Miss Flaningham's problem may be the eminently forgettable quality of the songs she has to sing, though this obstacle doesn't seem to have deterred the rest of the cast. There are moments — notably, the theme's blending of drum and trumpet flourishes into an on-the-road rhythm, the Chanticleer and Pertelote barnyard dance, and Nicholas' double-ended crowing about his noble cock — when the modern and the medieval mingle successfully. But for the most part the composers seem to have chosen the worst of both worlds, and Coghill exhibits far less verbal flair as a lyricist than as a translator. Since most of the songs have, in true musical tradition, very little to do with pushing the plot along, they must provide their own excuse for being. Few do.

The production's mounting provides diversion while waiting for the musical numbers to end, for it is as memorable as the songs aren't. The set, a pair of revolvable scaffolds combined with numerous (and evidently hard to manage) flats and drops, is a thoroughly flexible framework conveying some of the flat but bright quality of medieval illuminations. The costumes are even more illuminating for they are striking in themselves, in the patterns of color and texture they create, and in their fidelity to Chaucer's account of the pilgrims' array.

Canterbury Tales probably wouldn't claim to be better than the book, but it's fun and it's alive. And that makes it good enough to send one back to the source.

violently for half an hour with a friend, trying to point out to him that perhaps it was alright for Hitchcock to use anonymous actors, but not if they couldn't act.

I was referring specifically to The Birds, in which the worst horror was not the birds but the acting. My friend never denied that the acting was ghastly, but he refused to admit that it was a bad thing that the acting was ghastly. As I recall he did not say Hitchcock meant it to be ghastly, but that is the next step most commentators take.

To refresh my memory of certain pictures, I read parts of a book called Hitchcock's Films, by Robin Wood. It was lent to me by one of the students in the cinema course here — apparently they have to read it. If you want a kind of weird, instant paranoia you should read this book. Wood finds meaning in something by making it meaningless, but not letting on that it is meaningless. He justifies things by moving onto levels which really shouldn't be allowed to exist. I wish I had space to quote extensively from him, though his remark above, about Vertigo, may indicate how his mind works.

Well, there are some good things in Hitchcock's latest spy movie, Topaz — the opening few minutes, a few performances, particularly Michel Piccoli's, but nothing else. The plot is curiously weak. When it is over, the whole story seems to have been intended to move towards the suicide of a certain French official. But even the idea of his existence, let alone his death, becomes important for us only in the last ten or fifteen minutes of the film. It is like a crazy reversal of the idea Hitchcock used in Psycho where he killed off Janet Leigh near the beginning of the film. There the death meant everything to us, here it means nothing.

There is something strange about the Americans in this movie. The Cubans, the French and the Russians all use guns and get killed, but not the Americans. They are cool, debumanizing manipulators who perhaps reject violent methods. It is like a reaction to the vulgar and self-destructive use of power in Vietnam — this is the way the Americans should be controlling the world, it seems to say. If this is what Hitchcock is doing it is a pity he doesn't develop it further in some direction. However, and something like this always seems to happen with Hitchcock, the non-human effect may be a result of the sterile performances. There is no depth to the characters of the American spies and officials. If they are supposed to appear as sickening, one-dimensional, "I'm very sorry to bother you" kinds of people, then their acting, sterile or not, is perfect. But the point is not made strongly enough to make me believe in this, so I think it is unintended and that the acting is just plain bad.

Aldous Huxley said: "we all overact the part of our favourite character in fiction." These actors seem to be playing not real agents but characters they have seen in a million T.V. shows. Modern mass communication may finally see us overacting characters in movies who were overacting characters in other movies who were overacting characters in still earlier movies and on and on. Everything will then stop moving in any direction and just mill around forever at different points in the past. Maybe this explains why Topaz seems so out-of-date — with Hitchcock, the process is already taking place.

It is difficult these days not to be on the defensive when criticizing Alfred Hitchcock. There are people around who believe The Birds was a good movie, and at least one critic who thinks that Vertigo was "one of the four or five most profound and beautiful films the cinema has yet given us." I hardly know whether to take their arguments seriously. For example in several interviews Hitchcock has stated that he likes using unfamiliar faces in his movies to strengthen the actual situations. This sounds like a reasonable idea, but I once argued

Which like a magnet drew

These lines, published at the close of the Thirties in New Masses, an American left-wing weekly magazine, prophetically suggested what would happen to that decade during the next quarter century. The Thirties became a great official myth in our culture and the test of its enduring strength flected in the pages of New Masses, the weekly magazine which became a focus for the creativity of the decade. Contributors were never paid, yet the magazine consistently attracted the cream of American writers. The publishing of this anthology is an invaluable service, since it takes us back to the original confrontations with experience behind the myths that have survived.

The first thing that struck me was the number of stories which would not be out of date in today's press. It is as if the drums of the Fifties froze everything; nothing has been lived.

standing piece is a superbly ironic discussion of Mae West as a symbol of bourgeois culture, "the middle class molten in her hour of licence." Richard Wright reacting to Joe Louis' knockout of Max Baer in 1935 directly anticipates Eldridge Cleaver writing about Cassius Clay.

The writing in all these pieces is of top calibre. There is no question of crude political formulations. Men such as these (and others, including William Saroyan, John Dos Passos, Langston Hughes, Thomas Wolfe, and Ernest Hemingway) took their experience of the Thirties and, acting on certain implicitly understood premises,

At the same time he warned that "the spirit of a work of art proceeds organically from the work itself without artificially adding to it explicit propaganda."

This was a necessary cautionary note, as the work of some writers, including Joseph North, who edited New Masses for 15 years and compiled the present volume, demonstrates. Take this example. In a 1934 feature of a New York taxicab strike, a report of the remarks of a Harlem cabdriver at a strike meeting is framed by two sentences. Before: "How race hatred melts in the crucible of class struggle was poignantly evidenced when a Negro hackie . . ." and,

Moor (Marx), he could only spoil my style. Pretty soon I'd be saying things like 'surplus value', 'absolute and relative impoverishment of the proletariat', 'alienation', 'dictatorship of the proletariat' . . ."

Hemingway managed to lick the problem of writing politics in a human way. The anthology contains a superb example of this, a 1934 account Hemingway wrote firsthand of a disaster in which more than 400 World War I jobless veterans were killed because they were left without protection in work gangs in the Florida Keys in the hurricane months. Hemingway's second contribution to New Masses — a 500-word tism and fellow-travelling, still spring to mind.

The Cold War blocked out of the national consciousness a whole decade of hope and excitement to substitute years of mediocrity, complacency and conformity. All that has been handed through those years is the familiar self-justification "We were radicals too, you know, when we were young . . . But we were fooled, we were had . . ."

That kind of answer is simply not enough. Now too is a time of moral reorientation and upheaval. There is a reawakening, and perhaps it is time for a rediscovery of the past.

The radicalism of those years was re-mimer, whose lungs became infected with silicosis in a dangerous shaft; the miner expected to be dead in four months. There is a graphic description, through the eyes of a 15-year-old girl, of the exploitation of California migratory farm workers; her overwhelming fear is that if her baby comes in the night, there will be no light to see by. There is a dramatic account of a police tear gas attack on a Detroit General Motors plant and of how the hurriedly written impressionistic piece done following a bombing in Barcelona. Barrie Stovis recreates precisely the anguish and horror Picasso captured in his Guernica. And in 1934 Erskine Caldwell was writing about brutal murders and dead bodies in the swamps of Georgia. Another out-mate writes in his brilliant introduction to this anthology, "nearly all American writers were proletarian writers, without knowing it."

The French writer Henri Barbusse put it this way:

"Today it is not only a matter of restraining oneself from repeating and carefully sifting the eternal tragedy of the human heart; the adventure of love, desire, of old age, and of death; (However moving and profound these things may be . . . they always turn in the same circle that ends in nothingness . . .) Today we must enter into the collective drama. It is even more stirring than the drama of the individual, and it does not end with death."

workers was tremendous; it signified to me how deeply-injured prejudices and hatreds fostered among the proletariat can vanish overnight, when solidarity is needed in common struggle."

Obviously there is some profound human truth in the situation, but as effective journalism, this kind of approach is inexcusable.

North, as he admits in his introduction to the book, was aware that New Masses often "cut corners on excellence" but, he adds, "Did we catch the essence of the time? Yes I think we did."

North also recounts something Hemingway once said to him: "I can't read the

Another angle of this problem is brought out in an exchange between Michael Gold, who preceded North as the magazine's editor, and John Howard Lawson, a young left wing playwright. Lawson rightly puts down Gold for "cheap radical snobbery" in accusing Lawson of "repeating the same monotonous question 'Where do I belong in this warring world of two classes?'"

That question is the 'Thirties' equivalent of Cleaver's formulation, "You're either part of the solution or you're part of the problem."

That probably sums up the point that the problems and issues New Masses focussed on in the Thirties are no dead yet. They have not been resolved.

"Couple of guys named Marx and Engels. Find 'em and giv' em the works."

JOHN LEE HOOKER. That's Where It's At, Stax 2013. Simply the Truth, Bluesway 6023

The Stax record is largely old Hooker material. With the exception of one eight minute selection recorded recently to fill out the album, the numbers were recorded in 1953 and present the repetitive sound that Hooker has reproduced on countless records. The basic features are heavy, unaccompanied guitar playing, stomping feet, and moody singing. On a couple of numbers, the brooding vocal is spine tingling, but I've heard so much of this Hooker sound that I find more than a little of it a bore.

The Bluesway album is a pleasant surprise. Here John Lee is teamed with a pick-up five man band, and the result is great. Hooker purists may not care for the record because his distinctive guitar playing is pretty well lost among the harmonica, piano and other instruments. But without resorting to attempts to "modernize" his singing, he fits into the band setting beautifully.

BIG MAMA THORNTON. et al. Ball and Chain, Schoolie 1039.

Here it is. The original of that song that Janis Joplin rode to fame and fortune. And there is nothing like the original. "Ball and Chain" and a second number by Big Mama are the reasons to get this album. The rest, three rather nice, soul tinged tunes by Larry Williams and five good numbers by Lightning Hopkins, would make this only an average record without Big Mama.

ALBERT KING. Years Gone By, Stax 2015 Jammed Together, Stax 2020.

Albert King is putting out albums as if there's no tomorrow, and I'm not sure it's going to help his reputation. He has yet to recreate in a studio the power of his guitar on stage, and to my taste, Live Wire (Stax 2003) is still his best. Of his most recent records, Years is Memphis soul/blues and the best of the three. The horns are kept tastefully in the background, and King's guitar is given quite a bit of room. The King's Things are largely those of another Memphis man, Elvis Presley: Hound Dog, Don't Be Cruel, and that lot. There's even a Big Boy Crudup song that Elvis did, now being reinterpreted as an old Presley song. Trouble is that although some of the old tunes are alright, Albert doesn't really do anything for them. An occasional nice guitar solo, but that doesn't an album make. On Jammed, King is joined by guitarists Steve Cropper and Pop Staples (father of the Staple Singers). Each of them takes one vocal, but for the rest it's all instrumental. So that the listener can tell the players apart and keep score, Cropper plays shatterbox, Staples plays echo, and King takes it straight. Nice in parts, but they don't really pull it off, and the album will probably be of interest only to modern guitar fanatics.

B. B. KING. Alive and Well, Bluesway 6031.

The "live" side is by far the better of the two. It catches King working for a club audience and using the most recent developments of his increasingly ascetic guitar style. It's cool, controlled blues at it's best, and it's as good as or better than his great Live at the Regal album. Side 2, recorded in a studio and without his regular band, is not as good in comparison, but it's satisfactory, professional B. B. King.

CURTIS JONES. Now Resident in Europe, Blue Horizon 7703

Texas has been a good source of boogie and blues piano players, and two in particular, Curtis Jones and Mercy Dee Walton, have long been favorites of mine. Mercy Dee is now dead, but Curtis Jones continues to play regularly in Europe and Africa, wherever he can get a job (which isn't in the U.S.). His piano playing is delicate but sure, and his singing is relaxed. On three tracks he shows that he's considerably less talented on guitar, but they do little to spoil an otherwise fine album.

b. b. king was here

The old Rock Pile, of course, folded many months ago, and the new one, which opened last weekend, may very well be through as well. The place hardly had a chance to get started, and didn't even have a name (a tentative one, Club Foot, was dropped), when the Masons decided they no longer wished to rent the hall. It's too bad, because Toronto can ill afford to lose the place.

Anyway, while it lasted, the new club had one brief moment of glory: B. B. King's first set on Saturday night. It was the best B. B. King I've ever heard, in person or on records. He was more relaxed than I've ever seen him before, and he honestly seemed to be enjoying himself. Even though much of the set was his standard program, songs like Every Day I Have the Blues and Sweet Little Angel, I never had the feeling that he was just running through a routine, doing what he had done hundreds of times before. Between several numbers he dug into some solo jazz guitar and shades of Lonnie Johnson could be heard creeping into the B. B. King — he just seemed to be doing what he wanted and having fun at it.

There were times at the old Rock Pile when too much of the audience had come simply to make the scene rather than to hear the music, but this was certainly not the case Saturday night. The respectably large crowd at the first show had definitely come to hear the music. It was reasonably expensive, so they had to be there for that reason, and they gave every indication that they were getting their money's worth. It's just too bad that the second set Saturday and the one on Sunday were spoiled by small audiences.

Toronto needs a place the size of the Masonic Temple to bring in groups of the sort which otherwise only appear at infrequent intervals at Massey Hall (or, mostly, not at all). If you should happen to know of some place large enough to house a club, which is as conveniently located as the Masonic Temple, give me a call or write and tell me about it, and I'll pass the information along.

The Graduation of Rosemary

Conversation overheard in the Refectory:

"Hey, have you seen that great new movie 'John and Mary and Ted and Alice'?"

"Yah, it was really neat!"

This critic has yet to determine which movie they were talking about, but one thing is certain — there are an inordinate number of fun couples getting their kicks on movie screens in Toronto these days.

John and Mary, who are making it in the movie of the same name, are actually Dustin Hoffman and Mia Farrow. This is very fortunate because there seems to be an abnormally large amount of empty space in the movie without them. Director Peter Yates, who capitalized on our morbid fascination with violence in 'Bullitt', this time attempts to capitalize on our perverted fascination with sex — and he gets away with it. Perhaps the only thing we find out about the lovers (who remain nameless until the end of the movie), is that they are damned proud of their promiscuity. The funny thing is, that you couldn't imagine a less promiscuous-looking couple if you tried than this little girl and this mumbling clod.

The opening scene shows the couple making love, and for the voyeurs in the crowd the movie ends right there. J. and M. don their clothes and spend the rest of the film falling in love. The plot is as sketchy as that. We discover in the course of it that she is having an affair with some married politician and that he is balling this real voluptuous chick (you wonder why he is bothering with a skinny thing like Mary.) At the end of the movie they tell each other their names for the first time (that's the punchline) and we presume that they have fallen in love.

Much to their credit, Dustin and Mia make 'John and Mary' work. The pace is fast, the comedy is engaging and the stars do all the things which have made them big box-office draw. John emerges as an interesting mixture of Ratso and the Graduate, while Mia recites her lines in a strangely mystical way which reminds me of Rosemary's baby's mother. At the end of the movie we have felt absolutely nothing for John and Mary, but we have loved Dustin and Mia and so we are happy. Director Yates fails miserably in his attempts to portray the gay promiscuous life, but the movie succeeds in being light, unsubstantial and enjoyable. For the real thing though — run to see 'Bob and Carol and Ted and Alice. There you'll discover two swinging fun couples for the price of one.

The Hula Hoop ...

James Bond is alive and well and living in On Her Majesty's Secret Service. After an absence of two and a half years, the indestructible super-spy has returned to the screen under the able guidance of Albert R. Broccoli and Harry Saltzman, the masterminds of every Bond pic except for that inexcusable mistake, Casino Royale.

Since 1964, there has been a totally uncalled-for abundance of Matt Helms, Derek Flints and various other carBOND copies. As a result, Thunderball and You Only Live Twice, in order to keep up with the competition, came out looking like barely acceptable duplicates of sub-standard imitations.

Now that Hollywood is churning out human interest movies again, the secret agent market is virtually empty. Thus, not needing gimmicks to draw crowds, Broccoli and Saltzman have been able to delete to a large degree Bond's often-parodied horde of oversexed broads and his attache case full of impossible mini-weapons. In their place, Director Peter Hunt provides the viewer with undoubtedly the strongest plot, and the best fights and chase scenes since Goldfinger.

Many critics have panned On Her Majesty's Secret Service largely on the basis of what they feel was poor acting on the part of Sean Connery's successor, George Lazenby. The latter, in my opinion, actually has the misfortune of acting, not only in an extremely difficult role, but also for a very hard-to-please audience. Each and every Bond fan knows that, no matter what deviltry SPECTRE cooks up in its Swiss mountain-top lab, there is absolutely no possible way that Agent 007 can fail in his mission. This makes it very hard for the viewer to play along with Lazenby and undergo the suspense he felt when he believed Bond to be truly in danger of dying at the hands of Dr. No or Red Grant. In addition, it is not easy for Lazenby to reach an audience which has been brainwashed since 1962 into believing that "Sean Connery IS James Bond!"

Diana Rigg is delicious as Tracy, the only woman James Bond ever really loved. It does the heart good to see her lash out a few well-placed kicks and karate-chops after a two-year retirement from TV's spy series The Avengers.

Producers Broccoli and Saltzman have already promised Diamonds Are Forever for the few remaining Bondomaniaes. But by the time they hire James Bond number three (Lazenby has refused to play the lead again) and actually shoot the picture, 007 will probably have gone the way of the hula-hoop.

The no-holiday holiday.

Come to Britain and it's no holiday. The moment you get off the plane you're involved.

Not like most vacations, peering in from the outside. In Britain you're part of the action. And it's some action! We've got the discotheques, Carnaby Street, Kings Road and all the other fast-moving places you've heard about.

But, what about the things we take for granted: sifting through the Van Gogh's, Picasso's or Henry Moore's at the Tate Gallery; an afternoon watching the world's top drivers hauling their big, blasting, Formula 1 machines over the toughest circuits in Europe. Seeing a Shakespearean play, the way it should be seen - at Stratford-on-Avon with British actors; or perhaps, passing a sunny day at Lords watching the natives play their native game of cricket?

You can mix in, find out what we're all about - why Trafalgar Square isn't as square as you might think and a boat down the Thames means a roaring party, not a sedate sightseeing expedition. In Britain, it's all go. So why not go?

You could make it for as little as $175, that's for 9 days, hotel and two big meals a day. And, if you belong to a club or any organised group, you could cut the total price way down with a charter flight. Clip the coupon and find out what's going.

Come and take part in Britain - this year!

Library Exit Control

To reduce the loss of books from the University Library, the exit control system has been redesigned into this autumn. New inspection desks have been installed at the exits to the old and new wings of the Library, and will be in operation by getting as early as possible in the winter term. They will be staffed whenever the Library is open. A system of this sort has been under consideration for some time, but has been abandoned by many members of the teaching staff, and was urged this Spring by the Students' Administrative Council. All library staff and other faculty there using only the Waiting Room which has its own control system will be required to pass through these exit control points. All persons will be expected to present their books' receipts, bags and parcels for inspection as they leave the Library. There will be an express desk for persons leaving the building empty handed. Your co-operation is requested to ensure smooth operation of this procedure and thereby to help in the preservation of the library collection.

Writing a review of Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee is like trying to write an objective report on the Second Coming. The big problem is curbing a personal enthusiasm so that it does not offend the unconverted.

These two "greats of the blues" (for once I can agree totally with an introduction) are playing at the Riverboat until January 18. This is a review of what happened on one night, but don't expect to hear the same things if you go. This reviewer has gone two nights in a row on occasion and heard two entirely different sessions.

The first set on opening night got off to a good start with Blues Jumped a Rabbit. A lot of blues instruction books refer to Brownie McGhee when trying to explain some of the basic blues guitar rhythms. Brownie employs a very old-fashioned three-finger picking style which (in spite of the immense sophistication he brings to it) remains about the purest, most straightforward approach around. Meanwhile, Sonny filled in with the incredible runs, whoops, and hollers which only he can do. Brownie followed with Stranger Blues and then turned the solo work over to Sonny Terry. Sonny usually sticks to employing a B-flat harp for his numbers, a device which allows him to sing in F and still get a chord effect in the instrumental breaks. His voice is a rough, country type of voice, and stands in marked contrast to Brownie's polished city sound. During all the songs, he was stamping his feet half to keep in time and half just to contain his enthusiasm.

Then Brownie took over again. "Key of G," he said. "Got you covered," said Sonny, and they launched into a spirited version of Muddy Water. Then, they did their classic arrangement of Leadbetter's Rock Island Line. The two voices and two instruments blended perfectly in a song which always deserves better treatment than it gets from most other performers.

In the second set, Sonny sang Changed the Lock on her Door and something called the Hoodenny Blues. The latter was one of those unbelievable harp solos with wild "whoops" interjected at uncanny speed.

For a Tuesday night, the Riverboat was packed, but there was absolute quiet during every number. The crowd knew they were listening to the best music of its kind. Sonny Terry has produced great music with the best of them: Leadbelly, Gary Davis, Seeger, Houston, and Guthrie. He's still producing great stuff with one of the best left, Brownie McGhee at the Riverboat every night.

Tall, in dark cowboy hat, black vest and beetle boots, he places the square of wood on the stage floor behind the microphone. The guitar is lifted, tuned. His square cut face, smooth and clean peers from behind the microphone. A man from Marlboro country. He screams, the left leg arches back and comes crashing to the square of wood in a head-on rhythm. Stompin Tom is putting it down, words of folk-heroes like Bud the Spud,

*Bud the Spud
From the bright red mud,
Rolling down the highway smiling,
And the spuds are big
In the back of Bud's rig
From Prince Edward Island*

Perhaps he's Canada's only Eastern, down-home, cowboy, romantic humorist. His songs are of Canada, all of it. Tales of Sudbury Saturday Nights and bittersweet romances in Leamington:

*P.E.I. potato Met Leamington tomato,
She was mushy
Ketchup loves potatoes.*

They're dancing in the aisles at the Horseshoe. A middle-aged groupie rushes the stage and gives him a dollar for a song. Tramp, tramp, beetle boots on plywood. Stompin Tom takes a drink from the ice pitcher next to him and draws his sleeve across his face. More songs of Spud Isle and Cape Breton, "Where men are men, and the boys are double breasted." When he goes into a song, he adopts the speech and mannerisms of the people sung about whether they be "bluenosers, spud pickers or her-ring chokers."

What to make of this man Stompin Tom Connors? Here is a Canadian able to sing and write with the gentle humour of a man who feels a part of his land. He is able to spot the humorous in all areas of Canada. It's happy fun, not the biting sarcasm born of frustration. Is Bud the Spud our answer to Johnny Appleseed and The Jolly Green Giant?!

Mix Mark Twain with Walt Disney, film it, and the result will be something similar to The Reivers. Strangely enough, it all goes down nicely. Take no mistake about it, we're dealing with a fairytale set in the Old South. On this magical tour we find young Negro boys and white lads gambling naked in cool ponds amongst green rushes while Mother Nature looks on benignly. There are even white men who readily accept their ancestral Negro paternity and cleave to them as kin, whores with the proverbial hearts of gold, and kindly grandfathers who look just like Colonel Saunders.

The plot is pretty skimpy, but then most fairytales are not very profound. Two young bucks, one white and one black and a mere lad of eleven "borrow" a brand new yellow Winton Flyer and drive to Memphis for a lost weekend. The story is revealed through the eyes of the young boy who views the trip as an epic adventure into the realm of sin and manhood. After slogging through mud, carousing in brothels, and winning a race with a horse who runs like hell for a sardine, Grandfather finally catches up and the adventure is over. True to fairytale format, the young lad atones for his sins and is clutched to his Grandfather's bosom after being rescued from a whipping.

It works. The Reivers is a fine movie, a family movie which adults can enjoy without feeling guilty. The roles are all beautifully underacted, with no one taking themselves too seriously. The young boy (Mitch Vogel) fortunately avoids a wide-eyed, gee whiz characterization. The film is successful primarily because, however corny, most of us have shared in the same wondrous awe of stepping outside the realm of propriety to do a little honest sinning. Peeking at naked women, lying to parents and relatives stealing away from home, delicious mysteries all. In the end we all came back to Gramps.

After reels and reels of seamy sex, profound Swedish philosophy, and revolution, The Reivers is like a watermelon on a hot summer day. It's refreshing but you still have to spit out the pits.

Cactus Flower may well go down in movie history as the film that first introduced Goldie Hawn to an adoring public. For the movie was a triumph for the pert nymphlet, the new "blonde bombshell" of the 1970's.

Most people recall Goldie from her appearances on TV — as the girl next door in Good Morning World, and more particularly as the cute but dumb (and boy how dumb!) blonde kook on Laugh-in. Her performances there were, purposely, one-dimensional but in Cactus Flower she shows a depth and a range that one might not have expected. Furthermore, she dominates every scene in which she appears.

For example, in the opening scene, Goldie is seen trying to kill herself by closing all the windows and turning on the gas from the oven. She goes through the motions in an ordinary, straight way. There doesn't seem to be any particular cause for humour — certainly it must have seemed rather bare in the script. But by her mere presence, the whole scene becomes comic.

A more remarkable feat is the scenes she steals from that professional scene-stealer, Walter Matthau. It does seem poetic justice that Matthau, who dominated so many movies as a "second banana", should be so upstaged in one of his first major "top banana" roles.

The cast is singularly excellent. I was rather surprised, though, at the remarkable lack of prominence displayed by Ingrid Bergman — she seemed to be simply another supporting actress. However, Jack Weston and Vito Scotti are delightful in their roles, and Matthau does an otherwise competent job.

The plot is familiar. Matthau, a dentist, is having an affair with Goldie, a mistress. Matthau is a bachelor, but tells her that he's married with three kids. Goldie is upset about the situation and tries to kill herself, so Matthau decides to go ahead and marry her, so he creates a mythical divorce, and has his nurse, Ingrid Bergman, who for all these years has silently loved him, pose as his wife.

The action is totally obvious — we all know, practically from the start, what's going to happen. But where this is ordinarily a weakness, in Cactus Flower, it becomes an asset: We don't have to fool around with silly things like plots, and can sit back and just enjoy the fun.

But all in all, the film belongs to Goldie. The lady with the red hat and the feathers in front of me best summed it up when she whispered to her companion: "Oh, isn't she precious?"

Yes madam, she certainly is.

the lonesome range of andy warhol

"If everyone made films the way Andy does it would become as empty as the art world."

— Paul Morrissey, Executive Producer to Andy Warhol

Two or three dozen neon-filled glass tubes and several pools of fluorescent light along Yonge Street north of the Biltmore Theatre, Andy Warhol's Lonesome Cowboys is being screened 24 hours each day at Cinema 2000 on non-functional colour television monitors. Perhaps that alone indicates at least one aspect of the Warholian vision — everything customary and acceptable to those within Warhol's world, yet bizarre and disrupting to those beyond.

Despite his obvious failure as an effective film-maker in the traditional cinematic sense, Andy Warhol has revealed a persistently unique appreciation of the film medium which cannot be dismissed or condemned as casually as can the hundred irritating shortcomings of Lonesome Cowboys.

As one of the most prolific members of the established American 'Underground' (which includes Anger, Mekas, Emshwiller, Conner and the Kuchar brothers), Andy Warhol delights in defying rational perception and criticism. His 'films' (anti-films would perhaps be a more appropriate description) correspond approximately to three somewhat arbitrary conceptions.

Film as actuality. Empire: a stationary portrait of the Empire State Building, recording the shifts of light and shadow across its surfaces. Eight hours. Sleep: a pre-focused record of time in which a man is revealed asleep in bed. Eight hours.

Actuality as a process of change. Chelsea Girls: a split fragment in the lives of several characters within New York's Chelsea Hotel. Dual projection.

Change as disruption. Flesh and My Hustler: two records of the homosexual subculture, the former being a near-documentary in style and the latter, a typically Warholian exercise in basic iconoclasm. And . . . Lonesome Cowboys: "a cowboy's fantasy on the range."

Lonesome Cowboys is a random, camp, satirical demolition of the Western and is Warhol at his most irritating, self-indulgent, irreverent best. If little is gained, nothing is spared in Lonesome Cowboys. Renditions of the Catholic Benediction, Cartwright situation melodrama and selected permutations of perversion are combined to form the formless, or as Viva pontificates in all sincerity — "That's not what I've been exposed to in your presence. Your presence has exposed me."

Enter into the den of Viva and Nurse (the Don Juan and Sganarelle of insanity): a band of merciless, blood lusty outlaws one of whom insists on performing ballet exercises at the hitching rail. Andy Warhol is indeed present.

In Lonesome Cowboys, Warhol defeats and defies not only every existing rule of cinema, but also every existing standard of film criticism. The photography is disastrous, with frame lines sketched everywhere but around the action. The soundtrack is chaotic with camera bleeps forever punctuating dialogue. The editing might well have been improved had Warhol gathered his footage in tangles on the floor, donned razor-edged skates, and slashed his film to ribbons as he waltzed across it.

But Warhol in life, thought and conception, world without end . . . is a masquerade. To condemn Lonesome Cowboys in terms of its failure to adhere to the conventional terms of cinema is to argue that had Hamlet acted directly on his father's command, the carnage of the final act might have been avoided. It is completely irrelevant to apply past conceptions of cinema to Lonesome Cowboys, for Warhol's home movies either create their own standards of participation or, more frequently, defy participation completely. The critic in Warhol's world is without a home.

All this is not to suggest that it is impossible to appreciate Lonesome Cowboys as anything but a reflection of Andy Warhol himself. Cowboys is an effective mockery of exploitation in much the same way as is Vilgot Sjöman's I Am Curious (Yellow). But more significantly, it is a mockery of film itself — the medium which has passed from the novelty of 1903 and The Great Train Robbery to become the harbinger of commitment in the late 60's to be discussed by critics forever at the mercy of popular culture.

Lonesome Cowboys, in many ways, is a return to The Perils of Pauline when film was genuinely spontaneous. But we refuse to attribute simplicity to Warhol. We demand an equal measure of profundity and vicariousness in the 70's — those same demands that we have made of the Rolling Stones and about which Jagger sings with justified bitterness and resignation on Let It Bleed.

Perhaps the true mark of Warhol's talent and originality in Lonesome Cowboys is that he has ignored us all completely. As the Nurse whispers to Viva after she has been raped by the 'outlaws', "It's alright. We've just made $135."

ian ritchie

The prevailing quality surrounding Lonesome Cowboys is Andy Warhol's characteristic, teasing New York party-joke obscenity. There are no titles, no suitably suggestive strains of theme music. Instead, Warhol's camera pushes into the touching mawkishness of a too-closely observed human intercourse.

Warhol's use of sex is interesting in that he forces the viewer to see and hear more than all his previous conceptions of perversion have permitted. We come to realize that sex in this film, as performed by Warhol's smaller-than-Hollywood regulars, has the force of brutally exposing the naivety and the blemishes of people in close communication, beyond the bounds of convention. On a formalistic level, Warhol is saying that this is how it is when there aren't any silk sheets and broadloom — this is what you really recognize, isn't it? The comic quality of sexual frenzy, so far from what is ever intimated in even the 'new frank film, is what Warhol catches. He grasps also the frail, again gently comic concept of sexual attraction, often distorted to the deodorant-ad level. Through Viva primarily, Warhol portrays copulation as a meaningless sort of divine peace. Loretta Young crucified at last.

Opposing, and mingled with the lengthy inroads into the cine-sexual mystique, is Warhol's comic technique, which often consists of fore-shortening an obvious joke. He is inferring, perhaps, that since one is aware of the context and history of such humour as appears in Westerns, and of such humour as surrounds the homosexual milieu, why prolong the dead air necessary for audience participation?

Warhol's comic range exists somewhere between the vaudeville of Will Rogers and the endless giggles of the Goon Show and of the Peter Cooke/Dudley Moore school. It is based on a series of poses very distant from the characters who speak (the Warhol regulars). Then again, perhaps the reigning influence is the old Our Gang series. After all, Viva and the boys are old friends and the pose is that of a band of gay commanchemoes accompanying the lone Barbara Stanwyck-figure — tender but dirty-mouthed.

Yet, whatever the sources, the comic scenes all adhere to a pattern — one liners piled up one after another, punctuated by vacant glances, muttered sotto voce, and seemingly overheard by the audience. The overall effect is that of the spasmodic 'disappearance' of the camera, frequently followed by a scene such as the attempted gang-rape of Viva, wherein the performers cavort directly at the camera, making us aware of its mediating function and of Warhol's presence.

Viva and the boys, for all their intimated sophistication, are curiously 'soft-edged' characters. They are, by nature, closer to the somewhat undeveloped cowboy of the films of the 1930's. They possess that embarrassing tendency to reveal the soiled undergarments of their minds in funny, estranged voices. But the Mild Bunch are all very frank and gentle with each other in the midst of their gay rough-housing. The oldest toughest brother is forced to break down when he falls in love with Viva's dream-boy and has to compete with his young brother for his attentions. Viva dies in her euphoric realization that she has enjoyed the ultimate love gesture, her nakedness more grotesquely reminiscent of a famished martyr than of any sex-goddess. Always the gross and the tender struggle for supremacy in the characters.

The awkward self-awareness of these cowboys is very different from the crisp, hard-edged quality of Ratso Rizzo. Joe Buck and the two Easy Riders. Warhol never tampers with the message common to all three sets of cowboys — that of loneliness and the still voice of solace. His cowboys are much slighter in construction, of course. They are reminiscent of the mumbling endearing heroes who cropped up in early Westerns, like a young Jimmy Stewart with a guilty veneer of gay life, fumbling from the heart, embarrassing himself and the audience in the process, and chronically aware of the burden of his role. By contrast in Midnight Cowboy and Easy Rider, the cowboys are twentieth century life-seekers, chasing their fate through the fashionable slums of fashionable America, while their fate pursues them in the persons of the assuredly hostile heartless world. Warhol's boys are admittedly falsifying themselves and are slightly guilty but rather touching in their admissions.

Where Fonda and Hopper are didactic and pensive, Warhol's cowboys are gaily venturesome, but fragile enough to shatter their own assumptions with lost illusions. They cannot justify themselves — they're only having fun, and as fairly free emotional individuals (not heroes), they are less isolated from the viewer as he sits fidgeting in his seat. The very shabbiness and rough-cut quality of Lonesome Cowboys has a sneakingly attractive breath of naturalness and less appealing sense of sidewalk gray coldness, the homosexual, the motorcycle youth and the New York hucksters are all falsifying themselves everyday, while the movies go on falsifying youth. Still the feeble voices from the television screens at Cinema 2000 are probably the most directly touching. Of all the new cowboys, the gay cowboys are the loneliest.

FILM

After more than a year's absence, Repertory Cinema has returned to the city in the form of Cinema Lumiers at 290 College Street. Admission prices to "a season of notable films from the sixties" are more than reasonable — Sunday matinees and Monday $1.00, Tuesday to Thursday $1.50, Friday to Saturday $2.00. The series currently being offered contains a wide selection of fine revivals. Jan. 9-11: La Guerre est Finie by Alain Resnais; Jan. 12, 13: Petulia by Richard Lester; Jan. 14, 15: Charlie Bubbles directed by and starring Albert Finney; Jan. 16-18: Weekend (!) by Jean-Luc Godard; Jan. 19-21: Targets by Bogdanovich concerning which little information appears to be readily available. All letters gratefully welcomed on the subject. Any subject!

Elsewhere, several Christmas commercial releases still linger. Topaz at Loew's, John and Mary at the Hollywood North and Bob & Carol & Ted & Alice at York II. Exalted: The Reivers — a superbly undracted, carefully directed, beautifully photographed heirloom. Damned: (despite Henry) On Her Majesty's Secret Service, with particular acknowledgements to George Lazenby for the most leaden performance of the year.

Nemesis of the Year Award: to the Alberta film censor who was recently apprehended by police in the act of implementing his oft-discussed liberality in bed with two fourteen-year old girls.

Review Contest Number 5: Select the five best films from the past year. Select the two worst. Deposit answers in the Review office, 91 St. George St. First prize for the most judicious selection: Martin Knelman's telephone number. Second prize: unlimited perusal of the Varsity's photo file.

The Film Section is still in need of reviewers. If interested leave your name and telephone number in the Review office or call Ian Ritchie at 923-9047.

MUSIC

Watsup in theatre is: Canterbury Tales at the O'Keefe through 17 January and Hair officially opening Sunday at the Royal Alexandra for an indefinite run. (Company manager Gerry Livengood asserts that there are tickets available for every performance, current previews included, in spite of rumours to the contrary.) Ionesco's Exit the King at the Global Village and Shakespeare's Richard III at Theatre Passe Muraille open Tuesday 13 January. Also on the 13th, the Victoria College Dramatic Society opens a new student play, The Private Man, at Central Library Theatre. Written by Allan Stratton, the play "deals with a politician's struggle to reconcile his private code of ethics with his public responsibility" and is an entry in the Dominion Drama Festival.

In case you don't know who those five scruffy looking guys are, it's THE BAND. What more needs to be said. If you're into their thing, and a great many people are these days, you'll want to be at Massey Hall Sat. Jan. 17 to catch them. As of this writing (Wednesday night) there are still tickets available for the 7:00 show, so if you hustle, you may be able to pick up a couple.

SONNY TERRY and BROWNIE MCGHEE, back for one of their regular appearances at the Riverboat, are heading into their third week (review elsewhere).

At The Onion this weekend, one of the all-time greats of American folk music: DOC WATSON. The man is an extraordinary guitarist in the Appalachain country tradition and is highly recommended to almost anyone, regardless of musical taste.

Things may be happening to revive jazz in Toronto. Most important is the opening of a place called Matt Muldoon's (197 Queen St., E) with ELVIN JONES (also, on Friday night, a local jazz group called Fertility, and on Saturday a twelve piece band playing "free jazz"). Admission to Muldoon's is $3.00. Then at the Global Village, there are regular jazz jam sessions on Friday nights and rock and folk on Saturday. And some of the regular places are active too. The Cav-a-Bob has swing tenor man BUDDY TATE, playing with the rhythm section of the former Saints and Sinners, and at the Colonial

For rock, besides The Band, there appears to be only ERIC MERCURY/ELECTRIC BLACKMAN at the Hawks Nest Saturday and Sunday (Friday night now out). The Cosmic Home, mentioned here before Christmas, has had its phone disconnected, and as far as I know no longer exists.

ALMETA SPEAKS continues at Old Angelos, as does STOMPIN' TOM CONNOR at the Horseshoe Tavern.

The CBC's answer to the Mariposa festival, called Rock 1, will be on TV Sunday night, with Ian & Sylvia, Bruce Cockburn, Big Mama Thornton, The Pentangle, and others.

will always be known as a member in good standing of the party killed by police and police agents. Panthers from New York, New Haven and Berkeley who know Sams—describe him as a "madman."

He was expelled from the party by the Central Committee last year when it was found he had stabbed a brother, and rumors connected him with the raping of sisters in Chicago. Chairman Seale was persuaded to let Sams back into the party by Stokely Carmichael.

Many Panthers now doubt whether Sams ever fled to Canada or was captured there after the (black) slaying, as the police claim. They believe he was probably with the police all along and that his "disappearance" was used as an excuse for the police to blast their way into Panther headquarters in Detroit, Chicago and Denver, where they burned food intended for the Panther free breakfast program, looted and destroyed files, and smashed office equipment while they supposedly "searched" for Sams.

The Panthers do not think it was a coincidence that shortly after the pig visit to the Detroit headquarters Panther Area Captain Mike Baynham was found with two bullets in his head, a "suicide," according to the police report.

The Panthers do not know if Miss Luckes, who talked the same way as Sams at a recent bail hearing, is a police agent or if she was intimidated by the police while in jail.

the First Amendment) which prohibits anyone from saying what Hilliard said that day. Put in any name but the President's and it's quite within the law, but since "Richard Nixon" is what he said, Hilliard is now being held on $30,000 bail which the court ruled must be posted only in the form of cash or property. Charles Garry, the Panther's top attorney, termed it "ransom," but it is hardly a new phenomenon for Panthers to get bails designed to be unpayable.

FBI ILLEGALITY

A few days ago, the FBI detained several top-ranking Panthers at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York City. The Panthers, including Field Marshall Don (DC) Cox and Minister of Culture Emory Douglas, were en route to Algiers to visit exiled Minister of Information Eldridge Cleaver. The FBI obtained the Panthers' luggage—which had already been checked with Air France—and illegally seized materials destined for Cleaver. The Panthers eventually were able to make their journey, but the FBI kept the materials. All the Panthers could do was file a protest with Air France.

Meanwhile, developments in the New Haven Panther 14 case have confirmed the Panthers' allegations that George Sams, an ex-Panther whose testimony is responsible for their arrest in the first place, is nothing more than a police agent. George Sams and Loretta Luckes cooperated with the isolation cell, agent of the Presidential police force — the Secret Service — arrested Davis Hilliard, the Panther Party's national Chief of Staff, on Dec. 3 in downtown San Francisco for remarks he made during a Nov. 15 rally against the war at Golden Gate Park.

DENOUNCES FASCISM

At the rally, Hilliard denounced the fascism of American society and the viciousness of its attacks on the Black Panther Party. By the end of the speech Hilliard made no attempt to conceal his anger:

"We say down with the American fascist society. Later for Richard Milhouse Nixon, the mother-fucker. Later for all the pigs of the power structure." The crowd reacted nervously to Hilliard's strong language, and he answered them. "Later for all the people out here that don't want to hear me curse because that's all that I know how to do. That's all that I'm going to do. I'm not ever going to stop cursing."

"Not only are we going to curse, we're going to put into practice some of the shit that we talk about. Because Richard Nixon is an evil man. This is the motherfucker that unleashed the counter-insurgent teams upon the Black Panther Party. This is the man that's responsible for all the attacks on the Black Panther Party nationally."

"Fuck that motherfucking man. We will kill Richard Nixon. We will kill the firings, has scheduled a series of protests that could lead to a general strike by the department within three weeks.

The administration Wednesday shrugged off the resignation of English chairman A. G. Hooper, who said the purge — affecting 17 of the 43 English faculty — made his position "intolerable."

Malone accepted Hooper's resignation in a press release, and suggested Hooper should leave the college entirely.

Faculty within the department have already begun their resistance by withholding Christmas examination results from the college's record office. They also intend to advertise in Canadian and U.S. academic journals urging academics to avoid Loyola.

A "day of mourning" for the department is being conducted today — classes are cancelled, and students will conduct a mock funeral in front of the college.

If the administration refuses to change its position on the firings, faculty and students will hold a strike vote

January 26; other college departments, including history, are expected to follow suit.

The professors — 10 per cent of Loyola's teaching faculty — were suddenly fired December 15, as students began concentrating on end-of-term exams.

Faculty and students charge that the professors are the victims of a political purge, brought on by their support of students protesting against the firing of Santhanam, released without cause at the beginning of the fall university term.

Many of the fired professors openly supported a three-day student strike in mid-October, which failed to achieve its goal of binding arbitration by the Canadian Association of University Teachers in the Santhanam case.

A CAUT investigation team eventually began hearings on the Santhanam affair in early December; the team received no support from the Loyola administration, which refused to testify.

Argo's answer expected soon on Varsity proposal

By LYNDON LITTLE

Canadian Professional Football is no stranger to Varsity Stadium.

In fact, the pros regard it as one of their shrines.

In 1950, during the Grey Cup "Mud Bowl" game, Winnipeg's Buddy Tinsley almost drowned near center field when he was knocked unconscious and fell face down in a giant puddle.

Four years later Varsity was again the scene of one of the CFL's greatest moments as Jackie Parker snatched victory for his Edmonton Eskimos out of seemingly certain defeat as he picked up a fumble in the dying minutes of the game and limped on a gimp knee the length of the field for the winning touchdown.

However, after the 1958 season it all came to an end as the home town pros, the Argonauts left Varsity Stadium for the roomier confines of the new Canadian National Exhibition.

This fall, the sports community in Toronto was astounded at the announcement by the Argo management that, unable to come to satisfactory agreement with the CNE concerning a new contract they were considering returning to Varsity for the 1970 season.

No final agreement has been reached as yet but here is the situation as it stands today.

UP TO ARGOS

Lou Hayman, Argo President, acting on behalf of the board of directors has approached J. P. Loosemore, financial secretary for the U of T Athletic Association.

"We've given the Argo management our terms", Mr. Loosemore explained earlier this week, "and the decision is now up to them."

"The situation is certainly far from ideal for the Argos," he adds, "one large problem involves a conflict of dates."

In early November one of the dates which the Argos must hold open for a possible playoff match is reserved for an SIFL tilt between the Blues and McMaster. Mr. Loosemore leaves no doubt that the OQAA schedule, which is already finalized, takes priority and that the Argos would have to make other arrangements if they accept the U of T offer.

Mr. Hayman, in a telephone interview on Wednesday, felt that the schedule problem need not necessarily prove to be insurmountable.

"The conflict of dates is certainly one of the disadvantages of the move to Varsity," he noted, "but we've found in the past that when one team in the league has a schedule problem that the other teams are usually willing to make a change."

CRAMPED FACILITIES

Other annoying problems which Mr. Hayman suggested the move to Varsity would involve were the lack of adequate practice and parking facilities. During the '50's when the Argos were here they were able to use the back campus for their daily scrimmages. Now, the heavy schedule of intramural football and rugby games precludes this.

The capacity of Varsity Stadium (27,000 against 34,000 for the CNE) is also a drawback of serious proportions. Both the Varsity Athletic Directorate and the Argo management have ruled out any consideration of enlarging the stadium through the addition of a second deck as much too expensive.

With the Argos already playing to capacity crowds for the majority of their home games the gate receipts would show a decided drop. Whether the lower Varsity rent would offset this will probably be the deciding factor in the ultimate decision.

As far as the "ultimate decision" is concerned, Mr. Hayman promises that it will be settled one way or the other in "a week or two" when the Argo board of directors returns from their holidays down south and have a chance to meet.

Despite the concerted negotiations on both sides, there remains a lingering suspicion in many minds that the Argos are not really seriously considering a move back to their old home and that rather they are merely using the threat of a move to U of T as a ploy to force the CNE to moderate their terms.

But, Mr. Loosemore quickly withdraws from any suggestion that the Argos might not be sincere in their negotiations.

"You must remember," he adds, as he tips his chair back and pauses to gain emphasis, "that we at Varsity owe a great deal to the Argonaut Football Club. Had it not been for their financial help we would not have been able to build the West side grandstands in 1950 or have been able to afford to add the floodlights in '53."

So while all the factors seem against it, what many people regarded as next to impossible may indeed come to pass and this fall the old stands of Varsity Stadium could resound to the clash of Billy Joe Booth locking elbow pads with Bob Hudspeth.

Blues beaten 10-4 by Loyola for Centennial Trophy

Somewhere, sometime, an eternal optimist with masochistic tendencies once remarked, "behind every dark cloud there is a silver lining".

Despite all its limitations as a phrase it just about sums up the feelings of coach Tom Watt and the Blues hockey team towards their trip last weekend to the Loyola Centennial Hockey Tournament in Montreal.

The very large dark cloud took the form of a 10-4 trounceing at the hands of the Loyola Warriors in the tournament final Sunday afternoon plus several additions to the injury list.

The silver lining was the encouraging play of talented center Brian St. John. The Blues' captain was seeing his first game action since suffering knee ligament damage prior to the season's first league game.

The Blues departed for Montreal last Friday with their manpower already depleted. Veteran center Paul Laurent was forced to remain behind due to academic commitments. Defensemen Bill L'Heureux and Brent Swanick and forwards Bryan Tompson and Nick Holmes were all still out of action with assorted problems.

CRIMSON CONQUERED

Blues played Harvard (winners 7-4 over McGill Friday night) in their first game Saturday evening at the suburban Pointe Clair arena and won 7-5 in what coach Watt described as a "heart game". In that one Blues were forced to come from behind three times.

The first period was pure disaster as the Crimson jumped into a 2-0 lead with the Blues obviously suffering from the three week layoff since their game on Dec. 14th. However, by the seven-minute mark of the second Blues had it tied up on goals by rookie Bill Buba and Len Burman. Harvard again went ahead twice in the same period but in each case Blues came back to even the score, with Terry Peterman and Mike Boland connecting.

In the third period Varsity outscored Harvard 3-1. Boland, with two more for his first hat trick as a Blue, and St. John picked up the goals.

If Watt and the team had any knowledge of what was in store for them at the Montreal Forum the following afternoon in the final against Loyola no one could have blamed them if they had failed to show.

To begin with, it was discovered that defenseman Bob Hamilton had injured his ankle against Harvard and when he tested it before the Loyola game he found it was no go. Before the afternoon's ordeal was over Terry Parsons and Boland would join him on the sidelines while St. John, John Wright and Peterman would sustain minor losses.

STAYED CLOSE
Surprisingly, Blues stayed close to the Warriors for two and a half periods.

The first was scoreless but Loyola took a 5-2 lead in the second on goals by Mike Lowe, Alain Tremblay, Chris Hayes, Ron Riley and Mike Thomas. Bob McGuinn on a pretty play with Dave Field and Peterman and then Peterman with a power play marker re-pled for Varsity.

Lowe scored early in the third on a breakaway to give the Warriors a 6-2 lead but two goals by Wright brought the Blues back in the game by mid period.

Blues looked at this point as if they might be on their way to the come-back of the year.

Then — as the saying goes — "the roof fell in".

The Warriors scored three goals in a space of one minute and five seconds and it was all over except for the inevitable "We're No. 1" chants by the fans. One more Loyola score just before the game ended made it the highest score ever racked up against a Tom Watt-coached Varsity squad.

WRIGHT ON ALL STARS

Wright was the only Blue named to the tournament all-star team which included one from Harvard player and four from champion Loyola.

Blues have two important road games coming up this weekend which are "must" games if they hope to keep pace with the high flying Waterloo Warriors.

They travel to Hamilton to play their third and last league game with the McMaster Mar- lins tonight then move on to Varsity Blues swing back into action this weekend, and if you're willing to travel a bit you can take your pick of five different sports.

The hockey Blues head out on their last major road trip of the season, taking on the hap- less (and winless) McMaster Mar- lins in a SIHL Western Division game tonight in Ham- iltion. They'll go to London af- ter the game, and in the morn- ing carry on to Windsor for a joust with the Lancers tomor- row afternoon.

Blues need two wins from the weekend to stay in contention for the playoffs.

The basketball Blues will also be in Windsor tomorrow, to open their league season against the perennially strong Lancer team.

Meanwhile, the wrestling and swimming teams travel to Waterloo. The swim meet is a tri-school affair, with Windsor coming up to join in the splash.

And rounding out the week- end, the gymnastic team has a tentative date to meet Varsity Saturday.

Windsor for their first meeting with the winless Lancers tomor- row afternoon.

At the beginning of the week it appeared as if trainer Howie Ringham might be packing more crutches than hockey sticks for the weekend junket but now it looks as if the Blues will at least be able to muster a quorum.

Defensemen Hamilton and Parsons will likely be fit to play. Wingers Tompson and Boland are in the doubtful cat- egory but with St. John round- ing into shape and Laurent ready to gain the centre line once again the class of the league.

BLUENOTES: It took them four years but the Loyola team finally won their own hockey tournament — Blues took the Centennial Cup the first three times. . . Waterloo edged last year's national finalists the U of Alberta Bears in an exhibi- tion game over the holidays. . . Winless McMaster leads the league in one category, they hold the top three spots in the penalty parade — Blues' Dave McDowall is fifth.

Graduating from University this Spring?

Looking for a good job?

Try American Empire.

Like this young man.

When Pierre graduated with his B.A. from Jean de Brebeuf College in 1940, he was a confused young man like most of you. He had great ambitions. American Empire persuaded him to further his education. He received his law degree at Université de Montreal and was called to the bar in 1943. But Pierre, like most young men had an interest in why things are the way they are, so we obliged him. He came down to Harvard where he received his M.A. in political economy in 1945. But he was on to even better things: Ecole de Sciences Politiques in Paris and London School of Economics. We could see he was a young man with promise.

He was a young man out to change things, clear away the musty cobwebs. When he joined the Privy Council in 1949 as an economist and political advisor, we knew we had a real mover on our hands. When he challenged the conservative and crusty regime of Maurice Duplessis in Cité Libre, we knew he was our man.

We like our clients to be happy. Our young men are working hard at changing conditions. Pierre showed he had the drive, the intelligence and the charm to do the job so we made him our chief agent in Canada, the position he now holds.

You want an interesting job, right. A job that will help you plug into the mainstream of North American life and yet be a master in your own house. If you want to swing, but want security, try us. We'll be recruiting on the U of T campus on February 2 and 3.

Quebec Government may intervene in Loyola firings

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Quebec Government may decide to intervene in the current crises at Loyola College, but government officials would make no definite announcement until they had consulted with the Loyola administration.

The possibility of provincial intervention — through the government commission of inquiry — arose Friday from a private meeting between Yves Martin, provincial deputy minister of education, and four Loyola professors.

Following the meeting, Martin said that Quebec's Department of Education considers "the issue at Loyola a serious one that deserves our attention." But Martin will make no decision until he confers with Loyola administration president Patrick Malone — who unexpectedly left for Texas Thursday.

Malone is not expected to return to Loyola until tomorrow or Wednesday.

The meeting with Martin was arranged by the Association of Loyola Professors, formed in the wake of administration firings of 27 faculty on the grounds of "upgrading academic standards" and in preparation for an anticipated decrease in Loyola's enrollment next year.

Loyola students and faculty charge that the administration purged the professors because of their support of student efforts to secure binding arbitration by the Canadian Association of University Teachers in the case of nuclear physics professor S. A. Santhanam. Santhanam was fired without stated cause by the administration at the beginning of the fall term.

The CAUT is expected to release a report of its findings in the Santhanam case sometime during the week.

Also on Friday approximately 1,200 Loyola students watched quietly as the College's English Department which lost 17 faculty members in the firings, was laid to rest in the snow in front of the campus chapel.

Immediately after the ceremony the students voted to continue a sit-in in front of Malone's office as part of an effort to prevent the purging of the 27 faculty. The sit-in began last Wednesday.

The same evening, protestors trooped from the administration building to the Jesuit residence on the Roman Catholic campus, where they burned a puppet-sized effigy of administration vice-president Jack O'Brien, believed to be central to the firing decision. O'Brien had returned to Loyola that evening from a communications conference held in Bermuda, but forwarned of the demonstration, he spent the evening in a nearby motel.

TARTU: Second experiment in Communal Living

By KAREN COULTER

"Tartu College is a new 17-storey residence presently (if you're picky about grammar 'currently') under construction at the corners of Madison and Bloor Street," says the blurb on the front of the pamphlet.

Prospective residents are promised a new experience in campus community living. "It is hoped that Tartu College will be the RIGHT NOW habitation within the university community. To that end, mature and interesting people will be selected. The building will be co-educational and it is left to the individual whether he desires to live in a separate or co-educational suite."

However, anyone concerned about democracy and community in multi-unit housing can only be disappointed in the Tartu experiment.

Built by the Estonian community of Toronto as a combined university residence and cultural centre, Tartu now boasts three fully occupied floors. The main floor common rooms and lounges are still in the skeletal stage and the elevators are not yet operative.

A typical suite consists of six single rooms, two complete washrooms, and a shared "kitchen-lounge." The bedrooms, though completely furnished and carpeted, are rather small (approximately 80 square feet). The advertised "lounge-living room" consists of two easy chairs and a wooden bench at one end of the kitchen. Rather uncomfortable "lounging" for six people!

The broadloomed hallways, which connect the five units on each floor, are narrow, dimly-lit and generally cheerless. They provide no perspective for the Estonian art which the management hopes to introduce once the building is completed.

Services include a professional cleaning staff and laundered bed linen. The monthly rent for single accommodation is $85. Residents preferring to do their own cleaning receive a yearly rebate equivalent to one month's rent and those signing a full-year's lease an equal amount.

Members of Worker-Student Alliance picket outside Simcoe Hall

WSA, police, scuffle in lobby

University refuses guarantee on cafeteria workers' jobs

By GEOFF MEGGS

About 35 members of the Worker-Student Alliance pushed their way through 14 campus policemen at Simcoe Hall Friday, but failed to get an administration promise to rehire three former New College cafeteria workers.

J. F. Brook, executive assistant to Vice-President A. G. Rankin told a WSA delegation he could not and would not "make any guarantees about jobs."

The WSA had a petition signed by over 800 demanding the hiring of the last three workers still unemployed as a result of the change of caterers at New College in December.

Of the 42 cafeteria workers who went on strike after losing their jobs, 38 were rehired and one doesn't want work at U of T.

The WSA charges that campus police sat in on the job interviews of the three others and identified them to Beaver Foods as organizers of the strike. The group picketed Simcoe Hall for about half an hour after six were ejected from the building at 1 p.m.

POLICE PUSHED ASIDE

The group heard a short speech by WSA-member Bob Dewart (SGS). They then pushed through the doors of Simcoe Hall despite the frantic efforts of the police to contain them and throw them out onto the street.

Over the tumult the voice of Steve Moore (SGS) could be heard shouting, "We want to present a petition to Mr. Malcolm. Will you let us in? Answer the question. Will you stop fighting and answer the question?"

M. A. Malcolm is Director of Administrative Services.

Once inside, the group reformed and asked to send a delegation of three to Malcolm, but the police, headed by security chief Bill Lawson, refused to discuss the issue until the WSA handed over a missing key.

(No one had the key, but a member of the security force came to a WSA meeting later to again demand the key. It apparently was President Claude Bissell's key-case containing house and car keys.)

Finally it was agreed that three WSA members would be taken to meet Brook.

POLICE RECORDS

Brook told the delegation two of the workers were not rehired "because they have police records" but added that "the university does not hire them, the caterers hire them."

Brook said police may have been present at the interviews "because the WSA has caused a lot of trouble — they sent one of our police to hospital, and incidentally, we don't recognize your group on campus."

Bill Schabas (II UC) asked Brook if "it was official university policy not to hire people with police records."

"I'm not going to talk about this because I am not sure that it happened," said Brook. "The police were there to prevent trouble. Your group had caused trouble." He added that he felt a police record was a legitimate reason for not hiring.

"You don't have a case with the university, you have a case with Beaver Foods."

SCARE TALK?

"We don't have to do anything," Brook replied, "don't give me that scare talk."

"We are not going to insist that Beaver hire them and we are not going to hire them if jobs don't exist."

Brook's office later issued a statement outlining the history of the strike. The release admits that Beaver Food "stated that if any employees could not be absorbed in the present operation at New College they would endeavour to give them employment in other operations in the area."

"Despite harassment from the picket line," says the statement, the strikers were interviewed. "A university constable was assaulted by demonstrators outside Simcoe Hall and required hospital treatment."

The release emphasizes that "the decision not to re-hire those three was made by Beaver Food Services, who have the sole responsibility of staffing the New College Food Service."

VARSITY STORY PANNED

Finally, Brook states that "contrary to the story appearing in Friday's Varsity, the university police attended the employment interviews solely to prevent disruption. They did not attempt to identify strike leaders to Beaver Food Services."

In an interview Friday afternoon, Brook told The Varsity there were never more than two or three police at the interviews, none of whom interfered with or participated in the interviews.

However, the WSA still insists police were involved in the interviews and denies any knowledge of the injured policeman.

Meanwhile, Beaver Foods has given the rehired workers a raise to $1.40 an hour from the minimum wage of $1.30 and the WSA reports that the workers have been told they will lose their jobs if there is any more "trouble." They have no union.

Of the three workers, Doug Annabelle has been out of work with an accidentally broken shoulder, but definitely wants to be rehired; Peter Swiorowski is employed in a restaurant but will return if offered a better job; and John Kincaid is dropping newspapers from the back of a truck and definitely wants to come back.

The WSA plans to further circulate its petition and a new leaflet, to continue picketing Simcoe Hall and to hold a mass meeting Friday at 1 p.m. in the Free Speech Area of Sid Smith.

If any demonstrator ever lays down in front of my car, it will be the last car he'll ever lay down in front of.
George C. Wallace, 1968 campaign

Uncovering the hidden violence . . .

For a moment I was suspended at the second set of doors into Simcoe Hall — held momentarily in check by four policemen attempting to halt the flow of demonstrators pushing their way into the building.

About six inches from my face a 30-year old plainclothesman was telling me in a level but hurried voice to "go back out there now. Don't get yourself hurt. Just relax and go back outside and it'll be fine. Come on now, please now, go back on out."

Behind him four or five policemen chased around the member of the Worker-Student Alliance who had pushed their way through, while about another seven police hesitated on the fringe like young kids who had just joined the gang and didn't really want to fight.

"I'm not struggling," I said, "I just want to present a petition to this guy." And an instant later everyone was through and both sides were staring at each other puffing and shaking from the cold and the excitement. It occurred to me that with a hundred more on each side it could have been a real riot. It must have occurred to the police a long time before it occurred to me.

After hurried negotiations between security chief Bill Lawson ("be reasonable, Steve") and WSA member Steve Moore ("but, Bill all we want...") it was agreed that a small delegation could see a representative of the administration.

Forty minutes earlier, I had entered Simcoe Hall just after six cold demonstrators had been pushed out onto the steps. The 30-year old was reporting to a superior and as he hung up the phone he said to the man at the Information Desk "Nossir, not one of them comes in. They all stay out."

And forty minutes and a short scuffle later, they were all in. The trivial violence could not be blamed on anyone. The university (owner) had forbade entry to the WSA (trespasser) and attempted to use a little force to make their decision stick. The students (employers as members of U of T), had wanted to speak to the administrator (their employee) in their own building and used a little force to make their decision stick.

The situation goes further. The university didn't want the expense and problems involved in dealing directly with the food workers. Therefore it hires Beaver Food to do the job instead. After Beaver Food has taken a profit the cafeteria workers get $1.40 an hour — 10 cents more than the minimum wage.

The university does not deal with the workers but controls their situation.

According to members of the Worker-Student Alliance and the workers themselves, University of Toronto police were involved in the interviews that resulted in all but the strike organizers being rehired at New College cafeteria.

Whether or not this is true (the administration has denied it) the fact remains that the organizers were not hired and those who did get jobs have been told they will be fired, if there is any more "trouble." This, too, is trivial violence. If the university had been conducting the interviews, it would be considered real violence.

Varsity cartoon by Ted Michener

. . . in a quiet university

Very little seems to be happening at the University of Toronto.

The parochial compartment of the University of Toronto police force seems absurd in the context of this multiversity.

Friendly, middle-aged cops acting out their Quixotic vision of chivalry before the gates of Simcoe Hall. Stemming the timid seep of 35 members of the Worker Student Alliance. A little invective, a few apologies.

Meanwhile the pigs are ripping off the Panthers in the States . . .

"... When Wayne came out of Central Headquarters, he was shouting 'All Power to the People', although he had been wounded five times by shotgun pellets in the chest, leg, and stomach. He's in good health and spirits now at New College Jail . . ."

In comparison the action at the U of T seems to be a silent-film episode of cops and robbers.

At Berlesey mace is mace, and cops are pigs . . .

"... The bus stopped at the gates and two guards with shotguns jumped on. 'Alright you cleeps, move your asses out of here. The last guy out gets his head cracked open.'"

On the surface, there seems to be no violence at the U of T. The uniformed cops act out their role as father-figures. There's nothing a pat on the head wouldn't cure. A few U of T plainclothesmen walk around with a trench-coated secrecy about as subtle as Dick Tracy. At the open meetings of the left there are always a few lurking around. One always carries a briefcase. And there's a walkie-talkie inside. Oscar for special effects.

But behind this masquerade of confrontation politics, there's a university and a real world.

The scene in front of New College may seem comic. But there are still three former cafeteria workers who are without jobs for political reasons.

As the spectre of non-violence at U of T threatens the circulation figures of the daily press, real violence continues not just at Berkeley or at the Panthers headquarters or in the urban ghettos of America, but at the University.

It's latently present — in that this university continues to perpetuate a political and economic system that leaves 25 per cent of the Canadian population below the poverty line.

The U of T is located in Toronto, the conduit of the American capital that is responsible for strip mining in British Columbia, planned underdevelopment in the Maritimes, and the economic subjugation of the people in Quebec.

You've heard it all before. But it doesn't touch you. And besides, there's academic freedom and democracy. We live by values.

A university doesn't have to design napalm to perpetuate violence. Each day economists, sociologists, political scientists perpetuate the violence of inequity and exploitation.

And English professors. Even the purest confines of the ivory tower perpetuate violence by their lower academic acceptance of the present situation.

And it's not all academic. . .

It's not just the classrooms and the textbooks and the research grants. That one incident of the New College cafeteria workers illustrates best how the university directly perpetuates a system of exploitation in its own operating policy.

Although the surface actions appear to be the politics of the absurd, behind Monday's skirmish is the university's hard line policy that prevents its operating staff from organizing for a decent wage and a decent standard of working conditions.

The student reform movement surfaced last year, as the new politicians like Bob Rae and Steven Langdon ex-

The other side of the expressway debate

By WILLIAM DOLMAN
William Dolman is a graduate student in urban and regional planning.

The Metropolitan Toronto Transportation Plan for the Spadina Expressway is not a plan of possible future roadways in Metro Toronto. Instead it is a comprehensive analysis of the needs of Metro Toronto for transportation in the future, suggesting a combination of roads and transit systems to meet those demands.

The basic factor is the transportation of individuals; however, truck traffic (which accounts for 45 per cent of all urban vehicular movement) is not overlooked.

Although rapid rail transit is cheaper than an equivalent expressway; where only a few people travel in a given direction in any given hour, it is not economically possible to provide public transportation.

Without public transit, all transportation must be served by the private auto. Suburban development (at up to 10,000 persons per square mile) cannot even support buses travelling with traffic in rush hours only. At other times such lines must be heavily subsidized.

Furthermore, for many years now, 70 per cent of rush hour trips to the central business district of Toronto have been carried by public transit. This proportion is greater than any North American city outside of New York and Chicago, and is not likely to change. Even the removal of transit fares would only increase all transit trips by 11 per cent.

In future most of Toronto's employment growth will occur in the suburbs, areas which cannot be served by public transportation.

Building the Spadina Expressway would not necessitate construction of the Cross-town Expressway. The latter is necessary as part of the balanced plan to provide access across the city. The system is a unit, parts cannot be added or subtracted at will. Leaving the Spadina out would be akin to leaving the main artery out of the right arm of a man.

The analogy is valid, if only to demonstrate the importance of a full road system to the life of a city as the carrier of goods to the cells (residential blocks).

Note also that the Spadina, costing $220 million, is two travel routes which can be built cheaper together. Either alone would cost about $150 million. In addition, the maintenance costs on the expressway would be matched by maintenance and labour costs on the transit line.

GREAT DENSITIES

A transit-only system would mean great densities, not only at the centre of the city, but also all along the transit routes. Rapid transit lines would have to become apartment-house alleys to house all the persons working in the dense downtown area.

This district, also, would possibly expand to the area bounded by Bathurst, the CNR line, the Don, and the Waterfront in order to accommodate all the businesses which would have to locate there due to the lack of transportation services elsewhere, or possibly dissipate into the surrounding countryside as have the businesses of many large cities due to the ensuing congestion in a transit-only plan.

Lower Manhattan, the most auto-congested area in the world has only one U-shaped expressway at its edge. Even if private cars were banned, roads would be still congested due to taxis and trucks. These could not be banned, or the remaining businesses would leave.

"Expressways are the sole cause of the breakdown of urban life. Expressways strangle the city." That is a half-lie. The absence of expressways strangles the city just as much by cutting out truck servicing, and removing economic choice from the poor living in the centre of the city as all their potential jobs move out to the suburbs.

The transit system serves the lowest common denominator — persons who live and work near the line — neglecting the trucks which service primarily residential areas, job locations in the suburbs (low skill jobs which are desired by low income central-city residents), and the whole of the middle class.

It is unreasonable to assume, as Herbert Gans points out, that the middle class individual (even the Mustang-buying youth of today), will change his high opinion of the direct and quiet trip to work, the privacy of low density housing, the choice, and the social and cultural system (not neighbourhood-oriented) which expressways allow.

TECH-FIX

Furthermore, to hope that the technological innovations which would permit such freedom without autos of some type will show themselves and be accepted within the next generation, is to pray for a tech-fix that is presently only in the dreams of such idealists as Buckminster Fuller (a man who even now is 50 years ahead of his time — and what do we do for 50 years).

This tech-fix would take years to build, and would cost billions of dollars in congestion as well as construction and disruption costs to build in downtown Toronto alone.

A balance must be made to promote the change needed, as writer Jane Jacobs herself implies to keep a city dynamic and growing. This balance of public transit and expressway building has been one of Toronto's secrets over the years — the presence of a choice is why Toronto has "boomed" while other cities have "busted". To give in now to a false hysteria from non-equivalent events in American cities (whose social problems do not compare with any Canadian city except Halifax and Windsor) is to give in to an environmental determinism that has been proven not only false, but also naive.

The Spadina Expressway is controversial, not from its aspect as a destroyer, but from its aspect as an instrument of dynamic growth — a dynamic growth which does threaten the Lower Spadina business area, as it will be uneconomic (not just too congested) for these sweatshops to continue to use this valuable land — a dynamic growth which is necessary for Toronto to remain a vital, exciting city — a dynamic growth which must be not only accommodated, but also aided against the stativity of ideas of continuing and inviolate neighbourhoods and land use patterns which some "urban experts" would teach to be the goal of our society.

explored the council rooms of Simcoe Hall. There was a bright burst of optimism, and then student movement passed through the structures of SAC and went underground.

The world's problems were told to wait until the publication of the Commission on University Government Report. And alarmed administration set up the processes of reform. The faculty looked by in religious injury.

Now the CUG Report is published, and the institutional politics of the university are paralysed amidst a myriad of implementation committees and working groups.

The faculty and the administration are set in an incestuous deadlock, the former arguing for scholarship, and the latter arguing for efficiency.

And the students are bored. And somewhat ignored by the whole process. The words "student power" and "radical" have become palatable and thus cliched.

It's hard to see through this quasi-political fog of orderly process to see what's really happening at the university. But the administration's attitude to the cafeteria workers might give us an indication.

Despite the affirmative energy that can be directly intuited from John and Yokos efforts, phases of only reading about them in a fucked up press still gets me into mangling arg-phases of seeing that John and George are having a gradual send up, because John regularly gets some negative comment about George in, whenever he talks about Beatles. Well maybe it's true, but very little is final, so even if they do have a send up, that is not the end. "Metal-flowers were the first ornaments used in printed books; they have been divided into old and new, which to be sure is a division, but such as conveys nothing or a false idea to the understanding.

The former expressed some meaning and were formed from real objects, as from weeds and flowers of the field and garden, leaves, branches, fruits, crosses, banners, alunces and tilting-spears.

The latter, though mostly now in vogue, are mere figures of fancy, made up of circular oval and angular turns, contrived to look light, airy and unmeaning, and to try the genius or patience of a compositor.

— Dissertation Upon English Typographical Founders and Foundries; by E. R. Mores, 1778.

East of Queen's Park lies the land of Saint Michael, where, in a Temple by a great byway dwells an oracle known as the court-Marshall. This oracle prophesies that the minion Communication shall wax great and burst his iron bonds, metamorphosing so quickly into new forms that he shall soon reign supreme, yea, even over the very Content of his former masters.

I, a young Undergraduate of the Court, did therefore set out across the wintry fens of the Park in search of this creature's humble beginnings. It was within the preserving confines of Massey College that a shop containing eight antique printing-presses was discovered. One passes the gate, descends to the cellar (past Secretaries on either side, the ratchet-releases on their Remingtons cocked and ready) and promptly walks into a brick wall. "Are you looking for something?" a young woman asks.

"Yes," I replied, in broken reverie, "I have an appointment with Mr. Douglas Lochhead." As she leads me away from the wall and around to a studded metal door, it should be known that Mr. Lochhead is in charge of a unique collection of presses (of which five are fully operative), dating back to 1852. They print out folios from a collection of type so varied in size and degrees of ornateness that Mr. Lochhead (Lock-head) says, with the pride of one looking to the Old World, it is better equipped "than similar print shops in English universities."

He works with Tom Lytle, a Rochesterian come to the U of T by way of the University of Queensland (Australia). Both are bound in tough, ink-stained aprons and, while Tom rolls out a viscous glob of ink with an instrument called a brayer, Mr. Lochhead peers genially through half-spectacles and explains that "we go right through . . . the whole history of printing and the hook, and actually go through every step of printing pamphlets and broadsides."

For whom? "We have 51 PhD candidates in bibliography this year," — "(a small number, I thought to myself)" — "the biggest group I've ever had", and his hands moved in a small Anglo-Saxon gesture that communicated a giantness of enthusiasm.

Sprinting round a stolid black-iron Albion Press, he points to a graphic of a 16th-century press, so similar to his 19th century ones that you "can have the feeling you're going through the same motions they did in the early days."

We are standing among beds of type and minute, orderly blocks of metal-flowers and other ornaments such as leaping fish or leering gorgons. Upon the wall, Renaissance graphics of presses with fine letters identifying parts; woodcuts of Western Canadian circus posters.

Through this "working museum" Lochhead reaches back to his oft-repeated "early" . . . "I have a keener appreciation of the really splendid work done by the early printers," he says, with a mildness removed more than the true several geographies from the University outside, which though born about the same time his earliest press, runs not so smoothly for any addition of each application of Allen wrenches.

It is true, of course, that the Printer's Shop in the Massey basement no thunderous impact on the community, nor the community of "We're interested in the history of printing," definitely smiles Mr. Lochhead, "not in the latest developments of using the camera, and so on, though when they want to duplicate some type which is left only on a form on a wrinkled page, "we have a photoengraver make the engraving and we actually make the type."

Those of us elsewhere in the university most likely have only seen work in the occasional Pocut Ltd poster, and outside the U of T are only two universities with schools of bibliography receive material from the Massey print shop once did either man apologize, attempt to link printing past and present (though, at my prodding, Lochhead mentioned the creative use of print on the TV screen "especially Big Ale in the Big Land"). As the whirl of serifs and ampersands solitary printed sheet on the board leapt out: "HOHO!" it said.

Thereupon I plunged back through the well-wrought gates, down the avenue of castles, the Keele Three-in-One on my left, the Ho-the Stag on my right, trying to understand what makes a story. And, resting in the shadow of the Seven-Foot Horseman, it came to me that This Did. For had not Tom Lytle said, "When we really get going, we can print 3 or 4 copies a minute" with pride; was their work not relevant because it merely contents; were they not adamant in finding parallels between past and present only to amuse me, not abate or unfang me?

Never before in my travels had I spoken one and a half hours to anyone on campus and heard no taint of evangelism. Now it had happened.

As I crossed the last peril, the Circle of Everlasting Speed (erected by a vindictive Queen), I recalled another circular phenomenon:

"... the latter, though mostly now in vogue, are mere figures of fancy, made up of circular, oval and angular turns, contrived to look light, airy and unmeaning, and to try the genius or patience of a compositor."

What an express way to confusion, I thought; and who, would wish to be a compositor ought certainly turn from such abstractions, could he but find the exit.

And I truly wondered what my tweedy oracle should say, upon hearing my kind words for the past. Should I be made to count the dots on the TV screen, until my eyes implode. Who knows, and who cares; for I know that somewhere in the changing university there is a pocket of pastness.

Canada can't sell out

WASHINGTON — Canadian firms owned and controlled by U. S. companies will not be allowed to sell goods to Red China if they contain any U.S. parts, the U.S. commerce department has announced. The announcement dashed hopes coming from another department — the U.S. treasury — that "non-strategic" goods made by American subsidiaries in Canada could be traded with China.

Such subsidiaries have in the past been forbidden to trade with China at all. Now only goods made entirely in Canada with Canadian parts will fall outside the U.S.-imposed ban.

each other as they do, Tartu and Rochdale just seem to invite comparison. Indeed, Tartu seems haunted by the example of Rochdale.

Estonian architect Henno Sillaste, designed both buildings. Although reluctant to comment on the fate of Rochdale, he does outline some of the measures taken to ensure that Tartu will develop along vastly different lines. All residents are required to be enrolled in some institute of higher learning and graduate students are preferred.

"Tartu is a study-oriented, adult residence, attempting to fill the gap between Rochdale and the in-loco-parentis college residences", he says.

Sillaste still considers his involvement with Rochdale a very valuable experience, while deploring what he calls "the rocker morality" of the drug subculture which developed there.

"Student power is big business," says Sillaste. He cites the Scandinavian student movement as the ideal which Canadian students should pursue. "I would be very surprised if a residents' association does not spontaneously arise in Tartu," he says.

Ervin Maegi, building manager and president of the Estonian fraternal organization which founded the college is more outspoken in his criticism of Rochdale.

He attributes its problems to a lack of financial sophistication on the part of the organizers. "They allowed power to fall into the wrong hands," he says.

There is no danger of that happening at Tartu. Selection of residents is done by a board of Estonian students and professors. Thus far, no preference has been given to students of Estonian background. Aare Puhm, president of the Estonian Students Association at U of T does not foresee such a policy in the future.

However, it is Tartu's early-aborted educational program which best illustrates its determination to avoid the Rochdale experience.

Praxis is a social research institute, founded by Howard Adelman of York University's philosophy department and Abe Rotstein from U of T's political economy department. Its main purpose is to combine research with social action. For instance, last summer it undertook an educational program under the direction of Prof. Chuck Hanly for urban blacks. As a result the previously unqualified blacks were admitted to U of T.

In January 1969, Tartu and Praxis had what Adelman calls "an understanding" that Praxis would organize the college's educational program. Gerry Hunnius, an Estonian and a Praxis research fellow, was to have been registrar. However, in March Tartu denied that there ever had been such an understanding. Adelman himself is not bitter about the change of plans, saying, "I can understand their position. They were fearful of going the way of Rochdale. They just didn't want their building all messed up."

So far, no alternate plans have been made for an educational program.

In the realm of tenant control, Tartu fails miserably. In spite of Sillaste's predictions of spontaneous resident associations, the students themselves feel that there is nothing left for them to regulate. All exigencies are completely covered by the standard apartment-hotel (Tartu's legal municipal status) lease which all residents are obliged to sign.

The landlord retains the right to inspect any unit at his own discretion. The clause whereby a lessee waives benefit of legislation restricting the landlord's right to sell his property for payment of rent was recently invalidated by the Ontario Legislature. Nonetheless tenants who signed the lease before November were legally bound at the time.

Equally odious is regulation 22 of the "affixed rules and regulations," whereby the landlord retains the right to make further reasonable rules to ensure the safety and cleanliness of the premises and "for the preservation of good order therein." The landlord is sole judge of what is reasonable. The inclusion of such a "peace-order-and-good-government clause is an effective method of limiting the apartment dweller's control of his environment.

Pauline Belanger, (Scar I) former Rochdale resident, now lives in a co-educational Tartu unit. She calls the close relationship within the suite "a sort of continuous sensitivity group. However, the opportunity to meet kids in other units is extremely limited," she says.

She sums up the difference between the two residences, saying, "At Rochdale, the philosophy became more important than the building. At Tartu, there is no real philosophy."

Rather, it seems that there is a definite negative philosophy — not to become another Rochdale.

SAC considers six-dollar rebate to Erindale, Scarboro councils

The Students' Administrative Council is going to rebate half of the fees collected from their students to the Scarborough and Erindale Student Councils if the recommendations of a SAC committee on the two outlying campuses are accepted.

It is also expected to set up a tri-partite committee to negotiate future fees schedules. SAC has already decided to return $5750 to Scarborough, and $3750 to Erindale from this year's fees.

The relationship between the new campuses and SAC has been an issue since last year's presidential elections. Of the $22 collected from each student this year as student fees, $12 went to SAC.

For this money, the Scarborough students got The Varsity, and Radio Varsity. The Scarborough Students Council has had to organize and finance its own International Student Union, course unions, Free University, dances, cultural events, and co-op housing from the remaining $10.

The Scarborough Liberation Front, organized last year as a joke, soon became a rallying point for Scarborough separatism, with its omnipresent red and blue buttons.

Liberate our $12 from the dead chains of SAC" was its motto, and it promised that "this time the Dragon is going to slay St. George."

SAC president Gus Abols says "We recognize that Scarborough and Erindale are not just colleges, but well on the way to becoming campuses. It seems like a good idea for us to handle this problem before it gets out of hand."

The joint SAC-college committee was set up after Scarborough appeared before the SAC finance committee this year $5000 in debt, and asked for a total of $16,000.

Rookie Blues pace swimmers

U of T Swim Blues traveled to Waterloo Saturday for a double dual meet with Windsor and Waterloo. By the end of the meet, the swimmers had piled up a score of 85-28 against Windsor and 77-35 against Waterloo.

The most striking fact was simply that the meet was not won by the most experienced swimmers but by the team's depth, those who are striving to prove themselves. They have already put in three months of hard work preparing for the championships and are now beginning to see some of the results of their efforts.

Outstanding performances were put in by freshman Jim Adams in his 50 and 100 yd. freestyle victories. He was joined by other event winners Bob Watt in the 200 yd. freestyle and Morris Vaillancourt in the 200 breaststroke.

Freestylers John Twohig and Chris Rockingham and backstroker Robin Wilson showed that hard work pays off for freshmen by finishing second in their respective events. Twohig was second in the 50 and 100 free; Rockingham in the 1000 and 500 free; Wilson in the 200 back and Gessing in the 200 free.

Veteran Mike Guinness posted a personal best time in the 1000 yd. freestyle and Terry Bryon won the 200 backstroke. Probably the best spectator event was the 200 Individual Medley. Co-captain Terry Bryon touched out George Roy of Waterloo winning by 2 tenths of a second.

Blues will put the strength of the team to the test Friday when the tangle with the University of Michigan. Michigan finished fourth in the U.S. last year and are just as powerful this year. The pressure of such a meet is sure to produce some of the season's best times. Blues move from Ann Arbor on Friday back to London for a dual meet with Western on Saturday afternoon.

Bluettes storm Western

U of T women invaded the University of Western Ontario Saturday for a tri-school meet with Western and Windsor, and walked off with top honours in two of the four featured sports.

Most successful was the archery squad which captured the top four spots in its matches. Toronto's Sue Young had the deadliest eye, leading the field with more than 500 points.

The senior volleyball team, led by Jenny Karstoff, downed Western three matches to two. But the intermediates were able to scrap up only one win in five games with the strong Western squad.

As expected, Western's perennially strong basketball teams proved too much for the competition, defeating Toronto's intermediates 71-31 and then edging by the seniors 47-36.

The seniors dropped their second game of the day 57-45 to a very fast Windsor team. Cathy Cullis, who also led the attack against Western, racked up 14 points in the game, followed by Anne Thompson with 12.

In badminton, Toronto teams defeated all comers.

The weekend action provided a good warmup for the volleyball and basketball teams, who are preparing to face Guelph here on Wednesday night.

Four point weekend for Blues

Blues veteran defenseman Bob Hamilton shows his offensive skill as he tests Mac goalie Gary Inness in the third period of Friday's game in Hamilton.

Laurent started things going at the 1:18 mark as he picked up Len Burman's rebound and flipped the puck high over the left shoulder of Mac goalie Gary Inness.

Burman got the next one as he broke in over the blueline on a partial break and tucked the puck in the right corner. Holmes, set up nicely by Laurent, and then defenseman Dave Field on a fine shot from the point completed the scoring in the initial period and gave Blues a commanding 4-0 lead.

Holmes, who played for the Barrie Flyers of the OHA senior League last year, scored the only goal of the second and added one in the third for the hat trick in his first league game as a member of the Blues. Laurent assisted on them all.

SHUTOUT SPOILED

Marlin rookie Russ Stephens spoiled Watson's shutout bid with a screened shot from the point mid-way through the final period.

If Friday was "welcome back Nick Holmes night" then Saturday was an "afternoon matinee featuring Paul Laurent and his amazing feats on ice." Blues' perennial high scoring center had been held to only three goals in league play prior to the weekend. Saturday he broke out with a four goal effort against Windsor.

The Lancers opened the scoring with a power play goal at the 8:40 mark of the first as Tom McFadden connected with Blues' Bob Hamilton sitting out a hooking penalty.

Then Laurent went to work! Five seconds after McFadden had scored Laurent tied it up on a pretty play set up by linemates McGuinn and Holmes then just 25 seconds later he gave Varsity the lead as he broke in all alone on Lancer goalie Don Bruner and flipped the puck into the top right hand corner. He added one more in the second and another in the third.

Sophomore winger Terry Peterman, taking the place of injured Mike Boland on the right win of the John Wright line, capped a fine weekend with two goals against Windsor. Wright, John Gordon, up from the PhysEd interfac team, and McGuinn added the other goals for Blues while Bob McCabe added the second Lancer score.

Blues' rookie Mike Cyr did a fine job killing penalties in both games.

Captain Brian St. John playing his first league games of the season following knee ligament damage failed to score but skated well.

BLUENOTES: Blues' four point weekend left them two points behind Waterloo who defeated Western 8-2 on Saturday in Waterloo...Guelph Gryphons dropped a 5-3 decision to the Mustangs on Thursday night and are now one game behind Blues in the loss column...Blues' third line on the weekend was composed of St. John between Bryan Tompson and Len Burman on Friday with Gordon taking Burman's place on Saturday...Defenseman Bill L'Heureux and Brent Swanick remain the only Blues left on the injury list.

An outrageously funny spoof on the Western film, in the Warhol tradition. Taylor Mead is the zany of our time. a Zane Gray idea, written by Anstophanes and performed by members of De Sade's stock company Warhol's cowboys have an easier, non-violent masculinity than the mythical Hollywood types. The highly explicit love scenes between Vival and Tom Hoppertz follow the convent-bred Superstar's remarkable seduction of this curiously angelic-looking youth as she recites for him the Catholic Benediction, complete with chants. Rape never had more willing victims than this part!

Taylor Mead, who is stoned most of the time, and Vival are magnificent comedians. Lonesome Cowboys is liberally seasoned with our favorite 4, 8, 10 and 12-letter words and a cornucopia of nudity and sexual carrying-ons. It's by far Warhol's best film

B-Ball Blues impressive in loss to Lancers

By PETER WHITE

Contrary to speculation Toronto Basketball Blues will not play dummy to the straight men of Intercollegiate basketball this season.

In the season's opener at Windsor Saturday night they bucked the fates, the drums, the love and even the rear tire of Master McNaughton's limousine before dropping to a wearied bunch of Lancers 71-58.

Windsor coach Paul Thomas was particularly impressed by a Toronto defence which throttled his high-flying defending champions, holding them more than twenty points off their average. In an encouraging post-script he pointed out that no team coached by veteran mentor John McManus, will be of interest to many locals. We'll all know better after next Saturday's crucial game at Western. A second consecutive defeat in this year's balanced league could spell fins.

Victory at Windsor holds an allure similar to the forbidden fruit — it is to be dreamed of, not had (at least not since 1959)

But it was a groove of a loss and a hopeful beginning for the inexperienced Blues. With John Hadden the only returner to the starting line-up they played the very flashy Lancers to a standstill in the second half.

The seeds of defeat lay buried in the 38 handovers Blues laid on their opposition. Most of these were the result of the intimidating press which collapsed on guards Garth Evans, Larry Trafford and Mike Katz.

LATE RALLY TO WIN

Windsor won their ball game in the last five minutes of the first-half. Blues, playing well and only five points down, succumbed to the relentless pressure of the Windsor press and returned to the dressing room at the half facing a 13 point deficit. Only a saint could deliver visitors to St. Denis Hall from such a down. Blues are the good guys but there is not a saint among them, particularly of the St. Bob variety.

Throughout the first half the excellent work of John Hadden dominated the action. Blocking shots and pulling in rebounds at both ends of the court his work served as a rallying

By LYNDON LITTLE

One of the most promising line combinations for Tom Watt and his Varsity Blues hockey team during the pre-season exhibition schedule was the trio of veteran center Paul Laurent with newcomers Bob McGuinn on the right side and Nick Holmes on the left.

However, during the late November weekend swing to New York to play matches with traditional rivals St. Lawrence and Clarkson, Holmes injured his shoulder in the Clarkson game. The line broke up as Watt was forced to juggle his personnel to meet a rash of injuries.

Holmes resumed practice during the Christmas break but did not accompany the team to Montreal for the Loyola tournament.

Happily though, the three were re-united once again in time for Blues' weekend road trip to McMaster and Windsor and they responded like long lost buddies out for a night on the town.

That line picked up nine of the 15 goals Blues scored as they downed the McMaster Marlins 6-1 Friday night and the Windsor Lancers 9-2 Saturday afternoon to gather an important four points in their race to catch the Waterloo Warriors atop the SIHL Western Division.

Laurent had five goals and three assists, Holmes had three goals and one assist while McGuinn, who played with Cornell last season, contributed a pair of goals and three assists.

FAST START

Blues were really flying for the first time since they clobbered the Western Mustangs in their first league game on November 28.

They started from the opening face off in Hamilton and never looked back.

In fact, the game was eight minutes old before the winless Marlins managed their first shot on Adrian Watson in the Toronto goal.

see FOUR POINT, page 11

point. After a so-so exhibition season John looks ready for a big year. Chris Wydrynski, Windsor's all-star forward ripped for 17 first-half points.

Blues quickly dropped back in the second half and with twelve minutes left trailed by 22. However the rest of the game belonged to Toronto. Oh that the video tape machine could only record those last twelve minutes.

Running easily at last Toronto closed to within nine points of the Lancers. Coach McManus points out that two quick baskets at this stage could spell upset. Such was not the case of course.

Garth Evans, in his second season with the Blues, played with a verve still rare for the usually inconsistent Blues. His and Larry Trafford's 13 points led Varsity. Mike Katz continues to show flashes of class but has yet to put it together for a whole game. Scoring totals indicate the forward line does not hold much scoring punch. Our forwards were dwarfed by their opposite numbers on the Windsor squad and can expect the same from other teams in the loop. Toronto will have to look to Hadden for more offence.

Next Saturday and Western looms larger all the time. A win would be of inestimable value not only in the standings but as an agent to bolster team confidence. Blues learned this week-end that Windsor will be had. It will be an interesting season. See you there.

Police end six day sit-in, Loyola closed

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Confronted by 100 Montreal riot police, 350 students and 20 faculty peacefully left Loyola College's administration building Monday afternoon, and ended the non-violent sit-in which they began six days earlier.

The sit-in was called last week to protest the administration's refusal, without adequate explanation, to renew the contracts of 27 professors.

Sunday night Loyola's Board of Trustees, under pressure from faculty and students, invited the Quebec government to set up a fact-finding committee to investigate the crisis.

It then shut down the university for the week.

POLICE ARRIVE

With administration head, Patrick Malone S.J. in Texas, Loyola's Acting President A. J. Graham, S.J., called in the Montreal police to end the sit-in.

Graham and the 100-man riot squad arrived unannounced.

Protected by visored helmets, and armed with four-foot billy clubs, the police stood inside the entrance of the administration building, while Graham ordered the demonstrators to leave the building.

The students asked for fifteen minutes to discuss the matter and to read a statement to the press, but Graham didn't reply. He gave them one minute to leave.

They formed a procession of two's and filed past the ranks of police. Singing "We Shall Overcome", they solemnly carried out the wreaths and coffin used in last week's mock burial of the English Department which lost 17 professors in the administration's purge.

UNTOUCHED COMPUTER

After six days in the administration building, the students left it undamaged. The college's computer sat untouched just a few corridors away from the lounge where they were gathered.

The sit-in began last week with 100 participants, but at one point Sunday night the number had swollen to 500.

All day Monday, liberation seminars were spontaneously held by faculty and students, despite the administration's cancellation of classes.

The Board of Trustees said it cancelled all "classes, meetings, and scheduled activities in order to facilitate a freer and more profitable exchange of views."

The trustees — all Jesuits — form the supreme governing body of the college.

TRESPASSERS

By shutting down the campus and closing it off to all students, they also gained the legal right to call in the police and accuse the demonstrators of trespassing.

Although all campus buildings were out of bounds to students, faculty and administrators were allowed to use their offices.

Yesterday many professors continued to hold classes by moving them to off-campus locations.

The faculty are furious at the administration's interference in academic affairs. Many of them have joined with students in fighting Loyola President Patrick Malone, S.J., and the rest of the Jesuit administration.

"They closed the college, threw us out, and then wanted us to have a rational dialogue," English Department Vice-Chairman Stanley Russell told a mass meeting of students and faculty yesterday.

500 IN CHURCH

The meeting was spontaneously organized by word of mouth and publicized by broadcasts of an underground FM station in Montreal. Five hundred people squeezed themselves into a small church near the campus. Security guards would have stopped them from entering the Loyola auditorium.

As organ music played faintly in the background, the crowd heard a series of speeches from faculty and students.

"I want to thank the captain of the police force," said Michel Flores, one of the student leaders. "Their arrival meant the end of the Jesuit administration of the college. We sat in to protest the banishment of free speech at Loyola.

"We are not crazy radicals, but people who have decided to stand up against repression on this campus. We will continue to protest until the Board of Trustee's decision not to rehire the professors is reversed."

Seventeen of the 27 professors whose contracts have not been renewed opposed the Board's unexplained decision not to rehire Physics professor S. A. Santhanam four months ago.

DANGEROUS MAN

"I am not being allowed on this campus — I am too dangerous," Santhanam told the meeting. (In December he received a letter from the administration that prohibited him from the campus.)

The administration's act of calling in the police was irrational, unreasonable, and irresponsible. The sit-in was very peaceful and there was no destruction. Yesterday's demonstration could have ended differently, if there had been any provocation. We all know how easily the Montreal police are provoked.

"It's time we told the community and the college that we will not entrust Loyola to these individuals in the administration."

The meeting passed a resolution of non-confidence in the administration. The English faculty made the motion and organized a mass secret ballot. Of the 463 students and faculty present, 453 voted in favour, six against, and four spoilt their ballots.

"We want to know who the six 'concerned students' are who voted against," one student asked. The "concerned students" are an information force of students on the Loyola administration's payroll. The Loyola News revealed their identities and their salaries last week by obtaining the time sheets from a source in the administration.

STOP FIGHTING — ORGANIZE

Dr. Peter Davies, one of the non-renewed English professors urged the meeting to stop fighting about irrelevant issues.

"Those buggers are well organized," he said. "And a lot of them do not like us very much. We must get ourselves better organized, better led, and we must stop dissipating our energy. The only authority the administration has left is the power of the police."

When students and faculty filed out of the church, they were united with a solidarity left over from the sit-in. They are determined to sit-in again when the college re-opens next week, if the non-renewal decision has not been reversed.

Meanwhile the Quebec Government has set up a one-man fact-finding committee. A reliable source indicates that the most likely candidate is Claude Ryan, editor of Le Devoir.

And the long-awaited report on the crisis by the Canadian Association of University Teachers will be published next week.

The Loyola faculty had demanded binding CAUT arbitration, but the administration refused. When CAUT undertook the study anyway, it was barred from the campus and had to hold its meetings at McGill University. Loyola administrators refused to testify at the hearings.

Will Radio Varsity get FM license?

By JIM STRUTHERS

How would you like to wake up to Radio Varsity every morning? If The Canadian Radio-Television Commission grants University of Toronto Radio's request for an FM broadcasting license this spring, you may be able to do just that.

At the last SAC meeting the council endorsed a feasibility study drawn up by Craig Perkins (1 LAW) and Patrick Dymond. Radio Varsity's managing director and gave him the go ahead for an application to the CRTC. However, U of T radio will have to overcome many obstacles before they can obtain a license.

Their first problem is convincing the CRTC that they can finance such an operation, which Dymond estimates would require a $100,000 capital expenditure and a $70,000 operating budget for the first year.

Radio Varsity's current budget is $22,000 of which $16,000 is provided by SAC and $6,000 by advertising.

Dymond feels that the new station wouldn't require any more money from SAC than they currently receive, but that the station would have to look to outside sources for support.

Canada Council Support?

"We would look to the university for some of it as well as the Varsity Fund, and we could obtain a Canada Council grant. Also, the Department of Extension might want to use our facilities and thus share some of the expenses," says Dymond.

The probability that Radio York will also be applying for a license is another major problem since the already crowded FM band means that only one university could receive a license to broadcast.

U of T Radio can also expect stiff opposition from the six existing Toronto FM stations who don't cherish the idea of more competition, even from a non-commercial station like U of T Radio.

However, Dymond is convinced that an imaginative and unique programming presentation is the key to winning the CRTC's approval and he believes a talk-oriented community station is the right approach.

"Our basic idea would involve letting the Trefan Court Residents Association come down to the station and talk about their problems. This way is cheaper than producing a documentary and probably more effective," he says.

Thus, the majority of the station's programming would consist of news, sports, public affairs and community-oriented material with only 40 per cent of the air time devoted to music.

Staff may include faculty

This heavy reliance on discussion and news reporting for programming would require a large support staff of up to 200 people, and Dymond is counting heavily on university professors contributing their time and research to the station.

At present, however, Dymond is busy rounding up as much university and outside support for the FM license as possible since he hopes to have the station apply to the CRTC early this spring.

"I think the chances of us getting a license are excellent if everything laid out in our report to SAC comes true and we work out a solid programming presentation with University backing."

"We have to convince the CRTC that the organization isn't going to fall apart in a year," he added.

If U of T Radio's application is rejected, the chances are that it will continue on as before.

Dymond concludes that, "if we don't get the FM license, whatever the particular managing director feels the direction of Radio Varsity should be, will determine the nature of the programming."

Eyepener threatened with libel

The Eyepener, Ryerson's "alternate press" has been threatened with legal action and censure as a result of a light satire they printed about the chairman of the Ryerson Board of Governors, William Kelly.

The administration has also threatened to withhold students' fees from the student union if the Eyepener continues to print such material.

The article, "Chairman Bill on Soddturnmanship", which appeared in the Jan. 9 issue, satirized the sod-turning ceremony and linked it with political advantages gained as a result of Kelly's participation in the event.

Eyepener editor Walter Dmytrenko received a letter from Kelly's lawyers Saturday threatening the paper with legal action unless it printed a retraction and refused to circulate the remaining copies. The left-over papers were to be brought to the secretary of the Board of Governors.

The letter said the article in question had appeared without Kelly's knowledge and "was obviously calculated to disparage and humiliate and to lower him in the eyes of the public generally as Chairman of the Board of Governors, and as an officer of the Consumer Gas Company in his own personal capacity."

Staffers at the Eyepener decided not to hand over the remaining copies but some form of a retraction will appear in Thursday's paper, the editor said.

Student union president Barry Hales, who Dmytrenko says is under pressure from Ryerson administration, threatened to censure the editor and moved a motion for his dismissal.

Hales' motion came after meetings with acting administration president Tony Wilkinson, and David Crombie, the director of student services and a civic alderman.

The administration threatened the students' union with suit for any further libel, or obscenity appearing in the paper. They also threatened to contact advertisers and advise them not to advertise in the Eyepener.

Dmytrenko told The Varsity last night that some advertisers had heeded the administration's plea and cancelled their ads.

The Board of Publication, yesterday dismissed Hales motion to censure and fire Dmytrenko. They called the motion bureaucratic and said the union was over-reacting to a situation.

There will be an important meeting of the photo staff this evening at 7 p.m. in the Varsity office. All present and prospective staff members are urged to attend.

Everyone Welcome

Feudal Loyola meets modern police state

"Academic freedom has gotten out of hand on this campus."

That's Jack O'Brien, the Academic Vice-President at Loyola College.

Coming from a member of an administration that has committed one of the most blatant violations of academic freedom at a university in recent memory, his statement is ironic, to say the least.

In a somewhat tactless political purge, the Loyola administration announced just before Christmas it would not renew the contracts of 27 of their teaching staff.

The faux pas of most of those faculty was to question the unexplained firing of Physics Professor S. A. Santhanam. Seventeen of them had signed a petition calling for CAUT arbitration.

Last week a sit-in in front of the president's office won the sympathy of nearly all the students and the majority of the faculty, and the active support of up to 500 members of the 4,200-member community at Loyola.

Leaving the political paralysis of the U of T — the internal confusion of the left and the static confusion of committees — my arrival at Loyola College Monday was like stepping into another century.

Loyola College has weathered eight sit-ins over the issue of non-renewal of teaching contracts. The most recent one ended Monday with the arrival of 100 of Montreal's hard-core riot cops.

But there isn't a left-wing student movement at Loyola. Just an academic community fighting for some vestige of academic freedom. Their's is not a radical issue. Essentially the demonstrators were trying to preserve the status quo that existed at Loyola before the firings. They are trying to protect the jobs of faculty members.

But in doing that, by sitting in a building for six days, and by meeting nothing but uncompromising feudalism from the Jesuit administration, a process has occurred.

Young, upper-middle class, Catholic kids (many only 16 and 17 years old) have become confused about their understanding of obedience that the traditional parental image of the administration demands.

They took authority for granted, until they were faced with the physical reality of 100 tough cops ready to bust them at the word of an acting president A. J. Graham, S.J.

"Those cops were your mothers," English professor Sean Kelly told a mass meeting of students the day after the sit-in ended. Kelly is one of the fired faculty. And he's one of the only people in the university who could be considered a leftist.

Currently an issue internal to Loyola, the question of academic freedom has much greater importance.

As Kelly put it, "something is happening to these kids. You can't be a little bit smart, and you can't be a little bit pregnant, and you can't be just a little bit free. Those students are wanting more freedom."

"They knew in their guts why they were there when they saw the cops. Soon they will start figuring it out in their heads."

Students are united with faculty in an attempt to achieve "respectable" academic standards.

"Now there's an unholy alliance with the faculty," said Kelly, "and that won't last forever, because the professors are the enemy too."

Kelly is laughed off by most of the university, but he understands the situation in his own hippie-anarchist way.

"The whole of the west end of Montreal is like Ontario — unreal," Kelly said. "You've never seen such a bunch of kids. Before they could flex their cream of wheat muscles, the cops came in. They realized that Nazis were not just something that happens in a book."

Varsity cartoon by Ted Michener

"We're fighting the French Revolution — this is not 1970 — we're fighting to make a university that wouldn't have been laughed out of the 19th century."

Students are reacting more and more to the paternal authority of this medieval university. When Acting President A. J. Graham told them to leave, he also said it was for their own good.

The administration's tactics were rough — no co-optation here. Four stages:

- firing 27 professors because they contradicted an administrative decision and tested freedom of speech;
- shifting the responsibility to the Quebec government when the situation got too tense;
- closing the university for a week to isolate the militants and legally transform them into trespassers;
- prophesying "trouble" after five days of non-violence, then bringing in the police to create it.

The Loyola administration has created the crisis. The academic community has just responded to it. But now the students and faculty are beginning to take an active part in questioning the entire authority of the administration.

The college is run by the Board of Trustees, a body that contains no students, faculty, or lay representation — just Jesuits.

But the public pays 50 per cent of the college's operating costs; the students pay 45 per cent, and private donations account for 5 per cent.

The administration represents no one but the Society of Jesus, and it has been wielding ultimate authority.

The whole issue is an embarrassment to the Quebec Government, who are currently pretending not to be too concerned about English universities anyway. Most of the Montreal press is on the side of the militants.

Loyola is an anachronism in Quebec. But paradoxically its upper-middle class students have received the same police-state treatment as the Quebecois.

That treatment is forcing Loyola students to realize that the liberal issue they've been fighting has something to do with the politics of the province beyond Loyola's walls.

'Expressway would preserve middle class status quo'

By DAVID ROGERS

(David Rogers is a graduate physics student)

William Dolman's article supporting the Spadina Expressway (Monday's Varsity) is an extremely good example of the influence of the stale thinking of a department head (Dr. A. J. Dakin, Chairman, Department of Urban and Regional Planning) being passed on to his students. Dr. Dakin has also attempted a defence of the Spadina Expressway (the Globe, Dec 27). Like his leader, William Dolman has trotted out a few "facts" and by virtue of his academic qualifications, expects us all to fall in line. However, his facts are incorrect, his entire argument is based on the preservation of the "status quo" for the middle-class, and his arguments are contradictory. I wish to deal with these points one at a time although they are clearly interwoven.

His arguments are contradictory.

Dolman argues that transit-only systems would become "apartment-house alleys". This is probably true, after all we have a perfect example in Toronto, the north end of the Don Valley Parkway. Surely this argument is irrelevant to the transit-vs-expressway question.

Dolman's arguments on trucking are also contradictory. If Toronto were to build a complete system of expressways, and even if trucks could move faster on the expressways (which is debatable), then the complete and total congestion of the city by cars would make it impossible for trucks to move once they were off the expressways.

But suppose a good rapid transit system reduced the total number of cars in the core of the city (which it could). A truck which could get from the 401 to Bloor in 10 min. on the expressway could do it in 15 min. on Avenue Rd. The 5 min. lost getting to Bloor would easily be regained south of Bloor due to decreased congestion.

Dolman's arguments about the middle-class wanting to use expressways may sound convincing, but is it true, and is it a very deeply felt desire? Certainly a person in North York, far from Yonge St. is in favour of an expressway because car transit is the only form of useful transportation available today. But what about people near good public transit (e.g. Yonge St up to 401)? In these places, public transit is more efficient and is convenient. Therefore, many people, even those with two or three cars, use the transit system to get to work. People will use the most efficient and convenient means of getting to work. People in the suburbs are often just too shortsighted to realize that there are good alternatives to expressways.

Dolman's most glaring contradiction comes when he compalms "This tech-fix" would cost... billions in congestion as well as construction and disruption costs to build." If this is not the perfect description of expressway construction, nothing is.

His arguments are based on the preservation of the "status quo" for the middle class with no regard for the rest of society.

Dolman's discussion of the middle class wanting to use their cars is an obvious example of this point. He also claims that a lack of expressways will cause firms to move to the outskirts of town and then low-income central residents could not reach the low skill jobs.

It is a plain fact that most new industry is being built on the outskirts of town, with or without expressways, while most downtown jobs are white collar. The poor in general live in the core of the city whereas the middle class live in the suburbs. The poor have no cars or can ill-afford the ones they have, whereas the middle class have one, two or three cars per family. Now, if we build an expressway, who benefits? What happens to the poor? They cannot reach the jobs they can perform, but they cannot afford to move. Their part of the city is torn apart by expressways and in ten years, the social problems we now lack (according to Dolman), will be with us.

It has happened time and time again in the U.S. Why claim it won't happen here? Perhaps a rapid transit system would not prevent social problems, but at least it would not be so directly responsible for them. Public transport is subsidized by everyone, to serve everyone. Expressways are subsidized (at $5 per trip) by everyone, to serve only the driving population. And don't kid yourself, well over one-half the population cannot drive, those who are too old, too poor, too young or just unable to drive.

Dolman's facts are frequently wrong.

Dolman has tacitly assumed throughout his article that expressways can handle the transportation needs of the city, but he never quotes any authority for his assumptions. His assumptions are in fact wrong. This statement can be verified by studying the present figures on traffic flow. Dr. Dakin has gone so far as to point out that the number of vehicles using the Don Valley Parkway in 1969 exceeded the projected use of the Parkway for 1980. The U of T Department of Urban and Regional Planning is using figures which are known to be wrong by 11 years, yet they do not grasp the significance of this, and they still base their arguments on these projections which are known to be wrong. In any other field this would surely be academic suicide.

Work, however, has been done which attempts to accurately forecast the needs of a city in terms of transportation. Over the last three years, the American Department of Housing and Urban Development, in a typically American move, spent millions of dollars on 17 full scale contracts to study urban transportation systems. In particular, the General Research Corporation of California did a full scale systems analysis of several types of transportation systems in four model cities (one of them, Boston, is in many ways much like Toronto). Their results: "The results of our analysis made clear that, even with the most optimistic view of what might be achieved through improvement of the existing methods of transportation, such improvement could not satisfy the real needs of our cities in terms of service." This was a very detailed study which took account of many factors, including the desires of the middle class for private transportation, the mobility of the poor in the cities core, the average speeds and traffic densities on roads and the total costs. The remarkable point about this study was its concern for the quality of living in a city for all of its inhabitants.

As for Dolman's "Tech-fix", this is not as much of a dream as he believes. The American study also investigated new types of transportation, designed to overcome the problems of cars and the inconvenience of public transit. The study indicates that there are systems which are feasible, efficient and convenient. How long? Not the generation Dolman claims, but only five years before a full scale test would be possible. The cost of the test? $100 million (the cost of the Spadina-401 interchange). Not only are these systems possible but they are imperative if cities are to survive (think in terms of 50 years).

In short, Dolman's article is completely out of touch with reality. I have made no attempt to give all the arguments against expressways (Jane Jacobs can do a much better job), but I feel that the many shortcomings of Dolman's article must be pointed out.

I also must say a small prayer that students get a voice on hiring committees so that the Urban and Regional Planning Department gets with it. Either that, or that the Science Council provides them with enough money to do some good studies of our urban transportation problems.

"The University is a reactionary employer"

It is our position that the university is responsible for the four New College strike leaders losing their jobs. First of all, the university hires and fires catering companies with little concern for the workers involved. Secondly, the university pays the catering company which pays the workers. A rise in wages would raise the catering company's price and the university would end up footing the bill. As a result, the university has a direct interest in keeping wages low. Finally, the university sent the campus police into the Beaver Catering Co. interviews with the New College workers. The police fingered the four strike leaders; and as a result, Beaver Co. didn't hire the four workers. If the matter is just between the workers and the catering company, as the university administration claims, why were campus police in the interviewing room?

There can be no doubt that the university is a reactionary employer. There are 4000 campus workers and only 836 are unionized. However, both unionized and non-unionized workers are in bad shape. University kitchen workers receive $1.30-$1.50 per hour, unionized cleaners receive $2.29 an hour, library workers with B.A. degrees get only $4,200 a year, and many typists get less than $3,500 a year. None have real job security. More importantly, the university does not want these conditions changed. The Canadian Union of Public Employees, a campus union, has referred to the university as "an anti-union employer of the worst kind." (Brief to CUG from CUPE, page 8).

In general, worker-student alliance intends to support the struggles of workers for job security and better working conditions. In the long run, we hope to build a pro-working class student movement in order to achieve a fundamental change in the present social order.

Kensington defeats Baron Expressway—saves Tillie

By MICHAEL KAUFMAN

At noon Monday afternoon, a beautiful young maiden named Tillie Toronto was out strolling in front of City Hall, when a sinister man, Baron Edsel Expressway snuck up behind her, carried her off and tied her to the new expressway. It looked as though Tillie's demise was near, for a solid wall of cars came creeping toward her frail body.

In the nick of time Captain Lou Kensington jumped in front of the cars, stopping them in their paths, and turned to meet the evil stare of the Baron. A long and vicious swordfight ensued, but the mean Baron was no match for our Capt. Kensington. So once again the good Captain saved Tillie Toronto from certain death.

With this and other skits, the newly-formed Provocative Street Players joined singers, and sign carriers in an hour of guerilla theatre and singing to protest the construction of the Spadina Expressway.

A pamphlet handed out by the Stop Spadina, Save Our City Co-ordinating Committee pointed out that:

- "'Express' ways break up established neighbourhoods dividing residential areas, converting homes to concrete and destroying local businesses and industries.

- "The inadequate exit ramps will slow traffic on the highway to speeds less than that of the horse and buggy. The 'Express' way will necessitate the building of the Crosstown expressway and the inevitable spaghetti junction, had enough on the outskirts but prohibitive within the city.

- "A city lacking in parklands is willing to convert its land for more parking lots.

- "Toronto needs more public housing; it has been negligent in creating the necessary cultural facilities. Despite the lack of social funds Metro is willing to construct an expressway at a projected cost of $4.60 per trip."

The theatre troupe's skits, directed by Fred Thury also dwelt on the huge pollution and noise problem created by the onslaught of automobiles.

One of them, called Funhouse, features the mayor dressed up as a carnival barker selling tickets to motorists. The standard charge is $4.60 for suburban motorists going from their home to the city hall.

When a motorist from the city asks how much an inner-city ticket is, the mayor not only demands $4.60 but the person's lungs, then his eyes, ears, health, and finally his house.

Between skits a folksinging group Ned Jacobs, Katya Chomiak, and Rick Wentworth, sang songs that they have written about the expressway problem. "The Bad Trip" had the greatest impact on the crowd:

"Well, you've heard about the terrors of LSD and the dangers of hasbisch, But the very worst drug there ever was, is made of pure concrete.

"And it's a bad trip, it's a bad trip— That Spadina Expressway, While the highway boys are playing with their toys, Condemning it as a threat to pedestrians and low-cost student housing, the Students' Administrative Council passed a motion yesterday condemning the Spadina Expressway.

The controversial expressway was described as a "grave threat to the life of the community and a flagrant misuse of the citizens' taxes."

SAC has voted $950 of its $250,000 budget to the Stop Spadina — Save Our City Committee. In addition, SAC will circulate an anti-expressway petition to be presented to the Metro Council.

The people are the ones who pay."

The SSSOCCC, led by Alan Powell, and the eleven actors, who are mainly high school students, are optimistic that the expressway will be stopped in time to save the city.

They cite the example of the Lower Manhattan Expressway in New York, whose construction was halted last summer after a report was released stating that traffic on the expressway would generate carbon monoxide "sufficient to cause physical collapse" and "seriously impair the health of people living and working in the neighbourhood." Under the pressure of a number of civic groups, Mayor Lindsay dropped support of the expressway.

The SSSOCCC is sponsoring a meeting tonight at 8:00 p.m. in Convocation Hall. Jane Jacobs, author of "The Life and Death of Great American Cities", a highly acclaimed book, will be the featured speaker.

"So gather round all you citizens, And we'll tell you what it's all about, For if this plan goes through, not only me and you But the whole town's gonna Freak Out!"

Two McGill students suspended on assault charges

MONTREAL (CUP) — Two McGill students have been arrested on charges of assault arising from an incident in front of the McGill student union building December 7. They also face university disciplinary action and have been temporarily suspended.

The students — Arnold August and Eric Hoffman — are members of the Indian Progressive Study Group and the McGill Student Movement, respectively.

Police have accused the two of attacking Steven Wohl, former chairman of the McGill Moratorium Committee, and Frank Costi, manager of the student union building.

If convicted, the students face a maximum penalty of two years' imprisonment.

Both the IPSG and the MSM have been active in a campaign to remove retired General J. N. Chaudhuri from a position in McGill's Centre for Developing Areas Studies.

The students have charged that the centre is a front for CIA-type research, intended to develop defences against liberation struggles in Africa and Asia.

Earlier this year, the McGill administration warned Devinder Garewal, editor of the Engineering Students Society newspaper "The Plumber's Pot", "not to exceed the rights and limits of the protest activity" against Chaudhuri.

At that time, August was summoned to a "discussion" with several administration officials over the anti-Chaudhuri campaign, but refused to attend.

In a press release January 12, August and Hoffman said the assault charges were a "frame-up" aimed at suppression of the anti-Chaudhuri campaign.

The release added that the McGill student council and the administration were co-operating with the "ruling powers" to suppress "progressive movements."

charges against the pair because the alleged assaults constituted "a threat to the security of persons inside the union."

At the same time, the Student Society executive has barred several organizations from the student union building, including the McGill Student Movement, the Indian Progressive Study Group, and other organizations active in the Chaudhuri affair.

The two students face trial January 30. They will also face a disciplinary hearing by a committee of eight members of the McGill Senate.

The hearing procedure forms a part of a disciplinary code which will undergo revision within the next few days.

 "I think everything can be made relevant but it also matters what people want to make relevant."

Joel Sloman, an American poet from Cambridge, Mass., is a man who is very concerned with relevance in society and its reflection in art.

Born in 1943 in Brooklyn, New York, Sloman first started writing poetry in 1960.

Poetry is the purest form of expression for Sloman, because it most closely resembles the way in which people think. People do not usually think in structured sentences and paragraphs but rather in fragments and single words.

Sloman's poetry is spontaneous. It expresses his emotions and political views.

He feels that poetry should not be private, but should be shared with the community in which he lives and of which he is a part.

It is the function of the poet to work within an integrated community and not to isolate himself from it.

"But not to value ourselves as isolated individuals but as part of a social system in which all of our actions have consequences."

Sloman feels the isolation of the poet and the individual from the community is due to the "American Tradition of Poetry" which tends to alienate the poet and keep him intellectually aloof and private as to his work and thoughts.

It is this gap that Sloman tries to transcend with his poetry.

To him, the emotions felt and expressed by the poet are also those felt and shared by others and therefore should not be kept secret, but should be shared.

"All of us are deeply embedded in a system from which we can't escape alone. We happen to have needs which even help maintain the system, so it all seems like a bind."

Thus the concern of Joel Sloman and his poetry is that the poet should not be considered isolated from society but rather be an integral and functioning part of it.

"My tears are tears of pain at parting at the fear that getting together is impossible impossible because of my impotence."

Joel Sloman will hold a poetry reading in the Hart House Music Room on Thursday at 4:00 p.m., sponsored by the Innis College Writing Lab.

Sig Sam foils itchy fingered filchers

Book-thieving days are over for all you itchy fingered filchers.

To get your books, stolen or not, out of Sigmund Samuel library, you will have to open all bags and briefcases for inspection. Exit control desks have been installed and checkers will begin operation early next week.

R. A. Blackburn, Chief Librarian, said in a recent interview that books are disappearing from the stacks at an estimated rate of 8000 per year. Valuable reference books are missing as well.

The exit control will stem this flow.

Everyone leaving the library students, professors, and even library staff, will have to pass the clerks manning the counters. There will be an "express" exit for those carrying no books or packages.

In addition, each book leaving the stacks will have a new library symbol stamped on the check-out slip to frustrate anyone who might try making his own "date due" stamp.

Blackburn said that the time factor in leaving the library will not be prohibitive. He pointed out that getting books out of the stacks involves a bookkeeping procedure, while at the check-out counters, inspection only is required.

Additional staff is being hired for the procedure.

Asked to make a guess why so many books were being stolen from the stacks, Blackburn replied, "With larger enrolment, competition for books is keener."

"Books on undergraduate reading lists," he added, "disappear about four times as quickly as others."

We're not as square as you think! Behind our seemingly straight-laced image, there throbs some pretty way-out projects. And people. Alcan is involved in many unexpected areas. Because we do a lot more than just produce aluminum. We and others try to find new uses for it. For example, one new use that came to our attention was developed in Belgium and refined by a Montreal artist. Through a process called Aluchrome, he "paints" on specially prepared aluminum panels. The resulting work of art has a water-colour affect with unusual depth and perspective, and endless applications in art and architecture. And that's just one of the exciting new developments in aluminum. Alcan researchers and scientists are continually searching for better ways to do things with aluminum. And it's not always easy. Often they have to struggle for years to find ways of making their ideas come to life. So you see, they aren't the only ones who have to cope with hairy problems.

CUPE launches U of T campaign

The Canadian Union of Public Employees Monday launched a campaign to unionize U of T's 3,500 non-academic employees.

Headed by full-time organizers Michael Lewis and Clare Booker, a volunteer committee of employees and students is spearheading the drive.

Lewis, a member of one of Canada's foremost socialist families, previously has worked as an organizer for the United Steelworkers of America, while Miss Booker was formerly an employee of the Students' Administrative Council.

Miss Booker described CUPE's plans for organization. "Right now we're finding out what the personal gripes are. University support staff receive well under the Metro Toronto wage average for similar jobs; very few receive overtime pay."

The same jobs are given different titles in the various parts of the university she said, resulting in different wage rates.

Miss Booker also charged that wage inequalities exist among the various departments.

Referring to the role of the support staff in the university, Miss Booker said CUPE is pushing for employee involvement in the governing structure.

She had no comment however on the controversial proposals brought forward by CUPE last fall. These included fee tuition for the children of support staff, along with access to all university facilities, such as Hart House and the Faculty Club.

Miss Booker dismissed the fledgling U of T Staff Association, which is also trying to organize campus workers as "farical — the ultimate cooption."

"An association is not a union," she said, "and cannot take part in collective bargaining. The UTSA would be like the Association of Teaching Staff, except with less power."

President Claude Bissell, though officially a member of the support staff, is ineligible to join CUPE.

"This is because he has access to confidential decisions," said Miss Booker.

'UNDERGRADS'

You've heard about us, you've read about us. The exciting, controversial, unorthodox financial complex with world-wide headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland. In 14 years our global organization has grown from nothing to an organization with more than 10,000 associates, 800,000 clients in over 100 countries, and more than $2 billion in managed assets.

We're young and aggressive. It takes guts, hard work, and creativity to make it with us. But if you do, you'll make it like you never dreamed possible. Travel, excitement, money, challenge. That's IOS.

And you can still do your own thing. No pin striped suits, white shirts, etc. The whole scene. Forget it.

We're looking for management trainees. We will be on campus January 29 for interviews. Make an appointment at the Placement Office.

Why take a pill for a headache?

Maybe you just need glasses. So go get your eyes tested, then come and see us at Bradock Optical. Why? Because we give 20% off to students, and we've got the greatest collection of fantastic frames you'll ever look through. We're just around the corner at 158 St. George. Come and see!

Frisky Stangs host Blues

"The Blues are coming tra-la-la-la" is the tune Tom Watt is humming these days as he prepares his hockey team for their next game tomorrow night in London against the Western Mustangs.

After a slow and shaky start due to an unprecedented rash of injuries, Watt's charges appear to be coming into their own as witnessed by their impressive showing against McMaster and Windsor this last weekend.

The Mustangs, always tough in their own rink, have improved steadily since they were bammed 14-1 by Blues here at Varsity Nov. 28 in their first league game. They handed the Guelph Gryphons a 5-4 defeat last Thursday.

Blues will have to do without stalwarts Paul Laurent and Dave McDowall for this one.

Exams will keep them from making the trip.

Terry Peterman will take Laurent's spot at center between Nick Holmes and Bob McGuinn while McDowall's job will likely fall to rookie Dick Barnhouse.

Bluettes vs Guelph tonite

Varsity's Basketbelles and Volleybelles have an opportunity to improve their style in preparation for the intercollegiate championships as they take on teams from the University of Guelph tonight at the Benson Building.

Guelph always presents well-coached, packed teams, so victories in these exhibition encounters could mark the Varsity gals as the teams to beat in the league finals.

The action begins with intermediate basketball at 5 p.m., followed by the seniors. Volleyball is set for seven o'clock.

Due to bureaucratic bungling, the hockey tilt with defending champion Guelph Redwomen has been cancelled. The Hockeyettes open their exhibition season at Varsity Arena on January 23 against McMaster.

"What do you want to do? Do you want to better your own market value?"

"Those were questions London Life interviewers asked when I expressed interest in programming," says Allan Conway, a 1969 business administration graduate from St. Francis Xavier University. "They didn't talk about specific jobs, but rather how I could develop myself. As a systems programmer I soon discovered this is a company that is not only fast-growing, but also encourages you to develop an insight into all areas of its operations. You know you're treated like somebody — not just another body doing an isolated task. And you work with one of the most advanced systems anywhere. To any graduating student, I would suggest: 'Come and see for yourself. See how we operate.'"

There's a challenge waiting for you too, at London Life.

The Canadian Amateur Hockey Association announced to-day that the Hazleton Hash-International Olympic Committee Chairman Avery Brundage expressed doubts about the amateur standing of some Hash-Eater regulars. "Defenseman A. Solnicki", he said, "has no job, yet lives in luxury. The only possible conclusion is that he is being paid for playing hockey. Forward J. Filion was once stood a beer at Grossman's Tavern after scoring a winning goal; the IOC intends to produce the beer jug as evidence. INDOOR TRACK TUESDAY, JANUARY 20th

5:30 P.M. — 2 MILES —

ENTRIES ARE ACCEPTED AT THE TRACK

When the trumpets had sounded and all was in readiness on the face of the earth, Jehovah divided his universe:
 Anaconda, Ford Motors,
 Coca-Cola Inc., and similar entities:
 the most succulent item of all,
 The United Fruit Company Incorporated reserved for itself: the heartland and coasts of my country, the delectable waist of America.
 They rechristened their properties:
 the "Banana Republics" — and over the languishing dead, the uneasy repose of the heroes who horried that greatness, their flags and their freedoms, they established an opéra bouffe:
 they ravished all enterprise, awarded the laurels like Caesars, unleashed all the covetous, and contrived the tyrannical Reign of the Flies—Trujillo the fly, and Tacho the fly, the flies called Carios, Martinez, Ubico — all of them flies, flies dank with the blood of their marmalade vassalage, flies buzzing drunkenly on the populous middens:
 the fly-circus fly and the scholarly kind, case-hardened in tyranny.

Then in the bloody domain of the flies
 The United Fruit Company Incorporated unloaded with a booty of coffee and fruits brimming its cargo boots, gliding like trays with the spoils of our drowning dominions.

And all the while, somewhere, in the sugary hells of our seaports, smothered by gases, an Indian fell in the morning:
 o body spun off, an anonymous chattel, some numeral tumbling, a branch with its death running out of it in the vat of the carrion, fruit laden and foul.

(Interim) disciplinary committee proposed

By MARK WILSON

The Campbell report implementation committee passed a recommendation Wednesday regarding the membership of a proposed interim disciplinary body with strong dissent from graduate student Wayne Hankey.

The proposed body would consist of the presidents of the Graduate Students' Union, the Association of Teaching Staff, and the Association of Part-time University Degree Students, plus the deans of Law and Arts with the President Claude Bissell as non-voting chairman.

The committee itself has no power to implement such a body. Since this involves the dissolution of the present Caput, the Board of Governors must give final approval to any such change.

Of course this body would require the co-operation of the various constituent groups and so each would also have to approve it.

The motion stated that it was desirable to form an interim body to replace the Caput "rather than leave the situation open to arbitrary decisions by the administration in the event of a disciplinary emergency."

It stated that the advantages of this structure were that it is a parity body and that four of the six members were elected representatives thus combining "responsibility with authority."

Hankey the lone dissenter later commented, "The idea of setting up a body which in fact or legally will administrate, prosecute, legislate, adjudicate, and sentence is gross."

"The people in control want to produce a judicial body to keep the lid on," he said. Hankey claimed that student interests were best served by keeping pressure on the administration to speed up reform of the university. This interim committee would remove the pressure.

"Since we won't get a reasonable set-up until we replace the Board of Governors," said Hankey, "there is no point in setting up an interim body which is sort of political but didn't look political."

He contended that since the various presidents would be consulted in any disciplinary crisis in any case there was no point to the new body.

"What we've got isn't much" but he added that Caput was the most moderate body imaginable under the present circumstances and it had been quite lenient in the past.

He also complained about the attitude of some of the faculty members whose attitude could be summed up by "Surely there's nothing on which we can't compromise."

The motion was proposed by Prof. Guillet of the Department of Chemistry. Eight of 10 members of the committee voted in favour of the motion with Prof. Schiff, Law abstaining and Hankey voting against.

Art Moses, SAC Judicial Commissioner said later that the proposed body's "ex-officio elitist membership is not palatable," and that any idea of an interim body should be shelved until the legislative reforms now in progress at the university were completed.

Moses also said that SAC had now chosen the 20 people from whom 6 would be chosen to sit on SAC's proposed disciplinary body.

3 GREAT BANDS

CONSOLIDATED - BATHURST LIMITED

BACKGROUND

In 1967 two solid and long-established companies and their subsidiaries joined forces in a dovetailed operation that represents wider geographical dis- and greater product diversification. The integration brought with it a new name: Consolidated-Bathurst Limited. Consolidated Paper Corporation Ltd. had been linked traditionally with newsprint, Bathurst Paper Ltd. largely with packaging paperboards and containers made from paperboards.

Consolidated-Bathurst is 93% Canadian owned, with its Head Office in Montreal. Sales in 1968 were $295 million. The Company harvests 22,000 square miles of woodlands and operates eight mills and some thirty converting plants in Canada. The Company has manufacturing subsidiaries in the United States and in West Germany. One of Canada's largest producers of newsprint, Consolidated-Bathurst has about half of its total dollar sales in packaging materials in paper, wood and plastic. It also sells bleached kraft pulp and has a wood products group of five sawmills.

OPPORTUNITIES

In the structure of the parent Company there are five business or operational groups: Woodlands, Mill Manufacturing, Newsprint and Pulp, Wood Products and Packaging. The Company's management philosophy and its organization into functional and business groups are intended to provide every opportunity for the advancement of promising employees, present and future.

Top quality graduates in the faculties or departments of commerce and M.B.A. will be offered positions that will allow them to demonstrate their ability to perform with competence and progress to management responsibility at an early age.

While on-the-job training will be emphasized, graduates, along with other Company employees, will participate in development programs coordinated by the Manpower Planning and Management Development Department.

DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Performance is reviewed annually and salary increases and promotions are based on individual performance and potential. A complete range of coordinated employee benefits is comparable with the best available.

Consolidated-Bathurst representatives will visit your campus on Tuesday, January 20, 1970 to interview Commerce and M.B.A. graduates. Please see your Placement office for further details.

U of T collaborates with oil companies

By KAREN COULTER

The University of Toronto is in league with the oil companies and finance corporations to push useless and expensive expressways into the heart of the city, urbanologist Jane Jacobs said Wednesday night.

In an address to about 1400 people at Convocation Hall, Mrs. Jacobs warned of the "predator and prey" syndrome which develops in cities overburdened with unsuitable transit systems.

She accused the university of predatory behaviour in pressing for the extension of the Spadina Expressway to College St. at the expense of the neighboring Kensington market. "As far as I know the people of Toronto have not decided that the gas and oil companies are more important than the garment industry to the life of the city."

Mrs. Jacobs is a foremost expert on urban planning and the author of two well-known books, The Life and Death of Great North American Cities and Economy of Cities.

The lecture was originally intended as a debate between Mrs. Jacobs and a pro-expressway member of Metro Council. However, the various individuals invited, including Roads Commissioner Sam Cass, were unable to attend.

BANKRUPT CITY

Mrs. Jacobs challenged the idea that the subway line, which is to accompany the Spadina surface route is desirable. "The line would run where people don't take transit," she said. "If you deliberately set out to bankrupt a city, the Spadina Expressway is exactly what you'd build."

Mrs. Jacobs' positive proposals included dividing the city into zones within which there is heavy local traffic and installing good secondary transit systems.

Though the car can provide the required mobility within heavily-travelled areas, the pollution factor is fact rendering it dysfunctional in cities. In its stead, Mrs. Jacobs suggested the use of electrically-operated, "carveyors", compact, computer-controlled vehicles which run on rails.

YORK MEDICAL SCHOOL

Carveyors would be exceedingly inexpensive to run and require a minimum of operating personnel. She pointed out that the $150 million saved would buy a first-class medical school for York University.

Mrs. Jacobs said, "There is no such thing as a modern transportation system."

Mrs. Jacobs decried the general lack of creativity in transportation planning and accused Canadians of preferring to imitate Britain or the U.S. "But they're using it in London!", is the ultimate argument", she said.

In closing, Mrs. Jacobs exhorted Canadians to stop being parasites and contribute some creative thought to the universal problem of urban transportation.

Varsity bids farewell to Johnson

YANKLE TIPESH

TEL AVIV — The Israeli government announced here today that twelve North American college newspaper editors will be flown to this country for an all-expense paid week-long visit.

NOTORIOUS SUPPORTER

Brian Johnson, a notorious supporter of cafeteria workers and evicted tenants, was identified as one of the lucky winners of the free trip.

"I can't believe it," he said, "I mean — why me?"

He will receive his one-way ticket in the mail next week.

'PTA' meets over Loyola crisis

MONTREAL (CUP) — Approximately 200 parents of Loyola students emerged from a meeting Wednesday at McGill University sympathetic with faculty and student dissidents, but slightly confused over the issues involved in the current crisis at Loyola College.

The two-hour session, sponsored by the Loyola and McGill English Departments, was designed to mobilize public opinion against the Loyola administration's firing of 27 faculty just prior to Christmas.

The parents set up a committee to continue looking into the Loyola affair, and were urged by college faculty to write letters to the college administration and the Quebec government expressing concern over the crisis.

Both administration president Patrick Malone and academic vice-president Jack O'Brien refused to attend the meeting.

Meanwhile, sources at Loyola said yesterday that a Canadian Association of University Teachers report into the dismissal of nuclear physicist S. A. Santhanam is expected to reach both the college administration and the fired professor today.

The report will not be revealed to the public until next week.

The Santhanam case lies at the base of most of the conflict which has kept the Loyola campus simmering since September.

Santhanam was dismissed without stated cause by the all-Jesuit Board of Trustees at Loyola: students and faculty charge that the recent administration firings were aimed at purging professors who supported student efforts to gain binding arbitration by the CAUT in his case.

A case in point . . .

Don't be taken in when they pat you paternally on the shoulder and say that there's no inequality worth speaking of and no more reason for fighting because if you believe them they will be completely in charge in their marble homes and granite banks from which they rob the people of the world under the pretense of bringing them culture

The story behind the story on the centre of today's Varsity — Anatomy of an Eviction — reveals more than just a bad sheriff and a disabled workman playing off each other as pawns in a human interest feature.

Eviction is an ugly and depressing hardship that no family should have to face. But the case of Rako Perisa reaches deeper than the conflict and humiliation Perisa suffered in his apartment yesterday. The outcome of his case can be explained by the way he was treated by the Workmen's Compensation Board ever since he suffered his injury in 1961.

One doctor claimed that Perisa now has no disability; but Perisa still finds considerable difficulty walking. His disability is painfully obvious to anyone who has met him. Perisa says that he received only superficial examinations by doctors, and that some of them were more concerned with establishing him as mentally disturbed. That's clinical rhetoric that is much easier to present to the Workmen's Compensation Board, since mental disability is not so easily quantifiable in terms of dollars and cents.

The Board gave him a continual run-around even when he was legally entitled to his payments. He received one in the form of a loan and found many of his doctors' bills unpaid.

Perisa ran into legal barriers before the Board's tribunal. First neither the chairman of the Board, Bruce Leg, nor the vice-chairman heard his cases. They were always handled by pro-tem people.

At his first hearing he lost his case although he had one of the best lawyers in the city defending him. When he appealed the decision and his case was re-examined, he won — that time without a lawyer.

He never understood his own legal position.

"I am a new Canadian," he says, "and I don't understand all the laws."

Of course, the old dictum tells us that's no excuse, but one gets the impression that bodies like the WCB actually play upon the ignorance of the people they are set up to serve.

After Perisa made his first two appeals, he was told he could not appeal again. But he managed to obtain a third appeal.

After that fruitless attempt to recover compensation, he is now told that he may not make another appeal, that his case is closed, and there is no higher court.

He has received a total of $3,000 for an injury incurred on the job which has left him permanently disabled and without work or income.

Yesterday he was kicked out of his apartment by the York County Sheriff's office. His wife and children are in the City Emergency Shelter at Dundas and Bathurst, and he's probably staying at Seaton House or a friend's house.

Meanwhile his case has never received a fair inquiry, but he is not alone in our "just society".

of unjust compensation

... the decisions of the board shall be upon the real merits of the case, and it is not bound to follow strict legal practice. . . .

—Ontario Workmen's Compensation Act.

The Ontario Government's Workmen's Compensation Board is a "totalitarian" institution which will have to go through "tremendous changes" in the very near future.

That's what members of the Just Society, an association of Toronto poor, say.

John Neveu in particular, a 42-year-old who receives a small pension from the Board, is heading up a campaign to revolutionize the compensation system. Cases like the one which resulted in Rako Perisa's eviction, are not untypical, he says.

"A person is a tool in production. When he becomes unproductive he is cast away. Compensation is treated as a privilege, not a right."

Changes he thinks are needed:

- o The compensation board should include elected compensated workers. Presently the board consists of three cabinet appointees.

- o Decisions should be made more "realistic", based on specific circumstances rather than charts and schedules.

- o The Board should issue full explanations of its decisions, and appeals to the courts should be permitted.

- o Employers should be liable for negligence in accidents.

Neveu hopes to launch a province-wide campaign for changes in the compensation legislation. With union support, he says, this could culminate in an Ontario-wide day-long general strike.

Several doctors feel that their medical evidence is misused by the Board, that their reports are "twisted," he notes.

Neveu has repeatedly challenged Board officials to debate with him, but they have repeatedly refused.

Ignoring man, expressway will destroy city

By the time you receive this letter, Jane Jacobs will have made it quite clear (Convocation Hall, Wednesday, 8:00 p.m.) why the Spadina expressway must be stopped. However, William Dolman's article (Monday, page 5) requires some reply.

Mr. Dolman's basic unstated assumption is that Toronto's future development will result in haphazard, low-density, suburban growth and that industrial and commercial firms will shift from the city core to the outskirts of the city. Since public transportation cannot efficiently service this type of development, expressways will be necessary to provide suburbanites with access to the downtown core (God knows why they would want to come downtown after the working and shopping districts have relocated) and to provide the downtown poor with access to their "potential jobs" in the suburbs (apparently Mr. Dolman's downtown "poor" all have access to automobiles).

The tragedy is that Mr. Dolman is perfectly correct. If we permit this type of development to continue unhindered, and if we assign high priority to the provision of access between what will increasingly become downtown ghettos and suburban fortresses, then expressways will be essential. Indeed, the very provision of expressways accelerates the development process which makes them necessary.

To stop the Spadina expressway would be to slow down the fragmentation process which is dragging this city down the same trail that American cities have followed (and no, Mr. Dolman, the "social problems" of U.S. cities are not solely the result of race).

Besides his implicit assumption, Mr. Dolman uses two other arguments to justify the expressway — it is economic, and it is part of a balanced transportation network.

As for the economic argument, I admit that I am unable to follow Mr. Dolman's logic. On the one hand he states that "rapid rail transit is cheaper" but then goes on to say that "it is not economically possible to provide." Later he states that both the expressway and a rapid transit line could be built for the same cost, and that their maintenance costs would be similar.

But since a subway could be expected to carry 40,000 passengers per hour and an expressway 8,000 (4,000 cars at 2 people per car), the per passenger maintenance costs on the subway are only 20% those on the expressway. In fact, as critics of the expressway have repeatedly shown using figures supplied by the Metro Roads Department, the cost of a trip on the expressway will be about $5.00 per car!

And all of this takes into account only the financial costs, and not the social costs which would be much more devastating from the expressway than from a subway.

As for the claim that the expressway is part of a balanced transportation plan, one can raise the question of whether we can afford both an expressway and a rapid transit network. Even if we can, let us bear in mind the transportation planners' proud boast that when they have finished building roads, no point in the city will be more than ¼ of a mile from an expressway. Is this balance?

One final comment on Mr. Dolman's suggestion that the expressway will result in dynamic growth along Spadina Avenue. It may well be true that land used by the Spadina garment industry and by Kensington Market is being used uneconomically, that it would be more economic (read "profitable") to turn this land over to the developers who are eagerly waiting to pounce. But this area has more than an "economic" value to the city. For one thing, it acts as a receiving area for immigrants — rents are low (relatively) and the Market adds a touch of the old world that eases the adjustment process.

But this cannot be evaluated economically, and so the planners do not evaluate it at all. This reveals a callousness typical of the worst in North American planning — if the jobs and communities are destroyed, what the hell, they were uneconomic in any case.

The expressway is more than a road. It represents a frame of mind, a type of development which will destroy this city if we permit it to continue. If we can stop the expressway, there is still a chance that we can transform Toronto into the sort of community where Canadians can live a decent and meaningful existence. If we can't stop it, . . . well, we've all been to New York.

David S. Kelly (SGS)

I find the article by Wm. Dolman (Jan 12 — the other side of the expressway debate) an extremely frustrating one. There are some rather obvious inconsistencies in the content and logic of his discussion. For example, at present there are no plans to continue with the originally proposed subway line up Spadina, so that it is not a question of two routes for the price of one. The Crosstown Expressway is not necessary he states, but the Spadina is because it is a part of an overall expressway plan (of which, curiously, so is the Crosstown!)

However, even if these points are to be forgiven, the priorities which Mr. Dolman holds are the source of my frustration. Mr. Dolman makes a reasonably strong argument for the economic benefits of expressways. The people who most benefit are, he points out, "the middle-class individual, the Mustang-buying youth of today." The middle class will retain its preference for private transportation. We must have a "booming" economy and a vital exciting place to live." That is the point Mr. Dolman, while you and Mayor Dennison cavort with the convention boys and the business community, the quality of life for that "lowest common denominator" — is abominable.

In the name of a "dynamic city" you would replace whatever meaningful relationships people in the inner city have managed (however precariously) to maintain, with groovy buildings and an ever expanding economy. The damned trouble, Mr. Dolman, is that we worry so much about urban economics, out tax base, our industrial development (served by your trucks, etc.) that we forget about the people.

I do not assume that the typical middle class car owner will suddenly shift his attitudes. I pray that he will.

For you see, Mr. Dolman, as long as ones priorities are physical comfort, expanding economy and the like, so long will our society continue to be one of hypocrites. The pattern and network of relationships amongst those of the inner city, however intangible they are, are their only hope of finding something a little more meaningful in life than a colour TV. The quality of life is measured not by the number of trucks that pass a certain corner, or by the so-called economic choices of the lower classes.

But it is the intangible need of man to experience himself and others in a meaningful way.

The support of the archaic concept of the expressway and the labelling of "idealist" those who would challenge the dominance of the automobile ("what do we do for 50 years? — We die slowly inside, Mr. Dolman) are sad commentary on those who claim to be sensitive to man's needs. Urban and regional planning, Mr. Dolman, should be far more than traffic volumes, tax bases and an acceptance of status quo ideas.

Rako Perisa fell 45 feet from a structural steel construction site in 1961 and broke nearly every bone in his body. Workmen's Compensation stopped sending him cheques in 1968.

Yesterday an officer of the York County Sherriff's office evicted him, his wife, and his three children from his Scarborough apartment. Mrs. Perisa and the children were sent to an emergency shelter, and Mr. Perisa was forced to find separate accommodation for the night.

The high-rise on Danforth Road, just above Eglinton Avenue, is a stark white building stuck in the middle of a subdivision. I arrived at Mr. Perisa's tenth floor apartment at 10 a.m. yesterday, just half an hour before the sherriff arrived.

I was just a stranger from some student newspaper, but he was very friendly. He told me his story while the three children, Tommy, 13, Ivan, 12, and Linda, 10, sat quietly as if they'd heard it many times before.

Perisa said he was working on a Central Bridge construction site at Birchmount and Lawrence in 1961 when he had his accident.

"I suffered a fractured skull," he said, "and a fractured wrist, fractured elbow, fractured pelvis, broken fingers, and an injured spine."

Perisa paid three protracted visits to the hospital and received full compensation for them.

NINE UNPAID BILLS

But in 1967 he received only one month's compensation. For years after the accident he was constantly in and out of doctors offices, but one year nine doctor's bills were not paid by Workmen's Compensation.

"I had to pay one doctor out of my own pocket," Perisa told me.

He received his last payment July 30, 1968.

"But it wasn't a full payment," he said. "It was some kind of supplement fund. When I took the cheque to the bank, the clerk looked at it and told me it was a loan, not a grant."

"I didn't want to cash the cheque, but I didn't have any money and I was hungry. So I was forced to cash it."

After that last payment, Perisa went on welfare, first at $288 a month and later at $166 a month. But as soon as his wife got a job, his welfare was cancelled. Her job as a cashier at Inn on the Park pays $60 a week.

"The Workmen's Compensation Board has not acted legally," he said. "If you try to get a lawyer, they will try to prevent you from getting one. If you do get one, they will try to buy him off."

Perisa said he tried hard to get jobs.

TWO EVICTION NOTICES

"In one year I tried for 14 different jobs, but didn't get one. Dr. Butler accused me of being mentally disturbed instead of physically disabled, just because I tried to do that."

He also entered the Wellesley Legion School to be trained as a real-estate broker but failed the exams.

"I couldn't spell correctly in English, and I had to memorize everything," he said.

Perisa is a new Canadian. In 1952 he arrived in Canada from Croatia, Yugoslavia.

Yesterday — in 1970 — his two eviction notices lay on the table in front of us. Each one was stamped with a bright red seal and issued from the Sherriff of York County. The documents had ordered Perisa to leave by Tuesday. He was six months behind in his rent.

"I don't know when they will come," he said. "Perhaps in a week, a day, a few hours, a few minutes."

We talked about the Workmen's Compensation Board and welfare and wondered where he and his family would go.

A few minutes later, there was a knock on the door. Two men walked in.

EVICTION

"I'm from the York County Sherriff's office. I have instructions to evict you from the premises immediately. I can take your wife and children to an emergency shelter, if you want."

Sherriff's officer Frank Saltes was delivering the eviction notice. Officer Fred Ward accompanied him.

"You are not going to take my wife and children anywhere," Perisa answered. "You aren't going to force me to sign anything."

"All I'm going to do is ask you to give me permission to find shelter for your family," said Saltes.

"You put us out on the streets."
"No. I'll go beyond the law and assist you and your family."

"I won't sign anything."

ASK FOR SHELTER

"All you have to do is ask me to take your wife and kids down to the shelter."

I had been frantically taking pictures since the officers had walked in the door.

Saltes looked at me suspiciously and asked me where I was from. When I

God Bless All The Folks In Muskogee

*We don't smoke marijuana in Muskogee.
And we don't take out trips on LSD.
And we don't burn out draft caids down on Main Street.*

But we like living right and being free.

Out in the vast, flat heartland of America, out in Oklahoma just southeast of Broken Arrow and Cherokee County, and west of Okmulgee and Sequoyah Counties, there is a small town of approximately 40,000 souls called Muskogee. The land about it is level as far as the eye can see, land of wheat with the horizon only broken by the phallic shadow of the huge oil derricks that spring erect to the sky.

Oklahoma was Indian land, guaranteed by Congressional treaty; it was "ceded" to the white man in 1866. The land was fertile, the dirt farmer made his claim, settled and worked like a bastard. Crude, rough, sunburnt bodies bent to open the land and make it give food. They made it work for them; the wheat grew. Then someone discovered oil, you know, black gold, Texas tea, and the Clampetts moved to Beverly Hills.

Oil and wheat reside in an uneasy juxtaposition — the farmer and the magnate. Muskogee sits in the physical and emotional heartland of America. Woody Guthrie, genetic father to Arlo and inspirational father to Robert Zimmerman, made the Oakes his heroes. In a land wracked by the Depression, gangsterism, and the Dust Bowl, Woody, from out there, sang songs of hope, faith. Songs like THIS LAND IS YOUR LAND and PASTURES OF PLENTY. Songs of courage, the ability to face and endure the aberrations of nature and society. America, when in the throes of crisis, traditionally turns to the land, emphasizes the simple virtues, seeks the lost path. In the Depression, Guthrie and Jimmy Rodgers' "The Singing Brakeman" were the spokesmen. Now it's Dylan, Cash, Arlo, Merle and a host of others. And the medium is country music.

Vietnam, racism, the pace of life, impossibility of the cities, revolution of the young provoked the reaction, the return to the way. The Country Renaissance was born.

*We don't make a party out of loving
But we like holding hands and pitching woo
We don't let our hair grow long and shaggy
Like the hippies out in San Francisco do
And I'm proud to be an okie from Muskogee.*

Country music is relevant again, sustained by millions of forgotten people, a subculture which is the true underground; it was always there, just waiting to be called stage centre. Whether they be okies or bluenosers, herringchokers or Appalachian hillbillies, their music survived, their heroes, like Merle Haggard or Hank Snow prospered, their legends, Jim Reeves, Hank Williams, grew.

A steady underground stream, but occasionally seeping to the surface when faults (physical and moral) cracked the shell of American confidence and shattered the American Dream. Country music is the slave, the agent of reconstruction that will fit the pieces together again. The Johnny Cash of 1970 is no different from the Johnny Cash of 1954 (when he first wrote and recorded FOLSOM PRISON BLUES), except that now he is needed. Our heroes, our cultural pathfinders, have turned back from the apocalyptic vision engendered by our society and musically expressed through rock. Dylan went into the mountains and tasted a little COUNTRY PIE, The Band are UP ON CRIPPLE CREEK, even the Beatles are trying to GET BACK.

Rock had the power, the intensity, the fervour to shatter the myths, to rip off the fabric of hypocrisy, to expose the festering sores and cancers. As slayer of dragons, rock succeeded but there was nothing left, only a shambles. As Poco says, it's now time for PICKIN' UP THE PIECES.

Rock, the vehicle of revolution, is giving way to the strains of country music. After the mad, frenetic oscillations since the arrival of the BEATLES and STONES, the gross aberrations of people like the MC5, DOORS (they let it all hang out), NICE (they plunge knives into their amps and instruments) and the CRAZY WORLD OF ARTHUR BROWN (a pyromaniac) it's cooling down. Country music is the vehicle for the expression of the beauty of the land, peace, the past, courage, and sustenance. We just don't want to blow our minds anymore. One half of CROSBY, STILLS, NASH & YOUNG's act is done with unamplified instruments. It's time for PEACE IN THE VALLEY and THE GREEN, GREEN GRASS OF HOME, and returning to the fold. So we'll cut our hair, pick up the acoustic guitar, set up communes, jump on the cycle and ride out to find the country. We just might find it in Oshkosh, Glace Bay, Salinas, Cobocok or Muskogee.

*A place where even squares can have a ball
We still wave of' glory down at the court house
And white lightning's still the biggest thrill of all.*

The rock revolution carried the seeds of its own demise. Shaken with the memories of a near and feverishly violent past, country music expresses the yearning to get back to our roots. Country music, if nothing else, is essentially root music. Rooted in the soil, history, the souls of millions of forgotten men. Men who are gearjammers driving the lonely miles of pavement, crisscrossing the land, men who are chopping timber in the forests of New Brunswick or B.C. men working the mines, working the land, fishing the oceans. Men working, really working. Working with their bodies; no time to think.

Muskogee sits amidst the grain and the oil, the new Mecca. Waiting for the people, the average people, kinfolk all. There's been a few changes of course, Hank Williams is gone, killed by booze, drugs and cars, Red Foley and Jim Reeves are gone, Tex Ritter's going into politics, Nat Stuckey is pickin' Monkee tunes; but most of the boys are still here. Johnny, Buck, Sonny James and a few new people are coming up the road: Joni, Buffy, Bob, Arlo. Everything is gonna be just fine. Peace

Promises of a bucolic future, pleasant rustication on the range where the deer and the antelope play. Nothing more to worry about than your wife and who is going to win the pennant. Where the only change is that of the seasons giving way to each other in the eternal cycle. Where life goes on at a steady even pace. The quest for security and we just might pay the price.

300,000 peace-loving, flower carrying young people were completely ruled by a handful of Hells Angels who bullied, bruised, and kicked the shit out of them. The Hells Angels were the security at a free festival featuring the Rolling Stones. Somebody had to be the security and at one truckload of beer, Hells Angels come pretty cheap. 300,000 people just sat there and took it. Unquestioning acceptance of the authority of Hells Angels to rule festivals. With the drift to the country ethic and its expression through country music and the traditional themes of withdrawal and isolation (Big Pink, Alice's, church, communes), with Nixon finding that fabled constituency, the Middle Americans the quest for security is over. The result — the Attamont Massacre.

Country tunes are brimful of things like security, faith, endurance. There are songs of lost love, infidelity, deaths in the family, hard times and such but nary a trace of things like anguish. Even when things are tough, you know you'll see them through, God willing, and every last country show has at least one hymn. The Bible Belt is chockful of things like country music, Ku Klux Klan, Lester Maddox and George Wallace.

The country ethic is Janus like, mountain man Jim Bridger, freedom fighter Davy Crockett are part of the same tradition as Wallace and Maddox. Uncomfortable bedfellows but bedfellows nevertheless, beside the solid virtues, strong hearts and simple taste, there is a rock hard core of resistance to change and any semblance of toleration.

When was the last time you saw an anti-war demonstration in the South or West? Oh, there are demonstrations like the one in Mississippi where white kids are being forced to go to school with black kids.

*Leather boots are still in style
If a man needs footwear
Beads and roman sandals won't be seen
Football's still the roughest thing on campus
And the kids here still respect the college dean.*

Muskogee still sits there out in Oklahoma, surrounded by the wheatfields and the derricks. The country music and ethic are still there giving sustenance to the overcracked bodies and minds. The country culture of log cabins, sewing bees, homemade apple pies and jugs of sweet cider, has a singular allure.

It's a long way to Muskogee, and many won't make the trek.

on plays, politics and popular mythology

A wounded man sits on the sofa, a huge red blob of blood soaking through his stomach into his shirt. He is Loney, an aging revolutionary who has just led a rally to the steps of the legislature. The police guards, in accordance with a new law have opened fire into the unarmed crowd. Hundreds are injured, including Loney. The scene is straight from Battleship Potemkin.

"There was a man who was clutching his eyes... and they were hissing and he was crying out 'help, help'... goddamn pigs! goddamn bastards!" He groans and whimpers to his old friend Roberts, the moderate leader of the Senate.

Roberts' son, who has joined the rebels sits with his head between his knees. "Fascists!" they killed women and children... we didn't know they would really do it!"

Roberts looks on in dismay and reproach. You can almost hear him tsk tsking. Loney gasps, pulls himself to his feet and lunges towards his old friend, confronting Roberts with the fact that as leader of the Senate, he is powerless to stop the dictatorship. "What are you going to do," he shrieks, "What are you going to do?" The ultimate moment of truth arrives.

Roberts turns and with all the aplomb of Tiny Tim facing Atilda the Hun says (in all seriousness): "I'm going to raise one of the biggest stinks you've ever seen!"

Private hygiene aside, that emotion packed scene from Allan Stratton's new drama A Private Man just about sums up its effectiveness.

It's a political play, and as such, is commendable in this day of brotha-ha. Nevertheless a political play is a fragile animal which all too often takes as its starting point a popular mythology and gives very little recognition to the real forces behind politics.

A Private Man rises above even this. It avoids the latter completely. It is a play written in a vacuum, thought out in a vacuum, and performed in a vacuum. Even the fine points of its purely parliamentary content are so shoddy that credibility is destroyed.

Nevertheless, the play does have its feet firmly embedded in the cement of a very real mythology. It reminds one of an unsophisticated version of a novel by Hugh MacLennan. The moderate, hesit alike by long-haired extremists and foul-faced fascists, gropes to maintain his sanity in the onslaught of political havoc. And in your heart you know he's right. But then feet embedded in cement tend to be thrown overboard at the strangest times.

Arnold Jabes, dictator of Nostivak pushes his police bill through parliament even though progressive Tom Roberts has recently won control of the senate. In protest against the un-constitutionality of Jabes' move Loney (funny name for a radical) and Roberts' son organize a march. Roberts is helpless.

After the massacre, the police raid Loney's house and take the wounded man away for execution. In the scuffle, Roberts (he came to help Loney) assaults a police officer. While Roberts is in court the next day, Jabes' flunkies push through yet another bill. But Roberts arrives just in time to call, in an impassioned speech, for Jabes' impeachment. So Jabes dissolves parliament. So much for that.

But then Jabes is assassinated. Roberts, as senate leader becomes president. Things are starting to get back to normal when we find out who the assassin is (right Roberts' son (I guessed back at the beginning)). Only the president can slay the death sentence. Can a man of principle act on love? Can a loving man obey principle? Stay tuned next week to this station.

Perhaps if the play had been performed with even the minimum skill, the intrigue alone would be the saving grace. Alas, our hope is not kindled, much less realized. So we are left to contemplate the content.

As the play progressed, this reviewer became increasingly compelled to pump up, and like a latter day Jimmy Durante, yell, "Stop da music, stop da music!"

Because something had not been explained. Why were the people revolted? Because there was a dictator? Well, then, why was there a dictator? To say that this is central to the understanding of the whole play is an understatement of the grandest order.

Did the dictator issue his laws for no reason? Apparently he had reasons. Roberts wants reforms. What reforms? All that is mentioned is an obscure housing act (A verbahs wans housing bill). Certainly this is no cause for revolution or dictatorship.

Roberts' son helps occupy a university building (Check one university building occupied). He did it to protest oppressive laws. Why were the laws brought in? Because the people revolted? Why did the people revolt? Because of the laws. And so on and so forth all infinitum.

Dictators then, fall from the sky. They spring up like weeds. They are an aberration in our just political system. Trick Bryner as Jabes reinforces this image with his incongruously long hair (long hair on a fascist), his chain smoking, ill fitting clothes, trucking up and down the stage, looking for all the world like an evil Professor Erwin Corey.

The radicals are infants still at the oral stage, confused, blindingly honest and sincere but doomed to failure because they don't wear neat suits and vests.

But then Stratton is no different than most of us in his fairy-tale view of fascism. Hitler then, arose not because the German bourgeoisie, suffering after World War I, foresaw economic security and imperialist growth but because moderate men, men of good sense were duped. Hitler was an evil magician and if we don't watch it, his kind might arise today. To interpret Stratton further than this is to be presumptuous because the play doesn't give us enough substance to see what he's really trying to say. It just hints.

But the play has more hints. Some of the lines speak for themselves. "We forget the purpose of the laws," says Roberts (who is played by Steve Markson as straight from an ad in Campus magazine about "Accountants can be Swingers Too"). "Laws preserve the liberty of the common man... but well intended legislation can turn monster, rising up against the people it protects."

Indeed monsters are rampant throughout. Loney's wife, obviously a caricature of the NDP Ladies Auxiliary, chides him about running out to join marches, "Why can't you just be a private man?" At first I agreed with your fighting for causes, but now this dedication has turned into a monster."

We are told that well intentioned men and well-intentioned laws can turn into monsters and we are given living proof. But Roberts' tells his son "I want you to know that you did what you thought was right and I respect you for it."

"Thanks Dad," he answers, "That means a lot to me." Obviously these two positions can mean only one thing. There is another force behind men and laws that turns them into monsters. But Stratton never even alludes to this.

Had the play been meant as satire on Roberts, it almost might have worked. But there are enough hints to show that Roberts is considered a tragic character. He cannot remember his private emotions to his public image.

But tragedy must have some universal truth in it. This works only if the particular is credible enough and has enough real truth to make it universally effective. Unfortunately Stratton, through inconsistency in his own politics, not to mention complete disregard of the economic motives for political actions, has failed even to construct a meaningful tragedy.

Unfortunately, it seems, the lack of understanding and insight that plagues "A Private Man" is not only confined to the lack of sophistication of a student author but is indicative of something much more widespread among intellectuals in North America. If A Private Man is any indication, we may all become the figures in a mock tragedy staged and directed by men whose only answer to their seeming powerlessness is to further abchaplin the tramp: from bungling innocence to disguised malevolence

If asked to list the outstanding characteristics of the cinema in the past few years, the average moviegoer would probably name the easing of taboos on sex, the increase of violence, the accent on youth or the underground film. However, there is an important and increasingly popular aspect of the contemporary cinema that many people overlook: the revival.

The revival is not simply the re-release of box-office hits such as Gone With The Wind or Ben-Hur, but a presentation of films of the past that portrays specific actors, directors, genres or eras. It helps the modern viewer to travel back in time in order to discover the roots of the cinema.

Until recently, silent films or early talkies have been confined to novelty movie houses or to late late shows. But after the rise of the "camp" movement in art, serious film buffs began to take a closer look at their blown-up posters of W. C. Fields and Humphrey Bogart, and wonder why Hollywood still makes such a fuss over the stars of the 20's, 30's and 40's.

The interest in those motion pictures grew, and now it is not unusual for a local television station to arrange a prime-time film festival, or for a large theatre to devote a month to a series of old but superior movies.

One of the most successful actors to be "revived" is Charlie Chaplin, who appeared until last week in Modern Times (1936) and who is currently starring in the North American release of The Circus (1928). A jack-of-all-trades, Chaplin also produced, directed and composed the music for his films in order to ensure the proper portrayal of the Little Tramp.

The plots of many Chaplin movies tend to be very complicated and basically the same. Simply put, the Tramp attempts to find his place in society, but, through some misunderstanding or mishap, fails to settle down and terminate his "nomadic" way of life. There is nothing original in Chaplin's statement that it is hard to adjust to society. The real message comes in watching the Tramp trying to improve his lot, undaunted by his own incompetence or lack of experience. After the laughing has died down, the audience feels a very close bond with the Tramp and admires him for the determination, confidence and sincerity of his competitive spirit. Failure is not destruction, but a chance to start again.

It has been suggested that the unpopularity of the Little Tramp after the mid-30's arose through no fault of Chaplin's, but because of the changing relationship between man and society. The philosophy of the earlier comedies centered around the maxim "live and let live", to which the Tramp adhered religiously. This caused the conflict with society to be purely accidental and devoid of true viciousness on anyone's part. With the rise of fascism in Germany and the spread of world-wide depression, the innocent conflict developed to such a degree that the Tramp, although a comic figure, became a malevolent force out to eliminate the overgrown industrial enemy that was bent on destroying him. Such changes in a well-established character alienated the audience and caused the Tramp to "die".

This opinion is well illustrated by the two Chaplin films that have been presented in Toronto. In The Circus the Tramp becomes a prop man in a sideshow in an attempt to escape from the police who have mistaken him for a pickpocket. He falls in love with Merna Kennedy, an acrobat, becomes the star of the show, and persuades the wicked manager to stop antagonizing CONGRATULATIONS! you and 68,000 others graduate this spring got a job?

It is becoming common knowledge that this year there will be many more graduates than jobs. We are aware of the situation and we're taking steps to solve it.

During workshops held recently by the Human Studies Foundation and Career Assessment Ltd., leading employers discussed Canada's human resources problem. Their findings are important to you:

- (1) Employers agreed that there are more and more applicants each year for fewer and fewer jobs... and the ratio is growing.
- (2) Turnover of newly-hired grads is increasing annually, making students a bad risk for expensive training. This is due to the fact that grads often do not like their first job, since at the time they were hired, they were unsure of their real interests and abilities.

The workshops were conducted by several eminent psychologists, including Dr. Edwin Henry and Dr. William Owens. The former has been Chief Psychologist of the U.S. Armed Services, and Director of Selection, Peace Corps. The latter is President of the Division of Industrial Psychology, American Psychological Association.

Drs. Henry and Owens, along with Mr. James Hickling, one of Canada's foremost industrial psychologists have accepted positions with the Foundation to help students find the right job. The first time.

The Foundation can do this if you complete a Biographical Inventory Blank — BIB — a multiple choice inventory of auto-biographical questions relating to your own past experience. Once you have completed the BIB, and returned it to the Human Studies Foundation, you will be sent an individual, personal counselling report based upon your responses. The compilation of this report involves advanced computer analyses based on thirty years of research.

The BIB could also provide you with professionally selected job opportunities. This is done without charge to you by Career Assessment Ltd. Our staff of psychologists will be recommending lists of people who complete the BIB to various Canadian employers. The recommendations are made only after careful matching of job specifications to BIB profiles have been completed by the psychologists.

BIB will be available in your campus bookstore, along with explanatory material, as of January 21st. Your fee of $5.00 is remitted to the Foundation to help finance further research. If you wish job assistance as well as a counselling report, your BIB must be postmarked no later than Jan 29th. For more information about BIB, contact your Department of Psychology.

If you cannot get BIB from your bookstore, write the Human Studies Foundation, 50 Prince Arthur Avenue, Toronto 180, Ontario, enclosing $5.00.

the circus employees. In the course of the story, Chaplin walks a tightrope with monkeys on his head, inadvertently locks himself in a lion's cage, and disrupts a rehearsal of the circus clowns.

But Modern Times, for all its honest-to-goodness belly-laughs, is basically pessimistic and quite sinister. In the opening sequence, the Tramp is shown working as a human link on a conveyor belt. His sole function in life is to tighten two nuts on every part that goes by. Wherever he walks, the Tramp is glared at by the boss from a wall-sized Big Brother-type television screen. Finally, the overworked man suffers a nervous breakdown and nearly demolishes the factory in retaliation. (Yes, this IS the plot of a comedy.) The audience roars in laughter not at mere pratfalls or sight-gags, but at Chaplin's imprisonment after he is mistaken for the leader of a rioting labour union. At one point in the movie, the Tramp symbolically falls into a monstrous machine where he lies imprisoned by massive gears and huge fly-wheels.

Chaplin's comments were becoming too complex for audiences in the 30's and 40's. His films, which depicted a violent struggle between man and society, reduced the human being from a position of bungling, good-natured innocence to that of disguised malevolence.

Since the completion of Modern Times nearly 35 years ago, Chaplin's prophecies have come true. We have upon us today the threats of automation, total conformity, and the invasion of privacy that the Tramp viewed as so dangerous to his existence. To many people, Modern Times holds more attraction than The Circus because the truth of the former is much more relevant to today's society than is the naivete of the latter. Nevertheless, both types of Chaplin films continue to thrive in current revivals, one as a criticism of what is, and the other as a wish for the innocence that can be.

In all Chaplin's movies, simple or not, there remains the motto that the little man of 1930 and 1970 has always lived by: Persevere! "You have to believe in yourself, that's the secret", he once told one of his sons. "Even when I was in the orphanage, when I was roaming the streets trying to find enough to eat to keep alive, even then I thought of myself as the greatest actor in the world. I had to feel that exuberance that comes from utter confidence in yourself. Without it you go down to defeat".

If Hair were really the iconoclastic experience it has been cracked up to be, hard-liners from every camp would be congregating in front of the Royal Alex to defend their respective idols.

The Sisters for a Decent Society should be down in front of the Royal Alex every night to distribute chastity belts, soap and water, and black serge maxibros for the protection of theatregoers who are about to encounter a lot of four-letter words ("shit," "love," "flag") and some elaborate and blatantly phallic bits of staging and business. Meanwhile, matching these moralists stomp for stomp, there should be a parallel protest line of Fuckers for Freedom, demanding that a show which celebrates sensuality and sexual liberation should drop its self-conscious coyness and should be performed entirely in the innocent nudity which characterizes the strip at the end of the first act.

On the other side of King Street there should be a regiment of Descendants of American Rightists flashing Americanize-or-leave-it badges and carrying pictures of Communist fiends roasting (South) Vietnamese children as counters to the ridicule which the show in general directs at American mythology and to the unsettling exposure of dirty little wars in songs like "3-5-0-0." Scuttling in the opposite direction would be the New Left Chaos, mobilizing against the manifest mindlessness of the Tribe's teenybopper heroes and heroines and insisting that songs about the letting the sun shine are counter-productive strategies for a confrontation with condescending Liberal conviction. And if room could be found on the sidewalk, there'd be some Mapleleaf Mobilizers, whose gripe would be that local talent and ticket-money is being thrown away on a show which is not only an American import but also cannot be understood unless one has spent years of immersion in American kitsch. They might add that the show has been an international success with only minor concessions to local tastes (e.g., the Toronto production includes posters like "I Am Madly in Love with Canadian Bacon" and "Robert Goulet is an 8 x 10 Glossy") proves, not the show's universal appeal, but the universal infection from the American Empire.

And down the middle of King Street — placed thus so as to distinguish themselves from both political and ethical commitments — would come the theatrical ideologues. The formalists could find much to protest in this production of Hair — inept acting and obvious inexperience on the part of the cast (most notable among the exceptions to this verdict being Tobi Lark, a Dionne who, in spite of an injured leg, created a circle of charm and competence wherever she appeared), the reduction of choreography to much flailing of arms and jumping punctuated by group gropes, and the occasional lack of precision in the energetic execution of even this choreography and in the delivery of lines.

These protesters might dip their banners occasionally, being happily stunned by the variety and precision of the lighting effects, surprised by the high caliber of the singing, and respectful of the ingenuity exhibited in bits of staging which render mediocre musical numbers into dramatic marvels. But however the formalists' verdict on the execution of the show balanced out, they would have to condemn the very conception of Hair. Their grounds for such a judgment would be the claim that you can't pretend that fragmented parts add up to a viable dramatic whole, and consequently, a plot line which establishes nothing more than a conglomeration of occasions on which kids can jump in and out of costumes and caricatures proves only that either the kids or their scriptwriters are incapable of sustaining a single significant role. (Final phrase is lifted from Herbert Blau.)

The theatrical purists on the other side of the yellow line should be equally upset by the world-wide Hair cult. They would claim that, if Hair is trying to breakdown boundaries between theatre and life by putting "bei-ing" rather than "act-ing" on stage — and this distinction is emphasized by co-authors Ragni and Rado — then the $250,000-plus staging, the mammoth auditions, the publicity campaign, even the use of a specifically theatrical building, all add up to a self-contradiction if not a conscious cop-out. Rather like a girl investing in natural-look make-up and no-bra bras. These protesters would make their point, not by passing out pamphlets, but by creating an impromptu happening out of the materials at hand. And they would not charge oncoming traffic $15 a head for the privilege and pleasure of participating in the event.

But I sure didn't see any protesters near the Royal Alex on opening night. Everyone in my line of vision — MacKenzie Porter included — seemed to be having a rollicking good time, and all left with faces suffused by a warm glow of glee and good will. And I suspect that many of those people whose principles would logically prod them to protest on any of the previously-discussed grounds are busy picking up tickets, not pickets.

Nobody is likely to protest Hair because it is so much fun and such safe fun. Happy and harmless. The multilateral character of its mockery guarantees that any insults to your pet principle or practice will be quickly balanced by a jibe thrown at the opposition. As for the things which it seriously celebrates — love, life, human relations, and peace — these are so loosely and enthusiastically set forth that I can't imagine anyone so sour as not to subscribe to them. Neither the scoffing nor the celebration, in fact, makes any serious threats or demands on anything or anybody — except perhaps the health of the performing company. Safely distanced, the little old lady from the Annex can react with a line which, in the irony of self-defense the show attributes to her: "Look Agnes, how cute!"

Agnes and the little old lady will not be alone in finding the show appealing. Its entertainment potential is enormous, and the realization of this in the Toronto production matches expectations, particularly in Act II. But don't expect a revolution: the only observable one is that the little old lady has bought an Indian print minidress, or maybe even flared silk trousers, to wear with her tennis shoes. The success of Hair in New York, Paris, London, Munich, San Francisco, Chicago, now Toronto, and next month Sydney, does not signal the inauguration of an Age of Aquarius. It merely indicates that the Age's trappings are being produced, somewhat pasteurized, for popular consumption. And who bothers to protest a new fad — especially one that's obviously so remarkably marketable?

The most recent offerings by the Lennon-Ono axis have added a new dimension to hypeart in the record world. There have been at most a handful of performers in the history of popular music who have had the following that John Lennon has, but apart from his contribution as a Beatle, the adoration hardly seems justified.

I'm a bit suspicious of Lennon and the high powered promoter's world that he comes out of. I suppose it's still possible that he will do something courageous and meaningful to help the world get along, but a peace trip to Toronto which conveniently turns into a negotiating session for a "peace" music festival doesn't bode well for the future.

But even if it should turn out that Lennon's dedication to peace isn't as deep as it might be, his reputation can always fall back on his work as a Beatle and on his own records, one of which is the recent Wedding Album.

The album arrived in a large box from Capitol like a late Christmas present. The box could have held six records while in fact it only has one, but the record is the least of it. Here's what we get:

- two by three foot glossy sheet with six candid photos of the two on each side.
- second glossy sheet, one by three feet, with two cartoon versions of the wedding saga drawn by the principals.
- postcard of the two lying in bed holding tulips (imagine the excitement if John had been holding a Lily).

- strip of 4 photos of the same as taken in a coin photo booth.

- 17 page book of press clippings.

- plastic bag containing a photograph of what looks to be a piece of wedding cake on a doily.

- a copy of the wedding license.

All that for only about $10.00. And as if that wasn't enough, there's also a record, the album for which opens up to reveal the happy couple in their cozy retreat, completely surrounded by reporters.

Well, I can honestly say that the record was a complete surprise. The first sound to come out was something which sounded like a thick stew slowly bubbling in a large cauldron. This soon fades out and the following dialogue takes place:

John: Yoko

John: John

John: Yoko

Yoko: John

John: Yoko

Yoko: John

John: Yoko

Yoko: John

John: Yoko

Yoko: John

John: Yoko

Yoko: John!

John: Yoko!

Yoko: John!!

John: Yoko!!!

So it goes, pleading, threatening, seducing, laughing, crying, passionate, and in any other modes they can think up. It's an old joke, traditionally played between one John and one Marsha, but the particular genius of these two soon becomes apparent when you realize that it's going to go on for the whole side of the record. Besides, there's a new wrinkle to the game — the dolorous bubbling is back, and, after a while, it becomes clear that the sound is monstrously amplified heartbeats, one coming from each speaker, as are the voices.

Certainly this record is food for thought. Lying there with the Johns and Yokos waiting across your body, you might like to decide whether John Yokos better than Yoko Johns. Myself, I prefer Yoko's Johns. They have more humor to them and provide the really good moments. Of course, near the beginning of the record, you might wonder how long it's going to go on, and once you've figured that out, you may want to begin it again to see if there are more Johns or Yokos. It starts and ends with John saying Yoko, but that doesn't prove much since at several places they come out in batches. On my copy, the counting is complicated by the fact that there are three grooves which repeat. You can also open the jacket and view the touching scene: John and Yoko in their humble dwelling surrounded by the adoring throng. A new Nativity, is it not?

If you should feel yourself running out of pertinent thoughts as the Johns and Yokos drift by, you can always turn to the wedding license and marvel at the good fortune of C. J. Wheeler, who just happened to be the Marriage Registrar in Gibraltar on March 20th, 1969 and who took from J. and Y 2s 6d for his services. More important though is the pressing question, can the son of a common seaman (retired) find happiness with the daughter of a banker (retired).

Finally, if all else fails, you might ask yourself if it's true that Ono is the name of a common English contraceptive.

As all things must, side one at length comes to an end, and one wonders what can possibly be waiting on side two. So now, having turned it over and flipped the lever to start the machine, we sit back and — oh hell, I can't go on with it. If you want to know what's on the other side, buy it, but keep in mind that strictly on artistic merit, this record would never have been made, and only the name of John Lennon has brought it into being. It's not even good as a record documentary, but if you're desperate for a souvenir of the big event, it's all you've got. It would have been a nice gesture if they had given it away, or, better yet, if they had given it to anyone who contributed $2.00 to a Biafra aid fund.

Any old footage of John and Yoko, does NOT a program make.

Last Sunday afternoon on Channel 9, CFRB's Jim Fleming hosted John & Yoko . . . a Visit for Peace, a half hour saga of the Lennon's Christmas visit to Toronto to arrange for a grand peace festival at Mossport in July.

The program heralded itself as "an attempt to bridge the generation gap". Even that cliché was too exciting an introduction for the half-hour that followed. It was a disappointingly linear experience — no more than a piecing together of three or four canisters of film. The approach was chronological: warm welcome; press conference; private interview; skidooning sequence; final wave bye-bye from the Rapido.

The show began with music — All We Are Saying Is Give Peace a Chance — and Jim Fleming condescendingly urging all over-30 Torontonians to watch and listen and maybe then they'd begin to understand what this peace movement is all about. Unfortunately, director-producer Ed Richardson didn't seem to know himself.

It was all very wonderful — John and Yoko Lennon honoring Toronto with a special Christmas visit; putting up their pithy posters and smiling and saying how groovy Canada is because she talks to China. Then saying it again and again at the behest of interviewers and reporters.

The interviews themselves were not profound but they were worth listening to. John spoke clearly and straightforwardly, which made his statements believable and raised them a hit above the banal.

(After all, who hasn't heard this peace bullshit before?). Yoko appeared to be intelligent but played the subordinate-to-husband role, providing only supportive comments. John explained that this is so because he is the Famous Person and therefore the one to whom interviewers direct their questions and attention.

One suspects that John and Yoko have privately agreed on their respective roles. After all, the Beatleness of John plays an essential part in the Lennons' peace campaign. As John explained, they are exploiting his fame, his access to mass communication, and the attention he receives from the public to sell their product — PEACE.

"Advertising is where it's at", John believes. And so, taking the cue from the type of advertising spawned by capitalism, he is out to bombard the public with the idea of Peace. The effect, hopefully, will be a weakening of the general apathetic but firm acceptance of war as an inevitable fact of life, and concomitantly, a strengthening of the idea that peace is possible.

WAR IS OVER IF YOU WANT IT. The Lennons' Christmas message puts the onus of war where it belongs — on the individual. The words are tremendously powerful and leave any reader squirming in discomfort. Peace is possible, yes, even in our technologically complex society. You don't believe it? Then you're responsible for war.

The producer of this show had an excellent opportunity to boost the advertising campaign for peace. But he failed miserably because he seemed to be more taken with the personalities than with the product. The theme might as well have been: "Even famous people like to Skidoo".

Instead of devoting the entire half hour to John and Yoko's faces and voices and jokes and gestures, why not have selected the most potent portions of the interview and overlaid the rest with film and stills of other less famous, less beautiful peaceniks; focusing not on the queen bees but on the drones of the movement.

Producer Richardson and interviewer Fleming could've quite decide whether Lennon's PEACE or Lennon's FAME should be the focus of the program. The result: they never made it across that generation gap. The program didn't make it either.

WAR IS OVER IF YOU WANT IT

Outside of Libreville, Gabon, where many Biafran leaders are now in exile, there is a children's camp. The Gabonese call it Kilometre Onze, to mark its distance from their capital city, but its real name is Le Village des Enfants Biafrais. The neat white dormitories scatter themselves about beneath the huge old trees of the beginnings of the equatorial rain forest, and each building has a name: Enugu, Umuahia, Aba, Port Harcourt, Owerri, each named after a Biafran town or city.

I visited the camp in September, when Biafra was still alive, and saw some fifteen hundred children, just a small fraction of the millions of child refugees thrown up by the vicious war the Nigerian government now has ended — after beginning their needless attempt to crush the Eastern portion of their supposed nation some 32 months ago.

On the whole, they were happy children then, playing games, going to school, being kept active by their Biafran and German supervisors so they would forget their experiences and lost families. Almost all had regained their weight and ran excitedly up to shake your hand, saying "Bonjour, monsieur", until they were told you spoke English, then solemnly asking "How are you?"

Now their towns seem gone for good, and the Biafran flag they saluted each day in school, finally put down.

What happened to the Federation of Nigeria? What brought on Biafra?

Why did the Nigerian Government spend over a billion dollars, extinguish several million lives, to prevent Biafran independence? How did it all happen, where does responsibility lie?

In the middle of 1969, former B.B.C. reporter Frederick Forsyth wrote a book, The Story of Biafra, in which he attempted to convey the answers to these questions, and thereby to encourage the support which might have let Biafra live. His book now stands as an epitaph for the nation he tried to save. It gives us answers and they are depressing answers indeed.

You have to go back some way into the history of Nigeria to find the beginnings of the civil war, back in fact to the traditional African societies which dominated in the three major regions of the future nation. In the North, was the Hausa-Fulani area, where a Muslim elite ruled a hierarchical and very conservative society; in the West was the Yoruba area where "constitutional monarchies" were the pattern; and in the East was the Ibo area where decentralized democracies existed.

It took British Imperialism, competing with French and German Imperialism, to pull these three diverse societies into one political unit, Nigeria. That political unit never became a society of its own; the splits continued even during the fight for independence from Britain, when the North sought first to stop independence, then pushed for a separate Northern nation and finally settled for a federal constitution which left each region intact and very powerful. The pattern of political parties reflected these divisions, with three regional parties developing.

Post-independence politics in Nigeria came to be dominated by two characteristics, first, the consolidation of regional political parties, and, second, the gradual growth of power of the Northern Region over the Federation as a whole. In the mid-60's the second trend became most important as the North used the army to put down any dissent in its own region, and established a sympathetic government in the West by declaring an emergency there, and, in effect, putting the Yorubas under trusteeship.

Northern leaders used electoral fraud and anti-Ibo racism to win massive majorities federally and in the West. Riots broke out, and, as Forsyth puts it, "the mighty Federation of Nigeria was crumbling into ruin."

A series of army coups followed. The first was defeated but in its aftermath, Chief of Staff Aguiyi-Ironsi was named head of government by the cabinet. It was at this point that Colonel Ojukwu was named Military Governor of the Eastern Region. Shortly after Ironsi's takeover, organized riots in the North opposed unification of the country and murdered some three thousand Easterners there. Finally Northern army officers launched a coup and took over the government. Soldiers of Eastern origin were systematically killed across Nigeria.

In September, 1966, more massacres of Ibos in the North were carried out. It is estimated that 30,000 were killed at that time. Close to a million more Ibos fled to an eastern homeland many had never seen before, but would fear ever to leave again. Colin Legum, the reporter for The Observer and an experienced African expert, described the tragedy of that fall:

While the Hausas in each town and village in the North know what happened in their own localities, only the Ibos know the whole terrible story from the 600,000 or so refugees who have fled to the safety of the Eastern Region — hacked, slashed, mangled, stripped naked, and robbed of all their possessions; the orphans, the widows, the traumatised. A woman, mute and dazed, arrived back in her village after travelling for five days with only a bowl in her lap. It held the head of her child, severed before her eyes.

Another woman stepped off a refugee lorry, her face battered. By her side was her little boy, one of whose eyes had been gouged out, and her little girl, who had severe scalp wounds. "What," she kept repeating, "has happened to my baby?" It had been tied to her back before she was knocked to the ground. Men, women and children arrived with arms and legs broken, hands hacked off, mouths split open. Pregnant women were cut open and the unborn children killed.

There is not the least doubt that the Hausas of the North decided to rid their region forever of the Ibos.

Legum, Africa Report, November, 1966.

After three such massacres, there was tremendous pressure in the East for a breakaway from Nigeria. Only Ojukwu, the man now accused of starting the war, stood against secession and maintained attempts to work out an operational agreement with the coup leaders in the North and West. Such an agreement was finally established in January, 1967, at a meeting in Aburi, Ghana. A week later the Federal Army leaders effect-tively renounced the agreement; from then on it was a matter of time until Biafra's inevitable declaration of independence on May 30, 1967.

The confused fighting of the civil war began as Nigeria rejected Biafran independence. They felt sure of fast success in putting the revolt down, and, besides, they had the power of the British government behind them. Forsyth outlines at length the lies and the manipulations of that government in pretending neutrality, yet providing military advisors and millions of dollars of modern arms and ammunition.

Why did the British government play this death-dealing game? What was it about Biafra that made the same Northern leaders who had permitted the slaughter of Ibos in the North now fight to prevent those Ibos leaving the federation? Apologists spoke of the need to maintain a Nigerian unity that had never existed, seemingly for its own sake; they spoke of the dangers of a rise of tribalism in Africa should Biafra succeed in separating, although racial differentiation had already been established by the North as grounds for killing people.

The fact was, however, that Biafra had oil, the greater percentage of all the oil in Nigeria. One of the few African leaders who has rejected a continued dependent relation on his country's former colonizer is Julius Nyerere of Tanzania. That country broke its ties with Britain over Rhodesia, lost British aid at that time, and was free to speak. Significantly, Tanzania was the first nation to officially recognize Biafran independence. In September, 1969, Nyerere flew to Addis Ababa to the Organization for African Unity meeting to fight for a ceasefire:

Biafra had vital oil resources; the former colonial power (Britain) was vitally interested in this vast amount of oil; her interests were threatened in the conflict; (the really vital matter was the threat, not whether the threat came from the centre or the periphery; this is only important in deciding who is going to be ally and who enemy); but in this case, due to relations between the British and the Ibos, the

by steve langdon

threat came from the secessionists. When war broke out between Biafra and the Centre, Britain, like Belgium (in the Congo), was on the same side as the Foreign Companies — in this case the Oil Companies. . . .

From Britain's point of view, what is vital is her oil interests; as she decides on her own policy, this is what the war is about. The Biafrans are fighting a most unequal war, and if they go on fighting, God alone knows what their end will be.

Julius Nyerere, OAU Memorandum, Sept., 1969.

The war itself became an even more brutal and vicious fact when Biafra was cut off from the sea and makeshift airlifts were all that could supply her people with food in their diminishing, refugee-crowded area.

The Federal Government began to use starvation as a weapon of war, and the apologists condemned Colonel Ojukwu for not surrendering his starving country. Again it is proper to refer to Nyerere's response to this; his position was, after all, that of a disinterested neutral.

We are told that Ojukwu should end the terrible sufferings of his people by surrender. We are told he should reason thus: "The Nigerians are stronger than we are and they have stronger friends than we could ever hope to get. If we go on resisting, a combination of bombing, starvation and the inevitable epidemics, would exterminate us." Perhaps he should add, kindly: "Even if the Nigerians never intended to exterminate us. . . . the Biafrans surrender and all is well.

Historically and logically, however, surrender on such terms as these — with the alternative being extermination — is for the purpose of creating enemy on his own terms, with the only condition being that you should not be killed, cannot lead to any kind of friendship, or even toleration. If it is a battalion which surrenders, the soldiers become prisoners-of-war; if it is a people, they become a colony, or an occupied territory, or something like that.

If we do not learn to criticize injustice within our continent, we will soon be tolerating fascism in Africa, as long as it is practised by African Governments against African Peoples. Consider what our reaction would have been if the 30,000 Ibos had been massacred by whites in Rhodesia or South Africa. One can imagine the outcry from Africa. Yet these people are still dead; the colour of those who killed them is irrelevant. We must ask Nigeria to stop more killing now, and to deal with the problem by argument, not death.

Nyerere, OAU Memo

The O.A.O. meeting meeting was unsuccessful. I talked to a discouraged President Nyerere in Tanzania after his return. He stated at that time that the Federal Nigerian leader Gowon, with whom he had met for a lengthy discussion, had been convinced of the need for a ceasefire and agreed to call for one. Then hard-liners in the Nigerian government and leaders of other African states fearful of Biafra-style separatism in their nations combined to persuade Gowon against any such move.

The war went on and, with it, the starvation of Biafra.

All is fair in war and starvation is one of the weapons of war. I don't see why we should feed our enemies fat, only to fight us harder.

Chief Awolowo, Federal Nigerian Finance Commissioner.

I remember the hot sun in Libreville as I asked a Biafran doctor about the condition of the seemingly healthy children I saw at the camp there.

"It takes about six months of feeding to bring them back to the fairly normal condition they're now in. But that's all on the surface; there's so little we know about starvation and protein deficiency in children. Now we're beginning to find out, I'm afraid."

He went bleakly on: "Something like thirty percent of the children here are now suffering from T.B. Their resistance is so minimal after what they went through that they can't fight it. We think there's brain damage too that came with the lack of proper food. And now we're even having small children get heart-attacks. As I say the recovery's just on the surface."

"What about the prospects of a ceasefire?" I asked him. He answered in a very grim voice.

"There doesn't seem to be any chance of it. The war's just going to go on." His was the same kind of discouragement I'd seen in the other Biafrans I'd talked to in Libreville, aides at the Biafran Embassy there, workers and teachers at the children's camp. I should have known at that point that Biafra would not be able to stand up to yet another massively-armed federal offensive.

"At least there's one thing," the doctor told me, "as I look around here I can see fifteen hundred children who are alive and wouldn't be without our efforts."

And then there was Canada. Our population could think of thousands of children too who would have died without our aid; Canairelief became one of the most important of the scotch-tape and prayer-flying services which saved Biafran lives. Public opinion rose in mid-1968, but seemed to dissipate in the following months as the Canadian government, seemingly fearful of giving Quebec separatism any support by analogy, refused to act to help Biafra in any significant way.

We who will vote next election should faithfully remember Pierre Trudeau and his comparison of Biafran relief to sending food to the Nazis at Stalingrad. And we should remember Mitchell Sparg and the Liberal government for their support of British policy in Nigeria, and their cynical last minute gesture of "humanitarianism".

Like the rest of the white world, Canada's government watched millions of black men die and did virtually nothing about it, Rocky Jones, the Halifax black leader, has called this racism, and I think he's right.

Now Biafra is finished. What can Nigeria do with its millions of starved "citizens", especially after fighting them for 3 years? What will those people do? The answer is not in Forsyth's book, nor anywhere else. Perhaps the Nigerians will follow the example of British Imperialism that supported them, and establish a system of indirect rule. Perhaps the hungry Biafran population will accept this in return for food. But, somehow, it seems unlikely that such a situation could ever work over the long run. There is too much bitterness, too much fear, too much hatred.

Guerrilla warfare may go on; it may be extended into other parts of Nigeria where discontent has been held in check only by the hysteria of fighting a war. In their bitterness, many Biafrans in exile and friends of Biafra may hope for such a trend. Yet that too could only continue to bring misery to the lives of people in that country. The legacy of this civil war will be a viciousness that will last for generations; it has left a tragic hatred that will destroy the potentials of Nigeria for many years. The whole episode has been a serious blow to Africa's attempts to build a decent society on that continent.

Many people are now, in unthinking style, blaming the Biafran leaders, especially Colonel Ojukwu, who is pictured as fleeing the country with private riches. Such conceptions reflect only ignorance, of the wealth Ojukwu's father left for him in Switzerland, to which he could have fled at any time, and, of course, of the origins of Biafra. Biafra had no choice but to secede. Responsibility must lie with the Federal Nigerians, and the British, for making such secession necessary, and then for violently fighting it for 32 months; blame must fall on the countries of Africa and the world which did not intervene to stop the bloodshed.

At the Children's village in Libreville, I remember three children I saw in the hospital who had just arrived the night before from Biafra. Two were tiny skeletons, skin blotched from protein deficiency, sitting huddled and crying, eyes staring vacantly ahead.

The third was lying in a special room, unconscious, lying fetus-like and breathing with rasping difficulty. There was nothing to him but skin and bone.

I later learned he died that night. It was Dylan Thomas, in a poem about a child killed in a fire-raid on London, who wrote, "After the first death, there is no other."

The Mark of Z

In 1967 a military coup overthrew the existing Greek government and seized power. Today, a Fascist dictatorship rules.

Unable to speak out at home and harassed by the government, many Greeks have fled from their homeland and have become political exiles in the West. A new film, Z, directed by a young Greek exile, Costas-Gravas, (who previously directed a very fine detective film, The Sleeping-Car Murders), speaks out against the tyranny of this dictatorship.

The film, based on an actual event, the assassination of the leftist Gregorios Lambrakis in 1963, sets out to show us the overthrow of democratic government. Unable, for obvious reasons, to make the film in his native Greece, Costas-Gravas shot the film in Algeria.

The film was made for the most part with French actors and a French crew. Costas-Gravas has chosen some of the finest actors in Europe for his film. The cast includes Yves Montand, Jean-Louis Trintignant (A Man and A Woman), Jacques Perrin, the fine Italian actor Renato Salvatori, and Irene Papas, another Greek exile who is one of the most beautiful and talented actresses working today in any part of the world.

In the role of the doctor (Lambrakis) who is assassinated for his political beliefs, Montand is so convincing that his presence haunts the viewer for the whole film although he is assassinated when the picture is only one-third finished. Also very impressive in a brief role is Miss Papas. She plays the wife of the doctor who comes to his bedside as he is dying. In one scene in her husband's hotel room, she wanders around the room and looks at the belongings he had brought with him, on his fatal journey. As she touches the objects she remembers their married life. In this one scene, Miss Papas is absolutely brilliant.

Costas-Gravas uses his actors effectively and as we become involved with them, we become more and more sympathetic to the cause that they represent.

In perhaps the lead role in the film, that of the district attorney who investigates the case for the government, Jean-Louis Trintignant performs superbly. The government assigns Trintignant to investigate the murder of the doctor, hoping that he will sweep it under the carpet. The attorney is a loyal citizen but he is also an honest man and when he discovers that the murder was planned by the government and the army he decides that justice must be served. Trintignant shows us the struggle that goes on in a man who has believed in his government and has served it well, only to discover that it is, in fact, corrupt. He is an honest man and he decides that they must pay for their crimes. He courageously resists all pressures by his superiors to stop the investigation.

The crew is for the most part French and its most prominent member is the fine cameraman who so often works for Godard, Raoul Coutard. His camerawork is highly effective in maintaining the brisk pace of the film. He brilliantly captures the moods of a mob that angrily listens to Lambrakis making a speech for peace. As the camera surveys the faces in the crowd, showing us their anger, we hear the calm voice of the doctor who speaks of peace. As the speech nears its climax, their anger reaches its highest level. The tension is unbelievable.

Coutard's moving camera is most effective in the film's many chase scenes. In one scene, one of the doctor's aides, who is about to testify against the government is chased by a man in a car who attempts to run him down as he walks along the sidewalk. The aide avoids the car and the camera follows him as he frantically tries to escape. He runs from side to side but the car still follows him into a garden and even down stairs. The scene is, in a way, reminiscent of the scene in Hitchcock's North by Northwest in which Cary Grant is chased across an open field by a man in an airplane. Not since Hitchcock has a director so effectively filmed a chase sequence.

Costas-Gravas has made an extraordinarily exciting thriller. Through his use of his camera, his pacing of the film and his actors, he forces the audience to become totally involved in the film. This is quite a feat considering that, for two-thirds of the film, he concentrates on the investigation of an assassination in which there is hardly any mystery as to whom the killers were.

The audience is quite aware that the government was behind the assassination. He nevertheless follows the investigation until its conclusion and holds the audience's interest as he shows us the various attempts used to thwart the attorney's investigation. The attorney's investigation reaches its end and all the guilty parties in the army and the government are arrested. Through all these events, Costas-Gravas has forced the audience to become involved with his character. He has won our sympathies to the side of the doctor and his followers. We have seen the corruption of the Greek government and fully sympathize with those whom they have victimized.

In Z, Costas-Gravas has made powerful statement. He has shown us the corruption of a right-wing government that professes to allow free speech but, in fact, assassinates all opposition leaders in order to prevent them from protesting. He uses melodrama to drive home his point. Following the investigation, the full humbling of the guilty is revealed. The scene then cuts to a newscast in which the reporter tells us that all those who testified against the government, and the prosecutor, have mysteriously died and that all the guilty men have since been freed. The present government has restored them to their previous positions in life. The corruption has not been rooted out. The Fascists still rule.

At the end of the film Costas-Gravas gives us a list of things banned by the current government in Greece. They include: The Beatles, long hair, free assembly, political opposition, and the Greek letter Z which means "he still lives".

Director, Costas-Gravas, has made his statement in Z. The air surrounding the Lambrakis affair has not cleared and we must now be aware of the future.

Up Thine

At one point during Putney Swope I was experiencing something like a bad acid trip and was saved by the appearance on screen of a calming presence, a public relations man, I think, for Swope's Black advertising agency, Truth and Soul. Putney Swope is the kind of movie you must allow to take you in completely. If you try to get on top of what is happening while you are watching it, all is lost. However, although I may be wrong, I think that an American will become involved in the film more easily than a Canadian because the whole race question is likely to evoke more immediate responses from him. Because comedy moves on instinctive levels it is difficult to transpose it from one country to another and to have it work as well. It is not possible to keep up with the complex changes taking place in every aspect of race relations in the United States unless you are living those changes. Think of how far behind we must remain compared to a New Yorker, particularly if he is Black, no matter how much we try, vicariously, to stay ahead.

But the humour in the film is too rich to be spoiled by any lack of experience on that level alone. Robert Downey, who directed Chafed Elbows, travels into a surreal world — it is almost too perfect that it should be an advertising agency — that works, in the words of one of the characters, by means of "a phrase here, an innuendo there" Putney Swope, the head of the agency half-heartedly tries to stay on top of things, but finally realizes that to keep any one thing under control, he must take on the whole of reality. So he is contemptuous of those Blacks working for him who move and communicate according to vibrations, who receive signals from "the drum." It becomes obvious to him that there is nothing to move to, there is no bottom to the chaos. Faith in the "vibrations" is just as pathetic as the man Putney meets who has invented a word and uses it any way he wishes and thinks he has found some kind of foot-hold, some base from which he can work, except he goes over it and over it and can't move away from it.

Even enemies, after the earliest foot-hold, become amorphous and all-inclusive. A group of people demonstrating against the statelessness of Swope's ads are in the pay of the President of the United States who is a midget controlled by the head of an automobile company who wants his advertising done by Swope and whom Swope himself has just had removed from his building. Where do you begin?

The humour in the film moves in unknown directions, taking about three steps where just one is expected. An ad opens with a bum lying asleep in a mess of garbage and then this gorgeous chick comes dancing up in a gold minidress and says: "You can't eat an air-conditioner." Yet the ads are easier to take than the rest of the movie. The credits slide onto the screen at the beginning like words of doom. The camera moves about like the camera in a documentary, always intent on what people are saying — and what are these people saying?

Not every joke succeeds. Because Downey sets up no real limits, he must depend almost wholly on instinct but when things come naturally in Putney Swope, it is like moving into another dimension.

elvin dazzles, cannonball just rolls on

His records with John Coltrane and his own trio have revealed Elvin Jones as a vital and explosive drummer, perhaps the most creative force in percussion of the last ten years. Under his leadership, the drums emerged from their role as time-keeping accompanist and moved up front to take their place with saxophone and piano, etc. as a fully musical instrument.

However, the image of Jones that we had from recordings and from various stories was one-sided. Recordings, of course, always distort the role of the drums, which are vastly under-recorded. Consequently, one always assumes that a drummer is much louder than he sounds on records. Further, it was always alleged of Jones that he was an overbearing force in any group, unrelentingly loud and dominating. One Toronto drummer I knew was always practising to increase his volume, so he could play "loud, like Elvin and all the New York cats." And there were many other drummers, supposedly under Elvin's influence, who played at an ear-shattering level most of the time.

But last weekend, Elvin let us know the truth. He has a surprisingly fine sense of dynamics; his musicianship is complete. He always plays at the level of volume and of rhythmic complexity that the music demands.

On one tune, taken at a relaxed walking tempo, Jones played a very quiet and simple pattern on the ride cymbal, punctuated every couple of bars by a violent rim-shot. Throughout the theme statement he maintained this pattern, and when Joe Farrell began improvising on soprano sax, the drummer continued to play in an effectively understated way. Only as the development of the piece called for increasing complexity did Jones begin to create the poly-rhythmic (in the correct sense of the word) undercurrents for which he has become famous.

At points, Elvin drummed with fury, threatening to completely over-shadow Farrell and bassist Wilbur Little. Yet he could easily and logically subside very quickly; and not once did he fail to respond to the needs of the music as a whole.

Besides the excellent dynamics (which so many otherwise fine drummers lack), Jones has a conception of the kind of music that a drummer-led, pianoless trio should play, and he has found the players who share his idea.

Wilbur Little is another one of those remarkably fine bassists who have sprung up (seemingly out of nowhere) in the last ten years or so. He played a couple of solos that showed a good sense of overall development, as well as a big, attractive tone and the strength which is necessary in this kind of music.

Joe Farrell is virtuoso on four instruments, though he makes his most powerful statements on tenor saxophone. He is, however, inclined to noodle about a good deal and fool around with repeated arpeggiated figures.

Of course, music made by a trio of this sort places great demands on the players, each of whom needs technical mastery, keen ears, and a powerful musical mind. In the first two departments, the trio is safe; in the third, I feel that occasionally Farrell, though a fine reedman, has difficulty in consistently developing a piece of music in toto. However, perhaps only a Sonny Rollins is really up to a task like this.

But one does not want to quibble, for the music — basic, hard-driving, swinging modern jazz — was highly satisfying. One hopes that Matt Muldoon's will survive and continue to give us the chance to hear more music of this sort. Cunningly decorated to suggest a warehouse setting, Muldoon's has a kind of enjoyable atmosphere, and acoustics that any actual nightclub might envy. (One thing the management has yet to learn: don't go around blabbing to newspaper reporters how much you're paying the musicians. It's not professional, or cool either.)

Toronto's jazz spasm continues this week, with Cannonball Adderly at the Colonial. Hailed more than a decade ago as the new Bird, Adderly made his name with the great Miles Davis sextet (John Coltrane, Bill Evans, etc.) and then went on to almost instant fame and fortune. Over the years, with his increasing immersion in funk and, more lately, pop, Adderly's style has become less Parker inspired and more earthy.

But something is lacking. Even in his tenure with Davis,

Cannonball and brother nat

Adderly sounded a bit too pretty, too decorative; he didn't have the tough inner core like Miles and Coltrane. And these days, at the height of success, the stout alto saxophonist seems to be without the gutsy passion that his music demands. He's all surface, and he gets by on this, rather than involve himself creatively with the music.

Still, he has a good band. His brother Nat, who has learned much from Miles, got things off to a good start with his cornet solo on If I Were A Bell setting a hard-swinging bopish pace. And the rhythm section was excellent, indeed the main attraction as far as I was concerned. Bassist Walter Booker is one of the best arguments I know for retaining the standard acoustic bass in jazz bands; his fine tone would be lost if he were to switch to what is sometimes known as electric plank. The way he interacted with Joe Zawinul and drummer Roy McCurdy was exciting; and you could see that the three of them enjoyed their musical co-operation.

Pianist Zawinul, a native of Vienna was a pleasant surprise. Of course he has been with the Adderlys for 9 years, but has not, I think, become as widely known as he deserves. A fine player on ordinary piano, he has also very successfully adapted to the electric piano. In a single set, he is able to provide a great variety of sounds, from unaccompanied piano solos (a medley of Ellington's Come Sunday and Sophisticated Lady) showed his excellent touch and exquisite tone) to funky electric licks to hard-driving trio excursions on either instrument.

Cannonball's band is a solid, hardworking unit, which puts on a fairly good show. Indeed, Adderly goes out of his way to provide variety. In two sets, we heard a churchy thing written by Zawinul, a gritty, humorous blues sung by brother Nat, a piano solo, the usual funk a trio feature, a duo (cleverly entitled "DUO") by Cannonball and his drummer, the inevitable Mercy, Mercy, and some straight bop-based jazz.

Unfortunately, all these little bits seemed rather a cop-out; I would rather hear a lot more group playing on real jazz lines, instead of all this "versatility." It would also be nice if the leader could curb his tendency to preach at us. Though he is verbally dexterous enough, Cannonball's sermons are rather less interesting than good jazz music.

But I guess the clever chatter and all the various bits of music are for "the people", with whom Adderly is alleged to be vastly popular. If it were not for these attractions and the fortunate series of funky hits like Sack o' Woe, Work-song, Jive Samba, and the aforementioned Mercy, the Adderly band would be just a good — but still fairly ordinary — after all — modern jazz group. Certainly the excitement and musical intensity that Miles brought to the Colonial are absent (and so are the crowds), though the price remains the same.

 FEATURING: THE JUST SOCIETY

it works, folks

the King splits

"You're going to die at the end of the show!" Queen Marguerite flatly informs King Berenger in Exit the King, currently at the Global Village. Fortunately, this production of the 1962 Eugene Ionesco allegory avoids the inevitable fate of its hero.

"One hour, forty-five minutes," the members of the King's court intone in a ritual countdown to death. And, as the man who has lived four hundred or more years collapsingly grasps the fragments of possibilities for mankind, he recognizes his (and our) fractional accomplishments and jumbling masquerade of love.

Everything could be wrong with the Village show: the naked dance hall non-set, cellar atmosphere, echo-laden acoustics, and lighting that is amateurish at best. But the show works, simply and beautifully.

Prime reasons for its success are Craig Stephens as Berenger and Elizabeth Swerdlow as his cold, stalking Queen. His blend of Everyman and Oedipus is a tentative assertion of everything and nothing, as Ionesco envisioned it, while she is hard, precise and perfect.

Les Shugar, Adrienne Horswill and Keith Tyler-Smith are all excellent in support. Director David Martin's use of onstage percussion for punctuation adds to the stunning significance of the evening.

a married couple one more time

After three months, A Married Couple needs little additional praise. Since its premiere last November, Allan King's film has met with virtually unqualified respect and admiration. But since A Married Couple is such a fine piece of film-making, perhaps yet another review may be excused.

A Married Couple is a portrait, as most film-goers in Toronto must now know, of Billy and Antoinette Edwards and their marriage. It is a film about a 'real' marriage, but it is neither a conventional cinema verite excursion in the Leacock/Pennebaker tradition nor a strictly impartial and impositive probe. It is a sympathetic, open-eyes-and-ears film minus the uncomfortable sensation of voyeurism so often prevalent in personalized documentaries.

The trust which the Edwards have obviously placed in King has been so faithfully respected that although we move directly into their home in the opening zoom-shot, we never for a moment feel that we are not welcome to be there.

Without question Billy, Antoinette, son Bagart and Merlen the dog are aware of the camera's presence, for, say, 50% of the time. But then A Married Couple never peepes as a candid-camera glimpse of reality. In fact, as King himself has stated, it was never intended to be viewed simply as a documentary. If King's film corresponds to any antecedent, it is perhaps closest to an Edward Albee comedy.

Format aside (and that is surely the least important but most criticized aspect of the film), A Married Couple asks nothing of the Edwards but to be as direct about their feelings for each other as possible. It asks nothing of us but to try to understand.

Marriage undergoes a genuine shock test in A Married Couple and by the end of the film Billy and Antoinette sit on their living-room Chesterfield, separated by several feet, silent and disturbingly alone. Nothing in this marriage has been resolved and the impression that remains with us as Zal Yovensky's music plays over the silence is that nothing ever will.

King and associate director-cameraman Richard Leitman do not supply us with a pocket guide brimming with pre-fabricated answers to the problems of this married couple. That sort of presumption is best ignored. Similarly, it is never suggested that the Edwards represent anyone but themselves. Yet, their misunderstanding and, at times, their intolerance of each other reach out across the theatre and strike us all — they must.

A Married Couple is a sobering experience, but it is also a very sympathetic film. If this marriage is affected by all too-familiar flaws, then we all must share in it to some degree, for Allan King has made of A Married Couple a brilliant, disturbing and sincerely moving film.

daganawida not in demand

Land of the silver birch,
Home of the heaven,
Where still the mighty moose Wanders at will

Daganawida is the Indian god of peace. "Daganawida", a now play by Carol Bolt is about the struggle for peace, about those who would have it and about those who would prevent it. The play involves the confrontation between the Indians and the French settlers in seventeenth century Quebec, but there are obvious modern overtones. The French governor is portrayed as a paunchy, insensitive bureaucrat. The Indians appear as a combination of idealistic peace-warshippers and angry militants (who are black by the way), who wish to fight fire with fire. Among the French we find a spirited trader named Lajeunesse who would rather run off to live with the Indians than enlist in the French militia. The play attempts to evoke the quest for peace through parables, images, chants and mystical dances.

Unfortunately, there is not very much of a demand these days — even in Canada — for plays about Canadian Indians confronting French governors. Much as I wanted to get involved in the message of the play, I found the subject matter to be ever so remote, and if I may utter such a blasphemy about a genuine piece of Canadiana — being. The whole play belongs in a display case in the national archives — costumes, chants, fire-water, tom-toms and all. The first naive dance was a quaint curiosity, the second was already disturbingly familiar and by the second act I was cringing every time they started banging on the drums. Some of the lines were meevingly evocative, and even poetic at times. (As a matter of fact I have a suspicion, unconfirmed as yet, that the play may actually be written in some kind of verse.) However there is no recognizable movement to the play, only repeated references to burnt creps and villages, with deters and tortured missionaries, and those never-ending drums.

Even before I walked into the theatre, I was trying to figure out why the Tarnta Workshop would want to have anything to do with "Daganawida". Director George Luscombe's fertile mind has again produced an extremely smooth and artistically pleasing production. A strong cast is given the opportunity to display supple dance movements and to sing mystical chants.

The script, however, gives them little chance to act. Diane Grant excels in the role of the pregnant wench Marie-Neige and Ray Whelan, as always, bring a special talent to Therion the missionary. One cannot help feeling, however, that the entire cast and crew have put much mere skill and talent into the production than the play ever deserved. Far all their efforts, "Daganawida" comes out sounding like a pretty hell-low-tem-tem.

disc column

One of our brothers in Radio Varsity has suggested that we mix up the records reviewed each week, so that there's always a rock review for him to read (he claims that's all anyone would want to read anyway). Not having strong feelings on the matter, we'll give it a try for a while, so here's the first one.

THE BEATLES. Very Together. Polydor 242,008

This is the release of a tape of the Beatles performing in Hamburg in 1961 — before they made it big. Except for John Lennon singing "I'm 'n' Siree", all the vocals are by Tony Sheridan (who does a perfect Presley imitation). The songs are rock standards from the time, for the most part, like Ruby Baby. The music is extremely tight (thus the title) and very good. The Beatles set exacting standards for themselves in copying American rock. Engineering on the tape is excellent. The album is well worth buying.

CHICA CORE 4. Now He Sings, Now He Sobs. Solid State 18039

Appearing a few weeks ago with Miles Davis, Corea did many strange and wonderful things on the electric piano, here he plays a real piano in a more "conventional" manner. But he is no less brilliant. His ideas and his virtuosity are stunning, and the support he gets from drummer Roy Haynes is equally good. Absolutely not to be missed.

ILZO & UNISE. C'mon and Jan 1's. Mercury 6124

The album says, "They wrote, produced, arranged, played and sang everything on this 'total environment' production... they are absolutely like no one else." The first statement tells who to blame, the second is a lie. I have never heard such an anonymous album. The lyrics are unbelievable "sometimes I'm up sometimes I'm down I just don't know where I'm bound." The photos show two willow lads laughing, singing & holding hands.

doug walters

MELANIE. Born to Be, Buddha 5024

Featuring a style which is very like that of Laura Nyro, this singer can't help but please. Her guitar work is excellent, her lyrics beautiful, and her voice unique, though one could find it aggravating. Monna Monna is one of the most soulful songs heard for a long time.

i. dubinsky

THE MATCH. A New Light. RCA 4106

Five clean-cut California fellows making vocal group music designed for late morning, easy listening, radioprograms, super markets and night rise lobbies. Smooth and inspired, with organ and strings. Henry Mancini liked it. THE MAGIC LANTERNS. SHAME. SHAME. Polydor 242,004. More of the same sort of drivel, only these guys are English and aren't so clean-cut. Guitars, piano and brass are added to the ubiquitous strings to get a more "with it" sound, and, to be fair, they are better than The Match.

p. h.

THE YOUNGBLOODS. Elephant Mountain. RCA 41050

Very sophisticated music. Styles are mixed freely from country, jazz, and rock, and the music is very clean and precise in execution. The fiddle on some of the songs lends a eerie note. This lesser known San Francisco group is doing impressive work these days.

having seen saarinen's two terminal at kennedy airport and the white pedestal chair, the bauhaus idea of functionalism appears antique, the little teapots with half-circle handles look rather quaint amidst the curvilinear egg cups but these objects are the most demonstrative of what the difference is aesthetically and socially between 1919 and 1970.

it is of course only partly true that the bauhaus could not feel the fear that exists to-day not only for art but sensibility in general, the little half-circle on a pathetically tiny glass teapot was as much a reaction against the classical maidens upholding lampshades as the earthworks of michael heizer are against the currently facile productions of 'vanguard' art.

there is a delightful naivete and optimism mixed with the bauhaus phenomenon that makes it foreign to us, they demanded that all the arts unite and create from a common ground, something that we could never do to-day — strangely enough because of them, through the migration of bauhausers to the usa after hitler took political control, the bauhaus idea of functionalism developed to its present degree of sophistication.

it of course became the international style and still characterizes popular conceptions of the brave new world, but increasingly there is the realization that the bauhaus ideal of 'functionalism' was accepted only superficially, simply as style, people find themselves willing to sit in barcelona chairs beneath victorian roofs, 'functionalism' was the lubricant the bauhaus proposed and since it has had such effect on our lives re-reading THEIR definition would seem a good idea

'functionalism' to men like walter gropius and mies van der rohe meant far more than the grim utilitarianism we have to-day instead of thoughts like 'adornment' that could have conceivably led to a plastic nymph on every jar of ok cleanser gropius assembled a faculty that taught sullivan's dictum: form follows function, a thing should express itself, being beautiful by itself without the aid of 'gracious adornments', le corbusier said 'the art of building lives in a telephone as much as in the parthenon'.

design became all-important, it was the application of reason to nature, taking the three basic forms, the cube, the cone, and the sphere he ended with designs for entire cities, buildings as different as a cathedral and the united nations in new york but where people accept the plastic drinking cup and the molded egg carton from the bauhaus they do not accept the philosophy behind it the simplicity and logic that created those forms is consistently ignored in preference of pretentious objects in every case where the buyer exercises control of the product when people look to-day at the nightmares like st. james town or cadillac homes muttering under their breath 'damn that walter gropius' they entirely miss the point.

'functionalism was the creative principle with which the bauhaus became independent and started on its own path, fitness to purpose a requirement of state reason in plato's 'republic', it is intended to thwart the tendency towards opulence, towards arbitrariness, this requirement was then more or less advocated in all classical periods'

—ludwig grote, bauhaus catalogue in the bauhaus view a thing would express itself, all that the developments mentioned here can express is the collective stupidity of the construction industry gropius intended functionalism to be a much higher thing than mere use 'in order to create something that functions properly — a container, a chair, a house — its essence must be explored for it should serve its purpose to PERFECTION, i.e. it should fulfil its function practically and should be durable, inexpensive, and 'beautiful', 'elsewhere he more clearly makes beauty his end result, 'only absolute harmony in the technical function to purpose, as well as in the proportion of forms can result in beauty', he demanded a 'spiritual life over and above the value of its usefulness.'

looking back on the bauhaus it seems clear that the treatment they gave to art was necessary for their time, just as a new one is now necessary for ours, but the point at which we cannot dismiss the bauhaus is in the idea of functionalism we live with that philosophy and have made it a part of our daily life every person who works in the toronto dominion centre is part of that way of life granted, the building is a past classic and the idea must literally be re-formed but adding cement decoration or any other 'gracious adornments' hardly solves the problem buying a dinky sculpture with left-over money is no solution either because we are the most basic form in this situation and that is where all the trouble lies.

Well, as most of you probably know, THE BAND wasn't at Massey Hall last Sunday, as we reported in this column. What a way to start off a new decade. But, wearing sackcloth and covered with ashes, we're back to announce that THE BAND will, truly, be at Massey Hall tomorrow night for two shows at 7:00 and 9:30.

ANDRES SEGOVIA is playing at Massey Hall tonight, but you'll need to have a ticket already, as we're told it's sold out. Soprano ELLY AMELING will present a program of Purcell, Mozart, Schumann, Debussy and Wolf — 2:00 Thursday at Eaton Auditorium

Jazz continues to live quite well in Toronto this week. CANNONBALL

ADDERLY is at the Colonial tonight and tomorrow (but beware the $2.00 per set cover charge). He'll be followed there next week by HOWLING WOLF for two weeks, and then THE-LONIOUS MONK is said to be coming. OSCAR PETERSON, the venerable note-maker, is playing in the Hook and Ladder Room of the Beverly Hills Motor Hotel, if you can make it there. BUDDY TATE continues at the Cava-Bob.

If you haven't yet been to hear DOC WATSON, he'll be at The Onion through Sunday, followed by JERRY JEFF WALKER, who opens there next Wednesday. BROWNIE MCGHEE and SONNY TERRY are still on at The Riverboat.

Free this week

Sun. 3:00 An organ choral concert of Renaissance music under the direction of Charles Walker at the St Paul's R. C. Church (83 Power St. at Queen).

3:45. Canadian Concerts Orchestra, Walter Dabiak conducting. Scarborough College.

8:30. ORFORD STRING QUARTET. Compositions by members of the Faculty of Music, Hart House (tickets from the hall porter).

Mon. 1:00. A lunch time concert by various Faculty of Music ensembles. Concert Hall, the Ed. Johnson Building.

8:15. Piano Recital by student JONATHAN HANSEN. Concert Hall, the Ed. Johnson Building.

her boobs were like two nice ripe juicy cantaloupes crowned with little brown berries

Sounds nice? There's more where that came from on CBC Radio's SOUNDINGS, Wednesday night, Jan. 21 at 6:30. The Review's own Dan Mack prepared a documentary on pornography, called In The Eye of the Beholder. He spoke with various 'experts' in the field, from authors to the chief of the morality squad. The program points up the hopeless ambiguities in the law and indicts the white middle-class establishment as the major users or pornography.

THEATRE

The Centre for the Study of Drama will present Bertolt Brecht's A Man's A Man in Hart House Theatre at 8:30 on January 21 through 24. Tickets are $1 for students, $2 otherwise.

Directed by Martin Hunter (who directed Brecht's Caucasian Chalk Circle on campus last summer), A Man's A Man has never been done in Toronto before. More remarkable is the fact that this is the first student production by the Drama Centre in Hart House for two years. Students are responsible for all aspects of the production, including music which was composed for occasion by Clifford Ford, a student at the Faculty of Music. Even if you don't like Brecht, go see A Man's A Man to encourage student recovery of Hart House Theatre.

Elsewhere: Barry Brodie directs Sygne's Riders to the Sea at 9:00 tonight and at 9:00 and midnight tomorrow night in the St. Michael's College Student Centre. Admission free. Fiddler on the Roof opens for a week at the O'Keefe on Monday. University Alumnae presents Mind of Souls: The Making of a Poet at 8:30 Sunday evenings only through 1 February in the Coacheuse Theatre. And Dionysius '69 is still going on over the weekends at Studio Lab on Queen Street.

THEATRE

The destruction of Destruction: Six Plays appears mainly aimed at the audience, as if the audience, the collectivity of all those who ever held ring-side seats is really in for it. This is madness, chaos and destruction for real, folks. You don't have to participate; you just have to watch.

One play is a soap opera gone berserk. Another reminds you of those tableaux your fifth grade class used to put on in front of the whole school, only here with murky sexual import, primal mother-father rape and that sort of thing. A third shows an orgy of befoolment in a motel room by two huge papier-mache freaks. See 'em all at the Glen Morris church, 8:30 p.m., through Sunday.

didn't answer, he told Perisa that it was his business if he wanted me there. Then he looked at the eat that Linda was holding.

The animals will have to go too, but they won't be able to go to the shelter. No animals allowed in the shelter. Do you have any other animals? Any other form of life will have to go."

"We have a goldfish," said one of the kids.

There was a fat orange goldfish sitting lifelessly in a typical looking goldfish bowl beside the couch.

GOLDFISH TOO

"You must find a place for it too," said Saltes. "Can't leave it here."

The officers waited impatiently, expecting something to happen — a sudden rush to leave the apartment.

"My wife is at work," Perisa said. "I'll phone her. We can't leave until she comes."

Saltes agreed to wait. He had done most of the talking, waving the eviction notice in his hand. Ward just stood by silently, playing the role of the traditional deputy. Hands folded behind his back, Saltes walked over to the window and looked down on the mass of suburban roofs, just past a snow-covered playground.

"Take off your coats, gentlemen," said Perisa. He was in no particular hurry to leave. "Sit down, make yourselves at home."

"Yes, thank you," Saltes replied. "You know we have no personal vendetta against you, nor do you have any axe to grind against us."

"I know. I come from a communist country and I don't expect the golden life."

NEW SPECTATOR

A few minutes later there was another knock on the door. A Telegram reporter walked in like an uninvited guest arriving late at a cocktail party. Perisa welcomed him — another spectator for the festival of injustice.

His wife had not yet arrived. Everyone waited, seated patiently, while the officers paced near the window.

Another knock on the door. CFTO television arrived in the form of a suave, finely-tailored commentator and a bearded Australian cameraman. There followed interviews, a great deal of shuffling around, and some family portraits.

When the CFTO man asked Perisa why he didn't apply for Ontario Housing Corporation accommodation after hearing he would be evicted, Perisa replied, "I don't accept charity."

Another knock on the door. This time it was an official from the province's Department of Social and Family Services, Gerald Marks.

Before he had much of a chance to talk to Perisa, Marks was being interviewed by CFTO. He was asked what provisions could be made to house the family.

REJECTED HOUSING

"We wouldn't leave them in the street. He was offered Ontario Housing but turned it down."

He said the wife and children would go to the shelter and Perisa would either go to Sutton House, a shelter for men, or to a friend's house.

Marks then got Perisa to fill out an application for Ontario Housing. The process was similar to signing a death warrant before the mourners have had time to arrange a funeral.

Another knock on the door. This time it was Mrs. Perisa. When she opened the door she was faced by a group of strangers at the other end of the room, and one black, whirring television camera. She stood there for a moment without moving. Shaking, she walked over to her husband.

"I am evicting you and your family from these premises. You must leave immediately. Saltes had pulled out his notice again.

"But I have to phone my mother." She was crying. CFTO filming every second of it.

HELP YOUR MOTHER

She left for the kitchen. "Son, why don't you go and help your mother," Saltes told one of the children. "Put on your shoes and help her pack."

She phoned her mother. But her mother was very sick, and if the family stayed there the children might get sick.

She and the children would have to go to the shelter.

The children occasionally smiled at me as they got ready. The event was somewhat of an adventure for them — moving so suddenly with all the reporters watching.

Saltes was asking the cameraman all kinds of questions about the weight of the camera. He lifted it up himself and estimated its weight at 45 pounds.

Perisa stubbornly remained on the couch, when Saltes asked him to get ready.

EXIT FILMING

"I've only got to put on my shoes and coat," he said. He finally got up and stuffed some clothing into a small bag.

Slowly they all put their coats on. The CFTO cameraman filmed their exit from the room, filmed them entering the elevator, leaving the elevator, entering the Sheriff's car, driving away.

A social worker once had advised Mrs. Perisa to separate from her husband for her own financial well-being.

"I didn't have any film left to take a picture of the officers driving the wife and kids to the shelter and the husband to some other place."

Quebec radical calls B and B 'a farce'

The Quebec government, universities, and the Report on Bilingualism and Biculturalism came under attack here yesterday from Victor Raymond, a young Quebecois.

Raymond, who is travelling across English Canada to "counter distortions about the Quebec national struggle," spoke at Sid Smith under the sponsorship of the U of T Young Socialists.

"Bilingualism is a farce — a cover for the gradual assimilation of the Quebecois," he said.

Raymond called this assimilation an historical pattern, which could be traced from Lord Durham's famous report of the 1830's (which advocated union of Quebec with Ontario) through Confederation to the present.

He quoted George Brown, a Father of Confederation, as writing in a confidential letter to his wife "At last — the end of French-Canadianism."

POOR EDUCATION

Raymond also charged that educational facilities for French-speaking students in Montreal were inadequate.

Only one out of the four universities in Montreal is French-speaking. Last year, said Raymond, this single institution (the University of Montreal) turned away 12,000 applicants.

McGill University received special criticism.

"McGill's library has the best French language collection of French history and literature, and it is not open to the French-speaking public."

A former French Studies program offered by McGill, treated Quebecois "like vulgar natives, going happily to work every day followed by their parish priests."

SCHOOL INTEGRATION

Raymond, and La ligue des jeunes socialistes are pressing for unilingualism in Quebec through the gradual integration of public schools.

"But this does not mean the English people of Quebec will lose their rights," he added. "The French Canadian is notably magnanimous."

The Quebec government's Bill 63 which guarantees minority language rights was "obviously enacted under pressure from English capitalists," he said.

Executive refuses to endorse protest

By LAURA KELLY

Several student war resisters encountered heavy resistance themselves at Wednesday's students' council executive meeting, when they attempted to garner support for a placement center demonstration against Honeywell Corp. campus recruitment next week.

The SAC executive was asked by the Committee to End the War in Vietnam to announce SAC support of the planned demonstrations, to declare the Placement Center Advisory Committee irrelevant due to its unequal student-faculty composition and to withdraw the two remaining students from the committee.

Last fall the Placement Bureau Advisory Committee, made up of five students, five faculty, two administrative personnel, and one alumnus, approved the presence of the Honeywell Corp. on campus in late January.

Of the five students, three have left the committee, and SAC has made no new appointments.

Zane Boyd and Joe Young, speaking for the anti-war committee, reminded the executive of the 1967 SAC policy against the campus recruitment by corporations involved in the manufacture of war materials. They insisted that SAC uphold the policy by recalling the student members of the Advisory Committee who acted against the policy by approving the Honeywell recruitment.

Gus Abols, SAC President, voiced the strongly negative executive reaction, saying: "We can't withdraw students from a committee for incompetence because they made their own decision."

"Also, we haven't yet appointed new people, so we can't declare the committee irrelevant."

Bob James, SAC Finance Commissioner, objected to SAC approval of the type of protest that the Committee to End the War in Vietnam was planning.

James agreed that the university was linked to business and war interests but said "Let's be worried about how to get that issue down to 25,000 students."

The majority of the executive felt that an isolated demonstration against one corporation would only alienate the mass of job-seeking students.

The executive closed the issue by voting that in light of renewed interest, the Placement Bureau Advisory Committee should reopen the discussion of the Honeywell Corp. recruitment.

Unless the university administration excludes Honeywell from campus the Committee to End the War in Vietnam plans a demonstration Jan. 21, and an action at the placement bureau Jan. 22.

From time to time the Varsity will publish chess matches, problems and other sundry goodies for all you chess buffs. Here is the first article in a short series of international matches.

Earlier this year, a match for the World Chess Championship was held in Moscow between two Russian grandmasters, former World Champion Tigran Petrosian, and the challenger, Boris Spassky. The match consisted of 23 games spread over two months. An examination of any of the games gives us some insight into the intense nature of the struggle.

The match was basically a battle of styles - Petrosian with his subtle almost defensive style contrasted sharply with Spassky's classical attacking style. This is shown especially well in Game 19, when Spassky decks Petrosian out of his jockey shorts with a brilliant attack.

Blues beat Stangs 4-1, tie Waterloo for first

LONDON, ONT. (staff) — Varsity Blues survived a disastrous first period and, aided by tremendous goalkeeping from Adrian Watson, beat University of Western Ontario Mustangs 4-1 in SIHL action here last night.

The win moved Blues into a first place tie with University of Waterloo Warriors but gave Waterloo one game in hand.

The game provided a warm-up for Blues encounter with the Guelph Gryphons tonight at Varsity Arena. Guelph is the only team to beat Blues this season in league play.

Watson stopped 16 shots in the first period alone and with-

MIKE BOLAND
one goal, one assist out his fine effort the score could easily have been 5-0. Instead, Blues came out of the period with a 1-0 lead on a goal by Terry Parsons at 7:53.

Varsity finally remembered who they were, and in the second period took over the game. Mike Boland, who missed last weekend's games with a hip injury, scored at 13:48, with assists going to Len Burman and Dave Field.

SECOND ASSIST FOR FIELD

Field collected his second assist of the night against his old teammates at the 18:20 mark, as captain Brian St. John scored to make it 3-0.

Watson's shutout was spoiled early in the third period when Stang's Brian Domelle slipped one past the sophomore goaltender. But Len Burman got that one back in short order, scoring from Boland and St. John at 3:02 to finish the scoring.

Blues looked terrible in the first period, getting only eight shots on Western goalie Dave Duncan. But they made up for it in the second and third, ending the game with a 39-33 edge in shots on goal.

The game saw the return of defenceman Bill L'Heureux, out of action since Dec. 5 with a cracked bone in his wrist. The cast was replaced recently, and now he is able to grip a stick again. From his performance last night, his return will be a definite boost to Blues rear guard.

AVENGE LOSS

Tonight, Blues will be out to avenge their Dec. 3, 3-2 loss to the Gryphons. But they will have their work cut out for them, for Guelph knows it can not afford to lose any of its remaining games if it hopes to make the Western Division playoffs. Guelph is currently holding down third place, and a loss tonight would virtually eliminate them from contention.

Game time is 8 p.m.

BLUENOTES: Latest stats from the O-QAA publicity office shows John Wright and Paul Laurent one-two in the scoring race for the Western Division of the SIHL with 19 and 17 points respectively. . . Bill Buba, Wright's linemate, is in fourth place with 14 points, one point behind Waterloo's Ken Laidlaw. . . the stats do not include the results of last night's games. . . in other Western Division play this

Len Burman's goal in Wednesday's Varsity was taken by Blues' forward Mike Boland, who missed last week's games while recovering from a bruised hip bone. . . Library Exit Control

To reduce the loss of books from the University Library, the exit control system has been redesigned late this autumn. New inspection desks have been installed at the exits to the old and new wings of the Library, and will be in operation beginning as early as possible in the winter term. They will be staffed whenever the Library is open. A system of this sort has been under consideration for some time, has been advocated by many members of the teaching staff, and was urged this spring by the Students' Administrative Council. All library staff and users (except those using only the Wallace Room which has its own control system) will be required to pass through these exit-control points. All persons will be expected to present their books, briefcases, bags and parcels for inspection as they leave the Library. There will be an "express" desk for persons leaving the building empty-handed. Your co-operation is requested to ensure smooth operation of this procedure and thereby to help in the preservation of the library collection.

Bluettes triumph!

By FRANCES FLINT

A rather odd situation arose in Wednesday night's senior girls basketball game . . . no one could score!

Both the University of Guelph and the Varsity Bluettes seemed to be held back by an invisible shield over the baskets. Although the Bluettes did eventually break the spell and win 35-14, the harassed coach, Miss Hills, hoped the situation would never arise again.

Pat Leduchowski and Ann Thompson were the first players to get aggressive and scored eight and six points respectively. After realizing there was a hole in the basket the whole team started to move and easily overcame the Gryphons.

In intermediate basketball action the Bluettes defeated a game St. Joseph's High School team 29-23.

And in volleyball, Toronto's intermediate team clobbered the senior Guelph team, taking four of the five games played with scores of 15-3, 15-5, 15-5, 14-16 and 15-0.

Blues splash, grapple Stangs

Varsity Blues swimmers face what could be their toughest competition of the season tonight as they travel to Ann Arbor for a dual meet with the University of Michigan.

The Michigan team came fourth in the NCAA championships last year and this is the first time Blues have met them. The team expects to post some of its best times of the season, spurred on by the American opposition.

On Saturday, with hardly time to dry out, the team returns to London for a meet with Western. The Mustangs are showing considerable strength this year, as witnessed by their 64-48 defeat of Wayne State last weekend. It was the first time in four years the Stangs had defeated an American college.

Joining the swimmers in Western will be Blues wrestling unit.

In other weekend action the Varsity gymnasts travel to York University for a meet with York and McMaster Saturday. The Toronto skiing team will take part in the Cross Country championships at Horseshoe Valley on Saturday and in a jumping competition at Chickopee Club, Kitchener, Sunday.

A TRUE STORY

In 1954 Mr. Diem of South Vietnam decided to take out a foreign policy with American Empire. Many of his neighbours who had moved north started to come back and make trouble for him. Instead of making them feel at home, he bolted his doors and moved inside with his brothers and his sister-in-law. "If we open the window," she told him, "not only sunlight but many bad things will fly in." He began to get sick, sending people to concentration camps, brutally killing them, supressing free speech. Of course the people didn't like this, so they became angry. The insurrection began to gather force by 1958. In 1960, the roof caved in. Our then President Kennedy, believing in helping people to help themselves, suggested to Diem that he institute real and sweeping reform. We did not interfere however, realizing that work was the best therapy. But things became worse.

In 1963, after taking out a life-insurance foreign policy, Diem and his brother Nhu were killed and American Empire took over his estate, assuring Mrs. Nhu that his affairs would be handled with loving care. Mrs. Nhu was also well taken care of by us. At present, American Empire is making sure that things are as Mr. Diem would have wished them. Remember, your interests are our interests.

Faculty demands 22 per cent salary increase

By SUSAN REISLER

The Association of Teaching Staff at the U of T is demanding a 22 per cent salary increase this year.

The ATS is also proposing a system of arbitration if the administration and the faculty are unable to agree.

The University administration opposes both proposals. Prof. Don Forster, U of T Vice-Provost and Chairman of the Budget Committee last night called the ATS proposal "completely unrealistic".

Prof. Wayne Sumner, Chairman of the ATS Salary Committee said the 22 per cent increase is "a compound of a number of things."

A seven per cent increase is necessary just to keep up with the cost of living after taxes, he said.

Merit increases and an estimate of what is required to maintain a share of increased productivity are also included in the 22 per cent figure.

ANOTHER GAP

The committee is trying to "close the gap between university teachers and those in other professions," Prof. Sumner said.

"We do think we're entitled to a raise that puts us ahead of high school teachers."

The ATS accepted the Salary Committee's proposal Dec. 2. The faculty didn't vote on the increase, just on the bargaining procedures.

Those present at the meeting voted 50 to 4 in favor of establishing a binding arbitration board if the administration and faculty couldn't agree. The board would have three members, one chosen by the ATS, one by the administration and a third person chosen by the other two members.

The ATS has sent out a mail referendum to all its members on this subject. "The returns are running 20 to 1 in favor of arbitration," Prof. Sumner said.

The Salary Committee inserted the binding provision "to rule out the possibility of strikes," he said.

HALF-WAY HOUSE

"It's sort of a half-way house between the old system where the paternal university government ruled, and hard-nosed university collective bargaining."

President Claude Bissell, said he was "not in favor of the procedure the ATS has suggested."

"It leads to implications of denying the possibility of self-government," he said.

Forster objected to the use of "an outside arbitrator". That's handing over to a third party outside the university a decision which gives him power over the whole university budget. You can't separate this issue from the rest of the budget."

Besides, he said, "There are already three academic staff on the Budget and they would be negotiating for themselves."

PROFOUND CHANGE

"ATS traditionally has not acted as a collective bargaining unit. This new procedure suggests a pretty profound change."

ATS is a voluntary association, with no collective bargaining rights under the Labour Relations Act.

Administration officials also feel the university can't possibly meet the salary demand.

"In our present budget position," said A. G. Rankin, Vice-President (non-academic) "22 per cent is utterly impossible."

He explained the faculty increase amounts to $10 million. The university will only be receiving an increase in revenue of $7 to $8 million this year.

BALANCE REQUIRED

"There has to be a balance," Rankin said. Buildings have to be maintained and the support staff must be paid.

"At present almost 70 per cent of the total university budget is salaries," he said. "Maintenance gets what's left over."

For this reason many buildings still don't have the proper heating and lighting that they require, he added.

The Salary Committee doesn't feel the increase will bring belt-tightening.

The university budget is now open to ATS scrutiny. There is "enough wastage and fat that could be pared off without impairing the operation of the university," Prof. Sumner said.

"There will not be a cut in the number of faculty," he said. "And we have pledged to hold the line on student-faculty ratio."

"There are areas where the university has more money than it thinks it has," Prof. Sumner said. "The university consistently underestimates its income. This is the area we are most interested in."

Rankin admitted that "the last two years the university budgeted for a deficit that didn't materialize because enrollment increased more than expected and some academic departments didn't spend all their budget."

Prof. Forster says that a 22 per cent increase would force cutbacks.

"The amount of budgetary cutting required for that great a salary in-

Dr. Claude Bissell, Pres. of U of T is faced with new salary demands from the faculty and he doesn't know where the money will come from.

crease would create obvious difficulties," he said.

"You can slow down the rate of hiring new professors to zero, if you need to."

But the greatest areas of flexibility are physical plant and maintenance. There's still not enough money for these areas. Just look at the buildings.

"You can also cut down on library expenditures on new books. But this would be a great set-back for the library program."

"A 22 per cent increase is unrealistic in terms of the current economic climate and the budgetary situation," Prof. Forster said.

Danny's coming to Toronto

MONTREAL (CUP) — Daniel Cohn-Bendit, a leader in the May 1968 student-worker uprising in France, arrived in Montreal Friday for an indefinite stay in Canada.

Cohn-Bendit, known as 'Danny the Red' for his political views and bright red hair, was admitted to Canada after only a 15-minute interview with immigration officials.

He has been denied access to France since the May uprising — during a 1-hour stopover on his Frankfurt-to-Montreal flight. French officials did not allow him to even step off the plane.

Cohn-Bendit was met at the airport by former McGill University lecturer and active separatist Stanley Gray.

He is scheduled to come to Toronto on Wednesday to record a program for the CTV Network's 'Face-to-face' series.

Implementing CUG - consensus or chaos?

The plan for the committee was made public at Friday's CUG Programming Committee meeting at Hart House.

By JIM COWAN

The new group is to meet at the end of May to discuss the CUG proposals. If no consensus is reached, the committee will meet again in September.

The administration group on the committee would include representatives from both academic and non-academic branches, support staff, and heads of colleges and faculties, while the outside group would cover the Board of Governors, alumni, professional associations and secondary schools.

President Claude Bissell was unavailable for comment, but he is reportedly pleased with both the size and structure of the committee.

If the 160 delegates can hammer out a workable compromise, it is believed the President will forward it directly to the provincial government, which will ultimately pass a new U of T Act to alter the governing structure.

Much of the discussion at Friday's Programming Committee meeting centred on the question of what would be considered a consensus on the University Wide Committee.

While the matter was left open, it was agreed that any significant dissent by any group, and in particular from the students or faculty, would prevent the committee from achieving its goal of speaking as the voice of the university.

A letter outlining the proposals will be sent to all members of the university tomorrow, and elections to the committee should take place on March 26 or 27.

The Programming Committee also agreed to hold a full-scale debate on the CUG Report, probably on Jan. 29. Questionnaires will be sent to faculty and students in mid-February in an attempt to discover the university community's feeling towards the top governing structure.

If the committee's program is carried out on time, a draft bill to replace the current U of T act could be ready by next November.

Those who have been working on CUG feel the provincial government would pass virtually intact any measure which had the clear support of the whole university.

A 160-member committee will be set up this Spring to discuss the report of the Commission on University Government and draft recommendations to be presented to the provincial government.

The new body, to be called the University Wide Committee, will consist of 40 students, 40 faculty, 40 administration representatives and 40 delegates drawn from outside the university.

Petition pleads for three workers

Thirteen hundred people have signed a petition demanding that the administration find campus jobs for three former New College cafeteria workers.

The petition was presented Friday to J. F. Brook, executive assistant to Vice President A. G. Rankin.

Beaver Foods had refused to rehire the three after a strike in December. The difficulty arose when the University dropped its contract with Commercial caterers in favour of Beaver Foods, without assurance of job security for the New College workers.

After a rally Friday in support of the three workers, about thirty people moved to Simcoe Hall to present the petition. They were met by locked doors and an eight-man U of T police guard at the side door.

A delegation of three was allowed to present the petition to Brooks. In exchange, he gave them a letter from Beaver Foods unit manager, Horst Stuewer to T. G. Lawson, of the U of T Safety and Security Department.

It said that, "No U of T police officer approached me at any time to inform me of any action or words involving the four persons in question... I do not wish to state, at this time, why I did not decide to re-hire the four persons in question."

The workers have claimed that U of T police pointed them out to job interviewers as strike leaders.

Worker Student Alliance member Tony Leah (UC II) said that several of the men who were rehired by Beaver have since left their positions.

He said, "they are being forced out by Beaver, who is hiring students part-time to reduce costs" and increasing the work-load.

An unrealistic demand

The U of T's Association of Teaching Staff has demanded a 22 per cent salary increase for all academic staff, but their chances of getting it are almost negligible.

There are two aspects of the faculty's proposal which the U of T administration will find untenable:

(1) The amount of the increase — it could not be covered without drastic cuts in other areas of budgetary allocations;

(2) The ATS proposal of binding arbitration to settle unsuccessful negotiations between faculty and administration.

On the first point, the amount the ATS is asking for is unjustified for a number of reasons:

- yes, the cost of living has spiralled with inflation, but it has not spiralled to the extent of 22 per cent;

- such an excessive salary increase for the academic side of the university's employees would virtually negate any possibility of improved wages for the non-academic staff, who are grossly underpaid;

- the overall increase would not include any kind of levelling-off of salaries amongst the academic hierarchy — a 22 per cent raise for lecturers is justified, but not the same raise for full professors.

On the second point; the ATS proposal for arbitration seems to be a move to transform the ATS from a loosely structured association of faculty into a union. The ATS has no collective bargaining rights under the Labour Relations Act. But each year it gets bolder in its salary demands.

That kind of transformation sounds fine. But it is devoid of any of the content that would create a real union. The faculty have arbitrarily asked for a large increase without examining their own role as labour in the university, without considering the relations they hold with other employees and with students. They produce. They produce manpower in the form of educated students, and technological change in the form of research. They passively accept a given role in the university.

The new boldness of faculty, and the tinges of unionism bear a striking resemblance to the development of student unionism.

In Canada, and particularly at the U of T, the past few years have seen the rise and fall of a student power movement in the student councils. That movement often operated through top-level negotiation and sought strictly student demands. Most student councillors never questioned their political situation in the university as it related to the university's position in society.

They never seemed to face the contradiction of an underpaid janitor cleaning up the coffee cups after a Students Administrative Council meeting where an elite had pontificated on the oppression of students.

The faculty are now employing a similar narrow and selfish view of their own situation.

Although ATS Salaries Committee Chairman Wayne Sumner admits that he supports the efforts of the non-academic staff to get higher wages, he doesn't seem to realize that the ATS's 22 per cent demand will directly block those efforts. The support staff are even more poorly organized than the academic staff. And if the faculty won their demands, the administration would have to resist non-academic wage increases even more stubbornly than it has been doing.

The issue has just flared up. It will become a major issue at the U of T campus this year, although students may not be involved — only affected. Out of the first sign of the conflict four points emerge:

- the faculty are acting mostly in their own interests;

- their demand is unreasonable in light of the tight money situation at the U of T — they should and probably will receive a raise, but not 22 per cent;

- the faculty are replacing the students as the new thorn in the side of the U of T administration — a development that is also occurring in their obstinate opposition to the basic principles of the CUG Report, a document which the administration realizes is essential to the stability of the university;

- most of the conflict arising between faculty and administration over this salary dispute points directly to the tight money situation and the whole question of university financing.

Who's going to feel the pinch

The last two points are related:

The U of T's largely conservative faculty are reacting to the creation of a modern university that is well integrated with government spending priorities and the economy of this province. Faculty are placed in an educational system that understands students in terms of income-units.

Formula financing is the method of allocating provincial taxes to higher education in Ontario. It's a system that grants money to a university proportional to its student enrolment.

The government establishes a basic income unit — an amount to be granted the university for each student enrolled. But the income units for students in different fields such as engineering, arts, medicine, etc. are given a multiplier. The multiplier for a given field depends on the cost of producing a student in the given field. But it's likely that it also depends on the economic demand for students in a given field.

A university's government grant is determined roughly by multiplying the basic income unit that's been established for the year by both the multiplier and the enrolment in each field.

Or something like that.

But anyway, formula financing allows the government to control the economic function of a university.

The U of T's financial situation is now tight because it's undergraduate enrolment is not increasing very rapidly. But its graduate enrolment is rising.

In a telephone interview last night, U of T President Claude Bissell said he would like to see formula financing change to allow an increase in the size of the basic income unit and a "heavy weighting of graduate degrees, which would benefit us here, since we have a large number of graduates."

Bissell's hope directly relates to the University of Ontario plan, whereby the St. George campus would become an Ontario graduate school and the other 13 universities and the community colleges would serve as mass undergraduate schools, each relegated to a rung in the hierarchy of academic excellence.

U of T faculty and administration will not have control of salary negotiations over the ATS demands.

The weight of province-wide, economic control of educational priorities is the determining factor.

The SAC Family

or "The children are leaving home -- what can we do?"

The Students' Administrative Council does not serve the students of this University — it serves the Established Order. The administration needs a centralized organization to deal with to legitimize its decisions, whether or not that organization truly represents the student body.

Like the administration, SAC and its executive are a myth to most students on this campus — something they identify with only in a very distant and abstract way.

In the past few years, this university has seen the rise of its second parent — SAC — competent only in perpetuating its own committees. All this year's council did was decide who should receive grants and how much. It spent the entire summer in a struggle for power by two opposing groups — neither questioning the need or the basis of that power — mother and father fighting for custody over the children.

The SAC has been capable of establishing inter-elite communications with the administration, as if relations with the student body were of secondary importance. Would the student body ever consciously agree to assume a secondary role for the sake of aimlessly expanding bureaucracies.

The SAC has adopted a truly paternal methodology of dealing with issues. It sees its legitimacy and existence in its constitution, in its illusions of control over the student body. It could not accommodate any democratic decision made by a mass-meeting over the discipline crisis, for it saw itself "legally, in loco parentis" as the only responsible (representative) body that could lay down decisions about students' lives.

We can envisage a situation where the students are manning the barricades, with the SAC close behind, screaming "but listen to us. We're still your leaders".

SAC's legalistic attitude manifested itself quite clearly in the discipline crisis when U of T Vice-President and Registrar Robin Ross (negotiating for the administration) refused to talk with the steering committee of the coalition, which had been formed. He was only willing to talk with the "legal" representative of the student family — the President of the SAC.

The SAC is part of a never ending spiral that expands with every attempt made to narrow it towards its own centre — the student body. But "Optimistic" that these structural changes will eventually destroy student apathy, SAC continues to build more committees and spend more energies in implementing relatively meaningless solutions. SAC's continual growth into massive bureaucracies is accompanied by a synonymous growth in its abstraction from the student body (along with that paternal desire to unify the disintegrating family unit).

Any attempts by SAC to evolve into an alternate structure will fail, unless the basis of the organization is questioned and understood — unless SAC breaks itself out of that spiral. The perpetual existence of the family cannot be a pre-requisite for dealing with the real needs of the student body.

In building a real student movement, organizations must develop and grow without these pre-requisites if they are to be successful in dealing with "anything."

SAC builds a structure and then attempts to find and built its base of support. It continues to build mini-structures such as course unions which suffer from the same deficiency of support. This half-assed, backward approach can continue like the spiral, ad infinitum.

It's not a question of "student apathy". The children don't need a psychiatrist to straighten them out.

"Student apathy" is an accurate gauge, not of mental illness, but rather of a negative vote by those students concerning their real control over and need of that organization.

The students are dissatisfied with existing structures. They are searching for viable alternatives to the present top-down elites. The anti-CUS vote was an anti-authoritarian vote. The students were tired of a distant, abstract organization laying down a line on them. Both SAC and CUS were trying to deal with their "alienation" from the students within the framework of their own structures and never analysing those structures in any real way.

This is not an isolated phenomenon. Just look at the number of active participants involved in organizations similar to SAC (eg. course unions, student councils, and even CUG).

Only two months ago the Glendon Student Council dissolved itself when it found that the students were not interested in its activities.

L'Université de Montreal disbanded its central organization and now deals through the independent departmental ones. In general this growth of overall dissatisfaction with student councils' inability to fulfill students' needs and with their trends towards overbureaucratization is being concretely manifested in the negation of these existing structures. Structures that don't provide real control, democracy, and self-determination. This will become a reality in our family too.

The contradiction between the student body and the SAC is real — and it becomes more blatant every year. In the past few years the relatively strong leadership within the organization has obscured these contradictions. But this year we have no strong leadership, and they have surfaced at their face value. The question at hand is not to find a sterner parent that will put the SAC back on its feet again.

It's not surprising that the council members themselves now find it difficult to treat SAC without some underlying tones of contempt for its irrelevance.

I am determined to build a real student movement based on achieving real control over one's history, that means real control in decision-making, and the elimination of massive bureaucracies — contrary to the present trends of centralizing decision-making into the hands of small groups of expertise; that means the development of real human relationships among people; that kind of real control is essential for a real socialist revolution, which is the negation of the existing conditions of imperialism in our universities and our society.

I am forced to resign as Services Commissioner on the Executive and as a council member on the SAC.

All power to the children, people, workers... Dare to struggle, dare to win!

Bissell to get samples of Honeywell's bombs

At 11:45 this morning, President Bissell will be presented with several samples of anti-personnel fragmentation bombs produced by the Honeywell Corp.

A delegation from the Committee to End the War in Vietnam (CEWV) will use the bomb specimens to emphasize their demand that the Honeywell Corp. be refused permission to recruit on campus Jan.

22, 23 and 27.

The Advisory Committee on the Placement Service, decided last September not to bar corporations involved with war materials from the campus.

Three of the five student members resigned in the fall, and have not yet been replaced.

If Dr. Bissell refuses to ban Honeywell, the CEWV will raise the issue at the committee meeting Tuesday and will also organize a demonstration Wednesday at Simcoe Hall.

"We are not accusing those who have to work for such companies, said Zane Boyd (1 VIC) of the CEWV. "Rather, we ask them to join us in making this university active against the war in Vietnam rather than complicit in it."

Gymnasts open season at York

By ART STEIN

During the past several seasons, preparations by the U of T Gymnastics Team for the OQAA Championships have been severely hampered by two factors — lack of competition prior to the Championships, and lack of practice time.

This season, the first problem has at last been remedied. On Saturday, Blues participated in the first of a series of weekly exhibition competitions. They visited York for an exhibition tri-meet with MacMaster and the host Yeomen.

Unfortunately Blues, still without Brian McVey who looked on in the capacity of judge, were able to muster only 105.5 points compared to winning York's 127.8 and Mac's 115.9.

Of Mac's points, 52.3 were accounted for by Olympic gymnast Steve Mitruk who swept every single event with a dazzling performance to easily win the individual all-round competition by a whopping 8 points. All the remaining gymnasts were bunched well back — including Toronto's John Kortright and Al Forest who placed a close fifth and sixth respectively.

John was dogged by bad luck when the strap of his hand grip snapped in the middle of a beautiful high bar routine. Sapped of his strength, he had to repeat it but still managed fourth place. Coupled with a second place finish in the parallel bars, it capped off one of his strongest recent performances.

Meanwhile newcomer Gary Wicks continued to improve as he took fourth on the pommel horse. But Toronto's biggest surprise came from Phil Michaelis who had shown up at the previous evening's practice claimed he could not compete because of a neck injury. A bit of the right medication and a girlfriend's nimble massaging fingers must have worked magic. Phil did two flawless front flips in a row en route to fourth place in free exercise, then vaulted to second position on the horse, 0.4 behind the leader.

While a healthy Brian McVey would likely have allowed Blues to challenge for first spot in this particular meet, there is little doubt that lack of practice is seriously hampering the gymnasts' performances. A bit of questioning revealed that both Mac and York have four or five two-hour practice sessions each week. Toronto has two!

Swimmers lose to Michigan, swamp Stangs

It was a big weekend for the swim team. Our swimmers have been looking for stiffer competition but the University of Michigan proved to be better than a match on Friday evening.

Michigan's fourth place finish in the U.S. last year and six world-ranked swimmers are only a small indication of the depth and power of their team. The outcome of the meet was obvious but the results encouraging.

The race of the evening turned out to be the 200 yd. backstroke. Varsity's Jim Shaw was matched against Michigan's Greg Goshorn and Bill Kennedy. After seven lengths, the race was still undecided, but a last length sprint by Jim gave him the victory.

Mike Guinness was the only other individual winner for Toronto. He managed to elude two Michigan swimmers in the 200 yd. freestyle.

Jim Shaw, Ross Ballantyne, Bob Heatley, and Theo Van Ryn combined to give Toronto a third win in the 400 Medley Relay, four one hundredths of a second faster than the Michigan team.

The final score was 84 to 29 in favor of Michigan.

Blues traveled to Western on Saturday for a second dual meet. The results were much more favorable; Toronto 72, Western 40.

Event winners for Toronto were Mike Guinness 200 and 500 Free; Jim Shaw 200 I.M. and 200 Fly; Terry Bryon 1000 Free; Don Carr 200 Back; and Theo Van Ryn in the 50 Free. Toronto won both the Medley and Free Relays.

Blues will be at home for the next two weeks. They swim against Queens Saturday Jan. 24 at 2 pm and McGill Saturday Jan. 31 at 8 p.m. They are both traditional rivals and will provide good competition. Come out and support your team.

Blues trample Gryphons, grab first

By JIM COWAN

Varsity Blues went for a skate Friday night, fattened their points totals and, incidentally, showed Guelph Gryphons what happens to teams with the bad manners to beat the champs.

Final score was 12-1, with Peter Turner getting Guelph's only goal directly from a faceoff at 10:23 of the first period.

After that, Blues had it pretty much their own way and on the rare occasions that Gryphon shooters slipped through Blues tight defense, they found rookie Grant Cole barring the way.

"I think we played a great game," coach Tom Watt said afterwards. "I don't think we can get any better than that."

Lewis looks dejectedly at puck which Dave Field (not shown) blasted past him in the second period. Blues Nick Holmes signifies the obvious.

Guelph goalie Duffy Lewis sprawls too late to prevent Nick Holmes (9) from scoring the last goal of Blues 12-1 victory Friday night. Paul Laurent (8), who fed Holmes a perfect pass, circles behind net.

Blues sharpshooters had a field day, running up their biggest total since they dumped Western 14-1 last Nov. 28. Captain Brian St. John, John Wright and Bill Buba each scored a pair of goals, with other markers coming from Terry Peterman, Paul Laurent, Len Burman, Dave Field, Bryan Tompson and Nick Holmes.

Peterman was Blues top performer, scoring the winning goal at 12:18 of the first period, on a perfectly-executed passing play from Bob Hamilton and Terry Parsons. He went on to collect four assists, and in a game dominated by offence turned in a strong defensive effort.

It was a game of picture goals as Blues passing was as sharp as it's been all season. Mike Boland got the first of two assists on Blues' third goal, when he carried the puck the entire length of the ice before laying it back on St. John's stick.

Laurent did all the work on Holmes' goal, stealing the puck at his own blueline and beating Guelph's defense. He made a perfect pass to Holmes and the rookie had at least three-quarters of the net to hit.

"I could see where the puck was going even before he passed it to me," Holmes said later.

Eleven penalties were called in the first period, including a 10 minute misconduct to Guelph's Ron Pearnpoint. But the teams (or maybe it was the referee) settled down and only nine more infractions were called in the rest of the game.

BLUENOTES: Wright had a pair of assists to go with his two goals, putting him well out in front in the Western Division scoring race... Wright and linemates Buba and Peterman came out of a three game mini-slump in great style, picking up five goals and eight assists Friday... shots on goal were 38-21, advantage Blues...

Don't forget, the Big Red of Cornell are coming next Saturday, and tickets go on sale today at the Hart House ticket office...

Dempster, Stangs, end B-ball Blues' dreams

By PETER WHITE

Varsity basketballers made their lone Western appearance Saturday night in what from the Toronto standpoint can only be considered a non-game. This game was considered crucial by Blues yet if you placed any confidence in the logic of superstitious forecasting it was lost before it was begun.

A strange feeling pervaded these proceedings. First there was the unsettling influence of a snowstorm which threatened the highway traveller. Inside was the plushness of the Alumni Hall, theatre-cum-basketball court, which until recently refused to host sporting events on the putrid reasoning that the odour of sweating bodies might linger until the next cultural event.

Then to be reckoned with was the initial appearance of Bruce Dempster against his former team-mates, a bad sign with the revenge motive you know. And then there was the grotesque nonchalance of the fans who failed to respond to the drubbing their boys were laying on the Christians.

Such was the surrealistic atmosphere Saturday night at the Western home court that it would not have been surprising to hear the calm tones of Rod Serling informing the crowd that Blues had unknowingly entered the Twilight Zone.

From the beginning Blues were out of it. Down by five points in the first three minutes they never recovered. For this fan and the smattering of Toronto supporters the dullness of the action was matched only by the embarrassing incompetence of their team.

Blues at this stage of their existence have become all too familiar with the wrong side of an insurmountable deficit and that nauseous feeling in the pit of your stomach associated with losing may have now reached the proportion of second nature. Another game like Saturday's and the team's only trophy may be a set of ten new ulcers.

TEAM TIGHT

Blues came into this game tight and just never loosened up. Western playing its steady game with unflashy competence found they could move through the various Toronto defences like a knife through butter. With their consistent middle range shooting and strong offensive rebounding the Mustangs seemed likely to push their point total past 100.

Most dangerous cutter of all was Bruce Dempster, whose fluid style and leadership must have reminded Coach John McManus of better days. In accumulating 31 points Bruce played up to his allstar status and his performance is likely to burn Toronto rubber, which lost him, all season long.

By the end of the game the Western fans had begun the number one chant routine and if Western is number one you just have to wonder what the hell Toronto is. In this season's league of balanced clubs Toronto is beginning to look like the losing exceptions to the rule. Our season record now stands at 2-5.

Saturday's performance was a dismal follow up to last week's encouraging performance at Windsor. The team now faces the prospect of putting together a season with several problems not the least of which may just be a lack of go in a go-gettumm league. As they say on television, at this time of year the second season has just begun. Blues new season starts on Wednesday night, the home opener against Waterloo to be played at York.

The score? 98-69. The spectre of Bruce Dempster lives on in the Twilight Zone.

The old Bruce Dempster

Loyola backs down, agrees to negotiate

MONTREAL (CUP-LIZ) — The administration at Loyola College last night suspended letters of non-renewal of contract to 27 faculty members.

An administration statement granted right of appeal to the dismissed faculty which "suspends the effect" of the letters — de facto firings — issued December 15.

More important to the Loyola faculty, the administration agreed to renegotiate the membership of the college's Committee on Appointments, Rank and Tenure, the body which would hear the appeals. Currently, CART is made up of Administrative Vice President Jack O'Brien and five administration appointees.

"The nature and constitution of such a reconstituted body of appeal is now the subject of discussion before the Meyer Commission (the provincial government's one-man inquiry into the current Loyola crisis)," the statement said.

The faculty had felt that the move to fire the professors amounted to a purge of anti-administration elements on the Loyola staff. Withdrawal of the letters of non-renewal of contract has been the single issue in most of the protests at the college since students and faculty returned to the campus after Christmas.

It was the only demand made by 400 protestors who sat-in in front of administration president Patrick Malone's office until ousted by riot police January 12.

27 PLUS 1 FIRINGS

The sit-in had been sparked by the firing of the 27 professors, following a fall term of almost constant upheaval after the still unexplained firing of nuclear physicist S. A. Santhanam. The administration reacted by closing down the university for a one week period and barring students from the campus.

This placed the 400 protesters in the position of trespassing on university property and the police were called in to clear the building.

When students returned to classes Monday they were met by an administration announcement that civil injunctions would be served on faculty and students who took part in sit-ins or "other disruptive activities".

The continued clamp down on dissent at the Roman Catholic campus followed the release by administration President Malone of new, restrictive closing hours, and the posting of security guards near various campus buildings.

According to Malone, "recent events" at Loyola indicated current rules governing behaviour at the college were "inadequate".

"The administration of the College has the responsibility... to make and enforce such rules and regulations as may be necessary or desirable to insure the proper functioning of the physical facilities used by the College community," Malone said.

Two groups want right to represent support staff

By TOM WALKOM

A battle is shaping up between the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the University of Toronto Staff Association for the right to represent university support staff.

Clare Booker, CUPE organizer and former SAC office worker, threw down the gauntlet Thursday by resigning her position on the UTSA Steering Committee.

Her reasons for quitting the committee have centred on the bargaining issue. Under Ontario law, the association can't possibly be a legal bargaining unit since it contains management personnel.

"I think we are wrong to consider the university a benevolent employer," she stated in an open letter. "As shown at the library, the university fought the wishes of the employees to organize for over two years."

CUPE finally won the right to represent 350 library assistants last June following two years of negotiations.

HARSH WORDS

C. H. Fanning, manager of the University Bookstores, and a member of the UTSA steering committee, had some harsh words for Miss Booker.

"I don't like Clare Booker. She's a bourgeois chick who's never known any dirt or poverty in her life.

"I come from poverty and dirt, and I think that Clare Booker and people like the Worker-Student Alliance are just do-gooders who don't know where it's at.

Miss Booker is not a member of the WSA.

The object of this controversy, the support staff, consists of approximately 5300 university employees, including librarians, secretaries and research technicians. At present, about a thousand are unionized.

CUG RECOMMENDS VOICE

The support staff first came into the public light during hearings held by the Committee on University Government. Following the lead of several of its briefs, CUG recommended that support staff be given a voice on U of T's governing council.

One of these was the controversial CUPE brief which recommended, among other things, free university education for the children of support staff.

Last week, CUPE kicked off a drive to organize the remaining non-unionized support staff.

The UTSA was conceived last December at a general meeting of the support staff which set up a steering committee. Mrs. Gwen Russell, a hygiene technician, is chairman.

According to Mrs. Russell, about 250 of the 4100 people affected attended this initial meeting. The consensus, she said, favoured an association over a union.

ASSOCIATION OR UNION

"Personally, I prefer an association to a union," said Mrs. Russell,

"but the reasons at this point I prefer not to give."

All members of the steering committee emphasized that they were "not anti-union."

Fanning explained his view a bit more fully than Mrs. Russell.

"Unions might fragment the whole thing. There are two estates already — students and faculty. What they want is four estates — students, faculty, management and labour. One thing this university doesn't need is fragmentation.

"It would be nice if everybody could get together — dig?"

CUPE looks at the support staff in class terms, and concentrates on matters such as wage inequalities and overtime.

"Wages aren't really an issue," countered Fanning. "I don't meet that many people that are upset about what they're paid. Some are probably underpaid, but they're happy enough. They dig their jobs."

MR. BENSON'S WHITE PAPER SERIOUSLY AFFECTS YOUR FUTURE

The successful student of today will be more adversely affected than any other group of Canadians. You can do something about it if you act NOW.

If the Government White Paper on tax reform becomes law, you will pay about 50% more income tax than you would in the United States. The small businessman will be struggling just to survive under a 50% tax burden. A young doctor, lawyer, dentist or accountant will face great obstacles in starting his own practice.

Are you content to sit back and let these things happen? If not, read the frightening facts in this article and make your views known to your Member of Parliament:

The Government White Paper is an ominous document. As it moves rapidly towards legislation, only public protest and outcry from concerned Canadians can stop it.

This article is presented by such a group of alarmed Canadians. They come from many walks of life. They are opposed, not from a personal point of view (many of them would pay less tax under the White Paper), but because of what it holds for Canada and all Canadians.

No Canadian can honestly quarrel with the White Paper's efforts to lower the tax burden for people at the low end of the income scale. Or with a tax at a reduced rate on realized capital gains. Or with enforcing laws to eliminate tax avoidance schemes and expense account abuses.

But the White Paper is a complete tax reform that will kill incentive to work and save, increase the brain drain to the more attractive tax climate in the United States, lead to the withdrawal of capital from Canada and slow down the development of our natural resources.

For the young Canadians who are planning careers in Canada, some White Paper proposals will raise disturbing questions:

Will you be able to resist the attractive tax climate in the United States?

Mr. Benson says, "Canada needs the full effort of those with outstanding ability." Yet his White Paper seems to offer more incentive for emigration than effort.

The table below is a comparison of personal income taxes in Canada and the United States that has been prepared by an international firm of chartered accountants.

Personal Gross Income	CANADA White Paper Tax	State of Ohio Average Homeowners Tax	Dollar Difference	% difference
$10000	1658	839	819	49.39
$12000	2327	1186	1141	49.03
$15000	3370	1660	1710	50.74
$20000	5262	2620	2642	50.20
$25000	7434	3608	3826	51.46
40000	14711	7723	6988	47.50
50000	19631	11030	8601	43.81

In releasing "White Paper Highlights" the Government gave out a deceptive U.S.-Canada tax comparison that has been analysed by this accountancy firm. The government had compared the most highly taxed state against the lowest taxed province. — had not included special U.S. home owners' deductions — had included high pension (Social Security) levies in the U.S., and many other things to give the appearance that U.S. taxes are not approximately half the Canadian. The Canadian government told the public the U.S. taxes are lower by only

Gross income
$ 8,000	(7.22)%	instead of	49.52%
12,000	6.95	instead of	49.03
15,000	10.73	instead of	50.79
25,000	14.87	instead of	51.46
50,000	6.84	instead of	43.81

For further confirmation of fact write Colin Brown, Box 272, London, Ontario.

If you move to the United States, your income tax will be lower by about 50%. Even though the United States has been financing an incredibly expensive war in Vietnam and has sent billions of dollars to the moon.

The brain drain has been a problem in Canada for many years. The White Paper promises to make it a bigger problem. Our tax system should be competitive — particularly with the United States — if we are to keep our talent at home.

Will you be able to go into business for yourself?

Canada has always prided itself on being a land of opportunity for men with ideas and enthusiasm. The small businessmen have had tremendous incentives. And they, in turn, have blossomed into many of our large companies today. They have contributed a great deal to the country's prosperity.

The White Paper will change all that. The White Paper will make it difficult for the small businessman to survive, and doubly difficult for him to expand and grow. It may well discourage bright young people with ideas from setting out on their own.

Example: Right now the small businessman is entitled to a low tax rate of 25% on the first $38,000 of taxable income. This gives him the all-important cash to put back into his business. This cash is what keeps him afloat, and later helps him to grow.

Under the White Paper, he will pay a flat 50% on all taxable income. He will have to find out additional thousands of dollars in cash for taxes. Money he sorely needs just to survive in the early years.

If you're in law or medicine, will you ever be able to set up your own practice?

The first two years are the toughest for any professional man on his own. The experts say that you should be able to carry yourself for at least one year without cash income from your practice. That's why, under the present tax system, you pay tax on a cash basis — on what money comes in. Under the White Paper, you will pay on an accrual basis — on accounts receivable and time billed.

It makes little difference to the Government in amount of money collected over a period of years. But it presents a high burden for the young doctor, lawyer, dentist, accountant or veterinarian starting out on his own.

Example: Under our present tax system a young lawyer (married, no children) has just finished his first year in practice. He has billed his clients for $40,000 and collected $30,000 cash. After paying $20,000 for office expenses, his tax would be $500 — leaving him with $9,500 as net income. Under the White Paper, he will be taxed $18,000 that year on the $40,000 he has billed even though he may have collected only $30,000 from his clients. Assume his office expenses come to approximately $20,000; then he would be in debt by $8,000 and received no salary. What can he do but join a large firm?

What Canada might be like after a few years of White Paper taxation

- There will be a slow but sure decline in the number of small businesses.
- There will be a sharp decline in risk-taking by Canadians.
- The brain drain of talented young Canadians to other countries will grow. They will go where there are greater incentives for hard work and bright ideas.
- Foreign investment in Canada will slow down because of the unfriendly tax climate.
- There will be a withdrawal of capital from Canada as people with modest wealth leave this country to retire elsewhere because of our Estate Tax and Capital Gains Tax systems.
- The cost of money will rise as capital is removed from Canada and the remaining capital is diverted from debt to equity situations.
- The new tax structure will prevent the build-up of private capital in the hands of individuals. Ultimately all economic power and capital will be transferred to an all-powerful Government. (per Geo. Orwell's 1984)

What are you going to do? Here are some ideas.

- (1) Write a letter to your Member of Parliament telling him what you like and don't like about the White Paper. Send a copy of your letter to Finance Minister Benson.
- (2) Fill in a coupon below. Put it in an envelope and mail it to Box 4430 Ottawa. If you put your name and address on the envelope, it will go directly and unopened to your MP.
- (3) Encourage your parents or friends to write to their Members of Parliament and to send in coupons.

Bissell 'receives' bomb capsule

By LAURA KELLY

Nine U of T students lost round two in the campus protest game Monday at noon when President Claude Bissell refused their demand to exclude Honeywell Corp. from the placement center.

The first round was run through last Wednesday when the Committee to End the War in Vietnam (CEWV) was refused SAC support for a demonstration against war-material supplier Honeywell when it comes to campus tomorrow.

On Monday, the small student group was cordially ushered into the presidential suite of offices and greeted by a brisk Dr. Bissell.

The students grimly presented Dr. Bissell with a Honeywell-produced compact metal capsule, army green, which normally contains 250 pellets that scatter out when the explosive detonates. About 200 capsules are included in one bomb.

Dr. Bissell tossed the capsule into the air and joked about his day in the infantry.

Zane Boyd (IVIC) said, "We feel that as President of the University of Toronto you have the power to prevent this company from coming on campus."

"If you took a stand on this war, you would raise the issue on all Canadian campuses," said Ellie Kirzner (IVUC).

President Bissell answered "I think that there are two possible alternatives. The Thoreau point of view: Don't pay taxes; or put pressure on the government. I can't do anything."

The students condemned the university's connection to the Vietnam war through corporations such as Honeywell and through war research conducted by faculty members.

Dr. Bissell answered: "I think corporations should be allowed on campus. You ban all of them or you allow all of them. You can't discriminate."

The round ended quickly as Dr. Bissell thanked the protesting group for their moral advice and left for a meeting.

This is the anti-personnel fragmentation bomb Honeywell manufactures

Honeywell stays despite CEWV effort

It was three strikes and out for the CEWV as they failed yesterday in their bid to raise the question of Honeywell campus recruiting at the meeting of the Advisory Committee on the Placement Service.

Faced with a general lack of support, the CEWV has decided against holding planned demonstrations against the Honeywell recruiters.

At the meeting, the Advisory Committee decided to postpone debate on the issue until the three vacant student positions on the body have been filled.

Until that time, it reaffirmed its former position on recruiting by "war-compact" companies.

The committee decided in September of 1968 to allow all companies free access to Placement Centre Facilities.

Zane Boyd (IVIC), spokesman for the CEWV, protested against the nature of the Advisory Committee meeting because "the issue has not been raised among the students."

He said the body was "totally irrelevant because the two students on the Advisory Committee are not bound to vote along SAC policy lines."

Boyd said he wanted to debate the issue before the Committee "to publicize the issue and expose the Committee."

The Advisory Committee felt that since it had debated similar issues before, principally during the 'Dow crisis', it would serve no purpose to debate the issue again, as most of the members had not changed their minds.

The CEWV protested that by refusing to debate the issue, the members of the Advisory Committee were complicit in the war.

To emphasize their point, one member of the CEWV shouted "Sieg Heil" as the members of the Advisory Committee raised their hands to vote the 'no-debate' motion.

Dow—new and improved

P.L. Peep: I read a newspaper story that Prof. N.D. Peep had argued that the main problem facing Canada was American imperialism.

V.I. Brewster: So?

P.L.P.: But Prof. Peep is not a Marxist.

V.I.B. Obviously. So?

P.L.P. But how can he understand imperialism if he's not a Marxist?

V.I.B. Because it really exists.

P.L.P. Oh I see. I'd never thought of it that way.

It's recruiting time again, and the Dow Chemical is back in a new disguise — Honeywell Inc.

Napalm was getting to be a bit hackneyed after the years of anti-Dow demonstrations, so Honeywell has produced a new, improved device that could give Dow some stiff competition at Placement Services across the country — the fragmentation bomb. Again healthy competition and free enterprise has produced new ideas for better living.

"The main fragmentation bomb is the cluster bomb unit (CBU), which consists of a "mother bomb" filled with 640 small baseball-size secondary bombs called 'guavas.' These guavas are released from the mother bomb half a mile above ground and dispersed over an area ten football fields in length. They may be set to explode in the air, on impact, or after laying (sic) on the ground for some time. When they do explode, each one sends about 250 steel pellets flying in all directions with great force. According to Frank Harvey (Flying Magazine/66) 'The CBUs kill or maim any living thing in the open or inside a hut along an extended path a couple of hundred feet wide.' The pellets do no harm to concrete, brick buildings or weapons but they tear into flesh, spiraling forward and ripping insides. Their erratic course makes removal extremely difficult.

— Committee to End the War in Vietnam leaflet

The Committee to End the War in Vietnam is a front group for the Young Socialists (Trotskyists). They planned to organize demonstrations in front of the U of T Placement Service, where Honeywell will be recruiting students for future employment.

The Trotskyists' slogan is "End Canadian Complicity" — a slogan that brings back memories of the Dow demonstration at the U of T Placement Service in 1967, and the annual anti-war marches organized by the CEWW.

But Canadian complicity in the Vietnam war is really a misleading slogan to describe the relevance of Honeywell's presence on campus January 22, 23, and 27.

The point is not that Canadians are morally complicit in the Vietnam war, that they should feel a great surge of guilt, refuse jobs with war-mongers, and cleanse their bodies.

The point is that Canadians have no choice in a decision to work for Honeywell — or one of the hundreds of other Honeywells in this country. Canada is "complicit" in the American war effort because we have no control of our own economy. That economy extends into the university — the placement services, the research grants, the textbooks, the professors — and determines the nature of our education and the kinds of employment we derive from it.

Honeywell's presence on campus is not a function of Canada's moral complicity, but of Canada's structural relationship to the economy of the United States. Honeywell is a Canadian subsidiary of a U.S. Corporation, and the University of Toronto serves as a branch-plant of the U.S. economy in supplying hundreds of corporations like Honeywell with research and manpower.

This issue is one of imperialism rather than complicity.

Yes, son, you'll be fine for the job.

And it's not just a distant question that lives only in ledgers and on floors of stock-exchanges and on Vietnamese battlefields.

It affects U of T students.

It affects engineers, who can't be blamed for seeking jobs with corporations like Dow and Honeywell, for they have no other choice but to work for an American corporation which serves the needs of the U.S. military economy.

Imperialism doesn't stop thirty feet away.

An unholy alliance

"We all have a common thing — we're not students or teachers." — C. H. Fanning, manager of the U of T Bookstore.

Mr. Fanning is talking about the U of T support staff — that nebulous quasi-body of left-overs from the university academic pie.

As they used to tell you in public school, when the janitor was being pensioned-off with an imitation leather wallet after 55 years of broom-handling, "We can do without teachers and without students, but not without a good stationery engineer."

But the point is that at U of T, the support staff aren't all janitors. They are secretaries, and window washers and the guy who stamps your library books, and Claude Bissell and Charlie Fanning. Bissell is the president of the university; Fanning is the manager of the Bookstore.

Fanning says the support staff have a "common thing"; but the tie is a negative one. Support staff are united only in what they're not — they're not students or teachers.

Using this same logic, Black Panthers and Ku Klux Klansmen have a common thing, since they neither are Israeli.

The support staff is not a coherent body. At the least it consists of two bodies; those who give orders and those who obey — management and labour.

A dual body of this nature cannot be represented by a single agent. As Fanning says, "It would be nice if everybody could get together about it."

But everybody can't — the situation precludes it. Management must act in one direction, labour in another.

It is in their own interests that university workers be represented by an agent exclusive to themselves — Why an not association rather than a union?

To many support staff, the former, modelled on the Association of Teaching Staff, seems the more attractive alternative. Unions mean big fat men in sweaty undershirts drinking "the big ale," an association seems much more professional.

Fine. But what good can an association do? The ATS has some muscle because professors are hard to replace. If the ATS threatens strike during exam-marking period, as they did last year, the administration is worried.

If the U of T Staff Association threatens stike, the administration merely fires them and hires Office Overhead. For an association is not protected under the Labour Relations Act, and stenographers are easy to replace.

The CUPE move to organize support staff seems better than that of a pseudo-professional UTSA.

Why 22 per cent?

*"We prepare ourselves for a professional career,
but we don't get a professional salary"*

Monday's Varsity featured both a news story and an editorial on the salary demands which are being pressed this year by the Association of the Teaching Staff. The news story reported various administration figures as clucking that these demands are "completely unrealistic" and "utterly impossible". The editorial denounced the proposed 22 per cent salary increase and questioned the procedure which the ATS has recommended for salary negotiation.

We don't really expect a good reaction from the administration on these issues; after all, they sit on the other side of the bargaining table. An unsympathetic reception by the student body is another matter entirely. At least we would like students to have all the relevant facts in front of them before they make up their minds on this issue. Since many of these facts have not yet been featured on the pages of the Varsity, this brief account will have to suffice.

First the question of why we think we should receive an increase of 22 per cent. Isn't this figure exorbitant, especially in this age of supposed price and wage restraints? It is of course more than is required merely to keep pace with the cost of living; that would require about 7 per cent. So only the excess over 7 per cent represents any kind of gain at all. What kind of gain? Part of it is to keep pace with the expansion of the entire economy (the counterpart of the productivity factor which labour unions employ), and part of it is to provide "progress through the ranks", that is, to ensure that the average faculty member rises a little year by year in the overall salary scale at the university.

This brings us to about 14 per cent. It is interesting to note that the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario, a body not known for radicalism in any form, supports the faculty proposals to this point: the CPUO has recommended an average increase of 13.4 per cent. In terms of need, then, this 13-14 per cent range is relatively uncontroversial.

TREATED UNFAIRLY

It is the difference between 14 and 22 per cent which arouses doubt in some minds. This additional 8 per cent has a quite different purpose: to adjust university salaries with respect to the salaries of other professions. Comparisons with non-teaching professions are pretty well-known by now. In 1967 the average salary of university faculty in Canada was about $12,000, as compared with $27,000 for doctors and $22,000 for lawyers and self-employed engineers and architects. Year by year these gaps widen further. This is not just a matter of economic interest for us, or an argument that, as similarly qualified personnel, we are being treated unfairly. The university must compete with these professions for its personnel. If the rewards lie outside the university then that is where the talent will go.

Comparisons with other teaching groups reveal a different kind of disparity. The ATS has compared careers in the universities, the Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology (CAAT's), and secondary schools. These studies show that for at least 12 years after an undergraduate degree the university teacher is paid less than his CAAT or secondary school counterpart.

And it can take up to 20 years for him to achieve parity in cumulative earnings. The years of preparation in graduate school are, of course, the main reason for this anomalous situation. By the time a university teacher has devoted those 4-7 years to getting his Ph.D., his friends who chose other teaching fields are making more than he is and continue to do so for a considerable time.

Financially speaking, graduate education as a preparation for teaching is a bad investment. As this becomes better known, the university will find it increasingly hard to compete with cognate teaching professions.

NOT JUST GREED

Thus we are caught in the middle. We prepare ourselves for a professional career, but we don't get a professional salary. And those who do not, or cannot, so prepare themselves come out making more than we do. We want this situation altered for our own good, but we also see it as a threat to the quality of university education.

If the university cannot compete in the market, even in the education market, then it will be unable to attract the kind of personnel it needs. There is thus more at stake in this 22 per cent than whether the greed of some particular self-interested group will be satisfied. The quality of the university is also in the balance, and students should have some interest in the direction in which that balance falls.

There is, of course, the issue of restraint. On this matter our position is simple. Other similarly situated groups (labour unions, professional organizations, teachers' federations) have shown thus far no interest in restraint. If we act alone we fall that much further behind. I needn't remind you that secondary school teachers are seeking 35 per cent.

But perhaps the question which bothers — and ought to bother — students most is: can the university afford to meet this demand? What will be the effect of meeting it be on other budgetary items, e.g. support staff salaries, library acquisitions? What will the effect be on the staff-student ratio?

The ATS is well aware that the university's income is largely determined by the size of the provincial grant. In making our case for a substantial increase, we are talking directly to this university but also indirectly to the provincial government. A rethinking of the system of formula financing may be the only long-range solution.

WE ARE REASONABLE MEN

But the Minister of University Affairs has taken the position that this university could afford substantial salary increases with the funds it is now given if it were to manage itself more efficiently. We have long suspected that this is true, but have not in the past had the information necessary to confirm these suspicions.

Now we have access to these data, and are in a position to evaluate the university's budgeting procedures. We believe that this university can go a very long way indeed toward meeting our request without sacrificing any of the priorities mentioned above.

We are reasonable men with a strong interest in maintaining the quality of this institution. Thus we will not press demands in the certain knowledge that if adopted they would cut into library acquisitions or worsen the staff-student ratio. As for support staff, the problem here has been that they are not themselves effectively organized. The sooner they do organize (preferably with an outside union) the better.

When they do so (especially if they wield a strike threat), the competition for salary money will intensify. So it should. Perhaps the day will be seen when faculty and support staff present joint salary demands. For the current year, the ATS accepts that it must bear in mind the depressed condition of (non-union) support staff wages.

WHY DIM VIEW?

The Varsity seemed to take a dim view even of the negotiation procedure which the ATS has recommended, though I am not sure why. This procedure is designed to give the ATS an effective voice in determining salary levels without resort to strike. We favour binding arbitration in the event that negotiations between the ATS and the administration break down. The decision of an arbitration board, then, would have to be accepted by the ATS, whether favourable to our case or not. This procedure rules out strike action in which students always threaten to be among the losers.

In the long run the new role the ATS will play in negotiating faculty salaries will yield another benefit. This university is at present run by a small group of administrators who make the real decisions on matters like the budget. For too long they have had matters their own way. Increased faculty scrutiny of the budget will force them to open the budget-making process more, to increase their own efficiency at collecting and computing data, and to justify the budgetary priorities in which they have hitherto had a free hand. This in turn is but a step toward the real goal: control of the budget by faculty and students.

The Varsity accuses us of taking a narrow view. Its own position that our demands adversely affect the position of students and support staff is the narrow one. This university cannot be what it should be without a radical readjustment of salaries and without greater participation by faculty and students in the activity of budgeting.

The new student-administration alliance is based on a short-range and distorted picture of the situation. Faculty and students are united in the desire for a university with high academic standards. What binds us together is vastly more important than what divides us. And this should be made clear both to the administration of this university and to the government of this province.

bissell: expressway could turn city into 'polluted wasteland'

Dear Mr. Johnson,

I would like to make a few comments about the Spadina Expressway.

The Expressway is presumably based on the assumption that it is a good thing to enable as many people as possible to proceed by private car into the centre of the city. Even granted this dubious assumption, I have seen little evidence to show that the Spadina Expressway will be successful. It can provide a link with Highway 401 and the Gardiner Expressway, (and with the non-existent cross-town expressway), and thus give a means of escaping rapidly from the city; but I do not see how it can disgorge its traffic in densely built-up areas without causing congestion. In the likely and calamitous event that the Expressway ends at Sussex or Harbord, we have discussed with City and Metro planners and engineers the plan for moving traffic eastward. They have obviously given no considered thought to this question, but everything they say implies a cheerful acquiescence in the dismemberment of the campus.

But there is another assumption that I find more acceptable, namely that it is not a good idea to move people as quickly and easily as possible by car into the heart of the city; that, indeed, society should strive to control the motor car, not to make it and private transportation the summum bonum of existence. The Lord Chief Justice of England observed recently that "the motor car is as much the instrument of lawlessness as the jemmy". It can, if uncontrolled, turn the centre of the city into a polluted wasteland, beside which T.

S. Eliot's nightmare is a gentle Victorian landscape. Robert Lowell's epitaph for Boston may well become the epitaph for all cities:

"Everywhere, giant finned cars nose forward like fish; a savage serenity slides by on grease."

Yours sincerely,

old white men should unburden themselves

Monday's editorial was basically a restatement of the false idea that professors are the enemy students face, the cause of their problems.

The idea that the professors by their wage demand are robbing students and support staff is the same line governments take to try to keep wages down while profits soar — the idea that the proper share of the pie due wage earners is rather limited, so each group should not go for too much.

The idea that the professors should not follow their own 'selfish' interest is the old white man's burden view of working for social change: one works only for 'other people'. In actual fact social change is brought about by everyone pushing for the interests of all groups, starting with their own.

The idea that students or professors should be mainly interested in a philosophy of their link to society to the exclusion of concrete issues and actions — in this case wages — is really peculiar. Left politics does not reduce to an exercise in abstract social analysis. It requires little profound analysis, given the history of the majority — people who depend on wages for a living — to know that constant salary demands are necessary to keep up with the rising cost of living (which you underestimate) and job qualifications.

The ATS has indeed been a reactionary group. But now its members show a sign of at last recognizing that they have a common opponent with the students and the support staff:

the administration, representing the source of money — the Ontario Government.

WSA holds TGH informational picket

By RONNIE NEVIN

Ronnie Nevin is a graduate student in Sociology at the U of T, and a member of the Worker-Student Alliance

This Monday and Tuesday, over twenty members of Worker-Student Alliance maintained an informational picket line outside Toronto General Hospital. The picket was formed by WSA since hospital workers have been denied the right to strike since 1965. WSA distributed over eight thousand leaflets, linking working conditions, patient care and the poverty wages within the hospital.

The leaflet, written with information supplied by TGH workers, showed the public (who uses the hospital) the attempts of the administration to set the patients against the workers in order to maintain poor wages and inadequate care.

Any action by organized and united workers is presented to the public by the administration as an attack on the safety and health of the patients. Consistently workers have proven the opposite to be true. In part the leaflet states:

"TGH workers have demonstrated through their record of hard work that they take pride in their work and that they understand clearly how their work relates to patient care — whether it be a clean room, a well-cooked meal, or the many patient services performed by orderlies and ward aides.

"Therefore, with the advent of staff cuts many workers — feeling a strong obligation to patients — worked themselves literally into the ground to provide the same level of service they had previously been providing."

The workers feel so strongly about the quality of service that the leaflet goes on to point out, "... a grievance filed by 37 women working in the surgical supply area protested a 13 per cent cut in staff and a corresponding increase in work load.

ADVERSE EFFECT

It charged a sharp downturn in the ability of workers to complete supply orders for operating floors and patient areas. It concluded: "these supply shortages cannot but affect patient care adversely."

The 13 per cent cut in staff, and resulting supply shortages, are no accident. Toronto General, Ontario's largest hospital, considered a 13 per cent budget increase necessary for 1969. The Ontario Hospital Services Commission allowed only an 8½ per cent increase.

This cut meant that $1,500,000 had to be saved somewhere; that saving came at the expense of workers and patients. The staff was cut back

14 per cent from 1150 in July, 1968 to 990 in December 1969.

Wages remain at the starvation level for workers at TGH. (from $300 a month for general female help, to $542 a month for electricians). TGH workers, organized into Service Employee's Union, Local 204, are demanding a minimum of $100 per week, against $73 per week offered by the hospital administration.

40 per cent TURNOVER

The budget cuts, staff reductions and poverty wages have resulted in a 40 per cent turnover of hospital staff, with its inevitable bad effect on patient care.

The U of T and TGH are similar in many ways. For example, the struggle of unionized workers at TGH to fight poor conditions and wages is like the struggle of the non-union workers at New College who fought for their jobs.

In doing so both groups of workers run up against the same bosses. Both TGH and U of T share the dubious services of Henry Borden, William V. Ash and Ian Davidson on their governing boards, and both the U of T Board of Governors and the TGH Board of Trustees contain representatives of every major bank, trust company and insurance group in Canada.

The connection appears in more than the names of men or companies; policies are remarkably similar:

- U of T contracts out food services, as at New College, to save operating expenses and avoid direct responsibility for working conditions; TGH is contracting out its laundry service to a minimum wage company, eliminating the jobs of thirty workers.

- U of T has stalled the unionization of library workers for two years; TGH is also anti-union — hospital policy denies workers the right to strike and employs compulsory arbitration.

WHO DO THEY SERVE

Working people pay for the universities and hospitals with their taxes, and keep them operating with their labour. However, neither institution serves their interests. Hospitals give the public — mostly working people — poor service because of staff cuts and poverty wages. Admission to university is weighted against working class youth and universities teach ideas and conduct research directly opposed to the interests of working people.

Hospitals try to divide workers and patients to maintain their power to keep wages low and care inadequate. Universities attempt to divide workers and students to maintain their position of power in service of the government and the corporations.

Worker-Student Alliance and the workers at TGH have recognized that to break the power of the bosses it is necessary to organize and unite. The WSA picket at TGH was a step towards that unity. And the workers have shown they will not sit idly by while the Ontario government plays havoc with the well-being of hospital patients and workers alike.

final plans of university - wide committee released

By MARK WILSON

The final form of the planned University-Wide Committee (UWC) to draft the new U of T Act was released Tuesday by the CUG Programming Committee in a Hart House meeting.

It will be publicized in an open letter to the university community this week.

The body will consist of 40 representatives from each of the main estates of the University, students, faculty, administration, and vested interests (the Board of Governors, Alumni, SAC and other bodies).

Final implementation of the plan depends on the Programming Committee's judgement of the reaction of the community to the proposal.

This reaction will be assessed by a questionnaire to be published in early March, and by the reaction of the various representative bodies on campus.

Prof. M. L. Friedland, Committee Chairman said "the committee is not seeking ratification from any group, but it recognizes that the failure of any group to participate would render the UWC meaningless."

The wording of the letter, however, implies the need for ratification.

Prof. J. M. Rist, President of the ATS, said that unless the ATS Council was given the right to approve any proposals "we would have no choice but to withdraw from the committee."

The actual responsibility for drafting the new Act would rest with "a Steering Committee made up of 2 members from each of the first three groups... (students, faculty, and administrators and support staff)".

The letter states that "some safeguard should be provided to ensure that a decision was not made which either the students or faculty opposed."

Thus a proposal passed by a majority of the UWC but opposed by a majority of either of these 2 groups would not go forward as "the voice of the university".

Elections to the UWC will take place after the results of the questionnaire are published "about the second week in March", and the committee will meet in late May. If unable to reach a consensus, it would meet again in the fall.

The Programming Committee is sponsoring a debate on the top governing structure of the university on Wednesday, January 28 from 1-3 in the Debates Room of Hart House.

Dean of Students, Roderick Shearer said Malone could empower college lawyers to obtain a temporary injunction from the Chief Justice of the Quebec Superior Court to oust protestors from college property.

Ignoring the injunction would result in charges of contempt of court. Contempt charges would not result in a criminal record, Shearer said, and penalties would be "minimal".

The injunction threat and the stringent closing hours are an attempt to thwart further protest action. But the suspension of the letters of non-renewal yesterday may have defused the main element in the institution's current crisis.

CONSERVATIVES OUSTED

Also on Monday, the Loyola College Faculty Association ousted its conservative executive.

Faculty members had supported student agitation for binding CAUT arbitration in the Santhanam affair as well as the demands over the recent firings.

The four-man executive was defeated by a 108 to 28 vote in a non-confidence motion forwarded after the executive disregarded requests to place the firings on a faculty association agenda.

Faculty association members said they had circulated two petitions asking the executive to discuss the 27 recent firings — believed to be a purge of Santhanam supporters among the faculty — but discovered the issue was not listed on the agenda of their Monday meetings.

The Association elected J. R. Hanrahan, chairman of the Department of Business Administration as interim president for a two week period, pending election of new officers.

Brian Mulrooney, legal counsel for the dismissed professors, will recommend that faculty agree with the revised appeal process and begin their appeal. No appeal dates will be set until the nature of the new appeal board is decided.

Loyola observers say the appeals and suspensions of the letters will satisfy most of the protestors.

Sir George trials finally begin

MONTREAL (CUP) — The trial of the first ten defendants in connection with last February's destruction of the Sir George Williams University computer got off to a slow start Monday with only eight of twelve jurors selected before the court adjourned.

The defendants have pleaded not guilty to five charges of conspiracy and mischief levelled against them in connection with the incident.

All ten defendants of the total 79 charged, who are now on trial are black citizens of Trinidad and Tobago. More than half of the 82 prospective jurors were questioned during the day; all were male, white, and over 35 years of age.

No jurors admitted to race prejudice but many said reports of the incident, read in local papers had influenced their attitude towards the accused.

Presiding Judge Kenneth C. MacKay overruled a defence challenge which argued white jurors might be affected by "latent and unconscious prejudices which regrettably exist in white people in regard to black people."

The judge said the argument "embodied an assumption not acceptable in this court".

The computer-burning incident and the subsequent arrest of the defendants occurred after Montreal riot police were called into the occupied computer centre, where students were demanding an investigation into charges of racism.

Since the incident Feb. 11, 1969, court action has been slow. The accused had to wait until April 12 for preliminary hearings for 76 of them. Eight others did not face preliminary hearings until March 5.

The defendants claim the original cause of the protest; alleged racism at SGWU, has been buried under the sensationalism aroused by the computer burning. The University has so far ignored black students' demands for continued investigation into the racism charges.

The Students Administrative Council meets this evening at Erindale College (yes, marathon time is here again) at 7: 15. Buses leave for Erindale at 6:45 from Convocation Hall.

The Library, Varsity, and the Women's Athletic Program are on the agenda.

The twenty SAC nominees for the proposed Interim Disciplinary Committee, a body which would hold judicial authority until the implementation of the Campbell Report, will be presented to the council for approval.

The SAC plan to choose the six student members by lot from the twenty nominees is expected to face severe opposition from the Association of Teaching Staff. The ATS has called for selection of the student members entirely by lot.

Will Lancers help Blues again?

By JIM COWAN

Windsor Lancers, with a helping hand from the schedule-makers, beat the unbeatable Saturday afternoon as they downed the previously undefeated Waterloo Warriors 4-3 in Windsor.

The loss pushed Blues into a two-point lead over Waterloo in the SIHL Western Division standings. Warriors have played one less game than Varsity.

It was a weary bunch of Warriors that trekked into the border city for Saturday's joust. They played Friday night in Bowling Green, Kentucky, and managed only a 2-2 draw with Bowling Green University. Then they had to make it back in time for a 1 p.m. game with Windsor.

Despite the travelling, Waterloo took a 3-1 lead and held it going into the last five minutes of the game. Then they ran out of gas, and Windsor pumped in three fast goals to knock Waterloo out of first place.

Now, why, you may well ask, would any team agree to play back-to-back games like that? Part of the reason lies in the fact that Windsor can only get ice time for its home games on Saturday afternoon. Typically, visiting teams end up playing Friday night and Saturday afternoon, while Windsor conveniently arranges to play its away games in mid-week.

Why Waterloo set up an exhibition game for Friday night in Bowling Green is another question, and one, unfortunately, which we can not answer. But this particular piece of bungling may well cost Waterloo first place permanently.

GAME IN HAND

The U of W team made up the one game deficit last night when they played at Guelph, but Blues pick it up tonight when they face Windsor in Varsity Arena. Game time is 8 p.m.

The two teams last met in Windsor Jan. 10 for (what else?) an afternoon game. Blues had played in McMaster the night before, winning 6-1, and beat Lancers 9-2.

Western Division statistics after last weekend's games (but not including last night's) showed Toronto's John Wright and Paul Laurent standing one-two in the scoring race. Wright has 23 points and Laurent 21, and that gives a good idea of how evenly Varsity scoring has been spread this season. Wright's winger, rookie Bill Buba, is tied for third at 17 points with Ken Laidlaw of Waterloo.

Blues also have the top goal-tending duo in Adrian Watson and Grant Cole, who have a combined average of 1.55 goals per game. Fans sometimes tend to forget the importance of the goalkeepers when a team is so offensively powerful, but Watson and Cole are big reasons for Blues success this year.

McGuinn looks forward to greeting old 'friends'

By LYNDON LITTLE

When the Big Red of Cornell skate out against Blues Saturday night in their first-ever appearance on this campus, Varsity Arena will doubtlessly strike them as just another hostile ice rink.

However, one sight that will make them feel instantly at home will be the familiar countenance of Blues personable Bob McGuinn, who was one of them last year.

A newcomer to Blues this year, Bob is a Toronto native who spent four seasons on a hockey scholarship at the Ithaca-based Ivy League University after graduating from Richview Collegiate in 1965.

After completing his business management course at Cornell last spring Bob decided to enroll in the U of T MBA programme and lend Blues his talents.

Come Saturday night he will be renewing acquaintances with his old buddies.

Tom Watt and his Blues became painfully introduced to McGuinn two years ago when Varsity and the Big Red met for first time at the Nichols School Hockey Tournament at Buffalo.

BEAT BLUES

"The Guinner" as he is now affectionately referred to by his Varsity teammates scored the only goal of the game as the Blues went down to a 1-0 overtime defeat. In an exhibition game last season Blues again lost 7-20.

Last year at Cornell he played part of the year on a line with Brian McCutcheon and Kevin Pettit who are currently two of the Big Red's top performers.

This season with Blues McGuinn has been used on several different line combinations before apparently settling down on the right wing with Paul Laurent at center and Nick Holmes on left.

With half-a-season now under his belt in the SIHL McGuinn compares the two collegiate hockey loops favourably.

"The league here is quite a bit the same", he says, "there are good teams and bad teams in both. But, I feel the balance here is perhaps a little better. In the Eastern League some teams (like Cornell) go after the top Canadian kids and others go along almost completely with American boys."

NOT SOFT

Because the American rules permit less bodily contact and stress wide open passing, McGuinn has come in for some ribbing from his new teammates about the "toughness" of the brand of hockey he has been playing for the last four years.

This he strenuously argues is an egregious misconception.

"It's definitely no candy-ass hockey", he protests, "and besides, the net and the puck are the same and the game is still to put the one in the other."

And how does he feel about the upcoming clash with his old teammates?

"I won't have any trouble getting myself up for the match, but it's definitely a different type of emotional preparation than for any of the games played against SIHL rivals. There will be less of the feelings of anger or meanness, because a lot of those guys are my close friends, and more of the feelings of pride and the desire to show my best against them."

B-Ball Blues face their Waterloo

By PETER WHITE

"We were scraping before but now the real scratching has begun."

In alluding to the difficulties his crew faces, coach John McManus may have only begun the surface scratching of his most imminent problem: win number one. With the Waterloo Warriors in town for tonight's home opener things on the basketball court are not coming together.

To compound the effects of that moribund happening at Western Saturday night, McManus now faces the task of making the machinery to fire smoothly less two first stringers with a third on the hobble.

Larry Trafford is no longer with the Blues and Ross McNaughton is expected to miss a couple of weeks with a groin pull. Angus Braid who had anticipated a return to the familiar country of the back court tonight twisted an ankle in last night's prep. The severity of this injury is not known.

Waterloo comes into this game a two time loser and like Toronto is desperate for victory. Blues can be expected to come out running and free wheeling so there is just now a repeat of Saturday is in the offing. However Waterloo is a classy outfit led by the fine shooting of Jean Lanniste who carries better than a twenty-five point average.

Blues' captain Brian St. John scared twice last Friday against Guelph, and Varsity photographer Dan Andrew got both goals on film. Above, St. John turns behind the net as goalie Duffy Lewis searches for the elusive disc. Mike Boland (14), who set up St. John after a rush from his own blueline, wheels behind the net. Below, Terry Peterman raises his arms in a victory salute after passing back to St. John (not shown) for Blues' fourth goal. Lewis looks back at the puck, hidden by the goalpost.

Once again this season Blues play out of the neutrality of their home court at York. Depending upon fan response to tonight's game an arrangement for bussing from downtown may be initiated for future home action.

Look to a fine trip tonight. The losers will likely find themselves on a milk train excursion to Nowhere (to be found some sixty-five miles southwest of here). Game time is 8:15 at York's Tait-McKenzie gym complex. NO

ADMISSION CHARGE!!! FREE THROWS: Garth Evans leads Blues scoring after two games with a fifteen point average. Guelph's second league victory ever last Wednesday broke Windsor's home win streak at an even fifty. Western remains league leader after Mac was upset at home Saturday by Windsor, 86-78. John McManus predicts it will take only five victories to make the play-offs. His favourite (not the sentimental one) remains Windsor.

Interfac hockey race

By COLIN PILMER

The interfaculty hockey season is two-thirds over, but all divisions still feature close races for the playoff positions.

Vic has climbed to the top of Division I on the strength of two victories since Christmas. They downed PHE 2-1 and also edged second place Sr. Engineering 3-2. Allen tallied for Vic in both games.

In other games PHE tied Trin 3-3 and Riddell's three goals led SMC to a 9-1 romp over Trin.

Meds and SMC "B" continue to be the patsies in Division II, having won only one game each. Meds have lost their last three games by shutouts, 4-0 to Scarborough, 3-0 to Dents, and 2-0 to School of Business.

SMC "B" was bombed

twice, 9-0 by Erindale and 9-1 by Scarborough.

The other four teams in Division II meanwhile continued their close battle for the three playoff spots. Dents have returned to their championship form, registering two wins recently to move into first place.

Scarborough and Business remained one point back. Business dropped two games, 3-0 to Dents and 3-1 to Erindale, but evened their record with wins over Meds (2-0) and Scarborough (3-2). Scarborough took two games, from Meds and SMC "B" before bowing to Business.

Erindale is two points out of second place but has a game in hand on Business and Scarborough and is very much in the race for a playoff berth.

Loyola backs down, agrees to negotiate

MONTREAL (CUP-LIZ) — The administration at Loyola College last night suspended letters of non-renewal of contract to 27 faculty members.

An administration statement granted right of appeal to the dismissed faculty which "suspends the effect" of the letters — de facto firings — issued December 15.

More important to the Loyola faculty, the administration agreed to renegotiate the membership of the college's Committee on Appointments, Rank and Tenure, the body which would hear the appeals. Currently, CART is made up of Administrative Vice President Jack O'Brien and five administration appointees.

"The nature and constitution of such a reconstituted body of appeal is now the subject of discussion before the Meyer Commission (the provincial government's one-man inquiry into the current Loyola crisis)," the statement said.

The faculty had felt that the move to fire the professors amounted to a purge of anti-administration elements on the Loyola staff. Withdrawal of the letters of non-renewal of contract has been the single issue in most of the protests at the college since students and faculty returned to the campus after Christmas.

It was the only demand made by 400 protestors who sat-in in front of administration president Patrick Malone's office until ousted by riot police January 12.

27 PLUS 1 FIRINGS

The sit-in had been sparked by the firing of the 27 professors, following a fall term of almost constant upheaval after the still unexplained firing of nuclear physicist S. A. Santhanam. The administration reacted by closing down the university for a one week period and barring students from the campus.

This placed the 400 protesters in the position of trespassing on university property and the police were called in to clear the building.

When students returned to classes Monday they were met by an administration announcement that civil injunctions would be served on faculty and students who took part in sit-ins or "other disruptive activities".

The continued clamp down on dissent at the Roman Catholic campus followed the release by administration President Malone of new, restrictive closing hours, and the posting of security guards near various campus buildings.

According to Malone, "recent events" at Loyola indicated current rules governing behaviour at the college were "inadequate".

"The administration of the College has the responsibility... to make and enforce such rules and regulations as may be necessary or desirable to insure the proper functioning of the physical facilities used by the College community," Malone said.

Two groups want right to represent support staff

By TOM WALKOM

A battle is shaping up between the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the University of Toronto Staff Association for the right to represent university support staff.

Clare Booker, CUPE organizer and former SAC office worker, threw down the gauntlet Thursday by resigning her position on the UTSA Steering Committee.

Her reasons for quitting the committee have centred on the bargaining issue. Under Ontario law, the association can't possibly be a legal bargaining unit since it contains management personnel.

"I think we are wrong to consider the university a benevolent employer," she stated in an open letter. "As shown at the library, the university fought the wishes of the employees to organize for over two years."

CUPE finally won the right to represent 350 library assistants last June following two years of negotiations.

HARSH WORDS

C. H. Fanning, manager of the University Bookstores, and a member of the UTSA steering committee, had some harsh words for Miss Booker.

"I don't like Clare Booker. She's a bourgeois chick who's never known any dirt or poverty in her life."

"I come from poverty and dirt, and I think that Clare Booker and people like the Worker-Student Alliance are just do-gooders who don't know where it's at."

Miss Booker is not a member of the WSA.

The object of this controversy, the support staff, consists of approximately 5300 university employees, including librarians, secretaries and research technicians. At present, about a thousand are unionized.

CUG RECOMMENDS VOICE

The support staff first came into the public light during hearings held by the Committee on University Government. Following the lead of several of its briefs, CUG recommended that support staff be given a voice on U of T's governing council.

One of these was the controversial CUPE brief which recommended, among other things, free university education for the children of support staff.

Last week, CUPE kicked off a drive to organize the remaining non-unionized support staff.

The UTSA was conceived last December at a general meeting of the support staff which set up a steering committee. Mrs. Gwen Russell, a hygiene technician, is chairman.

According to Mrs. Russell, about 250 of the 4100 people affected attended this initial meeting. The consensus, she said, favoured an association over a union.

ASSOCIATION OR UNION

"Personally, I prefer an association to a union," said Mrs. Russell,

"but the reasons at this point I prefer not to give."

All members of the steering committee emphasized that they were "not anti-union."

Fanning explained his view a bit more fully than Mrs. Russell.

"Unions might fragment the whole thing. There are two estates already — students and faculty. What they want is four estates — students, faculty, management and labour. One thing this university doesn't need is fragmentation."

"It would be nice if everybody could get together — dig?"

CUPE looks at the support staff in class terms, and concentrates on matters such as wage inequalities and overtime.

"Wages aren't really an issue," countered Fanning. "I don't meet that many people that are upset about what they're paid. Some are probably underpaid, but they're happy enough. They dig their jobs."

MR. BENSON'S WHITE PAPER SERIOUSLY AFFECTS YOUR FUTURE

The successful student of today will be more adversely affected than any other group of Canadians. You can do something about it if you act NOW.

If the Government White Paper on tax reform becomes law, you will pay a about 50% more income tax than you would in the United States. The small businessman will be struggling just to survive under a 50% tax burden. A young doctor, lawyer, dentist or accountant will face great obstacles in starting his own practice.

Are you content to sit back and let these things happen? If not, read the frightening facts in this article and make your views known to your Member of Parliament:

The Government White Paper is an ominous document. As it moves rapidly towards legislation, only public protest and outcry from concerned Canadians can stop it.

This article is presented by such a group of alarmed Canadians. They come from many walks of life. They are opposed, not from a personal point of view (many of them would pay less tax under the White Paper), but because of what it holds for Canada and all Canadians.

No Canadian can honestly quarrel with the White Paper's efforts to lower the tax burden for people at the low end of the income scale. Or with a tax at a reduced rate on realized capital gains. Or with enforcing laws to eliminate tax avoidance schemes and expense account abuses.

But the White Paper is a complete tax reform that will kill incentive to work and save, increase the brain drain to the more attractive tax climate in the United States, lead to the withdrawal of capital from Canada and slow down the development of our natural resources.

For the young Canadians who are planning careers in Canada, some White Paper proposals will raise disturbing questions:

Will you be able to resist the attractive tax climate in the United States?

Mr. Benson says, "Canada needs the full effort of those with outstanding ability." Yet his White Paper seems to offer more incentive for emigration than effort.

The table below is a comparison of personal income taxes in Canada and the United States that has been prepared by an international firm of chartered accountants.

Personal Gross Income	CANADA White Paper Tax	State of Ohio Average Homeowners Tax	Dollar Difference	% difference
$ 8000	$ 1044	$ 527	517	49.52%
$10000	1658	839	819	49.39
$12000	2327	1186	1141	49.03
$15000	3370	1660	1710	50.74
$20000	5262	2620	2642	50.20
$25000	7434	3608	3826	51.46
40000	14711	7723	6988	47.50
50000	19631	11030	8601	43.81

In releasing "White Paper Highlights" the Government gave out a deceptive U.S.-Canada tax comparison that has been analysed by this accountancy firm. The government had compared the most highly taxed state against the lowest taxed province. — had not included special U.S. home owners' deductions — had included high pension (Social Security) levies in the U.S., and many other things to give the appearance that U.S. taxes are not approximately half the Canadian. The Canadian government told the public the U.S. taxes are lower by only

Gross income
$ 8,000	(7.22)%	instead of	49.52%
12,000	6.95	instead of	49.03
15,000	10.73	instead of	50.79
25,000	14.87	instead of	51.46
50,000	6.84	instead of	43.81

For further confirmation of fact write Colin Brown, Box 272, London, Ontario.

If you move to the United States, your income tax will be lower by about 50%. Even though the United States has been financing an incredibly expensive war in Vietnam and has sent billions of dollars to the moon.

The brain drain has been a problem in Canada for many years. The White Paper promises to make it a bigger problem. Our tax system should be competitive — particularly with the United States — if we are to keep our talent at home.

Will you be able to go into business for yourself?

Canada has always prided itself on being a land of opportunity for men with ideas and enthusiasm. The small businessmen have had tremendous incentives. And they, in turn, have blossomed into many of our large companies today. They have contributed a great deal to the country's prosperity.

The White Paper will change all that. The White Paper will make it difficult for the small businessman to survive, and doubly difficult for him to expand and grow. It may well discourage bright young people with ideas from setting out on their own. Example: Right now the small businessman is entitled to a low tax rate of 23% on the first $35,000 of taxable income. This gives him the all-important cash to put back into his business. This cash is what keeps him afloat, and later helps him to grow.

Under the White Paper, he will pay a flat 50% on all taxable income. He will have to pay out additional thousands of dollars in cash for taxes. Money he sorely needs just to survive in the early years.

If you're in law or medicine, will you ever be able to set up your own practice?

The first two years are the toughest for any professional man on his own. The experts say that you should be able to carry yourself for at least one year without cash income from your practice. That's why, under the present tax system, you pay tax on a cash basis — on what money comes in. Under the White Paper, you will pay on an accrual basis — on accounts receivable and time billed.

It makes little difference to the Government in amount of money collected over a period of years. But it presents a high burden for the young doctor, lawyer, dentist, accountant or veterinarian starting out on his own.

Example: Under our present tax system a young lawyer (married, no children) has just finished his first year in practice. He has billed his clients for $40,000 and collected $30,000 cash. After paying $20,000 for office expenses, his tax would be $500 — leaving him with $9,500 as net income. Under the White Paper, he will be taxed $18,000 that year on the $40,000 he has billed even though he may have collected only $30,000 from his clients. Assume his office expenses come to approximately $20,000; then he would be in debt by $8,000 and received no salary. What can be done but join a large firm?

What Canada might be like after a few years of White Paper taxation

- There will be a slow but sure decline in the number of small businesses.
- There will be a sharp decline in risk-taking by Canadians.
- The brain drain of talented young Canadians to other countries will grow. They will go where there are greater incentives for hard work and bright ideas.
- Foreign investment in Canada will slow down because of the unfriendly tax climate.
- There will be a withdrawal of capital from Canada as people with modest wealth leave this country to retire elsewhere because of our Estate Tax and Capital Gains Tax systems.
- The cost of money will rise as capital is removed from Canada and the remaining capital is diverted from debt to equity situations.
- The new tax structure will prevent the build-up of private capital in the hands of individuals. Ultimately all economic power and capital will be transferred to an all-powerful Government. (per Geo. Orwell's 1984)

What are you going to do? Here are some ideas.

- (1) Write a letter to your Member of Parliament telling him what you like and don't like about the White Paper. Send a copy of your letter to Finance Minister Benson.
- (2) Fill in a coupon below. Put it in an envelope and mail it to Box 4430 Ottawa. If you put your name and address on the envelope, it will go directly and unopened to your MP.
- (3) Encourage your parents or friends to write to their Members of Parliament and to send in coupons.

WHEN THE WHITE PAPER BECOMES LEGISLATION,

YOUR MP WILL BE VOTING ON YOUR BEHALF.

LET HIM KNOW WHAT YOU THINK.

Bissell 'receives' bomb capsule

By LAURA KELLY

Nine U of T students lost round two in the campus protest game Monday at noon when President Claude Bissell refused their demand to exclude Honeywell Corp. from the placement center.

The first round was run through last Wednesday when the Committee to End the War in Vietnam (CEWV) was refused SAC support for a demonstration against war-material supplier Honeywell when it comes to campus tomorrow.

On Monday, the small student group was cordially ushered into the presidential suite of offices and greeted by a brisk Dr. Bissell.

The students grimly presented Dr. Bissell with a Honeywell-produced compact metal capsule, army green, which normally contains 250 pellets that scatter out when the explosive detonates. About 200 capsules are included in one bomb.

Dr. Bissell tossed the capsule into the air and joked about his day in the infantry.

Zane Boyd (I VIC) said, "We feel that as President of the University of Toronto you have the power to prevent this company from coming on campus."

"If you took a stand on this war, you would raise the issue on all Canadian campuses," said Ellie Kirzner (IVUC).

President Bissell answered "I think that there are two possible alternatives. The Thoreau point of view: Don't pay taxes; or put pressure on the government. I can't do anything."

The students condemned the university's connection to the Vietnam war through corporations such as Honeywell and through war research conducted by faculty members.

Dr. Bissell answered: "I think corporations should be allowed on campus. You ban all of them or you allow all of them. You can't discriminate."

The round ended quickly as Dr. Bissell thanked the protesting group for their moral advice and left for a meeting.

This is the anti-personnel fragmentation bomb Honeywell manufactures

Honeywell stays despite CEWV effort

It was three strikes and out for the CEWV as they failed yesterday in their bid to raise the question of Honeywell campus recruiting at the meeting of the Advisory Committee on the Placement Service.

Faced with a general lack of support, the CEWV has decided against holding planned demonstrations against the Honeywell recruiters.

At the meeting, the Advisory Committee decided to postpone debate on the issue until the three vacant student positions on the body have been filled.

Until that time, it reaffirmed its former position on recruiting by "war-convict" companies.

The committee decided in September of 1968 to allow all companies free access to Placement Centre Facilities.

Zane Boyd (I VIC), spokesman for the CEWV, protested against the nature of the Advisory Committee meeting because "the issue has not been raised among the students."

He said the body was "totally irrelevant because the two students on the Advisory Committee are not bound to vote along SAC policy lines."

Boyd said he wanted to debate the issue before the Committee "to publicize the issue and expose the Committee."

The Advisory Committee felt that since it had debated similar issues before, principally during the 'Dow crisis', it would serve no purpose to debate the issue again, as most of the members had not changed their minds.

The CEWV protested that by refusing to debate the issue, the members of the Advisory Committee were complicit in the war.

To emphasize their point, one member of the CEWV shouted "Sieg Heil" as the members of the Advisory Committee raised their hands to vote the 'no-debate' motion.

Dow—new and improved

P.L. Peep: I read a newspaper story that Prof. N.D. Peep had argued that the main problem facing Canada was American imperialism.

V.I. Brewster: So?

P.L.P.: But Prof. Peep is not a Marxist.

V.I.B. Obviously. So?

P.L.P. But how can he understand imperialism if he's not a Marxist?

V.I.B. Because it really exists.

P.L.P. Oh I see. I'd never thought of it that way.

It's recruiting time again, and the Dow Chemical is back in a new disguise — Honeywell Inc.

Napalm was getting to be a bit hackneyed after the years of anti-Dow demonstrations, so Honeywell has produced a new, improved device that could give Dow some stiff competition at Placement Services across the country — the fragmentation bomb. Again healthy competition and free enterprise has produced new ideas for better living.

"The main fragmentation bomb is the cluster bomb unit (CBU), which consists of a 'mother bomb' filled with 640 small baseball-size secondary bombs called 'guavas.' These guavas are released from the mother bomb half a mile above ground and dispersed over an area ten football fields in length. They may be set to explode in the air, on impact, or after laying (sic) on the ground for some time. When they do explode, each one sends about 250 steel pellets flying in all directions with great force. According to Frank Harvey (Flying Magazine/66) 'The CBUs kill or maim any living thing in the open or inside a hut along an extended path a couple of hundred feet wide.' The pellets do no harm to concrete, brick buildings or weapons but they tear into flesh, spiralling forward and ripping insides. Their erratic course makes removal extremely difficult.

— Committee to End the War in Vietnam leaflet

The Committee to End the War in Vietnam is a front group for the Young Socialists (Trotskyists). They planned to organize demonstrations in front of the U of T Placement Service, where Honeywell will be recruiting students for future employment.

The Trotskyists' slogan is "End Canadian Complicity" — a slogan that brings back memories of the Dow demonstration at the U of T Placement Service in 1967, and the annual anti-war marches organized by the CEWW.

But Canadian complicity in the Vietnam war is really a misleading slogan to describe the relevance of Honeywell's presence on campus January 22, 23, and 27.

The point is not that Canadians are morally complicit in the Vietnam war, that they should feel a great surge of guilt, refuse jobs with war-mongers, and cleanse their bodies.

The point is that Canadians have no choice in a decision to work for Honeywell — or one of the hundreds of other Honeywells in this country. Canada is "complicit" in the American war effort because we have no control of our own economy. That economy extends into the university — the placement services, the research grants, the textbooks, the professors — and determines the nature of our education and the kinds of employment we derive from it.

Honeywell's presence on campus is not a function of Canada's moral complicity, but of Canada's structural relationship to the economy of the United States. Honeywell is a Canadian subsidiary of a U.S. Corporation, and the University of Toronto serves as a branch-plant of the U.S. economy in supplying hundreds of corporations like Honeywell with research and manpower.

This issue is one of imperialism rather than complicity.

Yes, son, you'll be fine for the job.

And it's not just a distant question that lives only in ledgers and on floors of stock-exchanges and on Vietnamese battlefields.

It affects U of T students.

It affects engineers, who can't be blamed for seeking jobs with corporations like Dow and Honeywell, for they have no other choice but to work for an American corporation which serves the needs of the U.S. military economy.

Imperialism doesn't stop thirty feet away.

An unholy alliance

"We all have a common thing — we're not students or teachers." — C. H. Fanning, manager of the U of T Bookstore.

Mr. Fanning is talking about the U of T support staff — that nebulous quasi-body of left-overs from the university academic pile.

As they used to tell you in public school, when the janitor was being pensioned-off with an imitation leather wallet after 55 years of broom-handling, "We can do without teachers and without students, but not without a good stationery engineer."

But the point is that at U of T, the support staff aren't all janitors. They are secretaries, and window washers and the guy who stamps your library books, and Claude Bissell and Charlie Fanning. Bissell is the president of the university; Fanning is the manager of the Bookstore.

Fanning says the support staff have a "common thing", but the tie is a negative one. Support staff are united only in what they're not — they're not students or teachers.

Using this same logic, Black Panthers and Ku Klux Klansmen have a common thing, since they neither are Israeli.

The support staff is not a coherent body. At the least it consists of two bodies: those who give orders and those who obey — management and labour.

A dual body of this nature cannot be represented by a single agent. As Fanning says, "It would be nice if everybody could get together about it."

But everybody can't — the situation precludes it. Management must act in one direction, labour in another.

It is in their own interests that university workers be represented by an agent exclusive to themselves — Why an not association rather than a union?

To many support staff, the former, modelled on the Association of Teaching Staff, seems the more attractive alternative. Unions mean big fat men in sweaty undershirts drinking "the big ale;" an association seems much more professional.

Fine. But what good can an association do? The ATS has some muscle because professors are hard to replace. If the ATS threatens strike during exam-marking period, as they did last year, the administration is worried.

If the U of T Staff Association threatens strike, the administration merely fires them and hires Office Overload. For an association is not protected under the Labour Relations Act, and stenographers are easy to replace.

The CUPE move to organize support staff seems better than that of a pseudo-professional UTSA.

but we don't get a professional salary"*

Monday's Varsity featured both a news story and an editorial on the salary demands which are being pressed this year by the Association of the Teaching Staff. The news story reported various administration figures as clucking that these demands are "completely unrealistic" and "utterly impossible". The editorial denounced the proposed 22 per cent salary increase and questioned the procedure which the ATS has recommended for salary negotiation.

We don't really expect a good reaction from the administration on these issues; after all, they sit on the other side of the bargaining table. An unsympathetic reception by the student body is another matter entirely. At least we would like students to have all the relevant facts in front of them before they make up their minds on this issue. Since many of these facts have not yet been featured on the pages of the Varsity, this brief account will have to suffice.

First the question of why we think we should receive an increase of 22 per cent. Isn't this figure exorbitant, especially in this age of supposed price and wage restraints? It is of course more than is required merely to keep pace with the cost of living: that would require about 7 per cent. So only the excess over 7 per cent represents any kind of gain at all. What kind of gain? Part of it is to keep pace with the expansion of the entire economy (the counterpart of the productivity factor which labour unions employ), and part of it is to provide "progress through the ranks", that is, to ensure that the average faculty member rises a little year by year in the overall salary scale at the university.

This brings us to about 14 per cent. It is interesting to note that the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario, a body not known for radicalism in any form, supports the faculty proposals to this point: the CPUO has recommended an average increase of 13.4 per cent. In terms of need, then, this 13-14 per cent range is relatively uncontroversial.

TREATED UNFAIRLY

It is the difference between 14 and 22 per cent which arouses doubt in some minds. This additional 8 per cent has a quite different purpose: to adjust university salaries with respect to the salaries of other professions. Comparisons with non-teaching professions are pretty well-known by now. In 1967 the average salary of university faculty in Canada was about $12,000, as compared with $27,000 for doctors and $22,000 for lawyers and self-employed engineers and architects. Year by year these gaps widen further. This is not just a matter of economic interest for us, or an argument that, as similarly qualified personnel, we are being treated unfairly. The university must compete with these professions for its personnel. If the rewards lie outside the university then that is where the talent will go.

Comparisons with other teaching groups reveal a different kind of disparity. The ATS has compared careers in the universities, the Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology (CAAT's), and secondary schools. These studies show that for at least 12 years after an undergraduate degree the university teacher is paid less than his CAAT or secondary school counterpart.

And it can take up to 20 years for him to achieve parity in cumulative earnings. The years of preparation in graduate school are, of course, the main reason for this anomalous situation. By the time a university teacher has devoted those 4-7 years to getting his Ph.D., his friends who chose other teaching fields are making more than he is and continue to do so for a considerable time.

Financially speaking, graduate education as a preparation for teaching is a bad investment. As this becomes better known, the university will find it increasingly hard to compete with cognate teaching professions.

NOT JUST GREED

Thus we are caught in the middle. We prepare ourselves for a professional career, but we don't get a professional salary. And those who do not, or cannot, so prepare themselves come out making more than we do. We want this situation altered for our own good, but we also see it as a threat to the quality of university education.

If the university cannot compete in the market, even in the education market, then it will be unable to attract the kind of personnel it needs. There is thus more at stake in this 22 per cent than whether the greed of some particular self-interested group will be satisfied. The quality of the university is also in the balance, and students should have some interest in the direction in which that balance falls.

There is, of course, the issue of restraint. On this matter our position is simple. Other similarly situated groups (labour unions, professional organizations, teachers' federations) have shown thus far no interest in restraint. If we act alone we fall that much further behind. I needn't remind you that secondary school teachers are seeking 35 per cent.

But perhaps the question which bothers — and ought to bother — students most is: can the university afford to meet this demand? What will the effect of meeting it be on other budgetary items, e.g. support staff salaries, library acquisitions? What will the effect be on the staff-student ratio?

The ATS is well aware that the university's income is largely determined by the size of the provincial grant. In making our case for a substantial increase, we are talking directly to this university but also indirectly to the provincial government. A rethinking of the system of formula financing may be the only long-range solution.

WE ARE REASONABLE MEN

But the Minister of University Affairs has taken the position that this university could afford substantial salary increases with the funds it is now given if it were to manage itself more efficiently. We have long suspected that this is true, but have not in the past had the information necessary to confirm these suspicions.

Now we have access to these data, and are in a position to evaluate the university's budgeting procedures. We believe that this university can go a very long way indeed toward meeting our request without sacrificing any of the priorities mentioned above.

We are reasonable men with a strong interest in maintaining the quality of this institution. Thus we will not press demands in the certain knowledge that if adopted they would cut into library acquisitions or worsen the staff-student ratio. As for support staff, the problem here has been that they are not themselves effectively organized. The sooner they do organize (preferably with an outside union) the better.

When they do so (especially if they wield a strike threat), the competition for salary money will intensify. So it should. Perhaps the day will be seen when faculty and support staff present joint salary demands. For the current year, the ATS accepts that it must bear in mind the depressed condition of (non-union) support staff wages.

WHY DIM VIEW?

The Varsity seemed to take a dim view even of the negotiation procedure which the ATS has recommended, though I am not sure why. This procedure is designed to give the ATS

an effective voice in determining salary levels without resort to strike. We favour binding arbitration in the event that negotiations between the ATS and the administration break down. The decision of an arbitration board, then, would have to be accepted by the ATS, whether favourable to our case or not. This procedure rules out strike action in which students always threaten to be among the losers.

In the long run the new role the ATS will play in negotiating faculty salaries will yield another benefit. This university is at present run by a small group of administrators who make the real decisions on matters like the budget. For too long they have had matters their own way. Increased faculty scrutiny of the budget will force them to open the budget-making process more, to increase their own efficiency at collecting and computing data, and to justify the budgetary priorities in which they have hitherto had a free hand. This in turn is but a step toward the real goal: control of the budget by faculty and students.

The Varsity accuses us of taking a narrow view. Its own position that our demands adversely affect the position of students and support staff is the narrow one. This university cannot be what it should be without a radical readjustment of salaries and without greater participation by faculty and students in the activity of budgeting.

The new student-administration alliance is based on a short-range and distorted picture of the situation. Faculty and students are united in the desire for a university with high academic standards. What binds us together is vastly more important than what divides us. And this should be made clear both to the administration of this university and to the government of this province.

bissell: expressway could turn city into 'polluted wasteland'

Dear Mr. Johnson,
I would like to make a few comments about the Spadina Expressway.

The Expressway is presumably based on the assumption that it is a good thing to enable as many people as possible to proceed by private car into the centre of the city. Even granted this dubious assumption, I have seen little evidence to show that the Spadina Expressway will be successful. It can provide a link with Highway 401 and the Gardiner Expressway, (and with the non-existent cross-town expressway), and thus give a means of escaping rapidly from the city; but I do not see how it can disgorge its traffic in densely built-up areas without causing congestion. In the likely and calamitous event that the Expressway ends at Sussex or Harbord, we have discussed with City and Metro planners and engineers the plan for moving traffic eastward. They have obviously given no considered thought to this question, but everything they say implies a cheerful acquiescence in the dismemberment of the campus.

But there is another assumption that I find more acceptable, namely that it is not a good idea to move people as quickly and easily as possible by car into the heart of the city; that, indeed, society should strive to control the motor car, not to make it and private transportation the summum bonum of existence. The Lord Chief Justice of England observed recently that "the motor car is as much the instrument of lawlessness as the jemmy". It can, if uncontrolled, turn the centre of the city into a polluted wasteland, beside which T.

S. Eliot's nightmare is a gentle Victorian landscape. Robert Lowell's epitaph for Boston may well become the epitaph for all cities:

"Everywhere, giant finned cars nose forward like fish; a savage serenity slides by on grease."

Yours sincerely,

old white men should unburden themselves

Monday's editorial was basically a restatement of the false idea that professors are the enemy students face, the cause of their problems.

The idea that the professors by their wage demand are robbing students and support staff is the same line governments take to try to keep wages down while profits soar — the idea that the proper share of the pie due wage earners is rather limited, so each group should not go for too much.

The idea that the professors should not follow their own 'selfish' interest is the old white man's burden view of working for social change: one works only for 'other people'. In actual fact social change is brought about by everyone pushing for the interests of all groups, starting with their own.

The idea that students or professors should be mainly interested in a philosophy of their link to society to the exclusion of concrete issues and actions — in this case wages — is really peculiar. Left politics does not reduce to an exercise in abstract social analysis. It requires little profound analysis, given the history of the majority — people who depend on wages for a living — to know that constant salary demands are necessary to keep up with the rising cost of living (which you underestimate) and job qualifications.

The ATS has indeed been a reactionary group. But now its members show a sign of at last recognizing that they have a common opponent with the students and the support staff:

the administration, representing the source of money — the Ontario Government.

WSA holds TGH informational picket

By RONNIE NEVIN

Ronnie Nevin is a graduate student in Sociology at the U of T, and a member of the Worker-Student Alliance

This Monday and Tuesday, over twenty members of Worker-Student Alliance maintained an informational picket line outside Toronto General Hospital. The picket was formed by WSA since hospital workers have been denied the right to strike since 1965. WSA distributed over eight thousand leaflets, linking working conditions, patient care and the poverty wages within the hospital.

The leaflet, written with information supplied by TGH workers, showed the public (who uses the hospital) the attempts of the administration to set the patients against the workers in order to maintain poor wages and inadequate care.

Any action by organized and united workers is presented to the public by the administration as an attack on the safety and health of the patients. Consistently workers have proven the opposite to be true. In part the leaflet states:

"TGH workers have demonstrated through their record of hard work that they take pride in their work and that they understand clearly how their work relates to patient care — whether it be a clean room, a well-cooked meal, or the many patient services performed by orderlies and ward aides.

"Therefore, with the advent of staff cuts many workers — feeling a strong obligation to patients — worked themselves literally into the ground to provide the same level of service they had previously been providing."

The workers feel so strongly about the quality of service that the leaflet goes on to point out, "... a grievance filed by 37 women working in the surgical supply area protested a 13 per cent cut in staff and a corresponding increase in work load.

ADVERSE EFFECT

It charged a sharp downturn in the ability of workers to complete supply orders for operating floors and patient areas. It concluded: "these supply shortages cannot but affect patient care adversely."

The 13 per cent cut in staff, and resulting supply shortages, are no accident. Toronto General, Ontario's largest hospital, considered a 13 per cent budget increase necessary for 1969. The Ontario Hospital Services Commission allowed only an 8½ per cent increase.

This cut meant that $1,500,000 had to be saved somewhere; that saving came at the expense of workers and patients. The staff was cut back

14 per cent from 1150 in July, 1968 to 990 in December 1969.

Wages remain at the starvation level for workers at TGH. (from $300 a month for general female help, to $542 a month for electricians). TGH workers, organized into Service Employee's Union, Local 204, are demanding a minimum of $100 per week, against $73 per week offered by the hospital administration.

40 per cent TURNOVER

The budget cuts, staff reductions and poverty wages have resulted in a 40 per cent turnover of hospital staff, with its inevitable bad effect on patient care.

The U of T and TGH are similar in many ways. For example, the struggle of unionized workers at TGH to fight poor conditions and wages is like the struggle of the non-union workers at New College who fought for their jobs.

In doing so both groups of workers run up against the same bosses. Both TGH and U of T share the dubious services of Henry Borden, William V. Ash and Ian Davidson on their governing boards, and both the U of T Board of Governors and the TGH Board of Trustees contain representatives of every major bank, trust company and insurance group in Canada.

The connection appears in more than the names of men or companies; policies are remarkably similar:

- U of T contracts out food services, as at New College, to save operating expenses and avoid direct responsibility for working conditions; TGH is contracting out its laundry service to a minimum wage company, eliminating the jobs of thirty workers.
- U of T has stalled the unionization of library workers for two years; TGH is also anti-union — hospital policy denies workers the right to strike and employs compulsory arbitration.

WHO DO THEY SERVE

Working people pay for the universities and hospitals with their taxes, and keep them operating with their labour. However, neither institution serves their interests. Hospitals give the public — mostly working people — poor service because of staff cuts and poverty wages. Admission to university is weighted against working class youth and universities teach ideas and conduct research directly opposed to the interests of working people.

Hospitals try to divide workers and patients to maintain their power to keep wages low and care inadequate. Universities attempt to divide workers and students to maintain their position of power in service of the government and the corporations.

Worker-Student Alliance and the workers at TGH have recognized that to break the power of the bosses it is necessary to organize and unite. The WSA picket at TGH was a step towards that unity. And the workers have shown they will not sit idly by while the Ontario government plays havoc with the well-being of hospital patients and workers alike:

final plans of university - wide committee released

By MARK WILSON

The final form of the planned University-Wide Committee (UWC) to draft the new U of T Act was released Tuesday by the CUG Programming Committee in a Hart House meeting.

It will be publicized in an open letter to the university community this week.

The body will consist of 40 representatives from each of the main estates of the University, students, faculty, administration, and vested interests (the Board of Governors, Alumni, SAC and other bodies).

Final implementation of the plan depends on the Programming Committee's judgement of the reaction of the community to the proposal.

This reaction will be assessed by a questionnaire to be published in early March, and by the reaction of the various representative bodies on campus.

Prof. M. L. Friedland, Committee Chairman said "the committee is not seeking ratification from any group, but it recognizes that the failure of any group to participate would render the UWC meaningless."

The wording of the letter, however, implies the need for ratification.

Prof. J. M. Rist, President of the ATS, said that unless the ATS Council was given the right to approve any proposals "we would have no choice but to withdraw from the committee."

The actual responsibility for drafting the new Act would rest with "a Steering Committee made up of 2 members from each of the first three groups... (students, faculty, and administrators and support staff)".

The letter states that "some safeguard should be provided to ensure that a decision was not made which either the students or faculty opposed."

Thus a proposal passed by a majority of the UWC but opposed by a majority of either of these 2 groups would not go forward as "the voice of the university".

Elections to the UWC will take place after the results of the questionnaire are published "about the second week in March", and the committee will meet in late May. If unable to reach a consensus, it would meet again in the fall.

The Programming Committee is sponsoring a debate on the top governing structure of the university on Wednesday, January 28 from 1-3 in the Debates Room of Hart House.

Dean of Students, Roderick Shearer said Malone could empower college lawyers to obtain a temporary injunction from the Chief Justice of the Quebec Superior Court to oust protestors from college property.

Ignoring the injunction would result in charges of contempt of court. Contempt charges would not result in a criminal record, Shearer said, and penalties would be "minimal".

The injunction threat and the stringent closing hours are an attempt to thwart further protest action. But the suspension of the letters of non-renewal yesterday may have defused the main element in the institution's current crisis.

CONSERVATIVES OUSTED

Also on Monday, the Loyola College Faculty Association ousted its conservative executive.

Faculty members had supported student agitation for binding CAUT arbitration in the Santhanam affair as well as the demands over the recent firings.

The four-man executive was defeated by a 108 to 28 vote in a non-confidence motion forwarded after the executive disregarded requests to place the firings on a faculty association agenda.

Faculty association members said they had circulated two petitions asking the executive to discuss the 27 recent firings — believed to be a purge of Santhanam supporters among the faculty — but discovered the issue was not listed on the agenda of their Monday meetings.

The Association elected J. R. Hanrahan, chairman of the Department of Business Administration as interim president for a two week period, pending election of new officers.

Brian Mulrooney, legal counsel for the dismissed professors, will recommend that faculty agree with the revised appeal process and begin their appeal. No appeal dates will be set until the nature of the new appeal board is decided.

Loyola observers say the appeals and suspensions of the letters will satisfy most of the protestors.

Sir George trials finally begin

MONTREAL (CUP) — The trial of the first ten defendants in connection with last February's destruction of the Sir George Williams University computer got off to a slow start Monday with only eight of twelve jurors selected before the court adjourned.

The defendants have pleaded not guilty to five charges of conspiracy and mischief levelled against them in connection with the incident.

All ten defendants of the total 79 charged, who are now on trial are black citizens of Trinidad and Tobago. More than half of the 82 prospective jurors were questioned during the day: all were male, white, and over 35 years of age.

No jurors admitted to race prejudice but many said reports of the incident, read in local papers had influenced their attitude towards the accused.

Presiding Judge Kenneth C. MacKay overruled a defence challenge which argued white jurors might be affected by "latent and unconscious prejudices which regrettably exist in white people in regard to black people."

The judge said the argument "embodied an assumption not acceptable in this court".

The computer-burning incident and the subsequent arrest of the defendants occurred after Montreal riot police were called into the occupied computer centre, where students were demanding an investigation into charges of racism.

Since the incident Feb. 11, 1969, court action has been slow. The accused had to wait until April 12 for preliminary hearings for 76 of them. Eight others did not face preliminary hearings until March 5.

The defendants claim the original cause of the protest; alleged racism at SGWU, has been buried under the sensationalism aroused by the computer burning. The University has so far ignored black students' demands for continued investigation into the racism charges.

McGuinn looks forward to greeting old 'friends'

By LYNDON LITTLE

When the Big Red of Cornell skate out against Blues Saturday night in their first-ever appearance on this campus, Varsity Arena will doubtlessly strike them as just another hostile ice rink.

However, one sight that will make them feel instantly at home will be the familiar countenance of Blues personable Bob McGuinn, who was one of them last year.

A newcomer to Blues this year, Bob is a Toronto native who spent four seasons on a hockey scholarship at the Ithaca-based Ivy League University after graduating from Richview Collegiate in 1965.

After completing his business management course at Cornell last spring Bob decided to enroll in the U of T MBA programme and lend Blues his talents.

Come Saturday night he will be renewing acquaintances with his old buddies.

Tom Watt and his Blues became painfully introduced to McGuinn two years ago when Varsity and the Big Red met for first time at the Nichols School Hockey Tournament at Buffalo.

BEAT BLUES

"The Guinner" as he is now affectionately referred to by his Varsity teammates scored the only goal of the game as the Blues went down to a 1-0 overtime defeat. In an exhibition game last season Blues again lost 7-20.

Last year at Cornell he played part of the year on a line with Brian McCutcheon and Kevin Pettit who are currently two of the Big Red's top performers.

This season with Blues McGuinn has been used on several different line combinations before apparently settling down on the right wing with Paul Laurent at center and Nick Holmes on left.

With half-a-season now under his belt in the SIHL McGuinn compares the two collegiate hockey loops favourably.

"The league here is quite a bit the same", he says, "there are good teams and bad teams in both. But, I feel the balance here is perhaps a little better. In the Eastern League some teams (like Cornell) go after the top Canadian kids and others go along almost completely with American boys."

NOT SOFT

Because the American rules permit less bodily contact and stress wide open passing, McGuinn has come in for some ribbing from his new teammates about the "toughness" of the brand of hockey he has been playing for the last four years.

This he strenuously argues is an egregious misconception.

"It's definitely no candy-ass hockey", he protests, "and besides, the net and the puck are the same and the game is still to put the one in the other."

And how does he feel about the upcoming clash with his old teammates?

"I won't have any trouble getting myself up for the match, but it's definitely a different type of emotional preparation than for any of the games played against SIHL rivals. There will be less of the feelings of anger or meanness, because a lot of those guys are my close friends, and more of the feelings of pride and the desire to show my best against them."

B-Ball Blues face their Waterloo

By PETER WHITE

"We were scraping before but now the real scratching has begun."

In alluding to the difficulties his crew faces, coach John McManus may have only begun the surface scratching of his most imminent problem: win number one. With the Waterloo Warriors in town for tonight's home opener things on the basketball court are not coming together.

To compound the effects of that moribund happening at Western Saturday night, McManus now faces the task of making the machinery to fire smoothly less two first stringers with a third on the hobble. Larry Trafford is no longer with the Blues and Ross McNaughton is expected to miss a couple of weeks with a groin pull. Angus Braid who had anticipated a return to the familiar country of the back court tonight twisted an ankle in last night's prep. The severity of this injury is not known.

Waterloo comes into this game a two time loser and like Toronto is desperate for victory. Blues can be expected to come out running and free wheeling so there is just no way a repeat of Saturday is in the offing. However Waterloo is a classy outfit led by the fine shooting of Jean Lanniste who carries better than a twenty-five point average.

Blues' captain Brian St. John scored twice last Friday against Guelph, and Varsity photographer Don Andrew got both goals on film. Above, St. John turns behind the net as goalie Duffy Lewis searches for the elusive disc. Mike Boland (14), who set up St. John after a rush from his own blueline, wheels behind the net. Below, Terry Peterman raises his arms in a victory salute after passing back to St. John (not shown) for Blues' fourth goal. Lewis looks back at the puck, hidden by the goalpost.

Once again this season Blues play out of the neutrality of their home court at York. Depending upon fan response to tonight's game an arrangement for bussing from downtown may be initiated for future home action.

Look to a fine trip tonight. The losers will likely find themselves on a milk train excursion to Nowhere (to be found some sixty-five miles southwest of here). Game time is 8:15 at York's Tait-McKenzie gym complex. NO

ADMISSION CHARGE!!! FREE THROWS: Garth Evans leads Blues scoring after two games with a fifteen point average. Guelph's second league victory ever last Wednesday broke Windsor's home win streak at an even fifty. Western remains league leader after Mac was upset at home Saturday by Windsor, 86-78. John McManus predicts it will take only five victories to make the play-offs. His favourite (not the sentimental one) remains Windsor.

Interfac hockey race

By COLIN PILMER

The interfaculty hockey season is two-thirds over, but all divisions still feature close races for the playoff positions.

Vic has climbed to the top of Division I on the strength of two victories since Christmas. They downed PHE 2-1 and also edged second place Sr. Engineering 3-2. Allen tallied for Vic in both games.

In other games PHE tied Trin 3-3 and Riddell's three goals led SMC to a 9-1 romp over Trin.

Meds and SMC "B" continue to be the patsties in Division II, having won only one game each. Meds have lost their last three games by shutouts, 4-0 to Scarborough, 3-0 to Dents, and 2-0 to School of Business.

SMC "B" was bombed

twice, 9-0 by Erindale and 9-1 by Scarborough.

The other four teams in Division II meanwhile continued their close battle for the three playoff spots. Dents have returned to their championship form, registering two wins recently to move into first place.

Scarborough and Business remained one point back. Business dropped two games, 3-0 to Dents and 3-1 to Erindale, but evened their record with wins over Meds (2-0) and Scarborough (3-2). Scarborough took two games, from Meds and SMC "B" before bowing to Business.

Erindale is two points out of second place but has a game in hand on Business and Scarborough and is very much in the race for a playoff berth.

There's nothing negative about running away to save my life

By LAURA KELLY

"But you can't just turn your back on all your responsibilities and run away from them," Major Danby insisted. "It's such a negative move. It's escapist."

Yossarian laughed with buoyant scorn and shook his head. "I'm not running away from my responsibilities. I'm running to them. There's nothing negative about running away to save my life. You know who the escapist is, don't you, Danby? Not me and Orr."

Catch-22

Draft dodgers and deserters are coming to Canada from the United States in larger numbers every month. Life outside their native land is becoming an increasingly popular alternative to submission to the psychological steamroller of the American military or prison system.

The choice is not easy, but as each new or potential recruit becomes aware of the absurdity of the Vietnam war and military life, the attractions of Canada grow.

A family, a woman, the common concept of honor, or the long-nurtured American nationalism can prevent a boy from refusing to serve in Vietnam. The majority of American males, especially the poor, the blacks, or the lesser-educated, answer and serve Uncle Sam.

The minority that become fugitives can no longer believe that any purpose would be served by the sacrifice of their lives and ideas to what they feel to be an indefensible cause.

A young ex-marine from the Bronx said at the Union of American Exiles office on St. George: "In the Marines they love people without brains. I realized that they were taking my mind. I couldn't let that happen."

MILITARY SERVICE DEGRADING

Nearly every deserter one meets can give accounts of the degradation of military service. Beatings, stints in the stockade, constant pressure to maintain "conduct and efficiency marks," and the demoralization of being called "slime" by the commanding officer, contribute to the frustration and doubt of one headed for the Vietnamese jungle.

Most soldiers don't know how possible it is to desert. They are told that the Canadian government will not barbor anyone avoiding their military duty. Deserters told of one boy who spent five weeks hiding in Toronto parks before realizing the RCMP wouldn't arrest him.

"It's only now getting around that Canada is safe," they said.

After dodgers or deserters make their individual decision and cross the Canadian border, there still remain weeks or perhaps months of emotional tension. Guilt, regret, or loneliness is difficult to evade when one steps out of a secure life pattern.

Unlike the military deserters, who had usually entered the armed services after high school, draft dodgers are usually middle-class college students, who sometimes only stayed in school to maintain a student deferment.

The dodgers' condemnation of the Vietnam war stems from political and philosophical idealism, rather than from distasteful experiences in the military.

AID FOR EXILES

To accommodate the different needs and interests of dodgers and deserters, Toronto has both the Union of American Exiles (UAE) and the American Deserters Committee (ADC). Both help with housing, obtaining landed immigrancy, and introducing the newcomer to other deserters and dodgers in Toronto.

The UAE, the dodger group, also encourages political activity in Canada. Ernie Fusco, an ex-chairman of the Union said: "People who come up here to be made aware of the political action they've taken. We don't want to take potential radicals and turn them into nice, career people. We want to promote a radical change in society."

Fusco emphasized that the political role of the dodger or deserter must not be as Americans, but as individuals within Canadian groups. "Canadians already know how to be led. All they have to do is figure out how to lead themselves."

Politically, a dodger tends to be more active and informed than a deserter. Many dodgers were either active in the American civil rights and peace movements, or affiliated with various socialist groups in the United States.

The majority of deserters resist any political pressures and more often express a desire only to settle down and start a normal life again. The ADC claims no political affiliation and devotes its resources to helping incoming deserters get established in housing and jobs.

Danny answers in style

If anything was made clear Wednesday in the taping of CFTO's "Face to Face" it is that Daniel Cohn-Bendit will not lead the revolution in Quebec.

Cohn-Bendit, called Danny the Red by his friends, was a leading figure in the May demonstrations 2 years ago in France. He was deported to Germany for his part and is forbidden to ever re-enter France.

Cohn-Bendit said he believed that something will happen in Quebec because of the "exploitation" of the people there.

But any action to remedy the situation will have nothing to do with Danny.

"Nothing that happens in the world is the work of one person, it is the action of the masses. Revolution occurs when those people ruling the system can no longer give the oppressed mass any reason for their actions," he explained.

The function of the individual in the revolution is to "mobilize support and world opinion."

"Violence," he said, "is produced by the system. If the bourgeoisie uses violence to suppress us, we will defend ourselves and if need be, respond with violence."

Danny had little to say about Pierre Elliott Trudeau. "I can't go to ski in France, so I can't meet him," he told co-host Patrick Watson.

The rather drawn-out performance was lightened by the appearance of the Edmund Burke Society.

Bearing signs reading "France didn't want him, we don't want him either", and "Red agitator go home", they attempted to disrupt the discussion for the benefit of prime time television.

Oldest teenager - self-styled genius?

The psychedelic world is not dying; it is merely less publicized by the media. Woodstock and the growing movement to legalize marijuana are proof.

That was the word from Tom Wolfe, author of The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test and other books about the pop world. Wolfe was being interviewed for the CTV show Face to Face.

The "mad" journalist believes in exhaustive research into his subjects, but he said that the writer should not get "totally involved," or effectiveness is lost.

Non-fiction on a wide scale is the new frontier in writing, according to Wolfe. A self-admitted genius, he claimed to be the "most imitated writer of the sixties."

"The media shapes not only the viewer," he said, "but the viewed as well after he sees his projected image. Cinema will never replace the written word, for it cannot project "inner dialogue".

For Wolfe, the most important social phenomenon of the Sixties was the widespread realization that with increasing affluence, people can play roles all their lives.

Wolfe, called the world's oldest teenager, intends to assume the role of an old man when he reaches forty — he hates middle age.

He also said that one cannot be free unless social norms are totally ignored. "An eccentric," he explained, "is someone who carries old marbles in multi-layered shopping bags."

apologia

The Varsity apologizes to both Classics Professor V. Sumner and Philosophy Professor Wayne Sumner. For Wednesday's page-five article on the faculty's recent demand for a salary increase. We ran a picture of Sumner the classicist instead of Sumner the philosopher.

Why go to jail?

The ease with which dodgers and deserters adapt to Canadian life varies with each person. For many, the Canadian personality is in sharp contrast with that of the American. The aloof, vaguely British, Torontonian has often frozen out the more aggressive American. But for some, adaptation means nothing more than losing a Southern drawl.

A draft dodger from Pennsylvania, now a printer and trade union organizer in Toronto commented: "I found work within a few days. No one bothers me and I have a circle of friends. My employer knows I'm an exile and he figures its my own business."

The lack of harrassment from Canadian police is a pleasant surprise for most of the American exiles. Accustomed to being under suspicion for anything from their appearance to being out at night, they appreciate the respect accorded to the individual citizen in Toronto.

In most instances the U.S. armed forces apply pressure on the deserter directly or through their families to return to the service. In several instances the FBI working with the RCMP has been able to keep track of deserters in Canada. The investigations or pressure, however, rarely affect an exile's assimilation into Canadian life, since neighbors or employers don't seem to resent their background. The greatest barriers to quick adjustment is the slow process of getting papers and a job, and the dearth of funds. The first months of the dodger's life in Canada can mean the gradual squaring of the eyes, a product of continual television viewing.

NEW FREEDOM

The future of deserters and dodgers seems no more nebulous than that of any youth. The new found freedom is exhilarating and they frequently express a desire to travel, continue their education, or get into some kind of social work.

The more politically active exiles indicated that they would welcome a chance to return to the U.S. and attempt to change the government and life style of Americans. But they reject the possibility of remaining in the U.S. to serve a jail term for evasion of the draft.

Tom Needham, a draft dodger now living in Toronto explained: "Why go to jail. You're beaten when you come out. It's romanticizing the way things are. Joan Baez saying 'Come on, boys, you should go to jail' really gets me."

By dodging the draft or deserting the armed forces, the exile has taken irrefutable steps to assert that his life is not a series of choices made by the government. Each exile has accepted full responsibility for his life by taking it into his own hands.

One deserter from New York concluded: "There's nothing I can do except not be part of the war."

Assistant Manager /
Underwriter

EVER CONSIDER VIETNAM?

Sure it's the hot spot in the world today, but it's also an opportunity for you to begin an intriguing career with one of the largest International Insurance Groups—American International Underwriters Corporation. After suitable orientation in New York and Hong Kong, you'll be assigned to Saigon as our Assistant Manager using your proven talent as an insurance underwriter to help manage the commercial property, casualty, marine and reinsurance for our domestic and foreign clients. The executive we're looking for is a recent college graduate with 4-5 years' commercial underwriting experience and is familiar with the marine insurance field. A good working knowledge of French with a desire to master the language is essential.

To match the responsibility that goes with this position, we offer a rewarding salary plus various overseas allotments and group benefits. There's more we could say, but we'd rather save it for the interview you should be making by calling (collect) Mr. Eugene T. Famula, Assistant Personnel Director, (212) 344-9200, Ext. 748, or by sending him your resume in confidence.

LETTERS

Are you impotent? Try mass-mobilization!

Your Wednesday editorial attacking the Committee to End the War in Vietnam campaign against permitting Honeywell to use campus facilities can only be interpreted by those opposed to the war as a statement of opposition to the anti-war movement, or at least against it in this country. It can only be interpreted as support of the administration and its continued complicity.

Crying into the wilderness that Canadians are mere pawns of imperialism impotent to voice opposition accomplishes nothing. The logic of your position should either lead us to look for some saviour from outside or in the final analysis it would lead us to shoot ourselves because we can do nothing about this situation.

The CEWV does not agree with this fatalistic approach. We are confident that masses of people can affect the course of history. The Vietnamese have recognized the contribution which the international anti-war movement, of which we are a part, is playing in helping their struggle.

You present yourselves as anti-imperialists. Our campaign is designed to fight a specific manifestation of imperialism, the complicity of the university with a war manufacturer. You do not pose any alternative. You just cry about your impotence.

The imperialists and their accomplices can well afford your kind of radicalism because it only leads to acquiescence to the system.

It is precisely by confronting Bissell and the Advisory Committee to the Placement Service that we are showing the students that complicity with imperialism occurs right here on this campus. Our campaign has just begun against campus complicity. Your campaign against imperialism has never started because it consists only of mournful words about how we are getting screwed and can do nothing about it.

Zane Boyd, Committee to End the War in Vietnam.

division within the ranks

It seems that the support staff situation at the university is about to be plunged into a morass of conflicting opinions and arguments. This is a shame, since it would be nice if we could all work together, to quote Mr. Fanning. However, as your editorial writer says, management and labour move in different directions.

Unfortunately, the situation will probably not even be as clear as that. To judge from the general meeting of support staff, many non-management people are going to balk at the idea of joining a union. Nor will matters be helped by some of the rash comments of the organizers for CUPE. And groups like the WSA, despite the justice of many of their actions, have only succeeded in alienating some of the people they want to organize, as was obvious at the support staff meeting. It is a pity that some of the radical student groups on campus can't exercise more cool. To chant Marxist slogans, or their equivalents, at the support staff is only to totally misread the whole situation. And revolutionaries who misinterpret situations end up being failures, as any reading of revolutionary literature will show.

On the other hand, it is naive of Mr. Fanning to say that wages are not an issue. Obviously they are, and they should be. There may be other advantages to working for the university (the usual argument to justify civil service salaries), but certainly many sections of the support staff are grossly underpaid. Any organization, be it union or association, that is established to better wages and working conditions should be welcomed.

There is one other problem that is about to become evident in the support staff situation and this concerns the CUG. Those members who desire to become unionized will not have a voice in the governing of the university (the association/union problem). What is happening, alas, is a further division within the ranks. Such a dichotomy is beginning to make a mockery of the general phrase "support staff".

ABOLS:

"I have no intention of becoming the leader of the 'real socialist revolution' "

By GUS ABOLS

Gusto (Gus) Abols is the President of the Students Administrative Council and an observer of campus politics.

In his article in Monday's Varsity, former SAC Services Commissioner Chris Szalwinski emotionally criticized SAC and its role on campus. The cartoon accompanying the article implied that I oppose the real interests of the student body. Both charges are irresponsible and require an answer.

Mr. Szalwinski complains that SAC "serves the Established Order" not the "Interests of the Students." He makes no effort to point out what he means by "Serving the Established Order" or what the real student interests are and what difference, if any, there is between the two. His charge is substantiated — if this is substantiation — by complaining about the SAC policy of participating through student appointments on committees that deal with matters that affect students on this campus. He adds that SAC is "irrelevant" and "perpetuates" committees.

His complaint is absurd. Responsible participation in such committees serves the interests of the students. I always assume that people elected by the students themselves tend to represent the interests of the electorate. Whatever the faults of the electoral system, no one has yet conceived a viable, acceptable alternative that has fewer shortcomings and is still representative to the same degree of the electorate.

STRUGGLE

He complains that SAC spent the entire summer in "a struggle for power" An especially active participant in this struggle as a representative of the pseudo-revolutionary left, not once did he express misgivings or concern about the struggle when his side appeared to be winning.

Only now, when the ideology of his group has been rejected by the student body generally, does he complain about the time wasted in the "struggle." He is apparently still not concerned that the voters of this campus helped to create the situation that brought about this "power struggle" by electing a split ticket last March; he is not concerned that from the very first secret meeting of the left on the Council (and other secret meetings in which he played a significant role) efforts were made to curtail any legitimate opposition from members of the Council who did not share "Leftist" political views.

INTER-ELITE COMMUNICATIONS

He complains that SAC has disregarded relations with the student body in order to establish "inter-elite communications" with the administration. What "inter-elite communications" means is unclear to me. If his complaint is that SAC talks to the administration and that I try to work with them to solve problems of mutual concern, I can't understand what could be wrong with this.

How can student representatives express their concern and their views of student interests unless they talk with the administration, or anyone else dealing with the problems affecting students? This is not a disregard of relations with students, but an exercise of our responsibilities to the students that elected us.

He complains that SAC cannot accommodate "any democratic decisions made by mass meetings over the discipline issue." If I remember correctly the discipline issue was decided by a mass meeting. That he did not like the result (being a member of the New Left Caucus at the time) is another thing. If the left were really honest, they would tell the students what they admit in private — that most mass meetings are a tactical device used to usurp power from the elected student bodies, bodies over which the student has at least some degree of control.

Personally, I support most meetings that inform students and truly enable them to participate in decision making, but I cannot support such meetings when they make a sham of the word "democracy." It was the left on campus that persuaded the students to resort to mass meetings during the discipline crisis.

Thus, when he now complains about the absence of "democracy," he really laments that the students refused to support the left coalition of the time, and thus thwarted plans for an occupation of Simcoe Hall.

NO CONTROL WITH SAC

He also complains that SAC is not the vehicle to build a mass movement that could bring about "real control" essentially for a real socialist revolution: I don't know what he means by "real." In any case, I have no intention of becoming the leader of the "real socialist revolution."

I was not elected for that purpose. The vast majority of students on this campus do not want "the real socialist revolution."

He also states that the anti-CUS vote was a vote against "top-down authority." The implication from the rest of his article is that he alone (in some cases) is anti-authoritarian. This analysis may be true, but, for the record, he voted to keep U of T students in CUS. Furthermore, he states that there is a parallel between SAC and CUS. He does not explain how such a parallel exists. In so far as the students directly elect their representatives to SAC and can recall them at any time should they become totally unrepresentative, I feel that there is significant difference between SAC and the now defunct CUS.

I can see no legitimate reason why we should follow Glendon's example and dissolve the student council. That would leave a political vacuum, where any political group could claim (as most already do) that only they represent the students.

CONTROL BY VIOLENCE

In such situations the majority of the students would have no control whatsoever over political groups. Should the majority feel that such groups do not represent them, they would have to resort to violence to control them.

The Thorson incident is a case in point.

Chris Szalwinski, the object of Abols' rebuttal, writes notes at one of last Fall's SAC meetings. He resigned from SAC Wednesday.

He complains that SAC does not provide for "real control, democracy, and self-determination." If he feels it's true, he should present a positive alternative to representative government. If, as he implies "real democracy" is "a real student movement" then the corollary is that neither you nor I would have a voice in "real democracy" unless we shared the aims and tactics of the "real student movement." By definition, it would be undemocratic to hold aims contradictory to the "real" movement and "real peoples workers democracy."

This, in my mind, is the vilest most totalitarian aspect of current leftist attitudes — democracy and participation for the true believers; political ostracism and outright condemnation for all others.

As Elridge Cleaver stated in his succinct totalitarian fashion, and the left on campus often states with zeal, "If you are not part of the solution you are part of the problem."

ABOLS AS PROBLEM

Beyond doubt, since I am not part of their solution, I am part of the problem. The left on campus often states this with zeal.

He envisages a situation where the students are manning the barricades, with SAC close behind screaming, "But listen, we are still your leaders!"

First of all, I don't know of anything on this campus that warrants SAC leading students to the barricades. Secondly, I wouldn't pretend to be leader of students that went to the barricades when there is no justifiable reason, and while there are still opportunities for reasonable debate.

He complains that during the discipline crisis, the administration refused to deal with anyone but the "legal" representatives of the student body — the SAC President. He felt that The Coalition "should have been consulted and listened to."

The Coalition was made up almost exclusively of left wing groups on this campus (NLC, Young Socialists, TSM, CPL, etc) who had assumed the role of student spokesmen.

This coalition had not been elected nor selected by the students at large to represent them. The fact that some members of the coalition were elected representatives did not legitimize the body.

CONTEMPT AND PATERNALISM

I can only say that the administration acted in good faith by not undermining the elected student bodies during a crisis situation. It is contemptuous and paternalistic for the members of the left to assume that only they truly understand the political climate on this campus; that only they can accurately determine what is in the best interests of the students (the socialist revolution); that only they can see clearly; that the majority of the students are too brainwashed and ignorant to really know what they themselves want.

This view of course is also contradictory to their rhetoric that people are capable of making decisions that may affect their lives.

There is no more important group on this campus than the students. But, I would include all of the students. As much as some people feel that a "real socialist revolution" is necessary, I do not believe that this is the view of the majority of the students. I cannot agree with the implicit suggestions that I and members of SAC stop participating in the problems of the university community — changes that we believe are positive and constructive, rather than destructive changes.

The fact that we do participate and try to bring about reforms peacefully and reasonably is not in my mind an abuse or rejection of the student body and its interests, as I understand them; rather, it is an exercise of the responsibility I feel we have towards the students.

Carleton students vote to dissolve council

OTTAWA (CUP) — The remnants of Carleton University's Student Council decided to remain in business Wednesday, despite a student mandate to dissolve itself.

During a two-day referendum January 19 and 20, students voted 744 to 457 to abolish the council and replace it with two new bodies: one controlling services, and one taking charge of "political" functions of student government.

But the referendum turnout only amounted to 19 per cent of the full-time student population of Carleton — less than the one-third of Carleton's 6,200 students necessary to make the decision binding.

The proposal to split the duties of the council — consigning service functions to a five-man board of directors, and political functions to a "Grand Council" composed of student representatives to the university's decision-making bodies — was originally forwarded by members of the Student Council executive January 6.

At the same time they made the proposal, seven members of the eight-man executive resigned.

Wednesday, the remains of the council rejected a proposal by former Student Council President Lorenz Schmidt asking that the council dissolve itself anyway, even though members were not bound by the referendum results.

"A valid political comment to draw out of the referendum is that a majority of the people who bothered think changes are necessary," Schmidt said. "I think this council should recognize that fact — and act accordingly."

The councillors voted 7-1 to defeat the motion.

"You want us to dissolve ourselves so your dream bill will come through," Arts Representative Dave Egan told Schmidt. "But right now we don't have enough participation. Let's wait until we get people at Carleton who will make this sort of change possible."

The council appointed Brian Hamilton, former Finance Commissioner, as interim president of the group; five other executive positions left vacant by the January 6 resignations will not be filled until new council elections take place February 16.

Booksac folds -- students get bookstore parity

The Students Administrative Council voted Wednesday night to close its bookstore.

The SAC Bookstore was a financial failure, although it served the purpose of forcing student parity on the committee which sets policy for the U of T Textbook Store and the Bookroom.

Chris Szalwinski, (III APSC), former Services Commissioner, recommended closing the SAC enterprise in a commission report. The action is effective today.

SAC also reiterated its previous position on the proposed structure of the Interim Disciplinary Committee by approving the 20 SAC-appointed students, six of whom will be chosen by lot as the final appointees.

The plan to set up a University Wide Committee to implement the CUG Report was given "tentative and critical" support by SAC, which also supports open balloting.

The committee will consist of 40 students (27 undergrads, 9 grads, and 4 part-time), 40 faculty, 40 administrators (20 academic, 5 non-academic and 15 support staff) and 40 others (including 20 from the Board of Governors and 20 alumni).

Geritt Van Geijn (II APSC) was appointed Acting Services Commissioner to replace Szalwinski who has left the council, and Peter Gold (II Dent) was elected to replace Mike Simon as External Affairs Commissioner.

Simon called his commission a "Santa Claus" and expressed total dissatisfaction with the petty politics of SAC.

The council also voted to open presidential nominations February 2, close them February 10, and hold the election March 3.

Rod Hurd (III Scar) and Eric Miglin (II APSC) are expected to announce their candidacy as a ticket for president and vice-president, as are Wayne Richardson (IV APSC) and Ken McEvoy (III VIC).

University gets bomb scare

The MacLennan Labs, the Galbraith Building, and the Old Physics Building were evacuated yesterday afternoon after a bomb threat was telephoned to the Metro Police.

Around 2:10 p.m. a deep male voice phoned both the Bell Telephone and the Metropolitan Toronto Police to warn that a bomb would go off in the MacLennan Physical Laboratories at 3:00 o'clock.

The university, which has a regular system for dealing with such threats, immediately evacuated and searched the buildings.

"We found nothing of any significance," Mr. J. W. Westhead of the Department of Physical Plant said.

When asked who might have phoned in the threat, Mr. Westhead admitted, "We have no idea at all. It came right out of the blue."

SAC maintains its original discipline proposal

Despite firm ATS opposition, the Students' Administrative Council reiterated its position on the Interim Discipline Committee Wednesday night.

It ratified the selection of 20 students from which six will be chosen by lot to sit on the committee.

SAC had originally planned to appoint students to the committee which would be both a legislative and judicial body, but the ATS objected.

At the last general ATS meeting, members voted to insist that SAC members to the discipline committee be chosen by lot from the entire student body to avoid political bias.

The present SAC position is a compromise suggested by U of T President Claude Bissell, though the ATS has remained opposed.

A four-man SAC committee including President Gus Abols, interviewed 39 applicants and unanimously selected 20.

Abols, however, opposed Wednesday's ratification, saying he preferred the Campbell Implementation Committee's proposal. This calls for a committee composed of SAC, GSU, APUDS and ATS presidents as well as the Dean of Arts and the Dean of Law, with Pres. Bissell as non-voting chairman.

Prof. J. M. Rist, ATS chairman, refused to comment last night on SAC's action, but said "the matter will come up before ATS council next Wednesday".

The proposed interim discipline committee would consist of 10 faculty and 10 students, (6 SAC, 3 GSU and one part-time student).

The hard-line ATS position has caused some SAC members to question the whole Interim Disciplinary Committee, set-up.

"Why should we be running around trying to help them set up a discipline body to put us in our place," said Wayne Hankey (SGS) co-chairman of SAC's University Committee and member of the Campbell Implementation Committee.

"The implications of establishing a legitimate disciplinary body are so great we should not go into it unless we're sure it's satisfactory. The trouble is what's satisfactory to us is not satisfactory to the ATS, Judicial Chairman Art Moses told the Varsity."

In a letter to SAC in December Dr. Bissell said that failing the establishment of a new disciplinary body before the Campbell Report is implemented, the Caput would consult with "representative students of the university" in any disciplinary emergency.

Paper swears, gets smashed

LA CROSSE, Wis. (CPS-LNS) — Control of the student newspaper of the Wisconsin State University at La Crosse is being given to the university's mass communications department beginning next semester because of the university president's displeasure with the paper's content. The newspaper, the Racquet, had come under considerable fire on several occasions from the town's commercial newspaper. The man who has been hired by the administration to supervise the Racquet next semester is city editor of that paper, the La Crosse Tribune. He intends to hold both positions. The president of the university, Samuel Gates, focused his attack on the use of "objectionable" words. Most observers feel that the suppression of the paper was at least somewhat politically motivated.

In the jaded world of rock music The Band is a rare example of purity and uncompromised joy. Their music is built on a country base, with only thoughtful and subtle traces of rock eclecticism (classical organ, jazz, etc.) Having played together for all of ten years, as a back-up band first for Ronnie Hawkins and then for Dylan, their presentation is extremely tight, almost formal. But within these constraints The Band demonstrate an endless capacity for variation and free play. The listener is instantly caught up in this tension and can't help but feel good as it is released into the music.

Last Saturday night to two packed houses at Massey Hall the Band put in a Toronto homecoming appearance. An instant rapport was established with the audience as the group went through familiar numbers, occasionally improvising and adding to the arrangements.

In several ways the music of The Band is a reconciliation of opposites. The simplicity of a past when children learned about the world sitting on their grandfather's knee is superimposed on the complicated symbols of the present. Folk wisdom and agrarianism are quoted into the context of rock and to an audience completely removed from the old way of life. Some of their recent songs use pictures of the American Civil War to talk about families and brothers at war with one another. And lurking under the guise of references to old-time fundamentalist religion is a sense of cosmic mystery that would warm the heart of any Hindu.

It means something that four out of five of The Band are Canadian (the fifth is from the American rural South). One can still feel history in Canada and understand that one's parents were somewhere rather than nowhere. And it is always amazing (to an American like myself) when Canadian audiences applaud at The Band's references to Canada in their songs. This doesn't mean that the scene up here is any better than in America, only that Canadians still identify with their geography. It's not like that for Americans anymore, though it once was.

thing to do, and they both sing. Two man groups are rather uncommon in the world of rock music, but when the musicians are as good as Teegarden and Van Winkle the effect is tasteful and exciting. Every number played in their set, and they were all good songs, was done with as much finesse as I have ever heard from any rock group. Go to hear them, if possible, when they play at Massey Hall on Feb. 1st.

Howling Wolf is one of a handful of older blues musicians who have been thrust into international prominence by the blues boom of the late 60s. Having spent all of his early life in Mississippi, he had the great good fortune to have learned to play guitar from the legendary Charlie Patton and harmonica from another blues legend, Sonny Boy Williamson (Rice Miller). He was never much of a guitar player, and he now seldom plays guitar in public, but his harmonica playing, along with that of Sonny Boy Williamson and Little Walter, has had tremendous effect on the development of modern blues.

Because of his recent popularity, Howling Wolf can afford to carry his own band on tour with him, but unfortunately, at least in the early part of this week, it hardly appeared to be an advantage. Guitarist Hubert Sumlin, who has been the mainstay of the Wolf band for many years, did all that was to be expected of him, but the rhythm section of piano, bass and drums just couldn't seem to get it together. The lack of cohesion was most painfully obvious in the band's warm-up numbers before Wolf appeared on stage, and the fault lay primarily with the drummer, whose technique was rudimentary at best and who seemed to be having difficulty maintaining the tempo, as well as following the occasionally difficult rhythms of the pianist.

Howling Wolf's arrival didn't entirely pull the band together, but occasional gestures to the drummer, and the strong rhythmic drive of Wolf's singing and harmonica playing brought sufficient improvement so that the band played adequately on several numbers. One hopes that at least some of the problem was first night unfamiliarity among members of the band and that by the time this appears they will have rightened it up.

As for Howling Wolf himself, he was in fine form, better than his previous Toronto appearance at the Rock Pile. A pre-Christmas heart attack has slowed down his stage movements to some extent, but it appears to have done nothing to his strong voice. He alternates between beaming benevolently from the stage and glaring threateningly at the audience while he sings in his low, stormy voice. His repertoire is strictly blues — he doesn't throw in blue-by pop tunes to pander to what might be the taste of his audience. He is truly one of the blues greats and deserves to be heard.

Orford quartet

The average concert-goer would contemplate the pleasures of modern Canadian music with about as much anticipation as a visit to the dentist. And when the programme offers an exclusive diet of Canadian chamber music, only the adventurous and the addicted would venture forth. Well, Sunday's concert of Canadian chamber works at Hart House by the Orford String Quartet didn't hurt at all. In fact it was an extremely enjoyable evening.

This was due, to a great extent to the performers; the Orford Quartet has improved tremendously both in intonation and in balance since their last Toronto performance. Modern music is their element and they are able to communicate their enthusiasm to the audience through the 20th century musical idiom more than through music of any other period. Although by the end of the demanding evening the quartet's dynamic range lost some of its initial magnitude, their playing was always secure and persuasive.

The programme consisted of string quartets by Faculty of Music composers Samuel Dolin, Oskar Morawetz and John Weinzweig. In addition first violinist Andrew Dawes, assisted by pianist Katerina Vournasos, performed Morawetz's Two Preludes for Violin and Piano. The first work, Dolin's Portrait for String Quartet was an ambiguous, rather unpleasant experience. Perhaps our ears are untrained for such esoteric carryings-on; the work was rather homogenous, composed of a series of grating unresolved dissonances. If music does not resolve, at least dynamically or rhythmically it is not harmonically, it must inevitably grow boring. It did.

The two works by Morawetz were definitely easier listening. Morawetz not only introduced and developed recognizable themes but masterfully built climaxes from his intricately textured music. His melodic subjects provided a welcome place to hang our conventionally-trained ears. The violin preludes called for considerable virtuosity on the part of Mr Dawes, and his efforts were repaid by some beautifully exciting music.

Weinzweig's Quartet No. 2 developed around rhythm themes which anchored the piece's melodic improvisations. At times the composer called for effects that seemed extraneous to the musical content. One particular sordino section seemed especially contrived. However the total impression of the evening was one of pleasant surprises and musical satisfaction. Both in their choices and interpretation the Orford Quartet is becoming professional in the best sense of the word.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS with RICHARD GOODE, piano. RCA LSC 6189.

(3 record set of chamber works by Schubert, Brahms, Poulenc, Webern, Martinu, and Dahl).

A wide selection of compositions ranging from the romantic to the atonal is bound to expose certain weaknesses in almost any chamber group. The ad hoc ensembles heard on these records often confuse vociferousness with empathy and the results are disappointing. Technical perfection suffices in Dahl's Duettino Concertante (1966) for flute and percussion, and the Concerto Op. 24 by Webern and Martinu's Nanon actually benefit from the crisp, rhythmic, note-perfect treatment given them. Poulenc's Sextet for Piano and Woodwinds cannot be classified with other "modern" works insofar as, like most of Poulenc, it is somewhat anachronistic. In the present recording, it suffers from a dryness of interpretation.

On the debit side, Brahms' Piano Trio in B, Op. 8, and especially Schubert's Trout Quintet sound harsh and shallow. Tempi are ridiculously fast in the Schubert, and the hundreds of nuances which constitute the soul of his work are boorishly indicated by general increases and decreases in volume throughout the ensemble. Again in the Brahms Trio, Goode, painstakingly aware of every note, misses the mood and the rhythmic qualities of the music.

While the romantic pretensions of this set are at times farcical, the modern works are convincingly performed and make worthwhile listening.

LUTHER ALLISON. Love Me Mama. Delmark 625.

Luther Allison has been making something of a name for himself as an up-coming Chicago guitarist and singer. This, his first album, while adequate, doesn't really place him among the blues greats. He has a pleasant, soulful voice, but it doesn't generate excitement by itself, and the band doesn't give him much help. Allison's guitar is in the modern school of Albert and B. B. King, but without the dramatic qualities they have when they're good. The rest of his group is subdued and seems to be holding back. Certainly Allison and his band don't show here the kind of excitement they are said to have in person.

p. h.

JOHNNY CASH. At San Quentin. Columbia CS 9827.

Problems, problems. This album suffers from uneven production and trouble with Cash's voice. On many tracks, Johnny's normally rough, ragged voice sounds too much like a strep throat. The album is a poor follow-up to the superb Folsom Prison LP. Cash sounds too tired and overworked to have made this album successful. There is also the nagging thought that this concern for prisoners is developing into a bit of a gimmick.

SCREAMIN' JAY HAWKINS. I Put a Spell on You. Epic 26457.

A voice from the past — Screamin' Jay Hawkins was sort of the Arthur Brown of his day. This reissue of an old LP (formerly titled At Home With . . .) isn't apt to set the stage for a Screamin' Jay comeback. Most of the material is take-offs of old standards with big band arrangements (I Love Paris, Ol' Man River, and the like). The humor, where it exists, is heavy handed, and some of the songs are perilously close to the originals and equally uninteresting.

p. h.

THE MASTERS OF DECEIT. Vanguard 6522.

Where this album isn't bad, it's either dull or too disorganized to have any effect. The group's attempts to sound like The Mothers of Invention aren't insane enough to be successful (who could, or would want to imitate the Mothers anyway?). The name of the group is appropriate. There are just enough good sounds on the record to deceive you into thinking its worth listening to. Don't let them fool you.

BEE GEES. Rare, Precious & Beautiful. Polydor 242.004/3.

This three LP album, selling for the price of one, is a complete disappointment. It's a collection of left-over material from the career of the Bee Gees. Many of the songs are poorly engineered. At their best, the Bee Gees have a sound like the Hollies or early Beatles, at their worst (most of this set) they're insipid. The mod-soprano voice is a dying art form.

rock at ryerson

As far as the music was concerned, at least, Ryerson's Winter Carnival was a definite success. Their Friday night dance-concert featured two fairly good local groups, and one excellent one. In Ryerson's Great Hall, after a reasonably functional jazz band, a group called Soma played. Their sound seems to be pretty much a Canadian attempt to emulate Blood, Sweat, and Tears, with a dash of Santana thrown in for good luck. They're a big group (nine men), consisting of a basic rock band, with added saxophones, organ, and a conga drummer. The result is a mixture of semi-acid rock and jazz, which they can't quite seem to blend, with the singer looking, acting and sounding like a copy of David Clayton-Thomas. The various influences in the band tend to pull it apart instead of adding together into a total unified sound. But the group has a happy, exuberant style, so it's possible that some people might dig Soma, although I didn't exactly get off on it.

In the gym upstairs the Robert E. Lee Brigade was playing at the same time. I was only able to hear the last couple of numbers of their set, but judging from those two they seem to be one of the best heavy rock groups around Toronto, doing some unusual things quite successfully. They were followed by Teegarden and Van Winkle. David Teegarden plays drums and Van Winkle plays organ, providing an excellent rock bass with his foot pedals, which is by no means an easy good cast can't hide simplistic moralising

Several local ideological cabals will have fun divvying up the point of Brecht's A Man's A Man, playing through Saturday in Hart House Theatre. Brecht is particularly susceptible to allegorizing by his audience — why not? he does it himself — and this play, given the politics of the present decade, is more open than most to it.

Some will choose to think that the hero, Galy Gay the Indian peasant who turns Army gunner, stands for "the liberal finding his natural alliance with militarism." Others may be pleased to sneer that he represents "the corruption of the individual, as under communism." Middle-roadsers might find it convenient to take refuge in history and conclude that he demonstrates the corruption of the native by the imperial experience.

Explanations as facile as those are disturbingly possible. Yet the excellence of Martin Hunter's direction, and the tightly-knit performance turned in by the cast, make one want to respect the play as somewhat more than ideological schematizing.

One touchstone for evaluating a production is the level of performance obtained from the minor characters. Nothing enervates a production, no matter how good the leads, like bumbling supporting players. Here true support, (and not detractor), is given by Mrs. Gay (Deborah Greene) as the helpmeet who keeps the hovel neat, and Wang (John Browne) as a Chinese theological capitalist. Billy Graham with a Charlie Chan accent. When minor characters are given as much gusto as these are, one is assured that every dram of meaning is being extorted from the entire play.

However that meaning is still elusive, even if all that is there is revealed. A parcel of whores led by the Widow Begbick (who receives proper brassily domestic interpretation from Maureen Fox.), indicate that something is being said about sexual exploitation. This impression is reinforced by the fact that the whores exploit the drives of Sgt. Bloody Five (James Bradford) — whose stiffness is not only in his back and his upper lip — for the benefit of the soldiers. Yet surely it must be something other than that exploitation does bad things to people?

Or again, Michael Fletcher's shuffling Galy Gay agonizingly becomes transformed into Jip the Gunner, destroyer of citadels. Mr. Fletcher puts the necessary obnoxiousness into the peasant Gay, and the requisite brassiness into Jip, the neophyte who outsharks his tutors. His strong depiction of both parts of Gay's character expose what can be taken as a weakness in the play itself, rather than an accusation of overacting. The thesis of the play, stated many times, is that one man is as good as another. The entire business of Army identity cards and the Gay Jip metamorphosis point to the interchangeability of men; and this is a threatening doctrine. (And when the transformation is so complete and swift as it is in this play, grounds of verisimilitude are readily at hand whereon to fight it.)

The issues of the play, then, are as distinctly defined by the players as they may be, yet the impression lingers that the artbenches of ideology may have called this one correctly. Choreographer Alison Stein and Designer Tom Doherty have successfully colluded to keep the action going against a pleasing backdrop, and Clifford Ford's original score for this production abets them. But all the whitening available to director, cast, and staff can't make this play any more than a sepulchre of simplistic moralizing.

Aside from first rate acting, there is some consolation in the fact that A Man's A Man marks the return to student theatre at Hart House. For the past two years (barring rentals to groups such as St. Mike's Mickies) the productions in Hart House have all been professional. The present effort, plus Measure for Measure next week, will be used to gauge both student competence and student interest in drama at Hart House. If A Man's A Man is indicative of the quality of production one can expect, student drama should again become a permanent part of the Hart House scene.

a good college literary magazine...

Reading Acta with an eye to reviewing it, you necessarily look closer than you would just glancing through in a cafeteria, and I realized that to give an honest opinion I would have to be really down on the magazine, something I didn't want to do in print because as a college magazine editor myself, I appreciate only too well the problems Mr. Ayre faces. Acta from Victoria College is the best UofT college literary effort around, and my hat is off to John Ayre and staff for the job they have done. But...

The editorial:

Art is structure imposed on a screen of emotion. In the course of the inspiration, the artist attempts to incise an iron pattern on an indefinite emotional space. The inspiration comes like a bird and is gone leaving a taste of strawberry feathers on the lip of the mind and in order to preserve that taste, the artist creates.

For God's sake, an essay with a beginning like that is pretentious and overdone to the point of absurdity already, but when the argument is for a subjective rather than objective approach to art, I am totally at a loss as to how to express how much shit I think it is.

Flip the pages to find out what makes the issue an impressive forty-eight pages long, and discover a long essay on Marvel Comics, and ten pages of quotes from past issues of Acta. The essay isn't bad, just disappointing that such an obviously cute, avant-garde, camp piece should have to be used to fill so much space. One long space-filler is one thing, however, and ten pages of snippets from Acta's back pages in the same issue is another. Occasionally cute, sometimes nostalgic, mostly just oh so groovy that Acta is 94 years old and can do something like that.

Mr. Ayre's poetry can be read either of two ways — quickly, to enjoy the sounds of the word combinations, or thoroughly, to try to piece together the original idea that spawned all the metaphors. Either way, it's better than most college poetry, but not as good as the self-confident understatement of Ian Young. At the other extreme, there is page 36, reserved for college poets not good enough to rate a whole page to themselves, but included to get a few more names on the table of contents (the editor trying to fight elitism, a worthy, but perhaps futile, exercise). In particular, Mark Czarnecki's Vision (note weighty title) and his use of "poetic" words like transfigures, hallowed, Seer — words all loaded with meaning and importance, and none of it under control.

dionysian dilemma

Ernie Schwartz — director, actor — was lying naked, bloodied, faking death (count to a hundred and you're alive again) when I, with fake offense at Darcy McHale's deeply felt jibes at me — member of the audience — left the Studio Lab Theatre and made my way to the foyer to chat with the Dionysian chorus over a can of bubbling cola. It was the kids what done it. No huge butch Agave and her Theban matrons thundering down some Grecian steps with Pentheus' gory head held aloft, no naked revellers either. Ernie Pentheus is smeared and squashed "to death" by a throng of youths in red and black bathing suits. To give them their due, it is also the kids (from the audience this time) who try to save Pentheus — and in a more general sense it is the kids, if anyone, who save the show.

At its base I find Richard Schechner's Dionysus '69 a sorry and somewhat pretentious piece — a feeble U.S. attempt at Grotowski's Poor Theatre gone wrong. Euripides' text is an obvious one for updating in an age in which the attempt to drop out, love, and live communally has been perverted into violent hatred by the stubborn, inhuman forces of conservatism. In fact The Bacchae has had remarkable popularity throughout the Sixties in productions that have ranged from the straight to the crazy. The aim of Dionysus '69 is "not merely to adapt." The Bacchae but "to transform it into a direct experience." The validity of such a claim can of course only be assessed from the results of the theatrical experience, not from the outline or script.

Dionysus '69 works least when its updating is most obvious. Sometimes this may have been due to what appeared to be a pale Canadian adaptation of intense U.S. emotions: Pentheus is compared to "one of those men who bug your telephones," hardly a stunning simile while Daley's thugs are still alive. Sometimes it is due to cheap theatrical tricks, which may be in the script but which seem to be inherited from Studio Lab's children's shows: Pentheus asks, "Are you Dionysus who comes from Asia?" Dionysus replies, "No, man, I'm Darcy McHale and I come from Dundas and Pape (or wherever)." This corresponds to the deliberate breaking down of the illusion which forms a controlled tension at the moment of Pentheus' death/"death". But exchanges like the above cheapen the effect at the gain of a few laughs from the high school audience wide-eyed at the event.

The updating is at its most embarrassing during those long dialogues or monologues when the Schechner relationship between the myth and today's reality is drawn. These are embarrassing not because their prosiness hits home with earthy acuity, but because paradoxically the absolute lack of poetry in these sections makes them stick out as false rhetoric and bombast within the sensitivity of Euripides' situation. Darcy Dionysus' final speech of admonition to Pentheus, chorus and audience is, to say the very least, a puny anticlimax after the exciting orgy of Pentheus' death. Either the intellectual and emotional confusion that the non-verbal power of the finale brought to the audience, or the stunningly cool economy of Euripides' text would have made the point with more impact and clarity than all Darcy's rhetorical jargon.

This comment holds for many other sections of the script: Schwartz would do well to have more faith in his company and his audience. For what the Studio Lab does add to the play is vigour, imagination (some, not all of the time), and, wherever the script allows, beautiful, plain, old-fashioned sincerity. Despite the play, that is, this Dionysus '69 is pleasing most of all for its unpretentiousness. Occasionally this is difficult to distinguish from banality or kids' show involvement of the "London Bridge Is Falling Down" variety. But the techniques did work for a majority of the audience on the night I was there. The 13-to-16-year-olds strove desperately to convert Pentheus to The Truth, and there were laughter and bright eyes all night. When he wasn't pontificating or cracking funnies, Darcy McHale was disarmingly appealing not as Dionysus perhaps, but enough to be good old Darcy McHale, man. Ernie Schwartz posed and sulked too much for my liking, but his exchanges with McHale were movingly controlled and his timing during the conversion scene did much to build the increasing tension. The difficulty the chorus had was to impart their enthusiasm to the audience, among which they sat without in turn acquiring some of its apathy or shyness. The results were therefore often blurred.

Dionysus '69 calls for, depends on, and got audience participation. But is this where the real bugbear lies? The audience's task of converting Pentheus when the rest of the cast leave the stage is impossible. Schwartz makes quite sure of this. Once his violent embraces have been refused by a girl or two, nothing will bring him around except the total support of the crowd. Despite the attempts of many members, this is in turn impossible because it would mean that he has total power — and who wants to support a "tin Hitler" like Ernie? The real paradox is reached in the final murder scene. Pacifist at heart though you may be, you can't stop the violence without at the same time supporting Pentheus. The terms are absolute now: kill Nixon, Daley, Agnew, or vote for them, fight for them. This is the harshness of the Dionysian alternative. War is over is you want it — and can act to stop it. I guess it's a pity that we've lost the choice of dropping out of the violent/violent axis completely. According to Darcy, even Regent's Park depends for its salvation on the kind of revolution that he demonstrated without very much impact at 53 Queen East.

Poetry is often an attempt to capture the weightiest of subject-matter, but what all too few college poets realize is that the way to do it is not by using weighty words. The object is control, and that is achieved only by distilling one's writing to the utterly simplistic, and building back up from there.

Most interesting in the new Acta is the introduction of reprints of professional artworks at the expense of original college artwork — a trend which might well be carried over to the next issue's prose and poetry as well.

Thus ends my (sort of) review, but while on the subject of college magazines I cannot resist the temptation to explain a little of why they are generally so bad. I don't know the specifics of the problems John Ayre faces at Vic, but I do know of the troubles with UC's Gargoyle Magazine.

UC has an annual literary competition (a good thing in its own right) which offers substantial monetary prizes to winners, and thus receives (understandably) many submissions. The contest also has a rule, however, which prohibits accepting pieces already published elsewhere. Consequently, when I try to solicit copy from UC people, I am often faced with a reply to the effect that the person has already submitted everything he she has done that is any good to the contest. The rule was made to prevent favoritism (submissions are anonymous) at judging, but is the possibility of favoritism more important than having the good writers and poets read by their peers in the college? As the contest is not over until late April, what the matter boils down to is that the UC Administration is paying several hundred dollars each year to prevent the college from having a half-decent literary rag.

BEFORE AND AFTER COMMAND FROM DOG HANDLER

These before and after pictures strikingly illustrate what the troublemaker in the crowd or a rioter sees when he is confronted by the dog handler team. One word of command has turned the passive, seemingly uninterested German Shepherd police dog (left) into a potent physical and psychological weapon (right)

The handler, by letting out the leash to its full extent, can slowly advance on the crowd. During this period the dog is snarling, snapping, growling or barking. He will be moving on his leash in an action perimeter of about 20 feet controlled from the center by the handler. Persons confronting this spectacle will normally "melt away." In such a situation, and depending on the local ordinances regarding use of police dogs, any person who is bitten is guilty of a misdemeanor and automatically is under arrest.

The dog is a police weapon, and like a firearm he can be employed in such maneuvers so as to bring discredit on the police department. Used properly, however, they are invaluable for crowd control, mob dispersal, and patrol and security duties during and after civil disturbances. Those departments with dog handler teams available should consider them as valuable additions to the riot weaponry and tactical field and plan their use in civil disturbances, accordingly.

A PRESS EXAGGERATED CONFRONTATION

This photograph was widely used by the news media. It shows National Guardsmen in the process of removing illegal anti-down demonstrators during a racial disturbance in 1964 in Cambridge, Maryland. Present in the picture are 13 demonstrators, 29 helmeted Guardsmen, 9 cameramen, and 20 bystanders.

The demonstrators were finally dispersed by tear gas, but only after much news publicity had been created. Although the incident itself involved little actual violence, authorities were criticized in some news dispatches for use of excessive force, etc.

Police should prevent or avoid such situations. The troops with their rifles and fixed bayonets in reality could not use such weapons on the passive, unarmed demonstrators. Good police techniques, using obscuring smoke, shock batons, the Mace and other suitable weapons, could have quickly removed the demonstrators without injury, or undue slanted news coverage.

(17) Most police activities are those carried out under rather close public scrutiny. Consequently, the operational-security aspects of civil disturbances are too often neglected or minimized in overall planning. Riot preparation, planning, training and equipping for violent civil disturbances is best done without publicity. Availability of the news media to this phase of law enforcement can be a two-edged sword, although it is always desirable for any police agency to have good public and press cooperation and appreciation of its capabilities. But, if the riot potential is great and if subversive, extremist and militant minority groups are present, good police riot-preparedness security must be practiced.

(9) Local ordinances granting emergency powers to authorities during riots should be completely reviewed and updated, if necessary, to facilitate temporary apprehension of professional agitators, known extremists, and militant leaders. The legal power should be on the books enabling police to confiscate firearms, fire-bombs, and other weapons found on persons and in vehicles during periods of a legally-defined civil disorder.

Fig. 1 Shows the mob advancing toward its objective. It is faced by only a few policemen, who will attempt to block off the path.

Fig. 2 Shows how the police have deployed into two lines to oppose the mob, and have advanced to meet it before it enters the intersection. At contact, selected mob members in front engage police units in combat, permitting the rest of the mob to surge out around the flanks into the intersection and continue toward the objective.

Fig. 3 Shows that the police meeting the mob have formed into the classic phalanx or wedge formation for mutual protection. Again the formation has advanced to meet the mob before it breaks into the intersection.

Fig. 4 Shows the police phalanx being engaged by selected hard-core mob members and the beginning of an envelopment action. This action will result in the police unit being surrounded while the mob moves on to its target.

COMMUNIST MOB TACTICS

* Note: Figures 1 through 12 are tactical illustrations which appeared in a Communist training manual on the creation of mob violence and destruction of police opposition. The manual was referred to in hearings of the U.S. Senate Internal Security Subcommittee (circa June, 1961).

HANDLING SPECIAL PROBLEMS

(1) Police should do everything possible to interfere with and break up the chanting, rhythm-beat, slogan-shouting form of crowd incitation used by professional agitators and organizers. These are forms of self-induced mass hypnotism directly related to primitive war dances and chants, and they are a basic means of inciting large masses of people who, thus losing their individuality, become subject to commands of the mob leaders and catalyze into a mob mass. The effect achieved is like that of a cattle stampede, where the herd blindly follows its leaders. Hitler and Mussolini were both expert practitioners of this technique.

This tactic is one to which the most sophisticated as well as the least literate mob member will succumb. Cheering sections at football games, the use of bagpipes and drum beats in battle, hand-clapping, and whistling are all examples of this play of psychological emotional build-up.

Leaders of such incitations and any mob members using bull horns or other means to build up the rhythm (drums, cymbals, etc.) should be extracted quickly from the mob, if feasible. The police use of super sound systems, sound trucks blaring music, or variable-pitch electronic sirens is recommended for breaking up this kind of crowd and mob self-incitation. Noise-bombs, firecrackers, and aerial noisemakers discharged over the heads of a crowd are also useful counter-measures.

THE SHORT POLICE BATON

Use of this baton in tactical formations is not recommended, unless it is necessitated by the use of protective shields, etc.

Police armed with the one handed baton have a tendency to break ranks and engage in individual combat with rioters. This results in baton use as a clubbing instrument, and a loss of unit discipline and strength. Rioter baton casualties are also the natural focus of press and TV attention leading almost inevitably to "police brutality" charges.

Fig 9 This is the military type envelopment technique. The central mob column meets and surrounds the police units from the front and at the same time the two columns on the parallel streets flank the police lines guarding the center.

Fig 10 This is another technique to meet the same police formation as in fig 9. In this case the single mob column breaks into three segments: one moving to the right, the other to the left, in order to flank the police lines.

Fig 11 In case of police roadblock the mob column splits into four groups that enables a coordinated attack on the police elements from all sides.

Fig 12 A plan to protect a public square where a meeting or demonstration is being organized. "Action units" are stationed at all points of entrance to the action area. These action units will divert the police, delay police entrance into the square, and protect and permit the crowd to build up to where it can be incited to mob action.

A POLICE TACTICAL SQUAD

This 15-man tactical riot squad is armed with 26" Shok batons and side arms. The squad also has a shotgun, and tear-gas capability. The squad leader (with bull horn) has available a complete range of force and options. Note that the men are wearing protective general-duty helmets and heavy, dark plastic eye protection.

ORGANIZING EFFECTIVE FORCES AND PATROLS

RIOT POLICEMAN WITH 37mm GAS GUN AND VEST WITH MUNITIONS

Two obscuring-smoke, two continuous-discharge gas, and two instantaneous-blast grenades are carried in the pouches on the back. Three long-range and three short-range blast shells are carried in the frontal pockets.

The gas mask can be carried by the individual, or with reserve gas munitions in canvas bags by extreme men assigned to accompany the formation into action.

Normally the gas officer will operate from within the baton-wielding formation. On orders from the commander, he can advance to the line to fire a short-range blast shell or throw blast grenades, or he can launch long-range shells into the mob area from any location in the formation.

Ideally, each squad should have one gas officer assigned as an integral part of the formation, more than one may be indicated. Others can be held in the reserve to meet the demands of larger riot situations. Generally, the smaller the size of the riot unit, the greater the need for gas-officer specialists to be assigned or available to make up for lack of numbers.

The above comments with respect to the 37mm gun and projectiles apply equally well to the unit equipped with shotgun launchers and either burning or multi-purpose grenades for achieving the same tactical purpose.

Property rights are the oldest of all human rights, antedating even other civil rights, and they must be upheld if a stable society and public support of law and order is to be maintained.

(2) Known outside agitators should be kept under surveillance. Within the bounds of law, police should maintain an "automatic pick-up" list for use at the start of any civil-disturbance operation. Police intelligence files, augmented by information provided by Federal agencies, should always be kept current on information concerning out-of-town extremists.

(3) Permissive looting, condoned to decrease violence, is not a successful tactic. Looting escalation and police morale are affected. Shoot-on-sight policies against looters, however, are not usable against women and children. Non-burning, non-fragmenting tear-gas grenades are the best means employed to discourage this class of rioter activity. Firearms should only be used when the looting is accompanied by arson or when the act of looting presents a most acute security hazard.

By training, temperament, and profession, the police officer is individualistic. He operates alone or, usually, with another officer during most of his law enforcement career, consequently, he has difficulty adjusting to team-work operations such as riot control formations, tactics and maneuver, without specialized training. This training must be undertaken at regular intervals and practiced consistently to enable successful mob-control tactics in the streets. Such training also results in good morale and aggressive, confident police performance.

Marooned is the story of the fungoid growth of Spiro Agnew/John Wayneism as it gropes outward into space. Remember those old war movies wherein Ace Silverwings, USAF, vowed to bomb Baden Baden in a gutless monoplane presumably held together by paperclips and bubblegum?

Good old Hollywood seems to have decided that Stanley Kubrick's sortie into spatial pseudo-philosophy was essentially unclean and un-American. Fine. Regrettably, Marooned is not set far enough into the future to be magical, or even engrossing in a scientific manner. As a visual trip, it rivals only the Union Station-Eglington subway run. If you can accept Gregory Peck as the Captain Ahab of NASA and David Janssen as the Jimmy Cagney-Silverwings pilot, and also stomach lines like, "Go on home, girls; when the boys are off flying, your place is at home with the kids", this is your movie, not mine. The movie itself is scarcely visible through the flag-waving.

Marooned seems incredibly clumsily made, with plastic planets, wooly clouds and a script which sustains a level of literacy that makes the verbal portions of 2001 sound like pure poetry. Technically it is an unimpressive film. Since people enjoy sci-fi movies for the sensational visual effects, Marooned seems to have failed on all counts. Ironman I and the other space vehicles look suspiciously like Mattel's latest triumphs, and even this pendant globe appears cheap and two-dimensional. While Kubrick's film may not have been intellectually sound, it was technically amazing and as such, has become the standard by which one tends to judge space movies. Marooned is offensive largely because it is such a step backwards. There are no lovely visual images of spaceships doing the Vienna waltz, nor is there any real grounds for believing that the astronauts are stuck out in the ether rather than in the Paramount washrooms. Spacewise, there are three token sun-ribs, that's all. This is obviously no film for A. C. Clarke or Isaac Asimov buffs. Buck Rogers, Captain America fans, maybe.

I have neglected to mention what is simultaneously the most tasteless and the most astounding feature about this movie. The three spacemen have lived in a space station for five months and have degenerated to such a paranoid level, that Captain Ahab-Peck orders them to return. Several neat shots are included of the wonderful American communications systems — two computers and twenty thousand television sets. Got that, you Russkies? Alas, it doesn't all end right there.

The retro-rockets on the returning Ironman I cop right out. (Hence the title — America pollutes outer space). At this point all hell breaks loose, and approximately thirty minutes of drivel wholly unrelated to anything pass before our boys decide to send up General Bubblegum and his paperclips. The three astronauts are dying, either of boredom or oxygen starvation — in this consists the best acting in the movie. A letter-to-three-wives, anyone?

At the crucial moment (after about three hundred semi-crucial moments), a Russian Vostok spaceship drifts up to Ironman I, looking evil, gray and somewhat like a late-model canister Hoover (on its side read: "Always first", ha, ha, in Russian). You can tell the creep inside is a Russky because he wears RED MITTS !! I was actually praying fervently that the inevitable indiscretion wouldn't happen. My prayers went unanswered, since Marooned intimates that our CCCP-man does nothing but fumble about in a sinister fashion (even after travelling 3000 miles out of his way, for godsake), until Captain Bubblegum arrives, and pushes him brusquely aside.

So much for Marooned. The only logical step to come in this new series of Startrek/2001 offspring would seem to be a Doctor Strangelove treatment of the whole affair. I only hope that Peter Sellers and George C. Scott don't get air-sick.

film about bad and good guys up and dies

In all those Westerns and Humphrey Bogart movies of the forties and fifties, when Americans still believed their society was somehow very real and legitimate, it was accepted, at least as part of the game, that the lonely, anti-social hero should at the end conform to the society with which he had in fact been flirting all along.

By the sixties, when the popular mind began to feel that maybe there was something wrong, an Ayn Rand figure like Hud could reject society right to the finish and still remain immensely popular with movie audiences. But at that time there still seemed to be a society real enough to be rejected and the hero, as a sort of corollary, appeared even more real. Now that America seems to be breaking apart into narrow, desperate groups mostly fighting each other, it becomes increasingly difficult to put one's finger on what is holding everything together. And the latest movie heroes, as members of groups as in Bonnie and Clyde and The Wild Bunch, or alone as in Pretty Poison, or in pairs as in Easy Rider and Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid are trying to survive in the face of a society which most often can only be hinted at; and when they are inevitably defeated, it is by members of other groups, usually the police or the army, rather than society itself (only Pretty Poison coming really close to making an amorphous and elusive society the actual destroyer).

The director of Hud, Martin Ritt, has made a new movie, The Molly Maguires, which sets out to continue this theme, or at any rate, appears to. The Molly Maguires was an illegal organization of Irish miners in Pennsylvania in the 1840s and 70s who tried to achieve better working conditions by blowing up mines and murdering mine officials. An Irish-born detective, James McParlan, in the pay of the mine owners, infiltrated the Mollies in 1873 and testified against them in a series of trials in 1876 and 1877. He was strikingly successful, for the violence ceased and the society disbanded.

Ritt says the movie is intended to be a fairly realistic interpretation of what actually happened, though it, in fact, spends more time examining the character of McParlan than interpreting events. Unfortunately, in the course of this examination, McParlan's character becomes so inconsistent that the events generated by him lose their reality. Ritt presents this traitor (Richard Harris) as an extraordinarily sensitive man part of the time, as if we are supposed to love the whole person. But it should have been enough for us to admire McParlan's clever duplicity and his nerveless cool, without being made to feel a lot of false pity for him, for some kind of identification to take place.

The methods by which his sensitivity is shown to us are so obviously and irritatingly just machinery clanking away on the surface of the picture that one is forced to believe that Ritt decided his audiences simply wouldn't be able to stomach an out and out bastard (Ritt must be the most misguided patronizing director around). At one point McParlan even starts philosophizing to a robin I defy anyone to find me a man who will talk to birds and then betray his friends to the police, unless that man is insane. But if McParlan is mad, then it is a very sick kind of madness different from that of say, Tony Perkins in Pretty Poison, where his madness was more an extreme kind of sanity in relation to a very sick society. If McParlan is mad then it is the madness of society, but even that doesn't work, for society doesn't talk to robins, it kills them, by polluting the air.

By contrast to McParlan, one would expect the Mollies to be a fairly justifiable organization, at least to those like myself, who under certain conditions accept violence as a valid alternative (with Ritt, one is always forced, in self-defence, to be aware of where one stands). As their leader, Sean Connery gives the Mollies some strength of purpose, but Ritt messes it up badly. Presumably to juxtaposition the case for the Mollies by juxtaposition, the village priest is presented as a wishy-washy liberal full of pious nonsense and the mine police as unbearably savage oppressors. But as if in order to placate the very liberals and law-and-order people he has just stereotyped, Ritt proceeds to weaken the case for the Mollies by portraying them as almost unjustifiably brutal as the police. We are certainly told some of the miners' troubles and can assume the rest, but we are never made to really feel the poverty and dreariness of their lives or the dangerous and unhealthy conditions under which they work, at least not enough to justify murder. Ritt might be saying that murder is never excusable, but if so, he doesn't give the other side a fair hearing.

In fact nobody in this movie is allowed a fair hearing. The priest and the police are stereotypes, the Mollies are brutes, and Ritt's attitude towards McParlan is embarrassingly patronizing. It might all have been good fun if the high-handed ease with which Ritt interferes with the development of his characters were not so apparent. Ritt must be a liberal because his priest is so perfect a masochistic projection of the liberal point of view.

At one point in the movie, the priest, sitting at the bedside of a dying man, is so engrossed in talking to someone else that the man dies without his knowing it (though the blame is later placed on the dead man for going without making a sound). Like his priest, Ritt is so busy and maddlesome, that his movie just up and dies behind his back.

NEW EMPHASIS 1970 - Graduate Students' Union

Departmental Graduate Student Organisations - Constitution

The GSU has devoted over 20% of its budget and hired an Organizer to help develop graduate student departmental organizations. Strong organizations would result in direct participation in affairs that affect them continuously and directly.

Every graduate student organization receives $2 per member allotment upon presentation of a constitution and interim budget. In addition special departmental grants fund exists for special conferences, speakers, and publishing material.

To date only 15 graduate student organizations have requested and received allotments. This is disappointing since there are 56 departments and over 30 are organized. Graduate students should check to see if their representatives have requested these funds. Departments with no graduate student organization in them, and there are 21 in this situation, should contact the GSU.

A questionnaire was sent to every graduate student organization in November. To date only 60% have been returned. We request that your departmental organization return the forms as soon as possible.

A Constitutional Committee established by the Executive has proposed a totally new governmental structure for the GSU. The major reason for change is that the divisional representative system has proven to be inadequate. Two divisional representatives cannot reflect the divergent interests of 1,500 students in different departments.

The most important proposed changes are:

1. The establishment of a General Council with elected representatives from every department, institute, and school in the SGS
2. The General Council would be the policy-making body of the Union
3. A President and Vice-President elected by all the Union members
4. The establishment of an Executive Committee consisting of the President, Vice-President, and up to eight other members appointed by the President from the General Council departmental representatives
5. All members of the Executive Committee are subject to General Council recall
6. The Executive Committee would be responsible for carrying out the day-to-day functions of the Union.

Copies of the proposed constitution are available at the GSU office and it is on the agenda of Monday's General Meeting.

Proposed Building Renovation

The dire need for major renovation of the GSU building has been continuously emphasized by the students who use our very limited facilities. Structural repairs and maintenance were not made by the University due to expectations that the Graduate Complex would be built in the near future. Unfortunately nothing has materialized.

The existing conditions are intolerable. The building is a fire hazard. The plumbing is rusted out, and paint is peeling off the walls. We feel that the University can no longer delay allocating funds to make the building sanitary and safe for habitation.

Our plans call for the inclusion of kitchen, dining room, and bar facilities whose costs we would share with the University. These latter costs total approximately $15,000. Hopefully we would have completed renovations by June.

Thesis Sub.

All Ph.D. students who have passed their oral examination will receive up to $100 for thesis expenses. A statement of expenses with official receipts and approval of the graduate department chairman or secretary must be submitted to Miss Gordon's office at the SGS. Expenses include typing, binding, and publication fee (micro-filming).

Taxation

A campaign is being organized by the Graduate Students' Union to present the Minister of Finance, The Honourable Edgar Benson, with a petition and brief arguing against the proposal to tax scholarships, fellowships, and other grants. This proposal would result in an average loss of income exceeding 10% and in some cases, for married students with Canada Council Fellowships, could amount to more than 25% or a loss of $100 a month. Students interested in working on the GSU Tax Review Board should leave their names with the Executive Assistant in the SGS.

Grad. Complex

The Graduate Complex, consisting of single graduate student residences, service facilities can be traced back to 1963. Plans were made and approved by the Board of Governors in 1966 which promised to house 1,380 graduate students by the fall of 1970. Again nothing has materialized. To date we have accommodations for slightly over 300 while the existing need is in excess of 1,800. One reason for the delay is the lack of capital. Another reason was the willingness of graduate students to be good citizens and wait their turn patiently. The result was declining project priority. Lesson: the administration will only respond when massive graduate student dissatisfaction actually surfaces.

We ask those who are not satisfied with the existing service and residential facilities provided (?) for graduate students to write to GSU, President Bissell, Mr. Rankin, & Dean Struck outlining your opinions.

Jean-Luc Godard completed Weekend in December, 1967 after a typically brief production period of four months. It was Godard's fifteenth feature-length film and his fourth adventure with Eastman colour. The crew which worked with Godard on Weekend all carried familiar names — Raul Coutard (Director of photography), Agnes Guillemot (Editor), Rene Levert (Sound), Antoine Duhamel (Music). The premiere was held in Paris on December 29, 1967 and caused a minor sensation — something which Godard had not achieved since his first feature, A Bout de Souffle, in 1959 and had not repeated until Les Carabiniers in 1963.

In the winter of 1967, Weekend was hailed as everything from a "cataclysmic nightmare" to a "seismic vision" by North American critics and succeeded in reinforcing the determined coterie of Godard enthusiasts. Not that Jean-Luc Godard had ever lacked acceptance. He had simply never actively sought cinematic renown. Godard's reputation as a dialectician had preceded the bleak lessons which he splashed across the screen so vividly in Weekend. Pierrot le Fou, Masculin Feminin, Made in U.S.A., Deux ou Trois Choses que je sais d'elle, La Chinoise and his contribution to Loin de Viet-Nam — all elicited similar responses from Godard, not only to content and concern, but also to the concepts of image, sound and montage in the cinema.

In an early article written in 1950, Godard had commented, "Beauty and truth have two poles: documentary and fiction. You can start with either one. My starting point is documentary to which I try to give the truth of fiction." In a later commentary, Godard expressed the same concept in more concrete terms — "The cinema is not only a reproducing apparatus; the cinema is not an art which films life: the cinema both gives to life and takes from it, and I try to render this concept in my films. Literature and art both exist as art from the very start; the cinema doesn't."

On viewing Weekend in retrospect, this specific quality of Godard's approach to film is, perhaps, the most striking. As Roland comments bitterly to an Emily Bronte born both within and without her age in the film, "We're not in a novel. We're in real life. A movie is real life," (which, of course, it is not). Or, as the dialogue runs between a society matron and a Roland stranded beside a country road:

Matron: "Are you in a movie or real life?"

Roland: "A movie."

Matron: "You're a damned liar." (or is he?)

As in what Richard Roud terms "the analogical incident" of Masculin Feminin in which a man is murdered for no apparently logical reason, or as in the cocktail-party sequence in Pierrot le Fou, in which Ferdinand is confronted with a series of characters all mouthing the absurd slogans of mass advertising, Godard brilliantly counterpoints reality with fiction and fancy in Weekend.

Certainly this tendency to examine the echoes initiated by realism is not a new one in the history of cinema. Alain Resnais had performed a similar role in his direction of Hiroshima Mon Amour in 1959 and Vertov Dziga was toying with the concept as early as 1928 in The Man With a Movie Camera. But Jean-Luc Godard in Weekend was the first to apply a strictly theoretical and artistic concept to a film that so vividly summarized everything that was grotesque and evil in the 60's.

That oft-quoted subtitle in Weekend — "A film found on the scrap heap" — has a more than incidental relevance in introducing us to Godard's vision of the past decade. Haskell Wexler owes Jean-Luc Godard a tremendous debt of gratitude for supplying him with a reservoir of images which he hurled at us so viciously in 1969, in Medium Cool, when run beside Weekend as a sort of mental split-screen process, seems to block-in in red, white and blue (or is it only red?) those incidents which Godard had predicted two and three years earlier in Made in U.S.A., La Chinoise and Weekend.

"Freedom means violence", Godard theorized in Weekend, but it required Abbie Hoffman to open our eyes. "The fight for freedom will end in the death of freedom", but it required My Lai to illustrate that so gruesomely. "We're all brothers . . . Morx said so", but Godard insists, in showing scene after scene of blood-soaked corpses lying ignored by the wayside, that compassion and humanism have long since vanished in our age.

For Jean-Luc Godard, greed, sterile materialism and blind selfishness are the order of a weekend spent roaming bewildered and directionless through the countryside of France, dotted, not with postcard scenes of rustic eighteenth century villages, but with twisted metal car wrecks, columns of oily black smoke from gasoline fires, shattered skulls and blood. It is a terrifying vision of senseless destruction and every bit as bleak as Dante's Inferno.

Not since Made in U.S.A. when one of the characters posing as Robert MacNamara stated that he thoroughly enjoyed his position of power, had Godard been so angry, so pointed, so comic and so brilliantly observant as he was in Weekend. Where his earlier films often lacked a hard, central focus; forcing our attention to wander to a single scene, a movement, a phrase; in Weekend Godard found a single image which seemed to contain everything characteristic of his theme and of his vision — a car wreck.

Weekend is so cluttered with shattered glass and mangled bodies, frequently as hideously beautiful as the wreckage in Losey's Accident, that there is scarcely room enough for Roland (Jean Yanne) and Corrine (Mireille Darc) to navigate. Their journey along paved highways and dirt roads is a twisted one, both in real and figurative terms, and when they are ultimately captured by a band of guerilla fighters engaged in that ever-present crusade against the bourgeoisie, we discover that even the forest which conceals their band is stained with blood and debris. There is simply no escape from the junkyard wasteland of modern-day life — no escape except that offered in that beautiful little scene in which the camera traces perfect continuous circles around a barnyard while a pianist, who wanders from town to town in a yellow truck, performs a Mozart concerto. But even the perfect halting simplicity of Mozart is forgotten as Godard slams us into yet another scene of ugly thought and action and wreckage.

Of Waiting for Godot, Hugh Kenner observed that Beckett's characters are forever doomed to "rehearse their grasp of detail". That is exactly the situation in which Godard has placed Roland and Corrine in Weekend — that is as much as they can ever expect from life. They never question. They never escape. They are the victims, the willing victims, of their age and we feel that, had they not encountered the guerilla band, they too would have eventually lain dead beside some road leading nowhere, forgotten and ignored, as the traffic bumped by.

Although Godard is, if anything, unpredictable, from all accounts his vision, so sharp in Weekend, is equally penetrating in his two latest releases — Sympathy for the Devil (originally One Plus One, featuring the perpetrators of the Altamont disaster) and Le Gai Savoir (originally intended as a tele-film and based loosely on l'Emile by Rousseau).

"To me", said Jean-Luc Godard, "style is just the outside of content, and content the inside of style, like the outside and the inside of the human body — both go together, they can't be separated." Weekend is undoubtedly Godard's clearest and most effective illustration of that dictum but it is also an example of what cinema, in general, can be — unique, perceptive, subtle, experimental and dazzling.

THEATRE

Maybe it's the time of year, but there's much theatrical meditating about death going on all over campus this week: Pœuli Ludique Societas' Somonyng of Everyman at Vic through tomorrow night; Measure for Measure opening at Hart House on Wednesday; and at St. Mike's next weekend (the 30th & 31st). Pinter's The Dumbwaiter and de Ghelderode's Three Actors & Their Story.

This production of Everyman is directed by scholar-actor Father Genesius Jones and its message is not likely to move anyone who does not have a working knowledge of medieval morality plays, Christian theology of the Middle Ages, and Roman Catholic liturgy.

Pœuli Ludique Societas tradition — including some of Father Jones' own show-stealing performances — has been to demonstrate the viability and contemporary appeal of centuries-old plays by means of much pageantry, a lot of stage business, and the development of memorable onstage characters out of the faintest hint of such in the original scripts. But this production, restricted by the dimensions of the stage in the New Vic Theatre and by the abstract functions of Everyman's dramatis personae, opts for a study in symbolism at the expense of theatricality. Pageantry is limited to the inspired costumes and to static stage pictures of the Trinity or of Everyman receiving redemption from the Eternal High Priest; stage business for the most part consists in shuffling actors from point X to point Y so that character X can make the symbolic switchover to doubling as character Y; and most of the opportunities for characterization are ignored — when Good Deeds, for example, announces from her bed of pain that she will need medical attention before she can accompany Everyman on his no-return trip, nothing but her (strongly-spoken) words suggests that she's not perfectly fit.

With a better cast to enliven its iconographic and liturgical emphasis, this production might have worked. The moments when it does work are provided by a few individual performances — John Moynes as Fellowship and Beauty, Richard Green as Goods, John Cartwright as Kindred, and occasionally Beth Whitcombe as Knowledge. But the bulk of the acting is either stodgy or shrill, and the audience can relate to this Somonyng of Everyman merely as an exercise in the implications of an old text, not as a theatrical experience of hearing the bell toll.

Measure for Measure, directed by Stephen Katz, opens Wednesday the 28th in Hart House. The show will play at 8:30 nightly through Saturday the 30th, plus a matinee-cum-question-period at 2:00 on Saturday. Admission is free, and seating is on a first come, first served basis. To guarantee that you will be able to get in on the evening of your choice, phone the Hart House box office and have free tickets reserved for pick-up by 30 minutes before curtain time.

Measure is likely to be one of — if not the — most important productions on campus this year. Like A Man's A Man (which continues in Hart House theatre through tomorrow evening), it offers some hope that Hart House theatre may be restored to students.

To stage this enormous and unorthodox production, director Katz (UC) and producer Anne MacKenzie (Vic) have recruited an all-campus company that includes much of the best student talent available. In addition to the novel interpretation it offers of the play, this production is innovative because its financial backing is as intercollegiate as its cast and crew. The largest measures of support have come from the Trinity College Drama Society, the UC Players Guild, the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama, and the alumni Varsity Fund — plus assistance from SAC and the drama societies of St. Michael's and Victoria. As a joint venture, this Measure sets a precedent to encourage continued cross-campus co-operation in undergraduate theatre.

MUSIC

Like most pop music, much of what was produced in the late 50's and early 60's was ephemeral stuff which has deservedly fallen into oblivion. Only a few performers have managed to transcend the mediocrity which surrounded them and have kept their music alive. CHUCK BERRY who appears at Convocation Hall, Sunday at 7:30 & 10:00 is probably the best of these very few. His performances last year in Toronto (notably at the Rock Pile) were met with tremendous enthusiasm, and it is hardly nostalgia for old songs which is carrying him along. He plays with tremendous enthusiasm which he communicates both to the audience and to whatever local band is giving him backing. He should do very well with Whiskey Howl on Sunday. Tic. ets are $3.00 and can be had at A & A or at the door.

Jazz continues to come to Toronto, this week in the person of BUDD RICH, who brings his band into the Imperial Room of the Royal York Hotel starting Monday. HOWLING WOLF is at the Colonial and continues there another week.

Sunday at 8:30, the HART HOUSE ORCHESTRA and the U of T CHOIR join forces under the direction of Boyd Neel in a production of Handel's Acis and Galatea. Tickets at the door, $1.50 for students. The TORONTO SYMPHO- NY programme at Massey Hall Tues. and Wed. nights includes works by Barber, Schubert and Stravinsky. The U of T CONCERT BAND will present a free concert at the Johnson Building tomorrow at 3:00, and Monday at 1:00. LOUIS-PHILIPPE PELLETIER will give a piano recital, also at the Johnson Building and again free.

EDWARD BEAR is the rock attraction at the Hawks Nest Sat. & Sun. nights. The Riverboat has JESSE WINCHESTER through Sunday; JOHN LEE HOOKER opens Tuesday. JERRY JEFF WALKER is the performer at The Onion, opening Wednesday. A week from Sunday, THE BYRDS are in town for a concert at Massey Hall along with TEEGARDEN and VAN WINKLE.

On the country side, top C & W star FERLIN HUSKY is at the Horseshoe Tavern this weekend, followed by BOBBY WRIGHT, son of Kitty Wells, who opens next week. MYRNA LORRIE ends her stand at the Edison Hotel this weekend.

Newly instituted at The Onion is a Monday night folk jam session. Anyone who wants to play is welcome and should get to the club by 8:30 to sign up. If you just want to hear what's going on, admission is 75¢ and performers begin about 9:00.

p. h.

Le Fauche, at 169 Avenue Rd., sometimes offers some good after-hours jazz sounds. By a happy chance, Sonny Greenwich spent last weekend at the little basement club. Greenwich, who has been working out his unique guitar style for the past ten years around Toronto and Montreal, was recently hired by Miles Davis. While waiting around to see if the U.S. immigration people will deign to admit a Canadian jazz musician into their midst, Greenwich once again gave proof of his originality, lyricism, and intense commitment to his music. We hope he will reach the attention of a much wider audience in the near future. We wish him good fortune — nobody could deserve it more.

FILM

An interesting program at Cinema Lumiere for the next two weeks. Jan. 22-25, Secret Ceremony by Losey; Jan. 24 (11:30 P.M. only), Rossi's More Than a Miracle; and beginning Jan. 26 for an indefinite run, a new Japanese film, Man Without a Map by Hiroshi Teshigahara (the director of Woman in the Dunes) will premiere in Toronto.

A number of new releases also opening either today or next week in the city: Z by Costa-Gravas; The Molly Maguires by Martin Ritt; Marooned, a sci-fi epic by John Sturges; Nicol Williamson's Hamlet; They Do Shoot Horses, Don't They?; and a re-release of Fantasia, Walt Disney's brilliant 1940 animated "voyage of discovery in the realms of colour, sound and motion" to the music of Stravinsky, Schubert, Bach, Ponchielli and Beethoven.

Received an extract from a press release dated Dec. 15, 1969 from the Syndicat General du Cinema et de la Television, a union representing 419 members of the NFB. Last Dec. 16, members of the staff of the National Film Board appeared in Ottawa to protest the layoffs that had been forced upon the NFB as a result of the government's austerity program. By next summer it is estimated that more than 150 employees of the Board will be dismissed as a direct result of the government's economy drive. As union president, John Howe, states the real issue involved is not so much the layoffs themselves, but "the preservation of the National Film Board as a unique Canadian institution where films are made of a kind that aren't made anywhere else in the world."

what resources do you consume?

Your article in Varsity, January 19th, "An Unrealistic Demand" contains a number of mistaken impressions about the formula financing scheme in Ontario. The scheme is not one which leads to control of the "economic function of a university" whatever that might be. Your correspondent should consider the following points.

(a) The formula scheme is used to calculate the total operating grant to a university and to distribute available funds between universities. Each program is given a number which approximately reflects the relative costs of educating a student in that program.

For example, 1st-year General Arts and General Science receive a number, or weight, one; Masters Commerce a weight of 2 and Ph.D., other than first year, a weight of 6.

The provincial government looks at its budget and decides how much it can allocate to higher education and selects a value for the Basic Income Unit. Currently this is $1530 for the 1969-70 academic year.

To calculate the grant to a university we sum the weights given to each student in each program and multiply the Basic Income Unit by this.

Suppose, in terms of our example, our university has only four students, a 1st-year General Arts student, a first year General Science student, a Masters Commerce student and a 3rd Year Ph.D. student.

Referring to the weights above we sum them and arrive at a figure of 10. Multiply our Basic Income Unit by 10, equals $15300, and we have the operating grant given to this university.

(b) There is no element of control in the formula system; the distribution of the $15,300 is the prerogative of the university. If it wishes to spend part of the $9,180 which the sole Ph.D. student brings them on the education of the Arts student, that is entirely the university's decision.

(c) Your article drew attention to the proliferation of graduate programs in the University of Toronto. That is not altogether surprising in view of the high weights given to graduate programs in the formula scheme.

Ask yourself — what resources does a 3rd year Ph.D. student in French consume? Written examinations probably finished a year ago, he has no office space, attends few lectures and chats with his supervisor for 10 minutes every week.

For providing this education the university receives six times as much as a 1st year Engineering student who requires staff, space and equipment in abundance.

Furthermore the university is under no obligation to rid themselves of their idle French Ph.D. student.

If he takes six years to write his thesis all the better; as time goes on the resources he uses will probably diminish anyway. Any rational university would expand graduate courses of this type at the maximum rate to subsidize expenditure elsewhere.

In view of this, President Bissell's remark that he would prefer a heavy weighting of graduate degrees would seem to be superfluous. Higher weights to graduate programs would certainly benefit the university as a whole — whether it would improve the quality of graduate education is doubtful.

(d) The problem with the formula financing scheme may be too little control rather than too much. A tax-payer can roughly gauge the return on his taxes when they result in bigger and better expressways, more efficient road sweeping etc.; but how does he estimate the return to higher education?

Does the Ontario government have no obligation to the taxpayers to see that the money is not wasted on unnecessary expansion of graduate programs or any other program? Perhaps not, but the question should bother those provincial government administrators who decided to spend $248,013,000 dollars in operating grants to Ontario's universities.

faculty support new college workers

The following is the text of an open letter to the faculty:

Dear Colleagues,
Many non-academic workers at the University of Toronto are exploited: they are very poorly paid and have no job security. We feel that the academic staff of the University should support demands by non-academic staff for decent working conditions. In particular, we feel that the cafeteria workers at New College deserve support.

We feel that the university has an obligation to the public to be a decent employer, both of people directly employed by the University and of people employed at the university under long-term contracts. As members of the academic staff we must support struggles by non-academic staff for better working conditions, better pay, job security and union recognition.

If the militant strikers who were not re-hired at New College return to fight for their jobs, we shall support them. Whether or not these workers return we shall make it clear to the university and to the public that we disapprove of the way the university treated the New College workers. We shall be ready to give more powerful and more timely support to future struggles by non-academic employees at the U of T.

We are in the process of forming an ad-hoc faculty committee for this purpose. We envision a committee containing individuals with many different political beliefs. The underlying principle of the committee would simply be that people have a right to decent working conditions.

All interested faculty members are invited to come to the founding meeting of this committee on Friday January 23 at 3:10 p.m. in room 2102 of Sidney Smith Hall. Please inform those of your colleagues whom you think may be interested.

imperialism

Wednesday's editorial attempted to ease the pain of an American owned Canada with the mere mention of the word "imperialism." It has always been easier to fault the faceless vulture to the south than to look closer to home. Perhaps you could convince the complacent that they are blameless.

What should be made clear to Canadians is that they willingly sold and do sell their nation for their personal material interests. The decision to accept more money from the "Americans" hardly requires thought for those who have "no choice." When people pay homage exclusively to the almighty dollar (U.S. or Canadian), when people cannot imagine lowering their material standard of living to raise their moral standard, it is difficult to point the accusing finger outward.

Imperialism doesn't begin thirty feet away.

Board will veto CUG—Reid

By TOM WALKOM

"Direct government intervention" is the only answer to U of T's need to reform, Liberal MPP Tim Reid said yesterday.

Reid, the opposition's education critic, was speaking to the U of T Liberal Club.

"I don't think U of T will ever be able to reform itself internally," said Reid, referring to attempts to implement the Commission on University-Government report.

"CUG," he said, "will be vetoed by the Board of Governors — "that last vestige of corporate control."

Reid also criticized the control of private endowments over a university's course of action.

"Who gave the right to wealthy individuals to discriminate against women on campus by building Massey College and Hart House?"

"Vincent Massey had something in common with Black Power Leader Stokely Carmichael," he said.

Carmichael has remarked that the only place for women in his association is underneath.

Reid's plan for government intervention in Ontario universities would include what he calls "bribery."

The government would set up a general format for a course it thinks in the public interest. It would then "call for tenders" in the various provincial universities, granting money to the one best qualified.

Reid was asked if direct government intervention might lead to overreaction a la Ronald Reagan.

"In Ontario where there haven't been and probably won't be any physical demonstrations, there is not much chance of this," he replied.

"At least Reagan controls his universities openly," he added.

The U of T Birth Control Information Centre has moved to the Advisory Bureau offices 631 Spadina above the Royal Bank. It will be operating Tuesday nights, Wednesday nights, and Thursday nights 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. Anyone male or female interested in discussing birth control and related subjects is invited to drop by.

NOTICE

The CUG Programming Committee announces a Public Meeting on the TOP GOVERNING STRUCTURE in the Debates Room, Hart House on Wednesday, January 28th, 1970, from 1:00 - 3:00 P.M.

Guest panelists are:

Professor J.H.G. Crispo - Centre for Industrial Relations
Professor C.M.T. Hanly - Department of Philosophy & Ethics
Mr. Ken McEvoy - University Government Commissioner - S.A.C.
Mr. Bob James - Finance Commissioner - S.A.C.

All members of the University community are invited to attend and take part in the discussion.

Reformism is marketable

NEW YORK (CUPI) — The New York Times of January 11 carried an advertisement claiming "Now you can escape air pollution in your home of office." And it will only cost $99.50 — reduced from $184.50

Selectronair, a portable answer to environmental devastation is offered by Whitaker's of Hartsdale, N.Y., "Westchester's complete drug and surgical store."

No longer, claim the merchants, need you cope with "the polluted air you are forced to breathe at your home or office." Selectronair just plugs into the wall and uses less current than a 100w bulb.

The device complements recent increases in sale of gas masks for street wear, although no announcement has been made about plans to colour-coordinate the two devices.

No information is available about the amount of pollution produced by the Selectronair factory.

search staff to try to produce such a compound, and that his firm had been in touch with Prof. Jones about the possibility of purchasing his product — after suitable testing, of course.

Prof. Jones explained how he got interested in pollution control. "It's because I'm a civil engineer, I suppose. Civil engineers have traditionally been responsible for control of the environment. We've done a pretty damn bad job of it up to now," he admitted. "But you can only do what your society allows you to."

Phil Jones, an associate professor of microbiology, also works with the Great Lakes Institute.

He explained that "one of the main pollution problems in the great Lakes is the tremendous growth of blue-green algae. This algae is nourished by the same elements that we humans need — nitrogen, oxygen, carbon, hydrogen, and phosphate. Now, you can't eliminate the first four, but you sure as hell can eliminate phosphate. It comes mainly from detergents."

Elimination of the algae's phosphate nutrients would cut down the proliferation of the algae and its consumption of the other elements.

"I started working on a non-phosphate detergent after it became obvious that the soap manufacturers weren't going to do the job until forced to by legislation," he continued. "I realized that it was up to someone like me."

Jones has formed a partnership with a graduate student, a chemical engineer, and an accountant to take out patents on the new compound.

The group is going to give the University a slice of the profits. Jones hopes it can go to the environmental sciences and engineering programs.

He said, "the program is harassed for lack of funds like every thing else around here.

We might even get something like the Banting and Best Institute going."

The August '69 issue of the Lake Erie Review says that "nutritional over-enrichment is the single greatest problem in Lake Erie today."

Phosphate is not only an ingredient in detergent, it is a very effective fertilizer.

Studies of the Great Lakes show that all phosphates are consumed during the summer by algal growth. This means that the algae grows to the limit of its phosphorous supply, then is forced to stop. Limit the supply of phosphate and you can start controlling algae pollution.

Since 47½ per cent of all phosphates in the Great Lakes come from detergents, this new compound could limit 47½ per cent of the algal growth.

Why didn't the soap manufacturers do something earlier? "It's a highly competitive field, and their chemists couldn't manufacture a cheaper, more effective substitute, I suppose.

"My philosophy was different than theirs." First crack, my detergent was more expensive and didn't do as good a job as the commercial product. It would have been rejected by any manufacturer, and quite rightly so. But we improved on it, and now we feel that we have a detergent that will do the job as well as any of theirs.

"It has been tested by a number of women in their homes, and we've manufactured five hundred pounds of the stuff, just to prove it can be done on a commercial scale.

"Of course, we're still testing the detergent on a broad ecological basis. I wouldn't want it to be said that I had solved one problem and created another. So far all the tests have been positive."

Professor Jones is now working on a way to remove phosphates from sewage. "Right now I have a few ideas that might be useful."

By HEATHER MOORE

Phil Jones, the U of T professor who claims to have discovered a non-phosphate detergent, doesn't look much like a crusader.

He looks, in fact, rather like a businessman approaching middle age; stocky and sandy haired, calmly puffing at his pipe in his cluttered office.

So far there have been seventeen or eighteen serious offers for his compound, including the Big Three of the soap industry — Colgate Palmolive, Lever Brothers, and Procter and Gamble, as well as from smaller manufacturers and private investors.

Their interest seems to have been sparked by proposed U.S. legislation to ban the sale of phosphate based detergents by July 1, 1970, because of pollution considerations.

A spokesman for Colgate, when interviewed by phone, first stated that there was no such thing as a non-phosphate detergent.

He then admitted that soap companies had combined re-

Big Red, Blues promise colorful battle

By LYNDON LITTLE

Cornell coach Ned Harkness must be happy that the people who run American college hockey have not as yet decided to take a page out of the Canadian Pro Football book and place a limit on the number of foreigners playing the university shinny game.

If Canadians were suddenly eliminated from his "Big Red" team, which is currently the only undefeated team in Yankee college hockey, he would find himself decidedly short of talent.

As a matter of fact, one spare goalie and one fourth-line forward would be all he would have left to work with!

Of the eighteen Canucks on the Cornell team that will be here to meet Blues tomorrow night, nine hail from Metro Toronto.

John Hughes from Birchmount Park and Brian McCutcheon an Alderwood Collegiate grad play on the top Cornell line which has picked up a total of 29 goals so far this season. Kevin Pettit from Hamilton is the other member of their number one trio.

Gord Lowe from Royal York Secondary Collegiate, Steve Giuliani from Weston, Larry Fullan from St. Michael's High, Dave Westner from Alderwood, Doug Stewart and Mark Davis from Don Mills Collegiate and Brian Copper from Bathurst Heights, their regular goalie, are the other Toronto area boys on the Big Red.

Harkness is himself a Canadian.

A native of Ottawa, after coming out of the Air Force following World War II he spent 18 years at Rensselaer Polytech Institute at Troy, New York, first as a lacrosse and then a hockey coach. Seven years ago he accepted the challenge of rebuilding the Cornell hockey fortunes.

Since then, you might say, he has had modest success: 146 wins, 27 losses and two ties is his record at the Ithaca campus.

The Big Red were National champs in '67 while last season they were runners-up to Denver University.

Blues will be the third OQAA team that has had a crack at Cornell this season. The Western Mustangs dropped a 8-2 decision and the Guelph Gryphons were handed a 4-1 defeat. Both games were played on Cornell's home ice.

As of now, the possibility of a sellout crowd for tomorrow night's game looks promising.

All the two-buck reserve seats have been claimed — which includes 160 which were sent down to Cornell. Only 2300 of the 3500 $1 general admission tickets remain to be sold.

See you all tomorrow at 8 bells!

"Certainly you make good money — but is that enough?"

"Most students are looking for more than money after they graduate," says Ron Wing, a 1968 graduate B.A. in economics from the University of Saskatchewan at Regina.

"Sure, a lot of them want to make a bundle fast, but there's a lot more to getting started on the right career. You've got to have the training and confidence to do your job well. Yet nobody wants to sit around some office for four or five years getting so-called 'experience' before he's allowed into sales.

That's why I was attracted to London Life. This company made sure my training was effective, and within three months I was ready to start out on my own. It's satisfying too, being involved in one of the most dynamic industries in North America."

There's a challenge waiting for you too, at London Life.

Is this a dagger I see before me?

No, it's Gellius and In'fac sports

By GELLIUS
HAPPYTH

Well, my goodness. I really am delighted. We received not one, not two, not four and three-fifths but THREE answers to the latest Contest. ("Moose Jaw, Sask.") One of these (from Mambly Whimsy III ABC) does, it is true, answer the previous contest. ("If Anna and the King of Siam, do all A's B?")!

"A's inclusive will always B (But what does a B when it A's?

Whatever do A's when they B?

Does a B, when it A's C what it B's?

Do A's when they B, C?") If Mr. (or whatever) Whimsy will send the Sports Office a stamped self-addressed envelope, we will send him (or whatever) Moose Jaw, Sask., by return mail. Please include 5 cents for handling charges.

Of the other two replies, one is from a previous winner, Don Short. Mr. Short's correct answer to the query "Is this a dagger I see before me" won him the UC II Hockey team, a prize which, as he complains with some justice, was not really functional. (The last game they won was played on the ice bridge between Asia and North America. See The Varsity for Dec. 8, 26765983 B.C.) This time, Mr. Short has been awarded T. S. Eliot, who plays a very functional Left Wing.

The Grand Prize winner is David Frank. ("Frank is the key" - B. Dylan). "Moose Jaw's ask many pertinent questions", he reminds us, and he further (use non solum... sed etiam in translation) gives an example: "Sperly Smear'd By Saccandidates". (The saccandidate is a quasi-mythical beastie occasionally reported in the B.C. brush. It is no relation to Ogo-Pogo, the capital of Manitoba.) Mr. Frank has been awarded a Morocco-bound copy of Joyce Gary's famous novel, "The Moose's Jaw".

Girls at Varsity tonight

Varsity hockeyettes open their exhibition schedule tonight against a highly-rated squad from McMaster. Game time is 7 pm at the Arena.

Aiming for a substantial improvement over last year's disappointing fifth place finish, the Varsity gals play a five game exhibition schedule before the championship tournament in mid-February.

The improved Toronto attack is led by the line of rookie Terry Midghall (I SMC) between wingers Diane Gilmour (II POTS) and Vikki Mitchell (III Vic).

Bluettes most effective checking line appears to be the fast-skating trio of Anna Radecki (II SMC) at center with Dianne Longbottom (IV SPS) and Bonnie Sproul (II PHE) on the wings.

Judy Angus (III Pharm), Barb Spence (II PHE) and Linda Browning (III Trin) form the gals' third line.

The steady play of two experienced veterans and some promising rookies features a strong Varsity defence.

Captain Cheryl Bishop (III Vic) teams with Nancy Missouri (I PHE) and Bluettes best rushing defenceman Briony Cayley (II Trin) is paired with newcomer Sandy Pett (II Vic).

Goaltending chores are shared by two agile Physeders, Alice Shank and Paula Vine.

Bruner's armor pierced, Blues impale Lancers

By JIM COWAN

It's not often a goalie allows seven goals in a game and still is picked as one of its stars.

But Wednesday night Windsor Lancers' Don Bruner was awarded the game's third star as his team went down to a 7-1 defeat at the hands of the Varsity Blues. What Bruner really deserved was a medal for bravery above and beyond the call of duty.

BILL L'HEUREUX out for season

Bruner, who was picked as the Western Division's all-star goalie last season, was fired on oftener than a Song My peasant. And for half of the game, he kept the score respectable.

The final tally flattered Lancers, who for the most part played as if they would rather be somewhere, anywhere, else. The shots on goal were an incredible 66-15 in favour of Blues, and that statistic indicated both the Lancer netminder's tremendous performance and the frustrating night Blues' marksmen spent trying to beat him.

But one man can hold out only so long, and Blues eventually found the range. Lancers, remembering their 4-3 upset win over Waterloo last Saturday, made a pretence of trying, but they couldn't stay with the high-flying Varsity squad.

LAURENT NETS TWO

Paul Laurent opened and closed Blues scoring, with his first coming at 15:53 of the first period. After taking a pass from John Wright, he blasted a hard shot from 30 feet in front of the Windsor net. Bruner partially blocked the puck, but it slipped past. Lancers were shorthanded at the time.

Seven different Blues teams will be in action this weekend, providing enough variety for even the pickiest of fans.

For the fencing team, Saturday marks the last regular match at home. The team will be competing against Rochester Institute of Technology and the Royal Military College in the traditional Lake Triangular Meet. The main event starts at 11 a.m. in the Fencing Salle and the Upper Gym, Hart House.

The swimming Blues play host to Queens University in Hart House at 2 p.m. Saturday, as the team continues to prepare for the OQAA Championships at McMaster Feb. 20 and 21.

Three Varsity teams take to the road, as the wrestling team visits Guelph, the gymnastics squad travels to Western and the skiing enthusiasts join in the Carleton Invitational Meet. (Editor's note: if someone from the ski and wrestling teams would let us know how you make out, we'd be bappy to pass it on to the rest of the campus.)

Laurent's second came at 17:05 of the third when he latched on to a Bryan Tompson rebound and put it past Bruner. In the last two minutes he had excellent chances to get his hat trick, but one shot whistled over the net and a second went inches past the post.

Blues also picked up goals from Bob McGuinn, Terry Peterman, Bill Buba, Len Burman and Nick Holmes.

For Wright, it was a most frustrating evening. The tone was set early in the first period when he broke in on the Windsor goal, and fired a blistering shot which beat Bruner cleanly and then with deadly accuracy hit the post. Buba, craning in, was so surprised to see the puck come out he fanned on his shot and Bruner covered up.

Minutes later, with Windsor a man short, Wright deked two Lancers and unloaded another drive which Bruner blocked. The Windsor netminder did it again during a series of shots in which he stole goals in quick succession from Wright, Dave Field, Brian St. John, Burman and Mike Boland. And his final save of the period was on (who else?) John Wright.

ALL STOPPED

Wright was by no means alone. It seemed as if every Blues' player on the ice was stopped at least once, and many more good chances were blown by skipping pucks, erratic shooting, and plain old bad luck.

It was McGuinn's goal at 13:50 of the second period which finally broke the spell. Laurent picked up the puck near his own blue line, sped down right wing and, with the Lancer defenceman backing up, swept the puck over to McGuinn. Bruner moved with the pass, and a straight shot would undoubtedly have been blocked, but the Blues' forward had just enough room to draw the puck back and reach around the goalie to put it away.

That seemed to be the turning point. Two minutes later, vs.

THE BIG RED

Wright chipped a pass out to Peterman, standing unhindered on Lancers' doorstep, and he lifted it into the twine.

One minute after that, Buba, off balance near the boards, threw a long shot which Wright stabbed at but missed. Bruner seemed to move to cover the deflection, while the puck slid along the ice to nestle in the far corner of the net.

Blues got an eighth goal, a beautiful team effort that was backed by referee Zip Thompson. Dave Field, who played a good all-round game and collected one assist on Peterman's goal, fired a hard drive from the left point which John Gordon knocked down and deflected in front of the net. Tompson batted the puck in, but the referee ruled the Varsity player was standing in the crease at the time and disallowed the goal.

EVASIVE SHUTOUT

It looked as though Adrian Watson, who was just another spectator for most of the game, might be on his way to his first shutout. But a defensive lapse by Blues left Windsor's Bill Wright alone in front of the net with a loose puck and with Watson down Wright lifted the disc high into the top of the net.

BLUENOTES... bad piece of news for coach Tom Watt...the medics say defenceman Bill L'Heureux is definitely finished for the season...Watson stopped one shot with his teeth in Wednesday's warm-up, but was saved from serious injury by his mask...

Guard Garth Evans (44) stretches for a lay-up shot during Wednesday's game with Waterloo. Other identifiable Blue is Bill Boston (53).

Get this (it's a tear jerker) — it's sixteen minutes of the second half and the old ball game is hanging out there for the grabbing at 74 apiece — Varsity loses tip in their backcourt — two points lost from scratch — Evans loose on the right side — drops a nifty eighteen-footer and that aging game is — What's this — No — Yes? — Oy Vey! — Hadden called for procrastination in the lane — no basket — no contest —

And so it goes, as it has all season for the Basketball Blues — not well. Varsity drops another (bet you can't say it just once) — final score — Toronto 78 — Waterloo 88 big ones. Everyone has the (seeing is believing) blues. The war (playoff battle) looks to be over — though no one wants it, what will be seems to be — inevitable.

To be fair, this was easily the most exciting contest Varsity has found themselves in all year — hopes of victory not being smashed in the awakening minutes of the game. Had the steam not stemmed in the dying (as in roll over and) minutes victory number one might be history at last. You cannot help but now ponder the irascible — no victories at all. Perish the thought.

It continues to be and isn't and haven't season — isn't it adoring Varsity specs — all three hundred or so of you opening nighters. Saturday afternoon Blues continue attempts to prevent a wasn't season against Guelph, a 97-69 loser to McMaster Wednesday night. Game time is 2 p.m. at York.

Wednesday night's flacker will be remembered as the night Blues almost cut it — but finally couldn't — in their most positive effort to date. Playing a box and one (it's clean) on Waterloo's Jean Lanniste, Blues held Waterloo and Lanniste (one basket) at bay through the first half.

With the Warriors shooting a paltry 29 per cent, due in part to the intimidating presence of Hadden and Boston, Blues scrapped together some nice breaks and combined with good foul shooting on fouls drawn inside left at the half with a very credible 45-45 tie.

The second half followed the pattern of the first — Blues would fall back and then come on strong. Coming on was fine until Waterloo destroyed the pattern and the Blues as described above.

As in past games Blues proved to be particularly vulnerable to a full-court press and there can be no doubt (though there are no statistics) that their thirty-seven turn overs per game average was richly maintained. Lack of quickness may have a lot to do with this. Toronto rebounding was strong on the defensive board — thank goodness — Blues were outshot by a startling 110 to 73.

One might speculate that it was only Waterloo's inept shooting which kept the score respectable yet Blues never looked that outplayed. No doubt that the Toronto defense had much to do with Waterloo's cold hand from the floor. What continues to plague are the ball-handling jitters which will show up among any inexperienced squad.

Individually John Hadden stood out as a tower of strength both on offence (21 points) and on the defence. His value to this team is becoming inestimable. Bill Boston the six-time former Monarch Park coach is coming on strong at the forward position. Moving well inside he picked up a cool 15.

Waterloo's fine guard combination of Lanniste and Kiewetter hit for 18 and 16 points respectively.

BLUES SCORING: Barker 4, Katz 9, Braid 10, Evans 11, Eben 2, Boston 15, Hadden 21, Anns 4, Markowsky, Betcherman 2.

Law society will hold binding SAC referendum

By LAURA KELLY

The Students' Law Society voted to hold a referendum Feb. 3 on the continued membership of the Faculty of Law in the Students Administrative Council.

More than an opinion poll, the referendum will bind the SLS to a position on SAC membership.

Bob Vernon (III Law), initiated the motion for the referendum at the SLS meeting Thursday. With a bare quorum at the meeting, the motion was passed 7-1.

Vernon, who had been planning the referendum since December, is strongly against the Faculty of Law remaining in SAC. He is currently a Law representative on the SAC.

"SAC provides no benefits for law students. I think it would be difficult for SAC to do anything for the Law School," Vernon said.

Vernon also criticized many actions that SAC has taken this year such as granting funds to speakers from Sir George Williams, to the Union of American Exiles and the California Grape boycott, and the hiring of a high school organizer.

"I don't see what that had to do with students as students," Vernon said.

Don Ferguson (III Law), president of the SLS, who cast the only vote against holding a referendum, called membership in SAC "vital."

Ferguson said that if law students were properly informed of the benefits of SAC membership, the faculty would vote yes to continued SAC membership.

The Placement service, SAC press, sponsored activities, and the student lobby in the Campbell Report and the CUG Report implementation were among the contributions of SAC.

Ferguson indicated that there was still irritation with some SAC policy, but called the issues "negotiable."

"Withdrawal from SAC is no solution to the problems," he said.

Peter Gilchrist (II Law), a presidential candidate in the upcoming SLS elections, also objected to the Law school dropping out of SAC.

"The Law school can't afford to opt out of the rest of the student body. Leaving SAC would be the first step in becoming a trade school," he said.

Bob Vernon SAC representative from U of T law school advised students to vote for a referendum.

U of O referendum rejects bilingualism

OTTAWA (CUP) — Social science students at the University of Ottawa turned thumbs down on bilingualism Thursday, and gave moral support to a Student Council bid for priority French-language instruction in their faculty.

Only 13 per cent of the U of O students favored the retention of current bilingual instruction in an unofficial referendum called by the Social Sciences Student Council after U of O administrators rejected demands for more French and less English-language instruction.

The unofficial referendum asked students to choose between bilingualism, French-only instruction, and two other systems which would give the French language priority in the faculty.

Although none of the options received a clear majority, 34 per cent of the 350 social science students voted for French unilingualism, while 51 per cent favored either of the two systems for priority French.

Although less than 15 per cent of the students in the U of O faculty are Anglophones, many of the courses in the faculty are in English, and a few professors cannot teach in French.

French-speaking students said after the vote that results are not anti-English, but an attempt to correct abnormal situations where English courses are out of all proportion to the number of Anglophones in the faculty.

In one department, they said, all but two of the 25 courses are offered in English only.

The Student Council will call a general assembly of the Social Sciences Faculty to decide on the next course of action.

Many Anglophone students in the faculty, however, said they would leave the faculty if a unilingual policy is accepted by the U of A administration.

"They're only cutting their own throats," said one student. "Where will they go after graduation with nothing but French in their education?" Most were confident the Student Council demands would not be accepted by the U of O senate.

The University of Ottawa's purported bilingualism has come under attack from other sources: December 8, 1969, U of O Student Council President Allan Rock said the two-language policy at the 4,500 student campus was a "failure," and agreed with charges in a

Quebec newspaper that the policy is a "disguised road to assimilation."

The article in the province-wide weekly, Quebec-Press, said the University's two-language policy hides the process of assimilation of French-speaking students, and called on the education department to establish a Hull branch of the Université de Quebec to serve French people in Western Quebec.

Jury selected for Sir George trial

MONTREAL (CUP) — Lawyers for the first 10 defendants on trial over the Sir George Williams University computer-burning acceded to the final two jurors Thursday.

Acceptance of jurors eleven and twelve followed the appearance of more than 210 prospective jurors, and an unusual press gang tactic by the court.

When the first 160 prospects yielded only 10 jurors acceptable, trial judge Kenneth MacKay Wednesday sent police out to round up 100 English-speaking prospective jurors from the Montreal streets.

Before the final concession by the defence, MacKay said another 100 could be made available, if defence lawyers were discussing "numbers."

"We're just concerned with making the right decision," said one of the defence lawyers.

The defence used most of the 120 peremptory challenges — disallowing prospective jurors outright without questioning — in choosing the jury, and questioned all other prospects closely about prejudice arising from racism and sensationalist press coverage of the SGWU incident.

Although no prospective jurors admitted to racial prejudice, many said sensationalized reports they read of the incident last February against the defendants.

Judge MacKay disallowed defence challenges that whites might be affected by "latent and unconscious prejudices . . . with regard to black people."

All 10 defendants are black citizens of Trinidad and Tobago.

The remainder of the 89 defendants charged with various counts of conspiracy in the Sir George case will have trial dates set March 2.

The defendants insist that the original cause for the protest — alleged racism at Sir George — has been buried under the sensationalism aroused by the computer-burning.

Believes in violence to protect blacks

By JEAN BUBBA

In the next American Civil War, the Blacks will be the catalytic force, says the Reverend Adam Clayton Powell.

"By 1972 there will be 100,000,000 people of diverse ethnic groups who will say we've got to stand together to save ourselves."

When the outbreak comes, Powell admitted that he "will be carrying a gun."

"Black is not your colour. It's the way of your thought. I'm not a Negro. I'm a Black," he said Friday in a taped interview on CFTO's "Face-to-Face-to-Face."

Soul might well be a determining factor in Powell's successful political life. He holds a congressional record for putting through 60 laws in the United States without one defeat. Tactically speaking, however, he attributes his success to directing the thrust of his legal approach to poor people in general and not just Blacks.

WHAT IS RIGHT . . .

"I intend to always fight for the principle of equality before the law. Rightness is a principle of the law. What is right is within the law — Federal law," he said.

When questioned about the charges of misuse of public funds which were recently dropped, Powell replied, "I just brought my bag and I have to fill it with tricks. I'm not going to be a martyr for other congressmen's corruption."

He is confident that the people of Harlem are behind him, citing a steady increase in his electoral returns as proof. "I am a candidate. When I die they are going to prop me up and run me. No one will vote against a dead man," he said.

"I disagree with total non-violence. I'm against war. I've always been a pacifist. I'm in favour of violence when I have to protect my black brothers and sisters," he said.

TRYING TO CATCH UP

He sees the majority of Blacks as trying to catch up with US affluence. "I want black people to be what they want to be. I want black people to do anything they can do as long as it isn't illegal. I want black people to live as abundantly as they can live. We blacks are going to live a fine life regardless if we can pay for it."

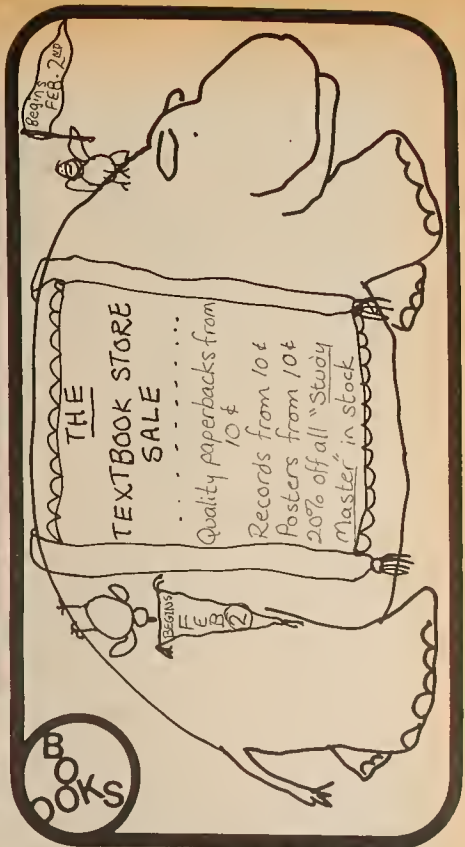

Watson suggested that allowing black people to buy Cadillac cars when there wasn't enough food for the family was distorting their values. Powell said, "They love their Cadillacs. What do you want to give them — a mule and cart?"

More seriously, however, he said, "I wish it was possible to organize the little money in the black community to more constructive use."

Adam Clayton Powell is congressman number 13 and stands ninth in the Democratic Party. "All I need is eight democrats to die and I'll be third in line for the presidency." But, he confesses he's too lazy at 62 to run for the White House. What he wants to do is disturb people.

"Anyone who gets disturbed and mad has started to think. No one in this country thinks anymore," he said.

Hopefully, Powell will get Canada mad. "The more that Canada becomes Canada and less an American colony, the better it is for the U.S.," he said. "When Canada achieves its national manhood, when it can do what it feels like without the Canadian ambassador in the U.S. asking if it's OK to do it, then it will make the U.S. grow up and get rid of its paternalistic attitude."

BALLAD

"No-struggle", or non-criticism is an essentially passive form that avoids explicit struggle choosing instead to internalise. It is a form that looks to what it sees as good and passes over the rest. If it can endure the cynical ridicule of the predatory critic it may be the mark of visionary integrity. But far more often it marks a naive and tragic hopefulness that tends to hint of Orwellian visions of terror.

"Predatory criticism" is a form very hard to deal with because it is mechanical and explicit, making use of real events and factual information. It simply finds fault and then announces it. It tends to be presumptuous and vain creating the impression that the critic stands above it all. To disagree with such criticism merely gets you identified with what is wrong resulting in further confusion and often personal hostilities.

A conscious form would tend to appear invisible to any who have a rigid, categorical, or dogmatic view of what is in fact the "ultimate mystery" of "reality". A science that "sets in order the facts of experience" can be the most vital critical form for the very reason that it does not separate "good" from "bad" experience but rather generates a unified reflection of what actually happens. It remains for individuals to accept or reject reality and deal with it on its own, or their own, terms. THEY ARE ONE.

A conscious critical form would not divide reality into what it likes and what it dislikes, it would generate an organic integrity that is "all things to all people", but most is an issue that goes far beyond the isolated structure being used as an example here. The same question is an on going, present and slightly-maniacal problem with the police, i.e. who will "serve and protect" and enforce the laws that the police break? In subtler ways it manifests throughout all social experience in any area where people occupy positions that in any way have authority or power over others. Finally it becomes realistically cosmic, in that it is a function of language (including paralanguage, etc.) and that it can and obviously is used in a way that tends to support structures and conventions that already exist, or questions and attacks them — which is part of the same process in that it still has that already existing structure-event as its focal point — or, it can be used to create, invent, or point out "alternatives" (Education?) This latter process tends to effect a restructuring of experience itself in that it generates completely new sets of perspectives and circumstances.

It is our experience that there is no satisfactory and enduring solution to any of these problems without such a "formation" because once a person has found or accepted a "position" and become "identified" with a "role" he tends automatically to become a part of the structure that has created his particular role, and thus he affirms and accepts it and cannot seek an alternative without suggesting doubt about his function which would have the effect of draining him of the necessary energy to "efficiently" fill as Larry Haiven concluded in a recent review, "to their seeming powerlessness (by) further abstracting it."

Another illustration is the cynical reaction of someone who himself describes his position as "set", who when told of an energy cell invented by Richard Keefer, a 17 year old Torontonian, responded "yeahh, but won't that inflate the sugar prices?" (the cell could be operated on sugar as well as a number of other things) In fact it turned out that he already knew about the discovery and had seen more of it via television than I had. But he was so preoccupied with finding fault that he was blinded to the real significance of the discovery. He "knew", but could not see.

There is also a pervasive problem of hostility toward any idea that we did not think of ourselves. This problem is compounded if someone is not established with wealth or power, or in this case is under 21 and does not even have a high school diploma, and further, showing little interest in money or power. He wants to do something good. And that, for some reason, is not believable! It implicates us all so we conveniently ignore and dismiss it — revealing the effect of pride and vanity to have for many, at least as much influence as reason or even moral necessity — those with vested interests to keep things as they are. Homes, cars, food clothes, services, transportation and communications can all be radically and dramatically improved in quality while being reduced in price, but inertia is so massive that specific innovations are suppressed auto-emphatically of service to those who intuit a need to understand as much as the need to apply their abilities to the process. You, I, we become whatever form our assumptions follow. If you like the appearance of things as they are, you will like oblivion ever better. Utopia, Oblivion, or the stagnant regressive present? All forms are within us as potential and we generally vary automatically from one to the other, dependent exclusively on what and who we identify with.

Struggles for improvements will remain on the same level of cyclic changes that only revolve around the real issues unless we adjust the private fantasies of ambition (right) and the public fantasies of ambition (left) to the continuing and immediate human realities and needs (as well as greeds). Struggle within as well as struggle without.

For example, should editors see themselves as having special duties? or, special privileges? When someone wants to do something differently than the way an editor feels it should be, what should be the criteria to decide? Is there value in doing something differently precisely because it alternates from what is popular with an editor? or should an editor be free to suppress work for reasons other than space? Beyond that there is the aching question of "if there really must be editors (also an open issue) who will "edit" the editors?"

It should be pointed out here, and emphasized, that this his particular role

It should be noted that exhaustion, doubt and inefficiency are very much a contemporary experience as roles and identities are restructured (as McLuhan points out with a thousand others). There are some ultimate questions being asked and the existing and often rapidly polarized dogmas are not an answer, but rather an aspect of the problem.

I find the experience slightly incredible to be told that "well . . . sometimes you just have to accept things as they are . . ." and again, "you're just meddling," when an effort is made to initiate discussion on obvious mistakes made by people I consider as basically human and friendly. There is something unreal about hearing someone you know personally, tell you the stereotype line that all kinds of entrenched bastards have used to ignore, dismiss and otherwise generally repress struggles against injustice. Most also suffer from the illusion that it is only things "out there", that is, anything except what they personally do, that is the cause of regression in general.

If the habit of accounting and setting in order the fact of our experiences privately and with those we know is not developed, when it comes to actually confronting a major issue (public or private) we will have no real integrity to work with and will react automatically and mechanically, atically by individuals and established group structures beginning with government and ending at your personal door (you may lose your job and your identity!)

The sugar prices might inflate, they may also drop, but it involves far more than that "point", yet that is the "point" at which most people quit thinking — we may eventually have to support some displaced garage attendants, but it wouldn't happen overnight, some would get other work, besides which the energy cell operates on gasoline as well! But more important it would simplify and increase the value of the cars we use while simultaneously reducing their cost, noise and waste and eliminating their exhaust.

Governments, corporations, Shell, General Motors, will change . . . if you want it, but not without struggle and conscious help. Think.

FULLER: First we must reorient our eons-long nervous reflex conditioning. It is not strange that we are so negative-minded regarding man's potential behaviour on earth. He has, up to this century a 1 in 100 chance of economic success. It is logical that we think of unemployment as a negative, rather than realizing it is signaling that society now has the ability to free people from the necessity of demonstrating their right to live by gaining and holding employment."

in risky ventures. Also, the Gains tax will not change the average rate of return on any asset, and if the risk involves something other than Capital Gains, the White Paper will not affect it.

Will foreign investment be slowed down by the new proposals? The major effect of the White Paper in this area would be to reduce the advantages to people operating in tax — haven countries — in other words, one of the favorite "tax avoidance schemes" of the rich would be reduced in effectiveness. Major investing countries — if their money were deemed necessary for Canada — could be joined to Canada by tax treaties: they would retain some or all of the present advantageous system.

An interesting point: Why mention the Estate tax in the ad? The White Paper doesn't propose any changes in this area: Major revisions were effected last spring. Further, why would the Gains tax cause people "with modest wealth" to leave the country — especially when the proposed tax is the same as that of the logical receiver country, the U.S.? They tax 25 per cent on realized total gains; the White Paper would tax 50 per cent of 50 per cent of capital gains, for an effective rate of 25 per cent. The only problem here is the proposed accrual taxation of stock gains — but Mr. Benson has stated that he will revise this.

The point that the cost of money will rise as capital leaves the country rests on the somewhat dubious assumption that the capital will in fact, leave. This is a case of building shaky walls on shakier foundations.

Per George Orwell's "1984", government control of assets can only be expanded at the same rate as tax revenues. Under the White Paper, total tax revenues will rise by 1.5 per cent, which is a somewhat marginal change. This figure has been widely criticized as grossly underestimating tax revenue increases. Even if it is one tenth of the true one, a rise in gross tax revenues of 15 per cent is hardly Orwellian. And once again, we know nothing about the disposition of these taxes.

The "group" stated that they supported the objectives of the White Paper — making the Canadian tax system more equitable. In the above paper, we have shown the group's objectives to be not only misleading in themselves, but also inconsistent with these overall goals. It is typical of objections to the White Paper coming from interest groups that they disguise their self interests in the furor of pious concern for the country as a whole.

For further confirmation of fact, do not write Colin Brown — look it up yourself.

SAC firm in discipline dispute

Art Moses is a third year arts student in UC. He is chairman of the SAC Judicial Committee.

by Art Moses

The SAC general meeting last Wednesday stuck to SAC's original position, and appointed 20 students from which 6 would be drawn by lot for a proposed interim university disciplinary committee.

The SAC proposal was rejected by the ATS when first suggested last fall, and most Council reps doubted that ATS reaction following the appointments would be different.

The conflict arose during discussions in President Bissell's office in the fall between representatives of SAC, GSU, Part Time Students Association and the ATS. Consensus was reached on the composition of an interim staff-student discipline committee pending implementation of the Campbell Report. The committee would consist of 10 faculty and 10 students (6 SAC, 3 GSU, and 1 part time.)

The breakdown occurred over how the members of that committee should be chosen.

SAC felt they should be directly appointed by the relevant organizations, since the body would make rules as well as adjudicate them, and any disciplinary action it took would be, in effect, a precedent affecting the future of the university.

ATS PROPOSAL STANDS

The ATS position was that members must be drawn by lot from the entire student and faculty bodies to avoid political bias.

There is now no legitimate rule-making body in this university. And there won't be such a legislative body to guide any judiciary until action is taken on a new governing council to replace the Board of Governors.

Given the necessity for the interim disciplinary body to be legislative and political as well as judicial, the ATS position was clearly unacceptable.

SAC, however, did proceed along the lines of a compromise suggested in the fall meetings by Pres. Bissell. The SAC Judicial Committee which included SAC Pres. Gus Abols unanimously selected 20 students earlier this month from 39 applicants. That selection was ratified by council Wednesday.

ALTERNATIVES INADEQUATE

Representatives realized they were, in effect, opposing the several alternative suggestions recently discussed by the Campbell Programming and Implementation Committee.

(One such proposal suggested the interim committee consist of the SAC, GSU, APUDS, ATS presidents along with the Deans of Arts and Law. Claude Bissell would be non-voting chairman. It would place tremendous power in the hands of six already powerful individuals.)

It was clear SAC's action Wednesday might prevent any new disciplinary body being established before action is taken on a new governing council and on the Campbell Report recommendations.

JUSTIFIED BY IMPLICATIONS

But the implications of such a body at this time justify that decision:

- Any new disciplinary body with legislative-judicial powers, with the appearance of more "representativeness" than the present Caput, would significantly lessen the pressure on the university community to establish a new governing council to replace the Board of Governors.

- It would also remove some of the impetus for general legislative reforms in departments and faculties.

- By reforming its top disciplinary structure, the university would be removing the immediate necessity for implementing the Campbell report recommendations, calling for mediation of disputes in classrooms and departments by structures set up for that purpose.

- By establishing a centralized judicial-political body before major reforms at the departmental level, we would be undermining the spirit of both CUG and Campbell reports which argue that power must be decentralized and dispersed throughout the university.

- The existence of this "interim" disciplinary body before the Campbell recommendations are implemented would lift the constraints presently on members of the university community to settle disputes through mediation at the lower levels.

COULD HINDER REFORM

Setting up a more legitimate disciplinary body at this time poses serious difficulties for prospects of reform at this university.

As SAC members felt Wednesday, an interim disciplinary committee is something that students should not help set up unless they are convinced it is really satisfactory. Given that SAC had already compromised its original position, the Council was justified in reiterating its stand.

SAC is not opposing establishment of a legitimate disciplinary body in the university. It is saying, given the absence of legislative reform, top level disciplinary changes will have to conform very closely to its own proposal.

For the same reason, the ATS is saying roughly the same thing about their stand. Hopefully out of this apparent deadlock will emerge new steps toward general reform in university decision-making, along with quick implementation of the Campbell report.

Judges fail to show at Western gym meet

Saturday morning found University of Toronto Gymnastics Blues motoring to London, Ontario for an informal exhibition meet with Western and Waterloo. And informal was how it turned out, for it seems that the judges had neglected to show up.

So here were four coaches, representative of all three teams, holding a conference after each free exercise routine to decide upon its merits. Toronto coach Julio Roncon, who has been a qualified International judge, was presiding. Following the routine of Toronto's Phil Michaelis, he asked the other three if they had noticed anything particularly difficult in it. "No," suggested one, "but I thought that the two front flips in a row was a bit repetitious."

Gymnastics experts will know that two front flips in a row is a very difficult movement to execute and is rated at the C (most difficult) level. But the meet's atmosphere was quite congenial, and when coach Roncon had finished explaining the feat of Phil's front flips to the other coaches, they agreed to award 7.3 points, good for second spot just 0.1 behind teammate Al Forest.

Fortunately, it was a good afternoon for a friendly, informal sort of competition from Toronto's standpoint. When John Kortright could not make the trip, the Blues found themselves with only one of their potential three top all-round competitors. Furthermore, they were short in a number of routines. In gymnastics, the scores of the top three routines for a team on each event count towards that team's total score. Having less than three on any event in a sport where tenths of a point are precious is usually equivalent to losing the meet before it begins. Toronto had only two competitors on rings and high bar. It is not surprising that they ended up dropping the meet to the home side. (Waterloo, with its two-man team halved by an injury during the warm-up, did not get a team score.)

Individually, Al Forest had a fine day, combining thirds on rings, parallel bars, and high bar with a second in vaulting and a first in free exercise to finish third in the standings.

Gary Wicks competed all-round for the first time, and was a commendable fourth. On single events, he placed fourth in rings and parallel bars, and third on pommel horse. Arthur Stein trailed him in fourth spot on the latter event. Phil Michaelis, who had passed the warm-up trying to sew the split in his gymnastics slippers because his girlfriend's nimble fingers had been left at home, added a fourth place vault to his second place free exercise routine.

The meet was very valuable as the Toronto gymnasts performed before the largest, most enthusiastic crowd they have yet seen. It also gave them a badly needed third workout for the week. This department's continuing poll still shows the Blues far out in front in the race for the title of most underpractised team in the league.

Swimmers drown Queens'

For Blues, it was six for six, as they defeated Queens at Hart House on Saturday afternoon.

The 67-24 score is in no way indicative of the Toronto strength or Queens weakness. Half a dozen Toronto swimmers were given the weekend off to allow others to experiment with a third event. The swimmers came through and the meet was a success.

As the OQAA Championships draw near, swimmers take every opportunity to try new approaches to their race. Freestylers John Twohig and Terry Bryon certainly took advantage by turning in seasons best times in the 200 and 500 freestyle events respectively.

Other event winners for Toronto were Adam Gesing (1000 Free), Jim Shaw (200 Fly), Don Carr (200 Back) and Morris Vaillancourt (200 Breast). Toronto also won both Medley and Free relays. For Queens, Rob Herman won the 200 I.M. and 100 Free.

Each week, dual meet results, from across the country are tabulated and are printed out in the form of the top 15 swimmers in each event. Toronto swimmers are high on the list in almost every event. As of Thursday Jan. 22, Toronto was first in the following events: 200 Back (Jim Shaw),

200 Fly (Jim Shaw), 50 Free (Theo Van Ryn), 200 Free (Mike Guinness), 500 Free (Mike Guinness), 1000 Free (Mike Guinness), and 200 I.M. (Jim Shaw). In the other events: Barry Bowerman 200

Breast (Third) and Doug MacIntosh 100 Free (Third). For those who are interested, complete copies of the top 15 are available in Hart House.

For Blues, Saturday Jan. 31 is the big swimming weekend. Toronto will host Oswego State in a dual meet at 2 p.m. and McGill at 8 p.m. McGill finished second behind Toronto by six points at last year's National Championships and are strong again this year.

Skiers sweep tourney

A consistent Alpine team and a strong Nordic team joined forces to defeat Queen's University by a narrow margin in Ottawa this weekend and the Carleton Invitational Ski meet for the first time.

The meet, in which eight teams competed, also marked the first victory for a Varsity ski team in intercollegiate competition since 1957.

Bill Beck is the coach of the current team.

In the Alpine events, Varsity placed second in the Slalom to Queen's and fourth in the Giant-Slalom to finish second overall.

The Nordic skiers won the Jumping event convincingly, but were edged by Queen's in the 10 km. Cross-Country race.

Curtis Eastmure was the strong-man in the Alpine events placing 7th in the combined. Robin Philpot finished 9th and Peter Boyd was 11th.

In the Nordic events, Per Furst placed second in the Cross-Country and Jumping to win the individual Nordic Title. Varsity made it a clean sweep of the Jumping event as Jukka Heikurinen came second and Rein Brand was third.

Other team members who competed at Ottawa were Brian McMillan and Bob Colquhoun in the Alpine and Bill Glover and Keijo Laine in the Nordic.

To provide some lighter moments, Colquhoun brought along his bagpipes and kept the team entertained with his many lively renditions.

Cornell edges Blues 2-1 in thriller

B-Ball squad succumbs to Guelph

By PETER WHITE

Another chapter in the continuing story of lost Varsity basketball respectability was written Saturday afternoon as Toronto's lonesome Blues were first chewed up and then spit back out by the Gryphons' of Guelph 90-54.

For the crowd (a so-called cast of 51 who witnessed the opening tip) there was little to do but dig in on the old textbooks, now a standard procedure for the "regulars" during extravaganzas of the sort witnessed Saturday. To those frustrated basketball buffs who feel cheated this season may I advise that New II will provide you with thrills equal to any you may have missed Saturday.

How, you ask, can a team, from this school yet, lose by 36 points to an opponent which last season won but one game and were themselves bombed on Wednesday night. Shooting stats tell part of the woesome tale. Blues hit a paltry 21.9 per cent for the game, including a second half run of 17.5 per cent. Many of those lost bombs were thrown up from ridiculous angles which even a St. Bob could not be expected to make.

Things were so bad in fact that it was not until Angus Braid made a lay-up at the four-teen minute mark that Blues made two from the floor in the second half, making the score at that stage 54-29.

Guelph, on the other hand, hit an outstanding 50.9 per cent. Many of their points were made on clear shots to the hoop as Varsity defenders, scattered in various disarray, struggled to catch the faster Gryphons.

Saturday's game confirmed what has been suspected for a long time. This year's Blues not only lack speed but border on flatfootedness. Guelph, with a one-and-three record coming into the game, proved to be a well-drilled team which runs adeptly and executes with an enthusiasm and efficiency which could certainly inspire jealousy from Varsity ballers. Guelph's performance here is just an example of the mounting hopelessness of the Varsity basketball situation at all levels of jurisdiction.

Players are quick to admit that they prefer playing on the road where a crowd of several thousand can be expected and for whom they can "get up." The only enthusiasm generated Saturday was the bell ringing of some little kid who in his blessed innocence remained oblivious to the murder being perpetrated down the court.

Blues this season just don't have it. The reasons lie much deeper than a mere lack of talent. There seems little that Coach John McManus and his players can do about the dilemma in which they find themselves enveloped. The athletic department should wake up to the fact that if you let what will be — be — you'll wind up in the ash can — a place only slightly more depressing than the York gym Saturday afternoon.

The corridor outside the Cornell dressing room was jammed with fans fighting their way out of Varsity Arena and old acquaintances pushing through the mob to congratulate Big Red coach Ned Harkness.

Inside the small, cramped suite allotted to visitors the team from Ithaca, N.Y., all but two of them Canadians, stripped off their sweetie armor and took long swigs from green soft drink bottles, secure in the knowledge that their unbeaten season had been extended to 13 games.

"That's the best team we've played," Harkness was saying. "It's a tremendously coached club."

Across the arena, the Varsity Blues relatively push quarters were silent. The players showered and dressed quickly, quietly, and slipped out one by one. When most had left, assistant captain John Wright was still sitting in his complete uniform, staring at his skates.

"I still think we're a better team than they are," he said quietly. "But whose going to believe that now?"

By JIM COWAN

A goal early in the third period proved to be the winner Saturday night as Cornell University's Big Red hockey team fought off a determined Varsity Blues squad and hung on for a 2-1 victory.

The exhibition game was the third time the two teams have met, and the U.S. team emerged with an unblemished record. It was undoubtedly the best game Varsity fans have seen this year.

Blues took off from the opening faceoff, checking the Cornell forwards in their own end and standing up at the blue line to repeatedly break up Big Red rushes. Varsity's stiff checking and the Canadian style of play which allows greater bodily contact seemed to throw the visitors off balance, and Blues outshot them 15-6 in that period.

But it was Cornell that opened the scoring at 13:58. With Garth Ryan off for elbowing, Blues power play was pressing around goalie Brian Cropper. Then a pass from behind the net went wide and was snatched off by Gordon Lowe, who carried into Blues end before throwing a pass over to Kevin Pettit, who scored.

But Blues stormed back and at 17:30 Paul Laurent completed a good passing play from Nick Holmes and Dave McDowall by blasting a low shot past Cropper.

Blues generally held the edge in the first two periods and Cropper played great goal to keep the score tied. The second period in particular was a nailbiter dual, as Cropper made spectacular saves on Dave Field, Laurent and a half dozen other Blues, while at the other end rookie Grant Cole coolly picked one shot off Dick Bertrand's stick and blocked a pointblank drive by Dan Lodboa. Blues were outshot 17-10 in the period, as both teams failed to score.

Perhaps the turning point came in the closing minutes of the second period when Blues, one man up after a penalty to Cornell's Pettit, were unable to muster an effective power play, and the two minutes passed with the Big Red team getting more good chances than did Blues.

At any rate, Bertrand's goal at 1:15 of the third settled the matter, for with both teams growing tired, it was easier for Cornell to

CLM charges GSU with political discrimination

By LIZ WILLYCK

The Graduate Students' Union Senior Executive took a trouncing at the General Meeting Monday afternoon at 16 Bancroft St.

A 25-minute agenda debate and continuous procedural squabbles over the regular business of the GSU preceded the main point of contention — charges by the Canadian Liberation Movement of political discrimination in the use of GSU facilities.

A motion of censure against Phillip Wulfs, GSU employee and non-elected voting member of the executive was proposed by Gail Dexter, (SGS), a CLM member.

Miss Dexter charged that Wulfs had taken it on his own authority as employee to bar the CLM from use of GSU facilities. She said that two CLM members had begun to run off a leaflet on Friday night. They were evicted from the building.

Michael Vaughan GSU president said that the two people had refused to identify themselves, and that when the campus police were called in, the affair was settled amicably and the two left.

NO RESERVATION

Mr. Wulfs objected to the charges on the ground that the CLM had made no reservation for the facilities. He also did not consider the group a graduate organization. After the meeting, Miss Dexter explained that there are 17 graduate CLM members, two-thirds of the organization.

Miss Dexter, he said, had phoned before her arrival. He denied the CLM the use of the gestetner "in my capacity as watchman."

He then received a call from Mrs. Marjaleena Repo, organizer for the GSU. He hung up when she became "rather abusive".

Michael Vaughan, GSU President

Miss Barbara Smith, executive assistant to the Graduate Students' Union yesterday resigned her position.

She said that events over the past weekend involving denial of facilities to the Canadian Liberation Movement, and subsequent charges of political discrimination, had been difficult.

Yesterday, GSU President Michael Vaughan accused her "on information from 'a reliable source' of phoning people" to pack the general meeting on Monday. "I hadn't been," said Miss Smith.

She also cited "general dissatisfaction with some members of the executive".

Miss Smith has been working for the GSU for two years, and many members feel that she virtually runs the office.

Although she was under contract for her first year, this year's executive did not renew it. Both she and organizer Marjaleena Repo are paid by the month.

"I knew Repo would open the door for them, so I removed the machine." Mrs. Repo arrived with Miss Dexter and two other CLM members, and found the Gestetner missing.

Wulfs went on to say that Mrs. Repo then entered his office and grabbed a book and "the notes of an essay I had been working on for six weeks" and walked out with them. He went back to the office and retrieved the items from the president's desk. Then, he said, Mrs. Repo "with that fine handbag of hers, hit me on this side of my face."

DOORBASHER?

He also said that one of the men "a tall, bearded fellow" said "you're going to give me the machine or I'll bash in every door in the building."

At this point, Wulfs left the building and returned with two campus policemen. A phone-call to GSU treasurer Eddie Wein gave post facto authorization to the action. Police took down the names of those involved, and everyone left.

Mr. Steve Moore (SGS), charged that there were no previous policy rules which could exclude the CLM — "except the rules in your head".

Mr. Vaughan suggested that the matter be tabled pending executive investigation. Someone near the back called out "Whitewash".

From the back row, Wulfs mumbled "This meeting is a sham anyway — you people are pigs."

QUORUM CALL

A quorum call indicated about 30 members present. 25 voting members — out of a possible 6,310 — represent a quorum.

As the chairman coughed and hesitated over the reading of the motion, Wulfs walked out followed by secretary Charles Zabrowski and two others. One stopped in the doorway to call to Vaughan. "Mike, Mike — get out here — there won't be a quorum." Mike obliged, and Treasurer, Ed. Wein called for a quorum count.

Immediately, several people were on their feet yelling "Get back here Vaughan. What are you being paid for?"

Vaughan then hovered in the doorway as a second quorum count was taken. Exactly 25 voting members were present.

Zabrowski stormed back in shouting, "I'd like to see everyone's ATL card." It was pointed out that all cards had been checked at the door before he arrived.

Members by now were heatedly demanding that the chairman call for a vote. The motion of censure passed overwhelmingly. The meeting was adjourned, leaving half the agenda untouched.

EXEC DEFEATED

A motion was also passed, reversing a previous executive decision that all charges for GSU facilities be dropped except for clean-up and breakage. Another granted any graduate student the right to use the gestetner facilities with payment for paper and ink.

Members defeated an agenda change for approval of the president's report and approved a grant of $1,000 to the Community Co-op Day Care Centre, which the executive had previously defeated.

Vaughan later said that "the meeting seemed to be fairly well packed". Miss Dexter replied, "If the conservative voice doesn't have a great enough interest, then that is a problem. If a wrong has been committed, then naturally progressive people will turn out to fight for their rights."

Challenged on his condoning of the quorum-breaking tactic (also used by the conservative element of the SAC), Vaughan fairly shouted at the reporter, "Look at that meeting. That was not participatory democracy, lady. Do you want a mass meeting to determine cases of personal discipline? I can't accept that."

"I'm not going to stay and participate in a discipline decision made by 30 people."

"I'm calling a general meeting three weeks from today" he announced.

Students to strike over residence rules

FREDERICTON (CUP) — Students at St. Thomas University here have told their administration to abolish curfews and visiting regulations for residence students, or face a student strike by Feb. 1.

The student ultimatum was unanimously passed at a Jan. 19 general meeting by one-third of St. Thomas' 900 students; the move followed a year of negotiation with the Roman Catholic administration over residence rules.

Students are demanding that administration president Donald Duffie set up a student-faculty-administration committee to work out details of a new policy no later than the beginning of the next academic year.

If the administration refuses, students will call a general strike Feb. 1. Plans for further action have not been worked out.

A brief outlining suggestions for a new residence policy was presented by the St. Thomas student council to the executive of the board of governors last December. The executive refused to vote on the issue, stating that open rooms were "an internal matter;" the final decision resting with Duffie.

St. Thomas is the third Roman Catholic university in the Maritimes where administrators have come into conflict with students over residence regulations.

Students at St. Francis Xavier University at Antigonish, N.S., unilaterally opened their residences October 22, 1969; students at St. Mary's University at Halifax incurred administration wrath when they attempted the same action in November.

The St. Mary's administration invoked new, harsher penalties for violating residence regulations, and posted security guards at residence doors.

"Pageants objectify women"

By BEV DILLON

Waterloo University had better look out because Simon Fraser's delegate to the Miss Canadian University pageant is a protest candidate, Janiel Jolly, also a staunch member of the Women's Liberation Movement in Vancouver.

Although she has been rejected as a candidate, Miss Jolly is going anyway with as many supporters as she can find to create as much disturbance as she can in the interests of women's liberation.

Speaking to an audience of about 30 (one-third of whom were men), Miss Jolly outlined her reasons for both feeling so strongly about women's oppression and for choosing the pageant as the stage to publicize her cause.

"Women all over the country are coming together against the oppression that beauty contests represent, she said. "We understand the pressures on women that make them want to be more desirable sexual commodities. But beauty contests are a degrading embarrassing experience, and the tears cried at the end are tears of sheer frustration."

Commenting on the fact that achievement figures for women drop drastically in high school she said "It really amazes me that women learn so late that they're supposed to be stupid."

Women are not the happy, contented lot that this society makes them out to be, according to Miss Jolly. She says "Ninety per cent of all sleeping pills and barbituates are sold to women." The problem as she sees it is that "women want to define themselves in terms of the men they associate with. They don't have a sense of identity of their own."

Capitalism is the root of this evil, says Miss Jolly. Women are encouraged through advertising to accept a superficial image of themselves. Women (and men) are encouraged to believe that beauty is a very physical thing and that the more make-up she wears, the more beautiful she is.

As far as Miss Jolly is concerned, this idea of beauty is propagated by profit-seeking make-up companies who can make a lot of money off vain women. "Women are being economically used," she exclaimed. "More than two million tubes of make-up are sold each week."

Miss Jolly's plan is to go to the pageant and talk to the contestants "in the spirit of friendship and solidarity, not competition." She wants to convince them that what they are doing is degrading and that they are being treated as objects. Hopefully she can persuade them to withdraw from the contest in support of the cause.

Miss Jolly is not alone in her mission — she has an escort. Nick De Carlo, an engineering graduate from the U of T, is going along to talk to the "plastic men" in the dorms who are escorting the other contestants, to try and persuade them to join the cause as well.

In any event Miss Jolly is going to the pageant to create a disturbance. She hopes to have the support of the press and she will not wear a bathing suit.

Kameny: What makes a homosexual?

By MARK WILSON

"Most men are girl watchers, some are boy watchers, some are both, some neither. It's just society that makes a miserable fuss about it all."

Thus spoke Dr. Franklin Kameny, founder of the Washington Mattachine Society and spokesman for the homosexuals of America in a lecture here Thursday. He proceeded to demolish many pet theories and superstitions about homosexuality.

He first attacked the new high priests, the psychiatrists, "the so-called experts on homosexuality." He contended that the psychiatrist never sees "the average untroubled homosexual" and that any conclusions drawn about homosexuals in general were based on a small unrepresentative sample of the homosexual population.

He then stated that both heterosexuality and homosexuality were the result of many subtle factors occurring early in life and that "until we know what makes a heterosexual, we won't know what makes a homosexual."

Dr. Kameny himself was unconcerned about the causes of homosexuality saying "I don't give a damn why I like men, I just go out and enjoy them."

Dr. Kameny compared the repression of the homosexual to the discrimination against the Negro and stated that "the only two major countries with laws against homosexuality are those two vanguards of enlightenment the US and Russia".

Commenting on the new militancy of the homosexuals he said that "like any oppressed group we've developed our militant wing" who recently have integrated heterosexual dances at Columbia, picketed employers who discriminate against homosexuals, occupied the mayor's office in San Francisco and rioted in New York.

He said that the June 28 Greenwich Village riots "are going to replace the Fourth of July in the homosexual calendar".

Dr. Kameny was questioned several times about the "naturalness" of homosexuality. In reply he stated that "every act you do from getting up in the morning to going to bed at night, from eating your food cooked, to clothing your body in wool and man-made fibres is unnatural."

When asked about the promiscuity of homosexual relationships Dr. Kameny said that a different tradition had grown up in the homosexual world and that "homosexuals often start with a sexual relationship which develops into a loving relationship, but with heterosexuals it's vice versa."

He also stated that heterosexual relationships have many safe guards built in by society, such as marriage, which the homosexual lacks.

He said that the "gay effeminacy homosexual" is a small minority group, mostly young homosexuals who had not yet freed themselves from the stereotype imposed by society.

FBI, narcs unaffected by pay cut

Washington (CUP LNS) — US justice department employees will not be affected by the recent 10 per cent reduction in American government employees overseas.

The department argued successfully that foreign-based FBI and narcotics agents were essential for "adequate coverage of major cases such as the identification, apprehension and extradition of the assassin of Martin Luther King."

They also contended foreign contacts by representatives of the Black Panther Party "pose a serious threat to our government and demand immediate attention."

The decision of the justice department means foreign FBI agents will join Peace Corps volunteers on the unrestricted list. The Peace Corps will work in the dwindling number of countries that will still accept them.

CONGRATULATIONS!

you and 68,000 others graduate this spring got a job?

by D. B. Scott

D. B. Scott is editor of The Gazette of the University of Western Ontario. Scott did a quick investigation into the latest enterprise of Matthew Hudson knowing from previous experience that most of Hudson's ventures are not in the student's interests.

When it comes to looking for a job, especially when faced with the grosser, cattle-auction aspects of job interviews, most of the students who'll graduate this Spring would welcome someone paying their way to that "good job with more pay".

And it was inevitable that some entrepreneur would see the endless commercial possibilities of taking the worry out of being hired.

The entrepreneur in this case is Matthew Hudson, a wheeler-dealer lawyer not unfamiliar with making a buck out of the student market.

And his scheme to take advantage of those commercial possibilities is Career Assessment Ltd., a computerized job placement service with a difference.

The difference is the setup, of the Company and of the customer (read product).

Quite simply, Career Assessment Ltd. combines the collation abilities of computer technology with the results of behavioural studies to come up with a new way of matching job hunters with employers.

"It will compare," a press release from the company says, "what the students have to offer with the employee characteristics sought by various companies in hiring staff."

For the student taking advantage of the company's service all that's required is five dollars and an hour or so of his time.

He picks up a Biographical Inventory Blank and fills in the required information. The Blank and its instructions, according to promotional literature, will be available in most college bookstores, or by sending a cheque or money order to the company's Toronto headquarters.

The information provided on the BIB is stored and sorted by computer facilities of the Multiple Access General Computer Corporation, located in Don Mills, Ontario.

The interpreted result of the questionnaire is sent to students in the form of a "personal counselling report." Career Assessment says this report should tell the student which areas of work he is best suited for.

The principle behind the BIB works this way according to a CA producer: "The reasonable and basic assumption behind the work in the field of "biodata" is that people will most often behave in the future as they have behaved in the past. It treats the person as an individual, based on his unique life history antecedents but is related to the social milieu in which he exists".

The fee paid by students goes, not to Career Assessments Ltd. but to the Human Studies Foundation, "a non-profit, Canadian institution being set up to further research into human resources, their allocation and use."

If all the money for the BIB's goes to the Human Studies Foundation, where does the profit of Career Assessment come in?

From the employers.

For getting a selection service performed by CA, employers pay a minimum fee of $500 to get several suitable candidates to fill two job vacancies, plus 5 per cent of the first year's salary of the persons hired.

If an additional employee is needed he can be provided for $300 plus 5 per cent.

By the end of the first year of operation, CA expects to have data on about 5,000 students to fit the requirements of companies during the first trial period.

The data is extensive, running to 550 multiple-choice items on the BIB relating to every aspect of an applicant's past life. That data, combined with the "empirical keys" developed by the Foundation, using past research results, forms the backbone of Career Assessment's product.

Career Assessment's president, Matt Hudson, is a long-time student of the art of student marketing, although not a very successful one.

While at Queen's University in law, he was involved in an organization called Mr. Campus. It sold national and local advertising for desk blotters to be distributed on campus and for some time raised charter overseas flights.

Contrary to quite a few federal laws, Mr.

Campus sold flights to Europe and Jamaica even though they were declared uncharter-worthy by the Canadian government. To get around this, they continued to solicit passengers, but routed them through other charter groups, also an illegal arrangement.

He was also involved in an abortive attempt to set up a national advertising scheme. According to Hudson, he was approached by a number of university newspapers to pilot the scheme, but pulled out when he encountered stiff opposition, notably from Canadian University Press and its president, Stewart Saxe.

Saxe said Hudson had too little know-how, too few backers and was starting too late for the scheme to be viable.

The set up and sales techniques in Career Assessment and associated companies is far more sophisticated, than in his previous ventures.

Career Assessment has nine members on its board of directors. Hudson is president, James Hinckling (listed as "one of Canada's foremost industrial psychologists") is vice-president and Mr. George Elliot (a Toronto lawyer) is secretary treasurer.

Multiple Access General Computer Corporation's vice-presidents of finance and marketing respectively, Harold Andrews and C. J. Kurtz, are directors as are the two psychologists in charge of the Human Studies Foundation, Dr. Edwin R. Henry and Dr. William Owens.

The staff psychologists are both from the U.S. Dr. Henry is described as semi-retired, formerly chairman of the Department of Psychology of New York University, Director of Social Science Research for Standard Oil of New Jersey and Director of Selection of the Peace Corps.

Dr. Owens, presently at the University of Georgia as a Professor and Director of "Psychometric Laboratory", is said in promotion literature, to be President of the Division of Industrial Psychology of the American Psychological Association.

None of the other "eminent psychologists" described by Hudson as working under Messrs. Owens and Henry are named.

Hudson said the other two directors haven't yet been named, but said they would be representatives of two groups of shareholders. When asked if there were any large shareholders he refused to say but did say "I can tell you this, the company is 98 per cent Canadian-owned."

He said both the corporation (Career Assessment) and the Human Studies Foundation started at the same time (1969) but legally, the Corporation began first.

"In terms of concept, they came together," he said.

"The concept is really one of research — there's going to have to be an awful lot of research done if this placement idea is to get better. But a research foundation doesn't happen to pay its own way so we're going to have to get donations from corporations and the government."

Hudson refused to name any trustees of the foundation, saying that they were just at the stage of asking people if they would consider joining the organization.

But in promotional literature sent to bookstores, the sales pitch was made in the name of the foundation.

From the letter: "The trustees of the Foundation have decided to make use of on-campus bookstores as distribution points for the Biographical Inventory Blank."

But the Western bookstore manager D. R. Mason told the Foundation not to bother sending the unwanted and unordered BIB's and denied use of the bookstore name in any Career Assessment advertising. The letter sent by the organization took cooperation by bookstore authorities as a foregone conclusion, to the point of giving instructions on how to remit money when the BIB's arrived.

The technique used to get people to sign up for the scheme and to handle the BIB's for sale is typically high pressured. The student is told in an ad that he has less than one week to purchase, complete and mail the form if he or she doesn't want to miss out.

Similarly, the bookstore is told time is of the essence for students to benefit.

Hudson said CA would be providing some funds for the Foundation because the $5 BIB fee wouldn't cover even the processing of the form. But initially, he said, the Foundation hoped to get government grants to support the research.

The question of storage of statistical minutiae and the possible abuse that could be made of this information was "a very important ethical question" according to Hudson.

The Foundation will only use the information for research with permission, he said.

Permission, however, consists of signing a consent form contained in the initial BIB. If the consent form is signed, putting the data in a pool for channeling to prospective employers under the screening process, it also gives permission for use in the Foundation's research. So far the areas of research have only been defined as "human resources and their application".

An applicant can withdraw his data, according to Hudson, at any time with a letter to the Foundation.

Career Assessment Limited and the Human Studies Foundation leave a lot of questions unanswered.

Hudson and his firm are financially stable and Career Assessments is a registered corporation. The method of collecting the data and the setting up of the non-profit corporation is legal.

But no safeguards are made for the possible abuse of privileged information. And Matthew Hudson is not a man to instill a lot of confidence in the prospective applicant. Caveat emptore still prevails.

One thing you have to say for Hudson though. For a psychologist, he's a good capitalist.

Charles Fanning, U of T Bookstores manager has assured The Varsity that U of T Bookstores will not carry the Biographical Inventory Blanks (BIB).

"It seems to me its some sort of strange white slave market," he said.

The ads that appear saying you can pick up a blank at your bookstore are misleading although the organization is still trying to convince Fanning he should carry the BIB's.

Fanning said he would advise students to stay away from the forms.

UBC votes on voluntary union

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Students at the University of British Columbia will decide on voluntary membership in the Alma Mater (student) Society in a referendum February 4.

The vote was called for after a petition carrying 591 signatures was presented to the student council Monday night.

Only 500 signatories are needed under the AMS constitution to make a referendum necessary.

The referendum will ask students to vote "yes" or "no" on the question: "Are you in favour of the membership in and paying of fees to the Alma Mater Society being made voluntary?"

In order to pass, the referendum will need a "yes" vote by a two-thirds majority and a minimum turnout of 20 per cent of UBC's 19,695 undergraduate and 2,687 graduate AMS members.

LAST VOTE IN '18

The petition was presented to the council by arts student John Charington, a former president of the UBC Social Credit Club.

"We haven't had a vote on membership in the AMS for over 50 years," he said. The last similar vote was in 1918.

"Instead of the Board of Governors pushing through compulsory membership in the AMS annually," Charington asked the council, "why don't you let the students decide for once?"

Council President Fraser Hodge said the intent of the referendum would spell the death of the union.

"The principle of people working together in a student union was the idea of the founding of this body," Hodge said.

NO MORE FEES

"If the AMS was made voluntary, nobody would bother to give the $24 (the current AMS fee) at the beginning of the year."

The council voted 15 to 1 to go on record as opposing the voluntary union.

The UBC vote will be the fourth on voluntary unionism at a Canadian university in this academic year.

Similar referenda were defeated at the University of Calgary (October 27) and at Memorial University (October 29-30).

Students at the University of Guelph voted November 13 to retain a voluntary union. The Guelph vote was followed by an administration announcement that the university would no longer collect union fees if less than 50 per cent of registering students in January opted not to join.

The price of a curbside cup of coffee on St. George jumped 25 per cent this week.

Caterers are now selling hot coffee, in eight-ounce paper cups at a charge of 15 cents a cup. Previously coffee was sold in six-ounce cups at 10 cents each.

Financial analysts say the change represents a "hidden price increase" of 25 per cent.

Coffee is a mildly addictive brew native to Yuban, Ont.

For Michael:
It isn't nice to block the doorway,

There are nicer ways to do it
But the nice ways always fail
It isn't nice, it isn't nice,
But if that's freedom's price sung by Judy Collins

By LIZ WILKICK

How is it that this mythical creature called representative democracy continues to persist in the minds and hearts of people at this university?

If you've attended an SAC meeting all year, you understood the "If this is reported the way it happened, we'll all look like idiots" article.

And from a recent look at the other major student representative body on this campus, the Graduate Students' Union, it seems SAC's not alone. The GSU is no better and it's rapidly getting worse.

Union President Michael Vaughan is famous amongst radical student politicians on this campus for his ability to waffle for his "co-optability" potential.

HORSE AND BUGGY GSU

Craig McKie, elected social sciences rep to the GSU says "it's obvious that general meetings are beyond the intellectual capabilities of the executive. They don't understand that there are important political things going on in the world. They'd prefer to provide horse and buggy services for horse and buggy students. Vaughan and Zabrowski (the abrasive GSU secretary) can control the executive meetings but not a general meeting."

One executive priority is the renovation of the old GSU building to include dining lounge and bar facilities. Costs would be in the area of $95,000 with about $75,000 coming from the university. Given administrative priorities and their now legendary stall techniques over the Campus Centre question, one wonders in what sort of euphoric haze the executive is operating.

It is true that graduate enrolment has increased over the last few years to over 6,000 students, and the building certainly could stand renovation. But $95,000? And a bar?

Marjaleena Repo, employed by the union as GSU organizer, "states in her report, that the six senior executives, with the help of a chairman of their choice, are in a position to impose their wishes on the rest of the executive to the great detriment of the general membership."

Although Vaughan emphatically calls the organizers report "a pack of lies", the charges appear to have some foundation.

democratic

CENTRAL COMMITTEE

What McKie terms the "central committee" generally votes as a block and by and large does control executive policy. It consists of President Vaughan; Vice-President, Dennis Kennedy; secretary Charles Zabrowski; treasurer, Ed Wein; Past President, John Winter; and appointed chairman of the house committee, Phillip Wulfs.

The executive's proposed bylaws for the GSU were distributed Monday at the general meeting, without prior circulation (as required by the constitution) and placed on the agenda. Fortunately the item didn't come up.

Bylaw 15 states that "the President shall appoint the Treasurer, Secretary, and other voting representatives of the Executive committee (to a total of eight) from the departmental representatives of the General Council.

Only the President and Vice-President would then be elected to their key posts by the membership at large.

Bylaws 49 and 51 then provide that impeachment or censuring of the president would force the rest of the executive to resign as well. Which is a logical step if the executive is more representative of the president's political views than those of grad students at large.

CONSOLIDATION OF POWER

But it also means that the bureaucratic hassle of a complete executive changeover would constitute a pretty strong deterrent to such action being initiated.

How can that possibly provide greater "representivity" or increased control by student of their organization?

There are other questions to be raised about the efficiency and motivation of present executive members.

Speaking about the present treasurer, McKie says "Wein is only interested in making money. He doesn't like anything approved that spends it. He has money invested in General Motors 90-day notes."

Executive Assistant, Barbara Smith and Organizer Repo disagree with Wein's contention that the GSU has suffered a $700 loss on misuse of facilities, namely the Gestetner. Both are office workers who supervise the use of such facilities during the day. They deny that they have had any difficulty with people using the Gestetner and say that in his report Wein ignored stock-piled supplies and accounts receivable but not yet paid.

POLITICAL DISCRIMINATION?

Another odd spot is the position of Phil Wulfs, censured by the general meeting Monday for making an individual and unauthorized decision. Wulfs had barred the Canadian Liberation Movement from use of the Gestetner.

The general feeling of the meeting was summed up by Neil Keller, "The whole building belongs to the graduate students. They should all be allowed to use it."

or

Wulfs was defeated in an election last year for drama rep. He was appointed to the executive by Vaughan because he was involved with the St. George Dragon and had ideas for a music program.

Barbara Smith commented that "He really wanted to be on the executive and this was how he got on. He works Saturdays as night watchman and caretaker for the building. He gets $82 a month and is quite well paid because he doesn't really have to do anything."

McKie's word for it is "patronage."

POLITICAL MONOLITH

If Monday's meeting was any indication, the political monolith of the executive is not particularly representative.

A $1,000 grant was given to the Day Care Centre over a previous refusal by the executive. An executive ruling on charges for using the facilities was overturned. Permission to use the Gestetner was granted to any grad student over executive opposition.

The bureaucratic tendencies of what Mrs. Repo calls a "very legalistic and inflexible senior executive" also received a rap over the knuckles when members moved from the floor that departmental organizations be granted half their allotted per capita funds on application, by the recommendation of the Departmental Relations Committee and the organizer. This means that only half the funds would be dependent on executive approval of the legalistic adequacy of constitutions and budgets.

The thirty to fifty people at that meeting may not be a very adequate slice of the 6,000 graduate students at the U of T. But all of them, for varying reasons, were committed to fighting for control of their organization. They were not prepared to passively accept the rulings of the bureaucratic elite.

PARTICIPATORY DEMOCRACY

It may not look like much on the surface, but at least thirty people making decisions bear more resemblance to participatory democracy than six.

On Monday night, a meeting of the executive committee passed a motion that "any group, except course unions or college clubs with a purely graduate student membership, wishing to use the Gestetner machine must have recorded permission in each and every instance. This permission must be from the President, the Executive Assistant or the weekend supervisory personnel only and shall remain subject to the convenience of the executive committee."

autocratic?

Once again, the executive has stepped in to place their bureaucratic riders on the wishes of the general meeting. And once again, they will make the decisions about who uses what and when.

Michael Vaughan's plans for the GSU are based on "a concept of cabinet government to get a working committee that will work together and not fight among themselves. It would allow for decisive action."

Oh well, representative democracy, anyone?

The no-holiday holiday.

Come to Britain and it's no holiday. The moment you get off the plane you're involved.

Not like most vacations, peering in from the outside. In Britain you're part of the action. And it's some action! We've got the discotheques, Carnaby Street, Kings Road and all the other fast-moving places you've heard about.

But, what about the things we take for granted: sifting through the Van Gogh's, Picasso's or Henry Moore's at the Tate Gallery; an afternoon watching the world's top drivers hauling their big, blasting, Formula 1 machines over the toughest circuits in Europe. Seeing a Shakespearean play, the way it should be seen—at Stratford on Avon with British actors; or perhaps, passing a sunny day at Lords watching the natives play their native game of cricket?

You can mix in, find out what we're all about — why Trafalgar Square isn't as square as you might think and a boat down the Thames means a roaring party, not a sedate sightseeing expedition. In Britain, it's all go. So why not go?

You could make it for as little as $175, that's for 9 days, hotel and two big meals a day. And, if you belong to a club or any organised group, you could cut the total price way down with a charter flight. Clip the coupon and find out what's going.

Come and take part in Britain — this year!

8 hearty men wanted to lead expansion of renowned boys' school

You may have read about St. John's in WEEKEND, or seen CBC's penetrating documentary on this unique Winnipeg school, where encouragement to think comes first, where students (and teachers) learn to snowshoe up to 50 miles or paddle canoes up to 16 hours a day, retracing routes of the early explorers; where building men of character is the motivating challenge of a hearty staff.

Now a second St. John's has been established in Edmonton, and others will be opened across Canada to meet continent-wide applications for admission. To do this we need men of immense vision and courage. They should have at least one year of university, and be prepared to complete their degrees under Company direction; they should be prepared to work up to 80 hours a week, sometimes more, for a salary of $1 a day plus food, clothing, shelter and necessities for themselves and their families; they should like people, be able to think logically, use the English language effectively, laugh easily. They need not be Anglicans, but should be prepared to examine the Christian faith and reach honest conclusions. Interviews Jan. 27-Feb. 9. Write: Company of the Cross, c/o Anglican Church of Canada, 600 Jarvis Street, Toronto 5.

Present economic and political policies will destroy us

By KARL HAUENSTEIN

Unless steps are undertaken immediately, mankind will be all but obliterated in 15 years.

These ominous words were spoken by Dr. Kenneth Watts, Professor of ecology at the University of California as he addressed a standing-room only crowd in the Old Physics building last night.

Dr. Watts has done considerable research lately on the problems facing the survival of mankind.

According to Dr. Watts, the most pressing problem facing humanity is the rate of growth of population with respect to time.

As the rate of population increase grows, man's ability to grow food remains almost constant, upsetting the equilibrium of the system.

Another factor which remains constant is the amount of fuel available to man.

Dr. Watts predicts that the earth's supply of crude oil, a commodity on which all economic activity is based, will shortly be used up.

Thus man will be left without any supply of fuel, since the theory that nuclear fuel will sustain man's activities is a myth; as actual nuclear fuels are sufficient to last twenty years at the most.

The problem of land distribution is one which stems from the population rate increase.

As the population in a predominantly food-producing area rises, the area tends to become urbanized and food production is shifted to another area.

CITIES ON FARMLAND

Thus the absurd situation arises that the large cities are located on the land most suitable for agriculture and agriculture is carried on in generally less fertile areas.

This shift in location in food production also affects the necessary fuel consumption, since it follows that food must be shipped a greater distance to where it is needed and thus more fuel is consumed.

Watts sees the problems of pollution and resource exploitation as a direct effect of the economic and political thinking which dominates policy making.

He cited historical examples where the impending depletion of a resource has had the affect in every case that men have been only more wanton in their senseless waste of that commodity.

"There is nothing in economic theory that gives anyone any reason to save anything."

MOON BEFORE POLLUTION

The government's position on pollution is similar. People are more willing to spend millions of dollars on a venture to the moon, whose success is doubtful than to finance an inquiry into the effect of air pollution on the gradual chilling of our planet.

"The government is more willing to spend money to ruin the atmosphere rather than clean it up."

Any effective efforts to forestall the doom of the human race must be preceded by a drastic change in the system.

"In our free enterprise capitalist system, the main concern is capital. More concern for long ranging benefits must take priority over concern for short-term capital gains."

To illustrate this problem Dr. Watts gave the example of the expressway dilemma.

"Anyone who tells you that you solve the traffic volume problem by building expressways doesn't know what he is talking about."

"A rapid transit system can move 80 people in the same space that 2.6 people can be moved on a freeway."

Dr. Watts ended his lecture with a plea that people should become more involved in politics. "If we leave the problems facing man to be solved by the institutions, there is a better than average chance that they will never get solved."

Legislation to demand strict Arctic pollution controls

If the Canadian government has its way, American oil tankers using the Northwest Passage are going to have to carry very heavy insurance to clean up the pollution that would be caused by an oil disaster.

Speaking Thursday in a panel discussion at the Faculty of Law, Alan Beesley from the Canadian Department of External Affairs said that the government will be consistent on two principles: "encouragement of Arctic navigation with preservation of the "environmental and ecological" balance."

Since the breakdown of pollution in the Arctic takes a much longer time than it does anywhere else, the possibility of a serious oil disaster is posing some very real problems.

Donat Pharand, professor of International Law at the University of Ottawa, claimed that "The coastal state ought to be able to regulate passage of foreign ships to regulate pollution."

The general consensus of opinion was that Canada has sovereignty over the land in the Arctic but whether or not that sovereignty extends to the waters as well is another question. This immediately poses the problem of whether ice is land or water. As one member of the audience said, since ice flows in a circular direction around the North pole, it could be Russian ice one year and Canadian ice the next.

Dale Gibson, professor of Law at the University of Manitoba said "If there is no international law to protect us then we are obliged to establish national law to protect ourselves."

Cecil J. Olmstead Vice-President of Texaco Inc. countered that if Canada is going to start drawing base lines then can the U.S. do the same along it's Pacific coast.

Brock students withdraw from all university committees

Photographers! We're trying to establish a Varsity photographers' workshop. The idea is for photographers to get together now and then to discuss work that's gone into the paper and how to improve on it. It's a chance for people to learn and to help put some life into Varsity photo-journalism. Drop by the Varsity office this evening at 7 if you're interested.

ST CATHARINES (CUP) — Student representatives will no longer sit on university committees, the Brock University Student Council decided Monday night, since such participation cannot change the fundamental function of the university in this society.

The Council accepted the report of its Academic Affairs Commission which urged withdrawal on the grounds that student representation benefited the "few major industrialists in whose interests the system functions."

The resolution passed 7/5/2. A motion to submit the question to a referendum failed.

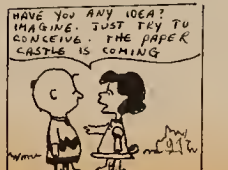

Patrick Beard, student union president, resigned immediately, saying he could not in good faith remain president since the resolution violated his principles. Internal vice-president Dan Bigger is now acting president.

The report says: "Any fundamental change within the system cannot be brought about without the support of the working class and only extra-parliamentary base-building can win support for such action."

The council motion pledges the union to challenge departments to allow students to engage in studies benefiting the people of the Niagara Peninsula, to challenge course content and to form interdisciplinary caucuses to relate course material to social conditions, to run education programs expanding on the analysis in the report, to work in the high schools, to publish regular community issues of the school paper and to support campus workers.

ion monster library stacks up (for 1972) callslip is on its way. When the book is located, the page places it on a special conveyor tray which takes the volume back to the student at the main desk downstairs.

Should the student "forget" to check out his book and attempt to take it out of the building, he will be stopped at the exterior doors by an electronic device which sounds in the presence of any unstamped library article.

The new building will be a refuge in more ways than one. Unlike the Sigmund Samuel Library whose employees were forced to return home when inside temperatures climbed past 90 degrees last summer, the Humanities Library will be completely air-conditioned. Particular attention will be paid to the Rare Book Wing where special heat, light and humidity controls will be rigidly enforced.

It is also hoped that the library will become a pleasant and relaxing study area. Noise is to be kept at a minimum in the central reading rooms by ample use of sound-absorbing carpets. In addition, 70 per cent of the main-floor walls will be made of tinted glass to avoid the blank windowless sterility of Sidney Smith Hall.

Even the shape of the building is a result of much detailed planning. "The triangular module, used in the library complex, was chosen as being the best solution for three basic planning problems", explains architect Andrew S. Mathers.

"Firstly, due to the need to accommodate 1,000 small offices or study carrels on the perimeter of the bookstack floors, a higher than normal ratio of wall perimeter to floor area was required. As a triangle produces about 16 per cent more perimeter than a square for a similar enclosed area, the triangular module satisfied the first requirement.

"Secondly, due to the immense size of the project, requiring a whole city block, the backside of a conventionally designed building would have become too overwhelming, thus creating second-class land adjacent to that side of the building. A triangular structure, however, tends to give equal emphasis to each of its sides, thereby minimizing the relative importance of a front or back elevation.

"Thirdly, due to the height and size of the building in relation to its neighbours, it was desirable to reduce the visible mass of the building as much as possible. The triangle accomplishes this admirably, even in perspective. Often only one side of the triangle can be seen at a time whereas two sides of a square or rectangle are usually visible when seen in perspective".

There will be a plaza around the perimeter of the entire complex, broken into small areas and delineated by short flights of steps which are required by the difference of six feet in elevation between Harbord and Sussex. The grounds in general will consist of a combination of grass, trees, broad steps, ramps and ramped sidewalks.

And that's what can be expected from the Humanities and Social Sciences Research Library. Do you still think there's nothing exciting going on behind that blue fence?

As it stands, the Humanities Library is not expected to grow beyond its projected floor area size of 1,015,070 square feet. Expansion can occur only to a very small degree below grade, and if overcrowding again takes place, another library building will have to be built.

When construction is finished there will be a mass transfer of books from all points on campus to the new library. In much the same way, many of the currently employed librarians will be "migrating" to their new headquarters. "Some new personnel will probably have to be hired", states Dr. Blackburn, "but not very many, as we are presently over-staffed. Some departments already have all the people they will ever need". As a result, the University has decided not to make provisions for additional parking on campus to go with the new building.

The library planners are especially proud of a new searching-checkout system which they are certain will move the books out at a much greater speed. A student's callslip is inserted into a pneumatic tube near the circulation desk and instantly zips up to one of the five major stack floors. At the same time, the librarian at the circulation desk rings a bell to let the page on the appropriate floor know a

By PHILIP RESNICK

PARIS, FRANCE — The wave of student revolts that has swept Europe, North America and Japan in recent years shows signs of subsiding.

Where there were tens of thousands in the streets of Paris and Berlin not so long ago, order reigns. International reaction, whether it bears the name of Nixon, Pompidou, or Brezhnev is, for the time being, firmly in control. Many who were militants or becoming so only yesterday have lost enthusiasm, dropped out, or gone to sulk in their respective sectarian tents.

Here and there a few revolts still flicker, some militants succeed momentarily in forging ties with striking workers, a rally or demonstration brings several hundred or 1,000 faithful together for a few hours. But no major breakthroughs take place; the revolutionary left seems to have lost the initiative; it is as though a new political ice age had descended and covered everything.

Or so it would seem at first sight. And so it has seemed in the past when a revolutionary upsurge has been stopped short, forcing those who felt a new world to be within their reach to eat instead the bitter fruit of prison, exile, or repression.

One can recall 1848 and the subsequent triumph of European reaction; or 1871 after the smashing of the Paris Commune and the decimation of the working class militants; or Russia after the defeat of the revolution of 1905.

The sense of let-down in a post-revolutionary situation is as great as the expectations which preceded. Only the most committed, the hardest, continue to work on in the knowledge that history has not ended nor the contradictions of capitalism disappeared; that somewhere in the future, perhaps sooner than expected, a new revolutionary situation will arise.

This is the stage a good deal of the student and revolutionary left is now at internationally. For as the novel of student-initiated revolt wears off; as the bourgeoisie, its mass-media, its police and its courts, at first prone to be somewhat tolerant towards its wayward youth, come to see in extra-parliamentary opposition a direct threat to its interest; as the left itself becomes aware that there are brick walls of power and domination in bourgeois society that will not crumble from one blow, a new phase begins.

Many, whose radical consciousness lasted only for an hour, disappear from the scene, but others, who were perhaps only left liberals (to use the Canadian vernacular) when they first revolted, are forced to recognize the bourgeois university or the branch plant economy as part of a system which will take years and quite probably decades to overthrow.

They begin to acquire a revolutionary (as opposed to radical) consciousness. They begin to see the need for concrete analysis of their political, economic and social situation, and for the ongoing struggles to transform it. And they recognize the need to put down roots among various sectors of advanced capitalist society — blue and white-collar workers, professionals and the poor — in order to attack the contradictions and the blights of capitalism. Blights exist in economic production and distribution of course; but also in the cultural educational, and sexual spheres; in the powerlessness people experience within almost all social institutions, and so on. In short, by a quite Hegelian cunning of reason, the periods when revolution appears at least probable can become a period of revolutionary maturing and consolidation.

That process, it seems to me, is now taking place on a general scale in Western societies. The revolutionary mole is busily boring underground, abandoning for the moment dreams of imminent upheaval, but laying the groundwork from which it can emerge again to attack the bourgeois world. To be sure, intelligent mole that he is, he tries to learn from past experience and has no intention of repeating past mistakes or simply copy-catting what revolutionary moles in other contexts have devised. Rather, through all the ideological banter and low-level activities which he now undertakes, he is slowly groping forward towards a new understanding of the conditions under which we live in an advanced capitalist society, and under which a revolutionary crisis can take place. This is where the problematic of revolution is situated today.

The immediate past has certain lessons for us. Thus, as the Days of May in France made clear, the attack on capitalism today takes place not only in the traditional industrial sectors, such as aviation and atomic energy, and among highly skilled and professional workers as well as the older proletariat.

Demands for workers' control in industry and qualitative change in relations of production are as important as an underlying theme of revolt as strictly quantitative demands for higher wages or reductions in the hours of work. Rejection of the manipulation by advertising, the mass media, and the parliamentary and state machine itself are another side of the demand for cultural liberation and direct control from below by the whole population over their society's direction. *

The wave of wildcat strikes which continues in Europe today, in smaller countries such as Belgium or Sweden, as well as in Germany, Italy, or England, is proof of a fundamental discontent with trade union bureaucracies, and through them, the complex capitalist system into which they are integrated.

The contradictions of technocracy and bureaucratization, far from disappearing will continue to develop hand in glove with advanced capitalism itself, laying the basis for future revolts. Similarly, in North America, imperialist exploitation of large parts of the world will continue to reap its harvest in forms not too different from the war in Vietnam, while in Canada, the multi-national corporation and the objective integration of the Canadian bourgeoisie with the American ruling class may provoke an anti-imperialist and anti-capitalist consciousness, not only in Quebec, but in English Canada as well.

An earlier past also has lessons for us. The whole history of repression by the bourgeoisie of socialist and working-class movements has tremendous importance in teaching us what we must expect and prepare against. The wholesale abandonment of revolutionary objectives by social democratic parties (and one must now include Western Communist Parties under the same rubric), is testament to the co-optative and integrative capacities of advanced capitalism, and of the need to foster an unmitigatingly extra-system, extra-parliamentary perspective in the revolutionary left that emerges.

...and for the future?

The degeneration of the Russian Revolution into a super-centralized bureaucratically-run system in which elementary democratic and socialist freedoms are absent, makes it necessary for us today to affirm a libertarian Marxism, not only against Stalinism, but against Leninism itself. **

For a revolutionary movement which does not incarnate the rich values of participation and control from the base, ie of social democracy, integral elements of the socialist movement from its earliest beginnings, will not take root in advanced capitalist societies and will deserve to fail.

It is the future, however, which is our most immediate concern, and here there are no simple guidelines. Our experience, particularly in a country such as Canada, is rudimentary in the extreme, and far more low-key struggle and base-building will be necessary before a mass revolutionary movement can emerge.

Nonetheless, that future will become possible insofar as we speak to the contradictions on our own situation, of which our direct integration into the American imperialist system is without question the most critical. From the perspective of Europe, a truth which was only partly clear to me before I left Canada now appears certain, namely, that there can be no revolutionary politics in Canada until national politics first comes unstuck; until there is a sense of a country worth fighting for against the Canadian bourgeoisie and its American allies.

A very similar process occurred in Quebec ten years ago, and though nationalism does not ipso facto lead to socialism, as anyone even passingly familiar with the situation in Quebec knows, in our context it remains the sine qua non without which revolutionary struggle cannot develop. That we can attack the American colossus with greater impunity and strike a responsive chord in broad sectors of opinion is one of the few advantages we have over American radicals, and we would be fools and branch-plant radicals of the worst order to ignore it.

But anti-imperialism is not enough, and indeed would make no sense, unless it were at the same time linked to struggle against our own bourgeoisie. For France does have much more of a national bourgeoisie than we do, one that has been as repressive of the left as any in the world, because its interests lie in continued domination.

So that the themes of workers' control and socialism from below, of a revolutionary culture and educational system, of non-alienating forms of social relationships that emerged in May 1968, were a response to deeply felt collective needs that are stifled in bourgeois France, but equally in bourgeois Canada.

If some become revolutionary socialists today, therefore, it is because we believe that various forms of repression with which we are familiar are part and parcel of bourgeois society, that a different kind of society is both possible and necessary, which will be prefigured in the struggles and kind of movement we build.

There is therefore a profoundly utopian content to the socialism for which the revolutionary left is prepared to fight, a belief in possibility that human nature can change through a revolutionary process in which people themselves shape and take control of their lives. At the same time, however, there is consciousness of the need to keep one's feet on the ground, recognizing the immense problems which any social transformation will pose, elaborating in greater detail than has been done in the recent past, the practical basis on which a socialist society may function. In this way, the revolutionary left may yet succeed in avoiding the pitfalls of earlier socialist experiments, without condemning itself to irrelevant day-dreaming.

The revolutionary mole, now boring underground, may succeed in pulling the twin traditions of libertarianism and Marxism together, spontaneity with discipline, imagination with reason, uniting in itself the labor of the negative and positive. Then the quietus which seems to have set in among radical groups everywhere can become something different, the rich and immensely important period where the seeds of a future revolutionary society are nurtured.

* On the importance of the strikes in advanced sectors, see for example Alain Touraine, Le Mouvement de Mai ou le Communisme Utopique, 1968, one of the most intelligent accounts of the Days of May. On the theme of direct democracy in the student revolt, see P. Vidal-Naquet, ed., Journal de la Commune Etudiante, 1969, now in the process of being translated into English.

 On the grandeur and decline of the Russian Revolution, Victor Serge's Memoirs of a Revolutionary and the anarchist Valine's The Unknown Revolution are particularly impressive. On Libertarian Marxism, there has recently been published in Paris a collection of essays by Daniel Guerin, Pour un Marxisme Libertaire, which is a provoking analysis of the revolutionary tradition of socialism from below from the French Revolution to today.

Occupation fails

Waterloo faculty keep their club

WATERLOO (CUP) — After a two-day student occupation, faculty at the University of Waterloo appear to have successfully defended their administration-financed club against an attempt to turn it into a community centre.

Approximately 40 students took over the newly-opened building last Friday and Saturday to demand it be turned over to the community which paid for it.

The building was constructed on land donated by the university and financed with a $100,000 administration grant and additional grants for operation costs.

Faculty club members plan to pay off the building's mortgage from club dues.

The student action followed publication of a special community edition of the Chevron, Waterloo's student newspaper, which invited the public to the opening of a "community centre." The issue gave no indication of the Waterloo administration's plans for the building.

Campus police turned away residents of the Kitchener and Waterloo communities who came to view the building, but allowed occupying students to set up a temporary day care center, show films, and serve refreshments.

The students finally left the building to the faculty Saturday evening, but announced plans for creation of another campus day centre and the beginning of a program to focus campus attention on community needs.

The anacronism still stands

The campus Women's Liberation Group has presented its case to the Presidential Advisory Committee for discontinuing the discrimination against women traditional to Hart House. The Committee suggested that we make our views known to the Board of Stewards.

We are aware of the fact that steps are being taken to "integrate" Hart House by making available facilities for women, and also that full "integration" is anticipated for the future, at least by some planners. What we are protesting is the manner in which the changes are being brought about and the inadequacy of steps to date.

For example, where it is apparently profitable, as is the case with certain eating facilities, women are admitted at specific times. The 2:00 time limit in the Arbor Room (women are not needed during the rush so selective discrimination is practical) we consider an insult.

Why not first come, first served, like any other restaurant?

The fact that it has not occurred to you (or has it and been rejected for other reasons?) to make available lounges, record and phonograph facilities, photography equipment and darkroom is an indication of what we consider the exclusionary attitudes of Hart House. Comparable facilities are not available elsewhere on campus for women.

It is the opinion of many that the existence of Hart House (that is, excellent facilities for men) has precluded the development of an adequate co-educational student union at the U of T, leaving it behind other Canadian universities.

Although it can be argued that this has never been the intention of Hart House, this is not a question of intentions. Having a nineteenth-century mens' club at the heart of campus life has imposed an alienating form of social life on both men and women in two ways: first by its replacing co-educational student unionism, and secondly by systematically reinforcing the attitude of many that women are inferior and obtrusive in the academy and in recreational activities.

This is not just a slight against women; it imposes debilitating social relations on men as well.

You are probably aware of the fact that the mens' club tradition of Hart House is considered out of date by many Canadian students, not to say ridiculous and certainly discriminatory.

Especially pending the construction of adequate student union facilities, Hart House is in no position to enforce separation or even "separate but equal" facilities.

The latter has been upset even in Mississippi concerning another question of equality.

Psych Dept as CUG Centipede

For those of you on this campus wondering exactly what the fate of the CUG Report is to be, the proceedings of the Staff-Student Committee which was set up to consider the possibilities of restructuring the Psychology Department may unfortunately be prophetic of things to come.

Organized last November, the Committee has incessantly bogged itself down in picayune matters. Indeed, it reminds one of the centipede who concentrated so much upon the action of its legs that it found itself unable to walk.

One would have assumed that, from the recommendations of the CUG Report, all meetings would have been made open to anyone interested enough to attend. This, however, was not the case, for an incredibly picky discussion dragged on for two and one half sessions on the very question of whether or not meetings should be open, or whether those meetings which were to discuss matters of concern to students (sic) should be the only ones open.

Consider Dr. Berlyne's (one of the committee members) arguments, presented in the second meeting, against openness. Motivated, no doubt, by visions of students armed with hand grenades eager to physically dissolve the Committee, he opposed openness on the grounds that the presence of non-members would convert rational discussion into anarchical free-for-alls.

The decision finally taken was such that non-members would be allowed to speak at designated times only, that is:

(1) following discussion of an issue by members

(2) at the end of a meeting, in the event that the discussion concerning an issue has not been completed.

A non-member may present a brief, providing he has notified the committee of his intention to do so at least one week in advance. As an example of the degree of ludicrousness which the committee has attained, one half hour was spent debating whether or not Mrs. Joyce Denyer, president of APUDS (Association of Part-time Undergraduate Degree Students), could speak. The argument over her right to speak focused on various interpretations of the above decision. The whole thing reminds one of a group of mouldy Supreme Court judges discussing the finer points of the B.N.A. Act.

But this is not all. The Committee had been set up originally with three appointed staff members, and three elected students. (one graduate student, and two undergraduates) Unfortunately, the Extension Students felt that they could not be subsumed with undergraduates, and requested representation after the elections had been held. In view of the fact that they had requested separate representation on such a body in a letter to the Departmental Chairman in August, their request seems quite acceptable. This letter, however, was lost and to worsen matters the Psychology Student's Union did not contact the Extension Students during Elections. This "problem" managed to paralyze the Committee even further. Solutions ranged from more or less discounting their existence, to the perhaps even more ridiculous final decision that they may elect a representative who can:

- have priority when discussion is open to non-members.
- present a brief if the Committee has been served one week's notice.
- attend any in camera meetings.
- speak providing no member objects.
- not vote.

Needless to say the Extension Students were disgusted with the whole affair, especially the fact that they could speak only if a Committee member did not object.

And so, what is the net result of two months of meetings? Substantially nothing. The Committee has found itself continually split due to the widely varying sensibilities of the members. Morale has fallen so low on occasion that some have suggested that it disband. Little wonder with all the petty hair-splitting that has resulted in almost total paralysis. Meanwhile the student body rots under a totally unacceptable system, and the conditions of that system have not formed any part so far of the Committee's discussions.

As far as its aspirations to communicate with the student body go it has failed. How can students even attend meetings when they continually change the room, and don't announce it until just prior to a meeting? For all intents and purposes the meetings remain closed. If this is indicative of the way in which the CUG Report is going to be handled, then it will never be implemented.

Financial difficulties hamper new athletic complex

It is readily apparent to all who use the Hart House athletic facilities that the University of Toronto is badly in need of a new men's athletic building. In this, the first of a series of Varsity Sports articles, Peter Adamson describes some of the history of the situation and outlines what is now being done. Mr. Adamson is Vice-President of the Athletic Directorate and co-chairman of the Coordinating Committee in charge of the building project.

By PETER ADAMSON

Will the University of Toronto ever get a new men's athletic building?

From a hopeful beginning in 1962 with the presentation of the First User's Committee Report, the prospects have waned in face of financing problems and of obtaining a site. The University has finally settled on the south-east corner of Spadina and Harbord, next to the Benson Building, as the site for the new building. It has assured the Athletic Association that this site will be held in reserve until such time as construction can commence.

Up until 1968, the major problem appeared to be one of finding a suitable site. This having been accomplished, a feasibility study was carried out by the architects.

Interfac B-ball New I upsets Law

By COLIN PILMER

A tight man-to-man defense and good rebounding helped New I upset league-leading Law 36-31 in interfac basketball last night.

New jumped into a 10-1 lead and never looked back. Numerous, turnovers repeatedly stalled the Law attack while New showed good ball control throughout.

Kirby (12) and Gilbert (9) led New scorers; Albino led Law in scoring (13) and spitting into the stands (5).

Earlier in the day Trin lost a chance to move into a first place tie with Law when SMC B edged them 28-26. St. Mike's used a collapsing zone defense to control the taller Trinity team but still needed Tim Wolfe's two free throws with 23 seconds to win their third of the year.

With four games to go only Law and Innis seem sure of playoff berths in Division II.

Oleszkowicz's 43 points in two games led Innis to 69-61 and 70-51 wins over Dents and New.

In Division I the playoff picture is clearer. UC, SMC, Meds and Sr. Eng. seem likely to meet in the post-season action, although Erindale could knock off the Engineers if they continue their recent momentum.

UC continues to set the pace on top of the division. Since Jan. 1 they have downed St. Mike's 83-80 and Vic 85-66 led by the 82 points scored by Pasht and Singer in the two games.

SMC dropped two close games to Vic and Meds (66-44) before unloading on PHE 101-61 while Meds won two, beating Sr. Eng. 49-29 and St. Mike's.

But what of our funds? In 1964 there was $6 million in the National Fund, of which $4 million was supposedly allocated for the proposed Men's Athletic Building. Due to a misunderstanding between the University and the Province, different book-keeping practices carried out by the University between 1964-68 necessitated $4 million being paid out of the National Fund to the Province in 1968. And so our funds for an athletic building have dissipated to $600,000. This sum has been set aside and will be reserved to contract the final architects' plans when that stage is arrived at.

FINANCIAL SETBACK

The Province has also imposed a considerable financial setback by drastically cutting its university grants for capital expenditures. The University can expect no new monies whatsoever until 1975, and even then it is unlikely that aid would be granted for an athletic building. All of the funds which have been allocated to the Univer-

Business remained on top of Division III with a 5-0 record. They are led by former intercollegiate star Glen Wilkie, whose 20 points a game could be better used by the hapless Blues.

Everybody interested in basketball should drop down to Hart House Friday night. There are three first division, full length games at 5, 6:30 and 8 p.m. plus exhibition boxing matches. It's all free and ladies are exceedingly welcome. Come and be entertained in the quaint surroundings of our own model athletic complex.

ty for the next five years will be absorbed by the humanities library and extension of service facilities (eg. steam tunnels). So the "top priority" billing which the proposed complex has touted for the last few years is of no real consequence, since no new capital expenditures are possible.

Discussions have been held with Mr. Beaubien, the Chairman of the Canada Fitness Council, concerning the possibility of incorporating the proposed building into the National Fitness Programme in return for federal assistance. However, on their small budget, ($5 million), it is not anticipated that any funds from this source will be forthcoming.

Our only alternative, therefore, is to raise the funds from private sources; this will amount to $8 million for the athletic facilities alone, not including the office tower to house the School of Physical and Health Education and Health Services.

FUND RAISING

If any success is to be had in raising funds, the various interested parties had to be integrated in their efforts. Thus, a "Co-ordinating Committee" has been set up to take positive action for a new building. On this Committee are representatives from the Athletic Directorate, Advisory Board, T-Holders Association, School of Physical and Health Education, and Board of Governors. We are presently determining the best method to raise funds (eg. large donations from individuals or companies, a general telephone campaign of T-Holders, specification of donations to the Varsity Fund to be applied to a men's athletic building, etc.).

Then it will be necessary to get the support of the Board of Governors for our proposals before a publicity campaign is begun. This will be aimed at informing the concerned people of the urgent need for new facilities, and inspiring them to help our cause. Only when definite sources of funds are available can the final architects' plans then be drawn up.

With regards to this, numerous individuals are exploring such areas as the specifications of the pool, track, and soon that would be required for international competition, sources of funding, the athletic facilities and their financing at other universities, and publicity for other athletics — all in the hope that these steps will improve the possibility of the University of Toronto realizing the new athletic facilities which it so urgently requires and deserves.

Blues' rally overcomes stubborn Gryphons

By LYNDON LITTLE

GUELPH — Varsity Blues came back from a shaky first period last night to defeat the Guelph Gryphons 5-2 in a SIHL Western Division game here last night.

Guelph took a 2-0 lead in the first as they outplayed and outskated a surprised Varsity team. Gryphon defenseman Ron Pierpoint opened the scoring at 7:33 as he connected with a low shot that seemed to catch Blues' goalie Adrian Watson by surprise.

The second Guelph marker came with only 29 seconds left in the period. Guelph forward Peter Turner was left unattended in front of Watson and he flipped a quick shot high into the net.

It looked for a while as if Guelph was out to repeat its early season upset of Blues, but the between-periods rest must have been what the team needed as they came out flying and picked up three unanswered goals. Grant Cole replaced Watson in the nets and handled 10 shots flawlessly.

Nick Holmes scored the first Blues' goal on a hard shot from the blueline at 2:54 that went through goalie Duffy Lewis's legs. Paul Laurent tied it up at 9:53 when he flipped a rebound into the uncovered side of the net after Len Burman had hit the post.

Laurent and Burman combined again before the end of the period as Laurent skated the length of the ice and passed from behind the net to Burman, who put the puck behind Lewis.

Blues continued their fine play in the third, taking the game to the Gryphons and coming up with two insurance markers. John Wright scored Blues' fourth goal at 9:30 of the period as he picked up a pass from Dave Field at his own blueline and beat two Guelph players to score from close in.

Laurent capped a great individual game as he added Varsity's final goal at 14:32. Just seconds after Cole robbed two Guelph players from point blank range, Laurent skated through the entire Guelph team to beat Lewis cleanly.

BLUENOTES: Blues have always had trouble warming up to the refrigerator Guelph uses for its games. . .shots on goal were 38-34 in favor of Blues. . .Cole's best stop of the night came when he stopped Ron Fierheller from point-blank range in the second period. . .coach Tom Watt's move of Len Burman to right wing on the Laurent line paid immediate benefits as the pair combined for two goals, each assisting on the other's marker.

U of T will play host for the Women's Intercollegiate Gymnastic Championships for Ontario and Quebec Saturday as eight universities compete for top honors and the right to send a team to the Canadian championships at the University of Alberta.

Action gets underway at the Benson Building about 9:30 a.m.

Toronto's senior team consists of Marty Kemeny, Connie Lindenburger and Ruth McMullen, all of whom compete in floor, beam, vault and bar events.

The junior team is made up of Sue Christiau (all round), Sue Young (bars and vault), Barb Glennie (floor and beam), Jane Stevens (floor and beam), Ornella Marussi (vault) and Jo-Anne Anderson (bars).

The Varsity girls have been slowly improving and this year should prove one of the team's most exciting.

Guelph beats BlueSkates 10-1

GUELPH (special) — The Varsity Silver BlueSkates dropped their second game in a row as they were beaten 10-1 by the Guelph Gryphonettes in an exhibition women's intercollegiate hockey game here last night.

The Varsity squad allowed seven breakaways in the first period alone, and Guelph converted four of the opportunities into goals as they took a 6-0 lead. The BlueSkates were outscored 2-1 in the second and 2-0 in the third.

Toronto's lone goal came off the stick of Vikki Mitchell. Guelph, last year's champions, had played nine games before last night's encounter and their rough, fast-skating brand of hockey was too much for the Varsity team, who have played only three games in their exhibition schedule.

The loss followed a 5-2 defeat by McMaster last Friday night at Varsity Arena. Diane Gilmour scored both Toronto goals in that game.

In other action last night, the Varsity Bluettes basketball team was upset 33-30 by Guelph after fighting to a 13-13 draw at half-time. Top scorers for Toronto were Karen Empey (9) and Joanne Petzel (7).

Wrestlers show improvement

The Varsity wrestling team needed a chance to compete with and observe experienced wrestlers, and last weekend they received it.

The 1970 Guelph Open Wrestling tournament hosted over 150 wrestlers of all shapes and sizes in a 12-hour test of skill and endurance. The meet was conducted under International rules using the "bad points" system, whereby it is possible for one person to wrestle as many as six times before a winner is determined.

The lacklustre performances of previous meets with Waterloo-Windsor and Western (which we lost) seem to have disappeared. Inspired by the presence of several NCAA champions and otherwise quality competition, the Varsity team displayed team spirit and an individual willingness to compete to desire.

Shand pinned two competitors in whirlwind fashion before meeting Dave Kestel, former NCAA champion. Kestel won by wrenching Shand into the air and slamming him to the mat with a head and arm lock. Shand was still in contention until he wrestled to a draw in a hard-fought match with Stitt (Hamilton).

John Davis wrestled six times to win a fourth place position in the 158 lb. division, sporting tape on a weak wrist and around a sprained digit. Davis used incredible balance and co-ordination to overwhelm two competitors. The remaining four matches were battled the full six minutes, giving John a stimulating introduction to competitive wrestling after a three-year lay-off.

Our brothers from Michigan State wrestling club and University of Buffalo showed the greatest team depth. They take home with them eight out of ten possible trophies.

U of T has the nucleus for a team, but we need extra bodies in all weight classes. Its a contagious sport and we welcome anyone who wants to come out and get in shape.

PHE 1 tops in WIH league

By JUDY WRIGHT

As January draws to a close, so does the schedule of Women's Interfac Hockey games.

Despite the early morning game hours, the season has seen much enthusiasm and even a little hockey skill. Whether the wide-awake fans who usually showed up came to cheer novices or to get their early morning smile is a matter of opinion.

PHE I has managed to come out on top of League I by defeating Vic I (7-2), SMC I (3-0), PHE II (2-0), with a final game against Pharmacy to be played this week. SMC I is in second place through victories over Vic I (5-0), and Pharmacy (3-0).

In League II, Erindale has taken the lead in victories over Meds (8-11), POT (6-0) and PHE III by default, while Vic II is in second place, having tied Erindale (1-1).

League III is led by St. Hilda's who were victorious in games against PHE V (4-0), Innis (4-0), SMC II (1-0). The quarter-playoff in this league sees the appearance of Scarborough who meet St. Hilda's on Mon. Feb. 9 at 4 p.m. for the playoff spot. Other quarter final games: in League I, PHE I vs SMC I on Thurs., Feb. 5 at 9 a.m. and Erindale vs VIC II in League II on Mon., Feb. 2 at 8 a.m.

Fencers foiled by RIT

Toronto struggled against their individual blues, dropping a close, exciting contest to Rochester Institute of Technology 12 to 15 bouts last Saturday in the Fencing Salle.

The Varsity foilists put up their best team effort taking a 5 bouts to 4 victory. Richard Wong dominated the individual standings winning all his bouts. The sabreurs were technically better than Rochester but under stress buckled to a 3 bouts to 6 loss. Martin Peros with all the Blues sabre wins outclassed all the sabreurs present.

Toronto's epeeists took the first three bouts easily, relaxed and impaled themselves on their opponents points. Only Helmut Microys could take two wins in the 4-to-5 loss.

After the great competition with RIT, the RMC were no match for either team; U of T 25 RMC 2, RIT 14 RMC 0. Without a full 9 man team RMC added insult to injury by taking their strongest fencers to an Ottawa Meet.

The 1970 Novice Foil Champion is Tony de Bakker. His skill was tested by Mark Taylor, 2nd, Andre Kahle, 3rd, John Boquist and Jim Heifitz, 4th and Roy Martin, 6th.

Who are the majority, who are the poor?

When we talk of Quebecers, we talk of all Quebecers, of all origins, of both official languages, of every religion, of any continent. When we talk of Quebecers, we mean all Quebecers. Some of you, I know, are getting uneasy about the situation here, and some of you are beginning to realize that you are a minority, you are listening to those who tell you you are a minority, and some of you are thinking of leaving. Let me tell you that there is no escape from feeling a minority. Canada is a minority as an industrial nation in the world. We are a minority among the rich nations. When you look at the vast majority of nations in this world, who are the majority, who are poor? And, in Canada, as French Canadians are a minority, and English Canadians are a minority in Quebec and I as a French Canadian, I am a minority in riding of Mount Royal; you know, feeling that you are in a minority is something in the mind, it's not something real. And I've often said this to French Canadians: you are a minority if you feel you are a minority but we don't feel a minority in Ottawa and nobody pushes us around in Ottawa, and don't let anyone push you around in Quebec. You have your roots here no matter how few years you may have come, some of you. But you have participated in the life of this province and you helped to make it a province which is interesting culturally, and you have helped to create its wealth and your place is here and if some people are thinking of leaving, I tell them: don't drop out, drop in, don't drop out, compete, don't exit, excel. This is what I tell French Canadians when I speak to minorities in other provinces and this is what you should be telling yourselves: that the small groups, the obligations of being a minority also create privileges, and if you think of the role, for instance, that the Scots as a minority played in the role of the history of England, you can see what a minority does, you can see how a minority can succeed, and I don't have to tell these things, you know them. And you know that this Canada and this party which is meeting here tonight sees all men as equals and we don't think of people as majority and minority. We think of people as Canadians, as having full rights in this country. And we won't let anyone destroy them.

Do university libraries threaten Canadian publishing?

By DAVID FRANK

The buying habits of Canadian university libraries are threatening the future of the Canadian publishing industry.

This is a fear that Canadian publishers have been voicing increasingly since last September, when discussions between publishers and librarians made it clear that, to quote the publishing trade magazine: "... about 95 per cent of all purchases of university and college libraries in Canada are made outside the country, with only five per cent for university libraries spent in Canada."

The university library market is worth $20 million a year, more than 10 per cent of Canada's book market. Four years ago libraries were spending only $8 million.

This rapid increase in spending accounts for most of the concern publishers are demonstrating. As one publishing executive put it: "We didn't realize such a great big chunk of the market was going out of the country," and another adds: "To put it in historical perspective, university libraries were not really worth very much."

For the most part the Canadian publishing industry is a supply operation — they are warehousing and marketing agents for American and British publishers.

The average Canadian publisher carries over 10,000 titles, only a handful of them actually Canadian books.

"There is no lack of availability of books," a top Ryerson Press executive said last fall. "There are more English language titles available in Toronto than in any other city in the world."

This agency representation system is the cornerstone of Canadian publishing. Only with money earned from these sales can publishers underwrite the cost of original Canadian books which rarely recoup their costs on the small Canadian market.

"Canadian publishers trying to publish Canadian books," says one publishing executive, "find it difficult if not impossible without carrying this mixed line. They need these American and British books to assist or subsidize — and I hate like hell to use that word — in publishing Canadian books."

Canadian university libraries have imperilled this tradition set-up by "buying around" Canadian representatives and going direct to foreign markets to buy books, say the publishers. Orders are placed in New York and London with "jobbers", outfits which will assemble a single shipment from a number of sources.

This procedure replaces the confusion and tedium of ordering small numbers of books from multitudinous individual publishers with centrally-ordered bulk shipments. From abroad.

This is the system employed by the University of Toronto.

Associate librarian David Esplin from U of T's Book Selection Office puts it like this:

"It's a matter of simple economics. If you buy 100 books from 100 different sources, you get 100 different shipments and invoices to process. It is much cheaper and quicker to place orders direct to London."

Chief Librarian Robert Blackburn adds:

"It's tempting to think that because publishers are in Toronto they can supply quick service. This is not always the case."

U of T library administrators point to other factors to explain their buying habits.

"Most of the things we buy cannot be purchased through Canadian publishers," says Esplin, "Many can't be bought through any bookseller."

This includes out-of-print books, and collectors' items, as well as more than $255,000 worth of periodical subscriptions annually. Blackburn says about 30 per cent of library purchases are non-Roman alphabet publications. "Canadian publishers' booklists are 'selective'," says Esplin, "They do not appear to carry a complete stock."

When publishers talk about not getting 95 per cent of university library business, he says, the question is "What percentage are books they can supply?"

"We do buy quite extensively from local services," he adds, "We use Canadian agents providing they can give service."

Two of the most important services the library receives, explains Blackburn, are delivery of books on publication and automatic receipt of books on approval in specified fields. Canadian publishers do not give this kind of service.

U of T was unable to supply figures indicating sources of purchases and to what extent buying which might go through Canadian agents was directed out of the country.

Esplin: "The figures are not kept that way."

Blackburn: "Could you hazard a guess?"

Esplin: "Very very small. I would guess someplace under one per cent of our purchases."

U of T also made no reply to a survey on sources of library acquisitions conducted by the Book Publishers Council of Canada.

Among the 14 universities answering the query, Brock University said 80 per cent of their purchases of in-print books was through foreign jobbers, Queen's University said 65 per cent, Sir George Williams University said 90 per cent, University of Victoria 84 per cent and University of Saskatchewan (Regina) 78 per cent.

In contrast to this pattern, two universities said more than half their buying was from publishers and jobbers in Canada. The University of Manitoba said 62 per cent, and the University of New Brunswick said "striving towards 100 per cent."

Jobbers in Canada supplied a service individual publishers could not.

books and libraries gathering consolidated orders for library purchasers. Jobbers in Canada replying to a similar survey said with one exception that they did not "buy around" and most supplied more than 90 per cent of their books from Canadian sources.

A similar alternative to foreign jobbers is offered by the Publishers' Academic Library Service, a co-operative organization of 14 Canadian publisher-agents formed in 1966 primarily to compete with British book-sellers who were supplying Canadian university libraries.

The advantages of a central ordering system for the total of 279 publishing houses represented by PALS gave the co-operative a 1968 sales record of $184,000. Up to September, 1969 sales were $248,000.

"We have considerable evidence that we are getting only some of the business," reported PALS manager Patrick Meany in last fall. "Nevertheless the increase in 1969, without any doubt, in the greatest part, represents business that previously was going out of the country."

Meany said the object of PALS was to "keep business in Canada" and in this sense the organization had been "a pioneer, a trailbreaker."

"Our main limiting factor," he noted, "is lack of comprehensiveness. In order to achieve maximum success, we would have to be able to handle orders for the in-print books of all Canadian, British and American publishers."

Although at least 11 university libraries do use PALS, this lack of comprehensiveness is the main reason U of T doesn't. Says Esplin: "PALS is directed towards small and medium size libraries. It has not proved acceptable to larger libraries."

Commenting on the U of T guess of "less than one per cent" as the effect of "buying around" policies, Miss Barbara Byam, a McGraw-Hill executive who conducted the Book Publishers of Canada survey, said "other university librarians have placed it somewhat higher than that."

"Objectively I don't see that the university libraries are wrong in the way they look at it. For sheer economic reasons they are better off. Instead of 52 orders they can place one."

Nevertheless she hopes that through PALS, Canadian jobbers and standing order plans, Canadian publishers can improve their share of the market.

She estimates perhaps half of the business going out of the country was for materials not available in Canada.

Other publishers also recognize that the libraries, with tales of slowness and inefficiency, have some valid complaints against Canadian publishers.

"In the past many publishers haven't given good service," says Mitchell Woolrich, a Collier-Macmillan executive, but he adds that now there is a "new breed" of publishers.

"We are prepared to try and do something, absolutely anything we can, to meet complaints."

Woolrich, as chairman of an eight-man Librarian-Publishers' Committee set up last fall, has been working for closer co-operation between the two. The committee was to deal primarily with problems of service, working towards standardization of cataloguing and processing procedures.

"Our ability to serve university libraries is only as good as they allow us. In other words, if a library is spending $1 million and we only get five cents of that business, our ability will never be very good."

He recognizes that libraries have many needs requirements which could not be supplied by Canadian publishers. "But there is $20 million involved — if we even had 12 or 10 or eight million..."

"The percentage of buying we could supply depends on the particular library," he says, "if it's an American book or a British book, we can generally supply 80 to 90 per cent of a library's needs," he says.

"Certainly we're interested in getting more of the U of T library business," he adds.

In December Woolrich told a meeting of library personnel in Toronto:

"We are constantly attempting to upgrade our operations to meet your needs. Nevertheless the question still remains unanswered. Will we, as publishers regain the business that we are losing and which rightfully belongs in Canada?"

In view of mounting grants to libraries from public funds, he says, when orders are placed with foreign jobbers, the question raised is "Why do we use Canadian tax money to develop the economy of another country?"

"The development of Canadian books written by Canadian authors is only possible if we have a strong and healthy industry."

At U of T, where book spending last year totalled $1,753,920, the librarians' answer is summed up by Blackburn:

"We have a responsibility to act in our own best interests. Our primary obligation is to Canadian education."

In 1968 there were 3,006 new books published in Canada.

"Canada is just out of the colonial period in measurement of book publishing, about the same position the country was in politically in the 1850's."

What are the real costs of the Spadina Expressway?

How much would you pay not to have increased traffic on your streets? Or not to have the noise and dirt an expressway will bring? Or not to add to your intake of carbon monoxide? Or not to have more cars and more parking lots in downtown Toronto? Or just plain not to have an expressway through your neighborhood?

Are these side effects of the construction of the Spadina Expressway compensated for by its benefits?

Surprisingly this question has not even been considered by the Metro Council, say David and Nadine Nowlan, authors of THE BAD TRIP, The Untold Story of the Spadina Expressway.

They report that no study has ever been made on whether this $210 million expressway supplies the best use of the taxpayers' transportation dollar.

The expressway will provide a convenient "corridor" route for about 9,000 people to come into downtown Toronto. Every morning 160,000 people commute to the downtown core. Of these slightly less than half arrive by car. The Spadina would be servicing an elite 10 per cent of the commuter population.

We are left, the Nowlans explain, with weighing the money we are spending against the actual rush hour time saved by some 7,000 cars on an average 4.5 mile trip.

According to the 1964 Metropolitan Toronto Transportation Plan, in 1980, the average speed of cars on an expressway will be 34.1 miles per hour. On a transit oriented system the speed on arterial roads would be 19.6 miles per hour. The saving is five minutes and 53 seconds.

With a projected expenditure of $210 million, at an interest rate of eight per cent and an amortization period of 20 years, the cost comes to $20 million per annum. 7,000 cars, taking two rush hour trips a day, for 300 days a year, would therefore each have to pay $4.76 per trip. Or $9.52 a day.

And because of maintenance and replacement costs after these 20 years, this cost will continue forever.

It's a staggering figure and one which Metro Council never bothered to calculate. In doing so the Nowlans make it clear that it is not the North York drivers, who will be paying $9.52 each day forever for the expressway, but it will be the downtown, who will pay the loss of its properties, businesses and the vitality of a diverse community and all the incalculable costs mentioned above.

What THE BAD TRIP says is that city planners have been behaving as traffic engineers and have been irresponsible from the beginning. In the 1964 Transportation Report all the figures showed that a transit-oriented system would cost less and supply a faster trip downtown and would result in less road congestion. Nevertheless the council decided on a "balanced" system.

We are also asked to consider the fact that even though the Roads and Traffic Committee officially shelved the Spadina Expressway as a low priority in 1956, by the next year Metro Chairman Fredrick Gardiner had pushed through authorization of land acquisition south of St. Clair Avenue and plans to continue the roadway through the Spadina escarpment under Casa Loma. And also how Gardiner snuck through bit by bit approval of lands destined to become the upper end of the expressway.

We are also told that the pressure for completion of this northern section of the expressway came from the main interests in the Yorkdale Shopping Plaza, the T. Eaton Co. and the Robert Simpson Co., who warned the land developers, Webb and Knapp, that the Yorkdale contract could be cancelled if there were inadequate road facilities into the shopping complex.

And that by remarkable coincidence, Webb and Knapp were linked with a flurry of pro-expressway letters which hit the newspapers in late February 1962, shortly before an important March meeting of Metro Council.

In bringing the facts about the Spadina Expressway, (many of them new and startling) to the public attention, the Nowlans have done a remarkable job of research.

But probably the most important thing about THE BAD TRIP is that it is not really a book in the traditional definition. It is not merely an academic analysis of urban problems, published after the fact.

It is a political pamphlet, a presentation of the facts with an admitted bias, and it is part of a growing citizen's movement to halt construction of the Spadina Expressway.

Obviously Torontonians are concerned about the problem, for the book has gone into a second printing of 6,000 copies and is already considered a best-seller. It presents the facts. As the Nowlans say:

"... We recognize that a rational and reasonable person could decide in favour of the Spadina proposal. He'd be mistaken of course."

Vaughan fires GSU organizer — may be impeached

By LIZ WILKICK

Graduate Students' Union president Michael Vaughan yesterday unilaterally fired GSU organizer Marjaleena Repo and now his job is on the line as students gather a petition to impeach him.

Yesterday's executive meeting began 35 minutes late with the arrival of President Michael Vaughan. Vaughan questioned the presence of non-graduate students, and secretary, Charles Zabrowski promptly began a scrutiny of ATL cards in the small, crowded room.

A move to oust non-elected chairman, Roger Harrington, on the grounds that the president was derelict in his duty in not assuming the chair himself, failed for lack of executive support. Gerry Neave (SGS), on continuing to express his opposition, was expelled from the meeting.

Mr. Vaughan read a prepared statement charging GSU organizer Marjaleena Repo with printing "lies" in her report. "She has made statements which are untrue and damaging to the graduate students of this university."

He concluded by firing Miss Repo, "effective immediately." He stated that as senior executive officer, he holds sole authority over hiring and firing.

NO DISCUSSION

There could be no discussion or debate on the matter he said, since the firing was now a fact. The executive might, however, take a vote of confidence in him.

Larry Hoffman, elected GSU rep, began the circulation of a petition calling for the impeachment of Michael Vaughan. It was subsequently signed by 18 of the 30 members present. The petition must be signed by 10 per cent of the membership of the GSU.

Eventually a motion of confidence in the president passed 6-3-2.

The three executive members in opposition to the motion left with the major part of the audience. Remaining executive members then passed a motion mitigating the structural riders they had placed on a General Meeting decision to allow any graduate student to use Gestetner facilities.

The present motion allows for use of facilities on a first-come, first-served basis, and emphasizes that political considerations shall not enter into the decisions about such usage.

4 CHARGES

About 20 people re-assembled in another room to discuss calling a general meeting to reinstate Miss Repo, and to deal with the impeachment petition.

They plan to circulate copies of the petition to all departments. It will charge Vaughan with four major counts of der-eliction of duty, and will call for a general meeting on February 25.

Shortly after the meeting, Miss Repo was given a letter signed by Michael Vaughan which informed her that "you are hereby dismissed as an employee of the Graduate Students' Union effective immediately. In lieu of notice, you will receive one month's salary which will be sent to your home address."

"I request that all keys of the GSU be returned to the Executive Assistant immediately."

LOCKS CHANGED

By four o'clock yesterday afternoon, the locks on the doors of the GSU building had been changed.

Miss Repo says that she plans to return to work as usual because the firing is "unconstitutional and illegal." She plans to "sue them for personal damages, because there is no just cause for dismissal."

Hoffman also contends that the action was unconstitutional, but that it is not an isolated incident. He feels the executive, and Vaughan in particular, have been regularly ignoring the wishes of the general membership.

"The president has been saying 'fuck you' to the graduate students at the U of T," said Hoffman. "It's time for the graduate students at the U of T to say 'fuck you' to the president."

Marjaleena Repo will ignore her firing because it was illegal.

Students investigate Poli-Ec dept.

"Who is Stefan Dupre? How was he chosen as new head of The Poli.Ec.Dept? These are just some of the questions that a team of students will be asking as they investigate the structure of the Department. The Investigation Committee meets in the Fifth Floor Lounge in Sid. Smith every day at lunch time to plan the afternoon's enquiries.

The announcement of Dupre's appointment met with the almost universal disapproval of the students who went to last Tuesday's Political Economy Course Union meeting.

"Before we act we must investigate," said Graduate student Charles Manson. "The Committee is open to all students who want to find out what's going on in this Department. It is time to turn objective neutral social science onto the Department itself. We have no particular point of view. This is just a piece of scholarship. We will publish our findings in the Varsity, and in the Staff Bulletin if they want to publish them and people can do what they want with the information."

So far, the Committee has been checking out the composition of the secret committee appointed by Dean Allen which made the selection. They are also following up on the involvement of Dupre in the Simon Fraser affair. Pres. Strand of SFU appointed Dupre as his own representative on the arbitration board established to 'look into' the case of the 12 professors fired by the university for supporting the democratization of the PSA Department.

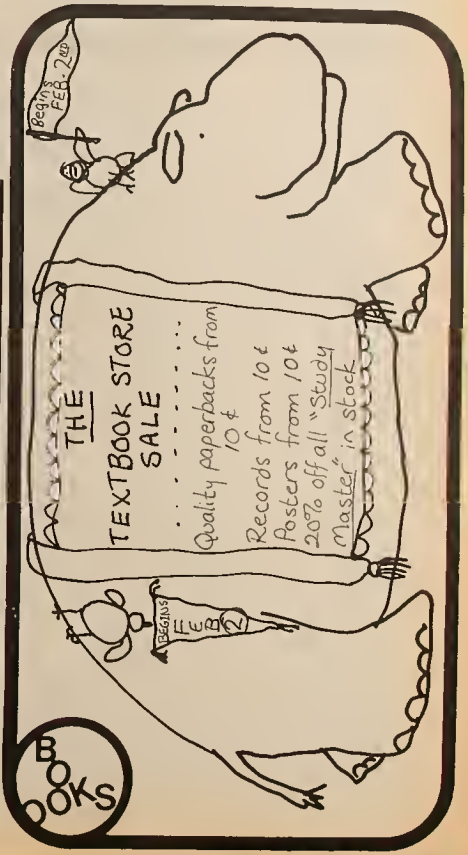

Another line of investigation the Committee intend to follow up is the part that the Urban Studies Department has played in the planning for the Spadina Expressway. Dupre was Chairman of Urban Studies until his latest appointment, and has been a public supporter of the Expressway.

The investigations are expected to take another week, when action meetings will be called. Grievances in the department are piling up. There is a growing feeling that the department ought to be restructured to give junior faculty as well as students control over their conditions of work and study. And many students are dissatisfied with the content of the courses and the nature of Departmental research. A manifesto — which amounted to a virtual declaration of rebellion — was circulated privately at the end of last term and got fifty signatures.

At the same time, the faculty of the Department have been vigorously opposed to even the minor reforms in structure proposed by the Department of University Government.

"When politics enters Political Economy, there will be an explosion", said Manson. Meanwhile, the Investigation Committee meets each afternoon in Sid Smith "We're just casing out the joint," said Manson.

University demolishes 10 houses for plant

The University is demolishing 10 more houses along Spadina and Sussex Avenues despite strong protests from nearby residents and opposition from the SAC executive.

The homes are falling to make way for the university's proposed chiller plant. The buildings are all good quality dwellings which formerly housed many students. Some students had remained there as late as December.

Also included in the condemned block is a variety store still operated by Jack Dimanstein. Mr. Dimanstein has run the business there 15 years and is determined to remain until the building is demolished. He claims the university has a moral obligation to pay him for his store fixtures and good will, since he is losing his business because of U of T expansion. He needs capital to purchase another store.

The chiller plant is designed to service air conditioning units in every building the university plans for the Huron Sussex area. Long range proposals see the campus expanding into the entire area bordered by Spadina, Huron, Bloor and Harbord.

Demolition of the homes began early this week. Two houses had been partially wrecked by yesterday afternoon. SAC has called a meeting for 1:00 p.m. today in Sid Smith Room 1074, to discuss possible student help for the Huron-Sussex Residents association.

Stan Benjamin, President of the Huron-Sussex Residents Association charged the university has never offered a satisfactory rationale for building the chiller plant on the Spadina-Sussex site.

Benjamin, a professor in the U of T architecture faculty, pointed out there are several vacant lots in the area possibly suitable for the plant but the university had never considered these alternatives adequately.

"When we ask why the residents were't consulted about the site the university always replies 'well, we told you the chiller plant was going to go up,'" Benjamin said.

One of the sites suggested by the residents is the land next to the Royal Bank, where Volume One used to stand. The University demolished that building in the fall for parking spaces.

According to K. S. Gregory, administrative assistant to Vice President (non academic) Alex Rankin, the chiller plant must be built immediately to service the library science wing of the new research library, schedule for completion next fall.

He said university planners had rejected the site next to the bank, since it did not provide a central location in what will be called the North West campus area. He said it was too far from the College of Education where major additions are planned in a year and a half.

Mr. Dimanstein talks with one of the workers who will soon demolish his home and store.

Benjamin, however, alleges the university's plans for the area are extremely indefinite due to the shortage of provincial government funds. Reports have it that all capital funds for the university have been terminated for six years.

He claims when funds become available, all the plans may have changed. He says to argue in terms of the university's present plans is totally unreliable.

The area residents feel demolishing the 10 houses will leave a serious gap in their community and will deprive the city of badly needed housing stock. Benjamin says it would be appalling if other vacant sites for the chiller plant are available.

Mr. Gregory said the university had no moral obligation to pay Mr. Dimanstein for his business. The university bought his building years ago but made no allowance for the business. He claims the $36,000 paid was adequate compensation.

Wednesday's SAC executive meeting urged the university to halt demolition work until all alternative sites had been discussed fully with the residents.

Today's meeting will discuss the situation and consider possible action. One suggestion is for an informational picket line around the demolition site. University officials have been invited to the meeting.

Bulletin

A student legal aid centre may be set up on campus next fall, according to Sid Valo of the Student Legal Aid Society.

The society, some of whose members work in Saint Christopher House in the Kensington area, tentatively received $600 from the SAC executive on Wednesday night for a study.

The executive also proposed that the petition against the Spadina Expressway be sent to all SAC representatives for distribution, particularly in classes.

It also voted $75 to each side of the Law referendum on SAC.

Physics department students and faculty have endorsed the Campbell Committee Discipline Report and urged implementation as soon as possible.

The department's committee on the CUG and Campbell Reports agreed unanimously that the report "satisfies the desires of members of the university community to be judged by their peers."

The committee also urged that the rights of non-academic employees of the university be opened up to discussion.

La jeunesse est de notre côté

MONTREAL (CUP) — C'est dans la confusion la plus totale que s'est terminée mercredi l'exposé de Raymond Lemieux devant quelques deux cents étudiants réunis au centre universitaire de McGill.

Ce n'est qu'après une heure de discours relativement paisible qu'éclata une mêlée verbale.

Plusieurs locuteurs improvisés s'emparèrent à tour de rôle du microphone. On remarqua parmi ces derniers des activistes "Maoïstes" d'après Reggie Chartrand, de la force constabulaire de Montréal.

Le discours de Lemieux était bien pesé et allait droit au but.

"Le fascisme au Québec est l'imposition d'une langue par une minorité sur une majorité," disait-il, "et comme les noirs aux états-unis s'identifient par la couleur de leur peau nous nous reconnaissons par notre langue."

Il profita de l'occasion pour mettre en relief la question de l'unilinguisme: "Le Québec bilingue a toujours 30 percent de plus de chômage que l'Ontario unilingue," déclarait-il.

"Ainsi, c'est le comble de l'absurde de voir un canadien français ne gagner que 60 percent du salaire e d'un canadien anglais d'égale compétence."

"Notre organisme met l'accent sur la langue d'éducation plutôt que sur la langue de travail," ajoutait-il. "Nous croyons qu'il est essentiel d'apporter des remèdes à ce niveau."

Il poursuivait les raisons de son optimisme quant au succès éventuel d'une libération nationale qu'il considère possible sur une période a long terme: "Nos adversaires se battent pour le passé, nous nous battons pour l'avenir car nous avons la jeunesse de notre côté."

hauntingly claustrophobic, disorientingly human." Tony Richardson's direction bears scant resemblance to that of most Shakespeare filmmakers, being to them roughly what Faces was to most American cineastes. In keeping with the intimate, almost intrusive quality of the production, the camera moves in for unusually close shots of all the players, so much so that their looming faces often overpower the sparse sets, leaving only a brick wall here, a torch or candelabra there.

Wilkamson plays Hamlet as an impotent phrase-monger, a child revealed in the dazzling illumination of his father's spirit, with pink skin, helpless blue eyes, and stubby infant hands, able only to cry, "Horrible! Horrible!" His sole weapon is a rushing torrent of words which spews from him in a clipped, nasal voice, quickly enough, he hopes to shut out the sounds of the royal court's corruption. He avoids any real confrontation except when inspired by the Players; then he becomes an exuberant little boy again, tearing around the stage and creating havoc. Similarly, the scenes of frustrated remorse of his poor showing next to another's passion, are beautifully underplayed, with a hollow nervous energy. In short, he's the shallow, theatrical Hamlet who hates to be upstaged by anyone, even Laertes at his sister's grave, but who knows inside that he hasn't the stuff to play even his own life well. The Hamlet we were always afraid was the real one.

The rest of the cast is almost equally flawless. Richardson has chosen to play up the fallible, human side of all the protagonists: Claudius is an opportunist pretty-boy, Polonius a harmless old fool, Ophelia, like her father, is very nearly absolved of guilt by the production; she is just a gentle soul, too weak to resist the manipulation of her elders. The only major casting flaw is Gertrude, Sheek-spear's loving, intuitive earth-mother, who is misplayed as usual as a painted witch, just a regol title spire passionate anguish in Hamlet is unfathomable. Aside from this complaint, the production is superb: terse, direct, and immediate.

waiting for chuck

Sometimes it turns out to be worth the time reviewing a show, which is very much the way I felt when Chuck Berry finally made his appearance at Convocation Hall last Sunday over two hours late. The problem was that the producers didn't have the necessary $3000 in cash to pay him with before he went on, and Chuck Berry doesn't go on before he's paid, and he doesn't take checks. It was only after long negotiation that they finally all got in a car and drove downtown to pick up the receipts from ticket sales at A & A.

In the interim, those of us waiting in the hall had the opportunity to bear a long set by Whiskey Howl and an even longer one by Berry's three man back-up group. Everytime I've heard Whiskey Howl, they've sounded a little better, and they are now, without doubt, Toronto's best indigenous blues band. Not that they're going to start nudging Muddy Waters or B. B. King, but their sound is together, they've listened closely to their blues records, and they make bands like McKenna Mendelson and Mary Lou Hoerner look as bad as they really were. The only problem with Whiskey Howl is a lack of inventiveness or originality. It may be unfair to expect them to do anything more than copy well, but their sound doesn't have enough of its own life to keep you interested past a couple of numbers.

I presume that Chuck Berry's three man band were picked up locally. It's usually the way he operates. But whoever they were, they had the showmanship of good professionals. Mostly with good natured buffoonery, and to a lesser extent with their music, they managed to keep the audience happy while they passed the time waiting for Chuck. They ran into a desperate lack of material long before it was finally star time, but they certainly deserved the audience's generous support.

Oh yes, and then there was Chuck Berry. As it turned out, in one way his late arrival on stage people showed up for the ten o'clock show that they would have felt rather lonely in the hall if the early crowd had seen their show and left. As it was, the two crowds were merged into one, and there was a full house for the double set which Chuck Berry finally put on. That is, I assume he put it on, because I didn't stay around until the end to find out.

After all that waiting, I just didn't find him interesting this time out. I'm familiar with a great many of his songs, and I've seen him before when he really knocked me out, but too much he just seemed to be going through his paces. He was one of the top geniuses of the late fifties and early sixties, and the crowd on Sunday certainly seemed to be enjoying it as he ran through, Nadine, Johnny B. Goode, Monkey Business, and the lot, so maybe it's just a case of over familiarity breeding disinterest. Or, can it be I've finally outgrown the 50's?

Bill Monroe, the most legendary figure in country music, will be making one of his very rare Toronto appearances this coming Thursday at the First Unitarian Church (St. Clair and Avenue Rd.).

Monroe's music occupies a unique position, straddling as it does the folk and country fields. Squeezed out of the limelight on the country format radio stations and the big Opry road tours ("it's too authentic, not commercial enough"), bluegrass is underexposed and overshadowed even at a time when the overall country music industry is experiencing an unprecedented boom. In the vast spectrum of the folk scene, bluegrass also runs the risk of being elbowed into a relatively obscure corner by some of the 'big guns' that dominate the field.

And yet bluegrass tenaciously hangs in there, its niche small but secure. Each successive summer an increasing number of Bluegrass Festivals throughout the U.S. attests to the gradual but steady growth of interest in this hillbilly art form. Almost all these festivals headline Bill Monroe, who is universally acknowledged as the King of Bluegrass and looked up to as the undisputed leader in this field. Monroe named his pioneering band the Blue Grass Boys (in honour of his home state of Kentucky), and from the name of the group has come the designation 'bluegrass' for the style in general.

reputed debut in 1936 and has been a featured performer on Nashville's Grand Ole Opry since 1939. His overpowering virtuosity on the mandolin has recued this noble instrument from obscurity, but he arrived at his choice of instrument by the process of elimination: One of Bill's older brothers had already taken up the fiddle, another was a budding guitarist, and — this being before the real revival of interest in the banjo — that didn't leave much to choose except the mandolin!

Musically, Monroe's material and mood range from the rollicking, rearing yodels of Mule Skinner Blues to the haunting eeriness of Walls of Time. From the peending wild abandon of Molly and Tenbrooks and John Henry to the low-down lonesomeness of his many blues-influenced numbers. Old gospel hymns, raucous instrumentals, they're all there.

There is a gulf of some dimension between rural and urban musical sensibilities. However, it is possible for the musical honesty of a man like Monroe to bridge this gulf. More and more, pop groups like Pace and the Byrds are revealing a deep indebtedness to Monroe's music and are turning on others to the sounds they've been digging on their own (in some cases, for quite a while).

But bluegrass hardly needs rock recognition to justify its greatness. It's an electrifying sound such as you will seldom hear on the radio, and in the hands of a superb musician like Bill Monroe, its infectious drive will appeal to almost any musical taste.

Tickets are $2.50 and can be obtained from the Toronto Folklore Centre (294 Avenue Rd., Tel. 920-6269) or at Sam's.

sort of ok

Boyd Neel's Sunday evening concerts at Hart House are cultivated affairs. The orchestra brims with sophistication, and so does the audience. Probably neither is aware of how phony they are.

Last Sunday I heard a performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea which was quite competent, but not very exciting. Among the four soloists, I think soprano Janis Orenstein (Galatea) did the best job, followed by tenor Garnet Brooks as Acis. Albert Greer, stepping in on short notice for tenor Glynn Evans as Damon, performed quite well on the whole, and sang one of the airs ("Would you gain the tender creature?") extremely well.

The quality of the University of Toronto Concert Choir's performance ranged from fair to good, and the Boyd Neel orchestra carried off its part with professional vigour.

On the whole, I thought it was as good a way to spend a Sunday evening as any. The atmosphere is rather nauseatingly affected, but if you detach yourself and close your eyes, I think you'll find the music pleasant.

m. r.

The performance by Edward Bear and his group at the Hawk's Nest last weekend confirmed a pattern of miserable Canadian rock music. It seems a myth has grown up with the record companies that Canada and particularly Toronto is going to be the latest New Jerusalem of the rock world. With the evidence of The Paupers from a couple of years ago, the Kensington Market, and of course The Band, company scouts are grabbing anything off the street with long hair and guitar and calling it a new Canadian discovery. The result to date is the pointless dribble of Mother Tucker's Yellow Duck, the Churls, and Edward Bear.

Of these Bear is easily the worst. His music is perfectly suited for high school dances in small towns — background sounds for getting drunk and picking up girls. It's certainly not dope music. The organist has an impressive looking rewired machine on which he can play four chords. The drummer and lead singer shakes his head, stamps his feet, and closes his eyes in a fit of adolescent bliss. Bear, the guitarist, has a repertoire of about five early Clapton runs. Set to another tune, the lyrics of the songs might work for a Bank of Commerce TV ad.

The only thing amazing about the group is that they actually have a record out. Promoters must still be completely ignorant to good and bad. They think in terms of trends — race, creed, and national origin. It doesn't occur to them that there's nothing interesting, important, or even enjoyable in the sound of a group like Bear's. Everything is a fourth-hand copy of the mediocre music of four years ago.

Something actually was happening in San Francisco in 1966 besides the Jefferson Airplane. So when record companies grabbed long-hairs off the street they hit on some good musicians. But to pretend the same thing will happen in Toronto is just somebody's fantasy.

If there are any good groups coming up in Toronto they've probably taken themselves and their amps to Samoa to be discovered there as the new Polynesian sound.

an illuminating measure measures up

Few of Shakespeare's plays are more deserving of a fresh approach than is Measure for Measure. Even the professional literati deem it to be a puzzling work and it has been the object of a remarkable amount of unintelligent criticism. One source of difficulty lies in the ingenious but unpleasant plot. Scholars have usually tried to meet this difficulty by talking as if Measure for Measure were exclusively a play of ideas and have found in it allgories of Christian theology and Aristotelian ethics. The natural step of treating characters as primary and making plot and ideas depend on them is seldom taken.

It is in this context that Stephen Katz's interpretation of the play being performed this week, including tonight and twice tomorrow, at Hart House) lays serious claim to our attention. It is not a question of adding gimmicks to one of Shakespeare's works simply for the sake of individuating a particular production. In this new Measure there are gimmicks aplenty — notably including an afghan hound and a wheel chair — but there is also sufficient understanding of the people involved to make the play work.

The chief historical archetype of the play has been identified as that of "the corrupt magistrate". The Duke of Vienna's deputy, Angelo (Harry Lane), promises Isabella (Mary Bellows) that he will spare the life of her condemned brother Claudio (Graham Whitehead) if she will sleep with him. In fact, however, the abuse of power pervaded the play not as a moral theme but as a social fact. Most of the people we find in this reading of the play are desperately weak, and thus willing to use whatever hold they can over others. Angelo is presented as not falsely modest but genuinely unfit for the office which the Duke entrusts to him. He uses the letter of the law to hide his inadequacies. The Duke (Paul Mulholland) delights in the exercise of power and the sadistic control which he is able to exert as he prowls around the city disguised as a monk. Any hint of opposition is sufficient to drive him to the brink of hysteria. In pleading for her brother to Angelo, Isabella discovers first her rhetorical power and then, realizing Angelo's frailty, her sexual power, which almost immediately backfires.

In short, they are all playing games with each other, games which assume differing degrees of seriousness and self-deception in each case. In the current production of the play, two foils to these central characters emerge. The Fantastic Lucio (David Klausner) moves from game to game without being taken in by any of them: it is he who prompts Isabella and he alone who sees through the Duke's foolish disguise. Possibly it is for this reason that it is also he alone who cannot be pardoned.

The second contrast is provided by Isabella's brother Claudio, who has good claim to be the one sane man in the company. After the Duke has engineered his grand finale, has claimed Isabella for himself and has mismatched Angelo to Mariana (Laura Acker), an extravagant Viennese lady, the life-loving Claudio remains to express his mute disgust at the senseless suffering caused by these little games.

Of course this is not a traditional interpretation of the play. It is not merely in emphasizing the manifest neuroses of the characters that this Measure claims to be unique. By making the Duke a kind of dramatist Katz manages to undercut parts of the dialogue. Friar Thomas' speeches, for example, are treated as if they were in fact written by the Duke from whom the friar receives prompting on occasion. Three players in whiteface have been added to bring out the pathos of the comedy.

Notwithstanding, I do not believe that the director had Procrustean designs on Shakespeare. For one thing the unpleasantness really is there in the play and he has had the courage not to explain it away or ignore it. There are good grounds for believing the work has been illuminated rather than distorted: despite the creative use of subtext the actual words have been left almost untouched, and anomalies have not been conveniently deleted.

One avowed aim of the current Measure for Measure is to achieve emotional impact. The ability to create such an effect was evident even from the dress rehearsal I attended Tuesday night. If since then the potential has been realized then Stephen Katz, producer Anne Mackenzie, and their company have found a workable solution to one of the so-called "problem plays" of Shakespeare.

believe it or not, the st. lawrence centre opens

Toronto's Centennial Project opens this Monday night 97 years ahead of schedule.

The St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, that much-maligned, almost forgotten piece of political sports equipment has finally been built—seven years after it was conceived and after so many monetary hassles than even Alan Lamport is too tired to talk about it any more.

At Front and Scott streets, directly east of the O'Keefe Centre, a stark, frugal concrete building houses an 830-seat theatre and a 483-seat concert hall called "The Town Hall".

Aside from the existence of a new theatre, far more interesting is the concept behind the smaller, more intimate Town Hall. This Monday night it will house a Teach-In on the Spadina Expressway. This will be the first of what Program Director Bruce Lawson hopes will be a series of events that involve the community.

Already the Town Hall is booked almost to June with events that bear out his idea of community involvement. Besides the Spadina Teach-in, in February there will be a Star Forum on Edgar Benson's White Paper on tax reform, a pollution forum, Canadian Mime Theatre, Toronto Dance Theatre and a special variety show put on by the residents of the Jarvis-Parliament area of Downtown Toronto, hosted by Hugh Garner and featuring Alderman John Sewell. Not to mention others.

According to the people at the Centre, the Town Hall will become a "communication centre for the city, the natural arena for the city's residents to discuss issues and exchange views. Special efforts are being made to make every group feel welcome to use the Centre's facilities. There will be no exclusiveness in the program philosophy, no weighting of programs in favour of issues of interest to any one section of society.

"Although the Centre is available on some occasions to groups able to afford the rental, it will sometimes be used by people with nothing more to offer than a good idea, promising talent, or a desire to dis-uss an important issue. Free admission to many public affairs events will make access equally available to every person in Toronto."

And Lawson says, "If you need a producer, we'll produce it for you. If you need technical advice, we'll give it to you. And if you need money, we'll help you go out and get a sponsor. We're here to help anyone who wants to use the facilities and can show us that what they have in mind is of interest to the community. As far as I'm concerned, I can't think of anything I wouldn't allow."

The program of the Town Hall is presided over by a board of governors that includes people from every sector of Toronto life, business, labour, community action groups. Even Gus Abols, president of SAC, is a member. Final artistic judgement lies with Lawson and the Centre's General Director, Mavor Moore. Both of them stressed that the Centre will only succeed with the interest of different groups in Toronto. Since the only financial concern of the Town Hall is to break even, success will not be measured in terms of money but of the interest and use the Hall receives from the community. Right now, the idea is very free, very open and very exciting.

And then there's the theatre which opens on March 3 with a production of The Knaacker's ABC by Boris Vian. There follows a repertory season until May 24. The other three plays are Man Incorporated, a multimedia comedy by Jacques Languirand; Striker Schneiderman, a comedy about the 1919 Winnipeg General Strike by Canadian playwright Jack Gray; and a new translation of Goethe's Faust by U of T German professor Barker Fairley.

The theatre, which is just receiving its finishing touches is one of the best in Canada. The basic proscenium stage can vary in width from 32 to 82 ft. because the stage walls move on special tracks. It can vary in height from 16 ft to the top of the tower which is 85 ft. There are five light banks out front with one of the most advanced dimmer systems in North America. There are 200 dimmer switches and the memory banks hold 256 cues at the time. Seventy pieces of scenery can be hung from the flies and the elevator thrust stage is divided into four parts so that it can be converted to almost any shape. The seating plan around the thrust stage is adaptable and no seat in the hall is more than 58 ft. from the stage.

Perhaps the most remarkable thing about the centre is the fact that it was built at exactly the price approved by City Council way back when. At $5,400,000, not a brick seems to have been wasted, and though complete and versatile, the centre has not spent an extra penny on frills. It has also promised Metro Council that it will break even.

The austerity shows in the lobbies with the bare concrete and periscope-like natural lighting, but rather than looking stark, the centre has a very down-to-earth appearance, and the seats, sightlines, leg room, acoustics, equipment and potential for further additions to equipment are all surprisingly good.

Perhaps the Centre should be more thankful than not for its small budget. The lack of frills has made the planners build the auditoriums with very specific purposes in mind and a real concern to fulfill those purposes. Right now, the Centre looks like so much raw material that could, if used well, do a great deal for the Toronto performing arts. We'll see.

radio drama in vacuum

CBC radio should be praised if nothing else, its recognition of radio's potential for entertainment a bit more varied than the cacophonous hustlings of disc jockeys, or late night "voice your opinion" shows. Its programming is neither slick nor packaged to fit the needs of a mass audience. This is especially true for shows not scheduled on prime time. One Sunday morning, for example, CBC commentators discussed the bizarre aphrodisiac side-effects of a new drug for the cure of Parkinson's disease, a malady which afflicts the very aged. Another CBC program presented an interview with the chef at Rochdale. (Certainly a feature of limited appeal.)

But this charming oblivion to the demands of the masses is not so charming when an audience (even a small elite one) is ignored altogether. Producers of CBC's radio drama seem often guilty of this.

CBC forgets that its audience is TV-oriented. It still plays to the old family circle huddled around the little black box. It frequently presents drama geared to the visual, and better produced on television. Thus, the last two plays aired on CBC's Theater 10:30 were sea sagas. Great care was given to roaring sea sound effects, and fog horns in the distance. And the cast maintained about fourteen variations of the British accent, so that one character could be distinguished from another.

But the fact remains that the plays were using radio in a way that seemed to deny the invention of television. If an audience wants a sea saga, it can probably tune in an old movie rerun of Moby Dick. Why bother with the visually inadequate Captain Horatio Hornblower?

CBC also seldom takes into consideration the peculiar weaknesses and strengths of a radio audience. One only half-listens to radio. Drama, if it's going to have any impact, has to grip the listener and force his attention. But once this initial participation is secured, the radio listener is susceptible to much deeper involvement. For radio drama is drama in a vacuum. It is the shadowy emanation of the human voice speaking to the solitary human listener. It is an intensely personal experience. Plays presented on radio should exploit this potential for intimacy with the audience. Suspense drama is adaptable to radio, because it plays to the vulnerability of the solitary listener.

Theater of the Absurd also seems suitable. For this kind of drama, already stark in its setting and staging, would achieve heightened surrealism if the characters and setting were not visible. CBC has aired some plays of this kind, and their effect on the listener was tremendous. One can only hope for more and more experimentation and innovation in this area.

Scheduling of plays also seems inconsiderate of an audience. Theater does CBC radio ignore this man?

10:30 fragments one play into five one-half hour segments. A play is not like a continuing serial; its impact is dissipated by performance extended over five days. And what listener can maintain this kind of prolonged interest?

Choice of plays and scheduling often frustrates the audience. This is all the more lamentable because CBC radio drama does have potential. Presentation of all plays is extremely competent. Acting is always quite professional, and actors maintain their dignity even when appearing in plays like "Storm Below." ("Storm Below" concerns the misfortunes besetting a Canadian ship bound for Vancouver towards the end of World War I. Troubles on board include the Captain's marital difficulties, the anti-semitism of the admiral's nephew, and the bizarre death of a young crew man who fell from the crow's nest.) They seem masters of dialect, and their voices often possess richness and resonance.

All technical aspects of the play are also well-managed. Sound effects too, are accurate without being overdone.

Thus, CBC has all the resources to produce excellent radio drama. One can only hope that in the future, that CBC will take more seriously the demands of its listeners, and will start to utilize all of its potential.

ORGANIZING AGAINST ALIENATION

There are a dozen or so undergraduate course unions presently in existence on the campus, out of a potential of five times as many. In the School of Graduate Studies about half of the 56 departments have graduate student organizations functioning more or less effectively. Old and new organizations, graduates and undergraduates alike, complain about student apathy and lack of participation; it is taken for granted that students in general and graduate students in particular have reached the heights — or perhaps the bottom — of apathy; that they are materialistic, snobbish, servile, hopelessly conservative, careerist and supremely individualistic, all qualities which make sincere efforts on the part of concerned fellow students to establish student unions and associations and in general to mobilize students around a variety of issues, fail rather miserably.

by marjaleena
repo

The campus left and right, alike are mystified by the phenomenon — the former has practically pulled out of any departmental organizing, the latter sees in the "apathy" a vote for the status quo at all levels; both are convinced that students in general and graduate students in particular are a dead loss as far as being able to affect any meaningful changes at the university.

The problem as I see it does not necessarily lie in the psychology of students, in their personal characteristics, or at least it cannot be determined at this level until two other features have been examined: the nature of the structures in which students at all levels find themselves in and the nature of the efforts made to organize people out of their so-called apathy. Thus the question really is: what changes here are possible. Two things are needed to start the process of disalienation, the tearing down of brick walls that separate people from each other and keep them weak in the face of a hostile environment — and despite the rhetoric spouted about "community of scholars", "institutions of higher learning" and "academic freedom", the university in its totality is one of the most hostile environments a person has up to that time encountered: hostile to learning, human impulses and human relationships.

The first step is to develop a consciousness of the existence of alienation, in one self and amongst one's peers, an awareness of the processes by which one has been deprived of one's true humanity. The second step is to develop a critical awareness of those structures that perpetuate alienation in one's present environment, in this case the university; the systematic unmasking of these structures and the simultaneous creation of human arrangements which will actively counteract alienation.

Let us take just one example through which the university perpetuates powerlessness and alienation amongst students. The ideology of the university is expressed in its buildings, its architecture, which must be the most anti-human, anti-life and anti-student that one could possibly construct. Large buildings, often brand new, are filled with empty spaces, endless hallways, large classrooms, seminar-rooms like boxes; everything is colourless and sterile, efficient in terms of its bureaucratic management; and brutal in terms of how it affects those who are forced to enter this territory. In this environment one is already controlled by the invisible and yet ever present masters, who have planned for themselves protective little cubicles and plush and comfortable staff rooms, out of the reach of plebeians wandering lost in the hallways. The point here is that students have been planned out of the buildings, before they have properly entered the doors of the university. There are a few if any called a myth. Not to blame people out of their so-called heads. The true question really is: what creates this massive alienation amongst students and what steps have to be taken to overcome alienation, to begin the process of disalienation.

But before I deal with these two questions, a few words about the terminology. Alienation to me indicates a profound powerlessness experienced by individuals as a result of their systematic estrangement from their fellow human beings and from themselves from their own powers and potency.

This alienation leads into a chronic inability to assert oneself, an inability to take hold of one's situation, it is a condition of perpetual passivity and subjugation, a kind of endless childhood and a severe shrinking of one's essential humanity (which in its alienated state cannot be fully developed). Alienation is not necessarily felt as such because there has been a lifelong conditioning, particularly on the North American continent, to accept it as a part of "the human condition", something one is born with and has to endure all one's life. Furthermore, the existence of widespread alienation is rationalized with an official ideology of possessive individualism in which every person is pitted against another ("each man for himself", "it's a dog eat dog world", "man is basically selfish") in a life-lasting competitive struggle. (What complicates the situation in the

“students have been planned out of the buildings before they have properly entered the doors of the university”

Canadian context, that is, increases the general alienation, is a massive dose of colonial mentality, which manifests itself in a profound contempt for all things Canadian, and thus alienation in the North American context does not originate in the universities; rather the universities perpetuate and institutionalize existing alienation and set up formidable obstacles to the act of disalienation. The responsibility — or the guilt — of the universities has to be seen in this light: that they knowingly allow widespread alienation to exist, that they CULTIVATE IT, GLORIFY IT, JUSTIFY IT, RATIONALIZE IT — and keep on building on top of it.

There are two simultaneous processes which culminate in the mass alienation of the university students. One is the process by which children and young people are systematically trained to be obedient and unquestioning through their most active years; the other is the process by which they are taught to view each other as opponents and competitors. Instead of a friends, fellow human beings, partners, participants and co-workers. The combination of obedience to authority and estrangement from one's peers — both of which are upheld in the school system through a punishment/reward system — is then the brick wall that surrounds the individuals who make up the student body. In this alienated and profoundly oppressed condition students enter the university, only to be swallowed up by the bureaucracy and further fragmented and alienated by the processes taking place.

But as with any other man-made arrangements, come persons. These places should be covered with bulletin boards for all kinds of communications, there should be notices and posters all over the place; they should be flooded with literature; critical bibliographies for various courses, handbooks for beginners and newcomers, reprints of articles, newsletters. With a simple coffee-making system these rooms will turn into dynamic environments where real education and its concomitant participation and disalienation can take place.

Sidney Smith would be an ideal building to start with as it is such a monument to man-made alienation. The two second floor waiting rooms could be divided up between various course-unions, which then would be responsible for creating active and meaningful environments in them. Once these commonrooms are being used to limit, other spaces could be located in the building — and in this year of the CUG the administration would no doubt be willing to relinquish some of these spaces for the cause of student participation.

There is another simple mechanism by which students can establish a link with each other, despite the institutionalized obstacles to them communicating with each other. Any student group getting organized (excluding only those very small groups in which people are in daily face-to-face contact with each other) should establish a regular newsletter or bulletin which would deal with their particular situation and would reach out to those who have become intimidated in the process of being “educated” — which is the overwhelming majority of students. A newsletter cuts through the fog of anonymity which surrounds students at all levels; it would assert the long lost right (back to it always at kindergarten level and never gave back) of students to their interpretation of processes they are put through; it would take them beyond helplessness by meeting with a small group of friends, it would put them in touch with the whole body, it would return them their authentic voice.

In order to exercise this authentic voice, facilities, simple mimeographing facilities must be available to the students. The paradox of the situation is that the university is virtually bulging with Gestetners, Koneos, A. B. Dicks, Xerox machines and other essential equipment, but that students have no access to them. Newsletters, and leaflets, if you have to have them done commercially are far too expensive for any student group to produce regularly, thus it is absolutely essential to learn basic mimeographing skills and find facilities where things can be printed for the cost of materials alone.

It might come as a shock to many people — it came to me — that SAC as the central student organization on the campus, has no mimeographing facilities at all — it has a professional printing press for its own use and for the use of those who can afford it, but does not provide anything where leaflets, bulletins, newsletters could be produced by eager amateurs. The difference in cost is substantial — to have a simple one page leaflet produced through the SAC method, you would first have to have a paper master typed professionally (I was told that the secretarial staff at SAC might do it, but obviously it would be a special favor, not to be counted on a regular basis); then the cost of printing thousand copies would be $9.50 whereas a simple leaflet on a Gestetner machine would cost no more than $4.00, that including stencil, paper and ink!

“it is pointless to talk about student participation in decision making, if students have no ways of expressing their opinions beyond using their vocal chords”

GSU, on the other hand, has one well-used Gestetner machine — around which major controversies recently developed. In this case a student bureaucracy guards the machine jealously and goes to absurd lengths in preventing people from using it — functioning thus in an identical fashion with the overall university bureaucracy. (Graduate students at Jan. 26 General meeting voted for an open and unrestricted use of the Gestetner by any campus based group, (graduate, undergraduate, political, non-political), as long as they pay for their supplies; only to have the executive that same night reverse the decision and set up elaborate rules to effectively discourage all non-departmental groups from using the wretched Gestetner. (That's all power to the people for you!)

Both these organizations, with their considerable budgets, should of course have several mimeographing machines and typewriters and other relevant equipment for students to use for whatever purpose they want to use them for; and there should be regular workshops to teach the use of these facilities for professional results. SAC in fact could afford to set up workshops on silk-screening and poster-making as well, to increase the self-sufficiency of the student body.

It is pointless to talk about student participation in decision-making, if students have no ways of expressing their opinions beyond using their vocal chords; thus the duty of student organizations and governments is to make sure that means are available for the students to really influence the process around them. And for that you need places of your own to meet in and effective means of communicating your opinions.

disc column

THE PLASTIC ONO BAND. Live Peace in Toronto 1969. Apple 3362.

A lot of people on the local scene are no doubt going to want this record to remind them of good times at the Toronto rock festival, but it has little else to recommend it. One song, Cold Turkey, with Yoko screeching like a machine gun in the background, is rather nice, but the rest are dull — a Carl Perkins imitation of Blue Suede Shoes, a weak rendition of Money (a poor song at best), Yer Blues, which has only a little Clapton guitar going for it, and so on. Side two is given over to two interminably long screeches by Yoko, sitting in her bag. Not something you want to play more than once. Just in case you don't feel you're getting your money's worth, a 13 month calendar is enclosed with the record, check full of photos, and poems, and whatnot. The lannons have promised periodic record releases to document their life as it goes along. The Wedding Album was the first, this the second, and one wonders if a third is really necessary. p.h.

MOTHER TUCKER'S YELLOW DUCK. Home Grown Stuff. Capitol 6304.

The first album by a country oriented group out of Vancouver. Not bad, not good — sort of vaguely pleasant. The lyrics are extremely sentimental and most of the instrumentation is fairly standard. From the looks of them, they're quite young, so perhaps better music can be expected in the future. r. d. schwartz LEADBELLY. Early Leadbelly. Biograph 12013.

Leadbelly was the jazz buff's blues singer in the 40's and 50's, and he still has a number of records on the market, though his songster approach to the blues has fallen out of favor with today's blues audience. This new album is one of his most interesting. Side one is a recording of a proposed 1940 radio show, with Woody Guthrie narrating and asking questions while Leadbelly shows the range of his singing. Side two is made up of previously unissued numbers cut at Leadbelly's early commercial sessions in 1935. The radio tape has its interesting moments, but Leadbelly's high voice and fine 12-string guitar style are at their best in the commercial sides. I find Guthrie's narrative cloying and would far prefer to hear more of Leadbelly himself talking, but the music is what's really important, and this is a good collection by a largely ignored southern folk musician. p. h.

GEORGE HAMILTON IV. Canadian Pacific. RCA 4164.

George Hamilton uses impeccable taste in his selection of album material. Canadian Pacific features all Canadian material from Lightfoot, Cohen, Tyson, Joni, and others. Hamilton's voice often seems innocuous in its treatment of a song, a little detached, as if he weren't sure what the song was about. Generally though, his restraint, when combined with the excellent instrumentation, only serves to let the music live on its own merits. It grows on you with each listening. dan quinlan EDWARD BEAR. Bearings. Capitol SKAO 6328.

One of the reasons this album sounds so tinny is the really bad sound engineering on it, but much of the blame must rest on Edward Bear itself. In any case, the record mercifully exposes the three-man Toronto group's faults: Larry Foley's nasal voice and the absolutely amateur status of his drumming, the schmaltzy quality to some of their songs, and mostly their general inability to create a full, interesting sound. nick schmidt

CREEDANCE CLEARWATER REVIVAL. Green River. Fantasy 8393

Wild, as usual. Raunchy vocals, particularly on Commotion and Sinister Purpose. The Creedance Clearwater sound is intact: a tight, hard beat which holds in some really weird lead guitars. But this is their third album, and, to me, they're beginning to suffer from having such a well defined sound. It's getting a little difficult to tell the songs apart. Still exciting though. doug walters

CHUCK BERRY. Concerto in B. Goode. Mercury 61223

Definitely a below average Berry LP. Some of the Berry charm comes across in It's Too Dark in Here, but most of the numbers drag badly, with heavy handed "madern" effects. The title number, an instrumental which takes up all of one side, is monumentally tedious. p. h.

a suspect prologue

The current tendency for an increasing number of film-makers and distributors to direct their products at the "youth market" has resulted, at time, in a by-no-means-equal mixture of relevance, experimentation, triteness, and outright exploitation. Quite suddenly there has been a proliferation of films of social commitment, films of social realism and films of social commentary. Yet, surely the apparent self-indulgence which accompanies so many additions to this new (?) cinema does not camouflage what is more often than not simply unimaginative cinema.

The case in point is a new release from the National Film Board entitled Prologue and directed by Robin Spry (previously assistant director to Don Owen on High Steel and The Ernie Game and director of Flowers on a One Way Street). Prologue is yet another concerned film dealing with youth and change. But Spry offers little more than a conglomeration of images, witnessed without any particular sense of revelation, which speak to us (mumble and shout would, perhaps, be more to the point), by juxtaposing Lincoln Park with a commune in rural Quebec, of the alternate ways or realizing social change.

Not surprisingly, Spry's central characters — Jesse, the editor of an underground newspaper in Montreal, and Karen, his girlfriend — are the spokesmen for the ideologies of Hoffman and Thoreau respectively. As a result, the bulk of Prologue's 90-minute running time is devoted to cross-cutting between the commune and Chicago in the summer of 1968, supposedly to enable Spry to explore the consequences these two ideologies hold for both the individual characters and society as a whole — see also any of a dozen "social" films of the past year.

Admittedly there are several instances of perceptive film-making evident in Prologue — notably, a scene in which the camera pans from a jet airliner in flight to a wide-angle of a group of Chicago combatants clustered about Allen Ginsberg on a beach while the waves of Lake Michigan break with a soft rush on the shoreline. But apart from a few isolated scenes, some effective black and white photography by Douglas Kiefer and token appearances by Jean Genet, William Burroughs and Phil

What is this man doing to himself? For answers see R2.

Ochs, there is little to recommend Prologue as anything other than a duplication of a theme which is rapidly becoming tinged with the suspicion of exploitation.

To add to the general confusion of Spry's foray into the land of youth (few can find their way without a map, Robin), the NFB press kit exclaims that Prologue is "a film on the whole unsettled world scene". There is nothing quite so admirable as a film with a touch of ambition.

detective into husband into . . .

Nathaniel Hawthorne once wrote a story called Wakefield about the effects of self-imposed isolation on a man who for a "joke" walked out of his house one day and didn't return for twenty years. It ends with these words "Amid the seeming confusion of our mysterious world, individuals are so nicely adjusted to a system, and systems to one another and to a whole, that, by stepping aside for a moment, a man exposes himself to a fearful risk of losing his place forever. Like Wakefield, he may become, as it were, the Outcast of the Universe."

ective, and is looking for another woman's missing husband. He is already an outcast and what he sees out there in the underworld is not very pleasant. Soon he wants to get away from it, but not by returning to what he has escaped already — he is so afraid of that, that to avoid it he pretends to his wife that he actually enjoys being a detective. Instead, he takes on the identity of the missing husband, wears his raincoat, tries to become a cab-driver and gets beaten for his troubles, as the lost man did, and makes love to the man's wife. Finally, like him, he disappears.

*It is a good story but needs some delicate handling, which it does not get here. We do not know enough about the character of the missing husband to see or understand the subtle changes which should be taking place in the detective as he assumes the man's identity. Small things count for more in such cases than beatings and fuckings, and should count for more to the detective as well, for the metamorphosis to be complete. But so much time is spent in creating an atmosphere of falseness and mystery (which was more successfully done in The Big Sleep, to which this picture bears some resemblance) that we never get to see the small things.*

*We are never exactly sure of how the husband disappeared in the first place. I do not mean the mechanics of his disappearance, but the metaphysics. Assuming, that since our detective is not murdered, the missing man was not murdered either, then for the identification to be total, the hero must disappear at the end for roughly the same reasons as the husband. But our only hint concerning the husband is that he has perhaps spread himself out so much (apparently he can do just about anything) that he has somehow disintegrated mentally. This is not at all the way in which our detective disappears at the end. Much of the picture is taken up in developing the change in identity only to have its logical outcome put aside in favour of a more dramatic leave-taking, remarkably like that in Hawthorne's Wakefield.*

The movie is long and sometimes tedious, though sustained by some of the acting, especially Katsu's. It borrows from Godard and from American detective movies but lacks his wit and their rhythm. I reckon nobody should try to do what Godard is doing. His is such a personal achievement that its only genuine offspring, at this point, is going to be an exact copy. And this movie has too little Godard-American vitality to be an exact copy.

confusing kabuki

The audience at the Onion, Ryerson's coffee house, sat spellbound last Tuesday night as a small acting troupe, to date nameless, pantomimed an adaptation of a Japanese Kabuki play, Gappo's Circle. Gappo was a great warrior until his enemies plotted against him and he fell. In return for protection, he marries his daughter, young Tamami to a powerful old man. Tamami falls in love with her husband's stepson and poisons her lover purposely to keep his enemies away from him. Then her father stalks her because she has humiliated him. Dying from her wound, she takes the blood from her liver and cures her poisoned lover.

A narration of this plot at the beginning confused the audience. They could not identify with the sociological strictures of Japanese customs, nor understand the significance of kabuki movements. Without the narration, the audience would have felt free to be absorbed by in the emotionality which the sequences of movement projected.

Traditional, stark white Japanese facial make-up, jet black, garlanded hair styles and Japanese kimonos, displayed in glaring yellow lighting raised the heavy emotional tone to a level of dramatic suspension which hovered over the audience for minutes after the performance had ended.

The acting of the story should likewise have been done with complete ritualistic formality. As it was, there was more fluidity than the requisite rigidity. There were shades of realism and western naturalism in movements and facial expressions which should have been puppet-like. However, the performers managed to lend their westernizations into a coherence which softened the Japanese harshness and staccato. What emerged from this Western assimilation of the East was not an adaptation, as was originally intended, but a uniquely original style which delighted the audience.

The troupe, directed by Richard Mulhellen and choreographed by Vera Davies, will be performing Gappo's Circle again at the Global Village, this Friday and Saturday night at 12 p.m. They will also be at St. Michaels College in the near future and at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts when it opens.

the designer of the thingamajigs for 2001

Every category of motion picture invariably contains one Classic Example, according to which other movies of that type are evaluated. And in the case of science-fiction, that film is unquestionably 2001—A Space Odyssey.

For nearly three years Torontonians have been watching Stanley Kubrick's documentary-fantasy with great interest, closely scrutinizing the conceivable realities of space travel in light of man's actual moon landing. Many people claim that the plot of 2001 is obscure or undefinable, but they nevertheless keep returning to watch the gliding space ships, HAL the computer, and the climactic "light show" on Jupiter's moon.

Working closely with Kubrick on this s-f epic was Wally Gentleman, the Director in charge of Special Effects.

Altogether, the cost of special effects alone for 2001 totalled more than $11 million. "You see," explained Gentleman, "the whole film was basically effects; there was very little that wasn't. For example, even the scenes with the actors involved sets that had to be elevated or constructed to simulate motion."

The biggest problem, he felt, in making a movie this size was the cross-indexing of the multiple number of shots and techniques that were needed to keep track of what was going on. Each technique involved possibly five to ten different operations.

As head of the special effects department, Gentleman helped transform the plot from fantasy to reality, but at no time did he actually aid in its construction or creation. "I think the only assistance I could offer here was when Kubrick would come busting into the office to try out his ideas. He was rewriting the script as he went along in production, and would come in brimming with enthusiasm for a line of thought that he had.

"One of these was the thing where he asked, 'What do you say to Bowman coming back as a baby?' I was just flabbergasted, and I answered, 'What do you want to do on that score?' And he said, 'Well, it could be construed as the Christ-child coming back.' All I could do was laugh and say, 'It's your film, Stanley'."

At this point we began to discuss in detail some of the special effects in 2001, and how a number of the movie's illusions were achieved. "Some of our space ships were 60 feet long", said Gentleman, referring to the models constructed in the studio. "What you always do in special effects is, as often as possible, build as big as the economics or the space situation will allow. And the bigger you build, the less intimate detail you have to put into the shots and the more realism you can get. Whenever you shoot a model, you deal in a variety of sizes, usually using three different scales to suit the situation.

"Sometimes we arranged the shooting of a space ship by using cut-out photographs. If you take a photo of a model and stick it on a piece of glass, then with an airbrush and very clever photofinishing you can make the picture's two-dimensional aspect look exactly like a three-dimensional subject."

Gentleman also explained a complicated photographic technique that he pioneered and used to shoot the film's opening "Dawn of Man" sequence. The camera is pointed towards a screen which has the power to amplify and reflect any light that reaches it. A one-way mirror is placed on a 45 degree angle between the camera and the screen, so that the screen is visible from the cameraman's position, but not vice-versa. A projector then throws a still picture onto the mirror, which, in turn, reflects that scene onto the screen. The latter, with its special properties, increases the brilliance of the picture, so that the cameraman sees, through the one-way mirror, a picture 400 times brighter than the one shown by the projector. In this way, because of the brightness of the projected image, the director can remain inside the studio and, using the screen for background, avoid the costly process of filming on location. Thus, the apes in 2001 were not out on the plains, but acted in front of a screen that reflected light at true daytime intensity.

by henry mietkiewicz

"When simulating weightlessness", stated Gentleman, discussing another special effects phenomenon, "you suspend a person from a cable, put a harness under his clothes, and then put the camera directly underneath him. Therefore, you cannot see the cable supporting the body, and the actor is free to wave his arms and legs and spin around in space. You can also pan and track to a limited extent, depending on how far to the side you get before seeing the cable. This occurs, for instance, when Bowman is shot back into the "Discovery". The airlock, as a set, is put above the head of the camera, and Keir Dullea is dropped down into the set on a cable".

In discussing the descent to Jupiter's moon, Gentleman made a number of observations that help clarify that particular episode. "Many people have been quite confused about the purpose of many of the actions that happened in the film, and I think that this confusion is more than partly due to "last-minute" changes in the script. The artifact that was found on the moon was going to be a tetrahedron instead of a slab. When you got to Jupiter, you would have seen in the earlier treatment not just a slot in the surface, but a tetrahedron. And you would have associated this with the fact that the artifact on the Earth's moon must have had its origin in a place of this shape.

"And then something else which was not brought out in the film was that when the probe was sent down into the slot on Jupiter's moon, it would be radiating back information on the precise diameter of the moon. And it would keep on doing this in excess of the known diameter of that moon. This would be an indication that what you'd really get there was not a hole in the surface, but a space warp, the exit out to another dimension. And this wasn't brought out in the film at all.

"The space warp idea was to be supported in another way that was also eventually scrapped. Bowman's ride through the vortex was originally going to be a fantastic trip through extra-terrestrial villages and cities, through subterranean caves with mysterious people going by, and 101 other fantastical things. But this was not done for two reasons: the first is that such creatures would be very expensive to make. In addition, Kubrick had come to the conclusion that to show these beings would have brought the film down into the category of normal space fiction. Indeed, we did experiment with a figure made of light, and with some elongated figures of gigantic size, but this was finally wiped out."

But because the probe's journey, explained or not, is still the impressive focal point of the movie, I asked Gentleman to clarify the techniques used in the psychedelic colour sequence. "The light formations", he said, "were done by an optical mechanism which relies for its effect on the fact that you are taking a still picture when the camera is actually in motion. The shutter is open for a long period, a flash is made to secure the original sharp object, and then the zoom is whipped back, putting a blur trace on the film. It was an animation effected through the vertical and sideways manipulation of back-lighted colour papers, combined with a camera that was moving forward progressively, its shutter open to receive a blurred image.

"I am actually kind of unhappy with the way that was done," he continued. "I think the technique itself works exceedingly well, but the shots were held up to such a length of time that they became recognizable as a phenomenon attained with special effects.

"In such cases it is essential that you make your point and then get the image off the screen fast, before it becomes seen for what it really is. You should never notice the best special effects, or that they're of an unusual variety. I feel that if I've done a very good job, nobody can tell exactly what I've had to invent".

I asked Gentleman whether he worked very closely with Arthur C. Clarke and Stanley Kubrick. "Oh, yes", he answered, "absolutely. I can only say that Kubrick is a terrific film-maker and has a tremendous enthusiasm and love not only for motion pictures, but also for still photography. He has a most open and receptive mind which, like a sponge, soaks up detail. As a warm personality and as an intelligent, thinking man he is just terrific.

"However, he did not turn out to be as big a man as I thought at first, since he claimed as his own creation the design for the special effects for the whole film. And I think that that was quite wrong. It's true that he directed the activities of a group of specialists, but he didn't do the effects by himself. I think credit should have been laid to a team, and not a person."

On the general topic of science-fiction, Gentleman observed that a film that Kubrick abhors is one of the few s-f films he (Gentleman) enjoys. That was The Mystery of Planet X. "Science-fiction is not really my great interest in life", he continued, "and I recall only films like Dr. Cyclops where you get lots of miniaturized people running around giants. I like special effects of the whimsical variety, such as those excellent ones in Disney's Darby O'Gill and the Little People".

MUSIC

Cellist JACQUELINE DU PRE and pianist DANIEL BARENBOIM will be appearing at Massey Hall next Thursday at 8:30. Though still in their twenties, they are held in high critical regard throughout the world, and their Toronto concert should be excellent. The program will consist of three Beethoven sonatas. Also on Thursday, the equally renowned BEAUX-ARTS TRIO will present a concert at Eaton Auditorium at 2:00. Tickets for students are 75c.

Jazz continues to live in Toronto. BUDDY RICH is still on at the Royal York Hotel, but the weekend $5.50 cover charge makes it a bit steep. THELONIOUS MONK opens at the Colonial on Monday, following HOWLING WOLF who closes there this weekend after two weeks.

The legendary mandolin player from Tennessee, BILL MONROE, will be in town on Thursday for two concerts (7 & 9) at the First Unitarian Church (St. Clair & Avenue Rd.). Tickets from Sam's or the Toronto Folklore Centre are $2.25 in advance; $2.50 at the door. If you like bluegrass music, you might be interested in the jam sessions held every second Sunday by the Toronto Area Bluegrass Committee. Call 766-2948 for details.

THE BYRDS, the Byrds, the Byrds. If you want to see the flock, they'll be in town Sunday for one show (8:00) at Massey Hall. Other rock features the Canadian sounds of THE COLLECTORS and NEON ROSE, both of who will be appearing at the Hawks Nest tomorrow and Sunday.

JOHN LEE HOOKER is once again in town, this time at the Riverboat where he'll be playing through Sunday. LENNY BREAU opens there on Tuesday for a week. Breau will also give a free concert at Hart House this Tues. Feb. 3. Trombonist Russ Little will be featured.

JERRY JEFF WALKER will be found at The Onion this weekend. For next week they're undecided as of this writing.

Sir:

I am rather mystified as to the motivations behind Tim Inkster's vituperative review of Acta in Friday's Varsity Review.

One of his major criticisms, the use of "non-literary" material, requires an answer that will perhaps clarify the nature of campus literary magazines in general and perhaps the attitude of Tim Inkster himself in his capacity as editor of Random and Gargoyle Magazine.

THEATRE

All the tickets for Stephen Katz' Measure for Measure had been given away by opening day. If you're looking for free theatre on campus this weekend, Theatre Mickities offers Pinter's The Dumbwaiter, directed by Tom O'Connor, at 9:00 and midnight tonight and Sunday night and no Saturday performance.

Elsewhere this weekend . . . Exit the King has extended its run at the Global Village through tonight; Man of La Mancha is at the O'Keefe through tomorrow night; Spring Thaw is in lower-priced previews at the Playhouse through Valentine's Day weekend; and the Academy of Theatre Arts opened G.B. Shaw's Mrs. Warren's Profession last night at their theatre, 23 Grenville Street, to play Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays through 21 Feb.

Opening next week . . . on campus, Peter Brigg directs a production of Jean Anouilh's The Cavern at the Drama Centre's studio lab theatre on Glen Morris Street. A preview is scheduled for Monday, with the regular run Tuesday the 3rd through Saturday the 7th. Curtain is at 8:30 and it's usually wise to arrive early, as there is no admission charge. 50¢ will get you into To the Hollow, an original drama by Graham Jackson, at 8:00 pm Wednesday through Saturday this week at the New Vic Theatre. And down at the O'Keefe, Ray Milland in Front Page begins a two-week run as of Monday the 2nd.

Over the past three years Acta has been under severe and justifiable attack at Victoria College for not being relevant to the majority of the students. In the past it has published material of interest only to a very small minority of E.L. & L. students. The intrusion of what he calls "campy material", the article on Marvel comics and the excerpts taken from the past 94 years of Acta Victoriana, through their student fees.

The excerpts from Acta Victoriana are not exactly camp. They consist of the genuine reactions of the students of the time to such events as the depression, the publication of Faulkner's Absolom ! Absolom!, Hitler and the war, the takeover of the Social Credit in B.C. If there were a few humorous excerpts then I apologize to our grey, half-assed critic.

Secondly, the whole point of Ron Weihs' article on Marvel comics (if Mr. Inkster would care to read it) was that Marvel comic books provide a whole universe of didactic morality that does not come within the confines of the voyeuristic camp ethos.

If I have corrupted the virgin purity and snobbery of the true believers of the little magazine set, then I do so in the name of a broader audience. The arrogance of most college literary editors in denying a broader range of material for their magazines is appalling. Acta has done much this year to alter the picture.

FILM

The Film Subcommittee of Hart House is presenting an Underground Film Festival on Feb. 11 and 12 in the Debates Room. Admission is free. Included in the program . . . From the Drain (David Cronenberg), Happy Birthday, Lenny (Lenny Lipton) Solipse (Bob Fothergill), Black Power (Leonard Henny), Portrait of Lydia (John Straiton) and Eclipse of the Sun Virgin.

Hopefully by next September there will be a permanent U of T Film Board established on campus with production facilities located in Hart House. Although still in the planning stage, the Board will be the most ambitious film undertaking yet attempted at U of T and, if all goes well, will have an impressive array of professional 16 mm. equipment which will be made available to campus film-makers. However, before a budget can be finalized the organizers would gratefully appreciate any information concerning film projects either planned or underway. Contact David Peebles, Warden's Office, Hart House.

As part of an English course in Literature and the film offered by Prof. Morgan at U.C. a number of early Russian, American, French and German films dating from as early as 1903 are screened on various dates in Room 105, U.C. at 4 P.M. On Feb. 11, Prof. Morgan will be screening Rene Clair's Le Million (France, 1931). Anyone interested is welcome to attend.

On Feb. 2 at 8 P.M. the Toronto Film Society is screening Alexander Petrovich's I Even Met Happy Gypsies, a beautiful Yugoslavian film made in 1967, at the Century Theatre (Danforth and Broadview) as part of the TFS Main Series. On Feb. 9 at 8:15 P.M., as a continuation of the TFS Silent Series, Monsieur Beaucaire (U.S., 1924) starring Rudolph Valentino will be shown at the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall.

Unfortunately, all screenings in both the Main and Silent Series are open only to members of the TFS, but Ron Anger has told us that the subscription list is still open. The membership fee for the TFS Main Series is $12 per person or $22 for a couple. The fee for the Silent Series is $7, however only one other film is to be included in this series — Master of the House (Denmark, 1925) on April 13. Cheques should be made payable to the Toronto Film Society and mailed to Douglas S. Watson, 128 Glen Rd., Toronto 287. Forthcoming features in the Main Series include Fists in the Pocket (March 2), The End of August at the Hotel Ozone (March 23), Father (April 20) and The Switchboard Operator (May 4).

Hiroshi Teshigahara's The Man Without a Map continues through the weekend at Cinema Lumiere. Cinema Lumiere is also planning to feature Resnais' Je t'aime, Je t'aime sometime in February. Watch for it.

Elsewhere in the city . . . Medium Cool at Cinecity (the management of which, incidentally, is planning to revive the Friday and Saturday late-night showings of classics and experimental films), They Shoot Horses, Don't They? (which is a powerful film although Michael Sarazin is not) at the newly renovated Uptown multiplex.

CUG panelists focus on unicameralism

By JIM COWAN

The second round of the Great Commission on University Government Debate opened with a whisper Wednesday as fewer than 70 people turned up at Hart House for the afternoon discussion of proposed reforms to U of T's top governing structure.

The past few months have been spent in discussions of the general principles behind the CUG Report and now interest is being focused on specific aspects of the document.

The four panel members — Prof. J. H. G. Crispo of the Centre for Industrial Relations, Prof. Charles Hanly of the Department of Philosophy, Ken McEvoy, SAC University Government Commissioner and Bob James, SAC Finance Commissioner — all agreed that change to the top governing structure was necessary.

And all but Crispo supported the CUG recommendation of a single-tier system composed of faculty, student and lay representatives.

SMALL LAY BOARD

"The CUG commissioners concentrated on the case for unicameralism and made the case as best they could against multicameralism," said Crispo.

He said a small lay board of trustees should replace the present Board of Governors, so that the university could defend itself to government and the public. "We suffer from a credibility gap the likes of which Nixon has never had to worry about," he said. "We need a buffer group."

Along with the trustees, he said, there should be an academic council with a majority of faculty members. In between the two should be an executive committee for the effective meshing of academic and financial matters.

"If we don't save ourselves," he warned, "someone else will save us and I'd hate to have to fall back on a Conservative government. If we don't come up with a body with a lay voice we won't be listened to, and that's what I fear the most."

McEvoy, stressing that he was speaking as an individual and not as a SAC representative, agreed the university was in danger of reform from outside if it did not take action itself.

FRIGHTFULLY NAIVE

But in arguing for unicameralism, he said "Anyone who believes you can separate academic and financial matters is frightfully naive."

The top governing structure should be composed of equal representation of faculty and students, he said. Administrators should be allowed voting membership only if support staff were similarly recognized.

He agreed that lay representation may be valid, saying "We all recognize the value of co-opting troublesome elements onto decision-making bodies."

Hanly also favors a unicameral system.

"It seems to me that laymen have an important contribution to make and that contribution can be made most effectively through a unicameral system," he said.

POLITICIZATION

He pointed out that the Ontario Government has already set up a unicameral system dominated by academics in the form of its Committee on University Affairs, and he suggested that any unicameral system adopted at U of T should provide for a simple majority of faculty.

James said the current discussions are an extension of "the politicization of the university" which started in 1859.

"We must eventually talk about education," he said, "(Reform) talks about giving me, an ordinary student, some control over the education system I've been put into."

"We all understand there are reforms which must be made, not just in structure but in content," he said. "Why aren't these changes being made?"

The four speakers agreed that alumni and support staff groups had a role to play, but no consensus was reached on just what that role was or where it should be practiced.

RUBBER GAME TONITE!

Here are two samples of the difficulties Blues encountered in their 10-4 loss to Loyola over the Christmas holidays. Above, Grant Cole must be sharp to stop a quick shot from Warriors' John Hutton (21) as teammate Bruce Wickham (20) waits for a possible rebound. Below, Blues' Bob McGuinn (16) moves in to clear a loose puck from in front of the goal. Len Burman (15), Dave Field (3) and Terry Parsons (5) are the other defenders. Blues defeated the Warriors 7-4 in a pre-season exhibition game to set the stage for tonight's rubber match

Blues vs Loyola: who is really number one?

By JIM COWAN

According to the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union, tonight's game between Varsity Blues and the Loyola of Montreal Warriors will be a contest between the two top university hockey teams in Canada.

CIAU rankings released yesterday placed Blues and Warriors one-two in the country. The weekly poll results from balloting by sportswriters and sportscasters across the country.

And there, as they say, is the rub. The majority of balloters have never seen most of the teams they are ranking. All they have to go on are the weekly scoring summaries sent out by the CIAU.

There is no basis for inter-league comparison (say between western and eastern clubs, or between central and Maritime teams) and there is no way of qualitatively differentiating the scores from any one league. And we all know how much more there is to a game than just the final score.

For instance, in terms of the Loyola-Blues conflict, the balloters should logically have picked the Montreal team over Varsity. Both are on top of their respective leagues. Blues, however, have lost one game (to Cornell) since the two teams last clashed on Jan. 4 while Loyola continues undefeated.

And, for the clincher, in the two games the teams have played this season, Loyola has the big edge after the 10-4 trouncing Toronto took in the Loyola Tournament.

RANKINGS IRRELEVANTS

But the rankings themselves are not only highly suspect, they are in this instance highly irrelevant. It's the spectre of that 10-4 loss Blues must overcome, and until they do that they can't very well claim to be number one in anyone's rankings.

Tonight's game should provide the same calibre of action as was seen against Cornell last Saturday. Loyola is taking the game seriously enough to have arrived in town last night, and requested and got ice time for today. Anyone who wants a sneak preview could drop around to the rink at 10 a.m., that is if coach Dave Draper lets anyone in.

The other big news in Blues-land this week was the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association ruling that no Canadian university hockey team could take part in the university tournament slated for Finland in April.

Blues, of course, would be a good bet if you were putting money on who would go.

POLITICAL INFIGHTING

The CAHA ruling, of course, is part and parcel of the political infighting between that body and the International Ice Hockey Federation over the use of professionals on "amateur" teams.

It seems that the International Federation of Student Unions requires IIHF sanction for its tournament, and the CAHA is Canada's voice on the IIHF.

So although the CAHA does not actually control the CIAU, they can foil any attempt to send a team to the international student games by simply withholding their sanction.

Blues' coach Tom Watt says that while he agrees with the CAHA ruling on the Olympic level, he thinks the present move is wrong because "it's an entirely different level of competition."

He says Blues would definitely have gone if they were CIAU champions again this year.

Arrangements were already underway, and there was a verbal commitment from the Federal Government's Fitness Council to finance the air travel, he said.

Did Loyola learn anything from their recent brush with Montreal police?

BallBlues face tough test in Mac

By PETER WHITE

Varsity Blue ballers reveal themselves for the fifth time this season as they travel to McMaster tonight. It must be hoped that Blues do not, unlike Putney's huckster friend, get charged with ten counts of indecent exposure.

Tuesday night Blues vindicated themselves of sorts with what coach McManus deems their best effort to date, in yet another loss, this time 79-75 to the YMHA. As far as preparation for tonight's game goes this exercise was probably the best medicine for a very sick patient and should return Blues to a frame of mind in which they can play the best ball possible.

Like Mac the Y is a fast-breaking club, so Blues should know just about what to expect from Mac's big threats Mazza, Dignan, Noble and newcomer Joey Martino.

Mac currently shares the number three spot in the six team loop with a two-two record. Last Saturday they dropped a heart-breaker to league-leading Western Mustangs 76-69. In the just released CIAU top ten rankings, nationally, Mac holds down the number ten position. Certainly would be nice for Blues to blow them the hell out of there!

To date Mac has been plagued by inconsistency of all sorts, and like the Blues problems with turnovers have proved to be their greatest nemesis. Mac boasts the finest defensive record in the league. Blues have the worst offensive record. Can't win 'em all. Mac's offensive leader continues to be Paul Mazza whose 19.25 points per game average ranks him second to Waterloo's Jaan Laaniste.

FREE THROWS: Larry Trafford returns to the Blues lineup tonight. Amid that floundering last Saturday a new light shone for the Blues: in his best game to date Angus Braid hit for 14 points.

Biggest basketball story of the week was New II's crushing, gushing, gnashing victory over Trinity II, 32-8. Wednesday afternoon. Not including unused tickets New II again this week outdrew Varsity. New II management is now negotiating with CTV for television rights to next season's home games. Income from this venture is expected to be invested in securing new glass backboards for the Gnumen to practice on in their Hart House Home.

Saturday at 8 p.m. at Hart House you should be able to witness what Blues swim coach Robin Campbell describes "the best meet of the year" as his powerful team tangles with the McGill Redmen swimmers. McGill should be the squad that provides the Blues with their stiffest competition in the OCAA championships in February.

The Gymnastics and the Fencing teams must travel out of town for their competition this weekend. They both journey to the Royal Military College in Kingston for a joint meet on Saturday.

The Women's Intercollegiate Gym championship for Ontario and Quebec will be held at the Benson Bldg. all day Saturday commencing at 9:30 a.m.

The vacant lot on the corner of St. George and Russell is not a spectacular-looking site, in appearance it is just another chunk of land.

But, this lot, the site of the proposed University of Toronto campus centre has been the focus of more than its share of misunderstanding and mudslinging.

The campus centre began as a result of a student effort to obtain a much-needed student union building for the St. George campus. Today, almost five years after the Students' Administrative Council hired an architect to design the building, the lot sits vacant.

Students and Simcoe Hall officials worked together to plan the campus centre. Today both sides feel frustrated and misunderstood.

Perhaps if it had been another academic or administrative building, tempers would have been less strained. But, it wasn't just another building. It was the campus centre, initiated by students on the Students' Administrative Council.

As one architect comments, "I'd say at the time that the building had a symbolic content for the students, as something that was theirs."

This was a first-time experience for students. They decided they wanted a campus centre, they commissioned an architect, arranged for financial grants from the U of T and the Minister of Education and managed to obtain two bank bids as funding arrangements for the remaining capital.

The students felt they had engineered a tremendous feat and sat back to wait for the appearance of the centre. To date, the building has not even reached the hole in the ground stage of construction and there is little indication that it will in the near future.

The students blame the city and the provincial government. However, most of their anger is aimed at the administration and the Board of Governors.

The reasons why the building was stillborn on the architect's drawing board are complex. No one person or group can legitimately be blamed. Rather than illustrating a clear-cut case of the "bad guys" (Board of Governors) squashing the "good guys" (the students), the campus centre runaround illustrates the problems the university has become burdened with in the last few years.

Unfortunately, the campus centre became the whipping boy. This only intensified the university's problems by worsening relations between students and the administration.

The campus centre story is the story of how the U of T could not get a building built.

The Financial Fiasco

August 1967: Joe Merber and Gerry McMaster poured themselves a glass of champagne and in a fit of celebration raised their arms and welded their glasses against the wall.

They were jubilant. McMaster, chairman of the Campus Centre Committee and Merber, SAC Finance Commissioner, together with Tom Faulkner, SAC President had spent months battling for a campus centre for the University of Toronto.

August 3, 1967 was their day. They received a lucrative financial bid from the Bank of Montreal. This completed the financial negotiations. On paper, the students had all the money necessary to finance the campus centre. Nothing could go wrong. At that moment says McMaster, "The campus centre was so close we could taste it".

Today, two and a half years and many bitter words later there is no money available for the centre.

When the students originally decided to build a student centre William Davis, Minister of Education agreed to provide 50 per cent of the four million dollar capital cost if the students themselves raised money.

The university agreed to supply at least $250,000. Thus the students had to obtain $1,750,000. The students' council invited every chartered banking institution in Canada for tenders and in August 1967 received bids from the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Bank of Montreal.

The Bank of Commerce offered a fifty year prepaid lease of $760,000 for 3,500 square feet of space. They also by mary kate rowan

offered a long term loan to finance the remaining funds and agreed to wait five years for the first repayment.

The Bank of Montreal offered a fifty year prepaid lease of $1,837,500 for 8,500 square feet of space.

However, the Bank of Montreal, unlike the Bank of Commerce insisted upon exclusive banking privileges on the St. George campus.

This meant that during the time of their fifty year lease and subject to any renewal of the lease, the Bank of Montreal would not allow any other bank, trust company or deposit gathering agency to establish a branch on the St. George campus.

The students wanted to accept the Bank of Montreal's offer and sent the bank's letter of intent to the Board of Governors for final approval.

At that point the bubble began to burst.

Neither the Board nor the administration were as enthusiastic about the Bank of Montreal's offer as the students. Their lack of enthusiasm hinged on the Bank of Montreal's demand for exclusive banking privileges on the St. George campus.

When the administration termed the Bank of Montreal offer unsuitable and asked students to reopen bids, students charged the Board of Governors with playing politics and acting in bad faith.

In a letter to this reporter, Tom Faulkner, former SAC president says:

"The delay, the efforts to duck previous commitments, and the final stalling of the Campus Centre by the Board of Governors assume a sinister tinge in the light of the following facts. If two plus two equals innuendo, here it is:

"There were in 1967 more CIBC Directors represented on the U of T Board than there were B of M Directors. Among them was Chairman Henry Borden.

"The CIBC has always been the bank for the University of Toronto.

"It was hinted to us by the Office of the President that the Board was dragging its feet on the centre proposals because it was displeased with the SAC's attitude on reform in the university. (e.g. radical change in the Board itself.)"

Faulkner's letter continues: "I dislike innuendo, but the circumstantial evidence is such that I have grave doubts as to the Board's good faith in the affair of the campus centre.

"Just to bring out all the dirty laundry out in the open, let me say that my father is a B of M employee. You can make of the situation who you will. In my opinion the University unnecessarily lost a fine building, the students unfairly lost a good deal of money, and the B of M was treated in a rather shabby fashion."

Other students involved echo Faulkner's sentiments.

Joe Merber, former SAC finance commissioner agrees with Faulkner that the administration was leery of "student power".

"The feeling that came through," he says, "was that they were afraid of what that control in the hands of students.

"I think the administration got very nervous," he continues. "We were building up an equity and could have used it as a loan basis.

"We were infringing on them. The Board of Governors gave the impression that they should be the ones to build a campus centre if it was required."

However, Faulkner, Merber and McMaster do not doubt that Simcoe Hall officials were enthusiastic about the building.

Gerry McMaster, former campus centre chairman says, "The people we dealt with at the administrative level felt it was worthwhile."

But, McMaster adds, "I really wish I'd had a chance to explain it to the Board of Governors myself, but we never got there.

"I guess you get bitter after a while," he shrugs.

The students are bitter and feel betrayed. They feel that the Board of Governors deliberately stalemated the campus centre.

This feeling filtered to the architect's office. As one architect said cynically "The Board of Governors never really stop anything. They just fail to put it ahead."

Officials in Simcoe Hall strongly deny that the Board deliberately stalled the centre.

One Simcoe Hall official comments:

"I think the students tend to overemphasize the influence of the Board in these matters.

"The Board was prepared to support the building but they were worried about exclusivity, which they should have been worried about. It's their function to be trustees. They also worried that the offer was not as good as it should be."

Alex Rankin, Executive Vice-President (Non Academic) argues that while certain individuals on the Board may not have been as enthusiastic about the project as others, the Board had very good reasons to scrutinize the B of M offer.

Aside from asking for twice as much space as the Bank of Commerce, the Bank of Montreal wanted exclusive banking privileges on the St. George campus.

In the past says Rankin "there has never been any resolution of the Board to grant exclusive privileges to anyone.

"The Board," he adds, "should not tie the whole St. George campus down for 50 years."

Prof. Don Forster, U of T Vice-Provost, says that while the Bank of Montreal offer was better in the short run, in the long run the Bank of Commerce offer was superior.

"They (B of M) were getting cheap space with an exclusive franchise, Forster comments. There was some criticism of the offer in that it was not good enough in respect to the concessions they were getting".

But, he says that the Bank of Montreal offer was better from the students' point of view because it gave them more money.

"The Board," he adds, "was worried primarily about the exclusivity problem."

To further complicate the campus centre debate the rules of the university finance game suddenly changed in March 1968.

The provincial government announced they would grant 95 per cent of the capital non-commercial costs of non-academic buildings (such as the campus centre). Previously the government had been willing to allocate only 50 per cent.

With the debate over exclusivity and the change in finance rules, Rankin suggested that the university try to get 95 per cent of the money from the provincial government. Rankin says the Board agreed to supply the remaining capital.

"Following the March '68 new policy I saw a chance to build the building without a nickel from commercial interests," he explains.

With this in mind he suggested that bids be re-opened to the two banks on a pure annual rental basis.

That way he reasoned, the university could use the bank money as rent to help with operating costs instead of burying the bank money in capital expense. To Rankin, this seemed a more sensible solution.

When he asked the students to reopen their bids they refused.

In his letter Faulkner comments, "We replied rather loudly 'No'. The agreement had been that these were the final bids and the B of M would just as likely reduce their's if given the chance."

Rankin sympathizes with the student's feelings. "When the students were turned down on the exclusivity issue," he says, "I think they felt betrayed and cheated. They felt that dirty big bad business had its hand in there."

"Dirty big bad business did not have its hand in there," he says, "but it's pretty hard to convince the students."

Rankin denies that there was any conspiracy among the Board members. "Believe me, 26 people don't scheme to default something."

Forster notes that to date the university has spent $211,000 clearing the site and paying the architects' fees.

"I don't think," says Rankin "that the governors undertake that kind of work just to be negative about it."

But he adds, "The Board is a good whipping boy."

Somewhere in the campus centre debate effective communication broke down and the two sides stopped listening to each other. Events happened quickly and people lost perspective.

Perhaps a full-time SAC campus centre co-ordinator would have helped. Perhaps a meeting with all the governors and all the students could have cleared the air.

Perhaps not. As Forster comments, "One almost gets the impression the program was fated from the beginning."

Now, the prospect of money for the campus centre looks even more remote. Last February, the provincial government informed the U of T that they would have no new space entitlement until 1975. Therefore, at the present time there is no money available for any building other than the new library at St. George and Hoskin.

Rankin says there may be some chance of the province granting funds to replace old buildings. "Whether some of that can go to Innis College or the campus centre I don't know," he says. At present Innis College is on the list of priorities before the campus centre.

The prospect for a campus centre on this campus looks very dim. "Even if all this money was there today," says Rankin. "We would still have the city to contend with."

As indicated by Rankin, the financial problems were just one thorn plaguing the campus centre. Just as destructive to the proposed centre as the financial fiasco was the "get tough" attitude of the city towards the university.

Watch for Part Two of this series which will probe how city-university relations affected the campus centre.

Student gets $25 ticket for jaywalking in crowd.

Jon Galama (IV SMC) walked across St. George St. Thursday morning, along with "millions of people," and was promptly stopped by a cop who handed him a $25 ticket for "disobeying a walk signal."

Surrounded on all sides by other students, John crossed against a red light at Willcocks St. Although there was no traffic on the street at the time, Jon says the policeman "just picked me out of the bunch."

A spokesman for the Central Traffic division of Metro Police said last night, "We are not cracking down on students in particular," but when a walk signal is disobeyed "we charge everyone" who is in violation of the law.

He pointed out that you "don't have to cross at intersections, you can legally cross anywhere as long as you don't interfere with traffic."

The fine seems quite high considering that if Jon had crossed a few steps away from the intersection, he couldn't have been charged with disobeying a crossing signal.

However, the police spokesman said, "a pedestrian on any street who just steps off the curb can be charged with failing to yield to traffic."

Jon, a foreign student from Holland, plans to take the matter to court rather than pay the $25 fine.

Jaywalking on St. George has always been a way of life for students, heading for Sid Smith from the main campus. Now, it seems, Metro Police are cracking down on the custom.

1300-name petition fails to reinstate New workers

Members of the Worker-Student Alliance visit President Claude Bissell in his office and present a petition calling for the rehiring of three New College workers.

By TREVOR SPURR
Twelve members of the Worker Student Alliance invaded President Claude Bissell's office Friday morning, but failed to regain the lost jobs of three New College cafeteria workers.

The WSA demanded an answer to a 1300-name petition presented on January 16 to J. F. Brook, Executive Assistant to Vice-President A. G. Rankin. The petition requested the administration find jobs for the three workers who were not rehired by Beaver Foods, the new catering firm at New College.

Bissell, who was out when they just entered, was angered at the way the WSA had barged into his office. He said he had never seen the petition.

"Besides you don't make decisions on the basis of petitions," he said. "You think I should respond to every petition I get?" he said.

"The people who signed it might feel they deserve an answer," countered Ronnie Nevin (SGS) of the WSA.

NO RESPONSIBILITY

Bissell denied administration responsibility to find jobs for the three workers.

"The new employer has the right to determine who he will hire. We can't compel him to hire anyone," he said.

"I don't find jobs for people on campus. I can't guarantee employment to people," he added.

WSA member, Tony Leah (II UC), said, "By your actions you have shown you act for business interests on this campus. You supported Honeywell and you support such things as the Institute for Industrial Relations."

The WSA maintains the U of T Police pointed out the three workers as the ringleaders in a strike of 42 cafeteria workers, fired by the old catering firm, Commercial Catering Company.

38 REHIRED

The new firm rehired 38 of the workers. One of the remaining four does not wish to return.

Bissell denied this version of the story.

"It is not my opinion that these people should be taken back, because the catering firm does not want them and they were considered inappropriate for the job," he said.

"If there were an additional 20,000 names on that petition it would need more consideration," he added.

A WSA member replied, "You sit there backing certain interests and you don't even care who is right or wrong."

Bissell said he did not have the power to influence decisions in the manner the WSA believed.

PETTY AUTOCRAT?

"You look at me like a petty autocrat who can just make decisions all by himself. I don't hate that authority," he said.

"If you wish, I will make an appointment for you with Mr.

Malcolm, the Director of Administrative Services. I guarantee you will see him within a week," he said.

The WSA reluctantly accepted the invitation and shuffled out of Bissell's office.

"It certainly was an unexpected pleasure to see all of you, I must say," said the President as he bade them farewell.

Please, no fooling around

Nominations for SAC President and Vice-President open tomorrow. Let's hope that the candidates have some respect for the students who are going to be voting for them.

Very few students take the time and care to examine the campaign platforms of the candidates. That makes it very easy for candidates to get away with the most ridiculous statements about pragmatism and Trudeau-like opportunism. Because few students know what SAC is actually doing, candidates often offer as part of their platform, things that SAC has already implemented. One running team last year promised to institute a regular column in the Varsity telling students what was going on and where. By coincidence, for the last many years, there has been a column in the Varsity called Here and Now in which students and groups submit free the time and place of events. This is only one example of how ridiculous campaign promises can get.

This year, there is no dearth of issues. No candidate for the SAC presidency can ignore them. The issue of the campus centre is one that must be taken up with vigour. The question of parity with academic staff on hiring and firing and other committees will die, much to the delight of the staff die-hards if strong leadership is not taken by SAC.

Apparently many students believe that SAC can be an effective organ when the council and the president are at odds politically. Apparently this is not so. The president doesn't have to be a devout Marxist, or even left-liberal but he must know what issues must be fought and where the interests of the student body lie. Generally candidates haven't a clue about either.

As Don McCulloch says on the opposite page, the only way that the CUG report will be effective is if the students and the staff who weren't instrumental in the writing of the report are forced to go through the process that the CUG commissioners went through.

This can only be achieved if the full-time members of SAC live up to the responsibility of their paid office, especially the president.

Let's not have any candidates this year who run on the politics of opportunism. It's an insult.

LETTERS

According to a statement made by C. H. Fanning, a member of the UTSA steering committee and manager of the University Bookstores, "wages aren't really an issue" with the U. of T. support staff. This bold statement, reported in the January 21st edition of the Varsity, has caused a great number of people to wonder exactly what is the "real issue".

If people are "happy enough" because "they dig their jobs" and really don't feel that they are underpaid, then why this battle between UTSA and CUPE in organizing or unionizing the support staff?

Is it just a question of representation at CUG?

In reality, the majority of people probably don't care who represents them at CUG so long as the representatives will not just play the role of honorary emissaries of "happy" although "underpaid" people, but will fight for the real issues that concern them.

It seems to me that the real issues are:

1.) To have our salaries adjusted to the present standard of living and salaries paid for the same or similar services in the private sector industries or public libraries.

2.) To be treated by this institution, not as second-class citizens, but rather as a group that fulfils an essential role in the university.

At a time when inflation is in full swing and the purchasing power of our hard-earned dollar is less and less every day, a statement such as Mr. Fanning's arouses everyone's anger. The majority of library assistants have not received a raise since July 1968. The remainder of the support staff of the University no doubt received only a mere "cost of living" raise in July 1969. Some may "dig their jobs" but they also have to feed, clothe, and house themselves and their families.

Incidentally, the language used by

Mr. Fanning in attacking Clare Booker shows that he indeed came "from poverty and dirty" but his attitude towards the real problems of the majority of the support staff shows that his sympathies do not lie with his origins.

The above is from the sanity-generating linguistic science of Alfred Korzybski as expressed in his "Science and Sanity". Although it is 15 dollars, I would dare say it is an eminently modest price for an experience of sustained sanity. It is over 700 pages but depending on how you relate to it, it is truly infinite.

Other sanity-generating devices, assuming the will, are any of the books by Fuller beginning with Nine Chains to The Moon and ending with his just-published-paperback Utopia or Oblivion. There is All and Everything (or) Beelzebuh's Tales to His Grandso a prohibitive 1238 pages at an equally prohibitive 18 dollars, and Meetings With Remarkable Men at about half that price — both by Gurdjieff. There is also the much cheaper notes of Gurdjieff's lectures, in Ouspensky's epic account Search for the Miraculous.

Teaching as a Subversive Activity by Postman and Wiengartner can also be a very immediate source of light on the darkness we call "school". But as ever, these are reserved for those who actually dare to look. We have begun and we would end here with H. Poincare and A. N. Whitehead respectively, "To know how to criticize is good, to know how to create is better".

... almost any idea which jags you out of your current abstractions may be better than nothing."

We All Have To Go Through CUG

by Don McCulloch

Director, U of T Advisory Bureau

Forms of political democracy are arriving on Canadian university campuses more than a century after their central appearance in the country as a whole. Unfortunately, they arrive at a time when, throughout the western world, public confidence in our public institutions is at a very low ebb. There is widespread evidence that large numbers of people greet the democratic rhetoric of political leaders with a mixture of cynicism and disbelief, that public willingness to participate in political life is almost non-existent. So, it may very well be that the University is adopting the right forms at the wrong time.

I doubt whether replication of familiar political forms within the University, which the C.U.G. proposes, will ensure significant participation in the governing process or an increase in trust and acceptance of the decisions made by "democratically" constituted governing bodies. Certainly the attempts at democratization on U.S. campuses have not resulted in the hoped for peace. A legacy of distrust, cynicism and apathy virtually ensures that genuine change will not be accepted as such. Thus, students who accept positions on newly democratized governing bodies are seen, at best, as co-opted, wishy-washy liberals and, at worst, as student niggers. And the changes instituted by administration are seen as the acts of frightened men motivated by desires to cling to power. And, paradoxically though understandably, the result is an escalation of demands to the point where the ultimate and necessary use of force to simply preserve any kind of peace is viewed as proof that the changes were not genuine in the first place.

I find this a frightening prospect, and even if only a remote possibility, one that we neglect to consider at our peril. Quite apart from the needs of the University, society has an urgent need to discover new forms of governing appropriate to the times and to the present temper of people. So that if the University community can conceptualize and realize effective new governing forms, this could be a major contribution to human affairs.

I believe that the experiences the members of the C.U.G. had together were more important than the report they produced. Ask any one of them about this, and I think you will come to the same conclusion. They began their task in that state of cheery distrust that is characteristic of all well raised human beings who ever find themselves in the role of negotiator. An observer to the Paris peace talks would likely see the same obfuscating forms of politeness and affability displayed by the U.S. and North Vietnamese delegates. C.U.G. also made changes in the arrangement of the tables around which its members customarily sat. For more than six long months they struggled, not simply to understand the views that they and others held about governing, about community, about a university, but they struggled towards an understanding of each other. They did not end up in agreement about proposals. They did not end up with relationships of high trust and mutual respect. But they did move in these directions to a very considerable extent. They learned much, felt much and most, I believe, would count the experience as among the most important in their lives, regardless of what is done to or with their report.

I take the report seriously, not because I like compromise documents, which it is, but because I know something of the experiences it grew out of. It demonstrates that a group of human beings of differing age and experience, some called students, some professors, some administrators, given time and opportunity, have come to the view that they are most comfortable, most open, most able to learn and function together when power is not a major issue between them. I suspect that the majority of people in the University, given the same time and opportunity and experiences together, would come to a very similar view. But the C.U.G. asks us to accept their position on faith and try to experience their experiences (of which they do not speak) vicariously. This is an impossible request. No one need be surprised at the character and direction of events since the release of the report. There are extreme limits on the degree to which people are changed in their attitudes and behaviour by vicarious experience.

What has been happening since the C.U.G. report reached our hands? The report stresses the building of a community of trusting, sharing, learning, seeking people. It suggests forms of governing that would end autocratic power and distribute decision making both by decentralizing and by extending the franchise. The response? The President (on the eve of the report's release) does not publicly dissociate himself from a hard line Committee of Presidents' Report. Professors reject student parity and look like they are seeking to inherit the power mantle. Support staff are outraged at their virtual exclusion from the proposed governing structures and speak of exerting their power through a strong staff association or union. Professors demand a 22c pay increase and ask for an outside arbitrator. The vast majority of the University community maintain monumental indifference to the report, as well as to these events.

I am not surprised, but I am concerned. I do believe that few things are more important than finding effective means of governing and of building community. I think the events here have meanings far beyond their importance to the University of Toronto. If the University could succeed, it would provide a model for other communities, non-university as well as university. And if it be agreed that one of the by-products, even if not the aims of education, is to assist in the creation of responsible citizens, then a university is uniquely placed to undertake the task of self-consciously developing community and the appropriate forms of governance.

I am suggesting that the C.U.G. report is more the result of a group of people experiencing together than anything else. I am suggesting that the report cannot be effective because people cannot change by vicarious means. I am suggesting that we regard their experience as a pilot study which gives us some idea of what we all might agree to had we been commissioners. I would propose that we all go through that experience, and that we take an academic year to do it. I would suggest that we come together in many groupings, as we do now, but to work on conceptualizing possibilities for living and working together, including division of labour and responsibility, on examining the teaching learning process, on discovering and uncovering our various views of the aims of this community. I would suggest that we periodically test out in action the concepts we develop. I would suggest that what we ordinarily think of as the main business of the University, research and the transmission of the subject matter of the disciplines, be treated as a side-line activity for the year. I believe that little of substance would be lost, and that much would be learned of great and lasting value. We might even succeed in producing genuine community and appropriate forms for governing.

WHAT WE ARE DOING - SAC

What's It All About?

The SAC has realized that it has been delinquent in reporting its actions to the electors. In an attempt to compensate for this, a weekly column will be published, to give a brief idea of how SAC is functioning. Hopefully, these accounts will be as objective as possible. Because the columns will be written by individual council members, some criticism may be levied as to their generality. However, it is hoped that they may prove useful.

Who Does What?

Defining the division of responsibilities (or who gets the blame) in SAC is not easy. The General Council is usually thought of as the head body, but in truth few initiating steps are taken here. It often serves only as a rubber stamp for the decisions made in the smaller Commissions. Thus, a few people make most of the policy. In this way, SAC resembles any large group.

Why?

Most of SAC's decisions can be explained (in theory) by their relevance to a defining group of priorities, of which education heads the list. This, however, is sufficiently ambiguous to cover a large range.

What They Did?

The Executive Commission wields the axe. That is, most of SAC's policy seems to come from there. Lately, much discussion has centred on the question of discipline. It is hard to convey the emotions of a group in a sentence.

Another function which the Executive Commission and Council has adopted seems to be that of the conscience of the students. By this, it is meant that they seem to endorse a great number of groups who come looking for support. A few recent ones have been:

- Stop Spadina Save the City Committee*
- C I A (Community Involvement and Action)*
- American Deserters Group*
- Toronto Research Group*
- Praxis Research Group*
- Spadina Expressway demonstration Group*
- McGill Moratorium Committee*
- New College Food Service Workers*
- Point Blank School*

University Committee

To summarize the efforts of this group in a paragraph is grossly unfair. A tremendous amount of work has gone into the study and planning for the adoption of the report of the Commission on University Government.

Education Commission

The parent of the course unions. Recent work included the hiring of a High School Organizer.

External Affairs Commission

Santa SAC. If you have a group, any group, see the External Affairs Commission for a handout. This is the group that in 45 minutes, can give $1750 to eleven different groups. The spectrum of groups supported is as large as the University. They range from the African Music Club to the Womens' Liberation Movement, touching off between at the Computer Science Club, the Young Socialists, Ukrainian Students, Pan Hellenic Liberation Movement, and the Radical Health Organization.

Services Commission:

They sponsored the F.U. of T, SAC Bookstore, remedial reading program, and the SAC Information Bureau.

Communications Commission:

To the Communications Commission fell the task of trying to coordinate Radio Varsity (which is looking for an F.M. Licence), Random, the Student Handbook, and the Blotter.

Finance Commission:

The impossible task of trying to make ends meet befalls this group. Perhaps it is justified, as it also sets the list of priorities for what comes first.

Apologies:

It is realized that no matter how objective one attempts to be, biases creep in. To those groups that feel slighted, or misrepresented, I can only say that honestly, that was how you appeared in your minutes. With those who feel the conscience of SAC was neglected, I also sympathize. If you feel slighted, why don't you give your impression.

Beauty queen leads protest against "beef auction"

WATERLOO (CUP) — More than 200 singing picketers joined a disqualified candidate in a Women's Liberation protest at the final session of the Miss Canadian University Pageant at Waterloo Lutheran University here Friday.

They were successful in getting one of the 34 candidates for the queen title to join them in a walkout.

Mid-way through the final judging rites, Janiel Jolley of Simon Fraser University, with more than 100 supporters in the auditorium singing "Solidarity Forever," walked onto the stage and demanded two minutes to publicly address the candidates.

Pageant officials had earlier granted Jolley — disqualified before the contest began for threatening a protest — two minutes time at each pageant function.

Over protests and interruptions from Master of Ceremonies Bill Walker, she denounced the "plastic woman image" and dehumanizing nature of beauty contests.

"You should hear the comments some of the men are making," Jolley replied to Walker's protest that the pageant was not a beauty contest.

The 25-year-old activist said she entered the contest to use the pageant as a forum for the views of the Women's Liberation Movement.

Then she appealed to her sisters on the stage to join her in the protest and was supported by York University candidate Judy D'Arcy. The two left the stage and the auditorium with their supporters and joined the 100 picketers who remained outside.

The picketers — men and women from Universities of Waterloo, Waterloo Lutheran, Guelph, and Toronto — sang and carried pickets reading: "Women are not Commodities," "Welcome to the Beef Auction," and "Women's Liberation is Human Liberation," before and during the ceremonies.

At a meeting following the walkout, D'Arcy told the group of her experiences with the pageant.

"Photographers kept trying to make all 34 of us pose sitting in a circle with our legs in the middle around pageant organizer Peter Sharpe," she said, adding that "the escorts had bets on us."

Asked if the pageant was really a beauty contest, D'Arcy said each candidate had only a 10-minute and a 5-minute interview with the judges.

She said that she was disappointed at not being allowed to speak, as she felt at least two other candidates would have joined the walkout.

Meanwhile, back in the auditorium, Ane Sapieja, "a 19-year-old blonde" from Guelph was given a year's use of a car, a fur coat, a one-week trip to Mexico and other gifts after being chosen winner.

Panther slaying "justifiable homicide"

CHICAGO (CUP) — A special coroner's jury here ruled Wednesday that the murder of two Black Panthers by Chicago policemen December 4, 1969, was "justifiable homicide."

The six-man jury was composed of three whites and three blacks. They said the ruling in the death of 21-year-old Illinois Black Panther Chairman Fred Hampton was "based solely and exclusively on the evidence presented to this inquisition."

The only witnesses in the 12-day hearing were Chicago policemen and state experts.

Jury Foreman James Hicks said jurors could not take into consideration charges made by the seven Panthers who survived the predawn raid by fourteen policemen armed with pistols, rifles and submachine guns.

The Panthers refused to testify because they face criminal charges of attempted murder and aggravated assault in connection with the raid. They have charged that police entered Hampton's apartment shooting and murdered Hampton and 22-year-old Mark Clark.

The policemen, all assigned to the State Attorney's office said that a 10-minute gun battle was touched off by a shotgun blast fired from inside the apartment. The only supporting evidence for the claim was blood matching Clark's found on one shotgun.

An empty shell casing found in the apartment matched test firings on that gun, and two other casings matched another seized shotgun. But investigators found no evidence that either shotgun was fired during the raid.

Hicks said the question of who fired the first shot was unimportant in reaching the unanimous conclusion.

However, evidence heard Tuesday indicated that police investigators have found no slugs or pellets fired from any of the 17 weapons police say they seized in the raid. The slugs recovered from the walls of the apartment and the bodies of the murdered Panthers only match police weapons.

Clark and Hampton are only two of more than 30 Black Panthers murdered in police and FBI raids against their headquarters and homes in the last two years. More than a dozen others, including the top leadership of the party, await trials throughout the U.S., on bail of up to $50,000 each.

SURVIVAL

BOSTON (CUP) — Students and police clashed Thursday in front of Northeastern University's Alumni Hall in a protest against the appearance of S. I. Hayakawa, President of San Francisco State College and Guru of the law and order set on North American campuses.

Approximately 200 demonstrators, carrying Viet Cong and anarchist flags, tried to gain admission to Hayakawa's speech at the campus, but were beaten back by police.

About 30 persons were arrested on charges of assault and disorderly conduct.

Hayakawa, recently voted the second most popular man in California behind actor-turned-governor Ronald Reagan, spoke on "Can American Colleges Survive the 20th Century?"

He advised his audience, many of whom heckled and jeered during his speech, that American youth should be press-ganged into national service in such areas as hospitals, mental institutions or the Peace Corps.

"This is your crusade and you should be getting involved," he said.

New student union may be formed

SASKATOON (CUP) — Five major western universities have voted not to attend a meeting at McGill University early in February to discuss forming a new national student union.

At a meeting here January 17 and 18, the five universities decided instead to concentrate on forming strong provincial unions, and working together on problems of "mutual concern" such as unemployment.

Represented in Saskatoon were the Universities of British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan (Regina and Saskatoon campuses). Delegates from the Provincial Student Associations of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta also attended.

The universities agreed not to attend the Montreal meeting because the forces at work to destroy the Canadian Union of Students were still present, and they felt no viable students' association could emerge.

Instead, the universities will meet in Calgary February 6-8 to discuss student unemployment, and again late in March to talk about unemployment, accessibility to post-secondary education, pollution research and student participation in university government.

Law votes on SAC tomorrow

The outcome of tomorrow's Faculty of Law referendum vote remains in doubt. The students will vote on continued membership in the Students' Administrative Council, and the results will be binding on the Student Law Society.

Dan Ferguson, President of the Law Society, said, "When the issue came up most students would have voted to pull out. Since then they have thought about it and will probably vote to stay in."

He said the issue was "oversimplified. Students want a realistic solution, but they should stay in the SAC and find a solution there."

Ruth Mesber (I Law), a member of the Law Society Executive, said that it was "difficult to say which way the referendum would go." She felt that it would be "politically unwise to withdraw from the SAC at this time."

"It's looking excellent in favour of withdrawal," said Bob Vernon (III Law), the SAC Rep who spearheaded the drive to pull out. Vernon said he hoped "that the students at the law school would see fit to withdraw from the SAC and restructure student government."

John Snippen, another Law Society executive member, thought it would be a toss up. He favoured withdrawal, not because it did not do anything for Law, but because it does not seem to accomplish very much.

"I personally want Law to stay in any campus-wide organization for the time being", said Larry Levine, another executive member. He felt that Law should stay in the SAC.

Vaughan defends firing

Last August Miss Repo was employed to facilitate departmental organization and write reports for the Graduate Students' Union Executive. She was fired last Thursday since her performance and behaviour did not warrant our earlier expectations. The report, which she secretly prepared and distributed without Executive authority, was one in a series of unsatisfactory actions. Unfortunately the Varsity's reporting has overstressed this issue and has printed her allegations without substantiation.

The elected Executive was extremely tolerant of Miss Repo's idiosyncracies. Miss Repo completed one graduate course at the U of T before dropping out. She preaches the familiar Marcusean idea of false consciousness, that is, we students do not really know what we want. Her reports were so highly charged with jargon, platitudes and high-minded clichés as to make them impractical as a rational base for change within the university community. The article printed in last Friday's Varsity is a prime example of her delusions.

Miss Repo has used the Graduate Students Union for her own political purposes. She prepared and printed the Trepann Court Residents Association Bulletin at the GSU. She privately let groups use GSU facilities with no authorization of the Executive. Her actions have become increasingly erratic and uncooperative. She has not fulfilled the terms of her employment at the GSU.

Recently she struck a member of the Executive who questioned whether the group Miss Repo had allowed into the back office was a graduate student group. This group, the Canadian Liberation Movement, was typing, printing and collating a newsletter in English and Italian for the Canadian Concrete Forming Workers Union.

Mrs. Repo's performance and behaviour, including her assault and her theft of GSU property, have shown that she was doing a disservice to the Graduate Students Union. Obviously no organization can tolerate any employee that works single-mindedly against its better interests. I terminated her employment and was supported by the Executive.

Loyola board takes firing to court

MONTREAL (CUP) — In a surprise announcement Thursday, the administration of Loyola College here declared it would take the case of dismissed physicist S. A. Santhanam to court, to obtain legal justification for firing him last term.

The move comes as the administration's response to a report issued by the Canadian Association of University Teachers investigation team into the Santhanam affair. It is seen by observers at Loyola as an attempt to foil CAUT attempts to act as binding arbiter in Santhanam's case.

Observers also felt the administration would win the case, which will go to court February 16.

Santhanam signed a statement in December, 1967, stating his intention to resign from the Loyola faculty in 1969, but was later given a contract for the 1969-70 year which "superceded all other verbal agreements."

But the Loyola Board of Trustees fired him anyway, and has refused to pay his salary for this year.

The CAUT report, product of an investigation which began December 6 without the cooperation of the Loyola administration, was delivered secretly to both Santhanam and the administration January 16, for comments by both parties.

In a 60-page rebuttal, the administration reportedly rejected the recommendations of the report, which called for binding arbitration in the case.

In a meeting January 24, the CAUT Academic Freedom and Tenure Committee accepted the investigation report and authorized the CAUT executive to find out if the Loyola administration would accept binding arbitration.

Loyola President, Patrick Malone had until Friday to reply.

Presumably, failure to respond would have brought a blacklisting of Loyola by the CAUT, a procedure in which members of the faculty pressure group — which includes most Canadian academics — would be warned away from seeking employment at Loyola.

Last fall, the Santhanam case touched off a series of incidents which have kept the Loyola campus in a state of near-crisis all year. The situation cooled off recently when the administration agreed to reconsider the firing of 28 faculty members.

Many of the professors had supported student actions in opposition to the administration over the Santhanam affair.

The Loyola action undercuts the credibility of the CAUT, which claims it acts to preserve the interests of Canadian faculty in disputes with university administrations.

CAUT officials were unavailable for comment over the action.

Petition starts

Seventy students in the Faculty of Architecture, Urban and Regional Planning and Landscape Architecture have signed a petition expressing "dissatisfaction with the present plans for the Spadina Expressway."

The petition also recommends stopping expressway construction "pending further examination of alternatives."

There are approximately 260 students in the Faculty.

A. J. Dakin, chairman of the Faculty, came out in support of the Expressway in an article published in the Globe and Mail last December 27.

SwimBlues beat Oswego States, McGill

DOUBLE VICTORY FOR SWIM BLUES

The University of Toronto Swim Team defeated Oswego State on Saturday at 2 p.m. and bounced back the same to take on McGill Redmen in an 8 o'clock thriller.

The afternoon provided Blues with better than adequate competition when you consider that seven top swimmers were resting for the evening meet. Adam Gesing, John Twohig, and Peter Richardson won the 1000, 200, and 100 yd. free-style events respectively. In addition, Bob Heatley and Ross Ballantyne put in excellent times in off events. Heatley won the 200 IM and Ballantyne the 200 Back. The meet ended 66-31; Blues seventh win in eight starts.

Then came McGill. Some observers suggested, before the meet, that this might be a preview of the championships, others predicted that the meet would go down to the last relay. By the end of the meet, the fans were not disappointed. It was a cliff hanger until the completion of the final event.

BLUES IN HOLE

Before the meet started, Blues went deep in the hole by the results of the diving events. The diving, run off in the Benson Building at 4 p.m. left Toronto on the short end of the 16-2 score. In a close meet a difference of 14 points is almost impossible to overcome.

For each event, strategy scoring and swimming were all crucial. The first two events were more or less routine. Toronto took the Medley Relay and McGill took first and second in the 1000 free. Score after 4 events was Toronto 10, McGill 23.

GUINNESS SHARP

Mike Guinness then showed his explosive power in the 200

Free by pulling away from OQAA champions Dave Johnson and Ron Nesbitt. Mike's victory posted new pool and team records. Theo Van Ryn and Jim Adams followed 1-2 in the 50 Free and Jim Shaw added another pool record in the 200 IM. The score at the end of the first half was Toronto 29, McGill 32.

The second half followed exactly the same pattern. Zajchowski of McGill won the 200 Fly. Jim Adams won the 100 free and Barry Bowerman won the 200 Breast. Jim Shaw broke the pool record for the 200 Back and Mike Guinness set new pool and team records in the 500 Free. With 4 impressive victories in the second half, Toronto was still not able to put down McGill. The score with one event remaining was Toronto 55, McGill 51. The final event, which is scored 7-0, was therefore the deciding event.

CLOSE FINISH

Both relay teams were evenly matched, but the Toronto quartet of Doug MacIntosh, John Twohig, Jim Adams, and Theo Van Ryn got a lead on Twohig's second leg and never looked back. Their winning time on the relay set a new pool record and settled the score 62-51 in favor of Toronto.

Blues will be away this weekend at MacMaster Friday night and at the Open Ontario Championships Saturday and Sunday. Last home meet will be against Guelph on Wed. Feb. 11 at Hart House 7:30 p.m.

Peace descends on campus

A World Council of Peace delegation including German Pastor Martin Niemöller, former Indian defence minister Krishna Menon, plus a spokesman for North Vietnam, will visit the U of T campus this Thursday.

They will address a public meeting at Convocation Hall at 1 p.m. Following that, Menon will visit the International Student Centre and Niemöller, a leader of church opposition to Hitler, will attend a reception at Hart House. Thursday night they will speak at the College of Education auditorium.

Members of the eight-man delegation, who are visiting Canada to campaign for peace and against the war in Vietnam, are guests of the Canadian Peace Congress. They attended a meeting to discuss strategy for opposition to the Vietnam War this weekend at St. Jerome, Que.

Hoopsters impressive but McMaster triumphs 73-67

By PETER WHITE

Toronto basketball Blues fashioned their finest effort this season Friday night at McMaster in a 73-67 loss. Walking into the furor of a packed McMaster house after suffering through the apathy of a two game home stand could not but help the Toronto cause. However in the final analysis it was the new found pride displayed by the Varsity cagers which kept them in contention to the final seconds of this most exciting game.

Key to the Varsity cause was the Herculean effort put out by veteran centre John Hadden who's performance moved Mac fans to rave platitudes. Many noted his improvement from last year. What they failed to realize was that not only is Hadden an improved player but his performance depends upon a strategy designed to wrest from him his potential. Blues increasingly find themselves filtering the ball into Hadden in the low post where they are not only assured of a shot but also a possible offensive rebound.

Friday night Hadden worked that low post to the tune of 22 points. More importantly his 25 rebounds added a measure of security to an offense prone to turning over the ball. Hadden can be expected to continue as Blues chief offensive threat and if he continues the season in the style he displayed Friday there should certainly be all-star consideration for him.

TRAFFORD A LEADER

Larry Trafford in his return to the Toronto line-up displayed a fine head and showed he is capable of giving Blues direction and leadership on the floor. His sharp passes and excellent ball control were key factors in keeping Blues alive whereas in past games turnovers and other lapses in crucial spots spelled rout.

It was also a big game for guard Mike Katz. For the first time this season he seemed loose and his 11 points, mostly on the long jumpers for which he is known, spurred the Toronto second half comeback which just failed to produce a first victory.

It was McMaster's game until the ten minute mark of the second half. However Blues gave indication early that this game was not to follow the usual exasperating pattern. Down 7-2 in the opening moments they fought back to tie the score. It was the first time this Varsity squad has recovered from anything, let alone a deficit. What caused it one cannot definitely say but throughout the first half, though they trailed 38-26 at its conclusion, Blues were hustling all over the damned court and matching the pace set by the speedy Macmen. Had they not missed so many shots on the rim Blues conceivably could have held the lead at half time.

The first ten minutes of the second half were fought evenly, and it was during this time that Blues began to look for Hadden under the offensive bucket. His efforts were the equalizing factor at this stage of the game.

COMEBACK HOPES

At the 10:20 mark of the half Blues were down 59-45 and you could imagine just about anything happening (past history being the gore it is) but a Toronto victory in the making. But glad tidings: eight straight Varsity points, all on inside shots, brought the score to 59-53 with eight minutes left. Time enough to steal the game and the crown jewels.

In the closing minutes Toronto flirted with victory. With a minute left they were down by four at 69-65. However a McMaster freeze drew an intentional foul from Toronto at 47 seconds and that was that. Final: Toronto 67 - McMaster 73.

Disappointing - yes. Blues certainly had played well enough to win. Things may at last be coming together, too late to regain respectability through some measure of consistency. Next game is at home against Windsor on Saturday afternoon.

First fight of season

FIRST FIGHT

The loosely-called game saw more highsticking, elbowing, slashing and holding than any game this season, although only 18 penalties were handed out. But something had to give, and eight minutes into the second period Varsity fans witnessed their first real fight of the season.

It started from a pileup around the Loyola net, with everyone getting their sticks up. The two main attractions were Paul Laurent paired with John Hutton, and Bryan Tompson matched against Carriere.

Eventually it narrowed down to Tompson and Carriere, who started off with a cudgeling exhibition but soon dropped their gloves and settled down to some serious slugging. The first round was declared a draw, but the second round saw Carriere deck Tompson as they wrestled along the boards. Both players received two minutes for minor penalties for highsticking, majors for fighting and game misconducts.

BLUENOTES: Coach Tom Watt was critical of the linesmen for not breaking up the fights sooner. . . "When I see one of my players being beaten," he said, "that's when I'm tempted to send the team over the boards" . . . one reason there have been so few fights this year is that fighting now carries the threat of a game misconduct, which in turn means a report to league headquarters . . . that doesn't apply to interleague exhibition games . . . shots on goal were 37-32 advantage Loyola, one of the few times this year Blues have been outshot . . . three stars as picked by the myopic penalty box crew were Donnelly of Loyola and St. John and Parsons of Toronto . . . next home game is an important match with Waterloo on Wednesday . . . Waterloo, incidentally, was beaten for the second time Friday night by Windsor, 6-4 . . . the defeat, barring unforeseen calamity, means Waterloo must win both their games with Toronto to have a hope of taking first place in the Western Division OQAA hockey race . . .

Both teams score late as Blues-Loyola battle to draw

By JIM COWAN

Varsity Blues fans would have been just as happy if the third period of Friday night's hockey game against Loyola Warriors had lasted only 19 minutes.

Warriors, with six attackers on the ice, scored with 15 seconds left in the game after a shot by John Donnelly was deflected past Blues' goalie Grant Cole to tie the game at 3-3.

Loyola fans no doubt regarded it as merely justice for an earlier disputed goal by Toronto.

Theoretically so-called "cheap" goals even out over time. Friday, they equalized in just 50 seconds.

With less than two minutes remaining, Blues' centre John Wright started down right wing. As he crossed the Loyola blue-line defenseman Pat McCool lined him up, with the expressed intention of introducing him to the fans in the fifth row seats. Trouble was, Wright slipped through, and McCool went heavily into the boards, re-injuring some tender knee ligaments.

GOAL DISPUTED

While the Loyola supporters yelled for a whistle, Wright swept around the net and poked the puck into a maze of players, and lo and behold, the red light went on. The time: 18:55.

Then the fun started. Loyola claimed play should have stopped when their player was injured and lying on the ice. The rule is that play can only be stopped if the injured player's team gets possession of the puck.

The visitors also argued that Toronto's Bill Buba was in the crease and/or that Buba had pushed goalie Rocky Martin and the puck over the line.

It was to no avail. Referee

Zip Thompson waved them away and indicated he was no longer interested in discussing the matter.

Loyola, still seething, stormed into the Varsity end. Brian St. John tried to flip the puck high out of his zone, but it hit Donnelly on the shoulder and stayed in. Donnelly passed to teammate Danny O'Conner, took O'Conner's return pass and blasted a low shot at Blues' net.

Cole said after the game he had the original shot covered, but that it was deflected over his pad at the last moment by a stick in front of the net. The time: 19:45.

ST. JOHN OPENS

Blues opened the scoring while short handed at 19:50 of the first period when Larry Carriere, behind his own net, tried to clear the puck around the boards. The disc hit a gate edge and deflected out to St. John, who was all alone in front of the goalie. Martin sprawled, and the Blues' captain whipped the puck past him and into the net.

Loyola tied the game up at 6:09 of the second on a goal by McCool, assisted by Alain Tremblay, and went ahead at 9:18 of the period when Donnelly fired a rising shot past Cole from 30 feet out.

Blues came back to tie the match at 13:45 when Mike Boland cut in on Martin from right wing and shot along the ice. The puck eluded the goalie, then hit the far post and went in. Nick Holmes and St. John assisted on the play.

Although the game meant nothing to the two teams in terms of standings, it was anything but an "exhibition" game. The teams are ranked one-two by the CIAU and Friday night each was out to prove they were number one.

Unfortunately for Blues there weren't more situations like these in Friday's 3-3 tie with Loyola. Above, John Wright (4) scores Blues' third goal as he tucks puck behind Martin. Loyola players avoid strike participation

By LYNDON LITTLE

Athletes (both professional and amateur) are by reputation notoriously apolitical.

Whether they might be an Arthur Ash, trying to play a tennis tournament in South Africa, or a National hockey team, hoping to represent its country in international competition, basically they just wish the politicians would leave them alone and let them do their own thing.

However, the other side of the coin is that athletes are often accused of using their commitment to sports as an excuse for their failure to involve themselves in the great issues of the day.

In many cases though, the young athletes of today feel themselves as representatives of a past culture. Often they feel themselves more akin to the present adult generation who respect the hard work and sacrifice that a dedicated hockey or football player must endure. They find themselves with little empathy for their fellow students who turn to militant politics as an outlet for their energies and frustrations rather than to the hockey rink or the football field.

INOFFENSIVE

We've all witnesses at least once too often the standard interview with the well-mannered local sports celebrity who, when asked to give his views on a current contentious issue, usually mumbles something to the effect that he "doesn't want to offend anybody or any particular group and that he just hopes that all sides can reach a harmonious settlement".

Because then, of this reputation that athletes have acquired for non-participation in political questions it would be interesting to find out how, if at all, the recent disturbances at Loyola College in Montreal effected their fine hockey team and whether or not any of the players actually became personally involved.

The question was put to the Loyola coach Dave Draper as he leaned on the boards of Varsity Arena Friday morning and watched his team sprint through an hour long workout in preparation for their clash that evening with Varsity Blues.

"It definitely did have a deleterious affect on our squad," he began.

ARENA CLOSED

"When they closed the school for the one week they also shut down our arena (the Wigwam) — which was certainly a shock to us. We then had to find outside practise ice and were lucky to get some at Pointe Clair and McGill."

During the time they were locked out of their home the Warriors had to play one previously scheduled exhibition game against McGill and one league game against RMC.

"On top of this," he added, "the guys had to worry about their academic future as it might be affected by any decisions that could be reached about the future of Loyola."

But when it came down to the gut question of whether any of his team had actually taken part in any of the demonstrations or sit-in, the stereo-type of the apathetic athlete held true.

"No," he answered emphatically, "I'm sure that being intelligent men that they are probably capable of discussing the issues of the situation like anyone else, but, as college hockey players they've got too much else to do to get personally involved."

Heavy turnout votes to keep Law in SAC

By SUSAN REISLER

Law students at U of T voted 192 to 123 yesterday to remain in the Students' Administrative Council.

Over 75 per cent of the law students turned up to vote on the SAC referendum, next year's SAC representative and the new Law Society Council.

First year students voted heavily in favor of SAC with a more moderate "yes" vote coming from second and third years.

Dan Ferguson (III Law), the outgoing Law Society president, said he was quite delighted with the results.

"I think it's a hopeful indication that law students are dropping their conservative image and taking a realistic approach to issues," he said.

UNHAPPY WITH SAC

"Most students are unhappy with SAC the way it is but they showed realism in not abandoning the council without having an alternative."

Steve Traviss (I Law) said that he was pleased law remained in the SAC.

"I think that law students should work with the rest of the campus and take an interest in the Commission on University Government," he said.

Bob Vernon (III Law), whose SAC term ended yesterday with the election of next year's SAC representative Craig Perkins (I Law), moved the motion in the Law Society meeting to hold the SAC membership referendum. He campaigned for withdrawal from SAC.

REGRETTABLE

Vernon said the students were "barraged by propaganda from Ferguson". He found the whole thing "fairly regrettable".

His attitude toward SAC came partially from having to sit through "hours and hours of useless meetings that ended nowhere," he said.

"I just hope that all the people who expressed their concern for SAC will come out and do something next year," Vernon added.

Peter Gilchrist (II Law), the new Law Society president, said that he was pleased that students were offered a choice when voting for the new Society members.

Gus Abals, Steve Traviss (left) and Bab Vernan (right) are among these law students scrutinizing ballots.

The students voted 200 to 80 in favor of Gilchrist, whose "activist" campaign defeated Julius Melnitzer (II Law) and brought into the Law Society his entire activist slate.

ACTIVE LAW SOCIETY

"I think it is an indication that students want an active Law Society," Gilchrist said.

Gilchrist's platform stated that the new Society would continue with SAC but investigate remaining with reduced fees.

They are also in favor of CUG implementation, and they are pushing towards a parity situation on their faculty council by asking for 15 student members. Parity would be 27.

The new Law Society will also propose curriculum changes that would bring the law school closer to the rest of the academic community

The other newly-elected members of the Law Society are Steve Clarke (II Law) Vice-president, Ian Roland (I Law) second vice-president and James Beamish (I Law), second year representative.

Protest candidate explores the ugly process of a beauty pageant

By KAREN COULTER

Judy Darcy was a queen for a week and hated every minute of it.

As York University's official representative in Waterloo Lutheran's Winter Carnival Queen Pageant, Judy curled her hair "for the first time in a year" and set off for a week of royal wiving and dining as the guest of the carnival committee.

"The pageant was presented to us (the candidates) as an opportunity to meet students from all over Canada. The beauty queen angle was really played down," said Miss Darcy.

The emphasis was on finding the right personality to represent the spirit of the carnival. At Friday night's final judging, MC Bill Walker summed up the criteria, "... poise, charm and all those qualities that make up a complete human being."

A member of the Women's Liberation Movement, Miss Darcy believes that women cannot achieve full human potential within the present framework of society. With the support of the WLM, Judy entered the contest as an avowed protest candidate. "Although I wasn't sure at first exactly what role to play," she said.

THEIR VERY OWN ESCORTS

During the four days of festivities the candidates were billeted in women's residences on campus and shepherded about to various social functions in "official" carnival cars. Every "queen" was provided with her very own official escort for the duration of the pageant.

"I was really upset by the degradation suffered by both the candidates and the other girls in residence," said Miss Darcy. She cited the subservience with which their hostesses attended to their needs. "It far exceeded the realm of hospitality," she said.

"At one of the parties we attended, I heard another girl say to her friend, 'Let's get out of here. We can't compete with all those beautiful girls.'"

"Even the candidates themselves were intimidated by the roles they were expected to play. Most girls changed their outfit three or four times a day. I found myself wearing eye make-up and setting my hair. It was a real shock. I thought I was strong enough to resist the pressure, but I even became self-conscious because I was heavier than most of the others".

Miss Darcy found an afternoon curling engagement particularly offensive. "While many of the girls played the helpless female role, photographers from the local papers caught them in various cute or ungracious poses."

SEX REACTION

At a press conference at the Skyline Motel, photographers would say things like "Sex" and then photograph the girls' reaction.

Each of the candidates was given two personal interviews with the panel of judges. Lois Smith, Prima Ballerina of the National Ballet and CBC's Bruno Gerussi were among them.

"Since I was an avowed protest candidate, they asked me fairly political questions. Gerussi especially seemed pleased that I was interested in politics and commented on how different I was from the other candidates," said Judy.

Most of the candidates were pleased and flattered at the opportunity to represent their respective Judy Darcy, a disgusted entry in a beauty pageant.

Pageant protest schools in the pageant. U of T's Blue and White candidate, Sheila Willson (III Vic) said, "It was a really tremendous chance to meet a lot of people. I think the girls offered a bit of charm and grace to the event. The contest itself was really secondary."

Miss Willson maintained that personality, rather than appearance, was the overriding standard of selection. While admitting that she would have been surprised at a candidate who was 40 pounds overweight, she added "I tend to think that there's something mentally wrong with a girl who's 40 pounds overweight. There's a sort of slackness in her personality."

NERVOUS AND DISTRESSED

Almost all of the candidates were nervous and distressed at the prospect of walking down the "T"-formation stage into the audience. "I managed to get out of it during rehearsals by hiding behind the girl in front of me," said Judy.

The disqualification of Janiel Jolly, Simon Fraser's entrant and fellow Women's Liberationist, cast a shadow over the entire pageant. Though Mrs. Jolly did not make an appearance until the final evening of the contest, several of the candidates expressed curiosity and a desire to meet her. "Almost as though they expected her to have two heads," laughed Miss Darcy.

Although Mrs. Jolly declared her intention to enter the pageant as a protest candidate early in November, she was not disqualified by the officials until two weeks before the carnival, ostensibly because she was married.

Miss Darcy, was, however, allowed to stand as York's representative. "The entry form did not enquire about our marital status. Perhaps it took them that long to find out that Janiel was married," ventured Miss Darcy. "Beauty pageant organizers usually prefer their queens intact." There were no other married women in the contest.

Miss Darcy says that the committee admitted privately that it feared scenes and adverse publicity which might alienate sponsors. The Ford Motor Co. and local furriers and cosmeticians had donated the prizes. This year for the first time, the Friday night finale was not telecast live.

Immediately preceding the final judging on Friday night, Mrs. Jolly was scheduled to speak for two minutes. When she first approached the mike, MC Walker attempted to confine her remarks to a question-and-answer session.

APPEAL FOR SUPPORT

When the audience baited her on her marital state and her American citizenship, (although one of the candidates was also American), Mrs. Jolly turned to the candidates behind her on the stage and appealed for support.

Miss Darcy stepped forward and attempted to speak on Mrs. Jolly's behalf. She reports that Walker then became quite flustered and said, "Look, Darcy... Miss Darcy..."

"I was extremely upset and on the verge of tears at that point," said Judy "so I withdrew from the contest and left with Janiel and my friends in the audience. It must have really galled that MC to have to announce my name as one of the semi-finalists."

Bill Lawson versus city — round two

Bill Lawson, the smiling owner of the Andrews Catering truck that squats perennially in front of Sidney Smith Hall, got a letter the other day that may mean that he will lose his vending license and his livelihood.

The letter gave notice that he is required to appear before the Metro Licensing Commission to discuss the renewal of his license.

Bill has been ticketed several times under City By-law 141-67 which states that he is not allowed to park his truck for more than ten minutes at one parking meter. A second by-law provides that he is only allowed to park his truck for 30 minutes on any one block, after which he must move to another block.

Bill ran into the same problem last year. After an article in the Varsity, 430 U of T students and professors signed a petition demanding the repeal or suspension of by-laws limiting the parking of catering trucks and/or special provisions for the parking of the trucks on University property.

The petition has so far been unsuccessful.

An attempt by George Majic, a law student and Lawson's legal advisor last year, to have the University allow trucks to be parked on University property, was also unsuccessful.

"None of the other drivers have come close to losing their licenses," he told the Varsity yesterday. He spoke of policemen who waited inside Sid Smith and then rushed out to serve him a summons after he had overstayed the 10-minute limit.

Bill doesn't know why he is the one being picked on, and he is not sure who, if anyone, is making the complaints to the police. He thinks it may be some of the restaurant owners around the campus or maybe the big caterers in the university who dislike competition.

Anyway, Bill is not too worried about that now. He's more concerned about the fact that he has to appear in City Committee Room 2, at 2:15 tomorrow and face the possibility of losing his license and his job.

This, because he wants to park outside Sidney Smith and sell sandwiches and coffee to U of T students.

Violence inevitable in South Africa

By JIM KARAMITANIS

A prominent American journalist called on Canadian students Monday to support the South African nationalist movement.

Aaron Segal, editor of Africa Report, a magazine on third-world affairs, was speaking to some forty students at New College.

"What goes on in South Africa" he said, "is the most flagrant example of man's inhumanity to man in the world."

Segal said he was convinced the conflicts plaguing South Africa "are going to be resolved by violence."

He urged students to provide the freedom-fighters with:

- books and vocational training facilities, especially for the refugees.

- transistor radios and watches so that guerrillas can coordinate their movements, and tennis shoes, "not boots because they leave tracks."

- publishing and communication facilities to counteract the propaganda spread by the governments.

- medical supplies, especially antibiotics when are difficult to obtain. "The nationalists can get the arms they need from the socialist countries."

Financially, he said, Canada is involved "up to her navel" in South Africa. "I think Canada can get out if there is a sufficient mobilization of opinion," he said.

He urged students to pressure the Canadian government to refuse to participate in any sports activities in which the Republic of South Africa is involved.

He also suggested the imposition of a "moral tax on immoral profits" on the extra profits Canadian companies make by exploiting cheap African labour. The money thus collected could go to United Nations committees on Africa.

Segal said that Portugal is using NATO equipment to fight colonial wars in Angola. He suggests that Canada should move to exclude Portugal from NATO and that our military attaches in Lisbon "get off their rear ends" and make sure no NATO equipment is shipped to Africa.

This is not, repeat not, an editorial

"Fools rush in..."

I write in reply to that fanciful letter from the 'Women's Liberation U of T Campus Group', regarding Hart House.

What the women do not realize is that Hart House is far too small to accommodate both men and women. That should be obvious to all. The traditions and atmosphere of the institution would be ruined forever. Just imagine the petty gossip that could be heard in the Common Rooms and the library!

The fact is, my dear ladies, that the men of the University want a place to themselves, and do not want Hart House open to the 'general woman', especially the type that possesses the audacity to write such letters to the public press!!! You girls belong to the militant suffragettes, or the Temperance League. (Remember, Miss Pankhurst was killed under the King's horse at the Derby of 1914).

As soon as we give you the Arbor Room, you want the run of the Record Room, the Music Room, and the Library, not to mention the Great Hall, which is already too loud with the cheap soprano tone.

The only run of the house you'll get is the run from Soldier's Tower right around and into the traffic of Queen's Park.

If you think that Hart House as an institution is out of date, just canvas the men who use it daily. The fact of the matter is, that not only do the men resent you women pushing your way in, but as I think the majority of the female students also resent you.

It seems quite apparent that you women are not ever going to be satisfied. You've got the vote, you've got equal pay with men in the professions, you've got your babies... what more do you want???

I suggest that if you want to be treated as ladies, start acting like them; you can't expect any respect from us if you continue to act like common nuisances. Your mistake lies in the fact that you obviously choose someone like Judy LaMarsh for your leader. Come back when you learn a little psychology about dealing with men. Even your letter which I am forced to reply to isn't too cleverly worded.

If you feel jealous, start your own club. Maybe then you will be 'Liberated', but then we will be liberated from you.

The heading on your letter said that 'the Anacronism Still Stands'.

I hope that when you girls read this, you will be sitting down; can't have any anachronisms standing, you know!

P.S. Let them pay $12 a year.

Damn Hart House

Letter: Let's occupy the Benson Building

If the university sends you a letter telling you to pay a $50 fine for failing to complete their compulsory physical education program, ignore it.

First year women at the University of Toronto (St. George Campus) still have to take a compulsory physical education requirement.

If a student fails to complete the program, the Chief Accountant's Office is notified; the Fees Dept. puts the student on the Arrears list; the arrears list is sent to respective colleges and faculties; the student is not allowed to write her exams if her name appears on the list.

First year men do not have a phys. ed. requirement because Hart House does not have enough facilities, neither do men and women on the Scarborough and Erindale Campuses also because of a lack of facilities.

The St. George Campus women are being discriminated against. Failure to complete the program makes them ineligible to write their exams and ultimately to get their degrees. If they do get their transcript, it says "failing to meet physical education requirement."

If a student is rich she can afford to pay the $50 fine.

The compulsory aspect of the program is not the only discriminatory thing. A woman must know how to swim. Failing to pass the swim test obligates a student to take swimming for one hour a week for a year.

If she fails the test, that renders her eligible for all the other penalties.

Last year a petition, circulated by Irene Bowman, then in her first year, was signed by about 200 first year girls. Even though most of them liked the program, they rejected the compulsory aspect of it.

The Students' Administrative Council passed motions, held discussions with the Dept. of Athletics and Phys. Ed. (Women) and even struck a committee to prepare a report.

The petition was filed away in Simcoe Hall and forgotten; questionnaires were circulated; the report was completed. That was the last of it. Nothing was done.

At present about 63 per cent of the Benson Building is used by students in the compulsory programme, while only 18 per cent is used by students in the four year programme in the School of Physical and Health Education.

Despite meetings between committees and SAC members, the Dept. of Athletics claimed that nothing formal was ever presented to either them or the Board of Governors — compulsory physical education is a Board ruling.

At its last meeting, the SAC passed a motion demanding that the $50 fine and all academic penalty be abolished immediately, and if a student completed the programme it should be recorded on her transcript.

The motion does not call for the immediate abolition of the compulsory aspect by request of the Dept. of Athletics. Once again the SAC has allied itself with estates other than the student body.

There is a one month time limit in the motion so that changes could go into effect this academic year. A sit-in in the Benson Building should be rather interesting. They have all sorts of facilities with which students could amuse themselves.

If you have not been to your physical education class recently and you get a letter telling you to pay a $50 fine throw it in the garbage. If you keep getting more send the letters to the Committee on Compulsory Phys. Ed. c o SAC office.

The report that sparked the GSU controversy . . .

By MARJALEENA REPO

The following is a slightly condensed text of the organizer's report submitted to the General Meeting of the Graduate Students' Union on January 26.

Miss Repo was hired as a student organizer for the GSU at the beginning of the term. She was fired last week by President Michael Vaughan.

Three motions, suggested by Miss Repo as solutions to the bureaucratic problems she describes, were adopted by the General Meeting.

The document has become a central issue in the current GSU controversy.

*Mother, may I go out to swim?
Yes, my darling daughter.
Hang your clothes on a tree,
But don't go near the water.*

— Children's song.

The above just about sums up my five months' experience as an organizer for the GSU. To paraphrase: "Yes, organize, but don't go near the students, and for God's sake, don't let them near this building; they might get the crazy idea that they have some rights on these premises."

In the GSU Newsletter, I report on the departmental organizations in existence and their concerns. This report indicates that much work remains to be done to activate those departments where organizations do not presently exist — this work being of the utmost importance if the proposed new constitution is to be made meaningful.

There have been considerable obstacles to my work as an organizer. At the root of the problem is the collective attitude of the senior executive — President Vaughan, Vice-President Kennedy, Secretary Zabrowski, and Treasurer Wein with past-president Winter and appointed member Wults voting in the same block. They, in words and deeds, oppose graduate student involvement in GSU affairs, although they occasionally pay lip service to student involvement and organizing.

The exact opposite is true about the divisional representatives, presently seven of them, who as a rule are in sympathy with student efforts to get organized. It is indicative that amongst the senior executive none are involved in departmental organizing, whereas amongst the divisional reps, five are in direct contact with the organizations in their departments, and the rest are generally sympathetic to students.

The six senior executives, with the help of a chairman of their choice, are in a position to impose their wishes on the rest of the executive to the great detriment of the general membership.

NO STUDENT CONTROL

These wishes as a rule have to do with the bureaucratization of the GSU to the extent that graduate students have no control over their union.

Consider the fact that departmental organizations are required to deliver constitutions and budgets before they can get their per capita funds for their own activities and programs. Although this is purely a formality and should be used as such, the senior members have held onto these rules beyond any reason. Departmental organizations which have considerable difficulties in calling general meetings have been sent back penniless for the ridiculous reason that one item is missing from their constitution.

Others have come to request an advance of their own funds while they are working on a constitution and have been subjected to a third degree interview, and then denied their request.

Meanwhile the existence and functioning of these organizations is verified both by the divisional representatives and by myself, but this information does not carry any weight in the eyes of the very legalistic and inflexible senior executive.

This absurd practice which has the result of discouraging and putting down the departmental organizations, should be abolished by the general membership.

MORE BUREAUCRACY

Bureaucratization manifests itself in another way. Although the GSU building is given to the graduate students by the University, without any charge, the senior members of the executive have pushed through a policy of charging student groups right and left for their use of house facilities.

A cumbersome procedure of requiring returnable deposits is set up for groups consisting of a minimum of 50 per cent graduate students. Handing these deposits back and forth involves time and effort on the part of both students and staff and some groups have experienced considerable difficulty in collecting the set amounts each time they want to have a meeting or use the gym.

Other groups with less than 50 per cent graduate student membership are being charged a non-returnable fee for using the facilities.

The fees go to the GSU which has a yearly budget of $60,000 and which does not pay a penny for these premises to the University!

All attempts to get the executive to drop these bureaucratic rules which are financially totally meaningless, have failed in the past due to the resistance from the senior members. Thus it is up to the general meeting to set up rules that would serve the interests of the students on this campus.

Currently, the building is underused rather than overused.

GESTETNER CRISIS

Another problem, which has recently reached crisis dimension has to do with the use of our Gestetner facilities. Our practice has been to allow individual graduate students, departmental organizations and campus based groups to use the facilities as long as they pay for their supplies. We might have had two or three groups per day using the Gestetner (sometimes none), and those of us who work around the building have not encountered any problems.

These facilities have been available during the weekend as well, as the GSU has paid supervisors then. Another practice has been for people to call in if they have a large amount of work to do, so they wouldn't interfere with our own work in progress.

Recently one of our weekend supervisors, Philip Wults, who is also the chairman of our house committee (he is an appointed member of the executive with full voting privileges), has taken it upon himself to decide which groups can use the Gestetner and decided to exclude the Canadian Liberation Movement, first by not letting them into the workroom, then by locking away the Gestetner and finally by calling in the campus police. This all on his own authority with no ruling from the executive, and purely because of his own personal likes and dislikes. (CLM has a membership consisting largely of graduate students.)

I also understand that elaborate rules are being set up by members of the senior executive and Mr. Wults to prevent the free use of our Gestetner. The purpose is to restrict particularly those groups that advocate things not agreed upon by these members of the executive, but it will affect all groups, currently using the facilities since none of them are strictly departmental and most of them are political in the broadest sense. All future groups would of course be excluded by definition.

In conclusion, student participation like charity begins at home. Certainly GSU should not set itself up as the major obstacle to students' efforts to organize around a variety of issues.

. . . and charges of a 'defamatory nature'

The statement by Graduate Student Union President Michael Vaughan published in Monday's Varsity, contains a remarkable assortment of statements regarding my person, some of them curious, others humorous, yet others patently false and slanderous in effect. I will take issue with some of the more concrete statements and accusations:

1) My report to the general membership of the GSU was necessitated by the extreme conditions prevailing in the GSU. The report is self-explanatory, as it essentially describes existing practices and policies of the GSU executive. It should be noted that the General Meeting on January 26 changed these policies in the direction recommended in my report. Furthermore, the report was not prepared secretly; that is, I did not hide the fact that I held these opinions. And I needed no authority to distribute it. At the October General Meeting I had distributed a report without specific authorization.

2) I am accused of having used the GSU for my own political purposes. Specifically this refers to preparing and printing a bulletin for the Trefann Court Residents' Association. The accusation is absurdly false. As an organizer I carried with me samples of newsletter and bulletin headings of various kinds to show graduate students how to put out effective newsletters.

The heading for the Trefann Bulletin was one of these samples; I demonstrated to some students early in October how to make an electric stencil with it — unfortunately our machine destroyed both the sample and the stencil — resulting in a financial loss of 30 cents to the GSU.

Obviously Mr. Vaughan located the sample in a wastepaper basket and kept it as a piece of "evidence" for future uses.

3) I am accused of having privately allowed groups to use GSU facilities. No such thing ever took place. The GSU had a general policy of allowing various groups to use its facilities, particularly its mimeographing facilities, as long as these groups paid their way. My "offense" was to insist that no groups be deprived of this right merely because they might advocate something which displeased one or two members of the senior executive.

This policy of free and unrestricted use was upheld unanimously by the general membership. And the same meeting censured the member of the executive who took it upon himself to obstruct one particular group.

4) I am accused of an unspecified theft, a statement which I take to be of defamatory nature. It appears to refer to an incident last Friday, the day after I was illegally fired, when I walked out of the GSU building with my three-ring binder containing personal notes regarding my work and other things of interest to me. In the presence of several witnesses, Michael Vaughan had previously inspected the things I was collecting and denied me access to my own written reports and other records of my work, and then insisted on "inspecting" my personal notes. I naturally refused this preposterous demand and — between phone-calls to and from lawyers — walked out of the premises. Vaughan followed me to the street, forcibly attempting to take the binder away from me, but with a little help from my friends I kept it — and this then is "theft".

For the record, the GSU has in its files numerous specific reports submitted by me to the executive; it has lists of all departmental organizations in existence and of contact people in various departments. I have distributed these lists and reports generously to the executive members and have never withheld any information from them.

Architecture plans new look for Hart House Farm

The campus centre on St. George may be stymied, but there may soon be a U of T student centre in the country.

The place?

Good, gray old Hart House Farm in the Caledon Hills.

After two years of research and planning, seven members of the faculty of Architecture have completed the design for extensive expansion and renovation of the Farm.

One member of the group, Graham George (IV Arch), says that the changes will "decrease the geographic and departmental breakdown of the farm." He hopes it will fill "a need for intimacy, for a place for intensive work, rest, and change."

LONGSTANDING COMPLAINTS

The renovations follow long standing complaints about the lack of accommodation, and poor heating, and the general physical deterioration of the property.

Alan Brown (IV Arch), another member of the group, says the project is "in direct line with some of the CUG proposals suggesting student involvement in university business. Not only would renovations be planned by architectural students, but construction would be carried out by student work groups as a practical application of their learning."

The plans grew out of a six-week design project in a second-year architecture course.

The well-wooded farm is situated on the Niagara Escarpment and includes in its facilities an outdoor sauna, two clear quarry ponds and limestone caves. It is run by the Hart House Farm Committee and is available to all members of the university at a nominal cost.

The renovation plan has been broken into four phases. The first two phases would include renovations of the main house, relocation of an existing dormitory building, Bryce Hall, over a new basement, which would provide both insulation and more room, and repairs of the old, stone shed.

UNIQUE BRIDGE

The third phase would be the construction of a unique bridge that would serve not only to link the present main building, Ignatieff House, and Bryce Hall on its new site, but also to provide extra sleeping facilities, much like a Pullman coach.

The first four phases will cost approximately $40,000-$50,000. The original farm of 150 Acres was bought in 1949 for $8,500, and was first renovated for student use at a further cost of $6,500.

The shifting of Bryce Hall will also provide more privacy for Eric Anderson, the resident farmer.

Total projected sleeping accommodation is about 120, compared with the present 45. The farm would be able to accommodate simultaneously the needs of more campus groups than at present, as well as assuring greater privacy for visitors who want to stay at the farm but keep apart from the other guests. At present, around 2000 people use the farm every year.

Even though all renovations could be done in one summer, each phase is designed so that it is a complete project in itself.

FAVOURABLE RESPONSE

The response of the Hart House Farm Committee to the plans has been generally favourable.

Carmen Guild, Assistant Warden of Hart House, calls them "very creative. It's a bargain. We get a great deal of building for very little money. The enthusiasm and interest of the architecture students on the committee has been splendid."

Luigi Carcasole (I APSC), a student member of the Farm Committee feels that some parts of the plan, like the bridge, are "unnecessary." He said he was "skeptical" about the low costs quoted.

He agrees, though, that most of the renovations are necessary. "If it were done, a lot more people would frequent the farm."

The Architecture group is asking SAC for financial support at tonight's general meeting. They also intend to approach the Graduate Students Union and the Board of Governors.

Drawings of the design proposals are on display at the Faculty of Architecture building at Huron and College Streets for those interested.

Part Two

The City and the U

With the campus centre fiasco, when things got bad, they could only get worse. They did. Just at the time when everyone concerned with the centre was arguing over methods of financing and coming to no satisfactory conclusions, the city decided to "get tough" with the university and enforce zoning bylaws regarding setback from the street.

These bylaws had never been strictly enforced before but the campus centre in its ill-fated way changed all that.

When architect John Andrews designed the building he did so under the impression that St. George Street would be closed to traffic.

He based his building design on a university master plan (which he had helped to produce) that recommended closing St. George. The building had a setback of zero to seven inches and plans included a ground-level walk-through mall for the centre.

City bylaws require a setback of 20 feet. If these bylaws are violated, the city can refuse to issue a building permit.

Andrews assumed that if St. George were not closed, the university would have no trouble with the zoning bylaws. This was not an invalid assumption.

"In the past," explains Frank Hastie, U of T Director of Physical Plant, "we've been able to go to City Hall and get whatever concessions we needed."

As one university official explains, since the university owns all the land in the area, it has no one to hurt but itself by waiving bylaws.

The university did not experience serious problems until it began building on major roads like St. George. Even today, Hastie says, the U of T would probably have little problem with a setback violation on a less important street.

The bylaw stringency affected both the campus centre and the new library (St. George and Harbord). Because only a tiny portion of the new library violated the bylaws, the architects made the necessary adjustments and the city issued a building permit.

However, the campus centre as designed extended to the sidewalk.

According to Tom Faulkner, former SAC president, the students were prepared to have the centre redesigned. Hastie says if the centre were redesigned it would be too tall and thin for the Russell and St. George Street lot.

Because the campus centre was a student initiated project, students and architects worked together before they consulted university officials.

Hastie feels some of the problems might have been foreseen if students had consulted the physical plant department earlier.

"I think right now under the same situation," he says, "there would be a closer relationship between the students and administration than there was then."

"It would have been helpful if we had gotten in earlier," he adds. "I was a little surprised when I found there was a zero setback."

Hastie says that although the university never had serious bylaw problems before, they had also never asked for permission to build a building with zero setback.

The Toronto Central Library further complicated the site problem.

To get access to the centre, the university had to get a five to six foot strip from the central library. The library objected to the closeness of the campus centre to their children's library.

Although the library never issued a formal complaint, the university expected them to oppose and defeat the university's bid for a building permit.

With both the Toronto Central Library and the city in opposition, the chances of obtaining a building permit were practically nil. The university never applied.

THE SECOND COMPLICATION CLOSING ST. GEORGE

At this time, to add complication to complication, the city and the university began to debate the future of St. George and other university streets. If the university could solve the traffic problem on St. George, they could probably persuade the city to issue a building permit for the centre.

Not only does the city very definitely not want city streets closed, it does not want buildings on well trafficked streets extending to the sidewalk.

The university, on the other hand, according to U of T president Claude Bissell's Executive Assistant Don Forster, is not willing to accept a solution that keeps St. George and other university streets open.

In an attempt to solve the traffic problem (the problem of keeping traffic away from up at the corner of St. George and Harbord the nature of the adjacent traffic pattern will be crucial.

"I find it inconceivable that the university should be sacrificed to the imperious demands of the motor car."

Aside from destroying any university plans to close the streets to traffic, the expressway also affects the campus centre. The university cannot discuss moving the site until they know the final form of the expressway.

"The university cannot design next to an unknown," says Hastie. (The Willcocks street site borders on Spadina Avenue.)

Hastie feels that if the university had the money it could solve the site problems.

There seems to be little hope the university or government can finance the centre. The campus centre is still high on the list of priorities, but Forster comments, "The university can set priorities to its heart's content. The campus centre is on the list of priorities right after Innis College. We don't have enough money to build Innis."

Gery McMaster, former campus centre chairman says the centre does not have to be a dead issue.

"There are 30,000 people at this university and with that kind of weight and need there must be a way to build it."

"If students really feel they want social facilities," says one architect, "there is enough money floating around in the under 25 generation that they can do something about it."

Perhaps.

But the obvious question is how. The campus centre, however badly needed, is now a five million dollar project.

pedestrians) the university hired a consulting firm, Damas and Smith, to propose alternative to the university street system.

Their $127,000 study says that closure of St. George and other streets involves diverting traffic around the university via Queen's Park by building overpasses at University Avenue and College Street and at Avenue Road and Bloor Street to handle the increased traffic.

The overpasses would cost $6.7 million.

Alternatives not involving street closure range from a $1.1 million raised pedestrian walkway, crossing back and forth across St. George and connecting all the principal buildings, to a $9.2 million scheme to partially depress the university's streets, cover them over and landscape the raised area.

The city and university have been unable to reach any agreement. At present, the provincial government is reviewing the Damas and Smith proposals. While the future of St. George remains undecided the campus centre cannot be built on the corner of St. George and Russell.

"I don't think the location is all that holy," says Hastie. "My own answer to the campus centre problem is to move the site."

"If the money were available," he says, "the best site would be across the street from New College." (on Willcocks Street).

But the city again enters the picture. The fate of both a campus centre and university streets hinges on the future of the Spadina Expressway. At the moment, expressway construction has been temporarily postponed.

"Until Metro Council has given approval to the final form of the expressway," comments one city official, "it would be a waste of time to decide on the streets within the university."

University officials fear that if the expressway extends to Bloor, university streets would be used as feeder routes. This would enormously increase traffic density.

In 1966 President Bissell wrote to J. Douglas Crashtley, chairman of the City Planning Board:

"St. George St. effectively cuts our campus in two. We have not been able to get any precise detail about the Spadina Expressway if and when it goes south of College St. The future of the Harbord-Hoskin east-west route is murky. When our new Research Library goes

HOW ARE YOU BEING TAUGHT?

ARE THESE THE ASSUMPTIONS ON WHICH YOUR CLASSROOM AND EDUCATIONAL EXPERIENCES ARE BASED?

Admittance to the university graduate school is best based upon the ability to pass examinations.

Examination-passing ability emphasises rote learning rather than mental originality of thought and scientific curiosity, traits which in the long run are much more valuable. Those who are selected are those who can focus on the known, and who can handle examinations, rather than those whose qualities would give them promise as "independent discoverers of knowledge."

Evaluation is education; education is evaluation.

Evaluation is based on the fallacious assumption that students learn by being threatened. Most faculty would deny that they hold to this assumption, but their behaviour shows all too clearly that this is the operational principle by which they work. The examination, as it marks the end of the course, is too often taken as the end of learning a subject — once a student has written an exam, he can forget about it.

*What is presented in the lecture is what the student learns.

This is exemplified by curriculum committees trying to decide what topics will be "covered" in a given course.

Many students do not feel that they are learning anything at all. Huge amounts of material are thrown at them and they are expected to regurgitate most of it on a test. They may gain some isolated facts about the subject, but none of them can be integrated in any coherent way.

The assumption that learning is equivalent to hearing a lecture is closely tied in with the preceding assumption that education is evaluation.

*The student cannot be trusted to pursue his own learning.

The faculty attitude is one of mistrustful guidance. Work must be assigned; the completion of this work must be supervised; students must be continually guided and then evaluated.

The general attitude in higher education today is one example of students vs faculty, rather than of students with faculty.

*"Weeding Out" or grading by the Bell curve is the best way of preserving standards.

A very high drop-out or failure rate is often seen as evidence that a department is maintaining "high standards". It is not realized that that "failure" is a reflection on the institution, instead of solely the student. Often the process weeds out the most unique and creative who quickly become disenchanting with the stability of the program. The arbitrariness of the "Bell curve", which dictates that a given percentage must not be allowed to continue in their course, has nothing in common with modern educational concepts.

*Students are manipulateable objects, not persons, and inferior to faculty in all respects.

Certainly in a number of departments the relationship between students and faculty is remote and impersonal. The current ultra-behaviouristic philosophy which underlies today's education tends to see all individuals simply as machines, managed by reward and punishment. Hence students are dealt with on this same basis. Since students do not like to be treated as objects, the net effect is low morale. Students tend to treat each other in the same fashion. In some departments where there is a very heavy stress on evaluation, student A will not give help to student B because any improvement in B's showing will automatically put A lower 'on the curve'. This seems to be a vicious sort of attitude for members of an academic community. There is another factor in this remoteness of faculty-student relationship. It is that it is almost impossible to be close to a student if one's primary relationship to him is that of judge and evaluator.

*Creative scientists and artists develop from passive learners.

The educational system does not encourage criticism or creativity — it gives out lists of facts, and the best marks in the examinations go to those who can repeat them on paper. Often students will try to write they feel what the teacher is looking for, instead of developing an independent approach. The results of cannot be positive if, there is a tendency of teachers to sweeping devaluations of "wild" or "silly" ideas, or even if students fear this attitude, or if there is a restriction on curiosity.

A knowledgeable person is not merely one who has an accumulation of facts, but one who can use facts in conjunction with imagination to create.

"Students like black people have immense unused power. They could theoretically, insist on participating in their own education. They could make academic freedom bilateral. They could teach their teachers to thrive on love and admiration rather than on fear and respect, and to lay down their weapons. Students could discover community. And they could learn to dance by dancing on the IBM cards. They could make colouring books out of the catalogues and they could put the grading system in a museum.

They could raze one set of walls and let life come blowing into the classroom. They could turn the classroom into a "field of action" as Peter Marin describes it. And they could study for the best of all possible reasons — their own reasons.

They could. They have the power. But only in a very few places, like Berkeley, have they even begun to think about using it. For students as for black people, the hardest battle is not with Mr. Charlie. It's with what Mr. Charlie has done to your mind."

— Jerry Farber, Student as Nigger

UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT REFORM: THINK ABOUT IT!

An exodus movement begins at Loyola

Loyola's Jesuit Residence, home of Loyola's Jesuit administration which has aroused the militant opposition of students and faculty over the last few months. Loyola News photo

MONTREAL (CUP) — A total of 125 Loyola College students have applied for admission to McGill University next year, a move believed to reflect students' fears over the future of education at the Roman Catholic institution.

The Loyola applications amount to approximately 10 per cent of McGill's normal quota of transfer applicants, and it is considered unlikely that the students will be successful in gaining entrance to the larger anglophone institution.

Most of the transfer applications come from the Loyola English Department, where the college administration has fired 17 of 43 profs in a purge of anti-administration faculty.

Loyola currently faces the probability of censure by the Canadian Association of University Teachers: the CAUT move would amount to an academic blacklist of the college, warning CAUT members — approximately 80 per cent of the country's academics — to stay away from the institution.

The McGill Admissions Committee January 28 decided to maintain current entrance standards for transfer students. Loyola's lower first-year entrance requirements will probably bar many of the refugees from entrance to McGill.

The Admissions Committee decision was made over the protests of student members of the committee.

No protest allowed against Hayakawa

BOSTON (CUP) — Students and police clashed Thursday in front of Northeastern University's alumni hall in a protest against the appearance of S. I. Hayakawa, president of San Francisco State College and guru of the law and order set on North American campuses.

Approximately 200 demonstrators, carrying Viet Cong and anarchist flags, tried to gain admission to Hayakawa's speech at the campus, but were beaten back by police.

About 30 persons were arrested on charges of assault and disorderly conduct.

Hayakawa, recently voted the second most-popular man in California behind actor-turned-governor Ronald Reagan, spoke on "Can American Colleges Survive the 20th Century?"

He advised his audience, many of whom heckled and jeered during his speech, that American youth should be press-ganged into national service in such areas as hospitals, mental institutions or the Peace Corps.

"This is your crusade and you should be getting involved," he said.

Blacks get heavy sentence

LOS ANGELES (CUP) — Three black students were jailed and 16 others placed on probation for one to 25 years last Wednesday for their part in an administration building takeover at San Fernando State College in November, 1968.

The sentencing marked a turning point in the history of student protest in the United States: the first time that the state has successfully pursued felony charges against student demonstrators.

The sentences spring from a meeting November 4, 1968, between members of the Valley State Black Student Union and acting administration president Paul Blomgren. The students demanded that the college football coach be fired for kicking a black football player during a game.

Administration officials testified they were held against their will and that the "kidnappings" were pre-planned. Superior court judge Mark Brandler refused parole for three of the students — Archie Chatman Jr., 22; Eddie Dancer, 21; and Robert Lewis, 22 — after hearing evidence that, after the convictions, they returned to their campus and took part in a meeting criticizing the trial.

Prosecutor Vincent Bugliosi said outside the courtroom: "I believe the sentences will have a crippling effect on campus militancy, if not throughout the U.S., at least in California state colleges, which have been a hotbed."

Blurbs

The Students Administrative Council is having another seven-hour meeting tonight in the East Hall of University College at 7 p.m.

On the agenda are the SAC Reply to the Campbell report, the Campus Centre report, the SAC brief on the future of Hart House, CUG, the SAC-Scarborough-Erindale brief, the Committee to restructure SAC and the proposals for renovating the Hart House Farm.

The Investigation Committee to investigate the Political Economy Department meets at 7 p.m. in the Fifth Floor lounge of Sid Smith. They have an interview with Dean Allen at 2 p.m. and a plan to question him about a secret committee believed to have hired Stephan Dupre. All interested police students are welcome.

Bill Lawson goes before the Metro Licensing Commission this afternoon at 2:15 in Committee Room 2, City Hall to find out whether or not his vending license will be renewed. Bill would appreciate the assistance of any interested Law students who might want to help him out, or any other students on campus who feel Bill provides a valuable service.

There will be a meeting of the photo workshop this evening at 7 p.m. in the Varsity office.

Gymnasts third in RMC Invitational

The University of Toronto Gymnastics Blues concluded their exhibition schedule with what coach Julio Roncon described as their best performance of the season.

Journeying Saturday to Kingston for the annual Royal Military College Invitational Tournament, they finished third in the six team competition.

For the third time this year, Blues found themselves in a meet dominated by Steve Mitruk, a Canadian National Team member. Mitruk swept the all-round competition and four individual events to lead MacMaster to their first place finish. With the return to health of Hartmut Fink, who placed third all-round, Mac may well have the strongest team in the OQAA.

Close behind Mac was York University, led by the second place all-round performance of Toni Kinsman.

Lacking an individual star of the calibre of Mitruk, Kinsman or Fink, Toronto relied on strong showings from all team members in their specialties. With an average of twenty-four competitors on each event, Toronto managed to place two men in the top half of the standings in all but two pieces of apparatus.

FOREST NOT GREEN

Al Forest was the leading all-round man for Toronto as he accumulated 38.6 points to tie for seventh place. However, the ranking is misleading, for although almost five points separated third and fourth place, only one point would have raised Forest from seventh to fourth. Gary Wicks continued to develop his all-round ability and finished eleventh.

On individual events, Forest collected the team's only ribbon when his vault scored 0.1 less than the winning ones. He also put together excellent routines on the rings and high bar and took sixth in each case. John Kortright was seventh on parallel bars and only 0.4 out of first place in vaulting.

Although the three individual stars of the meet mentioned above dominated the side horse event (in which coach Roncon rates Mitruk as best in Canada), it was Toronto's Gary Wicks who finished fourth behind them. Not far behind him was Arthur Stein in sixth spot. And on the floor, Carl Sloane stood briefly on one hand to place eighth.

It appears that the series of exhibition meets has been highly successful. In addition to providing much needed competition experience and the equivalent of extra practice time, the meets have forced some members of coach Roncon's corps of specialists to diversify. As the team begins final preparations for the OQAA Championships, which will be held in Ottawa February 21, Roncon hopes the trend to diversification will continue.

Fencers take it all at Kingston meet

Fencing Blues won the RMC Invitational Meet last weekend, and Toronto now has a team to defend its champion status.

Kingston sponsored this new meet for all Ontario-Quebec Universities. Seven teams took part but Blues won each team and every individual championship.

The mixture of styles from East and West Section faltered against the drive of the Toronto fencers: Brock, Waterloo (including a Blues reserve) and York collapsed, but RMC, Queens and Carleton brought out some delicate and exciting foil fighting.

Epee, the unpredictable, saw Blues fighting for their lives at 4 all against Queens. Ron Keith bailed the team out with a 5 to 3 victory over Allen Christain, to stop his winning streak. Carleton chased Varsity Blues all the way but in an exciting climax were dismissed 8 bouts to 1; Griffin confirming his top place defeating Dale Galbraith 5 zip.

Where are all the trophies? After taking the first four, Blues adopted a guest status. RMC followed in second in epee and sabre to retain their own trophies.

es, Connie Lindenburger, a close third on the beams, and a solid effort from Ruth McMullen.

BRIDGE CHAMPS

A University of Toronto team won the Canadian Intercollegiate Bridge Championships last weekend, defeating entries from McGill, Waterloo and five other universities.

The tournament was held at Hart House and hosted by the HH Bridge Club. More than 100 players were entered.

Varsity's team was led by Michael Schoenborn, Peter Fono, Linda Waldman and Andy Altay. The quartet won the tournament's team-of-four event.

And who said women's hockey is a tame sport?

It was a McGill Weekend with a difference as the U of T women's curling team spent an enjoyable few hours January 30 and 31 winning the WITCAA championship.

The gals, skipped by Charlotte Sutherland (III SMC), compiled 59½ points in round-robin competition to easily defeat five other schools.

Other members of the victorious Varsity rink are Lynda Eilbeck (II POTS), Nancy Manning (COE), Judy Thrasher (III POTS) and manager Mary Baird (II POTS).

GIRL GYMNASTS SECOND

Seven classy gymnastic teams converged on the Benson Building last weekend for the WITCAA championships, and when the chalk cleared perennial winners York U were just that again.

The powerful Yorkettes amassed 152.85 points to edge Varsity (149.65); Western was a distant third at 132.65.

Toronto's junior team had a great day as Sue Cristelau (I PHE) took the all-round junior title with firsts on the bars, beams and vaulting plus a second to teammate Barb Glennie on the floor exercises.

Jane Stevens scored well on the beam routines and Sue Young rounded out Varsity's scoring with a second and third in the bars and vaulting.

Toronto's seniors had the misfortune to run up against York's Barb Thompson, who took first place in all four events. Our gals garnered points from Marty Kenny, second in the floor exerci-

Interfac Roundup

A gelding is to horsery as a capon is to turkery as a ??? is to popery

By GELLIUS MACHINE POLITICS

It was announced today by Reputable Sources (11 UC) that Benjamin McNally (111 New) and Mark Golden (1V UC) will indeed be candidates for the positions of SAC President and Vice-President, thus ending weeks of tense anticipation and frantic maneuvering of a kind unseen since the death of Alexander the Great (cf. The Varsity, 19 March, 323 B.C.). Three Mack Trucks and a Red Rambler have been hired to transport the thousands of nominating signatures to the SAC office. Gus Abols, The Mad Axeman, Benjamin McNally, and Many More (1 Vic) were reliably reported to have signed.

McNally (vide supra) indicated that he would run on his record, "Lady Is Love" by The Humble Sponge. The difficulties inherent in speaking and keeping his balance at 45 rpm proved insurmountable, however, and McNally's further remarks were off the record. Golden intimated that he had no comment at this time but was expecting some from Europe and could front it for about a dollar a tab.

McNally assured reporter Quertyuopus that rumours he would abolish Victoria College were "ludicrous and vicious exaggerations" (copyright B. McNally, 1970). "We will carefully disassemble it stone by stone and ship it back to Cobourg," he explained. The land thus reclaimed would then be added to Queen's Park (presently rented to the Ontario Government for a dollar every year) and a three-hundred yard long equestrian statue of Edward VII would be erected. The statue — added Golden — will be hollow and will be so constructed as to play the school song ("Velut Arbor Aevo", no relation to "Velut Arbor, Mich.") if the horse's cock is pulled.

One of the less glorious incidents in Friday's hockey game against Loyola occurred just before the eight minute mark of the second period. Top, Blues' Paul Laurent tries to poke the puck under Loyola goalie Rocky Martin as Warriors' Ron Riley cruises in, but Bryan Tompson (17) and Larry Carriere (2) have already started to square off. Immediately above, Tompson heads for Carriere (background) as Laurent and Dave McOswall take on John Hutton (21) and linesman Pat Murray restrains Martin. Below, Tompson and Carriere struggle in round two and (bottom) the two wrestle on the ice as Murray and linesman Fred Haughton try to pry them apart. Referee Zip Thompson looks on. Both players were given game misconducts. Tonight, Blues face their third stiff test in a row as the Waterloo Warriors come to town. Only difference is, this one's for real; Waterloo still could take first place by beating Toronto twice. Game time is 8 p.m.

This is how they appointed our Poli. Ec. chairman

By A. S. BARKER

An investigation committee of students has started to piece together the semi-secret process which made Stefan Dupre the new chairman of the Political Economy Department.

The Political Economy Course Union greeted Dupre's appointment with dismay and set up the committee at last week's meeting to find out how it happened.

For ten days the committee toured the department "investigating" faculty and administrators who had been involved in the appointment.

"We have discovered the objective limits of scientific investigation in the university," a committee spokesman said last night. "Namely the secrecy which surrounds the entire decision-making process. Even professors don't know what's going on. And no one seems to think of even consulting students."

Thomas Easterbrook, Chairman of the Poli. Ec. Department, announced his resignation to the Dean of Arts and Science in late May or early June, the committee discovered.

"BENEVOLENT DESPOT"

Arts and Science Dean Albert Allen described Easterbrook's chairmanship to the committee as a "benevolent despotism".

"Easterbrook used to play with his cards very close to his chest," commented Political Science Professor C. B. Macpherson.

Jean Smith, former Associate-Chairman of the department, described Easterbrook's regime as "Ulbrichtian", a reference to the Premier of East Germany.

After Easterbrook's resignation, the normal processes for choosing a chairman — as outlined in the Haist Committee Report went into operation.

The Haist Committee was formed several years ago to formalize bureaucratic rules for making appointments and promotions in the university at the departmental level.

Dean Allen then chose a committee to appoint the new chairman.

Most of the faculty first heard about Easterbrook's resignation when they received a circular from the Dean's office announcing the composition of the appointment committee and asking faculty for suggestions for a new chairman.

MEMBERS MET SECRETLY

The Committee met in camera and kept no minutes.

- Its members were:
- Dean Allen (Arts and Science),
 - Assistant Dean G. A. Watson (Arts and Science),
 - Dean Ernest Sirluck (SGS),
 - Prof. D. F. Forster (U of T Vice-Provost, Claude Bissell's Executive Assistant, and professor in Poli. Ec.),
 - Prof. C. B. Macpherson (a senior member of the Poli. Ec. Department who declared he was not a candidate for the chairmanship),

- Dean J. M. Ham (Engineering),
- Prof. D. P. Kerr (Chairman of Geology),
- Prof. J. E. Hodgetts (Principal of Victoria College and professor in Poli. Ec.),
- Prof. J. E. Smyth (Commerce and Finance),
- Prof. R. Robinson (Poli. Ec.), later replaced by Prof. H. A. J. Green (Poli. Ec.).

Dean Allen told the investigating committee that he deliberately packed the appointment committee with administrators because the Political Economy Department was the largest and most important department in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The Dean's committee reduced the list of nominees and suggestions by the faculty down to a final list of six to eight names, all members of U of T's own Political Economy Department.

DUPRE NOT FIRST CHOICE

The committee first offered the job to Prof. A. E. Safarian, a "continentalist" economist, and then to Prof. H. C. Eastman, a mathematical economist and an Associate Dean of the Graduate School.

Both men declined the offer. In late November the position was offered to Stefan Dupre, who accepted it in January.

Members of the Dean's Committee would not discuss with the investigation committee the concrete reasons for their choice. They said it was necessary to protect the rights of the individuals involved.

Dean Allen and Prof. Macpherson both said no "political" considerations consciously entered the selection process.

Dupre has publicly come out against the proposals of the Commission on University Government. He said the proposals, if implemented, would take too much power away from the President.

Harvard-educated Dupre is an urban planning expert, a member of the centre for Urban and Regional Planning, and head of the Institute for Urban Studies.

Despite his involvement in urban planning, he has never taken a public stance on the Spadina Expressway.

"I don't think I've got the expertise to," he told The Varsity last night.

When asked why he took the job as chairman, Dupre replied, "If you come right down to it, I suppose I would get taking the job because a number of my colleagues spoke quite strongly about me doing it, and also it was one of these situations where in the last analysis there was a need for someone with administrative experience."

The investigating committee will make a full analysis of the structure of the department and its political significance for Monday's Varsity. They will present their findings to a full meeting of the Course Union early next week.

Krishna Menon nearly fights at ISC

Krishna Menon, the wry, former defence minister for India, was goaded into a near fight at a question and answer session at the International Student Centre yesterday afternoon.

Early in the discussion, Desh Chadha (SGS) called Menon a traitor to the Indian people because he wasn't contributing to the real Indian revolution.

Menon and Chadha both rose to fight, but several people subdued the aged minister and the youthful dissenter. Chadha was hustled out of the room shouting: "Long live the Indian revolution."

Later, Menon commented on various aspects of the present Indian and world situation.

● Population problem: "India has never been able to disseminate its population. If you were to tell Canadians that we'd provide this very exportable commodity, as soon as we could send the people over, Canadians would send them right back."

● Socialist change: "Slow? Of course it's slow. But it depends upon the potency of the people's will."

● World power: "To challenge the major powers, India would need one and a half times their power. Nobody in the world, not even India, can be trusted with that much power."

● Middle East: "The situation in the Middle East is more fraught with danger of world war than the situation in Vietnam. But just as the U.S. will never subdue the Vietnamese people, the long war in Israel will exhaust itself."

● Nuclear war: "There is no such thing as a limited nuclear war. Nuclear weapons cannot win a war. All you can do is destroy another country and therefore destroy yourself. There is no answer to nuclear war except to end it."

● China: "We won't accept the occupation of our territory. We have stated what our frontiers are, but the Chinese continue to occupy our land."

● Czechoslovakia: "The Czechoslovakian people can take care of themselves. This urge to protect Czech civilization is a new-found fervour. If the U.S. is worried about protecting culture, they can pull out all over the world."

● Press: (to a questioner who said his own information was gathered from newspaper reports) "If you only know what you read in the papers you are misinformed."

After the questions eased off, Menon stood and slowly worked his way through the crowd towards the exit, commenting on the fragmented consciousness of what he felt was another "typical university audience."

SAC will support Campbell Report

By TREVOR SPURR

The Students Administrative Council voted at a general meeting Wednesday evening to accept a report which would give SAC's "critical support" to the Campbell Report on Discipline.

The SAC report termed the Campbell findings a "watershed in the field of campus discipline", although it stressed the necessity for reform of university government that must be made in conjunction with the Campbell recommendations.

The major recommendations that the two reports agree upon include:

- Operational agreement to be reached between instructor and students on classroom and course procedure.
- That disruptive demonstrations can be justified, recognizing a difference between destructive, disruptive demonstrations and non-violent obstructive disruptions.
- A decision to use force against disrupters be arrived at by a democratically constituted body of faculty and students.
- That it be as difficult to expel a student as it is to fire a tenured faculty member.

- That the "in loco parentis" philosophy be ended in residences.

- That faculty members be eligible for library fines.

Reservations were expressed in the SAC report about Campbell's recommendation on double jurisdiction and double jeopardy which said "unlawful action should neither preclude nor make mandatory disciplinary action by the university."

The SAC report said action by both civil courts and university tribunals was only justifiable if "the criminal offence severely interfered with the university's academic function."

The SAC meeting also discussed the structure of disciplinary tribunals. It was suggested a member of the university be judged by a tribunal in which his peers (faculty or students) would be in the majority.

"It preserves the idea of two classes struggling with each other and helps create a permanent estate system which I don't like", said Ken McEvoy, University Government Commissioner.

The SAC also accepted the recommendations of the report on the relationship between SAC, Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

The report would create two new Executive positions, one for each campus, give a 50 per cent rebate of SAC fees to these colleges, and create a tripartite committee to re-negotiate the rebate every year.

Several organizations and individuals received financial assistance from SAC at its bi-weekly give-away.

Included in these grants were $220 to send U of T students to a McGill conference to discuss the creation of a new national student organization, $800 to CUSO, $200 to finance a U of T speaking engagement for Stanley Gray.

They also said they would ask for $2000 from next year's budget for the renovation of Hart House farm when the new budget was presented.

Council also agreed to pay all fees and fines incurred by Jon Galama (IV SMC) in fight to beat a jaywalking violation he received last Thursday.

EDITOR THE VARSITY

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications from members of the University community for the position of Editor-in-Chief of "The Varsity" for the 1970-71 academic session. The Editor will be responsible for the editorial policy and operation of the paper. As the job carries considerable authority, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format or editorial policy, and names of prospective staff. Approximately $4,000 per month is available for staff, including a salary of $50-$100 a week for the Editor, depending on distribution of the work load.

Applicants will be interviewed both by the current Varsity staff, and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision.

Address written applications to:

Mr. Gary R. Thaler,
Chairman,
Varsity Board of Directors,
c/o Erindale College,
University of Toronto.

Closing date for submission is 5:00 p.m.

Wednesday, February 18

Further information may be obtained from the Chairman or other members of the Board.

Varsity Board of Directors, 1969-70

The campus centre has been resurrected — at least temporarily. The Students' Administrative Council Wednesday night accepted a report written by Wayne Richardson (IV ASPC) (centre) that recommends a campus centre referendum.

The referendum, to be held on the same day as the SAC Presidential elections, will ask students if they feel SAC should continue plans for a campus centre.

It will also ask if they are willing to support a combination of a student levy (approximately 13 dollars a year per student over a 20-year period) and a fund-raising drive to finance the centre. If students indicate they want a centre but are unwilling to support a student levy, SAC will try to find alternate means of financing, says Richardson.

Richardson also recommends that SAC hire a full-time campus centre co-ordinator. Plans for a campus centre began five years ago but bagged down due to site and financial problems.

Bill Lawson wins battle over vendor's licence

Bill Lawson won the fight to keep his vendor's license yesterday by the skin of his ever-smiling teeth.

He appeared before the Metropolitan Licensing Commission Thursday afternoon and had his license renewed for one year on probation.

This means that if Bill receives any more tickets in the next year and the traffic department brings them to the attention of the Licensing Commission, then Bill will have his license suspended.

The end result of the whole process is that Bill is in much the same position as he was before it began.

He will continue to serve students from his truck on St. George St., and if the police want to, they will still ticket him under a 1931 bylaw which was designed for fruit and vegetable trucks.

And the game will continue until either the bylaw is changed or Bill Lawson loses his vendor's license.

...and there were no political considerations."

Making of a Chairman: Autonomy for whom?

In the process that led to the appointment of a new Chairman of the Political Economy Department, we see the meaning, presumably, of university "autonomy".

The Government did not intervene. Big Business did not intervene. Junior faculty did not intervene. Students did not intervene — in fact, the front-page story in today's Varsity is probably the first that most of them had heard about the resignation of the old Chairman six months ago.

Those who chose Stephan Dupre as the new Political Economy Chairman deny that any "politics" entered their decision. It should have: the Chairman has control over the department's budget and a big say in new appointments and the granting of tenure; more than any other figure, he determines the evolving anatomy of the department.

Although the decision to appoint Dupre may not have been a conscious political decision, the effects of that decision are directly political: he becomes the most powerful man in the department. He controls the quality and direction of the department's research and teaching by deciding the quality and direction of expertise in his appointments.

Many students, particularly Political Science graduates, have been alarmed at the pattern of recent appointments to the department — especially the influx of right-wing Americans such as Lakoff, Will, Thorson, and Berns. Berns resigned from Cornell, as he was enraged by the administration's leniency there with militant black students. Now he is teaching American government in the U of T's Political Science Department.

Aware of the resentment against the influx of American personnel, Dean Allen's selection committee consisted entirely of Canadians and was careful to choose a Canadian chairman. But the complete functional integration of this university with the American Empire is not going to be combatted by "ethnic" appointments.

To run the largest and most latently explosive department in Arts and Science, the committee of administrators chose an administrator — a technocrat in urban planning. They chose a Harvard-educated Canadian who is not in the least concerned by the stranglehold that American business and government has over our country. They chose a man whose stated position on even the mild reformism of the Commission on University Government's Report is conservative. He has vocally denounced even liberal student power demands.

Dupre is President Strand's representative on a hearing committee to arbitrate the cases of six of the 12 professors who were purged from the Political Science, Sociology, and Anthropology Department at Simon Fraser University. That might give us some indication of the position he is likely to take on the parallel structures proposal already made by the Political Economy Course Union.

Allen's committee did not have to make overt and conscious political considerations in order to make a political decision. Their final candidate was discovered through a process of natural selection: Dupre suited the pre-formed structures and administrative needs of the department.

"Apolitical" structures.

And it's not just coincidence that the "apolitical" politics that the same end-of-ideology politics that are being taught in the department. It's a brand of politics where value-free, technocratic administrators operate a decision-making machine within a given structure that pre-determines the political result.

In this case, the structure is the rules of the Haist Report.

By accepting Dupre's appointment, students will just re-create those structures. Political Economy students should act through their course union, which meets Monday, and challenge the process which appointed Dupre.

LETTERS

I wish to correct a rather serious misquotation which appeared in the feature article on the new Research Library in your issue of last Wednesday, January 28. The article quotes me as saying that the new building will not require many additions to the library staff "because we are presently over-staffed". These last five words are simply not true, and I could not have said them. If they were to become true, at some future date, we should of course be obliged immediately to begin laying off staff.

What I did say, apparently without being fully understood by the reporter, was that most of the people who will work in the new building are already on staff. They include the large technical services and systems departments now housed in a four-storey building on Bedford Road, the entire department of rare books and special collections now located on Charles Street East, plus most of the staff now jammed into the central library building.

Apart from this one misquotation, and a few incorrect statements about technical points which he did not check with me, your reporter did a very commendable job.

Robert H. Blackburn,
Chief Librarian.

The men who manually push the exit stairs to the plane are black, those driving the baggage trucks white, those loading baggage black, immigration officers white, porters black.

"Are you staying long?" "No, just a tourist on a trip," my tense voice answers. O.K., passports stamped, get my luggage. "Anything to declare?" "No." I'd left any left-wing literature that was banned here in Tanzania.

Big sign as I go to change some money in the air terminal lounge: "This lounge is for whites only." Same with washrooms, signs I haven't seen since Mississippi in the early sixties. Over in the far corner is a tiny little room: "Waiting Lounge: Non-Whites." But then I suppose that's only fair; blacks don't have the money or freedom of movement to fly much anyway.

On into Johannesburg, an incredibly rich city of 600,000, stark with the spread of new thrusting buildings rising against the slag heaps of the gold mines in the background. There are fair-sized bungalows all along the highway from the airport, each looking prosperous, well-kept; they're working class homes and in each backyard is what we first thought might be large dog-houses; they weren't, they were black servants' homes.

Downtown Jo-burg, Sunday afternoon, and my wife and I are walking, staring at the endless rich and specialized stores, making Toronto shopping look poverty-stricken. They're all closed, of course, South Africa being a very religious country, and chattering whites are coming out of church. We pass the city hall with its plaque commemorating South Africa's participation in the war for "freedom and democracy", the sign says. On the north side of the city hall is another sign: "Non-white entrance Only"; on the south is another: "White entrance Only." The same on the post-office and other public buildings. The buses too are segregated.

There are black Africans on the streets, in looking at the rich stores too, until the curfew sends all but servants back to the African location, Soweto, where they must live. The Africans don't look at you as they pass, their eyes look down. We'd been in Tanzania where equality is automatic, where eyes meet naturally, and it hit us very hard. You wanted to shout "God, I'm sorry!", but you couldn't because you, after all, were white.

Escape, get away from it, at least for a minute before it all pushes in and smother's you. There's a park, a fountain, some trees, thank the Lord, some benches to relax on for a moment. There were signs on the benches: "European Only" and "Coloured."

"The hardest thing is that people who grow up here just take it for granted. They don't even react to the signs anymore. Apartheid is just the natural way of life."

Horst Kleinschmidt was responding to my depression about the overt racism everywhere around me. He's Vice-President of the National Union of South African Students, the group I had come to visit and speak to. NUSAS represents English-speaking white university students by and large, although some Africans and Indians are involved in the union too, and as an organization it provides about the only legal opposition to Apartheid in South Africa.

"Take me. I come from South-West Africa, a rural area, and until I was 21 I hadn't even met an African on other than a master-servant level. The government succeeds with Apartheid because of this ability to keep blacks and whites separate, so that we never find out they're just humans like us. It wasn't until University that I met Africans on a basis that made me reject Apartheid. That's what NUSAS did and that's what it keeps doing by setting up non-racial situations where people really feel how stupid the government policy is."

Kleinschmidt had become an activist and was now deep in NUSAS work, building white opposition wherever he could, even among white Afrikaans students, and organizing with non-white students in touch-and-go scrapes with the immensely powerful and competent South African security forces.

"They tried to bribe me once to be a spy, and I refused; since then their harassment's been even greater. I'm pretty sure I won't get a job as a teacher when I graduate, especially since I'm going to work full-time for a year for the union."

"Why do you keep at it?" Silence, then a younger girl, Jeanette Curtis, the Regional NUSAS Director gave me her answer: "You have to do it, you have to stay politically active, apartheid permeates everything. It's a question of morality."

It's a question of morality that takes a big toll on student politicians. NUSAS leaders have been deported, had their citizenship revoked, been refused passports, and been named as "Communists" and "banned", a kind of limited arrest — all of course, without trial. It wasn't a game, even if there was a lot of excitement and a certain romanticism in the opposition of some of them.

"We've changed our strategy," Kleinschmidt told me. "We used to just react to big issues the government gave us, like expelling a university professor, or refusing a speaker entry to the country. Now we've started planning campaigns and demonstrations on the whole basic question, and, even more important, we've started organizing, more in an undercover way, among non-whites at their separate colleges."

"We're still doing a lot of social welfare stuff, too. We give Africans loans and scholarships for their education, we're doing virtually illegal prison education work, and we're trying to fight the malnutrition that thousands of Africans in this country suffer from. We try to encourage non-racial contact too, through things like regional reading rooms."

"But it's really hard, we've got a skeleton staff, next to no money, and we're always facing government pressures against us. We have to hire lawyers to give us detailed advice so as not to go out of existence for a pittance. If it weren't for overseas money that's donated to us, it would be impossible, and the government is always finding ways to block that getting to us."

He told me the secret channels they have from Canada and the U.S.A. but those have got to be kept secret.

Downtown Jo-burg again, buying toothpaste or something.

"Where are you from?" "Canada." "You visiting long?" "No, just a few days." "Hope you enjoy the visit. How did you fly down?"

"Oh, we came in by BOAC."

"You came over Rhodesia then, that's where I'm from, Salisbury. Bloody BOAC, they'd fly you over Rhodesia, but they won't land there anymore. Those British, bunch of bloody liberal hypocrits."

I smiled tightly and said good-bye, because, like most whites in South Africa, he was a friendly, open person, and smashing him wouldn't have done much good; besides he was probably right about British hypocrisy.

NUSAS took us all around Johannesburg, the plush, treed upper-class areas, the massive, modern as tomorrow Afrikaans university, its facilities, we were told, significantly underused, Witwatersrand, the English university, also huge, but crowded, where thousands of students marched last spring for the academic freedom to admit students of all colours and to hire professors without government interference. We also saw the Indian area where life-giving shops are being boarded up as the government forces these non-whites into rural areas, where presumably storekeepers can sell their goods to each other.

And we saw the Johannesburg Teachers' College for Indian students, a small, drab defends apartheid with the usual arguments — History has shown that all nations tend to be exclusive. One is not readily blended and great opportunity to prosper. A country that nature has blessed. Looks like a great place to live, doesn't it?

you wouldn't want to visit there building which offers the only post-secondary education for Asians in the city.

The head of the student council at the Indian college sat across from me, pretty nervous, even though he knew the NUSAS people and worked with them. All the frustration of the grim life of a non-white was coming out. "They're starving us, that's what they're doing, moving Indians out to the new towns; we can't make a living there. The government talks about separate development but there's a lot more separatism than development."

He was 19, would be able to teach only Indians and was under continual police harassment for his political activity. In Canadian political terms, those politics might have been right-wing Liberal. "The education in my school is very poor, they don't really try to have us learn anything, that would be too dangerous. And when you try to do anything at all about the school, they give you a very hard time. I'm sure they're going to fail me or take away my grant."

"Are you Afrikaans?" "Yes," said the Dutch-speaking white student as he sat down beside me in a university cafeteria that might have been anywhere in the world.

"Horst tells me you support the government's policies."

"Of course. I'm working in the Nationalist party because I think what it is doing is right in South Africa. You have to accept human nature. Humans are naturally prejudiced; and we accept that prejudice and make it a principle of our government. That's the best way to run a country. Look at the United States, they did away with segregation and now they've got all those riots." "You really think of yourself as that different from an African?"

"Sure. They come from a different background than me. I could never live beside an African, we're just two different kinds of people."

"You don't think you have to fight that prejudice and that difference?"

"No, you make sure Africans are equal, but they still have to be separate."

"And you think the government is doing that, trying to give Africans equal conditions and so forth in the country?"

"Sure, don't you?" I told him I wasn't convinced, in a nice way, too nice, but then he was a very friendly open guy. And I had to get to a meeting where I was speaking about Tanzania and the black equality and socialism we had seen there. It was very hard to talk about those things in South Africa.

Visitors to South Africa don't see Soweto, the African community of 500,000 people ten miles from the Johannesburg it serves. Partly because it's not on the maps, partly because it's illegal for a white to go there.

We visited it on the pretext of driving home a black former student of one of the five African universities in the country. He had been expelled as one of 21 supposed leaders of a spontaneous sit-in by 300 of the 400 students at the place objecting to government harassment and direction of their lives.

"All African universities in South Africa are just glorified high schools. There's just no future for us here. I want to get out of the country and get north, work in one of the independent countries there. This place is never going to change."

by steve langdon

I talked to him about the sit-in and he spoke bitterly about the white authorities of the school who wouldn't even have a discussion with students with complaints. He was also angry about the use of police spies among the students. Kleinschmidt, in fact, suggested that as high as 40% of African university students are forced to give police information on their classmates if they wish to remain in school.

"The African universities are so ridden with fear it's impossible to believe," said the NUSAS man, and the African student agreed: "They can get you anytime they want and simply take you away. The come in the middle of the night and pick somebody up, and you never hear from him again. You don't know what they've done with him — put him in detention, shot him or just transported him to the rural areas." With power like that against him, and little hesitation in its use, the non-white South African is a scared and careful man, keeping as much in line as possible.

We drove through Soweto, dirt roads, and crammed together thousands of drab toolshed size houses, with an average of nine people to each. Periodically the place erupts into violence and murders — against other Africans, usually on Saturday night. We visited the only high school for the whole area.

"We had to turn away 300 of 700 people who applied for first year last year," the African principal told us in the storage room that overcrowding forced him to use for an office. "And even as it is, we've got 70 students to one teacher in the early years."

We visited some classrooms and there the students were stuffed into second-hand desks in small classrooms trying to get the knowledge that the principal knew would give them little future in that society anyway. The students looked at us in a kind of tense fear that suggested the only whites who came here usually were Afrikaans inspectors.

We drove on through Soweto, past labour barracks the government is starting to use to avoid having wives and children come with their husbands to work in Jo-burg's mines and industries. We passed a high wall with barbed wire topping separating Soweto from adjacent white housing. Then we turned into the hospital for blacks, where conditions, we were told, were incredibly bad. As it turned out we couldn't verify that, though we tried to get a tour from the white female administrator of the place. Her eyes almost fell out when we walked into her office, five young whites and an African.

"What are you doing here? What do you want? You can't be in here!"

"Well, I'm a Canadian, and I thought I'd like to see the hospital before going back home with my impressions of South Africa."

"It's out of the question, impossible, you need a pass, and it's only good on Thursday, and you have to have a guide accompany you. Now you'll have to leave, at once!"

We left. We dropped the student off and we returned to the huge hotels, the expensive homes, the spacious universities of the other South Africa. Kleinschmidt looked at me, and said, "You remember you asked me why I kept doing what I'm doing? After Soweto, you know."

In South Africa there is no single way of life. The population comprises many different peoples whose divergent customs and traditions lend a highly diversified lustre to every day life. At one extreme is the white nation, main repository of western civilization. South Africa in fact, S.A. Dept. of Information.

significant of which is the African National Congress. The ANC in mid November proved it still exists in the country by organizing surprise pamphlet drops and hidden radio speakers to announce, "The time has come, this Government of oppression, this Apartheid monster must be removed from power and crushed by the people."

The ANC is also active in guerilla fighting in Rhodesia with the liberation movement there and sees its strategy as freeing Rhodesia and Mozambique first, then closing in on South Africa. The country is poor guerilla territory, though, much like southern Ontario, and the army is very well-equipped and trained. Internal war seems unlikely to succeed without major external aid, and here South Africa is already using her wealth slowly to buy off independent African governments, such as that in Malawi.

And so we come back to the South African economy with its massive American investment, its high profits and its growing dominance all across the African continent. It is a capitalist industrial nation of the very first order.

Yet it is a vulnerable economy because it relies so heavily on international trade and the investment of American and British capital — and of Canadian capital for that matter. Exports make up a quarter of the GNP and nearly a third of capital goods supplied each year are imported. Gold is a particularly important export and oil a particularly important import. In short, international action against South Africa could be effective.

Is it likely to come? Indications are not encouraging. Just recently the International Monetary Fund and the United States acted to provide a guaranteed market for the South African gold which new international financial arrangements seemed to have eliminated. The British cannot afford to act because of the harm likely to come to their precarious balance of payments. There has been no significant international move yet against South Africa, and it seems that western interests are making so much money there that such moves are unlikely.

What of Canada and Canadians? I talked to students in Tanzania when I was there and they were extremely critical of Canada. One student leader summed things up by saying "We still have to think of Canada as the enemy when you're in a NATO alliance with Portugal and when you're not moving against South Africa." The NATO alliance helps Portugal defend Mozambique. And far from being negative about South Africa, this country still provides them with Commonwealth preferences in trading, in spite of their expulsion from that organization a decade ago.

Canadians have two things they can do. They can force their government to act. And they can act as individuals. The first category should include economic boycotts against South Africa and political and military help for African liberation movements. Canadian advisors in Tanzania, for example, seem to have been relieved of their military duties by Tanzania because they refused to help train guerillas to fight in Mozambique, Rhodesia and South Africa. The Chinese are now doing the training — which may be preferable since their credentials for the job are a little more obvious — but is not very indicative of Canadian support for African liberty.

As individuals we can do two things, as well as pressuring the government. Church groups, those opposed to any kind of war, even of liberation, can contribute money to organizations like NUSAS helping Africans have a somewhat better life inside South Africa. Others can provide aid to organizations like the A.N.C. They have fundraising branches in Canada and need the money badly.

But we must act, and act quickly. In a major speech last fall at the University of Toronto the President of Tanzania, Julius Nyerere, perhaps the most respected leader on that continent, made the point emphatically. As he put it, the basic question we are answering is "Will Canada at least understand that freedom means as much to us in Africa as it does to any other people?"

A white person means a person who — (a) in appearance obviously is a white person and who is not generally accepted as a coloured person; or (b) is generally accepted as a white person and is not in appearance obviously not a white person.

1962 Amendment to Population Registration Act.

One of the Africans we met in Soweto put it very well. "It has to change. This is our country and we're going to run it; we have to. These people are human beings not animals and we're not going to accept being second-class citizens here. We're not going to be put down forever."

The question is will it change, and, if so, how?

Most NUSAS people were pessimistic; they felt forty years might be the shortest period you could expect. The reason is simple: there are three very powerful factors working for the government. Whites are coming increasingly to support the hard-line Nationalist party. Blacks are under tremendous repression and faced with very powerful military force if they move to guerilla warfare. Finally, and the key to both the first two, the South African economy is booming and very rich.

Organizations like NUSAS may have some impact on white opinion, but that is doubtful. In fact, the government is able to use NUSAS as a whipping boy, playing on fears of U.S. style student riots in conjunction with blacks, to keep much of its support solid. The NUSAS role is more likely to be in the fields they've recently moved into of helping and working with non-white students. Their usefulness here depends on financial help from outside South Africa.

RUDOLF SERKIN, piano, ADOLF BUSCH, violin, HERMAN BUSCH, cello. Beethoven "Ghost" Trio; Brahms Trio in C Maj., op. 87. Columbia Odyssey 32 16 0361.

For sheer musicality, this reissue of a 1951 taping of the Brahms trio in C major surpasses most present-day attempts, including the much lauded Istomin-Stern-Rose collaboration. Great dynamic depth and healthy tempi present a jovial, robust Brahms. The Beethoven seems a trifle fast, but Serkin and friends are very convincing. Their sensitive interpretation sets the standard for piano trios 20 years later.

CREAM. Best of Cream. Polydor 543.069. JIMI HENDRIX. Smash Hits. Reprise 2025. ROLLING STONES. Through the Past, Darkly. London NPS 3

If you were a Cream fan, chances are you'll already have recordings of most of the songs on Best of Cream, which is a selection of cuts from their previous albums. It's a fine and representative collection though, and, true to the title, it has pretty much the best of what the Cream did.

Like the Cream album, Smash Hits is a collection of songs available on old Hendrix albums, but it's not as good a record as the Cream's. While I think that Hendrix is the world's best rock guitarist, I don't think he put out a really great album until Electric Ladyland, and consequently even on an album which is supposed to be a selection of earlier hits, there are a lot of sub-standard songs.

The Stones are that rarity, the rock group whose musicianship isn't as good as their material. I have always felt that the Rolling Stones were more charisma than the great musicians they were supposed to be. Nevertheless, there is some excellent music on this collection of past material, although, as with the Hendrix album, there is some throwaway material among what is supposed to be only big hits.

JANIS JOPLIN. Kozmic Blues. Columbia 9913.

Janis Joplin, in spite of what people have said, isn't a blues singer. She doesn't have the voice, approach, material (usually), or backing of the blues. But what she has assimilated and made very much her own is the best of Detroit/Memphis/Chicago soul. She successfully avoids either simply copying an already well established black musical form or watering it down for a white audience. She has a powerful enough voice to handle the music and sufficient individuality in her voice to create her own sound. Songs good, band good — choice white soul.

DON ELLIS. Shock Treatment. Columbia 9668; Autumn. Columbia 9721.

Don Ellis used to be an obscure avant-garde musician who played with George Russell and had his own Hindustani Jazz Sextet. Now, with his electrified quarter tone trumpet, his extremely loud big band, with its many percussionists and amplifiers, and his compositions in odd meters, he has hit the big time. In person, once, this stuff might be exciting, but on record I find it soon becomes boring — a sort of up to date Stan Kenton/Woody Herman approach. If you must join the rush to buy one of the records, try the second, which features Ellis' flatulent trumpet on a super noisy Indian Lady.

THE VELVET UNDERGROUND. MGM 4617.

This group started off as part of Andy Warhol's show but have since moved off in their own direction. It's a definitely New York sound (Pearls Before Swine have the same out-of-tune guitars). The music goes from self-consciously soft to loud and sinister (with a bit of steel guitar). Lou Reed does some of the better rock lyrics around — often satirical, often flippant, sometimes strangely tender, even holy.

CHAMPION JACK DUPREE. Jack & Mickey in Heavy Blues. Sire 9710.

A nice, if unexceptional, addition to Jack Dupree's many albums. The Mickey in the title is Mickey Baker who, in the mid-50's, was the pyrotechnic guitarist with the phenomenally successful Mickey and Sylvia act. The two get together with a couple of good English musicians on rhythm and produce some pleasant blues, though definitely on the light side in spite of the album title. Good natured fooling, fine barrel-house piano, and off-color lyrics set the tone for the record.

p.h.

JEAN ANOUILH & TINA TURNER. In Person. Minit 24018.

An incredibly "live" album — the engineering is excellent. The torrid sorcery of Tina Turner spins right off the record. Sounding like she gargles with kerosene, this beautiful woman brings the whole album to a musical and sexual catharsis. With cauterizing vocals, the vibrations of Tina scream give it to me when you come home.

a gloomy cavern

Jean Anouilh's The Cavern is to me a best-beloved play. Just before curtain at the current production of it in the Drama Centre's studio lab theatre on Glenmorris Street, I acknowledged this favoritism to director Peter Brigg. He was not cheered by the information, opining that nobody ever approves a production of a pet play.

In this case he was right. The play endears itself to me as a stylized examination of what constitutes reality, on and off stage. Anouilh sets up and manipulates three kinds of characters whose ostensible reality index is the degree to which they are part of the play's plot: an Author who is stymied by his own play, the characters which he has created into human beings, and a cardboard cut-out of a police inspector who brings the people in the audience into the lives of the people in the author's mind by investigating a murder. The victim is Marie-Jeanne, cook and below-stairs queen in a wealthy turn-of-the-century French household. And by the end of the inmates of this household have gotten out of control, assuming such dimensions that the inspector's plot-pushing question of "Who killed the cook?" is as irrelevant, irreverent and unreal to the audience as it is to the Author.

Or at least that's what should happen: this time it doesn't. By cramming The Cavern full of comments from Author and Inspector about the calibre of his play as play, Anouilh gambled on the perennial and universal availability of a cast whose competence and conviction can invert his deliberately self-conscious theatricalism. Very few actors in this production are up to the effort: Nigel Spencer as the Inspector and Doris Cowan as Adele come closest among the leads, with some support provided by Robert Lackenbauer's Baron Jules (the dead-on comic timing of which made me regret the smallness of the part) and John Pepper's Seminarist. The thirteen other performances range from the barely adequate though poorly paced to the abysmal — the greatest deficiencies coming through in sloppy diction, uncertainty about the delivery of lines and gestures, and general failure to develop and vary a role beyond its simplest possible outlines. It is the last of these lacks which aborts both credibility and charm in Bie Cartwright's performance as the complex earth-mother-cum-aristocrat-Marie-Jean, and when the character of the Cook goes, so does the Cavern.

More's the pity because the technical staging of the show is not only up to scratch but beyond it. Merle Niemi's set, remaining faithful to the script's instructions and tone, seems to triple the available acting area, and John Hendrix' lighting effects provide some of the subtlest drama in the production. But this show rests with the cast, and Mr. Brigg might have been wise to have had them meditate on the Pirandello quote he put in the programme: "A play doesn't create people. People create a play. So first of all one must have people... With them and through them the idea of the play will be born, its shape and destiny enclosed in this first." Without people emerging from the on-stage parts, I couldn't discern life, much less shape and destiny.

Bertrand Russell was one of my heroes, in part because I thought the immoral old man was also immortal. He was 97 — a little deaf, but otherwise still lucid and active. That's a goal to aim for.

After the first part of his autobiography came out a few years ago, I put a picture of him on my wall, with his words beside it: "Three passions, simple but overwhelmingly strong, have governed my life: the longing for love, the search for knowledge and unhealable pity for the suffering of mankind." I like that. I was young then. Still am.

Russell's first three wives (and a few other love affairs) failed to meet that need for love. He divorced his first wife after 27 years, and the next two after about 16 years each (he gave his third wife a child when he was 65; that's another goal — not the child, but the activity). His longing was fully satisfied only after he was 80, with his fourth wife. (I've been lucky, so far.)

This old man once said that in his search for knowledge he had acquired a little, but not much. He, with all his learning, thought he knew little; what then do I know? What knowledge should I gain, how, and what do I do with what little I shall master? Russell wanted to answer those questions too. His search led him to logic and mathematics, psychology and epistemology, moral philosophy, philosophy of education, politics, economics, history, culture, religion and science. He wrote short stories and a lengthy autobiography as well. (I'd better get moving.)

He also had a great sense of humour.

Russell influenced one of the many formative stages of my life, with his intense honesty and his thoroughly rational, skeptical approach to every problem of existence. I am not going to analyze or summarize his thought; I just want to note some of those which have caught my attention at some time, to be accepted, modified, or rejected, but always grappled with. I don't want to sensationalize, either: Russell wrote so many books, and changed his mind often enough, that any position could be taken from his work. If I sometimes make him out to be embryonic New Left, it is only because some of his ideas have driven me there; others make me stop for a bit, though.

"Man is a rational animal — so at least I have been told. Throughout a long life, I have looked diligently for evidence in favour of this statement, but so far I have not had the good fortune to come across it." Russell spent his life trying to show people that rationality was a highly desirable condition; he insisted on the rational conquest of fear, the rejection of myths, the close examination of beliefs and assumptions. "Many a man will have the courage to die gallantly, but will not have the courage to say, or even to think, that the curve for which he is asked to die is an unworthy one."

Russell's ethical ideas were always getting him into trouble. Most people seemed to associate him with sexual immorality. He wrote, for example, that the ideal to be aimed at in sexual life was not lifelong monogamy enforced by legal or social penalties.

"The ideal to be aimed at is that all sexual intercourse should spring from the free impulse of both parties, based upon mutual inclination and nothing else . . . The cramping of love by institutions is one of the major evils of the world."

Sex should be a source of joy in the world, not a condition of repression: "If art is to revive after the world has been Americanized, it will be necessary that America should change, that its moralists should become less moral and its immoralists less immoral, that both should recognize the higher values involved in sex, and the possibility that joy may be of more value than a bank account." That was 1929: the American grasp has extended, and joy is still in last place.

But sex was only one ethical concern. He was also a pacifist; he saw no use for war, and campaigned for nuclear disarmament in his later years. He fought for socialism, too, but warned that just socialism was not enough: "Daily joy, liberation from care, adventure, opportunity for creative activities as important as justice in bringing a life that men can feel to be their own."

There are, Russell says, terms of morality in operation for dealing with our own society, other than for dealing with our world. Laing for the mechanics of operation. "Many of the men who gressive impulses are diffieal with, but the solution is hibit them, but rather to redirect them into creative directions.

"We shall not create a good world by trying to make men timid and tame, but by encouraging them to be bold and adventurous and fearless except in inflicting injuries upon their fellow men. Our present predicament is due to the fact that we have learned to understand and control to a terrifying extent the forces of nature outside us, but not those that are embodied in ourselves." Jung and Laing, among others, have been leading me to a greater awareness of those internal forces and how they work.

Religion is unworthy of free men, and Russell is fearless and ruthless in condemning it. He is often unfair in attacking religions through lashing out at their more stupid adherents, yet his general point is valid. Religion has served often to fetter men, to humiliate them, to deny their intelligence and their culture, to inflict severe tortures on other men for their beliefs — all this is true (though less so of Eastern religions). It is true too that most religious beliefs are held unthinkingly, to give solace and comfort. A few years ago, reading Russell's remark that "There is something feeble and a little contemptible about a man who cannot face the perils of life without the help of comfortable myths",

I thought, "Yeah! True! Not me, boy!"

Now, I wonder more — about the functions of myths in the past in various cultures, their functions now, and their possible functions. Can myths have valid purposes? What myths?
Should we think about creating new kinds of myths? Myths can be dangerous, but perhaps they can also add a beauty to living.

Russell wants to stimulate thought, and he succeeds. He places great value upon thinking; it is that which his politics, educational theory, all his philosophy glorify. He saw that the joy of mental adventure common to children is killed during education.
Why?

"Men fear thought as they fear nothing else on earth — more than ruin, more even than death. Thought is subversive and revolutionary, destructive and terrible; thought is merciless to privilege, established institutions, and comfortable habits; thought is anarchic and lawless, indifferent to authority, careless of the well-tryed wisdom of the ages."
Oh wow! Up thought! Up the revolution!

"Fear of thought holds men back — fear lest their cherished beliefs should prove delusions, fear lest the institutions by which they live should prove harmful, fear lest they themselves should prove less worthy of respect than they have supposed themselves to be."

I haven't touched on Russell's more technical philosophical works, for these are less easily dealt with in this format, but they are part of the quest for knowledge as well.

Russell acted too, and that is to be admired. Any man, who, at 90, gets arrested for disturbing the peace while leading a rally for nuclear disarmament gets my love. He was jailed for opposing British participation in World War I; he founded an experimental school in 1927; he was dismissed from an American college as an alien, an atheist, and advocate of sexual immorality; he championed women's rights, civil liberties, trial marriage. He set up a War Crimes Tribunal in 1967 to try U.S. leaders for their conduct of the Vietnam War; last December he asked U Thant to support an international commission to investigate the alleged massacres in Vietnam by American troops. And now that he's dead, he refuses to have any flowers at his cremation.

He was keenly honest, and always open to learning and changing his views, in order to approach truth more closely — a true radical. He's one of the men I want to be like when I grow up.

er's wisdom, and on the other, a ruthlessness in the struggle for worldly success and contempt for opposing groups. Russell suggests that education could be different if people thought it as important to keep alive children's minds as to secure victory in war. "Capitalists, militarists, and ecclesiastics cooperate in education because all depend for their power upon the prevalence of emotionalism and the rarity of critical judgement."

Education spends too much time preserving the past, and not enough trying to create the future. This is also one of Russell's complaints about politics. He was a liberal; his creed one of live-and-let-live, toleration and freedom consonant with public order, moderation in political programmes.
For the liberal, what ideas are held is not as important as how those ideas are held: they are held tentatively, send front page back to the press

When I was very, very young (15 or 16), a theatre pro relative explained to me what a "star part" was all about: Fifteen minutes or so of plot-setting dialogue, a sudden pause, follow-spot to up-centre stage, enter Star, a snappy one-liner, and bang: thunderous ovation from the house. Watch enough right-wing theatre and you can stage that bit in your sleep.

Unfortunately, Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur's The Front Page, currently in a two week run at O'Keefe Centre, contains no such "star part", despite Director Harold J. Kennedy's efforts to create one for Ray Milland in this road company.

This sort of misconception of parts is only typical of a disappointingly lethargic production of the 1928 portrait of old-time newsmen that produced many a nostalgic dollar in last year's Broadway revival.

O'Keefe touring companies are rarely endowed with the advance publicity of a T.V. special four days before opening. But this company could do without comparison to the revival Broadway cast the CBC showed last week, for every scene and character pales sickeningly.

The show itself, if a bit bitter, can be funny as hell: Robert Ryan and George Grizzard proved that in the televised version. But it requires tight timing and visible energy from every cast member, and in both respects, the current company apparently doesn't give a damn. But then most road companies don't.

Milland, as the sharp-tongued, crusty editor, doesn't even enter till the end of Act Two, and by then even a virtuoso display of comic genius (which he ain't) couldn't save the show. With the exception of U of T alumnus Colin Hamilton, a company that disgraces their Equity cards yawns, mumbles and miscues through some great lines.

Their leader in this atrocity was De Veren Bookwater, whose sing-song Hildy Johnson was a bad imitation of Robert Preston's Musc Man at best, and unprintable (even in the Varsity) at worst. And Milland is no better; his non-talent for walking over punch lines makes one suspect he is still trying to sleep off The Lost Weekend.

The capital sin, however, was to come from Brooks Morton as the Sheriff, who aside from obviously missing at least two lines cues, did that Which Is Not Done by upstaging The Star late in Act Three. Milland didn't like it, and took no pains to hide the fact. The misepisode did at least provide one of the night's few big laughs.

One heaven-sent exception to the whole mess was Hamilton, who alone among the cynical newsmen seems to know what one-liner humour is and how it's done.

When I worked in the press office of a U.S. resident, regional theatre, one of our favourite PR themes was the cold commercialism of New York theatre, where, we claimed, theatre as a craft was really dead. This Front Page makes me wonder how much of that was just factional PR hype.

salesman

Four men selling washable, gilded, forty-nine-ninety-five bibles to lower-middle-class Roman Catholic families. Salesman by the Mayles brothers is a film that deserves a different name, for it does not tell about salesmen in general, but about a specific kind of salesman selling a specific kind of bible to a specific kind of person — so many specifics that any generalization would be bound to seem false.

But the movie must be specific like this because it is cinema verite. To remain interesting, cinema verite usually deals with extremes of one kind or another and the particular extreme chosen often keeps the point of view of the movie limited to the subject of the movie. In other words, where cinema verite is concerned, it is sometimes not fair to take the extreme and apply it to the ordinary, for the technique does not open us up to complexities, especially of character, in an artistic sense, but only in a real-life sense. That is, because the people in a cinema verite film are what they are, they are not meant to be representative.

Salesman deals with inarticulate nobodies whose primary interest for us lies not in what they are, but in what they do. These four salesmen and their customers are too inarticulate, too insensitive to nuances and subtleties to be able to interest us in what they are — for that you need actors and a director. Although we are taken some of the way into their characters, for the editor can isolate certain gestures and expressions, our ultimate interest comes from the situations in which we find them.

Everything is kept on a level of prattling, jocular pretense to cover up the fact that the salesman's life depends on whether he can sell the bible; and so things get farther and farther away from reality until one salesman can openly offer to another, in front of the customers, to have a go at selling them the product: "Let me try, Jim." And it's quite safe to say something like that because by this time everyone is so far into the game, and paradoxically so aware that it is a game, that nothing so simple as that can stop it. But precisely because everyone feels called upon to acknowledge that it is a game, the selling becomes a dreary waste of time with nobody having any fun.

This interplay creates the rhythm to which the film moves. It is of an America where business is a fundamentalist religion, and where, for these particular members of the faithful, religion is a business. That sounds ponderous, but it makes for a lot of interesting and very funny episodes.

The rise of cinema verite techniques may have something to do with the increasing complexity of American life. Perhaps it is more realistic nowadays to state specifics, to deal with little groups and remain inside them, rather than to impose some kind of inevitably spurious unity on America. (If you keep away from the whole, you might find something good in the particular.)

Salesman shows a lot of dreary and depressing things, and maybe it is going too far to call it optimistic. But in spite of the debts and the pretence and all the other shit surrounding them, much of which they have created themselves, the people in the movie are so strikingly just human beings surviving as best they can in a rotten world, that the final feeling the picture communicates is a positive one, and that's pretty encouraging these days.

midas touch

Lenny Breau, fresh from an appearance at Hart House, opened this week at the Riverboat. His late start plus a thoroughly miserable day had me in a miserable mood before Breau even came on His Liberace-like voice (I've talked like I have a cold for two weeks years') and nonsensical banter further set me off.

However, once Breau picked up his acoustic and began to peel off Spanish Jazz: all the troubles of my day ended. He played the flamenco oriented tune in great style peeling off 64th notes with apparent ease, keeping always in control, interweaving melody line with improvisation, always intense and self-assured. By the time he had finished the song, I was ready to leave, feeling there was nothing else he could display.

I was sadly mistaken, for the other songs of the set displayed not only great standard technique but unique new stylings applied to every form of music from Jerry Reed's bluesy "The Claw" to Merle Travis' "Cannonball Rag", a country tune. Producing everything from 5-finger picking on body and neck simultaneously to the use of a microphone for effect, Breau had still not exhausted his 'touch'.

He picked up an electrified twelve string and created effects the nature of which I have never before seen or heard displayed on a guitar.

Anyone interested in hearing some great guitar music can hear this sadly unclaimed artist at the Riverboat this weekend.

The scenes — the Cafe Monaco, Rue de Rivoli, Cafe Buci — are unimportant, just as irrelevant as the fact that most of the tales are set in Paris, except that the incidents did take place in the Quarter, and probably couldn't have anywhere else in the world. The characters too, for the most part, are not memorable — they enter:

"I'm Baot," said Baot, lacking his smile.

"Just get undressed," she said and pulled the beehive sweater over her head.

They play out their roles in a tale or two, and leave.

It is not the characters, or the scenes, but the air of performance, the myth, that is all. A group, Garber included, toured the valley of the Loire:

Our noses dripped needles of crystal, our breath was stale. The rain had soaked us to the skin, so that we shivered as if palsied. No one soiled a ward.

A bum trip, all around. But, nearing Paris on the return journey:

Garber: "Listen," I said, "I liked this trip, it was good."

Cheryl: "It's like a dream. I won't ever forget it," she said.

The characters too, measure their stature in terms of myth. The failures — like Bobby E. The minions — like Dixie Glukicz, infatuated with the nasal sense of words so that "Neem" (short) was a judgement short and curt, while Neveemmm (long) expressed a mild and simple joy." And the heroes — Emmanuel the Spanish: "I have especial powers from the smoke of the hemp . . . It gives to me a great sexual profundness." Renowned as well as high priest to the god pinball machine: "These machines are not Gottlieb's of Chicago, . . . they are Rogers of Philadelphia. That is not the true machine." And like every true myth, a sense of the unreal — he wasn't Spanish at all, but a Canadian who took the trouble to translate everything he thought into Spanish and then literally back into English before speaking. Why? "It takes up his time." Heroes, and super-heroes — Vangrin, the famous writer, who committed suicide by drowning in a pile of manure.

Year of the Quiet Sun by Ian Young is Anansi's latest little volume of new Canadian poetry. I worry at calling it brilliant. Some of the poems are sentimental, or dangerously near it, and occasional bits of metaphysics have the claustrophobic smell of ACTA VICTORIANA. But brilliance is the effect of a surprising number of images, lines and whole poems.

Young's is a conservative poetry, delicate, spare and descriptive. It makes grammatical sense, often tells a story. The madness of simply being around these days is there (although I wonder to what degree this is acceptable to Young's own intention) but it is not out front in the wild juxtaposition and frenetic rhythms that are characteristic of most young 1960's poetry; instead it is contained, more powerful for being pent up by carefully polished words and sentences:

The sound of a cricket or the calls of birds were shrill lesions in the quiet air around me, sweltering and still.
The leaves hung from the trees dangling on thin stems.

. . . The sound of dry breath clings to me.

I hear the sun's core burn.
Have I been too long in cities that I have such fear of the landscape?

The extraordinary thing with Young is how he subdues so many of his tools — rhythm, sound — to a simple but important service role to the words, and then often just the meaning of the words. The brilliance hits less technically: the stuff again and again cuts deeply and accurately into the senses:

In a Chinese window of a store on Yonge Street,
I saw a row of green jade elephants. . .
so polished, and green, and smooth it seemed as if they'd loomed from some sleeping forest
under the sea, and only yesterday had wandered ashore to find themselves in a world of gigantic cushion-covers, and enormous bamboo fans.

Young reminds that occasional bits of beauty — sanity? — are around. The reviewer had almost forgotten. Ian Young, Year of The Quiet Sun, Anansi, $1.95.

wowee! sex!

Here's a special Review quiz for cinema buffs. From the following information identify the movie in question.

Some time ago, this black-and-white film raised a great many eyebrows when high government officials labelled it a "racy, sex orgy stag picture", and suggested it never be shown to the public. The movie appeared destined to remain unseen by North American audiences, but a board of censors finally decided to release it in the "Restricted-to-Adults" category. Since that time, hordes of people have been eagerly flocking to see this highly-publicized flick. What is it called?

If you guessed I Am Curious (Yellow) you are close and get part marks. The correct answer is Room for a Stranger which was shot right here in Toronto in 1965.

Room for a Stranger made national headlines when Ralph Cowan, then Liberal MP for York-Humber, charged in the House of Commons that a pornographic film was going to be shown in the local theaters. Although he admitted never seeing the movie, Cowan based his remarks on a number of stills published in a Toronto magazine, Cine World. The raciest of these pictures showed a fully-clothed man embracing a woman who was nude from the waist up, and whose back was turned to the camera. Pretty hot stuff, all right!

The MP was also annoyed that Room for a Stranger had been shot using some CBC sets without authorization, and that a number of CBC staff members were involved in the production. As it turned out, Cowan's accusations were disregarded, and the Metro police gave the movie its seal of approval.

Now, four and a half years later, the movie is out, and critics everywhere can finally tell their readers that Room for a Stranger is possibly the worst Canadian feature film ever made. Shot in a mere 16 days for the staggeringly small sum of $50,000, it deals with a professional blackmailier who demands payment in sex rather than in cash. The boredom produced is so powerful, that the film's scant 80 minutes seem as in need of an intermission as a four-hour Hollywood blockbuster.

It does not appear that any part of Room for a Stranger was snipped away and left on the cutting-room floor. But the finished version is so sexually unoffending, unstimulating and uninteresting, that it is really quite difficult to understand what all the Parliamentary noise was about. There is as much bare flesh as in a woman's bath-oil commercial, and as much raw sex as in a Doublemint ad.

Since, 1965, Canada has moved up somewhat on the international scale. It will unfortunately be quite a while before this country starts producing more films like Warrendale and A Married Couple instead of trash like Valerie and Room for a Stranger.

byrds of past paradise

The Byrds must have seemed like an anachronism to the Toronto audience that heard them last Sunday night at Massey Hall. It is impossible to separate The Byrds' music from the intricate pattern of rock history that they were once leading figures in. Jim McGuinn, the only remaining member of the original group, has kept the sound and image of The Byrds intact. Hearing them now is like going in a time machine back to the Los Angeles of 1965. The Byrds are the last representatives of the old hip scene — sounds for affluent white teenagers cruising unconcerned about politics down Sunset Blvd. in sports cars stoned on acid. Visions of the future in those days pictured hidden armies of smiling hippies flowing across the stage of history telling people to cool it.

The Byrds in their time were one of the most creative forces in rock. They were the first group to adapt Dylan to rock n' roll, and in doing so invented a sound that was both loud and electric and harmonious like a choir at the same time. They were the first group to go into country and the first group to use electronics for music. They invented the acid style of guitar — and used it in their music without abandoning melody.

It is fitting for a group whose closest contact with the American black man was driving past him on the freeway going to the beach that they made the jump across the ocean to India without a detour through the ghetto. Later groups have used what The Byrds created but have had to pay their dues to the musical and social forces of the age. The Byrds were there first and so could afford to be innocent. And of all the rock groups only The Byrds spoke lovingly of technology. They evangelized airplanes and space satellites, telephones and electricity. The modern world was to be dug on.

McGuinn has kept it just like it was. At Massey Hall The Byrds sang all the old songs — Tambourine Man, Eight Miles High, My Book Pages. McGuinn still talks to audiences with the careful heavy hip accent of the L.A. teenager. The group he's gathered around him gives forth the same pure sound. The second guitarist is one of the best in the business, the bass player superb. Everything is just right for an idle dream of by-gone days.

a drag in drag

In both of Graham Jackson's plays performed on this campus, he seems to have a fascination with the female character. Both "The Sisters of Mercy" (last year) and "To the Hollow" (Playing this week at Room 3, Vic New Academic Building) are peopled with many women and hardly any men. "The Sisters of Mercy" examined the relations of a brother to his five sisters and was an interesting probe into the character of the six people. "To the Hollow" is a play about five lesbians, and, at the risk of sounding coy, is just one colonial drag.

Jackson's women look like he thought them up after looking through Cosmopolitan magazine and the bickering and putting down are almost a direct transplant from a trite male homosexual play. Even Jackson's scintillating gift for verbal jousting and good performances by Karen Borczak and Judy Young failed to elicit any reaction but, "What the Hell is this all about?"

The Dance of Destiny

The 1930's — a collage of desperation, resignation, eternal optimism and irrational faith.

The 30's — rocking-chair marathons, roller-skating marathons, flag-pole sitting marathons, pie-eating marathons, dance marathons.

The dance marathon in particular. The fox trot, the camel walk, the Ipswitch, the dipsy-doodle, the Lindy Hop, the Lambeth Walk. Dozens enter. Hundreds watch, transfixed by the blind, relentless, unquestioning faith of the contestants and by the utter absurdity of it all.

Most enter for the prize money (deductions made by the organizers for various expenses will amount to hundreds of dollars, but of this the contestants can know nothing). Some enter with the near-hysterical hope that fame and discovery await. "Yowza, yowza, yowza . . . Welcome to the Dance of Destiny." Some enter when everything to do has been done. A few enter when something must be done with an empty life. Some by design. Some by accident.

Yet for twenty, forty, eighty, one hundred hours they dance while reasons slide slowly into oblivion. Most collapse from muscle fatigue and heat prostration after four or five weeks, but a few continue despite the stench of sweat and the glare of lights and the muted moaning and droning of the dance bands which persist in playing the same insipid, mindless numbers day after day after day. "Struggling, battling to win and isn't that the American way." Occasionally someone is driven mad. Occasionally someone dies. But most survive.

Sydney Pollack's adaptation of Horace McCoy's They Shoot Horses, Don't They? is a grim, ugly, horrifyingly bleak and brilliant film. It is a film which is better not remembered vividly, yet it is impossible to blur it in memory, for They Shoot Horses, Don't They? is as vivid and terrifying as a child's nightmare. There is nothing in Pollack's film to shield us from the sheer horror of the dance marathon and from the vacuum in which McCoy's characters exist. Existence is all they achieve in life and we come to feel increasingly uncomfortable with the menacing close-ups of the contestants with which Pollack punctuates the crushing routine — faces unable to mask the sullen semi-conscious fatigue which compels them to speak without thought and which ultimately erases all words and defies all description. Yet, as haunting as are these bursts of unflinching insight, the scenes which disturb the most, perhaps, are those in which the dance-hall audience looms beyond the floor in tiers of arena bleachers, their laughter and cheers of encouragement only fortifying their anonymity.

Yet, in They Shoot Horses, Don't They? the marathon audience is not simply a background wall of nameless faces. Generally the screen is the barrier at which our awareness of a film halts, but Pollack forces us to recognize ourselves beyond the screen, on the opposite side of the dance-hall, in another place and in another time. The expectations, however, of both audiences remain constant.

During 'The Derby', a savage endurance race designed to decimate the competition, Pollack's jostling hand-held camera momentarily freezes the blank, expressionless sense of terror in the contestants' eyes, and, just as the audience in the bleachers cheers and screams in an incredible orgy of release, so too we cannot avoid being swept along in a flood of adrenaline. In our minds we scream encouragement to Gloria, Robert, Alice, Ruby, James and the Sailor, for they cannot be disqualified. They are acting against all rational motives, all reasonable thought — sustained only by a ludicrous, un-nameable impulse to survive the marathon and to win. They are, in short, human — pathetic, small and blinded by their faith in themselves. When they lose that faith, they lose everything and they are destroyed.

Alice, the English showgirl (Susannah York), deserted by her partner, stands beneath a cold shower, fully clothed, during a fifteen minute rest period and stares out from the center of her catacnic disbelief at nothing. Gloria (Jane Fonda), the burnt-out Midwesterner, the ideal of American womanhood, but twisted, exploited and now forgotten, leaves the marathon — abandons her final attempt to find some sort of reason for life. "Now," she whispers calmly to Robert, her partner (Michael Sarrazin), and the bullet from her .38 revolver crashes through her skull and bursts her brain. "Why'd you do it, kid?" asks a bewildered cop. "She asked me to," replies Robert. "They shoot horses, don't they?"

If there is a single flaw in They Shoot Horses, Don't They? — although, in retrospect, it seems slight — it lies in the intermittent jump-cuts to a stylized court room where Robert is condemned to death for the "murder" of Gloria. The fatalism which hangs above the dance floor, the sense of entrapment which locks Horace McCoy's characters together in the marathon, is evident enough and better left unspoken and in the mind where it is sensed the strongest.

In the final analysis, what remains to be acclaimed? That They Shoot Horses, Don't They? adheres to the existentialist formula? That it is profoundly concerned with desperation and faith? That in its own way it is as horrific and sympathetic a film as Bergman's Persona? That Pollock offers no straight and easy path to human fulfillment and happiness? Certainly all this is true, but there is more to They Shoot Horses, Don't They? than metaphysics and if this review has dwelt at such length with the phenomenon of the 30's dance marathon it is only an attempt to dispel much of the bitter taste which McCoy's novel left with so many critics on its publication in 1935. Above all else, Pollack's film is an involving experience — as involving as Bullitt or The Wild Bunch or Z (if that has not yet become too blasphemous a description). Nevertheless, Sydney Pollack has directed an incredibly effective and disturbing film which is unquestionably the finest American release to appear this year. ian Ritchie

This week an Irish Studies seminar has brought an offbeat bit of theatre to campus along with the usual learned lectures and panels. Smock Alley, or The Fortunes of an Eighteenth Century, being performed through Tuesday night by an Irish company at Central Library Theatre, bills itself as an historical musical entertainment devised from "ballads, songs, quotations from contemporary journals, and extracts from eighteenth-century plays." The presentation aims to recreate the story of Dublin's Theatre Royal, better known to contemporaries of Goldsmith and Sheridan by its street address — a dubious distinction since Smock Alley was "no unfit name for a place where such great opportunities are given for the making of lewd bargains." (That was an Englishman's verdict.) Lewd bargainers, incorrigible Irishmen, eighteenth-century addicts, and theatre lovers can get tickets for $1.50 if students and $2.50 if not.

Even more unusual is the one-night-stand, only-Toronto-performance of mime expert Marcel Marceau at York University on Monday night.

On this campus, UC Follies' Motherhall opened last night at Hart House Theatre, while The Cavern and To the Hollow continue at the Glenmorris street church-theatre and the New Vic Theatre respectively. All three are playing through tomorrow (Saturday, 7th February) night

FILM

The Department of Italian at Erindale College will be screening a series of film society favourites during February and March — Fellini's Variety Lights (Feb. 4), Open City by Rossellini (Feb. 18) and Antonioni's L'Aventura (March 4). All begin at 3 P.M. and admission is free.

If you missed Masculin-Feminin at the U of T Film Society, it will be revived once again by Cinema Lumiere where it will continue through until Sunday. Beginning Monday, Resnais' most recent feature (1968), Je t'Aime, Je t'Aime, (his first colour feature-length film incidentally) will re-open at Cinema Lumiere following its premiere last summer at Cinecity.

On Feb. 11 and 12... an Underground Film Festival in the Debates Room of Hart House. Admission is free. To be included in the Festival... From the Drain (David Cronenberg), Solipse (Bob Fothergill) — two Canadians, both of whom, much to their credit, have achieved some degree of recognition in this country — Portrait of Lydia (John Straiton) and Eclipse of the Sun Virgin. Also on Feb. 11, Prof.

Morgan of the U.C. English Dept. will be screening Rene Clair's Le Million at 4 P.M. in U.C. Room 105. Anyone interested is welcome to attend.

Opening today — Abraham Polonsky's Tell Them Willie Boy Is Here at the Hyland. Polonsky, incidentally, was blacklisted for twenty years by Hollywood for his alleged Communist sympathies which were supposedly revealed by the House on Un-American Activities in the 40's. Also opening today, Fantasia at the Capitol.

Elsewhere... Russ Meyer's tribute to the glories of British Columbia, Vixen (at Cinema 2000). Room for a Stranger returns, four and a half years later and despite Ralph Cowan, to the Nortown. Salesman on the 13th at Cinecity.

Tonight at 7:00 and 9:00 P.M. the Cinematheque at 539 Avenue Rd. at St. Clair will be screening The Conquest, a 1937 Greta Garbo film featuring Charles Boyer in the opposite role. As Kenneth Tynan said, "Men see in Greta Garbo sober what they see in other women when drunk." Memberships to the Cinematheque are $2.25.

MUSIC

Tonight at Massey Hall, the Toronto Symphony under ALAIN LOMBARD, guest conductor is performing Stravinsky's Petrouchka with TERESA STRATAS, soprano. Concert begins at 8:25 p.m.

The FACULTY OF MUSIC MADRIGAL SINGERS are featured Monday, Feb. 9 at 1:00 p.m. in the Concert Hall of the Edward Johnson Building. It's free, but worthwhile. Finally, Sunday, Feb. 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Great Hall of Hart House, there will be a performance of CLASSICAL INDIAN MUSIC. Free tickets are available from the Hall Porter.

GORDON LIGHTFOOT is being brought to the campus by the Blue & White Society and will be at Convocation Hall this Sunday at 7:00. Tickets are $3.50 from the SAC office.

THELONIOUS MONK who, for some reason or other, didn't make it to begin his stay at the Colonial this week should have arrived by the time this comes out. He'll be in town next week as well. SONNY GREENWICH is playing at Le Fauche through Sunday along with TERRY CLARKE and DON THOMPSON.

ALEX FRENCH, who as written some reviews for us, will be on the other side tomorrow night. He'll be playing traditional American music on guitar, banjo, autoharp and harmonica at Victoria College's Barefoot Coffee House in Wymillwood. BLITZ CREEK will also be appearing. Entertainment begins at 10:30.

LENNY BREAU is back at the Riverboat this week. He'll be followed next week by JOHN HAMMOND. The Onion has ROGER LAW, formerly of Mother Tucker's Yellow Duck, over the weekend. MICHAEL COONEY opens there on Wednesday. Ronnie Hawkins' band, THE HAWKS, go it alone at the Hawks Nest. Saturday night only.

Apologies from the editor for screwing up the Edward Bear review last week. We knew that Danny Marks is the lead guitarist, but it didn't come out that way.

Finally, the great blues harmonica player HOWLING WOLF suffered a heart attack while playing in town last week. He's going to be in hospital here for at least a couple of weeks and would probably appreciate hearing from people. It doesn't have to be anything elaborate, just a card will do. Send it to Howling Wolf (Chester Burnett), Room 701, Wellesley Hospital, 160 Wellesley St. E.

If you're tired of crummy cafeteria meals around campus, try the specials at Meat and Potatoes, on Huron just north of Harbour. It's the kind of place that you can sit comfortably, watch all the strange people, and groove on the various art displays. Friday nights there are jam sessions for anyone interested, and if these prove successful, there will be music sessions all weekend nights until 2 a.m.

Judge revokes Dellinger's bail

CHICAGO (UPI) — Disorder broke out during the Chicago "conspiracy 8" trial Wednesday, as presiding Judge Julius J. Hoffman revoked bail for defendant David T. Dellinger and consigned him to jail for the remainder of the trial.

Hoffman ordered bail revoked after Dellinger stood up in court and shouted that a government witness' testimony was "an absolute lie" and added, "Oh, bull shit."

Dellinger's remark followed testimony by James D. Riordan, a deputy chief of the Chicago Police department.

On the evening of August 28, 1968 — in the middle of the Democratic party convention — Riordan said he heard an unidentified speaker tell demonstrators in Chicago's Grant Park to go into downtown Chicago and "disrupt" stores, theatres and streets.

Shortly afterward, Riordan said, he saw Dellinger, a leader of the Mobilization Committee to end the War in Vietnam, marching off in the direction of downtown Chicago with a crowd of demonstrators carrying flags.

Hoffman's action in silencing Dellinger provoked a melee in the court room as fellow defendant Abbie Hoffman, a member of the Youth International Party, was attacked by court bailiffs as he rose to shout at Hoffman.

"You're a disgrace to the Jews, you runt," he said. "You would have done better with Hitler." Both Hoffmans are Jewish.

It was the second time during the four-month trial of the "conspiracy" that Judge Hoffman has used imprisonment as a means to silence the defendants. They are charged with crossing state lines to incite a riot during the democratic party convention.

The first occurred when Hoffman sentenced defendant Bobby Seale, National Chairman of the Black Panther Party, to four years in jail for contempt of court and ordered a separate trial date for him.

Earlier, Hoffman had ordered Seale bound to a chair and gagged in the courtroom to prevent him from speaking.

Wednesday, Hoffman also sentenced a spectator, Michael Mirsky to two days in jail for contempt of court for standing up and shouting, "That's right. What a circus" immediately after Dellinger's exclamation.

Watkins terms his report moderate

By JIM KARAMITANIS

Melville Watkins yesterday called the Watkins Report on foreign ownership of Canadian business "incredibly moderate"

Watkins, a U of T Economics professor, was addressing the U of T Liberal Club Wednesday at Sidney Smith Hall.

He said that the report, which was commissioned by the Pearson government, "was written under the supervision of a sub-committee of the Cabinet" and the eight economists who wrote it assumed that it would represent government policy.

"Only in Canada can such a report be called radical," he said. Since the government had "no serious interest in Canadian nationalism," he went on, it "disowned" the report, saying that it only represented the views of the authors. The report cost $300,000 to produce.

"The business class of this country do not give a damn about the survival of this country," he said. "We would be naive in the extreme to assume that a Canadian businessman working for an American company is free to say whatever he wishes about Canadian independence."

Watkins said that American imperialism abroad and unrest at home, has put Canadian nationalism back on the political agenda.

"This time we must do something about it," he said, "and not let it fritter away as before."

He suggested that the use of state power and nationalization is our only weapon against Americanization.

"There is no point in replacing American capitalism with Canadian capitalism," he added.

For Canada, "the pursuit of independence and the pursuit of socialism are one and the same" he said.

Asked about the cost of compensating companies after nationalization he suggested that "the best solution is not compensate them". He then added that "you don't pay cash, you issue them bonds, fifty year bonds."

Survey shows majority of faculty are Canadian

A survey initiated by President Claude Bissell on January 12 to determine the citizenship of faculty members, has found the majority to be Canadians.

With 95% of all faculty responding to the survey, 67.5% stated they had Canadian citizenship. American citizens comprised 15% of the faculty, 10.4% were from the United Kingdom, and 7.1% were from other countries.

Dr. Bissell said these statistics did not include staff members who have been in Canada for many years but have never taken out citizenship papers, but are "Canadian" in almost every other respect.

The data also does not indicate many persons who have not been in Canada long enough to qualify for citizenship a period of five years in most cases.

In an earlier survey by graduate student Danny Drache for the Commission on University Government concerning the Faculty of Arts and Science, Drache expressed fear of too much foreign influence in the faculty.

This earlier survey found Canadian citizens comprise 54% of this faculty. Drache stated not one of the 19 university departments was 100% Canadian, only one more than 75% Canadian, and only three of the 19 were more than 60% Canadian.

The Toronto Anti-Draft Program is experiencing a serious and worsening shortage of temporary housing for U.S. draft resistors.

The shortage follows a recent influx of American deserters in recent days. A hundred to 150 exiles approach the Anti-Draft program for assistance every week.

"Often he arrives as a fugitive with little money or clothes," a TADP spokesman said. "He wants and needs job, but in order to get one he needs many personal papers which have to be mailed from his home.

"So it can take a month or two before he receives his papers which will allow him to get landed immigrant status and a job," he said.

Anyone who is willing to provide free accommodation for a night or longer is asked to call the Housing department at 481-0241.

The Huron Sussex Residents Association wants student support for its opposition to the demolishing of 10 houses along Spadina and Sussex Avenues by the university.

Interested students are asked to attend a meeting Monday in Sid Smith, Room 1074, where plans for an informational picket line around the demolition site will be discussed.

The SAC voted support at a meeting Wednesday night.

The 10 houses are coming down to make way for a chiller plant to service air conditioning units in the new library and other planned university buildings.

The residents charge there are vacant lots nearby which the university has not fully considered. They feel losing the houses will irreparably damage the neighborhood's aesthetics and destroy valuable housing.

SAC also voted to purchase a Varsity ad, urging students to patronize the store on the Spadina-Sussex corner scheduled for demolition. The university has refused to pay proprietor Jack Dimanstein, forced to vacate by university plans, for his stock, fixtures on good will.

Eng takes Victoria Staff Cup, risks trench mouth

BY GELLIUS VOLLEYBALL FINALS
 Somebody actually phoned us and asked for these results. Fearing that our phones are tapped, we answered, somewhat evasively, that The Great Potato Is Immanent Truth. Now, however, the Story Can Be Told. Eng beat Scar 8-15, 15-3, 15-1, 17-15 to win the Victoria Staff Cup for the 17th year in succession. ("Succession" is the name of the Volleyball Gym in Hart House.) The last winning Eng team died, regretted by all, of a severe case of Trench Mouth contacted by drinking champagne from the Victoria Staff Cup.

RETRACTION
 It was reported in Wednesday's paper that SAC Presidential and VP candidates Benjamin McNally Mark Golden suggested a statue of Edward VII be constructed so that (final clause, use the subjunctive) "the school song would be played if the horse's cock were pulled." This column is satisfied that Mr. Golden's remark was misquoted and is sincerely sorry for any embarrassment the mistake may have caused him, Mr. McNally, or the horse. What Mr. Golden said was, "The school song should be played if the horse's rooster is pulled."

U of M, Laval may bolt OQAA

The Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association may be the next victim of rampant Quebec nationalism.

The Athletic Director of the University of Montreal, Gerald Simond, announced last weekend that his school and Laval University will begin talks with other Quebec Universities not associated with the OQAA with a view to the possible establishment of an exclusive Quebec Athletic Conference. Laval and U of M have been long-time members of the OQAA.

The motive force behind this decision appears to have come from a government sponsored advisory committee on sports known as Quebec Sports Confederation. This group has as its goal unity in all levels of sports in that province.

Mr. Simond announced that a meeting of the OQAA administrative council held here in Toronto Jan. 14-15 has given him permission to begin in preliminary talks.

Administration headaches and fan confusion resulting from partial participation in the OQAA and partial participation in other provincial conferences was given as the reason for the proposed change.

However, any changes would not be possible until the 1972 term as both universities are committed to the OQAA for the next year.

Olympic divers here Tuesday

University of Toronto types will get a chance to watch Olympic-class divers in action next Tuesday at the Benson Building.

Such outstanding performers as Beverly Boyes, who placed fourth in the last Olympic Games, Nancy Robertson, and an up-and-coming twelve-year-old named Cindy Shatto will demonstrate their skill in a special exhibition following the Cochrane Cup, awarded annually to the top undergraduate woman diver at U of T.

John Eisel and George Houvenin will also be diving, and Canadian Olympic Diving Coach Don Webb will be calling the action.

The show gets underway at 6:30 Tuesday.

Blues, Warriors draw as bad odor lingers

By LYNDON LITTLE

Bear Bryant, the ageless coach of the Alabama football team once remarked that "a tie game is like kissing your sister".

For Blues hockey fans accustomed to seeing their team win almost every home game, the 5-5 tie with the Waterloo Warriors Wednesday evening was especially unpalatable as it followed last Friday's draw with Loyola and the Jan. 24th loss to Cornell.

The clash with Bob McKillop's Warriors was supposed to have been the "big showdown" where the upstart shiny group from Waterloo were to get their just due. A win for Blues would have almost clinched first place in the Western Division of the OQAA. Now, it appears it will all go down to the final league game of the season when the two teams meet in that insane asylum better known as Waterloo Memorial Arena.

Thus, instead of whistling "How the West was won", coach Tom Watt is humming, "Oh give me a home where the defensemen DON'T roam".

The game itself must have been a poor example of textbook hockey but it "was" exciting.

Blues drew first blood midway though the opening stanza as Len Burman converted Dave McDowall's blue-line shot with a deflection at the edge of the goal-crease to the right of Waterloo netminder Jim Weber.

The Warriors then set a pattern that they were to follow in the third period by responding to the Blues' marker in rapid fashion. Roger Kropf scored a goal just 22 seconds later that looked for all the world like a carbon-copy of the Blues' effort.

Varsity again took the lead in the last minute of the period as right-winger Terry Peterman potted the rebound of Terry Parson's shot from the point which had caromed off the goal post.

WATSON SHARP

Adrian Watson in the Blues' net had to be especially sharp in that period as he handled 14 shots with most of them coming from close in. His favorite victim was right-winger Ken Laidlaw, whom he beat three times.

As has happened many times this year, Blues played their best hockey in the second period. They held an edge in play and in shots and picked up the only goal. Paul Laurent got Blues' third marker as he poked in Bob McGuinn's rebound with only two seconds remaining.

Any comparison between the odor of the mysterious liquid poured on the players benches between the second and third periods and Blues' play in the last stanza is purely coincidental.

Warriors notched the game at 3-3 with two quick goals in the first three minutes.

Waterloo's fine defenseman Ian McKegney got the first one at the 1:10 mark as Watson was left like that poor unfortunate chap who had his last can of under-arm deodorant stolen, in other words — "defenseless"! McKegney flipped a quick shot high into the net.

Kropf got his second goal a minute and a half later.

BLUES BOUNCE BACK

Blues came right back to go up 4-3. Captain Brian St. John combined with McGuinn who had mesmerized the Warriors with his skillful stick-handling before passing to St. John for a clear shot at the goal.

Cam Crosby, a recent addition to the Warriors and a former teammate of Blues' John Wright with the Marlies, brought his team even once again as his hard, low shot caught the far corner of the net. Wright then put Blues ahead for the last time as his centering pass deflected in off a Waterloo player.

The last goal of the game came off the stick of Warrior defenseman Savo Vujovic who played the game with a faceguard to protect a nose broken in their last game with the Western Mustangs.

Bryan Tompson and John Gordon did an effective job of killing penalties as none of the Waterloo goals came on a power play. Gordon also took a turn on defense whenever one of Blues' rearguards was penalized.

One of the most gauling aspects of the game was that Blues' supporters were often out-cheered by a hard-core of Warrior fans who can raise more decibles per person than a crowd at the Boston Gardens.

BLUENOTES — Hard-working winger LEN BURMAN is on a six-game scoring streak. He has scored in every league game since Christmas

see BLUENOTES, page 19

John Wright, behind the Warriors' net, registers amazement as he realizes his centering pass has been deflected past goalie Jim Weber for Blues' last goal Wednesday night. Blues' Bill Buba, far whom the pass was intended, cuts away while Terry Peterman follows up. Waterloo players Dave Rudge, (10) and two other Waterloo players arrive just in time to apologize to Weber.

Hectic weekend for Varsity teams

It's another busy weekend in both men's and women's athletics at U of T.

Top attraction will undoubtedly be tonight's OQAA Western Division hockey game at Varsity Arena between the University of Western Ontario Mustangs and the good guys, the Varsity Blues. It's the third meeting of the two teams, with Blues taking both previous meets by decisive 14-1 and 4-1 scores.

Game time, as usual, is 8 p.m.

Varsity swimming and wrestling teams travel to McMaster to do battle tonight. Both teams will be taking part in tri-meets with Western and the Macmen.

No less than four OQAA sports start their championship playdowns this weekend. The association's Nordic Ski Championships will be held at the Ottawa Ski Club on Saturday, while the Western Division championships for Badminton (at Waterloo), curling (at Guelph) and fencing (at McMaster) all start today and continue on tomorrow.

One of the less well known of the Varsity squads, the boxing Blues, take on the Royal Military College Saturday at 8 p.m. in Hart House. Last year Toronto took a home-and-home series with RMC 10 bouts to 9 and this year Varsity coach Tony Canzano predicts an even closer battle, if that's possible. Tomorrow's 12-bout card will be rounded out with matches against Centennial College and Ryerson.

On the distaff side, two WITCA and two WIAU meets take place this weekend. The intermediate volleyball and basketball Bluebelles and the women's ski team travel to McGill for their matches, while indoor archery takes place at Western and badminton holds forth at U of T (that's here).

One final note to participants: if you don't now have a team writer and would like the rest of the campus to know how you did, give Varsity sports editor Jim Cowan a call at 923-4053 before 7:30 p.m. on Sunday.

B-Ball Blues

McManusmen face Lancers

By PETER WHITE

Basketball Blues take their sixth waltz of the year Saturday afternoon at York in another OAAQ league game, this one against the somewhat disappointing Windsor Lancers.

This game begins the second round of action against league squads, and Windsor is not one of the teams which will be licking their lips in anticipation of some fine Toronto vittals. Blues stayed with the Lancers in their home opener back on Jan. 10, finally losing 71-58 after playing Lancers even up in the second half.

Windsor is led by Chris Wydrzynski who after five games is averaging 18 points and 11.3 rebounds per game. Wydrzynski has a great move to the basket and plays in the reckless style popular south of the border (not just a coincidence). He is worth coming to see.

Other big names in the Windsor line up include Tino Lenti and Guy Delaire, who average 13.7 and 12.3 points per game respectively. Delaire is the aging speed horse (Blues had many a chance to observe the shining rear portion of his cranium) who broke up the first game from the hanging end of many Windsor fast-breaks. You can't miss him: he's the little guy with the gold-rimmed glasses who looks like a Swiss watch-maker.

Toronto certainly cannot consider the game crucial. Play-off hopes remain only in the nether of dreamland and anticipation of next year. However, with a lot less pressure and with the evidence of improved play off last week's game at Mac Blues can be expected to perform as well as they are likely to at any time. Windsor, though tied for second place, cannot afford a loss to Toronto at this stage of the season. The game shapes up as a good one: Blues in their relaxed role as spoilers versus the clinging defending champs.

Game time is 2 p.m. at York's Tait-McKenzie Gym.

By the bye: Teams all over the league have experienced an incredible spectator boom as caliber of league play improves markedly. Toronto's home court operation remains the only bush set-up. There must be more than 51 people interested in seeing good ball on a Saturday afternoon!

VOLUME 90, NO. 49

TORONTO

The "whiter than white" high phosphate detergent will soon pollute the Great Lakes into a greener than green swamps warned a U of T Pollution Probe report released today.

Phosphates, coming not only from detergents but also from human waste, industrial effluents, and agricultural runoff, pour into the lakes and overfertilize algae and waterweeds that ruin the water life.

The overgrowths of algae and waterweeds use up the oxygen supply of the fish, clog filtration equipment, wash up on the beaches, and construct channels and shorelines.

To save the Great Lakes the report urged that consumers cut back on the use of high phosphate detergents and that before 1972 the government ban these detergents.

The Pollution Probe report was optimistic about the consumer's interest in preventing pollution.

"We believe that there are a great number of concerned housewives who want to do their part to fight pollution but the basic information has until now been lacking," the report said.

To aid the housewife in identifying high phosphate and therefore pollution-potent detergents, the U of T research group analyzed the phosphate content of many of the best known detergents and soaps.

Cheer, Oxydol, and Tide XK all Procter and Gamble products, are high on the list of heavy duty laundry detergents with 43.5-44.5 per cent phosphate content.

All, Finish, and Calgonite are automatic dishwasher compounds with approximately the same percentage of phosphate.

Calgon and Amway water softeners were found to have 73-75 per cent phosphate content.

Wisk, Lux, Ivory Snow, Zero, Ajax, Downy, and Mr. Clean were among the products with the lowest phosphate content.

The press release contended that a safe phosphate replacement will be intensely researched only if consumers demand a non-polluting product, since so far the detergent industry has only designed a public relations campaign to ride out the storm over phosphates.

The demand for non-pollutants can be expressed through the market and by public pressure for anti-pollution legislation on MPs, MPPs, the Prime Minister, and the cabinet ministers in charge of pollution control.

No new national council yet

MONTREAL (CUP) — Delegates from 18 university student councils ended four days of meetings here Sunday agreeing on little more than the necessity for holding regular meetings.

The conference of student councils, called by McGill Student Society Vice-president Martin Shapiro to discuss the possibility of forming a new national union to fill the gap left by the demise of the Canadian Union of Students, was boycotted by student councils from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Quebec.

By a 7 to 5 vote, those councils which did attend voted to accept in principle the formation of a national union, but could not agree on the political direction of the proposed body.

A minority of delegates, led by the University of Western Ontario, insisted that such a union should be politically activist, but most of the delegates said they desired a "less active" organization than the former Canadian Union of Students.

Other delegates said it was "too soon" after the dissolution of CUS to establish a new national union.

Both CUS and Quebec's Union Generale des Etudiants de Quebec dissolved last fall, as political differences provoked member universities into dropping out or withholding membership fees.

Western was also the only university which disagreed with a compromise proposal calling for regular meetings of the councils to discuss specific problems such as education, or pollution.

Some delegates to the conference — and some who did not attend — charged the meeting was not national in its scope, and hinted at duplicity on the part of organizers.

In an open letter published prior to the meeting, University of Calgary student council president Pat Pattison said that U of C had reversed a decision to attend, and obliquely charged that Martin Shapiro had misled Calgary concerning the conference.

According to Pattison, Shapiro indicated over the telephone that U of C had agreed through council vice-president Bob Ferrier to co-sponsor the national meeting; Ferrier denied making any such commitment.

Although Shapiro did not respond specifically to the Calgary charges, he defended the conference, stating that Quebec universities were not in attendance because two of them — l'Universite de Montreal and l'Universite de Laval — did not have student councils.

A third French-language institution, l'Universite de Sherbrooke, did not participate in the weekend meeting, but has agreed to take part in future meetings.

Shapiro said he was "basically satisfied" with the outcome of the conference, but agreed that regular meetings would be more productive than a national organization "in the absence of a consensus."

The next meeting of the councils will be held during the fall at the University of Winnipeg, with the University of Ottawa assisting in the organization.

WHAT'S NEW ON SAC

Here's a rundown of things happening around SAC these days.

* SPADINA EXPRESSWAY: "Stop Spadina" Buttons, Posters and (ironically) Bumper Stickers are now available in the SAC Office. SAC is preparing a brief to Metro Council opposing continuation of the Expressway below Lawrence. There's also an action group set up to continue the campus anti-Expressway campaign. For info call Larry Colle 532-3724 or the SAC Office.

* CAMPUS CENTRE: At last week's Council meeting SAC endorsed Wayne Richardson's campus centre brief calling for the $5 million student and faculty centre to be financed by a combination of student levy and private donations. Students will vote in a referendum March 3, whether they favour SAC pursuing the Campus Centre Project and are willing to increase SAC fees about $15 per year to finance it.

* ST. GEORGE ST. JAYWALKER: SAC voted to pay the $25 fine for Jon Galama (III SMC) who last week was nailed for jaywalking in front of Sid Smith. This is in line with SAC's repeated efforts to pressure city bureaucrats to close St. George and other busy cross-campus streets.

* LEGAL AID SERVICE: The jaywalker was referred to the Student Legal Aid Service operated by U of T Law Students. SAC also voted $600 to those students for a summer feasibility study on a full time legal aid service for students on campus next year.

* CAMPBELL REPORT: SAC offered "critical support" to the Campbell Report on campus discipline. In its response SAC endorsed Campbell's call that "operational agreement" be reached between professors and students on approach and procedures involved in all U of T courses. It also supported Campbell's view that disruptive demonstrations can be justified and causes of such exam obstructive acts should be examined and negotiated rather than those disruptions being repressed.

* UNIVERSITY EXPANSION: SAC urged the University to halt demolition of 10 houses on Spadina and Sussex Avenues until the alternatives have been discussed with the residents. The houses are going to make way for a chiller plant. The Huron-Sussex Residents Association is struggling for a role in planning the future of their community and SAC is supporting the residents in that fight.

* SCARBOROUGH-ERINDALE: 56% of SAC fees paid by Scarborough-Erindale students will be rebated to those Colleges next year, recognizing the problems posed by the remoteness of the satellite colleges to the main campus and the difficulty of their students using the St. George Campus services.

There's more to report but no space left. For more info call the SAC office at 923-6221 or just drop in. We've been doing a lot of stuff lately but SAC's pretty irrelevant unless students in general a) know what we're doing b) give us ideas and help form policy. It's everybody's union. Solidarity will make us strong.

Canadian Government wants to deport fired UNB prof.

FREDERICTON (CUP) — Norman Strax, the former University of New Brunswick physics professor whose suspension and dismissal from UNB last year kept his campus in an uproar for months, is currently awaiting deportation proceedings by the federal government.

The deportation proceedings, initiated by the federal Department of Immigration, were unexpectedly delayed last Thursday when bad weather prevented the arrival in Fredericton of special inquiry officer for the immigration department D. M. Parent.

The move to deport the beleaguered physics professor first came Nov. 5, when Strax emerged from a 14-day stay in Fredericton city jail, for obstruction of a police officer.

Strax, witnessing a downtown arrest for drunkenness, said he felt the arresting officer was being "unduly rough" in his treatment of the offender. Strax began taking pictures as the man was herded off to the police station, and was arrested.

Without prior warning, Strax was greeted by police and a warrant from the immigration department upon his release from jail.

Strax has been an embarrassment to various sectors of New Brunswick society since his dismissal last year from UNB for supporting a student protest over library privileges.

The UNB Board of Governors obtained a court order barring Strax from the campus when students began a sit-in protesting his suspension: Strax ignored the injunction and was jailed for contempt of court.

The dismissal attempt drew an official censure from the Canadian Association of University Teachers for undue board interference in academic affairs, but the CAUT more did not prevent the board from firing Strax.

The Censure — only the second official blacklisting of a university in the history of CAUT, was lifted this summer.

Unemployed since his dismissal from UNB, bankrupted by lengthy and expensive court battles, and suffering from ill-health, Strax has since spent his time as a community organizer for the radical "struggle for a democratic society."

Strax's deportation is ostensibly being sought for his arrest on the obstruction charge, but Strax believes the move is simply designed to rid Fredericton of his presence.

"The offense is too trivial for deportation, but the decision will be made on a political basis," he said.

Strax will attempt to fight both the deportation move and the original conviction for obstruction, because his deportation "would set a very bad precedent, particularly for draft dodgers."

Dr. Norman Strax, fired UNB professor

If he manages to stay in New Brunswick, Strax said he hopes to work with Acadians and other oppressed groups in their struggle against "capitalistic society."

Laymen to be members of Loyola B. of G.

MONTREAL (CUP) — Loyola College announced last Tuesday that they would allow laymen to sit on the newly-created Board of Trustees.

Previously only Jesuits sat on the now-defunct Board of Governors.

Loyola President P. G. Malone S.J. said the names of the newly appointed lay members would be announced this week.

They are to be drawn from the old Board of Governors, the professions, labor, industry, alumni and other sections of the general community.

Malone did not rule out the possibility of students and faculty sitting on the Board eventually, though he said such action "would have to wait until the findings of the Commission on University Government were studied."

This commission, established last fall to investigate the entire administrative structure at Loyola, has not been set up yet.

Mankind may be the first species "to bring about its own destruction" Prof. Donald Chant told the Trinity College Convocation Saturday.

At a seminar entitled "The Upright, Uplight Biped", Chant said pollution, overpopulation and starvation threaten the future of the human race.

Prof. Philip Smith disagreed with Chant, saying non-materialism and non-conformism were a return "in full circle to primitive society" in which people lived "quite well."

Chant proposed Canada set itself up as a "demonstration" to the world of how overpopulation and pollution could be limited.

Malone said all the new appointees would be "full, legal members" of the Board.

Chant proposed Canada set itself up as a "demonstration" to the world of how overpopulation and pollution could be limited.

There will be a meeting of the photo workshop this Tuesday evening at 7:30 p.m. in the Varsity office. Anyone interested in photography and the Varsity is invited to attend.

Haggar may be hired

WATERLOO (CUP) — Controversial political scientist George Haggar may find employment for the next few months — as a visiting professor at the University of Waterloo.

Haggar began salary negotiations Thursday with the Waterloo administration, after receiving tentative — and somewhat grudging — approval for his appointment to the university's experimental integrated studies program, an inter-disciplinary academic experiment at Waterloo.

The Lebanese-born political scientist is still waiting word from the Ontario Human Rights Commission concerning protests he lodged last September against five Ontario universities, charging they discriminated against him on the grounds of political beliefs.

Haggar charged that Waterloo Lutheran University, Lakehead University, York University, Seneca College of Applied Arts and Technology, and King's College (an affiliate of the University of Western Ontario) all refused him employment because of his pro-Arab, pro-socialist beliefs.

The commission promised to report on his case by last October; so far no response has been forthcoming.

Waterloo students originally recommended that Haggar be hired full-time by the university, but their proposal was rejected. Last December, the integrated studies department recommended Haggar be taken on as a visiting professor beginning in January.

The Waterloo administration did not consider the student brief until January 30 — then suggested Haggar should only teach one or two days per week.

The University Commission and the Union of Course Unions will be holding a joint meeting with the Faculty Council of Arts and Sciences to discuss the motion "the council, while recognizing that students have legitimate role in decision-making rejects the concept of staff-student parity, as applicable to the governing body of faculties, departments or colleges," Tuesday 4.10 p.m. in Convocation Hall.

A reception will be held afterwards (students only) in the SAC office.

The Cretin that devoured Cleveland

The Cretins: masters of the 'apolitical' universe

Cretinism (krē'tini'z'm). 1801. [f. prec. + -ISM.] The condition of a cretin; a combination of deformity (usually with goitre) and idiocy, endemic in certain Alpine valleys and elsewhere. So Cretinize v. to reduce to c.

"All university teachers, without exception, are cretins."

The above is one of the more forthright statements of the Situationists' pamphlet, 'Ten Days that Shook the University'. It was one of the hypotheses that the Investigation Committee checked out in its investigatory tour of Political Economy last week.

There was some confirmation:

- Dean Allen unilaterally forbade students of the Stop Spadina Committee from using the Arts and Science Gestetner to run off their leaflets. He said the university was 'politically neutral' and should remain so.

- Senior faculty, evidently quite pleased with their political sensitivity, did their bit for Canada by choosing a new Political Economy chairman — Stefan Dupre.

"We chose a Canadian."

As if they really think an ethnic nationalism will end the political and economic control of the country by the American Empire.

- C. B. Macpherson, who is undoubtedly Canada's most highly-reputed political theorist, says he is a Marxist.

But he passionately believes that the university is a socially neutral institution. He also has publicly denounced the strike of the PSA faculty in Simon Fraser on the grounds that the faculty are professionals and should not behave like a labour union.

What became obvious in the course of the investigations is that the most powerful members of the department of Political Economy do not understand politics.

The investigating committee rooted out the process that led to the appointment of Dupre as the new Departmental chairman. The results were predictable:

- the appointment committee consisted mainly of administrators;

- the faculty had no say in appointing their own chairman;

- there are, on the average, only one or two faculty meetings every year;

- the students were not even consulted on Dupre's appointment;

The process of hiring and firing and of granting tenure in the department is haphazard, silent, undemocratic, and disastrous to students.

But there is a system behind the apparent non-system: Senior faculty (Macpherson, Eays, Skilling, Neufeld, Pratt, etc.) in each section of the department have a virtual veto over all appointments in their section.

The new chairman, Dupre, is no champion of democracy:

- he will do nothing to reverse the tide of Americanization: as a continentalist Harvard-Canadian, he represents it;

- he is opposed to the student demands for a democratized department;

- he is Simon Fraser President Kenneth Strand's representative on an CAUT arbitration panel (The panel was set up to judge the cases of the 12 progressive faculty members who led a faculty and student strike after the university authorities, under government pressure, dismembered the radical PSA department.);

- he is opposed to a limitation of the U of T President's power;

"Prof. Dupre said he was concerned about the general treaty in both the CUG report and the Campbell committee report on disciplinary procedures. As he read the reports, he said the references to the presidency had aroused him "like a fire bell in the night". The reports would strip the President of the right to appoint, promote, and dismiss, yet there were sound historical reasons for making this the responsibility of an individual, who should be the President."

—U of T Bulletin

Taking the given as given, the politics of the department are conservative: politics becomes transformed into administration.

The kind of politics that prevails in the department has two elements: cliques and careers.

Managerial politics is not surprising when one considers what the department really is: a vast technical operation to co-ordinate various governmental, military, educational, and corporate projects, and to train students in these tasks.

The closed departmental structure is weakening, as new research centres have silently sprouted up around Political Economy.

As autonomous or semi-autonomous institutions, they are free to bind the intellectual skills of the university to corporate and government needs.

For instance, the Canadian Institute for International Affairs provided policy advice and research for the External Aid Office. The Institute's head, John Holmes, was a key decision-maker during the period when Canada was formulating its policy vis-a-vis the Vietnam War. Canada had been covertly involved (via the ICC and Defence production) from the beginning.

The Industrial Relations Centre has done valuable work for government and corporations by devising strategies to ease labour "unrest". The Institute's head, John Crispo, was one of the main authors of the Woods Report. (The Woods Report recommends legislative limits to collective bargaining and envisages the integration of the labour unions with the planning mechanisms of the state.)

The Russian Studies Department is headed by Griffiths and Skilling. They are Cold War Liberals who are now helping to forge Canadian-Russian understanding: Canada is playing a key international role in developing an alliance between the American and Russian Empires.

No section of the department is studying the colonial status of Canada, let alone the general structure of the American Empire.

Only a cretin would assert that our Political Economy department is neutral — but it's the official rhetoric. Just a bunch of scholars doing their thing in the pursuit of truth...

even bigots should be accurate in their slanders

Assuming the fatuous tirade from Edward Moroney (II Music) was intended to be taken as serious argument and defence of the Hart House traditions, a few opposing comments are required.

1) Moroney claims "the men of the University want a place to themselves. . . I suggest the real men of this or any other university want to be with their women. If Moroney prefers to seek refuge in an institution catering to males only, that's his hang-up. And as for the "petty gossip" which he predicts would fill the common rooms if women were admitted, what does he think is going on under the existing regime, scholarly debates on DNA, world politics or the latest trend in phenomenology? Come off it, Moroney! Where are your ears? If anything, the level of conversation will improve; it can hardly sink any lower.

2) Moroney says "the men" resent women "pushing their way in". How does he know what "the men" do or do not resent? "The men" have never been polled, questioned or even allowed to vote on whether they want women admitted. If he personally doesn't want women and resents their presence, let him say that on his own merits without employing the mythical authority of "the men".

3) "You've got equal pay with the men in the professions. . . what more do you want?" Well, if after 15 years of supposed education in our school system you can't answer that by now, there's little chance of me convincing you. And by the way, your statement notwithstanding, women don't have anything close to "equal pay with men in the professions", at least not the respectable professions anyway.

And if the price these "common nuisances", as you term them, must pay to earn your "respect" is to give up the struggle to be treated with true equality in the university, they are frankly far better off struggling without your "respect" — whatever it may be worth.

4) "If you feel jealous, start your own club." Like "the men" started Hart House, I suppose. If Vincent Massey hadn't handed it to them, "the men" would still be arguing about the amount of foam rubber in the library couches. I find your remarks even more interesting when one considers that the Hart House elections were postponed this year because not enough "men" cared about the House to bother running at the initial deadline. They couldn't even get enough for acclamations until the deadlines were extended.

5) As for your snide reference to the gallant suffragette killed (or martyred, to be more realistic) by the King's horse in the Derby, it was a Miss Emily Davison, not one of the Pankhurst clan, and it was 1913, not 1914 as you claimed. Even bigots have the responsibility to be accurate in their slanders.

6) "The traditions and atmosphere of the institution would be ruined forever" if women were admitted. Western society didn't crumble when women got the vote, now did it?

Re-reading the Founders' Prayer, I find the "traditions" of Hart House include such items as "true education", "good fellowship", plus "clarity of mind and depth of understanding". As an habitue of Hart House, you and your "men" are presumably the products of its hallowed "traditions and atmosphere".

"Clarity of mind", "depth of understanding" and an irrational, almost hysterical fear of women. This is "true education"? It would seem, Mr. Moroney, that both you and Hart House are in desperate need of some long-overdue Liberation.

women don't want to steal hart house

Reply to Edward Moroney:

Militance is not my bag, nor do I belong to the New Feminists, the Women's Liberation Front, nor a Temperance Society, but I am a woman, very much offended by your arrogant and patronizing letter. Though I am not entirely in sympathy with the Women's Liberation Front's tactics and ideals — I do find feminine exclusion from Hart House unfair. Women don't want to monopolize all the chairs and couches in your common rooms nor spoil your brand of petty gossip with theirs. The point is simply that Hart House provides certain very desirable facilities for a small elite — of men!

If these were made available to women (I'm a dreamer, certainly not every girl on campus would rush to use them. But don't you think that those who would might have something to contribute? Women don't want to steal Hart House from you, just share it.

You are right in saying women now have the vote, babies, and (sometimes) equal opportunity and pay in the professions. But what we don't have and what we really want is equal value and equal recognition in the eyes of men. The tone of your letter makes the lack of this value very clear.

You call us "common nuisances", make reference to our "cheap soprano tone" and ask us to behave like ladies. You convey the impression that acting like a lady requires submission to you — the male (please correct me if I'm wrong) — something like "Speak only when spoken to." Hardly equality — no matter how much we're paid.

I find it hard to believe that anyone could be so one-sided and blind. But if you really are, I hope for your sake someone invents a time machine and transports you to another century.

difference between tradition and stagnation

As an active member of Hart House and a former member of the Board of Stewards (1967-68, 1968-69), I would like to reply to Mr. Edward Moroney's letter to the Varsity.

Unlike Mr. Moroney I do not resent the presence of women in Hart House, nor am I convinced that he represents a majority of the members. In the time that I have been associated with the House, I have not seen a single instance where the presence of women has or would have harmed the Hart House community. Indeed I have seen plenty of evidence to show that such a community can no longer exist without women being a part of it on the same basis as men.

Mr. Moroney does not appear to understand the difference between tradition and stagnation. Hart House has a fine tradition of excellence in the arts, debate, and many other areas, but if this tradition is to survive the House must adapt to the times. The exclusive men's club atmosphere is a remnant of the tribal custom of separating the men's quarters from the women's quarters, and a change is long overdue.

Regarding Mr. Moroney's comments on the Women's Liberation Movement, may I remind him that history justified the suffragettes.

Ian B. Turner (SGS)

timid and narrowminded

It seems inappropriate that The Varsity, which is supposed to concert itself with campus goings-on, devoted only two paragraphs to an original play, To The Hollow, by Graham Jackson, staged at Victoria College (compared to an entire page on the latest Hollywood movie which students can read about in the daily papers).

Even the two short paragraphs could hardly be called a "review". A writer whose reaction to a play about homosexuals is to drag out a tired old pun about "drag" and scream "What the Hell is this all about?" is obviously incapable of dealing with the subject.

It's also interesting that your review of my book, Year of the Quiet Sun, on the same page neglects even to mention the (homosexual) love poems which your reviewer Bob Bossin told me he particularly liked.

A reference to say anything good about homosexuality in print, whether it is your reviewers' or The Varsity's, seems unjustifiably timid (or narrow-minded).

Homosexuality can no longer be dismissed by bad jokes or a tacit conspiracy of silence. Perhaps The Varsity and its reviewers will be fairer and more sensible in the future.

Spadina: a good idea (if it won't harm U of T)

The University of Toronto is helping to build the Spadina Expressway, despite Claude Bissell's public statements against it.

In a letter to the SAC the U of T Board of Governors indicated its major interest during discussions with the city has been over the location of exits once the expressway is built, not with the effects the artery would have on the rest of the Toronto community and on the city's future.

And the University's own expansion plans assume the existence of the Expressway. The university's actions in tearing houses down along Spadina avenue coincide with this assumption.

The controversial proposed chiller plant on Spadina and Sussex has caused ten good-quality homes be demolished, despite the existence of vacant land elsewhere. The Spadina-Sussex site was chosen as appropriate to the eventual U of T plans to construct a virtual brick wall along Spadina from Bloor to Harbord — to serve as a buffer against the Spadina Expressway.

The university's plan calls for a series of parking garages with windowless high-rise academic or office buildings on top, stretching along Spadina Ave from Bloor to Harbord. The bleak features of the chiller plant are designed to coincide with that wall.

The university's callously treated the Huron Sussex residents' Association in refusing to discuss alternative sites for the chiller plant with them other than informing them of the site as a fait accompli. The university's planners and Board of Governors have shown cynical disregard toward the welfare of the city in their attitude to the Spadina Expressway.

That attitude is simply 'we care not if you build the Expressway with its well known social and economic implications so long as it doesn't hurt our own little satrapy, the university.' The university's sole concern is whether the Expressway traffic will be fed through campus streets such as Harbord, Hoskin and St. George. That's as far as its social consciousness goes.

There seems to be no worry whether the Expressway might destroy the Annex, Huron-Sussex, or Kensington communities. After all the university is in the process of busting up a community on its own. And breaking it up while assuming the success of pro-expressway voices across the city.

Perhaps a better case for reforming the governing structures of the university couldn't be made. Both Board of Governors and U of T planners are still wedded to traditional concepts of planning. They are devoted to what they narrowly see as being in the interests of the university. Efficiency is paramount. Concern for the welfare of people and consideration of neighborhood aesthetics is secondary, if it is dealt with at all.

GREAT SLAVE LAKE RAILWAY

Part I

By TREVOR JONES

PINE POINT, Northwest Territories

There were many stories written about the building of the Great Slave Lake Railway in the early sixties, about the drive to reach this "last frontier" in the Canadian Northland. Typical of the romantic indulgence required of journalists on such occasions was this story which appeared in 1964 in The Ottawa Citizen:

"The country along the south shore of the Great Slave Lake is as still as death, as it has been for centuries past. It is as if the thick snow in the spruce trees has muffled all the sound.

"Suddenly the stillness is shattered by a sharp, piercing blast from a diesel locomotive.

"Then it really hits home — the realization that steel has penetrated the last frontier; that they've built a railway from southern Canada to within 400 miles of the Arctic Circle."

But nowhere in the moody epics in any newspaper file in Canada will anyone find the story of R. F. Welch, one of Canadian National Railways favorite construction contractors. And nowhere is there the story of the hundreds of immigrants who built the Great Slave line and the conditions they labored under. Nor did anyone question how they got there.

The Great Slave Lake Railway, extending 378 miles through muskeg, bush and farm land from northern Alberta to the edge of the Great Slave Lake in the Northwest Territories, was built at the cost of $86 million in federal funds between 1961 and 1967.

Ever since the days of the CPR's Kicking Horse Pass line, in the 1880's hewn out of the Rocky Mountains by a mass labor force of Chinese and Irish immigrants, the Canadian railway industry has learned the value of immigrant labor. Ignorant of the language, of their rights, strangers to labor union traditions, immigrants make the most docile manual labor force available.

The Great Slave Lake Railway is a good example for several reasons.

For one, it is one of the most recent railways built in Canada. For another, it brings us in touch with Ralph F. Welch, a friend of the railway industry and of Ottawa for many years. And it brings us to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, as it was then known, and their splendid co-operation, as it was then known, and their splendid co-operation with men like Welch, and with the railway industry as a whole.

Finally, the story of the Great Slave line is pertinent because it has not ended.

The history of the Great Slave Lake Railway is one of the most blatant examples of Ottawa's accommodation of the interests of private profit that one can find.

The GSLR had been promised to the Peace River settlers by the Liberals for almost thirty years, to transport their products to the markets in the south. But when it was finally built, the settlers' interests were quite secondary.

The impending construction of the GSLR was announced by the Liberal Government, in the person of Northern Affairs Minister Jean Lesage, in 1954, and its construction was carried out under the conservative government — much hailed as testimony to John Diefenbaker's "vision of the north".

Diefenbaker's "vision of the north" coincided remarkably with the "vision" of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The GSLR was built, in Diefenbaker's own words, "primarily to bring out the rich lead-zinc deposits in the Pine Point area" on the Great Slave Lake — one of the richest deposits in the world.

Some 90 per cent of the lead-zinc deposits in the Pine Point region belongs to the Pine Point Mines company, which is owned 78.2 per cent by Consolidated Mining and Smelting (COMINCO), in turn owned by Canadian Pacific Investments — the holding company of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

A few Liberals, in opposition, asked loudly in the House why the Conservative government was "selling out to CPR", by using CNR to build a railway for the private company's convenience and profit. But perhaps they, who conceived the project in 1954, knew the answer to that best.

In 1955, the Toronto Star reported: "... a federal proposal for a three-way sharing of costs between CPR, Smelters, and the federal government had been turned down by the CPR and the big mining company which has a 99-year lease on the area."

The president of Pine Point, W. G. Jewett, had the unmitigated cheek in 1960 to complain that the government's delay in implementing its policy to build the railroad was causing Pine Point "great concern", and that if government didn't hustle, "alternate forms of transport" would have to be developed.

Though CPR had to repay the Federal Government some of the money over a 10-year period through freight costs on the millions of tons of ore it carried out to its smelters in Trail, B.C., it still received a convenient loan of $86 million, which it was not about to shell out of its own pocket.

It was, in the words of a Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development report, "a splendid example of co-operation between government and private enterprise."

This spirit of co-operation was carried through into the construction phase of the railroad.

In those years, the CNR was virtually the private domain of its president, Donald Gordon, a man greatly respected by the government for getting things done. Donald Gordon had that simple formula for building railroads that kept everything neatly within the budget — kill the unions, and make sure you have the cheapest supply of labor possible.

This is why in the case of the GSLR, as in the case of dozens of other railway contracts in the previous thirty years, the CNR turned to the R. F. Welch (B.C.) Company, with its headquarters in Vancouver.

Ralph Welch has enjoyed virtual obscurity and lucrative CNR contracts for over 30 years. As a "manpower and construction contractor", These foreigners make 'great slaves'!

Welch's specialty has been "extra gangs", the large construction and maintenance crews that build and repair this country's thousands of miles of track. Welch provided Gordon with what he wanted: a cheap, fast job, done without publicity and without combersome frills like unions.

Mr. Welch didn't have to worry about unions raising his costs because Donald Gordon was personally fending them off. Gordon engaged for years in a bitter fight with the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way to prevent its bid to unionize extra gangs. But when, in 1956, Gordon had to give in and extra gang labor was finally given certification under the Brotherhood, the CNR insisted on retaining Welch as a manpower agent on main lines, and also as a construction agent on pioneer lines like the GSLR.

In 1965, the Federal Government brought in the Federal Labor Standards Code (regulating federal employees) establishing a 40-hour work week. Railways were allowed to apply for deferments from this standard for their operating employees and extra gangs. But the only private railway construction contractor given the deferment under the umbrella of railway operations was R. F. Welch.

This left Welch free to provide the cheap labor the railway wanted. But Welch didn't restrict himself to dipping into any cheap labor pool he could cull in Canada (Canadians tended to walk off his jobs when they realized what they had to do).

Through arrangements with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and the Department of Labor, Welch agents used to travel to Portugal and Italy to recruit manual labor from the unemployment rolls of Lisbon and Rome, and from the surrounding rural areas. Through these arrangements with the Ottawa authorities, he brought them over by the hundreds to work on his extra gangs.

When it came to the construction of the GSLR, however, Welch no longer sent agents to Western Europe to recruit labor. His particular "arrangement" (his word) ended in 1957, apparently because the Immigration authorities took it upon themselves to keep up the supply of immigrants, and he no longer had to do active recruiting. He now only needed to phone up any government manpower office, say how many men he needed, and soon a trainload of Portuguese and Italians and other immigrants was on its way to his construction sites.

Technically the Great Slave construction phase should have ended in July of 1967, when the Board of Transport Commissioners authorized commercial traffic on the line. But Ottawa extended the "construction phase" from December 1967 to March 1970. What is now being done on the railway is heavy maintenance, not construction, but the convenient extension means that the line is not regarded as an operational railway, and unions like the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way cannot move in since they are restricted to the operational lines.

The GSLR gangs today do exactly the same work as the unionized men on the operational lines — they lay new steel build up the track bed with ballast and raise the rails where they sag. But they work for Mr. Welch.

Not much has changed on the Great Slave Lake Railway since the early construction days. The immigrant farm laborers and unemployed whom Welch formerly recruited abroad now are obtained in Montreal, Toronto, Edmonton and Vancouver. Welch gangs still work on the tracks from 90 to 120 hours a week. They even manage to clear $600 a month — if they work 500 hours.

Frontier College: two jobs in one

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

Two years ago, Steve Grant (Ill Vic) decided to break from an established routine and get a really challenging summer job. He applied to Frontier College, and wound up tutoring immigrants and shovelling gravel 10 hours a day for CNR in Saskatchewan.

Grant is typical of the 80-odd Frontier College labourer-teacher who are stationed during a four-month summer period every year in fish plants, logging camps, railway gangs and mines throughout Canada. In exchange for the guaranteed income of a back-breaking, but well-paying job, a student must use his spare time to conduct classes, seminars and recreational programmes for the workmen.

Since 1899, Frontier College has sent more than 4000 teachers (among them the noted baby specialist, Dr. Benjamin Spock) into backwoods bunkhouses to teach over 500,000 immigrants and illiterate Canadians.

The college is chartered by an Act of Parliament (Frontier College Act, 1922) to promote "an adult and community education service" in outlying parts of Canada.

Frontier College was conceived and initiated by the Rev. Alfred Fitzgerald, a Nova Scotia missionary, who preached in Ontario logging camps. Observing the air of depression in these areas, he concluded that much could be done to raise the morale of the men by offering them free and voluntary classes in self-education and guidance.

NO SPECIAL TREATMENT

Fitzgerald arranged for financial support of his project and had magazines and books of various languages delivered to the camps. Instructors, teachers and university students were also sent to help the labourers in their spare time.

In 1901, one such instructor grew tired of waiting for the men to finish their work, and joined them on the job. The workers' respect for him immediately increased, and many more began turning up for the classes.

Since that time, Frontier College has operated on the principle that an instructor who works alongside his students, without special treatment or preference, will more easily be able to understand the needs of a man he wishes to help.

In order to ensure a desired amount of independence in its teachers, Frontier College sends only one representative to each work camp. However, loneliness can be an unwanted side-effect of this procedure. "During my whole summer out there", says Grant, "I didn't see another Frontier College instructor, except for a supervisor who came around once. And it got pretty lonely for a while."

NO HOME COMFORTS

"But you learn to make friends. I knew a fine 60-year-old Portuguese man who was very kind to me. The biggest thing to overcome was that I was supposedly a college or university smart-ass punk. But most of the guys, if they had nothing to do with the classes, weren't very nasty to me".

Before his departure from Toronto, every labourer-teacher is made to realize that his work will be extremely demanding, and his living quarters far from comfortable. Grant lived in a small bunk car with seven Portuguese men in their 30's and 40's. His washbasin was a tank of cold water, and he showered under a bucket of hot water that hung from a nail.

"We had no electricity on the gang", remembers Grant. "The only way I could show films was that CAN got me a generator that you put gas in and wound up like a lawnmower. One guy sometimes used to use my generator to shave with".

"Because these conditions are so taxing", explains Bill Harwood, Frontier College's associate programme co-ordinator, "we have a dropout rate of about 3-5 per cent each summer."

"We had a fellow who came out last year from a big city, and he had never done any hard work in his life. When he got up to a camp in the Yukon, he just freaked out. Two days and he was back. He was a very athletic little doo-daw, and he could do five-mile runs and things. But this was different."

NO WOMEN

"You can never predict how a person's going to react to this kind of environment, so we emphasize from the very beginning that this is hard work. A lot of people just don't realize the extent of social, physical and emotional pressure in one of those camps."

Pulling spikes on northern railway repair gang.

Despite these problems, more than 2000 eager applicants try for the 80 available positions as teachers. And if any of these are women, they are promptly refused. "We have four married women working in husband-wife teams", states Harwood, "but it's just too expensive for Frontier College to go any farther than that."

It would be an unbelievable increase in expenses to try to take women into the program and send them where we do the men".

An "increase in expenses" is the reason for a great many of Frontier College's unattained goals. In 1969 Ontario cut its grant from $10,000 to $5,000, so that the largest single grant came from the Government of Quebec. Harwood says the cutback is due to Ontario's austerity program.

"Frontier College is a very small, very old grant, and Ontario has given us $10,000 a year for 15 or 20 years. I suppose that's where they got first: to the old-time grants."

LOW COST OPERATION

He contends that this reduction in funds is quite unfair, especially in light of the government's generous support of the Company of Young Canadians.

On a yearly budget of about $130,000, Frontier College manages to run its small office and maintain a field staff of 100 persons; its annual cost per volunteer is thus about $1300. The CYC, which is the only other national service organization of this type, spends a yearly average of $13,000 per volunteer.

For those who make it into Frontier College, there is the promise of an unforgettable summer. "The student has a good opportunity to learn about people and about himself," says Grant.

"A lot of radicals are really down on Frontier College because they say it's the upward mobility trip: give a guy a little incentive and all he wants to do is climb higher in the system without knowing anything about it."

"But I feel that through Frontier College you can help instill in people a sense of pride in Canada. It's a really good experience teaching and living this type of life for a while."

"The whole thing depends on how seriously you take the responsibility of what you're doing. A lot of guys go out there and let Frontier College down by just not doing anything. Others go out with a sort of Christ complex that they're the great saviours of the working man. I think that the mean, where you play a lot of things by ear and aren't hung up in your own self-importance, is probably the best thing about the Frontier College situation."

Frontier College will be recruiting at the University of Toronto this Wednesday, February 11, from 2:30 to 4:30 in the Hart House Music Room.

If you go, keep in mind what Bill Harwood told me. "A placement officer from one of the universities called me up the other day and wanted me to describe the job to him. After I had started, he interrupted and asked, 'What do you offer people?' And I said, 'We don't offer anything. We ask a hell of a lot!'"

Mandalas: an exploration

"It should be expected that this widening of horizons can only be attained, after all, with difficulty, because it requires an alteration of habitual reactions from one-, two-, and three valued to infinity-valued new semantic-reflexes, usually not easy to achieve. But there is little doubt that the future depends on it, and so we shall not be able to escape it indefinitely."

-A. Korybski

By JON KARSEMEYER

The more closely the structures of established group behaviour are examined, the more obvious it becomes that it is not a response-of-ability-to-necessity. It is much more like a uniformly unconscious and sinister submission to the dictates of con-vention, categorical assumption, dogmatic fashion, ritual, tradition and generally pathological pavlovian-animal-and/or machine reflex-habits.

"... and that to be guided in conduct and thought by blind adherence to tenets of tradition is... bravely to 'stick out the neck!'"

-R. B. Fuller. "Nine Chains"

There can be little question than about the "bravery" of the Abols-Vaughan-Bissel-Dennison-Robarts-Trudeau-Nixon-System, nor of their equally "brave" police, armies and multi-trillion dollar reciprocal destruction toys, all together with the rationale that these are needed to keep their "holy" methods and attitudes properly "defended". It's all clear... the established methods have served them well. Nor can there be a question about the bravery of the left. Established methods have treated us mindlessly, mechanically and parasitically.

Abols makes a claim not to understand what Chris Szalwinski means when he says "Inter-Elite communications". Abols: "He (Chris) complains that SAC has disregarded the student body in order to establish Inter-elite communications. What 'inter-elite communications' means is unclear to me."

He continues bravely, "If (...?) his complaint is that SAC talks to the administration and that I try to work with them, (etc.etc.), I can't understand (again...?) what could be wrong with this."

"Hurrah!... Eureka!"
All and Everything -G. Gurdjief

Gus! I've found it! It's right there, in your own article!!!

And not surprisingly... it's surprisingly simple!!!

COMPLAINTS

When you complain, "He complains (hmmmm) that during the discipline crisis, the administration refused to deal with anyone but the "legal" representatives of the student body-the SAC president. He felt that The Coalition 'Should have been consulted and listened to:'"

Bissel divided, "legal" from "Coalition", and you were conquered. Now then. Once again.

In the sentence before that you state, with zeal, that, "First of all, I don't know of anything on this campus that warrants SAC leading the students to the barricades." (emphasis mine) You seem to mean that as an answer to Chris' vision of the students manning the barricades with Sac behind screaming, "but listen, we are still your leaders."

There is a serious but simple, error in your understanding of what Chris and Fuller and the Left and all the critical crises and all the emerging emergencies are saying. They are saying the "legal" and established methods are "brave" but NOT GOOD ENOUGH FOR THE CONTINUING EVOLUTION OR EVEN SURVIVAL OF THE SPECIES!!!!

SAC in it's present role, that is symbolised by your attitude and behaviour towards the Coalition specifically and towards students generally, is much too "brave" to be human and what we need from the Nixon-Bissel-Vaughans is less "bravery" and more humanity. Less "legal" and more representation. Less "legitimacy" and more reality.

"From the hack row, Wulfz umhled. This meeting is a shan anyway - you people are pigs."

AT THE BARRICADES

The students are at the barricades, if you understand the intellectual and spiritual situation. Just to be a student automatically gains the suspicion of "established interests", and rightly so! SAC is behind (the other side)! SAC is "established" and "legal" and insofar as you submit to the demands for "legality" and ignore the less "established" but far more creative request for consultation from the Coalition with the petty explanation that they are "not a legitimized... body," SAC fails. You fail, I fail, Administration fails, students fail, society fails, the police come, the barricades become physical, we all lose.

To go on excusing and rationalizing your habitual posture by pointing to the obvious faults of the left, will just extend the whole process of dealing with words and ignoring the facts. You and administrations "right" and "left" are making a mistake whenever you become more concerned with words like "legal" and "inter-elite" and "legitimize" while ignoring the human experience. We need help! We don't need and can't afford your predatory habits and mechanical rituals. USE YOUR HYDRO! NOT YOUR HABIT! NOT LEFT NOT RIGHT!!!! LIGHT!!!!

Finally, if you understand, it has been a great event and possibly this kind of suffering of fools (often including ourselves) is exactly the irritation that was needed all along to awake us to the spirit and the truth.

If you don't understand, forgive me.

"Father...?"

"Yes son?"

"I want to kill you."

-Jim Morrison-Doors

"Think of what you're saying -you can get it wrong and still you think that it's all right."

-A. Korybski,

Science and Sanity

"There is a tidal wave of a new organizing capability that is about to inundate you, but you don't see it coming because it is invisible. That is why I talk to you about this wave's acceleration. I am a student of what acceleration is and what the great changes are, and I simply say to you that what will happen in the next ten years is going to be much more surprising than what happened in the last hundred..."

-R. B. Fuller.

Wow! and I can remember actually being afraid that it would always be like this (high school) and that NOTHING WOULD REALLY HAPPEN!!

Wrestlers improve at Mac meet

Last Friday, wrestling coach Jack Edgar took his team (and their trusty mascot Hobbs) to a tri-meet at McMaster. Some comedian at Mac also invited Western, thus ensuring keen competition in every weight class.

Despite the fact that we placed second to Western in the meet, our wrestlers had their individual moments of glory. Ken White (134 lb) displayed unusual aggressiveness to pin Zajack of Mac (I think Ken's moustache got pulled and that's what did it!). Al McAdam (142 lb) battled to a 7-5 decision over F. Stewart (Mac).

Jon Davis (158 lb) and Bill Allison (167 lb) seem to be the most consistently successful wrestlers on the team. Davis defeated J. Rabel (8-2) and O. Sorenson (pin), both from Western. After pinning Elson from Mac, Allison faced Norm Corrin. Corrin won a similar match last year, but Allison changed his strategy this year and came out on top 9-2. Both men are fierce competitors and will meet again in the OQAA championships.

Ernie Friedrich (177 lb) and Pepe Korgemagi (hw) managed to defeat their Mac competitors, but both lost to Western. After his loss to Bird of Western, Korgemagi admitted that excess adipose tissue may have contributed to his downfall.

This Wednesday at 7 p.m., U of T plays host to the University of Guelph. You are all invited to the wrestling room at Hart House to see Pepe attempt to pin Ed Mallard, Canadian representative in Mexico at 190 lbs. Dave Hagen and Bill Anderson (team neophytes) are both looking for their first win and your verbal support is needed to administer the coup de grace.

Leslie O'Brien, shown above halfway through a reverse layout off the one metre board, will be competing in the Cochrane Cup championships (to choose the best undergrad female diver at U of T) tomorrow, 6:30, in the Benson Building. A special added attraction will be an exhibition by Olympic-class divers featuring Beverly Boyes.

BlueSkates frozen out at York

Varsity's women's inter-collegiate hockey squad, the Silver BlueSkates, were faced with opposition from both the York Yeofemmes and the referees at an exhibition tilt Thursday at the York refrigerator plant.

The BlueSkates managed to battle the myopic officials to a draw but in the process lost to the York gals 3-1.

The York team used blatant body-checking and assorted other illegalities right from the opening whistle but the two York referees somehow managed to ignore all but the most glaring violations.

The game almost reached the state of pure farce when a York defence player repeatedly punched Varsity winger Diane Gilmour in the back as the Toronto player broke into the clear, and no penalty was called. The next time it happened, Diane retaliated and was duly penalized.

York scored first on a fluke bounce late in the opening period, but Varsity goaltender Alice Shank turned in an excellent game to keep Toronto close while the forwards adjusted to the unique York rules.

Gilmour and Terry Midghall combined to tie the score at 1-1 on the first rush of the third period. The BlueSkates had several more excellent scoring chances but York rallied for two goals late in the game to ensure the win.

It was a disappointing loss for the BlueSkates, as with competent officiating and more polish around the opposition net, they could have easily taken the game.

Varsity's final exhibition outing is Wednesday in Hamilton against Mac; the first round of the intercollegiate tournament starts Friday morning at Varsity Arena.

VolleyBelles do it again!

The Varsity Intermediate VolleyBelles made a clean sweep of the WITCA tournament in Montreal last weekend, defeating McGill, Western and Queen's in nine straight games.

The Intermediate Basketball team had slightly poorer luck, coming third behind teams from Queen's, who took the championship, and Western.

BLUENOTES. . . attendance at Varsity games has not been great this season, and Friday was one of the worst, with only 2,326 fans showing up. . . perhaps that's not too surprising, considering the near-sellout for Waterloo. . . it was a quiet game all round, with referee Moe Shank handing out only 16 minutes in penalties. . . only real excitement was in the second period when Mike Boland and Ron LeFebvre both dropped their sticks and started swinging. . . it cooled out quickly when Shank reminded them they could be thrown out for fighting, and both received minor penalties for highsticking and roughing. . . final shots on goal were, for Varsity, 48, for Western, 38, no matter what the p.a. announcer said. .

Bryan Tompson, who always turns in a strong checking game, has turned into a relatively prolific scorer this season. . . so far this year, in league play and from an admittedly unofficial count, he's quadrupled his goal production over last season. . . last year he got one (1) goal. . . Blues have two more regular season games, against Windsor at home next Friday and in Waterloo a week later. . . late score, Waterloo 4, McMaster 2.

Nordic team wins title

Varsity's Nordic ski team won the OQAA championship this weekend at Ottawa's Camp Fortune, the first title for Toronto since 1957.

Varsity skiers took top points in both the cross-country and jumping sections to produce a comfortable margin with 1106.1 points compared to 1066 for second-place Montreal.

Queens, Carleton, Laval, McGill and Ottawa finished in that order for the remaining positions.

In the gruelling 12-kilometer cross-country event Varsity's Per Furst (SGS) finished third, Jukka Heikurinen (Forestry) captured fifth spot, and Rein Brand (SPS), Bill Glover (Forestry) and Keijo Laine (Vic) sewed up fourteenth thru sixteenth.

Glover set a personal record for the course by not breaking so much as one ski. (Score: Meets 4, Broken Skies 3)

In the jumping, Furst took second behind Clark of Carleton, Heikurinen left his vaulting pole back home and came sixth, Brand grabbed thirteenth, while Glover and Laine provided the spectators with some much-needed comic relief.

Furst and Heikurinen finished one-two in the individual combined scores; Brand was fourth, Glover eighth, and Laine close on his heels in ninth.

The Alpine championships go next weekend also in Ottawa and Varsity now has a chance for a rare double title.

Boxers defeat RMC

The U of T boxing team took five of eight bouts to defeat Royal Military College in a dual meet Saturday in Hart House.

Veteran Bob Maton and novice Ron Marion, both of St. Mikes, were particularly effective in winning their matches, as were Toronto's two lightest competitors Pat Goodwin (120 lb.) and Pat Glynn (142 lb.)

Kit Simpson produced the fifth win for Varsity, while Mark Hebner and Paul Fletcher showed great promise in their narrow losses.

Most controversial bout of the evening saw the supposed knockdown of two-year Varsity veteran John Byrnes by RMC's heavyweight Alain Whissell. Referee Harry Davies insisted on doing the count but Varsity ringsiders thought Byrnes lost his balance without being actually hit.

In other matches, Varsity's Sam Corvo and Kevin Cavanagh defeated Paul Lalla and John Trussler of Centennial College.

Blues' anemic shooting leads to sixth loss

Two of the better Blues in Varsity's 79-63 loss to Windsor Lancers Saturday were center John Hadden (55) and guard Mike Katz (33) shown getting away jump shots despite harassment from the speedy Lancers.

By PETER WHITE

The Toronto Varsity basketball season continued to wend its inglorious way toward a blessed conclusion of the blood-letting Saturday afternoon at York as Blues knuckled under again, to Windsor this time, 79-63.

The most difficult thing to comprehend about this latest effort was that Blues did not play badly (for them) — playing well they just can't seem to cut it. On an off day we all know what can unfortunately happen — as did the Mets and the N.Y. Titans at one time or another.

In any case it's now six down the drain and four more to go. Blue's season comes to a sudden halt with the final home game of the year the Thursday of reading week, against the Western juggernaut. Between then and now Blues play three other quickies. The first of these is Wednesday night at home to the McMaster Marauders.

ODIOUS STATS

Shooting stats again tell the odious story of drowned hopes, and point out that of all the weaknesses which by this time appear to be inherently bred into this squad, shooting is both the most pathetic and the most injurious. Blues' put up 12 shots more than the Lancers yet made 11 less. That represents a difference of 22 points and the margin of defeat. Windsor's 53.9 per cent shooting was outstanding and a remarkable achievement, particularly on the 'stiff' York hoops. In contrast Toronto hit 30.2 per cent, a losing average in any league. Rebounds and turn-overs were substantially even.

In all likelihood Toronto lost those extra 12 shots between the 15 and 9-minute marks of the second half during which Blues failed to count a single point. Windsor jumped on Varsity at that time increasing its lead from 49-40 to 62-40. Considering that both teams played flat out until the curtain finally rang down you would have to conclude it was during this stretch that the game was lost. At that Blues still managed to play Windsor even in the second half.

It is ironic that Blues in their opener played Windsor to a standstill in the second half. As in all their games Toronto cannot maintain a consistent pace. Brilliant (well!!!) at times they flounder into ineptness and are victimized for their lapses. Case in point: down by 16 at the half Saturday they came out flying and within minutes had closed to within seven points. And then came that stretch which put them in the old pine box.

And so it's back to the drawing board for coach McManus. He might well keep in mind the observation of Windsor coach Paul Thomas who pointed out that with the biggest man in the league and several fine guards Toronto should consider something other than a two-guard offence.

ED. NOTE: OH, NO!

The game was a fast one with both teams giving it the old college try (my), as both coaches made extensive use of their benches (would that I could but I can't call it a Varsity strength). This seemed to please the partisan crowd of Windsor fans, replete with cheerleaders and drum, who were transported to the scene in three Greyhound Motor buses. For the Toronto regulars it was yet another chance to hash over their "I told you so's" about you know who and to contemplate the real nitty gritty of Toronto basketball currently being played out in the InterFac League.

John Hadden contributed a second consecutive good effort in hooping 21 points. Mike Katz was good for ten points, and though playing better with each outing should with his excellent shot be able to add more punch to the Toronto offence. Larry Trafford brings a measure of maturity to the floor without which (as was evidenced during his absence) Blues might be in for even worse rides.

Windsor's Tino Lenti in a substitute role led Windsor with 21 points. Delaire balled them all over too. What a guy — hustle, hustle!!

So now it's McMaster's next on the agenda. Mac is desperate. Despite the multi-talents they possess, collectively they have been a frustrated four-time loser. They should be a mean opponent. A loss would put them just about out of the playoff picture in a year in which they had anticipated participating in the Canadian finals on their home court. For the Varsity interest the guessing game continues. The players do not lack the desire to end it with their first victory. Will they?

GAME TIME 8:15 at York.

Blues' Scoring: Hadden 21, Katz 10, Braid 8, Boston 8, Trafford 7, McNaughton 3, Markowsky 3, Barker 1, Evans, Annis.

Blues follow game plan, corral Stangs

By JIM COWAN

To all those fans who stayed away in droves from Varsity Arena Friday night: you didn't miss a thing.

Varsity Blues put together a tight defensive game and a clear-cut passing attack to produce a 7-1 victory over the hapless University of Western Ontario Mustangs. They also produced one of the duller games of the year.

Not that it wasn't good hockey. After watching the same Blues' futile defensive efforts in last Wednesday's 5-5 tie with Waterloo, it was reassuring to see the Varsity squad still knows the meaning of the word "check".

From the opening faceoff, Blues corralled the 'Stangs in their own end, hobbled them at centre ice, and when necessary lassoed them as they crossed the Toronto blueline. On the rare occasions when a maverick slipped through, goalie

Grant Cole was there to slam the gates.

A FEW POINTS

Oh, yes, Blues also picked up a few points.

Led by Terry Peterman (two goals) and John Wright (one goal, which turned out to be the winner, and two assists) Blues peppered Western's Brian Simmons with 48 shots. Blues' other goals came from Mike Boland, Bryan Tompson, Nick Holmes and Bill Buba, who also assisted on both of Peterman's goals.

The game was pretty well settled by three fast goals in the first half of the opening period. Boland opened the scoring at 4:18 when he cruised around the Stang's net and fired the puck in off Simmons. Wright scored less than a minute later on a power play when he blasted a long shot from outside the blueline. The puck dropped and Simmons gloved it close to the ice, but the force of the shot turned his glove enough for the puck to drop out and roll across the goal line.

FORECHECKING PAYS OFF

Blues' tight forechecking paid off again at 6:54 when Tompson took a pass from Len Burman in the corner and made no mistake about putting the puck behind Simmons.

There was good reason for the tight defensive play of Blues Friday. Coach Tom Watt, disturbed because the team gave up the lead four times last Wednesday, took the unusual step of stopping Thursday's practice to lecture both defense and forwards on some hockey's fundamentals. After the practice, he said "I don't care how many goals we get, I don't want them (Western) to get any."

His gentle prodding obviously had its intended effect, as Blues put together what may have been their finest defensive effort of the season. But in the end, with only 1:12 left in the game, they allowed Dick

Peanut shells, bad tempers enliven faculty meeting

Peanut shells and shoving brought fraying tempers to the surface at the Faculty of Arts and Science Council meeting yesterday in Convocation Hall.

Following an hour-long debate which had seen the faculty reject staff-student parity, and a surprise move by the Political Economy Course Union, students present began to walk out.

As Prof. D. J. Dooley rose to speak, Rick Szalwinski (Erin I) made a face. Dooley responded by pushing Szalwinski down the stairs.

Meanwhile Prof. A. Aboucher had grabbed the microphone, demanding that Szalwinski apologize for throwing his peanut shells on the floor.

Szalwinski says he will not press assault charges.

"All professors are paranoid schizophrenics," said Szalwinski, "and are not responsible for their actions. It would be a crime to press charges. After all, imperialism does it to everyone."

The Council meeting had begun peacefully with an attempt to amend the hard-line Rist-Nelson motion against parity in faculty, department and college governing bodies.

At this point Peter Hall (Trin II), president of the Political Economy Course Union was recognized by the chair.

Hall read out a motion which had been passed by the Course Union minutes before. The motion declared the appointment of Stefan Dupre as chairman of the Political Economy Department "null and void because students were not consulted."

"This rubbish is out of order," ejaculated an angry staff member.

Hall continued, demanding that parallel structures of staff and students be set up, each having the veto power over the other.

No replies were made to Hall's statement, and debate continued on the parity motion.

Defending his motion, co-sponsor Prof. W. H. Nelson said any amendment would "obscure and blur" the meaning.

"Students mean by parity something quite different from equality of numbers," he said. He described parity as an attempt to split the university into staff and student estates.

Professor W. H. Nelson watches his anti-parity motion being debated at yesterday's Faculty Council meeting.

One student shouted "We don't want parity, we want one man, one vote."

Another amendment was moved to reject parity only when it "is meant to express in institutional form the confrontation of estates within the university."

Nelson attacked this too. "The worst thing is confrontation, but I am also against equality of numbers," he said.

As faculty members rose to defeat the amendment, a comment floated down from the student peanut gallery. "These are the complete reactionaries. The others are kind of sort of liberal reactionaries."

A third amendment, moved by Prof. M. Wayman of Innis College, removed colleges from the scope of the anti-parity censure.

Prof. J. M. Rist, long a leader in the faculty fight against parity, attacked the Wayman amendment.

"New College and Innis are different from the others," he said. "If colleges were merely residences or meeting places for faculty and students, this amendment would have a reasonable merit."

Wayman angrily shot back that Innis and New Colleges were more than mere residences.

Prof. Ralph Campbell, author of the Campbell Report on Discipline, supported all three amendments.

"Any exclusions we can make in its coverage are desirable," he said.

All three amendments were defeated by substantial margins. The original Rist-Nelson motion rejecting "the concept of staff-student parity as applicable to the governing bodies of faculties, departments and colleges," was passed 75 to 27.

Nine people, including two student representatives on the Council abstained.

Students declare Dupre appointment 'null and void'

By LIZ WILLIUCK

The Political Economy Course Union, in a meeting yesterday in Sid Smith, made two decisions that are likely to bring them into head-on collision with the faculty of that department.

Of about 50 people at the meeting, only three voted in opposition to the motion that the Poli Ec Course Union "declare the appointment of Stephan Dupre null and void because students weren't consulted."

They also made a commitment to fight for the concept of parallel structures within the department passed at a previous meeting.

The students met to discuss the findings of the Committee to Investigate the Political Economy Department, and to hear their recommendations.

A spokesman for the Committee pointed out that hiring and firing arrangements are very informal. There is no permanent committee and the "final decision rests with the chairman" who has veto power.

The Committee recommended that the Union state the position of chairman of the department is still open on the grounds that:

- The faculty at large was not consulted.
- students were not consulted at all.
- Dupre is a continentalist who is not sensitive to the question of Canadian nationalism.
- Dupre was Simon Fraser administration president Kenneth Strand's representative to the CAUT investigation of last year's SFU crisis which culminated in the smashing of the democratic structures of the PSA department.

Consensus of the meeting was that the move would provide the initial impetus for mobilization of students for a struggle over the question of hiring and firing.

Faculty response to the question of parallel structures is expected to be negative, as the system provides for mutual veto between faculty and students on all questions of importance, including hiring and firing.

One grad student commented, "I think the sleeping majority will be on our side — on the other hand, they may sleep for some time yet."

"If we play by the rules of the game as set up by the faculty and administration, we're screwed from the start because they're loaded against us," said Rob Ryan (Special). "The rules the course union should play by are those of democracy and participation."

Course Union President Peter Hall raised the questions before the meeting of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences yesterday.

He also plans to draft a letter to the faculty of the department requesting a reply to the Commissioner. Hurd, president of the Scarborough student council, has paired up with Eric Miglin, who is a SAC member, for the contest.

Miss Campana and Wolfson make up a third ticket.

Mark Golden, running with McNally, is a Varsity staffer, writing Interfac sports under the byline Gellius.

Teitelbaum, who ran by himself in last year's presidential campaign and dropped out before the race ended, is again running independently.

A forum for the presidential candidates will be held at 1 p.m. in Convocation Hall on Wednesday, Feb. 25, and an advance poll for faculties with conflicting schedules is to be conducted on Friday, Feb. 27.

A final report to the Senate on the enrolment at the University of Toronto shows the total student population in the academic year 1969-70, to be several thousand more people than in the cities of Brantford, Peterborough, and Kingston.

This winter there are 26,344 full-time and 8,229 part-time students enrolled in credit courses, and 22,000 men and women in non-credit courses. Of the full-time students 1,832 are at Scarborough College and 900 at Erindale.

When combined with the 11,035 students enrolled in the 1969 summer session the grand total at the university is 67,608.

Tartu dwellers protest conditions

By KAREN COULTER

"Tartu College's newly-revised lease is an attempt to deceive the uninformed tenant", says Ron McInnes, lawyer for the Metro Tenants' association.

Students, charging that inadequate garbage collection, inoperable elevators and the constant dust and noise of construction were destroying the "quiet enjoyment" of their home guaranteed under section 6a of the agreement, appealed to the Metro Tenants' Assoc. for help in setting up their own residents' association.

According to a recent act of the provincial legislature, many of the provisions of the Tartu lease are null and void. Most students are unaware that many clauses in a standard lease form are now not binding.

One graduate student in an all-girl unit staged her own "rent strike" to protest the inconveniences she had suffered as a result of the management's misrepresentation of the facilities. Having been involved in a recent car accident she was anxious that elevators and hot water be immediately available.

She therefore withheld her rent, claiming that her debt was completely covered by her safety deposit and the $25 she had paid to "reserve" her room in the all-but-empty college.

KEY MONEY

McInnes points out that the practice of demanding "key money" or a deposit upon reservation originated during the war. While rent control prohibited the landlord from raising his rents, he was able to rake in a little extra profit. And although this is still strictly legal, the demand for a safety deposit holds no legal force as of Jan. 1st.

On Feb. 3, the student was served with the above notice of eviction and given approximately 15 hours to vacate. Such action on the part of the college administrators is definitely illegal.

Provincial law forbids the eviction of tenants in winter or with less than 24 hours notice. As of Jan. 1st, a landlord may regain access to a premises only upon receipt of a court order.

This provision also limits a landlord's right to inspect a unit to times of emergency, or when he has reason to suspect abandonment of the premises, or in order to display the unit to a prospective tenant, once notice had been given.

Many Tartu residents complained that the caretaker often entered their suite without knocking. One girl was particularly distressed at his insistence upon frequently checking the cleanliness of her room.

Tartu has long been plagued by its rather nebulous legal definition. According to city by-law, it is neither fish nor fowl, neither hotel nor apartment building. Students taking up residence early in December were required to sign standard apartment lease form. They were assured that this was a mere technicality, a stop-gap measure until Tartu's own forms arrived from the printer.

LEGAL CASTRATION

The new leases arrived — with no significant changes. All the old, and now legally-castrated clauses still appear on the forms. The management still threatens to sell the tenant's personal effects to cover unpaid rent, and still requires the tenant to waive rights guaranteed him under future legislation.

"We are sorry to see such an attitude on the part of people who have expressed some altruistic motives for establishing their residence," said McInnes, on behalf of the MTA.

A social worker on the fifth floor was seriously inconvenienced by the lack of a phone during her first month of residence. Last week she approached general manager E. Maegi for a copy of the lease she had signed last November 26th.

She was assured that a copy would be available if she could come back in an hour. When she returned, however, Maegi presented her with a copy of the new lease form and requested her to sign it. The new form was also dated Nov. 16, 1969. Uncertain about the legal implications of this, the girl refused.

McInnes points out that the ante-dating of the contract is, strictly speaking, legal. "However," he says, "the problem arises when such a lease is challenged in court. The tenant would have difficulty proving that it had, in fact been signed since Jan. 1st and was therefore subject to the provisions of the new Landlord Tenant Act."

UNFINISHED BUILDING

Apart from the questionable terms of their lease, the residents of Tartu College have several other grievances. Many grievances are born of the problem of living in an unfinished building. And although Tartu has been plagued with a rash of strikes throughout its construction, the students are determined not to pick up the tab for these misfortunes.

At a general bitch-in on the fourth floor, residents complained about the lack of incinerators for garbage disposal. At present, refuse is deposited in an unfinished room in the fifth unit on each floor.

The residents of the fifth unit are understandably unhappy with the arrangement. In addition to the obvious drawbacks of having 30 people deposit their garbage in your apartment, there is the necessity of leaving their door unlocked at all times.

Because of the unfinished condition of the building, tenants must pick up their mail at the post office. One student was upset, upon discovering that the superintendent had opened a telegram which she had received for her birthday. "Well, I had to find out who it was for," came the explanation, "and, by the way, Miss —, happy birthday."

In spite of protestations to the contrary, Tartu seems to be developing along the lines of a typical "in loco parentis" type residence. Students entertain guests within their own unit had dragged out a sleeping bag to provide extra seating in the lounge.

BLUE BULB

They were promptly asked to remove it because it "doesn't look nice". Similarly, another unit was requested to remove a blue light-bulb from the light fixture provided, even though they had been careful not to overload the circuit.

Most of the students interviewed preferred to remain anonymous, rather than risk further altercations with the administration so late in the year. Some, however, have taken definite steps to seek a solution to the situation.

Under the leadership of Penny Manchester (IV Vic), tenants presented a petition to Maegi, demanding a rebate of $15 on their February rent. The previous month Tartu had voluntarily returned an equal amount to cover the inconveniences and lack of facilities. Only after the threat of a tenant association was posed, did the college accede to the residents demands.

As Andrea Rosnick (SGS), says, "It's a much larger question than simply one of rent. It involves the right of an adult, who also happens to be a student to live like a mature human being."

Stanley Gray, a member of the Front du Liberation Populaire will be speaking at Convocation Hall, Friday at 12:30 p.m.

Gray was fired as a Political Science lecturer at McGill University last spring for his involvement in left activities there. He played an active role in the big McGill francis demonstration last March.

Gray is one of the few members of the FLP whose native tongue is English.

EDITOR THE VARSITY

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications from members of the University community for the position of Editor-in-Chief of "The Varsity" for the 1970-71 academic session. The Editor will be responsible for the editorial policy and operation of the paper. As the job carries considerable authority, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format or editorial policy, and names of prospective staff. Approximately $1,000 per month is available for staff, including a salary of $50-$100 a week for the Editor, depending on distribution of the work load.

Applicants will be interviewed both by the current Varsity staff, and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision.

Address written applications to:

Mr. Gary R. Thaler,
Chairman,
Varsity Board of Directors,
c/o Erindale College,
University of Toronto.

Closing date for submission is 5:00 p.m.

Wednesday, February 18

Further information may be obtained from the Chairman or other members of the Board.

Yesterday the faculty cut their own throats

The incident at yesterday's Faculty Council meeting where a professor pushed a student down the stairs of Convocation Hall most graphically illustrates the irrational paranoia that was the main current throughout the meeting.

By voting down the principle of staff-student parity in all teaching areas of the university, the faculty have cut their own throats.

They have isolated themselves from both students and administration.

Faculty saw parity — staff-student equality in decision-making — as a mechanism of "institutionalized confrontation".

History Professor W.H. Nelson told the meeting:

"I think the principle of parity — or parallel structures of students and faculty thinly bound together, not by consultation, but by institutionalized confrontation — is a bad one."

But the principle of parity is one of staff and students co-operating on committees from positions of equal power.

It's ironic that the faculty should fear such "institutionalized confrontation". One of the administration's main motives in supporting the Commission on University Government's report was to institutionalize confrontation so that it could be controlled and neutralized.

In other words, the administration would be made willing to confront students over a conference table than over a barricade, especially when the conference table is structured to prevent that barricade from being built.

The administration's other motive in CUG was to prove that the university can govern itself. As the faculty reject the principle of parity, which is the foundation of CUG, the administration fears the arrival of the government technocrats such as Doug Wright and William Stewart, who are waiting on the sidelines to produce order out of chaos.

By voting down parity, the Faculty Council has only heightened the two threats it fears most:

- (1) open confrontation between faculty and students;
- (2) government interference in the scholarly workings of the "ivory tower";

The reasons are straightforward:

(1) Now that the faculty have effectively isolated themselves from students by denying students political rights, students will make their demands from no spirit of trust or co-operation. The faculty has made that impossible. Now students are not hoping for parity: they are demanding parallel structures — separate bodies of faculty and students with mutual vetoes. Parallel structures set up a far more hostile situation of "institutionalized confrontation" than parity. And it's a situation where it's much more difficult to control or neutralize students, since they would operate from an independent political base. The Political Economy Course Union has already demanded parallel structures.

And now that faculty have invalidated students at U of T, they can hardly expect trust and support on such matters as their demand for a pay increase.

(2) The faculty have effectively squashed the CUG Report, or at least bogged it down so deep that it will never be salvaged. Again it's ironic that they have marked a significant stage in the historical transformation of the university from their beloved ivory tower to a government-controlled institution.

As the faculty adamantly refuses to co-opt students, they heighten President Bissell's fears that university won't be able to govern itself.

And when the government steps into the fray with such schemes as the Educational Opportunity Bank, faculty will find their courses judged in terms of market value rather than academic excellence.

The faculty may rejoice in their newfound autonomy from administrators and students. They have pushed both groups out of their affairs in the same way Professor D. J. Dooley pushed the student down the stairs of Convocation Hall.

Their action against the rest of the university community may prove to be as rash as Professor Dooley's.

And their autonomy will be shortlived.

Meanwhile in another part of town (in a seemingly deserted warehouse) a psycho-paranoid was declared null and void while eating peanuts. . .

Faculty assume more confrontations will occur

By PETER HALL

Peter Hall, a second-year Trinity student, is President of the Political Economy Course Union.

"I am against staff-student parity decision-making bodies because I am against staff-student confrontation."

What an incredible statement! Yet it was made time and time again at the Faculty Council Meeting, yesterday afternoon.

Almost everyone there was against staff-student parity, whether or not it was in parallel structures, for no one wanted to 'institutionalize confrontation.'

But no one mentioned the real assumptions behind that argument. To argue that as soon as students are given parity with staff on any committee they will battle for a hard-line stand, totally against anything the faculty are for is to assume that faculty and students have nothing in common. Indeed it is to assume that their interests are diametrically opposed. In this light the stand against parity can only be considered as a tacit acceptance of a major faculty-student schism.

The premise is that each has no interest in the other's or their common welfare on which they can agree. To veto parity purely because it 'institutionalizes confrontation' is to postulate that confrontation and its assumptions a priori.

These assumptions go hand in hand with the one other major argument against parity — that students are not responsible enough or worthy enough to make rational decisions along with professors. Implicit in this argument is a strong belief in the 'guild' system whereby a professor teaches and a student absorbs learning — and each stays in his place.

For the student this means that the faculty make all the important decisions about this university and his life, consulting him only when they so wish, for presumably minor matters.

Such an argument is entirely consistent with the view that students and faculty cannot make major decisions together on a rational basis — that each estate's place in the guild precludes any common interest or competency.

This is what it's all about. To argue that students should be consulted but that they should not have a formal voice in making decisions is to argue from a contradiction. If it is good to consult students about decisions which affect their lives, presumably, they are competent to consider and advise on those decisions.

And when we speak of a voice, we necessarily speak of parity. For without it students' roles are still purely consultative. No one can pretend that sixteen students on the Faculty Council of four hundred professors can play anything but a consultative role.

Giving students less than parity does not prevent 'institutionalized confrontation'. It only ensures that the staff always win. The last thing parity will do is begin 'institutionalized confrontation' at the University of Toronto. Is that not just what we presently have? The most difficult thing Course Union moderates have to fight is the feeling that the present system condemns students to confrontation.

And in many ways it does. A purely consultative position implies an inferior position at least with respect to the parts of this university which bear most directly on the students' lives here. He is not expected to participate responsibly in the decisions which are made around him. If anything he is listened to most attentively only when he confronts.

As a result he either confronts as a minority or retires into a rationalized apathy as most students do. This is not because they do not care. It is because they are not expected to care — not in any meaningful way.

Yet the university, led for the moment by the ATS, is refusing to consider a reasonable outlet for student concern — i.e. parity on decision-making bodies; and, at the same time, is feeding this confrontation spirit by defending a status quo which tacitly assumes that students have nothing in common with staff and are incompetent to make decisions about their lives at this university.

In a sense, this university is facing a challenge for change. It can fundamentally accept the status quo; it can bury its assumptions about confrontative estates and the feudal guild under a series of platitudes and hope that most students will remain apathetic as they are expected to. Or it can accept the challenge and give students a meaningful parity voice in decision-making here. In this way it can recognize that students live and work here too and are also justifiably concerned about this university.

It can offer students the opportunity to participate in a valuable way in the life of this university. In other words by offering to work together with students on a rational basis at more than a token level the staff can encourage responsibility and conciliation instead of apathy and confrontation.

Parity is not a dirty word. Neither is interaction. Are we going to deal with our governing structures on the same basis as staff and student washrooms? Or are we going to be frank with each other? When we talk about confrontation let us recognize just where it originates — not from parity — we don't have that yet — but from the institutional perpetuation of a system which encourages an outmoded conception of staff and students as two colitudes, unable to work together and having no common interests. That is where the confrontation begins. Parity could be where it ends.

Health Service Director warns students about pill

Be believing.
Be belonging.
Be a bundle of love.
But be sure.

There has been much discussion recently in the news media concerning the potential hazards associated with the use of the Contraceptive Pill. There is also a need to clarify on Campus the policy and practice of the University Health Service in providing Contraceptive prescriptions.

There may be certain hazards in a person's medical condition and background which may, indeed, produce serious complications in a small percentage of persons taking the Pill.

For example, in susceptible women taking the Pill it may lead, in a small number of cases, to serious blood-clotting in various parts of the body. It may lead to the rapid growth in previously small unimportant cancers and, similarly, to the rapid growth and increase in size of pre-existing fibroids, occasionally to a degree where it may threaten the eventual ability of the patient to complete a normal wanted pregnancy.

For these reasons, it is still considered necessary on strictly medical grounds that before beginning the Pill a woman should subject herself to adequate medical history and examination. The examination should be repeated three to six months later, and then at yearly intervals after that.

Any reduction of this would be considered less than ideal by current medical standards.

The University Health Service has for some years freely given advice concerning contraceptive measures to any student so requesting. During recent years the policy has been broadened to encompass actual contraceptive prescription on request, providing that the patient agrees to the medical criteria described above. The occasional student who, from her medical history and examination, is considered to be a higher risk than the great majority of normal young women, may be refused prescription of the Pill. In this instance she will receive advice and, if she wishes, a prescription for an alternative mechanical method, i.e. the Diaphragm.

Similarly, some women find themselves unable to continue the Pill due to unimportant but upsetting minor complications i.e. persistent nausea, gain in weight due to the retention of fluids, worrying break-through bleeding, etc. For these people, the sensible and conscientious use of the mechanical devices also provides an adequate substitute.

One final hazard in the use of the Pill, and the resulting more widespread indiscriminate sexual contact, is a rapid and steady increase in venereal disease. In Canada, from a practical viewpoint, venereal disease is only contracted through sexual intercourse or other sexual contact.

One of the most useful aids in the avoidance of venereal infection is still the use, by the male, of a prophylactic Condom or "Safe."

As a minimum effort in avoiding venereal infection, men should wear a condom even and in spite of their extramarital partner's statement that they are on the Pill.

Similarly, women, if they wish to reduce their chances of venereal infection, should also insist that their male extramarital partners use a condom.

SAC URGES STUDENTS AND FACULTY TO PATRONIZE SPADINA VARIETY STORE

East Corner Spadina and Sussex

Proprietor, Mr. Morris Dimanstein, has been forced to vacate by University expansion plans but university officials refuse to compensate him for stock, fixtures and good will. Homes around the store are being demolished and Mr. Dimanstein has about two weeks to sell out.

Students and faculty are asked to help ease this situation their own administration has created.

Moroney strikes back "to those, now on a greater shore and in a greater light..."

The controversy arising from my letter to you regarding the Women's Liberation Group is indeed worthy of comment. But obviously my intentions were obscured by excessive subtlety, and construed as something very different from what was intended.

The points remain as follows: I have a firm respect for the Traditions and aims of those who founded Hart House. But, it has long been my contention that Tradition is out of fashion in this generation. Anyone who has the courage of his or her convictions is considered 'odd' or 'queer'!

I, for one, am not afraid of either the female sex, or the Women's Liberation Group or even Mr. Carson, who has seen fit to be able to Pontificate on my character. Such wisdom! Such depth!

It seems to me that what was most irate was that I deemed to refer to the female sex as "Women". If females are called anything less than the word 'Lady', it gets their Dander up!

It is the Militant Women I am against!

Mr. Carson does not think much of Hart House, anyway. Incidentally, women have long been welcome at Art Exhibitions and Concerts. Also, read the Massey Will. See what that says!

I have great respect for women who have won their rights, even Miss Pankhurst. No one admires Militants, except, maybe Carson. Yes, he's Liberated. "Many are called, few chosen."

To Miss Dominick, I repent. She is not a Militant. Sure my letter was arrogant and patronizing. It was supposed to be, but to the Militants, not to Miss Dominick.

Mr. Turner also has written fair points, but as regards the term "Stagnation", I am not entirely in agreement. When I think of stagnation, I recall to mind the old phrase, "A skunk smells its own stink first." Perhaps he's right.

On Thursday morning, June 12, I joined Gang No. 5, a 30-man Portuguese "extra gang", which was then at Roma, the southern junction of the GSLR and the Northern Alberta Railway of the continental system. Our work went on for 16 hours a day, seven days a week.

The new, unsettled track-head of the GSLR heaves and shifts in the winter frosts, particularly in muskeg and swamp country. Gang No. 5 was a "lifting gang", which repaired these hazardous dips and tiltings of the rails.

At frequent intervals the entire track was raised two to six inches by a power jack, under the direction of a "sight man", who determined the proper track elevation. He was crunched to the ground, his eyes fastened on the sighting boards ahead. Four men with tamping shovels packed fresh gravel under the raised ties. After only two or three hours of steady pounding, their leg and back muscles were numb and the successive physical jolts stiffened spine and shoulders.

Behind the power-jack, a three-man crew checked the accuracy of the elevation. A second sight man, also crunched on his knees, bent his head to the ground and peered upside down along the rail. Two men fell in, either to clear the about folding exquisite red lips in the Lucky Strike bull's-eye or playing with pebbles on the ties.

Even if a man is fired on a Wetch gang, he must provide his own exit. This means walking 10 to 15 miles up the track to the nearest road or up through long bush cuts to the Mackenzie Highway. In past years, when dismissed men did not leave the gang within two hours, or insisted that they be deposited at the nearest town, the gang foreman radioed for the RCMP, which came in on a speeder to arrest the man for trespassing on CN property.

The living conditions did little to improve either the health or the humor of the men. The cramped boarding cars, popularly referred to as "ovens", housed 17 to 22 in double bunks. The whole car was given two buckets of cold water for personal hygiene and enough closet space for half the men's belongings. There was no ventilation for men on the upper bunks, and many of the lower windows could not be used.

The workday began shortly after 5 a.m., and if

l. Our clothes, and the smell of unwashed bodies and stale air was intensified by the daytime heat. I retained within the tin shell of the coach. Few men ever managed a full six hours of sleep.

Each man received his sleeping quarters free of charge, but Welch subtracted $2.25 per day from each man's wages for food. As supplied by Mr. Welch, those meals consisted mainly of macaroni, boiled potatoes, spaghetti, Wieners and beef sausages. We never received milk, fresh vegetables or fresh fruit and for much of the time second servings were rare.

On Gang No. 5 over a three-week period in July and August we were fed 23 times with Wieners and beef sausages. The beef sausages were often green in the center and most of the men suffered from regular and violent attacks of diarrhea.

The chicken or ham hocks were usually too tough to be eaten. In Roma, a Welch agent came by the food car during lunch one day, asking if any of the men had any complaints about the food. Finally, one of the Portuguese asked for "some meat we can chew on".

Jackson, the agent, told the cook to bring the man more meat, and personally placed it in front of him. "Take your time," said the agent. "Eat slowly. And be out of this camp within two hours."

Six weeks later, when three men refused to work one afternoon because of the food they had been offered at lunch, they were fired.

(Jackson lived in Peace River, in a large mobile home, in which, he would brag, he had invested over $15,000 for wall-to-wall carpeting, panelling, bar facilities, stereo, and color TV. He had absolute control over every man's job on the track. They feared Jackson and his little rolling palace even more than they hated the foremen.)

It was much easier to replace men that it was to replace cooks on the gangs. We survived six cooks within 80 days and two of them left when their order forms to the Welch food commissar at Roma Junction were only half completed. These same cooks stated that much of the meat would be considered unsalable in Edmonton and that meat originally of good quality had been spoiled by careless freezing and thawing procedures.

At one point, the cook from gang 8, a maintenance crew stationed near Hockinss, ran on to the tracks in front of a CNR inspection car to protest the fact that he had not been sufficient food supplies for his men. He was fired the next day by Welch's commissar.

Accordingly, experienced Welch cooks took ludicrous steps to minimize costs. They would serve water rather than kool-aid (to save on sugar), skip fringe-incidentals such as pastry, gravy or pancakes, and refuse the men napkins or wax-paper with which to wrap up their supper sandwiches (which, please remember, one ate as one shovelled).

"You're paying $2.85 a day for your food," a cook who had worked for the Canadian army and in bush camps once explained to us. "The food I get costs Welch a buck. What do you expect?"

heads crushed, swollen knees, constant migraine headaches, and severely strained eyesight.

His two partners followed with a hand jack. With a steel lever bar they raised rails missed by the power jack, and rammed in gravel. I saw only two men during the summer able to work the manual lift for any long period of time.

The shovel crew worked in front of a diesel tamping machine. In previous years this crew had 14 to 16 men. This summer, however, it numbered only five to seven, but it had to cover just as many miles per day.

To ensure a "highball" operation, the head foreman walked the gauntlet of shovellers hurling invective and pebbles at those who fell behind. He insisted — even in 90 degree weather — that the tamping machines bear down on the shovel crew. Many of the shovellers were constantly unnerved by the furious, splitting roar of these great yellow machines.

A ballast gang was sent ahead of Gang 5 in order to survey the line and deposit new gravel alongside the track for us to use. Often they had not completed certain areas before our arrival and there were frequent miscommunications. Consequently we had to shovel large uncrushed rocks and packed mud from the very base of the track to get gravel. The ground was hard and rocky, and this task served to push many to the limit of their endurance.

No scheduled rest or supper breaks were provided during the nine-hour afternoon and it was necessary for the men to smoke cigarettes or eat what food they could carry while they worked. On one occasion three men managed to get far ahead of the shovel crew. When a foreman went back to check their work they sat down to await his return. Because of this rest break they were ordered to their bunks, and their wages were docked for the remainder of the day. The isolated nature of the camps and the desire of the men to keep their jobs helped reinforce the arbitrary power and significance of the gang foreman.

One of the few Canadians who worked on the gang, Pat Cummings, a 36-year-old down-and-outer from Saskatchewan, was overcome by the unrelenting pace of the shovelling and the strain of working near the tampers. Like many of his colleagues, he had not been warned in Edmonton about the work or of the weather conditions in the north and he had neither rain gear nor parka.

After 11 days he stopped working, and refused to speak with anyone in the bunk car. At night we would find him sitting on his bed with glazed eyes, every so often giving out a strange giggle. After three days, a speeder en route to Roma collected him.

Others too broke down, physically and mentally. In the course of the summer, five of the shovel crew who could no longer muster the strength to work also stopped eating and then finally had to leave. They just drifted off up the track, or through the muskog to the nearest town.

Fortunately, the tamping machine broke down once or twice a week. When it did we would stand

There was no medical officer for the gangs. When a laborer fell sick, he found it difficult to leave the isolated camps in order to see doctors in Peace River or Manning. The Portuguese, to make matters worse, were wary of the local doctors, because they could not communicate with them. Welch provided no interpreter. A worker with a serious back disorder and another with violent intestinal pain were both counselled by the local medical profession to take aspirin.

The one gang member who came from the Peace River area was a simple-minded, 44-year-old Ukrainian. He severely injured his shoulder and legs on the shovel crew, and could not shovel properly. The foreman refused to believe there was anything wrong with him, and did not allow him leave for medical attention. He finally limped off — without permission — and we heard that when he got to a town he was hospitalized for ten days. The doctors warned him never to return to the rails, but it was the only employment he could find, and two weeks later we saw him back on the shovel crew, stiffly going through the motions.

He had long since applied for compensation, but when I left in August he had not received any reply from Roma Junction.

This man, like most of the Peace River settlers and the Roma Junction administrators, was contemptuous of the Portuguese. They were, to everyone around, "DP's", Dumb Portuguese (in official use, "Displaced Persons"). Behind their backs, the Canadians would launt them with mock accent: "Maka de money, maka de money, eh DP's?"

In the middle of August a friend of mine, who had transferred to the ballast gang, was crushed between two box cars. Medical assistance came eight hours later. "The engineer was bloody lucky it was only a Portuguese," the timekeeper, a Canadian remarked when news of his death reached our gang.

Some of the Portuguese working on the lines were brought over by Welch during the earlier construction phase. Others were recent immigrants.

Welch men found that the Portuguese were hard-working and, above all, docile. They never questioned authority of foremen, 16-hour work days with no breaks, they ate the food, they would let themselves be handed down the track by a speeder when foremen wanted the job accelerated. The foremen called them "good boys" — the closest human thing to cattle, and like the Chinese, Irish and Ukrainians of earlier decades of the Kicking Horse Pass line they are the muscle for CNR steel.

After the Portuguese, the Welch manpower office in Edmonton favors "haywire tramps" who ride the western freight, and Merits from the Edmonton area.

The DP's were family men, who had relatively large families to support in the cities or abroad. Because they spoke no English or French, they had little chance of finding jobs elsewhere in Canada.

Those that entered Canada with technical skills could not meet Canadian standards, or were exploited in non-unionized construction work in Winnipeg or Edmonton.

Antonio Martinez, 50, father of three, his family in Toronto, entered Canada in 1968 to work as a TV repairman or electrician. When he was interviewed by immigration officials in Lisbon, he told him if he took a basic language program he would find work easily in Toronto.

"Before I left the immigration office," he explained in broken English mixed with French, "the immigration official in Lisbon asked me if I could do heavy labor. He also asked me to show him the palms of my hands. I should have suspected then that they didn't really expect me to get an electrical job."

Most of the recent immigrants told similar stories, about how they were led to believe by immigration officials that they could get technical jobs in Canada. As they felt that they had, in fact, been imported as cheap construction labor.

The only other Canadian in the gang when I first arrived was the head foreman, a 75-year-old railway man from Ukrainian stock who had been unable to accept retirement from the CN line after 44 years of service. As Welch's head foreman of Gang No. 5, John Chyrypha was responsible for herding the men down the track. He often boasted that he hadn't given a smoke break in 44 years, and he terrified the men. Bald, bullet-headed, short and tough, he would drive the men with barrages of obscenities and reward them with nickel candy bars.

One day he astonished the shovel crew by giving them a half-hour break, and he sat down to rap about a long-ago trip to Disneyland. He died that night in the foreman's bunk — wearing his railway pants and railway shirt.

He had overworked the men that July, the hottest month in several summers, and had driven many to the point of physical breakdown and furious temper explosions. Now he was dead, and his workers joked and laughed for several hours. Four men wrapped his body in yellow plastic before carrying it through the 5 a.m. drizzle to the RCMP car on the highway.

One Newfoundland who had lasted almost 40 days on the job had been planning to get himself fired by complaining about the food when Chyrypha died. He now turned to the gang and smirked: "Here it is, we were going to get fired, and we end up having to carry the bastard out. It was just about the other way around. By tomorrow I'd have been a sack over my back."

I quit Mr. Welch's employ at Mile 164 of the GSLR, near the town of High Level, on Saturday August 30. As the 80-day veteran of the shovel crew I had watched some 45 men come and go.

The final part of the story will appear in Friday's Vor-sity.

LETTERS

We sympathize with the problems of your people

Dear Sir,

May I enter into the fray regarding Edward Moroney's letter on Hart House. Much as I disagree with Mr. Moroney's tone, I think that there is much to be said for having the House remain as a preserve for men. To begin with, the Founder's Prayer refers only to men and Vincent Massey, to whom we owe the House in the first place was quite explicit, in his grant, about the exclusion of women. This tradition and respect for the Founder are evidently in favour of the status quo, not to mention the fact that giving membership to women is of very dubious legality. More importantly to some, perhaps, Vincent Massey, and probably most of those closely associated with the House throughout its history, have not been simply misogynists: they have seen distinct virtues in having men coming together and doing things themselves; and as long as fraternities and men's (and women's) social clubs flourish, this view of Hart House can scarcely be considered perverse and isolated.

Excluding women does not necessarily detract from their self-respect: it merely acknowledges that persons of one sex have things in common that they may not, perhaps cannot, share with members of the other, and it tries to make the best of diversity. The sexes seem to have little trouble mixing outside the House and, far from being a reason for integrating them inside, I think that it is a reason for preserving the traditional character of Hart House. Anyone familiar with the usual student unions at other universities can testify to the almost unique refinement and charm of the House as it is, and see how much would be lost in any drastic transformation.

At the same time, one can sympathize with the comparative lack of facilities for women, and if the existing female gathering-places remain insufficient, I agree that the House food-services, for instance, should be open to them. But this does not necessarily entail the complete undermining of the principle of male membership, and I do not think that it should be allowed to do so if people still care for the distinctive and distinguished contribution that the House has been making to the University and to Canadian culture generally.

At any rate, most will probably agree that the athletics wing should be reserved for men even if the record-rooms, the library, the common-rooms and so on, admitted women, and much of the current controversy will be superfluous if the new, integrated student union is ever built. In the meantime, however, this does not mean that the House should be completely and probably permanently changed merely for stop-gap purposes.

I know that this conservative, though not yet reactionary, view of Hart House is inconclusive and unsatisfactory, but most of the arguments for opening the flood-gates or whatever strike me as wrong-headed. Doubtless, the feminists and the levellers will win in the end, but they are wrong to claim that 'history justified the suffragettes' as it will them. History justifies nothing except to those on intellectual LSD: if it says anything about the suffragettes, it is that they brought in a huge new bloc of voters committed to God, King and Family.

Com - Com will study Varsity Board

The Varsity Board — a body which oversees The Varsity operations — has another month of guaranteed existence.

The SAC Communications Commission appointed an investigating committee Monday to study possible structures of a revised Varsity Board and requested that a report be made to the commission by March 9.

The commission had already unanimously rejected the present Varsity Board constitution which sets up an 11-man structure. Only three of the 11 are appointed by SAC.

The investigating committee, Board member Craig Perkins (I Law), Jim Cowan (IV Vic), The Varsity sports editor, and SAC president Gus Abols, was also directed to examine the possibility of obtaining financial support for the paper from the administration, support staff, the faculty, and the Graduate Student Union.

Communications Commissioner, Jon Levin (III UC), commented on his objections to the present Varsity Board: "Of 11 members, five are self-appointed. The constitution is self-amending, and the termination of any member can be made by a simple majority of the Board.

"The Varsity should be serving the university community, therefore the whole community should be involved in it," said Levin.

Levin also said that the paper could be either an undergraduate paper or a university community paper. An undergraduate paper would be totally SAC controlled, and a community paper would have minimal SAC control.

"The Varsity should be serving the university community, therefore the whole community should be involved in it," said Levin.

Varsity Editor Brian Johnson was not invited to the Communications Commission meeting, although he is a voting member of the Commission.

"The Communications Commission has no right to legislate the future of the Varsity," he said last night. "We are responsible to The Varsity Board and to the SAC general assembly only."

Johnson disagreed with the concept of a community newspaper.

"Students have a right to a student newspaper that represents student interests. Setting up a community newspaper for faculty and administration also is a move on the part of a few right-wing SAC bureaucrats against the interests of students as a separate political entity on campus."

The investigating committee will consider any briefs from students, faculty or administration on possible Varsity Board structures. Briefs should be submitted to the Committee through the SAC OFFICE.

Probe figures get good reaction

Pollution Probe has been flooded with requests for its percentage charts of the phosphate content in major laundry detergents in the last two days.

About 500 letters a day have come in from concerned housewives and PP's Tony Barrett expects a large volume of mail for the rest of the week. It takes out-of-town mail three days to arrive.

The requests started coming fast and heavy since Pollution Probe released the figures over the weekend. Several members had analysed the detergents in the University of Toronto laboratories using a standard textbook method.

Barrett, one of PP's four co-ordinators, said last night the letters show housewives really want to do something about the pollution they cause.

"Most of the comments have been something like: 'Look we do care. For once tell me what I can do. If I'm a polluter, tell me how to stop,'" Barrett said last night.

He figures the response argues against the federal government's view that we can't expect the individual housewife to show much concern.

"I don't think this will be a major swing in the market," Barrett said, "but it's nice to see we can activate some people."

Phosphates are additives that loosen the dirt from the clothing fibre and then suspend it in the water. The water can then be rinsed out leaving the clothes clean.

But when the water is flushed through the sewage system, the phosphates over-fertilize the algae and water-weeds in the lakes. These in turn use up the oxygen supply of fish, clog filtration systems and do other things to ruin water life of the Great Lakes.

"Phosphates are a luxury item," Barrett said. "It saves elbow grease."

"But my point is, we did without them for 2,000 years. Then in 1948 they were suddenly introduced. We're just going to have to do without them until we can find a substitute."

Barrett thinks the federal government will have to outlaw them in the new Canada Waters Act. "The detergent companies have to be forced. This goddamn capitalist system being what it is, there's no way you can expect them to get rid of them themselves."

"They won't do it one by one, because they'll just get clobbered by their competition. The way human nature is, they won't act themselves, but if you force them all at once, then they will."

The Pollution Probe analyses of phosphate content are reprinted below.

"Bad tactics for bourgeois revolution"

I don't believe that many of the staff members present at the Faculty of Arts and Science Council meeting realized how tactically foolish their recommendation against student parity on governing councils really was.

The motion has no legal force — it was simply an exercise in rhetoric.

Since most faculty members are already firmly opposed to student parity — especially in areas affecting their "professional status", i.e. job security and mobility — the motion probably stiffened the resolve of absent colleagues only minutely.

But by passing this motion, they once again raised the issue of student power in the university at a time when it had virtually died as a subject of controversy.

Without gaining more than a piece of paper in a resolution book, they have antagonized all kinds of highly co-optable course union people.

After a few more such demonstrations of unthinking conservatism, "Student leaders" will realize that playing the "numbers game" for committee seats is meaningless, as long as students remain deferential to faculty, and junior faculty remain deferential to their seniors, and no faculty member wants to lose his job, even if he could find another.

Students will realize that they should support the extension of faculty control of the university's government only to the extent that such expansion is at the expense of administration, Board, and government.

And they will also realize that they must aim to undermine and eventually overthrow the institutionalized power that faculty members hold over students.

practise but is at least 12 feet too narrow to host a championship meet.

The official seating capacity of 500 for the pool gallery is also highly suspect.

But, the biggest problem facing the swim team is lack of diving facilities.

A small diving team does exist but it is restricted to only two hours of practise time a week borrowed from the Benson Building. As a consequence, the divers do not compete with the rest of the team in intercollegiate competition and thus the swimmers begin the swimming section of every meet down a dozen or so points by default.

The gymnastics team, coached by Julio Roncon, used to be too embarrassed with their equipment to host a gym meet. Now they have the proper gear but not enough time or space to deploy it properly.

All these inadequacies of the U of T athletic facilities become more striking when they are placed against a background of multi-million dollar athletic expansion in other Ontario universities.

NEW FACILITIES

Toronto and Western remain the only major schools who have not built new athletic and physical education plants in the last decade.

At Guelph, where they are in the process of polishing off a new football stadium financed entirely independent of special Department of University Affairs grants, they have a new gymnasium (capacity 1300) and a new pool.

The cost was just slightly over one million dollars.

McMaster has a new athletic complex valued at three million which houses two gymnasias, a pool (50 meters, seating capacity 1000), four squash courts, class rooms and offices.

At Waterloo, York, Windsor, Ottawa, and Queen's the story is the same.

The people at Queen's appear to have pulled the biggest coup of all.

Their new building which will be completed soon, cost approximately six millions (remember, Maple Leaf Gardens was constructed for only three millions).

So, while no one in Varsity athletic hierarchy appears to be suggesting that the proposed new Men's Athletic Building should have been constructed ahead of the new research library, they are cautiously hoping that when the Board of Governors meet to re-establish their spending priorities the athletic directorate will all be able to chant in unison, "We're number one".

DIVING

Leslie O'Brien captured the Cochrane Cup emblematic of women's intramural diving last night with a 118 point total in a well attended meet at the Benson Building.

Barb Beatty was runner with 99.2 points, Lynda Gaelle was third with 82.4 while Mary Jean Nicolson was fourth.

B-ball team goes against Mac tonight

The Blues basketball season continues to wend its way to conclusion tonight as the hoopsters take on McMaster in York University's Tait-McKenzie Gym. Game time is 8:15 p.m.

McMaster seems to be playing the role of spoiler as they knocked off the previously undefeated Western Mustangs last weekend to the tune of 93-72. Maybe they'll "spoil" Blues perfect season tonight and let the McManusmen earn their first victory.

In an earlier season game, Mac downed Blues 73-67 in Hamilton.

On Monday, it was announced that Blues ace centre

John Haddon has been selected to play on the 12-man Canadian National Basketball team.

The team will play in the world championships in Yugoslavia next May.

Once again the U of T fencers have walked off with the Western Division OQAA title.

The team is now preparing for Saturday's meet against the Eastern Division winners from McGill. That battle will take place in the Hart House main gym.

In McMaster last week, the largest number of fencers seen in the sectionals complemented the excellent organization of the Mac staff and fencers. The Mac team chased Toronto all the way in the team event while Windsor and Waterloo were completely outclassed.

The foilists, overcome after their individual efforts, faced a fresh Mac team and dropped a 7-to-2 result, but creamed Waterloo 9-0 and Windsor 6-3.

The sabreurs steadily improved as the meet went on, taking Waterloo 6-3, Windsor 7-2 and Mac 8-1, and the epeeists passively demoralized Waterloo 7-2, Windsor 9-0 and McMaster 7-2. It was a fine team effort from rookies Oscar Wong, Ron Keith, David Brown and Mike Kerwin and stalwarts Mladen Peros, Helmut Microys, Richard Wong, Rowland Griffin and Vladimir Hachinski.

The individual championships were dominated by the undefeated Peros (first sabre) and Microys (first epee). With excellent style and clarity of movement both dissected the opposition. The Blues surprise, Oscar Wong, bounded through a barrage to take third place in the foil from Bruno Cicotelli (Windsor). Richard Wong took first place in the foil competition from Norm Bradwell. The third sabre place only narrowly evaded Hachinski.

Griffin and Irv Sntman wound up the day convincingly taking second and third in the epee.

CURLING

Varsity curlers skipped by George Carr missed a play-off berth at the OQAA Western Division Bonselid held at Guelph last Friday and Saturday. A heart-breaking 4-3 loss to Guelph in the last game kept them from a tie for second place.

The team of Carr, Bob Quinn, Dave Richardson, and Jim Stewart had a shaky start against Western on unfamiliar arena ice, and conceded after eight ends with the score 12-4. They produced steady curling after this, but lost to Waterloo 9-7 when Carr's last rock drifted just too far back in the house to win the game.

BADMINTON CHAMPS

A University of Toronto men's badminton team has swept the Ontario championships for the sport, with the best record ever turned in by a Varsity squad.

The team won 29 of 30 matches in the championship tournament, played last weekend at the University of Waterloo. McMaster placed second and Guelph third in the seven-team round robin contest.

The Varsity team was made up of Taylor Echlin (first singles), Pat Geale (second singles), John Patterson (third singles), Bill Kinsey (fourth singles) and Rich McCallum.

Echlin took the Ontario Singles Championship, then teamed with Bill Kinsey to take the doubles title as well.

The same team returns to Waterloo next weekend for the Ontario-Quebec badminton championships.

Athletic teams in Hart House squeeze

It is readily apparent to all who use the Hart House athletic facilities that the University of Toronto is badly in need of a new men's athletic building. In this, the second article in a series, same of the chronic problems facing U of T athletic teams are examined.

By LYNDON LITTLE

A squash team that is perpetually "on the road", a basketball team that practises in a mini-gym and plays its games in a maxi-gym, a swimming team that starts every meet it enters 14 points in the hole; these are only three of the anomalies facing athletic groups at Varsity due to the antiquated facilities at ancient Hart House.

While the governing body of the University debates on the priorities of its available funds the situation gets more acute every month.

Two athletic teams at U of T (the football and hockey) admittedly go first class.

Ron Murphy's football squad has the benefit of the finest stadium in Canada, adequate practise time and, an important factor often overlooked, a good training meal.

Tom Watt's hockey Blues enjoy the luxury of their own ice arena—a luxury few other teams in the OQAA can boast. Add to that two hours of practise time weekdays and once again a training meal and you have one of the reasons for their marked success.

Unfortunately, football and hockey are only two of a myriad of sports that must be accommodated at a large university such as Toronto.

A DIFFERENT TUNE

When we get down to the teams that are dependent on Hart House for their athletic shelter the tune of our story changes quickly.

All athletic problems at Hart House have a common denominator — inadequate space!

For John McManus, the quiet-spoken, long suffering basketball coach at Varsity, the initial problem is convincing a young high school player that he could really enjoy basketball at U of T.

The intercollegiate Blues practise in the shoe-box better known as the Hart House lower gym and play their "home" games in the spacious Tait-MacKenzie complex at York.

Hart House lower gym is 22 feet too short, 10 feet too narrow and has wooden backboards.

After practising in the smaller gym a team tends to run out of gas in the late stages when forced to play on the larger court. Switching from the wooden backboards to the glass ones used in most new buildings requires a shooting adjustment as the glass gives a different rebound angle.

NO HOME GAMES

Coaches of all sports are continually grumbling that the schedule makers have done them a bad turn, that they are forced to play too many "away" games. But, ponder for a moment the situation facing the Varsity squash team who have not had a "home" game in 17 years!

The three squash courts that were built with the original building in 1913 are far smaller than regulation size requirements.

As a consequence the intercollegiate squash team that has operated at Varsity since 1953 has never and will never be able to play a match on their home ground. Add to that the fact that the team is allowed only two hours a week of practise time for a 15 man squad and it must be considered a minor miracle that Ralph Rimmer and his group are solid contenders for the OQAA championship to be contested later this month at McGill.

NARROW POOL

The Varsity Swim Blues coached by personable Robin Campbell also have their problems.

The Hart House pool at 25 yds. in length is adequate for See CROWDED — page 13

SWIMMING — INTERFACULTY CHAMPIONSHIPS —

Thur. Feb. 17, 7:00 p.m. ENTRIES CLOSE

TODAY AT INTRAMURAL OFFICE.

The U of T women's archery team captured the WIAU Indoor Archery Championship in grand style at Western last weekend.

Under the excellent coaching of Mrs. Carol Ann Itheren, the team established new records which will be hard to beat. Led by captain Linda Campbell (IV PHE) (above) the team shot rounds of 2,271 and 2,297, breaking the previous single and double records of 2,283 and 4,537.

Linda's individual performance was dazzling as she topped the previous single mark of 598 with a second round score of 628 (648 is perfect). Combined with her first round score of 610 she broke her own double round record of 1,180.

Other Toronto scores were: Kathy Warburton (II PHE), 1,136; Kit Koehler (III PHE), 1,121; and Sue Young (II PHE), 1,073.

McMaster placed second with a total team score of 4,308.

HEY! DON'T SHOOT!

You'll never get anything done that way. And what'll it do about pollution or inflation?

You may pick off ten, fifteen, twenty people, but you'll never get rid of all the bogey men. You know that. The police will come and take you away. You'll spend the rest of your life in prison or be hanged. Besides, what's the use? There'll always be people around to make things rough for you.

So what do you do? How about doing what people have always done when they've been angry at something? Organize. Yes, get together with people who feel the same way you do. Talk to them, convince them that in unity there is strength. Get out. Hold meetings. Invite speakers. Get petitions going. Pretty soon you'll find you're not alone. You'll find that all kinds of people will be interested, people you didn't think would ever join you. Then you'll start to get things done. Because you'll have power.

And when you start to gain power, it's nice to know that American Empire is there right along with you. Yes, when you feel your muscles hulging you could probably use one of our AE 21973365 grants. It won't pay for everything, of course, but it sure will come in handy for office equipment or other things of bureaucratic necessity. We can even advise you on how to best handle it. In the past we've helped such organizations as the National Student Organization, Encounter magazine, and the Council for Cultural Freedom.

So if you think you need our help, or even if you don't (who knows?), why not get in touch with us? We're everywhere and we're more than eager to help. Who knows, we may even help pay for broken windows!

Lakehead escalates class boycott over Nightman firing THUNDER BAY (CUP) — Lakehead University students extended a departmental class boycott to cover virtually the entire university yesterday, as their administration refused to reconsider the firing of sociology Professor Victor Wightman.

At the same time, holes began to appear in Administration President William Tamblyn's story that the firing was prompted by financial and academic, rather than political considerations.

Wightman's contract was not renewed at the recommendation of Sociology and Anthropology Chairman Cecil French, who claimed he had the support of department faculty in the action.

Investigation proved that faculty had not been consulted in the decision, and that a majority would favor Wightman's retention at the university.

Wightman, a PhD candidate, reportedly has better academic credentials than French, and is undoubtedly better qualified than Tamblyn, at least academically.

LOCAL INTERESTS

Tamblyn is the possessor of an honorary doctorate, a bachelor of arts degree, has a substantial interest in the Tamblyn's drug chain, and is owner of a local steel mill.

The university-wide boycott was inaugurated Wednesday evening by the Lakehead Students Council, who voted 14-3 for the escalation at a mass meeting attended by approximately 400 students.

The council action bypassed an earlier recommendation that students extend their boycott, which began in the Sociology and Anthropology Department Tuesday, to the arts faculty only.

Approximately 50 per cent of Lakehead's 2,500 students stayed away from classes Thursday, as pickets sprang up at the university entrance to inform students of the move.

The council action followed a meeting late Wednesday afternoon, called by administration president Tamblyn.

IGNORES PROTESTS

At the meeting, Tamblyn declared he could see "no reason" to alter the administration's decision to fire Wightman, despite student protests.

At the same time, Tamblyn read a statement signed by seven of 10 sociology and anthropology professors, "regretting that the university has not found it possible" to re-hire Wightman, but agreeing with the administration's contention that the decision was prompted by budget considerations within the university.

But several of the signatories of the faculty statement were reported to have declared that they signed the document under direct pressure from the university administration.

And at a noon meeting Thursday, faculty of business instructor Ron Taylor indicated that the Wightman firing may have been the result of outside, corporate pressures on the university.

Taylor declared that Royal Canadian Mounted Police checks have been instigated by the administration on faculty members of the university.

PROOF OF INVESTIGATION

Although the administration has denied the charges, Taylor has declared he will produce evidence of the claim, including the name of the campus security officer who expedited the checks.

At the same time, Taylor asked about the existence of a letter "written by a pulp and paper company on the north shore of Lake Superior, which complained to the university about Professor Wightman's treatment of the subject of company towns."

One of the company's directors, Taylor said, also sat on the Board of Governors at Lakehead.

"If such a letter existed, there is a strong possibility that Professor Wightman's dismissal was for political reasons," he said.

In an interview, Taylor said he hoped to produce and publish the letter by today.

Meanwhile, at least 500 Lakehead students have signed a petition which calls for a total re-structuring of hiring, firing, promotion and tenure procedures at the university, increased student representation on such committees, and the re-instatement of Wightman and two other dismissed professors until new procedures are initiated.

The students are also demanding full access to "all relevant information such as budgets, graduate programs and other administrative and academic matters which affect decisions "on hiring and firing."

Administration and ATS divided over arbitration

By SUSAN REISLER

Members of the President's Advisory Council and the Association of Teaching Staff council have failed to reach any agreement over the ATS demand for binding arbitration to settle their yearly salary demand.

The two groups met Wednesday, and after a two-hour discussion, President Bissell said all he could do was take the proposal to the Board of Governors which has the final say in this matter.

Prof. Wayne Sumner, a member of the Salaries Committee said he was not too optimistic about the Board's decision. If the answer is negative the ATS will have to meet again to decide on what their tactics should be.

The meeting was clearly divided between the administration and faculty administrators, and the teaching staff.

President Bissell said this disagreement had very wide implications for the university.

"What we decide is relevant to the structure of the whole university and the whole university system," he said.

"What we are talking about is the shape and nature of the whole university," he said.

In a letter to Prof. J. M. Rist, ATS Chairman, Bissell said, "If we concede the possibility of an outside body making decisions on salaries, we are, in effect surrendering our right to govern the university."

"The ATS proposals imply that we abandon our attempt to work out a form of government based upon internal responsibility and accept the concept of the university as a corporation," the letter continues.

The fact that this issue is one of many that might turn the university over to the government did not play a role of major importance in the ATS argument.

Prof. Sumner said arbitration is the right solution.

"We're not quite mere employees, of the university," he said, "the way the support staff are."

"If out and out trade unionism is right for them, and I think it is, then I don't think it is right for us."

Arbitration is the mid-way point, he said.

Mr. A. G. Rankin, Executive Vice-president (non-academic) in charge of the university finances explained that full-time academic staff had received salary increases.

"Let me assure you that your non-academic staff salaries didn't go up and this is having repercussions today," he said.

The university is not getting enough money from the government to keep up with the necessary salary increases it must make.

The formula through which the university gets its government grant does not recognize many of the research institutes in the university and the university must finance them on its own, Rankin said.

We must get some overhead support for our $20 million of academic research, he said.

Bissell said most people believed the faculty are not well enough paid, but it is the method of negotiating that is the main bone of contention.

"Arbitration is not most effective on an institutional plane," he said.

"It will split the institution and leave us wide open for government takeover."

Education Centre,
155 College Street

The lady Godiva Memorial Band marched down St. George Street at 2 p.m. yesterday blocking traffic all the way up to Bloor St. much to the chagrin of Sam Cass, Metro Roads Commissioner.

Thousands of their fans lined the street and showed their appreciation in a spontaneous round of apathy.

When asked why the band was parading on engineer replied, "I don't know. I just heard the nice music and followed the people."

As the L.G.M.B. passed through the solemn halls of Knox College one seminarian was heard to remark, "what music! I don't hear any music."

A co-ed (Vic.I) on her way from a tutorial in Old Physics 135 said, as the band stumbled by, "Wow! Why can't we have a parade every day. University is fun!"

CAUT delays censure of Loyola

MONTREAL (CUP) — The executive committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers voted February 7 to make one more attempt at "proper resolution" of the conflict between physics professor S. A. Santhanam and the administration of Loyola College.

At a special meeting, the CAUT executive created "a small committee to determine the feasibility of any fruitful negotiations with Loyola College for a proper resolution of the dispute."

If the move fails — in other words, if the Loyola administration refuses to accept binding arbitration in its seven-month contract dispute with Santhanam — the committee was authorized "to determine a date for a special meeting of CAUT's council to deal with the recommendation... for the censure of the president and board of trustees of Loyola college."

The censure, officially recommended as the alternative to binding arbitration in the Santhanam case, is the biggest weapon — perhaps the only one — in the CAUT arsenal.

It amounts to an official blacklisting of Loyola by the 12,000-member CAUT, which claims to represent the interests of 80 per cent of faculty in Canadian universities.

The threat of the censure has been hanging over Loyola for several weeks now, since a special investigating team from CAUT held hearings at Loyola last December over the Santhanam case. The issue has kept the Roman Catholic campus in an uproar since the beginning of the fall term.

Santhanam was not rehired this year by the Loyola board, who gave no reason for the dismissal. The board intends to test the legality of their action in Quebec courts Monday.

EDITOR THE VARSITY

The Varsity Board of Directors invites applications from members of the University community for the position of Editor-in-Chief of "The Varsity" for the 1970-71 academic session. The Editor will be responsible for the editorial policy and operation of the paper. As the job carries considerable authority, applicants should submit detailed proposals for the management of the paper. These may include proposed changes in the current format or editorial policy, and names of prospective staff. Approximately $1,000 per month is available for staff, including a salary of $50-$100 a week for the Editor, depending on distribution of the work load.

Applicants will be interviewed both by the current Varsity staff, and the Board of Directors, with the Board making the final decision.

Address written applications to:

Mr. Gary R. Thaler,
Chairman,
Varsity Board of Directors
c/o Erindale College,
University of Toronto.

Closing date for submission is 5:00 p.m.

Wednesday, February 18

LOVERS' SECRETS

or the Art of WOING, WINNING and WEDDING

With 24 Pages of Rapturous Love Letters

Husband "real happy." This is just the book that has long been wanted. It speaks in plain, honest words, revealing knowledge that everybody ought to know, upon subjects of as vital import to all as the very air we breathe. Neither those already married, nor those contemplating the tying of the connubial knot, can afford to be without a knowledge of the many mysterious things that are so truthfully and vividly explained in this work. In addition, there are 24 pages of the most rapturous love letters, written by an Englishwoman to her lover that alone are worth the price of the book.

A bit of history

As the faculty of this university continue to bury the Report of the Commission on University Government, their contradictory position becomes evident when we place it in an historical perspective:

"An additional motion stated that a condition of The Association of the Teaching Staff involvement in the new committee was a commitment by the Board to submit the committee's report to the provincial government 'without change and without delay.'"

The "additional motion" was a resolution passed by the ATS on October 3, 1968. The "committee" referred to was the proposed Commission on University Government.

When the faculty joined the CUG bandwagon in 1968, they were full of enthusiasm: here was a commission that would neatly bundle up the problem of student power and bury it along with the annoyances of hula hoops and bobby sox.

It seems the ATS expected quite a different CUG Report in Oct. 1968 than the one they find themselves stuck with now.

In fact, they must have been so sure that CUG would strengthen their stranglehold on 'academic excellence', that they wanted the Board of Governors to submit the report to the provincial government "without change and without delay".

Now the situation is radically different. For example, last Fall faculty members objected to any immediate actions to set up a university-wide committee to implement CUG, and opposed student attempts to declare a moratorium on classes in January so that students and faculty could discuss the report.

Those objections were raised at a CUG Programming Committee Meeting, where ATS Chairman J. M. Rist said the decision on CUG was so important that it wouldn't matter if it took ten years to make it.

That attitude doesn't exactly reflect the spirit of submitting the report "without change or delay".

At the same ATS meeting in October, 1968, the ATS approved the Students Administrative Council's proposal for the structure of CUG: a committee consisting of an equal number of students and faculty. They accepted the basic SAC proposal and turned down the proposal made by the Board of Governors.

The Board proposed voting representation from four estates: the Board, the students, the faculty, and the administration.

At the October ATS meeting SAC rep Bob Rae defeated President Bissell in debate and convinced the ATS that there were two estates in the university — students and faculty.

By accepting the principle of two estates, that ATS meeting de facto adopted the principle of parity — perhaps without realizing it.

CUG was basically a parity committee. It was a group where faculty and students learned to co-operate, and to compromise themselves. They thought their structure worked. It's hardly surprising the basic principle of the CUG Report is parity.

Now, by rejecting parity, the faculty have turned their backs on the principles and guidelines they established last year. They have substituted those principles for paranoia.

Drache challenges Bissell's word on U.S. profs

By DANIEL DRACHE

Mr. Drache was a research associate for the Commission on University Government last year.

My survey of the nationality of the teaching staff in Arts and Science so greatly upset Claude Bissell that he found it necessary to conduct his own study of the problem for the entire university. A brief story in The Varsity (Feb. 6) said his investigation revealed that sixty-seven per cent of the teaching staff are Canadian citizens.

Worried by the decline in the numbers of Canadian faculty, Bissell went out of his way to show the situation was really better than it is because "these statistics do not take into account members of the staff who came to the University from the United States and the United Kingdom many years ago" and who "are 'Canadian' in almost every respect, but have not officially changed their citizenship."

He offers a further qualification apologizing for the "many persons from abroad (who) have not yet been in Canada long enough to be eligible for Canadian citizenship. . ."

Bissell's attempt to doctor the facts requires comment.

The grave consequence of the Americanization of this and other universities cannot be hidden from the students and the Canadian people by producing figures that serve to confuse.

DEPARTMENTAL BREAKDOWN

In his statement, Bissell did not give the breakdown of his statistics by department or by faculty. If he had, his findings for Arts and Science would have confirmed my own — that American citizens have penetrated what John Porter refers to as the ideological system of the university.

In my report to CUG I proved:

"Not one of nineteen university departments is 100% Canadian. Canadians are in a minority of 8 of the 19 university departments, and in another 8 Canadians have a majority of less than 10%."

In 1969 Canadians comprised only 54% of the Faculty. This means that for every three Canadians there is one American.

The high concentration of Americans in the ideological social sciences, humanities, and OISE, coupled with the recent changes in the curriculum — more liberal orthodoxy — integrate the university of Toronto into the American imperial Harvard-Chicago-Berkley system.

UNEQUAL PENETRATION

Bissell does not want to make all his findings public and confront the problem of Americanization where it really exists. He deliberately tried to create the impression that Toronto is a strongly Canadian institution in terms of faculty and, by implication, course content. He used one fact to advantage — the Americanization of the university has not penetrated all of its divisions equally.

As member of CUG, Bissell received this information in the form of two research reports — my own, and David Shtern's. Shtern reported on the nationality of teaching staff in the professional faculties, institutes, and centres. The Shtern Report (see appendix four) showed that in the Faculties of Medicine, Dentistry, Pharmacy, Applied Science, to name several, Canadians are in a substantive majority — over eighty per cent in most cases.

Bissell is kidding no one if he thinks he can use the solidly Canadian faculties to cover up the takeover that is occurring in the strategically important faculty of Arts and Science.

Frequently it is said that a branch-plant economy creates a branch-plant university. American capitalists control the staple resources of this country. Takeover of the ideological institutions follow.

AMERICAN SOFTSELL

From the American perspective, it is imperative that the university — like the trade union movement — not become political centres of opposition to American imperialism. But it is not enough that the trade union movement, the media, and the university be neutralized.

They are too important to the functioning of American imperialism to be pushed to the sidelines. Political-cultural institutions like the university are pressed into service to softsell American style "internationalism" to Canadians.

In carrying out his semi-secret survey, Bissell hoped to placate those concerned with the Americanization of the University. But he himself has said:

"... what was a natural and healthy influx has now become a major invasion."

The situation at the University of Toronto in the Faculty of Arts and Science conforms to the national pattern uncovered by Matthews and Steele:

"In the past seven years the proportion of Canadian university teachers in arts and science faculties appears to have diminished by about 26%, from 75% to 49% . . ."

BISSELL DEFENDS AMERICANS

By comparison in the United States, foreign university teachers comprise 3% of the total academic community.

The nationality of the teaching staff is a measure of what is happening to this and other Canadian universities. Who is hired and what is taught determine whether or not the university will serve the majority of the Canadian people or American interests.

Bissell defends the large number of transient American academics engaged in intellectual pacification of Canadian students and excuses British academics who keep their jaded imperial citizenship "just in case". He represents the class of Americanized Canadians. He has chosen his side; students, faculty, and the Canadian people will chose theirs.

Vaughan: fighting to overcome a shameful situation

The Varsity has made it apparent that it has no intention of providing balanced coverage of Graduate Students' Union events and policies. This is clear in the recent convenient omissions of factual information and misrepresentation in Varsity reporting, as well as the suppression of letters, for example those from Paul Grayson and Denis Kennedy. It is shameful that the elected representatives of the graduate students have to buy pages of Varsity space to inform their constituents about important new policies. The GSU Newsletter and magazine will hopefully overcome these obstacles.

The recent attempts to discredit the elected representatives of the Graduate Students' Union are clearly political. It has been stated that we have worked "in words and deed" against graduate student involvement. This is ludicrous since any casual glance at the policies we initiated will show that we have adopted a program that is both responsible and relevant. The building renovation and extension of office facilities. The hiring of an Organizer to coordinate GSU efforts in developing strong graduate student associations. Graduate student housing and the Student Tenants' Union. The return of over 20% of our budget to course unions. A new constitution abolishing one that is totally outdated — getting rid of the 25 person quorum General Meeting rule. Formulating policy and lobbying for changes in the OHSIP program, teaching assistant medical and accident insurance coverage university subsidization, against the tax proposal to tax fellowships, and so forth. Representation and the presentation of reports in behalf of graduate students covering every aspect of University life. And so the list continues.

MISREPRESENTATION

These policies, which are of extreme relevance, have been totally ignored by those criticizing the elected representatives. Tactics of personal confrontation and misrepresentation have been relied upon. This is unfortunate because the Executive Committee has attempted to leave politics behind and concentrate on providing new policies and services. It is quite evident that politics is not the art of the possible. Rather it consists of choosing between the disastrous and the unpalatable. Unfortunately, when confronted with a clearly political situation, the elected representatives were forced to choose the unpalatable.

It is not my intention to become involved with certain allegations made against my person which I believe to be false. Rather I would like to point out several facts that would refute charges levelled against the GSU.

CONCRETE FORMERS

1. It has been suggested that the senior officers have imposed rules to discriminate against those groups we do not agree with. This is false. It is conceded, even by Mrs. Repo, that all our facilities have been used with uninterrupted freedom by every group wishing to do so except on one occasion. In this particular case the House Chairman questioned whether the CLM was a campus organization, since they were using the GSU to publish an Italian-English Newsletter for the Canadian Concrete Forming Workers Union. In addition there was no reservation of facilities, which is normal procedure. In this instance the CLM should have approached the Executive Committee for direction. It should be emphasized that the GSU has never politically discriminated and has reaffirmed that policy of total nondiscrimination. The CLM has frequently used GSU facilities since the above incident.

TELEGRAMS

The Executive Committee has carried on an intensive educational program. We invited the Sir George Williams University students to this campus to present their case. We organized the Matthews-Steele discussion on telecanadianization. We sent telegrams to the US Senate regarding the ABM proposals and to President Strand regarding the arbitrary faculty firing. We printed and distributed the Waterloo Report and the Report on Women in Canadian Universities. Further reports, the CUG Questionnaire, and so forth indicate that our actions have been both responsive and responsible.

2. The claim that we subjected course unions to "third degree" interrogation are meaningless. Regular grants were approved automatically to all course union requests which were accompanied by a constitution and budget as stipulated by the General Meeting. New, flexible rules were drafted and moved by the Vice-President and accepted at the recent General Meeting. Naturally the Graduate Students' Union does not dole out money to anyone who staggers in off the street.

VIGOUR

3. The senior executive is accused of imposing Roger Harrington as Chairman of Executive Meetings. This is untrue. The position was widely advertised even in the Varsity, and only Mr. Harrington applied. He was unanimously accepted after a trial period during which his impartiality and efficiency was demonstrated.

4. As to imposing excessive charges one should note that no graduate student groups have ever been charged for GSU facilities. Moreover, all requests for a waiver of charges to non-graduate student groups have been granted.

It certainly hope that this will clear up some of the misconceptions about GSU policies. The executive feels that the interests of graduate students are at stake and we will respond vigorously.

The General Meeting on February 24 at Convocation Hall at 1 p.m. will decide the direction of policies of the Graduate Students' Union.

GREAT SLAVE LAKE RAILWAY

part III

By TREVOR JONES

In March of 1955, CNR president Donald Gordon appeared before the House of Commons Sessional Committee on railways and shipping and answered some questions about the railroad's dealings with Welch (the meeting was closed to the press).

Welch had started business as a contractor of rock and quarry gangs. The preponderance of immigrants on these gangs was earlier explained and defended by CNR officials (in a letter to a union) in terms of their having "a natural aptitude" for this rough and dangerous work. By 1950 Welch had expanded into recruiting and boarding laborers for seasonal extra gangs. Manual laborers on these gangs were non-unionized, while the foreman and the machine operators were paid at union rates settled between the CNR and the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way.

It was not until 1951 that the Brotherhood was awarded certification as bargaining agent for extra gang laborers. Because the CNR was bitterly opposed to unionization of their seasonal labor forces, it took two years of negotiations before a wage agreement was reached. Union officials, intimidated by CN's threat to contract all maintenance construction work to Welch, compromised their 40-hour standard week for extra gang laborers and managed to obtain the lowest rate in the railway industry for their men.

The union demanded the end of Welch contracts and, outwardly, the CNR went along. Donald Gordon told the Sessional Committee that "all the Welch contracts are being terminated."

Contrary to what Gordon said, however, the CNR simply filed new contracts with Welch that allowed him to recruit immigrant-laborers and replace regular CN foremen and machine operators with non-unionized retired CN and CP employees. Until union officials threatened further parliamentary action Gordon refused to discuss the Welch contracts. In February of 1956, however, the CNR returned extra gangs to union control but demanded that Welch be retained as a boarding and recruiting agent, and continued to use Welch manpower and construction services on pioneer lines.

Welch's contracts were protected by the CNR so that this public-owned corporation could get by all labor requirements and keep its supply of cheap, sullen labor. When it looked like troubled legislators were all too ready to investigate the contracts, Welch was defended by none other than the CNR President himself.

The advantages of the Welch-CNR contracts were clearly outlined by Donald Gordon when he testified before the Sessional Committee in 1955.

He explained that Welch had saved the Canadian public considerable sums of money (a concern the government didn't seem to have when it paid for aline to service a CPR industry) and he praised the "Welch interests" who employed "their special facilities to secure quickly the fluid casual labor required for extra gangs". Welch's "recruitment of labor in the form of immigrants," said Mr. Gordon, "is done on a basis that the railway could not tackle at all." — (Minutes and proceedings and evidence, sessional committee on railways and shipping, House of Commons, Tuesday March 29, 1955.)

When questioned about CN's interest in Welch's labor policies, Gordon replied: "what their understanding with labor is in that situation is none of our concern" (why did he fight five years to preserve it, then?) and went on to praise Welch's wage rates: "The rates of pay by the R.F. Welch people have been quite comparable with the railway rates."

When Welch was building the Kitimat spur line in that period, they were indeed comparable: 90 cents an hour. However they weren't particularly comparable to the Kitimat construction rates for manual labor: $1.58 an

"At this point", a Federal labor man apologized, "decent food and decent living quarters depend on the charitable good heart of the employer." Federal legislation on housing and food for federal employees consists of standards and recommendations — not enforceable regulations.

There is, however, a healthy file of complaints against R. F. Welch in the Federal Labor Bureau in Edmonton. From time to time Portuguese and Metis lodge accusations concerning poor food, late pay cheques, slave wage rates, or inhuman treatment of men. There is also mention of an Edmonton drunk who appealed for an "immediate investigation of the business ethics of one R.F. Welch" as officers of the law liberated him from the corner of Jasper and 107th.

The men who registered these complaints — Portuguese, Metis and tramps — represent the most unorganized and least articulate body of workers in Canada. This may explain why Welch prefers them for his gangs and it may also explain the Edmonton official's failure to forward the complaints to Ottawa or to investigate the situation on the ARR and the GSLR for himself. As a result of this inaction and the absence of legislation or jurisdiction, the inspection of the GSLR camps is delegated to CN officials — at their convenience.

"We're not too damn damn proud of our mobile units", said Dr. C. Mather, chief CNR medical officer in Edmonton, who went on to explain his view of the housing problem: "The men who work on these construction and extra gangs are usually immigrants and itinerants. They have little concern for personal hygiene, much less property or belongings. It probably doesn't matter what they're given to live in — they'd still leave it a mess."

In order to cut costs, over the last few years the CNR has replaced section gangs (which do repair work on the main line) with large extra gangs, which have wage rates that average 50 cents an hour less than section gangs. These extra gangs, consisting largely of immigrants or Canadian transients, have received little union support because they eliminate work for Canadian section men.

When the unions do finally move into the GSLR, after it's declared operational, the railway will be maintained by section gangs. The Portuguese and others who built and maintained the line for the last eight years will have no claim to seniority, and will probably lose their jobs to Canadians the unions will bring in at the higher section gang rates.

Welch's immigrant gang labor receives $1.65 an hour, 35 to 95 cents less than unionized men doing the same jobs on the continental gangs. Their overtime rates start after 60 hours, whereas unionized gangs get overtime after 40 hours. The wage difference must also take into account the fact that extra gang laborers on the main lines — thanks to the efforts of the unions — themselves earn the lowest wage rates in the industry. The unions make sure of this, because extra gangs are used by the CNR to reduce regular labor forces. Thus the CNR divides the labor force, and gets its way.

The men who work on the GSLR must work long hours if they are to earn reasonable money. Considering that 10 working hours a day clears $9 (after taxes and board are deducted), the five to eight hours overtime can hardly be considered "optional". Frills like pensions, job security or grievance rights, are, of course, unheard of on the GSLR.

hour. The men working for Welch were also paying $2.50 a day for "room and board" — in other words almost three hours' work a day. What Gordon was saying was that Welch's rates were as depressed as the CNR had succeeded in maintaining everywhere else on the railway.

Officials of the United Steelworkers of America in Kitimat visited the "horrible goddamn boxcars" that housed Welch's men and offered to organize them. Almost none of the Italians spoke English and they professed complete ignorance of their rights as landed immigrants and workers. They feared that any action would cost them their jobs.

Donald Gordon also mentioned the "special services which the Welch people render to immigrants". These immigrants came to public attention in 1953 when the Globe and Mail ran a story reporting complaints about the CNR extension line to Lynn Lake, Manitoba. Once again the manpower and construction contractor for the 600-man operation was R.F. Welch.

The story has German immigrants complaining to authorities in Las Pas, Manitoba that they were being forced to work up to 15 hours a day, seven days a week, and that they were being paid $300 to $400 a month for 450 hours of work. They also charged that Welch was squeezing 10 men into bunkhouses 8 by 12 feet and extorting $2.40 a day for "an almost exclusive diet of macaroni."

Archie Moffat, Welch's general manager in Port Arthur, claimed that "90 per cent of the men sleep in single bunks" and that overtime after 10 hours was not compulsory. He explained that because of the isolation the men preferred to work as much as possible. He did admit, however, that the men were obliged to work for 12 months as stipulated by their immigration work contract, and that if they broke this contract they had to repay Welch the cost of their one-way passage to Canada, $500.

The story (the only one to be found anywhere on Welch incidentally), quotes civic authorities in Las Pas complaining the Lynn Lake Line was "being built under conditions bordering on slave labor." CNR spokesman came to Welch's defense stating that a recent official inspection of the line had found the conditions to be "extremely good", and criticisms were "unwarranted." Ottawa authorities promised an investigation into the complaints. There was no investigation, and the press coverage ends.

Provincial and federal attitudes towards immigrant railway workers, as well as existing legislation concerning railway construction have also provided Welch with few obstacles.

"If you look at the overcrowded, dirty living quarters of these immigrants in the cities it is not hard to visualize the problems they present in railway camps," explained an official of Immigration Research in Edmonton.

These illuminating comments were made recently in the Alberta capital shortly after Provincial Health and Welfare officials disclaimed responsibility for conditions on the GSLR. As a Federal operation, it lies outside their jurisdiction.

For years the CNR has fought tooth and nail to keep its supply of immigrant labor. It has fought the unions, divided the labor force and obtained deferments from legislation to ensure that these conditions remained constant.

R.F. Welch is himself only a product of that policy, a man who has thrived in the vacuum of labor rights and legislative control that Ottawa so carefully created. Welch is a creation of Ottawa.

The real question is how this policy was permitted to exist, and in fact carefully maintained. When this question is asked, one invariably comes to the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

But there the answers stop. Officials plead knowledge of no special "arrangements" for contractors like Welch.

Then how did Welch operate his overseas recruitment until 1957? And after 1957, how was this convenient supply of labor maintained by the manpower offices? How did these men arrive to take their place in the labor pool for the Welchs to dip into, if they were not imported on a regular basis by the immigration authorities to maintain the pool?

When I went to Ottawa to pose these questions, the answers were not forthcoming. Immigration files are confidential and protected from release to the public for 35 years, under regulations affecting government documents.

A New Democratic Party MP posed the questions for me to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, Allan MacEachen, and received a confidential letter in reply from him stating that preliminary reports from internal investigations suggested "there may well be some irregularities or illegalities involved" in the importation of Portuguese and Italian laborers for work on the railways.

And there the matter rests, on the level of a few polite inquiries and a wall of blank faces. The history of Canadian importation of cheap labor will probably remain unwritten, stashed in the inaccessible archives of the Immigration authorities.

Perhaps the most acute comment on the whole matter was made by Mr. McLean, Welch's labor recruitment supervisor in Edmonton, when he reacted with wounded dignity to questions posed to him about GSLR working conditions and labor importation.

"Really," he pleaded, "we don't deal in chattel. We deal in human beings."

So, apparently, does our government. Wholesale.

LETTERS

'Mr. Moroney, how would you define a lady?'

Mr. Moroney, I reply to your letter to The Varsity of Feb. 4. Several replies have already been published, refuting your arguments. I find it interesting that while you claim that the majority of men do not want women admitted to Hart House, two of the three answers to your letter which were published in The Varsity of Feb. 9 were from men. I think that should give you an idea of male opinion on campus.

You claim that Hart House is badly overcrowded even without the women of the university. Admittedly the athletic facilities are inadequate. But why would the women want to use the Hart House athletic facilities when the Benson Building is better equipped? Is the Hart House music room overcrowded? The library? The Camera Club? The dining halls?

You claim that if women want to be treated like ladies, they should start acting like ladies. How, Mr. Moroney, would you define a lady? Someone who keeps out of any profession or career, or better yet out of any public place? No, ladies should not smoke cigarettes or drink alcoholic beverages in public. It is not becoming. You seem to have the mistaken idea that a woman cannot be a feminist and feminine at the same time.

Another point. You say to the Women's Liberation Front "Even your letter which I am forced to reply to (sic) isn't too cleverly worded." Clever wording, Mr. Moroney...?

As an ex-music student, Mr.

Moroney, I think I can diagnose your problem. You've been standing in line for the practice rooms in the Edward Johnson Building for too long. Two years of that would make anyone a little paranoid. Or are you just displaying a basic dislike for women?

Please, Mr. Moroney. Let us have no more of these petty diatribes.

Kenneth G. Beattie (Scar)

please don't forget pacofroh

In view of the recent correspondence in your pages concerning the relation of women to Hart House, it is perhaps useful to recall to your readers the existence of the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Future Role of Hart House (PACOFROHH).

This committee, appointed by the President on the advice of the Students' Administrative Council and the Board of Stewards of Hart House, consists of five students, three faculty members, a representative of the Board of Governors, a representative of the alumni and the Warden of Hart House. It will be making its recommendations to the President in the spring of this year.

PACOFROHH's terms of reference are to examine every aspect of Hart House's relation to the University community. Thus, of course, the question of women's membership is a very important topic among the many matters which the committee is studying. Several university groups, among them the Women's Liberation Movement, have expressed their views on the association of women to Hart House in their submissions to the committee.

Although PACOFROHH has amply advertised its existence by posters, notices in the Varsity and the Staff Bulletin, and letters to campus organizations, and has on occasion been mentioned in Varsity news articles, it still has not evoked any widespread campus attention. My concern in writing now is that your readers be informed that the current debate on the role of women in Hart House is not taking place in a void, but in the context of formal university study of this very important matter.

E. M. Bridge
Chairman of PACOFROHH

prof. dupre, it's nothing personal

I would like to clarify one point concerning the meeting of the Political Economy Course Union reported in Wednesday's Varsity. It is possible to infer from that article that the PECU is opposed to Prof. Dupre on personal grounds. This is completely wrong. Although some sentiment against Prof. Dupre himself was expressed at that meeting, many students made it quite clear that this was not their feeling and our resolution declaring the chairmanship still open was based primarily on the principle that students should be consulted on such an important appointment.

While I think it would be unfair to suggest that a majority of students would oppose Prof. Dupre at this time, there is certainly unanimous agreement in the course union that the appointing procedure used was totally incompatible with any feeling of mutual trust, openness, or cooperation which, I would hope, could characterize staff-student relations at this university.

The PECU is very serious in its determination to press for more student involvement in decision-making in our department.

To pose the question: seven novels and one collection of essays later, what is Mordecai Richler?

The fact that I am a Canadian Jewish writer may seem so obvious as to be unworthy of comment, but fifteen years ago, when I first began to publish, it troubled me enormously. (from the foreword to Hunting Tigers Under Glass)

A Jewish writer, he is — of his seven novels published to date (of which I have read four), at least three deal specifically with Montreal's St. Urbain Street Jewish community.

It is that same Jewishness, however, that makes me doubt Richler's claim to being a Canadian writer.

Listen to the picture of the street with its "endless repetition of precious peeling balconies and waste lots marking the occasional gap here and there" and corresponding resort area of Prevost where "plump, middle-aged ladies, their flesh boiled pink, spread out blankets and squat in their bras and bloomers, playing poker, smoking and sipping Cokes". The air is too dense, the flesh too close, to be at all in tune with the greater part of Canada, the land, and the transit of its youth on highways and rail.

I am not trying to be anti-Semitic, nor am I belittling the significance of St. Urbain as a sub-culture, but what must be realized (as Richler himself admits) is that the area is more related to "ghetto streets in New York and Chicago", than to, say, the Lac St. Jean setting for Louis Hemon's Maria Chapdelaine.

Granted, the social fabric of Hemon's Peribonka is often just as tight as that of Richler's St. Urbain St., but whereas Richler's characters live in an environment in which "each street between the Main and Park Avenue represents subtle differences in income", Hemon's act out their parts against the everpresent back-drop of the forest.

Not only are Richler's characters either trapped (the fathers who say: "I work like this so it'll be better for the kids.") or trying desperately hard to get out ("He couldn't help thinking about his mother and how she had looked at him when he said he was going. He went over his reasons again. It was stifling at home . . . Melech . . . his father always apologizing. . ."), but the writer himself seems unable to break from the street, its culture and its themes.

Some might wonder why Richler should be expected to make such a break, and the answer is simple: he's getting repetitious, both figuratively and literally — the long description of the street is lifted almost verbatim from Duddy Kravitz, and the whole chapter five of The Street appeared in Duddy Kravitz.

On the one hand, in reviewing Rolloff Beny's book, Richler says To Everything There Is A Season, like all picture books I've seen on Canada, as well as many an old calendar, manages to contain all the cliches, albeit poetically seen. But what of the anachronism of the "rising" lower middle class Jew? If not cliché already, he soon will be after not too many more of Richler's novels, and the next is apparently entitled St. Urhain's Horsemen.

To be fair, Richler does not always write of St. Urhain. The incomparable Atuk (out of print and utterly unavailable in Canada), I am told, is an excellent book about quite another subject (although what I was not told).

Of the books I did manage to get a hold of Cocksure, of course, is different. I also happen to think it stinks, but let me explain.

Mortimer Griffin, set up as an archetype of the British establishment, is an all too worthy target for comedy. All too worthy that is because even television has already done it, most notably with the Avengers series, and as we all know, anything television does must necessarily be stale. Richler redeems himself by adding a new twist and making Mortimer (in his relations with Agnes Ryerson and Hy Rosen) believable, human, but then he takes Mortimer's non-Jewishness to extremes and further assures himself that no-one (should a British-establishment type read his book) will be offended by damping the whole thing in surrealism — with the Star-Maker and his frozen stars, culminating in the Star-Maker's proud assertion: "Since God, the first self-contained creator, Mortimer, I am now able to reproduce myself. I will have a son."

Cocksure is neither fantasy, nor comedy with the painful reality that makes it sting, but merely a liberal wish-washy piece of crap with the naughty words included for the rich liberal wishy-washy over twenty set to titter at.

The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, is something else again. I think it's the best Richler has done yet, and excellent by anyone's standards. Duddy is obsessed with the maxim his Zeyda gave him that "a man without land is nobody". Duddy is hard to like, but the reader can sympathize with the intense effort he puts into making the money to buy his land, and can to some extent forgive his trespasses against his friends (especially Yvette) as the blind mistakes of a youth who has suffered too little to fully appreciate the implications of what he does and does not do. It is his tragedy that he fails to understand why his grandfather refuses to accept his gift of a farm on the land he eventually acquires, and his tragedy projected into the future that he becomes exstastic over a waiter's offer of credit on the basis of his property.

Son of A Smaller Hero, "a scathing novel of sexual rebellion and social protest" (what's so scathing about a Jewish boy having a goy mistress), was written in 1955 and is definitely dated for the type of avant-garde protest work it is. Society's sensibilities have matured fifteen years, we are no longer shocked by it, its back is broken, and is worthwhile only in the light of its leading up to Duddy Kravitz.

The Street, a short collection of bits and pieces, was published after Cocksure, when Richler was supposedly working on a long novel to be called St. Urban's Horsemen (still not out) and looks very much like a hasty job put together for some ulterior motive like money or keeping his name in print. As such, I consider it a literary snow-job on the book-buying public, and all the more so since we have already seen chapter five in Duddy Kravitz.

Hunting Tigers Under Glass, Richler's collection of essays, is as often dull as it is infuriatingly egotistic: "... there are a number of books, most of them embarrassingly boosterish, about Canadian writing." Perhaps this review, in its own small way, will help to remedy that fault.

missing the point

College Revues are notoriously uncertain. At best, they are speedily-paced, subtle and brimming with caustic satire. At worst, they are dull, clique-ish affairs, seemingly designed to dull an audience's sensibilities and to test their patience. This year's University College Follies, Motherball, directed by Steve Wilkin and produced by Lorne Drenfield, unfortunately, fell squarely into the second category.

Musicals are undoubtedly the most difficult type of theatre to stage successfully and when the production is billed, as was Motherball, as a "Revolutionary new musical," these difficulties are multiplied to staggering proportions. There is nothing in the code of stagecraft which compels a director to mount a musical (or a college revue) as a mindless extravaganza, but the production becomes a precarious one when it employs second-hand, third-hand and fourth-hand clichés as the basis of its humour and intent.

In the case of Motherball those clichés concerned the activities of a Left Wing group intent on spreading the words and deeds of revolution throughout a suspiciously familiar university campus. Granted the point was to satirize, but surely not at the expense of our intelligence. The attitude of Wilkin and Drenfield seemed to be established at the very outset of Motherball when a member of the Left Wing group, dressed in a red beret (Black Panther style, circa 1970), battle fatigues and armed with a rifle, wandered through the audience and onto the apron of the Hart House stage. After the prescribed dramatic pause and with all the subtlety of a pile-driver, our combatant then commenced to harangue us all far underestimating the sincerity and determination of the young Marxists, Maoists and Trots which were to be displayed to us that evening. Not an insipid evening of revue humour for the parents and friends of the cast: this was to be a musical of confrontation. But if satire was the point, it failed dismally and we were left to ponder exactly what purpose that slap in the face served, in view of the banality of the production.

Nevertheless, all criticisms of intent aside, Bill Skolnick's music was perhaps the only redeeming grace extended to us in Motherball, mingling cocktail-bar jazz with sophisticated rock in perfectly digestible proportions. Considering the cast's experience in such matters, the renditions of Skolnick's songs were hardly to be severely condemned, but was it really that necessary to place Miss Shiner in such a conspicuously uncomfortable situation as a down-stage solo?

Much of the production in general might also have been improved had Hilary McLaughlin not designed quite so ponderous and forbidding a set and had spent less time in designing her lighting around tight, singly spot-lit areas.

All in all Motherball, if nothing else perhaps, lends some credence to the old dictum sum exhorting the old ways as the best ways.

slow and bland

It is always frustrating to hear someone else expound in a totally unconvincing manner ideas with which you fervently agree. It is even more frustrating if that person does not bother to state the facts when the facts are eminently convincing as they stand.

Abraham Polonsky's taking-off point in Tell Them Willie Boy Is Here is certainly reasonable enough — that white man has done a hell of a lot of bad things to red man — and one would think there was enough material available to work with. But Polonsky doesn't use it.

For instance, his 1909 California Paiute reservation contains rather too many fat and healthy-looking Indians. Fact is, by the beginning of the twentieth century, because of the duplicity of the U.S. government and the land-hungry fervor of western pioneers, the Indians had been pushed into tiny reserves on poor land which nobody wanted and were a pretty starved and diseased lot. As if to prove the inherent strength of his stand against the white race, Polonsky presents the Indians' plight as being somewhat less alarming than it really was.

Rather than concentrate on the actual physical conditions of the Indians, Polonsky concentrates on what people have to say. He is interested in words and symbols and ideological poses, and the actions that go on behind all these must be suitably slow and bland, so as not to detract from what he is saying. This might be alright if Polonsky had something interesting to say, but not when all he can produce are choice lines like: "One way or another, you die at the end."

The whites in the movie are all bastards, weaklings or fools. Susan Clark plays an Indian agent. Now, many Indian agents were good people who fought against impossible odds (the U.S. government, territorial governments and the U.S. Army) trying their damndest to get a fair deal for the Indians. But this agent is a patronizing, sexually repressed bitch who loses our sympathy not for erring in trying to do good for the Indians, but for being the kind of person she is.

Polonsky isn't really concerned with the condition of the Indians at all. His real concern is with the clear-through rottenness of the white race, or at least of Americans. But one only has to compare the movie with the facts to see that yes, the Indians were treated in a sickening manner, but no, not all white Americans are totally depraved. The comparison is necessary because the movie is propaganda and to test the validity of propaganda one must look to the facts.

The final thesis of the movie is that white man is so congenitally depraved that he putrefies anything he touches. However, the next easiest thing these days to offering a facile and spurious hope is offering no hope at all. Polonsky doesn't give life a chance, he is so busy condemning it.

The things he says and the symbols he shows mean little in the context of the movie, for they are unrelated to the few bits of real life which occur there. Instead, Polonsky depends on us to provide a sort of Pavlovian response to his ideological stimuli, based on our personal knowledge about present-day race relations.

zest doesn't save name

Vic's famed spirit and enthusiasm pulled the Broadway musical Mame through a strenuous three hour run at Tuesday's opening night. A tremendous effort went into yet another mediocre Victoria production, it's the story of a young boy being brought up by his wild Auntie Mame in New York's swinging circles from 1928 on; it is based on a book successfully adapted for stage and screen.

Vic's version, just fails to catch the spirit of the thing. It is kept alive by its own lumbering momentum and the loudly competent orchestra, which frequently drowns out the spoken lines.

The songs, often out of tune and tinselly are announced by abrupt movement into groupings reminiscent of troops dressing their ranks on the parade ground. A basic problem is the simple inability of most individual voices to cope with the music. The overall effect of the singing is not enhanced by the Broadway lyrics of Jerry Herman, which sometimes become unabashedly dull, as in "It's Today", sung three times.

The acting vacillated from the flat to the exaggerated, in general heavy and clumsy. Its effect is reinforced physically by the blocking which seems to create invisible barriers on the stage, and whenever large number are present, it looks like the shepherd's line-up at the Christmas pageant of a Woman's Auxiliary.

Robert Galbraith has created simple and imaginative sets to represent the bare essentials of most scenes. Unfortunately this imagination is lacking in his choreography — although it surpasses the Mickey Mouse Fan Club choreography of last week's UC Follies — but its execution is more noteworthy for vigour than for coordination. In general, Galbraith seems to have under-directed, and not pulled the production tightly enough together.

Mrs. Mary Harris, as Mame Dennis does a passably competent job, though her voice lacks the colour for some of the songs, and her acting occasionally strikes a false note. Mary Robertson puts venom into the role of the supreme bitch, Vera Charles, but for her too, singing is a handicap. One constant note of quality is maintained by Cathy Fallis who effectively handles all aspects of her role as Agnes Gooch, the naive, repressed governess.

If you think you would appreciate a happy, vigorous and tasteless assault on Mame, then see it at Hart House tonight and tomorrow night.

quiet book

A WORLD TURNED TURTLE

by John Cornish
Clarke, Irwin — $4.50

A World Turned Turtle hits you very hard at the end, but not until then. Up to that point, the story has been a combination of London sight-seeing and mild characterisation, both centering around a not-too-bright, none-too-imaginative Estonian Canadian serving as a military policeman in Britain as the Second World War dribbles away.

Enn Koort knew he wasn't very smart, that's why he was a good policeman: and he wasn't very emotional, that's why, for example, he hardly knew his brother when he too was posted to London. But that way your world was safe, secure, predictable. Even his girlfriend was predictable, the old-maid daughter of an Estonian publisher in London.

Perhaps it is his bored parting from that girl that previews the book's conclusion; Koort begins to go with the actress daughter of his landlord, a step well beyond his usual world. Yet he can't make it there, as officers with more dash and more wit leave him waiting in her dressing room. Then more and more, his world begins to collapse into itself. His safe past comes back to him, no longer safe, with his brother's posting overseas and with the sudden appearance as a refugee in England of his former Estonian math teacher, seemingly as harmless an eccentric as one could find.

Tentative emotions come to Koort through his meetings with both these figures; he promises to try to keep the latter from eventual return to the Stalinist government in Estonia; and he begins to build a relationship with his brother. Such building reaches maturity, though, only to be smashed by his brother's vicious murder in an off-duty movie visit. Koort is thrown back onto his unthoughtful commitment to Aadu Tief, intellectual refugee, former figure of derision to the schoolboys he taught.

At war's end Tief is to be transferred from his English aliens' camp to a Soviet ship for return to Estonia; he fears death as a potential nationalist there. Koort is a guard on the train taking him to the dockside, and escape by the two is inevitable. The secure world is left behind, the policeman is outside the law and a more dreary than desperate attempt at concealment is necessary. It is, of course, hopeless from the start, but Koort finds himself enjoying his turtle world as he turns thief and undercover strategist. The emotional attachment of Koort to Tief, the opening of real human feeling in the younger man, of intellectual excitement, is only hinted at by Cornish, but you've felt it by the time the conclusion slams it down at you.

Tief is caught and turned over to the Soviet Embassy, and Koort's turtle world dies. He's lost anything that let him leave his safe security, and now that former world is cut off too. In an aimlessness that seems somehow right he finally seeks out that old-maid girlfriend, searching for some feeling, perhaps even more than some help. He's discovered, encircled, and in a final total tragedy, which shocks you into seeing the bitter development he's gone through, jumps despairingly to his death.

Cornish has written a book that relies on early slowness and sense of the commonplace to heighten the full destruction of Koort. That approach unfortunately leaves you dragging through much of what he has written. There is perhaps too much aimless wandering in the final sections of the novel too; Koort's frame of mind could have been suggested with much more economy. Nevertheless, it is a work that catches the process of a man's opening up to other men, and the poignancy of a rushing world's unconcern with such feelings. The world didn't turn turtle, it always was that way; the unfeeling, unthinking Koort just never noticed; and the revived Koort found it too much to take.

galactic virtues and groovy plots

Even When It Repeats on You It's Still Good

The meat and potatoes of television viewing is the daily repeat series Star Trek (Ch. 9, 5-6 p.m.). I was reluctant to admit it to anyone until I noticed that all sorts of people were talking about Star Trek. I began to realize that Star Trek, far from being my personal addiction, was at worst, a collective mania and at best, part of the viewing habits of the intelligentsia.

Spock . . . the final frontier . . . These are the voyages of the Starship Enterprise. It's five year mission: to explore strange new worlds; to seek out new life and new civilizations; to boldly go where no man has gone before.

Captain James T. Kirk, the promising young master of the USS Enterprise, is played and overplayed by William Shatner. He is a combination of an all-star collegiate quarterback and the president of the sodality; strength, concupiscence, but overwhelming goodness.

Leonard Nimoy, as Mr. Spock, the half-human, half-Vulcan first officer, is the real cherry of the program. With his pointed ears, raised eyebrows, slightly cocked head and impeccable logic, he is able to solve some of the knottiest problems in the universe. Nimoy's stature and talent give Spock a charisma that makes him endearing in spite of his aloof manner.

Star Trek ended two successful seasons as Nimoy left to replace Martin Landau in Mission Impossible. It was a bad deal all round; Nimoy is Spock.

DeForest Kelley, as Dr. Leonard McCoy, completes the trinity of main characters on the Enterprise. His performance usually falls just to the good side of mediocre.

The plots of Star Trek compensate for any character defects. They are believably exciting, sustaining adventure and tradition. Yes, tradition.

Omnes galoxias est divisus in tres partes.

In our galaxy there's the Clingon Empire, the Romulan Empire and the United Federation of Planets. The USS Enterprise (United Space Ship) is from the Star Fleet of the United Federation of Planets. Not only is it a troubleshooter, guarding against Romulan or Clingon sneak attacks, but it has routine Star Fleet assignments, such as picking up dilithium crystals that drive the matter-anti-matter warp engines of the Star Fleet. Warp drive is a major advancement over nuclear power, but not as efficient as ion propulsion. You see, the Federation hasn't yet mastered sophisticated ion propulsion — but I digress.

Star Trek is set in about the 22nd century, and there are frequent references to the nuclear holocausts and eugenics wars of the Earth's late twentieth century. Through various devices and accidents, travel in time (E=mc²) often takes Kirk and Spock back, back, back to the days of yesteryear for some tastefully executed twists on anachronism.

Even in these days after Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey, the sets, props and effects of Star Trek are delightfully real. NASA could well learn a lesson here. For example, the transporter is a device that atomises and reassembles people and things at fixed coordinates. This makes unnecessary any intricate bulky landing vehicles.

Star Trek is in the great television tradition of Captain Midnight, The Twilight Zone, The Outer Limits and other less nostalgic and note-worthy bits of tv memorabilia. It's interesting that The Twilight Zone is also on every night on Channel 11, just after Star Trek. There is really no comparison. Star Trek is in every way superior; and that's a difficult thing to admit for some one who wanted to be Rod Serling when he grew up.

Star Trek offers lessons in galactic virtue. The essences of justice, charity and democratic patriotism are applied liberally across the galaxy; from the halls of Thorax to the shores of Rigel 12.

Star Trek is the fulfillment of the pristine American Dream; the flowering of "liberty and justice for all". It's a show demonstrating that there is such a thing as working practical idealism. It's a series with hope and imagination — a rare and enduring combination anywhere.

The new theatre will provide well equipped space, a dramatic necessity conspicuously absent on this campus. In the two years since Hart House went semi-professional, theatre groups with people and sometimes even funds to spare have been stuck with the expensive and exhausting problem of having to import light and sound equipment into theatres with inadequate acting areas and miserable backstage conditions. Restrictions may provoke creativity — witness beer advertising in this part of the world — but they limit the range and variety of possible productions, and they do not attract people interested in experimentation.

The University College Theatre, which will be available to all college groups at lower rates through Players' Guild of course gets priority, should relieve if not solve the situation. It offers a kitchen, rehearsal rooms, and what Miss McLaughlin pronounces to be "the best dressing rooms on campus." More important, it makes available the on-stage luxuries which are essential for any kind of theatrical flexibility — a good sound system, "fantastic lighting," and some 40 graduated modular risers which multiply to somewhere near infinity the possibilities of the new theatre's proscenium stage.

To date under the direction of Principal LePan's ad hoc committee, the University College Theatre will be administered by a triune: a student director, a technical director from outside, and an executive director. The first two are as yet unnamed; the third is Professor Stephen Mainwain of University College, who will be directing a production of plays by Pinter and Beckett in the new theatre over three weekends in March.

one more time

As is his yearly custom, Gordon Lightfoot appeared at Convocation Hall Sunday night. It is the one affair which the Blue and White perennially sell out, and this year was no exception. In fact, nothing which Lightfoot does is ever an exception. Always a first set of new songs and a post-intermission array of "oldies" some of which have garnered that status since his last local concert when they made the first half as newbies.

In fact, for anyone who is not as enamoured with him as the groupies who sat charmed at his feet, the only real excitement of the concert was seeing what I expect will be a moustache when Lightfoot leaves his adolescence, the stage in which Lightfoot is musically mired.

Lightfoot has written some beautiful material (such as "Canadian Railroad Trilogy," which as always he plays as his encore), but there seems to be little sign of his evolving past a certain set lyric form and this leaves me bored after every concert. The one new wrinkle he has begun to display is the incorporation of protest oriented material into his repertoire of love and folk ballads, a trend started with "Black Day In July."

I must mention that once again Lightfoot's back-up men Red Shea and Richard Haynes, were superb, and I feel that he would suffer immeasurably if either of them, particularly Shea should leave. It is unfortunate that their talents may be forced to stagnate along with Lightfoot's.

virtuoso violin

Last Saturday's CBC taping gave Torontoians another chance to savour the essence of true virtuosity. Violinist Maria Hidy performed the world premiere of CBC-commissioned Suite IV for Solo Violin, by S. C. Eckhardt-Gramatte in a chamber music programme at the new St. Lawrence Centre. She has a natural genius for the instrument that can never be attained by the less gifted, no matter how hard they may practice. The Suite itself is fully phrased legato pianism was alone responsible for fashioning the work into a musically palatable whole.

The A MAJOR SONATA, OP.69 was better treated, and this is due to the work as much as the performers. The Sonata, irregular in many ways, is full of contrasts, allowing both Du Pre and Barenboim to display their different talents. Du Pre, always faultless in intonation, suggested that she's actually not always enraged with her instrument. One serious fault in interpretation occurred in the Scherzo, where synopacted E's are played in unison just prior to the return of the theme. In playing this with an exaggerated ritardando (not in the score) all three times, Du Pre and Barenboim destroyed the accumulated momentum of the music and made the horse's ass out of Beethoven's synopactions, now rendered inaudible and meaningless.

A complete turnabout came with the last work, the SONATA IN D MAJOR, OP.102, NO.2. This is a difficult late work with an extended slow movement requiring maturity of interpretation. Du Pre and Barenboim played it beautifully with sensitive phrasing. This is all the more impressive considering their youth and the earlier efforts of the evening. The D major alone made the evening a memorable experience. They encoored with Beethoven's VARIATIONS ON A THEME BY MOZART which was also musical and thoroughly enjoyable. It was a paradoxical evening in which we were in turn attacked, shocked, then soothed and elevated. But through it all Du Pre and Barenboim communicated a feeling of total commitment and incapable involvement, which after all is the hallmark of true musicians.

THE STEVE MILLER BAND, Your Saving Grace, Capitol SK 40 331.

Very quiet and refined type of bluesy rock. For what it is, it's good and pleasant to listen to. Miller never does anything hard or spectacular in his music, but he maintains a fine balance between restrained instrumentation and harmonious voices. A couple of the songs on the album are low-key arrangements of Negro spirituals. There are also some soft rock ballads with piano and organ. At times Miller is vaguely reminiscent of Blind Faith.

BLUES ROOTS, Poppy 60,003
About a year ago, Arthoole records, which has the best catalogue of native makes critical chopsticks out of any other work written for the instrument. But Miss Hidy is no mere technician, for she tackled this protean opus with incisive understanding and after forty minutes of double and triple stops, harmonics, pizzicatos and octaves it seemed there was nothing she couldn't do, musically or technically. An internationally famous concert violinist since age 18, Hungarian-born Marta Hidy is also concert mistress and assistant conductor of the Hamilton Philharmonic and head of the music department at McMaster University. I don't know how she does it, either.

good as ever

The composer, Mme. Eckhardt-Grammatke, is also a former concert violinist and the Suite reflects great familiarity with the idiom. Unfortunately her mastery of the medium exceeds the depth of her message, producing a work with technical difficulties far in excess of musical import. By comparison, Bela Bartok achieves more music with less effort in his Sonata for Solo Violin. Considering then this doubly difficult work of technical complexity and musical elusiveness, Miss Hidy's accomplishment seems all the more impressive.

The second part of the evening consisted of the Trio No. 2 (Op.66) by Mendelssohn. Miss Hidy was joined by George Horvath, cello, and Leo Barkin, piano. Miss Hidy is a soloist, Mr. Horvath an orchestral player, Mr. Barkin an accompanist. Given an ad hoc ensemble of such diverse persuasions, Mendelssohn was bound to take a beating. As it turned out, Barkin won by a decisive fortissimo, swamping both his worshiper colleagues' efforts and Mendelssohn's intents with great gusts of pedal-propelled sound. Horvath, who to be perfectly honest, did miss a cue here on a passage there, was never noticed in the great commotion. Only at times did they manage to vibrate around Miss Hidy's ever-steady violin playing. It's a shame that such an exciting evening should conclude with three musicians, who are perfectly competent in their respective media, cast adrift in a difficult chamber setting, apparently after minimal rehearsal. It showed them all in less than the best light, not to speak of Mendelssohn. Better we should have had a complete evening of Marta Hidy's art.

Fortunately, the band got stronger as the evening went on, and the second show was a different story. Kenny Baker, a sensational fiddler from Kentucky, really came to life and in turn seemed to inspire Bill to greater heights. His relaxed playing in Monroe's presence helped to relax the other musicians, and he was the main reason the band began to sound so good. Baker's fiddling truly brought out the best in Monroe, who, as one avid fan remarked, sounded better that night than he had in four years.

When the band played Orange Blossom Special, it brought the house down. The audience was so responsive that Bill allowed Baker to cut loose on two more fiddle tunes, Big Sandy River and Soldier's Joy. These last three numbers were by far the best numbers in an artistically satisfying concert. The sound of Monroe and Baker swapping lightning fast solos roused the audience and had them yelling for more as Bill played his standard wrap-up piece, Y'All Come.

and long shots in clarity. Where the sixteen millimeter achieves its best effect, though, is through a limited vision, centering upon an object — Ravi Shankar's thumping toes, acres of clapping palms or the rhythmic tapping of an individual finger.

The film succeeds in creating a mood and establishing a rapport by projecting, and thus magnifying, closely-cut images of audience and performer. The theater audience is invited to join in with any of a hundred, sunnied music freaks in that very personal, yet public, communion between musician and listener, which the music creates and the film records and recreates. Monterey Pop splatters images onto the screen from floating helicopters, from backstage or from the audience, through coloured filters or natural night light, and all these images flow aggressively and confusedly — sometimes with the music, other times against it — along the fluid celluloid medium. From beginning to end, the Monterey International Pop Festival was a celebration and in the end, Monterey Pop recreated and enlarged that event, and invited us to celebrate also.

ludwig is odd man out jacqui 'n dan

No question about it, British cellist JAQUELINE DU PRE is a first class performer of immense talent. However, at last Thursday's sold-out Massey Hall recital several of us in the audience wished that she had performed a little less and played more. There is no denying that Du Pre is the best cellist of her generation and one of the best of any generation now concertizing, but every-thing she does is so permeated with idiosyncrasies both of gesture and musical approach that, in her all-Bethoven program, old Ludwig was often relegated to the supporting cast. Here be found himself in the congenial company of husband-accompanist DANIEL BARENBOIM who is a true Beethovenian, and often took the opposite approach to Miss Du Pre in the three Sonatas they performed.

A major problem confronting the solo cellist in a huge concert hall is one of sound projection. Du Pre projected very well, at the cost of some very aggressive playing. Passages of notes were bowed individually, staccato, howling close to (and often with) the frog of the bow. The F MAJOR SONATA (OP.5, NO.1), a fast youthful work with little lyricism to start with, suffered greatly through its care-ful treatment. Barenboim's care-versions of Sunny and the Beatles Revolution, but the Fudge's ability to add some new dimension to other people's songs is conspicuously missing here. There are also a few bars from an old recording of the overture to Mozart's opera, The Magic Flute, thrown in somewhere just to blow your mind. Weird, really weird.

JOE COCKER, A & M 4234

Can you dig country soul? This is more relaxed than his first album. The horns and backup gtr's are gone, so his voice comes across with more feeling. He even makes Something from Abbey Road sound as ever. Particularly good is Dear Landlord with an up-tempo, funky beat that becomes really effective when Cocker stops the show with his singing.

CHARLEY PRIDE, The Best of... RCA LSP 4233

One of the most popular stars in the C & W pantheon, Country Charley is always a pleasure to listen to. This great-est hit album is Charley at his best. This black man has captured the essence of pure country sound, and his material is delivered with feeling and delicate control. He lays it all down nicely.

TAJ MAHAL, giant Step De Ole Folks at Home, Columbia GP 18

Taj Mahal's leanings towards both blues roots and a soul rock sound have been separated in this two record album, giving one good record and one not so good. The good volume is Giant Step, where the band gets into some tight rock and soul numbers with more or less blues overtones depending on the song. The band has improved considerably since the first Taj Mahal album. Less good is De Ole Folks at Home, featuring Taj Mahal alone on guitar, banjo, or harmonica. He shows that he can be an engaging performer, but his grasp of the instrumental techniques isn't def-initely enough for him to record alone. The deficiencies will be particularly noticeable to anyone who is familiar with the Gary Davis, John Hurt, and Leadbelly material on which he draws.

PETER SERKIN, Mozart: Fantasia, Sonatas and Rondos, RCA LSC 7062 (2 record set)

Young Peter Serkin seems to out-ecel-erate his famous pianist father in the ultra-introspective treatment of the Fantasia. In the C minor Fantasia, every note is firmly established and re-out a very good two volume sampler. Now Poppy records have also released two volumes drawn from the same catalogue, and this set is even better. The music ranges from the country blues of Fred McDowell, Big Joe Williams and others, to the recent Chicago sounds of John Littlejohn and Earl Hooker. A wide range of styles is covered and the per-ormances are uniformly good. Some of the others in the set are Big Mama Thornton, Booker White, Black Ace, and Jesse Fuller.

THE CHURLS, Send Me No Flowers, A & M 4233

The second album by this Canadian group is terrible. The music is contrived from all the possible permutations of three chords. The lyrics are random combinations of clichés and stock phrases about love — caricatures of the twelve year old mind. The songs relate to nothing, fall in no tradition nor are they creative and imaginative. The Churls are appropriately named — vulgar, uninspired, debased.

ARTHUR "BIG BOY" CRUDUP, Crudup's Mood, Delmark 621

Big Boy Crudup was a very popular artist on the Victor race issues of the 1940's. In the 50's he recorded only occasionally and then spent ten years in obscurity before being brought back to the recording studios by Delmark records. The engineering on this record is not very good which may bother some people, but I like his second Delmark album anyway. It's an old sound and a pleasant change from the searing guitar styles of today. Crudup's approach has changed little since the 40's, and he still plays an early amplified guitar with character-istically muffled tone. The chords are slow and easygoing, the vocals relaxed, and the accompaniments simple. Good straightforward blues in a style one doesn't often hear anymore.

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Eric Leinsdorf, cond. Mozart, Symphonies No. 36 & 39, RCA LSC 31097

The Boston Symphony has been getting kicked in the shins recently. One critic called it a "first-rate orchestra doing second rate work," another said it was "a great but sick orchestra." This record does nothing to prove the critics wrong. There's nothing especially bad about it, and it even has some exciting moments, but it has too many weak points and too much of a general lack of class to be recommended.

ning out little hard edged lines, one gem after another, all connected coherently. His new group seems to have given him new life. Or maybe he just feels he has to work harder to pull the whole thing together. At any rate, his music is still fresh, and he's playing rather more of it than on his previous visits.

After hearing Monk, we wandered up to Le Fauche on Avenue Rd. where Sonny Greenwich has been giving some fine recitals lately. The set we heard last Saturday was absolutely superb. I especially enjoyed the two medium-tempo ballads in which the guitarist's intense lyrical feeling emerged.

Besides the long, complex lines of the leader, the group also features Don Thompson's fluent, thick-textured piano work. Both Thompson and bassist Rick Homme (a 19-year-old Torontonian) make excellent contributions to the music. So would drummer Terry Clarke, if he could just restrain himself. Though his ideas fit in very well with Greenwich's modern conception of music, he does seem rather messy and too frantic.

But on the whole, this band is playing some of the best music I've heard anywhere for a long time. Let's hope jazz lovers make it to hear Sonny Greenwich while they have the chance. Greenwich will be featured at a Toronto jazz festival to be held Sunday, Feb. 22, at the St. Lawrence Centre. Produced by the owner of Le Fauche, the festival will present Lennie Breau, Russ Little, and others. Dig it now, because all this jazz activity seems just too good to last.

once more. His style has a directness and simplicity that makes him unique on the scene today. With his supple beat, great swing, and sensitive feeling for Monk's rhythms, Ware is able to give Monk the solid support his music demands but has not often enough received of late.

Completing the rhythm section is Beaver Harris, who has often played with Archie Shepp and others on the New York "avant garde" scene. Surprisingly enough, he sticks to quite conventional, even unusually simple, accompaniment, and in fact swings perfectly.

Excusing the absence of his perennial saxophonist Charlie Rouse, Monk claims that Rouse is now studying to be an actor. Not a likely story. The replacement is Pat Patrick, who has been associated with Sun Ra (he of the solar arkestra.) With his parodies of bebop lines and his reed squeaks and other "new" sounds, Patrick seems a very incongruent element in the group.

Monk himself remains very much the same as ever. A superbly individual pianist, he has created a style of by now classic simplicity and purity. Not that there is anything easy about what he does. The tricky rhythms and dissonances are by now familiar, and can even be imitated to some extent. But in the creation of genuine musical ideas, Monk has few equals.

He was particularly inventive last Saturday night, spin-stormy monday blues

otis spann

bill smith-coda

this will be the first time he has played anywhere in Canada. Like B. B. King only a short while ago, his many years of touring out of his home base Houston, Texas, had all been in the black communities of the States. Last Saturday, in Detroit, I was one of maybe a hundred white faces in an audience of 25,000 who had come to the Olympia Arena (home of the Red Wings) to hear "The Big Show of '70." Dee Dee Warwick was there, as were The Magic-Tones, Lee Hayes, Betty Lavette, The Detroit Emeralds and others, but the two acts that really got that huge crowd responding were Toronto's own Parliaments/Funkadelics group and Bobby Bland.

A week from Monday, on the 23rd, Texas soul meets Chicago blues at Massey Hall when Bobby Bland will share a bill with Buddy Guy and Otis Spann in the first of what one hopes will be a successful series of Blue Monday concerts.

Buddy Guy has appeared several times in Toronto in the past couple of years and most blues fans are familiar with his strong, modern guitar style. Otis Spann's piano playing was a mainstay in the Muddy Waters band for a great many years, and it was only very recently that he left to play on his own. This will be his first appearance in Toronto since he left the band.

For Bobby Bland though,

The Parliaments and Funkadelics were appreciated for being flashy and dirty and very tight. Bobby Bland made it because he had soul. On one number, a girl in front of me shouted out "that's it, that's the one. Sing that song, Bobby," and that's pretty much how the whole audience was reacting to the man. When he sang the well known Stormy Monday Blues, a ripple of expectation went through the crowd as he got to his knees singing the line "and on Sunday I go to church and I get down on my knees and I begin to pray," and when he got to "God have mercy," a roar went up to greet the familiar line.

The Toronto audience ten days from now won't be re-bobby bland

sponding the same way to familiar tunes because Bobby Bland is a new sound here. It's virtually impossible to get his Duke albums without sending to Texas for them. Some of his songs, notably Good Time Charlie and Turn on Your Love Light have already gained some reputation by being sung by others, and it's good to have the chance to hear the man himself sing them, backed by his band which includes tenors, trumpets and a trombone.

It looks like it ought to be some night. Lonnie Johnson, still suffering the effects of being hit by a car, says that he's going to sing a number, and it's even possible that B. B. King will show up to join the proceedings. But whatever the combination of performers, it should be a great show.

margaret laurence part two

It makes you sort of smug when a hunch proves to be true, even if it's a pessimistic one. When I talked to Margaret Laurence back in September, I told her that I didn't think she'd find very many women coming to see the Writer-In-Residence.

Now, with her term drawing to a close Mrs. Laurence, one of the best-known Canadian novelists, says it is, in fact, one of the most obvious things about her stay here.

At first she worried about whether enough people would come. But she didn't worry long. People responded very well and now she complains that there almost isn't enough time. But still very few women.

It's very hard to put your finger on the cause. Obviously it's a result of the societal oppression of women but the nature of that oppression here becomes obscure when you consider as Mrs. Laurence says, "more than half of the really good novelists in Britain are women."

But then perhaps the fact that women have begun to discover the power in political organizing here and at other Canadian universities is the main reason. Organizing around alienation is usually more effective than writing poems about same even though the former may be more aesthetically pleasing in the short run.

What about the people who did consult Margaret Laurence? "There was hardly anybody writing novels. Most students just don't have the time. But there are a few good short story writers and very many good poets. Some of the poets are going to be very good."

"Very few of them are ready to submit their work to professional publications but a few are and I've given them advice on whom to contact."

She's obtained some very clear impressions about campus writers despite limitations. "Most of the work is pretty personal. Very little of it is of a social nature. But I don't think that's necessarily bad. I think the best work is based in a personal sense and reflects the social implications on the individual."

I hastened to add that the best personal writing comes when a person comes to a full realization of his own tradition. Most young writers (and a few old ones) are so involved in trying to overcome their backgrounds that they completely ignore it in their writing or are very false about it.

Margaret Laurence fully agreed. "A writer has to forge his own mythology. He has to say 'these are my roots' and he must come to term with them. So many write as if the past doesn't exist and they don't realize that in a few years their grandfathers will be more real than they themselves."

What form do most of the works take? "Some of the forms are very weird, very unorthodox. And that's a good thing most of the time because it makes you question yourself about what are cliches. Some of them have a real freshness. Some of them don't."

"The two writers I think have the most influence on the writers I've seen have been William Burroughs in the realm of drugs and Tolkien in the realm of legend and myth. Many students write about myths but most of them, unfortunately are not very derivative. And, of course most of the poets are influenced by Leonard Cohen. I don't have anything against Cohen. I think he's marvellous, but I do get the impression too many people are copying him."

Next year Margaret Laurence intends to go back to England and work on a new novel, the details of which she refused politely to divulge. "I'm very superstitious that way."

Next year's writer in residence is just in the process of being looked for and Mr. Dickinson, assistant to the President says that student suggestions are welcomed (oh boy!).

If you have any ideas, send them in to the Office Of the President before the end of next week or go see him about it. Invite him to lunch. Bribe him. Or something like that.

Imported for the occasion of an Irish studies seminar on campus last weekend, Smock Alley, or The Fortunes of an Eighteenth-Century Theatre is being unexpectedly held over at Central Library Theatre until 17 February. After seeing a sold-out performance of the show, the news of its extension leaves me pleased and surprised, but slightly more pleased than surprised.

Surprise derives from the box office success so far of an historical musical entertainment which pastes snippets of information and sentiment into a collage evoking Ireland's "century of elegance . . . an era of gaiety and social ease." A frame is supplied by the 150-year history of Dublin's Theatre Royal. And who, I would have asked before seeing the show, wants to look at a recreation of "the feel of a small capital and of a leisured class that makes slander a vocation"? Eighteenth-century scholars, maybe, and professional Irishmen, and of course theatre historians. Not much of a market.

But Smock Alley reaches out from this limited range of interest by virtue of its thorough-going and good-tempered professionalism, which is likewise the source of the pleasure it provides. Some of the professionalism is to be found in the material out of which it is constructed. Maureen Charlton's narration manages to bring impressionistic order to disparate direct quotes from the best theatrical pros of the English-speaking world of the time — everything from a Lord and Lady Teazle bitching scene in Sheridan's School for Scandal to an operetta reeking with clumsy pastoral allusions to a pun that should have Congreve squirming for shame in his grave ("The more whores the pity.")

What perpetuates the scripted professionalism is the multi-role performances of the four-man cast: Bill Golding, Liam O'Callaghan, Louise Studley and Ita Darcy. Somewhere along the line of a performer's career there may come a point at which he is so sure of his on-stage self, his role(s), the rest of the company and his audience that he will have gauged the ideal combination of all four within minutes after curtain and can spend the rest of the show playing them off to their mutual advantage. Such is Mr. Golding, an actor capable of upstaging anyone with shameless delight simply by changing the line of his jaw or spine.

Switching unpredictably from well-rehearsed stylizations to apparent impromptu, he reaps and reflects the most obvious relish of his double jeopardy as actor and character. But the rest of the company certainly function as far more than his foils: Mr. O'Callaghan deftly switches from narrator to a variety of underling (so established by his accents) roles; Miss Darcy, with her enticingly uneven smile, seems to have been created to play ingenues; and Miss Studley's timing of the character of nervous actress matched the pitch of her singing.

What redeems their polish from slickness is the rapport they quickly establish with the audience. It is not a matter of trying or even pretending to tear down boundaries between theatre and life: the stage remains a stage and the audience remains literally in the dark. It is more like the atmosphere prevailing at a good party, a recognition that cast and audience are together in the same place and time, creating there a little enchanted circle unthreatened by tangents from the world outside the theatre.

If this be other-worldiness, Smock Alley's company makes the very most of it, — in spite of their confession that "we were scared to death to come to Toronto, bringing a show out of its location." Golden worlds such as the one Smock Alley laughs into existence — and then embellishes with tawny and rosy velvet and eminently civilized props like wineglasses filled with genuine (I checked) Mommessin — really have no location but a stage.

While John Lennon has always enthralled me as a songwriter, his excursions into PR for marriage and peace have left me, so far, disenchanted. But it gratifies my sense of symmetry to report that he is now responsible, with the help of adaptors Adrienne Kennedy and Victor Spinetti, for one of the most charming plays to come along in quite a while. His musical achievements now have some company in excellence.

Adapted from Lennon's two books, In His Own Write (the play) thrives under Martin Kinch's ebullient direction at Theatre Passe Muraille. The theatre company has been having financial difficulties recently — it actually closed down for a month, and was reinvigorated for this production because some of the company were able to work without pay for a while.

The present play is no exception to the company's usual outstanding regard for both the integrity and the possibilities of a dramatic work. When I say it is charming, I do not mean that it is easily dismissable as gauzy, though cheerful, entertainment only. As adapted, In His Own Write is a devastatingly accurate evocation of childhood's end. Bill Cosby works in much the same manner; the humor of the telling is integral to the experiences — maternal conflicts, sexual awakening, rejection of religion and of father's business — yet the events themselves are, taken cold, fearful. The comedy of the play is as central to the story of the hero Mc's gradual desertion as, God help me, pain is to childbirth.

And the company, led by Ashleigh Moorehouse as the physical and verbal contortionist Me, are more than merely competent: their energy and precision are positively inspiring. The production uses verbal clarity — no mean trick with a word-magician like Ennaboo — and physical agility with enviable interaction.

Paul McCartney remarked in his introduction to the book version, "None of it has to make sense and if it seems funny then that's enough." Thanks to shape-givers Kennedy, Spinetti, and Kinch — and lifebreathers Moorehouse, Savage, and Steinhouse — the play version both does make sense and is, not merely seems, funny; which is even better than before.

Also on the bill is a well-executed nonentity called Sweet Eros. (I do not mention the author's name in order to spare the honor of his family.) Studies of madness are disgustingly difficult to keep from looking contrived and pretentiously "meaningful." Though Gordon May and Margaret Keith strive valiantly to make you forget this difficulty, the author is there to sabotage them every time. The rape of normality by insanity as a metaphor has been better days, if indeed there ever were any. The play tells you more about the playwright's hangups than about either character or about the state of the world. This play comes first on the hill, and it is a good beginning; light looks all the brighter for the presence of shadows, and In His Own Write justly benefits from the juxtaposition. The sensible madness of the Leinoo play is supercompensation for the diversionary pointlessness of Sweet Eros. But were there two such excellent plays on the same program, I wouldn't be writing a review but a fan letter.

honky-tonk woman

The country people invaded Massey Hall last Saturday and as usual a good time was had by all. Carl Smith who runs the Country Music Hall show on CTV got the program off to a very shaky start. Known for his high silver hair and seal-like manner of holding his guitar, this man has had some very big hits and deservedly so. But in the last few years, he's grown fat and lazy. Few country artists would even dream of putting on such a poor show as he did. He displayed no enthusiasm and was extremely tasteless in singing about how the girl he loved went off with Johnny Cash (June Carter, now married to CASH, was once his wife).

Faron Young, "The Singing Sheriff" and his excellent band, The Deputies really started things moving. Faron Young has been at the top for years and keeps working. A real country gentleman, with grace and a mellow voice. His imitations of Hank Snow and Hank Williams were very convincing and full of gentle humour. At the end of his show he sang a paean to Canada and left leaving a warm happy feeling.

The night I let you
Hang my wings upon your horns
And turn my halo
Into thorns.

Pure honky tonk and sparkling. Loretta Lynn, sweet, plaintive, stomping C&W. My, my, it goes down just fine. Loretta wailed sad and happy songs of the woes and merits of the fair sex in their continuing battle with the horny beasts. Little sister Peggy Sue sang a few tunes and nearly upstaged elder sister. The audience helped select the music, the Instamatics flashed, the Carolina whine was sweet. A nice time with the Country People.

we get letters

Larry Haiven should be congratulated on his remarkably terse, absolutely meaningless, unenlightening blurb, A Drag in Drag in last Friday's Review, on one of the few original student dramas presented on this campus, namely, Graham Jackson's To the Hollow. If anything is a drag it would have to be Larry Haiven's insensitive, limited view. Triteness and coyness seldom substitute well enough for honest, thinking criticism. But the less said about the 'review' the better, as L. H. himself seems to think.

The Varsity's primary abuse of student funds and student readership lies in the apparent Varsity Review policy of ignoring and discouraging campus student theatre. The greener pastures of big-time 'art' movies and professional Toronto theatre seem more attractive to the energies of the Review staff. The Varsity Review would greatly profit by leaving facetious word games to those who are paid for it. Perhaps the Varsity could reconsider its review policy and delving deep into its cognizance, somehow bring to light its primary concern — theatre, music and art at U of T.

Dorothy M. MacKinnon (Vic II)

In answer to both your letter and that of Ian Young which appeared in Monday's Varsity, may I say that you are right in criticizing my review of To

The Hollow. It was rather hastily done and exhibits a great deal of neglect on my part. None of my reactions to the play have changed. I don't think it is a very good play. Nevertheless, I feel I must explain the circumstances behind the fact that some campus productions, notably Richard Murphet's production of Deconstruction and the above have received such hasty and necessarily patchwork reviews.

Because of press deadlines, we try to save a little room for events happening Wednesday nights. That usually turns out to be on the backpage. But we must give priority to material that comes in earlier. Usually plays starting Wednesday nights end on the weekend and it is too late the next week to review them (this week's review of UC Follies is an exception).

Sometimes it would seem better not to run a review at all rather than a short, unfavourable one, but that's a very hard thing to decide. The review of To The Hollow I must admit, was totally unsatisfactory. We tried to get a dress rehearsal on Tuesday night but it had been held Monday.

As for your charge of the Review not covering campus events adequately, I think that if you drop your outrage for a minute and actually look at some back issues you'll find you're wrong.

Michael Snow's New York Eye and Ear

Whether it's the haystacks of Monet or the squares of Albers, the tradition of aesthetic research has never been overwhelmingly popular in Canada but it is part of the reason that the work of Michael Snow stands out as it does.

Since the fifties Snow concentrated on several interests through the use of one motif — the walking woman. Put in reflective nickel on a street corner, flat-surfaced wood construction in a gallery, or used multiply as a support for a brilliant series of positive-negative relationships, the walking woman has been ambulating amongst us for a long time. Possibly too long.

So to remedy that familiar myopia and to put Snow's work into some kind of perspective, Dennis Young, Curator of Contemporary Art at the Art Gallery of Ontario, has assembled 148 paintings, sculpture, collage and 8 films. The exhibit opens to the public tomorrow and may be seen through March 22. The exercise is characteristic of the new use of the retrospective — in that, instead of defining an artist's style, it shows what he has done and what future possibilities exist. However by calling the retrospective a "Survey" no further debasement of the term takes place, at least by the AGO.

This "Survey", then, gives Toronto audiences a chance to see the variety of Michael Snow's concerns, how far he went beyond them in the sixties, and the results of his previous work in sculpture (like Aluminum and Lead of 1968.)

In an interview with him earlier this week he said that he felt Aluminum and Lead was an important piece to him, but not much more. With the advantage of objectivity, Dennis Young suggested that the broader question involved was "Which is more important — the image or the material?" In Aluminum and Lead both questions are skirted; material usage versus literal idea. This conundrum characterized his last show at the Isaacs Gallery where literature and theatricality too often precluded success.

But Snow is both diverse and prolific, being quite capable of taking that idea and making a success of it in less ambitious pieces, namely the Portrait of 1967 (aluminum bars and clamps forming a square between two closely-placed walls, a kind of "empty" frame). It is this kind of sophistication (which is not the same thing as quality) that presently separates Snow from his Canadian counterparts — if they exist.

Seeing a Michael Snow is a distinctively different kind of viewing from what has come to be the "usual" in Toronto galleries. He reflects the high level of appreciation that New York can give an artist and the strength that centre demands. He said he went there because "being in contact would make me better at what I do." But while he still feels this influence, he doesn't consider that the artistic climate of New York has had a great effect on him. Snow's attitude is that his interior development isn't particularly indebted to anyone. During our conversation the only figure whose influence he admitted was that of John Cage — and that was in the sense of a reaction to him.

Typical of artists who can paint still lifes during revolutions, Snow talked about the social problems in the U.S.:

"No question that there's a crisis". But in his view the activity of art remains essential to the human condition. In art, he says, "The idealism is there already . . . we supply the refinements . . . why we're here, etc. . . ."

What I find so odd about this viewpoint and the argument in general is that the work it applies to does not deal with either spiritual essentials or refinements on the naked ape. Recent art is increasingly self-contained and self-referential. The criticism could be extended to all abstract art in that it has concerned itself with its own materials and inner necessities rather than the great social questions of the moment. But the art of this past decade has been, especially in the minor movements, lightweight stuff. Does one really find satisfying spiritual values in the art of Oldenburg, Warhol, Morris, or Judd — or Snow? Are we seeing yet another twist in the Emfinsamer Stil?

Snow's answer is that "I try to make experiences that are powerful. My films have been shown all over the world. I know they have changed lives. I know that." He used his wife Joyce Weiland's film Rat Life and Diet as an example of the kind of comment that fits his view. He believes that it is a film that will last, that people will continue to find it interesting for its construction, colour, organization; in short its art. The fact that it is an acidic vision of American life is agreeably incidental.

(Both Rat Life and Diet and Wavelength will be shown at Cinema — Lumiere, on Feb. 25).

There are a variety of interests in Snow's own films. The purely plastic treatment of the medium in much the same way a painter uses paint becomes very important for him. He finds no threat at all of a literal idea taking over, and remains unharmed by the myth of ephemera that still clings to the celluloid artist. Doing, the activity itself, is much of Snow's art. Whether it lasts until the year three thousand or not is beside the point.

But this idea of process, while general to his work, takes on specific concerns in his films, namely sound and movement in relation to purely visual information. Music organizes time through sound and film by colour and movement. What Snow wants to achieve is the fusion of these elements, which is the success of Wavelength. The soundtrack is a glissando going from 50 cycles per second to 1500 over the course of 40 minutes. The treatment is highly individual, and as P. Adams Sitney notes in his article in the exhibition book, it relates to Andy Warhol's Sleep (showing a man sleeping for several hours).

But where content in the Warhol film is important it is less so in Snow's. His treatment is the thing — and that is considerably more plastic. As Snow said, "It's just a bunch of coloured lights." Eight of Snow's films will be shown on four Thursday evenings at the Art Gallery of Ontario. They are extremely important for anyone interested in the new uses of the medium and two will be shown for the first time. A-Z, New York Eye and Ear Control, Standard Time, and Dripping Water will be shown Feb. 19 and March 12, Back and Forth, and One Second in Montreal on March 5 and 19.

Dennis Young has assembled this exhibit with the idea of presenting Snow "not as a single-minded artist following one path. It's much more inclusive, to give a broad view. . . . He has always been interested . . . in the question of the philosophic status of the work he's doing. In the early fifties he was raising these questions although not consistently . . . the woman emerged through different materials and style."

He noted Snow's interest in the work of Paul Klee and its similar literary content relating his ideas of the fifties and early sixties to those of Duchamp. Although Michael Snow likes the work of Chambers, Curnoe, and the "Rabinoevae" Dennis Young considers him entirely exterior to Canadian Art in that he has always recognized New York as the centre of ferment.

THEATRE

Celebrate Valentine's Day tomorrow at 8:30 at the Global Village with Layton, Penelope, Hawkins, an evening of poetry and song by these authors. The theatre is at 17 St. Nicholas Street (between Bay and Yonge, near Wellesley), and $3 tickets can be reserved by phoning 920-8170.

Then, if you're not off skiing or writing essays, celebrate Reading Week with Zorba, which opens at two-week run at the O'Keefe on Monday the 16th. Or go to the annual revue Spring Thaw, which officially opens at the Playhouse on the same evening. Nearer campus, there's Smock Alley at Central Library through 21 February, and the Victoria Music Club production of Mame at Hart House Theatre through tomorrow evening.

And down at Theatre Passe Muraille (11 Trinity Square, just west of Yonge below Dundas), John Lennon's In His Own Write continues indefinitely at 8:30 Tuesdays through Saturdays. For the sake of an abjectly depressing evening (if that sounds absurd, you should see the show) and for the support of one of Toronto's most inspired theatrical outfits, don't miss it.

MUSIC

ROSTROPOVICH, with the exception of Casals the world's most famous cellist, will play two concerts with the Toronto Symphony next Tuesday and Wednesday. Lawrence Foster will be the guest conductor in a programme which will include Mozart's G minor Symphony, No. 40 and Haydn's Cello Concerto in C.

DUKE ELLINGTON also plays with the TSO, tomorrow night at 8:30. For other jazz, THELONIOUS MONK is still at the Colonial through tomorrow, followed by WILD BILL DAVISON and the JAZZ GIANTS who open there Monday.

BRIAN BROWNE plays regularly at Castle George, and the SONNY GREENWICH quartet is again at Le Fauch  (169 Avenue Rd.) Sets generally begin after midnight, Thurs.-Sun.

For folk music, MICHAEL COONEY is playing at the Onion through Sunday. JOHN HAMMOND is at the Riverboat, and TIM HARDIN will be there next week - he opens on Monday which is usually the dark night at the Riverboat.

BLUE MONDAY is the title of a blues concert coming to Massey Hall on the 23rd, a week from Monday. Featured artists will be BUDDY GUY, BOBBY BLAND and OTIS SPANN. GEORGE KENT is the C & W attraction at the Horse-shoe Tavern this week, next week it's BOBBY BARE. On Sat., the 21st, PORTER WAGONNER, DOLLY PARTON and DAVID HOUSTON are bringing a country show into Massey Hall. Looking ahead somewhat, BUCK OWENS is coming to Maple Leaf Gardens on March 1st, bringing with him some of the regulars from the Hee Haw TV show.

JOHNNY WINTER returns to Massey Hall Sunday night with his blues sound. ZOOM, a rock group from Windsor is at the Hawks Next Saturday night only. Next Saturday it'll be the FROST.

The Toronto Jazz Festival will occupy the St. Lawrence Centre on Sunday, Feb. 22. Sonny Greenwich and his excellent quartet will play, along with trombonist Russ Little, guitarist Lennie Breau, legendary organist Smitty, and other local jazzmen.

COFFEE AND DISCUSSION
AFTER CONCLUSION OF SERVICE

SUNDAY, FEB. 15th 11 a.m.
FIRST UNITARIAN CONG.
175 St. Clair Ave. West at Avenue Rd.

By TREVOR SPURR
The Political Economy Course Union yesterday presented a letter to department chairman W. T. Easterbrook seeking a specific forum to deal with the continuing crisis over the appointment of Stefan Dupré as chairman to replace Easterbrook.

The letter cites the growing concern among students over the absence of any student participation in the selection of Dupré, and asks negotiations be started for "student representation in decision-making in the department, particularly as it concerns those decisions affecting faculty appointments."

The PECU, at a general assembly meeting on Feb. 10, adopted a motion declaring Dupré's appointment "null and void because students were not at all consulted."

The letter also said, "it is almost inconceivable that the department and faculty should so completely disregard the principles of trust openness, and mutual interest which underlie even the most conservative proposals for university reform".

The PECU has requested a reply to the letter by Feb. 25, the date of the next general meeting of the union when further strategy will be debated.

"Possible future moves could include a strike by the students or a sit-in", said Peter Hall, president of the union.

He added "right now the buck seems to have been passed all the way up to Bissell".

Hall along with Fred Dreger, Chairman of the Graduate Association of Students in Political Science, and Gary Webster (SGS), went to see Professor Dupré in his office, yesterday afternoon.

"Dupré said he doesn't have anything to say about his selection since he was not responsible for his own appointment", said Von Dreger last night.

"By inference, however, he was not in favour of students helping in the selection of the Chairman," he added.

Dupré also said he would not put his position concerning student participation in decision-making down on paper for anyone, nor would he presently consider speaking to students at an open meeting.

A meeting of all graduate students in the Political Economy department is to be held on Feb. 23 in which the "null and void" resolution of the PECU will be discussed and voted on.

"The present reaction I'm getting from fellow students tends to be in line with what the course union passed", said Von Dreger.

Although he could not speculate as to the nature of any grad strategy he added, "if the motion is a serious one then the action could be a serious one".

"There is no doubt the situation is critical", he said.

What did you learn in school today?

By PETER BEYER

"Much of the present education appears to be operational—based on the assumption, 'You can't trust the student'. Acting on this assumption, the teacher must supply motivation, information, organization of material, and must use examinations . . . at every turn to coerce the student into the desired activities.

The (student-centered) approach . . . is based on the assumption diametrically opposed, that 'You can trust the student'. You can trust him to desire to learn in every way which will maintain or enhance himself; you can trust him to make use of resources which will serve this end; you can trust him to evaluate himself in ways which will make for self-progress; you can trust him to grow, provided the atmosphere for growth is available to him."

—Carl Rogers

There is a course in this university, offered by Innis College which embodies the above mentioned "student-centered approach". It is known as CIN 193. Although it may not be the only course run along student-centered lines, it is, to my knowledge, the only one which leaves the educational experience almost entirely under the control of the individual student.

In relating some of my experiences with this course over the last few months, I cannot seriously speak for anyone but myself. When education is made largely an individual matter, it is difficult to generalize. No doubt, some of the other students in the course are disappointed and feel that the whole thing has been a waste of time and that it did not get them anywhere.

However, I am convinced that there are at least equally as many who have shared my more positive experiences.

At the beginning of the semester, I entered the course not knowing what to expect. The calendar had been vague enough and general enough to make me feel that it was worth a try. The first couple of meetings can be described by the word anarchy. Many students, including myself, were surprised to learn that course content, evaluation, classroom structure, teaching method, in short everything was almost entirely up to us, the students.

This very fact and the first two or three rather chaotic meetings were enough to scare off a number of students. For many the prospect of having to control their own educational experience was too much for them to handle.

After about a month, those of us who remained in the course managed to settle down a tiny bit and vaguely decide what it was that we wanted to do. We divided ourselves up into what turned out to be about four main groups. Each group met where and when it wanted. Some students did not even join a group. Some still haven't.

The general topic of the group which I 'joined' was education. The first few meetings of this group were just as confusing as the plenary sessions had been at the beginning of the year. I had trouble deciding exactly what it was that I wanted to do in this course. However this problem solved itself for the most part as I became used to the idea of deciding such things for myself.

Gradually I began to realize that something was happening. I found myself doing more work than for most of my other courses and not only enjoying it more but also learning more relative to the effort I was putting into it. The removal of the threat of teacher evaluation made everything so much simpler. I learned what I wanted to learn, when I wanted to learn it, and at my own pace. It was and is the first time in my life when a part of my formal education was tailor-made to suit my needs and interests. My other, more traditional courses began to piss me off even more than they had before. But, you may ask yourself what the difference was between this and just going out on your own and learning such things outside the formal system. I think the most fundamental difference is the 'classes'. The meetings, as I mentioned before were at first confusing and lacked direction.

They still lack direction in that there is no such thing as a set curriculum. But for me much of the confusion has gone out of them. Throughout the year I had the feeling that we were making steady progress in these areas. Even though the meetings were at times discouraging, I was learning something at almost each one, even if it was only the fact that we had as yet not solved some basic problems. It wasn't until late January that we really began to 'get somewhere' and then it wasn't planned, it just happened. Undoubtedly, one of the hardest things to learn in such a free environment is how to communicate in a group with minimal structure.

This was by no means the only problem which we faced and are facing. A guy who has had the desire to learn knocked out of him for fourteen years, will usually find such a changed environment difficult to adjust to. I have found it mildly difficult to ignore the traditional teacher-student relationship. I have also experienced difficulty in motivating myself to work.

This is the first year for CIN 193. It has been in a very experimental stage. Many difficulties in adjusting to a student-centered environment must yet be overcome. It must be made potentially meaningful to a greater number of students. The course has shown, to me at least, that the student-centered method works — better, much better in fact, than the system to which I am being subjected now. The main problem is to convince members of that system (teachers and students alike) that this is so.

Most of the articles which appear in this column are to say the least, critical of the present educational system.

And well they should be. For the most part, what you and I are going through right now is to put it mildly, shitty. Here at least is the beginning of an alternative happening right under our noses. I can only hope that it continues to happen and expand!

The composition of a new top governing structure of the university will have a direct influence on all students of the university, as it will have a profound effect on the style and content of education at the university.

There is a questionnaire being mailed to all students next week. It will ask for opinions on a future top governing structure for the university, and on the structure of a University-Wide Committee which was proposed by the C.U.G. Programming Committee, a body with three faculty and three students. The proposed structure of the UWC (an outline is included with the questionnaire) is a compromise between original faculty and student proposals.

The Commission on the Government of the University of Toronto (C.U.G.) was a nine-man body including four faculty members, four students, and President Bissell. This is what they say about some of the issues involved in their report:

- FREEDOM must prevail within the university as it goes about its own life and work. Just as it must ward off outside domination, whether of government, business, or any social group, so too, must defend itself against domination by any internal group, whether it be faculty, students, or administration.

- ACADEMIC FREEDOM requires dialogue, compromise and a respect for persons. Along with it must go freedom of association.

If the university is to proclaim itself a place of freedom, it must make it perfectly clear for all to see that freedom does flourish within its walls.

- Enjoyment of academic freedom must be an experience open to all members of the academic community. Freedom in teaching and research, long recognized in the traditional view to be the prerogative of the faculty member, must go hand in hand with the student's freedom in every aspect of his learning. Neither freedom is autonomous. The teacher's freedom must guarantee him the right to teach as his experience and knowledge suggest, and he must enjoy that freedom. But he must weigh alternatives that others — including students — propose. The student's freedom must assure him of the right to learn not only by choosing what he wants to learn, but also by having a say in how he learns it — how not only in the sense of a process of taking formal lectures, having seminars, and tutorials, etc., but also in the sense of the method used to determine what he is to learn. He must learn to accommodate his freedom to his teacher's freedom and the rights of other students. Here, freedom is best acknowledged by providing genuine alternatives; it is a process that involves mutual respect and adjustment.

- The future of the university as a community is based, on mutual trust and respect, not on the absolute power of any one estate in the university. Power, authority and responsibility must be shared between the central structure and departments; between faculty and students; between deans, chairmen and their councils; between academics and general support staff. Those who argue for the domination of any one estate over the rest threaten the survival of the university.

The 'numbers game,' as the Commission has learned in its discussions of the proportions of membership to be recommended for the various groups on the Governing Council, can be played ad infinitum, ad nauseam. It becomes meaningful only if one assumes that each estate votes as a monolithic bloc. Anyone who has attended a meeting of members of the academic community — be they teaching staff or students — will know how unlikely it is for such unanimity to develop! In the final analysis, numbers tend to be symbolic; in this instance, the prospect of the academic representatives on the Governing Council being able — if they unite their full membership — to make the final over-riding decision, is surely symbolic of the ultimate objective of self-government in the name of academic autonomy. Numbers also have a psychological value in group interaction through discussion. For this reason we have accepted parity in the representation of students and teaching staff — and for lay members as well! Any one of the estates, if given merely nominal representation, is likely to contribute less, to be more diffident in discussion, and to regard the body they serve as much less credible than if all are on roughly equal terms. In any event, under the proposed arrangement, no one estate (even assuming it thought and voted alike) is in a position to dominate the policy-making forum.

- If the university is to be controlled by its academic components, power should be shared. The strongest arguments for parity between faculty and students are based both on the student commitment to and interest in the learning process, as well as on very important political and psychological realities: unless students feel secure in their influence and are given considerable influence, participation becomes merely token. The recommendations for departments call for joint student-faculty negotiations to determine the actual makeup of councils and committees, because this is considered to be the fairest approach. A solution cannot be imposed by either students or faculty upon one another. If people are to live together, then, they must be able to agree on the basis for that relationship.

Where negotiations are not feasible, at a faculty level and above, parity is provided for student and faculty representation AS A RIGHT, with additional participation by academic senior administrators, lay people, and alumni. The recommendations at these levels provide for flexible student representation, from none at all to parity with elected faculty, depending upon the wishes of the students involved.

- Both the constituent elements (students and faculty) of the academic community should be represented — and should be given equal representation.

Before answering the questionnaire, we would urge you to read the report of the C.U.G. Commission. Copies are available in the Registrar's Office in Simcoe Hall, or at the S.A.C. office. If you wish further information, phone 923-6221 or drop into the SAC office and ask to have your name added to the University Committee mailing list.

Another spectator halts trial

NEW YORK (UPI) — Shouted protests by spectators and defendants at the pre-trial sessions in the case of 13 Black Panthers charged with conspiracy brought the proceedings to a halt Wednesday for the sixth time since the trial began February 2.

Judge John M. Murtagh cleared the court only minutes after the session began, and only allowed the session to reconvene an hour later after warning spectators they faced summary judgment on contempt of court charges if another outbreak occurred.

The outbreak occurred although warned spectators respond in any way he defendants — with conspiring to apartment stores and public places — were into the courtroom.

they urged the spectators to join them.

"Right on, let me hear it," cried one. "Don't let him intimidate you," shouted another. The spectators broke into a tumult of shouted Panther slogans.

Spectators remained silent when the Panthers were brought into the courtroom the second time, after Murtagh's threat and plea for an "orderly trial."

Contempt of court punishment — for up to 30 days in jail and a $250 fine — can be meted out instantly. Two women spectators have already been cited with contempt in the trial for joining defendants in shouted protests against the proceedings. One was released after apologizing; Murtagh gave the other one, Maryann Weissman, 30 days in jail.

All but one of the 13 Pan-

April 2, 1969. Afeni Shakur, one of two women defendants, was released after a group of clergymen raised $100,000 for her bail.

As pre-trial debates continued Wednesday, Michal Tabor returned to the stand to testify about his arrest by 5 policemen who allegedly found guns in his apartment during a pre-dawn raid.

Replying to questions about his criminal record, Tabor said he had become a heroin addict by the age of 13.

Heroin helped "my nose not to smell the urine-soaked hallways," he said. "I didn't feel the garbage underfoot. I didn't hear the sound of police sirens tearing through the black jungle."

At the age of 20, Tabor said, he became convinced only "a radical over-all change in the social system" would free black people from any kind of addiction — dope or alcohol — and joined the Black Panther Party.

B-ball Blues close season against Waterloo, Guelph, Western

By PETER WHITE

Wednesday night Blues proved they can play basketball — and how!!

Within the next week they will attempt to complete their schedule in the fashion of the Mac game. Though it is certainly going out on a shaky limb, it is not unnatural to predict that if nothing else, the sheer frustration of lost fruits of victory could sustain Blues through to at least one triumph.

Saturday Blues travel to Waterloo and an encounter with the inimitable Mr. Laaniste and his one man shoot-up parade. Laaniste leads the league in scoring. So far only Toronto has death with him reasonably well holding him to 18, largely because of a box and one defence which was for the most part "in his jock strap".

In that first Waterloo game Blues played well before bowing out in the final minutes 88-78. Laaniste receives support from other places as well, including his running mate at guard Tom Kieswetter, who is only slightly less proficient from the field. In a recent game, Waterloo scared Western into a 106 point performance before losing Saturday's game should be much more a defensive struggle.

The Toronto season then comes to an end with a flurry with a game at Guelph Wednesday night and a home game against Western the following evening. Since Guelph decimated Blues here (shan't even try to recall that one) the Gryphons have met with only mediocre success. If Toronto could be considered to have a mark all season this Guelph game would have to be it.

Western had an equally easy ride with the Blues in first game, winning that one 98-69 in the wake of Bruce Dempster's 31 point effort. The only team to crease the Western record was the game Mac team Toronto has lost two games to by a total of nine points. Western is assured of first place already. Game time, as usual, 8:15 p.m. at York, Thursday Feb. 19.

The Mac game was recorded by Channel 11 and will be rebroadcast Saturday afternoon at 2:00 p.m. Hear the golden strains of loveable Ivor Wynn and see the hell of a fine ball game — in colour.

The race for second spot continues to build. Currently Mac, Waterloo, and Windsor all stand at 5-3. Anything could happen — biggest screw job of all would be a Toronto victory against Waterloo Saturday night. It would make the rest of the pussyfootin' seem worthwhile.

In the archery B division, two Vic freshies, Jane Dean and Anne Sherwood, took top honors, challenged closely by Denise Teskey and Marion Lindo of St. Mikes.

BLUESKATES LOSE THIRD

Injuries, exams and a well-drilled McMaster team sent the Silver BlueSkates to their third exhibition loss Wednesday night 7-1 in Hamilton.

Playing without four regulars, the BlueSkates gave up two power-play goals in the first period, but rallied to narrow the score to 2-1 on Dianne Longbottom's first intercollegiate goal.

Then Mac's greater experience and precision passing took over and they notched five unanswered goals.

The BlueSkates play defending champion University of Guelph today at 9 a.m. in the first round of the women's intercollegiate tournament at Varsity Arena.

The Toronto gals then play Western at 12:30; Western and Guelph meet Saturday morning.

INTERFAC FINAL

A gallant, fast-skating and law-abiding group of talented women hockey players wearing the maroon and white of Scarborough

College were three brief seconds away from the interfac hockey upset of the season yesterday morning when it happened.

The underdog Scarborough gals had just broken a 2-2 tie as diminutive Kathy Copeland slid a slow roller which the PHE goalie gracefully waved at.

But with their goalie on the bench for an extra attacker, PHE stormed to the offensive and Lorna Tanner managed to deflect a crazily bounding puck into the Scarborough net with three seconds remaining in regulation time.

PHE then scored a disputed overtime goal to win the championship, as Liz Daniel swept the puck bome.

Betty Sherk had two goals for Scarborough, while Sally Manning and Lorna Tanner had the other PHE markers.

The winning team of Jim Pigott (driver) and Maurice Stevens set out.

The five trophies available in the February 7th Engineering Car Rally were hotly contended for by 66 cars. The early morning traffic jam at Convocation Hall indicated the huge success which is becoming a trademark of this rally. The first team trophy was won by Delta Tau Delta Fraternity. The Delts also captured the Interfraternity Council trophy from Phi Kappa Pi.

First place and the Engineering Society trophy was won by Jim Pigott (IV Industrial) and Maurice Stevens (Grad-Civil).

The second overall trophy went to Brian McLean (Grad-Civil) and Bryan Keeler (IV C&F). Third place and Electrical Club trophy went to Steve Carrick (IV Electrical) and Diana Omylanowski (IV New). The fourth place trophy was taken by Henrik Jacobsen (III Electrical) and Reli Ortner (II SMC).

The organizers, Dave Pigott and Brian Walker, wish to express their thanks to all those who entered this challenging event. Thanks is also due to the marshalls, and BP Rally Drivers Club for their sponsorship.

Guelph invasion defeats wrestlers

Remember the one about the home front being sacred territory, to be defended at all costs?

Well, the University of Guelph must have decided to extend its personal stomping grounds to Toronto, as they clobbered U of T wrestlers at Hart House Wednesday.

All but two of the ten matches were close, and the crowd seemed pleased with the action. But Guelph wrestlers have this wierd quirk of nature about them. They like to pin people. Four of our wrestlers got pinned and one lost by decision.

Bright lights for this week go to Peep (not Pepe) Korgemagi (hvwf), Bill Allison (167 lbs), Dave Simms (158 lb), and Ken Shand (118 lb). Peep really was in top form. Saunders of Guelph looked like . . . well . . . to coin a popular phrase 'He's an animal'. Korgemagi combined Korgemagian stubbornness with about six effective headlocks to win 6-3.

Bill Allison and P. Symons (Guelph) are both OQAA champs from last year (in different weight divisions). I imagine they're both nice guys, too, but put them both on the same mat at the same time and the key phrase is "This mat just ain't big enough for the both of us." As it turned out it was, and they drew 1-1.

Dave Simms defeated D. Oldershaw 2-0. Simms claims his long hair gives him strength. Last year he had to wrestle this hairy guy from Ottawa — he said to himself 'aach, a piece of cake' — Dave got wiped and he's had long hair ever since.

Squidgers off to Ithaca

U of T's finest tiddlywinks players will travel to Ithaca, New York, this week-end to compete in the annual, invitational Tiddlywinks Championship hosted by Cornell.

Among the other schools competing are Harvard, Cornell, and MIT.

There will be a total of 11 teams from seven schools. The Toronto team is sponsored by the Engineering Society which donated $75 towards travelling expenses.

The "squidgers" on the Toronto squad are Byron Alexandroff (IV APSC), Barry Corbin (IV UC), Lindsey Horenblom (III New), Paul Milgram (IV APSC), Morris Cohen (IV APSC), Mel Solomon (IV APSC).

"We've got a real hope of winning this year since most of our players have been competing for four years", said Captain Alexandroff.

B-ball Blues ' best effort not enough, lose 82-79

By JIM COWAN

For a few sweet moments Wednesday night, it looked as if John McManus's basketball Blues might just do it.

With only 4:25 left in the game, guard Mike Katz broke away and potted his layup to put Varsity out in front of the McMaster Marauders, 67-66. It was his tenth point of the game, and the last he got before fouling out with 2:14 remaining.

But it was not to be. Although Blues held the lead once again before the end, Mac stormed back to snatch an 82-79 victory.

It was undoubtedly the best effort Blues have put together all season, as they shot a most respectable 41 per cent in the first half, then came back to improve on it, shooting 51.4 per cent in the second.

Combine those stats with Mac's game percentage of 41.4, and add in the fact that Blues fired six more field goals in the second half than did Mac, and you start to wonder what this team has to do to win a game.

It looked like it would be the same old story for Blues even before they hit the court. Here they were, playing on their home ground, and there were the cheerleaders and fans and band . . . McMaster's cheerleaders and fans and band. And scattered lonesomely through the grey and maroon, the occasional Blue and White.

The pattern carried over into the opening minutes of play, as the well-drilled Mac squad moved the ball easily around the court. Blues took three minutes to score their first point, on a free throw Ross McNaughton, and demonstrated an alarming tendency to throw the ball out of bounds, to Mac players, or just about anywhere but where it was supposed to go.

But as the first ten minutes ended, it started to dawn on the few Varsity fans that something unusual was happening. Here it was, the second period, and their team was still close! Not only that, but even occasionally taking the lead. And the half ended with Blues just six points down, 44-38.

Then came the second half. With 14:14 left, the score was 50-50. With 9:51 to go, 59-59. And so on, right down to the wire, with Blues winning the half 41-38, but losing the game.

They lost it, with a not-so-gentle assist from the referees, on the foul line. True, Blues seemed to get shafted on more than one call, but they must still face the fact that, in the second half, they made only three points on free throws, while Mac sank 11.

FREE THROWS: John Haddon had an especially rough game, scrapping the inside of his wrist on a basket support early in the game, then near the end catching an elbow in the left eye. . . he said after the game he wasn't sure of his status with Canada's National Team . . . it seems they're supposed to report to camp around the first of May for the tournament starting May, but he won't be finished exams until May 13. . . former Toronto star Bruce Dempster, now playing for Western, is in the same boat, not finishing exams until May 15. . . top scorer for Mac was Jim Noble with 22 points. . .

BLUES SCORING: John Haddon, 19; Ross McNaughton, 19; Larry Trafford, 17; Mike Katz, 10; Bill Boston, 8; Angus Braid, 4; Bob Annis, 2.

Windsor vs Blues at Varsity tonight

Tom Watt's Bloor Street Blueshirts continue their battle for first place in the OQAA Western Division when they meet the surprising Windsor Lancers tonight at Varsity Arena.

Blues are currently one game ahead of Bob McKillop's Waterloo Warriors with each team having a pair of games remaining. Waterloo meets the Guelph Gryphons tonight, then clash with Blues in the season's finale on their home ice a week later.

The Lancers, in their second OQAA season, looked like permanent doormats this year as they were winless up to the Christmas break. However, since then coach Cec Eaves, in his

Two of their wins have come at the expense of Waterloo, for the Warriors only two losses! Ironically, if it weren't for those victories Blues wouldn't be in the battle for first place.

The biggest roadblock Blues will have to overcome tonight will be Lancer goalie Don Bruner.

Bruner, last year's western division all-star netminder, was almost personally responsible for holding off Blues when the two teams last met on Jan. 21 here at Varsity. Although Blues finally prevailed 7-1, Bruner kicked out 65 Toronto shots. He is reported to have blocked 55 Waterloo pucks in the second Lancer victory over the Warriors.

THE RACE IS ON!

The starting gun has sounded in the race for chief student bureaucrat at U of T, and election machines have started to roll.

On next Tuesday, March 3, interested students will cast their votes for the president and vice-president of the SAC.

Running are four tickets and one independent nominee.

Presidential nominees are Wayne Richardson (IV APSC), Rod Hurd (IIS car), Joan Campana (I UC), F. J. Benjamin McNally (III New), and Bernard Teitelbaum (III UC).

For the office of vice-president are Kenneth McEvoy (III Vic), Eric Miglin (II APSC), Ken Wolfson (II New), and Mark Golden (IV UC).

Check inside for an exciting look at the power-hungry. Interviewed in today's paper are the SAC-experienced Richardson-McEvoy team; Scarborough president Hurd and his running mate, SAC rep Miglin; and "if-at-first" Teitelbaum, the independent candidate.

The other tickets are Campana with Wolfson and McNally with Golden. Watch Wednesday's paper for their profiles.

An advance poll for faculties with conflicting schedules is to be conducted on Friday, Feb. 27.

Gems of student power wisdom and drops of political oil will be liberally sprinkled on all and sundry at a forum for the presidential candidates Wednesday at 1 p.m. in Convocation Hall. Other meetings will be held in various places all week.

Think about it. Should you be there? Or is anyone even listening.

A whole slew of people have taken to the field for this year's SAC presidential elections. The race promises high drama and excitement, spectacular spills and thrills. Take a peek inside today's paper for profiles of some of the candidates. More coverage will follow Wednesday. (Bill) Charlton Heston is not running this year.

WHAT'S HAPPENING IN POLITICAL ECONOMY?

That's an excellent question.

Are a bunch of radicals raising shit about nothing, again?

Just who runs the Department of Political Economy, anyway?

THE FACTS

The Chairman of the Department runs the Department. He has absolute authority and final responsibility for every decision that is made in the Department. He can delegate as much authority as he wants — or as little as he wants. At the present time Prof. W. C. Easterbrook is the Chairman of the Department. The Associate Chairman is Prof. Jean Smith. Prof. Art Kruger and E. P. Neufeld are the Undergraduate and Graduate Secretaries of the Department. These four men, together with a few senior professors they trust make every policy decision made in the Department. If they want to consult other professors or students, they do. If they don't — they don't.

THE CHAIRMAN

The Chairman of the Department of Political Economy normally holds office for ten years. Prof. Stefan Dupre has just been appointed the new Chairman of the Department. The members of the committee which chose him were: Dean Allen, J. M. Hamm, D. P. Kerr, J. E. Hodgetts, J. E. Smyth, E. Sir-luck, H. A. Green, D. F. Forster, G. A. Watson, C. B. Macpher-son. Only three of these people are in the Department of Political Economy. None of them is a student. At no time were students asked to give any suggestions or opinions to the committee. Dean Allen, himself, admits that the committee was anxious to avoid informing students of the proceedings. What happened to the principles of openness, trust, and mutual participation of which the CUG Report spoke? Prof. Dupre says he has nothing to do with it. He didn't choose himself. The Department says they had nothing to do with it. It was the Dean's committee. The Dean says he simply followed the regulations.

THE REPORT AND THE UNION

Four months ago, today, the Commission on University Government presented its report, a blueprint for reform on this campus. It stressed community in the university and the rights of the individuals in that community. It declared that students were "full members of their Department"; that the Chairman should be responsible to the faculty and the students; that decisions in the Department were to be made by all members of the Department, together.

The Political Economy Course Union is dedicated to these principles. We believe that everyone in this university has the right to participate in the decisions which shape his life here.

But the Department is run as it is run. To date, students have no representation on any committee in the Department. Indeed there are no committees in the Department. What can we do?

YOU MAY FIND THIS HARD TO BELIEVE

WE DO

If you take a course in Political Science, Economics or Commerce at this university and care about what is happening to you, come to the meeting, Wednesday, 2.00 pm Rm. 1016 New College.

UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT REPORT - THINK ABOUT IT

The Telephone As An Instrument Of Terror

Bell telephone will provide the weapons for a "guerrilla" action on the American consulate this week.

Reprisal Against Repression (RAR), an ad hoc committee of U of T students, last night invited people to start a massive phone campaign to tie up the lines of the U.S. consulate in Toronto and effectively disrupt its operation.

The phone-in is planned "to protest the repression taking place in the United States," committee spokesman said last night. "Particularly the kangaroo court that Judge Julius Hoffman used to convict the Chicago Five."

The phone-in action follows a 250-man demonstration Saturday that left the consulate splattered with red paint.

"It's a disgrace that the consulate has been allowed to sit there unscathed while it represents the official presence in Canada of a repressive and fascist country," the spokesman added.

The committee asks all concerned students and faculty to participate in the phone-in.

"The phone number of the U.S. Consulate General is 366-3553," the spokesman informed the Varsity last night. "And the number for visa information is 366-3554.

"The point is to tie up the switchboard for one week — Monday to Friday — and disrupt normal business activities by tying up the phones from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. each day.

The committee suggested people phone the consulate and ask questions about U.S. history, culture, and politics — a service the consulate regularly provides.

The committee spokesman added: "They can just do their own thing, or they can try asking some of these questions:

- 1) Why did the police riot in Chicago in 1968?
- 2) Why did Mayor Daley order them to riot?
- 3) Why did Attorney-General Mitchell order the prosecution of the Chicago Eight?
- 4) Why did Judge Julius Hoffman deny Bobby Seale's constitutional right to defend himself?
- 5) Why is the F.B.I. attempting to smash the Black Panther Party?
- 6) Why is exercising freedom of speech a crime in the United States?
- 7) Why is the Canadian-American border being defoliated?
- 8) Why are there American troops in 64 countries?
- 9) How much American capital is in Canada?
- 10) Why did the U.S. invade South Vietnam?
- 11) Why does the constitution of the Democratic Republic of North Vietnam begin with a quote from Thomas Jefferson?
- 12) Why are American planes bombing Laos?
- 13) Why was George Washington a childhood hero of Mao-Tse-Tung?
- 14) Why are concentration camps being refurbished in the United States?
- 15) Why did American nuclear bombers fly practice sessions over Saskatchewan?

- The committee suggested that callers could also ask questions about how to obtain an American visa by calling the visa line (366-3554).

phone," the committee spokesman added, "just phone, let it ring, hang up, get back your dime, and phone again."

"We are just asking people to use their constitutional right of peaceful protest," he said.

Demonstrators protest Chicago Five verdict

About 250 demonstrators left red paint splattered on the American seal and the front door of the American consulate Saturday afternoon after protesting the verdict given Bobby Seale and the Chicago Five.

Sherry Campbell, a worker for the Toronto Research Project, was arrested for public mischief.

The demonstrators gathered spontaneously in front of the consulate at about 5 o'clock as afternoon papers came out with the news that five of the Chicago prisoners had been declared guilty of contempt of court and of crossing state lines with intent to incite riot.

They carried signs reading "Free all political prisoners," and chanted a quotation from Abbie Hoffman: "In order to love we have to survive and in order to survive we have to love."

The demonstration culminated in the throwing of eggs filled with red paint against the consulate. One window was also broken.

About a dozen policemen and another dozen plainclothesmen were present.

The demonstration was prompted by the "Black, Red and White," an association of American exiles.

"All that concrete can't be wrang; the library is rising"
—headline in the U of T Bulletin

"One or the other of you is forever in my way. How do I know what damage you have done to my horse?" — the Marquis, A Tale of Two Cities.

The GSU affair: echoes of Judge Hoffman

You might wonder what all this fuss over Michael Vaughan and Marjaleena Repo is about.

During the past month the pages of this newspaper have been heavily laden with verbal assaults from both sides of this conflict within the Graduate Students Union. And the whole thing might seem just a game of fighting words, phrases combatting phrases.

But one concrete fact still remains: Marjaleena Repo is without a job; she was fired as Graduate Student Union Organizer precisely because she did her job too well; GSU President Michael Vaughan fired her on no other grounds than his own political paranoia.

Last summer the GSU placed a large advertisement in the weekend Varsity asking for a full-time "outside agitator". Needless to say, the tone of the ad was frivolous. Vaughan got what he asked for. Miss Repo is one of the best organizers this campus has seen. In fifty departments of SGS, she was able to initiate some kind of organization. And she was responsible for many of the GSU programs that Vaughan claims under the aegis of his own leadership.

Miss Repo's case is clear: she was fired on flimsy evidence — a ruling that makes Judge Julius Hoffman's charade look like a fine expression of justice.

But even so, why is this case relevant to students at this university? Why has this conflict developed into an "issue"?

- Marjaleena Repo has two children to support and needs that job;
- she was fired for political reasons that had no bearing on the performance of her job;
- the politics surrounding her firing form a glaring example of the opportunistic style of student councils.

The last point is important. The GSU Executive is an elite of student bureaucrats that is far removed from the students who finance their affairs.

Under Michael Vaughan's direction, the GSU executive bought three full-page advertisements for today's Varsity — with the money of U of T graduate students.

The advertisements pass off as policy and information statements by the GSU, but, in fact, they are part of Michael Vaughan's personal political campaign to ensure the perpetuation of Michael Vaughan as GSU President after tomorrow's general meeting.

Through legal fees and advertisements, he has indirectly carried on his fight for personal survival with students' money.

Vaughan realizes he made a tactical error in firing Miss Repo: it could cost him his job tomorrow. In the past few weeks he has desperately tried to pass the buck to every conceivable scapegoat.

The most popular scapegoat is always The Varsity. He claims he has been censored by The Varsity. When he makes specific charges, they will be rebutted specifically.

One of Vaughan's complaints relates to a full-page comment article he handed me at 8 p.m. on the production night before publication. The article arrived three hours after deadline. It was logistically impossible to print it. Our refusal to print it is called repression and censorship.

Vaughan is grasping at straws. His most recent tactic — always the last trick in the game of council opportunism — is a red-baiting campaign. He's labelling the group supporting Marjaleena Repo as a left-wing plot to take over the GSU. I don't know of a left wing group that would want to take over the GSU.

The conspiracy obsessions of Judge Hoffman are alive and well in the GSU office.

The impeachment of Michael Vaughan tomorrow seems to be in order.

never helped by letting the arch types do the work. Lyndon, Peter, Jim and Paul (also Robin) dispersed in the rain, while Dave and Suecup went to press. Liz flew in late. Karen provided many services. Ernie provided many sandwiches. Laura, Karl and many were impartial, objective and mostly dull. Dave laid out what mark didn't have. Larry worked the drache and Roy left his stuff early. Brian was far radical, anti-fascist action, but Louis wasn't. Ceta was ubiquitous and art was incomprehensible, as usual.

Vaughan asked for an agitator — he got one

Last September the Graduate Students' Union Executive hired Marjaleena Repo (from 30 candidates for the job) to work as a fulltime organizer for the GSU. She was to concentrate on encouraging existing departmental organizations and on activating the general mass of uninvolved students. She was hired by a vote of the executive because the GSU constitution specifically states that the president can "hire and discipline union employees with the approval of the executive."

On Jan. 29 Marjaleena was fired on the individual initiative of president Michael Vaughan. No discussion was held and no vote was taken. Instead, Vaughan demanded a vote of confidence in his over-all performance, and received it from 6 out of 11 members present.

FALSE ACCUSATIONS

At that time, Vaughan gave only one reason for the firing: that Marjaleena had circulated an Organizer's Report at the Jan. 26 General Meeting. This report to the graduate students was critical of executive attitudes and listed some specific policies and practices which she felt were detrimental to the graduate students and seriously handicapped her work as an organizer.

The general meeting voted in favor of the three suggestions made in her report (that departmental organizations get advances without presenting constitutions, that any university group can use GSU facilities without charge and that any graduate student can use the guestner facilities).

This show of confidence in their organizer evidently angered the president and his friends on the executive.

But instead of calling another general meeting to discuss matters of policy (something which the constitution allows) and instead of bringing up his grievances against Marjaleena at that very meeting, Vaughan attempted to walk out of the meeting and later "fired" Marjaleena. Why? Considering the fact that her hiring was ratified at a general meeting, why has he not put this matter on the agenda of the Feb. 24 meeting? Why did he not give Marjaleena specific reasons for her "firing" in writing?

Since the "firing," Vaughan and his friends have desperately tried to justify their actions. Vaughan told the daily papers that he fired her to "block a takeover of the GSU by left wing groups" — an accusation he never made in the presence of students, knowing full well it wouldn't hold water. The following justifications have since been offered:

- "Her performance and behavior didn't warrant our earlier expectations"
- "She preaches the Marcusian idea of false consciousness, that is, we students do not really know what we want."
- "She used the GSU for her own political purposes. She prepared and printed the Trefann Court Residents' Association Bulletin at the GSU. She privately let groups use GSU facilities with no authorization of the Executive."

Also Marjaleena has been accused of theft and criminal charges have been laid against her by Vaughan (a hearing is to be held in the Old city hall, courtroom 34, Mar. 6 at 2 p.m.).

Members of the executive have asked for a list of items which Marjaleena is supposed to have stolen. They have not received any information, neither has Marjaleena or her lawyers. Nor has the executive asked her to return anything. This criminal charge makes it completely impossible for her to find any work at the present time.

SETTING THE RECORD STRAIGHT

We believe that the accusations against Marjaleena are false, that she was unjustly fired and that the firing was unconstitutional.

Marjaleena's work record has been excellent. Just about everything the GSU executive has to show for its year in office has in fact been accomplished due to her efforts:

- She suggested and organized the Mathews-Steele meeting in the fall
- She suggested and reprinted the two reports the GSU has made available to members: The Waterloo Report and Women in Canadian Universities
- She suggested and devised a questionnaire to departmental organizations so that for the first time the GSU has some relevant information about what is going on in the departments.
- She began work on the employment situation for graduates
- She began work on the employment situation for graduates
- She prepared the GSU newsletter (which includes a lengthy organizer's report). This Newsletter was ready in January but, strangely enough it was just mailed last week.

- There are 56 departments in SGS. She contacted people in 50 of them.

Thirty are organized, half for the first time, and the others have been well-assisted by Marjaleena.

If the GSU is to be a democratic organization which can fight for the interests of graduate students, we need more "organizing", not less. And Marjaleena is the right person to do the job, as her work record shows.

Marjaleena Repo, GSU organizer fired by Michael Vaughan.

- There is no basis to the charges of theft. These are vindictive and damaging lies
- Marjaleena never put out a newsletter for Trefann or any other group
- She did not privately let groups use the GSU facilities. These groups had the right to use GSU facilities (as confirmed at the Jan. meeting) despite objections from some members of the executive.

WHO PAYS?

In order to protect herself from the malicious accusation made by Vaughan Marjaleena has had to retain a lawyer at her own expense. On the other hand, Vaughan's own personal lawyer happens also to be the lawyer retained by the GSU. (At a recent executive meeting a motion to drop these charges was defeated 7 to 6). Depending on whether the executive votes to pay the GSU lawyer's legal fee.

This seems likely for two reasons:

- 1) the executive voted to press charges;
- 2) a previous executive meeting approved paying for a $100 ad Vaughan wished to place in the Varsity "defending" his position.

Fortunately the Varsity refused to print this ad because, according to legal advice, it contained statements which might be construed as slanderous.

GSU—A BAD EMPLOYER MORE MORE MORE

Marjaleena was unfairly treated as an employee of the GSU. She was promised a contract until the end of the term for which she was hired — this contract never materialized despite frequent requests on her part. She did not receive any regular employee benefits, until January when she was finally put on the University payroll, although she requested this at every executive meeting last fall.

Unemployment insurance, pension plans and particularly medical and hospitalization benefits were thus lost to her for up to eight months.

A general meeting has been called for Tues. Feb. 24, Convocation Hall at 1 p.m. We urge all graduate students to attend this meeting to deal with the following demands:

1. That Marjaleena Repo be reinstated to her position as Organizer; and that the agreement which was to cover 40 weeks starting Sept. 1, 1969 be honoured.

2. That all criminal charges against her be dropped; and that a public announcement be made to the effect that there was no basis to the charges; and that all other damaging statements be publicly retracted; and that she be financially compensated for the legal costs incurred because of this suit.

GSU -- lost in "smokescreen of unproven allegations"

The Executive Committee has been subjected to blatant misrepresentation of the facts regarding its dismissal of Mrs. Repo. The crudest misstatement of the facts is probably that written by "the Committee to Retain Marjaleena Repo". The majority of its members were present at the Executive meeting which approved her firing which makes their inaccuracies the more inexcusable.

The Committee to Retain Mrs. Repo states that no discussion was held and no vote was taken by the Executive Committee on her dismissal. The facts are that the discussion was lengthy and most of Mrs. Repo's Committee, who so strangely deny its existence, took part in it. The ex-organizer also defended her actions at this meeting before a vote was taken. The Executive Committee concluded the meeting by voting on a motion of confidence in the President's action which eight members supported, three opposed, and from which two abstained. It was evident to the Executive Committee that Mrs. Repo had not fulfilled the terms of her employment. A statement explaining the reasons for the Executive Committee's dissatisfaction with Mrs. Repo has been mailed to every graduate student in our recent newsletter.

The Committee to Retain Mrs. Repo continue their unsubstantiated charges against the President by accusing him of laying a malicious charge of theft against Mrs. Repo. In fact, the charge was laid upon the instruction of the GSU solicitor and is now in the hands of the Crown. Furthermore, the Crown will issue a summons for a charge of theft only when there is substantial supporting evidence. Attempts are being made to justly resolve this matter before the preliminary hearing. Despite claims to the contrary, Mrs. Repo's solicitor has been given specific information as to the number of GSU documents allegedly stolen.

It is claimed that just about everything the GSU Executive has accomplished this year was due to the efforts of Mrs. Repo. This is so patently ridiculous that it hardly warrants a reply. Needless to say, the building-program, constitution, incorporation, CUG questionnaire, the social program, educational program and so forth, are some of the items developed by the Executive Committee exclusive of Mrs. Repo's efforts.

It is hoped that graduate students will see through the smokescreen of unproven allegations and support their elected representatives at the General Meeting on Feb. 24 at 1:00 p.m. in Convocation Hall.

LETTERS

staff association won't push for support staff's rights

In the Varsity issue of January 21st, an article appeared about two organizations that wanted the right to represent the Support Staff.

This week, a brochure has been distributed among the staff of various Departments stating the aims of the University of Toronto Staff Association.

Having spent some years on the campus as a staff member of this University, I have seen both the Canadian Union of Public Employees and this so-called "Staff Association in action."

Under the head of "Aims and Benefits" the UTSA brochure uses verbs like representing, acting, improving, obtaining and providing. For an outsider this conjures up the idea of a dynamic organization that really wants to do something on behalf of the staff.

According to Mr. Fanning, a member of the UTSA Steering Committee, wages are not that important as an issue at the University. He agreed that CUPE concentrates on such things as wage inequalities, buy why bother — most people are happy enough — Varsity, January 21, 1970.

But in point six of the recommendations of the brochure, the Association promises to provide financial and advisory services for future members. A jolly good advice then of this Mr. Fanning.

Regarding the representation of the University Staff in the governing of the University of Toronto community the following can be mentioned:

Mr. R. A. K. Richards, architect, member of the Planning Division of University of Toronto and the UTSA Steering Committee states that in the CUG report staff members are treated like second class citizens — Varsity November 26, 1969.

In this he is perfectly right, but the same Mr. Richards proposes to weigh votes in future voting procedures of the Association. Representatives with a larger salary and more service years will be accorded a privileged position.

The Staff Association invites the staff to attend a general meeting in the Convocation Hall, on Thursday, March 5, 12:30 p.m. In order to keep things under control Prof. Reid of the Physics Department suggested bringing in the Police.

Moreover, as Mr. Reid says it is not their intention to be involved in elaborate discussions: the purpose of the meeting is just to sign up people. Of course, difficult questions will be asked but that is the policy of annoying opposition group.

According to Prof. Reid, to be a step ahead of the audience, the Steering Committee themselves should ask the questions — Meeting Steering Committee Feb. 12, 1970. Apparently Mr. Reid does not believe in participatory democracy.

Regarding improvements to be made within the university community, Miss Carol Belford suggested being friendly towards the Administration. "Why should we be acting in a hostile environment?" she asked.

I can agree with Miss Belford's suggestion, but this advice also infers that the Association should not push too hard.

I have given the opinions of several members of the Staff Association; not to put the various persons in an unfavorable light.

But it shows clearly the spirit of the Steering Committee UTSA.

CUPE is negotiating for a contract on behalf of members of the Library. Herewith is shown which organization is really acting on behalf of the Staff.

As for UTSA: a lot of paper has gone out but nothing has demonstrated the goodness of the latter.

Sancho Panzo

what about wages and job security?

Members of the support staff of this University have received a communication from an administration selected Steering Committee of a proposed University of Toronto Staff Association.

After years of indifference to the welfare of its employees, the University is now attempting to thrust upon them what appears to be an administration-fostered association. In the information sheet distributed, the aims of this staff association are set out in meaningless jargon.

They do not say they will work for fair wages and fair working conditions. Surely "To provide medical, financial and advisory services for you who join" does not in reality say anything! They do not suggest that a fair system of promotion be implemented. Instead, they are going to help "To obtain for you who join all the educational benefits available within the community"; "To provide social and recreational facilities for you who join"; "To act, at your request, upon all matters affecting your interests".

It's too late for this kind of paternalism. Support staff, just as faculty and students of this University have had enough of it. Surely the support staff can find a better means of banding together to demand job security, fair wages and working conditions than through an administration-initiated association.

U of S goes CPUO one better

By ART MOSES

Publication of hard-line discipline regulations at the University of Saskatchewan has plunged both U of S campuses into a crisis which may climax this week.

At Saskatoon the same staff student-administration committee which was reported to have agreed to the regulations unanimously last Monday, voted 4-3 to shelve its report.

The Committee suggested instead a new parity committee to consider the whole discipline question in detail, similar to the Campbell Committee at U of T.

The move followed denials from all the students and one faculty member on the committee, chaired by Law Dean Rodger Carter, that they had acquiesced in the new discipline regulations last spring, as reported in the administration's newspaper.

The Saskatoon Faculty Council will still debate them Feb. 26.

At the smaller Regina campus, over 400 students voted at a general meeting Tuesday against "any attempt by administration or faculty to set up disciplinary rules that could be used to interfere with the rights of students to fundamentally change the university and politically organize for that end."

DEAN CARTER

The disciplinary code was actually written at Saskatoon by Dean Carter. It is perhaps the most hard-line ever seen in North America.

Its publication, Jan. 28, after receiving Saskatoon Faculty Council executive approval, took the campus by surprise.

Political activity there has been minimal. The local Students for a Democratic University chapter has been isolated and quiet.

Besides recommending closed judicial hearings and prohibiting any conduct "whether on or off campus which may bring the university, any of its officers, employees or students into public disrepute," the Carter regulations provide for ex parte (without a defense) suspension of students merely suspected of breaching the code.

They also allow any faculty member "who has reasonable grounds to believe" a student has committed a breach of discipline, to eject that student from a classroom, seminar, lab or university building.

JUSTIFIED OR NOT

Failure to obey such an order, whether justified or not, is ipso facto a breach of discipline.

The proposed Saskatchewan regulations also bar any conduct "which may reasonably be expected to create a disturbance," a clause far more strict than its equivalent in the working paper issued by the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario. That paper sparked discipline crises across the province last September.

In Saskatoon, Students' Council President Rob Garden, a member of the Carter Committee, completely dissociated himself from the regulations.

The Committee, established by the U of S Senate to "revise current discipline regulations", met from February to May last year.

It kept its "report" secret pending Regina reaction, said the Saskatoon Dean of Students. Regina administrators deny ever hearing of it before January.

FACULTY DISSOCIATION

Also denying concurrence with the code was faculty committee member Doris Dyck, who was out of the country when Carter finalized his recommendations.

Carter strongly disagreed with his committee's action, which essentially rejected its own recommendations.

As chairman, he had no vote at Monday's meeting, originally intended to hear briefs from students and faculty. He was supported by the Dean of Students and 2 faculty members.

Despite the Carter committee's official position, Saskatoon students are taking no chances and are organizing opposition to the disciplinary regulations. They hope to have widespread student and faculty support for their stand before the faculty council meets in general session Thursday.

Many moderate professors have expressed revulsion at the Carter code, including the Dean of Engineering. Student leaders across the largely apolitical campus are solid in their opposition to it.

At Regina the scene is strikingly different. A new campus principal took office there last in January. He is considered far more liberal than his predecessor.

OH, HORROR

The Regina campus, long struggling for autonomy from Saskatoon, greeted the Carter proposals with horror.

An already existing staff-student disciplinary committee rejected the Carter report, but then drafted amendments, using the Saskatoon code as a basis.

When Regina students heard of the widespread opposition at Saskatoon, they reversed direction and took a strong stand against any administrative disciplinary power.

Matthews attacks Canada Council

OTTAWA (CUP) - Carleton university professor Robin Matthews has opened a new front in the campaign against de-Canadianized universities and scholarship by disclosing that 61 per cent of Canada Council research grants in 1968-69 were awarded to "non-Canadians."

In a forum here February 15 the English professor said he had three times asked the Canada Council to release the breakdown figures of Canadian recipients of the grants, but that the requests had gone unanswered.

Matthews said private discussions with council personnel revealed the 61 per cent figure.

The accuracy of the figure, based on the definition of the "non-Canadian" phrase, has been questioned by a Canada Council spokesman. However, both parties agree that "non-Canadians" in this case, means persons who received their first degree outside of the country.

Matthews said a council reply to his first request stated there was no method of determining proportions of Canadians to non-Canadians on the grants list. He said he was not satisfied with the answers and sent a further inquiry.

Matthews said the letter went unanswered for five months, but meanwhile an independent study of York University in Toronto revealed that 68 per cent of council research grant recipients were non-Canadians in 1968-69.

Disclosure of the York University figures brought a reply from the council that 63 per cent, not 68 per cent of council research grants at York were to non-Canadians. Matthews said.

Matthews said he had made a further request one month ago for a breakdown of the Canadian recipients and a request for the names of the academic panels who made the selections.

He said he had received no answer to his request and suggested the council had "gone into hiding because they are afraid to make public the absolute disaster of granting now going on in Canada."

Canada Council assistant director Frank Milligan said last Sunday night he doubted the accuracy of the relationship between the "first university degree" and citizenship. He said such non-Canadian academics could easily become citizens in the time they spent in Canada.

Matthews has been campaigning for the Canadianization of Canadian universities since the fall of 1968.

Loyola takes Santhanam case to court

MONTREAL (CUP) — The administration of Loyola College ran into little opposition last Monday as it petitioned for a declaratory judgement in the case of dismissed nuclear physicist S. A. Santhanam.

At the end of a day-long hearing in the Quebec superior court, administration lawyer T. P. Slatter, petitioned judge Leon Lalande for an outright judgment in the contract dispute between Santhanam and the college, after Santhanam and the college, after Santhanam's lawyer agreed that the professor had no legal claim to be rehired after July 31, 1969.

Neither Santhanam nor the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the national faculty pressure group which has backed him in his seven-month contract dispute at Loyola, are arguing that the administration was legally bound to hire the professor.

Both maintain, however, that the college was bound by a "moral" obligation in Santhanam's case, and the legal decision which will result from Monday's court case is not expected to prevent further conflict between CAUT and the Loyola administration.

Santhanam's firing from Loyola at the beginning of the fall term provided the fuel for one of the most extended conflicts in the history of Canadian universities, as students and faculty first protested the firing, and then escalated their actions when the Loyola administration attempted to purge 27 anti-administration faculty last December.

Santhanam signed a statement in December, 1967, stating his intention to resign in 1969, but was later given a contract for the 1969-70 year which stated it "superseded all other verbal agreements."

But the physicist was not rehired by the college, and a recommendation by the Loyola senate that his case be reopened was rejected in June, 1969 by the college's all-Jesuit board of trustees. No reasons were given for the dismissal.

CAUT has not yet announced whether or not the organization will go ahead with an official censure of the college for ducking its "moral obligations" in the Santhanam case.

On February 7, the executive committee of CAUT mandated a special committee to make one final attempt at securing binding CAUT arbitration in the Loyola case.

If the move failed, the committee was authorized "to determine a date for a special meeting of CAUT's council to deal with the recommendation . . . for the censure of the president and board of trustees of Loyola College."

The censure would amount to an official blacklisting of Loyola by the 12,000-member CAUT, which claims to represent the interests of 80 per cent of faculty in Canadian universities.

Texaco boycotts rabble raisers

LOS ANGELES (CUP-CP) — Texaco, Inc., one of the world's largest oil companies, has decided to stop advertising in university newspapers which "engage in rabble rousing and attempt to foster anarchy."

The announcement was made recently by W. V. Linn, Texaco's advertising and sales promotion manager for the United States, who said action has already been taken against several U.S. college papers, after Texaco reviewed their content.

Linn would disclose the name of only one paper, the New University at the Irvine campus of the University of California. He said Texaco had received complaints about an issue of the New University which contained a story on the arrest of a local bookstore owner, arrested for allegedly publishing an underground newspaper which urged readers to shoplift.

The paper also carried an ad for Texaco.

In a letter to a person who complained about Texaco advertising in the paper, Linn stated Texaco had assumed "that the publication maintained a good moral policy in its editorial and news reporting activities. Naturally, we are quite shocked to find that such is not the case."

Texaco's action is not a violation of free speech, Linn said. "If we don't like what's in there, we don't have to advertise with papers like that," he said.

Architecture students unveil new plans for university

Brian Carter, Nic Hill and Gavin Lloyd-Jones are graduate students in the School of Architecture at U of T. As part of the Graduate Design Studio program they are drawing up a plan of action for the development of the St. George Campus. Here they present some of their ideas.

Question: What's a university doing in a big city anyway? Dean Sirluck: Well, the university did not invade Toronto — Toronto has engulfed the university.

Although the fence which once bounded the University of Toronto and the gates which marked its entrances have long since been taken down, it is clear that the St. George campus is still seen by many as a university apart from the city.

The city offers a diversity of activities — eating places, cinemas, diamond merchants, strip clubs and shirt makers. On Saturday night whether it be on Yonge St., the Uptown cinemas or skating at City Hall, the city is a place for the exchange of ideas and personal encounters.

Cities and universities share common roots. Yet the University in Toronto strains to ignore the city. But the city is more than something to engulf the university. It is also where the people are; the action is in itself a vast learning environment.

In ignoring the city, the university intentionally avoids any "conversation" with other parts of its environment. It is still a "members only" club, policing its narrow entrances.

The university's buildings are scattered across its land holdings, isolated pavilions which have a nostalgia for their once remote, rural setting. And in an effort to preserve these faded glories, the university scandalously under-uses its land holdings while at the same time it gobbles up more land.

If the university were to develop its existing land holdings in accordance with city planning law it could increase the total university floor space to date by 50 per cent — or enough space to accommodate a total of 50,000 students. There is no need to take more land for the Chiller Plant, Innis College or the Ontario College of Education.

In spite of statements to the contrary by the Director of Physical Plant F. Hastie the U of T does not develop its land holdings to the maximum permissible coverage, but rather continues to buy land, demolish housing, and justify such actions by claiming they are necessary for expansion.

Present university planning tries to keep the campus apart from the city, as if to say the educational process must be introverted and physically isolated from its environment.

The street is the interface between the university and the city — it is common ground which serves as a part of a metropolitan scale system. To change one part, as the University has attempted with its plan to close St. George St., is to affect the entire city-wide network.

The streets running through the university are places to fight traffic, dodge the stop light and head off into another building. In the city the street is a message-giver, a meeting place and an outdoor public room. When the university fled the medieval monasteries in the 12th century it took to the streets, rented its teaching spaces and owned a sidewalk.

The basis of much of our study has been to investigate ways of bringing the city and the university together and to try to establish a climate where dialogue between the two can take place.

We have found that the university does not need more land and it perhaps does not even need new buildings as long as it is grossly under-using the ones it already owns.

In an effort to make the university a part of, and not apart from, the city, we have exploited the potential of the street as one of many alternatives to present expansion plans.

SCENE ON BLOOR

On Bloor St. the university jolts up against the city. It is a conservative and aloof resident making no effort to disclose what it is. The underside of a rarely used stadium and two sober buildings display the university's disinterest in the crowds of promenaders wandering around this part of the city.

The university's landholdings here are some of the most valuable and most underused real estate in Toronto.

We propose to continue to develop the prestigious office and residential facilities that are a part of the street one block east and to exploit the development as a new educational scene.

The university should begin to exert its presence along Bloor St. in much the same way as the Royal Ontario Museum has moved its Ming china out onto Avenue Rd.

The university would also provide a large open green meadow off the street in the area between Philosopher's Walk and Devonshire Place — a space for picnics and summer theatre, ice skating, music festivals and gatherings. A place for the city and the university — to sit in the sun and think aloud; to be alone, or with others.

ON FREEWAYS AND BILLBOARDS

University Avenue, which bounds the eastern sector of the campus, is a major vehicular route in the city carrying an average of 60,000 cars daily. Yet to these passing motorists the campus is insignificant and uninviting — presenting an iron fence and the backs of Hart House, Wycliffe College and the Library.

The university should take advantage of the opportunity presented by University Ave. to inform the larger community of its activities and happenings. It must learn the importance of highway frontage for advertising.

The introduction of electrographic billboards along University Avenue is an appropriate way of making this contact. In size the billboards could resemble those on the 401 and would extend along the length of the roadway — almost $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile.

Through the use of electronic and cinematographic projection the Avenue would present an ever-changing newsboard. Where information, such as moon-landings and national election, require continuous viewing, automobile drive-in and sound hook-up systems could be provided.

Accordingly there would be the necessity for large tarmac parking areas off University ave., which would resemble a suburban shopping centre car park with back-up facilities — gas stations, washrooms, mobile cafeteria and ice cream bars.

UNIVERSITY

THE STREET IS A STUDENT CENTRE

St. George St. between Harbord and Wilcocks is the most heavily used pedestrian section of the campus. The east side is lined with residences and along the west side is a loose assembly of the university's major academic buildings. The street is featureless and, after 5 o'clock is desolate and windswept.

Yet St. George St. has everything going for it to become the university's student centre. Just as Kensington Market where the fruit stands and shops are open to pedestrians, similarly St. George St. could be a series of spaces accommodating social facilities, political clubs, eating places and commercial activities located immediately on the sidewalk, accessible to students and public alike.

By its very nature the student-centre street would be very different from the "members only" centre projected for the corner of Russell and St. George. In appearance it will resemble any well-used pedestrian area in the city — Chinatown or Yorkville — with the usual ticky-tacky paraphernalia of billboards, posters, lights and vending machines.

The student centre would, like any street, be constantly changing, accommodating new requirements, and housing additional activities in spaces which have become obsolete. This would necessitate a building technology which could be assembled and dismantled easily and quickly — a Meccano set of lightweight components inflatable structures and mobile trailers providing cheap, quick enclosure — a far cry from the monolithic tomb at Scarborough College.

This man is losing his store

He was in Auschwitz for only a couple of months. He got married in the refugee camps after the war.

Now he has magazine racks of SICK, ACE, KNIGHT, CLIMAX — a dusty haphazard display window.

And he seems to be a happy man. So they will try again.

They feel it is just another variety store. But the 'just-another-variety-store' does not exist — if there are people who look closely at the parts of the city that they touch and need. But those who touch to infect are rarely those who look.

"The agent was from Crown Trust, not the University... the University did not even know there was a store here!" said the white-haired man behind the counter.

Morris Dimanstein speaks quite easily to you, as to any other customer. He is five feet and not very many inches tall; white-haired and with thoughts and emotions flickering across his features. Occasionally during the two hours we talked he would dart around from behind the counter and march purposefully up to me to state with succinctness what merited it; then he was behind the counter again.

At first he was silent. A young man in by ray conlogue shades and overcoat was moving intermittently toward the door, Spadina Avenue roaring distantly behind him through the storefront, Sussex Avenue to his right. A milk jug under one arm and a loaf of bread under the other.

Auschwitz is far from the parental home at Frankfurt-am-Mainz, but Morris Dimanstein was much younger than, and stronger. Two months in the death camp must have left him most of his strength...

"I think the Residents' Association is a vested interest," said the fellow in sunglasses. "... they're making a killing, making a lot of money off students. Their houses are paid off." To his left, that is, proceeding north on Spadina Avenue, were ten gutted houses, Nos. 677 to 689. He had rented three houses to students, but two of them — 685 and 689 — were presently pits of raw brick and broken foundation. Could I use his name? No, he still rented 691. Then the University owns the houses? Yes.

...most of his strength, because they took him back to Germany, I was working in a factory for airplanes in 1945... the Oberschaffner — I not know how you say this, maybe, 'General' — he came from the factory to Auschwitz...

"You can be a good landlord or a bad landlord," said the fellow. "I charged $15 for a room and a kitchen; it's $20-$25 elsewhere.

"Now, if they're going to tear down a house for no good reason, I won't take it lying down.

But I got three months' notice, and I moved my tenants into another house."

His last house was standing because it's a duplex with 693, which Simcoe Hall has not yet purchased; until then, 691 is safe. Could I use his name? "Yes." He is Bill Jackson, a chemical engineering graduate who wants little to do with the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association... "people have been rattling the University too much" when it had no choice in the matter of expansion.

Besides, "I didn't want to be too much behind them (the Residents' Association) because of the shakiness of my tenure."

"...the soldiers worked in the factory before, now they were gone to the front, you understand?... The war is nearly over... so they brought these strong young people from Auschwitz..."

A man's uprooting brings memories, fears and philosophy, especially to a Jewish store-keeper who has been fifteen years watching the door open and close. Now that door has ragged cardboard and a serawl:

STORE FIXTURES FOR SALE BARGAINS!

"I sold the store five years ago to the University, I sold it for $36,000." Was that a good price?

"...they took us to Germany to work in the factory... afterward the American planes came and put fire bombs — you understand? bombs?"

(and the whole neighborhood is going too)

— they put fire bombs on the factory. . . they took us away from this place. . . this is hard for me to explain; little by little you will understand. . . they take us to the gas chamber. . .

A good price? "Hard to say. . . I no want to blame myself. Nobody forced me to sign it. . . in everything is something, you look back, it could have been better. What my wife said to me, 'I told you not to sell.' You feel sorry for yourself." His thoughts come in separate gentle parcels, each one shifting as he gropes for words. Often he backtracks and tries once more, "you understand?" tumbles out uncertainly again and again.

. . . to the gas chamber, like the old people, they no need us any more. . . give me 16 milk, two orange (to the just-arrived dairyman) . . . every day we walk ten miles to another city where they take the people, but then the General. . . the Obershaffirer. . . has to go to the front. . . Mister Arthur? (to a trembling very old man) . . . Mister Arthur? What, no newspaper today? Yes? Okay. . .

"There is two kinds of people," said this milk philosopher, looking clearly at me over the counter, "one kind, you hear someone yell 'Help! Help!' you jump in to help him, the other kind. . ." the ancient rococo cash register rings a sale, but the dirty tin numbers with curved tops no longer fly up.

"Now you come to the conclusion. . . he (referring to Jackson) just goes in temporarily. But me, the agent came and said, sell it now or later they take you to court, you get less."

"I talk to them, this" — to the University, asking $2000 for his stock, "so they said they will start at the top." Of the ten houses? Yes, Simcoe Hall has time and money, but it hurts less to spend time — "I will see the last houses torn down, then I will go." With no compensation for unsold stock, I ask if that is fair. . .

. . . we would smell, we would feel how the situation is. . . the war will soon be over. . . I feel like I can't walk any more, so we escape. . . The tale of the night in the farmhouse, the strafings by Russian aircraft, the impromptu burial details along the road; but mostly the farmhouse — "At 3 in the morning the Obershaffirer calls us out, we walk out while the soldiers watch us. But me, with my friend, we hide — you know how, for cows, the floor is lower — we hide on the floor" he says with glee, "and we hear all the soldiers leave. . ."

No compensation for stock? Is that fair? "They know already is not fair. . . they bought this like just a piece of land. . . Intently for some seconds he is quiet. "There is two classes of people. . . one is quiet, the other wants his right. . . I know what is my right. . . they are stronger, they are different class, different people. . . I cannot fight them. . ." But amongst these echoes of another country, another time comes the determination of the man in front of me: "I would make them take me to court, send a bailiff, take months. . . but I won't. . ." Perhaps the true echo is of the strength this graying man once had; perhaps the echo of "different class, different people" is no echo at all. . . "I am too old to fight, I am too nervous. . ."

" . . . we hear the soldiers leave, we wait, then we go out to a — how you say, of straw, a pile —?" "A haystack?" "Yes, yes, a haystack, where there is a hole, you know, for air under the side, you understand?" "Yes, I understand. "Well, we crawl in" he says exultantly, "we stay there for a whole day, then we go to the farmhouse; ah! you must understand how we look. . . we are not nice, we have Auschwitz clothes on us, and beard, and hair! Very long, except," he makes the gesture of shears running down the center of his head, "so they know we are prisoners. . ."

" . . . I am too nervous. . . from a concentration camp, now I go to fight again?" You were in a concentration camp? "Yes, yes. . . From a few years I have to live, for a few dollars, even if I win, the whole aggravation is not worth it."

" . . . and a lawyer. . . they have better lawyers."

" . . . we walk not normal, too, like this," and he shuffles, leaning forward as he does it, " . . . so they know, the farmers, who we are. . . But they feed us, and we rest, and they give us old clothes." "The transformation is complete, except "I only weight about 60 pounds. . ."

" . . . the agent was from Crown Trust, not the University. . . the University did not even know there was a store here! He came in here to the store. . . I don't know to who to talk. . . he was representing the University. . ."

He offered you $36,000?

"Not so fast," with some vexation and pride, spreading the flat of his hand before me, "Not so fast. . . thirty-two, thirty-four, thirty-six. . ."

" . . . but we go away, and some French people find us, and help us to travel away. . . and so I come to Toronto. . . I work for New York Furs for ten years. . . Yes, I am a furrier. . . but I want my own place, so in 1955 I buy this store. . ."

Finally the tales converge, and it is all said. He obtained finally thirty-six thousand dollars for this property which he was assured would be torn down soon. That was in 1965. Mr. Dimanstein accepted a month-by-month rental until the wreckers should come. That monthly rental has continued for five years and now, according to Stan Benjamin, the planner who is also president of the Residents' Association, the property on which Mr. Dimanstein's store rests is likely worth $65,000 to $70,000.

I find myself looking idly about the store, at the dusty unkept merchandise and at the six-seven-five worked into the little colored glass panels that run across the top of the front window. These casual bursts of stained glass are the ornament of a bygone architecture and now, as with everything else in a Toronto February, they have lost much of their glory.

As I prepared to leave, I recall the detail of the concentration camp. Mr. Dimanstein would be glad to tell me about it, he says. . . "but it is only one per cent from the life story, there is so much to say. . ."

Going out, I study the display window, picking out posters in degrees of storefront oblivion: from Sweet Caporal's "Poker Hands" to Player's "so good they're guaranteed" . . . Now! Peter Jackson offers $10,000 and Belvedere "Instant Cash Certificates." They lurch at musty angles. The climate was poor.

"What I received for this store is nothing. . . rents are high, it is hard. But to be sorry is nothing, I have to go out, I have to go out. . ." His voice fades now, there is the noise of demolition. You can go and look. There are only one-and-a-half houses left between the corbar and the little variety store on the corner of Sussex and Spadina.

And the wreckers wreck quickly.

A First Lesson In Canadian History (or

In the beginning there was American capitoll...

J. A. Hobson
1858-1940

Although Hobson was a liberal British economist and free trade advocate, his famous study Imperialism was a major influence on Lenin's political theories. He came to Canada in 1906 to "make a special inquiry into the effects of the tariff on political relations between Canada, Great Britain and the United States." Even at the turn of the century, he could see the growing dominance of American capital in the Canadian economy.

"... if Canada is really destined to quick development it will be achieved by a large influx of American capital and labour, inventive and organizing energy. What is already happening makes this manifest. . . .

"... Indeed it is one of the frequent boasts of the Canadian protectionist that his tariff sucks in American capital, forcing the great Trusts to set up inside Canada, with Canadian labour, instead of exporting goods from their American mills, though in the next breath the same protectionist, in his capacity of British Imperialist, expresses his regret that British capital will not come into Canadian 'industrials'. A large proportion of the big manufacturers and railroad men are American horn and the training and business ideas they bring are imported from the States."

"... This widespread reckless alienation of lands, mines, forests, and water powers has virtually handed over the control of the future of Canada to a group of economic potentates similar to those who today rule the destinies of the great American Republic.

The same triangle of capitalists forces is seen — railroads, financial companies, industrial trusts — and the greatest of these is the railroads. It requires little study of the map of Canada to perceive that the railroad is there a more potent ruler than in any other country of the world. The whole of Canada today is a thin trickle of population and of industry along a long-drawn-out railroad. The CPR is by far the greatest institution in the country. It is rightly known as 'the government on wheels'. . . . Its investors had the courage and the faith to stake their money on the future of the country at a time when the Government quailed before the risk and the expense. For this lack of courage and of faith the people of Canada will pay a heavy price — the price of their economic liberty."

Canada Today (1906)

... it was only a matter of time before the British century came to an end. The new age dawned.

A.M.R. Lower
1897-

This noted Canadian historian and nationalist recalls the event of the hirth of the new colonialism and also the leading midwife's story of how it all happened.

"One nice old lady asked me whether, in the event of a German victory, 'the British empire would be moved to Canada'. No madam, I replied, it would be moved to the United States. She seemed rather surprised at the answer, but in the light of the last twenty years, is that not pretty much what has happened?"

"... our Winnipeg Institute of International Affairs was addressed by a leading civil servant, one L. B. Pearson. He talked on 'War and Canadian-American Relations' which he himself at the time was helping to keep smooth. I have forgotten most of what he said, except one statement. Talking about our position in Washington, he made it clear that we were able to maintain special relationships with both the British and the Americans because of our ambivalent nature, which made us British with the British and American with the Americans: as he put it, 'we can work both sides of the street.' I have always understood that this phrase referred to ladies who made their living on the streets in not the most honorable ways. I asked Mr. Pearson if he did not think we, Canada, were in much the same position as these ladies. The meeting did not seem to like the comparison too well."

My First Seventy-Five Years (1967)

The meeting may not have liked Lower's comparison but reality has a way of defying audiences. It also starts to bother people . . . like . . .

Harold Innis
1894-1952

The man after whom Innis College is named was the first Canadian to be appointed chairman of the University of Toronto Political Economy Department and later became Dean of Graduate studies here. Internationally famous for his painstakingly detailed studies of Canadian capitalism, this liberal political economist turned in later life to developing theories of communications and studying the cultural effects of American domination of the Canadian economy. In all this he leaves an insight into the many different ways that "Canadian history is on the point of being reversed from nation back into colony".

"... It is both a source of constant frustration to attempt to be a Canadian. Both Great Britain and the United States encourage us in assuming the false position that we are a great power and in urging that we have great national and imperial possibilities. From both groups we are increasingly subjected to pressure and in turn to bureaucratic tendencies dictated by external forces . . . We seem destined to occupy in North America the place of Czechoslovakia as a show window in relation to Russia in Europe, first as to the British Empire and second as to the American Empire."

The Church in Canada (1947)

"Rigidities in some relationships between Canada and the United States have accentuated concentration on flexibilities in others . . . Capital movements have been encouraged in every possible way. American firms not only have responded to encouragement but have been quick to see the implications of differences in price levels or of instability in American policy and have set up branch plants to take advantage not only of the Canadian market but also of the diverse markets provided by imperial and other agreements. The automobile and the agricultural implement industries will serve as illustrations. The aluminum industry on the Saguenay was a result not only of the search for investment in hydro-electric power development by the Duke interests but also of the search for a means by which the Aluminum Company of America would participate effectively in a world cartel. American industry has recognized the importance of maintaining a position in other countries to offset the effects of disturbances in the U.S."

Recent Developments in the Canadian Economy (1941)

"In the Anglo-Saxon world we have a new mobilization of force in the United States with new perils and all the resources of culture and language of the English-speaking peoples, including those of the United States, will be necessary to resist it. In the crudest terms, military strategy dominated by public opinion would be disastrous.

"... Canadians can scarcely understand the attitude of hostility of Europeans towards Americans because of the overwhelming influence upon them of American propaganda. Americans are the best propagandists because they are the best advertisers. Whatever hope of continued autonomy Canada may have in the future must depend on her success in withstanding American influence and the pressure of the United States and Russia. But there is little evidence that she is capable of these herculean efforts and much that she will continue to be regarded as an instrument of the United States."

Great Britain, Canada and United States (1948)

"The development of advertising and mass propaganda masquerading as education compel the consent of the governed. Legal institutions like religious institutions tend to be weakened as bulwarks of liberty. The overwhelming amount and complexity of legislation inspired by bureaucracies weakens the influence of the courts by adding to their burdens and stressing the spread of administrative law. The social sciences reflect the demands of industrialism and capitalism.

Political Economy in The Modern State (1944)

Faced with all these threats, how did the Canadian intellectual academics react? The most outspoken critic against the latter was . . .

Frank Underhill
1890-

A Canadian historian who taught at Victoria College, and a founder of the CCF, Underhill edited The Canadian Forum when it was a radical periodical. In the cold war atmosphere and economic boom of the 50's, he gave up his radicalism and became an apologist for Pearson.

The Conception of a National Interest (1935)

With only token resistance from labour, students and intellectuals, in the early 60's the Canadian government finally had a free hand in selling the resources of the Canadian people to the Americans. An early voice of protest was that of . . .

George Graat

Philosopher, social critic and educator, he was the first since the fifties to reintroduce nationalism to a pacified Canadian public. His book Lament for a Nation in 1965 created a controversy. It was an indictment of the settler. But in true colonial style, his pessimism underestimated much of what he had to say.

" . . . after 1940 it was not in the interests of the economically powerful to be nationalists. Most of them made more money by being the representatives of American capitalism and setting up the branch plants. No class in Canada more welcomed the American managers than the established wealthy of Montreal and Toronto, who had once been themselves the pillars of Canada. Nor should this be surprising. Capitalism is, after all, a way of life based on the principle that the most important activity is profit-making. That activity led the wealthy in the direction of continentalism. They lost nothing essential to the principle of their lives in losing their country. It is this very fact that has made capitalism the great solvent of all traditions in the modern era. When everything is made relative to profit-making, all traditions of virtue are dissolved, including that aspect of virtue known as love of country. This is why liberalism is the perfect ideology for capitalism. It demolishes those taboos that restrain expansion. Even the finest talk about internationalism opens markets for the powerful."

"The economic self-seekers had never been the ones to care about Canada as a nation."

Lament for A Nation (1965)

But the ever-increasing domination of the Canadian economy did not alarm the Ottawa establishment; they welcomed and threw their political lot in with it. On occasion they documented this takeover with bureaucratic indifference. One of them was. . . .

J. J. Deutsch

A prominent economist and former head of the Economic Council of Canada he is now principal of Queen's University. He had a privileged view of everything that went on in Ottawa during the Pearson years.

"Geographical proximity, the desire of security in the circumstances of the cold war, and the absence of impediments to foreign enterprise and foreign investment all gave Canada a decided advantage, in the eyes of the United States interest over alternative foreign sources. . . . When shortly after the War, new discoveries indicated that the prairie provinces contained large pools of oil and gas, the huge United States international companies with their world-wide experience, know-how and ready access to capital moved in on a large scale. This was facilitated by the fact that a number of these companies were already established in Canada and also, by the fact that if Canadian production of oil and gas expanded sufficiently, outlets would have to be found in the United States in any case. The discovery in Canada of immense resources of uranium coincided with the search by the U.S. of adequate and assured supplies of this strategic material for the atomic energy program."

"The Canadian frontier became The North American Frontier."

Recent American Influence in Canada

. . . and what the Canadian intellectuals didn't want to hear, a hard-nosed American cold warrior could and did analyse far them.

Hugh G. J. Aitken

Aitken is one of the few American academics who specializes in the study of Canada. Most notably, he has co-authored Canadian Economic History with Tom Easterbrook, Canadian head of U of T's Political Economy Department. He describes to American audiences the benefits of exploiting the land to the North.

United States private foreign investment has tended to concentrate in those areas of the world that offer a relatively high degree of security, principally Canada, Western Europe, and certain parts of Latin America. . . . Long-run commitments of capital, of the type that resource development requires, are impossible without assurance that property rights shall be inviolate. This is the basic prerequisite; anything short of this is merely tinkering with the problem. . . .

"The unexploited but potentially rich resources of the world exist today, by and large, in areas that have been outside or on the margin of the spread of industrial, urban civilization. These are, to speak in general terms, the areas we call "underdeveloped." They are also the areas most affected at present by poverty, by the virus of anticolonialism, by suspicion of western capitalism, and by the deep-seated desire to become masters of their own political and economic destinies. Development of the natural resources of such countries by foreign corporations, particularly when the raw materials produced are destined for use outside the country of origin, is a delicate enterprise. . . .

"At present, however, Canada occupies a distinctive position as a field for American resource investment, for it offers at one and the same time all the advantages of a highly developed commercial society and all the attractions of a resource frontier whose potentialities have so far barely been tapped. The positive virtues of the developed and the undeveloped are there present in a single economy. A vigorous society, highly commercialized in its outlook, enjoying stable government under a well established political and legal system. . . . it can claim the second highest standard of living in the world and a climate for investment that, despite an embryonic nationalism, leaves little to be desired". . . . Add to these considerations similarity of language and culture, geographical proximity, a closely integrated continental transport system, and commitment to joint defense, and the rationale for American investment in Canada becomes clear."

American Capital and Canadian Resources (1961)

Late in the 60's a few liberals stepped, looked around and asked, "My God, What's Happening To the Country?" One of these was Walter Gardan.

He went on a campaign to buy Canada back from the Americans. But the Americans weren't selling. And even if they did, the question remained "Who are they going to sell it back to?" Gardan suggested the present Canadian branch-plant managers. But it's too late for that. Even Trudeau laughs at the idea. What then are the political implications of the new nationalism?

"Bourgeois nationalism is a spent force in Canada. The Canadian people are indifferent to it and the bourgeoisie themselves have no faith in it. What remains powerful and alive in the national consciousness is the force of sentimental nationalism. It expresses the discontent and the general anxiety of the Canadian people with their future of living in an advanced capitalist and advanced colonial state. . . .

"Sentimental nationalism is not a revolutionary force because it does not isolate and crystallize the economic contradictions of capitalism. But it does create the conditions out of which will evolve a revolutionary nationalism — namely, anti-imperialism, which provides the only alternative to the policies of the Canadian bourgeoisie. As a anti-imperialist struggle is the only way to break through the tight circle of Canadian history. Anti-imperialism, anti-capitalism and Canadian independence are an inseparable unity."

The Canadian Bourgeoisie and Its National Consciousness" (1970) by D. Drache.

"An independence movement based on substituting Canadian capitalists for American capitalists, or on public policy to make foreign corporations behave as if they were Canadian corporations, cannot be our final objective.

"Capitalism must be replaced by socialism, by national planning of investment and by the public ownership of the means of production in the interests of the Canadian people as a whole. Canadian nationalism is a relevant force on which to build to the extent that it is anti-imperialist. On the road to socialism, such aspirations for independence must be taken into account. For to pursue independence seriously is to make visible the necessity of socialism in Canada."

Teitelbaum sees SAC as apolitical

By MARY BASTEDO

Bernie Teitelbaum has had his campaign posters up for two weeks. "Teitelbaum is SAC President," they read. (And in small print - "elect. Please confirm with your vote.")

"If the election were tomorrow I'd win because I'm the only name everybody knows," Teitelbaum said in an interview last night. "I'm the only one who has had signs up since before reading week."

"The person who wins this election will be the one with the best advertising. That's how uninvolved the students are," he said.

Teitelbaum, a third-year commerce and finance student, is the only one of the SAC Presidential candidates who has run for the job before. Last year he was in the race but dropped out before the election.

"Last year I ran because I was thoroughly disgusted with everything. I thought, 'What in the world are these pinkos doing to us?'"

He dropped out because he felt Gus Abols and he had the same ideals and he didn't want to split the vote.

Now he's running again for those same ideals.

"The big problem with SAC is that it's political," he said.

His main concern is working for the students' interests. "I think you can separate the student interests from the political arena. You can lift student interests off the political spectrum when they don't deal with the administration or the community."

"In SAC now," he said, "people don't give a damn about the student interests. They're only interested in scoring political points."

Teitelbaum is not a past SAC member but he feels during the past year he has been one de facto because he has attended most of the meetings. During the fall term he went to about half of the executive meetings and all of the SAC meetings except those at Scarborough and Erindale.

He is very critical of the internal system of SAC "which involves no one but its own members." He would like to involve more students in SAC programs and activities.

"I'm not trying to drag people into involvement but they will want to get involved," he says. "I think every student would want to be involved in at least one facet of SAC's activities."

"If I am elected president next year, there will be at least 15,000 undergraduates going to vote in the next election."

Teitelbaum is eager to see the campus centre built and would like to work to get it funded from outside sources, an approach he feels has been rejected by past SAC presidents.

"People will say they don't want a Wallace McCutcheon memorial gymnasium but that's the way you do it - get money from outside."

He does not want to see the CUG report implemented as it now stands.

"I don't believe in a unica-merial system. You can't have 160 people reaching a consensus." Lay people should compose the largest proportion of any top governing structure because any group within the university has low credibility in the community, and with the government's austerity program, lay people are very important for outside funding."

Teitelbaum is also the only candidate running without a vice-presidential running-mate.

"What do you need a running mate for?" he asked. "Once you are elected it doesn't matter whether two people agree with each other. You need a united SAC."

His slogan - "A house divided cannot stand."

Erindale College has cancelled all normal activities on Wednesday February 25th so that students, faculty and support staff could discuss university government and education.

The symposium is being sponsored by the Erindale College council.

The meeting will act as an idea generator with the students and faculty talking about a direction for the college.

Classes will again be cancelled next Thursday, March 5th to continue planning for the future of Erindale College.

Hurd sees SAC as seeker of solutions

By LAURA KELLY

Rod Hurd and Eric Miglin look and talk like men who could make the quarter of a million-dollar SAC business run smoothly. Genial, with cleanly-cut beards, they are candidates for the Student Administrative Council presidency and vice-presidency.

"We have a company with a quarter million dollars and it doesn't seem like it's working that hard for students," said Hurd.

Hurd is a third year psychology student and the president of the Scarborough student council. Eric Miglin is a second year Engineering student and a SAC member.

The two candidates deplored SAC's lack of financial responsibility and inconsistent allotment of funds.

SAC has stated priorities, but it doesn't adhere to them," said Hurd.

"It's the easiest thing in the world to give away money, but SAC should offer real supportive assistance and commitment," added Miglin.

Hurd and Miglin talked about a SAC that would listen to student feedback, and then organize or promote groups that allow for student involvement.

Hurd enthusiastically described an action group that would mobilize students for one day community action activities involving no long range commitment.

"Students are busy people, they have essays to write and other commitments. I suppose this is treating the symptoms and not the cause. But the cause has to be treated higher up on a government level," said Hurd.

Hurd and Miglin want a SAC that is relevant to the normal student's educational career at U of T.

"I'm not so sure SAC should be committing financial resources to world movements," said Hurd.

"SAC has attempted too much to politicize students," added Miglin.

Hurd and Miglin are more interested in setting up loan bureaus, or planning committees that would give students a say about new residences.

"The New Left is good as a catalyst to get the ball rolling but when that period is over you have to get people in there that can do the work and organize," said Miglin.

"SAC is doing a lot of good things, CUG, Campbell, but it can't seem to keep more than one good project going at a time," said Hurd.

With SAC as co-ordinator, and students as volunteers and consultants, Hurd foresees a well-balanced, give and take, tight university community.

"If everybody puts their heads together, we'll come up with solutions," said Hurd.

Presidential Hopefuls

Richardson to unify university community

By KARL HAUENSTEIN

The spirit of Marshall McLuhan is alive and well in the persons of Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy, for SAC president and vice-president on a joint ticket.

Richardson (IV APSC) and McEvoy (III VIC) see the most significant problem involved in "making SAC work" as being the lack of communication between it and the rest of the university.

Actively involved in such groups as the CUG Implementation Committee and the Stop Spadina Committee, they are very concerned about the future of SAC and the university.

"The situation which developed this year in SAC was that the members were drawing up sides on different issues, resulting in political in-fighting and a break down of effective communication."

To remedy this situation Richardson and McEvoy feel that the university should be made into a more unified community, rather than the "commuter university" it is now where people attend classes but do not really become involved in its affairs.

SAC should encourage and initiate programs in which the students are forced to become involved in the affairs of the university and be able to relate what they learn in the classroom to the outside community and vice versa.

To do this, SAC should take the funds given it by the students and, rather than invest it in off-campus groups, as it has frequently done in the past, use it to finance educational measures which will involve the students and inform them and the community.

Such programs, says McEvoy, would be in the form of television productions and grants to different film groups to work on topics which relate to the university but also involve the community.

The three main newspapers in the city should be approached, says Richardson, with the idea of running a university column on a regular basis. All students would be free to contribute to this column to inform other students and the outside community of the functions of the university.

Thus the community would be educated as to how its problems are interrelated with those of the university and there would be an increased sense of unity between the students, the university and the community.

To make this community possible, Richardson and McEvoy maintain that a change in the university structure is necessary, both at the higher and lower levels.

They support the university-wide committee, proposed by the CUG Programming Committee, to be representative of all the present decision-making bodies. It will allow a two-way flow of dialogue, starting in the classroom with students and instructors communicating to establish a situation in which both sides learn.

Dialogue would then move all the way up the structure.

The first step would then be taken in making the university a true community in which its members can relate the workings of the community to the world outside.

To further promote community spirit, Richardson and McEvoy feel that research is desirable to discover whether there should be preferential admission and financial assistance offered to students from economically and culturally deprived areas of Toronto, who would not other wise be given the chance to attend university.

Their platform rests on the need to get students involved in a unified university. They hope to make the SAC the unifying force.

UNHAPPY ABOUT THE SYSTEM?

Interested in a real challenge? Then teaching is the job for you! The profession needs bright young people who are willing to dedicate themselves to improving education in Ontario. Here is the answer for people who are really concerned and want to do something constructive about our educational system.

Education is as stimulating, challenging and progressive as its teachers make it. If you don't like the way it is, get in there and change it!

Exciting things are already happening throughout the system from kindergarten to Grade 13. Did you know, for example, that:

1. there are schools in operation now in which the children determine their own program in collaboration with their teachers?
2. children as young as 6 or 7 years old are learning how to do research, and are carrying out their own?
3. children are creating and living history and drama rather than reading about it?
4. children are visiting places like the City Hall in order to learn about today, or places like Pioneer Village in order to learn about yesterday?
5. there are schools in which children are not confined to a particular 4-walled classroom, 30-35 classmates, and one teacher, but are free to move about in a large open area in which they work with a team of teachers, different ones at different times of the day; and a few or many classmates depending upon the activity in progress?

But this is not the situation everywhere in Ontario schools. It is not even the situation everywhere in Metro Toronto, Why? Because more people like you — young, interested, ambitious and hard-working are needed!

Did you know that as a teacher you are paid according to your education and receive the same salary and benefits no matter whether you teach 5-year-olds or 18-year-olds? Did you know that the opportunities for advancement for bright young people are good?

If you would like to know more about teaching particularly at the Public School and Junior High School (Senior School) level, come to the meeting Wednesday, February 25 at 4 p.m. in the Sidney Smith Building, Rm. 1083 and find out more. The challenge is out — are you up to it?

Important G.S.U. meeting

Tuesday's general meeting of the Graduate Students' Union promises to be a long and bitter one.

Among many items on the agenda is a motion to rehire Miss Marjaleena Repo, fired from her position as organizer for "failing to comply with the terms of her contract."

Michael Vaughan, GSU President, says Miss Repo stopped attending meetings and submitting the required weekly reports last December.

Three members of the executive council, Neil Keller, Larry Hoffman and Craig McKay voted against the motion to dismiss Miss Repo.

Even with the council thus divided against itself, neither side expects a flare-up.

Although she anticipates a "very calm and reasonable meeting", Miss Repo says, "I think that there might be some motion to censure Mr. Vaughan for his conduct."

Vaughan, however, does not expect the walk-outs which characterized previous GSU meetings. "We must get through the constitutional by-laws. With the elections just ahead of us, this is definitely the most pressing issue before us," says Vaughan.

Also on the agenda, are a motion of incorporation and the building and renovation proposals which would provide the proposed Graduate Student Centre with a bar.

6% maximum raise for ATS

The University Budget Committee is not giving any ground on the Association of Teaching Staff demand for a 22 per cent salary increase.

At a meeting Wednesday night, the Budget Committee informed the ATS salaries committee that it could foresee a maximum increase of only six per cent.

Philosophy Prof. Wayne Summer a member of the salaries committee said last night. "The offer is completely unacceptable to us.

"The ball is in our court now and it's up to us to show them that more money is in fact available," he said.

Negotiations are scheduled to resume Friday.

You Can make SAC work

SAC is a sick organization. Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy are running for president and vice pres. of SAC because they want to work with you and other students in the university to make it healthy again.

They know what is wrong with SAC... that it doesn't communicate with its constituents enough, that it makes irresponsible political commitments it has no right making, and that it is torn by internal factionalism.

They know these things because they have had to fight them as they sought to do something constructive on SAC... Richardson with the Campus Center, briefs on Hart House, and the Spadina Expressway, and McEvoy as chairman of the SAC University Committee in its dealings with CUG.

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy are convinced that they can overcome the problems facing SAC... by building communications links between SAC and individual students, by avoiding political entanglements which have nothing to do with the University, and by listening to ideas, no matter where they come from.

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy are both deeply committed to the concept of community in the university as set forth in the CUG report. They have proven the depth of that commitment in their years on SAC.

They want very much to transform SAC into the kind of vital, relevant organization that can act as a powerful agent for developing that concept into reality.

They need your vote to do it.

Winegard to answer students

GUELPH (CUP) — University of Guelph administration president W. C. Winegard Friday stalled for time in the face of student demands for an open hearing with student participation in the case of dismissed sociology professor Donald Grady.

Winegard had been given until noon Friday to respond to student proposals for a committee to review the case of Grady — dismissed without stated reason by the Guelph administration after receiving a recommendation for tenure from a sociology department committee.

As the deadline expired, Winegard declared that he was "unable to respond" to the student demands in the stated time, but promised to give an answer by noon today.

The student demands arose as a counter-proposal to administration suggestions for a review committee in Grady's case, grudgingly issued nearly a month after students launched a protest against the unorthodox firing.

Winegard had suggested a review committee consisting of three tenured faculty: one chosen by Grady, one named by the administration, and a chairman named by the other two nominees.

Hearings under Winegard's proposed committee would be "informal and private" and its decision would be "binding on both sides."

At a mass meeting last Wednesday, about 700 students heard a counter-proposal suggesting student parity on the sociology department's tenure and promotions committee, administrative disclosure of all reasons for refusal to accede to departmental recommendations for promotion, and the right to an open hearing in all cases where departmental decisions were reversed.

In addition, the students approved a review committee format that Grady agreed to: two tenured and two non-tenured faculty with one of each category chosen by the administration and by Grady; two students selected from the sociology department, and a chairman elected and agreed upon by the other committee members.

About 190 students presented their proposal to Winegard personally Wednesday.

Grady, dropped from the faculty in January, was a leader in a fight for student participation in the Guelph sociology department on a one-man, one-vote basis.

Senior faculty crushed the move last November after the department voted to support an October strike by campus workers.

GSU Amended Proposed By-Laws as Ap-

I PREAMBLE

The By-laws enacted herein are those of the Graduate Students' Union, University of Toronto, as chartered by the Province of Ontario, (date) (documentation).

II GENERAL COUNCIL

A. Function and Procedure

- (1) The General Council shall be the supreme policy-making body of the Union except when a general meeting is sitting.
- (2) The General Council shall normally meet at least once every two weeks during regular academic session and at least once a month during the summer session.
- (3) Notification of Regular General Council Meetings and Special Meetings must include the following:
 - i. notification to each member of the General Council
 - ii. notification in Varsity and/or GSU publication if published prior to the meeting
- (4) Special General Council meetings shall be called no sooner than three days following the initiative of the Executive Committee, or the written request of one-third of the General Council, as submitted to the Chairman or President.

B. Membership

- (5) All departments, institutes, or other Schools, hereinafter called Departments of the School of Graduate Studies shall have separate representation on the General Council according to the following formula:
 - 1 - 100 graduate students - 1 elected representative
 - 101 - 200 graduate students - 2 elected representatives
 - 201 & up graduate students - 3 elected representatives
- (6) All departments may decide by a two-thirds vote of its members to affiliate for electoral purposes with another department within its division. The number of graduate students in the affiliating department shall be added to the other department's total to determine the number of representatives the combined electoral constituency shall have. Affiliate departments shall have full rights of candidacy and voting in elections to the General Council. The affiliation shall be terminated by a majority vote to disaffiliate in either department.
- (7) The President and Vice President shall be full voting members of the General Council.

III EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

A. Function and Procedure

- (8) The Executive Committee shall supervise the day to day functioning of the Union and shall ensure the implementation of the policies of the General Council.
- (9) The Executive Committee shall be responsible for the hiring, firing and discipline of Union employees.
- (10) The Executive Committee shall not make any financial loans without authorization of the General Council.
- (11) The Executive Committee shall normally meet once a week.
- (12) Notification of regular Executive Committee meetings and special meetings shall require notification to each member of the Executive Committee.
- (13) Emergency Executive Committee meetings shall be called upon request of half the membership of the Executive Committee or the President and two other members and shall be held within two days of such a request.

B. Membership

- (14) The voting members of the Executive Committee shall be:
 - The President
 - The Vice-President
 - The Treasurer
 - The Secretary
 - and not more than six other members of the General Council.
- (15) The President shall appoint the Treasurer, Secretary and two other voting representatives of the Executive Committee from the departmental representatives of the General Council. The remaining four voting representatives of the Executive Committee shall be elected from the departmental representatives by the General Council.
- (16) The General Council shall recall their four appointments by simple majority vote and Presidential appointments by a two-thirds vote of the Membership. At least two weeks notice must be given during the regular year, and at least four weeks during the summer, before this motion can be acted on.

C. Duties

- (17) The President shall:
 - i. serve as official representative and spokesman of the Union on all occasions.

proved by Course Union Representatives

C. President and Vice-President

- (42) Any voting graduate student member of the Union shall be eligible for the position of President or Vice-President

D. General Council

- (43) Elections to the General Council shall be managed by the Course Unions unless they request the Election Committee of the Graduate Students' Union to supervise it. Also in the case of constituencies where there is no established departmental organization the Election Committee shall hold the Election.
- (44) Elections managed by the Course Unions shall be held on an annual basis at whatever date is convenient to them although elections simultaneous with the Presidential election are preferred. These elections shall take place at either a general meeting of the membership of the Course Union or by a secret ballot open to all their members.
- (45) If no candidate is nominated for election to the General Council on the advertised date for election, the Course Union executive may appoint a representative. Before the appointment of a representative the vacancy must be advertised for a week in the departmental newsletter or bulletin board.
- (46) Each member of the Union shall be allowed to cast one ballot for the President and one for the Vice-President.
- (47) To be eligible to vote members must show ATL identification cards.

VI RECALL

- (48) The departmental representative shall be recalled by his departmental constituency or by a petition of two-fifths of his constituency as defined by the most recent SGS census. Elections shall occur within three weeks of recall. No more than 50% of recall petitioners may again petition the recall of the same individual if reinstated within a period of six weeks.
- (49) The President shall be recalled by a two-thirds vote of the General Council providing two weeks notice has been given. This removal shall automatically necessitate an election of all members of the General Council which shall occur within three weeks of recall provided that the former incumbent decides to run again.
- (50) The Vice-President, the Treasurer or the Secretary shall be recalled by a two-thirds vote of the General Council, providing that at least two weeks notice has been given. The President may not reappoint to office a senior officer recalled by the General Council, except with its previous permission.

VII CENSURE

- (51) The President, if censured by a simple majority vote of the General Council shall have the option within three days of the motion of censure of resigning and calling an election of all members of the General Council which shall occur within three weeks of his resignation, provided that the former incumbent decides to run again.

VIII AMENDMENTS OF BY-LAWS AND CHARTER

- (52) Motions to affiliate or disaffiliate the Union with any other bodies and amendments to the By-laws or Charter require two weeks notice to the General Council and shall only be voted on between October 15 and March 15. They require a two-thirds vote of the General Council and shall take effect six weeks after passage by the General Council unless a referendum has been requested.
- (53) A referendum shall be held if it is requested by at least one-quarter of the General Council or by at least two hundred Union members listing their ATL number submitted within six weeks of passage by the General Council. The referendum shall be held within three weeks of the submission of the valid petition and only between October 15th and March 15th.

IX EX OFFICIO OFFICERS

- (54) The Past President and Vice-President shall be full voting members of the General Council.
- (55) The Past President and Vice-President shall be removed by a two-thirds vote of the General Council.

X BY-LAWS AND CHARTER

- (56) Copies of the By-laws and the Charter shall be available to any member of the Union on request.

XI GENERAL MEETING

A. Function and Procedure

- (57) The General Meeting shall be the supreme policy-making body of the Union.
- (58) A General Meeting shall be held within three weeks of receipt of a petition to the Chairman or President with a number of signatories and accompanying ATL numbers at least equaling the quorum requirements for the General Meeting.
- (59) Notification of General Meetings shall require two weeks notice of all Union members by a newsletter stating the agenda or by both:
- notification sent to all graduate student departmental organizations or to graduate departments and posters on Union notice boards
 - at least two advertisements in the Varsity on separate days stating the agenda

B. Rules of Order

- (60) All meetings shall follow as the rules of their procedure Robert's Rules of Order Revised, except in such circumstances (i) where it shall have adopted its own rules by support of half the General Meeting (ii) where it is inconsistent with the by-laws and charter
- (61) All meetings shall be open to the public
- (62) There shall be no proxy voting allowed
- (63) The quorum shall be twice the size of the membership of the General Council

C. Recall

- (64) The General Meeting shall fire the President and senior members of the Executive Committee by a two-thirds vote and other members of the Executive Committee by a simple majority vote, according to the same procedures as established for the General Council.

D. Amendments

- (65) Motions to affiliate or disaffiliate the Union with any other bodies and amendments to the By-laws or Charter require two weeks notice before the General Meeting and shall be voted on between Oct. 15th and March 15th. They require a two-thirds vote of the General Meetings and shall take effect six weeks after passage by the General Meeting unless a referendum has been requested.
- (66) A referendum shall be held if it is requested by at least one-quarter of the members attending the General Meeting or by at least two hundred Union members listing their ATL number submitted within six weeks of passage by the General Meeting. The referendum shall be held within three weeks of the submission of the valid petition and only between October 15 and March 15.

SACSTUFF

DISCIPLINE

SAC has finally formulated a reply to the Campbell report. Copies are available in the SAC Office.

Two weeks ago the University of Saskatchewan came out with an incredible discipline code, which is even more blatantly repressive than the CPUO document. Both Regina and Saskatoon campuses are ready to explode. The administration there has control of their telex so students there cannot communicate with the rest of Canada.

UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT

The University Commission is conducting an educational campaign on governance in the university.

Ken McEvoy has been spending his budget on ads and reprints and mailings. Ask to be put on the mailing list.

If you received a questionnaire about CUG in the mail, and you do not know anything about that report, information about that document is available in the SAC office.

Staff-student parity and uni-cameral system of government is SAC policy. (CUG also recommends it).

Hart House

At the last SAC meeting, the council accepted as policy Wayne Richardson's brief on the Future Role of Hart House. We recommend that the house be open to all members of the university and that they assume full duties and responsibilities of the House (like paying the $25 membership fee.)

Compulsory Physical Education

This requirement has been in existence too long. At present only first year women are required to take it. Last year a petition was presented but nothing occurred.

This year SAC began work again on it.

The Dept. of Athletics (Women) has been extremely co-operative and they will recommend to the Board of Governors that the $50 fine and academic penalty for failing to complete the requirement, be abolished.

It is not then we are going to need YOUR help.

SAC REPORTS

Over the last two years, SAC has written a large number of reports, all of which are being used this year and are continually being referred to. Some of those reports are:

SAC brief to CUG

SAC policy statement on Discipline

SAC Reply to the Campbell Report

SAC Report on Research in the University

SAC report on the Spadina Expressway

SAC brief on the Future Role of Hart House

SAC Report on the Campus Centre

SAC brief to the Committee on University Affairs

etc. etc.

The following reprints are also available

Student Centred Teaching, Carl Rogers

Academic Government and Academic Citizenship in a Time of Revolt by Christian Bay

etc. etc.

GENERAL MEETING GSU

TO DETERMINE FUTURE OF GSU

- INCORPORATION
- BYLAWS
- BUILDING RENOVATION PROGRAM

CONVOCATION HALL 1 PM TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24

GSU REPORTS

GSU CUG QUESTIONNAIRE

The Graduate Students' Union has developed a questionnaire covering several key aspects in the CUG Report. Several questions dealing with the "Americanization problem" and employment are included. This questionnaire was included in the package sent to graduate students by the CUG Programming Committee. We ask all graduate students to return both questionnaires as soon as possible so that we may determine the appropriate graduate student policies.

PROPOSAL TO TAX FELLOWSHIPS, SCHOLARSHIPS AND BURSARIES

The Graduate Students' Union Tax Committee has prepared a brief arguing against the White Paper proposals to tax fellowships, scholarships and bursaries. A presentation will be made to the House of Commons Tax Committee by the Graduate Students' Union. Copies of the brief are available from the GSU Executive Office.

CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE

The proposed by-laws which were submitted to the January 26 General Meeting have been amended and endorsed by a meeting of Executive Committee members and representatives of graduate student departmental associations. These proposed amendments are available from the GSU Executive Office and will be submitted to the General Meeting tomorrow.

DISMISSAL OF GSU ORGANIZER

On Thursday, January 29, 1970 at a meeting of the Executive Committee Michael Vaughan, President of the Graduate Students' Union, dismissed with reason Marja-leena Repo promising her an additional months salary in lieu of notice. A motion of confidence by the Executive Committee "in the President's action" was then proposed. This was in accordance with the Constitution VII, 1. vii.

The President shall be responsible, subject to Executive approval, for hiring and disciplining Union employees.

Mrs. Repo was then given the opportunity to speak against the dismissal as were other graduate students in attendance. The Executive Committee then proceeded to approve the dismissal. Only three of thirteen executive members voted against the motion. Larry Hoffman, Craig McKie and Neil Keller. It is indeed unfortunate that Varsity reporting totally distorted these facts. Background explaining the dismissal is included in the Newsletter sent to all graduate student members.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE COVERAGE

In response to GSU requests for University paid accident insurance coverage of teaching assistants, researchers and demonstrators the administration has carried out a survey of graduate student employee risk. After this risk assessment the planned insurance coverage would hopefully be available by next term.

RENOVATION OF THE GRADUATE STUDENTS' UNION

CAF has approved the major renovations program developed by the Graduate Students' Union. This includes the necessary fire and sanitation expenditures. At this stage it seems that installation of a full-time bar is imminent. We have already received approval for our liquor license and it seems extremely likely that our incorporation proposal will be approved.

The Regina Students Union voted unanimously Monday night to oppose any rules applying to students to which the rest of society wasn't subjected.

A mass meeting of 400 students unanimously approved this stand and took an even stronger position proposed by members of the SDU in subsequent amendments. It opposed any administrative disciplinary powers whatsoever while students are not involved in making decisions governing the university.

FESTERING SORE?

The Regina campus, with a long history of radical political action, has been a festering sore in the side of provincial premier Ross Thatcher, considered by many to be the real source behind the Carter regulations.

Last year's attempt to censor the student newspaper the Carillon, by crushing the Student Union, failed amid solid student opposition. This year's discipline position seems to command the same kind of support.

A mass meeting of over 1500 in the only cafeteria on the 4000 student Regina campus, saw students vote for a province-wide Carillon issue to publicize the discipline question and to send busloads of students to Saskatoon for the Thursday faculty council meeting.

That meeting will be closed to all but 120 students with passes, but there are bound to be more demanding entry.

About 200 students Tuesday marched on the principal's office in Regina to demand a public statement on the Carter code.

Principal John Archer, just learning the ropes of his new job, expressed opposition and hoped suitable amendment could be made.

His reaction to the students essentially "no discipline" stand was unclear. Faced with widespread student support for that position, along with Archer's hostility to Saskatoon domination, Regina students may achieve significant gains toward a more democratic university.

They may be jeopardized by Ross Thatcher's opposition to student radicals, and by the Saskatoon administration's seeming determination to clamp down the lid before "trouble" occurs.

UNIVERSITY RESIDENCES

The SAC Working Group on Residences is preparing SAC proposals and policies on residence government and residence life.

Anyone wishing to make a submission should contact Tony Usher at the SAC Office (923-6221) by February 27th.

Charles St. Residence on verge of rent strike

By ERIC MILLS

If residents' complaints are not dealt with, the Married Students' Residence on Charles St. may be the site of a second rent strike against the Ontario Housing Corporation.

The Tenants' Association, formed last September, has attempted to solve problems through a policy committee with resident and OHC members.

Negotiations have brought little success.

Earlier this year, a small number of students complaining about noise withheld their rent and got results.

The noise was caused by an $8000 pump which eventually was replaced by a $1500 pump.

Residents complain design faults abound. Corners are not square, floors are uneven, the laundry room floor is covered with water from overflowing washing machines and drains.

The heating in many apartments is inadequate (and without individual controls), especially on the corners of the buildings.

One resident, Sandra Bruno, said at a meeting of the Policy Committee last Tuesday that the average temperature in the nursery room is 55 degrees.

Dan Spinner (III VIC) gave a similar figure for the recreation room.

Another complaint is that OHC stalls even when agreeing to correct something. A set of playground equipment ordered last September still has not arrived. OHC refuses to give the name of the dealer with whom the order was placed. Residents find this typical of OHC co-operation.

"It's got to the point where we don't believe OHC" said Dan Spinner. "They ignore people as long as it is politically expedient".

Swim Blues take title ten

The University of Toronto won their tenth consecutive OQAA Swimming Championships on the weekend at McMaster University.

The two closest victims, McGill and Western were about 100 points off the pace this year finishing with 379½ and 247 points respectively to Toronto's 475. Western has been the only team since 1956 to defeat Toronto and that feat was accomplished in 1960.

Friday's events went very poorly for Blues. Several bad breaks in the heats, three up-sets and one disqualification left Toronto with only a six point lead going into Saturday's events.

Saturday was a different story. Toronto swimmers were bound and determined that McGill were not going to short change them on bad breaks.

Bob Heatley and Jim Shaw started off the evening by finishing 1-2 in the 100 Fly. For Heatley, a new OQAA record.

Jim Adams and John Twohig followed with a 1-2 victory in the 100 Free and Ross Ballantyne and Barry Bowerman followed them with a 1-2 in the 100

Ross Ballantyne (leading) and Barry Bowerman stroke their way to a 1-2 finish in the 100 yd. breaststroke race.

Breast. For Ballantyne the second OQAA record of the evening.

Jim Shaw followed in excellent style by defeating his McGill rival John Hawes in the 100 Back with John Twohig third. Shaw also broke the OQAA record making it three for the evening.

With the four fastest sprinters on one team, one would think it would be difficult to lose the Medley Relay. The quartet of Shaw, Ballantyne, Heatley and Van Ryn therefore decided to go after bigger stakes. — the Canadian Record. They were about 2 seconds short on the attempt but they won the race and set a new OQAA record (the fourth).

The last event, the 800 Free Relay, turned out to be the most exciting.

Mike Guinness put in a strong last leg to thwart off a last length attempt by McGill. The Toronto team won by 1 second — the fifth OQAA record of the day.

The superb showing on Saturday enabled the Blues to qualify ten swimmers for the CIAU Championships next weekend in Montreal. McGill qualified seven, Western four, McMaster one, Guelph one, Montreal one, and Laval one. Toronto will be represented by Bob Heatley (co-captain) Terry Bryon (co-Captain), Jim Shaw, Ross Ballantyne, Barry Bowerman, Mike Guinness, Doug MacIntosh, Jim Adams, John Twohig, and Theo Van Ryn.

Front to back, Jim Shaw, Ross Ballantyne, Bob Heatley and Theo Van Ryn, members of the 400 yd. medley relay. All were individual winners in their own events as well.

Yet another sports round up...

FENCING

Imry Henniey's Varsity Fencing team contributed their share to a very successful Varsity sports weekend as they captured the OQAA fencing championship at Hart House with a victory over the Eastern champs McGill.

In winning, the Varsity squad also became the first team to capture all five of the trophies up for competition.

Blues took the team cup with a 16-11 margin. They had a 6-3 edge in the foil, a 6-3 margin in the saber but were edged 4-3 in the epee.

The four individual trophies all fell to Toronto sabbers. Richard Wong was the foil winner. Helmut Microys captured the epee while Peros Malden was a double winner taking both the saber and the special sportsmanship trophy.

SQUASH

Varsity Blues won the York University Invitational squash tournament Saturday in preparation for the intercollegiate finals in Montreal this weekend.

Blues' "A" team consisting of John Stewart, Howie Fluxgold, Ashley Perkins, Mike Gardiner and Mike Zimmerman went through the tournament without a loss.

Varsity's "B" team of Mark Khanna, Rudy Willert, Rupert Bramall, Tom Thayer and Dave Cook took second place in the tournament followed by York and McMaster.

Each member of the "A" team received a plaque to indicate he won his seed while a team trophy was also awarded.

Blues travel to Montreal Thursday for the intercollegiate final at McGill Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

BADMINTON

The U of T badminton team captured all three competitions during the OQAA championships held Feb. 14 at Waterloo.

Taylor Echlin of Scarborough College won the singles, then teamed with Bill Kinsey to cop the doubles crown.

Echlin and Kinsey plus John Patterson, Pat Geale and Rich McCallum joined forces to clobber Laval 6-0 for Varsity's fifth consecutive team title and the Jemmett Trophy.

The rare singles-doubles-team sweep engineered by the Toronto squad was the first for Varsity since 1954-55.

Blues' blues end as season sputters to close photos by peter kirby

Blues' Larry Trafford (35) cuts around a lanky Mustang defender as he heads for paydirt in last Thursday's game against Western at York. Below, Garth Evans (44) moves to guard Bruce Dempster (33), the former Varsity star now playing with Western. It was Blues' last game of the season.

By PETER WHITE

It was with mixed feelings that the Varsity basketball season ended last Thursday night at York.

Varsity lost another — fans and players were by that stage more than used to defeat. But it was the nature of the defeat, 78-68 to league champs Western Mustangs, that left the small Toronto contingent with an outlet for the emotional energy that has been building by all involved on the basketball scene this season. Varsity had arrived as a basketball team but of course, as with everything associated with Blues this season, it was too little and too late.

For those who have lost contact with Blues progress it will come as a surprise to learn that Varsity was by this last game a veritable threat. Evidence of a resurgence, or what they call jelling, appeared several weeks ago as Blues played Windsor, eventually the third-place team, to a standstill in the second half of a game won by Windsor 79-63.

A few nights later Blues played what till that time was their finest game in a three point loss to Mac. Mac is now heading into the OQAA play-downs, after finishing second.

BLUES FIRST VICTORY

On Valentine's Day Blues travelled to Waterloo and came up with their only love-in of the season, downing an over-confident Waterloo bunch, 86-81. Not only did Blues win but they came back from a 15 point half time deficit and in so doing buried Waterloo and its playoff hopes.

The game has been unanimously dubbed the "upset of the season." Varsity fans could be excused if they interpreted "upset" to refer to the fact that Toronto actually won something this year. They could not realize Toronto was playing up to its potential, which apparently was quite beyond the scope of its imagination and happily close to that of the other excellent teams in the league.

Last Wednesday Blues ran afoul of Garney Henley's Guelph Gryphons losing 105-84. The next night they lost to Western. However, throughout these closing games of the season Blues played with verve and in taking the game to their opposition were competitive and credible. By season's end Coach McManus was down to suing virtually just six players and these last losses, all marked by collapse late in second half, could easily have been victories with a couple of more dependable men on the bench. The loss of Mike Katz, out with an eye injury suffered in a collision early in the Waterloo game, was a severe blow.

EVANS STARS

The Waterloo game was Garth Evan's baby. Coming off the bench to replace the injured Katz, Evans erupted from a disturbing mid-season slump with a 26 point effort that led the Blues past the Warriors. Impressive in defensive roles were John Hadden on the boards and Larry Trafford who held Jan Laaniste, until then league leading scorer, to a trifling eight points.

In missing the game this reporter may have blessed Blues since this was the one game passed up and Blues only victory. Coach McManus, who waxed enthusiastic following his big win, would probably have been happy to see this absenteeism continue. Anything to help a dying cause.

Off the Waterloo game Toronto might have expected to run rampant over the hapless Gryphons whose fortunes since their early season drubbing of Toronto were not unlike those of Blues — they were without victory. The first half was a dog fight with Blues on top 41-40. Victory number two seemed inevitable as Blues, playing with confidence under the fine floor leadership of Larry Trafford, forced the play.

GRYPHONS RALLY TO WIN

However, Guelph opened the second half with a tenacious press and steadily ran Blues into the ground. Toronto made a game of it until the 10 minute mark but a combination of some unconscious Guelph shooting and a tirant Toronto defence turned into a 21 point loss.

This game was marred by the worst refereeing Blues experienced all season. John Hadden was hit with his usual technical foul. Mid-way through the second half the Guelph bench picked up a couple in protest over the many cheap fouls and travelling calls. Trafford was lost to Blues at the 7:51 mark on fouls and that was that for Toronto.

HADDEN ILL

It was learned after the game that John Hadden was ill, most certainly a factor in the Toronto downfall. Evans had another brilliant night leading all scorers with 22 points. Billy Boston put together his most productive effort with 18 points, many earned on offensive tips. Trafford made 17, many on his gorgeous long shots, before leaving the game.

The next night it was Western at home in the York gym. Blues played a superb first half again, leaving the court with a 38-31 lead. Trafford spent a good part of the night in a victorious head-on-head battle with the former Toronto ace and Western work-horse Bruce Dempster. Blues unfortunately lost several lay ups on travelling calls. But the rest of their game was sharp: in shooting 47 per cent, pulling down 25 rebs (Hadden 11) and cutting down on turn overs, in contrast to the sloppy play of Western, Toronto looked to be the real league champs.

STANGS REBOUND TO WIN

Two quick Toronto baskets opened the second half. From that zenith Western steadily pilfered through the courageous Blues. For the best part of the half the teams traded baskets. However, Toronto was visibly tiring, particularly Hadden who was still feeling the effects of his illness of the night before.

Eventually Western pulled out a hard earned victory, 78-68. Evidence of the desire of the Varsity squad was a Hadden 23 foot jumper which earlier had tied the score. The defeat was inevitable but it was one of Blues best efforts and a seemingly fitting way to end the season.

HADDEN POTS POTTER

Hadden finished the game with 21 points and his Trojan-like effort showed why he was chosen to the Canadian National team. At half time Dalt White fittingly presented him with this season's Potter Trophy, as Blues' most valuable player.

"That was the hardest we had to work all season" said Western coach Jerry Gosner following his team's victory. Like everyone else present he was particularly impressed by Garth Evans. Evans 13 second-half points kept Blues in it in the close going of the second half.

Final record was 1-9 and of course was accompanied by a last place finish, the worst in Varsity history.

POST SCRIPTS ON A LOSING SEASON: The Western game was a nostalgic conclusion to an unfortunate addition to the Varsity athletic record. Though the foibles of the past certainly were not forgotten, it seems they would better rest as active reminders of what can happen when the train of defeat and failure hurtles along unawares. In the end there was hope.

Blues finally reached respectability and consistency. The cream took a long time rising but Coach McManus by season's end had several good ones and a couple of potential all-stars. John Hadden was in the final stages of the season incomparable. A great asset, it is a shame his abilities were not tapped till it was too late to recover the season. Trafford, Evans, Boston, McNaughton and Katz did eventually play well and individually were at times actually super. Angus Braid, though wasted much of the season at forward, finally found a home as swingman.

Potentially all will be back again next season. I guess that is a happy prospect in spite of the 1-9 record they produced. As has been hinted before things cannot remain static. This season's performance was both unnecessary and embarrassing. There must be another way.

BlueSkates shut out McGill, Queens, in WIAA tournament

The Silver Blue Skates notched two consecutive shut-outs en route to a fourth place finish in the WIAU hockey championships held last weekend in Guelph.

Alice Shank, who has played outstanding goal all season, climaxed her career with a hard-earned 2-0 whitewash over McGill.

Rookie Paula Vine stopped Queens 5-0 to gain a shutout in her first intercollegiate game.

Leading tournament scorers for the Blue Skates were Terry Midghall and Diane Gilmour with three goals and assorted assists each. Gilmour also established a record with 44 minutes in penalties during the season.

Other Varsity goals came from center Anna Radecki and defenseman Sandy Pett.

University of Guelph retained their championship, narrowly edging McMaster and Western. Mac could have forced a tie but were held to a rough 2-2 draw by Western in the final game of the schedule.

In earlier games, the Blue Skates lost 3-0 to Mac, gave Guelph a scare before bowing 4-1, and matched a crude Western squad check for check but dropped a 4-0 score.

York, Ryerson and Loyola are expected to join the WIAU in time for the 1970-71 season, and league coaches have recommended a round-robin schedule plus a play-off tournament for the nine-team group.

As Varsity will lose only four or perhaps five players through graduation, and with the possibility of several talented gals coming to the team from the interfac leagues, the Blue Skates should be ready to challenge for the title next season.

Sports roundup no. one: track, b-ball all stars, sailing

Two Varsity trackmen took national titles in the Canadian University Indoor Track Championships, held in Winnipeg February 14 and 15.

The Varsity contingent of Bill Franklin, Alan Tucker, Dave Quibell and Matt Duncan took a close second in the 400-metre relay, while Franklin ran away from the field to capture the 600-metre event in a new meet and Manitoba record of 1:13.6. Quibell outprinted his rivals to win a hard-fought 300-metre race in 36.2.

The relay saw personal best times by Tucker and Duncan and featured a 49.7 leg by anchorman Franklin. Though Varsity easily won their heat in an excellent 3:25.7, they lost out by five-tenths of a second to McMaster in the final.

For the first time ever an allstar basketball team will be chosen for Divisions I and II of the interfaculty basketball league.

All players, coaches, and referees are eligible to vote and ballots may be picked up at the Hart House intramural office. Those voting for the first division pick two players for each position, while those voting for the second division chose one for each spot.

The deadline for voting is today.

Unfortunately, the allstars will not see action as a unit, since no competition is available.

The meeting of the U of T Sailing Club, held February 11 at Trinity, promised dramatic changes in this season's sailing program.

Stephen Dinsmore, illustrious commodore who gave birth to the UTSC as it exists today, resigned from the position he has held for three years to make way for the fresh upstart Charlie Megan. The rest of the executive consists of Madeleine McLaughlin, Wendy Thompson, John Moody (darling of the Engineering water-polo team), and Barb Ovens (nothin' says lovers like something from the Ovens).

Due to the Sailing Club's active participation in the Midwestern Collegiate Sailing Association, the racing schedule has been greatly expanded. Toronto's expert sailors will hoist their mains'ls against such fierce adversaries as Notre Dame, Ohio State, Southern Illinois and Wayne State (in Detroit).

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1970-71 MONDAY, MARCH 2, 1970

This is the third year that a revised method of electing the five student representatives to the University of Toronto Athletic Directorate will be followed. To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year of the University. There will be one ballot only under which 128 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows.

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A":

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B":

The nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "C":

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph.)

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate.

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport"

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at this University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner.

This year, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

J. P. LOOSEMORE, Secretary
University of Toronto Athletic Association.

WATTEMEN WOUND WARRIORS WIN WEST

Waterloo goalie Jim Weber looks behind him just in time to watch puck fired by Blues' captain Brian St. John enter net. The goal came in the second period of Blues' 9-6 victory over the Warriors Friday night and gave Varsity a 5-1 lead.

By LYNDON LITTLE

The fans at rickety, ramshackle, Waterloo Memorial Arena were suddenly strangely silent.

The fellow in the engineering hardhat who had been incessantly beating the big U of Waterloo bass drum decided to call it quits, the students on the west side hauled down their hand-lettered "FO-TO" banners, and the chap in the yellow jacket who had been making obscene gestures to Varsity players all evening put his finger back in his pocket.

Blues had just scored four goals in a space of two minutes and 38 seconds mid-way through the final period Friday night to put the game out of reach and wrap up the western division title of the OQAA hockey league.

The hard-earned 9-6 victory over the Warriors gave Blues a final record of 12 wins, one loss and two ties, to finish four points ahead of Waterloo, who could have taken the top spot with a win over Blues.

It was Blues' first victory over the Warriors this season; both previous games ended in draws.

PLAYOFFS SET

Blues, by virtue of their first place finish will now meet the U of Montreal Carabins in the first semi-final playoff game this Friday night at Varsity.

Waterloo will meet the Gee-Gees in the second match.

For a while, in the wild, frantic game at Waterloo Friday it looked as if Blues would once again be victim of the plague that had struck them in previous big games this year — their inability to hold a lead!

With less than a minute remaining in the second period Blues carried a seemingly "comfortable" 5-1 cushion. Then, before you could say "Ken Laidlaw", the talented Warrior sniper had scored twice to cut Blues' margin to only two goals.

CROSBY ASSISTS

Laidlaw's muscular line-mate Cam Crosby set up both scores. He dug the puck out of the corner and fed it to Laidlaw in front for the first one, then broke in all alone on Grant Cole, guarding Blues' goal.

Cole made the initial save on Crosby but Laidlaw picked up the rebound to score with only four seconds left.

Bob McKillop's Warriors continued to fly as the third period began. At the 2:38 mark Waterloo's Dennis Farwell connected to bring them to within one goal.

Blues looked hard-pressed at this stage, but at mid-period, with Waterloo still carrying the attack, Blues' defenseman Dave Field scored the first of the four quick Varsity goals to turn the tide.

John Wright broke up centre ice with Field on his left. He passed the puck to Field just as his teammate was hitting the Waterloo blueline.

FIELD SCORES

Field swung around the Warrior defense and headed behind the goal. Then, when nobody met him at the other side he came right in front and with all the super-cool that characterizes his play he stopped, took a look, and casually flipped the puck into the top left-hand corner of the Waterloo goal passed a startled Jim Weber.

"Bookie (Mike Boland) had taken a man out of the play so there was no one to check me in front," Field explained later.

That marker appeared to take the steam out of the Warriors. Blues' rookie Mike Cyr, who has been replacing the injured Bob McGuinn on the rightwing of the Laurent line, notched two more only 12 seconds apart. Bill Buba then completed Blues' scoring with his twelfth goal of the season only seconds later.

Wright and Bryan Tompson connected in the first period while Wright again, Brian St. John and Nick Holmes added second period markers.

BLUES OUTSHOT

Blues were outshot in every period with the final margin being 52-34. The difference was that Blues made the most of their opportunities while Warriors squandered many good chances with poor shooting. Whenever they were on target Cole came up with key saves.

Cole robbed Laidlaw twice in the second period. The first one came on a point-blank shot from in front and the second was a hard shot from the point that Blues' goalie just got a stick on as it was heading for the top right-hand corner of the net.

Prettiest goal of the night was Holmes' second period marker. The Blues' rookie winger stole the puck at center ice, broke in on left wing and handcuffed Weber with a sizzling shot from about 50 feet.

Blues and Waterloo set the stage for the last game thriller when they both came up with victories on February 13. The Warriors handed Guelph a 5-3 defeat at Waterloo while Blues disposed of the Windsor Lancers 9-4 at Varsity.

While Blues fired 64 shots in all at Bruner it was still only 3-2 for Varsity late in the second. Then, three quick goals, two by Wright and one by Terry Peterman broke it open.

Wright had five goals in all against the Lancers, his second five goal performance of the season. Wright spent so much time that night circling the net with his arms raised he looked like he was road testing an underarm deodorant.

Dave McDowall (his first of the year), St. John and John Gordon picked up the other Varsity goals.

Weber waves his arm in futile attempt to stop Nick Holmes' blast from just inside the Waterloo blueline. As of last report Weber has still not seen the puck.

Repo rehired, Vaughan loses support

By JANE HOLLINGWORTH

The Graduate Students Union general meeting yesterday voted to "strongly recommend" re-hiring Marjaleena Repo as GSU organizer, before denying GSU President Michael Vaughan (SGS) a vote of confidence.

The meeting, held in Convocation Hall, also voted to drop the criminal charges that Vaughan brought against Repo, in the name of the GSU, for allegedly stealing a number of unidentified files. The GSU will pay all Repo's legal costs and voted to publicly announce that it does not support the charges.

Vaughan stated he would "activate the wishes of the GSU" by re-hiring Repo and "do everything in my power" to withdraw the criminal charges.

In the first few minutes of the meeting, GSU members had agreed in a vote that under the old GSU constitution "this meeting can't order Mr. Vaughan to do anything."

After Repo was "strongly recommended for re-hiring" to complete her 40-week contract by a vote of 166 to 77 the meeting had to ask Vaughan if he would support the decision.

As meeting chairman Roger Harrington said, "technically speaking, nothing would happen" even if the meeting voted non-confidence in Vaughan.

WILLINGNESS TO WORK

John Byrne (SGS) president of the student union of the English faculty, made the original motion to reinstate Mrs. Repo. He was supported by other course union presidents who cited her "willingness" to work long hours helping them organize.

A member from the Engineering Faculty said, "An executive not overly concerned with its image would rehire Mrs. Repo."

He added that while Vaughan called her "past employment record" poor, Repo was "chosen from 30 people last summer; therefore, this executive must have made a mistake somewhere."

Gail Dexter, (SGS) a history graduate student, said the whole issue was "simply a question of how you deal with people."

While Vaughan had pointed to Repo's "inability to get along with the executive" as one of the reasons for firing her, debate yesterday centred mostly around the quality of Repo's work as an organizer, with grad students generally.

WE NEED AN ORGANIZER

John Winter, past-president of the GSU said, "We need an organizer. It's far too easy to criticize by saying that work is not being done, but there's no one around to do it."

Winter said the present executive had acted foolishly in "hiring a woman organizer without checking her qualifications."

But Winter supported re-hiring Repo till the end of the session since "she has tried, though, in my opinion, not produced as much as I would have liked if I were in control."

Repo was asked by the chairman to speak and she said, "It's the criminal charges against me that bother me most. I'd like to see some kind of justice done."

After the vote, the meeting broke into loud applause and several members including Barbara Smith GSU executive assistant raised victory signs.

They were all there at the meeting — Hali (top right) Michael (middle right) and all their fans.

Most of the students left, so that the vote of confidence in Vaughan was only defeated by a vote of 44-41.

A motion to remove the chairman, Roger Harrington when members objected that he was impeding procedures through lack of knowledge of Robert's Rules was also defeated earlier in the meeting.

Gagnon pledges himself to liberation of Quebecois

Charles Gagnon and Pierre Vallieres were arrested on Sept. 27, 1966 in New York as they protested in front of the United Nations against the holding of political prisoners by the Quebec government.

The two were detained in the Manhattan House of Detention for Men until Jan. 13, 1967 when they were extradited to Canada.

Gagnon and Vallieres went to trial on Mar. 8 of that year, charged with the death of Therese Morin, a secretary in the La Grenade Shoe Factory. Workers there were on strike when an FLQ bomb was planted in the building where Miss Morin was a secretary.

Gagnon was acquitted of homicide, but was held on a minor charge, conspiring to commit theft. No trial was set.

During the next year he was tried for other charges and on Wed. Feb. 18, Charles Gagnon was finally freed after three years, four months and 25 days of imprisonment.

Pierre Vallieres is still in jail without bail.

The following is a translation of an interview Gagnon gave QUEBEC-PRESSE on the first day of his freedom.

"The first day isn't easy. You have to get used to your freedom. This morning, when I woke, I opened the curtains of my room and looked outside: the sun was shining on the street . . . and people were passing by. It took me a good two minutes to understand that I myself could also dress and go out into the street . . . or into a bar, or anywhere, if I felt like it. It was a real shock. Really, I still have the impression that it is just a temporary dream . . . that it is all going to end at any minute.

"The funniest thing is that the "outside" world is not divided into long corridors like it is in the prisons where I lived for 3½ years. I continually have the impression that some guard or other is going to come looking for me and return me to my cell.

"What will I do with my liberty? I said it yesterday as I left the Parthenais, as I said it at the end of my last trial, last Dec. 10 — I will employ all of my energies and myself to fight for the liberation of all Quebecois.

"How? Yes, that's another question. For the moment I would really like to rest for a few days and get used to my new life and talk seriously with my lawyers, and with some comrades who have continued the fight outside the prison. It will only be after this that I will be able to unveil my precise plans, and I certainly intend to make them public.

"Have things changed in Quebec in the last 3½ years and what should we do? These are all subjects which I plan to speak about in a few days. Our intention, the Committee for the Liberation of Vallieres and myself, is to hold a press conference (scheduled for today) at which I will speak of my future, of my joining the struggle, of the role that I intend to play (if of course the comrades wish to accept me) and of the projects which we envisage. At this point I really prefer to keep silent.

"What I can tell you is that the battle has just begun, and for the moment it is necessary to lead a large offensive for the liberation of Pierre Vallieres.

Vallieres is no more guilty than I am of these crimes of which he is accused. I myself will not feel truly free until he too is freed. And besides, I'm an optimist and I believe that his freedom will not be held up now."

—translated by sue reisler

Charles Gagnon, held for 3½ years as a political prisoner by the Quebec Government, was finally freed this week.

Soc chairman chosen by faculty

Professor Perry Giffen has been appointed the new Chairman of the Department of Sociology at the University of Toronto.

Prof. Giffen who has been acting chairman since last fall was chosen by Dean Allen of the Faculty of Arts and Science on the recommendation of a nine-member committee chosen for the purpose.

Its members included Professors Currie, Hall and Bell from the department but no students. The graduate students, however, met by themselves to consider a new chairman and eventually requested representation on the hiring committee.

Dean Allen refused this, but allowed them to present a brief. This they did, recommending Prof. Bob James as their first choice and Giffen as their second.

Janice Newson, President of the Sociology Graduate Students Association described Giffen as the "best man at the moment" and indicated that he had strong support among the faculty.

A faculty committee overwhelmingly recommended Prof. Giffen for the job to Dean Allen.

Professor Giffen is a specialist in deviants and criminal behaviour. Although not well known in his field he is very active in such organizations as the Centre of Criminology.

Miss Newson described him as a "good teacher" who has excellent rapport with the students.

Prof. Giffen took his B.A. and M.A. at Toronto and did graduate work at Columbia.

The chairmanship was vacated by Prof. S. D. Clark last fall after bitter faculty infighting in the department, which saw the departure of Professor John Porter.

Lakehead drops plans to fire Wightman

THUNDER BAY (CUP) — The administration at Lakehead University has backed down in its attempts to fire sociology Professor Victor Wightman.

In a letter received by Wightman Monday, administration President William Tamblin told the popular professor that "it has been decided not to insist upon the termination of your contract under the terms of the notice given by my letter of January 29, 1970".

At that time, Wightman was told that "budgetary considerations" had made his dismissal from Lakehead necessary. Wightman was reportedly fired on the recommendation of department head Cecil French, who declared that his decision was backed by a majority of faculty in the department.

Subsequent investigation indicated faculty had not been consulted in the dismissal.

Wightman had supported a counter-bookstore set up in Thunder Bay to fight the high prices in the administration's bookstore — a move the Lakehead administration regarded as an affront.

Wightman was also heavily involved in a two-day November Moratorium against the Vietnam war.

According to the administration, the rescinding of Wightman's notice of firing came as a result of a technicality: Tamblin's letter of January 29 did not reach the sociology professor until February 2 — two days after regulations declare such letters can be received during the academic year.

Wightman's firing had prompted large-scale protests at the Lakehead campus, climaxed with a two-day university-wide boycott of classes February 12 and 13, in which 50 per cent of Lakehead's 2,500 students were reported to participate.

In addition to a review of Wightman's firing, the students were demanding a total restructuring of hiring, firing, promotion and tenure procedures at Lakehead, increased representation of students on hiring and firing committees, and full access to "all relevant information such as budgets, graduate programs and other administrative and academic matters which affect decisions" on hiring, firing and promotion.

The administration's decision to forestall Wightman's firing may effectively short-circuit the demands, though students are still requesting that a review board be set up to investigate them.

U of S drops proposed discipline code

SASKATOON (CUP) — The faculty council executive of the two-campus University of Saskatchewan Senate decided Monday to drop a proposed discipline code incorporating some of the strictest measures ever suggested for Canadian universities.

In a closed meeting, the executive agreed that the Carter Committee Report on Student Discipline should be dropped in favor of a dual review of student discipline at the U of S.

The executive decision is expected to be ratified at a meeting of the academic senate tomorrow.

In its place, the senate is expected to set up a committee including "adequate" student and faculty representation for both the Saskatoon and Regina campuses of the university.

At the same time, a parity student-faculty committee is expected to be set up to examine current disciplinary regulations at the U of S' Saskatoon campus, pending a decision by the senate committee.

The reasons given for the executive decision were the refusal by both the Saskatoon student council and the administration at the U of S Regina campus to endorse the report.

The Saskatoon student council objected to the lack of student parity on the Carter Committee, composed of six faculty and administrators and three students; the Regina administration declared it was not consulted at all in the process of formulating the report, which would have been binding on both campuses.

The report, released January 29 drew a storm of protest from students at both Saskatchewan campuses for its harsh stance on student discipline.

The report forbids any student action which "creates or which may reasonably be expected to create" disturbances of any kind, binds students to university discipline even for off-campus activity, forbids the use of public address systems on university property without authorization, and gives the faculty the right to demand identification from students at any time.

In addition, the report recommended granting wide powers for summary suspension of students suspected of having infringed university regulations, and declared that hearings of alleged infractions would be closed.

At a meeting February 17 at the Regina campus, more than 1,000 students termed the report "an insufferable infringement" of student rights and Regina campus autonomy and demanded the report be withdrawn.

The students also said the Regina Student Union would not support any discipline report which did not apply to the whole academic community.

The Regina students forbade their student council to prepare a counter-proposal to the Carter Report, declaring that "such an act of compromise would still allow students to be repressed."

BAR AND BAND

Review of the Press : Is this the opposition?

Our usual policy is to ignore the various and sundry sheets of propaganda that the university's Department of Information disseminates

The U of T Bulletin, which changed its name this year from the Staff Bulletin, is a fairly innocuous weekly rag that goes to all faculty. This year, when it changed its name, it tried to become more of a newspaper, with real reporters. But basically it consists of unedited and unbroken columns of official information and comment

However, there's another publication called the U of T News, a newspaper sent to all alumni of the university. And it's hard to ignore the latest issue without comment, for it's as arrogant and unabashed a piece of sophisticated propaganda as you're ever likely to see on the U of T campus.

The theme of the issue is university expansion, or perhaps a better term is growth. "Growth" seems to embody the emotions of corporate leaders and the like better than the cliched concepts of "profit" or "progress" or "expansion".

The issue is specifically dedicated to the expansion of the Graduate School and the building of the Humanities and Social Sciences Research Library, the $42 million edifice "primarily for the use of teachers and graduate students". Or perhaps we should call it the Graduate Library. Or perhaps the Claude T. Bissell Memorial Library.

The building is a monument symbolic of a major redesign of the U of T — converting the St. George Campus into a graduate school. The building is part of a vast graduate complex planned for the north-west corner of campus. The whole concept is part of a University of Ontario plan that would centralize nearly all Ontario graduate work at the St. George campus. Undergraduates would be farmed out to suburban colleges (which are being expanded), other universities, and community colleges — all arranged in a set hierarchy of 'academic excellence'.

All that concrete can't be wrong: the Library is rising

The U of T News has nothing but glossy and rather unsubtle rhetoric for the scheme.

The lead sentence for the front-page 'news'-story reads:

"The 1970's will be another decade of change and achievement for the University of Toronto."

Some of the headlines are classics:

"LIBRARY ON PERFECT SITE FOR THOSE IT WILL SERVE"

Ironic. It certainly won't serve the undergraduates of this university, who will be forced to stay with the limited facilities of the Sigmund Samuel Library.

Here are some of the other hope-and-progress headlines:

"PRINCIPAL SAYS 5000 NOT SCARBOROUGH'S LIMIT";

"AN INCREASE TO 12,000 IS FORECAST";

"IN THE U OF T MATRIX, YORK UNIVERSITY WAS GIVEN LIFE";

"EARTH AND MOON COMPETE FOR ATTENTION AT ERINDALE";

"HANDSOME TEACHING, RESEARCH BUILDINGS AND OFFICE LINK RISING IN FIRST PHASE";

It's beginning to look like expansion of the National Hockey League. Is Claude Bissell the Clarence Campbell of education?

He's certainly vying to make the U of T the Harvard of the North. And it's happening in the north-west corner of campus, where the Huron-Sussex Residents Association is frustrated and powerless in its attempts to stop the destruction of their homes.

As the wrecking crews set to work, the U of T News offers this moral reminder:

"ALL THAT CONCRETE CAN'T BE WRONG: THE LIBRARY IS RISING"

As they proclaim the transcendental properties of physical growth, at least they could be a little less religious in their fervour.

open letter: 'colorful rhetoric and hackneyed cliches'

I hereby resign my position as Chairman of the Graduate Student's Association in Political Science.

Faced with apathy and hostility, all my efforts in that office to organize meaningful and effective change in departmental decision-making in the interests of graduate students have now come to an end.

The recent meeting held on Monday, February 23, clearly indicated that the lack of concern on the part of graduate students for the affairs of their own department has made the continuation of reasonable policies impossible. With few notable exceptions, most of the individuals who did attend the latter meeting and who are willing to be active in the affairs of the department are people in whom I personally have no confidence. In my view, they do not have a real concern for procedures that are reasonable both in discussion and action.

If colourful rhetoric and hackneyed cliches are to be accepted as the apotheosis of political wisdom, then we can safely leave further action in the very capable hands of the self-declared apostles of "true consciousness". As for me, this is where I get off!

Judging by the lack of attendance and interest, the majority of students have no conception of the issues at stake: they act like apprentices and deserve to have a well-meaning, paternal structure to direct them until they learn to think and behave like self-aware, mature individuals. It appears that the existing procedures of decision-making and appointments are perfectly suitable and worthy of the calibre of the graduate student body.

My very best wishes to Professor Stefan Dupre in his new post as Chairman of the Department. A man with his professional and administrative qualifications is precisely what the Department needs.

The only constructive changes in the Department over the past two years have been the work of a handful of concerned and reasonable students and faculty who have spent much time and effort with little thanks. They have worked in the face of apathy on the part of the large majority; hostility and abuse by the "enlightened" activists on the left; and at the cost of severe suspicion and distrust from many members of the faculty.

Since most of the faculty are as intransigent in their determination to preserve archaic structures as the radicals are in promoting direct conflict, there appears to be no room for constructive reformers in the Department of Political Economy in this University.

A violent confrontation seems to be the only remaining possibility and I, for one, cannot condone and do not wish to share in that event. My best wishes go to both parties: they are deserving of one another!

The trust and openness necessary to the university community and the participation of students in joint decision-making with faculty members which the Commission on University Government emphasizes, is nowhere in evidence in this Department.

Were the tax-paying public aware that it is in fact subsidizing this deplorable fiasco, it would soon withdraw the funds it provides for both students and faculty.

I can only hope that the undergraduates will be both more responsible and more active in pursuing the reforms necessary at both the departmental and university levels.

open letter to bissell: ashamed to take visitors to U of T

I am ashamed to take out-of-town visitors on a tour of "my" university any more — unless to give them laughs: but that is really too painful.

Surely a President of your stature and accomplishments can put more pressure on your architects. Surely you have a Faculty (School?) of Architecture, whose advice might have prevented such a disaster. Surely the University has more influence at City Hall, than to continue to retain all the old street patterns. Surely you can afford to hire a landscape architect!

For another ten or twenty years, I fear, I will continue angered. One way to show my feelings is to donate not one cent to what now "appears" to be a retrograde institution. In my heart, of course, I know it is not; and continue to be proud of Varsity for accomplishments other than its selection of architects.

Incidentally, Sir, I was present at a presentation your officials made to residents of the Huron-Sussex Residents Association before Christmas. They did it well, I thought, except for the gentleman who bored us by read-

I would like to correct a misleading impression in a story on the activities of the University's Budget Committee which appeared in the Varsity on Monday, particularly the headline.

What we did do was present to Professor Sumner and his colleagues a

Open Letter:

President Bissell,

This year again I, as an alumnus, am being asked to subscribe to the "Varsity Fund". I cannot bring myself to do so, although I recognize the need.

Here is why: I have watched the campus grow with great interest. At first, say after 1950, I watched with pride and anticipation. Then as the West campus began to take shape, my pride turned to alarm. It is now registering disgust.

I refer to the architecture (?) of the new buildings: which at best could only be described as unworthy. While New College and Sidney Smith might be the least bad, they rise to exemplary grace and charm compared to the Benson Building, and various Science structures west of St. George St.

out from under!

"Through self assertion in independence and liberty, the man acquires his social value and concurrently his prestige as male; the ambitious man aims at wealth, celebrity and women in one and the same enterprise; one of the stereotypes which stimulate his effort is that of the powerful and famous man whom women adore. But for the young woman, on the contrary, there is a contradiction between her status as a real human being and her vocation as a female... a conflict breaks out between her original claim to be subject, active, free and, on the other hand, the social pressure to accept herself as passive object."

— The Second Sex, Simone de Beauvoir

For women in Women's Liberation as well as for women in the society as a whole we feel that Simone de Beauvoir has expressed something that has to be seriously analyzed. Not only has she expressed some of our worst frustrations but revealed one basic schizophrenia that all women experience.

In the past few months the U of T Women's Liberation Group has begun to discuss the conditions that define for women who and what they must be.

Last week we were invited to come and talk with women in the St. Mike's dorms about Women's Liberation. We discussed the various roles of women in society — the woman as sexual object, worker, and wife and mother within the nuclear family.

Women presently also talked about control over their own bodies through contraceptives and abortion.

We would like to see this discussion extended to include more women: it will only be through understanding why and how women are oppressed that we will be able to join together to overcome it. If any women are interested please call 532-6609.

In addition to talking with women we have exerted pressure on the University Health Service, asking them to supply more information on birth control and to prescribe the pill upon request, (this of course depends upon the medical history of the woman involved). The Health Service by their policy statement in the Feb. 11 issue of the VARSITY has agreed to do this.

We hope also to have a rotating literature table set up soon to make available articles on Women's Liberation and our own original material as well.

We are presently doing research into where women are located in the University and where they will be going after graduation.

Women are unifying and beginning to act. The Edward Maroney's on campus have good reason for hysteria — our struggle has just begun!

GASPS demand consultation

By JIM STRUTHERS

The Graduate Association of Students in Political Science denounced the lack of student consultation in the appointment of the department's new chairman, J. S. Dupre, and endorsed the principle of "parallel structures" in the decision-making of the department at a meeting Monday.

But the association's chairman, Fred von Dreger, resigned yesterday, citing the apathy of the other graduate students in the department towards meaningful change in the department's structure as the reason for his decision.

At the Monday meeting, GASPS adopted the following resolution by a margin of 32 to 2:

"The graduate students of Political Science in the department of Political Economy declare the appointment of Professor Stefan Dupre as chairman of the Department of Political Economy unacceptable on the grounds that students did not participate actively in that decision."

The meeting was divided over effectiveness of the motion.

"I can't see this motion as an exercise in anything but futility. It doesn't mean anything," commented one student.

But David Milne (SGS) felt differently.

"The first step we have to take is to make our insistence known on the right of consultation for appointment and tenure decisions. Lets take a stand now on whether students have a right to be consulted."

Milne pointed out that students had to get power in the department before there could be any meaningful discussion on its ideology and politics.

"The guts of the motion is the third resolution, proposing parallel structure. We've got to fight for some form of democratization of the department," said Andy Wernick (SGS).

As the number of students dwindled the association passed its final motion by a vote of 23 to 6. The motion reads:

"Whereas it is necessary and desirable that students become involved with and participate in major decision-making procedures such as curriculum and course content and including the appointment, promotion and tenure of faculty personnel in the department of Political Economy, therefore be it resolved that a General Assembly consisting of all students in Political Science be empowered to affirm or reject all decisions in that department.

A supplementary motion added that: "such committees as are needed in the department either as standing or ad hoc committees be created and be composed of equal numbers of staff and students."

A committee of five graduate students in the department consisting of Andy Wernick (SGS), Gary Webster (SGS), David Milne (SGS), Phyllis Clark, (SGS), and Fred Von Dreger (SGS) will take the two motions to the department chairman on Monday, March 2.

The motions will also be taken to today's meeting of the undergraduate political economy course union. Discussion there will centre on the possibilities for action to emphasize demands for parallel structures and revision of the appointment procedures which made Prof. Dupre chairman of the department without full student and faculty consultation.

The United States Consulate in Toronto changed its telephone number yesterday, according to usually reliable sources.

Close observers claim the change may be related to the telephone harassment campaign started this week by the Reprisal Against Repression Committee, a campus group protesting Judge Julius Hoffman's verdict over the 'Chicago Five'.

"The new number is 366-3554," said Directory Assistance on a telephone interview last night. "And the other number is 362-7513," she added.

The U.S. Consulate General was unavailable for comment last night, but a tape recorder answered the phone.

It said the Consulate line would not be open to the morning. "But for emergency calls only you may call 368-3775. May I repeat, this number is for emergency calls only," she added.

Parliament ain't show-biz—Dief

By MARY BASTEDO

The Chief was there and Olive, too, and people packed the aisles and lined the walls and opened the windows because it was so hot.

Last night the 210th Hart House debate tackled the question "This house has lost confidence in the present federal government."

On the Ayes side there were the Toried, in the white shirts, who called Mr. Trudeau the walrus and Mr. Sharp the carpenter.

"We have come up from the oyster bed only to be devoured," said Ted Rotenberg (II Law), and there were radicals, in the blue jeans, who said the choice between the liberals and the Conservatives was the choice between Tweedle-Dum and Tweedle-Dee.

The Nays answered that Rotenberg was the Queen of Spades who was simply shouting "Off with their heads!"

MAIDEN GESTA

SAC President Gesta Abols launched his maiden speech in Hart House in defense of the federal government with a much appreciated joke.

"I'm going to talk about the affair with Barbra Streisand and what it means to this country," he said. "It's a matter of national pride. It's about time Canadians were on top of Americans."

"Mr. Trudeau proves himself to be a traditionalist and not a liberal in keeping up a long-standing tradition among Canadian officials — of going out with "singers" of one type or another," he said grinning at the member from Prince Albert.

The Rt. Hon. John Diefenbaker enjoyed the spectacle immensely — "the arguments, the counter-arguments and the irrelevancies," he said.

As he stood up to speak at the end of the two-hour debate, in the room hung with pictures of Arthur Meighn and William Lyon Mackenzie King and Lester Pearson, he said "the opportunity to speak here tonight touches me deeply."

Responding to a speaker from the Nays who compared Need we explain?

the atmosphere of the debates room to a scene from "Hello, Dolly!" he insisted "Parliament isn't show biz.

COMPUTER PARLIAMENT

"But listening, I couldn't help but recall Trudeau's attitude in Parliament today.

"I'm concerned about Parliament," he said.

"I always wanted to be in Parliament. I've known all the Prime Ministers from Laurier to Trudeau. Parliament is the embodiment of the heart of freedom.

"You can't make a computer out of it. You've got to have argument, you've got to hear both sides. But you can't do that today.

"The present government is controlling, stifling and undermining the essence of our democracy in the House of Commons and in Parliament."

The Chief was in great form, warming up to his audience, catching people's eyes and evoking tremendous applause.

"I haven't been critical of Trudeau," he said. "I've been in his position and I know all the fires that burn around those who occupy positions of power.

"But I'm getting concerned about my country.

"Trudeau has plans that this country will be placed in a position where the Presidential system will take over and the Prime Minister will be head of state.

"If the people of Canada want that they should have the right to vote for it and not have it done surreptitiously, under the table, as it is today."

LOVED NATO

Outraged, he exclaimed, "The Prime Minister could do anything under the sun under the new rules — why he could put through an amendment whereby the Queen could be abolished, or he could socialize our country! (They tried that in Saskatchewan and saw the greatest export of people into other parts of Canada.)"

On NATO he said, "I loved that institution."

Diefenbaker was perhaps his most critical on the white paper on taxation.

"It's an infringement of the state on the people. It will bring about major tax increase masquerading as reform. It will place small businesses in jeopardy, and small businesses are the backbone of Canada.

"It will put an end to Canadian development of our resources. It will mean higher taxes in Canada, which will mean emigration from Canada of our young talent. It has caused people in Canada fears which will take a long time to eradicate."

Diefenbaker received a standing ovation as he concluded his speech. As people filed out the "Aye" and the "No" exits the vote was counted — 241 for the Ayes, 196 for the Noes. Hart House had no confidence in the present federal government, at least when swayed by the rhetoric of the old Chief.

An official photograph of the event was taken and the picture will go up on the wall.

Social work profession runs out of steam

"Social work is a crusade that has turned into a profession that has run out of steam," Leonard Shifrin, Director of the National Council of Welfare told a conference of Canadian Social Work students in Winnipeg last weekend.

Shifrin noted the increasing questioning by social workers of the "legitimacy of social animation."

He said his organization is trying to undercut the "paternalism of the haves to the have-nots" by encouraging citizen participation at all levels.

He called on social workers to "annihilate their hang-ups over their professional status" and "catch up with those they are supposed to lead."

Bernard Shiffman, Deputy Administrator of the Human Resources Administration in New York City told the social work students that social workers must "advance from their predominantly introspective and guilt-ridden stance with respect to social problems."

Blaming the "lack of public commitment" for the prevalence of social ills, he said we are "confronted in our society with an unhappy, alienated people unwilling to demand change.

"Services," he concluded, must be designed for all, not merely for the poor in our society. Services designed for the poor are generally poor services."

Students for Israel protest sale of jets to Libya

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

A long, black coffin and six solemn pallbearers led a procession of 500 people in a demonstration in front of the French consulate yesterday afternoon.

Under the direction of the Students for Israel organizations at U of T and York, the demonstration protested France's sale of 100 Mirage jets to Libya.

France has an official arms embargo on the Middle East.

The march coincided with the official visit of French President Georges Pompidou to the United States and his meeting with President Nixon.

One of the leaders, Abie Pesses (SGS) said that the coffin was to show that France's actions "will only increase the danger of the situation and result in a great many deaths."

About 400 students, carrying placards and sporting blue and white arm-bands, were met at the consulate by a group of older persons, including several Toronto Rabbis.

While the demonstration continued outside, a five-man delegation headed by York student Mark Clarfield and Ross Culliner (II Innis) attempted to present French consul Miss M. Campana with a petition and a number of questions regarding France's influence on the Middle East.

After threatening to have the police evict everyone from her office, Miss Campana later consented to see four of the representatives. She would not come downstairs and personally address the demonstrators.

In their prepared statement, Clarfield and Culliner accused France of wanting to "play the dentist in the Middle East, trying to pull out Israel's teeth and supplying the Arabs with newer and sharper ones".

The consul said that the sale of jets to Libya was done primarily to protect the oil of that country from outside powers.

When she added that there were not even enough pilots trained for war, the Jewish students asked what would happen in five years when the pilots were ready to fight. Campana answered that she hoped there would be peace by then.

Campana: democratize university for socialist change . . .

By LAURA KELLY

If they win the contest for SAC leadership, Joan Campana (IUC) and Ken Wolfson (II New) aim to lead students in forming a democratic university that will be a basis for socialist change in Canada.

Miss Campana has spent one year at the University of British Columbia, and two intervening years travelling in the U.S. and Mexico.

"I'm only in first year but I think I've seen quite a number of universities, and I know a lot about how they work," Miss Campana said.

Ken Wolfson is a long-time member of the Young Socialists, an active anti-Vietnam campaigner who has completed a three-year journalism course at Ryerson.

Campana and Wolfson are not content to run a campaign dealing with localized campus issues, but focus instead on wider social issues.

"I think we're trying to cut through the preconceptions of the student's view of the university's role by bringing in world issues," said Miss Campana.

"Of all people, students are the most responsive to critical analysis.

But there is a lack of leadership and that's why students are apathetic. We'd like to be the leaders," she added.

But the socialist ticket has run into a lot of resistance because of its socialism.

"A lot of kids have come up to me and said: 'You know, if you didn't have socialism on your ticket you might even win because your program is really good.' This is another preconception we have to break through," said Miss Campana.

But the Campana-Wolfson team is not disclaiming their political ties in spite of the initial student response.

"We have a program. That is not to say we want to dictate to the student. But we do have a much more realistic basis on which to tackle the problems than the other piecemeal candidates," explained Miss Campana.

The socialist platform includes demands for a completely democratic university with no control by big business, a strong SAC policy against the war in Vietnam, financial support that would draw students to the university from all classes, and a special university department for the study of women in society.

"The U of T receives almost one million dollars for war research from the U.S. We have to get rid of this control. We have to start democratization at the bottom and take it all the way to the top," she said.

Campana and Wolfson want the university to be in the hands of students, faculty, and support staff, not the administration.

"What is the administration? They should keep the computer running and make sure the boilers are going," said Wolfson.

"The U of T has to break from the tremendous control of the provincial government. The government should give financial support to the university and not be involved in any other way," said Miss Campana.

"Where other students may make promises, we're going to get in there and question. We're going to make the university a rallying point for demands that are very reasonable," said Miss Campana.

"But the students themselves are going to be involved," said Wolfson.

Campana and Wolfson also have strong objections to the Campbell Report's definition of campus diversity because of its vagueness, and the suggested structure for university courts.

"We feel that members of the disciplinary committees should be elected on programs and be recallable," said Wolfson.

"The key is that we're running on a program. We just learned to be organized and competent because we believe in what we're doing," said Miss Campana.

. . . McNally: issues of student government are irrelevant

By TREVOR SPURR

Benjamin McNally and Mark Golden believe the issues of student government are largely irrelevant to any campaign for SAC president and Vice-president.

"When the other candidates talk about CUG and Campbell reports most of the students don't know what they're talking about.

"So there is really no difference between the other candidates except the images they project," McNally says.

McNally has had no experience in student government but believes students will vote for him because the image he projects is more interesting than those of the other candidates.

He hasn't thought about CUG and says the Campbell report is of little concern to him. The campus center "isn't really necessary" although he wouldn't mind seeing a bar on campus.

"All those things are an issue only because the Varsity says they are. A SAC present can't do anything to change things.

"People have to learn if you want something done they'll have to get together and do it themselves," he says.

In running for president, McNally hopes to explain to students that it makes no sense having a president like Gus Abols.

"What's the sense in such a president if people don't even know who he is," McNally said.

His running mate, Mark Golden, also sees little value in examining issues in the campaign.

"Existence is a shifting thing.

You can't take an issue and just say you're going to solve it."

"What is important is emotions," he says.

Golden believes SAC should be a medium to make people realize they are all part of the same thing and all working for the same goals.

"SAC should be used as the cohesive force which holds the university together just as the Lady Godiva Memorial Band has been for the Engineers", he says.

Golden believes the university could be a good place to be, but for many people it isn't at the present time.

"The first stage in the process to change this is to get people to care by getting SAC to lead the students as a central force," he says.

Candidates talk to Dents

By JEAN BUBBA

As the various campaign machines swung into operation this week, the working of SAC took first place in policy discussions.

The first campus forum of presidential candidates took place on Tuesday at the Faculty of Dentistry.

Joan Campana, running on the Young Socialist slate, said that each faculty and college "should decide themselves what is relevant in their relations with SAC."

Wayne Richardson (IV APSC) said SAC was becoming relevant by supporting course and faculty unions.

PHILOSOPHY OF EDUCATION

Citing the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering as an example, he said, "The development of a philosophy of education in engineering led to our involvement in education, which resulted in a restructuring of the faculty council. Money is available for similar projects from SAC by working through your SAC rep."

Rod Hurd (III SCAR) emphasized the need for SAC to be more aggressive in its role in education and in maintaining its relevance to the university. "SAC should go to the individual disciplines and faculties and ask them what they need," he said.

"It took Scarborough two years to get money from SAC for course union work, though the voting procedure, in the end, only took two minutes," said Hurd.

Eric Miglin (II ASPC), Hurd's vice-presidential running-mate, said "the financial and fiscal responsibility of SAC must be taken much more seriously."

At the beginning of the year, Miglin, an SAC rep himself, said a group of law students formed the African Music Club. SAC agreed to finance them before it realized the organization was merely a prank.

NO INVESTIGATION . . .

"It is examples such as this which show that SAC does not investigate its financial requests properly," said Miglin.

Later at another forum at Cody Hall, the political atmosphere was

Candidates meet their constituents in Cody Hall heightened by the smell of oranges, courtesy of Vice-Presidential candidate Mark Golden who said, "SAC should be a cohesive, emotional force like the LGMB. There is no such thing as an issue. It's not worth taking seriously."

Ken McEvoy Richardson's running-mate, staunchly defended the implementation of the CUG report as an issue. "If there were meaningful dialogues in the classroom, then the university would be a broadening experience."

Hurd said that "top priority must go to local education if SAC is to be responsible to the students. At all costs it must avoid downward politicization. As it now stands, SAC not only tells us to think, it tells us what to think."

Bernie Teitelbaum (III UC) said that "SAC must seek involvement in the problems of individual colleges and faculties. The issue is not one of communication but involvement."

According to Joan Campana, the priority issue is "to find out the issues in society which create problems in the university."

PART II

THE CASE FOR A NEW CANADIAN N

There is a new nationalism evident in Canada. The teach-in here March 6 and 7 on the Americanization of Canada is one manifestation of it — with similar teach-ins taking place spontaneously in colleges and high schools across Canada. And a book on this theme, Close the 49th Parallel etc. edited by Ian Lumsden of Atkinson College, is due from the University of Toronto Press on March 15.

Canadian nationalism is not noted historically for its pervasiveness and militancy. Indeed, it is sometimes argued that the absence of nationalism is the hallmark of Canadian nationalism. If this is read as a statement of fact — rather than goodness — it contains a good deal of truth. For there has been and still is a persistent anti-nationalism evident in Canada consistent with our status within succeeding empires. But this nationalism of anti-nationalism is too self-evidently in the interest of the prevalent imperialism to be seen as other than a manifestation of colonial status and the colonial mind.

For Canadians on the left, the current upsurge in nationalism is a healthy development. The Americanization of this country, with its consequences for economic independence and national survival, serves no interest in Canada or the United States that anyone on the left would wish to serve. For Canada to disappear by absorption into the United States would not be a global catastrophe, but it would clearly be a step in that direction.

Nor are the sources of the new nationalism difficult to find. At its simplest level, it is an understandable reaction to the sickness of the present American society. To be a Canadian is to be a North American and Canadian nationalism is typically reactive. To some, this means that Canadian nationalism can be put down as anti-Americanism, but to so label it and leave the matter there is to miss the point profoundly. For the reaction within Canada is matched by — indeed, follows — the reaction within the United States, to the War in Vietnam in particular and American imperialism in general. What is called unAmerican within is called anti-American without, and is itself only another manifestation of Americanization.

It follows that the left in Canada should, like the left in the United States, see its politics as the politics of anti-imperialism. At the center of the empire, such a commitment takes specific forms: the burning of draft cards, Vietnam moratoriums, Weatherman and Black Panthers. At the periphery of empire, the politics of anti-imperialism properly takes the form of nationalism, of the struggle for independence, of national liberation movements.

To put the matter differently, a serious Canadian nationalism is necessarily a nationalism, not of anti-nationalism nor of anti-Americanism, but of anti-imperialism. And hence, as Jim Laxer has argued so brilliantly in Canadian Dimension: "Continental integration has become so pervasive that those who value an independent Canada and those who reject the values of corporate capitalism are coming to share a common agenda. Canadian nationalists are starting to realize that only large scale government intervention in the economy can win back control of this country for Canadians. Socialists are increasingly aware that we cannot build a better society here if Canada does not possess sovereign power." It follows, in the words of the Waffle Manifesto: "to pursue independence seriously is to make visible the necessity of socialism in Canada."

AN ATIONALISM

by Mel Watkins

Under the stern gaze of Sir. Robert Borden these liberal MP's rejoice in their new flag. After six more years of selling out the country, they're still laughing their way to the bank.

At a deeper level, the sources of the new nationalism are to be found in the evolution of the American economy into one dominated by giant corporations. At home, American capitalism began to move decisively to the monopoly stage almost a century ago. What began as national corporations quickly became multi-national corporations. Just as they steamrollered over local and regional interests within, now they push aside national interests without. A former U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs described the multi-national corporation as "seeing the world as its oyster". Marx and Engels said it better before it had really happened: "The need of a constantly expanding market for its products chases the bourgeoisie over the whole surface of the globe. It must nestle everywhere, settle everywhere, establish connexions everywhere". To write about this phenomenon, as many liberals do, in terms of the harmonies and tensions between the multi-national corporation and the nation-state is, if you think about it for a moment, breathtaking. It puts IBM and Japan, General Electric and France, Kellogg's and Canada on an equal footing. And if you read the substance of what writers who think that way write, the companies matter more than the countries.

The arrogance implicit in this approach is occasionally made very explicit as when George Ball hails the multi-national corporation as "a modern concept designed to meet the requirements of a modern age" and dismisses the nation-state as "a very old-fashioned idea and badly adapted to serve the needs of our present complex world". You don't have to be a socialist to find such talk insulting, but you do have to be a socialist if you find it sounds all-too-true and want to do something about it.

As the Vatican Council has put it, economic and social development "has to be kept under the control of mankind." "It must not be left to the sole judgment of a few men or groups possessing excessive economic power" or "of certain especially powerful nations." The issue is not planning per se, but by whom and for whom. Stephen Hymer of Yale University makes the basic point: the multinational corporation coordinates one industry across many countries; socialism points to the advantage of coordinating many industries within one country.

Now if there is a new nationalism in Canada, there are also increasingly powerful regionalisms — not only Quebec separatism, where there is a linguistic and cultural base for national aspirations, but now mutterings of secession in the West. The paradox is more apparent than real, for it is in the nature of imperialism to divide and conquer, and in the nature of the beast for the periphery to experience, in Karl Levitt's fine turn of phrase, "economic dependency and political disintegration". It is no accident that Americanization and balkanization go together, that newly elected Premiers find it at least as important to touch base in New York as in Ottawa. A Shreyer can talk tougher to the Ottawa mandarins than he can to the New York capitalists — and it is the latter, incidentally, who are the ultimate constraint on the possibility of socialism in one province or one anything.

Regionalism and nationalism go together as the two sides of the (American) coin. But so do independence and socialism, and once either nettle is grasped at the federal level, so too must the other. The farmers of the West are understandably critical of an Eastern capitalism that exploits them behind tariff walls, or by collusion among giant firms as in the farm machinery industry. But to live in the East is to know that Eastern capitalists are mostly engaged in the second-order activity of managing orchard plants for American-based corporations. The solution is not to separate but to socialize. Quebec's aspirations are, of course, another matter, though greater independence for Quebec and not for the other provinces could mean a binational Canada based on an anti-imperialist alliance of English Canada and Quebec.

There have been nationalist upsurges in Canada in the past, as recently as that which swept Diefenbaker to power in the late fifties. But they have typically dissipated themselves in mindless anti-Americanism or in sentimental gestures. What has not been tried is a nationalism of the left. That is what the seventies could be about, though hardly without a struggle.

"Where will Canada get the funds to finance her development if the U.S. capital inflow is cut off? Indeed, it is a major contention of the continentalists that Canada desperately needs foreign investment. This contention is utter nonsense. American multinational corporations make no net contribution to investment in Canada. Indeed, just the reverse is the case. The outflow from Canada of profits from subsidiaries more than offsets the inflow of investment funds from the parent organization.

Between 1960 and 1965 there was a capital outflow of investment funds from the parent organization to the Canadian affiliates of just over 2 billion dollars; in the same period, the affiliates sent 3 billion dollars to the parent organizations in the form of dividends. When we add to this outflow from Canada the small equity investment by Canadians in the U.S. economy, it is clear that so far as direct investment and profits from direct investment is concerned, Canada is a net exporter of funds to the U.S., not a net importer.

If that is the case, what is the source of the large increases of U.S. investment in Canada? (Indeed, the increase of U.S. assets in equity capital has been very large. It has risen about five-fold between 1950 and 1966.)

By far the largest proportion of U.S. direct investment in Canada is financed by the subsidiaries themselves out of profits earned in Canada and depreciation and depletion allowances set aside out of revenues earned in Canada.

In other words, most U.S. direct investment in Canada is financed with Canadian savings, that is, with savings generated from income produced in Canada.

... The point to be stressed, and it cannot be given enough emphasis, is that there is no shortage of savings in Canada; the problem for Canadian financial independence is that a large proportion of Canadian savings, the surplus generated from Canadian production, is owned and controlled by American subsidiaries and branch plants. It is with these savings earned in Canada that American corporations spread their control over a wider and wider range of economic activity."

The Political Economy of Canadian Independence.

Canadian companies have slipped under foreign control in the 20 federal government released its controversial Watkins report on the Canadian industry. A small fraction show up in news reports. A front-page headlines. But the majority go unnoticed — Canadian-owned the next.

Statistics show outsiders control at least 60 per cent of our manufacturing. Accumulated direct foreign investment in Canada is conservative $20 billion — $20 billion of it from the U.S. Four years ago the total was $12.9 billion.

Today, foreign capital is now invested in about 13,000 Canadian companies of those are foreign-controlled — 7,000 American.

More than half the total assets of our 400 largest corporations, according to a report, control 97 per cent of our automobile industry, 97 per cent of chemicals and 77 per cent of electrical apparatus.

The steel industry is 59 per cent foreign controlled; the petroleum industry 74 per cent."

U of T hosts americanization teach-in

A major teach-in will be held at U of T on March 6 and 7 on the Americanization of Canada.

The teach-in is sponsored by the U of T NDP Club and the Waffle Movement, left wing group of the NDP.

The two high priests of Canadian nationalism, Walter Gordon and U of T economics professor Melville Watkins will lead off the debate at 8:00 p.m. on Friday March 6.

On Saturday morning a panel on the Americanization of Canadian universities and a debate on Organized Labour and Independence are scheduled.

In the afternoon there will be a confrontation between Waffler James Laxer and Parti Quebecois candidate Bernard Landry.

The sessions will close with a panel on Canadian Foreign Policy featuring M. P. Andrew Brewin, Danny Drache and C. W. Gonick, the editor of Canadian Dimension and a Manitoba MLA.

Woodrow Wilson scholarships for 34 U of T grads

U of T has placed first among 800 Canadian and American universities and colleges in the number of students who have received Woodrow Wilson Fellowship designations.

34 U of T graduating students in Arts and Science were selected this year.

Their names will be sent to graduate schools in both countries with a recommendation that they be offered fellowships for graduate study. The foundation has limited funds to provide its own fellowships.

In all 1,163 designates were chosen from 12,000 nominees.

Following U of T in the number of designates was the University of Michigan with 26. Harvard and the City University of New York tied for third place with 25 each.

McGill University took second place in Canada with 21 Designates, followed by Carleton University with 9 and York University with 8.

The U of T designates are Alexander D. Bain (IV Trin), Mary E. Bartlett (IV Trin), Florence M. Bartoshesky (III SMC), Elizabeth M. Black (IV Trin), Alan C. Bowen (IV Trin), Melville Bradshaw (IV UC),

Robert D. Cairns (IV Vic), Mrs. Beverley A. Cavanagh (IV Mus), Edward J. Champlin (IV Trin), Jan Don D. Cioe (IV UC), Howard M. Davidson (IV Trin), Louis Erlichman (IV Vic), Joel S. Pratt (IV Vic), Benjamin Rusak (IV UC), Robert E. Sinkevich, (IV SMC), Veronica Strong-Boag (IV Trin), Thomas M. Vari (IV UC), Dorothy E. Westney (IV Vic), and Mrs. Mary G. Wills (IV UC).

There were also 27 U of T honorary mentions.

Moss Award up for grabs again

The Alumni Association's getting its annual search under way this week for graduating students "who will find on the banks of the Isis, the Cam and the Charles, in the cafes of Paris, values that make them more perceptive and therefore better men."

This was how 1934 Moss Scholar J. K. Thomas outlined the criteria for awarding the John H. Moss Memorial Fund Scholarship, which this year will be an award of $1,000 to the best "all-round man or woman in the 1970 final year."

Students in their graduating year may nominate their classmates for this award until March 5.

By April 15, a committee consisting of Claude Bissell, University of Toronto Alumni Association President Morris Gross and three other UTAA members will choose the winner from a group made up of eight semi-finalists, one from each college.

So if you wish to frequent the banks of the Isis, contact your undergraduate student council to determine how nominations are made.

Students consider Poli Ec boycott

The Political Economy Department may end up with a boycott or sit-in if its upper echelon fails to act on student demands over the selection of Stefan Dupre as chairman of the Political Economy Department.

The Graduate Association of Students of Political Science is meeting today to discuss the motion passed by the Political Economy Course Union that declared the selection of Dupre null and void because students were not consulted.

Fred Von Dreger (SGS), chairman of the Graduate Association, said last night,

"Most of the students I have talked to seem to agree that the appointment of the chairman, following the recommendations of the CUG report, shouldn't have been done without a certain amount of student participation."

If the motion of the Course Union is adopted, he said "there will be a discussion of the steps students are prepared to take if the department does not meet our requests." Would they agree to a boycott of classes, pickets, demonstration. These questions will be decided at the meeting.

The meeting, to be held at 4 p.m. in Room 1017 of New College, will also discuss the internal organization of the Association and parallel student-faculty bodies in departmental decision making.

The results of the graduate meeting will be presented to the general course union meeting Wednesday.

Vic maintenance workers to vote on joining union

Victoria College maintenance workers will decide next Wednesday March 4 whether or not they will join a union.

The vote, to be administered by the Ontario Labour Relations Board, could certify the Service Employees Union as the bargaining agent for approximately 100 caretaking, cafeteria and residence employees at the college.

A simple majority for membership is required to guarantee certification.

The union has been seeking certification since the Spring of 1969. Charges and counter-charges have brought the matter to OLRB inquiries several times.

The union has claimed the 55% support required for certification, but the college charged that one signature had been illegally obtained and that coercion had been used by the union.

The college has also supported the formation of a competitive staff association without bargaining rights.

Because of these complications, the union has agreed to vote.

"We don't want to delay any further," Norm Harper, secretary-treasurer of local 204 of the union said yesterday.

"I think we're going to win it, though", he added.

Referendum

Innis College students will go to the polls Friday to approve their college's new constitution.

The proposed changes, which received administrative approval last Monday, require a 2/3 majority on the part of the student body.

The new College Council will consist of 38 members, 19 of whom will be students. It will be the sole governing body of the College.

The Innis College Student Society will be pared down to 8 executive members from a former membership of 14 and will deal with all strictly-student issues.

Ted Montgomery, president of I.C.S.S., said, "The problems of the old constitution was basically one of manpower. Students were being offered positions of real power on council committees, like building and awards, and it was becoming increasingly difficult to find people to sit on I.C.S.S. committees."

The new constitution was drawn up by a committee of volunteers — four students and four faculty members. Montgomery emphasized that throughout the year of negotiations, sides were never taken along staff-student lines.

Students demand gov't stand

A huge demonstration demanding that the Canadian government take an official stand against American involvement in Viet Nam will take place in Ottawa this Saturday.

The March, sponsored by the Students' Society of McGill, has the support of a dozen Canadian universities and a number of high schools as well as the various anti-war organizations.

10-20,000 people from across the country are expected to participate in the march at 1:30 in the afternoon from the Centennial Center to Parliament Hill.

NDP leader T. C. Douglas, Laurier Lapierre, Dalton Camp and Claire Culhane, of the Voice of Women in Quebec, are expected to address the demonstrators.

If there is sufficient interest, the Student Christian Movement of U of T will arrange for bus transportation. Those interested should call SCM at 923-9727.

Information & Nomination Forms in U.C. Lit Office

U of T gymnast John Kortright performs on the parallel bars. Despite his best efforts, Blues could place only fifth in the OQAA Championships in Ottawa last weekend.

Good showing by gymnasts in OQAA final

This year's OQAA Gymnastics Championship Meet, held in Ottawa February 21, was the largest ever with competing teams representing ten universities.

It also featured, amongst the more than 40 individual competitors on each event, two members of Canada's National Team, each with international experience. When it was over, these two had swept almost every medal in leading their teams to the two top spots well ahead of the remaining eight entrants.

Steve Mitruk of MacMaster and Barry Brooker of the University of Ottawa spent the evening competing between themselves. Mitruk won out, taking four gold medals and one silver on individual events as well as the all-round title. Brooker had one gold and three silvers and the two shared a sixth gold. But Mitruk's MacMaster teammates showed greater depth and beat out Brooker's Ottawa squad by a whopping 10 points.

Trailing in third place, 11 points out of second was last year's champion Universite de Montreal team. The rest of the pack was another ten points behind them.

For the Toronto Gymnastics Blues, it was a frustrating evening as they saw Western slip by them into fourth place by a scant four-tenths of a point — about the value of a single missed movement.

Facing competition without the aid of an outstanding individual star for the first time in many, many years, Blues required a real team effort. And it was just that — few truly outstanding performances but lots of good, solid gymnastics. In the individual all-round point totals, for example, John Kortright picked up 32.65, Al Forest had 31.55, and Gary Wicks managed 30.75 in his first championship competition.

However, Toronto was not without its share of noteworthy individual efforts. John Kortright's 8.85 valut put him only 0.05 away from the silver medal and only 0.1 from the gold. You can't come much closer. Kortright was also an excellent fifth on the big bar, while Al Forest took ninth on the same event. And with 42 or so competitors on each event, the thirteenth placing of Gary Wicks on the parallel bars is also worthy of mention. Finally, without the extra points picked up by specialists Phil Michaelis, Carl Sloane and Arthur Stein, the team could not have even reached fifth place.

For half the team, this was probably their last OQAA meet. It is hoped that next year, response to the team will be somewhat more enthusiastic than it has been in the past. The squad will continue to practice regularly for another month and gymnasts are encouraged to join in the upper gym at Hart House Tuesdays and Fridays from 5:30 to 7:30 p.m.

Squash team to challenge McGill for title

Varsity Blues head for Montreal tomorrow to try to end the stranglehold McGill has had on the intercollegiate squash title for the past three years.

During that time Blues felt they should have won at least two of the tournaments but last minute injuries weakened the team, resulting in close losses to the powerful McGill squad.

Despite the presence of Peter Martin, one of Canada's top ranked players, McGill's five-man team is not as strong as in past years. Blues have already defeated them once 5-0 although Martin did not play.

Blues stiffest competition should come from Western which has a well-balanced team with strength at all five positions. Other teams in the tournament which runs from Friday to Sunday at McGill are Guelph, Waterloo and McMaster.

Varsity coach Ralph Rimmer has chosen the following five, listed in order of rank, to make the trip: Vic Harding, captain and member of the Ontario team which played in the U.S. Nationals last weekend, John Stewart, winner of the Toronto and District "C" tournament this year, Howie Fluxgold, winner of the T and D "B" last week, Mike Gardiner, former T and D "C" champion and Ashley Perkins, a ranking provincial junior.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1970-71

MONDAY, MARCH 2, 1970

This is the third year that a revised method of electing the five student representatives to the University of Toronto Athletic Directorate, will be followed. To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 128 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows.

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"

The nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph.

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows.

The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport.

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at this University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence. Also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner.

This year, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

J. P. LOOSEMORE, Secretary
University of Toronto Athletic Association.

You Can make SAC work

SAC is sick. If it is to recover, the first thing it must do is to establish two way communication between SAC and you, the students in the university.

Wayne Richardson believes that the SAC president is the person to build this communications link. He is running for president because he wants to spend most of his time and energy in the coming year doing just that.

He wants to experiment with the mass media as a means of giving you, the student, a chance to be involved in SAC again. He wants to try to make better use of the Varsity to inform you about what is going on, and to find out what you are thinking.

He wants to make SAC your organization again. He knows it is far from that now.

It's easy to say what's wrong, though. It takes something more to make SAC work again.

It takes a president like Wayne Richardson and a vice president like Ken McEvoy... people with some ideas about how it shouldn't be doing them.

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy have a deep and proven commitment to the concept of community in the university articulated by the CUG report. They are convinced that SAC has the potential to play an active role in the development of such a university.

They need your support to make it work so that it can.

Toronto wrestlers fifth

Waterloo and Western proved that hard practices and physical fitness produce winning teams as they came first and second in the OQAA wrestling championships. Toronto placed fifth, defeating only MacMaster and U of Windsor.

Ken White placed second in the 126 lb weight class, pinning 3 out of 4 competitors. Bill Allison (167 lb) placed second to P. Symon of Guelph. It was a frustrating match to watch as Allison lost 1-0.

Well, there are only 361 1/4 days left until the next OQAA meet. This year was a real down — we can only go up.

Cameron wins interfac curling

University of Toronto curlers finished the regular season Sunday at the Terrace Club with Jack Cameron leading his rink to the Interfaculty Championship.

Cameron, along with Harvey Pasternak, Wayne Freeman, and Bob Kesnik notched their tenth win of the season, downing Bill Malouin 9-2, to finish on top of the ten-team league.

Play-offs for the Dean Maxwell Trophy for the Club Championship start next Sunday, with eight teams entering the single knock-out competition. Joining Cameron will be Alan Bromstein, Dan Omura and Art Moses from the Recreational League and George Carr, Terry Lalande, Larry Westbrook, and John Francis from the Intercollegiate Group.

Even three goalies couldn't help Waterloo last Friday night in Warrior's 9-6 loss to Varsity, although they did manage to keep the puck out on this drive. Other teams in the league had even poorer luck, and Blues ended up with the two leading scorers in the OQAA Western Division.

Blues top OQAA scoring

We love you anyway, squidgers

Twelve days ago, the U of T tiddleywinks team left unheralded for the land down under — Ithaca, New York — to make what was to be its last bid for the North American Championship.

Paul Milgram (IV APSC), Barry Corbin (IV UC), Lindsay Horenblas (III UC), Morris Cohen (IV APSC), Bryon Alexandroff (IV APSC) and Mel Solomon (IV APSC), after surviving a nasty border incident and a series of bizarre circumstances which nearly caused the team to default all its matches, put up a creditable showing, placing third in their division with 85½ points, only 8 points out of second.

Their opponents were among the best in North America: Cornell, MIT, Carleton and Somerville (who took home all the winks).

It was a nostalgic experience for all the U of T players, who had been together for three years and had competed twice before for the trophy. Five members will be lost through graduation and the future of the team is cloudy indeed. Paul Milgram broke down and sobbed convulsively as he finished his last match, while his partner futilely attempted to comfort him and at the same time hold back the flow from his own eyes.

Ten days ago, the U of T tiddleywinks team returned unheralded from the land down under — Ithaca, New York — after making what was to be its last bid for the North American Championship.

Volleybelles take WIAU crown

Varsity's talented group of Volleybelles romped to the WIAU championship played February 13-14 at Queen's.

Toronto took the title with unexpected ease, winning all fifteen games without losing a single set.

The Volleybelles defeated Queens, McMaster, Western, Guelph and McGill, all by the monotonously regular scores of three games to zero.

Since the intermediate volleyball team also swept past its opposition during the season, Varsity appears to be firmly established as the school to beat in women's volleyball.

Unfortunately, the same can not be said of the basketball team. Taking a cue, perhaps, from their male counterparts, the basketbelles tied for fourth and last spot in the WIAU championships.

The first round was played at McGill on February 13-14, with the Varsity team losing 40-20 to Queens and 47-31 to McGill.

In Part Two at McMaster last weekend, they lost 30-27 to Guelph and 40-31 to Western before finally beating McMaster 46-33. Queens, Western and McGill finished in that order, with the other three teams tied for fourth.

Who said politics makes strange bedfellows?

We don't think so

... and neither does our competition

The modern marriage has its ups and downs, sure. But it also requires co-operation and friendly co-existence to make it work. The modern woman has a need, not a right to self-fulfillment. Besides, the competition is healthy.

That doesn't mean we don't have our little scraps. Sure we do. Life wouldn't be complete without them. And just because we're the most important couple in the world doesn't mean we can always hide our little tiffs. Especially early on. She got a little angry over Vietnam. It's only natural. We got a little angry over Cuba and we put our foot down. Sometimes a man has to do what a man has to do.

But our marriage has matured. Now we see to it that things never get out of hand because each of us knows his/her sphere of interests. We've consolidated our positions. And we cater to each other's whims. We didn't make a fuss when she grabbed Czechoslovakia, did we? And the little disagreements make for a sort of creative tension, don't you think?

SAC accepts Varsity Board constitution

By TREVOR SPURR

The Varsity's independence from the Students' Administrative Council was re-affirmed Wednesday night as SAC voted to accept the constitution of the Varsity Board of Directors.

Recognition of the Board puts an end to attempts to return control of the paper to the SAC Communications Commission. Until the establishment of the Board two years ago the paper was accountable to Comcom.

As explained by the Board's chairman Gary Thaler, an assistant science professor at Erindale, one of its main purposes is to free the Varsity from any political control.

"The editor is not free from all control, but with the Board he must defend the paper on journalistic rather than on political grounds", he said.

Before the constitution was presented to SAC, it had been studied by a Communications Commission Committee established to investigate the purposes of the Board and an appropriate structure for it.

One of the Committee's proposals was to establish a "community-supported newspaper" which would be controlled and financed by the administration, faculty, undergraduate and graduate students.

Both the administration and the faculty expressed little enthusiasm for such a proposal.

A letter from Academic Vice-president J. H. Sword, said, "The history of undergraduate journalism is marked with controversy, but through it all is a theme of criticism, usually serious in nature and forceful in comment.

"The kind of newspaper that I would anticipate resulting from your proposal would inevitably be watered down and less colourful and I would suspect be of little interest to the undergraduate student body..." he said.

The Board as outlined in the approved constitution therefore rejects the concept of the "community supported paper." It is rather to act as a buffer for the paper against political fluctuations within SAC.

The 11-member Board includes members selected by SAC, the faculty, and the Varsity itself.

An important constitutional amendment also accepted concerned the firing of Varsity editors only by majority vote of both Varsity staff and Varsity Board.

In pushing for acceptance of the constitution, Board Chairman Thaler said it embodied "simplicity and lack of political overtone".

SAC also ratified a contract which will involve the Varsity in the Canadian University Press national ad co-op.

The ad co-op will sell national advertising through Cameron Consultants of London, Ont. and will provide a substantial increase in revenue for the member papers.

It is the best method for student papers to solicit national advertising, explained Stewart Saxe, CUP President.

"National advertisers formerly have not wanted to deal with us but if we have only one agent and one billing they have said they would be interested", said Saxe.

Some members of SAC expressed reservations about the contract because the agent's commission is 20 per cent.

Admitting this was a large percentage, Saxe explained "it was the only way any agency would accept the risk and the contract."

Saxe said the lost revenue would be more than made up by the increased number of ads that would be bought.

"There would be more ads than there are now — perhaps a 300 per cent increase", he added.

Poli Ec Course Union sets Tuesday as deadline

By ALF CHAITON

The first organized mass boycott of classes in recent memory at U of T may take place next Tuesday.

The Political Economy Course Union, in a general meeting Wednesday of about 70 class representatives and other poli-ec students set next Tuesday as a deadline for a departmental reply to a motion passed earlier in the meeting.

That motion, moved by Gary Webster (SGS), co-chairman of the Commission on University Government, stated that a parity committee should be set up immediately to discuss the future structure of the department.

Included was a demand that the appointment of the department chairman be reconsidered. Prof. J. S.

Dupre had been appointed chairman without any student consultation or knowledge, and the course union had earlier declared the appointment "null and void" in their eyes for that reason.

Former SAC president Steve Langdon (IV Trin), who proposed the boycott said, "Most students have a gut feeling that the appointment was messy and badly-handled, but believe they can't do anything about it. When we refused to accept the appointment, we made a political decision. If we drop it now, it'll reinforce those views."

"The main problem in this department," Langdon continued, "is that the faculty doesn't believe that students are serious. When it comes right down to it, they feel we're not going to do anything about it."

A small group of students disagreed. Mike Mazurek (I UC) said, "We shouldn't be concerned with how a chairman is chosen, but with who is chosen."

Phyllis Clarke (SGS), however, said that the trouble in the department was its "undemocratic nature", and that the main priority was to decide the place of students within the decision-making apparatus of the department.

There also be an arts festival on the third floor of Sidney Smith, where Andy Wernick (SGS) suggested that most poli-ec offices are located.

This festival would include "singing, dancing, gabbing, poetry reading, etc." It would begin Tuesday morning at 10 a.m., along with the boycott, if a positive reply had not been received from the department.

"This could be the cultural event of the year at the U of T," he added.

The two proposals were adopted with only 7 opposed and a five-man steering committee was set up. The members are Langdon, Webster, Wernick, Peter Hall (II Trin), chairman of the course union, and Fred von Dreger (SGS), recently resigned chairman of the graduate political science union.

The following is an open letter to fellow students in political economy from the elected members of the co-ordinating committee. The committee was set up by the course union meeting Wednesday to direct activities with regard to a possible boycott of the department.

"You can't always get what you want; But if you try some time You just might find You get what you need."

—Jogger and Richards

Students in the Department of Political Economy have been trying to get changes in the structure of the Department that would give us some say in the decisions that are made. We have participated in an endless stream of committees to persuade the faculty that real changes should be made.

A year ago, the undergraduate Curriculum Committee and the Political Science Graduate Programme Reform Committee raised the question of student participation in all decision-making. The faculty told us to wait for the CUG report.

The CUG report came out in October, and the Course Union immediately set up a committee of students to formulate a student position. So far the faculty have repeatedly delayed, and have never met themselves to discuss CUG.

The Political Economy Course Union and the Graduate Association of Students in Political Science in general meetings have repeatedly called for student participation in decision-making in the department. This is the end of February. Time is running out this year.

An Open Meeting of the Political Economy Course Union on Wednesday, February 25, decided that words and resolutions were bringing no results: the time had come for action in which all students could participate. It was time for students to express their concern on this vital issue.

After passing resolutions, the Course Union presented the following list of demands to the Chairman of the Department with copies sent to Dean Allen and President Bissell:

- That the procedures outlined in Recommendation 57 of the Report of the Commission on University Government be implemented in order to restructure the Department of Political Economy.
- The negotiating committee to be made up of equal numbers of staff and students from the department. That negotiations be based on the parallel structures model, i.e. any agreement must be approved — separately and by majority vote — by the staff and the members of the students' union or club before it can take effect."

- That the Committee negotiate a restructuring of the Political Economy Department and that it report back to the students and faculty in separate meetings to be held by the second week of October, 1970.

- That because of the procedure used to appoint Professor J. Stefan Dupre as the new Departmental Chairman, this Presidential forum - The sacred and the profane

By LAURA KELLY

The serious and satirical candidates for top SAC positions gathered Wednesday in Convocation Hall to present their views on campus issues to about 150 students.

Rather than debate, each candidate was allotted four minutes for his political pitch, and a question period followed.

Only a flashback to Easy Rider briefly disrupted the proceedings, when vice-presidential candidate Mark Golden, who is on a ticket with Benjamin McNally, roared into the hall on the back of a motorcycle.

As Golden climbed the speaker's platform, he tossed oranges, his campaign trademark, to waving enthusiasts.

"I'm not here to talk about issues because I think issues are illusions. I'm here to talk about events," said Golden.

"It doesn't matter that the university is supporting the Vietnam war, it matters that it's falling apart. SAC should make itself an emotionally cohesive force," Golden said.

Although it was a hard act to follow, the remaining candidates continued.

Combining their two four minute time slots, Wayne Richardson (IV APSC) and Ken McEvoy (III Vic) alternated at the mike in presenting their platform.

"Many people feel CUG is irrelevant. I don't. Structural reform does make a difference in this university. I want to be elected to help continue this reform," said McEvoy.

McEvoy headed the SAC University

Commission this year, working closely with administration and faculty in an attempt to implement the CUG report.

Richardson, SAC member and chairman of the SAC campus centre committee, defined the SAC presidency, a full-time job, as an office of communications "to bring an overall analysis of the university to the different segments on campus."

Richardson and McEvoy want a full-time campus centre coordinator, television programs and comment sections in Toronto daily papers about university affairs, a regular full page Varsity ad about SAC, and they urged student participation in community groups like Pollution Probe.

Rod Hurd (II SCAR) and Eric Miglin (III APSC), who form an opposing ticket, emphasized the students' role as planners in the university.

"SAC could pressure the government to renovate older buildings like University College," said Hurd, president of the Scarborough student council.

"SAC collects a sum that is well in excess of a quarter million dollars. That's an awful lot of money," said Miglin, an SAC rep.

"SAC tends to be too political. It forgets the social aspect of campus," said Miglin.

Richardson would place himself in no political category, and Miss Campana and Wolfson reaffirmed their socialist outlook.

"I only want to show that all this is ridiculous," offered McNally.

Bernie Teitelbaum, an independent presidential candidate answered, "I want to be Secretary-General of the United Nations."

Two more resign from U of T Staff Association

By PETER HALL

Two more members of the Steering Committee for the proposed University of Toronto Staff Association have resigned this week from the Committee.

Bill Welborn, a worker at the Sigmund Samuel Library, and Susan Meredith, on the staff of the Victoria Library, quit at a Committee meeting on Tuesday.

Welborn, expressing dissatisfaction with the Committee's approach to the administration said, "I think they are a little naive. They think that by being friendly they can get things done; but it has been proven that you don't get things done that way."

"You have to bang the table to get action."

He criticized the Steering Committee for not having an "effective policy". "They don't know what they are doing," he said.

Mrs. Gwen Russell, the chairman of the Steering Committee, indicated that the Committee was anxious to ensure agreement on the new constitution they will be proposing to a general meeting of university support staff March 5.

"Everyone will have to stand up and be counted at the meeting next Thursday," she said.

Welborn and Meredith do not expect to attend the meeting but both indicated they are strongly opposed to the proposed constitution.

ASU in on chairman selection

The Anthropology Department is on the verge of selecting a new chairman, though student participation was not invited until quite recently.

At this point, Professor D. R. Hughes seems to be the most likely choice.

Chris Haussmann, President of the ASU said, "We've met with candidates, of course, and we put in our own recommendations to the dean."

"We didn't know what was happening until fairly late in the procedures. If we had, we might have submitted our own candidate."

Haussmann said, "I'm in the process of drawing up a letter of support for the political Economy course union... If we're not satisfied with our department's position, we might carry this further."

The PECU declared the appointment of Stephan Dupre as department chairman "null and void because students were not consulted."

They are preparing for a boycott of classes next week if the faculty is not prepared to set up a parity committee to examine the structure of the department and appointment procedures.

U of T enters Urban Car Competition

A novel low-pollution car is being designed at U of T's Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering. The car is to compete with vehicles from American universities in a race from Boston's M.I.T. to the California Institute of Technology at Pasadena, California.

The event officially known as the 1970 Urban Car Competition, is scheduled for late August. It is to take nine days and plans are being made to include Toronto as the first stop.

Driving for U of T will be Mechanical Engineering student Douglas Venn (SGS), who will also direct overall design and construction.

The car will be designed to run on propane gas at high combustion efficiency. The engine can be used either to drive the wheels or to charge a number of standard lead-acid batteries. Subsequently, where zero pollution is the aim, one or both generators can operate as propulsion motors, powered by the batteries.

The project is funded by several companies involved in the field and by two funds established by former professors in the Faculty.

appointment be subject to scrutiny, review, and agreement through this negotiating committee.

That a satisfactory reply to the above points reach the Course Union by Monday afternoon, March 2, 1970, if the boycott scheduled for Tuesday is to be avoided.

The meeting elected us, as a co-ordinating committee to make preparations for the boycott and associated activities that will be organized if a satisfactory reply is not received.

A general meeting to discuss the boycott will be held on Monday at 1 p.m. in Sidney Smith.

After - dinner politics

The real world arrived at the Saint Mike's Graduation Banquet last night, in the form of the college's own radical group. The class of '70 did not suspect that there would be little traditional decorum.

Dan Mack, as toastmaster, somewhat abashed, asked for a toast to the Queen. Table three, row three failed to rise with the rest. Those present became aware that a quorum of radicals, prominent among whom were Greg Kealey and Tom Mathieu was present. The group was dressed in denim, shirts, scarves and bandanas which distinguished them from those dressed more traditionally; they kept their coats with them.

Florence Bartoshevsky appeared at the head table, somewhat as a surprise, to point out that no women had been included in the list of speakers. In a brief but emotional speech she presented the opinion that the well-heeled dinner, and the people present at it were feeding "out of the stomachs of 95 per cent of the human race," by virtue of being graduates.

Mr. Mack had earlier referred to the fact that three of the group (Greg Kealey, Tom Mathien and Florence) were recipients of Woodrow Wilson Scholarships with the implication that he doubted their sincerity as radicals, wishing them "many happy years of confrontation and co-option." After Miss Bartoshevsky's speech he confined himself to neutral remarks and asked Father Kelly, the President of St. Michael's, to speak as scheduled.

Father Kelly wondered how he could follow Miss Bartoshevsky's "act".

branch-planting in the intellectual colonial garden --see r 12

"It's no act," she cried out.

His speech dwelt on the necessity for understanding of diverse viewpoints and was received quietly by most and with intermittent heckling from Table three.

A series of toasts from anyone on the floor wishing to make one followed. Dave Davies, a member of the Hart House Debating Club, tried to speak of University as an experience that ought to be disconcerting. It set the tone for a number of such toasts, which cut into the main speaker's time. A table of eight had successfully converted staidness into a mass examination of conscience. The crowd seemed to yawn whenever words of "good people I have met" came from a speaker. They harkened to WLF members speaking of the "shitty future" awaiting women, and to Terry Mack, who reminded them that despite the "shittiness" there was still a less "pessimistic" view of woman's role.

Table three became more insistently loud, reaching a crescendo of scorn when Herbert Richardson, the main speaker, tried to talk, incongruously but with sincerity, about a spiritual force working in those who spoke.

concerted graduates, who then heard Mr. Richardson to the end.

Dan Mack, in concluding, twice mentioned the "docility" of the crowd, from whom not a heckle or a peep was heard after the Group's exit.

Those who had objected to the shortage of wine with which to do the numerous toasts shortly afterward were satisfied by the copious supply at the party in Sigma Chi Fraternity.

No-one from table three, row three, attended the party.

"Get metaphysical, Herb, explain it all to us," yelled Kealey, later echoed by Mathien, who objected to Rev. Richardson's "working it all into his speech... it's shit," he screamed, almost incoherent, "just — BULLSHIT!"

Richardson tried to quieten the uproar by saying he was "not philosophizing, just entertaining." Table three, en masse, grabbed coats and exited. There was applause from the mass of red-faced and dis-staff association or union - not really a battle

I have, until now, avoided becoming embroiled in the so-called "battle for representation of the support staff", because, as far as I am concerned, no battle has ever existed. Members of the staff who wish to join a union are, as far as I am aware, perfectly at liberty to do so. Many of our tradesmen cannot work at their chosen trades without a union ticket. C.U.P.E. has opened its doors to the rest of us and all are welcome. Those members of staff who do not wish to join a union will have an alternative, the U.T.S.A., it is as simple as that.

I feel compelled however, to reply to the two letters appearing in the February 23 edition of the Varsity. Mr. Panza is doing very well if he has been around the university for a number of years and seen the Staff Association in action. I wish he would tell me more about it, as to my knowledge, no such association presently exists? Any action he has seen has been from a steering committee, formed two months ago, to set up proposed guidelines for the formation of an association. Surely, the place for Mr. Panza to air his views was at these meetings, not in the Varsity; all the meetings were open, and we were most anxious to hear all points of view. The statements he attributes to members of the steering committee were all personal opinions, thrown to the meeting for discussion, with just as many voices in direct opposition, by members who strongly opposed those views and said so. Did he? Unfortunately, he chooses to hide behind a pseudonym, so only he can answer that question.

The function of the steering committee was to seek a cross section of opinion and present a necessarily broad outline of aims and objectives to interested staff for general approval. The details will be dealt with piece by piece by the Board of Representatives and the elected officers of the proposed association, at later meetings when people have had a chance to discuss amongst themselves what they want the association to do for them. We are not the association, we are just staff members interested enough to attempt to do something about the difficulties we all face. I was rather amused to read that I was selected for this job by the "administration", as Mary Dustin seems to think. Rest assured, if that were the case, I would not be prepared to spend my lunch hours at work and many hours of my time at home working on this project. Furthermore I think it is inevitable that, in pursuing the interests of the staff, conflict with the "administration" may well occur.

I quote one of my own statements made at a meeting before I became the chairman of the steering committee, to in-dicade to Mary Dustin, that I am fully aware of many of the problems and would also like to see something done about them. "A U. of T. wide staff organization will result in direct contact with administrative bodies to ensure that the problems of job security, increased salary scales, consistent job classification and defence against arbitrary dismissal will be resolved. It will give staff a chance to air grievances and ideas and be an incentive to make a job at the university a career rather than stop-gap employment, as it is for many at present."

Barkwell : Election shows SAC is part of students' oppression

By BOB BARKWELL

Bob Barkwell, a third-year U of T Medical student, is the Vice-President of the Students Administrative Council.

—The most effective and enduring form of warfare against liberation is the implanting of material and intellectual needs that perpetuate obsolete forms of the struggle for existence.

— Herbert Marcuse, One Dimensional Man

And once again friends, we plunge into the hurly-burly of an SAC election. All around us the colourful election posters, announce meetings at which the candidates have at one another, hammer and tongs. Charges and counter-charges, issue against issue, political view against political view, give the voter the opportunity to choose the alternative that most nearly approximates his own view. I mean, that's how democracy works, right?

So let's look at the choices we've got. On the one hand, we have the Richardson-McEvoy team, offering "a strong, relevant, and representative" SAC, an end to "frustrating and unproductive . . . petty factionalism", and "irresponsible political commitments". And (honest to God) communication. On the same hand, we have the Hurd-Miglan team offering an SAC "representative of the students", which offers "free and open discussion of all sides of issues", "remaining relevant to students in a concrete way", and (honest to God) communication.

The only contest so far has been in terms of competence. Richardson and McEvoy play hard on their experience with SAC, their knowledge of the University, and their acquaintance with administrators. Hurd and Miglan are desperately trying to prove that they know just as much. (Hurd talking about the engineering details of the U. of T. smokestack to show how much he knows about the St. George Campus.)

The problem with all of this is that it doesn't relate much to the concerns of the average student on campus. Abstract talk about the CUG Report is pretty meaningless if you know, from experience and deep in your guts, that you have no power, that in fact you are interchangeable with any other student as far as most professors and all of the administration are concerned, that as far as Simcoe Hall knows, you do not exist except as 65B040390. And so far in this campaign, no one has tried to make those links, never mind the equally important links between the self-determination of students and the self-determination of Canada.

SAC as LGMB

One team, McNally-Golden, has at least seen the existential absurdity of talking only about structures without talking about content, of talking about issues to people who don't believe in politics. The problem is that they have substituted another mystification (albeit one that's more fun) for the myth that elections have much relevance to the lives of people. On the thesis that the LGMB provided a focus for the unity of engineers, they want to turn SAC into a $250,000 LGMB. ("New, improved. Now bigger and better than ever!"). The point they miss is that the unity of engineers is based on a number of factors, some healthy, some not; and that the LGMB was the symbol and not the cause of that unity.

The Young Socialist campaign is a strange mixture of innocent naivete, solid analysis, and crass opportu-

ism. They do begin to make the connections between what happens in your course and how corporations affect the university. They begin to lay out the relationship between the position of women in society and the channelling of women into specific courses at the university.

Unfortunately, by trying to persuade students that these things are going to be changed via the medium of the SAC, they make themselves unbelievable.

Bernie Teitelbaum is a joke.

KEEP THE BABY, FAITH

Well, there you have it, ladies and gentlemen; step right up, pay your money and take your choice.

Do you think we've turned apathetic?

Apathy is such a bad word. I'd hate to think it's apathy we suffer from.

Let's just call it faith.

— Jules Feiffer, The Explainers

The problem with student council elections, as with other elections in liberal democratic institutions, is that they function to depoliticize people. That is, by casting a ballot once a year you discharge your political responsibility (The choice is yours). Cast your vote March 3.). All other forms of activity are de-legitimized, and you are forced to suffer the results of that election until the next time. (People get the government they deserve.)

The fact that you are faced with a choice between Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee doesn't enter into it.

That particular thesis has been accepted for some time around the SAC. It formed the basis of passing impeachment and referendum procedures so that people could more directly affect the SAC; it lay at the root of the SAC Brief to the CUG. It has been conventional wisdom for some time at SAC that the self-determination of students is not going to come about without the creation of structures that allow people to influence their own lives, at the same time as attitudes which encourage people to do that are also being developed.

The present election campaign fails miserably if it is judged in terms of trying to build those attitudes. Not only are none of the serious candidates explaining what their basic political attitudes are, (which is dishonest and irresponsible), none of them are talking about what the function of the SAC is in working towards the self-determination of students, what the function of the university is or should be and what the students' role should be in determining that.

SUFFER THE GRINDINGS

As long as candidates for SAC continue to see their role as one of holding and wielding power, and therefore see the role of elections merely as a means to that end, the process of the student elite talking to the administrative elite (and usually being screwed) while the great majority of students silently suffer the grindings of the mill will continue to go on. Only when the SAC takes communication as meaning more than TV programs and leaflets, and begins to address itself to the problem of persuading students that all action is political, and that together in their apathy they are as effective in maintaining the status quo as they would be together in their militance in changing it, will SAC itself cease to be part of the structure of the oppression of students.

Students' Councils are the invisible occupation of the campus by the administration.

Queens moves to purge radicals

KINGSTON (CUP-SUE) — A special senate committee at Queens University yesterday recommended to the Senate that Chuck Edwards, a graduate student in Chemical Engineering withdraw from the university.

Edwards had charged that his doctoral supervisor, Henry Becket, told him to either cease his political activity or leave the department.

Edwards is a member of Kingston's Free Socialist Movement.

The investigation committee of the Senate consisted of five men: one representative from the Alma Mater Society, one from the FSM, and three other administration reps.

The report they drew up was only signed by four of the members. Terry O'Hara, the FSM rep was not aware of its existence.

Val Traversy, the AMS rep saw the report and at first refused to sign it. But after a secret six-hour meeting with the three administration representatives, he signed.

Originally the committee planned to hold open deliberations, but some of the members changed their minds.

On Feb. 18 they attempted to hold their meeting in camera, but O'Hara brought along other members of the FSM with him to open it up.

That meeting was dissolved. The three administration representatives then decided to let the chairman write the report himself.

The report that exonerates Becket from the complaints made against him by Edwards and recommends that Edwards withdraw from the university.

When the open senate meeting heard the report yesterday, only 35 students were allowed to be present, and they had to have tickets to get in.

Only six members of the FSM, who were presenting a collective defense, had tickets. Edwards was not invited to the meeting. He had no ticket and he was not admitted.

R. H. Clark, head of the Engineering Department, received a special invitation and a ticket from principal J. J. Deutsch.

During the senate meeting O'Hara had intended to present a special paper that proposed that all the secretaries in the Law faculty who were forced to work overtime on this report be unionized and given a bonus.

When the report came up on the agenda, O'Hara demanded that Edwards be present. Deutsch ruled him out of order and when he refused to be silent, Deutsch ordered the student police to drag him out of the room.

As those FSM members who were outside the senate chambers tried to push O'Hara back into the room they were surrounded by more student police, many of whom were not wearing their identification armbands.

The students were eventually removed and the report was read. It will be referred to other departments.

One of those is the Faculty of Graduate Studies which is expected to ask Edwards to voluntarily withdraw.

Following the reading of the report, J. H. Brown, Dean of Engineering proposed a motion that Edwards and the two others who originally raised the issue be suspended from the university for a year and also that every member of the FSM who declares himself such and any one who publicly chose to align himself with the FSM also be suspended for a year.

The motion failed because Brown had not given the senate a week's notice of intention to make a motion.

After the meeting Edwards said, "It's just so ludicrous I can't comment."

"On every single incident where there was a conflict in testimony between the department of Engineering and us, the committee took the department's side."

He called Traversy's decision to sign the report, "brainwashing".

"Traversy can't explain anything that's in the recommendations," Edwards said.

"He still believes pressure was brought to bear by the department — but he signed the report."

"The whole thing is blatant repression. Terry (O'Hara) was thrown out of the senate simply for speaking out of turn," he said.

Another senate meeting is planned for Tuesday and the FSM said they are planning militant action to protest the way the case was handled.

Edwards said he doesn't plan to voluntarily resign. The only other legal method they have for removing him would be along academic lines and "they will have a hard time doing that," Edwards said.

SOCIOLOGY

If Sociology be the study of society, it is an odd thing to find that in this discipline at the University of Toronto there is shockingly little studied about Canadian Society.

In all of the undergraduate courses (about 38) there are four which deal specifically with some aspects of Canadian Society. There are, to be sure, several others which pay lip-service to Canadian issues, but studying the French/English problem in Canada in terms of American problems of race and ethnic relations is totally unsatisfactory in understanding the situation in Canada.

In the graduate department, of a possible 19 courses, one deals specifically with Canadian Society. Two others deal with Canada in a cursory way, using Canadian and American data as interchangeable and paying no heed to differences of history and culture. At least five courses treat the problems of the United States with little or no mention of Canada.

Why is it that so much emphasis is placed on the society of the United States and not on Canada? Part of the answer lies in the training and citizenship of the professors.

In 1960, 4 of the 6 sociologists had received their final degrees in the United States. By 1965-6, 16 out of 20 staff members were "finished" in the United States; in 1967-8, 21 out of 28; in 1968-9, 25 out of 32; and in 1969-70, 30 out of 39. (These figures include all full-time staff in the Department, including those on leave-of-absence, but excluding visiting professors.)

In 1968-9, there were 15 Canadian professors, and 13 American. This year there are 15 Canadian and 18 American full-time staff, excluding visiting professors, plus a handful of others.

A department which has more Americans than Canadians cannot help but teach more American-oriented or related courses than Canadian. It is the Canadian student who suffers when the study of Canadian Society remains ignored, denegated, or merely touched upon.

These articles were written by students in the respective departments at University of Toronto.

PHYSICS

The "Americanization" of the university affects our whole perspective on Canadian politics in the most fundamental way. Perhaps this example from a political science textbook which has been in use for 24 years will illustrate the colonial mentality engendered in our universities.

The existence of numerous state and provincial governments in the United States and Canada gives to government, as a whole, a different character from that of Britain, and raises a number of special types of political problems from which British politics is free.

That is the final sentence in the chapter on Federalism in Corry and Hodgett's Democratic Government and Politics still used as one of the texts for the introductory course in Canadian political science. The entire book is dedicated to the theme of understanding Canadian politics by explaining British and, more particularly, American practices. Conventional wisdom is so strong on this question that most people are likely to feel that this is only natural. But, do the texts used for courses on American and British government give equal space to the Canadian example?

It is not, however, merely a question of emphasis; it is a question of the whole perspective on Canadian politics. Two issues here are fundamental, that of the creative potential of Canadian politics and that of the validity of comparing these three units as equivalents. To begin with, all the originality of the Canadian political experience is submerged in the American-British pattern; there is no feeling that Canadian politics has been, is, or could be different from the United States or Britain. And secondly, sentences such as, "The broad patterns of government functions in Britain, United States and Canada are strikingly similar . . ." give the false impression that Canada, like the United States and Britain, is a self-determining entity.

What this means is that the major question facing Canada today — her relationship to the United States — is not realistically discussed in Canadian political science. This assumption that our politics will basically follow that of the U.S. means that Canadian political science has virtually taken a position on American control over Canada. This can be seen from the fact that there is little discussion of the continued viability of Canada. If Canada is only 20 per cent independent, as Trudeau has said, surely this must affect the study of regionalism, federal-provincial relations, and all the other traditional aspects of Canadian political science. Yet these subjects tend to be discussed without reference to American domination. This lack of discussion is particularly true of the academic community — outside it there is a fairly clear understanding that this is the central issue for Canada today. Instead of leading the discussion, as could be expected, the academics seem to be far behind other groups in this society.

Canada has been in a unique position to analyze the movement from British Imperialism to American Imperialism. That Canada is rarely discussed in this perspective strongly condemns the kind of political science taught at U of T.

POLITICAL SCIENCE

While in arts departments such as political science, history etc., there are or should be detectable differences between the Canadian and American approaches; this is not the case in the physical sciences where Russians and Americans carry out essentially the same type of research and the international viewpoint is considered valid.

However, the tight employment situation in Canada for physics graduates has recently made the discussion of a quota system more acceptable. Two problems must be considered in the immediate future: that the Ph.D. programme has always been seen as a period for developing academic excellence and not as job training; and Canada has always produced more PhDs than can find jobs here which is why 50 per cent have traditionally gone to the States. Therefore much of the present employment problem can be traced to the tight employment situation in the U.S.A.

To understand how American academic imperialism adversely affects the development of Canadian science, we must investigate the nature of international scientific research to see where Canada fits into the scheme. Two facts are immediately perceptible: many research projects conducted in Canadian universities require enormous amounts of money; the resulting type of graduate training is applicable only to the largest of international (i.e. American) corporations. Two such projects at U of T are the Aerospace Institute and the Experimental High Energy Physics Group. In both cases there are no

Canadian industries to take advantage of the research knowledge obtained in the Phd programmes.

Canada, as well as a large number of other countries, cannot support the size of industry required to do big money research. Maybe, instead of trying to buttress the American branch plants to imitate the parent companies, the universities should specialize in research that will result in graduates who can fill useful jobs in Canadian industry.

Knowledge in the physical sciences may be "international" but the spheres in which Canadian universities decide to do research today are definitely determined by "think big" American corporations.

ENGLISH

From An English Graduate Student

With the help of the Commonwealth Universities Yearbook for the relevant years and The Directory of American Scholars, the percentage of Canadians above the rank of lecturer in the Toronto English department was compiled. The far right-hand column shows the percentage of Canadians including those with the rank of lecturer. A drop or rise in this figure pre-dates by a couple of years percentage change in the upper ranks.

Year (fall)	Total	Cdn.	Non-Cdn.	U.S.	U.K.	Other	% Cdn.	% Cdn + lect
1939	16	14	2	0	2	0	87.5	87.5
1954	23	20	3	0	3	0	86.9	82.9
1959	34	28	6	4	2	0	82.4	78.3
1961	33	28	5	4	1	0	88.2	76.7
1962	42	29	13	8	4	1	69.0	66.6
1963	51	37	14	8	6	0	72.5	68.3
1965	64	42	22	10	11	1	65.6	71.4
1968	79	52	27	14	10	3	65.8	N.A.

The figures show Canadians increased only 2.6 times since 1954 while non-Canadians increased 9 times. Though there was a doubling of above-lecturer staff between 1939 and 1959 (or 1961), Canadian percentage was stable. But when the staff had again doubled in the short time between 1961 and 1965, the Canadian percentage dropped 22.6 points. The drop could have been anticipated in the high percentage of non-Canadian lecturers evident in the 1959 and 1961 figures.

The sources normally supplying Canadian staff supplied only 14 of 31 (or 45.1%) of new professors above the rank of lecturer between 1961 and 1965.

Between 1965 and 1968 Canadians supplied 10 of the 15 (or 66.6%) and the total for 1961-68 was 24 of the 46 new professors (or 52.2%).

How does the present Canadian percentage at Toronto compare with other Canadian English departments? Here is another table; it supplies percentages above the rank of lecturer only. The first set of figures covers the top 20 English schools — in terms of staff numbers; the second covers the other 26 schools; the third is a total.

Year	Total above lecturer	CDN.	Non-CDN.	U.S.	U.K.	Other	% CDN.
1968	660	320	340	203	108	29	48.5
Top 20	177	100	77	46	20	11	56.5
Other 26	837	420	417	249	128	40	50.2

Source: Commonwealth Universities Yearbook, 1969, some calendars, and E. G. Mardon's Guide to English Studies (Univ. of Lethbridge, 1968).

The "top 20" figures make Toronto look good — too good, for her own figure (65.8%) is still 15 to 20 percentage points below her standard of the 1950's. However it is still worth pointing out that Canadians are a mere 46.1% minority in the other 19 departments, and that though Toronto's figure is nearly 20 points higher than this average, the total for the top 20 is still only 48.5%.

The top 20 departments are important not so much because they influence more students but because they make the majority of hirings and they influence the trends in the whole system. If these schools cannot supply one another with competent staff it is obvious they have little confidence in their own work. It seems we are expected to believe that so badly trained are Canadian graduate students in English that non-Canadians have to be recruited to produce more inadequately-trained Canadians!

Toronto's is the only English department which has persistently indicated a belief in its own training. But, while it hires plenty of its own graduates, it fails to hire Phds from other Canadian universities. Thus English graduates gravitate toward Toronto, fearing that doctoral work at universities such as U.B.C., Alberta or Western would leave them jobless. Further, if Toronto were to hire more Phds from these universities it would enhance their prestige and more students would consider them as viable alternatives to graduate study at Toronto or in the United States.

As for the influence of non-Canadians on programmes and course content, Toronto is equally affected as other Canadian universities. Most British professors wholeheartedly support the maintenance of an Honours programme; though some Canadians perhaps under U.S. influence dislike this programme, I believe the majority still promote it.

From both a cultural and commercial viewpoint Canadian textbook and publishing interests (and the economic base for Canadian literature) are not served by the present high ratio of non-Canadians.

Finally, Canadian academic English interests are often submerged due to surface conflicts between British and American styles of professionalism. If a Canadian professionalism were given a chance to develop (and Toronto would be the place to look for it), it doubtless would have much to offer as a positive contribution to the re-enlivening of English studies. For example, the peculiar problems Canadian English has in a bilingual and multi-cultural country: — Canada has lagged, not led, in teaching English as a foreign language. Toronto has no interdisciplinary programme in Canadian literature, especially on the graduate level, which might produce a much needed number of English Canadians competent in both languages of our literature and capable of helping to lessen the cultural gap between French and English Canada.

HISTORY

The history department refused to give President Bisset statistics on the nationality of teaching staff because members of the department generally felt that statistics are a perilous numbers game and that they wanted to insure that the "Americanization" discussion take place on a suitably scholarly level. Because of this refusal, the history department has assumed the responsibility to investigate the effects of American imperialism on the department. To this end, a committee has been set up to present an initial brief to the department as a whole.

But, there are serious obstacles in the way of a profound discussion of the issue within the department. First of all, two of the three-member committee are non-Canadian. No Canadian historians were included or volunteered for this committee. The very composition of the department makes open discussion difficult: according to the CUG Research Report there are 26 Canadians, 20 Americans, 11 British and 2 others. The large "international" component among graduate students makes this an embarrassing topic — especially since Canadian graduates are well aware that their difficulty in getting jobs is related to the fact that the job market here is being flooded with American applicants since the U.S.A. has over-produced history Phds.

While this mood of tension suppresses discussion, the very training and preoccupations of Canadian historians makes it almost impossible for them to see the reality of imperialism. Because many of them received their graduate training in the "best" schools of Britain and the U.S., they feel that imperialism was somehow benevolent to Canada. Their political view of history, which emphasizes the constitutional aspect of independence, makes them blind to the American takeover of the Canadian economy, the Canadian culture and the Canadian university system.

American professors in the department, believing in the university of their liberal values, find it impossible to believe that THEY could be a problem to their Canadian students and colleagues. Therefore, they interpret any opposition as personal resentment, or fascism or communism. Their very liberalism makes it impossible for them to understand the democratic, anti-imperialist implications of the "Americanization" debate.

Since the department seems incapable of sustaining a serious investigation into its own Americanization, the impetus will have to come from students.

Toronto, Canada:

"Faculty with American citizenship constitute the largest group of academics at York University. Fifty-one per cent of professors in the Humanities are American, forty-five per cent of those teaching in Social Science are American nationals.

"In the political science department only 34 per cent of faculty are Canadian. In sociology, Canadian professors constitute 10 per cent of the department. In the same departments, Americans are 52 per cent and 46 per cent of the staff respectively."

line for Sociology 369, I didn't think of giving Canadian problems special consideration, not because that's not my interest, but I just didn't conceive the issue along national lines.

"The material I looked at was exclusively American: I guess there was a kind of built-in selectivity."

Ottawa

"There is reason for believing that between 1963 and 1965 roughly 58% of new appointments went to non-Canadians; between 1965 and 1967, this figure appears to have risen to 72%; in 1968, it may have been as high as 86%."

Windsor, Ont.:

"This year, the faculty is 24% American, 22% other Non-Canadian (mostly Commonwealth), and 54% Canadian, all by first degrees. But second degrees again jump to 47% American, 28% Other, and 27% Cana-ean. Third degrees again jump to 57% American, 3% Other and 39% Canadian. And of course, a Ph.D is more important than a B.A. in terms of knowledge and methodology in his field.

Overall, these percentages look relatively harmless. The point is, Americans are heavily concentrated in some departments and other groups in some departments. There is no dispersion at all: non-Canadians range from 50% to 100% in these departments."

Burnaby, B.C.:

"At Simon Fraser University, only three of 24 persons who teach history are Canadian, only five of 16 who teach geography, ten of 35 who teach economics and four of 23 instructors in political science and anthropology are Canadian teachers."

Edmonton, Alberta:

"An internal analysis of faculty at the University of Alberta, (by country of birth) shows Canadians in 1961-2 at 60.8%. In 1968-69 Canadians are 47.2%.

In the department of political science Canadians constitute 31% of the faculty, in sociology 21%, in psychology 17%."

Vancouver, B.C.:

"At U.B.C. a rough survey of the history, psychology, anthropology and sociology, political science, English and economics departments show that foreign professors outnumber Canadians 134-102. Of the 132 foreign professors, 82 are American.

Figures issued by the information office at U.B.C. reveal that for those professors known, 55.2 per cent are foreigners and only 44.8 per cent are Canadians.

Americans make up 25.3 per cent of the total: professors from the Commonwealth make up 19.0 per cent of the total."

REVIEW 5

please sir, I'd like to study some-

University of Toronto has been called the "Harvard of Canada", one of Canada's leading educational institutions. The student in search of Canadian studies programs would surely come here to find them. But he would be sorely disappointed; not only are Canadian studies subordinated, they are outright neglected.

POLI SCI BAD

The U. of T. political science department is among the guiltiest. In the mid-fifties, only one course related to Canada, an introduction examining "the structural side of government combined with a study of the nature and functioning of government in Canada" was available to general students. The general program offered only two other courses — one theoretical and one dealing with the United States and Britain.

Of the other nine honour courses, only three related to Canadian studies. And aside from the introduction course, Canadian content was put off until fourth year. "Local Government" took an administration-biased look at "the development of municipal government in the United Kingdom and the United States" with "an intensive treatment . . . of Canada"; "Public Administration", with the same orientation, examined "the problems of control of administration in a democratic society" in Great Britain, the United States and special emphasis on Canada. Both these courses are obviously geared toward government positions; they ignore any labour or regional disparity conditions in Canada.

Despite the beefing up of poli-sci to fifteen courses by 1962, no new Canadian content courses were added. One new course, "Governments in the United States and Europe", was an early indication of the swing toward a U.S. orientation.

In the fifties, most of the influence on studies was British — British courses, British texts, British department heads. By the early sixties, Americanization had crept into Canadian courses. Where American professors were not hired, Canadians with an American education (read, orientation) were. American influence on Canadian thinking has continually increased, shifting the emphasis from British studies to American. Somewhere along the way, Canada was omitted.

Even when the poli-sci department expanded to twenty-three courses in 1965, only one new Canadian course was added, "The Canadian Political System". This was a fourth year course — although the greatest number of students graduate after third year.

However, that same year, a new second year course on "The Government of the United States" was added. The remaining bulk of courses were either theoretical or concerned with the blossoming interest in underdeveloped nations. Attention was devoted everywhere but toward Canada.

This year the expansion of the poli-sci department still has not meant intensification of Canadian studies. The department has managed to cover other neglected areas — communism, politics of the far east and underdeveloped nations. But it added only two new Canadian courses — a third year course with a limited enrolment; and a first year "Introduction to Canadian Politics".

The administration courses remain despite the void in labour studies. There are still no courses on Quebec, a major issue on the Canadian political scene. Nor is there any investigation of regional disparity, a significant topic when Canada's West, too, has discussed separation.

HISTORY NO BETTER

Canadian history fared no better than Canadian poli-sci, despite the fact that the department was reputed to be Canada's leading history department under such brilliant men as J. M. S. Careless and Donald Creighton, in the fifties. The general student in 1954 had only one chance to study Canadian history — and then he shared the course with a study of United States history. This course, which was not available until third year, was no more than an elaboration of grade thirteen history.

Honours students could not get their first taste of Canadian history until third year, where a course on history of the United States was also offered. In their final year they could take such courses as: "External Relations of Canada since 1867," usually geared toward relations with the U.S.; "The Liberal Tradition in Canada", which barely touches on French Canada; "Development of the Community of Ontario to Confederation", a study of English Canada only; "The Age of Sir John Macdonald", perhaps the only truly Canadian course but dealing only with early Canada. Canadian content was limited and slanted toward English Canada. The departmental stress was British; the Canadian image was colonial.

The new courses added by 1962 only reinforced this image: "British North America — a regional and social approach 1815-1867"; "Conquest of the Canadian North"; and "Canada and the Second World War". The new course on the "Evolution of French Canadian Nationalism since 1849" was accompanied by the addition of two courses on the U.S.: "Evolution of American Nationalism 1790-1870" and "The American-Progressive Tradition in the Twentieth Century". These last two American courses saw no necessity to relate the U.S. to other powers, as the Canadian courses did Canada.

The American influence was infiltrating "Canada's leading History department". The ratio of Canadian to American courses was five to two in 1954 and one to one (six courses each) by 1965.

Where one course on the "Canadian Religious Tradition", not quite a pressing topic, was added to the fourth year choices in 1965, two American courses, "The American Revolution" and "Urban Democracy in the U.S." were added. The course dealing with the "Canadian Party System" disappeared, while numerous Canadian-American relations courses arose; many of these are taught by American professors.

The previously third year "History of the United States" became a second year course, while Canadian history remained in third year — an indication of priorities in the history department. The student was now guaranteed the opportunity of studying both — with the U.S. first, of course.

Although this year, the study of Canadian and American history seems to be equally important (twelve Canadian to eleven American courses) a cursory glance at the course titles clearly indicates that one country receives more depth than the other. In second year "Introduction to Canadian History" is available; so are courses in the "History of the United States" and "Major Themes in American History".

Despite the slight addition of Canadian regional studies there are only two such coursthing about Canada

In the crucial area of labour, there is a course on "American Labour History"; there are no courses dealing with Canadian labour.

ENGLISH WORSE

Canadian interests are most completely alienated in the English department where in 1954 the only Canadian literature course was a one hour fourth year option for religious knowledge.

Even the course entitled "Canadian and American Literature" was described by a list of American novelists and poets with the final appendage, "readings in Canadian poetry". It later became a first year "American Literature", only, course.

Over the past fifteen years courses on "The Novel", "Modern Drama" and "Modern Poetry" listed British and American writers. There were no Canadians.

The one exception, a course called the "Modern Novel", offered a selection of British and American novels and "a Canadian novel".

By 1966, one full Canadian literature course appeared — in fourth year only, with English Canadian writers only.
