Today nothing has changed. The proliferation of American literature persists conveying the ideals of the American dream to Canadian minds. "Forms of Twentieth Century" offers no alternative either; this first year course consists of British and American authors only — as if Leonard Cohen, Mordecai Richler, and Robert Service did not exist.

This year's "Modern Drama" course recommends reading of English, American, French, Italian and German authors. No Canadians listed.

The one fourth year "Canadian Literature" course still remains deficient of French Canadian authors. And the French department, concentrating on Parisienne French for studying the classics, offers a single third year course in "French Canadian Literature".

AND WHAT'S MORE

The American trend does not end with these three departments — it is prevalent in sociology and economics as well. And every arts student takes at least one course in one of these areas.

But more often than not, the student takes a program combining a number of courses from these departments. He is not only exposed to Americanization of his ideas but completely immersed in it. The courses of political science, history and English are the practical studies for future Canadian teachers, politicians and administrators — with an American orientation.

....Come to think of it, for the student in search of Canadian studies programs, the best place to go is Harvard, the only place in the world with an Institute for Canadian Studies.

THE CONTRADICTIONS ARISE

Two articles appeared in the Toronto Star this month one day after the other:

1st article: Feb. 18, 1970: OTTAWA — "The Frito Bandido out-scored Sir John A. Macdonald more than two to one in a recognition quiz among Grade 5 children at Overland Drive Public School in Don Mills, the Senate Mass Media Committee heard today. . . . all but two of 59 students recognized "The Frito Bandido" as a character in a cartoon commercial for corn chips."

2nd article: Feb. 1970: CHICAGO — "Bowing to pressure and publicity, Frito-Lay has disarmed its Frito Bandido and banished him forever to the never-never land of advertising. Frito-Lay, a subsidiary of Pepsi-Cola, said it was discontinuing use of the cartoon character to promote Fritos "because of the company's desire to avoid a continuing difference of opinion with certain leaders of Mexican-American organization."

What's going on here? Why should Canadian children be deprived of the Frito Bandido just because Pepsi-Cola Ltd., a multinational corporation, is acting in a racist manner towards one domestic, oppressed minority? Give a Canadian child the Frito Bandido in grade five and he'll want Pepsi-Cola or Coke (It's the real thing!) by adolescence. By the time he grows up, he'll want the real thing — full integration into the American Empire. What else is there? Who the hell is Sir John A. Macdonald anyway?

"The obvious role of the university in Canadian-American relations, as the crowning achievement of any national system of education, is to clarify and to deepen the understanding of each country for the other." Claude Bissell from "The University and Canadian-American Relations" from The Idea of a University.

"There is some cause for concern about the number of American teachers in Canadian universities. . . what was a natural and healthy influx has now become a major invasion."

Claude Bissell, quoted in the Montreal Gazette

ASPECTS OF COLONIAL MENTALITY

The colonial mentality is "the real thing" in Canada. It turns you on — and off at will. Claude Bissell is the president of the University of Toronto, the largest university in Canada. The largest university in Canada gets the cream of Canadian academia. If Bissell says there is an invasion, what does the president of Beaver Groin Sask. Junior College say? Well, probably nothing. He's probably American himself or received his education there.

Why do some people recognize Imperialism and others not? Because it really exists. If it is in your interests to ignore it, then you ignore it. If you are an American, even a liberal American, perhaps even a radical American in Canada, you ignore it. If you are a member of the Canadian business elite, you ignore it. If you are a student interested in "pure scholarship" you ignore it. (Until you try to find a job.)

But if you're president of the largest university in the country, you can afford to see a bit of it, though not very much. One of the aspects of the colonial mentality is the colonial worship of the imperial power especially by heads of cultural and educational institutions. Because of their position of power, they must pay lip service to a very weak form of nationalism, but it is not in their interests to see this nationalism through.

How do we know so much about the colonial mentality? Well, we've all read the Algerian psychiatrist Franz Fanon and his scathing condemnation of African colonialism. We're all for African liberation from their white colonial masters aren't we? It's such a simple thing to see because of the races involved. One of the aspects of the colonial mentality that Fanon mentions, however, is the fact that the colony refuses to see its own colonialism.

We see colonialism in Africa but not in Canada. But some Canadians cannot ignore imperialism because it ruins their lives.

Quebec is one place where American Imperialism is being felt and has been felt for a long time. This is because the racism inherent in this imperialism manifests itself perhaps before any other feature. We are all surprised that Vallieres calls French Canadians "Les negres blancs de l'Amerique." The rest of Canadians know little or nothing about Quebec. Why is that?

Why is it that farmers in the west are organizing?

Why is it that Canadians can do nothing to stop inflation?

It is in the interests of those who profit from our colonialism that we know nothing about these things.

What then is Canadian nationalism? The impulse to nationalism is a feature of all colonial countries. The impulse to nationalism arises from personal interests, it is true. But even if those interests are limited, the impulse is inevitably directed towards the control of our own lives.

The impulse to nationalism leads on to a one-way street. The end is total independence and a control of our destinies. But there are many diversions. Where self-interest beckons, so straggleth he with that interest. It is a feature of colonialism that so few go to the end because it is not in their immediate interest to go to the end.

In the past there have been many nationalist movements. Why have they failed? Because the leaders started down the road and then got off as soon as their interests were achieved.

It has also been a fact of Canadian history that every new sort of this bourgeois nationalism has bred a higher degree of colonial subjugation which has in turn bred a new nationalism. These nationalisms have been dissipated because they have failed to really lock horns with the imperial power.

Fanon says: "The objective of nationalist parties as from a certain period is, we have seen, strictly national. They mobilize the people with slogans of independence, and for the rest leave it to future events. . . they are completely ignorant of the economy of their own country. This economy has always developed outside the limits of their knowledge. They have nothing more than an approximate, bookish acquaintance with the actual and potential resources of their country's soil and mineral deposits; and they can only speak of these resources on a general and abstract plane."

In order to understand the limitations of petty nationalisms we must first have . . .

A SHORT LESSON IN ECONOMICS

The American economy, the richest in the world, thrives on the fact that America is an imperialist power. Every American businessman can tell you that. An Imperialist power gains its power by extracting capital from all the places in the world it can get its hands on. The American Empire is a military-industrial complex.

Canada is the most stable of American colonies. We have "unlimited" resources, a friendly government (a dyed breed in the world), a highly developed communications and transportation system (we did it on our own), and a high degree of consumer mentality eager for surplus goods from a surplus economy.

Most of our heavy industry and resources are owned by the U.S. And most of what we sell is sold to the U.S. Why can't we sell to other countries? Because we don't own our economy so we don't have a say.

Canadian subsidiaries of American companies have primary responsibility to buy from their parent companies even though it might be cheaper and often is cheaper to buy from Canadian or other foreign suppliers. But the subsidiary is devoted to the maximization of profit of the parent firm even though the subsidiary loses money.

How is this? Most big U.S. firms must produce above a certain "break even" level because of large overhead costs of production. Profit only comes about after this level is reached and then increases rapidly, especially around the 100% productivity rate. Exports consist of what cannot be absorbed by the US domestic market at prevailing prices. These same exports also are very often the crucial yielders of the highest profit.

But everybody, of course, knows this. What they perhaps don't know are some more facts about the Canadian economy. Like the fact that American multinational corporations make no net contribution to investment in Canada. In fact, Canada is a net exporter of capital to the U.S. Between 1960 and 1965, American parent organizations invested $2 billion in Canadian affiliates. In the same period, the affiliates sent back $3 billion in dividends. Add to this the outflow of capital by Canadian companies investing in the United States.

Why then do we hear so much about U.S. capital investments in Canada. Well, of the $14 billion gross "American" investment from 1960-65, only that $2 billion came directly from the States. The other $12 billion came from profits earned in Canada, depreciation and depletion allowance and borrowings from the Canadian money market.

In other words most U.S. direct investment in Canada is financed with Canadian savings ie. with savings generated from income produced in Canada.

The Canadian income is now large enough to support not only all current U.S. investments, but also Canadian private investment as well as the net export of profits to the U.S. parent companies.

Not only that, but an efficient Canadian-built program of "roads to resources" provides American companies with roads, railways and other means of access to Canadian resources and consumers. In other words, by now the Americans have conveniently set up a self-perpetuating system that reaps them profits without having to invest another cent. And the Canadian branch-plant managers are helping them do it.

... 'tis of them

by Larry Haiven

We are, then an essential part of military-industrial complex and we have no say in the matter. Not only has the Canadian bourgeoisie given up economic control but they have also forfeited any political control that they once may have had. This is a typical manifestation of colonial pessimism. American prosperity engendered by colonial expansion results in Canadian middle-class prosperity. And so it is in their interests that the Americans expand colonially. Wonder now why Trudeau says nothing about Vietnam or Canadian manufacturers (they're not Canadian) making war materials?

This is not to say that at certain times such as the turn of the century and the 1950's the Americans have not initiated several large scale capital projects. But they did this not out of any generosity, but because they needed Canadian resources. These projects soon began to more than pay off for them.

These savings in turn allow the Americans to spread even more control in a continuing vicious but profitable circle. And it's not a new thing. Most large-scale U.S.-based companies have been solidly established here since the 1920's. Since then they have been slowly (then more quickly) absorbing Canadian-owned interests or squeezing them out of the market.

IN THE THICK OF IT

Bourgeois nationalism has always, in time, turned around and helped the American Empire. Sir John A. Macdonald united the provinces against the threat to the south, then garnered investment for a nation-wide railroad. That nation-wide railroad, once built to unite Canada against a military force to the south soon turned into a pipeline vomiting resources through the great Lakes into an economic force to the south.

And now, the different regions of the country have been effectively split, and divorced from each other until now each of these regions drains almost directly from north to south.

"When you find yourself in the thick of it, help yourself to a bit of what is all around you."

The Beatles, "Martha My Love". Walter Gordon must have listened to the Beatles. In the early 60's he took a look around him at the continental pie and decided that it was time the Canadian branch-plant managers helped themselves to a bit of it. But when you talk nationalism-out of one corner of your mouth and profits out of another, your interests are clear and don't lead very far down that road. In fact, even if Walter Gordon and Eric Kierans had won out, their brand of reformism would have facilitated, not hindered the complete centralization of our economy.

But the continentalist boys in Ottawa weren't taking any chances. They crushed Gordon. Why? Because they knew that the impulse to nationalism started by Gordon could prove to be dangerous. The business and government community are scared of the fact that the nationalist impulse can start to force Canadians to take stock of themselves. That's why Trudeau, in his inimitable "style" shrugs at nationalism as being dead.

It is a particularly salient feature of colonialism that the power of divergent interest groups are dissipated when these interests are played off against each other on the road of nationalism. At the NDP convention in Winnipeg, the Waffle group was crushed because of this, especially by the American-based unions betraying Canadian workers. And we know where the interests of American-based unions lie. They branded the Watkins manifesto as "anti-American" when it spoke of American Imperialism. The leaders of the NDP ignore American imperialism because it is in their interests to do so.

Our colonialism hides our history and our present from us. It is perpetuated not only in the media and public education, but in the centres that teach these. The university is one of the keys to the objective study of our economic and cultural situation. But it is also the place where the colonial mind can best be generated. That is, because the university has become the modern centre of technological innovation, it is in the interest of the imperial power to be in control of it. The universities are in the grip of those whose interest it is to maintain Canada's existence as a satellite state. Their money and grants and fellowships come from a system that tolerates their harmless search for "the university of excellence."

Because of our colonial mentality, we don't see the utter ridiculousness of the fact that we don't have one course in Canadian Labour History. We might even be tempted to assume that there exists no Canadian working class. We might be tempted to assume that no portion of Canadian society feels the direct effects of imperialism. We might be tempted to believe that we don't even exist. If we are taken in by the first fallacy, we might as well be taken in by all the rest of them.

THE UNIVERSITY OF EXCELLENCE

The early Canadian bourgeoisie was not quick to establish higher education on a large scale because it realized that it would be a threat to its power. For a long time, as John Porter points out in "The Vertical Mosaic", the University of Toronto was the only "university of excellence" and it trained only the leaders of government, church, business and education. But later the governments, in response to the increasing needs of a technology-oriented society and in response to the demands of American Empire, started instituting higher education on a mass scale. But the Canadian bourgeoisie was not being Rockefellerish. They weren't going to supply the funds to build a distinctively Canadian higher education system for the "masses" even if they had the funds. So we imported the skilled academic labour mostly from the south. But with them they brought their interests. And the effects are just being felt.

In December 1968, a faculty meeting of the Carleton University Academic Staff Association, Robin Matthews and James Steele, two Carleton professors started a controversy that was soon to rock all the Canadian universities. They produced figures they had compiled on their own showing an alarming rise in the number of non-Canadian, specifically American academics flooding into the arts and science faculties of Canadian universities. To say the reaction was violent is to understate the case somewhat. Time magazine reported one Carleton professor as saying, "I hope we can club these people to death when it comes up at the meeting."

The Carleton staff and then most Canadian academics over-reacted with abject horror. As Matthews and Steele write: "Our motions were called immoral, illiberal, racist, neo-Nazi, proto-fascist, chauvinistic, anti-American, protectionist, restrictionist and intellectually obscene."

Their motions consisted of a call for a restriction of the number of permanent academic position to non-Canadian citizens, active advertising for qualified Canadian academics, limiting administrators to Canadian citizens and the launching of a campaign to investigate the problem in other universities.

What their opponents almost uniformly refused to talk about, in their hysteria, were the real facts that brought about these requests. The recruiting system, being a crude sort of academic grapevine mostly spread by word of mouth. The increasing influx of American professors and graduate students. The lack of professors to supervise graduate students in Canadian studies which contributed to the lack of good Canadian teachers. The lack of texts written by Canadians, not to mention the lack of good texts about Canadian subjects. The proliferation of texts and classes and professors schooled or reared in the American traditions of sociology, political science, history and other highly ideological subjects. The pervasiveness of American liberal ideology into even Canadian questions. All these questions were and are being conveniently ignored by Canadian universities. It's no wonder why.

"... I can think of no better way of quickening national life or of strengthening our voice on the international scene than by the development of a few institutions of higher learning of unequivocal excellence."

Claude Bissell "The Great University" from The Idea of the University

Calling for "excellence" is another way of obscuring the issues. It is in fact the manifesto of pro-imperialist politics.

One professor (from University of Chicago) puts it this way:

"Is calculus British because it was developed by Newton? ... If a Brazilian, German and Ceylonese economist each computed the Canadian gross national product and came up with different totals, the variations in their estimates would derive not from their ethnic backgrounds, but from the different technical features of their analysis."

What he conveniently forgets is that if an American were computing the Canadian GNP, he might have different reasons in doing so than the other academics. And, in fact, he has. The university is the chief obscurer of the Canadian FACT and it does its job well.

The campaign around the universities grows. Many of those involved don't realize that it is a political struggle. It is a struggle that inevitably raises political consciousness. It demands that the universities serve the interests of the economic and cultural independence of Canada.

The struggle does not call for more Canadian academics like Marshall McLuhan who are sophisticated ideological apologists for the American Empire, its consumer technology and sophisticated mind control. The colonial mentality accepts unquestioningly the sayings of those of its number acclaimed in the intellectual world market. The struggle calls for dealing with problems, not mystifying them.

The struggle is to clear the road of nationalism of all the dead bodies who have fallen and decayed on the way. As Fanon says:

"In an underdeveloped country an authentic national middle class ought to consider as its bounden duty to betray the calling fate has marked out for it and to put itself to school with the people in other words to put at the people's disposal the intellectual and technical capital that it has snatched when going through the universities."

The "people" are those who work in the factories, mines, offices and any other Canadian institutions that provide wealth for the American Empire. Their interests are the only interests that lead all the way down the road of nationalism to Independence.

The struggle for independence will not only reveal itself as an anti-imperialist struggle but will force those in the struggle to realize that independence can't be won in the context of the present market system.

That's one of the things your friendly conscious agent of American Imperialism won't tell you.

why a quota system?

Once we've discovered that the increasingly low proportion of Canadians on staff in our universities and the increasingly high proportion of Americans is no accident . . . that our cultural institutions in general and our universities in particular are fast becoming colonial appendages of the American system . . . that in fact the "Americanization" problem is U.S. imperialism . . . WHAT DO WE DO?

What we do depends on how serious we consider the problem to be. And, the problem is seen in all its seriousness when we understand the extent to which the "Americanized" university oppresses the mass of Canadian people.

The university, in training people who hold positions of authority in the community, shapes the national consciousness. It trains the managers and technocrats, and also the teachers, writers, broadcasters, lawyers — the Canadian intelligentsia. These people leave our universities knowing more about "caste and class in a southern town" than about the plight of our native peoples, more about "alienated American youth" than about the Canadian working class.

As more and more American professors join "sensitive" departments such as political science, history or sociology, there is an ever greater tendency to ignore Canadian issues simply because these teachers know little or nothing about Canada.

As for the propagation of American orthodoxy, it is certainly true that American professors are supported by colonial-minded Canadians who hope that this polished liberalism will somehow rub off on them. But there can be no question but that the propagation of these ideas is facilitated by the importation of hundreds of U.S. academics who are exposed to no other modes of thought in the great imperial centres of learning.

For example: students are commonly taught that the multi-national corporation (an academic euphemism for U.S. monopolies) have benefited Canada by providing 'badly needed capital'. In fact, the Canadian people have paid dearly for the presence of branch plants which send their profits south of the border. Students learn almost nothing about the trade union movement. But, if perchance a few are exposed to labour history, they are not taught how the big U.S. "International" unions are a primary force suppressing the class consciousness and political development of the Canadian working class. They are not taught how these undemocratic unions annually steal millions of dollars from Canadian workers.

The list is a long one. Students must of course demand new courses that deal with problems relevant to Canada. They must demand too teachers qualified by experience and outlook to teach these courses (clearly it's ridiculous to study labour from the boss' viewpoint just as it's ridiculous to study phenomenology from the viewpoint of an analytic philosopher). But we must also ask ourselves if Americans are qualified to teach courses relevant to Canada.

When a quota system is men-

by Gail Dexter

tioned people tend to write off as so much "petty chauvinism". This is most peculiar considering that all European countries have quota systems (permitting about 2 per cent foreign professors) and that the U.S., through its hiring practices and immigration laws, has an effective quota of 2.5 per cent on permanent foreign teaching staff. It is only Canada which insists on having 'free trade' in the academic market place. And the result is that our universities are dominated by citizens of the world's greatest imperialist power!

Recently some sophisticated rationalizations have been offered (usually by university administrators) to obscure this issue.

The most common, that Canada is too "underdeveloped" to staff its own universities, has been disproved by Mathews and Steele in The Struggle for Canadian Universities. A second cliché which suggests that American professors bring to Canadian universities "higher academic standards", can be dismissed if we understand that "standards (academic or otherwise) are by no means universal — they are socially determined. So the "high standards" of a Harvard or a Wisconsin graduate are precisely the standards of the American education system. Surely it is for the Canadian people to decide the standards of the universities the way for.

But, there is another cliché that sticks to the ideological left rather like chewing gum. This cliché asserts that Canadian radicals should welcome American radical professors — and after all, among radicals what difference does citizenship make. It's certainly a good thing that Canada has welcomed American radicals who are disenchanting with life in the Empire. But, let's not kid ourselves, most of the American professors who come here are not that — Professor Thorson is the rule rather than the exception. As for the real American radicals: surely the best way for them to act on their political beliefs is to support Canadians (and people around the world, including the U.S.A.) in the struggle against the takeover of the universities and supporting the quota demand.

The implementation of a quota system that would permit 85 per cent of our teaching staff to be Canadian and insure that the remaining 15 per cent of foreign professors be dominated by no one country would be a major step in the reform of our universities. It would insure at least that Canadian issues be considered, that Canadian students have jobs in universities paid for by the Canadian people and that our universities become bulwarks against imperialism instead of viaducts for imperialist ideology.

The quota system does not solve all the problems of the university. It does not solve the problem of working class accessibility. It does not automatically democratize the university. It is a progressive demand.

But, because of the ingrained colonialism of university administrators, and because of the toughness of U.S. imperialism, it is a progressive demand we will have to fight hard to win.

In fact, students will not be able to win this struggle on their own. After all, most of us are from petit bourgeois backgrounds. A further liability is our years of "education" which have taught us to think in terms of the individual, to abhor organizing and to ignore the reality of U.S. domination. Workers, on the other hand, cannot ignore that reality which is imposed on them everyday in the factories and in the trade unions. The Canadian working people who built this country and pay for our education are more conscious than we realize of the "Americanized" university which spreads its influence far beyond the confines of the campus into the very fabric of the Canadian community.

The demand for a quota system — a demand that directly confronts the Canadian reality — will unite workers with students in a crucial struggle.

You Can MAKE SAC WORK

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy are running for President and Vice President of SAC because they are deeply concerned about the lack of true community at the University of Toronto.

They see evidence of this lack of community almost every day as they attend classes... they see it in class-room structures that mitigate against real learning. They see it in the comments of alienated students and in profs who get turned off because their students are turned off.

Richardson and McEvoy are convinced that something can be done about these situations. They think that CUG provided a definition of a structure which would go a long way towards breaking down many of the arbitrary divisions which are working against real learning in the classroom today. They are convinced that the concept of community articulated by that report is perhaps the best way of developing really relevant education at this university.

Richardson and McEvoy are determined to transform SAC into the kind of strong and united student organization that can work effectively for the development of such a university community.

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy realize perhaps better than anyone else running in this election the problems that are preventing SAC from being such an organization now.

They know that it makes irresponsible political commitments that tend to divide rather than unite the campus.

They know that it was torn by internal factionalism this year. They know that it doesn't communicate enough with the student body.

And they are determined to do something to remedy the problems... by avoiding irresponsible political commitments, by listening to ideas wherever they come from, and most of all by building communications links between SAC and the student body.

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy want to transform SAC into the kind of student organization that will be able to build the spirit of trust and co-operation among all members of the university that must exist if true community in the university is ever to exist here.

They need your vote to do it.

Matthews answers his critics

First, find out what's going on before answering fact, irrefutable fact, with worn out slogans which become more threadbare and meaningless each time they are mouthed. Secondly, look in your heart.

What do you see? Stars and Stripes? It's a common colonial condition as well as an incurable imperial disease. It spawns, unfortunately, most of the arguments against Canadianization.

We have insisted that Canadians receive justice and fair opportunity in their own country, that guests be treated justly, that all changes be from now on, not retroactive. But our critics constantly accuse us of wanting to "get rid of all foreigners", even though we have recommended a larger, continuing alien participation by far than is the law in other countries in the world. But our critics want to smear us because they want to fight reasonable Canadian desires for control of the universities, access to Canadian material, opportunities for jobs. Don't discuss our public proposals. Discuss something else, make it fascist, anti-semitic, etc. etc. and then say that is what the Montreal Committee recommends.

Push for internationalism. It's a word that easily disguises imperialism. Scholarship, we all know, is international. Every country, answering its own character, customs, styles of learning, looks at the problems that confront the home society and all mankind. Out of the local, necessary character come special insight and unique solutions. Moreover, by addressing peculiar problems countries develop ways of looking at world problems. That is internationalism. But our critics really want imperialism. Though almost every country in the world fosters its home scholars, brings them to excellence in order to provide for order and continuity — even in change — our critics sneer at the idea.

Internationalism for them is U.S. "value-free" (read 'pentagon-approved') study.

Internationalism for them is studying British and U.S. literature, not Canadian. Internationalism for them is the U.S. city. Who else has them?

Internationalism for them is science research that moves in the U.S. Grants orbit. For that reason they prefer alien scholars who won't rock the gravy boat. (Why are 12 of the 13 Ph.D. students in Sociology at York non-Canadian?)

They tell us something else. From Newfoundland to Vancouver Island the U.S. imperialist scholars (especially), branch-planting in the intellectual colonial garden, tell us to fight U.S. militarism, U.S. economic takeover, but they tell us not to fear U.S. citizens who are conditioned in the American Dream, the frontier theory, Manifest Destiny, oaths of allegiance to the U.S. flag, and other liberal U.S. ideas of "internationalism". They are the teachers who have come to liberate our youth. They ask us to ignore the fact that they are outrageously ignorant of Canada and Canadians. They ask us to ignore the fact that they themselves probably got their jobs on the colonial grape-vine, perhaps instead of qualified Canadians, certainly (in a majority of cases) where qualified Canadians should have been available if the Canadian universities had been doing their job for Canada.

But even if we are willing to blink at all those things (and who is?), we cannot blink the fact that economic colonialism means cultural colonialism. The instrumentality of culture in our day is technological. Technology is what much of economic takeover is about. And so a country (the U.S.A.) taking over our economy is automatically taking over our culture: film, periodicals, television, text book and conventional publishing, teaching aids, and the system of producing technocrats (called the higher educational system). There can be no denying that the U.S. citizen in Canada today, teaching in a Canadian university, is a part of the general U.S. expansion and takeover of Canada for U.S. uses. The only thing the individual U.S. citizen who wants a different role can do is to support Canadianization with passion and militance. To be neutral is to be for the status quo: U.S. domination of Canada. The U.S. citizen who does not want to belong to the imperials should not push U.S. texts, Graduate Record Exams, U.S. pre-law exams. He should push against them.

Our critics should stop talking about the scholarly community as an open, mobile market. It isn't. At best ideas are mobile. (Do even the ideas from most U.S. research move in an open mobile market?) Most countries in the world: France, Britain, the U.S.A., West Germany, the emerging nations, etc. etc. restrict alien scholars severely or block them almost entirely. Canada alone discriminates against her own people in favour of aliens. This year, now, the rule across Canada is that Departments offering any jobs at all have hundreds of applicants, Canadian applicants often competing ten to one for places in their own university system before hiring committees who refuse to consider being Canadian a meaningful qualification.

But a scholar who doesn't know Canada isn't qualified. Excellence doesn't happen in a classroom in terms of "teaching material", or "course content". Learning has to do with the people taught, the community they come from, the questions they must have answered in ways that are meaningful to them. Only people trying to erase or take over the community deny the relevance of the community. Guess who it is in Canada who makes that claim all the time?

The latest cry of the critics is that we are fighting on the level of personalities with gutter tactics. The answer is that the struggle for Canadian universities is the struggle for Canada. We are fighting for Canadian survival. We have exhausted "the channels" in more than a year of stalling by the C.A.U.T.: A.U.C.C.: the Ontario Committee of Presidents, the Canada Council, etc. etc. They have done everything they could to fight us and continue the colonization of Canada.

When we fight Pierre Trudeau, William Davis, Claude Bissell, Davidson Dunton, Peter Dwyer, Frank Milligan, Al Berland, Jack Saywell, Ernest Sirluck, Ramsay Cook, Gene Smith, etc. etc., we are not fighting personalities, but symbols. They are symbols of what is called The American Empire, Canada Ltd. Wanta join? They have!

Mackenzie King and Truman — to find out who they are, ask your history prof. On second thought, better not.

WILHELM KEMPF. Schubert: Sonata in B flat Major. Deutsche Grammophon 139 323. ARTUR RUBINSTEIN. Schubert: Sonata in B flat Major. RCA LSC3122.

The Schubert B flat Sonata is an immense work. Yet it is filled with a wealth of melodies and little Schubertian niceties, and needs to be treated with love rather than respect. The Kempff version emphasizes magnitude of conception. This aloofness is further emphasized by the DGG taping which is distant and blends the sound, often to the detriment of musical detail. The Rubinstein version is very closely taped in the American tradition, and while the serenity of the music is sometimes disturbed by this more percussive articulation, it seems to be the more satisfactory approach. Rubinstein's playing, while never note perfect, is phenomenal in dynamic conception and aptly vigorous execution. tony john

SLEEPY JOHN ESTES. Electric Sleep. Delmark 619

In a dozen years of recording, beginning in 1929, John Estes established himself as one of the greats of the early country blues. He then dropped out of sight, but was reformed in the early 60's and recorded the first of several albums as he began a new career. On this most recent LP, he plays with the backing of a typical Chicago band, and, at first thought, it seemed like an unlikely combination, but in fact it succeeds remarkably well. Estes' high, scratchy voice may take some getting used to by those not familiar with it, but the total effect — an album of good Chicago blues — is excellent, due in no small measure to a fine group, highlighted by Sunnyland Slim's great piano. p.h.

THE FROST. Frost Music. Vanguard 6520.

Left me cold. A mixture of folk rock, acid rock, and various other well-worn styles, it's one of the most unoriginal LPs I've heard in a long time. There's one nice cut, A Long Way Down from Mobile, and a few other good moments, but nothing that hasn't been done better by someone else many times before.

EARLY BLUEGRASS. RCA LPV 569.

From Wiley Morris' opening mandolin run on Salty Dog Blues to the last notes of the Bluegrass Boys' quartet, this is a fine selection of early southern stringband music. These bands produced some of the most vital music of any of the American folk traditions. The sound of these old recordings is excellent, and the music is thoroughly entertaining. A good companion to an earlier volume in the TCA vintage series, Early Rural String Bands. p.h.

KALEIDOSCOPE. Epic 26467

A group which evolved out of the old folk scene in Los Angeles. Not really rock, but a mixture of exotic styles and rhythms played on violin, banjo and oud. This is their most mature album to date. They've followed through into very complicated instrumental work, whereas their earlier music was caught in the limits of short songs with lyrics. David Lindley's banjo picking is some of the best there is. r.d. schwartz

LET'S GO RIDING. Origin OJL-18

A superb volume of goodtime music in the blues tradition which will enliven any collection, though it might be a bit out of place if acid rock is your only thing. The emphasis is on dazzling rag guitar playing by the likes of Pink Anderson, Blind Blake, and Ellis Williams, in several places with the aid of violin, kazoo or washboard. The sound on these 78s, recorded between 1924 and 1936, varies, but is generally reasonably good. If you want to try a cut at the record store, listen to Willie Walker's South Carolina Rag. p.h.

DIANA ROSS and the SUPREMES with the TEMPTATIONS. Together. Motown 692. STEVIE WONDER. My Cherie Amour. Tamla/Motown 296.

All of these artists exhibited considerable talent in their early careers. The talent is still there, but when one is in the Motown stable, it tends to be smothered in Copacabana-like material and arrangements. You'd never believe songs like Baby Love and My Girl came from these people. With a little success behind them, it's now The Shadow of Your Smile and Sing a Simple Song. The Temptations-Supremes album is particularly flat. Stevie Wonder still manages to present some good vocal and harp work, but the material and arrangements stifle any real excitement. don quinlan

ACADEMY OF SAINT MARTIN-IN-THE-FIELDS. Neville Martinor, cond. Handel: 12 Concerti Grossi, Op. 6. London 2309.

Despite sound musicianship and some very fine playing, especially in the vigorously executed fugues, this 3 record set doesn't sound quite right. There's a distinctly tinny sound to much of the music. One possible reason for this is that the bass isn't strong or clear enough and is overshadowed by the violin parts, which is fatal in bass dominated Baroque music. Another, more important, reason is the use of a fast and persistent string vibrato which gives everything a slightly nervous quaver. But if you like a lot of vibrato, you might find this an excellent set of records. nick schmidt

A NEW SOUND FROM THE JAPANESE BACH SCENE. RCA VICS 1548.

A recording of some of Bach's more popular pieces played on Japanese instruments with added electric bass, electric guitar and drums, it has more influences than a hydra has heads. The Japanese instruments are unmercifully strained in accommodating the Western pitch system, and the jazz touches only confuse the issue even more. J. S. would most definitely not approve, but it's alright as a novelty, I suppose.

Would you willingly go to the movies to see a travelogue? It's highly doubtful. And in trying to figure out why not, you would probably come across the reasons for the failure of More as a serious film on the dangers of drug addiction.

Travelogues, with very few exceptions, are notorious for their nauseating optimism and their sticky-sweet superficiality. Every country in the world appears to contain miles and miles of unpoluted, unviolated countryside; a wizened old farmer who barely survives, but loves his simple existence; and a famous artist spreading good will and friendship around the globe. But where are the slums? Is racial discrimination absent? What caused the riots? Unfortunately, travelogues are content to stay at the surface, and rarely do they try to discuss a subject beyond the scope of tourism.

This is precisely the nitfall into which More tumbles. A German student and his American girlfriend run off to Spain, shack up together and begin taking drugs. The boy becomes an addict, and thus falls prey to the girl who has already kicked two others.

One ought to feel concerned, but at no time in the movie is there any audience identification with the actors. The latter merely go from drug to drug, popping pills and plunging needles in an endless stream of psychedelic monotony. Because characterization is so subordinated to the plot, no one truly cares what happens. Nor is there any real attempt to determine the physical and emotional problems that led to addiction. As a result, More produces no more audience involvement than watching a laboratory film of two rats being injected with lethal doses of heroin.

A few people may enjoy drooling at young people getting hopelessly hooked. They may not care about the unexplained implications of addiction. They may even get their kicks out of the unerotically boring sex scenes. But then, some people like travelogues.

One does not usually associate the name of Machiavelli with hilarious stage comedy. Now, Mandrágola, presently being staged at the Colonnade Theatre by The Victoria College Dramatic Society, is not exactly the most riotous, most gut-splitting play of the year. But at its best, it is a mindless and pleasantly amusing entertainment.

Although Mandrágola is indeed a comic piece, much of the bitterness and cynicism which are Machiavelli's trademarks come through in the play. The plot is the same as that of every Italian farce: the young romantic schemes to cuckold the foppish old lawyer with the help of a corrupt parasite and a hypocritical friar... and he succeeds. The end of the play is ever so slightly disturbing in a characteristic Machiavellian way. All the schemers succeed in getting everything they want: the youth Callemaco gets the wife of the old fool Nicia, Liguorio, the parasite, gets the run of both households, and the Friar extracts money from everyone. There is no justice, no punishment, and Nicia remains alone on stage at the end, hopelessly duped and wonderfully cuckolded.

With such a predictable plot, a production of Mandrágola can only be as successful as the stage business and verve which can be injected by director and cast. Director Don Kemple's production is often imaginative, but working on the confines of a tiny stage the cast simply fails to deliver the gusto needed. The play also lacks much of the slapstick and sexual innuendo which I had anticipated. Several attempts at vigorous action were stifled by the cramped quarters and three clowns who were presumably there to enliven the proceedings were stilled, dull and to my mind better left out.

But even with the few difficulties experienced by the cast, the play is never dull. The plot moves easily and rapidly (it isn't a long play to begin with), and several of the caricatures are skillfully drawn out. Bruce Salvatore as the faithful servant, Siro, seemed most at ease with the slapstick required by the play. But it was Bruce Evoy as the Friar who really carried the play through its rockier moments. His humour and ease of movement gave much appreciated polish to the production. Doris Cown as the chaste wife is beautiful and not much else. Personally, I preferred Ellen Levine in an all too brief appearance as a flirtatious widow. The real highlights of the play are the magnificent period costumes which colourfully disguise the fact that there is no set. All in all, the play is insubstantial, but a pleasant evening's entertainment.

Oh yes, the title, Mandrágola refers to a secret fertility potion which, to my knowledge, has yet to be bottled and put on the market.

A long story

It began more than 30 years ago when a doctor developed the first commercial tampon. The first hygienic internal sanitary protection, Tampax tampons. Since that time, Tampax Incorporated has devoted all its research and technology to making that tampon the best, safest and easiest to use. We don't make sanitary napkins or facial tissues, just Tampax tampons. The best possible tampons.

Today, millions of women in 118 countries around the world trust Tampax tampons. They rely on their comfort and convenience. No other brand can make a similar claim.

Fads, fashions and fancies come and go. Scores of other tampons have seen the light of day and faded. Tampax tampons are here and now. And still just beginning a long story of comfort and freedom for modern women throughout the world.

arts festival next year

A number of students on the U of T campus are organizing a nationwide University Arts Festival to be held on the University campus next February. There is only one stipulation for entry — the work has to be an original — and a good one — created by a student.

Renaissance '70 is a 'total arts' concept — original entries will be accepted in all fields of writing, painting, live theatre, films, music, and dance. Renaissance '70 is a 'showcase' — luminaries from all the aforementioned arts will be invited to see and take part in the festival, so that many doors will be opened for aspiring university talents.

Entries will be judged in the preliminary stages by a combined adjudication board of the university and the local cultural community.

Plans for festival week include the opening of the festival with a multi-media show at Convocation Hall. The show will be produced by the person who conceives of the best original idea for such a show. During the week, there will be art and sculpture exhibits, concerts, poetry readings, movies, and plays put on throughout the campus (and in some cases, off-campus: Cine-city and The St. Lawrence Centre) with the co-operation and facilities of the various colleges and faculties. Informal discussion of the exhibits will be encouraged by such things as coffee houses, after-theatre coffee sessions, etc. The festival will close with a dinner at Ed's Warehouse, where members of the community and the artists and producers will come together.

If the festival is a success, it will be put on an annual basis, different universities across the country acting as hosts.

There will be pre-festival activities leading up to festival week. Various colleges across the campus will be given an opportunity to display their original artistic entries in a co-ordinated way.

More staff is needed however, so anyone who wishes to organize, advertise, publicize, print a magazine, or head the music, art or dancing sections will be welcomed with open arms.

For information about the festival call: Alexandra Mercer Stephen Rosen Executive Producer, National Co-ordinator 922-7980 782-5091 or write: Miss Ruth Upsprich, Executive Secretary, 118 Atlas Avenue, Toronto.

undisciplined winter

As a display of virtuoso guitar technique Johnny Winter's Feb. 15 concert at Massey Hall was outstanding. Winter's dexterity is amazing, and his ability to produce lightning-fast and smooth runs, and other assorted pyrotechnics didn't flag throughout the whole performance. From the standpoint of the music itself though, the set wasn't quite as exciting. Often Winter gets so carried away with getting his fingers around his guitar that he neglects both the quality of his singing and the necessity of shaping his improvisations into clear and coherent phrases, with the result that the total musical effect suffers. Winter also seems to forget sometimes that playing in a band involves give and take between the musicians, and often his back-up men weren't allowed to contribute all they probably could have toward a complete musical texture because Winter was too wrapped up in his lead solos. Too much showing off goes against the spirit of simplicity and honesty inherent in the blues.

Despite shortcomings however, no one can deny that Winter has a spectacular facility on his instrument which is matched by few other guitarists around today, and even if for that alone, his concert was something to hear.

fast-moving waltz

Among the final words of Anouilh's Waltz of the Toreadors are these: "One must never understand anyone, or one will die." The two and three quarter hours preceding are nonetheless a single-minded delving, alternately witty and cruel, into that understanding. Enough of a challenge; the added one of length is unnecessary. That, with the intermittent passages of philosophy both pompous (the General) and anesthetic (the Doctor) are a problem that even the Drama Centre's very capable cast cannot always surmount.

Nonetheless, Anouilh's strengths — and they are considerable — get a good airing. Keith Mills, as General Saitot-Pe, misses no nuance of bluster, cajoling, whimpering or oily self-satisfaction. More sparing use of the red-faced explosion, however, would have made his very long part more palatable. Balanced against this military tankard are Gaston, very chaste, somewhat horny and excellently played by John Winter; Madame Saint-Pe (Gillian Gillillano), the bed-ridden paragon of shrill virtue who does not let immobility detract from stage presence; and Mlle. Sainte-Euverte, well and intensely played by Anne Szamosi, but too sexily breathless to convince us either that she waited faithfully for seventeen years, or that she finally falls in love with a eunuch like Gaston.

Randolph Dellago has created an effective Doctor Bonfant; his serene manipulation of the General, however could be balanced with some concern for the man he has cuckolded. It would help on believability.

Bievability per se, however, is not Anouilh's prime aspiration. We are asked to accept a stage-world of characters who "utter enormities" and find themselves empty; a series of people whose complexity begins and ends with sex drives in conflict with sham respectability. In this context, credibility is exchanged for high humour, brilliant irony — and carte blanche for the cast to be funny. This they have done well, any weakness arises from over-indulgence.

Lea Usin's set (antelope horns courtesy ROM) is visually attractive and well constructed, but awkward in the one major set change — an object lesson to proscenium-builders in the Glen Morris Church, where there is potential for much more.

All in all, the show is thoroughly entertaining. Anouilh could have written less on a General's bitchy soul and the cast could have come up with more varied interpretations; but generally the two agents seem to work together for an evening of non-stop satire and well-developed humor.

blue monday blues

Last week's evening of blues at Massey Hall, entitled Blue Monday, while it had some superb moments, was not all that it might have been.

The show was to have featured Buddy Guy, Bobby "Blue" Bland, and Otis Spann, with a possible performance by Lonnie Johnson, and with B. B. King promising in the middle of last week to put in an appearance.

If all had gone as planned, it could well have been the best blues show Toronto has ever seen, but unfortunately Otis Spann entered Chicago's Cook County Hospital a day or so before the show with perforated ulcers, and B. B. King never made it. That left the showtime, which went on nearly 3½ hours, to be divided about equally between Buddy Guy and Bobby Bland, with the help of Whiskey Howl who had the job of warming things up at the start.

Buddy Guy did just about what was expected of him — he clowning. He's a fine guitarist; I've seen enough of him to believe with many others that he's one of the greatest, but he relies too much on his growing talents as a humorist and juggler, and he doesn't spend enough time improving his musicianship, either as a solo artist or as a bandleader. Both he and the band can be good, but they seem to be lacking a controlling hand to make sure that the quality is always there.

By contrast, Bobby Bland's band is all control. But while Buddy Guy can to a large extent make up for any faults with his wit, spontaneity and inventiveness, the Bobby Bland Review has little to save it from what I find a rather banal sound.

I don't love most soul music, so it may simply be a case of not being with the music on my part. However, even as big band soul it seemed to me to miss the mark. I know Bobby Bland has better material than he presented Monday night. I just wish he had used some of it.

But while the show might have turned out to be a discouraging beginning to what one hopes will be a continuing series, it was saved by the brief performance of two men — the incredible Lonnie Johnson and Buddy Guy in his role as accompanist. When Lonnie Johnson walked slowly on stage, cane in hand, the standing ovation was in recognition of Toronto's resident blues great and for the pluck of a man of 81 who is coming back from spending months in hospital after being hit by a car and having a stroke. When he had finished his two numbers and was helped offstage, the even more enthusiastic standing ovation was for the superbly moving beauty of his singing and for the incredible sensitivity of Buddy Guy who accompanied him sitting at his feet. All his career, Lonnie Johnson has had a startling and beautiful voice, and with two songs, that voice made the first Blue Monday his show.

I allowed for the bleachers and the atmosphere of poverty at the Global Village. But I could not excuse the poor presentation of the first part of the Valentine's Day program Layton Penelope Hawkins. Poet-singer William Hawkins and poetess Penelope sought dramatic effects, but they were let down by their supporting technicians. Their half of the program was lit from above, with the results that Hawkins often stepped out of the light and that an otherwise attractive Penelope had terrifying shadows cast across her face.

Hawkins offered simple love songs not of themselves more poetic than any half-decent folk song. Three-chord progressions were lifted intact, with melodies, from Tim Hardin. Good baritone voice, thin in upper range. Enjoyable for me, he made others restless: like Penelope, his seeming disdain for the audience — in the poems and in their presentation — kept him from being engaging. But there was a saving warmth and humour.

Penelope read in a monotone learned from the aged Robert Frost. One poem was chanted in plain-song, another projected on a screen. No clapping by request (to sustain the "mood"). Often hyper-abstruse like her poems, the illustrative slides were poorly chosen and seldom synchronized with the reading.

Enter Layton. From the back a young girl cried, "He looks like a teddy bear." Also like a rabbi. He lit up to see the audience. Absolute command of the podium. Similar sure-footedness in his reading. People were so caught up in the intense darning of this hyper-erotic poetry that they let him pass between two ravishing poems without clapping. Astounding. Physical love totally exploited — no action, no sensation omitted. Love of life and love permeates the atmosphere. Beautiful poems, readily-seized and richly laboured. A striking poem about waning love (strangely enough). And incestuous poem. Total poems.

The master made it worthwhile. It was encouraging to see Layton (for the first time in my experience) drop his persona, unabashedly affirming life, forgetting to see how much shit he can disturb, acknowledging the presence of Lazarus in the pin-striped suit, speaking bopful words to awe-struck young poets after the reading, coming on as a magnificent human being.

m. w. macina

'damned' is slow

Luchino Visconti's The Damned is a symbolic treatment of the rise of Nazism in Germany in 1933 and 1934 and it must be one of the most ironically miscalculated pictures I have ever seen. I guess just about everything's wrong with it. To begin with, the actors' voices are dubbed, or at least some of them are. You hear the same voices you have heard in all the dubbed, second-rate French and Italian movies you've ever seen and you get the same feeling of a group of people standing around a microphone in a room somewhere reading the script, but never just right.

As if aware that the dubbing is going to spoil the meaning of the lines, Visconti tries instead to divert our attention to the visual aspects of the film. Since even the music is lousy, which is interesting considering Visconti wanted his film to be called Götterdämmerung (from the last opera of Wagner's Nibelungen Ring). Presumably his movie, like an opera, was to be everything: theatre, spectacle, colour, great drama, music. But watching it is like watching an opera with no singing.

Even without the dubbing one wonders if the lines would come right. They are so melodramatic they should be sung, not spoken. But Visconti goes even farther by actually working against what his actors are saying. At least three scenes begin with shots of someone talking to someone else off camera, and since what the on-camera person is saying appears to be of importance, we wonder who the listener is, and it seems important to know this because alliances are continually changing in this movie. Who is plotting with whom this time? But in each case, we are kept in suspense too long.

Right from the beginning, you know who the good people are, and the bad and the weak and the strong. The bad look like vampires and the weak put up their meek little struggles. The events in the movie are supposed to symbolize Hitler's rise to power, but they have no real depth to themselves, so they give no depth to what they are symbolizing.

One result is that some irony rises from the very slow pacing of the movie. In scenes with groups of people the camera pans slowly over every anonymous face in the room. A homosexual-transvestite party which Hitler's Brownshirts have the night before they are murdered by his Blackshirts goes on so long I was glad when the S.S. boys drove up for the slaughter. The scenes move slowly apparently because Visconti wants us to think. But there is never much to think about. The irony is that by keeping it slow we realize this. Take out all the transvestism and incest and the green faces and white make-up and speed up the rhythm and you have a fast melodrama like Z. Or leave that in and remove the politics and you have a nice, sick comedy.

Even all those beautiful colours don't take much close study. Everything is reddish-brown, like dried blood, and the result is nice to look at. But Visconti gets carried away, particularly with Ingrid Thulin's face. She plays the wicked, power-hungry mother of the movie her face is green. (But of course what else could it be? — after all, she makes her son dress up in drag and drives her lover (Dirk Bogarde) to two murders.) But then sonny boy, Martin (Helmut Berger) rebels and screws mother ("I'll destroy you.") which completely zons ner and from then on her face is pure, pasty white, big black eyes and ruby-red lips.

Well that's pretty cheap of Visconti, and awfully dumb. In 1970 we are surrounded by colours that our response to colour, per se, is going to be pretty minimal. Maybe back in 1300 bright red would knock you over just by being bright red, but not nowadays. Okay, so maybe Visconti is saying Nazism was like a second-rate horror movie, but if he should have speeded the movie up and made it into a comedy of horrors instead of asking us to take it all so seriously.

An aristocratic industrialist's family represents Germany, or the government of Germany in 1933. Like people who think it enough of an accomplishment just to recognize the existence of a symbol without trying to discover the new meanings created by it, Visconti seems to think it enough that he simply present the family to us as being metaphorical and that's all he needs to do. The degeneracy of the family is supposed to stand for the political corruption of Germany. Visconti makes this very clear. None of the transvestism or incest offered to us carried a message or a moral. One can say the family stands for this, and the degeneracy stands for that and that is precisely what is wrong. But not only do Visconti's metaphors not lead us anywhere, they have no existence of their own. In trying to be so visual, Visconti destroys the very meaning of his images and symbols, and that's the biggest irony of them all.

kuerti & feneyves

Criteria for a "good" concert, based on attendance by Toronto's musically wise audiences:

- 1) Concert must be at Massey Hall
- 2) Tickets must be expensive (over $5.00)
- 3) Artist must be visitor from Europe, preferably with a gimmick.

Of the two offerings commemorating this Beethoven year so far, one, the DuPre-Barenboim concert, scored high on this list and was rewarded with a full house of our local cognoscenti. The other, the first two of a series of three concerts by pianist Anton Kuerti and violinist Lorand Feneyves performing the complete set of Beethoven's Violin Sonatas, was received by a small audience filling barely three quarters of the recital hall of the Edward Johnson Building. The first two concerts by Kuerti and Feneyves took place on Sundays, the 15th and 22nd of February, and the last of the series will be played this coming Sunday, the 1st of March.

The irony of the situation comes with the realization that the Feneyves-Kuerti collaboration is in many ways the superior chamber ensemble. They are artists of great integrity and maturity, and their playing shows a complete grasp of Beethovenian architecture. Mr. Feneyves' playing is so translucent that one is only marginally conscious of his presence. Rather, one is struck by the immediacy of Beethoven's genius, proof of the validity of Feneyves' interpretation. His playing is reminiscent of Jacques Thibaud and other great chamber players of the past both in clarity of conception and fidelity of presentation.

Anton Kuerti is a pianist who is a musician. For many pianists today the terms are mutually exclusive; Bela Bartok called the piano a machine. Mr. Kuerti however seems to be so imbued with the essence of Beethoven's music that he further elevates these Sonatas towards an ideal which only he and Mr. Feneyves share. Technically he has no obstacles, and his virtuosity serves only to more firmly delineate Beethoven's ideas.

In tempi and phrasing and all the tiny nuances of the music, the ideas of both coincide perfectly, to the greater glory of Beethoven.

The Torontonians disease of incessantly bemoaning our dearth of culture, coupled with a blatant disregard of our sizeable resources, was again manifest these two Sundays past. Those who truly love music should catch the last of this exciting series (including the Kreutzer Sonata) this coming Sunday at 8:30 PM at the Edward Johnson Building. Tickets may be purchased for $2.00 (students) at the Box office before the concert. It's a worthwhile musical experience.

The new $250,000 theatre Womens' Union Building was opened Wednesday night with the U.C. Players' Guild's production of Anton Chekov's play The Seagull which will be performed there until March 7. The auditorium itself has a few minor defects: the absence of a door renders access to the storage space under the stage impossible, the house lights are controlled by an on-off switch (which doesn't happen to be in the lighting booth) rather than a rheostat consequently it is purely a matter of chance whether the end of intermission catches you in your seat or not.

There were also technical difficulties in the staging which might be charitably ascribed to the unfamiliarity of the crew with their (limited) resources. The worst problem was with the sound, specifically with a deafening piano and an inaudible gunshot.

The choice of play to christen the new house is courageous and commendable. The extraordinary subtlety of Chekov, as compared for example with Strindberg, makes him a real challenge for relatively inexperienced actors. I cannot agree, however, that this is a valid reason for ignoring him. Ralph Vaughan Williams' observation about music applies equally to drama: "If a thing is worth doing it is worth doing badly". Great works can withstand imperfect performances better than the exaggerated reverence that breeds neglect.

By this I do not mean to imply that the current production is an incompetent one. Under the direction of Hilary McLaughlin it provides not only a clear reading of one of Chekov's finest texts but a rendering which is often dramatically effective.

Chekov's main concern in this work is the psychology of the artist. He shows behind the reputations of actress and novelist two weak, bored people passing much of their time in the country among equally bored and weak, but untalented people. While individually dull, eight or ten such people on stage at once fidgeting awkwardly exert a paradoxical fascination. With such characters there is perhaps a danger of being caught by the fallacy of imitative form: that is, a danger of playing ordinary people in too ordinary a fashion. One of the ways of avoiding the tedium the characters are prey to is the alternation of tempo in succeeding scenes and acts.

The first act of the Players' Guild's Seagull is extremely low key, so much so that the family doctor's claim that everybody is hysterical becomes ludicrously inappropriate. The second act is more emotionally demanding. Margaret Reid as Madame Treplev, the actress, copes admirably with the two major scenes in which she must retain her hold over the novelist Trigorin (Stephen Tackett) and make peace with her son (Rob Powell) who also has artistic ambitions.

Young Treplev is in love with Nina (Arlene Perly), to be replaced in the second week by Virginia Roncetti). The two young people get what they want; he becomes a published author and she an actress. But the hope that they could avoid the fate of their elders proves vain. Nina is corrupted by the banal evil of Trigorin. She can no longer bear to think about the seagull which was the image of her purity and freedom and Trigorin has even managed to forget it entirely. In the climax of the final act Constantin, Treplev and Nina are brought together after a two year separation while the other generation laughs over supper in the next room. Arlene Perly is extremely convincing in this painful and difficult scene.

At one point Konstantin says that to be an artist requires a lot of patience. Similarly Chekov's plays at the best of times require a certain amount of patience and as presently performed the pace of the Seagull, with two lengthy intermissions, requires rather more than can reasonably be expected. Nevertheless, as far as I am concerned, the requisite patience is not unwarranted.

THEATRE

Good things on and near campus these days: Chekov's The Seagull, directed by Hilary McLaughlin, marks the re-opening of the University College Theatre (formerly Women's Union), with performances at 8:30 pm through Saturday, 7th March; a Victoria College production of Machiavelli's Mandragola, directed by Jim Morrison, continues at the Colonnade through tomorrow evening, with curtain at 8:30 and tickets $1; and at the Drama Centre's studio theatre on Glenmorris street, Anouilh's Waltz of the Toreadors, directed by Robert Lackenbauer, plays through tomorrow night. No admission charge, so arrive well in advance of the 8:30 curtain time.

is offering a ballet called Transmission on Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays through 14th March. Billed as "a contemporary dance-drama," Transmission is the work of Elizabeth Swerdlow, who was responsible for Blues S.A. Weekend nights at the Global Village also include 10:30 pm to 6:00 am jam sessions and, this Saturday only, a one-act play called Children of the Night. $2.50 advance, $3.00 at the door gets you in for the evening. Box office phone is 928-8170.

American headlines become Toronto theatre as of next Tuesday, March 3, when Toronto Workshop Productions' opens Chicago '70, a play based on the just-concluded trial of the "Chicago Eight" for their activities before and during the last Democratic convention. The script of the play is derived from day-by-day transcripts of the trial sent to TWP by the Chicago Conspiracy Office, and, to quote the TWP press release, "with this material the company has been working on a Conspiracy of its own". In 1968 the whole world was watching what the official report of the Walker Commission later called a "police riot" in Chicago; given TWP's record of high-calibre craftsmanship, it will probably be worth watching to see what they create out of Chicago's equally ugly aftermath. Americanization, perhaps, but about rights, revolution and reaction of international significance.

I stand corrected and apologetic for the implication, in a two-weeks-ago story on the reopening of UC's Women's Union Theatre, that Hart House Theatre has been unavailable to student productions since the two-years-ago establishment of a semi-professional season. Brian Parker, Director of the graduate Drama Centre, has reminded me — and I pass the word on to college drama groups looking for a good, if expensive, theatre — that "the theatre is still a rental house, still mainly used for student productions, and, since the Drama Centre took it over, there has been absolutely no change of rental policy and no raising of rental rates." The productions of the professional faculties (like Dentantics and Dafydil) and those of the occasional college group (like next week's Ride-a-Cock-Horse by SMC's Theatre Mickities) have continued in the theatre along with the semi-pro schedule. And while there are no longer the Hart House-sponsored productions wide open to student involvement four times a year, the Drama Centre encourages undergraduate theatre — quite tangibly so this year by producing A Man's A Man, helping the undergraduate Measure for Measure, and giving a grant to the productions of Pinter and Beckett next month in Women's Union Theatre.

Review of the press

The Last Post is an editorial co-operative that formed last year for the purpose of creating an alternate press.

It is an independent, critical magazine trying to uncover some of the facts that have been buried or hidden by the commercial media.

"The geography of the moon is more familiar to us than the roots of inflation, the crisis on the prairies, or the forces interplying in Quebec," said Anne Boody, one of the members of the co-operative.

"For this we can thank an irresponsible, irrelevant notional press that has mystified social and economic problems, fragmented the notional consciousness, and characterized itself more by its omissions than its inclusions," said another member of the co-op.

The first issue was well received across the country. The Varsity feels that the second also rates on honorable mention.

By SUSAN REISLER

Volume two of the Last Post appeared on the stands last week. It deserves our attention.

The main story, about Canada's own bastion of family control, Eaton's, is of interest to all Canadians.

Too long has this family empire been able to grow without notice by the press, except when the company decided they wanted publicity.

The Last Post story is written anonymously because the author works for one of the commercial papers that believes Eaton's deserves special non-attention. He would lose his job for writing an expose of Eaton's.

This control of the news for or by a major advertiser is not unusual. Ron Haggart, a Telegram columnist can write about anything he chooses, except the T. Eaton Company.

The Telegram knew Haggart had been doing research into the family holdings when he was hired and could blow open their 'family' image. Everything Haggart has written about the Eatons has been suppressed.

But Haggart was not the only journalist who discovered that writing the truth about the Eatons was trespassing on private property.

The Last Post story "The Company" reveals that other newspapers have exercised the same restraint (control?).

To this day, the story says, a story on Eaton's that deals with anything more than some trivia about the Santa Claus parade must be passed through the highest editors of any of the English papers in Montreal, Toronto, or Winnipeg. Assignments to cover Eaton events are generally assigned by the publisher or managing editor, with the addendum, "Must go".

And then copy about Eaton's is sacred material. A reporter for the Montreal Gazette went to the 1967 Santa Claus parade in Montreal and wrote up a humorous story afterwards. The story ran for the first edition of the paper but the reporter was informed that he was not allowed to write about anything that wasn't assigned to him. Three weeks later he was fired. Eaton's had been angered by the story.

The Last Post story for the first time takes a good long look at what this family has become and the means they have employed to build up an empire that is worth $400,000,000.

The story reminds us of all that Lady Eaton said and did — Italy now happiest land says Lady Eaton returning, praises Mussolini's rule was the headline in the Toronto Daily Star Oct. 19, 1927.

In the past, Lady Eaton has said, I may be called antiquated for some of my ideas.

I do not see that women have gained much by the vote — it has merely complicated the problem, because the vote is not restricted to intelligent women. I think the vote is rather a nuisance myself.

The story also tells about attempts to unionize the company that are being squashed to this day. Eaton's wants to be known as one big happy family. Those who work there used to be known as associates.

The story explains the Eatons' political power. Eaton's is given preferential treatment by all governments from municipal to federal.

The family is powerful enough to hold onto critical development land against all pressures, public and private, until it suits their own purposes to develop it. It is a feat that can be duplicated by few other corporations in Canada.

The story of Eaton exploitation is an ongoing one. Last Christmas the Toronto company fired 200 maintenance employees and gave the cleaning contract to a company in which they had a financial interest. The average wage for those workers who were forced to switch to the contracting company dropped by up to 28 per cent.

All Toronto papers killed stories about the firing. Eaton's had squelched one more possible attempt at unionizing their big family.

Also in this edition of the Last Post is a detailed study of Canada's complicity in the arms race. Canada's chief arms salesman, D. H. Gilchrist, of the Department of Industry, comes under attack.

The rest of the magazine is filled with informative material about the way things operate in our country, like The United Appeal and who it really serves, or some of the problems that Benson's White Paper on Tax Reform poses, or Patrick MacFadden's review of the Davey Commission.

This month's issue is much brighter than last month's, although a little sloppy on the editing side. By the next issue they should come close to putting out a well-composed, well-edited magazine as well as one with readable content.

The Last Post is available at the University Bookstore.

Corpuscule chasers back on campus

Stretch your veins and flex your corpuscules, 'cause U of T's hemorrhagic race for the Red Cross is on again.

If you don't know what that means, go to the Galbraith Building this Monday or Tuesday (but not both) and see if the nurses and the stretchers can clue you in.

The goal this time is 2,900 pints but unless more people overcome their hemmophobia than last time, the bleed-in could prove a trickle.

Chief organizer Hans Viergeur (III Dents.) said "The chances of reaching our goal are quite good, but faculties like Medicine and Music will have to make a better showing than last time."

The first drive of the year was only a moderate success, with Dentistry winning the trophy for highest per capita contribution hands down.

Students protest French embargo

MONTREAL (CUP) — Montreal students Wednesday celebrated the first official visit to North America by French President Georges Pompidou, by presenting a 1,500-name protest petition to French consulate officials here.

The petition, presented by a group entitled the Committee for Social Justice, criticized a selective French arms embargo against Israel and the sale of French jets to Libya. They attacked French complicity in jeopardizing peace in the Middle East.

The petition was signed by Montreal students and university faculty members, primarily from anglophone McGill and Sir George Williams Universities.

Visit of St. Paul's students

Today we went to visit the Varsity. We met some very nice people. Don took us into the dark room and took our picture. Sue showed us the Tel-ex machine. Louis said that we could write an article for the paper. Liz showed us the editor's office. Clare showed us how the paper is set up.

We thought that it was a sharp place. We liked the sign that said, "If you want to find out what the rules are break them."

SHORT SHOTS

The Gee-Gees have three all-stars in their lineup. Goalie Jacques Audy and defensemen Paul Cadieux were chosen on this year's first team while centre Bob Aube was selected to the second team.

The Ottawa team however comes into the playoffs off a two game losing streak. They lost to Montreal and to Laval last weekend.

SHORT SHOTS - In other playoff action around the country, out west the U of Calgary Dinosaurs, who finished first in the western intercollegiate loop, begin a best of three playoff final with the perennial western champs the U of Alberta Bears. The Calgary squad won a semi-final series over the University of British Thunderbirds in straight games while the Bears reached the final by dumping the Manitoba Bisons in like manner. . . The York Yeomen who were undefeated in the OIAA group are the best bet to represent that league at Charlottetown. . . Meanwhile, in the Ottawa-St. Lawrence league, Blues old rivals in the Loyola Warriors and the Sir George Williams Georgians participated in a wild second period brawl in a game last Wednesday. Over one hundred and thirty minutes of penalties were handed out. As an aftermath, both Loyola and Sir George have been put on a probation period lasting until the spring of 1971 by league president Maj. W.C. (Danny) McLeod of the Royal Military College.

Hadden only Varsity B-ball all-star

There's this guy, you know, whose wizardry with a basketball is out of sight and has remained that way for the past five years. Yesterday official recognition of the talents of this stranger arrived with his election as the BEST centre in the wide-world of OQAA basketball. Today those sporting guys at The Varsity salute him. This is to let you know John Hadden that there are some in this soulless basketball institution who do appreciate you.

Talking about basketball here, you come to realize the shame of it when a veteran of the abuse like John speaks of the added difficulty of playing well over five seasons without the fan support which inspires a player and makes one glad to be playing in blue and white uniform. In thinking about alternatives to playing ball at U of T next season John adds "there's nothing here to encourage a player to keep playing."

UP AND DOWN, IN AND OUT!

John's career has had its downs. Injuries have often frustrated him particularly in his second season when a bad ankle kept him inactive for most of the year. It was a game which he sat out that season which he remembers most vividly. In that one Blues outboxed national champion Windsor Lancers at Hart House 117-115. Bruce Dempster, whom John rates as his finest playmate, broke up that one with the winning two pointer in the closing seconds of double-overtime. Those were the days!!

Statistically this was another typically well-rounded Hadden year. He led the league in rebounding with 137 and finished eighth in scoring with his highest average ever. 15.9 points per game. What the stats cannot reveal is the dominance over a game which John exerts. It's too bad there isn't an award for intimidation and blocked shots — this is probably the reason opposing players and coaches elected him number one this season. Anyone who has seen John hammer them back at opposing centres and forwards will appreciate this prowess in this sticky part of the game.

LOVE 'EM

His coach, John McManus is completely unrelenting in his praise of John's contribution to the team. "He's played well consistently, worked hard, attended practice faithfully, and played when sick. He's an A student, the best centre in the league, and was this season's captain. He's given us five years of his life."

John's Varsity career was capped these past few weeks with several well deserved honours. First he was named to the Canadian National Team which is headed to the world basketball championships in May, which he will unfortunately have to forsake in deference to Law exams.

At half time of the Blues final game he was presented the Potter Trophy awarded to the Blues player voted most valuable by the members of the team. And yesterday there was his selection as first team league all-star, the only

Varsity baller to attract such interest. Folks, there's been a great one in your midst.

John was particularly disappointed with this season's 1-9 record. "It wasn't that we were so bad, it's just that everyone else was so good — the big gym is really telling now."

It was a combination of inexperience and inadequate facilities and sponsorship which reduced this Blues squad to what often resembled a second-class travelling circus. John feels this team had the capacity to finish third in past seasons. He is, however, optimistic about the talent on which the future of Varsity basketball rides.

BYE, BYE JOHN

And what is John inclined to do in the near future? This summer he's getting married and then plans to spend next year either teaching or studying law at UBC. Will he ever be back to claim his last year of eligibility here? Unlikely folks; it's too bad you never dug big John leading Varsity out on the hardwood — stuff 'em forever John!!!

SAC Presidential candidate Benjamin McNally, absent from Toronto for some time (he had been staying at a monastery in Tibet, playing pool and getting laid twice a day) made his first campaign appearance Wednesday at Convocation Hall. His remarks drew a standing ovation, which, Mr. McNally said, reminded him of his grandfather's standing ovation. "It was too tall for the shelf, so it stood 90 years on the floor." Mr. McNally's running mate, Mark Golden, arrived somewhat later disguised as a Hell's Buffalo, and hurled oranges into the vast, cheering throng. Mr. McNally and Mr. Golden are the Anti-Scurvy candidates.

Mr. McNally apologized for not wearing a button to identify himself. "I have a tattoo on my ass," he explained, "but it says 'Rosy'." Mr. Golden promised to avail himself of all the potential mythic modes of SAC; he suggested a good start could be made by assassinating the SAC President on the Ides of March.

All other candidates blew dead bears.

The Senior Womens' Basketball team, alias the Bluettes, Basketbelles, etc., have finally chosen a name. They shall hence forth be known as the "BLOOMERS".

The womens' Intercollegiate Ski Team overcame their inexperience to finish a very respectable fourth in a meet last weekend held at the Avila Ski Club in Quebec. Eleven other universities competed.

One last plug for the distaff side. The Womens' Intercollegiate Fencing Team (the Fenettes?) will try to staf their way to the WITCA championships this weekend at McGill.

Last home appearance for three Varsity stars

By LYNDON LITTLE

Tonight, and (hopefully) tomorrow night will be the last chance for Toronto hockey fans to have the pleasure of watching the shinny skill of Paul Laurent, Bob Hamilton and Bryan Tompson, three veteran mainstays of the Blues.

The OQAA playoffs which commence at Varsity Arena at 6:30 p.m. feature Blues against eastern division runners-up University of Montreal Carabins in the first game followed at 9:30 by the Waterloo Warriors matched up against the eastern champs the Ottawa U. Gee-Gees. (you can see both games for the price of one)

The winners of tonight's games meet in the final tomorrow evening. The winner of that game goes to Charlottetown PEI as the OQAA representative in the national finals next weekend.

LAURENT FIVE-YEAR VETERAN

The Paul Laurent story is familiar to almost every college hockey fan.

Varsity hockey buffs were excited when Paul opted for Blues in the fall of 1965 after he had led the Toronto Marlies of the OHA junior A in scoring the year before.

That shocked the Marlie management as he still had a year of junior eligibility remaining.

Since then, the diminutive, slick-skating center has thrilled college hockey fans not only at Varsity but everywhere he has performed.

Always a top marksman, Paul won the SIHL scoring title in his second year with Blues and this term he was runner-up to teammate John Wright.

Defensive star Hamilton was a pleasant surprise for Blues this year. "The Champ", had been away in Europe last year and was not counted on in this year's plans, but, he returned and enrolled in OCE.

A former Hamilton Red Wing junior, Bob's experience has been a vital ingredient in Blues' rearguard core this season.

For Bryan (Topper) Tompson, a graduating dent student, this season marked the eighth year he has worn Blues uniform with distinction. Topper's career at Varsity spans three coaches, Jack Kennedy, Joe Kane and now Tom Watt.

To Paul, Bob and Bryan on behalf of all Varsity hockey everywhere all we can say is "thanks for the memories."

WATT HAS SURPLUS OF TALENT ON WINGS

Meanwhile, coach Watt faces the problem of selecting his starting lineup for the weekend tilts.

The main difficulty is on the wing position. Here, the return to health of Bob McGuinn and the return of leftwinger Len Burman following a one game suspension has created a vexing problem.

McGuinn, the Cornell grad, injured his ankle in the first period of Blues' Feb. 6 game against Western and missed the last two league encounters. Rookie Mike Cyr has been replacing him on the rightwing of the Laurent line and has done a creditable job picking up a pair of goals in the big win over Waterloo last Friday.

BURMAN RETURNS AFTER FIGHTING SUSPENSION

Burman, who has been one of the most consistent Blues all year, was involved in a major scrap with one of the Windsor Lancers in the last five minutes of Blues' last home game Feb. 13. In accordance with the league rules he was suspended for the Waterloo match.

Only seventeen players can dress. With Watt's decision to go with five defensemen following the re-activation of Bill L'Heureux two forwards will have to sit out the weekend action.

Rookie Grant Cole, the Erindale College freshmen, who had the league's lowest goals against average this year will start in the nets.

Blues' opponents this evening, the Carabins, are coached by Andre Hureault. The U of M squad finished in second place with a final record of nine wins, four losses and three ties which is just about the same as they did last year when they came third. Their captain is Andre Larouche, one of their better defensemen and an eastern division second team all-star this year.

The Ottawa Gee-Gees, coached by George Hansen, have made a spectacular improvement over last year. Then they finished dead last in the OQAA east with only one victory to show for their efforts. This term they posted a 10-4-2 record to finish on top.

(see SHORT SHOTS on page 26)

Paul Laurent and Bob Hamilton, two veteran Blues playing their final games before Varsity fans this weekend, are caught in a fraternal pose following one of Blues' victories over McMaster earlier this year. The photog. on this occasion was Varsity rightwinger Mike Boland.

Six Blues on SIHL 'dream teams'

Varsity Blues capped a very successful league campaign by walking off with six of the twelve western division all-star positions announced yesterday by the OQAA publicity department.

The Waterloo Warriors, runners-up to Blues for league honors, were next highest with three selections.

John Wright at center and rookie Bill Buba at one of the forward positions were chosen for the first team.

Rookie Grant Cole in goal, Dave Field on defense, Paul Laurent at center and captain Brian St. John at forward made the second team.

Blues had five all-stars selections last year.

Laurent was the only Varsity repeater.

Don Bruner from the Windsor Lancers in goal, Ian McKegney of the Warriors and the Western Mustangs Dick Oudekerk on defense, and Ken Laidlaw from Waterloo at the other forward position rounded out the first team.

On the second team, the Guelph Gryphon's captain and former Blue Jim Wilson joins Field on defense. Dave Rudge of the Warriors was the other second team forward.

Several anomalies appear in the selections.

Mustangs Oudekerk was chosen at defense for the second year in a row even though he was switched to the forward line this season. Blues' St. John and Waterloo's Rudge were selected for wing positions while both skate from center ice.

Blues defensemen Dave McDowall, a standout all season, was a glaring omission.

THE GAME:

Waterloo goalie Ian Scott kicks out one of 34 Varsity shots aimed his way in Saturday night's OQAA final, but his heroics weren't enough to prevent the Varsity Blues from winning the game and the Queen's Cup. The final score was 7-4. Blues defenseman Dave Field moves in looking for a rebound, while Waterloo's Greg Sephton (18) arrives to help out.

Blues and Warriors made it to the Saturday final after winning their semi-final matches Friday night. Toronto walloped the University of Montreal Caribins 11-0, while Waterloo downed a game University of Ottawa team 7-3. The complete story of the Friday night action appears on page 19 of today's Varsity, and the saga of Saturday's scintillating spectacular is on page 20.

Hart House farm architectural students have presented extensive plans to the S.A.C. for renovations to H.H.F. They plan to do all the work themselves. After much debate, the S.A.C. decided to allocate $200 of next year's money/budget to help the students complete their plans.

Erindale & Scarborough appreciate being more involved in the S.A.C. election this year. Turn-out at the polls should be interesting!

Communications Commission: Comm. Comm. has recommended abolishing Random and the student blotter. Paul Carson and Gus Abols will edit next year's handbook; Jim Cowan is editor of the summer Varsity. Pat Dymond has been named as Managing Director of Radio Varsity.

The Varsity board has a constitution!! After a three-hour debate, the S.A.C. ratified the amended constitution, with changes in the actual membership pending.

Dont' forget: Campus centre referendum included with election. Express your opinion with your vote.

Finance Commission: Budget time is here again (tum-de-dum). The commission hopes to have coerced budgets out of all other commissions soon, and is asking for a budget session on March 18th. The SAC priorities paper, written by members of this commission, will be debated at the next SAC meeting and will be used as the general guideline for SAC operations next year.

Education and University Government: There is still a lot of work going on at the course union level. As well as working to implement a top governing structure and trying to make some sense out of the CUG questionnaire, these two commissions are now working closely with the Political Economy Course Union on their efforts to begin talks within that department on the implementation of structural reforms.

Judicial Commission: The Campbell Report and its implementation committee are the main concerns of this commission at the moment. The SAC response to Campbell, adopted at the February 4 general meeting, was presented and discussed last Monday at the Implementation Committee meeting. A good time was had by all.

IMPERIALISM DIES

Nixon surrenders, gives up gig

TRUDEAU FLEES

American Imperialism in Canada ceased Friday. Shortly after 2 o'clock p.m., American President Richard Nixon announced that American parent firms had been ordered to surrender full control to the Canadian people.

At a special news conference he told reporters that the move had come about in response to a special issue of the Varsity, the University of Toronto undergraduate newspaper that appeared Friday morning. "They made all the right connections, he said, "So we knew the gig was up."

Around the world popular uprisings have flared up leaving US investors shaking. At the end of Friday's trading, the New York Stock Exchange reported "a very alarming" downward trend.

Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau fled late Friday to Argentina with singer-actress Barbara Streisand. An aide to the prime-minister quotes Mr. Trudeau as saying, as he boarded the plane, "Well surely now you wouldn't expect me to stay around after the shit hit the fan do you? I know when I'm licked."

Business leaders all over the country have also fled. Many have committed suicide in their private offices.

Members of the Varsity staff expressed surprise at the fact that no mass movement or political struggle was needed to initiate the pullout.

In an exclusive interview Saturday Varsity editor Brian Johnson expressed skepticism at the fantastic success of this one-shot effort. "Something's fishy. It just can't happen that fast. It's too Hegelian. Sure we made all the connections but you just can't convince people by writing it all down."

U of T President Claude Bisell is reported to have fled to the United States where he has been offered a teaching job at Harvard University.

Failure of Liberalism draws 16 people

Sixteen people came to Hart House Saturday to decide whether liberalism has failed.

Among the 16 were four reporters, three speakers and five organizers from the U of T Liberal Club, which has been sponsoring the two-day conference entitled "The Failure of Liberalism?"

John Mooney, a representative from the Just Society, a local social action group, was unable to appear on the panel as scheduled. A spokesman for the Just Society said that Mooney, who has been fired from the organization, is wanted by the police for misuse of funds.

Prof. Raymond Garneau of Glendon College blasted English Canada for its failure to understand Quebec. He was the only speaker to receive applause.

The question continually posed to Quebecois — "What does Quebec want?" — shows this lack of understanding, he said.

"We do not merely want to survive, but live; we want to create our own human values. If you stay between your mother's legs you don't become a man."

He described the Quebecois as being alienated from an economy controlled by English and American companies.

They disguise this control behind a bilingualism they don't really believe in, he said. "In our province we can't work in our own language."

"This is imperialism pure and simple."

He dismissed bilingualism as a cure for federalism. English Canada supports bilingualism he said, since "it costs little and doesn't change much."

"If Canada really wanted bilingualism, why do English provinces give immigrants the chance of learning only one language?" In Ontario you have every opportunity to learn French but refuse because of the effort."

Garneau was asked if separatism could be economically feasible.

"I don't know," he shrugged,

"I'm not an economist; I'm just telling you my feelings."

Murray Cotterill, public relations officer for the United Steelworkers of America, criticized Liberals for failing to understand the collective bargaining process.

"Instead of getting people to help one another, Liberals have regulated," he said.

Cotterill envisioned problems like inflation being solved by management and labour getting together, without the interference of "the ruling elite and the properly educated people like the Economic Council of Canada who tell people what's good for them."

"I see democracy as a number of strong pressure groups making sure no one group gains control," he said.

Rev. A. D. Brown spoke of morality and liberalism.

"I am disturbed at the pragmatism," he said. "So many decisions that are moral are made on an amoral basis."

"How does man become a Jesus-man?"

Latin America underdeveloped due to imperialism

By JOHN BENSON

Four specialists in the politics of Latin American economic growth all agreed Friday that Latin American countries were being kept in a state of perpetual underdevelopment by economic imperialism.

The seminar, sponsored jointly by the International Studies Programme, The Latin American Studies Committee and the International Relations Committee of the University of Toronto, met Friday in Hart House to discuss political aspects of economic development in Latin America.

The four panel members all had harsh words for economic policies of the United States and several European countries. Professor Floristan Fernandes, Latin American in Residence at U of T said "when interests of private companies in Latin America come in conflict with the national interest of the country in which they operate, it is the private companies which pre-

He said, "The interests of the countries are only considered when they coincide with outside interests and the interests of the middle and upper classes." Professor Fernandes stated that "external control of a nations economy means permanent export of capital."

"In 1965," he said, "the United States invested 3.5 billion dollars in foreign countries, and only six to eight per cent of that was invested in Latin America. However, that six to eight per cent provided 25 per cent of the return on foreign investments to the U.S."

"This means that the Latin American countries are organized to be permanently underdeveloped," he said.

Professor James Petras, Pennsylvania State University, said "the predicted revolutionary socialist perspective has not been realized in Latin America. Mant stated goals such as agrarian reform have not been reached, and the American dominated Alliance for Progress is now virtually defunct."

Prof. Petras predicted more violent confrontations with the US as nationalism becomes a more potent force in Latin America. He pointed to the new elite nationalism in Peru which is putting pressure on the US in its drive to achieve more independence from the US, faster economic growth and a better income distribution.

Prof. Petras gave evidence for his prediction that there would be more violence in Latin America when he said "a close reading of the Rockefeller Report calls for more police and military aid to Latin American countries."

Professor Carlos Diaz Alejandro of Yale University gave a friendly warning to university radicals. He cautioned against applying "fashionable new left politics on the Latin American countries which have totally different historical situations."

A sad campaign

The Varsity staff did not reach a collective decision to support any candidate in the SAC Presidential election. But here Laura Kelly, a Varsity reporter who covered most of the debates and forums, writes here analysis:

The race for the SAC presidency and vice-presidency is ending with tomorrow's election while most students have barely noticed that it has begun.

The situation is not incomprehensible since this year's student council has not affected the atmosphere of U of T, nor the life of the average student, except to make him twelve dollars poorer. Why should one wade through the flood of boring campaign speeches if the victor will never be heard from again?

Is SAC then irrelevant? A poor man with $250,000 but no spark or power? Unfortunately this is a bad year to reach that conclusion.

The CUG and Campbell Reports beg for student participation. The Spadina Expressway threatens the campus. And in a wider sphere, students across Canada and at U of T are anxious to take a hand in the administration in different university departments but lack a cohesive student union.

But the conclusion on SAC's irrelevance has been reached because most of us can't remember or imagine what a relevant student council can do. It can assist the education of the student through both lectures and entertainment; it can provide channels for student action in areas of concern outside the five regular courses; and it can relate the student as a group to the society outside by collectivizing its financial power and then allocating the funds to action groups.

What is the possibility of the candidates fulfilling these functions?

seem to be the least likely of the prospects to involve the students in the university.

Hurd was the last president of COPOUT, a committee of the student council presidents at the U of T. The committee would have been an excellent opportunity to develop some link between the students in each college.

Hurd convened the last meeting in September. It is now a defunct organization.

Hurd and Miglin are firmly in favor of the implementation of the CUG report. Yet Miglin, speaking for Hurd and himself, said that SAC should not support the Political Economy Course Union's proposed boycott. The boycott will be called only if the department does not consent to a parity committee to investigate departmental appointments.

Parity is a basic element of CUG.

Hurd and Miglin spoke repeatedly against politicization of the student, often attempting to scare moderate students into voting for a "safe" candidate.

At the Faculty of Law, Miglin said that the present SAC gave $150 to the Black Panthers. The $150 was given to an Afro-American organization which would like to get a Black Panther for a speaking engagement.

If Hurd and Miglin are "apolitical" how will they decide on priorities for their quarter of a million dollar budget. Will it go to the Red Cross?

Jean Campana and Ken Wolfson, the socialist candidates, have a thorough consciousness of potential student involvement in governing the university and in social action beyond the campus.

Miss Campana has focused on the role of women in the university as an area of interest and study for the student.

Her goals, however, along with Wolfson's fondness for rhetoric ("We will drag this university, kicking and screaming, into the 1970's") overwhelm the student who is not sure if SAC can even get him a cut-rate flight to Europe, let alone a Utopian society.

Benjamin McNally and Mark Golden were brilliant comics in an already farcical campaign. But students need more than oranges in the face of the ATS hard line.

Bernie Teitelbaum is an interesting personality whom I don't believe is qualified to run SAC.

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy at least go beyond the Hurd-Miglin view of SAC as a small business smoothing out the details of campus planning.

Richardson is emphatic about communication from SAC to the student. He has brought about the inclusion of a referendum question about the campus centre on tomorrow's ballot. But beyond fringe benefits to the students, Richardson presented few ideas about motivating the student to question the process and content of the university.

Richardson and McEvoy devoted much time to discussion of the impact of the CUG report's restructuring on the individual student in a classroom. Although their policy on the student's role and power within the university is vague, their concern for the quality of education is genuine.

Why Richardson and McEvoy remained so heartily neutral is a question for their campaign manager to answer. But even as neutrals, their credentials and sincerity make them the most logical choice.

—Laura Kelly

We are very much concerned that the current SAC election campaign has been so off base.

That the campaign has failed to discuss the real issues is evident. But the somewhat justified disinterest of most students may well have a very dangerous consequence.

Students who have put effort into CUG implementation, the course unions, the disciplinary process reforms, and all the other essential aspects of assuring the development of community here, fear the possibility of losing what has been won so far.

Partly because of the content of this campaign, many students otherwise supporting reform in this university, do not see the leadership of SAC affecting that process at all. They are wrong.

As long as the power to negotiate many of these gains still lies in the hands of a campus-wide council, any weakness or hesitancy on the part of the SAC executive, could jeopardize the gains already made.

For these reasons we urge people to shake off their cynicism and act to preserve the progress that has been made.

Note for candidates who have proven experience in these matters.

We feel compelled to support Wayne Richardson (IV APSC) and Ken McEvoy (III Vic) in this election.

Barkwell writes about boring contradictions and false ironies

Mr. Barkwell is totally correct in his analysis of the democratic processes on campus; once a candidate is elected, the electorate is "stuck" with him, unless it has the initiative to impeach him. Between elections, the student body may indeed suffer if the 'wrong' candidate is elected. Yes, Mr. Vice-President, we have suffered.

Despite Mr. Barkwell's desperate attempts at political rhetoric, his own disillusionment with his position on Council is only too clear. Aside from the obvious cynicism, pettiness and sour grapes evident in Barkwell's article, I wish to examine the statements he alleges to be his own.

Quoting, presumably from the Toike Oike, Mr. Barkwell alludes to a Richardson-McEvoy statement to end "irresponsible political commitments" within S.A.C. I wonder if this statement is reconcilable when complemented by a letter sent to all SAC Reps, written by Ken McEvoy, which began "dear compatriot" and was decorated with a clenched fist. I might confidently question the 'competence' of an election team which would print such matter in direct opposition to its campaign claims. Another point on 'competence' consists of a simple reminder to Mr. Barkwell that he relied on his own SAC experience in a campaign not so long ago.

Mr. Barkwell further complains that the candidates have ignored the problem of student self-determination and the self-determination of Canada. In the next column, he suggests that the Young Socialists are attempting the very connections he has just asked for, but that they are "unbelievable" because they believe that SAC is the place to try to rectify whatever the situation mismanagement may be. If Mr. Barkwell is so anxious to have candidates claiming to realize this "problem", yet does not think that SAC is the place to institute such talks, why is he a member of the Council??

Reflections of the last election campaign bring to mind the same "charges and counter-charges". Mr. Barkwell hails in this campaign, although that previous campaign experienced far more flagrant abuses. Some people have not altered much since being candidates last year. One would suppose that a prospective doctor would have more common sense than to slander any candidates: no matter what his "professional" diagnosis may be.

Mr. Barkwell's most substantial error, however, lies in his premise that students want power. Some students may be interested in the administration of the university and may wish to be involved. However, most students seem to want to abstain. All action is NOT political. The Students ADMINISTRATIVE Council should concern itself as its name suggests; political ends are secondary and arise only from administrative business.

The self-determination of students is a marvelous idea; let each student determine himself.

If SAC is an agent of student oppression (whatever that is), then Mr. Barkwell, Vice-President, is part of that agent. Does he wish to lift the "yoke"? No; he wishes only to criticize the rationalizing attempts of others to realize the student position and try to help whatever it has gotten into. If he truly wants to change a situation he does not like, why does Barkwell not offer his constructive criticisms? Or, has he realized that he does have certain "power", but does not want to use it, to work within the system? Is this the disillusionment we hear in his article?? If he really wants student self-determination, why does he attack Ken McEvoy's hard work to get students interested in CUG implementation, calling it "abstract talk"? If Barkwell has contempt for SAC and such venom for elections and campaigns, why did he bother to run?

Barkwell's article is so full of boring contradictions and false ironies that I find it truly incredible that the Varsity actually printed it. Surely more credible, newsworthy items can be found to enlighten the student body??

Sue Crowe, Erindale SAC rep.

Teitlebaum— you will eat your words

Laura Kelly's summary of my contribution to the Convocation Hall forum (Friday's Varsity) is not an insult to me, out to those 25 people who are working 60-hour weeks to carry my campaign to victory. The absurdities of your paper will become more than evident after my election victory. As for Mr. Barkwell's allegations in his letter to the Varsity, he will have a chance to prove them in court.

Disrespectfully yours,
Bernie Teitlebaum (C & F III)

CUG substitutes one structure for another, but it's not the answer

Dear CUG PROGRAMMING COMMITTEE:

I received some questionnaires in the mail from you which you wished me to fill out. Although filling it out would have been a simple matter I found myself resenting the deprivation of individual identity which the questionnaire and no doubt the 'PROPOSED UNIVERSITY-WIDE COMMITTEE' represented. You don't seem to realize that the majority of students wish to make full use of the institution for the acquisition of knowledge and find you and your kind both on the side of the faculty and the student body irritating.

This doesn't mean 'apathy' on our part, just a basic difference in attitude from that of a minority of young uptights.

If I didn't at this point think that you were infringing upon my right to my individuality, I would have ignored you, and to this point I have not seen any wrong in the existence in the university body of individuals who were defining their personalities and philosophies by their behaviour. It is when your individualism begins to infringe upon the individualism of others that I find it necessary to define to you my position and hopefully to define to yourselves your position with respect to me.

I would begin by defining to you the nature of our environment. My definition is basically the same as one that was proposed by a U of T professor many years ago and has widely been discussed throughout the world. Should we wish to define a problem with respect to the running of the university, we would define it by the simple proposal: that an organizational structure within the university of a previous time makes it impossible for the university to adjust in all ways to all changes in attitude and behaviour taking place. And changes must nevertheless take place for any individual wishes to resonate with his environment.

But what is being proposed is simply a substitution of one type of administrative structure with another, on the pretext that if the new administrative structure contained more 'student representation' then these 'student representatives' could act as interpreters of change of attitudes, principles, etc. to the actual administrators of the university. You will simply substitute one type of policy-determining hierarchy with another which will of course substitute one type of problem for another type of problem, whose existence may not become apparent until the next generation of university students steps in to repeat the act.

Since any difficulty we may consider does not lie in administration's capability but in the overall capability for the university to respond to change, the solution lies only in those aspects of your proposals that will serve to make the university more plastic.

It appears to me that the most advantageous situation would be one in which the professors have greatest freedom. This doesn't represent any great change from older times, except that if we also allow students to have the freedom to chose who they want to be lectured by, or precisely how and where they would like to situate themselves within a knowledge-acquiring situation, then control of optimum conditions would be dictated by straightforward unhypercritical behaviour of all.

Professors salaries would be divided into two parts, the part which the student will have no concern about and which is governed by all non-lecturing functions, and a part which varies proportionately with his teaching success (which will certainly not always reflect his capability, but more usually his ability to be 'plastic'.)

Since every student pays a large sum for his education, it is certain he will look after his welfare.

Such a system would place all people in the best positions by natural laws. It would take care of personality variations, and among the individual students this would mean that different students would gravitate toward their preferred method of securing knowledge. And this would create the optimum quality of educational atmosphere.

Instead of 'decision-making bodies' on either side, all decision-making should be abolished. Individual professors and students will make their own decisions guided by their interpretation of the world around them.

These ideas mean that the professor would have the role of passing on knowledge of what is happening in his particular field and of providing the student with the relevant groundwork for understanding this knowledge should be sense that his students desire it.

If response and class attendance dwindles, he knows that he was wrong. Hence the professors themselves are educated and don't remain in the dark as the old system requires (and this is where the main reason for the lack of 'plasticity' lies)

Administration will be in the hands of statisticians constantly analysing student distribution and providing those students, who require more specific directions with the information and freedom they want. The student body may have to take on the duty of consulting daily or weekly changes on timetable which could be projected on airport-type TV screens located in the relevant faculties.

Examinations will be abolished and replaced with an extensive evaluation by men and women in their respective fields, of undergraduates on an individual basis at the end of the course. None of the evaluators would be an employee of U of T. All other examinations and tests will be voluntary for those concerned people who may wish to evaluate themselves as they go on.

Some of this is very idealistic and even futuristic, however most is merely an extension of changes that have already taken place. The basic ideas is:

- the abolition of politics or decision-making bodies pretending to serve my interests. (there should be no politics of any type whatsoever in an educational institution, for it is an irritation to the primary function and to individual belief; and no single body can propitiate to serve the interests of a very diverse assortment — greater than any recent period of history — of individuals)

- the institution of all techniques and policies (namely anti-techniques, anti-policies) to secure and maintain a high degree of plasticity.

This sets down my interests in the manner in which I wish to secure knowledge, and hopefully states my esteem for the principle of conservation of individual freedom.

Vietnam, pollution, Americanization of the university, the Spadina expressway, the oppression of women, the treatment of campus workers — great social problems concern us at U. of T. yet we find ourselves without leadership from SAC.

SAC can become the catalyzing agent for student action if it develops a program and wins student support for that program. We run on a clear program so that there is no doubt in your minds as to what our views are or what we plan to do. With an active student body which supports our program SAC will become a meaningful force which can speak and ACT.

We pose a strategy for the student movement of creating a university active in the struggle for socialism, a university which fights big business interests which are behind the rape of Vietnam, pollution and many other social problems, a university which aids the workers and the oppressed minor-ties in rediscovering their history and in developing their struggles.

The university cannot democratize by maintaining the present Board of Governors stacked with big businessmen or the Governing Council proposed in the CUG report. Twenty-six of the 66 proposed members are representatives of big business interests. Such a block will control the Governing Council. We propose that students, faculty and support staff sit on the Governing Council.

We support the demand for student-faculty parity on hiring and firing committees. We stand 100 per cent behind the Political Economy Course Union which has declared Professor Dupre's appointment as department head null and void.

The university has shown itself to be an anti-union, anti-worker employer. The University and SAC must give full support to the unionization of campus workers and in particular to the present drive by CUPE.

The Campbell report on discipline proposes that the university President should have the power to call the cops on campus. In our view the police and courts are instruments of the rulers of Canada — the very people responsible for the poverty, pollution, exploitation and wars we see around us. Discipline should be administered by the members of the university itself without recourse under any circumstances to the police and courts.

Working class youth are largely excluded from university for monetary reasons. Tuition fees, residence fees and all other fees must be abolished, free textbooks supplied. All students over 16 should receive a living wage. Financial development of education should be accomplished through taxing the rich, starting with a capital gains tax and elimination of defence expenditure.

The poisoning of our environment through pollution and its destruction through monstrosities like the Spadina Expressway point out the whole unplanned, profit-oriented nature of capitalist society. SAC must actively lead campaigns against the big business which are threatening the extinction of the human race. Industry must stop pollution or be nationalized, under workers' control. Free rapid transit should replace cars and freeways. In the final analysis these problems will only be solved by a planned socialist society instituting social ownership of the means of production.

The Americanization of the university in terms of staff and courses is a cause of grave concern. The Americanizers of this university are the big businessmen who sit on the Board of Governors. To stop this we must take the power out of their hands and put it into the hands of the students, faculty and support staff.

What the candidates say

The nine candidates for top jobs at the Students' Administrative Council will see their ambitions realized or dashed Tuesday as we all head for the ballot boxes to elect a president and vice president. Each of the teams was offered enough free space in The Varsity for an article of roughly 500 words. The Varsity was unable to reach the McNally-Golden ticket, so we have run one half of the only picture available from the candidates. It works out to about 500 words worth of picture.

MIGLIN ☒

The Hurd/Miglin team will work to build a responsive and relevant Students' Administrative Council. Issues dealing with the students' local educational experience will be of the highest priority. We believe that students must play an active role in the classroom situation and have an active voice in determining their university environment. We support the principles expounded in the CUG Report and will work for their implementation. We feel that the SAC should increase its commitment of both human and financial resources to the concept of student involvement in the decision making processes at the Faculty, school and Departmental levels. It is in this area that the most immediate changes might be realized.

While we firmly believe that all students, indeed all people, should not ignore the conflicts and struggles which are taking place in our society and in the world, we feel that the SAC role in this regard must be to provide forums to illustrate these problems as fairly as possible. The SAC as a group should not adopt a "white man's burden" policy by giving small sums of money to idealistic and/or social organization that comes forward, but rather the members of the SAC together with any other members of the university community should commit themselves and work for these causes as concerned individuals not as spokesmen for the entire student population.

The real foothold in the attempt to build a broad base of student support for meaningful exchange in this university and in this society is honest and responsible dialogue between individual minds and not the petty theatrics of unrepresentative pronouncements and manufactured confrontations.

We feel that perhaps one of the most crucial problems facing the SAC today is its emergence as a large unwieldy bureaucracy. It seems unable to keep more than one program progressing at any given point in time. We promise a well co-ordinated approach to all SAC programs — an approach that will yield concrete results and not simply apologetic history papers (eg. Campus Centre Brief and Spadina Brief).

It is important to gain student involvement in the planning and financial processes in the University and in the Government if many of the projects such as the Campus Centre or Men's Athletic Centre are to be realized. We would work to create a powerful and cohesive student/ administration/ faculty lobby to pressure the government on such issues as the lack of capital grants to renovate existing facilities at the U of T. More co-operation between the estates of the university would also lend more weight to such things as Stop Spadina promotion or Pollution Probe.

In the areas of services, Cultural Affairs and Community Action, we believe that SAC should undertake the role of initiator. The ultimate aim is to build self-contained and self-perpetuating service institutions. The SAC should commit sufficient resources to inaugurate programmes such as the Varsity Downtown Education Project with a view to discovering other sources of financing to take on the burden of continuing the programme thereby enabling the SAC to use its monies, energies and influence in beginning necessary programmes elsewhere.

The Blue and White could be developed into a limited company paying dividends to program organizers and with this added impetus, it could operate at a profit. Capital accumulated could then be used to compliment SAC grants to other cultural programmes such as U of T choirs, debates, and cultural exchanges.

We would also work for the autonomy of residences from the Simcoe Hall Budgetary umbrella and would push for student determination of their own style.

The Hurd and Miglin team have many other ideas about how the SAC can work and work well. But it must be remembered that if anything that the SAC undertakes is to enjoy broad student support, then it must have a recognized responsiveness to student needs.

Surely if the SAC is to have any credibility whatsoever, it must become more relevant to the particular problems of the various and far-flung segments of the university community and this implies dialogue-LISTENING as well as talking.

The classroom is not education. Education is working together and being together, drinking downtown, learning about pollution, the Spadina Expressway. At the university, existence is falsely separated into "formal education" and "life" and the two are not related.

"Community in the University" implies trust, co-operation, and communication among all members of the university. This doesn't happen now.

If you get to know and understand other people — students, professors, support staff — at all in the three years you're here, it is more likely outside the class than inside. There are barriers set up within the class between the professor and his students: structure becomes alienating. There are barriers built up between the formal education you receive and the very real problems of pollution, urbanization, and transportation that exist in the real world: content becomes alienating.

Pollution Probe should not have to exist as an extra-curricular activity.

The Spadina Expressway poses problems in economics, politics, sociology, ecology, engineering, and architecture. These are seldom discussed in the classrooms of this university.

People learn best in an informal and co-operative setting: more real learning goes on outside our classrooms than inside. People learn best what is relevant to them.

We feel that it is important that education enable people to be creative and critical. The problems facing society can only be dealt with if people can intelligently evaluate other's opinions, and work co-operatively toward the solution of problems.

This is not happening now.

The degree you receive won't assist you in coping with the major problems that have to be faced. You learn how to pass exams, but beating the system is not positive learning.

We feel that the content and structure of the classroom must be changed. If "formal education" is to mean anything, it must relate to both individuals and society. This can be done if students and faculty participate actively in their education.

CUG can help do this. Its implementation may not result in an ideal educational situation but it sets up a process of change within the university to allow it to become less alienating in both structure and content.

The SAC can help to make education more meaningful. We will do this through financial support of the course unions and through working to implement a new university government. Reform is not being stopped by the administration but by the uncompromising positions of some faculty members. To compromise further on CUG (a compromise itself) is to act irresponsibly.

In order for any SAC work to succeed, there must be two-way communication between the SAC and the students. We will actively ensure that the students are made aware of and involved in the policies evolved by the SAC by maintaining direct contact with all parts of the university and by imaginative use of the media.

We would like the SAC to produce several television programmes, provide more funds for campus film groups and attempt to obtain a section of university comment in the three major daily newspapers. These would provide discussion and dialogue between students and the community.

We want to continue with Radio Varsity's F.M. application. We will provide full page Varsity information advertisements, not just with SAC news but with details of major policies and reports that are to be discussed at the SAC. Thus students can have a say in policy formulation before decisions are made.

We will work for a more relevant education and a less alienating university experience. We need your support now and in the coming year if we are to affect this transformation.

TEITELBAUM

In this election, the candidates have made so many speeches, they are beginning to sound alike. All of them are intelligent people who can generate good programs and services for the students of the university. All of them would be foolish not to benefit from the ideas of the others. But that does not make a good SAC President.

All the candidates recognize that SAC is alienated from the students. That does not make a good SAC President.

All but one of the candidates feel that communications is the chief problem of SAC. THAT IS WRONG! The other candidate wants to involve you in the decisions, policies, programs and services that SAC creates. THAT IS RIGHT!

Can't all the candidates do this? No! All of the other candidates are caught up in the political spectrum. All of the other candidates are part of, or wish to be part of, the internalization of SAC, and want to perpetuate that internalization. You are not alienated because you want to be, but because you are forced to be. You don't vote not because you don't want to, but because you have nothing at stake in this election, or so they would have you believe.

The people who are the candidates to beat are not so because of your free choice, but because they are foisted upon you. It is the SAC status quo, the Varsity, and the college newspapers which dictate to you whom to vote for. You have no choice in the matter.

The only way for your voice to be heard at all is at the polls on March 3. The only way to stop the private ambitions of SAC members is to elect a president who effectively represents the student interest. We've been fighting a long time for a voice in the decision making process of the University.

It is about time we had a voice in the decision making process of SAC.

Next year SAC will be making decisions that will affect the future of your university life. Make those decisions yours. Vote Bernie Teitelbaum. That makes a good SAC President.

TEITELBAUM FOR UNITY
THROUGH INVOLVEMENT

- increase substantially the number of non-SAC members on SAC commissions;
- more efficient and student oriented budgetary allocations;
- college, faculty and school open houses for more inter-student contact.
- increase Blue and White budget to $10,000;
- increase Cultural Affairs budget by $5,000 to meet with needs of cross-country drama festival;

- decentralization of SAC decision making;

- allocation of funds and facilities to colleges and faculties for their own programmes;

- Campus Centre financed from outside the University;

- student loan and residence cost lobby with the Ontario government;

- rapid implementation of CUG and Campbell Reports;

- greater assistance to campus clubs and course unions;

- rejuvenation of Hart House farm;

- a campus pub;

- a new men's athletic building;

This is your chance not only to make sure that SAC works for you, but for you to have the influence to make it do so. Ask the people that know Bernie Teitelbaum. They will tell you. VOTE BERNIE TEITELBAUM. DO YOURSELF A FAVOUR. YOU'VE EARNED IT.

US moves to integrated energy market

By JIM LAXER

Canadians should feel immensely honoured that their country has been singled out for having a special energy grid with the United States.

Some will cynically say that this is simply because we are their neighbour and because we happen to have an immense supply of just the resources needed by the Americans. However President Nixon confounded the doubters when he said, in a recent statement "that a unique degree of security can be afforded by moving toward an integrated North American energy market".

The fact is that the Americans trust us. They feel a bond with us. George Ball put it well when he told the Commons External Affairs and National Defence Committee on Jan. 15 that:

"It is the genius of the Anglo-Saxon people, from which both of our nations have inherited some of our ideas and our habits of operation, that they were capable of evolving enduring institutions almost without realizing it."

And in this hoary Anglo-Saxon fashion we are on the way to forming just such a new North American institution. An integrated energy and resource grid for North America would set priorities for where and how the resources of the continent would be allocated. (It happens coincidentally that most of the "continental" resources that would be involved in the scheme are located on the Canadian side of the undefended border.)

One unforeseen benefit of the plan is that it would reduce still further the role of the federal government of Canada. Resource integration would mean that Ottawa would preside over even less of a national economy. This would permit a stepped-up transfer of responsibility to the provinces, thus allowing the Prime Minister to continue working toward his formula of Ten Canadian Statelets in an Integrated North America. Anything but Two Nations!

The present energy plan sought by the Americans is bold, simple and imaginative. It would work in the following way: in return for complete access to the North-West passage, the right to build an oil pipeline across Canada from Alaska to the rest of the U.S., and freer exchange of natural gas and hydro power, the United States would allow American oil companies in Alberta to ship as much oil to the U.S. as they like. Absurdly enough, American oilmen in Alberta now have to face a quota on how much oil they can send home, even though the profits from their efforts are securely within the family. The new energy grid would overcome the second class citizenship now keenly felt by American oilmen in Calgary. And let's not forget that these newcomers have added richly to the cultural mosaic of western Canada.

This whole subject was eloquently discussed at the recent meeting of the Ontario Liberal Party in Ottawa by Robert J. Orange, M.P. who is Parliamentary Secretary to the Hon. J. J. Greene. He warned us against those simpletons who tend to regard United States corporate investment in Canada and the marketing of Canadian resources in the United States as related issues.

In his address, Orange revealed a flair for classical economics when he stated:

"The availability of markets is related to the law of supply and demand, to the method of negotiation of price, to the give-and-take of competitive bargaining upon which our entire system is based. This is healthy, useful for Canada, and less than sinister, I would suggest."

It is difficult to disagree with Orange that a continental energy grid would have little effect on the level of U.S. ownership of the Canadian petroleum industry. The point is the Americans already own the bulk of the Canadian oil industry, thus revealing the ignorance of those who confuse the question of the ownership of resources and the availability of markets.

As one can see from the pedigree of his economic thought, Orange (and there are many like him on the Liberal side of the House) is the sort of man who takes the long view on important questions. With this kind of government in office, we can rest assured that full study has been given to previous arrangements in our history whereby we invited the Americans to apply their initiative to our resources. It is reassuring to recall that the Liberal Party was for Commercial Union with the U.S. as long ago as the 1880s. In other words, there is nothing sudden or impulsive in our moving in the direction of a continental resource policy.

In fact, the only thing wrong with the present plan is that it doesn't go far enough. There is one element of inequity not dealt with in the scheme as it now stands. Granted the U.S. should get the bulk of the "continental" resources — they are the larger country — it is a little unfair that Canadian taxpayers have to foot the bill for opening up remote resources areas. The fact is that Canadian tax money puts in the airfields, rail lines, roads, weather stations or provides icebreakers, to use a currently controversial case. It must be conceded that to a great extent Canadian taxpayers install the services and American companies get the benefits.

The solution to this problem seems to lie most intelligently in some form of lend-lease arrangement with the United States. In return for free access to our resources, let's require the Americans to put in the services. This way the benefits of foreign ownership would be apparent to even the most cynical mind. The Americans would be developing our country both by using its resources and by opening up its remote areas to settlement.

Let us suppose, for example, we were to lease out an area of northern Ontario from Lake Nipigon to North Bay to the Americans. The federal government could then require them to man our weather stations in Thunder Bay, James Bay and Pickle Lake Regions, North Bay, Cobalt, Cochrane and Moosonee and Earlton.

There are many possibilities. The one I like best will only be possible after the federal government's mild reluctance to sell Canadian water to the U.S. has been overcome. I'd like to see us lease out the entire province of Alberta to the Americans and then they could re-route western Canadian water down a 70-mile wide trench between Banff and Calgary.

Such a lend-lease plan would realize the vision set out by our Prime Minister in 1964 at the beginning of his long journey. In a statement entitled "An Appeal for Reason in Politics", he intoned:

"We choose the free flow of economic and cultural life. We reject the idea of a 'national state' as obsolete".

By HOWARD LIPTON

BOSTON, February 19, 1970 — Thousands of people rallied today at City Hall Plaza to protest the verdict in the trial of the Chicago Seven. There were expensive-looking cameras everywhere, and FBI agents who looked like FBI agents drifted through the crowd taking photos; and the protesters in turn, kept taking pictures of the agents. Both parties said little to one another.

The five men convicted of crossing state lines with intent to incite riots were given prison sentences of five years on February 18, by district Judge Julius Hoffman of Chicago.

My jury will be in the streets tomorrow, warned Rennie Davis one of the accused. "We're going to turn the sons and daughters of the ruling classes of this country into Viet Cong."

"There are bedbugs that bite and the food stinks," said Abbie Hoffman. "The trial has been like Alice in Wonderland in 1984. At one point, I had a great urge to confess guilt. They said I was an enemy of the state — and I am. But I have been convicted of making three speeches during the convention, one of which I never made."

APATHY IMMORAL

Jerry Rubin, the Yippie, had explained to Judge Hoffman that he had abandoned a life of respectable journalism to become an activist because "it's immoral if you're just accepting what's going on. I did nothing in Chicago. I'm going to jail because I'm part of a historic movement. We don't want just a piece of the pie and college degrees and to live in the suburbs."

Rubin's final words to Judge Hoffman were, "You radicalized more young people in this country than anyone else. You are the country's top Yippie." Bobby G. Seale, Chairman of the Black Panther Party, and an original defendant in the trial, was separated from the other seven after Judge Hoffman sentenced him to four years for contempt of court.

As the crowd gathered at Tremont and Park Streets in Boston, speakers using a sound truck told them how to avoid trouble and, if need be, how to cope with it. The crowd was given several telephone numbers to write on their wrists in case they needed a lawyer. One number was the American Civil Liberties Union.

Buckets were passed to collect bail money, and a few people moved through the group handing out white face masks.

MILITANT BUT PEACEFUL

Alex Joyce, a former Simmons College student, was one of the organizers of TDA, The Day After. Her voice rang across Boston Common. "We're planning a militant but peaceful demonstration."

She told the protesters to organize into affinity groups of eight people, both for protection and to prevent anyone from making trouble.

"If you want to trash, please leave. If you see anyone throwing rocks, surround these people and take the rocks out of their hands. We're going to have collective discipline, and we've made the decision not to trash."

The demonstrators, led by a green sound truck and a group of 75 women, headed towards City Hall Plaza. One banner carried aloft read, "If we don't hang together, we'll all hang separately." Another read, "Revolution for the hell of it."

The crowd at the Plaza rally was estimated by police at 15 to 20,000 people. At the Plaza, an effigy of a pig wearing judicial robes was burned high on a stake, while the following passage from the American Declaration of Independence was recited. "But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their (the people's) right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security."

REVOLUTION NOW

Danny Schechter, an organizer of the march, said "This is not just a march. It's the beginning of a movement, a movement to begin a revolution."

Schechter urged the crowd to go home quietly. "Move off the way we came, in small groups and peacefully, in a way that doesn't get a lot of heads busted."

The crowd then began to move out, along Tremont Street towards the Common. Policemen tried to move the crowd by swinging their billy sticks at the demonstrators' legs.

Then through the streets On Boston Common, 13 persons were injured when 40 riot-equipped policemen charged a group of 1500. Three of the injured were girls, who were hit in the back and in the head by the police who had waded in.

POLICE CHASE

The police fell back for three or four minutes, and then charged again, chasing many of the demonstrators as far as Charles and Boylston streets, about half a mile.

Later that evening, the TDA organizers issued a statement charging, "The police, unprovoked, attacked the demonstrators as we attempted to disperse in the Park Street Area"

"The brutality of the police was once again outstanding as many demonstrators were clubbed while they were already on the ground, and from behind."

"All around this country, thousands of people are rising up angrily. We will not be intimidated, and we will not be defeated"

Why is this man smiling? Is that a peace sign he's sprouting? Yes. He's looking forward to resourceful co-operation and a big piece of Canada.

"We are from Palestine, th

PART I

story and pictures

The Israeli Government Ministry of Tourism sent Varsity Editor Brian Johnson and 12 American college newspaper editors on a one week, all-expense-paid trip to Israel last month.

The following is the first in a series of articles on Israel that will appear in the Varsity during the next two weeks.

Qalqiliya is a small Arab town in what used to be Jordan. In the "occupied territories", just on the "other" side of the former Israeli border, it has been one of the heaviest centres of Arab resistance since the Six Day War, a stronghold of the El Fatah.

The Israeli military government has destroyed 120 homes of suspected terrorists in this small town, and the people's mood is bitter.

When we drove into Qalqiliya's narrow main street in our Hertz Cortina, it was dark. There were no other cars on the street. Arabs were congregated on corners and in open-air stalls where they puffed on water-pipes and drank Turkish coffee.

We stopped the car by a group of Arabs on the sidewalk.

"We are journalists from the United States and Canada," we told them. "We want to speak to people here about the 'conditions'."

There were four of us — Rob from Columbia, Peter from Wisconsin, an Israeli girl from Tel Aviv University, and myself. It was our only free evening on the one-week tour of Israel, so we had decided to rent a car and find out what the other side had to say. For her own safety, the Israeli girl posed as a Canadian journalist. Fortunately she spoke English well.

An Arab boy led us into a small bookstore, where we sat down, surrounded by basketballs, pens, Arabic books, newspapers, cameras, microscopes, letter paper, and plastic soccer balls. We conducted our interview across the counter with the shopkeeper and two Arabs on either side of him — they spoke English.

"We want to know what your life is like here," Rob asked. "How have conditions changed since the Six Day War?"

"We will not answer political questions," the shopkeeper replied. "We will be thrown in prison if we do."

At first they were reluctant and suspicious. But they soon opened up.

"Life is not good now," the shopkeeper said. "You can't speak what you want." The other Arabs nodded in approval.

"During the Six Day War, the Jews stole books from this store," he added. "And they robbed other stores. In the textbooks in the schools, they changed the word Palestine to Israel. They tried to change the thinking of the Arabs, but that is very hard."

"We are not free to go where we want. We cannot go back to our homeland. If I go back to my farm, they will put me in prison."

Arabs in the occupied territories must take out papers from the military government if they want to travel anywhere. The shopkeeper showed us a small green document, a travel permit.

"It's easy to get," he said. "Anyone can get it. But you must have a good reason." As we talked, the inevitable question came up; we asked them for the solution to the problem. They stared at us. They were as curious about us as we were about them.

"Why does America send napalm weapons to bomb us, burn us?" the shopkeeper countered.

We told them we didn't know America sent napalm. It was hard to tell them we weren't complicit in that. The New Left doesn't mean much in Qalqiliya.

"We have a land here in Israel," said the shopkeeper. "We are dismissed from it, moved out for no reason. If the Jews return our land and return refugees to their land — if they return them to their homes — there would be no war, there would be peace. They must return us our freedom. There must be freedom for all people to say what they want."

"They do not treat Arabs on the West Bank like Arabs in Jerusalem. Arabs in Jerusalem can speak. If anyone on West Bank want to speak . . . cannot. Five men in Nablus (a town on the West Bank) wanted to start a newspaper; the government stopped them.

"If they speak about what is here in the West Bank, they will be in prison."

I asked if there were many people in prison. "Yes, I have many friends in prison."

Back on the formal tour, two days later, we were in the bus — driving through the occupied territories on the way to Jerusalem. Nablus is a town on the West Bank that has been the centre of the most violent Arab resistance. As we passed through Nablus at about thirty miles an hour, a sight flashed by the window that looked like a scene from Battle of Algiers.

About 400 hundred Arabs were massed in front of the main gates of a large stone building surrounded by concrete walls. They were shouting and pressing against the gate.

"They are Arabs waiting to see relatives inside the prison," our guide explained. He said they were all political prisoners.

"How has your freedom been restricted since 1967 in terms of . . ." Peter didn't finish his question.

"Our freedom was lost in 1948," said the young Arab on the shopkeeper's right.

By then about 20 people were crowded into the small bookstore. Faces of Arab children pressed against the window. The fact that we were celebrities in this small town told us we were in the Third World.

A man brought us a tray of Turkish coffee. It was poured into tiny cups from a small brass ladle. It was rich — almost like syrup — and very good.

"The Jews are not from Palestine"

There was none of the defensive hostility we were first treated to. They had accepted us into their "home" and now offered the traditional Arab hospitality that guaranteed our safety.

I asked about the recent "incidents" that put Qalqiliya on the pages of the New York Times a few months ago.

"Many houses have been blown up," the young Arab replied. "One month ago five houses were blown up. The Israelis come, and they think terrorists have been harboured in some house, they evacuate them and blow it up. A month ago five houses were blown up. Sometimes the Jews use a bulldozer — a big machine to destroy our houses. Not always bombs. The government does not provide money for new houses."

He then asked me what I thought about Mr. Dayan burning the El Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem.

I said I didn't think Mr. Dayan did it.

"Who do you think did it?"

I didn't know.

When we were in Jerusalem three days later, our guide said an Australian arsonist did it. When we visited the mosque, two armed and smiling Israeli soldiers were guarding it.

"Mr. Dayan did it. And Mr. Dayan is destroying Qalqiliya." Everyone in the shop agreed, and the interview broke down into a flurry of crosstalk in Arabic and English.

The room suddenly became silent when a man walked in escorted by two boys. He was the local teacher, an elderly man, dressed in a grey suit. He had been brought especially to talk to us, and he commanded a great deal of respect from the people there.

Before he spoke, another Arab walked in and took advantage of the silence. He was dressed in the traditional Arab robes and headdress. He glared at us and the teacher.

"We are from Palestine. The Jews are not from Palestine."

Everyone laughed except him. He walked out, and attention shifted obediently to the schoolteacher.

"Why are you here?" he asked us. "Why have you not come for 30 months?"

We told him we didn't have the opportunity to come before. The room was respectfully hushed as he began his speech.

"We are asking for peace. We want to live. But the problem is that some people want our problem to be solved and peace spread over our country. As a population, we can't do anything. Why? The problems are the leaders and their policy. Every leader belongs to a big country. Some to U.S. some to Russia, some to France. When they accept our minds, the problem can be solved.

"The Palestinians want to restore back their town. They are in camps — cold, hungry, in huts, tents. If you ask them where they are from, they say, I am from Lod, from Haifa, from Tel Aviv. If you ask him what he wants, he says, I want to go back to my town, my home. You can see them — they are weak, hungry, without any building. They get no help except from the U.N."

We asked him if he thought the situation would continue.

"I can't decide that," he replied. "You know you from America. America supplies weapons to Israel. Some supply Arabs. What this do to us? Ruin, destroy towns, bring killing. We hat war. Why kill you? Why not sitting and eating and drinking? Why they hope always — the Jews — the way of war?"

"You hear about refugees? Refugees want their rights, want to get their land back. Why not peace? Why not?"

Just as he said that, the muezzin waited the evening prayer from the minaret of the mosque.

"We are not afraid. We only give our opinions," said the shopkeeper.

"We are pleased — pleased to see you," concluded the teacher. "But can I solve the problem? Can I solve the problem?"

The teacher left and the meeting ended. Roh brought a newspaper before we left, and the shopkeeper quoted him a price in Arabic money. Roh said he had no Arabic money.

"Will you take American money?" Rob asked.

The shopkeeper hesitated before saying yes.

VOTE FOR A SAC COMMITTED TO: WOMEN'S LIBERATION

The whole educational system including the university discriminates against women. U. of T. must become actively involved in changing this situation. A Department of Women's Studies should be set up to research the history of women, to investigate wage and job discrimination, and to study such immediate and crucial problems as the effects of the birth control pill. Women should run this department entirely drawing upon women from all faculties. It should hold teach-ins, seminars and give credit courses.

The university should provide free birth control devices, and free abortions for those who request it. There should be a comprehensive day care program financed by the university and controlled by the parents.

All discrimination in hiring and firing, advancement and job classification of women must end. End the streaming of women into courses which lead to worthless BAs and stifling low-paying jobs. There should be preferential admissions of women into courses where they are underrepresented. There should be a quota of 50% women in the graduate studies department to ensure that women can overcome the discrimination against them in earlier years.

ACTION AGAINST THE VIETNAM WAR

The university is complicit in the war in Vietnam. The administration refused to cancel classes for the Nov. 14 Moratorium. The administration allows companies such as Honeywell, makers of fragmentation bombs used in Vietnam, to use campus facilities and accepts almost $1 million in war research. The university must sever all connections with the war makers and become active in the fight against the Vietnam war. SAC must lead in the struggle against campus complicity and in building the spring offensive against the war, culminating in the Apr. 18 March on Ottawa, rather than dragging its feet — refusing to support the Honeywell protest and giving only token support to the Moratorium.

Low Law turnout for election forum

By LAURA KELLY

The SAC campaign trail wound through the Faculty of Law Friday where the presidential and vice-presidential candidates spoke to a small but lively assembly of about 30 students.

Speaking in the dignified Moot Courtroom, most of the candidates expressed a negative attitude towards the present SAC, but held out promises of an improved student council.

Wayne Richardson (IV APSC) and Ken McEvoy (III Vic) presented their platform, urging a focus on the implementation of the CUG report, especially in the face of ATS opposition, as a method to improve the learning process at the U of T.

"Some people think CUG is a radical document. I don't; I think that parity is a necessity," said McEvoy.

"We'd like to tie everything together with communication," said Richardson.

DAILY COLUMNS

He proposed television programs, Varsity ads, and informational columns in Toronto's daily newspapers to relate SAC activities to the student body.

Benjamin McNally, a presidential candidate, spoofed the election procedure.

"I had a really great speech, but the dog ate it," he deadpanned.

"The referendum at the Faculty of Law a few weeks ago voted overwhelmingly to stay in SAC. Now where is everyone?" McNally asked, glancing around the empty hall.

"They heard about your dog," an observer called back. McNally ended his speech, and withdrew into a corner.

PIECEMEAL PROGRAMS

Joan Campana (I UC) and Ken Wolfson (II New), the socialist candidates spoke next.

"Every year we see a parade of SAC candidates, Bright, innovative, young men, but with piecemeal programs," said Miss Campana.

"We must connect campus issues with the great social issues beyond the campus, and make the university a dynamic base for socialist change," said Miss Campana.

"The one essential part of my campaign is Women's Liberation, because the whole educational system perpetuates the myth of women's inferiority."

A tired, bitter-sounding Bernie Teitelbaum, made his short presentation.

WORK FOR STUDENTS

"I was up until 4 a.m. last night, putting up posters that had been ripped down. I've been going on three hours sleep a night," Teitelbaum said.

"I'm in this campaign to fight the internalized elitism of SAC. Yesterday, I was asked 'Why don't you drop out of the race since even if you are elected no one will work for you?' I answered: 'Son, you don't have to work for me, you have to work for the students,'" said Teitelbaum.

Eric Miglin (II APSC) presented his absent running mate's, Rod Hurd (III Scar), platform.

"Students are over-politicized. SAC forces its opinion on the students. SAC should be getting involved at local levels," said Miglin.

"At the last SAC meeting, they gave $150 to the Black Panthers," said Miglin.

One law student asked the candidates whether the poor turnout at the assembly didn't indicate the uselessness of SAC for the Faculty of Law.

"It's the over-all alienation, of which SAC is just a part. The problem is in the leaning process," said Richardson.

WOULDN'T VOTE

"If I weren't running myself I wouldn't vote either," said McNally.

When the candidates were questioned about their position on the Political Economy Course Union's proposed student boycott, all but Miglin supported the decision.

"I feel SAC should support course unions financially, but I don't think SAC should support this action. This has to do with my philosophy of not politicizing the student," said Miglin.

In search of red corpuscles

Blood will flow once again at U of T over the next two weeks as students turn out in hordes and herds to contribute some of their corpuscles to the Red Cross.

Some 2900 students are expected to suffer the pricks and arrows of outraged nurses and technicians or turn them back if they have too much booze in their blood.

Taking the blame for the drive is Hans Viegever (III Dents) who has thrown out challenges to anemic faculties like Medicine and Music to beat the record of the faculty of dentistry for per capita contributions.

The Faculty of Dentistry has won the Anemia Trophy for most contributions for the past three years.

So if you are not afraid of nurses or their pricks come and get laid on one of the stretchers in the Galbraith building today or tomorrow.

Administration replies to PECU today

The Steering Committee of the Political Economy Course Union is meeting this morning with Prof. W. C. Easterbrook, the outgoing chairman of the department, to discuss a reply to the course union demands for a negotiating committee to discuss restructuring in the department.

A spokesman for the course union said that several members of the Steering Committee had already spoken to Prof. Easterbrook and were "optimistic about the success of the negotiations."

An emergency General Meeting is being held this afternoon at 1 p.m. in Room 1083 of Sid Smith to decide whether the boycott of classes is on or off.

At that time the course union hopes to have some sort of faculty reply.

Prof. Easterbrook has indicated privately that he is willing to set up a negotiating committee but would like some faculty support. This may require time to call a faculty meeting.

The boycott coordinating committee however is anxious

8% vote in referendum

Less than eight per cent of the students at Innis College turned out Friday to vote in a referendum to give the college a new constitution.

The new constitution gave parity to students on the College Council and all of the not to dissipate the militancy that is rapidly building up in the student body.

"The reaction I am getting from the normally moderate students is simply amazing," commented one member of the Steering Committee. "I think students must be impatient to get something done on CUG, this year."

Council committees.

Students voted 49 for the constitution and one against. About 650 students were eligible to vote.

The existing College Council had already approved the constitution.

"Innocuous" story leads to seizure of 200 Innis papers

About 200 copies of the Innis Herald were taken out of circulation Friday as an act of censure on one story about the Innis College Council.

Ron Pushchak, editor of the Herald, laid the charge of censure last night.

The Council meeting that was reported discussed the possibility of using the School of Graduate Studies building next door to Innis I as part of the College.

Printing some of the remarks from that part of the meeting caused the controversy, said Pushchak.

Pushchak said that Innis Registrar David King told him that some of the quotes might jeopardize some people's careers.

Prof. P. Silcox was quoted by the Herald as saying that "most Grad students could tell you where to put the School of Graduate Studies and it wouldn't be up St. George St." Other members of the Council were quoted as saying "push Sirluck up the street."

King refused to comment last night on the censure action.

Ted Montgomery, Innis College Student Council President said that he picked up the papers so that the members of the Council quoted could know that their comments were reported "before the Graduate School people saw that (story)."

The Council has a number of student members, one of which is the student council president.

The Council meetings are traditionally open, said Montgomery, but have never been reported before.

"People are used to making personal remarks" in the meetings said Montgomery.

Pushchak said that he will circulate the rest of the papers. "I'll have them all over campus tomorrow," he said last night.

Pushchak said that he thought the article was innocuous and couldn't understand why the Herald was being censored.

Energy possible substitute for walls & roofs

By JIM KARIMITANIS

Energy used as a substitute for walls and a roof in creating enclosures with no visible structure at all, according to two Toronto researchers.

Bernard Etkin, professor of engineering science at U of T's Institute for Aerospace studies and Peter L. Goering, a Toronto architect and a 1955 graduate from U of T's (then) School of Architecture have co-authored a paper called "Air-curtain Walls and Roofs - Dynamic Structures."

Details of the new approach were presented to an international conference on Architectural Aerodynamics, convened in London, England by the Royal Society.

Research had been initiated at the Institute for Aerospace Studies by Goering's proposal that energy might be substituted for mass in large architectural systems. Experiments that have been conducted at the Institute have already demonstrated on a laboratory scale that air can be used to provide both walls and roof.

As for future possibilities of the experiments Prof. Etkin said "We have here, I think, fairly clearly shown that we have only scratched the surface of the scientific and engineering problems related to air-curtain enclosures."

Etkin and Goering told the conference that the major problems with air curtain roofs would be wind and rain. But whereas the former is critically dependant on details of geometry the latter is susceptible to some generalized analysis. Early theoretical and experimental works dealt with the use of horizontal jets.

Very recently the team tried an entirely new approach. "It occurred to us that annular jets, directed upwards, might have useful properties as a jet curtain, in view of the known tendency of jets to coalesce," they say in their paper. Thus a ring of upward pointing jets might be set up around a stadium and they would converge to form a single "solid" jet. Raindrops falling onto the system would be shattered and dispersed.

Prof. Etkin warned that their are many obstacles which seem insurmountable at the moment but advised that is not the time to be concerned with apparent limitations "but to let the imagination run free."

Tuesday ballot to decide fate of Campus Centre

The flurry of platitudes in the SAC presidential election has detracted from yet another vote slated to appear on the same ballot tomorrow.

A campus centre referendum will ask whether U of T students would support a $15 levy to raise funds for the much belated project.

Students now pay $12 each year for SAC fees, one of the lowest student union levies in the country. The campus centre levy would be additional.

The student fee for the project would hopefully be supplemented by private donations if approved at the polls Tuesday.

The five million dollar campus centre was conceived three years ago, but ran into rocky ground when the Board of Governors refused to grant a campus monopoly to the Bank of Montreal which offered significant financial support for the centre.

Since then government funds previously available have dried up. Tomorrow's referendum is the result of a report by SAC presidential hopeful Wayne Richardson (IV APSC) calling for the combination student levy and private financing.

SAC president Gesta (Gus) Abols originally proposed the student levy and referendum himself at an SAC meeting January 21, but voted against the proposal when Richardson presented his complete report two weeks later.

Plans see the campus centre providing cafeteria services for the west side of the campus, along with offices for student and faculty groups, recreational facilities and common rooms.

There will be two questions on tomorrow's ballot. The first asks if the SAC should continue with its campus centre plans. The second concerns the student levy.

Simcoe Hall exonerated

Mr. E. A. Prichard, the Superintendent of the Physical Plant on the St. George Campus, emphatically denied last night that the stink on the main field was coming from Simcoe Hall.

"We were wondering if it were coming from the Medical Science Building," he said.

"I wouldn't be surprised by that at all," commented Chris Ibe, a first year Meds student. "We do all sorts of weird things inside that building. I'm amazed no one noticed it earlier."

The small which has been particularly acrid in the last few weeks seems to hover over the main field in front of University College, and across from Simcoe Hall.

Its source remains a mystery. "We certainly haven't fertilized the field this year,"

"And I don't think it is coming from the main smokes-tack."

A spokesman for Pollution Probe noted that it could not be from the main smokes-tack since the wind blew the smoke away from that field over towards the astronomical telescope on the MacLennan Labs.

Prichard declared that the authorities were looking into the stink and expected to come up with results shortly. For the moment the source of the smell hanging over that part of the university remains unknown.

"Bullshit, plain bullshit," exclaimed leading campus radical Bob James when asked to comment. James linked the smell ideologically to the threat of American Imperialism in the university.

THE POINT ISN'T THE POINT, IT'S THE PROCESS!

What's the point?

We are trained to look obsessively and automatically for "the point" (c.f. "the facts ma'm, just the facts."), the objectional effect of this being that we are simultaneously being trained to ignore the process.

It's not working. In fact it is killing us.

Physically. Mentally. Spiritually. "Take a day! And walk around! Watch the Nazis! Run your town! Then go home! And check yourself! You think that it's always someone else!" (from "plastic people" by Zappa, M.O.I.)

We must change within the next few years (preferably months) the basic structures through which we administer our social environment. At present the administrative structures are inadvertently spastic-elitist-repressive and utterly ritualistic in both structure and behaviour. Above all, they are traditionally incapable of responding in a meaningful or creative way to the human situation.

The first thing to emphasize and repeat is, that we are talking about structures not people. The aim being to free and preserve people, ALL people, and destructure, restructure (or smash, if you like) the repressive, exploitive, and generally mindless traditional power structures and to involve all kinds of people of all ages at an ever-increasing rate of ever-decreasing frustration to all majorities and minorities. Everyone is the "elected representative" of a minority of at least one.

Impossible? Impracticable? Am I ignoring the law of social Darwinism, and the economics of Malthus? ("Survival of the fittest" and "There isn't enough for all," respectively.) No, I just started to understand Bucky Fuller. (Utopia, by doing more with less via synergy and dynamaxion automation and environmental design revolution. Or, Oblivion, by continuing our somnambulist conventions as they are.) The effect then, of the present training structure pompously called "Education" is to make you ignore the process and above all to accept things as they are. Secondary effects are hardly better. They are to train you to:

1. Sit; the training of burocrates, rather than doing.
2. Endure the numbing tension of, and thus become calloused to, square buildings and square rooms. Squares and cubes do not occur in nature and as structures have no integrity. They collapse without lateral support. Hexagons are only one of many alternatives that are far more natural and efficient.
3. Listen. What more can I say? "Listen or get out!"
4. Memorise trivia, labels, and facts.
5. Specialise; arrange facts.
6. Accept authority. Rather than generate insight.
7. Ignore your own thoughts. (see above)
8. Ignore the thoughts of fellow students. (see 6.)
9. Ignore those without authority, power, or influence (i.e. anyone who isn't setting the exam.)

It is worth stressing that all this is secondary to the fundamental purpose of this training, being to train you to accept this method and structure without question. i.e. "trouble-makers, meddlers, agitators etc." don't pass. "get ahead", sit on committees (!!!), etc. etc. ad nauseam.

You might say things kinda fucked up. "Teaching as a Subversive Activity" by Postman and Weingartner is right on, and reading their stuff can be better than not. Then a bit of Laing (Politics of the Family) and Fuller, (Utopia or Oblivion) and you may never be the same again, thank God!!!

MORE THAN JUST WORDS

A happy group of Varsity Blues gather around the Queen's Cup held by captain Brian St. John following their 7-4 victory over Waterloo. The cup must feel right at home by now as this is the thirty-second time that the scene has been repeated since 1903.

their semi-final victory over Ottawa. As Watt said, "Crosby is so big and strong is usually takes two players to clear him from in front of our goal."

Also, Laidlaw had his effectiveness reduced when he twisted an ankle in the second period.

Wright was cut for a few stitches when he was unceremoniously wrestled to the ice by a Warrior defenseman in the middle period.

PENALTIES RAMPANT

Varsity players were nabbed for 11 minor penalties to only four for the Warriors.

Grant Cole in the Blues' goal stopped 32 Warrior shots while Blues fired 34 at Scott.

Wright and St. John emerged as Blues leading scorers in the two weekend games. Wright had four goals and three assists while St. John had three goals and four assists. Bubba was next as he put in two goals in each game and added two assists.

Varsity winger Mike Boland was the hard-luck player of the playoffs. "Bookie" hit more posts and missed more close chances than most players do in a season.

Perhaps one of the Waterloo fans, a pleasant looking girl with long blond hair, summed it up best as she talked quietly to her boy friend after the game.

"I just get so discouraged," she said. "After tonight I really begin to wonder if we'll ever beat Blues. You know, its sort of a vicious circle. We need confidence to beat them."

"I just get so discouraged," she said. "After tonight I really begin to wonder if we'll ever beat Blues. You know, its sort of a vicious circle. We need confidence to beat them and yet we can't get that confidence until we beat them! And besides, they're just so big... so smooth... so strong... so EVERYTHING!"

And that just about says it all.

York Yeoman also make PEI playoffs

As of latest report, four of the five representatives to the Charlottetown CIAU hockey championships have been decided.

Down east, the St. Mary's Huskies, who finished first in the Atlantic Intercollegiate AA, defeated the St. Francis Xavier X-Men 6-5 in their playoff final.

There will be two Toronto universities represented at PEI. The York Yeomen decided that when they downed the Laurentian Voyageurs 8-2 Saturday night to take the Ontario Intercollegiate AA title.

Out west, it will be the perennial western champs the U of Alberta Bears once again. The Bears downed the U of Calgary Dinosaurs 3-2 and 3-1 to take the best of three final in straight games.

The Ottawa-St. Lawrence AA is the only league still to be decided. It will be the Loyola Warriors and the Sir George Williams Georgians in that final.

You Can MAKE SAC WORK

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy are running for President and Vice President of SAC because they are deeply concerned about the lack of true community at the University of Toronto.

They see evidence of this lack of community almost every day as they attend classes... they see it in class-room structures that mitigate against real learning. They see it in the comments of alienated students and in profs who get turned off because their students are turned off.

Richardson and McEvoy are convinced that something can be done about these situations. They think that CUG provided a definition of a structure which would go a long way towards breaking down many of the arbitrary divisions which are working against real learning in the classroom today. They are convinced that the concept of community articulated by that report is perhaps the best way of developing really relevant education at this university.

Richardson and McEvoy are determined to transform SAC into the kind of strong and united student organization that can work effectively for the development of such a university community.

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy realize perhaps better than anyone else running in this election the problems that are preventing SAC from being such an organization now.

They know that it makes irresponsible political commitments that tend to divide rather than unite the campus.

KEN McEVoy

They know that it was torn by internal factionalism this year. They know that it doesn't communicate enough with the student body.

And they are determined to do something to remedy the problems... by avoiding irresponsible political commitments, by listening to ideas wherever they come from, and most of all by building communication links between SAC and the student body.

Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy want to transform SAC into the kind of student organization that will be able to build the spirit of trust and co-operation among all members of the university that must evolve if true community in the university is ever to exist here.

They need your vote to do it.

Blues bludgeon Carabins 11-0 to win OQAA semi final

By JIM COWAN

The U of T Blues and Waterloo Warriors set the stage for Saturday's OQAA hockey final Friday night as they won their respective, if not respectable, games against teams from the universities of Montreal and Ottawa.

Blues had little trouble downing the U of M Carabins 11-0 in the first game of the evening, but Waterloo ran into some stiff opposition from the Ottawa Gee-Gee's before winning 7-3 in the nightcap.

It was a tough game in more than one way for the Warriors: they lost star forward Cam Crosby in the first minute of play when he collided with an Ottawa player at his own blue-line. The injury was diagnosed as a broken leg, and he was taken to hospital for X-rays. (They don't shoot hockey players, do they?)

A few minutes later another collision cost Waterloo a goal, as allstar defenseman Ian McKegney and teammate Savo Vujovic nailed each other at centre ice. As the two tried to get untangled, Bob Aube, Ottawa's leading scorer this season, picked up the loose puck and skated in to beat goalie Ian Scott.

It took Warriors all of three minutes to even the score. At 8:36 Rick Bacon took a pass from Peter Paleczney and beat Gee-Gee's Jacques Audy with a hard shot on the goalies' glove side. Waterloo took the lead at 16:25 when Roger Kropf beat Audy for Warriors second goal.

DISASTER STRIKES

Ottawa's Bob Fawcett tied the score at the 1:20 mark of the second, but that was it for Gee-Gee's in what turned out to be a disastrous period. At 5:27 Greg Sephton gave Warriors the lead again, and at 13:36 Dave Rudge scored the winning goal. Audy was caught out of his net, dived back in time to make the first save but couldn't prevent Rudge from putting his second shot into the net.

The 2-1 edge Waterloo held in goals in the second period was in no way indicative of the way the two teams played. Ottawa seemed to completely fall apart after Sephton's goal, and they didn't manage to get regrouped until very near the end of the period. Ottawa lost the game in the middle stanza, and only Audy's great work kept the score respectable.

Gee-Gee's carried the rally into the third period and drew within one goal when Gaetan Secours scored at 3:54. But two goals by Ken Laidlaw finally put the game out of reach, and Rick Maloney added another at 13:47 just to make sure.

Ottawa finished in first place this season after a last-place finish in the OQAA east-ern division in 1968-69. Netminder Audy showed why he was chosen for the first allstar team in the east this year and the Ottawa defense turned in a creditable showing for most of the game. Up front, however, the only line which posed any real threat was that of Bob and Bert Aube and Bob Arnott.

Warriors, with a somewhat better balance of talent, had to go all out to win, and took the game by making better use of their chances around the net.

FIRST SHUTOUT

It was an infinitely more entertaining contest than Blues romp over the hapless Carabins: the only real question in that one was whether or not goalie Grant Cole could hang on to his first shutout of the season. Some good goal tending and at least one friendly goal post insured that he did.

Blues won the game at 1:42 of the first period as Bill Buba scored his first of two goals, taking a pass from John Wright and putting the puck under a sliding Luc St. Jean. Mike Boland started the play with a clearing pass to Wright.

Then Terry Peterman went

These three goals in the second period Friday night removed any doubt about who would win the first semi-final tilt. Above, Blues Len Burman (15) and Terry Peterman (10) signal Brian St. John's marker as goalie Luc St. Jean looks over his shoulder for the puck. Carabin's Carol Bellemarre (11), Robert Denis (4) and Gregoire Dodier (16) are the unwilling observers. Below, Dave Field (foreground) circles away after scoring Blues' sixth goal while Nick Holmes (left) and Bob McGuinn salute. St. Jean looks disgusted and Andre Larouche blocks out Paul Laurent, just a little late. Bottom left, John Wright disengages himself from Pierre Paiment's stick after scoring Varsity's seventh goal. Bob McGuinn (16) confirms what everyone already knew as Jacques Dube (18) and Bellemarre move in to comfort St. Jean.

photos by spencer huggins to work on a hat trick that even the purists couldn't fault, scoring back-to-back-to-back goals at 7:11, 12:29 and 16:57. The first was unassisted; Brian St. John helped out on the other two.

Peterman and his captain again combined at 6:43 of the second as St. John picked up his first goal of the night to put Blues ahead 5-0. Len Burman also assisted on the goal. St. John scored again at 9:30 of the third period, assisted by two else?) Terry Peterman.

Blues' other three-goal scorer was John Wright, who scored one in the second and two in the third. His last marker at 12:42 was an excellent example of teamwork on the Boland-Wright-Buha line.

Boland fired the puck into the corner then raced in to throw a pass out to Buba, standing 30 feet in front of Carabins' replacement goalie Bertrand Trudel. Buba's shot was knocked down, but Wright pounced on the loose puck and lifted a shot past the Montreal netminder.

BLUENOTES: Only one penalty was called in the Montreal-Toronto game. Varsity's Bob Hamilton was fingered for roughing in the second period. . . shots on goal were either 58-15, 62-15 or 62-20, depending on who was doing the adding. . . suffice it to say that Blues badly outshot Carabins. . . shots in the second game were relatively close, 36-29 with the edge to Waterloo. . .

Varsity wins Queen's Cup - - - again!

By LYNDON LITTLE

As the final seconds ticked away in Saturday night's OQAA hockey final the scoreclock at Varsity Arena read, "Visitors 7- Home 4"!

Now wait a minute! Don't get all upset — Blues did win.

Because the playoffs are supposed to be on neutral ground Blues opposition in the final, the Waterloo Warriors, were designated as the "home team". Blues, wearing their white away uniforms, won a thrilling "road victory" before a packed house to walk off with their fifth straight Queen's Cup.

It was also Varsity's thirty-second OQAA championship since competition was inaugurated in 1903.

It was Blues second consecutive clutch victory over the Warriors in the last two weeks. After being held to two ties in their first games, Blues came up with a key 9-6 win Feb. 20 to clinch first place and now the triumph in the playoff final.

"DOWN EAST" NEXT

Blues now pack their bags for Charlottetown, PEI for the national finals this weekend. They are scheduled to depart Wednesday.

Saturday's game lends itself to an easy analysis. Blues jumped into an early four goal lead, Waterloo had to play catch-up hockey and couldn't quite make it.

Rookie rightwinger Nick Holmes opened the scoring after only 50 seconds of play. Paul Laurent, closing out his illustrious Varsity career, swept into the Waterloo end, pulled the Warrior defense over to the left side then passed to Holmes who was unguarded in front of the Waterloo net.

Another of Blues' fine first year players, Bill Buba, came back just a minute later to put Blues two ahead. Buba stole the puck at center ice, broke in on his left wing and beat Ian Scott in the Warrior goal with a quick shot from a sharp angle.

WRIGHT PROLIFIC

Goals by John Wright, his fourth of the weekend and his eleventh in his last four games, and Len Burman gave Blues their four goal cushion by the 15 mark of the first period.

The Warriors then did what they have been doing all season in their matches with Blues. They came right back when it looked like they were out of the game.

Before the first period was over, two quick goals, one by Bob Reade and the other by defenseman Savo Vujovic and Waterloo was right back in the game.

If there was any turning point it came in the first few minutes of the second.

Blues Dave Field had taken a penalty at the 19:15 mark of the first and then Mike Boland was fingered for a tripping violation just as the period ended.

Leftwinger Len Burman circles behind Waterloo net after jabbing in Varsity's third goal in Blues' 7-4 Queen's Cup victory over the Warriors Saturday night at Varsity Arena. Captain Brian St. John, who set up the score with a perfect pass, watches the action from the corner.

Blues were forced to play two men short for the first minute and 15 seconds of the middle stanza.

At one point in that frantic 75 seconds, Warriors most dangerous marksmen, Ken Laidlaw, was set up right in front of Blues' goal with half the net to shoot at. All the Waterloo fans rose to cheer what looked like a sure goal but the puck somehow went over the Varsity net.

After the Warriors failed to capitalize on their two-man advantage the momentum swung back to Blues.

THE ST. JOHN SHIFT

Just a few minutes later, Brian St. John took a pass at centre ice from defenseman Bob Hamilton. The Varsity captain put a beautiful shift on the Warriors' defense and broke in all alone on Scott.

St. John's hard shot from about 30 feet found its way through Scott's legs.

That's what being a captain is all about," coach Tom Watt said later, "leadership and a big goal."

Buba's second goal of the game and one by Bob McGuinn completed the Varsity scoring. Dave Rudge and Rick Maloney picked up the other Waterloo goals.

Warriors undoubtedly missed the services of Cam Crosby, their muscular leftwinger who broke his leg in Swim Blues splash to fifth straight national title

Two Canadian and nine CIAU records fell as the University of Toronto Swim Team captured their fifth consecutive national title in Montreal last weekend.

The most powerful team ever assembled in Toronto took an early lead on Friday evening and came back to double the margin on Saturday. The final score left Toronto well ahead of the University of Alberta 370-239. McGill finished a close third with 229 points.

Theo Van Ryn started the action by successfully defending his title in the 50 Freestyle (for the fourth time). This year the 50 was a tribute to a retiring Champion. Two winning relay legs and a third place finish in the 100 free made the meet a total success for Theo.

Jim Shaw, who had a poor meet last weekend, followed the example of the "old veteran" in the 200 Backstroke by defeating his rival John Hawes (McGill) and by setting a Canadian Record in the process. Terry Bryon came through with second place finishes in the 200 Free.

The highlight of Friday evening was the 400 Free Relay. The only competition in this race across the country is between Toronto and McGill. McGill swimmers were anxious to win, but had to settle for second place as they forced the quartet of John Twobig, Doug MacIntosh Jim Adams, and Theo Van Ryn under the Canadian record.

Toronto continued the domination by making a clean sweep of the sprint events on Saturday afternoon. Bob Heatley broke the CIAU record in the 100 Fly. Jim Adams won the 100 Free by a judges decision. Jim Shaw set a new record in the 100 Back and Ross Ballantyne and Barry Bowerman made a 1-2 finish in the 100 Breast.

was an obvious success winning by over a pool length

The most important outcome of the meet was the selection of the team to represent Canada at the World

Student Games in Italy this summer. If Canada sends a team, eight Toronto swimmers will be considered. Theo Van Ryn, Jim Adams, Mike Guinness, Terry Bryon, Bob Heatley, Jim Shaw, Ross Ballantyne, and Barry Bowerman are among the sixteen Canadian College swimmers who will be considered.

Hurd nudges Richardson by 293 votes

By DAVID FRANK

SAC vice-president Bob Barkwell played the piano in University College's West Hall last night.

Radio Varsity's Pat Dymond fooled around with the piano.

Mark Golden, who was running for SAC vice-president, also took his turn at the piano while the election returns trickled in last night.

And when it was all over Scarborough College's Rod Hurd was the new SAC president.

And his running-mate, Eric Miglin, had clinched the vice-presidential spot.

Barkwell sat down at the piano as the final totals were posted and played Solidarity Forever. The crowd joined in.

Hurd piled up a total of 2612 votes, keeping his chief opponent, Wayne Richardson (IV APSC) at a safe 200 to 300 vote distance most of the evening. He defeated Richardson by a 293-vote margin.

Trailing far behind were Benjamin McNally (III UC) with 475 votes, Bernard Teitelbaum (III UC) with 395 votes, and Joan Campana (I UC) with 265 votes.

The overwhelming push for Hurd's victory came from the two suburban campuses.

Scarborough, where he is student council president gave him 974 votes, while casting 46 votes for Teitelbaum, 39 votes for Richardson, 24 for Miss Campana and 11 for McNally. The Erindale campus gave Hurd 182 votes out of the 270 cast.

On the main campus Hurd led by small margins at five polls and garnered 124 votes in Dentistry against Richardson's 51.

The Richardson-McEvoy team led at the remaining 15 polling stations, and on the main campus alone held a 700-vote margin over Hurd.

But despite significant majorities in Engineering and most of the arts colleges, Richardson was unable to build up enough of a lead to cushion the impact of the Scarborough votes.

In the vice-presidential race it looked for a long time as if another split ticket was in the making for 1970-71.

SAC president Gus Abols, who has had a running battle with his vice-president since last year's election, was saying that he really couldn't see too much difference between Hurd and Victoria College's Ken McEvoy and thought they would be able to get along.

But at the last minute Miglin managed to pull ahead of McEvoy on the strength of the results from his home engineering faculty and prevented the possibility of another split ticket. Miglin tallied 2588 votes, while McEvoy received 2447.

The other two vice-presidential candidates lagged behind with 634 votes for McNally's mate, Mark Golden (IV UC), and 266 votes for Ken Wolfson (I New), running with Miss Campana on a Socialist ticket.

Teitelbaum got less than 50 votes at each poll, including Scarborough where he placed second to Hurd.

McNally and Golden did best at University College, where they were second to Richardson and McEvoy.

The socialist ticket did best at Scarborough where Wolfson was able to poll 63 votes.

Spiro Agnew got one write-in vote.

Parity committee set up, Poli Ec postpones boycott

By LAURA KELLY

The Political Economy Course Union meeting Monday accepted department chairman W. T. Easterbrook's and associate chairman, J. E. Smith's personal commitment to gather support for a parity investigating committee, and thereby withdrew the threat of mass boycott of classes.

A student coordinating committee, previously appointed by the course union, earlier in the day presented the department chairmen with the demand for "an appropriate negotiation structure as suggested by CUG."

"What Easterbrook and Smith agreed to was a meeting on March 19, by which time they hope to amass faculty support for a parity negotiation committee," said Peter Hall, the course union president.

The demand for a CUG-like structure was sparked by the appointment of the new department chairman, Stephan Dupre, which was made without any consultation of students.

Agreement to the non-boycott was made only after full discussion of the alternatives.

"Do we want to get into a fairly militant fight now, at the end of February, or set up a situation for a fight in October?" asked Andy Wernick, a member of the coordinating committee.

A few students were worried about accepting a negotiating committee which would examine the structure of the department, while Dupre's appointment would slip into legitimacy.

"Dupre is an insult to the students because of his stand on student participation," said Wernick.

"The negotiating committee is going to be able to consider Dupre's appointment, and if they decide it is wrong then legally there is no way they can force him to resign, but politically they will force his resignation," said Steve Langdon, also a member of the coordinating committee.

"The best idea is to get as many people as possible to the faculty meeting on March 19, and be sure that the parity negotiating committee does come through. Otherwise, we'll scream bad faith," said Langdon.

The meeting also voted to direct the course union steering committee to inform Dupre that until the meeting of the negotiating committee, his appointment would be considered temporary.

"We should keep the issue alive by going to Dupre or Dean Allen and protesting the appointment," said Peter Hall.

The course union will choose its negotiating committee representatives, who are to report back to the students, at a general meeting Friday.

Campus Centre ok'd in referendum

U of T students voted in yesterday's referendum overwhelmingly in favour of having a campus centre and a lot less enthusiastically in favour of paying for it out of their own pockets.

The first question on the ballot, asking whether SAC should continue plans for a campus centre, got 4803 yes answers and 981 noes.

The second question, which proposed a levy of $15 a year per student for the next 20 years to pay for a centre, got a yes from 3419 students and noes from 2360 students.

Varsity Fund mounts campaign

Between now and the middle of April, 75,000 alumni of this fine institution are going to be telephoned by Varsity Fund volunteers asking for donations.

W. E. Lewis is chairman of the telethon that claims to be the largest of its type in the civilized world. There are two larger ones in the United States.

According to Tom Daly, assistant director of the Department of Development, 25 per cent of graduates donate to the fund. There are 110,000 registered members of the Alumni Association.

Last year donations totalled $500,000 an average of $15 a contributor. The fund gives grants to everything from the Centre of Criminology to Pollution Probe. Scholarships and grants are also given to students with financial needs.

People who graduated as far back as 1918 will be up against the wall as 4,000 volunteers man the telephones for the month long campaign, which promises to be as exciting as the recent one for SAC. One of the volunteers commented that she hoped that the outcome would be better than the other campaign. There is even some discussion that in the near future the fund will start approaching undergraduates for contributions. Watch out gang.

"Fuck! And you can quote me on that!"
 —Art McIlwain after last night's election results were announced.

Sketch
 Varsity

Hurd: "It's easy once you know how, Eric."

It's not how you play the game, it's whether . . .

Apparently there was an election yesterday. At least one quarter of U of T students thought so, because they voted, and the majority voted for Rod Hurd and Eric Miglin as SAC's new President and Vice President.

The campaign and the election happened without causing much of a ripple on the apolitical surface of the U of T millpond. The issues remained submerged throughout. The most 'progressive' candidates were Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy, but their campaign suffered from the same political indecisiveness as John Oldham's unsuccessful fling last year. Oldham's defeat last year could be explained away as a backlash against the radicalism of the Langdon year. But Richardson and McEvoy did not bill themselves as radicals, and they did not bring out the issues.

Instead they produced a similar slate of rhetoric to that of the Hurd-Miglin team. They chose Engineering Society President Art McIlwain as their campaign manager, and he produced a raft of Madison-Avenue styled publicity that played upon the usual cliches of 'communication' and 'relevance'.

While the Richardson-McEvoy team agonized over whether to talk about issues or to sell themselves as a pluralistic package, the Hurd-Miglin team were playing the games of electoral manipulation, which assured their victory. The politics of opportunism were the rules of the election, because nothing else was allowed to get in the way.

The Hurd-Miglin strategy was quite clear. They were not responsible for the major tactic — SAC President Gus Abols' chose Hurd for the role of heir apparent. SAC Communications Commissioner Jon Levin considered running, but Abols would not give him support. Abols realized that Levin was just a bit too right-wing and did not have the base to carry the election. Hurd, on the other hand, presented a more respectable image and had the important base at Scarborough.

The landslide of votes at Scarborough proved the tactic paid off.

The next important step was to select Miglin as Hurd's running mate. By choosing Miglin — an engineer — the campaign managers split the engineering vote, which was Richardson's base.

The politics of the actual campaign were dead easy:

- sherry parties, the modern-day version of bread and circuses;
- painting Richardson-McEvoy slightly pink, but not with the tasteless brutality employed by Bernie Teitelbaum;
- marking the opposition as the "established" candidates and announcing time-for-a-change.

The red-baiting was totally unprincipled. For example, Hurd visited classrooms and told student SAC gave $150 to the Black Panthers at last week's meeting. He used the action as a direct indictment of Richardson and McEvoy. The words "Black Panthers" were enough of a scare.

In fact, the money was not just a direct contribution to the Panthers. It was a grant to an Afro-American group who wanted to stage a rally at U of T and invite Panthers as speakers. Considering the ignorance on this campus about the Panthers, who are presently being exterminated by U.S. cops, the grant will serve a useful educational function, a function that North America's news media are not performing.

Associating Richardson and McEvoy with Black Panthers is a McCarthyite tactic reserved for the dirtiest political campaigns, where it is opportune to play upon people's ignorance.

When Hurd and Miglin billed the Richardson-McEvoy team as more-of-the-same, they were not quite correct, considering that Hurd and Miglin are almost direct appointees of Gus Abols, this year's SAC President.

However, the result is not very important, even in the context of SAC. The most crucial election for SAC is that of the general members and the executive. That election will determine the politics of the council.

we're just doing it for your own good, boy

The article in The Varsity of March 2, reporting the seizure of copies of the Innis Herald by the Registrar of Innis College on February 27, is inaccurate in conveying the impression that the so-called act of censure is still in force. What happened was this. A copy of the latest edition of the Herald was handed to Mr. King by one of the secretaries at approximately 11:00 a.m. on Friday, shortly after copies had been delivered to the Innis College II building by the editor. On reading the Herald's report of the College Council meeting of February 11, Mr. King concluded certain members of Council had been quoted accurately new college workers forbidden to loiter

NOTICE

EMPLOYEES OF BEAVER FOOD SERVICE ARE REQUESTED TO LEAVE THE BUILDING AS SOON AS THE SHIFT IS OVER. DO NOT LOITER IN THE SNACK BARS OR LADIES REST ROOMS, NOR RETURN AT A LATER TIME.

EMPLOYEES ARE NOT ENTITLED TO ATTEND ANY DANCES, OR, SIMILAR FUNCTIONS IN NEW COLLEGE.

VISIT TO THE PREMISES ON DAYS OFF SHOULD BE ONLY FOR BUSINESS PURPOSES PERTAINING TO THE OFFICE.

Beaver Food Service Ass. Ltd.

This notice is posted in the kitchen and workers' washroom at New College. The signature is that of the Beaver Food Service manager. Students who have found that workers are unfriendly may not realize that New College supervisors instruct workers not to talk to students. As this notice shows, workers are also forbidden to come into further contact with students. Supervisors are usually hovering in the background — try talking to the workers at the U.C. Refectory when the supervisor is watching.

The university is private property — owned by the Board of Governors — which is why employees can be accused of trespassing. But this is a regulation that the university and not Beaver has the power to enforce. The university enforces it only when it but out of context. Not being convinced that the editor was aware of this and of the possible implications for the persons involved, he arranged in what he believed to be the editor's interest to have the copies placed in his office until he could discuss the matter with Mr. Pushchak. At 1:00 p.m. Mr. Pushchak came to Mr. King's office where the latter raised his questions. The interview concluded with Mr. King stating clearly and unequivocally that the question of whether the copies should or should not be distributed was now up to Mr. Pushchak. The fact that Mr. King made this statement on Friday after-serves its interests. The administration does not prevent the manager from "loitering" on university premises. In fact, businessmen used New College for a banquet last Wednesday.

It is important for the catering company and the university to keep workers and students apart. If students became friendly to workers and found out what it is like to work on campus, they might support workers should they try to improve their work conditions. Students might find workers becoming sympathetic to issues concerning students.

arab propaganda

Your piece of bullshit concerning the Middle East in Monday's Varsity is typical Arab propaganda — and nothing more.

Pity the poor, peace-loving Arabs. No, they never throw bombs into Israeli supermarkets or blow up civil aircraft or mine roads. And never did they threaten to drive Israel into the sea. And no, the Jews are not from Palestine according to you — we're from the land of Oz.

Seriously, Varsity, stick to your very fine exposes of American domination of Canada, the university issues, and internal Canadian affairs — and keep your fucking noses out of the Middle East. The Mideast war is solely up to us (Jews) and the Arabs to solve — without any outside advice.

May I be allowed the courtesy of your columns to correct a few false impressions which may have been left by a sentence on page Review 7 of The Varsity for Feb. 27th. It reads: "The French department, concentrating on Parisienne French for studying the classics, offers a single third-year course in "French-Canadian Literature"."

Firstly, if by the "classics" is meant the literature of the classical age, I should inform you that it is henceforth possible to graduate in French without studying this period at all.

Secondly, despite the charms of the Parisienne, her French is placed on the same level in the classroom as that of the educated Parisien or Tourangeau or Quebecois.

Lastly, the calendar clearly states that a course similar to the third-year course you mention is offered in the second year of the New Programme and that part of FRE 142 is also devoted to French-Canadian literature.

Next year the French dept. will be offering, besides FRE 142, three other courses — FRE 330 which covers the major works of French-Canadian literature up to the present day; FRE 433 Roman et societe quebecoise 1918-1965; and FRE 434 Prosateurs canadiens-francais contemporains. It is thus possible for a student to study French-Canadian literature in each of his four years. You may also be glad to know that another course will be offered if there is sufficient demand, and that, with its usual sensitivity to students' preferences, the French dept. is presently taking positive steps to assess that demand accurately.

You and your readers will doubtless be relieved to discover that the French dept. is endeavouring to rescue the study of French-Canadian literature from its traditional neglect.

americans 'n stuff

I have seldom seen such a wildly inaccurate article as Harriet Kideckel's about the number of Canadian courses in political science. May I suggest that a reporter (and a newspaper) might at least get the facts straight?

The number of courses in political science incorporating Canadian subject matter and available this year amounts to 12 out of 41 offered, not 3 out of 52 as your story indicates.

If we had any more Canadian courses, we would probably be accused of being Canadian chauvinist pigs.

Poul Fox,
Professor of Political Science.

The New Brunswick establishment has succeeded in expelling the American Professor Norman Strax. The British Columbia establishment appears to have suppressed the attempt to put a social science department at Simon Fraser in the service of the people: some of the professors fired there were American too, and quite likely some will now leave Canada. All the way from Ottawa I can hear the cheers of Robin Matthews. But to Danny Drache, Mel Watkins, and anyone else who really wants to liberate Canada, let me suggest this: The task has enough in common with that of liberating the US that you would find Strax and the Simon Fraser professors better allies than the Matthews-style protectionists.

A coincidental (?) case of double corruption

The following two letters were sent to Cliff Jenkins, Chief Returning Officer of SAC. The first letter that follows was written by a member of the Hurd Miglin campaign. The one after it was written later by a supporter of the Mellwoin McEvoy team (ed.)

Dear Mr. Jenkins:

I am writing to you as Chief Returning Officer for the 1970 SAC Presidential election.

Several matters have come to my attention in regard to the election campaign run on behalf of Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy, which I feel should be investigated in the light of the SAC Election Rules and the possible disqualification of any candidates who contravene them.

As regards rules 10 and 7, pamphlets on the Campus Center, containing favourable mention of Mr. Richardson, and signs placed up in the Engineering Buildings, stating "An Engineer is Running for SAC President," have both been widely distributed today, Election Day, and are, I contend, clear contraventions of the above mentioned rules.

Not only do the pamphlets and signs constitute campaigning on Election Day, in my opinion, but the money spent on producing them, when included with the rest of the campaign expenditures, should place Richardson and McEvoy well-above the $300 limit allowable.

I trust that the above matters will receive your careful and impartial consideration.

Yours very truly,
John Crossingham

Dear Mr. Jenkins,

I am writing to you as Chief Returning Officer for the 1970 SAC Presidential election.

An abhorrent and disgusting matter has come to my attention in regard to the specious election campaign run by Messrs. Rod Hurd and Eric Miglin, which I feel should be investigated in light of the SAC Election Rules and the possible disqualification of any candidates who contravene them.

As regards rules 10 and 7, a sheet urging students to vote for the aforementioned Hurd, under the signature of the Scarborough College Students' Society, dated today, has been widely circulated today, and is, I contend, clear contraventions not only of the SAC Election Rules, but of every known form of civilized behaviour.

Not only do the pamphlets constitute campaigning on Election Day, in my humble opinion, but the money spent on producing them, when included with the rest of the campaign expenditures, should, in my considered opinion, place said Hurd and Miglin way above the $300 limit allowable.

I trust that the above matters will receive your careful and impartial consideration.

Struggle,

McNALLY - GOLDEN

TEITELBAUM

By TOM WALKOM

Bernie Teitelbaum, the man with the confident campaign, conceded his defeat in the SAC presidential campaign early last night.

"It was the pink sheet," that killed me, said Teitelbaum, who was not referring to The Varsity. The pink sheet was a Teitelbaum campaign poster reading "Varsity supports pink-koes."

"The poster wasn't intended for student consumption," he said, "it was just to be put across the street from the Varsity office and in the Engineering building."

Teitelbaum authorized the pink posters in angry response to what he considered unfair coverage by The Varsity.

"They tried to kill me and did a good job; they made me into a reactionary. But when people talk to me they see me as the moderate liberal that I am."

THREE-WAY COALITION

He sees himself as the victim of powerful campus forces — SAC members, The Varsity and the college newspapers.

One of his favourite stories tells of the opposition his workers ran into from a night watchman as they were pasting up posters.

"This watchman was telling them to get out, and kicking them — and Mo — he's been a street fighter since he was six, and Neil takes karate — they could have killed him if they wanted to."

"Then a little later," we came back and (Wayne) Richardson and (Ken) McEvoy and Ceta (Ramkhalawansingh Chairman of the SAC Elections Committee) were putting up posters with the night watchman and U of T police there."

"But I'm not bitter," he said, referring to The Varsity-SAC-police-janitor coalition. "I've shown those guys that 400 people believe what I say."

BUYS PIPE

Teitelbaum is an enigma. Image-conscious, he claims elections can be won by advertising alone. "Just look pretty — that's what I bought a pipe for."

HURD - MIGLIN

By LAURA KELLY

Among the nervous pacers and quiet watchers in the jumbled crowd at UC's West Hall last night, Eric Miglin seemed the least relaxed and talkative.

"No predictions. I'm just nervous like anyone else would be," said the vice-presidential candidate.

Rod Hurd, running for president with Miglin, was spending the evening at Scarborough College.

The election was tight, and Miglin wasn't leading. His faculty, Engineering, had yet to report.

When the Scarborough returns showed overwhelming support for Hurd, the Richardson supporters fell into making eulogies on the New Left, but Miglin still didn't brighten. The Engineering returns remained to be counted.

The long, tiring wait between the Scarborough report and the Engineering return ended as the student politicians amassed before the blackboard.

The numbers from Engineering didn't give Richardson his desperately needed landslide, but the vote did reward Eric Miglin with a new position on SAC.

"Congratulations," said Gus Abols, the out-going SAC president.

Quickly the radiant Miglin was surrounded by supporters cheering "We did it."

Later, Jon Levin, speaking for the celebrating Hurd and Miglin, said: "We'd like to thank all the students who voted for us, and we'd like to thank SAC."

"We'll send you a statement on Thursday," he added.

Eric Miglin stands alone waiting for the results last night.

RICHARDSON - McEVOY

By TREVOR SPURR

While presidential candidate Benjamin McNally could find great satisfaction out of the one vote he received from Food Sciences, Wayne Richardson and Ken McEvoy found little solace in their defeat last night.

"It was a nice dream while it lasted," said McEvoy as the returns were counted.

Richardson alternated between expressing amazement at the way the votes were going and pessimism about the final result.

"It's incredible. I thought the people would read what we had to say and see the difference," he said.

The "left-wing" members of SAC were always around the two candidates offering encouragement and predicting the future of SAC if Richardson and McEvoy were to lose.

"There's going to be a lot of good people on this campus who won't bother to run for next year's SAC if Hurd gets elected," said Bob James, this year's Financial Commissioner.

Even before the votes from Scarborough College were counted Richardson expressed his fear they would decide the election and would "break our backs." Hurd, his main opponent, is a member of that college.

"When we were out there if Hurd had said he was going to shoot them and I offered them each a million dollars they still would have clapped and voted for Hurd," he said.

But more than personal disappointment was revealed as he talked to his friends last night.

"There's going to be no communication on SAC next year. Colleges are going to get more dissatisfied and they're going to pull out," he said.

"I hope Hurd and Miglin do a lot of work this summer so they are prepared for next year. Otherwise I'm really worried for this campus," he added.

Richardson declined to wish the winners luck in the next year.

"How can I wish the winners luck when they're going to compromise on everything including CUG and the Campbell Report.

"I can't wish them luck in destroying everything SAC has worked so hard to win in the last few years," he said.

Richardson did wish to thank all those who had supported McEvoy and himself and said the broad support he received on the St. George campus was significant.

Yet he is a political puritan, concerned with waging a fair campaign and angry at what he considers dirty tactics of others.

"I keep a file on everybody; I've got enough to hang everybody, but I didn't use it since I didn't want to confuse people. I think the others appreciated that I was clean."

Teitelbaum, who withdrew from the SAC race last year to throw his support behind Gus Abols had bitter words for Abols last night.

"Miglin was supposed to be my running mate until Gus co-opted him for Hurd," he said "If Eric and I had run, we would have won."

DEATHLY KISS

"I'm the type of guy people think they can play with. I was supposed to be Gus' man after Hurd told him he was the kiss of death — I was supposed to do Gus' little mudslinging but I refused to. I played both sides of the fence; I told Hurd what Richardson was planning and Richardson what Hurd was planning."

Teitelbaum responded to jibes from those in the counting room with what he calls his famous one-liners. A supporter figured that he had polled three votes for every dollar spent, and after all they were ahead of the Young Socialists.

The winner was announced at about 10:30. I asked Bernie if he was going to stand behind Hurd.

"He's the people's choice said Teitelbaum stepping off the chair he had been standing on, "I guess I have to."

Bernard Teitelbaum and pipe

several species of small furry electronic hybrids gathered together in a cave and conspiring against conventions while grooving with a picture should be the title it says here

"Interstellar Overdrive . . . consuming continents. . . Pink Floyd, even the United States army can't stop them. . . "Well I . . . at the time I was very attentively unravelling a meticulously arranged perception of time and space and naturally any tonal suggestion of a situation that was already manifesting apocalypstics like consuming continents would have a somewhat arresting effect. . . to say the least. So I listened.

Needless to say it was "some 'nother music". "Piper At the Gates of Dawn" is the title of their first album. It is an entirely modest description. They are. Myra Mysterious speaks in warm memories of an open air concert they did down in the you-nited states, during which there was what turned out to be a magnificent lightning storm with the natural percussion. Completely soaked they played not so much right through it as right along with it! That's the kind of music they do. Their second album "Saucerful of Secrets" has an epic earthquake dividing the first and second parts.

On his way to Afganistan, Tom was in England and caught one of their concerts. They arranged about a dozen speaker banks around the audience instead of the usual only-on-the-stage. The effect was that they were able to create a very explicit experience of movement that could be recognized by the entire audience.

Combined with their vividly innovative musical constructions is a very literal literary awareness. Meticulously controlled and orchestrated lightning, rain, storm and equally sunlight, open meadows with a slight stirring breeze. . .

"Careful With That Axe, Eugene" is a very gradual whispering event that changes abruptly and drastically to the mortal screams of someone clearly not long for the life we know and love. There is more. And there is "More", although Doug did the review of it before Christmas. "More" is quite. It has some very revealing studies in textural changes in, for example, the abrupt change from the seething, throbbing assault of "The Nile Song", to the serene quiet and verbal cycle of the "Crying Song". Forget the movie but the record is right on.

UMMAGUMMA's front cover photo is NOT what it seems at first glance, or second or third or fourth, yes, and sixth and twelfth and on unto final realization and tentative acceptance. There is also something written on the vase that is really only on the floor. Ummagumma: Live and studio. "Space music by far-out earthlings." Ummagumma: "The whole house was packaged for air-delivery anywhere on earth. It could be erected on site in one day and weighed only 1 per cent of traditional construction.

"This was in 1927, the same year that Le Corbusier, Mies van der Rohe and Walter Gropius were building the Wiessenhoff Siedlung in Stuttgart. Modern architecture emerging in its new orthodox uniform. . . (could this be one of the reasons we are a fascist society? We have adopted the architectural forms that developed in the setting from which fascism emerged.) They were talking about machines for living in and the great new industrialization. But the dymaxion house really was a machine for living in. It was and still is an indictment of modern architecture's technical obsolescence.

"It was followed by his experimental dymaxion car and a brilliant new projection of a world map."

Mere beginnings. Buckminster Fuller and Pink Floyd. Ummagumma. They're really far more epic than I can tell of. Thank you Doug. (Yes, Larry, I am playing with the structures that are so comfortably familiar to you.)

Sir George prosecution sums up

MONTREAL (CUP) — The prosecution in the Sir George Williams affair summed up its arguments in the six-and-a-half-week old trial of ten Trinidad and Tobago students here Tuesday again attempting to link the defendants to a conspiracy in the computer-burning incident February 11, 1969.

Each of the defendants faces five counts of conspiracy arising from the incident which exploded after Montreal riot police charged student-held sections of the SGWU administration building.

Special prosecutor Fred Kaufman told jurors that all they would have to prove is that the defendants "pursued by their acts the same object" to bring in verdicts which could send the ten students to jail for life.

To make its case, Kaufman said, the Crown did not have to prove that "two or more parties came together and agreed."

Kaufman tried to suggest that the setting up of a security committee in areas occupied by Sir George students last February constituted "an agreement to keep people out who had every legal right to enter."

Defence lawyers representing the first group of 87 students charged in connection with the Sir George incident, are expected to commence their final pleas Wednesday.

After completion of defence arguments, presiding Judge Kenneth Mackay will instruct the 11-man jury on deliberation procedures.

The jury must reach separate verdicts on each of the five counts for each of the accused.

Tickets for the Americanization of Canada Teach-In, to be held March 6 and 7, are now on sale in the SAC Office.

Speakers will include Walter Gordon, Former Minister of Finance, Mel Watkins, co-author of the "Waffle Manifesto", Rob-in Mathews, author of "The Struggle for Canadian Universities" and Andrew Brewin, MP.

Tickets will also be sold in the Sydney Smith foyer. Admission: $2.75 (general) and $1.25 (students and unemployed).

The Red White and Black requests donations of French primers for their free French classes. Please drop them off at 44 St. George or call 925-2615.

Jericho's mayor talks about "the story and photos

PART TWO

The Israeli Government's Ministry of Tourism recently sent Varsity Editor Brian Johnson and 12 U.S. college newspaper editors on an all-expense-paid trip to Israel. The following is the second in a series of articles about the trip.

There are one million Arabs in the occupied territories and another million in Israel. Together Arabs constitute nearly one half the population under Israeli rule. But these Palestinian Arabs are second class citizens. They are in poverty and have no political freedom. Most Israelis ignore the needs of these people, since they do not constitute as great a security threat as the surrounding Arab states — particularly Nasser's Egypt.

"The Palestinian question is of no significance to Israel," an Israeli government economist told me. "We can deal with it with both hands tied behind our back."

Furthermore, most Israelis refuse to admit the presence of a Palestinian national entity:

"We had a war with the Arab states and we will negotiate with any of these countries individually or together," the Israeli Minister of Tourism, Mr. Kol, told us. "Why should we have to start negotiating with a third party? If the Palestinians on the West Bank do not support Hussein, we can't change that. There is no room for a third Palestinian state."

While denying the existence of two million Arabs, Kol adds:

"We are prepared to negotiate with the Arab nations. All they have to do is recognize our existence."

The Israeli military government rules the occupied territories with help of Arab mayors in the towns. Most are puppets of the military.

After our official tour ended, four of us stayed an extra day in Jerusalem with three of the other college editors. That evening we rented a car and visited Jericho, a town well inside the occupied zone — right on the present Israel-Jordan border.

We drove down from Jerusalem, down through hills of the Judean Desert. It was dusk and the landscape was barren and grey. As we drove into Jericho we passed several army jeeps and trucks of soldiers in full combat fatigues, complete with helmets and guns. We passed a truck with a Howitzer mounted on the back.

We tried to get to the Allenby Bridge which crosses the Jordan River but were stopped by four Israeli soldiers. They said they weren't allowed to speak with anyone and were afraid of getting caught by the captain. But they told us there had been a lot of fighting there.

"Toujours la guerre, toujours la guerre," said one of them, a young Moroccan Jew.

We went back to the town and tried the same tactic we used in Qalqilya. But the people on the streets and in the cafes would not talk. They told us to speak to the mayor.

The mayor sat playing cards in the lobby of Jericho's main hotel, which he owned. He was a big, fat man who didn't speak English, and he wore a purple fez cap and a moustache and a dark grey suit, and he smoked a tall, brass water-pipe. He looked like a hanger-on the day after a Shriner convention in the lobby of a sordid Miami Beach Hotel.

The walls were painted in a faded pastel pink, and the floor was covered with Persian rugs. A framed photograph of the mayor hung on the wall just a few feet above his head, just beside the water-color of the Jericho skyline.

The four of us sat down at the card table and interviewed Saleh Abdo, the mayor. A friend of his translated for us, as we asked about the "conditions" in Jericho, and how they had changed after the Six Day War.

"Before the war in 1967 we used to have more than 60,000 Palestinian refugees living in Jericho in three camps," the mayor said. "After the war 95 per cent of these refugees left to Jordan."

Jericho lived off agriculture and tourism before the war, he added, but "after the war there were no people left to work on agriculture. There wasn't enough labour. But agriculture becomes better and better because of the Israeli government's efforts."

Jericho had agriculture and tourism. Now only agriculture.

"Tourism is finished," the mayor said. "Before tourists would stay here — we have five or six hotels. But now the Egged bus line brings tourists to see but not even to stop and have a cup of coffee. They take them back to Jerusalem in the buses. So the people doesn't get any profit from this. There are no tourists in this hotel. It has 120 empty rooms."

The night before, in Jerusalem, we had heard Israeli Minister of Tourism offer this excuse:

"When the tourists go to the West Bank they do not want to sleep there. In the night, there is nothing to do there. There was little tourism there in the Jordanian rule. I wanted to develop more tourism in Jericho because there's a wonderful climate there and because of the Christian pilgrimages. But tourists don't like to stay there, and they didn't during the Jordanian period.”

"Which way to Jericho?" asks Brian.

“best town on the West Bank”

Mayor Abdo said he favoured the establishment of two Palestinian states as a solution to the Arab-Israeli War; the people in Qalqiliya wanted one.

Mayor Abdo said the Arabs on the West Bank had the “same life as Israelis” and enjoyed freedom of speech; the people in Qalqiliya said their life-style was determined by poverty and political repression.

We pointed out the discrepancy to the Mayor.

“Did you speak to the Mayor of Qalqiliya or the people?” he asked us.

“The people,” we replied.

“Oh well. The mayor knows everything, not the people. The people know nothing. You should have visited the mayor in Qalqiliya, the mayor in Hebron, the mayor in Nablus . . . Did you visit the mayor of Hebron? He's a good man, he's a strong man — you should visit him.”

“The mayor of Hebron said to the terrorists:

‘Those who want the Arabs to disappear from our houses and cities should support terrorism.’ — Minister Kal.

We asked if the El Fatah was strong in Jericho.

“We don't know them here,” he replied. “Nothing has happened since the war. This is the best town on the Western Bank.”

“He is running this place with an iron hand,” added the translator. “He's a good man. They trust him here, and even the Jordan government trusts him. The mayor is a good friend with the Prime Minister of Jordan in 1967.”

We were puzzled as to why Jericho was so quiet compared to the other towns in the occupied territories — until the Mayor explained that four-fifths of the population fled to Jordan in 1967.

Jericho has not seen the people revolt because there are hardly any people in Jericho.

“And the people who stayed here prefer to settle peacefully,” the mayor added.

He told us that all the employees of his hotel had fled to Jordan. The bar and the reception desk looked conspicuously empty. With the pink walls, the marble-plated pillars, the rugs, the water-pipes, and the Arab costumes, the lobby looked like a phony movie set from Casablanca. — and served as the mayor's council chamber.

“The mayor — he's ruling all this town — everything,” claimed the translator. “And when he's in bad need of money for Jericho and asks the military government for it, the government gives it right away.”

When we asked if the mayor was elected, the group laughed and explained the joke several times in Arabic.

“From the time of the war, no elections,” said the translator. “Mr. Abdo is really the deputy mayor. The mayor fled to Jordan after the war.”

“Mr. Abdo is a rich man,” he added. “He owns the Pasca Bus Company; he owns lands — big landowner — many cinemas, also many properties in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. That's why he's fighting hard for his living. He keeps his hotel open just for survival. He doesn't like to see his hotel closed.”

We left Mayor Abdo to resume his card game, but not before he had invited the four of us to spend the night at his hotel for no charge.

We too had to go back to Jerusalem.

As we left the hotel, we stopped to talk to a few Arabs in a cafe. We told them some of the things the mayor told us and asked them if they were true.

They all looked at us for quite a few seconds. Their eyes told us they wanted to speak out, but they were afraid.

“Whatever the mayor said was right,” one of them answered.

Vic holds half an election for SAC

While the senior SAC executive battle was raging in University College, another election (half an election really) was being waged at Victoria College.

Only five of the 10 executive positions were contested in yesterday's Victoria University Student's Administrative Council elections. The other five positions, including the Presidency and the Vice Presidency were filled by acclamation.

The Vic Council was recently reconstituted to amalgamate the student councils of Victoria and Emmanuel Colleges.

Tim Young is Vic's new President with Paul Hurly as the Vice President. The other acclamations in the VUSAC were Ernie Hobbs in the University Government post, Tammy Shack in Communications and John Ostrander in the Productions Chairman position.

In the election itself the important Finance Commissioner portfolio will be filled by John Sparks, who won easily over Brian Kessler.

Glenda Stark outpaced Kelly Marr for the Internal Affairs job, while Liz Beale squeaked past Jack Basey for the Social Activities slot.

A close three-way race saw Janice Fischer and Barb Staples elected as members-at-large over Karen Eubank.

About 540 Vic people turned out for the election out of a possible 2500. Strand Editor Jim Cowan said last night, "doesn't sound like many people, but a 20 per cent turn out at Vic is pretty good."

A mere 422 pints of blood have been contributed after two days at U of T's bleed-in for the Red Cross.

Engineers lead the race with 297 pints while Music has contributed precisely one pint.

Chief organizer Hans Viergever (III Dents) said, "all faculties have been disappointing but Vic should pull us back. The Red Cross is counting on us for this blood and blood comes only from people — this time we are the people."

The goal for this year is 2900 pints, representing slightly more than ten per cent of the students.

Today there is a clinic in Margaret Addison Hall, 140 Charles St. Thursday it's at New College and Friday at the Faculty of Dentistry. In the past Dents have been the most eager contributors winning the Anemio Trophy three times in a row.

Court backs Loyola administration

MONTREAL (CUP) — Superior Court Judge. Leon Lalonde surprised no one Monday as he gave legal backing to the administration of Loyola College in its 7-month-old contract battle with nuclear physicist S. A. Santhanam.

In a declaratory judgement, Lalonde said Santhanam had "no contractual right" to remain at Loyola following his dismissal from the Physics Department July 31, 1969.

The odds are good, however, that Lalonde's judgement will not put an end to the conflict which has pitted the administration against Santhanam, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, and a large number of students and faculty during the past academic year.

CAUT has not yet announced whether the organization will go ahead with an official censure — amounting to a blacklist by its 12,000 members, about 80 per cent of faculty at Canadian universities — for ducking its "moral obligations" in the Santhanam case.

On February 7 CAUT's executive committee mandated a special committee to make one final attempt at securing binding arbitration in the Santhanam case.

The move failed, and the committee was authorized "to determine a date for a special meeting of CAUT to deal with the recommendation of the centure of the president and board of trustees of Loyola college."

SQUASH

Varsity Blues scored an unprecedented demolition of all opposition over the weekend to capture the intercollegiate squash tournament at McGill University.

Blues chalked up a perfect 25-0 record in the six team tournament, the first time in the 20 years of intercollegiate squash competition that a team had gone undefeated.

All five members of the team had perfect records while Vic Harding at number 1 and Ashley Perkins at number 5 didn't even lose a game. Harding captured the individual title, the first time a Varsity player has done so since 1961 and only the second time ever that the award has come to Toronto.

Blues ended a four-year winning streak by McGill and at the same time a four-year drought which saw them lose the tournament several times by a single point, usually due to loss of key players through injuries.

The three other members of the team which coach Ralph Rimmer rated as one of his strongest ever were John Stewart, Howie Fluxgold and Mike Gardner.

McGill and Western tied for second 8 points behind Blues followed by McMaster, Waterloo and Guelph.

WOMEN'S SKIING

Uplands Ski Hole was the site of the Women's Interfacul-ty Ski Meet on February 24.

Pots proved to be the outstanding snow bunnies by taking the team title; PHE came second and Scarborough placed third.

Mary Ann Quinn (III PHE) skied her way to the individual intermediate title, while Suzanne Adams (III POTS) walked away with the beginners prize.

BOXING

KINGSTON — (special) The Royal Military College defeated Varsity boxers six bouts to two here on February 21 to win the second of two home-and-home matches and take the series nine to seven.

Varsity won the first series of matches 5-3 on February 7 in Hart House.

In Saturday's bouts only St. Mike's Bob Maton and Vic's Des Glynn emerged as winners against a determined RMC squad coached by Les Mason, a former Olympic competitor in the sport.

Glynn defeated Larry Travis while Maton handily defeated Gerry O'Neill.

TRACK

A dozen U of T trackmen competed last Saturday at the annual Eastern Michigan University Indoor Track Meet and most recorded personal best times on the fast, 220 yard track.

Varsity winners were Mark Minden, who took the 1,000 yard event in a strong 2:14.5 and Bill Franklin, who won the 600 yard race in 1:11.1.

Miller Norm Cummings ran a great 4:12.7 for third in that event, while Doug Kayler notched a 4:29.8 for a sixth in his section.

Peter Pimm and Mike Miller both took sixth position in their races, Pimm with 14:41.0 in the three mile and Miller with a 2:00.1 in the 880. Aris Birze was in good form as well, running 52.2 from blocks in the 440, then adding a fast 50.5 leg in the mile relay.

Sprinter Dave Quibell recorded a 32.2 in the 300 yard event, ahead of Alan Tucker's 33.0 seconds, while lone Toronto field entrant Brian Penny Made 5 feet 10 inches in the high jump.

FENCING

U of T's women fencers placed second last weekend in the WITCA championships held in Montreal.

The Varsity contingent was headed up by Lilit Zekulin, who placed second in the individual championships. Other team members are Sharon Takasaki, Sarah Parsons and Barb Milne. The team is coached by Ken Wood.

This is the end of machine politics in interfac sports

By GELLIUS

MACHINE POLITICS

SAC Presidential candidate Benjamin McNally rose early, checked for crabs, paid the girl and then, after a hearty breakfast of Aunt Jemima's Pancakes and gin, went off to vote at Knox College. His running mate, Mark Golden, attended early morning services at the synagogue of his choice (Knox College), as is his invariable practise, and fortified by the contact with his Maker cast his ballot, marked with a firm "X" (it means "he is alive" in Greek). He then slipped into the mists whence he came, headed, so they say, for the Vale of Avalon where Arthur yet sleeps his sleep.

HOCKEY PLAYOFFS

PHE beat Dents 7-6 in their total-point series, winning 3-2 (PHE: Brown, Nuppola, Duncan Dents: Sullivan, Skelton) after a 4-4 tie. Sullivan had all Dents goals in the tie game; Ellis scored three and Nuppola (a kind of dome; Nonvocation Hall has a nuppola) the other for PHE.

Sr. Eng (Cullen, Pitts) 2; SMC (Morrison, Riddell) 2.

Adams had 3, Sharpe and the speedy Benny one each as Vic edged Bus (Baker, Black, Healey 2), 5-4.

BASKETBALL PLAYOFFS

Vic, led by Short (18), Erew (18) and Tomisson (17; "which twin has the tonisson?") kefuf- fled Vic II, 93-64. Magna Kartna had 17 for Vic II.

New 88, PHE B 71. Horenblas had 25 for Gmus. (The gnu is a small South African antelope related to the Inverness-shire.) Babcock was tops for PHE B with 18.

Trin (Farris 25) 78; Jr. Eng (Callahan 17, Cherniak 11) 53.

Silver and Herling and Wilkie and Heustis, Texas all had either 23 or 20 points and Innis topped Business, 81-61.

Even sports gets letters

At this time of year our thoughts turn to things Olympian, especially to who will represent Canada in the various events at the next Olympic Games. Let me, therefore, make a nomination that will gladden the hearts of all supporters of the Varsity Blues hockey team: Mr. Paul Laurent, for one half of the men's doubles ornamental dancing team, skating division. Last Friday at Waterloo Arena, Mr. Laurent demonstrated outstanding skill in the partial and complete embrace, having embraced one Waterloo player or another eight times at the end of the arena at which I was sitting, so that no doubt his total for the game ran to twenty or so, though none of these loving gestures was seen by any official or — sad to relate — appreciated by the partners concerned. They felt, nasty chaps that they are, that Mr. Laurent (poor, misunderstood little lad) should have been penalized. They said he was holding. Holding, indeed, when all he wanted was to dance!

We Waterloons await with interest the next game, which will, of course, be held on neutral ice — Toronto's — and with neutral officials — Toronto's — in charge. One wonders what would happen if Toronto were required to participate in a play-off on somebody else's ice, Ottawa's, for example. No doubt such rank discrimination would upset the delicate natures of Toronto's players, who accept as their God-given right the privilege of having Toronto referees officiate at all Toronto games, despite the fact that all other teams in the OQAA must take the officials the league provides. But, of course, Toronto is different; it's Toronto, so there, and it doesn't, and shouldn't be expected to, accept those silly rules that the others must adhere to.

Isn't it regrettable that people still use the term "Hog Town" when referring to our fair Queen City. I wonder why? I also wonder what the Toronto referees and linesmen will think if the opposing team gives sly knees in the groin, cross checks (from the rear, yet) and other gentle taps to the fair-haired boys from old T.O. Everybody knows that this is a Toronto privilege, and that one must not belt a Blue for hitting him over the head with a stick, as your fine hero Gordon hit one Ken Laidlaw, having failed to knock said Laidlaw over with a cross-check from behind a second or so earlier. It was really nasty when struck without warning in this way, especially when the puck was twenty yards away. What had he to lose? And to think that he would attempt to strike poor Gordon... Rotten sports, these Waterloons.

Cheer up! All the world

Blues head for PEI

Varsity photog Don Andrew caught Blues' captain Brion St. John in the act of scoring the winning goal in Saturday's OQAA final against Waterloo Warriors. Above, St. John dekes between startled defenseman Peter Paleczney (2) and Savo Vulovic. Below, goalie Ian Scott looks back in anguish at the puck bouncing around in his net.

Varsity Blues held their last practice of the season in Varsity Arena last night, and right about now the team is winging its collective way eastward in search of their fourth national hockey title in five years.

Blues, the University of Alberta Golden Bears, the York University Yeomen, the Loyola Warriors and the St. Mary's University Huskies will converge on Charlottetown, PEI, for the CIAU playoffs, which start tomorrow.

Loyola filled the last playoff spot Sunday night when they defeated Sherbrooke 2-1 to win the Ottawa-St. Lawrence conference title.

Playoff action gets under way at 6 p.m. Thursday with York facing off against St. Mary's. Then at 9 p.m. the good guys, the Varsity Blues, take on the Golden Bears from Alberta.

On Friday, the two Thursday losers play off, while the winner of the York-St. Mary's game plays Loyola. The winner of the Toronto-Alberta game gets a day off.

"It will be no picnic," coach Tom Watt said after last night's practice, "but if we can get past that first game we should be all right."

On Saturday, the winner of the Blues game takes on whichever other team is unbeaten, while the two teams with 1-1 records go to it for the consolation spot. It's all a little confusing, but a simple computer program will make everything clear. Let us know.

If Blues can pull it off it will be their second national title in a row. They've been the OQAA representatives every year since Watt took over the team. Last year they defeated Sir George Williams, in 1967 they beat Laurentian of Sudbury 16-2 in Edmonton, and in 1966 they bumped off Alberta 8-1 in Sudbury. Only in 1968 did they lose the title, when they dropped a 1-0 decision to Loyola in the semifinals. Alberta proceeded to beat Loyola 5-4.

Irate Warrior fan is . . . wrong!

knows that Toronto's own dear officials will spring to the defense of their fellow townsmen next weekend, and that un-sportsmanlike conduct such as that displayed by Waterloo will be given the treatment it deserves.

See you at the game, fellow unselfish sportsman.

Eric W. Makepeace

P.S.: Would you believe that some evil tongues around Waterloo are claiming that the reason Toronto beat Windsor twice by a wide margin and Windsor beat Waterloo twice was that Bruner — who cannot play every game — was tending goal against Waterloo twice and a far inferior goal tender was playing twice against Toronto? It just goes to show you how far jealousy will go, even though, in this case, the story happens to be true.

E. W. M.

We at the Varsity sports department are pleased to see that at least one Waterloo fan appreciates our Blues.

By the way, the final OQAA stats show that Mr. Laurent found enough time when he wasn't clutching and grabbing to score 14 goals and 18 assists (two points more than the top warrior)

Also for the record, the illustrious Lancer, Mr. Bruner put in exactly 180 minutes of ice time against Blues this year.

It's your uniform you remember, not what you had to go through to get it.

You left like a lamb being led to the altar. You didn't even know who you were anymore. Then, there came one moment that made it all worthwhile. And you knew who you were again.

You were Babe Ruth, Gary Cooper, and Superman all wrapped into one. You looked at yourself in every window you passed. It was the day you got your first dress uniform.

We make fabrics for people who still wear uniforms every day.

Uniforms made with our fabrics are the very easiest to care for and they last two to three times longer than uniforms made out of cotton.

Best of all, they're always a step ahead in fashion. They make you look great and feel great on the job.

Klopman makes more Dacron® polyester/long staple combed cotton fabrics for uniforms than any other company.

Maybe it's because we understand what it can feel like to wear one.

Don't just look for fabric. Look for Klopman.

Sirluck to become president at Manitoba

By DAVID FRANK

Prof. Ernest Sirluck has accepted the post of president of Winnipeg's University of Manitoba and will resign his twin posts as U of T's graduate vice-president and dean of graduate studies.

The decision was announced Tuesday by the University of Manitoba; it was not announced here. Prof. Sirluck's resignation takes effect July 1.

After eight years as a U of T administrator and 15 years as an English professor at the university of Chicago, he is returning to his alma mater.

Sirluck was chosen for the job by a 14-man selection committee from among about 200 proposed names. The Manitoba student council officially withdrew its two members from the committee because it was meeting in secret. The council also wanted a campus-wide plebiscite to finalize the choice.

Sirluck feels the method of selection was an "extremely good one" and that the Manitoba campus, from his contact with it, was content with his appointment.

He called the student decision, which was made the week he visited Winnipeg to be interviewed, "a rather sad thing."

After eight years as a U of T administrator Sirluck is going back to the campus which awarded him his B.A. 30 years ago.

The University of Manitoba has mushroomed in that time from a campus of about 3,500 to a campus of 14,000 Sirluck notes.

"I go there with no set of policies," says Sirluck, "I take with me my intellectual and academic biases and tastes." He expects to spend a lot of time "watching and listening."

Mostly Sirluck goes to Manitoba with a great wealth of administrative experience learned at U of T.

U of T president Claude Bissell last night called Sirluck "one of the very top academic administrators on this continent."

In 1962 Bissell brought Sirluck from the University of Chicago to become a professor of English and Associate Dean of Graduate studies.

Two years later he became Dean.

His appointment coincided with the great push to expand graduate studies on the main campus.

That year, 1964, there were about 2,200 graduate students at U of T, including both full and part-time students.

This year, the graduate enrollment has topped 6300 students. This represents a 24 per cent rate of growth for the graduate sector, up from 11 per cent in 1968-69. Meanwhile undergraduate enrollment on the St. George campus was increased by three students over last year.

In recognition of the growing significance of U of T's graduate complex, Sirluck was elevated to a new post of graduate vice-president in January of last year.

While recalling that U of T has traditionally been "the nucleus and anchor of graduate work in the humanities and social sciences in English-speaking Canada," Sirluck adds that in recent years graduate studies have moved "from the periphery to a part of the centre of the university."

Graduate studies, he now feels, are secure, "no longer in the experimental stage" and have reached a level of "self-sustaining intellectual and structural stability."

There is room for expansion in the social sciences and life sciences, he suggests, but he does not foresee a need for "indefinite increases."

Sirluck sees graduate studies as being essential for any major university, for "riveting the discipline."

He rejects out of hand the idea that teaching and research are incompatible functions within a university. Graduate studies are meant to provide homegrown teachers for post-secondary education, he says.

Sirluck exudes formality and seriousness, a manner which reflects his basically conservative approach to the university. Sometimes a harsher manner breaks through.

During last fall's discipline crisis he could be seen standing in the aisle at Convocation Hall, muttering hoarsely under his breath as President Bissell attempted at the microphone to defend his stand that Caput remained the official disciplinary body on campus.

CUG bogged down

Tim Reid sees Queen's Park as CUG arbitrator

The debate over the Commission on University Government's Report may move to the Ontario Legislature with Liberal MPP Tim Reid's introduction Wednesday of an Act to amend the U of T Act.

"Serious reform of the top-level governing structure of the University of Toronto is urgent," Reid told the Legislature as he read his proposed amendment. Reid, MPP for Scarborough East, is the Liberal University Affairs spokesman.

"In my opinion the basic structural reform proposals spelled out in last summer's Report of CUG are bogged down in hopeless discussion," he added. "There will never be agreement from within the U of T among the Board of Governors, the teachers, the students and the administration on the kind of surgery needed at the top."

Reid's amendment is based on the CUG proposals and would incorporate into the U of T Act the model of a top, one-tier Governing Council composed of student, faculty, administration, and lay representatives.

U of T President Claude Bissell disagreed strongly with Reid's analysis of the CUG debate on campus.

"I don't think they're bogged down in hopeless discussion," Bissell told The Varsity in a telephone interview yesterday.

He called the present stalemate the result of an "understandable tension" which need not be permanent.

"I think the results of the CUG questionnaire will help," he said. The administration sent a questionnaire to all U of T students asking their opinions about university reform.

"I think it's naive to think we are going to have peaceful consensus," Bissell added. "There's a gradual movement to basic agreement on some sorts of issues, but we never will have total agreement."

The faculty have been a thorn in the administration's side this year, as they set up the barricades against CUG and parity, and have threatened the university's budgetary security with a 22 per cent wage-demand.

"The faculty's assertion of power was healthy," said Bissell. "They have been watching the students for two years and it was time for them to assert themselves. It's a necessary balance."

But he added that the "hardening of segmented lines" in the university would be disastrous.

"As the hierarchical structures break down in the university," he said, "a new sense of nationalistic identity is emerging in each group within the university."

Tim Reid said the Legislature's Standing Committee could serve as an arbitrator in the "dispute which has split U of T."

Sirluck moves on

He likes to put his attitude towards the university on a business-like basis:

"The university does not support itself. It cannot set its own goals. It is brought into being for specific goals. Its structure derives from these purposes. Our business is academic, education."

A university president, says Sirluck, is "an academic leader." He must offer "guidance in the fulfilling of the university's essential commitments."

His attitude towards the Commission on University Government report is unenthusiastic.

"No university can work satisfactorily without the assent of its members," he says. "To ensure assent, one has to agree with it," he adds, calling CUG "an absolutely essential enterprise."

"Universities are academic institutions," but the modern trend is for "other characteristics" which may destroy the fundamentals of the university to intrude.

He rejects the idea of the university as a "general purpose institution" and suggests that other forms of post-secondary education be expanded to relieve universities of the responsibility for general education.

The analogy which compares the university to a general community is "fruitful but misleading," he says. A university community does not support itself, and is entrusted with specific goals, he argues.

"I don't accept parity as a structure," he says, although he agrees a large student say is essential in disciplinary, residence, and library matters.

He points to the student participation initiated in his school in the last two years.

"These students have a substantial presence without it becoming an issue which would frighten people."

In the school's governing graduate council, student representatives have four voting seats in a council of 37. Sirluck expects students will get a "substantially increased voice, but not parity" in the near future.

"I am not frightened by words like tokenism," he says. "There has been nothing to recover from, no blood to mop up."

"With one or two exceptions the student view has prevailed on the council," he says.

One of those exceptions was a student proposal to relax the rule against allowing full-time graduate students to accept employment anywhere for more than ten hours a week. In January 1969 Sirluck convinced the council the rule was needed to enforce "full concentration" and protect the "investment" governments and private donors had made in graduate studies.

In June 1969 Sirluck charged a group of "some 40 selected extremists" and "persons experienced in foreign university riots" had plotted to make U of T their target that academic year.

He analyzed for the listening audience of graduating students and parents how U of T had avoided the "real and omnipresent" dangers of "student militancy" over the previous months.

This speech was vigorously attacked by student Bob Rae, then a member of the Commission on University Government, who said Sirluck had "jeopardized the entire trend toward reform" through engaging in "a McCarthyite character assassination" of students involved in student politics.

He said the attack was a "vicious, insulting and completely inaccurate attack on the student movement as a whole."

"You can't discuss menues with cannibals," Rae added.

CUG forced Bissell to state formally that Sirluck's speech did not reflect administration policy.

Sirluck's decision to leave U of T took some Simcoe Hall officials by surprise. As a respected kingpin in the administrative elite which runs the university and a close friend of President Bissell, he had been rumored as a likely successor to Bissell.

Even now he does not deny this.

"President Bissell is still in office," he says, "I can't control what people say."

Choosing Prof. Sirluck's successor will be conducted in the "approved manner," says President Bissell. This could mean through the mechanism of the CUG report, or it could mean the traditional method of a five-man committee with representatives from each division of graduate studies, plus the university president.

And the Maoists never showed up

Uneasy policemen at the Royal York Hotel guarded Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau from a demonstration that fizzled.

I arrived at the hotel 15 minutes before Trudeau, to find the area swarming with stiff-backed, steely-eyed men in blue uniforms and stiff-backed, steely-eyed men in sports jackets.

One of the latter stuck his turtle-necked head over my shoulder as I was jotting down notes.

I asked him who he was. "Oh, I'm an undercover policeman," he replied.

"Mounty or Metro?" I asked.

"What's the difference," he said, as he hurried across the street to see if a group of commuters entering Union Station were wearing Maoist buttons.

Some Waffles (supporters of the Mel Watkins wing of the NDP) were budded away from the doors handing out leaflets.

The turtle-neck man, still looking for Maoists, sidled up to them and took a look at their buttons.

"It's all right," he reported to a policeman with a walkie-talkie, "they're the (Stop) Spadina people."

Motorcycles rumbled; policemen held back other policemen from blocking the main doors, and a dapper grey-suited figure, later identified as the Prime Minister smiled his way into the hotel.

Five minutes later organizers of the Young Socialist demonstration arrived with placards protesting the Vietnam war.

Waffle organizers soon followed with their own placards, protesting the sale of Canadian water to the U.S.

One girl picketed with a large German shepherd, but a policeman made her tie it to a tree.

Initially there were more police than demonstrators, but by 5:30 the numbers were almost even.

There were no Maoists present.

Union rejected

Maintenance, outdoors and cafeteria workers voted Wednesday to reject Local 204 of the Services Employees Union as their official bargaining agent.

The employees turned down the union by a vote of 61-38. There were 109 workers eligible to vote in the referendum, which climaxed more than a year of union efforts to obtain certification. The local represents about 700 other U of T employees.

PART 2 1/2

An unscheduled section in the series

I feel compelled to reply to the barrage of letters criticizing the two articles on Israel that I wrote for Monday's and Wednesday's Varsity. This is not an editorial, for the letters are not just an attack on The Varsity, but an assault upon my personal integrity as a journalist.

The response implies, directly or indirectly, that I am a liar, an anti-semitic, and a fascist.

The letters are based on a number of assumptions apparently drawn from the articles:

- that I've presented only one side of the picture;
- that the stories formed a political polemic or analysis rather than a description of an experience;
- that a criticism of Israeli policy in the occupied territories constitutes support for the surrounding Arab states;
- that anti-Zionism is anti-Semitism;

I'll try to show what I was doing by dealing with these assumptions one by one:

(1) The two articles constituted a "one-sided" picture in that they were about one aspect of the Middle East conflict — how it affects the Arabs in the occupied territory of the West Bank. The stories related that aspect through a narrow range of experience — a few interviews with Arabs in Qalqillya and the Mayor of Jericho, interspersed with some contradictory statements from Israeli officials.

The articles were originally designed as one feature, but were broken down to two because they were too long. The effect of two articles about the same thing was enough to evoke charges of one-sided

"Arab propaganda".

But more than two stories were planned. I deliberately placed those two at the beginning of the series, because they presented a "side" of the Middle East situation which has been virtually ignored in the commercial press.

A third section was planned for next Wednesday's paper. In that section I was going to write about Israel itself, a fairly factual and concrete view of students and youth in particular. The experience on the West Bank was one of the few occasions we came into a personal, almost emotional, contact with people. We were away from the structures of the tour and were not so pressed for time.

(2) The articles were not intended to be analysis of either the Middle East conflict or the situation on the West Bank. They were descriptions of how the war affected people we met there. But I related as accurately as possible what the objective nature of those experiences was; I was not trying to define the objective problem of the Middle East crisis, propose cure-all solutions, or deliver the "correct line". The articles were political pieces written about a political situation, but they were not polemics. They stated no editorial policy, no manifesto of rights and wrongs.

Eight days in Israel forms no basis for writing an analysis of the Middle East. Despite Howard English, I was not writing a "New Left analysis". Nor was I on a fact-finding mission.

But I did report impressions based on accurate quotations. Michael Engelberg's letter implies that I'm a liar, when he doubts the verity of my "Israeli government economist". But he really exists, Michael. I talked to him at a party in Jerusalem on January 31, the last night of the formal tour. I repeat what he said:

"The Palestinian question is of no significance to Israel. We can deal with it with both hands tied behind our back."

(3) Most of the letter-writers far too easily concluded from my stories that I supported the Nasser regime and the Arab states. I never stated nor implied that.

To equate support for the Palestinian Arabs on the West Bank with support for the Arab states surrounding Israel is to submit to the illogic of Nasser's pan-Arab dream. Most of the refugees want nothing to do with either Egypt or Jordan. Their oppression before 1967 under Hussein's regime was no better, and perhaps worse, than their present condition.

Pointing to the existence of a Palestinian national entity, independent of Jordan and Egypt, in fact, invalidates the claims of the legitimate Arab states, rather than backs them. Many Israelis consider the problem of the Arabs in the occupied territories a secondary priority. The main threat is from Nasser, they say. Yes, the main military threat is from Nasser, but the question of Israel must be posed in greater terms than those of brute military strategy.

By recognizing the existence and rights of the Palestinians, and by negotiating with them, Israel would cut considerable ground out from under Nasser's imperialist notion of pan-Arab expansion.

(4) I was freer then to discuss and criticize Israeli policy with Israelis than I am now with supporters of Israel at U of T. Israelis are not monolithic in their support for the present military policy in the occupied territories. Most do not see a criticism of that strategy as fascist. Many are aware of the oppression of the Arabs in the occupied territories and oppose it.

And to take an anti-Zionist stand in Israel is not to take an anti-Semitic stand. Zionism, a religious form of nationalism, is rapidly fading in Israel.

I met Anne and Benjamin Shalit at a party. They are a couple who took their case to the Supreme Court and won the right to register their children as Jewish, although Anne was not Jewish. They admitted their struggle was not just a personal fight, but part of a broader political attempt to separate Church and State.

"I always consider editorial comment to be justified . . . as long as it's . . . tasteful."

The basis of the problem in the Middle East is political, but the war takes the form of racial conflict. The stories tried to deal with a political situation on a micro and personal level. One of the most frightening developments in the war is racism on both sides. But if political criticism is continually translated into racism, there will be no understanding of solutions.

Varsity features draw angry response insult to johnson's credentials as journalist and editor

Brian Johnson's two most recent exposes of the Israeli-Arab situation are an insult to any credentials he might have as a journalist and an editor. After writing, sometimes eloquently, of the faults of the commercial press, Johnson has fallen into the same trap; covering up an absence of facts with colour, subtle commentary through the words of other people, and just a dash of innuendo.

At no point in his previous two articles, has Johnson quoted the feelings of the pioneer who came to Israel after the second world war, created a nation out of a desert, and then found that the downtrodden Arabs were ready to sacrifice the little they had to destroy him and what he had worked for.

At no point, has Johnson spoken of the exhortations of President Nasser, to set about creating a sea of blood in the Middle East, presumably from the bodies of dead Jews.

Johnson has deliberately ignored the activities of the El Fatah; their words and actions, and their senseless slaughter, not only of the so-called 'Jewish oppressors,' but innocent tourists with the audacity to travel in no sympathy with naive political idealism

Brian Johnson's second piece of Arab propaganda is irritating, repetitious and deeply disturbing. The fact that the editor has not one single word to say about Israel, its people and its achievements indicates his pre-determination to present an entirely one-sided point of view, (sadly, at the expense of the Israeli Government).

Why should the Israelis negotiate with the Israeli Arabs when Egypt and other Arab nations have stubbornly and insistently refused even the right of existence of Israel in the past 22 years. Does the editor really think that war is a game of "fair play"? He knows, as everyone else, that it is kill or be killed. Who provoked the 1967 war, the Arabs or the Israelis? (Not to mention the previous two). Furthermore, what would have the Western nations done if Nasser's plan to "run the Jews into the sea" succeeded?

Probably exactly the same as they up to israelis and arabs

In response to Rick Kardonne's letter in The Varsity of March 4th, I should like to remind him that it is only fair that we read "Arab propaganda" as well as "Israeli propaganda" (I am presuming that Mr. Kardonne recognizes the freedom of speech).

If, indeed, the Varsity, as a student organization, is not to be allowed a Jewish territory, or on Jewish airlines, or attempt to understand what Zionism means to the Jewish people. That is something of which Johnson shows no conception; the founding after thousands of years, of a Jewish purpose, a Jewish identity, a Jewish liberation in the land of Israel.

As a matter of fact, he shrugs off the primary barrier to peace in the Middle East, the unwillingness of the Arab leaders to recognize the nation which they are urging their people to destroy.

Johnson, of course, mentions this, but only in juxtaposition to a comment that the Israel Minister of Tourism refuses to recognize the two million Arabs living under Jewish rule.

What is most distasteful though, is the continuous insinuation that because Israel buys arms from the United States, she too, is an imperialist nation. The false universalism of this analysis ignores the fact that the United States also supplies arms to Arab nations, that many of the same Arab nations, are suppliers of oil to the United States, and in terms of did 30 years ago, or only a few months ago in the case of Biafra: absolutely nothing. Offer sighs and apologies. That is why the Israelis — having been taught a bitter lesson in history — learned that they must take their fate into their own hands. No one else will.

It is without question that the Arab refugees present a great problem; but is President Nasser really interested in finding a solution to this question? Haven't the Israelis offered to meet anywhere, anytime to negotiate with the Arab leaders?

As a Hungarian, who left after 1956, I have no more tolerance or patience for people with naive political idealism. May I propose that the Editor apply to the Soviet Ministry of Tourism for an all-expense paid trip to Czechoslovakia? I'd love to hear his report on that (that is, if he makes it back).

Nicholas Deutsch (SGS)

voice in issues external to the University, and to Canada, neither has the University of Toronto Jewish organization the right to protest, on campus, the sale of French planes to Libya.

domestic politics, that many of the Arab governments are the most reactionary in the world.

If carried to its logical conclusion, the New Left analysis of the Israeli-United States association would mean that those who buy anything from an increasingly anti-semitic Black Panther Party, are themselves anti-semitic.

But we must remember that Brian Johnson and the New Left are not anti-semitic, they're just anti-zionist.

Howard English
Students for Israel

war not fought with mustangs and marshmallows

Wednesday's instalment of "War in the Middle East" or "A Day in the Life of the Victims of the Great Zionist-American Conspiracy of Imperialistic and Warmongering Aggressors" makes for interesting reading indeed.

Yes, Mr. Journalist Johnson, we've heard it said before that war is hell, and your articles from the Middle East certainly show that. We had heard that the Israelis were butchers, but seeing the photograph of barbed wire in your article was enough to make even a hard-hearted soul sick. Never did we dream that there was barbed wire over there! It must really be a brutal war. The serious nature of the situation is emphasized by your poignant observations of the landscape.

We in Canada are fortunate indeed to have you tell us that on the way to Jericho, one sees "army jeeps and trucks of soldiers in full combat fatigues, complete with helmets and guns and a truck with a Howitzer mounted on back." Never, in our wildest moments of insanity, did we dream that the ceasefire lines were manned by jeeps, soldiers, trucks, and guns. We thought that the Zionist Imperialist puppets were using those greatest of all American imperialistic tools — Ford Mustangs, empty Coke bottles, and Kraft miniature marshmallows.

We're especially horrified at the attitude of the Jewish Fascist Expansionist Pigs depicted in one paragraph. You write, "The Palestinian question is of no significance to Israel," an Israeli government economist told me. "We can deal with it with both hands tied behind our back." I wonder who the "Israeli government economist" was. He reminds me of "a high official of an Arab government embassy in Ottawa" who "recently told me" that "the Israeli question is of no significance to the Palestinians. We can deal with it with both hands tied behind our back."

The ultimate indicator of the raw, militaristic fascism of the Israeli stooges is the fact that four of the American and Canadian newspaper editors rented a car in Jerusalem (from imperialistic Hertz or Avis, no doubt?) and drove all around the West Bank area to see things for themselves. It sure is lucky for the Israelis that they haven't finished butchering all the Arabs yet! (the ones that didn't "flee to freedom" in a Jordanian refugee camp) Otherwise, there would have been no one for Brian Johnson to interview! (Except, of course, for the "Israeli government economist.")

nasser and third reich

Three cheers for Mr. Kardonne and his brilliant and probing analysis of Monday's Arab bullshit in your illustrious journal! Always aiming to improve, the Varsity's Wednesday edition once again delivered another heaping helping of Arab bullshit, and I might add, in rather "liberal" doses.

Perhaps the Varsity is honored with the presence of the "good" Rev. Al Forrest on its editorial board? (Some of my best friends are anti-semites).

May I humbly suggest that the editors and staff of the Varsity take a permanent trip to Cairo? I am sure that Fuhrer Nasser and the remaining scum of the Third Reich will be happy to see you all — in their downtown Cairo bunker, of course.

BLURBS

There will be no Varsity published Monday. The next issue will be published Wednesday March 11.

A teach-in on Americanization, organized by the Waffle group of the NDP, will start tonight at 8 p.m. Obtain tickets from the SAC office or the Sidney Smith foyer. Admission for students $1.25.

David Alexander Frank was elected new editor of The Varsity last Friday to succeed Brian Johnson. The staff's exercise of mass democracy was approved by the Varsity board Monday.

Frank defeated editorial candidates Mark Golden, Dan Melton and John Winter to win the position.

The new editor has been with The Varsity for three years as reporter, City Editor, Features Editor, lay-out man and heavy at large. He has also been employed by the St. Catharines Standard and the Toronto Star as a news reporter.

"David Frank is neither Karl Marx nor Jon Levin, but he'll make a good editor," commented Johnson.

Frank has grandiose plans for The Varsity. "The Varsity is a newspaper," he said. "I plan to make it into a break-fastfood — Kellogg's Copy Flakes. I'm also going to get a new bulletin board."

Frank takes over his duties from Summer Varsity Editor Jim Cowan in September.

UNIVERSITY EXPANSION

I think that I shall never see Another university
That wrecks our homes as much as thee.

This area is all coming down. What once used to be an expensive residential area will become part of a new university face.

Prof. D. J. Knight of Victoria College sits behind a desk in the spacious Old Vic building, erected when hallways could be as wide as basketball courts and the University of Toronto was about as compressed as a Texas ranchhouse.

That's all changed now, and Knight is one of the faculty unfortunate enough to have settled his family within gulping distance of U of T expansion. What was, five years ago, to be a warm family home comfortably near the university has now received the black hand on the developer's map, and his employer has shown itself to be somewhat ravenously fond of land. Knight's Sussex Ave. home is to be razed within the next several years as the University burgeons north to Bloor St.

He describes Sussex as a "controlled PhD slum, a beautiful, casual neighborhood." Surrounded by U of T-owned houses, and first to admit that "there's a lot of junk up there," he nonetheless subscribes to the theory that old houses provide the kind of housing students need. Instead of residences in loco parentis, with "no nails in the walls" regulations, he favors the old houses where a freer life style prevails, and where organizations like Campus Co-Op keep things reasonably neat.

As further evidence, he cites empty residence rooms (with a housing shortage current) as proof of student detestation for high-rise dorms.

Prof. Knight is well-known as a conservative in the English Department, and the first to vociferate for the faculty's status as a professional guild. Turtlenecks and love beads do not go with this image, but they are as much a part of his department as his colorful conversational style.

"The university is a very bad neighbor. Their workmen came drunk to work and the university has been guilty of leaving buildings empty for an unconsionably long time."

He tells of Simcoe Hall's efforts to purchase No. 5 Sussex when the owner, a divorcee with three children, adamantly refused. At the height of dispute with her, the wrecking crews came to take down No. 7, which the university owned.

"I've seen the bulldazer bash the blade into the side of the house. If that isn't terror tactics I don't know what is. . . Then they left it vacant for seven months after she moved out."

Professor Stan Benjamin, who has struck many sparks in conflict with the U of T, would agree with Knight's description of "bland automatic virtue radiating from the university men" when they confront residents.

Benjamin does not express himself as colorfully as that, but he is as angry. President of the Huron-Sussex Residents' Association, he recites a list of cases in which the University has acted without consulting the people involved. "Their concept of flexibility is, if you can't take down 10 houses here, you take down 10 houses somewhere else."

As I sat in the vague white livingroom of his Washington Ave. home (shortly to be part of OCE), I recalled that he was an architect. In hopes of eliciting some praise for the beauty of 19th-century housing, I asked what he thought of the construction of the neighborhood. Fiddling with a mass of sheets and folders, he brusquely replied: "I like old houses, or I wouldn't be living in one."

Benjamin is too busy with his private Armageddon to be concerned with esthetics. The University has informed him that his contract as a professor will not be renewed. He will not easily be recommended. Although hesitant to connect this with his anti-expansion activities, Benjamin makes the point that in seeking work elsewhere he leaves a power vacuum in the neighborhood.

And one hard to fill. As a professional planner himself, he could refute Simcoe Hall with jargon including phrases like "two-point coverage", which means roughly that the U of T has land it ain't even used yet. In the mounting pile of material on my lap was a copy of the U of T Master Plan (Supp. No. 1, Dec. 68) which does not agree with Professor Benjamin's contention about unused land.

There is a war on in Southern Africa, a war to decide whether it will be ruled by the majority of the people living there or by a small minority. Canada is in effect helping the minority.

The war, with its economic ramifications and its implications for international politics, displays all the complexity, but theatrical-politics

Abbie Hoffman has remarked that "politics is theatre and magic." Toronto Workshop Productions has taken this gnomish utterance, plus others of varying intelligibility occurring in the 20,000 pages of transcripts from the Chicago conspiracy trial, and is fashioning theatre from the magic politics practiced by the defendants, attorneys, judge, and media.

They call the result Chicago '70, and the production opens Tuesday the 10th at 12 Alexander St. with a benefit performance for the defendants. Director George Luscombe and his cast have used the trial proceedings as the basis for collective improvisations which, when given final form, will constitute the play.

Politics, when viewed as governing itself and not as the stratagems sometimes necessary for such governing, has a moral dimension. And the trial is so full of politics, on both levels and from all sides, that any distillation of the event into art is bound to omit points of current moment. In A Man for All Seasons, Robert Bolt could afford to leave out Thomas More's controversy with William Tyndale over the Bible; the issue current in 1532 had little dramatic punch by 1961. But Chicago '70 does not possess such artistic leeway. The issues which surround the trial are so much with us that they are rapidly becoming clichés — they are entering the conventional wisdom, that fertile though smelly compost heap in which the seeds of change must germinate. These issues may not well fit into drama — which is after all more concerned with individuals than with systems — but they do fit very much into our lives.

Thus the play is going to be up against major artistic difficulties, the chief of which will be finding the line between relevance and timelessness. However, the magnitude of the difficulties makes the courage involved in the attempt to solve them all the more laudable. It appeared from the play's preview that there might be more to praise, indeed, than mere courage for trying.

Courage, as the example of Bobby Seale shows, isn't the touchstone. In the case of a play about the trial, fidelity to the subtleties of repression is the touchstone, and Toronto Workshop Productions may have it safely in its collective blue-jean pocket. I hope so, anyway; we need justice done to, as well as within, the courtroom.

Catalyst seemed always to be the campus literary magazine that never had a home or a solid base of support. It was never associated with a college and was always dependent on various university organizations for sporadic grants to keep it going.

This year, editor Ian Young has transformed Catalyst into a political periodical of commentary, reviews and poetry. There seems to be a healthy disavowal of the local literati for the greater harvest of a potentially national audience. While the general bias of the articles follows the objectivist-libertarian point of view, only one of the articles on "industrial totalitarianism" by Ian Darwin becomes choked in predictable right-wing rhetoric. The publication otherwise stands rather refreshingly beside the plethora of left-wing journals on the newsstands.

Besides Darwin's article, the general tenor of the magazine is much less strident and serious. Of particular interest to me was a review of William Buckley's The Jeweler's Eye by Ian Young. Less well known to general public than the schisms and infighting on the left are those on the right between the mystic conservatives of the "our country do-or-die" stamp (the Edmund Burke boys) and the objectivist-libertarians who expound a doctrine of extreme individualism and the truncation of the powers of the central government. So, in his review, Ian Young, a representative of the local libertarians, takes an amusing, satyric glance at the unquestioned Monarch of the American Right, William F. Buckley Jr.

Included in the issue is a rather long though informative analysis of Utopias, past and present, by George Woodcock who explores the illusory search for societal perfection.

On the aesthetic side and more in line with the old Catalyst are the poems by various new writers and a photograph by Norman Elder. The poems strike me as competent but not completely professional. There are some excellent lines such as Ldzislaw Kurlewicz's "I am skin filled with stone, that labours for beauty," but few fully integrated poems. I was particularly impressed with the two poems of John Steffler that are somewhat rough stylistically but which succeed in creating a desired mood. . . .

and comes a day you sit without light by the high window and fine shadows no longer fill your dish

Faced with the probability of extinction as a literary magazine or the possibility of innovation, the editor has taken the second course. I admire his courage: Young is publishing material both of a creative and commentary nature that would never make the glossy pages of the anaesthetic establishment magazines. He has further provided a constructive alternative to the various left-wing periodicals like the Canadian Forum. For the right, it provides a breath of fresh air and for the left, material for a few giggles and some insights into what the other side is thinking and doing.

a human school for our children

The First Street School in New York, which is the subject of George Dennison's book The Lives of Children was an experiment in a personalized, decentralized school system. There were four teachers working with twenty-three children, all of whom had come from the regular New York public schools. Each child had experienced failure as a result of the prejudice and insensitivity which is almost a byword for that system. The children were a mixture of Puerto Rican, Black, and White whose parents sent them to the school out of despair because they (the children) weren't learning, had been expelled, or refused to attend regular school. As the children for the first time began to enjoy school and started to learn, the original parental distrust changed to support.

The role played by parents was central to the First Street experiment:

All parents had all teachers' phone numbers, and they called frequently to ask questions, give information, make complaints and suggestions. The parents got to know one another. The social exchange itself was inspiring, but soon there was much more, for they had many needs in common and found that they could help one another. They swapped clothing, took care of one another's children, chipped in and hired an older child to escort the young ones to school. Some banded together and devised strategies for confronting the Department of Welfare (they have continued — now in stronger and more political forms).

As the kids became happier, so did the parents. Not all the changes took communal forms. Some were romantic. One mother blossomed suddenly into an off-Broadway actress. Two found new husbands. Was this an effect of the school? Who knows? A woman looks prettier when she isn't frantic with worry and depressed by the feeling of isolation. I claim it for the school. All these parental changes had further effects on the children.

To Dennison, learning is a function of growth, therefore if learning is to take place, the child must be given permission and encouragement to grow and change. The first step for the school staff therefore was to develop a personal rapport with each child based on trust and mutual respect. At this point some of the most important learning had begun. There was a change in the children, not just in their ability to learn or pay attention, but in their ability to communicate with and experience others. The process of helping a child see that he can be original and creative is an exciting one and Dennison conveys this excitement. He also talks about the frustration:

Spanking Stanley made me realize that I couldn't handle him. Not that the spanking was wrong. It was exactly right (and could not be repeated). He is terribly alienated from the child in himself, and is consequently driven by the child's fears. I treated him as a child by spanking him. I had set up relations with the part of himself he had rejected. And I had let him know that I could cope with the behavior he was unable to handle himself. But just that is the rub, for though in principle I can cope with it, in fact I cannot. I've been over this road before, and I know that if I were to take him under my wing, protect him from himself, and assume the responsibility for the impulses he cannot handle, we could bring him around. But the truth is that I cannot do this, I haven't the patience anymore, or the commitment, or — most important — the love. This became clear to me when I spanked him, for I saw how correct it was — not correct in itself, and definitely not correct as punishment (which it wasn't; it was force and anger), but correct as the first step in a long chain of close responsibility, amounting in the end to a functional parallel of love. I could not sustain that chain. Nor was First Street a school for disturbed children. And so the spanking was wrong, which is tantamount to saying that we must get rid of Stanley.

Even so, the question of Stanley is not settled quite so simply. One feels the struggle — as indeed it must have been a struggle — to weigh the damage to the other children, the possibility of getting someone who could devote full-time attention to Stanley. But finally Stanley had to go. I think of all the children like Stanley — who will have to go — into reform schools, penitentiaries, mental hospitals etc. until the system is changed. Changed so that children like Stanley are reached before they become so destructive, and so defensive that there is almost no one who has the energy, time, and love to commit full time to save such a child.

The book goes on to quote Paul Goodman's suggestions as to how a decentralized model such as The First Street School could be carried through into the regular school system at approximately the same or less cost financially, and at much less cost in terms of human lives.

"For ages six to eleven, I propose a system of tiny schools, radically decentralized. By tiny school I mean twenty-eight children with four teachers (one grown up to seven children) and each tiny school to be largely administered by its own staff and parents, with considerable say, also, for the children, as in Summerhill. The four teachers are: A teacher regularly licensed and salaried, since the present average class size is twenty-eight, these are available. A graduate from the senior class of a New York college perhaps just embarking on graduate study. Salary: $2,000. There is no lack of candidates to do something interesting and useful in a free setting. A literate housewife and mother, who can also prepare lunch. Salary: $4,000. No lack of candidates. A literate, willing, and intelligent high school graduate. Salary: $2,000. No lack of candidates.

For setting, the tiny school would occupy two, three, or four rooms in existing school buildings, church basements, settlement houses otherwise empty during school hours, rooms set aside in housing projects, storefronts. The setting is especially indifferent since a major part of activity occurs outside the school place. The setting should be able to be transformed into a clubhouse, decorated and equipped according to the group's own decision.

The Authentic Child by Alan de Witt Button also deals with children and how they learn. It should have been an essay. As a book it is over long and repetitious. The message, however is an important one:

"If we are to be authentic persons we must abandon, cast aside, transcend our need to be told what to do and how to do it. . . . To unearth our true feelings takes time, insight and honesty. To act upon them takes courage and patience. But the result is a different beauty, — authenticity, a full and warming pride in oneself and one's child."

Both DeWitt and Dennison talk about the need for honesty and mutual respect when dealing with children. However, Dennison seems less of a moralist in doing so than does DeWitt.

It is possible to forgive DeWitt for the length of his book when one considers that what he says is so much in need of saying. The Lives of Children, however, should be prerequisite reading for anyone interested in schools or children.

there's a war going on over there

.....none of the neatness, of a higher mathematical problem. The basic issue, however, is as simple as it is stark.

There is a war on in southern Africa, a war to decide whether it will be ruled by the majority of the people living there or by a small minority. Canada is in effect helping the minority.

The war, with its economic ramifications and its implications for international politics, displays all the complexity, but none of the neatness, of a higher mathematical problem. The basic issue, however, is as simple as it is stark.

Southern Africa, an area more than one-half the size of China, includes a population of roughly four and a half million whites and about 36 million non whites, the vast majority of them black. Its eight countries are ruled — either officially or in practice — by whites and their rule is harsh.

The whites occupy the best land, are relatively wealthy, well-fed and well-educated. The blacks are poor, relatively — in many cases shockingly — ill-fed and ill-housed, and what education they receive amounts by and large to the training required for menial tasks.

President Julius Nyerere of Tanzania summed up the view of Africans who oppose the status quo in the southern part of the continent when he spoke last fall at the University of Toronto.

"The common objective of the African people," he said, "is self-determination for the peoples of southern Africa . . . and an end to the official propogation and practice of racialism in our continent. That is all.

"We are not anti-white terrorists wishing to impose a reverse racialism; we wish to uphold human equality and to give human dignity and non-racialism a chance to grow in our lands."

To many southern African whites, the issue is equally simple. Consciously or otherwise, they know that black rule would spell the end of their high standards of living, indeed of their whole way of life, and they are afraid.

Already black liberation forces conduct regular campaigns in large parts of the Portuguese colonies of Mozambique and Angola and FRELIMO, the insurgent organization in Mozambique, claims effective control of the two northernmost provinces of that country.

In Rhodesia, two organizations, the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) and the Zimbabwe African Peoples' Union (ZAPU) are conducting sabotage, recruiting followers, and — when they are forced to — fighting, sometimes with telling effect. ZAPU and ZANU are assisted by the African National Congress (ANC) of South Africa, which, within its own borders, confines itself mainly to reconnoitering future bases and arms caches.

In South-West Africa, a U.N. trusteeship territory which the Republic of South Africa has taken as its own, the Peoples' Organization (SWAPO), with the help of the ANC, engages in hit and run raids.

GUERRILLA WARFARE

Altogether in southern Africa, the Economist of Britain, reported last year, some 26,000 guerrillas are arrayed against government forces totalling nearly 250,000 men and well equipped with aircraft, ships and weapons.

Southern African whites are afraid, not primarily of the guerrillas facing their forces, but rather of the sheer proximity of overwhelming numbers of potential enemies. They respond with increasing repression, with unceasing efforts to build up their economies, and with attempts to hold and increase outside support.

So far, and for the foreseeable future, there is no question that the whites are, overall, getting the best of the conflict. They will probably be able to hold on to most of what they have as long as they continue to enjoy the support — tacit or open — of North America and Western Europe.

The support that southern African whites need — and receive — from the Atlantic community comes in two forms: 1) foreign trade and investment, which provides the economic basis for the maintenance of the white-dominated regimes, and 2) military assistance, much of which is provided by members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Canada is directly involved in the first category of support and, as a member of NATO, it is at least concerned with the second.

TRADE AND INVESTMENT

Some aspects of Canadian involvement in foreign trade and investment present a clear picture, while others, perhaps more important ones, remain shrouded. Trade in commodities is a straightforward item. A glance at Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures shows that Canada does a brisk trade with South Africa, Portugal and Angola and a small amount of business with Mozambique. Here is a brief rundown:

South Africa: Canada imported $39.3 million worth of South African commodities in 1968, including $16.4 million worth of sugar. It exported some $68.3 million worth to that country, including more than $2 million worth of aircraft and more than $22 million worth of motor vehicles.

(Since the DBS does not count gold — a major South African export — as a commodity, there is probably a great deal missing from the figure for imports from South Africa.)

Portugal: Angola's and Mozambique's colonial master sold us $12.3 million worth of goods in 1968 and bought $6.3 million worth.

story by Christopher Leo

Angola: Canada imported $7.7 million in goods — most of it was coffee — from Angola and exported $376,637 worth in 1968.

Mozambique: Canada bought $579,422 worth of tea from Mozambique in 1968 and not much else. We sold $1.8 million worth of goods.

That is the clear part of the picture. Among the murky parts, an outstanding one concerns Rhodesia. Since the white government of that country unilaterally declared its independence of Britain in 1965 in order to avoid giving the vote to black citizens, it has been the object of a boycott and embargo recommended by the United Nations.

The DBS figures would have us believe that Canada does almost no business with Rhodesia. It is widely accepted, however, that Rhodesia circumvents the boycott by routing its trade through other countries, especially South Africa. The figures, therefore, do not reveal the extent to which Canadian goods are bought by Rhodesians and Rhodesian goods by Canadians.

Another area that remains murky is that of foreign investment. A scattering of information is available from various sources. For example, the Rand Daily Mail of South Africa carried an article in 1967 about a speech by the chairman of Alcan Aluminium of South Africa to a group called the Canadian-South African Businessmen's Association.

The Alcan chairman reported that his company planned to double Canadian investment in South African aluminium by 1972. Alcan, the Daily Mail noted, supplies 75 per cent of South Africa's aluminium ingot requirements.

RAPID EXPANSION

The African National Congress says the third largest farm machinery plant in the world belongs to Massey Ferguson of South Africa. "This typifies the rapid expansion of this company in South Africa and its steady acquisition of other companies," the ANC publication Sechaba says.

"However," Sechaba adds, "while the Canadian Massey-Ferguson provides technical advice and research, it has severed its formal ties with the South African company so as not to endanger its other international investments. Another Massey-Ferguson plant . . . exists in Southern Rhodesia." The ANC says that the International Nickel Company of Canada is also active in South Africa.

It is not only private Canadian investment that is active in South Africa. According to the Toronto Star, Polymer Corporation, Canada's publicly owned synthetic rubber producer, owns a 20 per cent interest in the Synthetic Rubber Company of South Africa.

It would be possible to go on dropping gems of information, but all of them combined would not begin to add up to a clear and comprehensive picture of Canadian-southern African investment activities. In the absence of a prodigious research effort, it would not be possible to estimate the extent of those investments, nor — more important — to judge whether they form a pattern that would yield politically possible means of striking an economic blow at the southern African regimes. But it is reasonable to assume that the Canadian government has all this information at its fingertips.

Our government, however, vacillates. On the one hand — presumably its left hand — it officially deplores the southern African systems of white domination. On the other hand — possibly the government's right hand — the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in a slick-paper publication entitled Foreign Trade, offers businessmen detailed information on investment opportunities in southern Africa.

An economic remnant of the 1950s adds another aspect to the Canadian government's encouragement of trade with the Republic of South Africa. Although South Africa withdrew from the Commonwealth in 1961, Canada continues to extend Commonwealth trade preferences to it. The Toronto Star commented editorially last week:

On March 21st, 1960 a large group of Africans were demonstrating peacefully at Sharpeville in South Africa against the repressive "pass laws" which required Africans to carry identification at all times. The police opened fire into the crowd, killing 67 persons and wounding 186. Seventy-five percent were shot in the back.

"It is not only hypocritical but absurd that South African goods should be entering Canada at an advantage over the products of many countries with whom we have no quarrel whatever. And it's nothing short of disgraceful that a company owned by the Canadian public should be in a position to profit from the economic injustice which South Africa imposes on its black people."

NATO

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, of which both Canada and Portugal are members, has played a major role in contributing to Portugal's domination of Angola and Mozambique.

Portugal has been supplied, through NATO, with large numbers of aircraft, heavy weapons for its army, and ships. In addition, according to the London Observer, seven NATO installations on Portuguese soil were built with minimal contributions from Portugal and some £750,000 has been spent on local scholarships and scientific research, with a contribution of no more than £55,000 by Portugal.

All of this contributes, not only to the Portuguese economy, but also — and often directly — to its war effort in Angola and Mozambique. Airplanes, bombs, heavy weapons, and ships supplied through the North Atlantic pact are used in those colonies.

NATO lends additional support to Portugal by accepting its minimal contribution to European defense, a contribution that has been steadily decreasing as the fighting in Africa has grown heavier.

United States relations with Portugal, after undergoing a brief chill in the early days of the Kennedy administration, appear to have been warming steadily ever since. Arms supplied through NATO are not supposed to be used in Africa and, although the U.S. has taken note of Portuguese violations of this rule, it has made no move to stop them.

France, for its part, makes no secret of its status as a supplier of weapons to white southern Africa and West Germany, despite repealed official denials, has been a major supplier of aircraft that Portugal uses in Africa.

Singlehandedly, Canada can neither change the course of NATO nor undermine the white regimes of southern Africa. But we have an advantage over the United States, France and West Germany: we are not tied, by diplomatic and political strings, to open support of white rule in southern Africa.

It is possible for the Canadian government to state where it stands and to follow its words with action, thereby, at the very least, helping to focus more attention on an all-but-forgotten war and on the thriving European colonialism and white domination in Africa that has brought that war about.

Canada can also indicate, more strongly, its support for Zambia and Tanzania, both of which, by opposing the regimes on their southern borders, face border incursions and sabotage in reprisal.

An embassy in Zambia would show Canada's concern for the fate of that nation, which is boxed in on three sides from outlets to the sea and which remains partially dependent economically upon the regimes it opposes.

As for Tanzania, Canada last year allowed a five-year aid programme for the training of Tanzania army personnel to lapse, apparently because Tanzania's desire to establish defenses against air incursions from Mozambique conflicted with a Canadian desire to stay out of trouble with Portugal. The aid programme could be renewed.

The war in southern Africa is likely to continue for a long time. The liberation organisations are not winning now, but they are on the move, and the white regimes have not succeeded in stopping them.

If we believe what we say when we condemn white minority rule, we should, if anything, assist those who are determined to end it. Certainly we should not be throwing economic obstacles in their path.

a war of liberation on many fronts

This article is drawn largely from interviews with, and the writings of the late Eduardo Mondlane. It is believed the Portuguese Secret Police were responsible for his assassination on February 3rd, 1969. As President of the Mozambique Freedom Movement, FRELIMO, he provided a dynamic leadership to unite Mozambicans in their struggle against the Portuguese, and start driving them out of their colony. Mozambique is a kinglypin to white supremacy in Southern Africa. Should FRELIMO be successful, South Africa and Rhodesia will be cut off from vital ports, with long borders facilitating the activities of freedom movements in their countries.

FRELIMO's history is typical of the movements engaged in the struggle for self-determination in Southern Africa.

Although Portugal conquered parts of Mozambique as early as the seventeenth century, uniform domination was not established until 1898, when the last Mozambican kings were defeated and banished. (The Berlin Conference of 1885 which assigned control of various parts of Africa to the European nations, gave Mozambique to Portugal.) Local rebellions occurred as late as 1917, but such isolated resistance was easily crushed.

The first stage of the movement which produced FRELIMO was the people's awakening understanding of the uniform nature of Portuguese domination. They became aware that Portugal was exploiting their natural and economic resources. Moreover, they themselves were exploited as a source of currency, as Portugal began to transport forced labour to South Africa and Rhodesia.

At present, the South African government has contracts with Lisbon to supply eight to ten thousand workers a year for not less than eighteen months. In a recent South African mining disaster two thirds of the victims were from Mozambique. The wives of the absent men are not compensated; in fact, they may be forced to work on the roads without pay as part of what the government calls the "self-help scheme". Henrique Galva, a Portuguese Inspector General, described the forced labour situation in 1947:

Eduardo Mondlane

tion is worse than simple slavery. Under slavery, after all, the native is bought as an animal is bought; his owner prefers him to remain fit. Yet here the native is not bought; he is hired by the state, although he is called a free man. And his employer cares little if he sickens or dies, because if he sickens or dies his employer will simply ask for another.

Although education does not flourish here (the UN figures estimate illiteracy at 95% of the population), literary protest has continued since the twenties. Although this type of protest is difficult to sustain under a fascist regime, it helped create awareness of resentment on a national, rather than a tribal, level.

Students began to organize, forming UNAMO (Nationalist Union of Mozambique) in 1949. Then the urban Africans formed two organizations, unfortunately divided by race into a black group and a mulatto group. But both expressed the same sentiment: resistance against Portuguese rule. The example of other liberation movements in Africa created hope in Mozambique, and non-political organizations became involved in discussions about liberation.

In the next stage, when independent states first developed in Africa, Mozambican nationalists left the country to organize. UDINAMO was organized in Rhodesia in the early sixties; another group, MANU, developed in Tanzania and Kenya. In 1962, the various nationalist groups joined together to form FRELIMO.

FRELIMO drew up a program involving four stages: to form political groups, to organize a military program, to launch a world-wide diplomatic attack on Portugal and to educate the people.

The first process, political organization, began in the country, since most of Mozambique is rural. FRELIMO linked itself to existing farmers' co-operatives and economic organizations, influencing them to engage in political action. In the towns, such work is more difficult, because of the

LEARNING FROM THE EXPERTS

In a 1967 interview with a West German journalist, General Hermes de Araujo Oliveira, the Portuguese commander in Angola, was quoted as saying:

"It is clear that at present the Americans are determined to retain the Portuguese provinces in Africa as a peace zone. Due to this change in America's African policy, Portugal received important moral support also because Portugal has the military situation under control. The Portuguese general staff has developed a system of modern guerrilla warfare which is considered also by Americans, French and British military critics to be perfect and which has brought about a complete change in military strategy. We do not only take advantage of French experiences in Indo China and North Africa, but also of methods used by the German Abwehr against French and Russian resistance movements." — Portugal and NATO strength of PIDE (International Police for State Defence). Organization in the towns is still clandestine.

As the second stage, FRELIMO realizes that war is inevitable and necessary, since it is unlikely that a Fascist, country, denying it's own people freedom will willingly grant such freedom to a colony. Indeed, when the Portuguese government invited the discussion in Mueda after some peaceful protests in northern Mozambique, the army surrounded, and massacred several hundreds of the co-operative Mozambicans.

Protesters in Angola and Guinea-Bissau have received similar treatment. Therefore, FRELIMO has contacted countries that could help to give military training, such as Algeria and Tanzania.

In spite of FRELIMO's belief that military action is necessary, they also try to influence world opinion against Portugal. They have offices in Dar es Salaam, Cairo, Algiers, New York, and student representatives in many other countries. They make use of the Trusteeship Council discussions at the U.N., and of other international conferences to isolate Portugal.

The fourth program is education. FRELIMO has twenty thousand students in bush schools, and has sent one hundred and fifty abroad to universities. (When FRELIMO was established in 1962 there were scarcely fifteen Mozambican Africans at that educational level.) They have established a secondary school at Dar es Salaam. This program is to provide FRELIMO with cadres with some education to support the new structures which it is developing.

Many obstacles hinder the fulfillment of FRELIMO's aims. Although tribalism was not a problem during the excitement of the early stages of the preparation, both tribalism and regionalism are a potential threat to unity. The Portuguese naturally hope to divide the nationalist forces with this weapon. The racial problem, however, has been solved within FRELIMO. Mulattoes and blacks may hold any position in the organization. In principal there is no discrimination against whites but they are not allowed to work as members of the Central Committee. This is necessary as a security measure in a country where the European settlers are overwhelmingly racist and anti-nationalist.

The most serious problem comes from outside the country, however, in the form of NATO aid to Portugal. Because of NATO's help, Portugal possesses extremely sophisticated weapons, although officially only France "allows" these to be used in the colonies. Some of the weapons were made in Canada.

Despite these obstacles, FRELIMO has had substantial success in it's military struggle. It controls all of the province of the province of Cabo Delgado, except the towns, and over two-thirds of the province of Niassa. The towns in these provinces are thus isolated, and the Portuguese can only reach them by air. The Rovuma river is also in Frelimo's hands. It is possible to cross into Mozambique from friendly neighbourhood countries without hiding.

There are other areas of intense struggle, partly guerrilla action and partly regular action with heavier equipment. In these areas most of the population is with FRELIMO, sustaining the fighters militarily and economically.

In a third type of area, only guerrilla action is possible, and the fighters must hide constantly. In these areas the guerrillas work clandestinely, mining roads and ambushing the Portuguese in an attempt to push further south.

All militants involved in the struggle undergo at least three months of political training, and there is a massive programme of such political training in the rural areas. This is essential to prepare the people for the length of the war with Portugal, once their initial enthusiasm begins to wane. Many factors create discouragement: Portugal's growing arsenal, the danger of help from Rhodesia and South Africa, the continued support of N.A.T.O. and the increasing economic involvement of the Western Powers in the Portuguese colonies.

On the other hand however, the European troops are at a serious disadvantage in guerrilla combat, especially in the isolated areas where they cannot easily obtain supplies. FRELIMO hopes to improve and increase its production of homemade explosives, and to adapt Vietnamese and Cuban guerrilla techniques to her own struggle. The Portuguese are using all the techniques developed by the U.S. in Viet Nam, including napalm bombs. Hopefully, like the U.S. forces the Portuguese will fail.

FRELIMO is also trying to create a new Mozambique through programs other than the military and educational. It has organized a health service, with centres ranging from simple first aid posts to small clinics. Although drugs, equipment and personnel are inadequate, the bulk of the population is better served than it was under the Portuguese.

NATO CARRIES THE CAN

(A leader of the Mozambique insurgents) claims that FRELIMO could take Mozambique in three or four years if the West withheld all aid to Portugal. Since 1959 Lisbon has received nearly $400 million of American aid under NATO. . . .

American diplomats in Africa see little merit in "carrying the can" for Portugal. As one of them puts it: "Portugal makes a very good thing out of membership of NATO, and gives peanuts in return." — The Economist, 10 May 1969.

Local campaigns for vaccination against typhoid, tetanus and tuberculosis have been carried out, as well as a mass campaign against smallpox. Health education programs in the schools and army are helping to spread a basic knowledge of hygiene. In these programs, FRELIMO fights against a desperate lack of qualified personnel and supplies.

The struggle has also produced two rather paradoxical results. On one hand, native culture (e.g. music, art, and crafts) has re-emerged from the despised and neglected status forced on it by the Portuguese. On the other hand, new influences are freeing Mozambique from the cultural isolation forced on it by Portugal. Thus the militants who have been abroad spread knowledge of other cultures, from the U.S.A. to the People's Republic of China. New themes are being introduced into the traditional cultural forms. Perhaps one of the best symbols of FRELIMO's attempt to build a modern nation out of Mozambique's own culture is the appearance of the guerrilla fighter as a subject among the more traditional figures of the Makonde sculptors. The combination of the re-emergence of the suppressed culture and the liberating contact with the outside world may be the key to creating a nationalism transcending regional and tribal division, and strong enough to resist the technological advances of the Portuguese colonialists.

WAR IN PORTUGUESE ANGOLA

The eight year liberation struggle in Angola has been in response to long colonial oppression by Portugal. Consider the dismal heritage of five centuries of Portuguese exploitation: 9 doctors per million people; an infant mortality rate of 60 per cent; life expectancy of 28 years; 96 per cent illiteracy; endemic malaria, leprosy, scurvy; and near-slavery thinly disguised as "contract labour", with all the profits flowing to the privileged white settler elite and the Portuguese oligarchy, backed by growing American and South African financial interests. (The list of grievances could easily be extended: seepticars are referred to recent issues of the U.N. Statistical Yearbook.)

By the beginning of the sixties, the despair of the Angolan people had reached new depths, bringing about a popular uprising. Typical of the Portuguese reaction was the eyewitness account by United Church minister Sid Gilchrist concerning "... the bodies of helpless Africans, remote from the site of the revolution. . . buried by the hundreds in the ground by bulldozers, and thrown into the Cuanza River until it stank so that chains were placed across it to catch the rotting corpses. . ." (Angola Awake, Ryerson Press, 1968, pp. 53-4) Such atrocities are the natural consequence of the attitude of Portuguese military authorities that is exemplified by the remarks of Army Minister Mario Silva: "We are going to fight savages. We are going to fight wild beasts who are not Portuguese because they obey orders from international communism." (Ehnmak, Angola and Mozambique, p. 19)

In the past eight years, the Movimento Popular de Libertacao de Angola (MPLA), the vanguard of the Angolan revolution has steadily widened the revolution's military fronts. The MPLA is now fighting in 9 of Angola's 15 districts. Though MPLA troop figures are (understandably not publicized, the movement's success can be gauged by the increasing burden on metropolitan Portugal: in 1962 Lisbon's total defense budget (including expenditures on domestic repression and for NATO) was $200,000,000; by 1967 Lisbon was spending $175,000,000 exclusively on defense of its African possessions; and by 1968 Portugal was spending 40 per cent of its total budget on defense.

During this period, not withstanding its U.N. rhetoric to the contrary, United States policy has been to step up military aid to Lisbon's fascist regime — such aid is now upwards of $400,000,000 annually. Revealing was U.S. Admiral R. E. Libby's 1967 statement in a Brazilian newspaper that it is in the interest of America to support Portuguese policy in Africa and that Lisbon's colonial wars are comparable to the American intervention in Viet Nam. (loc. cit.) Similarly, Melvin Laird, appointed by President Nixon as U.S. Secretary of Defense, has long been a public supporter of Portuguese rule. For example in a 1966 Congressional speech, glowingly citing an article entitled "Red Menace in Africa" and emphasizing that "... we must define America's interests" not only in southeast Asia but "... in other equally important parts of the world where conflicts are erupting. . ." Laird paid tribute to "... the importance of Portugal to American foreign policy with regard to both the Atlantic community and Africa." (Congressional Record, 22 Oct. 1966) With Laird now in the Pentagon and with extensive new Gulf Oil Company investments in Angola, one may safely assume 'bipartisan' continuity in U.S. Angolan policy.

South African politicians have also been quick to grasp the strategic implications of the Angolan revolution, for clearly, in the words of pro-apartheid United Party boss Sir de Villiers Graaf: "While Angola is controlled by Portugal, it offers South Africa a completely safe border and a buffer state." (U.N.A./AC, 28 March 1968) Moreover, the Vorster government realizes that with its substantial petroleum resources, "Angola could save the Republic of South Africa if the Afro-Asian bloc succeeds in cutting off South Africa's vital oil supplies." (Johannesburg Star, 1 Aug. 1964) interview with a freedom fighter

Tony Boustha was born around 1938 (according to the missionaries' estimates) in a Mozambican village. Largely through chance, he was able to attend school, first near his own village and later at a Jesuit boarding school fifty miles away.

In 1962 he joined the Mozambique Freedom Movement (FRELIMO) underwent three months military training and then spent three years in the liberated regions of Mozambique. He is presently a graduate student in Development Planning at U of T, and plans to return to work with FRELIMO after his courses are finished.

Interviewer: Tony, can you remember your early experiences with the Portuguese?

Tony: My first reaction started when I was home from missionary school. The police came to my village early in the morning and I was the first to see them. I rushed into the house and told my brother to hide. The police came to ask for my brother, because they needed him. Of course, I knew, because I had seen many lorries passing, many police coming into the village to arrest people for forced labour in the plantations and in the mines in South Africa. So I said I didn't know where my brother was.

The police insisted. They said, if you refuse to tell us where he is, you are the one who is going to go for forced labour. I was about 11 or 12. They took me to the village chief, who threatened that he would beat me and that he was going to send me to the Portuguese authorities. I told them that I really didn't know where my brother was. Then they asked for my identification. Now one thing is true in Mozambique, that the missionaries are very much respected, both by the African people and the Portuguese. So once they saw that I was a student, they released me and let me go home.

Another time I remember the police came early in the morning and took all the women. My mother said she would be back at night and went with the other women. They went to clean the roads all day. The women are supposed to carry their food with them, and they are not paid one penny. This is called the "self-help scheme". I could not understand this, that they could take a woman away from her family and home, and not even pay her for her work.

Another experience: I went one time with my brother to the marketing place to sell cattle. We did this when we needed money to buy things or to pay taxes. To my surprise, the Portuguese determined the price for you. You had no bargaining power at all. They would offer 500 or 600 escudos; an escudo is worth 3 cents, so you can figure out that this was not very much money.

I also discovered that each family had to produce a certain amount of cotton each year. This was a scheme when the Portuguese had started manufacturing and they didn't have enough cotton. The Portuguese authority determined how much land could be used for food and how much must be used for cotton. And if you didn't produce enough cotton, you are going to be arrested or beaten. Because they had to spend almost all their time growing cotton, my family had to buy food almost every year.

What were your experiences at the missionary school?

We spent more time working in the fields than learning how to read or write. What do they teach? They teach us exactly the same things that children learn in Lisbon. You start by learning how to read and write in Portuguese; we are not allowed to learn about our own language at all. Secondly, they teach us mathematics and history — but the whole history is Portuguese history. Absolutely nothing about Africa and Mozambique, except that the Portuguese discovered Mozambique in 1498. In geography, all we learn about is Portugal. What did you do after graduation from this school?

After I finished school the priests asked me for various reasons if I would like to be a priest. I didn't know a black person could be a priest. I said sure, I would love to. But after 12 years in the seminary, I was asked to quit as a politically-minded person. The Portuguese came to this conclusion for three reasons.

First, an old man's children had not taken care of his cattle, which had wandered into the Jesuits' gardens. The old man came to claim his cattle, offering to pay for the damage they had done. But the Jesuits said to forget about it, and kept his cattle. This man came to me, and as I said the missionaries are respected, and at this point I had a cassock. I was very angry, and let him take back his cattle, saying that I would take the responsibility. So the father superior wrote to my bishop, and said that I was a racist because I protected my own people against the priests.

That was one incident. Another time, when I was in the hospital, I didn't stand up in front of a Portuguese governor. I didn't know who he was. So he reported to my bishop that because I was a seminarian, I thought I was better than the Portuguese authorities.

The last incident was when I was in Malawi. I wrote to friends that I was impressed by Dr. Banda, who was organizing his people to demand self-determination. After the Portuguese censors opened my letters, the authorities asked my bishop to make me quit the seminary.

I had difficulty getting a job because of my bad reputation as a politically minded person. So I became a teacher at a school in Tete. I opened a night school, free of charge, for the African people. When the government found out, I was taken for interrogation by the authorities. They tried to get me to change to a government school job, but I refused. Then they offered to ask me to become an assimilado (an educated African who cooperates with the Portuguese in return for improved legal status and other privileges. From this they concluded that I was truly a politically-minded person, and I began to have real problems.

Next they sent two soldiers to spy on me at the night school, to see if I was talking against the Portuguese. But they didn't find out anything. When I found out I was on a list of people to be arrested I went to Beria and got in touch with the nationalists there. This was 1961. I decided to work with them. I went to Malawi and then to Tanzania where I joined UDANAMO, the Democratic Nationalist Movement of Mozambique.

In a refugee camp in Dar es Salaam, I met with the nationalist leaders, but there were many disagreements among them. I decided to go to the U.S. as a student. There I talked with Dr. Eduardo Mondlane, and explained to him about the situation. He went back in 1962 to organize the nationalists into a front. When I finished my B.A. Dr. Mondlane asked me to come back to Dar es Salaam, which I did with all my heart, I have been working with FRELIMO since then.

Why did you come to Canada?

We had no one in Canada, and we were very excited that for the first time a Western country had voted against Portugal in the U.N. We thought maybe Canada could help us somehow. So I came here instead of to the U.S. or Eastern Europe.

What sort of work did you do with FRELIMO?

I taught math at the Mozambique Institute, then worked in the financial department. Then I was with Radio Tanzania's External Services broadcasting back to Mozambique. Finally I went to work in the semi-liberated areas — that was my first real experience.

I saw people being bombed with napalm. In an area like that, if you have any education you are like a father — everyone came to me. I had to take care of everything. Mostly I was setting up a farmers co-operative for agriculture reconstruction. But almost every day I had to take sick and injured people, people who had been bombed, to our centres to be taken to hospitals in Tanzania. This was my most bitter experience, because every day I saw many planes bombing people, many women and children killed. It was my most exciting time and my most bitter.

It is very easy to sit at a desk and be a revolutionary, but when you see the reality, it becomes serious, I saw that revolution is very difficult. But I became more determined to carry on the struggle. It is very difficult when the education is so bad, to explain a co-op to the 96% of the people who are illiterate. It's not easy to communicate so they can understand you. But the people are very willing to listen. One thing they want: no matter how educated you are, they want you to identify yourself with them. That was a very good experience for me. I was very happy to get a lot of co-operation from them, and things became a little easier for me. I was very happy that even young people were willing to fight and there will be growing fighting for their freedom.

Samora Machel, chief commander of FRELIMO's military forces (right) with women and children of village in Tete province near proposed site of Cabora Bassa dam.

A dam to seal in white supremacy

The Cabora Bassa hydroelectric dam would be a huge engineering undertaking, regardless of where it was situated. It will eventually produce up to 4,000 megawatts at peak capacity, very similar to the capacity of the huge Labrador undertaking at Churchill Falls. It dwarfs the Aswan Dam in Egypt by a factor of two and makes Niagara dim by comparison.

It will cost up to half a billion dollars which puts it in the financial league with the St. Lawrence Seaway.

But Cabora Bassa is much more than an engineering project. On the part of Portugal it is a last gasp effort to maintain control of their Mozambique colony. The high cost of maintaining 40,000 troops and other extensive security measures has meant that the colony actually costs the home country money (unlike Angola which returns a net profit to the Portuguese dictatorship).

The huge dam will provide a reservoir for the irrigation of 3.7 million acres of adjacent land and the development will open up a total of 85,000 square miles of bush into which the Portuguese hope to attract one million whites and by so doing, entrench white supremacy forever.

As a South African newspaper proudly proclaimed, Cabora Bassa "will also greatly stabilize a highly sensitive area of Southern Africa vulnerable to attacks by rebel guerrillas — the Mozambique enclave spreading westwards between Rhodesia, Zambia and Malawi."

Therein lies part of the South African interest, but the same article indicates another major impact that the colonial Portuguese and their South African soul-mates are hoping for. "Politically, Cabora Bassa will create still closer ties between Mozambique, South Africa and Rhodesia."

That article provides a clear reminder of the real meaning of the Southern Africa entente. It shows how South Africa is attempting not only to push her defense perimeter beyond her own borders, but also to reap immense financial gain from her own form of economic neo-colonialism.

It is a South African led consortium, Zambese Consorcio Hidro-Electrico or ZAMCO, which has won the contract for the first three stages of the project. Its principal participant is Anglo-American Corporation (which also has extensive holdings in Rhodesia Zambia and Canada.) E.T.S. Brown, executive director of Anglo American said after the contract award was announced that "75 per cent of the content for the construction of the dam would be "South African."

Two parallel transmission lines will take the bulk of the power generated at Cabora Bassa some 800 miles to South Africa and the towers to support those lines will absorb 65,000 tons of South African steel.

But it is not only the power that South Africa is eyeing. The Portuguese have calculated that the project will open up iron deposits capable of producing a million tons of ore a year, and deposits of titanium, manganese, nickel, copper, fluorospar, chrome and asbestos.

But in all the glowing reports about the project, nobody mentions the 24,000 Mozambiquans who will be forced off the land to be flooded.

The back-up of water behind the dam will make the Zambezi navigable for a total of 500 miles from Rhodesia to the Indian Ocean for barges up to 1,000 tons. This could have the beneficial effect of cheaper transportation for Zambia Malawi and Rhodesia if the project were being undertaken by a free and Independent Mozambique. Instead it is more likely to open Malawi and Zambia to an even more ominous threat — South African penetration.

By the same token, the publicity blurbs boast that Cabora Bassa will provide the cheapest power in the world." Cheapest for whom?

The third member of the Southern Africa entente is Producing 4000 megawatts of power, the dam will supply South Africa and is aimed at bringing a million more white settlers to the newly-irrigated strategic area.

Rhodesia which intends not only to get cheap power, but also to profit handsomely by selling cement, foodstuffs, and clothing etc. for the dam and the workers building it.

But the dam couldn't be built if it were not for the support that the Southern African entente gets from outside. Much of the money will be supplied by Barclay's Bank DCO which is a subsidiary of Barclay's Bank in England. In addition numerous German and French companies are involved in the consortium.

The huge Swedish electrical company, ASEA, was also in the consortium at the beginning but was forced to withdraw by sustained public pressure in Sweden, based on the likelihood that the project will contravene the mandatory economic sanctions against Rhodesia adopted by the UN Security Council.

And therein lies the hope. Frelimo has already vowed to disrupt the construction within Mozambique and the scrub terrain, the many berrubs which will have to be constructed and the necessity of barging much of the equipment will be fruitful ground for Frelimo action.

Sweden showed, it is possible to prevent the outside help which the project needs from reaching there. The ASEA participation was absolutely necessary to the project because they were the experts in high voltage Direct Current power transmission.

English Electric company, which also has access to high tension transmission, then tried to pick up the part of the contract dropped by ASEA and public pressure in Britain forced English Electric out. The project has now been delayed by the search for a new partner with this specialized knowhow.

Canada is one of the few countries in the world which is building similar high tension lines and Canada is one of the obvious places for the ZAMCO consortium to turn for expertise. It is up to us to ensure that they don't get it.

An artist's impression of the proposed Cabora Bassa dam in Mozambique. Half a billion dollars to entrench white minority rule.

INTERNATIONAL CONSPIRACY?

Conspiracy views of history carry with them the danger of obscuring the basic economic driving force which motivates most actions. It is not, therefore, necessary to postulate the existence of wicked cabals of South African, Rhodesian and Portuguese racists plotting with the captains of European and North American industry to impede the progress of the peoples of Southern Africa towards freedom. They are simply acting out the roles in which they find themselves. The fact that behind the Cabora Bassa project is an interlocking network of free-world capital represents a normal, rather than an exceptional, state of affairs. It is just that in the case of Cabora Bassa it is a little easier than normal to lay these links bare.

It is therefore understandable that FRELIMO is dedicated to the destruction of the Cabora Bassa project, which, they say, is "aimed at the further oppression of the people of Mozambique and of Southern Africa as a whole . . . it is another device being used by capitalism, racism and colonialism in Southern Africa." FRELIMO is committed to harass and destroy the dam at every stage of its construction; already it has blown up bridges on supply routes in the area around the dam and a lorry carrying supplies to the dam site. It is important for the struggle to free Southern Africa that FRELIMO does destroy the dam — and that we help them.

from "Anti-Apartheid News", February 1970
South Africa is unique in the capitalist and imperialist systems of the world. It combines the most special and backward forms of colonialism, for the bulk of the African population, and the most advanced forms of capitalism, imperialism, neo-colonialism and fascism.

The economic and mineral wealth of South Africa is to say the least, fabulous. It accounts for 75% of the gold mined in the capitalist world, it has valuable minerals like copper, iron ore, coal, manganese, diamonds, chromium, nickel, thorium, vanadium, lithium, uranium and numerous others. It is a treasure house and jewel for foreign capital and investment.

The estimated foreign investment in South Africa is approximately £ 3,000 million of which Britain accounts for about 60% and U.S. 13%. Through the ruthless exploitation of African labour the rates of profits in South Africa are higher than anywhere in the world. The British monopolists are guaranteed 12.5% profit as against 8.5% in the rest of the world, the U.S. 20.6% as against 10.4% Japan, West Germany and other western countries have made South Africa the hunting ground for super-profits.

South African companies like the Anglo-American Company and many others have all got interlocking interests and directorships with British and U.S. companies. Economically therefore, the South African racists who cling to Apartheid are an integral and key part of the exploitation by the imperialists on an international scale. The merger of White S.A. capital with international finance has been a specific feature of S.A. penetration in the economies in many countries in Africa and elsewhere.

GREAT NEWS!

South Africa's children are being indoctrinated in the ways of the Special Branch from a very early age. The monthly children's magazine Patrys which is circulated by the police and schools on behalf of Voortrekker Press, a political publishing group of the Nationalist Party, has taken up the building of a Detectives Club, and the inculcation of police attitudes in the minds of white, especially Afrikaaner youth. A recent issue of Patrys contained a photo series "the building in the woods" which has as its villain a savage, loin-clothed African who is preoccupied with plunging his spear into whites so as to add to his collection of skulls. The heroes of the strip are three virtuous and brave Afrikaaner children. A story "Gurfad on the Border", contains a character's comments: "I don't know much about animals, but I do know the Bantu. I know him as a superstitious scoundrel."

The Detective Club run by the magazine is flourishing to such an extent that the entry forms warn that "Patrys detectives must understand that they are only the eyes and ears of the Police. . . and only have the right of arrest" in an emergency. The magazine gives an address for General-Major Joubert at Headquarters, South African Police, Pretoria. It also gives the following message. "Will all Patrys Detectives in Pretoria North who are aged over 15 years please write their name, address and date of birth on a stout card and hand it in at the Charge Office at Pretoria North Police Station." Membership is however open to children from the age of 12. Gang-badges are advertised in which a man is shown caught in the sights of a hunting rifle. Another carries the motto "Revenge is Sweet". In these pages, headlines scream

"Detectives, gangs, terrorists — fighter and Communist-haters! Here is great news!!" It then offers membership of yet another organisation the CVC which is linked to various police stations. On another page, the editor's comment on a member's letter: "I am glad you told me that one can shoot more accurately at a tin when one thinks of it as a Communist." Patrys is of course also distributed in Rhodesia. Sechaba Magazine February 1970

PROJECT MOZAMBIQUE

It is proudly proclaimed by the Portuguese that they have been in Mozambique for more than 400 years, bringing 'civilization' to a primitive and savage people. Their achievements however tell a different tale:

- between 95 and 98 per cent of the African population are illiterate;
- 94 per cent (according to official Portuguese statistics) depend basically on subsistence agriculture for their livelihood;
- by 1965 the Portuguese have produced less than 10 African university graduates;
- Mozambique has one of the highest infant mortality rates in Africa, and Africans have a life expectancy of less than 30 years;
- tropical diseases are endemic and there are periodic epidemics of small-pox, typhoid, yellow fever etc.;
- the Portuguese have provided hardly any health services whatsoever in the rural areas, and most Mozambiques never see a doctor or a medical clinic.

Nevertheless Portugal clings tightly to Mozambique, outlawing any political activity and brutally suppressing any opposition or protest. On 16th June 1960 more than 500 Africans were killed in Mueda for protesting against poor wages and political suppression.

As in the rest of Southern Africa, the people of Mozambique have been left no alternative but to fight for their emancipation. In the words of President Julius Nyerere of Tanzania, "the demand for freedom has been rejected in principle. The door to progress is shut, bolted and barred."

Project Mozambique was formed recently in the belief (as expressed by President Nyerere) that: "we cannot call for freedom in Southern Africa, and at the same time deny all assistance to those who are fighting for it, when we know, as well as they do, that every other means of achieving freedom has been excluded by those in power".

Project Mozambique has set as its priority sending aid to those regions of Mozambique from which the Portuguese have been expelled. At present approximately 15 per cent of the population live in these areas, covering about one fifth of Mozambique.

FRELIMO, the Mozambique freedom movement, faces an awesome Portuguese military machine with an estimated 40,000-60,000 troops in Mozambique. Its task is that of freeing the rest of the country from Portuguese domination, as well as defending and providing for the liberated areas. With the active support and participation of the mass of the population, FRELIMO is already serving the people far more effectively, under war conditions and constant bombing, than the Portuguese ever did.

Since 1967 more than 120 schools have been established with 20,000 pupils. Hundreds of students have been sent to universities and technical schools abroad. Agricultural reconstruction and cooperative schemes have been established, and the liberated regions are producing considerably more food than when they were under the Portuguese. Despite a critical lack of medical supplies and personnel, various types of health centres have been established throughout the countryside providing much improved facilities, and vaccination for a large percentage of the population.

Supplies remain a very serious problem however. Peasant farmers badly need simple agricultural tools. Most school-children are without even notebooks, pencils or pens. Very few people have shoes, or more than a few rags of clothing. Bicycles would greatly improve the transportation of people and goods. Medical supplies and equipment are in desperately short supply. Funds are needed for the schools and institutes which train teachers, technicians and medics.

Project Mozambique is trying to fill some of these needs. High school students are collecting school equipment, and investigating the possibility of sending bicycles. A Fund-raising and Publicity Committee is working with other groups and organisations to raise money and materials for specific projects. A Research Committee has been collecting information, carrying out research, and publishing material on Mozambique in particular and the whole Southern African situation in general.

Only with the support and donations of lots of Canadians can Project Mozambique give effective help to the people of Southern Africa, in their struggle for freedom. Their address is: 156 Dorset Road, Scarborough. Phone no. 535-3851.

RHODESIA (don't throw stones in a glass house!)

By BRYAN HADDON

Ian Smith's Unilateral Declaration of Independence (U.D.I.) for Rhodesia in 1965, there has been a fair amount of international interest in the country, and a half-hearted attempt at imposing economic sanctions. It is important to realise however, that both the old Rhodesia's new republic (adopted on March 1st.) are but steps in the long process of ending white rule (4 per cent of the population) as rulers of the country. Rhodesia became a self-governing republic of Britain in 1923. The Land Apportionment Act (1931) divided the country into white and black areas — 45% of the most fertile land and 55% of the most urban areas and 98% of the most fertile land. The population is completely segregated. Black children receive compulsory education until they are 16. Only 60 per cent of African children get any education at all, and most can spend less than four years at school.

In the sphere of politics, whites have been even more forceful in maintaining their dominance. Voting "qualifications" kept all but a handful of Africans off the Voters' Roll, and Smith's new constitution ensures permanent white control of the parliament.

To stop African political activity, some of the most repressive legislation in the world has been passed since 1958. The Law and Order Act:

- gives police almost unlimited powers of arrest and holding without trial;
- has outlawed all African political parties;
- imposes up to 20 years imprisonment "for throwing, or possessing a stone."

Meetings, strikes, boycotts and pickets are illegal. All African political leaders not in exile or underground have been imprisoned or detained without trial.

The only real difference that U.D.I. has made, is that previously Britain was theoretically able to change the situation in her colony: now it is patently obvious to Africans that she cannot and/or will not change it.

Thus the only alternative Africans have to increasing and ruthless oppression, is using violence to end it. They have made the choice.

Since 1965 Zimbabwe (the African for Rhodesia) freedom fighters have been training in guerrilla warfare tactics and entering the country.

Reports of these engagements have naturally been minimized by Ian

Smith's regime, but it is known that fighting has taken place in many areas in the West and North of the country.

A typical engagement occurred on January 15/16, 1970, when eight South African and five Rhodesian soldiers were reported killed, in a raid on Victoria Falls Airport.

The freedom movements have been concentrating however on building up their support in the rural areas, and supplying these people with arms. They are prepared for a long and bitter struggle. But in a country with four and a half million Africans and two hundred thousand whites, they believe that eventually they will triumph.

getting it on

THEATRE COMPANIES SPEND MUCH TIME coming into being in Toronto, but they usually manage to live and die with significant rapidity. Consequently, there is always a new company opening — new fodder for the daily paper critics to churn into neat little slaughterhouse articles, new opportunities for what must be called (for want of a better word) the Toronto Theatre Audience.

With a genesis in the Central Library, Hart House, the Poor Alec, or even Mirvish's Warehouse Beautiful (splendiferous Royal Alexandra), with underpaid staff and often overpaid foreign luminaries (who in hell set Clifford Williams' salary?), various companies have begun growling and ended grunting to pathetic finishes in unfinished, unsuccessful seasons.

What kills them? Why do so many ostensibly Good Ideas cave in of their own weight? Although simple answers should ideally be avoided, they might well be impossible in dealing with Toronto theatre. There are really three established forces working for the failure of any theatre company in this city.

CAN NATHAN COHEN FIND LOVE AND HAPPINESS WITH ANY NEW THEATRE COMPANY?

Probably. If it's staffed in large by the APA-Phoenix Players, directed by Gielgud or Olivier, and offers a season which includes Ghelderode, Shakespeare, and at the most one non-established contemporary play.

And Cohen is the best we've got in daily journalistic criticism. Jim MacPherson walks a clever middle line of non-commitment, while Herbert Whittaker is a likable man who wants very much to be objective while giving a new company the benefit of the doubt, right to the end of the season.

Moreover, Cohen's responses to the plays he reviews are almost always acute, despite the limitations of his medium. Journalistic drama criticism is seeing a production, then going to an office and instantly putting one's impressions on paper for publication on the morrow. And when you have two or three professional productions in a week to cover (yes cover; you're still a newspaper reporter), the words and phrases become more difficult to find.

Because you have to be clever. You have to write interestingly as well as intelligently. The art of writing a review is very difficult to separate from the art of responding as acutely as possible to a production. Many people will read your material with no view whatsoever to attending a performance of the play in question. They read it because of the clever kill you come up with in three or four words. And unfortunately, it's easier to write destructively than in praise. The well-turned dagger has much greater appeal to the reader than the best, most carefully articulated praise. You have to entertain as well as discuss the merits of others' entertainments.

That in mind, can one accuse the critics of destroying theatre companies with consistent adverse criticism (or simple hatchet jobs, as is usually the case)? While positive criticism can help only slightly in encouraging the people who will go to anything that is presented on a stage, consistently negative criticism is probably ineffectual in deterring them from going anyway. Those of us who see whatever possible simply do not trust the critics sufficiently to stay away from slammed plays. Moreover, there simply isn't a great deal of choice in an evening's theatrical entertainment, although admittedly there is much more going on here today than back in the days before Theatre Toronto (let dead dogs lie).

by Bill Rockett

But consistently negative criticism will do nothing to encourage or develop a new theatre audience. And we have yet to see what effect a Nathan Cohen possessed of the same acute sensitivities but controlling the tongue-lash might accomplish. In the meanst, let's look at the material we have to work with — that is, the people of this city who represent our potential audience pool.

A PISGAH VIEW OF TRAWNA: FUTZ WITHOUT THE LOVE
Yeah. They call it Hogtown, don't they? Didn't they. But the New City Hall, you say. And the excitement of Centennial and Expo. And new attitudes, new blood.

Well, Toronto is the city whose mayor arrives three minutes before the final curtain of its Arts Centre's grand opening night because he was attending a Rate Payers' Meeting. And Mavor Moore and Bill Dennison both assert that because this city is a biggy, and the bestest in Anglo Canada, it should be taking the lead in expression of English-language culture and arts.

The ironic thing about all this is that it's inestimably true. If any city in Canada has the means or potential to sustain such activity, it's Toronto. CBC has located its English Radio and TV Drama central clearing houses here. There are a great many talented technicians, performers, and writers in this one city (most of them out of work, or teaching high school in Etobicoke). But where are the audiences?

Nowhere. Unless you count the pubs, the television rooms in apartments and homes, and the cinemas. Oh, they make it to Hair, that incredible commercialisation of what was a commercial production to begin with. But Hair is hip and can derive its audiences from Don Mills and places of such ilk (nobody in the core of the city can afford those bloody prices).

Much effort has been made to establish the existence of a theatre tradition in Toronto (see the Globe and Mail Magazine of a few weeks ago). But all such efforts succeed in proving is that a great many stage performances have been done. Generally of three kinds: the touring road show, which continues down to our own day in what goes on in the O'Keefe Barn; the little theatre groups, where everyone participates and thinks it's a gas, but the audiences of which are drawn primarily from friends and relatives; and, finally, the semi-professional groups, so active over the last ten years and more or less thriving today.

I suggest it is to these last we must turn. Three years ago in Random, I praised companies like Montor Productions for doing good plays well, and tsk-tsked that they suffered from a lack of sufficient facilities. I wanted the money put up to build three or four theatres, small but well equipped, in a central area. On a strip. Near shops, boutiques, and galleries. Yorkville, say. Or Gerrard, even. To create a central area of activity. To provide at reasonable rents the facilities for groups like Passe Murraile and TWP, who have appeal for what is today the true potential audience in this city.

And you know by now whom I mean. Leave the Barn for the roadshow-cum-Beverly Hillbillies Watchers. The Royal Alexandra once it dumps Hair can revert to good travelling higher-priced repertory companies, if they can still be had (British National Theatre Company tours, etcetera). But we need the small theatres for the people who are making Paramount dump the accumulation of fifty years of Pretty Superstar Candy-coated Filmfactory material. We need the small theatres for the new audience under thirty who made Easy Rider the biggest financial success of the last four years. And are leaving Hello, Dolly out in the cold. Seventy-five per cent of the new film audience is in that age bracket. The theatre can get them. The theatre in Toronto absolutely needs them.

But they're ripping out Yorkville.

And they've put all their cultural eggs in the one basket of The Saint Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

THE OWL AND THE PUSSYCAT

Cold, but not slick. The building has neither the grace nor the opulence of, say, the Lincoln Centre in New York. But definitely better located than, say, the Garden State Centre for the Performing Arts in New Jersey, dumped as it is in the middle of the Turnpike (read Expressway and identify) and its attendant cow pastures.

Wise old Mavor Moore, the hedcock of Toronto theatrical Establishment, has got what he's wanted for a long time. He wants the town hall to turn into a genuine community centre, and the debate on the Spadina Expressway has borne him out on this as a possibility, even if it's difficult to imagine Torontonians up against the wall again.

But he wants the Theatre policy to be 'one of having a Canadian company doing primarily Canadian plays, not on the grounds of chauvinism but because there's not much point talking about a Canadian civilisation if we don't produce.'

Right. So we have our arts centre, a little prematurely as far as I'm concerned (I would have opted for those other theatres first, to be followed by an Arts Centre in ten years time, say). And Moore has selected a schedule of world premiers (remember Theatre Toronto's first season?).

Who needs the plush of the Lincoln Centre and its New York State Theatre if what's going on inside is getting to the right people? If the program is varied and responds in some way to the hulk new audience as well?

Programming a theatre season is a tricky business. Theatre Toronto blew it the first time around by offering only one play with any wide appeal, namely Hochhuth's Soldiers. We knew who Hochhuth was. We knew The Deputy, and we knew pretty much what to expect from the new play. But this was not true of The Drummer Boy, or Festival of Carols. The Feiffer offering, an interesting, well-produced play, had a few strikes against it in that its reputation of having bombed in New York preceded it here.

Remember Leon Major's first Hart House season for the Drama Centre. Aiming for a university audience, he did two plays which drew small houses and all involved were somewhat surprised. They failed to see that you can't build a theatre season on academic curiosity. One such play is enough; you need something that will draw a fifty per cent-plus house, so you can afford to do other things.

Major and Moore, surely aware of this, have attempted a diverse season. MAN Inc. is essentially a revue, offering music, dance, and the incredibly workable Living Screen. Striker Schneiderman is a period drama of traditional design. Knacker's ABC, a comedy by Boris Vian, is black but slapstick, following the theory that comedy always appeals, if in different ways to different people. Finally, Faust (which has yet to open) is an extravaganza of many scenes and some 150 characters — the operatic proportions Major always directs.

On the surface, a well-balanced season. Something for everybody. The comedy and MAN Inc. should appeal to the new audience, while the other two productions should draw the traditionalists. The Welcome Wagon Set and members of the TSO Women's Guild will support them all (at least they'll buy season tickets). Finally, Moore's got an essentially Canadian season. A Quebec revue, a Canadian translation of Faust, a Canadian-written play on the Winnipeg general strike.

It's a sensible season, and almost the sort an Arts Centre should be putting on. I say almost. Because absent from the season is any reliance upon the already-proven. Moore and Major, have given us a season of plays out of place in part. At least two of these shows belong in those small theatres we don't have. Half of the time given to experiment could and should be given in a state-sponsored Arts Centre to established plays by men like Brecht, Fischer and Albee. We'll have the Shaw Festival and Stratford in, but those are separate entities, different seasons. The balance of an Arts Centre home-grown program differs from that desirable in any other venture.

What has happened is that Toronto is trying to make its Art Centre do for the whole shot. And failing. Major and Moore are trying to kill all the birds with several tons of poured concrete. Poured concrete is cheap in construction, and our dated City Councils of the past few years have seen fit to concur with them. Economy is a marvellous thing.

Except when it negates what you should be trying to do.

But there is no sense in hawailing the construction of the Arts Centre now. We'll just have to keep pressing for those other theatres, although our chances of getting them now are considerably diminished. We have to get what we can from the existing program in the meantime. And that means careful, meaningful criticism of what has been done this year. What is good and what is simply bad.

The season is committed. And there are good things to say about what has been done and what is promised. Next week, I'll talk about each of the plays currently in repertory, and add a few remarks on the working text of Faust.

Suffice it to say for the present that we've blown it. But neither irrevocably, nor in an overly disastrous way. A successful salvage operation for next year is at least possible. The quality of acting, design and production on the Centre's stage at present proves that good theatre in Toronto is possible.

What we need is a wider approach to it all.

canada needs new political economy

Business and Government in Canada by K. J. Rea and J. O. McLeod Methuen Publications 397 pp. $4.95 (paper)

"We are in serious danger of ending up with political policies that make no sense economically and economic policies that make no sense politically. This is why we end the volume with a plea for rethinking old assumptions and developing a new and more sophisticated political economy."

With a plea for "rethinking old assumptions," two University of Toronto professors, K. J. Rea and J. T. McLeod, introduce their recently published anthology of readings, Business and Government in Canada. The authors suggest that social scientists in Canada are in urgent need of a new political economy which will more adequately cope with the current social and economic realities of Canadian society.

In the concluding essay, however, Professor Melville Watkins takes a hard look at the reality of power in a branch-plant economy and seems to suggest that a new theoría is not enough, that what is required in addition is a new political praxis.

As a volume of essays, the book is worth reading both because of the variety of material covered and because of its declared purpose of "rethinking old assumptions." There are some widely divergent styles and levels of writing represented. For example, between essays by Friedrich Von Hayek and Milton Friedman is a contribution by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. Although critics of Von Hayek and Friedman might not appreciate the ideological position which the two Chicago economists share with the Chamber of Commerce, it is quite useful to read both types of writing, if only to discover that whereas Friedman and Von Hayek use the principle of the free market to criticize our current economic system, the Chamber of Commerce people appear to think that free enterprise exists in Canada, and must be defended against the encroachments of State power. This illuminates an underlying assumption of the book, namely, the authors' contention that at the level of both academic social science and popular ideology, we don't know what kind of politico-economic system we have.

In their preface, the authors argue that Capitalism is an intellectual construct, an "artificial order invented to explain the emerging industrial society of the nineteenth century." From this premise they are critical of the two underlying assumptions of bourgeois economic thinking, arguing that: 1) it is foolish to maintain that society is naturally organized on the basis of private property and competitive markets; and 2) it is impossible to make the realities of the market conform to the theory of the competitive market.

At this point, this reader is with them, feeling that such a straightforward rejection of the competitive market model will lead to a more realistic, radical analysis of Capitalism in Canada. Unfortunately, the authors' recognition of the inadequacies of the bourgeois explanation of Capitalism is a double edged sword, and except for their inclusion of the Watkins piece, they are content to demonstrate the limits of the liberal explanation, without embarking on the development of a radical alternative for Canada. In sections two and three of the book we are exposed to a series of readings which amply reveal the mystifications and limitations of public policy in Canada, but it is only in Watkins' essay that the beginnings of alternative perspective is provided.

Section Four, "Toward a New Political Economy," begins with the second selection in the volume by Karl Polanyi, whose writing seems to provide the main underpinnings for the authors' conception of their project. Polanyi's writing is extremely suggestive, and is worth giving more time than we can here for it stands as criticism of both bourgeois and Marxist categories. However, useful as Polanyi's work is, it is really only a reformulation of the problem, and it is left to Mel Watkins to relate the problem to the Canadian context and provide us with an alternative approach.

Watkins' essay, "Economics and Mystification," is about power, and it is written as a critique of both bourgeois economic theory and the social role of the economist in a branch plant economy:

"Economists have a hang-up about power. They have power, or appear to have it. But they use it to support the system — the onrushing status quo — and might not appear to be powerful if they didn't. Above all, they don't, as intellectuals, understand power. Economic theory, the kind of theory that economists use, just doesn't come to grips with it."

In his essay Watkins uses specific policy documents such as the Carter Commission's Report and the Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada to illustrate the limitations of approaches to economic problems which ignore the social realities of power in the Capitalist, branch plant economy. He underlines the futility of trying to solve the problems of poverty through superficial tax reforms and other proposals which fail to come to terms with the structural problems of the capitalist economic system and the special problems relating to foreign ownership.

By redirecting our attention to the realities of power in Canadian society, the realities of advanced capitalism and American Imperialism, Watkins goes beyond the original thesis of the book to suggest not simply the development of a new political economy, but also the development of a new political praxis.

Essentially, what Watkins is saying is that the economist, qua economist, in Canada is trapped, he is a tool of the branch plant economy he is asked to serve, and he cannot leave behind the assumptions of that system and expect to maintain any power as a policy-maker. It is only when he leaves the academic realm and joins others in politically confronting the present power holders, that solutions to our current political and economic problems will be found.

bad acta

The February edition of Acta Victoria would have been acclaimed in the Fifties. But its publication in 1970 is a classic example of the failure of campus publications to make themselves relevant to their audiences. By their narrow choice of content and negligent, almost non-existent exploitation of their form, the Acta staff has published a magazine that will hardly be given a glance by the readers.

Literary magazines serve the interests of those on campus who wish to read the work their contemporaries, those who have work of sufficient quality to be published in a semi-professional magazine and those who are interested in the process of magazine publication.

Only three of the nine contributors to Acta are not staff members. Of these, K. R. Maddock has submitted an incomprehensible book review suitably entitled Theatre as Hieroglyph which refers to the book in question once in 1,000 words. On the other hand Ian Young and Fred Weihs have both submitted interesting pieces which suffer from the contemptuous design they are given.

Young's descriptive essay The Red Room is especially pleasant for its economic style and uncomplicated sentences. Contrast Young's writing with this from Acta editor John Ayre:

"My mind was beginning to register sharper images and I felt the dull tinny of Mexico City parties slowly dissolve into the atmosphere of Vera Cruz. I was even beginning to see the trip down to the Yucatan as essentially redemptive. I was chaining a whole load of boredom on the invisible carrier of dreams, dreams of escape into the Mayan jungles where temples rose strangely from the green thumbs of the tropic hills."

Weihs has prepared a poorly edited but intriguing essay entitled Life in a Mountain Road on white spirituals which tries to let this unique music speak for itself. Unfortunately he, like Young, is ignored graphically. While no attempt is made to give Young's piece visual appeal the failure to exploit the graphic opportunities of musical notation and spiritual song lyrics is even more obvious.

The staff contributions, naturally enough, receive more graphic attention, but none of the design support Random, Gargyle and even the Trinity Review have given their literary work. Amazingly the transcript of Graham Jackson's play To the Hollow which has already been produced, is not even supplemented by pictures of the performance.

Editor Ayre leads off his magazine with a short story of his own that is quoted above. He concludes with an interview with Northrop Frye that stands alone without photographs or any kind of visually appealing design. Frye says some rather intriguing things about religion and literature, but they are buried in the morass of tiny, blue type Ayre has chosen for the entire 52 pages.

As usual in publications such as this, the poems are a surprise bonus. Larry Frolick's The Polar Rose with its accompanying drawing by Michele McGibbon is one of the literary and graphic high-points. William Horton has had the misfortune of having his poem run into Ayre's story, but Bob Read's collection entitled The Bean Bag Toss is accorded its own section.

Despite these unhappy glimmers of talent, Acta is a loss for all three groups it should serve. It does not represent any cross section of skilled writers on campus, and those it does publish suffer from Acta's shoddy, negligent presentation. Finally, if you wish to learn how not to put out a magazine, turn to Acta. Any "literary" publication that persists in publishing full pages on the history of Victoria College, a table of contents and staff credits is not worth picking from its cardboard box.

Ride a Cock-Horse is not a musical but rather "a play with music", as its author Barry Brodie terms it.

Even more accurately it is two plays — a light comic treatment of the Lady Godiva story alternating with the remarkably un-comic story of the production of such a play — separated by songs.

The songs are the least successful part. I am not unaware that nursery rhymes are really political satires. Yet their relevance to either plot is really insufficient to justify the extent of their use. While some of the arrangements are interesting, the music generally lacks variety and distinction.

A play about a play is a dangerous device and the chief merit of Brodie's handling is that he keeps his two plots independent for the most part. This Kunsterdrama is at times an embarrassingly spiteful attack on Hair focussing as it does around Lady Godiva's nude scene.

Nevertheless the dramatic development of this section is powerful and effective. Tom Collins as a temperamental novice actor turns in a fine performance: he is really the only one from whom the cliché-ridden dialogue sounds completely convincing.

As far as the actual Godiva story is concerned, Brodie's ambitions are more modest but his success is more complete. Lady Godiva (Gayle Gibson) disguises herself and becomes the speech-writer for the revolutionary leader Tom (Rich Dallinger).

Meanwhile Tom's girlfriend Jenifer (Jody Alesandro) "negotiates" with Godiva's husband Leofric (Michael Macina) to drop his new tax law so that she can get Tom to occupy himself with more important things, like sex. When she tells him of her deal with Leofric he agrees, with a magnificent gesture,

"I find acedade with acedade."
"My," remarks Jenny, "your life-style has improved." The intrigue is satisfying although predictable and the dialogue, heavily laced with hip jargon, is highly polished.

It is the final integration of the two plots which is the least happy part of each. The intrusion of the serious mood of the one upon the light-heartedness of the other, even though objectively justified by the blinding of Tom on seeing Godiva, is passing.

Ride a Cock-Horse is being performed tonight and tomorrow at Hart House by Theatre Mirkities under the direction of Thomas O'Connor. Curtain time is 8:30 and it will cost you $1.00 to get in.

kudos to ubu

The question Ubu Cocu poses with spastic poignancy, the furious, unanswerable question, is simply: What is an Ubu? Just another piece of detritus dropped into the famed Parisian sewers by the bloated imperialism of fin de siècle western European capitalism? Or is it our own lost conscience, remnant of spiritual yearnings finally and irrevocably choked off at some moment between the Opium and the Boer Wars? One thing, and one thing only, we can be sure of: Alfred Jarry, lost of the French neo-romantic playwrights (or first of the proto-Brechtians?) can not, or will not, answer it.

It lies squarely in our lap, and it is much to the credit of the Victoria College Dramatic Society that they have attempted to pick it up and run with it — to confront our common dilemma in the space of a rainy afternoon half hour lunch break in the somber atmosphere of the New Vic Theatre.

Sprightly is the word that springs to mind to characterize Marni Jackson's direction of this bubbly farce, this overflow of excremental, anatomical, and geometrical obsessions, this subtle blow-torch of a one-acter.

Kudos, also, are due to the actors, who perform wonders in penetrating the central enigma of the play, shaking, wiggling, strutting, spitting, sprawling and declaiming their way across the stage like a march of schizophrenic cockroaches. (Klausner as Pa Ubu is very good, really; and the cost as a whole make it all look deceptively easy). One is left with only one, small hope at play's end, that Geza Kovacs will eventually be sprung from the Don Jail.

SIMON AND GARFUNKLE. Bridge Over Troubled Waters. Columbia KCS 9914

Bridge goes back to S and G's roots in rock and roll, and it is explored with great taste, irony and sense of the absurd. There is no feeling, line or riff on the album that is not underscored by the slight edge of its opposite, e.g. having the rock rhythmic section just slightly too enthusiastic, adding (quite intentionally) a whole feeling of doubt. The images are spare and delicately absurd, and the enigmatic absurdity of the lyrics bumps up against the absolutely unsubsistent simplicity of the rock or dialectal. Brilliant.

bob bessin

HUMBLE PIE. As Safe As Yesterday Is. Immediate 101.

Most of this album is either pretty dull or unoriginal. You can hear fragments of harmony, rhythm, and general stylistic characteristics stolen from Led Zeppelin, Steppenwolf, Mandala, and a multitude of other rock groups practically all the way through the record. Humble Pie aren't bad musicians, and there are a few good moments when the group has got a lot of good material. Unfortunately there aren't nearly enough of these to save the album.

LIGHTNING HOPKINS. Lightnin'! Poppy 60,002.

A great many of the records Lightning Hopkins has made, both singles and albums, in the 25 years he has been recording, have been poorly produced. This two volume set is a notable exception. The sound on these recently recorded numbers is excellent, and Lightning is in fine form. He's one of the great originals of the blues, known for his improvising abilities. His guitar playing doesn't depend on dazzling technique for its effectiveness, and his voice is unassuming, but in spite of this, his blues ability is universally recognised. These two LPs contain some of the very best Hopkins I've heard.

MUSIC IN PRAGUE. Vanhal: Viola Concerto; Benda: Harpsichord Concerto. Turnabout 34305.

That the mid-18th century Bohemian composers Vanhal and Benda are not nearly as famous as their approximate contemporaries Haydn and Mozart, does not mean that they didn't write some very beautiful music, such as the two fine concerti on this record. Although neither the performances nor the sound quality have quite the professional slickness of recordings by some of the larger labels, this disc more than makes up for it in having an extra amount of feeling for the music.

DUKE PEARSON. The Phantom. Blue Note BST 84293.

Pianist-composer Pearson is a rather erratic leader, but generally his work with small groups is distinctive — which is certainly not true of his big band stuff. This record, his best since Sweet Honey Bee, has some very nice tunes in a wistful, mysterious vein. Played by a group featuring Bobby Hutcherson's vibes, Jerry Dodgion's flute, and various percussionists, the music, while not terribly compelling, has a pleasant, lilting feeling.

j. mcc.

GERALD WILSON. Eternal Equinox. World Pacific Jazz 20160.

Unlike many able big band arrangers, Gerald Wilson has a unique conception of this kind of music. Consequently, even when played by anonymous studio men, his music is readily identifiable. Besides his excellent compositions, this record also features a flock of well known soloists — including Harold Land, Groove Holmes and Bobby Hutcherson — who supplement the studio crowd.

only drawback is an incredibly funereal "vocal" by some basso profundo whose name I have the charity to omit.

i. mcc.

THE ISLEY BROTHERS. The Brothers: Isley, T-Neck 3002.

The Isleys have been around for a long time (remember the original Twist and Shout!), and they have seen a lot of changes. Their new bag is supercool soul, with funky brass sections and Temptation-like vocals. They're in complete control of their product, and it's well done. The Blacker the Berry... the Sweeter the Juice alone is worth the cost of the album.

MYRTH. RCA Lsp 4210.

A new group in the brass band bag of Blood, Sweat and Tears. Horns and saxophones abound. These are good musicians and the music sounds tight, but it's all basically uninspired. The songs and arrangements are mediocre, as is the singing. The album is also loaded down with useless sound effects — birds singing, the roar of an automobile, and long, dull passages of electronic distortion.

r. d. schwartz

BIG MAMA THORNTON. Stronger Than Dirt. Mercury 61225. The Way It Is. Mercury 61249.

Stronger, the first LP Big Mama has made since moving to Mercury from the Arhoolie label is a decidedly inferior sampling of her work. A large band, with ample portions of organ and brass, is hardly sympathetic backing and songs like Funky Broadway and a mediocre thing, Let's Go Get Sioned, don't help much. The Way It Is, with a decent blues band behind her, is considerably better. Recorded live in a small Los Angeles club, it shows off some of Big Mama's stage enthusiasm. She sings a better selection of blues numbers on this one, but even so it's only a fairly good album, not yet quite up to some of the work she did for Arhoolie.

TAMMY WYNETTE. Tammy's Greatest Hits. Epic 26486.

The acknowledged Queen of country music, wife of George Jones and author of several hits, puts all her pearls in one album, and it shines. Stand by Your Man is probably the best female vocal in the entire history of country music. Maudlin lyrics of songs like D-I-V-O-R-C-E and I Don't Wanna Play House become very sensitive and evocative in this singer's hands. Also included is Tammy's and David Houston's My Elusive Dreams, a haunting country-folk song maestro michelangelo

"The pedals are like my lungs. Three notes with the right pedal work can become another world." Last Thursday night (Feb. 26) at Massey Hall, pianist Arturo Benedetti Michelangelo, labouring over a rather asthmatic Steinway grand, was hard pressed to match his words with music. With ersatz-blond mane swept straight back and black silk kerchief parked on top of the piano, aristocratic Michelangelo's main assets seemed to be astute publicity and the infrequency of his appearances. At Thursday's recital, the Maestro began by casting before his audience pearls by Beethoven: the Sonatas No. 3 in C major, Op. 2 and No. 32 in C minor, Op. 111. The second half of the programme consisted of three "encore" — type selections by Chopin, the Scherzo No. 2 in B flat, Ballade No. 1 in G minor, and the Polish Brillante, Op. 22.

We are told Michelangelo's main preoccupation is with his music school in Italy, and the first movement of Beethoven's C major Sonata indeed smacked of a musty schoolmaster-like approach. His measured tempi and frequent recourse to the "una corda" pedal accentuated the already lugubrious sounds emanating from the piano. While the third and fourth movements did accumulate momentum and provided some excitement, the predominant impression was one of comfort and relaxation before all else.

Such an elegant, casual drawing-room attitude is dead in the case of the Sonata Op. 111. This work, the last sonata of the then deaf Beethoven, is elemental music, the union of volcanic thunder and celestial crystalline serenity. In approximating the opposite forces towards a comfortable medium, Michelangelo caused the music to suffer. From the first two notes, taken with two hands instead of the usual one, to the difficult trill of the last variation taken with the 3rd and 4th fingers instead of the more demanding (and appropriate) 4th and 5th, comfort and safety was the motto.

To some the music is a Beethovenian "death and transfiguration"; yet, whatever it signifies, it is not "nice" music, and should not be played "nicely". The feeling was that Michelangelo, refusing to go to Beethoven, rather brought Beethoven to himself. The goods were damaged in transit.

The Chopin pieces were more favoured by (or favourable to) Michelangelo's temperament. They were note-perfect, as was everything else, but here Michelangelo's penchant for details brought to light many beautiful lines usually buried within Chopin's thick textures: Solo parts in the treble were played in a suitably singing fashion but, in spite of a quick consultation with the tuner during intermission, the piano adamantly swallowed the more visceral aspects of all three pieces. Of the two existing versions of the Polonaise, the orchestrally accompanied one better suits the huge dimensions of the work, but Michelangelo compensated with remarkably saturated orchestral sounds.

Acknowledging the ensuing thunderous applause with a barely perceptible nod, Michelangelo discretely patted his bearded brow (black silk kerchief) and strutted off stage, only to be called back by enthusiastic fans. Will the Maestro deign to honour us with an encore? Ah, but no. Pleading a strained wrist with a movement of understated elegance, he disappeared back stage. Perhaps for another ten years?

up against the vinyl wall, mother

R. G. Sewell and the Committee are taking up arms against the "monogamy of art" in an exhibition of vinyl paintings to run all of next week at the Adams and Yves Gallery, 602 Markham Street.

Under the title of "Brant, the Beginnings of the Breakdown of Monogamy with Art", the exhibition is designed to eliminate the exploitation of the artist and his art by capitalist society. The Committee contends that art is exploited as a commodity, which as property, has a value generally alienated from its purpose: the fame of the artist, the age of the painting, the school etc. They see this exploitation as the result of capitalist pressures which force the artist to sell his painting, encouraging a monogamous, incestuous relationship between the owner and the painting.

Who, after all, owns the painting? The artist who signs his name to it, or the owner who buys it? The Committee feels that the artist has a private relationship with his art object like husbands have with their wives, and like parents have with their children. Only the artist is credited with the real knowledge of his product; it belongs to him exclusively by virtue of the one act of conception and he must retain all responsibility for it even after the act is finished.

In our society, the artist is isolated from people by the same emotional pattern of relationships which isolates and alienates everybody else. He is made a special person by his art and it is this possessive pattern of relationships that is fundamental to our whole social system.

The Committee and the artist, Richard Sewell, has decided to do a bit of guerrilla theatre on gallery owners, critics, people who like to look at art, people who buy art, people who feel intimidated by art and people who never look at art. Sewell is determined to thrust upon the reluctant art public not their own vinyl paintings but his responsibility for them as well.

So it's up against the vinyl wall on March 8 through March 22 at the Adams and Yves Gallery, 24 hours a day.

fun and games in Korea

No Mash has nothing to do with hash. We do get a glimpse of marijuana on the feet ball field, but that is briefly, in passing, through the good clean fun of this beautifully hilarious and endearing war comedy. The scene is a surgeon's station in Viet Nam. The characters: bright, zany, efficient doctors and nurses. Mash makes it obvious that comedy has passed the catharsis stage. Idiomatic antics placed beyond the fringes of reality and exaggerated to the point of lunacy, all for the sake of that hysterical, escapist belly laugh that relieves the tension built up at the office, is not for Mash company. They prefer to build an aura of credibility around themselves which says that one day you too can plant a microphone under a vibrating bed and transmit the message of "love" to the operating room and throughout the camp.

It is made clear from the beginning that these guys are just too educated and too bright to take the army regulation and "fight for your country" crap. They take the freedom to "operate" any way they choose, and they are bright enough to get away with it. Since they are, in spite of it all, good doctors they maintain the audience's sympathy and faith in them throughout.

The dialogue in the film is paced at a rapid tempo and there is a great deal of it. It is more in the style of television than film, which usually employs less dialogue and depends on visual effects.

But Mash goes all out on both audio and visual effects. Zany jokes and actions are set against mountains of bloody corpses in the operating room, into which, on top of it all, the camp loud speaker continues to blare. The camp loud speaker is a character in itself, continually blaring in a slightly "off" tone and spoofing the idiocy of the formal kind of normality it is supposed to symbolize.

Every action, every device, and every setting in the film is strictly unified to produce the overall atmosphere of intelligent hilarity and heightened reality, aware of itself and therefore free to laugh at itself, and make use of ordinary reality to do so.

Imagine an ordinary golf game — on top of a muddy, war — wrecked peak — with monstrous ravines on both sides. With settings like that, who needs slapstick? Threw into this some bizarre dialogue with a pilot who lands to interrupt the golf game and who is being terribly "preper" and we have a funny, but not "unreal" scene on our hands.

The film uses melodrama of the 1920's variety to caricature the actions of the "villains" — the over-regulation style-bound nurse and her lover. And we agree with the film — that they are "unreal" and should be separated from the flow of the film.

Let's get back to reality: the only thing you can really say about a good film is: "Go see it!"

the blues come slidin', mama, just like

IN THE PAST FEW YEARS, modern, electric blues have gone from being an ethnic popular music to becoming an international popular music, played both by musicians who grew up in the blues culture and by those who heard and liked the music and imitate it for their own purposes. The result has been that a great many blues records of various sorts have appeared on the market, and there's hardly a major record company that doesn't handle blues of some kind. But while this flood of modern blues recording has been going on, there has also been a parallel increase in interest in the older blues forms, and several smaller labels have appeared which reissue blues 78s made from the twenties to the forties.

One of the interesting things about the blues is that virtually the entire history of the music is available on records. Many record companies in the twenties and thirties found it profitable to record huge numbers of country musicians on what were then known as race recordings for sale exclusively to black communities. It is quite probable that only the first generation of musicians playing a recognizable blues style was left off records, but their musical forms were most certainly preserved by their immediate followers who were recorded. What follows is a look at some of the early blues styles and at the recordings on which they can be heard.

MISSISSIPPI & THE DELTA

The bluesmen of Mississippi, and in particular those of the cotton farming delta country in the northwest section of the state between the Yazoo and Mississippi rivers, have attracted most of the attention of those who began searching out dusty 78s by the older musicians. Perhaps it's because there's a kind of primeval sound in the vocal styles of singers like Son House and Skip James and Booker White which seems to characterize much of the singing in the area.

For the most part, the accompaniment was only the singer's guitar, though occasionally another musician would help out on second guitar or violin. The guitar styles often have a roughness about them, with a heavy, sometimes percussive bass, but there developed as well the extraordinary sound (it appears elsewhere as well) of a knife or bottleneck or other hard object being run over the strings by the fretting hand. The sounds produced by this method varied from the robust, often train-like effects of Booker White to the plaintive and beautiful playing of little known artists like Bobby Grant and Hambone Willie Newbern.

Also in the rural areas of Mississippi, there were singers who played in a lighter style and sang songs in a songster and minstrel show tradition. John Hurt is by far the best known of these musicians, but Papa Harvey Hull and Joe Calicott and others have been preserved on record playing this sort of music.

There are five important collections of early Mississippi blues, two on Yazoo (Mississippi Blues, Yazoo 1001 and Mississippi Moaners, Yazoo 1009) and three on Origin Jazz Library (Mississippi Blues, vols. 1, 2 & 3, OJL 5, 11 & 17). Any one of these presents a good sampling of the music. The two Yazoo issues give quite an even mixture of the various Mississippi styles. OJL 17 (Mississippi Blues, 3: The Transition) is of particular interest to later blues fans, including as it does both Robert Johnson's often used Sweet Home Chicago and Hambone Willie Newbern's Roll and Tumble Blues (much of this artist's fine slide guitar style can still be heard in Muddy Water's playing).

Charlie Patton, a legendary figure in the early Mississippi blues, both for the quality of his records and for the influence he had on many later greats, is considered by many to have a sound which is the quintessence of the delta blues. His voice ranges from high and plaintive to low and rough and his songs tend to be either personal blues or spirited dance numbers. On many tunes he is accompanied by the violin of Henry Sims. Samples of his work can be heard on OJL 11, Yazoo 1001 and Yazoo 1009. A fuller selection of his music, including folk songs and spirituals is available on two volumes, OJL 1 and OJL 7. Yazoo has also recently come out with a two volume Patton set, but I've not yet heard it. However, for anyone unfamiliar with Mississippi blues styles, Patton might well be a hard place to start listening. His diction is extremely difficult and many of his records were poorly recorded.

Skip James sings in a very high voice, often falsetto. Many of his songs are poetic compositions of great depth, and he accompanies himself with virtuoso guitar playing. His Hard Time Killing Floor Blues is on OJL 5 and his Cherry Ball Blues is on both OJL 17 and Yazoo 1009. Special Rider Blues, which he felt was his deepest number, is on Yazoo 1001. After his rediscovery in the early 60's he made three fine albums (Melodeon 7321, Vanguard 79219 & 79273) on which he remade many of his old songs and revealed an even greater diversity of guitar styles than on his early records. Yazoo has recently released a full album of his early numbers (Yazoo 1021), but, again, I haven't heard it.

Son House' style of slide or bottleneck guitar playing is rougher than some of the virtuoso techniques displayed by lesser known artists who cut in some cases only one record, but it was highly influential. He alternates biting slide passages with strummed chorded sections and sings in a rough voice. Numbers by him can be heard on almost all the collections already mentioned. Another of the blues rediscoveries, he also made quite a good record in 1965 (Columbia 9217).

Another bottleneck player, Robert Johnson, to my taste, shares the honor with Skip James of being the most compelling of the major delta artists. Many of his songs deal with devils, hellhounds, and the like, and on almost all his songs, there is a haunted quality to both his singing and playing. He never had the chance to become a rediscovered great, having died under mysterious circumstances before he was 21, perhaps poisoned. He can be heard on Yazoo 1001 and OJL 17, but recommended is the excellently produced album from Columbia (CL 1654) which has finally, after many years, been released here recently.

John Hurt is an artist completely unlike those mentioned already. He plays a complicated finger picking guitar style more like the rag-time style of the East Coast musicians than like Mississippi blues. His voice is soft, gentle and very moving, and, unlike the music of some of the delta artists, his playing and singing can be appreciated without any trouble at all. Two of his early tunes can be heard on OJL 11 and one each on OJL 17 and Yazoo 1009. John Hurt was one of the many rediscovered early greats and he recommenced recording in 1963, after almost a 35 year lapse, almost as if no time had passed. His first LP (Piedmont 13157) is still his best, but later albums on Vanguard (9220, 9248) and the Canadian Rebel label (1068) are all excellent.

This hardly begins to cover the many fine Mississippi bluesmen, but it's all that space will allow. Some of the others worth hearing are Big Joe Williams (Delmark 602 and Arhoolie 1092 are good ones), Fred McDowell (Arhoolie 1021, Milestone 93003), Booker White (Takoma 1001, Arhoolie 1019 & 1020), and a fine 2 volume set recently recorded in Mississippi by Arhoolie (1041 & 1042).

JACKSON AND MEMPHIS
Jackson, Miss., south of the Delta showers of rain

and Memphis, Tenn., just north of it, were two important centers of early urban blues development. Both Jackson and Memphis drew constantly on Delta musicians, but city conditions, particularly the concentration in one or two centres of a large number of musicians, brought about changes in blues styles.

In Jackson, many of the mannerisms of Delta singing tended to become smoothed out and the guitarist developed a more melodic and flowing picking style. In addition, small blues groups were more and more in evidence, using piano, mandolin, and even clarinet. Bottleneck guitar was used little but the clearly phrased guitar playing of musicians like Charlie McCoy and Tommy Johnson was much in evidence. Only one album devoted to the Jackson area has been issued (Yazoo 1007) but Jackson artists are to be found on many of the Mississippi collections.

Tommy Johnson was the most important figure in Jackson; great numbers of bluesmen eagerly learned his guitar style. His Big Road Blues was recently recorded by Roosevelt Holts, and his Canned Heat is a more than familiar title. For such a popular artist, he recorded very little — only six records. Three of his songs are on the Yazoo album and two others, including Canned Heat, are on a Historical collection called Masters of the Blues.

Blues styles in Memphis paralleled, to some extent, those in Jackson. Guitar players who could play clear, rapid lines were obviously popular. Some of the techniques in Memphis were particularly swift. A somewhat strained, nasal vocal style seems to be largely peculiar to a number of Memphis singers, most particularly Gus Cannon.

Two good collections of Memphis blues are on Yazoo 1002 and 1008; the second is particularly fine. Origin has also recently released a Memphis album (OJL 21).

Memphis was also an important center for the development of the raucous groups of jug bands. Jugs were used in these bands by blowing across the top to produce a bass sound, and almost anything else that made a sound could be used, including saw, kazoos and washboards. The sound is fast and exhilarating. Three good collections of the music are OJL 4 & 19 and Blues Classics 2.

THE COAST STATES

There were great guitarists in every area of the early blues, but for sheer dazzling technique, it's hard to match some of the musicians from Georgia, the Carolinas and the other coast states. The various possibilities of ragtime guitar were fully explored and the technical facility of the best musicians is truly breathtaking. Georgia Blues (Yazoo 1012) is a collection of blues largely at a moderate speed, though a couple of numbers each by Kokomo Arnold and Blind Blake are included. Conspicuously absent is Willie McTell, one of the greatest Georgia artists. Yazoo's East Coast States album (1013) is all fast guitar (or faster) and as a collection of this music it hardly has a rival, though Origin's Let's Go Riding, a collection of raggy pieces (and therefore largely east coast artists,) is also a good one. Yazoo has recently come out with another, called Guitar Wizards (Yazoo 1016).

All the major east coast artists have had LPs devoted to them. Blind Blake, who relies almost entirely on speed, a smooth style and impeccable timing has an excellent LP on Biograph (12003). Willie McTell, who adapted ragtime stylings to a twelve string guitar — and made himself the best twelve string guitarist ever — has a collection of early numbers on Yazoo 1005 and an LP of good material from the early 50's on Biograph 12008. Blind Boy Fuller, dean of the Carolina ragtime musicians, who often plays with harmonica and washboard accompaniment, is on Blues Classics 11. Kokomo Arnold, another of the Georgia guitarists, applied ragtime tempos to slide guitar playing and created a scintillating style. He shares an album with pianist Peetie Wheatstraw on Blues Classics 4. One of the major guitarists of the Carolina school, though he didn't record much in the early years, is Gary Davis. His Prestige 7725 album is a programme of beautiful rag instrumentals.

THE CLASSIC BLUES

Mention should be made of the singers who developed a blues style which went with the music being created by the jazzmen of the time. Foremost of all was Ma Rainey who began singing in minstrel shows to the accompaniment of jazz musicians when she was a young girl. She had a voice of tremendous character and power, and her blues approach pretty much established the sound of what is called the classic blues. She was, unfortunately, poorly recorded, but even so the beauty of her performances comes across. Two excellent collections of her music are on Biograph 12001 & 12011. Two complementary collections on Milestone (2001 & 2008) are also good. Ma Rainey's only rival, Bessie Smith, is not readily available at the moment. A very good four volume set of her music is being deleted by Columbia in order to make way for an even larger series.

There are a number of interesting collections of lesser known classic blues singers. Trumpet Blues (Historical 27) features a variety of singers who were accompanied by notable trumpet players, including King Oliver and Tommy Ladnier. An equally interesting album is Historical's Hot Pianos (HLP 29) which reveals the many points of contact between "blues" pianists like Cow Cow Davenport and Montana Taylor and the "jazz" piano playing of Jelly Roll Morton and Fats Waller.

A word about sound. With only a few exceptions, these reissue collections are made up by remastering tapes of issued 78 rpm records, and only very seldom have the original master pressings been available for the purpose. The sound is, of course, never high fidelity; in most cases there is some record noise audible, and in some cases it is a considerable amount. Paramount, which recorded some of the greatest blues artists, seems to have held them in contempt except as money makers and used inferior techniques in recording them so that the sound is even worse than it might have been. In general, until you have an idea what 78 reissues sound like, it might be a good idea to listen to the records before buying them. Many of the collections mentioned have one or two noisy selections, though in general the remastering has been done well, and in any case the quality of the performances usually overcome defects in recording techniques.

If you'd like to know more about the available records, here's where you can get catalogues (free except for the Arhoolie Blues Classic catalogue which costs 25c):

- Yazoo Records, 390 E. 8th St., New York, N.Y. 10009

At Cinema Lumiere this evening . . . Bergman's Hour of the Wolf. March 7 & 8, Shame and March 9-15, Jean Paul Rappeneau's A Matter of Resistance.

Also this evening at the Cinematheque, Frank Capra's State of the Union. March 13, Captain Blood with Errol Flynn, Olivia de Havilland and Basil Rathbone.

Opening soon . . . Mash, a promising black comedy set during the Korean War . . . Coming Apart which has also received a number of positive reviews in the U.S.

On March 12 at 8:30 p.m., the Art Gallery of Ontario will be screening four films by Michael Snow — A-Z, New York Eye and Ear Control, Standard Time and Dripping Water. On March 19, the Gallery will conclude its survey of Snow's filmology with an 8:30 showing of One Second in Montreal and Back and Forth.

Last week, Snow's 40-minute magical adventure with sensation, Wavelength, was shown at Cinema Lumiere. Wavelength deserves some sort of commentary, not because it is likely to exert a profound influence, on 'avant garde' cinema in quite the same way as, say, Ed Emshwiller's Relativity, but because Wavelength is, in its own anarchic way, an unsettling film which succeeds against virtually every law of filmmaking.

The setting is a large, barren room. A row of high casement windows forms one wall through which Snow occasionally focuses on an anonymous city street below.

A woman enters accompanied by two workmen carrying a large chest of drawers. They discuss its placement in the room and leave hurriedly.

The camera throughout remains absolutely immobile. Consecutive rolls of film (alternating in exposure, tinting and methods of printing) are exposed to the different moods created by the play of light and colour across the setting.

A girl enters, dials a telephone number, speaks fearfully of the death of an unidentified man, and disappears abruptly out of frame.

The soundtrack, as Neil Marshall noted in his feature — "Michael Snow's New York Eye and Ear", consists of a clear, sustained wave of sound alternating from 1500 cycles per second throughout the bulk of the film's running-time.

Slowly and almost imperceptibly, the camera has been zooming from the introductory extreme wide-angle of the room to a picture pinned to one wall — a detailed portrait of powerful rolling ocean waves, but frozen as if in a photograph.

The effect Snow creates is startling — simple fascination mixed with perplexity and controlled completely by the undeniable reality of the setting. Yet, it is this reality, surviving for forty minutes on the screen, which sbadows Wavelength with a complex feeling impossible to fully describe.

The film traces a perfect cycle which, although unstated, is unmistakably present — a sort of finality, a complete peace as if the final image of the ocean waves somehow summarized everything we had witnessed before.

Here time is completely under control, yet Snow captures the shifting mood of the room as if he was filming by means of a rhythmic time exposure. Wavelength manipulates sensation as if the film itself was generating waves in the mind. It is a film which travels straight through the senses and which is understood somewhere behind the eyes. Everything about Wavelength implies immediate feeling and an almost alien serenity for Michael Snow always remains the magician conjuring the spell of the film.

MUSIC

Renowned player of the guitar and lute, JULIAN BREAM, is here for a concert Sunday night — Massey Hall at 8:30. Also on Sunday, at 4:00 the TORONTO REPERTORY ORCHESTRA will be performing works by John Weinzwieg, Brian Cherney and Srul Gluck at the Toronto Workshop theater (12 Alexander St.). Again on Sunday, at 8:30, Boyd Neel conducts the HART HOUSE ORCHESTRA in a programme of Shostakovich, Arensky and Tchelikovsky (Hart House Great Hall). If you're hard up for other things to do this weekend, ARTHUR FIELDER leads the TSO in a pops concert tonight at 8:00 at Maple Leaf Gardens. Next Tuesday and Wednesday, the TSO will be back under Karel Ancerl with flautist Jean-Pierre Rampal the guest artist (Massey Hall, 8:30).

Versatile folk musician MIKE SEEGER is at the Riverboat through Sunday. LEN CHANDLER opens there on Tuesday. EARL HINES continues to play at the Colonial. PAUL GERMIAH is at the Onion. The rock attraction at the Hawks Nest tomorrow night is MAGIC CIRCUS. DOTTIE WEST finishes at the Horseshoe Tavern this weekend, with J. DAVID SLOAN coming next week.

Next Friday RICHIE HAVENS and TOM RUSH team up for a concert at Massey Hall.

This afternoon at 1:15, Ubu Cocu, directed by Marni Jackson, will be playing at the New Vic Theatre. No admission charge. Tonight and tomorrow night in Hart House Theatre at 8:30, St. Mike's Theatre Mickities offers Rice a Cock Horse, an original musical about Lady Godiva, written and produced by Barry Brodie and directed by Tom O'Connor.

Near campus, the Global Village's Transmission will be playing tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30. Same evenings, same times, over at the Poor Alex, something called Threshold Explosion Players are presenting Simpson's Resounding Tinkle, directed by Duane Howard, and Pinter's The Room, directed by Maureen Jennings.

Further away, Toronto Workshop Productions Chicago '70 is now in previews. The proceeds from next Tuesday's official opening will go to the Chicago Conspiracy office to help defray the Chicago Eight's legal expenses. Same night Sounds of the Seventies, three separate variety shows, begin at the O'Keefe: John Mayall on Tuesday and Wednesday, chanteuse Mireille Mathieu on Thursday and Friday, and Bobby Sherman (sounds of the '70's!?) on Saturday.

Global Village is putting us on — us and the way we state ourselves on stages. But the send-up gets lost somewhere in Transmission, a new dance-drama choreographed by Elizabeth Swerdlow.

Even the posters for the show are a tease: "SEE!!! THE AGONIZING AFTER DEATH OF A SPEED FREAK . . . SEE!! THE YOUNG MAN RAPE A MANIQUIN AND ASSIST IN THE BIRTH OF HER CHILD . . . SEE!! THE NUDE DANCER ESCAPE THE SUPERPEOPLE!!" All these you get and more, much of it repeated often enough to fake a substitute for dramatic continuity and construction. But all that Transmission gets across is a current of boredom alternating with snickers. Repetition ad nauseam of extreme banality and/or grotesquerie can be a scary theatrical statement of the absurdities of existence, but when it's clumsily done, it provokes no more in the audience than curses at Samuel Beckett and his successors for starting what their imitators couldn't finish.

The clumsiness of this production as a whole is all the more obvious from the skill shown in the execution of some of its parts: much of the staging shows at least ingenuity in exploiting limited resources; there are shining moments of ritual and rhythm in the choreography and less frequent ones in its execution; and Jonathan Welsh as the speed freak almost redeemed the evening with his disintegration from Beautiful to Nil. But, like the evening, he was an awfully long time a-going.

Transmission continues on weekend nights at the Global Village, 17 St. Nicholas St. They're experimenting with all available "arts" over there, and if you find this show as much of a fizzle as I did, chalk it up to the following paraphrase from the show: "She is in the immediate process of creating her own character. Later, when she is secure in the part, she may be able to break consciousness." Theatrical identity crises are at least signs of life.

Although "enrolment will be held at some 24,000 students," said the mute pamphlet, "space needs of all kinds will continue to rise."

Without questioning the apparent contradiction in that, I read the issue of the U of T Bulletin which stated that expansion was necessary as part of the graduate program ordered by the Provincial Government. To Benjamin, this is excuse-making.

"They don't have to accept the role the provincial government set down. They can decide their own capacities."

In addition, if they accept government orders, then the Master Plan is false in assuming enrolment can be held down. "At any time in the future, the provincial government could say, We need more post-grad facilities, another faculty, etc."

They are "empire-builders," he added scornfully.

Claude Bissell, apparently on guard for that kind of rhetoric, wrote a letter to Benjamin. Picking it from the lap-pile, I caught these words:

"This is not a question of an inhuman corporation suppressing the rights of individuals for the sake of imperialistic expansion. It is a question of accommodation between two sets of rights — those of the individual and those of the public."

Bissell's sarcastic use of leftist jargon is doubtly amusing to Benjamin, who maintains that the U of T is indeed an inhuman corporation. "Last May they said they would institute a scheme to work with the residents. The first (and only) meeting took place in December."

That meeting, Dec. 18, will be remembered by the residents as the one that Bissell, despite assurances to the contrary, did not show up for. Benjamin says he gave a speech "in which I roasted Bissell," and then settled back with the rest of the residents to hear the U of T representatives justify themselves.

"Their point was that they had planners, world-renowned. I said that this display was disgusting. They had simply come and presented a body of inarticulate information to a lay community. . . It's a very paternalistic operation."

In Benjamin's pile of letters was one he had written to Bissell on Dec. 8, saying that the U of T "does not have a permanent staff of competent planners." Those responsible for expansion are hired on a temporary basis. This patchwork technique helps explain "the quality of physical environment offered by the west campus."

As an architect, he has nothing but contempt for the cheek-and-jowl construction along Huron and St. George south of Harbord. It indicates a lack of regard for students that parallels the lack of regard for local residents.

Meanwhile, in the earlier-mentioned issue of The Bulletin ("all that concrete can't be wrong"), the University blandly assures readers that Huron-Sussex residents were given "a completely frank account which left out none of the whys or wherefores."

But in their own minutes from the meeting of Dec. 18, the residents conclude that "The University is not prepared to listen to any planners other than their own", and asks a series of six practical questions, such as,

Why is it necessary to build the College of Education on Washington Ave.? Could it not come south just to the backyard lines and be a taller structure?"

Such questions are never answered. Another example:

"Why can't the University work with other planners and the ratepayers?"

A question not yet answered, and unlikely to be.

Meanwhile, life in the neighborhood continues in usual fashion. More houses come down, more residents move out. Wreckage becomes a way of life.

"Do you know what the first word was that I heard my five-year-old read?" asked Professor Knight. "'Teperman.' The very first word."

These houses have almost all been levelled by the university expansion program.

Volks pronounced dead after life of service

Lucky-non-lucky Friday Feb. 13th. Near the twenty-fifth anniversary of the bombing of Dresden. (The military boys still insist it was normal and even necessary.) I was only obeying orders. . .

Today the green Volks, after a long and heroic life of service, was pronounced dead of a dropped rod. The death came suddenly during a brief but increasingly troubled illness.

A close friend felt it was particularly tragic, since the death would probably go unnoticed. He felt that if a factual record of the life and trials of the departed had been kept, it would have served as a revealing document described as a "Super-non-Mythological-Epic." He said it would have been of great value in giving a meaningful perspective to the experience of material and societal structures during these difficult and changing times.

The nearest relative, although grieved, counts the departed's life as one in which there was gain, and the experiences shared had generated greater understanding and light.

It is expected that the departed spirit will re-incarnate in a more highly evolved form — possibly an electric or even electro-magnetic vehicle — after a short regenerative stay where the dimensions meet. . .

"I am inclined to think that our integrated organic capability is much more powerful than any of us tend to accord. . . how much we can apprehend in just the flash of an eye. In one ten-thousandth of a second a strobe light can get a beautifully detailed photograph. I am quite certain that humans can enter a room and tell instantly what the real situation is. But they usually don't trust their own high capabilities so they spend hours trying to find out whether their first flash impression was right or wrong. As I travel around the world today, I see that the eyes of youth see that the world could be made to work for all of humanity. And I see that they will settle for nothing less. And I see that they are impatient. And I see above all that they can and will make it so."

Gurdjieff, Cayce, Korzybski, Buckminster Fuller (quoted above from his new book "Utopia or Oblivion") and you and I all agree in that we all agree we are capable of generating an almost unimaginably better human environment. . . we know it won't be easy but more important we know it is not impossible.

The fact that we generally don't trust our intuitions is a major obstacle that gives strength to all the fatal and obsolete conventional habits of behaviour.

We have found a very powerful device for examining your intuitions about the real situation, and the system or structure with which you experience your unique reality. Do it.

"These questions, with variations, may be used as the basis to examine any system (e.g. the home, the government, mathematics, historical description, war, marriage, astrophysics, the school, the city, etc.).

- "What are the purposes of the system?
- "What roles are people assigned?
- "What rules must be followed?
- "What rights and restrictions are given and imposed?
- "What are some of its critical underlying assumptions?
- "What are its key words?
- "To what extent do the problems of the system require decisions? Choices? Solutions?
- "To what extent is the system changing?

This photo is an example illustrating that by observation of any given "set" we can come to see things in a different light. Literally and/or figuratively we can acquire an experience of the changes that occur during process — which we are generally unaware of. . .

"What are the mechanisms for change within the system?

"To what extent is the language of the system obsolete?

"What are the critical nonverbal symbols of the system?

"To what extent are these changing?

"What is the actual effect of the system on people?

"To what extent is this different from the ostensible purpose of the system?

"Are there alternatives to the system?

"Can we do without it?

"How is the system related to other systems of knowing and behaving?

"The purpose of all this we need hardly say is to make students more open systems. People make themselves, or are made, "closed" systems for many reasons, most frequently because they are unaware of the extent to which they are "linguaging" systems, and being unaware lock themselves into predetermined decisions by limiting their language resources."

mooney denies firing and mis-use of funds

This is in reference to your March 2, 1970 issue, in which an article appeared headed "FAILURE OF LIBERALISM DRAWS 16 PEOPLE." It is not the failure of liberalism with which I am concerned (it's been failing for years), but rather the few sentences in the third paragraph which refer to me.

Specifically, the paragraph reports that I was "fired" by the Just Society Movement, and that I am wanted by the police for mis-use of funds. The first item is untrue, and the second requires clarification.

Item one: on the 29th of January 1970, I quit, left, terminated my association with the Just Society Movement. (It was not until February 12, 1970, that the co-ordinating committee of J.S.M. issued a statement which said, in effect, that I was "fired".) The decision to leave was certainly not a sudden impulse, though the actual, physical leaving was not announced by me.

My reasons for leaving the Just Society Movement were varied, but two are sufficient to mention here;

- the continuing lack of desire, on the part of most members of the co-ordinating committee to make a real effort to begin organizing the poor, resulting in a sour inertia which certainly affected the movement, along with my desire to continue.
- the extreme difficulty of attempting to exist without any income, whatsoever. And this is where I must clarify item two.

The report in the Varsity infers that the police are looking for me because I mis-used funds of the Just Society Movement. That is not true. The police are looking for me because signed, blank cheques were cashed — after they had been made out in my name — against the account of "STOP SPADINA SAVE OUR CITY COMMITTEE".

The "COMMITTEE" lost no money, because the cheques were not cashed — initially — at their bank, but at another. Therefore, the bank "lost" money. As the bank is an institution upholding the present exploitive economic system, I submit that they are fair game.

During the time I was with the Just Society Movement, I did use funds for other than Just Society business. However, I made it known to all concerned, and often voiced the opinion that I was justified in doing so in order to eat, drink or meet what I felt were pretty basic needs, especially in view of the fact that it was a policy to expend funds for baby-sitting and gas allowance.

There is the matter of a fairly large, long-distance telephone call which is my responsibility, and perhaps I will be able to pay it.

If I am guilty of anything, I suppose it is doing, openly, what so much of society does in a more "socially acceptable manner."

JOHN C. MOONEY

not at harvard - institute for canadian studies lost

I was interested in Harriet Kideckel's article on the state of Canadian Studies at the University of Toronto which appeared in your issue of February 27th. The article concludes with the reflection that the best place to pursue such studies is at the Institute for Canadian Studies at Harvard. Harvard does not have such an institute. On the basis of money raised by a group of Canadian and American businessmen it established a professorship in Canadian Studies. I was the first incumbent of the professorship, and I was asked to give a general course in Canadian Studies to undergraduates and an advanced course in my discipline. I gather that the same pattern has been followed in each of the two subsequent years. As far as I know, Harvard has no intention of expanding this annual professorship into an institute. An institute would require at least one additional full-time appointment and a number of cross-appointments from related disciplines. Unfortunately there are very few disciplines at Harvard that could provide such cross-appointments. Possibly the only one is Economics, which has always had a lively Canadian emphasis. But in History and English you will search in vain for any Canadian material.

Early in the article Miss Kideckel seems to suggest that Leonard Cohen, Mordecai Richler, and Robert Service would be important authors to study in a Canadian course. I presume that the criteria here are "relevance" and "Canadianism". Even in these terms I have some difficulty in recognizing the claims of the three writers. Leonard Cohen is a sort of international minstrel. Mordecai Richler is a talented novelist who lives in England and regularly reviles his Canadian home in advanced British periodicals. Robert Service was a remittance man without the remittance who soaked himself in minor romantic literature, and then exploited the northern mystique in endless jingles.

293 votes equals a positive mandate

The heat of anger and disappointment rampant in the editorial offices of the Varsity following the positive mandate proffered the Rod Hurd — Eric Miglin ticket in Tuesday's SAC election is to be viewed as unfortunate for two reasons and necessarily to be deplored.

The obvious one is the insulting condescension on your part towards those involved students who elected Hurd-Miglin. If your office takes exception to that election, then it is publicly disdaining the level of discernment in those who voted Hurd-Miglin. In effect the Varsity is calling those students political incompetents. Perhaps the future SAC elections should be left totally to the discretion of the Varsity editorial staff since they have decided the rest of us are not fit to competently exercise our franchise. The "sour-grapes" attitude of both the March 4 editorial, plus the three-year old comments of thwarted Wayne Richardson, have provided the students of the University of Toronto with undoubtedly the most blatant example of journalistic puerility, and childish non-grace ever offered.

Since the Varsity has on its own initiative taken a stand opposite to that of the majority of involved students, then by choice it has ceased to represent the views of that majority and therefore must change its editorial policy back to the centre, or cease to be the official press representative of the students of the University of Toronto.

The ridiculous attitude of Richardson, coupled with the subliminal journalism, is a definite statement that indeed the majority of concerned students, those that voted Hurd-Miglin, made the correct and only sane choice.

Pink Paper offers token voice to administration

OTTAWA (CUP) — In an effort to head off possible unrest among campus administrators, the student council at the University of Ottawa Wednesday offered to grant their administration a voice in student union affairs — but only a token one.

In a "pink paper" on student government at the self-styled "bilingual" university, councillors proposed that administrators be given representation on the four commissions handling student affairs on the campus.

Campus authorities, says the paper, "have shown themselves worthy of this responsible role" — but councillors gave the statement a hollow ring by further declaring they could not "justify parity representation for the administrators."

Although student council executive members swear their proposals are serious, the "pink paper" bears a strong resemblance to administration announcements earlier in the academic year, which offered students four seats on the 40-person U of O academic senate.

At that time, student council members complained that the administration offer did not give students enough voting power on the decision-making body.

So far, the U of O administration has neither accepted the council offer nor put forward counter-proposals of either the negotiable or non-negotiable variety.

Vogel tops McGill poll for new principal

MONTREAL (CUP) — McGill students want Arts and Science Vice-Dean Robert Vogel to succeed retiring Principal H. Rocke Robertson next year, a campus-wide poll showed Wednesday.

If a similar poll held last year is any indication, they won't get their choice.

Vogel topped eight other candidates in the poll, conducted by the McGill Student Council, including three McGill vice-principals, two deans and two department chairmen.

Vogel is seen as sympathetic with student demands for openness and relevant discussion at the senate and board levels of university government.

Last February the McGill administration ignored a student poll in choosing a successor for Arts and Science Dean H. D. Woods. Poll winner was English Department Chairman Donald Theall, and Woods stood a distant fourth in the standings. Physics Professor E. J. Stanbury was awarded the deanship.

Results of the latest poll will go to the university committee, which will choose the new principal. Students have charged that they are underrepresented on the committee. The committee has equal representation from five groups —

Board of Governors, senate, faculty, graduates and students.

Blood still flowing

About 847 pints of blood have been contributed to the Red Cross by an equal number of students, usually reliable sources disclosed yesterday.

The drive which will last two weeks is aiming for 2,900 pints.

Today's clinic will be at the faculty of Dentistry, reputed to be the fastest bleeders in town. Monday Loretto College will host the bleed-in and Tuesday Trinity College.

So far there have been no unpleasant incidents and one student who tried it on a nurse said he found it quite pleasant.

wrestle with your problems

Exam-time tensions? Assignments overdue? Over-worked and underplayed? The U of T wrestling team has devised a scheme whereby all your tensions and frustrations can be relieved in just nine, short minutes.

We give to you the Metro Toronto Wrestling Championships, sponsored by the U of T Athletic Association. Absolutely everyone (m.) who is a resident of Metro Toronto is eligible to compete in this match as long as they fill out the required entry form (to be found in the wrestling room) by 5 p.m. today.

The meet commences at 12:30 this Saturday and will be held in the main gymnasium at Hart House. Spectators will see excellent wrestling as top competitors from all the high schools, YMCA's and wrestling clubs in metro will be out to take the trophy away from us.

U of T won last year, and coach Jack Edgar encourages anyone who wants to wrestle to sign up and help us defend the trophy.

It has been pointed out to us that we haven't run any pictures of the OQAA semifinal game between Waterloo and Ottawa and since this is the first anniversary (1 week) we thought we'd oblige. Here we have Ottawa goalie Jacques Audy kicking out a Waterloo shot. From left to right are Cloude Alain (12) of Ottawa, Dennis Forwell (14) of Waterloo, Peter Paleczney (2) of Waterloo, Audy and Michel St. Jacques (4) also of Ottawa. Also, to be fair, we have included two unidentifiable players, one from each team. Note particularly the expression on the spectators' faces. Also note that Waterloo won, 7-3.

Board asked to support MAB

 that no funds will be allocated for it from capital grants received by the University, and the monies will have to come from a specific grant for such facilities from the provincial government or be raised privately.

REQUEST TO BOARD
 With these factors in mind, we asked the Board members present to report to the full Board on our meeting, and ask for their assistance as follows:

(1) We would like the Board's enthusiastic individual and corporate support for new men's athletic facilities for the University of Toronto.

(2) We would like the Board's advice concerning the best methods of obtaining funds, and their help in executing these plans.

(3) We would ask the Board to approach the Metro Chairman concerning the proposed sports complex at the CNE, to determine if the University might also be considered as a site for such facilities, or might be eligible for municipal assistance in building integrated facilities.

(4) We would ask the Board for the names of parties interested in such a project so that they may be approached for contributions.

(5) We would ask the Board to agree to construct the men's athletic facilities if it received support from the above groups.

MUST WAIT
 These proposals were formally presented by the Board members present at our meeting to the meeting of the full Board held last week. We are optimistic that our proposals received favourable consideration, and are hopeful that more positive steps can be taken in the near future. However, until the Board reports to us on the direction of its actions, it is very difficult to assess the success with which the project may meet.

The University of Toronto being the only major university in Ontario, other than the University of Western Ontario, that has not embarked upon expansion of athletic facilities in the last 10 years, we feel assured that the members of the board are anxious to assist us in the most productive means possible. Therein lies the probability of a new MAB for the students, staff and graduates of the University.

Blues beat Bears 6-0, advance to CIAU finals

By LYNDON LITTLE
 CHARLOTTETOWN, PEI—
 The Toronto Varsity Blues followed the strategy that has worked best for them all season to defeat the University of Alberta Golden Bears 6-0 last night and advance into the CIAU hockey finals to be played here Saturday night.

Blues, as they have done so many times this year, got off to a fast start then used superior skating to take them the rest of the way. The Varsity defense, backed by superb goal-tending from rookie Grant Cole, played one of its finest games last night as Terry Parsons, Bob Hamilton, Dave McDowell, Bill L'Heureux and Dave Field stood up at the Varsity blue line against the Bears attackers and checked with authority.

Cole stopped 30 shots in recording his second shutout in playoff competition this year. He was in the nets last Friday when Blues downed the University of Montreal Carabins 11-0 in an OQAA semifinal match.

The Bears were the winners of the Western Canadian Inter-collegiate Athletic Association hockey league.

The Tom Watt-coached Varsity team, winners of the OQAA championship, scored two goals in each period as they made the most of their opportunities.

Blues Dave McDowell opened the scoring less than three minutes played in the first period on a bizarre goal. The puck hit the boards behind the Alberta net, rebounded out and went in off the leg of startled Bears' goalie Bob Wolfe.

Captain Brian St. John's marker less than two minutes later gave Blues a quick two-goal lead.

Paul Laurent and Len Burman scored in the second while Terry Peterman and Nick Holmes notched third period counters.

Laurent, who had one of his greatest skating games, set up both first period scores with superb playmaking.

Blues' opponents in the final Saturday will be decided tonight when the Atlantic Inter-collegiate champs, the St. Mary's Huskies, meet Blues' old nemesis, the Loyola Warriors.

The St. Mary's team from Halifax defeated the York Yeomen 4-1 in the first game last night to advance against the Warriors. York will play a consolation game against Alberta tonight, and the winner of that one will play the losers of the St. Mary's-Loyola game Saturday.

BLUENOTES: Who says intuition doesn't pay off... Paul Laurent used a new stick in Blues' last practice here Tuesday, and made a point of telling trainer Howie Ringham to pack that cue for the trip... Blues' left in a heavy rain on Wednesday morning, on a charter flight shared by York... Laurent's comment after landing in PEI and seeing the Charlottetown airport: "I've heard of regional disparities, but this is ridiculous"... a sellout crowd of about 2,300 was on hand for last night's opening games.

Blues and Bears are no strangers to each other in playoff action. Last year the two teams met in semi-final action, with the same result as this year. Above, Steve Monteith scores one of his three goals in Blues' 3-2 win, while below, last year's edition of the Bears experiences frustration trying to score after catching Blues out of position. That's Blues' defenceman Bill L'Heureux and goalie Adrian Watson; Bears' representatives are Jack Gibson (14) and Gerry Hornby (12), both of whom are this year's club as well.

BofG considers proposals

The following is one of a series of articles concerning the new Men's Athletic Building of U of T. Peter Adomson is co-chairman of the co-ordinating committee for the Men's Athletic Building.

By PETER ADAMSON

In a previous article, an outline of the past efforts of various parties in obtaining new men's athletic facilities for the University was outlined.

Since then, the "Co-ordinating Committee" has met with Mr. O. D. Vaughan, the Chairman of the Board of Governors, and five other Board members. At that time, the various problems of the situation were posed and certain proposals for their solution were presented.

We pointed out that the University of Toronto has not expanded its athletic facilities, except for added seats to Varsity Stadium, since 1927. It was also noted that the Athletic Association has never received any provincial monies, and other than loans, has received only $5000 from the University for capital expenditures. In spite of this, the "priority" for the Men's Athletic Building will not be considered with respect to capital expenditures for academic and other university buildings, but will be considered separately. This means Dale Holterman stops a close in drive by two of last year's Blues. Since there is no Varsity next Monday, the full report and pictures of this year's playoffs will appear in next Wednesday's paper.

Student Power gets the can

It happened quietly, without violence, sit-ins or demonstrations.

Evolution towards the ideal of a true community of scholars took another peaceful step forward.

There was hardly a whimper of protest, because, as all concerned knew, The Time Had Come.

In a single magnanimous gesture U of T's prestigious Presidential Advisory Committee on Accommodations and Services decided last month to end the distinction between student and faculty urinals.

A Simcoe Hall press release hailed the historic step in the following terms:

"We trust this move will inaugurate an era of true student and faculty co-operation in line with the spirit of the report of the Commission on University Government."

"We sympathize with student aspirations; this move symbolizes our sympathy."

ON WITH THE JOB

Following the committee meeting one senior administrator told reporters: "We're all human. We're all in this together. Why should silly old-fashioned rules make it difficult for us to get on with the job?"

President Claude Bissell's executive assistant, Don Forster, has promised that all "staff" signs will be removed as soon as possible.

Response to the news of the decision has been enthusiastic, among both students and faculty.

One professor, generally regarded as a conservative in political matters, warmly welcomed the ending of what he called "the single greatest barrier to student-faculty understanding."

"There's no stopping us now," he added. "Everything is going to be all right."

Most students felt the abolition of staff washrooms would save students considerable time and trouble in locating separate facilities.

One radical student was ecstatic about the change. "Now we can end the mystification of the real nature of faculty. Students have been taught since kindergarten that their teachers 'do it different'. Now we will see."

Student politicians claimed the "liberation" of the washrooms as a great gain for the ideal of student power. They claimed the major credit for forcing the administration to wipe out what they called "the single most discriminatory bureaucratic rule against entitled students to full membership in the university community."

One Students Administrative Council executive member claimed that on January 7 the council had issued an ultimatum to the administration threatening to mount a campaign for integrating the washrooms unless Simcoe Hall gave in.

POLITICAL ORGASM?

Education commissioner Craig Heron (IV UC) called the administration move "SAC's greatest political victory of the year."

He attributed the triumph to the "policy of constipation" which SAC has followed since early last summer.

The same January SAC meeting, however, declined to push for a similar demand to end the use of separate staff elevators.

"One man, one can, is enough for now," university commissioner Ken McEvoy told the council. "We should press for limited victories now and not try to achieve a total revolution at once."

The only people who feel left out are the university support staff.

"We feel cheated," grumbled one cleaner at Sid Smith. "Not that we'd ever want to get in there with them. We just feel left out."

Day - care centre seeks support following eviction notice

By HEATHER JON MARONEY

Workers at the Campus Community Day Care Centre fear that the U of T administration is moving to kick them out of its premises at 12 Sussex.

The house is the property of the University, but is administered by Crown Trust.

"After a year of operation, just as we are getting on our feet, we feel we may be turfed out. The possibility is too much to contemplate," said Lorenne Smith, an Assistant Professor of Philosophy, in charge of negotiations with the Administration.

In early October she received a letter from the Office of the Executive Vice President (Academic) which guaranteed occupancy at Sussex St. to the end of December and assured help in finding new premises.

A. G. Rankin, non-academic Vice President assured the centre it could count on the Sussex Avenue house until the end of May.

SIMCOE HALL UNENTHUSED

Early in February Mrs. Smith requested a meeting with the administration and Crown Trust. She was informed that the matter had been transferred to K. S. Gregory, Administrative Assistant to Rankin.

"On Friday, February 27, we received a letter from Crown Trust saying 'pay $300.00 in back rent or else'" said John Foster (SGS) Treasurer of the Centre. "This despite the fact that we had no lease and were still negotiating with the university. They did not say 'Or else what'."

On Monday, Gregory told Mrs. Smith that the Centre should consider itself on a month to month lease.

"He would make no commitment about length of lease or other space, except that there was no other place around," Foster said at a meeting of 45 parents and workers Monday night.

"Gregory said the university had a commitment to provide 'family housing' for the community. The situation would 'clarify' in three to four weeks. In any case we were to consider ourselves on a term to term arrangement."

"Which means they're going to kick us out at the end of term when we can't get any support from the university community, when students and faculty are gone," said Sarah Spinks, one of the organizers of the centre.

INNIS NO EXCUSE

Crown Trust originally told the Centre the building would be demolished in December to build Innis College. Due to budgetary cutbacks, construc-

ELECTION DAY

MARCH 20, 1970

Expressway to push on into the campus

A new plan for the Spadina Expressway has grave implications for the University of Toronto.

Originally designed to end at Sussex Avenue, the expressway will push through to Willcocks St. Most of the traffic going on or off the expressway north of College will use St. George St., University Ave., or Harbord St.

To accommodate this traffic Harbord St. will become a major artery with 8,000 cars per hour using it at peak times.

Property on the east side of Spadina Avenue presently owned by the university, and designed as a part of the westward campus expansion will be expropriated for the expressway.

A report issued yesterday by the Metro Traffic Department said "positive benefits will accrue to the Kensington Market and the garment district" on Spadina Ave. due to relief of existing congestion.

Three thousand cars per hour will use Spadina Ave. and 87 of the 251 parking spaces will be lost as a result of the elimination of angle parking.

U of T president Claude Bissell last night called for a "strong response from the university community."

"We're not just sitting ducks. All of these matters must be discussed with the university," he said.

The Graduate Student Union is attempting to initiate such discussion.

The GSU executive Monday night called for a mass meeting within two weeks open to all members of the university to discuss the question. They will request the physical plant to prepare a brief outlining the effects on the university of the expressway.

GSU president Michael Vaughan said he has already received indications of support and co-operation from the administration and the SAC. ATS and support staff have yet to be approached.

Vaughan said that a massive response to the meeting could lead to a presentation or a demonstration on behalf of the entire university community.

The Metro Transportation Committee will hold public hearings on the report next month. Interested parties wishing to speak must provide 15 copies of their brief by noon, April 1.

Day-care centre

"University planning is usually five or six years in advance," said Glen Davis, one of the volunteer workers, "so a three to four week delay is just to cover us so that we can't act back."

"What other reason could they have?" asked Davis, "They're sneaky bastards."

The meeting agreed on four demands to be sent in a letter to Gregory:

- That the centre be guaranteed space at Sussex until September 30.

- That the university provide a larger safer location on a year's lease to September 1971.

- That the rent be free,
- That the University undertake repairs to the buildings.

They requested a reply by noon Wednesday March 18.

UNIVERSITY IRRESPONSIBLE

"It's the responsibility of any employer to provide day care. How else can people come to their jobs?" said Cathy Bergman, one of the mothers.

"What are we going to do if there's no day care centre? It's not that we want this or want that, but that we need it," said Sonia Bronsvet.

This desperation led many parents — though their jobs were on the line — to call for militant action, and to take the initiative in negotiations with the University.

One woman said she would do anything up to risking her job. Another parent said that he could sit in "only half a day. I don't think they will give me time off to demonstrate."

The meeting agreed to seek support from SAC and the student body. SAC and the GSU have given financial support to the centre already.

SUPPORT NEEDED

On Wednesday 60 students in the school of social work signed a draft of the brief.

Anyone who wishes can sign a letter of support at the centre.

The parents have called a meeting Wednesday March 18 at 7:30 p.m. to discuss the university's response.

"There is no choice. If we cannot be guaranteed suitable space, we'll have to act, and ask the students and faculty to act with us," said another parent and support-staff member of U of T.

Doom 'n gloom belied in west

From our Vancouver Bureau

Pollution will not result in the end of mankind.

That was the premise followed by the Popular Student Front (alias the Vancouver Student Movement) at a teach-in sponsored by the Academic Activities (alias the VSM) two weeks ago at Vancouver's University of British Columbia.

The VSM argued that the world is scientific and that overpopulation and pollution will not overwhelm it as "doom theories" state.

Ecologist P. M. Leiber said: "The doom theories are lies by the very fact that they assume the growth rate will remain constant. Some natural process will take over which will cause us to drop our birth rate."

He went on to give the example of the lemmings in the Arctic which commit suicide when the population is too great.

Geography prof. K. S. Sandhu, said the world population is outstripping the food supply, and geology prof. W. R. Danner said: "There will be major famine in 35 to 40 years because the world will be able to produce enough food but the farmers will not produce it."

Sandhu, Leiber and Danner said the doom theories are inaccurate because they project to the infinite.

The AAC maintained the theories are lies because they "divert attention from the real problems caused by their exploitation."

Anyone who hates kids and dogs can't be all bad

During this period in U of T's history, when the administration is demolishing houses in the Huron-Sussex block and evicting tenants, it's hardly surprising that the mandarins of Simcoe Hall are finding the Day Care Centre unnecessary.

After all, our university is dedicated to the perpetuation of scholarship, not the survival of people.

The Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre is an invaluable service to parents of over 25 children. The parents are members of the university — from support staff to faculty to students.

The administration has never been famous for fully consulting the members of the surrounding community, when it has decided to evict them. But you would think that even the administration would be more tactful in dealing with the citizenry of its own "community". Some of our best graduate students and faculty have children.

Up until now the administration accepted the existence of the day care centre. But when it shifted the responsibility to the office of the (non-academic) vice-president, K. S. Gregory, an administrative assistant reversed the policy of co-operation. Consistent with its schizophrenia, Simcoe Hall has let its policy-makers coat the Day Care Centre with sugar and spice, while its property managers enforce rules unknown and inaccessible to the people they affect.

Two new policies have suddenly appeared:

- a crocodile-tear concern with providing "members of the surrounding community" with "family" housing;

- the removal of guarantees to the Day Care Centre of accommodation until at least May 31 in its present location, and the evaporation of promises for help in finding a new location if necessary.

The administration has kept the Day Care Centre workers in constant confusion. Amid the piles of non-policy statements issued from Simcoe Hall, there is the concrete reality of parents who need day care for their children.

If this university really served people, day care centres would be a first priority.

Parents on this campus desperately need inexpensive day-care facilities because the U of T pays notoriously poor wages to support staff, especially to women.

Without day-care, women students with children have severely limited time for their studies. The single day-care centre, set up by the initiative of the Women's Liberation Movement, is not sufficient. It's the responsibility of the employer to provide day-care for its employees.

The present U of T Day Care Centre is vital — for there just aren't any others available. This centre is unique in that parents of the children collectively decide policies that affect their children and can be present to help carry them out.

By supporting the demands of the day-care centre for adequate free space, members of this university can show the administration that it cannot continue to treat people as political pawns.

Babies if necessary, but not necessarily babies.

LETTERS

I am writing this letter, because, as a Jew, I feel it is necessary to disassociate myself from the fascist political stance on Israel (namely Zionism) taken by some otherwise progressive Jewish students. Let me state my position in a number of points:

- Israel is not a socialist society, it is state-capitalist. The Union bureaucracy may have a great deal of power in Israel — but the workers don't.

- The Palestinian population in the state of Israel are a minority who are politically oppressed and economically super-exploited.

- The 'religious' foundation of the State of Israel is racist. It is the racism of an historically oppressed people, but it is still racist.

- The Israeli Government has scant regard for Arab lives and property. Because the struggle of the Palestinians for their homeland is becoming a people's war, it is not surprising that Israel is obliged to make war against the Palestinian people. (There is an analogy with Vietnam.)

- Israel was the aggressor in the June War: it fought for and won the territories she is now occupying.

- The progressive forces in the Middle East are presently represented by the Arab guerrilla movements: not by the national bourgeoisies of the Arab countries, nor by the official labour movement of Israel.

- Anti-semitism in this century has been at least in part a racist distorted form of anti-capitalist feeling. Those Jews who are racists, fascists or capitalists cannot shelter forever behind the charge of anti-semitism levelled against opponents of Zionism and Imperialism.

- My political views do not have to be derived from genetics — nor from cultural background. I am from a nouveau riche bourgeois family: that does not give me any natural solidarity with the class I came from.

On the contrary, my parents are ultimately class enemies. By putting family solidarity, religious solidarity, national solidarity etc. always in the forefront as a set of overriding loyalties, there can never be class struggle — therefore there could never be a socialist movement or society.

- The Progressives for Israel is a monstrous cop-out for its members: you can't be "progressive" and "for Israel". It is a stance which prevents family problems and identity crises, but it does not much help the people of the Middle East.

- Although I support popular movements in the Middle East to smash the State of Israel as it is currently constituted, I do not, of course, support any kind of race war waged against Jews as such in the Middle East or elsewhere, and I oppose the cultural nationalism in the Arab movements that is being assiduously supported and encouraged by nationalist governments (e.g. Egypt) in order to divert their people from revolution at home.

- Finally, those who stand on the sidelines of popular struggles and call for peace and love are reactionary: they want the people to disarm.

ALL POWER TO THE PEOPLE.

johnson caught at own game

Having read the first two installments in your series on Israel I feel a few remarks are in order. I find it rather interesting that in your Mar. 4th editorial you accuse Mr. Hurd and Mr. Miglin of using McCarthyite tactics in smearing their opponents in the SAC elections, then you go and do exactly the same thing in your article on Israel.

Your series supposedly deals with Israel, yet it contains very little regarding Israel. Instead it is a one-sided propaganda attack on Israel which lacks accuracy and fairness. You approached the topic with a closed mind and your trip to Israel served only as a means of searching for evidence to support your predetermined position.

Let me make several comments regarding the two articles I have already read. You say you visited the Arab town of Qalqiliya (Kalkilya). At no time do you point out that the Jordanian army used this town as a base for their long-range artillery.

The Jordanians pounded Israeli targets from this spot during the Six Day War and the Israelis replied with an intensive artillery barrage that demolished most of the town. After the war the Israeli government appealed to the citizens of the town to return and began rebuilding the town. Are you certain that the demolished houses you saw were a result of Israeli retaliation for terrorist action or could they have been the remains of the damage incurred in the last war?

johnson speaks the truth

The difference between an honest man and a "crook" is that the first expresses exactly what he sees and feels, or in other words, he reflects the truth as it appears to his ability of assimilation, whilst the second does not.

The reason behind writing this letter is the series behind your experience with the Arabs in the occupied land of Palestine.

I would like first to congratulate you for your honesty in saying what you saw and heard, because the people behind your invitation to visit that land were hoping to brain-wash you, as they do in all the information media, and to utilize you as a spokesman to support the Zionist atrocities committed by the government of Israel.

Secondly, I would like to point out that in this country either you speak

If you had done your homework you would also have discovered that Kalkilya has not been an El Fatah stronghold. In fact, the town has been rather passive. The real centres of Arab resistance have concentrated in the Hebron area.

As to the 120 houses you claim the Israeli military authorities have destroyed in Kalkiya, allow me to enlighten you. According to a statement made by Defence Minister Moshe Dyan in the Israeli Knesset (Parliament) on Dec. 16, 1969, the Israeli military authorities have demolished or sealed off a total of 516 buildings since the Six Day War. Of these, 265 have been on the West Bank and most were located in Hebron, Nablus, and the surrounding areas.

You also describe Jericho's mayor as being a lacky of the Israeli authorities and you place a great deal of emphasis on the lack of elections in the occupied territories. May I remind you that the local Arab authorities were not elected under Jordanian rule. They were appointed by Amman.

Israel has chosen to maintain the status quo for the time being. Israel has not appointed new men nor has she called elections. Instead, Israel has allowed the former officials to retain their positions and has allowed these people to continue administering the territories.

Only when there has been armed resistance has Israel punished the Arabs, "correctly", meaning that you are Zionist, or else anything you say is "bullshit" according to Mr. Rick Kardon. What you published was vehemently attacked simply because you spoke the truth, and this is something that has no room in the Zionist-controlled mass media in Toronto, and anywhere else in the Western World for that matter.

Maybe the Varsity should quit speaking about the Middle East and leave the floor for the Zionist papers such as "Masada" and "Other Stand" to present the truth to the people!

I hope you'll remain "honest" in your future articles because I am sure that many Canadians have long been waiting for somebody to present the "actual truth".

portionate to their numbers.

In the occupied territories where poverty is widespread, (as it was under the Jordanian and Egyptian rule) the Israeli military occupation has begun several schemes to improve conditions. Israel has made available a low interest long term loan programme to all the inhabitants enabling women for example to buy sewing machines. It has provided unemployed men with jobs in construction, road building and agriculture and at pay very nearly the equal of the Israeli worker. Most of my information is first hand as I personally and only by destroying their homes. There has been no case of an Arab terrorist being executed. What other occupying power in the history of warfare can make that claim?

At the beginning of your second article you claim: "there are one million Arabs in the occupied territories and another million in Israel". This is a sterling example of your inaccuracies. While it is true that there are a million Arabs in the occupied territories, there are only some 300,000 Arabs within Israel.

As to the fact that most Israelis ignore the needs of the Palestinian Arabs, I do not believe this is quite true. The Palestinians in the occupied territories remain Jordanian citizens and therefore are treated differently from Israeli citizens. Despite this, these people are allowed to enter Israel and may carry on trade and commerce with Israel.

These Palestinians are also allowed to travel back and forth across the Jer-dan River and may export their produce to Jordan. Without this trade, the Palestinians would be impoverished. Instead, their standard of living has risen since the beginning of the Israeli occupation. Israel has also sent in agricultural experts to teach the Arab farmers modern farming techniques and Israel has sent them modern equipment to increase the agricultural production in the area.

Conditions in the occupied territories may not be ideal — neither are conditions within Israel. But Israel has treated the Arabs in these areas as well as, if not better than, the Jordanian and Egyptian governments had before the Six Day War. If you wish to criticize Israel, I wish you would take the trouble to find out what you are talking about. It is very easy to write a slanted article. It is more difficult to ferret out the truth. Perhaps you should enrol in a good school of journalism and learn a little about your trade.

johnson a courageous journalist

The barrage of letters of personal insults to Mr. Brian Johnson by some Zionists, which appeared in last Friday's Varsity, as a result of the two reports which Mr. Johnson published in previous issues, is a typical Zionist manoeuvre aiming to undermine his efforts for presenting an honest picture of the plight of the Palestinians in the occupied West Bank of Jordan.

Zionists use every method of deceit to brain-wash people in the Western world about Palestine (Howard English, of the Students for Israel, tells us that "the Zionists went to Palestine as pioneers, created a nation out of a desert" and made this bloom!!!)

When the world discovered that Palestine had a people — contrary to Mrs. Golda Meir's claim that "the Palestinians do not exist" — Zionists claimed they were bringing prosperity and progress. They assured the world that "a Jewish State was never a part of the Zionist programme". When the people of Palestine resisted the Zionist invasion, the Zionists started justifying their illegal immigration on the grounds of "historic rights" and false interpretation of the Old Testament. They claimed "God is repatriating His Chosen People to their Promised Land".

In 1948 and thereafter, Zionists misrepresented their war of aggression against Palestine and its people as a "war of liberation" and a "war of independence". Zionists call their looting and robbery of Arab homes and lands "reclamation". Now that they feel that the Arabs of Palestine are determined to liberate their homeland, Zionists are frantic and want the Western Powers to supply them with all types of modern weapons to deter the Arabs from making any move toward liberating their lands from the Zionist occupation.

Brian Johnson is a courageous journalist. For, to criticize Israel, because of its inhumane policy towards the Palestinians, has been labelled as Taboo by the Toronto daily papers, and for Brian Johnson to have stood up, telling everyone what he had witnessed, in the occupied West Bank, in a society in which much of the key positions and nerve centres, on campus and elsewhere, are Zionist-controlled — (remember the Haggar affair?) — deserves admiration and support from every man and woman seeking the truth.

M. Adnan Mughrabi.

Brian Johnson's article on Israel in the Wednesday Varsity is so full of inaccuracies and untruths that it clearly shows his vicious anti-Israeli bias.

There are not two million Arabs under Israeli rule but only one million (including those in pre-war Israel.) The three hundred and fifty thousand Arabs in pre-war Israel have an average per capita income of two thousand, four hundred and fifty dollars compared with the Jewish income of two thousand five hundred and ninety. They have complete freedom of speech and have representation in parliament proportionate to their numbers. I travelled and lived in post war Israel for five months and made several Arab friends.

I was in Jericho several times, it is not "the best town on the West Bank" but one of the worst. Jericho is at a spot where the Jordan River is quite shallow and saboteurs very frequently cross here and consequently it has always been a very dangerous area. Several times it was shelled by the Jordanian army (Arabs shelling Arabs!). One of these occasions was one day last July when I, together with some other foreign medical students working in Jerusalem had planned a tour of the area. We had to cancel our visit.

Now do you know why tourists don't stay in Jericho. As for elections, there never were any under King Hussein's rule. All mayors were appointed and for the most part still retain their posts. However the Israeli government is now in the process of taking a census and organizing elections.

I hope in the future Mr. Johnson is more accurate in his reporting.

U of A admin takes red pencil to The Gateway

EDMONTON (CUP) — The administration at the University of Alberta Thursday took its censor's pencil to the campus student newspaper, The Gateway, to force removal of two "objectionable" photographs.

The action has escalated the conflict between the administration (which prints The Gateway) and the staff of the paper, who have charged the administration with interference in The Gateway's right to print what it chooses.

The pictures shows posters publicizing an election and formal which depicted nude men and women. Captions were: "Opportunity 103" and "Opportunity 102."

Administration printing services co-ordinator Ross Grant, who oversees the paper's production, demanded removal of the photos, declaring "I have never been sued, and I don't intend to start now."

Grant was backed up by administration vice-president Gordon Tyndall.

In protest, Gateway editors replaced the entire front page of the paper, with a small note inviting students to Gateway offices, to read the page one news.

Editors also urged students to attend an open meeting tomorrow where the editors will confront Tyndall and Grant over the censorship.

It's the second time the administration has censored The Gateway, arguing that the paper's contents would "demean" the university in the eyes of the general public.

In November, the administration refused to print an anti-vietnam war cartoon which appeared in several other student newspapers.

The cartoon depicted a couple engaged in sexual intercourse, the male labelled "U.S." and the female "Vietnam." The caption read: "Reluctant to pull out."

After the November incident the U of A student council asked the university's General Faculty Council to establish an appeal board composed of students, faculty and administration with the power to override decisions made by the university's printing services concerning Gateway content.

The GFC refused to consider the matter, and the case is now before an appeal committee of the university board of governors.

West Indies tensely awaits conspiracy verdict

MONTREAL (CUP) — The judge in the "computer conspiracy trial" here has decided that conspiracy involves more than one person even if they don't have to talk to one another.

And in the West Indies, a tense quiet prevailed as demonstrators, who had taken to the streets by the tens of thousands over the past two weeks, awaited the verdicts in the trial.

Judge Kenneth MacKay made his decision Monday concurring with a motion by attorneys representing the 10 West Indian defendants in the current trial: that the defendants be considered as a group on each of five separate conspiracy charges.

MacKay then instructed the 11-man, all white jury to return a decision on the first charge — conspiracy to destroy computers in the Sir George Williams University Computer Center on February 11, 1969 — considering the 10 defendants as a unit.

Originally MacKay had intended that jurors return 50 separate verdicts — one for each defendant on each charge. Earlier, he did not object when special prosecutor Fred Kaufman told jurors the crown need not prove that "two or more parties came together and agreed," in order to prove a conspiracy existed.

Later, the jury will consider the other charges: conspiracy to interfere with lawful use of the computer centre; conspiracy to commit arson; conspiracy to interfere with lawful use of the faculty lounge and conspiracy to destroy cafeteria furniture.

The 10 black natives of Trinidad and Tobago are the first of 87 adults charged in connection with the 1969 incident.

Fire broke out in the SGWU computer centre after the Montreal riot squad charged a student sit-in at the building. The students were protesting the university's faulty handling of charges of racism levelled at a SGWU professor.

Canadian racism and imperialism has been the focus of protests in the West Indies since February when demonstrators stormed a Royal Bank of Canada building at Port of Spain.

Since then, street parades of up to 10,000 persons have demonstrated against the trial of the West Indians at Montreal, accompanied by predictions that a guilty verdict in the trial would spark intensified protests.

At Port of Spain Monday, Geddes Granger, a spokesman for the National Joint Action Committee, told reporters: "we can give no guarantee to Canadians here if our boys are found guilty and sent to jail."

At Georgetown, Guyana, the Progressive Youth Organization sent a telegram to Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, warning of possible retaliation for guilty verdicts.

Monday the tension had spread to Montreal where the city police riot squad was posted outside the courtroom in anticipation of a protest. Inside, blacks among the 80 spectators raised their fists in a salute to the defendants as the jury filed out.

MONTREAL (CUP) — Perry Meyer, one-man arbitration committee in the cases of 29 Loyola College faculty fired by their administration last December, surprised the Loyola campus Tuesday by reversing the administration's decision in the cases of 22 of the professors.

At the same time, Meyer took pains to soften the blow for the Loyola administration, declaring the original action in firing the professors did not constitute the "political purge" charged by students and faculty at the college.

Students at Loyola termed Meyer's decision "a great victory" in their year-long struggle with the all-Jesuit administration at Loyola. Administrators, although reportedly thunderstruck at the long-awaited arbitration report, made no comment on the decision.

Meyer, a law professor at McGill University, was appointed a special investigator into disturbances at Loyola January 12, after students and faculty had launched a full-scale protest against their administration for the firings and for refusing to consider binding arbitration in the case of nuclear physicist S. A. Santhanam, dismissed without stated reason at the beginning of the fall term.

A high proportion of the dismissed faculty had been heavily involved in criticism of the Loyola administration for its action in firing Santhanam, and some had supported a three-day class boycott by students protesting the administration's no-negotiation attitude over the Santhanam firings.

On January 20, the Loyola administration agreed to suspend letters of non-renewal of contract sent to the dismissed faculty, and granted right of appeal of the decision to the 27 and to two other faculty dismissed at the same time.

Meyer was appointed a one-man appeals board for the cases, and the administration agreed that his decision would be binding on all parties.

Tuesday, Meyer declared that 22 of the faculty should be granted one-year "non-terminal" contracts — containing a renewal option. Five of the remaining professors were dismissed from Loyola, two others withdrew their appeals before Meyer reached a decision.

In his 89-page report, Meyer also suggested sweeping changes in the governing structure of Loyola — although the suggestions will not be binding on the college.

Chief among the suggestions was a large-scale cutback in the power of the Roman Catholic Society of Jesus over academic affairs at the college; arguing that "serious consideration" should be given to the selection of a lay president and academic vice-president for Loyola.

Current administration president Patrick Malone and acting academic vice-president Jack O'Brien are both members of the Jesuit order. Both have served as objects of student and faculty discontent at the college.

Meyer also suggested that members of the Loyola Board of Trustees (currently all Jesuits) should not be allowed to hold "senior academic positions," currently held by at least three trustees.

Meyer suggested that such a conflict of interest would have to be resolved by resignation from the Board. He also suggested the appointment of a college ombudsman to handle disputes at the college.

At the same time, Meyer warned that financial and administrative considerations might force cutbacks in Loyola staff next year.

The Loyola English Department, which regained 16 of 17 faculty fired by the administration, could expect "serious cutbacks" next year, Meyer said. He also predicted cutbacks in departments "that weren't affected this year."

CUS travel bureau is alive and well . . .

In the market for a sporty new Maserati? The Association of Student Councils just might be able to get it for you cheap.

Unaffected by the demise of the parent organization, the CUS Travel Bureau has changed its name and is not only continuing, but expanding operations in its old familiar haunts at 44 St. George — just upstairs from the Association of American Exiles.

Executive Director, Robert Simond outlined some of the new services of the AOSC.

"We can now offer the student lower rates on most foreign-made cars and car insurance," says Simond. "In addition, we are beginning to look into the best life insurance policies for students, which we plan to endorse to our members."

Needless to say, the AOSC is encountering a great deal of static from the various profit-making dealers in the city. "Many companies offer a good-sized kickback to the dealer, most of which we are able to return to the student," explains Simond.

In fact, even the old, familiar, CUS flight is a better deal than most students realize. Although many organizations promise lower rates, Simond points out that this is often the result of failure to fulfill the numerous federal regulations governing charter flights.

Some travel clubs have been known to wait until they have a flight 75 per cent booked to reserve an aircraft. Needless to say, this often results in cancelled flights and disappointed passengers.

"Since such practices usually result in the organization's loss of franchise, I think the AOSC has a clear mandate to expose such practices and protect the interests of the student."

All AOSC profits — from flights, car sales and insurance — are used to pay its small, skeleton staff of 4. Simond himself is on straight salary and receives no commission. At the end of the year all residual monies are returned to the member student councils, in proportion to the percentage of business received from that campus.

This summer the AOSC is offering a total of 30 overseas flights, 2 to Tokyo. As a member of the International Student Travel Conference, the AOSC is able to offer its members sizable reductions on Asian and inter-European flights.

For example, an Indian student studying in Canada was able to go home to Bombay for a total cost of $505. Regular tourist fare on BOAC is $1200.

ITC rate from Amsterdam to Moscow is $29.

"When I started in this business 4 years ago, I thought students preferred non-jet flights," says Simond. "However, today I find there is no market for them. After all, it's only the more affluent student who can afford a summer in Europe."

There will be comfortable stretchers and willing nurses in the Junior Common Room today and the Medical Arts building Thursday and Friday.

The nurses have already begun to needle the campus and will allow any student willing to contribute blood to be on the Red Cross couches. About 1579 students of both sexes have been laid so far.

Only 120 bled yesterday at Trinity's bleed-in and many more are expected to join the fun and reach the desired 2900 pints point.

The Faculty of Dentistry bled like mad last Friday as more than 80 per cent of the students turned up. Only about 10 per cent of the students of other faculties and colleges contribute on the average.

israel:

Imperialism — just a few feet away from Arabs in the Old city of Jerusalem.

2,000 years ago the zealots dealt with different Romans

My loyal followers, long ago we resolved to serve neither the Romans nor anyone else but only God, who alone is the true and righteous Lord of men: now the time has come that bids us prove our determination by our deeds. At such a time we must not disgrace ourselves; hitherto we have never submitted to slavery, even when it brought no danger with it: we must not choose slavery now, and with it penalties that will mean the end of everything if we fall alive into the hands of the Romans. For we were the first of all to revolt, and shall be the last to break off the struggle. And I think it is God who has given us this privilege; that we can die nobly and as free men, unlike others who were unexpectedly defeated. In our case it is evident that day-break will end our resistance, but we are free to choose an honourable death with our loved ones. This our enemies cannot prevent, however earnestly they may pray to take us alive; nor can we defeat them in battle.

“Let our wives die unabused, our children without knowledge of slavery: after that, let us do each other an ungrudging kindness, preserving our freedom as a glorious winding-sheet . . .

Come! While our hands are free and can hold a sword, let them do a noble service! Let us die unenslaved by our enemies, and leave this world as free men in company with our wives and children.”

—from El'Azar's Oratian at Masada

israel:

Tents of an Israeli army camp on the road to Masada.

The Israeli government recently sent Varsity Editor Brian Johnson and 12 American college newspaper editors on an all-expense-paid trip to Israel. The following is the third and last in this series of articles, which have sparked considerable controversy in the Letters-to-the-Editor columns of The Varsity (see page five).

...Our kibbutz is surrounded by Israeli soldiers. It's been fairly quiet here, but yesterday we had two soldiers hurt. One of them was killed. We hear machine-gun fire about a mile away just about every night. And occasionally the Jordanians shell the kibbutz. Our last injury here was two years ago when a tractor ran over a mine planted in one of our fields. He was killed unfortunately."

In Jerusalem a Scotsman was telling me about the war and how it had affected his four months' experience on a border-kibbutz. A qualified computer technician with job-offers in Tel Aviv, he preferred to milk cows near the Jordanian border. His experience is a typical story that can be told by anyone from a number of other kibbutzim within hearing-range of the gunfire that marks the formality of the war.

But even away from the fighting, behind every major aspect of Israeli enterprise — from education to tourism — there is the war.

Throughout Israel, the visual symbols of war make a striking first impression. Soldiers with sub-machine guns slung over their backs are a common sight. But the novelty of seeing a nation-in-arms soon wears off, more deep-rooted is the militarism of the attitudes and life-styles that are geared to the production of security.

The universities plug right into that production. When we visited the three major universities — the University of Tel Aviv, the Technion in Haifa, and the Hebrew University in Jerusalem — we saw familiar structures that related directly to the proverbial military-industrial complex. Just like in North America. Education designed to produce highly specialized labour and research.

But the attitudes of Israeli students are radically different. They know why they are at university and they don't question their role.

No long hair. No beards. No politics. No student sub-culture.

"Our situation does not allow us to be very humanistic, because of the threat we face," explained a student at the Technion, the engineering school that is Israel's M.I.T.

"We are forced to judge things realistically," he added. "A friend in my course died just today. I thought of humanistic things and that, but I can't. I would like to follow emotions of humanistic things and international politics and flowers, but I can't."

Israeli students are serious. Most spend a term in the army after high school, unless they are deferred to the "academic reserve" so that they can serve in the army after their university education. Many are married by the time they reach university.

I asked a University of Tel Aviv student if he liked school.

"I regard school as a jumping stage to something else," he said. "I come here because I have my plans and my program. It's not a question of liking school."

At the Technion, "political activity" is forbidden by the Council of Students.

"We would have underground feuds and conflicts, and the voting wouldn't be clean," a student-councillor told me. "So we forbade politics."

"We don't have any riots here," another student explained. "We are not like the French students; we are not amateurs. We have been in the army and we are soldiers. Most of the faculty are officers and sergeants. So if we have a riot, it will be a good one."

Education is part of the sophisticated side of Israel's development. Foreign affairs is not just a question for abstract discussion. From 1968 to 1962 the Technion ran a program of inviting students from Zambia, Thailand, and Cypress — "developing countries" — to study agricultural engineering. Also 'Developing Countries' is a major course in the University of Tel Aviv's Social Sciences. Yet Israel itself is a "developing country."

"The student here is better integrated into society," an American professor at the Hebrew University told us. "He is not alienated. Our youth feel they are important in the society. Students here don't have time to sit around and form a subculture."

Students, like most other Israelis, are well integrated. They found it hard to understand the American student's resistance to the draft and to his education, since 'national purpose' is one of the primary motives in their lives.

Some students talk vaguely about student power, but they see student power as a device to make university run more smoothly, not to restructure the function of education.

"We have student delegates on the Board here," a Hebrew University student told me. "If we have good reasons for not wanting courses or exams, we make demands. Of course we have to fight, but it's a fair fight."

In Israel, students and administration are on the same side of the barricade.

Disruption only results from isolated acts of Arab terrorism.

When we entered the student union building at the Technion, a security guard checked our bags at the door — looking for bombs. Last year Arab students left a bomb in the cafeteria of the Hebrew University and 22 people were injured.

"We learn that they don't care about places where people study and learn, so now we don't take any chances," our guide explained.

In the Technion, we sat with a few hundred students in the cafeteria. They went about their business of eating in a room designed like a factory. A conveyor belt lined one wall, and students formed a long queue along another. Many wore black ski jackets, and there were very few women. They carried English and American textbooks. English is a prerequisite for university education, since most of the texts and reference books are in English.

American technology and manpower is clearly written across the face of Israel: senior professors with Mid-West accents, university construction financed with private American capital, over 100 discoteques in Tel Aviv. Coke signs in Hebrew and Arabic contrast sharply with the ancient architecture in Jerusalem; television aerials rise from the rooftops of the ochre rows of stucco houses in Tel Aviv.

The most powerful American presence is tourism. Israel's Ministry of tourism provides the country's second largest source of revenue. And it is probably one of the most political ministries of tourism in the world.

As a group of North American college news-story and photos

part three of a series

nationalism and war are a way of life paper editors, we felt very defensive against the propaganda we expected to receive in return for a free tour of the country. But there was very little overt political propaganda. The present Middle-East conflict was de-emphasized as we were heavily bombarded by the history of Masada, the beauty of Eilat, the architecture of Jerusalem.

But tourism is a subtle and effective method of propaganda. Israel is a beautiful country, and it's easy to leap from that impression to conclude that Israel is playing a just role in the Middle East.

The history and archeology is a dramatic statement for Israel; it is difficult to separate the historical oppression symbolized in the ancient ruins from Israel's present process in making history.

After a two-hour tour of Masada — Herod's rock fortress on the Dead Sea — our guide led us to the northern tip of the mountain, where, 2,000 years ago, El'Azar had invoked the remaining 960 Zealots to commit suicide in face of the Roman siege. Our guide asked one of us to read his oration:

"My loyal followers, long ago we resolved to serve neither the Romans nor anyone else but only God, who alone is the true and righteous Lord of men: now the time has come that bids us prove our determination by our deeds. . . Let our wives die unabused, our children without knowledge of slavery: after that, let us do each other an ungrudging kindness, preserving our freedom as a glorious winding-sheet. . . Come while our hands are free and can hold a sword, let them do a noble service! Let us die unenslaved by our enemies, and leave this world as free men in company with our wives and children."

For 13 college editors who imagined themselves as the participatory audience to an ancient play of mass-suicide, the oration was moving.

But the renegade spirit of Masada is dying in Israel. Youth culture characterized by a pragmatic and expedient nationalism is replacing Zionism. Israel's economy demands that the country's history be sold as a commodity to tourists — a product with heavy political packaging.

Tourism is part of the infrastructure of American investment that is being built, as Tourism Minister Kol reveals behind his altruism:

"I was once asked a question at an American press conference: 'Why do you want our money?' I answered, 'I am giving out loans to American investors to build American hotels for American tourists.' This satisfied them."

As student editors, we couldn't understand why Israel was selling tourism to us. Students are not great importers of revenue. They usually find accommodation at a kibbutz, or at one of the 14 camping sites, or 22 youth hostels; the Hilton is prohibitive.

Minister Kol conveniently provided the answer:

"Zionism began with students," he said. "We invited you here to build bridges between the youth of Israel and the youth of North America."

Youth is an important element in Israel's political development, and the kibbutz is a centre for that process.

Until I visited the Kibbutz Ein Hash-ofet near Haifa, I thought kibbutzim were just agricultural communes where people lived off the land in pastoral bliss.

The appearance of Ein Hash-ofet — with the communal dining hall, the pedestrian walkways running through the rows of small houses — reminded me of a summer camp. But the image is deceiving.

We listened to a leader of the kibbutz, an American who helped found it over 20 years ago.

"A kibbutz economy is highly technological. We employ the most modern machines in agriculture, and most of them are American. We have an annual budget of six to seven million Israeli pounds ($2 million)."

Aside from producing just about every conceivable agricultural crop, the kibbutz operates two trucking industries and a screw factory.

The internal organization of labour is socialist. There is no private property, and little management hierarchy; 150 members of the 400-member kibbutz manned committees in elected positions.

But the kibbutz plugs neatly into a state capitalist economy. The camps provide a very cheap supply of labour, and the socialist politics do not extend beyond the structure of the kibbutz.

The leader from Ein Hash-ofet explained that the major criterion for setting up an industry in a kibbutz was a market. They were considering manufacturing starters for fluorescent lights to stop them flickering, he said.

The kibbutzim are products of three leftist movements around the turn of the century. They were considered a revolutionary project. But now they are well integrated into the economy and are established as mini-utopias.

"We have solved most of our problems," one of Ein Hash-ofet's founders told me. "There are no more problems"

The biggest problem in kibbutzim "is with marijuana," said a leader of one of the kibbutz movements in Tel Aviv.

"On a kibbutz, you don't need it," he added. "In Israel, life is very harsh, and we don't need escapes. We don't need substitutes, because there isn't the same boredom. In Israel the mention of drugs is very frightening. We could have a very rational discussion about hashish, but the parents of a 14-year-old don't want to have rational discussions. A boy from Montreal came to a kibbutz and gave two 14-year-olds opium as an experiment."

In Israel there is no escape. No alternative to nationalism. Things never get boring when there's a war going on.

As we drive from the kibbutz down through occupied Palestine to Jerusalem, we picked up an Israeli soldier, a Moroccan Jew. He wore battle fatigues and carried a sub-machine gun. We talked in French about politics and the occupied territories.

"Every people has a nation," he said. "You are a Canadian — you have Canada. The Jews have Israel. I have been stationed in the Golan Heights for two years and was in the Sinai during the war." He was very proud. He pointed to the place in Sinai on a map.

What about the El Fatah, I asked.

"Ils sont betes!"

What support do they have?

"They have the support of the population," he said. "From this high (he gestures) to this high."

Teach-in waffles with no Watkins

By ALF CHAITON

In many ways, Friday's Teach-in on the Americanization of Canada was a disappointment.

Melville Watkins, leader of the Waffle group who organized the teach-in, and perhaps the leading Canadian economic nationalist, was unable to attend due to illness, and Walter Gordon, from whom Watkins inherited his position, lacked the fire he once had.

The tone was set right at the beginning with a half-hour of Canadian folk songs, which few people bothered or cared to listen to.

June Callwood, who acted as moderator, got the first spontaneous burst of applause when she said, "As long as the educational process is brutal and dehumanising, I don't care whether the content is Canadian or American. We're killing the minds of 80% of our kids."

Gordon said that it was still not too late to regain control of the country. He defended the actions of previous Canadian governments by saying they have "hesitated perhaps because the majority of Canadians had not been concerned, and would not have been in favour of government action at the time."

He argued that it was necessary for the government to make a definitive statement on economic policy, and then to offer incentives for Canadian entrepreneurs. The unexpected absence of any mention of his proposed Canadian Development Corporation was noticeable.

Cy Gonick, a professor at the University of Manitoba, as well as a NDP

M.L.A. and leading Waffler, argued that Gordon and the Watkins Report had failed because they addressed the wrong people, the business elite and the government.

"Canadian industry is totally integrated into the American economy. There is a virtual identity between the Canadian business elite and the American business elite. They want to be free so that they can sell out when the price is right," he said.

Amid continuous applause, he continued, "We oppose the American system because it is a system of corporate capitalism; we oppose the American domination of Canada because we want to build a democratic, socialist Canada."

Gonick and Gordon got into a name-calling session with Gordon criticising the Schreyer government in Manitoba, and Gonick denouncing the role of the Liberal Party in allowing American domination to occur.

Gonick got in the last licks as he said, "The Trudeau government forms the executive of The American Empire (Canada Ltd.)."

Chartrand attacks international unions

By SUSAN REISLER

Labor organizers from various segments of Canada's labor unions spoke out against international unions last Saturday at the Waffle Teach-In in Convocation Hall.

The three speakers who advocated the liberation in various forms of Canadian unions from their American affiliates were Michel Chartrand, President of the Montreal Council of the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU), Grace Hartman, National Secretary-Treasurer, Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) and Kent Rowley, Secretary-Treasurer, Canadian Council of Unions.

The only dissenting voice came from Chris Trower, the International Representative of the United Steel Workers of America who saw the independence of the Canadian labor movement as something quite different from the independence of Canada.

Unions work in the opposite direction from big business, said Trower. They are not interested in making money.

"Trade unions have a common purpose that cuts across all national and international boundaries," he said.

MARX CO-OPTED

Trower quoted Karl Marx as saying "Workers of the world unite" to prove that the unions should remain international.

The audience didn't accept his reasoning and hissed in return. Chartrand was the most radical of the three independentists.

"We want to run our own show in Quebec," he said. Quebec labor has its own problems that the Canadian Labor Congress hasn't got time to work on.

The CNTU involves itself in politics and the CLC doesn't bother about provincial politics, Chartrand said.

CALL FOR SOCIALISM

Chartrand said he was interested in labor sticking with politics to work for a good socialist government.

"We are bargaining on the industrial front," he said, "but we have to go further than bargaining.

"There is an ideology in Canadian unions — 'share the cake'. But that doesn't protect people."

Chartrand said Quebec unions plan to fight on two fronts: in the plant they are fighting against capitalism, but they are also fighting for people outside the plant.

"The labor unions should be the vanguard of the working class," Chartrand said.

But they are not the working class. Labor unions represent only part of the working class.

REVOLUTIONARIES UNITE!

He said, "We will work together with all revolutionary protestors for the destruction of capitalism that has no consideration for the people.

"Capitalism is a social, anational, apatriotic, and amoral.

"We are living in a country of economic dictatorship. Capitalism is Fascism."

Chartrand said universities should be run by the students and the professors and they should have the guts to join a labor union.

"And if they don't have the guts, they should be kicked out of the university and not allowed to teach our children."

CHARTRAND TAKES CAKE

The other speakers were no match for the fiery speech that Chartrand gave.

Grace Hartman, said that Canadian businessmen have been doing nothing to liberate Canada.

"True independence won't be achieved without the whole support of labor," she said.

"Canada is unique in that most of the workers belong to unions based in the U.S.," Hartman pointed out.

There are many differences between the Canadian union and the parent union in the States.

AFL-CIO LEADERSHIP FASCIST?

The AFL-CIO supports big business and the war in Vietnam. Its leaders are usually to the right of the American president.

In Canada the CLC at least supports the NDP and is opposed to the Vietnam war.

She found labor relationships between Canada and the United States parallel to colonial power relationships.

America first pours money into them, divides the organizations so they can't assert authority, puts puppet Canadians in positions of strength, makes the Canadian trade unions feel inferior and eventually reaps huge profits from Canada, the colony.

All Canadian labor organizations should be autonomous from their American counter-parts, she said.

BOURGEOIS PRESS DISTORTION

Kent Rowley brought out statistics that Toronto newspapers had refused to print and which he claimed proved how American unions were exploiting Canadian unions.

According to the Corporation and Labor Returns Act unions are required to report their total income and expenditures to the government.

He cited yearly income from Canadians to the American unions from 1962 to 1967. The total was $166,322,000, as opposed to $98,253,000 which was spent in this country.

And that, as Rowley pointed out, is a net profit by the American parent organizations of $68,069,000. "Even General Motors wouldn't sniff at that."

The American organizations don't reflect the attitudes of the rank and file workers, Rowley said; they reflect the policy of the U.S. State Department or the Pentagon.

Co-op day care centre protests eviction by U of T

The following is the brief presented to the administration by parents, staff and volunteer workers of the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre.

It calls for a reply by noon March 18. For more background see the Centre story on page 1.

We, the parents, staff, and volunteer workers of the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre, protest the administration's recent statement that the university cannot guarantee the centre continued occupancy at its present location, nor provide it with larger and more suitable accommodation.

We were quite clearly given to understand that the only reason we might be moved from 12 Sussex would be that the house was slated for demolition and that, in that event, we would be moved to other accommodation.

As a consequence of the uncertainty surrounding the continued existence of our present premises, we have been unable to comply with the safety, health, and fire regulations which must be met in order for the centre to be granted a licence under the existing provisions of the Day Nurseries Act. The Day Nurseries Branch of the Ontario Department of Family Services has been extremely co-operative and understanding throughout the whole of our negotiations with them, but it is quite clear that these regulations ensuring the health and safety of the children in our care must be met as quickly as possible. The present situation is intolerable.

There is an unquestionable need for the services we provide, which cannot be met by other existing institutions.

There are very few Day Care centres within the area of which the university is a large and integral part. None of these accept children under two and all (only two in the area) have long waiting lists.

TORONTO DAY CARE INADEQUATE

Throughout the whole of Metropolitan Toronto there are almost no centres which provide care for children under two, and those which do are prohibitively expensive for all but those in the upper 10 per cent of the earning population.

The parents who have children in our centre do not fall within this bracket. They are made up of graduate students, other students, support staff and faculty members of the University of Toronto, and residents of the surrounding community.

It is in these income and social groups that day care for children is essential. It is in low-income families that women must work, whether or not they wish to, and in professional groups that women insist on the right to work, whether or not they have children. That anyone should be forced to withdraw from the work-force because she cannot find accommodation for small children is social stupidity to say the least, particularly when it means that a family must fall below the poverty line, or an individual "waste" the training for which society has already borne a heavy financial load.

The university must acknowledge its responsibility to provide child care services for its employees and for those students on whom the university community depends. If the administration does not at least contribute to the support of organizations such as ours which do provide these services, many persons within the university community will be severely handicapped.

Our experience over the past year has shown that there is a need for many more such centres. Knowledge of our centre has spread almost entirely by word of mouth, but we have from the outset had to turn people away because we simply could not care for more children.

GRAVEST CONCERN

Thus, the thought that this centre should be forced to cease operation due to reluctance of the administration to provide even minimal assistance is a matter of the gravest concern not only to those of us who have expended much time and effort, but to all those who are associated with, or affected by, the university.

Indeed, what is clearly indicated is the need to expand our facilities, with no increase in cost to the participants. The centre must be operated at a cost within the range of those who most need the care. Our experience has shown very clearly that with a cost per child about $30 per month, this cannot be accomplished.

Other groups and individuals within the university community have supported the centre in various ways. Out of the donations from SAC, the GSU, and private individuals ($500, $1,000, and $300 respectively), and the massive contributions of labour from individuals both in and outside the university, male and female, we have succeeded in achieving day care which is inexpensive and co-operative. Parents and other members of the centre are collectively responsible for the socialization of children.

It is ironic, indeed paradoxical, to be told by the administration that its commitment to "providing family housing for the surrounding community" necessitates turning out the 22 babies we have in our care to obtain a private dwelling for one family.

The centre serves the needs of 20 families. Since a very large number of our parents are employed full-time throughout the year, the need for the centre is not seasonal. It is mandatory that our needs be met not only from September through May, but for the whole of the year.

It is a matter of the utmost importance to have continued accommodation assured before the end of March.

THE ULTIMATUM

We request that you respond to this brief by 12 noon Wednesday, March 18. We apologize for the fact that the time is rather short, but since the full extent of our uncertainty of our situation has only just come to light, and the uncertainty of our position after the 31st of March is only too clear, we cannot delay beyond this date.

Our specific demands are as follows:

- That the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre be immediately confirmed, by lease, in its present occupancy of 12 Sussex Avenue, the terminal date of such lease not to be earlier than September 30th, 1970.

- That the university undertake to find larger and more suitable accommodation after 30th September 1970 in order that we may expand our facilities. We would, of course, be happy to be moved to such accommodation prior to 30th September, 1970, provided that the terminal date of the lease on said property be not earlier than 30th September, 1971.

- That the rental on 12 Sussex Avenue or other premises be free (or "nominal" only in the sense that the fee should be sufficient to constitute a leasehold).

- That the university should undertake the responsibility of making the necessary renovations to said property or properties in order for the centre to comply with the building, health, and fire regulations. In order for this to be feasible, of course, it is important that the centre be located as soon as possible on those premises most likely to be its "permanent" home (tip to at least September 30th, 1971).

Benson proposes tax on student grants

KINGSTON (CUP) — Federal finance minister Edgar Benson said Saturday (March 7) that he expects to rake in an extra $4 million from students under his new tax proposals.

Student fellowships, scholarships, bursaries and research grants, tax-exempt under current legislation, would be taxed under proposals in Benson's white paper on tax reform which was tabled in the Commons last fall.

Benson was speaking at a symposium on the tax paper held at Queen's university.

Benson justified the tax increases by arguing that some students who get scholarships, bursaries and grants also have "substantial" outside income and should pay taxes on their total incomes "like all Canadians."

The finance minister also rejected a suggestion that students be allowed to deduct interest on student-aid loans. It was too hard to determine whether the money was really borrowed to finance education or to invest in the stock market, he said.

Benson said certain "reasonable expenses — such as tuition, books, reasonable travel expenses, and if it's necessary to hire an assistant to do research work" — would remain tax deductible expenses for students.

Nancy Rubin and Tasha Dellinger, wife and daughter of two of the Chicago Seven who were recently convicted in the Chicago conspiracy trials, will be speaking in Convocation Hall tomorrow

The no-holiday holiday.

Come to Britain and it's no holiday. The moment you get off the plane you're involved.

Not like most vacations, peering in from the outside. In Britain you're part of the action. And it's some action! We've got the discotheques, Carnaby Street, Kings Road and all the other fast-moving places you've heard about.

But, what about the things we take for granted: sifting through the Van Gogh's, Picasso's or Henry Moore's at the Tate Gallery; an afternoon watching the world's top drivers hauling their big, blasting, Formula 1 machines over the toughest circuits in Europe. Seeing a Shakespearean play, the way it should be seen—at Stratford-on-Avon with British actors; or perhaps, passing a sunny day at Lords watching the natives play their native game of cricket?

You can mix in, find out what we're all about — why Trafalgar Square isn't as square as you might think and a boat down the Thames means a roaring party, not a sedate sightseeing expedition. In Britain, it's all go. So why not go?

You could make it for as little as $175, that's for 9 days, hotel and two big meals a day. And, if you belong to a club or any organised group, you could cut the total price way down with a charter flight. Clip the coupon and find out what's going.

Come and take part in Britain — this year!

Don't pee in the streets

By JERRY RUBIN

The revolution satisfies deep human needs denied by American society. That's why it's so dangerous. The biggest social problem in the country today is loneliness.

"What are you doing tonight?"

"I don't know, Marty, what are you doing tonight?"

Loneliness is not an individual problem — it's the collective problem of millions of Americans, growing out of the alienating environment we live in. We work in one part of town with people who are not our friends, and we sleep in another part of town and don't know our neighbours. We waste much of our life dying in mobile concentration camps called freeways or commuter trains.

Where in the city can we go to make friends? Where can we leap out of our individual prisons and enjoy each other? The city is full of walls, locked doors, signs saying "Don't."

If someone you don't know says hello, you get uptight: "What's he want?" It's taboo to talk to strangers. Everybody's hustling. The streets are paved with terror, the city a prison for the soul.

The car, a box, transports lonely people from the box where they sleep to the box where they work, and then back to the box where they sleep. Americans relate to each other as drivers of other cars; the only good driver is the one who takes another road. People killed on freeways are casualties of a war every bit as f—d up as Vietnam.

The streets are for business, not people. You can't sit in a restaurant without buying food; you can't read magazines in a store — you gotta buy, buy, buy — move on. What if you're in the middle of the city and suddenly you have to take a shit?

We are liberating the city, turning the streets into our living rooms. We live, work, eat, play and sleep together with our friends on the streets.

Power is our ability to stand on a street corner and do nothing. We are creating youth ghettos in every city, luring into the streets everyone who is bored at home, school or work. And everyone is looking for "something to do."

For us empty pockets means liberation — from draft cards, registration papers — we are close to our naked bodies.

The hippie becomes the first mass alternative to the American urban prison. Liberated neighborhoods are a great threat to capitalist city life. So the forces of Death — the business community, cops and politicians — conspire to wipe us out. An entire battery of laws — genocidal laws against the young — makes social life in the streets a crime. If you don't hand a cop documentary proof of who you are, you can be arrested. To the state empty pockets means vagrancy.

Watching the world from a street corner is loitering. Hitchhiking is a crime. It's against the law to panhandle, to rap to a crowd in the streets, to stop traffic. Playing a harmonica in the streets is illegal in Venice, California.

Two friends of mine were just arrested for the high political crime of pissing in the street. One was put into a mental hospital. "Underage" kids caught on the streets are hauled straight to juvenile court.

And when all else fails, they establish a curfew, a Nazi law designed to prevent us from getting together.

These laws are designed to strike fear in the youth community. Although they exist on the books everywhere, they are enforced only in the ghetto. Cops patrol the hippie areas the way they patrol black communities, the way American soldiers patrol Vietnam villages. Everyone is a likely enemy.

But the main strategy for destroying the free spirit is business. "Psychedelic" stores try to steal the culture by selling fake artifacts to an emotion-starved Outside world. Camera-toting American tourists come through in buses and on foot, snapping pictures, laughing, squealing, pointing at us.

The streets turn into a hustle, a business section. We never know whom to trust. Burn artists and undercover cops flood the place making it unsafe to buy or sell dope on the street.

We become an island in a capitalistic sea, attacked and infiltrated from inside and outside. The death culture tries to destroy our life force and restructure the youth ghetto in its own image. We lack space in our own community — to breathe, conspire, celebrate, grow.

It is a war for land. Our survival depends on our ability to drive out the psychedelic exploiters, the invading pigs and the politicians, and create youth communities where dropouts from middle-class America can live.

Our goal is to create fires, blackouts, subway stoppages, strikes and snowstorms because only in crisis does liberation come to a city. People meet their neighbors for the first time while watching their apartment buildings burn down. When the subway rumbles along, everyone acts as if no one else is aboard. As soon as there's a breakdown, people start talking to strangers. During snowstorms New York is a playground, an amusement park.

Crisis brings liberation to a city.

The revolution declares all land titles null and void. We are urban and rural liberators, seizing land for the people. No more "I own it!" People who believe they can own natural resources, industries or land are really candidates for mental institutions.

We will bring war to the suburbs. The middle-class creates suburbs as sanctuaries from the fire of the city. Children raised in the suburbs are treated as mentally and physically retarded. If we are not safe in our communities, why should corporate executives be safe in theirs?

We'll get our own tourist buses, steal cameras and ride through the suburbs squealing, laughing, snapping and pointing fingers.

We will take the revolution to Scarsdale.

In a revolution there are no sanctuaries.

This last week-end's teach-in on the Americanization of Canada gives rise to some disturbing thoughts. The extent of American control, of course, is one of these. But there are others.

There was much talk of socialism at the teach-in. The necessity for this is increasingly obvious, for it is surely only with social priorities and not with a society organized to ensure private profit that Canada can achieve genuine independence from the American empire.

And yet the socialism of Saturday's meeting was little more than a slogan; there was little precision among the speakers, and there was little analysis either of the social forces working towards such an end or of the political strategy necessary to obtain it.

There was also much talk of nationalism at the teach-in. Here there was even more difficulty.

What is to be the content of the New Canadian Nationalism? What form is nationalism likely to take in a modern industrialized state?

These questions were hardly asked. Instead, it seemed to me, most enthusiasts were seduced by the hate-filled and condescending rhetoric of Robin Matthews. It is surely not enough to cast off a colonial mentality; the problem is to replace it with a mentality which is more humane, and more creative. And here the speakers provided little inspiration.

Nationalism and socialism: a potent and potentially dangerous mixture, most of us are aware. Or are we? What is one to make of the constant vociferation and celebration of something called "The Canadian Fact"? And what are we to make of the reviewer in the Varsity who considered that Mordecai Richler's choice of subject matter (Jews in Montréal) was not sufficiently "Canadian"?

"A world must be overturned," Rosa Luxemburg once said, "but every tear that flows and might have been staunch is an accusation." Revolutionaries too have responsibilities.

How little of this spirit, which has sustained the socialist movement in its darkest days, and which has always given it a moral superiority over the strongest adversaries, how little of this was evident among the budding theoreticians of the New Nationalism.

varsity reaches a higher plane

Your position exposes you to much criticism, especially when you turn Reporter as well as Editor. It is not possible to keep the balance under conditions of war and man is in a state of warfare all the time.

For your encouragement I would like you to know how much I appreciated the last issue of the Varsity with all the detailed information about the political situation in Africa. This is so different from the usual squabbles of student factions and the bad language which disfigures your paper from time to time.

The perennial issues in society are justice and freedom and by drawing our attention to the problems in Africa, you and your co-workers have lifted the Varsity to a higher plane.

Unamerican activities committee rides again

WASHINGTON (CPS-CUP) — The U.S. senate internal security sub-committee (formerly the subcommittee on un-american activities) has launched a new investigation against several U.S. radical groups.

The investigation, under the chairmanship of Mississippi senator James O. Eastland, involves at least four groups:

- Liberation News Service, a news distribution agency which sends a packet of articles, photos and drawings twice a week to 500 subscribers in the U.S. and abroad;

- the New York regional office of the Students for a Democratic Society, now an independent collective. The office has been used as a meeting center and for printing and propaganda work for radicals in the area;

- Cambridge Iron and Steel, Inc., a corporation operated by radicals for the distribution of money donated by a wealthy benefactor.

A spokesman for Cambridge Iron and Steel described the organization as a "fluke" — that is, not an ordinary funding arrangement for radical movements — and said the name was a joke. The corporation disbursed nearly $25,000 to about a dozen groups, including LNS and the SDS New York regional office.

- the Institute for Policy Studies, an academic "think-bank" located in Washington, D.C. IPS' fellows and visiting researchers include radical academics and activists. Its director, Marcus Raskin, was a co-defendant with Dr. Benjamin Spock on charges of encouraging draft resistance.

The Eastland subcommittee has so far obtained the bank record of IPS (which offered no resistance) and of Cambridge Iron and Steel (whose bank, Cambridge Trust, did not notify the corporation.)

LNS and SDS have successfully obtained court restraining orders to prevent the sequestering of their records.

Continuing legal action by the two groups will seek to enjoin the subcommittee from continuing its investigation. So far, a federal judge has postponed making a decision.

The Eastland committee, re-named in the backlash against red-baiting in the U.S. in the 1950's, made headlines a year ago when it called youth international party non-leaders and anti-war activists before its members.

Jerry Rubin showed up wearing war paint and carrying a toy sub-machine gun.

Senator Eastland, chairman of the committee, is a resident of Sunflower County, Mississippi, where he owns 5,800 acres of land, worth about $4 million. Eastland also owns stock in the state's two largest and most politically influential banks. Eastland family holdings in Mississippi bring in about $158,000 per year in federal subsidies for land left idle: his annual income is reputed to be in the neighbourhood of $250,000.

Most children in Sunflower County grow up in families with total incomes under $1,000 per year. Most blacks in the county don't vote, although they make up 68 per cent of the county's population.

According to the New York Times, Eastland has bottled up more than 122 civil rights bills in senate committees during his political career.

Vic, St. Mikes in interfac hockey final

A third period comeback last night earned PhysEd a 6-6 tie, the second game of the intramural hockey semi-finals against Victoria College.

But Vic took the two game, total point series 12-8 by virtue of their first game 6-2 victory last week.

The Vic team now advances to the final for the Jennings Cup, emblematic of the interfac championship, against St. Mikes, winners of the other semi-final over Engineering.

St. Mikes and the Engineers played a thrilling series that saw the first game end in a 2-2 draw. The St. Mikes crew advanced to the final with a 5-4 overtime victory in the second game.

Varsity Blues taxi-squad-ders Robbie Ellis and Dick Barnhouse led the John Wright-coached PhysEd team against Vic with a pair of goals each. Steve Buron and Gord Nelson added singles.

Paul Squires paced Vic with two goals while single markers went to John Icton, Bob Porter, Warren Brownlee and Doug Berry.

Vic coach Dave McDowall and the team's self-confessed "spiritual advisor" Mike Boland were optimistic of their chances against SMC in the final.

"Our strength is our over-all balance," said McDowall last night. "We've got a good skating team that has played together all year."

Give us a chance to let our hair down, too.

We're not as aquara as you think! Behind our seemingly straight-laced image, there throbs some pretty way-out projects. And people.

Alcan is involved in many unexpected areas. Because we do a lot more than just produce aluminum. We and others try to find new uses for it.

For axampla, one new use that came to our attention was developed in Belgium and refined by a Montreal artist. Through a process called Aluchroma, he "paints" on specially prepared aluminum panels. The resulting work of art has a water-colour affect with unusual depth and perspective, and endless applications in art and architecture.

And that's just one of the exciting new developments in aluminum.

Alcan researchers and scientists are continually searching for better ways to do things with aluminum. And it's not always easy. Often they have to struggle for years to find ways of making their ideas come to life.

So you see, they aren't the only ones who have to cope with hairy problems.

most valuable player award, but rather is given to "the member of the senior hockey team who in the opinion of his teammates is most deserving."

Widely acknowledged as one of the smoothest skaters and playmakers in the league, he has been named to the OQAA Allstar team in every one of his five years.

The classy Blues centre has been active in other areas as well. During both his two years at Victoria College and his three years in Law he has been active in intramural hockey, and this year coached the Law "A" team.

Laurent graduates this spring, and will be articling with Alan Eagleson's law firm. He says he has no plans to pursue a pro hockey career.

Van Ryn's record in his six years as a Varsity swimmer is equally impressive.

Like Laurent, he and his team have won the OQAA and CIAU championships for each year he has been on the team. He has held no fewer than 10 CIAU records and two Canadian records. Basically a freestyle swimmer, he holds records for the 50 and 100-yard events, and swam on record-breaking 400-yard freestyle and medley relay teams.

In 1967, he was voted Canadian Interscholastic Swimmer of the Year. The same year, he participated in the Tokyo Universiade for U of T and Canada.

In interfaculty athletics, Van Ryn has coached and managed the Meds swimming and waterpolo teams. He is the current president of the Medical Athletic Association.

Boxing News

Bob Maton (II SMC) was elected captain of the Varsity boxing team for 1970-71 at a team meeting following the recent RMC-Varsity competition.

Maton was also received the Massey Foundation Trophy as the most worthy member of this year's squad. He has won his weight title (150 lbs) for two consecutive years.

Coach Tony Canzano picked Ron Marion (II SMC) as the most improved boxer on the team, and Ron received the Zierler Trophy. As a novice boxer Marion put up a good showing against RMC opponents in two bouts.

ger Terry Peterman uncovered in front of the Huskies' net and hit him with a perfect pass. Peterman had goalie Chuck Goddard at his mercy, and he took his time beating him with a backhand to the glove side of the southpaw netminder.

Goddard, who spent five years with Peterborough of the OHA Junior A, was one of the St. Mary's players with experience in the tough Eastern league and it was his goaltending that had made the difference in the Huskies 4-0 shutout of Loyala Friday night.

Huskies came within a silly millimeter of tying the game early in the second.

St. Mary's Carl Boswick let a hard shot go that eluded Grant Cole, guarding Blues' net. Cole, who is an avid snooker player, turned around just in time to witness one of the nicest bank shots he will ever see.

The puck hit one post, went straight along the goaline, hit the other post and then came out harmlessly into the crease area.

PETERMAN AGAIN

Blues went ahead 2-0 as they scored the only goal of the period. It was Peterman again with a quick wrist shot from about 20 feet in front. St. John and leftwinger Lenny Burman drew assists.

It was about this point that the Huskies appeared to realize that their chances of winning would be greatly increased if Peterman was somehow removed from the scene.

There followed three consecutive St. Mary's penalties with Peterman the object of attention on each occasion. First came a cross check into the boards, then a trip and finally an elbow that was delivered with all the force that a charge the width of the ice can create.

The last of these penalties, the elbowing minor to Huskies' captain Brian O'Bryne, which carried over into the third proved more of a curse than a blessing to Blues.

Blues failed to score with the advantage and when O'Bryne stepped onto the ice he was fed a breakout pass by teammate John Murray. O'Bryne scored to narrow the gap to one goal.

The score appeared to put new life into the Halifax team as they began to carry play to Blues.

SCORE TIED

With less than five minutes remaining they tied the game when the rightwinger on their top line, Gerry Cameron, swept a loss puck into Blues' goal.

That set the stage for Laurent's last second heroics.

"You have to give the St. Mary's team credit," said Watt after the game. "They played three games in three days and gave us all we could handle."

For Laurent, the high-scoring, veteran center, who was playing the final game as a Blue, it was a storybook ending to a storybook career.

In the cluttered cubby-hole that was somehow mistaken for tournament officials for a dressing room, Laurent was the first to admit that it was a team victory.

CHEERS

One by one, all the Blues who had given so much to reach the championship received the accolades of their teammates.

The first cheers went to Peterman, who led Blues in tournament scoring with three goals and two assists. The former Princeton star in his second year with Blues was one of the sine qua non's of the team this year as he filled in at all three forward positions at various times and was a success at each one.

Grant Cole kicks out a Huskies' shot as Brian St. John (12), Len Burman (15) and Dove Field move in to offer support.

The next cheer was for the remainder of the forwards who checked well and scored big goals when needed.

A round for the defensive core of Field, McDowall, Hamilton, Parsons and Bill L'Heureux who met the Huskies with authority all evening.

And last but certainly not least, a loud salute to the big, quiet guy in the corner, Grant Cole. Cole, the rookie netminder from St. Michael's College, went out and did the job in both games with the cool proficiency that belied the magnitude of his contribution.

And thus, by Sunday morning Blues were masters of all they surveyed.

BLUESNOTES... Blues and Huskies monopolized the tournament all-star selections. Blues took all three forward positions with Brian St. John at center, Terry Peterman on the right side and Nick Holmes on the left... Huskies' Chuck Goddard was the all-star goaltender and the tournament's Most Valuable Player while his teammates Brian O'Bryne and John Murray were selected on the defense... the Alberta team, who were one of the disappointments of the tournament as they were trounced 6-0 by Blues and 11-3 by York, hired a local high school band to provide them with support... the perfect squeal of the week was left to one of the rink rats at the Charlottetown

Forum and came at the expense of the westerners... during the drubbing Alberta was taking at the hands of York, the Bears coach Brian MacDonald scolded the young boy for disturbing his team by shooting a tin can with a broken hockey stick in the arena corridor... "The way your team is playing," the boy replied, "you'd better put me out on the ice..." four loyal Blues fans, Jack Shieman, Mark Mandisohn, Ron Sluser and Sam Zylhergold drove all the way to PEI (22 hours straight through) to lend their support.

Wrestlers close season with good showing in Metro Championships

Well, aside from the fact that U of T placed second to Scarborough Wrestling Club, the Metro Wrestling championships can be termed a huge success. High schools and clubs provided 64 entries competing in 120 bouts.

U of T fared well, placing in every weight division entered. Unfortunately quality lost out to quantity... the masses of unknown wrestling potential remain so until another season.

Ken White was our only representative in the lower weight divisions. He placed second to R. Phillion at 125.5 lbs. Bill Allison and Paul Beswick placed first and third respectively, at 163 lbs. Beswick wrestled seven times to earn his position and deserves credit for the fastest pin of the afternoon — 21 seconds.

Gregg Rokosh and Ernie Friedrich battled to first and second at 180.5 lbs. Anderson nearly had a third, but pinned himself with a complicated double-elbow roll — so much for that move! Peep lost to Ylo, but the Korgemagi's still took home the first two trophies in the heavyweight division.

The trophies were donated by the Inn on the Park through Morris Sobel, Athletic Director (also a former coach at U of T). Thanks go to Jack Edgar who created the team and the U of T Athletic Association who gave us their many forms of support.

Paul Laurent doesn't usually carry his hockey stick with him on a jet airplane.

While the remainder of Blues' equipment rested in the luggage compartment as the team winged its way home from Charlottetown on a bright, clear Sunday afternoon, Paul's stick travelled first class with the rest of the team.

That stick, with its chipped heel and raggedy tape, was a very special weapon. With it, Laurent scored the winning goal with only 14 seconds of regulation playing time remaining the night before.

The 3-2 victory gave Blues and their coach Tom Watt their fourth national collegiate championship in the last five years.

The goal came in the tournament final against the St. Mary's Huskies from Halifax in what ranked in the minds of the hockey men who took in the four day event as one of the most exciting college hockey games of all time.

For sheer drama the game was hard to beat.

On one hand were St. Mary's University, the popular favourite of all the Maritimes. The Huskies were bolstered by many of their own fans who made the trip from Halifax to the Island when it was learned that their team had made it to the final with wins over York and Loyola.

Huskies, coached by Bob Boucher, were a talented, close checking team. In their lineup were four players with experience in the US semi-pro Eastern league.

On the other side were Blues, the defending champs.

ROUGH ROAD

For Blues the road to Charlottetown had been far from smooth and at times they appeared permanently detoured. A rash of injuries culminated in the low point of the season when they limped home from Montreal early in January after suffering a humiliating 10-4 defeat at the hands of the Loyola Warriors in the final of the Loyola Centennial tournament.

Now Blues had to face the team which had themselves handed the warriors a convincing 4-0 defeat.

With a capacity crowd of 2,700 on hand, and another 400 or so hanging from the rafters, Blues ran into trouble early in the game.

Defensemen Dave McDowall and Bob Hamilton picked up back-to-back penalties and Blues were forced to play two men short for 61 seconds.

Only superb defensive work by Blues' remaining two regular defensemen, Dave Field and Terry Parsons, the checking of captain Brian St. John and a couple of lucky bounces of the puck, prevented St. Mary's from scoring.

From that point Blues settled down and picked up the first goal with only seconds remaining in the first period. St. John found his rightwin-

Water, frozen and liquid, was a major factor in the success of the two top male athletes at U of T this year.

Hockey veteran Paul Laurent and swimming star Theo Van Ryn last night were named co-winners of the George M. Biggs Trophy, awarded annually to "the undergraduate who has contributed most to University Athletics from the standpoint of leadership, sportsmanship and performance".

Laurent has the distinction of having been on OQAA champion teams in every one of his five years with Blues. He has also played on four CIAU national championship teams.

His individual record has been just as outstanding. In 1966-67, his second season with Blues, he led the OQAA scoring race, and has a career total of almost 100 goals. This season he was second only to teammate John Wright in the OQAA Western Division scoring.

This year Laurent received the Dr. Bill Dafeo Trophy for the second year in a row. This trophy is not a

The “Conspiracy 8” — dangerous men and proud of it . . .

“Sure we're in contempt of the American legal system. Why shouldn't we be? They're not our laws. We didn't make them.”

Tasha Bird, daughter of Dave Dellinger, one of the Chicago conspiracy trial defendants teamed up with Nancy Rubin, travelling companion of Yippie non-leader Jerry Rubin.

Nancy pointed out: “Rennie Davis told Thomas Foran, one of the prosecutors, ‘If I ever get out of jail, I'm going to move next door to you, Thomas Foran, and turn your kids on’” — pretty dangerous all right.

About 900 students were on hand Wednesday in Convocation Hall to check out the reality behind the media myths.

“The whole trial pointed out the huge gap in the way of life of the people.

“Hoffman gave Bobby six months for saying ‘bullshit’ in court. It was an ‘obscenity’. Hoffman was the only obscenity in that courtroom.

“We are solar systems apart. I think it is going to be more interesting in jail than out because all my friends are there.

“You know when you are in jail you are at least close to the people. A lot closer than Nixon is in the White House.

“I don't know much about Latin, but they say the root of conspiracy is breathing together. That's what we were trying to do. They tried to divide people up, but we won't have anything to do with that.”

Echoes of Rubin last year:

“They said Chicago was part of a conspiracy. Well, how do you think we got there. Youth Fare. They knew we were coming.”

“We're all people, that's what the revolution is about — people.

“You can do anything you want — just do it.”

Tasha talked about that too:

“The defendants went into the trial as they were. They weren't going to wear shirts and ties just to please the judge. What does it mean — the decorum of the court?

“What do laws mean to us. Not a thing to me. They're just machine laws, power laws. They preserve the status quo.

“We're life; we're human; we are not programmed like computers. All that happened in the courtroom was spontaneous.

“The Constitution means a lot in the U.S.? . . . It means nothing. You know what Hoffman said to Kunstler? ‘Mr. Kunstler, there have been quite a lot of references to the Constitution during this trial. One would think the Constitution had just been written yesterday — we are well aware of what's in the Constitution.’

“I think the constitution was written so long ago they have all forgotten it.”

Tasha talked about the Movement too — and violence — and Canada:

“The government thought they could take people out of the movement to slow it down. But they were wrong. There was just the opposite reaction.

“We know what's wrong in the United States. We can all tell. We are all leaders. We don't just need seven people to tell us what it's all about.

“Some people say there's violence in the movement. Well, you compare that violence to the kind that sees men dying, murdered in Vietnam. Compare that to the powers of Nixon and Mitchell to be violent.

“What is the violence in burning a bank in Santa Barbara. Man, that's all part of the American system.

“I don't know much about Canada. I may have been here when I was two — but I'd try to kick the Americans out of Canada because the Canadians don't need the violent and American government to run theirs.”

Applause. Why not? Sounded like Mel Watkins and Walter Gordon. Quite safe to applaud.

And from 900 U of T students, $340 was collected for the ‘Conspiracy’ defence fund.

Hydro plant to be concrete skyline south of University

By RAY CONLOGUE

Forty houses will be demolished and a million-kilowatt power plant will be built south of the university, Ontario Hydro officials told residents at a University Settlement House meeting Wednesday night.

The officials explained Hydro's future plans, in particular the gigantic plant to be constructed in the block bounded by Beverley, Baldwin, Cecil and Henry Sts. The smaller substation (167,000 kilowatts) presently being constructed on Huron St. was also discussed.

The residents' attitude was hostile as W. G. Robbins, Senior Planning Engineer, explained that "We do not buy property in the area to upset it or cause any commotion intentionally."

He explained that five or six other sites had been considered but were either too far removed or else unobtainable (as in the case of the Bay and Gerrard site now given to hospital expansion).

He said that the buildings of the Beverley St. station will not detract from the neighborhood. "We think they will look attractive and be an asset."

A CONCRETE BLOCK

According to present plans, the station will be 300 feet long by 172 feet wide, and 45 to 55 feet high, in its initial stage. Expansion by 1986 may raise the height to 120 feet.

It will be completely windowless, extending almost the entire length of the block.

Asked if such an edifice would not be quite ugly, Mr. P. Sinnott, Senior Project Engineer, replied, "That's a matter of opinion."

Mr. A. R. Clink, Station Project Engineer, said it would be a "precast design of concrete slabs, the general modern trend," landscaped "with grass and trees so that it presents a pleasing appearance."

Audience reaction ranged from sarcasm to anger. When Robbins said the small staff of fifty presented no disturbance to the neighborhood, one woman called out: "How can you pretend this is the same as a neighborhood? You wake up in the morning and look at a big concrete block. How can you pretend it's the same?"

PEOPLE POWERLESS

Asked if the site was final, of if something might be done to change it, Sinnott said, "If you want to make your voice known, you may do so." He did not say where or to whom.

The plant's potential million kilowatts (by 1986) is more than the entire city is using presently. Its construction is necessary to ease the strain on overburdened lines from Kipling Ave. and Scarborough which presently supply most of the downtown.

This is the building which will go up about 1976, minus the roof section done in block. That will be added later, about 1986, if technological advances are incorporated. The small block section houses the transformers which will step down power from 230,000 volts.

Robbins said it was essential for the power security in the neighborhood, saying "We don't want a power flickering when you all turn your stoves on between 5 and 7 p.m."

He also mentioned that the massive capacity will supply institutions such as hospitals downtown, and will take care of power needs in future downtown development.

When asked if Hydro was aware of intentions to depopulate the downtown, he and the other officials said they were not qualified to discuss the matter.

BUT — MAYBE

Although construction was originally slated to start by January 1, 1977 it has been deferred for two to five years. Because of rapid developments in technology, the building may not resemble at all the present plans when finally constructed.

Robbins said, "We have told you the worst. Now, the higher part of the building may never be built. In France and Switzerland new equipment is being developed" which may minimize the size."

Because of present plans, however, the entire block is still necessary. Thirty-four of the forty houses have been obtained by "negotiation". Expropriation will be used if necessary for the other six.

Members of the audience mentioned numerous under-used parking lots as alternatives. Robbins said that corporate parking lots could not be expropriated because they were an integral part of company operations, which would be upset if employees' parking space were removed.

"You're upsetting forty houses," one woman called out.

HEARD THIS ONE BEFORE?

Despite the size of the area to be served (Bathurst to Church, Bloor to Front) the less densely populated waterfront area was out of the question for construction. For economic reasons, the plant must be located centrally in the area to be served.

And the U of T could not even provide land for the much smaller Huron substation which will service it, much less the larger one.

When the question period was over, Sinnott noted that by the time construction starts, around 1976, technological advances may have made it unnecessary to use all the land for construction.

"Then people can say to us, 'This is stupid. Why did you buy all that land?'"

This is what those transformers will look like if the advances are not incorporated. Based on present engineering, they will be 120 feet in height. Hydro officials were anxious not to have this sketch printed, inasmuch as the building will almost certainly not be as large as this sketch presents it.

A house divided against itself

"The division of labour, which we saw as one of the chief forces of history up 'till now, manifests itself also in the ruling class as the division of mental and material labour, so that inside this class one part appears as the thinkers of the class (its active, conceptive ideologists, who make the perfecting of the illusion about itself their chief source of livelihood), while the others' attitude to these ideas and illusions is more passive and receptive, because they are in reality the active members of this class and have less time to make up illusions and ideas about themselves. Within this class this cleavage can even develop into a certain opposition and hostility between the two parts. . ." — Karl Marx, The German Ideology.

The U of T administration, the U of T faculty, the Metro Board of Control, and the Provincial government, all basically represent the same interest group — the ruling class. But it seems that we've reached such a high stage of cultural degeneracy that even the good of ruling class is disintegrating through internal collisions of various power-seeking interest groups.

(1) The Spadina Expressway
Throughout the year, the Varsity has been hammering away at two issues which affect the community around the U of T — the Spadina Expressway, and the ruthless expansion of the university. They were presented as two unrelated issues.

Last week we learned that the Expressway was planned to extend to Willcocks Street — right into the heart of our academic homeland. Suddenly the two issues are in conflict. The Spadina Expressway will limit university expansion into the residential area west of St. George Street.

People now have the choice of being evicted for a graduate complex or for a strip of concrete.

It's a great choice. Which they don't really have the power to make anyway.

It's a strange conflict: buildings fighting roads.

It looks like violent struggle in the streets, but there aren't any people on the streets and all the windows are closed. Just one structure of concrete versus another.

Yes, people enter into the decision somewhere. The people on the Board of Governors will fight for the Expressway if it doesn't infringe upon campus. The people in Simcoe Hall will make some backroom agreements with the people in City Hall, who in turn have made backroom agreements with contractors. But people are not really making those decisions: they are the results of internal conflict of structures within the ruling class.

It's a truly democratic society where people can be oppressed by either an expressway or a graduate complex.

Meanwhile the press provides the entertainment by producing the conflict as a political spectacular for the people's consumption. And it perpetuates the myth that the people affected by the outcome of the debate are more than spectators.

People can stop the Spadina Expressway, and students can help — but not by pressuring their local politicians, who already have their minds made up that there will be an expressway.

Why not a People's Park in Toronto? Students could organize this spring and start planting grass in front of the bulldozers.

2. The Day Care Centre

Speaking of schizophrenia within the ruling class, let's take another look at the administration's treatment of the Campus Day Care Centre.

The division of mental and material labour within the administration caused a few problems here. The policy-makers of Simcoe Hall — "its active, conceptive ideologists" — decided last Fall that the Day Care was a good idea. After all, it was politically expedient to grant that much, and it wouldn't really hurt.

But the property managers in Simcoe Hall — in A. G. Rankin's department — got in the way. They talked about evicting the Day-Care Centre from its premises on Sussex Street. Now it seems that Bissell's policy-makers are straightening things out again and slapping the wrists of the property managers because the Day Care Centre started a militant protest.

As soon as a cleavage within the ruling class threatens it, the split disappears. A compromise is worked out.

(3) University Government:

The university must learn to govern itself, U of T President Claude Bissell tells us. The administration is anxious to see the adoption of the CUG report, for CUG will maintain their security as governors of the university.

Now the university is rent by disagreement over CUG. There is a sharp antagonism between the administration and the faculty. The faculty feel threatened by the students, who are challenging their traditional roles. The administration feels threatened by the government, which is ready to step into the dispute and solve the problem if there's no consensus within the university.

The faculty and administration are agents of the ruling class, which is more directly represented by government and big business. If government — representing big business — assumes the administration's role a la Berkeley-Board-of-Regents, clearly the administration feels threatened.

A function of these internal contradictions between various interest groups in the ruling class is the absorption of people's political consciousness into false conflicts, instead of acting upon the real conflict between themselves and the ruling class.

George Bowering was born in Pentiction, B.C.

He (Bowering) "is the author of the following books of poems: STICKS & STONES (1963), POINTS ON THE GRID (1964), THE MAN IN YELLOW BOOTS (1965), THE SILVER WIRE (1966), BASEBALL (1967), TWO POLICE POEMS (1968) and ROCKY MOUNTAIN FOOT (1969). He has also written a novel, MIRROR ON THE FLOOR (1967)." Since the publication of ROCKY MOUNTAIN FOOT, from whose dust-jacket I copied the above resumé, yet another book of poems, THE GANGS OF KOSMOS, has been released by Anansi.

"MIRROR ON THE FLOOR is a story of one summer in the life of Bob Small, graduate student, and his strange and total involvement with a free-living girl, Andrea. The pressures of her past build up in Andrea over the summer, despite her intense affair with Bob, and eventually culminate in murder and madness."

Yes, that's right. Clichéd. Maybe it wasn't in '67, but it certainly is now.

The novel opens with Bob and his roommate Delsing in a cheap restaurant on Vancouver's skid row. The cops bust the place and both of them (unjustly) spend the night in jail. Ok, I believe it, it happens. It happens to most university students with hair anywhere longer than short, but so what? It happens so often it's difficult to hold an audience of more than two or three for a personal, original account. It's just not the stuff novels are made of. It's harassment, not repression. Harassment, mickey-mouse, as annoying as a cold on the day of a big rock-concert. Maybe if we did have police repression, we could start building a great Canadian literature. Tolstoy. Dostoevsky. Now they had something to write about — hundreds of years of tsar-serf repression. An undesired night in the camp pales in comparison, and pales badly.

MIRROR ON THE FLOOR is Bowering's first novel. He seems to have tried desperately hard to jump into the mainstream of the contemporary short, semi-disjointed chapter style of novel writing, the style practised to perfection by Richard Brautigan. Bowering however, falls somewhere short of the mark. As episodes, or vignettes, many of the chapters are superb, and more than ample proof that Bowering can write prose, but they are sometimes disjointed to the point that one says "That's nice, but what does it have to do with anything?" With Brautigan, you expect it, that is his style, but with Bowering, the calm flow of three or four chapters is badly jarred by the occasional one which is slightly more disjointed than the rest.

A far more serious problem with the novel is that the difficulty in portraying the delicate phases of character change without slipping into mundane trivia (largely circumvented with the short, punchy chapters) hasn't been replaced with anything else. The trivia has been avoided, but the characters (especially Andrea) don't shift enough to bear the weight of the violence at the end of the book.

Prose Bowering can write, but thus far he hasn't managed a novel. His poetry, I think is great.

I was unable to come by any of his books published prior to THE SILVER WIRE, so I take it on faith that "in his first book Bowering was concerned with the technique of poetry as a spoken art and with the importance of making his own individual voice register on the page."

That is reasonable, in the light of the progression I can see from THE SILVER WIRE through ROCKY MOUNTAIN FOOT to THE GANGS OF KOSMOS. It is a gradual establishment of personal identity in the people closest to him, then in the landscape of his western home, culminating, I think, in a long poem called "Hamatsa", which draws heavily on the legends of the B.C. Indians.

Bowering is, was, and probably always will be a western poet. From the first poem, "far from the shore", in which a very close friend dies "in an auto wreck on far/foreign highway", in Ontario, his loyalties are clearly established. Another poem, "it's the climate":

At my autopsy they will find my belly, intestines, bladder & spleen pocked solid with the flying dust of Alberta.

But more than geographical loyalties, THE SILVER WIRE is a book of personal loyalties:

*angelo sleeping in the bed
Angelo sleeps naked.
The snow falls outside quiet.*

*The white face of the lady
God: faint glimmer in the dark.*

And other, very personal, people poems — "when you run naked", "eyes that open", "a bedroom sound". Personal, close, often sparked with the mundane details ("running water flushing toilet") that let us get that close. Similar to John Newlove in that regard, but with Newlove it is the "I" that counts:

*You
You are not like this, like that, not as one would have you.
One does not have you, one can only take what is given. This frivolity so truthful, that I love you far, I hate you far, lovingly.*

With Bowering, no matter how close to himself he gets, it is still "Here, look" rather than Newlove's "Here, look at me". Significantly I think, the geographical poems are placed mostly towards the end of THE SILVER WIRE, as if Bowering knew what direction he would take. Three lines:

You move your colored car on the highway that issues north trace your beginnings

ROCKY MOUNTAIN FOOT is subtitled "a lyric, a memoir", a verse garland for Alberta. A number of poems from the earlier book are reprinted (because of the no doubt larger press run by McClelland & Stewart then the now defunct Quarry Press) but the emphasis has shifted from the personal to the geographic, and further, to the people associated with that geography. One of many quotations and bits of fact thrown in alongside Bowering's verse for emphasis: "There's a man who can ride him — an Indian/named Tom Three Persons. But he's in jail."

Also important in ROCKY MOUN-

TAIN FOOT is the mastery of technique, the placing of words rather than just lines, the absence of apostrophes, which make Bowering's poems unique, rather than just inventive studies of William Carlos Williams.

With his latest collection, THE GANGS OF KOSMOS, Bowering has gained vibrancy — "As I walk to the kitchen/I see delicate deer fucking outside my window.", his imagery is developing — "there like a spider looming it/above an arena of sandy faces", and violence becoming more pronounced

*Once she tightened her mouth & fell face down on the couch, appendix exploded,
spraying poison through her guts.*

His poetic technique is expanding, developing, that much is certain. What interests me is that he is using his talents in longer poems, almost Indian in tone — "Come home, hunt er,/before nightfall,/your brother is Windigo." "Windigo", "a long shadow/on the ice", and "Hamatsa", a very long poem based on B.C. Indian legend:

*The poet among us goes to the University of British Columbia, on Spanish Banks,
a forest of dead sailors.*

*Where the industrial smoke of higher learning rises to the sky, merging with cloud.

fine bream

Last Sunday's Massey Hall concert was the second Toronto recital by British guitarist Julian Bream. Like the first, this recital was divided equally between lute and guitar works and augmented by Mr. Bream's enlightening commentary on the pieces. His discursive approach helped to reduce the formality of the concert hall and in part overcame the restraints of the stage-audience barrier.

Both the guitar and lute, being plucked instruments, are limited in their sonority, but the lute especially seemed to suffer the consequences of a less-than-ideal environment. The works performed were all written in a 16th century secular dance idiom and had a certain upiformity which even Bream's diverse talents and faultless technique couldn't overcome. Bream is an excellent lutenist and pioneer in a small-scale lute revival. But unlike Landowska's harpsichord, the lute is very much a predecessor of the guitar with very few unique characteristics that are not matched and surpassed by the guitar. The harpsichord is quite distinct from the piano and its repertoire includes works by modern composers like Poulenc. The lute, restricted to a Renaissance regimen, is less likely to remain viable in the 20th century.

The second half of the concert consisted of guitar works, both original and in transcription, ranging from the Suite in A Minor by the 17th century composer Johann Froberger to a 1956 work by R. Smith Brindle, El Plifemao d'Oro. Transcriptions included the Prelude in G major from J. S. Bach's Suite No. 1 for solo cello and Kinder-Sonate by Robert Schumann. Julian Bream is unquestionably one of the leading experts of the guitar and his style is difficult to match in musical conception or technical execution. His instrument took up the guise of harp, piano, harpsichord and celeste in the course of the evening and finally found its own magnificent voice in Enrique Granados' "Tonadilla: La Maja de Goya".

While Bream's popularity is primarily a result of his guitar virtuosity, Sunday's concert presented a complete musician who, lutenist or guitarist, surpasses with sheer musicality any obstacles that either instrument may offer.

sonny greenwich and andrew cyrille at u. of t.

Once again it is time to sing the praises of Sonny Greenwich. At a noon hour concert in Hart House, he gave yet another splendid demonstration of a mature and original musical talent.

Wielding a small wooden flute Greenwich at first threatened strange things. But fortunately he laid aside the wind department, Don Thompson removed his hands from the insides of the piano and applied them to the keyboard, and, the shimmering prelude dispensed with, the band swung into a hard driving My Favourite Things.

Thompson, a fluent and vigorous pianist (as well as a good bassist and, it is reported, drummer) began the second piece of music with some nice solo piano. Greenwich then joined him in the exposition of the theme, which is a favourite ballad of the guitarist's. After a very fine duet, the other members of the quartet entered, and gradually increased the rhythmic and harmonic density of the music. Thompson played another excellent solo with the trio before the group ended this number.

Besides the standard pieces, Greenwich played some satisfying music of a "free" nature. One of the pieces began as a lyrical tone poem and grew gradually into a series of musical explosions. Greenwich is a master of the art of raising and lowering, by subtle degrees, the temperature of the music.

Moreover, this is not a soloist with accompaniment. Greenwich, Thompson, and Terry Clarke, (I hate to keep saying it, but his drumming is still too loud) have been playing together for some time now and have evolved a very solid and distinctive group sound. They are a band with a personal and original musical conception, and they are worth hearing.

Evidently their music has considerable appeal. The East Common Room of Hart House was packed for two and a half hours last Tuesday, and Greenwich had to play an encore after the enthusiastic ovation the students gave him.

Hart House will again be in the vanguard of jazz music when the music committee presents Andrew Cyrille in the Great Hall tonight. Cyrille is a drummer with wide experience in jazz, having played with, among others, Junior Mance, Coleman Hawkins, and Cecil Taylor. It seems a safe bet to predict that the music to be heard tonight will reflect the influence of the iconoclastic pianist Taylor. One should go prepared for some free and fiery sounds.

Playing with Cyrille will be (if they all manage to turn up): Charlie Haden, the fine bassist who first appeared with Ornette Coleman more than a decade ago; Sam Rivers, a capable saxophonist who has also played with Taylor, as well as more conventional groups; and Eddie Gales, player of ghetto music and trumpeter with — guess who? — Cecil Taylor. Tickets free from the hall porter.

Speaking of new jazz, there are rumours afoot that Matt Muldoon's will be bringing in McCoy Tyner in the next couple of weeks or so. One hopes that this venture will succeed. Muldoon's is an interesting place, just the sort of thing Toronto needs. Unfortunately one never knows exactly what is happening there, though there are stories of jam sessions on Sunday nights. At any rate Coltrane's former pianist is said to be playing some fine music these days; and so, readers should keep their eyes peeled for signs of activity at Muldoon's.

Music of a very different sort can be heard at the Cav-A-Bob for the next month. Buddy Tate, the still vigorous veteran of the great Basie band of the swing era, has a tight little band featuring trumpeter Herman Autrey. The other night they played some very swinging jazz of a down to earth nature; music of this relaxed kind is rare enough these days. Though they play for dancing, the band manages to keep the jazz content pretty high.

On one number, an old standard in fact, Tate played some really gutsy, romping tenor saxophone. An emotional player, Tate likes to pounce on those high notes and squeeze all the juice out of them, then slide down into a growly low tone. When he really feels like playing, Tate can still be a very compelling musician.

Alone With America, Richard Howard. Essays on the Art of Poetry in the United States since 1950. John Ashbery, Sylvia Plath, Allen Ginsberg, Paul Goodman, William Meredith, Robert Creeley A book years ahead of its time, because academics study only dead poets, and most of these are living. Alive. "These then are the children of Midas, who address themselves to the current, to the flux, to the process of experience rather than to its precepts." Recommended by Northrop Frye as "indispensable to anyone interested in contemporary poetry in America." But then, not everyone can read as well as Northrop Frye. A guide book. Indispensable. Unreadable.

York University

Prof. G. Harjan Dept. Of Russian Literature

Student & Faculty group led by Prof. Harjan departs 19th May, 3 weeks, visiting Vienna, Kiev, Yalta, Moscow, Leningrad, Helsinki, Copenhagen. $749.00 incl. full particulars, Miss A.M. Pontson — (416) 366-4371. P.Lawson Travel Service, 697 Bay St., Toronto, 2, Ont.

The Opera School of the Faculty of Music has for some years now complemented the Canadian Opera Company season by offering less familiar operas throughout the year. Manned by students in every phase of the production the quality of these performances hovers in a semi-professional limbo that nonetheless sustains opera buffs in the long arid season following the COC's fall series.

Their present production, entitled "A School for Opera" departs from usual practice. In a tenuous framework woven of Mozart's little-known work "The Impresario", they perform arias and scenes from several operas, some familiar, others seldom heard. Obviously the primary consideration here is to allow more opportunities for the singers, some of whom would otherwise be condemned (some justifiably so) to the oblivion of the chorus. The presentation must also be more than a glorified recital of operatic excerpts to keep costuming and stage students busy and to justify the cost of admission.

Most of the first half of the work is taken up by a home-brewed story involving nightmares, opera schools and electronic sound effects. There is biting social satire with all the teeth pulled, sprinkled with a series of extended double-entendres, the humour of which has a baseball bat's subtlety. Alternately clobbered and gummed to death, the audience may not survive this, the worst part of the entire production. The author(s) should remain anonymous. It blends smoothly into Act IV of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro", a choice of questionable value, wherein Rocca figurines amble about a stationary setting, doing nothing much.

After intermission came a marked improvement, beginning with Act I, scene ii of Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri". This was imaginatively staged and well sung by Sonia Rozhdzysky (Isabella) and Bruce Kelly (Taddeo). The musical highlight of the evening was Act III of Puccini's "La Bohème". Especially impressive was the strength and beauty of Deborah Jeans' voice, singing Mimi. Complemented by Peter Barzco's powerful Marcello, it was a scene of profound musical (if not visual) excitement.

The visual climax came with Act IV of Verdi's "Don Carlo". Set in Spain at the time of the Inquisition, the stage and costumes exuded a sombre El Greco-esque atmosphere. Igor Saika-Voivod as Filippo II sang with a dramatic conviction that almost overcame the limitations in range and strength which this demanding role imposed.

There were times in the Don Carlo when the orchestra confirmed a suspicion which I acquired during their first concert last year under Karel Ancerl, notably that they are potentially the best student orchestra in Canada, including the National Youth Orchestra. That this potential is not realized is due primarily to inadequate preparation for concerts. And this is due directly to the innumerable rehearsals misspent oom-pa-pa-ing through operas instead of working through the immense symphonic repertoire.

One solution would be to make the opera orchestra a separate (non-compulsory) activity, rewarded by extra course credits or (God forbid!) a salary. At present a disproportionate amount of the average instrumentalist's four university years is spent with operas, at the expense of better preparation and a greater variety in their orchestral repertoire.

While this is tangential to the purpose of this article, it illuminates the basic shortcoming of the present production. "A School for Opera" tries to please too many people and presents most of them in an uncomplimentary fashion.

YEHUDI MENUHIN and the MENUHIN FESTIVAL ORCHESTRA. Handel: Music for the Royal Fireworks. Angel 36604.

The definitive recording of Handel's Fireworks Music was made a few years ago by Charles Mackerras and something like half the wind musicians in London: 28 oboes, 14 bassoons, 4 contra-bassoons, 3 sets of tympani, 8 side drums, etc., etc. The vivid tone colours of this disc were not only magnificent to listen to, but also suited this very robust piece of music ideally. After a record like that, you'd wonder why people wouldn't consider the Fireworks Music a closed subject. But it's a likeable and popular work, so the companies are still coming out with different performances of it. This latest one by Yehudi Menuhin and his orchestra is better than some, but it won't replace Mackerras' version. Side two of this record has two Handel concertos, both of which would be very good except that Menuhin plays the violin solo good except on the first one. In it slow movement he gives a demonstration on how not to improvise Baroque ornaments (Gypsy influences in Handel?)

MARTIN GALLING, harpsichord. Bach Keyboard Music Vol. V. Vox SVBX 5438.

Martin Galling's heavy-handed and extremely stodgy interpretations on this three record set of Bach's English Suites plus other assorted keyboard works are most definitely not to my taste. They appear to me to be lacking in any sense of nuance and delicate whatsoever, except for an annoying periodic halting of the rhythmic flow. Even though everything is played as slowly as possible, much of the faster music, especially the gigues, where lightness is essential, is lost in the clanking of the harpsichord machinery.

CAREY BELL's Blues Harp. Delmark 627.

A very nice Chicago blues album by an artist hitherto unknown except for a number he sings on an Earl Hooker record. In his mid-thirties, he's one of a number of younger musicians who look as if they are going to keep the blues very much alive in Chicago for many years to come. Born and raised in Mississippi, he played around the south from the age of 13 and moved to Chicago when he was 20. Various influences can be heard in his harmonica playing, among them both Big and Little Walter, but he doesn't sound as if he's copying anybody. A good voice and excellent back-up musicians both help to make this a very good debut album.

p. h.

DRIFTIN' SLIM. Somebody Hoo-Do-Do! The Hoo-Do Man. Milestone 93004.

A good, minor blues artist, Elmon Mickle, or Driftin' Slim, has made a number of fine singles which show the influence of Sonny Boy Williamson I as well as Jimmy Reed. The Williamson influence is again strongly felt on this LP, but the record isn't as good as many of his singles. Several numbers are one man band tunes, with Slim playing guitar harmonica and drums, but he doesn't show that he has fully mastered the technical problems involved. The better songs are those recorded with a blues band, but here the recording quality isn't all that it might be. It's an honest blues effort, but there are a great many better ones.

p. h.

JUNIOR PARKER. Honey-Drippin' Blues. Blue Rock 64004.

Having come up with the tough Memphis blues groups of the early '50's, Junior Parker has the credentials to produce good blues or, at least, to bring something different to soul singing. On this record, however, he has done neither. It's largely very average soul singing with girl vocal groups and heavy brass. He has played some very good harmonica in his time, but there's none of it here.

p. h.

JOHNNY WINTER. Second Winter. Columbia KCS 9947 (two records—three sides).

The best Winter so far. He leaves some things to be desired on his more or less straight blues, but he's considerably more effective playing early rock or Bob Dylan (Highway 61 Revisited). He certainly can get around the guitar with great facility, as he has ample opportunity to show, but for all round musicianship, the rather less featured Brother Edgar (on piano and other things) is probably the outstanding member of the band.

p. h.

Jo-ANN KELLY. Epic 26491.

A leading member of the English traditional blues scene, Jo-Ann Kelly exhibits a remarkable ability to sound like a deep south blues singer and an even greater ability to play guitar in the old Mississippi style. Her voice isn't always completely convincing, but it's damn close. She lacks some of the sheer force of musicians like Robert Johnson and Tommy McEneaney on whom she bases her work, but there's no getting around the fact that she does an incredible job of recreating these old-time blues sounds.

p. h.

MAGIC SAM. Black Magic. Delmark 620. JIMMY "FAST FINGERS" DAWKINS. Fast Fingers. Delmark 623.

Before his very untimely death several months ago (at 32), Magic Sam was the central figure in a new kind of Chicago blues sound which seems to be developing among some of the younger musicians. With the release of Fast Fingers, Delmark shows himself to be working along lines very similar to those followed by Magic Sam. The style of music is well summed up in the title of Magic Sam's first, very popular LP, West Side Soul (Delmark 615).

The music has strong affinities with more traditional Chicago blues, but it also leans heavily towards rhythm & blues and soul. Much of the music is formed from constantly repeated phrases which are subject to variations or act as a base to which the lead guitarists return after independent excursions of varying length. Both Magic Sam and Jimmy Dawkins show the influence of B. B. King, and their playing is not dissimilar, though Dawkins has a sharper, more biting attack. Magic Sam's voice has a plaintive note to it; Dawkins' voice sounds plaintive at times, though it frequently has a brisk, straightforward tone. Both musicians use the same basic group for their bands.

p. h.

JEAN-LUC PONTY. More Than Meets the Ear. World Pacific Jazz 20134. Electric Connection. World Pacific Jazz 20156.

Now, jazz violin is not really my favourite sound. Still, one has to be impressed by Ponty's technical mastery and contemporary ideas. The young Frenchman luckily has a good tone and plays with precision; not for him the romantic excesses and sloppy intonation of violinists like, for instance, Ray Nance. The first record has a small group with Carmell Jones, a young trumpeter in the Clifford Brown tradition, and alto saxophonist Leo Wright. The second, which has a larger band with scores by Gerald Wilson, is less satisfying.

POCO. Pickin' Up The Pieces. Epic 26490.

A group put together by Richie Furay of the (now defunct) Buffalo Springfield. The album continues the same country style, with banjo, dobro, and steel guitar. Most of the songs are composed and sung by Furay, and his clear voice comes through on them as it used to do for the Springfield. But they're just not that good. As a whole, the album is uninspired. Steve Stills and Neil Young were the really important composers for the Springfield. Now they're off doing their own thing.

THE MOODY BLUES. To Our Children's Children. London THS 1.

Ever since In Search of the Lost Chord, it seems as though the Moody Blues haven't actually made new albums, just remakes of things they've done before. To Our... Children is more of the same: beautiful sound engineering, lots of pretty effects, but not so much genuine poetic and musical inspiration. The Moodies have become ever more obviously drug-oriented, but it hasn't improved the quality of their lyrics, which were always rather weak anyway, and, while their music used to show a pleasant, lyric approach to rock, it's now become kind of trite.

JOHN DRANIE reads STEPHEN LEACOCK. Melbourne 4015.

Canada's contribution to the world's coming literature as read by his leading interpreter. Not all the sketches are equally amusing, but his tribulations in dealing with a bank (My Financial Career), Mother's Day (which turns out to be a holiday for everyone but mother), and the hazards of public lecturing (We Hove with Us Tonight) are outstanding.

THE FIRESIGN THEATRE. How Can You Be in Two Places at Once When You're Not Anywhere at All. Columbia CS 9884.

The only thing the Firesign Theatre resemble is the old Goon Show. The pace is slower, though still three times as fast as any other comedy record. A devastating mixture of W. C. Fields, James Joyce, the original Lone Ranger, social criticism, drugs and mental chess. It is impossible to count the levels. Just light up and enjoy.

THE DOORS. Soft Parade. Elektra 75005.

An attempt by the Doors at a big band sound. Instrumentation includes saxophone, trombone, and English horn. The album is a failure. Whatever sense of the strange and eerie the Doors have is obscured by long, monotonous instrumentals and unimaginative melodies. Morrison's lyrics for this album are consistently banal — lacking the occasional touch of insight of earlier albums. They're full of childish comments to "grab a gun," "follow me," etc. The title song comes off as an attempt to copy the super-musicality of Zappa. Along, with the rest of the album, it is thoroughly boring.

RITCHIE HAVENS. Stonehenge. Stormy Forest 6001.

Another good sample of mainly original folk tunes. However, Havens' fine qualities are marred by a second rate production and poor arrangements.

REVIEW 5

fugal riot

"Mr. Rubin, do you have an ideology?"
"No, ideology is a brain disease."
"Well, then, do you have a movement?"
"Yes. It's called dancing."
(Dances)
"Is this a put-on?"
"Why don't we try the questions again."
(Repeat above once)
"Mr. Rubin, do you have an ideology?"
"Yes. We believe in peace, freedom, and brotherhood for all."
"Is that your program?"
"No. It's a put-on"

The crutch of a musical metaphor presents itself to prop the quivering limbs of this review. The structure of Chicago '70, a "theatrical documentary" which Toronto Workshop Productions is presently engaged in, is fugal.

Director George Luscombe and his cast have pieced together several themes which emerged from the transcripts of the trial of the Chicago 8, have shuffled in some counterpoint from the trial scene in Alice In Wonderland, and have framed the whole with a radio newscast which precedes each act and provides running accompaniment to the piece.

Like most courtroom dramas, Chicago '70 presents the interplay of defendants, attorneys, and judge as persons with distinct attitudes. Unlike most such dramas, however, the attitudes are illustrated by spliced-in "bits," such as the one quoted at the beginning of this review, or the intermittent recurrence of scenes from a civics class a la Laugh-In. The cast will suddenly cease dramatizing the transcript, act out these illuminations, and then return to the point where they left off. Thus both the public postures and private attitudes of the characters are presented in almost cinematic fashion, and with enviable precision.

I suggested last week that any play on this subject would have difficulty finding the line between relevance and timelessness; the line is congruent with that between ideology and art. TWP is in the enviable position of having found it and of having successfully stayed on the proper side. If there are any certificates for the Tightrope Walkers' Union, the cast may justly obtain them and place them lovingly next to their Actors' Equity cards.

To suggest that a play is more artistic than ideological is not to rob that play of political significance. Artistic shape raises ideology from the realm of the present and gives it broader implications, as Shakespeare did with the Tudor myth in his history plays. TWP's handling of matters of immediate moment may be less sensitive, hence less long-lasting, but the principle is the same. Justice, like bureaucracy, is more easily described by an anecdote than defined in a sentence. That the situation is factual, and that it entails a great deal of current politics, is, when managed as it is here, a strength and not a weakness. The struggle for justice is what politics exists to give form to, thus a successful artistic treatment of it has inescapable political implications. The blending of politics with art started a long time ago (on one level, the Bible is a series of stories which pushes Zionist propaganda,) but that does not make it less difficult.

The company is as disciplined as Marines. They present, with ruthless efficiency, the Protean force and humor of the defendants confined within a judicial system which should be supple enough to envelop them and still disgorge justice. Mel Dixon brings to the part of Bobby Seale enough directed energy to obliterate most of Middle America. Jim Lawrence, the only American in the cast, contributes sardonic innocence as Mark Lane. Especially impressive was Diane Grant, who mugged her way through the parts of Little Old Lady Juror, Alice, and Public Opinion with admirable élan. Steven Bush played Allen Ginsberg as the envy of every hippie's, and Thomas Foran as the envy of every redneck's, dreams. (It is no mean feat to be a convincing US Attorney in a yellow blouse with red and blue stripes.)

Jerry Rubin's wife, imported for the occasion of the opening, observed after the production, "You've captured the energy of the defence, but not the terror of the prosecution — if this audience had been in the courtroom and had reacted as you did here, you'd all be in the Cook County Jail." Nonetheless, the squint-eyed malignance of Judge Hoffman was put across, as was the fact that it sprang from his age and training, and is not motiveless. Evil in the form of sincerely held convictions is the most difficult to combat. John Mitchell, who really believes what he says, is much more dangerous an adversary than someone who is harmlessly brilliant like William F. Buckley.

The objective of theatre is to create a world on stage, but a world which has tendrils which impinge on your own experience. Chicago '70 has even managed to make those tendrils specifically relate to Canada. It does not indulge in that specious form of cultural imperialism which claims that "there is no difference between capitalist oppression in the US and similar oppression here". Rather, it grasps the fact that even though a colony is tied to the empire, the colonial experience is materially different from the imperial one. Within that necessary distinction, the relevance of Chicago '70 to Canada is demonstrated with disheartening accuracy.

In all, Chicago '70 makes large issues visible through individual characters, and thus avoids the cheap and easy gamesmanship of theatricality as distinct from drama. In structure, in delivery, in staging, and in characterization, the play makes the story of conflicting lifestyles, both honestly held, resonate beyond the moment. It made a parable of an incident which occurred before the play began on opening night. Incense had been passed out in the lobby beforehand, and a number of people in the audience had lit the sticks; given the colorfulness and activity of the audience, the atmosphere was that of a Buddhist brothel.

Little Walter, Sonny Boy Williamson II, Elmore James, Muddy Waters, and Howling Wolf. That's the core of musicians pretty well responsible for the creation of the Chicago blues sound. They all recorded for Chess (though James less exclusively than the others), and it's been known for a long time that there are miles of tapes in the Chess files, much of it never issued, covering all the great years of Chicago blues. Chess has, at last, decided that there is enough of a market for this material to warrant making it available, and it has embarked on a very lengthy LP programme, the first seven volumes of which have recently been released.

Probably the most dominant sound associated with the blues style which developed in Chicago is the wail of the harmonica (Mississippi saxophone); and of the many great harmonica players, the most influential of all is Rice Miller, better known as Sonny Boy Williamson. He was a superb musician with a distinctive, lonesome sound, and for years his band broadcast a daily radio show called the King Biscuit Hour out of West Helena, Arkansas and into the heart of the deep south blues country. It's doubtful that any of the harmonica blowers who made their way from the south to Chicago were uninfluenced by Sonny Boy; and when he also made it to Chicago, his influence on the developing style was even more strongly felt.

One of the few musicians who could begin to rival him was the much younger Little Walter Jacobs, who substituted for Sonny Boy's haunting sound a biting, arrogant tone. His swaggering, little tough guy voice was a perfect match for his harmonica, and together they fit perfectly into the rough city world.

Like Little Walter's, Howling Wolf's music seems to be a violent attack on the horrors of a huge U.S. city. Wolf's harmonica playing has neither the technical proficiency nor depth of feeling of Sonny Boy Williamson and Little Walter, and he de-emphasises the harmonica in favor of his voice, a mighty, gravel-throated instrument which literally attacks a song. The blues is full of extraordinary voices; it's part of the esthetics of the music that great value is placed on unusual vocal abilities, and Wolf's is one of the great voices.

Whatever the prominence of the harmonica, however, guitars continued to be the most important instrument in Chicago as in other blues. Among the earliest to put together "city" bands was Elmore James, who featured sax and piano with his searing Mississippi slide guitar playing. His approach led to a whole school of Chicago playing, and he was instrumental in transferring several great songs by Mississippi bluesman Robert Johnson into the modern sound, though he himself was not that closely connected with the city.

Another Mississippi guitarist, however, has been at the center of Chicago blues from the very beginning — Muddy Waters. When he was first recorded in 1941 by the Library of Congress he was playing downhome Mississippi country blues, on some numbers backed by mandolin and violin. When he moved to Chicago two years later, however, his style began to change to suit the city conditions, and he soon became the most successful of the musicians attempting to create a new sound with electric blues bands. He has always been tremendously talented at putting together superior bands, and a great many musicians came up through the Muddy Waters band, including Little Walter, Big Walter Horton, Otis Spann, Junior Wells, and James Cotton. If one person were to be named as chiefly responsible for the Chicago blues sound, it would have to be Muddy Waters.

THE RECORDS

Blues from "Big Bill's" Copa Cabana (Chess 1533 — formerly released as Folk Festival of the Blues). Muddy Waters, Buddy Guy, Howling Wolf, and Willie Dixon playing and singing together live from a Chicago club. Because it's live, it has a good deal of musical enthusiasm though the record also preserves a number of performance lapses.

Little Walter. Hate to See You Go (Chess 1535). A beautiful record of songs previously available only as singles. Only a shade less good than his superb Best of Little Walter LP (no longer available).

Sonny Boy Williamson. Bummer Road (Chess 1536). Another great LP, mostly of material never released before. The 12 minute cut of Little Village, with about a dozen false takes, is a bit of a drag, though it's gained some notoriety because in it you can hear Sonny Boy call one of the Chess brothers "motherfucker."

Elmore James/Joba Brim. Whose Muddy Shoes (Chess 1537). Elmore James recorded better material for companies other than Chess, so he isn't heard at his best here. However it's all that's available in Canada at the moment. John Brim is a very good second line Chicago bluesman with an excellent band. The notes don't identify who has which numbers. John Brim's cuts are 1, 5, 9, 10, & 13.

Albert King/Otis Rush. Door to Door. King isn't a Chicago musician though he did some recording for Chess and they bought up some of his other material. His early recordings here show that his style was pretty well developed 15 years ago. Rush is another of the good second line Chicago musicians. His rather eclectic style is getting more recognition now than in the past. Both he and Albert King play good guitar in the B. B. King school. (Rush's cuts are 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13).

Muddy Waters. Sail On (Chess 1539 — formerly The Best of Muddy Waters). A good range of early Muddy Waters tunes, showing his development (between 1948 and 1954) from a country blues artist on numbers like Rollin' Stone to an established city musician with a tightly knit band.

Howlin' Wolf. Evil. (Chess 1540 — formerly Moanin' in the Moonlight). Good, brutal Howling Wolf blues. He plays with some excellent stands. The music is all from the 50's when Wolf was perhaps at his best.

If in fact we are undergoing a widespread revival of 1950's music, it must to some extent represent a nostalgia for a kind of unconscious youthfulness which is no longer with us. 50's music certainly represented a revolution, or perhaps a quick evolution, in life styles, but there was little awareness by those taking part that they were creating a new world. Problems with parents weren't seen in terms of national failings; adolescent frustrations were alleviated by external activities like riding fast cars, dancing, or screaming at rock concerts rather than by chemically attacking the mental source of the frustrations. Teenage sexuality was becoming a theme in popular songs, but the songs were, for the most part, written or sung by non-teens, and the teenagers themselves were only at the point of recognising their sexuality, hardly proclaiming it.

Perhaps most important of all, there was a division between the generations much realer than that represented by the tag phrase about over-thirties. Parents may not have liked the new music, and they may have been positively alarmed by the suggestiveness of some of the lyrics (implications often lost upon the teenagers themselves), but they kept out of it. Parents simply didn't try to "get with" what was going on, nor did they impose an adult consciousness of "significance" on the changes which were taking place. The music and the style were associated with youth, but no one expected them to expand their area of influence and bring about widespread changes in the world.

To a large extent the new life style developed because teenagers accepted and adopted new ways which were presented to them. There was much less a sense of creating the new style. The focal point for the new way was Elvis Presley and the place where much of it started was Memphis, Tennessee.

Sam Phillips, a southern, white disc jockey with an ear for black music, began recording R & B artists for various labels and then set up his own Sun label. Besides recording R & B musicians, most of whom are now more or less obscure, he also opened his studio (which may be a polite word for the equipment he had) to white country artists, and an amalgam appeared which was the "new" sound. The use of Negro musical ideas by country musicians can hardly have been happening only in the Sun studio; more likely it was something which was taking place widely at the time; it just happened that Sun was in the right place at the right time. Along with the blues of musicians like James Cotton and Big Boy Crudup and the country music of Johnny Cash, Sun produced Elvis Presley, Carl Perkins, and Jerry Lee Lewis.

It hardly needs to be said that Presley was the leader. He was the one who introduced to the white middle class the image of a singer who played an instrument. It was Presley who suggested that white folks could have rhythm, and most important, his was the voice, slightly petulant and with the capacity of dropping an octave for "well-a-well-a-well-a".

Presley hasn't been missed in the revived interest in 50's music. He recorded his first album in almost a decade recently (From Memphis to Vegas, RCA Victor 6020). It's a two volume set, half of which is recorded live before an adoring audience of screaming matrons. He shows that he still has the voice dripping with sex and an ability to rip through the old songs with tremendous vigor. He takes them a trifle fast, but they still sound pretty good. The second record is a Memphis studio job of recent material, and the less said about it the better.

What is most noticeably missing from the recent Elvis album is that peculiar thing, the Sun sound. The sound was created in a desperate effort to overcome the shortcomings of primitive recording equipment. Rhythm in the small groups was emphasised above all. The string bass was often played with a drumstick to impell the rhythm along. Even the lead guitar often concentrated on the lower strings, (a particularly distinctive part of Johnny Cash's records). Then too, the straight recorded sound was never what appeared on the records. Echo and compression were used to recreate the sound, and the result was a hard, clear sound, with a sharpness from the use of flutter echo.

The recent flood of Sun reissues by Jerry Lee Lewis and Carl Perkins in particular (Lewis on Sun 102, 103, and 107, Perkins on Sun 111), show how much better the sound techniques of the Sun studio suit the songs than do modern "good" techniques. Neither Lewis' recent Smash LPs, nor Perkins' recreation of his hits on a Columbia album (Columbia 9833) have the excitement of the early sides.

The songs are plainly aimed at teen listeners. The subjects are school, cars, dancing, making out, and the like. Perhaps the most noticeable subject, though, is the teenage girl, the "sweet little sixteen." The sex queen was a girl who was "too cute to be a minute over 17." The emergence of this predecessor of the groupies was particularly evident in Chuck Berry and Gene Vincent, though she appears everywhere, in Buddy Holly, in the Everly Brothers, as well as in the Sun artists.

Gene Vincent wasn't a Sun artist, but his recently reissued sides by Capitol (Greatest! Capital 380) show that the style was being copied by other companies following Sun's success. Vincent's songs are almost all concerned with the foxy little teen queen, and there's a weak, sickly sound to his voice which suggests that his preoccupation wasn't entirely healthy.

In moderate doses, records with the 50's sound, particularly the reissues, are fun to hear. Jerry Lee Lewis bases his sound on his own corny boogie piano and sometimes gets into some rather suggestive stuff (Big Legged Woman is more than suggestive). Carl Perkins varies his sound by a skillful use of country, blues and R & B. He has a good delivery and might have led the movement if it hadn't been for Presley. Johnny Cash, the most heavily reissued of the Sun artists, (Sun 100, 101, 104, 105, 106) was actually not one of the label's rock and roll artists. His deep voice is full of country integriety, and he seldom strayed from a straight country-folk approach, though he was most obviously uncomfortable when he did.

A note about some of these recent reissue albums. The Gene Vincent record on Capitol is a bit of a gyp, having a total playing time of only 26 minutes which is outrageous for a reissue. On the Sun albums, you have to watch out after the first couple of volumes by any one artist since they begin to repeat material. Johnny Cash's Show Time LP (Sun 106) is definitely to be avoided. It's material from the other LPs with an hysterical crowd track added to make it sound "live." The crowd is absurd; it never stops shrieking at top level.

Along with all the U.S. rock and roll, at least a little of the Canadian product is being made available. One example is the Beau Marks (Birchmount 505), a group of regular looking guys in plaid jackets who do a very nice job with various aspects of the 50's sound. Jerry Lee Lewis piano and all. One look at them and you can see how little the changes in music were reflected in other areas of life, notably appearance.

The "revival", if it is one, is so far rather limited, in that with the exception of Chuck Berry and possibly Little Richard, it has missed the black music of the 50's, which was as interesting as the white rock and roll, if not more so. However, the interest in the music of that period is probably little more than a brief fad, explained by the record companies and already past its peak.

pierre's dolly

After a cinematic season of shot-gunned motorcyclists, homosexual cowboys and drug addicts, Hello, Dolly! is a much-needed change of pace. At first it's a little uncomfortable watching such a defiantly optimistic movie, but before very long Hello, Dolly! becomes a thoroughly enjoyable experience.

The film deals with the amusing attempts of widowed matchmaker Dolly Levi (Barbra Streisand) to marry a rich grain and feed merchant, Horace Vandergelder (Walter Matthau). On the way, Dolly is also drawn into the marital problems of Vandergelder's niece and his two clerks.

Despite its overall excellence, especially in set design and costumes which easily rival those in Oliver!, Hello, Dolly! is noticeably split by the intermission into a mediocre first Act and a superb second Act. The songs in the first half of the movie are instantly forgettable and similar to the depthless "June-moon" ditties of Jackie Gleason's second Honeymooners TV series. In addition, the solo numbers are off just enough to make it evident that the singing is dubbed. Unlike Oliver! where the story-line is always suspenseful and where Oliver Twist gains immediate audience sympathy, Hello, Dolly! takes a full first Act, i.e. 75 minutes, just to establish the theme and the characters. Only a consistently fine performance by Matthau saves Part One from boredom.

But in the second half, Hello, Dolly! not only redeems itself, but shines. In a magnificently choreographed restaurant scene, a dozen red-coated waiters fly through twenty dazzling minutes of popping corks, soaring trays and flaming swords. The dancing insight of Director Gene Kelly is appreciated particularly in his choice of camera angles and quick-shot editing.

To the audience's relief, the central characters in Part Two have emerged from their stereotyped shells and begun to get involved emotionally in the goings-on. There is renewed excitement when Streisand finally opens her mouth to speak, and not to sing; her verbal jousts with Matthau achieve a high degree of precision and timing. As the songs emerge crisper and the sub-plots join together, Hello, Dolly! rises to a fully-orchestrated smash ending, equal in force to few other movie musicals.

At a time when the average moviegoer is constantly burdened by the weight of a sombre, unattractive world, it is a relief to discover the sheer entertainment and unmatchable enthusiasm of Hello, Dolly!

St. Lawrence Centre - Part Two . . .

THIS PAST WEEKEND HAS BROUGHT US MANY ODD THINGS. The Isle of Dogs has seceded from London. We have seen Pierre Eliot Trudeau at his best — dancing fun native tambourine dances with Eskimos. The United States has once more articulated the necessity of all of North America sharing all of Canada's resources (dig).

And in the entertainment section of the Star, Nathan Cohen has urged us all to be of good cheer regarding theatre's future in Toronto. Because after all, everyone feared the death of Theatre Toronto would mean the demise of Toronto theatre and, golly gee, we've got the Saint Lawrence Centre just one year later. Presumably, we should all buy the TT Ladies' Guild's theatre calendar so that immensely debt-ridden venture can be laid in a quiet grave, and we can go on to bigger and better things.

Even if (says Nathan) the Centre is a bust, both in its program and its presentation. Should the Centre company die, something bigger and better will take its place. At any rate, some thing will take its place.

We are not amused. It is my contention that the Centre, despite the drawbacks inherent in a first season, the limitations of such an institution to begin with, and not a few errors of judgment on the part of the general and the theatre directors, is at least a fifty per cent success.

Is successful enough, in fact, for me to urge attendance by anyone interested enough to have read my last article and begun this one. If you arrive at 8.15 p.m. on any night, student card and one dollar bill in hand, you are almost guaranteed a seat. Moreover, if you're alone, or prepared to sit alone, you can have the odd orchestra seat (less likelihood of that sort of thing if you're looking for two seats together).

Each of the three productions currently running is worth seeing for variety reasons. Each confirms once more that Toronto is blessed with more than its share of talented people. Each attests what can be done, and what (granted a bit of luck and better planning) will be done in this city in seasons to come. And the forthcoming Faust may prove to be the most impressive production of the season (if for a lot of the wrong reasons).

Read on, then. And can Nathan Cohen dance with a tambourine? MAN, Inc.: THE RAVE-UP REVIEW

Although he calls MAN, Inc. a play, Jacques Languirand has been branded a writer of revue by at least one critic, who shall here remain nameless because I've plugged him enough in my last ten pages of copy.

Revue is an apt description of this show, since its primary thrusts are in a series of tableaux, each interconnected with the others, but essentially individual enough to stand on its own merits.

And of merit, there is much. The ten tableaux move from the creation of the world to something called 'Naturism or the Return to the Source', culminating in the 'Birth or the Continuation of the World.' Husband Him and wife Her get in on the ground floor, as it were, and their marriage founders, folds, and gets it all on again in parallel to the movement around them.

My chief criticism of Languirand's text is that he bothered to write interconnecting dialogue between his tableaux. To have done so is to force the continuity. The tableaux are contiguous enough to do without it. It adds nothing to the material, as a sense of the development of Him's and Her's relationship is sufficiently conveyed in the tableaux.

At any rate, such breaks are brief, and only slightly detract from what is surely one of the most exciting productions to originate on a Toronto stage. The revue uses the Living Screen techniques created by Ralph Alswang. Superb film by the French Production Division of the National Film Board attests to the stupidity of our Ottawa Government's cutback in financing that organisation. The film fills sides, sloped stage and ceiling with incredible colour, infusing as much activity and life as I think any stage can bear. Judy Peyton Ward's costumes are always apt, often witty, and work beautifully in the dim stage-lighting and warm film projections. Norman Symonds' music is perhaps only a cut above Muzak, but it works with the film and revue as a whole. Hugo Romero's choreography is not innovative, but it is good, solid interpretation and his dancers successfully merge with the emotional as well as physical movement of film and music.

MAN Inc.

Paul Soles as STRIKER SCHNEIDERMAN

Don Francks as Him manages befuddlement better than the program note on him might suggest (iron buffalo . . . another ancient earthling, etc.). He is a very hip man, in complete possession of his role when it is not possessing him. His wife, Lili Francks (The Other Woman), may not have totally succeeded in seducing the Univac machine, but she did wonders for my libido.

But it is Patricia Collins who deserves especial praise. Miss Collins, who as Wojcek's television wife emerged as both a fine actress and one of your more exquisite ladies, gives us a predictably fine acting performance. But she offers something over what was expected. In this, her first singing role, she surprises us with a very white but very solid urban-blues sort of voice. Francks' own husky tone is in beautiful complement with Miss Collins' incredible sound. In brief, she gets as much woman into her voice as she projects with her physical presence.

Man, Inc. was a beautiful way to begin the Centre's season. It establishes that old story-lines, simple relationships, and superb production are the basics of truly good theatre. M. Languirand has given us more than enough to justify our wishing to see more from him in future.

STRIKER SCHNEIDERMAN: THE WISTFUL REVIEW

Hey, Jack Gray has written a new play. Jack Gray knows how to write plays — how to work dialogue, structure scenes, sustain movement. Unfortunately, Mr. Gray has really given us two plays sufficiently different in tone as to leave one suitably confused.

You see, most of Gray's drama is a kind of elongated Jewish joke. The stereotyped little Jewish tailor trying to sit on the fence, pay the mortgage, watch the girls, love his wife. Full of rotten jokes, but he's a nice man. This makes for passable entertainment, and if it were not so redundant, all manner of nice things might be said for Gray having written this play.

Unfortunately, he gets heavy on us. Schneiderman the tailor is ultimately sucked into the Winnipeg General Strike (you remember Canada had a Commie General Strike in 1919?). He becomes a Leader of Men. Partly because his buddy gets shot down by the Specials. Partly because his wife does an at least 170 degree turn and tells him to do so.

There are so many potential lines Gray might have taken. The mayor of Winnipeg is torn between the Man of the People drive and the Savant of Law and Order pull. Tom Evans, chairman of the strike committee, is fully aware of the pacifist tactics needed to win, but his dialogue never gets round to a satisfactory articulation of them. This is partly because the skeletal representation of the strike committee (one Marxist, one Nice Involved Lady, one Simple Worker) is an inadequate expression of the complexities involved in the issues of strategy and just what a strike is all about whether the play is to deal with the little man or the heavier issues. White makes his presence evident at least physically, and it is to be regretted that Gray has not given him the dialogue which would have helped inestimably.

The set design is, like the play, a puzzle. Murray Laufer uses huge blow-ups of 1919 Winnipeg along the cyc line and on either side of the stage. The playing area is hung with pennant-shaped reproductions of newspaper headlines, and strings of bare lightbulbs emphasize the carnival-used car lot atmosphere.

But Laufer also offers a realistic storefront and a set piece for Schneiderman's shop. In centre, he it started out well. Larry Schaffer's set is nothing short of brilliant. The knacker's is supposed to stink. The Centre has no odours seething through it, but the stage setting seems permeated with stench. It bears a striking resemblance to a stable. And this is a house of a horse-slaughterer (or knacker)' This is mostly a human stable.

Marie Day's costumes are all right, just fine in fact. Catherine, the daughter who has joined the Russian paratroopers, arrives at the close of Act One in an incredible red satin miniskirt affair, epaulettes, gauche, and not very austere Socialist Realism. Tedde Moore's underwear is quite groovy, but that's another story.

THE KNACKER'S ABC

by Bill Rockett

to begin with. The Establishment are so obviously so that the sight of the police inspector in his 1919 Simpson-Sears summer underwear is a bit like watching a Barbi doll (or perhaps I should say Ken) strip. One is chiefly surprised not that the doll can undress itself, but that it bothers with undergarments at all.

Gray could have given us that long Jewish joke. Or he might have given us the tale of the little man caught up in a big conflict he wants to stay out of. Towards the end of the first act, this seems to be what he's aiming at. But Gray is not content. Round about the midpoint of the second act, he decides to move into the Eternal Verities. Like Love. And Freedom. And Stuff Like That. Which is all alright, all okay, if you've been building for them.

Gray hasn't been doing so. The shoot-em-up scene is short, abrupt, choppy. A turning point, to be sure. But who was going where in the first place? We've moved from the little man caught on the periphery to the central action. And the little man miraculously pops into view there as well.

Of course, he's still cracking Jewish jokes.

Paul Soles as Schneiderman does what there is to do with the part. He's good, of course. But then, he's hardly given much room to falter. Sylvia Lennick as his wife Deborah, never a favourite actress of mine, pleasantly surprised me. She is good, passing good. In point of fact, some of the best comedy in the play is given to her, and Miss Lennick handles it well. While all the other performers are at least adequate, some mention must be made of Jack Medley as Magistrate Hutchison and Dennis Thatcher as Inspector Holmes. They do much with little. Jonathan White is to be congratulated for what he has attempted to do with the part of the mayor. This role receives perfunctory development from Gray in the early stages of the first act, but the playwright never carries it far enough. The presence of the man in the middle must needs be sustained throughout the drama, no matter has set a stylized but blocky structure representing the front of the Winnipeg City Hall. The overall effect is mish-mash, as if Laufer couldn't make up his mind between representational and surreal settings. Miss Ward's period costumes are functional, and from all appearances of the period. They tend toward the dark shades of urban streetwear, which is appropriate. But I think the costume effect would have been more successful were the actors playing against one or the other faces of the schizophrenic set (preferably just platforms and the blow-ups).

I have little to say concerning Leon Major's direction. His blocking, as usual, is superb. Actors move as if in choreographed concert. The text admits little opportunity for a director to seize a point and work it through the play. Nor does it allow Major much chance of working in emotional contexts between characters.

I wish, I wish. That Jack Gray would've written one play in one direction. If he meant it to end where it does, then he certainly has written in bad taste. As it is, that's pretty much what it leaves. In one's mouth. But faint enough to suggest you may as well see it. Some of the technique alone makes it worth viewing.

Unless you're a card-carrying member of the Anti-Defamation League.

THE KNACKER'S ABC: THE SAD REVIEW

Boris Vian was a very funny man. The Knacker's ABC is a very funny one-act 'paramilitary vaudeville.' The Centre's production of same is a little confusing. But mostly saddening.

Directors Ted Follows and Major have tried to improve on a good thing. They've broken the play into two acts, lengthening it by the expansion of sight gags and stage business. The result is that no one on the stage seems to agree where the play is going. Everyone's just doing their bit. And I don't think Vian was trying to invent Theatre of Confusion.

in this production.

Regrettable. But Vian and the performers are worth the trouble of the slight strain Follows and Major have placed upon them.

And on the audience. FAUST: THE HEDGING PREEVIEW

The proof-reader slipped, as proof-readers do. Last week I mentioned Faust as being of the operatic proportions 'Leon Major always directs.' As we all know, Major directs many other things. The sentence should have ended 'directs best.'

True, I think, on both counts. This Faust is a distillation of two long verse plays into one two-act extravaganza. The translation (by Barker Fairley as adapted by Peter Raby) doesn't bear too much relation to Goethe's plays, in that it attempts in prose what should be in verse. The conventions of verse drama are quite different from those of dramatic prose plays. This version of Faust retains the conventions out of context. There is no incredible poetry to sustain the movement of the drama, and in verse plays, it is the poetry which imparts the most life to the drama.

What this adaptation — it cannot fairly be called just a translation — does possess is a clutch of the Big Production Numbers from the original. Lots of people on stage, lots of action, quick cutting from place to place. Of course, poor Gretchen gets short shrift. And the play ends with Faust's salvation apparently due to Mephistopheles' peculiar sexual proclivities rather than the intervention of Gretchen and Helen of Troy.

Nonetheless, we shall have a Faust. With Roy Montgomery lighting and Judy Peyton Ward creating the 150 costumes, design looks promising. Murray Laufer's doing this set, and if he can get together what he wants and stick to one approach, it should work out well.

It won't be Goethe, but it will most likely be worth seeing as a piece of theatre.

So. The box score is don't miss MAN, Inc., and do see The Knacker's ABC if possible. Striker Schneiderman is all manner of instructive, but put it at the bottom of your list. Watch Faust, because it could go anywhere and will likely go in good places, provided you're not a Goethe freak.

Give the Centre a chance. Fair marks for a first season. And remember, they're keeping us in our place. So see things. Get mad. Write dirty letters. Write nice letters about the nice things, too.

But remember, it is our place. We're stuck with an institution in the making. And on the make. Let's get on that we can, so's to stave off the tendency all art centres possess of becoming the artistic panem et circenses of a society. Small libations to the gods. An excuse for not doing other things. An excuse that easily becomes tired and just plain bad.

Leave us not get raped.

new old music

The summer I spent in England around the London and Manchester folk clubs was the summer Ian and Sylvia started using an electric bass. They had been there a month before we arrived and their tour had been disastrous. The mix of folk music and electronic arrangements that was central to the development of pop music over here just didn't go down. Probably British integrity: some things simply did not change and English folk music was one.

It has taken six years for British traditional music to begin to at least partially de-insulate itself. If it is legitimate to talk of styles (a rock style, an art song style — Cohen, Mitchell, Collins —, a country style) then the time lag has been good; the sound coming out of the new tradition-based musicians, The Pentangle, The Fairport Convention, The Young Tradition, The Incredible String Band forms a quite different grouping.

'Grouping' is a carefully non-committal word, for the musically tight Pentangle is miles from the free-wheeling, sloppy Fairport Convention, and it is safe to say that no-one resembles the Incredible String Band at all. Still each is bridging hundred year gaps and opening up a number of musical possibilities for non-afficionados. Which is worthwhile, for British folk is a musical tradition as well as a historical one. There has been a constant sound — simple, melodic, triadic, often mournful. It is in the border ballads, broadsides, Holst, Vaughan Williams, Flanders and Swann, the Beatles and The Moody Blues. Day in the Life is a distinctly British tune.

What was left to the traditional singers, however, was the myth and imagery that went with the melodic style. I don't know that there is an intellectual way to get at the power that a traditional image can hold. Eliot tries in Tradition and the Individual Talent.

For me there is just the feeling — what was it like to first hear 'If I were a carpenter and you were a lady, would you marry me anyway. ...' — some mystery around how things change and stay the same. Or maybe there is a natural poetry that becomes exposed when words are polished by generations of use, or some ornery simplicity urban academese as a language, lacks. It's just there for me when Blue digs little holes all 'round the yard', or Jacqui McShee (of Pentangle) sings, 'If I were a scholar and could handle a pen. ...'

The first new traditional group to surface over here was The Young Tradition, and they never really moved very far from their roots: most of their material was sung unaccompanied, and none of it was 'written'. Where they differed from the Watersons or the various 'Families' was in brash enthusiasm, replacing the droning respect that hangs over so many traditional arrangements like a dust cloth. The Young Tradition has the same flat, rich quality of the Dillards or Crosby, Stills and Nash, both of whom the Y.T. excel in harmonic and rhythmic inventiveness. (Or re-inventiveness since the material was in common use two or three hundred years ago). And whatever power there is in old imagery, it hangs on them like beads. Their last album, Galleries (Vanguard 79295) is worth finding, if that is possible, although be forewarned that they are an acquired taste.

The Young Tradition played Toronto twice, first for a week at the Mouseshole to excellent reviews and a total audience of twenty, about half of whom knew one another. The next time they moved up to the Riverboat and opened on the first day of the Yorkville hepatitis scare. Their popularity followed them elsewhere and they split up this fall.

Quite the opposite is the case with The Pentangle who have in less than a year developed the sort of avidly partisan following that Judy Collins has. In a sense they are the first folk music super-group. Bert Jansch, singer and second guitar has been one of the most popular British folk musicians for almost ten years. His instrumental work is somewhere between classical and the chunky American blues sound of Rev. Gary Davis. Vocally, Jansch is as distinctive as Fred Neill, to whom there is a slight resemblance. With the success of the Pentangle, Jansch's earlier English albums are being re-released over here. Lucky Thirteen (Vanguard, 79212) is where Jansch was six or seven years ago, with the writing drawing far more on American blues than English ballads. Birthday Blues (Reprise 6343) is much more recent and the songs, while Jansch's own, are very much part of the tradition:

I shall fix a magic spell to weave on you:

*For the long grass to catch you in,
For the orange to sweeten sin,
Before this very moment evilly.*

Birthday Blues also brings Jansch together with Terry Cox, about the most tasteful drummer in pop music and Danny Thompson, a fine jazz bassist (double bass, not electric) if somewhat of a show-off. Cox and Thompson are another two fifths of Pentangle.

John Renbourn and Jacqui McShee complete the group. Renbourn's guitar work has been popular in England for some time. He has an instrumental album of his own, now released here under the title Sir John Alot of Merrie Englandes Musyk Thynghe and Ye Grene Knights (Reprise, 6344) which is quite pleasant. Renbourn is both more fluid and more precise than Jansch, although less distinctive. Although otherwise similar, their styles are quite complementary and fit together as tightly in the Pentangle as Krieger and Manzarek in the Doors. (Avoid an album called Stepping Stones, Jansch and Renbourn (Vanguard 6506). It is old, unimaginatively arranged and the best cuts are played more clearly on The Pentangle, Sweet Child.) Jacqui McShee sings lead and has a clear, distinctive voice that just grabs a number of us.

Together they are almost baroque in their musical carefulness. If they reach the soul it is quite directly through the ear and, again, through the mystery of the images. The format is usually a series of light jazz solos and counterpoints off something like House Carpenter, Once I Had a Sweetheart or a Hunting Song. (Basket of Light, Reprise 8004). While the group is becoming increasingly jazz oriented, the lyrics, McShee's plain style and the instrumentation all draw one back in time. ('All instruments played on this album are acoustic', they announce somewhat belligerently on Basket of Light.) Sweet Child, Reprise 8002, their two record concert is their tour-de-force much as Judy Collins' In My Life or The Beatles' Sergeant Pepper.

Pentangle fans tend to be in their twenties, and in the group's one Toronto appearance, on CBC's Ian and Sylvia Rock Festival, they were not very well received by the younger rock oriented audience. In England, this bridge is being made by The Fairport Convention.

The Convention are an under-hearsed British version of The Band, the sort of group who could do a rock version of Matty Groves and bring it off on sheer drive and spontaneity. As well as traditional material they play early Joni Mitchell (Eastern Rain), Dylan (I'll Keep It With Mine, Percy's Song) and their own writing (Who Knows Where the Time Goes.) Dave Swarbrick's folk fiddle is quite nicely incongruous. Only one album, Unhalfbricking, (Polydor 543 098) is available here, and while it is not their best, it is fun and catchy. Like The Young Tradition, they recently split, although not for lack of popularity.

That leaves The Incredible String Band who, as suggested earlier, simply do not compare. Their first album (of six, all available here) showed strong influence from traditional singing and calypso, an unlikely combination, true, but there it is. With Thousand Layers of The Onion they were still comprehensible although increasingly original, eg. Robin Williamson's The First Girl I Loved — later sung by Judy Collins — and Mike Heron's Painting Box:

Somewhere in my mind there is a painting box,

I have all the colours there it's true,

But lately when I look inside my painting box,

I seem to see the colours of you.

Then they went schizophrenic, with their material increasingly coming to resemble the last section of Eliot's The Wasteland. The music — hardly definable as songs — is in the form of a loose oratorio worded by snippets of different religions and mythologies:

Someone you saw stretched sleeping on the sand

Five withered violets cradled in his hand

His dreams are so loud calling in your ear

The yellow snake coils from the water
And all is refreshed far and near.

The instrumental work is brilliant although they seldom bother to play or sing exactly in tune. (Actually they do for one cut. Sleeper's Awake on Changing Horses (Elektra 74057) their newest album. It turns out they sound like a less enthusiastic Young Tradition.)

It is interesting that all the new traditional groups are more popular in the United States than here: there were several Fairport Convention albums released in the U.S. before Polydor finally decided to distribute one here; The Young Tradition were a big hit at Newport; the Pentangle played Woodstock but do not appear to be invited to the John Lennon Peace Festival; and the Incredible String Band are one of the biggest attractions in California music. A local impresario says neither they nor the Pentangle are worth bringing to Toronto financially. So much for empire.

coming apart

Coming Apart is the story of one man's progressive mental disintegration, as shown in his increasingly unhappy and hostile sexual encounters with numerous women. The idea has a lot of potential. I think, but this film, written and directed by Milton Ginsberg, is plagued with an incredibly shallow and pretentious script.

All that happens in the film takes place in one room. The film is supposed to have been taken by the central character himself, a psychiatrist (Rip Torn), who has hidden a camera in a small box disguised as a "kinetic sculpture", and which he can turn off and on by remote control.

The action does move around considerably, though, often moving partially or completely off screen. At other times, the characters will stand immediately in front of the camera, so that for several long stretches all the viewer sees is a grey, unfocused close up of someone's pantleg.

All this is to point out that the film is supposedly made by an amateur. But as if this were not enough, the film at intervals includes the strips of leader as if someone were changing reels, and a great many jarring noises have been added to the sound track. All these things together are so over-emphasised that they lose whatever effectiveness they might have had, and become highly annoying.

The events in the film are a series of erotic scenes taking place on the couch or reflected in the mirror. Apparently, we are to infer the man's progressive disintegration from his increasingly poor performance as a lover, and his increasingly hostile attitude to his women. Why he should be disintegrating at all we are not told.

Eventually these scenes become only two persons, the psychiatrist and his latest girl, dressed in their underwear, insulting each other or not saying anything at all. Finally the film ends, with one rejected lover (Sally Kirkland), alone in the apartment, half-clothed and holding a gun, viscously smashing everything, and at the very end smashing the mirror. The film ends inconclusively, leaving one wondering what happens to the psychiatrist when he returns.

A lot of planning must have gone into the placing of the action, so that the motionless camera could record most of it. But whatever interest might have been built up is ruined by the monotonous and meaningless dialogue, and by the extreme emphasis placed on the amateurism of the film.

WE GET LETTERS

Sir:

The Varsity and the Review have carried a series of articles highly critical of the white governments of Southern Africa, culminating in the eight pages in the Review last Friday (March 6, 1970). I do not pretend that all criticism of these governments is unjustified, but it has been very one-sided and therefore misleading.

It is, I suppose, the nature of the morally outraged to see absolutely no good or justice in the actions of those they condemn. Convinced of their monopoly of righteousness they then tend to "snatch the knotted card from the hand of God and deal out murderous blows", and make no mistake, it is murderous blows they advocate. The term "freedom fighters" glides safely over the reality — the arson, maiming and killing involved. Most of the pre-independence violence in Rhodesia was not directed against the white man but against the African — against the African police reservist, or the African — against the African police reservist, or the African belonging to the rival nationalist party, or simply the African belonging who wanted nothing to do with any party. The moralisers who write your articles recoil in horror from the thought of Africans napalmed by the Portuguese — but is the horror significantly different when one African throws a gasoline bomb that explodes beside another? It was partly to stamp out this type of terrorism in Rhodesia that the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act was passed.

Unlike some others, I am not an expert on all of Southern Africa, but I do believe I can offer some balancing comments on Rhodesia. To Steve Langdon, whose short visit to South Africa has condemned it forever in his eyes, I recommend "A Very Strange Society" by Allen Drury (currently available at the U of T Bookroom at 1/3 the regular price). It is not a defence of the status quo but a fair presentation of the complex problems involved. For the rest, I would point out that Rhodesia ought not to be lumped too quickly with South Africa. There is no legal racial division in most of the social sphere — the bus service, the government-supported university, the cinemas, the national soccer team are all multi-racial.

As an example of the unfair distortions and generalizations which frequently mark discussion of Rhodesia, I should like to deal in detail with some of the claims by Bryan Haddon in last Friday's Varsity. 1) — "Education is completely segregated." False. I attended a multi-racial school in Salisbury. However, government-run schools are segregated. One might not accept the reasons for this but they should have been presented. It is financially impossible for the Government to provide a full education for the whole school-age population of Rhodesia. The white tax-payers who provide the vast majority of governmental revenue demand that their children not be educationally penalised because of this. Moreover it is felt that integration would have an adverse effect on the education of culturally more advanced white children (Rhodesians are not alone in thinking this way). I do not insist that these various reasons justify segregation, but they do put it in perspective. Finally the university is multi-racial. Perhaps Mr. Haddon does not consider this to be education.

2) — "Only 60% of African children get any education at all". I do not know the source of this figure, but, assuming it is more reliable than some of Mr. Haddon's other statements, I would point out that it compares very favourably with the rest of Africa. Also, since 1963, Rhodesia's expenditure on African education has risen 90%, high school enrollment has nearly tripled, and African enrollment at the university has more than doubled.

3) — "The Law and Order Act . . . has outlawed all African political parties". False. Mr. Haddon means that specific nationalist parties have been banned for subversive activities and terrorism (largely directed against other Africans). The sweeping generalizations is typical of the falsifications in which he indulges. In fact an African party is represented in the legislature.

4) — "All African political leaders . . . have been imprisoned or detained without trial." False. Incorporated into this definitive statement of fact are Mr. Haddon's unstated personal political prejudices, namely that the leader of the opposition and the thirteen other elected African MP's (who sit in the same legislature as the white MP's) are not leaders. He must also assume that the African chiefs and headmen who represent the bulk of the African population are not leaders either. These traditional leaders of African society, of course, are anathema to those of African political philosophy. One might ask, "When is an African not an African?" and be forced to conclude — only when he supports the government.

The net cumulative effect of the biased type of commentary we were offered last Friday is that most people have come to accept a simplified version of a very complex problem — black is good, white is bad. In fact, in Africa the difficulties are so great and so many that the question of who rules serves only to distract from them. The substitution of a minority black elite for a minority white elite brings no advantage to the mass of the population. Indeed, quite the opposite. Political inexperience and lack of technical skills are likely to result in the political and economic instability which have characterised and still do, the rest of Africa. What does this imply? It implies hunger and starvation, violence and insecurity — all in the name of human rights. Ask the African in the street, not the politician in the limousine, whether black government has made him feel better.

Probably the single most galling fact for Rhodesia's would-be-liberators is the lack of popular support for their cause. Rhodesia is one of the most internally peaceful countries in the world. What fighting takes place is the result of guerilla sorties from Zambia. The standard explanation for this is the cry "police state". It does not stand up very well. As we are so often told, the white population is less than 250,000. Subtract the women. Subtract the children. Subtract the sick and the elderly. Subtract those need keep the economy running. That does not leave very many over to defend the borders against guerilla invasion and to police millions of exploited and oppressed Africans, does it?

It is not my intention to reverse the equation and pretend that the white is good while black is bad. There is racial prejudice in Rhodesia (and in Canada too). I suggest, however, that it is wrong to advocate destruction, slaughter of livestock, murder in the night, and ultimately war, when experience elsewhere in Africa teaches that the alleged benefits in terms of human dignity and welfare are unreal, and when conditions in Rhodesia, compared with those elsewhere, do not merit such bloody solutions.

. . . and advice

(Moved by a simultaneous denunciation of an Edward Bear concert and LP by two of our writers a few issues back, Danny Marks, guitarist with the group, has offered the following observations on the art of reviewing.)

Sir:

A review should be as unbiased by unusual aspects as possible.

The reviewer should do his best to get into the music of the band, to see it as they see it, as the audience sees it & as he sees it. He should not get carried away by his position, his opinion is only one of many.

It is often best that the reviewer meet the band members. Their music will reflect their personality and their personality will reflect their music.

A reviewer should always consider the band in all different lights — as a unit, as individuals in the unit, as musicians, vocalists, personalities.

He should not waste time with petty details especially in the more serious bands — people still talk about their favorite foods, etc.

When giving any opinion, especially blind praise or condemnation, there must be ample fact to back it up. Too often a blanket statement is made without specific examples or ample proof.

All opinions should be backed up.

An opinion is usually the result of a series of conclusions; at least some of these conclusions should be mentioned for the reader to see how the writer formed his opinion.

No artist or group is all bad or all good. A completely black or white review of one artist only seems to imply that there are other factors involved rather than just musical.

A reviewer, if interviewing, should have a method of making sure he gets his facts right. Before going to see an artist, it is often best to study the artist's background, as one often reads the script before going to see a Shakespeare play — to give him a better idea of the background.

It is also often better for the reviewer to remain unbiased by anyone else and to go see the act "cold".

I often appreciate a reviewer checking with me to see if I approve his content, often facts are messed up or something has been interpreted wrong.

The reviewer should be a logically minded person — but then everyone should and few people are. Of course it is most important that the reviewer know his subject inside-out. He must remember criticism can be good or bad — but it should always be constructive and logical, not sarcastic and unfounded.

ancient jazz records

The problem with reissues of recordings is that it is often difficult to evaluate the actual quality of the music. What do you do when faced with obscure alternate takes of undistinguished compositions by the Duke Ellington of 1927? The sound may be terrible and the music corny and dated. And yet there is the "historical" interest, the curiosity about the development of styles and schools of music which no longer exist, or at least don't sound the same any more (because of the change in recording techniques).

For the average jazz fan, reissues present a music which is nothing more than an artifact that belongs in a museum. Still, you don't have to be an antiquarian to appreciate the really outstanding jazz of the past, for it has a vitality that makes it timeless.

Of the many reissue programs carried on by almost all the record companies, one of the most recent — and best — is the Prestige Historical series. Attractively packed, accompanied by informative liner notes, and carefully remastered, these records make available again some of the best jazz of the thirties and forties. (The only major flaw is the silly and redundant use of fake "stereo").

Dicky Wells in Paris/1937 (Prestige 7593) is probably the best of the series. Representative of the best small band jazz of the late thirties, it features Wells and three excellent trumpeters, of whom the most outstanding is Bill Coleman. Wells is one of the great trombonists in jazz. The very antithesis of the J. J. Johnson school of wooden sterile trombone playing, Wells had a sly and subtle way of shaping his rhythms. His solos are gems of relaxed and original improvisations with a definite emphasis on that elusive and undefinable quality called swing.

Besides the solos of the brassmen, this record has good small band ensemble playing on such tunes as Bugle Call Rag. And there is also the unique guitar sound of the great Django Reinhardt.

Swing, 1946 (Prestige 7604) reminds us that Jonah Jones, believe it or not, was once a very good "hot" trumpet player. This will come as a surprise to those who know only his work of the last two decades. Fortunately, those rabid French "hot jazz" enthusiasts, Hughes Panassie and Charles Delaunay, recorded Jones when he was still famed for his jamming on New York's 52nd St. Jones' little jump band included Ike Quebec, a tenor saxophonist who never had much recognition, but should be heard.

Other bands heard are those of Benny Carter, who had an excellent group featuring Ben Webster and Buck Clayton, and Gene Sedit, a former sideman of Fats Waller.

Jazz Pioneers (Prestige 7647) has early Coleman Hawkins and Mary Lou Williams. Back in the early thirties, Hawkins had already developed a mature style whose essential tonal elements were a huge vibrato and a heavy, rich sound, which tended at times to be rather too sweet. His improvisations were daring, with their audacious intervallic leaps and rhythmic experimentation. (This last element is evident on the tracks where Hawkins is accompanied by piano only; he foos around with time values, expanding and contracting them).

Besides the solos of Hawkins, which are to be found in a wide variety of settings, this record also presents some original compositions by the pianist Mary Lou Williams. Though there are definite suggestions of Waller and Hines in her work, Miss Williams had, for the time, quite an advanced style, featuring modern chord voicings.

Less essential in some ways for the average jazz fan is Benny Carter/1933. But then Carter has always been a "musician's musician", less appreciated by the public than by his peers. A master of the alto saxophone (if a bit too fastidious and, on the other hand, sometimes too florid), Carter also plays good trumpet and, reportedly, piano and trombone. He is also a very capable writer, with a particular talent for saxophone scoring; in fact he has been making a comfortable living in Hollywood for some years now.

This record brings back the days when Carter was primarily a bandleader. Though he had to make his money playing for dances, Carter still managed to maintain very high jazz standards, and in fact his band in 1933 had great jazzmen like Teddy Wilson, Chu Berry, and Sid Catlett; nor were they smothered in corn, as happened in many other bands of the time. Still, the music is a bit dated, and the sound not the best; probably only the connoisseur interested in this period will feel compelled to own this record.

RCA Victor has had their Vintage series of reissues for several years now, but apparently they haven't run out of Duke Ellington material yet. Though some of their Dual reissues have been dogs, the latest one — Flaming Youth (LPV 568) — is quite good. Like all the Vintage efforts, it is well produced, with good sound (no phony stereo "effects") and all the necessary information.

Six of the titles on Flaming Youth are alternate versions of compositions already available in Columbia's six-LP series, The Ellington Era; these include some of the greatest Ellington works — Creole Love Call, East Saint Louis Toodle-oo, The Mooche, and Black and Tan Fantasy. Though some of the music now sounds primitive and corny, there is a vitality and inventiveness that Ellington no longer seems capable of matching. And too there are the extraordinary early soloists like Bubber Miley and Joe Nanton, who helped form the Ellington sound. Though not necessary if you have the Columbia reissues, this album would be a very good introduction to early Duke Ellington.

In the Vintage series there are also items of at best peripheral interest to the jazz fan. Such is Charlie Barnett, Vol. 2 (LPV 567). Barnett led a dance band in the forties that was very much under the influence of Ellington. There is jazz here, but not of a very distinctive quality; better to spend your money on the real thing.

Columbia too has a reissue program, though their latest efforts seem devoted to switching material already available from lower to higher priced categories, and vice versa. Piano Starts Here (CS9655) is an example of the former. Solos by Art Tatum have been promoted from the cheap Harmony label to the full fledged Columbia. Phony stereo has been added, which has not enhanced in any way the piano solos recorded in 1933 and 1949 by Tatum. Worshipped by many jazz musicians as the greatest jazz pianist ever, Tatum had a dazzling technique, and, it is said, a boundless flow of ideas. The early solos here are indeed remarkable; but somehow I have never been crazy about Tatum, whose improvisations seem too ornate.

With Coleman Hawkins and Clark Terry Together, Columbia has demoted what used to be known as Back in Bean's Bag to a cheaper label. It is not a distinguished record, and there is no need to consider buying it.

Another reissue of later Hawkins is to be found on the Riverside series Swing Masters (RS 3305). Here the music is modern; consequently the listener does not feel the gap that may separate him from the earlier music on the bulk of reissues. Hawkins plays very well indeed, surrounded by contemporary musicians like J. J. Johnson and Idrees Sulieman. Unfortunately, the masterminds at the record company have felt it necessary to mutilate Hawkins' gorgeous tone by adding fake "stereo" and "echo" effects.

The above represents only a small sample of the reissued material being pumped into the marketplace. There are signs that the flood is only beginning. Columbia, for instance, is planning to reissue, on ten (10) LPs everything that Bessie Smith ever recorded. This kind of program will call upon the listener to exercise his discretion more than ever before in order to separate the truly musical from the mere historical curiosity.

bob bossin discourses on books

Looking back over this year's book section I have the uncomfortable feeling of failure. Only it's worse because I cannot put my finger on exactly what the failure was. It is not in lost reviews, stolen books, promised copy never handed in, misplaced telephone numbers. They are just the usual irritants that come with doing something you discover you don't particularly care about. Not having talked to half of the people who wrote things troubles me more. But that's not in the territory of the real spectre. I would have been more conscientious had I not been relatively early, overcome by legions of black angels whispering, "so what".

It doesn't come on so much, as you might expect, when I think of all the things that did not get said; it has more to do with the things that did. Joan Didion gets at part of it:

The piece called Slouching Towards Bethlehem was the first time I had dealt directly and flatly with the evidence of atomization, the proof that things fall apart: I went to San Francisco because I had not been able to work in some months, had been paralyzed by the conviction that writing was an irrelevant act, that the world as I had understood it no longer existed. If I was to work again at all, it would be necessary for me to come to terms with disorder. That was why the piece was important to me. And after it was printed I saw that, however directly and flatly I thought I had said it, I had failed to get through to many of the people who read and even liked the piece, failed to suggest that I was talking about something more general than a handful of children wearing mandalas on their foreheads. Disc jockeys telephoned my house and wanted to discuss (on the air) the incidence of filth in Haigh-Ashbury, and acquaintances congratulated me on having finished the piece "just in time", because "the whole fad's dead now, fini, kaput." I suppose almost everyone who writes is afflicted some of the time by the suspicion that nobody out there is listening, but it seemed to me then (perhaps because the piece was important to me) that I had never gotten feedback so universally beside the point.

I am not even sure what the 'point' of book reviewing is, beyond ego gratification for the reviewer who signs the piece and for the author who gets mentioned. This is the book review that launched a thousand ships. Hardly.

There is a Damon Runyon story about a small town typesetter who murders his wife, and, caught up in remorse one Sunday night, inserts a brief confession in the middle of the paper's weekly reprint of the town minister's sermon. Nobody notices. I wonder sometimes if there is anyone listening.

The worst, though, pre-dates publication. It is when I am writing and the angels come on saying, "Hold it. You didn't mean that." At rock bottom they shout "liar" each time I complete an assertive sentence. "You don't really feel that. You aren't really sure, certainly not as glib and calm and orderly as you're making it sound." We have this game on campus of making questions sound like answers, turning self-doubts into debates and quandaries into bloody expositions. I could take that, except I don't think it's under control anymore, but like some late show substance from outer space it's got hold of us and it is stealing our spirit, and I'm getting so very tired of sitting in rooms, hour after hour, day after day, playing Pretend, as if God were watching from behind a false mirror, taking it all down and giving us a grade.

Laing sees it in Politics of Experience when he plays with the sentence "There is nothing between us." There is nothing. No things to bring us together. Separateness. But if there are no things, there is a rare free space through which we can move — no things to keep us apart. The social things that unite us are by the same token so many things, so many social figments that come between us. Nothing: no excuses, no clever roles, no attractive authoritative comments. And there is nothing to be ashamed of, nothing to be afraid of.

Part of the solution or part of the problem? As I said at the top, I can't put my finger on it. The angels still holler. I do know that, compared to the botch we have made of the rest of the world, the failure does not seem like a particularly important one.

VARIOUS BOOKS

A number of books that have had value for me over the year have gone unmentioned. I point them out:

Joan Didion, Slouching Towards Bethlehem, Delta, $2.35
Tom Wolfe, Electric Kool-aid Acid Test, Bantam, $9.5

Wolfe says that the novel is dead and the most important writing today is in the form of creative non-fiction. He, Didion and Norman Mailer bear witness to that. Acid Test is a brilliant description and imitation of the hip-drug-music sub-culture, built around one of its early key figures Ken Kesey, author of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. It will probably turn out to be one of the most important pieces of sociology on America in the late sixties.

Joan Didion is as good as Wolfe or Mailer, probably better than Mailer. Her style is a marvel to most writers, stripped bare and clear and honest as hell. Possibly it is so simple that she hasn't been noticed because of it. The articles are completely personal about a woman "unconscious of the moment's high issues, oblivious to its data, alert only to the stuff of bad dreams, the children burning in the locked car in the supermarket parking lot. . . the cunning Okie faces that turn up in military investigations, the sullen lurkers in doorways, the lost children, all the ignorant armies on some dark pathological plain. Acquaintances read the New York Times and try to tell me the news of the world. I listen to call-in shows."

Didion is never indulgent: herself is the perfect vehicle for her vision of America: the widening gyre, the falcon which does not hear the falconer, the gaze blank and pitiless as the sun; those have been my points of reference, the only images against which much of what I was seeing and hearing and thinking seemed to make any pattern."

As well as Slouching Towards Bethlehem, her articles now appear as a regular column in Life.

Susan Sontag, Styles of Radical Will, Doubleday, $7.25

Sontag's style is slow and cramped. Her aesthetics and film criticism are closed to me; but her cultural anthropology, eg. Trip to Hanoi in Styles, is amazing. She accepts no words: history, politeness, irony, honesty all come up for re-examination, in the Vietnamese, in America, and in herself, the bourgeois intellectual. "My consciousness reared in that 'big' culture is a creature with many organs, accustomed to being fed by a stream of cultural goods, and infected by irony.

Carl Rogers, Freedom to Learn, Merriam, $8.25.

Postman and Weingartner, Teaching as a Subversive Activity, $7.50.

Most readers probably do not know how important Roger's influence has been around here. His 'student-centred teaching' formed the basis for SAC and Canadian Union of Students policy on education for the last four years. It is apparent in the CUG report, in the engineering society's suggested new program for engineering, the Free University, the Advisory Bureau, etc., etc. I wish we had a report for every time we have quoted the conclusion of his 1951 article:

Much of present education appears to be operationally based on the assumption, "You can't trust the student." Acting on this assumption, the teacher must supply motivation, information, organization of the material, and must use examinations at every turn to coerce the student into the desired activities. The approach we have been discussing is based on an assumption diametrically opposed, that, "You can trust the student." You can trust him to desire to learn in every way that will maintain or enhance self; you can trust him to make use of resources to serve this end; you can trust him to evaluate himself in ways that will make for self-progress; you can trust him to grow, provided the atmosphere for growth is available to him.

After twenty years, Rogers has expanded the article to a full book. It should be pre-requisite to anyone advocating or wanting to introduce classroom reform. There are examples, supporting research, arguments, theory, plans for elementary through graduate schools.

Over the last few years, however,

Rogers' limitation has become more vividly apparent: each time he encounters opposition from a structure or person in authority he settles for as much freedom as possible within the new constricted perimeter. That does not invalidate what he says, although it suggests that one should read Laing, The University Game (particularly McCulloch's piece), or Che Guevara as an addenda.

Teaching as a Subversive Activity has the same fear of politics. It is flashier than Rogers although less thorough.

NEW RELEASES

Conspiracy, edited by Abby Hoffman (Dell $9.5) and Tales of Hoffman (Bantam $9.5). Conspiracy contains statements by each of the Chicago Seven, Tales the edited transcript of the trial.

Also, this is new author's season at Anansi: in poetry there is Bob Flanagan (Body) who writes a compressed, puzzling, potent line, eg. Be nights alone, loose head, find reason to climb down jaws of animal normal nothing. There are also new Spiderline first novels: Michael Cawthra's Victor Vietm Rachel Wyatt's The String Box and the first English translation of Roch Carrier's 1968 Quebec novel La Guerre, Yes Sir!

George Jonas has a second volume of poetry, The Happy Hungry Man. Jonas is surprisingly witty for one whose world view is so abjectly grey. It cuts me as rather insincere, although quite clever. All the above sell at $2.50.

As well, Matt Cohen's first novel, Korsoniloff is being reprinted. We somehow never got to review it although it was quite good:

She looked at me and told me that before she had met me she had known no-one deeply and had felt alone within herself but that now she felt not only alone but isolated and that she was not sure but that she preferred the first. When she said that I felt, although guilty, relieved. I suppose it was my ambivalence that was keeping us out of contact, or so I thought, and I began to try to reassure her without being overly dishonest.

We should have reviewed it, I think, having undertaken to write book reviews at all. ($1.95)

the 'educators' rap

It seems that books on education are interesting only when they are attacking the "system." In Herbert Kohl's 36 Children, Neill's Summerhill, and various tracts by Edgar Friedenberg, John Holt, and Paul Goodman, there is a passionate outrage that gives vitality, and, it seems, validity to the criticism levelled at the public schooling. Jacques Barzun, too, though a very different kind of critic, writes wittily and penetratingly about education.

But as soon as a committee or a teacher breaks into print to tell us what education is or should be doing, and how so, the spirit departs, leaving only a lifeless corpus behind.

A splendid example of how deadly inspirational and pedagogic writing can be is provided by the Hall-Dennis Report, which is filled with banal commonplaces and redundant jargon.

Informing us that we live in an age of change, and that we must be adaptable to it (whatever that means), the committee advocates breaking down all those terrible old structures called subjects and replacing them with . . . well, I'm not sure what. There is much talk of "areas of emphasis" and of a tripartite scheme of content organization, but what is to be taught remains vague.

Still the Committee does not think that instruction is a very important function of the school anyway. More important are things like creating "sensitive human beings" with "a love of man everywhere" who will have aroused in them "the hunger for the loftiest ideals of truth (which) can be sought only in a free society." The child will "experience a program" designed to end war, wipe out poverty everywhere, profit from "Canadian multiculturalism", "en rich" (a favourite Committee word) his psychic and environmental inter-relationships and foster universal brotherhood. A formidable task!

Melvin Keene's book for beginning high school teachers, though not an unrefreshing change after the inspired (Cf. Tale of a Tub) flights of Hall-Dennis, is just as frightening. Keene has one simple thesis: the essence of teaching is keeping order.

Above all, the system must function smoothly.

The class must be kept under wraps at all times. If once they wake up, disaster may result. "Sometimes the runaway class goes to extremes of open rebellion. The students talk freely. Even get up and walk to a window." (p.92.)

At this point, Keene leaps in with the requisite seven point program which will obviate the necessity for the teacher's suicide. His whole book is, in fact, arranged in this way: point-by-point responses to such terrible educational crises as the above.

Naturally enough, this becomes extremely repetitious, and, in spite of the comic element, boring. Ultimately it is quite useless, because he never suggests what is worth teaching. Still, what else could you expect from someone who laboured on behalf of the New York City school system for 29 years?

Of course for the automaton who has no human responses of his own, this book could be useful. Advising the prospective teacher on the portentous topic of "facial expressions" (number 3 in a series of 7), Keene writes:

Don't hesitate to scowl when a student pulls a boner. Smile broadly at a clever answer. When something humorous is said, laugh. (p.62).

And what is the purpose behind all this delicate human interplay? Well, there are several aims, such as "having your students master your subject so they can pass their examinations" (the least objectionable aim, actually.) Then there is "the development of the teenager as a person. A large percentage of secondary schools now give ratings on each student's personality and character. . . It is your obligation to do whatever you can to improve the personality and character of your students. . . You are preparing teenagers for adult life." (italics in original, p. 53.)

Marjorie Hourd is obviously an enlightened teacher, or at least seems so after dealing with Mr. Keene. Her principles are, surely, unimpeachable: the paramount importance of the child's needs, and the necessity of recognizing the "wholeness" of the child's vision.

Unfortunately, after reading the book, it is difficult to recall anything specific except that the author is heavily under the spell of Gestalt psychology. And like many modern "educators" influenced by the new "sciences", Miss Hourd suffers from a certain vagueness, which is reflected in a sometimes opaque style.

The technique of teaching which she recommends is one of "knowing and yet appearing not to know, of consciousness and unconsciousness, action in inaction." To explain this, she quotes Buber:

But however intense the mutuality of giving and taking with which the teacher is bound to his pupil, inclusion cannot be mutual in this case. He experiences his pupil's being educated, but the pupil cannot experience the educating of the educator. . .

What the teacher has to do is to create a "betweenness", which is the quality that educates. "What integrates is what grows up in the course of the lesson between the pupil and the material and the teacher."

But there's more to it than that, stuff about "neogenesis", "unitary process", "polarity and ambivalence", and like that. All very fine, if only one really knew what it meant, and could use it in teaching.

Looking into books like those of Walsh and Reeves — which purport to be specific methodologies on teaching specific things — one finds surprisingly little that is of any real help. In teaching poetry, for instance, one apparently must first create a "Telaxed atmosphere" — somehow. The students must "experience the poem as a whole". Yes, of course.

Both books are filled with examples of writing by students, and comments there on. (I wonder if the kids are getting any royalties.) This certainly helps to pad out the books. Now, of course there are a few points of specific usefulness to a teacher of English, and the authors' attitudes are commendable enough. But if one were to edit these books down so that only the original and helpful ideas were left in, they would be even "slimmer volumes" than they are now.

"What none of these books does is raise the question: what is worth teaching, and why? Even more seriously, they apparently accept all the commonplace ideas of the "silent majority" on the nature of man and society. It's pretty hard to take the "educators" seriously when they believe, as the Hall-Dennis Committee states, that Man in the "technomatic age" continues to make great strides along the never-ending road of PROGRESS.

MUSIC

One of our sources for the happenings in classical music has had his phone disconnected, and the other has gone into hiding at a crucial moment, so our apologies for a rather sparse section this week.

The Opera Dept. of the Music Faculty is presenting A School for Opera, a pot-pourri of great scenes blended into a whole (review elsewhere). Tonight is the last night, 8:30 in the Johnson Building. Student tickets are $1.00. Tomorrow at 8:30, the FESTIVAL SINGERS present their third concert of the season in the Great Hall at Hart House. Guest artists will be the TORONTO WOODWIND QUIN-TET and the programme will feature compositions by Canadian composers Harry Freedman and John Weinzwieg.

Two free recitals. Anita Rundans (organ), 4:00 tomorrow (14th) at the St. Pauls Anglican Church (227 Bloor St. E), and CINDY SHUTER (flute), 12:15 Monday (16th) at the School of Music Concert Hall.

The TOM RUSH — RICHIE HAVENS concert is tonight at Massey Hall. The CLANCY BROTHERS will be in Massey on Wednesday for a post St. Patrick's Day concert.

EARL HINES finishes his stay at the Colonial this weekend. The ATLANTA BLUES BAND, last here with Big Mama Thornton, open there next week, aided by comedian PROF. IRWIN COREY. BUDDY TATE continues to play at the Cav-a-Bob. Tonight at 8:30 four highly skilled jazz musicians from the Cecil Taylor band, CHARLIE HADEN (bass), EDDIE GALES (trumpet), ANDREW CYRILLE (drums) and SAM RIVERS (sax) will present a programme of avant-garde jazz at Hart House. There are said to be jazz jam sessions at Matt Muldoons on Sundays (Queen at Sherbourne).

LEN CHANDLER is at the Riverboat through Sunday; the MALKA half of Malka and Joso opens on Tuesday. ROMPIN' RONNIE HAWKINS will be at the Hawks Nest Saturday night.

J. DAVID SLOAN plays C & W music at the Horseshoe Tavern this week, and a huge country show headlined by PORTER WAGGONER, DOLLY PARTON, and DAVID HOUSTON is coming into Massey Hall on March 21st, a week from Saturday.

THEATRE

The last Review digest of theatrical press releases, posters, advertisements, scrawls and phone calls proudly pitches the following:

THIS WEEKEND

University Alumnae Dramatic Club last night opened America Hurrah, an alumnus (-a, -um?) of off-off-Broadway of the 1960's. Written by Jean-Claude van Itallie and directed by Phyllis Benvenuto, the trilogy of plays will be performed at 8:30 through 21 March, with Sundays and Mondays dark, in Central Library Theatre. $2 tickets for students can be reserved at 653-2248.

Up St. George St. at the new University College Theatre, Pinter's The Dwarfs and A Night Out, directed by Jeremy Hole, alternate with Beckett's Endgame and Act Without Words I, directed by John Astington, on Thursdays through Sundays for the rest of this month. Phone 928-6307 to check the performance schedule or to reserve a student ticket for $1. 8:30 curtain, with Saturday and Sunday matinees at 2:30.

Tomorrow night at 8:30 in Hart House Theatre, Judy Jarvis, graduate of the U of T and Mary Wigman's dance school in Pianist-composer Cecil Taylor, above, will NOT appear tonight at Hart House. But the rest of his band will. You may expect some very strong (I think that's the right term) music from this quartet, 8:30 p.m. in the Great Hall, tickets free from the Hall Porter. Thanks to the Music Committee of Hart House for some good concerts this year.

West Berlin, performs a "solo contemporary dance concert" which she has choreographed herself.

At 6:00 and 9:00 tomorrow and Sunday nights, Sophocles' Oedipus the King will be performed in Burton auditorium at York University. The company, directed by Michael Gregory, is that of Glendon College's performing arts programme.

NEXT WEEK

Shakespeare's notorious Titus Andronicus turns up Tuesday in the Drama Centre's studio lab theatre on Glenmorris Street. The evening will include a seminar and demonstration, directed by visiting lecturer John Russell Brown of the University of Birmingham and performed by Drama Centre students. Doors open at 8:00.

Friday the 19th through Sunday the 21st finds West Side Story in Hart House Theatre, courtesy the New College Drama Guild. Director and choreographer of this production is David Yarwood.

And down at the O'Keefe, Carol Channing and 10 Stout-Hearted Men will be dishing out what the press release terms "special musical delight filled with songs, comedy and dances" from 16 March to the 28.

WORTH WAITING FOR

Theatre Passe Muraille opens A Bond Honoured on 26 March at 11 Trinity Square. (Phone 366-3376.) Reconstructed by John Osborne from Lope de Vega' La Fianza Satisfcha, the play will be directed by Ashleigh Moorehouse and performed at 8:30 Tuesday through Saturday nights. Student tickets cost $2.

FILM

This being the last issue of the Review and such, here is the program being offered by Cinema Lumiere and The Cinematheque until the beginning of April.

At Cinema Lumiere this weekend . . . A Matter of Resistance. March 16 & 17, Sergio Leone's Once Upon a Time in the West, March 18 & 19, Louis Malle's The Thief of Paris. March 20 & 21 Rachel, Rachel directed by Paul Newman (and not to be missed), March 22, Roger Corman's The Trip. March 23, a Cinema Lumiere first . . . presenting, Penn, Polanski and Boorman — A Small Festival plus Catch Us If You Can (Having a Wild Weekend) directed by John Boorman, March 24, Repulsion by (who else) Roman Polanski. March 25, Arthur Penn's The Left Handed Gun. March 26, Penn's previous film, The Chase. March 27, Point Blank. March 28, Cul de Sac and on March 29, The Fearless Vampire Killers, both by Polanski. Penn's Mickey One, March 30 and Boorman's Hell In the Pacific, March 31. April 1-4, Lindsay Anderson's If . . . (another, not-to-be-missed or a to-be-seen-again). And on April 5-7, Francois Trufaut's Jules et Jim. Also note, Cinema Lumiere's new prices — Monday $1.00, Tuesday to Thursday $1.25, Friday to Sunday and Holidays, $1.50.

At The Cinematheque tonight, Captain Blood, starring Errol Flynn, Olivia de Havilland and Basil Rathbone. March 20, My Man Godfrey, directed by Gregory LeCava. April 3 (there will be no showing on March 27), Josef von Sternberg's The Scarlet Empress with Marlene Dietrich. April 10, The Man Who Came to Dinner with Bette Davis. April 17, Fritz Lang's Ministry of Fear and on April 24, Leo McCarey's The Awful Truth.

Rumour has it that U of T will play host to a major cinematic happening in the near future. A guaranteed mind-expanding, psycheliberating experience for one and all, folks. A clue . . . the film premiered in North America at the San Francisco Film Festival several months ago.

Managed to see Mash this week and it is everything that distributors have claimed it to be. ~~Mash - some show in Toronto~~ to restore your faith in the U.S. and convinces you that if rules are wrong, the only reasonable thing to do is to ignore them. It is, as they say, a beautiful film. Donald Sutherland is superb.

daycare centres are desperately needed'

Over the past few months I have been researching the progress of day care nurseries and their development throughout Canadian cities by combing the files of Toronto's newspapers. Your report in today's Varsity was sadly ironic to me, because the treatment that our day care centre is undergoing has been all too common among centres of its type throughout the past decade. It seems that most of the group efforts put forth by concerned working mothers to secure adequate care for their children are being consistently dealt the crapped-up end of the stick by big business.

In 1966, parents from Flemingdon Park in North York had energetically set up a co-operative nursery, one that requires the most amount of initiative and participation from the parents themselves. At first the developers of the area were glad to provide them with space for a nursery in the nearby shopping mall.

But the housing section of the development was bought out by the Ontario Housing Corp., and the previous owners suddenly lost interest in their former tenants and booted their nursery out of the mall. The OHC offered the school a converted home; but then came another stumbling block — North York bylaws wouldn't allow day nurseries in homes. The hard working parents continued to fight and finally accepted the kind offer of a Church in Don Mills.

This is, of course, only one of many examples I could have chosen; and even if I didn't tell you, you can imagine what kind of treatment welfare workers and lower-middle class working mothers are getting. I don't care what your feelings are as to whether these mothers should be allowed to have more than one child (in this income bracket) or not; the point is these children exist and they deserve to wear a smile in a healthy environment.

Why condemn these children to crowded mudholes and dangerous streets when reasonably simple, community efforts can provide adequate playgrounds and schools with plenty of room and new creative things to explore?

That useless expressway THEY want to build is like a kick in the groin to most of the city's parents who realize how difficult it is already to get proper space for their children in our crowded city.

This University could set a much-needed precedent by giving aid to the Campus Day Centre both in the areas of financing, and research into the future bettering of the proposed facilities. The University is an employer of women, and women who play important roles in all of our lives. There is just a prayer that other businesses might follow such a helpful example.

In the U.S.S.R. state owned nurseries are located close to where the mothers work, so that the mothers can perform the very important task of nursing during morning and afternoon breaks. (Maybe I shouldn't mention that; it might only confirm some rightist masculine notions that women working in responsible positions is a communist plot.)

The Kibbutz communes in Israel, if they have demonstrated anything, have shown that when both parents can work in the community during the day without worries for their children's care they are able to provide the children with more love and parental attention when the work day is over. They appreciate the children more when the day is not filled with nagging home problems; and there aren't too many of us here who would deny that personal troubles at home can cause serious difficulties when it comes to growing up.

If anyone has read this much and hasn't seen the relevance of this to his or her own life; just stop a moment and take a decade into the future. With the Pill and other acceptable birth controls those of us who might wish to have kids certainly are not thinking about such an event in the near future — but, if you have them now or in ten years, would you want to see your wife go to seed because she is forced to give up some creative task that she enjoys, or as a mother to see yourself treating your own children poorly because your nerves have gone bad. I'm not condemning the ordinary form of motherhood, because for some people that can be honestly beautiful (and I don't say that with condescension); but you don't need the WLF to tell you that the role of women is constantly changing.

Believe me, there are many intelligent reasons why day care is important for children of mothers in many differing social and economical brackets. And serious valid research is presently being done to make the day nursery as creative an experience as the child might want.

I noticed Sarah Spinks name in the Varsity article, and I can tell you without looking at my reference notes from the Toronto newspapers that she has worked extremely hard over the past four years to accomplish what she has on this campus and in other city areas. She and the others who work with her need the support of those of us who believe that this changing society, whether by evolution or revolution, requires the love and co-operative human care of all individuals. This is no "taking candy from a baby" joke; help is needed.

Peace...

'your pants should be pulled'

Dear Mr. Wernick,

I do not wish to debate with you or to quarrel with you. I find myself thoroughly disgusted with your opinions and your wisdom. But I recognize your right and privilege as a human being, to express whatever is on your mind. You quite adequately condemn yourself when you boast "those... for peace and love are reactionary." And for this, I thank you.

You also add your support to the popular movements in the Middle East (or Arab Guerillas, as you clarify) "TO SMASH the State of Israel as it is currently constituted." Of course you realize that the smashing of the State of Israel means the murder and the killing of not only every Jewish man, woman, and child there, but, as well, of anyone who even remotely shows some obscure link to Judaism. This being the case, and if that time should ever come, do you really believe that your political views would save you?

Pull down your pants, and take a good look at your penis "as IT is currently constituted."

jew as anti-semitic

I am writing this letter in response to Andy Wernick's piece of verbal diarrhea in Wednesday's Varsity. He proves once and for all that not all Jews are Zionists; he even shows us that his type of militant Jew makes the best anti-Semite. How can he bother to state that "although I support popular movements in the Middle East to smash Israel as it is currently constituted, I do not, of course support any kind of race war waged against Jews as such..." when he knows that the slogan of "Drive the Jews into the sea" is being broadcasted by the Arab propagandists. Is he blinding himself to the fact that one Israeli defeat means instant death to all the Jews in Israel? Or is he more concerned with the slogan "All Power to the People"?

I wish to know what people he means — nouveau riche bourgeoisie or racists like biased (pseudo-) revolutionaries?

James I. Rubin New College

wernick replies

(1) You don't combat anti-semitism by supporting the oppression of another semitic group.

(2) Some blacks say "kill whitey"; they have got things wrong. That does not turn me into an opponent of an autonomous black struggle for liberation. In such a case I would be a racist.

50 socialist slogan - chanters at Queens buy time for Edwards

KINGSTON (CUP) — Approximately 50 students, chanting "power to the people," broke up a special meeting of the Queen's University Senate Wednesday. The disruption forced the body to postpone retaliation against doctoral student Charles Edwards and two others who last December charged chemical engineering professor Henry Becker with political blackmail.

Wednesday's Senate meeting was a continuation of that held February 25, when the Senate accepted the report of a special committee that investigated charges made by Edwards and the two other students: Tom Good and Glen MacDonell.

The committee found Becker "utter innocent" of charges that he attempted to force Edwards out of his doctoral program because of his left-wing political activities.

At the prior meeting, the Senate forcibly ejected Terry O'Hara, Edwards' representative on the investigating committee, after O'Hara demanded that Edwards be present during the presentation of the committee report.

Edwards and other members of the left-wing Free Socialist Movement, which conducted his defence, have since denounced the report as a "whitewash" of the incident.

At the Wednesday meeting, David Slater, Dean of Graduate Studies and Research, introduced a motion calling for support of the investigation committee report, a "request that Mr. Edwards be taken from the registration of Queen's," and a suggestion to censure Good and MacDonell for their part in bringing forward accusations against Becker.

When the Senate over-ruled an attempt to disallow Slater's motion on the grounds it was "out of order at this time," 10 students rose from their seats in the Senate spectator's gallery, chanting "This is out of order... This Senate is acting out of order."

Other members of the Free

Socialist Movement, who had been picketing the meeting, pushed through the doors of the Senate chambers, and eventually 50 students blocked the entrance to the chamber.

Senate chairman John Deutsch adjourned the meeting and called another for next week. The next meeting will be closed to the public.

As they left the room, senators ran through a gauntlet of protestors, who raised their arms in Nazi and black power salutes, chanting "Seig Heil," and "Power to the People"

Meggs matriculates

It was announced today that Geoff Meggs (II Innis) was proclaimed to the post of Editor of the Review for the academic year 1970-71. Meggs, 19, was pleased and delighted.

"No, I'm not 19 yet," Meggs commented, "But I'd like you to leave that in."

SAC voting and acclamations

Nominations for SAC reps at UC, St. Mikes and New College close today at 5:00 p.m. Nominations at Vic close Monday, 5 p.m. Forms are available in the student council offices in each constituency. Elections are scheduled for Thurs., March 19.

There are 5 seats available at both UC and Vic while 4 seats are up for grabs at SMC and New.

Several constituencies have already held SAC elections. Winning at Scarborough were incumbent Rob Stewart (II Scar), Kathy De Zorzi (II Scar), Mike Hofstetter (II Scar) and Linda Joyce (I Scar).

In Engineering, incumbent Bill Palmer (III APSC), Michael Lee (I APSC), Derek Smith (II APSC), David Slater (II APSC) and John Brouwer (III APSC) were victorious.

Acclamations in Dentistry saw current SAC External Affairs Commissioner Peter Gold (II Dents) and Wayne Pulver (I Dents) returned to office.

In Architecture Barry Sampson (III Arch) was also acclaimed, while in Law, Craig Perkins (I Law) won in a three-way fight.

Acclamations were also the order of the day at Innis, where incumbent Peter Boswell (II Innis) was returned, in Nursing where newcomer Alison McInnis (II Nurs) will take a seat next year, in Pharmacy where Glenda Barkwell will be back for another year, and at Erindale where Philip Dack (II Erin) and Bill Cooper (I Erin) faced no opposition.

Peter Adams (9) flips the puck over SMC goalie Tom McNally for Vic's second goal in interfac playoff action last night. The goal gave Vic a short-lived advantage as St. Mike's came back to win 4-2. Second game in the series is Monday at 5:30 in Varsity Arena. photo by jim cowan

Breaks help SMC down Vic 4-2

A successful shot and an awarded goal gave St. Michael's College A's a 4-2 victory over Victoria College I yesterday in the first game of the interfac hockey finals.

St. Mike's took an early lead on a first period goal by Don Pagnutti when Vic netminder Rick Porter was caught out of his net after a mixup around the crease. For most of the first period it looked as if Vic would be run out of the rink by the tight forechecking and stand-up defence of SMC.

But Vic stormed back in the second, taking the play to St. Mike's, and scoring two goals in five minutes to take a 2-1 lead. Dave Sharpe scored on a quick shot from close in at 4:35 of the period, then came back to assist on Peter Adams' goal at 8:55.

Minutes later, Paul Noble tied the score for SMC, scoring on a long screen shot that beat Porter on his stick side.

The two teams played head-to-head hockey for most of the second and third periods, but two breaks cost Vic the game. At 1:50, a pile-up around the Vic net ended with a Scarlet and Gold defenseman lying on the puck in the crease. On the following penalty shot, Fred Merlocco skated in close to deke Porter and flip the puck over his pads into the net.

Both teams missed good chances in the last period. A St. Mike's marksman beat Porter but his shot rattled along the crossbar and stayed out. At the other end, Jack Fraser let go a waist high drive that caromed off a post.

Then with just 15 seconds left and Porter out of the Vic net in favour of an extra forward, a St. Mike's forward got a partial breakaway at centre and as he crossed the blueline a Vic player stabbed at the puck and dropped his stick. The officials rules that he had thrown his stick in an attempt to deflect the puck and awarded a goal to SMC.

The finals are decided on a strange system whereby the first team to accumulate four points wins. This means a team could win with two victories or one victory and two ties. SMC picked up two points last night, next game in the series is Monday at 5:30 p.m. in Varsity Arena.

UC, Vic meet in interfac B-ball final

BULLETIN

A late second half rally earned the UC basketballers a hard-fought 70-63 victory over Vic in the first game of the interfac finals played at Hart House last night.

The UC crew coached by Ivan Betcherman held a slim 36-35 lead at the half.

But, Vic came on early in the second and at one point opened up a 52-44 lead. Paced by the fine shooting of guard Mike Betcherman the UCers fought back to gain the victory before a good sized crowd.

Scoring — UC — Betcherman (Mike) 18, Sternberg (Allan) 15, Pascht 11, Sternberg (Ron) 10. Vic — Stevens 18, Tonisson 17, Ehan 12.

By PETER WHITE

The interfaculty basketball championship tournament is now narrowed down to a field of two: UC I will meet surprising Vic I in the final.

The finals are a best two out of three series. Second game is at 12:30 p.m. next Tuesday and the third if necessary will be played on Thursday at 7 p.m. All games are in the Hart House gym.

In the two game total point semi-final series UC outlasted St. Mike's, winning both games and the round by a 177-161 count, and Vic 1 surprised Meds 4 129-115. Vic blew Meds into oblivion with an opening game 65-48 drubbing.

Vic has to be the season's shockers. After a slow start, during which their record once stood 5-7, under the leadership of Dave Horner and Mike Eben they have come back to win five of their last six and now pose a serious challenge to UC supremacy.

Vic coach Mendy Hersh credits the ascension of his squad to a change from the fast-break game to a ball control style and board game which is more suited to his starting five which averages six foot three inches. To beat the good shooting minutemen of UC he figures to dog them into early fouls forcing them to go with their short benchmen. One thing is certain — you can expect a physical game predicated on ball control from Hersh's big men.

UC led by several ex-Blues including Jack Pascht and Bump Betcherman pose a formidable offensive threat. They have been the class of the league to date and it now is left to Vic to determine whether they shall remain so. A betting man would have to put his money on it but since jocks and bettors have seen better days together the best advice is to get out and see for yourself what's what.

UC's forte has been balance and they will have to work damned hard to maintain it against the huge physical presence of Vic on the tiny Hart House floor.

SAC supports day care centre demands

The SAC Wednesday night threw its support behind the demands of the Campus Community Cooperative Day Care Centre.

The Centre had demanded that the university administration take on the responsibility for providing adequate quarters if the project is evicted from its present site at 12 Sussex.

The Council also called on the administration to find more suitable accommodation at a nominal rent and pay for renovations, as requested by the Centre workers.

Meanwhile Keele Gregory, Administrative Assistant to Vice president (non-Academic) Alex Rankin, said in an interview yesterday no commitment had ever been given to the day-care centre, besides allowing it to remain until last October.

Day-care centre officials say Rankin had assured them they could count on the Sussex house at least until the end of May.

Gregory, whose office is in charge of supervising the matter, said Wednesday he didn't know anything about Mr. Rankin's statement.

"I've been acquainted with the matter from the beginning and I know nothing about Mr. Rankin's commitment," he said, promising to check into the question.

Mr. Gregory said his reluctance to allow the day-care centre an extended stay on Sussex stemmed from the university's commitment to the Huron-Sussex Residents Association to encourage family use of area homes.

The University has just demolished 10 houses along Spadina Ave. in the Huron-Sussex block.

Mr. Gregory said he hand't thought about asking the residents if they wanted the day-care centre to continue in their neighborhood.

"I'm not contemplating discussing it with them, but one could do anything," he added.

Common room is liberated

About 15 students invaded the senior common room of University College yesterday for afternoon tea with the faculty.

The common room has traditionally been "faculty only" but SAC Rep. Tony Usher (III UC) called the action another move in the liberation struggle which began with the integration of staff washrooms.

Included in the group were such notables as Campbell Committee member Rick MacDowell (IV UC), UC College Council members Sally Hill (III UC) and Art Stein (IV UC), UC SAC Rep Art Moses (III UC).

Given the rare opportunity of having tea with such a prestigious group, both faculty members present when the students entered left within five minutes.

One cup of tea and two biscuits cost twenty cents. Most of the students felt the tea was excellent, but that the biscuits were terrible.

Blissfully unaware of the daycare centre's imminent fate, this baby sat idly by as Varsity photographer Errol Young photographed him at the Sussex Ave. building yesterday. photo by errol young

SAC ups fees to $13, sets campus centre levy

By LAURA KELLY

SAC increased student fees by $1 at its meeting Wednesday, to augment the budget by $10,000. Fees will now be $13. There will be an additional levy of $1 per student to set up a Campus Centre fund. Both will be effective September, 1970.

Craig Heron (IV UC), SAC Education Commissioner, defended the raise: "We now have the lowest fees across Canada, we're the largest campus, and in the last two years we've lost revenue from GSU, Erindale, and Scarborough."

"I think we'll have the roof cave in around our heads if we raise fees. It will do irreparable damage," said vice-president elect Eric Miglin (II APSC).

Earlier, Bob James, Finance Commissioner, presented his budget priorities paper, which emphasized educational programs and showed cuts in cultural affairs allotments, and opened the floor to discussion.

Brian Tanney (IV Meds), Cultural Affairs Commissioner, mesmerized the council with his critique of SAC.

STILL DON'T LISTEN

"We've taken it upon ourselves to teach students to take a critical approach to their social milieu, but then we don't listen to people with criticisms different from ours," Tanney said.

Tanney suggested that SAC focus on campus problems and organizations next year, especially course unions, rather than stressing community action.

"Barkwell's idea of a worker-student alliance is a bloody good one, but students aren't ready for it. We have to back off a little bit and get students thinking about their own lives," said Tanney.

He emphasized the fact that SAC has a function at U of T. "I think somehow we have to get this university moving, and not by just sitting on committees," he said.

SAC rep Bill Palmer, (III APSC), opposed the priorities paper: "People are evil capitalists, they're going to say if I don't get anything for my money, you're not going to get my money."

THE END

"We can't accept this paper. It would mean the end of SAC," said Palmer.

"You'd be fools to prostitute yourselves to the people," retorted Tanney.

The issue of whether spending should centre around campus political organizations rather than social affairs or community involvement, finally went unresolved as the council voted to accept James' priorities paper as a guideline for further budget discussion.

SAC expenditures have become inflated due to added allocations for a student legal aid service, student tenants union, hart house farm renovations, student film making facilities, university arts festival, and Radio

Varsity television productions; coupled with increased allocations to course unions, the engineering society's educational program, pollution probe, and campus clubs.

March 18 is the date set for formal discussion of the SAC budget.

SAC also moved to send a letter of condolence to students at the University of Manitoba on the occasion of the appointment of U of T's Dean of Graduate Studies, Ernest Sirluck, as president there.

SAC is blasted for inaction on Spadina

Alan Powell, chairman of the Stop Spadina-Save Our City Co-ordinating Committee (SSOCCC), berated SAC at their Wednesday evening meeting for their lack of student leadership on the Spadina issue.

SAC responded by calling a rally in Convocation Hall, followed by a march to Queen's Park, to be held on March 18.

"There were so many things you could have done, like spending the night on June Marks' lawn. This is your bag, isn't it?" said Powell. Powell thanked SAC for its contribution of $950, but, he said, "the contribution was like sending a dollar off to Biafra."

The council called an organizational meeting yesterday afternoon and decided that the rally should represent the entire University community, and should oppose the expressway because of its potential effect on the city as well as the U of T campus.

SPADINA : WHERE IT'S AT

The SAC and The Stop Spadina Save Our City Coordinating Committee has organized a demonstration against what they term "another step in the destruction of the inner core of the city." The committee will hold a rally at 1 p.m. in Convocation Hall today and then march on Queen's Park to ask the provincial government "to intercede with the powers-that-be of City Hall, on our behalf, to halt the construction of the Spadina Expressway."

By LIZ WILLOCK

Eight years ago, "Big Daddy" Frederick Gardiner kept Metro Council up until five in the morning in order to push through the original proposal for the 401 Cloverleaf and the first part of the Spadina Expressway.

It was part of a deal whereby the province, with the support of Eaton's and Simpson Sears, and the Developers of Yorkdale Shopping Centre, would build the 401 Cloverleaf if the Metro Corporation would agree to build the Expressway from the 401 to Lawrence Ave.

At that time, citizen opposition forced Gardiner to pass a very modified proposal, which did not include the Crosstown Expressway or even the full Spadina route as now proposed. As director of the Foundation Company, whose subsidiary, Fenco-Harris Engineering, were consultants for the project, he stood to gain a very great deal from expressway construction.

Since that time the scope and cost of the Spadina proposal have mushroomed. In 1964, the Metro Transportation Plan recommended the Crosstown, the Christy-Grace Extension of the 400, the Richview, as well as the southern extension of the Spadina.

Once again, Metro Council prepares to take a vote on Spadina. Again, citizen protest has burgeoned, and the proposal is being modified and watered down to placate fears of the irate citizenry.

NO CROSTOWN??

We are told that there will be no Crosstown. However, Hans Blumenfeld, consultant for the 1964 Plan, says that without the Crosstown, the Spadina will not work.

We are told that the Spadina proposal will make possible new forms of public transportation and rapid transit. But the construction of the Spadina is virtually a rejection of the transit-oriented system which was the 1964 alternative to the Expressway system.

Calculations made by David Nowlan in The Bad Trip indicate that such a transit system would cost $912 million less than the system of which Spadina is a part. Reallocation of that amount of money could provide a lot of homes for a lot of people, or any of a number of community and people oriented projects.

Instead, the Expressway will cost one and a quarter billion dollars. The Spadina alone will expropriate one thousand homes. It will disrupt whole inner city communities — the Annex, the Chinese community south of College, and Kensington Market.

It will destroy the jobs of 23,000 workers in the Spadina garment industry south of College. As the system develops, it will force more and more people from their homes into the sterile box life of the high rise.

GOODBYE INNER CITY

It will destroy the inner core of this city as we know it.

The Spadina Expressway alone will have a very severe effect on whatever sense of community presently exists at this university.

The long overdue Cass and Wronski Reports indicate that the southern terminus of the Expressway will be Willcocks Avenue. The Reports admit that the volume of traffic discharged at the southern terminus will exceed the capacity of the Willcocks intersection.

The widening of Willcocks and the construction of the Expressway proper alone will prohibit the construction of the Campus Centre on the present site at Huron and Willcocks. It will make inroads on the College of Education extension, the Connaught Laboratories, the Centre for Criminology, New College and many others.

The increased flow of traffic on university precinct streets will sever the campus into a series of isolated blocks separated by high speed death traps like the Queen's Park Crescent.

THREAT TO U OF T

The Students Administrative Council, with lukewarm support from the administration, has long been agitating for the closure or submersion of St. George in hopes of uniting the segments of this already fragmented campus. The Spadina Expressway poses a much more potent threat to both campus and community.

The SAC, working with Stop Spadina Save Our City Co-ordinating Committee, has called a rally today at 1 p.m. at Convocation Hall to protest the building of the expressway.

The council has taken a strong anti-Spadina position and will be presenting a brief to the Metro Transportation Committee next month.

The Association of Teaching Staff has expressed opposition as has President Bissell. The Board of Governors, which opposes the expressway only as far as it affects the university, has taken no strong public stand.

The rally will demand that the Board of Governors call for a halt to expressway construction until a full scale review of the project can be undertaken. It will ask them to take a stand behind the citizens of this city.

MARCH ON QUEEN'S PARK

Following the rally, there will be a march on Queen's Park. The provincial government not only initiated the project, it is footing half the bill. The march will demand that the provincial government put its foot down to halt construction pending further study of alternatives.

Contrary to rumour, the university is not in the vanguard of the expressway opposition. In fact, aside from the ever present buttons, there has been little activity emanating from this campus.

The SSSOCC, with its student minority, is co-ordinating about 150 briefs for presentation to the Transportation Committee.

It has been holding anti-Spadina strategy sessions with citizens' and ratepayers' groups from across the city. Members of SSSOCC feel that the upsurge in opposition to the expressway from the people of Toronto is beginning to exert considerable pressure on the politicians at City Hall.

JUDAIC STUDIES

IN THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

In 1970-71 the University will offer a much-expanded selection of courses in Judaic Studies. The programme is intended for both specialists and students who wish to take only one or two of the courses. It is planned that specialists in Judaic Studies may take the third year of the programme at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Among the courses available are:

Recommended First-Year Preparation

Introductory Modern Hebrew
Medieval Jewish History to 1789 (Projected)
Introduction to Judaism
Classics of the Jewish Tradition in Translation

Second-Year Programme

Introductory Aramaic-Syriac
Intermediate Modern Hebrew
Intermediate Classical Hebrew
Modern Jewish History, 1789 to the Present (Projected) Early Biblical Literature in Translation

Third and Fourth-Year Programmes

Intermediate Aramaic
Philosophy of Judaism
Medieval and Modern Hebrew Literature
Literature of Israel in Translation,
ca. 600 B.C.E. to C.E.200
Modern Hebrew Literature in Translation
Prophetic Literature and Thought
The Psalms

Committees negotiate to transform English Department

By MARY BASTEDO

Efforts to transform the structure of the Combined Departments of English, giving students voting participation in decision making and streamlining the process of government, approach a delicate stage this week as two different committees, each with a set of recommendations, negotiate before the final meeting of the Combined Departments on April 6.

In the present unwieldy structure of the department, all of the 160 faculty members (lecturers and above) are automatically voting members of the Combined Departments. Sixteen students also have voting privileges in the Combined Departments.

The impetus for change came last April when a meeting of the Combined Departments, attended by 100 irate English students, passed a resolution "to accept the principle of student voting participation in the decision making of the department."

At that time a staff-student committee, made up of 12 students and six faculty members, was asked to implement the principle of student participation.

The staff-student committee "went beyond what it was asked to do," commented chairman of the Combined Departments, Prof. George Falle. "But there was no opposition."

"Rather than just adding students onto the present structures, which we felt were inadequate anyway, we found it necessary to restructure the whole department," said Kenneth Owen (IV Trin), co-chairman of the staff-student committee.

In December the staff-student committee submitted its report to the general committee of the Combined Departments — a committee made up of the six college chairmen, the chairman and secretary of the Combined Departments and seven faculty members. The general committee responded by setting up a sub-committee of five people to draw up a second report.

Chairman of that sub-committee, Prof. J. R. Jackson, commented, "It seemed to us the report of the staff-student committee was not a wholly practical document."

The two committees met Saturday to try to reconcile their reports. The meeting was declared closed and a Varsity reporter was asked to leave the meeting.

"In principle the two reports are very much in agreement," said Chairman George Falle in a Varsity interview. "It is simply in working out some of the details that both committees will have to go back to their drawing boards."

Prof. A. M. Leggatt, co-chairman of the staff-student committee and a member of the general committee, agreed.

"They both recognize the need for something representative, in the matter of elections for both faculty and student members. Both agree that there should be some student representation, and both recognize that for efficiency we need a small elected body and not just everybody," he said.

Other members of the department see the two reports as more radically opposed to each other.

"The general committee's report is not entirely, not even primarily, concerned with the problem of student representation," said Prof. Barbara Martineau, a member of the staff-student committee.

"The chief intent of the general committee's report is to propose an effective means of reforming the present inefficient structure of the department.

"The result of the staff-student report is a rather messy structure in which the chief goal is peaceful co-operation and understanding between the various interest groups." (i.e. junior faculty, senior faculty, students, administrators.)

"The general committee report proposes a structure which is centralized and efficient and eliminates many of the organizational problems that would still remain with the staff-student committee's report but it doesn't ensure broad representation, especially of any dissenting voices.

"Efficiency and democracy are not always compatible," she added. "In fact they sometimes work against each other."

Prof. Douglas Hill, another member of the staff-student committee, agreed that the report of his committee sets up a structure which is "pretty decentralized" whereas the general committee's proposal is "incredibly centralized."

"But that's not necessarily bad," he added. "If the representation on it is good, it doesn't matter if it's centralized. If it's the right kind of centralization, i.e. if it represents all the people concerned, in the thing, it's alright."

"I would much prefer to see our report, but rather than see nothing I'd accept a compromise," he said.

A series of amendments to the general committee's report has been proposed by the staff-student committee and is now the basis for discussion.

"We've pretty well abandoned our own report," said student member of the staff-student committee, Thomas Schofield (III UC).

"But I'm still concerned that decisions be made by a representative body.

"I haven't given up the idea of representivity for the sake of efficiency.

"There are things in the CUG model that should be included — openness of meetings, high percentage of student participation, representivity and the idea of compromise over conflict.

"Many people feel the centralization proposed by CUG would be a bad idea but, except for issues like hiring and firing, the combined departments is already quite centralized, deciding about examinations and curriculum for example."

"I think we can reach an agreement," he said. "I personally would be happy enough to see a compromise but I think students as a whole should have a chance to voice their opinion, since only 16 students will have a say in the Combined Departments."

"The amendments for the most part are moderate and sensible," said Prof. Jackson, chairman of the sub-committee.

"What I would fear is that if many of the amendments are passed it will be exceedingly difficult to pass the thing in the Combined Departments."

Prof. Michael Millgate, a member of the sub-committee, commented on the reports: "Both reports are serious attempts to get at the problem of providing an effective government for a very large, diverse and widely distributed department in a form which will combine all groups within the department, and yet avoid the creation of a rigidly centralized structure which is totally unresponsive to the individual faculty members and students."

The two committees will continue their deliberations in closed sessions. Access to the two reports has been denied.

Prof. Falle expressed fears that if an agreement is not reached between the two committees, both reports will be tabled until next year, when the department will be in a weaker position to resist CUG recommendations for more centralized, uniform departments.

"If we are agreed, we have a real position of strength at the Combined Departments meeting" commented Thom Schofield.

"If the two committees cannot reach an agreement together there might be a solidifying of positions around the extreme points."

"The most conservative thing that can happen," said Prof. Legatt, "is that both reports will be thrown back, but that would not be the end of it. Pressure for change from within the department is irresistible."

Whatever recommendations the two committees come up with, they will be presented to the Combined Departments on Monday April 6 at an open meeting in the Convocation Hall at Trinity College at 4 p.m.

Art of Manipulation

The tensions of this campus are managed by a collaboration of administration, faculty, and student bureaucrats. They talk to each other and keep the students in the dark.

Secrecy is maintained by closed meetings, censorship, statements of meaningless rhetoric, and overtly manipulative strategy. All in the name of the general good of the students.

Like the commercial press, The Varsity often concurs in the general mystification of students. Credibility. Integrity. Responsibility. Those are the bywords of journalism that are more of often than not the rationalizations for obscurity and myth.

That's the case in the story by Mary Bastedo on page three of today's Varsity entitled, "Committees Negotiate to Transform English Department".

The story leaves the impression that there are no serious conflicts in the English Department. Everything's groovy. It omits the two most vital facts about recent developments:

- what happened at Saturday's joint meeting of the General Committee and Staff-Student Committee of the Combined Departments of English;

- any explanation of why the reporter was ejected from the meeting and forbidden to write about the two and a half hours of it she had attended unnoticed.

Those two aspects of the reporter's own experience and the fact that they were omitted tell directly what the final story obscured — the paranoia of the faculty and the manipulative secrecy of committee negotiations.

In face of threats and pressure from the faculty, particularly Prof. David Hoeniger, Mary Bastedo promised not to report the meeting. Instead she wrote a bland history of the student reform "movement" in English at U of T. She was forced to write around the story. Caught between her forced promise and a belief in principled journalism, she chose the former.

Saturday's meeting discussed two reports: from the staff-student committee, which proposed a parity-style structure for the department, and the other from the General Committee, which proposed a structure of roughly one third students and two thirds faculty.

The faculty on the committee became paranoid that the conflict between these two proposals might filter down to the students.

Here's what happened as Mary related it to me:

- The committee members discovered I was there just before lunch (after two and a half hours), when the eyes-noes-abstentions didn't add up to the number of bodies present;

- After lunch Prof. George Falle, the chairman of the meeting, brought up the question of whether or not I should be there;

- It was argued that the event wasn't newsworthy because the reports were just preliminary and nothing final was or could be decided.

- Some of the faculty from the General Committee objected to the reports being made public.

- People objected to the idea that they would be quoted when they didn't know they were being quoted.

- One professor said my reporting was bound to be inaccurate ("we're only human") because she noticed I wasn't taking shorthand.

- Prof. Hoeniger stood up and ("I don't like to say this but...") said that last year I had written a story in which he was interviewed. "I was called a bibliophile and grandfather. I am a bibliophile. I'm not a grandfather. In fact, I think today I may have been acting quite youthfully..."

- Hoeniger threatened to resign from the committee unless three conditions were met: 1. I leave the meeting; 2. I leave my notes behind me; 3. nothing appear in The Varsity about the meeting.

- Hoeniger left the room, with one other faculty member, for 10 minutes.

- I argued I had been invited to the meeting by some student members of the staff-student committee — who had assumed the meeting was open.

- Others agreed they thought the meeting was open.

- Richard Wright (a student member) said he would have to leave if it wasn't, for his course union followed CUG's policy of open meetings.

- There was no consensus as to whether the meeting was closed or open, or whether or not the reports were supposed to have been circulated (i.e. shown to anyone else).

- People accused me of acting in bad faith by not letting it be known that I was from The Varsity from the beginning ("an unfortunate misunderstanding").

- Prof. Hoeniger returned. He repeated his threat to resign. He was very angry. I left at that point, saying I wouldn't have left under ordinary circumstances. But I did, since there was a misunderstanding that was interpreted as bad faith.

- After I left, the meeting decided its next meeting this Friday would be closed.

The faculty were not the only pressure group on the reporter. The two students on the committee — Richard Wright and Tom Schofield — asked her to write a mild story that would not alienate the faculty. They wished to re-establish "trust" and "good faith", and hoped to reduce the faculty's paranoia — part of a strategy of co-operation and compromise.

But why compromise yourself to intimidation and secrecy in order to build a relationship of "good faith" founded upon the refusal to deal with the real conflict between faculty and students, in fact, upon the policy of ignoring student needs?

- Students should organize around the experience of students, not the hysteria of faculty.

Through compromising with reactionary faculty, a student elite win some "power" in the department. But when the process that establishes such power ignores students, the use of that power will also ignore students. Because students will not have any power. Just the elite — who have never bothered to talk to students. Meanwhile students don't know what's going on because all the cracks have been smoothed over with rhetoric, myth, and secrecy.

Smoothing over the cracks and servicing the needs of an elite are the games played by the commercial press. And often the student press — which has had trouble struggling out of its traditional role as an innovative but parochial version of the commercial press.

The principle of a student press must be to create an alternate to the commercial press, not a miniature of it. That means breaking down structures of journalism which traditionally abstract from reality and mystify it...consistently in one direction: maintenance of the status quo.

By leaving the abstraction on page three and putting the facts on the editorial page (just-my-own-opinion-of-course), you flip the medium.

There will be another joint meeting of the English staff-student committee and the General Committee Friday at 7:30 p.m. in Trinity College in the Combinations Room.

It's a closed meeting. If English students think it should be open, they should meet at 1 p.m. Friday at 91 St. George St. to discuss strategy.

it's about time the arabs tried to live in peace

Dear Mr. Johnson:

It's a funny thing, Mr. Johnson, about the Jewish people. You have to comprehend; they've lived through the holocaust (don't tell us you understand); they have gone through the Crusades; they have been subjugated by every type of people from the Greeks to the Romans to the Christians to the Arabs to the Poles, Russians etc. etc. It hurts when someone says we are now the oppressors. We don't want to oppress. We're trying to find the best solution but... Nasser wants to kill us, Russia wants to use us, France wants to be fair, the U.S. wants to appease its Jews. Who should we turn to?

You see, Mr. Johnson, there is a state called Israel. It exists and there are about three million people there. Some would like to change that. Question: Where do these people go? We've learned that Jews are not acceptable en masse in the U.S., Canada, and other Western nations (see "While Six Million Died" by Morse) South America is already occupied. I don't think we'd like to try Russia. Our people already have experience with that haven. The thought of a binational state is absurd in this age considering the major national movements and also the fact that I have yet to see enough desire for love of neighbour from the Palestinians to make me want to share a government with them. India and Pakistan could not be one nation. So that leaves only the concept of the Jewish State in Israel.

In 1947 the U.N. voted for a partition plan — a lousy plan but we were happy, it outclassed concentration camps any day. Since the Arab nations would not accept the plan for a Palestinian state we are called fascist Zionist aggressors. From the time of the Rhodes Conference, the Arabs would not accept our existence. Terrorism did not begin in 1967. It has in its utter glory, precipitated two wars.

In 1956 after the Sinai campaign, we were forced to give back the captured territories to obtain a shalom-salaam (peace). So we gave them back and Nasser erected a monument in El Arish proclaiming his victory. Peace? That was buried deep in the sands under the monument. Terrorism continued. Shelling from Syria and Jordan continued.

Then came the '67 war. It began on June 6, but when the Straits of Tiran were blockaded. Three weeks went by and the world did nothing. So another war. Unfortunately we won and this victory was a shock to many people who were prepared to have magnificent memorials for the valiant Israelis. Witness Biafra.

Instead we gain a buffer zone so Israel is a little safer. Now how about peace? No! Let us get close again and maybe this time...

So, Mr. Johnson, we are stuck with all this territory and all these people who have learned over the years to hate us. What should we do? You obviously haven't studied the period after the Sinai campaign. We know the peace we got then (with guarantees too).

As I wrote earlier, it hurts to be called oppressor. But what does one do with murdering terrorists, with a potential fifth column, with textbooks that teach in terms of your death? As long as there is no bargain for peace we can't give back the land and say try again. And so we must deal with the terrorist who you portray as some sort of honoured hero but who really is courageous in ambushing tourist buses, mining civilian gathering places and bombing airlines.

Mr. Nicolas Zabaneh of the U. of T. Arab Student Movement proposes peace with the Palestinians. First let us see El Fatah dissociate itself from the Arab governments and show its sincerity for peace.

We want peace. We don't want to see any more people die, Arabs or Jews. But Mr. Johnson, we can't discuss peace over any border whether it's the one you want or the one that now exists. Normally people sit down to discuss rationalities. Why not try this method? The Jewish people speak of peace in prayers, ritual and normal conversation. We're tired of fighting. Let us see the Arab people, be it the Arab nations and/or the Palestinians show a desire for peace and try us out. They have never attempted to live in peace with the Jews. It's about time.

open letter to psychology department

Open Letter to the Psychology Department:
Re: Psychology 100 Decision on the Final Exam

It has come to our attention that the final examination as formulated by Miss de Toledo for her Psychology 100 class will contain entire subject matter for the whole of the year of the course. This entails material covered by two lecturers, Dr. Robert Lake and Dr. de Toledo, with the following proportional representation in the examination:

- 25-30 per cent for material covered by R. Lake
- 65-70 per cent for material covered by de Toledo.

This examination accounts for 50 per cent of the final mark. Lake's two term tests account for 25 per cent of the mark; Miss de Toledo's only test of the second term accounts for 25 per cent also.

Disregarding the obvious bias in mark allocation, objections have been raised concerning the following:

Two tests have been given to cover Dr. Lake's material, why are we being re-examined on this work?

Dr. Lake is no longer a member of the Faculty, why should his request concerning the set up of the final exam be granted since neither Dr. Lake nor Miss de Toledo have consulted the class on this matter?

Why wasn't a vote accurately taken in the Psychology 100 class on March 12? Only students who were in favour of Miss de Toledo's proposal concerning the final exam were asked to raise their hands; dissenters had no opportunity to vote since no alternative was raised.

gregory's actions unjustified

Mr. Gregory's wishy-washy defence of the actions taken against the Day care center, as reported in Friday's Varsity, are both dishonest and misleading. It was stated that the action was taken as part of an agreement with the Huron-Sussex Resident's association to encourage family use of area homes. Has the administration of this University forgotten that it also promised to protect the rights of existing tenants?

Perhaps that commitment only applies to the slum-landlords who take university-owned property and rent it to students at highly inflated rates?

Also if the University is so concerned with family housing why did it allow 40 Sussex street to remain vacant for over six months and why was that dwelling finally turned into an office for the OCTSA? The University maintains the right to use any of the buildings that it owns in the Huron-Sussex neighborhood if they are needed by the University.

Does the action against the Day Care Center mean that the needs of the University reflect only the needs of Simcoe Hall and not the needs of its students and faculty?

I for one am sick and tired of the way administrators of this University manipulate their commitments to meet their own unscrupulous ends.

Actions like the one taken against the Day Care Center can not be justified under any guise. Attempts to do so, only discredit the University to an even greater extent than it has already been discredited.

Thomas Schofield
(III History and English)

We propose that more stress be placed on Lake's term tests, thus omitting his material from the final exam. Since the latter half of Miss de Toledo's work has not been tested, it should be emphasized.

As the matter stands, it is totally unreasonable to expect students to cover this enormous amount of material and pass their other finals. Permission needn't be granted by Dr.

better idea for babies

In an effort to continue the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre through the summer of 1970, its first summer, I like to state again what the most urgent hurdle is to be taken by this day care centre. A house owned by the university is used by approximately 20 babies as a place to live during weekdays. On the 31st of March this house has to be vacated and will eventually be changed into a family dwelling. I feel it is not strong enough a point to discourage a group of such young and enterprising people. (yes, babies are people)

Over the last two weeks I have heard a better idea. Why not combine the efforts of the Married Students Residences' nursery and the Campus Day Care Centre. Both nurseries are in their infancy, and may have trouble in finding enough volunteering people during the summer. However, the two nurseries do not have much in common at the moment. The Campus Day Care Centre is running weekdays from 8 o'clock and takes children below the age of 2, while the Married Quarters' nursery is open only during the afternoon and takes children between 2 and 5 years of age. Furthermore, the Campus Day Care Centre is serving university families in the Lake as he has not left a forwarding address.

Your goal should be to create incentive not to destroy it. This is an obvious negation of the true learning process. We suggest the department look into the CUG report with more objectivity.

Mark Bojún,

widest sense thereby filling its capacity with the most needed cases. The Married Quarters' nursery, on the other hand, serves up 'til now only the tenants of 30 and 35 Charles Street. On such a short notice it will be hard to change this structure. Both nurseries should at least try to keep going.

Assuming that they have equally strong support of their participating members the housing problem is the crucial factor. The Campus Day Care Centre has the weakest chance of survival due to this sudden action by its landlord. It should be possible for the university to postpone action 'till after the summer and let the Centre celebrate its first birthday in September at 12 Sussex Street.

Today's paper is the last regular issue of The Varsity this year. There will be a special issue published by SAC April 1 to cover the SAC budget meeting and the joint meeting.

We are still left with a pile of letters an Israel. We apologize to the writers of all letters not published for reasons of space.

"if someone tells you that the Israelis do not want peace he is a big liar"

Mordecai Erlich is a 22-year-old university student in Jerusalem.

Born in Israel, he served with the paratroops in Sinai during the 1967 Six Day War. Now he studies political science, but his academic career is punctuated every year by three weeks training in the Reserves.

Mordecai is in Israel by choice. He spent three months last summer visiting relatives in Canada at which time he was encouraged to stay here. But he decided to go back, and in the following excerpts from a letter to his cousin at U of T, he talks about what it is like in Israel now. The raid of which he speaks at the end of his letter resulted in the capture of an Arab radar station.

...But as a matter of fact during the last three weeks I was in the reserves. . .

...I want to tell you that in these last three weeks I've learned one basic fact, that if someone tells you that the Israelis do not want peace he is a big liar. Everyone who was in there training with us, no matter what is his occupation at home, wanted with all his heart, instead of running and training in the rain, to be in his place with his family.

Well, you see, when you are in the cold and rain instead of a heated apartment you want peace desperately and this is also one of the many viewpoints you can look on in the conflict. (I'm sure from this viewpoint the Arab soldiers want peace much more than we do.)

And a few serious words about the situation. Generally, in the Suez Canal we are now attacking all the time and the attacks are not in the first line (which was almost completely destroyed by our air force) but in the heart of Egypt. (For example, today our planes attacked targets 10 km. from Cairo.)

The borders are now relatively quiet and the only new development is in the Lebanese border where the guerrillas are trying to gain power near the Israel border, but we hope that the Lebanese army will succeed in stopping them. Otherwise, this area of Lebanon is going to be isolated like the border in Jordan, and it's a portunity for the innocent Lebanese farmers who are going to suffer from it.

And to finish about the situation a few words about the biggest army event recently. Our paratroopers succeeded in conquering an island south of the Canal and holding it for 36 hours. We took 61 prisoners of war and big quantities of arms. Unfortunately this success was faded by an awful accident in which a truck of ammunition blew up in the port of Eilat and we had 20 casualties and 30 were wounded. . .

poli ec situation "crucial"

The Political Economy Course Union will be holding an emergency caucus at 1 p.m. tomorrow prior to the Faculty Meeting at 4 p.m. which will decide whether or not the department sets up a negotiating committee.

"The situation is crucial", said Peter Hall, the Chairman of the Course Union. "This could be the turning-point for the department in terms of reform."

The faculty is meeting in the Council Chamber of the Galbraith Building to consider the course union's request for a parallel structure negotiating committee to review the structures of the department and the appointment of the chairman.

The course union has already elected six tentative delegates to this committee. At a meeting last Friday a General Assembly meeting elected Steven Langdon, (IV Poli. Econ.), Peter Hall, (II Econ.), Bob James, (III Poli. Sci.), Phyllis Clarke (Grad. Poli. Sci.), Jim St. John (Grad. Poli. Sci.) and Bob Hann (Grad. Ec.). Hann is also on the faculty at the Centre of Criminology.

Prof. Easterbrook, the Chairman of the Department and Prof. Smith, the associate Chairman who favour the committee have privately expressed concern that it may not receive faculty approval.

"I'm optimistic," commented Hall. "What we are asking for is eminently reasonable. I think it's time to replace some of the confrontation we've seen with dialogue. We've got some common problems and I would like to see us talk about them."

Many students are anxious that the course union not compromise on the move to put the question of the new chairman's appointment on the agenda of the committee and it is expected that this will be discussed at the caucus in Room 1071 S.S. at 1 p.m. tomorrow.

The Magic Nose Flute

Anyone Can Play It!
No Knowledge of Music Needed
Small Enough to Carry in the Pocket!
Loud Enough to Lead the Band
Sweet Toned and Musical

The MAGIC NOSE FLUTE is a very novel style of musical instrument, differing from almost any other. It is made entirely of metal, and with care should last a lifetime. There is nothing to wear out or get out of order. It is placed over mouth and nose as shown in our illustration. It takes but a few minutes to learn how to play it, there is just a little "knack" that you can easily acquire. You can play any tune after a little practice, and the tone is very musical and flute-like. It is capable of the most charming modulations, and the most popular melody of the most elaborate operatic air can be played, either as a solo or accompanied, in a manner that would be enthusiastically applauded even on a concert platform. Anyone can play it, and the performer with the true "gift of music" will find it, with very little practice, the most easily controlled sound producer. It is possible to imitate, and imitations of bird calls and warblings can be produced, and it cannot be excelled for teaching a canary to whistle. By special arrangement with the manufacturer we are now enabled to offer this remarkable instrument for less than half the price formerly asked, at which price it is surely worth while to give it a trial, if only to see just what you can do with it.

No. 3478, THE MAGIC NOSE FLUTE.

the various and sundry review editors take two pages from this the best in the arts in the past year and also reveal petty a year of reviewing, pay heed

In retrospect, film over the past year seemed to be dominated by an entire movement within American cinema. Despite its frequent tendency to pander exclusively to economics, Hollywood has long been the most dynamic collective force in international film-making, and 1969 was undoubtedly the year in which Hollywood (if it is still possible to speak of Hollywood as a geographical area) finally capitulated to another of its intermittent cycles of re-orientation. Not since the downfall of the mass entertainment film of the 40's has the American film industry been involved in quite so significant a process of radical change.

The major West Coast studio conglomerates, no longer able to bear the multi-million dollar losses inherited from two, three and four-year old extravaganzas and no longer able to rely upon a guaranteed return from a guaranteed audience, were finally compelled to relinquish their traditional direct control over production; at times grudgingly and at times, perhaps, unsatisfactorily; and to accept the role of financier and distributor.

The implications of this shift in Hollywood were only suggested this past year, but certainly the pattern of international production and investment will never again be the same.

Nevertheless, as part of The Varsity's continuing policy of service to the community, here is the Review's selection of the best (and the worst) in film of the past year.

THE BEST . . .

— If . . ., directed brilliantly by Lindsay Anderson. Unquestionably the finest film of 1969. Suffered unduly and unfairly from critical misinterpretation but, nevertheless, emerged as a perfect 'classic' film immediately upon its release. Unique, involving, beautiful.

— The Wild Bunch (Sam Peckinpah). Magnificent photography by Lucien Ballard. Utterly absorbing, powerful, uniquely conceived and superbly choreographed in its rhythms of death.

— Easy Rider (Dennis Hopper). Certainly the most significant film of the year in terms of its impact upon the American film industry. Slightly self-indulgent at times, yet meticulously conceived, fast-paced, frightening in its implications, keenly perceptive. Superbly fluid photography by Laszlo Kovacs.

— Medium Cool (Haskell Wexler). Proof positive that cinematic laws are not irrevocable. A brilliantly imaginative mingling of several film styles which colours Wexler's portrait of commitment with compellingly original shades.

— Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid. (George Roy Hill). Subtle, full of life and profoundly sad. Beautifully written scenario by William Goldman. Genuinely moving performances by Paul Newman, Robert Redford and Katherine Ross.

— I Am Curious (Yellow) (Vilgot Sjoman). A film completely distorted by critical pre-judgement. Remarkably clever editing and an interesting concept of camera technique. (i.e. there is none.)

— Putney Swope. (Robert Downey). A galloping insane film forever bordering on complete delirium. Downey again proved himself to be a master of controlled anarchy. Brilliantly comic, wildly imaginative with a truth that irritates in its bluntness.

— Other films which deserve at least a mention for injecting a considerable degree of vitality into the past year. . .

— Stolen Kisses, Oh! What a Lovely War, Z, Last Summer, Bob and Carol and Ted and Alice, The Reivers, They Shoot Horses, Don't They?, Midnight Cowboy, Lonesome Cowboys, MASH.

— Best Canadian film of the year. . .

Unquestionably, Allan King's A Married Couple. Perplexing in its style, but unrivalled in sensitivity and insight.

— Greatest disappointment of the year. . .

— Alice's Restaurant by Arthur Penn. Agonizingly static, contrived. An example of youth exploitation at its most insidious.

— Worst of the year. . .

— An unresolved draw between On Her Majesty's Secret Service, Marooned, De Sade, and Prologue.

This may be a chauvinist position for the retiring radio and television editor, but I like my television.

After four years of almost total abstinence, I returned to the fold with a 21" black and white rented tube. A glorious Easter after a long hard Lent.

A television is one of those things that you abstain from for a while (Forever!) to evidence a major change of life.

Dear Mother and Father,

I no longer watch television. I am a University student. My mind belongs now to the Wisdom of the Ages.

Love,
Dan

It can signify a renunciation of old values and the old life style and imply their replacement by the Enlightened Ones.

Television can become the symbol of fascist bourgeois pig decadence; the automaton master of the automatons. It is the malleable tool of the Capitalist System. Ach! (vomit) It stupefies and mesmerizes the lower working classes while molding, directing and controlling the dishrag middleclass minds. (vomit)

That was last year. This year I have a tube. And there's a certain mark of distinction about the whole thing.

Dear M & F

Tino Louise and I got a tube the other day. Blow your mind or who! or what, eh? Tina Louise is the chick I screw with now.

Love!
D

It now signifies a certain status; free time; the discreet use of leisure hours; the freedom from the fetters of routine and schedule, yet the vicarious participation in popular culture. There's that certain pleasurable identification with the Masses; the Workers, you know?

Let the Revolution Come!! I'd be the last to stop it. But goddam motherfuck if it takes Star Trek or It's My World and Welcome To It off the air. That's the people's air and I'm a people and I want to watch Star Trek!

daniel mack

the penultimate edition of the varsity to give you their views on prejudices, vices and anomalies which have accumulated in

As I understand it, this is supposed to be a list of my favorite things of the last 12 months, or what I consider "the best of..." But I can't seem to get interested in making any such list in any accurate sense, so instead, here are a number of things in various fields which have caught my imagination.

Books.

Johnny Otis. Listen to the Lambs (Norton, $6.25). Johnny Otis is a white R & B musician from the West Coast who embraced black culture as the only viable one in the States. He was totally accepted by that culture (which seems to have found skin color a minor detail) and became a respected contributor to black music. This book of rather random chapters is a reaction to the Watts riots of '65. It ranges from youthful episodes and scenes from his life as a musician to musings on sociological and political musings. The musings, though obviously warmly felt, are not terribly interesting, but the chapters taken from his life are fascinating, and in a couple of instances, extraordinarily well written.

Movies.

I rather liked If, though it sort of fell apart at the end. Easy Rider had a lot of impact at the time, but in some ways the effect seems to have been ephemeral. 400 Blows was nice. Haven't seen a movie in a while. Last one was some garbage about taking over the Alamo.

TV.

The first show of The Manipulators series, about a junkie, had a rather simple plot, but the acting and direction were superb. It's the only TV I can recall which rivaled the CBC's Best Damn Fiddler from Calabogie to Kaladar.

Records.

Roosevelt Holts. Presenting the Country Blues. Blue Horizon 7704. Roosevelt Holts is a guitarist and singer in his mid-sixties who plays in a Mississippi style of 30 years ago or more. 8 months or so ago he asked a blues buff friend to help him produce a 45 he could sell to friends around his hometown. The record was made, he got 50 copies and was promptly arrested for countervailing a Mississippi statute against peddling without a license. His car was confiscated ($500 to get it back) and he was in some danger of being sent to a work gang. This LP gives you the opportunity to get a good sampling of authentic Jackson style blues as well as to help fight the effects of justice in Mississippi. If you'd like a copy of the guilty 45 as well, send a M.O. for $1.25 to David Evans, 208 So. Sievers Ave., Brea, Calif., 92621. All profits go to Holts, and he can probably still use them.

Theater.

I have, unfortunately, missed several interesting things, but I did see Tom Paine, by the Passé Muraille, which was excellently produced by a fine group. Considering that the TWP's first two productions have been drags, it's probably the best theater I've seen. I consider the pretensions of Dionysius in '69 a laugh.

Art.

The Bauhaus show dazzled a great many, but I found it stultifying. There were some nice things for sure (I remember a particular teapot with fondness), but on the whole I felt I was looking at the forerunners of what currently passes for taste in North America, and I didn't find that a pleasant experience.

Concerts.

A third of the audience left after the second number by Andrew Cyrille and his group at Hart House last Sunday, and half the audience was gone after intermission. However, the fact that half of a packed Great Hall was willing to consider new musical forms in a lengthy concert is encouraging. The music was difficult, but it was fascinating to watch an excellent group of musicians reacting to one another in ways which went beyond the conventions understood by most of us. Black music has probably always been the art form to most accurately reflect social conditions on the U.S., and this music seems to be keeping that tradition alive.

The trouble with editing something like the Review is that you never get a chance to do anything except count words. Really nevertheless I managed now and then to sneak off and take in, at inopportune times, some of the finer arts. The following are comments on a sparse season of culture:

FILM

The most fascinating movie, strangely enough, is The Sterile Cuckoo. I came away from the movie, absolutely disgusted with Liza Minelli and the whole film. Trouble is, that's exactly what makes the movie so effective. Minelli plays a yecch reaching out desperately and smotheringly for affection and all the audiences that couldn't stand her might very well ask themselves why. It makes you very uneasy.

Easy Rider was a slick, captivating orgy of indulgence on the part of Peter Fonda, who played up every mystical and apollitical prejudice seething in hung-up middle-class American youth today. Life magazine on two wheels.

Midnight Cowboy was a slick but overly sentimentalized look at The Big City with a fine natural performance by John Voigt and an embarrassingly overacted and hammed portrayal by Dustin Hoffman as Razzo Rizzo.

John and Mary was a fine, delicate and intensely personal story about the games people play. Mia Farrow was just right; Dustin Hoffman was adequate as two "young swingers" who don't know why they're swinging. The movie catches you off guard.

Medium Cool was very confused and needed lots of editing, except that would have left about five minutes.

The only thing good about Putney Swope was the three commercials that Putney actually got around to doing. (Ethereal Cereal's "No Shit" was a masterpiece.)

It was the best all-round film I saw all year. Not for the relevance or truthfulness of its message, although that's important, but primarily because Lindsay Anderson did it all so well. The characters in the film were psychologically razor sharp.

BOOKS

Books are perhaps the only art form where you might get an inkling that you live in a country called Canada. There have been a number of fiction books published this year and a significant number have been by Canadian women. The best, to my mind was Alice Munro's collection of short stories, Dance of the Happy Shades. They're all haunting, lonely, touching and carefully shaped. Next best was Margaret Atwood's The Edible Man, a somewhat oblique look at the dry life of an "ordinary" young woman, her bland and dumb fiancée, and the emaciated graduate English student she falls in love with.

Margaret Laurence's The Fire Dwellers was a somewhat uncomfortable attempt to get under the skin of a middle-class housewife but the plot was just a bit too contrived.

Phyllis Gottlieb's Why Should I Have All the Grief tried to describe the inner anguish of a Jewish concentration-camp refugee years after. Not only was it superficial politically, but it barely scratched the surface psychologically and didn't ring true in the least.

From the land to the south, one book stands out. It's a quiet and deeply disturbing novel by John Cheever called Bullet Park. It has a way of angling in very simply and wryly on the various aspects of American urban schizophrenia.

TELEVISION

I don't have a television (oh, blessed event) and so I have joined the wisdom of the ages. (cf. Dan Mack on this page), nevertheless it's an insidious medium and you can't help catch a few things. The most fun thing to watch is NBC or CBS news special reports. Its television at its best and worst. My favourite is Charles Kuralt of CBS, second only to Walter Cronkite. They can scare you half to death about something like pollution in a way that makes it sound as if they're going to be around after it all happens. (Hello this is Walter Cronkite reporting to you from the scene of the 3rd World War. I'm standing amidst the rubble of New York City and for miles around, I can see nothing but...)

This month marks a substantial step forward for writers and lovers of poetry at the University of Toronto, as Innis College puts out an all new literary magazine called WRIT.

Due to go on sale some time towards the end of this month, WRIT is the most ambitious and perhaps the most original magazine of its kind this campus has ever seen.

WRIT contains possibly the best collections of poems and short stories assembled in any campus magazine I have ever seen.

Its contributors vary considerably. Represented are such well-known campus poets as Bill Templeman and Ian Young.

This year the Summer Center Theatre undertakes its second season with a venture into prestidigitation. It will attempt to produce — presto! — five full-scale plays on a budget of approximately $1200. Sheldon Clark, who is in charge of the Glen Morris Church productions, points out that "$1200 divided by five plays" means "certain basic limitations around which one cannot get."

But, with a certain perverse optimism, he points out that lack of money can draw creativity out of directors and actors that would not have been necessary in more affluent stagings. It will be fascinating to see the innovations in this summer's productions:

May 26-June 6 brings us Oedipus Rex (Sophocles'), which Clark himself will direct. He points out that "because of our budget, and the Church as a location, it won't be Athenian." Costuming may be co-ordinated modern dress ("If Oedipus wears a black turtle-neck, he'll be the only one in a black turtle-neck") rather than a bedsheet-Greek attempt at costuming. Among possible innovations will be a tape-recorded chorus which will leave the on-stage chorus free for interpretive dancing.

June 16-27 will have Thomas Lytle directing Middleton's More Dissemblers Besides Women. Any critic will have to confront Lytle's formidable knowledge of this Elizabethan drama, which he is editing from the original as part of his PhD program.

July 7-18 is reserved for The Mollusk, by H. H. Davies, to be directed by Merle Niemi. The set will be naturalistic, but the finances will compel a spare naturalism indeed, with minimal stage brie-a-brac.

July 28-August 8 is given over to Ross Stewart's production of Camino Real. Tennessee William's play will have the benefit of Ross's acumen as lighting expert and technician (and on-top-of-it stage manager, as I found out while in Man's a Man). Ross says the production will be "huge" — in cast, the largest of the five — and "hellish". That is, as intense as possible a presentation of the mood set out in the play. Ross has a theatre M.A. from Carnegie Tech.

August 18-August 29 ? ? ? ? As Clark puts it, "the date's uncertain, the play's uncertain". What is certain is that the director will be Martin Hunter, who has shared his Brechtian tastes with us by way of Man's a Man and Caucasian Chalk Circle. Clark said, "It's likely a new play —"

"By a young Canadian author?" said I.

"Well, he's not young and he's not Canadian" said Clark, and did not say the name.

Overlapping these from June 30-July 11 is Saved, by Edward Bond, directed by Jeremy Hole at the Women's Union Theatre at UC. Though it shares some costs with the Summer Centre Theatre, it's largely independent, and will by the only play to charge admission.

Clark, who worked on last summer's program, believes in the free admission that has been the Church's policy, though it means unelaborate staging. "If the acting's credible, the people will be content." He points out that "students in the summer session do come" to the productions, as well as a good turnout "from the artsie types who go to small university associated theatres," and who expect thought-provoking productions. The dinner-and-theatre person looking for light entertainment does not make an appearance.

For lack of a word less burdened with bad feelings, one might say that the productions have culture. They don't have to sell, they don't have to cater, and they can be innovative.

That was part of the reason Jim Bradford wedged $2000 from the Centre for last summer's season. It was a good one, with the CBC videotaping the production of "Typically English," and "Caucasian Chalk Circle" filling the seats and jamming the aisles.

Despite expectations of doing more than six plays, that was the number arrived at last season for financial reasons. This summer, for the same green folding causes, one of the five plays may have to be dropped. Clark is sympathetic to the Centre's problems in providing money:

"They paid for two professional shows at Hart House" — which are astronomically more expensive than amateur ones — "and contributed to Man's a Man and Measure for Measure," as well as hiring speakers throughout the year." Not to mention the eight winter season plays at the Church, which averaged $500 apiece.

The summer season, at a little over $200 a show, is "not even financially competitive with the winter season."

Within those straps, however, he hopes for some Promethean efforts in imaginative staging and directing. With a show running from Tuesday-to-Saturday, for two weeks, he hopes to give performers "experience in sustaining a part" by a ten-show effort that is quite rigorous by customary campus standards, where an actor finishes a three-performance run feeling he has dumped out his guts, and where's the award? "We hope he'll have some appreciation of what the professional has to accomplish in doing the same show every night for a year."

Summer theatre, being quite separate from the winter program (which Clark likes), attempts to offer the practical experience to which Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama has not given more than a modicum of support in the past.

The GCSD handbook is heavily academic. It offers courses for "critics ('literary ones', explained Clark), historians, teachers" — not, God forbid, directors or even theatre critics. Therefore, those who venture in that direction receive no academic credit for their labors. This is a blow to the M.A. and PhD candidates who are mainly responsible for Church productions, and who have an understandable desire to handle the bricks and boards of what they theorize about.

"The idea of the Church was that it was to be an experimental theatre where a student could fail and have no repercussions." Though Clark insists that the productions are still experimental and innovative, the fact remains that failure is not permissible, and directors tend to use a style that gets applause (not to mention getting the people attached) for a show

Therefore one doesn't simply have a group of students mount an act of Moliere, in French if that's their whimsy, because of one simple shortcoming in the attitude of the program: that is, that the recognition due to experiment should clearly be academic credit — and the Graduate Center for the Study of Drama gives none.

Clark emphasizes that the summer theatre program is free of this infighting, and simply gives four months free rein to directors from the GCSD. They're chosen competitively, and what they've done in the winter session tells whether they get a chance at the summer one.

As a final note, Sheldon Clark will be directing a new play by Angus Braid of the Centre. Called Outport, it will run from March 24-28 at the Church. It's "naturalistic, and set in Canada", a fairly comfortable combination of qualities, even with "Chekhovian overtones", and much to be looked forward to.

eracy is a natural human response to the institutionalized narcosis and the frontal labotomies "education" performs on us.

We go into a know-nothing existentialist stance against the imposition of everyone else's head-trip. This also marks their final victory.

Illiteracy combines with the elimination of our pasts and futures to make understanding an impossible project: we have to reinvent private and public space.

The classical Greek word a privatized man was "idiot".

The head-trip of the private individual mediates between the Idealism of the culture and the privatized structure of our lives.

Existentialism is bourgeois ideology on the defensive. We reduce the world to absurdity because in our subjectivity we are its only fixed point.

We can side with the ruling class and the system.

We can cop out — which is also taking sides.

Or we can fight — together.

The dominant cultural response: implosion. The normative order collapses, leaving us with a defensive posture in which we (middle-class lumpen-intelligen-tia) justify our privacy.

IX.

Abstractions haunt the page like ghosts. Contradictions in thought which derive from real contradictions: a latent class struggle in which we have to take sides.

The absolute observer is a social Newtonian: he posits absolute space.

He is also a theologian: only God can live in absolute space.

He is also a pantheistic egoist: he becomes God.

Whais he kidding?

X.

Meanwhile, back in reality: Anglo-Canadian capital plunders the Carribean.
(That means poverty, misery, racism, exploitation among a people that can't afford the alienated epicurean stance of decadent Western intellectuals and groovy young academics.)

American capital plunders the natural resources of a cooled-out Northern frontier — Canada. (The RCMP rules the North, we don't have a country of our own, Indian reserves are destroyed, money flows south.)

Unemployment rises. Depression depresses. Fifteen per cent unemployed in class-conscious and nationally conscious Montreal. Eatons and Simpsons and Fred Gardiner and construction companies push through the Los angelisation of Toronto and will find themselves with a People's Park on their hands and their heads.

XI.

Weekend is awake end. Godard represents the decadence he observes. And the Rolling Stones are cultural nationalists.

XII.

U of T still functions as an imperialist institution — housing reactionary ideologues like Frye, McLuhan (who's never done acid), and Macpherson the house Marxist; it does research and development for U.S. Corporations, the military and the Government (which is not neutral); and it manipulates us into being manipulators (social scientists), unproductive decadents (pure arts) and technical workers who are sold on a career and power myth (technical sciences).

All this is a familiar leftist litany: but we reproduce this institution every day of our lives.

What are we going to do?

Organize.

How? You give me only fragments.

Don't ask me — the world has coherence and structure. Discover it before, through and after action. Struggle is absolute. This is a liberated zone: head-trips stop here.

This was a sermon then?

No. Just a stoned piece for The Varsity.

University-Wide Committee finalized

By MARY KATE ROWAN

This is Miss Rowan's last story for The Varsity. She is moving on to greater things at the Globe & Mail.

After months of discussion, the CUG Programming Committee has decided upon the membership of the University-Wide Committee.

The University-Wide Committee will have the power to make final recommendations to the President on the composition of the top governing structure of the U of T.

The President's Council agreed Monday to support the University-Wide Committee.

The 120-member committee will consist of four groups:

- 40 students — 27 undergraduates, 9 graduates, 4 part-time degree students.

- 40 faculty.

- 40 administration — 20 academic administrators, five senior non-academic administrators and 15 support staff.

- 40 other delegates — 10 from the Board of Governors, 20 alumni representatives, the President or designate of the A.T.S., G.S.U., S.A.C., and A.P.U.D.S. (Association of Part-time University Degree Students), and six representatives of the non-university, non-alumni components of the Senate (representatives from professional associations and professional schools).

This is the composition originally proposed by the Programming Committee.

To determine the composition of the University-Wide Committee, the Programming Committee sent questionnaires to all members of the university.

4,500 REPLIES

Of the 30,000 questionnaires mailed, 4,500 were returned.

Forty per cent of the full-time teaching staff, 10 per cent of the full-time students and eight per cent of the support staff responded to the questionnaire.

Those who responded favoured the concept of a university-wide committee by a 2-1 majority.

Those who favoured a university-wide committee supported the Programming Committee's proposals by a 3-1 majority.

The Programming Committee will supervise university-wide elections to select representatives of the teaching staff, undergraduate and graduate students and support staff.

We're Braddock Optical, and we can tell you all about contact lenses—then you can decide if you want them. We're just round the corner at 170 St. George. Come and see.

MAIL VOTE

Nominations open March 20 and close March 31.

Elections will be conducted by mail from April 6 to April 24.

The Board of Governors, the U of T alumni association and the Association of Part-Time Degree Students will choose their own members.

Representatives of the academic administrators and senior non-academic administrators will be elected from among their respective numbers.

People who fall into more than one category will vote according to the following rules:

RULES AND REGULATIONS

Arts and science faculty who have cross-appointments vote according to their primary affiliation or main appointment.

In most cases primary affiliation will be with a university department.

Faculty who are appointed by a college vote in their college constituency.

People with teaching or research duties who are not in the first four ranks of faculty and who are not graduate or undergraduate students vote as members of the support staff.

Faculty who have administrative duties vote as members of the teaching staff, unless advised otherwise by the Programming Committee.

REVAMP

The CUG report released last October after 10 months of deliberation by four elected faculty and four elected student commissioners called for a complete revamping of the present university governing structures.

They recommended that the existing top governing structure — the Board of Governors (administration) and the Senate (academic) be replaced by a unicameral governing council.

They recommended a 66 member top governing body consisting of 20 lay members, 20 elected students, 20 elected academics and six ex officio members.

CUG recommended that the powers of the Governing Council include curriculum planning, student promotion, evaluation, admissions, degree granting, academic appointment, promotion and tenure, allocation of budget and resources granted by the Governing Council to the faculty, and student petitions and appeals.

The tentative schedule of the University-Wide Committee and its Steering Committee is as follows:

TIGHT SCHEDULE

Meeting of representatives from the faculty, students and administration to elect members to the Steering Committee — early May.

Meetings of Steering Committee — May and possibly during the summer months.

Meeting of the University-Wide Committee — June 1 and 2 with possible meetings in the fall.

Any person who has not received a ballot by April 20 or who is unsure of which constituency he belongs to should contact the Office of the Vice-President and Registrar.

To you it's

Here's how SAC is budgeting this year

It was easy to understand the reluctance of many students' council reps when they voted to increase SAC fees $1 last Wednesday, but large losses of revenue for next year's budget forced them to accept the hike.

Although appropriations for several organizations including Random magazine, the Blue and White, Free University of Toronto and the Booksac have been cut, the Finance Commission still found itself faced with a $29,000 deficit.

Finance Commissioner Bob James told the council the fees hike was the only way to avoid massive cutbacks on valuable SAC projects.

The largest new allocation in the budget, which is to be presented to SAC tonight, is the $4,000 earmarked for a student legal aid service next year.

The project will be operated entirely by U of T law students and should work closely with the newly formed Student Tenants' Union, which received $600 in the New budget.

Another major grant will be $2,000 to the Engineering Society for its educational program. Engineering Society President-elect Mike Sefton explained to the Finance Commission the money would be used to run course evaluations, to rejuvenate the class reps system and provide information for student-faculty council members.

Other major increases contributing to the fee hike are:

- $2,000 to course unions;
- $1,000 more to course union newspapers;
- $2,000 to Pollution Probe;
- $2,000 to several architecture students for their renovation work on Hart House farm;
- $2,000 more for high school organizers. This year's allocation covered only half the year;
- $2,300 to Radio Varsity for its new ventures into television program production;
- over $2,500 more for the Cultural Affairs Commission for student film facilities and the University Arts festival.

Of the losses in revenue $5,000 stems from a Graduate Student Union decision not to pay for SAC services used by graduate students.

In addition, SAC recently agreed to grant Scarborough and Erindale Colleges a 50 per cent rebate on their SAC fees, leading to a further loss of $11,500.

Here's where SAC summermoney goes . . .

Where does SAC's money go in the summer? The answer to this oft-asked question was revealed yesterday by Dave Tinker, SAC's permanent accountant.

Subject to approval by SAC's budget meeting tonight in the Debates Room at Hart House, money will be spent on the following projects.

Summer Varsity will require a net cost of $122.

The Student Handbook will need $2000.

Two students will be undertaking summer research projects at a cost of $3,000, taking the place of the Student Information Bureau. A permanent research officer will also be hired.

The Varsity Downtown Education Project (VDEP) may require up to $10,000 if SAC has sufficient cash flow. This cash flow depends on past surpluses, since SAC fees are not paid until September.

A feasibility study for a student legal aid centre will continue during the summer. The centre itself, if approved, will probably not require money until the fall.

Other salaries include six permanent SAC office workers, an education consultant, and a high school organizer at $95 a week.

Incoming SAC President Rod Hurd will be entitled to draw salary the whole summer, VP Eric Miglin for up to twenty weeks, the finance commissioner for three weeks and the other commissioners for two weeks.

Although the SAC Press will be operating the drop-in centre has been dropped.

ly, too many women have broken through into male-dominated fields and have succeeded in them to sustain that myth.

It is the cultural definition of femininity in this society, which says women are by nature passive, non-aggressive, non-assertive, non-analytical, emotional etcetera. One's femininity is not inherent, it is socialized, and oppressive by its very definition. Margaret Mead's Male and Female describes tribal systems in which the masculine-feminine roles of our society are reversed, with little harm done, apparently.

It is all those myths about motherhood — that women are somehow blessed with the faculty for caring for children. Women learn how to be mothers. After working six to 10 hours a week as a volunteer in the campus co-op community day care centre for the last two months, I can say that I am beginning to know something about how to look after children. It is learned, not inherent in one's sex.

It is all those myths about women's sexual behaviour, best summed up in the Ann Landers men-are-beasts-theory, in which the level-headed, less passionate girl is to keep her cool and stop those wild young men from ripping off her bra. Some women are passionate, too.

Male chauvinism denies women the right to determine their own sexuality. Repressive laws about abortion doom 2,000 Canadian women to death through illegal abortions — which perhaps wouldn't have happened if our society was not so repressive in giving out birth control information and contraceptives.

Women have little freedom of choice in their sexuality. In my parents' time, a girl was supposed to say no to sex, if she was decent. Today, if a girl is to show that she is enlightened, groovy etc., she has to say yes, or risk the label of frigid, neurotic, a prude. A woman is damned if she does, and damned if she doesn't. What she feels, wants, or needs sexually is never considered.

Repression of sexual knowledge oppresses women. An amazing number of women don't even know all the facts about their own menstrual cycle — how to calculate when it's coming, whether you can use internal protection if you are still a virgin etcetera. This lack of knowledge makes the maintenance of the sexual myths about women easy, because women don't know the facts to combat those myths. Dr. Clare Robinson, of Lakeshore Psychiatric Hospital, was recently quoted in the Toronto Star as saying that between 80 to 90 per cent of the female patients at the hospital suffer from some kind of sex problem such as frigidity or frustration. He also said that lack of information and misinformation were to blame for the majority of sexual problems both mentally ill and sane people undergo.

Male chauvinism denies women their mind. A woman who asserts herself is considered de-feminized, a male castrating bitch, unwomanly. I remember a professor of mine at university urging his class to "be real he-men, be aggressive, ask questions". This was very embarrassing for me, because I always asked questions — and I didn't like being characterized as a real he-man, thank you very much!

The worst put-down of this sort I ever saw was at a UBC SDS meeting last year. A male member suggested (in a strange fit of liberalism) that the men in the group should try to combat male chauvinism, and let a woman be nominated for the steering committee. Great. A girl named Ellen who had been very active in the movement was put up for nomination. The only problem was, every time she was mentioned, she was called Allan — a subconscious gesture perhaps, but it worked. Ellen never became too involved and later dropped out. And if you don't believe that's put-down, would Andy Wernick or Stephen Langdon have been so enthusiastic about being on the Political Economy course union committee if in the nominations they had been continually referred to as Andrea and Stephanie?

Male chauvinism of this sort places the whole emphasis on appearance. The recent series of Star articles on women executives revealed this all too clearly in its almost obsessive interest in the looks of the women it wrote about. The articles invariably began with two or three paragraphs describing the women's clothes, her figure, her hair, her cosmetics ad nauseam.

Male chauvinism denies women a separate identity. It denies their own individual existence. A woman gains the status of a person only in relation to the man she is with.

Legally, this is shown in that women cannot get credit cards in their own names if they are married. A man must be co-signer of a mortgage or else it is not binding.

A woman's class is her husband's, although she functions as the proletariat of his class. A woman's name is also her husband's.

In politics the situation is the same. One of the funnier passages in Judy La Marsh's Bird in a Gilded Cage tells how eager party hacks come up to the wives of recently deceased members of parliament at the funeral, hoping to per-suaide the widow to run for her husband's seat in the next election. Most of the women in Canada who have made it into the House of Commons or the Senate have been wives or daughters of political figures. Very few have made it on their own. Very few have made it in their own 'decade of women', there is one woman in the House, Grace McNinis, — the wife of a former member.

Even in the New Left this attitude is found. A woman is often identified as being so-and-so's wife (yes, Virginia, even liberated women marry), or girlfriend, or is sleeping with so-and-so.

The most important aspect of male chauvinism is that it separates the political opportunist from the true political radical intent on smashing the capitalism which denies liberation to both men and women in this society. It is easy to make speeches, sign manifestoes, and declare your support for oppressed people far away in the villages of Viet Nam, the ghettos of Harlem, and the factories of Quebec. It is something else to recognize and confront the oppression of women in your own life.

As August Bebel said: "Every socialist recognizes the dependence of the workmen on the capitalist, and cannot understand that others, and especially the capitalist themselves, should fail to recognize it also; but the same socialist often does not recognize the dependence of women on men because the question touches his own dear self more or less closely."

If a man can translate the philosophy of political liberation into the radical action of altering the relationships within his own living-space so that the women he knows are not oppressed, then he will be truly liberated and liberating.

"Operational decisions best left to businesses"

Six hundred men out of a job. Why? Two weeks ago Dunlop closed its plant on Queen St., after losing an Ontario contract to a Japanese firm.

"Robarts asks Canadian industries to hire students," said Ed Maher, Dunlop employee.

"Then he closes down the plants." This eliminates 20 to 30 summer jobs, but the real affect is upon the 600 employees who are now without jobs.

Most of these people who are to be unemployed are middle-aged — people with many years service on the same job. Some are still raising families, buying homes and cars etc. Quite a few are veterans who fought for this country and free enterprise.

Dunlop Canada Ltd. closed its industrial plant here in Toronto because it could not compete against imported rubber goods from Japan and Europe.

In the past 10 years, outside industries have taken 27 per cent of the market. Ontario Hydro gave the contract that closed Dunlop to Japan to save $80,000.

"Close the Ontario Hydro and import Japanese Electricity," stated Phil Japp, the president of local 132 of the United Rubber Workers Union.

"People are just tools for big business and governments to use at their own expense."

The Dunlop Co. made this decision without consulting the union, and delivered its conclusion to the workers without warning.

The telephones in the plant were cut off so none of the workers could phone home. Many of the employees' wives heard the news for the first time over the radio.

The losing of the Ontario Hydro contract was a primary reason for the closing of the plant. Before the shutdown Japp sent a telegram to Mr. Robarts explaining the significance. Robarts did not reply.

James Renwick, NDP member for the riding, was also informed and tried to reach Japp at work. He was placed in contact with the company president, Neville Procter. Procter informed him that everything was quite satisfactory; two days later the plant closed.

There is no government legislation to prevent this type of fiasco.

The union is going to Ottawa to present a bill they have written up. It goes as follows:

I — that laws be passed providing, when a company is going to close, they be bound by law to justify their decision.

II — that, if the decision to close is found justifiable, a reasonable length of notice be given to the employees, e.g. 6 months.

"Canada Manpower" will be brought into play to relocate the employees. This is a good way to remove the 600 men off the unemployed statistics. Will Manpower find these men jobs when there are over half a million unemployed in Canada today?

"The operational decisions are best left to businesses", said Premier Robarts.

Day-care centre offered "piecemeal solution"

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

The U of T administration has responded to the requests of the Campus Co-op Day Care Center with what social worker Peter F. Holland calls an unsatisfactory and "piecemeal solution".

The Center, which looks after about 25 children belonging to U of T staff and students, has come under threat of destruction, as it occupies part of the construction site for the new Innis College.

Holland, who believes that the University ought to offer free day-care services, is particularly angry at the administration for refusing to support the Center.

Referring to a letter from Administrative Assistant K. S. Gregory, he maintains that the U of T has not met demands for free rent, alterations to the building, or expanded facilities.

The Day-Care Center has also been notified that, in addition to meeting provincial and municipal health and fire regulations on its own, it must pay the university $50 a month until April 30, 1972, the suggested eviction date.

"They'll give us back the rent money if we're kicked out before 1972", explains Holland, "but without an alternate location, it won't be much help".

He sees a need for a much larger building with separate rooms for children of various ages. As it is, the Center must cope with 2-3 month old babies in an ordinary semi-detached house with a small living-room and kitchen.

Holland estimates the cost of renovating the present Sussex location at "several thousand dollars", and points out that the Day-Care Center could be instantly closed if all the requirements were not met.

Because the new lease will likely be with Crown Trust, Holland also thinks that the Center would be bound to "increasingly inadequate facilities", forced to pay a rent to which it does not agree, and handicapped in future attempts to change the situation.

Nevertheless, Gregory writes, "The University does not have available for rent any houses which are larger or more suitable, nor does it have available any funds which would allow it to undertake the alterations which are necessary".

The parents and volunteers connected with the Day-Care Center will be meeting there tonight at 7:30 p.m. to discuss the terms of Gregory's proposals.

Should we tax bursaries?

Last November the Federal Government introduced a White Paper on their proposals for tax reform in Canada.

Section 2.24 recommends that fellowships, scholarships, bursaries and research grants be made taxable. "There seems no valid reason for continuing such exemption," it states.

The U of T Commerce Club is holding a debate on this and other ridiculous proposals of the White Paper, so that students can voice their concern on this matter, which concerns everyone.

The debate will be held tonight at 8 p.m. in the Junior Common Room, University College.

The no-holiday holiday.

Come to Britain and it's no holiday. The moment you get off the plane you're involved.

Not like most vacations, peering in from the outside. In Britain you're part of the action. And it's some action! We've got the discotheques, Carnaby Street, Kings Road and all the other fast-moving places you've heard about.

But, what about the things we take for granted: sifting through the Van Gogh's, Picasso's or Henry Moore's at the Tate Gallery; an afternoon watching the world's top drivers hauling their big, blasting, Formula 1 machines over the toughest circuits in Europe. Seeing a Shakespearean play, the way it should be seen - at Stratford-on-Avon with British actors; or perhaps, passing a sunny day at Lords watching the natives play their native game of cricket?

You can mix in, find out what we're all about - why Trafalgar Square isn't as square as you might think and a boat down the Thames means a roaring party, not a sedate sightseeing expedition. In Britain, it's all go. So why not go?

You could make it for as little as $175, that's for 9 days, hotel and two big meals a day. And, if you belong to a club or any organized group, you could cut the total price way down with a charter flight. Clip the coupon and find out what's going.

Come and take part in Britain - this year!

Varsity victorious over SAC . . . proclaimed as "great political victory"

The uneasy truce that has existed between The Varsity and the Students' Administrative Council broke into open violence Monday night as the two sides clashed in that annual spring mayhem better known as the Varsity-SAC hockey game.

Solid and poised from the goal out, the Inkmn (plus a few Inkettes thrown in for good measure) won what a neutral panel of judges termed a 12-8 victory.

Both teams deployed unbalanced attacking formations as each side admitted to a shocking dearth of legitimate "rightwingers."

In a jubilant Varsity dressing room the Inkmn's illustrious captain Brian Johnson claimed the triumph as a "great political victory".

An unkind voice in the background intoned, "Yes, but the only one."

Scoring for the Inkmn — Parkins 3, Rodger's 2, Mills 2, Carson 1, Little 1 and Johnson 3.

Student run course on community problems

A unique course on community problems is being initiated by students in the Political Economy Department.

The aim of the course is to understand the dynamics of municipal politics through action in the community, to see how "City Hall" works by fighting City Hall with the community.

Under the proposed set-up, students in the course would rent a large house in the area (Ward 6, south of College, west of Yonge, has been suggested), and live within the community they are working in. Only in this way, it has been argued, can the students be accepted by the community.

The course will be largely unstructured and would be almost entirely student-run. The students would write a group report describing and analysing their findings at the year's end. Group action would be encouraged throughout the year.

The course is not finalized and anyone interested in the concept of the course is invited to attend a meeting next Tuesday, March 24 at 1 p.m. in Sid Smith 3050. The structure and content of the course is still up for grabs.

Erindale election results

Bob Rudolf, a second year arts student, was elected president of Erindale's Student Administrative Government (SAG) yesterday.

Rudolf, defeating the other two runner-ups by a wide margin, replaces outgoing SAG president Paul Kochberg.

Two vice-presidents were elected — Rob Morningstar and Elizabeth Bell. Wendi Arnfield won the post of Secretary, while Paul Fairgrieve was acclaimed treasurer.

Vic ties series in interfac Hockey, B-ball

Flash! — Victoria College may not be shutout this year from a share of the interfac triple crown of sports (football, hockey and basketball).

After having already dropped the football title to the talented PhysEders Vic was on the verge of being eliminated from the other two after losing the opening game of the hockey and basketball finals.

The shiny edition of the Scarlet and Gold defeated St. Mike's 4-3 Monday night to even the Jennings Cup series at one game each.

Yesterday afternoon, the Vic basketballers, with their collective backs to the Hart House wall, edged the UC drib-blers 73-70 in a match that provided last minute thrills.

Monday night, the hockey team made the most of their manpower advantages to gain the victory.

Two of the Vic goals, (Peter Adams' first period marker and Joe Stewart's third period winner) came with a two man advantage.

The third game of the series goes tonight at 5:30 p.m. at Varsity. A win by either team gives them the Jennings trophy. In case of a tie a fourth match will be played at the same time tomorrow.

The deciding game for the Sifton Cup goes tomorrow at 7:00 p.m.

This is the last sports roundup of 1969-70

CURLING

The University of Toronto curling season ended last Sunday when John Francis and his rink won the Dean Maxwell Trophy in convincing fashion — defeating Terry Lalonde 17-10 in the ten-end final.

Francis and his team of Doug Harrold, Bob Hollingshead, and Paul Slocome were never behind in the high scoring contest, and after four ends were coasting on a 8-1 lead. But Lalonde, curling with Dave Shugarman, Doug Kirk, and Craig Harvey, made a fine raise double take-out to count six on the fifth end, and moved back into the game. Unruffled, Francis answered with a five on the sixth end, and controlled the game after that.

In earlier games Francis beat Art Moses 10-8 and Larry Westbrook 11-8. Lalonde, the defending champion, reached the final with more difficulty, as he needed an extra end to subdue Alan Bromstein 9-6, and then squeaked by George Carr's Varsity team 8-7.

Francis 104 305 040 x 17

GYMNASTICS

U of T's women's gymnastics team met other Canadian universities in Edmonton, Alberta, last weekend for the National Intercollegiate Championships. The Varsity team of Sue Christilaw, Sue Young, Connie Lindenburger and Marty Kemeny placed second in this, their first national competition, only eight points behind the perennial champs, UBC.

Team member Ruth McMullen missed the competition because of an ankle injury suffered in the team's last meet.

Taking honours for the U of T team in the finals on Saturday were Sue Christilaw, fifth in the vaulting, and Marty Kemeny, second in the floor exercises. Marty, who placed sixth all around, was chosen as a member of the team to represent Canada in the World Student Games in Torino, Italy, next August.

Coach Carol-Ann Letheren was chosen as coach for the National Student Team.

SAILING

The University of Toronto Sailing Club has recently announced that it has reorganized under the direction of a new executive for the Spring and Fall seasons. The club will be participating in the recently formed Canadian Inter-Collegiate Sailing Association and also the Midwest Collegiate Sailing Association.

Between the two organisations the club expects to be sending crews out to approximately 20 events between now and the end of November. This should give ample opportunity to sail for most of the active members.

Scheduled events include the Columbus Star trophy at Ohio State University, regattas at Kent State, John Carroll, R.M.C., Queens, McMaster, and Wayne State.

The club also has announced plans to hold a two-day regatta on May 30-31. The event will take place on the Royal Canadian Yacht Club race course and will be participated in by eight Canadian and eight American universities. Included will be Trent, Queens, Scarborough, Mac, RMC, Michigan State, Ohio State, and several other schools.

There will be an organizational meeting in Hart House in the Debates Room on Thursday, March 19 at 5 p.m. Those interested in helping to work out the details of the event and possibly represent Toronto are invited to attend.

Besides actual racing events the club expects to be able to offer its members both on-shore and in-boat instruction as well as informal sailing next fall. Prospective members are urged to attend the Thursday meeting.

GOODBYE

T. A. REEDTH
Miss Boyd says that ASCP (Div. I) and Knox (Div. II) have won the T. A. Reed Trophy for participation and goodth in Interfacu athletics and, since I have no reason to doubt her, I pass the story on to you.

WATER POLO

Good conditioning — many Vic players are Varsity swimmers — helped Vic overcome a half-time 2-4 score and narrow the tar out of Knox 12-4. This gives Vic the Meister Eckardt Trophy (named after a mediaeval mystic who said that "God is the referee in the water polo match of the world") for the first time since 1943. Adams with 4, Karn, Bryon (2), Heatley (2), and Coleman (2) scored for Vic; Wade in the Water had 3 and Brydon the other for the surprisingly strong School Of Hard Knox.

INTERMEDIATE HOCKEY FINALS

Trin B, Worts and all, beat Meds D 5-0 in the first game of the finals. Worts, Burt (2), Davey and Love were Trin scorers.

Catch-up football not good enough

By PAUL CARSON

It began in brilliant sunshine and ended in freezing rain and mud. A magnificent late summer afternoon in Guelph as Blues handed Gryphons 15 points and lost by one; a painful, cold late autumn nightmare in Montreal as Blues made McGill's storybook year complete, losing 17-0 to the new Yates Cup champs.

Two games, two losses which typify Varsity football 1969. Blues had the potential, but somehow they just couldn't put it all together.

Blues hurt themselves all season by inconsistent play — especially in the first half — numerous foolish penalties, and a series of crucial mental and physical lapses just when it really mattered.

Blues played only one good first half all season — when they held Western to a net offence of a mere 24 yards and led 14-0 en route to a convincing 41-16 rout.

Otherwise, the season was one game of catch-up football after another. Blues caught up five times altogether, then blew two of them in the last minute.

OPENING TIE

In the Western exhibition game, mistakes and a dubious penalty gave Stangs a last second field-goal and a 16-16 tie.

In league play, Blues needed second half rallies of 22 points to overcome Mac (35-16) and 21 points to get past Waterloo (31-21). Rookie QB Wayne Dunkley scored late in the fourth quarter as a typical Varsity rally edged McGill 17-16 for Redmen's only loss.

In Kingston Blues bumbled while Gaels amassed a 24-0 lead at the half but Varsity roared back after the intermission only to fall short 24-17.

The rematch followed the typical Blues script — a late rally put Varsity ahead, then a needless roughing penalty kept the Queens drive alive and a last minute 18-yard pass on third down sunk Toronto 16-14.

Blues played their hearts out in the finale but couldn't produce the big play and Chris Rumball's 90-yard punt return clinched the Yates for McGill.

RECORD FOR WALTER

An 85-yard td pass against Western enabled veteran flanker Eric Walter to set new career scoring marks of 30 touchdowns and 180 points. Walter won the Copp Trophy as Blues MVP but didn't catch a single pass in the last key games against Queens and McGill.

Despite their third-place finish, Blues placed nine players on the SIFL all-star teams . . . receivers John Chapman and Walter, halfback Walt Sehr, diminutive QB Vic Albino, tackles Jim Bennett, Jim Kellam and Derek Turner, defensive end Alex Squires, and safety Pete Lamantia.

Bennett, Paul McKay and Peter Raham were selected in the CFL pro draft.

In the College Bowl, Manitoba Bisons climaxed an undefeated season by ousting McGill 24-15.

In interfac football, PhysEd finally ended Vic's Mulock Cup string at eleven with a well-deserved 16-12 victory over the Scarlet and Gold.

Hockey agony and winning ecstasy

By LYNDON LITTLE

"The agony and the ecstasy" might be the best way of describing the hockey Blues 1969-70 season.

The agony was the result of the knowledge that Blues had another potential powerhouse if only an unprecedented rash of injuries could be overcome.

The ecstasy came when Blues finally put all the broken, stretched, torn and dislocated pieces together just in time to win their fifth consecutive OQAA crown and their fourth national title in the last five years.

As Tom Watt's team began their exhibition schedule Blues were logically rated as one of the teams to beat in Canadian college hockey.

The only question mark was on the wing positions where graduation had cost them the services of Steve Monteith, Ward Passi, Bob McClelland and Gord Cunningham. Together, these four players had accounted for 32 goals the previous campaign.

But, from the exhibition schedule-until Christmas it was for Blues the old story, too familiar in sport these days, of early promise turned sour by a plague of unpredicted injuries.

The first to go was team captain Brian St. John who suffered strained knee ligaments in a Nov. 10 practise.

Then, defenseman Brent Swanick re-injured his knee in a pre-season tilt with Laurentian.

The next to go was rookie Nick Holmes who was hit with a serious shoulder injury during Blues traditional weekend foray into New York State.

In the first league game against the Western Mustangs all-star rearguard Bill L'Heureux had his wrist broken.

Bryan Tompson (in the second exhibition game with Laurentian), Bob Hamilton, Terry Parsons and Mike Boland (all in the Christmas Loyola tournament) were the other casualties.

At this point, Blues were still only second in the OQAA west, trailing the high-flying Waterloo Warriors.

Slowly however, as January turned into February, and one by one the injured players returned, Blues began to gather momentum.

On the weekend of Jan. 9-10, with the bitter taste of Loyola still lingering, Blues made a road trip to McMaster and Windsor coming away with impressive 6-1 and 9-2 victories.

A week later, Blues trounced the Guelph Gryphons 12-1 which at that point Watt described as the team's best effort.

By the time the OQAA and CIAU playoffs arrived Blues were once again in high gear.

And as a consequence, if you walk past the trophy case in Hart House you can see the Queen's Cup and the University Cup resting comfortably where they belong.

B-ball Blues . . . next year?

There's this tradition in sporting circles that a losing coach, near the end of the season, will optimistically promise better things "next year".

Unfortunately, for mentor John MacManus and the BasketBlues, looking ahead to "next year" quickly became the morphine to dull the pains of Blues worst SIBL campaign — a miserable 1-9 mark and (not surprisingly) last place.

With all-star guard Bruce Dempster defected to Western and his backcourt mate Larry Trafford missing from the opening lineup, Blues crop of rookies just couldn't get any momentum going.

Blues only victory, 86-81 over Waterloo, eliminated Warriors from the playoff chase. A strong McMaster team crushed Western for the OQAA title but fell to the undefeated UBC Thunderbirds 96-75 in the CIAU finals.

Brightest star for Varsity was veteran center John Hadden, whose determined play kept Blues in the thick of several games they just might have won with greater depth and experience. Hadden was Blues MVP and repeated as OQAA all-star center. Selected along with Dempster to the Canadian National team, he'll have to pass up the World Student Games due Goodbye . . .

By JIM COWAN

Since time immemorial, or at least since 1966, which is as far back as I looked, it has been the custom of the major domo of this Department to seat himself in front of his typewriter on the night before the last paper and, with his notes on one side and his beer on the other, review the athletic happenings of the past year.

But first, as we say in the trade, time out for this message. . .

We happen to think that sports is one of the best-read sections of The Varsity, and perhaps the only one left with any credibility with the mass of U of T students.

And that's strange, because we probably spew out more propaganda than all the other departments of the paper combined.

Now this is not to suggest you should stop reading us. We generally manage to get the scores right, and the standings and so on.

But that's only part of the story.

When we say "The Blues were unfortunately unable to take advantage of their chances to score" what we really mean is that the team was so hopelessly incompetent that nothing could save them. And when we say "A defensive lapse cost Blues the game" we probably mean that Joe Athlete got tangled up in his jock strap and blew the play.

There's a very good reason for our pussyfooting, of course. If we ever come out and criticize any team or individual too strongly, we soon find it impossible to do any sort of a job because athletes and coaches, being human, don't like criticism.

And now, in a remarkable about face, I'm going to tell you why I agree with things the way they are, at least most of the time.

University athletes, unlike the pros, don't get paid anything for the effort they put into their sports. About all they get is the satisfaction of playing their own sport, and whatever recognition they receive by being good. That's not much in return for what they put out, and without getting trite, there's a Hell of a lot of effort the fans never see.

That's why any criticism we offer is in general and muted terms. Maybe if some of the "fans" remembered what goes into a game, they'd be a little less ready to criticize too.

End of lecture.

By any reckoning, Varsity teams had a good year. The men brought home no fewer than eight championships of various shades while the distaff side chimed in with another six.

For the men, it was hockey (of course), swimming, fencing, squash, rugby, badminton, skiing and bridge (bridge??!). The women brought back titles in curling, archery, field hockey, swimming, badminton and volleyball. But the list of titles, records and honours is really not all that meaningful. And so to all the teams which don't have big shiny trophies to show off, congratulations anyway.

And finally, to all the people who have helped us this year: Miss Lee, Miss Boyd, Ron Murphy, Tom Watt, Dave Copp, John McManus, Ed Armstrong, Howie Ringham, all the players on all the teams, the girls in the WAB, all the coaches and managers we never got around to meeting in person, Dalt White, Warren Stevens, and everyone else in the sports hierarchy: thanks. You're all great.

To the writers: Peter White, Dan McAlister, Art Stein, Rowland Griffin, Robin Campbell, Colin Pilmer, Nan Flindall, Frances Flint, Leslie Johnson, Howie Fluxgold, the immortal Gellius, Peter Adamson and all the others who helped out second term: without you it would have been impossible.

To the photographers: Don Andrews and Spencer Higgins, Brian Sweet, Peter Kirby, Alan Van Geijn, and the rest of the shutterbugs; you amply proved that, especially in sports, a picture is worth at least a thousand words.

Three special thank-you's. To Brian Johnson, Varsity editor, for giving us a relatively free hand and providing something for sports to be the last three pages of:

To my predecessor, Paul Carson, who continued to fill in any gaps I left, worked as hard in the second term as he did as sports editor in the first, and who left such a well organized operation that things often seemed to run themselves;

And finally, and perhaps most especially, to my heir apparent, Lyndon Little. He made my job much easier, and his acceptance of this post bodes well for the future of the department.

It's been fun, most of the time, working for the paper these past three years, and an awful lot of that fun has come from being associated with sports. Thanks to everyone who made it possible, and best of luck for the future.

And now . . . where's my beer?

SAVE THE DAY CARE CENTRE

The Day Care Centre — 12 Sussex Avenue.

The Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre serves students, faculty, and support staff of the university, as well as parents in the outside community.

- The Centre needs $3000 to make repairs to the premises on Sussex Ave.
- It needs expanded facilities to meet the growing demand for day care.

The U of T administration refuses to take responsibility for day care

- It won't pay the repairs.
- It won't guarantee the Centre's continued accommodation.

The Day Care Centre asks the U of T community for support.

RALLY • SIDNEY SMITH • NOON TODAY

Day care confronts Bissell: yes or no?

By LIZ WILLICK and RON COLPITTS

In an emergency meeting last night, 45 parents and volunteers from the Campus Cooperative Day Care Centre decided to march on Simcoe Hall to demand that President Bissell reply to their request for renovations.

The march will follow a mass rally in the free speech area of Sid Smith today at 1 p.m.

A small deputation will carry the demand for needed renovations to Bissell, requiring him to speak to the crowd outside. They expect a clear yes or no answer.

The urgency behind the demand for renovations arises from the fact that without them, the Centre cannot be licensed. In such a case, it is likely that the authorities would close down the centre over the summer months when little support could be mustered.

After months of negotiation, the U of T administration has not met the original basic demands of the Campus Community Cooperative Day Care Centre.

THE DEMANDS

The demands were four:

- that the University guarantee space for the centre.
- that larger safer accommodation be provided
- that the University undertake necessary renovations
- that the rent be free.

K. S. Gregory, Administrative Assistant to Executive Vice-President (non-academic), A. G. Rankin, assured the Centre occupancy of its present quarters at 12 Sussex St. until April 30, 1970. The Centre has agreed to pay rent of $50, which is sufficient to cover municipal taxes.

Clarifying the administration's stand on the other demands in a letter dated March 20, Gregory said, "The University can give no guarantee that other quarters can be made available" when the present building is demolished.

He also said that there is no larger house available which would permit expansion, and no guarantee that there would be.

In reply to the demand for renovation work, he stated flatly, "The University will not undertake to make, or to finance, the renovations to 12 Sussex Avenue which are required because of the Centre's use of the property."

ADMINISTRATION RESPONSIBILITY

Renovations are essential if the centre is to obtain the license it needs to remain in operation. The people at the Centre contend that this is the responsibility of the university, since the service is provided for its student, faculty and support staff.

The Day Care Centre operates at a minimal cost to parents. Should it be forced to raise its fees, most would no longer be able to afford it.

The Centre cares for over 20 children under two years of age. Almost no other services exist in the city for that age bracket. Where day care exists at all, the cost is usually prohibitive to most parents.

As might be expected, the Centre is bright, cheerful and noisy. It is staffed by two full time people on subsistence wages and by volunteers.

Bonnie MacTaggart is the mother of 15-month old Heather and a student at Teacher's College. Her husband is a grad student at U of T.

DON'T FENCE ME IN

She explained that Heather was sent to a sitter for the first week-and-a-half of the term and "the lady was horrible. The sitter kept her in a play pen all the time. They don't do that here."

She feels that "the Centre meets the needs of the children. They are allowed to do what they want within a structured situation, but they are protected from themselves and environmental dangers. The baby really enjoys it."

Another mother, Sandra Foster, finds the Centre wonderfully healthy for her little girl. "Johanna is a very well socialized animal. She's completely different from any other kid I've seen at 3 months," she said.

"She had developed a distinctive personality earlier than any other child I've known," Sandra attributes this to the Day Care Centre "and to mother's milk."

SPEAKING FOR THEMSELVES

A recent interview with some of the little people at the centre went something like this.

Varsity: "What is your position on cooperative day care centres?"

Lyndsay, 20 months: shyly, "It's nice"

Johanna, 3 months: silence, but with a large smile behind a clenched fist.

Alexis, 9 months: grinning silence, punctuated by drooling.

Varsity: "What would your days be like if you couldn't go to the day care centre?"

Jeanne, 19 months: "Yawn!"

Varsity: "Do you wish there was room for more of your friends?"

Nita, 2 years: crawling over three of her comrades, "Yes."

Varsity: "Is this a good place for doing creative things?"

There seemed to be general agreement that it was a pretty creative milieu, as borne out by the achievements of the group to date.

Varsity: "Would you be willing to assist in renovations?"

Lyndsay: "Yes." (as she rearranged furniture and toys and offered to decorate the walls.)

Varsity: "What do you think about having to move out?"

Nita: "HmmmH...Nope!" (Most of the little people didn't seem to want to think about it.)

Varsity: "What do you think of the administration's response to the day care problem?"

Heather, 13 months: "AaaaaaH!"

Alexis: silence, followed by loud wailing (His diapers were suddenly very wet).

So you think you want to be a journalist? Come to a meeting to organize The Summer Varsity, 1970, tonight at 7:30 in the Varsity office, 91 St. George St. We need writers (all kinds) photographers, lay-out people, etc., etc.

The summer paper is published weekly in July and early August, and the emphasis is on writing about, taking pictures of, drawing, what interests you. If you can't make tonight's meeting, sign up on the sheets in the Varsity office any time and we'll get in touch with you, or call summer editor Jim Cowan at 923-4053.

Day care is a necessity

I am appalled at the attitude of the administration of the University of Toronto toward the Campus Community Cooperative Day Care Centre. The critical shortage of adequate day care facilities for children in our city should be taken seriously by the university.

The University has an obligation to provide social services for its students and staff as it has recognized by establishing counselling services for its students and staff.

The Day Care Centre is a very necessary service which should be provided free of charge.

I believe that it is the responsibility of the university to provide the Day Care Centre with the best possible facilities and would hope very much that the administration will begin immediately negotiations with the Centre.

A history of frustration . . .

At noon today in Sidney Smith, students, faculty, and support staff, of this university should rally to support the Day Care Centre's struggle for survival against the U of T administration.

Throughout the months of fruitless negotiations with the administration, direct action has proved to be the only effective method of jolting Simcoe Hall into some positive response.

An examination of the Day Care Centre's brief history is a chronology of frustration:

- At the initiative of the Toronto Women's Liberation Movement, the Students' Administrative Council asked the U of T administration to provide facilities to establish a day care centre for its employees and students.

- They were disarmed by an unexpected response of sympathy and promises of help from Simcoe Hall. But after meetings with Prof. Don Forster, U of T Vice-Provost and Executive Assistant to the President, and with Brian Levitt, his special assistant, the day-care organizers were told that the administration could not help. They were referred to Crown Trust, who handles all U of T rental arrangements.

- On their own initiative, the organizers phoned Crown Trust, who said there weren't any houses available.

- They walked up and down the street in the university area and found that the Crown Trust house at 12 Sussex Ave. was empty.

- When the organizers asked Crown Trust about the empty house, the rental agents said it would be torn down in a few months and that the wiring was unsafe.

- By this time, applications for day-care had been received from parents of over 40 children, and the organizers agreed to take the house even under the limited conditions.

- A housing inspector said the wiring in the house had been installed two years ago and was safe.

- About 20 parents and the organizers met Thursday September 18 and decided they were fed up with the university. They agreed to occupy the house. There was a broken window in the back door. They spent the weekend painting and cleaning the house.

Crown Trust first offered rent at $150 per month one week after the centre opened on Sept. 22. On Oct. 6, after negotiations, Brian Levitt wrote a letter offering to reduce the rent to $75.

"The university cannot guarantee our occupancy of 12 Sussex past the end of December," Levitt wrote. "We are, however, doing our best to find suitable premises for you to occupy in the new year."

At this point the whole matter of the Day Care Centre shifted from the politicians of Simcoe Hall to its property managers.

Correspondingly the administration's attitude changed from one of "helpful co-operation" to one of bureaucratic stubbornness.

When K.S. Gregory, an administrative assistant (non-academic), told the Day-Care Centre it was on a month-to-month lease, the co-operative became understandably alarmed.

Day-Care Centre parents and volunteers wrote a brief to Gregory, who refused to guarantee space, to look for other facilities, or to pay for necessary alterations.

Repairs costing three thousand dollars are needed to make the building meet provincial fire and health regulations.

By refusing to pay for the repairs, the administration is, in effect, shutting down the Day Care Centre.

Even if the Centre could afford the repairs, the Sussex house is too small to allow for necessary expansion of the centre. At present there are 25 children on the waiting list for day care.

The volunteers also feel a responsibility to the present parents to continue to include children who are now reaching two years old and who need a larger, separate area.

But more important, with the lease offered, the Centre still has no guarantee of space; it could spend the $3,000, and be evicted — whenever the Administration wishes — with a compensation of only $50 per month for the period up until April 30, 1972.

The parents and volunteers have a right to be disgusted with the months of frustrating negotiations that have culminated in a policy which flatly rejects any administrative responsibility for day-care.

It took an occupation to get the Day-Care Centre; it might take an occupation to save it.

NOW YOU MUST REALIZE THAT THE U OF T. IS NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR THE DAY CARE SITUATION. IN ANY CASE, WE WILL BE REPLACING IT WITH FAMILY HOUSING WHICH OF COURSE, IS A SERVICE TO THE COMMUNITY. (AS A MATTER OF FACT, MY WIFE AND I ARE LOOKING FORWARD TO MOVING INTO ONE OF THE UNITS....)

. . . and you ask, 'Why day care?'

Day-Care facilities are not a luxury but a necessity; the Star estimates that there are 135,000 children in Metro who need day care.

Women supply over 30 per cent of the work force in Ontario and the largest proportion of these are married women. Even though their salaries are likely to be half that of men in similar job classifications, the money that these women earn is necessary to the support of their families.

A frequent reason for the withdrawal of women from the work force — or, in the case of the University, from school — is simply that there are no facilities for the care of their children.

Without adequate day care facilities most are submitted to feelings of worry and guilt about the care of their children.

This oppression is especially heavy for women who are the sole support of their families.

It is social stupidity to force women to withdraw from the work force when it means their families will fall below the poverty line or that they will be unable to develop or to utilize special abilities and skills.

But it is not only women who work who have a right to day care.

Every woman should have the opportunity to exist in a social milieu. The experience of women is often a sad contradiction of this. They find themselves trapped in an apartment for eight hours a day with small children.

In this situation — which describes most nuclear families — children become the "creation" of a woman, become objects through which she finds her self-definition through whose accomplishments she assesses her worth.

Instead of a public life, she is offered the family.

There are special reasons for supporting the Campus Day-Care Centre.

- It is attached to the workplace but controlled by the parents and people who work there; that is, decisions about the socialization of the children are not the responsibility of any one person but of the collective.

- It is the only centre of its kind in Toronto. The fees of the other centres which take children under two are inaccessible to all but the top ten per cent of the earning population.

- It directly serves members of the university community, students, support staff and members of the surrounding community.

an example

I am aware of the fact that without the services of the Day Care Centre, a whole change would occur in my family-situation. Only from the financial point of view, my husband being a student without any loan or grant, would be obliged to withdraw from university in order to supply the necessary means to support the family.

As for myself, I am a low-income staff-member of the U of T.

I managed to make both ends meet each month thanks to the inexpensive and reliable services of the Day Care Centre.

'administration has reneged on responsibility'

The duplicity of the administration of this university in dealing with the problems of the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre is a matter not only for self-righteous condemnation on the part of the university community, but for action.

The question of day care in our society is one of vital importance.

It is important in so far as it frees women from the restrictive stereotypes of the past. It is important in financial terms to innumerable families, who require the income of more than one person in order to maintain a decent standard of living. It is important to any student who has a child and cannot afford or does not wish that their child be subjected to a succession of babysitters.

The administration of this university has reneged on its responsibility to provide conditions conducive to genuine learning in many areas. In this case, their action can only lead to the destruction of an embryo project of primary concern to over 30 families (and potentially many more).

In many ways the centre is still in its experimental stages, but it has proven its viability and importance in the past year.

The parents and volunteers are determined not to let the project die because the University authorities shirk their responsibility to anything but administrative efficiency.

We support their determination and we will support any action they may take with our voices and with our bodies if such is required.

It's anachronistic not to support day care

I would like to protest the University's recent ambiguous decisions in relation to the Day Care Centre at 12 Sussex. Given the financial need of the Centre, those decisions are tantamount to refusing its continued existence. It seems to me anachronistic at the very least to refuse to support such a centre which is vitally important to many students, employees and their young children.

Destroying the Day Care Centre will make it impossible for many women to continue either to work or study at the University since most child care facilities or arrangements are either exorbitant as to cost, inadequate to the needs of the children and usually both.

Given the inadequate state of social welfare services in Canada as compared to most other developed countries, both East and West, it is incredible that the University would choose to ignore its responsibility to its female employees and students. In effect the University, along with many other institutions in Canada, is penalizing women for having children.

It is time to put an end to such anti-social practices which place all the burden of child rearing on the nuclear family thereby discriminating against all but the most affluent.

University ignores its social obligation

The University's refusal to uphold the continuation and expansion of the Day Care Centre at 12 Sussex Ave. is another example of how blind it is to the social obligation it owes not only to the staff and students of this university, but also to the surrounding community. Denying that such a service is not necessary is sheer stupidity in case the administration does not realize why it is important, we list a few:

- women DO work to supplement the family income

University staff need Centre

The Day Care Centre serves a vital part of the life of my one and a half year old daughter and myself every day while I am working in a University office. I would have trouble finding a better or less expensive service if it were forced to close.

Pam Carroll

- single parent families are a reality.
- low income families DO exist (right here in Toronto).
- students HAVE children
- the wages paid at this university are low.
- children DO need a place to be cared for (preferably near their mothers or fathers). Only when this university faces reality and provides material and financial backing to the day care centre will it then make the first small step to becoming a place where people count.

York offers support

An Open Letter to the Day Care Centre

We were shocked to learn of the University of Toronto administration's refusal to grant space to the Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre. The York administration, although they had threatened to take away the rooms given to us by a college council earlier in the year, has obviously realized that our day care centre serves an important function and has popular support on the campus.

The rooms we now occupy have been guaranteed us until September and we are presently negotiating for space for next year.

The university administration of York and of the University of Toronto cannot deny that we fill a need of many people for inexpensive day care for their children. Both parents and children benefit from the co-operative.

Some of us will be demonstrating with you on Wednesday to show our support.

Administration's policy:

OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE PRESIDENT (UNIVERSITY)

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO
STUDENT & CANADA

COMM/5904-12

March 26, 1970

Mrs. Leonora J. G. Smith,
550 Steadman Crescent,
Toronto 4, Ontario.

Dear Mrs. Smith:

Re: 12 Sussex Avenue

We have your letter of March 19, 1970 and note the three requests therein. We must advise as undernoted.

- 1) The University can give no guarantee that other quarters can be made available for rental to the Centre when 12 Sussex Avenue is demolished.
- 2) The University does not have a larger and more suitable house available for rent and can give no guarantee that it will have.
- 3) The University will not undertake to raise, or to finance, the renovations to 12 Sussex Avenue which are required because of the Centre's use of the property.

The proposal made to you in our letter of March 16th assures you of occupancy of 12 Sussex Avenue until April 30, 1972, or of financial compensation should the period be shorter, and of occupation beyond that date should the building remain standing. The rental of $50 is only sufficient to meet municipal taxes and the Centre has therefore been offered what is essentially rent-free use of the premises. As we stated previously the University does not have funds available to provide day-care facilities and it is not considered that this is a responsibility of the University.

Yours sincerely,

K. S. Gregory,
Administrative Assistant.

Day Care Centre is necessary in Toronto

The Toronto STAR estimates that 135,000 children in Metro Toronto need Day Care. There are 45,130 under the age of six; there are 83 nurseries caring for only 3,710 preschoolers; there is practically no care for infants.

What could the U of T do toward remedying this situation?

One can think of many things — extensive day care facilities for all students, faculty, and support staff needing such, promotion of wide spread and long range community research and action etc.

Instead the U of T adminisnot a mediaeval university?

We urge the administration of the University of Toronto to give all required support to the Day Care Centre. Many members of the campus community have young children and cannot work, teach or study without such assistance.

This is not a mediaeval university attended by celibate clergy with benefices or monasteries to support them.

Financial aid to the Day Care Centre would be a small recognition of the actual needs of today's university community.

University should repair the Day Care Centre

I support the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre in its demand that the university administration recognize its responsibilities to the workers, students faculty and community in providing free accommodation that is equipped to fire and safety standards.

350 OCCUPY SIMCOE HALL

About 350 supporters of the Campus Day Care Centre carried out the first occupation in University of Toronto history yesterday afternoon as they swept past struggling policemen on the stoirs of Simcoe Hall to take control of the Senate Chambers on the second floor.

About 350 supporters of the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre carried out the first occupation of Simcoe Hall in U of T history yesterday.

They won their way into the building and pushed up to the Senate Chambers after U of T President Claude Bissell refused to come outside to speak to the crowd gathered on the front steps.

Two hundred and fifty occupiers spent the night in the building, and at press time (2 a.m. this morning) they were still in the Senate Chambers. They are planning a mass rally for 12 noon in front of Simcoe Hall.

Bissell to ask for $2,000

Seven delegates from the 300 demonstrators in Simcoe Hall met with U of T President Claude Bissell at 2:45 p.m. yesterday in Convocation Hall after waiting half an hour for the President. The delegates included representatives from the Day Care Centre, the SAC, and The Varsity.

Dr. Bissell suggested two possible ways of providing support to the day care centre:

- a long-term commitment by the U of T Board of Governors to give financial support to the centre;

- a short-term grant from the Varsity Fund.

"I can't give you a guarantee of the former," Bissell told the delegates.

"You would have to go before the Board and make your case there. . . . And then there is the fundamental question of whether or not the university is responsible for the welfare. . . ."

"...of its own members," interrupted SAC Vice-President Bob Barkwell.

"Yes," Bissell answered.

"What the university has said is that it is a fine idea," he added, "But we're not willing to make a long term commitment, because we are not a social welfare agency."

"The university is concerned with the welfare of children, but it's not in fact obliged to set aside part of its budget."

"You're saying that the university is like any other institution in society," said Barkwell.

"No, I'm just giving the university's present position," said Bissell.

"But you're not willing to work to change it," shot back Barkwell. "... You wouldn't have the problem you have here if you'd answered the people outside."

"I don't like responding to mob hysteria," said Bissell.

"I am not willing to allocate university money to this commitment at this time," he added.

Barkwell drew an analogy to the construction of Graduate Students Union bar, which the administration helped finance. He asked why it was a higher priority than the day-care centre.

"It's not just a bar; it's a social amenity," said Bissell.

"That's a euphemism," said Barkwell. "It's a bar."

"No, it's a social centre," insisted the President.

The delegates left the meeting and returned to the crowd of demonstrators in Simcoe Hall. Bissell had left them with two possibilities for financing the Day Care Centre for an interim period:

- He personally committed himself to recommend to the Varsity Fund that it provide a grant of $2,000.

• K. S. Gregory had already talked to William Stewart of the Province's Department of University Affairs in an attempt to get a non-formula grant for day-care.

But Bissell would not commit the university to any responsibility for day care.

President Claude Bissell, told the Senate Chamber occupiers at 6 p.m. yesterday that he would recommend the Varsity Fund donate $2,000 for renovation of the day care centre. He then went home for a double scotch.

...suggests a committee

The Senate Chamber must have had three of four hundred people crammed into it when Claude Bissell made his first public appearance of the day.

Somebody had just finished reading out the stories from the late editions of the Star and Tely when Bissell wandered in.

A small floodlight went on, TV cameras focused on him, reporters gathered round and Bissell, with his characteristically bashful grin, wondered how do you work a megaphone anyway.

His first words, jokingly:

"This reminds me of several scenes from Harvard. . . . A few inarticulate mumbles. Then he was terse and to the point:

"I understand you have asked me to make a pledge regarding making renovations to the Day Care Centre," he started out.

"As I explained to your committee," he went on, "I am quite prepared to go to the Board of Directors of the Varsity Fund.

"I think I can give reasonable assurance that their response will be positive. The number of people I've talked to indicates that on the whole the response will be favourable."

Bissell was repeating his earlier offer, which he made at the 2 p.m. meeting with the sit-inners' representatives, to try and get the required $2,000 from the Varsity Fund by Wednesday next week.

Standing near the centre of the oak-panelled room, crossed arms nursing the megaphone, he explained that there were some "very general issues involved" in the matter, specifically "the nature of the responsibility of the university for what could be called the social welfare of its members."

"I am prepared to recommend a committee be established. . . ."

Jeers. Catcalls. Hooting, Laughter. It was the story of his life and he joked:

"I'm afraid I don't share your enthusiasm for committees," but it wasn't funny enough and there was more boing.

"I am prepared to establish a committee," he resumed, "which would probe the nature and extent of the social welfare responsibility of the university."

"I am leaving for home now for a double scotch and I hope that you will do likewise."

Someplace in the Chamber a baby was babbling in a squeaky voice as Bissell finished off:

"I ask you if you will now leave this senate chamber and leave this building."

He turned around and left abruptly. So abruptly in fact that he walked off with the megaphone and somebody had to call out "Stop thief."

...and students are mad

It had been predicted minutes before Bissell aired. "No matter how much he grimaces and bleeds for us, no matter how much he complains about the powerlessness of the university president, don't believe it," Dennis Corcoran had been saying.

And now Bissell had said he would try and convince the 35 directors of U of T's slush fund, the Varsity Fund, to put up the $2,000. He also suggested a committee to talk about U of T's "social welfare responsibility".

And so, when Bissell suddenly finished his 5:30 p.m. speech and walked out, there was a spontaneous reaction.

"The fact that he has come in, talked to us, and then walked out, shows that he thinks he should talk to us but we shouldn't talk to him," said Peggy Morton.

"The university president doesn't have to go and talk to any goddamn directors before a building belonging to the university can be repaired."

Passing around the megaphones from hand to hand, the three to four hundred people voted to stay put until the university gave a guarantee that the renovations required to meet fire and safety regulations would be made.

Said philosophy professor Lorene Smith: "What we want is a guarantee that the renovations will be done whether President Bissell chooses to get the money from the Varsity Fund or from some other source."

The decision of the occupiers was then communicated through vice-president Robin Ross to Bissell.

A debate followed on whether the press, including The Varsity, which was preparing today's paper at the Senate Chamber table, should be excluded from the hall. This was defeated and committees were set up to keep the front doors of Simcoe Hall open, the corridors and chamber swept clean, and to look for food.

UofT police were sympathetic, but upset at hostility

"Push the pigs out of the way. . . ." a mother is escorted crying, down the student-jammed stairs. . . . shouts of "They're hurting the babies."

This was the scene at 1 p.m. as sweating, grunting U of T police held 200 students back on the stairs of Simcoe Hall.

One, a white-haired cop of about 50, with the kind of crinkles that would make a good Lions' Christmas benefit Santa Claus, grinned at the people downstairs.

Minutes later, he was being pulled out of the way by students from the rear. He raised his fist — then lowered it and moved out of the way.

During the occupation itself, the police seemed jovial and confused. They treated the whole thing as some kind of game, that put them temporarily on the other side of the students.

Although they were sympathetic to the actual day-care issue, their general opinion of the sit-in was "No comment."

"The kids had a beef and wanted to air it, you know," said the Santa Claus cop.

Another was upset by the attitude of the students to the police.

"Why did you hit us? There were 200 of you and a few of us — you could have pushed us, you didn't need to hit."

He couldn't understand the use of the term "pigs", and the hostility shown by many students.

"It makes me sad. Some guys it makes mad — me, it just makes sad."

He called the use of babies as front line troops unfair. "If it had been my kid, I wouldn't have let him go; they could have been hurt."

A third guard leaned over and said confidentially, "They're not all students here, you know."

It was suggested to him that there were a few parents present.

"I've been told it's more than a few," he said. "And they've been well-trained, you know."

Santa Claus sighed and figured he would have to stick around until it was all over. "Boy, do my feet hurt," he said.

'Christ, it looks like an occupation'

By UZ WILLICK

SENATE CHAMBER — SIMCOE HALL — We stood on the steps of Convocation Hall with the babies and the balloons, waiting for Bissell.

I talked to two of the cops guarding the side entrance to Con Hall: "No, we don't expect trouble from this crowd... We never have any trouble with our students."

Word came out that Bissell was not going to talk to us. Angry and determined, people rushed the doors.

A few men backed the guard up against the wall to keep the doors open and prevent a fight. The crowd surged into the lobby and up the stairs. They were blocked near the top.

Trying to get closer to the action, I went up the back stairs with a friend. No opposition. At the top we were met by three uniformed U of T cops determined that if we were going anywhere, it would have to be up the main stairs.

Two plainclothesmen arrived and demanded press cards. I was allowed through, my friend turned back.

The scene from the top of the main stairs bordered on chaos. Three uniformed police and four plainclothesmen had stopped the demonstrators at the landing. But it was obviously an effort keeping things that way.

Sara Spinks, in the front line, bore the brunt of a lot of police frustration.

Her face, barely visible in the crush between the cops and the demonstrators showed anger — and pain. "We're asking for $1500. Look at the degree to which they're prepared to fight us. Bissell's desk probably cost $1500. WE'RE NOT MOVING."

Great pushing and shouting. A solid mass of people all the way down the stairs. Cops and press staring over the railing above.

A young photographer, staring at Sara, knuckles almost white on his camera — "They are such pigs — Look at them!"

Suddenly, Terry Thompson, a Centre volunteer, was hoisted up from the crowd. As she attempted to climb over the balustrade to the second floor, three cops converged on her.

They tried to push her off. Beyond the crowd on the stairs, there was only the stone floor.

The young photog and I each grabbed one of the cops. "You'll break her neck, for Christ sake." Screaming, trying to get to Terry, as the cops tried to shake us off.

Finally a plainclothesman motioned them off. Terry was up, followed by a blond student called Rick. The cops converged again, and as he made it over, started to scuffle with him.

I threw myself at Rick and pulled him away to the wall. Shaking, we hugged each other for a moment's support.

Without warning, about a dozen demonstrators arrived on the run from the back stairs.

The cops on the steps were outflanked. Again, the high-sign from a plain clothesman and the crowd flowed up.

The press concentrated on Bissell's office at the head of the stairs, with cops forming a line of resistance in front of the door.

"If we can't see Bissell, why should you?"

In the melee, a fist crashed through one of the engraved glass door panels. The sound of the glass shattering raised cheers.

"WE WANT BISSELL"
Vice-president Ross arrived "You sent a delegation. The President informed them that he would come to a meeting on April 1."

"WE WANT BISSELL"
Ross gave up and disappeared into the inner sanctum. The demonstrators filled the hallway and overflowed down the stairs. The cops still held the south corridor.

Johanna, 3 months and sporting an "I-am-an-enemy-of-the-state" button waved a fist from the security of her father's arms.

People milling about, talking, sitting. Addresses through a megaphone.

Natalie Davis: "All we want is a sign from the administration. It isn't just a few mothers and a few babies who care, but every woman on this campus, including professors with children."

Another woman: "We have to talk about the press and the cameras. If they're not press and taking pictures for the pigs, I think we should deal with that."

"Cops are lining the back stairs. If you go down they won't let you back up."

"They're trying to put off the inevitable crisis. We had to act now because when the students leave, we won't be able to do anything. That's why Bissell said Wednesday."

"They're beating someone up down there!"

People scrambling to their feet trying to see past the cops down the south corridor. More shouts. Tension at breaking point. Finally a long-haired student named David was allowed through to join us.

"What were you doing?"
"Nothing, just sitting on the floor."

An unhappy University of Toronto plainclothesman tries to hold back a mother and child intent on reaching President Claude Bissell on the second floor of Simcoe Hall to discuss the day care centre.

They just grabbed me. I guess they wanted me out."

"Why did they let you go?"
"I guess because they thought that's what the people wanted."

A decision was made to wait half an hour before deciding on further action.

Seated students pounding on the door of 218 where it was rumored that Bissell was closeted with Sword and Ross.

"YOU'VE GOT HALF AN HOUR"
"We're breaking U of T's virginity. It might even have an orgasm today."

Air getting worse. Everything locked up. No ventilation. People sitting all over. Smoke. Sweat. One washroom in the liberated zone. Constant stream of people looking for water.

"Let's take Bissell's office."
"No, get the Senate chamber."
"Why not both?"

Ross reappears. Tries to get through the crowd for a way. Gives up. No comment. Just smiles his Imperial British Smile.

He eventually announces that Bissell will speak to us — at 2 o'clock in Con Hall. Instant ousturb. Chorus of yes's and no's. He is eventually told to get out.

A decision is made to send a small delegation to Con Hall to receive his answer. If he wants discussion, he'll have to come back to us.

Downstairs the hall porter is still smiling.

"Has the demonstration done things hard for you?"

"Not at all. It kills the time. I am kind of enjoying it."

A talk with a U of T cop.

SAC postpones special meeting

By a meager two votes the Students' Administrative Council voted to postpone the joint council meeting last night because of the day-care center demonstration.

The meeting was to follow the joint council banquet in the Great Hall of Hart House, and elect next year's SAC executive. The banquet and the joint meeting are attended by the present SAC and the newly elected members.

"All we are is a bureaucracy, but tonight we can try to get out of that bureaucratic mold and do something relevant," said Art Moses (III UC), a member of both the old and new SAC.

The joint meeting will be held April 1, at 7 p.m.

"Would you answer some questions?"

"We aren't answer any questions at all. We have to be impartial. That way it doesn't put us on the spot and it doesn't put you on the spot."

Flo Woods, mother of 7-month-old Oona. "On the stairs, the cops were trying to push us down. One of the cops kicked Oona."

Ross to student, "Don't make any mistake about it. If there is violence, the University will deal with it... and would you mind calling him Doctor Bissell."

Two cops wander through carrying coffee for someone, checking the locked doors.

A student talks with a cop from France in French. Fellow cops are getting uptight.

Suddenly, the Senate chamber door is kicked in. People rush through with minimal resistance from two guards. No damage.

"THE SENATE BELONGS TO THE PEOPLE."

Red flag follows black. An "occupied" banner goes up from the window. "Tambourine Man" on a guitar from the middle of the floor.

"It's what I call a snow-white issue."

"The reason I'm here is because Prof. Natalie Davis gave a big pitch in class."

For a while, relative peace in the Senate Chamber. Windows wide open. Air!

A little tousled blond girl evading her mother amongst the high backed chairs. People sitting and resting. An older uniformed cop wanders in to rest for a while.

More and more people.
"Don't lose control of the halls."
"Don't let the front doors get locked so no one else can get in."

Mounds of bread arrive from nowhere. The diminishing cigarette supply is replenished.

Outside, in the real world, students still going calmly to classes and it's almost Easter.

Inside, more signs going up. Jesus Christ it looks like an occupation. One more sign goes up on the window facing the main campus:
"JOIN US"

SIMCOE HALL IS OCCUPIED

It all started with a noon rally at Sidney Smith and approximately 100 mothers, babies, students and faculty.

Lorenne Smith, Assistant Philosophy professor and a member of the Day Care Co-operative explained briefly to the crowd a history of the day care centre's struggles with the university.

The university had agreed to lease the centre at 12 Sussex Ave. to the Day Care co-operative for $50 a month but they refused to make the necessary $3,000 renovations so the centre could pass the city inspections.

"And now the centre has to expand," Mrs. Smith said. There is a waiting list of children who need day care. The centre also wants to be able to accept older children.

"As a member of the faculty," Mrs. Smith said "I am embarrassed by this move by the administration.

"And as a woman I find it insulting. It's unthinkable that a woman must give up her career or not be able to work when she needs to support a family, because she has children."

The Day Care Co-operative sent an ultimatum to Bissell yesterday morning demanding that the university accept the responsibility for renovations to 12 Sussex. Bissell was required to answer the crowd of people in person in front of Simcoe Hall.

There hadn't been much talking. It was about 12:30 when somebody shouted, "Babies up front, Everybody follow the parents and babies!"

Nobody paid attention to that, and the whole disorganized mass of balloons, baby carriages, two-year-olds, reporters, students with briefcases, and professors poured out of Sid Smith and onto St. George.

Probably 250 people in all were walking down St. George St., laughing and happy in the warm sun.

"The sidewalk belongs to the people!"

"Move up to the front!"

Traffic was held up on a red light as the parade trooped across, led by a broad white banner saying Support the Day Care Centre.

The demonstration reached Simcoe Hall almost too soon. There were fears Bissell was out to lunch still ("He's been out to lunch for ten years") because he expected the demonstration to arrive at 1 p.m.

It looked like there might be some standing around in the warm sunshine for a while.

At Simcoe Hall the campus police were prepared for the huge delegation that now numbered about 250. They allowed a delegation of parents to go up to Bissell's office.

Bissell spoke to the representatives but refused to address the larger crowd because he didn't believe they represented the Day Care Centre.

He said he would come to a Day Care Centre meeting next Wednesday at 12 Sussex.

Bissell's answer was loudly booed by the crowd who began to shout "We want Bissell now" in the direction of his office windows.

The crowd decided that since Bissell wouldn't come down they would go up to see him. They pushed through the main doors of Simcoe Hall and were met by campus police who pushed back.

In the middle of the shoving one of the mothers was caught with her baby on her back. Screaming and pushing the crowd managed to push the police aside and make a start for the stairs. The mother with the baby was up front and one of the police hit the baby.

Everyone surged for the stairs that led to Bissell's office and they were met by more police who tried to push them back again.

U of T vice-president Robin Ross appeared at the top of the stairs for a moment to survey the situation. He was met by jeers from the demonstrators.

Looking down on the crowd, Ross said, "President Bissell said he would meet you," and before leaving he added that the students should go back.

The demonstrators replied with chants of "We want Bissell, now."

So here's the picture:

About 250 people have pushed their way into Simcoe Hall and half way up the stairs to the second floor, which is where Bissell's office is.

Just above the first landing on the broad stone staircase, six or seven burly campus police have blocked the way up, straining against the pressure of the crowd, bracing themselves on the bannister.

For 15 minutes, more people pressed forward, babies were passed down out of the crowd on the stairwell, and the police were forced up several steps by the crowd's mounting pressure.

Two incidents broke the tension. First, two students started to climb directly up to the second floor from the landing. Police pushed them back into the crowd which was a good eight to ten feet below.

They tried again and succeeded in leaping over the second floor bannister where a student-police fracas started. One window pane outside Bissell's office was smashed in the melee.

At the same time a group of half a dozen students had gone around and up the back steps to Simcoe Hall and attacked the police on the stairwell from above, pulling them up the stairs. The crowd broke through from below and flooded onto the second floor. Bissell's office is right at the top of the stairs and the police formed a heavy line out front.

On the second floor, supporters stretched out along the hall before Bissell's door and near the Senate Chambers.

There was a short discussion about whether the press would be allowed to sit, and a Telegram reporter who refused to sit down was shoved aside.

As Don Forster, Executive Assistant to the President, and Robin Ross met to decide the administration's next move the students discussed their strategy.

"We have only the strength of our numbers," said David Depoe, a third year sociology student. "We will have to use our physical resource as our only resource."

Ross left to watch the crowd and would only say that the administration would make an announcement at the right time.

photos by gary wieland and errol young

Followed by about 250 supporters, mothers and children of the Campus Day Care Centre set off from Sid Smith in the spring sunshine yesterday to talk to the administration at Simcoe Hall.

Returning with the administration's reply, Ross said, "I've been asked by President Bissell to tell you that he is ready to speak to you in convocation Hall at 2:15."

The demonstrators had earlier decided that Bissell had until 2 p.m. to reply and shouts of "No!" followed Ross's statement.

"I think you can take it from me," Ross added, "as someone who knows the Senate Chambers far more than anyone else at the university that the Senate Chambers are far less comfortable than Convocation Hall."

"My suggestion is that you move on to Convocation Hall and Dr. Bissell will meet you there at 2:15."

Ross met with loud boos and jeers. "I think it's obvious," said Andy Wernick (SGS), "that if we go to Convocation Hall it will be impossible for us to get back here."

"Even if Convocation Hall is more comfortable I'd rather be back in the Senate Chambers."

Ross suddenly remembered a meeting of the Engineering Faculty and said the demonstrators could not use the Chambers because they had already been booked.

There were more discussions about the form the occupation should take and people tried to decide how long they should stay.

"We can stay here until the Day Care Centre gets its renovations," Heather Jon Maroney said. "They separate us time and time again and the same thing happens."

"I suggest that we send one person out to talk to Bissell but that person have no power to negotiate. We are here and we have to stay together."

The group decided to send one representative from the Day Care Centre, one representative from SAC, and a Varsity Reporter.

They met Bissell who had worked out a compromise.

Bissell said he would try to get the necessary money from the Varsity Fund and give an answer next Wednesday.

More discussion followed for and against Bissell's proposal. Most people wondered whether Bissell could actually keep his word.

Steve Langdon (IV Trin) said the administration had reversed their policy today. Originally they said they were not responsible for renovation but they had now agreed to seek funds, he said.

Langdon also reminded the demonstrators about the parallel between the St. Charles Day Care Centre and the U of T Centre.

"We asked for a similar sum of money," Langdon said, "and we got a similar response from the university. We got the money from the Varsity Fund."

"And secondly, it is wrong to consider the Varsity Fund as a separate entity from the administration and Bissell."

"The Varsity Fund has consistently followed every whim of Bissell's no matter what he has suggested. We can count on Bissell to keep his word."

The Senate Chambers' doors had been pushed open and students were occupying the corridor in front of Bissell's office and the Chambers.

It was agreed to wait until 6 p.m. in Simcoe Hall until Bissell could phone members of the Varsity Fund Board and give a positive reply to the Day Care supporters.

Plans were made to keep the doors to the main entrance unlocked and a food committee was set up. And the supporters took over the Senate Chambers.

At 10:37 a man phoned the Metropolitan Toronto Police switchboard threatening that a bomb was set to go off in Simcoe Hall.

U of T Vice-Provost and Executive Assistant to the President Don F. Forster told occupiers that if they insisted on staying in the building it would be at their own risk.

DUNLOP SHUTDOWN: 597 WORKERS ASK STUDENT SUPPORT TODAY

By PHILIP JAPP

Philip Japp is part-time president of Local 132, United Rubber Workers of America, representing rubber workers at Dunlop of Canada, Ltd.

Tom Patterson, a student at the University of Toronto in conjunction with Mike Prue, another student from Scarborough College, have been instrumental in organizing a demonstration to protest the closing of the Dunlop plant in Toronto. This demonstration is to be held in Convocation Hall today at 1 p.m.

Both of these students have fathers who still work in the Dunlop plant, both have been employed at the plant as student workers for the last few summers.

But are these reasons enough for these men to organize such a demonstration during a most crucial period of their school year? Or does the issue go further afield, and are Tom and Mike doing all they can to bring into the public eye a situation that cannot and should not be tolerated much longer in this land?

Well, if happen to think it is the latter question that motivates these guys. All my associations with Tom and Mike have convinced me that they see the plant closure situation as I do:

A) The manner in which the employees were informed was strictly a carry-over from the Dickens era.

B) There should be legislation in this province that requires a company which claims it is no longer a viable operation to prove such a claim.

C) If such a claim is found to be legitimate, the employees of the plant should have at least six months notice prior to the company going out of business.

Such legislation is neither unrealistic nor unreasonable. It just takes into account the fact that when a large multi-billion-dollar corporation decides to close one of its subsidiary plants, the employees deserve at least that much consideration.

But getting back to Tom and Mike: Someone said to me, "What right have these university people got to disagree with the Dunlop Company's decision to close?"

Well, for openers, I said that they have all the right in the world to disagree. These young men and women are starting now to correct situations that have been accepted for years without a murmur of protest being heard. And as they are very soon going to occupy positions of decision and leadership, they are starting now to set their house of the future in order.

One of the bright spots in this bleak picture of the plant closing is the way that the young people in the universities, news media, and the general public, have come forth unasked to help us. Regardless of what happens, I'm damned sure that when people like Tom Patterson and Mike Prue and dozens of others like them assume their future roles in this country, it will be a much better place to live in.

CONVOCATION HALL RALLY
MARCH ON QUEEN'S PARK

1 p.m.
TODAY

despite 'efficiency' effort

The union refuses to go without a fight

Dunlop Canada's grimy industrial products plant on Queen St. near the Don River is usually a whirlwind of activity, so it isn't often that all the day shift workers are asked to assemble in the cafeteria at 10 in the morning. But Friday March 6 was a special day.

Reading from a fetter signed by Neville Procter, chairman of the Canadian board of directors, plant manager Cyril Bullough announced to the assemblage that as of May 1, the plant would be shut down forever and their 597 jobs would be gone.

The news came as a shock to the several hundred rubber workers, the office staff and boiler room workers. They quickly dispersed, some back to their jobs, some to phones to try and call home. The phones were dead.

At about the same time, Procter was holding a press conference, fact sheets were being handed out, radio, television and newspapers were being notified. The union locals at the plant had been told about the move only minutes earlier.

It was all part of a well-rehearsed plan to make sure that everybody concerned got the news at the same time. Ac-ording to the Financial Post, the fact sheets for the news conference were printed in a plant on the other side of town to minimize the risk of leaks. A specially hired public relations firm, Scott-Atkinson Only International Ltd., besides helping with the rest of the preparations, had previously drilled Procter with hostile questions to prepare him for the press conference. The conference room was reserved anonymously, taxis were reserved to carry press releases to news media, hundreds of "personal" letters were printed and mailed so as to be received as close to release time as possible. The company was doing everything to make the news less severe.

But one employee was not so much shocked as angry. Phil Japp, 42, has worked at the plant for 26 years. He is also the part-time president (he isn't paid) of United Rubber Workers of America Local 132. Besides the nagging spectre of his own situation, the lack of jobs in the rubber industry as specialized as his own, inflation, unemployment and the suddenness of the announcement, Phil realized that it would be even worse for the majority of the workers at the plant who are for the most part older men, some having worked at the plant for 30 or more years.

The plant specializes in industrial rubber products such as conveyor belts and fire hoses. It also manufactures special quality products such as are used in the textile industry.

The majority of workers who are 45-50 years old, are skilled and have seniority. They earn $3-3.50 an hour. Although 14 representatives of Manpower have visited the plant, chances are that the greater number of workers will not find jobs with anything near the combined salary and benefits that a group of skilled workers can build up working at one plant over 30 years.

Phil Japp knew this and it didn't take him or the union executive long to realize that they couldn't take the decision lying down.

The Local 132 executive gave Japp a blank check to do what he could to fight the arbitrary shutdown.

"We were willing to listen to anybody and for a while we didn't know exactly what to do," says Japp. "But eventually all kinds of people came in to help us."

James Renwick, NDP member of the provincial legislature for Riverdale, where the plant is located, immediately started gathering a file of facts on the plant to present at the House.

Tom Patterson and Mike Prue, two University of Toronto students whose fathers are Dunlop employees for a few more weeks, became actively involved in the efforts of the local.

The first militant action taken was a march on Queen's Park on March 11. Two hundred and fifty men called on Premier John Robarts to ask for a full government investigation of the plant shutdown.

At the same time, Japp says, "A couple of us came up with the idea of using our collective severance pay to buy the factory. It wasn't anything more than a grass roots thing because we were desperate and willing to listen to anything. A lot of the workers are thinking seriously of it."

It was at this suggestion that the press became interested. Stories abounded and public interest grew when it was learned that the employees

Got a job this summer?

The case of the Dunlop workers is living proof of the way in which Canadian workers are being exploited by multi-national corporations, do-nothing American business unionism and a government which is little more than a managing committee for the ruling business elite.

The closing of the Dunlop plant immediately affects more than 600 workers who will lose their jobs, but it will ultimately have repercussions throughout the economy.

And, for the plant-owners in Britain and Italy thousands of miles away, the shut-down means something too — more profits.

At the international level, especially when one company makes several parts for an item, prices can be set low in the subsidiary country to avoid paying taxes or to get lower import duties. The host country, in the meantime, even subsidizes this industry to keep jobs for its workers.

While Dunlop is closing its Toronto plant, they're accepting a forgiveable loan from the Ontario Development Corporation to set up another factory in a designated (ie underdeveloped, low-wage) area near London.

When a government pays cash grants of up to $12 million (or about $30,000 for each job created) to migrant international firms willing to settle there, the future looks bleak for Canadian industry and much bleaker for workers. These companies, as Dunlop is proving, have a free hand. As "good corporate citizens" the companies are allowed to do their own thing.

Premier Robarts made this quite clear when he slapped down NDP MPP James Renwick who criticized the government's handling of the affair. "You would interfere because you as socialists want to control individual initiative," Robarts said.

"We do not think it is the function of this government, nor do we think it is in the best interests of the economy of this province and the development of job opportunities for our people, that we should say to any company that it can or cannot locate and operate in any area it wishes in the province," he said March 9.

But, as Mr. Robarts probably knows, there's a hitch in his theory. Nations cannot grant these sweeping freedoms to international companies without denying their essence as nations with the right to run their own affairs.

Robarts is obviously aware of his status as an agent of imperialism. And Robarts is equally aware that the problem of the Dunlop workers will not be solved using his formula.

Governments have stepped in on cases like this before. The Nova Scotia government took over the Dosco steel factory from British-owned Hawker-Siddeley, who said the firm was losing money. Last year Dosco had a profit of $3½ million.

Perhaps in this case, Canadian workers will have to take the initiative that the government can't — or won't. It won't be the first time.

Late in 1968, more than 150 Domtar workers occupied a plant in Windsor, Que. for 26 hours in support of their demands for better wages, violating at the same time a Quebec court injunction against the strike.

Italy, scene of mass strikes in the last few months, has had several mass occupations of factories, including the Pirelli Company which recently merged with Dunlop. There, workers took over the factory to protest Pirelli's importing cheap, foreign-made tires, and wrecked several freight cars carrying the tires.

During the May revolts in France two years ago, thousands of workers barricaded themselves in factories, sometimes holding the managers prisoner in protest against low wages and poor working conditions.

Workers at Reggio Emilia in Italy prevented the shut down of a tractor plant. They occupied the plant, threw out the management and, making use of abandoned projects, organized the production of agricultural tractors on its own initiative.

The workers at Dunlop are not just fighting for their own jobs. They've learned in the school of hard knocks as they say about the perils of multi-national corporations, vest-pocket governments and sell-out unions. They're fighting for all of us. But 600 men can't win the struggle by themselves.

How an international union deserted Local 132

Local 132 has been fighting the battle for the jobs of its men almost alone.

It's not supposed to be that way.

After all, local 132 is a local of the United Rubber Workers of America, a large "International" union with some 17,000 Canadian workers organized in locals mostly in Ontario and Quebec.

The Canadian director, Norman Allison, is appointed by the International executive in Akron, Ohio and paid $12,000 a year plus expenses to "report to the International all strikes, lockouts, or work stoppages, or report at the start of a dispute to the International president."

When asked what he was going to do about the Dunlop situation, Allison said: "I have 90 locals to look after, I can't possibly give precise information on every one."

He said that he had contacted Manpower which put 14 representatives in the Dunlop plant to try to relocate the men in new jobs. His assistant, William Plunnett, handled the Dunlop matter.

Plunnett was not optimistic about the situation.

"As far as I'm concerned," he said, "this is a darned disgrace. Dunlop should have given us more notice. The recent layoffs in the rubber industry mean that few of the men will be re-employed."

Plunnett, like Allison, had few long range plans. Both spoke of the need for "political pressure" on the government, and both denied the usefulness of wildcat strikes in support of local 132 at other two Dunlop plants. Wildcats are illegal, they say, and therefore dangerous.

Both men forgot to mention the wildcat Local 132 used as an effective weapon against Dunlop two months ago.

In January, 80 workers at Dunlop's Centralia plant were striking for their first contract. And the Toronto Dunlop workers Local 132 felt enough solidarity with the other locals to put their jobs on the line. As soon as they realized they were making products for shipment to the strikebound factory, they refused to scab and shut down the plant for five days. They sent a message to their sister Local 494 in Whitby, which served notice on the company that, unless the contract was settled, the Whitby plant would be shut down too.

This illegal strike forced Dunlop to settle. Yet, the International bureaucrats insist wildcats won't work.

The International is not highly regarded by local union militants. Victor Hugh, a worker at the Goodyear plant on Lakeshore Rd Local 232 has been in the union for 25 years.

"Internationalism is hurting our union because of their bad politics in the 'States,'" he said. "The International supports free enterprise, and they won't do anything."

"We had a strike in the summer of '68 and wages were not the issue. The issue was working conditions because the efficiency drive was so bad.

We just wanted some bloody rights out of the place — now they're calling it 'industrial democracy' or something. Anyway the guys were out to get Goodyear."

At that time we had a lot of young guys in the plant who didn't even have the chance to buy their own house because of the cost of living. We had mass meetings of 2,000 men, and whenever Plunnett tried to speak he was booed down.

"The strike lasted for 17½ weeks. The International did only what they had to under the contract (pay their $25 a week strike pay) and discouraged us every minute. We had to print up all our leaflets, take them to the plants. We did everything ourselves. When the medical benefits began to run out, we were really in trouble. So we tried to take out a loan on our union hall (paid for by the local out of those dues not sent to the U.S.), but the International prevented this. They were trying to break the strike and the company knew this; We were starved back to work and all the time the International was giving the company hope."

The United Rubber Workers belongs to the Canadian Labor Congress and the Ontario Federation of Labor, as required in the constitution. These larger labor bodies are supposed to be the strength of unionism. Plunnett is one of the vice presidents of the OFL.

Understandably, the OFL has the same lethargic attitude as the Canadian directors of the Union.

David Archer, president of the OFL and past Canadian director of the Textile Workers Union of America (a union hard-hit by unemployment these days) said: "International unions are not strong enough to fight international companies — we'd have to spread our internationalism all around the world. How do you fight a company that closes down?"

When asked about fighting in the Dunlop plants still open in Canada and the U.S., he replied: "You can't really do anything because the laws penalize the workers. Unions stand to lose too much in staging illegal strikes. You have to fight politically."

Murray Cotterill, public relations director of the Steelworkers, the biggest of the Internationals in Canada, is a powerful voice in the OFL.

"I don't think there's anything you can do about Dunlop," he said, "except appeal to the conscience of the government and try to replace it at the next election."

While International reps plan to "overthrow" the government at the next election and replace it with the NDP, the Dunlop workers in local 132 are wondering where is the strength of the International, now that they need it.

Multinational-nice name for imperialism

By MEL WATKINS

Economics Professor, U of T

Dunlop Canada, which owns the plant on Queen Street East in Toronto that is to be closed shortly, is not exactly your corner buggy whip manufacturer driven to the wall by that competitive struggle that only the fittest survive. The reason is not merely that; simply as a plant it's a fair size — 597 workers will lose their jobs by May 1 — but rather that behind that plant stands one of the world's largest corporations. The emerging struggle between workers and management must be put within that context.

Dunlop is a British-based multinational corporation. In Fortune's ranking of the top 200 industrial corporations with headquarters outside the United States, Dunlop placed forty-second in 1969. With sales of $1 billion, and assets of the same order of magnitude, it would have placed 90th on Fortune's list of the top 500 American corporations. And the Fortune rankings are prior to the merger of Dunlop and Pirelli S.P.A. of Italy which doubled Dunlop's size. Imperfect data suggests that the combined corporation is the second largest rubber manufacturing firm in the world, out-ranked only by Goodyear of the U.S.A.

And Dunlop is multi-national as well as large. It operates in 26 countries and five continents, has 120 plants and more than 100,000 employees, and does 60 per cent of its business outside the United Kingdom.

MULTINATIONAL

Some people imagine that foreign ownership doesn't matter, but they miss the point that a national firm, being smaller and national, has far less potential to shift operations from one plant to another and cannot shift from one country to another. Dunlop can do both, and very probably will — perhaps to Japan where it has a subsidary and wages are much lower. The current president of Dunlop Canada, Neville Proctor, was himself brought over from Nigeria to, in the words of the Financial Post, "settle another troublesome situation in the colonies" and he "will be given gainful employment elsewhere in Dunlop's world wide organization."

According to Jack Behrman, an American professor of international business whose views have been sought by the Economic Council of Canada and who has done extensive interviewing of corporate executives in North America and Europe: "The parent becomes involved in all decisions to expand or contract operations"; the role of affiliate managers is to "propose, while the parent disposes".

He goes on to cite some facts which perhaps should be read by Dunlop officials as useful advice. "Multinational enterprises are quite reluctant to close down a given operation or leave a plant site. It is costly and bad for government and community relations. The enterprises attempt in a variety of ways to maintain the facility so as to maintain employment or reduce it only gradually. With new products being developed and with opportunities of shifting products among integrated affiliate operations, the enterprise has a number of ways in which a given facility may be used."

VARIOUS REASONS

The reasons for closing the Toronto plant may be various. The bite of anti-inflation may have something to do with the timing for Toronto officials have been poor-mouthing the union and threatening to close for years. Eroding tariffs make possible cheaper imports from elsewhere, a matter of indifference to Dunlop but not to the Queen Street workers. Ontario Hydro gave a contract to Japan to save $80,000 and Dunlop Canada claims that was the final straw. If true, the savings bear no relationship to the ultimate costs of the close-down; it is particularly irresponsible behaviour for a monopolized and publicly owned utility. Wages of $3 to $3.50 an hour, while high by world standards, are not by Canadian standards. One definite possibility is that the Toronto plant is a victim of the Dunlop-Pirelli merger, for it is reasonable to expect that it would be followed by a new global rationalization appropriate to the new firm.

While it is customary for most people to give a corporation the benefit of the doubt and assume that it knows its business better than any outsider, or worker, this may not be the case. British firms are not noted for their efficiency and Dunlop's reported world profit of $28 million after taxes and minority interest in 1968 is a low return on $1 billion of assets. The fact that $1,500,000 was spent on improving the plant in the year prior to the closing suggests a certain desperation and the possibility that somebody may have bungled. The refusal of the company to permit a feasibility study means not only that we cannot know, but leaves open the possibility there is something to hide.

WHOSE INTERESTS

Even if the closing is defensible from the company's point of view, that is, that it will increase its global profits at least in the long-run, it does not follow that it is anybody else's interest.

The conflict between the private and public interest is dramatically evident when one considers how much it could cost governments in Canada to straighten out the mess Dunlop will leave behind — and these are simple identifiable dollar costs that give no weight to the human suffering entailed. The company claims it lost $1.5 million at the Toronto factory. Put against that the fact that the federal government advertises that it will give grants of up to $30,000 per new job created under its regional expansion program. It would have been cheaper by far to help Dunlop keep the plant open, or better still, given Dunlop's behaviour, help the workers run the plant, as they proposed, an offer they backed up with their severance pay. When we add to the 597 jobs directly lost perhaps as many that will also go as the ramifications of the closing spread, we can see how up-side-down the economics of this matter are. Dunlop's irresponsible behaviour is paid for by all of us as taxpayers.

To put the story this way is also to see how reasonable the present demands of the union are. They want laws requiring a company to justify a decision to close and requiring a reasonable length of notice to employees to be affected, say 6 months, and they want the company to be obliged to transfer employees to expanding branches and divisions of the firm before it can do any further hiring. Yet even these modest demands have been repudiated by Dunlop and by our elected governments.

Governments could clearly do more if they wanted, for they could compel the company to give the data needed for a feasibility study in this case, and amend the laws so that this sort of thing won't be allowed to happen again. As it is, the workers have been left on their own. Their reasonableness and initiative in the midst of so much unreason is laudatory, but the days are numbered and it is already late — though not too late — for concerned citizens to insist on a fairer deal from the company and our governments.

Students work night and day to aid fathers, friends

When Dunlop Canada announced March 6 that it was closing its Queen St. plant, U of T students Tom Patterson (II New) and Michael Prue (III Scar) said goodbye to their summer jobs — but that was the least of their troubles.

Their fathers, Bill Patterson, 62, and Herbert Prue, 48, said goodbye to security, seniority, more than half their severance pay, full pensions and, of course, their steady jobs.

Although neither student has had any experience in organizing a demonstration or political meeting, Tom and Mike decided the issue was serious enough to put aside the essays and the term work to gather campus support for the displaced Dunlop workers.

With no help forthcoming from the United Rubber Workers union headquarters at Akron, Ohio, Tom and Mike decided to pitch in and help with the work load at Local 132's Grant St. office.

Mike "couldn't believe" that Dunlop was closing down, especially since a recent $1,500,000 addition made it the most modern conveyor belting plant in North America.

Both students are bitter about the international union, which has offered little support. "The men have been sending $50,000 a year in union dues to the States for 25 years, and the best the international could do was send a few sympathy telegrams," Mike says disgustedly.

"My own personal opinion is that the problem is inefficient management," says Mike. "Scrap rubber is thrown away, not salvaged. Any 'second' in a bicycle tire was slashed and thrown out, yet the seconds were of very high quality. The company blamed the shutdown on high union wages, but in 1955 my father was making $2,000 a year more than a first class police constable.

"Now he makes $2,000 less than a policeman. If the police force can afford to raise wages to that extent, then surely a company the size of Dunlop can afford to."

One of the demands of the 600 workers is for the Ontario government to conduct a study to determine if it is feasible for the plant to remain open. So far, the company has refused.

"Dunlop is a foreign-owned company which is not listed on any Canadian stock exchange," says Tom. "It does not give a damn about Canadians.

"As long as it can drain profits out of the country at the expense of Canadian workers, it thinks everything is O.K.

"Dunlop is supposed to have a Canadian board of directors," says Tom. "Four of the directors are British, three are Americans and two are Canadians — and they call it a Canadian company. Bullshit!

"A foreign-owned company, especially from the United Kingdom, has very poor control over upper management. I personally think Dunlop is closing because the Canadian directors have found an easy way out — they can blame the workers when they themselves are at fault. Every one of the 600 workers knows this."

Mike is at a loss to explain the company's attitude, as the Queen St. plant produces large quantities of belts and hoses.

"Belting and hoses make a huge profit. Dunlop sells conveyor belting at $12 a foot. It takes about 25 to 30 man-hours to make a 1000-foot belt."

That's less than $200 worth of man-hours for a $12,000 conveyor belt. Costs of production would have to be astronomically high for Dunlop to be losing money on its belts.

The two have concentrated their efforts on reaching political groups, talking to radio stations and distributing upwards of 110,000 leaflets, some in Italian.

"It seems this is a last-ditch effort. It is more than just a union effort — it is a united people's effort," says Mike.

People are important !

David Scott-Atkinson calls the Dunlop shutdown the "most humane closure" he has seen. The Scott-Atkinson International Ltd. is the public relations firm that made sure "597 employees got their walking papers from Dunlop . . . and that all concerned 'publics' — suppliers, customers, competitors and so on — received the news simultaneously."

The closure was no one's fault, says Scott-Atkinson, but rather a financial necessity.

"The industry was inviable because of the high cost of labor, material and the low cost of imports," he explains.

Scott-Atkinson contacted the Department of Manpower before notifying the workers of the impending closure, so that they could find places for the 597 displaced employees.

"But we are not a placement agency," Scott-Atkinson says.

His major responsibility is of course to his employer — in this case, Dunlop of Canada Ltd. Any responsibility beyond that is "subject to the dictates of my own conscience" and the ethics of the associations of public relations firms of which Scott-Atkinson is a member.

"I did not put 597 people out of work," Scott-Atkinson maintains; he blames it on market changes.

"Nobody closes down a business that has been running for 71 years and is profitable for 61, without a great deal of soul searching," he said.

Gus Genies

After more than nineteen years with Dunlop, Gus Genies is about to be unemployed, "without even six months notice".

"It's a rough deal after working the best years of your life for a company — to discard us on the street," Gus says.

He will leave Dunlop in May with $968 of severance pay and benefits.

Gus scorns the company's arrogance; it "never even consulted us".

Dunlop announced the impending closure at 10 a.m. on March 6, "then cut off all the phones so if you wanted more information, you'd have to wait till you heard it on the radio," he explains.

"People bought homes and furniture — all on credit because when you're a worker you'll never be rich," Gus says.

"Now we're all in debt. And jobs are hard to get."

Herbert Prue

When Dunlop worker Herbert Prue, 48, first heard the news about the plant's closure, he couldn't believe his ears. He was home from work that day with a broken thumb, and the first inkling he had that he was soon to be unemployed came when he heard Gordon Sinclair's voice describing the shutdown.

For the Prues, the loss of the Dunlop job is not certain exacting work as a shrinking-blanket grinder, he can only look forward to returning to school to learn another skill, for there are no job openings in Canada for his special skill.

The job loss may have shattered Herbert Prue's dream to put his three sons through university. Mike, 21, is finishing third year Political Science at Scarborough College, and will probably be able to complete fourth year on a student loan, but there is not as much hope for his other sons, who are 18 and 14.

Prue received only $1206 of a possible $4000 severance pay, and if he takes Manpower retraining, his only income will be the $80 a week Manpower pays family heads during retraining.

"My father is not as badly off as some of the workers," says Mike. "One man just bought a house, and he's probably going to lose his down payment."

"My mother will have to continue working as a clerk-bookkeeper now, but there isn't much hope that her salary can be applied towards a down payment on a house — her fondest dream."

Bill Patterson

For Bill Patterson, 62, the shutdown means early retirement and a reduced pension.

"And," says his son Tom (III New), "he hasn't a prayer in hell of getting another job."

What worries Bill Patterson the most is rising taxes on his home. "There is no way to live in Metro Toronto with taxes and the cost of living the way they are without a full pension," says Tom.

Mr. Patterson, who is a shrinking-blanket operator, preparing the blankets for co-worker Herbert Prue to grind, has a house which is fully paid off. In later years the Pattersons have been able to afford a car, but they don't have much money left over for entertainment.

"I would guess they've been to maybe one movie in the last three years," says Tom.

Mr. Patterson will probably have to ask for his pension payments to start immediately, which means that they will be lower, as the payments must be spread out over a longer period of time.

For a man of 62, there is not much hope for retraining.

It hurts all over

The closing of the Dunlop plant on Queen Street adds 597 people to the unemployment lists.

Neville Proctor, recently appointed president of the branch-plant firm, spoke in generalities when he explained his company's decision to cease operations: "There was no way out. We tried to find one — like a drowning man grasping at straws."

The Dunlop decision could not have come at a worse time for the Canadian rubber industry. Goodyear Tire, a subsidiary of the giant American firm, has laid off 400 men since January, in Toronto alone. According to an official of the United Rubber Workers Local 323 the staff in the plant is down from 2,200 to 1,700 employees. The latest mass layoff is part of a pattern begun in 1965 when Firestone closed its plant in Lindsay, Ont.

When Phil Japp, militant leader of the Dunlop workers, went to work for Dunlop Tire twenty-six years ago, the Queen St. plant employed 1,300 people. At that time Canada had a prosperous rubber goods industry.

According to Japp the breakup of the Queen St. plant began in the mid-fifties

IMPLICATIONS

The most recent decision to close down Dunlop has industry-wide implications.

Cosmos Imperial Mills of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, is expected to be hardest hit by the Dunlop decision. It sells between $750,000 and $1,000,000 worth of industrial hose and belting to the Dunlop plant annually.

Cosmos employs 500 workers. The closing of Dunlop places their jobs in jeopardy as well.

In textiles Canada imports 45-50 per cent of its produce from all over the world.

George Watson, the Canadian director of the Textile Workers' Union of America, said "No other country in the world allows this degree of importation."

Union

were interested in taking over the plant. But it was still only a suggestion. The company, of course, would not open its books and the Ontario government was not going to make it do so.

The next day, March 1, 250 workers boarded buses in Toronto at 4:30 in the morning and headed for Ottawa where they demonstrated in front of Parliament. They spoke to Alan MacEachern, federal minister of manpower and immigration and Bryce Mackasey, minister of labour. Both said they would look into the question of whether the Dunlop operation was a viable one.

Mackasey sent a telegram to the Ontario government saying that although such a study

The president of Cosmos Imperial in Yarmouth blasted the government when he spoke of the future prospects of the industry:

"The Federal Government has all the tools they need to put the brakes on the situation."

It is clear by the decision taken by Dunlop president Neville Proctor, that the firm decided unilaterally that time had run out for them.

At one level the economic recession which has hit both industries stems from a common set of problems. The government refuses to protect the jobs of workers and particular Canadian manufacturing concerns. In the case of Dunlop, foreign imports in the industrial belt category, mainly from Japan, have captured a third of the Canadian market.

Japanese and other foreign capitalists did more than $5 million worth of business last year, according to an official of the Rubber Institute of Canada. Faced with increased competition it appears that it is cheaper for Dunlop Canada to give up its share of the industrial belt market than to compete with foreign competition. The two or three million dollars annual business that Dunlop does in this field of manufactured goods is of marginal interest to a world-wide Anglo-European corporation.

MARITIMES WORSE

The shut-downs in the rubber industry, the layoffs in textiles, and the unemployment in automotive plants are too-familiar events to Canadian workers. The latest figures show that there have been many unreported 'Dunlops'. Unemployment in March rose to 526,000, or 6.5 per cent of the total work force.

The situation in the Maritimes is much worse than the rest of the nation. One in ten workers in the Maritimes is out of work. The Dunlop shut-down adds urgency to an already national emergency. The would-be jobless workers have no prospects for employment.

William Punnett, assistant director of Rubber Workers Union in Canada and vice-president of the Ontario Federation of Labor, believes that no one should have any doubts as to the seriousness of the problem.

"We're in a recession — each day the unemployment situation is getting worse," he says.

The companies have aggravated the job situation by their market philosophy.

For example, Dunlop recently bought the Geo. Angus Co., a rubber distributor, in order to import and dump cheap rubber goods on the Canadian market. In this way, Dunlop International competes with Dunlop Canada for the Canadian market.

MONEY GALORE

The only direct assistance which the Ontario Government has offered the Dunlop workers is to consult with Manpower officials. By contrast, the Government has played a very active role in attracting foreign industry to Ontario.

In 1969 the Ontario Development Corporation granted $30 million to corporations. Fifteen million went to American firms such as General Foods, Honeywell, Union Carbide, and Black and Decker. Included in the grants was a $135,000 to Uniroyal.

Between 1963 and 1968, 251 branch plants of U.S. companies were established in the Province.

Liberal MPP James Trotter, told the legislature: You (the government) are literally encouraging the Americans with free handouts.

The Government, by not stepping in to protect the jobs of workers at Dunlop, is letting jobs go down the drain. This is what Phil Japp and the workers at Dunlop are fighting for. "We are trying to salvage the plant. We feel that this plant is a long way from dead."

would have to be undertaken by the latter, the federal government would co-operate.

The telegram met with initial support from Roberts who said on March 16 that a study would be undertaken "if this is the wish of the company and the union combined. . ."

The next day Roberts was much more skeptical, doubting "whether the company would be interested in a further study." But all indications were that Roberts had not contacted the company.

When the NDP requested that the government intervene, Roberts said government intervention would "hamper initiative."

Around this time Phil Japp, Tom Patterson and Mike Prue decided that "one of our last chances was with students. It was only a suggestion that students might be willing to help us but a little later Prof. Mel Watkins of U of T and Prof. Bob Laxer of OISE approached us and the idea just blossomed."

More people on campus became involved and for the last week, Tom and Mike have been working day and night to organize students to come out to Convocation Hall at 1 o'clock today and join the march on Queen's Park.

The mass meeting and march are just another of the attempts of 597 soon-to-be-unemployed men who are desperately seeking for some way to retain the benefits they have earned for themselves and their families after years of work.

Outgoing SAC members

They all agreed on one point: "We failed"

By LAURA KELLY

The Students Administrative Council ended the year with a noisy, spring-cleaning meeting Wednesday evening attended by both old and new SAC members.

Unusually raucous after a pre-meeting sherry party funded by Rod Hurd, the new SAC president, the joint council was addressed by the departing executive, after which the new council elected their executive for the coming year.

Gus Abols, the current SAC president, summed up his year: "I was not radicalized as some people expected. In fact, I leave office more firmly convinced that the only way to make progress is through reason.

"I do regret that we were divided for so long. It was not until later in the year that we could get together on issues," he said.

"As for the new council, I don't think you'll be able to do very much without unity," said Abols.

"It's not much like Langdon's farewell," observed one old SAC member.

Occasionally interrupted by derogatory remarks and laughter Abols' speech ended with prolonged applause and desk-thumping by the old Council members, and then verbal reaction.

"I'd like to thank those who did the President's work this year and I move that the Council receive but not accept the President's report," said Mike Simon (III Sear).

Bryan Tanney (IV Meds), Cultural Affairs Commissioner, voiced his rejection of Abols' report and also capsulized the year: "There was no agreement among us, and therefore there was no philosophy. We had no idea of what SAC was supposed to be. We didn't relate to the students, and we didn't learn much ourselves.

"We failed, and we failed badly," said Tanney.

Tanney rejected Abols' report because it neglected to point out what was not accomplished and neglected to explain SAC's failure.

The chairman ruled, however, that since the report contained no recommendations, no vote was required and the report was tabled.

Bob Barkwell, SAC vice-president, outlined the reasons for SAC's failure: "There was a failure to struggle. This is an indictment of the Left and myself in particular. The struggle was foregone for manipulation."

Barkwell also said that SAC did not plan for the year, nor relate actions to the student body.

"It became more important to win a particular issue than to talk to the students about the issue," he commented.

Barkwell recommended to the new council that they view SAC not as a medium for change but as an idea machine, and center on classroom organizing to effect real change.

Barkwell ended with a quote from Mao Tse-tung: "The people and the people alone are the motive force."

Ken McEvoy (III Vic), University Commissioner, commented on the University-Wide-Committee to implement the CUG report, the focus of the University Commission this year.

"It's a co-opting body; every section of the university is represented. But I have a very strong feeling that the whole thing is going to fail," he said.

The Cultural Affairs Commission, headed by Tanney and the External Affairs Commission, led by Peter Gold (II Dent) had no reports to make.

Craig Heron, (IV UC), Education Commissioner, recommended that SAC abandon F. U. of T., and instead encourage students to change the present university system.

"We all know how we want the university to be: creative, cooperative, free, student-centered, related to the social context, but for the actuality look around at your lectures," said Heron.

Hallett succeeds LePan at UC

By RAY CONLOGUE

A. C. H. Hallett, Associate Dean of the Arts and Science Faculty, was named the new principal of University College yesterday.

In a meeting attended by about 40 staff and several students, U of T President Claude Bissell announced the appointment, saying that Dean Hallett has "qualities of understanding and awareness... and a scholar's understanding of the importance of scholarship."

Bissell, referring to the secrecy of the new selection, said he liked "reserving unto myself dramatic situations and dramatic announcements."

Hallett said in an interview later that the news had "come as rather a surprise to me", since he had been offered the post only two weeks earlier.

He succeeds D. V. LePan, who announced his retirement from the principalship last fall, to devote his full time to teaching.

Dean Hallett graduated from maths and physics at the U of T's Trinity College in 1948.

He won a £350 science research scholarship from the British Royal Commission of the Exhibition of 1951, going to England and receiving his PhD in low-temperature physics in 1951. He has taught in the U of T Physics Department ever since.

The job of choosing a successor to LePan fell to a Search Committee established by President Bissell in the fall. The Committee included four students, but it met in closed session. Other names considered for the post were not released.

The students on the committee were chosen by the UC Literary and Athletic Society after President Bissell, on the advice of outgoing principal LePan, suggested the students be Lit President Herman Siegel (III UC) and Lit reps Sally Hill (III UC) and Art Stein (IV UC). The Lit accepted these names and later added John Gero (IV UC).

Hallett has been Associate Dean of Arts and Science since 1966. He played a major role in developing the New Program.

Provost John Sword, in announcing the decision, said it "was brought to the President with unanimity and enthusiasm."

Later on, in Sidney Smith...

Dean Hallett could not make it to the meeting in the crumbling round tower on the west end of U.C. He was in his office in Sidney Smith.

Split down the middle by a dual job as physics professor and dean, Hallett said his new job will mean "substantial orientation for me". He is not certain how a "hard-boiled soldering-iron physicist" will take on the job of managing a liberal arts college.

He spoke gingerly of student unrest, saying that "students will certainly aim themselves at the Principal's office, or anywhere else they think power is located."

Mild skepticism also marked his attitude toward last week's sit-in. "I don't think I like the tactics too much... one accepts it as part of life, and the way one group of people expresses their dissatisfaction." "The same way we got used to the telephone," he added.

Nothing in the office gave a hint of physics, but mentioning the subject brought him down from bemusement to avid interest. He feels that technology is leaving the humanities with nowhere to go.

"I see problems not handleable by any one discipline — it's not the bumheaded physicist but someone with a basic philosophical approach that we need.

"That was one reason I accepted the presidency, to have a chance to come into contact with humanities students and see how to foster this bringing together of the two groups."

For a man not given to passionate outbursts, he spoke with considerable fervour on the need for a humanistic approach to return to society "and challenge the dominance of social sciences — John Doe lives here, he has to move here, and so on."

Since he first lectured in 1951, the students in front of the podium have changed in attitude, he said. Now they are "more concerned with their neighbor than they were then. At the time, the poor were something you took for granted, as always being with you."

The slender academic, having spelled out the problem and the promise of students as he sees them, crossed his lanky legs and said: "I don't know if I'm a character of strength to deal with this, but time will tell."

SAC - It's not their fault it didn't work

This year the Students Administrative Council disintegrated

It still has a budget, a constitution, a full-time bureaucracy, and various and sundry representatives. But, as a viable political body, it's dead.

At last night's joint meeting of this year's and next year's council, one executive member after another said, "We failed." They agonized over the fact, warned next year's council about the pitfalls of the SAC, and generally prophesied doom.

But they didn't understand what had really happened to the council. It's not their fault; their guilty sentiments are somewhat gratuitous.

They were part of the failure of student councils across the country to provide the structural means of organizing students. For a few years the student movement operated through student councils but found that mainstream structures contained the elitism and duplicity of the social structures it was fighting.

Last night, SAC President-elect, Rod Hurd, watched a parliamentary process in the final stages of disintegration.

Next year's council and executive does not have the potential for the internal conflict that rendered this year's SAC dysfunctional. It's a mildly left-liberal group. The left has realized their focus should be to organize amongst students, in departments — not amongst themselves over donuts in Hart House.

At the joint meeting, Hurd crisply outlined the course of things to come. Make the bureaucracy more bureaucratic and the council more informal. Check list of standard options: pollution, expansion, expressways, CUG, freedom, democracy. Get rid of irrelevant research at the university. Hurd introduces a general house-cleaning plan.

But the plan could have just as easily come from the administration. It too dislikes pollution and is trying to do away with research that's irrelevant to the economy.

The efficiency program Hurd outlines is not just a drive to make SAC a better service-organization. It's part of a process by which student councils are becoming integrated with the administrative needs of the university.

But as the attempt to salvage SAC continues, students will be organizing, and their experience should prove SAC to be irrelevant.

All the King's horses and all the King's men . . .

Day Care occupation shatters a myth

Last week the Campus Co-op Day Care Centre won a victory. With support from students, faculty, and support staff, the day-care centre won their demand by carrying out the first occupation of Simcoe Hall in U of T history.

It was unlike most occupations:

- it was brief — only 24 hours;
- the demand — $2,000 to renovate a day-care centre — was extremely liberal;
- the demand was non-structural — it could easily be filled in the short run without a major structural transformation of the university;
- the administration gave in and the day-care centre survived.

During the occupation, where a kind of picnic-lunch-peanut-butter-and-jam-sandwich atmosphere prevailed, there was a tendency for revolutionary fantasies to take over. People had to be constantly reminded that this was not yet Chicago. Although when U of T President Claude Bissell backed down Thursday afternoon, he had already prepared a court injunction and was ready to bring in Metro cops to eject the occupiers by force if they didn't accept his compromise. Goodbye to the Campbell Report.

Ironically, when the occupation started, the Committee to Implement the Campbell Report was in session in the Senate Chamber.

Of course, it was a compromise: although the administration guaranteed the survival of the Sussex Ave-ue day-care centre, it did not recognize its own long-term responsibility to provide day-care facilities for its employees.

Yes, its employees. One thing the day-care issue demonstrated was that the university is an employer, and that it treats its employees in much the same manner as any profit-motivated corporation.

By grossly underpaying its support staff, the U of T creates the conditions for its employees which demand day-care facilities. Most cannot afford babysitters.

The issue has also illustrated a kind of employee-employer relationship between students and administration. Students with children cannot survive on insufficient grants and lack of summer employment. Inexpensive day-care care becomes an economic necessity for them.

Over the day-care issue, students and support-staff have found a common ground of experience in their relationships with the administration as employees. The alliance could prove threatening.

The occupation of Simcoe Hall itself was an important stage in breaking the frustration of the student movement at U of T. It's finally clear that this university's liberal administration — the marshmallow — is not invincible. It's now clear that it's possible to organize on this campus. Occupying Simcoe Hall proved to be not just a revolutionary fantasy, but a workable strategy.

And Bissell gave in.

Bissell had been riding on the reputation of being the only multiversity-administrator in the world whose campus had not suffered an occupation. The reputation was becoming a legend. Only superceded by the legend that Bissell could turn any campus crisis into a committee, which he has been consistently doing for the past few years.

Last week he waved his magic wand a few times, and it didn't work. The rhetoric, the flip humour, the expressed concern, the promise of committee — none of it worked when he spoke to a Senate Chamber full of demonstrators. When he gave in Thursday afternoon, the mystique was shattered.

Bissell is not alone. Students across Ontario are discovering that they can organize and get somewhere. Sit-ins at Ryerson and Laurentian University seem to indicate that a wave of occupations is hitting the province. And the Globe and Mail is getting paranoid. Read their editorial this morning.

LETTERS

I am appalled at your "scene"

Dear Editor and Students:

Last night, I watched on the news yet another of the interminable sit-ins that seem to be a way of life at your university. I say "your university" because it has become hard lately to think of it as "mine".

It seems the protest this time, is about repairs to a day-care centre that would cost less than $2000. Is this really the university's responsibility? Must it foot the bill for the care of children of those who made the free choice of taking on education, marriage and family, all at the same time? Have the people involved, never heard of the "do-it-yourself" process? What can one conclude about the professor and mate, who both work, yet expect others to contribute toward the cost of their children's care, when their own combined income probably is above that of most people, including mine.

My job is to manage a plant for one of our large corporations. My stay on your campus was largely self-financed. The nearly 23 years since I left it have been fulfilling, but by any means of fair measurement, years of hard work, to meet the needs of my family, my organization, and our society. Very rarely, do people like me have time to think of ourselves; there is too much to do and always problems that can't wait.

Perhaps this is as things should be, perhaps it is right that those of us who can, should bear the load that has to be carried. However, if you, in the student body can opt out and protest, perhaps it is time for those of us who do the hard, unglamorous work of the country, to opt out and protest too. This, you know, is the time of annual exhortations from the university for money, and for help to find jobs for students. Last year, I managed to place thirteen in our plant, and through friends and associates, several others with other firms. Not much, I know, compared with the accomplishment of those who occupied Simcoe Hall, but I did what I could. This year, I intend to opt out.

To state the matter to you plainly, I am appalled at your "scene", as it appears from here. It is sickening to read of huge wastes in the educational building programmes. I can look at the sort of activity reported last night, only as a repugnant abuse of the priceless privilege to learn and to grow, without the pressures attending the lives of less fortunate people. I do not admire the professors who seem to have time for every imaginable kind of activity, until one is led to wonder if, and when, they ever teach. And, if one rated your administration, it might not score so well either.

To sum up my only connection with you from now on will be a pleasant memory of another time and place, and certainly of better people.

J. Tutecky 417

CUPE supports day care protest

The Canadian Union of Public Employees has been following your militant and determined action for adequate day care facilities with considerable admiration.

We are shocked at the complete indifference which the administration of the University of Toronto views the critical shortages you openly demonstrate against. The University has a total obligation to provide the vital services needed in the course of your education, the Day Care Centre is a necessary service and it should be provided without question — and without charge.

The Canadian Union of Public Employees knows well the experience of your frustration and indignation; we, too, were born of a protest movement and we know that only by collective and determined action can we achieve the just conditions we all are entitled to.

CUPE salutes your stand, we applaud your fighting spirit and feel confident you will win your battle for justness and the reasonable consideration you request from the University.

CUPE SUPPORTS YOU.

CUG UWC keeps nominations open

Lack of interest has caused the CUG Programming Committee to extend the deadline for nominations to its University-Wide Committee one week to 5 p.m., Tuesday April 7.

Ballots should be received through the mail by April 27, and the mail-in vote ends on Friday May 1 at 5 p.m.

The University-Wide Committee will have the power to make final recommendations to the President on the top governing structure of the U of T. Its 120 members will include 40 students, 40 faculty and 40 administrators.

A check with Administrative Assistant Leslie Fenyves revealed that there are many positions still open.

A minimum of 21 faculty nominations are required to fill its quota.

Three of the seven graduate students' seats are still unoccupied.

19 undergraduates have applied for 12 positions, but there are 15 seats still open.

GSU President-elect Larry Hoffman (SGS), a member of the CUG Programming Committee, said the university was "mishandling" the elections by "relying solely on the University of Toronto Bulletin" to publicize them.

Another member of the Programming Committee, Ken McEvoy (III Vic), said "There is absolutely no problem" in getting undergraduate nominations. "Many people," he said, were "simply waiting until the last day of nominations."

Compulsory phys-ed is ended

Compulsory physical education for first-year women has been abolished by the administration, subject to ratification by the Board of Governors.

The decision follows several years of agitation by various campus groups, including the SAC.

Three months ago SAC Reps. Ceta Ramkhalawansingh (I New), Anne Maurer (III SMC) and Judy Maxwell (IV-PHE) put forward an SAC motion requesting that the requirement be abolished within one month.

At the end of that month, the SAC received a letter from the Department of Physical Education and Athletics (Women) saying that they would recommend to the Board that the compulsory aspect, the fine and academic penalty be abolished. To date that report has not yet gone to the Board.

Women who are presently in first or second year who did not complete the requirement will not get threatening letters from the chief accountant; they will be allowed to write their exams; "failing to complete the physical education requirement" will not be recorded on their transcript when they graduate from the university.

50 members elected to SAC

Fifty members of the sixty-four member Students' Administrative Council for 1970-71 have been elected. The remaining fourteen will be elected in the fall.

The President for the coming year is Rod Hurd, assisted by Eric Miglin as his Vice-President.

The remaining members of council are for Scarborough: Rob Stewart, Kathi De Zorzi, Lynda Joyce, Mike Hofstetter; Erindale: Phil Dack, Bill Cooper; Engineering: Mike Lee, Bill Palmer, Derek Smith, John Brouwer, Dave Slater; Nursing: Alison McInnes.

Pharmacy has re-elected Glenda Barkwell; Architecture: Barry Sampson; St. Mike's: Jean Bubba, Dan Leckie, Vince Dolan, Kevin Slavin; Law: Craig Perkins; Food Sciences: Fran Thomas; Innis: Peter Boswell, Paul Zalan.

Dentistry has re-elected Peter Gold and Wayne Pulver; Medicine: Harry Krakowky, Fred Mandel; St. Hilda's: Eden Anderson; Victoria: Bruce Campbell, Doug Mann, John Kirton, Don Macleod, Bronwyn Best.

University College Reps. are Art Moses, Brian Hayes, Toby Vigod, Bob Spencer, Owen Dick; New: Brian Bannon, Gerrit Van Geijn, Michael Kaufman, Robin Tivy; Trinity: Peter Hall.

Knox: Dave McInnes; Emmanuel: Carmen Holborough; Forestry: Eric Fetterley; Music: Ruth Pincoe; Phys. Ed.: Fran Haber; Wycliffe: Terry McNear.

The old council elected Bob James and Ken McEvoy to the two honorary positions of co-chairman of the university and judicial committees.

Hoffman is new GSU president

Larry Hoffman (SGS) won the presidency of next year's Graduate Students' Union in an election turn-out of about five per cent of all graduate students March 27.

Hoffman received 142 votes to 118 for Joe Peters (SGS).

Neil Keller, Hoffman's running mate, had been acclaimed.

Hoffman, a history student, says he is "to the left of Michael Vaughan", this year's president. He was one of the GSU members trying to impeach Vaughan earlier this year.

He hopes to meet with SAC president Rod Hurd to discuss greater co-operation with SAC.

Next year's SAC picks new executive

The new SAC performed its first autonomous political act Wednesday night by electing the eight commissioners who will sit on next year's executive.

The ten-man executive is composed of the president, vice-president, and commissioners.

Five of the positions were filled by acclamation: Peter Boswell (II Innis), Finance Commissioner, Bob Spencer (III UC), Education Commissioner, Gerrit Van Geijn (II APSC), Services, Peter Hall (II Trin), University, and Craig Perkins (I Law), Judicial.

The open ballot showed a basic split within the council, perhaps puncturing Rod Hurd's hope to "allay all petty factionalism."

Doug Mann (III Vic) was nominated by Su Crowe (I Erin), and active Hurd-Miglin campaigner, for Communications Commissioner and was challenged by Brian Hayes, (II UC).

After the four-minute campaign speeches, during which Mann emphasized feedback from constituents and dialogue with the course unions, and Hayes suggested experimental communications and SAC involvement in college orientations, the vote was called.

With the candidates out of the room, the cluster of new members seated around Miglin and Miss Crowe voted for Mann, but Hayes received a majority and won the post.

A similar vote was given when Vince Dolan (I SMC) ran a close race with Bill Cooper (I Erin) for External Affairs Commissioner.

Cooper was nominated by Miglin after a last minute consultation, and lost the election by only one vote.

The lines were not as clearly drawn when Wayne Pulver (I Dent) ran against Mike Kaufman (I New), for Cultural Affairs Commissioner. Pulver won the position with mixed support.

As the meeting swiftly disintegrated into a shouting match, Bob James (III Vic) was appointed co-chairman of the University committee, and Ken McEvoy became co-chairman of the Judicial Committee.

of student participation in governing the university and he urged the firm implementation of the CUG report.

"It's very necessary next year to allay all petty factionalism and get down to the business at hand," he concluded.

Earlier in the evening SAC rejected Abols' proposal to hire an architect as the campus centre co-ordinator.

The final SAC meeting of the year was the last meeting for most old members, since only ten out of the 54 present members are returning next year.

They shoot horses,

By BRIAN JOHNSON

After nearly eight hours of festive insanity, while blotters and donuts hung in the balance, the Students Administrative Council allocated $280,000 in its annual Spring budget meeting two weeks ago in the Hart House Debates Room.

As the budget-meeting, which sets next year's spending priorities, witnessed lobbies from virtually every interest group on campus, the council members lost no time in turning the quiet atmosphere of the Debates Room into a chaos reminiscent of the Montreal Forum.

One of the first motions to stir the SAC backbenchers into frenzy was a move to cut $700 from the $1,800 appropriated for refreshments at SAC meetings. The $700 roughly covers the cost of donuts for one year's meetings.

"Look at the starving people in Biafra," pleaded Ann Maurer (III SMC) in a bid to cut the donuts.

The motion to kill the donuts failed. Close on the heels of the Donut Dilemma followed the Great Blotter Debate. SAC spends $1,330 a year on printing a blotter listing the calendar of university events. The blotter earns 1,500 in advertising, so it makes a profit. SAC Communications Commissioner Jon Levin moved to delete the blotter from the budget.

MISERABLE BLOTTER

"No one picks up the blotters," said Levin. "They just lie around the SAC office."

"But what would the SAC office be like without piles and piles of blotters," shouted Wayne Pulver (I Dents) as the vote was being taken. Levin's motion was defeated.

"Moved that we put the blotter out of its misery," shouted an honourable member.

"That would require a two-thirds majority," said the Speaker, Bob Parkins (UC'68), who has seen better days at the U.C. lit. He ran the debate in grand auctioneering style.

An enraged Mike Simon (III Sear) addressed the House:

"This is fucking ridiculous," he said. "We've spent a half an hour talking about donuts and now we've spent half an hour talking about blotters."

"I want a blotter," Pulver shouted.

"What am I going to use for my ink?"

SAC plodded through the rest of Executive Commission's budget allocating $8,200 for summer research, a permanent research officer, and working groups.

LEVIN LOSES

The council then passed a $38,000 grant to The Varsity after a fruitless attempt by Communications Commissioner Jon Levin (III UC) to cut the sum by $2,000.

As SAC moved right along to External Affairs, a group of students made an impassioned plea for $650 to be reinserted into the budget for the Tarheel Exchange, a program that allows 20 students from the U of T and 20 from the University of North Carolina to visit each other.

"I realize it's very hard for you to understand that it's a human interaction," said Dale Wilson (IV Mus). "For once I felt I could reach out to other people. It's a very human thing. You don't go up and hug your professor."

Sandy Simpson (III Trin), who was in the last exchange, seconded Wilson's emotions:

"We went down to the States — you probably think it was just a social event, a big drunk — it wasn't..."

Whispering heckler: "You got laid."

"... We had seminars with these people. We had things like soul food dinners; we did things we never did before in our lives. If the council turns this down, they'll be denying one of the most potent forces on this campus."

Heckler: "They could spend the money on mescaline and reach more people."

Ann Maurer: "It's a meaningful experience. I don't know how to explain it. It's 85 people searching for some way to communicate with people. I plead with you..."

John Frank (III UC): Ann, I just don't believe that's true. Do you know why there was no exchange at Harvard? There's no student council. They got rid of it. That's what's happening in the States. The only reason there's one at Tarheel is because that university is in an incredible social setting.

Maurer: IT'S NOT THAT, IT'S NOT THAT!

Speaker: C'mon, keep it down. If we're going to have a debate, we're going to have it quiet.

Mike Simon: "I don't want any laughter on this... (silence, broken by faint chuckles)... We've allocated $700 on donuts to feed the stomachs of these clowns. I move that we trade the donuts for the Tarheel Exchange." (Rousing table-thumping)

Bob James (III Vic), Finance Commissioner: "Mike, you can't do that."

NEW RELIGION

Amidst the confusion, the chairman of the Tarheel Exchange rose:

"The Exchange is a forum to put across divergent views," she said. "It's something that is intrinsic. You can't put your finger on it... it's a faith..."

"Far out — 200 caps of mescaline," quoth the heckler after some quick mental arithmetic.

"... It's not just intellectual — it's human. And you ask... how?"

The motion to support the Tarheel Exchange carried by one vote.

General uproar. One of the girls who had pleaded for the exchange started to cry.

"It's like a Canadian-Maple Leaf Hockey game," someone shouted.

"You've got your money. Now get the hell out of here," yelled another council member.

"ORDER!" screamed the Speaker. Under External Affairs, the Varsity Downtown Education Project (VDEP) won $10,000 from the council.

ABOLS MAKES JOKE

"Are we expected to give money to the Salvation Army or any charity organization in Toronto?" asked a member.

"I don't think VDEP has a band," joked SAC President Gus Abols with his classic Gallic shrug.

SAC then turned over $1,000 to the Stop Spadina Committee.

"The Spadina Expressway is the only issue which has turned on the campus this year," said SAC Judicial Commissioner Art Moses (III UC).

"It's the only issue that has got Claude Bissell and Charity Grant aligned with the SAC."

On a quick impulse, the Spadina debate was followed by a $1,000 grant to the Campus Community Co-operative Day Care Centre for repairs.

By this point SAC was $1,510 in the hole, and Bryan Tanney was preparing to increase his Cultural Affairs budget.

Tanney brought up each item in the cultural affairs budget for separate discussion.

He persuaded the council to grant the U of T Orchestra $1,507 instead of the proposed zero.

He managed to raise the grant to the U of T Chorus from $1,000 to $3,550.

The Student Film Facility, a filmmaking project, received $2,000.

Cultural events are a direct way of raising political consciousness on campus, Tanney told the council.

PRIVATIZED CULTURE

"I'm sorry, Brian," James interrupted. "But I'm getting a bit pissed off. I mean... shit! Sure, raising consciousness is groovy, but that's not just cultural affairs — it's course unions, and organizers and... You're not going to raise consciousness one iota by getting people to go to a Gord Lightfoot concert. We're sitting here financing a privatized culture."

"This is a political body, dammit. We're trying to change the educational system, not get everyone dropping acid. We could buy a lot of dope for $280,000."

The Blue and White Society received $1,500 — $500 over the proposal in the budget.

After initiating the Cultural Affairs budget by $5,500 over the proposed estimates, the council quickly dealt with the last item — the Education Commission.

It allocated $23,000 for course unions, $5,500 for a high-school organizer, and $4,250 for "university government."

After the Cultural Affairs orgy, SAC was left with a deficit. No other choice but to cut the donuts.

"If we don't vote for this we're crazy," someone shouted just before the motion to cut the donuts passed.

As the meeting finally ended about 2:30 a.m., SAC's budget was left with only an $8,500 contingency to finance new programs.

don't they?

Why CUPE and university employees should get together now:

- Because university employees not part of CUPE have no way of guaranteeing for themselves that their wages and working conditions will be what they need and deserve.
- Because as individual workers university employees are looked on by their employees as faceless and nameless numbers coughed up by a computer. Membership in CUPE gives university employees the dignity and consideration now lacking.
- Because as CUPE members you will be part of a powerful and sophisticated organization with all of its 140,000 members in Canada. Like you, these CUPE members are employed by universities, school boards, separate schools, hospitals, municipalities, and the CBC.
- Because as members of CUPE you'll form your own locals, make all your own decisions about what work improvements you'll seek, about what you'll pay in union dues to support your activities and what contract provisions you'll finally accept.
- Because as CUPE members you'll have the assistance of a full-time CUPE representatives who's trained in negotiating with university-like managements. This representative will have backing him up the services of CUPE's research, legal, public relations and education departments.

Are other schools jealous?

By TONY FALLICO and JOE CRISTELLO
DEWSON ST. PUBLIC SCHOOL

Dewson Street Public School is a new open space school. The school was built in 1968-69. In the school there are at least 600 students. The school is on Concord Avenue. All the school's floors are carpeted. Dewson is a lot different than other schools. In the school there aren't any rooms; there is a large floor divided by moveable walls. When the students come in at nine o'clock, they stay in their home areas until 9:30, when they split. At nine-thirty some go to math, then to reading. The reason for this is that when the kids go to Kent, they'll know what to expect.

In the afternoon in the new school we have all sorts of clubs like the Africa group and the Explorer's Club. I don't think there is a school in Toronto that has any of these clubs. I so far this year have learned a lot from going to these clubs. The Africa group is about a month and a half old, and I so far have made a minaret. I was interested in African architecture, and I chose to make a minaret. So far the minaret has turned out well, and I probably will be making more kinds of African buildings. I don't think I would have known what a minaret was in old schools.

In the Explorer's Club I have learned a lot from going to food factories on trips. I learned a lot about pollution from going to the city incinerator. When I went into the plant it looked like there would be lots of pollution caused, but there was barely any because of all the equipment used. The machine that stopped the air pollution was the combustion chamber. I've also learned a lot from the newspaper club. In my stories at the first of the year, I just put down who scored the goals and that was it. Now my stories are much longer because I use more variety and describe more of the interesting things.

Some schools think we're not learning enough, but I think they should come over and take a look and see how we're working by making our own decisions, and without the teachers telling us what to do. Some kids in other schools are jealous because the other schools don't have enough freedom like we do. In the other schools the kids have to stay in their classrooms all day; they can only go out if their teacher says so. The other schools don't have as many activities as us. I think Dewson is a good school and more students are wanting to go to Dewson.

Sit-in polarizes Ryerson

By ERROL YOUNG

A student occupation at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute ended in failure yesterday as students failed to win re-instatement of five fired English teachers.

The twenty-hour sit-in in the administrative offices ended at 11 a.m. yesterday when the students agreed to leave the office to allow one of the fired teachers a private interview with President D. L. Mordell in his adjoining office.

A group of engineers, carrying signs saying "Mordell is Boss" and "Give Mordell a Chance" entered the office just as the protesters were leaving, but only words were exchanged. Ryerson's administration president is D. L. Mordell.

At an administration-called mass meeting in the Ryerson cafeteria at noon yesterday, Mordell admitted to 1000 students the "great care taken by the protesters to protect the property of the institute," but added that he disliked the presence of non-students at the demonstration.

He would not discuss the firings which precipitated the sit-ins, saying the protesters' demands "showed ignorance of the facts and procedures" of the case.

The demands, formulated overnight during the sit-in, were the immediate re-instatement of the five fired teachers, who students insisted were competent, if innovative, and the setting up of structures for equal faculty and student participation in hiring and firing decisions.

The mass meeting had a large contingent of engineers and other supporters of Mordell's stand.

Mordell announced he was instituting a "system of identification cards. They can be used as admit-to-lecture cards and will enable us to find out who is who at any function," an obvious reference to the protesters.

"Is it the wish of the students of Ryerson for me to allow further disruptions?" he asked.

A shout from the engineers: "No."

"I am moving as fast as I judge I can to make reforms," he continued, "but am I to let myself be slowed up by a group of students who, I feel, do not represent the majority of the students of Ryerson?"

Another shout: "No."

"If another such sit-in should develop," he asked, "do I have the approval of the students of Ryerson to invoke due process?"

Shouts of "Yes," "Judas" and "Zieg Heil".

the cries of "Hip hip hurray."

Gerry Lampert, one of the teachers fired, told the students he wanted "Ryerson to simmer down and trust Mordell. I will support the president in any decision he makes."

The teachers are now having interviews with Mordell in an attempt to regain their former jobs.

The Free Ryerson Movement, founded two weeks ago over the hiring and firing issue is undecided on its future course of action.

The engineers upon entering the cafeteria lined the back of the hall in a show of strength.

President Mordell addresses his students at the mass meeting he called yesterday to state his point of view on law and order in the school.

Arts students and others signal the peace sign in response to the shouts by the engineers. Tempers between the two factions were at their highest at this point but no visible violence broke out.

Bissell plays in Daycare playroom

By H. MOXON-TRITCH

It's almost like a royal reception: or the arrival of God. Lots of blue flashes outside the window, courtesy of the Bourgeois press, who have waited two hours on the front steps.

Everyone is tense, clear on the three points: when, who does them, how do we pay? The renovations that will keep the Campus Community Day-Care Centre open and eligible for license.

The result of the first occupation in the history of U of T. The first successful occupation in English Canada.

Bissell comes into the main playroom, undistinguished blue suit, red face. The security guard, blue suit, grey hair, stays in the hall.

"Ooph," gets him to the floor where everybody's sitting. All those double scotches.

"Hello, Mr. Wernick," — clearly a familiar, "I didn't expect to find you here," but an unexpected face.

Down to the negotiations: The renovations will be done, but "Rather that you arrange for the renovations, because there is not a long term acceptance of by the University" for the provision of day-care.

Sarah Spinks counters, "It seems to me" (new left phraseology) "better if the University did it because we are not experienced in such matters."

Bissell is cagey, wiley. He has it turns out a two-part program: the first is to deny U of T has any responsibility for the provision of day-care. (We have a two-part program, too, but he doesn't know it.)

Everyone fences for a while. I'd always thought B. was cool and smooth, but he turns out obfuscating and slick, almost. His hair line recedes in such a way that above the deep red face, pieces of scalp form horns. Mephistophles in Disneyland.

His technique is relatively simple: everything that can be constructed on our part as a principled commitment is dismissed as "an irrelevant technical point." "I have to take direction too, you see and Mr. Rankin prefers..."

And everytime we try to establish that day care is a socially necessary condition of work for which the employer is as responsible as he is for safety, he describes it as "social welfare," and a "Philosophical matter."

"There are certain contributions of indirect aid to faculty. One of the more controversial, perhaps, is guaranteed loans to new faculty to enable them to purchase housing.

"It's a philosophical problem."

One of the volunteers said, "Day-care is a legitimate demand that can be made as a condition of work that support staff-and students- as they become increasingly employees of the university supported by state grants — might make in negotiating contracts. For example, union officials in CUPE have already indicated support for day-care."

Bissell continues his social-welfare-as-philosophical-question rap. "We have this solemn agreement with the community (Huron-Sussex Residents Association) to ensure that houses are not demolished are used for family housing."

He doesn't wear executive length hose, and sitting cross-legged on the floor his shins are very white in contrast with the still red face.

The first part of the programme is settled at this point: the renovations will be made and we (this is a real gain of the occupation) now get into discussion of the long-term commitment of U of T to day-care.

"What did you have in mind for the committee that you suggested, Dr. Bissell," Terry Thompson, a volunteer, asks.

And we go through the committees: one committee, two committees — for day care and to establish priorities, "a philosophical committee". Then, three levels of responsibility: son of committees meets levels of responsibility and it all goes around and nowhere.

There's a small wooden dog on the floor with leather ears mounted on fat red plastic wheels, and Bissell is fondling the ears. Like Johnson.

We want the administration to hire a researcher from the day care Centre to compile data on the future needs of the university for day-care.

While we discuss research, Bissell tries to push the dog away. It keeps rolling back, creaking.

Sarah keeps attacking Bissell's concept of research and social science. "It's like the city. There's a great difference between the number of houses that should be torn down when a researcher from the city goes in and when the residents of an area do the work."

Combat bourgeois Social Science!

"People have children now and they make some kind of arrangements for them. You have to look at it as a social need."

The committee is to have funds at its disposal to hire a researcher.

"Which committee are we talking about now?" Bissell asks. (If he doesn't know, how does he expect us to have kept track of the proliferation of committees and offices that he has created for us to deal with.)

Dunlop protest ends in scuffle

By LARRY HAIVEN

Just before the five hundred people left their seats at Convocation Hall Wednesday to march on Queen's Park, Tom Patterson (III New) took the podium to read a few telegrams. His voice could not conceal his anger.

"I have here a telegram from John Roberts, the premier of this province, in answer to our request that he attend the march on behalf of the 597 Dunlop workers who will be out of work on May 1."

The telegram said that unfortunately the premier could not attend due to prior commitments. Patterson then read an almost identical telegram from Ontario Labour Minister Dalton Bales. "And I understand that Mr. Bales is presently enjoying a holiday in Florida." Mr. Bales' office reports that he left Wednesday morning. The provincial legislature opened Tuesday.

"These people don't care for the workers at Dunlop. They don't care for my father. My father is 62 years old. He's worked 37 years at Dunlop and this May he's going to be out of work. And he doesn't know where the money is going to come from."

The crowd formed up outside and marched quietly to Queen's Park. When they arrived, they were met only by a couple of office workers coming out for lunch and about twenty Metro policemen and OPP officers peering at them from behind the main doors.

Nobody from the Conservative party came out to meet them, although the legislature was in session at the time. People milled about, restless, angry as a result of the speeches given at Convocation hall by Phil Japp, president of Local 132 of the United Rubber Workers of America, Tom Patterson, U of T economics professor Mel Watkins, and others.

Phil Japp climbed up on an open car and spoke through a small speaker system with considerable feedback. "I want to thank everybody for the wonderful response on behalf of the 597 Dunlop workers. We'd especially like to thank all the university students who marched. I think we've shown by this silent, orderly march that we want some answers from the government. I want everybody to stand here silently for two minutes and then all disperse."

There was silence for a few seconds. People were shifting nervously. Some more office girls cheerily clambered down the steps, lunchbags in their hands. The police stared. Photographers took pictures of the crowd. The stone face of the parliament buildings stood impassive.

Then somebody yelled, "Why doesn't somebody come out?" Other shouts followed. "Power to the people," "We want Roberts," "What are we standing here for?" The shouting became louder. Tom Patterson climbed onto the car, nervously took the microphone and asked the crowd to please disperse. People still stood around, not knowing what to do. It had only been a few minutes since they arrived.

Suddenly, two men carrying a banner broke from the crowd, yelling, "We're going in to see Roberts," and ran up to the doors carrying their banner. Most of the crowd of about 300 surged ahead after them.

Phil Japp stood on the steps as the people thronged past him. They ran up to the doors where they were met by a solid line of policemen.

Several scuffles broke out. One very young Metro policeman fell to the steps with a demonstrator. His cap went flying.

James Renwick, MPP for Riverdale, where the east end Dunlop plant is located, who had spoken in angry terms earlier at Convocation Hall put up his hands in an attempt to calm the crowd. He begged them to disperse. "Please do not destroy whatever good has been accomplished here today. Please disperse."

Phil Japp came back up to the steps and started to speak. Somebody else was shouting. "Will you shut up and let me speak?" said Japp. The man shut up. "You're not doing a thing to help the Dunlop workers by what you're doing here."

Later, Phil Japp said of the demonstration, "The people who started that mix-up did the Dunlop workers a great disservice. I don't mind militants but I don't like militants who have to be half-coked to do anything, and I'll tell you, some of those auto-workers were drunk."

"Other than that, though, the men at the plant were quite heartened by the whole thing. They really appreciated all the students coming out in support. We're very disappointed by the lack of support we got from the international union. They didn't help us at all."

Japp was referring to the Toronto branch of the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, whose headquarters are on Cecil Street. The Canadian Director of the International, Norman Allison told The Varsity Tuesday, "I have 80 locals to look after; I can't possibly give precise information on every one." Members of other Rubber Workers locals around Toronto have also expressed dissatisfaction with the response of the international to their problems.

Apparently British Unions have a more sympathetic attitude. Japp received a telegram from Britain Wednesday asking for complete information on the Dunlop shutdown to be sent to representatives of the Transport and General Workers, International Federation of Chemical Workers and shop stewards of Rubber union locals in British Rubber plants. Japp says they plan to apply pressure to Dunlop in Britain.

Meanwhile, back at the plant, Dunlop employees continue to work, wondering what effect Wednesday's march will have on the provincial government. Whether they will indeed be left jobless in a month, some of them after thirty years at the same plant at specialized jobs, jobs that end with the arbitrary shutdown of the plant.

But as Phil Japp says, "We're not quitting yet."

Local 132 president, Phil Japp, speaks at Convocation Hall.

lived in grudgingly by urbanites . . .

While four-fifths of Ontario's population live in urban areas, these same people would rather live in the country.

This predicament is the pre-occupation of Hans Blumenfeld, city planner and author of "The Modern Metropolis." As guest speaker at the Seventh Annual Law Conference Banquet on Friday night, he examined the issue of the future urban life of these four-fifths.

The whole "metropolitan region," he said, "is definitely oriented to one centre and spreads farther as transportation and communication improve.

But it will not become a formless mass. The centre will remain important but change in character," said Blumenfeld.

The city will become "more and more interconnected but the forms of administration will become less and less adequate to deal with it."

In feudal society people used the land to reap benefits for themselves, he said. Now, the value of a piece of land depends not on how well the farmer has worked it but by the accessibility of that land to other people.

"What a man does on his land affects many other people. Some public authority must try to anticipate the wide-branching activities of people and try to co-ordinate them. . . The development of land is not a right but a privilege which society confers on developers."

Blumenfeld predicted a move towards public ownership of developing areas as the best way of co-ordinating the activities of a city since "the highest and best use of land does not necessarily produce the highest and best volatile community."

The future ought to hold "greater equality of opportunity, more of our tremendous scientific powers to control nature and increased time for leisure. . ."

"It could be a bright future. It could be. It might not necessarily be."

According to Blumenfeld, we may use the processes of nature for the happiness of mankind, to blow ourselves up or to poison our environment to the point where it can no longer sustain life.

"It depends on you and me and all of us which way our cities will go. . . If we are spurred by a never-ending quest for truth, then it may be a bright future indeed."

and who will foot the bill?

Municipalities in Canada are creatures of the provincial government and Darcy McKeough, Ontario's Minister of Municipal Affairs, thinks it should stay that way.

Speaking to a panel on the Power of the City Thursday at New College, McKeough called for more money for the provinces, with less federal intervention.

The power of the city has eroded because of lack of money, McKeough said.

"What we're really talking about is cold, hard cash. Bucks — that's power."

McKeough said the main problem is that the federal government has the power to set priorities that should be set by provincial and municipal governments.

"The Federal role should be indirect," he said. They should give the money to the provinces, who would administer the programs.

Hewart Grafftey, a former MP, blamed "confusion in the constitution, buck-passing, lack of coordination," for the failure to cope with urban problems.

Grafftey foresaw a way out of the "constitutional jungle" in a Metro and Urban Rehabilitation Act for "consultation, cooperation, goodwill and local initiative."

"Ottawa simply cannot turn its back and ignore these problems.

Economic equilibrium and economic dissatisfaction is more important now than language rights and linguistic matters," said the former Quebec MP.

Vernon Singer, deputy leader of the Ontario Liberal Party, said the solutions would only come from Queen's Park.

"No answer will come out of Ottawa wa that is acceptable to all cities across Canada," he said, "I can't look with enthusiasm at what is going to emanate from Ottawa."

Singer, a former Reeve of North York, rejected complete free enterprise in development.

"We can't just have a free-for-all," he said. "I just don't have that much faith in the genuine desire to serve the community."

while debate continues--- planning or development?

By TOM WALKOM

A city planner belittled planning while a developer praised it, at a Friday symposium on The Quality of City Living.

Earl Levin, director of Planning for Metro Winnipeg, criticized present planning techniques as "the construction of projects on paper."

"Planning must be implemented as well as conceived," he said. "The planning process is identical with the governmental process."

Albert Latner, president of Greenwin Property Management, stressed the importance of planning for the present.

"When we put up an apartment building," he said, "I don't know how it's going to affect the people."

MOST KNOWLEDGE

Latner felt developers like himself should be included on planning boards, even as non-voting members, since "they are among the most knowledgeable."

"There is a widespread belief that the city is failing," Levin said. "It is a mistake to blame the problem in the US strictly on the insane attempts of Americans to dehumanize the Negro. The problem is the new urban fact."

Toronto lawyer J. T. Weir related planning to "the facts."

"Movement to the cities is a force you can't stop," he said, and problems must be examined in light of this.

"It is dubious whether any legal or administrative process can stop this migration," the lawyer went on.

Weir used the example of a Toronto post-war zoning bylaw. By trying to create quality within the city, the problem was moved out to the suburbs, he said.

"It is silly for planners to sit on Olympus. We must examine relationships between people and the city and find out what is going on in those apartment buildings," Weir said.

THE ELECTIONS COMMITTEE PRESENTS:

A DISCUSSION-DEBATE WITH ALL CANDIDATES RUNNING FOR MAYOR IN THE CITY OF TORONTO.

DATE: Monday, November 24th

TIME: 12.30 p.m. to 2.00 p.m.

PLACE: Convocation Hall

Come, ask questions and find out where things are really at with those candidates running for the most important job concerning the city of Toronto.

$100,000 damage in Loyola bombing

MONTREAL (CUP) — A building at Loyola College was rocked by dynamite Thursday evening, apparently in reprisal against the passage of Bill 63 in the Quebec Legislature the same day.

Damage to the four-storey Bryan Building — finished in February, 1968 — was estimated at between $100,000 and $150,000 by Loyola administration President Patrick Malone.

The bomb exploded in a glass-enclosed stairwell. No one was injured although 500 night students were taking classes in the building at the time.

Malone said he doubted the bombing was connected with the dismissal of physics Professor S.A. Santhanam, fired without explanation by the administration last summer. The dismissal has sparked several sit-ins by students, and the Canadian Association of University Teachers will begin an investigation of his case Nov. 28.

The belief is widely held that groups opposing Bill 63 — which gives Quebec parents the right to choose French or English as the language of instruction for their children — planted the bomb. Last month Separatist labor leader Michel Chartrand predicted that English education institutions might be bombed if the controversial bill was adopted.

It was the second bombing that day. Early Thursday morning a small blast shook the home of a suburban deputy mayor, one of those leading a fight to retain English education in St.-Leonard.

A U of T team has won the Bishop's University annual debating tournament, held this weekend at Lennoxville, Quebec.

Speaking on "Be it resolved that social change can only be brought about by violence" the two Toronto teams of Don Devenney (SGS), Frank Wierich (ISMC) and Vincent Dolan (ISMC) remained undefeated in their rounds with teams from McGill, Loyola and Bishop's.

The championship debate was waged impromptu style on the randomly chosen topic entitled "Be it resolved that a line should be drawn."

Devinder Garewal, a Maoist from McGill and his partner John Van Dor took the affirmative side in losing to Miss Antonyshyn and Mr. Dolan.

Anthrops debate academe apathy

Is Anthropology a toilet training of the mind? Some members of U of T's anthropology department expressed that opinion at-a debate last Thursday.

The debate was organized to resolve whether or not the study of anthropology was "detrimental to the alleviation of poverty".

Anthropology student Clive Doucet (IV SMC) charged that the study of anthropology was simply "a way of gaining a meal ticket" and has no relevance to social problems.

"Anthropologists describe things in terms of future grants" said Doucet.

Doug Daniels (SGS), Doucet's partner in the debate, said that "discrimination against the poor is the equivalent of racism". "Anthropologists" he said, "sit on the side and criticize racist thinking but fail to do anything about it."

One member of the audience accused anthropologists of apathy and said "all they're interested in is masturbating into their field notes".

Bilanow affair rocks Ottawa U

OTTAWA (CUP) — The University of Ottawa student council is considering establishing a permanent Commission on Academic Freedom in the wake of the "Bilanow Affair."

An article in Saturday Night tells how Kazimierz Bilanow, a Polish lawyer, was virtually promised a job at the university, and then rejected because he was "from a socialist country."

A letter from Douglas Wallace, Secretary of U of O's Canadian and Foreign Law Research Centre, sent April 23, spoke of difficulties in convincing the Board of Governors to hire someone from a socialist country.

A later letter from Wallace told Bilanow he was being rejected for financial reasons.

U of O student union vice-president Hugh Segal said the affair was an affront to academics from communist countries presently working in the science and medical faculties.

"I don't think the politics of the applicant should have entered into the discussions at all," he said.

Biafra may be 4000 miles away, but there are people at U of T who care about it.

This Thursday from noon to 2:30 p.m., Convocation Hall will be the scene of a Biafra Symposium — U of T's contribution to the national day of mourning for Biafra.

Rev. Dick Quinn, worker at a food relief station in Biafra, and Samuel Imiku, a Biafran cabinet minister will speak. Harry Lampman's film, "This is Biafra", narrated by Cliff Robertson, will be also shown.

At 6:00 p.m. Thursday evening, MPP Stephen Lewis, and MPP Andrew Brewin, both New Democrats, will speak at Convocation Hall. The film will be shown again.

When this is over, there will be a candle-light procession down Bay St. to City Hall to join the Toronto Biafra movement.

Stanley Burke, organizer of Interpax, will address the mourners.

Municipolix: the wisdom of the silent majority

Louis Erlichman found this editorial written on the pavement. Mr. Erlichman wishes to absolve the original author of any responsibility for any errors found herein, which are doubtless due to faulty transcription.

It has been standard form for a long time to complain about the "apathy" of voters. High school essayists point to 25% turnouts at municipal elections and decry the foolishness and ignorance of the masses.

What all of this misses is the most obvious conclusion to be reached from the electorate's response: that they are right, that there is damn little point to voting for the municipal official of their choice.

This meaninglessness has several dimensions. In the first place, municipal governments are tied almost exclusively to a field of vision that makes parish pump politics look broad-ranging. Any decisions they make can be vetoed by the Ontario Municipal Board (a fact for which one can occasionally be thankful), the Department of Municipal Affairs, Standing and Special Committees of the Legislature, and/or the Premier.

Which does not, of course, preclude the possibility of municipalities doing things of note, within the limits of their non-progressive tax system, their powers and their interests.

Which brings us to the second problem, the calibre of candidates. The general lack of coverage of municipal politics means that Mahalon Beach can go on blathering against Communism for years without his constituents removing him for a head-check.

All the candidates in wards six and seven at election time clamber over each other in the rush to condemn sin (the Spadina expressway) and extol virtue (the resident's participation).

But unless you want to spend ten or fifteen hours a week going down to City Hall every Wednesday, you'll never have the slightest idea what your man is really doing. Incumbents become almost impossible to dislodge simply because their names are better known than anyone else's.

Coalitions on the council are ephemeral and follow few discernable patterns. The councillors, are independent operators in every sense of the word, guarded by newspaper non-coverage, and a community of interest from standing accountable, from being other than opportunistic, and engaging in other than marriages of tactical convenience.

Once on council, you make your slow move up the ladder from alderman, to controller (alas, the cushioning step in Toronto is no longer), mayor, and if you have a bit more ambition, to provincial or federal politics.

Both Dennison and Campbell followed the route, Maggie even taking time out for a loss in her first run at controller.

You can circumvent the grind sometimes by making noise.

June Marks made it to controller (where she has been conspicuously quiet) as the voice of the poor people, the poor but proud lady from Pembroke Street who stood up against the inspectors and the slum-razers (until she moved to the Borough of York).

You have to be careful, of course, to be loud only in praise of motherhood, as George Ben found out (although he got a seat in the legislature as a consolation prize).

That there is a way out of the mire is doubtful. Clarkson has made it obvious in his campaign that you can have old ideas coming from young men. At best, he can be expected to be as hard-working and conscientious as Dennison and Campbell, which is, one suspects, as much as one can hope for from the Liberal Party.

The unfortunate part of all this is that the city, for all its impotence, still plays, or refuses to play, a large part in the planning and development of this agglomeration we call a city.

The party system held out a little bit of hope that there might be an independent, responsible political approach to the limited realm of municipal government; that there might be accountability and consistency, and an unwillingness to sell out to spot-rezoning.

Well, the parties seem to have brought some slight improvement in the calibre (as well as the number) of candidates, but the prospects of their being any more than several tighter, but still warring, factions on the councils are slim. And looking at the party slates, it's still hard to say that's a bad thing. The North York and Toronto Liberals somehow can't seem to agree on the Spadina Expressway.

So you're faced with a choice between the jewellers and the real estate men (good family men all), in varying shades of earnestness, and citizen participation. The election may be meaningless, but things can't get much worse. Please.

Why is the Poli-Ec course union irrelevant?

CHECK ONE:

There's no need for it...

I'd like to comment on Bob James' article on the course union election in Gad Horowitz's Political Analysis class, not because he failed to convey the utter lunacy of the proceedings, but because he missed the point by analysing it in terms of elitism and the inadequacies of representative government.

Bob noted that "there are important issues coming up that the course union will have to deal with — CUG and Campbell to name only two. But there was no perceived need for that representative (that Political Analysis had been asked to elect) in that class."

The reason there was no perceived need for a class rep was that there was no perceived need for a course union.

In that classroom I could recognize members of the Young Socialists, Canadian Party of Labour and/or Worker-Student Alliance, New Left Caucus and the SAC executive, plus a Varsity masthead staffer and assorted leftist hangers-on. But no one could say why he or she wanted a course union. Except Bob James.

Bob wanted a course union in order to deal with CUG and Campbell.

Setting aside any principled preference for liberty and democracy, there is not much point in students getting on decision-making bodies of this university unless after we do so we are going to change things; many would say, "change things to our advantage." In other words, if people like Bob keep talking as if CUG and Campbell are their own rewards, then those reports will probably go the way of virtue.

But what is it that we as students want to change? If we could reach a consensus on that question, then we would know why we want to see CUG and Campbell implemented, why we need student unions, and why Political Analysis needed a class rep. If we can find some "perceived needs" to combine with our "principled preferences", then we will have a student movement on this campus.

In his editorial last Friday, Brian Johnson tried to make CUG relevant to students by pointing that the university is irrelevant to the "real world", and suggesting that students could change that. But even that (absurdly liberal) argument is too abstract to stir up mass interest — ask any Trot. That editorial did not relate to anybody's perceived needs — certainly not Brian's.

And while we're all sitting around waiting for the February Revolution, maybe we ought to consider the implications of the last paragraph on page 15 of the Campbell Report. And maybe we ought to do more than just consider them.

...it's an ugly duckling

The Political Economy Course Union has nothing more to do with democracy than the Political Economy Department does.

Both are vitally interested in the subject of democracy, yet neither makes any pretense at democratic decision-making. But for the Political Economy Course Union that is intentional. The Union is making no pretense at decision-making of any kind.

It does not claim to represent all the students in political economy. Nor does it represent all points of view in the department.

The Course Union is a group of students interested enough in the discipline of political economy to want to relate their studies to the real world, and committed to the idea that there can be more to the educational experience than a weekly lecture.

Waking people up to reality is a difficult task, as the people organising this union are finding.

If the pleas of the people who tried to organize the union this year had a peculiar messianic quality it was because it seemed like they were crying in the wilderness when they talked about student initiative and democratic reform.

Even the hardest radical heart begins to soften and the strongest democratic ideals begin to crumble when a passionate plea for student support in ten classes produces barely six volunteers.

When the people who are organising the Union asked for a representative they weren't trying to "impose a structure from above" onto every class. They were trying to find enough people interested in the idea of student organisation to support a meeting, let alone a structure.

It is very easy to spout the ideology of Mosca and Pareto (Poli. Sci. 307 offers ten easy lessons) and scream elitism at every student attempt at initiative and indeed student elitism is as bad as or worse than any other kind of elitism.

But give the Course Unions half a chance. Don't kill the ugly duckling before he turns into a goose. He just might turn into a swan.

On Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in Room 1071 of Sid Smith the Political Economy Course Union is holding a meeting open to all students in the department to discuss a draft constitution which is a real attempt to prevent elitism if not to promote anarchy.

That Union is still a very ugly duckling but it is trying desperately to fly (and quack). Give it at least a few months before you start the hunting season.

Faculty set the record straight on staff-student parity

we slap our wrists

Certain assertions made by Brian Johnson and Trevor Spurr need to be corrected. The ATS did not say that judgment should be withheld on the structure of the top governing body of the university; that motion was tabled. The ATS did not vote down the principle of staff-student parity in all departmental and faculty matters. The motion passed reads:

"Be it resolved that the ATS, while recognizing the legitimate role of students in providing information and advice, rejects the concept of staff-student parity in the governing bodies of departments, colleges and faculties." This applies to governing bodies, but not to committees of those bodies — where the real work is usually done. This leaves individual departments a great deal of freedom, if they wish to use it.

Admittedly, if the majority of those attending the ATS general meeting of Nov. 12 fairly reflects the opinions of the staff as a whole, then this may only be hair-splitting.

If this is so, students should ask themselves: since relatively few faculty members have actually had bad experiences with students on governing bodies, why the strong antipathy toward parity? Brian Johnson gave his reasons; I'd like to add one of my own. Perhaps "the students" have a bad image these days. If so, why? There are two answers: SAC, and The Varsity.

Prof. Alan D. Latta
German, Trinity College

they slap our faces

Sir,

I am directed by the Council of the ATS to inform you of the following motions passed at the Special General Meeting of the Association, held on November 12.

"a. That the Association of Teaching Staff, while welcoming student opinion on all university questions, affirms its determination that its members continue to be judged in matters of appointment, promotion, tenure and/or dismissal solely by members of the academic staff of this University, or, where proper, by professional colleagues outside this University.

b. That the ATS, while recognizing the legitimate role of students in providing information and advice, rejects the concept of staff-student parity in the governing bodies of Departments, Colleges, and Faculties.

c. That any changes in the procedures affecting University research administration be consistent with the right of scholars to select their own areas of research and public service solely on their own initiative."

Since several incomplete or distorted versions of these motions have appeared already and have led to editorial comment in The Varsity, it is Council's wish that you and your readers should be aware of the precise form of these resolutions so that any further comment can be directed towards the actual position taken by members of the Association.

Stewart McLean,
Secretary, ATS.

we get slap-happy

Like the Rev. J. A. MacKenzie quoted in the Nov. 19 issue of "The Varsity" in "There's Hope Left For Rochdale" (page 1) I call into question "the values of society".

The phrase "Debts Payed" used as a sub-heading in the article is an anomaly bearing no truth and no weight. The word "payed" does not exist in the English language.

If the writer and/or typesetter wished to convey, as I gather, the idea of payment of debts, then may I suggest the "Debts Paid" would comfort those who still believe in linear communication such as the printed and correctly spelt word.

CUG discussion begins

Organized campus discussion of the recommendations and implementation of the report of the Commission on University Government gets under way today.

At 10 a.m. the CUG Programming Committee meets in the south dining room of Hart House to discuss the possibility of a campus-wide teach-in on CUG.

During the summer the administration agreed to cancel all classes for such a teach-in.

A meeting Friday of the SAC university committee was unable to decide whether to have large meetings for each separate faculty, college or institute, or smaller seminars for each course in regular class time.

The first of several campus meetings to discuss the CUG report will be held at noon today in room 2117, Sidney Smith Building. Students, faculty, administrative and support staff are urged to attend.

Most crucial meeting of the week comes Wednesday afternoon when the Arts and Science Faculty Council debates student-staff parity on major departmental and faculty committees.

The 1,100 faculty members and 13 students on the council will discuss a motion supported by the ATS students parity on all tenure, hiring and firing, and curriculum committees.

It directly contradicts a CUG recommendation for staff-student parity on all such committees. Meanwhile, Innis College will hold a general student meeting on CUG Tuesday at 1 p.m. in the common room of Innis II.

The Innis Student Society executive decided last week the general meeting format would be the most legitimate way to formulate an Innis College reply to CUG.

Vietnam: imperialism is expensive

by I. F. Stone
Washington, D.C.

Imperialism is an impolitic word. It is only other countries which are imperialist. One's own is always engaged in some noble crusade.

German imperialism under the kaiser was spreading kultur.

The czars claimed to be extending the mystic sway of Moscow as the Third Rome, and their communist successors carry on in the same vein, albeit secularized.

France had a mission civilatrice, and Britain "the white man's burden".

Bolivar long ago said that the United States "plagued" Latin America "in the name of liberty".

What has happened overseas since World War II is only an extension of what has long been occurring under the Monroe doctrine.

The Greek dictatorship the Sixth Fleet supports is a Guatemala extended to the eastern Mediterranean, and the oligarchy the US bolsters in Saigon in the name of freedom is no different from half a dozen similar regimes under the US wing in Latin America.

This is imperialism and it is expensive.

A new survey by Congressional Quarterly of US commitments abroad adds up the stupendous figures. In September: 1.2 million military personnel stationed abroad (out of total US armed forces of 3.46 million) in more than 33 countries and foreign possessions. With them were 26,000 US civilians, 350,000 dependents and 255,000 foreign nationals attached to US overseas bases.

There are US military missions in 50 countries and 2,270 military installations overseas (not including Vietnam), of which the pentagon designated 340 as major installations.

The cost is difficult to arrive at. The Pentagon figures the cost of all US military commitments overseas exclusive of Southeast Asia at $15.1 billion per year. It puts the cost of the Vietnam war at $28 billion, or a total of $43 billion, somewhat more than half the US military budget.

Congressional estimates run higher. Senator John Sherman Cooper in a report to the NATO parliamentarians last November estimated US NATO commitments alone at $12 to $15 billion annually and the Vietnam war at $30 to $35 billion. That would put total costs in the $50 billion range.

That $50 billion a year spent at home could in 10 years wipe out poverty, illiteracy, pollution, racial tension and much of the crime that afflicts the US.

Entirely too much has gone into military forces and hardware, sparking little arms races around the world. There have been few armed conflicts since the war in which both sides did not fight with weapons the US supplied.

Of the total in aid since World War II $38.8 billion is listed as military — and all but $2.8 billion of that in grants, not loans. But, Congressional Quarterly points out, aid labelled economic has sometimes been primarily for military purposes: "During the 1950s' for example, 'economic' aid to Laos paid for the entire military budget in that country."

A total of 78 countries have received US military assistance since 1950. As part of this military aid program "some 10,000 foreign military personnel are trained annually by the US at 175 centres in this country and at other locations overseas." The training includes "counter-insurgency," i. e. repressing social discontent by force.

The US's rival in imperialism is the Soviet Union, but it is a distant second in the power struggle. While the US has 1.2 million men in more than 33 countries, it has 320,000 troops stationed outside its borders in four east European countries.

The Brezhnev doctrine is modelled on the Monroe doctrine, and the Caracas corollary. This has made the Russians more unpopular than any other people in eastern Europe, as the US is unpopular in the "free" world.

Just as Russia stifles liberalism in the Soviet bloc, the US tends to stifle it in many of the countries under its control. Czechoslovakia and Greece are sisters in suffering.

The military on both sides prefer hard-line regimes. Truman in March 1947 pledged the US to "support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressure." In Greece where the Truman Doctrine started, as in Vietnam, the US finds itself supporting armed minorities in subjugating the majority, non-communist and communist alike.

The "frontiers of freedom" around the Eurasian rim from Greece through Iran to Taiwan are manned by dictators. Each of these countries is a potential Vietnam.

Vietnam may end, but the effort to police the world goes on. Hardly a day passes without some story from the pentagon about budgetary cuts but the details remain suspiciously vague.

Aviation Week Oct. 27 says Nixon has approved spending levels over the next five-year planning period at the Pentagon of $70 to $75 billion a year. If the new level for the next five years assumes an end of the Vietnam war, then it means a rise of 40 to 50 percent from the level just before Johnson sent in combat troops and Americanized the war.

Then, the total budget outlay "by function" for the military was $49.5 billion. A post-Vietnam level of $70 to $75 billion would mean a stepup of from $20 to $25 billion.

These figures show it is not enough just to get out of Vietnam, or even as Mansfield told the Senate Oct. 20 to get out of Southeast Asia "lock, stock and barrel."

Without a major shift away from the idea of a pax americana, there will be scant resources left for reconstruction at home. It is imperialism and militarism which must be recognized as our enemies. The Pentagon is fighting a rear guard action on bases and personnel, as it is on Vietnam, making no more concessions than necessary to appease public opinion.

Richard J. Barnett in his admirable new book The Economy of Death concludes that the militarization of America is now America's number one national security problem and warns that after Vietnam "there are waiting in the Pentagon wings 13 major new weapons systems which will move inexorably toward production and deployment unless the juggernaut is stopped."

That is why we have to talk of militarism and imperialism and not just of Vietnam.

underground comix in the at

In this age of nuclear holocaust, world famine, strangulation of the lifeblood of Mother Earth by pollution, well-intentioned but misdirected protest, pay toilets and Compoz, it is hard indeed to criticize Academe's total negligence of pop culture as evidenced in the work of America's underground comic-strip artists; nay, one may even say, without fear of immediate contradiction, that this gap in the study of modern literature looms large. Nonetheless, in secluded and dingy corners of Learning's Halls lonely scholars collect and catalogue that trivia of our era — the head comic. Conceived in haste, carried out without regard to the sensibilities of 20th century, printed on cheap paper in a slipshod manner, the idea of an underground comic book, combining at once and simultaneously cosmic truths and banal observations is one unique to our time.

It is futile and depressing to attempt to consider within the confines of this MS. the underground comic sui generis, its origins, its ramifications or lack of them in the real world and its future. Indeed to do so would be futile. Rather, I wish to begin with a brief discussion of other head comicists in general, then zoom in on the life and times of R. Crumb, his work and his art, and finally conclude with an analysis of a single pathos-packed Crumb comic.

I. THE OTHERS

There are many names that spring to mind as one tries to construct a pantheon of underground comic greats — names like S. Clay Wilson, (Captain Pissgums) Gilbert Shelton (Wonder Wart-Hog, Hog of Steel), Larry Welz (Captain Guts), Rick Griffin (AAAAAAAMMM), and so on. Each of these wielders of the comic pen has developed his own style complete with humorous nuances and side-splitting themes, some gross and obscene, some refined and delicate, but all infantile.

Wilson, for instance, is renowned for his biting characterizations of Captain Pissgums and his Pervert Pirates, the Checkered Demon and Captain Fatima, leader and confessor-figure of the lesbian-manned pirate ship "Quivering Thigh." The Pervert Pirates are described thusly by Wilson, in a representative example of his gift for gentle humor and wry wit: "They came from every crud-crusted corner of the globe, these lice-infested losers ... some were sadists ... some were masochists ... some just licked stinky old boots" and Pissgums himself engaged in activities too diverse and perverse to be described in a newspaper read by young people.

In Zap Comix No. 3, whose publication was a red-letter day for comicologists everywhere, Wilson outlines the amazing battle that took place between the Perverts and Fatima's equally far-out crew of half-nude dikes. Here of course, is the eternal struggle of the universe, black versus white, yin and yang, egg rolls and pizza, tied to the sexual-erotic metaphor to give the theme immediacy and meaning in a confused world. Wilson's cosmic vision shows the barbarian struggle that results, the ultimate synthesis as each side decides perversion is the better part of valor and retreat in harmony to "Quivering Thigh" to begin afresh building something of more lasting and heterosexual beauty. Once again the subjective correlative has been found to be the objective fact.

Gilbert Shelton's delightful fantasy-man in Wander Warthog, Hog of Steel, alias Philbert Desanex, "mild-mannered reporter for the Muthalode Marning Mungpie" is another example of a decayed mind at work. Shelton's superhero, hampered as he is by his grotesque visage in real-life, epitomizes the image we all have of a Halden Caulfieldesque super-hero, always stumbling on the big crime but also always failing to apprehend the criminal (see figure 1). In the illustration we see our Hog-Hero trapped in a washroom while attempting to rid himself of his Desanex disguise.

It is not possible keeping in mind the extreme space limitations, to begin to demonstrate the Existential Universalism of Rick Griffin's work or the political naivete of Larry Welz (e.g. "Wake up, America! It's later than you think! Are you one of those simpering pinkos that sees nothing but go WHICH SIDE ARE Y Captain Guts.) Insten

II. A QUICK LOOK AT ARY.

It is indeed difficult to keep one's mind with the gar Robert Crumb's; a hard-hitting humorist, a accomplished artist, a characterization in frames. Perhaps the obtuse comment mated "Definitely a ent." Our hero exp following manner. ' speedfreak I ain't. T the world's last gre ... the Old Guy's skin and Mr. Natural was summarily sent back to dear old Earth — a small step for God, but a giant leap for Mr. Natural. Relaxing at home, the Sage receives a telegram from God condemning him to hell; Natch escapes, only to fall into a crack in the earth. I will digress at this point to point out the obvious similarity to the Proserpina myth — Natural too, is hanging between earth and hell in eternal limbo. In addition, Crumb's weltsanschauung has perceived the ups and downs, trials and errors of life on earth's stage and compounded these into a single, pathos-packed, rib-splitting image. (figure 3).

Finally, of course, the "hot-headed old sage" repents and is sold a repentance kit (hair shirt, ball, chain, boulder, mountain) by one Cheesis K. Reist. This wide-ranging theme is a common one in Crumb's work, involving as it does the five elements of earth, air, fire and water, astrology, aspects of the Tarot, penance, and salesmanship.

It is impossible to analyse all of Crumb's themes and his symbolic people: Angelfood McSpade for instance, is America's dream girl — statuesque, intelligent, sock-o-delic, and fun to be with!; or Schuman the Human, half-man half-machine, who finds a heart in a drop of water. Perhaps the only way to gain a true understanding of the Crumbian philosophy is a frame by frame analysis of one his simplest yet most poetic comic-strips — Mr. Natural.

III MR. NATURAL: IRRELEVANCE IN A POST-HEGELIAN AGE

In this mellow psycho-drama our first frame is the protagonist Flakey Foont hanging up the phone. Crumb's oral tradition is introduced immediately by the "click" of the phane cradle and Foont's pensive "hm!". In the background is a painting of what seems to be a sunrise, forewarning us of the rebirth promised in frame six. On the other hand, it could be a sunset, emphasizing the Ultimate Abstraction. In frame 2 Foont strikes the pose of Rodin's Thinker, leading us to completely misinterpret the rest of the strip. Peering through the obscurantist venetian blinds he sees the city, his 20th century technological anti-environment. The themes have been set, but who knows what they are.

Frame 3 shows Foont articulating the well-known problem of failure in human endeavour, the Freudian guilt of modern man. As Foont says "I've been goofing off a lot lately." His cry of fear at the thought of being abandoned by his guru is the same cry being uttered by today's Youth. His panic increases in Frame 4, but here we have the lamp, symbolic of education and salvation and we realize Foont's true concern for his mentor in the kind term of endearment he uses "th' ol' fart."

Frame 5 emphasizes the passage of time ("an hour later") and finally we are faced with the denouement. Foont has donned costume, he is a bit-player on the world-stage and Mr. Natural throws a philosophical verbal tomato at Foont's perspiring face.

"No, no, no Flakey Foont ... a beard doth not a Mr. Natural make!!"

Robert Crumb has risen above the contemporary, transcending the gross insufficiency of the published form, for the content of the sodality within. Between reader and artist, the oft-hazed ganja stands treadmill no more, but is, in fact, become sybaritical rendevous of bombastic import. By fashioning Hegel's dialectical idealism materialistic, the inner windings of Crumb's chronometer flux conjugally in accord with the great sidereal movements — his philosophic gems dancing light upon even the most Lilliputian of minds. In short, he's a real prince!

Editors of U. of A. paper to ask for student control of censorship

EDMONTON (CUP) — The editors of the student newspaper at the University of Alberta will go to their student council today to demand student control of censorship of their paper.

The Gateway was censored by the U of A printer, who refused to publish an anti-war cartoon Friday. The printer was upheld by university vice-president in charge of finance and administration Gordon Tyndall. The university owns the printshop.

The cartoon, first printed in the Ubyssy and subsequently in several other student newspapers, shows a man labelled "USA" and a woman labelled "Vietnam" apparently having sexual intercourse. The caption reads, "reluctant to pull out."

Tyndall said Wednesday the university "does not want to print something that will demean the university or is not up to its standards."

He denied the refusal was censorship. "To censor is to prohibit a person from publishing something. The Gateway can publish it anywhere they want but we won't print it."

Editor Al Scarth said Friday the incident clearly illustrated the need for student control of the university press.

The newspaper will ask council for a motion of censure of Tyndall, and appeal to administration president Max Wyman for a reversal.

Medicine faculty favors Bill 194

Support for Bill 194 — which would make stray animals available for scientific research — is growing in the Faculty of Medicine.

Wednesday the faculty cancelled its classes, and Meds students made up the majority of about 600 students who turned up at an open hearing of the Province's Select Committee on Animal Health Care.

At the hearing, representatives of the Council of Deans in Medicine in Ontario spoke strongly in favour of the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Armstrong of the University of Guelph spoke of humane treatment that the animals receive and of the shortage of them for research purposes.

Mr. Stelling, president of the Ontario Humane Society, spoke against the bill. He questioned the value of some of the research being done and suggested that animals, especially dogs, be specially bred for research.

The debate on Bill 194 will continue today at 1 p.m. in the Medical Sciences Building where representatives of the Humane Society and the Faculty of Medicine will present their views.

Can-opener cadger gets canned

REGINA (CUP) — The University of Saskatchewan at Regina has refused to rehire a teaching assistant in sociology because he stole a 39-cent can opener in Banff last summer.

Jeff Goodman, who has taught at Regina for four semesters, had his application for appointment for the spring semester turned down by the Board of Governors despite a recommendation from the sociology department that he be rehired.

"The university is clearly exercising double jeopardy here," Goodman said, "trying to punish me again and in a much more serious way for something I've already paid for."

"In any case the theft of a 39-cent can opener is really pretty insignificant and it is completely irrelevant to whether or not I qualify as a teacher."

Goodman was fined $54 for the theft, which he calls "a stupid momentary lapse." He has his MA from the University of Chicago and is working on a doctorate. Regina students have already started a petition to get Goodman rehired.

Saturday padded off to an early start for the Women's Fencing Team when they hosted their first tournament of the season in the Benson Building. Three and a half hours of Time developed eleven tired girls, two hungry Directors and a Victor, Marion Julier.

Two bouts were fought simultaneously and the winners of each — Lilit Zekulin, Barb Milne, Sue Acourt; and Marion Julier, Sarah Parsons and Sharon Takasaki, competed in a final match.

Marion Julier who won the competition is a member of the Woodsmen, a Fencing Team coached by Ken Wood.

Lilit Zekulin who was our most spectacular Fencer last year placed second with victories in four of a possible five bouts. Third was Barb Milne also a strong Fencer from last year.

Sue Acourt was outstanding in that she was a finalist and this is her first year with the University Fencing Team.

The Directors were Mr. Wood and Lester Wong. There were a few spectators but none that stayed the duration of the event.

Women's interfac tennis finals settled at last!

By SANDY PETT

Would you believe . . . women's interfac (outdoor) tennis is officially over!

The marathon tournament began in the last days of September with one round being played off each week until the quarter-finals were reached.

On a Saturday in late October, Scarborough College hosted what was thought to be the windup of the tournament.

Alas, this was not to be. Although the doubles competition was finished, a singles winner had yet to be chosen.

However, at the Strathgowan Club last week, Marguerite Moore (II VIC) defeated Marcia Leonard (I PHE) 6-1, 6-0 to capture (at last) the singles title.

Having been foiled by foul weather several times the girls finally resorted to the indoor court where nevertheless one's breath was quite visible. Congratulations to these hardy souls.

In team standings, PHE finished first followed by Vic and Scarborough. For those wishing to try to change those standings there will be an indoor tournament (one night only!) in late January or early February.

Interfac Basketball

PHE II wins title over PHE III 18-13

By FRANCES FLINT

It took a fourth quarter rally, but PHE II finally broke out of a tight defensive game to defeat PHE III 18-13 and take the women's interfaculty basketball championship.

The games were played last Thursday at Benson Building.

Lorna Tanner capitalized on the solid teamwork of PHE II and accounted for 12 points. Cathy Cullis topped the scoring for PHE III with 6 points.

The game started out as a fast breaking contest but soon settled into a defensive and forechecking match. At the end of the third quarter the score was deadlocked 12-2.

Both semi-final matches were close. PHE II defeated SMC III 12-10 after two overtime periods, while PHE III scrapped past Meds by only one point to make it into the finals.

Undefeated Season

Manitoba beats McGill 24-15

Varsity sports photographer Spencer Higgins, shooting at 1200 ASA in available light only, deftly decapitates two players in Friday nights' collegiate championship as McGill's Chris Rumball (27) and Dave Norcott (60) bring to earth Manitoba scatback Dennis Hrycaiko (27). Mr. Higgins escaped unjured.

The Establishment of college football suffered a setback Friday night in the fifth annual College Bowl as the Western Intercollegiate champs, University of Manitoba Bisons, captured the Canadian collegiate title with a 24-15 victory over the McGill Redmen.

It marked the first time a Western team has defeated a SIFL squad in post-season play.

The U of Alberta Golden Bears defeated McMaster 10-9 in the 1967 College Bowl but that was one year before Mac joined the OQAA big league.

College football in Canada has burgeoned in the past half decade with top competition taking place in five conferences involving 29 teams. No longer will the SIFL be able to claim a monopoly on the country's top calibre of play.

The Manitoba team, not noted for its passing with skinny bespectacled "Wonder Boy" Bob Kraemer directing the attack, stunned McGill with a 52-yard pass and run completion to halfback Mike Shylo on the game's first play from scrimmage.

Four plays later, Kraemer, a second year PhysEd student, rolled out to his right and carried 4 yards for the first score.

The Herd from Manitoba added two more touchdowns and a field goal to take a commanding 24-8 half time lead.

INTERCEPTION PROVES COSTLY

Near the end of the first quarter, Manitoba's outstanding linebacker Gil Bramwell, made the first of his two interceptions giving the Brownmen the ball on the McGill fourty-seven. Four plays later, Kraemer bit his right end Robin Wright with a 15-yard TD pass.

Mid-way through the second quarter, a short punt by McGill's Ron Kelly and a piling on penalty gave Manitoba a first down on the Red-men's 12-yard line. Following a short plunge by fullback Graham Kinley and a first down run by halfback Dennis Hrycaiko, Kinley, a Western conference all-star, dove over left tackle for the Bison's third major.

McGill scored their lone first half touchdown on a 11-yard run over left tackle by Ken Aikin. A 43-yard pass from quarterback Dan Smith to flanker Peter Bender set up the score.

McGill picked up another point when a field goal attempt by Lovecchio went under the crossbar and Bisons conceded a single.

SCORE ON LAST PLAY

With only seconds remaining in the second quarter, Manitoba's left safety, Richard Jackiw, intercepted a pass intended for Bender at the McGill twenty-nine. On the last play of the half, soccer-style booter Walter McKee kicked a 36-yard field goal.

The Redmen's play improved in the second half but they could only manage a 61-yard single by Kelly and a touchdown on a one-yard dive by Dave Fleiszer in the fourth quarter.

The Bisons picked up a whopping 347 yards rushing to McGill's 156. Shylo gained 140 of these on 15 carries while Kinley had 132 and Hrycaiko 67. Fleiszer, Canadian college football's MVP this year, bothered by a bad ankle, was held to only 45 yards on 10 carries.

McGill's Smith out passed Kraemer, picking up 182 yards on 9 of 22 passes while the Manitoba pivot struck through the air for 97 yards completing 9 of his 13 attempts.

After the game, McGill's head coach Tom Mooney summed up the Manitoba strength when he noted that "you couldn't pick on any one guy and that's what gave us the trouble."

Kraemer, the West's candidate for the nation's MVP, won the Ted Morris Memorial Trophy as the game's top performer.

Nine Blues make SIFL all-star team

By PAUL CARSON

The mystery of the 1969 Varsity football Blues continues.

As you recall, Blues lost three key games to McGill and Queens, and tumbled into a disappointing third-place finish behind Gaels and the victorious Redmen.

Then the 1969 SIFL all-star teams are announced, and who should top the poll with nine nominees? Varsity Blues.

All of which begs the question, are the teams an accurate reflection of the SIFL's player quality, or how could such a talented team finish third?

First-place McGill Redmen placed eight players on the two teams, Queens landed five, Western Mustangs had three, and Waterloo Warriors took two spots. Not surprisingly, the winless McMaster Marauders failed to win any positions.

As expected, Blues classy flanker, Eric Walter, was an overwhelming choice for his position.

Walter, who came to Toronto after four stary years at McGill in the early sixties, set two career records in the past season — 30 touchdowns and 180 total points. A second year dental student, Walter had six TD's this season, but was held scoreless and catchless in the final two games.

It's the fourth time Walter has made the so-called "dream team", twice for McGill and twice for Blues.

Massive defensive end Alex Squires was chosen for the third successive year, as was 230-pound tackle Jim Kellam. Squires graduated last year but returned to enrol in Business Administration; Kellam is in first year Meds.

Blues diminutive quarterback, Vic Alboini, was a surprise choice at that position as the selectors bypassed Queens signal-caller Bill McNeill and apparently couldn't choose between the McGill duo of George Wall and Dan Smith.

Blues leading rusher, outstanding sophomore Walt Sehr grabbed one of the halfback spots, and split end John Chapman tied for that position with the league's leading pass receiver, Waterloo's Don Manahan.

Veteran Derek Turner took one of the offensive tackle spots. Turner tied with McGill's Mike Evans, and both players weigh in at just barely over 200 pounds.

Joining Squires on the defensive team are Jim Bennett and safety Pete Lamantia.

Bennett, 6'2" and 205 pounds, developed into an excellent defensive tackle, and Lamantia, while only 180 pounds, was by far Blues roughest and deadliest open-field tackler.

The nine winners are the most ever accumulated by a Toronto team except for 1967 when Blues won the Yates Cup and had 11 selections, including Squires and Kellam.

The Yates Cup winners of 1965 produced only seven all-stars, including Mike Eben and Gerry Sternberg now with the Argos.
