Tougher Policy against Dissidents

Universities urged to adopt 'Counter-Violence'

By PAUL CARSON

Ontario's university presidents have approved a stringent "get tough" policy for dealing with dissident faculty and students.

A working paper issued Friday by the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario recommends universities exercise "counter-violence" by summoning civil police to deal with serious campus disorders.

In addition, the working paper states, students or faculty involved in "obstructive behaviour" should be immediately suspended, expelled or dismissed.

The Committee of Presidents (COPOUO) is comprised of the president of each of Ontario's fourteen universities which receive provincial funds, plus "a respected academic" from each university representing its teaching staff.

There are neither students nor student representatives on the committee.

Toronto members are President Bissell and Howard Rapson, a professor of chemical engineering.

Member universities, says the working paper, "are anxious to accommodate legitimate dissent", but COPOUO insists the universities "will not carry on discussions or make changes in the face of threat or other forms of coercion."

"The unlimited range of ideas essential to the university function cannot exist in the presence of coercion."

Anyone, whether student or teacher, who "interferes with free discussion and the rule of reason", is guilty of "behaviour unfit for the academic community", the working paper concludes.

President Bissell termed the working paper "a helpful document... one of several statements which that will be used to determine our Toronto policy."

The Toronto policy will be based mainly on the recommendations of Presidential Advisory Committee on Disciplinary Procedures, chaired by Professor Ralph Campbell.

The Campbell committee, which includes three students, was formed in 1968 but has not issued a final report.

The COPOUO working paper suggests all faculty members, students, and university employees be compelled to identify themselves to university police "on request".

"Failure to comply will be interpreted as evidence that the person is not a student, faculty member or employee (of the university)."

The working paper does not say what measures will be taken next.

If the recommendations of the working paper are implemented, Caput (currently the main disciplinary body in the university) would be replaced by "an appropriate standing committee" of students and faculty.

This committee, chosen solely by the university Senate and with no guarantee of staff-student parity, would rule on whether a particular disturbance "involves violence or the threat of violence" or is merely "an obstruction to the university's processes".

If "violence" is deemed to be a factor or probable factor, civil authorities will be called onto the campus.

Moreover, the working paper gives police permission to enter the university campus "on their own initiative" in any situation where "there is clear and present danger to life or property."

At present, civil police become involved in university disturbances only on the specific request of the administration.

At the most recent serious incidents on the Toronto campus — the disruption of the Clark Kerr lecture this February and the Placement Service sit-in in November 1967 — the administration did not send for police reinforcements.

Dr. John B. MacDonald, executive vice-chairman of COPOUO, insists the controversial report is "only a working paper."

"Each university is free to accept the report, implement it, modify it or ignore it," he said.

The working paper is deliberately vague on numerous key concepts including "university function", "illegitimate disturbances", "legitimate dissent", and "obstructive behaviour", Dr. MacDonald admitted.

"Yes, that's true; the working paper doesn't define them," he said in a Varsity interview Friday.

"I imagine each presidential commission will be free to arrive at its own definition, bearing in mind the particular circumstances at each university."

The working paper concedes some of its suggestions are "distasteful" and "severe" but argues they are necessary because "the very existence of the university is at stake."

Professor Rapson stressed that, despite its tone of urgency and impending crisis, the working paper "is definitely not binding on any member university."

"Nothing is imposed from above."

The working paper was assembled from "published documents... and other sources" by a sub-committee of COPOUO.

"I'm not at liberty to disclose its membership," Prof Rapson said. "I'm sure you will appreciate the need for secrecy."

"But remember, the working paper is not a secret document," he quickly added.

Welcome back to University of Toronto — welcome back to hossles, to line-ups, to the computer society, to your friendly neighbourhood registrar, to this year's registration in fact. Students this year found that the problems of yesteryears were not lessened by the presence of computerized cards, schedules, and fees forms. Turn to pages 3 and 14.

As recently as a year ago, the most critical question a freshman would face at orientation events was which course he was in. Now campus political groups have chosen orientation programs as a starting point for their questioning of the university system. The Varsity reports on three of these challenges from the New Left Caucus.

The Registration Game

Arts students were asked to pre-register in the courses of their choice. However, since the new calendar was not available until the end of August, many students were faced with administrative problems in trying to register. It's called the Registration Game, and most artsies played it, but we're reproducing it here to show just what a good computer can cause.

- 1 University mails you a pre-registration card and a fees form. Proceed to Step 2.
- 2 Mail fees form with cheque.
- 3 Receive mailed receipt. You lucky dog. Proceed to Step 4.
- 4 Go to registrar's office for computer card. Line up some more. Proceed to Step 5.
- 5 Take computer card to Sidney Smith Hall. Line up to submit card.
- 6 Wait three days.
- 7 Return to Sid Smith. Line up to receive computer-approved timetable.
- 8 Go to class.

1A
University mails you a PR card, but not a fees form. Proceed to Step 1a.

1B
You get nothing from the university. After making copious inquiries, go to 215 Huron. Line up to get a fees form. Grab fees form and proceed to 1b.

1C
University mails you fees form, but no computer card. Proceed to Step 2, but note you will spend more time in Step 4 than others.

3a
Receive no receipt. Go to Step 3b.

3b
Go to 215 Huron. Line up forever. Get receipt. Go to Step 4.

7A
There is nothing wrong with your timetable. The computer approves. You may go to Step 8.

7B
You have a timetable conflict. You stupid idiot. Proceed to (1).

7C
By this time, you have read the calendar, or consulted a few profs. You have decided to change one of your options. Proceed to (1). Pray a lot.

1a
Fill out fees form. If you have not brought a certified cheque with you, kick self several times, then proceed to bank. Return with cheque. Line up forever. Eventually get receipted fees form. Go to Step 4.

(1) Go to the department which is responsible for the course in which you have a conflict. Get authorization to change either time or option. Spend several hours trying to find a prof or year advisor.

(2) Return to registrar's office and fill out subject change form. Receive new timetable card, but not before waiting 30 minutes or so.

(5a) The computer approves. Proceed to Step 8.

(3) Return to Sidney Smith and submit new timetable to vagaries of computer.

(4) Wait three days.

(5) Return to Sid Smith. Your timetable has been spat out by the computer.

People's Park: A letter from Berkeley

A state of emergency is in effect in the city of Berkeley tonight. The National Guard is on the streets, summoned by the governor of California to restore law and order following a day of violence and anarchy. That was yesterday.

The emergency regulations are crisp: no loitering in or about the city of Berkeley between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m.

The image is clear: dark cement pavements crackling with tension. Footsteps approaching. Soldiers nervously put out cigarettes. Outrigger bayonet: "Who goes there?" Ears alert for that immediate bullet crack. The natives are restless. People huddle behind locked doors. Once again law and order have broken down. Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan alert by their phones. Will keep posted on further developments. Heads shake over coffee cups in Los Angeles, in Washington. Where will it all end?

I've just come indoors from a night on the scene, and here's my own on-the-spot emergency report, filed, 2 a.m., May 17, 1969, Berkeley, Cal.

It's a warm spring night — clear, star-kissed skies. California scent of fragrant girls and rich fertile earth. Olive-rich Berkeley. Lovers stroll arm-in-arm. Dogs wander the streets, sniffing for midnight kicks. Groups of freaks standing around on corners chatting easily with smiling National Guardsmen.

The National Guard — sounds scary — who are they? You walk by them and what! They're kids just like us. Digging the chance to visit Berkeley and mix with their own kind, grooving on the pretty college chicks. I pass by one group of national guardsmen on a street corner. "How's it going?" I ask, friendly high smile. One guardsman answers: "Great. How's it going with you, brother?" And there it is. Heads posing as soldiers. The kids who got out of fighting in Vietnam. And the warm, gentle night brings us together.

There's us and there's them. There's the young — vibrant, chuckling, flowing. A whole generation conspiring with laughter. And there's the old, the atrophied, spinning out their weird mechanical head trips — which button to push? Quick! Help!

Kids open their apartment windows and boom out the Beatles and Jefferson Airplane for the entertainment of the guardsmen. Berkeley is in a state of emergency, and all is well.

Yesterday was different. The Blue Meanies — that's the special tactical squad of the local Alameda County police, so named for their blue helmets and battle fatigues, and their particularly threatening expressions which say "We mean business, punk." It's the old strong-arm thug scene.

Giant beer bellies, scarred fat cigar-chomping faces.

They down booze to build up their hate, and they don't like a lot of things, but they especially don't like spoiled, middle-class punks. Their dress style is Pentagon Efficient — helmets, gas masks, flak vests, shotguns. They pile into formation in the middle of the street — stout defenders, the goal-line stand.

Around the corner comes the rabble — bearded, long hair, taunting, chanting "Pigs go home" and "We want the park." Laughing, bouncing, lightheartedly angry, defiant, waving balloons and flags, waving to friends. Two realities meet, and what happens is unreal.

Suddenly tear-gas explodes everywhere. Screaming crowds, choking bystanders start moving away. Cries of "Walk, don't run." Rocks fly. A rock is thrown from a store roof, and the helmeted Blue Meanie wheels and fires shotgun blasts at spectators on a neighbouring roof: one dead, three seriously injured — one blinded.

By the end of the day, at least eighty young people have been wounded by police guns. The police say birdshot; the bullet-holes in the store windows, head-high, indicate buck-shot.

Word of the shootings sweeps the community. The warning, spread from young face to young face — stay in doors, and tell all your friends. You're risking your life on the streets.

But that was yesterday night. Tonight the Blue Meanies have left, the National Guard is in. Berkeley life moves as young life does everywhere — soft, fantastic, high-frown boasts. Freaky things to do. O, really? Wow! Vibrant, cheerful, harmonious. For Ronald Reagan, that's the real emergency. — allan kamin

Ontario as California: 1,2,3...many Ronnie Reagans

Law and order has arrived in Canada — rhetorically at least.

The Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario last week produced a working paper called "Order on the Campus."

The paper is an over-reaction, a statement of administrative paranoia in the face of a growing student movement. Its recommendations are based on a series of unexplained assumptions and undefined terms:

"Recent years have witnessed a mounting wave of demonstrations, confrontations and violence in North American universities."

• The preamble generalizes about North American universities. The same administrators who accuse student radicals of importing theory and tactics from their American counterparts have imported their methods of repression from the United States.

The Committee of Presidents working paper was generated by the aftermath of "that business at Harvard," admits N.S.C. Dickinson, assistant to U of T President Claude Bissell.

In fact, the paper itself draws largely from Harvard policy.

• The paper never defines "extremism" or "violence" — two terms which are lumped together and provide the foundation for the whole document.

The paper assumes that kind of "behaviour" exists without examining the historical reasons for it. The administrators have fearfully and superficially looked at campus "disturbances" as a distasteful quirk in reality. They have accepted them as a threat to the status quo, without ever examining the irrational and inhuman quality of that status quo.

"The unlimited range of ideas essential to the university function cannot exist in the presence of coercion..."

• The paper never defines what the university's function is.

• It assumes either that "an unlimited range of ideas" exists or can exist in the kind of university we have today.

In fact, the university offers and accepts a very narrow range of ideas — ideas that provide an input to a very narrow function. That function is to serve a very narrow sector of our society — corporations and the government that supports them. Research in the physical and social sciences directly plugs into that economic sector, which is owned and controlled by the United States.

An academic Marxist like the U of T's C.B. Macpherson is loved. An active Marxist like Stanley Gray at McGill is fired.

The presidents' report, like the Harvard report, lists as "illegitimate and unacceptable":

"obstruction of the normal processes and activities essential to the functions of the university community."

Again that function is not defined. And the statement is so broad that it could apply to anything that in any way disturbs the status quo.

After the occupation at Sir George Williams University, the administration there installed a similar rule. It states that "every student who interferes with the proper functioning of the University as an educational and research institution, or interferes with the peace, order and good government of the University," may be suspended or expelled.

The presidents' paper condemns "interference with the freedom of any speaker" in the university, whether in a classroom or not. That could constitute anything from questioning to assassination. The clause directly prevents students from questioning the basic content and structure of the classroom.

It seems that even the liberal tolerance of heckling is wearing thin.

The crunch really comes when the paper talks about solutions to this presupposed evil of "violence and extremism":

"... the only response by which violence can be contained is the exercise of counter-violence."

Which comes first—the brick or the mace?

"It should be noted that the police may on their own initiative come on campus if there is clear and present danger to life or property."

Tones of the U.S. constitution.

U of T President Claude Bissell called the presidents' working paper "a helpful document."

"It is one of the several statements that will be used to determine Toronto policy," he said in a press release.

How can he reconcile his tacit acceptance of that paper with his tacit acceptance of the views of his own advisory committee on discipline chaired by Professor Ralph Campbell? That committee will recommend student-faculty parity for the trial of students and will allow as much scope as possible for radical activities.

Last spring, President Bissell admitted to the Students Administrative Council that CAPUT, the U of T's disciplinary body, was illegitimate, and that the new body would emerge from the Campbell Report.

But last week an administration press release stated in effect that CAPUT would discipline students for now.

SAC Executive member Greg Kealey (IV SMC) points out that the administration "has completely double-crossed us."

A radical group of students says the following wall-poster will soon appear on this campus:

"Claude Bissell has disrupted the normal processes of the University. This extremist behaviour by the administration, a minority element of the university, financed by a Foreign Power, clearly represents a threat to the very existence of this institution. As a result of their disruption, the normal processes of teaching, learning and research have ceased. Before the University can return to its normal state, students must take over their classrooms to discuss the nature of this threat and formulate among themselves the correct way of handling it."

CAPUT will meet Tuesday at 2 p.m. in the Senate Chamber at Simcoe Hall to discuss discipline. All students are invited. It should be a mass meeting.

Bob Bossin feels out campus orientations

Bob Bossin, The Varsity's Norman Mailer, participated in the actions that the New Left Caucus took at the Vic, U.C., Music, New College, and Scarborough orientations.

The Varsity refuses responsibility for Bossin's existential version of the facts.

1. Sitting on the grass in the Vic quad, legs out, late afternoon cold. Behind us guys with suitcases are coming in from Avenue Road, heading over to the tables to be freshened. Just south of us an RCMP agent disguised as a lawn mower is redoing the same patch in order to catch more of The Plan.

Steve Grant from Vic comes over to us dressed like fraternity president with a red ribbon saying Senior. He approaches me since he was a Commissioner on University Government member, the most radical kind of moderate, and I am a feelie, the most wishy-washy kind of radical. He looks almost ready to have an emotion; I tossle my hair and look hard-line.

"Um, Bob", he says poker-faced, "I hear the radicals are coming."

I look around furtively and don't see them. At first I am going to duck down behind a small rise and shout "Run the wagons into a circle!" I see a band of radicals donning warpaint and breech-clouts made of the Rudolph the Red-nosed Reindeer towels my grandmother gave me for my sixteenth birthday. We charge into the E. J. Pratt Library surrounding the 30 rows of 20 freshmen shouting, "President Moore speaks with fork tongue." Richard Szalwinski, wearing a beaded headband over his mad German scientist Indian blue eyes, stands on the lecturn, tuck as bow string. Then with a short deft crack, he breaks an arrow in half and throws it down in front of Principal Hodgetts. Principal Hodgetts suggests that Mr. Szalwinski kindly resume his seat and bring up his point at the end of the programme.

"Come on Bob, what's the plan?"
"We're going to levitate the library."

The RCMP gardener writes it down.

2. The worst thing about disrupting six orientations in five days is the boredom. Did you know that there are five departments in the faculty of music plus an opera school; that there were 10,000 copies of the list of concert programmes, but people tend to lose them; that there are 693 freshmen at U.C.; that for the first time there are more women than men at Vic, but that won't affect the social life; that Scarborough College is very lucky to have important art displays so we shouldn't destroy the paintings; that you get out of university what you put into it; that these are years of growth; that you should listen to all points of view; that university life goes far beyond the classroom?

Jesus. And people kept saying, "We didn't choose to hear you, we chose to hear them."

3. By way of explanation, an analogy:

At Queen's until two years ago, all the freshmen engineers had their heads shaved. The last year three guys objected: two because they were musicians and needed their hair to make money (which was seen as sufficient defence), and one because he just didn't want his head shaved. A week later, the third man was jumped. His hair was cut off. So was his pubic hair. By freshmen.

While the whole event is repulsive, the particularly frightening element is what in one week had happened to the freshmen. None of them had jumped and shaved anyone before, but now they were at college they accepted the 'orientation' of that particular 'community'.

Except at St. Mike's where entering university still means playing dead horse on command, the norms of the U of T community are passed on in much subtler ways. The trouble is, they are the same norms: conformity, passivity, a hierarchy, elitism, obedience.

The laying on of this trip is hard to notice because it is already well instilled by the media, family structure and especially by the highschools. And because it is expressed not just by what is said but by the whole form and setting of rows, lecturns, head tables, beanies, and dull empty speeches to quiet, respectful audiences.

Orientation is the theatre, the MUZAK for peaceful, stultifying entry into a peaceful stultifying community of by and large tired, irrelevant and obedient scholars.

But there are real conflicts and they are honest and nothing to be afraid of; the authority can be challenged, the conformity can be broken from, pre-set structures can be opened up; we can stop the MUZAK and follow a different drum: the place can be exciting.

This is not something to say but to be, to do. So we did it.

4. Eightish in the Vic quad. If you look up at the old building from real close it looks as if it's made of cookies and gingerbread.

We meet on the well-shaved patch of grass just south of where we were in the afternoon. The freshmen, beanie and bowed according to sex, are filing into the library. Bob James, the Vic SAC rep and one of us, hands out beanies to us. It goes well with my jeans and headband. The colours, red and yellow, match those on my Smash Capitalism button. Trying to look inconspicuous, we head for the library.

There are about five guys in suits and red senior ribbons waiting.

"Excuse me, are you registered at Vic", says one; "Where's your ATL card?", another; "Aren't you Bob Bossin?", says a third.

"No; I lent it to a friend to cheat on student stand-by; and yes, I am", I say, backing us all over towards the take-out desk so that the others can sneak in to the hall. (This act as it turned out was totally unnecessary, but I congratulated myself on it at the time.)

A nice, soft spoken guy takes over. "We're glad you guys came, no really, we'd be happy to hear your point of view; would you like to speak?"

"No, thank you."

"Well, please don't disrupt. I mean we're slowly winning the administration around, and don't want to blow a lot of real progress."

What can I say to the guy? How can I explain that a radical inserted into an authoritarian, hierarchical, repressive and dull system merely by his presence reinforces that system? How can you tell your mother that you don't want to talk to her now because you are in bed with someone?

We go in. Minutes later everybody rises while the platform party files across the podium, and stands until motioned to sit down. I wish I was someplace else.

5. On the whole people hated us, some for being rude, more for being disturbing, or maybe like in "Easy Rider" for being in some limited sense, free.

After U.C. someone spluttered at me: "The way you guys acted makes it completely impossible for me to listen to you, what do you think of that?"

6. Speaking 'out of turn' is difficult at best of times. Scarborough College was not the best of times. The chairs are not in rows, facing the podium, they are in a circle, and there isn't a podium. There are three microphones and anybody is welcome to speak. The trip is still being layed on of course, the whole bloody iceberg is still there, but the water level has been raised.

The only 'formality' is the principal's address, delivered from the north-north-east edge of the circle. He talks about all the areas that students have a say in, not mentioning the more central ones where they don't. I, being basically a polite middle-class pudding kid, have never heckled anyone in my life, but someone has to do something. I steel myself.

"Principal Plumtree: ... and not only in strictly student affairs; students are beginning to have a voice in curriculum planning, so you see here at Scarborough you are full members of the college..."

Here we go. "What about grading?"

I shouted.

All stops.

"I beg your pardon?"

I am south-south-west. All heads turn. I wish I was not wearing a headband. I wish I was wearing a suit. I wish I had put up my hand. I wish I was someplace else.

"Do students have power in decisions about grades... marks?" I sound fairly firm, thank god.

Mass turning to the north.

"No, not yet, but I wouldn't be surprised if that was coming. As I was saying, at Scarborough we are fortunate, too, to have a number of important art displays..."

Oh well. You win some and you lose some.

7. And you win some. At the Faculty of Music:

Me: "Dean Neal, would you care to tell us why classes are compulsory here?"

General negative reaction. Yes, by the students, God help us all.

Neal: "Which classes?"

Me: "The ones here."

Neal: "No, I'm sorry, I can't answer that. This is not a discussion. This is a meeting to introduce the staff."

Then he walked out. Followed by the staff. The system when challenged can become pretty clear.

8. At Scarborough I recall one of the most obnoxious people I have ever encountered, holding the microphone for some time and then saying, "See, I'm saying absolutely nothing, but I'm saying it well." Then he continued for another five minutes. He got healthy applause.

That's the way it goes.

9. Through the disruptions I started to understand what Marcuse has called repressive tolerance.

10. I look back at the week with contradictory feelings. There's excitement and pride: middle class kids so rarely act, even less rarely commit themselves, that it is bound to feel liberating. But there is also a feeling of something akin to loneliness, for you have passed the Nuremberg point: to say I was just obeying orders or waiting for a more appropriate time is no more a comfort. Every decision becomes a moral one. Of course every decision always was, but now you know it. Like losing virginity.

11. The Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario just announced that any disruption of normal university activities could be followed by arrest, suspension and/or firing.

If the rules had been in effect last week, we all could have been arrested, kicked out. I'd do it again. The woods are burning.

IS CUS FALLING

Canadian Union of Students President Martin Loney addresses students from the ledge in front of Sid Smith during a visit to U of T last fall. The results of a referendum to be held at U of T next month are expected to be decisive in determining the fate of the national student union.

PORT ARTHUR (CUP-Special) — Financially crippled and riven internally by attacks from both radicals and moderates, the Canadian Union of Students staggered out of its 33rd annual congress facing the very real possibility of dissolution by Christmas.

CUS will go bankrupt and collapse if it does not win acceptance in a dozen crucial referenda at Canadian campuses this fall.

The U of T Students Administrative Council agreed to an Oct. 23 referendum last March after a petition signed by more than 2,000 students.

CUS can't survive without U of T's numbers and money.

During the congress at Lakehead University Aug. 27 - Sept. 3, radicals charged that CUS and its member student councils were elitist organizations that isolate delegates from the students they represent. They demanded a restructuring of CUS into a radical, grass-roots union.

At the same time, a small group of conservatives attacked the CUS structure for being unrepresentative.

They suggested disbanding CUS in favor of a new organization — the Canadian Students Federation. The proposed CSF would consist of members elected directly by students, rather than appointed by student councils.

Meanwhile the majority of the congress delegates, led by CUS President Martin Loney, avoided the structural debate and concentrated mostly on programs of educational reform.

When the final plenary session broke off at 6 a.m., more than a third of the programs and policies still remained to be debated, and a new President-elect had not been chosen. CUS decided to hold a Christmas congress to deal with unfinished business, including the future of CUS itself.

A radical group of delegates, observers, and members of the former CUS secretariat told the congress that, in order to rebuild the union, it must solve the union's structural problems rather than just develop more moderate programs. "A lot of people here are going to return to the campus and not do very much," charged Barry McPeake, last year's CUS Atlantic fieldworker. McPeake acted as chairman of the congress until the final plenary when he retired to attack the whole week process.

He said the congress was passing radical programs that delegates would not be able to implement when they went back to their campuses.

"People have to make a choice," he said. "Either they fulfil the implications of the content of our motions in action and in words, or they sus-tain the structures which have lead to failure in the past."

"That choice may mean staying on their students councils, or getting the hell off. And when the real crunch comes, they're going to stay on council."

"The choice lies not in keeping the structures," McPeake said. "We have to destroy them or tear them apart so they will serve the people."

John Gallagher, a member of the new CUS secretariat, vehemently denounced McPeake's charges. He agreed with CUS President Martin Loney that the Union must concentrate on organizing students around issues such as housing and unemployment rather than a radical analysis of society.

The previous evening, delegates from the University of Waterloo had also tried to force a discussion of the CUS structure, stunning the congress by proposing the national union become an affiliate of the Industrial Workers of the World, a revolutionary syndicalist organization smashed by the police in the 1920's.

"In introducing that resolution, we are not trying to smash the Union," said David

The Waterloo proposal went down to defeat by a vote of 17 to 3, after the congress refused to allow Waterloo to withdraw the motion.

The conservatives were less successful in forcing debate on the structure of CUS. The University of Calgary motion calling for the creation of the Canadian Students Federation died for lack of a seconder.

The resolution included a constitution which would have greatly restricted the ability of the new union to be politically effective.

SAC President Gesta (Gus) Abols and three other members of the 13-man Toronto delegation sponsored the resolution, along with some students from McGill, Dalhousie, and British Columbia.

The McGill and UBC representatives were non-voting observers, and the Toronto and Dalhousie delegations refused to support the actions of a minority of their members.

Toronto delegates Gus Abols, Jon Levin (III UC), George Sachs (III APSC), and Gerrit Van Geijjan (II New) were part of the caucus that proposed the CSF.

But the hard logic of finances may prove to be more

U of T and Carleton would bring in revenues of almost $35,000, including money from the CUS Travel Plan. A loss at Toronto especially would require "such a drastic cut in secretariat staff that no further operation of the union is sensible," the commission said.

After referenda defeats in the last academic year, CUS slashed $85,000 off last year's expenses and $53,000 from projected expenses this year for a deflated 1969-70 budget of only $94,500.

CUS President Martin Loney said CUS would have to spend $148,000 in 1969-70 to maintain programs at their present level.

In making their cuts, the finance commission:

- o reduced the budget for the CUS National Council to $4,000 from a proposed $5,400, anticipating a reduced number of members;
- o cut research money to $3,300 from $11,000;
- o slashed a CUS grant to a national student newspaper to replace Issue to $16,000 from a proposed $20,000.

Loney said at the end of the Congress that the drop in income would make CUS "a small part of what happens on Canadian campuses this year."

"But CUS will still be a forum for debate," he added, "and provide full-time people with experience to try and translate that debate into action on the campus."

CUS can also be important in fighting situations like that at Simon Fraser University, Loney said, where the administration is trying to smash the democratically-structured social sciences department.

Loney was SFU student council president two years ago.

In compiling the budget, the finance committee assumed that CUS would win about 50 per cent of the referenda coming up this year. That would add 28,000 members at $1 a student.

Beside Toronto and Carleton, 10 schools representing 57,500 members are up for referenda that might go pro-CUS.

The finance committee also included a $38,500 profit on the Travel Plan, although the plan will be crippled if too many campuses reject CUS this year.

If so, the plan might be administered through the Ontario Union of Students and other provincial unions which have kept more members than the national union. This could keep the Plan's revenues up to the $40,000 made last year, the committee report said.

But the Congress agreed that, without Toronto, no Union was possible.

At the CUS conference SAC President Gus Abols was severely criticized by nine members of the 13-man U of T delegation for signing a press release which called for the disbanding of CUS. Abols stated afterwards that he had been speaking as an individual, not as a U of T spokesman.

Black, a member of the 1968-69 CUS secretariat.

"We introduced the motion to show that one has to be aware of one's historical roots — of people before who tried to go above and beyond the system they were condemned to," Black added.

"There has been a complete refusal," he said, "to examine this institution, this congress, and ourselves in a critical way."

of a deciding factor in the direction of CUS than either radical or conservative arguments.

By the end of the congress, only eight student councils had committed themselves to the Union for the coming year, although several other delegations promised to fight for CUS in referenda.

With only 39,500 students in the Union, the CUS finance commission predicted the organization would go "belly-up by Christmas" if critical referenda at U of T and Carleton do not favor CUS.

CUS : WILL THESE

PORT ARTHUR (CUP - Special) The 33rd Congress of the Canadian Union of Students shifted its emphasis away from international politics and revolutionary strategies and moved towards a program to democratize Canadian universities.

A resolution, passed unanimously, charged existing course unions are divorced from most students in their course, limit their action to purely administrative matters, and are monopolized by a minority of "students with career ambitions in their discipline."

In another resolution, the Congress voted almost unanimously to oppose the Americanization of Canadian universities but rejected a quota system that would directly restrict the number of U.S. professors teaching in Canada.

The Congress was held at Lakehead University August 22 to September 3.

Canadian universities are supporting "an irrational and inhuman status quo," stated the education policy passed by a large majority of the delegates.

They said that the university does criticize the present system to some extent but that "the ivory tower" approach to problems "separates criticism from action" and produces "academic criticism that is often merely academic, removed from real material problems."

The policy statement said society was unable to solve the problems of poverty and inequality partly because the fragmentation of knowledge prevents intellectuals from forming the "total perspectives" these problems require.

The statement also condemns the subordination of public good to private profit.

Congress delegates also attacked courses "directly apologist" of present conditions which encourage students to think the system is unchangeable. The policy statement condemns "ecology courses that don't deal with pollution, politics courses that deal with politics as what happens in parliament, and economics courses that teach Samuelson."

The only real opposition to the statement came from Martin Shapiro, a Congress observer from McGill University.

Shapiro said the document was "intolerant of non-socialist views and had dangerous tendencies towards a new kind of fascism."

Delegates applauded CUS secretariat member John Gallagher when he replied that the statement called for "something more than a unified university with a unifying ideology." Most expressed approval at Gallagher's statement that the present university system does not allow different points of view to be expressed and "can only lead to a reinforcement of the status quo."

Only two schools voted against adoption of the statement.

Students must "reverse the power relationships between the instructor and the students," according to a resolution on "authoritarian structure in the classroom."

The resolution attacked verbatim note-taking, memorization for examinations and long reading lists as leaving little time for critical thinking.

The resolution further attacked this situation because it "prepares the student to fit uncritically into the corporate capitalist structure," without questioning the social and moral effects of the system.

Memorial University, Newfoundland, delegate John Harris called this section "an attempt to relate the economic factors in our society right to the classroom, since the role of the professor is that of the boss."

"The students in the classroom should be in control in the classroom and should be actively participating in the classroom," he said.

Only University of Alberta (Calgary) delegate Bob Ferrier opposed the motion. He said, "The problem is more with the student than with the system," and "the student should open up" and participate more often.

Ferrier was supported by Ken Sunquist of University of Saskatchewan (Regina) who said the picture of an authoritarian classroom "just doesn't fit into what I know."

Delegates called for a new policy whereby course unions would only be formed after small groups of students in a class had initiated critiques of the class content and structure, and after "the mass of students within the discipline have articulated some concrete demands."

Instead of working so closely with faculty, the new kind of course union would write critiques of both the course and its textbooks, confront the professor openly in the classroom, and organize counter-courses.

U of T SAC rep Craig Heron (IV UC), who helped draft the motion, said classroom organizing was "probably the key area students have to be involved in next year", and emphasized the need for a more informal approach.

Observer Ron Thompson raised the only debate on the new concept when he proposed an amendment which would start a program of organized cheating at the class level to challenge the whole system of marks and grades and the way class content is determined.

Thompson's "cheating" rejects methods like getting someone else to write one's exam or sleeping with the professor. In his non-competitive system, as soon as an exam was handed around, the students would gather together to discuss it, divide up the work to be done, perhaps bring relevant books and notes into the room to "broaden the scope of their answers."

The logical result of such a system is to extend the exam period for a term or even a year, in order to make the answer more complete.

Thompson asked the delegates to adopt the first step by starting to "cheat by co-operation in the classroom."

The amendment was defeated by a narrow margin, with many delegations abstaining.

The congress demanded that other university services, such as bookstores, libraries, and food services be democratized and organized on a co-operative basis.

"The existence of these authoritarian systems at the university effectively continues the socialization begun in the public school system," the resolution stated.

A resolution on Americanization rejected any quota system that would bar a certain number of American professors from Canadian universities on the basis of their nationality.

"A professor's ability to deal with Canadian reality is not always based on his nationality," it stated.

"Some American professors have the concepts and experience to understand that reality, and conversely, some Canadian professors — often trained in U.S. graduate schools — present an American discipline that has no relation to our Canadian reality."

The delegates said a quota system would not attack the other features of American influence that permeate our universities such as:

- o Course content is heavily loaded in favor of American textbooks, concepts and history.

- o Canadian content is deliberately devalued in most courses. For example, a graduate student in English at the U of T often cannot do a PhD on only one Canadian author.

- o Canadian universities do research for American corporations and military departments;

- o The prestige positions of American universities in certain disciplines and their effects on Canadian teaching.

The congress particularly objected to the heavy emphasis on empiricist and behavioral methodology imported from the U.S. into Canadian disciplines.

"The Canadian educational system services and rationalizes Canada's colonial status within the international capitalist system," the resolution concluded.

The Congress resolved that all academic openings in university must be advertised in Canada; that Canadian graduate schools emphasizing the Canadian perspective be established to orient faculty toward Canadian problems; and that students participate in hiring, promotion and tenure of professors, and in curriculum committees.

At present many vacancies in Canadian universities are not advertised. A popular practice allows department chairmen — often American themselves — to hire faculty through contacts in American graduate schools.

The criterion for hiring should be a professor's "concern with the needs of the Canadian people, rather than strictly (his) nationality," the resolution stated.

David Leadbeater, council president of the University of Alberta, asked how such concern could be judged. "Couldn't nationality be more important than we've established here?" he asked.

"We'll just have to tell as we go along," responded SAC Finance Commissioner Bob James (III Vic), mover of the resolution. "If professors at Lakehead University are looking at the problems and situations in northern Ontario, that might be more significant than where they come from."

An amendment to set up departments of Canadian studies was soundly defeated.

"The whole university, not just one blasted department, should discuss Canadian content," said Brandon delegate Harko Bhaget.

UC head table refuses to answer radicals

By SUSAN REISLER

Firecrackers and loud questions disrupted the quiet formality of the annual University College freshman banquet Thursday as about 300 freshmen and 40 members of the New Left Caucus tried to shout each other down.

For a few minutes the Great Hall in Hart House shook as the freshmen NLC engaged in a yelling match to see who would speak — the head table speakers or the outside radicals.

The radicals had joined the dinner after the meal was finished although their presence was felt throughout the meal as several of the guests refused to remain standing for grace and to take part in the toasts. A firecracker exploded during Prof. Ronald Shepherd's remarks. The UC registrar only acknowledged the noise and continued.

"I have just registered 693 scholars, students, people," he said. This brought heckling from the audience. Shepherds to the freshmen class was countered by the cry, "Power to the People".

The audience was visibly disturbed by the interruptions. "You are upsetting me," a freshman said to a radical beside him.

Art Stein (IV UC) an organizer of the freshman week and member of the head table guests told the listeners that he could not make the required toast to the health of the university.

Instead he made a toast to the people in the University of Toronto. Radicals this time joined Stein with another cry

An ominous silence was maintained as John Sword, executive vice-president (academic) and provost of the university, spoke.

Mr. Sword recommended that the students read the Royal Commission of 1906 which recommended changes in U of T's structure and the unpublished Commission on University Government report. The latter was compulsory reading he said.

"Does CUG deal with the functions of the university and who does that university serve?" someone shouted at Mr. Sword.

The radicals canted, "Answer the question," a German professor in the audience asked. "Could you be civilized for one moment? You are being rude."

A shouting contest developed because the room was so large that one had to shout to be heard. Above the roar someone yelled a toast to all the women who would never be allowed into the Great Hall again uncensored.

Douglas LePan, Principal of University College took the microphone and tried to restore order.

He calmed the audience by inviting the students to discuss the question of the function of the university afterwards.

But after giving a nervous speech LePan shut the microphone and left the stage with the rest of the head table guests.

The radicals tried to organize a toast in the hall but were unsuccessful. They then invited those who wanted to talk about their actions to come to the Howard Ferguson Residence.

About 75 students did go and air their angry feelings. Many who participated in this meeting said it had been most productive.

By SUSAN REISLER

Members of a campus leftist group disrupted the annual meeting of the freshmen and staff at the Faculty of Music Thursday afternoon.

The radicals, who were members of the New Left Caucus, asked Mrs. Edith Binnie, the information officer, why attendance to the Thursday concert-lecture series was compulsory.

Mrs. Binnie said they were wrong because they were lecturers. "Then why are lectures compulsory?" asked SAC Vice-President Bob Barkwell (III MEDS) amidst boos and hisses from the audience.

"I am only the information officer," said Mrs. Binnie. Bob Bossin, teaching assistant, asked Prof. Boyd Neel, Director of the Faculty of Music, to answer the question.

Prof. Neel replied that Bossin would have to go through the proper channels to get his answer. "This is only a meeting to introduce the staff to the students. It is not for discussion. It is not for discussion."

The staff then left the stage and Ted Groat, President of the Undergraduate Society in the faculty, continued the meeting.

Outside the concert hall some students questioned Barkwell about his presence at their meeting. Their reactions to him were mixed but the discussion brought to light some of the grievances music students had with their faculty.

The students agreed that the staff-student liaison committee was powerless and that this was one of the few faculties where classes were compulsory.

This discussion was moved back into the concert hall because Bossin had been given an opportunity to speak to the students.

Bossin began by repeating what had happened at Victoria College the previous Friday evening.

"We came to this meeting," he said, "because members of the New Left Caucus had been approached by music students themselves. "We realized we were outsiders but decided to come," he said.

Students from the audience joined in to question and dispute with Bossin.

Cliff Ford (IV Comp), a student on the staff-student liaison committee agreed that his committee was powerless but Surprised radicals disrupt Music orientation and discover classes are compulsory disagreed with confrontation. "People are temperamental in this faculty," he said, "and you can turn somebody off if you ask him in the wrong way."

Another student said he hadn't spoken before because he was afraid. "All I want is that you think about what is happening here," he said. "All right, it is a good education that you are getting here, but is it the best?"

"All I ask is that you think," he said. There was some applause as he sat down.

Another student thought that a lot of what was being said didn't apply to the Faculty of Music. Barkwell challenged this.

"Students should be raising these questions," he said. "Who has the power in this university and why do they have this power?"

"If you only study the violin or surgery you are not going to be a human being, you are going to be a one-dimensional person," he said.

The staff then left the stage and Ted Groat, President of the Undergraduate Society in the faculty, continued the meeting.

"I would like to see every body be human beings and recognize their possibilities."

Radicals and administration share platform at Victoria College

This is because you've been conditioned to see Hodggets as an authority figure, and not to challenge him when he says something you disagree with.

Bossin went on to talk about women's liberation. "Look at what you laugh at," he said. "Everytime women are mentioned, people laugh, yet most women can't get a decent job, or even have a decent orgasm." The audience laughed.

About 25 members of the recently formed New Left Caucus disrupted the annual freshmen welcome meeting at Victoria College Friday, Sept. 12.

Members of the NLC said they were attending to expose the authoritarian nature of the meeting and of orientations which socialize students into attitudes of deference and docility in the face of institutionalized hierarchies.

Bissell issues warning about disruptions

The members of the Caput view with great concern the attempts by individuals and groups of individuals to disrupt academic events officially organized or sponsored by the University or by any part of the University. In the light of recent disruptions on the University campus, particularly the disruption last Thursday night of the official University College dinner for freshmen, the members of the Caput wish to make it clear that the disruption of any lecture, class, seminar, or meeting sponsored by the University or any division of the University is a serious offence, and that in any future occurrences of this nature the following procedures will be observed until the University has agreed on statutory changes.

- 1) When any such disruption occurs, the person in charge will attempt to restore order, but if that proves impossible he will, at his discretion, adjourn the meeting or lecture and immediately report the incident to the head of the academic division concerned;
- 2) The head of the division will conduct an initial investigation and report to the Caput;
- 3) The Caput will decide forthwith whether or not formal disciplinary proceedings should be initiated. Such proceedings will include a formal hearing open to the public at which any person accused will be entitled to be represented by counsel. If the person accused is found guilty, the statutory disciplinary jurisdiction of the Caput includes the power to suspend, to impose fines, to recommend to the Senate the withholding of degrees, diplomas, certificates or academic standing, and, with the confirmation of the Board of Governors, expulsion from the University.

SFU students may strike over interference

BURNABY, B.C. (CUP) — A strike vote today by members of one of Simon Fraser University's departments will determine their response to the administration's refusal to restore autonomy to the department.

In a four-hour plenary session last Tuesday, over 400 students and faculty of the political science, sociology and anthropology department voted overwhelmingly to merge as a single decision-making body until the administration lifts its trusteeship over the department.

On July 7, the university senate passed a motion that provision should be made for the investigation of departments the administration considered "unhealthy." The motion also gave the senate the right to suspend department heads and appoint new ones in "unhealthy" departments.

Arts Dean Dale Sullivan immediately designated the PSA department unhealthy and informed its members that he would refuse to recognize any decisions made by the student-faculty committee.

The conflict arose in a dispute over tenure procedures. The tenure committee established by the administration rejected tenure recommendations of the PSA department until a professor chosen by the administration had been placed on the committee.

The administration also demanded that the committee stop presenting its decisions for full faculty ratification and rejected the policy of student parity and veto on the committee.

As proof of their sincerity PSA members gave SFU president Kenneth Strand until noon today to either accept or indicate a willingness to negotiate their three demands.

These demands are a return of department autonomy and an end to university trusteeship and acceptance of the recommendations of the PSA tenure committee.

The PSA department also wants re-instatement of four professors whose contracts have not been renewed and a fundamental recognition at SFU that experimental practices in organizational and educational procedures should be encouraged and not repressed.

At a general meeting of the SFU students' society last Thursday, over 600 students voted to call in the Canadian Union of Students in conjunction with the tenure committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, to investigate the decisions made by the administration committee.

to the top administration and student officials at Victoria.

Victoria student president Ernie Hobbs (III Vice) acknowledged the radicals' presence at the beginning of the meeting and asked them to speak at some time during the program. The initial part of the meeting was uninterrupted, but when principal John Hodgetts addressed the freshmen, some of the radicals started shouting "Bullshit!" and "That's a lie!" at some of his points.

Hodgetts called the freshmen "the guinea pigs in the new curriculum experiment," and asked for their help in implementing the forthcoming "radical" report by the Commission on University Government.

He said the report "will make heavier demands on faculty and students, jointly involved in a learning process and in decisions which will determine the future of the university."

The radicals stopped him by heckling, asked who really held the power at this university able to discover his point of view. Abols responded to this heckling by inviting representatives of the NLC to speak from the podium.

Andy Wernick (SGS) went to the stage and told the freshmen they were being socialized into institutionalized hierarchies of power relations. "Orientations are simply the 'muzak' which serve to smother the tensions generated by the process of registration into a repressive institution," he said.

He went on to tell them that the orientation beanies and bows they were wearing served to socialize them into acceptance of the myth of a hierarchical "authority of knowledge," and mentioned women's liberation. With this he was shouted down.

NLC member Bob Bossin, teaching assistant, spoke next. "Look at the contradictions in your own behaviour," he said. "You shouted down Wernick far more than was done by us earlier in the meeting."

After the meeting was over, over 100 freshmen joined the NLC members outside and a discussion continued for several hours.

Bissell postpones speech

University president Claude Bissell will not be giving his annual welcoming speech in Convocation Hall this afternoon.

The Department of Information announced late yesterday that the address would be "postponed indefinitely."

No reason was given for the postponement, and there was much speculation as to its cause.

The possibility of a strike by university maintenance employees which would have started this morning, would probably have made the speech impossible, but the maintenance union came to a partial agreement with the administration late Saturday night.

There was also a speculation that Bissell's speech was cancelled to prevent it from being disrupted by members of the radical New Left Caucus.

When contacted last night, Bissell refused to comment on the postponement.

Birth control spreading

An unusually high number of pregnancies on campus last year has resulted in the Birth Control Drop-In Centre, established in August as a sub-group of the Women's Liberation Movement.

Since its inception the centre at 91 St. George St. has had up to 20 people a day coming in to look at a display of various contraceptive devices and newspaper clippings and pamphlets on birth control.

"Because there were a lot more pregnancies last year on campus, we felt there was need for a birth control information centre", explains volunteer Dawn Aspinall, (SGS).

The main source of printed information is the comprehensive 46-page Birth Control Handbook, published by the McGill Students' Society.

Of the 10,000 pamphlets the group ordered, almost 1,000 were distributed last week from the St. George St. and tent locations. To date, the centre has been used by couples and single men and women who drop in to discuss birth control methods or to obtain the name of a reliable gynaecologist. They have also had several requests for help in obtaining abortions.

During registration, centre volunteers pitched a tent in front of the SAC office and distributed the handbook to passersby.

Volunteer Linda Cameron says more men asked for the Birth Control Handbook than women.

"I think some of the girls are too shy to come and get the book in public", she explains.

The centre is open Tuesday and Thursday evenings from 7 to 9 p.m. and Wednesday afternoons from 1 to 5 p.m.

However, says Mrs. Aspinall, "The hours would be extended if more volunteers could give their time."

Campbell attacks Ontario university presidents' report

The report on campus discipline issued by the 14 presidents of Ontario universities took Prof. Ralph Campbell, chairman of the Campbell committee on disciplinary procedures, by surprise.

"It isn't by any means in line with the document which we hope to produce within the next few days," he said.

The presidential advisory committee, established in April, 1968 to re-evaluate disciplinary procedure on campus, has assimilated briefs from numerous campus groups.

"We would propose a more quasi-judicial system of discipline," said Prof. Campbell. "You have a sort of court where you lay charges and decide whether an individual did in fact behave obstructively or destructively."

Prof. Campbell had not read the actual document but didn't think the idea of a university tribunal came through in newspaper reports on the statement.

Campbell defined "obstructive behavior", one of the vague phrases used in the document, as something that obstructs the teaching-learning-research function of the university. Making the presentation of a lecture impossible, for example, he considered obstructive.

"It doesn't have to be students who are the offenders," he added. "Staff could be charged, too."

Professors would be tried by a court composed of three voting staff members, two voting students and a legal advisor. Students would be tried by three students and two staff members and a legal advisor.

A certain range of punishment and a maximum penalty would be predetermined but the actual decision on punishment would be decided by the tribunal.

In order for a student to be expelled or a professor fired he would have to come before a further committee.

UofA gets new discipline system

EDMONTON (CUP) — The draft for a new disciplinary body has been passed by the law and order committee at the University of Alberta without either a quorum or the student members present.

Composed of three faculty members and two students the board would summon in writing an offender to a hearing. Failure to appear could result in a fine, refusal of marks, suspension or expulsion. A person found guilty of an offence would be subject to the same penalties.

Steve Hardy and Bob Hunka, student members of the Law and Order Committee, claimed they were never asked to attend the meeting which passed the new proposal.

"Although the report states the committee is in favour of student discipline remaining in the hands of the students, the majority of the committee has consistently rejected this idea," Hardy said.

"They have voted down any proposals for the majority of the board to consist of students or even an equal number of students and faculty," he added.

It was a longlonglonglong.

Between the New Program and the computer, the arts student has been in more lineups for longer periods of time than any other year — and many of his troubles won't be ironed out for another several weeks.

There are some who claim the computer makes more mistakes and takes more time than the old human-power system. Whatever administrative improvements the computer may have wrought, the beneficiary was most certainly not the student.

At registrars' offices, staff members were often too busy even to comment on how busy they were.

Rev. A. F. Waligore, assistant registrar at St. Michael's College, said exam results often altered students' plans. He predicted a busier year for faculty advisors and felt next year's students would generally be "more aware of the value of pre-registration."

The new calendar, which could have eased registration problems if it had been published on time, did not appear on campus until Aug. 27.

Scarborough registration went fairly smoothly, taking about 20 minutes per student, despite the computer's habit of declaring itself out of order every other day.

At Erindale, Registrar J. J. Rae used the "old-fashioned system" — human power — to register about 900 students without a hitch.

Professional faculties, which registered students at least a week earlier than the arts faculty, reported no serious difficulties.

Graduate students had few timetable problems, but one PhD candidate, new to Toronto, reported blisters on both heels after walking "at least

THEY

Friday afternoon found several hundred second year students lined up at Sidney Smith Hall awaiting revised timetables.

"They said to come at 1:30, so I'm here," said Beth MacLeod (II Vic), "but so is everybody else. I feel I'm about to be processed. It's like a big fight with the computer."

Most students didn't seem too upset by having to spend one to two hours standing in line.

"I've only been here half an hour," said Randall Withell (II Vic), somewhat nonchalantly. He didn't seem to mind standing there in line.

"I was in a line up just a couple of days ago. It wasn't that bad," he added, but felt the situation could be improved. "They should try to disperse everything a bit Few escaped the eccentricities of the machine. The computer told professors they couldn't register any more students in classes they had intended to expand.

"We were asked at the beginning of the summer to set a limit on enrolment in our courses," explained a political science professor.

"We set arbitrary limits just to get the paperwork out of our hair, then found the computer was refusing students in courses we had decided to expand after our summer meetings."

Pol 202, originally titled Political Economy and Public Policy, was changed over the summer to a simulation of Canadian-American relations.

"We sent letters to all the students who pre-registered in the old course, but we're not sure how many are going to drop out because of the change," said Prof. Stephen Clarkson.

"Meanwhile, the computer is rejecting new applicants. We don't consider the course closed, but apparently the faculty office is turning new applicants away."

A harried sociology professor said administrative difficulties under the new system are "at least twice as bad as under the human-run system."

Most considered registration line ups a necessary evil and just another part of university bureaucracy, although one girl thought it could be an administration plot.

"If we didn't have all these line ups to stand around in, the students might all be out in the streets making the Revolution," she commented.

But what about next year's line ups? Will the bureaucracy become more efficient? Many students were optimistic that things would get better.

"After all," said one, "They can't get much worse and still function, can they?"

"There's just too many people in the same place at the same time and there's bound to be confusion," added another. "It should get better though — the baby boom is decreasing."

Book Sac crowded out by

BY JIM COWAN

After almost a year of off-and-on negotiating between the Students Administrative Council and the University of Toronto Press and Bookstores, agreement has been reached on a student-faculty committee to set policy for the U of T bookstore complex.

The committee, originally announced last November, will be composed of three SAC appointees, three faculty appointees, one graduate student and one administrator. The U of T Bookstores will send a representative as a non-voting member.

The new committee will act as a subcommittee of the Press Committee of the Board of Governors, and it is expected that any policy recommendations it proposes will be accepted.

Friday's meeting climaxed a summer of confusion and growing bitterness between SAC, the SAC bookstore project, and the U of T Bookstores. Most of the problems arose from SAC's failure to define its reasons for setting up the bookstore project, known as BookSac, to those running the enterprise.

BookSac employees say they understood SAC wanted a permanent textbook store to compete with the U of T bookstores. Shiela Tessler, co-manager of the BookSac, said Thursday: "We wouldn't have put so much effort into it if we'd thought it was only for one year."

But SAC Services Commissioner Chris Szalwinski says BookSac, now in its second year, was "only a political tool" designed to pressure U of T Press into agreeing to the committee. "Once we gain control on that committee," he said, "the SAC bookstore will be disbanded."

BookSac, operating on the premise that they were a competitive bookstore, refused to co-operate with the U of T Press officials. The Press in turn put pressure on SAC to gain co-operation so between the two stores there would be enough textbooks ordered without either store being stuck with excess stock.

And from both sides came accusations of dishonesty, unfair practices, and largely unsubstantiated claims of harassment.

According to Szalwinski, the committee was originally held up because SAC didn't trust the University Bookstores. But following a meeting at which the Bookstore provided a detailed breakdown of their financial operation, including salaries and overhead expenses, SAC said it was convinced the Bookstore was doing as well as it could.

SAC vice-president Bob Barkwell closed that meeting by saying: "After years of being suspicious of administrators I have a residue of completely unsubstantiated suspicions, but my major suspicions have been cleared up, mostly due to the list of salaries with names. I will speak to the Bookstore people and ask them to cooperate with you fully."

It was generally understood, said Szalwinski, that full cooperation would mean an exchange of records so that neither store would over order.

SAC compromise

But the BookSac people dug in their heels and refused any cooperation. "We didn't feel it was good business to disclose information to our competitors," Miss Tessler said Thursday.

BookSac continued to make its plans on the assumption it was an independent, competitive bookstore. An advertising flyer was prepared and time purchased on Radio Varsity. The campaign was to start Sept. 11.

The handout charged University Bookstores with selling books above list price, and said, in indirect terms, that the University Bookstores were inefficiently run and were not concerned with the student's welfare. Both charges were hotly denied by Charles H. Fanning, general manager of the bookstores.

In the face of threats by Fanning to refuse future cooperation if the handbill was distributed, Szalwinski withdrew the flyer. Then it was discovered that by cutting the bill in half, all the advertising information was retained while the allegedly libelous remarks were eliminated. The bill was handed out in this form.

Friday's meeting chaired by Brian Levitt of the Provost's Office, was a final attempt to reconcile the differences between the two stores.

SAC and University Bookstores officials agreed on the committee, but the co-managers of the BookSac renewed their intentions not to sit on the committee or co-operate in any way.

At one point it looked as though the committee would founder once again, when Fanning stated he would not sit on any committee with Miss Tessler. But he later stated he would be happy to implement any policy the committee decided on.

The future of BookSac remains clouded. Miss Tessler says she would like to see the bookstore continue and eventually be turned into a student-owned co-op. But Szalwinski has said the bookstore will be closed if the committee is set up, and Fanning has stated the University Bookstores would buy out BookSac stock.

The committee should meet in about two weeks, after SAC and the Association of Teaching Staff appoint their representatives.

Ryerson student governors resign

Two Ryerson Polytechnical Institute students, appointed to the Ryerson Board of Governors last May, have resigned.

In a joint letter to Premier John Robarts, Gordon Jackson and Richard Finlay said they felt their presence had been ignored by the more established members of the board.

The students, the first in Canada to sit on a Board of Governors, were appointed following changes in the Provincial statute governing Ryerson. Jackson and Finlay were elected by the students, then formally appointed to sit on the board by Premier Robarts.

Students will challenge Caput decision

The university's decision to allow the Caput to deal with student disruptions runs contrary to the university's own policy, two students on the Committee to Reconstitute Caput charged last night.

The Caput, U of T's highest disciplinary body, announced Saturday that it would, if asked, deal with disruptions similar to the New Left Caucus action at a University College freshman dinner Thursday.

"The university has recognized that Caput is an illegitimate body for dealing with socio-political offences," said SAC vice-president Bob Barkwell, who sits with SAC executive member Greg Kealey on the Committee to Reconstitute Caput.

The report of the committee is to be finalized at a meeting Tuesday. The report recommends that "as far as cases of student discipline are concerned, the Caput (should) continue to exercise its jurisdiction in cases that it has historically dealt with (i.e. cheating, plagiarism, library theft, etc.)."

But the committee specifically added that there should be "no extension of the jurisdiction of the Caput during the interim period."

The reconstituting committee was called last spring, after radicals disrupted a speech by former Berkeley president Clark Kerr, to set up interim disciplinary arrangements pending a report by the Campbell committee on discipline.

The Campbell committee report will recommend full-scale changes in the U of T's disciplinary structure.

Both these committees, Kealey said, came out against harsh handling of disruptions and other political actions.

"The Campbell Report is expected to recognize that sometimes disruptions are necessary to bring about change in the university," he said.

By deciding to use Caput to take action now, the university has undercut its own procedures, Barkwell said.

And Bissell's implied endorsement of the "law and order" working paper of the Committee of Presidents of Ontario Universities will also tend to undermine the more moderate positions of the two committees, he said.

Bissell said the working paper, which calls for harsh penalties for disruptions, was a "useful" document, and added that he would present it to the Board of Governors and other university bodies.

Barkwell said he hoped students would come to the open meeting of the reconstituting committee Tuesday, at 2 p.m. in the Senate Chambers of Simcoe Hall.

"We're going to attack this double-crossing and we're going to talk about the fact that students weren't involved in Caput's decision to take action now," Barkwell said.

"I hope lots of students will come to the meeting and see the contradictions laid bare."

UNIVERSITY HOUSING COMMITTEE

APPLICATIONS FOR STUDENT POSITIONS NOW BEING ACCEPTED

Last September the SAC called on the university administration to centralize authority for University housing development and administration by establishing a Student-Faculty committee to supersede all existing committees.

This committee was set up last year. There were seven students and six faculty members and was chaired by Prof. D. F. Forster.

Student representatives have to be reappointed this year and the SAC shall do so in consultation with the GSU and residence councils.

Please apply in writing, stating your background, qualifications and your reasons for being interested in serving on this committee.

Applications are to be sent to the SAC office.

Metras retires after this season

by JIM COWAN

It would have made a great story — Johnny Metras, coaching his last game at Varsity Stadium, beating his arch-rivals, Varsity Blues.

And it would have been in character, for Metras has spent 35 years as head coach of the University of Western Ontario Mustangs providing good copy for the newspaper hacks.

Most college football fans know the Metras saga by now; how he came to Canada from the University of Detroit in 1933 as a playing-coach with the St. Michael's College team in the old Ontario Rugby Football Union, how he was an All-Canadian centre in '34, and how he moved to Western in 1936, taking over as head coach in 1939.

He was unbeaten in his first ten seasons, and even taking into account the disruption of the war years, that's quite a record.

Since then, he's been one of college football's more colorful characters, and one of its most avid boosters.

"He's been great for the game over the years," Blues' coach Ron Murphy said Saturday, noting some of the many innovations Metras has introduced. At one time, for instance, he used a diamond T formation, with two quarterbacks set one behind the other.

Metras sees the game as going through cycles every ten years or so, and always improving. "When I first came up here," he said Saturday, "I could have played with both hands behind my back and still kicked the crap out of the teams then.

"You take a team today that's a loser and it could be a winner ten years ago. The kids have improved so much, and they're watching better football today."

Metras has always opposed athletic scholarships and likes the Canadian system of basing scholarships strictly on academic ability. "I don't think an athlete should be treated any differently.

"I went through the damn American regime," he continued, "and it produced a lot of bums."

Metras' system has proven successful over the years. He can boast of having graduated more students into the professional leagues than any other coach. But, as he said in 1965, "our prime purpose is to develop men to help Canada grow, not football players to help the Canadian Football League grow."

Metras has always made it clear to his players that studies come before football. Some years ago he said: "If I thought my job was just to win football games, someone else could have it tomorrow. I think I've made it pretty clear where I stand on the subject of players keeping up their studies. Consequently, the whole faculty is behind me."

Metras will continue as Athletic Director at Western, and one might suspect he is beginning to regret his decision to quit coaching.

"It's going to be a long four years with nothing to do," he said before Saturday's game. "But you can't keep working 75-80 hours a week for ever." Then, during a half-time presentation ceremony, he said "... and don't think I won't have a fair bit to do with the football team next year."

BLUENOTES ... Blues first string offensive tackle Norm Trainor left the game in the early with an injured ankle ... the training staff worked on his knee for five minutes before he pointed out that that wasn't what hurt ... his place was filled by defensive lineman Alex Squires.

loss, Tie in Pre-Season Games

Mistakes and Penalties mar strong Defence

By PAUL CARSON

It was Johnny Metras' last appearance in Varsity Stadium as Mustang mentor, and for three quarters Saturday it looked as if Blues were a group of comedians hired to enliven his testimonial dinner.

An almost interminable succession of silly mistakes and costly penalties had given Metras and his Mustangs a 13-9 lead, and Blues seemed to be in no hurry to change things.

Then, for 14 minutes in the final period, Varsity decided to play football.

Rookie quarterback Wayne Dunkley led a series of sustained marches that finally produced the go-ahead score from another first-year player, halfback Cor Doret. Victory, what: 16-13?

Victory, no. Fifteen minus 14 leave one. And in that last one minute, another silly mistake plus another costly penalty enabled 'Stangs all-star middle linebacker Ottavio Colosimo to kick a 33-yard field goal. Tie. Ugh.

With about a minute remaining, Mustangs found themselves on their own 37; at quarterback for this last charge Metras had chosen Joe Fabiani. Fabiani is a rather pleasant chap, but until then he had been about as effective as the campus cop chaperoning the LGMB.

Stangs 16 Blues 16

Fabiani promptly pitched for 31 yards to flanker Wayne Danter and 'Stangs were in Varsity territory. Three Blues defenders stood by admiring Danter's unobtrusive curl-in pattern.

Two plays later, a questionable pass interference penalty against Varsity's Jody Ortvod put Western on the 15. Ortvod bumped Danter on the shoulder while knocking down a low pass; the official was behind the play, but the dubious call stood.

After an incomplete pass to Carl Lindros, Blues outstanding veteran end, Alex Squires, dumped Fabiani for a 10-year loss. But Colosimo's wounded-mallard style field goal was clearly good, and Western got their tie.

As in the Guelph game, Blues defence was outstanding — when it wanted to be. Squires, Jim Bennett, Peter Van Bedegom, and Bart D'Onofrio anchored a defensive line that held the powerful Mustang running game to but 121 yards in 36 attempts.

Varsity's secondary, especially Pete Lamantia, Ian Kirkpatrick, and Ortvod, restricted Stangs to the short, harmless completions. Fabiani and starting QB Steve Stefanko netted only 101 yards on 13 completions.

Blues duo of Dunkley and Vic Alboini made good of 9 of 15 passes, including a 34-yard touchdown strike to John Chapman in the first quarter.

As all through last year, and in the Guelph game, Blues continually hurt themselves by incurring too many stupid penalties.

Two needless roughing penalties plus a costly offside helped Western to its first score, a one-yard sneak by Stefanko.

Varsity's cause was not aided when sloppy downfield tackling enables Mustang punt return specialist Al Lockhart to scamper 57 yards deep into Toronto territory.

Blues could easily have won had Murphy imitated Metras and played his first-string for most of the game. However, the Varsity coach wisely decided to substitute freely, even in the last quarter.

"Let's face it," he said afterwards, "it's only an exhibition game. If I don't play the rookies now, I'll never get a chance to see what they can do."

Blues stuck to a game plan that called for more running, even in the third quarter when Western threw a stacked defence at them. Dunkley was impressive as he moved Blues on the ground; 'Stangs gambled successfully with one-on-one pass coverage and prevented Blues from scoring until late in the game.

On offence, Blues have made enough mistakes in the last two weeks to last an entire season. The defence appears solid, and the drop of rookies is well above average.

If Blues stop taking stupid penalties and beating themselves, Queens will have to be in absolutely perfect form to beat them.

What ho! Sports staff recruiting time again.

Western's Bob LaRose (73) jumps for joy and tackle Bob Watts (65) looks on approvingly as Mustang place kicker Ottavio Colosimo's last second topsy-turvy field-goal soars between the uprights. The 33-yard kick spoiled a tremendous second half by Varsity's stellar defence.

GUELPH — (staff) — Competing with both the rock revival and the Argos-Ottawa game on the boob tube, Blues opened the season on the 13th with the most inept display offered by any Varsity team in recent years.

Feeble blocking, sloppy tackling, a succession of dropped passes and numerous costly penalties combined to hand the Gryphons a gift-wrapped donation of 15 points. As Blues managed only 14 in return, they became the first major Varsity team (football, hockey, or basketball) ever to lose to Guelph.

Guelph 15 Varsity 14

Blues were over-confident and lackadaisical throughout the game. The well-drilled Guelph line made mince-meat of their blocking patterns, and in the second half, Varsity simply could not produce the big play when needed. With less than two minutes left, the last Toronto drive ended embarrassingly in an easy interception by standout Gryphon linebacker Paul Zvonkin.

As 1,500 ecstatic Guelph students mobbed their heroes, Varsity coach Ron Murphy commented, "Well, I guess we've made their season for them."

With only two full scrimmages before the game, Blues' unfamiliarity with offensive and defensive patterns was readily apparent.

On Gryphon's first play from scrimmage, halfback Mike Power scampered 43 yards through Blues' right side for a touchdown. An accidental clip on the other side of the field nullified the score, but Power's run gave the underdog Gryphons a momentum and confidence they rarely lost.

Blues confined all their scoring to a three-and-a-half-minute segment of the second quarter.

Split-end John Chapman ran past two startled Guelph defenders and grabbed a 68-yard TD pass from Vic Alboini.

Three of Blues' better rookies combined to produce the second (and last) Toronto score.

Brian Penny intercepted a Guelph pass on the Gryphon 38; four plays and one roughing penalty later, halfback Corradino Doret took a swing pass from Monarch Park grad Wayne Dunkley, and scored standing up from seven yards out.

With a 14-1 lead, Varsity got lazy and careless. Rookie Guelph quarterback Ron Bremner engineered a 71-yard march that produced a major just before half-time.

Bremner's play calling and execution were strictly ordinary; Blues simply forgot how to tackle.

In the third quarter, Guelph concentrated on keeping Blues pinned down in their own end. Paul McKay appeared to have reversed things with a gorgeous 77-yard punt from his own 20, but Blues were hit with a questionable offside penalty.

On third and 15 from the Varsity 15, McKay tried to run. Silly boy.

On the very next play, Guelph ran a sweep and Blues stumbled over each other while Steve Stewart ran back and forth across the field before crossing the goal line. The convert was Gryphons' margin of victory.

McKay looked sick on Stewart's winning run, and Chapman's showboating antics earlier cost Varsity about 200 yards of needed offence. But you can't blame the loss on any one player.

When a team stinks the way Blues stunk, it's got to be a team effort.

When Blues weren't beating themselves, the officials contributed their share.

Catching in full measure the spirit of ineptitude which pervaded the afternoon, they made some of the most unique calls in college football history.

Early in the third quarter, an Alboini pass attempt fluttered to the ground near the sidelines.

A Guelph lineman ambled over, picked up the ball, and casually flipped it to the referee, who promptly ruled it a fumble.

On the last play of the first half, Guelph wisely declined a holding penalty against Blues but the officials gave Varsity one more play anyway.

Once, a Guelph linebacker found himself in the Varsity backfield before the snap, but Blues got the penalty. And so on.

Bright spots for Varsity were the veterans on the defensive line, and the solid job of pass coverage from the secondary.

Alex Squires, Bill Bennett, Bart D'Onofrio, and Peter Van Bodegom contained the Gryphon attack, but Murphy gave the rookies equal time and they weren't nearly as effective.

Bremner and starting Guelph QB Gerry Organ managed only 30 yards on four completed passes, including a miserable minus-eight yards in the second half.

Each team rushed for 120 yards, and Blues duo of Dunkley and Alboini had eight completions (plus eight more sure ones dropped) out of 20 for 191 yards.

BLUENOTES . . . Veterans Eric Walter, Peter Raham and Rick Agro sat out the game with minor injuries . . . Blues dressed 44 and all played; Guelph dressed 60 and played most of them . . . Gryphons could win the Central Canada Conference and could conceivably have a rematch with Blues in the College Bowl . . . "Now wouldn't that be an interesting game," mused Murphy.

DISCIPLINE COMMITTEE FOLDS AS STUDENTS WALK OUT

By SUSAN REISLER

Student members of an interim committee set up to reconstitute Caput have resigned.

The resignation followed President Calude Bissell's refusal yesterday to repudiate his statement about the Committee of Presidents of Ontario's working paper on discipline and the Caput's statement, issued last Saturday.

The two SAC members, Bob Barkwell (III MEDS) and Greg Kealey (IV SMC) were the first to walk off the committee after Barkwell read a long statement prepared by the SAC executive Monday night.

In their paper the executive called the statements of the Council of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario (CPUO) and those of the Caput "repressive and anti-democratic" and said they "come close to fascism".

The paper complained of the lack of definitions in CPUO working paper and the complete lack of student participation in its formulation.

of Caput because they did not want to create precedents before the Campbell report had been presented.

"The committee recommended that the Caput continue to exercise its jurisdiction in cases that it has historically dealt with, but that there be no extension of the jurisdiction of the Caput during the interim period."

STUDENTS IGNORED

In the conclusion the paper said:

"Again, it is not so important what the content of the statement is, as that it was drawn up without involving students and ignoring both the committee on reconstitution of Caput and the Campbell Committee. If students are not to have a hand in making the rules which affect their lives, if the administration is going to bypass its own channels, whenever it is expedient for them to do so, if the students are to have their elementary rights to free speech, to organize, and to academic freedom repressed, then we can no longer deal with the administration in good faith. Unless Dr. Bissell repudiates the statement of CPUO and the Caput withdraws its ruling pending publication of the Campbell report, then "liberal" attempts to reform are at an end. One does not, to quote Bob Rae, a student CUG member, 'discuss menus with cannibals'."

Professor Frederick Winter, Chairman of the Association of Teaching Staff and also a member of the interim committee, agreed in substance with Barkwell's report.

"Although I regret some of its dressing," he said, "it still remained the responsibility of the university, to deal with any disruption or dispute that arose on the campus."

"Whether it was dealt with by the interim Caput or not, it would be dealt with by some other power on the basis of power already vested in them.

"It was simple-minded to expect that a situation would be allowed where there was a complete vacuum of authority," he said.

GSU POSITION

Michael Vaughan (SGS), President of the Graduate Students' Union made a statement similar to SAC's saying the GSU could not endorse Bissell's statement about the CPUO working paper or the Caput statement.

He asked that Dr. Bissell either withdraw his statement or substantially modify it.

Vaughan later withdrew from the committee also stating that his position there, if he remained, would be an elitist one.

President Bissell had expected the SAC demand that he repudiate his statements and he had a formal reply already written.

Dr. Bissell said he agreed with the basic assumptions of the CPUO statement.

The Caput statement, he said, "is a simple summary of the existing statutory situation and cannot be repudiated by any member of the University without repudiating the University as an institution founded on law."

"It has been suggested," Dr. Bissell continued, "that there was a deliberate extension of the jurisdiction of Caput contrary to an understanding reached by the special committee set up to consider the composition of Caput. One cannot extend or contract by fact the jurisdiction of a body that has complete responsibility for the disciplining of students in the University. Certainly that jurisdiction includes the disruption of what is at the basis of the whole University process — the class and the meeting. One does not sanctify deliberate disruption by calling it political action. If you deny this you are denying the existence of the university."

Dr. Bissell said he would discuss the issues with SAC, "but only on condition that existing law remains in force until changes are agreed to and

CAMPBELL COMMITTEE UNDERCUT

"The most disturbing aspect of this statement," read the SAC paper, "is that President Bissell has refused to disown it, thereby undercutting the staff-student committee, under Dr. Ralph Campbell, which has been considering the entire question of campus discipline for over a year. . . . Unless Dr. Bissell clarifies his position, it will be impossible to continue negotiations with the administration. It is not possible to discuss discipline if one of the positions held by the administration is repression and the destruction of democracy."

The SAC paper also said that the CAPUT statement contains an "outright lie" — that the committee on the reconstruction of Caput "has not as yet been able to reach agreement on the question of what the Caput's jurisdiction to deal with actions arising out of sit-ins, disruptions of classes etc., should be. In fact, this committee, which has been meeting all summer, at the request of the administration, did come to an agreement."

According to the paper, the committee agreed not to change the traditional powers formally implemented."

"I therefore have no intention of repudiating either statement," he said again.

MEETING BREAKS UP

After Dr. Bissell finished his statement, the two SAC members said they were withdrawing from the committee and suggested that the 250 students who filled the Debates Room in Hart House should meet immediately in the same room to discuss the issues and disrupt the committee meeting if necessary.

Disorder set into the meeting as students in the audience heckled and tried to speak. There had already been heckling throughout the meeting but after the students resigned from the committee the chanting began in earnest.

Andy Wernick (SGS) tried to sum up what had happened in the meeting:

"First," he said, "the administration has declared war on any political organizing on this campus.

"Second, the committee has lost its legitimacy because the students have walked off.

"Third, the students here don't want to talk to that committee."

Wernick suggested that the committee meeting should continue at Simcoe Hall and that the students should meet where they were.

Chants of "OUT" filled the room for the next three minutes.

LANGDON STEPS IN

Steve Langdon (IV TRIN), last year's SAC president, said he agreed with the SAC's move.

"I think the SAC has a perfect right to ask for President Bissell's repudiation of the statement.

"I think the President has made a big mistake," he said.

In the middle of the melee the meeting was adjourned, but President Bissell had the last, final, official word.

"Change at this university will come about by democratic procedures and not by the kind of procedures that have come about now," he said.

Art McIlwain (IV ASPC) said he was frightened by the report.

As an Engineer he had marched with the LGMB and been on capers that might be considered disruptive. As such he would be subject to this discipline and could have been expelled.

But, he said, "students don't do themselves any favors when they shout down things they don't agree with."

The students finally agreed to hold a mass meeting Thursday at 1 p.m. in Convocation Hall to discuss how the matter should be further handled.

A DISRUPTION IS...

In an interview later with The Varsity, Robin Ross, Chairman of the Interim Committee, said he did not consider the meeting disrupted.

"My view of a disruption," he said, "is when you get to a stage where an individual wants to speak and can't speak because other people are making it impossible for him to speak.

"In my view the most important privilege in being at a university is that the staff, students, or administration has the right to speak freely and without undue restrictions on matters which are of concern to them.

"If that right is in any way damaged or challenged this is fatal to the health and vitality of the university. This, in my view, must be the over-riding concern which underlies the way in which the university orders its members.

"This, in my view, underlies the statement recently issued by the Caput of the University of Toronto," Mr. Ross said.

"One cannot discuss menus with cannibals." — Rhodes Scholar Bob Rae to Chancellor Omond Selondt after the latter's convocation address.

Repression looms as tolerance Fades

Yesterday U of T President Claude Bissell refused to change his get-tough policy on student discipline, a policy that has forced the disruption of his own channels of liberal tolerance.

He refused to change it in the face of direct opposition from 250 students crowded into the Hart House Debates Room, from the Students' Administrative Council, from the Graduate Students Union, and from the head of the Association of Teaching Staff.

Now, SAC, GSU, and ATS Chairman Frederick Winter have walked off the committee to reconstitute CAPUT, after that committee held disastrous court before those 250 students yesterday.

Dr. Bissell has disrupted that channel of discussion.

He has done so by shifting last year's policy of liberalism and accommodation to one of open conservatism and repression — an attempt to crush a student movement before it has even begun to organize.

This week Dr. Bissell has expressed his new policy through five developments:

(1) He postponed his traditional opening address, scheduled for Monday afternoon. When The Varsity phoned him Sunday night he would not comment, although he did comment to The Globe and Mail.

Bissell later said he postponed his address so that he "might deal in greater detail and at substantial length with problems facing the University at this time."

It is more probable that he expected the New Left Caucus to disrupt the address, and that a speech called on shorter notice would be less susceptible to disruption.

The NLC planned no disruption.

(2) Dr. Bissell then accepted the statement on discipline by the Committee of University Presidents as "a helpful document" (see page 5). The CPUO paper is an affront to democracy: not one student participated in drafting it, and it recommends that a "standing committee" chosen by the Senate alone deal with discipline.

As the SAC statement says, the CPUO paper is "frightening", for "it fails to deal with the reality of Ontario; by talking of 'violence' and 'disruption' in the abstract, it creates an atmosphere of hysteria. . ."

(3) Dr. Bissell clearly reversed a former commitment to students and faculty by extending the powers of Caput to deal with disruptions.

An administration press release stated that the committee to reconstitute Caput "has not as yet been able to reach agreement on the question of what the Caput's jurisdiction to deal with actions arising out of sit-ins, disruption of classes, etc., should be."

But Dr. Bissell and that committee did agree during the summer that Caput should not deal with such political action, and that some ad hoc arrangement would have to be made in the event of a political crisis. The minutes of that former meeting indicate that it did reach such an agreement.

And Dr. Bissell has misrepresented the facts and acted in bad faith.

(4) Dr. Bissell refused to withdraw his statements on Caput and the CPUO working paper and has lost the confidence of faculty and students.

(5) Finally he over-reacted to the New Left Caucus' actions during orientations, which he labels as "a serious offence."

If students may not challenge the content of orientations without threats of punishment, it's frightening to speculate what might happen if they challenged the content of their courses or organized in the classroom.

Thus, the past few days have clearly shown that the U of T administration has shifted to a new, tougher line on discipline, and that last year's liberal rhetoric is not worth the paper it was written on.

Is the shift in policy a tactical error, does it show a change in purpose, or is it a realistic policy to protect the interests of the administration?

It's not just a foolish mistake. It's too blatant and repeated to be that.

And it's not a change in basic purpose. The purpose remains the same — the jargon for it is "counter-insurgency."

Last year the administration was dealing with a social-democratic student council that did not really challenge its power. Last year's SAC was easily absorbed onto committees, and pacified by promises of student participation.

This year the administration is dealing with an extra-parliamentary left group — the New Left Caucus, a socialist group that is organizing to change the university and society. A group that will not accept the sickly taste of marshmallow politics. So the marshmallow has burned — it's now as soft as granite. It's determined to crush, not absorb, the latest threat to its seat of power. That power lies in the corporations that finance its research and accept its graduates, the same corporations that hold Canada to colonial statutes and are ravishing ("developing") the Third World by extracting natural resources for prestige and profit; the same corporations that maintain an economic system justified by professors and textbooks in our classrooms.

When a university group seriously challenges the justice of that reality, campus administrators will try to smash that group and limit its freedom to organize. If that fails, the police will be welcomed and asked to brush their feet at the door.

In his recently published President's Report, John Sword, acting U of T president 1967-68, said "many of the moderate voices seemed silenced by indifference, desires for detached analysis, dislike of irrational debate and preoccupation with more constructive and scholarly pursuits."

He hopes. Perhaps those students should start to examine the function of their own scholarly pursuits and of their own detachment.

Workers belong

Flushed with its breakthrough this summer in organizing both university library and SAC employees, the Canadian Union of Public Employees has produced (with a wry grin on its collective lips, one suspects) one of the most brash and startling documents to appear on the university in quite some time.

The CUPE brief to CUG is very well-written. The style is light and readable. It tosses about the New Left jargonism "artificial divisions", "alienation", and "democracy" with, for the most part, rare clarity and logic.

Some of its bitterness is touched with subtle humour. It describes the representation given by SAC and the ATS to the students and faculty as "strong" and "effective", a characterization one suspects is more governed by politeness than precision.

The tone is emphatic, but not optimistic. One gathers that CUPE is asking for considerably more than it thinks it can get in the foreseeable future. It spends the major part of the brief just asking for a non-hostile reception for unions on campus.

The initial reaction to the brief was very much as expected. The daily press seized on the image of plumbers in the Faculty Club, treating it with a mixture of condescension and disbelief.

One can expect similar scorn for the brief's proposals from those sections faculty and administration, who have opposed the acceptance of students as full members of the university community.

We will probably know CUG's response within a month, if it responds at all. Frank Kitchen of CUPE admitted that the brief was written with the feeling that CUG was "gutless and marshmallow".

The interesting response to CUPE's recommendations will come from students, and more particularly, from SAC.

Participatory democracy is relatively easy to support if it coincides with one's own interest. But it is different when it is those uppy workers that want to slip beneath the covers with the elite of the intellectual faculty.

Now, the CUPE brief has its weaknesses. It's bias is overwhelming towards institutional unionism, and for all its use of the jargon of the student left, the content is eminently self-centred, reminiscent of that attitude known lovingly as "trade-union consciousness."

The ninth recommendation of the brief calls for selection of staff members by the staff at large, but by the "bargaining agents of the staff."

The cause of free tuition and special admission requirements for staff and their dependents, rather than for the "working class" as a whole, is emphasized. University workers, CUPE seems to feel, wouldn't really mind being a slightly privileged class, in the short run, at any rate.

In spite of the aggressive tone of the brief, CUPE is very unlikely to press its claim as the union to organize the whole campus. A building trades style battle for membership is not to be expected.

The partisan tone of the brief is, however, no excuse for its rejection. Any student who believes seriously in democracy in the university must accept the substance of the recommendations. Workers are a part of the university community, and, as such, deserve a place of respect and power in that community.

CUPE is still mostly concerned with organizing more university workers, and getting decent wages for its members. 80 per cent of the campus' workers are still unionized and the wages of those who are are still substandard.

The response to the brief, has to comm

The response to the brief has to come from individual members of the staff and the student body. There must be support for the efforts of unions on campus. But along with it, there must be a change of attitudes, the beginning of which should be a positive response to the CUPE brief.

Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

Bissell calls this 'a helpful document'

The following is the entire text of the working paper entitled "Order on Campus" issued by the Committee of University Presidents of Ontario:

Recent years have witnessed a mounting wave of demonstrations, confrontations and violence in North American universities. Increasingly, these disturbances have been characterized by extremism and violence, confusion and division on the part of faculty, frequent tacit or vocal endorsement of radical students by some faculty members, a wide range of responses by university administrators (all the way from condoning or forgiving extremist behaviour to prompt reliance on the police), demands for amnesty in the aftermath of violence, and a growing disaffection and rage directed at the universities by the public and legislators.

There can be no doubt that violence constitutes a serious danger to the survival of the universities as places of teaching, research and scholarship. These functions at the highest level can only be performed in an environment free from coercion. By accepting membership in the university community an individual acquires new responsibilities. As observed by the Faculty of Arts and Sciences at Harvard, these responsibilities "require him to see how easily an academic community can be violated, knowingly or unknowingly — whether by actual violence or by lack of responsiveness to widely perceived needs for change; whether by impatience or by insensitivity; or by failure in a process of decision to make sufficient effort to consult those who have to live with the results of the decision."

In Ontario the focus of protest has been on the governance of universities and on the programmes and curricula. Much but not all of the protest has been exercised fairly and legitimately and the universities have shown their willingness and ability to be responsive to the need for reforms.

NO COERCION

The universities in Ontario will continue to be responsive to student concerns and opportunities for improving the ways in which they perform. The faculty, administration and governing bodies are prepared to discuss with the students the merits of proposals on any issues in an atmosphere of mutual respect. They will continue to make changes where discussion and examination demonstrate opportunities for improvement. However, the universities will not carry on discussions or make changes in the face of threat or other forms of coercion. The unlimited range of ideas essential to the university function cannot exist in the presence of coercion and he who interferes with free discussion and exercise of the rule of reason exhibits behaviour unfit for the academic community.

Illegitimate disturbances within the universities fall into two classes — those which obstruct the normal processes by which the university carries out its academic functions and those which, whatever their other characteristics, invoke violence or the threat of violence.

Illegitimate and unacceptable activities, as listed by Harvard, include the following:

(a) violence against any member or guest of the university community;

(b) deliberate interference with academic freedom and freedom of speech (including not only disruptions of a class but also interference with the freedom of any speaker properly invited by any section of

LEGITIMATE DISSENT

It is possible to have peaceful demonstrations to draw attention to issues without interfering with the academic processes of the university and such demonstrations are entirely legitimate. The university, while anxious to accommodate legitimate dissent, is not prepared to tolerate dissent or demonstration which involves any of the above-listed illegitimate activities. The university therefore will consider all of the activities listed above (a through e) as cause for immediate suspension. When a disturbance occurs, disciplinary action will be implemented as follows:

1. All students, faculty and employees of the university will be required to identify themselves to any officer of the university on request. Failure to comply will be interpreted as involving violence or threat of violence. The committee, in the event that violence is not involved, will be asked to rule whether the disturbance constitutes an obstruction to the university's processes.

3. If the ruling is that the university's processes are being obstructed, the President will be required to warn or have warned all those involved.

4. If the obstructive behaviour is not promptly discontinued, the persons will be advised that they have been suspended.

5. If, after suspension, the obstructive behaviour is not discontinued, the police will be brought in.

6. If the ruling is that the disturbance involves violence or the threat of violence, the President will be required to suspend the person or persons and call the police. Cases of violence are beyond the capacity of the university to deal with alone. Violent action is unnatural to the university and yet the only response by which violence can be contained is the exercise of counter-violence. The university recognizes that in such circumstances there is no acceptable alternative to enlisting the police for the protection of the academic community. When the police have been called in and when charges have been laid by civil authorities, the university will not intervene. It should be noted that the police may on their own initiative come on campus if there is clear and present danger to life or property.

7. In the case of grave emergency involving the safety of individuals or immediate danger to property, the President can call the police before calling into session the special standing committee.

8. Following suspension, the suspended person or persons will be charged before the university's properly constituted disciplinary authority (regardless of any action taken by civil authorities). They will be accused of wilful obstruction of the university's processes or violence, or both, and if found guilty will be liable to expulsion, or dismissal.

HOUSE OF INTELLECT

The university recognizes that these procedures are distasteful and that the penalty for offences is severe. It fer-the university community to express his views;

(c) theft or wilful destruction of university property or of the property of members of the university;

(d) forcible interference with the freedom of movement of any member or guest of the university; and in general

(e) obstruction of the normal processes and activities essential to the functions of the ed as evidence that the person is not a student, faculty member or employee.

2. The President will have available to him an appropriate standing committee of faculty members and students chosen by the Senate of the university. The President will be empowered to call this committee into session without notice in the event of disturbances occurring in the university. The committee will be asked in any such case to rule first whether the disturbance

ity of the university to deal with alone. Violent action is unnatural to the university and yet the only response by which violence can be contained is the exercise of counter-violence. The university recognizes that in such circumstances there is no acceptable alternative to enlisting the police for the protection of the academic community. When the police have been called in and when charges have been laid by civil authorities, the university will vently hopes that it will not find it necessary to invoke these sanctions. At the same time, the university is adopting this position because it is convinced that the very existence of the university is at stake. Expulsion or dismissal is the only appropriate penalty for those who would challenge the university's right to carry on its affairs through orderly and peaceful discussion and its right and responsibility to be a house of intellect.

talk with list

Sir,

In the article entitled "BookSac Crowded out by Sac compromise", carried in the Varsity of Sept. 22, reference is made to a handout alleging that "University Bookstores sold books above list price."

(This) charge was hotly denied by Charles H. Fanning, general manager of the Bookstores."

Since Mr. Fanning felt that this charge required "hot denial", it becomes interesting that, when, during the last winter term, I brought to the attention of the Bookstore staff three books, out of several which were marked at prices above list, I was told that nothing could be nor would be done to correct the situation.

If Mr. Fanning wishes to examine the matter, himself, the three books were and edition of Euripides' "Hippolytus", publishers, list $8.85, U. of T. $9.25; A. R. Burn: Lyric Age of Greece", publisher's list $8.50, U. of T. $9.25; A. R. Burn: "Persia and the Greeks", publisher's list $10.95, U. of T. $12.00.

These books are still on the shelves of the Bookstore, with prices unchanged, and still above the publishers' current list price.

The college awakes to the sound of muzac — Freshmen's comment on Orientation and Banquet:

Sitting below the elevated platform emphasized the fact that we were the lowly non-thinking freshmen. The administration handed down its usual line of choosing with discretion from the university grab-bag. Overprotected by our high school system, how could we manage unsteered by those of experience? Better get that 1966 Student Handbook!

Orientation definitely had covered up the realities of university life. Up until this time politics were pushed aside and the emphasis seemed to be on social life. We drifted along unquestioning MUSAK on the shores of academe.

Challenging the system angered some and pleased others, but at least all were stimulated — minds started ticking like they should have seven days earlier.

create and build

I feel that one of the basic ideals of University is to create and build, to guide individuals to formulate ideas of constructive change and progress in our society.

The Left Caucus gives the impression it is bent on destroying. Just as President Bissell seems to be bent on malletting the freedoms of our University.

With all our "learning" on how to constructively progress in our society it is unfortunate, more a catastrophe, that the Left Caucus, a "representative" student group, could only discuss intelligently how to "smash" our present system. Nothing could be easier than to give destructive criticism.

This group has failed to give any constructive ideas to correcting the situation. They only suggest abstract ideas of a "people's university". It is apparent that only chaos would follow should these people gain control.

I feel that;

1) The LC is using this weak link in the government of the University, i.e. the University Committee on Discipline, to gain political advantage on campus.

2) The discipline committee was biased in that the two students serving on the committee (from SAC) were LC members and not a true representative body from the University. Their resignation from the committee was a planned political manoeuvre to avoid rational discussion within the elected government.

3) Their disregard for freedom of speech, continual childish heckling, and violent actions (mob-like), such as wrestling over the use of the microphone give an idea of the methods of this group.

It is unfortunate that too many students feel that after SAC is elected, their (i.e. the students') political role in the University is ended.

It is this disregard of what is happening around the campus, ignorance of the facts, and the failure to express opinions, which are the elements of the catastrophe.

Students, in general, will probably not agree with the resolution of the use of "police" to suppress freedoms on campus (as Steven Langdon pointed out, a definite step backwards). But, the methods of the LC and their basic wish for fascist upheaval of the establishment must be peacefully suppressed.

Administrative threats of suppressing all academic freedom in the name of preserving academic freedom has been the first ominous step which has led many U.S. universities into the mire of police violence and atmospheres of fear and hatred. With the administration's de facto endorsement of the CPUO recommendations we stand on the edge of this mire. If the endorsement is not unequivocally revoked, everybody (barring the forces of reaction) stand to lose. Intimidation of pursuing almost all student causes is achieved by the endorsement, and faculty members will have to teach with the ghost of the club-wielding police behind the lectern. Surely differences among members of the U of T community are not so great as to prevent unity in the struggle for our university to repudiate these recommendations, and we call for a general participation in united action to this end.

Review of the Press:

STAR gazing for fun and profit

By LARRY HAIVEN

For those of us who had nothing better to do all summer, the daily crop of Toronto Star editorials has provided what can only be termed an educational experience.

Can the only daily in Toronto that holds a liberal viewpoint really face the nitty gritty? Will Peter Newman and his forums end student unemployment and poverty? What shocker will Page Six hold today?

We gasped when early in July they advocated revolution in Latin America. We choked when they all but demanded a sit-in over the PSA department at Simon Fraser University. And, when, earlier this month, they put down rock festivals and called for a renewal of youthful protest, we felt that the hills had moved and the mountains had skipped like rams.

Imagine, then, our dismay when we beheld the editorial of Monday, Sept. 22, entitled "Dear Freshman" addressed to the bewildered first year student who is apt to be turned into a raving building-burner "when the old slogan maker comes rapping seductively at (your) door."

Is this the dreaded backlash we've all been warned about? Is this a journalistic "first" heralding that backlash? Alas, no.

It's the Star's subtle way of pointing out all the biases, myths and misconceptions presently believed about the university and the nature of what can be called "student protest" (press term).

Let us read this piece, and, as we take inspiration from the dialectical questioning of the works of Chairman Mao, so let us derive true learning from a perusal of this aspect of the mass culture.

The tone is a surprisingly condescending one, not seen very often before in the Star, reminiscent of the last editorial in the Sunday New York Times. But then the basic premise is that the bewildered freshman is acting like a robot being manipulated by a misguided minority who are choking "the establishment" to death.

And so, tut, tut, "don't burn the schoolhouse down. Take the gasoline out of the coke bottle. Give the system another chance."

This presupposes fair play, that the system gives the freshman another chance. But the system has television, radio, the university and its authoritarian structures, business, government and the newspapers on its side. But then we all know the difference in appearance of an insidious television commercial and a bomb-throwing student.

Besides, how long has it been since you've seen anybody at U of T throwing a bomb?

Next the Star informs "you can be anybody you want to be". You can be Hugh Hefner. You can run for political office. "Ynu can be a full time actor, singer, dancer, cynic, idealist poet, philosopher, nihilist" etc. And to top it all off, you can be (yes you too can be...) an activist!!!

(Oh boy, I've always wanted to be an activist, grow long hair, wear buttons, disrupt meetings....)

Wait a minute, you can't do that! After all, there is the report of the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario which says you will no longer be in university if you try that. Go back ten spaces and miss a turn.

But there are lots of other groovy things that you can do while you're given the privilege of going to university (and the Star neglects to mention that many people can't go to university, not because of insufficient funds but because of insufficient education; but then they'll deal with that in another editorial.)

You have more leisure time than you'll ever have in your life (what ever happened to the great spectre of leisure time looming up in the future?)

Here's something that sounds exciting, "You may even get to rub minds with some of your professors". And even more breathtaking, "It is then up to you to cultivate them as you would hothouse flowers".

This lets the cat out of the bag. We now know that the Star is kidding. They've got to be kidding. They must be kidding, eh? Or is the Star admitting that things are that bad? Do we really have to pander to the people who are supposed to teach us. Is this real learning?

The whole thing is reminiscent of Genet's play, "The Balcony". In this play, while revolution and civil disorder are going on outside, there stands a whorehouse wherein every fantasy can be brought to life by the madam and her employees.

The prostitutes will play out any role with the patron. One patron wants to be a judge, another wishes to be a general, another a bishop. They pay and are served with their fantasy. Until the end, that is, when they are made to actually be the character they have pretended to be.

How clever to mix this literary reference with popular song references such as "they have taken away your name and given you a number," and "you (now) can be anybody you want to be." It could all be set to music.

The sarcasm and patronizing attitude becomes so thick near the end that it's hard as mud to wade through.

"Besides," it says, "if you do burn the old school house down, what will you do for an encore?"

How about building a new one?

And then the Star reminds us of that ominous sword of Damocles (ancient Gk. for "committee of presidents") that hangs above our heads ready to oust us from this comfortable nest, "an arbor far from the cares of the world where learned men gather to stimulate one another's mind with lofty thoughts, a hower safe for the world of ideas...."

They rub their hands in glee with the thought that the administration might get tough (it provides good copy).

(Bronislaw Chretien, 22, a third year, history student and member of the New Improved Leftist Faction, a radical group on campus, yesterday became the first student is so very skilled at doing (and the other papers to no lesser an extent.) They are producing hysteria.

They produced it by discovering poverty all of a sudden one Saturday.

They produced it by running a full page of pictures of "The Children of Cabbagetown", from a random collection of shots by somebody from outside.

They produced it by screaming that we will all be dead within twenty years from pollution and never telling us really how to get rid of pollution.

Hysteria is what we have here. It is the duty of every newspaper to create hysteria and if they do it well enough, they assume the role of "liberalism"; they take over the reins of a white charger and ride off into the sunset (or the sunrise if they are a morning paper.)

The editorial shows blatantly the dichotomy between theory and action, between thought and life, between education and the real world. Sure, these are slogans but the editorial says it more originally.

"The university as a stage is really quite small. You will not suffer greatly for mistakes in self-casting you make there."

They're right that the university is a small stage of action. But that contradicts the

You will be dragged into any one of a number of jobs, from reporting and taking pictures, to typing, using telephones, learning make-up and sharpening pencils. The Review, too, needs people.

Dear Freshman:

Don't burn the schoolhouse down. Not yet, anyway. Wait a couple of months, maybe even a couple of years.

University has just started and this is a bad time, we know. They have taken away your name and given you a number. You have been dropped in one end of the great sausage machine and no one knows what you'll look and think like when you come out the other end.

They are subdividing your mind and forcing your energy into narrow channels, to be suspended from the university in accordance with a ruling of the Committee of Presidents on Campus Order. Mr. Chretien was charged Wednesday night with disrupting a class and hindering the due process of University function.

When asked to comment, Mr. Chretien said, "Well, I don't know, moon, it's just like I wanted to go to the can. Everything happened so fast, I can't remember a thing." Later Mr. Chretien added, "Sh-t, my Dad's gonno kill me."

What the editorial reveals is many of the pat opinions that say yea to repression of all sorts in California, at SFU, at Sir George and finally here.

For the Star is doing what it fact that you are sheltered from the mean, cruel world when you are in university. Can one ignore what's going on outside?

Or as one cartoon puts it, "You never hear from that 90 percent of students, who are quiet, obedient, studious and don't give a damn about war, famine and fascism."

Don't burn the schoolhouse down. Not yet, anyway. Learn to understand the university, what makes it run, why you are there, who isn't there and who runs it. If you haven't answered these questions by the time you're finished, you'll have given "the system" all the chance it needs.

A GUIDE TO THE

BY ANDY WERNICK

(Andy Wernick is a political science graduate student and a member of the New Left Caucus)

The student left — as any student close to it will have realized — is not united. In fact, many students, frustrated enough by the university and society to begin organizing, must be genuinely confused by the plethora of warring factions on the left, who shove leaflets into their hands and beg attendance at meetings.

The history of the left, by the way, is not made in meetings. At first sight, left-wing groups all employ the same rhetoric. The differences between them often appear to be more theological than political.

Of course, if the left has no practice and engages in nothing but internal debate, it degenerates into a church of unimportant sects. And its theory becomes arid, dogmatic, and irrelevant.

Some groups are quite sectarian in their practice, and their theoretical level descends into the abyss of ecclesiastical Marxism.

But there are some essential differences between left-wing groups that amount to differences of strategy; they give different answers to the following major questions:

1. How is (American) imperialism going to be defeated?
2. How do we build socialism in Canada?
3. What kind of socialist society do we want to construct?
4. How should we operate on campus?

COMPLEX DISPUTES

The disputes are very complex — but it helps to be able to identify the major disputants. I am not interested in producing a kind of shopping-list, because we don't engage in supermarket politics. Practice alone determines what strategy is correct. Ultimately, the "correct" line is the one that makes a successful revolution.

Leaders lead: sects cast voodoo spells from the sidelines.

The following in no particular order, are the organized groups:

The Young Socialists: Trotskyist youth wing of the League for Socialist Action. The LSA is a Leninist vanguard party, which means it thinks of itself as the organization that will ultimately lead the revolutionary struggle in Canada. Definitely a concealed position to take given its strategy.

They support the NDP because "that is where the working class is" and keep up a pathetic struggle to take over the NDP by infiltration, a policy known as "entrism".

They have not yet "won the NDP to Socialism", partly because the NDP bureaucrats keep purging them.

On campus, the YS is psychotic — inhabiting the castles in the air that the LSA builds for it. The YS really believes that it is the student movement.

They are strategically always about 2 years behind the real movement. They now support student councils and try to run people for office (just when CUS as a left-wing vehicle is being smashed and the left is organizing off-campus).

Their strategy is roughly: (1) Build defence committees; (2) Organize bi-annual anti-war marches; (3) Sell the Young Socialist Forum.

Their slogans are always very liberal. In the anti-war movement, which they still dominate, they push the slogans: "End Canada's Complicity", "Peace Now" etc. instead of an open anti-imperialist position ("Smash Imperialism", "Victory to the Vietcong", "Independence for Quebec", "Canada for the Canadian people"). Although quite strong in the high schools, they have had more difficulty recruiting on campuses.

The Canadian Party of Labour: A young militant group, recruiting quite quickly, wanting to build a non-revisionist, non-Trotskyist vanguard party. Stalinist, vulgar Marxists. Dogmatic, but not sectarian. They do make principled alliances. They operate on campus, both under their own name, and under the name of the Worker-Student Alliance which is virtually their front-group on this campus.

They are completely anti-nationalist, and see the fight in Canada as anti-capitalist (workers vs bosses) rather than anti-imperialist (Canadian people vs the American Empire and its Canadian ruling-class lieutenants). For those who follow events in the States, they are very close to the U.S. Progressive Labour Party, which recently split from the S.D.S.

Their campus strategy can be summed up as:

- (1) Build a worker-student alliance (ongoing work of building organic links between militant students and militant workers, with the workers' struggles dominating the "alliance")

 (2) Fight authoritarianism in the university. This is thought to be somewhat subsidiary, and they really see the student struggle for democracy in the university and for a less oppressive educational system as very secondary to the class struggle — industrial workers vs the bosses. And somewhat divorced, in theory and practice, from

(3) Combat bourgeois ideas — intellectual contestation in the classroom, designed to win students to Marxism-Leninism through persuasion. This is a strategy bordering on the heresy known as Idealism — or "its all in your head".

They are very "straight" (short hair, no dope, etc.), and cannot understand concepts such as alienation except in a very narrow, non-cultural sense. CPLWSA was one-half of the split in last year's Toronto Student Movement.

Toronto Student Movement: The TSM no longer exists as an organization, having split this summer into 2 wings: The Worker-Student Alliance, and the New Left Caucus.

Although the split was serious and irrevocable, the two organizations agreed to cooperate where a principled alliance was possible. For example, WSA and NLC have put out a joint statement supporting the campus workers in their struggle to unionize in the face of Administration hostility. All that is left of TSM is a hundred red and black TSM buttons.

The "Internationalists" Everyone calls them and their interminable front-groups the "Internationalists", because that was their original name, which they have now dropped. In form they are Maoists, with front groups connected to a central vanguard Party (the Canadian Communist Movement).

Their student wing is called the Canadian Student Movement and each campus group is called the X Student Movement. However, other universities in Canada have a group called the X Student Movement also (e.g. the York Student Movement, and the Glendon Student Movement) which are not Internationalist front groups.

Very confusing. And of course, last year there was the TSM, whose name was proposed by an Internationalist.

On this campus, the Toronto Student Movement (unit of Canadian Student Movement) is Internationalist and last year's TSM no longer exists. (No, this is not a math problem!)

You can recognize Internationalists by their eyes: three-fourth of them are functionally insane. Their line is anti-imperialist — and yet they have little practise (so far) except hysterical verbal assaults against liberals, and members of the left (who are all denounced as "fascists", "hacks", "bourgeois-liberals", etc.)

Their Marxism is unbelievably mechanical, so much so that it is impossible to take them seriously as a political force. They are incapable of doing real mass work, and they expand by conversion.

Their style resembles that of the Moral Rearmament movement. The entire left, from NDP to CPL regards them as utterly lunatic. They also succeed in discrediting Marxism by reducing it to magical incantations. They have a Leader...

The Communist Party of Canada: Small, smashed during the Cold War, and slowly revivifying. Revisionist — peaceful transition to socialism through Parliament and peaceful coexistence with imperialism.

They toe the Soviet line — hence, they supported the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia. Very liberal in rhetoric, their attack on NATO and all the military apparatus of American imperialism is very muted. They unobtrusively ally with liberals, promoting pacifism ("Peace in Vietnam") and low-key campaigns for better housing etc.

They have some strength in the Labour Movement, where they promote independent Canadian unions and fairly militant political struggles against repressive anti-labour legislation (e.g. the Rand Report). In the U.S. they entered an alliance with the Black Panthers this summer, which many people thought did more damage to the Panthers' politics than it did good to that of the CP USA.

On campus they support a strong progressive student council, and help organize course unions. They do not see the creation of a strong mass militant revolutionary student movement as a priority, mainly because they are completely reformist in their outlook. They have few members and act in their own name (the U of T Communist)

The NDP /NDY: The NDP is not really on the left at all — as the career of the Manitoba NDP government should make obvious. Social-democratic socialism — conceived of as lots of little reforms and a better welfare system. The NDY in Canada, the NDP Youth wing, is much more left-wing, but is really tiny, and starved of funds by the parent organization.

The NDY on this campus does not exist as a political force, even though some student radicals are members. As an organization, the NDP/NDY is irrelevant to the left on this campus.

Women's Liberation Movement: A very militant, fast-growing socialist women's movement which organizes women workers and students around the oppression of women in capitalist society. They think women must organize autonomously, within the context of a socialist movement, if women's oppression is to be overcome.

The WLM split several months ago when a group of women in the Movement, who were anti-socialist, broke off to form the New Feminists. The NF, like purely feminist groups in the USA, see men as the enemy and want equality for women within the existing social structure. The WLM position is that liberation for women and men, sexually, culturally, socially, politically, economically, is impossible within the context of a capitalist society.

Historically, the WLM began in Canada in reaction to the oppressive role that women found themselves playing within the student movement. A continual problem within the movement is that the same bourgeois social relations which the movement was struggling against in Canadian society are reproduced within the movement.

WLM are operating a Birth Control Centre, organizing a Day Care Centre, building links with super-exploited women workers, fighting against the sexual exploitation, oppression, and objectification of women, and fighting against sexual discrimination of women students on campus. Many members of WLM are in the NLC, hardly anyone in WLM is in any other political organization.

The New Left Caucus: Militant, very fast-growing and centre-stage. The NLC has developed from one-half of last year's TSM. Visually, freaks with long hair. At the centre, a group of 20-50 students, trying to develop a collective style roughly along the lines of the Red Guards in the Chinese Cultural Revolution. You can recognize them also by their red arm bands, denim jackets, and "Struggle" buttons. Slogan — "All power to the people."

Developing an anti-imperialist, anti-capitalist perspective, but not attempting at this stage to do anything but build a mass, autonomous revolutionary student movement with a great emphasis on cultural revolution.

The NLC does not think students can make a revolution; ultimately, a successful revolutionary movement will have to be a bloc of workers (blue-collar, white-collar, and technical) farmers and students.

It does think that it is a priority for its members to organize within the university at this stage. Overall strategy, however, is very clearly a process of building alliances in order to unite the majority of the people against the owners and controllers of capital.

The NLC is the only political group which openly supports the WLM.

SIX PRINCIPLES

The Caucus accepts the following six principles:

- (1) build socialism in Canada;
- (2) support National Liberation for Canada, and the anti-imperialist struggle around the world;
- (3) reject the "parliamentary road" to socialism;
- (4) build an autonomous, revolutionary student movement;
- (5) support an autonomous women's liberation movement;
- (6) exclude from its ranks members of all existing Vanguard parties and movements (CP, YS, CSM, & CPL).

On campus, the NLC is developing an integrated attack on the form and content of capitalist education at the U of T, struggling against the repressive nature, and anti-democratic functions of capitalist education.

It celebrated its birth by contesting five orientation ceremonies last week. Each time it tried to force the Administration into answering the question, "Whom does the University serve?" Struggle will be taken right into the classroom, and the NLC is trying to build left caucuses in all major departments.

Battle with the administration has been joined, and the repression that had been prepared this summer is descending on the heads of all those students and student groups who are trying to organize in the university. Right now, the NLC is mounting a campaign against the new disciplinary procedures which the administration has concocted to suppress contestative politics.

NLC has links with similar groups on many campuses in Canada (the SDU'S AT Simon Fraser, Regina, and Alberta. The York Student Movement, Glendon Student Movement etc.) Out of these groupings a national student organization will probably emerge before the end of the year.

UC'S LEPAN RESIGNS

President Claude Bissell announced yesterday the resignation of Dr. Douglas LePan, principal of University College. LePan's resignation will take effect in June 1970.

The announcement comes only five days after the New Left Caucus interrupted his freshman orientation speech at Hart House.

LePan had been principal for six years. He attended U.C. as a student and graduated in English and History before going to Oxford to continue in English language and literature.

He began his teaching career as an instructor and tutor at Harvard in 1938. After an eight year interruption, including service in the Canadian Armed Forces, and the Department of External Affairs, he resumed teaching as professor of English literature at Queen's University.

LePan said that he was resigning in order to pursue, to a fuller extent, teaching and writing. He added that it is common for persons in administrative positions to resign after five and seven year periods and that in the last six years a great deal more than half of his time had been spent on administrative tasks.

When asked whether his resignation was influenced by the actions of the NLC and how he considered their behaviour he said, "I had no comment before and I still have no comment."

Dr. LePan will continue in the next school year as a University Professor, a position which enables him to teach in areas of his own choice.

At Victoria College J. E. Hodgetts was appointed president yesterday to replace A. B. B. Moore.

Hodgetts has been principal of Victoria for two years.

The Great Radical Conspiracy: New College Episode

By MICHAEL KAUFMAN

(Michael Kaufman is a first year Arts student at New College.)

Two hundred and fifty smiling members of the men's residence of New College shuffled into the Whetmore Hall Dining Room, on Monday night, for the Whetmore Hall Welcome Dinner. Half of them, freshmen clad in new suits, were indistinguishable from the other half, except for the residence radicals who wore turtle-necks instead of a shirt and tie with their suits. Two things were on everybody's minds; that the food would be better than usual, and what time would the New Left Caucus show up?

When we sat down, Joe at the next table was talking about racing go-carts, as he continued to do throughout most of the meal. The talk at our table centered around food, and how exciting it was to be going to university, despite the fact that half of them had waited in line for hours before they could get in.

All of a sudden Bob, who had been staring at his thoroughly cooked chicken for about five minutes, said he thought that the principal of University College had handled himself pretty well last Thursday at the U.C. freshman banquet. This turned Joe momentarily away from his go-carts to comment that it was a shame that the radicals had taken away his right to free speech.

Although Bob and Joe used some pretty impressive logic to hack up their ideas, we entered a conversation that revealed that most of them were scared of the radical and especially the pro-communist groups on campus. This led to talk of U.S. exploitation of Canada, to which Benjamin, sitting next to us, frankly said: "The guys who pay the fare, decide the way." That seemed fair enough to most of them, so they just turned back to their chicken.

The conversation was dead until the melted icecream course. Even then it was limited to Clyde's one liner: "Would you really like to go to a university where the students had rioted and now were running the school?"

Dean Kurtz tapped on a glass, stood up, and started introducing the people at the head table. About a quarter of the way along, the friends of one of the two students at the table started hissing when he was introduced, instead of the usual clapping. Everyone at the head table was stunned; Dr. Ivey's jaw dropped. The radicals had come.

Whether they actually came is still a mystery. If they did, they must have stayed quiet so as not to confront Dr. Ivey, who said in a short address that the people in the hall were lucky because they were living in the CONFINES of an academic group, and Dean Kurtz, who came out with: "I trust some students in some situations and distrust others."

What can you say to a clever statement like that?

Unionizing on campus means long hassles

The tone of aggressiveness underlying the CUPE brief has a basis in the bitterness of the struggle for unionization at U of T.

The brief complains that the university was able to stall off CUPE's certification as the bargaining agent for library workers from April 27, 1987, when the first Ontario Labour Relations Board hearing took place, to the issuance of the certification on June 27, 1988.

According to the brief, "it represents the longest period for an application for certification by CUPE in Ontario."

The university went through two sets of legal consultants in pressing its claim that the library workers were an inappropriate bargaining unit, arguing that it should consist of all 1850 office and technical employees.

In all, there were 30 meetings with the OLRB Examiner. The brief also comments on "the fears that the employees now have that the university will carry out reprisals against employees who try to form a union," in calling for an end to the University's "negative role" in labour relations.

A collective agreement for the library workers, which the union must obtain within a year of certification to retain its status, is now being negotiated.

Other unions have faced similar difficulties organizing on campus.

The Service Employees International Union, which already represents approximately 350 University maintenance workers, won certification and a two-year agreement for Trinity College workers on July 1.

None of the other Federated Colleges are unionized. The Services Union bargaining committee signed a memorandum of agreement for its University employees on Saturday after four months of negotiations.

It will be presented to the membership for ratification on Friday.

In all, only about 20 per cent of the 4000 university and federated college employees are unionized.

CUPE, which organized the SAC office staff as well as the library staff this summer matches the Services Union campus membership of almost 400.

The other seven campus unions range from the International Union of Operating Engineers with 50 members, through 40 Plant Guard Workers of America (U of T policemen), 18 carpenters, 10 electricians, 9 plumbers, 7 machinists and 2 sheet metal workers.

general debate on it by the student body.

The move to unionize was made by the SAC employees last spring, and 100 per cent signed in favor of joining CUPE. The Voluntary Recognition Form was signed by last year's executive, and the SAC workers were legally recognized by CUPE at local 1222 in 1986.

It was started by Bob Vernon, the SAC Law representative elected by CUPE at local 1222 in 1986.

UNION SEEKS END TO INFERIOR STATUS FOR NON-ACADEMIC STAFF members on the campus, has been trying with little success to organize college employees, and there is a possibility of jurisdictional battles in the future.

Albert Hearn, International Vice-President of the BSEU, in an interview disputed the characterization of the small craft union locals as "weak."

"If they consider them weak, they should look at the results. The small trade groups all get the international unionization."

Unionized U. of T. cleaners earn only $2.29 per hour compared with $2.80 at Windsor U., $2.82 at Brock and $3.00 at the Toronto Board of Education.

The tone of the brief, however, carries beyond demands for better wages and union recognition. "Employees," CUPE says, want to feel that they are respected as individuals and are no longer prepared to be looked upon as numbers, to be pushed about in an arbitrary and authoritarian manner.

"The staff feels separated and alienated from mainstream of university life."

CUPE feels their participation in discussions on the purpose of the university would offer a way out of "the remoteness of the academic from the real world and its real social problems."

The brief emphasizes the need for employee participation in all functions of the university.

Besides an effective voice on decision-making bodies, the brief calls for an orientation and continuing educational program for all university employees.

"The academic screen," which keeps children from poorer families out of university, is cited as a reason for free tuition, special courses, and less stringent entrance requirements for university staff and their dependents as a precursor to their availability to all of the underprivileged.

CUPE also recommends that all university facilities, including the library, Hart House and the Faculty Club, be open to all workers.

The brief confines its University Government recommendations to expressing "abhorrence" at a

By LOUIS ERLICHMAN
A campus union has called for an end to the "inferior, second-class" status university employees.

In a brief to the Commission on University Government, the Canadian Union of Public Employees recommends that workers be given a position of equality with students and faculty and "say in the day-to-day decisions affecting their lives."

The brief's advocacy of one all-encompassing campus union (i.e., CUPE) may, however, lead to considerable inter-union conflict on campus, possibly acting as a prod to union militancy.

The brief, written by CUPE research director Gill Levine, asks for 50 per cent representation on committees dealing with conditions of employment, effective (perhaps 10 per cent) representation on a single-tiered university governing body, free tuition, special courses and admission requirements for staff members and their dependents, and the development in the university of "a model form of labour management relations."

CUPE is most emphatic in pressing the university to greater acceptance of unions and collective bargaining.

It says, "The University should become a model with which to educate both staff and students towards a humanistic approach in labour relations."

The union, which just won a two-year fight this summer to be certified as the bargaining agent for 350 non-professional library workers, bitterly brands the university administration as "an anti-union employer of the worse anti-union employer of the worse kind."

The working conditions of university employees are compared unfavourably with those in other public institutions, as well as in other universities.

Simon Fraser students vote to strike — BURNABY, (CUP) — Eleventh Hour intervention by the Canadian Association of University Teachers has delayed until at least Wednesday the possibility of a strike within Simon Fraser University's departments of Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology.

At a mass meeting Monday, the students and faculty of the department voted overwhelmingly to open direct negotiations with the administration over the current crisis, based on an oral suggestion made by CAUT president William Allen to former PSA chairman Mordecai Briemberg.

But if the administration has not shown any sign that it is willing to negotiate by noon today, PSA members also voted overwhelmingly that the department should immediately begin a strike and Teach-in on democratization of the university.

So far, the administration has refused to negotiate with the department at all.

The proposal by Allen followed a statement made Friday, proposing a three point plan for cooling off the strike at SFU, which included the investigation of the relationship between PSA and the university, and then setting up an independent board of appeal for the eleven professors who were fired, demoted or placed on probation by the SFU administration.

At the meeting Monday, seven hundred out of the eight hundred PSA members agreed to consider the CAUT proposal in direct negotiations about the issues involved in the PSA con-

Frank Kitchen, a CUPE National Representative, denied that there would be any conflict with

If the administration does not show its willingness to engage in direct negotiation as specified, by appointing an administrative negotiating committee, then a PSA strike and teach-in on democratization will begin.

"We wish indicated yet again very clearly that if a negotiated settlement is not achieved it will be because of the administration's complete unwillingness to negotiate under what are the broadest terms," the department said.

Only 22 persons opposed the motion, with a further nineteen abstaining.

In a pamphlet distributed at the meeting, PSA members explained their strategy if the administration forced a strike:

"A strike of the PSA department would be quite different from the normal conception of a strike in an industrial plant," they said.

"What we are attempting to do is not grind the wheels of production to a halt but rather to collectively express our opposition to the administration's efforts to destroy our department."

"A strike seen in this way is a highly effective means of protesting and a very flexible instrument of mass action. All those who support us can become involved in various degrees and on various levels."

"Those who are unwilling initially to support us will have the opportunity to become involved as they come to understand our position."

"The administration is attacking the PSA department as a whole," they said, "and the philosophy of critical studies, democratization and community involvement which the department represents."

"We must fight to reverse the political firing of PSA faculty, to halt any attempt to abolish or restrict student participation and to lift the trusteeship over our department."

But there is considerable doubt, in an effort to stop the ratification by SAC on Wednesday.

At this point SAC management is obliged to bargain, and a negotiating team consisting of three members from each side, approved the contract.

So far, no officially recognized meeting of the student council has debated the issue because the summer session lacked a quorum. The delay tactics used by the anti-unionists, besides the petition, took the form of walkouts to destroy the quorum, and were aimed at blocking the ratification of the contract before the student body is consulted.

Over the past few years, partly because both the SAC executive and many of the staff are students the relationship has been very democratic.

This blurring of the lines between labour and management has led to a very good working relationship. The contract will therefore simply institutionalize the existing procedures.

If the decision does come to a referendum (and the petition needs 2000 signatures to block the standard Council ratification on Wednesday) the vote is not to decide whether or not the SAC employees can unionize — Local 1222 is already in existence — but on whether or not this particular contract will be accepted without amendment.

A rejection of the contract requires that it be amended and then approved by the employees, before it is sent back to the student body for acceptance.

During the summer SAC president Gus Abols said: "I wouldn't want to go back to the voters and say 'Listen, guys, we're not in control of what the office does anymore.' So far, it has been pretty democratic, but we always knew where the ultimate power would be" (with the SAC executive).

Abols objects to some of the broadly phrased clauses of the contract, specifically, one which has to do with "technological and other changes" whereby employees must accept any change which affects the rights of the workers. In his view, this could mean anything from dismissal of employees to the colour of the paint in the office.

But there is considerable doubt, in an effort to stop the ratification by SAC on Wednesday.

Student 'pacifiers' at York

TORONTO (CUP) — Harry Crowe, dean of York University's Atkinson College, has been challenged to explain a secret meeting he called Monday night (Sept. 15) to recruit 40 students as "pacifiers" during freshmen orientation ceremonies.

Mrs. Pearl Chud, vice-president of the Atkinson student council, charged Tuesday that the meeting of selected council members was called "to get 30 or 40 senior students to act as ushers at orientation meetings so they wouldn't have any outbreak of violence... or disruption."

Last Thursday (September 11) members of the York Student Movement disrupted a teach-in featuring York dean of arts John Saywell and Liberal MP Philip Givens. The YSM challenged Saywell and Givens to justify the connection between the university and corporations set up exclusively for private profit, and the special treatment given corporations by governments.

The college apparently hoped to avoid further disruption by radicals by using 40 students as "pacifiers," Mrs. Chud said. There were no incidents during this week's orientation exercises.

Interviewed Tuesday (September 16) Crowe said there had been no meetings or formal discussions regarding a plan for dealing with potential disruptors. Later that day he admitted that such a meeting had been held, adding that the ushers were intended as "pacifiers," in case of trouble.

On Tuesday morning Bill Farr, secretary of the university warned the YSM that they might be physically assaulted if they tried to challenge speakers.

Mrs. Chud, a strong critic of Crowe's belief that the only relationship between a faculty member and student is that of a master and apprentice, said she was not invited to the meeting because "They felt that male students would suit the purpose better."

The Students' Administrative Council will hold its first meeting of the term in the West Hall of UC tonight at 7 p.m.

After two unsuccessful summer meetings (the first one lacked a quorum, the second one dissolved in chaos) there are minutes of 18 summer meetings of the executive to be ratified.

Other major business is agreement on the union contract for SAC employees.

The major discussion will focus on the statement issued by the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario last Saturday by President Bissell, and the CAPUT statement issued yesterday.

The decisions to present Bissell with a demand to retract his statements and to withdraw student members from the committee to reconstitute CAPUT were made by the SAC executive, not the whole body of SAC.

Georgia Straight may fold

Since many of the Straight's writers have been convicted on drug and minor city by-law charges, the probation would hamper McLeod's ability to edit the paper.

Similar charges against managing editor Bob Cummings were dropped for lack of evidence.

McLeod said before the trial that a stiff fine could finish the paper, and defence counsel John Laxton said at the trial that anything over $500 could put it in "serious financial difficulties."

There was never any question in Thursday's trial that the crown's star witness, Penelope York had any intention of planting the drug after she read the article, entitled "Plant Your Seeds," in the March 28 edition of the Straight.

She said she thought never

SAC MEETS TONIGHT

The Students' Administrative Council will hold its first meeting of the term in the West Hall of UC tonight at 7 p.m.

After two unsuccessful summer meetings (the first one lacked a quorum, the second one dissolved in chaos) there are minutes of 18 summer meetings of the executive to be ratified.

Other major business is agreement on the union contract for SAC employees.

The major discussion will focus on the statement issued by the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario last Saturday by President Bissell, and the CAPUT statement issued yesterday.

The decisions to present Bissell with a demand to retract his statements and to withdraw student members from the committee to reconstitute CAPUT were made by the SAC executive, not the whole body of SAC.

Wondering how SAC spent your summer? Read this

A union contract which would give Students Administrative Council employees more say in running their office has not yet been ratified by the SAC.

The Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) was certified as the bargaining agent of some 20 SAC staffers in May. Each of two summer business meetings were to vote on the contract. But the failure to have a quorum for the vote leaves ratification to the first SAC meeting of the academic year, scheduled for September 24.

The CUPE contract is considered by some members of both SAC executive and staff as a model contract because it encourages office democracy.

It is partly aimed at giving CUPE a foothold on campus, from which it could organize other U of T employees, such as library staff.

But SAC President Gus Abols feels the present contract gives staff too much control over the office, though staff is not responsible to an electorate, as is the executive. Mr. Abols consulted the SAC's law firm, Osler, Harcourt and Hoskin, which agreed with this estimation.

A lawyer consulted by SAC Vice-President, Bob Barkwell, disagreed. Former SAC president and civil rights lawyer Vince Kelly considers the contract valuable.

Some important aspects of the 43-page contract are: frequent consultation between the SAC executive and its employees, in which both could make suggestions, an intricate dismissal and promotion procedure and notification to the union of impending technological changes, prior to their implementation. There is also paid maternity or paternity leave, not subject to loss of seniority.

Another clause allows SAC employees, Local 1222 of CUPE to refuse to violate picket-lines of other CUPE members. If CUPE organizes U of T employees, this clause becomes important.

Another principal concern of the SAC this summer was the enforcement of campus discipline.

Other SAC business this summer included:

- A SAC speed-reading program for 150 people being organized for the coming academic year.

- A Teach-in on university structures and education is a likely prospect for the fall. The SAC will be involved in the organization of the Teach-in, which will deal mainly with the CUG report.

- Several SAC people joined Ryerson and York students on the picket line of the Steelworkers union, which struck Scarborough's Allanson plant in July to obtain a first contract. Students opposed the scabbing of 30-60 other students at the plant. It has been SAC policy for some time to condemn student scabbing.

- SAC incorporation has been delayed once again. The principal aim of incorporation, which has been underway for several years, is to give the SAC financial independence from the university. The University of Saskatchewan's administration refused to collect student council fees this year, in order to obtain endorsement of the student paper.

Is reading a (bad) habit, is reading a skill, or is reading a thinking process?

YES!

skill?

Of course. You were taught to read in Kindergarten and Grade 1. Poorly, perhaps, because you ended up reading 200-300 words per minute—the same as your parents, and grandparents. Word by word, and hearing many words in the process. Techniques discovered by Evelyn Wood make it possible to teach reading with better speed, comprehension, and retention than it was possible when you were in Grade 1. You have the potential to read at least three times faster. Why don't you?

You have been reading every day of your life since Grade School. Small wonder it's now a bad habit. There is no gimmick, no machine that will break this habit for you. That's why the Reading Dynamics course is taught using books, papers, and magazines, and why your practice uses books of your own choosing. You begin immediately to make this skill a habit in your daily reading. How much time will you spend reading in the next ten years? Far more than you have to?

thinking process?

As you read, you think. Analyze. Remember. Relate. Question. Probe. Reject. You may do more than this, or less. Reading is thinking, comprehending, remembering. Your speed is now limited by the way in which you were taught, not by the complexity of the material. Reading Dynamics shows you how to extend your range of reading skills dramatically. Fast readers get better comprehension and retention. They can grasp the whole while seeing all the words. Because they can read a book in an evening, it is more cohesive and more easily remembered. You could read as fast as you think. Think about it.

What did you learn in school today?

By CETA RAMKHALAWAN-SINGH

12 noon Room 135 the Old Physics Building — it is really in awful shape.

Political Science 101 was a bloody bore.

I walked in a few minutes late and a song and dance act was going on down on the stage below to make the freshmen happy and to help them forget how goddam boring it all was.

He was amusing because he was making an idiot out of himself and at the same time making a mockery of education.

It really did not matter if I stayed or not because the lecture, which ended precisely fifty minutes after it started, was devoid of any relevant content.

Prof. Thorson did say that poli-sci was a "grab bag of things", which is to say that poli sci is not at all relevant to what is happening in the political world — it does not explain anything.

He went on to psychoanalyse all student radicals. He said that the root of student dissidence is basically a result of father hatred. (But I love my father and my mother, Prof. Thorson.)

He went on to say that if the 'father' was successful, powerful, dominant and difficult to compete with, then he would be typical of the fathers of student radicals.

Prof. Thorson drew an analogy at this point between the university and the 'father' saying that because the student radical could not vent his rage upon the 'father' he did so upon a public object. He also said that they were going through a reality testing process like a six or seven year old kid.

Politics, according to Thorson, had to be understood psychologically. He also talked about Lincoln, saying that it was because Lincoln was so ugly he was motivated to aspire to great heights which would displace his gawkiness. Hence he could then vent his rage through his powerful personality onto public objects.

But I don't see the connection between Lincoln's motivation and student radicals motivation, perhaps there is none, especially in the psychoanalytical way that Thorson mentioned.

Student radicals believe that people should have some effective control over the decisions which affect them. Lincoln was trying to democratize various processes also.

At that point we launched into a discussion, or rather Thorson launched into a monologue about the US political and electoral system. He said that no majorities were real, that they were all built in by the electoral laws. But he never talked about who built in those electoral laws or why they were built in.

He also said that the electoral college inflated majorities and that it failed several times the last time being in 1820 with Andrew Jackson.

He said that Kennedy's margin was not very large and neither was Nixon's, but that the electoral college merely made it seem more of a majority than it was. But Thorson never mentioned how and by whom and why this system was set up. He talked about the system being "rigged" so that someone always wins but Thorson never talked about who rigs the system.

He even postulated a situation where everyone was given the opportunity to vote. But he envisioned that it would work out in such a manner that anyone who wanted to, would get on onto a bandwagon and start campaigning and he questioned what might happen if none of them got more than ten per cent of the vote.

By this stage of the game Thorson had done all the talking and the spurts of facts and evil thing for the U.S. to support a militaristic regime." But nothing followed that comment up — students did not understand what he meant but were scared to talk or perhaps they had stopped listening.

Then, getting onto his psychoanalytical wagon again later on, he said that politics was really a farce and that a lot of people get their psychological jollies out of politics.

At that point he started to talk about approaching the course in terms of human evolution and later proceeded to give a reading list on which two of the five books were his own.

After the class I talked to a few first year students, all of whom were very angry at what went on in the room. But they did not think that they could do anything about it and they even said — and this is only after one lecture and the first day of school at that — that they did not think that they would go to anymore of those classes.

After experiencing that class the people to whom I spoke were able to understand the various things that have been happening on campus these last few days and the anger which radicals feel.

What did you learn in school today is a column which tries to get at what's going on in the university's lecture halls and seminar rooms. Readers are invited to submit articles for publication under this heading.

figures and nice-sounding ideas had already put him in a power position and a knowledgeable position is a damned powerful one at that.

He kept talking in terms of the U.S. all the time and I doubt that the existence of Canada was even mentioned, but then of course Trudeau himself said that Canada is only 15% independent from the U.S.

He kept throwing out goodies like "people think that it is an

The Students' Administrative Council will be asked to subsidize a novel project in social work at its meeting to-night.

The Varsity Downtown Education Project is "the first long-term involvement of the university community in the problem areas of Toronto's inner city", explains VDEP project director, Jean Golden. Miss Golden, an articulate 23-year-old working toward her M.A. in sociology, will be asking for $10,000 at the meeting.

VDEP is an experiment in generating community education and organization in "slum" areas, begun in 1967 by twenty-four young people affiliated in various ways with the U of T.

The summer of 1967 was spent in training staff and having them work through established institutions, such as the St. Christopher's Settlement House. VDEP's aim is to work out a two-way learning situation between the staff (from varying academic backgrounds but experienced in children's education), and the children of such "culturally deprived" areas as Trefann Court.

ATMOSPHERE

The provision of a "nice"

atmosphere in the nine-to-four environment of any school, or of a summer camp outside the city and attended by children from various areas for a few weeks, does little to change the environment to which the child returns, feels VDEP staffer Ron Weihs, an English graduate who worked at such a camp last summer. Intensive sessions with a child are valuable, but limited. But to bring the child further than either institution "requires an alteration of the subculture".

"We want these people to change their way of life so that it will not take the self-destructive form that is so common in the area." It's hard to get out of the closed circle that is the poverty cycle because our society produces few self-directed people. And it takes a strong individual to alter his way of life.

"Successful projects (like a street dance organized from the local tavern) build the confidence needed to influence one's life, and subsequently one's neighbourhood", Weihs said. Discussion of common problems may lead to organization against unfair rental practices, for example. The point is to encourage people to organize what they want to, without making value judgments. Weihs has moved into the Dundas-Jarvis area, and gets to know neighbours over shuffleboard games at the tavern.

IDENTITY

The area in which he is working has no community identification as yet, other than a sense of itself as a red-light district. There is a large transient population. The identification which exists revolves around the Duke of York School, and this immediately excludes non-parents.

One of the two concrete projects initiated by VDEP is a community centre lodged in a house on George Street, across from the school. The house was open to all residents seven days a week during the summer. Its program focused on children.

The house was successful in that many kids came. Rooms were set up for art, drama, science, 'shop' and reading. "We tried to leave it as unregulated as possible" says Weihs. The sixteen full-time staffers worked eight-hour shifts and "the stress was great because of the emotional impact of all that happened".

Unfortunately, hostility was incurred, for example, by not consulting the local Chinese church before moving in. Some VDEP staff members were "long haired freaks" to the residents. (Ron Weihs has since cut his hair.)

SAC signed the lease this week for a different house on George Street. A resident parent wants to help the two VDEP staffers organize a quiet homework room for his children and their friends. Some teen-age girls want a cooking class and Ron would like to see one of the local members teach it. Other projects expected to be working by November include guitar lessons and a boxing club.

PRIVATE SCHOOL

The other principal VDEP project is a private school in Trefann Court called Laneway. It has run out of money but somehow manages to operate with ten children and four staff members. It began this summer because some mothers wanted a summer program for children who had been in Board of Education "opportunity classes" — for children with low I.Q. Some of these children were too bright for even the best opportunity classes at the Park School, says Daryl Leberg, a U of T anthropology graduate. She worked with ten kids aged seven to seventeen, one a sixteen-year-old who graduated in "muffin-making".

LANEWAY

Six mothers, furious about the dead-end towards which their kids were heading, spoke to the school and the Board of Education with little result.

What brought them together was a feeling that there could not be so many slow learners in the small area that is Trefann, explains another VDEP staffer. The mothers suggested last April that VDEP try to establish a real "opportunity class". The Trefann Court Residents' Association donated a house, replete with leaky roof and only cold water. "This became Laneway.

"What we saw was sad. It made us angry," says one of the four permanent staff at the school. An eight-year-old who after ten minutes was taught to write her name; illiterate children who had been condemned stupid through long years in school until they themselves believed it.

According to Ron Weihs, such children lack the self-confidence necessary to the "learning process"; they can't tolerate frustration, they can't pretend, they can't concentrate. They can't follow rules; they can't sit still in a classroom. They lack the inner security to develop self-expression.

To the delight of the staff, one of the children at Laneway recently wrote a badly-spelled letter — to Mayor Dennison, protesting the threatened expropriation of her home.

One of the mothers, Mrs. Noreen Gaudette, is running for school trustee, to improve communication between the Board and the parents. She and the other mothers whose children are at Laneway evaluate the staff, and their assistance is cross-evaluated. The community identity, which has existed for some time, is being reflected in concrete changes in some residents' control over their own lives.

FUND DRIVE

Laneway and the St. George house have an operating budget of $26,000 — equipment for the two houses, and salaries for six staff.

VDEP is normally reluctant to seek publicity, fearing the unintentional bias of patronizing sympathizers who speak of "underprivileged kids having the time of their lives". However, it is currently conducting a campaign to raise necessary funds from wealthy businessmen. The Varsity Fund has given VDEP $20,000 over the past two years, and is now helping with the campaign.

SAC contributed $5,000 last year and $2,500 the year before. It is now being asked for $10,000.

The monthly salary of $300 for each of the six staffers cannot be paid, as the $600 left from last year's budget will go toward rent on the George Street house, Miss Golden told the SAC executive last night.

"If we support these people, we would be supporting our own democratic rhetoric", SAC Vice-President Bob Barkwell had told a summer SAC meeting.

Newly-independent GSU may lose OISE students

By TOM WALKOM

Fragmentation may face the Graduate Students Union.

In an open letter to GSU president Michael Vaughan, the Graduate Students Association of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education has demanded independent status as an affiliate member of the larger union.

The alternative, states GSA president Bruce Rusk, is withdrawal of the 400 OISE students entirely from the GSU. If such an example were followed by other course unions, Rusk continues, this "could possibly mean the destruction of the GSU".

The squabble arises from the special relationship between OISE and the University of Toronto.

The Institute, now housed in a Bloor high-rise, grants its own degrees, but is affiliated with the U of T. Its students are to enjoy "all the privileges and responsibilities" of the graduate student. Up to now this has included compulsory payment of the GSU fees ($5 for a part-time, $10 for a full time student.)

A meeting of the GSU in late July turned down the request for affiliate status, apparently on the stated principle that OISE students were just ordinary members of the university.

According to Rusk, this is not so. Two-thirds of his students have no connection with the university. Most are married and already working in the field of education.

The $7,000 in fees collected from OISE are used mainly for recreational and social purposes — wine and cheese parties — useful, in Rusk's words, "only to two or three."

"True," said Rusk in a telephone interview, "the GSU has done research on Teaching Assistants. Yet at OISE there are very few teaching assistants, mainly research assistants to whom the GSU work does not relate."

The GSA, Rusk felt, could better use money to finance student participation in departmental affairs, a monthly newsletter, special programs for foreign students (one-quarter of the enrollment), and educational conferences.

Students serve 'real' society

Students must take a greater responsibility in providing for themselves the kinds of experiences which they see as important to the fulfillment of their own goals, according to a volunteer worker at the University Settlement House.

The USH, located between Beverley and McCaul Streets, behind the Art Gallery of Ontario, is a university social agency.

The people it serves are poor. Their social activity is limited. It is the USH which must serve as their social outlet.

The USH has two full-time workers on its staff. But the bulk of work done by the USH is done by volunteers. They come from all segments of life, but the majority are from the university student body.

Chris Poulter, a volunteer at USH last year, sees her work as a necessary extension of her studies at university: "I see the involvement in the real society which exists outside the boundaries of the university, as imperative."

The success of the entire project depends largely on the staff that runs it. To be adequately staffed, USH requires 60 volunteers to work at least once a week.

Some volunteers teach physical education, arts and crafts and music. Others supervise club meetings. Others help organize the various programs for the different groups.

Information is available from the USH at 23 Grange Rd., phone number 921-2320.

Harvard will set up its own CUG committee

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (CUP) — Harvard University announced last Thursday that it would name a committee composed of students, faculty alumni and trustees to recommend proposals for changing the structure of the university.

The decision followed a report by the Harvard Overseers (trustees) which found students and many professors unhappy over the quality and relevance of the university's teaching.

Citing the Vietnam war, racism and social injustice as primary causes for student unrest, the report declared, "the students' faith in the university as a teaching institution has been undermined by absences of senior professors, the impersonality of some of the instructional processes, and the narrow abstract and technical mode in which the intellectual concerns of the faculty are sometimes expressed."

The students, the report says, "feel a great pressure to do everything presently in their power to force reason and humanity on a world which they think in many ways to be inhumane and senseless, and they in turn ask the university to do likewise."

The report was approved in principle Friday by the 30-member board of overseers.

Students charge Ryerson fakes plans

Two former student representatives to Ryerson Polytechnical Institute's board of governors charged Monday night that the board was trying to hoodwink City Council by preparing a fake expansion plan for the school for presentation to the council.

Richard Finlay, 22, and Gordon Jackson, 23 made public a confidential, administration memo which said that two plans had been drawn up — one real and one fake. Administration vice-president B. W. Power sent the memo last March to president F. C. Jorgenson, who has since left the school.

Mr. Power expressed regret that he had used the "unfortunate expression", a "fake" plan.

"The terms only have meaning among ourselves," he said.

The memo mentions two plans: a long range Plan A, dealing with future land acquisition; and Plan B, dealing with land Ryerson already owns and wishes to have rezoned.

Power's reason for two plans was that the publication of the larger Plan A would result in a rise in the cost of land which the school wishes to purchase. There had been no attempt to gain financial advantage for anyone on the board, Power insisted.

Acting president Anthony Wilkinson also denied the charge that the board was trying to deceive City council. Toronto planning commissioner Dennis Barker, who said he had seen both plans, agreed with him.

Wilkinson expressed surprise that the two former student representatives had even seen the memo.

"There were only three copies of the memo and none belonged to either of them," he said.

FILES

In addition to the "phony" expansion plan charge, Finlay and Jackson said they had files to show:

- Ryerson paid former principal Howard Kerr, a full salary for 14 months after he had resigned in June, 1966. He was on the payroll on a consulting basis while he also held a part-time job as chairman of the Council of Regents of the Community Colleges. At the latter job, he earned $5,000 a year, while earning over $1,500 a month at Ryerson.

BISSELL RE-WRITING

U of T President Claude Bissell postponed his welcoming address to freshmen Monday to rewrite his speech.

In a statement released by the Department of Information Monday, Bissell said: "I want to deal in greater detail and at substantial length with the problems facing the university at this time."

The statement did not say when the speech would be delivered.

Toronto boycotts could determine fate of grape workers this fall

By JUNE MCNAMEE

Negotiations to settle the four-year-old grape workers strike in California broke off this summer when workers demanded protection from the indiscriminate use of pesticides, a grape boycott organizer said yesterday.

Marshall Ganz, a United Farm Workers representative, said that when workers tried to examine records of the chemicals used they were halted within an hour by a court injunction.

Ganz is in Toronto to draw attention to the attempted boycott of California grapes, which he says is the last hope of the 400,000 workers.

"We're down to the nitty-gritty now", he says. "September and October are peak months for the growers. They're holding back shipments, waiting for the chain stores to break and then they'll flood the market. We really have to put the heat on."

"If we lose the chain stores now, we've lost four years of fighting," Ganz says. "If we maintain what we have now, this winter may see a successful conclusion of the strike."

According to Ganz, Toronto's boycott of California grapes has been a partial success. Before the strike Toronto was the third largest market in North America. Today it's number fourteen — with a third of the $20 million Canadians spend yearly on grapes going south of the border.

The Delano strikers are demanding a minimum hourly wage at all seasons of the year, sanitary working conditions, a seniority system to protect workers of long standing, and stewards to represent workers.

Wages were $1.10 an hour when the Delano workers went on strike in 1965. Today some growers are paying $1.50, but workers have no unemployment insurance.

Organizers of the Toronto boycott say they plan a week-end fast prior to Thanksgiving to help publicize the plight of the workers. It will probably be held in front of a chain store which does not recognize the boycott, or at a store manager's home. Jim Brophy, coordinator of the boycott on the U of T campus, says Food City and A&P are the "prime targets".

must persevere before evil met and conquered

By GEOFF MEGGS

Late last March D'Arcy Martin consulted the I Ching, a book of Chinese wisdom, in an attempt to determine what fate had in store for the Commission on University Government.

Success was assured, the oracle told student commission member Martin, with "joint forbearance and perseverance" but September would see a reversal of the situation unless evil was "met and conquered."

After more than 10 months of discussion and preparation CUG's report will be published Friday, Oct. 24.

President Claude Bissell, who will sign the report before its presentation to the Board of Governors and ultimately the Ontario Legislature, has predicted it will "have a profound effect on the academic structure of the entire university community of Canada."

No one with any connection with the university will be immune from CUG's influence. One month before publication, it is certain that the CUG report will recommend a radically different and unique governing structure for U of T, based on philosophical principles determined after weeks of painstaking discussion.

Student CUG member Bob Rae, a Rhodes Scholar now at Oxford, peers down the Senate chamber table at his fellow commissioners.

During the long months of meetings, often as many as five a week, the members of the commission certainly persevered.

In a recent interview, student member Bob Rae said "there was no machination on the outside, there was never an attempt on the part of one of the members to say things outside they weren't prepared to say inside." Many problems were discussed repeatedly until a consensus was reached.

However, the commission's conception and final delivery were not so good-natured or deliberate.

In August of last year the Board of Governors, on the recommendation of the President's Council, authorized the establishment of a commission "to study the structure and government of the University of Toronto."

Although the board hoped for a nine-member commission with only two students, it was forced to compromise with the Students' Administrative Council on a composition of four students, four faculty, the president, two non-voting board representatives and an alumni representative.

SAC's success in obtaining a weighty influence on the commission will probably be reflected in the report in the form of extensive student participation at every level of university affairs.

On November 26, 4,788 students — 16 per cent of the eligible voters — cast ballots to elect four student representatives from a field of 16.

The four elected were Robert Rae, D'Arcy Martin, Steve Grant and Gary Webster. In an editorial the day after the election The Varsity noted that all four were "committed to a thorough reform of the university structure."

The Association of Teaching Staff chose their representatives from a field of nine after a quiet, almost entirely written campaign. More than 60 per cent of the ATS mailed in their ballots to elect Bernard Etkin of the Institute for Aerospace Studies, J. E. Hodgetts of the History department, J. S. Thompson of Anatomy and L. E. Lynch of Philosophy.

All accepted inclusion of students in the decision-making process but not on the basis of student-faculty parity. All the elected students wanted parity.

Three of the faculty members said in their campaign statements that part of the university's function was to "supply professionals and specialists in a variety of areas to fit the needs of society." The students favored a socially critical university.

The philosophical gap between students and faculty was wide, to say the least, but has not proved impossible to bridge. As far as is known, the report is unanimously supported by the commissioners.

Discussions began immediately and before long CUG called a long procession of resource people to its meetings and invited briefs from the university community and the public.

One such "resource" gathering brought together Andy Wernick of the Toronto Student Movement, Paul Fromm of the far-right Edmund Burke Society, unsuccessful SAC presidential candidate Bill Charlton and John Winter, president of the Graduate Student Union.

Next month the Commission on University Government will hand down a report which could revolutionize the distribution of power at U of T. This story looks back over the last nine months and explains what CUG has been up to.

"Basically I'm declaring war on this commission and regard the whole thing as insulting," said Wernick, "You can't force people to be free."

"Whoever heads the structure must not only be a top bureaucrat," said Fromm, "but a strong leader willing to take any action necessary to prevent the breakdown of law and order."

Marshall McLuhan was there too, in later weeks. "The university is a monument to 19th century hardware" he said, "Don't spend any time trying to reform an institution."

In February CUG published a Statement of Issues and arranged a series of public meetings for the statement's discussion. In brief, these are the problems CUG has tried to find answers to — the success of CUG's solutions may be determined by debates after publication:

- What is the purpose of the university? what is the nature of its social commitment?
- what is the role of the university government?
- can the alumni fulfil a useful role as interpreters of the university to the public?

• one-tier or two-tier government for the top governing structure?

• what is the function of the president? should administrators be civil servants or participate directly in decision-making?

• should colleges be strengthened and expanded?

• should there be staff-student parity for decision-making? for hiring and promotion committees?

• what should be the relationship of SAC and the ATS to the governing structure?

With the advent of exams,

CUG fell out of the public eye, but an August press conference gave an indication of where CUG's deliberations had led.

It appeared almost certain the Board of Governors would be abolished and replaced by a single-tier government composed mainly of equal number of students and faculty. Other sectors of the university will also be represented.

Also likely are departmental councils of the same general make-up to initiate curriculum changes. Faculty councils will be given increased financial responsibility.

The theme of the proposed structure is flexibility. The extent of student participation on each individual body will be determined by negotiation.

The report will also doubtless recommend an implementation committee.

On Oct. 23 the Board of Governors will receive the report, append its objections and present it to the legislature. CUG will be dissolved.

Whether the forbearance and perseverance will pay off remains to be seen. On that count I Ching was vague.

A story with a Happy Ending

"I like stories with happy endings."

—Varsity City Editor Louis Erlichman

The Sports Department hereby presents the Louis Erlichman Happy Endings Story for September.

On December 9 last year, Ed Armstrong, trainer for the football and hockey Blues, lost his left leg.

A main leg artery had ruptured, and before complete treatment could be arranged, the leg was infected with gangray his expenses and even staged a Christmas Party with Blues end Mark Slater as a rather stringy Santa Claus.

It's a genuine pleasure to be able to report that Fast Ed has made an almost complete recovery.

Equipped with a special artificial leg, he has returned to the training chores with the Blues. He can't run very fast, of course, but before the accident his speed compared unfavourably with a wounded snail, anyway.

"That thing (the artificial grene and had to be amputated below the knee.

Ed's nickname is "Fast Eddie", and while that is absolutely no indication of his pre-injury mobility, in Ed's line of work a certain amount of mobility is required. Like running onto the field to attend an injured player.

Over the winter Ed's doctors and nurses were amazed at his speedy recovery. They expected him to become morose and depressed, but instead he started walking a bare two days after the operation.

Then the visitors began to arrive, and arrive, and arrive...

The football and hockey teams plus the university athletic association helped to deleg) is damned heavy," Ed told me recently. "It's just like a lead weight on my foot, but at least I can walk again."

Ed wears baggy pants in any case, and the artificial leg looks like a small hockey knee pad.

"It's a bit uncomfortable still, but at least I don't have to take any more therapy."

"I just take care to sit down and rest at every opportunity," Ed said. And who can blame him?

Our congratulations to Ed and his wife, and a big thank you from Varsity Sportsies to the doctors, nurses, athletes, coaches, administrators and friends who helped make it possible.

The following article on men's intramural athletics has been prepared by the student and faculty members of the intramural committee.

At the outset, we'd like to impress that the purpose of this material is to acquaint you with the scope and value of the intramural program, not to provide a detailed outline of its structure.

The intramural program is centered around the competition for the T.A. Reed Trophy, donated by members of the Intramural Sports Committee (IMSC) in 1936.

For about twenty years, all colleges and faculties competed in one large, almost unwieldy group but in the early 'Fifties this was split into two divisions to facilitate greater participation from the smaller faculties.

In 1968-69, Forestry won Division II of the Reed competition, and St. Mike's and Medicine were named co-winners of Division I. This unusual decision was necessary because the water-polo final between those teams, which would have decided the Reed winner, could not be completed due to examinations.

TWO LEVELS

The actual competition is divided into two levels: Interfaculty and Intermediate.

Participation in Interfaculty level sports requires above-average ability, and usually some previous (i.e., high school) experience. The games are highly competitive, to say the least, and strong rivalries have been developed over the years. Some of the more bitter battles are Vic-PHE in football, Vic-St. Mike's in hockey, and Trinity-Law on the squash courts.

The Intermediate level is intended for the less skilled or less dedicated athlete who is playing more for the recreational value of the sport than for Reed points.

This dual level structure has proved to provide both rewarding competition for those who desire it and a valuable recreational purpose for those who are content with this aspect of university sports.

Intramural activities are already underway; the tennis tournament began yesterday and football practices are held nightly on the back campus and at the various federated colleges.

MOST POPULAR

Football usually attracts the largest crowds and produces the fiercest action. The various college and faculty teams are competing for the Mulock Cup, donated by the politician of the same name in 1893, which makes it the oldest football trophy in Canada. The Grey Cup did not materialize until 1906. To the consternation of the other teams, Victoria College has won the Mulock for the last decade or so thanks to a mixture of long practices, good coaching, and superior talent. The past two seasons saw an amazing challenge from Medicine, and as this is probably the last year for Meds football, they will probably be going all out to end the Victorian regime.

The U of T intramural program is the most advanced in Canada, and is reputed to be perhaps the best in all North America. The wide range of sports offered and the strong inter-college rivalries are far superior to the inter-house or inter-residence form of organization found at most other universities.

The U of T system has been used by several new universities as the key to their intramural programs.

In the Toronto system, each college and faculty competes as a separate entity, complete with cheerleaders (good for the eyes on cold November afternoons), managers, and administrative structure.

The Intramural Sports Committee is the overall governing body and reports directly to the University Athletic Directorate.

JOINING A TEAM

If you wish to participate in a team sport, consult your own college or faculty athletic association or bulletin board. Students wishing to play a sport for which their college will not enter a team may sign up for a "players pool"; they will then be distributed among the teams needing additional players.

Team sports scheduled during the fall term are soccer, lacrosse, football, seven-a-side rugby (a U of T invention), volleyball, squash, hockey, basketball, and water polo. Many of these will continue after Christmas, especially hockey, basketball and water polo.

The Interfaculty level track meet is scheduled for Varsity Stadium on Oct. 9, and curling begins Oct. 19 at the Terrace Club.

Fencers plan Open Night in new HH Fencing Salle

Attention campus sabre rat-tlers!

Your chance to fence (with swords this time) is the Open Night in the new-look Hart House Fencing Salle on Thursday (three months before Christmas).

Time is 5 p.m. sharp. Come and see the array of deadly weapons . . . epee, the dueling sword; foil, the flucking weapon (what a temptation to offer a Varsity writer); sabre, the most spectacular. The first 50 visitors will get to test Mike Kesterton's Spanish Artillery Officer's sword. The second 50 get to sew up the first 50.

In a more serious vein, Imre Hennyey, Varsity fencing coach and coach of the 1968 Canadian olympic fencing team, welcomes all new and returning fencers, regardless of experience. Remember, the OQAA championships are only 4 months away.

The first sabre trial is also scheduled for Thursday — 6 chimes in the upper gym. Survivors get first crack at the lockers.

Puppets on a String? No, it's just two members of the Varsity fencing team demonstrating the electric wire scoring system used in foil competition. The attacker (right) has just scored a hit — note the bent foil — with a sudden lunge as his opponent retreats.

Sailors should score in Owen Sound regatta

A crack University of Toronto sailing crew will compete next weekend in an international regatta in Owen Sound.

Mike Austin and Ron Leslie, both of Owen Sound, will compete against teams from Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, Royal Military College and McGill, Queen's, Trent, MacMaster, Western, West Virginia and Wayne State Universities in the U of T Invitational Regatta.

Leslie and Austin finished sixth in the Canadian Albacore Championships.

The Albacore, which will be used Saturday and Sunday, is a 15-foot open sail boat.

The races will be run under Canadian Yachting Association rules, with the winner decided by a seven-race series. The winning boat is the one which compiles the lowest point total in the races.

McGruer and Clark, a major boat-building firm in Owen Sound, will be sponsoring the races.

OTHER TACKS . . . the Sailing Club meets in the Hart House fencing room today at 1 p.m., and new members are welcome . . . last year the team defeated teams from Michigan State and Ohio State Universities in the International Collegiate Regatta Finals in Detroit . . . the Wayne State team will be flying into the regatta in their own plane . . . the club would like to find someone to go along to take pictures of the races, all expenses paid . . . if you're interested contact the club through the Varsity Sports Department

ATS Chairman Winter leaves Caput committee

By MARY BASTEDO

Professor Frederick Winter, chairman of the Association of Teaching Staff, will resign his position on the interim committee to restructure the Caput.

In announcing his resignation last night, Prof. Winter attacked both the Committee of University Presidents working paper "Order on Campus" and the controversial re-statement of the administration position by Caput issued by President Bissell Saturday night.

"For the moment, that committee is dead," he told the SAC executive during their meeting last night.

"As you people have said, the positions are pretty well polarized, and you can't talk on that basis.

"I was absolutely flabbergasted and dismayed when I read the document by the Committee of Presidents."

Until his resignation, Prof. Winter was one of three ATS representatives on the interim committee.

The two other faculty members are W. G. Dean (Geography) and J. M. Weir (Nursing). As of midnight, neither had indicated any plans to resign.

"At a meeting of faculty associations a week ago, President Bissell had recognized a need to discuss campus discipline," Winter said.

"But," Prof. Winter continued, "he had seen no point in discussing it when only two groups — the faculty and the administration — were present and by far the largest group — the students — were absent.

"Sometime between Monday evening and Friday a group of people got together a most ill-advised statement," said Winter, referring to the CPUO working paper.

"Some of the parts are absolutely ludicrous, for example asking students to identify themselves," he commented.

On the question of the legitimacy of the Caput statement signed by President Bissell, Prof. Winter affirmed that "the committee did reach a decision definitely and unequivocally to exclude that from our decisions."

"The president's point of view may have been technically correct but it was not representative," he said.

"I don't personally think disruption of a class is a serious offense," he added.

Prof. Winter showed up at the executive meeting to try to persuade SAC not to abandon discussion with the administration, despite the events of the afternoon session.

"I want to ask whether you people feel there is any basis on which you would be prepared to enter into discussions with the ATS and the administration to see if we could at least get talking again.

"I would hate very much to be a part, even indirectly, of the sort of situation that has developed on other campuses," he said.

"If we go on in a state of daggers drawn, all of us are going to be hurt."

"If I can do anything as an intermediary I'd be glad to do that," he added.

The half-dozen SAC members present at the meeting basically rejected his offer.

"Students on CUG and the Campbell Committee and this committee to reconstitute Caput in the interim all felt they were negotiating in good faith," said SAC executive assistant Liz Willick.

"They thought they were doing some good for students on this campus and then the administration comes along with these two statements. From the SAC point of view, the administration has stabbed us in the back."

"The statements have exposed the whole power structure of the university," said SAC services commissioner Chris Szalwinski. "That's what we've got to start talking about."

SAC votes to issue ultimatum to Bissell

By MARY BASTEDO

The Students Administrative Council and 300 students at a mass meeting have thrown their weight behind the position taken by the SAC executive Tuesday in defiance of the two statements on discipline issued by the administration last week.

At its Wednesday night meeting SAC voted 28 to 6, with 5 abstentions, to demand:

- that President Bissell officially disassociate himself from the Committee of Universities in Ontario working paper, since the paper has nothing in common with the Campbell committee report and since it is not possible to support both reports;

- that Caput withdraw its position of Saturday;
- that no new disciplinary action be taken until after the Campbell report is published;

- that the university recognize that Caput is not a legitimate disciplinary body for dealing with student discipline and that further discipline be dealt with by a committee representative of the university community;

- that the Campbell committee report be published as soon as it is presented to the president;

- that the administration reply to these demands within one week;

The SAC stand was taken in spite of a letter to SAC from President Bissell which some SAC members considered as reasonable a repudiation of the statements as could be expected.

STATES POSITION

In the letter Bissell stated, "My own position about the CPOU statement is that I endorse its main principles: 'that no university can survive if it acts under force or the threat of force; that the university must take steps to defend itself against such an eventuality; that before it takes the final step of calling in outside support, it should consult a body representative of both students and staff.'

"I have no doubt whatsoever that these principles are acceptable to the U of T.

"I am equally sure that there are some parts of the CPOU paper which will be found unacceptable on this campus. For example, I do not believe that the Senate of the U of T is the correct agency to choose the committee of faculty members and students proposed in the paper as a group to give advice to the President.

"That may be applicable, however, in universities where students have accepted membership on the Senate. Nor do I think that this university will accept as they are proposed the provisions of the paper concerning the identification of students, faculty and employees of the university."

In a midnight meeting at the Students' Administrative Council building members of SAC, the Graduate Student Union and the New Left Caucus formulated a statement of "legitimate, alternative criteria for expulsion or suspension of students until disciplinary procedures are reformulated in some democratic way."

The group of students, forming a campaign committee to mobilize support for SAC's six demands to President Bissell decided that suspension or expulsion would be legitimate:

*1) in the event of actual personal physical violence against a member of the university; or
2) in the event of actual, intentional, physical destruction of property, i.e. literally burning buildings or smashing computers."*

The campaign workers said they were attempting to demonstrate the distinction between violence and political disruption.

Dr. Bissell sits on stage with radicals Andy Wernick, Dennis Corcoran and Bob Barkwell at mass meeting Thursday.

Bissell gets seven days

Mass meeting backs SAC demands

By MARY BASTEDO

A decision to support the six Students' Administrative Council demands was made by about 300 people yesterday — less than half the crowd of over 1,000 that assembled in Convocation Hall two hours earlier at 1 pm.

The mass meeting was called Tuesday by those who attended the meeting of the committee to reconstitute Caput, which dissolved in chaos in the Hart House debates room.

After the administration has been given a week to retract its statements another mass meeting will be held next Wednesday to decide on further action.

President Bissell was present at yesterday's meeting. He sat and listened while last year's SAC President Stephen Langdon read a series of statements from various campus groups — SAC, the executive of the Graduate Students Union, the New Left Caucus, the Young Socialist Forum, the U of T Communist Club and Radicals for Capitalism.

All except Radicals for Capitalism condemned Bissell's stand and demanded he repudiate his statements.

LONG APPLAUSE

Prolonged applause, whether of expectation, anger or approval, greeted Bissell's approach to the podium.

He read again the letter he sent to SAC Wednesday night, which Langdon had just finished reading

ished reading

"... no university can survive..."

"No capitalist university," someone shouted.

Applause

THREAT OF FORCE

"... if it acts under force or the threat of force..."

"I have no doubt whatsoever that these principles are acceptable to the U of T."

Heckling.

"Who let these Commies in here, anyway?" someone else shouted.

Bissell said he looked upon the Campbell committee report as "the document on which this university should make its decisions on campus discipline."

NO REPUDIATION

He did not directly repudiate either his statements lauding the usefulness of the CPOU working paper or the Caput statement.

"Really what we are engaged in today is part of the wider discussion — can the university govern itself?" he said.

"I think there are considerable doubts now that the university can govern itself.

After a series of frustrated questions to Bissell the crowd broke into a chant of "Retract! Retract!"

CONSULTS UNIVERSITY

"Most of these questions are directed not at me but at certain bodies of the university."

Bissell shouted angrily. "It's a very flattering image you have of me as one who pontificates on high, but that is not the case. I can assure you I consult the university and that is what I intend to continue to do," he exclaimed, hitting the podium with his fist.

With that he left the room, red-faced and grinning.

"I personally feel that Dr. Bissell has broken a promise to us and has to repudiate his statement," said SAC president Gus Abols.

"I am totally in favour of mass meetings. People's rights are at stake here. We're all in it together no matter what you believe at this stage."

"It is my opinion that real physical violence or destruction of property is not condoned by most of the people on this campus.

FREE SPEECH

"People have the right of assembly to discuss whatever they want without interference.

"But the right of confrontation must be defined."

Andy Wernick, a New Left Caucus member, sat on the stage with Barkwell, Bissell, Langdon and others but he did not say anything during the meeting.

After an hour of people discussing and people leaving, the decision to support SAC in its ultimatum demands to the administration was almost unanimous.

WEBSTER HESITANT

Gary Webster (SGS), a member of the Commission on University Government, was one of the few to state reservations about the motion.

He agreed that the statements were repressive and based merely on rumours. But to be "politically realistic," he said, "I doubt very seriously that, unless disruption actually comes to the point where it is unequivocally violence, that any action will be taken."

"His letter shows that Bissell has some reservations. We have a chance for a breathing space."

"The president has repudiated already, as I see it, the most crucial aspects of the statement."

Webster, however, did not vote against the motion.

Some people have a tremendous urge to speak that cannot be stopped other than by hitting them on the head. — Prof. R. C. Oldfield, director of the Medical Research Council's Psycholinguistics Research Unit at Oxford University.

A mass meeting of students yesterday passed a series of six demands of the administration. These demands, originally formulated by the Students' Administrative Council, are a concerted attempt to get the U of T administration to reassert political freedom in this university.

The Varsity supports these demands, which appear on the front page of today's paper.

We support them, not because they throw a clenched fist in the face of the administration, the guys in the black hats. Not because they will "raise political consciousness" on this campus and mobilize students towards the left.

But because the demands are an attempt to correct a situation that limits the freedom of every student on this campus.

President Bissell's support of the Committee of Presidents working paper, an overtly repressive document, and his reassertion of the powers of Caput to deal with disruptions are part of an attempt to destroy the left before it has got off the ground.

It's an understandable reaction after the disruptions of the college orientations, but it's hardly rational.

It's a law-and-order policy imported from the United States that has no relevance to the Toronto campus. It's an undemocratic policy that students have had no voice in forming. And, although the motives behind the policy may be "counter-insurgency against the left, the policy still threatens the basic freedoms of every student on this campus."

Even Art McIlwain (IV APSC), the conservative to liberal president of the Engineering Society admits, "The CPUO document frightens me."

"In engineering, we have pretty free and easy classes," he said. "And if the people in the class think the professor is full of it, they tell him."

"The way the document read, I could have been expelled," he added.

"When you go on a caper with the Lady Godiva Memorial Band, you make some noise and do funny things," he said. "That could have been termed a disruption of the normal processes."

The CPUO paper denies all students the right to challenge what's going on in a classroom, a department, or in the university as a whole, no matter what the nature of that challenge is.

And although Bissell has tried to pass off the paper as "solely... a working document for discussion in each university," he has also stated, "I endorse its main principles."

Also Bissell is a prominent member of the CPUO, and the paper could not have been produced without his approval.

In his speech at yesterday's mass meeting, Bissell reinforced his policy of conservatism in the classroom.

"The real crunch comes," he said, "when there is a sustained violation of the contract — an informal contract — between speaker and audience."

But does sovereignty lie with the speaker or the audience?

Yesterday's audience in Convocation Hall clearly thought that the sovereignty belonged to them, as they finally heckled Bissell off the stage as he continually refused to answer a basic question — How could he reconcile his acceptance of the CPUO working paper with his acceptance of the Campbell Committee?

The answer is clear. Bissell no longer sees the Campbell committee as the best way to deal with the student movement.

For he said yesterday that he will also consider "hundreds of statements of discipline which are pouring to my desk from across this continent."

Half an hour earlier the meeting had laughed down Rob Ryan, a member of the New Left Caucus, who had accused Bissell of plugging himself into a continental strategy.

Cartoon by R. Cobb

"I'm delighted to have my strategy given continental dimensions," Bissell joked.

After delivering more of last year's community-of-scholars rhetoric and trying some nervous humour, Bissell's last ploy to the mass meeting was this disclaimer:

"There's a flattering assumption here that the president of the university speaks from on high."

He said there were other bodies in the university community that must be consulted.

After bypassing the interim committee to reconstitute Caput, the president in effect tells us that he only works here.

And he passes the buck to those other bodies which he may at any time ignore in the event of a disruption — the CPUO statement that he supports would allow him to call the police.

President Bissell has adopted a conservative and contradictory policy towards discipline, a hard-line stand that is more than a tactical error.

It's an insult to every student's intelligence and freedom, and that is why every student, not just the left, should support the six demands — a liberal, not a radical, request.

I would like to question a few items in the Varsity coverage of the New Left Caucus visit to Vic's orientation.

There is a surprising similarity in the definition of "disruption" employed by The Varsity in its story and by President Bissell in his recent overreaction to campus unrest. By any reasonable definition, there was no disruption of the Freshman Welcome at Vic. Some TSM people came, had their say, talked to a lot of freshmen: it was peaceful, it helped the freshmen understand some of the issues now being debated. This is hardly disruption. If Mr. Bossin wishes to enjoy his fantasies of Mounties and cops, it is probably a harmless form of paranoia. But it would seem to indicate that the only people who got uptight about the affair were the New Letters.

I would like to protest, however, The Varsity's claim that I was "attacking the left politically". Since I am of the left, the dazzling sweep of the charge is patently absurd, unless it is meant to imply that I have adopted Red Guard self-criticism. Presumably it should read that I was "Attacking the New Left caucus politically". That would make more sense but would be no more accurate. My differences with the New Left are over strategies, not over aims. I attempted, that evening, to argue that even if violence were necessary at, say, Berkeley, I didn't think it was necessary here, that the situation here was so fluid that virtually any change, however radical, was realizable if intelligent tactics were employed.

It's carrying the polarization bit to ridiculous extremes to assume that anyone with a title like "dean" is Ipso facto an enemy of the people. It also isn't very good reporting. But it is consistent with an article that confuses the chronology of events, mistakes a reference to Vic's "mini-CUG" as one to the university's CUG, and generally overdramatizes a constructive confrontation.

Law and Order on campus - words of wisdom from all over

dr. claude bissell

My own position about the CPUO statement is that I endorse its main principles: "that no university can survive if it acts under force or the threat of force; that the university must take steps to defend itself against such an eventuality; that before it takes the final step of calling in outside support, it should consult a body representative of both students and staff".

I have no doubt whatsoever that these principles are acceptable to the University of Toronto.

I am equally sure that there are some parts of the CPUO paper which will be found unacceptable on this campus. For example, I do not believe that the Senate of the University of Toronto is the correct agency to choose the committee of faculty members and students proposed in the paper as a group to give advice to the President. That may be applicable, however, in universities where students have accepted membership on the Senate. Nor do I think that this university will accept as they are proposed the provisions of the paper concerning the identification of students, faculty and employees of the university.

I would also repeat that my reason for establishing the subcommittee to reconsider the composition of the Caput was to bridge the gap between authorized practice and the receipt, discussion and implementation of the Campbell Report, and to form for the interim period a representative body of students and academic staff that would deal with all matters of discipline. I have always believed that such a body is essential for the disciplinary policy that would carry the full weight of the university endorsement. I believe strongly in this principle, and as I emphasized at the meeting I will continue to work for its implementation.

This subcommittee worked hard during the spring and summer. However, no decision was reached and it was obviously the opinion of the student representatives and some of the staff that even a reconstituted Caput could not deal with disciplinary cases arising from disruptions of a political nature. I appeal to students and staff to reconsider this decision, and to provide the university in this interim period with the kind of body that can make decisions in all disciplinary matters, on the understanding that such a body could be modified in the light of the reports of the Campbell Committee and the Commission on University Government.

In the meantime I have no alternative except to consult the only body in the university that, by statute, is given disciplinary powers over the students of the university — the Caput.

C. T. Bissell.
September 24th, 1969.

The recent statements of the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario and the recent actions of Claude Bissell and the CAPUT of the University of Toronto are part of a continental strategy designed to repress the student movement.

The American origins of this policy clearly illustrate Canada's neo-colonial status. American domination extends into all facets of Canadian life, and the university is no exception. The "normal functions" of the university serve the interests of the ruling class in both the U.S. and Canada.

As students begin to struggle against and expose the servile relationship between the university and the class structure of Canadian society, the response of the administration has been to abandon its liberal reformist mask in favour of direct repression.

Last year the U of T administration created a Presidential Advisory Committee on Discipline under Dr. Ralph Campbell. Now, anticipating that the report of this committee would protect the rights of the student movement to create a critical university serving the Canadian people, the administration realized that their attempts at subtle counter insurgency had failed. This necessitated the repressive measures outlined by the CPUO and the CAPUT which demonstrate again that the university is built on a foundation of corporate interests.

The velvet glove has finally been removed from the iron fist.

The position of the New Left Caucus is that the administration must meet the demands formulated by SAC and endorsed by the GSU.

ALL POWER TO THE PEOPLE

col um and a half

By MICHAEL KAUFMAN

I had been reading about the New Left Caucus for a while; I had seen them lurking in the shadows; I knew, as we all did, what they were planning; but there still seemed to be more than met the eye. I had a feeling it was more than some college fad, or a series of harmless fraternity pranks, so I decided to take it on myself to find out the truth. I would attend one of their meetings.

I thought it would be best if I blended in with them, so I put on my Sta-Pressed Levis and a paisley shirt with an ascot. The taxi driver who gave me a ride down to the meeting seemed awfully friendly, and turned out to be a cop. The meeting was down in the dirty area of town by the bus station. I was glad that I hadn't worn my good clothes. I turned off the main street and went down an alley that was being prowled by two cats. I cleverly noted that one of them had a series of bumps on its stomach, and realized that it was one of the Caucus's agents with a poor fitting disguise.

It meowed at me and I meowed back twice, which must have been the password since it didn't try to scratch me. I knocked on the door.

which slowly creaked open to leave me standing in front of a huge freak with a deep scar across his cheek. I fought back a wave of nausea.

The meeting began with a series of karate exercises. I shuddered when I pictured Convocation Hall crumbling under one well-placed chop. There were around thirty of the hoodlums at the meeting. Judging by the voices there must have been some boys in the crowd, but just off hand I couldn't identify any as a male because of their long hair and what they call love beads.

The chairman started the meeting: "Comrades, we're in a tricky situation. We have enough CS gas to wipe out the whole city of Toronto, but we can't afford a helicopter to drop it from. With that a man wearing a trench coat stood up and said: "My friends, I think my government will be able to handle that for you." There was a round of applause. The chairman, who had a name that immediately identified him as an East German, also extended his thanks.

... the administration has also shown itself to be irresponsible. At the June 1 meeting Bissell stated that in the event of a disruption his own course of action would be to call together as representative a body as possible of staff and students. This, as recent events point out, has proved to be totally incorrect. For this reason I support the position of S.A.C. asking for President Bissell to withdraw his recent statements. There has been no consultation on his statements with students.

It is imperative that S.A.C. be consulted on any such statement on the part of the administration now and in the future. But, it is also imperative, that if we as students want to participate in decision making that we do so responsibly, that we deal with all issues of government, as disturbing as they must be, that we do so in good faith, that we do not obstruct reasonable debate because it is an advantageous political tactic for any specific ideological group. S.A.C. had the opportunity to deal with the issue on the Sub Committee to examine the composition of the Caput this way first. The Executive this summer has clearly rejected this opportunity. As a matter of fact, in the August 6 meeting, Kealy presented a new S.A.C. position which he hoped would be "non negotiable" by S.A.C. and unacceptable by the committee, thus frustrating any possibility to continue to deal with this issue which was to him unpalatable. To his surprise the recommendations were accepted. Such an attitude on the part of a committee member is counter productive and shows a lack of good faith.

I propose that the SAC get together with the GSU and the Association of Teaching Staff, to determine what an acceptable policy would be for the interim period.

If such a resolution would be presented to the administration, and that be regarded as the only legitimate policy in the interim.

— Gus Abols,
(President of the Students Administrative Council)

history union

On Saturday, September 20, President Bissell issued a statement to the effect that the disruption of any lecture, class or meeting sponsored by the University will result in an investigation by the head of the academic division concerned, the convening of a Caput, and possible suspension, expulsion, or other form of punitive reaction. Because the nature of what constitutes a disruption is nowhere clarified, the document in effect gives absolute power to individual professors to invoke disciplinary procedures against any student who happens to step outside very narrowly interpreted bounds of acceptable behaviour.

This, in itself, is unfair and dangerous enough. However, in light of the CPUO working paper recently presented and termed by Dr. Bissell "a helpful document," one of several statements that will be used to determine Toronto policy", which provides for a Caput appointed by the Senate, the implications become even graver.

The two documents rigidly and formalize, through fear, the classroom situation and effectively reinstate the professor (and administrator) as minor gods to an even greater extent than before. They restrict academic freedom by classifying situations which could have some educational and intellectual validity as disruptions and treating them accordingly. Finally, their publication at a time of flux and change within the university a time when polarization and perhaps violence are real threats, can only inhibit the growth of a community of scholars based on mutual trust and understanding, as trite and hypocritical as this concept may seem, it is the only way that students can attain an equal voice with faculty and administration in this university without destroying the institution.

As a responsible student organization, dedicated to giving students such a voice, we cannot allow the existence of two such dangerous documents to go unopposed. Consequently, we deplore both their imprecision and severity and will resist strongly any attempt to make them effective within our department.

The History Students' Union

One of his henchmen came up and whispered something in the chairman's ear. "Brothers," he started, "I have been told that we have an informer in our midst." My heart stopped. I had heard much of their insidious tortures; the bamboo slits, hot irons, chemistry lectures with three hundred students. My life started passing through my head.

I guess it was a good thing that I had come disguised, for the chairman pointed to a man on the other side of the room. The man instantly turned red, at which time he was immediately accepted by the group.

I was still worried about being discovered, so I stood up and suggested that we go down and burn the computer centre. I couldn't hear anything specific above the shouting, but I think that they were in favor of my suggestion.

Things were starting to get pretty quiet as they were just waiting for their guest speaker, so I decided to leave. As I was leaving, a short, bald man, who was wearing baggy brown work clothes, softly stepped into the room, amid a thunder of applause. As the door closed behind me, he started addressing the group. He had such a strange accent, and was using so much hip jargon, that, as far as I was concerned, he might as well have been speaking Chinese.

I returned to the university and immediately went and told my good friend Clyde all that I had seen and heard. He didn't have much time to talk, because he was getting ready to leave to meet with his friends from some of the other universities of Ontario, but he said that he'd see what he could do.

Well, that was around a week and a half or two weeks ago, and I don't know if Clyde had anything to do with it, but it sure seems as though some things are finally being done to ensure that students, referring to the radicals of course, don't gain control of the university. I thank God that Law and Order has been restored on campus.

Festival Scene: I

We paid to see a rock n' roll festival, but were treated to two.

The first took place in light — under a blazing California-like sun, and then, after dark, under Varsity Stadium's football lights. Although this "first" concert ended on a down (with Louisiana folk-nik Doug Kershaw), it was generally well worth the price of admission.

The fact that the artists (Little Richard, the Plastic Ono Band and the Doors) who ended the festival were able to lay down a non-negotiable demand that the lights be turned out is already something of an indication of their status as superstars. As the lights went out and the physical setting became more elusive; so too, the mood changes — intensified, on the part of both performers and audience. (The Olympus (Mecca) of rock personified — a "second" concert.)

The afternoon mood of carnival-like glee first caught fire with Bo Diddley's classic rendition of his namesake, "Hey, Bo Diddley". Balloons chased with trails and babies danced on picnic-cloths as the mood quickened through Tony Joe White ("Poke Salad Annie"), Jerry Lee Lewis, and Chuck Berry.

Kim Fowley, the emcee — purple jacket, yellow pants, black bowler and dirty white sneakers — looked like Jack (of Beanstock fame) trying to look cool, and was about as witty. Fortunately, he did manage to refrain from the screaming contests he had tried to start at CKFH's rock n' roll revival rally the previous weekend.

A few kids in the front row started breaking the snow-fence between them and the press-section in front. We got scared and started packing for a quick exit. We got more scared when the cops tried to reassure us by saying that they had sent for an extra platoon of men. Fowley came on with his only intelligent move of the day as he announced that there were crippled children inside the press area who could be crushed in a riot. There were no crippled children, but neither was there a riot.

The free and open use of drugs at festivals has fast become an established tradition. Police tolerance in such situations is, of course, based on very "straight" logistics — why provoke a generally well-behaved crowd to hostility?

What did surprise me though, was the manner in which Fowley treated the subject over the P.A.

He began by announcing that the police had assured him that there would be no drug arrests. Tacit acceptance is one thing, a public statement is quite another — Were the police afraid that some people might refrain from using drugs for fear of arrests? Strange sort of fear for the police! That, plus the fact that Trailer (on hand to treat "head" problems) was mentioned in the same breath as St. John's Ambulance (for problems of a more physical nature). You might have a headache or a bad trip. You simply went to gate three or gate eight according to the nature of your ailment. Simple!

Not much perhaps, but there seemed to be some foetal institutionalization of what had been strictly a "look-the-other-way" affair before. A basis for the legalization of grass?

After interminable pleading by Fowley, the stadium lights were finally turned out, Little Richard's band started on "Tutti Frutti", and Fowley's voice, barely audible over the rising wave of music, came over the P.A.: "Ladies and gentlemen, the king of rock n' roll, Little Richard!"

A few quick chords on the piano, and then up dancing on it — looking every inch a queen in ivory sequin pants, skin-tight, and a metal vest that reflected the spotlight all over the stage.

Like it?" "Want more?" And he sang it again and again as about 50 kids came over the barrier. The cops did nothing. "Good Golly Miss Molly" and then it happened — someone shot off a few flares, and one landed in the middle of the crush. The cops carried out a screaming Negro of about 16 with extensive burns on his face.

Relatively few people noticed, however, and the crowd pushed closer, taunted by Little Richard's stripping and throwing his clothes including the vest ("That was damn nice of him, it must've cost a mint"), to the audience.

The intense excitement created by Little Richard cooled somewhat as everyone sat to await the Plastic Ono Band.

Fowley came on again to organize a greeting — on the word "Band", as they arrived on stage, thousands of matches were all lit simultaneously — an incredible sight in the darkened stadium. And even more incredible to see Lennon, looking for all the world like the Messiah of rock dressed in his tropical white suit, stride confidently across the stage (for the first time in four years.)

"We're going to do numbers we know, 'cause we've never played together before."

"Blue Suede Shoes", "Money", "Dizzy Miss Lizzy", and the masses were awed. Clapton, too, dressed in straight jeans, recalled Dylan's adoration of Johnny Cash avoiding fancy solos to watch Lennon.

Then a new song, "Cold Turkey", read from Yoko's notes — a moderate rock beat with a simple C, E, C progression throughout the verses.

The crowd rose to give two-handed peace signs and enthusiastic vocal support to Yoko and John singing "Give Peace a Chance." No attempts to rush the stage.

"Now Yoko is going to do her thing, all over you." Clapton looked bored even before it began, but begin it did . . . interminable shrill oriental chanting occasionally punctuated by the words "Don't worry John, let's hope for peace."

Lennon and Clapton busied themselves varying sounds by waving their guitars directly in front of the amps. After about 10 minutes, John (now visibly annoyed) tried to stop her with a few words in her ear. She kissed him and continued as the boos became stronger. As the musicians gradually, casually, started off the stage it struck me — the modulating bass drone and treble fuzz — an anatomic holocaust.

Underneath the pulsating drone of the amplifiers, there rose a feeling of uncertainty as to whether or not the Doors would be anti-climactic. Fowley again asked the audience (still seated) to use matches as a greeting. Each of the thousands of little points of light recalled "Light My Fire", and its connotations of Jim Morrison's widely-publicized trouble with decency in entertainment. Uncertainty was replaced by wonder at what would Morrison do?

But the Doors have changed — they came, this time, to play; and play they did. Then Morrison walked on stage, slowly, dressed in a jean and jean-jacket outfit — not particularly snug-fitting, and with no belt as if from the Sally Ann. Obviously no attempt whatsoever at showiness; his face — blank, determined, perhaps even vengeful, but exhausted in the light of a single white spotlight rimmed in sequential prism colors at the edge.

Morrison stepped up to the mike, put his right foot on its stand, closed his eyes and the music dimmed. Just the bass and the drums, slowly. Then the bass alone . . . boom . . . boom . . . (silence).

Morrison, softly: "We want the world and we want it . . . NOW!"

The music blared back to full volume as he screamed and leapt into the air.

Then he closed his eyes again and stood quietly except for periodic spasms of anguish which faded as quickly as they came.

During an excellent instrumental exchange between organist and guitarist in "Light My Fire", Morrison stood at the back of the stage, leaning on an amp, pensive. Then he sauntered, disinterested, back to the mike and finished

The crowd screamed for more, and the band returned, but some idiot brought everyone to his feet by turning on the stadium lights. Fowley returned and finally got the lights turned out again. But it was too late, the charisma had broken, and everyone remained standing because they knew this would be the last song.

Morrison returned and spoke slowly, humbly: "You know I can remember, when I was in grade seven or eight and rock n' roll first came on the scene;

it was for me a liberating experience that burst open whole new strange catacombs of wisdom. That is why it is such an honor . . ."

The crowd stood quietly, listening. A girl screamed "Touch me!" and he sang — "This is the end, my only . . ."

Again excellent solo-work featuring a melodic instrumental played on the drums. Again Morrison stood quietly, singing with his eyes shut, then leaped screaming and collapsed, only to return to the mike.

The song had ended, there were no further cries for "More!" After 14 straight hours, with aching backs and bleary eyes, the crowd headed for the gates as a half-dozen cops on horses rode in to herd us faster.

'wha' happened? what'd we do right?'

The Age of Aquarius did not invent the phenomenon known as "feeling groovy". That sense of collective harmony, which pervades pop festivals has been going on in theatres for ages, but nobody's had such a nice vague name for it.

That's just what it's needed because feeling groovy is an ambiguous experience. In the theatre the grooviest moments are the ones which nobody sees coming until they've slid by. "Wha' happened? What'd we do right?" mutter actors reaching for cold cream and tissues. The audience wanders out of the theatre in silence. A few blocks later they break into incoherent talk about what they've just been through rather than where they're going for a snack. Even the critic's mind boggles over his typewriter because the production has already said everything worth saying about itself.

These are the moments that anybody who gives a damn about theatre lives for, and in between reviews and rehearsals, it's always nice to try and figure out why you bother.

You bother, I think, because it's a rare chance for co-ordination of visions, with everybody looking in the same direction and maybe even seeing something there.

Any production which doesn't look where the author has pointed is bound to be cross-eyed. It's the director's problem to find the author's line of vision in the flat type of a script and then to ensure that everything in the production, from casting through curtain call, is in harmony with it. (The assumption that playwrights know their business is usually safe and anyhow can only be tested in production.) A fuzzy line separates imaginative innovation from the kind that violates the author's intentions. In times of political hypersensitivity and/or nervousness about the fate of Culture, this line is often overstepped to play up — or down — Meaning and Significance.

Visions don't get realized without much technical competence. And that comes only with advance and ad hoc calculation in endless rehearsals, till performances become conditioned reflexes and the inevitable emergencies are manageable. The effects of this kind of intelligent drudgery were dramatized last January in Henry Tarvainen's production of The Visit and, though with less consistent success, by Toronto Workshop Productions' Good Soldier Schweik in March. The year before, Pocu-li Ludique Societas' York Crucifixion showed the same results. In medieval idiom, no less.

The productions managed what lots of others don't. Cast, crew and audience peered however briefly, around the self-consciousness that usually clogs sight. People in a show have Theatre-as-Illusion as a permanent basis of operations. The all-purpose criterion is "OK, but will it WORK?" This pragmatism of make-believe decides everything from the first entrance to the final blackout. And if "it" doesn't work in performance after all, initial reaction backstage is usually "God, what a shitty house we've got tonight!"

Members of the audience, meanwhile, tend to be smugly self-conscious about doing their bit to save a dying art. They are not about to forget that they have gambled TV time and ticket money to be entertained and/or edified by an illusion. If they have any familiarity with the play or the company, they are even less likely to forget themselves. The lady in the aisle seat in row 3 announces over her intermission orange juice that one actor was much stronger last week in a different part, or that this production of the play isn't up to the one she saw in New York in 1953. She may be right, but she could say it in one word — "unconvincing".

The mutual consciousness of roles and rules in an illusion can cease when the production is beyond belief. Literally. The only reality is the play; nothing else exists for comparison.

This never happens quite as planned; I don't really know why it ever happens at all. By all the rules of logic, for example, it should have happened in this summer's skilled production of Caucasian Chalk Circle in the Church. The fact that I saw nothing more (or less) than a diffuse conglomeration of brilliant bits of acting and stage business made me wonder if theatrical grooviness is merely a subjective reaction. But it's experienced and remembered as an instance of intellectual and emotional cooperation. Which is probably more like it — co-ordination of vision being achieved when the company exploits its competence, not to compete, but to develop a conviction and share it with an audience.

It's either the stockiest of all possible illusions or none at all. Either way, it's worth the going. Just don't look for it.

sonny and the jazzmen in boomtown '69

For the next two nights, Sonny Greenwich will be providing the last bit of jazz that we'll be able to hear in Toronto for some time. Originally from Toronto, Greenwich and his guitar spend most of their time in Montreal these days. Metro Boomtown '69 does not have room for Sonny Greenwich.

A long Digression: this town is becoming increasingly dismal, at least if you happen to like jazz. The Town Tavern, always wobbling from one entertainment policy to another, is currently off jazz again, for the 45th time in recent memory. And Harvey Lichtenberg, co-owner of the Colonial, long a stronghold for mainstream jazzmen and their fans, reports that sales have increased since the club began importing unknown vaguely "hip" acts from the U.S. Not much solace there.

And if you happen to be an amateur jazz player, you might as well forget it. An excellent drummer called Weeks, who used to do a lot of playing in his native Bristol, has had about 3 gigs since he arrived in Toronto two years ago. In the civilized centres, I'm told, there are places where musicians hang out, and there are back rooms in pubs where they can play. Not so in Toronto.

Whenever Sonny Greenwich drops in to town, he tries to get something going. But with no back rooms, or other facilities, there are no sessions. So there is no place for the young musicians to blow, and there is no fresh music being created. End of digression.

Meanwhile, at George's Spaghetti House, Greenwich, in spite of the odds, continues to play his original, uncompromising brand of modern jazz. Originally inspired by Coltrane, Greenwich has developed a unique approach to the guitar, creating long, twisting, spiralling lines of wild, leaping intervals based on sophisticated harmonic extensions. He likes to build and build the tension relentlessly, refusing to release the listener from his grip.

On a recent night when we heard him, he began a 45 minute piece by creating warm, gently spreading blankets of sound and slowly increasing the rhythmic density until finally there were sparks shooting like crazy, and then, when he had reached a breath-taking peak of intensity, he began very slowly to let us down until he finally ended the piece in the original mood of tranquility. It was enthralling music.

Though he has at times associated with the "new" musicians, Greenwich never shows any of the aggression and anger that seem to possess some of them. Quiet and modest, with a serene expression on his face, he appears to be a man at peace. Which may seem surprising when you think of the lack of acceptance he has suffered due to refusal to play anything other than what he really feels.

Better dig him before Swinging Toronto sends Sonny Greenwich on his way again.

Mississippi Blues, 1927-41. Yazoo 1001.

Although Mississippi is perhaps best known for its "low-down" moaning blues, quite a variety of styles developed there simultaneously. This reissue collection of extremely rare 78s shows how wide a variety of excellent music there was. Robert Johnson, Son House and Charlie Patton are the best known names on the album, but some of the best cuts are by the unknowns. The musical quality is consistently high, and the sound is mostly quite good, but if you aren't familiar with the sound on old 78s, have a listen first.

Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup. Look on Yonder's Wall. Delmark 614.

This is the return to records after many years of one of the very biggest blues names of the '40s. His style has changed little, but unfortunately both his voice and guitar playing are a bit unsure. Not a bad record, though disappointing, and perhaps a second album would show that Crudup has found himself again. Sound could be improved too.

Eddie Boyd. I'll Dust My Broom. London PS 554.

Eddie Boyd solo and with an English blues band. Boyd is in the strong tradition of Chicago based piano players, with the influence of Memphis Slim and Roosevelt Sykes particularly evident. Peter Green accompanies adequately on guitar, and John Mayall's harmonica is awful but infrequent. A good enough record of the Chicago type, but lacking the sheer drive of Boyd's 1965 album with Buddy Guy and a Chicago rhythm section.

Juke Boy Bonner. I'm Going Back to the Country. Arhoolie 1036.

This is modern Texas country blues in its liveliest form.

The Juke Boy is a one man band with incredible drive and vitality. He really sounds like a tight band, and the highly poetic songs (he's a serious poet) are first rate.

Urban Blues, Vol. 1. Imperial 94002.

The third volume in Imperial's excellent "Legendary Masters" series (the other 2 are rural blues). 14 city blues of various sorts by 7 artists, the music ranges from real blues to early rock. The artists include T-Bone, Walker, Roosevelt Sykes, Joe Turner and Fats Domino. The high quality of the earlier volumes is maintained, and there is no sound problem, since the record is made from good original masters.

George Coleman. "Bongo Joe." Arhoolie 1040.

Hardly conventional blues, but strongly African influenced. Bongo Joe plays a 55 gallon oil drum with homemade rattle drumsticks, sings in a humorous, scratchy voice, carries on farcical dialogues, and occasionally whistles. Seemingly uninfluenced by West Indian drumming, he is an extraordinarily individualistic performer and in small doses his highly original material is entertaining, though as a whole it's a bit unvarying.

Anyone who wasn't very concerned with what was happening wouldn't be there. He wouldn't walk the ten miles. This was a nucleus. A PROTOTYPE? Because it was so exclusive in its nature you could see very clearly the drawbacks & advantages of this kind of prospective community.

Hardly anyone who was there was prepared to live rough for three days. They couldn't cope with the necessities of life.

Well — it was a pretty common experience to be sitting and have some FOOD come down — it was a pretty common experience to be sitting there and have a JOINT come down.

As far it was a preview of the hippy community, there wasn't really MUCH TO DO.

It's definitely some sort of spiritual occasion. The Hopi have a huge of dolls & they're called Katinas dolls. They're the spirits of different forces, which are subsidiary to other forces that are like gods. I don't think there were any gods at Woodstock, but there were spirits & they resembled the gods very closely in appearance. The dolls are very colourful & elaborately dressed & there are always a lot of them. Watching the groups was like watching a succession of these. Different manifestations of the spirit they represent. The groups rang the changes.

Nobody articulated very much, but they understood quite well; if you judge understanding to be evidenced by the way people actually act. They acted in great harmony.

THE HOPI HAVE A CONCEPT OF TIME THAT WAS CONSIDERED 'PRIMITIVE'

UNTIL 2 or 3 YEARS AGO WHEN MODERN PHYSICS CAUGHT UP WITH THEM.

Hendrix came on & told the crowd how he's spent the summer in Washington. Digging the sun. He had a bandanna on. He said that he had busted his head with the Experience & he'd gone back to the Sun & Mother Earth & his new band was called Gypsy Sun because WE'RE ALL GYPSIES. They hadn't gotten much further than primitive rhythm, & that is Mother Earth & Gypsy Sun & they jammed. In between he talked with the crowd personally. It was a resolution. Hendrix got into the Chieftain slot. It was time for the crowd to be easy. After a difficult 1st year in San Francisco, & an even worse one that ended in Chicago, now it was going to be a good one. And it was.

looking ahead Festival

It's been one of the quietest summers in a whole lot of years. Detroit didn't burn. No political figure of any importance was killed. (tsk tsk — now the weight of guilt begins to rise on shoulders again until a new sacred goat is killed and absolves our sins). It was the summer of equilibrium nixonium, of that uneasy tension, that madly whirling, standing still tension of Nort America. In short, nothing apocalyptic has happened.

And, of course, it was the summer of the pop festival. People rushed to be on the Johnny Carson show to tell everybody that those kids were beautiful, I tell you, they were beautiful. If there had been a group of adults that large, you would have had fights and bottle throwing on, of course you would have had the police. Why I sown one of those kids pregnant and everybody was doing everything to help her; when she had her baby, they didn't know what to do but everybody was helping.

They treat it as if it's extraordinary when it's really the norm. It's the whole product of an image-conscious liberal society. A society where everything goes. A society where the rednecked bigot in Easy Rider is just as embarrassing to the status quo as the radical who sees through the trip being laid on all of us by the powers that be.

North America needs nothing more than what it has now. A great mediocrity at the core of things with a few fringe freaks to pacify the thrill seekers.

And yet that's what makes it one of the most interesting summers in a long while. One of the best ways to take stock of what is happening around you is to notice which event and which people are in the process of mystification. Mystification is that process by which a phenomenon is given a "significance" — and is intellectualized far beyond its original portent. What usually ends up happening is that it serves as an efficient way of masking the real problems at hand.

Last summer had its share of mystification. When Bobby Kennedy was shot, the western world went into a dream. When the cops beat the kids on the head in Chicago, a whole fantasy world lit up. People shouted, "Aha, we have seen the repression; we know what it's all about now!" But chances are the powers that be were very embarrassed about the reactionary clubbings by an unruly police force and would have preferred to let the kids have their "festival of peace and light".

They needn't have worried. A little repression is just the thing to add spice to life. Without it, the newspapers would be short of copy (as they were this summer).

That's why the pop festival scene fitted so well into the summer. There was nothing extraordinary about them, absolutely nothing. And yet pop festivals were the target of this summer's mystification. "It's the revolution, the revolution of love." "Feelin' groovy is what it's all about." Life magazine devotes a whole issue to the Woodstock Music Festival. It becomes praiseworthy.

At the Atlantic City Pop Festival in August, a good example of this contradiction came up. The audience of about 100,000 was getting restless and many people were rushing the stage (a no-no). The emcee took the mike and started on one of his all too familiar monologues. His voice was a bit shaky and we could tell he was scared.

"Hey cats and chicks, like this is a groovy scene, right and we don't want to blow it. You know you can smoke your grass and those narks up there on the roof aren't going to bust you. We're going to take over 'cause the revolution is coming so we don't want to blow our scene. You're gonna hafta get back from the stage, alright?"

That wasn't too bad, but at another time he started to speak: "This is the people's pop festival. This race track (that's where the festival was held) belongs to the peop... this racetrack belongs to... it belongs to..."

He couldn't finish. Everybody was waiting for him to say whom the racetrack belonged to and he was at a loss for words. In front of 100,000 people. It was very funny and very telling.

When a pop festival promoter tries to tell you about ownership, he's sure to get into hot water.

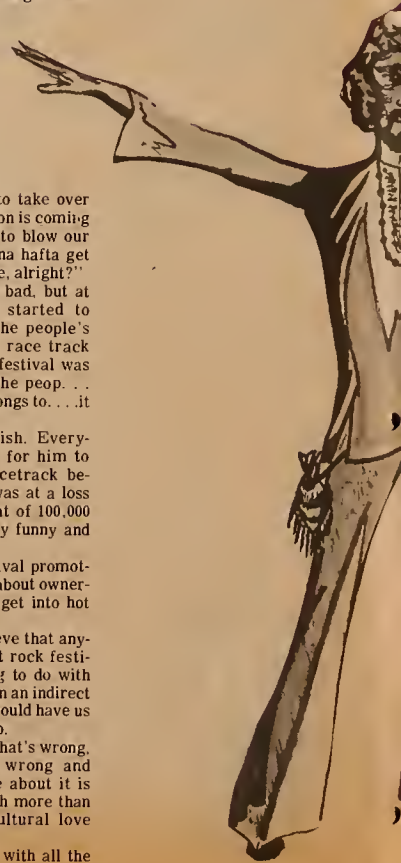

It's hard to believe that anybody believes that rock festivals have anything to do with revolution except in an indirect way and yet they would have us believe that they do.

To understand what's wrong, and who's doing wrong and what's to be done about it is unfortunately much more than the "orgasmic cultural love zonk liberation".

In other words, with all the riots and pop festivals and words spoken, we are probably no nearer "the revolution than we were five years ago. Capitalism is still as powerful and resilient as ever. No winter palaces have fallen. No long march is being conducted across the northland of Canada. No authority has been truly questioned.

In REVIEW's of the past it's been pretty easy to write about the summer. There have been lots of riots and other disturbances to write about. One could analyse things and believe that they were in a state of flux, that something was happening here and you all knew what it was.

But this summer has been different. In a way, it seems as if we've regressed, which brings up the question, "Have we ever moved at all?" Certainly there's been an advancement in consciousness but how many people have that consciousness of what's going on around them?

That's what makes the task so hard this year. We can't afford to sensationalize and yet when you start thinking and projecting about something like pollution and the rape of the environment, you can hardly stifle a scream that starts deep down in your throat and rises until you think that your despair can't be fathomed.

Yet how can you scream on newsprint? You type something with lots of mistakes in spelling and many overtypings on a scrap of paper. You pencil in edits and send it up to the press. The typist types up your scribbblings and produces a punched tape. The tape goes Solutions are like history. They are dynamic, not static. You have to take into account that as you talk of a "problem" it's constantly getting worse.

You have to realize that "problems" are like optical illusions. The rape of our minds by the mass media and education are slow processes whereas the fire-bombing of a bank is a fast one and will receive the attention the former does not get.

In order to deal with "problems" one must have some method of analyzing those problems, not a static "method" but something dynamic yet glued to reality.

What we're trying to get away from is the job of the current mass media — confusion, and cynicism. Any graduation exercise at this university will reveal that the majority of students are not — as is commonly believed — apathetic. They are cynical. In this day and age we cannot afford to be cynical. It's the kind of individualistic, "Everything is so hopelessly confused that I'm just going to try and get my share of the loot, hopefully without hurting too many people on the way." And they find, as they grow older that the world they abandoned is falling around their ears.

The existentialist hero is dead. In modern capitalist society, he's transcended and become a seeker of "the good life". All of us, radical or wishy-washy are similarly co-opted by the good life, for it's impossible to be revolutionary in a society that isn't revolutionary. We lack a sense of history no matter how many degrees we have. None of us are really prophets and it's probably counter-revolutionary to try and be one.

That means that we have to be very careful in pronouncing judgements on our society. So much of it is merely presumptuousness and a waste of energy that would best be spent in an honest analysis. When we say that the corporations produce pollution — that's fine. But what are we going to do about it? We never answer that. Because we don't know.

Look at any citizens' committee to end pollution or violence. See how much real power they have over the real cause of their grievance? Then be humble about it. Realize talking won't solve it.

People are all too ready to compromise a revolutionary outlook because they have acquired a bit of information. What they don't realize is that it's a constant process, that applies to every single action they make.

What it comes down to is a decision of what side you're on.

It's not an easy one to make, because the showdown has not yet arrived. Those who decide what side they're on will have to produce that showdown.

People ask what is there evil in human nature that makes for wars and genocide and inhumanity. Is it original sin? Is it greed? Is it lack of mother-love?

It's hard for any rational person to believe these. It's just that man too easily forgets. He much too easily forgets.

Sadly, in the evolution of radio since Pittsburgh station KDKA began regularly scheduled broadcasts in November 1920 and the CBC was founded in 1936, there has been serious mutations of the genes that produce intelligent radio programming and the CBC Radio is one of the few surviving species on the North American continent that is capable of demonstrating the worth of the genus. These are just the skimmings of a review on the new television season. After the new season builds a bit of a head of steam, lengthier reviews will appear. But for this column a few random glances at some of the shows.

This season two new hour long medical dramas; the anguish and tension of heart transplants and student unrest; older doctor, chief of something, and the younger doctor, subliminally craving to be the chief; rabble-rousing med students... What? The television adaptation of Lewis Feuer's novel, The Conflict of

Generations? Where's Ben Casey, that barrel-chested nimble-fingered neuro-surgeon of the Establishment? TV like it's trying to relate. MARCUS WELBY, M.D. (Ch. 9, Sun. 10 pm and Ch. 7, Tues. 10 pm.) and MEDICAL CENTRE (Ch. 11, Sun. 8 pm and Ch. 4, Wed. 9 pm.)

Along with the regular complement of try-hard comedy shows, there are two that look promising. THE BILL COSBY SHOW (Ch. 6, Thurs. 8 pm and Ch. 2, Sun. 8:30 pm.) takes Cosby off the stage, off the records and makes him Clet Kincaid, the Black PE teacher in the local high school. He loses a bit in the translation; there's no more Cryin' Charlie, Fat Albert or Old Weird Harold. But Cosby's rubber face and body humour carries the show pretty well.

MY WORLD AND WELCOME TO IT (Ch. 6, Sun. 7:30 pm and Ch. 2, Mon. 7:30 pm.) stars William Windom as John Monroe, a James Thurberish magazine cartoonist. He drifts in and out of reveries enlivened by Thurber-style animated cartoons. A Thurber revival is an ambitious and meaty undertaking. But there's a danger in identifying too closely the imaginative Thurber and his fantasizing creation, Walter Miity, with the character of John Monroe. It's a form of oxymoron that threatens to obscure both Thurber and his humour.

No season is quite complete without a smattering of reruns. Reruns placate reactionaries; the guys that remember the good old programs and want to see them all again. This year's stock stretches back to those pubescent nights of yesterday. THE TWILIGHT ZONE is on every week night at 6 pm on channel 7. Also, THE DICK VAN DYKE SHOW is on at least twice and sometimes three times A DAY!! (Ch. 13, 1 pm, Ch. 7, 7 pm and Mon., Wed., and Fri., Ch. 6 at 6 pm.). It was a good comedy series, but the trip over the football three times a day is enough to make even the most loyal Van Dyke fan go bonkers.

There are a lot of lessons to be learned at the Canadian Opera Company this year.

Opening one: The COC decided to treat Johann Strauss' Fledermaus as a satire on current Canadian politics, a frothy and unworthy idea indeed. Pierre Elliot was represented by almost every character in the opera at one time or another. Badly.

The show was light and gay, more in the vein of Gilbert and Sullivan than Strauss. It was amusing, for instance, to note that opera singers can't talk. Nor, when they're talking, act. There were some creditable vocal performances, notably by Gwenlynn Little as Adele and Richard Braun — who can act, despite an inability to talk — as the prison warden.

The timing was all off, from start to finish. A battle between the stage and the orchestra, still going strong two shows later, was entered into with the pit an easy assassin.

Opening two: La Forza del Destino. Verdi. A beautiful show with the finest singing of the season by the enchanting Marina Krilovici. Anthony Besch's elegant staging can be faulted only for its evenness. He was evidently trying to let the production show its own highs and lows, and they would have benefited from a little weighting.

But it was a glorious manifestation of the almost mystical experience that opera can become when music and action unfold on a landscape of almost mythic proportion.

Murray Laufer's sets were pretty well standard Laufer, which is to say excellent, stunning, effective. Their greatest feature is the interesting variety of exits and entrances provided.

It is a tribute to the impressiveness of this Forza that it cut through the biases of opening night critics and engendered an honest reaction. The audience was cautious about showing too much enthusiasm.

Opening three: Electra, by Richard Strauss. It's extremely difficult to discuss this Electra honestly, for to criticize it severely is to endanger the delicate position of modern opera in Canada and in this company in particular. But it's not very good.

The main problem is Astrid Varnay, who plays Electra with several handicaps: a flawed voice, delusions of grace, and an acting talent which, put most kindly, suffers from a little heaviness on the histrionics.

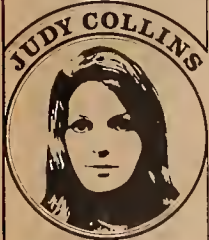

It would be easy to be amusing about Miss Varnay, but the fault is not entirely hers. Director Herman Geiger-Torel gave her moves and gestures for which she simply does not have the style. Consequently she was frequently placed in a position of absurdity. And for those who claim that opera is strictly to be heard and not seen two points. A) They're wrong — the total experience of opera as a genre involves greatly the interplay of visual and aural to a combined effect and B) the voice of Astrid Varnay could certainly not carry this production.

General impressions of the other aspects of staging were not overly memorable — the set, by Lawrence Schafer, was oppressive without conveying any of the many valid reasons for its being so. Torel's direction is on the whole tight and well thought out but lacking mysteriously in potency. Conductor Heinrich Bender almost drowns the singers with his loud, though not insensitive, direction of Stauss' discords.

Three down and two to go at the COC as Leon Major takes to the stage this week. There are a lot of lessons to be learned at the Canadian Opera Company, and it's to be hoped that someone investigates them . . . soon.

film

mother rapers, father stabbers and even worse, father rapers

"You can get anything you want at Alice's Restaurant... cept'n Alice."

But nobody really did — especially Shelly, who was the only one to get Alice. Shelly died. Arlo and his friends have some good times at Alice and Ray's church, and Alice and Ray get married again. Woody suffers and dies, and Roger just seems to enjoy himself.

All this, and a lot more, happens in Alice's Restaurant. It might all have added up to a home-movie, "me and my hippy friends just having some fun." In fact Arlo's sweet, rather ingenious smile seems to suggest that he is enjoying himself immensely most of the time, even with "the mother-rapers, father-stabbers, and even worse." Nonetheless, Arlo's fun has to compete with, or co-exist with, what Ray calls "a lot of death", a bit of roughing up from assorted police, professors and members of the military establishment plus the disintegration of a pitiful, weak hard-drug freak, Shelly (who just might have loved Alice.)

Arthur Penn has made of the hip "family" a jolly group, scarcely degenerate at all (unless one looks too closely).

The group in the Stockbridge Church is fairly loose, but seems also to entail many of the petty miseries and greater sorrows of the 'natural' biological family unit. Alice is not wholly in love with Ray — she loves something about Arlo, and loved something about Shelly. Pat Quinn is brilliant as Alice — very much the over-worked mother figure. "I guess I'm the bitch with too many kids milking her..." She suffers eloquently, if non-verbally, as the film closes with a lovely 'Gothic' shot of the couple almost alone, but still not wholly resigned to one another. Ray uses Alice much too much and ends by being something of an overbearing bully.

The Church itself is a spiritual centre only for a year, but ceases to work as such when the "children leave home", after the spring re-marriage of Alice and Ray. The fun of Alice's Restaurant in the summer, and of the fall "Thanksgiving dinner that couldn't be beat", with its garbage massacre are almost forgotten with the coming of winter and of two deaths. The wedding is held as a celebration of new life and vigour in spring-time, but does not seem to dispel the sadness of lost tempers, small tragedies and the loss of Shelly and Woody.

Watching the neo-family over the course of a year naturally implies some sort of cyclic and ritualistic theme in the film, and there is exactly that. Penn perhaps would like to suggest that the lives of the hip are governed as much by the traditional elements as are the lives of Mr. and Mrs. America.

Alice's Restaurant is also round ninety-nine of the 'us vs. the Establishment' conflict currently battling its way through American films. Arlo is not vehemently against anyone — he just knows that he has a habit of not doing what he doesn't want to do, and of taking sly, sideways digs at what he doesn't like. Nonetheless, he knows he represents the "hairy pervert" element to the draft-board and college crowd as do Captain America and Billy in Easy Rider.

Regrettably for this viewer, two peculiarly uneven elements are worked into Alice's Restaurant. The first is that of Shelly, the misfit, whose weak and formless mouth betrays a softening mind. Shelly is the 'lost son', perhaps, Ray's favourite. He is lost because of a gap in understanding or love (a generation gap?) His funeral is a mixture of attempted tenderness and a mawkish collection of posed hippies musing to a Joni Mitchell song.

One might also object to the leitmotif of "remember my father, Woody", who is played by an actor who does manage to suffer admirably. Lamentably, he and Arlo aren't much alike, and he seems to have been included for the sentimentalists in the crowd.

But there are lovely small portraits, such as the ever-scheming little groupie who wants Arlo to make her because he "might be an album someday", and that of the character of Arlo's long-suffering friend, Roger, who just smiles and smiles through much buffeting.

In general, you may not get everything you want in Alice's Restaurant, but much of it is there. More Arthur Penn's are needed in American cinema, but more importantly, more Arlo's are needed in the world.

blood, guts, gore and the american way

In two films to escape from this past summer's sludge, Easy Rider and The Wild Bunch (yet to be released from the clutches of the Ontario censor), Dennis Hopper and Sam Peckinpah concern themselves with an exploration of celluloid mythology. Both films reveal as much about the Hollywood mythology of violence as they do about the American condition.

Yet, in addition to this icon-smashing, the images, tinted by unremitting exclamations of red, which Hopper and Peckinpah project onto the screen are black in and for themselves. In both films the action occurs not in those locales in which we have become accustomed to witness brutality, violence and death — the street, the ghetto, the jungle — but rather in naturalistic settings which normally we would expect to be far removed from destruction. In The Wild Bunch and Easy Rider flesh is torn apart by steel shotgun pellets under great expanses of sky where it becomes all the more clear and all the more cruel. We seem to be told that the wasteland mentality of John Wayne/George Wallace has touched and polluted everything so that words like innocence and peace have become anachronistic, if not non-existent, in a vocabulary of violence.

Yet, if violence is the language that Peckinpah screams in The Wild Bunch and which Hopper plays upon in Easy Rider, it is also something more than a means of expressing their sentiments. It's a mythology which has fascinated Hollywood (and therefore America) for as long as history has created folk-heroes.

Like other American folk-heroes from Huck Finn to the Apollo astronauts, the central characters in The Wild Bunch and Easy Rider are framed by the tradition of the picaresque — a journey in which the hero is confronted and tested by a variety of experiences before achieving his goal. In The Wild Bunch, Peckinpah deals with five marauding outlaws who, after fleeing the law (an equally wild bunch of bounty hunters) and escaping to Mexico, are confronted by a murderous Mexican general's army and who rob an American Army munitions train only because their leader wants to pull one final perfect job before retiring. Similarly, in Easy Rider, Hopper and Fonda play two cocaine pushers who, after making a big transaction, also flee, this time from L.A. to a retirement in Florida, on huge customized, chromium-engined bikes, only to be ultimately cut in half by two blasts from a redneck farmer's 12-gauge shotgun.

Although the central characters in both films seek a release from violence, the prevailing mood is frightening since they succeed only in escaping into increasingly bloody situations. Here catharsis comes shot from the barrels of guns.

Despite the fact that the stylized narrative of folk-legend is still present (The Wild Bunch IS a Western and Easy Rider IS an adventure/travelogue), the effect in these two films is to show the brutality that is created in the mind by Hollywood's fairytales of death. In their films Peckinpah and Hopper concern themselves as did Lester in How I Won the War, not so much with the situation as with the false glorification of death perpetuated by legend and myth. Both films present us with the much-analyzed vocabulary of violence in America, but they do so only to re-define Hollywood's romantic interpretation of violence in terms of angry present truths.

In most Hollywood films of the past (as we all have known since our first Randolph Scott Western), when good faced bad both social and cinematic justice was served with the quick, clean death of the evil one. But as Hopper and Peckinpah are aware, the danger of this attitude to death is that it often becomes difficult to realize that in reality death IS death IS death.

In Easy Rider, Hopper, Fonda and Terry Southern explore this mythology from the viewpoint of a documentary-tinted feature and do so with a reasonable degree of objectivity and honesty. But as Sam Peckinpah has realized, the most effective way to explore a myth is from the inside. Peckinpah's familiarity with Western fairytales (Ride the High Country) makes The Wild Bunch a brilliant examination of his theme and as visually poetic as it is grotesque.

In The Wild Bunch, Peckinpah repeatedly underlines the fact that his film is dealing with the mythology of violence as seen through fantasy, not reality. The violence is of the 'Catch-22' type — hyperbolic, casual, brutal and often without seeming to be motivated by any sense of rationalism. Death is both fantastic and ritualistic because of the extensive use of slow motion which both crystallizes the gruesomeness and transforms the slaughters into something like beautifully choreographed ballets.

The metaphor that Peckinpah uses to represent this mythology isn't blood, rapid-fire shotguns, automatic pistols or machine guns, but children and their games. Children represent the fantastical side of Hollywood violence in The Wild Bunch, or is it the violent side of American fantasy?

During the massacre in the little Texas town at the outset of the film, two children watch emotionlessly, perfectly resigned to the pulse of blood and as the 'Bunch' race out of town we see children again, this time shooting with play-like innocence at the pile of corpses in the street. Near the end of the film, a small Mexican boy dressed in an over-sized army uniform is the one who finally kills the leader of the Bunch. In the context of the film his death becomes nemetic rather than ironic.

As Lindsay Anderson told us in the war games scene in If... and as Peter Brook pointed out earlier in Lord of the Flies, children do not so much imitate their elders as their elders only extend children's games into what we have chosen to call 'reality'. Even the entire Generalissimo's army in The Wild Bunch is consistently represented as being little more than a band of children engaged in a game of death. In fact, everyone in the film — the guards on the munitions train, the bounty hunters, the Bunch themselves — betray their affinity to children. Violence becomes an unanswerable question in Peckinpah's film — which of its forms is more gruesome or more real — the death of James Sanchez after his throat is slashed open by the Generalissimo, or the death of the scorpion at the beginning of the film as it is devoured alive by red ants and then set aflame by a group of children?

Whereas Peckinpah sees violence from the inside of the myth, Hopper chooses to examine it from the outside. Easy Rider is a well-documented series of glimpses, strung together by the electricity of Jimi Hendrix, Steppenwolf, The Band and long deserted highways, into the mythology of violence as it has affected the mind of contemporary America. Images pile up, frame over frame, in Easy Rider until the mythology of violence becomes so confused with the mythology of money, manhood and the Right that what we are left with is a contemporary nightmare. The screen becomes full of blackened colours — a country terrified of change and fearful of freedom in which bigotry is combined with violence in the name of justice.

The only releases offered by Hopper and Fonda are an obvious Jack Kerouacian 'On-the-Road' philosophy and drugs. Acid and grass alone in the film seem to inspire the only persistent expressions of personal, inner feelings. Drugs are not escape routes in Easy Rider but rather the only means that Ginsberg's generation of "angleheaded hipsters" find hope.

If Hollywood has spent decades building its myths, Peckinpah, Hopper and Fonda have done all they can honestly do in The Wild Bunch and Easy Rider to tear them down. Perhaps these two films, and others like Francis Ford Coppola's The Rain People and Arthur Penn's Alice's Restaurant, point the way to the destruction not only of the Hollywood mythology of violence but also of Hollywood itself.

MUSIC

McKendree Spring at the Riverboat has a pleasant and smooth electrified folk sound with touches of country and jazz showing through occasionally. The group consists of a lead singer who also plays hythm on an electric hollow-body, a lead guitar, bass, and an electrified violin.

Their songs are interesting and well-played, if not always particularly exciting. The singer has a good voice which is suited to their basically folk material and he plays strong rhythm while the bass and lead offer a solid support which blends together well. In the songs the violinist didn't add very much to the group's effect, and even put in a few jarring notes, but when given a chance to do something on his own, while the singer was changing a broken string, he improvised a fine extended instrumental solo with the kind of gypsy-Turkish effects that Kaleidoscope has popularized, showing some of the imagination and drive that the group could use a little more of in their total sound.

Considering how difficult it is for a group as eclectic as McKendree Spring to sound together they do remarkably well and their music is a pleasant change from super-amplified heavy rock.

BOOKS

"FIND OUT WHAT MAKES YOU TICK"

But I don't, and finding myself offended in a variety of other ways with their somewhat pathological advertising I'm not really excited about what is quite probably an interesting and perhaps even valuable magazine.

The Book of Life magazine series appears to have a colourful and interesting layout design and editorial policy aimed at pleasing as well as informing. However their advertising policy sounds as if they are trying to sell some form of psychotic sexuality to robots: "probes deeper into your body" . . . "deeper and deeper into your body and your mind. . ." and after all that groovy stuff it implies that you "tick"!!! maybe there will be a special issue about robots and time-bombs. . .

The magazine is nice, but the advertising doesn't make it, unless, of course, you are a robot ot ot ot ot ot ot ot tttttbz

FILM

If shorts have recently appeared to be a dead film-form, a programme offered by Janus Films on Oct. 10-12 at Ryerson Theatre is guaranteed to restore your faith. Among the more memorable pieces to be screened are Wolfgang Urch's brilliant animated study of technology and its effects on us — Machina; George Coe's infamous 15 minute demolition of every sacred Bergman image — The Dove; and Polanski's second film, The Strong and the Weak — a study in pantomime of oppression and imprisonment.

THEATRE

Rochdale's Theatre Passe Muraille, the folks who brought you Futz, plans a three-play season for this year — Paul Foster's Tom Paine, near the end of November, David Helwig's The Hanging of William O'Donnell, and something called The Metropolitan Police Dossier. Other dates haven't been announced yet but a request for support has. For $17 (or $25 if you're not a student) you become a "patron-member", which means you get into these plays and into members-only workshops, get sent their new quarterly newspaper, and get put on their mailing list. disagreed. He pointed out that Bissell had not repudiated the most objectionable parts of the CPOU paper — the definitions, taken from Harvard, of what constituted "illegitimate and unacceptable activities."
"No parts of the paper are acceptable," he said. "The whole statement needs to be completely repudiated."

ABOLS ABSTAINS

SAC president Gus Abols was one of five members to abstain on the issue.

"I agree with the first two parts of the motion," Abols said, "But I found I could not in good faith support an ultimatum when in effect SAC has not come up with an alternative policy."

"I felt if SAC had tonight hammered out what it could do and proposed that as a reasonable alternative we could have issued that ultimatum so that the administration would accept that policy."

CONDEMNS BARKWELL

Abols also reiterated the accusation he made Tuesday at the meeting of the committee to reconstitute Caput that the SAC representatives on that committee, Bob Barkwell and Greg Kealy, had acted in a way that was "counter-productive and showed a lack of good faith."

"Barkwell and Kealy, members of the New Left Caucus, have done everything possible to avoid dealing with the issue constructively," he said.

"Rather, they have avoided it so that they could participate in the New Left Caucus strategy of confrontation at any meeting, in any classroom, whether the people had assembled for that purpose or not."
Abols suggested that if SAC decides to reinstate representatives on the committee they be elected by the whole body of SAC or by the entire campus, not just the executive, and that they not be affiliated with any political group.

Abols' comments evoked a furious response from former SAC rep Alberto di Giovanni (III SMC)

"I think the action Barkwell and Kealey took was the only intelligent action any student could take at that point," he said.

PERSONAL ATTACK

Barkwell declined to discuss what he considered a personal attack from Abols. "As long as that statement is the basis of discussion, we're discussing not whether we're going to be repressed but how much we're going to be repressed — and I am not willing to do that," he said.

Michael Vaughan, President of the Graduate Students' Union supported the six demands made by SAC. He announced that the GSU executive had moved at an emergency meeting Wednesday afternoon that:

o Bissell's statement was totally unacceptable and should be repudiated o a committee made up of representatives of all parts of the university community except the administration be set up to consider disciplinary policy with respect to demonstrations, obstructionism and violence with the intention of arriving at a unified staff-student policy.

Vaughan also supported the SAC position Tuesday when he withdrew from the committee to reconstitute Caput, following the example of Barkwell and Kealy.

NEW COMPLAINT

Rick McDowell (IV UC), a member of the Campbell committee since its inception in April 1968, found an additional section of Bissell's letter to get angry about.

In the letter Bissell urged students and staff "to provide the university in this interim period with the kind of body that can make decisions in all disciplinary matters, on the understanding that such a body could be modified in the light of the reports of the Campbell committee and the Commission on University Government."

The understanding of these committees was that they would make much more radical changes than mere modifications on existing structures, McDowell complained.

"This kind of statement will make it difficult for us to complete our report," he said.

AGREEMENT IMPOSSIBLE

At the meeting in Hart House Tuesday McDowell said, "Given the tenor of the CPOU paper, I think it clearly is going to be almost impossible for the Campbell commission to reach agreement."

The report of the commission is expected early next week.

Amending a motion made by Art McLwain that SAC form a committee made up of representatives of all parts of the university community except the administration to set forth guidelines on disciplinary procedure, SAC decided to postpone formulating any policy on discipline until after the Campbell committee reports or until the next SAC meeting, whichever comes earlier.

SAC also gave its official support to the mass meeting Thursday in Convocation Hall although any decision made by that meeting would not be binding on SAC.

Housing scene tough but not critical

By JIM STRUTHERS

"Although there has been a heavier demand on the Housing Service for accommodation than in other years, there has not been the same evidence of frustration and discouragement. Students have been able to find accommodation, but not always apartments and flats."

This was how Mrs. Mary Jaffary, director of the Housing Service, described the situation which faced many University of Toronto students this year.

The most critical problem, she said, is the significant lack of both apartments and flats brought about the unwillingness of Toronto landlords to rent to students.

As a consequence, all of these organizations reported significant increases in the number of applications received this year and with very few exceptions, most available spaces have been taken.

The following is a general breakdown of the situation in the university residences:

NEW COLLEGE

Despite a $60.00 increase in fees, to $1010.00 from $950.00 for Arts and Science students, Wetmore Hall is still filled to capacity.

New College's Wilson Hall, with a comparable increase in fees, reported that approximately 10 spaces were still available out of a total of 326.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE

The Sir Daniel Wilson Men's Residence now reports 3 and possibly 4 single rooms available due to last-minute cancellations. Residents here were also hit by a fees increase of $65.00, thus raising the price of room and board to $1009.00.

Whitney Hall, the women's residence, experienced a rise in fees as well, to $1008.00 from $928.00 for room and board and the residence office reports that due to cancellations, 10 spaces are still available. First year residents numbered 81 out of a total 222.

DEVONSHIRE HOUSE

This men's residence is reported to be completely full, with a room going for about $570.00 depending on your faculty. The proportion of freshmen remained about the same as last year, 44 out of a total of 188.

TRINITY COLLEGE

Both men and women residences in this college are full and both report fee increases as well. Room and board in the men's residence will cost you $995.00, up from $865.00 and at St. Hilda's $970.00, up from $840.00. The number of freshmen in each residence is always kept constant at 44 out of a total of 217 in the men's and 30 out of 135 in the women's.

VICTORIA COLLEGE

Victoria College residents were also caught in a rise in residence fees with room and board at Burwash Hall jumping from $975.00 to $1015.00. In Margaret Addison fees jumped to $890.00 from $850.00 in 1968.

Both residences were reported full.

The two easily discernible trends in the university residences this year were a general rise in fees ranging from a low of $40.00 to a high of $80.00 and a decrease in the number of freshmen being admitted.

While not offering a remarkable bargain in terms of rent (one bedroom starts at $135.00; two bedrooms at $156.00), they do offer accommodation which is both close to the university and available for families.

Suffering, not politics, says Burke

Stanley Burke couldn't care less whether Biafra is independent or not.

"I am definitely not pro-Biafra," Burke said at a meeting Wednesday night. "I couldn't care less whether in the end Nigeria is united or not. Let them hang Ojukwu (the Biafran's leader) if they so decide."

Burke, who resigned from the CBC's news department following a trip to Biafra, was on campus to recruit members for a new organization dedicated to ending the war in Biafra. The organization was to have been called Interpax, but that name conflicts with an established group. Burke's group has not found a new name, but the university branch will be called Unipax.

The group will attempt to pressure the Canadian government into taking action on the Biafran situation. Burke himself is inviting many influential people into his movement, which will soon circulate petitions in the home ridings of External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp and Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau. It feels that by pressuring people in power, it can bring about quick action by the government.

Of greatest importance to Burke is resumption of relief flights to Biafra. He is now working closely with Canair Relief in an attempt to convince the Canadian Government to resume flights of its Hercules transport planes.

The Committee For Solidarity with Striking Workers is sponsoring a demonstration in support of the striking nickel workers in Sudbury.

The committee said the purpose of the demonstration is to protest "Inco's cynical manipulation of the striking nickel workers and the Canadian public.

The demonstration will take place at the International Nickel Company's offices at the Toronto-Dominion Centre of Bay and King Streets on Saturday, Sept. 27 at 11 a.m.

BEING ACCEPTED

Last September the SAC called on the university administration to centralize authority for University housing development and administration by establishing a Student-Faculty committee to supersede all existing committees.

This committee was set up last year. There were seven students and six faculty members and was chaired by Prof. D. F. Forster.

Student representatives have to be reappointed this year and the SAC shall do so in consultation with the GSU and residence councils.

Please apply in writing, stating your background, qualifications and your reasons for being interested in serving on this committee.

Applications are to be sent to the SAC office.

Davis probes alleged fake plans at Ryerson

Education Minister William Davis will head an investigation into alleged mismanagement and fraud in the development of expansion plans for Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, Premier John Robarts announced yesterday.

The charges were made Monday by students Richard

Finlay, 22, and Gordon Jackson, 23, who resigned from the Ryerson Board of Governors over what they called fake expansion plans presented to city planners by the institute.

The controversy centres on two sets of expansion plans drawn up by the Ryerson Board.

The first was a design for short-term growth, while the second was to be kept as a guide for long-term development.

Board vice-chairman J. S. MacKay said in a release Tuesday that Jackson and Finlay "confused long range planning with the practicalities as dictated by available land and money, and academic need."

The second plan, concerning consideration of means of future accommodation, would "await city and Ontario Municipal Board approval" said MacKay.

"The board has at all times acted out of concern for the students, the taxpayers of the province and all members of the Ryerson community," said board-member W. M. Kelly.

The board issued a statement Monday saying the failure of these students to participate effectively in board affairs was "peculiar to the men themselves."

Premier Robarts, in his answering letter to Finlay and Jackson, said he had no reason to believe that they had been a "disruptive influence" on the board.

New College supports SAC ultimatum to Bissel

New College student council voted last night to support the Student Administrative Council's six demands to the administration on university discipline.

The motion to support SAC was brought up after New College SAC rep Chris Szalwinski explained the background of the discipline issue and SAC's reasons for making the demands. There seemed to be general support for SAC's actions and the motion passed with only one person opposed

"We have decided to back SAC up to this point," said council vice-president Eric Platt.

"Any further decision concerning this matter will have to be considered in full by the council," he added.

"This issue concerns every student on campus," said SAC rep Ceta Ramkhalawansingh.

"It's good that the New College council decided to support SAC's demands," she said, "I hope the other college councils do the same."

The council also decided to censure the New College administration for its policy of not allowing non residents into the college after midnight.

Said Miss Ramkhalawansingh who made the motion. "This policy is not conducive to a college atmosphere. Non-resident New College students cannot study here after midnight, even if they have nowhere else to go."

Council president Jon Fidler said he would take the decision to the New College administration council for discussion.

A weekend conference of a pro-Arab group, the Committee for the Liberation of Palestine, has resulted in the organization of a counter-group: Students for Jewish Survival.

Organized by Abie Pesses, past president of U of T's Hillel chapter, the group plans a demonstration today at noon in Sidney Smith Hall. They will march to Rochdale College, scene of the weekend conference.

"By allowing the Committee for the Liberation of Palestine to use its premises for a conference," Pesses said, "Rochdale is assuming complicity in genocide."

Pesses has also asked U of T professors to cancel lectures from noon to 2 p.m. to show that "the University of Toronto will not sit and watch while a meeting for Jewish genocide goes unchecked."

Teacher held prisoner five minutes

BOSTON — The FBI has been asked to investigate the movement of Students for a Democratic Society members into Boston high schools, the Boston school committee said yesterday.

Committee chairman John Kerrigan admitted the action "might shock the pants off some of our liberals and libertarians."

He said "I hope for arrests and prosecutions" in any further incidents of SDS disruption of classrooms.

On Wednesday a teacher at Girl's Latin School said she was held prisoner in her own classroom for five minutes while five girls, allegedly SDS members, lectured the students on reform and revolution.

Windsor cuts OUS

WINDSOR (CUP) — When the University of Windsor students' council made up its budget and ratified it Thursday, they left out the Ontario Union of Students.

Faced with a $28,000 deficit left from last year's council, the Windsor students decided they couldn't afford the provincial union and proceeded to save approximately $1,300.

"Windsor still wants to be a member of OUS," said council president Wayne Yared. "We will ask OUS to accept us as non-paying members. If OUS wants us to be a member they will have to accept us on those terms."

All areas on the Windsor budget were drastically cut. OUS president Jim Kehoe said Thursday that "some arrangement could be worked out to keep Windsor in the provincial union without payment of fees."

OHSIP plan will boost student medical costs

TORONTO (CUP) — University students from campuses across Ontario are considering a mass march on Queen's Park to protest the beginning of medicare on Oct. 1 and the higher premiums the compulsory medical scheme will mean to most students.

Student representatives will meet in Guelph this Saturday to discuss the medicare question.

Michael Vaughan, president of the Graduate Student Union, said the Ontario Hospital Services Insurance Plan will mean a large increase in medical costs to many students.

At U of T single students are now able to purchase medical insurance for $29 a year under a private plan. Beginning Oct. 1, basically the same coverage will cost $69, Vaughan said.

CPUO makes (another?) decision

The Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario has reached a decision on the number of non-Canadian faculty members in Canadian Universities.

The statement reads: "that scholarship is universal and that nationality and place of birth are in themselves irrelevant." No quota system will be imposed and no preference will be given to native Canadians.

However, the statement recommends a fuller advertising program for 'academic vacancies' in Canadian University publications.

Watkins on a socialist Canada

Prof. Mel Watkins will present his views on a socialist Canada at a Young New Democrats seminar here this weekend.

In a controversial document "For an Independent Socialist Canada", released Sept. 4, Watkins outlined his views for introducing socialism in Canada. Watkins advocated severing economic ties with the U.S.

Watkins feels that the power in this country should be redistributed, giving the working class control of industrial decision making.

The seminar will be at Hart House from 9:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Saturday and from 12:30 to 6 p.m. at Sidney Smith Hall.

Pollution Probe scores again

A "delighted" Dr. Donald Chant, a prominent member of Pollution Probe said yesterday that his group had almost "completely achieved its aim" in limiting the use of DDT in Ontario.

Dr. Chant, chairman of the Department of Zoology, said the provincial government's decision to ban the use of the chemical, except in a few authorized cases, would result in a 90 per cent reduction in the use of the insecticide.

He said that his next target is the Federal Government as well as the remaining Provincial Governments in Canada.

"Now that we have cleaned up our own house, we don't want other peoples' dirt tracking up our hallways," said Chant noting that the use of DDT anywhere in North America affects the food here.

In the future he hopes to attack the sewage and industrial waste that contribute to water pollution.

He dismissed as an "exaggerated claim" yesterday's report that a new lime sewage process would cut down pollution by 92 per cent.

Blue and White may fold

The Blue and White Society may fold within two months according to interim chairman Wayne Pulver (1 Dents).

Pulver said yesterday that unless the society finds a permanent chairman very soon, it will cease to function after the beginning of November.

Pulver is acting as chairman and has planned activities for the society until Homecoming, Oct. 31 - Nov. 2, but said he cannot continue the post after that.

"Due to schoolwork and my other SAC activities, I won't have the time to run the Blue and White society," he said. Pulver is New College SAC rep.

Little interest has been shown in the Blue and White Society over the past couple of years, and Pulver wondered whether it could serve a useful purpose anymore. He said there was too much apathy on campus and too many other activities going on in the city for the society to be effective.

"We ran free concerts and films last year, but we have to make some money before we can do it again," he said.

He also felt poor organization in the past has hindered the society. Last year's chairman, Abe Mudrick, was not elected to the post and ran the society in what Pulver termed "a dogmatic fashion."

Mudrick had applied to be chairman again, but he wanted 90 per cent of the society's profits for his efforts. These terms were unacceptable to SAC, and the society does not have a chairman now.

"We've advertised for a chairman but nobody's applied," said Pulver.

The Varsity wishes to clarify statements made in Wednesday's issue concerning Dr. A. B. B. Moore's retirement as President of Victoria University.
 Dr. Moore will continue as president until July 1, 1970, at which time he will be succeeded by Prof. J. E. Hodgetts, who has been principal of Victoria College since 1967.
 Prof. Hodgetts was chosen to succeed Dr. Moore last spring by a student-faculty-administration committee. His appointment was ratified by the Victoria University Board of Regents during the summer.

Murph promises Warriors 'something special'

By PAUL CARSON

"Forget that Waterloo's an expansion team." Murph was saying last night. "They're a big strong club; this isn't going to be an easy game, not easy at all."

Now starting his fourth year at the helm of the local heroes, Murph is not just playing the traditional game of "build up the opposition."

Last year, a heavily-favoured Toronto team waltzed into Waterloo for what should have been a laugher against the Warriors.

However, Waterloo halfback Gord McLellan put on a dazzling one-man show and Blues had to block three converts just to salvage a tie.

McLellan garnered three touch-downs, one on a scintillating 50-yard run.

"Don't worry, this time we have something extra special ready for him," Murphy said.

What's that?
"Why don't you come to the game and see for yourself?"

Fair enough.

Blues starting backfield features Vic Alboini at quarterback and last year's rookie sensation, Walt Sehr, leading the running attack. As Sehr must replace Copp and Omega Trophy winner Mike Raham, he must produce a fantastic season just to avoid unfavorable comparisons.

Outstanding rookie Cor Dorset will start in one of the other runningback spots, and Murph has switched all-star split end Eric Walter to flanker "so he'll have a little more room to maneuver."

Biggest surprise is the choice of veteran defensive halfbackplace kicker Bill Stankovic for the final running-back slot.

It was actually quite simple, according to the genial coach. "Stankovic has been running real hard in scrimmages, he ran very well against Western, so why not? He's earned it."

In other position changes, John Chapman moves to split end Rick Agro, last season's all-star centre, becomes an interior linebacker.

RUGGER

The Varsity Blues Rugger Team began the season's contact with other teams last Wednesday with a trial match at York University.

The game was very scrappy with especially uninspired play by the Blue forwards whose only unifying force was the continuous verbal barrage and strong play of captain and pack leader, Graehem Wynn.

Our weakness, fortunately, was more than balanced by the ineptitude of the York 3/4 line which only rarely managed to get the ball to its speedy wingers.

BOTH TEAMS USED SUBS FREELY

The opening kickoff put the ball deep into York territory and their forwards, with assertive loose ruck play, advanced the ball into Blues' territory. After a long period of erratic play, staccatoed by the over-zealous whistles of the referee, Maher intercepted a bad pass by a York centre and sprinted forty yards for the first try of the game.

A strong headwind foiled Cairns' convert attempt and the score remained 3-0 for Toronto. York forged back into Toronto territory but were foiled by lead-belly fullback Larry McKenna who stopped a point-blank grub kick by the attacking York pack.

Toronto won the loose ruck and the subsequent advance down the field was completed with a try by Segsworth, an import to the Toronto squad. Undaunted, the York team forged back and scored their only points of the match with a penalty kick by Hunter to make the score at the half, Toronto 6 York 3.

In a trial game, substitutions are allowed so York replaced about half of their starting team with second team players while Toronto replaced wing forwards vanBanning and Henry with Dicke and McAlister.

York kicked off to Toronto and the Blue pack, a little more accustomed to working together, gained more possession of the ball in all phases of play and despite two York penetrations to the Toronto 5 yard line, were able to set up tries by McKenna, Owens and Wynn, two of which were converted by scrum-half, Andy Cairns.

The try by Wynn occurred following a high kick by the Toronto fly-half that caused the York winger and fullback to knock each other flat, delivering the ball into the surprised captain's hands and enabling him to charge over for the score. All in all it was an exciting game, the Blues showing potential that can be brought out with more training and concentration on teamwork. The final score — Toronto 22, York 3.

Two of Blues 1968 SIFL All-Stars

Nine new faces crack tough Blues lineup

Less than four weeks ago, about 55 eager and talented rookies began workouts in their quest for a position on the football Blues. Of this group, four lucky frosh will play their first varsity game tomorrow.

WAYNE DUNKLEY — a 170-pound Metro All-Star from Monarch Park, he'll be back up man to veteran Blues signal called Vic Alboini. Wayne came off a rather average performance in Guelph to directed a powerful Varsity running attack last week against Western. "Watch him," says Murph, "in a couple of years he will be great, simply great."

JODY ORTVED — a product of the traditionally well-coached teams at UTS, Jody has won a starting position in Blues defensive secondary, and that's not an easy lineup to crack. He's 5'10" and 175 pounds. Films of the Western game indicate the controversial pass interference call against Ortved was close enough to have gone either way. He's also experienced in hockey and track.

CORRADINO (COR) DORET — another Metro All-Star lured to Varsity by coach Murphy, his fine play in both pre-season games has won him a spot in the starting offensive backfield. His powerful running produced a clever td against Guelph and he bulled for what should have been the winner last week. "Doret's given us the running and his blocking isn't bad for a rookie," says Murph.

GRANT HINCHCLIFFE — still more All-Star material for the Varsity coaches. Hinch has an excellent chance of displacing Mark Slater at tight end. A graduate of Leaside, he packs 187 pounds on a 6'1" frame and is a devastating blocker.

In addition to these four legitimate rooks, Blues will dress five other "quasi-rookies", players who have previous training camp and interfac experience but haven't seen any significant action before this season.

RANDY MYERS, a product of Vic's Mulock champions, has won a spot on the roster as a backup halfback. He's 5'11", and a grad of Scarlett Heights.

REIN ENNO has been a most pleasant surprise during training camp, and seems to have offensive center all locked up. He practiced with Blues last year but saw very little game action.

BOB POTTS, backup guard and linebacker, is another Mulock winner who's made it to the intercollegiate league. A real Vic vet, he starred on four interfac championship teams.

DAVE GEE might start at tackle if Norm Trainor's knee ankle problems don't clear up before Saturday. He's another veteran of interfac — you guessed it — at Vic. Now you know how the SCARLET AND GOLD keeps on winning.

HARTLEY STERN — finally, a graduate of interfac who didn't play for Vic, but maybe he wishes he did. Hartley, an outstanding athlete at Forest Hill, did and died for gutsy Meds in the Mulock final. Now he's playing with Myers, Potts and Gee; he made a key interception against Western and should start in one of the corner linebacking slots.

And how do you classify a graduate of the Notre Dame glory teams of the mid-sixties and a late cut of Argos last year? At 26, Pete Lamantia is hardly a rookie, but it's his first regular season game as a Blue. A deadly open-field tackler, he'll probably start in the defensive secondary.

EXCELLENT DEPTH AT ALL POSITIONS

The win shows that the gaps left in the 3/4 line by the departure of Wraw, Pierre, Sutherland and Pibbs have been well filled by new players from Great Britain, New Zealand, Australia and the United States.

As for the pack, the eight positions are filled by seasoned veterans and several very competitive newcomers. The team this year has very good depth so that for virtually all fifteen positions, there are at least two hot contenders and since captain Wynn has stated that first team selections, made two days previous to each match, will be based on recent performance in games and practises, rather than past reputation, all competent players will play in some First Team games.

The test of the Blues' depth comes this weekend when two full teams will travel to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor for two games, continuing the exchange plan between the two universities. Despite their large size Michigan, in the past two years, has failed to defeat either Toronto team because of lack of knowledge of the game, but Toronto is expecting the worst and has been training vigorously all week.

CHRISTMAS TOUR PLANNED

This Christmas, following the regular season, Toronto will send a team and several reserves to Great Britain for a tour of games with eight British clubs. For this reason, we will need extra support from both interested players and fans at practises and games so consult this column every Monday for reports on weekend games and match schedules for the week. Blue buttons supporting Rugger are now on sale by several players and will be available at all games. The proceeds all go towards the cost of the tour, and since the players must pay most of the costs themselves, your purchase of one of these witty buttons would be greatly appreciated.

REPORT FAVOURS TOTAL OVERHAUL OF DISCIPLINE

By DAVID FRANK

University of Toronto President Claude Bissell last night released the text of an 88-page report proposing sweeping and radical changes in the disciplinary procedures at this university.

The report was prepared by a 10-man presidential advisory committee which President Bissell appointed in February 1968.

Chairman of the committee was Prof. D. R. Campbell.

The report proposes replacing the present supreme disciplinary body, the Caput, composed of 24 top faculty and administrators, with a system of tribunals composed of elected students and faculty.

The report proposes completely new machinery for the administration of discipline, proposes guidelines for new rules as well as recommending certain specific changes in university rules.

The role of disciplinary rules and procedures, reads the report, is "to help members of the University perform their functions of teaching and learning, of research, and of critical analysis."

The following were formulated by the committee as basic principles:

- The university has no interest in the personal behavior of staff or students except where this may affect their ability to perform their duties.

- The doctrine of "in loco parentis" should be rejected. The university should assume students are "sufficiently mature that they should make their own decisions concerning moral and social behavior."

- No member of the university should receive special treatment in cases involving infraction of the law. For instance, charges of theft on campus would not be dealt with by the campus tribunals.

- Mediation committees should be established to try to reach voluntary solutions to disputes arising in the classroom. This would include dis-

Campus disruptions

The Campbell Report, in dealing with the issue of campus demonstrations, classifies protest in three main categories:

- off-campus demonstrations. These are outside the university's jurisdiction.

- "Non-disruptive" demonstrations which occur on campus. The Campbell Report says the university should "actively accommodate such protest and protect demonstrators, forcibly if need be." This would include picketing, distribution of literature, etc. as well as rallies and marches which "do not interfere with the performance of the essential educational function of the University."

- "Disruptive" demonstrations. The report recognizes that in the last several years many of this type of demonstration have occurred.

The report defines such demonstrations and stresses that disruptions are "not simply due to a conspiracy of a small group of revolutionaries," but are often symptoms of "much wider discontent."

The report suggests that the restructuring of university government in line with democratic decision-making recommended by the CUG report, "should help to prevent those disruptive demonstrations that arise . . . because of ignorance on the part of demonstrators; insensitivity on the part of administrators and inadequate means of consultation and discussion between the two."

Among disruptive demonstrations, reads the report, there are two types: those which are "violent or destructive in character" and those which are "simply obstructive."

Campbell thus recognizes that "a given disruptive demonstration may prove to be justified."

No action was taken when the Toronto Student Movement disrupted Clark Kerr's lecture last year. What would happen this year?

THE WHEELS OF JUSTICE

The Campbell Report would replace the present supreme disciplinary body, the Caput, composed of 24 top faculty and administrators and meeting in secret, with a system of joint staff and student tribunals, mediation and hearing committees.

- Mediation committees would deal with disputes arising in out of the teaching-learning function of the university. This would include such matters as grading, course content, etc.

These committees would be composed equally of elected students and faculty, could impose no penalties and would have to attempt to reach a voluntary settlement of the dispute. If they failed, the matter would be passed on to the appropriate superior tribunal.

- Within each of the eight colleges, plus the faculty of arts and science, engineering, medicine, dentistry and graduate school, and division of extension, a tribunal would try cases arising in the classroom, and which mediation committees could not resolve.

They could impose, by a majority vote, penalties ranging from "censure", suspension of students or faculty for up to six months or the remainder of the academic year. If the penalty involved loss of remuneration or the loss of an academic year, at least four of the five members of the panel hearing the case would have to concur.

- A recommendation that a student be expelled or a faculty member dismissed would require a four-fifths vote of the panel hearing the case. Such a recommendation would result in formation of a hearing committee to consider the matter. In effect this procedure makes expulsion or dismissal as difficult and tedious a process as dismissing a faculty member enjoying tenure.

The tribunals would consist of nine staff and nine students each, plus non-voting chairmen, preferably with legal experience. Cases would be heard by panels of three students and two faculty (in the case of a student accused) or three faculty and two staff if the accused is a staff member.

Tribunal membership would be determined by lot, using the university computer. This method, says the report, "should prevent any hint of bias in selection and it would avoid the dangers of the intermingling of elections with judicial matters and conduct." All members of the appropriate faculty and student body would be eligible to sit on tribunals of the college, faculty, school or division to which they belong.

The highest campus court would be the University Tribunal. It would be a court of appeal from the lower tribunals and a court of first instance in cases involving cross-campus regulations such as rules regarding research, social offences, and defamatory publications, as well as action regarding demonstrations and protests.

This tribunal would have the same powers to impose penalties as the lower tribunals.

It would consist of appointed representatives of the following groups: Association of the Teaching Staff (nine members), Graduates Student Union (two members), Students Administrative Council (six members) and the Extension Students Union (one member).

putes over course content, grading, etc.

• The procedures of the tribunals must be in accord with the rules of "natural justice". This means an end to the Star Chamber-style proceedings employed by the present Campus.

• Off-campus activities of students and faculty should "only on rare occasions" be the concern of the university. Intervention would be warranted where "the performance of the functions of the university are adversely affected." This is meant to apply to over-involvement in off-campus commitments to the detriment of one's academic performance.

• The whole disciplinary set-up should be decentralized. This would mean creation of "lower tribunals" at the college, school, and faculty level as well as creation of a "university tribunal."

• All disciplinary bodies should consist entirely of students and faculty, chosen either by vote or lot. A panel of three students and two staff would hear cases involving a student, while a faculty member would be tried by a majority of his peers.

The guidelines for university rules which the Report proposes are as follows:

TEACHING-LEARNING

In any course the students and the instructor should attempt to reach agreement on approach and procedures in the course. If disputes which cannot be resolved arise they will go on to the mediation committees and then to the lower tribunals.

"Any student or instructor," reads the report, "has the right to question whether the course content is in accordance with the course outline, to question grading practices or persistent failure to appear for classes, to complain of alleged discrimination, or to protest recurrent disruption and so forth."

Cheating, plagiarism, and similar offences would be handled by the lower tribunals. The same holds for cheating on exams.

Falsification of records also goes to the appropriate tribunal, as well as forging of letters of recommendation.

How it would work

There would also be a non-voting chairman with legal background appointed for a one or two-year term.

Five-man panels would be selected by lot to hear each case.

Each individual tribunal will decide at the outset of a case

Students should have the right to appeal academic rulings regarding standing, petitions, etc.

RESEARCH

Members of the university should enjoy complete freedom in the selection of research projects subject to three qualifications:

• No secret research should be performed using university facilities.

• In research involving human subjects precautions must be taken to ensure "the physical or mental health or dignity of the subjects."

• Research hazardous to persons or property should be cleared with university and government officials.

Community service by members of the university community is not of concern unless it "encroaches" persistently on time which should be devoted to the university's functions which have priority."

THE LIBRARY

There should be equal, if not precisely similar, treatment for faculty and students in imposing penalties and fines at the library, says the report. The present situation, in which students are subject to fines but faculty subject only to warnings, should be ended.

Restrictions in the use of library facilities, however, are necessary because of the differing needs of undergraduates, graduates, and faculty.

A Library Tribunal, consisting of five faculty and five students selected by lot from the entire university community, should have the power to levy fines, suspend library privileges, etc. In serious cases, such as theft, the Tribunal may recommend laying charges in the regular courts.

RESIDENCES

Says the Report: "Those who live in a residence should have self-government in setting up and administering residence rules."

All staff and students in a given residence should be subject to the same rules and no academic penalties should be imposed for infractions.

Fines are considered to be "an inappropriate penalty". A scale ranging from warnings and reprimands to loss of privi-whether proceedings are to be open or closed. If either the complainant or the accused ask that the hearings be open, reads the report, we would expect the Tribunal to accede to the desires of either the accused or the complainant in this matter, opening the hearings...

leges up to expulsion is suggested instead.

The report suggests residence level disciplinary committees, selected by the residents themselves.

The role of dons is envisaged as one of "advisers, teachers, counsellors, business managers and custodians of property" and it is proposed residents have a significant voice in their selection. If indeed dons are to be retained, the Report suggests they be relieved of disciplinary functions."

These recommendations apply only to the directly university-run residences, but the suggestions are also directed at the federated colleges.

PUBLICATION

Unsigned material, or material sponsored by groups outside the university, "should not have an automatic right to distribution" on campus, says the Report, although no action would normally be taken unless defamatory material were involved.

Charges alleging defamatory attacks could be taken to the University Tribunal as well as the regular courts.

The Report recommends that the necessary legal steps be taken to ensure that no part of the university be held responsible for anything appearing in faculty or student publications.

THEFT

Theft is a criminal offence and consequently charges should be laid in the regular courts, not the university tribunals. Students and faculty should not be entitled to extra privileges because they belong to the university.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT

Rowdy behavior by members of the university which "may be disruptive but would not be described as demonstrations" should be treated as if they had occurred at non-university events.

But in cases where the safety of persons or university property is endangered, "there is no responsible way that the university can avoid quick and effective means to end such demonstrations."

The report suggests such measures as requests for police intervention, seeking course injunctions, and laying charges in regular courts.

There should be no resort to force by the university until after other "reasonable alternatives" such as negotiations, injunctions or even referenda on the issues are attempted.

Such a resort to force would have to be sanctioned by the "democratically constituted governing body" which would be set up by the CUG report.

The committee could not decide whether charges could be laid against demonstrators in the University Tribunal.

The Report stresses that "negotiations concerning a demonstration should be addressed as much as possible to the substantive issues of the demonstration and not just to the disruptiveness."

The full text of the Campbell Report chapter on Discipline and Demonstrations is reprinted in today's Varsity on the centre spread.

Campbell Report

The long-awaited Campbell Report, released last night, is as reasonable a statement on discipline as could be expected from a presidential advisory committee.

Now that the report is published, it is clear that U of T President Claude Bissell's "support" of the basic principles of the Committee of Presidents paper, "Order on Campus" is completely incompatible with his "support" of the Campbell Report.

The CPUO paper essentially equates violence, extremism, and disruption. It seeks to preserve the function of the university (which it does not define) without allowing that function to be questioned.

On the other hand, the Campbell report distinguishes between disruptions "that are violent or destructive in character and those that are simply obstructive."

The CPUO paper automatically condemns all disruptions as offenses, regardless of their political context. But the Campbell Report states: "Since a given disruptive demonstration may prove to be justified, negotiations concerning a demonstration should be addressed as much as possible to the substantive issues of the demonstration and not just to the disruptiveness."

While the CPUO document sanctifies the "pre-formed bond between the speaker and his audience," the Campbell committee has shown the need to examine the function of that bond itself.

The Campbell Report begins with a liberal definition of the functions of the university — "teaching-learning, research, and critical analysis" — although it does not relate those superficial patterns to the society outside that demands a certain kind of uncritical teaching, research, and analysis.

The CPUO Report offers no definition at all.

The two reports also suggest major differences in tactics of repression.

Under the Campbell Report, only a staff-student committee may decide to use force to end a disruption. The CPUO paper allows the university president to call the police on his own initiative.

There are some serious problems with the Campbell Report. It leaves legalistic loopholes that could allow a disciplinary body to act very severely; it wavers between a liberal desire to condone and accommodate protest and a conservative need to preserve the existing function and form of a multiversity.

In practice, every university administration will accommodate or physically smash a growing left-wing student movement that challenges the university's form and function.

And the Campbell Report has left both roads open to the administration, although it leans heavily towards the road of accommodation.

But, at least the document offers some political protection for students organizing in classrooms and departments, while the CPUO paper openly denied that right and offered overt repression as a supposed cure-all.

Now the crucial issue is what will happen in the next few months, and this week in particular.

The U of T administration and Dr. Bissell must respond to the demands formulated by Students' Administrative Council.

Dr. Bissell must retract his statements about Caput and the CPUO paper, and base any disciplinary action on the Campbell report recommendations.

In a telephone interview last night, Dr. Bissell expressed some reservations about the Campbell Report.

Ronald Reagan and friends — will Campbell in a white hat run them out of town?

"I think they are getting into all sorts of metaphysical subtleties here," he said as we talked about the section on disruptions.

"If someone came into my office and seized me by the lapel, that would be physical violence," he added. "But if someone came in and just prevented me from working, it wouldn't be violence, but it would be physical force."

Bissell would not offer a clear definition of what is tolerable and what isn't.

But he did distinguish between a "critical" disruption and an "intimidating" disruption.

"It's a question of motivation rather than precise action," he added.

Precisely.

But what is a correct political motivation? And who in the university is to decide?

LETTERS

Sir,

Your account of my part in the events of September 23rd, while generally accurate and fair, contains one error which to my mind is quite serious. I did, as you reported, tell the SAC Executive group that "as far as I am concerned the Committee (on the reconstitution of Caput) is dead." I definitely did not say that I was resigning from the Committee. It would in any event be difficult to resign from a body that no longer had any factual existence; more important, to make the gesture of resigning would have been tantamount to saying that I am not prepared to participate in any further discussions. Your own report of my statements to SAC shows that my position is quite the opposite. I therefore ask that you publish this correction.

I would add further that in my view there is a very considerable difference between a disruption of a class, in the sense of one class-meeting in a particular course, and disruption of a whole series of meetings. It seems obvious to me that one of these situations is much more serious than the other, and that they would have to be treated differently.

F. E. Winter,
Chairman of the Association of Teaching Staff

Sir,

Dr. Bissell's recent action on disciplinary measures at U of T must be viewed with considerable alarm and concern. It is a type of nineteenth century gunboat diplomacy which is inappropriate to a politically conscious campus — as Dr. Bissell should well know.

To restore any confidence in his administration amongst the students and faculty on this campus, President Bissell must meet the six demands put forward by SAC and consider very seriously the alternative suggestions to his CPUO working paper that were made by members of SAC, NLC, and GSU at a meeting last Thursday night.

For Dr. Bissell to do otherwise would not only be provocative but would place into doubt the very legitimacy of his position as president.

Letters: Bissell's stand comes under fire ill-advised

The controversy rages. A seemingly dull September has exploded into a time of crucial change. The New Left Caucus, until now little more than a fringe group is suddenly heard with a credibility greater than the university president — a statement, a reiteration and a repudiation refused — suddenly, the university is simmering again.

One should be genuinely hard pressed to discover the motivation behind Dr. Bissell's obviously ill-advised disciplinary statements. The Varsity editorial and NLC attribute it to a "counter-insurgency" plot or at least genuine "bad faith". I suggest that it is little more than poor judgment.

To argue that it is a well-calculated power move to crush the NLC on behalf of the status quo oriented corporate elite is, I think, to over-dramatize its significance.

Ironically, such statements do little but strengthen these revolutionary groups. With these issuances Dr. Bissell is forcing a polarization that the NLC has sought for some while. All their efforts, at Hart House, in meetings and on campus have aroused not nearly the response that Dr. Bissell's one action has solicited. Students, contented to apathetically await the outcome of more aggressive students' policies, are now forced to polarize their actions. When questions of repression arise few students can remain aloof.

Furthermore, in making the decision, many unsuspecting students will discover themselves in sympathy with the NLC, a turn of events unattainable by the NLC actions alone.

Dr. Bissell need only thank himself and his thirteen cohorts for an increased NLC activity on campus and its subsequent support by a larger section of the student population.

Such a statement also emphasizes the administration's complete misunderstanding of the students on its campus. Obviously, (whether just ill-advised or genuinely repressive) such discipline procedures are directed to a large extent at the NLC and associated NL groups. They probably were intended to have little relevance to the majority of students and I am certain, it was assumed, to arouse little response from them.

Unfortunately for Dr. Bissell, he failed to realize the latent fear of repression dormant in every educated person. Most students know too much German and Czechoslovakian history to allow repression to creep into a democratic structure. They have also seen too many National Guardsmen on U.S. campuses to savour such a prospect in Canada. In cultures of violence, repression is often an accepted response.

But in Canada — especially in Ontario which has ironically seen no violent university disruptions — the fear of repression far outweighs the threat of violence.

Dr. Bissell should have realized that the best form of discipline in most cases is that administered by those whose interests it serves. Who is more qualified to prevent classroom disruptions than the irate students whose courses are interrupted? How better to deal with the NLC than to let their ideas be heard, judged and probably disregarded by the vast majority of students? How many professors have already had classes disrupted by engineers' lunch bags, bored students' chatter and late student arrivals? Yet, how many professors have advocated suspension of those students or even complained of disciplinary problems?

Surely if there needs to be discipline in the classroom or on the campus, it must be administered by those whose interests it serves. It must be the professor and his students who preserve, as they wish, the decorum of their course. It is the faculty, students and administration who must protect the campus itself. No group, almightily reigning from above, can do it. Dr. Bissell certainly must realize that this approach is intolerable to the Canadian mentality.

One can only conclude that Dr. Bissell's statements were ill-advised. Undoubtedly, he supported a communique without proper consideration of its consequences and now feels irrevocably bound to it. (It is certainly bad politics to yield to political pressure and repudiate even an unwise statement!) If anything, the statement was motivated by a misunderstanding of the student political scene and an en masse importation of foreign disciplinary ideas. If Dr. Bissell really still considers it a "helpful document" explosive days will lie ahead.

R. N. Poole (II Law)

vaughanote

The mass meeting in Convocation Hall yesterday presented an incomplete picture of what has actually occurred on the Disciplinary Committee of which I was a member.

It was pointed out that there was an absence of policy with respect to disciplinary procedures on demonstrations, obstructions and violence.

Some claim that President Bissell and the CAPUT acted justifiably in filling this void. What is totally unacceptable about this position is that this committee, which had been working all summer towards restructuring the CAPUT has had the rug pulled out from under it.

We were not consulted! In fact, we would have set up an interim committee at the last meeting which could have dealt with these issues. Now it has been claimed by President Bissell that we were unable to come to a decision. This is true but only because the President's statement pre-empted our decision. We had no notice from the President that he considered our discussions in vain. In fact, we believed the President supported the outline set forth by our committee.

At the June 11 meeting the President said that the disciplinary procedures in question were too complex to be decided by an interim body. I agree.

However, I believe that this body was the only one that could have legitimately formulated a temporary policy.

Dr. Winter, the ATS representative, the SAC representatives and I were shocked by the arbitrary actions taken by the CAPUT, a body which the President himself called illegitimate.

President Winegard, at the University of Guelph, said yesterday afternoon that "there is no attempt on my part to smash dissent on campus" and that all recommendations will come from an existing staff-student committee.

This attitude is acceptable. We cannot condone policy handed down from an illegitimate body. This is why we have asked for repudiation, not to create a void, but to create legitimate guidelines.

column and a half

By JOSEPH BLANKIER

Joseph Blankier graduated from U of T last year, and is now on a trip around the world.

His letters will be a regular feature in The Varsity (far as long as his stamps hold out). Next stop Okinawa.

The bus ride from San Francisco to Berkeley is all but scenic. You travel across the Oakland Bay Bridge which takes you past the outskirts of an Army Base and over Treasure Island (the central naval supply depot for the U.S. Pacific Fleet).

Once in Oakland you are treated to the heavy industry which lines the shore, mainly cargo transport, steel and chemicals (what else is there?). Your first impression is that the hyphen in "military-industrial complex" does not apply.

Berkeley is a lot like the 'avant-garde' element of University College but multiplied about 10 to 20 times. People are far-in, far-out, flipped-out, freaked-out and out-of-sight. The dogs and cats are almost as numerous as the people and they generally roam around on the loose.

The police force has been bolstered this year to 100 from a previous 35.

Police carry guns, truncheons and are given riot training. These are campus cops — not Berkeley cops. Those are even worse. The pigs are all over campus, patrolling on foot and in unmarked cars.

A few I saw were generally friendly — that is until we saw them "bust" somebody for possession. They admit themselves that they do not let personal feelings interfere with their duty. "Gotta follow orders, you know!"

The campus is between quarters (school starts about September 29). The atmosphere is fairly quiet and restrained but there are more people here every day and there are enough issues to blow the place across the bay.

I use the term "the situation may be explosive" carefully. It is difficult to predict with any degree of certainty what might happen. It could be nothing and it could be blood on the walls.

In the context of the State and the University their position is felt to be justifiably acceptable. Election year is 1970 and there is some hope that Reagan will get tossed from the gubernatorial saddle.

The Regents and the State government are prepared to 'sacrifice' a few 'trouble-making commie-plotting' faculty members in order to remove any element of friction. All in the cause of higher education, of course.

However, it seems doubtful that this move will develop into any meaningful confrontation. One must bear in mind that in uptight California the faculty does not trust the students, the students do not trust the faculty, government distrusts both faculty and students and vice-versa — and nobody likes the Chancellor.

Although the bouncing of a few faculty members may not cause much excitement, the entire atmosphere of mutual suspicion, distrust and hatred may prove to be a vital factor in deciding Berkeley's fate. Much will depend upon mood and timing.

Of the major issues the Eldridge Cleaver affair and the Peoples' Park melee are residual and may not amount to much.

(Last year Cleaver was brought in to give a course. The Regents announced that guest lecturers could give only one lecture. In effect it was a move to get rid of Cleaver.)

Last year the Third World group (Afro, Asian, Indian and Spanish-American) were allowed to organize their own college. It sounded great.

To date, there is no money, no building and no help from the administration. There is a study program prepared and a full enrolment as well as resource people. When school opens a lot of people are going to feel screwed.

Student government cannot help the college either. Two years ago, the Regents took away most of their operating grants leaving them $5,500 out of a previous $280,000.

The move was generated by the powerful alumni association when the student council reduced the budget of the school band.

Perhaps the most immediate and most significant issue on the campus is the Vietnam Moratorium (boycott of classes) scheduled for Oct. 15. Organizers hope to draw support from local people as well as university students.

The Regents threaten faculty with tenure withdrawal or loss of appointment if they refuse to teach Oct. 15. A general boycott will almost certainly lead to demonstrations. The situation could be explosive.

The Regents, chosen by Reagan, govern the university and have absolute control over all policy, including tenure and hiring and firing.

Students have no rights. Academic freedom at Berkeley means that as long as you remain within the bounds of Reagan's concept of education you have the blessings of the State. Move out and down comes the axe — hard.

However, for the majority of students, social change and the 'smash capitalism ethic' is too nebulous. Most are content with the system as it is.

Although the street people have little power by themselves they may be able to polarize the community around issues that are central and concrete.

It is more likely to find dissent with issues such as Vietnam, the draft, high rents and housing. California is a prosperous state.

To many the line of the S.D.S. and the P.L. (Progressive Labor) is too extreme to elicit much support.

There are very few if any right-wing elements at Berkeley. There are few far-out radicals. In California it is very comfortable to be a radical.

Engineers concerned about image

Engineering Society president, Art McIlwain, addresses Eng. Sac. meeting.

By GINI SNELL

Student representatives to the Engineering faculty council are trying to drastically change the face of the Engineering education.

They will support a document passed by the Engineering Society Tuesday which calls for a switch in emphasis from the technological to the socio-technological aspects of their education.

The document was drawn up this summer by a committee originally designed to plan the actions of the student representatives serving on the decision-making faculty council.

The committee, headed by Art McIlwain (IV APSC), felt that some thinking research into the aims of the faculty and students on the purpose of education was necessary.

A survey was made of faculty opinions, and the committee themselves produced a policy statement of their aims and objectives.

The policy paper of the students denies the traditional image of the Engineer.

He is typically portrayed, it says, as an "unlettered, fairly uncouth he-man", unfeeling and insensitive to human problems.

But according to the report, the Engineer, is not as insensitive to human needs and affiliations as is supposed. Rather he is concerned about the effects his work will have in a social context.

The report says that because of this "he is concerned that he is not able to become informed and adept in disciplines which are not narrowly definable in the context of Engineering Knowledge."

There is, it states, an increasing social consciousness as well as an increasing desire to become "educated".

Education is defined in the report as a "contributive social process, the essence of which is an expanding awareness of man's social and natural environment through dialogue and co-operative intellectual effort."

The goal is to develop free and creative human beings who are able to adequately cope with their environment.

This definition "approximates the goals of the Engineering student uncomfortable about the nature and extent of his education".

The idea of co-operative intellectual effort seems to be rather hard to accept in the Engineering context. Abolishing the professor-student dichotomy in such areas as fundamental calculus is entirely unrealistic, the report says.

But if we consider education in the broader sense, it continues, it becomes possible to interact at an intellectual level. The different perspectives thus arising would produce solutions more acceptable to the students than those arising out of one perspective only.

The report points out that the Engineering student is now given access to all the technical knowledge necessary to his profession, but he has no chance to study those subjects governing his social environment.

The report states that education cannot cater to only one area of the students' needs. The Engineer is denied "the ability to interact with his social environment in a very fulfilling way."

Last Thursday the Faculty Council considered this report, and it has expressed itself anxious to discuss the recommendations made. The paper will be discussed in two weeks at a closed faculty meeting.

but ---- LGMB up to old tricks

Last year the Engineers officially opened the bottom half of the new Meds building. Wednesday saw the opening of the top half of the building.

Since they did not go in, in, in, the Engineers invited the doctors and nurses out, out, out for the opening of this new "concrete erection", built to satisfy a "lust for knowledge" on campus.

Spokesman Mel Solmon identified the structure as an "Engineering Fallout Shelter and Radical Environmental Birth Control Center", constructed with the effort of "two million army ants trained to carry dirt to the surface."

The Engineers proposed to leave the lecturer outside "since we students are now on our own" and "to admit students according to their usefulness."

Birth control pills would be distributed to all girls "except those from St. Mike's — we'll give them thermometers and graph paper!"

The caper climaxed with a historic first for the Engineers: while the LGMB renewed their "good relations" with the police at the College St. "Cop Shop", all the engineers remained on the sidewalk.

HOBBS RESIGNS FROM VCUC

Ernie Hobbs, President of the Victoria College Union Council, resigned Thursday night after the student council refused to take what he considered a sufficiently activist stand on discipline. CUS and university government.

The council did pass a motion supporting the "general direction" of the Canadian Union of Students and another endorsing the Students' Administrative Council's demands that President Claude Bissell repudiate recent discipline guidelines.

But it stopped short of recommending that Vic students vote to keep U of T in CUS, or demanding that the Vic administration also repudiate the discipline guidelines. Earlier in the meeting, council defeated Hobbs' amendment to a report on university government which would have made student parity on decision-making bodies VCUC policy.

Hobbs told council in his opening remarks he was "very upset by recent developments" and had "seriously considered resigning." He said he was prepared to stay on as president only if council showed it was "ready to discuss issues in a meaningful manner."

At the end of the meeting, which lasted four-and-a-half hours, he re-read his statement and added "(council's) decision has been very clearly shown by its actions. That, I feel, means I must resign, and I do so."

A number of council members would not co-operate under any other conditions was dropped.

The presidential elections will be held Oct. 9, the same day as three members-at-large are elected. Hobbs said Sunday he would run on a slate, which, if elected, would give council a more activist-oriented majority.

After Hobbs resigned he watched as the sidelines and watered-down version of his motion, calling on President A.B.B. Moore and Principal J.E. Hodgetts to repudiate the Caput guidelines and state that discipline at Vic would be handled by a staff-student-administrative committee.

The threat that students would not co-operate under any other conditions was dropped.

SFU president threatens to fire strike supporters

BURNABY (CUP) — In the face of potential and threatened repression by the administration of Simon Fraser University faculty in the department of political science, sociology and anthropology remain divided in their attitudes towards a strike by students and faculty in that department Wednesday.

The strike began when a mass meeting of over 700 of the PSA department's 800 students voted overwhelmingly to strike until the administration agrees to negotiate their demands. The PSA members are demanding:

- an end to the administration trusteeship of the department

Norman Strax was fined $500 and sentenced to 30 days in jail on a charge of contempt of court for ignoring an injunction barring him from the campus of the University of New Brunswick after the UNB administration had suspended him over a library protest.

PSA faculty member Kathleen Aberle said Thursday that several of the PSA faculty were landed immigrants who might face serious consequences such as deportation should they defy an injunction to keep them off campus. She said she would not defy such an injunction.

The stance of the PSA faculty, at the moment is that they others are responsible for the totally opposed to the strike. Four others have declared their position in more qualified terms. Eight other members of the PSA faculty are not on campus this semester.

The PSA department's teach-in on democracy in the university, scheduled to run for the duration of the strike, drew over 700 people to the first session Wednesday, and the department has asked others to stay out of classes during the strike as an expression of solidarity with the PSA demands.

The History department at SFU has already voted support for the PSA parliament and others are expected to do so.

Zionists—Arabs clash over weekend

The first on-campus violence of the year came early Saturday morning when the Tabernacle of Peace, a religious symbol of the Jewish festival of Sukkot was nearly destroyed by fire.

The temporary structure, erected Friday between the Sir Daniel Wilson Residence and University College, is to be used this week by Hillel for a series of programmes on peace.

The fire started around 2 a.m., but students in the neighbourhood were able to extinguish the flames before more than one wall was burned.

Since Hillel officials decided on fire-proof canvas for the walls of the structure, they are convinced that someone must have intentionally set fire to it with kerosene or gasoline.

To protect the booth from further destruction, Abie Glatlis (II Arch) and Mark Klarfeld, a York University student and vice-president of Hillel, guarded it during the weekend.

Two students will be on constant watch every night until the end of the program next Sunday.

Mark Okrent, president of Hillel, said "Worst of all is the fact that someone has tried to destroy a building which represents a request for good will and peace, and is also a sacred religious article."

Friday, students supporting Israel met at Sidney Smith for a noon-hour demonstration against a conference of the Committee for the Liberation of Palestine this weekend at Rochdale College.

About 200 marched up to Bloor St., carrying signs which read: "Israel stands for peace in Mid-East" and "Anti-Zionism is Anti-Semitism."

Several mounted the Rochdale rostrum to address the crowd, but they were ordered off the property by Steve Van Beek 24, a Rochdale governor.

He told the demonstrators they had no permission to assemble there, and that Rochdale "couldn't afford to get involved in anyone's movements."

In reply to the complaint that the opposing faction had been granted space at the college, he said, "I'll make sure it (the conference) is blocked. We do not serve as a forum for political activity."

The demonstrators moved to the sidewalk, and it was the police who complained this time.

Saturday at City Hall, the placards read: "A Zionist is a Fascist," "Escalate People's War," and "Arabs and Jews can live together in peace without Zionism."

The demonstration, which was actively supported by the Canadian Student Movement and Canadian Revolutionary Youth, marched down Yonge Street chanting "Long Live People's War" and "Long Live El Fatah."

The demonstrators supported what they termed the "just struggles" of the Palestinian people against not only Zionist aggression but also American imperialism.

They said their opposition is to the state rather than the nation of Israel. Anti-Zionism was not anti-Semitism but a movement against "Middle East imperialism" by which Israel collaborates with the fascist powers to expand its territory. It is a movement to free the Palestinian workers from American oppression.

Phil Bregman, (III New) member of Students for Jewish Survival, insisted that the Jews and Arabs could live in peace only if Zionism was supported to protect the existence of Israel.

He said the movement "to drive the people of Israel into the sea" was being financed by the U.S.S.R.

The anti-Zionists countered with the accusation that Israel is on the payroll of the United States government.

As the anti-Zionist demonstrators filed out of Nathan Phillips Square for their march up Yonge St., there was some thing of thematic significance in the air: the Musak loudspeakers in the Square started to play the theme from 'Exodus'.

ment began last summer and reinstatement of Mordcaai Breimburg as chairman of the department. Breimburg was acclaimed by both PSA faculty and students, then vetoed by an administration committee.

- reinstatement of four professors who were in effect fired when they were not who did not teach . . . or other one student wants it held.

At least eight of the faculty in PSA this semester support the strike. They include the deposed chairman of the department Mordcaai Breimburg, Aberte, who was denied tenure, John Leggett, who was finally granted tenure although his promotion was vetoed and Prudence Wheelodon whose contact and application for tenure were only extended for one year.

Only two professors among the 16 PSA faculty on campus during SFU's fall semester are dering lending their support.

Four of the six lay members of the SFU Senate made a statement in support of the PSA department, objecting to Strand's bypassing the Senate on academic matters.

But the Canadian Association of University Teachers, whose last minute intervention last Monday delayed the strike deadline until Wednesday, has warned the PSA department that use of the strike might cause the national lobby of academics to withdraw any support from the faculty.

no consensus in our Committee as to whether or not charges could be laid before any of the Tribunals of the University.

We recognize that anyone who feels that a criminal offence has been committed can request police intervention or lay charges in a regular court.

However, any request in the name of the University for police intervention is the prerogative only of the chief executive officer, his delegate or the representative governing body of the University. This prerogative should not be exercised without consultation, wherever possible, with a quorum of the principal governing body of the University.

We reject the notion that there should be any automatic or set procedures in responding to disruptive demonstrations that do not clearly endanger the safety of persons or do not destroy the valuable property of the University or its members. If such disruption following should be considered basic:

- 1) Since a given disruptive demonstration may prove to be justified, negotiations concerning a demonstration should be addressed as much as possible to the substantive issues of the demonstration and not just to the disruptiveness.

2) At the same time, however, the University cannot fulfil its obligations if it allows a minority of its members to disrupt repeatedly or for a prolonged period of time, its essential educational functions. The University must consider the rights of the majority in these situations. Finally, the University must seriously consider the volatile nature of disruptive demonstrations.

- 3) The initial response to the demonstrators should occur as locally as possible. Where a demonstration is directed against an individual or a group, the persons concerned should be given the opportunity to participate in all deliberations. However, we recognize that ultimately a prolonged disruptive demonstration involves the University community as a whole rather than only those immediately concerned. The negotiations on behalf of the University should be conducted by representatives of the democratically constituted governing body.
- 4) If a demonstration cannot be resolved by such negotiations, the use of injunctions from a regular court might be considered, or it might be feasible to hold a referendum on the issues involved in the demonstration.
- 5) A resort to force by the University should occur only after other reasonable alterna-

Committee says about disruptions

discuss here, but before considering the dangers they pose to the University and the various ways they can be responded to, it is important to realize that disruptions in universities are not simply due to revolution of a small group of revolutionaryaries. At times small groups have attempted to halt the functioning of a university but their actions have been successful only when they combined with much wider discontent within the University.

How then, should the University respond to disruptive demonstrations? It is difficult to lay down procedures here because each situation has its own logic. It is possible, however, to suggest some general principles. We believe to distinguish two general types of disruptive demonstrations — those that are violent or destructive in character or those that are simply obstructive. In disruptive demonstrations that endanger the safety of persons or destroy valuable property of the University or its members, there is no responsible way that the University can avoid quick and effective means to end such demonstrations. These means could include the requesting of the police to intervene, the seeking of court injunctions, and the laying of appropriate charges in the regular courts. There for greatly increased consultation and representation in decision-making bodies. In this Report we have proposed the establishment of effective decentralized disciplinary bodies and of a University Tribunal all with membership consisting of students and faculty members. This kind of structure and disciplinary procedure should reduce the likelihood of resort to disruptive action.

tives have failed. The decision to use force should be made by the democratically constituted governing body.

Demonstrators who violently disrupt the University or who impede the clearly expressed will of the majority in non-violent disruption render themselves liable to charges laid in the regular courts.

The Committee could not reach a consensus as to whether charges could be laid against demonstrators in the Tribunals of the University. (Among those of the Committee who felt that charges could be laid in Tribunals of the University there was agreement that the appropriate Tribunal in all cases would be the University Tribunal.)

In addition to demonstrations there is also a range of actions against individuals or small groups which, if widely pursued, would make life on the campus almost unbearable. Such actions fall under the general term "harrassment" and would include physical violence to individuals, persistent public name-calling and other similar actions designed to embarrass other members of the University. The individuals aggrieved always have the right to lay charges in the regular courts. Our Committee could not reach a consensus on whether or not charges could be laid in the Tribunals of the University.

CHAPTER VII
DISCIPLINE AND DEMONSTRATIONS

A current problem involving discipline at the University is that of disruptive and sometimes violent or destructive protest.

Not all demonstrations are disruptive, and not all warrant disciplinary action. Demonstrations can be divided into those occurring off-campus or on-campus and those which are disruptive or non-disruptive.

This Committee believes that the University should not interfere in any official way with off-campus demonstrations by members of the University.

The off-campus activities of students or staff should not be regarded any differently from the activities of individuals not connected with the University except as they impinge directly upon the teaching-learning and research activities of members of the University.

The public and the police should be made to realize that groups from the University do not represent the University, and it is not responsible for their action.

On-campus non-disruptive demonstrations need no justification. We believe that the

It is the conviction of this Committee that all action, official and unofficial, must be directed to the resolution of conflict through non-violent means. This applies to all members of the University. The recommendations that follow presuppose a university structure in which students and faculty are consulted or represented at all levels of operation. Such a structure should help to prevent those disruptive demonstrations that arise in universities because of ignorance on the part of demonstrators, insensitivity on the part of administrators, and inadequate means of consultation and discussion between the two. It is the assumption of our Committee that the Commission on University Government at this University will recommend an organizational structure which will provide Disruptive demonstrations or protests on campus are those which block access to buildings or rooms, which create such noise or inconvenience as to hinder or prevent persons from working in the buildings, which prevent classes or meetings from taking place, or which involve the intimidation of students, teachers, speakers, or administrators, or which violate the confidentiality of records of the University and its members. With these disruptive activities there may also be threats of violence and destruction of facilities and property and the carrying out of these threats. As a Committee on Disciplinary Procedures, our concern is with disruptive on-campus demonstrations.

The causes of such demonstrations are too complex to Maintenance workers veto union settlement

University maintenance workers have refused to ratify a settlement worked out by the Building Services Employees Union negotiating committee and the university administration.

In two meetings Friday, the membership, mostly university janitors and cleaners, voted 60-59 against in the morning and 132-132 in the evening to send the dispute back to conciliation.

Disagreement centred around the amount of the wage increase.

The settlement called for a 20 cents an hour increase across the board, with an additional 10 cents for afternoon workers and 15 cents for night workers.

Union negotiator Norm Harper told The Varsity he thought it was a "good settlement". He said he'd "bashed his bloody guts out" for four months to get it.

The previous contract, which is still in force, expired on June 30.

Ed Lockwood, a cleaner in the Medical Building, said "The union tried to get us to accept the contract, but we wouldn't go for it."

He complained the university had broken its agreement with the employees.

"They keep us at the temporary rate of $2.28 an hour, rather than the regular rate of $2.36," he said, "though some people have been here for over a year."

A new agreement will now be sought by the negotiating committee. A legal strike is not possible until two weeks after the breakdown of conciliation is recognized by the government conciliation officer.

'Enemies of McGill' barred from Senate

MONTREAL (CUP) — Fearing that they would not be able to "police open meetings," the McGill Senate Thursday turned down a student request to open the Senate's deliberations to the general public.

Student senator Robert Hajaly said McGill is supported largely by public funds, and "has the responsibility to the general public."

"It is a flagrant injustice to deny a citizen of Quebec the right to witness the proceedings here," Hajaly said.

Vice-Principal Michael Oliver opposed the motion, saying the move was tantamount to "opening the doors to those who might be enemies of McGill."

Oliver said he feared the Senate would be unable to "police open meetings." He was referring to an incident last April when 40 militant French workers and students came to a meeting to ask the Senate to act on the demands of Operation McGill.

Operation McGill, or McGill Français, was a mass action during which thousands of workers and students demonstrated to demand a French-speaking McGill University.

On that occasion the Senate did not meet due to lack of a quorum, although individual senators met with the delegation outside the chambers.

Hajaly said Oliver's claims about policing the meetings applied no matter who is allowed to attend.

With the defeat of the motion, only senators, McGill students and staff, and accredited press representatives will be allowed to attend meetings.

Group seeks to legalize pot

"It's really an open secret that many people are smoking pot," Ian Mason, president of the Toronto Legalize Marijuana Committee, said yesterday.

"Students who are smoking pot are being considered criminals for nothing," he said. To combat legislation against marijuana, Mason has founded the committee, of which he is so far the only member.

The committee is affiliated with the London Legalize Marijuana Committee, organized by London, Ont.; businessman Brian Brown.

The London committee has already submitted a petition to Health and Welfare minister John Munro requesting that the "government of Canada strive to legalize marijuana."

Among those who signed were Judge Little of the Toronto juvenile court and Pierre Berton, a prominent author and TV journalist.

The 700-signature London petition was accompanied by a copy of the LaGuardia Report, a New York study made in the 1930s which found that the use of marijuana was widespread and less harmful than tobacco or alcohol.

Marijuana does not contribute to any "mental deterioration or change basic personality structure," the report said.

Mason is trying to circulate another petition on U of T campus now. He already has 50 signatures.

"The academic community must speak up or no one else will," said Mason.

He needs help with his cause, and will welcome any interested volunteers to call him at 920-2549.

24 U of T professors oppose administration

As members of the faculty of the University of Toronto, we believe that the guidelines on student demonstrations issued by the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario are alarmist, repressive, and extreme. It should not be necessary to mention that any individual committing a crime (such as assault or theft) in the Province of Ontario is subject to arrest and civil prosecution.

By recommending that extraordinary measures be adopted for Ontario campuses the committee would have, believe either that it has sufficient evidence of a proximate threat to public safety on some campuses, or that it may be in the interests of universities to suppress some groups of its members. No evidence has been given to support either belief.

The slogans of student rebellion and law and order are invoked when no case for general breakdown has been made. We find no intrinsic value in wholesale obedience to social rules and customs (which may also hide an every-day violence). We believe that rules and regulations, goals and values, processes and customs require constant examination, criticism, and challenge and that the university must be open not only to dissenting ideas, but also to changes wrought from dissent.

It is better to risk dissent, demonstration, and disruption of normal processes and activities — which may lead to change and renewal — than to sink in a spurious safety through a proliferation of legalities, strictures, and police intervention. We believe that to exalt the rule of law and order as absolute is totalitarian.

The plan to co-opt students and faculty onto committees to legitimize institutional violence and repression is abhorrent to us. It is the wrong sort of effort by the wrong group at the wrong time. If there must be committees let them investigate grievances, and let the presidents be required to redress them. Why should presidents be "required" to repress, but not to help?

We oppose any implementation of the committee's guidelines at the University of Toronto.

Watt watches while Warriors wearily wilt

By JIM COWAN

"O.K. listen, Dave, the inside backer's cheating to the set side, we can afford to run Stank straight ahead."

Tom Watt, perched high above the field in the Varsity Stadium press box, was talking to Dave Copp at field level, via a telephone linkup.

"Run a 36 dive away from our setback," suggested Watt.

On the next series of downs, Bill Stankovic romped through the centre of the Warrior's defense. "He's running tough!"

Watt told Copp.

Blues, like most of the other teams in the senior leagues, rely heavily on their spotters. Between them, assistant coaches Copp and Watt (better known perhaps as the sartorially splendid coach of the champion hockey Blues) are responsible for giving head coach Ron Murphy a running commentary and analysis of the action on the field.

Being a spotter involves much more than just watching the game with the myopic hacks in the press box, however. Watt begins preparing for each Saturday's game far ahead of time.

Before each game, the coaches huddle with the scouting reports on the opposition and old game films to produce a list of items to be checked when the game starts. Watt begins during the warmup, looking over the other team's lineup and noting the formations they run in the practice period.

Saturday, Watt phoned down to the field that a new tackle, Brent Gilbert, was in the Warrior's lineup, and warned the defensive linemen that Waterloo was using a quick count as they came over the ball.

At the other end of the press box, the Warriors' spotter was doing the same thing with the Blues. Waterloo has their quarterbacks handle the phone at field level, rather than a coach. "He's the one who's running the team and he has the feel of it," head coach Wally Delahey explained. During offensive series, the backup QB takes over the headset.

Once the game started, Watt checked the offensive and defensive sets of the Warriors, and found they were generally what had been expected from the scouting reports. Blues third assistant coach, John McManus, usually draws the assignment of checking out the opposition for the following week and preparing the reports.

The only significant change was the shifting of the interior lineman, and once it was pointed out, Blues were quick to take advantage of it.

Watt also keeps an eye on the Blues, watching to see who is doing his job and who isn't. Often he can see why a lineman is being beaten or a play broken, and adjustments can be made.

"The key thing is not to try and look for everything at once," he says, "That way you miss everything."

At halftime, Watt scrambles out of the press box and down to the dressing room for a conference with the coaches. He sometimes will speak to a particular player, but generally it's Murphy who diagrams changes for the whole team.

"You've got to have good communications," says Copp. "If you can't talk to each other in this game, you're in trouble."

Watt's advice, of course, isn't always taken. It's up to Murphy, receiving information from both Watt and the players on the field, to decide what changes to make.

Much of the job is just keeping the other coaches informed about what's happening on the field, but listening to Watt describe the action gives an insight which you'll never get listening to Esaw & Co.

GOD BLESS MCGILL

Soccer Blues undefeated in pre-season play

By LYNDON LITTLE

The University of Toronto Soccer Blues kept their unbeaten string intact Saturday as they whipped the York University Yeomen 2-0 on the back campus.

The game was the fourth exhibition tilt for the Blues as they prepare for their league opener this weekend at McMaster.

This season should prove to be a stiff challenge for the team that has dominated the OQAA soccer picture for the past quarter of a century, winning the championship 21 of the past 24 years including the last 5 years in a row. This season the Blues have a chance to equal the record of the 1945-51 edition of the team which won 6 straight titles.

However, the rest of the league has been slowly catching up to the powerful Varsity eleven. Last year the Blues had a tough battle with the University of Guelph Gryphons before winning the Western Division title. With 7 of last year's regulars not returning, this year should provide an even greater challenge.

The changes begin with the coaching staff. Gone is popular head coach Ernie Glass, who is in England on a football sabbatical. Replacing him is personable Bob Nicol who has had experience with the now defunct Toronto Falcons and is presently playing coach of Ukraina of the semi-pro National League.

Gone also is much of last year's scoring power. The seven graduates include league leading scorer and co-winner of the Oster Trophy

Jim Lefkos, as well as Dwight Taylor, Bill Nepotik, Bernie Dabreaur, George Nomatielis and defensive star Eric Sereda.

Head coach Nicol will be counting heavily on a returning nucleus composed of forwards Frank Soppelsa (league leading scorer 3 years ago), John Gero, Ken Cancellera, Mario Palermo, link-men Miles Sosa, Adrian Verhulst, Roman Zakaluzny, Ormond Mendes (back after a year's absence) and backs Stan Bognucki and Jim Kalman.

Impressive newcomers include Trevor Wilson, Peter Mucalov, Andy Rode, John Coby and goalie Sam Cesario. Saturday's game against York featured a determined Toronto attack that was frustrated by poor timing around the goal plus a good dose of incredibly bad luck.

The first half was scoreless with Blues missing excellent scoring chances by Mario Palermo and Jim Kalman. Kalman missed a sure goal when teammate John Gero inadvertently stepped in front of the hard shot just as it was about to enter the goal.

Varsity continued to press in the second half almost completely controlling play but didn't score until 61 minutes when fullback Stan Bognucki finally broke through with a short header. Four minutes later the Blues had their second goal on a hard, low, 20 yarder from Frank Soppelsa.

Goalkeeper Allan Duffy and center-forward Wayne Purdon were standouts for York.

FREE KICKS — The York side has already played a pre-season match with Guelph. The score? Guelph 3-York 0.

The York head coach describes the Guelph team as possessing a "tremendous defence" and predicts that the Gryphons will easily contain the Blues attack. The Blues other three exhibition games were against Seneca College and Grad Studies. They defeated Seneca 5-2 here and 7-2 at Seneca while downing Grad Studies 5-2.

RUGGER BLUES FIZZLE

By DAN McAUJSTER

The two Blues rugby teams travelled to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor on Saturday morning and after a tiring six hour journey, fell to a double loss with the recurrence of many of the symptoms of bad play seen in the Wednesday York game.

The firsts' game, marked by remarkably dull play in the forwards and all 'round bad or non-existent tackling was again given order only by Graehem Wynn.

Wynn was injured in the process and will be sidelined for at least a week.

The match was very wide open, making fast cross — covering by the forwards imperative. Second phase attack was fairly even in the first half but as the second half wore on, the Michigan Team sustained their determination while the Toronto Fifteen lagged badly.

Two minutes after the opening kickoff, Michigan had fought deep into Toronto territory when Toronto was called offside and the ensuing penalty kick resulted in a three point lead for Michigan. Minutes later the Toronto side recovered their own kickoff, and were in good position to score three points where a penalty was called against Michigan.

By now the Michigan team was solidifying, the pack and backs meshing well in second phase play and reverses. Near the end of the half the technique paid off with a try near the touch line that was not converted.

In the second half, the Blues held off the unrelenting Michigan pressure with the help of fast wingers Segsworth and Zepp and especially strong running, kicking and tackling by fullback Larry McKenna. The last ten minutes though, were disastrous to Toronto as the Michigan side stormed across for three unconverted tries.

Winded, the Toronto team succumbed to a 15-6 loss, its first in thirty-nine games over a period of three years.

The Second Team, short three players, filled its positions with McKenna and Henry from the First Team and Neville Nankeville from our coaching staff.

Neither team was able to score a try; it was the fine kicking of four penalty goals by the Michigan flyer — half and one by Toronto player — coach Nankeville that made the final score Michigan 12, Toronto 3.

Blues' second half surge overcomes stubborn Warriors

Warrior's No. 70, Peter Bedford, puts the grab on Blues' Randy Myers about two seconds too late to prevent him from scoring on his first offensive series after replacing injured Bill Stankovic. Blues' end John

By PAUL CARSON

At about 3:40 Saturday afternoon, Varsity Blues decided to stop beating themselves.

Until then, Blues were mired in the same sloppy performance that had ruined the pre-season games as foolish penalties and silly but costly mistakes overshadowed excellent play by the defensive team.

It was late in the third quarter, and Varsity trailed the surprisingly tough Waterloo Warriors 21-10. Warriors had massive size along the line, and a clever diversified offense was capitalizing on Blues mistakes.

Toronto blockers often gave up as much as a 65-pound weight advantage, but when it counted Blues had a greater reverse of pride and basic guts.

A punt return by Pete Lamantia took Varsity to the Waterloo 48.

Waterloo then made three no-no's which reversed the entire momentum of the game.

First, Warriors were offside on second down, enabling Blues to retain possession instead of being forced to punt or gamble on third down.

Second, Warriors relaxed on a pass rush when Varsity quarterback Vic Alboini fumbled the snap. Alboini quickly recovered and hit flanker Eric Walter for eight needed yards.

Third, Warriors were caught muttering about Walter's clutch catch as Myers ran 14 yards up the middle for six points, his first as a Blue.

Two minutes later, Alboini hit split-end John Chapman for 32 yards and the go-ahead touchdown. Varsity 24, Waterloo 21. Chapman ran a perfect post pattern and nabbed the pass right between two befuddled Waterloo defenders.

Blues defence continued its magnificent play and protected the slim lead until Alboini and Walter settled the issue on a 72-yard pass and run combo with about three minutes left.

Lamantia snuffed out the last Waterloo drive with a diving interception (his third of the afternoon) of a pass deflected by Blues corner-back Bob Bloxham.

Even for a Varsity sportsie, it's difficult to find enough superlatives for Bloxham, who stripped continually Waterloo's sweep blocking and made several tackles that can only be described as clean-vicious.

The victory was sweet revenge for Varsity, and coupled with McGill's 28-6 upset of Queens, it makes Varsity number one (this week) in the SIFL.

Coach Ron Murphy had promised "something special" to contain speedy Warrior halfback Gord McLellan, and it worked. Last year, McLellan personally destroyed Varsity with 158 yards and three touchdowns; Saturday he gained but 32 yards on 13 carries and was knocked cold twice by Blues relentless gang tackling.

Jody Orted keyed on McLellan most of the afternoon, while Rick Agro and Ian Kirkpatrick often left their regular assignments to give the Waterloo superstar special treatment.

Blues started early by running in, out, around and through the six rookies on Waterloo's starting defensive team.

In his first start on offence, fullback Bill Stankovic led the Varsity ground game with 64 yards on 10 carries; Stank was injured in the second half but will be ready for Mac.

Chapman (76) and Warrior's Ryan Tripp (15) look on as referee umpire Tip Logan signals the touchdown.

However, erratic passing from Alboini and a missed assignment allowing Waterloo's Ed Scorgie to block a McKay punt, prevented the Toronto attack from producing a major score until 30 seconds before halftime.

Cor Doret capped a quick march by sweeping into paydirt from six yards out.

Varsity guard Don Fraser set up the score by wiping out mammoth Warrior tackle Dean Anderson with a devastating block. Anderson weighs 240; Fraser is 180.

Warriors only touchdowns came on rare defensive lapses by Varsity.

The line messed up a tackle on fullback Chuck Wakefield and he scampered through a maze of surprised Blues on route to a 40-yard touchdown.

In the third quarter, Rick Wiedenhoef slipped through Blues zone defence and grabbed a 40-yard td pass from Dave Groves. John Chapman fumbled the ensuing kickoff and Warriors marched 24 yards in five plays; Wakefield got the last four on a short screen pass. And that was it.

Warriors tried to gain field position by using set plays for on punt and kickoff returns, but they clipped outrageously on each attempt and the officials caught most of them.

Waterloo will clobber somebody this season, but that's ok. We don't play them again 'till '70.

Warrior's Ed Scorgie gets in to block Paul McKay's punt as Bill Stankovic blocks out Warren Hull. Scorgie picked up the ball and ran it back 25 yards before McKay tackled him on the Blues 20 yard line.

mass meeting 1 p.m.

Last minute compromise fails

If the university's administration refuses to comply with the second compromise on discipline which the SAC will advise today's mass meeting on discipline to sit-in.

The sit-in would be non-obstructive, and in effect extend the mass meeting until 9 a.m. tomorrow morning. It would enforce the SAC position on discipline, to which the administration has so far refused to officially reply, despite today's expiry date on the SAC-mass-

The committee will be composed of four representatives of the SAC, two of the Graduate Students' Union (GSU), and six of the ATS.

- The CPUO document "Order on Campus" will not be referred to this committee for any purpose because many members of the university community find it unacceptable on the ground that it contains repressive features.
- The procedures of the Caput statement of Sept. 20 will be superseded by procedures established by the interim disciplinary body.

The administration's main reason for refusing to accept the compromise was felt to be fear that its second clause would make Dr. Bissell lose face to such an extent that he would be forced to resign.

Because the staff-student compromise was turned down, today's mass meeting will be faced with separate statement from the ATS and the SAC.

meeting ultimatum for such a reply.

The administration yesterday turned down a compromise stand, worked out by an informal staff-student committee. Its membership included: Frederick Winter, chairman of the Association of Teaching Staff (ATS); Charles Hanly, chairman of the Ontario Council of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA); Michael Vaughan, president of the Graduate Students' Union (GSU); and SAC President Gus Abols.

The compromise statement of yesterday morning was a flexible version of the SAC-mass-meeting stand. It said that:

- There be established an interim disciplinary body, by delegation of Caput authority.

THE SIX DEMANDS

- that President Bissell officially disassociate himself from the Committee of Presidents of Universities in Ontario working paper, since the paper has nothing in common with the Campbell committee report and since it is not possible to support both reports;

- that Caput withdraw its position of Saturday;
- that no new disciplinary action be taken until after the Campbell report is published;

- that the university recognize that Caput is not a legitimate disciplinary body for dealing with student discipline and that further discipline be dealt with by a committee representative of the university community;

- that the Campbell committee report be published as soon as it is presented to the president;

- that the administration reply to these demands within one week.

What's happened . . .

February 1968: Acting President John Sword appoints a ten-man presidential advisory committee to write a full-scale report on discipline at U of T. There are two faculty, two administration representatives, three students, one alumnus on the committee as well as secretary Prof. A. M. Kruger and chairman Prof. D. R. Campbell.

March 1969: The Caput, the supreme disciplinary body, composed of 24 senior administrators, issues a statement saying immediate change in its own membership is essential in order to make Caput "more fully representative of the university community." Campbell, whose committee has not finished its report, comments that Caput's voluntary move to incorporate students and faculty right away is probably "an interim measure," designed to gain "a stronger moral position" on campus until the report's recommendations can be acted on.

May 1969: At the initiative of President Bissell a nine-man committee is set up to look into changing the composition of Caput for the period before the Campbell report can be acted on.

This committee has three students, three faculty and three Caput representatives.

September 18: This committee meets five times. They reach agreement that:

- Caput should be immediately reconstituted with a membership of 12 people: four students chosen by SAC, two chosen by the GSU, and six faculty chosen by the ATS. They would choose their own chairman from outside.

- This new Caput would be a temporary body, to be dissolved at the end of the academic year 1969-70.

- There would be "no extension of the jurisdiction of the Caput during the interim period," and the Caput would simply "exercise its jurisdiction in cases that it has historically dealt with."

The committee also suggested several reforms along the lines of the then-unpublished Campbell Report (open meetings, a system of lower courts, being tried by panels of four, extension of Caput jurisdiction to staff and faculty as well as students, and ending university jurisdiction in criminal actions such as theft).

September 18, 1969: The Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario, a council of the 14 Ontario university presidents, plus one "respected academic" from each campus issues a working paper saying universities should use "counter-violence" to deal with campus disorders.

Students or faculty involved in "obstructive behaviour" should be suspended, expelled or dismissed at once, the paper said.

Anyone who "interferes with free discussion and the rule of reason" is guilty of "behaviour unfit for the academic community."

These guidelines were suggested:

- all students, staff and faculty will be required to identify themselves "on request";

- the president will suspend anyone involved in what a staff-student committee identifies as "an obstruction to the university's processes"

- if this does not end the disruption, "the police will be brought in"

- if there is a threat to life or property, the president may call in police without consulting anyone

- suspended persons will later be charged before the "university's properly constituted disciplinary authority" and if found guilty will be liable to expulsion or dismissal.

September 19, 1969: President Bissell describes the working paper as "a helpful document" and "one of several statements that will be used to determine our Toronto policy".

September 20, 1969: President Bissell publishes and signs a Caput statement deploring the disruption of the University College freshman dinner two days earlier. Caput warns that it is still a viable body and that it will continue to exercise its traditional powers to fine, suspend, and recommend expulsion or withholding of standing.

This, says the statement, is necessary because the nine-man committee which had been meeting all summer to recommend changes for the period before the Campbell Report is dealt with "... has not yet been able to reach agreement on the question of what the Caput's jurisdiction to deal with actions arising out of sit-ins, disruption of classes, etc., should be..."

September 22, 1969: The SAC executive meets and publishes a statement saying Caput's statement contains an "outright lie." The committee on reconstituting Caput, says the SAC statement, did in fact reach agreement. (see above). The committee had decided to endorse no change in Caput's traditional powers.

The executive charged the administration with "bypassing its own channels whenever it is expedient" and with developing procedures for the interim before action on the Campbell Report without consulting faculty or students.

The executive asked Bissell to disown the Committee of Presidents working paper and asked the Caput to withdraw its statement of Sept. 20.

September 23, 1969: The committee to reconstitute Caput meets in Hart House. Bissell says he agrees with the basic as-assumptions of the CPUO paper and that the Caput statement was "a simple summary of the existing statutory situation."

He said he would not repudiate either of the two and that "existing law" would stay in force until charges are "agreed to and formally implemented."

The two SAC members of the committee withdrew following Bissell's speech, as did GSU member Michael Vaughan.

Later the same day a faculty member of the committee, ATS chairman F. E. Winter said he was "leaving" because the committee was effectively dead.

The committee, Winter said, had definitely reached a decision on interim disciplinary procedures before the Caput statement was issued September 20.

He said also that he was "absolutely flabbergasted and dismayed" after reading the CPUO document.

September 24, 1969: SAC meets and formulates the six demands.

SAC receives a statement from Bissell in which the president endorses the "main principles" of the CPUO paper while pointing out that some of its suggestions are "unacceptable on this campus."

Bissell also says that in the interim committee "no decision was reached" about the jurisdiction of a reconstituted Caput.

September 25, 1969: At a mass meeting in Convocation Hall, President Bissell reads out his statement of the previous day.

SAC president Gus Abols tells the more than 1,000 assembled students: "I personally feel that Dr. Bissell has broken a promise to us," namely that before the Campbell Report was acted on, Caput would be reconstituted in line with the decision of the nine-man summer committee.

Two hours later, after the crowd had dwindled by more than half, 300 students endorsed the six demands and decided to meet again in seven days.

At midnight the same day a coalition of the SAC executive, the GSU executive and the New Left Caucus issued a statement saying expulsion or suspension would be legitimate only in the event of physical violence against persons or destruction of property. This was an attempt to show the distinction between "violence and political disruption."

September 29, 1969: President Bissell releases the text of the Campbell Report which recommends placing disciplinary procedures in the hands of student-faculty courts.

The Report says there is a distinction between "obstructive and "destructive" actions.

Response to

Three campus councils have endorsed the six demands SAC issued to the administration last week. In favor of the demands are the Innis College Student Council, the Graduate Students' Union Executive and the University College Literary and Athletic Society.

The Medical Society issued a statement opposing the demands.

The Innis College Student Council voted 7-1 to support the SAC demands. Rejecting the wording of SAC's demands as ambiguous and redundant, the council issued the following statement: "Recognizing that Innis College philosophy concerning campus discipline is substantially reflected in the Campbell Report, the ICSS executive demands:

- that President Bissell officially disassociate himself from the CPUO working paper and that Caput officially disassociate from its position stated on Sept. 20

- that the Campbell Report be adopted and enacted as soon as possible

- that a body in keeping with the philosophy and structure recommended by the Campbell Report be established to deal with discipline matters until such time as the Campbell Report can be fully enacted.

In addition to supporting SAC's demands, the GSU Executive Committee passed the following motions:

- that the GSU is willing to participate in the establishment of disciplinary procedures along the guidelines of the Campbell Commission Report provided that an interim body satisfactory to staff and students is constituted to replace the Caput until the implementation of such procedures.

- that the interim body deliberate on all cases of discipline that are brought to its attention.

TIME TO ACT

Today the ultimatum expires. Students will assemble in Convocation Hall at 1 p.m. to face the U of T administration's response to the six demands which appear on page one, and decide on a form of action.

During the past week, the administration has been negotiating for a compromise, and the Campbell Report has been published. Its immediate publication answers demand five.

The Campbell Report is a fair document, but its blurred definitions of disruption and obstruction and its wavering conclusions only reinforce the first demand made by last week's mass meeting — that U of T President Claude Bissell disassociate himself from the working paper issued by the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario.

For while the Campbell Report looks for tolerance in the field of discipline, it could be interpreted to mean just about anything.

It depends how its implemented and how it's applied.

The chronology on page one and Bob Barkwell's article on page five show the administration has acted in bad faith in dealing with students on discipline committees.

No committee is worth its weight in paper, if an administration can always revert to the "due process" of legalism, as Dr. Bissell did last week when he stepped up the powers of Caput and thwarted the committee he had set up to deal with it.

The security of a liberal university lies in "due process," as Sidney Hook points out in the May issue of U.S. News and World Report.

"If universities refuse to govern themselves, the government will have to take over. It cannot permit assault, arson, possible loss of life merely because administrators — and the faculties — are cowardly. . .

"... Now, the essence of liberal civilization is the belief in due process. . .

"We have believed that once we follow due process, we can correct any inequity that develops. The alternatives are mob rule and lynch law."

Dr. Bissell also diverts the question of political freedom into a discussion of due process.

But the due process of Caput is anti-democratic. And the way the CPUO paper attempts to deal with 'mob-rule' is almost fascistic.

One condemns genuine mass democracy by calling it "mob-rule".

"Mob-rule" may be the administration's vision of a Toronto Reign of Terror, where the gutters around Simcoe Hall will run with blood. And the mass-media have already started to portray the alternatives as law-and-order or rioting-and-burning.

But no one is asking for anarchy and bloodshed.

Concerned students are asking for the right to build a mass student movement that can rationally confront the irrational and inhuman bases of our society and its universities.

One wonders whether the powers-that-be are afraid of mob-rule or mass-democracy, for the latter would challenge and subvert the social relations on which our economy, our education, and our society are built.

Mass action does not have to endanger life or property. The Campbell Committee realized that; the Committee of Presidents did not.

If the U of T administration has not repudiated the CPUO paper and thrown its weight behind the Campbell report and democratic due process, the students that appear at today's mass meeting should test the good faith of the administration by planning an action. That would provide an empirical case.

Such an action should be very low key: perhaps an overnight sleep-in at Simcoe Hall, followed by department strikes.

If Dr. Bissell called the police to end such a low-level occupation, Dr. Bissell's support of the Campbell Report would then seem vacuous, and his support of the CPUO brief would be obvious.

If the police were called, students should obviously get out. To stay would be suicidal, adventurist, and absurdly romantic.

But by some peaceful but obstructive means, good faith and due process must be tested in practice, if the demands are not answered.

'apathetic throngs'

My heartiest congratulations to the swinging staff of The Varsity for their dedicated efforts in pandering to the elements of disruption and disturbance on this campus and for contributing to the spirit of chaos which so many wild-eyed radicals feel is so necessary to society today. Also extreme compliments to the wise and learned fabulous freshmen of '69 who after one lecture hour can run crying to 'Mother Varsity' lamenting their cruel, harsh fate, their dissatisfaction with the system, and the ineptness of lecturers who were not sufficiently stimulating.

Sir, The Varsity should present these various aspects of the system for they underline the basic frustrating experiences which every student undergoes or should undergo. However, ferment and friction are also the criterion for hope in the future. Please publicize the positive and conservative ways in which hostilities may be vented for only then will progress be made. Enlightened action and discussion must be made attractive to the throngs of the apathetic or else innovations will become the statement of an isolated, radical group.

'unhealthy climate'

Sirs,

Whatever the intentions of the President, his failure to dissociate himself from the CPUO recommendations on discipline makes it appear that the administration of this University supports those recommendations. In view of the fact that the contents of the Campbell Committee Report were at that time unknown, this seems ill-advised since it may well be the case that the Report which ultimately will guide the formation of policy regarding discipline does not endorse these, or other similarly repressive recommendations.

In addition to being a threat to academic freedom, the CPUO recommendations are all too similar to the use of intimidation, a practice which has time and again had the effect of creating an unhealthy climate and has promoted rather than discouraged campus disturbance.

In the face of the recent situation, we believe that the SAC proposals were realistic and deserving of support from both the faculty and the administration. Now that point five has been met, we believe the administration has an obligation unequivocally to dissociate itself from the CPUO recommendations and to commit itself to the acceptance of the Campbell Committee Report as the basis for discussion and the formulation of future policy.

'let them speak'

We work here. We are happy to teach the scheduled subjects at the scheduled times; this "orderly educational process" is facilitated by calendars and registrars, and we welcome their help. But we are not content that the University should be confined to the limits set by inherited traditions and protocol.

If some student radicals announce they have a fundamental challenge to the University — let them speak! There has been too much flurry about just how far they should be permitted to go, and just what sort of committee should punish them if they go too far. We would wish for a more positive response from the University. (Not the Administration, but the University, of which the students and faculty are the central part.) We affirm that the University not only can "deal with" or "contain" an ideological challenge, but may benefit from it. Student radicals have not threatened to burn books; they have promised to call in question the structure of the University, the role of the University in society, and the content of some of its courses. Let's give them the chance to make good on their promises!

Sirs,

We welcome the prompt publication of the Campbell Report. We particularly welcome the President's declared willingness (as expressed in the Globe and Mail today, Monday) to consider setting up a Campbell-style tribunal to replace the Caput while the report is being discussed. We look forward to the speedy establishment of such a tribunal.

Barkwell speaks out against administration

By BOB BARKWELL

(Mr. Barkwell wishes to make clear that his article is not official SAC policy.)

The recent actions of the administration, bypassing students in subverting its own channels, and in deliberately lying about both, are only the latest in a long line of betrayals. Not only in the field of discipline, but on the campus centre, and on last year's secret brief to the committee on university affairs, Simcoe Hall has shown duplicity, dishonesty and a general disregard for students and their interests.

Fifteen months ago, Simcoe Hall at least tacitly decided that the disciplinary procedures of Caput were no longer adequate, and set up a joint staff-student committee under Prof. Ralph Campbell to come up with both new structures and new procedures. But on March 5 of this year, President Bissell and the Caput decided that even in the interim, Caput was not able to deal with discipline, and a committee was set up to restructure Caput.

WHY RESTRUCTURE

The SAC only agreed to go on with discussions on condition that the jurisdiction of Caput not be widened; that is that socio-political offences would not be dealt with. When Bob Barkwell asked Robin Ross, Vice-President and Registrar, why, if the administration agreed to that, there was necessity for restructuring Caput, Mr. Ross replied that "until recommendations stemming from the Campbell Committee were adopted, there would still be purely academic offenses occurring which the present Caput must handle in the interim. Even in dealing with these, the Caput felt that it was not a body that was "credible in the eyes of the University as a whole." President Bissell agreed "with the SAC view that the question (of socio-political offenses) was too complex to be decided by an interim body." He did say, however, "that in the event of a disruption, his own course of action would be to call together as representative a body as possible of staff and students."

STUDENTS IGNORED

But what has actually happened? The Caput has gone ahead and promulgated new rules without a single student being consulted. President Bissell has said that this was because the interim committee failed to reach agreement on the jurisdiction of Caput. And finally, the CPUO has put forth a statement which completely undercuts the Campbell Committee and which Dr. Bissell has refused to repudiate. It is clear that this alone would have shaken our faith in the honesty of administrators and in their real concern with student participation in decision-making. But this is only the culmination of a series of events which also lead to similar conclusions.

For example, last year the administration, without consulting staff or students, prepared a secret brief for presentation to the Committee on University Affairs. Only after this brief on the future of the university to 1975 was completed, were students asked to come to the presentation. It was necessary for a mass meeting to threaten a sit-in before that brief was released and students and faculty were allowed to modify it.

CENTRE CONFUSIONS

The Campus Centre has such a long and complex history of betrayal that it is impossible to cover it all here. What follows is a more or less chronological list of the high points. In 1967, the Ontario Government promised $2,000,000, the Board of Governors agreed to let the Bank of Montreal have exclusive rights on campus for 50 years in return for $1,836,000, and the Board agreed to put up the additional capital. On the Montreal's money, they should change the agreement to a yearly rent and throw the whole thing back open to both the B. of M. and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. It was felt by SAC at that time that the fact that the Board had 5 directors of the Imperial and only 3 directors of the B. of M. was significant. SAC refused to withdraw its promise of $2,000,000. And so on and so on.

ACTIONS CONTRADICT

This entire sequence of events, building over the last two years, calls into question the good faith of the administration. Their constant protestations of desire to deal with students are contradicted by their actions in consistently making important decisions without dealing with students. Their constant calls for open dialogue are contradicted by their own dishonesty and double-dealing. It is clear that students can only deal with Simcoe Hall from a position of power, that to go on committees without the power to force Simcoe Hall to abide by the decisions that are made is irresponsible and is not in the best interests of students.

It follows that since we can no longer trust the administration to follow decisions made in committee, that they must be forced to recognize the only power which students have — that is, they must recognize the right of students to take mass collective action such as peaceful sit-ins, non-violent strikes etc. Any failure to recognize this right in effect emasculates students and forces them to depend on the good will and good faith of the administration. The situation is exactly analogous to labour-management relations, in which the only real power labour has is their right to organize and strike. Unless students can win the same rights, they become subject to the whim of administrators. The explicit right to organize and to act collectively must be recognized by the administration.

strength of these promises, SAC retained an architect and went ahead with planning. In 1968, the Board decided on a manoeuvre to get the government to pay the entire cost, then announced that since SAC no longer needed the Bank of following the Board's suggestion, following which the Board announced that they were unable to give the B. of M. 50 years exclusivity on campus. In the spring of 1968, the Government

PSA struggle continues at Simon Fraser

Burnaby (CUP) — The threat of administrative repression which has been hanging over the heads of striking faculty in SFU's Dept. of Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology began to materialize today (Sept. 30) as the SFU administration made its first move toward suspension and dismissal of the strikers.

The move by the administration has brought counter-responses from students and faculty outside the PSA Dept., which has spread the 7-day old strike into other departments of the University.

In individual letters to 11 PSA faculty members who are taking part in the strike, acting administration vice-president L.M. Srivastava set a deadline of 5 p.m. Wednesday (October 1) for their capitulation to an administrative demand that they teach all regularly scheduled classes, using course material described in the SFU calendar and approved by the academic senate.

A promise by the faculty to comply with the administration demand, first made September 24 the day the strike began, would amount to the virtual ending of the strike by the professors.

"If you fail to respond or your answers are negative, it is my intention to recommend to the president (SFU president Ken Strand) that he immediately suspend you and institute dismissal procedures against you," he said.

The administration claims failure to comply with the ultimatum will constitute sufficient grounds for "breach of contract" by the faculty and termination of contract by the dept., and called for a general strike of history students to begin at 12:30 Thursday.

The strike would continue until such time as negotiations begin between the SFU administration and the Dept. of Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology.

Approximately 250 history students out of a total enrollment of 750 attended the meeting: 150 voted in favour of the strike.

The history students also called upon faculty and staff in their department to support the strike.

Other PSA members have begun examination of the now-structure of SFU, comparing it to that of UBC, and a both formulated yesterday evening.

The first stand was taken in the early evening by the ATS executive, which voted unanimously to endorse a weaker statement than the compromise. The vote was motivated more by fears of Dr. Bissell's resignation than by united faculty opinion on discipline, SAC felt.

The ATS statements said: Whereas the ATS welcomes the President's statement that the CPUBO working paper is not policy on this campus,

Whereas implementation of the Campbell Report will take considerable time;

Whereas it is necessary to have a policy on discipline in the interim;

There be established an interim disciplinary body... (composed of six staff and students, chosen by the ATS, GSU and SAC).

The interim body be free to establish its own procedures. Professor Winter informed an SAC executive meeting last night of the ATS position.

Professor Hanly then told the SAC executive that OCUFA had taken a stand on the CPUBO working paper. They label its content "ill-advised" and unnecessary. He added that though burying it on this campus had failed officially yesterday afternoon, it would not in effect be implemented here because of the opposition with which it had been met.

But debate at the SAC executive meeting repeatedly brought up the fact that not even the staff-student statement had specifically mentioned adherence to the principles of the Campbell Report.

The SAC executive voted unanimously to present the following statement, read by Vice-President Bob Barkwell, to today's mass meeting: That the SAC state that the following conditions will meet the Six Demands (of last week): That one or more senior administrative officials state that the CPUBO document will not be used on campus, because it is a repressive document that does not reflect the spirit of the Campbell report.

That Caput withdraw its position and delegate its responsibility to SAC, the GSU, and the ATS.

That the spirit of the Campbell Report be the only basis for discussion on this campus. The motion was formulated by the coalition which had been considering the student position on recent disciplinary developments. The coalition is composed of the SAC, the GSU, several college councils, the History Students' Union, the Italian Club, and the New Left Caucus.

It was later clarified by the SAC Executive. They voted to add to it that it was not meant to be an ad-hominem attack on any official, but was directed at the best interests of the university community.

The SAC's and the GSU's acceptance of its second clause shows willingness to take part in the same kind of interim disciplinary body it had resigned from last week.

The Medical Society released a statement expressing support for the authority of Caput until an interim body could be set up. The statement calls the failure of Dr. Bissell to inform the Students' Administrative Council of his intention to sign the CPUBO paper "unfortunate". But it asserts that the President has "demonstrated good faith in his statement of Sept. 23 clarifying his position with respect to the CPUBO document, and putting it into the proper perspective as a working paper — open to critical discussion, and not a statement of University of Toronto disciplinary policy."

At an executive meeting last night SAC gave support to the protesting students of UBC and SFU. In response to an appeal to all Canadian students to show concern over the planned U.S. atom bomb test, SAC expressed the "solidarity and support" of the U of T student body.

The fear of "possible environmental poisoning, disruption of ecological balance and the danger of seismic disasters" prompted UBC and SFU to call for a nation wide blockade of all highway, railroad, ferry and airline systems is planned from Victoria to Halifax. Already some eight thousand UBC and SFU students are organizing at British Columbia crossing points.

To show their support McGill is planning to send representatives to bolster the SFU blockades.

ing that "many of the people around the Manifesto, and the federal aids to blastier onto a individual of minority action seems to be a person involved in termination of contract by the administration.

Five professors in the 16-man PSA department did not comply with the overwhelming vote in favour of the strike in the first place.

Striking PSA members began picketing the classes of the faculty scabs today (Sept. 30).

A striking PSA faculty have written a response to the administrative ultimatum, entitled "Who has broken contract with whom?", but their response has had limited circulation. Members of the administrative trusteeship over the department would have to sign the requisition form for paper required to circulate the document.

The administration's move has provoked SFU History students, already on record as supporting the Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology department's struggle to join the strike.

At a special meeting of the History Students Association, Tuesday, members voted near unanimous endorsement of the strike action taken by the PSA.

BY PETER HALL

The Ontario Young New Democrats support both independence and socialism for Canada, but they aren't sure which should come first.

At a weekend session at Hart House, an open split developed between delegates advocating strong support for Canadian economic nationalism and those emphasizing the more traditional class-struggle aspects of socialism.

The seminar, which brought together 150 delegates from all over Ontario, centred around the manifesto for an Independent Socialist Canada, the controversial paper prepared by a number of prominent NDP academics seeking to reorient the party leftward.

University of Toronto economics Professor Melville Watkins, a prime mover behind the Manifesto, emphasized the need for the party to take a strong anti-imperialist stand.

"The elites of Canada have sold out to the Americans," he said. "If you're anti-capitalist, you must be anti-American."

Gerry Kaplan, a lecturer at OISE, agreed with Watkins that "the reality that is the most important one in the world is the reality of American imperialism."

In a panel discussion keynotes to the conference his sentiments were echoed by James Laxer, a Queens graduate student, and Giles Endicott, former NDP president.

In the discussion groups that followed, supporters of Watkins' position prepared a resolution advocating stringent government controls on foreign ownership of Canadian industry and "selective nationalization of foreign-owned firms."

They were challenged by several delegates worried that nationalistic issues might divert the party from more fundamental socialism.

Dave Shea, a provincial councillor of the NDP, declared that "the socialist workers' struggle to change the system is most important."

Regina Modtich, a delegate from the Toronto area, charged that "many of the people who band-aids to plaster onto the capitalism where its sores are most evident."

He called for a "united front Canadian capitalism" conscience and a "crisis of socialist form."

Kaplan accused student leftist movements of doing a "lot of stupid, dangerous, untenable things."

"Most of the student movement in Canada doesn't talk to anyone but itself," he said. "Socialism means dialogue, saying something to people that is useful."

Sunday, the left moved from its socialism-imperialism discussion to an attack on the New Democratic Party for being undemocratic and "too political."

Steve Penner, a delegate from London, said the NDP "must go into communities and show they will help without party strings attached."

Wilson head metro director of the Social Planning Council encouraged the party to "help people on their own terms" and not force "these people in individual or community action groups to become involved in the party."

"Previous NDP community work was called 'superficial' by Hans Brown, an Ottawa delegate.

In reply to Ontario MLA Stephen Lewis, who urged that the party work toward socialism through parliament, Langdon said "the NDP in power in parliament, by itself, cannot make the fundamental changes for a socialist society."

"The NDP can be the centre of integration for some extra-parliamentary activities, but not an umbrella for all," Langdon said.

Langdon felt that co-operation with all "left-wing" people, not just NDP members, was necessary to bring socialism to Canada.

In a seminar on Student Democracy, Langdon discussed democratization, decentralization and a free learning approach to education in the high school.

He talked of raising the level of student consciousness among political and apathetic students.

President Nyerere of Tanzania comes to campus

Julius K. Nyerere, President of Tanzania, will speak at Convocation Hall tomorrow at 3:30 p.m. It is probably the best to look at a few of his policies and actions in Tanzania.

Two years ago he grew increasingly concerned about the transfer of the Tanzanian intelligencia into an acquisitive oligarchy. This has been a feature in all too many African countries over the past few years. A major feature of Nyerere's policy therefore has been to avoid this danger.

He has insisted on genuine elections — so much so that in 1965 many cabinet ministers and MPs lost their jobs. His own salary was cut by 20 per cent, and those of civil servants and party officials by 10 — 15 per cent. Furthermore, civil servants and party officials may not have more than one house, or take part in any

A quiet, unpretentious but dedicated and selfless leader of his people, President Nyerere has proven a rare asset to a small and poverty-stricken country. Under Nyerere's leadership, Tanzania has perhaps the brightest prospects of any country in Africa today.

crushed". Thus Tanzania gets its aid from a wide variety of countries, but at a much lower level than nations that lean to either side in the Cold War.

Nyerere's insistence on making decisions on the basis of principle has often had costly repercussions. Tanzania was one of the few African countries to carry out the promised break in diplomatic relations with Britain (over her handling of the Rhodesian crisis). This led to the abandonment of a $22 million aid loan.

Nyerere also incurred the animosity of a number of African countries with his stand on Biafra. "Unity can only be based on the general consent of the people involved," he stated when Tanzania became one of the first countries to recognise Biafra.

When Russia invaded Czechoslovakia, Tanzania was sharply critical, and warned the Eastern bloc countries not to try interfering with Tanzania's affairs. "We did not fight against the Western Colonialists in order to become the playthings of any Eastern country."

The position of Tanzania and President Nyerere has been growing increasingly difficult. Many other developing nations have been caught in the pitfalls Tanzania is trying to avoid. The next few years will be crucial in determining the struggle for true independence, and the achievement of equality and an improved life for all Tanzanians.

Should Nyerere succeed, he will have a major impact on the development of all other African countries, and probably the rest of the world as well. He needs all the support Canada can give him.

NON-ALIGNMENT

Dodge says university spending report distorted

"In dollars and cents terms, in fact, Canada may now be throwing away more than fifty cents of every dollar it sinks into the university."

According to the Toronto Star of Sept. 25, this rather startling warning comes from David Dodge, a young economist at Queens.

This summer, Dodge completed a study that deals with "the returns to investment in university and professional training."

The Star and the Globe attempted to synthesize his academic dissertation into snappy, readable stories that would interest their reading public.

Both papers have interpreted the Dodge dissertation as a challenge to the traditional concept which assumes that any amount of government spending on higher education automatically produces a "profit" expressed in economic benefits and better living conditions.

This challenges the traditional concept that almost any amount of money that the government spends on higher education produces a "profit" in economic benefits and better living.

In calculating the "profit," Dodge wrote, the investment is the amount the government spends for classrooms, libraries, labs, professors' salaries, and other miscellaneous expenses. The gross return is the difference between the incomes of graduates and those of "similar" individuals who did not go to college.

Former reasoning has been that the individual's salary is an approximate indicator of what he contributes to the total production of the country; the extra income commanded by a university graduate is due to knowledge he absorbed in his courses.

Dodge has calculated that government investment in higher education now yields only a small annual return in increased national output, i.e., about 3 1/2 per cent. Since the cost of money is now considered to be 7 1/2 per cent, it may be concluded that education is an unprofitable investment.

Previous estimates have set this figure at 9, 10, or more per cent — at least always more than 7 1/2 per cent.

Further, Dodge estimated that as much as 40 per cent of the difference between the earnings of dropouts and those of graduates may be a result of the latter's greater ability. In other words, he believes that the "smart ones" would make more money whether or not they went to university.

He also estimated that up to half the extra income of college graduates is a result of the fact that a degree requirement is merely a "barrier to entry" to many jobs and professions. This refutes the opinion that the college education is something that is needed directly for doing the job.

In conclusion, the Star reported, Dodge recommended in his study that if a decision is to be made on strictly economic grounds, the government should put a freeze on its university spending.

"Certainly I accept it," said U of T economics professor David Stager. "Dodge is a very methodical, competent researcher," Stager added.

He emphasized in an interview that this was an economist's study, and that the economists have already done their job in discussing the value of university education. It is now "A role for the sociologist to tell us what are the benefits of the non-monetary side."

In a second interview with Professor Stager, after he had talked to Dodge at a seminar at the Department of Manpower in Ottawa, Monday, September 29, he discussed the background of the newspaper story.

One of Dodge's graduate students in a seminar on the Economic Council also writes for the Star. The report was the subject of seminar discussion and this student asked Dodge's permission to write it up for the Star.

"The student wrote up a good report that was reasonably accurate," although slightly prejudiced from his own point of view." The Star chopped out parts of it.

Among the facts not included in the Star article is that the study concerned only a very small group of people — engineers, accountants, and physical scientists.

Also, in terms of economic profit, from the private individual's point of view there is still a high rate of return on university education investment. At the same time, it is important to go through that route (i.e., the university) in order to get at the means of higher returns, since many jobs require a university degree.

Professor Stager commented on the Star's implication that there was disagreement between Dodge and his boss John Deutsch, President of Queens and chairman of the Economic Council of Canada in 1965 when that body called for a "tremendous expansion" of the Universities.

"Dodge has gone one step further than the Economic Council. It is not a conflict but an indication of advancement. Dodge implies that we must go beyond his study to study social benefits.

"Until someone says that there are other benefits, and until we know how to measure them, this will stand. It is an outline of what needs to be done."

Professor Stager concluded this interview with criticism of the two newspapers involved.

"For the Globe and the Star to take the sensational view of the study is irresponsible and irrational."

Both the Star and the Globe and Mail reported that this study had been completed with a Department of Manpower grant. However, as Dodge himself said in Monday's Globe, he received the aid from the Industrial Relations Centre at Queen's University.

More on Campbell

The recently published Campbell Report has been hailed as "salvation" and "our only hope" by Dr. T. McFeat, chairman of the Department of Anthropology.

Other department heads are similarly excited. The Dean of Arts and Science, A. D. Allen, calls the report "marvellous" and "one of the best statements on the discipline problem". The Dean of the Department of Applied Science and Engineering, J. M. Ham said the report is a "creative basis for university life". Both men are on Caput.

The Varsity Free University will hold its first major class this Saturday, it was announced yesterday afternoon.

"Here's your chance to learn how to write a story, think up a lead, take a pic or lay out," said Varsity editor Brian Johnson.

Surprises, a little hard work, a free dinner, and a party (featuring Dave Frank's new "The Band" record) will round out VFU.

Wanna buy yourself a class?

LONDON (CUP) — Psst! Hey meester, you want to buy nice sociology class?"

Classroom overcrowding and a registration mix-up have opened a whole new area of free enterprise at the University of Western Ontario — a black market in course registration cards.

Some departments at the university have not bothered to keep track of course enrolment cards given out during registration, and as a result students could register in close to 30 different courses, some of them more than once.

And some students have been cashing in during a year when Western, bulging at the seams, has turned away students due to lack of space.

Less fortunate students turned away from overcrowded classes have been able to buy the required course card for prices ranging from $2 to $40.

"I need this course and if I can buy a card to get into it, I will," said one. "Registration has really screwed me around this year."

"It's a queer thing," said UWO registrar J. K. Watson. "This is the first I've heard about it, but I can't imagine a student silly enough to buy a course card when he has just paid $500 for tuition.

"I guess students need some sort of mother here to protect them from themselves."

'Peace monument' dismantled

A "peace monument" built by the Hillel Foundation last week was taken down yesterday, after one arson attempt, to prevent any further burnings.

The thatch-roofed, canvas structure was erected for the Jewish holiday Sukkot as a plea for universal peace.

But late Friday night, someone poured kerosine on the structure and set fire to it, destroying one wall.

University fire marshall Frank Cunningham was upset over the fire, and told the Hillel executive he wanted it taken down immediately to prevent someone from burning down the rest of it.

"It's not our fault people want to burn it," said executive member Mark Hundert (III APSC), but he agreed that more burnings could endanger someone's life, and so the structure was taken down yesterday afternoon after a "peace service."

Hundert felt that whoever tried to burn it probably saw it as a symbol of Zionism.

"But it wasn't," he emphasized, "It was a universal plea for peace."

Waterloo president will permit student veto of CPUO document

WATERLOO (CUP) — Students at the University of Waterloo will have the opportunity to veto any recommendations coming out of the report of the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario, before they become university policy.

Waterloo Administration President Howard Petch made the promise last Thursday to students who gathered outside his office demanding his reaction to the report.

While he would not reject the CPUO report out of hand, Petch said, all recommendations made by a committee studying the document would be subject to the approval of the Waterloo Federation of Students.

Petch rejected Federation President Tom Patterson's description of the arrangement as a "parity veto", preferring instead to call it "defining mutually acceptable guidelines," because not only the students but also the faculty association and the president's council (senior administrative body at Waterloo) would have to approve any recommendations.

The next day, Petch indicated that he wouldn't mind leaving the enforcement of law and order in the hands of the state.

Interviewed by the student newspaper, the Chevron, Petch said he was willing to accept the implementation of a report submitted last fall by a five-year committee on discipline, composed of students, faculty and administration.

The committee recommended that campus disciplinary bodies confine their jurisdiction to such academic offenses as cheating; leaving any activity covered by the criminal code of Canada to the discretion of the courts.

The CPUO report called for punitive action by both the courts and the university, and would add suspension or expulsion to any legal penalties administered to university offenders.

Under the Waterloo committee recommendations, any students arrested during a disruption would be able to return to classes as soon as they had posted bail.

"If that's what people want, then I will call the police," Petch said.

Organized speakers and topics relevant to student needs are the oims of this year's program, according to Miss R. D. Goymer, a career counsellor at the Centre. For example, Dr. Ben Schlesinger of the School of Social Work will give the Oct. 16 lecture on social work.

Specials in the series include a talk by the director of the Centre on Interviews and Recruiting as well as a Hallowe'en special on employment opportunities for grads.

Miss Goymer promises concrete and surprising answers to the question, "What's available for a general arts person?" in the Nov. 5 lecture.

For dates, locations and information on everything from permanent positions (jobs) for grads to personal counselling, visit the Centre at 581 Spadina Ave. or watch for the posters.

History students worried by overcrowding

The problem of overcrowded classes took top priority at the meeting of third and fourth year history students on Tuesday afternoon.

The profuse number of students enrolled in third-year history and the lack of teaching assistants has caused lectures in some courses to be enormous, and other courses to be without tutorials or group discussions of any sort.

Some professors have tried to alleviate matters by setting up bi-weekly tutorials of 25 students in place of a third lecture.

Craig Heron, President of the History Student's Union, suggested student-organized tutorials might be substituted for the third lecture in a course with the professor circulating from group to group.

It was felt that by having the tutorials run by the students, only those students really interested would attend.

This suggestion could only be implemented if it met with the approval of the professors.

The problem of closed lectures, the treatment of special students, the limited course choice, compulsory tutorial attendance, and closed department meetings were among other grievances brought forth at the meeting.

Some of these problems will be discussed at the Standing Committee meeting and others by the Department of History.

On Thursday Oct. 2, at 1 p.m., a mass meeting of all history students will be held in Room 102 of the New Physics Building to discuss the discipline question and how it affects the history students. The curriculum and the question of exams will also be dealt with.

Sorry . . .

Twenty-four U of T professors have objected to a Varsity reprint Monday of a letter they sent to The Globe and Mail.

The professors specifically objected to the heading of the letter, which indicated that they opposed President Claude Bissell's stand on discipline. "Our letter was not a criticism of President Bissell and the administration. It was a statement of the inappropriateness of the CPUO guidelines (which are not the official policy of any institution)," they wrote.

The Varsity regrets having misquoted Mr. Norman Harper of the Building Services Employees Union in Monday's edition.

The reference to "bashing his bloody guts out" was the result of poor telephone connection. The Varsity apologizes for any inconvenience caused Mr. Harper.

RuggerBlues meet Old Boys tonite

Regular season starts Saturday

By DAN McALISTER

Tonight at 8:00, the U of T Rugger Old Boys challenge the Blues Rugger Team for their last pre-season exhibition match. The game will be played under the lights in Varsity Stadium and should be very exciting since the Blues play their best ball in the stadium.

In practice yesterday, most of the time was spent remedying the ills of the Michigan games. Loose rucks, line outs and cross covering play improved steadily with the spirits of the team.

New faces in the pack are those of prop Bill Henderson, second row "Sifto" Salt, and number eight Harley Griffiths.

New backs are winger Ian Hartley, centre Bill Hutchinson and fullback John Holmes.

The Blues are vigorous and ready.

The Old Boy lineup is formidable with the Blues' best from the last five years. Bethel, Imrie, Kyle, and Donohue from the pack and Phibbs, Sutherland and Wraw in the back line, all having recently left the Blues, will be very anxious for a victory.

This match will make or break the Blues' spirit for the season opener against McMaster on Saturday and will be hard fought all the way so don't miss it!

Good grief, Charlie Brown! Womens' Sports on page 12

By MELANIE POTTS

The Women's Athletic Association of the University of Toronto proudly presents the Women's Athletic Association's annual, new and exciting, revised and expanded, wildly contemporary program, in athletics, achievement, recreation and sport.

As luck would have it, Miss A. Hewett (or Miss Anne H., depending upon how well you play golf) happened to be sitting in a chair beside mine, in the centre of the huge sports gymnasium. Having explained to her the circumstances leading up to my sedentary status, she proceeded in her extraordinarily efficient manner to expound on the remarkably fine qualities and almost limitless scope of activities which the W.A.A. proposed to offer again this year.

The women of this University have only to make the vaguest noise of interest or set a pen to paper and they are whisked off on socially and athletically satisfying escapades, such as ski trips, bonspiels, bowling tournaments, archery shoots, golf tournaments and team sport competitions of every description.

JUST STYLE AND HUMOUR NEEDED

And what is nice is that about the only prerequisite to an interfaculty competition is a good sense of humour and a little bit of style. (Where in doubt smile and lie like hell!!)

I confess that, when I was first asked to write an article entolling the virtues of this particular athletic department, I was hesitant. (In the immortal words of Varsity swim coach, Sue Kinnear, "Are you kidding? I'm not saying anything".) I knew not where to begin and having begun I knew not where to end.

Faced with this dilemma and recognizing indecision as one of my chief failings, I casually seated myself in the centre of the huge sports gymnasium in the Benson Building and observed the various registration tables located around the periphery.

COMPENDIUM OF WHAT???

What a compendium of opportunities, I thought!! What a myriad of stimulating experiences we are offered in this very room. (Well; perhaps those were not the exact words that flashed across my mind.)

With these enthusiastic words still ringing in my ears, I began to observe once again, this time more critically, the various registration tables.

My eyes scanned acquatics and dance gymnastics and sports and I wondered why only one or two students at the most were signing up for these activities. When, quite by accident, (my peripheral vision not being what it used to be) I noticed twenty-three wholesome young bodies lined up patiently at one of the tables, my heart leapt into my throat. I rushed joyously to see what could possibly attract such a favourable response — only to find two ladies from the Health Service heatedly writing out appointment slips.

A FANTASTIC RECORD

It is pointless, I suppose to rave about the fantastic record that our girls have built up in intercollegiate competition. (Nevertheless I feel I must continue in this vein.)

Last year alone, our swimmers swept the speed, diving and synchronized swimming meet, our tennis team was number one, our archers cleaned up at the Intercollegiate Shoot and our basketball team captured the Bronze Baby after a decade of draught.

The Varsity Sports Department plans extensive coverage of all aspects of womens' athletics, both intramural and intercollegiate. However, this additional coverage can be achieved ONLY if we obtain many additional female reporters and photographers. See important notice on page 11.

What is more, our volleyball players are perennial champions and our field hockey team is consistently unbeatable. Surely (and I fear my facetious tone is fading) this says a great deal, not only for the student but, indeed, for the staff.

I might say just in passing that the talent located in the Physical Education Department and on the W.A.A. itself might well be staggering to anyone who had not come to expect only the very best from the University of Toronto.

McMaster University sailed past eight other competitors to win the McGruer Trophy in the international intercollegiate regatta at Owen Sound last weekend.

As the fair breeze blew and the white foam flew, Waterloo hoisted her sails to take number two position. Queens captured third place.

McGruer and Clark of Owen Sound were kind enough to provide boats (albacore class) and did an excellent job of organizing this first annual regatta.

Meanwhile, back at Kingston, the Toronto sailors showed their true skill. Skipper John Wright with crews Bill Dunlop, Dave Gilmour, Charlie Megan, and Mickey Weiner came first over all in the competition held at RMC. The winds became so rough that racing had to be terminated after three races the first day.

Tenants will march for housing rights

By MARY BASTEDO

After two years of sporadic attempts at organizing tenants in Ontario and Metro have formed the Ontario Tenants Association and are planning a march on Queen's Park this Saturday.

- Marchers are demanding:
- that security deposits be abolished
 - that landlords be required to repair the buildings they own
 - that tenants be protected against retaliatory and arbitrary eviction
 - that rent review boards be set up to explore the whole problem of high rents and to mediate in landlord-tenant disputes.

The demands involve basic changes in the Landlord and Tenant Act which were recommended in December 1968 by the Ontario Law Reform Commission. No action has yet been taken by the government on the recommendations.

The march will leave from City Hall at 10:30 a.m.

The Metro Tenants Association was formed last year on the impetus of two unsuccessful rent strikes at an apartment building at 33 Eastmount Avenue.

The second strike ended in court. The judge decided that the strikers were revolutionaries and ordered them to pay their rent within five days.

Tenants discovered they had no rights.

"What we're really interested in changing is the whole concept of property," said Lee Patterson, chairman of the Ontario Tenants Association, "the concept that if you own something it's yours and you have total control over it."

The Metro Tenants are also arguing for government regulation of rent.

The association is pushing for security of tenure, tenant control of their buildings, fair leases and an upgrading of the design and construction of apartment buildings.

The ratio of homeowners to non-homeowners in Ontario and in Metro is about 50:50

Meeting accepts Bissell's statement

By SUSAN REISLER

The controversial working paper on discipline issued by the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario "is not . . . is not the policy of the University of Toronto," U of T President Claude Bissell told a mass meeting at Convocation Hall Wednesday.

Dr. Bissell was making his reply to the six demands issued to him a week earlier by the Students' Administrative Council and the Graduate Students' Union before an overflow audience of almost 3,000 people.

Dr. Bissell, met wild cheers and a standing ovation as he entered the hall. His address was preceded by a reiteration of SAC's demands by SAC president Gus Abols.

Reading from his statement, released an hour earlier and distributed to the audience, Dr. Bissell explained once more that he had "agreed to the circulation of the CPUO paper on the clear understanding that the statements in it did not speak for any university and were not in any way binding on any university.

BISSELL RESPONDS

Dr. Bissell dealt with all the SAC demands that remained to be answered. His response fell within the one week deadline specified in the sixth demand and the publication of the Campbell Report Monday morning fulfilled demand five.

The president did not personally disassociate himself from the CPUO paper, nor did he repudiate the document generally, as SAC had demanded.

However, he did emphasize that the CPUO document was in no way university policy and said the Campbell Report was "the report that is relevant to the University of Toronto."

Dr. Bissell said a parity committee of students and academic staff would immediately be formed to begin working on the implementation of the Campbell report.

Until the report is implemented the parity committee would take over the functions of the Caput and operate in the spirit of the Campbell Report.

CAPUT SUPERCEDED

The new implementation committee would seem to fulfill the demands that the university recognize "that Caput is not a legitimate disciplinary body" and that "no new disciplinary action be taken until after publication of the Campbell Report."

The final demand, that Caput withdraw its position threatening strong action if new disruption of university functions occurred, has not been reacted to by Caput.

Michael Vaughan, president of the Graduate Students' Union, was the first to speak to Dr. Bissell's statement.

"The points just made in the speech are a victory . . . showing that reason prevails on this campus," he said.

MOVES ACCEPTANCE

Vaughan then moved that the students accept Dr. Bissell's statement as a reply to the students' demands.

Vaughan also termed an article in Wednesday's Varsity, which described student-administration negotiations during the week, as "garbage."

Greg Kealey V SMC, a SAC executive member, said he would respond in some ways similarly to Vaughan.

"It is obvious," he said,

"that the statement doesn't fully meet those six demands. It meets approximately five and one half of them.

"The other one half does not relate to U of T," he said.

BOOKSTORE BONANZA

Lucky Susan Carrington (II Vic) won a year's free supply of textbooks in the Textbook Store draw Wednesday.

"I was really thrilled," Susan said, "It was like one of those contests you win that you just can't believe you've won."

Miss Carrington still has to answer a skill-testing question to be awarded the prize.

But there was some behind-the-scenes confusion, according to Charles Fanning, General Manager of the store. The contest was the big promotion of the year for the Textbook Store.

Into the student handbooks were inserted entry forms to be filled out and dropped into a box in the main store. The store expected roughly 15,000 entries, since 40,000 people have used the store in the past two weeks.

There were 459 entries, 85 of them by one person, 78 by another.

Mr. Fanning attributes this catastrophe to SAC who put the inserts in backwards, so people didn't notice them.

The Damned Campus

Everyone making you uptite? Administration, profs, assignments, buttonholing by right and left wing student caucus? Whether to join those trying to be the most "in" showing bravery in mass meetings by shouting catcalls and obscenities to a person or group in the minority, or be downtite about all of these pseudo-salvationists cults on the damned campus. That is the question.

Don't be uptite! Consider the Original Society for the Advancement of Downtite! We are interested in your salvation, but with a history of around 4000 years, don't mind us if we are a bit downtite about it.

Skulemen turn out in force

By TREVOR SPURR

The problem of campus discipline was not the real issue at Wednesday's mass meeting at Convocation Hall, according to Associate Dean W.F. Graydon of the Faculty of Engineering.

"The issue was whether a small splinter group of people was going to run this place," he said Thursday afternoon.

Commenting on the large number of Engineers in the front rows of the meeting he admitted, "there was some effort on the part of the faculty to make it clear to engineering students that they had the right to attend the meeting," and "some departments put up notices to that effect."

"The Dean was aware of the students' desire to go and thought every department should allow students to attend, but he issued no statement on the matter," he said.

Graydon went on to say the expression of support for President Bissell at the mass meeting "was not a story of coercion by staff or the Dean surreptitiously doing something. It was a grass roots movement."

FEARS MINORITY RULE

Although he expressed reservations about some aspects of the CPUO working paper, Graydon said he was more worried about a "tyranny of the minority".

Dean A.D. Allen of the Faculty of Arts and Science did not advise students or staff about Wednesday's meeting.

"I felt it would be inappropriate that I should indicate where the department should go in non-academic matters," he said.

He added that he did not mean to imply that he disapproved of the Faculty of Engineering's actions.

Dean Allen's reaction to the result of the mass meeting was "one of great relief." He believed the President's statement Wednesday was "an extremely good one."

NO ADVICE

Dean A.L. Chute of the Faculty of Medicine also said he had not advised his faculty or students on attendance at the meeting.

President Bissell said that he was unaware that classes had been cancelled so that students could attend the mass meeting, but he thought the move was justified.

"Yes, it's a good thing to do if there is a matter of importance to the university. I'm all in favour of divisional responsibility," he said.

He had no comment as to whether classes should have been cancelled in other faculties.

The Students' Administrative Council executive met briefly after Wednesday's news meeting in Convocation Hall and issued the following statement:

President Bissell's statement of October 1, which meets the thrust of the SAC demands at the University of Toronto, is a victory for students.

The administration concessions were gained by the effective participation of students on this campus in voicing their rejection of the CPUO and Caput statements. The students, by this action, have demonstrated their support of the right to organize on this campus.

We regret that President Bissell's statement was limited to the University of Toronto because CPUO affects all other Ontario campuses. Not all campuses have a Campbell Report. The students at the University of Toronto will have to continue to work towards quick and reasonable implementation of the form in light of the Campbell Commission and the Commission on University Government.

We extend our thanks to all organizations and individuals, both faculty and students that helped in the resolution of this crisis.

Kealey stressed that the CPUO paper was issued on other campuses which are engaged in similar struggles to get it repudiated.

It was important to get the paper repudiated for all of Ontario, he said, "because not all campuses have a Campbell Report to fall back on."

SAC President Gus Abols said, "I personally feel that it is an acceptable statement."

Speaking through severe heckling, Young Socialist Hans Modlich (SGS) said it was too early to pass judgment on the Campbell Report and called for a campus-wide referendum so that students could decide "who could call the cops."

POWER TO PRESIDENT

Modlich advocated that the power be given to the SAC president.

Young Socialist Ellie Kirzner (IV UC) also had trouble speaking above the crowd.

At one point she called the boys who were heckling "proud, chauvinist pigs."

Miss Kirzner said that students should set the guidelines for the interim discipline committee. The "vague" Campbell Report should not be allowed to structure it.

ELECT, DON'T APPOINT

"The students should be elected, not appointed," she said.

John Winter (SGS) moved the question and a vocal vote was taken.

It was clear from the noise that the demands were acceptable to the majority of people who filled the hall.

Dr. Bissell made his exit to the tune of "For He's A Jolly Good Fellow."

Do you think we've turned apathetic?
Apathy is such a bad word. I'd hate to think it's apathy we suffer from.
Let's just call it faith.
Jules Feiffer, The Explainers.

'THE CAPUT IS DEAD, LONG LIVE THE CAPUT!'

The performance was a great success.

Claude Bissell walked into Convocation Hall, grinned several times and waved, read a prepared statement and was rewarded with a standing ovation and a rendition of "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow."

The audience was packed with engineers and medsmen who grouped themselves in cheering sections. You could expect the Rose-Bowl placards to emerge at any moment. The fans seemed ready to crown Dr. Bissell "Campus King," or "Mr. U of T."

The engineers had been freed from their classes and sat at the front of the hall. They watched their leader Art McIlwain (IV APSC) chair the meeting.

Hugh Downs on daytime television.

The affair was like a huge game-show, and Dr. Bissell won the grand prize — a trip for one to his old plateau of politician-and-administrator-extraordinaire.

The scenario lacked only an orchestra pit, as Dr. Bissell smiled on an audience that would have passed the Communist Manifesto or Mein Kampf, if Bissell had read either of them from the podium.

But what was really happening, as "the discipline crisis" suddenly ended in that brief flurry of bread-and-circuses?

Bissell was backing down. And the pre-planned tone of the meeting in Convocation Hall made it look like he wasn't.

SAC President Gus Abols stood up to make clear that the six demands issued last week were not "a personal attack" on anyone, and then Bissell took the podium.

He read his lines slowly and firmly, visibly pacing himself so he would not lose his temper as he had the previous Wednesday.

"The paper issued by the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario is not (repeat for emphasis) is not the policy of the University of Toronto. . . It was a working paper. . . circulated only for purposes of discussion. . ."

That was one demand euphemistically met.

Not a direct repudiation, and nothing about the document being "repressive." That would be too humiliating. There's an assumed infallibility about presidential statements.

"We have now received the report from the Campbell Committee," continued Bissell, grasping the podium firmly with both hands. "This is the report that is relevant to the University of Toronto."

Cheers. Good 'ol Campbell. Good 'ol Bissell. Good 'ol Charlie Brown.

Memories of last year when Bissell gave in to student demands to publish a secret brief to the Committee of University Affairs.

Then, too, everyone wondered for a while if the President had lost his old liberal touch by producing a document that outlined the university's plans for the next few years without consulting students.

That time he also gave in without humiliation. Just triumph and increased popularity.

CAPUT REPLACED

All summer Bissell had wanted to replace Caput with a student-faculty disciplinary body. He set up a temporary committee to suggest how Caput could be immediately reformed.

Just after this committee had reached agreement, Caput issued a statement saying Caput will continue to be in charge, and Bissell had to support that statement publicly because Caput represented "due process" and duly constituted authority.

That was what was behind his outburst of the previous week when he declared angrily: "There is a flattering assumption here that the president rules from on high. I too have to consult other university bodies. . ."

Bissell must have been receiving pressure from Caput, and perhaps from the government.

ADMINISTRATION PANICKED

One of the administration's most serious worries about campus disruptions is that they will force the government to cut back grants due to public resentment.

When the New Left Caucus contested about five orientations in one week, an off-guard administration panicked.

And law-and-order came down from the Committee of Presidents, Caput, and God knows where else.

During the past week on this campus, the left felt a direct threat — they felt the administration would destroy their right to politically organize on campus.

They feared expulsions and suspensions, and what that kind of reaction would do to a movement that was struggling to acquire a mass base for the first time in its short history.

So they went into the discipline issue looking for a victory, not looking for a confrontation or a mass-base.

They sat exhausted and silent in the mass meeting, for they had done their work.

The administration did back down.

And if Claude Bissell emerged as a hero, the man who quelled the threat of a student strike, good for him. His image is secure for now, and the government and public are happy.

But what's important is that a week of student organization forced the administration to change a repressive policy on discipline and make way for the Campbell Report.

Caput is dead, declared Bissell, long live the new Caput.

UofT graduate can't find a job

Sir,

As a BSc. graduate I have had very much difficulty in finding a job even though I possess specific laboratory skills. It is well known that B.A. graduates experience difficulty in finding a position but they have no special training suitable for industry or business unless they have studied business or math. BSc. grads, however, do have special training in a particular area.

Two months of intensive job hunting in Toronto has resulted in nothing more than worn out shoes and an empty pocket. After dozens of letters and interviews I'm ready to go on welfare. The four years of university studies shall culminate with the grim promise that my baggage and I will end up in the middle of the street.

Many applications were filled out as early as February 1969, several months prior to my graduation but they are no doubt gathering dust in some provincial, federal or industrial office.

Most people that I've talked to expressed disbelief about my chronic unemployment. As a matter of fact, I find it hard to believe myself and keep telling myself that it must be a bad dream because Canada is a land of opportunity.

I am not a drug addict nor an alcoholic nor do I have a criminal record, so I cannot understand why. I dress neatly for interviews, use no profane language during interviews do not chew gum nor smoke. I naively thought that cutting my long hair would facilitate employment but the fact that I have had short hair for two months did not move the granite wall. The only thing against me may be the fact that I wasn't born in Canada although I'm a Canadian citizen fluent in both French and English.

Therefore my advice to potential university students is: do not expect a university education to increase your earning power (a grade six drop-out with a journeyman's electrician certificate will earn close to a dentist's salary), take a professional course at college, avoid general arts and science courses unless you wish to take one year at OCE, cultivate the friendship of higher up civil servants, arrange to have a rich influential father and eat a well balanced diet with plenty of milk.

Bissell's new statement on campus discipline

The following is a complete text of U of T President Claude Bissell's statement on discipline delivered to Wednesday's mass meeting of Convocation Hall.

During the past few years this university has taken many steps to involve both students and teaching staff in running its affairs. One outstanding example is the joint effort by students and staff that resulted in the implementation of the Macpherson Committee Report on Undergraduate Instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science. This report revolutionized the curriculum in the largest faculty of this university. This revolution was brought about by students and academic staff working together.

Two days ago there was made available to every member of the university community another important document — the Campbell Committee Report on Disciplinary Procedures. Again, this is the report of a joint group of students, academic staff and administrators of the university. It will have a profound and far-reaching effect on disciplinary policy and procedures at this university.

In the near future, every member of the university will receive a copy of an even more significant document — the report on the Commission on University Government. This report is the work of a group consisting of four students and four members of the teaching staff and the President of the university. The four students and four faculty were elected to this committee by a campus-wide election. The committee is chaired jointly by one of the members of the faculty and by one of the student members.

These are merely three of the more significant developments in staff and student co-operation that have taken place on this campus in the last few years. There are many others.

During the last ten days, I have been accused of ignoring the staff and students of the university. In reply to that, I would say that it was at my initiative that this university established the three committees that I have described. I would also say that I have never wavered in my belief in the need for staff and student participation in university government, and I have spent the greater part of my time, during the last year, in conducting or joining in discussions that would lay the ground work for such participation.

There is, I understand, some fear on the campus of rigid and arbitrary action that would stifle dissent. Nothing in the recent history of the university justifies that fear. I can think of several examples where this university has resisted pressures to discipline individuals for what they said or wrote; I can think of none where it has yielded to such pressure.

I appeal to those of you in this hall and to all members of the university to look objectively at the record. I appeal to you to do nothing that will prevent the full, quick, and informed discussion of the Campbell Committee Report and, still more, of the report of the Commission on University Government.

Now I will comment on issues raised in recent discussions.

The paper issued by the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario is not the policy of the University of Toronto. With the other members of that committee, I agreed to the circulation of that paper on the clear understanding that the statements in it did not speak for any university and were not in any way binding on any university. It was a working paper that the Committee of Presidents agreed should be circulated only for purposes of discussion. I recognize the apprehension that it has raised among some members of this university, particularly when we do not yet have a system of governance that is adequately representative of the whole university community.

We have now received the report from the Campbell Committee; this is the report that is relevant to the University of Toronto. This is the report that will shape university policy on discipline in the University of Toronto. A parity committee of academic staff and students will be appointed immediately to initiate discussion, to formulate agreed recommendations, and to facilitate implementation. I express the hope that this committee would give high priority to the analysis of the meaning of disruption, and would base its conclusions and recommendations on a campus-wide discussion. Surely there could then be no fear that the university would adopt a narrow and repressive attitude.

In accordance with a resolution passed unanimously by the Caput at its meeting yesterday, I shall proceed immediately with the formation of an interim, university-wide, disciplinary body in the spirit of the Campbell Report, and I shall recommend its establishment to the Board of Governors. This body, which will be a parity body, would discharge the function of the Caput and would determine its own procedures. It is my hope that it will be rapidly superseded by the implementation of the Campbell Report.

It has been urged that the Campbell Report be published as soon as it is received by the President. This was, in any event, my intention, and it has been done.

I urge that the important thing for us is to get on as quickly as we can with the job of examining the Campbell Report. This is the only way in which we can hope to have what the members of the administration and all members of the university have always wanted — a disciplinary system covering both students and staff acceptable to all members of the university. I also ask you to play your full part in the still more important discussion of the organization and governance of the university that will arise from the Report of the Commission on University Government. Let us make this a year when discussion leads to action, and analysis to change; a year for this University and for Canada of transformation and renewal. — Claude Bissell

U.F.T. President Claude Bissell looks on triumphantly, as students cheer his recent statement on discipline at Convocation Hall claudé bissell as neville chamberlain?

Sir,

It seems the engineers have a penchant for history far more than they probably ever realized. It was 31 years ago to the day, October 1, 1938, that another crowd sang "For He's A Jolly Good Fellow" to another man on the stage of a then somewhat peaceful Europe. That man was Neville Chamberlain and most of us are aware of his successful policy of appeasement in Europe that effectively resulted in war.

The engineers have no right to claim that the "New Left" is fascist in its methods of heckling and frustrating speakers. They are more than successful at doing exactly the same thing.

I feel the students who managed to sardine themselves into Convocation Hall on Wednesday of this week saw the weaknesses in the process of democratic mass meetings. Questions asked by some of the speakers were never answered, and those questions were pertinent. The composition, organization and jurisdiction of the interim discipline committee to replace Caput are defined more in terms of "the spirit of the Campbell Report" than by concrete facts and figures.

The limiting of the debate by the call for the question allowed little chance for dissenters to get their ideas across to the restless audience. Closure on such an issue must be handled tactfully and this was the one thing the chair lacked.

In short, Claude Bissell has survived the situation. By varying little from his statements of the past two weeks, he has weathered the storm while the publication of the Campbell Report has moderated the students' stand. Claude Bissell called the CPUO statement a "useful" working paper. Whether it is "relevant" or not to this campus, repression for "ill-defined offences" can still occur in "the spirit of the CPUO statement." Therefore the problem of discipline and confrontation remains unresolved until the Campbell Report is implemented. The students have won nothing; the administration has gained a breathing space.

Leonard H. Rosen (II UC) radicals suffer stunning defeat

Sir,

The press release issued by the SAC Executive immediately after the mass meeting at Convocation Hall on Wednesday was misleading in the extreme. Dr. Bissell's statement was indeed a victory for the students — but a victory in that the President of our university refused to be bullied by the radical minority who have blown the discipline issue out of all proportion. The almost unanimous decision to accept Dr. Bissell's statement was a stunning defeat to those members of the SAC and its executive who are committed to causing disruption on this campus for their own political purposes and who had hoped for mass support for further protest.

The suggestion that Dr. Bissell has capitulated to them is both untrue and hypocritical and is merely an attempt to save face.

HAYDN

Haydn was a giant figure in the early classical era. Through him, the structures of the Sonata, symphony, concerto and quartet were amplified and solidified.

VIOLIN CONCERTO Haydn is regarded as a master of violin music. Mozart said of him, "He alone has the secret of making me smile and touching me to the bottom of my soul"

TWO SYMPHONIES The creative activity of Haydn spanned half a century. He wrote a total of 104 symphonies and in many of the slow movements he achieves a kind of poetic revelation which we associate with Beethoven.

NOVEMBER 30, 1969

J.S. BACH

One one of the rare occasions when Bach appraised his own life's work, he remarked simply, "I worked hard." No composer worked harder. Wagner called him the most stupendous miracle in all music.

PRELUDES AND FUGUES; These are monumental pieces written, surprisingly, to help his wife and children learn to play. They are functional in that they championed a new way of tuning and aesthetically significant.

CHORAL PRELUDES Bach was the last great master to deal with this form with the exception of Brahms. These preludes are short compositions, originally for organ, based on a chorale (a German Protestant hymn-tune).

ART OF FUGUE This is a set of 16 fugues, 4 canons, 2 fugues for 2 claviers and a final unfinished fugue; all of them on one and the same theme. It was left uncompleted owing to the composer's death. It is believed that Bach intended it to be an instruction manual on contrapuntal writing and the work proves to be superior, technically and artistically.

JOHNNY WINTER
MASSEY HALL
FRIDAY OCT. 3

with the Humble Sponge and Whiskey Howl.

"Peace" signs from both sides. Johnny Winter. He's the one in the picture: you remember — the albino blues guitarist signed by Columbia for something like $100,000. Whiskey Howl are (just) another Toronto band: friends, lovers, dreams, everything except luck maybe, maybe nothing but.

The Humble Sponge ye have always with you.

The Humble Sponge are (just) another Toronto band. Have been for years. Once upon a time three Don Mills boys came together and formed the Sponge. "I'll let you be in my dream if you let me be in yours" one said to the other, but time moves on, Toronto marches to different dreamers, and the Sponge play a dance here (and "here" has been the Mercer Reformatory for Women), a concert there.

You see, it's hard to make it in Toronto. Mainly by leaving, some do. McKenna-Mendelsohn. David Clayton Thomas did, after the Shays, after the Bossmen. The Bossmen had a brilliant young pianist, acclaimed as one of Canada's top jazz talents. He went to NY to try and make it, didn't, came back, and — the story I heard — died of a narcotic overdose. It's not true, but I guess only his close friends now know where he is. Clayton Thomas' whereabouts are no secret; that's him singing with BS&T, and when he returns to the Village these days girls who didn't know they were groupies crowd him and Eric Layman sells him poems for twenty dollars.

The Sponge have to write their own poetry. Music and technical evil and ego things hassle them as much as the Cream, say; the Toronto scene is littered with ex-Sponge, some of whom have had their ex-Sponginess thrust upon them. But the main concern is money.

STATISTICS

Union dues $121 +$40 per year per person
No. of records made: 2
No. of records released: 1
No. of records sold: 9
Cost of making records: $1300

The Sponge are a Union band, and the Union demands they be paid scale — $160 — for each performance. Union, meet supply and demand. The Sponge will get $100 for Massey Hall. (Nor do the established bands do much better. Nucleus gets maybe $600, the Market used to draw about a thousand.) Johnny Winter will make $10,000 for the night.

To-night is another $100 gig, at the Y ("All Souled Out") in Oakville. Massey Hall is still six days off. The band thinks about it a lot, headily conscious/subliminally sure that they may be humble no longer, that soon all their present pictures may bear "before" captions. (A name has already been chosen for the first album.) October 3 is the big one: an audience of 3 — ? — thousand, all the critics, agency people. David Keyboards' mother and aunt in to see him play, who-knows-what if they go over (record contracts! tours with Bob Dylan! "Sponge socko" — Varsity!!!) And if they fail ... they fail. There will still be jobs at the eyelash factory and the Bookroom, dope to sell and dope to go up in smoke along with the dreams.

But to-night is Oakville, and the Sponge are heroes in Oakville. It's homecoming for David and for Paul Drums, who was 11 when David played for his first band here. The schleppers have brought the stuff out some four hours before and now the entire bopper community of Oakville is hopping to the Y, chattering away about whatever boppers chatter away about.

Rhonda, about 5'8, forgettably pretty:

"I've been off chemicals for a week"

Linda, a walk-on:

"I thought you were grounded"

Rhonda: "Yeah, but I snuck out while my parents were in the basement."

Holding on to someone's hand, greeting friends only to ask where the others are. Here are the happy Sponge, easy. Uldis lead-end sits down next to the driver. "Should I wear my glasses on stage?". The schleppers are getting free Cokes at the bar; Johnny Winter is on the PA. "I think I will", says Uldis. Pyke Rhythm is on stage, tuning — the lights are out, the Sponge is on, Uldis isn't wearing his glasses.

The Sponge don't play bopper music. They start with "In My Time Of Dying" and the words leave Squirrel's mouth hurriedly, as if pursued by bear, and become — not noise, exactly but something like the urgent utterance of a particularly inarticulate pumpkin being tortured. An intense pun'kin, but kind to animals too. Right, but look, the kids are nudging each other knowingly after a few bars; kids who wouldn't give John Estes a dime for a cup of coffee applaud Liquor Store Blues, and some of the hipper ones mutter Buffy when the band goes into You're Going To Need Somebody On Your Bond. "We'll be back" says Squirrel and the Sponge, retainers in train, make for the band room (furniture donated by the Banfield family.) The lights go out and twenty people sit around the table cursing the darkness and lighting matches. The voice trying to get a lift back to Toronto belongs to Larry Bass; various unidentified voices are explaining the logistical impossibility of his request. Kids keep opening the door and doing a dart-in-and-hide-under-the-table-and-where-it's-all-at thing. Like a Beatles press conference. Lights on again, time for the second set.

Someone — three someones, actually — has requested Barrabas, The Sponge's hit single then it's Dink's Song (Uldis breaks a string) and the Youngbloods' Darkness, Darkness. And then what has become the band's theme — in Oakville, anyway — the Gary Davis-Eric Budman Vulture Rag. An instrumental? Goodness. Peek-pockety-pockety-kweep goes Uldis, the piano rags some, and the boppers pockety-kweep along in the pauses, clapping and stomping and whistling. It's a fun song, a witty song, wit being a thing Toronto bands use more often as a preposition than as a musical ingredient. (Or have you ever seen Jim Morrison smile? Could Arlo write a song for Led Zeppelin?)

Over. Back to the boys in the back room. The Manager has tracked down the promoter of "All Souled Out", a local about the Sponge's age, a little untogether with the crowd — 200 people — and the consequent refreshment hassle. Turns out it's a $90 gig, and the gate was 75 cents, not a dollar — the boys aren't going to make any percentage money or much money at all. $Twenty-five for the truck, $10 for the schleppers leaves a little less than ten dollars a man — one quarter's Union dues or two tickets to Massey Hall. It's a good thing they're going to be playing.

Back for the third set — a bar band skit led by Pyke ("Welcome to the palatial Palisades Hotel, pals and gals!" — spangles and tinkles from the piano — "the bar will open in twenty minutes, meanwhile the Hurricanes" — guitar ninth — "will blow you up a storm") and a sort of amoebic jam as the band splits and flows its separate ways for a while, Pyke and Uldis go gunning for each other with their guitars, and only the habit of twelve-bar keeps it all together. No one has danced all night, and now, as it becomes twelve o'clock every minute and daddy and mommy begin to look where's our-little-girl-tonight at the TV, couples lie in this and that posture right over the floor, conscious (those conscious at all) only of each other and a certain vague and very external throbbing from the stage, a throbbing which pocketies once, pocketies (kweep!) twice and is Vulture Rag. Oakville rearranges itself to bid the Sponge fond farewell much as the Cavern Club's groping couples freed their hands to wave the Beatles "good-night" and then "good-bye."

By 12:45 everyone has gone — even Larry has a ride — and the schleppers, cursing the 300-lb. wire-amp look forward to Massey Hall and another five dollars.

When I was in Spain last summer

I went to see Peter

in Hell's Angel's On Wheels dubbed into Spanish. Fonda was an Angel (read cretin) who rode around California in leather and chains wowing the bourgeoisie. The film was very violent and very bad and the Spaniards loved it.

The Spaniards are very conservative people. Theirs is basically a peasant mentality born of a life close to the soil. Consequently they hold physical virtues very dear and their apotheosis is the bullfighter — the man of extreme physical courage. This is because physical courage is all that a peasant mentality can understand. Watching the bullfight it seemed to me that the Spanish sense of moral courage had been subverted, and all that was left was physical courage — Hemingway's cojones. Or the false courage of the motorcycle hood.

For instance, we went to see what had been billed as a bullfight circus-style in Malaga. On the way to the ring we met Henry, an old German would-be writer who had lived in Spain for thirty years. He told us not to go to the fight. He had seen one in Barcelona. The Spanish are animals, he told us. Then he said something curious of the Spaniards.

He said they have no sense of honour.

The circus began with a group of midgets dodging a young bull. Then three keystone cops joined them in a slapstick sketch. It was mildly funny. The next act was an acrobat vaulting the bull Cretan style. He too was rather amusing. The audience consisted almost exclusively of women and children and it responded happily. At the end of his act the acrobat drew what appeared to be a rubber sword and absurdly slew the bull.

But the sword was real. The bull staggered and spurted blood into the sand and the acrobat jumped onto the bull's back and slid down and wrapped his legs about the neck of the bull and held it by the horns. Then he began to wrench the bull's neck and forced the bull down to its knees all the while sitting on its head and twisting its horns and finally rubbing its nose in the blood and the sand until the bull had died. The audience laughed wildly. It was a very sexy show. The horses dragged the dead carcass out.

For the final act a novicio, a young matador, was to fight a young bull. The bull was let into the ring and it was very fast. Small but with big horns. Because it was so small the handilleros and the picador were dispensed with and so when the matador entered the ring he faced a bull whose neck muscles had not been broken by the picador, and whose horns were, therefore, high and dangerous. The matador was so scared that you could see his knees knock. When the bull charged, the matador waved his cape like a magician and jumped back. He arched his back but the wrong way and the bull passed him about four feet away. It was very funny, especially so because the matador kept losing his cape on the horns. Because he was so afraid, the matador determined to kill the bull quickly and be done with it. But it was much too early. The bull was fast and the horns were high and it was difficult to kill the bull standing four feet from the horns. The matador tried to kill the bull many times. Several times the sword pierced half way but then slipped out again. Finally the bull was weak from loss of blood and very dizzy and he stood against the barrier waiting to be killed. But each time the matador drove in his sword the bull lunged and the sword missed the spinal cord. It was such an abomination that you had to laugh and the audience laughed wildly.

But there came a point at which the matador became not merely enraged but desperate. He knew that he had failed as a bullfighter but now he was failing as a man and he began to curse and lunge wildly at the bull who stood swaying before him. Tears came to his eyes and he drove home the sword but the bull tossed his head with a weak gesture and the point again missed. It lasted for a long time and finally the matador stood in the ring and howled and hurst into tears and broke his sword across his knee. He flung the pieces into the dust and turned and ran and when he reached the barrier he clambered over and was gone.

This was the climax of the circus. It was better than anyone had expected. People laughed and laughed until the tears ran down their cheeks. The matador had failed. He had no cojones. He was not a man. He was a clown.

There were other clowns around Spain last summer. And people who were worse than clowns, people whose posture, whose lifestyle, whose interdependence, whose hair were the antithesis of the bullfighter — the hippies. The hippies were a complete enigma to the Spaniards and consequently there was a great deal of prejudice against them. They were not leather-jacketed peabrains — this the Spaniards could have understood. They were not self-sufficient peasants — conservative, dogged, enduring. And they certainly were not bullfighters. So they could not get a hotel, people would not talk to them, and the police periodically arrested them in the streets, cut off their hair, took their money and kicked them out of the country.

Now seeing Easy Rider the other night reminded me of Spain. It reminded me of that kind of peasant mentality and that kind of prejudice. It recalled feelings I had had as a long-haired capewearing anomaly in Malaga and feelings I had heard James Baldwin and Malcolm X and Eldridge Cleaver talk about. That feeling of bewildered hatred at being faced with the irrationality of prejudice. For what emerged for us in Spain was the realization that it is a particularly peasant mentality that spawns this kind of prejudice. A mentality which can only respond to physical values — courage, conformity. And this is the mentality of the New Mexicans and small towners depicted in Easy Rider. Naturally it is a ubiquitous mentality — one finds it in the cities but it is particularly acosmopolitan in its intolerance of diverse life styles.

For it is precisely those peasant-like virtues — doggedness, conservativeness, the ability to endure — which negate any sense of tolerance.

Now if it is a truism that we are living in a time of unprecedented change, it is true that the discrepancies between town and country mentalities are increasing. The country mentality always follows the town but with a long time lag, and it is this evolutionary discrepancy which creates a great deal of prejudice. If this discrepancy is increasing then so is prejudice burgeoning and this seems to be one of the reasons for the recent swing to the right in politics and the consequent estrangement of the left.

Easy Rider shows the effects of that discrepancy. It shows the effects of intolerance, of prejudice — the effects of the peasant mentality. For that is what the film is really about. It is not about youth or drugs or sex but about the lethal sin of prejudice — how irrational are its premises, how fatal its consequences. It makes one think of the crowd laughing as the dying bull had its nose rubbed in the dust and of the failed matador howling admiring the laughter and of the feeble sadistic bellowing women and of the Spanish sense of honour.

It's not a very good film. It was scripted by Peter Fonda, Dennis Hopper and Terry Southern. The two former writers no doubt provided the tedious and extraneous scenes of drug culture which almost sink the film. As in Hell's Angels on Wheels Fonda searches for America and himself in a motopsyo nightmare. He offers himself as a psychedelic James Dean but his only real virtue as an actor or a personage is his taciturnity. But even Fonda's leaden features and delivery have not been able to destroy the talent of Terry Southern whose lines emerge from the self-conscious jargon of Fonda and Hopper to give the film some real guts. And the ending is Southern at his best.

Everyone died the victim of petty prejudice. Because that is what Southern sees — that a rational vacuum and a temporary insanity are spreading across what was once "such a beautiful country."

A couple of weeks ago I talked to two boys from that beautiful country as I hitchhiked through British Columbia. They were both nineteen and both from Easy Rider country — New Mexico. They had slight Southern accents, wore blue jeans, had trouble finishing a sentence — two shy, friendly boys from the University of Albuquerque. We talked about the communes and they said yes there were several hippie communes around Albuquerque.

"Aw there's alotu . . . kids got nothin t do . . . there's nothin t do . . . n . . . like there's only about ten thousand people n . . . they never get outa Albuquerque . . . n . . ."

"You mean university students go out to these communes and beat people up cause there's nothing else to do?"

"Yeah."

So.

There is a lot of hate in North America. For many people discrimination and prejudice are facts of life. Facts so basic that a leader like Malcolm X could describe in the closing pages of his autobiography his imminent assassination. Prejudice which is so strong and real that it has become the overwhelming force in many lives. The only antidote to prejudice is custom — the imperceptible and unconscious adaptation of different life styles which are so subtly and insignificantly different that they cannot possibly affront the peasant mentality.

But this kind of custom comes slowly and the evolutionary discrepancy is increasing. And Easy Rider shows that prejudice kills people now whenever they affront that mentality . . . whenever they lose their cape or whenever they have black skin or long hair or live together outside Albuquerque.

records

jazz — mainly modern

The Jaki Byard Experience.
Prestige 7615.

An erratic musician, Byard has at last given us a record that does justice to his talent. The music here is straight ahead, hard blowing modern jazz without any of the pretension which has marred some of his recent endeavours. But though Byard's pianistics are fine, the dominant sound is the tenor sax of Roland Kirk, who plays with tremendous passion, executing some passages that will leave you breathless. Recommended without reservations.

Sonny Criss. Sonny's Dream.
Prestige 7576.

Criss, one of the best of the bop musicians, who somehow got overlooked for approximately 20 years, has been making his presence felt in the last couple of years. A welcome sound on today's scene, Criss is heard here for a change with a supporting nonet, in original material written by Horace Tapscott. The music is dark, heavy, foreboding, and Criss responds with a vehemence unusual even for him, wailing on alto and soprano saxes with no holds barred.

Elvin Jones. Puttin' It Together.
Blue Note BST 84282.

The most influential drummer of the '60s is heard with his own trio in a well programmed set. Jimmy Garrison does his flamenco strumming as usual and provides a very strong ground. Joe Farrell is the front line, blowing tenor and soprano saxes and piccolo (yes).

Eric Kloss. Sky Shadows.
Prestige 7594.

Kloss is a blind 20-year-old philosophy student in his third year at Duquesne who happens to play forceful modern saxophones (tenor and alto.) He is here teamed with Jaki Byard and an excellent young guitarist, Pat Martino. Though there is nothing startling about their approach, there is some interesting and satisfying music in a conventional vein, (except for some of the time signatures).

Jaekie McLean. 'Bout Soul.
Blue Note BST 84284.

Barbara Simmons, who has been reading her poetry in Harlem for the past 4 years, and has been published in Black Fire (a collection edited by Le Roi Jones and Larry Neal), here gives us a musically spoken homily on the meaning of soul. The free musical response of McLean and his men is quite effective, in a programmatic sort of way. McLean's hard and wide alto sax sound is featured on an attractive slow piece, but the rest of the record is turbulent "free-form" stuff. Better give it a listen before you buy.

John Coltrane. Cosmic Music.
Impulse 9148.

A bit too cosmic for me. Recorded not long before Coltrane died, this is a wild boiling cauldron of sounds with sort of religious overtones. Not recommended for the timid (or the music-loving, either. I am tempted to add, though this can be disputed.)

and who will write love songs for you?

Judy Collins will be at Massey Hall Sunday Night. Apparently the concert is undersold which is sad: understandable, given the ticket prices — $3.50 to $5.50 — but still sad.

Collins is perhaps the most underlistened to of contemporary performers. Outside of the sort of people who call A & A's to find out when her next album is coming out, she is largely ignored. Pity, for she is one of the handful of performers who not only sing well but who also interpret with a sense of the integrity of the songs themselves.

Janis Joplin can successfully leave the words and music behind and sing Janis Joplin, but she is a pretty rare bird. Collins, on the other hand, serves the song, with subtlety and a strikingly clear voice. There is none of the wispy or its opposite, super-slickness, that mar many woman folk singers; nor is there the constant feeling of someone straining at the end of her register that is ever present with Joni Mitchell.

Collins changes very little, or perhaps it should be very slightly, from song to song like a good Chekavian actor. Her arrangements (now grand piano, electric organ, guitar and drums) show a similar uncluttered taste. On the records they grow. In concert, they do not interfere.

It is this taste that makes Collins so incisive. It was there in her folksinging, particularly in the middle sixties when she began doing "city folk": Paxton, Farina, early Dylan. Recollections, a greatest hits type album just released covers this period, although Judy Collins

No. 5 is still the high water mark of the style. In My Life, released almost four years ago, was as influential on "city folk" as Sergeant Pepper was on rock: taste combined with the gall to jump from folk and freedom songs to Weill, Brel, Marat-Sade, and the then largely unheard of Leonard Cohen.

If In My Life was slightly eclectic — Donovan and Kurt Weill on the same record — Collins has since settled into a style that is simple, cautious and strong, both in performance and in material:

*And who will write love songs for you
When I am lowered at last,
And your body is a little highway shrine*

That all my priests have passed (Cohen)

*The first girl I loved time has come I will sing you this sad goodbye song, when I was seventeen,
I used to know you.
I haven't seen you now in many's*

the short years, the last time I seen you, you said you'd joined the church of Jesus, but me, I remember your long red hair falling in our faces as I kissed you.

(Robin Williamson)

*All my sisters soon were gone
To Denver and Cheyenne, Marrying their grown-up dreams,*

*The lilacs and the man . . .
I sail my memories of home
Like boats upon the Seine
And watch the Paris sun set
In my father's eyes again.*

(Collins)

According to her press release Judy Collins does not seek out songs so much as "verbal lookings" from "somewhere different, immediate, close". Again, taste.

She will be at Massey Hall on Sunday night.

wait a minute, isn't that...it's...wait a minute....

uh it's...(peter kastner?)

Peter Kastner is a nice boy from Forest Hill who had his first, and so far, only big success in a movie called Nobody Waved Goodbye. He played a mixed up suburban kid who couldn't get along with an inflexible and conservative family.

After that he worked with CBC's very own adolescent star Michelle Finnie on a Sunday afternoon show called Time of Your Life.

When CBC cancelled that — much to his surprise and disappointment, says Peter — Kastner was offered a job by a New York agent. He took it and became the Ugliest Girl in Town for twenty very unfunny episodes. The series died quickly in the spring of 1968.

Kastner: It wasn't very good; not very funny. But I wanted to work. They paid me a lot of money.

He starred in one Hollywood flic — You're A Big Boy Now — to some critical, not much audience acclaim.

And Peter likes to act. As he talked, over red cabbage and bratwurst, he continually commented on my blonde hair. It is difficult to interview someone who is trying to con you.

Varsity: How did you feel having to dress up like a girl for the TV series?

Kastner: It was just an actor's job. It was great working hard, five days a week. I did have a negative reaction to it at first; but I analyzed it and thought there wasn't anything wrong about it.

Peter Kastner is a Canadian actor who has worked in the U.S. First he is an actor.

Kastner: I wasn't in a hurry to leave Canada. I was already registered in third year at UC. Then I got a call from a New York agent (to do the TV series).

Varsity: How do you feel about Canadian actors going to the U.S.?

Kastner: I don't know . . . there's no contractual security for an actor. You're totally at the mercy of the market — strictly a job by job basis. In Canada, there is a special problem: most movies and prime time TV shows are American.

Peter Kastner wants to act; but he liked it when "they paid me a lot of money" too. He would like to see some sort of "security for actors" to end the "anarchy that exists now".

Varsity: Why do you think actors should have security?

Kastner: There is a need for actors — I don't know — there is. Theatre has some sort of function in society.

Varsity: Do actors have a specific role in society, some political function?

Kastner: The bulk of actors are no more non-political than most other groups. Politically there is the same spectrum of political views.

Varsity: Should actors be more politically active since they are involved in communications with the public?

Kastner: There's no special "shoulds" for actors. Whereas a writer makes a direct statement of his views, an actor speaks someone else's words. In improvisatory theatre it's different. Even in your own work, it is difficult to get socially critical material.

Varsity: If a play was contrary to your own views, would you accept the part?

Kastner: I haven't come up against that, yet. They just had me dress up as a girl.

Peter laughed, commented on my blonde hair again and finished his lunch.

At twenty-six, Peter Kastner is now concentrating on getting his bachelor's degree in history at UCLA. Then he hopes to continue on toward a masters. He hasn't given up acting — there are just no jobs for him right now.

harriet kideckel

On stage or off, Peter Kastner is an actor. And every listener is an audience — even if it is an interviewer from the Varsity. He likes to talk, and to impress, on any topic.

Varsity: You said you were in history at UCLA. What do you think about campus politics?

Kastner: I think it's great. Peter Kastner says he was never involved in campus politics. While he attended University of Toronto for three years in the early 1960's his greatest amount of involvement was assistant editor of the UC Gargoyle.

Kastner: About the political thing, now: I couldn't do that even if I wanted to. They'd take away my student visa at UCLA.

OLD PHYSICS BLDG. (Rm. 135) ADMISSION 50¢
(AT THE DOOR)
FRIDAY, OCT. 3rd 8 P.M.

The idea of art is not so much selling, the idea is to communicate the artist's awareness; but this has been made commercial. . . there's a lot of hostility toward the really big financial machine that's built up around art, particularly now.

—John Van Soun from the catalogue to The New Alchemy at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

A few years ago a New York artist, Don Flavin, began exhibiting rooms consisting of nothing but evenly placed, vertical fluorescent tubes.

He was hailed. Jack Burnham made Flavin's work a vehicle for "Systems Esthetics" in ARTFORUM. I read that and felt good. Perhaps this stab might help to begin the mitigation of the visual ugliness of our North American world.

So when Brydon Smith dropped the word that the great Don Flavin was actually in Ottawa, I made the inconvenient pilgrimage to kiss the feet of a master. Imagine: "Systems Esthetics" — whole cities, areas, homes, not dominated by objects but by ideas that could be changed constantly, that would take the form of things like Flavin's beautifully simple tubes, glowing singly, whitely.

But the exhibit at the National Gallery was so disappointing that Flavin has now to be counted out as an intellectual leader of our time and as a contributor to a movement that people such as Van Saun and Hans Haacke are in fact guiding. If an artist is to say, "To hell with the object, to hell with the commercial parasites, to hell with the stinking-

ly corrupt system of politics and stupidities that exist today" — then he has to abandon the "object"

Flavin has not. His red piece is beautifully lyrical — but it was done in steel by Anthony Caro (not that I mean to insult Caro by the comparison), and no real gain results from his use of light. In fact there are signs in one room (triangular, one of the better things in the show) that warn PROLONGED VIEWING WILL CAUSE EYE DAMAGE. Now, to paraphrase John Cage, is that any way to get things done?

The other bugaboo about Flavin is that he is supposedly "religious". Well he is about as religious as a plastic replica of Notre Dame. Gothic maybe, in a kind of lifted way, but religious? HAH! The corollary to that is his "simplicity". That I find the most ludicrous adjective that could possibly be applied. One journey from red room to green room to white room to purple room, with a whole bunch of inconsistent and illogical pieces tossed in around like Jackie Kennedy's tour of the white house. His formal development, apart from its brevity, is quite inconsistent. The only aesthetically unified presentations I found were the ones on which he has built his reputation: the single vertical, a grouping of four tangential tubes, an uneven diffusion of six, or his collage, "rhythm four Zimmers" in which four photographs of the same subject are placed in the corners leaving the "interior" space open: these pieces best illuminate his aesthetic of separateness and, like Les Levine, modularity.

He also has done some drawings that comment simply dignified, and a series on James Joyce's "Chamber Music" (perhaps Joyce's earliest and most syrupy work) that generally gravitate to a slightly lower level. Ultimately Flavin decorates on the lowest plane and ironically enough he does achieve Jack Burnham's wish to make art less than it presently is, i.e. by lowering its general quality. Flavin is good but got great, and needs at least another few years before he can sort out the multitude of elements that presently make his work so inconsistent.

At the moment he neither excites nor surprises the viewer and has given us a show that is nothing more than ersatz avant-garde pre-packaged for the Ottawa bourgeoisie, and that is something that I really hate having to say.

There is a point in Easy Rider where Peter Fonda, Dennis Hopper and Jack Nicholson arrive at a Louisiana cafe. Inside, the fair-haired, apple-cheeked sheriff coyly discusses "the animals" with his pug nosed friend: "Isn't she cute? I didn't know they let the gorillas out of the zoo"

Meanwhile the local groupies giggle with embarrassment and hopes of a thrill. "Take us for a ride. Hey, take me for a ride."

The Straights vs The Freaks.

Nowhere does this rift become so obvious and yet so necessary as when you're out on the road.

It's frustrating. Damn frustrating. Wet waiting in the cold prairie all morning. At last a car stops. You get in and don't even bother to make small talk and anyway the heater is on and you fall into a warm dream and kind of fall out on Moose Jaw's main drag.

Or melting in the blazing sun about to squeeze liquid from the grass you're so thirsty and every car is a station wagon from Illinois with grandma and the kids on vacation.

THE RITUAL:

David and I position the baggage in a row, knapsack, sleeping bag, tent to look like we're hardily carrying a thing. And I pull my dress up a little and smile and try to make my thumb look sexy and maybe should hide one of the bags down in the hushes or better yet you hide down there ("Uh, well, I have a friend, uh, but it's o.k. he's real little. He's just down the gully taking a leak — sorry ma'm — but Sam's a terrific guy. Hey, Sam get up here we gotta lift . . . actually Sam's 7'2", but he folds in three and I stuff him in the side pocket of the knapsack.")

Mostly it makes no difference what you do. How drivers react is the result of a subtle conditioning, a message they have learned about "freaks". Those weirdo hitchhikers who mug feeble old men, then rape and ravage their 1948 Plymouths for dope stashes.

What happens out on that stretch of road long and concrete is confrontation.

When a car slows down just to look at you and as you run with your bags to jump in, speeds up leaving your face dusted with gravel sand, there are far more basic issues being considered.

There you are and you ask. Please help me along the way brother. I'm very nice and my mother loves me and I like children and dogs and once you got to know me I bet we'd even be best buddies.

When the man behind the wheel sees you 200 yards away he's got his mind made up. He doesn't like strangers or he's afraid or both.

He locks the car doors and turns on the air conditioning, barely noticing the blurry bodies on the highway who are people too. And also afraid. Afraid of what's happening to the city and wanting to know: do we give up now — desert the city and try to make it living off the land? To lean into the wind and pose the question with our figures.

And the question of the moment was: WHAT AM I

WHAT ARE WE DOING HITCHHIKING TO VANCOUVER?

It wasn't funny. Not at 7:28 on a Sunday morning across the street from the Richmond Hill Mister Donut. Not funny at all. In fact I was terrified. Couldn't imagine why I wasn't nestled under the covers in the big bed at home where everyone knows me so well and its so secure. It was 75 degrees already. I imagined a steamy night in the country, sharing a sleeping bag with a commune of mosquitoes.

I hate mosquitoes. I mean I'm a solid out and out bigot when it comes to those lecherous insects. What good do they do humanity? They sit around at night, plotting, hoping in their dreams for a sting to that extra vulnerable spot — the one that itches no matter how you move — fold of the thumb, between the toes. . . .

So what was the use. I knew it was going to be a miserable trip.

At the same time I wondered why anyone would be going to Mister Donut early Sunday morning. The donut man in the back probably held secret jolly donut communion.

Getting through southern Ontario is a giant hopscotch game. Cottage country sprinkled with thousands of lakes and all the cars are going just around the next bend. You learn to take every ride, even a 5-miler. It keeps up morale and changes the view anyway.

The men all smoke Player's and listen to country music.

Up at Batchawana Bay, one shiny car driven by a middle-aged man with a truck driver's face had a complete stock of Country and Western cartridge tapes. MARTY ROBBINS. FERLIT HUSKY. I chose one and slipped it into the stereo machine:

HELLO. MY NAME'S JOHNNY CASH.

"You kids hungry?"
We arrived at the TRANS-CANADA RESTAURANT, HIWAY 11 NORTH. AT THE ESSO STATION HEYDEN ONTARIO. OPEN 24 HOURS, HOME COOKED MEALS. BETTY AND HARRY WHALEN. PROP.

After soup and coffee we drove for awhile until we hit a government liquor store. Our driver brought back whiskey and cokes and set off to take us to a stream for a quiet afternoon of fishing.

Before we could refuse, he noticed the gas tank was empty. We scurried out and he promised to come back immediately and pick us up.

He horned off and got gassed. But that was part of the second day out, north of Sault Ste. Marie.

Back on the first morning we had just arrived past Barrie (Hurray. boy am I ever jealous) when a converted 1959 Chevrolet panel truck picked us up.

The two girls and boy were from Windsor. They'd had spent the previous evening at a girlfriend's wedding — the dark girl in the front seat had confetti polka-dotted through her hair-sprayed curls. Shopping bags in the back spilled over with peau de soie shoes and gowns, bathing suits and terrycloth shorts.

It was ten in the morning. They'd been driving all night.

"Do you know Linda Smith from Toronto?" (All their friends were descendants of Linda Smith — George Black — Mary Jones).

The girl in the front kept leaning out at the road hogs making a noise which sounded like a sick cow trying to imitate an ambulance siren.

"Won't Alice — Alice is my grandmother. We're going to her lodge in Muskoka . . . won't Alice just die when I come struttin' in with streaked eye makeup — haven't slept all night — Won't George and Alice just die?"

Her girl friend in the back spent most of the time looking for a melted chocolate bar buried somewhere in the back of the truck.

The rest of the way to Sudbury I slept, remember drinking pop and my eyes heavy with exhaustion.

Young guy in blue Cortina let us off at the four corners in Sudbury, where Highways 17 and 69 intersect. A supermarket parking lot by the railroad tracks. Hot. Warm seven-up residue to drink. Passed by Memorial Hospital coming in. It's set up on a hill and I couldn't imagine a more depressing place to recuperate from anything. Look out your window and watch the smog and sulphur covered land. The disease like a shadow. As we passed through the smoky atmosphere the radio insisted: "Keep your forests green. Only you can prevent Forest Fires."

But who was preventing the industrial pollution? And what green was there left to save?

No wonder Sudbury has the highest rate of alcoholism in Canada.

Fifteen minutes later a chubby blond in a Camaro convertible stopped.

We drove for a long time without speaking.

From the side, with his dimples, turned-up nose and beer belly tucked into striped hell-hottom pants, he was a fair-haired Tony Curtis.

"Where you kids from?"
"Toronto"

"Hey, what do you know about that place . . . Yorkville, Yorkville, is that right? In Toronto." (But why did he suddenly ask about Yorkville? I kept quiet and let David talk.)

"What do those hippies want?"
"Hey have you ever tried that stuff? What do they call it — maridgewanna?"

Just a minute. Nobody is that stupid. At least not a young guy like this. In my mind I sent signals: DON'T SAY ANYTHING. HE'S GOT US TRAPPED IN THE CAR.

"Maybe I'll try it sometime. But only in a locked house with some of my buddies. If you get caught they lock you up and throw away the key."

Was that a threat?
The land became blurred and dark. I tried to huddle in the front to get warm, while the wind whipped my face.

Finally I blurted out, "What do you do for a living?" (looking at his face to see how long he hesitated. OH I THOUGHT YOU'D NEVER ASK MA'M AS HE STUCK A GUN IN MY CHEST AND SAID THIS IS A BUST)

"I'm an airline pilot."
"Wow. Really"

"Yes I've worked for Air Canada for five years.

"But there's no excitement in flying commercial any more. Everything is so automated I just sit and watch the plane fly itself. I'd like to fly into the bush, where you handle the controls yourself. If I'm good enough.

"Maybe I should try being a hippie for a summer."

A pilot. It almost sounded possible. Every boy's dream — to be an airplane flyer. Yet he was bored. Maybe a hippie. Find the action. Maybe just curious and after all, honest about his ignorance.

He left us at Ojibway Campsite 15 miles from Sault Ste. Marie to look up an old girlfriend. He said he'd come back and put up a tent.

We made a fire, had Lipton's soup and the remainder of a hagel from the lunch I'd packed the night before (was that Toronto?)

The full moon shone like a giant flashlight on the beach. Waves slipped out softly. And the mosquitoes were hussy tunneling through my back jean-pocket.

hey kids! you can use this page as a compass. all you have to do is turn the arrow till it points west, and you'll be facing north!

I guess he found the girlfriend.

In the morning we scrambled over a fence back to the highway and a man picked us up right away, started talking and didn't stop for an hour.

"Oh, I drive this road back and forth all the time pickup hitchhikers goin' both ways more goin' east now ya know oh this summer I picked up humerd of them ya know what the mayor of the town did used to be on radio one of them hotline shows he was a policeman now he's mayor still has a tv show he started a "Y" hostel in the evening trucks go out on the road pick up stranded hitchhikers for 50¢ take them to a farm give them a place to stay for the night breakfast in the morning drive them outside the soo in the morning."

We were now in downtown Sault Ste. Marie.

"Let me give you a tour of the city here's an old stone house built in 1814 just sittin' there in the downtown and the city didn't even know how old it was and look at those seaplanes by the water cost one million per put out forest fires and look at the view down there Algoma and Abitibi there's the Windsor hotel the president of algoma steel has a suite on the top floor there."

Three hours later, 50 miles up the road, David and I were contemplating a pleasant evening in the lighthouse across the highway.

A half ton pickup stopped, a young boy climbed down from the front, helped throw our bags and us in the back and we were off.

Looks like brother, sister and father in the front cab. Packsacks and sleeping bags. Probably going camping. There was also a matched set of grey luggage. Maybe they're going to the cotlage.

The sunblisters on my skin didn't hurt in the cool wind and it didn't feel like the 90 degrees hot that it was. We sat on every thing that might blow away, especially our cowboy hats. We took them off first.

God it was beautiful. I remembered going out west by train in '67. Sudbury to Winnipeg through the interior a parade of brush, swamp, depressing mudbrowns.

But driving along Lake Superior, watching the velvet blue water and the straight trees, green absolute.

Rolling by from behind eyes creased into tears.

So much land. Hills getting higher and millions of undiscovered secret forests. A happy and secure lung enveloped my body. Stretch your arms multiply them spin never touch all the beauty. Come up and build a house, bathe in the crystal water. Nothing but the Rockies compares to the pastel mirror of those five hundred miles.

We stopped at a gas station. Found out that man was father of son. Girl was also hitchiker. (in high heels and matched luggage? She had spent the summer travelling with her go-go girl sister in southern Ontario. She arrived in the soo without a cent. Got out on the road. Trying to make it to Dryden and bum money from unsuspecting aun.)

Mr. Parks was heading to Red Lake for some prospecting. His lined smiling face telescoped into a stare, then began to blink. The veins running from his nose matched the check on his red wool jacket. A perfect father image, complete with graying hair and moustache.

The sun had gone down and it was freezing in the back of the truck. Huddled under unzipped sleeping bags, I decided to write up our diary. I carefully pulled out a pencil stub and notepad, snuck my hand from under the covers and started to scribble. After half an hour my fingers were numb. I never wrote in the diary again.

Later on we talked about travelling. Mr. Parks said he had to be back to Newcastle, Ontario (where he had a farm) to fly to Australia.

"I go about ten times a year. I go around the world two or three times a year. We bought a house in London, England because we're there so often.

Never really understood what he did Mining, exploring.

He had something to say about every town we passed through, sitting and drinking endless rounds of black coffee.

"I remember digging samples here. It's a horrible place. The smell of pulp mills like old sausage. I remember hitchiking across the country with my younger brother 25 years ago. Now I do all my travelling by plane. But I decided that it would be a real adventure to drive up this time."

And I had felt badly about letting him pay for coffee.

The local teenagers sat in the diner booths listening to the jukebox. At breakfast the man changing the tunes played the new Rolling Stones and Creedence Cleerwater and told us that Glen Campbell singing Hava Nagila would be a big hit. After hearing True Grit on every car radio so far every other song I couldn't argue.

We spent the rest of the day in the back of the truck with a memorable stop in the Lakeland for ten cent soft ice cream.

The truck left us at a provincial campsite where we swam and crawled into the tent. But not before I'd mapped out a plan to destroy the mosquitoes lurking at the door flap.

After a while you start to think about the cars and the drivers. Like Mr. Parks and his trucks. Trucks are a pretty good bet. Any car with a trailer won't stop. Station wagons rarely stop — whether full or not. A man and his wife won't pull up but if he left her at home he's almost a sure thing. Volkswagons are usually full. Invariably they give the V peace sign.

In fact this summer every young person seemed to be giving the sign: hiking the other way, driving in a full-up car, in the back seat of their parents' car to show that they were really o.k. Keep the faith we're all in it together.

It's a good feeling.

"Hey they gave the sign".

It cheers you up after waiting a day without a ride. Somewhere else on the Trans-Canada someone else is having a rough time. The same kind of feeling you get at a rock festival. Brothers tied together by a bond of embryonic liberation.

The Groovy Revolution. Flash the peace sign to show that you're not straight. I mean I'm really bip, man. Dig the beads.

It's a good thing to feel part of a huge chain thumping across Canada. But this kind of solidarity shouldn't mask the real problem.

People are afraid. Every time someone picks you up, each time they take a chance on you, you owe it to them to be friendly, to explain what you believe and to try and understand them. If you act as though they owe you a ride, they'll respond by thinking they did you a big favour. Up comes the wall.

Yes, trucks are a pretty sure bet.

We met two kinds in these early stages of our trek. You've read about the first pick up, now get this: I WAS A TEENAGE HALF TON PICK-UP UNDER THE WINNIPEG VIADUCT.

Read on:

When we got off the bus at the edge of the city, so did a couple of long-haired guys. I looked straight up the highway.

"David there are at least three other groups ahead of us."

I looked down at my jean suit, felt my hair tucked up in a cowboy hat and realized that the only weapon we had in our favour at that point was me. It was definitely the time for action. We snuck beneath the viaduct post and zipped open my bag. I pulled out my sexy low cut dress, stepped into it, yanked it over my pants and started to lift my jersey over my head.

Unmistakable sound of a motor idling. Through the posts I spotted a red cleaner's truck and inside a greasy young kid sitting and staring. He couldn't see anything, it was all being done so cleverly, so skillfully . . . (GIRL ARRESTED FOR INDECENT EXPOSURE MY GOD, SAID THE CONSTABLE, WITH A BODY LIKE THAT HOW DID SHE HAVE THE NERVE)

I stared back and the cleaner's truck left when I was zipping the dress and throwing the pants into my bag, the truck roared back and huddled in a shadow. We started to walk beyond the bypass and along the highway when the red monster pulled up beside us.

"Hey, do you kids want a lift?"

I mean what do you do. With ten others just up the road and you're sure he doesn't just want the company. Maybe hoping that I get these frequent uncontrollable urges to liberate my pores.

So we got in between all the plastic bags and the dry clean smelling clothes. He said he was making out of town deliveries and when he stopped to "phone in" and made us hide in the back I figured that was it — (YOUNG COUPLE TAKEN TO CLEANERS BY MAD DELIVERY BOY)

After a while he stopped in the middle of prairie nowhere and said this is as far as I go. Where did he deliver, I mused, to the local yahoos bringing overalls. Maybe he smuggled jewels in the pockets of ladies for coats.

It was a relief to get out of the truck even if the waving wheat didn't smell so sweet.

But he sat in his red truck. He sat on the edge of the road and looked at us. Plenty of chance to cross the highway and turn back. Maybe he's waiting to see if we get a ride and then when the coast is clear he'll nab us.

David snuck to the knapsack and pulled out his all purpose nail-file can opener knife thing and stuck it in his belt.

"If this doesn't save us nothing will".

I rubbed the good luck tooth around my neck.

Zonk the red truck was gone in a flash.

We laughed — just a stupid kid killing time.

REVIEW.

quilico shines in Rigoletto...that voice!

Rigoletto has in abundance just about all the elements that can make opera such a powerful form; a strong plot, densely-written and intelligent libretto, and, best of all, Verdi's incomparable music. The C.O.C.'s current production offers the opera-goer a creditable interpretation of this masterpiece of the composer's maturity, of consistently high quality in regard to both the musical and the dramatic values.

In Louis Quilico the Company has an artist of world stature for the anchor-role of Rigo-letto — when he is onstage one is constantly aware that here, at last, is a real singer. The third act finale, "Si, vendetta," is his and consequently the opera's best moment; although his gestures, especially in the last act, seem a little diffuse and strangely introspective for such an emotionally powerful situation. But that voice! Rigoletto, inasmuch as any one artist can be said to stand out in the even quality of the production, is definitely Quilico's show.

Beautiful, slender, and possessed of a sensitive understanding of the delicate idealism required of the characterisation, Urszula Koszut sings Gilda with a consistently warm lyricism, although her voice has not yet the strength required in the upper range to toss off the flourishes with the technical élan of a Callas. That she is able to focus the pathos on herself in the last scene, one shared by Quilico, is a fair indication of the sureness of touch of her dramatic style.

As the Duke, Pierre Duval fails at times to realise the vocal requirements of his numerous big arias. Still, he acts the part of the cynical yet dashing libertine with fine panache, aided by brilliant bits of stage direction from Leon Major

Nor does the supporting cast fall short of the generally fine standards of the three principals. Richard Mundt makes a sinisterly professional Sparafucile, and Joan Maxwell swings a wicked pair of hips in her brief but satisfying characterisation of his sister Maddalena. Don Garrard's impressive Monterone contrasts well in its dignity with the corruption of the rest of the courtiers, and especially with Richard Braun's elegant and arrogant reading of Marullo. The chorus sings lustily, as the occasion demands, and on the whole seems to relish the histrionic delights of acting what must be the meanest and most vicious collection of courtiers in all opera. Like the chorus, the orchestra under Mario Bernardi is consistently professional and finely unobtrusive.

With such a pleasing assembly of musical and dramatic talent, it is a pity that the sets seem occasionally at variance with the opera's demands. Murray Laufer's presentational arches and staircases are functional for getting the traffic on and off, but the agility needed to negotiate them would tire the resources of a mountain goat, let alone an opera singer.

Rigoletto is not a production to be missed, either by opera-lovers disillusioned with the present season or by anyone interested in theatre, curious to know what the conventions of the genre can produce when displayed to their best advantage. Besides, one does not get the chance to see a Quilico every day. Verdi's composition is after all, in its own style, a kind of King Lear of opera. See it and find out.

Booker White is one of the old blues "living legends" found in the early 60s. In not every case did it turn out to be a kindness to the "living legends" to have rediscovered them and coaxed them back to the recording studios and the hard life of touring musicians. In some cases there was little left, and in many others only a poor echo of former greatness remained. But two who showed that they were still as good as they had been years before, perhaps even better, were John Hurt and Booker White.

John Hurt has been dead for a few years, but Booker White still keeps an active schedule, and this week (through Sunday) he is appearing at The Onion coffeehouse in the Ryerson student union.

"I like this town, you know. I swear I do," he says, raising his right hand. "I like to feel happy — somewhere up here, you know. And sometimes I'm at a place, and I start to come up and then I stop. I just get so far. But I've always felt good in Toronto, ever since I first came here."

On the bandstand, he acts like a man who is happy being where he is. Even with the somewhat small midweek crowd Wednesday night, he was genial and talkative. The crowd is far removed from the noisy dancers for whom he played his loud steel-bodied guitar 40 years ago, but he likes it just the same.

"The blues is what we young people need for recreation. I don't know what the old people need, because I'm never hardly around them. Course I heard a lot of things from the old people. I'd follow an old man around, blues'd fall out of his pocket, and I'd pick 'em up. You know, he was going out and I was just coming up then."

When he's really going, a Booker White performance is a relaxed mixture of songs and tales blended together. The tales aren't always strict fact, but they're a sort of mythic autobiography based closely on his life, full of humor, but with touches of seriousness and sadness.

The songs are magnificent. He has had to relearn many of his old hits to satisfy the requests of blues fans, and he plays them with tremendous vigor, often playing with a piece of metal tube on his little finger, which he slides on the treble strings, creating beautiful, moving effects. Being on the coffeehouse and college campus circuit hasn't brought an artificial smoothness to his music. It's still the rough blues of the deep south, and he certainly plays it well.

come live with us

Poetry about hitchhiking has, as it turns out, advantages and disadvantages.

On the plus side, hitchhikers are people, at least a little bit closer to the nub. They are certainly unaccommodated, "anything but comfortable" for that you stay at home" as Elizabeth Woods puts it in Thumbprints, Doug Fetherling's anthology of hitchhiking poems.

The Hitchhiker is at the mercy of storms, winter, boredom, drivers. And there is a lot of time between cars to think about it. As poet, he has what the road serves up, the scores of incidents, love affairs, fights and what all.

And, though practised more widely in Europe, there is something particularly Canadian about travelling down the long skinny highway (Trans-Canada-401) in the long skinny country, asking favours from the most prudent, cold, untrusting people in the world. As Fetherling says, everyone gets stuck in Wawa.

The common nature of the experience is also on the debit side. A lot of us have stood in more less the same place (Wawa) and passed the time with more or less the same musings, so a published poem had damn well better be original or else awfully well expressed.

The new Canadian hitchhiker poet must at least be able to see (if not raise) what is already an extensive prose literature, and writers like Kerouac and Tom Wolfe are no easy match.

On the whole, Thumbprints does not fare too badly, although the lighter toned narrative pieces tend to come off better than the conceits, many of which fail to survive the transfer from journal to anthology.

As with hitchhiking there are dismal passages:

*the purple sexuality of the roadside flowery weed surprised me.
I'd turned, and there it was all the while — and remained even while I stepped on it*

John Newlove

More often the ills are those of an apprentice poet suffering from one image too few (overthinness):

and the ground once flat for cultivation of wheat has begun to be pock-marked the face of my sister's pimp

Eldon Garnet

Or belaboured by just one line too many (obviousity):

... and the streets are numbered from the forest to the mine itself the better to remember where one goes perhaps

Laurel Thompson

*He picked me up and felt I was familiar
Was sure he picked me up, (As I was).*

*Once before in the rain
'Aren't you the fellow,' he asked.*

*'With the nine inch cock?'
... and I had to tell him no.*

Michael Levinson (elapses unfortunately his)

the rule of the thumb

However, the same writer will then turn around and bang on:

*it's not that I'm o jealous man
it's just that when I think of how a butterfly could see your breast as a nest or toy with your nipple like it was his milkweed dinner*
I lose all my well rehearsed control and strike back at you by dreaming love to strange wamen

Garnet

That's how it goes with early poetry.

Thumbprints has, as well, some controlled, accomplished work — as one would expect from Margaret Atwood, John Robert Columbo, Raymond Souster. And there is marvelous Al Purdy, powerful and eclectic as ever, mixing Ameliasburgh Canadian and Delphi oracle.

*I AM DEFINITELY ON THE SIDE OF LIFE
I SAID TO PAUSANIAS
but shit nobody will give me o ride*

*... now I rest in the wheel ruts
I sleep in the mountains
I drink my face in my hands in the dawn every morning the old man slowly disappears the summer is mare like o mood thon o season.*

Only Purdy. One wishes, since Fetherling chose to include two barroom brawls, one good one mediocre, he had added Purdy's alltime great At The Quinte Hotel.

And there is Fetherling himself, perhaps the ideal road poet:

*red river odieu to conditions beyond our control like Winnipeg sinister on the horizon it's Queen Victoria lost on the prairies homeless on the courthouse lawn
looking for other serious statues like herself.*

Vancouver for which I travelled 6 days each mile o little closer to that moment of 1st glimpse of saltwater whereupon i ran in2 the surf w/ my harmonico & blew sweet blues to Kyoto.

Most heartening is the appearance of a number of well crafted poems by less known Canadians: Edgar Lavoie, David McFadden, Marian Engel.

Unfortunately, as with Purdy, Atwood, and Souster, they are represented by only one poem each. The only poet in the whole anthology who gets full exposure (ten poems) is John Newlove. Why so little space to them (and so much to him) escapes this reviewer. Thus Anansi's Canada First: A Mare Usque ad Edmontum, released at the same time as Thumbprints, makes more satisfying reading, for, while there is no Purdy, Atwood or Fetherling, there is at least enough consistency to get to know Paulette Jiles or Bob Flanagan. One wants to complain to Fetherling as does Rosencrantz to Guildenstern (or Guildenstern to Rosencrantz) "Incidents! Incidents! All I ask is a little sustained action!" But anyone who dedicates his book to S-----, "I loved here, and she ralled her own" must be forgiven.

word*

*People talking at you?
Can't hear a word they're saying?*

Try the Canadian Mime Theatre. Its silence is fluent in the lingua franca of human emotions and responses. And most of the time it's a lively silence that's fun to listen to.

The Mime Theatre, Canada's first, has just finished a 10-week summer season at Niagara-on-the-Lake. The program they are offering at the Central Library Theatre through October 11 is a series of short sketches in a boredom-proof variety of styles and moods, exploiting every mime tradition from white-face solos through masked "dialogues" to strobe-lit mass hysteria.

The company numbers six, but more than half of the 20 sketches are solos performed by either Adrian Pecknold or Harro Maskow. They met in 1964 while studying in Paris under the same master, Jacques Lecoq, but they take very different approaches to their art.

Pecknold performs most of his numbers in the traditional clown-white make-up with sad upside-down "v's" for eyebrows. Immediately recognizable and lovable as the universal simpleton, he mimes activity or situation rather than character. When demonstrating all the things that can go wrong when cycling, or exercising at Vic Tanny's, or assembling pop art, this kind of mime demands — and from Pecknold, gets — a dancer's strength, agility and rhythm.

It also requires emotional control of one's audience so that pathos and self-recognition never cross the consonant line into bathos and distant pity. Pecknold's precise placement of every look and gesture saves numbers which could otherwise be cloying — such as Don't Pick the Flowers, in which he dissects a daisy, learns she loves him not, botches a succession of attempted suicides, and finally succeeds by mistake. Also delicately handled is La Balon Rouge, in which the movie of the same title is condensed into a few memorable minutes. Appropriately saved for the end is his physical and lyrical masterpiece, a tense little vignette of a prisoner's Final Hour, Pecknold alternately plays clock and condemned man, never once losing the tick-tock beat that pounds from offstage.

Maskow's approach is less Marcel Marceau and more wry mimicry. His makeup is usually straight, emphasizing his hollowed-out eyes and remarkably limber jawbone, the basic ingredients of an improbable assortment of personalities, human and animal. Sometimes the characters are switched as soon as they have been established and enjoyed; at other times he develops them through a variety of actions and reactions — a cop whistling down traffic, helping a child, and giving directions to a truck driver, or samurai droning jibberish/Japanese as he shoos away a hovering wife/mother, whacks off her head, and flails at his opponent. In the last he plays two characters; in Western Narrative, he plays a cast of thousands, including settler, settler's dog, hordes of Indians, telegraph operator, cavalry commander, and troops, conveying in the process such complicated bits of information as "the message isn't going through because hostile Indians have clipped the wires."

The supporting company's apprentice-level of competence is painfully evident in comparison with Pecknold and Maskow's virtuosity. The only really inept performances were given by a decorative blonde named Randi Gregeren, who somehow managed to look like she was missing her cue even when she was playing a statue. Kenneth Stern and Kevin Fenlon did much better destroying each other over A Piece of Lint, and Wendy Stern gave evidence of knowing exactly what she was doing even if it was just holding a sign. But their ensemble efforts fizzle. When, for example, a loner confronts a tight little group over The Bomb, that group lacks uniformity in reacting times, expressions, and under- wear.

But the evening as a whole is a glorious inversion of the everyday. The audience is permanently hushed. What non-verbal sounds there are (unfortunately including a lot of unpalatably sappy music) assume new significance. So does every gesture, particularly in a black-light number in which the story is told only by the geometric movement of fluorescent costumes and swords. The infinitesimal becomes important, while the tragic is reduced to the ludicrous. It's all said in the opening set, in which a small, absurdly red flower at the back of the stage dwarfs the blackness around it.

help! I'm trapped inside a film transcending media

In 1886 Anton Chekov wrote a play entitled The Seagull. Some forty years later Vladimir Nabokov wrote a novel entitled Laughter in the Dark. Today both of these works have been made into movies.

Neither work is really satisfying as a movie. As directors, neither Richardson nor Lumet have had either the daring or the skill to rethink their material in purely cinematic terms. Because of this it is clear in both cases that what one is seeing is an adaptation rather than a true film.

In the case of The Seagull this is most obvious. With Laughter in the Dark the problem is more difficult. One is not immediately aware that what one is watching is a filmed novel; one is merely left with a feeling of deep dissatisfaction.

In the case of Lumet's Seagull, the film follows the play's text with an almost slavish fidelity. There have been no attempts to open up the script by utilizing any of the standard film techniques — the flashback, the quick cut, montage. Lumet might easily have followed Nina to Petersburg, or illustrated Konstantine's memories of his youth, his mother's career and the society in which she moved, but he has chosen to do none of this.

Not only does his camera never leave the country estate: it never even leaves the actors. It forces them to a merciless, relentless scrutiny. By doing so it captures all the tiny details with which the play is so rich, yet half of which are almost always lost in a stage performance of the play. Lumet knows exactly which characters the audience should be watching at any given moment, and is able to guide his viewers here in a manner impossible for the stage director.

Furthermore, he is able to successfully convey the naturalistic detail which invariably presents a problem on the stage. Chekov's subtle moods and complex emotional struggles are not played happily against a setting of canvas trees and styrofoam rocks. The change of medium makes it possible to capture the flavour of a summer in rural Russia without being intrusive. Lumet realizes that Chekov's play is about people, and he keeps his background as a background.

Fortunately the excellence of his cast justify all of Lumet's decisions. It is unlikely that one will ever get to see a stage performance of this play with so many superlative performances. Vanessa Redgrave, David Warner, and James Mason are outstanding in this first rate cast.

One may be disappointed initially in the non-movie-like quality of the Seagull, but one is soon forced to admit that Lumet knows exactly what he is doing, and has a subtle and compelling mastery of his art. By deliberately refusing to open out the story he heightens the sense of claustrophobia inherent in the play, and avoids the risk of diffusing Chekov's potent psychological conflicts.

If Lumet can be accused of showing too much respect for his author, Tony Richardson errs much more gravely in the opposite direction in his film of Laughter in the Dark. He grossly underestimates the quality and complexity of his material, and twists and cuts it in a manner hardly justified by the final result.

His theory behind doing a screen adaptation consists of cutting anything which might present problems, and filming the remainder. Unfortunately his understanding of Nabokov's novel is so slight that he consistently cuts the wrong bits, and is left with nothing but plot. All the details, the wry observations, and peripheral ironic events have been given the axe although they really form the main body of the book.

Plot for Nabokov is simply not very important. He uses it more as a convenience for displaying his extraordinary wit and literary virtuosity. What is important is his unique vision . . . a bizarre combination of ironic detachment, compassion, melancholy and humour. One can no more film one of his books for plot alone than one can take that approach in filming Milton's Paradise Lost.

It is disturbing then to find that a director of such professed skill as Richardson has completely missed the point, and has so clearly failed to find a cinematic style which will compensate for all that is lost in the change of medium. What is perhaps unforgivable is the fact that he repeats almost every mistake which Kubrick made some years ago in his disastrous film of Lolita.

Nabokov has taken an ordinary, somewhat sordid love-triangle and through his narrative technique has transformed it into something rich and strange. Richardson in the film, works the reverse transformation.

His picture is shapeless and lacks focus. What is missing is the omnipresent force of a creator commenting throughout on the foibles of his characters. Nabokov fulfilled this job admirably in the novel, but when one looks to Richardson to do the same, he seems to be always busy lining up the next shot.

Despite the fact that he has updated the story, even throwing in a few inflatable plastic chairs, beautiful people dancing to rock music and a mandatory modish queer, his film comes out as a strangely old-fashioned humdrum melodrama. It is definitely a step backwards when a complex concentric novel is simplified and forced to assume a straight linear progression, and emerges as a film which looks like the crude makings of a novel by Nabokov.

One can only hope that it is as unsatisfying to make a movie such as this one as it is to watch it, and that sooner or later more directors will have the courage to throw down their books and walk.

The Morality Squad's Favorite Film Board

In late 1966, John Hofsess completed Redpath 25, the first segment of his ode to the underground, Palace of Pleasure. Several months later, Peter Rowe's gritty urban exploration, Buffalo Airport Visions, was released. Both films provided the nebulous 'Canadian underground' with something of a flickering existence, but in more substantial terms, both films established the McMaster Film Board as, perhaps, the most active and influential production group currently engaged in the production of independent Canadian shorts.

If the MFB exposed and then developed that illusive (or is it illusory?) nether-world, its past practitioners have since surfaced, fully-blast, into the Wonderland of Canadian film. Following his kaleidoscopic fantasy, Palace of Pleasure, John Hofsess, spiritual mentor of the movement, has further explored the field of experimental film with Columbus of Sex (which previewed this past summer to an enthusiastic group of critics from the Hamilton Morality Squad). Peter Rowe, who with Buffalo Airport Visions had established himself as the conscience, perhaps, of the MFB, is currently at work on a feature, A Fifties Trip. A Sixties Trip, supported by a grant from the Canadian Film Development Corporation. And David Martin, who revived the MFB amidst much anxiety following the budget crisis surrounding Hofsess' second film, Black Zero, graduated from his more conventional, more whimsical short, To Paint the Park, to become assistant to Richard Leiterman on Allan King's A Married Couple.

Despite the obvious significance that the McMaster Film Board holds for independent production in Canada, its existence has been a perilous one. Faced with a $1500 budgetary deficit and painfully bitter recollections of Black Zero, the McMaster Student Union attempted to freeze any reformation of the Film Board following Ivan Reitman's terms as president two summers past. The burden of the MFB's continued existence was inherited by its present president, Dan Goldberg.

"Last summer Ivan asked me if I wanted to start the Film Board again, so I said 'Sure'. There wasn't anything else better to do. We planned it so that we would only ask the MSU for organizational funds. After about a month of arguing they agreed since, after all, it was only about $600 or $700 they were gambling.

"But a month later we decided that we did want to make a film and so we said we'd make a film about first year orientations as a sort of candy-coated propaganda piece for the MSU. As it's since turned out, that's not the way it happened."

The result was Orientation — a 20-minute colour film shot over a three-week period last summer and budgeted at $1800. Directed and produced by Ivan Reitman with screenplay provided by Goldberg and Reitman, Orientation is reminiscent of David Secter's epochal feature, Winter Kept Us Warm. The narrative lines in both films run somewhat parallel — the maturation in mind and spirit of a novice who miraculously achieves identity within the university-game.

Compared to Secter's feature which deals with a similar theme, the MFB's production is predictable and, at times, almost agonizingly contrived. Yet, apart from the irrelevant technical considerations applic-icable to any non-professional film — lack of colour-balance, a poorly-timed answer-print and sound which occasionally slips out of synch — Orientation is, in many ways, a success. The editing provides the film with a comfortable pace and Reitman's subdued, understated music track adds a nostalgic lyrical quality to the visuals.

Unlike previous McMaster Film Board productions, there is little sense in Orientation of the unveiling of underground truths. The form and function of the film is that of gentle satire — notably, the sequence in which a hopelessly unoriented English professor pontificates on the Apple as hero of 'Paradise Lost'.

Yet, as has been the pattern in many past MFB films, Reitman's short is pure cinema in the best tradition of Jonas Mekas. The distinguishing quality is that of visual involvement rather than elaborate narration (although there is a definite narrative content.) Reitman adopts the underground's leader by borrowing technique at random. Animation, voice-over, rapid-cutting — Orientation exploits the nature of film without allowing technique to either dominate or become superfluous.

In many ways Reitman's film exemplifies the collective attitude of the MFB to film as medium. Dan Goldberg: "Too many people who teach filmmaking are too hung-up on the scholastic or intellectual content. If a film-school gets too academic, it doesn't perform any role. The best way to make a film, as far as we're concerned is to let someone take a camera, go out and shoot it and then put it together. Doing that you learn everything that could possibly go wrong with a film. As it stands now the MFB is a film-course — it's just not for credit.

"I'd say that in about five years, the Board, if it continues to go the way it has been going will be independent and will be a great training ground for students — perhaps one of the best in Canada."

In the space of about four years the McMaster Film Board has made remarkable inroads into, what had been before, the Never-Neverland of Canadian film production. Apart from the significant fact that the MFB owes much of its success to young, talented film-makers like Rowe and Hofsess, it has also benefited from the inherent character of the 'Canadian film industry'. As Allan King once commented, Canada is unique in that among her native cineastes there has yet to be established a preferential hierarchy as in the U.S., Britain or France. Gilles Carle's Le Viol d'Une Jeune Fille Douce commands as much attention (or as little) as Larry Kent's Hugh.

There still exists in this country enough of a mythology surrounding film that audiences tend to view home-grown releases with a relatively small amount of prejudice. The Underground, in which the MFB has established its undeniable membership, because of its anti-structure, benefits from this attitude to an even higher degree than formal feature production.

McMaster's Film Board which has occupied so much of the vacuum previously associated with the production of independent Canadian shorts, now seems destined to assume the additional role of a non-formalized workshop. The MFB plans to initiate an ambitious three-year production programme during which a novice film-maker could graduate from readily accessible super-8 equipment to a professional 16 mm. Eclair and Nagra unit. In addition to the workshop, the Film Board also intends to establish a summer film-'school' at which film devotees could both produce films and discuss them with established Canadian directors and cameramen.

At present the McMaster Film Board is being scrutinized by other film agencies in Canada. Twentieth Century Fox is negotiating for the North American rights to the 35 mm. version of Orientation and the CBC is planning to air Reitman's film some time next month. The current interest in MFB productions tends to throw a good deal of validity into Goldberg's remark that "There's going to be a feature film industry here within 10 years and we're just going to be in on the ground floor."

This is a book blurb. Everyone is welcome to review books except snotty English graduate students.

What you do is just write about any book and leave the copy at the Review Office, 91 St. George for Steve Langdon or Bob Bosin.

Langdon is in charge of books with subtitles. Bosin, books without. Bosin likes reviews with the titles of three or four books at the top. Langdon likes those New York Review type reviews that don't even mention the book until half way through. Langdon also likes Rex Stout.

If we like your review we will use it. (If not, we will call and talk about why we don't, and how it might be revised. Then we will order books for you free, or let you have some of the prizes that flow in from the publishers on their own: eg. The Galloping Gourmet, The Happy Hollisters at Cape Kennedy. We particularly need someone on contemporary Canadian fiction, who can understand surrealism.

In the meantime, watch this space for excerpts from the Story of O: Installment 1. "From now on the only time you will open your mouth in the presence of a man will be to cry out or caress."

Keith McKie (pronounced McEYE), former lead singer of the Kensington Market, opened Tuesday night at the Riverboat. It was only his second gig as a single and he demonstrated enough promise that this writer is willing to predict a bright future for him.

In his first set, accompanying himself on guitar, the fine quality of his voice became very evident. His wide range and good control were evidenced in his very first song 'Love Is Beginning', an original composition, as were most of his songs. His guitar work, though not exceptional, was most satisfactory and pleasing in its own right.

McKie's eagerness to communicate closely with his audience makes him one of the warmest performers I have witnessed for a long time. Though unpolished, his stage presence is still strong. Unfortunately, his second set was marred with requests (including my own for 'Aunt Violet's Knee') which he tried to oblige and with which he found himself floundering. Yet his warm smile and calm manner more than compensate for this.

Generally, McKie's theme is a search for identity in life and the meaning of love and peace of mind. These are best evidenced in the beautiful Neil Young ballad 'I'm A Child' in which he plaintively asks:

*What is the colour
When love is burnt?
What is the colour
Of Love?*

Tom Rush moves into the Riverboat on Friday, but McKie informs me that he may stay to perform with Rush. This makes for a fine opportunity to see the best single folk artist in the field, in my estimation, along with a young man who displays the potential to become a new addition in the series of bright young Canadian folk artists.

NDP , New Left must co exist. . Langdon

The New Democratic Party should not try to replace the New Left in campus politics, Steven Langdon told a meeting of the NDP at Sid Smith yesterday.

Langdon, an executive member of the NDP provincial council and past president of the Students' Administrative Council, outlined the differences between the NDP and the New Left in terms of their historical tradition and their relation to the social classes.

He pointed out that the NDP has strong roots in Canadian history, derived from two strands of radicalism — non-partisan and urban.

"On the other hand, the New Left does not relate to that radical tradition in Canadian history, but rather has its response in present society," he said.

Langdon then observed that the NDP is "of and for the working class. Its strength is to be found in the working class areas, its key people are associated with the trade unions, and its policies revolve around improvements for and protection of the working class."

The New Left, he continued, appeals primarily to the middle-class: those emerging from the universities to form a "new" working class.

Although he suggested that the radicalism of the New Left might be more appealing to the mass on campus, Langdon said that for the New Left to survive it must relate itself to that very historical tradition the NDP possesses.

HSU raps

A resolution calling for abolition of the three-hour final exam and demanding more student say in the methods of determining term marks was passed by the History Students' Union yesterday.

About 70 students at a meeting in the New Physics Building voted "that the breakdown of the final mark be determined by democratic decision as a result of discussion between professor and class."

Several students expressed the hope that, if the class voted to abolish the final exam, one would be available to those students who wished to write it.

HSU president Gary Lax (II UC) was to present the motion to Dr. A.P. Thornton history department chairman late yesterday.

Steve Langdon, former SAC president and now on NDP provincial council, speaks at NDP meeting.

Be kind to the people at the Textbook Store 'cos it's getting awful empty

When store managers and shop assistants have to look down empty aisles all day, it gets them down—naturally. So spare some kindness for the people at the Textbook Store. Call them. Visit them. Stand in line even if you're not buying a book because long lines encourage them. Persistently ask for the Ethnology shelf and keep the assistants talking because they're bored and they need a break. Ask the cashier for a game of Scrabble. If there's anything you can spare (a chestnut or a censored handbill?) leave it around the store for a keepsake. Or why not take the manager a coffee and have a good long chat about prices, because that's the kind of thing that makes a store manager tick. There's a lot of nice things you can do for a bookstore that's in the doldrums without buying any books. Because when it comes to books

Thousands protest nuclear bomb

Thousands of students and supporters clustered at border crossings and airport terminals across the country Wednesday, blocking traffic in an unsuccessful protest against the US's underground atomic blast in the Aleutians.

Mobilized on less than 24 hours notice, the snow-balling protest involved approximately 14,000 students from at least 14 post-secondary institutes, backed up by other supporters who learned of the protest through news reports.

The idea for the protest originated at the University of Victoria. The response Wednesday provided the largest demonstration in the history of that university, spilling over into mainland British Columbia and involving nearly 10,000 BC students altogether.

Nearly 2,500 U Vic students blockaded the docks of American-owned Blackball Ferry on Vancouver Island, filling the narrow approach street eight abreast for a distance of two city blocks.

A further 400 students blockaded a morning flight from Seattle at the Victoria International Airport, refusing to allow passengers to disembark.

WARNS PROTESTORS

After the BC demonstrations ended, Victoria students fumed over a statement from B.C. Attorney General Leslie Peterson. He tried to halt the action by warning students that they "should realize the seriousness of the charges which could be laid under the criminal code, and the subsequent impairment of their academic record."

In contrast to the Attorney General's remark, Mitchell Sharp, Federal Minister of External Affairs Tuesday sent a telegram to U Vic students' Council, applauding their move and wishing the demonstrators success in their attempts to halt the test.

In Ontario, over 2,000 demonstrators blocked US border crossings or demonstrated near Sarnia, Windsor and Niagara Falls.

At the Rainbow Bridge, Niagara Falls, 150 students delivered a message and a gift to US customs officials for President Nixon.

The gift was a battered globe; the message: "one small blast for man, one major holocaust for mankind."

FOUR ARRESTED

At the International Ambassador Bridge in Windsor, police arrested four demonstrators of a group of 350, who blocked traffic there for more than an hour. The four were charged with blocking traffic and obstructing a police officer.

In Quebec, approximately 200 demonstrators from McGill and Loyola Universities were forced to hike the last eight miles to the border crossing at Champlain, N.Y. when Quebec Provincial Police impounded their buses on the pretext that the vehicles were not properly licensed.

The incensed protestors were confronted by more police at the border but they managed to extend their planned one-hour demonstration two hours, until their transportation was returned.

The McGill Students' Society may bring charges against the QPP.

In Alberta, although the nearest border crossing is 400 miles from the University of Alberta, Benjamin Spock, pediatrician-cum-draft counselor still urged students to support the blockade and any other means of forcing the US to cease atom tests.

SFU strike growing in momentum

BURNABY (CUP) — Eleven striking faculty members in Simon Fraser University's Department of Political Science, Sociology, and Anthropology ignored an administration deadline for promises to return to their classes Wednesday and left themselves open to possible suspension and dismissal for breach of contract.

The deadline was set by administration acting Vice-President L. M. Srivastava, who sent letters to each of the professors earlier during the week demanding that they declare whether or not they would return to regularly scheduled classes.

Failure to reply to his letters by 5 p.m. Wednesday, he said, left the professors open to suspension and dismissal.

The professors have been on strike since Oct. 24, when the SFU administration failed to begin negotiations over the removal of the trusteeship now imposed on the PSA department, and over administration tenure rulings which fired, demoted or placed on probation seven PSA faculty.

NO STATEMENTS

Neither Srivastava nor administration

President Kenneth Strand have issued statements since the administration's deadline passed. Observers feel they will not make any declarations until Monday — a move they say would be designed to forestall a weekend of preparation for protest by SFU students.

The SFU strike, which began slowly, has begun to pick up momentum on the campus. History students began a scheduled strike yesterday at noon, with the intention of staying out of class until the administration begins negotiations with PSA.

English students voted Wednesday to begin striking Monday if the administration still refuses to negotiate with the department.

Meetings of students and faculty in the Departments of Modern Languages, Psychology, Economics, Commerce, Education and Geography began yesterday to discuss the crisis, and formulate positions among themselves.

Most are believed to be sympathetic to PSA.

Today at 1 p.m. in Room 102 Mechanical Building, Prof. John Leggett and graduate student Pat Hoffer from SFU will explain the issues involved in the SFU strike.

on october 17, 18, 19, the statement "let us reason together" may take on a new meaning. on those three days will happen a conference called symposion. it will happen when 24 faculty members and 24 students get together in small, interdisciplinary groups to think-talk. it will happen about education, educational experience, and the interface between the academic cultures, and whatever else the participants think is relevant. any student (grad or undergrad, male or female, or any combination of these elements) may participate. when you decide you are interested, stop by the sac office or the hall porter's desk in hart house and pick up an application. symposion is one of the many things, happening as part of the 50th anniversary of hart house.

Nyerere urges West back African freedom struggles

By HEATHER MOORE and HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

President Julius K. Nyerere of Tanzania yesterday warned that the struggle of Black South Africans and Rhodesians could open the rift between Africa and the powerful Western powers unless these countries use their influence to help bring freedom to southern Africa.

Nyerere was giving an address marking the official establishment of the International Studies Programme at the University of Toronto. He also received the title "Doctor of Laws — Honoris Causis" from U of T President Claude Bissell.

Nyerere told a sympathetic audience that his country is committed to ending racism in Africa and is "naturally and inevitably allied with the freedom fighters."

It is the Western world, he declared, which makes the choice between peace and war in southern Africa by giving at least tacit support to the minority white regimes.

FREEDOM FIGHTERS

When violence comes, Nyerere stated, the African freedom fighters will have to turn to Communist countries for arms and training, only because Western nations will not supply military assistance to such revolutionary groups.

Nyerere drew deafening applause as he said "When every avenue of peaceful change is blocked, then the only way forward to positive change is by channelling and directing the people's fury — that is, by organized violence, by a people's war against their government."

Nyerere is afraid that the black-white confrontation will be seen by the West as a Communist conspiracy. "The people in the West would be seeing us as communists who wish them ill; we would be seeing them as supporters of racialism and of tyranny."

The president emphasized, however, that such bloodshed is not inevitable if the Western nations use their power "to exert the kind of Western nations use their power "to exert the kind of pressure which brings change with a minimum of violence."

STATE OF IMBALANCE

As long as the people of countries like Mozambique, Angola and South Africa are "governed by an external power which rejects the principle of self-determination," Nyerere believes that the forces of change and stability will be in a constant state of imbalance.

Because the pressing need for freedom is so central to Tanzania's objectives, Nyerere made it clear that black Africans are "not anti-white terrorists wishing to impose a reverse racialism" but people who want "to give human dignity and non-racialism a chance to grow."

Several students waved large banners reading "We thank you President Nyerere — Biafran Association of Canada" and "African National Congress: Greetings and Solidarity."

The general response to Nyerere was so warm that after the address most students waited at Simcoe Hall to see him off.

Tenants on the march

with the balance slowly tipping to the tenant side.

Many people now in apartments are not just temporary tenants. They will probably never be able to afford a home. They will be tenants all their lives and their children will be raised in the apartment environment.

The philosophy of the Metro Tenants Association is that a community can only survive and have a viable life if it has power — that is, the ability to act to control and affect its environment.

Its target is not just the government but the whole society that is biased in favour of property owners.

Some communities, for example Kingston, won't allow people who don't own property to vote in municipal elections. Kingston, incidentally, has one of the strongest tenants associations in Ontario.

Last year the Students Administrative Council demonstrated its concern over the student housing problem by setting up a Tent City. Out of that grew the University Housing Committee, a presidential advisory committee that investigates the housing situation for students and oversees housing development on campus.

One housing development on campus — the married students residence, has already affiliated itself with the Metro tenants.

The Metro Tenants Association intends to approach SAC this year to see if students are interested in becoming part of the organization, probably as a viable, autonomous unit.

At the moment the association is also looking for people to become involved in their various action groups. There is an action group, for example, to get tenants on city committees on apartment design.

"People are going to learn that if they don't accept the responsibility about where they live they won't have any rights about where they live, and they'll find themselves out on the street," Mr. Patterson concluded.

Paul kent retains interfac tennis crown

By OAVIO BURT

On Monday afternoon, the interfaculty tennis tournament reached a belated but still energetic climax as Paul Kent (Meds) outlasted Mike Zimmerman (Law) to retain the championship.

The tone of the final match was established in the first set as Kent's acrobatic ability to cover the whole court and his aggressive play combined to produce a 6-4 result.

The second set was much in the same order, though it produced a much more one-sided score. Zimmerman's reluctance to move to the attack (perhaps caused by a recent bout with the flu) and his inability to handle Kent's elusive serves resulted in three quick service breaks and a 6-1 score for the champion.

However, Zimmerman's very deliberate shots from the base-line began to pay dividends in the third set, as Kent's aggressiveness developed into a remarkable ability to drive returns inches beyond the lines.

Zimmerman was repeatedly short with his lobs, but still managed to keep Kent on the run until a service break produced a 6-4 set and kept his hopes alive.

The exhausting fourth and deciding set was punctuated by many long rallies featuring some remarkable recovery shots by Kent when Zimmerman drove him deep to the base-line.

The score gradually mounted from 5-5 to 7-6 and then 8-7 for Zimmerman, but Kent was gaining control of the net play and continually put away his opponent's short lobs for easy winners.

Kent's accurate placements produced three straight games and a hard-fought 10-8 set for the title.

Joining Kent and Zimmerman on the intercollegiate team are Don Steele (Vic II) and Frank Blyth (COE).

They are playing right now in the Western sectional finals at Waterloo, and if successful they will travel to Carleton next weekend to avenge the upset loss in last year's championships.

Varsity oarsmen face early morning workouts

Crawling out of a warm sack at 5:00 a.m. every morning to go rowing isn't easy, but thirty dedicated U of T students have been doing it since September 15. They live as far away from the Argonaut Rowing Club as Scarborough and Port Credit, but seldom miss a practice.

After a hasty change into sweat clothes, the oarsmen begin their workout with a two mile run and fifteen minutes of calisthenics. It's still dark and cold when they carry the sixty-foot racing shells out of the boathouse and lower them into the chilly water of Lake Ontario. Now the real work begins under the watchful eyes of coaches Ingo Schulte-Hostedde and Jim Lyttle. Rowing inside the breakwall between the Humber and the CNE, the crews cover an average of seven or eight miles before the Shell Tower registers 7:30 and the workout terminates.

During those miles on the water though, great pains are taken by everybody to perfect rowing technique and to improve chances of success in forthcoming E.C.I.R.A. (Eastern Canadian Intercollegiate Rowing Assoc.) regattas. Head coach Schulte-Hostedde is especially optimistic about his Sr. Varsity boat which holds more experienced oarsmen than the U of T has been able to muster in a number of years.

Three of the crew represented Canada last July at the Henley Royal Regatta in England; another was a gold medalist oarsman at the Canada Games in Halifax and the other four have been part of at least one Canadian Championship crew. Jim Lyttle is equally enthusiastic about the Freshman and Jr. Varsity crews that he's coaching. In the last couple of weeks they've improved greatly, and with another few days of training under their belts, they'll be tough to beat.

With crews like this on the water every day, the Rowing Blues are already eyeing the E.C.I.R.A. points championship trophy (which they won last year) and the O.Q.A.A. championship which goes up for grabs on Nov. 1 at Brock.

The last time the O.Q.A.A. trophy came to Toronto was in 1964, and this year our lads are out to get it back. The first regatta is scheduled for Oct. 4 (at the Argonaut Rowing Club, 1225 Lakeshore Blvd. W.) with crews from Brock, McMaster, York and Western promising keen competition.

Scott leads golf team

On Monday at the Oakdale course, aspiring Varsity golfers played a 36-hole qualifying round to decide the team that will represent Toronto at the OQAA championships next weekend in Hamilton.

Leading the pack with 153 was George Scott (Vic III), as his 79-74 was just enough to get by Jim Clelland's 75-79.

Three strokes behind the veteran Clelland (UC III) were Gary Price (Erin I) and Kevin Hughes (Scar II) at 157. Both made their second rounds count after large first round totals. Price tallied 81-76, while Hughes produced a combination of 83-74.

A problem was created when Doug Ross (Vic III), Brian Houston (COE) and Frank Crean (MBA I) tied at 158. Since the OQAA contingent is restricted to only five players, two of this last trio must be eliminated.

As of last night, no-one could say exactly how this will occur, but occur it most certainly will.

Last year's champion, Jeff Gollish, turned in an unflattering 159 and failed to make the team.

Tenants confront Queen's Park

Hundreds of Ontario tenants marched on Queen's Park Saturday demanding changes in the Landlord and Tenant Act which were recommended to Ontario Government 10 months ago.

They booed, jeered and heckled Minister of Trade and Development Stanley Randall when he tried to defend his government's position.

They applauded the call by Liberal NDP and OTA spokesmen for rent controls, standard lease forms, and the abolition of security deposits.

The march, from City Hall to the Parliament Buildings, was organized by the Ontario Tenants Association, headed by Victoria College professor Lee Patterson, and the Metro Tenants Association.

A 'vital and creative' department dies

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

"The struggle of the PSA (Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology) department at Simon Fraser University is the struggle of every university on the continent," Prof. Louis Feldhammer shouted.

"The struggle is about the kind of system you, the people, are going to have at university," he told a meeting of about 50 students in Sidney Smith Hall Friday.

Feldhammer is one of the eight suspended PSA faculty members.

Pat Hoffer, a teaching assistant and graduate student, explained that "the main issue is student parity."

She said the PSA department has a "different perception of what student and faculty are."

"Faculty is no longer a parent surrogate but a colleague in a learning experience," she said.

In the PSA department all decisions were made only with the agreement of both the student plena and the faculty plena. The two bodies met concurrently to discuss and vote on all aspects of department policy, Miss Hoffer said.

"The point is," Feldhammer added, "we're democratic. We are more democratic than any university in North America."

"And the trusteeship nullified that structure," Miss Hoffer said. "The gains we've made are going to be lost unless we're going to fight."

Feldhammer said nine or 10 faculty members will probably be fired.

"But the price is not too high if we can lose the rhetoric of the university," he said.

Feldhammer said he wanted a university that "serves the people who pay for it — the Indians, the blue collar workers."

"Instead, my bosses are the chairman of British Columbia Telephone, the B.C. Employers' Association chairman, the owner of the local racetrack.

"They recruit people for their corporations. That is the first thing a university does and don't let anyone fool you," he said.

"Fifty per cent of the students are from blue collar families and my boss is the president of the Employers' Association.

"We want to do research that the people want," Feldhammer said.

He explained how, in the counter-courses that the PSA department is now holding while on strike, research has been requested by local unions.

Some of the research being done includes an examination of the psychological effects of shift-work, research on noise pollution, an investigation into the profits of one of the largest corporations in B.C., Mac-Millan Bloedel.

"The university is the apex of those values this society must have to continue: competition, individualism and the 'I'm-all-right-screw-you-Jack'

Strand Fires 8 SFU profs

BURNABY (CUP) — The Simon Fraser University Administration Friday began dismissal procedures against eight of 11 striking professors from the Department of Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology, and placed the eight on suspension until their firing is completed.

In a letter to each of the professors, administration President Kenneth Strand made good an administration threat issued Sept. 24, the day the PSA Department went on strike.

The eight professors are deposed department head Mordecai Briemberg, Kathleen Aberle, John Leget, Prudence Wheelodon, Louis Feldhammer, Nathan Popkin, David Potter and Saghir Ahmad.

All of the professors except Ahmad were denied tenure, demoted or placed on probation by the administration tenure committee in late August, overturning recommendations made by the Department's own tenure committee. Ahmad, a visiting professor in the PSA Department, had strongly supported PSA resistance to the administration.

Strand and acting administration Vice-President L.M. Strivastava set a deadline of 5 p.m. Wednesday for the professors to declare that they would attend regularly sched-

Faculty is university's enemy decides Hart House debate

Faculty members could be the greatest threat to universities, says John Saywell, Dean of Arts and Science at York University.

"The root of our present campus discontent is a faculty which for a generation after the war refused to examine itself."

Dean Saywell was speaking at the 207th Hart House Debate Thursday night, on the topic "The Greatest Enemy of the University Is Its Faculty".

He said faculty is reluctant to accept changes in teaching methods, but added "It is now doing so under the gun. . . a most unsatisfactory method."

Prof. Saywell proposed that "the ranks within the faculty be abolished" so that all members would be equal.

David Saul (SGS), had accused faculty members of being mainly concerned with research and publication in order to supplement their incomes and raise their status."

He said faculty members, being "mainly interested in money and power, could care less about their students."

"For this fundamental reason — not being interested in teaching — they are the enemy of the university," said Saul.

John Winter (SGS) however, said that it was "naive to talk in stereotypes."

He said that his opponent had committed the "common intellectual error" of thinking that our current problems have "easily identifiable victims and villains."

Several speakers felt that the current definition of "research" had become greatly distorted. Prof. Saywell said he didn't believe a professor could "keep up his standards throughout a lifetime and teach properly without the type of stimulation that research offers."

The final vote was 41-26 in favor of the resolution.

4000 protest USSR anti-semitism

About 4,000 people marched on City Hall last night to protest suppression of the Jewish people in the Soviet Union.

The protest is an annual event on the Jewish holiday Simhat Torah in sympathy of Soviet Jews, who on this day every year gather to assert their Jewish identity.

Michael Schwartz, a student at Harvard, told the crowd at Convocation Hall before the march, "This is not a problem for Jews. It's a problem for the conscience of the world."

"The Jews should be given the right of cultural expression that is given other minority groups in Russia."

The crowd then marched by torchlight to City Hall, where they were joined by about 1,000 more people.

A letter sent to the Soviet Embassy was read. The rest of the demonstration consisted of folk songs and folk dancing.

It was feared that there would be trouble with anti-Zionist demonstrators, but none materialized.

public housing after hearing it described this morning" by Mr. Randall.

"Don't sit back and wait," she told the 350 tenants. "You've got to do it yourselves."

March organizers had expected a better turnout because of an OTA conference here yesterday.

When the masses failed to appear, one marcher suggested the tenants were more interested in the two afternoon football games than the protest.

attitude," he said.

Feldhammer said academic standards go up in a democratic atmosphere like the one that existed at SFU.

"The students are thirsty for knowledge because they have control over their own education. They ask me, 'Why are you teaching a course in kinship?"

"If I can't answer, then I have no right to teach. The questioning makes me a better intellectual," he said.

Feldhammer defined an intellectual as someone who knows something and acts upon it — "and if he doesn't (act upon it) he's not worth a tick".

The professor described his department as "vital and creative" because "we believe the social system we live in is not a given."

"The classic purpose of social science is to serve the people. We're interested in improvement, in change and in getting rid of the stink and insane asylum we live in," he said.

Feldhammer said he suspected the administration imposed trusteeship because the democratization of the department is a threat to the present nature of the university.

The PSA department is supported by SFU's psychology and philosophy departments. History students and faculty have joined the strike, and the English department is expected to walk out today.

It is a popular strike. Last week the Clansmen, the SFU football team, issued a petition of support.

Miss Hoffer and Prof. John Leggett have been touring campuses around the country at their own expense to explain what has happened at SFU.

Feldhammer asked everyone to write letters supporting the strike to Strand or to the Toronto newspapers.

uled classes and teach course — material as described in the university calendar and approved by the academic senate. Failure to respond, they said, would constitute grounds for dismissal.

None of the striking faculty responded.

The suspensions, according to Strand, became effective at noon Friday.

The professors were relieved of all teaching and committee duties, and lost all voting privileges "in any decision-making body in the university."

They are still eligible to draw salary, and welfare and library benefits — until their firing is completed.

Strand also forbade the professors to "engage in any activity that causes or may cause a disruption of the normal activities of this university" — in effect, a command to cease aiding or supporting the nine-day-old PSA strike.

According to Strand, the professors "abused the trust of those students who enrolled and paid for instruction" at SFU, and "who now find their programs of studies disrupted and thwarted" by their actions.

Course re-scheduling is particularly difficult at this time during the university year, Strand said, "and it may prove impossible to provide instruction in these courses."

In an open letter to SFU students issued today, Srivastava encouraged students affected by the PSA strike to apply for course transfers if they desired.

"Every effort will be made to accommodate transferring students," he said.

More than a wage dispute

The feature about the Hanes Hosiery workers, which appears on today's centre-spread is not just another story about a union fight.

First the battle is not just a question of workers wanting higher wages. Although over ninety per cent of the workers at the Hanes factory are women, the men hold the best paying jobs.

While the women work on the assembly-line, the men hold supervisory positions.

Traditionally women have been channelled into semi-skilled jobs in textiles, even if they have been qualified for positions with greater responsibility. Employers rationalize the situation by saying:

- (a) women are not as capable as men;
- (b) women cannot handle responsibility;
- (c) women are an employment risk, since they leave after a few years to get married.

Let's look at each of these points:

(a) Women are not given the opportunity to "be as capable as men". Strangely enough, when there is a great need for workers in certain key areas, women miraculously become capable. During the last war, when women took over men's jobs in factories, they proved equally capable.

Traditionally, women have been treated as a floating job market for employers. They are a labour force that can be channelled into any section of the economy where there is a labour shortage — teaching, nursing, secretarial work.

The textile industry is another field that exploits women. It appears to employ women for their ability to sew and knit, but the woman in Hanes functions as one unit on an assembly-line that requires little more feminine skill than the Ford plant in Oakville.

In fact, the work is extremely tough and "unfeminine." It is "piece-work", which means that a worker is paid for every piece of work she does. If she takes a coffee-break, it shows up in her paycheck.

The more work she does the more money she gets.

But there's one catch. When everyone at the factory becomes more efficient, the piece-work rate is raised — that is, each worker must do more work for the same pay.

(b) Although we are told that women can't handle responsibility, what are they doing in jobs as teachers and nurses?

And what are they doing bringing up children?

(c) Women are an employment risk, since they leave after a few years to get married.

Yes. They are. Especially if the company does not provide maternity leave. Hanes doesn't.

In fact, statistics have shown that men do not stay in jobs any longer than women, since they get transferred to other jobs. They are transferred to higher-paying positions, and they have more vertical mobility on the employment scale than women. Which brings us back to the same question of economic exploitation of women.

The women at Hanes have virtually no chance for promotion out of the assembly line circuit. Workers and management are two separate groups that are recruited from two separate labour pools.

"Pantyhose by Hanes. Sheer Indulgence"

So the Hanes strike is not just a simple matter of a group of workers pushing for higher wages. It's also a matter of women's oppression.

However, there is yet another aspect to the story. The Hanes story illustrates just how difficult it is for workers to win a strike, if the company is uncooperative.

It took real guts for the Hanes women to organize in a company that has a hard-line anti-union policy.

When they were finally unionized, an American union and an American company fought it out for seven months, and the Canadian workers in the Toronto branch-plant still stand on the pavement and wait.

The Textile Workers Union of America has 120,000 members, 20,000 Canadians.

How can a huge American union possibly fulfill the needs of Canadian workers?

The situation only reflects the branch-plant set-up of the American company and the Canadian subsidiary.

It is impossible for workers to challenge that domination, when it is inherent in our own union structure.

It is illegal for a company to import strikebreakers from outside Canada. But the Canadian government won't prosecute a company if the worker is from a branch-plant.

If the strike-breaker from the U.S. tells the border-guards that he is a permanent resident of Canada, they will never even ask where he is going.

A company has labour-legislation at its mercy:

- For instance, even if no violence occurs on the picket line, the company can apply for an injunction to limit or stop picketing. The strikers cannot either limit or stop the company from hiring strikebreakers.
- There is a professional strike-breaking company in Toronto called Anning Securities, which hires itself out to strike-bound companies.
- Even when a company refuses to offer higher wages to the strikers, it can offer higher wages to the strike-breakers in the plant. Hanes did that, and nobody stopped them.
- A company can demand and get police protection even when it reaches the ridiculous extreme of having three policemen to supervise four picketers at the Hanes plant in Rexdale.

Whose side is the law on?

THE VARSITY

The Varsity was founded in 1860 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto. Printed by Web Offset Publications Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

Around Campus

Grads trickle to SAC

Only two to three per cent of 3,472 full-time graduate students have paid Students' Administrative Council fees this year.

"Most joined to take advantage of charter flights," said Mrs. L. M. Cheron, the graduate fees clerk. Each year SAC arranges charter flights to Europe at a reduced rate.

"Hell, I was trying to get out it," commented a married graduate who refused to give his name. He said that membership in SAC gives an "unbending and redundant feeling."

He accused SAC of being too politicized and partisan. "I would rather give money to unwed mothers than draft dodgers," he said.

He referred to charter flights to Europe as "lollipops" to encourage other grads to join.

SAC vice-president Bob Barkwell was "happy" to learn of the estimated number of graduates paying the SAC fee.

It is "good" that the charter flight is attracting this number, he commented.

He said that the Graduate Student Union would realize that SAC represents GSU interests also and is not split artificially into two groups: grads and under-grads.

He predicted that the GSU executive will rejoin SAC, perhaps in two years.

He explained that SAC had not waged a stronger campaign to enlist grads because of the disciplinary problems that pervaded the campus.

Socialists clash with Engineers

The U of T Young Socialists ventured into the Engineering faculty last Thursday and came out slightly scarred.

Young Socialist, Hans Modlich (SGS), who hoped to clarify the misconceptions among his fellow engineers concerning the Campbell Report, was met with scorn at an "information" meeting at the Galbraith Building.

"The engineering students haven't had a chance to fully understand the implications of the Report", he said.

His major complaint was that the report ignored university autonomy since it allowed for the possibility of police intervention on campus.

Using the computer destruction at Sir George William University in Montreal last year as an example, Modlich maintained that campus violence was never a reality until police were called in.

He said the decision to request police intervention should not be left to the university president alone, but to an elected student official.

"Are you saying that the Campbell Report hasn't gone beyond the report of the university presidents?" asked Prof. G.A. Gow, secretary of the Engineering faculty.

"If indeed you are serious, then there's no point in staying. This is no longer a discussion," he said, and promptly walked out with another staff member.

Prof. S. M. Uzumeri accused Modlich of not being objective in his criticism of administrators, who are mostly "professors of the highest talents".

He left the meeting with the one other remaining staff members when Modlich said a poll should be taken among students on the question of university autonomy.

The remaining engineers continued to suggest that Modlich was avoiding their questions. They were particularly critical of the problem of equality in the law.

The Young Socialists insisted that the university must be completely independent. The other students strenuously disagreed.

Ontario professors seek 20 per cent salary hike

Ontario's 6,500 university professors are requesting an average salary increase of 20 per cent for the 1970-71 academic year.

Charles Hanly, executive vice-chairman of the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA) said that the average salary for Ontario professors and deans was $13,659 for 1968-69. OCUFA is the body which represents the various faculty associations before the Provincial Government.

Negotiations for this increase have not yet begun at U of T. The Association of Teaching Staff is still completing negotiations over last year's 10 per cent increase.

Hanly, a U of T philosophy professor, said that the increase "would have no effect on student fees". Although he feels there is mutual concern between the faculty and the students over fees and wages, there will be no attempt by OCUFA or the ATS to actively solicit student support.

Hanly said there is no danger of strike action by the professors.

In Rexdale 'the Hanes'

They use it to sell their high-quality, expensive hosiery through super-slick advertising pushing the "Hanes Nude Look". It sells.

As a gimmick to publicize the strike, the barrel incident was a long-term failure. After the initial flurry of publicity, both the press and the public forgot the strikers at Hanes.

The Hanes workers were used to being ignored. For six years women's wages hovered around the minimum wage ($1.30 an hour).

The company refused to pay hospital or medical benefits. Although 90 per cent of the workers were female, Hanes refused to consider maternity benefits. A woman could come back to work if a job were open, but in the process she lost all seniority.

"We asked for raises and they refused," says Mary O'Sullivan, a striker. "With rising costs we found we had less money than the year before.

"Every department went in to ask for a raise. The company said they would look into it."

When the situation did not improve, the women decided to organize. Inexperienced but determined, they opened their phone books, found the listing of the Textile Workers Union of America (TWA), and phoned for help.

The union's task was easy since the women had organized themselves. All they had to do was pass around the membership cards to the 85 per cent of the Hanes employees willing to join.

All the workers asked for was guidance and direction and the legitimacy of a union to ensure their gains.

The company and the union negotiated for seven months, but still there was no settlement.

The strike began March 3.

The workers demanded that the company increase wages, provide maternity leave, and pay all hospitalization and medical insurance benefits.

The first day of the strike, 35 of the 145 workers crossed the picket line, but the mood of the other 110 was optimistic.

The March 27 edition of the "Panty-Hose Special", a bi-weekly newsletter distributed by TWA to the strikers, reflected high hopes and enthusiasm.

"Despite the rain and the snow and the wine the spirit of the Hanes strikers continues to be high," it read.

"Rain or shine, the strikers do the bunny hop on the picket line."

"Of course we expected to win," says Mary O'Sullivan. "We wouldn't have gone on strike if we hadn't."

But the union was more pessimistic from the beginning.

"We knew it was a tough company," says Jim McConnell, TWA business agent. "We'd worked with them in the United States."

The battle was between an American union and an American company, but the Canadian workers of the Toronto branch-plant were right in the middle!

That was last March. Now in October the strike continues, but you'd never know it.

Last Monday morning at seven o'clock four strikers formed a feeble picket line in front of the Rexdale plant.

They carried no signs and wore no placards. Aside from a few disheartened growls directed at the strike-breakers, the tiny picket line remained silent.

Incoming workers ignored the pickets, and only the police kept close scrutiny.

Two of the three policemen stepped out of their cars to ensure that the strikers caused no damage. Satisfied, the police left only to return in a half hour for another cursory view of the scene.

When they returned the picketers were sitting in cars to wait out the rest of their three-and-a-half-hour duty.

One by one the strikers have drifted to other jobs, leaving only 60 of the original 110 officially on strike. The enthusiasm has evaporated and now the atmosphere is one of waiting it out until the bitter end.

The Hanes workers had legitimate grievances, a large union, and the will to fight out the battle.

What happened?

Although the company refused to offer wage increases during pre-strike

Last March a group of suburban housewives took off their clothes, donned barrels and waited for the press.

It didn't take long for the women to find themselves splashed through newspapers across the country.

People laughed at the pictures of the semi-nude barrel-clad women. But behind their "for-the-press" smiles the women didn't laugh.

Strikebound employees of the Hanes Hosiery plant in Rexdale, these women used the barrels in an attempt to embarrass Hanes and publicize the strike.

Officials at Hanes head offices in North Carolina must have smiled as the women in the barrels unknowingly advertised for the company they were fighting against.

Semi-nudity is nothing new to Hanes.

Hanes 'Nude Look' isn't glamorous---

It's a seven-month strike meetings with the union, soon after the strike began the company sent letters to the strikers' husbands and wives offering wage increases if the strikers returned to work.

"It was more of a bribe than anything else," says Mary O'Sullivan.

Strikers bundled up the letters and sent them back in a Hanes box with a note saying "Thanks, but no thanks."

Under Ontario law a company must deal with workers through the union. Because Hanes violated this law by sending letters to the strikers, TWA put the case before the Ontario Labor Board which granted the union the right to prosecute the company.

But the union didn't take advantage of this opportunity. "We didn't prosecute," explains McConnell, "because we wanted to keep the avenues open for negotiation."

Although little violence occurred on the picket line, Hanes requested and received police protection. Last June, three months after the strike began, the company tried but failed to establish an injunction against picketing.

TWA refused to stage an aggressive strike. "If you are aggressive you get an injunction right away," comments McConnell.

Although 90 per cent of the Hanes workers are women, men hold the most important jobs. They are the fixers who keep the machines running.

Six of the nine fixers joined the picket line but the tactic failed. The company simply imported fixers from their plant in the United States.

Under Canadian law it is illegal for a company to import strikebreakers. Canadian border points have a list of all strikebound companies.

However, according to Ernest Fanning, District Administration Supervisor of the Department of Immigration, "If a person is coming to Canada on a temporary basis, he can't work. If he is coming on a permanent basis we don't care where he is going."

When The Varsity informed him of the situation at Hanes, Fanning asked us to write a letter so the Department of Immigration could investigate.

McConnell says the Immigration Department has investigated Hanes.

"We applied to the Immigration Department about the fixers from the United States. They said they would not act as long as the people were employees of the United States company."

After the strike began Hanes had 35 workers. Now they have 97. To increase productivity the company bolstered shifts from eight to 12 hours. When a strikebound plant regains 80 per cent of its former productivity, the strikers are eligible for unemployment insurance.

A government investigation of the Hanes plant reported productivity at 63-65 per cent of the pre-strike level. Because of this the strikers cannot claim unemployment insurance.

In the battle between the company and the union the workers have come out as the losers.

"Since we have been on strike," notes Edna Shaw, "The company has raised the starting rates to $1.50 and now pays 50 per cent of hospitalization.

"If they had given us those benefits before, we probably wouldn't have gone on strike."

"If the company would just let the union in, I would be happy," she said. "The workers already have the raises and benefits we wanted."

It is doubtful that the union will be admitted. Ninety-five workers in the Hanes plant have signed a petition asked that the union be decertified.

At present the Ontario Labor Board is considering the application and will give a decision in two weeks.

If the Board allows a vote to be held, all workers hired since the strike will be eligible to vote.

Because strikers have drifted to other jobs, at present workers in the plant outnumber those on the picket line. Thus, votes against the union outnumber votes for the union.

Last week Mr. Stafford, manager of the Hanes Rexdale plant told the Varsity:

"The whole thing is in the hands of the Ontario Labor Board. At the present time we would rather not get involved in any newspaper controversy.

"If you call back in a couple of weeks perhaps we can give you more details."

His voice, confident and cheerful, was the voice of a man who knows he has enough votes to decertify the union.

Unlucky 13th for Vic?

Interfac Football starts tomorrow

By LYNDON LITTLE

It's been 76 years now since old Bill Mulock grudgingly kicked in the $17.50 necessary to buy a trophy for interfaculty football competition at the University of Toronto.

Since then, interfac football has been growing bigger and better every year — and No! Virginia, Vic has not won the championship every year since then! The Vic squad has taken the cup "only" the last 12 years.

Again this season there are twelve teams playing in three divisions with the top two teams in the first division and the winners in the other two advancing into the playoffs.

Each team plays six regular season games (two each against the other three members in their division) with the chance of two additional playoff games should they go all the way to the final.

Dentistry will move up to the second division this year while New College will replace them in the third. All other rankings are identical to last year's.

In the opening games tomorrow, Vic battles old rival St. Mikes and the Engineers play PhysEd. Back Campus at four chimes.

PREDICTIONS

FIRST DIVISION — VIC (6-0) was undefeated in this division last year despite some close games with St. Mikes and Physical Education. This year Vic will have 15 returnees. The biggest losers are Randy Myers and Dave Gee to the Blues. ENG. (1-6) have the highest number of returning players and should be improved despite, as coach Joe Crichton describes, being "shallow on the line". SMC (4-2) according to coach Vince Greco has "some holes to fill". PHE (1-5) rounds out the division.

SECOND DIVISION — Last year MEDS (6-0) won this division handily, rolling up scores of 39-1 and 34-6. However, look for increased competition from SCARBOROUGH COLLEGE (4-2) this year. DENTS (5-1) in the third division last year, and UC (1-5) complete this section.

THIRD DIVISION — NEW COLLEGE (2-4) in the second division last year should win here despite the loss of last year's star Q.B. Hartley Stern to the Blues. TRINITY (2-4), FORESTRY (3-3) and PHARMACY (2-4) will try to provide an upset.

CONSENSUS — The only factor that might stop Vic this year is complacency and with new head coach Tony Sepelac at the helm that is extremely unlikely. Ho hum.

Fencing trials begin tonight at 5

A great Fencing comeback is underway. Two Varsity squads will oppose all visiting Fencing Teams. Twelve guys with endurance and fencing ability will finally be our OQAA representatives.

Inter-squad trials begin tonight at 5:30 in the Fencing Salle. Come and watch — see it as it happens.

Soccer Blues held to 2-2 draw by Mac

By LYNDON LITTLE

The Soccer Blues opened their regular season play Saturday with a 2-2 tie against McMaster Marauders in Hamilton.

Judging from Saturday's play the Blues will need to show a marked improvement if they are to successfully defend the Blackwood Trophy which they have won the last five years.

The first half was scoreless but McMaster set the tempo of play early as they continually had the Varsity squad pinned in their own end. The Marauders had several good scoring chances with the best one coming on a hard, rising, 25 yarder from center-forward Eric Combe which just grazed the top of the goal. The Blues best opportunity of the first half came on a long drive by Frank Soppelsa at the 31 minute mark.

The Toronto side started better in the second half but Mac scored first on a short tip in by Combe set up by right-half Bill Miller at 50 minutes.

Varsity then put on a determined effort to get back in the game and were rewarded ten minutes later with two quick goals.

Fullback Stan Bognucki scored the first one on a fine individual effort as he took a hard shot from 25 yards out which rebounded off the crossbar and back towards him. He then moved in and headed the rebound towards the corner of the goal but it struck the left upright and stayed out. However, thanks to good follow-up he was right on top of the play and was there to tuck the ball in the corner.

Just one minute later, Blues' Ken Cancellera took advantage of a penalty shot to give Toronto a 2-1 lead.

Unfortunately, the McMaster team was playing too well for the Blues to hold the lead. At the 90 minute mark, Mac took advantage of a defensive lapse by Varsity which left veteran fullback Jim Kalman alone to mark three Marauders in front of the Blues' goal. The result was predictable as Mac's Tony Piccoli drove a dandy shot to the top left hand corner to gain the tie.

The last ten minutes of play saw the Blues hanging on as McMaster, completely in control, went all out for the win.

Head coach Bob Nicol used words such as "disappointing" to describe his team's effort.

He hinted that perhaps too many members on the team were counting on the past record of Varsity soccer to carry them through the games.

FREE KICKS — JOHN GERO, who was shut out against Mac, was the Blues' leading scorer in the exhibition series with four goals. . . Last year's scoring champion and Varsity great, JIM LEFKOS, is presently the leading scorer in the semi-pro American Soccer League. Jim is playing with the Syracuse Scorpions. . .

When the McMaster side makes it's visit to Toronto on Oct. 29 watch RON BYRCE and TULLIO VOLPE closely. They are two of the smallest but most exciting players in the league.

Harriers '2nd' in Invitational

U of T Harriers came second Saturday in the Royal Military College Invitational Harrier Race, losing only to the University of Guelph A team and beating four other universities.

The cross-country race over a 4.4 mile course was won by Grant McClaren of Guelph with a time of 20 minutes 54 seconds.

Top man for Toronto was Rich Pyne, who finished fourth. Other Toronto runners were Dave Tong (ninth), Bob Knuckey (twelfth), Mike Lauzon (fifteenth) and Peter Pimm (seventeenth).

Blues need another rally, then clobber Mac 35-16

By PAUL CARSON

It's rather difficult to summon enough energy to report the disappointing and disturbing performance Blues turned in Saturday, but as there's no honorable (or effective) method of coping out, here goes.

Blues won it rather handily. Score 35-16. Now that's over with, forget the score.

Once again, the defence saved the day for Varsity.

With Mac ahead 16-13 in the third quarter, a bad snap plus a heavy Toronto rush forced Marauder punter Alec Lockington to hurry his kick.

The rather short line drive was caught by Peter Raham on the Varsity 35. Raham appeared quite surprised (he was protecting against a fake pass — Mac pulled one in the first half and it worked) but not too surprised to head for touchdown territory.

Most of the Mac tacklers were trapped downfield and when Bart D'Onofrio wiped out Vince Lyons with a fantastic block, Raham was gone.

Blues defence then stopped Mac's running, made a couple of interceptions, and that was that.

The secondary grabbed off four Tanner aerials in all (Ortved, Kishimoto, Raham, Kirkpatrick) and the fearsome foursome plus friends held Mac to an embarrassing total of only 49 yards along the ground.

Blues started quickly with some hard up the gut running from fullback Bill Stankovic and a 6 yard pass to Cor Doret for the opening touchdown.

Then they went to sleep and Mac controlled the remainder of the first half.

Tanner burned Lamantia for an 82-yard td strike to flanker Bob Baytor; just before half-time excellent pass blocking and sloppy Varsity coverage allowed the same duo to connect again.

Raham dragged Baytor out of the end zone and Tanner was forced to sneak over on the next play.

In the last minute before the interval, a short McKay punt and a roughing penalty to Rick Agro set up a 37-yard field goal by Lockington.

When Blues decided to play for real, Eric Walter beat Mac's best defender Pete Quinlan for a 19-yard td. Then came Raham's ramble.

McKay boomed a 65-yard single and sophomore halfback Walt Sehr shook off his letbergery to scoot for 12 yards and another major score.

RookieQB Wayne Dunkley fumbled a sure touchdown into a single and the officials contributed the final 7 on the last play of the game by calling Mac's Bob Adams for breathing too hard on Blues Dave Quibell.

Doret ran the ultimate post pattern on the extra play and Dunkley hit him perfectly.

So Blues won with a decidedly sub-par effort mainly because the slow-footed Macmen are incapable of running.

Varsity has the talent and the coaching to go all the way this year, but they must start playing four quarters of football each time out. Another display like this one against McGill and they'll be knocked on their fat complacent asses.

It's easy to hold onto the ball when you've got two right hands, says Varsity rookie Cor Doret. Watching his amazing ledgerdemean are befuddled Macmen Greg White (21) and Ned Kozowsky (76).

Blues standout defensive halfback Peter Raham (22) crosses the McMaster goalline for the winning touchdown in Saturday's game. Raham returned a Mac punt 75 yards as Marauder defenders Joe Watt (69), Jamie Spears (38) and John Smees (58) look on helplessly. photo by jim cowan

Ruggerites blast to triple win

By DAN McALISTER

Varsity rugger teams, on momentum gained from a 21-9 win last Wednesday over the Old Boys, rolled to a double win at McMaster Saturday, beating both Mac's first and second teams.

The Firsts' played very well in the first and last fifteen minutes of the match. The rest of the play mired in the bad, inexperienced technique of the Mac team that cramped the Blues' style.

For the first time this season, there were several forward rushes that very nearly resulted in tries but were foiled by forward pass rulings. These plays are made possible by the more uniform conditioning of the forwards enabling them to move in a tight cohesive pack. The final score was Toronto 16, McMaster 6.

The Toronto seconds soundly trounced the Red side. The Mac team was even less proficient than their firsts. Toronto players, eager for positions on the First team, took advantage of the situation and dominated the entire game winning almost all of the lineouts, tight and loose scrums and scoring all of the points as well.

Backs Pierre and Hartley, who has been sidelined by an ankle injury, played exceptionally well, scoring tries and tackling very hard. Player coach Nankeville, though not in top condition, through wily positioning, was in the right place at the right time and scored twice. His convert attempt, though from directly in front of the posts, veered sharply off towards the sideline, probably because he wasn't wearing his glasses.

The final score: Toronto 27, McMaster 0.

Last Wednesday, glowing with new power and finesse, they took a 21-9 decision over the U of T Old Boys.

The match was very open in the first half but sure tackling on both sides prevented a high score. A try by McKenna, converted by Owens, a penalty goal by Cairns and one by the Old Boys made the score at the half Blues 8, Old Boys 3.

In the second half, the superior conditioning of the Blues paid off. The Old Boys were held to two tries, the first and the last of the half; neither was converted.

New man Bob Hutchinson and reliable Chris Maher produced two beautiful tries for the Firsts and both were converted by fly-half Ian Owens. The other three points of the match were scored on a penalty goal by Owens.

Rookie sensation Cor Doret again, this time lying in the Mac endzone after catching Wayne Dunkley's td pass on his knees right in front of the tuning far goal post. Mac's Pete Quinlan (14) and Dane Tutton (18) are caught out of position. The play was made possible by a goofy pass interference call involving Varsity end Dave Quibell (72). photos by jim cowan

Cut class barriers to education, new study demands

By MARY KATE ROWAN

A study on the Ontario Student Awards Program has reported that OSAP is inadequate and does not meet the needs of the low-income student.

The report, Student Aid and Access to Higher Education in Ontario, received financial support from the Department of University Affairs and the Ford Foundation Research Program. It recommends that the present OSAP program be revamped to ensure universal accessibility to Ontario universities.

The report was written by Edmund Clark, David Cook, George Fallis and Michael Kent.

It recommends that:
• low income not be a barrier to the pursuit of education at any level in Ontario

- the present loan-grant OSAP system be replaced by a full grant system without reducing the amount of the awards

- every grade 11 student pre-apply for assistance, to ensure that all students become aware of the plan

- the government adopt a policy of stringent checks into the validity of applications and establish an appeal board, independent of the initial allocating body, with discretionary power to alter awards which are successfully appealed.

- the Ontario Government reform the tax structure to eliminate all major "regressive taxes" and to rely exclusively upon progressive sources for its revenue.

The study used three criteria to determine the most effective form of assistance:

- the extent to which the plan enables a needy student to receive the necessary funds
- the extent to which it makes education equally accessible to everyone

- the extent to which the award system affects the individual's decision to go on to post-secondary education

THREE PROGRAMS

Three student award programs were considered — a loan scheme, OSAP (loans and grants) and a salary scheme.

All three meet the first requirement of providing the necessary funds.

According to the study, only a salary system ensures universal accessibility to higher education because "both a loan scheme and OSAP force students of low income to go into debt".

"Surely in a field so relevant to personal development we cannot design the system making the road easier for the upper income student."

The rationale behind student assistance for higher education is to ensure that cost is not a barrier.

"An aid scheme works by altering the decision-making process of students who are unsure about continuing," argues the report.

But the student makes the crucial decision about higher education when he enters grade nine and chooses a four or five year stream.

The study reports that only 40 per cent of students in grade nine "have heard" of OSAP.

UNREASONABLE IDEA

It further reports that "those among the lower income groups in grade 9 who want to go on to university have an unreasonable idea of the cost."

"These students envisage post-secondary education as expensive. In fact they greatly exaggerate its costs. It appears to them as alien, dominated by middle and upper class students."

However, all students regardless of their economic situation realize both the need for higher education and the benefits. For those in lower income

Lower-income students have little hope of getting past high-school

By TREVOR SPURR

A report entitled Student Aid and Access to Higher Education has found a significant difference in the success of students from different economic backgrounds.

"Students from poorer backgrounds, in greater numbers than students from high income families fail to complete high school," it says.

While one in two students from families with incomes above 10,000 dollars make it to Grade 13, only one in four students from families with incomes of less than 5,000 dollars achieve the same level.

The report also found that, among students surveyed, the IQ tests of the poorer students were generally lower than those from wealthier families. The researchers divided students' families into four income levels (less than $5,000, $5,000 to $8,000, $8,000 to $10,000, and more than $10,000 dollars).

Thirty-three per cent of the lowest income group had an IQ of less than 100, while 15 per cent of those in the highest income group had a similar score.

Conversely, 30 per cent of the wealthier group had an IQ of over 120 in comparison to only 13 per cent of the poorer group.

The report says this difference is not because of genetic inferiority, but a result of environment.

"The extreme difference in IQ scores between the classes can be viewed as objective evidence of the deprivation certain classes in society are currently enduring. Intelligence tests measure not potential ability but achieved ability," it says.

ENVIRONMENT

The IQ test measures the ability of the student to absorb the values and drives of the incentive system in which he lives. Poorer students do not live in an environment conducive to learning these values.

"Unlike their middle class counterparts, poor adolescents do not have access to adults who have the power and desire to assist in the socialization process. Among the poor there is a real shortage of adults who can actually show and tell the adolescent what he should be doing in order to make the grade," the report says in quoting David Gottlieb.

The report also shows a striking difference in the desires and expectations of the different economic groups.

Of the low income groups, 72 per cent desired post-secondary education but only 53 per cent actually expected to get it. In contrast, among the highest group 90 per cent desired it and 85 per cent expected to attain it.

The "reality adjustment" that the poor must undergo is 19 per cent as opposed to only 5 per cent of the wealthy group.

"A bias also exists in terms of what type of post-secondary education those of each class planned to pursue," the report continues.

Across all grades 38 per cent of the poor desired university

U of T students authored controversial report

By TREVOR SPURR

The recommendations of a report undertaken by four University of Toronto students and released this week have far-reaching implications for students' accessibility to universities in this province.

The report, entitled Student Aid and Access to Higher Education in Ontario, was originally undertaken to discover if the present OSAP program of student aid was working effectively but its scope was expanded.

"We found that we had to expand into the whole problem of accessibility and we were able to do this because we were in complete control of the project," said Michael Kent one of the students, in an interview Tuesday.

Of the four students involved, Edmund Clark, David Cook, and George Fallis were of the Political Economy Department and Michael Kent was in the Department of Psychology.

Clark and Fallis are currently doing graduate work in the United States. Cook is in the School of Graduate Studies at the University of Toronto.

The study was financed by the Department of University Affairs and the Ford Foundation. The financing was arranged by Professor R.W. Judy of U of T.

The project was initially undertaken by Edmund Clark who wrote a well-received report on the student housing situation at the university last year. Clark then hired the other students involved.

The research was conducted in an atmosphere of genuine enthusiasm and cooperation as reflected in the easy-flowing style of the report, said Kent. All members of the group received equal salaries and had equal authority.

groups government assistance is the only answer.

To determine student reaction towards borrowing money, the researchers sent out a questionnaire. Results indicate that students generally are very uncertain about borrowing money, especially in the lower grades.

By grade 13 only 11 per cent of students indicated they would not borrow money for their education. However, by grade 13 a student has made his decision about higher education.

PUBLICITY NEEDED

The report emphasizes this and argues that a good financing program must be widely publicized to students in the early high school grades, especially grade 9.

Since students view OSAP as a loan program the report recommends that "the salary program would be most effective in encouraging students to proceed".

Since students are generally opposed to borrowing money and regard OSAP as a loan pool, OSAP is not effective in encouraging students to proceed with their education.

Students from low-income families who reach grade 13 are "highly motivated and will proceed if any sort of aid program is offered which will enable them to overcome the barrier of tuition and living costs," says the report.

Therefore, to these students, OSAP is ineffective as an incentive to higher education.

GRANT

As a replacement for the existing OSAP structures the study says "the only effective, and just as significant, the only equitable aid scheme would be one which would provide grants to cover all educational costs and living expenses for any student who lacked the money to pay for such costs himself."

The report says that government should be willing to experiment and argues that "governments are formed in order to provide citizens with services which they as individuals cannot."

Therefore, the study recommends a pilot study with the following features:

- an area in the province where incomes are low would be chosen for the study
- "Community-corporations" should be established to provide employment to all who seek it
- all work of all types should be rewarded according to a common scale based upon the number of dependents
- a co-ordinated attack on the many problems which accompany income deprivation should be made
- this attack should include co-operative medical and dental clinics, a Head Start program, and a comprehensive housing project.
- all those involved in these supportive programs should be remunerated on the same basis and according to the common scale as those in the community-corporations
- emphasis should be placed on control of the organizations directly by the people in the community
- the number of families should not be more than 2,000 in order that sufficient experimental controls and the essence of the project be maintained.

INEQUALITY

The four students state that "it is apparent that the concept of total equality in all that society has to offer involves very real theoretical and practical problems.

"We find it equally apparent however, that the present degree of inequality is far beyond that which is functionally necessary for the operation of the society.

"Our conclusions left no doubt that a radical solution was necessary. A major commitment by not only the government but the population as a whole is essential if real progress is to be made.

"Nevertheless it was clear to us that no report could allude to hope to bring such a commitment, that the mere recommendation of a movement towards equality was not sufficient.

"The barriers presented by unequal income are so great that no cultural program will be able to leave a meaningful effect until they are eradicated.

"A child who spends 60 per cent of his day in a deprived environment cannot be rescued by spending 30 per cent in a middle class one.

"Even keeping a child in school for eight hours a day does not overcome the dominance of his home environment."

The following sums up the essential recommendations and philosophy of the study:

"A grant scheme is essential if an awards program is to have a long term effect of breaking down the class barriers to equality of opportunity."

"A loan scheme would serve to accentuate the problem. A grant based awards program will not, however, by itself eliminate the problem.

"The situation which we found is so severe, that only a more sweeping attack on the environmental forces causing the problem can hope to remedy it."

in contrast 69 per cent of the wealthy.

WHY?

During the early years of high school, a student from the low-income group develops ambitions and expectations lower than those of the high-income group. Then he makes decisions that mean he will not get post-secondary education.

In a section of the report titled "Why?", the authors explicitly attribute unequal accessibility to the class-structure of our society.

"While the present society has generally adopted a mythology which denies the existence of classes, it is clear that they do exist," the report states. "Different groups have quite distinct life patterns. Their values and ambitions differ from those of other groups. They enjoy unequally the benefits of society."

"Class, in the broad sense of the word, clearly is a determining factor of the child's ability," the report adds. "The lower class child comes from a home in which he is materially and culturally deprived of the variety of quality stimuli necessary for good intellectual maturation.

"By the time the child reaches school, he is already behind his peers from middle or upper class families."

GAP WIDENED

The report describes the effect on a student proceeding through the school system:

"He has entered an environment where values and talents other than his own are stressed. Initially, he was behind his classmates. This gap has not narrowed, but instead has widened because of negative reinforcement and growing alienation. The difficulty of the work increases, the sacrifice becomes greater. At the same time, the motivation to go on lessens. In all probability he has passed the educational attainment of his parents. Soon he feels that he needs little more to get as far as his father did.

"Staying in school longer serves only the purpose of upward mobility. The desire for this is gradually outweighed by the costs involved. Finally he gives up and quits."

archal structure involved in presenting proposals," he said.

The financial grant covered travel costs, salaries, computer time, and the printing of 10,000 copies of a questionnaire that formed the basis of the report.

The questionnaire was administered to 8,700 students highly representative of the various social and economic backgrounds in twenty-five schools across the province. In this way the researchers were able to compare the values, ambitions, and performance of the students.

The report will be presented to the department of University Affairs this Friday at the Maclean Hunter Building with all four researchers in attendance. It is expected that it will be a closed meeting.

Report on access and aid is good analysis

At last the phrase "universal accessibility" — bandied about by everyone from Trotskyites to cabinet ministers — has been discussed in a realistic way.

Last week a group of four U of T students produced a report called "Student Aid and Access to Higher Education in Ontario."

The report, which will be presented to the Provincial Government's Department of University Affairs Friday, exposes just how inadequate the present Ontario Student Awards Plan is and considers some alternatives.

The present OSAP system is a farce. Although it was designed to help lower-income students get to university, it in no way meets their needs.

Less than half of the OSAP budget, which comprises only one per cent of the total Provincial budget, goes to student grants. The rest goes to loans.

A loans system puts the lower-income student at a distinct disadvantage, not only during his university career, but after graduating.

His disadvantage is built right into the OSAP awards system.

His financial insecurity leaves him with a debt that a higher-income student would not accumulate.

The report on student aid and access proposes that all OSAP aid be in the form of pure grants.

It also recommends that the government stringently check the validity of every OSAP application.

The report asks the government to publicize such a new awards program, so that students will know, when they are in high school, that they have a chance of getting to university.

The lower income group of Grade 9 students questioned by the researchers "envisioned post-secondary education as expensive. In fact, they greatly exaggerated its cost. It appears to them as alien, dominated by middle and upper class students."

The report's short-term recommendations to the government provide a better scheme than the present OSAP. But they do not constitute universal accessibility.

Only rhetorically in the first recommendation:

"That the Province of Ontario guarantee that lack of income shall be no barrier to the pursuit of education at any level."

Even the students who compiled the study realize that juggling with a completely inadequate OSAP scheme cannot provide universal accessibility.

"The group ideally would not have made any recommendations on student awards," says Michael Kent, one of the researchers. "Student awards are only marginal in changing the socio-economic mix."

Kent and the three other students — Ed Clark, David Cook, and George Fallis — discovered that the barriers to higher education are rooted so deeply in our society that merely changing the mechanism of an inadequate awards system cannot solve the problem of universal accessibility.

The study found the roots in the class-structure of our society.

Our present educational system only reinforces the present class structure by streaming students into a hierarchy of community colleges, vocational schools, and universities.

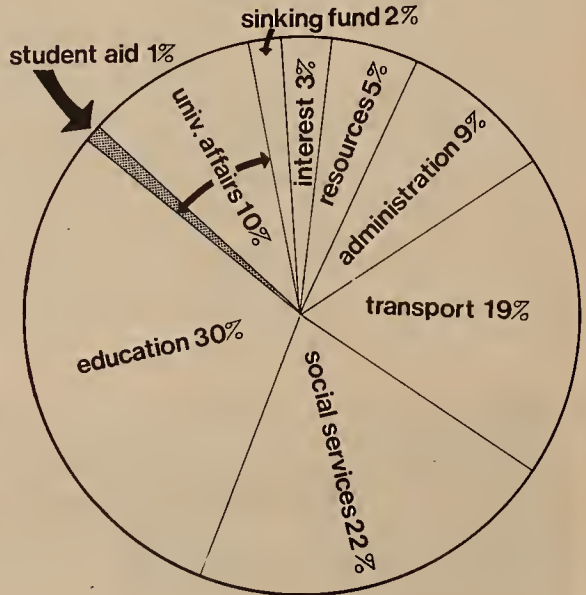

The report discovered that high-school students from lower-income families actually did not desire to go to university as much as those from higher-income groups, although they were equally aware of the value of university.

And statistics showed that lower-income students had little hope of making it to university, although they might have wished to.

This gap between desire and expectation is much wider for the lower-income student than for his wealthier counterpart.

The report explains that reasons lie in environment, a product of the family's income:

ALLOCATION OF ONTARIO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT SPENDING 1967

source: provincial public accounts 1967-68

OSAP guarantees education for all? This pie-chart is one item in a study prepared by U of T students who have shown OSAP to be a farce.

"The barriers presented by unequal income are so great that no cultural program will be able to have a meaningful effect until they are eradicated. A child who spends 60 per cent of his day in a deprived environment cannot be rescued by spending 30 per cent in a middle class one. . . Even keeping a child in school for eight hours a day does not overcome the dominance of his home environment."

The report's short-term recommendations are naturally limited in scope, since they are being offered to the Department of University Affairs, which is hardly determined to radically alter our tax structure.

A government is more the product of an economy that its antiodote.

But the students' report is extremely valuable — not so much for its recommendations but for its unprecedented research into the whole class-nature of educational opportunity.

The study debunks the myth that we have impartial IQ tests, fair and adequate aid, and classless classrooms.

"Guidance teachers could be made more aware of their middle class biases and greater emphasis could be put on encouraging lower class students to attempt academic courses," the report suggests.

Among the long-term solutions, the report recommends a small-scale model to test universal accessibility — an interesting proposal that might produce even more evidence that our present taxation structure is grossly unfair.

The Department of University Affairs will consider the report for the first time Friday.

The Provincial government must consider this report seriously, if it wants to inject any credibility into its Golden-Land-of-Opportunity rhetoric.

Nyerere condemns West's support of African racism

By PETER HAWLEY

Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere exploded the popular Western myth that white supremacy in southern Africa is the only source of stability on the continent, when he spoke at Convocation Hall last week.

The greatest threat to stability in Africa, he said, is the enforced policy of racism in South Africa, the Portuguese colonies, and Britain's colony of Rhodesia.

Nyerere's speech is the most forthright statement ever made by a leader of a developing African nation about the threat of white supremacy to African nations in the north.

"We can only give top priority to the questions of developing individual freedom and individual dignity when the whole of Africa is free," Nyerere said.

"The principles of freedom and equality have no validity unless they are of universal validity," Nyerere said "and the principle of racial supremacy is invalid unless it is universally valid. Conflict between these two conceptions of humanity is inevitable. Where they meet, the conflict will be an active one.

"Whatever the emotions may be, the fact is that Tanzania's freedom is itself in jeopardy while colonialism remains dominant on our borders."

PEOPLE'S WAR

Nyerere emphasized the sadness with which his and other African nations committed themselves to the freedom movements.

"We have a deep desire for a peaceful transfer of power to the people," he said. "But if the door is locked and bolted, and the present guardians of the door have refused to turn the key or pull the bolts, the choice is very straightforward. Either you accept the lack of freedom or you break the door down.

Nyerere was speaking in Canada — and the West received the main brunt of his attack.

"My real point is not the fact of the west's economic involvement. I am not accusing the western powers of conscious racialism, but of a preoccupation with conflicts which are at present irrelevant to the situation in Africa. N.A.T.O. is a Western military alliance against East European communism — perhaps against communism itself — and Portugal is a member of N.A.T.O. South Africa claims to be a bastion against communism in Africa. The regime in Rhodesia claims it is defending its part of Africa against communist-inspired chaos.

BETRAYAL OF DEMOCRACY

"... The real danger which worries me is that the West will accept this interpretation and that it will in consequence betray its own principles by supporting these southern African regimes. The principle of self determination and of national freedom is part of the democratic ideal. It is a shrine in all the greatest philosophies and documents of the Western world. But will the West recognize that this is the question at issue in southern Africa?"

Nyerere said African nations have no arms to give the freedom movements.

"If the Western powers will not put pressure on their friends to secure peaceful change, is it likely that they will supply arms to those who in desperation have decided to get change by force. We all know the answer. The freedom these things. So we accept arms from communist states, and say 'thank you' for them."

Nyerere outlined the military and economic support given by the West to southern Africa. He said that it was because of Portugal's membership in NATO and in EFTA that it was able to spend 47 per cent of its budget on "overseas Nyerere added.

"The question is not whether the Western powers are able to exert pressure on southern Africa but whether they are willing to do so."

CONFLICT OF RACES

Nyerere feared the West would accept the ideological arguments of southern Africa, point to the communist weapons used by the freedom movements, and align themselves with the racist and fascist states in southern Africa.

"The freedom struggle will in reality become part of the world ideological struggle as it is now wrongly alleged to be," he said.

"I believe that if this is allowed to happen we are liable to finish up with an even more disastrous conflict — a conflict of the races. For Africa and the West are liable to end up on opposite sides of the barricades and Africa will have the support of Asia and large parts of Latin America." This color pattern might only be broken by support of the freedom fighters from Russia and East European communists.

"Indeed it may be that the liberal humanitarians of Western Europe and North America may find themselves grateful to the white communists!"

And with what urgency did Nyerere speak? "I am talking of what seems to me," he said, "to be a terrifying series of events unless some effort is made to break the chain of logic in African and Western bloc relations. We are not at the eleventh hour; We are past the twelfth hour."

movements will therefore get their arms from the communist powers. And these communist powers will be their exclusive suppliers."

Africa is occupied by an alien power now; its people are suffering under minority domination now. We have to fight defense" — which means "Maintenance of colonialism in Africa."

The refusal of Britain to enforce its decisions against the illegal Rhodesian regime by direct intervention reflects a sense of involvement with Rhodesia's dominant minority,

Review of the Press

By PETER HAWLEY

CBC's petty treatment of Julius Nyerere's visit to Canada leads one to ask once again whether CBC is disintegrating as an effective agency through which Canadian people can become informed about vital issues in the world today.

CBC knew that Nyerere, President of Tanzania, was visiting Canada at least two months before his arrival. It was informed almost one month ago that Nyerere would grant no private press conferences or interviews but would grant one public statement in Canada — in Convocation Hall last week.

The press and the CBC knew that Nyerere's Convocation Hall speech would be a major policy statement about his nation's position towards southern Africa.

How did CBC react? By attempting to get Nyerere to face a panel of students who were supposed to confront him with questions. CBC has a fixation about confronting important figures with students. In Nyerere's case, it would only have served to debase the importance and urgency of Nyerere's message. Nyerere refused to face the students because he felt it would detract from his U of T address. But at the last minute agreed to grant a personal one-hour interview to be shared by CBC News and Public Affairs Departments in Ottawa.

NO RESEARCH

CBC TV News chose an interviewer whose ineptitude about African problems soon became evident to attending members of the press. He bragged to one reporter that he did no background research.

"I never research things like this," he said.

The interviewer chose to concentrate on Tanzania's relations with the western and eastern blocs. Nyerere answered a question about aid from China by saying that it was given with more idealism and fewer strings than that from any other nation.

The interviewer then asked, "Have you succeeded in playing the east against the west?"

Nyerere dismissed the question by saying he had no power to play east against west and wanted no part of the problems of either.

The News Department used less than one and a half minutes for its broadcast, and left only five minutes of film for Hugh Winsor who was to interview Nyerere for Public Affairs TV. Winsor has spent three years in East Africa.

Nyerere had good reason not to wish to grant an interview to the Canadian press. His statement at Convocation Hall was carefully prepared and made perfectly clear what Tanzania's position was. He chose to make his important policy statement here because he believed that it would be received by a conscientious and scholarly audience.

PRE-OCCUPIED WITH SPECTACLE

Nyerere's personal secretary told members of the Canadian press before he came to Toronto that he was concerned with the poor press he had received at the 1968 London Commonwealth Conference, and that he wanted to tell the world of the urgency of the southern African situation at Convocation Hall.

But neither CBC nor CTV were present at Convocation Hall. And Nyerere's advice to all western nations — particularly Canada — will fall on few ears. CBC TV did not mention Nyerere's address on either the local or national news.

Having faced a budget cut, the CBC should work even harder to produce shows of high quality, even if it means cutting the quantity of items it produces. It seems to be pre-occupied with spectacle to the detriment of content.

The Canadian Government invited Nyerere to Canada to discuss African issues. He chose Toronto, the national headquarters of CBC to make an important statement about a critical issue.

The Canadian Government will not know how its voters respond to Nyerere's ideas except through the long ovation he received at Convocation Hall. His speech was a classic and would have been an important reference document for CBC and television networks in other nations.

But the CBC fumbled it. It seems that CBC is becoming even more parochial than it has been in the past.

Sirs,

In my mind, the office of "President of the University" carries with it a certain innate dignity, to which should be added, the personal worthiness of the man who holds that office. Whatever has happened to the dignity of our President, Dr. Claude Bissell?

What has particularly sparked this query is an assembly which I attended last Wednesday in Convocation Hall — a gathering to hear the honourable President Julius K. Nyerere of Tanzania open the International Studies Programme at U of T. I, among others, was impressed by the personal dignity of our speaker, his quiet bearing, his dynamism at the podium. In contrast with this self-possession, however, Dr. Bissell spent many minutes of the hour shifting positions in his chair, scratching his head, rearranging the folds of his formal robe and staring vacantly at the floor. He had the opportunity to rise from his chair twice: the first time, he presented a degree to our guest which he did with aplomb but immediately slouched back to his seat. The second time was a badly mangled thank-you to the speaker. Dr. Bissell got up immediately upon the end of the speech and approached the mike. Without waiting for the thundering applause to stop, without summoning a quiet house, without commanding the attentiveness which surely this speaker deserved, our president mumbled several words while bent over the P.A. system and returned to sprawl in his chair for the third time.

I have never written a letter as uniformly critical as this one. Perhaps it was the contrast of the quiet dignity of President Nyerere with the undignified behaviour of his host that heightened my disappointment at Bissell's showing. Perhaps it was the strain that our President has been under over the past few weeks that prevented a statelier presentation. Or, perhaps it was not.

Sir,

Remember the Mass Meeting at Convocation Hall last Wednesday (Oct. 1)? Well, a funny thing happened to me on the way. When I arrived at this meeting it was already massed, with a couple of hundred people milling outside around the loudspeakers.

Although I came late and the hall was filled, I still wanted to try to get in. Walking around the building, I entered a side door to the main foyer of Simcoe Hall and approached the door leading to the Hall, in front of which stood a campus policeman.

I asked him if this was the door to Convocation Hall. He replied that it was, but nobody else could go in.

I said, "alright" but just then two women came out of the hall. I inquired of the officer if I could replace one of them in the Hall and he said "no" because the Hall was filled and he had orders not to let anybody in. I said okay and turned to leave.

Just then two men in jackets and tie approached the officer. They whispered something and he allowed them into the Hall. Naturally I wondered about this and asked the officer why they were let in. He said, "They're members of the university." Offended, I emphatically said that I too was a member of the university. But he countered that although that was true, "... you're ONLY A STUDENT." I was too flabbergasted to reply and left.

lecture on discipline

Sir,

I was dismayed last Wednesday by the spectacle of the Engineering students' takeover at Convocation Hall. It was evident that their presence had little to do with the issue at hand: they wanted merely to put down other students with whom they did not agree.

The Engineering students did President Bissell little honour in their support. They did the University little honour in their unwillingness to participate seriously.

However, I was not only dismayed but disheartened by what I can only hope was not a representative response by a member of the University faculty.

This gentleman, whose name I do not know, used discussion time before the vote on the motion to accept President Bissell's statement not to speak to the motion but to lecture the students on discipline, with appropriate puns and lecture platform remarks.

One might have hoped that the faculty at least would speak seriously to the motion at hand. But then, perhaps this is a part of what University reform is all about.

It's a good year for the button salesman

CONTRARY to the prophecies of Richard Nixon, widespread demonstrations broke out at United States college campuses this September as the US braced for what could be a very tumultuous year.

In Ann Arbor, Mich., more than 2500 students turned back police who came to evict 200 occupiers of the Literature, Science and Arts Building at the University of Michigan. But after 14 hours of demands that students and faculty be given charge of a proposed university bookstore, 400 police reinforcements from the state highway patrol broke through the crowd.

More than 25 demonstrators were injured — one girl, seriously — and 123 students were arrested.

At Madison, Wis., more than 2000 protestors led by radical Catholic priest James Groppi took over the state legislature, demanding higher welfare payments for the unemployed. The crowd burst through locked assembly doors and crowded the assembly chambers.

Wisconsin Governor Warren Knowles activated 1000 national guardsmen and after conferences with the state attorney general, Father Groppi pulled his forces out.

And in Los Angeles, the UCLA campus was tense for a while as the regents of the eight-campus University of California fired black philosophy professor Angela Davis after she admitted being a member of the American Communist Party. Miss Davis quieted militant students, however, announcing she would take the matter to the courts.

But the demonstrations lack any substance: at Ann Arbor, students have been demanding a university-subsidized bookstore for many years to counter the high prices from commercial establishments.

Father Groppi had begun a march with 40 people from Milwaukee, 90 miles away to emphasize their demands. As they gathered in the library mall on the University of Wisconsin campus, students wandered out and soon the crowd was 2000-strong. The march gained momentum and Father Groppi piously screamed, "So, let's take it!" And they did.

But there was question as to whether the students knew what they were taking, and why they were taking it.

Only the UCLA campus has a viable issue: whether political beliefs should prohibit professors from teaching. Miss Davis contends her firing is based on racial prejudice, but this seems simply an histrionic gesture to infuriate conservative regents.

The regents fired Miss Davis after the longest secret executive session held since they decided to fire Clark Kerr, the mastermind of mass education, back in 1966. Governor Ronald Reagan openly called for her dismissal in several recent public speeches after she announced to the press she was a member of the CP.

Reagan is a member of the board of regents; the other members are elected or appointed by him.

The action confused many political observers for two reasons: first, the same thing happened last year when Reagan, who also sits as a trustee on the board of San Francisco State College, engineered the firing of Black Panther George Murray.

Murray, in an amazingly parallel situation, avowed his political beliefs and was fired. The Black Students Union began demonstrations, tearing up the student newspaper offices and roughing up several professors. The faculty eventually called for a strike and before the year ended classes had been closed down for six weeks, 236 people were seriously injured and more than 300 arrests were made.

Few doubted that this would occur at UCLA if Miss Davis' firing was upheld.

Secondly, at their last previous meeting, the regents passed a resolution, sponsored by Reagan, declaring faculty political beliefs would have nothing to do with their tenure potential.

Reagan now poo-poo's this, claiming American CP members are subversive. They are "communists with a big C" he explains; communists with a little "C" are simply philosophical. But big "C" Communists "obviously have allegiance to another country and therefore are dangerous and not qualified to teach on our campuses."

Miss Davis is really confusing the issue by insisting her firing was on racial grounds. Such an assumption is absurd, and frightening.

There is little doubt the courts will enjoin the university from firing her, ruling the by-law the regents acted under is unconstitutional. The by-law, passed in 1940 and strengthened in 1950, is a result of the McCarthy red-baiting era and has been invoked only twice before.

But the Davis scene is a good indication of the growing conservatism and fear of communist takeover across the country.

The new president of Columbia University went before a McClellan subversives subcommittee this summer and read into the record the names of everyone arrested at Columbia during the last year, because "this is obviously a national plot to overthrow the government."

McClellan smiled and invited several other big university presidents to do the same: Harvard, Michigan, Stanford and Berkeley among them.

It would be a lengthy list: more than 500 arrests have been made on those campuses alone last year.

San Francisco State College president Samuel Hayakawa, who will probably run for either senator or governor before the year is out, has railroaded through a student government with designs for "ousting subversives." The government, which is banned to all activists, supports Hayakawa and approved suspensions for anyone ever arrested and anyone else he wants to prohibit.

The student newspaper, last vestige of opposition to Hayakawa, has been banned by the government, though it still publishes off-campus. Hayakawa had the student government election — which was worse than any Mayor Daley ever manipulated in Chicago — sanctioned by the San Francisco federal courts.

And then there is the Yippee conspiracy trial in Chicago. It is masqueraded justice and is quite funny to observe. Yippee leader Abbie Hoffman is rumored to be the director of the "living theatre" that the courtroom will likely turn into.

But all humor aside, the malicious intent of the jurisprudence in Chicago is obvious and has definite fascist overtones. It could most easily be compared to the purge trials of several communist nations this government seems so to fear.

And the American student movement isn't moving. It seems only a visible manifestation of frustration that at the most has managed to create a new lifestyle of the hippy genre.

Passing through Sproul Plaza on the infamous Berkeley campus one meets a Kentucky evangelist claiming that unless you embrace J. Christ you will die in a car accident. Further on, members of the Weatherman faction of Students for a Democratic Society pass out — well, force out — literature.

The Scientology Forever, Inc. student group marches in Buddha-like draperies and haircuts each day, singing Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna.

And the only one who seems to benefit from this is the official Sproul Plaza button salesman (700 buttons: if you don't see yours, ask for it).

'Secret strategy paper' exposes SAC split

By AGLIUKACS

A SAC executive meeting last night dissolved into unstructured coffee-kitsches without making a formal decision on financial backing for the pro-CUS forces in the Oct. 23 referendum.

Ten minutes of strained discussion on CUS came at the end of four hours of languid torpor and disinterested bureaucratic business.

SAC vice-president Bob Barkwell (III Meds) reminded the meeting that SAC had voted a positive commitment to support CUS in the referendum, but noted that the motion of commitment passed at a special summer meeting did not include any authorization of financial backing.

Some pro-CUS leaflets have been printed and distributed on campus, but the executive allowed the question of paying the printing costs to die without a vote.

The SAC people appeared to be more concerned about the leakage of an alleged "secret strategy paper," outlining the tactics of the pro-CUS group.

The "paper," prepared by John O'Grady (II SCS), was printed by SAC Press last week. O'Grady is the co-ordinator of the pro-CUS campaign for the referendum.

SAC president Gesta (Gus) Abols demanded to know why O'Grady had refused on Saturday to show him the "paper."

"I am under the impression that anything printed by SAC Press is an open document, available to all SAC members."

"...Don't be politically stupid," Barkwell replied tersely. "That was a pro-CUS strategy paper and O'Grady wouldn't show it to the opposition."

"You'll see it in the Take Oike on Thursday," Barkwell added.

The ramifications of the "paper" should be one of the many political hornshells at tonight's general SAC meeting set for 7 p.m. in St. Mike's Brennan Hall.

The meeting is expected to discuss three main issues: ratification of the contract unionizing SAC's office staff with the Canadian Union of

Hobbs heads 'activist' slate in Vic elections

John Elton, whom Hobbs defeated last spring in winning the presidential post, is running on a slate with John Kirton and Bill Ostrander. Their platform calls for negotiation rather than confrontation in attempts to reform Victoria College.

There are also four independent candidates for member-at-large. Greg Sparks, Glenda Stark, Johnathan Wrobel and John Chester. Sparks, Stark and Wrobel are freshmen candidates.

G-TAWA (CUP) — The student council at the University of Ottawa has charged the union membership with this action, student councilors claim. It has resulted in "well-over 300 reconsidering the original summer vote to support CUS in the referendum. A vote against CUS is a vote against the left-leaning majority of the executive.

The meeting is expected to feature stunning feats of political manoeuvring, elaborate alliances and more than the usual number of strange political bedfellows.

It promises to be a lengthy session.

Symposion kicks off H.H. 50th anniversary

A selected group of students and faculty will have an opportunity to mesh minds at the Hart House SYMPOSION October 17, 18, and 19.

SYMPOSION will be a vaguely defined conference to which any University of Toronto student may apply. Twenty-four invited faculty members from various disciplines and 24 students with varied interests will be free to explore each other's intellects within the general reference of education, educational experiences, and the entire process of learning.

Meeting in morning and afternoon sessions during the three days, the conference will divide randomly into six groups of eight people: doctors and philosophers mixing with geography and fine art students.

SYMPOSION was the idea of a subcommittee of the Hart House 50th Anniversary Committee composed of undergraduate and graduate students in addition to Hart House staff.

The Political Economy Course Union Teach-In takes place today. There will be two sessions — one from 10 a.m. to noon and another from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m., at Convocation Hall.

The CUC and Campbell Reports, as well as departmental decision making and course content are a few of the topics for discussion.

BURNABY (CUP) — The

of Ottawa has charged the university administration with actively working to undermine and weaken the campus student union by encouraging student withdrawal from the union.

The council claimed that administration subversion is due to the success of the union at gathering student support for moderate change at the university.

Administrators have gone so far as to prepare withdrawal forms which allow a student, upon registration, to opt out of BURNABY (CUP) — The Senate at Simon Fraser University voted Monday to condemn the two-week-old strike of the Department of Political Science, Anthropology, and Sociology.

They called the action "highly irresponsible and unethical towards the students enrolled in their courses."

The students and faculty in PSA are demanding the administration show a willingness to negotiate the abolition of an administration trusteeship for the department, restoration of tenure and promotions to PSA faculty who were fired, demoted or placed on probation by the administration, and recognition of the department's total student parity.

The Senate urged the administration to remove the trusteeship of the department by appointing a non-striking PSA member as department head.

They also endorsed President Kenneth Strand's call for the examination of the PSA Department by an external committee.

Faculty- and student-elected department head Mordecai Briemberg, one of nine PSA professors who were suspended last Friday pending dismission, said yesterday the Senate was trying to "give power to a minority in the department which is opposed to student parity."

The parity issue is the administration's main charge against the department.

Briemberg also charged the external committee referred to by the Senate was the joint Association of Colleges and Universities of Canada and Canadian Association of University Teachers team, which Strand endorsed and which "would have supported the administration's allegations."

Both these bodies are on record as opposing student parity in departmental decision-making.

Briemberg added that Monday's Senate meeting was "unfair" because no members of the PSA were allowed to present their side of the case.

A student senator who tried to speak for the PSA was ruled out of order as senators voted almost unanimously to condemn the department.

SFU student council President Norm Wickstrom called a joint faculty council meeting for today. Next to the Board of Governors, this is the most powerful body on campus.

The birth of a parking lot

Story by

The cleaning lady put bottles of lemon oil on the wood to keep it from drying out. It has to be kept greasy or it will dry out. It's not that it gets overheated in here, but it's never cold.

Living here is really a groove because there's Yorkville up the street and then there's Spadina. It was better though. Just a while back this whole street used to be all houses, mostly flats, and you'd know say one or two people in each house. It was great coming home after classes because you felt you really were coming home.

And the way they built houses in those days! Generation after generation would use it. The kids must have had a great time living in a place like that, finding out things about the house that took a childhood to discover.

Then the University takes a place like this and turns it into an office and utterly ravages it by letting secretaries butt their cigarettes in the marble sinks and by knocking down walls and turning bedrooms into offices.

But no one really notices that when you stand at a corner you see the same things every time, always at a different angle than before.

Big back yards are conveniently waiting to be turned into parking lots. After a few years they tear the place down, make a bigger parking lot and speculate about additions to the grad school.

You can talk to the foreman, John, and he'll sell you the stuffings of the house at a reasonable price "to defray the cost of destruction."

But worst of all, is to call a friend that used to live there and to discover that the line has been disconnected.

When you look at the place in the dark you can see the ivy still climbing up and the house is still alive in a way. In fact, if you listen to the rustlings of a house settling for the last few times, you would think you could hear the ghosts of the original workmen laughing because nothing quite as good will ever take stand on this spot again.

The general meeting of the Students' Administrative Council will be held today at 8 p.m. in Brennan Hall, St. Mikes. The meeting is open and all students are encouraged to come.

By TOM WALKOM

David Depoe is alive and at the University of Toronto.

Depoe, who achieved notoriety last year as a member of both the controversial Company of Young Canadians and the Yorkville Diggers, is co-ordinator of a new campus group — the Sociology Radical Caucus.

The SRC first emerged into the public light two days ago. Second year students settling into their customary Monday morning Political Science class were handed SRC-prepared critiques of the assigned reading.

Entitled "Does Max Weber Strike Out", the paper, using Marxian analysis, criticized what it called the "assumptions of sociology."

This introduction of course content criticism into the classroom met a mixed reaction.

Some students took active part in the discussion arising from the paper, others muttered resentfully about the "weirdos monopolizing the class", while a great number just appeared confused.

The lecturer, Professor K.N. Walker called the SRC move "extremely useful", expressing his willingness to "co-ordinate lectures with this sort of course criticism."

The existence of organized questioning of the course made

Walker step warily in his lecture.

At one point, while referring to Karl Marx's Communist Manifesto, he said: "It's clear what Marx meant — no it's not; somebody will probably take me up on that — let me try and guess what I think Marx meant."

Depoe later commented on the role of the SRC.

"We're not tied formally with any other group (such as the New Left Caucus) or with the Sociology Course Union. . . The Course Union is concerned more with student voice in the hiring of professors; our function is course criticism.

"It's also," he noted "a good way to take in the course."

So far the SRC has organized in two classes — Political Theory (Soc 204) and the first-year class (Soc 100).

GSU Budget Supports Graduate Course Unions

The GSU executive allotted over twenty per cent of its $60,000 budget to course union activity on the graduate level.

At its meeting Monday night, the executive voted to raise its commitment to $2 from last year's 50 cents per graduate student enrolled in a department.

Michael Vaughn, GSU president, called the move an important change in policy, because it supports "the most basic form of participation" in university activities.

Vaughn noted that the undergraduate students council, from which the GSU withdrew last year, now allots much less to course union activity, and will probably increase its commitment. SAC allotted approximately $11,000, five per cent of its budget, to union activities last year.

The GSU executive's motion has still to be ratified at a general meeting, which will take place on October 22.

GSU backs Simon Fraser strike

The Graduate Students Union executive yesterday sent a telegram of support to the striking faculty and students at Simon Fraser University.

Eight professors of the striking Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology department were recently fired. The department has been operating for over a year with democratic participation, which involved mass meetings of faculty and students in so-called "parallel structure".

The GSU executive called for restoration of this self-government and reinstatement of the fired staff.

It called recent events at Simon Fraser "a grievous blow to serious, relevant scholarship in Canada."

"Academic freedom and responsible government have been liquidated on your campus", the telegram to the PSA department read.

The GSU executive speaks for the approximately 6,000 graduate students at the U of T.

Factfinders descend on U of T to get the dope on drugs

Student heads and others will be able to expound their views on the non-medical use of drugs Friday, Oct. 17 in the Hart House Debates Room at 12:00 noon.

The Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs, sponsored by the Federal Government, will be setting up a panel to lead the general discussion on drugs.

A report discussing the aims of the commission states the commission will conduct a comprehensive survey in Canada and abroad, to seek from all available sources, information and data concerning the use of drugs.

Its ultimate goal, the report says, will be to recommend ways and means by which the Federal government can to reduce the dimensions of the problems involved in drug use.

The commission will be looking at drug usage from all angles. It will report on the "current state of medical knowledge respecting the effect of the drugs." It will be inquiring into the "motivation underlying the non-medical use of drugs" and also the "social, economic, educational and philosophical factors relating to the use of drugs."

The commission will also look into the "extent of the drug phenomenon, the social factors that have led to it, the age groups involved, and the problems of communication."

OF THE

Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical use of Drugs

10 a.m. October 16, 17 and 18, 1969

St. Lawrence Hall
157 King Street East, Toronto

The Commission is gathering whatever information is available, in Canada and abroad, on the non-medical use of sedative, stimulant, tranquilizing, hallucinogenic and other psychotropic drugs or substances.

The Commission is conducting its inquiry in public and in private, and will report to the Government of Canada on:

- the effects of these drugs and substances.
- the motives behind non-medical use of these drugs and substances.
- the social, economic, educational and philosophical aspects of the phenomenon — particularly how widely these drugs and substances are used, social causes, age groups and communication difficulties.

The Commission will recommend measures that the Federal Government — alone or with other governments — can employ to attack problems raised by the non-medical use of these drugs and substances.

The subject of the inquiry is a complex one. The Commission therefore invites the opinions of any individual or group that will broaden understanding of all aspects of the subject.

The public is encouraged to attend these hearings and offer their views.

Those who have submitted briefs to the Commission will have opportunities to review them verbally during the hearings.

The Commission has the authority to hear testimony in private and anonymously. These arrangements should be made with Mr. James J. Moore, Executive Secretary of the Commission, during the public hearings.

The Committee will hold an open hearing

Rugger, Soccer home openers today

RUGGER

The Rugger Blues play their first home game today at 3:00 in Varsity Stadium. Admission is free.

The Opposition is Waterloo who soundly trounced Guelph 45-0 on Saturday while Toronto edged McMaster by a mere ten points in their league opener. It will be a very highly contested match and a large amount of student support would be most helpful.

The Blue Team is fit and ready; Code, Anderson and McAlister are three new additions to the squad and should inject some needed spirit.

The Seconds play Waterloo Seconds at 4:30 on the Back Campus. Their game will be as hard fought as the Firsts' since the players, as always, will be seeking berths on the First Team.

Both games will be excellent Rugger and at least one game should be seen by all those interested in first-class rugger action.

SOCCER

The Soccer Blues play their first home game of the season today against the Waterloo Warriors at three o'clock on the back campus.

The Blues were held to a 2-2 tie last Saturday at McMaster in their league debut.

On Monday, the team prepped for the clash with the Warriors with an exhibition tilt against the Emeralds of the Toronto and District League and were edged 2-1.

There will be a meeting of all (All) (this means you) students taking any undergraduate course from the Department of Classics at 1 p.m. Thursday in UC A101 to elect members to the Staff-Student Committee.

This is important so for Christ's sake come; like, you know, cut class even.

Tennis Blues win West; seek revenge in Ottawa

By DAVID BURT

The U of T tennis team proved supreme in the OQAA Western Division eliminations last weekend, and left Waterloo with both the team and singles championships.

This gives Toronto a chance to meet Carleton in the East-West finals next weekend in Ottawa, and avenge last year's loss to the Ravens.

Toronto's first seed, Paul Kent, proved to be the best in the West when he won the singles championship.

He will be looking for a double win, in the team and singles championships, when he meets Carleton's ace, Marinus Wins.

Don Steele, Frank Blythe, and Mike Zimmerman will support Kent in the team singles events.

Blythe and Zimmerman, and Steele and either alternate Bob Robinson or Kent, will combine in the doubles.

The doubles championship round will see McGill meet Western, but rest assured that Toronto tennis buffs will find two out of the three OQAA titles sufficient retribution for last year's loss in the finals.

Winning start for rowers

Saturday marked the successful debut of another rowing season for the University of Toronto.

Crews representing three other Ontario universities provided keen competition, but Toronto came through with two firsts and a third to edge Western and win the regatta. Final Score — Toronto 86¼, Western 85, Brock 25, McMaster 21.

Toronto won easily in the Lightweight Varsity race but ran into much stiffer opposition in the feature Senior Varsity event.

In second place off the start, the Senior Varsity oarsmen pulled ahead of the heavily favoured Western crew in the last 500 metres to win by more than a boatlength.

The U of T Freshman crew, although shut out this week, gained valuable experience in their race and should be in much closer contention next time out.

New talent upsets vets as Fencing trials begin

Fencing trials usually have an air of inevitability. Not this year, as many new fencers have given the club an unusual throbbing of interest.

Each fencer is weighing his chance of making the two Varsity teams. The easy life is over, the urge to train is there wetted by the drive to reach the final twelve places on the OQAA team.

The Epee trialists sparkle with talent. Rowland Griffin topped the pool with four victories, followed on hits by Jan van Maanen, a fast left hander from Holland.

Mike Kerwin, Irv Snitman, and Bill Gibson from USC struggled to one victory each, while Ron Keith needs more experience.

Foil is our most competitive weapon with 15 talented fencers capable of making the team.

The first of several inter-squad trials showed Richard Wong return to his extremely high standard. The 5 to 0 victory followed with support from Johannes Katryski (University of Berlin) and Steve Jorgenson; Oscar Wong, Geof Nathan and Vladimir Gettler suffered the defeat.

Sabre is dominated by the presence of Martin Peros, now recognized as a Canadian A fencer. Returnees Martin Moskovits, Richard Kry and Andrew Beneyi and Mark Pfeiffer are challenged by David Brown, last year's Western Ontario team member and Vladimir Hachinski.

Beneyi, Hachinski and Schomberg cleaved their way to 6 victories in the first sabre trial. Peros took the directors duties too seriously (1 victory), while Kry wondered where all the tall guys had come from to torment him. Brown staunchly the tide to record two wins.

This weekend, Varsity, for the first time, will send individual fencers to a competition as University fencers rather than as unattached — a necessary ploy to ensure that clubs who visited other clubs can fence under their true colours. The meet is called the London Heros' Tourney.

Martin Peros has entered the sabre, while Griffin, Kerwin and Snitman will try and take the Epee.

Freshers, it is great to see you all — if you have not tried out come and enjoy the aches and pains of learning to fence.

Vic opens season with 6-0 win

Vic quarterback John Baird (12) evades a desperate rush from unidentified SMC lineman and tosses game-winning pass to tight end Malcom McKinnon, seen breaking into the clear well behind the SMC secondary.

By LYNDON LITTLE

Vic opened their defense of the Mulock Cup yesterday afternoon with a narrow 6-0 win over St. Mikes.

The score would have been considerably higher but costly penalties in key situations killed many good scoring situations.

In the first quarter, Vic had a 30-yard TD pass from John Baird to Peter Fairgrievies erased on a holding call. Near the end of the quarter a no-yards call eliminated a rouge after a long Vic punt.

In the second quarter Vic killed a good drive with a clipping penalty and a fumble.

The Scarlet and Gold finally scored near the ten minute mark of the third quarter.

A fumble by St. Mikes' quarterback Brian MacConnell gave Vic the ball at the SMC 40-yard line. Two short ground gains and an offside penalty put the ball first down on the 30.

On the next play Peter Fairgrievies rambled in to score but a Vic lineman was guilty of clipping. Undaunted, quarterback Baird came right back to hit tight-end Malcolm McKinnon with a 33-yard TD pass for the game's only score.

The convert was wiped out on — well, you guessed it — another penalty.

With 5 minutes left, St. Mikes had a good chance to get back in the game when a 25-yard pass from MacConnell to Tim Wolfe gave them a first down on the Vic 35.

However, John Sharpe, Vic's back-up quarterback, ended the threat with a key interception.

SMC was held to 40 yard rushing while Vic picked up 127. Peter Fairgrievies personally accounted for 73 of those yards on eleven carries.

John Baird was good on 4 of 7 passes for 102 yards while MacConnell was 6 for 15 for 48 yards.

In the other game played yesterday afternoon PyhsEd downed Eng. 9-0.

At 7:15 Wednesday night SAC President Gus Abols ambled to a piano in the St. Mike's student center and proceeded to play "Yesterday".

After a minute or so of this unexpected overture, the SAC members applauded their approval, and the second general SAC meeting of the year was underway.

Not exactly.

First, the members had to spend two weary hours approving all the executive minutes since April. Technically, this was an extension on the first SAC meeting held Sept. 24 and never officially ended.

The pile of minutes was eventually approved with only a handful of minor changes.

Then the controversies began in earnest.

As SAC moved into the scheduled meeting at 9.48 p.m., Gus Abols rose to read a letter he received yesterday from Art McIlwain, president of the Engineering Society, concerning a pro-CUS strategy paper prepared for the upcoming referendum.

McIlwain said the Engineering Society executive found "comments... on the strategy to be followed in fighting the forthcoming Canadian Union of Students referendum... unacceptable."

The executive objected specifically to "that statement discussing the necessity to neutralize the student leadership of the professional faculties and to induce a small turnout at the pools."

"For these reasons the Engineering Society demands in the strongest possible terms that the Students' Administrative Council renounce the document and follow a policy which will encourage discussion of the issues rather than censor such discussion."

Abols then showed the council a xerox copy of a Sacspress duplicating order dated Sept. 22 for 250 copies of the strategy paper. He also read the council sections from the paper, which he said he had been twice forbidden to see by SAC office staff.

The paper proposed the pro-CUS forces aim for a victory margin of 455 votes in a projected turnout of 1,595 voters.

THREE-POINT STRATEGY

The three-point strategy was summarized as:

- "Direct the campaign towards the moderate bloc of votes.
- "Neutralize professional student leadership and induce a small turnout in these faculties.
- "Conduct a campaign that is both intense and educational."

While Abols did not read the summary, he directed the council's attention to page four of the document which proposed local committees take charge of "scrutinizing and insuring the desirable number of ballot boxes."

"I demand SAC disassociate itself from and condemn the document," Abols concluded.

ISSUES AND POLICIES

SAC vice-president Bob Barkwell immediately took the floor and moved that "SAC disassociate itself from the statements to which the Engineering Society objects and affirm its desire to fight the referendum on issues and policies."

"After all this is only a working paper," he continued.

"SAC did not officially publish this working paper — it was produced as a basis for discussion and an outline of technical strategy by a group on and off SAC interested in fighting pro-CUS. It does not reflect the working policy of the group."

"Typically, Mr. Abols didn't read the section saying it should be an educational campaign. To win this referendum without explaining the CUS issues is pointless."

"During the summer, SAC overwhelmingly passed a motion supporting CUS, so we thought we could expect some aid. The printing costs will be paid by the author of the working paper, John O'Grady, out of his own pocket."

POLITICALLY UNWISE

"I admit it was politically unwise for that statement to appear, especially when 250 copies were printed."

"We must use this referendum to educate the campus and make the students think, otherwise we're wasting our time, money, energy and intelligence."

"There's no doubt about it, it was a SAC paper," said New College member Wayne Pulver (1 Dents). "Such a paper should have been freely available."

Comparing the SAC working paper to the working paper on discipline ("Order on Campus") published by the Council of Presidents of Universities of Ontario, Pulver said the SAC document was "repressive and hypocritical."

NEUTRALIZED

"According to this working paper, I've been effectively neutralized," Engineering member Gerrit Van Geijn told the council. "This turns me off so badly I can hardly think... well, less than usual."

"That's not true," shouted SAC executive assistant Liz Willick, "You're not neutralized."

Geijn: "Mr. Barkwell said it."
Willick: "It doesn't matter, it's still not true."

Geijn: "The working paper was sheer lunacy. We keep referring to the referendum as if it is democratic, but how can we say it is democratic when pro-CUS people want to neutralize the leadership of the people who would vote against it and induce a small turnout at the pools?"

Greg Kealey, (III SMC) University Committee Chairman: "How do you induce a small turnout?"

Abols: "That's your problem."

Various members of the council then called on John O'Grady, (III SMC) author of the working paper to address the council.

George Sachs (IV APSC): "Who the hell is John O'Grady?"

O'Grady, red-haired and slightly built, speaks to the council in short, clipped sentences through a barrage of heckling.

"I prepared the paper in late August," he begins, "solely as a working document."

"I was out of town at the time and when I returned to Toronto, I discussed the paper with Bob Barkwell and we decided such an approach was entirely inappropriate. It's purely a background paper on the issues. It was published by mistake."

Various members: "Some mistake!"

O'Grady: "My sincere apologies to anyone who feels offended. It never represented anyone's views."

Abols laughs skeptically.

Kealey: "Fuck off, Abols."

O'Grady: "There was no desire to manipulate the views of the engineers..."

McIlwain: "Bullshit."

O'Grady: "I doubt they could be manipulated."

Wayne Hankey (SGS): "Bullshit."

Several members: "Bullshit."

McIlwain (to O'Grady): "Not by you, anyway."

Abols then asked for a detailed account of the production of the working paper and demanded disclosure of the membership of the pro-CUS committee.

Wayne Richardson (IV APSC), objected to Abols' request. "I see no reason to delve into the private affairs of a group of students," he said. "It is a private document prepared by a group of concerned students and there is no financial loss to SAC."

Abols' position was one of "naive outrage" agreed Hankey, who felt the situation was "essentially a private group producing a private document."

"I find this whole discussion is irrelevant to the business of SAC," interjected Peter Boswell (II Innis).

Hankey returned to the debate, which was still dealing with Barkwell's motion.

OFF TO CAPUT?

"Do you really expect the pro-CUS people to stand up and identify themselves simply because SAC passes a motion?" he asked. "What will you do then? Drag them to Caput and say 'Punish! punish!'"

Pulver: "Please, I'd like the situation clarified a bit."

Abols then moved an amendment to Barkwell's motion, calling for disclosure of the membership of the pro-CUS committee. The amendment was defeated.

Speaker George Murray then recog-

Students invade faculty council as strike support grows

BURNABY (CUP) — Students at Simon Fraser University caused the shut-down of a meeting by the institution's joint faculty council Thursday, when they ignored a ruling which ordered the gathering to meet behind closed doors.

The ruling is part of a continuing effort by the administration to insist on its right to privacy. It follows an aborted "mill-in" on Wednesday.

The proposal for the "mill-in" arose at a meeting of striking students, but approximately 100 students found the doors to the administrative building barred by security guards.

An attempt to photograph the proceedings by student newspaper photographer, Hugh MacIntosh ended when he received a dislocated shoulder, allegedly at the hands of two security guards.

Thursday's disruption occurred when only a few of the approximately 200 students who attended the meeting heeded the ruling of Chairman L. M. Srivastava, administration vice-president, that students be requested to leave.

Two-thirds of the Faculty attending the meeting voted to adjourn when the students, chanting "On-strike, shut it down", made no move to comply with the chairman. Faculty agreed to consider items on the agenda through a privately circulated referendum ballot.

Support for the strike at SFU, led by the University's Department of Political Science, Sociology, and Anthropology, still appears to be growing.

Students in the SFU Philosophy department voted Wednesday to join the strike, which now includes PSA, History and English students.

GENERAL MEETING

A general meeting of students in the Faculty of Arts and Science was scheduled for Thursday afternoon to consider support for the strike which began September 24.

Strikers are demanding the SFU Administration begin negotiations for the removal of trusteeship over the PSA Department, and re-instatement of professors fired, demoted, or placed on probation by the administration for their activity in the student-parity department.

So far, nine professors have been suspended by the SFU

Administration, pending dismissal procedures, for refusing to teach regular classes during the strike.

The strike has drawn support from outside the University with letters of support coming from the University of Toronto Anthropology Department and members of the McGill University academic staff and student body.

U OF T SUPPORT

At least 55 staff and student members of the U of T Anthropology Department signed a letter which read in part, "This administration action has threatened both academic and democratic freedoms, not only at SFU but also, if allowed to stand as a precedent, at any institution of learning."

"The action has threatened the concept of a University, in that a University, by its very definition, implies the free exchange of ideas amongst, and the unrestricted participation of, all members of the university community."

The McGill letter pledged the signators' "support and solidarity, political and financial to the PSA Strike Committee." They are also sending a donation to the Strike Committee as a demonstration of their support.

SAC affirms CUS support, votes election Funds

During a heated and lengthy meeting Wednesday night, the Students' Administrative Council reaffirmed its commitment to campaign on behalf of the Canadian Union of Students in the Oct. 23 referendum.

SAC also allotted $1,000 to the pro-CUS group on campus, which includes a large number of SAC members, and $500 to the anti-CUS group.

Mike Simon (III Sear) was elected chairman of the pro-CUS campaign, while Art McIlwain, president of the Engineering Society, was chosen to head the opposition.

In a letter to SAC President Gus Abols the Engineering Society executive, headed by McIlwain, termed "unacceptable" a tactic proposed in the paper, calling on the pro-CUS forces to "neutralize the student leadership of the professional faculties and to induce a small turnout at the polls there."

SAC Vice-President Bob Barkwell, a prominent member of the pro-CUS group, who had commissioned the paper, moved that SAC disassociate itself from the objectionable statements.

McIlwain accepted the explanations offered by the pro-

SAC president Gus Abols and his executive assistant Liz Willick at SAC meeting Wednesday evening

CUS members of SAC, whereupon the council approved Barkwell's motion.

The council disregarded requests from Abols and Communications Commissioner Jon Levin for widespread publication of the strategy paper. Abols contended the paper was a public document, since it had been printed by SAC press.

"The SAC press is a service for any student who pays to have work done," Barkwell responded. He said O'Grady would pay the printing costs. Several members feared irreparable damage had been done to the tenor of referendum debate.

The strategy paper was a product of misunderstandings — don't let it cloud the campaign, pleaded SAC Executive Assistant Liz Willick, a member of the pro-CUS group.

"However sincere the explanations about the strategy paper are," said Levin after the meeting, "they won't be believed."

If this is reported the way it happened, we'll all look like idiots — SAC member Wayne Pulver after Wednesday night's meeting.

Council freaks out

Wednesday night's meeting of the Students Administrative Council — reported on the front page — demonstrated that the majority of the SAC members are incredible, irresponsible, and probably irrelevant to political struggle on this campus.

At that meeting the members exchanged the usual boredom of Roberts Rules of Order for the insanity of personal invective, childish debating games, and indefensible smear tactics.

The meeting was the clearest demonstration to date of the irrevocable split that has emasculated the council since the elections last spring.

On the executive level the split is two-fold. The majority of the SAC executive consists of radicals and left-liberals who look to SAC Vice-President Bob Barkwell (III Meds) and Greg Kealey (III SMC), co-chairman of SAC's important University Committee.

Barkwell, Kealey, and Services Commissioner Chris Szalwinski (III APSC-New) are sympathetic to the New Left Caucus.

Also on the left-wing of the split are Finance Commissioner Bob James (III Vic) and External Affairs Commissioner Mike Simon (III Scar).

Education Commissioner Lee Coulter (III Vic) and Judicial Committee co-chairman Art Moses (III UC) are less committed but somewhere to the left of centre.

Cultural Affairs Commissioner Brian Tanney (III Meds), currently on a special study-session in England, is a principled liberal who judges each issue separately.

SAC President Gus Abols is normally very docile during executive meetings; after several defeats during the summer, he has apparently abandoned hope of working with the executive.

Abols and Barkwell were elected on a split ticket.

But behind Abols is a hard-working and committed right-wing group centered in the professional faculties and the U of T Law School.

Abols only supporter on the executive has been Communications Commissioner Jon Levin (III UC), who has discreetly stayed out of the public-eye.

The irreparable split on the executive is continued on the council as a whole.

Wednesday night the two groups sat opposite each other in true parliamentary style — to the right and left of the Speaker — and spent most of the evening exchanging senseless insult and invective.

If you wish evidence, read again the story beginning on page one.

During the freaked-out screaming on the "secret CUS strategy paper", the left tried lamely to explain it away as "simply an innocent working paper... that never reflected the thinking of the pro-CUS group."

After the discipline crisis, they should have thought twice about such a phrase.

For its part, the right was little better. It completely ignored the two thirds of the document devoted to explaining the important educational aspects of the referendum.

In fact, the paper said that winning or losing the referendum was not the important issue.

As veteran SAC member Wayne Hankey (SGS) pointed out, "the right is upset not because the left is secretive and deceptive, but because the pro-CUS group intends to win."

The controversial union contract allowing the Canadian Union of public employees to organize the SAC office staff indicated clearly that the two political groups on SAC are totally incapable of working together.

Law member Bob Vernon presented the council with a 2,300-name petition demanding a campus-wide referendum on the contract.

The right-wing group presented a total of 13 pages of detailed amendments and indicated they will force the needless referendum unless the contract is modified to their satisfaction.

SAC decided to delay the contract for two weeks and send it back for re-negotiation and possible amendment.

Whatever its technical faults, the CUPE contract establishes vital principles of office democracy — and Abols opposes those principles. The contract would remove his power as "management" over the SAC bureaucracy.

SAC's reconfirmation of support for CUS was expected, as was the decision to give financial support to the pro-CUS campaign.

But Finance Commissioner Bob James startled even his staunchest supporters when he glibly demanded an unbelievable expense account of $1900 to fight the campaign.

The right screamed in justification. After 35 minutes of theatre of the absurd, SAC agreed to give $1,000 pro-CUS and $500 anti-CUS.

The left on SAC should have asked for equal sums to both the pro- and anti-CUS groups. First, the decision the give more money to the pro-CUS group was political suicide for their campaign.

Second, if members of the left want to play at student-council politics, they should play it straight.

The left does not consider the majoritarian framework as an adequate tool for building political consciousness. The left should only inject themselves into such a system in order to bring about structural change in that system.

In applying that strategy to CUS and SAC, the left should not be fiddling with budgets and council tables in order to push a blind "YES" onto a ballot.

It should be talking about that whole YES-NO dichotomy, the process by which a student delegates his responsibility to someone else.

The left must push to change union structures lie CUS and SAC from top-down organizations to grass-roots organizations.

If the SAC left doesn't want to do that, it should resign and do some real political work off-council.

On the other hand, the right should at least fight the referendum by debating CUS policies. And it must discuss structures without red-baiting and sensationalism — if that is possible.

If the SAC members of either the left or the right are unwilling to debate structures they should resign.

Note-Taking for fun (and a little profit)

You will notice that a great deal of this book simply relates to little things I've done and thought. It may seem completely irrelevant to Columbia. That's the way it goes.

Jim Kunen's Strawberry Statement is unlike the myriad other books on Columbia in particular, student revolution in general. For one thing it is funnier.

Kunen at nineteen is a radical, not a leader, just "a single revolutionary digit", ordinary except for keeping a diary that was published in The Harvard Crimson by a friend. Then it was picked up by New York magazine, the Atlantic, Random House, and now it looks like a major film studio as well.

If Cockburn and Blackburn's Student Power (Penguin) gives you the analysis of the student revolution, Kunen gives the feeling of it, an especially worthwhile reading now that the left seems to be embarked on an impersonality fetish. The hope, as expressed by the New Left Caucus, is to stop the press from personalizing the movement out of existence; that is, the press sets up newsy, eccentric characters (Mario Savio, Mark Rudd, David DePoe, Andy Wernick) or otherwise covers up the real issues with politically irrelevant detail. One has to be sympathetic, since this is exactly what the press does try to do. Ross Munro of the Globe being an exception. Unfortunately, the apersonal stance even further separates the radical from the rest of the population, as he seems sure (or cocksure), cold and detached, humourless, or even inhuman — as opposed to the more fun-loving normal kids.

"Every so often I get hit with eggs which a small group of jocks are having good clean fun throwing. Since they have no arguments, and no support for their arguments (of which they have none), they have no recourse but to assault us like this and sing fight songs — that's right, fight songs. They are standing there, I beg you to believe this — throwing eggs and singing "Roar, Lion, Roar" all the while. They sing "Who Owns New York?" (C-O-L-U-M-B-I-A) which I think is particularly amusing, because it is precisely our point, that Columbia is such a huge real estate enterprise (and Harlem slum lord). They top it all off by singing "America". We join them in this one."

The pukes (Columbiase for radicals) are people. The jocks (radicalese for the sort of students who last week gave Pres. Bissell a standing ovation for his essentially Nixon position on discipline) are people.

... A lot of the time we are unhappy, and we try to cheer ourselves up by thinking. We think how lucky we are to be able to go to school, to have nice clothes and fine things and to eat well and be healthy. How lucky we are really. But we remain unhappy. Then we attack ourselves for self-pity, and become more unhappy, and still more unhappy about being sad.

We're unhappy because of the war and because of poverty and the hopelessness of politics, but also because we sometimes get put down by girls or boys, as the case may be, or feel lonely and alone and lost.

Perhaps the difference between the jocks and the pukes is that the pukes are trying to do something about both levels of unhappiness, especially the former, while the jocks are doing nothing about the former and not a hell of a lot about the latter.

It's not all fun of course.

As the evening wears on I feel less useful and more alienated, so I assign myself the task of keeping the mayonnaise covered. After covering it twelve times I decide to give up and write home. I wonder whether the Paris Commune was this boring.

... When I get up I'm right in the middle of the police. Two of them single me out and start chasing me with clubs raised. I run like a thief for the other side of campus, for Broadway, far away, that's all, far away. A cop in front of me turns and waits for me. I notice that he has his weight on the balls of his feet, his club parallel to the ground, ready for me to go either way. I'm thinking what a goddam shame it is that I'm wearing my goddam loafers because I can't run in them. . . . Twenty feet away a kid has tripped and two cops are on him. I run down to help him (which consists of yelling "Hey, leave him alone"), but the cops are through with him. A stretcher is brought but he says "That's alright, I'm fine." There is blood streaming down his face. I think he obviously doesn't know what he's talking about.

American radicals on the whole are less theoretical than Canadians.

Radical consciousness here is most often developed initially by finding the schools a turn off, by thinking of alternatives and then finding them impossible to implement because they go against the whole grain of Canadian capitalist society. In the States, you don't need a weatherman to know which way the wind blows.

However if James Kunen is an ordinary untheoretical American revolutionary, he is no ordinary writer. Strawberry Statement has its share of faults. For one it climaxes, along with Columbia, at about page fifty, and from then on the pace slackens as Kunen more and more desperately tries to pad the thing out to the contracted length. Also, to very unprofessionally borrow from another reviewer, his ingenuousness is sufficiently overwhelming that you expect him at any moment to wonder where the ducks from Central Park go in winter.

But underneath is a writer's sensibilities — compassion, humour, a clear eye, and most important a fine sense of irony; understanding the negative of every positive. Kunen knows that people think more than one thought at the same time.

I am not having a good time here. I do not know many people who are here. Worse I have doubts about why I am here. . . . Of course the possibility exists that I am here to precipitate some change at the university. I am willing to accept the latter as true, or rather, I am willing, even anxious, not to think about it anymore. If you think too much at the second tier (thinking about why you are thinking what you think) you can get paralyzed.

There are passages where the ingenuous style itself rolls away and the precision of a mature writer shows through.

Everywhere you walk you here a click-clack. . . . The earth is trapped between concrete and for and you are locked away from it.

Leaving the school or the city doesn't really help. Once you live in New York, you are locked in the city and the city is locked in you. . . .

On the beach or in the woods the click-clack follows you, and you carry the pavement beneath your feet. . . . You know the story on the world; you see how far people are. And you feel quite sad.

The highest level of irony in Strawberry Statement can probably be felt but not understood by the author, as one suspects Peter Fonda could not fully grasp what was born in Easy Rider.

Kunen still wants to believe in the original American Dream, somehow magically denuded of all the tendencies — the Puritan intolerance, the super-individuality, the separation and defensiveness (eg. the freedom to bear arms) — that led, almost inexorably to the American Dream of Willy Loman and Lyndon Johnson. He senses the impossibility of "Their" bringing about change, the futility of trying to be effective in "Their" system — although not in the book, Kunen threw a rock at a cop after witnessing the beatings; later he regretted doing it — yet he writes a book to turn them on. He is on both the liberal and the radical path at once. (And the establishment's one, given all the money he is making working for Esquire, CBS etc.) Kunen obviously still faces some choices.

But this makes the book stronger not weaker, as the imperfection of Dickens' or O'Casey's characters make them more powerful, casting dark over light, light over dark.

Kunen ends:

Since the First Republic of the United States is one hundred ninety-two years old and I am nineteen, I will give it one more chance.

But if the Democrats do not nominate Clean, whom against my better judgement I love, or, if they do nominate Clean and he turns out to be what I suspect but won't admit he is, then I will have no recourse but to acknowledge that democracy is not only dead, but is also not about to be revived through democratic means.

The last entry is dated August 6, three weeks before the Chicago convention.

The Strawberry Statement — Notes of a College Revolutionary by James Simon Kunen Random House

osmosis on brunswick street

"Here the motivation has to be a personal search, for we do not offer carrots."

... or degrees or awards or diplomas of any kind. There are no examinations. The Faculty receives a minimum salary and doesn't complain, students enjoy their classes and are seldom absent. The administration is friendly, sociable and welcomes innovation.

Does this idyllic school system really exist or is it merely a figment of this writer's imagination? 296 Brunswick St. in Toronto, the new premises of Three Schools Ltd., and particularly the Artists' Workshop is too easily findable an address to be imaginary. So what's it all about?

Artists' Workshop students are offered a selection of courses ranging from the very basics of drawing, introductory classes in sculpture (if you've never even fooled around with plasticene), ceramics, acting, printmaking, to advanced and intensive courses for the more involved. There are no prerequisites. Classes may be held in the morning, afternoon and evening of different days to help fit YOUR schedule.

This year a few imaginative and more ambitious courses have been introduced. Vera Frankel's "Explorations", in visiting and experiencing Toronto's markets, galleries, temples, lake, etc. hopes to "move through dreams and art, politics and music, poetry and imprisonment, film and fashion, dance and religion, sculpture and the novel, architecture and revolution."

There are courses in batik, portraiture, creative and fashion photography, and even gourmet cooking. "Black and White", "an eye-cleansing path through the media" sounds like it has potential, as does John Neon's "Sound and Light Environments". The Calendar includes some thirty-five choices of workshop or class, and is organized and run by one of the original Workshop creators, John Sime.

"He sees beyond the exterior of a person; he sees their potential." (a staff member about Mr. Sime)

A warm and life-enjoying individual, married, with four adopted children, John Sime seems to direct and inspire the entire show. He makes you feel welcome, relaxed, open to conversation. Very much aware of education systems and developments around him, critical of their lack of concern with the individual, preoccupation with grades, and, in the higher schools, boring classes, he strove to correct these flaws in his own school.

Largely employing the Bauhaus technique of teaching, Artists' Workshop offers guidance and training on a specialized and individual basis. Students gather in groups for classes, but progress at their own rate, digress from the group in theme, do what they want with help and encouragement, ork is never compared to 'another person's, praised or criticised in relation to someone else, but rather the student is helped to draw for himself conclusions about his own accomplishments. John Sime says education should be involving and enormous fun. He promises that by the end of a course here, "you'll know a lot more than when you started... about yourself."

"In essence, all we do is to find the best possible instructor in a given field, gather a group of people around him, and see what happens, by talk, example, and osmosis."

Staff for the Artists' Workshop are not chosen because of their scholastic record, universities attended, or an impressive performance on written applications or interview.

Instead, they are visited in their studios, their work is examined, techniques and objectives discussed, and if their ideas for a course are exciting, they are invited to teach. Every one on the Faculty, must, at the same time as he is involved with the school, also be busy in some way with his art form.

There are, however, a great deal more applicants than necessary for teaching positions, and only Toronto's finest are of the high calibre acceptable to the school. Some of the present list of instructors include Toronto artists and experts Dennis Burton, Vera Frankel, Gerald Scott, Diane Pugen, sculptors Ed Gheress and Ann Mirvish (Ed's wife), gourmet chef Gaston, Don Lougheed, and CBC's new producer Lorne Michaels.

Along with Artists' Workshop are two other degree-free schools oriented especially for the individual. One is The New School of Art, "conceived in January 1965 in the middle of a wild discussion." It is a three or four year program of studio work, seminar and discussion on much the same principle as the Workshop and with a limited total enrollment of about 100. The first "graduates" will join Toronto's art scene this year, and as the sole concern of the New School is to provide the best possible training for the artist, will likely be a welcome addition to our city.

The other branch is Hockey Valley School, an out-of-doors summer experience in art complemented by a natural setting and campy atmosphere.

If any student at the Artists' Workshop is dissatisfied with his course, he is helped, wherever possible, to choose another one. There are very few dis-appointed or even less than enthusiastic students.

Fees include a compulsory membership charge. All members are entitled to vote at General and Annual meetings. The school is financed through fees, individual donations, as well as a small Canada Council grant and some support from the Ontario Council for the Arts. As a Workshop they are not subject to some of the more limiting legislation accorded to schools. Even in the largest classes there are between twelve and twenty students because the administration firmly refuse to over-enroll. Classes usually cost about $42 a term, with a 20% reduction if two or more are taken.

"The object's to help the individual to develop in his own way and to avoid trying to mould him."

Considering the discontent and unrest in some of our larger mass-education establishments, fresh, exciting approaches such as the more individualistic and enjoyable Artists' Workshop are a welcome innovation. Hopefully with more consistent support through both the government and community acclaim, it will develop and expand in other directions as well.

margaret lawrence has six coffee mugs

Margaret Lawrence has never worked in an office before, so she's a bit confused about her role this year. But she's not going to write a novel.

The author of A Jest of God, and the recent Fire Dwellers is writer-in-residence at T this year, following in the footsteps of poet Earl Birney and novelist Jack Ludwig. Besides "thinking and brooding" about a new novel, she will be available to talk with fledgling writers on campus.

She was a bit surprised to learn that she was inheriting the office of her predecessors in the male bastion of Massey College. "All my Canadian friends in England told me that they were sure I'd be somewhere else." But she's there in the small and simple room looking out on the courtyard. The shadows fall very long on the furniture and into corners.

"I'm not a formal person, so being in an office is rather strange. I'd like to meet students on an informal basis, but at first I think I should meet people individually. Then maybe I can organize seminars or whatever people want."

Writers who come to see her will find her very sympathetic and enthusiastic. But she says, "all they'll get is the opinion of one person — and I don't dare tell any lies about what I see. After all, this is my life."

"I guess I should warn you that I'm really a prose writer. That doesn't mean that I don't like poetry or that I won't welcome poets. It's just that I really don't know what happens inside a poem. I don't know how it unfolds the way I do for a novel."

Having lived in England for the last couple of years, she's very eager to see what young Canadian writers are thinking about and doing. "The whole academic world is completely new to me. I haven't been at a university since I graduated, which was a long, long time ago." (She laughed)

She concedes that "the real survivors will survive", that talking with her won't change a bad writer to a good one. But "many young writers need to talk to someone. Very many of them turned up at my house in England."

In her early writing days an English professor was the listener she needed. Now she's probably one of the most successful Canadian authors. Her Jest of God was made into the movie Rachel Rachel by Paul Newman, and it's had a big success.

"I was at a party a while ago and a lady introduced me to me friends by saying: 'This is the woman who wrote the book for Rachel Rachel. And to think I knew it when it was just a novel!' Just a novel indeed, it still is just a novel."

She will be glad to talk to anyone who cares to see her but warns that she only has six coffee mugs, so if you're planning to come en masse, better bring your own

BOOKPRINT

It struck me, reviewing Kunen's book, that someone else would have written a completely different review. (Brilliant, Bob, brilliant.) A more analytical leftist might have torn it to shreds and an apolitical (read passive reactionary) would probably have said "Kunen defeats his own arguments. He is exactly the sort of young man the 'establishment' wants and needs to..." To which Jim would probably say, "Up against the wall, mother-fucker", citing the slogan of the Columbia demonstrations.

Book reviews are only the second statement. Bookprints will be a regular feature printing letters and comments to continue the discussion. Also short reviews, announcements and graffiti.

P.S. Free books not withstanding, there are still no volunteers for book reviews. Again, all welcome. Leave your name at 92 St. George. Review office. Even English graduate students, we're so desperate.

Welcome to the Horseshoe Tavern The home and land of the free

The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly are playing tonight.

The plaintive whine of the steel guitar and the nasal twang of the vocalist suggest a sound somewhere between St. John's and Nashville. The songs are of loneliness and ties passed through or pined for: Memphis, Baton Rouge, even St. John's. Wagon wheels hang from the ruddy panelled walls, with two-gun holsters on either side. A poor imitation of an Old West saloon. Old West illusions are shattered even more as the words of the song float across the smoke-filled room.

*"I wish I had the power, to change the course of time,
And fish again in Newfoundland."*

As the night wears on, the rhythm of tapping toes, drumming fingers and guttural ya-hoos gives the music, that old-time, down-home music (and down-home can be anywhere), a throbbing, rolling, pulsation. Search the crowd and you'll discover a few genuine Stetsons, leather boots, and maybe even some string ties with a metal clasp embossed with the head of some longhorn. Maybe the gear comes from Calgary or Natchez, more likely, it's from Woolworth's.

The faces of the crowd are sometimes young, usually older. They're lined and the hands are calloused. The people smile, laugh, the odd guffaw rings throughout the room. Bald waiters in crinkled white shirts with rolled-up sleeves gather ashtrays, filmy glasses, and empty bottles of Molson's Golden.

"We're gonna send this one out to Aunt Mabel from Brighton, Ont."

Aunt Mabel beams. There are lots of Aunt Mabels in taffeta, or maybe dresses of twinkling sequins. Aunt Mabel probably wears glasses, is a bit paunchy, and wears her hair rolled on top of her head. Aunt Mabel and Uncle Fred work for a living. They work and they'll work until they die. They know this, but that's life. They're not here to blow their minds listening to orgiastic bombast; they nurse their minds, it's time just to breathe and take it easy. It's all there in the music. The lyrics are conversational. They tell of life, ordinary life as lived by the millions every day. Tales of lonely drives to the lakehead, heart-broken homes.

*"Last night in the barroom,
I forgot I was your wife.
Don't call me Angel,
I lost my wings last night."*

The songs can be funny. The jokes are barnyard or bathroom humour. The people still laugh. It's good to laugh. Who cares about pipes crawling along the ceiling or tiles lifting from the floor? The Saga of Ringo is a favourite. The crewcuts in open shirts or ties askew sit back in the hard little chairs and wait for the familiar words.

*"Ringo the two-gun fairy Got lonesome when his horse died
He got himself a woman,
And he's back in the saddle again."*

It's funny and you laugh with the rest. Your bells seem out of place with the argyle socks and cuffed trousers. An old man, a frustrated guitar player sits and talks with you about history, the people who built the Horseshoe and, oh yeh, his vacations to Fort Lauderdale and visits to Miami nightclubs to see Woody Woodbury.

It's good here. The people are nice, you'll stay a little longer. Your mind needs a rest too. You begin to sing "Happy Birthday" to Wendy and you sing with a loud, full voice. Maybe you'll go to Woolworth's and trade in your love beads for a string tie with a longhorn clasp. Remember there's dancing till five at Aunt Bea's Nashville Room up the street.

The greasy haired band in the blue shirts and black ties play on and on. The words of the tune must be some sort of Horseshoe Tavern theme song.

"Shake the dust my boy, You're welcome at the door."

BAND AND REFRESHMENTS

The University as Asylum / Mortgaged Monastery / Its occupants as Losers in Drag / Mountain Monks with a Phobia for high Altitudes

What I'm going to say here concerns several straight-forward and indeed simple things I've noticed about what's happening on campus this fall. Precisely because these things are obvious, they are perceived only with difficulty by this "community of scholars". This isn't so much an ideological tract as it is an attempt to look at what is actually happening around me.

The first thing that I've noticed seems strikingly clear: there is a very elusive, almost fictional atmosphere about the whole community. There is something very basic which is very unreal about university life and this awareness becomes more intense each year.

Make an excursion into any one of the campus nests of gross human unreality.

High on your list of Wonderlands should be the infamous GSU Friday wine and cheese blasts (although undergrads need not lament, there are many other enchanted forests to explore). Once there, you will see several hundred supposedly intelligent and hopefully sensitive people mewing, cawing, pawing, gaming, milling and lying and in short being incredibly unreal with each other. They act as if they are on stage; they are. At least the Engineers describe their own socials as what they are: Hustling Dances.

The university is losing its meaning. There are still passengers on the bus — the drivers and owners are particularly present — but everyone, passengers, drivers and company, is becoming more and more vague about the destination. In fact, some passengers and more drivers than you would first guess are doubting the value and meaningfulness of the entire trip. This shows itself in many little ways:

MORAL HYPOCRISY

More students are becoming open about their own rationalizations for staying in school — "it's easier than working", "can't think of anything else to do", "I like the good times", — and with grad students (over seven thousand at U of T). "the hours are good and the money is improving." Despite this awareness of their own moral hypocrisy, students are doing their best to make something comfortable out of these private lies; there are shockingly few real people about.

By real I mean someone who constantly expands — instead of constricts — his capacity for experiencing life. The House of Intellect has become a dormitory for fat souls. One thing is for certain; the number of idealistic "Keen-beans" is diminishing.

Does this mean standards are falling? No.

If anything, they are going up. And for good reason; studying is becoming like holding down a job in business. Students, like businessmen, governments and armies, are becoming more efficient. As one cynical professional says: "I'll vent my anger towards the system by beating it at its own game." The cult of the professional is sweeping departments whose subject matter is destroyed if professionalized. English is one example.

Some faculty members — again more than in previous years — just don't want to start teaching again. The younger ones are exhibiting the required autumn zip and zest well enough, but among the more experienced men there are signs of deep-felt disenchantment.

They see a world around them changing rapidly and they are no longer sure of their relationship to it. Myths are deteriorating into puns. Some profs aren't showing up for classes. Some are trying to cancel their courses. These are not mean or lazy men; they are merely questioning the worth of going through the whole tedious circus another time. With each new year they see themselves sinking deeper into an empty cycle of committee work, administrative ritual and petty politicking.

They are being drawn away from their students and the subject matter that once meant something to them in order to please their department heads and appease Simcoe Hall's computer. It is now highly subversive to whisper to one's colleague. "we've got to make life simpler, we've got to slow down or we'll destroy the whole show".

What's going on here? To try and answer this, let's try some elementary social theory. This will — like all theorizing — bland, but please hang on.

LIBERAL DEMOCRACY?

The survival of any group depends heavily on a consensus about "what is real."

The universities' function as an integral part of North American liberal democracy carries with it many definitions of reality. "By getting a university degree I will both make more money and be of greater service to my society. I'll enjoy life more than if I didn't have a degree". Depending upon what you define as being real, this statement is true or false. Modern technology has changed the reality of both the university and the liberal democracy. Yet these two institutions have not altered their own definitions of reality. Both are no longer what they say they are, yet they keep on repeating what they are even though they don't really know what they are (or refuse to acknowledge what they see). Hence, to many they are wrong. Therefore, conflict.

A number of people no longer accept liberal democracy's definitions of "what is real" as being true. They propose their own definitions as the total group's true reality. While most of these alternatives fan out to the left and right of liberal democracy on the political spectrum, but they are all in the same position in regard to technological influence — they don't know what is happening, they don't know what they themselves are. Here we are, arguing over the virtues of each other's lies.

However, the influence of technology upon a group's definition of reality is not the main point of what I'm examining. The unreality of university life is due to a far deeper problem than the conflict of reality definitions offered by differing political sub-groups. The key to the entire muddle of defining realities and accepting truths lies not in picking the best definition but in the very act of definition itself. Any definition of reality is a restriction upon what can possibly be accepted as being real; defining reality is like trying to see your own profile with one mirror — the action distorts what is acted upon. Those people who strive to live in total reality without definitions are in one sense the most threatening dissenters any ideological group has to face. They can't be beaten at the game because they never enter the playground.

SELFISH

Members of the New Left Caucus are still students at this university; arrested users of hallucinogenic drugs are not. Political revolutionaries are co-opted as soon as they define reality by raising their alternative. What is the status of the poet, the "psychotic" and the mystic in the university? The first is ignored or censored; the other two are incarcerated or given "therapy". (With qualification, some drug users could be added to this group). In one sense, the most valid action for each member of this university would be to confront this total reality on a personal level

theatre

this demon lacks imagination, intimacy

The auditorium of the Ward Price building on Grenville Street is an improbable place for a play. The cream-coloured walls are relieved only by the occasional Doric pilaster. A center aisle divides two rows of dark wooden pews complete with hymn-book and communion-glass holders. The creaking wooden floor betrays stage hands and late-comers alike. Such is the home of the Academy of Theatre Arts, which has been giving public performances there since last February. The ATA, a non-profit organization under the direction of Z. A. Turzanski, aims to prepare actors "for the professional theatre". The Academy's brochure emphasizes the need both "to train the technique" and "to develop the gift". What is disappointingly absent both from their theory and practice is recognition of the need for imagination and experimentation.

Last spring the ATA produced Gondoni's Servant of Two Masters which could hardly have hoped to escape unflattering comparison with Theatre Toronto's reading of the same play a few weeks earlier. This month, while neither design nor interpretation could be considered an innovation, their choice of play is considerably more interesting. Anton Chekhov's The Wood Demon is probably unknown to many admirers of the Russian playwright, principally because it was superseded by his more compact Uncle Vanya which draws heavily upon it.

Apart from the happy appearance of this play in Toronto at a moment when the film version of the Seagull has kindled interest in Chekhov, The Wood Demon has particular contemporary relevance. The play's title is the nickname of a country doctor who is horrified by man's callous attitude towards his natural environment. He protests the wanton destruction of the forests and labours tirelessly at reforestation. Chekhov, however, undermines this theme by either crudely exploiting it or conveniently forgetting it when it threatens to interfere with romance.

The triteness of many of the lines in The Wood Demon is disguised by over-acting on the part of much of the ATA cast. Considering the small size of the audience, a more subdued, informal delivery might have been expected. It is paradoxical that Lunet's film of SEAGULL, although impersonal, is considerably more intimate than most stage productions can afford to be. Yet this intimacy is lacking where it might almost have been possible in The Wood Demon.

The finest performance in the Academy's production are those of Jackie Abbey-Taylor as the young wife of a gouty old professor and Judy Gallant as her step-daughter. The scene between these two women at the end of Act II is one of the best of the play and was incorporated by Chekhov into Uncle Vanya almost without change. I found the men less satisfactory on the whole, although Tom O'Hanley's exuberant portrayal of the young soldier and self-styled Don Juan, Fyodor Orlovsky, deserves praise.

The Wood Demon continues on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights through October 25. Anyone with a strong interest in either Chekhov or in the state of theatre in Toronto might find it worthwhile.

everyone but lenny bruce welcome to my world (for now)

"Here! Here! There's a place for that, sir!"

My World and Welcome To It is one of the most promising and perhaps portentous television shows this season. I've not called it a situation comedy for fear of connoting those improbable, absurdly dull shows that are railroaded down your throat on a loud laugh track.

My World and Welcome To It is "based on stories, inspirational pieces and things that go bump in the night" by James Thurber. That's the same James Thurber of the "All right class, I want you all to read My Life and Hard Times, by James Thurber for three weeks from today." A sensitive, imaginative misogynist who thought technology was doing him dirty, Thurber belongs to that "Little Man" School of humour, vintage 1930. Bewildered by the emerging New Woman and confounded by the touted efficiency of technology, the Thurber Man withdraws into dreams, fantasies, often to emerge a bitter neurotic or a violent psychotic. Thurber was basically pessimistic in his view, but his gentle, crafted style of writing and his simplistic, everyman-type cartoons extracted the comedy and the pathos from what Thurber saw as bitter reality.

In the series, William Windom plays John Monroe, a cartoonist for a New York magazine, "The Manhattanite". Windom has loosened up quite a bit since his days in The Farmer's Daughter. And he's lost those William Buckley pouts and scowls. Like Thurber and Thurber's characters, he is perturbed by many of his encounters with his wife Ellen, played by Joan Hotchkiss, and his daughter Lydia, 10, played by Lisa Gerritsen. Two things distinguish him from any Thurber character. There is an obvious bond of love, understanding, and communication between all three members of the John Monroe family. And even in his fatherly-husbandly perturbations and embarrassments, he retains his male dignity. It is the violation of male dignity and communication that impels so many of Thurber's characters to despair and depression.

As John Monroe said, "Imagination makes life tolerable." He indulges his imagination all the way to fantasies about his daughter's school teacher being a luscious blonde whom he chases around the room and onto the bookcase. And he imagines that he is shooting it out with his daughter because she's beating him at chess. Occasionally he may step in or out of a Thurberish animated cartoon, or start to tell a story that is animated by Thurber cartoons. It's a very effective animation and particularly suitable to Thurber cartoons, with their simple lines. (A refreshing contrast to the often fantastic or hyper-human cartoon creatures of Saturday morning.) But Monroe leaves his fantasies to re-enter the domestic world to resolve the discord with gentleness and sensitivity, a major departure from Thurber's situations.

It's so nice to find a situation-comedy (with the term broadly understood) that doesn't depend on a central eccentric for its basic humour. There's no reliance on a "funny" maid, butler, friend, uncle, etc. to create "funny situations". The characters are able to sustain the comedy from rather ordinary situations without the aid of bladder bags. (Nonetheless, there is a rather quiet laugh track.)

Although the show has a good cast, technical innovation with integrated cartoon and fantasy sequences, and a relatively subtle approach as a situation comedy, it lacks a basic fidelity to Thurber. Thurber did not tidy up his endings and plan lessons in applied virtue or practical goodness. The happy ending is one of the rubrics of television sitcoms. The misunderstanding, the fear, the embarrassment or whatnot cause of comedy clears up to the gleeful satisfaction of all concerned, and the viewer is left with a sweet lesson. There is a certain violence and despair about much of Thurber comedy and this is entirely missing from the show.

This is a serious flaw. Yet at the same time, if this show is any indication, an evolution of the situation comedy is underway. There may yet be a shift from the hyper-kineticcioidy of Lucille Ball to a more subtle kind of humour. It is heartening to see a true humorist used as the basis of a series, rather than a barrage of third rate joke writers. It is heartening to see greater use made of the medium, by integrating these cartoon animations.

The show deals only with the simple foibles of marriage easily remedied in thirty minutes, not with the basic marital conflicts often resulting in isolation and despair. The wife is not a shrew; she is not out to humiliate or repress John Monroe. She is understanding, rather pretty and affectionate. Two of the four shows already aired end with wife Ellen: a coy comment, a twinkle in her eye; and husband John: stalking her off to bed. Yes, inter-course! You'd never catch Mr. and Mrs. Walter Mitty at that! The typical Thurber end is alienation.

However, this discrepancy is not the fault of the show, but of the present Ideology of Television: Documentaries, they talk about problems; Comedies, they entertain, that's all.

Satire is the dominant mode of humour today. Laugh-In dabbles in it; the Smothers Brothers got their knuckles rapped; That Was the Week That Was was axed because of irreverent satire. If television doesn't make more room for satire, or just good humour, the sitcom will soon be as amusing as an old knock-knock joke.

Thurber's comedy was spawned as a form of social criticism — chiefly relating to the first half of this century. Since then, the New Woman has emerged a bit more and isn't all that terrifying, though just as noisy as expected. The speed of techno-logical change has accelerated to the point where there's very little tradition left to corrupt, and there's little left to change but changes themselves. Thurber is funny, but dated. His humour has lost its bite with age. And this is what goes on television? And I'm glad? Yes! Perhaps television is catching up to the culture it's helped to create. Keep your fingers crossed. Next season: "That's My Syringe, You Cocksucker," based on the satire of Lenny Bruce, and starring Jackie Gleason, Debbie Reynolds and Jay North.

East of Sudbury there is a little town called Coniston which is a must for anyone who wants to see what man can do to ruin his environment. The town is located right beside a huge smoke-belching smelter and both are owned by the mammoth International Nickel Company. On Labour Day we drove out to look around.

Up on the railroad tracks, five workmen were listlessly scraping away at the dirt on the tracks. It would just drift back around the diamonds and ties anyway. One of the men thought I was a newspaperman and hoped that I could get things changed for them. He was all ready in his broken English with the facts of life in Coniston.

He told us about the thick layer of fine dust that would settle on the furniture on days when the wind blew up a storm, the impossibility of growing anything green around their houses, because the topsoil had been ruined by the sulphur which had swept over the land for years, INCO's refusal to do anything about the impoverished soil — above all, just the utter desolation that surrounds the town. He remembered what it had been like there when he first came over from Italy more than thirty years ago. There was long grass then, and a white pine forest had covered the area where now the only things standing were telephone poles. He was pretty disappointed when he found out I wasn't from the newspapers. He told us that not a word about the ravages effected by industry on our natural environmpt, one of the current main topics of interest in newspapers across Canada and the US, reaches the pages of the Sudbury paper. And CKSO, Sudbury's T.V. station is the only C.B.C. affiliate which is not carrying the network's current series on pollution. Not enough local interest, says the station management, according to Patrick Scott. But then that little railroad man never had a chance.

everyone should have such a brother

Johnny Winter was a curiosity from the beginning. One can just imagine the glee with which Tiny Tim's old manager greeted the spectacle of an albino from Texas who sang just like a real blues singer. The surprise was that he really was a blues singer.

This at least was the impression I came away with at the Toronto Pop Festival where he sounded completely genuine. Something was generated between the audience (who were really prepared to like him) and Johnny himself. (He has been saying all week that he was very nervous). This was his first live appearance of any importance outside of Steve Paul's club in New York. He had to live up to his name, which he did.

But there was a completely different feeling to his concert last Friday at Massey Hall. Probably this had its origin in the setting; it is impossible to sit in plush seats and just watch the blues. Inevitably it turns into some kind of freak show with no real emotional content, no tension & release in the playing.

And it seemed also that Johnny Winter had changed. He came on in a brown brocade jacket and purple cords and began dancing like a snake. The guitar playing was as fluid as the rest of the act — tight, but nondescript backing and a well-choreographed interchange between Johnny and the drummer.

But here's the worm (said the apple). Boredom crept in. Why? The playing was excellent. But there was too much. As it all went on and on, I kept feeling that the whole thing had lost all meaning. There is some kind of indefinite felt reason behind each note that a man like B.B. King plays. When he goes into a solo he is really going somewhere. And the listener goes along with him (part way anyway) and they build off each other's feelings.

Something exciting did happen though. About halfway through his set — everybody should have a little brother, says Penny — he brought on his brother, Edgar. Edgar sat down at the organ and they moved into a long, beautiful number that sounded something like an electrified Grateful Dead. He left behind clusters of notes no longer attached to "the blues" but somehow belonging to a new castle of music. Edgar became the star of the show when, as the first twin albino seat-singing blues duo in history, they did it to "Tobacco Road". And so, yes Alice, we did go to bed happy, our heads raped and our ears deaf.

ian & sylvia -- too slick for country

Ever since the demise of folk music (or rather, of the popular variety that they did so well and made their reputation through) Ian and Sylvia have been looking for a bag. In the process they have produced some good songs (several of these were performed at their Convocation Hall concert on Monday — "Mr. Spoon," or Sylvia's "Woman's World", but these have been without reference to any on-going historical mainstream — rock, country, etc. Now, with the Great Speckled Bird as their back-up band, Ian and Sylvia have the equipment to do country music (or rather, the popular variety that Dylan has moved into and that The Band exemplifies — neo-country). And it is clear that they can write in this vein — witness Sylvia's "I Work Every Day in a Trucker's Cate." But they just don't have the touch to sing country music: their sophisticated showmanship betrays them.

The contrast between Ian and Sylvia and the Great Speckled Bird is immediately apparent. The band is remarkable. Buddy Cage is a perfect master of the steel guitar, every mournful twang carefully understated. The same for Amos Garrett, lead guitar, whose short, clear notes and fast runs weave in and out of the music in accomplished Nashville style. The drummer, Norman Smart, provided a fine backing, never stepping out of place in a type of music that depends, again, on understatement.

Ian and Sylvia, however, have a slick, serious delivery — quite the opposite of the studied dead-pan essential to neo-country music. A comparison with The Band, with whom they share material (including some of Dylan's songs), brings this out. The Band's version of "Long Black Veil" has a slow, almost tedious tempo. The lyrics are sung without comment, each note carefully following the previous one. When a note is drawn out, it is for musical rather than emotional effect. An extreme distance is maintained between the singer and the song (which, in this case, renders the song oddly humorous).

Ian and Sylvia, on the other hand, are constantly interject-maris strassfeld

ing themselves into the songs they sing. By demonstrating their virtuosity as singers they interfere with the effect of the song. They attempt to express the emotions of the song, rather than just letting everything be what it is, rather than just letting the song pass through them.

However, aside from their problems in finding a suitable new sound, they are often a pleasure to listen to. They are good singers, singing what they like. They borrow what they want from whatever bags are around.

pinball wizard meets acid queen, uncle ernie etc.

On Tuesday, October 14, The Who will perform Tommy, a rock opera, at the C.N.E. Coliseum. This composition, and the round of live concerts accompanying it, may be the most exciting event current in the world of rock.

Musically, Tommy is highly organized, with recurring melodic and lyric themes. The steady beat of rock is juxtaposed with extended musical phrases to achieve an effect that may be compared with classical music in its versatility and complexity. In a sense, Tommy is the culmination of an era of rock history, demonstrating that rock can be employed for a task as demanding as composing a full opera. The Who have succeeded in this without abandoning any of the basic musical forms of rock (they have even included a blues number by Sonny Boy Williamson, the only piece not their own — it fits perfectly).

The Who are especially accomplished as rhythm guitarists, relying more on fast chord progressions and rhythm rather than individual notes. The solid, driving beat of their guitars has been the distinctive feature of their sound since they began performing — and marks their music as unadulterated rock (in a line of descent that goes back to Bo Diddley).

The opera tells the story of Tommy, the new Messiah — a deaf, dumb, and blind kid and wizard on a pinball machine. Tommy as a boy is "unaware of everything":

*Playing poxy pin ball picks his nose and smiles and Pokes his tongue at everything.
Tommy goes on to become the best pinball player around (far cry from the days when Mes-siah's wandered down out of the hills or in from the desert). His constant plea is: "See me, feel he, touch me, heal me." A doctor cures him and Tommy is ready for the world.*

*You'll feel me coming
A new vibration
From afar you'll see me
I'm a sensation.
He preaches to the world.
"The theme of the sermon has come unto me, love will find a way." In place of meditation, contemplation, and such religious practices, Tommy has his own spiritual exercise:
If you want to follow me
You've got to play pin ball.
So put in your ear plugs
Put on your shades
And you know where to put the cork!*

Of course his followers forsake him in the end.

Tommy is too rich a story to describe in this short space. His adventures with the Acid Queen, mean Cousin Kevin ("the school bully"), and wicked Uncle Ernie are hilarious. The love of teeny-bopper Sally Simpson for Tommy is touching (she gets thrown off the stage at one appearance of Tommy's and gashes her face — such things have actually been known to happen at Doors concerts). Tommy might be taken as the true-life story of what its like to be a rock n' roll star.

records

Black & White, Tony Joe White — Monument SLP 18114

This is a weird Nashville record, engineered by some Cadillac-driving genius. The sound on any one cut is liable to range from rock to blues to swamp to country to r & b. You will also find flutes somewhere. It's a mixture of originals & standard pop. Wichita Lineman all re-worked into a funky mess. Good but somewhat monotonous vocals. Good bass work by Norbert Putnam.

Blues from Laurel Canyon — John Mayall — London PS 545

From its crystalline cover & voluminous magic pictures of Mayall to its self-pitying lyrics this effort exudes pretension. There is some good backing by what must be Mayall's umpteenth group but through it all is the feeling that he is playing at some alien form & feeding it into a massively overdeveloped ego. Nothing suggests that he knows or cares what he is doing.

Hallelujah — Canned Heat — London LST 7618

They've cleaned up their act — a little bit. An augmented band takes on 1968 & the police to good effect. And behind all the hokum of their avowed dirtiness is a good old-time straight blues band. Unfortunately they don't have much of a singer. Particularly good are Do Not Enter (remember the bikini with the exit sign) and Down in the Gutter (but Free).

Nucleus — Mains tream S/6120

A Touch of Gold — Johnny Rivers — Imperial LP 12427

I couldn't listen to either of them all the way through. The former makes the drastic mistake of confusing acid rock sound clusters with noise. Contrary to some opinion, there is a difference. Johnny Rivers goes pseudo-psychedellic. Enough said. I hope it doesn't sell.

salome's got that jazz feeling

Salome Bey, now appearing at George's Spaghetti House, has most of the qualities that a jazz singer requires. Among these are the jazzman's unique sense of time and rhythm and his way of taking liberties with phrasing. Of course, the most important thing is the "jazz feeling" — that ill-defined quality that places Louis Armstrong and Billie Holiday into the category of jazz singer while all other contenders — even Ella Fitzgerald — are somehow suspect.

Now, though Miss Bey — a talented singer by any standard — has these attributes, I am not certain that she wants to be labelled a "jazz singer". Indeed, many singers have tried to avoid being so tagged, and with good reason, for they have found that the "jazz singer" just doesn't get the lucrative jobs in the supper clubs and the electronic media.

Salome Bey has been heard occasionally around the city in the past few years. Prior to settling in Toronto (she is now the wife of Howard Matthews, a partner in The Underground Railroad), Miss Bey was a singer with Andy and the Bey Sisters. I've heard her sing a couple of times before and was impressed. She seemed to be a real jazz singer (a rare thing, actually) — not afraid to open up and swing in a straight ahead jazz context.

errol young

At George's these nights, the musicians backing up the singer have excellent jazz credentials, particularly Sir Charles Thompson, who is on sabbatical from the piano chair at the Golliwog Bar of the King Edward Hotel. But Salome Bey seems to be making an effort to avoid being caught in an exclusively jazz bag. Particularly in her choice of songs, she appears to be striving for an eclecticism which would satisfy a supper club crowd, rather than a jazz audience. The songs range from Aquarius and Mercy Mercy to old Cole Porter things like Anything Goes, to sentimental — semi-French things that remind me of Edith Piaf. Not one of the songs in the two sets we heard derived from the jazz tradition.

But jazz or not, Salome Bey is a fine singer. With a dark toned, powerful voice, and a simple, fully professional stage presence (no hokum), she was able to dominate the room, a considerable feat at George's, where the audience is always noisy and indifferent to the music. She even had to do an encore.

CONTINUE HERE:
PREPARE FOR ETERNITY. YOU'LL SOON BE THERE FOREVER. — billboard between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie.

A sidetrip never hurt anyone.

And so, fifteen minutes after escaping from the clutches of the red cleaner's truck, we were bumping along a gravel road in a blue Pontiac and a child with silky blonde hair was peering at the two visitors in the back seat, and flirting with us under his white eyebrows.

His two brothers scrambled over their parents and the father brought the baby close to his shoulder, as we wheeled off the bumpy sideroad.

A cluster of barracks-like wooden buildings confronted us for a few moments, as a bearded man in black clothes clambered into the back seat.

Five minutes later we were parked in the middle of the prairies looking over a wire fence at a horde of hundreds of FAT LADIES RUSHING TO THE BARGAIN TABLE.

Like sheep, they stormed off in one direction, and then tucked in their feet and skimmed back across on invisible water skis, their long white necks preceding them by a split second and their broad white wings fluttering comically near the ground because they had been clipped.

I started running around, picking up loose feathers to put in my hat, and the oldest of the three boys stood by and looked at me with a quizzical expression:

MORE GEESE. ALWAYS GEESE. ALWAYS MAKING THAT NOISE AND SCAMPING AROUND. WANDERING INTO MY BEDROOM IN THE MORNING. STEALING FOOD.

WHAT'S THE FUNNY LADY DOING? JUMPING UP AND DOWN AND RUNNING TO THE MAN WITH THE BLACK HAT.

I watched the seven-year-old sitting on his fence post and almost grinning, as I clutched handfuls of white goose feathers and stuffed them in my purse.

Suddenly he jumped down into the midst of the geese, scopping white down into his chubby palm. He thrust his collection in my face.

(THERE I WAS WITH ALL THE SILLY FEATHERS IN MY HANDS AND I COULDN'T FIGURE WHY. THE GOOSE LADY PROBABLY WANTS THEM.)

"These are for you. I don't need them."

His four year-old brother toddled around, following his example, beaming.

When the two men left the squawking we all trooped back to the car, the bearded man sat beside us again and I wondered, vaguely who he was. His face was sunburnt and freckled and he could have been 30 or 50. We stopped and the men went into one of the barracks.

A monster German Shepherd was dozing in the sun. The boys scampered out and rushed towards him.

WHAT ARE YOU DOING LETTING A MONSTER LIKE THAT PROWL THE STREETS WHY HE COULD PONCE ON MY PRECIOUS AND BABY HIM TO CHEWY LITTLE BITS and the three boys woke him up, talking excitedly, and the toddler clambered up onto the dog's back pony-style while the mother watched delightedly from the car.

A group of children gathered on some wooden steps watched Kevin bouncing on the dog. One boy, with baggy pants supported by suspenders, called the German shepherd back to the porch. A girl wearing a close cap to contain her braided hair, kept tripping on her ankle-length cotton dress, as she swung a friend back and forth on a swing.

I asked the mother why the children were dressed in such an old-fashioned way and she told me the farm was a Hutterite commune.

Rick quietly opened the back door and nudged his brother into the front seat, saying,

"You can't do that Kevin. You might hurt yourself."

He came to my ear and whispered confidentially.

"My friend went into the street and a car hit him and he died. I have to look after my little brother."

The oblong schoolhouse stood aside from the living quarters.

I figured the parents would take charge of their children's education but the boys' mother told me the Hutterites bring in teachers from outside.

I was just as surprised when I asked Rick if he liked school and he answered, "Not very much. This year in grade one they taught me to print my name."

By the end of that sticky-day, rain was threatening and we were standing outside of Brandon looking at a 26 flavour ice cream store. We opened the door and got in line.

MAPLE WALNUT. RHUBARB RIPPLE. BUTTERSCOTCH NUT CRUNCH. TANGERINE TWIST. COCONUT CABOOSE. ULTRA BODONI. ORANGE GASM. CHERRY CHURN. COME*AS*YOU*ARE* APPLE

(Original sin ice cream)
Girl at the counter chomping.

"Yea, what'llite."

"Two vanilla, please."
Music stops and the ice cream freezes in the customer's mouths.

"Ah, did I hear you say two VANILLA?"

"Yes, that's right."
"Ah, just a sec. Hey Harry we got vanilla. Some weirdo out here."

A weary voice from the back booms out, "Its under Brussel Sprout Bonanza."

Then mumbles, "Must be one of those queers. Always order vanilla. Oughtabe locked up those fruits."

We slinked out, soft white volcanoes slihering down our dry throats, dancing over a hill to the highway.

"We're freaks. Hey people we're weirdoos."

hurry to catch rush ?

Tom Rush returned last Friday to make one of his frequent visits to the Riverboat. The weekend also featured one of the Riverboat's all too rare double bills, with Keith McKie, an outstanding young performer.

The second half of the bill was reserved for Tom Rush, who appeared sporting a new moustache. Unfortunately, that was not the only change which Rush had undergone. His current repertoire is now heavily laden with updated tunes at the expense of the purer, more appealing Joni Mitchell type folk song.

This, of course, does not mean that Rush is no longer the most polished folk performer around. One still can't help but be enamored with his congenial manner and commanding stage presence. He still features some of the most humorous anecdotes ever delivered by a folk performer on sage. There is for instance his tale about the time he passed a troop convoy full of killers who insisted on passing the peace sign at him.

His material still ranges from the gutsy songs which Rush first performed in the Chuck Berry-Bo Diddley era, as exemplified by "Who Do You Love" to material such as Colours of the Sun, a beautiful ballad by Jackson Brown.

The instrumental work by Rush and his men was excellent. Rush himself played three finger acoustic guitar, backed by Trevor Weitch on guitar (who was particularly excellent on Colours of the Sun) and Duke Barton on bass.

Tom Rush may head for Europe this summer, and so this weekend will be the last opportunity to see him for quite a while. Take advantage of it.

ww I smash socko hit as flick —varsity

Beneath a scoreboard scoring impassionately of the total loss of 1,500,000 Allies, Sir Douglas Haig and his staff dance. Tickets to the pageant on the World War I amusement pier are eagerly purchased by entire families.

Field Marshal Sir John French, reminded of the French slaughter, blusters. "Damn it all Wilson, we've got our own war to fight." The chaplain absolves the men of killing on the Sabbath.

And the shell-shocked troops in the trenches sing, "We're here because we're here because we're here."

Oh! What a Lovely War is the Ed Sullivan Show, the latest news-footage from Vietnam and 'Guernica' by Picasso. Its style is musical comedy. Its mood is deadly black. Its impression is of forgotten history with ignored chapters in the present.

Adapted from Joan Little-wood's stage presentation, Richard Attenborough's brutal satire is a film in which heroes are awarded barbed-wire wreaths of glory. Like Peter Brook's Marat/Sade, Oh! What a Lovely War treats all situations as a series of tableaux. Behind the official panorama of World War I, directed by the British from an amusement pier, by the French from a merry-go-round and by all sides from interminable gala balls, lies (ultimately in mass graves) another tableau — the Smith family at the front.

The Smiths are the Every-men, the first to volunteer, the expendables. They enlist, by jingo, to songs praising their manhood, their patriotism and the rightness of their mission. They march, like graduates at commencement exercises, onto the divinely-ordained stage of war and are pushed behind the scenes into trenches reeking of mustard gas and decomposing bodies. Where once they sang 'rule Britannia', they now sing 'Gassed' while British-owned factories in Germany over-produce for the Kaiser and Haig prays for victory.

Attenborough's attitude to the Great War always remains in sharp focus in his film. Sir Douglas Haig is little more than a naive socialite who dances poorly and commands even-worse. The entire body of British officialdom, dreaming of Empire, is content to bask in the glory of the nineteenth century, while Englishmen are deliberately kept ignorant of the realities of trench-warfare.

Irony is everywhere in Oh! What a Lovely War. From his command-post atop a giant spiral slide perched on a Brighton amusement pier, Haig puffs, "We're going to walk through the German lines." Cut to: a shell-crater, four infantrymen, the mud on their faces slowly dissolving under a steady downpour of rain.

But the most persistently ironic comments on an ironic war in which French cavalry tilt at German artillery are the songs through which the chaos is seen. Not one of them is without a bitter, wry overtone when juxtaposed against the settings of war and, perhaps this is the one fault of the film. Cross-cutting between song and action or action and song effectively illustrates Attenborough's viewpoint, but his intent becomes overly-predictable after continued use. Irony is a powerful dramatic technique, yet, like all technique, loses its impact when relied upon exclusively.

Oh! What a Lovely War might have been another in the continuing series of smug, self-righteous anti-war films (ie. The Charge of the Light Brigade) but it generally replaces the obvious with the subtle. Mercifully, Attenborough never pontificates, but instead shells war with one of the angriest blasts I can remember at the end of his film without speaking a word.

did they have to bash the seagull?

Fire Island, the well-known haunt of homosexuals and other social deviants in New York City, is the setting for Last Summer, a story of another sector of alienated society — four teenagers.

None of the four people involved are really representative of youth today since they are all outcast whelps of wealthy parents who never appear on the screen. Yet they symbolize the growing tragedy of modern-day society — a sense of isolation and a resulting frustration which if pushed can lead to violence.

Sandy and her constant blonde companions flash their tanned and beautiful teeth at us, but they can't con us with their smiles. We see what a phantasmagoria their psyches are and what ugly intentions they have.

The film ambivalently attempts to show that the parents have contributed much to their children's loneliness, but that all the decisions made in the movie are spontaneous and the responsibility of the teenagers as individuals and not merely as the product of their environment. It is true that Sandy is bitter towards the skinny, effeminate little man sleeping with her mother — but does she have to bash the brains out of her pet seagull? Although Peter's parents were the source of marijuana for their pot party, were Sandy and Peter and Dan compelled to follow the actions of their parents?

Even the relationship among the trio is entered into, by the boys at least, for the express purpose of laying Sandy in the woods as soon as possible. Sandy seems to enjoy the power that her sexuality gave her over the two boys. Sandy isn't plagued by conscience, but instead is ecstatic over her new-found desirability.

Into this Utopia stumbles pudgy, studious Rhoda with her braced-teeth who, unfortunately, has a sense of morality, sensitivity and the desperate need to be loved and accepted. She questions the three about their violation of the seagull's basic rights, and makes them uncomfortable by introducing doubt. Immediately Sandy senses competition — not sexually, but spiritually. In Rhoda, Sandy senses someone equally as strong-willed who threatens her dominance.

As with the seagull, however, Sandy accepts Rhoda who seems weakened by insecurity and the haunting memory of her mother's drowning and who doesn't seem too competitive in a one-piece bathing suit. But, like the seagull, Rhoda tries to assert her rights — most particularly in her attempt not to go out with the Puerto Rican computer-date, and later not to abandon him to a gang of toughs.

Sandy slowly begins to feel that Rhoda is no longer amusing, no longer acting out the subservient role that she should be playing. At the end of the film, after Sandy has received the most unkind blow of all from Rhoda — a sense of doubt and self-disgust — she tries to destroy her. That act of unspeakable violence leaves each character in the film, and the audience itself, permanently isolated from each other.

Most of us stopped experimenting with our own definitions at about age four. Kenneth Burke, one of the few contemporary writers that has something relevant to say about our tendency to sleep-walk through existence," says:

In the unwritten cosmic constitution that lies behind all non-made Constitutions, it is decreed by the nature of things that each man is "necessarily free" to be his own tyrant, inexorably imposing upon himself the peculiar combination of insights associated with his peculiar combination of experiences.

MUSIC

Burn, I Want To See You Burn!
No, it's not Rap Brown or Bobby Seale. It's Cejay, beautiful Cejay, lead singer with the New Bar — K's, not to be confused with the old Bar-kays. They're tough and they're playing at Soul City, 167 Church St., one block north of Queen. They're there Fri. Sat. Sun. from nine till three in the morning. A curious hybrid, they fall somewhere between James Brown and Sly and the Family Stone. In fully fuschia shirts, afro hairstyles and pants tight where it counts — they play soul. The brass section is good, the organist is cool, they're all so incredibly tight. The rhythms pour across the room, a whirling maelstrom of noise. You can leave your head at home, this is for the body. It's that special between the legs type music. The guitarist hits the wah wah, the guts are pouring out. It's funky. Screaming Cejay growsls the stage. He's beautiful, loins pushing forward, hips arching, a long scream, "Burn, I want to see you burn."

THEATRE

Things are starting to happen in campus theatre, so here's Part I of your handy guide to what's playing or planned in the near future. (Notice our editor's thoughtfulness in placing this column at the outer edge of the page, where it can be clipped out with a minimum of scissors effort.)

SMC THEATRE MICKITIES
— The Tempest, directed by Barrie Brodie, 6 — 9 November in the SMC Student Centre.

— Streetcar Named Oesire, directed by the Drama Centre's Fred Marker, at 8:30 26-29 November in Central Library Theatre. Since not all of the male roles have been cast yet, men-only audition will be held Tuesday, 14 October, at 7:30 in Carr Hall.

TRINITY COLLEGE DRAMATIC SOCIETY
— Nothing definitely scheduled before Richard Reoch's Songs for the Coal Forest Children, 16-20 December in Central Library Theatre. An open audition for this production will be held Wednesday, 15 October, 3.00-5.00 in Cartwright Hall of St Hilda's College.

VICTORIA COLLEGE DRAMA SOCIETY
— Albee's American Dream and The Sandbox, directed by Tony Shepherd, 29 and 30 October at 8.00.

— The Ten of Us, a musical written and directed by Jim Betts, 6-8 November at 8.00.

— The Bob Revue, The Emperor's New Clothes, written and directed by John Bemrose, 18-22 November at 8.30.

— Anouilh's Antigone, directed by Bob Galbraith, 2-6 December at 8.30.

All of these will be in Room 3 of Vic's New Academic Building, and all but the first are still casting. Information about tryouts may be obtained from Anne MacKenzie at 920-8541.

So much for and from the federated colleges. Part II will outline the activities of the drama groups at UC, Innis and New. Meanwhile, two professional openings next Monday, 13 October: at the O'Keefe, Hans Conreid in Spofford, a comedy adapted by Hans Shumlin from Peter DeVries' novel Reuben, Reuben; and at the Royal Alexandra, the Harkness Ballet.

FILM

On Oct. 10-12, Janus Films is presenting New Cinema, a programme of short films, at the Ryerson Theatre. If shorts seem to be a dying film-form, New Cinema is guaranteed to convince you otherwise. Among the more impressive shorts offered are Machina, a brilliant animated study of modern technology by Wolfgang Ulrich; Actua-Tilt, a gritty film about mechanization by Gean Herman; and The Dove by George Coe, an infamous piece in which every sacred Bergman image is satirically demolished in 15 minutes.

RADIO

The music of RAVI SHANKAR, as recorded this summer at the Mac-Millan Theatre, will be broadcast on CBC radio's Tuesday Night, October 14, at 8:10 pm. Ravi Shankar is accompanied by Alla Rakha, playing the tabla, and Kamala Chakravarty, tamboura.

JONATHAN WINTERS makes a guest appearance on the first show of the season for FUNNY YOU SHOULD SAY THAT, a highly successful comedy show that may signal the revival of radio. Sunday afternoon, October 12, 5:03 on CBC radio.

TELEVISION

CBC WEEKEND, the ultra new Information Programming series premieres this weekend. It's the result of a whole lot of shuffling and jumbling of departments, unions, staff and concepts in programming. This Saturday night after the hockey game and Sunday at 10 pm.

MUSIC

The Faculty of Music's Thursday Afternoon Series presents concerts which are almost always worthwhile. Sometimes the music is well played; sometimes it's not, but in any case it's usually interesting.

For last Thursday's recital 'cellist Peter Schenkman chose some fine 'cello sonatas, and these were well worth hearing, even if this particular time the playing wasn't spectacular.

The Bach Sonata in G minor got off to a shaky start. Intonation was occasionally a bit off; things weren't falling into place rhythmically; figurations and ornaments were sloppily executed, and the 'cello's tone was so thin and uneven that it got lost underneath the piano accompaniment.

Fortunately the Beethoven Sonata went much better. Schenkman apparently feels rather more at home with Beethoven than with Bach (or with Ravel, whose duet sonata for violin and 'cello was the third item on the program). The jocular final Allegro Vivace of the Beethoven was attacked with appropriate gusto and verve.

Unfortunately the Ravel sonata got much the same treatment, and with Ravel it doesn't fit. The Beethoven was jovial and hearty, but the Ravel demanded wit and elegance, and should not have been over-Romanticised. Although from a technical standpoint they played well, Schenkman and violinist David Zafer seemed only occasionally in tune with this stylistic aspect of the music.

FILM

Now that television is waging its war against violence and reviving the doctors and lawyers, more people are turning to the cinema for the treatment of a theme in an adult fashion. In other words, they go to the movies for the cheap thrills which the tube can't offer.

With the re-appearance of two Clint Eastwood epics, Western connoisseurs now have the opportunity to sit through four-and-a-half hours of cold-blooded murders, disembowelings and mutilations.

In Hang'em High, Director Ted Post succeeds fairly adequately in depicting and deploring the gross iniquities and shortcomings of frontier justice. But the slap in the face comes when Eastwood rides off in Hang'em High, realizing that a fair trial is the only civilized way to judge human beings, and then returns five minutes later in The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly as a cigar-chomping killer.

Unfortunately, any spark of originality in either movie is buried under a sea of blood. Both films are specimens of cinematic ineptitude, with nothing to offer but death-rattle sound effects and a wide array of full-colour corpses.

MUSIC

Probably the best place in town right now to get good entertainment at a minimal cost is at the Onion, a coffeehouse in the Ryerson Student Union at Gould and Victoria (a block east of Sam's and A & A).

This week it's Adam Mitchell, and coming up are Don Crawford, Dave Van Ronk, and Lennie Breau.

The sets start about 9:30, food and drink ranges in cost from 10 ¢ to 50 ¢, and the atmosphere is darkened and casual. For information call 366-5369.

Interpax plans to lean on gov't

The student arm of Interpax, the aid-Biafra plan supported by Stanley Burke, pledged itself to an activist campaign Wednesday night.

Jack Green, one of the leaders of the group, said that Interpax is essentially an information distributing agency headed by a coalition of Stanley Burke and church leaders around the world.

"Our group," he said, "will be politically active. Our main aim is to politicize the Canadian public in order to put pressure on the government."

He said public pressure had worked effectively last year to make Canadian planes available for relief flights, but people have now forgotten about Biafra.

Immediate plans are to "infiltrate" External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp's riding with posters, pamphlets, and informational meetings in high schools, churches, and organizations.

December 6 is the tentative date for a one day blitz, when the entire riding will be canvassed with a petition. The group, which has close to 100 volunteers so far, hopes to have 2000 people by that time.

Lack of money is one of the main problems. The group hopes to get some help from Canajrelief, the agency that sends "food planes" to Biafra, but in the meantime those present at the meeting were asked to raise fifty dollars each. They need money to pay for posters and films.

A statement, written by Stanley Burke, says that a million people were allowed to die last year, and people are still dying, "because the rest of the world couldn't care less."

Canada should play a peace-making role in the conflict, he wrote, and should aid the Biafran people to prevent mass starvation. He said that this will be achieved only if pressure is put on the government.

Law and order comes to Blue and White

The Blue and White Society lives. Or at least, it has a new chairman to keep it alive.

Mike Lawrie (III VIC) officially took over Wednesday from Wayne Pulver (III NEW). Pulver was named interim chairman when last year's chairman, Abe Mudrick (SGS), resigned in May.

Lawrie said one of his first priorities would be "to bring a little order to the Blue and White."

The society has already lost money this year and the finances have to be put in order.

"The idea of the Blue and White Society," said Lawrie, "is not to turn a profit."

"The idea is to provide good, cheap entertainment such as dances, films, concerts, skiing weekends, etc.," he said.

Lawrie blamed B&W losses es this year on improper timing and lack of publicity for events.

He thinks a survey to find out what the students want would be a good idea.

This idea, and plans for Homecoming Weekend, will be discussed at a meeting Tuesday at 7 p.m. in the Bickersteth Room, Hart House.

Psych staff wants student participation

Department of psychology staff have called for a small staff-student sub-committee to discuss student proposals for representation in department affairs.

Prof. Tony Doob, undergraduate academic advisor, said the staff proposal was "an attempt to streamline proceedings" to get debate started, but added it was not necessarily the only way to handle the situation.

The staff will choose three members and the course union is asked to do the same.

The Psychology Students' union discussed the proposal at a meeting at Sidney Smith Hall last Monday.

In the informal setup which exists now, undergraduates and graduates are encouraged to make suggestions to the department but they have no say in the adoption of the recommendations.

A faculty committee meets every two weeks to discuss business, but there are no students on this committee or any of the department sub-committees.

At the beginning of the term, members of the course union presented a paper to the chairman of the department outlining student grievances.

A student-faculty forum discussed the paper. The Faculty felt it was too vague, and recommended the students make it more specific.

Monday's meeting was called to work out more specific suggestions, but because of a low turnout, no decisions were made.

97-year-old mushrooms

Students in the campus' oldest course union, the Maths and Physics Society which was founded in 1872, are experiencing growing pains this year.

Under the old program, there were only about four hundred students enrolled in the honors Math, Physics, and Chemistry course. Most were active members of the Society.

This year, because of the latitude of choice allowed under the new program, the course union probably represents some three to four thousand students; anyone, in fact, who is taking even one math or physics course.

That's quite a leap in membership and Bob Spencer, President of the Executive Council, is trying to organize a system of student reps.

Under a proposed new constitution, each class would have one rep, to act as liaison between the staff, the Executive Council, and the students.

The society is planning to press for the implementation of the CUG report in the Math and Physics departments.

Redmen visit Blues in first-place battle

Only one thing is certain about tomorrow's crucial game between Blues and the resurging McGill Redmen — after it's over there will be only one undefeated team in the SIFL.

Redmen have astounded the forecasters by storming to two upset victories, 28-6 over Queens in the season opener

SoccerBlues win

Maybe it was the presence at the game of last year's star Jim Lefkos that did the trick!

In any case the Soccer Blues played inspired football for the first time this year as they downed the Waterloo Warriors 5-2 on the back campus Wednesday afternoon.

While the Blues don't have the powerhouse team that rolled over the rest of the league in past years, the Toronto side came up with a first class effort in this one.

It was a case of letting "John" do it Wednesday afternoon as veteran forward John Gero hit for three goals and rookie wing half John Cobby notched the other two.

Waterloo got goals from outside right, Rinaldo Ciofle and centre-forward, Gord Barclay.

It's a clash of the undefeated tomorrow afternoon as Blues meet the Soccer Mustangs from Western at noon on the back campus.

and 30-11 last week over Western.

The charges of coach Tom Mooney were tough, determined and impressive, particularly in the devastating beating administered to the defending champion Gaels right in Kingston.

Mooney's spartan training methods have been severely criticized in the past, but he now seems to be enjoying the last laugh.

His attack is built around last season's rushing leader 170 (?)-pound fullback Dave Fleischer and nifty flanker Pete Bender. McGill also boasts a heavy mobile line and a very

RuggerBlues win, draw

The Blues Rugger Team played to a 6-6 draw with the Waterloo Warriors in Varsity Stadium Wednesday.

As usual, it was inadequate forward support that gave the win away. It was the skill of the Toronto backs that balanced the drive of the Waterloo pack.

Early in the match, Owens scored three points on a penalty goal. The Waterloo pack was frequently offside and enabled Toronto to set up a try by Wynn from a lineup. Then, disaster struck when Waterloo pounced on a fumbled ball in the U of T matured George Wall calling the signals.

For Blues, tomorrow is the test of whether coach Ron Murphy's careful program of constant improvement and extension of the running game will pay off.

Both the offensive and defensive units have been excellent at times but also incredibly spotty and unco-ordinated, especially in the first half.

Blues need a solid 60-minute effort to win.

The game will NOT be televised but the game film will be screened Tuesday at 1 p.m. in the Hart House Fencing Room. All Welcome.

end-zone.

The second half was very even with deep rushes by both teams but it was the fine toe of the Waterloo fullback that evened the score on a drop goal. The even match justly ended in a tie.

The seconds were more successful and trounced Waterloo 32-5 in a hard tackling display of good teamwork and spirit.

Tomorrow the Blues are host to Western, the most threatening side last year. Games on the back campus will be at 12:00 and 1:30. We need your support.

nized Kealey, who sat up on the back of his chair to address the council. "I'd like people not to sit on the back of the chair," interrupted Van Geijn, "because it always gets all philosophical."

TOO STUPID

Kealey conceded he intended to be philosophical, but did not change his position. "Obviously the document is too stupid to be a conspiracy," he began. "It's full of internal contradictions."

Mellwain then rose to make the most impassioned speech of the evening. "Godammit, SAC is not a political party, it is a student government and abnegates its responsibility to students when it even thinks of manipulation."

"CUS is a radical organization and I'm not a radical and resent having to belong to it. There's too much McCarthyism and god-forsaken name-calling and I don't want to fight the referendum on that basis."

Chris Szalwinski, Services Commissioner: "Mr. Speaker, point of personal privilege."

Mellwain: "Mr. Speaker, I have never mentioned that asshole by name."

Speaker George Murray: "I've never seen so many paranoids in all my life."

Mellwain: "I apologize for the use of that seven-letter word. I am satisfied with Mr. Barkwell's statement and I hope my constituents in engineering will be also."

Barkwell's motion passes with an overwhelming majority. It is 10.55 p.m.

MOVES ADOPTION

At 11.30 External Affairs Commissioner Mike Simon (III Scar) moves adoption of the contract negotiated between SAC and the SAC office staff — Local 1222 of the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

Immediately law representative Bob Vernon presented the speaker with a 2,300-name petition requesting a campus-wide referendum on the contract.

"Oh no, Bob, don't file it now," exclaimed Van Geijn. "We're cutting off * debate by handing it in at this stage." "Speaking purely as an individual," SAC Communications Commissioner Jon Levin intoned, "I suggest this campus really doesn't want another referendum." "I'm sure this problem can be worked out to everyone's satisfaction," Levin continued, while several members busied themselves checking the accuracy of the signatures.

VETO POWER

"This contract gives the office employees veto power over SAC policy, over any changes in the office," Vernon charged.

"The executive tried to sneak it through during the summer when most students are away," he added.

Barkwell rose to defend the contract. "Since early August, we've been fucking around with other people's lives. If we do not support office democracy and worker control of their own environment in our own offices, SAC might as well forget 'student power' and go back to running dances and giving money to the Blue and White."

CHAOTIC DEBATE

During the chaotic debate which followed, some members suggested the contract be renegotiated "so lots of valuable amendments can be added" and others wondered whether SAC has the legal power to enter into a labor-management contract.

Finally a compromise was achieved. Council passed two sections which it felt embody "the spirit of the contract" and agreed to renegotiate all other clauses.

All members of the university may suggest amendments to the contract, copies of which may be obtained in the SAC office. Vernon agreed to table his petition until the next SAC meeting.

CONFUSED AS HELL

"I'm just as confused as hell," muttered Kealey. It was now 12.30 a.m.

Council is now able to debate the motion everyone has been waiting for. George Sachs moves that SAC rescind its earlier motion of commitment to CUS.

"SAC as a body should be neutral. Of course, members as individuals can and should take stands and campaign."

Mellwain: "SAC's pro-CUS bias affects its constitutional responsibility to conduct a referendum. There is sincere and reasoned opposition to CUS, but how can it compete against a well-oiled and well-financed machine?"

Barkwell: "If we as SAC members believe membership in CUS is beneficial to us as a student government and useful to the students at large, we have a responsibility to say so and finance the pro-CUS campaign."

"You're making the anti-CUS group into the underdog," said Vernon, "and underdogs usually get extra sympathy."

In a 19-12 roll-call vote, the council re-affirmed its commitment to CUS.

The members then freed Abols to campaign as he sees fit. Abols indicated he will actively oppose continued U of T membership in CUS.

Council then turned to the sticky question of how much SAC money the pro-CUS group would get.

To everyone's amazement, the pro-CUS Finance Commissioner, Bob James, calmly suggested $1,900.

The anti-CUS group was dumfounded, since a SAC presidential candidate is strictly limited to campaign expenses of $150.

Vernon: "Why not half a million?" James: "OK, move the motion."

Pulver (sarcastically): "The vote was close this time, even."

After a comical search for a compromise figure, Council agrees to give $1,000 to the pro-CUS group.

Still-alert member Tony Usher (III UC) reminds the meeting that the "pro-CUS group" has not been officially recognized, and therefore SAC has just voted money to a non-existent organization.

The meeting quickly appoints Mike Simon chairman of the pro-CUS group.

The other nominee is Jon Levin, who is anti-CUS.

Simon's reaction: "I think this whole goddam thing is ridiculous."

Council approves the wording of the referendum ballots — Are you in favor of continued membership of the University of Toronto Students Administrative Council in the Canadian Union of Students and the Ontario Union of Students?

Mellwain then forces the reluctant members to formally consider financing the anti-CUS group.

"I approve some financing for a principle debate during the campaign, but we must eliminate all anti-intellectual shit," Barkwell says.

He proposes anti-CUS material be "reviewed" by the SAC executive and up to $500 be made available if the material is judged "reasonable".

CENSORSHIP CHARGED

The anti-CUS group charges this amounts to "censorship" and SAC finally agrees that both groups will be responsible to the executive for the tone of their material.

Barkwell: "that's groovy." Pulver: "This whole discussion has been bullshit. It's the most unstructured meeting I've been to in my whole life."

Anne Maurer (III SMC): "If you can't like it, resign."

Pulver: "We're going to go out and see whether one side can win with $500 and the other can win with $1,000. The whole thing is fucking ludicrous."

Barkwell: "Almost from the beginning of the evening this meeting has been insane."

Pulver: "If this is reported the way it happened, we'll all look like idiots." Meeting adjourns at 2.01 a.m.

As the groggy members file out, Gus Abols strolls to a nearby piano and slowly plays Etude no. 3 by Chopin.

Elton narrowly defeats Hobbs for VCUC presidency

John Elton last night was elected president of the Victoria College Union Council, narrowly defeating Ernie Hobbs, who resigned from the position two weeks ago.

With a surprisingly heavy

President-elect JOHN ELTON turnout at the polls, Elton won by a scant 36 votes. More than 900 ballots were cast, representing about 36 per cent of the eligible voters.

Following his victory, Elton said "I'm very tired and very excited. Now I've got to get down to work right away. I'm taking over the job in mid-year and there's a lot to do."

Also elected as members-at-large were John Kirton, who ran on a slate with Elton; Paul Hurly, who ran with Hobbs, and Glenda Stark, a first year student who ran independently.

Hobbs resigned as president when he felt the VCUC was not taking sufficiently strong stands on the issues of university government, the Canadian Union of Students referendum, and the recent discipline controversy.

During the campaign, Elton stressed the need for negotiation rather than confrontation in dealing with the Victoria University administration.

Ironically, one of the first issues facing the new president could renew the conflict of the past election. Vic is currently setting up its own version of the Commission on University Government, and Hobbs said last night he would run for one of the student positions on the commission.

(Victoria University, as a federated college in U of T, has its own Board of Regents and Senate. Mini-CUG, as it is known, will study the same types of questions at Vic as CUG did for U of T.)

"I'm disappointed," Hobbs said last night, "more for the council than myself."

Election results were delayed when a number of close contests, including that for the presidency, necessitated recounts.

The count is CUG minus one

The long-awaited report by the Commission on the Government of the University of Toronto will be released later this week.

To help provide a framework for the discussions which will follow the report, The Varsity today presents a summary of the U of T Structure in its pre-CUC version.

The University structures are prescribed by the University of Toronto Act of the Ontario Legislature. This makes the Ontario Government, through the Department of University Affairs and its Minister, the ultimate authority for U of T. There is a similar, separate act for each of the 14 provincially-chartered universities.

The most powerful body, in legal terms, directly connected with the university is the Board of Governors.

THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS

"The government, conduct, management and control of the University and of University College, and of the property, revenues, business and affairs thereof, shall be vested in the Board." (The University of Toronto Act, 1947.)

The Board has 32 members appointed for six-year terms by the Provincial Cabinet.

Although it may be overruled by the Provincial Cabinet, the Board has complete control over all functioning within the university. It has the legal power to borrow up to $500,000 without government approval and can expropriate property for university use.

In practice, the Board deals primarily with financial and developmental matters, leaving academic matters to the Senate and departments and most administrative functions to the President and his administrators.

All Ontario residents who are British subjects are eligible to be governors. However, in general, the governors tend to be old Conservative politicians and businessmen.

The justification for the Board's membership is that businessmen are financially capable and have fund raising connections. As the government share of university financing increases, this latter function diminishes.

No member of the U of T staff, faculty or administration can be on the Board, although the President and Chancellor of the University are ex-officio (non-voting) members.

The Provincial Cabinet can remove Board members at any time, for any reason, and the Board can remove a member if he is "mentally ill", "incapable", if he is chronically absent from meetings or if he joins the university staff.

The Board meets weekly in Simcoe Hall, with day-to-day business run by an executive committee.

Most business is handled by sub-committees, 15-20 in all, including Finance, Property and Undergraduate Activities.

All Board meetings are closed. Communications to the Board from the student body, the Senate and the administration must pass through the President of the University.

Although the Board of Governors is allowed by the University of Toronto Act to appoint "a representative committee of students as a medium of communication on behalf of students and board," it has never done so.

Pro and Anti-CUS face off as referendum looms next week

By TREVOR SPURR

A well-organized pro-CUS machine will engage an amorphous anti-CUS faction in political battle during the next week to determine the future of CUS on the U of T campus.

The referendum on CUS membership will be held next Thursday, October 23.

The pro-CUS group has formed committees in each of the colleges and faculties on campus with a central committee to oversee all activities.

The group is headed by Michael Simon (IV Scar) and has the support of several members of the SAC executive, including vice-president Bob Barkwell, finance commissioner Bob James and University commissioner Greg Kealey.

"We hope to educate the students as to what the hell is going on in CUS", James said in an interview last night.

"This will involve going around to the various colleges and speaking to the students on an individual basis," he said.

In line with this policy of educating the public on the value of the national student union, the pro-CUS group also plans to distribute three pamphlets of 12,000 to 13,000 circulation each.

"We will also have a number of forums with such people as Steve Langdon speaking for our side. Even Bruce Kidd will be down on campus to help," James said.

In contrast, the anti-CUS group has not set up any formal structure to run its campaign.

We are not the NDP or the New Left Caucus so we don't plan a rigid structure to fight the campaign," said Art McIlwain (IV APSC), leader of the dump-CUS faction.

"CUS is not a student union but rather is a political party," he said last night.

"The views of all members of the union should be equally welcome but people with views such as mine do not feel welcome at CUS meetings," he said.

He described "people such as himself" as those who do not believe in "the need for revolution to accomplish local change."

The anti-CUS group also plans a number of speaking engagements to present its viewpoint. It plans to add to the blizzard of circulars by printing several thousand of its own.

Even with all this reading material available on the streets, a spokesman at the main library said he did not foresee a drop in book circulation during the week of the referendum campaign.

Campaign funds were provided by SAC at last week's general meeting. The pro-CUS group was given $1000 and the anti-CUS group received $500.

All SAC fees-paying students can vote in the referendum. Graduate students who have paid SAC fees must provide proof that they have done so before they can vote.

All non-SAC fees-paying students who wish to vote may do so providing they pay the $12 membership fee at the SAC office before the referendum.

The SFU snafu... an historical perspective

By ALLAN E. WARNKE

Allan E. Warnke has a B.A. in sociology from Simon Fraser University, and taught for one year in the PSA department. He is currently a graduate student and teaching assistant at McMaster University in Hamilton.

He wrote this comment article for Canadian University Press in an attempt to analyse the situation at his alma mater. It was written before yesterday's announcement that made "scab" Robert Wylie PSA chairman.

A brief summary of the latest crisis at Simon Fraser University is simple: the administration of SFU is dismissing all of the faculty (with the exception of a small minority) in the department of political science, sociology and anthropology (PSA).

Many radicals feel this is the issue which clearly illustrates to students, faculty and public alike the administration's complete disregard for academic freedom.

The current crisis is the last stage of a successful drive by B.C. Premier W.A.C. Bennett, SFU Chancellor Gordon Schrum and President Kenneth Strand to rid SFU of critical elements within the institution.

The price has been high for both sides.

An entire department which enrolls one quarter of SFU's students has been smashed and nearly dissolved in the process.

Many of the continent's leading academics have left or are being fired. The department's standards will undoubtedly drop.

And despite the radical reputation SFU has established, it is becoming the most conservative campus in Canada. This sudden shift to the right was led by highly-experienced American personnel whose aim was to rid SFU of any 'subversive' tendencies and establish a training program conducive to the American Empire.

Many conservatives will applaud the recent events at SFU, since it is fashionable to blame radicalism for the poor image higher education is getting these days. Yet what people should know is that SFU's administration broadly defines 'subversive' to weed out those treading the fine line of leadership

Letters on SAC

Sir,
I wish to take strong exception (prudence prevents me from saying "violent exception") to the Varsity editorial opportunity to clarify my position of October 10th in which the "commitment" of various leftist SAC members was determined by their positions on wish to see a liberal or conservative CUS, but rather because I am concerned about the credibility of the left. So long as we pretend to represent any sizeable faction of the student population, while continuing to press for radical reforms which have no grass roots support, we undermine that credibility and alienate potential sources of support. We of the left must stand up on our own, few in number though we be, and say our piece, attempting first of all to rouse the political consciousness of our own constituents. In other words, we tread a fine line between truly leading the student body and racing ahead along paths it will not follow. Perhaps the day is coming when SAC and CUS will no longer be a viable structure for leftist activity. Andy Wernick reached this conclusion last year and one must admire his honesty and integrity.

Finally, in regard to my personal "commitment" to the left, I would point out that during the recent discipline crisis, the six demands drawn up by the left were presented to council for its consideration by me.

Lee Coulter,
SAC Education Commissioner

body's performance would be at last approaching low-level competence. A Speaker who knows the rules, the campus situation, and the SAC, and who has the patience and gumption to strictly control a meeting — as a meeting should be controlled — could perform a blessing for this campus. No student body, however apathetic or dull, should have to be submitted to the tedium and childishness that the students at U. of T. must face because of their SAC.

I urge any SAC members who really have the welfare of the students at heart to put out a call for a Speaker of force and authority to ride herd on what now passes for a body of student legislators. Perhaps then the embarrassment we now suffer from the SAC can be ended. SAC has the potential to do a great deal indeed — why the hell doesn't it do it? And do it right?

R. D. Payne

sac needs brains and guts

Sir,

I find it patently incredible that the students — who generally ignore the SAC as totally as possible — should stand by and watch this body politic destroy what student government credibility remains at the U. of T. without protesting the fact. Since SAC is supposed to be a representative government it either indicates that ALL students at the university are clods of the first rate, or that the SAC members simply do not make an effort to sound out the opinions of their constituents. The first alternative is distasteful, but possible; the latter highly probable.

It has been my experience, unfortunately, to have had to deal with the SAC over a period of four years through my work at the radio. In that time I have been convinced of only one thing — that the SAC in general, and this SAC in particular, is one of the most pompous, self-aggrandizing, unresponsive and inexperienced bodies I have ever seen. I find it incredible that the students would put up with the almost cretin-like level of debate that passes for responsible student government. SAC seems so preoccupied with playing politics that the useful legislation they somehow manage to pass in the course of a year seems luck rather than any great governmental skill.

I have maintained for several years that should the SAC have the brains and the guts to appoint a REAL speaker the the CUS referendum during the last SAC debate. I am especially grieved to find myself categorized as one of the "less committed".

I would like to take this opportunity to clarify my position of October 10th in which the "commitment" of various leftist SAC members was determined by their positions on CUS. It seems to me that a national student union is not the appropriate structure through which the student radical movement should operate. Not because I particularly

Gus condemns 'shoddy' contract, denies right-wing label

Sir,

In last Friday's Varsity, in the editorial comments there were a number of things stated which I feel were incorrect and misleading. The first statement to which I take offence was your representation of my position on the union contract which the SAC is presently negotiating with its employees. I am not opposed to office democracy — that is, to allowing the SAC workers to determine amongst themselves how to distribute the administrative work load imposed on them by the SAC. I am however, strongly opposed to a contract which in my mind gives the employees an effective VETO power of SAC policies that may change the nature of the work that the SAC would like to undertake. I think it is imperative that the SAC, the elected government of the students, the organization that bears the political responsibilities, retain the ultimate policy-making powers. Any infringement on this responsibility, by employees that are not politically responsible to the students, I find is perverse and unacceptable. I refer specifically to the clause in the contract under the heading of "technological and other changes": "The clause requires approval of the employees where "other changes affecting the rights of the workers" are to be made by the SAC. You will notice that, under the proposed contract, rights of the workers includes everything but hiring, firing and promoting. I'd like to stress that I am not opposed to unions per se, or the right of employees to organize. I am, however, opposed to shoddy contracts that interfere with the political responsibilities of the SAC to its electorate.

Secondly, I feel there was an attempt in your recent editorial to label me as right-wing. What greater purpose such labeling has, of course escapes me. I would like however, to point out that I have always voted, not along partisan lines as do many SAC members, irrespective of the issue, but rather on the issues as they arise, according to what I feel would be in the best interests of the students on this campus, and essentially on the basis of my election platform. My voting record, I think clearly shows that I have supported and opposed motions made by all political factions on the council.

Lastly, I'd like to point out that at Executive meetings I am the chairman. There is, I feel a difference between being fair and polite, as a chairman, and between docile.

Gus Abols,
SAC President

(Ed. — First we would like to thank SAC Communications Commissioner Jon Levin for personally delivering Gus Abols' letter to The Varsity office.)

Canada catches spillover from million-man moratorium today

The American consulate will be the site of a rally today at noon to protest the War in Vietnam.

The rally, organized by the Vietnam Mobilization Committee, will press solidarity with the U.S.-wide moratorium on "business-as-usual". This is part of a fall offensive against the war.

The fall program will culminate in international demonstrations on Nov. 15.

Today's moratorium is expected to involve the closing of hundreds of American high-schools and universities, George Addison of Toronto's VMC said yesterday.

American students will spend the day knocking on doors to talk about the Vietnamese war. They will tell people they expect to be in Vietnam next year unless the war ends.

"A million Americans are expected to take part in demonstrations," Addison said.

The Toronto program will include teach-ins at York University, and probably classroom discussions at the U of T.

Erindale's college council voted to endorse this action, and VMC pamphlets will encourage it on the St. George campus.

Barricade goes up at Glendon

"The Year of the Barricade", an international forum on student revolt, is coming to Glendon College, Oct. 23-26.

The conference is being planned by the Glendon College Student Union and will involve student leaders from Europe, North American radical and liberal academics, and students from across Canada.

One of the highlights of the conference is expected to be a concert on October 24 by protest singer Phil Ochs at the Ryerson Auditorium.

Resource people include Britain's Robin Blackburn, co-editor of the New Left Review, Karl Dietrich Wolff, past-president of the West German SDS, Simon Fraser University's Jim Harding, former McGill lecturer Stanley Gray, U of T's C.B. Macpherson, and local Marxists Andy Wernick and Ted Richmond.

There are 25 tickets available for University of Toronto students at ten dollars each. Application forms may be picked up at the SAC office.

Is your name list-less ?

Students who wish to vote in the upcoming municipal elections must appear on either the regular voters list or the resident voters list, posted in the voting districts.

Basic requirements are that a student be a British or a Canadian citizen and be 21 years of age.

A person must also be a tenant or owner, or the spouse of a tenant or owner who has resided in the city of Toronto since January 1, 1968.

If a person meets these qualifications but is not on the lists he may appeal by phoning 367-7800 Mon.-Sat.

Last appeal date is Oct. 28, 1969.

Faculty hopes to arouse appeal

University of Toronto faculty members are making an all-out effort to raise money for the United Appeal this year.

Under the joint chairmanship of Engineering Dean J. M. Ham and non-academic vice-president, Alex Rankin, the faculty members will be canvassing each other for donations.

"I hope the university will, by doing this all together, demonstrate a real concern for the city," commented Dean Ham.

The faculty campaign begins today and will continue until Nov. 3.

It is the last day that course changes can be made in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

So if you're enjoying a lecture you did not think you would enjoy when you pre-registered, notify your registrar no later than Friday.

Professor deplors students' timidity

"Students shouldn't be so timid. They should push for straight answers," a U of T economics professor said last Wednesday.

He was speaking at the Political Economy Course Union Teach-In.

Prof. Kotowitz said students should confront these professors and press them for the proper lecture material.

He said when he came to the University of Toronto it was surprised that the students just sit back quietly.

"In Israel it is different. As soon as a professor opens his mouth the students jump down his throat", he said.

Rick MacDowell (IV UC) said some professors "teach material that has little bearing on the course" and "hedge questions asked by students relating to the course content."

He said "the lectures are often interesting but the students don't want to learn the intended subject matter."

Tony Leah (II UC) said that students in such situations could compile critiques of the professor's methods and subject material, and circulate copies to other political economy students as well as the Department so that more people would be aware of the problem.

Prof. Kotowitz said if the students were to decide upon a course not offered, the Department would make every possible effort to include that course, hiring professors if necessary.

SFU's Strand appoints 'scab' PSA chairman

BURNABY (CUP) — The administration at Simon Fraser University has discovered a simple solution to the problems posed by approximately 700 striking faculty and students in the university's department of political science, sociology and anthropology: ignore them.

Administration President Kenneth Strand announced business as usual officially began in the department yesterday with the dissolution of an administration trusteeship over PSA and the restoration of power to the department's chairman.

But according to Strand, the PSA department now consists of five professors who did not join the strike by students and faculty which began Sept. 24, and which continues right under the administration president's windows.

In a statement issued Friday, Strand also announced the revocation of appointment of one of the five, Robert Wyllie, as department head, and declared he would take over the duties of the trusteeship.

It's the second time in less than six months that Wyllie has held the post of department chairman: he resigned during the summer when faculty in the department — 16 of them — declared they would not bow to administration demands that students be removed from their parity position on committees governing faculty appointments and tenure.

This time, he apparently received a unanimous vote of confidence from the department — which consists of himself, Herbert Adam, Don Barnett, Gary Rush and A. H. Somjee, all opposed to the strike and all technically "scabs."

The rationale for Strand's announcement stems from an administration ultimatum which set a deadline of Oct. 1 for PSA professors to return to their classes. When the deadline was ignored, Strand declared that nine striking faculty were suspended pending dismissal procedures: effectively making them "non-persons" in the department.

The five "official" faculty have declared they elected Wyllie chairman "in order to facilitate the lifting of the trusteeship" imposed by the administration to clamp down on the total student parity operating in the department.

The five also cited "a number of pressing problems" which figured in their decision, including unresolved difficulties with curriculum and budget, and "the general malaise existing in several sectors of the department."

Striking faculty and students gave no indication they would accede to the new state of affairs in PSA, and continued their strike to reinstate professors fired, suspended or demoted by the administration, and to force recognition of student parity in the department.

As you may or may not realize the Embassy is a pub. We are trying to get a pub on campus so students won't have to cross that busy Bloor Street. — SAC President Gus Abols of last week's SAC meeting.

Abols and Levin — the politics of opportunism

Now that the Students' Administrative Council is beginning to crack from the strain of factional conflict, the adroit politicians are beginning to look for crutches and scapegoats.

The right-wing — those who wish to preserve the status quo — is falling back to its usual tactic — the representivity game.

SAC President Gus Abols, in a letter on the page opposite, disclaims the right-wing label The Varsity attached to him in last week's editorial.

"I would like however, to point out," he writes, "that I have always voted, not along partisan lines as do many SAC members, irrespective of the issue, but rather on the issues as they arise, according to what I feel would be in the best interests of the students on this campus and essentially on the basis of my election platform."

Representivity is an easy claim from a SAC President who speaks from a vacuum of political opinion.

And basing votes on an election platform that said little more than "representivity" is not difficult either.

Any student may claim to represent the students, but such a statement is vacuous if it is not based on a concrete political platform that has been presented to the students.

Abols reacts to issues as they "arise". He sees them separately. But issues do not fall from the sky or rise from the ground, and they are interrelated.

He says he has "supported and opposed motions made by all political factions on the council."

But when he aligns himself with a radical policy, he drains any content from it, as he removes it from any kind of total context:

"The student-worker-farmer alliance is a nice liberal sentiment," he told last week's SAC meeting. "We should align with the whole community, not merely s-w-f. Society is composed of a lot of other people; some of them are even parents. We must have a clear-cut policy as to which members of the community we will align with and support."

Abols claims to stand aloof from political factions, as he claims to represent everyone, regardless of their positions, needs, or demands.

But his actions at the annual congress earlier by a vote of 19 to 4 to stay in CUS, and it had directed its delegation to abide by that vote.

So Abols completely bypassed the authority of his delegation and of his council.

Now he talks about representivity.

Behind Gus Abols, there are a few backroom supporters on the council.

twice interrupted the debate on points of information. ("Mr. Speaker, I didn't see any uniformed scabs the last time I was in the Embassy.")

And he opposed the SAC stand on the Embassy strike-breakers during the summer.

When The Varsity noted publicly his anti-CUS stand in Friday's paper, Levin

— Reidford, Toronto Globe and Mail

gress of the Canadian Union of Students in August indicate a different alignment.

There he led a right-wing caucus that proposed to smash CUS and set up a Canadian Students' Federation, a service organization with virtually no political power.

It was the only caucus at the Congress that met in camera.

The caucus completely bypassed the congress and issued a press release stating: "Delegates from four major Canadian Universities attending the CUS Congress... today presented a resolution that would in fact disband the 33-year-old organization and create a new student group called the Canadian Student Federation."

Abols signed the press release without even consulting the rest of the Toronto delegation.

The student press was not invited to the press conference, although the whole national office of the Canadian University Press and many student editors were at the congress.

The resulting news story, which Canadian Press sent all across the country, implied that the U of T wished to disband CUS. And that's exactly what the press release implied.

But SAC had voted just a few weeks ago the most influential but less conspicuous is Communications Commissioner Jon Levin (III UC).

Levin is one of the smoothest campus politicians, with clear plans for the future.

To protect his image for future campaigns, he takes care never to be on the losing side in controversial issues.

During the CUS Congress Levin was cool and diplomatic at the heated U of T delegation meeting following the CSF press release.

He disassociated himself from the right-wing caucus, in which he had participated: he told the delegates he would have mentioned the press release to them if he had had a chance.

Levin's favourite tactic is to abstain on controversial issues, where a recorded vote might damage his later political career.

Thus, he often abstained during the summer SAC Executive meetings and declined to vote on the main SAC discipline motion at the first general meeting September 24.

On October 8, he abstained from a vote supporting SAC's strong opposition to the use of professional strike-breakers at the Embassy Tavern.

"I wasn't paying attention," he lamely explained afterwards, but records of the meeting show that Levin complained, "But I've never taken a stand on CUS publicly."

True enough. But away from the limelight, Levin is an active member of the anti-CUS group.

Levin is a constant delight at SAC meetings ("Mr. Speaker, speaking purely as an individual...") and offers well-rehearsed excuses for any difficulties connected with his commission — he blamed the late appearance of the student handbook on supposed "political patronage" involved in choosing the editors.

Levin did not mention that as Communications Commissioner, he is ultimately responsible for the handbook debacle.

Most of the actions of Abols, Levin, and the rest of the SAC right-wing boil down to two factors: defeating the left, and political opportunism.

Last spring Levin won election to the SAC Executive on the New Left slate of candidates, for then they seemed the strongest.

Now, as he judges campus reaction, he is in open opposition to the rest of that slate.

But what will happen to Levin and the right-wing if SAC for once dispenses with the petty manipulation and opportunism of student council politics and begins to debate real issues?

who do not conform to the standards set by the top administrators.

Numerous 'liberals' have attempted to change the structure by using proper channels and have opposed violence as an alternative. These people are also under fire from the administration.

What this means is that the 'proper' procedure — using the institution to initiate social change — presents the opportunity for the elite to counter social change successfully.

This sets an important precedent throughout Canada that makes a mockery of academic freedom. Academics, take note! It is particularly the liberal who must learn a lesson here.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Initially, the B.C. government opened SFU in the fall of 1965 as a Sacred 'showpiece' and to supply big business of the province (almost exclusively dominated by American investment) with human resources to feed the economic sector.

Within a year of its opening, the novelty of a new university began to wear off. The administration set high standards for students and faculty to meet.

Grades were scaled down. The requirements were too heavy. The administration became an impersonal bureaucracy.

Who was all this work for and why the ridiculous demands? The answer came in the spring of 1967.

Five teaching assistants (among them Martin Loney, current president of the Canadian Union of Students) challenged a local school board's decision impinging on the right to free speech. The board of governors used its power to dismiss the five concerned.

Indeed, the TAs only knew about the board's decision via radio broadcast. The concept of proper channels was violated, triggering a near-strike situation — not so much in support of the TAs for their action, but as a reaction to the dictatorial method the board had chosen to dismiss the TAs.

The dean of arts, who had been ignored in this situation, resigned. It illustrated to everyone that the board had power over every aspect of the academic community.

It also meant that SFU did not have an established form of procedure and that anyone could be dismissed from the university without being told the reason.

It should be no surprise that there was a tremendous amount of anti-board sentiment. Under pressure, the board finally gave in and the TAs were reinstated.

RCMP CALLED IN

Immediately after the affair, the board set out to regain its lost prestige. Within a month RCMP plainclothesmen (who could only have been sent with the approval of the attorney-general in Victoria) appeared on campus.

The board, all big businessmen or pro-business elements, has strong ties with the Sacred government and could do this at the taxpayers' expense. (Chancellor Shrum is co-chairman of Bennett's money-maker, B.C. Hydro.)

Concerned by the over-dominance of the board, the faculty called in the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), which made an investigation and submitted a report on how the university could be reconstructed.

The board, in particular Shrum, completely disregarded the CAUT report.

Finally, in May 1968, CAUT censured the board and President Patrick McTaggart-Cowan for mal-administration and condemned the university's structure for being "top-heavy."

It was about this time that the PSA department moved toward democracy, decentralizing authority and responsibility and granting students parity on all decision-making processes affecting their future.

The board, concerned with lifting the CAUT censure, had no time to devote to PSA.

It dismissed McTaggart-Cowan and called on the faculty to select a one-month 'acting' president. The faculty agreed to student representation on the Joint-Faculty committee's presidential selection meeting.

STRAND STAYS NEUTRAL

In the struggles that followed, Joint-Faculty chairman Kenneth Strand emerged as the only figure who did not choose sides.

Two student spokesmen (who could not be classified as radicals) arranged with Strand and other senior faculty to set up the proper procedure in which the students could present their choice, Canadian John Seeley, before a meeting of Joint-Faculty.

At the meeting there was considerable confusion over the student nomination procedure and Strand eventually over-ruled the students' right to speak.

The students left the meeting en masse and Joint-Faculty elected Strand as acting president.

At the time, he promised to serve only one year.

Since then, the students have tried to obtain meaningful representation in the university, but faculty have 'niggerized' the students to the point of bitter alienation.

When students challenged their low representation (two members) on a presidential research committee, a history professor told them: "The students are deliberate tokenism."

In the fall of 1968, students and two faculty Senate members presented the Senate with evidence of corrupt and inefficient admissions policy.

The Senate, chaired by Strand, did not make any argument, in fact remained silent on the question.

In retaliation, more than 400 students occupied the administration building. After three days, Strand called in the RCMP, who arrested 114 of the demonstrators.

Strand received tremendous support from a reactionary student body and the public at large. The student movement was effectively smashed.

With the students out of the way, Strand proceeded to smash the PSA department. A series of small attacks on the department received wide publicity in the press and served to build up public antagonism to the department.

It started with a series of 'rumors' which were blasted over the front page of the Vancouver Sun. The rumors said certain faculty members from PSA had threatened other faculty members with physical harm or violence.

The alleged source of this information, a history professor, denied the charges and the statement was retracted on a back page of the Sun.

But the damage had already been done. Now the public knew whom to blame for student violence.

It was an effective method: use lies to create a front-page story, then later deny it on a back page.

Soon after this, the administration cut PSA's budget.

Finally, during the summer of 1969, arts dean Dale Sullivan, an American, ousted Canadian PSA chairman Mordecai Briemberg and set up a trusteeship over the department.

The trustees are non-PSA members with the exception of T.B. Bottomore, who is in England and has no intention of returning to SFU. One of the trustees is McMaster history professor J.M. Bumstead.

The only thing that could have saved PSA — and, I'm afraid, SFU in general — was a defeat of Premier Bennett, who was unfortunately re-elected with a strong majority in late August.

In September, two PSA faculty members were fired and six others given limited tenure of one year — a practice generally known as 'phase-firing'.

In the face of the trusteeship and phased-firing, the faculty and students had only one way to confront the administration: they went on strike.

The Massey Man

By JOHN THOMAS

Massey College's brooding, impenetrable presence gives rise to strange fancies. There it stands at Hoskin and Devonshire Place, its blank brick walls giving perverse impressions of what you will find within, its great steel gates offering an unsought rebuke to the passing stranger.

"Look on me, ye Puny, and despair." It seems to say, and you wonder, who lives there? Does anyone live there? If so, do they ever come out?

As you stand outside this latterday House of Usher you seem to hear strange noises. Here a maniacal laugh, there a ghastly shudder. Wild visions appear before you.

Beady eyes peer from behind those ancient window slits, eyes grown weak from long hours of study in Medaeival Hindi and necromancy. Eyes which momentarily fasten on a dying taper while perusing Aelfric's Homilies long into the night.

On the wall, perhaps, is a pin-up — the Venerable Bede in genuflecting aspect. On the desk lies a grinning skull filled with snuff. The Massey Man looks up and chuckles insanely. "Yes," he mutters to himself. "Sub specie aeternitatas . . ."

The Massey Man lays down his manuscript and pours himself a chalice of boiled carrot juice. He settles back and strums his lyre. In an hour the taper has burned down and this strange, balding man slips deliciously off into a dream of twelfth century Venice.

For the Massey Man regards as avant-garde anything post-Dante. The Renaissance! — that was when the trouble started. Now the vile mob rules. The sacred thread of learning has been lost. Yes, order has been lost. Scholasticism vanished, except, — except — behind these walls.

The Massey Man dreams of Lady Chatelaine, there in a white flowing gown. Strange thoughts — disturbing thoughts — fill his mind. He sees her evanescent figure dissolving down long corridors, lost in a maze of doors.

He tries a door, which opens on a scene of Restoration depravity. Painted women and trivial aphorisms. He quickly slams the door. He opens another and sees a scene of bustling students and busy traffic.

"What place is this?" he asks a passing stranger.

"Hoskin and Devonshire Place," is the reply.

"So." The Massey Man ponders. "It seems that I remember such a place . . . long ago . . ."

For the Massey Man, student revolution is not a problem. For there have been no students since the days of Duns Scotus. So how can there be a revolution? In fact, it is doubtful whether there is any university.

The Massey Man slams the door. The Twentieth Century, crying out in his sleep, "Stipendium peccati m est. Ha! . . ."

A little sadly, perhaps, to enter Massey College is to lose a few of these impressions. Your perverse impressions fade. For while Massey may look forbidding from without, once inside you feel slightly amazed and exhilarated at a minor explosion of space.

Once past Ancient Dick (Norman McCracken), the wax-mustached Porter, the quadrangle spreads before you like a delicate bubble of light water, with fountains gushing over stones and pleasant paths drifting idly away beneath the elms.

You picture the ecstatic poet composing within:

"all in a singing wonder of blossoming yes . . ."

And as you recover from this orgasm and move across the quad into the Upper Library your ideas begin to change. Inside the library are gathered several Massey Men armed with from the Buttery Bar, and you

No snuff?

It doesn't even touch boiled carrot juice.

The dining room is more as you had thought, however. For here the Massey Man is summoned in black flowing gown by the huge College bell. Here he sits in traditional elegance, yes, in highbacked leather chaire. Here he ponders, a little sadly, the inscription about the wall: "To be happy you must be wise." — George Santayana.

In the summer he ponders through dark glasses for the ceiling of the dining room is so beautifully open to the sky that the summer sun provides a blinding spectacle. Indeed, everywhere in Massey there is this feeling of space, of light.

"Ah, here," you say, "here is pomp!"

"No, it's just a good place to eat for 75 cents."

"Conversation?" you frown.

"No lack of that."

Indeed, no lack, for men like Northrop Frye and Donald Creighton have found a working centre at Massey, as have writers-in-residence Jack Ludwig (past) and Margaret Laurence (present).

"Take me to the musty library," you cry.

Massey College is renowned for its library: 28,000 volumes of Canadiana with first editions of such poets as Bliss Carman and Archibald Lampman.

And it contains what is perhaps unique in North America — a Bibliography Room where printing is taught. There are four old presses, probably the finest in the world, and here the Massey Man (or anyone) can repair with his sonnets, make his own paper, set his own type, and print his own slender sheaf. Almost two hundred people in the university use the room, among them members of the Pocoli Ludique Societas.

Passing through the subterranean vaults you come upon a number of carrels and here are more distressingly un-Scotus tupes — the non-resident Junior Fellows who use Massey for their centre of study and graduate life.

Moving quickly on you discover the College Chapel, a small, sequestered affair reminiscent of Fortunato's resting place.

"That's incense I smell?"

"Floor wax."

Shaken, you retire to the subdued lighting of the Common Room, there to ponder your lost illusions. You sink into a plush leather armchair with a wistful sigh and muse at the patterned relief of the ceiling. Where is the Massey Man? Where is Scholasticism? Gone forever.

A maid asks you if you would like something to drink.

"Boiled carrot juice," you say.

door of g out in dismayed to find that they are not at all the Duns Scotus type.

"But does no one have a skull?" you ask.

"Sorry."

"Perhaps a little snuff?"

"Not a chance."

Actually Massey's 85 Junior Fellows (working for a graduate degree) represent the most varied disciplines and are chosen, not for their scholarship in any esoteric field, but for their more general assets and experience in the world.

And as for wandering lonely as a cloud, the Massey Man seems rather inundated with visitors. Five thousand guests drop in for meals yearly, while 150 distinguished visitors from the business/ art/ political worlds jostle for the speaker's podium.

Four hundred graduate students take courses at Massey and it is the headquarters of the U of T Drama Centre. And as there are no restrictions on women the poor Massey Man seems to have little time even for boiled carrot juice.

In the time you take to read this ad, this student and teacher could finish the next three pages of this newspaper.

Because both of them have an average reading speed of 2,500 words a minute, or, over six times faster than normal.

To Grade 13 student Tom Gray, this is pretty important. It means he can do all the studying he has to and still have lots of time left over for sports and recreation.

Tom has another advantage over the other students too. Since taking the Reading Dynamics course, his comprehension and recall have improved considerably. So he really learns what he reads and he can remember it for exams.

To college teacher Paul Thompson, his reading speed is invaluable in helping him get through large volumes of research and teaching material, and in evaluating students' work. The dynamic reading course has improved his concentration and he retains much of what he reads.

Both Paul Thompson and Tom Gray enjoy having a reading range. They can read slowly, word by word in the old way, if they want to appreciate poetry, or up to 10,000 words a minute for light novels.

Maybe you should call the Centre for Reading Dynamics now, at 923-4681. Or attend a free 'Mini Lesson' at one of the listed locations. We guarantee to at least triple your reading speed, with equal or improved comprehension. And if we don't, your tuition fee will be refunded.

THE SENATE

The Senate presides over academic affairs.

All its actions must be approved by the Board of Governors.

The Senate grants, cancels and restores degrees. It is in charge of setting up faculties, schools, departments and courses. It administers the library and accepts reports and appeals from faculty and school councils.

Membership in the Senate is broadly representative. It has both elected and appointed members from all schools, faculties, colleges and federated universities. Alumni elect representatives to all of the above. The Ontario High School and Vocational School principals also have representatives.

The unwieldy size, relative paucity of working academics on the Senate and the huge agendas for formal approval of faculty decisions make the Senate largely ineffective.

The President of the University acts as chairman and is the sole effective link with the Board of Governors. With his entourage of professional administrators, he is substantially able to control the Senate.

THE PRESIDENT

"A university president in Canada is required to have some of the qualities of the superintendents of lunatic asylums and of ringmasters of circuses." Harold Innis.

The President is in charge of "academic work" and teaching staff, and heads up the administrative apparatus. He is a member of all University councils except the University College Council.

He is chairman of the Senate and of the Faculty of Arts and Science Council.

His powers include those to suspend staff and recommend appointees to the Board.

According to the Duff-Berdahl Report on University Government, the whole system depends on "the superhuman talents of the President."

As mentioned above, he is the only effective link between the Board, the Senate, the administration and the students.

ADMINISTRATION

Under the President's office come a wide spectrum of administrative officials. Traditionally, the administration has been carried on in the different departments, and only recently has some effort been made to rationalize the administrative structure by centralization.

On the academic side lie the offices of Vice-President (Academic), Provost, Registrar and so on.

The non-academic side is headed by a Vice-President (Non-Academic) with responsibility for the provision and maintenance of the physical assets of the university, the operating and capital funds, trust funds, and all matters concerned with the collecting and disbursement of money.

Much of the day-to-day operating policy of the university comes from administrators, but in theory at least they are responsible to the Board of Governors, once again through the President.

FACULTY COUNCILS

The faculty council is the top decision-making body in each faculty.

Under the direction of the Senate, the faculty council oversees "the government, direction and management of the college or school."

It also considers all applications for admission to the faculty and sets and supervises examinations and academic standards, and determines curriculum.

Membership in the Arts and Science faculty council is typical of all the faculty councils.

It consists of the President of the University (college principals in the federated colleges), the faculty dean, the chief librarian, and all teaching staff above and including the rank of assistant professor.

Soccer Blues unimpressive in tie

By LYNDON LITTLE

The Soccer Blues played their first class football for only the first half and as a result were held to a 1-1 tie by the Western Mustangs Saturday afternoon.

The tie leaves the Varsity side still unbeaten with a record of two ties and one win in three league games.

The Blues started strongly and scored their goal after just 6 minutes of play. Mario Palermo tipped in a hard shot by John Gero.

Western also scored in the first half as Vivian Manswell, the Mustang's giant outside-left, took advantage of a mix-up between Blues' goalie Sam Cesario and fullbacks Stan Bogucki and Trevor Wilson to even the score at 16 minutes.

The Varsity squad played a spirited first half featuring crisp passing and good ball control. They had the majority of the good scoring opportunities.

Unfortunately, the Blues could not maintain their fine play in the second half as their organization degenerated badly.

Wing-half Ken Cancellera and fullback Bogucki continue to play top-flight football for the Blues.

Blues' veteran fullback Jim Kalman commented after the game that the team's poor second half performance was due to inadequate conditioning. Here that, coach!

Free Kicks — Top forward FRANK SOPPELSA missed this one to serve as best man at a wedding. . . This Saturday against Guelph coach Nicol will try to persuade him to be "best man" on the soccer team. . . JIM LEFKOS is now attending C.O.E. and will practise with the team but cannot play any league games due to his semi-pro status.

Tennis Blues beat Carleton for title

By DAVID BURT

Varsity tennis Blues regained the OQAA team tennis championship by defeating Carleton Ravens last weekend in Ottawa.

This completed the Blues' campaign to pay back the Ravens for last year's upset loss in the finals.

Varsity no. 1, Paul Kent, defeated Carleton ace Marinus Wins in the singles final, 6-4, 5-7, 7-5, 6-4, making the Toronto player no. 1 in the conference.

In the team competition, things started on a bad note for the Toronto squad, when Kent lost the first match to Paul Henry of Carleton.

Then Mike Zimmerman proved Marinus Wins human with a 6-3, 6-3 victory.

In the next match Frank Blyth put Toronto into the lead, defeating Gerry Filion, 6-2, 6-4.

With Don Steele's 6-2, 6-3 victory over Mike Pulchny, the Toronto team entered the decisive doubles needing only a split of the two matches to gain the title.

Paul Kent suffered his second defeat in the team competition, when his doubles partnership with Steele lost to Wins and Henry, but Zimmerman and Blyth provided the clinching win, 7-5, 6-4 over Filion and Pulchny.

The doubles final was not played, Western's tandem winning by default when McGill failed to turn up.

WRESTLING

The University of Toronto wrestling team began practices yesterday in preparation for seven scheduled meets this season.

Paul Beswick will coach the team until Christmas, when he is expected to leave to finish up his graduate degree. At that time, Kirt Whipper or another suitable replacement will take over.

Most of last year's team is expected to return this season, including Bill Allison (OQAA 1st, CIAU 2nd) and Ted Sauer (OQAA 2nd).

Though the team will be missing last year's dynamo, Larry Barron, a new asset has brightened the scene — John Davis, a first team wrestler from UCLA, at 160 pounds.

New grapplers are needed in all weight classes, especially 137 pounds and under, and 175 pounds and over.

So regardless of weight and experience, for a good conditioning sport, requiring speed and co-ordination, come and try Blues Wrestling.

Practices are daily at 5 pm in the Hart House Wrestling Room.

Library will end some privileges while keeping others

By LAURA KELLY

Equalization of student and faculty library fines will be the first priority of the newly-reconstituted Library Council.

Formerly an all-staff body, the Library Council voted this fall to adopt a structure of student-faculty parity, following an experiment in student participation conducted last year.

Twelve students and 12 faculty members will sit on the council in addition to several ex-officio members and representatives of Scarborough and Erindale Colleges.

The equalization of fines was recommended by the Campbell Report on discipline.

Presently students are liable to daily fines of 20 cents for loans from the main stack, and hourly fines of 10 to 25 cents for books borrowed from the Wallace Room. Faculty members are not fined for any infractions of library rules.

The Campbell Report also suggests the formation of a library tribunal composed of five students and five faculty members which would have the power to levy fines and suspend library privileges.

The proposed tribunal, however, would not have the power to recommend suspension or expulsion of a student, or dismissal of a faculty member. Those offenders who refuse to pay fines are to be prosecuted in the regular courts.

Chief Librarian Robert H. Blackburn called the report a "very helpful" document, although he enumerated some personal objections.

Mr. Blackburn said "The library tribunal has fewer penalties than other tribunals. There is not an equal scope nor wide enough authority."

The other proposed tribunals are to be given the power of censure, suspension or expulsion of students, and dismissal of faculty members.

Mr. Blackburn stated "In general, the enforcement is still in the hands of the desk librarian."

The Campbell Report also suggests that if there are varying needs among students and faculty the library ought and has a right to respond accordingly.

The library already offers different privileges to different groups. Faculty members are permitted to borrow books for two months with the option of a two month renewal, while undergraduates can obtain volumes for a maximum of one week.

In order to make materials available to those with the greatest need the main stack is closed to first-year students, except with special one-day passes. There are various college library stacks open to all students.

Faculty members can also make use of a pick-up and delivery service to obtain library material. Any faculty member conducting individual research can utilize one of the 18 study carrels to which books can be charged.

Both faculty members and graduate students are eligible to borrow from libraries of other Ontario universities participating in the Ontario Council of University Librarians Agreement.

Mr. Blackburn supports a library policy that allows for differing needs of the university members.

"Professors are paid salaries and must perform," he explained. "They need more equipment."

Mr. Blackburn, however, also said he recognizes the need for constant improvement in library facilities which serve primarily undergraduates.

The Library Council will formulate the rules for the library including preferential treatment of the faculty members.

In addition to relying on a discipline structure to maintain the quality of the library functions, the library staff is interested in improving security measures.

Along with SAC they have agreed upon the advisability of installing a check-out system in the main library similar to those in supermarkets, in order to cut down on the rate of library material loss.

Rugger Blues subdue Western

By DAN McALISTER

Rugger Blues trounced Western 14-3 Saturday in a hard fought match dominated by forward play.

For the first time this year, the Toronto forwards were a solid unit and dominated the loose rucks. (ed. note: what the hell are loose rucks?)

Instead of the forwards ruining the game it was the backs this time. But whenever the play broke down, eight forwards were there to cover up. Had the backs been up to their usual level, the score would have been much higher.

The first half was very close as the teams were fairly evenly matched. Several infractions were called against the green Western side however, and finally, one penalty resulted in a goal by Cairns.

Then, a try by Holmes was called back as the referee ruled that he had stepped out on the one yard line. The resulting line-out was won by Western and they kicked out of danger.

Towards the end of the half, the Western forwards quickly recovered a loose ball and scored to make the half time score 3-3.

In the second half, the Blues increased their drive and with the rebirth of the Cairns "Golden Toe", chalked up eleven more points to Western's nothing.

First, fly-half Ian Owens broke through the Western back line and set up a back line pass play that was completed with a try by Segsworth. Cairns converted and made the score Toronto 8, Western 3.

A try by the pack, spearheaded by Apse, was called back by the referee because he was unable to follow Apse's blinding speed and wasn't sure where the ball was.

The Western team refused to learn about illegal play. They persisted in breaking the rules and as a result gave Toronto six more points through the kicking of Cairns. The final score; Toronto 14, Western 3.

The seconds' game as well, was dominated by the forwards. Unfortunately, the back line was a quickly assembled lot and didn't know how to play together.

Tries by each team were called back on infractions and there were no successful penalty kicks. Against a slightly superior side Toronto escaped with a 0-0 tie.

Varsity 17 McGill 16

Varsity sports photog Spencer Higgins records the sequence of plays that produced the winning touchdown late in the fourth quarter. At left, rookie end Jack Buchan stumbles on the McGill five after taking a 37-yard pass from Wayne Dunkley. Then the officials kick the ball around after penalizing McGill halfback Ken Ross (36) for piling on. Finally, Dunkley sneaks over for the touchdown (below); referee signals the score as McGill's Chris Rumble (27) hits Dunkley in the end zone.

By JIM COWAN
and PAUL CARSON

Alex Squires stood in front of the bulletin board in Blues dressing room under Varsity Stadium, ripping off handfuls of press clippings about the McGill Redmen.

On the blackboard used for diagramming plays and making those mysterious "half-time adjustments" so dear to the hearts of sportscasters, someone had chalked "Queen's are next".

And underfoot, bent and spike-scarred, lay a white button with the blood-red words,

"Go, Redmen, Go."

It was late Saturday afternoon, and Blues had just squeaked past McGill Redmen, 17-16.

Most of the Blues wandered around grinning happily.

Coach Ron Murphy came in, called the team around him, and started to say "O.K. guys you've got to stop making so many mistakes..." but he was drowned out in a general chorus of boos.

Rookie QB Wayne Dunkley left his shoulder pads on a little longer than usual, mostly to absorb the pounding he was receiving from his team mates.

Dunk moved into the game with about 10 minutes left, taking over from Vic Alboini. Alboini had been doing a good job of play-calling and execution until his sore arm forced him out.

Dunkley moved in and capped his first sequence of plays by scoring the winning touchdown himself.

He completed four of five passes in that march, three to John Buchan, then sent Bill Stankovic into the middle of the McGill line. The game films showed that Stank was in, but the officials ruled otherwise.

On the next play Dunkley kept the ball and ran over right end behind the blocking of Walt Sehr and Cor Doret. It was the same play he fumbled on last week at MacMaster.

After showing the game films Tuesday, Murphy said there were some things, like the pass blocking, he was happy with, and some things he would be talking to the team about.

"We only let down twice," he said, "Once on that long run by Bender and once in the third quarter when we kept their drive alive with penalties."

He refused to comment on the officiating.

Blues other touchdown went to Walt Sehr; Paul McKay kicked a field goal and a single and Stankovic added a convert.

McGill points came on the 102-yard TD run by Pete Bender, a 14-yard effort by Dave Fleizer, two singles and a convert by Sal Lovecchio, and a single by Ron Kelly.

It was the first major test of the season for Blues, and they won it with their best performance as a cohesive team instead of two separate units.

The McGill offence suffered noticeably from the absence of injured stars Cliff Moore and Dave Doherty, but Blues shook off their hurts and Murph's tremendous bench depth proved decisive in the second half.

When flashy rookie Randy Myers got racked up, in came veteran Bill Stankovic, merely the league's leading rusher, to replace him.

When rookie defensive tackle Bill MacNamara was winded, in came Dave Gee; Gee, a 240-pound veteran of interfac wars, had starred in Blues first two games.

In the fourth quarter, Mark Slater gave way to rookie Jack Buchan at tight end, and Buchan caught the pass that set up the winning touchdown.

Sophomore running back Walt Sehr overcame the frustrations that marked his play earlier, and became the scintillating two-way threat Blues coaching staff expected.

Sehr rambled for 130 yards on 11 carries and produced a magnificent 65-yard dash early in the fourth quarter to give Varsity field position. He also caught four key passes for 53 yards and a touchdown.

As expected, McGill had the rushing edge 254 to 141 but Redmen's George Wall could muster only five completions of 15 tries for 52 aerial yards.

Blues combo of Alboini and Dunkley was good on 16 of 31 for 242 yards.

In other weekend games, Queens slipped by Western 17-6 and Waterloo beat Mac for the first time ever, 14-13.

CUG proposes sweeping change in university structures

- replace Board of Governors, Senate, with three-way representative council
- decentralize decision-making to the faculty and departmental levels
- make all council and committee meetings open
- grant students a voice in appointments and promotions

A complete revamping of present university governing structures at all levels is called for by the Report of the Commission on University Government.

The authors term the report "a considered attempt to arrive at a way in which people of basically different views can continue to live together."

The Commission recommends that existing university governing structures be replaced by councils —

- The Governing Council, a 66-member top governing body consisting of 20 lay members, 20 elected students, 20 elected academic staff and 6 ex-officio members,
- faculty councils of not more than 100 members with membership two-fifths staff, two-fifths student and one-fifth administration.
- a clearly established governing council of under 50 members for each department, centre, and institute.

CUG leaves the responsibility of deciding the proportions of representation on councils to the department, centre, or institute committee.

The report suggests that at the departmental level decisions be made using the "parallel structures" model. Under this system any decision would have to be approved by a majority of the faculty and a majority of the students in the department meeting separately.

The Governing Council would have sole governing authority with final control over all financial and academic matters.

To ensure participation in decision-making at all levels, CUG proposes the devolution of power from the top governing body to the faculty and departmental level.

SPREADS POWER

CUG recommends that:
● the powers devolved by the Governing Council to the faculty level include: curriculum planning, admissions, student promotion, evaluation, degree-granting academic appointment, promotion and tenure, allocation of budget and resources granted by the Governing Council to the faculty, student petitions and appeals, with provision for further appeal to the Governing Council;

- the department council have the functions of making policy, advising the executive and reviewing the implementation of all policy matters within the jurisdiction of the department.

This would include policy on personnel, curriculum, budget allocation, research and consulting, short-range and long-range planning, space allocation, teaching methods, non-academic staff, and other appropriate matters.

CUG further recommends that the president, all deans, all chairmen, and all directors be appointed by an ad hoc student-staff-administration committee of the Governing Council.

It endorses five year terms, renewable once, for deans, chairmen, the president and director.

COLLEGES TO STAY

The commission decided to maintain the college system. But they suggest it be expanded to allow the colleges to develop their own departments in "university" subjects. These inter-collegiate departments would have a chairman who is not attached to any of the colleges.

Each college would initiate its own curriculum.

The report proposes the differentiation between college and university subjects be dropped.

It also proposes that the School of Graduate Studies be renamed the Faculty of Graduate Studies and have the same status and responsibility as other university faculties.

(The Commissioners define a faculty "as any part of the See REVAMPING p.3

The Commission on University Government set itself a difficult task:

"To discover those positive areas of agreement within the university that would guarantee that it could sustain itself as a community, and to suggest practical structures for governing such a community."

In its chapter entitled Principals — Problems of Pluralism, the Commission outlines two opposing views on the character of the university and establishes a philosophical basis for their co-existence.

These philosophical conclusions form the underlying principles of the Commissions recommendations.

The two views, the traditional and the radical, characterize the atmosphere within which the Commission had to work.

TRADITIONAL VIEW

The Commission argues that unity is very easy in the traditional university.

But it stresses that today's university is a multiversity. Because of its complexity, it often seems to lack a unifying base.

The commission asks how "such a complex, large and highly specialized university can claim to be a community".

The traditional view sees the modern multiversity as an academic institution rather than a social institution.

The traditionalist views the university "as a community of scholars, as an organized activity, dedicated to the preservation transmission and advancement of knowledge."

According to this view, the staff-student relationships are in the manner of "an old-style guild relationship".

"In his academic role, the student is an apprentice who has come to the university to study under a master."

For the university to survive, the traditionalist argues that it must be free. "No interference in the workings of the university can be tolerated from any source or agency outside the university."

"The university's relations with society at large are at an arm's length."

RADICAL VIEW

The radical view of the university stresses that "the university must become a critical institution."

According to the radical, the University of Toronto never was an ivory tower.

It is not now a community of scholars.

The radical view defines today's university as "a multiversity, a conglomeration of faculties, institutes, research centres and professional schools."

Professional schools and in- See PHILOSOPHY p.3

After 10 months of deliberation and more than 125 meetings the Commission on University Government has released its conclusions to the university community.

Established in November, 1968, at the instigation of President Claude Bissell, the commissioners met for the first time on Dec. 13, 1968. It was nearly four months since Bissell had proposed a commission to study university governing structure — the interim had been taken with negotiation between students, faculty and administration on the composition of CUG.

Despite the argument and frustration that led to CUG's formation, the nine voting members, one of whom is Bissell, have published a unanimous report.

The remaining eight voting commissioners, four elected students and four elected faculty members, are Robert Rae, now a Rhodes scholar, Steve Grant (Ill Vic), D'Arcy Martin (OISE), Gary Webster (SGS), J. E. Hodgetts, president of Victoria College, Prof. B. E. Erkin, chairman of Aerospace Studies, Prof. L. E. Lynch of the Department of Philosophy and Prof. James Thompson, Chairman of the Department of Anatomy.

CUG proposes total revamping university which administers its own degree or diploma program").

The Commission recommends direct student participation in appointments and promotions of academic staff.

Although the departmental chairman would have the final say in appointments and promotions he would base his decision on a list of names submitted by an ad hoc personnel committee.

PROMOTIONS

CUG proposes that:
 • promotions not involving tenure and below the rank of full professor be made by the chairman on the advice of the departmental personnel committee;

• promotions to full professor be made by the dean on the advice of an ad hoc personnel committee of the faculty council.

To facilitate co-ordination between university planning and financing, the Commission proposes there be a standing committee of the Governing Council responsible for university long-range planning.

This committee would incorporate all the functions of the present Committee on Accommodation and Facilities and the Committee on Resource Planning and would incorporate the planning functions of the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Budget.

CUG recommends that this long-range planning committee work closely with the proposed Budget Committee of the Governing Council.

It stresses that Budget meetings be open.

RESEARCH POLICY

To replace the present Research Board, CUG proposes a Research Committee of the Governing Council to formulate all general university research policies.

It further proposes that:
 • research policy within academic units be the result of full discussions among the interested faculty, students and administration;

• the research committee encourage funding agencies to provide block grants;

• the university have an internal research fund to support research the university considers worthy but that cannot receive outside funding.

• consulting policy be the responsibility of the representative council of the individual faculty, college, institute and department.

To ensure the university becomes a true "community" with participation from all "citizens" of the university, the Commission proposes that representatives of the university staff (secretaries, maintenance workers, police, etc.) be made assessor members of the Governing Council.

To encourage the support staff to take a direct role in education, the Commission advocates direct assistance to support staff members taking academic courses within the university or training courses, both within and outside the university.

In the preface, the authors of the report state:

"The Commission's positions have emerged as a series of compromises.

"Differences in analysis and interpretation of the university's role still divide the Commission members.

"The report does not represent totally the aspirations of any one member or group of members.

"Nevertheless the voting members as individuals stand behind the group's recommendations, which seem to them to be an honest and fair compromise reached after analyzing the problems and needs of the university."

The philosophy behind the report

stitutes play an important role in the corporate economy by training lawyers, doctors, businessmen, social workers and engineers.

"Economy is planned on a province-wide basis according to what it is thought the economy and the social system will need."

The radical sees the university as a class institution and an elite institution and regards this situation as intolerant in a democratic society.

According to the radical, "the university is based on a series of anti-communitarian principles."

The radical sees the problem as an effort to establish a genuinely critical university.

"The task for the democratic university is to give students and staff the ability to control the decisions that affect them, that is, to give them the means to make the university critical."

PRINCIPLES

Recognizing the difficulties of reconciling these two views of the university, CUG arrived at three "Principles of Community" that would "make it possible for students, staff and administration to work in harmony within a single community."

The Principles of Community are:

a) Common participation in the activity of learning, including as it does the student's learning by instruction, research and personal initiative, and the faculty member's learning in instructing and doing his own particular research and reading.

Both students and faculty gain from this principle, argues the Commission, because one of the bases of the university community is "a common commitment to learning."

"Training should not imply the simple assembly-line processing of human material.

Our ambition must be to be more than a trade school."

b) Common participation in a structure intended to produce a self-governing and self-adapting community.

This principle will resolve some of the tension and conflict in the community, because all members of the university will share in determining "the extent and nature of the university's political, economic and social involvement."

"We believe that such sharing can resolve some of the conflict."

c) Common acceptance of policies at all levels of the university, because all the university's members have seen clearly how and why the policies were established and have shared in their establishment.

The Commission argues that only by giving all members of the university "the opportunity to influence those important decisions that directly affect them" can the university assure itself of being "independent and progressive."

FUNDAMENTAL

The Commission stresses several attitudes are fundamental to smooth operation of the university, even with the acceptance of the basic principles. The first of these was trust.

Noting that "the only thing that makes the President's present role even remotely possible of fulfillment is that he be trusted," CUG decided one of its tasks "was to make recommendations which would generate trust in all areas of the university."

To facilitate the development of this general trust, the report recommends adoption of the principle of openness so that "anyone who wants to do so can see how and why decisions are made."

"A policy (and, we would hope, an ethos) of openness would make a great contribution to reducing misunderstandings that often arise because deliberations are held in secret."

The Commission recommends that openness "be accepted as a basic operating principle for all university councils and committees."

The report emphasizes that the "university's dedication to individual liberty and institutional independence must be evident in everything that goes on within it."

FREEDOM AFFIRMED

In re-affirming the right of all members of the university to academic freedom, the Commission says "academic freedom requires dialogue, compromise and a respect for persons. Along with it must go freedom of association."

To permit the flexible community that will allow this degree of academic freedom or pluralism, CUG concluded a decentralized structure was called for that would allow decision-making to take place where those concerned could participate.

"One of the Commission's great concerns is the establishment of a genuine diversity and academic pluralism within the university."

Since virtually every member of the community is involved in learning and is affected by decisions shaping the university's character, participation by everyone is the best way of guaranteeing true pluralism. How can the university be arranged so that staff and students can participate?

"By smaller classes, tutorials, more informal methods of instructing, and the possibility of more intimate access to staff.

By sharing "power, authority and responsibility"... between the central structure and departments."

Now that the recommendations of the Commission on University Government are in the hands of provincial education minister William Davis, legal and legislative experts will hammer the rough draft of the proposed University Act into acceptable form for presentation.

The ministry will carefully watch response to the recommendations and present the new legislation when it is clear there is general support for them. The drafting of the new University of Toronto Act may take as little as two weeks. When the legislature will debate and pass the changes is anybody's guess.

In the meantime, however, the university can proceed with implementation of policy and non-structural changes as fast as it pleases. The timing of implementation will largely depend on the extent of discussion of the report and President Claude Bisell's judgement.

How to accommodate any view—CUG

The Report of the Commission on University Government has arrived. Finally.

It is a report that could be a catalyst to move students towards making real change in the university.

Or it could be the blueprint for a more efficient factory.

The ambivalent direction of the Report is very much a product of irreconcilable contradictions in the Commission itself and the context within which it was operating.

Here we will only try to draw out those contradictions and place the report in its proper context, without discussing the specific recommendations for now.

"Violence is a constant threat — an ominous presence in all debates over what the university is and can be. But this university has been able to generate from its faculty, student and administrative resources the leadership required to originate and sustain the kind of reasoned discussion a university should demonstrate to a society as a whole. It has acted as a community.

"What the Commission had to formulate were the clear principles and structures for such a community. It was not an easy or frivolous task, and discussion leading to a satisfactory result could not be merely academic. The reconciliation of differences needed to bring accord was difficult, and a genuine solution is not expected to be palatable to all in the community. The Commission's recommendations represent an attempt on the part of all concerned to listen, to argue and to reach a working agreement. If this willingness had not existed, there would have been little basis for any solution."

The above is an excerpt from the Report of the Commission on University Government, which was released yesterday.

That passage ironically defines some of the problems and contradictions that could prevent the report from being anything more than a consensus approach to patching up an unstable university. The passage implies three unwritten assumptions which have narrowed the context of the report considerably.

(1) Violence is the greatest threat to the university. It is impending from radical sources and must be averted by reason.

(2) The university is some sort of community and must become more of a community. Unity at all costs.

(3) Consensus and compromise are necessary to avert division of the community.

Each of these assumptions is understandable, considering the nature of the Commission:

(1) CUG was prompted by fear and instability, an atmosphere in Simcoe Hall that has historical roots in this university.

The U of T is the only multiversity on this continent that has not had a major blow-up. In 1967 the university experienced its first physical confrontation, when a demonstration against Dow Chemical at the Placement Service disrupted the mental calm of Acting President John Sword and the U of T police force.

And with the new presence of the Toronto Student Movement on campus last year, the administration realized that some

"reasoned dialogue" was necessary.

Historically then, the CUG Report is a reaction to the first strains of the student movement at the U of T. It was initiated as an attempt to absorb and neutralize that movement.

So although the Commission made an honest intellectual attempt to suggest wide-sweeping reforms of the university, its direction was naturally effected by the administrative paranoia that brought CUG into being in the first place.

(2) One of the Commission's initial assumptions is that the university is a community and must become more of a community through participatory democracy on all levels.

"Community" is the central notion in the report which proceeds to examine how to create a free and responsive structure to provide community.

But the report never really states what the function of the present university community is or what it should be. It does not analyze the class nature of society and how that is reflected in the university.

CUG tends to define a community as something that acts together in a democratic way, something that runs smoothly and ought to be together.

CUG looks for unity in the university without questioning the qualitative reasons for such unity, without asking whom that unity serves.

(3) The Commission comes close to defining the function of the university community. It concedes that nearly all the opinions it heard about the university basically boiled down to two opposite and contradictory views — a conservative view and a radical view.

CUG was working under certain circumstances — as a Presidential commission that had to provide some kind of solution that would work. A palatable solution.

And the Commission itself was split between the radical and conservative view.

Consequently CUG had to compromise. The report is a self-avowed consensus:

"Any community needs general agreement about the goals it is striving for and the paths best guaranteed to reach them. But any attempt to create monolithic commitment of the university as a whole could obviously be achieved only by suppressing the variety and contradictions that exist among its members. To impose a conservatism that was not based on substantial consensus would obviously violate the very academic freedom in which such a view seeks to defend; to impose a radical faith on everyone in the university would destroy the pluralism necessary to the survival of the very university to which some radicals look for leadership in social reform movements. The gap between the two views is quite clear; there is a considerable disagreement on fundamentals. Therefore, the actual task that confronted the Commission was to discover those positive areas of agreement within the university that would guarantee that it could sustain itself as a community, and to suggest practical structures for governing such a community."

Since the Commission had to find a "solution", it was forced to work a compromise between two views that it considered opposite and contradictory.

The conservative view emerged as a natural function of such a presidential commission: that the university be preserved as an institution.

The radical view emerged in two ways: as an administrative attempt to absorb student revolt, and as a student attempt to change the university.

The game is called co-optation. And both sides take a gamble. It is not yet clear who will win from this one.

For the Commission has produced a far more radical report than Dr. Bissell would have expected last year when he triumphantly announced CUG's formation. He could not have expected students to win parity on the commission itself.

And some of the recommendations such as student participation in hiring, firing, promotion and tenure came as a shock.

On the other hand, the report legitimized student power and separates it from any kind of class critique of the university and society, from the question of content — "Knowledge for whom?" It channels student discontent into the committees of due process.

A multiversity administration needs feedback from students. To keep a university stable, it needs to know what's going on in their heads.

As U of T Registrar and Vice-President Robin Ross said last night, "I believe this is a report which will help the administration of the university a great deal."

Administrators — servants of corporate and government interests — need to make the university run more efficiently. A university manufactures the ideology, the manpower, and the technology that plug into the society.

The assembly line must be well oiled, and the components of the "community" must be happy.

If CUG is implemented, the university should run more efficiently.

But it could backfire on the powers-that-be.

What's important is how change is implemented, not just what change is implemented. Changes that are the result of a rubber stamp, a flick of the pen, or an "X" on a ballot change nothing, if students' consciousness does not alter and actually motivate those changes.

The CUG Report is a structural recommendation that needs content injected into it. The Commission could base its proposals on pluralism.

A small group of students and faculty could not sit in the Senate Chamber and impose either the radical or conservative view on anybody. And it didn't try.

But the Commission did come up with some concrete recommendations that could allow students to question the content of their courses, the authority of their professors, and the function of their education.

Those questions must be asked — despite its contradictions — is an honest, progressive, and political document provides an excellent framework for debate.

Now that the CUG report is out, who will answer this question, scrowled on the wall of a Sid Smith lecture hall?

proposes representative governing council

By GEOFF MEGGS

A new unicameral and representative governing structure to replace the present Board of Governors and Senate is one of the major innovations proposed by the Commission on University Government in yesterday's report.

The report recommends a main decision-making body called the Governing Council be given "sole governing authority with final control over all financial and academic matters within the University of Toronto."

The Governing Council would total 66 members. Students would elect 20 members, including five graduate students.

The faculty members would also have 20 representatives.

A group of 20 lay members would be partly made up of government nominees or appointments. At least 10 of the lay representatives would be graduates or alumni members.

Non-academic "support" would be allowed "assessor" members.

Due to the large size of the Governing Council, necessitated by its representative nature, the Commission recommends that its functions be restricted to "policy formulation, scrutiny and review, rather than . . . executive tasks."

Stressing the need for "devolution of responsibility, power and effective decision-making wherever possible," the report proposes nine Governing Council committees to carry out the bulk of administrative tasks.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

The most important of these would be the Executive Committee, made up of three students chosen by and from the student members of the Governing Council, three faculty members chosen in the same manner and three lay members chosen from the lay-graduate group.

The Executive Committee is charged with preparing policy statements for the consideration of the council, making interim policy for the council "in cases of urgency," and advising the president in his dealings with the Committee on University Affairs.

The council would also set up eight other standing committees, composed of not less than two appointees of each group represented in the Governing Council. All committees would be empowered to enlist extra members from the community at large.

The other committees proposed include a Finance Committee, an Environmental and Physical Services Committee, a Community Services Committee, a Research Committee, an Academic Committee to review degree-granting courses, a Budget Committee, a Long-Range Planning Committee and an External Relations Committee.

1906 ACT OUT

The CUG proposals abolish the present system, established by the University of Toronto Act of 1906.

Under the Act, decision-making is split between the Board and the Senate.

The Board is pre-eminent with power to hold property, make appointments and alter the constitution of any body in the university except the Senate and the Committee of Election.

The Senate, regarded in the report's words as "the supreme academic governing body" was organized to be representative of faculty and graduates. It is still, however, subordinate to the Board in many respects.

Also in the Board's shadow in the present system are the faculty councils. The councils must go through the Senate for ratification of academic decisions.

DELEGATE POWER

At present, the Chancellor and Convocation have little or no decision-making power.

The monthly line-up of Cadillacs outside Simcoe Hall will pass away with the acceptance of CUG's recommendation that the Board of Governors and the Senate be replaced by a representative governing council.

Under CUG government, the Governing Council absorbs virtually all power, then delegates as much as possible into committee or lesser bodies.

Specifically, the Governing Council is empowered to:

- govern, manage and control the University and its property, revenues, expenditures, business and affairs including academic and educational policy;
- appoint and remove the President and the Chancellor;
- appoint, promote and remove all members of teaching, administrative staff as it sees fit;
- establish an Executive

- Committee;
- regulate admissions, set examinations, award fellowships, confer degrees;
- delegate powers as it sees fit to Faculty councils or other members of the university;
- determine its own constitution with respect to quorums, election of students and faculty and so on.

In line with its determination to "place the President squarely in the centre of a unicameral system which will represent all relevant estates of the university" the report would make him "chief executive officer" with a renewable five-year term.

encourage openness, more social criticism in research

Virtually complete openness in research, administration, and encouragement of socially critical research work are proposed in the Research and Consulting chapter of yesterday's Report of the Commission on University Government.

"If one of the roles of the university is to encourage social criticism," says the Commission, "and we would assert that it is, then university staff need the possibility — and not simply the freedom — to do research that cannot be funded from outside."

To facilitate this research the Commission recommends establishment of a Research Committee to encourage "block grants for use in rather generally designated areas of research."

Further, the report proposes that part of all grants be siphoned into an internal university research fund to support projects "that cannot obtain support from an outside agency."

Consistent with its feeling that "all members of the university community need full access to information on research activity," the report recommends that information such as subject matter under research, the donor of the funds and the amount of his grant be readily available.

The Commission recommends also "that meetings of all bodies dealing with research policy normally be open."

To formulate policy for university research the report proposes the Research Committee, (see article on governing structure).

The goals of research policy, says the Commission are to "stimulate the funded research effort of its academic staff and to guide it in such a way that it is consonant with the goals of the university" and to "reconcile potentially conflicting needs: that of academic freedom for the individual researcher, and that of the university's responsibility to serve the best interests of the society which supports it."

Decisions on research policy "within academic units," says the Commission, should "be the result of full discussions among the interested faculty, students and administrators."

The functions of the Research Committee would also include formulation of policy "with respect to the consulting activities of faculty members."

While the Commission reports "abuse of the freedom to engage in consulting work is rare at the University of Toronto," it says "the forces of the market in consulting work are such that research is done for those interests in society which can afford a consulting fee."

Therefore the report recommends the Research Committee "prepare a general definition of consulting" and "define the limits on the amount of consulting work that it considers acceptable for faculty members," and that information relevant to consulting practices be available to every member of the university.

A sense of relief

By JIM STRUTHERS

Relief and satisfaction on the part of CUG members marked the Report's publication.

"I feel quite a sense of relief" Dr. James Thompson said last night.

"There are a few wrap-up chores to do. However, I don't feel that I have any formal obligations towards the report's implementation."

Steve Grant (III Vic), one of the commission's student members, thought the report was a "fabulous document" and that he hoped it would be well received.

"I think the climate of trust and openness we've produced will be generated throughout the university."

Education minister William Davis hoped the report's publication would lead to some form of consensus within the university regarding its internal organization for the coming decade.

U of T president Claude Bissell, in an official statement, remarked that there has been a growing concern throughout the world over the methods of university government, which in many instances has led to violent confrontations.

He said, however, that the university's deep sense of tradition and its abhorrence of violence make it possible for a radical critique to be applied dispassionately.

choosing sides by default

There is a particular reality to revolution and there is a world context within which it takes place. Basil Davidson concentrates on the first in his excellent analysis of the African liberation struggle in Portugal's West African colony of Guiné. Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere concentrated on the second in his fine speech here last week. Both men raise essential questions to which we must respond.

The particular struggle in Guiné began in the late 1950's. Urban Africans in Bissau, the country's capital, were encouraged by the independence gained by other black states on the continent, and formed the African Independence Party of Guiné and the Cape Verde Islands. (PAIGC) In the classic manner outlined by radical Algerian analyst Frantz Fanon, the Portuguese repression quickly destroyed the party's urban "proletariat" base; fifty dock workers were simply shot in 1959.

The consequence was momentarily destructive, but fundamentally useful; the PAIGC was forced back onto the rural peasantry which Fanon successfully argues must be the true basis of any real revolution in Africa. Long heart-breaking months of peasant organizing followed, working village to village, arguing, persuading, slowly winning peasant confidence, not so much in the desirability of change but in the possibility of it.

The African in Guiné was exploited economically; but even more, he was robbed of his history and of his sense of making history. He became a subjugated individual both physically and psychologically. He came to doubt his very race, to accept the stereotypes the colonialists gave to him. As one peasant replied to a PAIGC village organizer, after agreeing on the need to drive out the Portuguese: "We're blacks, we don't even know how to make a safety match. The whites have guns, aeroplanes. However can we get rid of them?"

By organizing the peasant population to liberate itself, and by succeeding in the fight, the PAIGC has done more than free territories; it has freed people of the internalized inferiorities of years of domination.

How has it been done? Several points are important. The preparation for guerrilla struggle was long and successful; Portuguese repression in the early sixties helped the nationalists organize by swinging doubters in the population to them.

The PAIGC concentration was not just on some concept of freedom, but on the provision of a better material life for the African in Guiné. PAIGC has, in fact, in its liberated areas — now two-thirds of the country — begun schools (some 159 by 1967), organized co-operative stores, and provided health care wherever possible.

The result was the classical requirement for guerilla war: solid support of the population through which one moves. This has meant that the seemingly impossible terrain of parts of Guiné — open plains, for example, — have been as easily liberated as were remote forest areas. Again the movement made the strategically necessary step of developing a regularized mobile army when it was able to.

As the PAIGC's leader, Amílcar Cabral, has said: "The people are not fighting for ideas, for the things in anyone's head. They are fighting to win material benefits, to live better and in peace, to see their lives go forward . . ."

The leadership of the movement has also been excellent. Cabral has continually learned from the experiences of actual struggle and has stressed the need for non-elitism within the party. The revolution has progressed with an openness and spirit of self-criticism, a realization of the need for constant working with people on the simple level of everyday life. It has not retreated to ideological purity and in-group dispute.

Finally, the movement has received help — from the neighbouring states of Guinea and Senegal, from revolutionary movements in Cuba and Vietnam, and from the Communist nations of Eastern Europe. (China has been less than enthusiastic in her support because of PAIGC's acceptance of aid from "revisionists".)

The movement has not received support from Canada, nor from the western world generally.

The latter is the reality of which Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere spoke last week in Convocation hall. Guiné is not the only part of Africa still suffering the seaweed of colonialism, left clinging after the tide of white supremacy began to sweep out in the 1950's. Portugal also holds the large southern colonies of Angola and Mozambique; Rhodesia remains white-run; and South Africa practices a racism in its borders and in South West Africa that pervades and corrupts the whole society: colour means everything, the good life or the dismal, domination or subservience, open opportunity or shut-in despair.

Nyerere, one of Africa's most committed democratic socialists, talked of this situation: "Outside forces are suppressing Africans, and Africans are being humiliated and persecuted simply for being what they are — black or coloured Africans . . . We cannot be uninvolved . . . In all these areas the demand for freedom has been rejected in principle. The door to progress is shut, bolted and barred."

"In such a situation the only way the people can get freedom is by force. . . . The only way forward to positive change is by channeling and directing the people's fury — that is, by organized violence, by a people's war against their government.

"When this happens, Tanzania cannot deny support. For to do so would be to deny the validity of African freedom and African dignity. We are naturally and inevitably allies of the freedom fighters."

Are we?

Nyerere is afraid the answer may be no. The west will import its stereotypes of anti-communism into Africa and will oppose a group like the PAIGC because that group accepts aid from Communist countries — that is the fear. The result could be "a conflict of the races," said Nyerere. "For Africa and the West will be on opposite sides of the barricades; and Africa will have the support of Asia and large parts of Latin America."

Certainly at the moment there is little evidence of us moving toward support of African liberation. We are, formally, at least, allies of the same Portuguese whose oppression of Guiné Davidson describes so well. Their membership in NATO has given them modern helicopters, U.S. napalm, and training help; it has permitted them to free more of their troops for duty in Angola, Mozambique and Guiné than might otherwise be the case. We don't dare to talk of boycotting South Africa; and our efforts in Rhodesia are less than overwhelming to say the least.

Nyerere said last week, "You cannot escape giving an answer to the challenge of the freedom movements in Africa — even if it is only an answer by default." Have we perhaps given that answer in our refusal to act?

The Tanzanian President threw another muted challenge at those of us in the University of Toronto, one worth considering in our critical analysis of this and other universities. "I hope that Universities like this one," he said, "will help the people of this country to consider all the implications of their choice."

For the university has a social responsibility in this as in many other areas. And whether we will exercise it is open to question. We have helped Tanzania, one of Africa's most radical states, in its efforts at economic development. We have at least one student from the Mozambique Liberation Movement studying here. But clearly we could do much more, both on our own, and in persuading the Canadian government and public to take a harder line against white racism in Africa.

These are just questions, but questions of considerable moral and political significance, and of immense human significance for millions of subjugated Africans: like the old man in C— village in Guiné, for whom "living under the Portuguese was like living in a cave. Now, since the party came, the Portuguese are afraid, things are different. . . . 'We didn't think it could be different. Party work and Party talk: it's like a big lie at the beginning. But in the end it's the real truth'."

The basic question we are being asked is, in effect, which side are we on?

a lasting solution (folks!)

2000 students and professionals in 40 different countries, with 40 members in Canada. The basic precepts of the organization revolve around the assumption that Jesus Christ is the son of God and that his message is contained in the New Testament. That this message, in their opinion, is not understood by most students, they attribute to the perversions and misinterpretations of the Church.

At present, the organization is attempting to make students aware of their message through several groups. One of these, which exists only in the U.S., consists of basketball, weightlifting and wrestling teams which compete throughout the States and were featured in the Mexican Olympics.

Music with a message is coming to Toronto. The message is that college students can find meaning and answers to their search for identity in the teachings of Jesus Christ.

The medium? "A group of five guys and four girls," called The New Folk. The music is varied, ranging through "heavy to contemporary, Brazilian, soul, jazz and folk rock." Sometimes they sing songs about contemporary America, songs by such songwriter - singers as Dylan and Ochs. Sometimes they write their own songs about how to transcend contemporary society and come in contact with what they describe as "a lasting solution to the needs of the world."

The New Folk preach their message under the auspices of a student organization — Campus Crusade for Christ International. This movement was originally conceived in 1951 by a California businessman, who found, while visiting the UCLA campus, that many students were seeking to understand Christ, but could not do so through the channels of institutionalized Christianity.

He also found many other students whose search for identity led them to sex, drugs and religion. Through his efforts, an organization was established which seeks to give meaning to life through Christ, instead of escaping from the realities of life through other activities. The organization now claims a membership of

The activity of the group, however, centres around the concerts of The New Folk, who have been heard by approximately 250,000 Canadian and American university students at places such as Daytona Beach, where 5,000 students gathered for a free concert, at campuses mostly east of the Mississippi, and at leading military installations. The group has also been featured on the Mike Douglas show and did a T.V. special with Pat Boone which was filmed at UCLA.

The group itself was formed about 4 years ago by a group of students and professors at U. of Minnesota. At present most of the members are professionals from campuses across the states. The group began in a folk vein, but have kept pace with musical innovations and now will do almost anything. But the performance itself is only part of what they do at their concerts. After they have finished singing, they invite members of the audience to come backstage and talk about their beliefs.

According to Alick-Lee Warner, to whom I talked about the movement and the group, it was almost impossible to come near the stage after the concert which he attended in Banff.

books

well it's not really a book, it's sort of...

The U.C. Undergrad, due out last spring, has finally arrived. It was well worth waiting for. Editors Bob Allen and Heather Murphy have collected a surprisingly good selection of, for the most part, undergraduate poetry.

But what is really significant about this collection is its refreshing good looks, an exciting new format. Entitled Pandora's Bag, the whole thing does come in a bag of sorts, so you can pull the goodies out one by one. The poems are printed individually on brightly coloured cards, each with a design of its own. This kind of lay-out gives every poem a quite remarkable integrity, a unique unity of feeling (which, in a few cases, I think, almost more than does credit to the unity of the poem itself.). The general attractiveness and excitement of the package is largely due to the imaginative, sensitive graphics of Maureen Hell, who has somehow managed to find the mood for each poem. Her drawings are also a lot of fun.

As might be expected, the quality of the poetry itself varies from really, really 'o wow' good, to just mediocre. The things which mainly bugged me, to get that over with first, were the inevitable weaknesses of young poets — an awkward self-consciousness, and something which is linked to that — a tendency to play with words, to dig up "effective" images and phrases without the requisite maturity of poetic vision to inform them. Marty Reyto's poem "The Madman" suffers on both counts. It begins,

The hellfire god came to plague me again last night

*when I lay in my bed staring at the walls.
But who or what this hell-fire god represents is left vague and general, in a muddle of self-consciously "poetic" motiveless phrases.*

There's one really bad poem which just doesn't deserve to be in this collection. Images of Nancy, by Gary Geddes has lines like,

*I see her moving tall and straight,
among the boats the tackle and the bait, and it ends with*

This is my lovely Nancy gone too soon, too soon!

Now that is just plain awful and I don't think even the poet would argue with me. He redeems himself admirably, however, in his other selections, although I must admit the significance of Transubstantiation, which is about the slaughter of a pig, completely escaped me.

Brian Johnson's Let Me Row Awhile has a nice lyrical bent to it and the poet shows that he is aware of the music of language. But somehow the whole thing feels second-hand and unoriginal — love-conventions are simply repeated, not exploited, as they should be; for example,

*arch your head back let your hair fall past your ears bare the white down of your neck while your hair falls behind
But then there's the "really, really" stuff. Like everytime
i look outside,*

the morning is pottering around the lamp posts about to piss on the streetcar tracks.

from Bob Allen's Letter to Morningstar,

or
*God lives in the jungle playing Tarzan
while the world is spread like Jane* until He is ready to enter from a poem by John R. Prikhal

or
Tonight was much the same an exceptional night of limited excellence of love-making in a stuffy room by partners who while not together were not apart

from Zhivago by Bob Bossin. Bossin's poetry is curious stuff and I don't quite know what to make of it. Both his poems in the collection are sinewy, dense, clever and often witty. But the sense of control and discipline is so strong in them, that it results in a curious kind of tension, as in these lines from Boys still go to the sea,

Boys still go to the sea, Inland boys when the law allows still go to the sea.

You can feel the poet's acute consciousness of the formal aspect of his work. You can almost hear him "cogitating".

But all of this is good, and there's more besides. Ian Young gives us a brutal and effective The Undergraduate, Of His Coy Mistress. (Student Power in Bed). You'll get the idea from the first lines,

*Though the air was a filthy grey it was a nice day in its way and as soon as we said How d'you do?
we knew*

we wanted to screw.
Of all the poets, however, Bob Allen is my favourite. The ease, maturity and imagination of his poetry is unmatched by any of the others. And he is almost consistently good. These are some lines from ONETWOTHREEGO: Portrait of the Artist as the Dusseldorf ripper:

*come pick at the carcabs kite bird in a dark flash remember with love baby rita so quickly carrion to little love poets,
so quickly killed with her crinkly laugh,
(I think i loved her) dumped in remembrance in six feet of happy valley (registered with love, with you, with the florida land sales association), wait for me little love,
i'm coming as soon as i brain
blackie and spread him like marma-lade in my notes:*

*i'm coming last of all, swollen love,
after jesus christ even,
first and last on a slippery cycle of little blackbird's blood.*

So anyway, dip into Pandora's Bag — no sin and death waiting to be unleashed, just some harmless poetic vapours. And in case you've taken it all too seriously, there is one poem, a glorious send-up of the whole poetic "bag" by Dave Brenner, that really should have the last word.

*And then it was that I found my shirt whom I have ever loved since she was a puppy.
She stood a while before me enraptured by the sight of my nostrils while i for my part nothing loth spewed forth the wisdom of my seven gallon ancestors
The room was to say the very least ubiquitous
And feeling no more sorry than yesterdays tomato juice
we indulged vigorously in one another.*

censors lobotomize tv movies

With the demise of television's moronic situation comedy and the coincident reaction against violence on the tube, the networks have turned increasingly to movies to fill the programming hours.

Movies cost less, of course, and they also fare better in the ratings. And, since higher ratings means demand (key word) amongst advertisers, and thus raise the price of a commercial spot, the television mogres (moguls + ogres) aren't doing too badly at all.

But movies on television have at least two basic flaws. First, in order to fit into a ninety minute time slot, they are often edited beyond recognition, halved and quartered until the film we remember from the theatre screen bears scant resemblance to that shown on the set. And second, the incidence of annoying commercials does little to enhance one's intellectual or aesthetic enjoyment of a unified cinematic experience. So, if it comes down to a choice between, say, Juliet Of The Spirits with its spirits somewhat lobotomized, and The Doris Day Show, one might as well read Scott Young.

The televised movie is plagued too by scissor-happy censors who, seeing themselves as defenders of morality, eliminate those scenes which offend their delicate sensibilities. The memorable scene from "The Pawnbroker", for example, in which Nasseran confronts a bare-breasted temptress and sees, in her place, the image of his wife — naked, shivering and helpless — as the Nazis prepare to assault, was deleted in the showing for television. The context ignored, bare breasts clearly represented some vital threat to America's morals.

The problem also applies to movies made especially for television. Allan King's prize-winning documentary Warrendale, Martin Lavut's recent Canadian Film Award winner

At Home (both made for the CBC), and Peter Watkins' powerful The War Game (for the BBC) have yet to be screened by the respective networks of sponsorship. King and Watkins are directors of proven merit, Lavut a novice with potential, so when the principal cultural influence in two countries reacts with such myopic rigidity to works of artistic value and promise, one begins (had one not done so already) to question not only the judgment of the censors, but their entire raison d'être.

In their feud with CBS, the Smothers Brothers cited violation of artistic integrity on the part of the network censors as a major cause of the dispute. With somewhat less chutzpah but clearly more justification, film directors could make the same claim. For while the cutting of a Brothers' comedy sketch, whether justified or not, detracted little from the impact of the programme as a whole, the snipping of a scene from a movie like John Huston's Treasure of Sierra Madre could seriously weaken its total effect.

Two new developments, however, may amend. First, some directors have refused permission to show their films on television unless screened in their entirety. And the technocrats have announced that one day videotaped versions of the classics — available in cassette-type packages — will at last make television a respectable medium for the showing of films. Please God, bless the EVR unit, but save the neighbourhood theatre just in case... if you could.

cracking cramer's nascent

"Peter Gzowski (he used to be editor of the Star Weekly Magazine) was going to start a magazine called This City — like New York magazine but for Toronto — and I was going to work for it. But he couldn't get enough money and then he got the job with MacLeans (as editor). I was working for the Globe and Mail and I didn't want to stay there. About midsummer, I realized that Gzowski's magazine wouldn't be so I started Egg."

That is the early history of the newly hatched Egg magazine (now nationally distributed) as told by its publisher-editor and originator, Alex Cramer.

Cramer is a soft-spoken, self-assured Toronto journalist who dabbled in student journalism at York University. He edited various papers — from The Winters Blast, a gestetnered college paper, to the Seer, a tabloid which lived long enough to rival the Excalibur, York's established student press, and then died from financial difficulties.

Cramer calls his bi-weekly tabloid an "underground" newspaper.

"We are underground in the sense that we are not commercial, not an advertisers' medium," Cramer explains.

"Underground" means we present ideas you don't find in the establishment media," Cramer continues, smiling slightly with pride for his latest journalistic adventure.

"We want to create a forum for good writing with enough ads to pay a small staff."

He has little fear of advertiser control of his magazine. The magazine's main ad-sources are the boutiques and so-called "underground" records which "must advertise in the publications their buyers read".

Egg is a 'radical' magazine, according to Cramer, but not "radical in a Marxist way. We won't be afraid to ask questions that have to be asked," Cramer explains.

"The paper will have political content," he adds.

The magazine is for "people under thirty — or over-thirty-but-hip . . . that is, they are rather cynical, they don't believe everything they read."

The 26-year old editor believes his magazine will be a place where young writers can "write the way they want for a selective audience".

Cramer speaks from his experience last summer at the Globe when he says, "When you write for the establishment press, you have to write a certain style. They cut up your stuff pretty badly; they destroy everything," he says and even his soft drawing voice is tinged with resentment.

In the "Premier Issue" of Egg, released a week ago, Cramer has tried to achieve the objectives he has set for his publication. The effort is obvious, the result is not always equivalent to that effort.

That is not to say that this first issue is poor, in spite of Cramer's efforts. The first issue is more than promising of good things to come.

The keynote, and longest article in this issue is by Review's own Larry Haiven, who has taken a critical look at the purposes and profits of beauty contests, for both the promoters and the participants.

Haiven has a lot to say, taking a woman's liberation "exploitation-of-women" tack, to which he gets strange reactions from a beauty contest promoter, a winner and even Judy Welch, owner and operator of a charm school.

And best of all, the layout is the complement of the article, contraposing beauty queens in line with fashion manikins in a row.

The two other articles of significance, which, appear a little later in the paper are by Ian Ritchie and Peter Goddard.

Ritchie writes nothing less than a brilliant review-comparison of Easy Rider and The Wild Bunch (which if you think hard enough, you will remember seeing in the Review).

Goddard, another Varsity-type now with the Toronto Telegram, leaves no area untouched in his record reviews of the Rolling Stones', Clear Spirit's and The Beatles' latest albums. He writes for the musically learned but clearly and directly enough for the musical novice.

Cramer's 'Blues' record reviews are a poor follow up to Goddard. He just does not have the knowledge musically or the facility journalistically to write Goddard-calibre reviews. He is a 'blues fan' spreading his opinions on a page.

But he has organized well his magazine and perhaps he should stick to that and keep his own writing to a minimum.

This goes double for his assistant editor, David McCaughna, who has written two articles in this issue, neither of which is really worth its space. The first, and lead, article is on the Porno-arts — a hackneyed subject to start with and then treated tritely on top of that. Basically a survey of what is happening with pornography, movies and paperbacks, its opinions are no more than broad generalities expressed in every magazine from Playboy to Ladies Home Journal.

His second article devotes about one quarter of a supposed book review to Jane Kramer's book on Allen Ginsberg. The rest is a collection of other people's opinions of Ginsberg. McCaughna can only give the second hand "impression one gets of him (Ginsberg)".

One really worthwhile article is a dialogue between Egg and Robbie Robertson of The Band (Music from Big Pink). Written by York student, Howard Gladstone, it is well done, comprehensive and interesting. Though the layout is not outstanding the checker pattern of copy and pictures is attractive and pleasing.

And while we're on layout, I must mention the center spread. A regular feature of Egg will be a photo essay in the center. This first one, with photos by Varsity's John Swaigen, has 'nice' pictures, neatly arranged. But in plain words, 'nice' pictures of people in a park don't really say anything. Hopefully, this will improve; I think it will, since the next centre will be done by Len Gilday who has been doing excellent photography and graphics for the Varsity for two years.

All told, the magazine holds its own quite well. A new magazine has to start somewhere, and writers like Ritchie, Goddard and in the future, Graham Fraser and Jack Batten are more than a good start.

He carries his stop-sign with a slightly military air as if it was his last hold on a useful existence in Toronto. Perhaps he was once in the army in his youth and it feels familiar to carry it that way. He takes his position at the crossing three times a day and I catch glimpses of him out my window as he stands there.

The violent orange of his safety vest is out of place on this quiet man who leads the school children across the street. One might expect him to be embarrassed. But he keeps his dignity in a way that draws out a respect that I didn't expect to be there.

Some of the children exchange half-hidden smiles as they approach the corner, but most wait impatiently to get across the road. He has not learnt the authoritarian manner that most people possess when dealing with children and is sensitive to their impatience. Balancing their eagerness against the flow of traffic he holds the stop-sign over the road like a sceptre whose authority he is not sure that he can trust. When he is sure that the cars have stopped, he leads the kids across the intersection.

Reaching the other corner, he lets the sign fall momentarily to his side. Then seeing no more children, he tucks it under his arm and waits. No one talks to him as he stands on the corner. What do you say to him — a man with a white, peaked hat like ice-cream vendors wear. A man whose day is regulated by the comings and goings of a group of children to whom he is another object to be looked at. In the morning, his presence tells them that it is the start of another day to sit in school, and at night, he is their confirmation that the day is over and it's time to get home to supper.

The cold, fall breeze blowing from Davenport Rd. pushes some dead leaves up against his feet. Carefully, he steps aside as if he did not want to hold them up and watches... as they scurry down the street. The yellow lines painted on the road are his protectorate while he is there, and he is careful not to stray too far from their boundaries. Passing beside him, a man with a briefcase crosses the road on his own, for he is not in school anymore and doesn't need anyone to watch the traffic for him.

I would like to speak to him some day but I never remember until I see him out my window and then my mind is occupied with other things just like the school kids that pass him by every day. And yet I will miss him if he ever goes for he has turned the corner into a setting which my mind can grasp and turn over like a piece of sculpture which one might see in the corner of an art gallery. And I know I won't say "hello, nice day isn't it".

But I will wonder who he is and watch him look expectantly for any stragglers who have had detentions after school.

And I do know that he would feel badly if he missed any of the kids. Because that is why he is there. And that is why I watch him.

A LeMans Start . . . Go!

Jarvis, Ontario (pop. 860)

On the right, just before Main Street crosses Talbot (the intersection of highway 6 from Hamilton with highway 3), you pass Burke's restaurant.

Diagonal red "Drink Coca-Cola" door handle opens a wooden screen door to the inevitable rack of records featuring the best of Elvis Presley, Duane Eddy and Johnny Cash. The rough-finish plaster ceiling lends an air of age (perhaps even pre-war) as sounds of a TV in a back room lead us to an empty booth. A "cute daughter" type — close-cropped home-style haircut and missing front tooth — takes our order over our not too successful attempts to avoid laughing at the girls in the next booth with Hagersville High-School ribbons dangling from their shoulders.

A few miles further down highway 3 towards Lake Erie, we turn off onto a dirt road leading to the track.

Huge bellows roar repeatedly, cut by the persistent whines of smaller bikes darting back and forth across the practice track.

A fifty foot high concrete monolith rises from the vintage airfield to the fluid greyness of an oppressive, overcast sky . . . almost indistinguishable from the distant, pallid lake.

1941 and a similar greyness echoed the drone of dozens of Harvard two-seater, fighter planes practicing low-level strofing runs at the concrete gunnery target. Smells of grease and aircraft fuel. Fleece-lined brawn leather jackets, khaki coveralls, walrus mustaches . . . 19 year old pilots hassling their Group Captain by racing solid rear-end Triumphs or Vincents around the tower.

The tower, now used by racing marshals, is still there. So are the sounds — British Nortons and Triumphs with their characteristic low brown roars and blatting back-downs, red howls of "pretty" Hondas, and lemon whines of Yamahas, Sidecar at 95 m.p.h.

Suzukis and Kawasakis.

In the smaller classes, Japanese technology dominates — their two-stroke machines like cats — fast, light and agile, with engines like swiss watches . . . finely tuned but very delicate. They have also recently become competitive in the larger classes, where their 350cc cycles can win against bikes almost twice their displacement. Large twin-cylinder English engines, although good in their day, fail to develop enough horsepower for their size to match advanced Japanese design. Harley-Davidson's, made in the good old U.S. of A., just don't make it at all.

Of the many types of bike racing, "road-racing" is only one. Other, self-explanatory types include ice-racing, dirt-tracking and hill-climbing. Scrambling is an attempt to race over hills, rocks, mud . . . without "dropping" the bike in the process — an ever-present possibility for even the best of riders. Enduros and trials involve driving one's bike where none have gone (or would have any sane reason for trying to go) before.

Harewood, a 1.8 mile long, nine-cornered oval, built largely on abandoned runways, is an aging version of the type of track used at Mosport, St. Jovite and Daytona for road-racing. Bikes entered in this type of event are segregated by type, displacement and expertise of riders.

The "production" class is split into 250cc and unlimited categories. Here the machines must be absolutely "stock" (as bought from a dealer) — tape up your lights, attach a number and go. Big 750cc Triumph Tridents and Norton Commandos have a considerable edge in the unlimited half of this class — grind and scrape through corners they may, but nothing can touch them down the back straight. Production races of both categories feature "Le Mans starts", in which riders line up on the far side of the track and then have to run across to their machines after the starter's flag drops.

Open sidecars, the home-built three-wheeled freaks of road-racing, wiggle-wobble up straights and drift and slide through corners with the pillion riders flopping in various precarious attitudes to maintain the machines' balance.

A "racing" class bike is easily distinguished by its fairing

— a light, fiberglass shell draped around the bike to leeward resistance. That characteristic is only one of many however, since the rules in this class permit unlimited (short of turbine power) modification of stock bikes in the interest of speed. The keen competition and greater skill necessary in this class (split into 125cc, 250cc, 500cc and unlimited races) makes it easily the most interesting.

In the 250cc senior-expert race, one of the day's feature events, Jim Allen (a friend of ours who rides for Suzuki of Canada) got off to a poor start. But then again, bad starts are not, necessarily, indicative of anything.

Yvon Duhamel, something of a legend in his own time at

Jim Allen slides

STORY . . .

SPEED FREAKS

this and other Canadian biking tracks, inevitably gets a poor start.

Down drops the starter's flag; the riders run alongside, pushing their bikes (a "grid", rather than "Le Mans start"); jump on side-saddle to bump start their engines and they're off! Except of course for the Horatio Alger of the track, little Yvon — by this time he's at the end of the pack, enveloped in blue exhaust, short legs still pumping away pathetically alongside his machine. Finally, as the roar of the pack fades into the first corner, he too jumps on. Then, at about 50mph (still in first gear with the engine shrieking its protest), he calmly swings his right leg over (yes, he really does ride side-saddle up to about 50), the cold spark-plug used only for excessively high speed riding stops missing, and he is off in hot pursuit. By the end of the first lap, he is first. That is how he rides — to finish first, or not at all.

In the Canadian Grand Prix two years ago for example; DuHamel finished first, carrying the entire clutch side of his handlebars in his lap.

But Yvon, like any other Canadian with any sort of talent, is in the States — trying to make a fair share of what little money there is to be had in bike racing. He races in Canada only in the most important meets, and thus was not at Harewood last Sunday.

Duane McDaniels, an American who rides for Livonia Yamaha of Michigan, was there, and made his presence felt by winning the 125cc race by a good half-mile. In the 250cc class, he was third (behind 97 and 127) going into the first corner. Our friend Jim Allen, off to the poor start mentioned previously, was about fifteenth as we resigned ourselves to watching McDaniels take the lead and win again.

By the third lap, McDaniels (on his white and red number 27) was second; with friend Jim ("Will you catch that damn American already?"), on number 100, in sixth position. The fourth lap saw McDaniels take the lead, followed by 127, 97 and ("Do you believe it?") 100!

McDaniels, in a tight situation on a hairy succession of turns known as "the Chicane", dropped to fourth place as Allen (paisley helmet recognizable anywhere) blasted through to take second away from 97. What followed was a running battle between Allen and 127 (who had both by this time lapped several of the slower riders): Allen would grab the lead by flinging his Suzuki into the two long turns known as "Drift Corner" and holding it over farther than anyone else dared. His engine, however, was sounding a bit "tatty" and you expected to see him off in the boondocks at any moment. In fact, the engine was missing at anything over 115mph. Consequently, 127 was able to regain the lead every lap in the back straight due solely to a sound engine, not skill. Continued trouble with his bike resulted in Jim's finishing third, behind 127 and 97. McDaniels, the American, had been unable to catch up and finished fourth.

The next race, the 500cc production class, was barely into the second lap when one of the leaders tried to pass another machine on the inside while they were both coming out of "Gunnery Corner" onto the pit straight. His front wheel spokes just grazed the other bike's right foot-peg which was enough to put his bike into the air, leaving its rider sliding across the track on his back at about 95mph. After hitting a hay-bale on the far side, he got up and walked to the ambulance by himself with a broken finger and superficial scratches (which is as good an argument as any for the eminent sensibility of wearing leathers when riding).

Due to an early dusk, the race was not restarted.

Walking back to our car through the paddock, we met Jim Allen and congratulated him on a fine race. He shrugged, gave a sheepish little grin and walked away . . . which probably would have been his reaction even if he had won. It's just that kind of thing . . . not to be talked about . . . personal.

music

two conductors... worlds apart

If any concertgoers were still in doubt as to the exact function of the man on the podium who stands there waving his arms in time to the music, their questions were certainly answered.

The Toronto Symphony's opening concert on Tuesday was a fine example of the vast difference that a change of conductors can make. Especially when the two conductors are as radically different in temperament as Seiji Ozawa and Karel Ancerl.

Ozawa, despite all his elegant technique and grace of motion, was a dynamic and vibrant force on the podium, and this force was necessarily injected into the players themselves. Within the space of a few years, the orchestra was transformed into a brilliant and sonorous piece of machinery, technically and expressively capable of perhaps more than it had ever done before. On occasion, watching Ozawa reach out with his long arms and hands, one had the impression that he was literally carrying the orchestra along, that the brisk vitality in the music was his own.

With Ancerl at the helm, the change is immediate and obvious. The orchestra has mellowed; much of the brilliance of the strings and brass is gone, replaced by a very strong middle section. The violas, instruments of nuance and shading, now occupy a very prominent position at the edge of the stage to the immediate right of the conductor.

There is often not enough distinction between tenor and bass, and some of the high brilliance of the upper strings is lost; at the same time, the string sound is full and rich, and emerges as one unit as opposed to the sound made by five separate string sections playing together.

Ancerl used the effect to great advantage, most notably in the second movement of the Dvorak Symphony No. 6, in which the emergence of one of the sections over the others from time to time was always a beautiful surprise. In this, as well as the first number on the program, a symphonic poem by Smetana (Wallenstein's Camp, Op. 14), Ancerl proved himself a master of detailed expression and musical dimensionality; his insight into individual passages is superb; strangely, though, this insight did not seem to encompass as fully the works as a whole.

To my mind, the best work on the program was the Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor, with Rudolf Firkušny as the soloist. Firkušny's interpretation of Schumann was perhaps a little too uniformly forceful, and at times, a shade too abrupt; the adjective can also be applied to some of the orchestral phrasing in the second movement. On the whole, though, and especially in the final movement, the orchestra and piano related to one another with a flowing rhythmic finesse, and clear expression; so that the one seemed to take on added impetus from the other, carrying the piece to a highly satisfying conclusion.

The concert was rather unfortunately marred by a number of minor, but disconcerting technical flaws in performance. In the Smetana, a beautiful brass fanfare was to some extent spoiled by the sloppy entrance of the first trumpet; in the Schumann, one of the clarinetists appeared to be playing with a faulty reed, resulting in two incongruous, high-pitched squeaks in the first movement; and in the final movement of the Dvorak symphony the violin sections exhibited a slight tendency to fall apart in the faster and more brilliant sections.

On the whole, however, the concert was a very enjoyable one. The choice of program lent it a marked Old World flavour; the orchestra has been toned and paced down, but the sound is richer, gentler and more delicately expressive than previously. The general mood was reminiscent of smoking an old, well broken-in pipe; relaxing, satisfying, burning slowly, but with a great deal more flavour.

Addendum: Remarking on the fact that the TS, rated the third-best symphony orchestra on the continent, is in serious danger of dissolving at the end of the season for financial reasons, a friend of mine said to me after the performance that it was a goddamn shame that a city as generally wealthy as ours should not think it worthwhile to uphold it. I need add no remarks to his, except that, strange as it may seem, the more money an orchestra has to work with, the better the spirit, the better the publicity, the better the turnout, the better the performance. And, of course, vice versa. At the moment, the TS barely has enough money to keep itself alive. And this is a fact that no amount of newspaper coverage

- in the world seems to be able to alter.

OTIS SPANN.

London 551.

The Bottom of the Blues.
Bluesway 6013.

Originally issued on English Decca in 1964, the first of these two records is a repackaged, stereophoned job. A couple of saxes, a trumpet and a guitar have been added to the original quartet, which included Muddy Waters and Ransom Knowling. The original record is superb, and the added instruments on this one don't intrude enough to spoil what is probably the finest blues session ever made outside the U.S. The other album Bottom Of The Blues is Spann's own favorite, and is better than his first for Bluesway. Lucille Spann provides some nice, down home vocals, and Muddy Waters band does the backing — sufficient recommendation.

SUNNYLAND SLIM.

Bluesmakers. World Pacific
21890

One of a new series by contemporary blues artists from World Pacific, Sunnyland Slim sings the rough, uncompromising blues of the small cafes and dance-halls where he has played for most of his 62 years. He doesn't have the sophistication of B. B. King or the tough brilliance of Muddy Waters, but there's a lot of honest feeling in what he does, and on this album, the sound has been updated by the modern guitar playing of Luther Allison and Henry Vestine. Occasionally the union of styles is uneasy, but on the whole it works.

JOHN LITTLEJOHN.

Chicago Blues Stars. Arhoolie 1043

EARL HOOKER.

2 Bugs and a Roach. Arhool-ie 1044

Fine fine fine fine fine. Two beautifully recorded albums by two virtually unknown artists. John Littlejohn shows signs of Elmore James influence, but has enough of his own musical personality to produce very much his own sound. Earl Hooker's jazz flavored guitar playing and artistically assimilated use of the wah-wah pedal is unlike anything I've ever heard. Earl Hooker should do more of the vocals, and I'd like to hear John Littlejohn's group with a piano, but otherwise these albums could hardly be more satisfactory. These two would be my pick for this year's best modern blues releases.

SWEET HOME CHICAGO.

Delmark 618.

As with many collections, this one could be more consistently good. Luther Allison and Louis Myers provide the best numbers, but Magic Sam, the best known artist on the record, is disappointing. Luther Allison is a young guitarist who is getting more and more attention and may soon follow Buddy Guy to fame and fortune. Louis Myers has been playing for a number of years with some of the big Chicago groups. If the harmonica playing he exhibits here is a fair sample, he should be a good deal better known.

art

a pile of grass, a mouldy loaf, a magnetic field, and thou

— Takis' iron filings with magnets

There was an international conference of philosophers in Hawaii on the subject of Reality. For three days Daiseiz Teitara Suzuki said nothing. Finally the chairman turned to him and asked, "Dr. Suzuki, would you say this table we are sitting around is real?" Suzuki raised his head and said Yes. The chairman asked in what sense Suzuki thought the table was real. Suzuki said, "In every sense."

— John Cage,
A Year From Monday

A lot of people are getting upset to-day because they do not think that art is real. They get upset when they see an art object and must quietly ask themselves, "Is this it?" Of course one may break the problem down into the various confusions of the twentieth century art world, such as the crisis of the object and, how much more less is more?

But this doesn't help things much, and it is for that reason that I think the New Alchemy at the Art Gallery of Ontario is so good. It fuses, presents and thereby clarifies the concerns of a lot of people in the art world to-day. Hans Haacke's conceptual weather map resides with a peace only slightly qualified by Charles Ross' prisms, the Van Saun bread, and the elegant magnetics of Takis. It presents elements: elements so simple that they have never been regarded as art before.

Yet in seeing these Alchemists at work (or play) it becomes obvious that they are giving us the most relevant cultural expression of our time in an especially direct and surprisingly unsullied way. Going to see the New Alchemy genuinely enhances one's life and that, I think, is the highest compliment these artists can receive.

But there are problems. Once having broken down the barriers between art and life, or so goes the Cagean revival, one finds that many things become unnecessary — me for instance. You don't "review" a pile of grass. Either you have perceived it or you haven't. It exists by itself and needs only the art gallery as a vehicle and possibly the press as publicist. This exhibit offers experience — and that is not art.

What makes the New Alchemy art is that experience has been interpreted and it is only within the narrow confines of selection or interpretation that the critic gets a chance to use his guns.

The only validity that a "review" of this kind can have is for it to act as a go-between for the art gallery and the reader: to say that in my opinion the pile of grass is a beautiful luxuriant thing, that the wind room is a sensuous experience, that there is aesthetic pleasure to be found in a simple phenomenon like a magnet. As John Van Saun writes in his book, "My position now is to select those things in reality that I think are beautiful and present them as best I can, to whatever audience there is." We can now see the perception of John Cage's remark on Rauschenberg that he erased the De Kooning "in preparation" and we can now see the New Alchemists paraphrasing him — our eyes are now in excellent condition. The stainless steel squares by Donald Judd were the beginning and not the end.

This show also screws a great many things up. You cannot buy wind. Magnetism, personal or no, is not a good investment. Should art gallery staffs take courses in the care and maintenance of chicken hatcheries, à la Hans Haacke? Can every artist put out $9,000 on one plexiglass polygon? This show demands that art, defined in a new and more basically subjective way, be more than it has ever been before.

And as it becomes more, the machinery of dealers, critics, and buyers becomes less. It is a conception of human sensibility that exists in complete harmony with the man on the moon, and like him declares loudly that everything about him is antique. The only question left is how much to throw away.

But nevertheless I am writing a review, so as my function goes slowly down the drain, I might as well review what I have seen. The title of the show exhibits a neat trick of side-stepping. Dennis Young, who organized it, should be applauded for treating it as synthesis and not as a variety of elements: e.g., conceptual art, kinetic art, possibly constructivist.

Hans Haacke is the easiest artist to see. The quality of his work should be apparent to any cultivated viewer, especially in the line of water, the billowing nylon, and the frost stick. It is lyrical work with a great deal of the artist in it, which is why it is so accessible; which is not to be taken as some kind of disqualification.

Charles Ross's work is more difficult in that he confronts the viewer with something more elemental than Haacke. My only real criticism is that I wish he could tighten his imagery more than he has in this show, but that is really a cavil in the light (literally) of his success. Ross connects well with traditional constructivist form while still being able to present phenomena: colour, reflexion, illusions of space that all become natural in the context that he makes. In a similar but less controllable way I give Gunter Uecker his Caspar David Friedrich rainbow. I have always enjoyed them, even if they don't advertise anything.

Takis I find far too theatrical to be successful except in the nails and iron filings configuration. There is so much going on in his more elaborate magnetic pieces that they obscure the phenomenology of them, which is after all, the point.

John Van Saun is, I think, the most radical of the "exhibitors". He combines a real aggression in such things as his very painterly mouldy bread with an extremely ethereal white band of plastic that slowly burns away. In his book as well (which is a rather slick production) he shows this same delicate aesthetic grasp of things. The question is whether the work is simply weak and from a minor artist, or strong and highly definitive of a new basis for the art of our time.

I haven't decided yet. He does however symbolize the New Alchemy and summarizes so well when he writes, "Anybody could do my work, in fact, there's no talent involved."

1. False. Internal menstrual protection actually dates back to the early Roman days, but it remained for an American doctor to develop Tampax tampons. That was more than 30 years ago and since then women and girls have used over 25 billion of them.
2. True. Any normal girl of menstrual age—married or single—who can insert Tampax tampons without discomfort can use them with complete confidence.
3. False. You can tub or shower—even swim—when you're wearing Tampax tampons. Contrary to superstition, water can't hurt you, and cleanliness is particularly important during your period.
4. False. Active girls especially appreciate the freedom of Tampax tampons but even the "indoorsy" types like their comfort and convenience, too.
5. True. Remember there had to be a first time for everyone. Just relax, take your time and follow the simple directions in every package of Tampax tampons.

Problem: Is it preferable to do a single thing to perfection or many little things to upper mediocrity?

Lacking an all-purpose virtuoso who can accomplish both, the 5-year-old Harkness Ballet seems to have chosen the latter option. Over its 6 days in Toronto, the company is performing 11 different short works. All relatively obscure, they range from dated to daring. Judging by the sampling I saw on Tuesday, their efforts may be interpreted as either imaginative flexibility or nervy omnincompetence, depending on whether you want to stress intention or realization.

Madrigalesco, for example, is described in the programme as "an evocation of the sentiments, manners, and graces... so often reflected in portraits of the Italian Renaissance". (Have you ever wondered what the beginning and/or end of the Mona Lisa's smile looked like?)

But this transfer of the qualities of a static art into a kinetic one was achieved only by lead ballerinas Hester Fitzgerald and Bonnie Mathis. Aside from their efforts, the effect of a medallion come-to-life was achieved only in the static stage pictures beginning each section of the ballet.

And even then it was due as much to the colour and stylized grace of the female costumes (the males' were chintzy Flash Gordon) as to any technical effects — mostly just sphere (moon?) that creaked its way up and down the backstage curtain — or to Benjamin Harkarvy's choreography, which (1) started a story line and then dropped it, and (2) directed a monotonous majority of the dance along a diagonal downstage line. This latter gave his dancers the maximum possible distance in which to move, but after a while it became as predictable as kids whizzing down a playground slide and then climbing back up to the top.

Evidently this is Harkarvy's favorite strategy, since he relentlessly used it again in Le Diable a Quatre. This pas de deux was another evocation — this time of the Romantic Ballet style of the mid-19th-century. The subtleties of the various dance forms within this idiom were lost on me, and the pseudo-Giselle costumes seemed only slightly sillier than the 1845 homogenized-folk music.

But Lawrence Rhodes' lithe and light dancing was among the best of the evening. Since he is cited in the programme notes for his "intellectual approach to the interpretation of his roles", I should have liked to see him in something worth his intellect and technique.

Monument for a Dead Boy, on the other hand, certainly did not suffer from lack of something to say, and said it as jarringly as possible. What it said was, I think, a sort of Freudian odyssey of education, conducted in flashbacks at the point of death, (the last before the darkneses converge being the moments of conception and birth).

Confusion as to what was happening resulted from splitting the title character into himself (Helgi Tomasson) and his golden youth (Warren Conover). But, aside from missing lots of the electronic music cues and occasionally stepping out of the equally eerie light pools, the classically-trained dancers managed to cope with their writhing.

Souvenirs, the final number of the evening, had nothing to say but said it with a relish shared by the audience. Bursquing sex and pre-World-War-I modes in a series of vignettes like the Vamp (Bonnie Mathis) vs. the Gigolo (Salvatore Aiello), this relish was a foregone conclusion. Froth, but every bubble of detail in timing, costume, and business, was in place.

Maybe next season they'll try one thing more worth their potential talent and their audiences' time. marion o'connor conried slogs through jargon jam

Broadway productions are events during which the middle class indulge their taste for TV. They can feel pampered, spend money in self-satisfying anticipation, and yet not ever have to depart from the comforting banality which TV dispenses to their interiors.

Thus might speak a bumbling modern Saki; who would, of course, to be fashionable, be a radical. Radicalism is presently the fort where the objectivist myth holes up, and some suspicion of one's objectivity is necessary for that kind of superciliousness.

Now I freely admit to being prey to such suspicions of objectivity (they are insidiously like intimations of immortality); and I do have difficulty suppressing scorn for Spofford! which plays, or at any rate is performed, at the O'Keefe Centre until 25 October.

However, my curling lip is less a function of my politics than my aesthetic sense. If one were to accept the easy fiction that Broadway represents what middle-class America — the phrase itself is an easy fiction — wants, then a terrifying indictment could indeed be drawn up against a whole people. (Mr. Burke notwithstanding.) But there is a glut on the indictment market these days, what with the Telegram, the NDP, and CUS in full cry, and this is a review, not a polemic.

Hans Conried (himself no bush league lipcurler and mobscorn) takes the title role as a Connecticut chicken farmer who is gradually inundated by a polluted tide of commuters. Various caricatures function as the cultural neo-Huns: Linda Parrish, Peggy Winslow, Karen Ford, and Peggy Hagan. Miss Hagan, who plays the snobbish-arbiter of the commuter set, oozes, sighs and gushes like a decrepit platinum faucet.

She also provides the motive for Conried's forays into commuterdom, round which the play is built. (It is built in the same way a prefab house is: neatly, quickly, and shoddily.) She breaks up the romance between her simpering son and Conried's budding granddaughter. (Phillip Schopper and Kathleen Morrison are mired in those parts.)

Conried decides to mingle with the uitlanders so as to learn their mores and pass the knowledge along to granddaughter. However he garners enough lore for a sociology tome, and is bribed not to publish it by being made first selectman, or mayor.

Along the way, Mary Cooper, impersonating his widowed sister-in-law, decides that Conried has had enough widowerhood himself, and another marriage plot ensues. Her complacent whining platitudes make the sister-in-law one of the few fleshed characters in the play. (The others are Spofford, the boy-ingenu's arbitrating mother, and the said mother's guzzling Scots poet and paramour, played by a braw Jerome Dempsey.)

Mainly the play functions as a creaking vehicle for Conried's acerbic voice. He is not given many noticeable witticisms to exercise it on, although his role as narrator-cum-character gave plenty of room for them. The jokes are of the over-40 rib-nudging type that one reads in gossip columns, and they appear with depressingly metronomic regularity.

The author, Herman Shumlin, who also dares boast that he directed the production, has chosen to fling fake Freudianisms about, and also to make fatuous comments about the generation gap. (Any comments of whatever calibre on that subject are an inevitable sign of a moribund intellect. It types one the same way talking about the Queen of Canada, or the moral justification for Viet Nam, does.) Smug "relevance" is not an excuse for anything, least of all a jam of jargon.

The set reinforces the impression of drab banality which the lines and plot induce. It is really not necessary to import an entire pseudo-Depression house in order to have the set suggest one. What entertainment an evening at Spofford! presents is not owing to the plot, which is so tight and heavy it could be stolen bodily, nor to the wit, which is invisible, nor yet to the acting, which is negligible. No, it derives solely from the sight of Mr. Conried playing Atlas with a paper-mache world. He flexed his voice admirably, as if it were the sinews of the play. And so it was.

I overheard someone ask his companion at intermission, "You enjoying the play?" She replied, "I'm waiting for something to happen." I still would be, if I thought it worth the effort of inertia.

Medium Cool is anything but a lukewarm movie. It is Chicago in the summer of 1968. Through the eyes of our young, handsome, muscular anti-hero, who this time around is a T.V. cameraman (not a photographer as in Blow-up), we cover the Democratic convention, the riots complete with practise sessions, the funeral of Robert Kennedy, the Black Power scene, the hippie scene and the average guy's scene.

The film begins and ends with a car accident. The first accident our hero, John (i.e. everyman) is filming while his soundman expertly and disinterestedly ("I'm just an extension of a tape recorder") picks up the feeble moans of the smashed-up woman.

The last accident finds our hero personally involved. He is reported in critical condition and his latest girlfriend, a simple sincere woman from West Virginia, is killed. While the rear end of John's car is flaming away, a carload of kids snaps a picture as the car passes and then we see yet another cameraman. As the movie ends, he focuses his camera first on the wreckage of the car and then on us, until the blackness of his lens envelops the screen.

The message here is exquisitely banal — modern technology and the population explosion have thrown men closer together. They are forced to be aware of their fellow man, but this awareness extends only to the medium of recording as a machine does.

The harsh world that director Haskell Wexler faces in Medium Cool is that of cinema verite. Most art forms are now preoccupied with grabbing a piece of reality and rubbing our faces into it until we run away, vomiting. Medium Cool is a movie concurrent with this theme. Not that it presents us with a Campbell's soup can (read: absurdity) — it simply relates the truth and does so successfully.

But Wexler does not leave us to tremble over vast quagmires of nebulous symbols left connected by the flimsiest of threads. Rather he blatantly points them out in the forward, confident American style. Millions of homing pigeons are launched into the air and the scene switches to a poster of John Lennon beside a dove.

The symbolic tack is carried in approximately this manner for the remainder of the film. There are innumerable instantaneous flashes to other scenes and a substantial quantity of flashbacks, but they are organically linked together.

The love scenes are magnificently done and could easily serve as a model for the appropriate use of nudity and sexuality in other films. Nude scenes in Medium Cool illustrate and enhance the main themes of senselessness, indifference and apathetic cruelty.

John takes his girlfriend, ironically enough a nurse, to a Roller Derby where the skaters are constantly engaged in staging mock fights. At approximately the time that the mock fighting turns into a very brutal, very real battle, Ruth turns passionate eyes on John and they leave for bed. They make love to the sound effect of the cheering mob at the roller skating rink.

The juxtaposition of the rink brawl and the love scenes are marvellously concise commentaries on American sexuality. The film has its own explanation of the 'New Morality'. When one is not deep involved, one can have a variety of partners and sex is levelled out to a fun-and-games function. Medium Cool does not convey any kind of melodramatic disgust at this type of sexuality; it simply portrays it as an integral part of the entire environment.

This American 'Blow-up', is more obvious than its British equivalent and does not purport to be as aristocratically modish. Characters are less stylish, more hung-up, more common-place and less eloquent. The Chicago riots are much less 'cool' and a good deal steeper than fashion photography.

and who shall keep thee from corruption mr. censor?

During the past several months Toronto film reviewers have donned their capped-crusader uniforms with just cause and joined battle with the Ontario Board of Censors' five-man force. The Board has recently emerged from several ugly battles fought over the release of three films — The Wild Bunch, A Married Couple and Medium Cool.

The Wild Bunch, Sam Peckinpah's powerful examination of a mythology of violence which has escalated into reality, ironically met objections from the Board for being too effective. The film's distributor, Warner Bros. -7 Arts, had originally intended to release Peckinpah's anti-Western last July 25, but the Board delayed final distribution for one and a half months pending a large number of cuts. On the Board's insistence, Warner Bros. ultimately pared 1000 feet from the film, needless to say much against the director's protests.

The commentary on last month's bout between Allan King (A Married Couple) and O. J. Silverthorne (Chairman of the Board) has been dutifully documented, and with good reason. The Board demanded that King cut 34 individual dialogue sequences, which the Telegram in its best euphemistic manner described as "four-letter words for copulation, female genitalia and excrement", plus a semi-visible nude swimming scene shot through a cluster of reeds along a lakeshore one misty morning.

As for Medium Cool, the distribution of which was mysteriously delayed for four weeks, J. Cunningham, Director of Advertising for the Ontario Board of Censors, denies any complicity.

"We released the film, so obviously we had no objections. Everything in that film has been released as it was submitted to us. We didn't hold the film up so obviously it must have been held up by the distributor. There couldn't have been a lot of controversy about it since I wasn't invited to look at it."

Activity in Cunningham's office has that distinctive quality of a live enactment of a 1945 Hollywood detective movie. Official classified documents locked in banks of green filing cabinets, secretive comments spoken in subdued tones. Example: on producing a file card stamped Restricted, and on noticing the tape recorder microphone, a certain nervousness crept furtively into the interview. "You'll have to turn that off. This information is restricted to the distributor and this office."

Although remarkable advances have been achieved in space-age technology, to my knowledge Japanese manufacturers have not yet achieved the ultimate goal in miniaturization — the concealment of a light-weight camera in a microphone. What price the role of Censor demands.

Although the Ontario Board of Censors operates as an agency of the Dept. of Tourism and Information and although the Board requires a 50-cent-a-foot clearance fee which ostensibly guarantees the distributor freedom from local police harassment, the operation can and has been ignored by the Toronto Morality Squad. Witness: that ugly affair surrounding Hieronymus Merkin.

Similarly, although formal provincial politics do not affect the operation of the Board, inter-governmental bureaucracy does. After Allan King appealed to W. H. Auld, the minister answerable for Board decisions in the Legislature for a more realistic appraisal of A Married Couple, the problems surrounding the film's release seemed to vanish with unusual rapidity. On this neither Silverthorne or Cunningham would comment. "Anything that transpires between this office and the distributor is confidential."

The Ontario Board of Censors is CONFIDENTIALLY located between the Leaside Community Memorial Gardens and the Canadian Pacific Railway tracks in Toronto's east end. From humble yet significant origins in 1911, the Board graduated into 'modern' film censorship (or as Cunningham prefers, 'classification') in 1934.

At that time the current Premier of Ontario, Mitch Hepburn, appointed Silverthorne, an old family friend, to the post of Ontario Censor with these sage words of advice: "O. J. you're going to be a film censor. If you're a good boy, the government will give you a pension in 20 years." (sic.)

After 35 years, O. J. Silverthorne and his four-man Board is still very much in evidence. In their annual report to the Minister, the Board stated with pride that during the past year, of the 548 feature films submitted, only 5 were not approved while 97 were placed in the Restricted category. Eliminations were made in 43 trailers (advertising pieces for forthcoming features) and 437 pieces of film advertising were rejected.

Decisions within the Board as to the acceptability and classification of films are essentially subjective with the Chairman casting the deciding vote in a deadlock. Apart from The Theatres Act and Regulation 554 which are primarily concerned with directions like "There shall be one toilet-room for use by men and one by women, and they shall be conspicuously marked accordingly", there are few formal guidelines for the Board's operation. Small wonder that decisions from Silverthorn's office more often appear to be arbitrary than consistently reasonable.

(Scenes in If . . . depicting female genitalia and lewd acts of excretion were passed without comment while the Board's collective thunder crashed down upon King's film.)

Generally, Cunningham feels that the Board has gone "from a period of great activity to a period of great liberality right now. Of course this is true of every facet of life. We like to think that we reflect society. I don't think there's been a lot of activity from this office. Perhaps these people who complain are good publicity agents. It's wonderful for them to stir up a little controversy and keep it going."

Undoubtedly the Ontario Board of Censors is the most liberal in Canada, with Alberta still reigning as the most restrictive, yet there is one disturbing feature about the Board's operation. If, as Cunningham professes, "Once a film is in a category (Restricted, Adult or General) we more or less leave it there", why the necessity for further cuts? Surely, the restriction of distribution through the restriction of audience is enough.

And if the Board is becoming more liberal, it is also becoming more erratic. Perhaps hard-line stands are occasionally necessary to placate that little old lady with the shopping bag in the back row, but when in the space of three months three separate films are subject to the same 'get tough' policy, it does become puzzling.

In the precarious matter of authority, doubt not the power of the Ontario Board of Censors. If a distributor objects to a decision, either the Board will alter that decision, which as Cunningham admits is seldom, or the film will be reclassified — small comfort for a distributor whose product is already in a Restricted category. If the distributor refuses to abide by the dictates of the Board, he is simply denied a certificate and his film then cannot be released anywhere in Ontario.

Basically the current controversy surrounding the Board of Censors filters into a question of representation. If the Board does claim to reflect society, which parts in the sum of society does it, in fact, reflect? Again Cunningham is the spokesman — "We seem to be barraged by the same segment of the population all the time. We get a lot of mail claiming that we're not doing our job — that we're letting too much through. The feeling that we get is that the public doesn't think we're being restrictive enough. Everyone doesn't participate and sometimes a minority will do all the talking. But they definitely influence anything that we might do in the future." Does this also include minorities who feel that the Board is overly restrictive or even that it has become superfluous?

The influence of the Board of Censors will never vanish from films distributed in Ontario. It would be naive to think otherwise. The classification system may change but the Board will still remain. As Cunningham predicts, "I think there's always going to be a place for classification and I feel strongly that there should always be some sort of classification to advise people, especially younger people. If you took a young person to some of the films you've seen, I'm sure they'd be really shocked."

I saw the Wild Bunch again two weeks ago. The majority of the audience was between 16-20. They laughed at every scene.

singer Roger Daltry, bare-chested with a white cape, slithers around just like rock singers are supposed to.

Throbbing rhythm and driving bass, the music is total rock — music to fire neurons to. The Who are uncompromising purists. They have restricted themselves to a precise form and perfected its expression.

After Tommy, with the crowd cheering for more, the Who played some other songs, including versions of "Shakin' All Over," "Summertime Blues," and their own "My Generation." Townshend finished the act by throwing his guitar in the air and then smashing it (The Who used to smash all their equipment, including their amplifiers, but I guess this got too expensive).

Needless to say, a horde of teeny-boppers rushed the stage and were fought back by a line of cops just like in the good old days.

MUSIC

The Who have one of the finest live rock shows around. No pretensions — they just shout, jump all over, play their music, and have a good time. They don't abuse their audience in the process (like, say, Jim Morrison does). It seems they sincerely want their listeners to get involved and have a good time too.

That was my impression of The Who concert at the Coliseum last Tuesday night. They played a long set — almost two hours. It was well worth the money (at a time when most top rock singers have cut sets down to under forty-five minutes). The only flaw in the show was the acoustics of the building (Peter Townshend, leader of the Who, apologized for this, referring to the place as a "garbage can"). But the music was loud enough, and could be heard at ear-splitting volume by everyone there.

The Who warmed up with several old numbers, and then went into their full-length rock opera, Tommy. This piece of music isn't as technically perfect done live as it is on the Decca album. But The Who more than make up for this with the raw energy of their act. In preparation for striking a chord, Townshend, dressed in a white jumpsuit, leaps up in the air, falls to the ground, and whirls his arm around like a softball pitcher. Lead

The Toronto Chamber Society is presenting its first concert since its formation ten months ago.

This group under the experienced hands of Anngret Wright, the director, has prepared a program of Bach, Buxtehude, and Shutz, using a style of singing designed to bring out the qualities of this music.

The only drawback to this concert is the price — $3.00 — but for those with the money, it should be a good buy.

What a shock to open up the foldout of a skin magazine and find that Mary-Anne Buxom is not the girl next-door. She's a model who tours with the editor of the new Penthouse magazine, somebody's answer to Playboy. Penthouse, in a recent magazine ad claimed that it didn't fool around with philosophies or polemics, just ran good clean pics and stories. Well, if Mary-Anne doesn't play volleyball with her younger brother or take Spanish or teach arts and crafts or go to the library, the whole myth comes down about my ears. Mary Anne Buxom epitomizes what Davy Crockett once said, "Learn to do one thing well and you can tell the world to go to hell."

TRAVAIL

Quebec is a beautiful city. It is historically and architecturally unique. Although the Americans are only a few miles south and despite the humiliation of having the local "Plains" on which they were defeated glorified and meticulously maintained, and although it's all been going on for about two hundred years, Quebec City has somehow preserved the spirit of its French origins, beautifully.

Now then, guess where somnambulist somebody decreed a concrete-and-glass incongruously sterile and spiritlessly unimaginative "Centennial Project" to be erected? Yes Virginia, right in the very heart

But the story is not over because although "Centennial" has been over for two years, somehow the relatively small building is still not complete . . . in the setting of central Quebec City, the building represents an implicit act of violence! It is an irritating and incongruous eyesore. I sensed an aura of outraged energy being projected from the local people toward the building site . . . a feeling that arrangements were being made among self-respecting "Quebecois" to make some "alterations" . . . Quebec Libre!!

suggests student and staff committees have say in hiring and firing and tenure

The Commission on University Government recommends that students have a direct voice in appointment, tenure and promotion of academic staff.

It proposes that an ad hoc committee of the concerned department, institute or centre take responsibility for presenting a list of suitable candidates for a new appointment.

Although the chairman would have the final say, if his decision did not agree with that of the committee he would be expected to explain his decision to the group concerned.

The Commission divides academic promotions into two groups — those not involving tenure and those involving promotions to full professor and the award of tenure.

Non-tenure promotions would be made at the departmental level by the chairman on the advice of an ad hoc departmental personnel committee.

Because tenure (lifetime job security) is a concern of the university as a whole, CUG recommends that tenure promotions be made by the dean of the faculty.

He would be advised by an ad hoc personnel committee of the faculty council, composed of the faculty dean, department chairman, faculty and students from the faculty council and the departmental personnel committee and the Dean of the graduate school.

TWO CAUCUSES

Since there is strong faculty reluctance to discuss their colleagues with students, the Commission suggests two separate caucuses, staff and student, for promotion committees.

Both would make recommendations to the chairman or dean.

The Commission terms policy on appointment and promotion of academic staff as "the most sensitive problem facing the Commission."

Last summer, to voice their concern, 632 professors signed a petition stating:

"We, the undersigned, wishing to maintain the present academic standards of the University of Toronto, are totally opposed to the admission of students to any committee concerned with the appointment, termination of appointment, tenure and promotion of academic staff."

The Association of Teaching Staff and the Victoria Association of Teaching Staff, in briefs submitted to the Commission, also voiced opinion against direct student involvement in promotions, tenure and appointments.

The faculty argued that student participation would jeopardize professional standards of scholarship and endanger the quality of education as a whole.

However, the Commission argues that students can make a "unique contribution" to the overall assessment of teaching staff.

It also argues that "students too must have certain rights, an academic freedom to learn that gives him the responsibility to help define what shall be learned.

"In the community we hope will develop at this university, academic rights and freedoms cannot be the preserve of any one group — they should be shared."

CUG recommends that students must take a certain number of courses in a department before being eligible to run for the department council or serve on its committees.

"It only seems fair to all concerned that students should have a certain commitment to a particular department, simply in terms of numbers of courses before helping to formulate its policy."

The report continues "Our other concern is that teaching and student opinion of this teaching be guaranteed considerable influence when promotions and the award of tenure are being considered."

The Commission makes no recommendations on tenure, but urges a formal discussion and re-examination on the place of tenure in the university.

Responsibility for the appointment of The President all deans, chairmen, and directors would be with the Governing Council.

FIVE-YEAR TERMS

CUG proposes that the initial term of office for academic administrators be five years renewable only once.

At the end of the first term, a committee would consider all candidates for the position.

The report states that "It is often true that a man who remains in one administrative position for too long develops a disproportionate amount of power which, however fairly it is wielded, is viewed with suspicion and distrust."

According to the authors of the report, "Few problems have been the subject of such concern and debate within the university as the question of policy on the appointment and promotion of academic staff.

"We offer our discussion of the problem and the recommendations that follow as guidelines to the vital negotiations that should be carried on in each department, centre and institute."

"The recommendations here are not made lightly. We are aware that some will find them hard to support.

"We would assert that they are based on principles which we have considered essential for the life of the community."

Under CUG's recommendations students will have a say in their lecturer's future.

deplores 'second-class' status, gives non-academic staff a voice in decisions affecting them.

A significant role in decision-making for university "support staff" — janitors, office workers, maintenance workers, etc. — is recommended by the CUG Report.

Deploping their present "second-class" status, the Report seeks an assertion of their "citizenship within the University Community" through "organization, representation and education."

The Report distinguishes between the "academic community" and the "university community", the former including just students and faculty, the latter including support (a positive term for "non-academic") staff. Support staff have a role only in the latter community.

CUG endorses the proposal of many briefs (particularly that of the Canadian Union of Public Employees) in giving support staff "a right to participation in those decisions that affect their well-being" in the university community.

The report gives support staff equal representation with the faculty and students on committees of department and faculty councils set up to deal with matters concerning them.

ASSESSORS

Support staff representatives would be on the Governing Council only as "assessors", though they would be allowed membership on Council committees.

They are given "limited representation on the top body" because their "stake in the university as an academic institution" is not "similar" to that of faculty and students.

Support staff are also to be permitted membership on academic councils.

The Report calls for a "flexible, effective" and broadly-based organization to represent support staff and create "organizational unity" among "diverse" staff members.

This organization would be the bargaining agent for the employees, along the lines of an industrial union. It would also have some role in arranging support staff representation on decision-making bodies.

While calling "rigid craft unionism... inappropriate", CUG refuses to better define the role of the organization, leaving it to be settled by the staff and Governing Council.

DIRECT SUPPORT

While rejecting the recommendation of the CUPE brief that families of university employees be given preferential access to the university, the Report suggests "direct assistance" to support staff to allow them to study both within and without the university.

"Paid absence from work for study, direct financial subsidies" and "special courses" are suggested to allow employees to further their education.

Special consideration for university employees is also suggested to the Presidential Advisory Committee on Extension.

CUS: WHY VOTE NO

The "Canadian Union of Students" is a myth. There really is no such thing in this Country.

There is an organization which uses that name and which gets a lot of money from the students at this University by pretending to be a national student organization. But it really is little more than a fairly small number of people some of whom are students. It claims to be an organization working for the betterment of mankind, but it is really working for a revolution.

And that is what makes it unacceptable as a "student union".

When you go to a CUS seminar or congress you hear a lot of talk about "repressive tolerance" and "false consciousness" and stuff like that. Their idea is that you and I really don't know what we want or need. We have to have our "consciousness" raised, and when we do we will all go out and man the barricades. The revolution will happen and a bright new world will dawn.

And if you don't quite like the idea of having someone with a "workers uniform" (blue jeans and a blue jeans jacket) manipulating your consciousness, or if you think that maybe you have a viewpoint which is a little more rational or just as good as theirs, you really aren't welcome in the "Canadian Union Of Students".

And if you even try to develop an analysis, which is not based on the premise that revolution is necessary you can forget about trying to get it across in the "Canadian Union of Students." It will wither and die before it is out of your mouth.

The official line of the political party which hides under the name of the "Canadian Union of Students" is shying away from talk of revolution these days. It's pretty hard to fight a revolution without money, you see. And we have the money, you and I.

So the leaders of the "Canadian Union of Students" decided to stop talking about revolution and concentrate on keeping us paying. What we have to decide on October 23, next Thursday, is if we are going to. If you want to find out more about the organization which calls itself our student union, go to the meetings and ask questions.

A lot of us have done that sort of thing already. We've pretty much made up our minds to vote "no" next Thursday. We don't see any reason to belong to a political party which gives us no room to express our concern on the very real issues that confront our University and our country. We don't see any reason to let people who believe in revolution to the exclusion of all else make fools of the students in Canadian Universities any longer.

If you want to raise some questions in print, bring your stuff to the Engineering Stores, or the SAC office. The people who are fighting CUS don't have much of an organization. We have other things to do besides organize . . . like studying. But we'll do our best to see that your point of view gets published and listened to.

CUS a political party, says Abols

By LAURA KELLY

The debate on next Thursday's CUS referendum was opened Wednesday with a Liberal Club discussion featuring SAC President Gus Abols and SAC Finance Commissioner Bob James (III Vic).

"During this referendum the issue is not whether a national union is needed. The issue is whether CUS is that viable union," Abols said, speaking against membership.

James, a CUS proponent, had described the Canadian Union of Students as a vehicle for improving the learning process at the university and for introducing critical thinking into the classroom.

"Education should become non-authoritarian. Education should become a non-competitive experience, a cooperative experience," James said.

James indicated the goals of CUS were the abolition of mass lectures and rigid grading and the widening of the university experience to include all classes of Canadian people.

He defended CUS as a tool for implementing student aims not only in education reforms but in student housing and student employment.

Abols offered a different description of CUS.

"It's a political party. It doesn't try to bring up discussion. It tries to indoctrinate," Abols stated.

Abols said CUS meetings are dominated by socialist rhetoric. "If you want to express a view that is not Marxist Revolutionary, people laugh. I find that totally unacceptable as a union of students."

James stressed the potential of CUS as a union that could initiate social change in the university.

He said he regretted the lack of dialogue between students and the CUS representatives.

"We feel that perhaps other peoples' heads are not in the same place. We hope that this referendum will get at that. We hope that it will have people discuss why we see things this way," James said.

Abols hammered away at the representivity issue. "CUS has no intention whatsoever of trying to find out the general consensus. The CUS officials do not believe in representivity," he said.

"Many of us don't believe CUS can be representative in the liberal democratic sense," James said.

"The way CUS would like to be representative is to go out, talk to people, and discuss what you're doing. Get a constant feedback on what you're doing and thinking," he added.

James held that it is a matter of the CUS representatives acting, and then returning to their constituents to explain their actions.

Abols was challenged on the validity of withdrawal. "CUS exists now in these terms of reference because those are the people that are involved now. If you want to change the institution you don't withdraw," one student said.

"I've tried to reform the institution. The CUS people fear representation as a loss of their power," Abols replied.

English frosh choose exams

Students in first year English courses will continue to write some form of final examinations.

About 140 English department faculty members, after voting to allow about 50 students to watch the proceedings but not to participate, Wednesday approved four of 22 recommendations of a report prepared by the combined English Department's examination committee.

The committee's report used the results of a questionnaire mailed to more than one thousand students and staff.

Although it recommended that final exams be kept, the report noted each instructor, if he notified his class, the course committee and the combined English departments by November 15, should be allowed to set his own exam. His students could then choose to write the professor's or a departmental exam final.

SFU petition started here

A petition supporting the strike at Simon Fraser University was framed on Wednesday by a group of students under the auspices of the Political Economy Course Union.

The group, headed by students Paul Reinhardt and Richard Peachey, will circulate the petition in most Political Economy classes.

Literature is being prepared to acquaint those students who are unfamiliar with the events at SFU with the situation.

As well, they are setting up a booth in the Sidney Smith Hall foyer so interested people will be able to sign the petition.

The petition will be sent to SFU President Kenneth Strand.

Sailors hit by goofy ruling; knocked out of CIAU regatta

By RON FACTOR

Well, the Athletic Directorate at Queens pulled a beauty last week-end.

An OQAA sail-off was to be held on Friday last, to determine who would sail in the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union regatta.

Because of strong winds, however, only one race was held in which McMaster placed first and John Wright of Toronto came second.

So it was all set, Mac and Toronto would race in the CIAU regatta.

But the Queens boat managed to break its centre-board during the race and through persistent bitching, the Queens team pressured their Athletic Directorate into drawing cards to select the winners. (What better way is there of determining sailing ability?)

With low card winning and ace being high, Skipper John Wright of Toronto drew an ace of clubs, which of course meant he was disqualified from sailing in the national regatta.

The Executive of the U of T Sailing Club strongly condemns the action taken by the Queens Athletic Directorate.

It displays not only poor sportsmanship on behalf of the host team (Queens hated the sail-off), but gross unfairness as well.

Ted Haynes, the Mac skipper, placed first over all in the CIAU regatta. Queens came second last.

Varsity-Queens highlites busy weekend

By PAUL CARSON

It's going to be a busy weekend for Varsity athletes.

The football Blues travel to Kingston for a crucial showdown with the second-place Gaels. Queens were upset by McGill 28-6 in the season opener and must defeat Blues tomorrow if they hope to repeat as Yates Cup champions.

Varsity should be at peak form for the game, as last week's important win over McGill showed the offence is capable of making the big play when needed.

Trailing 7-1 late in the first half, QB Vic Alboini hit on five consecutive passes to produce a beautiful touchdown just before the half ended.

In the fourth quarter, rookie signal-caller Wayne Dunkley led Blues to the winning marker with six minutes left. Dunkley broke the game open with a magnificent pass to reserve end Jack Buchan, then scored himself on a keeper.

Blues offensive line has played outstanding ball despite glaring weight mis-matches in all three games. Their blocking on traps and sweeps is the key to the surprising success of the Toronto ground attack.

Queens, however, are no pushover. Blues passrush and pass-blocking are still not satisfactory, and the well-coached Gaels secondary can be expected to exploit this as much as possible.

As Nattily Attired, ace TV 11 commentator, would say, it's going to be a great game. Tickets are still available at Hart House. The war starts at 2.

Meanwhile, back at the ranch (or what's even worse, at Guelph), Varsity rugby and soccer Blues put their unbeaten records on the line against the galloping Gryphons.

The rugby team is moulding into a truly effective side, and the forwards should run wild against the traditionally loose-tackling Guelph side.

The soccer Blues have been unimpressive in recording two ties and a win; they will need to play to their utmost potential to defeat the only side that bested them last year.

The track team journeys to Mac for the OQAA championship; Waterloo are defending champs but Varsity has the depth and experience to regain the title.

Jukka Heikurinen, Dave Bailey and footballer Dave Quibbel are expected to record victories; the wise money is on ex-sports editor Rich Pyne in the 1,500 meters.

Also on Saturday — the rowers do their thing in London; the women have a fencing clinic in Benson Bldg, women's archery at Mac, gals' tennis in Guelph, and field hockeyettes smashing shins almost everywhere.

Sunday — soccer Blues in Buffalo and an exhibition rugger tilt on the back campus at 3:00. And we've probably forgotten something.

SWIMMERS SPLIT MEET

The women's swim team showed great depth and potential in splitting an exhibition tri-meet in Guelph Tuesday night.

The Varsity gals lost to a powerful Guelph squad 63-50 but easily beat McMaster 58-46.

Varsity won only two events, the 50-yard free style (Judy Kent) and the 100-yard free (Merrily Stratton). However, coach Sue Kinnear's talented crew piled up points with five 2nds, five 3rds and three fourth place finishes.

Leslie O'Brien, Barb Beattie and Linda Geale swept the first three spots in the diving competition.

Field hockey gals easy winners

Varsity's championship women's field hockey team spent an enjoyable Tuesday evening in Guelph recently clobbering aggregations from Guelph and McMaster.

Playing under the lights, Varsity was sparked by four (or was it five) goals from Lorna Tanner; Sally Manning got the others. Varsity 7, Guelph 0.

The Marauder maidens from Mac fared only slightly better as Tanner, Manning, and Sandy Stevenson led Toronto to an easy 4-0 win.

The Toronto defence was outstanding, as goalie Sharon Wilson had to stop only a half-dozen or so shots all evening.

Toronto plays York at 3:30 this afternoon at Sunnybrook Park (off Leslie, opposite Inn on the Park).

Progressive Books presents a photo exhibition direct from the People's Republic of China on the theme "The Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution." This exhibition consists of 180 photos which reflect the struggles and triumphs of the Chinese people during the past three years of consolidating the dictatorship of the proletariat.

The exhibition will be accompanied by two films — "The East Is Red" (with English subtitles) and "Tunnel Warfare". "The East Is Red", made in 1965, depicts the revolutionary struggles of the Chinese people during the past 30 years using pageant, theatre, film and operatic forms. This film, made in 1965, heralded the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution and follows Chairman Mao Tse-tung's revolutionary line on art and literature. "Tunnel Warfare" shows how the Chinese people used Chairman Mao's teachings on people's war to defeat Japanese imperialism.

Chairman Mao says, "In the world today all culture, all literature and art belong to definite classes and are geared to definite political lines. There is in fact no such thing as art for art's sake, art that stands above classes, art that is detached from or independent of politics. Proletarian literature and art are part of the whole proletarian revolutionary cause; they as Lenin said, cogs and wheels in the whole revolutionary machine."

Debate continues on CUS support of radical politics

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

The Canadian Union of Students came under fire again last Friday at a debate in Cody Hall.

CUS field worker George Biggar and students' Council Finance Commissioner Bob James (III Vic) said they believed the Canadian Union of Students to be an effective tool for the improvement of education, while Bob Vernon (III Law) and SAC President Gus Abols insisted that CUS has been reduced to "a radical, political movement."

"All the ideas that came out of CUS are now in the CUG Report and the New Programme," said Biggar. "In fact we discussed CUG's concept of university democracy five years ago."

Vernon did not deny this, but said he was strongly opposed to paying a compulsory levy to an organization which he felt had ceased to be representative of the opinions of the students who support it.

"To help its image," continued Vernon, "CUS held a 're-building conference' last summer, but they played the same games as usual. If this is the case, I'm being used as a pawn of a revolutionary body."

James returned the discussion to education, stating that CUS' existence is vital, since its interests lie mainly in helping students relate learning experiences to world problems.

NEED NATIONAL UNION

"The issue is not whether we need a national union," rebutted Abols. "I just don't believe that that union should be a political party, as CUS has become."

He also described CUS as a meeting-place for revolutionaries who turn a deaf ear to any delegates who deviate from the party policies.

"If someone wants to agitate on my behalf," added Abols, "I want to be able to choose to whom I give my financial support. And with CUS I don't have that choice."

When asked by the audience what CUS does for the students of the University of Toronto, Biggar replied that it sends out representatives to talk to students about current problems and then attempt to solve them by a slow process of reform.

Some students were unsatisfied and said that this was not concrete enough an answer.

BOSSIN CLARIFIES

Bob Bossin, a U of T teaching assistant, clarified Biggar's response, saying that CUS is instrumental in forming course unions, preparing university government research papers, and publicly airing students' complaints regarding OSAP and the lack of summer employment.

"This may be true," said Abols, "but if any representatives disagree with a certain issue, CUS sets up groups to work against the campus coun-

A 'Marxist humanist' talks revolution Interview by

SUSAN REISLER and ROBRYAN

Tariq Ali is a prominent member of Britain's "Vietnam Solidarity Campaign" which brought 105,000 people into the streets of London last October to protest against the war in Vietnam. The main slogans of the demonstration were "Victory to the National Liberation Front" and "Death to American Imperialism".

He is also editor of one of Britain's most widely circulated revolutionary newspapers, the "Black Dwarf" and of a recently-published book, "The New Revolutionaries".

VARSIETY: The last ten years have seen the rise of mass revolutionary student movements in almost all advanced capitalist societies.

Whereas in the early stages the focus was on the black civil rights movement and the war in Vietnam, now students are beginning to demand changes in the universities where they live and work.

To what do you attribute this change of emphasis?

ALI: I think the main reason for the rise of a revolutionary mass student movement is due to the fantastic increase in the number of students who are going to universities. This is in response to the increasing demand for highly skilled workers.

In the past university students could find jobs that would differentiate them from a large majority of the population and put them in privileged positions. Now the student population in advanced industrial societies has increased to such a point that only a minority of these students can be integrated into the upper strata of the social structure.

Students are beginning to see that their jobs will be no different from the jobs performed by white collar workers and, in many cases, by manual workers.

Anti-pot legislation is immoral students tell drug inquiry

By KARL HAUENSTEIN

"Banning marijuana because it leads some of its users to more dangerous drugs, is like banning sexual intercourse because it causes some people to become perverts."

This was one of many arguments presented Friday by a gathering of students and faculty to the Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs, in the Hart House Debates Room.

The meeting in Hart House was the second in a series of hearings in Toronto to investigate the possibility of legalizing marijuana.

The first hearing was held on Thursday at York University. At this meeting the R.C.M.P. presented the Commission with a brief describing marijuana as a dangerous drug "whose spread must be halted at all cost."

The meeting on Friday started with the reading of a statement by the U of T Committee for the Legalization of Marijuana, based on the reactions they got from the students and faculty in the circulation of their petition.

They said that many people felt that legalization of marijuana would put its sale in the proper channels and the buyer would be assured of getting only pure pot, rather than a dangerous substitute.

MORE TAX INCOME

In addition, the controlled sale of marijuana would provide another source of tax income for the government, rather than ridiculous profits for organized crime.

Freedom of choice was another big argument on which the Committee based its position. Everyone, they said, should be free to choose whether he wants to take alcohol or marijuana and the state has no moral right to hound people when their crime hurts no one.

The committee stressed that not all those who signed their petition used marijuana. Of those who were asked to sign and refused, only 15 per cent were opposed to the legalization of marijuana.

The discussion that followed the reading of this statement showed that most of the people present were in favour of legalization, or, as one professor put it, de-criminalization.

The RCMP's claim that the use of pot had reached epidem-

George Haggar -- radical professor without a job

By JIM STRUTHERS

The controversial political scientist George Haggar explained to fifty people on Friday why revolutionary Marxists like himself could not survive in a liberal university.

Haggar, who presently has charges pending before the Ontario Human Rights Commission against five Ontario universities was fired from Southern University in New Orleans last year. Two years earlier he had lost tenure at Waterloo Lutheran University.

He used his experience at Waterloo Lutheran as an explanation.

Haggar told the audience that two weeks after his appointment he wrote an article criticizing the nature of capitalism. Shortly after its publication Haggar said the Dominion Life Insurance Co. threatened to withdraw all further contributions to the university unless he was released.

CLERICS NOT SCHOLARS

Haggar said he continued to publish more critical articles including one that accused Canadian professors of being clerks instead of scholars.

"After this article Dr. Villeneuve called me into his office and said that if any more articles of this nature were published I would be fired."

In 1967 Villaume was replaced by a new administration and Haggar was informed that his contract would not be renewed.

They told me that the Jewish professors were strongly protesting what I had said and threatened to resign unless I was released."

Haggar told the audience that at that time there was only one Jewish professor at Waterloo Lutheran and she was his good friend.

PROTESTS DISMISSAL

Haggar said that he protested his dismissal to the Canadian Association of University Teachers but that, "CAUT feared the consequences of a federal investigation and sidestepped the issue."

Following his dismissal from Waterloo Lutheran, Haggar said that he applied to 13 Canadian universities and was rejected despite the fact that he has a PhD from Columbia University and is a well-known scholar.

TAMBLYN REPLIES

He said that he applied for job of chairman of the political science department at Lakehead University which had been vacant for three years and was told by President Tamblin, "We received your letter. We don't need your types."

Haggar was eventually hired by Southern University in New Orleans and made chairman of the political science department.

However, his support of the black students occupation of that university in the spring of 1968 caused him to be dismissed and deported to Canada, where he has continued his efforts to obtain a position in a university.

"We graduated 10,000 Canadians with MA's and PhD's this year and only 300 are teaching in this country. Meanwhile we've hired 1113 Americans."

"We have the teaching supply but we don't have the will to use it" Haggar concluded.

Raymond Lemieux, member of the Movement pour l'integration scolaire in Quebec, will be speaking Tuesday at 12 p.m. in Convocation Hall. Lemieux's activities in the St. Leonard community have brought a charge on him of sedition against the state.

The issues in Quebec are complicated and they are escalating. This is an opportunity for English speaking Canadians to find out what is going on in Quebec.

cil. This is not acceptable to a national union."

He was also convinced that the U of T had to secede from CUS, rather than try to change it from within, since it contains "a tremendous amount of inertia and a dislike for change."

Should this occur, would SAC be willing to set up an alternative to CUS along non-political guidelines?

"Of course we would," replied Abols. "I've been pushing to do that for a long time."

Mass resignations paralyze Glendon student government

Glendon Campus students find themselves minus most of their student council today.

Friday afternoon seven of the nine members of council resigned. With them went the Editor-in-Chief and managing Editor of the Campus newspaper, Pro tem.

The mass resignation resulted from the defeat of a referendum last Wednesday. The referendum asked authorization for an increase in student fees from $17 to $27.

According to Dolores Broten, acting Editor of Pro tem: "Students failed to vote, thereby denying the referendum the 50 per cent turnout needed, because they felt that the extra money would be spent off campus."

Resigned students' council President Bob McGaw says that this is not true. "One quarter of the proposed increase would have been used for a student bursary fund. Most of the rest would have been spent to improve facilities for students on campus."

He does admit, however: "Members of council were elected on a 'Student in Society' platform. We were interested in involving the student body in the community. Naturally part of the money raised would have been used to continue off-campus work."

McGaw points out that the resignation of Chief Returning Officer Paul Scott, an appointee of the council, makes a subsequent election impossible. "The council and the Constitution are effectively in a suspended state."

The ex-President and two members of the council are also members of the local radical organization. "We were considering resigning in December," says McGaw, "in order to force the students to reconsider the whole structure of student government. The defeat of the referendum simply pushed the date ahead."

Glendon finds itself without student government and with no way of organizing future elections. McGaw says that if the radicals have their way, the new situation will force the council to talk about the future ic proportions, was refuted by Bob Bossin U of T teaching Assistant, who said that the use of drugs was mainly a middle-class pre-occupation, since the lower classes were more concerned with bettering their lot in life than smoking pot.

Most of the remarks directed to the Commission, however, were pleas for extensive educational programs, so that more people can find out the true nature of marijuana and its effects so that the old fears and prejudices could be eliminated.

It was also suggested that the Commission inquire why this is such a drug-oriented society. Criminal law, it was pointed out, is not the proper means with which to deal with drugs, which are a social problem.

Review of the Press:

Although there is no evidence that marijuana has harmful effects, the use of marijuana — which in Canada has reached epidemic proportions — must be "halted at all costs," the RCMP urged today (Thursday).

This is the paragraph which should have appeared at the top of Toronto newspaper reports of last Thursday's session of the Royal Commission into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs.

Should have appeared, but didn't.

It should have appeared because it reports the totality of what RCMP Assistant Commissioner J.R.R. Carriere said in his testimony to the commission. What he said contained a glaring contradiction which the newspapers chose to gloss over.

Carriere presented relevant statistics regarding arrests on marijuana charges since 1962. In that year only 20 persons were charged, and during the first six months of 1969 the figure was 2,305.

Carriere also cited instances in which he had observed marijuana in "open use". He concluded that marijuana use was epidemic.

From these facts he ventured two judgements:

1. that this use must be "halted at all costs,"

2. that there is no evidence to prove that smoking marijuana has harmful effects.

Both of these comments were reported in the news stories, but the newspapers chose to play up the first and bury the second.

The Toronto Star relegated Carriere's admission that there was no evidence marijuana was harmful to the final three paragraphs, which appeared with the carry-over on page two.

His urging that marijuana use must be "halted at all costs" appeared in the first paragraph of the story, on page one, and was repeated in the headline.

An honest report of the commissioner's testimony would have pointed out, in one and the same place, the contradiction between his two conclusions.

LETTERS put aside ideological leanings

In reaction to the last S.A.C. meeting on Oct. 10th, we the Executive Council of the Dental Students Body, would like to speak on behalf of our student body in expressing our anger and shame in regards to the action of the SAC and its members.

We ask that all those with strong political and ideological leanings put them aside and closely examine the role of the SAC and their own personal reasons for being on the zody. If it is for pure political reasons we ask that they resign. It is felt that should the SAC continue the political game, U of T shall witness the death of student solidarity.

SAC by its very nature must serve the people it represents. It can not serve both (a) students and (b) the socially oppressed in our society EQUALLY WELL. The problems pressing students are not the same as the people working for the Anning Security Company. The Student housing Project failed because of an ideological dispute regarding the Portuguese community of the area.

On the other hand we support Bob James in his desire to make available funds for student groups who would like a chance to become socially involved with the "revolution" outside of the University structure.

In closing it should be noted that if the sole of the SAC is not clearly defined in the near future and steps taken to unify the members of SAC we ask for STUDENT MOBILIZATION across campus asking for immediate reform.

Peace,

The Students Dental Society Executive Body.

anti-conspiratorial hysteria

Sir,

We would like to protest vigorously against the spirit and tone of the advertisement, CUS: Why Vote No, which appeared in these pages last Friday. We deplore the indiscriminate and irresponsible use of defamatory stereotyping and unsubstantiated generalizations in the attempt to substitute unfounded, anti-conspiratorial hysteria for rational deliberation of issues.

We consider the anti-intellectual, character and motive-defiling imputations of the advertisement as vulgar and insulting the intelligence of students. Surely, in an institution which has the potentialities of a student union, if one's viewpoint is not ascendant, the solution is not to abolish the institution. We do not find the general apathy of those who oppose the present policies of CUS sufficient justification for denying to all the benefits or advantages of a student union. The presence or absence of these benefits or advantages should be the subject of debate.

CUS president Mortin Loney could lose job if the union folds

GSU president Michael Vaughan is job-hunting

CUS--hope it doesn't sound like red-baiting

By ART McCLWAIN
(Art McClwain, a fourth year engineering student, is Chairman of the anti-CUS campaign and President of the Engineering Society.)

It isn't going to be easy to vote "no" in the CUS referendum this Thursday.

The concept of a national student organization is really quite an attractive one. The idea of people from all across the country and getting together to discuss common problems is very exciting.

The Canadian Union of Students was founded to fill just that need. Unfortunately, it has failed miserably.

A number of things are apparent at any national function sponsored by the Canadian Union of Students. The first of these is the absence of any French speaking delegates. In fact, if you look carefully, you notice the absence of delegates from a lot of non-French speaking universities in Canada too.

CUS isn't a national organization, you see. It has less than 80,000 members, and a big percentage of those are right here at the University of Toronto.

The next thing one notices at one of these "national" gatherings is that almost all the speakers seem to be radical. That means that they are usually making a moving denunciation of "decadent bourgeois capitalism" and that they probably believe revolution is an acceptable means of solving the world's problems.

I hope that doesn't sound like "red-baiting". It is not intended to minimize the effectiveness of the Union's programmes, or to slander the participants in its forums. It does reflect any experience, though, both at the national forums I attended, and those I read about and heard reports from.

There is a noticeable absence of resource people at these forums who could provide a reasoned and articulate alternative to the radical perspective of society.

If you ask why other viewpoints aren't expressed, you are told that the people who might present them refuse to attend CUS forums. The union's leaders tend to blame this on the "bourgeois press".

It seems that last year's CUS president was misquoted in Guelph, and everyone now thinks that the Canadian Union of Students is a radical organization.

CUS has, in short, either been discredited, or discredited itself, to the point that it cannot attract a balanced set of speakers and resource people to its national forums.

This tends to raise serious problems for the Union in a couple of areas.

Firstly, the students who go to the conferences with a moderate viewpoint find themselves hopelessly outnumbered. They find, too, that the people with the radical perspective regard them as fools.

They are told their "consciousness is false," and that their ideas are bound to change with time. They are given a chance to speak but are not listened to. Which is not exactly the idea behind CUS.

Perhaps a more serious problem, though, is that the virtual exclusion of any but the radical viewpoint makes it next to impossible for anything but radical policy to emerge from these national forums.

And the majority of students in Canada are not radical.

The result of course is that the "Canadian Union of Students" lacks the popular support necessary to make it a viable institution. Its statements on issues concerning a lot of students tend to be phrased in such a way that we react negatively towards them. They favour the politics of confrontation rather than negotiation. They get very little done.

Mainly they just get people up tight. Which is just fine if you're a radical student. But that sort of thing seems pretty childish to anyone else. It makes the organization pretty irrelevant to most people.

GSU--old politician looks at the new politics

By JOHN WINTER

John Winter, a U of T graduate student in Geography, was last year's President of the Graduate Students' Union.

The Graduate Students' Union is on the verge of a crisis. It could be as damaging to graduate student interests as the collapse of the organization two years ago.

The problems result from the incompetence of the present leadership, and the reactions engendered in the radical opponents.

The action will start on Wednesday noon at the General Meeting in the G.S.U. building. The Executive hopes to pack this meeting with its supporters, who are predominantly from engineering and the physical sciences. They are being lured by the prospect of unlimited supplies of free beer. Members of the New Left Caucus are quietly marshalling their forces by other means.

The Executive may lose. For it has a deplorable record over the past six months.

MONEY TO HIPPIES

Almost exactly two years ago a G.S.U. Executive was accused of unconstitutional actions and voted out of office. This Executive had given money to hippies. The President had bought expensive equipment without permission. And the Executive had hired one of their (unqualified) friends as an Educational Advisor for $9,000 a year.

In November 1967 a new Executive was elected. I took over the Presidency in May 1968. By last Christmas there was the basis of a viable organization. Reports had been published, a magazine had been started, teaching assistants were being organized, representation on various committees had been achieved, and the organization was functioning efficiently.

No new benefits have been achieved for graduate students in the past six months under the new Executive. The magazine has not been published. No information was available to graduate students at registration. And the leaders have fallen into the same pitfalls encountered by the fatal Executive of two years ago.

For instance, they have spent large amounts of money (on a film projector, and office furniture) without permission from a General Meeting. This is expressly forbidden by the constitution. The Executive has hired what they once termed an "Outside Agitator" and now call an "Organizer". Without authorization from their members, the Executive has employed this Organizer for over a month (the salary is $5,000 a year, plus benefits).

Judging from her last report, the Organizer has done no organizing. Indeed it may be some time before she understands graduate student problems. She has been outside University life for a long time.

POOR LEADER

The present President, Michael Vaughan, is a poor leader. He has sent (unauthorized) letters to Ottawa protesting about chemical warfare. He telegraphed U.S. Senators during the A.B.M. debate, and assigned the (unauthorized) bills of $50 to the G.S.U. His role in the discipline crisis was minor, and he showed great indecision while under pressure.

Recently the President has decided that he wishes to "work full time for the G.S.U. at a salary of $2,500 for six months. This is more than many graduate students receive over a year. And they do not own expensive new Ford Torino cars.

The worst criticism of the present Executive is that it has initiated nothing new, and dropped many viable programmes of the previous administration. The recent success in obtaining a $100 subsidy for Ph.D. thesis production was the result of Alan Bowker's work on the Graduate Council last year.

This Executive has been concerned with appearances, with internal organization, with "normalizing" relations with S.A.C., with buying expensive office furniture, and other time-consuming bureaucratic activities. They have no guiding philosophy that could lead to useful action for the benefit of their members.

The most sensible decision of this Executive was to return one fifth of the budget to the departmental organizations, where it may do some good.

OISE OPTING OUT

The graduate students of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education have finally decided that they do not get value for money from the G.S.U. They have a strong argument, as they are not located on campus.

Their leaders demanded $9 be returned from their $10 G.S.U. fee, although they agreed that some of their budgetary requests were for spurious purposes.

In my opinion, the $5,000 for the so-called "Organizer", would be better spent improving the inter-departmental organization at O.I.S.E.

Yet the opponents of the Executive are acting just as irresponsibly. Their plan is to kill the construction of the bar at the G.S.U. They want the building fund to be diverted to departmental graduate organizations. This is despite C.U.G.'s recommendation to slow down the construction of the new Graduate Centre.

Unfortunately the Wednesday General Meeting, and the proposed constitutional changes, are illegal under the terms of the present constitution, as not enough notice was given for each.

CUS, CAUT study SFU strike

OTTAWA (CUP-staff) — The Canadian Union of Students has appointed a five-man team including former SAC president Steve Langdon to investigate the situation at Simon Fraser University in conjunction with the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

A CUS spokesman said the committee would examine relations between the SFU administration and the university's department of political science, sociology and anthropology.

Pat Gallagher, CUS associate secretary, said the investigation would look into the administrative trusteeship imposed over the student-parity department last summer and allegations of political discrimination by the administration in deciding who would teach in the department.

PSA has been on strike since September 24 over the firing, demotion or probation of 11 professors, nine of whom have been suspended pending dismissal.

Langdon was emphatic about the importance of the SFU situation, and felt that the future of democratic decision-making in Canadian universities was at stake there.

DEMOCRATIZING UNIVERSITY

"If the administration succeeds in what it's trying to get away with at Simon Fraser, then the chances of democratizing the university in Canada will be pretty slim," he said.

SFU student president Norm Wickstrom, a member of the CUS investigating team, said he wanted the CUS group to report on SFU whether CAUT would come or not. CAUT executive secretary Alwyn Berland said Friday CAUT had not yet made a decision whether to join the CUS team for the report.

He said CAUT was still considering a resolution passed by the SFU joint-faculty council endorsing administration president Kenneth Strand's request for an investigation committee from CAUT and the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

SFU administration president Strand has not accepted the idea of a CUS-CAUT committee, and refused to have the firing and hiring arrangements in the department a subject of investigation.

The CUS investigating team named Friday includes Langdon, Wickstrom, Hugh Armstrong, past president of CUS and a former consultant of the Ontario Department of University Affairs, Ken Sunquist, student president at the University of Saskatchewan at Regina, and Trish Johnson, Student External vice-president at the university of Manitoba.

English students join strike as faculty support Strand

BURNABY (CUP) — A decision by students Thursday in the Faculty of Education to support the strike at Simon Fraser University was countered by a faculty move the next day.

Education students joined the 22-day old strike of SFU's Department of Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology Thursday.

Over 200 faculty members met Friday and voted support for the administration president and deplored the strike action by students in the PSA department.

By a vote of 128 to 120 education students joined PSA, History, and English students in demanding re-instatement of PSA faculty fired and suspended by the SFU administration, and the recognition of total student parity in the PSA department.

The joint-faculty council passed a number of motions:

- o a motion commending president Kenneth Strand for his stance in the crisis.

- o a motion deploring the strike action by PSA.

The Education students' decision pushed the number of students on strike well over the 1,000 mark. Many classes in history and English as well as five classes in the PSA department, continue despite strike decisions.

SHARPER CONTRADICTIONS

The contradictions in the university are also becoming much sharper. The needs of the state have changed. Once the university could produce 500 sociologists and 25 engineers, now they must produce 500 engineers and possibly 25 sociologists.

The state will soon dictate its needs to the university and say we don't give a fuck about what you want to do, what we want you to do is this. And if you don't like it get out of the university.

However students want to learn about the nature of their society rather than receive a narrow training about meaningless jobs.

I also think that universities have been demystified as their links with the realities of war, poverty and racism have been made public.

Students now understand that the university is not a neutral force. It has a specific purpose, and that purpose is to produce large numbers of graduates who will organize consent for the system and help preserve the status quo with the aid of the intellectual tools with which the university has provided them. They are beginning to demand that they learn how to change society, not to preserve it.

These contradictions which lead to a massive uprising in the future.

NEW MOVEMENTS

VARSIITY: Along side of the growing student movement, one can also see the recurrence of militant workers, blacks, and women's movements. What are the factors which have led to these important social phenomena?

ALI: Working class militancy in the United States is in part a response to unplanned automation which affects unskilled laborers in many cases. A large number of unskilled laborers in the United States happen to be blacks and this is an important reason for the rising militancy of the black movement.

As automation begins to increase in the U.S. and white workers begin to be affected without any increase in leisure time or leisure occupations, you are going to see the increase in alienation which Marx spoke about.

Marx forecast that as the technical division of labor intensified in an authoritarian work situation, blue collar, white collar and technical workers would begin to feel isolated from the work they were doing.

In France, the revolutionary implications of this process were shown in very concrete terms in May 1968 when the Renault factory workers went out on strike for more than wage demands. They were posing the question of political power in the factories.

HIGHEST PAID

You must remember that Renault is a firm owned by the French state not by private capitalists, and that the Renault car workers are the highest paid workers in Western Europe.

When the French Stalinist bureaucrats tried to channel their demands into wage demands, the Renault workers would have nothing to do with it. When Georges Seguy, the leading French Communist Party bureaucrat came to the factory and said that they had won a 12½ per cent wage increase, the workers spat on him and said, "We want the revolution, we want political power in the factories."

For years we have been producing surplus value for the capitalists, as our fathers before us. Now we want to control the surplus value we are producing and how we are to produce it.

There are very concrete reasons for a Women's Liberation Movement. Women are discriminated against. They do not receive the same pay for doing the same jobs that men do. In Britain, this has resulted in a massive equal pay movement.

Of course Marxists in this movement are saying that it is not simply a matter of equal pay, it's a matter of equal rights.

PATHETIC PAY

Women can't simply demand equal pay with men, they have got to realize that the pay men are receiving is also pathetic compared to the work they are doing.

There are other aspects to consider. Women are regarded as sexual and personal objects. They are treated with a certain amount of repressive tolerance in this society.

But of course while a women's movement is extremely important and extremely necessary, at the same time it is necessary to add that their problems cannot be solved within a capitalist society.

It is very convenient that women stay at home in the eyes of this society. It is very convenient that artificial divisions are created between male and female. These are problems which should be talked about.

But these problems will only be solved with the abolition of capitalism and with it the destruction of the whole nuclear family system.

MARXIST HUMANIST

VARSIITY: On a BBC television program shortly after the May revolt in France you and other new left revolutionaries from North America, Eastern and Western Europe described yourselves as Marxist humanists.

What do you mean by this phrase Marxist humanist?

ALI: We are Marxist humanists in the sense that we differentiate ourselves very, very plainly from the traditions of Stalinism.

We're saying that we have nothing in common with the Stalinists who have been misleading large numbers of workers and students throughout the world by claiming that the society built in Russia under Stalin was a socialist society, whereas it was a society that had nothing in common with socialism.

We see ourselves in the tradition of Marx, Engels, Trotsky and Guevara. Our task is to revitalize Marxism to show people that the real goal of Marxism is maximum individual freedom and not the sort of systems that have been developed in Russia and the rest of Eastern Europe.

STUDENTS AND WORKERS

VARSIITY: Many left wing groups are now talking about building a student-worker alliance. Putting aside for the moment the important question of how that alliance is built, do you see one developing?

ALI: I hope so, because I think that a student-worker alliance is absolutely essential. To think that students can create a small niche in capitalist society, create a liberated area in capitalist society is a completely utopian prospect.

You can, of course, occupy a university and keep it occupied two weeks or perhaps a month, but ultimately if the state wants to finish you it can.

You have to confront the state where it hurts the most, and at this moment where it hurts the most is at the point of production where commodities are being produced. This can only be done by a coalition, by a collaboration with workers as was done in France in May 1968, in Pakistan, to a certain extent, and in Mexico to a large extent.

I think that students who think that by activating themselves in the university alone can solve all the problems are going to be proved very, very wrong.

VARSIITY: In a recent article entitled "Where is America Going," Ernst Mandel, a prominent European Marxist analyses some of the tendencies we talked about earlier and concludes that a very intense revolutionary situation may well develop in the United States in about ten or fifteen years. Do you think Mandel is being an optimist or a pessimist.

ALI: I hope that Mandel is a pessimist and I hope that we find that the revolutionary situation develops much sooner than that. In general I agree with Mandel's analysis, and I think that the article he wrote on the United States is one of the most significant theoretical articles to be written on that subject.

Rochdale. . a tale of mass anarchy, scholars, freaks and (now) colonization

"I envisage Rochdale College as a community of men and women who love wisdom and are actively pursuing it." (Dennis Lee, from the Rochdale College Bulletin, Jan. 30, 1967)

Rochdale, more than anything else, is a continuing educational experiment involving large numbers of people.

As such, it moves, it is dynamic. Whether progressing towards a utopian system of education, or regressing towards the physical deterioration and ultimate collapse of the building at 341 Bloor West — something must, by its very nature, be happening all the time.

BY TIM INKSTER

Unfortunately, many outside observers lose sight of that fact — led by the intolerably ugly vision of 18 storeys of grey prefab concrete to the questions — Can anything worthwhile happen in such an aesthetically revolting edifice? Has the experiment been successful thus far? Is Rochdale progressing?

Progress, according to V. Gordon Childe (Man Makes Himself), can be understood to mean: "what has actually happened — the content of history."

Such an attitude could well be applicable to an examination of the Rochdale condition, in the light of Wilf Pelletier's (the college's interim co-ordinator) remarks to me about the similar value of "success" or "failure" in any experiment. That is, when the desired results fail to materialize, one at least knows yet another way not to do something, which is in itself an advance in knowledge.

Pre-Natal Idealism

"Rochdale", the name, is taken from Rochdale, England, site of one of the earliest 19th century co-op stores. "Thus the college originators saw it as an elaboration of the idea of co-op residences . . . along the way, Rochdale grew educational appendages" (Joyce Kury, "the Rochdale Experiment", Random vol. 11, no. 11).

The concept of Rochdale as a co-op was never in question since it was Campus Co-op Inc. who did the early groundwork. In 1967-68, the year before Rochdale was built, when college members were resident in six houses (provided by Campus Co-op), that ideal was successfully co-existent with the educational aspects.

Early Problems

Even prior to the completion of construction, however, Registrar Rick Waern predicted that "the building is going to be three-fourths full of people who just want a place to live while going to university." That was the original idea as conceived about eight years ago — Rochdale (the building) would help alleviate U. of T.'s housing shortage. By fall 1968, however, Rochdale, at least conceptually, had become more of an answer to the U of T, than just to the university's housing problems.

Thus a large university student population was by no means the optimum situation. But the building had to be filled for financial reasons, and there just weren't enough people, interested in pursuing the Rochdale system of free education full-time, around to do it.

It was thought that students, though they would not contribute much to Rochdale as a college, would not hinder it either.

But unforeseen problems arose. Obviously a population of 850 is more than enough to provide anonymity for those who wish to escape the sense of group responsibility operative in the smaller, more personal atmosphere of a house.

The idea that each floor would develop as a house was quickly destroyed by the anonymity (obviously no one could know all 850 residents) of irresponsible offenders, by the large number of disinterested student-residents who were concerned only for their personal living quarters and not for the halls or common rooms, and by the architectural barrier of the doors on each floor which separate the Ashram and cheaper suites from the Aphrodite and more expensive ones.

Add to those conditions the fact that the building was still under construction when it was first occupied in September 1968 and you have a fair indication of the mass anarchy that prevailed.

Dennis Lee's (a one-time professor of English at Vic and full-time resource person at Rochdale, now at the House of Anansi Press) community of scholars was neither a community, nor could it boast many (Rochdale, as opposed to U of T) scholars.

Disinterested university students, fine, but the number of bikers, drug-freaks, crashers and 13-year-old runaways made living conditions barbaric, forced idealists to think in terms of survival, and led to general disillusionment.

By January, disillusionment had become depression, and Arthur Leader in an article for UC's Gargoyle (vol. XV, no. 7) described the situation as: "Red carpets stink from cat piss and the fire bell is usually clanging wearily through the day — and no one cares. In a 'community' dedicated to group responsibilities, nobody cares."

Wilf Pelletier

Rochdale, one year later, is still there. I approached Wilf Pelletier, the present co-ordinator and head of the Institute for Indian Studies, with as positive a mind as I could muster — determined to look beyond the dirt in the halls (which is not as bad as it once was) and the glaring failures of resident-run cafeterias (obvious from the uniformed, caterers' serving ladies, and the fact that "the Same" 24 hour restaurant now closes at 1 a.m.).

I asked about "progress" (in the conventional sense) and "goals", but Mr. Pelletier wanted to speak only in terms of "self", "being" and the present. Since he believes that the future is, at best, an uncertain possibility: to work towards any future goal in an educational or social project would be to forego life to dwell in unreality.

That attitude, concern for long-range goals, is precisely where he thinks our conventional educational systems fail. In forcing the student to study in terms of final exams, they take a student's powers of concentrated inquiry away from the only true reality, the never-ending present.

Mr. Pelletier is reluctant to discuss Rochdale projects — for a project necessarily involves concern for its completion at some future date, which constitutes a "goal". There also exists the added danger of some outside observer judging a project on an artificial success-failure scale.

Such a possibility could lead to bloated heads and complacency if the project is deemed successful, or to despondency if not. Since success and failure both generate equal amounts of knowledge (which is what learning is all about — the acquisition of knowledge), why leave oneself vulnerable to uninformed outside observers?

The Meaning of Rochdale — Phase One

Although the college has managed to rid itself of many of the trouble-making bikers, drug-freaks, crashers and runaways, there still exists a large student-resident population (Mr. Pelletier thinks about half) who never really come to grips with the Rochdale experience, due to lack of interest or involvement.

Even among those who do, there is a significant number of first year Rochdale "grads" who are discontent. Paula Maundcote-Carter, a weaver who is also associated with Bruce MacArthur's ceramic workshop, is one of them.

According to her, you can't "do" anything in Rochdale because there is too much noise, too many "dabblers" and too many screwed-up kids.

That is not to say that a year at Rochdale is meaningless, not at all. The grads I spoke to had all experienced the growth of the college from a barbaric, subsistence level society to a comparative civilized calm, and all had acquired astounding degrees of tolerance and compassion as a result of their experience.

Rochdale (the building) does have a meaning, has it on the kind of personal level discussed by Mr. Pelletier.

Seminars do take place, but they are for the most part discontinuous and unrelated, and as such, totally unacceptable to the serious student.

The only two examples of continuous projects surviving within the building are the 14th floor commune and the Institute for Indian Studies.

The commune is an attempt on the part of Rochdale grads to come together to experience life on an inter-personal level. They have all experienced the building before on an individual basis and now preserve their project by an extremely close selective system.

That is, no one is offered residence on the floor until he has convinced the other members that his primary interest, and the one to which he is willing to devote most of his time, is the commune itself. An artist, for example, who wants to paint while living in a commune, is, at this point, unacceptable to the members.

The continuity of the Indian Institute is largely explicable in terms of its large size (with international membership and affiliations), independent financing (with fund drives and backing from foundations), age (it pre-dates Rochdale by about six years) and the fact that it has fairly effectively isolated itself on the 17th floor.

The art gallery on the ground floor, a recent development, also fits into the model of a "personal" Rochdale since most of the work is done by individuals on their own initiative and then placed on display by a judging board of two.

Projects which feel comfortable within the building are few — by far the more dominant trend is for pockets of Rochdale grads, having straightened themselves out as individuals, to gradually come together within the building, organize and then go outside seeking the necessary space and atmosphere to do whatever it is that interests them.

Rochdale: Colonizing — Phase Two

One of the earliest attempts at colonization was made by groups interested in emphasizing the co-op ideal of Rochdale. Faced with impossible living conditions at 341 Bloor West, they moved, in groups of five to 15 to small farms in the Kawartha Lakes district. At present, there are about a dozen such farms with the only problem being a difficulty in sustaining summer labor to prepare for winter in the face of large numbers of exuberant visitors from Toronto.

The idea is not dissimilar from the 14th floor co-op, but the farms represent a more workable concept and thus are more established. It is obviously easier to avoid adverse living conditions, rather than try to isolate a group within them, as the 14th floor is attempting to do.

Although very few of the colonies have any official connection with the college, most of the colonists still consider themselves Rochdale people and perpetuate varying degrees of ties on a personal level.

Bruce MacArthur, a potter from the U.S. with training at Alfred College (one of the foremost art colleges in North America), came to Rochdale with the intention of setting up a ceramics workshop.

Jack Diamond, then registrar, offered him $500 to teach a course and $250 to help set up a workshop. Unfortunately, Mr. Diamond's lavish promises were based on a $10,000 budget, $5000 of which was obtained by over-drawing a bank account, and $5000 of which was to come from a non-existent fund-raising project.

Bruce went ahead, unpaid, and built his workshop, leaving it open for use 24 hours a day and paying for materials out of his own pocket.

It didn't work — freaks and dabblers continually came in to "play", wrecked valuable equipment and left the place in constant need of cleaning. By charging 25 cents a pound for flared clay and locking his door, Bruce was able to attract a small group of serious students but was still plagued with dabblers.

He and his troupe are now moving to a house at 10 Sullivan, across the street from RCMP headquarters, where classes will be given solely to Rochdale members. One can become a non-resident Rochdale member of $25.00.

The location (south of Dundas) is far enough away to discourage dabblers and college is putting up $100 a month to help pay rent.

Similar situations are seeing a painting group under Bob Potegal trying for a house at 40 Beverly (around the corner from Sullivan) and Judy Merrill, one of the world's foremost science-fiction editors and writers, already living in 44 Beverly with a group of young writers and poets. Two of the poets, Bob Flanagan and Mike Price, had never published in Anansi's widely acclaimed Canada First.

One interesting side-light to the colonial movement is that Canada Trust, the corporation that owns the houses on Beverly and Sullivan, will not rent to anyone who associates themselves with Rochdale.

Apparently unemployed artists are more reliable as tenants than Rochdale art students and writers seriously interested in pursuing their chosen crafts.

And Still Rochdale...

Sitting in "The Same" rapping with Judy Merrill and Bruce MacArthur, we were watching Don Holyoak (the dancer arrested in the Baldwin St. incident) serenade passers-by on Bloor St., when the inevitable yellow patrol-car did a u-turn and pulled over. The constable got out to inform Don that he wasn't wearing a shirt in the cool weather. When Don came in to relay the profound observation 10 guys in the restaurant immediately pulled off their shirts and went out to dance their defiance on the wooden stage in front of the college.

Kim Foikis, Vancouver's town fool, appeared to play recorder and then David Rea (of Mariposa and other, fame) came running out with a guitar... spontaneous creative climate.

Perhaps Wilf Pelletier's "present" will also prove a workable concept in time... after all, it took Archdeacon John Strachan five years to set up King's College, the predecessor of U of T.

CUS: WHY VOTE NO

Why Vote At All:

To most of us, the so called "Canadian Union of Students" is a mystery. We really have no idea at all what it is or who runs it or what it is supposed to do. The only time we hear about it is in the newspapers when it makes some policy pronouncement we usually disagree with.

And now we are being asked to decide if we should continue to belong to it. Why bother?

Probably one good reason for not continuing to support it would be that it is so irrelevant to us. Any organization that accepts our money and our moral support should have the decency to at least tell us what it is doing. We shouldn't have to read about it second hand in a newspaper.

But that is probably asking too much of the leaders of the "Canadian Union of Students." After all they have a whole world to change. How can they possibly find time to tell us about their "programs"?

The threat that we might no longer give them our money, or let them use our name seems to have dragged them on to our campus at last. They are now going around telling us about their "programs" in the nice non-threatening language they say they despise.

And if we vote "yes" this Thursday, they will go right back to solving the problems of the world, leaving us to pay the bills.

The so called "Canadian Union of Students" has demonstrated in the past its unwillingness, or inability, to communicate with us. We can only conclude that it will do likewise in the future if we let it.

Why Vote "NO"

Its sort of a nice feeling to think that maybe you're part of a national student organization. It gives you a feeling of belonging; you have something in common with people of different backgrounds and outlooks. You can talk with someone from Quebec, or the Maritimes, or the Prairies, or the West Coast and feel some sort of kinship, because you all belong to the same organization.

That's what is so attractive about a national student union.

You know, its too bad CUS isn't like that. The fact of the matter is, though, that the "Canadian Union of Students" doesn't want one.

"The students there think Quebec is a nation," says Steve Langdon, "so they want a 'national' student union.

Sure they do, Steve.

In all the "Canadian Union of Students" has less than eighty thousand "members". And about thirty thousand of us are at U of T.

Some "national organization".

The point is that if we vote to get out of this "Canadian Union of Students" we really won't lose a national organization at all because CUS just isn't one.

What it is really is an organization with about twenty five active members on this campus and eight or nine national "field-workers."

The question for all of us this Thursday is whether or not we should continue to give this splinter political party about thirty thousand dollars a year of our money, and our moral support.

A lot of us think not.

McGill officials censor their own newspaper

MONTREAL (CUP) — Administrators at McGill University have forced their own newspaper to drop an issue devoted to former political science professor Stanley Gray, who was fired last year for political activity on the campus.

A 28-page issue of the McGill Reporter, an administration financed paper established as a counterweight to the student-run McGill Daily, was scheduled to appear Friday, Oct. 17. It had included an interview with Gray — now a member of the independentist Front De Liberation Populaire in Montreal — a chronology of his dismissal, essays on civil disobedience and academic discontent and comments on McGill's future from graduates and faculty members.

But the McGill Senate's Committee on the Communication of Information, chaired by Vice-Principal Robert Shaw informed Reporter editors the paper would be dissolved if the issue appeared.

"We have to find a new way to get across," said associate editor Stuart Gilman. "Official reactionary feelings at McGill are legitimate now that they're rid of Stan."

It's the second time the reporter has gotten into hot water over Gray. The first occurred over the crisis around the lecturers dismissal last March, when the paper criticized the administration for a lack of dialogue in the case.

Reporter editors now say the administration clampdown on the issue was a blessing in disguise. It will allow the paper to develop a new format which will stress "more dialogue and a far greater variety of articles."

Editors expect the "bulk of the content" of the Gray issue will eventually appear — bit by bit — in the revamped newspaper.

Waterloo retains track title

The University of Waterloo easily retained the OQAA track and field title at a cold and windy meet at McMaster.

Using its great depth and experience to full advantage, Waterloo doubled the score on second-place Varsity; Blues edged Mac by taking second and third in the pole vault, last event on the schedule.

Best individual performance was turned in by Michel Charland of Montreal, followed closely by Brian Donnelly of Queens. Varsity failed to win any events.

PhysEd uses passing game to beat Vic 15-0

By LYNDON LITTLE

PhysEd quarterback John Osburn completed only two passes but both went for touchdowns as his team upset Vic 15-0 in a key interfac game played Wednesday afternoon.

Vic was well beaten both physically and on the statistic sheet as well as on the scoreboard.

Osburn stunned Vic on the game's first play from scrimmage as he hit flanker Rick Johnson with a 55-yard pass-and-run play for a TD.

Vic never appeared to recover from the shock as they were unable to mount a sustained offense throughout the game.

PhysEd completed their scoring in the second quarter as two bad Vic snaps led to a safety touch and a major by Larry Theed.

The win gives PhysEd first place in the first division with its second win in as many games. Vic now has a record of one win and one loss.

On Tuesday, it was Trinity 13 and Forestry 12 with Trinity just surviving a last minute Forestry comeback.

On Wednesday, besides the Vic-PHE game it was Pharmacy over New College 28-7. Ian Ferguson with three TD's and Larry Bartle with one handled the scoring for Pharmacy. Paul Braun picked up the lone score for New.

Thursday, it was St. Mike's over Eng. 6-2 with Pete Maroney getting the major. On the other field Meds got their second win with a 13-7 defeat of UC. For Meds Doug Watchhorn and Rick Rowland had TD's while Steve Gryte scored for U.C.

The game scheduled for Friday at Scarborough with Dents was postponed.

After two weeks of play the standings look like this: First Division — PHE (2-0), Vic and St. Mike's (1-1), Eng. (0-2); Second Division — Meds (2-0), Dents (1-0), Scar. (0-1) and U.C. (0-2); Third Division — Trinity, New, Forestry and Pharmacy all 1-1.

Triple disaster for Rugger Blues

By DAN McALUSER

It was a black weekend for the Blues rugger teams.

The results of the weekend's play are a 21-8 loss to Guelph, a 28-0 loss to Trent and an unmentionable shutout of the Blues by the St. Georges Rugger team from London, Ontario.

The match at Guelph was very erratic because of a high wind and the Toronto pack failed to cover the often fumbled ball.

Toronto began the scoring with a penalty goal by Cairns. The Guelph side retaliated with three tries and one convert that made the score at the half Guelph 11, Toronto 3.

Guelph opened the second half with a quick converted try. Then, Toronto feebly interjected with a try before Guelph drove back to score the last try of the game. The final score was Guelph 21, Toronto 8.

The Seconds were not in winning form either and bowed to a powerful team from Trent. Spirit was not lacking but they were simply not skilled enough to stop Trent. The final score of their game was Trent 28, Toronto 0.

Trent is not in the inter-collegiate league but definitely deserves to be. For the past two years they have shown quality of play that is easily equal to that of the OQAA.

On Sunday, the hapless First hobbled out to be smashed by the London side. No spirit, coupled with very weak tackling gave the game away.

The opposition was allowed to score at their leisure, running freely through the back line using both their forwards and backs. The outcome of the game was a devastating shutout by the visitors.

Although spirit is lacking on the Blues, there are other ailments as well. Leg injuries have sidelined centres Chris Maher and Larry McKenna; Maher is in a cast for six weeks and McKenna is out for an indefinite period.

Holmes, Hutchison and Owens were missed this weekend because of academic obligations. The players filling their positions in the backs were not close enough in their timing and the forwards were too slow in covering broken down plays. The resulting lack of concerted drive in the First's games spelled defeat.

The Blues can still win the championship if they want to. The absence of Captain Graehem Wynn in the next two games increases the measure of required effort. This effort, combined with strong support from the students of the University, can enable Toronto to keep the cup at home.

The stroke of fortune that makes this possible came last Wednesday. Guelph, who had been trounced 26-0 by Waterloo early in the season, came back and beat the Warriors.

The surprising victory makes a three way tie among Toronto, Guelph and Waterloo. Straight, high scoring victories by Toronto for the last half of the season will put the Blues on top.

Our first test is against Waterloo this Wednesday at three o'clock in Waterloo. Every match from now until the end of the season will be sudden death as far as the cup is concerned, and will be well worth watching.

Soccer Blues tie Guelph

By LYNDON LITTLE

The soccer game on Saturday started as simply Guelph versus Toronto but it ended as the "armers" against the "city slickers" with insults exchanged between fans, coaches and officials.

The game ended in a 1-1 tie with Guelph's center-forward Don Blacklock scoring with less than 7 minutes remaining the tying goal on a short header from a corner kick.

The Blues were forced to play the last 30 minutes with only ten players as center-forward John Gero was ejected from the game by a flustered referee.

Varsity carried a one goal lead into the second half as they took advantage of a strong favouring wind to dominate first half play. Gero scored the Toronto goal (giving him five for the season) on a close-in header from Miles Sosa's free kick at 40 minutes.

Early in the second half, several questionable calls led to an angry and frustrated Varsity side. Gero vocalized his displeasure too strenuously and was abruptly dismissed.

Despite the loss of their top forward, the Blues continued to play spirited football. Blacklock's tie-maker late in the game came on one of the few Guelph deep penetrations of the second half.

WOMEN'S SPORTS

TENNIS

by sandy peit

Strong opposition and lineup changes forced by a last-minute injury brought an end to U. of T.'s domination of women's intercollegiate tennis last weekend.

In the first singles competition at the WIAU tournament at Guelph, defending champion Marnie Seifred (IV PHE) lost 6-3, 6-4 to archrival Marion Munro of Western.

Both players have now held the singles title twice, having alternately dethroned one another in the past four years.

Catherine Fournier (IISMC) a newcomer to the senior team, fought gamely but lost 6-2, 2-6, 6-3 to McGill's Margot Dionne in a see-saw battle for the second singles championship.

Miss Fournier moved to the second singles spot on the team after Dale Butterill, last year's winner, was injured early last week falling off a horse.

The doubles team of Terry Midghall (I SMC) and Marguerite Moore (II VIC), also new to Varsity tennis, had the added disadvantage of never playing together before the tournament.

Despite a poor start, they managed a third-place tie with Queen's.

Western was the overall winner, losing only two matches out of fifteen. Toronto finished fourth behind McGill and MacMaster.

FIELD HOCKEY

by marie landmesser

Varsity's field hockey team did everything right Friday afternoon as the girls clobbered York 7-0.

Toronto's leader scorer, Lorna Tanner, was in spectacular form and led the Varsity onslaught with yet another trick.

The speedy red-head could well break the Varsity scoring records held by Joan Stevenson, now the York coach.

Sally Manning and Anne Thompson each had two goals to complete Toronto's scoring.

The cold weather bampared both teams as the game started slowly and the players really didn't hit full stride until almost half-time.

Toronto's right halfback, Alice Shank, delighted the spectators by playing in street-clothes and slippery sneakers. It wasn't intentional: Alice came along for the ride but was pressed into action when Blues were one player short.

Varsity's championship prospects were dimmed when Sue Peck sacrificed her left ankle to the cause and will be out of action until next season.

Sue, a member of the Canadian national team, will be sorely missed when the Blues travel to McGill Thursday for the opening round of the intercollegiate tournament.

Gaels win 24-17

amount of statistical analysis is going to change that.

But Blues controlled the ball (92 plays to Queens 57) and proved they have an excellent pass attack and superb pass defence (Queens completed 2 of 5 for 29 yards).

What's more important, though, is that the second half showed Blues have the guts and the basic pride to get up off the ground and prove they are not a 24-0 football team.

Take nothing away from Queens. They played well, exploited Blues weaknesses, and turned in a ferocious display of blocking.

But Queens benefitted from a bushel-full of breaks and Blues ineptness in the first half.

Pride, ability and strategy are going to determine the best football team in the SIFL this year.

The rematch is November 1 at the Stadium. It will be interesting.

BLUESNOTES . . . Eaman finished with 130 yards in rushing; as a team, Blues had only 129 . . . other ground-gainers for Gaels were Ron Clark (118 yards on 10 carries) and Brian Warrender (64 yards on 10 tries) . . . Walt Sehr led Blues with 60 yards on 15 carries and Stank had 45 from 9 rushes . . . as expected Eric Walter was the key to Blues passing attack with nine receptions for 115 yards . . . Sehr contributed 94 yards, Cor Doret 49 and John Chapman 44 yards . . . Blues were hit by numerous injuries, especially to Bob Bloxham, Don Fraser, Rein Enno, Pete Van Bodegom, and Ian Kirkpatrick . . . in addition Pete Lamantia and Randy Myers sat out the tilt courtesy of hurts from the McGill game.

A first half to forget as Blues lose to Gaels 24-17

By PAUL CARSON

Varsity football coach Ron Murphy has been spending lots of time and thought recently attempting to remedy Blues perennial problem of folding in the second half.

Blues have played low-key in the first half all season, and Saturday in Kingston this continual flirtation with danger finally caught up with them as Queens Golden Gaels made an unbelievable first-half performance stand up for a 24-17 win.

Coupled with McGill's 49-13 slaughter over McMaster, Gaels upset of the unbeaten Blues has created a three-way tie for first place in the SIFL.

Statically, coach Murphy appeared to have found the perfect solution for the famous second-half fade.

Blues had achieved ball control, running 46 plays compared to 28 by Queens; the Varsity defence had turned in a gutsy goal-line stand; the short passing game was well-established and seemed unstoppable; the running attack was unspectacular but Varsity had amassed 14 first downs, Queens only four.

Everything appeared just perfect, but there was this one little problem: Queens had 24 points, Varsity had zilch. And points, not statistics, are what win football games.

While Blues appeared worried about a second-half collapse, Queens exploited some incredibly sloppy Varsity tackling for three scintillating touchdowns and their apparently unsurmountable lead.

On Gaels second play from scrimmage, all-star halfback Keith Eaman raced 34 yards through Blues right side for the first major score.

Blues offence couldn't move the ball after the defence had held on three plays from inside the five, and Gaels promptly marched in for a 22-yard field goal by Doug Cozak.

Key play in the drive was a fluke tripping penalty against Varsity safety Peter Raham.

Following the field goal, Blues passing attack carried them to the Queens 18, but Alboini fumbled the snap on an attempted field-goal, and Gaels took over on the 20.

On the next play fullback Ron Clark scooted up the middle; 90 yards, 11 seconds and one convert later it was Queens 17, Varsity 0.

Eaman then completed the amazing display with a truly beautiful exhibition of broken-field running en route to a 50-yard touchdown.

In all, Queens ran 18 times and gained 253 yards, and it was just half-time.

As the second-half began, the animals that pass for football fans in Kingston screamed for more humiliation, but Blues surprised everybody but themselves by making the route into a game.

A few defensive adjustments took the sting out of the Queens running attack (Gaels pass offence was virtually non-existent) and the Varsity passing game started to click in the clutch.

From the Queens 49, Alboini hit on three consecutive passes, to Doret for 12, to Sehr for 18, and to flanker Eric Walter for the final 14 and Blues first score.

Blues were back in scoring territory a few minutes later, but had to settle for a 39-yard field goal by Bill Stankovic.

An then, for one brief fleeting moment, it appeared that Varsity was going to win it all.

On the last play of the third quarter, Cor Doret returned a punt for what appeared to be a 57-yard touchdown that would have made the score 24-17 with a full quarter left to play.

Alas, Blues were nabbed for clipping and instead of seven points, Varsity was back on its own 38.

The Queens defence stiffened and when Blues finally managed to score (a three yard run by Stankovic on third down), there were only 72 seconds left.

After a short kick-off failed, Eaman ran 13 yards for the crucial first down, and Gaels ran out the clock.

Okay, Blues lost, and no

see GAELS WIN on page 14

Biggest Varsity threat in the disappointing 24-17 loss to Queens on Saturday in Kingston was all-star flanker Eric Walter (27). Walter is shown evading Gaels defender Gord Squires (55) and snaring one of the nine passes he grabbed during an otherwise painful afternoon. P.S. Queens students and alumni produced 13,500 fans for Homecoming — a record which should be broken Nov. 1 at Varsity Stadium.

Dear Editor:

I was on interested, though somewhat skeptical member of the audience of last Friday's hearing of the Royal Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs. No matter how impressive the arguments, how many the signatures, or how sincere the Commission Members, I am left with the feeling that the subsequent report can do little but follow the unheeded path of its predecessors, previous Royal Commissions and earlier impartial studies of drugs. Public opinion is the bogey-man, and the only way of overcoming this is for every concerned user to turn on five non-users — preferably including his or her parents.

These were the moods of CUS president Martin Loney as he pondered what might be the Thermopylae of the national organization — tomorrow's referendum on this campus.

CUS faces crucial test at U of T tomorrow

BY TIM BROOK

The existence of the Canadian Union of Students depends on the U of T referendum tomorrow, yet the students who are voting generally are unaware of what CUS is doing.

CUS President Martin Loney spent yesterday on campus attempting to clarify CUS position. His defence of CUS was not an easy task at a university whose student body is ignorant of and not interested in CUS.

"The Canadian Union of Students has played a considerable role in bringing about positive change on university campuses, and we are paving the way for improvements in the future", he said at a debate in Convocation Hall.

Loney, who has just finished his M.A. in political science at Simon Fraser University, appears to be pragmatic in his approach to problems. Speaking at the debate, he was eloquent and keenly analytical.

He stressed that the image of CUS as an association of revolutionaries bent on the destruction of Canada's universities is false.

"The whole campaign has been a clear case of red-baiting. We have been unjustly associated with events in which we were not involved."

Loney said that CUS is the victim of the right-wing backlash at the U of T.

ONE YEAR SHIFT

"Last year St. Michael's College held a referendum on CUS and they supported us two to one. This year CUS is more moderate than it was last year, but I'm sure they won't give us the same support.

"The New Left Caucus has polarized the whole campus, and CUS is getting hit unfairly."

Loney said that the NLC felt that CUS policy was too liberal. In any case, Loney suggested, CUS stands in the way of their creating an independent radical group to replace CUS, which is a national council controlled by the participating student councils.

In the debate SAC President Gus Abols admitted the need for a national student organization, but he said he finds CUS too much at variance with his opinions.

Loney said earlier that too many people are ignorant of what CUS is and what CUS has accomplished. This ignorance he attributes to the students themselves rather than to the organization.

NO SHOW

"I come to talk about CUS policy and thirty people show up. What do you do?"

He feels that the opinions of most students have been grossly influenced by ads in The Varsity which are not only unfair but also untrue.

At the debate in Convocation Hall, Loney tried to clear up some of the misconceptions. He dealt extensively with what CUS wasn't.

"CUS is not an intolerant monolith," he said, adding that the picture Art McIlwain presented of a radical conspiracy against the moderates at CUS policy seminars was untrue. CUS policy is decided democratically by participating universities.

"We are not working for a revolution," he said. He does not believe in the utility of violence; he is a pacifist who advocates compromise as a means of effecting change.

"CUS is not affiliated with any political party." The beliefs of the members of the CUS national council range all over the political spectrum.

FUTURE POLICY

Loney said that in the future at the U of T CUS would study the problems of graduate and summer employment; continue to work for better student loans; provide course critiques; keep SAC in touch with student councils in other universities.

Loney stressed that CUS will become involved in an issue at a university only at the request of that university's student council. The general purpose of CUS is to establish guidelines which individual councils are free to implement as they see fit.

CUS is very much attuned to the necessity for compromise. Loney said. He cited the stand on Quebec: CUS took the middle way between those who think that there are no differences between English and French Canada, and those who advocate separatism.

Also, CUS is not the expensive proposition it has been reported to be. It costs only $1. per student. The money is used for seminars and information pamphlets.

The support of the U of T is critical to the organization's existence.

"If the U of T withdraws from CUS it means the end of CUS", Loney said.

"If we lose our strongest member, it will be impossible to rebuild CUS as we had planned. Many other campuses are in favor of rejoining CUS now after quitting last year, but without the U of T they won't consider it worthwhile."

The Canadian Union of Students lost its referendum at Carleton University last night by a vote of 1656 to 861.

The following institutes still hold CUS membership: Simon Fraser University (who recently won a referendum to maintain its CUS membership), University of Regina, University of Manitoba, Brandon University, Lakehead University, Laurentian University, Brock University, Glendon College (part of York University), MacMaster University, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, St. Patrick's University, Mount St. Vincent University, Kings College, St. Thomas Aquinas University, Dalhousie University, and St. Francis Xavier University.

Monday the council of the University of Saskatchewan at Saskatoon unanimously moved to take the CUS issue to an early referendum. The campus withdrew from CUS last year.

Queens, Western, and Edmonton have also initiated talks towards holding new referenda on their campuses.

SFU lays charges against striking students and faculty

BURNABY (CUP) — Simon Fraser University Administration brought civil court charges Tuesday against three professors and 11 students involved in the strike of the Department of Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology.

The administration has also applied for an injunction barring all strikers from picketing and disrupting lectures. A further injunction against distribution of literature by picketing students may soon be applied for.

The civil charges brought against the 14 strikers are for loss of revenue — because the administration has had to reimburse students who decided to withdraw because of the strike — unspecified damages and trespassing.

The trespassing charges grow out of an administration decree that striking professors and students are no longer part of the university.

The injunction would particularly seek to put an end to the picketing of the "mini-courses" the administration has set up to replace the missing PSA lectures. "Mini-courses" in archaeology and economics were prevented from meeting by PSA pickets Oct. 17 and 20. Without these lectures, the administration policy of ignoring the strike would be difficult to maintain.

The professors named in the civil action are Louis Feldhammer, John Leggat and Saghir Ahmad. The students charged are J. Harding, J. Cleveland, B. Slocock, A. Holinbaugh, C. Hardy, J. Miller, B. Enoch, B. Fletcher, B. Plummer and P. Hoffer.

The strike is protesting administrative interference in the PSA department.

SAC reps divided on CUS

The majority of SAC members seem to support U of T membership in CUS.

"I'm pro-CUS, but I'm anti-CUS structure," said Ceta Ramkalawasingh (II New) during an informal Varsity poll after the SAC executive meeting last night.

She explained that CUS is the only remaining structure which can serve as a union of students, but it still needs improvement.

"Either you work with CUS as the only existing structure or you work without a structure," Miss Ramkalawasingh said.

She explained that CUS cannot be expected to serve students directly.

"Representivity is a myth. It is physically impossible," she said.

"I want a union, not a student government," she said.

Mike Simon (III Scar), head of pro-CUS campaign, agreed.

"CUS is the only organization with resources to provide research for the different interests of the University and the student today," he said.

"It's a top-down organization, a consensus organization, but it is the only structure now," he said.

Joe Levin, (III UC) Communications Commissioner, voiced an anti-CUS opinion.

"From my experience with CUS, it is unwilling to change or accept change in structure," he said.

"CUS is not open to debate from all sides; it is generally intolerant of its student members," he added.

Levin suggested that there could be an alternate organization for student debate, namely the Canadian Federation of Students.

"I'm anti-CUS," said Gus Ahols, SAC President, while exiting from the SAC building.

Ken Philbrook, (III Erin) stated "I'm definitely against CUS because of its Leftist tendencies."

The remaining SAC members, who could not be reached, were reported by Miss Ramkalawasingh to be favoring the CUS referendum, 3 to 1.

Loney, McIlwain debate CUS

By KARL HAUENSTEIN

Pro and anti-CUS forces met head on Monday night in New College to debate the future of the Canadian Union of Students.

Martin Loney, President of CUS, said that CUS is a valuable tool and should not be abandoned.

CUS is now working to cut down U.S. involvement in Canadian universities and to study how students can more effectively run their own education, Loney said.

Many of CUS's ideas have been implemented as policy in some universities, he said. Indeed, even parts of the CUG report were suggested by CUS.

Art McIlwain, President of the Engineering Society, said that CUS is so radical that a person with a moderate viewpoint could not have his ideas seriously considered.

Since moderates did not attend CUS meetings, the policy emerging from these meetings was usually biased.

REFUSED TO WRITE

Loney replied that McIlwain had been asked to write his views to be published by CUS and had repeatedly refused, saying that he had no time.

McIlwain also charged that CUS was not really a representative body, since the Quebec universities did not belong to it. He noted that Loney stood opposed to the admission of any Quebec university into CUS.

"I oppose only the admission of English-speaking Quebec students into CUS," Loney said, "because they would try to use CUS against the French students."

Even without the membership of Quebec universities, CUS is as representative as the Provincial or Federal Government, he added.

CUS does not exist; the referendum is a myth

The Varsity staff was unable to reach a consensus on an editorial policy for the CUS referendum.

Two basic positions emerged out of the ad hoc in The Varsity office last night.

Some staffers offered a position of "critical support" of CUS — based on the rationale that students must vote "YES" for CUS in order to improve the structural problems of the union, and that a national students union is necessary to discuss the common problems of Canadian students. This pro-CUS position is best expressed in the comment articles written by Steve Langdon, Bob Bossin and Gary Webster.

Other staffers said CUS and referendum were irrelevant, and that confining a position to "YES" or "NO" ignores the majority of students who will not vote tomorrow.

The following comment piece expresses the latter position:

Tomorrow there will be a referendum at the U of T that will decide the fate of the Canadian Union of Students, the fate of a national student union. That's the myth that's going around campus.

It's false.

The Canadian Union of Students does not exist. It's dead as a viable political organization — no matter what the outcome of the referendum tomorrow might be.

In the past few years, CUS has been important in the development of a left-wing student movement in Canada. As Langdon and Bossin point out in their article on page 5, CUS was a vehicle that helped develop the expertise and the analysis through which a small number of students could develop a critique of the university and society.

But CUS has never acted as a union, because it never was a union. Historically — before the "reds" moved in — it was an elite group of students running a service organization and claiming to represent every Canadian student by virtue of a piece of paper.

But a constitution does not constitute a union. A union is a majoritarian structure that must respond from organic need — the desire of a majority of Canadian students to organize politically.

The left needs to organize politically, but it is not yet a majority and it does not need to operate through a top-down "union" of students that is, in reality, little more than a piece of paper, a budget, and a group of secretariat personnel.

CUS has become irrelevant to the student movement. Not just to the small number of people across the country who are generally grouped under that label — but the movement of all Canadian students to understand and change their situation.

CUS cannot relate to the boredom of the average student in Political Economy 100.

Because CUS is an archaic structure without any built-in conception of dealing with that student's boredom.

Just as the Political Science 100 class is not structured to allow the student to deal with his own political situation in the classroom, neither is CUS structured to allow students to deal with their political situation in Canada.

I attended the annual CUS Congress in August and began to realize the circular and limited process of a national union structured like CUS.

We would set together around seminar tables and talk about "issues" — real issues in the real world, issues like housing, unemployment, authoritarianism in education, imperialism, capitalism, etc.

But the Congress was structured in such a way that each issue emerged separately and seemed to have no relation to the one next to it. Issues, like academic disciplines in the university, were fragmented into hundreds of atoms and taken out of any historical context.

Once we agreed on the issues — e.g. imperialism — then someone would say: "That's a bad word. Let's call it control." Or influence. Or pressure.

It was process where people were trying to make "radical" words palatable to the majority of students.

An exercise in rhetoric.

Whenever anyone questioned the process, the answer was, "We can't turn people off."

So individuals would get together and make up motions, then tone them down so that they would be compatible to the plenary.

Then the plenary would pass the motions.

All the delegates would say with great enthusiasm that they must "bring the issues back to the member campuses" in two ways: through the local student councils and through referendum campaigns.

The Resolutions Book goes to the Students councils. They discuss the motions and pass more motions.

There is a referendum. pro-CUS group on the U of T campus believes in the issues and see the continuation of CUS as being necessary to promote the issues. CUS must survive so that student council people can go back to the Congress next year and pass more motions about the issues and fight more referenda.

The pro-CUS people admit that CUS is top-down, that it's an elitist structure. But keep CUS going, they tell us, and we'll solve those problems later.

The referendum has been a campaign of survival. And the politics of survival are opportunism — anything to maintain the "tyranny of process".

The anti-CUS, right-wing group sees CUS as a threat to democracy, the popular notion of democracy being, at present, stability. Their tactic is red-baiting. They and Premier Bennett.

The pro-CUS forces see CUS as a place to be legitimately radical. The collapse of CUS is a threat to their survival. But to be a legitimate radical in this society is a contradiction in terms.

As a result, the pro and anti groups have waged a bitter and opportunistic campaign that began at an idealistic meeting of the Students Administrative Council where both sides saw the main political issue as campaign funds.

Tomorrow a concrete event is taking place: a number of students will get up and walk to ballot boxes and put marks on them.

But many more students will not vote at all. Because they haven't heard of CUS, or they don't know what it's doing, or they just don't care.

And those people who don't vote are the best illustration of the irrelevance of CUS — a union that cannot relate to students because it is not a grass-roots union that students have formed to do anything.

There is a difference between saying something and doing something. There is no such thing as a radical word, only a radical action — for that is the only way to affect your environment, change it, and become part of history because you are making it. The CUS rhetoric cannot effect anything because it cannot break through the structure of the union itself and reach the student.

Students should be organizing in classrooms and departments rather than delegating their political responsibility to a paper union in Ottawa, to a small group of students delivering paper motions that are only rhetoric.

All of that does not mean smash CUS by voting NO in tomorrow's referendum. To vote at all is to perpetuate a myth. The referendum itself assumes that there is a national student union to vote for and against. There isn't. Just some paper, some money, and a few tired radicals in Ottawa.

Trix is for kids

CUS does not relate to kids' teeth

The following is an excerpt of a speech made by David Block at the annual CUS Congress in August. Block, a former member of the CUS secretariat, is speaking on a motion that CUS join the Industrial Workers of the World (the "Wobblies").

The motion was a theatrical device intended to expose the structural problems of CUS.

On the street where I live in Ottawa in a suburb called Vanier, it is mostly French Canadian. The little kids on the street have become our good friends because I own a dog and most of them don't have a dog and the kids know that.

And they come to dinner and they say "Oh you eat well and we are only eating fish at 43 cents a pound.

They say things like you own a lot of records and we only have ten. And the little girl Denise, who is only five, laughs, and her mouth is full of cavities because her father couldn't afford to take her to the dentist.

That is the reality that I experience. It means something. Not just words in the gut.

In introducing that resolution we are not trying to smash the union.

That would assume that the union exists. It does not.

The problem that is ours is to become relevant, to do something about the fact that the kids on my street, who, incidentally, are affluent, have to live out their lives the way they do.

So we introduced the motion which, talked about the previous radical tradition that was smashed, the previous radical tradition that wanted to do something, the previous radical tradition that was dangerous to North America and came out of the one big union that was Canadian.

Most of us probably don't know the history of the IWW. Most of us have probably not ever heard of the old OBU. That is the function of our textbooks, the function of what we are taught. We are taught to ignore reality.

To be a student — student — to study, to know, is to know a lot more than most people do.

It is worth taking your education and knowhow and serving the people. Because that is the only choice we have, if we are students. And that is the thing that has not happened here. We have assumed ahistorically the need for CUS.

An Open Letter

From Steve Langdon and Bob Bossin

By STEVE LANGDON and BOB BOSSIN

(Steve Langdon was last year's President of the Students Administrative Council, and Bob Bossin was last year's SAC Education Consultant.)

We've both been very frustrated by the debate about the Canadian Union of Students and thought it might be useful, or at least therapeutic, to write down why.

Partly it's a personal attachment we've both had to CUS: our own ideas about the university and about Canada have developed with and through CUS. We've seen the organization become a radical student union instead of a student government club for future cabinet ministers.

Obviously such a change of direction raises questions. The frustrating thing is that during the last week none of them were being asked. Instead there has been a "debate" that should embarrass any university community.

The anti-CUS campaign has spent its time in name-calling and misrepresentation of CUS (eg. quoting Andy Wernick as wanting to haul a red flag over every social science building — even though Wernick has no position in CUS, and his statement has nothing to do with either the union or its policies).

There has been the misleading red herring about Quebec. Quebec's French-speaking university students want a strictly Quebec student union. They don't want to belong to CUS or any union by another name that might replace it. CUS accepting this doesn't make it happen — it just permits us to talk with them.

And there was SAC's stupidly giving more money to one side than the other. The campaign would have been better if they had given nothing to anyone.

Meanwhile, the real questions — what CUS is, what it has done, what it thinks about the university and Canadian society in 1969 — these have hardly been mentioned. We want to try to deal with them.

What it is:

CUS is not a phantom group in Ottawa, making decisions by inspiration. The SAC reps elected at Toronto met at the Lakehead in August with representatives of 42 other universities.

Union policies were decided there; the Ottawa secretariat only carries them out.

This is not ideally democratic of course; many local councils are still elected in popularity contests or in campaigns like this one.

What has it done for us lately:

The issue here is not flights to Europe, or life insurance or tuition deductions from income tax. CUS has done things much more central.

We don't think we would have a CUG report, at least in its present form, had there been no CUS. The student position on university democracy developed through CUS seminars, CUS papers and CUS research. The plan CUG recommends for restructuring departments (parallel structures) came from CUS discussions and analysis of experiments tried by other student groups.

SAC education policy — course unions, course evaluations, the Free University, emphasis on student-centered learning, demands for multi-discipline courses, content reform — has resulted directly from CUS work and expertise. Before the 1967 CUS seminar on education, the SAC Education committee's main function was watchdogging the Blue and White Society budget.

The same link can be made between CUS and U of T student policy on housing, discipline and student aid.

POSITION AND STRATEGY ON THE UNIVERSITY

CUS's policy and strategy have developed from this day to day work on student issues. For example, in researching student aid we learned that basic social and economic factors were more important than simple needs for aid money in preventing many people from reaching university. Poor schools and housing in slum areas, low parental incomes are what really prevent lower class kids from getting here. A government financed study by four U of T students recently proved this conclusively.

All this taught us we had to look beyond easy answers that only reflected what we saw on our own campus.

In the same way, after demanding a "voice" in university government we learned that just a voice (eg. seven members on the two hundred member senate) was not enough.

We learned that "academic freedom" meant to many faculty members the freedom to do whatever they wished in the classroom and thus, as pointed out in the Campbell Report, denied academic freedom to students. And we learned that faculty had power and students didn't.

We also learned that changes don't come without political pressure. Ironically, last year the Southern Alberta Institute of Technology withdrew from CUS, calling it "too political" and then had to call CUS for help the next week when the government tried to make SAIT a straight trade school — without consultation.

Much the same thing happened here last year. We discovered that a secret brief on the future of the university was about to be presented to the government. SAC asked that the brief be discussed and approved first. President Bissell approved. SAC and a general student meeting had to threaten a sit-in. The administration then changed its position and made the brief public (revealing, among other things, that Forestry was to be moved to Erindale, a decision made without discussion by Forestry students or staff.)

Students were able to prevent that decision and others as arbitrary.

This is what is meant by the politics of confrontation: not that negotiations are stopped in favour of taking up axes, but that we be willing to put ourselves on the line when it becomes necessary.

SOCIETY

Over recent years we also learned that the complaints students express — boredom, feeling "I'm not doing anything really meaningful", loneliness, alienation — are not just student feelings but problems of the whole community. The executive in his office is just as alienated, the workers just as powerless.

Student difficulties are aspects of social difficulties. There is not enough student housing because there is not enough low cost housing. There is unemployment, student and non-student, because of the nature of our economy. The values of the outside shape attitudes in the university. Economic forces influence it. University examinations aren't to help learning which they actually hinder; they really aid private industry in their employee selection.

All this means to tackle student problems we must tackle social problems. That's why CUS concerns itself with society. This inevitably includes research on our economy.

Most crucial in the long run may be CUS's work on the question of U.S. control of Canada. Half our manufacturing industries, two thirds of our key resource sector are in American hands; the same trend is hitting our university education. It has to be stopped if we are going to keep open the chance of building in Canada a better, more humane co-operative society.

We think this is a valid sketch of what CUS really is. As such it has some limitations. For example, we think it should be linking our hopes for change with those of students in other countries, where national freedoms are also limited by local tyranny or by external imperialism.

We were surprised to learn this summer, one of us in Africa, one in Latin America, that even rhetorical support from Canadian students is welcomed by, say, students in South Africa fighting Apartheid. It makes them feel less isolated.

But we recognize that no national union, whether it's the one we've got or some mythical new one, can reflect exactly what any two students want to have done. CUS is essentially a parliamentary body — but one with a radical, active position on university and national issues.

We realize it is not saving the world but we think it is doing something useful.

That's what CUS is. If students don't feel this is what their union should be, they should smash CUS. But if that is to be the decision, it should not be made on the basis of the name-calling, misrepresentation and innuendo that have made up this campaign.

'Engineers' paper has radical implications'

I wonder how CUS became the revolutionary party its detractors call it.

It must have been a glorious day when elected student councillors gathered from across the country, suddenly discarded shirts and ties for blue jeans and prepared to man the barricades.

Or maybe it didn't happen that way at all. Maybe we can wade through all the recent jargonizing and misrepresentation and demonstrate how CUS is a valuable organization worth saving.

Art McIlwain should really know. He's president of the Engineering Society which days ago published a paper on Objectives for an educational environment in Engineering.

That document not only employed the essentials of the CUS Declaration of the Canadian Student but based its entire analysis on a paper written by former CUS secretariat member Bob Baldwin.

The concepts in that paper are central to CUS's view of education.

Explicitly drawing on them, the Engineering Society calls for education to be a "co-operative intellectual effort" and defines the principal goal of education "to be the development of all citizens as free, creative, human beings.

Written largely by Art McIlwain, the engineering paper notes that this cooperative intellectual effort necessitates an atmosphere free of "arbitrary superiority — inferiority situations" It detected a feeling of "malaise" among engineering students, since the concepts of McIlwain and Baldwin recommend are far from reality in the faculty.

Yet McIlwain has chosen to oppose our continued membership in CUS. He wants us to accept the ideas but reject the organization to which those ideas are central, and which was largely responsible for helping student councillors articulate them.

McIlwain is worried because CUS is "radical".

He doesn't seem to recognize that the education he recommends for his faculty is far from reality across this campus. Few students would consider their day-to-day learning experiences "co-operative intellectual efforts". "Arbitrary superiority-inferiority situations" prevail in most classrooms. Any changes in this direction would be rather major.

And it's doubtful that we can generate an atmosphere of cooperation when a competitive marking system, grim struggles for graduate school positions and a competitive ethic in our socio-economic system are still with us.

McIlwain's Engineering Society paper smacks of pretty radical stuff. But he doesn't seem to recognize its implications. Some CUS people have taken McIlwain's analysis several steps further. But that must make them "revolutionaries" so our Engineering Society Pres. campaigns against them. It's a pity he can't see past his own rhetoric.

It's also a shame he doesn't recognize the key role of CUS in helping student councillors across Canada move from the situation existing two years ago — when University of Western Ontario students were refused a single seat on their Board of Governors — to today's CUG report, which sees students involved in hiring, firing and promoting professors.

He could point to the recent study on student aid sponsored by the Department of University Affairs which endorsed a long time CUS position that class barriers to education cannot be overcome with loans but only by attacking financial deprivation in all its forms.

Maybe those approaches were radical. Maybe they involved political analyses. But they were responses to problems that won't go away even though student unions ignore them. And if the analyses were radical the debate should be whether those approaches were valid and not that a student union shouldn't be radical at all.

It would be ludicrous to allow a valuable organization like CUS to crumble in a flurry of jargonizing and cries from a few campus politicians that they were embarrassed intellectually at the last Congress.

12 student presidents back CUS

Sir,

We the undersigned, presidents of our respective student unions, support the Canadian Union of Students and believe that its programmes and policies for the year 1969-70 provide a firm basis for a union which has wide support as well as effective policies. We have had time to only assemble this small number of signatures and deliver this letter at such a late date because we had no idea that the attacks made on CUS would be so totally misrepresentative of what actually happened at the last CUS Congress. Far from an unrepresentative group of manipulating conspirators, the Congress extended voting privileges to all schools who attended regardless of membership and the resolutions that were passed, in most cases by overwhelming margins, represented a broad consensus around issues which affect Canadian students. We hope that the students at the University of Toronto will look at those resolutions and realize that their vote has wide implications on campuses all across Canada. We realize that locally we all have problems which need to be worked on and resolved but clearly there is a difference between local issues and the future of the national union which we regard as extremely important. We look forward to membership in CUS with the students of the University of Toronto so that we can all move on to solving the problems facing Canadian students in this society.

GSU executive calls for Winter's resignation

Sir,

The Executive of the G.S.U. publicly requests the resignation of Mr. John O. Winter for the deliberate misrepresentations he presented in The Varsity of Oct. 20. Mr. Winter has not, to this date, brought these accusations to the attention of the Executive Committee of which he is a member. Nor has he ever introduced any motions to this effect. The following facts are ample refutation of Mr. Winter's article:

1. The Executive does not intend to pack the General Meeting.
2. Unlimited supplies of free beer after General Meetings was, in fact, one of the policies which Mr. Winter personally initiated last year.
3. The Executive maintains that its record of achievement over its first six months surpasses that of previous executives.
4. Mr. Winter's claim that he left the previous Executive functioning as an efficient organization is an unfortunately egotistical overstatement. Furthermore, Mr. Winter has refused to share with the present Executive the storehouse of privileged information which he accumulated as the personification of the previous Executive.
5. The acquisition of office furniture was initiated by Mr. Winter's Executive and was approved by a General Meeting. The film projector was purchased wholly from the profits of last year's movie programme. This purchase was necessitated by extraordinarily high weekly rental costs.

6. The Organizer has been paid from the contingency funds of last year's budget; her continuing employment is subject to the approval of the General Meeting. It is the opinion of the Executive that her work has been satisfactory to this date.

7. Michael Vaughan has not sent any letters as President of the G.S.U. to Ottawa protesting chemical warfare.

The Executive agreed to pay for telegrams amounting to $13.68 not $50.00 as was claimed by Mr. Winter.

Mr. Vaughan does not own an expensive Ford Torino, nor does he intend to acquire a new or used car.

Mr. Vaughan has Executive confidence in his handling of the disciplinary crisis in which he played a major role.

Mr. Vaughan has expressed his willingness to postpone his Canada Council grant in order to carry out the duties of his office which have become increasingly time-consuming since the G.S.U. has become an autonomous organization. The Executive has resolved that he become a full-time President at a salary of $500 a month for 6 months with full employee benefits.

8. The present Executive maintains that its guiding philosophy leads more effectively to useful action than the confused hit-and-miss approach of previous Executives.

9. The Executive has, in fact, reconciled all differences with OISE.

10. The General Meeting has been called in a constitutional manner to the last detail. At the General Meeting a Charter and by-laws will be presented for consideration of the members. Mr. Winter's charge of illegality is misinformed.

11. The present Executive is in the process of shifting the policy emphasis of the G.S.U. from that of an isolated service organization to that of an actively-involved socio-political Union. To this end a significant part of the proposed budget has been allotted for departmental graduate student organizations.

We will accept nominations for the position of vice-president, Division II Representative, and Division III Representative at the General Meeting today at the G.S.U. from 12 noon.

The above statement was passed unanimously by the GSU Executive

Why vote yes on CUS referendum tomorrow

By GARY WEBSTER

(Gary Webster is a graduate student in Political Science and was Co-Chairman of the Commission on University Government.)

Opponents of CUS have centred their attacks around the claim that CUS is not a body representative of student interests but is rather a revolutionary "political party" committed to the destruction of society as we know it with no regard for the opinions of the majority of students.

These charges need to be confronted on two levels: CUS' real service to the interests of the majority of students must be demonstrated; and it must be established that CUS is no more a political party than the Government of Canada or any other representative or delegative institution on which the majority of members have a particular political leaning.

CUS' basic purpose has been to serve as an institution through which the various student councils in Canada may exchange and promulgate ideas generated by their experience in local constituencies and formulate coherent strategies for the student movement across Canada. University administrations and academic staff, government, and corporations all operate through national organizations. Students, who deal with and often oppose these interest groups, need a similar national medium of policy-formulation, research and communication.

CRUCIAL

From my personal perspective, the research and communication functions of CUS are crucial to attempts to make successful representations on behalf of students both at the local university level and before provincial and national governments. The importance of these CUS functions is well illustrated by the CUS role in the university government debate, which has led on this campus to the CUG Report. CUS took an early stand on student parity in university councils and researched and disseminated some of the first hard analyses of the need for a student role in the hiring and promoting of faculty members. CUS stands on these questions were publicized in the AUCC magazine University Affairs and in the nation's press: thus administrations were put on notice that a national student offensive on these questions was to take place.

The sensationalisation of CUS militancy in the press made the CUS demands seem all the more pressing, and brought administrators to an earlier recognition of the need to accommodate student concerns than might otherwise have been true. The urgency with which CUG was established, and the willingness to accept student parity on the Commission are cases in point.

IMPORTANT GROUNDWORK

Once CUG was established, the importance of CUS' groundwork became even more evident. It was because CUS published the report on PSA reforms at Simon Fraser through its Secretariat that the SAC could think through the parallel structures system of departmental organization and present it as a model in its brief to CUG. That model achieved partial recognition in the CUG recommendations.

CUS documents on the ideology of social science and on the history of university government and curriculum in Canada served the students on CUG well in making their case for reform of the university. Martin Loney appeared before CUG to explain the necessity of a critical and open university in a democratic society.

This is but one example of the service that CUS has provided to student reformers. There are many others. Governmental agencies took very serious notice of the CUS paper on student loans and the question of universal accessibility to universities. When the CPUO research committee set to work on formulating new proposals for financing students, this document received its considerable attention. At the federal level, tax exemptions for income which students earned and applied to their university fees were achieved partly because of CUS pressure.

UNREPRESENTATIVE?

These are a few ways in which CUS has served the interests of all students. What then of the charge that CUS is a "political party" unrepresentative of students, where moderates and conservatives are unwelcome?

CUS representation comes from the students' councils at all member universities. If delegates to CUS are largely "radical" (many are only "liberals"), it is because the elected councils which choose them are, in their majority, of similar political complexion. Those who oppose CUS membership have been too apathetic or have lacked the political appeal to win a majority on their local councils and thus to control the delegations to CUS. Having lost, they scream "unrepresentative" and demand the break-up of the organization.

It is as if the NDP, having failed to win a majority of seats in Parliament and the right to organize a substitute national institution representative, essentially, of its ideology. If students are really dissatisfied with CUS policies (which I think they have little reason to be, the CUG report and loan reforms being partially the result of strong CUS policies), let them replace the local SAC majorities which are represented on CUS with their own people. If they cannot do so, let them act as a defeated party is obliged to act in a democracy.

NO ALTERNATE

A final word about the type of political analysis which CUS generates. CUS opponents think it too radical and very unrepresentative of student thinking. Yet in this campaign they have not put forward their own alternative analysis or strategies for furthering the interests of students in Canada. If they wish to neutralize or destroy the ability of a national organization to formulate any policies and any strategies, let them say so, and let us deny them the right to do so.

If not, let them organize to elect their own people at local levels to change the political complexion of CUS and to develop new strategies.

Those of us who believe in democratic process and in the necessity of an effective national student organization will vote YES on Thursday.

Overseas worker must sell his culture: Dr. McClure

In order to succeed in overseas work, a person must become a missionary of his culture. Dr. Robert McClure, Moderator of the United Church of Canada, said last night.

Dr. McClure was speaking to an overflow audience at the International Student Centre at a meeting, sponsored by Canadian University Students Overseas.

"A person in an underdeveloped country has no respect for a man who believes in nothing", he said.

He attacked those people who have a "liberal viewpoint" and will not express their beliefs of their culture when asked by a citizen of an underdeveloped country.

"A worker from China or the Soviet Union has a cultural mark and the people of the country where he is working know where to place him," he said.

In contrast a man from the West is distrusted because they do not know where he stands.

In an interview after the meeting a CUSO spokesman disagreed with the position taken by Dr. McClure.

"It is not our feeling that our workers must sell our way of life when they go overseas," said Suzanne Johnson, CUSO coordinator in Toronto.

Dr. McClure also said the desire to serve is no longer the only requirement for a person who wishes to work overseas.

"You must have a skill to be useful in the developing lands. Your skill must be your tool and your tool must be sharp", he said.

He also had some advice on the correct attitude for CUSO workers to adopt in their work.

"There is nothing you can do for the people of a developing nation except in what you can do with them", he said.

Dr. McClure was the first in a series of speakers sponsored by CUSO in its continuing attempt to get involved in public education on campus.

"We hope to involve students in international development through these lectures, whether they are interested in serving with CUSO or not", said Miss Johnson.

"We thought Dr. McClure would be provocative and offer a different viewpoint than ours", she said.

Persons who would like to help in CUSO activities on campus can volunteer their services at the organizations headquarters at the ISC.

Confusion hits PHE students

By SYLVIA McVICAR

Many Physical and Health Education students have reacted with surprise and anger to the revamping of their course, which was outlined to the first year students last Thursday.

Students were informed they will have only six hours of sports practice each week in their first year, four hours in their second and third year and two hours in their fourth year. Last year the first year students had 12 hours.

The main point of confusion lies around the question of the purpose of the P.H.E. course. Those who are aiming at teaching positions, especially in secondary schools, are upset at the de-emphasizing of actual sports proficiency, while many who are interested in graduate studies, rehabilitation or health sciences welcome the change.

P.H.E. director Dr. Ebbs, has said that the sole purpose of the course is not to provide secondary school teachers, coaches or athletes as such.

Last Thursday night, twenty graduates met with Ebbs and agreed that teaching should not be the end of the P.H.E. course.

Under the old program the P.H.E. graduates found they had already acquired their teaching education, making the required year at the College of Education extraneous.

BASIC PROGRAM

It has been decided instead that the purpose of the program should be to provide a basis for continuation in any area, such as rehabilitation, health sciences or teaching.

Ebbs also stressed that the program set up as of last Thursday, is not final. There will be a committee of students and graduates to study it until November and decide further changes.

Ebbs said he does not know why some of his staff has disagreed with the new course and resigned.

Much of the surprise at the changes in the new program is due to the fact that the new calendar did not come out until July 1, because of the wait for approval by the Senate.

As a result, many first year students enrolled at U of T on the basis of the old calendar. The new courses were not finalized until the second week of September this year.

Uniwat president charges radical with theft

WATERLOO (CUP) — University of Waterloo President Howard Petch has charged a student with the theft and possession of a letter from his files.

Petch accused Cyril Levitt, a member of Waterloo's Radical Student Movement, with stealing a letter from Philip Pocock, Research Director of The U.S. Senate special committee on science policy, containing peripheral references to expected increases in research funds because of American weapons research.

Levitt read the letter to more than 300 students Sept. 25, as they gathered to get answers and explanations from Petch about the "Order on Campus" report of The Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario.

The report called for stern disciplinary action against nearly all student disruption.

Shortly before Levitt's reading Petch told the group the University was involved only in peaceful research.

Levitt appeared in court Monday. No trial date has been set.

He told reporters he intends to plead innocent on both charges.

SAC financially supports aldermanic candidates

SAC has leapt into municipal politics for the first time this year, supporting the campaign of two candidates in Toronto's Ward Seven, the city's poorest ward.

John Sewell, who received $300 from SAC for his independent campaign for alderman, will discuss municipal politics on campus tomorrow.

Sewell, a graduate of Victoria College and U of T Law School, has worked in Trefann Court and other parts of "Cabbagetown" for three years.

His campaign is not based on specific reforms, but he says he hopes to give the residents of the area some say in the decisions that affect them.

Sewell also says he will try to protect his constituents from city developers who wish to level major portions of Ward 7 and build high-rise apartments.

"We think that the poor people should be made aware of the power they have," said SAC President Gus Abols. "They have every right to be able to determine their own political future."

SAC is also supporting Mrs. Noreen Gaudette, a Trefann Court resident, in her campaign for Board of Education in Ward 7.

Sewell will be speaking at noon tomorrow in Room 2135, Sidney Smith Hall.

Canadian bedfellows with Nixon

NEW YORK (CUP) — About 200 demonstrators quietly protested the Council of Churches of the City of New York "Family Of Man" Awards Dinner Monday, as the council honored U.S. President Richard Nixon and San Francisco State College President S. I. Hayakawa.

A "counter-banquet" of bread and wine, planned by the "Peace Meal Committee" and sponsored by 12 anti-war groups, was held in the street outside the New York Hilton, while the awards were presented inside.

The protestors announced their own "Family of Man" awards for Black militant leader James Forman and James E. Groppi, a civil rights leader now serving a six-month sentence in a Milwaukee prison.

Organizer John E. Shuh said the council's awards to Nixon and Hayakawa were the "baptism of oppression," and "a cheap publicity stunt."

Inside, Hayakawa told guests at the $150-a-plate presentation dinner he felt he was "acting in defense of academic freedom" when he took over at San Francisco State.

Last year, Hayakawa, who was born in Vancouver, called State Police and National Guards on campus to break a strike by students and faculty demanding black studies courses and an investigation of alleged racism on campus.

'I was refused a teaching position in the sociology department two weeks ago for blatant political reasons.'

By RONNIE NEVIN

(Ronnie Nevin is currently working toward her PhD in Sociology at U of T. She did her Masters in Sociology here last year and received her BA from the State University of New York at Buffalo. She is a member of the Worker-Student Alliance and the Sociology Radical Caucus.

The following is her account of what happened when she applied for a teaching position in the Sociology Department.)

After being granted a teaching fellowship in late September, I was turned down for the position of tutorial leader in Norman Bell's Sociology 100 course because of my radical political views.

After much stalling and assurances that I would be considered for the position, I discovered two weeks ago exactly why I was not thought fit to teach. Bell stated three reasons for the refusal, making it clear that the issue had been widely discussed in the department:

- there was "ideological opposition in the department" to my political views (sociologists aren't value-free; they do take political positions).

- I lacked an "eclectic (many-sided) view of sociology" and was too committed to a position (I was just more honest about my analysis and didn't hide it behind a hodge-podge of positions; anyway the other sociologists were obviously committed enough to see my critical views as threatening).

- The real reason was my "lack of composure" — that I didn't have the correct style or approach and thus couldn't teach. He said I might get a chance later on to teach, but in a protected way (was I being protected from the students or vice versa?).

PUT OFF

At first when I applied for the position, I was put off and told that my request would be considered.

Leo Zakuta, graduate secretary of the sociology department wrote down my request but said he couldn't promise me the position.

Bell also refused to commit himself even when I said I would start attending his lectures (since classes had already begun).

A week later I discovered that three of the four tutorial leaders for Soc. 100 had already been chosen, without my being informed of any decision. I had accidentally walked in on a meeting of Bell and his tutorial leaders.

At this point I decided to find out if I would be given the last position:

Zakuta informed me that someone else was already being considered for the last position.

He said that Bell had requested the four tutorial leaders, and I had not been one of them.

Zakuta tried to convince me that I was needed in another course (primarily as a grader of exams) but said there were no other teaching positions available.

"RECOMMENDATIONS"

When I talked to Bell, he insisted that Zakuta made the decisions on teaching assistants, and said that he only made recommendations. (Both Zakuta and Bell claimed that the other had made the final decision.)

It was clear I would not be permitted to teach. When the fourth tutorial position became free, at least three other students were called for the position, before it was filled. And meanwhile Bell's course had gone on for four weeks without tutorials, due to difficulty in choosing tutorial leaders.

In sociology, and other departments in the university, acceptance of status quo ideas about society are an important criterion in the selection of faculty. I was not allowed to teach because my critical analysis of society contradicts what is usually taught in sociology courses. This would have been dangerous because the predominant ideas are important in preserving the system — they teach people that the status quo is natural, unchangeable and the best of all possible worlds.

Canadian society is run by the small minority of the people (the capitalist class) who own and control the industries and finances in the interests of profit.

It is directly in their interests to have people accept the status quo. The university plays a vital role in transmitting the ideas and values of those who run society — bourgeois ideology; its function is the maintenance of the present system.

Thus, my membership in the Worker-Student Alliance and my participation in the Sociology Radical Caucus, which has been organizing left caucuses in several sociology courses, was seen as a direct threat to the role of the university and the sociology department.

The Worker-Student Alliance has been actively criticizing the content of status quo, bourgeois social science at the U of T. Only by organizing, especially on the classroom level, can students challenge the ideology they are taught and gain a critical understanding of the world around them.

At the same time, since it is the function of the university in society that determines the kind of university we have, we are trying to build a movement for social change by forging a fighting alliance of workers and students.

Voting with Georgie

Keep it to a whisper

By GEORGIE RUSSELL

You can vote on the Canadian Union of Students Thursday, but you can't talk about it. If you do, you may have to vote on CUS again.

The referendum is being run under the same rules as an SAC presidential election, and according to SAC elections committee chairman Ceta Ramkhalawansingh, the rules prohibit any form of campaigning on the day of balloting.

Included among the prohibitions is an injunction against any student advising other students on how to mark their ballots.

"If someone came up to you and said "vote no on CUS," that would technically invalidate the referendum," Miss Ramkhalawansingh said. She added that the rules were "ridiculous."

"Like, if the anti-CUS people got the Lady Godiva Memorial Band out and disrupted the campus a little, we'd have to discount all the anti-CUS votes."

"It's really bullshit," she said. "I just brought it up now, but the executive of SAC didn't see it that way."

The only campaign material allowed Thursday, she said, would be posters tacked up during the week — as long as they are not within 50 feet of the pools.

'Great, I guess'

Reaction to new program varied

By JANE HOLLINGWORTH

"The new program means academic freedom. But with the core program, it's just the same as before if you want a specialist degree", says Craig Copeland (II VIC).

After a month of the new program, a random sampling of student opinion indicates it ranges from disenchantment to "great, I guess".

First year students, asked to describe their program, invariably said "What new program?" and "You're not quoting me, are you?"

One added, "I like being able to choose what I take but what if I don't have the prerequisites for my second year choices?"

Another explained it as "just general arts, really".

Second and third year general students — liberated this year by the new program — were hardly enthusiastic about its effect.

One who would "rather not be quoted" said, "I just took what I would have otherwise — it was easier that way".

Some named specific improvements as hope for the new program's future possibilities.

Bob Ransom (III VIC) said, "The political science department has probably best set up the new program. This year there were 25 poli sci courses for which I had the right qualifications."

In limbo, waiting for the program to catch up with them next year is the way third year Modern History students feel.

Romana Nothdurft (III VIC) said, "I just wish someone would tell me what's going on. It means an extra course in fourth year."

Forestry and engineering students, with no new program, are disinterested. "What new program? We have to take the same old crap no matter what. Big choice — Transportation Systems or Plant Physiology" said Peter Cox (III Forestry).

Limited choice was the biggest beef among the old program group. Lloyd Chioti (III APSC) said "I still have only one choice of options — my Arts subject."

English Language and Literature, one course "unique in its concentration", disappears under the new program. Feelings among E Land L students vary on its demise. Bruce Whittlesea (IIVIC) said "I really don't think you should disturb the system."

Some English students said the restricted options and "the day-to-day grind" made it too much like "extended high school."

College English departments are now deciding final exam policy.

Said one Vic English instructor "Because of the changeover this is a confusing year with people operating under varied regulations. Any 'opt-out provision' for exams will involve more administrative work and chaos somewhere."

Registrars handle computers, rainbows

By ANDY SOS

When the Macpherson Report's recommendations created the New Program in Arts and Sciences this year, they also created much more work for Registrars' offices around the University.

But despite the increased workload, hassles with the computer, and the greater number of course changes made by students, the Registrars still seem to have favorable reactions to the New Program.

As R.L. Cummins, Registrar of Trinity College, said, "Administratively it's a lot of work", but added, this fact should be "secondary to academic considerations."

"This year there was much more shopping around and this is a good thing," said Innis College Registrar, D.B. King.

Because of this, he thought, students had a chance to investigate more of their courses and as a result there were some drastic changes in programs, like switches from all sciences to all arts

MORE COUNSELLING

The wider choices offered to students necessitated many more hours of counselling, according to J.J. Rae of Erindale.

In some cases, he said, students chose irresponsibly without considering requirements.

Fortunately, with the New Program they can make up for this in later years.

St. Michael's Registrar Father H.V. Malton thinks the students should be happier with this New Program because they now have enough latitude to choose the courses that satisfy them the most.

Working with the computer for the first time was also a problem, says A.C.M. Ross of Victoria College.

A RAINBOW OF PAPER

Especially troublesome were the myriad forms in many colours (featuring green, white and goldenrod) that had to be filled out.

New College's Registrar F.A. Hare, upon hearing that three other Registrars had been consulted, refused to comment.

He said, "It is good enough for you to use the opinions of the Registrars of two or three bigger colleges."

Although it is still too early to judge conclusively, the general consensus among the registrars is that the New Program is successful in giving students a greater freedom and, hence, a greater satisfaction in their choice of courses.

VOL. 1 — NO. 1 — OCTOBER 20-24 independent national newsmagazine

"Prepared?... Certainly! In fact we administrators are waiting eagerly for the next demonstration."

● Exploitation and discrimination in the Alberta beet fields page 4-5

● Quebec page 7

● Beauty and the Beast — politics of youth in Britain page 8

NATIONAL SUPPLEMENT

This is the first issue of the new National Supplement. We hope you like it.

We're not completely happy with our first issue, but we hope to improve as we get established. We are damned well pleased though that we manage to get the thing off the ground against what at times looked like nearly impossible odds.

For this first issue something like 100,000 copies will be distributed across the country as inserts in the 15 subscribing papers. We are pleased to see that most of the larger student papers have subscribed, but somewhat disappointed in the response from the smaller papers. When we originally conceived of the supplement we thought it could be of most service to the smaller papers, particularly in the supply of feature articles.

We don't like the name "National Supplement" either, but couldn't come up with anything else so we decided to use it, at least for the first edition. We hope to have a better one next time around and welcome suggestions from our readers.

The paper will appear every two weeks. It is published jointly by CUP and CUS but editorial content is independent of both organizations. Editorial control is vested in an editorial board made up of two from CUP, two from CUS and two non-CUS-CUP types. We think that this set up will lead to the production of a better, more flexible paper. Direct editorial control by the publishing organizations could lead to the paper becoming little more than an inward looking house organ.

Contributions — letters, articles, photos, cartoons and artwork — are always appreciated as are comments, criticisms and suggestions.

In this edition...

We would like to draw particular attention to the piece on Quebec. Take away the cops and you have open class warfare, with guns, (page 7) by our Quebec correspondent Tom S. Brown. The editors of the National Supplement feel it is a particularly informative and well-written piece of journalism.

Beauty and the Beast: The Politics of Youth and Class in Britain, (page 8) is a close look at some of the more recent social phenomena among British youth. Few people in North America are aware of the existence of the skinheads and, as London correspondent Robert Tressler reports, it is only recently that the British press has begun to report on them.

CUP Bureau Chief George Russell surveys the state of tolerance of protest and free speech in the article Repression on Campus, (page 6) and A. Anzwe takes a few broad swings at the chief oppressors on the Simon Fraser campus in Strike Continues at Simon Fraser (page 6).

The plight of Indian agricultural workers is reported upon by John Ferguson and Barry Lipton in the Prairie Fire in the centrefold spread Discrimination and Exploitation in the Alberta Beeffields. Subscriptions to the Prairie Fire, Regina's opposition press go for $8 (one year — fifty-two issues). Write: The Regina Community Media Project, 2640 Angus Blvd., Regina, Sask.

Hagos Yesus, of the Ethiopian Students Association, makes a plea for support from Canadian Students in Repression in Ethiopia (page 6). He will soon leave on a cross Canada speaking tour, so watch for him on your campus.

In future editions...

Some of the upcoming articles in the National Supplement are: Politics in British Columbia, a close look at the turbulent political scene on the west coast and the implications of the recent election.

Women's Liberation, a Canadian look at the growing women's liberation movement, what it's doing and what it's thinking.

Apartheid in South Africa, a report on the social, political, and economic effects of apartheid in the Cape.

The Mid-Canada Corridor, an in-depth examination of corporate plans for the future exploitation of Canadian natural resources.

Canada's Economic Situation, a report on the present state of the Canadian economy and trends for the future: boom or bust?

The Political Economy of the Atlantic Provinces, a report on the politics and economy of the Maritimes and an examination of the root causes for slack in the Atlantic economy. Part of a series on regional problems in Canada.

And many, many more features and articles.

CYC — Scapegoat

MONTREAL — The shaky administration of Mayor Jean Orapeau is trying to use the Company of Young Canadians as a scapegoat to pull itself through the plethora of criticism it finds itself facing in the wake of the Montreal police strike. Using all the familiar McCarthyite tricks of half-truths, innuendo, red scares and "fact-filled" never-made-public secret documents, Drapeau and his executive secretary Lucien Saulnier hope to convince the people of Quebec that recent disorders in Montreal result not from the bungling of their regime, but from the activities of CYC "agitators."

Support for PSA

VANCOUVER — The student council at the University of British Columbia unanimously threw its support behind Simon Fraser University's PSA department, and condemned the SFU administration for trying to impose a "uniform and monolithic education environment at SFU."

Several faculty members at UBC departments of political science, sociology, and anthropology have also added their support to the PSA department.

EDMONTON — The University of Alberta political science department publicly condemned the administration of Simon Fraser University and voted to boycott SFU at both the faculty and student level until the administration lifts the suspensions and halts dismissal proceedings against nine striking faculty in SFU's PSA department.

The U. of A. department called on the Canadian Association of University Teachers to support the two-week old PSA strike, and asked that the SFU administration enter into immediate negotiations with the department "for a resolution of the problem on the basis of the continued operation of the PSA department as a democratic department working in the interest of the university community and the community as a whole."

The U of A department granted support to PSA by a vote of 18 to 3; the faculty committee is composed of 23 faculty, four graduate, and four undergraduate students.

CPUO report under attack

OTTAWA — The report of the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario on "Order on the Campus" has been getting its lumps all over Ontario since its release Sept. 18. Students at Toronto, York, Waterloo, and Carleton have demanded that their individual university presidents repudiate the report defended by them as "just a working paper."

Most of the Ontario presidents, when confronted, have said that the CPUO document will not form the basis for new disciplinary codes and structures at individual campuses.

SDS Weatherman faction fight Chicago police.

CHICAGO — A smaller-than-anticipated force of about three to four hundred members of the Weatherman faction of the American SDS took part in their four-day "Bring the War Home" demonstration this month in Chicago. They battled Chicago police in a number of street fights that resulted in numerous injuries to both police and Weathermen. Police made 290 arrests and there were still 150 demonstrators in Chicago's Cook County jail several days after the demonstrations. Total bail bonds are expected to run to over $2 million. The Weathermen, who take their name from the line "you don't have to be a weatherman to know which way the wind blows," in Bob Dylan's song "Subterranean Homesick Blues," have been severely criticised by most of the North American left for their "adventuristic" and "infantile" tactics.

Welfare protests in America the beautiful

NEW YORK — Welfare budgets in many US states were cut to the bone and further this summer and now the poor people are cutting back. Led by the National Welfare Rights Organization, a union with a national membership of over 70,000, welfare recipients have participated in hundreds of demonstrations in a score of major U.S. cities.

By mid-September about 70,000 children were boycotting New York schools, and 600 mothers and children had been arrested in actions at over 30 welfare centres.

Demands are that allowances for children's clothing and schoolbooks be restored, and that free meal programs be inaugurated in schools.

In Madison Wisconsin, welfare demonstrators aided by students seized the state assembly building Sept. 29, holding it for 11 hours before peacefully withdrawing.

Ahmed Evans

CLEVELAND — Black nationalist Ahmed Evans, scheduled to die in the electric chair in Ohio Penitentiary Sept. 23, was granted a stay of execution when his lawyer Stanley Tolliver filed an appeal.

Major rallies were held in New York and Cleveland on Sept. 20, in support of Evans. Petition campaigns urging authorities to spare his life have been carried on in New York, Cleveland, Detroit, and Milwaukee, and in at least six Ohio cities.

Repression on Campus

by George Russell

The 1969-70 academic year is barely six weeks old, but it's already shaping up to be a bad one for thinking about holding a weenie-bake in your local university computing centre. In fact, it may be a bad one for holding up your hand in class.

Traumatized by the horrific events at Sir George Williams University last year (the trials of eighty-plus defendants, charged with conspiracy to commit arson and various other indictable offenses, begins in early November), and perhaps more than a little overcome by American late-night newscasts, Canadian university administrators have already made it abundantly clear that the crypto-fascists of the student left will not be allowed to carry on their shennanigans unhindered during the current school term.

In short, peace, order and good government have become the words of the day in Canadian universities, and codes of discipline, judicial procedures and student-faculty disciplinary committees (at the more liberal campuses, with student parity) are being created just as fast as political science departments can spare the men to write them.

Students barely had a chance to pick the price tags off their textbooks this September, before the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario issued — "a bit prematurely," as a CPUO official delicately put it — a working paper entitled Order on Campus; a document designed to help university administrations come to terms with the knotty problems of unacceptable dissent and what to do about it on their campus.

Culled largely from a similar document issued at Harvard (no-one has seen fit to pick up on this particular example of the American influence on our universities except the Canadian Union of Students, which can be counted on to pick up almost anything), the CPUO working paper says basically that all of this stuff has got to stop.

"This stuff" is then outlined in four trenchant pages: in effect, every form of dissent except informational picketing. And maybe not even that: one category of verboten activity is "obstruction of the normal processes and activities essential to the functions of the university community."

As released to the press, the document unfortunately fails to include the appendix listing the normal processes and activities essential to the functions of the university community (it would have been mandatory in a Master's thesis); presumably they will be discovered by the trial and error method.

The CPUO official was probably right in his assessment of the timing of the release: students and faculty from the right, left and centre raised some sort of howl on virtually every one of the 14 Ontario campuses affected by the document, and at the University of Toronto the scuffle over the document nearly boiled over into a full-scale showdown between the Students Administrative Council and affable, aristocratic administration president Claude Bissell, long considered the Clark Kerr of the Canadian university scene (Bissell, a long-time friend of Kerr's, and mediator-in-chief at Canada's closest approximation to a multiversity, reportedly even likes the comparison himself).

As luck would have it, the show-down at Toronto turned out to be as anti-climactic as the resolution of a Mary Worth comic strip: Bissell didn't lose, he thinks, but he didn't win either, the students think.

Instead, Bissell announced that U of T already had its own disciplinary guidelines in the works, and wouldn't use the CPUO document as a guideline for anything. He didn't exactly say he denounced it, though, and the Toronto SAC was left with more than the niggling suspicion that, somehow, they hadn't achieved quite what they wanted.

Relieved students, led by engineering faculty and students who had been given the day off from classes to listen to Bissell, gave the president a standing ovation and sent him away from the meeting with choruses of "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow."

And it was all so exciting that no-one got around to discussing why Order on Campus was written in the first place.

No-where near the same fuss was raised either by or about the situation at Sir George Williams University, where law and order wasn't just proposed: it was laid down with a vengeance, no questions asked, no answers given.

The first order of business at Sir George this year was to lay on the discipline code to end all discipline codes; students must show their identification on demand; no circulation of unsigned leaflets, etc. on the one-building campus; and "every student who fails to submit to the jurisdiction of this code of Student Behaviour is guilty of an offence and is liable (i) to be suspended from the University, or (ii) to be expelled from the University."

So far, no-one at Sir George has raised a peep — or at least a publicized peep — presumably because according to the above-mentioned clause, it's against the law.

Apparently the trauma of Sir George still hangs too heavily on the rest of the country for students, faculty or anyone to do more than pretend the university ceased to exist alongside the late-lamented computer. No-one talks about the place in the present tense, no-one wants to know what is going on there.

And besides, the argument runs, no-one complains about rules except those who want to break them.

This particular train of logic extends beyond the silence at Sir George; in fact, it forms the first and last line of defence by Ontario administrators who discovered their students weren't quite as psychologically well-prepared for law and order as the students at Sir George.

Perhaps because they hadn't done anything to provide the slightest reason for such a code, perhaps because they were still faintly curious as to the nature of the "normal processes and activities essential to the functions of the university community" which the CPUO paper set out to defend.

"The only people who have cause for complaint against the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario for circulating a working paper on Order on Campus are those people who are planning disorder on the campus," thundered Douglas Fisher and Harry Crowe columnists in John Bassett's Toronto Telegram.

Fisher, politician-turned-pundit, is a former member of parliament for the New Democratic Party, former CBC commentator, critic of Canadian complicity in Vietnam... left-wing credentials as long as your arm.

Crowe, by happenstance, is a dean at Toronto's York University, which is adjudged to be a pretty liberal place. If they've had it with students, then everybody has had it with students.

And when they say that everyone who is against discipline codes is against discipline, well...

Their logic is becoming more familiar this year, on campuses across the country, its consistency only questioned in the odd philosophy tutorial.

At the University of Alberta, administrators brought down a proposal for a disciplinary body very similar in operation to both Sir George and the CPUO paper, with equally hazy guidelines. Their proposal, too, was pushed through to protect freedom in the university.

Freedom at the University of Alberta had such a high priority that tentative approval of the plan couldn't even wait for the students who were supposed to help in preparing the document. They noted plaintively at a somewhat later date that they hadn't had a chance to even read the proposal before it was passed.

They also said they weren't informed of the meeting where the plan was adopted. And when Steve Hardy, one of the two students sitting on the drafting committee, finally got his hands on a copy of the discipline proposal he noted dubiously that it "gave a great deal of power over the lives of students" to a new judicial body. It could, among other things, try a student twice for the same offence and expell him before he even got to see his judges.

At last report, no-one was even seen smoking in the immediate vicinity of the U of A computer.

The general tenor of the disciplinary codes which have come down during the 1969-70 year is relatively clear: in the broadest possible terms, students and faculty can talk about the university, but they can't do anything about it. And when questions are raised about the validity of such rules, the questioners must provide the burden of proof that they are not the match-wielding agents of a foreign power, or, worse, yet, flag-waving anarchists who can't even buy Canadian wheat.

"Doing" equals "destroying." Questioning "equals" secretly wanting to destroy.

Sir George Williams makes a far more convenient example for such an argument than, say Simon Fraser University, which is currently providing some degree of embarrassment to its own administrators.

Students and faculty in the SFU department of political science, sociology and anthropology were engaged in the most blatant disruption of the normal processes of the university that had been seen in Canada.

As the Toronto Star (not quite the Peking Review of Canadian journalism) described it:

"In 1968, the PSA faculty decided to give students a fully equal role in decisions. Although the university faculty had overwhelmingly endorsed a motion giving each department the right to democratically run its affairs, faculty and administration began to have second thoughts as PSA became an example for students from other departments and other universities.

"The election system for head of department was bringing more junior professors to positions of influence; tenure was sometimes being recommended for good teaching as well as for publishing; and there was even talk of the secretarial staff of the department having some role in decisions. All too much for an uneasy administration facing political pressure from a right-wing provincial government."

PSA, of course, is now on strike; nine faculty have been suspended for "coercion" — they didn't teach their regular classes, using administration-approved course material.

The Toronto Star, it's mind back on other things, did little more than issue an editorial of regret concerning the seemingly-fated smashing of the PSA department. Somehow, the Star failed to note the similarity between the rhetoric of SFU administration president Kenneth Strand and the rhetoric of the CPUO report.

And in the meantime, the Star completely endorsed the CPUO document, because, of course, anybody who objects to rules is obviously someone who wants to break them.

Under the circumstances, the editors implied, it's difficult to understand how anyone could look at it any other way.

Exploitation and Discrimination

John Ferguson, a school teacher and former employee of the Indian Affairs Branch now working with the Board for Basic Education in Regina and Barry Lipton a reporter for The Prairie Fire, Regina's opposition press, recently travelled to the beet fields of southern Alberta to investigate rumours of exploitation of and discriminatory and unfair treatment of Indian agricultural labourers. Here is their report.

Calgary, symbol of the big west where oil meets beef, is one of the most affluent and fastest growing cities in Canada.

It bustles with new industries, housing developments and high rise apartments. The downtown shopping and entertainment core, centered on the Palliser square and the brazen pretentiousness of the new Husky Tower, has been virtually rebuilt over the past ten years.

Driving south from Calgary you pass through an idyllic countryside of small ranches set back from the highway, nestled in the foot hills. The further south you go the more the land flattens out until finally it becomes as flat as the Regina plains and fields of sugar beets appear on either side of the highway.

"I started working when I was six and I don't like it."

The Taber, Lethbridge, Picture Butte area of Southern Alberta is where sugar beets are grown. They grow in low straight rows in irrigated fields, and growing them takes a lot of hard hand labour, hoeing between the rows to keep the weeds down. Most of the people hired to do this work are Indians.

We spent a week in this area living and talking with the Indian beet workers.

We lived in a "Beet Shack" with an Indian family, a very old house with many of the windows and walls broken, an average home for the beet workers. There was no water and no refrigerator. Plumbing was primitive: an outdoor privy. The shack had electricity, a luxury which many others did not have.

The Indians, most of whom come to the area from long distances and live there during the growing season, make their living doing hand hoeing in the fields. It's hard, back-breaking work beneath the hot prairie sun, yet women and children as young as six or seven take part.

There are three different hoeings during the beet growing season.

The first involves weeding and thinning (the beets have to be ten to twelve inches apart) and pays seventeen to thirty-five dollars per acre. This is the most difficult hoeing.

The second, which is simple weeding, pays nine to fifteen dollars per acre.

The third hoeing, the final operation, is a light weeding which pays three dollars per acre. This year the third hoeing was not done due to the lateness of the season.

We found the range in pay, the difference between the top and bottom rate for any of the operations, is due to two factors — the dirtiness (weediness) of the fields and the color of the workers' skin. Indians are paid less than whites.

We talked to David Courtoreille, an Indian beet worker, and asked him if he thought racism affected the wages he was paid. To answer he spoke of a recent experience of his with a beet farmer.

"Well, he had twelve Hungarian workers there. Now he paid them thirty-two dollars an acre. Then I was supposed to do second hoeing and I got only three dollars an acre. The second hoeing is normally worth nine dollars an acre. Supposing if we did the first hoeing on his piece, we'd only get twelve dollars an acre, we Indians," he said.

In a different setting we talked to Steve Rostic, a white field worker.

"We (white field workers) get twenty-five dollars an acre on first hoeing and ten or eleven dollars for second hoeing," he told us.

According to these figures white workers get seven dollars more per acre for first hoeing than do Indian workers and one or two dollars more per acre for the second hoeing.

Many Indians claimed to have been short-changed on acreage and deductions when they were payed-off.

Three Indian families spoke of the poor treatment they received from one farmer. They said they had been "contracted" to hoe beets for the farmer. Under a "contract" there is an understanding that the man who does the first hoeing will also do the second and third.

After the families completed the first hoeing — the hardest one — the farmer refused to let them do the easier second and third. He claimed they did a poor job on the first hoeing and deducted three dollars an acre from their pay.

Many of the Indians of Lethbridge claim that they have been involved in similar incidents and can do nothing about it because they have no place to turn to for aid.

We talked to a group of Indian field workers and asked them if they had been short-changed, in their pay-cheques or knew of people who had been. David Courtoreille answered first.

"Yes, I've seen a lot of that cheating," he said. And a lotta poor Indians got that too — they don't know the difference. A lotta these farmers, you know, they think the Indians are dumb.

"But the Indians won't say nothin'. You know, they won't even talk about it. And yet I see a lotta them said — Well, they got beat — you know a lot of them got beat. I know that myself.

"What I think it's because is a lot of them can't read or write, you know.

If anybody was here to look after those Indians ... The field men, what the heck, they are sitting over there and none come around. They don't even measure our fields. I betcha we got beat on that too."

The "Field men" he referred to are employees of the sugar factories whose job it is to measure the fields and see that the beets are grown under the conditions specified by the company. The beets are grown by the farmers under contract with the sugar mill. If the farmer does not meet the terms of the contract related to growing conditions the mill will not buy his crop.

David Courtoreille continued.

"A lotta times I know darn well the Indians are getting beat on the acreage. When we get heat there is nothing we can do. What could we do unless they come around and check. The Indians are timid, you know. They are timid, that's the reason they get beat.

"If they only knew, you know, if they only knew, that would be different."

Then Clarence Miller, another Indian field worker joined in.

"They really try to beat us, you know," he said. "This last place I worked for, me and my brother-in-law Mosy Swan, me and my wife and his wife, we done second hoeing there and we all finished, you know.

"When a man is hurt in the fields, we do it for that. Even if we were to die in the fields, we do it."

"All of a sudden we said we were finished, so he walked through the field and he seen a few weeds, you know, in between the rows like, you know, where he is supposed to cultivate. He says, No, we are not going to pay you until you do a better job." So me and my brother-in-law went up to Picture Butte and we talked to the field man like and told him to come down here."

David Courtoreille broke in. "... that's his (the farmers) friend, you know. We got no chance whatsoever. The field man is right in with the beet farmer. They helps them more than we could get any help out of them.

"There's a lot of Indians that can't read or write down here. All they talk is Cree and Chippeweyan and a lot of them don't even read or write — they can't even spell their name or nothin'.

"They pay them out in cash and lord knows what happens them. They don't give a written statement. I know myself I got beat, even on the labour. I still didn't get my payment from this spring..."

"Some of these Indians when they're finished their beets, the boss that owns the place, well they say, 'Okay, here is fifty dollars and that's it.' You know now they, the Indians, don't realize what is going on. They don't even know how much money they got coming." Clarence Miller said.

ion in the Alberta Beet Fields

"The biggest problem with the beets," he continued, "is that one year they measure out a field, then if the same person works on it next year, like they expect it to be the same length and then they, the farmers, they do about four of five rows more, you know, and do more beets along side, a little bit, you know, lengthen the rows. Then they expect the Indians to accept the same amount of payment."

The Indians also complain that

Workmen's Compensation doesn't even pay beet fields they wouldn't do nothin' about

They are not eligible for unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation.

"I can't understand why we don't get unemployment insurance," John Courtoreille said. "We work by the families with all the kids, but we don't get a cent of unemployment insurance or stamps. We don't get nothing."

"We just have to try hard to make out a living. By the time we're finished on those beets we got nothin' coming."

"When a man is hurt in the fields. Workmen's Compensation doesn't even pay for that. Even if we were to die in the beet fields they wouldn't do nothin' about it," David Courtoreille added.

Housing is supposed to be supplied free to the field workers by the farmer they are working for.

A "Letter of Instruction and Information, Sugar Beet and Vegetable Industry Workers, Season 1969-1970" put out by Canada Manpower and distributed to the beet-field workers contains this promise:

"Houses are supplied free and vary in size from 2 to 6 rooms, depending usually on the acres of sugar beets and the number of workers required to handle the contract. Houses are equipped with stoves, beds, and mattresses. Water is hauled if necessary, by the farmer, free of charge."

That wasn't quite the way we found things.

Living conditions for most beet workers are very poor. Almost all of the buildings provided by the farmers for them to live in are shacks, converted graneries and chicken coops. Many of them have only dirt floors and none have plumbing facilities or easy access to water.

None have refrigerators or storage areas for fresh produce. As a result the beet workers' families live on canned goods for the two to three months they work the fields.

We found the wages paid to those supplied with housing amounted to two to three dollars less per acre than those finding their own accommodation off the farm. This works out to a "rent" of two to three hundred dollars, quite a sum to be paying for a converted chicken coop.

"I don't pay rent like, but what they promised I never did get that. The difference for not living on the farm is two to five dollars more. I'd say it would cost about two hundred dollars for a hundred acre contract to live on the farm," David Courtoreille said.

Child labour is another feature of sugar beet work. Most of the Indian families have small children who work side-by-side with their parents in the beet fields. Most of the Indians don't like the idea of their children working in the beet fields, especially the younger ones of six or seven, but feel they have no choice if the family is going to feed and clothe itself. The beetgrowers cynically exploit the situation as a device to obtain cheap labour.

"I have three children under eight working in the fields," John Courtoreille told us.

His son David said, "I started working when I was six and I don't like it."

We asked the beet workers if they thought a union would make things better for them. Most thought it would.

"If we had a union the first thing I would want them to do would be to raise the price on beets and then pay unemployment insurance. Oh, I think we'd live better if they had to pay all the same like white people. We work harder than white people and we still don't make the money we should," David Courtoreille told us.

One of the most unsavory aspects of the situation the beet workers find themselves in is that they are recruited for work in the fields under conditions of compulsory or forced labour. At least two federal government agencies and the welfare departments of two provincial governments (Alberta and Saskatchewan) are complicit in this process.

Canada Manpower working in co-operation with the Federal Department of Indian Affairs recruits the Indians for work in the sugar beet fields from as far away as Northern Saskatchewan.

And "co-operate" the Indian Affairs Branch does:

"The Indian Affairs Branch has the policy of stopping welfare payments during the summer, for all reserve members but those on permanent welfare. The result of this policy is that reserve members must leave the reserve during the summer months to find work. We asked reserve members who were working in the sugar beet fields in Southern Alberta concerning the summer work opportunities available to them. Eighty-five percent of the beet workers interviewed reported that they had tried to find work near the reserve but that none was available. These same men all said that they would prefer to work on or near the reserve. We noted earlier in this section that there are almost no jobs in the area surrounding the reserve either in the winter or in the summer. The majority of the people have no alternative in the summer but to travel to where there are jobs available, making use of the skills or lack of skills they can offer."

— Morton Newman, For the Human Resources Research and Development Executive Council.

The Alberta and Saskatchewan

This state provides a service to the beet growers — abundant, cheap labour.

But the state provides few services for the Indians. Although they are recruited by Canada Manpower, they are not even eligible for unemployment insurance.

It's over thirty years since John Steinbeck wrote The Grapes of Wrath, his classic tale of life for migratory workers in the great depression. Since then men have landed on the moon and there's a lot of talk about the "affluent society" but the Indians of the Alberta beet fields live in conditions worse than those described by Steinbeck.

The agencies of the federal government and two provincial governments contribute to the situation that denies these people a decent human life, basic human dignity, yet we do nothing about it.

We're pretty smug when we condemn the Americans for the way they treat Blacks or the way they exploit the grape pickers. But what about the Indians and what about the beet fields?

Will anybody do anything about it? We doubt it.

Things will only change when the Indians organize and force a change. They might even have to arm them-

"We just have to try hard to make out a living. By the time we're finished on those beets we got nothin' coming."

government welfare agencies do their share by cutting off payments to non-treaty Indian and Metis.

Then the buses cruise the Indian communities, waiting to take them to work in the Alberta beet fields for little pay and poor working and living conditions.

Our society destroys the ability of the Indian society to support itself, makes the Indian society dependent upon welfare handouts, then cuts the welfare off in the beet season, forcing the Indians to go to work for low pay.

themselves to do it. Who knows? They'd certainly be justified.

But then, of course, the actions of the Indians working in the Alberta beet fields would become headline stories. Not stories about the plight of their life, but stories about law and order and anarchy. Nobody would ask why the Indians were driven to such extreme measures. The papers and the good, solid, white citizens would only demand that order be restored and the guilty be punished.

Strike continues at S.F.U.

The strategy being pursued by SFU's striking PSA Department appears to be succeeding.

The goal of the department, on strike since September 24th, was to build support for the strike and to spread it into the other departments. To date, students in English, History and Philosophy Departments have gone out on strike.

The Departments Modern Languages, Psychology, Geography, Biology and Economics and Commerce have taken a stand in favour of some or all PSA demands. The Teaching Assistant's Union has requested its members to observe all picket lines.

Even the Alumni Association has called for the removal of the trusteeship imposed on the Department last summer.

In order to gain support rather than antagonize students, picketing has been solely informational with no attempt to block students who wished to attend regular classes. Some faculty in English and History have respected the picket lines as have many T.A.'s.

Guerilla stunts such as a visit by 50 English students to the administration building to exorcise the demon Strand combined with regular strike meetings and some counter courses have served to attract students away from regular classes. Nevertheless, for at least 60% of the students the story is classes as usual. While in PSA the strike is 90% effective - in science it has made little impact.

Five scab faculty continue to teach in PSA:

Herbert Adams, a German sociologist, who claims he used to run with the German SDS and has been running scared ever since.

Donald Barnett, 'hard-line' revolutionary who wrote Mau Mau From Within and spent time with the Angolan guerilla's, who believes that student protest is petit bourgeois thrill seeking and that the role of revolutionaries in "advanced Capitalist societies" is to send care packages to revolutionaries abroad - a viewpoint that was sufficiently subversive to ensure him normal renewal.

A.H. Somjee, another self-professed socialist who led the battle against the department "radicals", represents a combination of British colonialism in Indian and British fabianism at the London School of Economics.

Gary Rush is an empirical sociologist, and like most empiricists cannot decide which side he is on, so while weighing the evidence he ends up with the forces of law and order.

Finally, there's R.W. Wyllie, voted by the other four scabs as new department chairman. With only a B.A. degree, Wyllie could never afford to take chances but this is one he's not going to miss. His first act was to set the wheels in motion to hire the striking T.A.'s.

The administration's strategy has been diverse. They have suspended the striking faculty and initiated dismissal proceedings. At the same time they have cancelled those PSA courses in which both T.A.'s and faculty are on strike.

New courses are being opened with Economics Commerce, and the Science faculties eagerly competing for the not too eager PSA students.

Strand who has never been particularly worried about the niceties of procedure also terminated the voting privileges of the Suspended PSA faculty although under the academic freedom and tenure brief he has no authority to do so. That move enabled the PSA scab faculty to meet together off campus and elect a new "chairman" and also reduces the anti-Strand, anti-Dean of Arts, Sullivan, vote in the joint faculty and the Faculty of Arts.

Joint faculty met on the 9th, over two weeks after the strike started, its first motion was to exclude students who as the movers of the motion anticipated refused to leave. This then gave them the opportunity to adjourn joint faculty.

The leading mandarins are reported to be circulating a motion of confidence in Strand to be placed in secret ballot. The absence of debate is characteristic of the manoeuvrings of Strand's top administration. If all the facts are against you its not such a bad tactic.

For the waverers the administration has daily releases about suspensions for faculty who support the strike and injunctions for anyone who pickets.

Strivastava, the academic - vice president, is regularly on the picket lines taking photos. Indeed, there are so many cameramen it is difficult to know who are the real cops and who are the administrators playing cop - some would argue it is purely a philosophical point.

Amateur photographers however would be advised to stay clear, Hugh McKintosh, photographer for The Peak, the student newspaper, suffered a broken collar-bone while attempting to photograph in front of the locked administration building. He is charging Fred Hope, head of Security for the University, with assault.

The success of the strike continues to hinge on creating a broad enough body of support for it at SFU. Most students support the demands but to move from that to actually doing something about it is a jump in consciousness many are slow to make.

Students find it hard to understand how Strand the "reformer" who emerged from the Canadian Association of University Teachers censure, can now be playing a lead role in the current purge. Many also find it hard to conceive of a winning strategy in a province controlled by a reactionary Social Credit government which has shown no reluctance in using police and the courts against militant labour or student actions in the past.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers, whose censure of Simon Fraser University in the summer of '68 at the request of the SFU faculty association president Okuda, resulted in Strand's election as president - has adopted a hands-off posture.

Having created the monster which is now devouring SFU far more voraciously than McTaggart-Cowan ever did, the CAUT continues to follow the lead of the SFU faculty association whose president Milton McLaren has for a long time inter - mixed biology with vitriolic attacks on PSA and "radicals" in his lower level lectures.

For his efforts Okuda becomes perhaps the least published faculty member at SFU to gain tenure.

Support from other campuses both financially and verbally has been coming in and has provided some of the resources for hiring speaking equipment, etc. and putting out a newspaper.

The administration has closed all university facilities to the strikers who even had to provide their own generator to hold an on-campus dance.

The outcome of the current conflict at SFU is of great importance for the future development of higher education in Canada. If reactionaries succeed in breaking student parity and experiments in democratization at Simon Fraser, the resistance to reform elsewhere will increase.

An Appeal

Repression in Ethiopia

To the outside world Ethiopia is portrayed as an idyllic country with a glorious tradition. In truth, the celebrated Ethiopian independence of three thousand years is nothing more than the most unmitigated feudal tyranny. Beneath the image of picturesque medievalism of kings and queens lies the overwhelming reality of misery, famine, terror and death of the toiling peasantry.

It is this ungodly story of unbounded oppression and exploitation of the vast majority of Ethiopians that must be told. For too long now this brutal reality has been systematically hidden from the public eye of the world outside.

What then are the facts of existence in Ethiopia today? Here are a few:

Tyranny from Within

1. To begin with, Ethiopia is one of the largest countries in the world, having an area of nearly half a million square miles and a population of more than 25 million. By all accounts, Ethiopia is also one of the richest countries in the world (potentially, that is), blessed with fertile soil and abundant rainfall.
2. Ninety per cent of the land is owned and controlled by the COPTIC Church and the feudal nobility. More than 90% of the population are peasants and are landless serfs. These peasant masses are today obliged by law to surrender 75% of their meager produce to the landlords. In addition, they must perform innumerable "personal services" and "specialized" taxes such as the "education tax" and "national defense tax" from which they receive no benefits.
3. More than 95% of the people are illiterate. Of the more than 8 million children of school age, less than 4% attend school. Of this group, the majority are concentrated in the earliest primary grades. By the time they would have been eligible for secondary school, most have been siphoned off as "drop-outs". Only a tiny fraction ever see the inside of a college. In the case of girls, the numbers descend in geometric proportions.

4. The average annual per capita income is $40 or less. The average wage (for those lucky enough to find jobs) is 40c for a ten-hour work day; unemployment is among the highest anywhere in the world.
5. Average life expectancy is 35 years. Between 50 and 60 per cent of babies born die before they reach the age of two; maternal mortality is also among the highest in the world. In addition, hundreds of thousands die every year from malaria, starvation, tuberculosis, typhus, etc. To serve the health needs of 25 million people, there are only 324 doctors in the entire country.
6. There are more prisons and concentration camps than schools. Most of the prisoners are "political offenders". A large number of them are students and youths. Hundreds of dissenters are rounded up, tortured and murdered every year.
7. Whole villages and districts are bombed and napalmed whenever peasant uprisings occur, as in the provinces of Eritrea, Gogjam and Bale.
8. Emperor Haile Selassie and the oligarchy rule by "divine right" at once absolute and barbaric. No political parties are allowed; no freedom of press, of assembly, of speech, of movement. No more than 5 persons can assemble "for political purposes" without the written permission from the Minister of Interior.

Domination from Without

1. The United States maintains the largest military base in Africa on Ethiopian soil, manned by more than 10,000 G.I.s. The United States trains, equips and controls the army, the air force and the navy. The CIA trains and equips the "internal security forces". The U.S. government supports and sustains the feudal regime of Haile Selassie with millions of dollars every year. It trains counter-insurgency forces at Fort Bragg, North Carolina, destined for Ethiopia.
2. Through its "Peace" Corps, AID and others similar outfits, the United States virtually controls the entire educational system.

3. U.S. companies and their affiliates control the main arteries of the national economy. More than 200 such companies hold a decisive monopoly.

For these reasons, the U.S. government is now actively collaborating in the suppression of peasant uprisings in the countryside and student agitation in the cities and towns. In December, 1960, it helped put down a coup d'etat staged by young progressive intellectuals and officers of the armed forces. Last July when Haile Selassie paid one of his numerous visits to Washington, the Ethiopian Students Union in North America held several demonstrations. The U.S. authorities arrested 25 students, beating and wounding many of them. Fifteen are still awaiting trial with bonds totalling $49,000. They are under imminent threat of deportation certain to result in years of imprisonment, torture and death.

It is against these combined repressions that the Ethiopian Students Union in North America together with its sister unions in Ethiopia and Europe are struggling. During the last six months, 25 students have been murdered in Ethiopia; more than 2,500 are in concentration camps; within the last year the United States government has deported 2 students. Since last March, all schools primary, secondary and university — have been ordered closed by the regime, and Ethiopian students are engaged in a deadly struggle against all this. They demand land reform, freedom of press, of speech and assembly. They are armed with truth and justice; the enemies of the people are armed with bullets and bayonets.

Clearly, this is an unequal struggle. But Ethiopian progressivists believe that the cause of truth and justice will prevail. They ask only for the understanding and assistance of men and women of good will the world over.

Take away the cops and you have open class warfare, with guns

— a report on Quebec

We shall take as our text this scene from the streets on Montreal the night the cops went over to anarchy.

Window smashed, people running in and out of a stereo store carrying nice pieces of equipment. English-speaking people, some of them Black.

One Black kid, a turnable tucked into a bag under his arm: "Not bad, eh?"

At length some of the French-Canadians around get up the guts to zap in too, and one of them comes out with a funny elated look on his face.

The cops are that part of the indigenous population you hire to keep the troublesome parts of the indigenous population in line.

"Kalisdetabarnak," he says and caresses his loudspeakers, "Pas plus fou que les autres, hein?"

That, Anglo, means why should we be any dumber than anybody else. Goddamit, and the whole story of Quebec is in it.

The colonized Quebecer has taken maybe more of his colonizing into himself and self-depreciation and self-controlling institutions than any other oppressed man, but now the barriers are cracking.

"Pas plus fou que les autres," says the Ti-Pop man now, instead of "Né pour un petit pain."

Can you figure it? A popular proverb. A people's description of itself, coming out that way: "Born for small-bread"? So the English find the French lack business sense, and the French admit there's a little truth in that, but to make a self-condemnation your national philosophy? The French-Canadians did it, and a few years ago the intellectual left found a word for it: it was Ti-Pop.

For the Ti-Popist to reach the point where he doesn't rate himself dumber than average is already insurrectional.

For it to be revolutionary, though, it would have to get to the point where he actually conceives of outraging the people who are putting him down. When you have to take lessons in looting, it isn't yet there.

That's part of the story of what's happening in Quebec.

The heritage of three centuries of elitism among the small bread eaters.

Some were born for smaller bread than others, after all. Ti-Pop.

It used to be the Curés and the Notaries, now there's a whole new crowd of Economists and Administrators, P.R. Men and Industrialists who would like to be bigger Industrialists, grafted onto this native élite, all with their reflections in Government Opposition, Civil Service, Parti Québécois.

Ti-Pop is still knocking under to these Sound Heads.

You could see this in Guy Marcil, the cop sergeant who took the Fraternité des Policiers out on strike. In Quebec the day after, he had a hangdog look. There was cop pride on the beat when his boys had gone back on the beat when the National Assembly told them to. Some had even worked double shift to help the provincials and the army clean up the disorder.

There was cop pride three nights later when the Montreal constable poked his three-foot nightstick at you, showed the army how it was done, and told you in case you were thinking of demonstrating at city hall, "Sorry, my good man, this street's closed."

The cops are that part of the indigenous population you hire to keep the troublesome parts of the indigenous population in line. They stand off the sieges on those parts of your order that provoke anger. You do well to keep them happy. For if they get out of line, if the sentries disappear from the battlements, your society is naked, and its battles are fought directly between the adversaries.

Montreal is simply a city where the conflicts are many, the provocative faces of the establishment many, the discontented groups many. Quebec is such a place and Montreal is the wen of Quebec.

In Montreal you have, all over the poor city, projects in what is called animation sociale. Citizens on relief formed into citizens' committees, animators who may be Young Canadians or paid by McGill University but for who this work is revolutionary work, grievances, irritants, fear that rates of welfare will get even lower, marches on Quebec to tell the legislators about it. Such committees exist in Quebec City too. They exist in St. Jerome. The raw material exists in every Quebec town. They touch a minority of the population, certainly, but they do not cool things down.

Montreal is simply a city where the conflicts are many, the provocative faces of the establishment many, the discontented groups many.

You have, in Montreal, labor conflicts aplenty. You have hydro and hospital strikes, you have school teachers on strike at one end of the suburban rim, and teachers looked out at the other, leftovers of contract negotiations that took two years and a flood of teachers' animators at parliament's gate. The Murray Hill dispute is nothing new. There have been bus overruns and burnings before, there have been grievance filings before, there have been pleas for a better deal for the taxi drivers before. Every Montreal taxi driver is outraged by the fact that only the limousine firm can bring passengers into town from Dorval Airport, though only a few are in the Mouvement de Libération du Taxi. Many who aren't in it read its paper. Those who are in it are not all marxists, but they have the backing of the left, they took their name from the left, the left's artists perform to raise funds for them, they are listening to the left, and they have their anger. Take away the cops here, and you have open class warfare, with guns.

The taxi men don't even care if the public is with them, if the plane-riding public likes Murray Hill's cheap service. Murray Hill is the hotels, and the city hall, and the mayor and the government all in together, and it's english, it's Them.

In Montreal you have that Mayor, the Expo and Subway man, Jean Drapeau. He's french, he's modern, he was a nationalist years back, but now he opens a luxury restaurant — his own — in a hotel called the Windsor, in the english downtown west. His cops train in riot control, and union lawyers who organize tenant committees and put their nose in public housing projects get visited by those cops. Left-wing groups collect dossiers on him and his executive secretary Lucien Saulnier and their regime, and he goes on television after the police strike and says it's because Montreal is great that she has this anarchy problem, but he'll go on negotiating the baubles that will make her greater, even if they bomb his house.

Because you have also the bombs. The underground left, really underground, which they can't wipe out, which mushroom again with every set of arrests. Which has everybody up-tight, which has the cops raiding and the suburban ladies staying home and the hippies twice as pig-nervous as in other cities. Which has cops in hip disguises watching dope and dynamite, anti-terrorist specialists in and out of witness boxes for months, rattling off their stories, checking their notebooks with the judge's permission. Which has a good gang of young men behind bars, a good handful in Cuba, but which can't convict the two biggest names in terrorism, Pierre Vallières and Charles Gagnon, because the evidence won't come forth, or the accomplices won't testify, or the jury won't convict-doubts, sympathies, their own kids separatists ...

But the death of a provincial cop, in plainclothes among the demonstrators according to weekly tabloid reports, is getting at the tabloid reader, too. And the old working man in the east end says to a chum on a bus: "You heard about that? Vallières wants Trudeau to testify for him. Vallières — a member of the underworld, with Lemieux and those guys. Underworld types. And Trudeau has to testify that he's a good boy — knew him at university. They'll all get off free." He knows it's not the same kind of underworld as Rivard, or he wouldn't have said Lemieux. He doesn't know about the intellectual magazines, Cité libre, so he says The University. Those university guys who get off scot free for their crimes while the little guy gets screwed Ti-Pop.

You have a developed, though not numerous in terms of a two-million population, left. You have the CEGEP's, the new technical academic colleges, which were occupied one after the other by their students the year of their creation.

You have the Front de Libération Populaire, begun by André Ferretti, the Marxist bookseller's-wife who used to be in the parti pris group, moved to the R.I.N. as the left wing of separatism, and then into her own group when the R.I.N. expelled its left. She's not there anymore — with FLP which has inherited many of the toughest militants of parti pris and retained some of the separatists it socialized during the R.I.N. period. It puts out a paper, La Masse, and this paper is one of a panoply of left paper in Montreal — Go Shit one is called, Mobilization is another, there are the english hip left's Logos and The Local Rag, there is the slick magazine which is the university of Montreal paper Le Quartier Latin looking for a mass audience, a CEGEP audience, there is The Network and that's what it all is, a network of small groups which can, without any one of them being a real mass movement, get together a big crowd on short notice to hit the system at some sore point. "Nothing is happening" a veteran militant will say, and he's referring to that lack of mass support for what is specially left. "They're getting married like mad on the left, and drugs are taking their toll." Still, they stir the pot.

You have the language thing, which makes all this explosive. It enables the rallying of big numbers even when the organizing groups don't have big memberships. The rallying of the unemployed adolescent window-smasher. The society is turning out in greater and greater numbers.

You have St. Léonard, where an alliance of left-wing separatists like Raymond Lemieux and worried nationalist, maybe even a little racist, working-class parents has instituted on a small scale the unilingual plan that the separatist movement has for the whole of Quebec. They've seen the Italians testify to the moribund state of their language. Its inability to do the job, by choosing English to assimilate to, and they've decided they'd better revive the thing, and fast, if they want to go on being French. They've aroused the anger of the Italians who see this as a brake on their climb up the ladder, who know the industrial system is English, and want the right to knuckle under. The result is two oppressed groups at blows, with the oppressor cheering on the weaker oppressed as a trip-up to the threatening one. All for humane Anglo-Saxon reasons.

This last is the most important of all. This gut national thing. It may be the saving of Ti-Pop, its eventual link between the anger of the taxi driver and the resentment of the east-end bus rider.

The angry conservative can have it both ways, maybe, with the right-wing nationalist politicians, with the promise that the Quebec man will come into his own and the riotous Université will be put away.

It's a race between this, though, and the left's mudslinging at the politicians offering it: Cardinal and Bertrand spending millions on booze and hostesses conventions when they can barely borrow enough to pay the province's bills, Wagner with his delusions of kennedysm at the new england summer resorts, Drapeau and his Golden Ship in the basement of the Windsor.

And that's what it all is, a network of small groups which can, without any one of them being a real mass movement, get together a big crowd on short notice to hit the system at some sore point.

Montreal is like any other city, it has slums and pollution and crime and ethnic groups getting walked on. Quebec is America, except that a walked-on ethnic group is the majority of the population and wants to be more than an ethnic group, and everything else becomes part of that. Rene Lévesque says that his party, offering that more-than-ethnic objective as a parliamentary accomplishment, is the insurance policy against chaos. Maybe.

But if all problems are now swallowed by the national problems, all will be vomited up again by the national solution. The citizen's committees and the unions and the taxi liberators and the clandestine castrists and the local rags will see to that. Maybe even the cops.

(1) Beauty and the Beast:

— The Politics of Youth and Class in Britain — by Robert Tresselt

On March 17, 1969, some 75,000 people marched through the streets of London on a demonstration in support of the struggle of the Vietnamese people. Some of these demonstrators had been amongst those who attacked the US Embassy in October 1968. On both occasions, the mass of the participants were identifiably sons and daughters of middle-class Britain.

Earlier this year, when Robin Blackburn of the New Left Review was dismissed from his post at the London School of Economics, some 14 campuses in Britain were the subject of student protest action. Again, the vast majority of participants were decidedly middle-class in origin, in life-style, and, in many cases, in social destination.

To many North American readers, the class origin of these radicals may not seem surprising, and, more relevantly, may not seem important. The fact that action was inaugurated on these two issues on campus, and that it did involve so many students, may seem sufficient in itself.

There is certainly no intention here to enter into the debate over campus and off-campus alternatives that is currently bedeviling the activity of the American SDS. Rather the intention is simply to explain to North American readers that the direction of British politics, and the struggle of British student-worker movements, cannot be understood unless the class nature of Britain and contemporary politics is taken into account. If not, there will be no way of explaining why it was that British politics in 1968 (or at least politics as understood by the mass media) was student politics whilst politics in 1969 is (as often as not) the politics of working-class youth or at least of déclassés movements of youth. The politics of the street and the soccer terraces has replaced the politics of the campus in British popular consciousness.

Three 'street' groups can be identified and each of them can be seen to be the product of a social situation: the squatters, the hippies and the skinheads. Each of these can be understood — at least in part — to be the product of the situation of certain sections of the working class, and particularly working-class youth, after five years of Labour Government. That is, the relatively unattractive and the rather ambiguously political activity of British youth movements is the product of a 'social democratic' experience.

The social democratic experience in Britain has failed the working-class in material and in cultural terms. When the Labour Party came to power in 1964, it was not expected that the Party would inaugurate socialism, but it was certainly a part of the expectation that the people would be housed much more efficiently, that they would be educated more equitably, and that they would be provided for more munificently than they had been under a regressive Tory Government. It is a comment on the British Left in that period that the expectations were so high: it is a comment on the British Left in 1969 that it has dropped its illusions about the nature of Labour Government and social democracy in general.

But the experience of Labour Government is not felt so keenly on the campus as it is on the streets of Britain. Although the reactionary posture of the Labour government vis-a-vis the European and international capitalist economy has given rise to severe cuts in educational expenditure — which has been felt on all university and college campuses — the most telling feature of Labourism is the material constraints on standards of living exemplified in the incomes policy and the new strike legislation and the continuing repression of cultural and educational opportunities within the working-class. This attack by a Labour Government on its own electors, and on its own tradition, had resulted in contradictory and confusing responses on the part of the class. It is all too easy to dismiss these responses, as does the mass media, as 'arbitrary', 'escapist' or even as 'reactionary'.

The re-emergence of 'squating' as a form of direct action — although it has only received wide publicity in North America quite recently with the squat by 'hippies' at 144 Piccadilly — has been apparent over the last two years. Squating is, quite simply, the occupation of unoccupied houses, be they privately or publicly owned, and the placing in them of a homeless family. There are some half a million such families in Britain at the moment, and, at the present rate of Government housing building, some cities will never provide houses for those families. It is perhaps no accident that the last occasion on which squatting was necessary was in 1946, one year after the disillusion experienced by working-class people with the Labour Government elected immediately after the war. The difference is that in 1946 the squatting movement was very much under the direction of the pre-1956 Communist Party, whereas in 1969 the movement is influenced, although hardly directed, by libertarian socialists, anarchists and radicals of various complexions. The squatting that is taking place at this moment in Britain is however very much the result of spontaneous action and initiative — particularly by working-class people who take their cue from mass-media-reportage of other squats, and only marginally the consequence of specifically political agitation. Importantly, the squatting movement — for all the taunts and smears of the Associated Press and its related agencies — is not simply the work of unoccupied and idle hippies, students etc., but is a direct response on the part of the labour movement proper to the housing crisis which the Labour Government is unable, and unwilling, to resolve.

Squatting has in common with the activity of the skinheads a do-it-yourself ethic. That is, the experience of the working-class under Labourism is a bureaucratic, stifling, and constraining kind of experience: the one way out of this containment is to do it yourself. Now often of course when people are forced back onto themselves, when their representatives fail them they can take up positions and politics which may appear reactionary. And there is no denying of course that when the London dockers and meat-porters marched in support of the racist Tory spokesman Enoch Powell in 1968 they were objectively reactionary in their activity. But the rise of racism in Britain in recent months is not equivalent to the attempts of youth and workers in general to re-create some kind of identity and self-respect under a hypocritical and capitalist government. It is not to be a romantic about the working-class to assert that the working-class youth movements in Britain are no more, and no less, 'pathological' or 'meaningless' than their equivalent in the middle-class. The teddy boys in the 1950's, the Mods and Rockers in the early 1960's and now the Skinheads represent the attempt of working-class youth to assert some control over external political and cultural restraints. What these groups have in common with the middle-class student leftist is a conflictual attitude towards the dominant culture of western capitalist society. At the lowest level, these groups, along with the leftist students, have reason to question the role of the police in our society; at a higher level, they do share some kind of perception about the unequal distribution of power in contemporary capitalism. The question of politicisation, and the potentiality of working-class youth as allies of the socialist movement, is a question that is already being subject to some trial in the streets: in Paris in 1968, in the squats in London this year, and to some extent now in North America (with the emergence of groups like the Young Patriots in Chicago).

The skinhead 'movement' has emerged out of the soccer culture of the British working-class. The hold which soccer has over popular consciousness in Britain (as well as in Europe generally and in Latin America) may be difficult to comprehend in North America. But it is certainly arguable that the 'game' of soccer is more important than religion in influencing the content of class consciousness in these areas (with the exception perhaps of Northern Ireland and certain societies in Latin America). It is sufficient to note here that each locality of any size possesses its own professional soccer team, and that around these teams there is a hard-core of extremely committed and fervent working-class supporters. For many of the kids who live in the larger conurbations and housing estates of Labour Britain, the soccer match and the 'happening' on the Saturday afternoon is the one release from the home, from the production-line, from the processed 'entertainment' on the TV screen, and from the society in general. It is 'their' day and it is 'their' team. And this is more than you can say for 'their' job or 'their' neighbourhood. What is quite clear is that this attempt to control 'their' team (in various kinds of intervention and in activity which is conventionally defined as vandalism) has been increasing in direct proportion to the extent to which young workers are repressed, increasingly under-paid, and increasingly insecure (in a period of rising unemployment). In all these senses, what appears as 'soccer hooliganism' in the world-wide press releases can be understood as intrinsically political in content, and as potentially political in outcome.

CUG

stand on student say in staffing should set off some surges of struggles

By LARRY HANNANT

Reaction by academic staff and students to the report of the Commission on University Government, although generally enthusiastic, includes criticism of several of the recommendations of the report.

Despite the fact that many of the individuals contacted had not studied the report in detail, most of the faculty deans and students agreed that the reforms proposed in the report, presented to the Provincial Government Thursday, will benefit the university.

But many recorded objections to specific areas of the report, which culminated 10 months of work by a nine-man committee composed of four students, four faculty members and one U of T administrator.

And a potentially disruptive struggle is brewing over faculty reaction to the issue of student participation in staff hiring and promotion.

Opposition to the recommendations that students have a voice in appointment, promotion and tenure will almost certainly be forthcoming from the faculty, F. E. Winter, president of the Association of Teaching Staff, believes.

"I'm sure that the majority of staff members are not prepared to accept the CUG recommendations on staffing without some modifications," he said.

Most of the briefs submitted to the commission by faculty members urged that academic competence be appraised only by a professor's peers.

The commission, however, felt that students could make a valuable contribution to staffing committees, and its recommendations were based upon this view.

Reaction to other parts of the report by faculty was favorable.

Ernest Sirluck, Dean of the School of Graduate Studies (which will be transformed into a faculty, if suggestions of the CUG report are followed) observed that the three principles and six attitudes that form the ideological background of the report, are "altogether acceptable as general statements."

Dean of Arts and Science A. D. Allen, noting that the report proposed the creation of "a different sort of university than what people are accustomed to," expressed belief that a great deal of useful discussion would be generated by the report.

O. D. Vaughan, chairman of the Board of Governors, was generally happy with the report and especially impressed with its style.

"Whoever wrote it ought to be congratulated on his writing ability," he commented.

The fact that the board would be eradicated in favor of a Governing Council of students, faculty, administrators and lay representatives does not distress most members of the board, he said.

"For the most part they are happy to relinquish the powers of a largely thankless job," he added.

Most SAC members, because of the work involved in preparing for the tomorrow's CUS referendum, have not completely studied the report, according to Gus Abols, SAC President.

He sees the report as "a terrific thing." But his enthusiasm is tempered by concern about decision-making at the departmental level using the concept of 'parallel structures'.

Under this system any decision would have to be approved by a majority of the students and a majority of the faculty in the department meeting separately.

"I could see where this method, where neither faculty nor students have representative powers, might bring any negotiation to a standstill," Abols said.

SAC discusses priorities

A controversial research report prepared by Danny Orache, a graduate student of political science and one of three researchers hired by the Commission on University Government (CUG), will be discussed by the students' council tonight.

The report is as yet unpublished. SAC will discuss releasing the paper, if CUG doesn't do so.

SAC will also continue its consideration of the SAC office employees' union contract.

Today's negotiations between management (the SAC executive) and union will probably resolve conflicts that led SAC rep Bob Vernon (III LAW) to circulate a referendum asking for a campus-wide plebiscite on the contract.

The objections to certain clauses in the contract have largely been ironed out since the tabling of the motion at the last SAC meeting, SAC Executive Assistant Liz Willick told The Varsity last night.

SAC will also discuss its priorities for the coming year.

There is now a moratorium on grants and donations, pending a general budget meeting and budget meetings of SAC commissions.

The meeting will be at the Council Chamber of the Galbraith Building tonight at 7 p.m.

The SAC Travelling Circus moves south tonight, opening under the Bigtop of the Galbraith Building. Come one, come all — see your favorite wild animals, clowns and juggling artists in the Council Chamber. Show starts at 7 p.m. Admission is free, mostly because you've already paid through the nose for it.

LET'S GET THE RECORD STRAIGHT

The anti-CUS campaign has said:

1. CUS "claims to be an organization working for the betterment of mankind but it is really working for a revolution."

The only people who will benefit from the destruction of CUS are the extreme right. CUS resolutions deal with education and social problems that affect students. They do not deal with revolution.

2. "You really aren't welcome in the Canadian Union of Students." Your support isn't just welcome, it is vital. A few people in Ottawa and on student councils cannot bring about the changes necessary in our universities. It takes a majority of Canadian students.

3. CUS "gives us no room to express concern for the very real issues that confront our University."

Democratic government of the university, academic freedom for students as well as faculty, relevant course content, multi-disciplinary courses, pass-fail, openness in decision-making, research beneficial to the society not private companies, fair entrance policies: if these aren't the real issues that confront our university, what are?

CUS MEANS

We must see student problems as part of greater social problems. For example, there is a shortage of student housing, because there is a shortage of all low-cost housing. Why can an economy of abundance not meet this need? In the housing field CUS is doing research, helping students to set up co-ops and working with tenant associations.

This summer there was widespread student unemployment. And many university graduates had difficulty in finding jobs. Student unemployment can only be understood as part of a greater economic problem. CUS has recognized this and oriented its research and lobbying in this direction.

Recent figures show that over 70% of university students come from upper income families. But less than 2/5 of the population falls into this category. CUS has demanded that higher education be made accessible to all social classes by reducing economic inequality.

All CUS efforts are in the immediate interests of Canadian students. Student employment. Student housing. Admission to university. And education reform.

Students are members of society as well. Some people forget that and want student leaders to concentrate only on winning more privileges for students. But CUS believes that such policies would be socially irresponsible.

CUS needs your support. CUS is your support.

CUS/YES

CUS: WHY VOTE NO

- VOTE NO because the "Canadian Union of Students" has become virtually a political party. It isn't interested in, nor will it accept your ideas.
- VOTE NO because the "Canadian Union of Students" is so wrapped up in its revolutionary perspective that it is unable to work effectively for change.
- VOTE NO because the "Canadian Union of Students" isn't. It can't be a national organization unless it has an interest in attracting members from all parts of the country, and it doesn't.
- VOTE NO because it is impossible to elect people to attend CUS functions. Given the reality of the SAC this makes it impossible to have CUS a representative body.
- VOTE NO because the 25,000 dollars we spend each year on CUS is being wasted.

The liberal tongue-lashing and its backlash

By RON THOMPSON,
CANADIAN UNIVERSITY PRESS

In October, 1968, Graham Spry, former ambassador to Saskatchewan House in London and a respected name in Canadian communications theory, was granted an honorary doctorate by the fall convocation of the University of Saskatchewan, Regina campus.

In his acceptance address, he expressed his fears at the striking similarities he perceived between modern North American student radicals and Nazi youth of the thirties.

Minutes later, a student refused his degree, asking to speak in rebuttal to Spry's remarks. The chancellor refused to allow it.

"Oh, my God," said a woman after the student had removed his robe and left, "I was afraid he was going to set fire to his robes."

But the administrators on the stage expressed no such illusion.

Instead they worried about calling in the police to remove the student.

DEBATE CONTINUED

Nine months later, in a Saturday Night magazine article, George Woodcock, author of a number of books on anarchism, again raised many of Spry's fears.

Documenting several examples of similar critiques by many western leftists, Woodcock wrote, "In Canada we are not far behind the rest of the world in a type of activism which pretends to be libertarian but is in action authoritarian and in prospect totalitarian."

"Like academic freedom, fair play is unrecognized by authoritarian activists."

He defined fascism for the purpose of his argument. "Fascism is not conservatism. . . nor is a police state necessarily a fascist state. . . Fascism is in fact a radical movement aimed at social transformation."

Two months later the debate continued in the letters column of Saturday Night.

In a letter to the magazine, Woodcock says, "I am not implying anyone can at present be termed a fascist; I am talking about tendencies and threats."

And perhaps there is enough hedging in the remarks of men like Woodcock to satisfy their own requirements about objectivity.

But in the meantime, the past year has seen a gradual extension of that debate from the arena of liberal dialogue to the points of real confrontation on the campus.

Virtually every article or program in the mass media raises the spectre of "extremism" in coverage of the problem of "student unrest."

Since the fire in the Sir George Williams computer, even Newsweek sees fit to consider "Canadian students. . . among the most militant in the world." — a merely parenthetical comment in a report on student unrest in the U.S.

But almost every university and college administrator in the country is by now on record as 'in favor of change' so long as it is achieved through 'the proper channels' — that they like students to be 'concerned with change, so long as they aren't extremists.'

In this context, all the terms are applicable anywhere, because they remain undefined.

At Carleton, 'radicalism' is at the stage of a student attempt to get a petition to the senate to set up a committee to look into overcrowding in the university. Yet Lester Pearson, Chancellor, sees fit to warn against extremists. President Davidson Dunton has already been established as the sole person who can give the directive to the police to come onto the campus.

Perhaps that is the function of the 'liberal philosopher' in this society — a symbiotic relationship that allows him to retain a position on the fence, edging away from taking a stance, while the society feeds off his rhetoric to create a climate for repression.

The rhetoric of 'anti-democratic disruption' creeps into the press statements of the 'liberal' administrator.

And when confrontation occurs, the issues are shoved under the table.

When a charge of racism is raised at Sir George Williams University, and over the year escalates to an occupation and a destroyed computer, the problem is seen merely as one of control. A new discipline code is introduced which outlaws all dissent.

ORDER ON CAMPUS

In Ontario, the presidents of the province's 14 universities caucus and come out with a working paper, 'Order on Campus', in a virtual vacuum of any kind of confrontation. But then a spokesman for the group did say the release of the paper was 'premature.'

It somehow follows, in that kind of an atmosphere, full of the rhetoric of disorder and anarchy, using a logic which defines the strongest dissent around as dangerous extremism, that Simon Fraser would work out the way it has.

Administration president Kenneth Strand, for the second time in a year, is able to set the stage for whatever means necessary to break the dissenting group on his campus without ever having to answer their charges or speak to their demands.

This time it is the department of political science, sociology and anthropology, trying to shuck off an administrative trusteeship imposed over the summer which resulted in the probation, demotion or firing of eleven PSA faculty.

Students and faculty eventually voted to strike. Although faculty said they were on strike, they agreed to teach a class if only one student wanted it held.

But the rhetoric in the air was against them. The Canadian Association of University Teachers, the university faculty lobby, would have no part of such "emotion-laden atmosphere of confrontation and strike."

Strand, right on cue, called the whole thing "threat" and "coercion" — it was depriving students of their rights (although nearly 700 PSA students had voted for the strike) — and said the university could not operate under such conditions.

A week later nine profs had been suspended pending their dismissal. Now they fear only a court injunction to keep them off campus.

Only eight months ago, such an injunction resulted in a demonstration that ended in a police raid.

And, well, if the police are there, that just about proves that the students really are, if not fascists, then tending that way.

SWIMMING

The University of Toronto SwimBlues opened their season last night by defeating Etobicoke Aquatic Club 56 to 47 in a close double dual meet at the Benson Building.

The Blues, winners of the 1968-69 OQAA and Canadian Intercollegiate Championship look like strong contenders again this year to extend their unbeaten record of nine conference and four national championships.

With the addition of several key freshmen, the Blues hope to fill the ranks left vacant by graduating lettermen Chris Fisher, Cliff Gentle, and Gaye Stratten, now coach at Etobicoke Aquatic Club.

Veteran Mike Guinness led the way with wins in the 200 yd. freestyle, 500 yd. freestyle and the 400 yd. freestyle relay. Terry Bryon (co-captain) put in strong early season performances by winning the 200 yd. Individual Medley and assisting Mike in the 400 yd. Freestyle relay.

Veterans Barry Bowerman, Ross Ballantyne, and Doug MacIntosh helped the cause with victories in the 200 yd. breaststroke, 100 yd. breaststroke and 50 yd. freestyle events respectively.

Freshman Jim Shaw assisted the team by winning the 200 yd. fly and 400 yd. Individual Medley.

On the women's side U of T did not fare as well. They lost the meet by a wide margin, but shining lights for the women were Merryly Stratten, who won the 50 and 100 yd. freestyle events, and Liz Daniel, winner of the 100 yd. Individual Medley.

THE TURNING POINT

Varsity rookie halfback Cor Doret (34) sets off on his 57 yard punt return during Saturday's game against Queens. Doret evades Gaels Ran Clark (26) as Varsity linebacker Hartley Stern (71) gets set to block. Doret went all the way for a touchdown which would have put Blues only seven points behind with a full quarter left to play BUT a clipping penalty put the Blues back on their own 38, and when they finally scored, there were only 72 seconds remaining in the game.

Vic used two quick touchdowns, one late in the first quarter and the other early in the second, to down Engineering 13-6 Monday afternoon.

The victory puts Vic back on the winning track after a 15-0 loss to PhysEd.

Unfortunately, the game was played on a muddy, soupy field which prevented either team from displaying its best form.

The game was also marred by frequent penalties which halted potential scoring threats time after time.

Neither team put on much of an offensive show as Vic managed a total of only 87 yards, while Eng picked up 111.

Engineering scored on their first series. Quarterback Rob Dickinson capped a 65 yard march, which was sustained by two Vic penalties, by sweeping right end from two yards out for the major.

Vic came right back following the kickoff to tie the score. Vic QB John Baird found his nifty flanker Paul Lasko well behind the Eng. secondary and the two combined for a 60 yard TD pass.

That was Vic's only long gainer of the game.

Vic kicked off to start the second quarter. On Engineering's first play, Dickinson's pass was intercepted by defensive back Dave Harris who carried it in for the winning score.

Vic head coach Tony Special commented after the game that he saw little to choose between his team and PhysEd. He expressed the opinion that the club with the most hustle and desire would probably prevail come Mulock time.

In games played yesterday, Dentistry upset Medicine by a score of 19-6 while Forestry was disposing of New College 27-0.

The Dents are quickly justifying their move into the second division this year. They are now 2-0 and along with PhysEd are the only undefeated teams in the league.

The teethpullers picked up a touchdown on their first serious drive.

Flanker Mel Pearlman scored from 20 yards out on a reverse.

The Meds came back with their only TD late in the second quarter. Fullback Doug Watchorn, who did the yoeman's share of the ball carrying for his team, swept right end from 6 yards out.

At the half it was Dents 7, Meds 6.

SOCCER

(Oh, really? Do you know John Soccer?)

UC rose like a Phoenix from the flames and ozymandiased Vic, 5-0, on goals by Iozzo (2), Kivisto, Speedy Gonzalves and Campbell. "Was that Phoenix the Cat?" said a Vic player, who asked to be unidentified. Unfortunately, no-one could be found to unidentify him.

Maratioti got 3, Mighty Hercules, Relph (cf. "puke", "keck", etc.), and Demarino one each as SGS (Sir George Williams) beat Marble Arch (Battaglia), 6-1.

Heikutimen and Campbell led For past Innis, 2-0.

DaRosa starred as New beat Jr. Eng. 5-1 and Law, 3-1, scoring twice in the first game and getting all 3 in the second. Boulos, Dolan and Muskat-composer of "Muskat ramble" — helped out against Jr. Eng. as Bruzzesi ("Is that a hickey?" "No, I just bruzzesi") replied for the losers. Stack hit for Law.

Trin B (Philpot) 2; Wyc (Kibblewaite; a kibblewaite is the heavth of one cord of hashish) 1.

Smith, Hutchinson 2, and Baker were scorers as Trin katenjammered PHE A (Apse), 5-1.

Scar beat Dents 6-0 on goals by Galaty (3; the earth is in a galaty called the Milky Way), Bubrin 2, and Rattek ("Most people call me Ratso.")

RUGGER

(You remember "The Old Rugger Cross", don't you?)

Kocur Spaniel had 3, Tibbo 2 as Eng beat UC, 5-0. (Or was it Tibbo? Tibbo or not Tibbo...)

Trin open-weekended Vic, 16-5. Compton had 7, Scott 6, and Busworth (a kibblewaite of hash costs one busworth) 3 for Trin, Adams 3 and Howarth 2 for Vic.

PHEO, LAW O.

Vic (Adams 3, O'Donoghue 3, Richardson 3, Howarth 3) 12, UC (Sidle) 3.

Newell scored all the points to give Eng II (Eng II, Brute) a 5-0 win over Innis.

Tibbo had 5 and Newland 6 as Eng took Trin, 11-0.

LACROSSE

Homatidis found the range twice (Homatidis in the Range?) and Woigo once and Sr. Eng. beat Meads (Omols, Scarrow) 2.

Vic (Ryan 3, Vallillie 2, Hart 2, Summerville) 8; Devonshire

House (Parris, Devonshire Howse 2, Munro 3) 6.

D'Onofrio and Frasca scored for SMC, Sodek and Osbinowo for SGS and the final score was — wait a minute — I've got it 2-2.

Travas scored 3, Ulan Bator and Battling Bulger 2 each and O'Reilly one to pace SMC's 8-7 win over Innis (Krill, Bessley 4, Okhiro 2.)

PHE (Reid, Fawcett 4, Crocker 3, Connelly 2) 10; Erin (Chervaty 2, Krill 3, Pelech) on the other hand, 6.

CONTEST

It was announced today that Miss Susan Stairs Cowan (IV Refectory) has won this week's Varsity Sports contest. Miss Cowan's answer to the question "Frere Jacques, Frere Jacques, dormez-vous, dormez-vous" was, "No, I had to get up to let the oil-man in, no, I had to get up to let the oil-man in." Miss Cowan has been awarded a refrigerator as her prize.

This week's contest is addressed to T. Tyger, burning brightly in the forests of the night, and is phrased in these terms, viz., "Did he who make the lamb make thee?". Send all answers to "Contest", Varsity Sports; relatives of Mr. Tyger are ineligible. The decision of the judges is Immanent Truth.

PROBLEMS - SAC ELECTIONS COMMITTEE 923-6221

By NORM GREY-NOBLE

Whot creature weighs 9000 pounds, has a piercing mating call and moves stealthily upon its 120 sneakered feet to attack thousands of helpless football fans at every Varsity game?

Not much guesswork is required to identify such a ponderous beast, for the Blue and White Band demands recognition and respect from all of its victims.

Watching the band perform is truly awe-inspiring. You cannot escape feeling that some unstoppable force has been set loose on the field below, marching about blowing and beating, waving flags and twirling batons, threatening to come up into the stands at any turn.

The first subtle hint that you are about to be assailed comes prior to kick-off time. While the teams are still warming up, the band-members begin to mass in the end-zone. They form their ranks — tubas where tubas should be, bass drums where bass drums should be, flagbearers where flagbearers should be — every piece and person that makes up the band is put in its proper place. From this point on, individuals cease to be individuals and a single being exists to move upon its many-sneakered feet.

The band eagerly anticipates its first moment of glory of the afternoon, stomping its feet and adjusting its music sheets. Then, led by its trainer (who is a cross between Sergio Mendes and the Good Humour Man) and our dauntless cheerleaders, the band sweeps across and then off the field to play a heart-rending arrangement of our notional anthem.

As the game begins, the beast seems to become extremely docile, curling up on the sidelines content to comment on the action of the first two quarters with the odd boom of its drums or bleep of its trumpets. But as half-time approaches a restless pacing begins as the band prepares for its pinnacle of glory, its very reason for being — THE HALF-TIME SHOW.

Once again the band pulls itself together in the end-zone, quivering in anticipation ready to spring to the attack when given the cue. Then — BOOM — the band launches itself across the field to the strains of "This Is It", the theme song to the Bugs Bunny Show. Instead of Bugs, Elmer Fudd and company, you have the band and you cannot be disappointed.

Sweeping from one end of the field to the other, from side to side, from corner to corner, the band splits up sending out various clumps of its members on sorties and then miraculously re-forms while continually issuing its own unique mating call. The precision displayed is truly amazing as the band enthusiastically goes through its paces followed (for some strange reason) by a trainer who acts as a human metronome coaxing forth bits and pieces of music.

Then, just as triumphantly as it first appeared on scene, the band prances off the playing field to resume its docile repose on the sidelines where it can watch the rest of the game, make musical comments, and bask in the sunshine as any well-trained housepet.

CUS goes belly-up: U of T withdrawal is death-blow

by HENRY MIETKIEWICZ and JIM STRUTHERS

The Canadian Union of Students died in the West Hall of University College last night, but few mourners were present.

Students voted 5,434 to 2,222, a margin of more than two to one, to withdraw from CUS.

No groans or cheers could be heard amidst the counting and the election officials resembled doctors presiding over an old man's death.

At the outset, CUS appeared to have the upper hand. The first returns showed Music voting to remain in CUS by 73 to 46.

But by the time it was all over, it turned out that Music had the only polling station to vote YES. The other twenty-four had decided to leave CUS.

CUS suffered the biggest disaster in Engineering with a NO vote of 962 to 151, and also fared extremely poorly in Dentistry, Law and Erindale College.

SAC agreed to the referendum last March after receiving a petition signed by more than 2,000 students.

Five months later, during the CUS conference at Lakehead University, Toronto delegates Gus Abols, Jon Levin (III UC), George Sachs (III APSC), and Gerrit Van Geijjan (II New suggested disbanding CUS in favour of a new organization — the Canadian Students Federation.

Abols was severely criticized by nine members of the 13-man delegation and he explained he had been speaking as an individual, and not as a U of T spokesman.

With only 39,500 students in the Union at the time, the CUS finance commission predicted that the organization would go "belly-up by Christmas" if critical referenda at U of T and Carleton did not favour CUS.

They didn't. The U of T turnout yesterday was considered to be the best on campus in a long time, as 38 per cent of the undergraduates cast their ballots.

"I'm very satisfied with the results", stated SAC President Gus Abols last night. "This proves to me that the radicals are no longer the representatives, since the students have rejected them."

"It's a good indication of where the students stand, not only at the U of T, but all over the country."

He added he was sincerely disappointed that in the past weeks some speakers had tried to obscure the issues by personal attacks against him.

"I have never used unethical tactics in any of my campaigns," he insisted. "Some people even call my methods 'red-baiting' as if ideology were some sort of sacred cow. But we have to bring the issues before the students and let them decide."

Abols now wants to attempt the formation of a new Canadian students union along non-political lines.

"If the response is favourable", he said, "we can get to are at today."

Engineering President Art McIlwain said the referendum was "a clear warning for SAC that they will have to begin communicating with the students."

When it was announced that 962 Engineers had voted against CUS, McIlwain grinned and said, "I'd hoped to get up to a thousand NO's".

Graduate Student Union President Michael Vaughan interpreted CUS' defeat in a different manner.

"I don't think it's a loss for the left on campus", he explained, "but rather a loss for the leadership role taken by the CUS executive.

"You can't politicize from above. You have to respond to the various needs of the campuses as they come into CUS, and this is something I feel the CUS executive didn't do."

Law SAC representative Bob Vernon was surprised the turnout was so high, and felt that this proved the average student was upset with the present system of campus government.

"With SAC carrying the burden now", he said, "it should devote more time to examining the possibility of joining a new student federation.

Vernon also thought that this

Ceta Ramkalawansingh tallies CUS vote in West Hall.

referendum would help students relate to SAC, and saw a new wave of co-operation beginning at the U of T.

SAC judicial commissioner Art Moses said he felt that the outcome was ironic since "a lot of the things CUS has pushed for in the last five years were starting to show up on campus."

Moses said the results indicated people on campus have turned against things they identify as purposely radical.

"It's a reputation of words rather than policies," he added. "I don't think the issues and policies of CUS were properly discussed, and both sides are guilty of this."

OTTAWA (CUP) — The exact fate of the Canadian Union of Students will be decided at a national council meeting early next week, CUS president Martin Loney said last night.

"I don't want to make any comments until then about future plans," he added.

"It's unfortunate the campaigns haven't been fought on issues but on stereotypes and slogans. We were prepared to fight on CUS policies; that's not what happened."

Dalhousie downs CUS

Halifax (UP) — Students at Dalhousie University added the coup de grace to CUS by voting "No" in their CUS referendum.

It probably didn't matter; the loss of Toronto the same day killed CUS. And maybe the Dalhousie students knew that — 237 spoiled their ballots compared to 633 "No" and 411 "Yes" votes.

Larry Kapz, president of the Dalhousie Graduate Student Association felt "The defeat of CUS could set the cause of student rights back five years."

But for undergraduate President Bruce Gillis the vote was a victory. Gillis tried to bring about the end of CUS at its congress in late August when he proposed the formation of a new "student federation". He and the other proposer of the notion, University of Toronto's Gus Abols, were repudiated by their delegations and the proposal died in the plenary for lack of a seconder.

This is how the people who voted voted at the various places at which they voted.

Academic freedom?

Danny Drache is quite bitter about the Commission on University Government, and he has a right to be.

When CUG hired Drache to do research for the Commission last year, it agreed the work would be done in complete openness and that the research would be published.

Now the Commission is not only refusing to publish the report, but is delaying in releasing it. It probably won't be released at all.

"The Commission is afraid to release the report," Drache says.

Drache has written an important report — a document that contains more real information about the true nature of the university than the CUG Report itself.

It is derived from interviews with departmental chairmen and general statistics about the departments. From concrete information, Drache has launched critiques of six departments in the Faculty of Arts and Science and produced figures on the nationality of teaching staff.

The Commission now claims that the interviews with the departmental chairmen were confidential and must be edited by the chairmen who gave them in the first place.

But the interviews were only in response to a questionnaire that asked for simple, procedural information. Drache extrapolated radical conclusions about the class nature of even the most "liberated" departments such as philosophy.

For instance, one item in the report reads:

"A dramatic manifestation of the importance of the chairman (of a department) can be glimpsed from the data collected from the 19 departmental chairmen regarding the number of extra-departmental committees they as individuals are members of in the university, in the province, in the nation, and professionally.

The departments and the number of extra-departmental positions held by their chairmen are listed here:

The CUS Secretariat: "And now a hoard of shiftless rehs loosed upon the countryside to spread revolution, sedition and had breath."

Drache has compiled an academic and radical report that is being suppressed by a Commission that has recommended as guiding principles academic freedom and openness.

If the Commission wishes to remain consistent with those principles, it must release the Drache Report.

letter from safe sociologist

Sir,

As a new member of the Sociology faculty this year, I found Miss Ronnie Nevin's article in the Wednesday Varsity very difficult to believe. During my undergraduate years here, and in my professional life since, I have been involved in numerous 'unpopular' political and social causes — ranging from editorship of the radical student bulletin "Campus Comment" in the early Fifties (at a time when the Varsity was rather tame, and student power unheard of) to personal aid for American army deserters in the early Sixties, to public advocacy of legalization of pot.

AT NO TIME, as student or teacher, have I ever experienced personal harassment in this Department as a result of my views. (I cannot say the same for another university, where my views roused considerable antagonism, so I know what it feels like!) So far as I could determine, my academic and teaching abilities were the only criteria considered by my Sociology teachers, who have now become my colleagues.

This autumn, I have instituted radically unstructured techniques in my classes, INSISTED that my students address me by my first name, and created so many opportunities for students to participate in the content and approach of three courses, that over 40% of them, in an anonymous evaluation form circulated last week, informed that they wanted a more traditional approach. I would cheerfully welcome the Sociology Radical Caucus to organize among students in these classes, if their objective is to create a sincere dialogue for genuine social change and student participation in the learning experience at all levels, including evaluation. If their objective is disruption, I suspect they will find no following among students who have a real opportunity to relate personally with their professor.

I have not had the opportunity to meet Miss Nevin (I would like to) so I have not discussed her problem with any of my colleagues, as yet. I don't know the real reasons for her non-appointment, but I do know that they cannot be the "political bias" she charges. When she accuses the department of making "acceptance of status quo ideas" a criterion for selection of faculty, and charges that I or my colleagues "teach people that the status quo is natural, unchangeable and the best of all possible worlds", Miss Nevin is indulging in blatant nonsense, and throwing doubt on the credibility of her complaint of unfair treatment.

I hope that The Varsity will be sufficiently concerned with the facts involved, to give this letter prominence comparable to that given Miss Nevin's charges.

Sewell wants to bring power down to the people

By LEAH ADAM

John Sewell is a lawyer who has been working for the Trefann Court Residents' Association since 1966. Now he is running for alderman in the ward and the Students Administrative Council has given $300 towards his campaign.

He sits on the edge of the desk in a room in Sidney Smith Hall, and talks about municipal politics. He explains how the City Council represents the people of Toronto. "Of the twenty-three members of the City Council, thirteen come from Forest Hill, and four don't even live in the city."

He explains that municipal decisions are made by the Board of Control, and City Council merely rubber-stamps them. As such, the aldermen, who are supposed to be local representatives, have no part in the decision-making process — "so they discuss other members of Council. It's all very interesting. . . but they don't do anything, just talk."

City Council refuses to listen to the people, says Sewell as he describes Trefann Court residents' losing battle with city hall over redevelopment of their area. The city plans to tear all the homes in the area down in order to build high-rise apartments. The residents have a plan which would cost half what the city is about to spend, besides providing more services with less displacement of residents. But the City Council made the decision three years ago, and it stands.

As alderman, Sewell wants to decentralize the structure of municipal government in order to "bring the power down to the people."

The people of Trefann Court, he says, are far better planners than the people the city pays. They really care about better conditions. If they organize themselves, and with a little help changes can be made.

For example, under the old ward system Trefann Court and Rosedale were in the same ward. City Hall's explained that aldermen should represent "a cross-section" of the community; and so the poor were effectively ignored.

Trefann court residents worked out the "block" plan for ward boundaries, making Bloor Street an east-west boundary, so wards would be roughly homogenous. City council wouldn't listen to the deputation, but the Ontario Municipal Board did. Now the poorer people south of Bloor can elect aldermen to represent their own interests.

It was Trefann court and Don Mount residents, not City Hall, who finally forced a change in the expropriation act, so that owners are sufficiently compensated to enable them to buy homes of comparable value.

John Sewell — he hopes to cut through City Hall politics and reach the people of Trefann.

In many cases, residents have gone ahead with a plan only to be frustrated by City Council. Instead of building a school on an empty lot that the Ontario Housing Corporation had agreed to sell for one dollar (after being approached by Trefann Court residents) the city spent $900,000 for occupied land, and is going to tear down 50 homes.

Says Sewell, "It wouldn't be so bad if there was payola, but they really believe that what they are doing is right."

Real communication is needed between politicians and the people, says Sewell, so that politicians are not merely personalities, but true representatives of the wishes of the people they serve.

Richard Fidler, of the League for Socialist Action, is also running in Ward 7. To him, John Sewell is "either incredibly naive or some sort of a fraud," because he is running independently of the NDP campaign, which, says Fidler, has essentially the same objectives.

But, says Sewell, political parties rarely do anything about things like urban renewal. "In talking about social change," he says, "we are talking about people, not political parties."

John Sewell has no specific program which he intends to implement if elected. He says he will just follow the instructions of the residents of his ward, trusting them to make the right decisions about matters which concern them.

Column and a half

By BILL TEMPLEMAN

On this campus we have just experienced a mass religious ritual, complete with sacrificial offerings, transmigration of souls, and faith healing.

Sadly, the faithful did not receive the Grace of God. The Great Spirit alone knows how this event will be identified in eternity, but here on this fleeting planet in the evanescent presence of now this ritual is referred to as "The Great CUS Debate and Referendum".

First, among the offerings let us record the following: 23 gallons of expensive but irrelevant printers ink, untold acres of scenic pulp-paper forest, and expended time amounting to the equivalent of several hundred years of human life.

Oh, the gluttonous deities!

Next, let us recount the great transmigration: many intelligent beings, from the land of Reality to the veiled world of Illusion, (these travellers hereafter will be referred to as CUS ritual participants), in broad daylight, lacking the comforting presence of angels, of their own volition.

Thirdly, an account of the faith healing: the multitudes were observed scratching marks on scraps of paper, folding these scraps, and drapping these scraps in ugly metal boxes attended by other people, who in their turn jealously coveted these seemingly priceless scraps, inspecting them assiduously late into the night — apparently in search of the Mystic Answer. (No answer was found.)

I can defend my religious spoof of the CUS muss from the following premise: only by positing some form of deep spiritual faith can one possibly reconstruct the individual philosophies which led this community to behave as observed.

The entire CUS affair — debate, publicity, referendum — was a live demonstration of non-communication. Few really knew what was going on, but everyone kept stout-heartedly going on anyway. And that, my children, is faith.

But Saint Augustine would have been insulted. The medieval Christian objects of faith were aesthetically far more convincing.

Most students did not vote yesterday because they did not have faith — faith in the reality of the ritual in which they were being asked to participate. Farmers no longer burn offerings before spring planting because they have discovered that the ritual does not influence the crop.

Students no longer vote in elections because they have discovered that the ritual of voting does not affect them. CUS has no perceivable influence on their day-to-day living. Hence, CUS is not real. Therefore, no communication.

Yesterday's non-communication was due to a conflict in world views — both based on an act of faith. The CUS ritual participants say the world exists. The non-participants say it doesn't.

Since the CUS participant believes he can influence the external world, he must accept information he receives "second-hand" about this external world he cannot experience as being real. This is, at best, like saying a metaphor is a fact. It is not.

When someone says "the whole CUS affair is an incredible drag", he is not saying that the conversion of Lake Ontario from lake to sewer pool does not affect him. He is not saying that SAC or CUS have no effect upon him. He is not even defining his own world view (external world vs. world-is-an-illusion). He is saying he finds the local political polemics aesthetically displeasing.

If you believe in your influence on your non-immediate environment, then you must act on that influence. You must debate about CUS. You must line up and vote about it.

But, if your world view means an acceptance — an act of faith — of only your own being and your immediate environment, then participation in such issues becomes meaningless.

The obvious has become the subversive. Not voting is precisely not giving a damn. But one must try to understand how much is being damned and why — by being true to experience, not by plugging in a favorite ideology.

The external world advocates do not realize that many people on this campus live in a very personal space for a variety of technological, social, and cultural reasons. These reasons are habitually not investigated in the local "analyses".

BEST MINDS

The "Campus dialogue" has previously avoided these levels of debate. It is here that hard thinking and acting must be done. Until the 'migrant souls' of yesterday stop hiding from the reality of this conflict of world views, this university will continue to experience a highly illusory form of criticism and debate, and most of all, 'guaranteed no action'.

Allen Ginsberg's "Howl" — written in 1956 — opens with this line: "I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness, starving hysterical naked . . ."

If Ginsberg were around this university in 1969 doing a rewrite, he might do well to start with "I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by mental masturbation, blathering, analytical, blind. . ." Or one might ask "where are the best minds?"

U of T neglecting social responsibilities: Clarkson

By PAMELA BERTON

The University of Toronto is destructive, irresponsible, and isolated in relation to the outside community, said Steve Clarkson, Liberal Mayorality candidate.

The 31-year-old Political Science professor, who is known around campus for his student-involvement simulation courses, was speaking to the U of T Liberal club.

He termed the University a "developer and a slum landlord". Clarkson argued that it lets houses deteriorate and then tears them down. The University is "reacting badly in a time when there is a serious housing crisis."

"In terms of the explicit function of education the university has failed the social community in not taking steps to increase access of the lower classes to the University."

He stated as well that there is a lack of socially relevant research carried on in the university, especially in relation to the city. The recent Commission on University Government made a similar statement.

Clarkson believes that the CUG report's idea of a non-academic external council should go even further to include representatives from the various ethnic groups, ratepayers associations and professional groups, as well as at least two of a ten member council from City Hall or Metro council. This would be a formalization of the University's relationship to City Hall.

"This is Toronto's turning point. The question is whether it will go down the traditional path of the American cities or whether it will take destiny into its own hands," said Clarkson.

The main change he wants to see in Toronto government is a transformation from "institutionalized individualism" to a more parliamentary system.

At each election two-thirds of the people in Toronto don't bother to vote. This shows the "irrelevance of the city's political position to our lives," he said. Clarkson feels the solution to this kind of alienation is a "dialogue between the communities and the politicians." In this way the neighbourhoods, (and the University is one of these) can be consulted in the decision-making process and the "politicians can respond to the guidance of the people."

"Toronto's future depends on our being concerned above all with the quality of its community life."

Loyola students will strike Monday

MONTREAL (CUP) — A three day strike by students and faculty at Loyola College, postponed earlier this week, has now been set to begin this Monday.

The strike is to support demands that the administration accept binding arbitration in the case of a physics professor S.A. Santhanum, fired earlier this year after confusing deliberations about his contractual status.

Trouble has been building at the college since early summer when the administration refused to re-hire the professor in spite of a senate recommendation to that effect.

In the fall pressure was increased on the administration in the person of President Rev. Patrick G. Malone when the Loyola News ran an editorial "There is no future for Father Malone here" in its first issue.

The administration also refused to accept arbitration by the Canadian Association of University Teachers, attacking the faculty pressure group for its "pretentious language and inept threats".

On October 8, three students and seven faculty senators resigned from the senate, charging that since 43 per cent of its members were appointed by the all Jesuit board of trustees, it was unrepresentative.

Loyola students voted Tuesday Oct. 14, by a bare majority, to hold a three-day boycott of classes over Santhanum's dismissal and over what students charged was an unrepresentative senate and an arbitrary administration.

In response to what it termed the "sharp division which exists on campus" the board of trustees announced last Friday it was setting up a commission to examine the entire academic structure of the university.

The board also agreed to give Santhanum half salary for a year's sabbatical on a terminal contract and excellent references to other institutions. The administration president seemed to agree and so did CAUT.

Other administration officials worked against the deal however, particularly the academic vice-president, and it was finally withdrawn. The faculty association then gave the president until next Wednesday to come to terms. He failed to gain cooperation from the rest of the administration.

The faculty association is now expected to unequivocally demand binding arbitration by CAUT and an examination of the entire administration set-up on campus. The student strike will support the same demands.

BURNABY (CUP) — Eleven students at Simon Fraser University have moved from strike action to "non-violent civil disobedience."

A hunger strike and sit-in by the 11 began in the rotunda of the administration building yesterday in support of the strike of faculty and students in SFU's Department of Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology.

The students say the hunger strike will continue in the rotunda and outside the door of Administration President Kenneth Strand's office until the SFU administration agrees to reverse decisions made this summer in firing, demoting or placing on probation 11 professors in PSA.

They will smoke, but take absolutely no food during the sit-in.

They have asked other students to visit the sit-in, as long as they do not eat there.

Meanwhile, a cultural festival is scheduled for today marking the start of the second month of the PSA strike, which began Sept. 24.

Featured attraction is a piece of strike theatre billed as "A Tragicomedyspectacular farce," sponsored by Little Man Productions called: "The Case of the Nine Naked Professors in a Phone Booth, OR, How I Got Screwed By The People I Trusted" (SIC).

The Little Man is the star of SFU comix — a cartoon character symbolizing the strikers and Karl Marx — appearing in the student newspaper.

Rock bands will be playing on the campus all day, and the 'Phantom English Department,' a creation of English students on strike in sympathy with PSA demands, is to present a symposium on the film "Easy Rider."

Vaughan quits books for politics

By SUSAN COLLYER

Graduate Students Union President Michael Vaughan will now receive a salary of $500 a month as a full-time president.

This decision was reached at Wednesday's General Meeting of the GSU. The role of president has become so time-consuming said Vaughan that only a full-time president can fulfill the needs of the GSU. In order to assume this position, Vaughan will relinquish a $4,500 Canada Council grant.

"The decision to postpone my academic work has not been an easy one to make," said Vaughan.

Severe controversy arose over this proposal, but the graduate students decided that paying a president did not require a change in the constitution.

Vaughan will receive $500 a month from last September to February, 1970. He would then renew his Canada Council grant and continue to serve the GSU as part-time president.

Paying the GSU president should be a decision based on circumstances, said Vaughan. The position should not become permanent, he said.

Expected controversy did not arise over the matter of the department union organizer, Marjaleena Repo, who was hired by the Executive to help set up departmental unions. She distributed a report outlining her duties as organizer and her achievements so far.

"My understanding of my role," she said, "was that I was to concentrate on working at the departmental level, assisting existing graduate organizations in their efforts and helping new organizations to get off the ground where they do not presently exist. I was also to act as a liaison between the GSU and the departmental organizations."

The GSU will try to improve the effectiveness of departmental organizations with increased financial aid. The new budget includes an increase in grants to student organizations in the various departments, from 50 cents to two dollars per member.

These grants involve 20 per cent of the new budget, and are available upon presentation of a constitution. "This is to ensure that the body receiving the funds technically exists and is democratically constituted," Vaughan explained.

Vaughan briefly outlined the achievements of this year's GSU and plans for the rest of the year. This included Health Service subsidies for Teaching Assistants and Demonstrators, free accident insurance coverage for all part-time teaching fellows, and a $100 thesis subsidy from the School of Graduate Studies.

Also included in the budget is $5000 for the Capital Fund, which with $15,000 from last year will be dedicated to a proposed bar.

This is the first in a series of profiles of favorite sons who have struck out and gone forth (or fifth as the case may be) into the big clammy cold world in search of fame, fortune and other great things. (Search and ye shall find!)

Kaspars Dzeguze's goal in life is to "get a Ford Foundation grant to build a glider to go out into outer space so I can get the Hasselblad camera that NASA left behind. It's the only way I can get one."

In the meantime, while waiting for the grant, Kaspars has been movie critic for the Globe and Mail.

His is no ordinary success story, because he worked under an overpowering handicap — he was movie review editor of The Varsity last year.

He looks with nostalgia (or did he say "nausea"?) on his Varsity days. While enjoying the company of the staff, he thought the quality of the journalism left something to be desired. "There is a tendency," he said, "for people in the revolutionary movement to run off at the mouth and say a lot of uninteresting things in a similar fashion."

"The campus needs The Varsity," Kaspars admitted, "though not as much as The Varsity needs the campus. It has a perverse sort of effect. In its best moments, it reflects the issues that are troubling the university and is a good way of living with the campus."

"Communications becomes good when the 'person' comes through in the article, when all the rough edges aren't rounded out by the 'blue pencil' of the editor," he said.

This brought up one of his pet beefs — editors. When he first started writing, he wrote on his low-lying ceiling: "Never trust an editor" — a statement which he believes to be one of the few enduring truths.

He arrived at the Globe eager and enthusiastic (well, at least as much as Kaspars can be). He thought the staff was courteous enough, but "they were all doing their own thing."

He found that the things he needed to know were: where the paper is, where the toilet is, and where the toilet paper is.

"Unless you're doing something terrible, you don't find out the reactions of the staff to your work. At first," he continued, "it's sort of scary. At the Varsity you knew exactly what the editor thought of your work."

"The most difficult thing to adjust to are the deadlines," he stated. "You have to write one article every day. Sometimes I had to do one in 45 minutes."

He didn't think you can learn to be a critic. You could only be taught to look for certain things.

He put it this way: "Either you're a born bastard or you aren't."

There was also the technical side of criticism. He said that in his reviews he was looking for "balance". There are many different aspects of a film — the dialogue, the acting, the direction, the camerawork, etc. What Kaspars tries to do is blend his views on these varying sectors of the film into a unified whole.

He thought he had become less selfish in his writing than before; that is, becoming more aware of the reading audience. As he became more aware of the "newspaper" as a medium, he began in his own way to try to respond to that.

At first, he was impressed by readers' letters (or depressed as the case may be). Now they don't affect him much.

"One of the rules of the business I've learned is that it's good to get letters, no matter what they may say."

One of the advantages of the critic is that he has what Kaspars calls "24-hour mortality". He might write a real stinker of an article today, but he can always make up for it tomorrow. Your bad days can oftentimes be simply forgotten — of course, the reverse works in the same way, though usually not as often.

One of the particular advantages Kaspars enjoys is his press card.

"It's not saving the money I like (though on my salary it helps)," he said, "it's staying out of those goddam queues."

He despaired about the state of the film industry.

"It's easy to write a review on a good film, or a particularly scathing attack on a terrible one. But what do you do about mediocre movies? They're the toughest to do because you have to scrape the bottom of the barrel and really do something magnificently creative to produce an interesting review."

Kaspars personally enjoys good comedy, but finds that there's "damn little around." He smiled as he ventured that many of his views on the quality of specific films were at variance with those of the paying public.

For instance, he doesn't particularly like Woody Allen's movies. He thought it offensive when someone makes a career out of being pathetic.

Probably his greatest hate, though, is pretentiousness.

"I'm open about films. I have no absolute standards (enjoyment is the goal). But I cannot tolerate pretentiousness."

Kaspars' career began rather strangely. His parents originally didn't let him go to films (or at least they didn't encourage him).

For those of you who may enjoy such things, or collect such data, he got his start at the old Christie theatre (now the Maple Leaf Ballroom) on St. Clair Avenue.

Finally we got around to the Canadian movie industry.

"It's getting better," he said, "but then how could it get worse? The Canadian Film Development Corporation is getting experienced, but there is still no agency in Canada for fledgling (small budget) filmmakers."

"The CFDC conditions are stringent, but that's the way it should be. They weed out the weak producers and often good the strong ones to get independent financing."

"The trouble with reviewing Canadian 'works of art' is that you can't make a separate case for them. You have to treat them as you would anything else. But then if you give a bad review (even if it's a bad movie), you get branded for discouraging local talent and initiative."

"All in all, I think Canadian distribution, actors, and critics will probably mature simultaneously."

As for his own future, Kaspars wants: to have a screenplay of his filmed by a professional company, to do a film himself from his own screenplay, to travel to Europe to see films made, to write "The Great Canadian Novel."

"Anything else I have to say will all be covered in my novel," he concluded.

montréa blah! vs. TORONTO round one

Like the Canada Goose, my flights, featherings, and nestings can be predicted with a Junior Red Cross Calendar and a look at the leaves. And so, Thanksgiving weekend found me back home in Montreal. Shattered English plate-glass. Stories about the looting. The masses are in revolt. My god! What happened to turkey dinners, autumn leaves, and walks in the country?

SAVED BY THE BELL

But there's the city and its people. And their mountain that's been travelling into autumn for centuries, changeless as the winds. Ah, Montréal, Montréal. Yes, there have been riots. Yes, there is crime, violence, corruption, a tinge of racism and yes, even that rare intellectual's bird, social class revolution. Yes, money is leaving the city. Yes, some long-time residents are leaving. Yes there is financial depression. Yes, yes, all true and yes, Montreal is still one of the most human places to live on the continent. It is arguably the most civilized city in Canada. The Revolution—Quebec Libre, Smash the System, Workers Arise, Acid, Peace, and Hair Forever—which ever flavour you prefer—is in a Taoist sense, saving Montreal.

DARKNESS HAS PAST

The disciples of Lord Progress, (with their Holy Trinity of Efficiency, Expansion, and Control) are beginning to realize that the people of the city will fight—FIGHT—to remain atheist. The truly dangerous point for the city has been past. Five years ago, things looked dark dark dark indeed. Expo construction was festering everywhere. High Rise was deflowering the spirit all over town. Developers were humping slum-dwellers out into the streets. They were bulldozing like horny wart hogs. Advertising was spreading like a sixteen year old's pimples. The city smelled of America. The mayor wanted to make a Super City. An international jet-set-global-village. Another New York. Whoopee!

HEAVENLY SLUMP

Now all is beginning to delightfully fizzle. The High Rise men can't fill their prisons. The Concordia Group—an outfit currently plotting the destruction and "renewal" of a monsty hunk of the charming Milton-Park-St.Famille area—is having second thoughts due to—shall we say—recent events. In short, Montreal is thankfully on its decadent way to becoming a "depressed area". That's a blow against Progress, (only a fool or a visionary uses a small p for progress these days) a crisis for investors, and as far as the people are concerned, a gratuitous intervention by the Great God of Cosmic Goodness. Surely the Heavens are smiling.

THE FALL OF TORONTO

What of Toronto? Here, people actually line up for a chance to live in High Rise. Developers erect another one of these indignities every month. Progress is spreading like cancer. There are Great Plans for poor old T.O. Spread to Sudbury. Envelope Lake Ontario. Money knows no fear. Wherever Efficiency, Expansion, and Control become public morality, the human species is in deep trouble.

PASSION BY THE URINALS?

Why is Montreal like love and visions with the living of your choice while woman in Toronto is brownies and Postum with Auntie Gertrude? People, Torontonians are on the make. Everybody is in a hurry to get something then get out. No wonder. Taking now, the present moment for what it's worth in Toronto is a devastating experience. There is simply nothing there. How many couples do you see playing kissy-face while waiting for a subway train? One just cannot feel love while standing in a gigantic yellow-tiled wash-room surrounded by lonely urinators afraid of a public piddle. Ever ridden le Metro? You could film enough ear-nibbling and bottom-stroking to make The Great Canadian Erotic Feature-Length. In Montreal, doing present tense, spontaneous things is the norm. You avoid planning because planning smudges the clarity of the living moment and this moment—right now—is, after all, what life is. Montrealers are a far more immediate people.

FRIGHTENED OUTSIDER

When an outsider digs the present moment in Toronto, he undergoes a threatening, almost hallucinatory experience. He sees himself isolated from existence. He sees colossal flows of human energy racing in circuit, all of it strangely mute as if devoted to some Orwellian plan—who knows the Sinister Secret? The same outsider in Montreal, upon stepping off the circuit, is liable to find himself wrapped up in life. Maybe two motorists are brawling over a rumped fender right in front of him. (Drivers in T.O. don't fight, they just call the cops and crouch alone in their respective wrecks, eyeing each other). Or two girls crossing the street towards him are making idle speculations about his body with their eyes. Or he hears two labourers laughing at the passing sidewalk spectacle. He sees not only people in motion, but also, people living. And this quality of living makes the difference.

PITY THE POOR IMMIGRANT

In Toronto, there's little joy or despair: life is neither good nor bad; it is a thing to endure, like relatives at a wedding, sometimes mildly pleasant, sometimes not. Toronto is a city of the mean, not the extreme. Toronto is trying to make love with a store-window manikin in the dark with all your clothes on. Toronto is a freeze-dried pre-packed alternative to existence. Secure. Somewhere to put in time. No happy, no sad just BLAH! There is revolution in Montreal precisely because there is something to fight for—there's a richness, a depth, a passion in living there. Montrealers have a lot to lose in terms of "quality of life". Whenever they riot, strike, bomb and fight they are trying to maintain their own definitions of themselves. They are struggling to be. They are fighting against an ethos which creates torontoes. Toronto, sadly, has nothing to fight for other than its bland security. It is its own worst enemy. Like an ambulatory schizophrenic, Toronto will wake up one morning and realize it hates itself. Montreal's revolution will be minor when seen next to this self-mutilating chaos.

FRENCH SPIRIT

What is this quality of life that drives Montreal? You sense it when walking around the city. It is a collective spirit, almost numinous in its presence. You feel it around the Forum on a hockey night. You feel it when you're on Mount Royal after the first snowfall. You feel it late at night walking down St. Laurent in the Montreal Pool Room for hot dogs and frites. You get the feeling that if the two cities were both besieged like London or Stalingrad, Toronto would crumble in a few weeks while Montreal would hold out for years. Yet this spirit is largely the people. Les Quebecois. An inefficient people. Ambitionless. More interested in being than progressing. Emotionally expressive instead of suppressive.

DOWN WITH UMPHFF

Montrealers daily carry on what is in Toronto a profoundly subversive activity—they talk to strangers. And relating to other people is what life in Montreal is all about. Your feelings and your contact mean more than your ideals and goals. Montreal is a city for artists, not intellectuals; for lovers, not career fanatics. Yet there is something enigmatic about the very medium of this inter-relating and its effect on people—the Quebec-French manner of speech. I used to work in a bar on Mountain Street in Montreal. When I served in French, I had to speak more words to say the same things that I said in English—French being a less exact, more expressive language than English. Serving in French I would often become involved in brief conversations—always trivial talk and quickly boring but nevertheless beyond the strict necessities of the situation. Serving French clients I was a menial figure, but human—something a bit more than a thing that brings us beer. Serving my fellow anglophils was another story:

"For you, sir?"

—pause, he stores empty-eyed past me lost in thought.
"Um... Molson's"

—I open the beer, punch up tab, place beer and tab before my meditating molson man.

"There we are sir" (I needed lips severely—those were lean days)

"Umphff", he grunts, without meeting my eyes.

Umphff. That's it. End of communication. Umphff was an unusually lively anglo response to my efforts. Even more atypical was Umphff with eye-to-eye contact. "Thanks" was extremely rare. Once a guy asked how long I had been working this bar. Mumbling soundlessly, I swiftly retreated to washing glasses in order to hide my shock. I was an apparatus with a function to perform, and as long as I was oiled regularly, I required no further attention. Toronto is a rampaging breeding ground for Umphffs.

But I Can Dance!

The bony legs in the grey textured stockings shook and rubbed against each other. Hair clinging to the soft trembling face, her voice squeaked out another sequence of DA DA DA DA DA DA DA's. HEY JUDE was being given yet another interpretation. No one seemed to want to sing it in tune or in time with the piano. A hand with leather at the wrist slowly rose, the music stopped, Marsha kept on croaking. "That's fine Marsha, that's fine." Marsha turned and walked from the stage.

The Masonic Temple turned

Club 888, turned Rock Pile, is now the centre for the auditions for the Toronto production of Hair. There are thirty members in the cast, and they're all to be selected at the auditions which will probably run for the next month. On Monday night, 715 people either auditioned or made appointments to do so.

A big black cat in long flowing robes, looking like a male Mahalia Jackson, pounds out YOU CAN'T HURRY LOVE in a voice somewhere between Tiny Tim and Walter Brennan.

The hand rose, the music stopped. "But I can dance." Off came the pants, the man is all over the stage, legs quivering, running, bending, pumping, doing jack knives, scissors, and splits. He can dance.

"You have to be able to sing, sorry".

A few hours of auditioning, and a slowly burgeoning audience of hip, square and official people, helped to lend an atmosphere of a community talent show. Everybody was applauded — after all you might be on next, best not to make any enemies. A young lad in faded denim bells and a Union Jack at his knees lead the people in a round of HE'S GOT THE WHOLE WORLD IN HIS HANDS. His name was Charlie. He had something. It was a free easy rolling type of audition. In the labyrinth of off-key notes, lost words, inaudible voices and trembling bodies, something happened.

Long, almost straggly hair flew gracefully from side to side, the gentle rhythms of her body moved in unison with the Laura Nyro rhythms of the piano. The stage with the grand ornate arch shrunk to a pedestal. The voice — small at first grew and grew, rich and full. She sparkled, threw herself to the music. It was in the eyes, it usually is. "Tell me something about yourself." Joe Regan in kurta and striped bells was interested. He's casting director and he wants to see her again. Everyone applauded wildly. It was our victory too.

And so it goes on and on. The long search for talent, shuffling of cards, gazing at pictures, the listening to music . . . If you know a couple of rock songs, take them to 888 Yonge, Joe Regan might be able to use you.

GARY BURTON. A Genuine Tong Funeral. RCA Victor LSP3988 Country Roads and Other Places. RCA Victor LSP4098.

Although I think Burton has received acclaim out of all proportion to his talent, still it can't be denied that he is a good musician. Funeral, an interesting "dark opera without words" by Carla Bley, presents the Burton vibraharp and quartet effectively in a small orchestral setting. In The New National Anthem, Miss Bley turns loose the musicians to create a frenzied searing climax.

Country Roads, on the other hand, is aptly described as "modern American chamber music", and features the best Burton quartet to date in a loose set in which the country sound is prominent, though there is considerable variety.

DUKE ELLINGTON and BILLY STRAYHORN. Cottontail. Riverside RS 3306. MAX ROACH. Deeds Not Words. Riverside RS 3018. SONNY ROLLINS. Freedom Suite. Riverside

In the '50s, Riverside was one of the most important jazz labels, recording many of the best contemporary musicians. Though the company went out of business several years ago, a few of the records are now available again in the form of reissues (most of them with phony stereo.)

The Ellington-Strayhorn piano duets, reflecting one of the closest and most fruitful musical relationships in history, were recorded in 1950. Though the music is, of course, interesting, the sound is poor, making the record essential only to confirmed Ellington collectors.

Max Roach fares better. One of the key musicians in the development of modern jazz drumming, Roach led a number of unusually good jazz units in the '50s. Deeds has fine performances by the group which featured trumpeter Booker Little, who demonstrates remarkable technique and musical maturity here, though he was only 18 when these sides were recorded.

Roach is also prominent on the Rollins record. One side consists of pop standards, for which Rollins has a peculiar genius, with the other side taken up entirely by a long Rollins composition based on a few short themes. A trio recording (the third man is bassist Oscar Pettiford), this is a fairly good representation of what Rollins was doing in 1958.

DON CHERRY. Where is Brooklyn? Blue Note BST 84311.

One of the original "new thing" musicians, Cherry first became known for his pocket trumpet playing with the Ornette Coleman trio of the late '50s. Since then he has gone on to play barefoot in Copenhagen, and is now generally recognized as one of the major figures in the so-called "avant-garde" movement. This record was made in New York in 1965, with Pharaoh Sanders doing his usual stratospheric explorations of the cosmos, and with Ed Blackwell providing some fine musical drumming.

pinned down like a butterfly

Going to see John Hammond at the Colonial (playing until October 26) can be a disconcerting experience. Hammond is the sort of performer who seems (at first) to be easily classifiable. Backed by two blacks, Larry Holt on bass and Charles Otis on drums, he seems to want nothing more than to make his group a black threesome. Black mannerisms, black intonations, black expressions are forced into everything he does. He juts his lower lip out farther and farther until his features look more pronouncedly black than those of his sidemen. So, it seems, the viewer has got Hammond pegged. He is a "white nigger" (to misuse a phrase) trying to get really into black music by being a phony half-black.

An accident at the Colonial Monday night strengthened these suspicions. Somebody told Hammond to get on stage about half an hour before he should have. Thus, there was an abortive half-set at eight o'clock. Hammond sang, "I Can Tell", "Sugar Mama" and "It's Evil." Then, there was a ten-minute break and the set proper began with (can't you guess?) "I Can Tell," "Sugar Mama" etc. It was just like replaying a record. Every spontaneous-looking gesture, every natural-sounding catch in the voice was duplicated in the second effort. The audience is watching the half-black show how carefully he has done his homework. The jaws of classification are closing tighter.

It's all over. Hammond has been pinned down like a butterfly. He's a "white nigger" stealing black vocal technique. If the viewer stays around for a few more numbers, however, a spanner gets in the classifying works. Hammond can go straight from his Junior Wells imitation into a version of Jimmy Reed's "You Don't Have to Go" and make it his own all the way. Then he does "Long Distance Call" and it's obvious that you're listening to real Hammond and not bargain-basement Muddy. Numbers like these show that Hammond can be a performer in his own right. He is not as classifiable as he once looked.

Hammond comes through with some numbers which all alone are worth the cover charge. In "Forty-four" he shows tremendous control by taking his group through some tortuous rhythm changes. In Dixon's "Spoonful" he gets a call-and-response feeling between his voice and guitar that marks blues at its best. Then, he does some things on bottleneck style guitar that have everybody in the place moving their heads and saying, "Oh, yeah."

After one set, I asked Hammond which blues harp performers he modelled himself after. "I've been playing harp for nine years," he said, "I don't have any model except myself." When Hammond sticks to his words, and gives us himself up on stage, he puts on one of the best shows in town.

As the night goes on, weekend

WEEKEND is the CBC Information Programming Flagship Balloon, filled with a mixture of helium, borium, laughing gas, tedium and hot air; sometimes it floats; sometimes it fizzles - Saturday night after the hockey game, about 10:15 and Sunday at 10 pm fizzlelesswhisqueefrinkle WEEKEND!!

It's biggest billing has been its flexible devil-may-care format, able to hang loose, offering those last minute news stories, those amusing film lighties and those short poignant documentaries. It's tv's Pandora's Box: news, current events, Canadian personalities and discussion.

So far, it hasn't hung loose and it hasn't hung together either.

WEEKEND is a gamble, an experiment with the medium; it's trying to juggle a lot of variables: changing groups of on-camera personalities, in various cities linked in what is termed the "Electronic Highway." Topics range from "hard news" to satire. But all is not left to chance. Among the constants are Anchorman-Host Lloyd Robertson who provides continuity and some degree of direction to the often disparate elements of the show. He's a young 35 year-old, possessing the serene composure of a CBC Staff Announcer but exhibiting an uncharacteristic animation: he laughs, talks, smiles and walks like a real human. Both Robertson and other constants of format, like a hot-seat interview, the trip along the Electronic Highway and pre-recorded film and video tape shorts reduce the risk of the experiment but it seems that the producers aren't ready to commit themselves to hang all that loose; and as I said, the show just doesn't hang together - yet.

The major fault with WEEKEND after its two weekend run seems not to be either the content or even the form, but the lack of production judgment that combines the two. It's laudable that there is a live mixture of people, places, opinions feedback, news, film . . . Robertson seems capable and what's more important, even personable; and the variety of features is able to maintain a wide audience. But whoever is reading the recipes and doing the blending is doing it wrong. And that means the producers: Saturday - Neil Andrews, Sunday - Richard Nielson, News - Ian Murray.

The first Saturday show appeared thirty minutes in arrears due to overtime hockey, leaving only twenty-five minutes for the premier performance. In that short time there was heavy news emphasis on riots - Montreal, Chicago and Belfast. And then - poof - there appeared a film lightie, "The Shape of Women." Although it was a well-edited light approach to the Question of Bralessness and the Dangers of the Sag, it was thrust in at the expense of any intelligent comments from awaiting, frustrated guests along the El Highway. It's too bad that the producers had to sacrifice coherence and unity to present little inane snippets of all the promised toys and personalities. (Punch Imlach mouthed a few garbles on hockey). Would that there had been time for everybody and everything. Alas, Time said 'Nay.' The producer said 'Let's Try.' A lack of judgment. Don't Fight Time.

The most recent WEEKEND evidenced more of the same. On Saturday there was a news story, commentary and an El Highway discussion on the Company of Young Canadians and the charges brought against them as a result of the Montreal riots. Near the beginning of the El Hi discussion, Shaun Hamon in Winnipeg called the whole item and by implication, the whole show a "bore" saying that the CYC didn't deserve all the attention.

Irving Layton was sported as a studio guest for the Sunday show. It looks like he was chosen to add colour to the discussions; the colour? herring red. He's a windbag of no small renown and I find it difficult to imagine a producer expecting any congruity between Irving Layton and a fast-moving intelligent discussion. Not that Layton isn't fast or even intelligent, but he tends to form one opinion and recite it in poetic, prosaic rhetoric until he's literally cut off. And that's just what Robertson had to do, several times.

If it's colour they wanted, Barbara Frum, a very capable broadcaster offered an adequate hue. There were some very good subjects: separatism in the CBC and sexuality in prison, from conjugal visits to homosexuality. Layton certainly offered some interesting comments but they were presented and repeated in such a grandstand manner that the discussion suffered.

WEEKEND has the odds on its side. Wide scope, adequate and often irking on-camera personalities, but it needs better pacing - a minor flaw. It's a good gamble and I'll stick with it.

THE END

pieces obscure for a reason

The Faculty of Music's Special Events Series began last Thursday evening with the Parennin String Quartet a group with some professional polish and competence, but unfortunately a poor choice of concert material.

Musical cognoscenti always complain bitterly when performers choose concert music from the "standard repertoire", which everybody knows and has probably heard many times before, instead of playing music which hasn't had much exposure and is unfamiliar. Of course it's nice to discover a worthwhile new piece rather than listen to Beethoven's C sharp minor quartet once again. But, as the Parennin Quartet demonstrated, many of the pieces which have been consigned to the depths are quite deserving of their obscurity.

Perhaps the most interesting aspects of the piece of Schubert juvenilia that opened the concert (Quartet in E flat, opus 125) are the structural anomalies which were explained in the program notes. The performance had both good and bad moments; some graceful ritards, a dialogue between the viola and 'cello in the last movement stylishly executed, also some faulty intonation and a few turns that didn't come off.

But generally the playing didn't do much to alleviate the basic dullness of the piece. In the slow movement several members of the audience fell asleep, while on stage all except the first violinist appeared to be in much the same state. The Parennin Quartet's very warm and overly lush string tone (created in part by the violist's bowing continually on the fingerboard) seems to have a definite soporific effect.

Polish composer Witold Lutoslawski's String Quartet, the next item on the program, is the kind of essay in new sounds that's typical of avant-garde music now. Apparently a good example of its sort, it included effects that made me think of eyebrow plucking, swarms of bees in flight, sirens, and creaking doors.

According to the 'cellist, the Quartet was booed and hissed while playing this work in the U.S. Toronto audiences don't do such things, of course, being much more progressive, or apathetic, depending on your point of view. The Lutoslawski quartet is partially "indeterminate", which means that certain aspects of the performance are left up to the discretion of the musicians, and in playing they must follow each other's cues in order to keep together. This worked out quite successfully, and the performance at least sounded well co-ordinated.

Verdi's Quartet in E minor concluded the concert. He should have stuck to writing operas. Not even the Parennin Quartet's good use of the theatrics of string quartet playing could save this piece.

CANYONS OF BAY STREET

Any resemblance to any persons living or dead is purely intentional.

by jack mccaffrey

as told to larry haiven

— to update files used by other companies to find out whether they do business with the companies mentioned first.

Great job, I thought, and I'm sure gonna work hard and conscientious.

Ben (who had been a cop in England before I.C.L.) told me on the first day: "All I.C.L. reporters are expected to be the epitome of the well dressed businessman!" He was resplendent in white socks, a shapless brown suit (with a crusty green splotch on the shoulder), trouser legs hiked way up, revealing eighteen inches of clammy white flesh.

Little did I realize that a few basic traditions were showing their slimy little selves. But I was all eagerness.

I always tried my hardest to do what Albert, the training supervisor told me. So when some idiot asked I.C.L. for a report on Gordon Lightfoot Enterprises (a concern he obviously thought had no future), I rushed out, little brown leather Mickey Mouse official I.C.L. briefcase in hand, to interview the principal of that particular corporation.

After pacing up and down the street nervously for 20 minutes, I took the plunge. I went to the door and knocked. (Oh, hello Mr. Lightfoot, McCaffrey from Investcorp Ltd. here. No. Hi there Gord, just checking up on the old corporation, y'know.)

I flipped out my little I.C.L. calling card with utmost aplomb and asked to speak to Mr. Lightfoot. He was in Charlottetown doing a concert. His wife was in Florida with the kids, and no one was prepared to give me a financial statement.

How could I go back to the office? And face Albert, bald of head and stern of demeanour (twenty years army service). Albert had two specialties: terrorizing the Red Rocket

"Well, Jack, what seems to be the trouble? I see you're sixteen reports behind this week."

"Well it's these darn complicated amalgamations and joint ventures."
"Oh come on now, they're all the same after a while, aren't they?"

"Not really. And it takes a long time to go through those twenty page prospectuses and get all the information."

"Well look Jack, I may be a nobody around here, but better minds than mine have figured out that everyone has to do eleven a day, and when the New York office wants to know how come we're not meeting our quota, I have to have an explanation."

Of course, like nearly all the larger companies in our free country, Investcorp Services Canada Ltd. suffers from headlessness. That is, big brother inhabits the walnut paneled boardrooms to the south. So the president is simply part of, not a chain of command, but an order of shit-kicking. When he gets the word from New York, he calls in the top manager, deposits the dung in his lap, and sends him out to transfer the load on down through the ranks until finally it lands on the reporter's desk.

We were treated to the spectacle liberally. The president would emerge from his boardroom office (private washroom) and shout across the room over the clickclack of typewriters and wringing of phones. "Ben". (The one office held about two hundred of us.)

Ben would scuttle nervously across the office, socks flashing, fingers popping, and hover in the doorway until he was told to enter the president's office. Then the number two man would come rushing out again and yell to the number three man across the office. And so it went.

the offices of Forked-Tongue Associates Mines, I would race around the controller's desk, fluff my handkerchief, blow my nose and ask: "Do you have fire insurance on these properties?"

Another fancy (which I almost fulfilled on my last day at work) was to dress in a pin striped suit, black shirt and white tie and accost the president of Motherhood Books Inc. speaking out of the side of my mouth.

That was all fine and good until the day I realized that no matter how outlandish a scheme I proposed to embarrass the company, even leaping up on my desk and machine-gunning the entire staff while yelling "victory to the working classes, a bas les imperialistes!", would not have made a ripple in the corporate latrine.

And so when my friend told me that the inflatable steel dinghies for patrolling the dykes and canals had been swallowed whole by the Moby Dick filing system, I was not in the least surprised.

Investcorp Ltd. is, of course, not an exception. It's closer to the rule in the happy corporation land. I did the unspeakable. I began to think and wonder how people could get along in the dung heap.

Nobody loves it (except the nuts, that is, and there are plenty of those). Most people fully realize that they are living in complete absurdity. They get a long, like the successful ones at I.C.L., by being "cool", making up for it on the weekends, or boozing. (If you don't have a good time on the weekend, your life becomes meaningless.)

So I got out. Came back to the groves of academe. I am now determined to find some way to a meaningful life. I have enrolled at the College of Education.

the jaques brel carousel comes around yet another time

"If I were the devil watching them sometimes, I think I would castrate myself; If I were God listening to them pray, I'm sure I would lose my faith."

The above is also a good example of how Brel's songs work — the images are so unexpected and the thought processes so wry that the lyrics are memorable even in a translation which occasionally works against the music. Line after line comes flying by that you want to catch and hold for replay on appropriate occasions, but the songs move too fast for mental shorthand, and they usually turn around on themselves in the middle.

park world of Carousel will soon distort itself into a freak show and chamber of horrors.

This repetition of approach is less obvious on stage, where many of the songs are given tremendous sophistication in their mounting directed by Moni Yakim. Song, singer and situation often move at sharp angles to each other. The result is a fascinating interplay of judgments.

Timid Frieda, for example, tells of a girl striking out into the bigdeworld. But the tale is told with distaste by a righteous-looking Salvation Army trio, who are themselves told on by a Brel gibe tossed out by Frieda as she strides by with her suitcase ("If we leave the world to them, they'll crochet it to the colour of goose shit") and by the fact that the leading lady is getting goosed and loving it even while she sings.

Such complexities of staging are sometimes intensified further still when the mood of the music or dancing is at variance with the lyrics. It almost becomes a con-brio experiment to see how many different things one song can be made to mean in performance. Brel, I suspect, would shrug his approval.

After months of doing the same thing, the re-opening-night cast (Loro Farrell, Bob Jeffrey, Judy Lander and Stan Porter) spilled off their numbers with a precision and polish which one would expect — and with an enthusiasm and emotional intensity which one would NOT expect.

The latter qualities almost brought the audience into the set — which is where they belong in the first place, since Jacques Brel is designed for cabaret performance — and occasionally they were overwhelmed. Mr. Porter alone seemed able to vary intensity and manipulate it to a song's advantage. Miss Lander's enunciation tended to get lost in her agonizing, and Miss Farrell's facial expressions oscillated between the classic masks of tragedy and comedy, with nothing in between.

But these factors and the occasional lighting fluff didn't stop the songs from getting through, which is what is at issue in Jacques Brel. And the more heavily the songs were dropped on the audience, the more they applauded. Nothing like cheering your own condemnation, for, we were warned at the beginning, "Jacques Brel says he writes the songs as he does because he's living in the world as it is." That could be an escape hatch, but it doesn't have to be.

Jacques Brel, I'm told, is Alive and Well and Living in Paris. (Or maybe Brussels.) The revue of the same name has been resuscitated — brought back from death (well, from Montreal) by CHFPI to the Bayview Playhouse. It's incarnated in the same company as last winter, and if you missed it then, try to catch it some time before it passes away again in mid-November.

But be fortified in advance for an evening that is as enervating as it is entertaining. Brel's evaluation of his kind and its prospects is a permanent pessimism that is heightened, not reversed, by occasional assertions that "If We Only Have Love . . . then tomorrow will dawn". Meanwhile, we usually don't . . . and will it?

To ensure that you don't miss (or dodge) the message, the revue is laced together with sayings of Brel that reinforce his negative verdict on humanity.

Sons of starts out as a lullaby with Brotherhood of Man overtones and becomes an impassioned Mothers-for-Peace marching song. La Fannette looks like nostalgia for a lover who was a friend, until, three mood changes later, you learn that the affair died because they weren't friends. Brussels begins as a celebration of the rag-time when Brussels could sing" and moves relentlessly on through the World Wars which ravaged Belgium and ended the party.

Inversion is a great way to devastate an audience: they get involved in an apparently innocuous number only to have its values evaporate or explode. But such a strategy can be used with full effect only once per given kind of song before it becomes predictable, and attacks can be fended off when anticipated. For example, once Marathon has presented mindless merriment dragged on into a survival-of-the-fittest struggle, it is easy to foresee that the amusement

Life in a box is better than no life at all, I expect.

You'd have a chance at least.

One of the senior American critics (I've forgotten the name) has a brilliant discussion comparing Kafka and Shakespeare. Both, he suggested, have essentially black visions: man is hauled into the world caterwauling and held captive for seventy years, baring tragic irony.

Within the prison, for Shakespeare the tale may signify nothing but it is full of sound, fury, colour and, so far as an existence devoid of meaning permits, dignity. Kafka's characters, on the other hand, reflect the void, are themselves faceless and arbitrary.

Tom Stoppard's Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are on the same axis, about halfway. Uncertainty is their normal state. While Hamlet may know a hawk from a handsaw (when the wind is southerly), R and G cannot quite reach the point of deciding which way southerly is. They are not Kafkaesque digits — they have too much panic for that, nor are they the treacherous courtiers of Shakespeare's play. They at least know better than to mistake a question for an answer or England for reality.

In this limbo, like Vladimir and Estragon in Waiting for Godot, they pass the plan by passing the time, only here with dazzlingly funny intellectual games far beyond the ken of the two French farceurs.

Black comedy is a more demanding form than is usually recognized; for while the work must have a comic integrity, it must also have in the same speeches, in the same lines, the tragic integrity basic to the black vision. And the master black-comedian has to control the interplay of the two meanings: he must lay shadows where the comic threatens to become dominant and bring out the absurdity of taking the tragic too seriously. At this, Stoppard is magnificent:

Ros: Did you ever think of yourself as actually dead, lying in a box with the lid on it?
Guil: No.

Ros: . . . I mean one thinks of it like being alive in a box, one keeps forgetting to take into account the fact that one is dead . . . I mean you would never know you were in a box, would you? I mean it would be just like being asleep in a box. Not that I'd like to sleep in a box, mind you, not without any air — you'd wake up dead for a start, and then where would you be? Apart from inside a box . . . Ask yourself, if I asked you straight off — I'm going to stuff you in this box now, would you rather be alive or dead? Naturally you'd prefer to be alive. Life in a box is better than no life at all, I expect. You'd have a chance at least. You could lie there thinking — well, at least I'm not dead! In a minute someone's going to bang on the lid and tell me to come out. "Hey you, what'syername! Come out of there."

Guil: (jumping up) You don't have to flag it to death.

R. and G., for all that, is still too long, more brilliant than Godot but less controlled. Stoppard cannot always resist the lure of a joke, e.g. having Ros shout 'fire!' (in a crowded theatre), a clever point, but one that comes out of left field and goes immediately back there.

If black comedy is difficult to write, it is even more difficult to perform. A slight edge to the comic and it becomes farce with delusions, a 'Shakespearean Festival' style production, and it falls flat as an elocution lesson.

The Producing Managers company at the Royal Alex opts for farce, for which Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead, with its layers of ironic British wit, is singularly inappropriate.

The play opens with Ros and Guil flipping coins:

Ros: Heads. (He picks up the coin and puts it in his bag. The process is repeated.) . . . Heads . . . Heads . . . Heads . . . Heads . . .

Guil: There is art to the building of suspense.

Under the humour there must be a feeling of awe, mystery, maybe slight fear, discomfort at being manipulated, discomfort that your discomfort at being manipulated has been manipulated . . . But all these nuances are lost as the Producers company charge through the lines and, indeed, the whole play without one good, respectable, British, theatrical pause.

The performances are uniformly American buffalo with only Frederic Warriner as Walter Brennan playing Polonius making a success of the genre. Casting Clebert Ford, a short stout friendly-looking black, as Guildenstern, a man obsessively introspective to the point of paralysis always just on the rational side of panic, is like casting Woody Allen as the Emperor Jones. I'm all for black power, I really am, but I'm also for intelligent iconography in the theatre. Anyway, Ford reads his lines badly.

John Church (Rosencrantz) should have Guildenstern since he is slightly tremulous for the empirical ingenue Stoppard had in mind. Still, he's not bad. Robert Burr gives the role of First Player dignity, something otherwise lacking in the performances. A man may be weak and scared, but he is still not a caricature.

In addition the Tragedians look too well fed for a wandering troupe fallen on indifferent times, the set is cluttered and the staging is clichéd, and the scenes culled directly from Hamlet should be used to counterpoint Stoppard's barren modernity. Instead they appear shoddy. Only the final moment of the play, Horatio's closing speech from Hamlet, stops the audience with the irony of the form.

Still, the high school students who made up almost half the audience ("Remember, meet in the southwest corner of the lobby and we'll all go to the bus together") enjoyed the comedy, especially the sex parts. Hopefully, the spoofing of Shakespeare — "What we lack in meaning," says the First Player, "we make up in obscurity" — will give them some armour with which to defend themselves the next morning when, if they all made it to the bus, Miss Smith asks, "Now, who can tell me an instance of irony?"

The play will be performed tonight, Saturday afternoon and Saturday evening.

"The short story is dead, but what form with more potential exists?"

Dave Godfrey (Death Goes Better with Coca-Cola), here quoted out of context from one of the author's introductions included in New Canadian Writing 1968, seems to have accidentally struck the keynote of that collection of short stories.

For the most part, the stories are typical — typical short stories in their strict adherence to accustomed norms; and typically Canadian in their authors' frantic search for "literary" characters and settings. American mid-west, back-woods Florida, Nigeria . . . anywhere but for God's sake not Canada, or about Canadians (or if so, don't admit it)!

Common among "sophisticated" Canadian writers is a disdain, painfully obvious here, for the efforts of folk-niks from Oscar Brand through Ian and Sylvia to Lightfoot ("Something to Sing About", "Four Strong Winds", and the inevitable "Canadian Railroad Trilogy") to get into Canada — her moods, land, people. . . .

New Canadian Writing, then, is misnomer — New Writing (by Canadians) would be a more honest title.

Of the 43 stories included in the book and its successor, New Canadian Writing, 1969, two, and only two, use Canadian locale.

An Arab Up North, by C. J. Newman, is set on a Dew Line camp near the arctic circle. The small, isolated working camp, while typical of what is left of the Canadian pioneering spirit that built the CPR against impossible odds, is used by Newman to bring out a close inter-personal conflict between an Arab and a Jew during the war of '56.

Which brings us to the question — are Jewish-Canadian writers the only ones proud enough of this country to set their stories here?

From these two collections of short stories it would appear that way, the only other story included which is recognizably Canadian is The Old Lady's Money by David Lewis Stein, set in the lower-class Spadina district of Toronto.

Jewish-Canadian nationalism aside, the next question is — are Jews the only Canadians who can write?

A good case for that thesis could be made just from the literary fertility of Montreal's Upper Westmount and Outremount areas, which can claim such names as Cohen, Layton and Richler as native sons. The pattern follows through here with titles such as How I Became a Jew, Yenteh and Everything Must Be Sold (about the closing of an, inevitably, Jewish pawnshop).

Contrasting sharply with the more common plots built around ethnic conflicts and urban alienation, is the lyricism of D. O. Spettigue. His stories, "usually set on a farm or in a small town", tenderly examine the lives of the little people — a delivery boy who fails at school, a mechanically impotent geographer, an inmate of an old folks rest home.

John Metcalf's "Walking Round the City" also has a very personal, lyrical subject in a man's love for his dog. His approach, however, replaces the softness of Spettigue with the more usual style of anguished bitterness — "The first policeman snatched at the bag and ripped it open. Her body (the dog's) flopped out and landed across the rim of a garbage can."

Dave Godfrey's (the only real innovator included in the two collections) Kwame Bird Lady Day comes from a series the author wrote "to overthrow the CIA . . . by a very abstract and artistic weaving of all the languages we speak . . . because I'm bored with plots in stories." Different, it is — a welcome attempt to do something different within the standard short-story framework. I also found it incomprehensible, which could well have been my own fault.

In summation, the manufacturers of Eddy sequin matchboxes beg to inform that "there are more than 200 covered bridges in New Brunswick".

to be a great canadian writer?

CANADA FIRST, the 1969 poetry anthology from House of Anansi, comes across very Canadian: lots of individual styles but impossible to pin down as a whole. There are 19 poets in the collection — A Mare Usque ad Edmonton — ranging in age from 21 to 37; and, although you can occasionally hear Cohen and Sylvia Plath muttering in the background, they go out on their own limbs. These are poets at a stage somewhere between publication in magazines called South Chappawwa Review or Pseudopod, and their first book. Some of them should be, and will be, more widely read.

This is a conscientious anthology: representative and diverse. Canada being the big sprawler it is, poets in different cities are into different things, and rather happily, the book has no stylistic centre. T. O. NOW, the first Anansi anthology, was inspired/infected by a Toronto contagion — a tricky, poet-as-cantorionist style — but CANADA FIRST is straighter without being easy, and keeps falling into satisfying fragments: singular poems, individual words, silence. If the book had a slogan, it might be Paulette Jiles' lines:

*I am not a tone or a note
I harmonize nowhere or Bob Flanagan's
we were rumoured to be found in words,
but it was not true.*

The best of the poets use the language grudgingly: they don't want to be too articulate. Which is not to say that they indulge in a lot of wilful obscurity or murky Poetic Effects. At their best, they're reticent, allogical, ungrammatical and completely on target.

Paulette Jiles' poetry is strong and sure (some of the other good poems seem rather fishy, as if they were a happy accident startling the poet as well as the reader).

Her poems come across as tough and metallic, but the software is always there: as in "Letter to Gradad. . ."

*I won't visit your already-divided homestead
Or help you feed the cows,
Or stir your muddy ears with shouts.*

*I won't be coming to your funeral, so
So long for now.*

*You knock me out
Remember our secret,
Remember our secret.*

The 14 poems by Bob Flanagan — and he definitely warrants the space — are the other highlight of the book. His poetry is compressed and almost inaccessible it's so airtight, but they're worth the work. He writes in a bone-spare style, and the words are eery in their familiar newness — in his own phrase, "language glistening wet". You have to read it with a continual shifting of the mind (or maybe no mind at all — they make subverbal sense):

Asleep, hand asleep, the night feared, continents of lives I am waking up,

*I am each skin's amaze
I am each skin's shape of eternal*

There are two voices from the East in the book — the drawing Maritime mysticism of William Bauer, and the Mandalas of John Douglas. Bauer has written a mus-ing series of poems about the life of Everett Coogler, vegetable-stand man, and in an off-hand, whimsical way he communicates both the mystery and absurdity of the commonplace. The 9 Coogler poems perhaps tell you more about Everett than you care to know, but it's enjoyable reading.

John Douglas's icon-poems play with the haiku form. The use of silence and white space make the words on the page a visual parallel to his still-centered images:

in my pockets you will *find the world speaks from this centre unearthly words can you hear me

I have been giving your love to others*

There's other good stuff: the lotimate, funny monologues of Thomas Lozar; "Crevecoeur", a slow-moving mythic composition of tangible rhythms and beautiful tone by Frederick Louder; a handful of slight, gentle pieces which dissolve under close scrutiny but are pleasant in passing.

CANADA FIRST has gaps, because it's an anthology of young poets, still testing and developing their styles. But it is to Anansi's credit that they are letting you see the stages in that process — it's encouraging to the poets and the readers.

will you reach an unconscious climax on the western terrace?

Two years ago I saw a small oil by Paul Fournier and thought it extremely rare. Here was a representational artist who was obviously (and not apologetically) talented. The rest of the exhibit confirmed my opinion then since the small and perfectly executed drawings of rats and crows deceased were being shown. So for the viewer who has been studying Fournier's development the present show at the Pollock Gallery should come as a surprise to see how far he has taken his painterly eye and maybe scale without essentially changing the nature of the work.

The paint has always been distinctively handled in delicate mist-like layerings that form the motif. Most of his previous work that I have seen also employs a centralized composition that, save for one near-example, does not occur in the present show. The shapes and colour were concentrated in the centre, feeding the rest of the surface in varying degrees of diffusion. This meant that a slow process of gradation took place that managed to maintain the picture's surface without falling into the textural possibility of a heavy paint build-up. Without this concentration of paint and by using his subject matter (paint) as an illusion Fournier arrived at a unique position in the vanguard of Toronto painters. He was a conservative who could lead.

In his present show paint is again the subject and succeeds best when it is depicting an even atmospheric illusion that sustains its tension across the picture's surface. Where the work fails in the artist's heavy handling of the composition as in "Blue Nassau" with its great curve falling from the upper left corner onto areas of diffuse (the paint is rubbed into the canvas) and pastel paint that simply cannot take the pressure. Before Fournier's work can develop in the new directions he is taking it, composition on a larger scale and perhaps a new use of colour must be resolved.

The former is revealing two directions and in such a beautifully controlled work as "Breath of Spring" it seems clear where Fournier can take it. But colour in this recent work takes on an almost illustrative quality which particularly grates when it is combined with often rather hackneyed titles. But once again Fournier is showing us the fertility of his talent. In an upstairs room at Pollock's there is a separate showing of pastels that raise a whole new set of problems, or solutions, for him. It is, I think absurd to ask someone like Fournier for "coherence"; there must be experimentation. But this present show has a great deal of the experiment in it and as such it will be up to Fournier to tighten his control on his diversity and leave us to judge at a future time.

On the Western terrace of the McLennan Laboratories there is presently a display of unconscious art. It is best viewed walking North to South since at about the two-thirds point an unconscious climax is reached. The display consists of wooden planks in groups usually two piles of seven each and stacks of cement blocks that utilize the same module. It is unusually strong in its aesthetic presence for such work and is a better work than last week's display of water, plastic and wind.

wanna see a stag movie with a difference?

The first question that you tend to ask yourself after seeing The Libertine is whether or not it is a comedy. It is funny, but you're never sure if it is the intent or the ineptitude of the movie. Initiating a 'comedy' with a funeral is perhaps a dubious beginning, but in The Libertine it seems to fit the general incongruity of plot, character and meaning. Most of the humour is derived from sex, as is the plot, character and philosophical intent. Irreverence is the keynote in the film, which attempts to annihilate every social institution in existence, primarily those of marriage and the traditional role of 'wife'.

The plot centers around a wife's discovery of a husband's infidelity. Apparently the husband's sports interests led, not only to death rendered by a flying tennis ball (symbolism, symbolism), but also a keen interest in the non-sports world of perversion. His home movies of various perverted diversions initiate feelings in the wife (Catherine Spaak) that she has been wasting her time, and that she should further her husband's cause after his untimely death. Her greatest concern, however, is not that her spouse was unfaithful, but that he didn't include her in the activities. In fact she isn't even listed in his little black rating book.

Determined to disprove the image of the 'little saint', she decides to dabble in the arts herself. With the 'Sexuals Psychopathia' as her operating manual, she systematically studies various prescribed methods of perversion. The only variety in her routine is a manipulation of subjects and methods.

Following a car breakdown, she accepts a ride by a very confident stranger, who seems shocked and even a trifle afraid when she accepts. After their love-making, he presents her with cash. Later she remarks on the trophy, with some pride, that it is the only money that she has ever earned in her life.

According to Mime, the wife, every man places women in one of two categories — either she is the respectable marriageable type or is the woman desirable in all ways but marriage. She never worries that she is categorized as the second type since she seems to feel that prostitution is a matter of definition — i.e. that a woman is a whore only if she rejects men.

Freud would have material enough to write another book with Mime's case as documented evidence. Perhaps she elicited rare talents from her partners, but they all fulfill at least some of her predictions concerning their sexual habits. Psychiatrists would be astounded at the classical derivation of her desires which are apparently institutionalized by Aristotle.

After extensive experimentation, Mime finally decides to restrict herself to professional men. A professor of radiology is her unwitting final guinea pig. After an uneventful yet stimulating encounter, she traps him by succumbing to his class. One field trip and a night together later, he proposes and the result concludes the movie — their individual propensities for perversion each a perfect complement of the other.

Rarely in any of the love-making scenes is there any affection, love or understanding between partners. Usually the couples merely use each other with no concern beyond their own satisfaction and pleasure. Often the violence they display in these scenes only serves to illustrate the emptiness in their lives — but perhaps this is searching too deeply for meaning in a movie meant for laughs. Yet, I wonder if it is really amusing to degrade something as potentially unselfish as sex can be, for the sake of a little humour.

The characters in this film are — sadly — developed only enough to reveal the stereotypes they represent. These caricatures are very funny, but it's difficult to get any constructive idea of anyone's relationships to anyone else, since everything is so consistently nebulous. As far as plot is concerned, the film is predictable and boring, but variations on the same theme help to add interest. The only constructive ideas conveyed are the various types of perversions, their origins and practice and Freudian advice in the field of sex.

Yet there are a few rare moments of sensitivity in the film as in the scene which depicts Mime crying from the voyeuristic stares of thirty Italians who catch her half-naked in a car. These moments are obscured, however, by the deluge of pointless sex.

The Libertine is a stag movie with difference. Not only does it entertain but it is also very, very, very funny, very, very sad and very frustrating. If nothing else, The Libertine proves that a movie based on sex simply doesn't satisfy.

white man come, white man see, white man conquer

The tendency to overkill which exists among promoters in the performing arts media has once again reared its ugly head.

In the stage production of The Royal Hunt of the Sun Shaffer made an intelligent, personal study of the meaning of exploration, conquest, power-lust and the love that must underline it all to make it lasting. Shaffer, a scholar of the heritage of the contemporary theatre, used mime, masks, dance, ritual, chant, music and the unlimited possibilities of the actor as a moving force to make the stage the best conceivable milieu for an epic of this structure.

But the problem with filming a spectacularly successful play lies in the nature of the transposition. There must be an inherent respect for the nature of the original in order to prompt the effort in the first place, yet the desire to see it in a new perspective should carry with it the vision of its validity, in augmented or condensed form.

In Royal Hunt, where the text, although fine, is but an element of the play as devised by the author, fidelity to the letter of the text is less essential. But to the nature of the play a kind of loyalty seems, justly, to have been supposed necessary.

Director Irving Lerner has let everyone down badly by his monumental indecision as to ethics, and his obvious ambiguity of attitude toward the aesthetics of film and theatre. He could have made of Royal Hunt a swashbuckling epic film, which would probably have been the best type of 'using the medium' possible in a theme of this sort. He could have tried the tack of the Olivier Othello, a frankly filmed-play with a few bonuses. Obviously, neither could have been a universally satisfying presentation, but each could have claimed its champions. What Lerner has done — a compromise to be euphemistic — will have few.

One of the most memorable moments of the stage production was the Mime of the Great Massacre, in which the Spaniards killed two thousand Incas. The use of mime here was the most brilliant method of bridging the credibility gap while retaining dramatic impact. Clearly loath to relinquish that force in his own shoddy effort, Lerner has filmed it in slow motion, an idea which may have made it on the drawing board but which never took on celluloid.

The direction of the film, in general, is suggestive of a colour-blind, slow-witted, deaf mongloid who doesn't speak English. Cuts and pans are simply designed to keep things moving. Symbolism is oppressively heavy, when used at all, and the characters of Pizarro and Atahualpa, the magnificent Inca, are under-developed. As for the meaning of the play as it once was, there seems to have been an executive decision to avoid communicating it.

Robert Shaw is an actor with many fine credits behind him, but this won't be one of them. His performance is genuine — the actor's sincere attempts to come to grips with the man he portrays are evident, but it has been senselessly stunted by Philip Yoridan's tepid screenplay and Lerner's impatient direction.

Christopher Plummer's Atahualpa is intently acted, but again the grim spectre of Lerner is forever over him, casting mottled shadows on the Son of the Sun. Plummer has a control which is enviable, and an imaginative canon of expressions and gestures with which to fill out the Inca to 70 mm.

But he is destroyed from the first by a tactical error by Lerner. The emotional response of the audience to Atahualpa is coloured badly by Lerner allowing the Inca to come to the Spaniard rather than them seeking him in his own court. In the stage production there was a definite holy quality about the appearance of the Inca as a huge gold medallion, representing the Sun, unfolding slowly to reveal him standing ceremoniously and imperiously above his obeisant vassals.

The Royal Hunt of the Sun presents the dilemma of a man who has lost his faith in contemporary religion. In Atahualpa and his delusions of immortality, Pizarro finds a possible new channel for hope and love, which is cruelly shattered by the Inca's death. He is the Christ-figure who makes his conquest but leaves Pizarro with a path to peace and true acceptance. But the film cuts off without any of Pizarro's self-examination, which gives his character its ultimate shape in the play.

This hunt, never royal, never saw the sun.

FILM

The U of T Film Society is presenting 22 films in two series (by press time you will have missed four if you haven't subscribed) at a price that even you can afford. Film societies are among the best things happening on this campus, and with theatre admission prices steadily escalating, they are the last hope for the penniless film devotee. With the sorrowful passing of the Elektra from Toronto, the U of T Film Society provides the largest selection of important films from the past (distant and near) in the city. Tickets for the Society's program are still available at the SAC building. Miscellaneous help is still needed — even graduate English students.

If you won't be able to catch Johnny Cash in person when he comes in November, you'll still be able to see a good deal of his act in his new movie, Johnny Cash, The Man, His World, His Music is playing at several Twentieth Century theatres. Much of the footage is from his summer show, but it still looks very exciting and fresh. Included is a segment of Cash recording with Bob Dylan, June Carter, Mother Maybelle Carter and The Carter Family, and The Tennessee Three will also be featured.

The major musical event of this evening is Phil Ochs concert at the Ryerson Theater (41 Gerard St. E.) at 8:30. Tickets are $2.50 and $3.00, and can be got at the SAC building and the other usual places.

John Hammond who plays blues as if he came up from the deep south will be at the Colonial through the weekend.

And one who, with Hammond, had a large part in making the N.Y. folk audience blues conscious, Dave Van Ronk, plays his equally deep-south sound at the Onion in the Ryerson Student Union.

Rob McConnell leads his big band, Boss Brass, at the Savarin. The band features a big, loud brass section and no needs. It's McConnell's most successful band to date, and perhaps the least jazz oriented.

Sunday's Hart House concert will consist of modern music played by flautist Robert Aitken, a dancer, a couple of percussionists, and various electronic tapes. The programme looks interesting (weird even.) 8:30 p.m., Sunday, Great Hall.

ET CETERA

Starting yesterday and running till Sunday evening, York University will hold a conference entitled The Year Of The Barricade, a conference about the student radical movement in Canada. The highlight of the conference will be a Phil Ochs concert to be held at Ryerson Theatre this Friday evening.

The conference is geared not for the radicals, but is rather about the radicals, and there will be representation by Conservatives, Academics, and Liberals as well as Radicals. Experts have been imported from Europe, the U.S. (especially S.D.S. workers) and Canada (Stan Gray, John Saywell, Andy Wernick et al) for the conference.

The four days will be divided among plenary sessions, workshops, and seminars with the emphasis on de-sensationalism. The conference has been fifteen months in the planning and is a non profit-making venture. All the participants appearing for expenses only.

Unfortunately, the conference proper is sold out. However, seats are still available at the time of writing for the Ochs concert at the SAC office, Ryerson, Sam's, and other centres for $2.50 and $3.00. i.d.

Drache accuses CUG of repressing research material

by LAURA KELLY

The Commission on University Government was accused of repressive tactics by Danny Drache, a researcher for CUG.

Drache presented his case at the general SAC meeting Wednesday evening.

The report is based on taped interviews Drache conducted with various professors. It was presented to CUG in September.

Publication of the report was delayed by CUG because of the confidential nature of certain statements made by the interviewees was questioned.

"Where we are hung up is exactly what was the understanding that the interviewees and interviewer had at the time of the interview," said Prof. L.E. Lynch, co-chairman of CUG.

Drache maintained CUG is preventing publication of the interview transcripts because they are based on a critical leftist analysis.

"The Commission is upset over the report. They don't want to release it," he said.

Drache also insisted that all the interviewees were presented with the questionnaires two weeks in advance of the interview, and at the time of the interview the profs. were informed of the public nature of the research.

"Some of the commissioners maintain that the transcripts should be sent back to the interviewees, and they should be allowed to edit," said Drache.

Drache maintained that editing would be censorship, and CUG would be in conflict with its policy of openness.

The debate over SAC action on the matter ended when Lee Coulter, SAC Education Commissioner spoke for CUG.

"CUG would like to release Mr. Drache's report in toto. If none of the people object to their own transcript CUG will release the report," he said.

The interviewees are expected to reply within the week.

If there are objections CUG can either print the report with editing, or the commission can overrule the interviewees' objections.

SAC decided to wait for a CUG decision before taking any action.

At the same general meeting SAC passed a motion to nominate 20 members for an interim discipline body, six of whom are to be selected by lot.

The motion represents a compromise of an original proposal that SAC appoint six members to the interim body.

The Association of Teaching Staff opposed the first proposal and SAC put forth the compromise.

The interim body on discipline was established after publication of the Campbell Report and after vigorous protest against a Caput statement saying traditional disciplinary procedures would remain in force.

The interim body will serve as a discipline committee until the Campbell report can be studied and acted on.

Apartment building goes to pot

by LARRY HANNANT

Another legalize-marijuana campaign has been launched in Toronto, this time aimed at finding support among members of the business working community.

The organization, called "Now" by Neil Harpham, the founder and driving force behind the campaign, is sponsoring a petition to be submitted to the Canadian Bar Association.

Harpham, 25, who is selling the apartment building he owns to finance the campaign, says that from his own experience he has ample proof that there is sufficient support in the community to get marijuana legalized.

"I do business in public," he says. "I deal with thousands of people and I think there is more than enough support."

"The cops are tired of having to prosecute users, the bar association feels the same way; I have a lot of lawyers behind me. Even the government knows there shouldn't be a law against pot."

The kind of support for legalization that is needed, Harpham believes, is support from professional people and ordinary citizens "who are just plain tired of hearing and reading about the pot issue."

And while petitions from university students do help the cause, he says, politicians will only act if they feel they have the community behind them.

Harpham wants persons to sign a petition giving their names and occupations at the Now office at 792 Yonge St. but wants people to join the organization as well.

If the legalize-marijuana campaign reaches a successful conclusion, and Now gets good support, Harpham intends to investigate other popular causes like abortion and pollution.

But he admits that support for the marijuana campaign is a prerequisite for him to immerse himself in any cause.

"I want people behind me. I don't want to be a martyr. And if I were an individual and I said something, no one would really care. But if you stand up and say that you represent some organization, they they have to listen to you."

His own reward from the effort he puts into the campaign is the involvement itself. "I'm getting political, you might say."

But he is optimistic that he will soon be openly puffing a joint. As he says, "it's the right time. There's a right time and a wrong time, and now's the right time. You just have to cap things off."

Parties hamper individual; MPP

"The party system is antiquated and destroys individuality," said Ron Knight, MPP for Thunder Bay, in a debate Wednesday at New College.

Knight, who split from the Liberal caucus on September 30, was debating U of T political science professor, Jack MacLeod on the usefulness of the party system.

"The problem is one of priorities. Is your top priority to see your party become the government party, or is it your own self-respect and ideals?" he said.

"As part of a team," he continued, "you must sacrifice some things for the team, but they're asking too much."

Prof. MacLeod argued that not only was the party system useful and necessary, but that it was inevitable.

"The basis of a democracy is self-government," he said. "Self-government implies discussion. Discussion leads to differences of opinion. A party is a necessary vehicle for resolving these differences into action policy."

Knight disagreed "I'm worried about the kind of world my kids are getting into. Society is turning people into 'rubber stamps', taking away their individuality. Organization comes from those concerned about specific issues."

In response to a question, Knight said he thought that revolution was necessary — but a quiet one, and done in such a way as to build respectability for the cause.

MacLeod thought that the principal deficiency of the party system was its domination by "timid, dull, moderating, compromising, middle-class positions".

"There must be greater left-right polarization as real alternatives for the system to become a vehicle for effective action," he explained.

He stated that many of Knight's proposals were familiar in Britain at the end of the 18th Century.

But he added, "If you're far enough behind one parade, you may be able to lead the next."

What did you learn in school today?

By GARD SHELLEY

Have you ever been in a class where the professor hands out the course outline at the end of October? That's how Prof. Wilkins started Sociology 201 yesterday.

The past month and a half have been devoted to "Course Mechanics" and "General Discussion". Room 1016 in New College admittedly has bad acoustics and consequently Wilkins can't be heard beyond a hundred feet. To compensate for this difficulty a portable sound system was incorporated yesterday and more confusion resulted from extremely low volume and relentless feedback.

Tutorials have still not begun and a list was posted assigning us to one of four tutor-al groups. Even though I've been in with the computer since pre-registration days I wasn't on any of the lists; neither was a friend.

Sociology 201, a course in methods of social research, is designed to teach the collection and interpretation of data, or how to cook your results. The next month, in the outline's words, is devoted to Lectures and seminars and all that kind of thing is what the learning process is all about at U of T. What did you learn in school today is an attempt to talk about what's happening there. The space is open to people who want to write about that kind of thing.

"Gearing up to do Research". The following unit should have been called "Down Gearing to Data Collection" but wasn't.

But the reading material may save the course. Texts by Philipps, Stephans and Weiss look as though they may clarify some of the problems. They are well organized and connected.

Unfortunately good texts cannot compensate for a lack of personal involvement by teacher and student. If any indication not much student-teacher rapport is likely to develop and confusion and disorganization will reign. On the way out of yesterday's class a fellow student remarked "Does Currie ever seem good now." (Prof. I. D. Currie taught Soc 120 last year.)

SAC Feels threatened

A worried and introspective Students Administrative Council Wednesday night created a committee to study the relationship between SAC and students.

“Don't underestimate how threatened this organization is,” said SAC president Gus Abols.

“Every time SAC comes out looking ludicrous in The Varsity, this organization is in danger of being destroyed. We have to learn to deal with the administration as a united group on the students' behalf,” said Abols.

“Students outside couldn't give a shit about what's happening in this room,” said Chris Szalwinski (III ASPC).

“I hope SAC is still around next spring,” said Dave Brown

(III VIC) who has resigned his seat to be a member of Victoria College's mini-CUG.

Su Crowe (II Erin) spoke to the Council of Erindale students' discontent with SAC.

“We're not getting a great deal out of SAC. There's no attempt at liaison,” she said.

Hark. The Blue and White Band approaches with well-percussed tunes and watermelon.

“May it soothe all your wounds and thirsty throats,” intoned Dale Wilson, the band major, as he presented the watermelon to SAC.

The meeting continued. SAC set up a nine-member commission to study the relationship between Scarborough and Erindale, and the St. George campus.

WATER POLO

By DAVE BREECH

It's taken a full year for the Varsity water polo squad to recover from its embarrassing loss in the 1968-69 OQAA championship, and new coach Kirk Thompson doesn't intend to live through that agony again.

Thompson's coaching policy stresses strenuous conditioning and emphasis on the fundamentals. "The team in the best condition and with the most endurance and ball-handling ability usually wins," he explains.

Following this basic philosophy, Thompson puts the squad through a vigorous two-hour practice three evenings per week, including distance swimming, sprints, ball-handling and scrimmage.

Toronto and McGill have been the only two teams involved in the intercollegiate competition for the Herschorn Cup since 1909. McGill has won the cup more times than Toronto but the Blues have been the dominant power in the last decade winning the championship seven out of the last nine years.

This year there will be integration into this fifty year old rivalry by McMaster, Western, and Guelph. These teams plus Toronto will form the Western Division and McGill will be the lone team in the Eastern Division. There will be a round robin in the Western Division with the winner facing McGill for the Cup.

Although three prominent members of last years team are not returning, namely Dave Breech and Chris McNaught, two high scoring forwards, and Skip Bergman, an experienced defenseman; the team will have strength and depth.

Returning from last year's team are Alex LeRoy and Andy Hackett, this year's Captain and Vice-Captain. Other returnees include Hunter Milbourne, Derek Duvall, Brian Barras and Peter Petzold.

Blues tenacious goal-line defence stops Queens early in last week's game. The Varsity line held on three plays from inside the five. In picture at left, along the goal-line are Dave Veale (72), John Gordon (28), Jim Kellon (66), Pete VonBodegom (63) and Bart D'Onofrio (55). Then the offensive line takes over (right) and moves the ball out of danger. Varsity photog ted Zier-Vogel captures the left side of Blues blocking brigade, Mark Slater (7), VanBodegom (63), guard (hidden), and center Rein Enno (42).

Blues are locked in a three-way tie for first place, but as Queens and McGill battle each other in Montreal, Varsity could use the luck of the schedule to have one of its opponents automatically eliminated.

IF, and only if Blues beat Western.

And the key to beating a rushing-prone team like the Mustangs is the play of the offensive and defensive lines.

At Center, Rein Enno is a more than adequate replacement for last season's all-star, Rick Agro, who switched to linebacker.

On the right side, Derek Turner and former all-star Jim Kellam; on the left, problems.

Injuries to Gord Whitaker and Norm Trainor forced Murph to insert Pete VanBodegom from the defence and go with 180-pound Don Fraser.

VanBodegom has played well in his new role and Fraser developed into an excellent pulling guard until a concussion knocked him out of the game last week.

On defence, no-one runs against the left side patrolled by veterans Alex Squires and Jim Bennett, but Queens discovered running room through rookie Bill MacNamara and second-year man Bart D'Onofrio.

Western must establish its running game early or Blues will simply pass the Stangs silently. Walter Sehr and Alboini may get the glory, but if Blues are still in first-place to-morrow evening, MacNamara and D'Onofrio will be a major reason why.

The Ontario Hydro is getting ready to give it to you from great heights.

There are lots of polluters who are filling the air with poisons but around Toronto, there is none as blatant as the Ontario Hydro.

This is their new plan. Currently there are eight smokestacks at the Hearn generating plant that spew out the 80,000 tons a year of sulphur dioxide that comes from burning over 2.36 million tons of coal a year. Now the Hydro has a great idea to rid Toronto of this pollution. They're going to build a 700' smokestack to handle all the poison in one easy method. And this does mean that there'll be less ground sulphur dioxide poison around the plant area but the 80,000 tons still have to go somewhere. As of now, it looks like that somewhere will be Scarborough. Or Pickering. Or out in the Lake. (Isn't it great how The Lake becomes our great green garbage bag?)

Just a word on sulphur dioxide. It's a gas. And it can injure delicate tissue. It can easily aggravate respiratory diseases. (It can even start some.) It contributes to poor visibility and high humidity in the areas in which it exists. It combines in the air to form acid which really kicks the heck out of our plant life (pine trees in particular). It also attacks and destroys even the toughest metals like steel and zinc. So you can imagine what it can do to your body.

So what's the alternative? First, forget about throwing the pollution up higher in the sky. That simply doesn't get rid of the problem. Secondly, find another way of powering the generator. George Gathercole of Hydro says, "We were not able to get a firm commitment on a natural gas supply." Oakah Jones of Consumer's Gas says, "We can supply the gas if they can tell us how long the Hearn plant will be used." Somehow it seems pretty basic doesn't it?

The big alternative is for you to do something about this. Fill out the coupon in this ad (or write on anything you can) and send it to the Honourable George Kerr, Minister of Energy & Resources Management, at Queen's Park, Toronto and register your feelings with him while you're still healthy enough to do something about it. If the Hydro are going to get us from great heights, maybe we can do the same to them.

DEAR MR. KERR,
Minister of Energy and Resources Management, Queen's Park, Toronto, Ontario.

I am against the Ontario Hydro smokestack.
I am against sulphur dioxide polluting my air.
I am for something being done before it's too late.

Glendon conference ends in mass picket line

By GEORGE RUSSELL

More than 250 demonstrators — a cross section of the Canadian student left plus leaders of youth movements in France, Germany and the United States — picketed in front of the Toronto Globe and Mail yesterday, demanding the newspaper end its distortion of the struggle for self-determination in Quebec.

Climaxing their protest by forming a gigantic, moving circle in a vacant lot opposite the Globe building, the students chanted their support for an independent, socialist Quebec and demanded the Globe "end the lies or shut it down."

Among the protestors were Luc Barrett, president of the Union Nationale des Etudiants de France; Reimot Reich, past president of the Socialist German Student League (SDS); Michael Klonsky, former national secretary of the U.S. Students for a Democratic Society; and students from virtually every province in Canada.

The demonstrators were delegates at Glendon College's "Year of the Barricades," a four-day symposium on the nature and direction of the international student movement which began last Thursday.

Their action was initiated by a women's caucus which formed at the conference, which proclaimed that female delegates would march on the Bell-Sifton-Soutbam newspaper to express solidarity with Quebec women fighting for national self-determination.

A leaflet circulated at Glendon Saturday claimed the Globe was leading "a systematic campaign of slander and smears, falsehood and distortion," aimed at whipping up "an atmosphere of hysteria in Canada."

The aim of the press campaign, the leaflet said, was "to isolate the people of Quebec from Canadians who would support their struggle if they knew what was going on."

"The Toronto Globe and Mail is the mouthpiece of English-Canadian capital, which oppresses the people of Quebec and is responsible for the current wave of repression against them."

Saturday evening, delegates at the symposium heard political activist Stanley Gray, a member of Quebec's left-wing Front de Liberation Populaire, explain that a front-page story in the Globe October 23 had earned approximately three inches of column space on the back pages of Montreal newspapers.

The story outlined charges by an English-Canadian lawyer in Montreal that nationalist organizations in Quebec were financed by Moscow, Cuba and the El Fatah (a militant section of the Palestine Liberation Front.)

The lawyer was speaking to members of the Mount Royal Women's Club, an organization founded and operated by members of Montreal's English upper-class community.

"It would be very nice if this fellow would give us the names of all the people he says are financing our organization," Gray said, "because we're really short of money right now — in fact, we're in debt."

Gray, formerly a political science lecturer at McGill University until fired for his part in disrupting a meeting of the university's board of governors last year, attended the conference to explain the activities of the FLP and to raise funds for members arrested in a current crackdown on independent activity.

Gray refused to comment on the protest by the symposium delegates, declaring "it is not my job to tell you people what to do in your country."

Non-academic staff walkout at Guelph

By MARY KATEROWAN
Varsity Features Editor

GUELPH — Last Friday night after a social gathering, a dean at the University of Guelph vacuumed the floor.

Other faculty members washed dishes and emptied ashtrays. They weren't doing it for a lark, but out of necessity.

Members of the university non-academic support staff are on strike.

More than 800 members of Branch 10, Civil Service Association of Ontario walked off their jobs at the University of Guelph Friday morning, backing demands for higher wages and union security.

Branch 10 is divided into two bargaining units — trades, maintenance and services personnel; and office, clerical, laboratory and technical personnel.

At present, membership in the union is voluntary. Union officials want it to be compulsory.

Security guards and firemen are on strike. Special steps are being taken by the university faculty to care for the research and laboratory animals.

STUDENTS HELP

Employees of Versa Foods, caterers for the university, refuse to cross the picket line. Reports from the university indicate the students are helping man the cafeterias.

The strike, the second in two years, came after 15 hours of negotiations with a government labor officer as conciliator. Last year's strike lasted three days.

Strikers demand parity with civil service salaries.

Until 1965, Guelph was an agricultural college and all employees were classed as civil servants, under the Department of Agriculture.

With the establishment of the University of Guelph in 1965, all employees came under the jurisdiction of the university and its Board of Governors.

The faculty decided to affiliate with the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

Non-academic staff voted overwhelmingly to remain with CSAO.

At that time, according to CSAO, university president J. D. MacLachlan (now retired) told the staff they would not lose any benefits by transferring to the university.

According to the CSAO press release:

"Since then wages have fallen behind the civil service rates and the conditions of employment have seriously deteriorated.

"They (the support staff) have lost two statutory holidays (Remembrance Day and Easter Monday), the right of female employees to maternity leave and many other items."

LOW WAGES

Mrs. Trix Davies, business agent for CSAO estimates present wages to be "21 to 80 per cent below Civil Service rates."

According to Mrs. Davies clerical workers receive $54.50 a week. The university demands applicants to have grade 12 education.

On the other hand, the union says, civil servants in a comparable position receive $66.00 a week with only grade ten education demanded.

The strikers also demand union security — compulsory payment of union dues by all employees, including those who do not legally join the union.

The university, in a statement issued by President W. C. Winegard, said it was willing to consider union dues as part of a total settlement in the trades maintenance and service unit where the union has a significant majority. Monetary items, according to the statement, appear to be very close to agreement in this unit.

But Dr. Winegard says the only way the university could meet the demands of the CSAO in the office, clerical labor and technical units "would be by curtailing or eliminating various programs vital to the ongoing work and growth of the university."

He did not elaborate.

All universities in Ontario are experiencing cutbacks because of decreases in capital grants from the provincial Government.

The union charges the university with "extravagance, waste and luxury at the expense of the employees salaries."

As an example, they refer in a press release to asphalt walks "covered over with hand-laid bricks."

FIXED EXPENSES

In a letter to his colleagues, President Winegard says "It is true that the university operates on a fixed yearly 'Operating Expense Account' and,

Volume One ...

Sometime today, a wrecking crew will arrive at a three-storey stone building at 635 Spadina Avenue and dismantle it to make room for another parking lot on campus.

The first floor of the building was occupied by Volume One, the only second hand bookstore in the vicinity of The University of Toronto.

Usually when you wandered into Volume One, next to The Royal Bank of Canada at Harbord and Spadina, Len Kelly would be sitting, reading, half-hidden behind the huge gold-filigreed National cash register.

Behind him, suspended from a bookshelf, a framed diploma "The Booksellers of Britain and Ireland. This is to certify that Leonard Kelly has been awarded the Diploma in Book-selling with honours." The store was cramped with books lining the floors and climbing to the ceiling.

Last Saturday morning, the floor of Volume One was loaded with books. But they were all packed in boxes. Javex bleach, Joy detergent, Co-Co Puffs and Delsey bathroom tissue. Cardboard boxes bending at the bottom as you picked them up. In the window a sign scrawled: Volume One will be closed on Saturday Oct. 25. We are moving to our new location at 427 Spadina Avenue.

We sat on the steps of the bookstore, grey pink front glittering in the Indian Summer brightness, eating ice cream cones and waiting for Len Kelly and his friend with the truck to arrive.

A blue-black 1951 Buick pulled up in front of the store. Len, a lanky figure got out, straight dark hair flying, came up to the step, looked around and said, "I guess I told my friend to be here at one. Why don't we go down to the new store?"

The six of us piled into the car, which had old-time snake loops to hang onto in the back. We stretched in the couch seats, marvelling at room inside the Buick.

Al Capone and the Gang. Red book on back ledge: Ontario in your car. Len staring straight ahead through black-rimmed glasses. As he turned a corner, the large rip in his green corduroy jacket opened in a yawn, then closed back to join the seam.

Straight down Huron Street, across College, hang a right down an alley and enter another world. Here was a street with no trees or grass, just concrete up to the red and green painted porches. Picket fences around these small houses on Glasgow Street, where you could spot the Clark Institute through another alley.

We walked through the back of the store, past the old gas stove, the long wooden planks and more garbage boxes full of paper plates and empty baking powder tins.

The front was clean and shelves had already been set is the greatest street in Toronto. Across the wide road, where the cars park diagonally is The Famous Dairy restaurant and Bakery where you can get Israeli dishes. Next door is La Patria and a little further up, Aunt Bea's Nashville room for good country music. And behind all this, the throbbing color and food of Kensington Market.

Len thinks some of the well-fed people from the restaurants will come across to the store, but mostly he hopes that students will wander down Spadina and browse around the store, where you can get Dickens' complete works for $20 or a Swedish version of Orwell's Animal Farm for 25¢.

up and lined with books.

Len hadn't given the new store much attention in the month since it had been open, running up and down Spadina with books from one store to the other, life pretty chaotic and business sporadic.

He closed Volume Two, his bookstore on Markham Street, at the end of the summer. Now he was incorporating Volume One and Volume Two into the New Volume One store down Spadina. The red awning outside read Parkdale Wines Ltd. and old men still staggered in looking for a bottle or two.

The store stands in the best part of Spadina Avenue which Len and a curly headed man in a green striped tee-shirt which barely covered his stomach stood in the store and handed boxes down to Tim, to me, to Ilka, to Larry, to Reuben, to David, who stood inside the truck arranging them. Errol stood on the side taking pictures. After a while the human chain built a rhythm and you forgot that your arms and back weren't really strong. Lift and pass, lift and watch out for that one the bottom's falling out. Sometimes a heavy one like Travel and Nature had to be carried by two people.

And when the truck was full, we drove back down Huron Street, through the back alleys and unloaded the truck.

Poetry. Occult 1st Ed. Philosophy. By the second trip the Buick door was draped in discarded jackets and By the fourth trip the Old Volume One had been stripped to shelving and the counter. The screws were loosened and the shelves dismantled. On the counter in a plastic bag was a size small poster dress of P.E. Trudeau.

We loaded the truck with planks and the massive black counter, tied the truck closed and headed back to the store.

After unloading again we sat on boxes of books sipping beer from the fridge in the back.

Len reminisced about the days when he worked at the U of T bookstore and used to have $400 book bills. Now he reads a book and if he doesn't like it, puts it back on the shelf of his store.

Leaning against a wall of books, with hardly a line in his pale face, Len Kelly mused about the hole that would soon replace his store, "Why I bet they can only park four or five cars in that spot."

— Interview between Danny Drache and E. W. Nuffield, chairman of Geology.*

We'll publish the Drache Report if CUG won't

The Commission on University Government is still delaying the publishing of Danny Drache's Research Report on the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The Commission first wants to secure the approval of the departmental chairmen who were quoted in the report.

Drache carried out a number of straight-forward and open interviews with these chairmen — interviews that lay much of the factual basis for Drache's incisive analysis into the structure of departmental decision-making and the process of the liberal reform movement at the U of T.

In the letter below, Robin Ross, on CUG's behalf, tells us with all due sincerity how much the Commission would like to publish the Drache Report.

But CUG still insists on giving the departmental chairmen the right to censor their own interviews. The Commission's reaction is understandable.

Drache's report completely invalidates what CUG has spent nearly a year doing — generating structural reform at the U of T.

Structural reform means setting up committees ("democratic decision-making processes") without fundamentally changing what gets taught, why it's taught and who teaches it.

As Drache points out in his report:

"The extent to which reforms have used the status quo structure of power to limit change explains the uniformity in the reforms themselves. The changes in decision-making, in the structure of departmental government, and in policy matters reflect the outlook of the two most powerful groups within the department, the chairman (in most instances) and the majority of faculty members."

All that sounds like empty rhetoric. But the cruelest out of all is that those words are based on quotations from the horses' mouths — namely the departmental chairmen.

Nearly all of them admit that, in effect, the staff-student committees are just a sop to the students.

For instance:

"The regulations of the university, I believe, say that I'm sole arbiter and I take the ultimate responsibility for any decision. I make the ultimate decision..."

... The decisions we make seem to be inevitable decisions. No matter who had to make them, any reasonable person would have to come to more or less the same conclusions. So it may be nice to have the student point of view, but I don't think it would make an awful amount of difference." — J. M. Daniels, Chairman of Dept. of Physics.

And also:

"Well there's something in a guild — a guild has a certain craft or art which it has perfected, it has made rules about, it has developed a professionalism about. That's not phony. They know how to build a better mousetrap, or they have tried to have it proved to them they can't.

I think that this whole business about democracy in an academic institution is fundamentally phony. And that's why, if you want to talk about guilds, I'll talk about guilds." — professor Thornton, Chairman of History Dept.

If CUG does not break its own ties with the academic guild and publish the report by Tuesday, The Varsity will publish it Wednesday in some form or another (by excerpt or summary) — especially the quotations.

For we have one of the only copies around.

bad faith and suppression

The following is the text of a letter Danny Drache and James Feeley sent to the Commission on University Government to protest CUG's attitude towards their research:

Dear Co-Chairmen,

It is necessary for us to comment on the afternoon meeting of September 5th. The decision of the Commission to unilaterally redefine the status of the research is in direct opposition to the terms of reference under which we worked.

First it must be pointed out that the entire research was directed by Commissioners Hodggets and Rae. They helped formulate the framework and they gave specific guidance when requested. They were kept informed of our progress. We worked well together and we all knew and understood,

1. that the Commission wanted and expected independent research;
2. that the research was an integral part of the Commission's work; and
3. that all information collected was for the public record.

This last point now appears to be crucial. At no time did Commissioners Hodggets or Rae give any indication that some information collected would, or could, be classified or restricted. In mid-May the Commission itself, when it received a presentation of the major research undertaken, gave no indication that information collected could be classified or restricted.

But now the Commission has changed its mind and has declared that material contained in the transcript of the oral interviews is virtually classified and restricted information. This puts Research Associate Drache in an untenable position. Having conducted his research and written his report within the given terms of reference he is now told that his work is not to be regarded in the spirit and the letter in which the entire work of the Commission was done — as an open and critical inquiry into the conditions of University life.

We are under no illusions about the seriousness of the situation. The Commission has threatened the independent status of the Drache report. The report would be emasculated if the quotations are censored. And in this case emasculation is destruction. To know that Drache was writing a report analysing the decision-making structure of the Faculty of Arts and Science, to know his report was based on interviews with the chairmen, to let him go ahead and write his report, and then to tell him that quotations from the transcripts cannot be used, is, to say the least, to act in bad faith.

But it is more than that. Ex post facto classification is suppression. The only reason a researcher requests classified information is because he cannot get it openly. But this was not the case and even if it had been, the decision to classify information would have been made before the information was obtained and not months after.

Let us look at the interview situation more closely. Most interviews were conducted with a tape recorder. No interviews were held in camera. No interviewee was told that the interview was confidential. Not only was confidentiality never agreed to by an interviewer, but on one occasion one research associate did not carry out a projected interview because of the possibility that confidential information would be disclosed.

Whether the interviewees now want or do not want their interviews put in the public domain is therefore irrelevant. They should have no say in the matter. It was decided long ago, even before the research was undertaken: the Commission declared itself open.

We trust we have made our position clear. We think that the Commissioners are guilty of some confused thinking. We hope that when the time is taken to consider the matter extensively it will be agreed that the collected research cannot be classified, that the Drache report stands, and should be released as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,
D. DRACHE—Research Associate
J. FEELEY—Research Associate

dissipate uncertainties

Sir,

I refer to your editorial "Academic Freedom?" in the Varsity of the 24th October, in which you commented upon the release of a report prepared for the Commission on the Government of the University of Toronto by Mr. D. Drache, employed by the Commission as a full-time member of their research staff.

The position about the Drache report is as follows.

1) As you say, the proceedings of C.U.G. were open. However, all persons who gave written or oral evidence to the Commission were clearly informed by the Commissioners of the open and public nature of the Commission's work before they gave such evidence. This was done to avoid any possible misunderstanding on the part of the person giving evidence.

2) In his research work for the Commission, Mr. Drache interviewed many persons. The Commissioners have reason to doubt that he made it clear to all the persons whom he interviewed that the evidence which they presented to him might be made public. Indeed, some of the persons so interviewed have stated to members of the Commission that he did not make this clear.

3) The Commission had asked Mr. Drache to submit the results of his research by the end of July. However, he did not do so until September, by which time the Commissioners were wholly involved in the final drafting stages of their own report which they had undertaken to publish in mid-October.

In his report to the Commission, Mr. Drache has quoted some ten verbatim passages from his interviews. The Commissioners discussed only these passages, and no other aspects of Mr. Drache's lengthy report, at a meeting held on the 15th October, at which Mr. Drache was present. This meeting failed to dissipate the uncertainty concerning Mr. Drache's procedures in explaining the public nature of his research work to the persons whom he had interviewed. In the circumstances, the Commissioners agreed that they should themselves contact the persons interviewed by Mr. Drache, and quoted in his report, in the hope that these persons would give their assent to the publication of the quotations attributed to them by Mr. Drache.

4) Since the 15th October, the Commissioners have been attempting to contact the persons involved, and they hope to have contacted them all in the near future. Some of these persons have been away from the university in the past week.

5) The Commission is anxious to permit the early publication of the report, and will undoubtedly do so as soon as they have satisfactorily clarified the uncertainty concerning Mr. Drache's procedures vis-a-vis the individuals whom he has quoted in his report.

'How do you have a worker-student alliance when the workers are not allowed in here?'

by BRIAN JOHNSON

"If we can't eliminate class chauvinism in this school — Glendon — than we've got to shut the place down."

Everyone clapped and cheered.

A few clenched fists.

After all, it was a good speech.

Nobody got up to shut Glendon College down, for this was only a conference. Another conference.

Michael Klonsky, former national secretary of the SDS, was speaking at Saturday's plenary session of Year of the Barricades — a peep-show of radical international all-stars at Glendon over the weekend.

The conference was not organized by the Canadian left. But the elite of the Canadian left came to watch their American and European counterparts perform on stage.

A radicals-in-cages conference. Year of the Zoo.

Closed circuit television cameras and bright red admission tickets that cost ten dollars each marked the conference as a prestigious affair.

It seemed as if the Queen had held a garden party for the cream of Canadian left and invited foreign revolutionary dignitaries as guest speakers.

As international experience flowed from the panel in Saturday's plenary, some good things were said. Meanwhile the Canadian left waited and watched. Intimidated. Waiting for ogasm.

Mike Klonsky spoke with a southern drawl awkwardly clipped with a militant urgency. He spoke of the SDS Convention in Chicago, against the Progressive Labor Party which was purged from that Convention after a major split.

"The response of many people to the convention," he said, "was 'Oh, isn't that terrible — all this factionalism going on'. But the split was an ideological struggle. This bitter fighting has been a good thing, a positive thing.

"There was a major question involved — white supremacy. We live in the heartland of U.S. imperialism, right in the heart of the monster that has its tentacles deep in other countries, sucking them dry.

"The history of the left in the United States has been characterized by white supremacy — chauvinism of the worst kind."

Yeah. Everyone nodding. We Canadians know about all that history. Slavery an' all that in Chapter 7 of the Grade 13 textbook.

"Every struggle in U.S. history was broken and turned around into a tool for white supremacy.

"At the Chicago Convention the Progressive Labor Party made attacks on the Black Panthers as racists. How could we expect the masses of the people in our country to fight white supremacy and chauvinism when we couldn't rid our own movement of it?"

"Those who are not willing to confront the question of white supremacy cannot call themselves a revolutionary movement."

Yeah. Proud New Leftists clap and smirk at the chauvinistic members of the Canadian Party of Labour. The Trotskyites seem oblivious to it all. Their lips move in faint intimation of the words — "End Canadian Complicity."

Clenched fists again. No chauvinism here. Nosirree. No white supremacy.

No blacks.

Klonsky talked about the Harvester strike in Chicago, where the Re volu-tionary Youth Movement of the SDS united with blacks and Puerto Ricans on the picket lines.

"In order to build unity with the blacks in the Third World, we are going to have to struggle against ourselves."

"In Cook County Hospital 200-300 sterilizations a month are performed — mostly on Black and Puerto Rican women. They are often forced to sign papers authorizing it."

"We joined them in their struggle and demanded an end to genocide and oppression of blacks and Puerto Ricans.

"We've got to carry on the struggle inside the movement and eliminate chauvinism.

"A common attitude in the student movement is: 'We don't hate workers — if workers want to join our revolution, that's fine.'

"You can't go through 13 years of school in Canada and have an anti-working-class feeling drummed into your head day after day without being infected by it. You have to fight it in yourselves."

That's bringing it back home, Mike. Everyone claps — glory in self-flagellation.

During that plenary Canadians forgot their own history. The revolution of panel-politics was coming.

When the audience rose from a combination of boredom, awe, and intimidation, the response came in the form of petty factional fights.

Jackie Henderson, a Trotskyite, took the stage and pleaded for mass action.

"We should have 3,000 people here. How do you have a worker-student alliance when the workers are not allowed in here? We've got to fight the revolution in the streets around the most central issue — Vietnam . . ."

She followed with a torrent of Trotsky jargon. Straining to invoke the masses with the magic wand of rhetoric.

Don Roebuck shot a couple of paper darts just above her head. Paper darts that had been beautifully engineered over the past hour.

Between the words and the sectarian fighting, there was one revolutionary moment.

A Quebec separatist from the panel stood up and told the audience that the conference had been a bore and that he would not try to add to the boredom with more words.

He climbed up onto the table, and took a dollar bill from his wallet.

"This," he said, holding the bill up high, "represents all the institutions against which the movement is fighting — Yes?"

Yes. Loud Cheers.

He then took a lighter from his pocket and burned the green, Queen-covered piece of paper to a crisp.

Several members of the audience took out their red admission cards and set them alight. They proclaimed the conference open.

The conference contained little theatre and much rhetoric. And no action. The Canadian left seemed paralysed by their inability to move out of their own history.

Everyone agreed that the central issue was Quebec.

But the conference was unable to act as a whole around Quebec when a demonstration against the Globe and Mail was finally suggested. Womens' Liberation was the only group capable of acting, of organizing.

Everyone else was too busy proving the credentials on his red card.

A familiar scene where the local army is protecting the local people. Are these the barricades of Mexico? Bolivia? Vietnam? Harlem? Montreal? They certainly aren't the barricades of Glendon College, where a radical conference — Year of the Barricades — prompted little more militancy than the closed circuit television cameras that watched it.

Barricades built on Quebec struggle

By SUSAN REISLER

Despite an impressive guest list of international radical leaders, Canadian participants at last weekend's Year of the Barricades conference tried to focus on the issue of Quebec.

The Quebec French clearly brought their movement down from the academic level and gave concrete examples of the repressive measures being used against the French people in Quebec.

For example, during a march held in support of unilingualism and the action in St. Leonard, the Riot Act was read. But very few people heard it.

As a result some people who continued with the march are charged with sedition and treason against the state. That charge carries a life sentence.

Right now in Quebec it is illegal to hold political gatherings of more than 15 people in the CEGEP's (community colleges).

Malcolm also linked Gray to the Black Panther Movement.

The Montreal press refused to carry any of these accusations. Gray said there was absolutely no proof for what Malcolm said and the Montreal press was aware of this.

What the Glohe and other Toronto papers did was try to whip up a hate campaign and drum up more English support against what was happening in Quebec, said Gray.

Quebec police now have warrants which allow them to go into any organization's office and confiscate their print-

The province is still technically under marshall law and the army's presence is still felt in Montreal.

Conference participants were concerned enough about the situation in Quebec to ask Stan Gray, fired McGill professor, to come down to the conference to speak about the situation.

Gray used two Glohe and Mail stories which appeared last Friday as examples of the type of information the rest of Canada is fed about Quebec.

In one story Liberal lawyer T. R. Anthony Malcolm charged that members of the separatist Parti Quebeccois were getting financial aid from Cuba, Algeria and the Soviet Union.

ing presses, files, and other material.

It is impossible to hold rallies or demonstrations without worrying about the Riot Act being read, and if you will be able to hear it.

Listening to Gray and talking with other Quebeccois, a few people at the conference decided there was something that the group as a whole could do to support the French in Quebec.

From this sterile discussion an action was born — participants decided a march on the Glohe and Mail would be at least one way they could show their solidarity with the people in Quebec.

therefore, cannot meet the present wage demands of the CSAO negotiating committee.

"It is not true that money spent on buildings and art work could have been used for salary increases. Funds for these items come from a separate Capital Account and each item must be approved by the province of Ontario. By law, these funds cannot be used for wages."

The Guelph Transportation Commission refuses to cross the picket line, and has rerouted bus service around the university except on one main road. They will not, however, let people on or off along that road.

Some students offered to join the picket line but the union refused.

One faculty member said, the faculty will do the essential jobs such as garbage collection and animal care.

Students are not being asked to help, but may volunteer. They will not be paid.

There is much speculation around the campus about what will happen when classes begin this morning.

When asked what security measures are planned, campus police will say nothing more than "all kinds of precautions are being taken."

At the moment, it seems to be a question of who can hold out longer, the union or the university.

You all know Mike Klonski, of course. He's the past national secretary of Students for a Democratic Society. And, he'll be speaking in the free speech area of Sid Smith at 1 p.m. today.

Employers want 'alive human beings'—Headrick

By JIM COWAN

Alan Headrick sat in his newly-renovated office at the U of T Career Counselling and Placement Centre and talked about his two favorite subjects: students and jobs.

"The decision of which job to accept is probably not as momentous as most students think," he said. "Most people will have three or four completely different careers, so the question is really 'what do you want to do first'."

"I've seen people sit with six job offers in front of them in a state of paralysis because they're afraid they'll pick the wrong one."

Not that Headrick advocates a casual approach to job hunting. After all, he is running a placement service. But more and more the emphasis is shifting to counselling.

This is the second year for a series of career counselling lectures designed to show students what's available in the job market. "This year they're better than ever, mainly because more students are aware of them," says Headrick.

Headrick has been with the placement centre for four years, and was named director on Jan. 1, 1969. When he says a person may have several different careers, he knows what he's talking about.

Leaving an established job as a school teacher, he went to Queens University and eventually got his M.A. in English language. He then came to Toronto to work on a Ph.D.

"Then I woke up one morning and said 'I don't want to be an academic.'" He was offered a job with the placement service, and accepted.

His major complaint is that students don't make maximum use of the services his department offers, and still complain when they can't find the job they want.

"The big thing is that this is a convenience — a quick method to cover a wide range of employers," he says. Hiring is becoming a seasonal thing for employers, he said. A company will set up a recruitment period of from four to six months, and get all their hiring completed.

"Then when the new employees come in the employer has to forget about recruiting and concentrate on training," he added.

And that's why students who look for jobs in the spring and summer have such a hard time finding anything.

On the other hand, employers find it hard to understand how a university can graduate upwards of 2,000 arts students every year and then have only a handful turn out to recruiting sessions.

"They ask me, 'Where the Hell are your arts people? Don't they want jobs?'"

Interest is growing in the "whole, alive, human beings."

"The employer's buying potential," he points out. A university grad doesn't even earn his salary at first.

"The greatest demand in all courses is for the educated human being on whom the employers are quite prepared to spend a great deal of time and money to teaching the mechanics. Students feel the employer is looking for someone who knows the job before he starts. Hell, he doesn't expect you to be trained."

Some students tend to be overly-selective in their job choice. Headrick says some seem to feel that every degree carries fine print guaranteeing a job. "Many students visualize a situation which doesn't exist — they've been sold a bill of goods by society and it sends kids to university for the wrong reasons.

"A person who wasn't a very employable human being when he left elementary school probably still is not very employable after university," says Headrick.

"The employer says, 'O.K., you all have degrees, what else can you do? What ability do you have other than writing exams?'"

Headrick will himself conduct a seminar on interviewing — what both the student and employer is looking for — on Tuesday. The session, a taped discussion among some of the top professional interviewers, was made last summer. It's especially recommended for those who will be taking part in the recruiting program, which starts next week.

Meanwhile, Alan Headrick sits in his new office, with its orange rug and blue chairs, and waits for his coffee table and purple couch. And anyone who wants to drop in and talk about careers, interviews, or anything else, is welcome.

Employers, he says, are less concerned with signing up a top student than with finding

First step would be a visit to the career counselling library, where the student can browse through any number of booklets. "We have a good library on 'what it's like to be a... you name it' and that's part of the counselling process," says Headrick.

Once the student has found several job areas which interest him, he should accept "a fairly broad range of interviews. This should narrow it down to one kind of firm," says Headrick.

He says students eliminate themselves by considering themselves as English students or History students, rather than as "liberally-educated" people. "If they'd just get out of the straight jackets..."

Employers, he says, are less concerned with signing up a top student than with finding put the lion of judah

At least 20 Ethiopian students have been murdered by police since January. One was from university, the rest from high schools and elementary schools. Another 2000 are in concentration camps outside the capital city, Addis Ababa. About 15 of these have been sentenced to eight years hard labor.

In response to the demonstrations which resulted in many of the arrests, the schools were closed for a month in February. The students struck and continued to demonstrate; the schools remain closed.

Imprisonment without trial for up to six months is legal in Ethiopia. Thousands of political prisoners are tortured — left in stagnant icewater for days, dragged by cars over pebble roads, lashed while hung by their feet or jolted with electric shocks.

Entire villages have been wiped out by air attacks; peasants have been arbitrarily shot or hung. The death toll is impossible to tally.

When Selassie made one of his visits, frequent since the Eisenhower rule, to Washington this July to ask for more money and arms, to discuss the American military base in Ethiopia and generally ask Nixon to help buoy up the foreign financial base on which his power rests, twenty-five members of the Ethiopian Student Association in North America were arrested in a demonstration. They face deportation and sentences of from ten to fifteen years.

The picture painted of Ethiopia by Ethiopian Airlines and the country's magnificent embassies throughout the world — like the one in Ottawa — is a lie — a lie built upon the repression and exploitation of the people of Ethiopia by Selassie's regime. The feudal aristocracy lives well and lavishly, but it is the dismal story of the hardships suffered by the vast majority of Ethiopians that needs to be told.

While there are pretences of democracy, Ethiopia remains a political despotism. There are no political parties — not even rubber-stamp parties; the parliament is democratic only in name. Members of the upper house are personally appointed by the Emperor who is free to overrule any decisions of the lower house. His decisions and legislation on all matters are binding and are not subject to review by the parliament.

According to the U.S. Army handbook for Ethiopia, Selassie has merely designed "a more constitutional framework (the parliament) within which . . . the nobility and the church (would be) brought more closely under the throne's leadership."

The ruling class maintains its power through a combination of violent repression and only 62 per cent of the gross domestic income. Modern manufacturing is still concentrated in a few small enterprises, 90 per cent foreign-owned, which turn out consumer items like cigarettes, shoes, liquor, soft drinks and textiles. These industries, paying standard wages of about 40 cents a day, represent only about two per cent of the total economy. Although there is increasing foreign investment, mainly American, in minerals it represents a negligible portion of the country's income.

AMPLE CONTROL

Ethiopia is a classic example of a one-commodity export economy. Nearly two-thirds of the value of exports comes from coffee. American purchases represent 75 per cent of the value of exports. Despite Selassie's three-decades-old proclamation that "a free public education is the right of every child," only 3 per cent of over 6 million school-age children are in school. Only 0.3 per cent of potential students over the age of 15 attend school. These few attend classes that average 58 students in size in the city, between 79 and 84 in the country.

Yet in terms of resources, this need not be.

"Much of Ethiopia's 450,000 square miles is plateau land which possesses one of the most fertile agricultural soils and grazing lands in the world. The country's broad range of climates and altitudes allows for the cultivation of a wide variety of agricultural products. According to the Ethiopian Planning Board, only 15 per cent of potentially arable land (not including vast areas which could be utilized through irrigation) is at present cultivated. . . .

"An American economist has estimated that, if properly cultivated, Ethiopia could produce enough food to feed Europe. According to a U.S. study, Ethiopia is second only to the Congo in hydro-electric potential among African countries." Although it is known there are large potash and iron deposits, the mineral and oil resources have not been fully explored. (from Repression in Ethiopia.)

Although for nearly 3,000 years Ethiopia has maintained her independence, her militarily strategic location has meant her subjugation to foreign occupation or influence for the last thirty years. During the Italian occupation Selassie was given refuge in Britain. When the Italians had been driven out in 1941, the British lent their troops and air force to prop up his regime in the face of a series of popular revolts over the next ten years.

PART OF EMPIRE

Since the early '50's, however, Ethiopia has become a part of the American empire. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been poured into the country in the form of loans and technical and military aid. Millions more have been squeezed out.

The U.S. maintains a military and naval base (the largest in Africa, and one of the most important of America's far-flung bases) in the country. This is despite Selassie's avowed dedication to pan-Africanism — with American help the headquarters of the Organization for African Unity and the U.S. Economic Commission for Africa were established in Ethiopia — and the OAU's request for all military bases to be removed from African nations. In return the U.S. signed the 1953 agreement to maintain Selassie's regime.

Ethiopia's armed forces are under the tutelage of the U.S. — except the paratroopers and secret police who are trained by another U.S. ally in the Middle East — Israel — and are financed by American military aid. American weapons is to maintain dependency; it is to be replaced quickly in any program.

The OAU recognizes the Ethiopian independence posed by the presence of "The American Mapping and Geographical Institute and the Peace Corps (as well as the presence of the American base) to strengthen the hold of Ethiopia." (in Africa, 1964.)

In addition to the "large" military aid in all Africa of 25,000 to 30,000 GI's a month, the U.S. maintains Peace Corps missions in and ideological indoctrination. The former is carried out by a 40,000-man army and an equally large police force, the latter by the state Coptic Church.

It is Selassie, the upper echelon of his feudal regime and their foreign backers who must bear the responsibility for the misery of the Ethiopian people.

Ethiopia is one of the poorest countries in the world and in Africa. Per capita income is about $40, and even this figure hides the plight of the peasants who are forced to turn over 75 per cent of their crops to the landlords. The peasant is bound to this feudalism, able to terminate his services only by death or if he is too ill to work — provided he gives four years notice. Services also include devoting one day in three to personal service for the landlord.

Though Selassie said in 1961 that "it is our aim that every Ethiopian own land," 80 per cent of the land is still owned by two per cent of the population. The Imperial family and the feudal nobility own 65 per cent of all land and the Coptic Church between 20 and 30 per cent of the most arable land.

Although 90 per cent of the population is involved in agriculture their produce represents only 62 per cent of the gross domestic income. Modern manufacturing is still concentrated in a few small enterprises, 90 per cent foreign-owned, which turn out consumer items like cigarettes, shoes, liquor, soft drinks and textiles. These industries, paying standard wages of about 40 cents a day, represent only about two per cent of the total economy. than 25 per cent of the total population. The university is American; it holds over 50 per cent of the land. The schools aren't for the masses in any case, but with control even the insignificant minority are traitors. . . .

Part of the U.S. economic policy can be seen in the report of January 17, 1967: "Dozens of American already discovered Ethiopia to a $100 million petroleum spice firm to two of the companies . . . Among Africa's most liberal and generous duty-free and tax provisions, special laws plot against expropriation."

STRATEGIC

But it is largely Ethiopia's strategic location that justifies the presence of the American military bases in the Middle East and Africa, with ports on the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean.

"One of the most important questions between East and West is whether the U.S. must stand behind those who are in the past — in the present — in the future. Haile Selassie." (The NY Times, January 12, 1964.)

The importance of the Red Sea ports of Massawa and Assab lay behind Selassie's cancellation of the independence and federal status of the province of Eritrea. The northeastern province had its status negotiated by the United Nations after WW II, but in 1962 Selassie moved in. The civil service was virtually liquidated, the Ethiopian military replaced the Eritrean police, and mass arrests by secret police have led to detention camps throughout the countryside, known as "fortified hamlets."

Guerrillas have been waging a war in Eritrea since 1962 against Selassie and the Americans. As early as 1964, an American helicopter piloted by a U.S. Army flier was used in reconnaissance against the guerrillas. An entire infantry division of about 8000 American-trained men and two squad-

Air bombardments have been constant and severe.

STUDENT MOVEMENT

The student movement in Ethiopia has seen a parallel consolidation over the last decade. They have joined forces with the peasant struggles under the banners of Land to the Tiller and Anti-Imperialism. Seeing the common goals in the two struggles the peasants have responded to the mass meetings and protests organized by the students.

The final straw in a series of increasing education taxes brought the student struggle to the fore last February when the Emperor of a nation with a per capita income of about $40 annually decreed a school entrance examination fee of $10. The rope, ignoring those from socialist countries, many of them in important technical areas; cessation of the use of American Peace Corps teachers whose function is to serve as agents of cultural imperialism in Ethiopia; immediate termination of the vast expenditures on extravagant entertainment of foreign guests and similar visits abroad by Ethiopian officials; the removal from office of those officials directly responsible for the state education system."

"The students also demand that various officials responsible for the killing of students during peaceful demonstrations be brought for public trial." (from Repression in Ethiopia.)

DENIAL REJECTED

The formation of the World Wide Union of Ethiopian Students has seen support extended to Europe, the Middle East and North America where Ethiopian students studied abroad. The North American association organized the demonstration and confrontation during Selassie's visit to Washington this summer. They have expressed their solidarity with blacks in the U.S., denying any validity to Selassie's denial in Washington thirteen years ago that he was a black or a negro, that "Ethiopians are a race apart."

Selassie sits alone on top of a powder-keg, 25 million subjects whose many grievances are now being vocalized by an articulate student movement. Inside and outside the country, the students are organizing protests and demonstrations, educating people to the crimes against their people.

Selassie continues to look to foreign powers for help in keeping down his people. The United States has come to his aid again.

The students know they will not make a revolution in Ethiopia by themselves. They can only serve to help organize and educate the people who have been oppressed so long. They recognize too the importance of taking their story to the rest of the world if they are to prevent the U.S. from stepping in an realizing the fear one student voiced in Washington that Ethiopia would become the next Vietnam.

"The people and students of Ethiopia are too familiar with the oppression and inhumanity of the feudal and neo-colonialist regime in Ethiopia. But the diabolic nature of the government and the true condition of the masses of Ethiopia remain unknown to world public opinion.

"That such a regime, through its control of the press and censorship should attempt to hide its despicable practices does not come as a novel discovery. It is all the more imperative therefore that all well-meaning and progressive peoples everywhere make their voices heard in a condemnation of its inhuman acts." (from "Repression in Ethiopia.") rons of American-built war planes are fighting the guerrillas near the Sudanese border.

What is important is that the Eritrean struggle is not an isolated one, nor is it a historical. Since 1941 there have been constant uprisings against the feudal fascism of Selassie's regime. The major ones during WW II were put down with the aid of the British in Gojjan and Tigre, and in Weyanne, where a year-long struggle was finally crushed by RAF bombardments. A peasant revolt in Ogaden in 1948 was also stamped out by British troops and a revolt in Wollo in 1958 was met with the "eradication of a whole chain of villages from the map of Ethiopia."

In 1960 there were two revolts. A peasant uprising in April protesting dispossession by the Emperor's family, led to the massacre of more than a thousand peasants. An attempted military coup d'etat in December was put down with the aid of bombardments by planes flown by American pilots.

Since then the economy has suffered an increasing plunge into an inflationary crisis, and is threatened with collapse by trade deficit. Peasants and workers have seen the cost of living rise by over 30 per cent while their incomes have remained at the same level or lower. The tax burden has been increasingly shifted to their shoulders.

Though repression of any dissent has been severe, the last decade has seen an escalation of resistance against the Selassie regime and their foreign sponsors. Workers in various provinces have staged attacks for wage increments and rights to organize; labor leaders have been arbitrarily dismissed or physically eliminated.

In protest of new land taxes, peasant uprisings have spread to other regions than the struggles now under way in Balle, Borrena and Eritrea. The province of Gojjam has again taken up arms against the regime. Repression by the military and the police has been brutal. The provinces are under constant search by army divisions.

students at the university planned a strike, but the Emperor sent the security forces and evacuated all the university students to a concentration camp outside the capital. High school and elementary students came out in support of the university students — and the school system has been closed down since March.

An important characteristic of the recent student demonstrations has been the support of the poor people in Addis Ababa and other cities. They battled with the soldiers and police, often protecting the students from arrest. For days the capital was under martial law and still heavily-armed soldiers and militia police patrol the city. Workers and civil servants supplied students with food, money and shelter during the strikes.

The students in Ethiopia have transcended their backgrounds to the extent that many of them came from the better-off strata of the society; the traditional role of the university had been to train self-seeking ambitious bureaucrats to staff the civil service and high bureaucratic posts. Their struggle is now with the masses of the population against the feudal oppression. Their demands are political demands that speak to Ethiopian problems.

They are demanding: "the withdrawal of school and examination fees instituted by the regime; a just and equitable distribution of scholarships granted by any foreign nation (of 3000 foreign scholarships offered per year, the regime has accepted only about 1000, from the U.S. and western Eu-

Grape workers still ask for safer working conditions

By BILL RODGERS

"The time has come to be free. We want to run our own lives. We are not going to let vested interests treat us as less than free people."

Cesar Chavez, leader of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, spoke in Toronto Thursday night in support of the California Grape Boycott.

"The principle behind our struggle," Chavez said, "is a basic one: the right of workers to organize. This is a right that has long been recognized for most laborers but not for farm workers."

Pesticide poisoning is a danger that faces many grape pickers. The practice among growers is to spray fields either by airplane or tractor while workers are picking.

Chavez's union wants the right to remove workers from the fields while spraying is taking place and for them to wear protective clothing when they return.

The owners have refused to meet these conditions. As a result, when the California Department of Health recently tested farm workers, Chavez says that 632 or the 700 tested exhibited at least one symptom of pesticide poisoning.

STARTED UNION

Cesar Chavez, 42, has lived all his life among the migrant farm workers of the southwestern United States. The son of a Mexican-American farm laborer, Chavez spent his childhood travelling from place to place with his poverty-stricken family.

In 1962 Chavez started to build the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee dedicated to improving the living conditions of grape pickers and other farm workers. In 1965 he led a non-violent strike against the farm owners who had refused to recognize the union. Chavez is presently travelling throughout North America to gain support for the California Grape Boycott.

The "Don't Buy California Grapes" campaign has been in effect in Toronto for over a year. Picket lines around supermarkets have urged customers not to purchase the California grapes on sale within the store.

The Toronto stores which do not support the boycott are Loblaw's, A&P, and Food City. The strikers have the support of Dominion Stores and Miracle Mart as well as various religious groups and the Toronto City Council.

Toronto has been a major success centre for the strikers. Last year it was ranked fifth in North American cities consuming California grapes — this year it is ranked as fourteenth. Chavez claims that sales of grapes have dropped by 32 per cent, while production of grapes increased by 17 per cent.

AGRIBUSINESS

Chavez stated that dealings with grape farm owners have racial overtones. "About 95 per cent of farm workers are black or brown. I have often thought that if we were white that we would have this contract by now. The owners are unwilling to recognize a brown man as leader."

The grape growers are not small independent farmers but are large modern corporations. California's huge agricultural market was valued at $4,000,000 in 1967 and has been called "agribusiness." Governor Ronald Reagan is sympathetic to the big business interests and has not tried to negotiate the strike but has taken a hard line stand against the workers.

During the harvest season the owners have been bringing immigrants from across the Mexican border in cattle trucks to work in the field as strikebreakers. This illegal practice has been ignored by the California State Legislature and the Border Police, Chavez claimed.

Chavez states, "The union is more than increased wages to its members; it is all the issues, all the indignities suffered by the poor Mexican-Americans. We are fighting for better working conditions, we are fighting to be treated as human beings."

"It will take time," Chavez says with quiet confidence, "but soon they (the owners) will know they aren't dealing with a commodity but with determined human beings."

McGill reps resign over council's dilly-dallying

Montreal (CUP) — Five of McGill's eight student senators and three student council members resigned their posts Friday rather than "stay and legitimize what the senate is doing."

Education rep Margo Verral asked student council to send no more students to senate meetings until the administration promised to restructure the university's highest governing body to include "one-third students, one third faculty and one-third representatives of the Quebec people."

When the council refused to pass the measure in favor of continuing negotiations with administration on the government of McGill, Verral, two more council members and five senators resigned. The senators' terms expire next week.

In a joint statement the resignees accused council of adopting "a conciliatory and ineffective position vis-a-vis the restructuring of the government of McGill."

They said council had sided against "a McGill which serves and is controlled by the people of Quebec" in refusing to take a harder line with administration.

Peter Foster, one of the resigning senators, said he would continue to "work for the radical transformation of McGill through other channels," such as citizens' groups.

Student council president Julius Grey accused the resigning senators and councillors of being "on the side of those who oppose McGill", and said council's opposition to making McGill a French-language institution was behind the resignations.

Few students actively support Guelph strike

By JIM STRUTHERS

GUELPH — The recent strike of maintenance and clerical workers at the University of Guelph emphasises the difficulties of forming a worker-student alliance.

While most students sympathize with the union's demands, few actively support the strike.

Almost all the students, however, are worried that a more militant picket line will prevent the food staff from getting to their jobs and thus cause a curtailment of food services.

This would force all students on board plans to purchase their food elsewhere.

"I would be angry at the university if my food was cut off," said one student.

"As long as the food doesn't run out the strike's OK," added another.

Many students, including the staff of the campus newspaper The Ontario, were displeased with the quality of work previously done by the maintenance staff.

"Our floor hasn't been cleaned in eight weeks," said editor Dave Doney.

Students seem to favor the university's offer of merit increases over the union demands for annual increments.

In the university residences students are cleaning floors and taking out garbage, but no one considers this to be "scabbig".

"It's basically a question of sanitation," a resident explained.

RCMP agent induces crime

OTTAWA (CUP) — A judge dismissed trafficking charges against a Carleton University student here Oct. 22 on the grounds that he was trapped into the offence by an RCMP officer.

Gordon Shipley, 22, was charged with selling $30 worth of hashish to RCMP under cover agent Larry Lowes.

Judge McAndrew dismissed the case, ruling that "without (Lowes's) inducements the accused would not have trafficked in drugs," and that the duty of an undercover agent is not to manufacture crime.

Students were also displeased by the efforts of the Guelph Student Movement to support the strike. These efforts included plugging up toilets and spreading garbage across the floors of the largest residence.

The GSM were also the only students to join the workers on the picket line.

The lack of student support can best be explained by the following comment of one student.

"I'm sympathetic to their cause. They need more money, but I don't agree with forming a picket line."

U of T student gets job at Expo '70

Osaka and Expo '70, will be a heady experience for one U of T student, Miss Halyna Kushpeta, who is taking a year off from her studies to represent Canada at the Ontario Pavilion at the World's Fair in Japan.

Presently Halyna and 26 others are undergoing an intense language and orientation programme.

The hosts and hostesses were chosen out of 2,000 post-secondary students. They were recruited on the basis of attractive personality, maturity, and initiative. Some university or post-secondary education was preferred. Multi-lingual applicants were in high demand, especially those fluent in Japanese.

The Ontario Pavilion, contains a revolving sidewalk which will move the visitor through a Christopher Chapman multi-media Ontario simulation. The essential aim of the $2.6 million pavilion is to "open up trade and development with Japan and other countries."

"Japan is Canada's third best trading partner currently, but Ontario is only getting a small fraction of its business," said Minister of Trade Stanley Randall.

Deadline for voter list appeals is tomorrow

The City of Toronto is conspiring to keep university students from voting in the Dec. 1 municipal elections.

At least, that's the way it looks to two of Steven Clarkson's campaign workers, Robin Inskip and Larry Clarke. Clarkson is running for Toronto mayor under the Liberal Party banner.

Miss Inskip said the city had done nothing to inform students they may have the right to vote in the municipal elections, and had done little to facilitate appeals by those left off the lists.

There is no enumeration for municipal elections, as there is at the provincial and federal level and it is up to the voter to see he is included. The original voters lists are made up from assessment lists.

There are two lists, and students may qualify for either one.

Thousands of irate electors could descend on the Clerk's Office in City Hall this morning at 11.45.

The Committee for Action on the Rights of Electors have called a demonstration to support their demand for an extension of the Oct. 28 deadline for appeals to get on the voter's list.

All voters must be 21 years of age by Dec. 1, 1969, and be a Canadian citizen or a British subject by birth or naturalization.

In the first category, all owners and tenants, or wives or husbands of owners and tenants on land assessed in excess of $400 on the last revised assessment roll, can vote for the alderman and trustee.

Students who rent an apartment unit consisting of two or more rooms and cooking facilities qualify for this list.

There is also a second class — and second class is a good description because their voting rights are restricted — known as resident voters. To be on this list you must have been a resident of Toronto from Jan. 1, 1968, to Dec. 31, 1968, and be a resident of the city as of Dec. 1, 1969.

Students in U of T residences who lived in the city during the summer qualify for this list, as do all students living at home.

A spokesman at City Hall said anyone living in the Metro area and now in residence could qualify for the Toronto resident voters list.

But don't assume that just because you qualify under these provisions you will be on the lists. Chances are, if this is your first election, you're not on the lists.

To be included, all that is required is a telephone call to the voters registration department at 367-7802. Tell them you want to be put on the list, which group you qualify for, where you live, and your telephone number.

One other thing: the deadline for appeals is next Tuesday, Oct. 28.

SFU strikers hit with injunctions

BURANBY (CUP) — Striking faculty and students at Simon Fraser University are holding a general assembly today to decide what action to take on injunctions imposed by the British Columbia Supreme Court Thursday, against picketing.

At the request of SFU President Kenneth Strand, the court ordered participants in the strike:

- Not to obstruct any faculty member
- Not to obstruct any campus facility
- not to make any unscheduled appearances
- not to unlawfully coerce any student.

The court order makes them liable to six months to a year in jail if they distribute any literature, picket in any way or address any group on campus without the administration having granted a booking.

All picketing was suspended Friday in the face of the injunction and PSA faculty spent the weekend examining the final form of the injunction determining what actions they may still take.

A hunger strike started by one staff member and twelve students Thursday continues on a 24-hour-a-day basis until the administration lifts the suspension of the eight suspended PSA profs, negotiates "in good faith" with PSA and drops charges against striking students and faculty.

The hunger strikers said their "Fast for Freedom" was designed to de-escalate and depolarize the conflict on the campus, and call attention to the "profound moral urgency of the present conflict in our community."

Fencers impressive in Buffalo loss

Toronto's new strength in undergraduate fencers crossed swords recently with the experienced fencers of Buffalo University under USA college rules, losing 16 bouts to 18. The gesture gained Varsity new respect as USA teams have always lost to the graduate-based teams of previous years.

The 4 man sabre team drew first blood. David Brown easily anticipated his opponent but Buffalo riposted quickly to take the lead.

The dash and gay abandon of Andrew Benyei saved the Varsity reputation. His three victories included the defeat of Kaser, the USA under-20 team member. Martin Moskovits fought back to gain our only other victory, leaving a 5-11 deficit.

Meanwhile Varsity outclassed the Buffalo epee fencers, North States champions, 7 victories to 2. Irv Snitman with delicate touches to the wrist, Mike Kerwin using countertime to good effect and Rowland Griffin's careful victories made the score 13-12 favor Buffalo.

Could our new foil team get at least 5 wins? Michael Schomberg overcame his nerves for 2 wins, John Ho's opportunism outgessed his more experienced opponents but Alex Lee could not get that final thrust. So we dropped the foil, five bouts to four.

Tuesday nite at 7 the femme foilers fatale invade the hallowed halls of the fencing salle for a special meet and the latest in co-educational (fencing) activity.

Well, not quite; just some of the thirty-or-so gals who competed in the Interfac Archery-Golf tourney held Thursday at the West Hill Golf Club.

As you might guess, Archery-Golf is a novel sports fusion, combining elements of both games. The contestants use regular bows and arrows, and the course is a regular golf course complete with sand traps, hidden flags, and holes.

The "holes" are four-inch thick rubber balls mounted 12 inches above the green; (As in golf, the player with the lowest number of shots wins.)

Apart from the normal hazards of archery and golf, the gals had to overcome freezing temperatures, a heavy wind, and three inches of snow on several fairways. If you've ever tried to find a golf ball in the snow, think how much confusion is created by losing an Women's interfaculty tennis was favoured with blue skies and warm weather at the tournament at Scarborough College on Saturday.

Intrepid quarter-finalists, who had been playing midst snowflakes and falling leaves in past weeks, congregated at the scenic campus for the completion of the singles and doubles events.

Two first year PHE students, Ann Marie Lyn and Marcia Leonard, captured the doubles honours by defeating a Scarborough team 11-3 in the finals. Mel Bolger and Anda Sipolins were the representatives of the host college in its first year in the tennis competition.

Due to lack of time, the semi-finals singles match between Marcia Leonard and Sandy Pett was postponed until later this week. The winner will meet Marg Moore, who defeated Ann Marie Lyn in the semis.

McGill dumps Gaels 21-3

MONTREAL (Special) — At first it was rumoured that Queens University was another community college. By late afternoon Saturday, the midget mentality of the Queens fans and the progress of their football team left little doubt in the minds of 8,000 Molson Stadium witnesses.

The McGill Redmen took a giant step towards capturing their first Yates Cup since 1962 with a convincing 21-3 victory over the defending champion Gaels.

Coupled with Blues 41-16 romp over Western, the stage is set for the Yates showdown on Nov. 8 in Montreal. Varsity defeated McGill 17-16 two weeks ago in Toronto.

The Redmen's dynamic duo of Dave Fleiszer and Ken Aikin trampled on Queens bodies strewn about by McGill blockers, and each accounted for over 100 yards rushing.

Fleiszer, the leagues top runner and scorer, accounted for two touchdowns, his seventh and eight of the season. With two games remaining, he could break the season record of 11 set by Toronto's Tim Reid in 1958.

Aikin scored the other McGill touchdown, and Sol Lovecho added three converts.

The McGill defence showed why it is rated the best in the Canadian collegiate circuit by holding the Gaels to seven first downs (none until the third quarter), a total offense of just 140 yards, and no video-tape highlights.

McGill coach Tom Mooney must have thought he was watching last year's game films as his charges began the game with a blunder reminiscent of their forgettable yaesteryear.

On Redmen's first play from scrimmage, Fleiszer watched the muddy pigskin he was carrying squirt loose and slowly sink under a herd of dirty gold jerseys on the McGill one yard line.

O mygod, he must have thought.

However, the McGill defence set the pace of the game by pushing Queens back to the ten, and Gaels had to settle for three points instead of the easy seven they expected.

Rookie QB Dan Smith then marched the aroused Redmen down the field at will to produce their fifth win of the season, equaling the total winning output of the last four seasons combined.

In the other SIFL game, Waterloo hammered winless McMaster 29-8.

for a 52-yard TD while two members of Western's supposedly unheatable secondary looked on.

McKay broke the shutout by conceding a safety touch from the three, and Metras sent in Peter Werry, benched since Walter's first TD.

On the next play, Walter ran past Werry again and into the record book. Eric finished with five catches for 201 yards and Peter had a lesson in how not to cover all-star flankers.

BLUESNOTES. . . . Pete Lamantia and Peter Raham sat out the game with minor hurts and rookies Paul Sheehan and Brian Sickle showed well in their spots . . . Blues held Mustang's key runner Jeff Hilton to only 67 yards in 16 carries, below his season average . . . by comparison, Walt Sehr, improving with each game, had 62 yards from 11 carries . . . Stank had four converts and McKay added a single on a wide field-goal try . . . flanker Stew Behie and QB Steve Stefanko had the Western majors . . . it was a thoroughly sloppy and botched farewell for Metras (who, seriously, deserve a first-class send-off) as the Mustang bank played the national anthem while Stangs were being introduced and then had to be ordered off the field by the officials when their half-time show dragged on forever . . . it was a bush-league display by the Western administration and Metras does deserve something better than that . . . it was a sorry day all-round for Western as their football team was beaten, ditto soccer and rugger (twice, even), the Mustang Band was completely outplayed by (gasp!) our own undernourished Blue and Whites, and then there was that incredible cross-country exhibition . . . midway through the second quarter, the game was stopped to allow some far-sighted moron's idea — a cross-country race that would start during the game and end at half-time back at the stadium . . . the lead Western runner raced around the track . . . and missed the exit by twenty feet . . . but for a wire fence and a quick-thinking cheer-leader the poor boy'd be running round that track yet . . . oh yes, Western lost the cross-country as well.

If Blues and McGill win their respective games this Saturday (and Blues will), then the Varsity-McGill rematch in Montreal on November 8 will decide the Yates Cup.

Buses to McGill will be operated by the Engineers (God Bless 'em) — leaving Friday the 7th and returning Sunday afternoon.

Soccer 4 - 2

Rugger 27 - 0

By LYNDON LITTLE

Soccer Blues improved their chances of a successful defense of the Blackwood Trophy as they defeated the Western Mustangs 4-2 Saturday afternoon in London.

Ironically, the Western team kept the Blues in contention by downing the previously unbeaten McMaster Mauladers 1-0 last Wednesday.

Blues victory sets up a three way tie for first place in the Western Division of the OQAA between McMaster, Western and Toronto.

Varsity plays Mac this Wednesday at three o'clock in the Stadium in a crucial game.

John Gero, the Western Division's leading scorer with six goals, led the way against the Mustangs with a pair. Ken Cancellera and Trevor Wilson picked up the other two goals.

Charles Kiewiet connected for both Western tallies.

Gero opened the scoring at the 25 minute mark on a fine individual effort as he worked his way in from his right wing position to score from a sharp angle.

Western's Kiewiet tied it up six minutes later on a penalty shot just seconds after Blues' goalie Sam Cesario had saved a sure goal with a fine diving stop.

The Blues came back with a penalty kick of their own just four minutes later. Forward Cancellera made no mistake as he gave Toronto a 2-1 lead at the half.

When Kiewiet tied the game for the Mustangs early in the second half it looked like the same old story all over again. In three previous games this year, Varsity has had a lead in the second half and has been unable to hold it.

This time, however, Toronto continued to play aggressive soccer and came back with two goals to win the game. Wilson scored what proved to be the winner at the 65 minute mark on a hard left-footer from 15 yards and Gero added his second goal for good measure with only 15 minutes left to play.

Coach Bob Nicol made a tactical switch before the game moving veteran forward Frank Soppelsa to center half and was very pleased with the results as Soppelsa, a fine passer, had more room to set up plays.

Once again, Blues received superior goalkeeping from rookie Central Tech grad Cesario. This edge in goal could mean the difference against McMaster on Wednesday.

KORNERKICKS . . . The soccer team split a pair of exhibition games recently . . . On the 16th they lost to Ukraina of the National League 2-1 in a game played under the lights at Varsity Stadium. Last Sunday they travelled to Buffalo where they downed Buffalo State 4-0. Gero, Adrian Verhulst, Trevor Wilson and Mario Palermo scored at Buffalo while Gero notched the lone score against Ukraina.

The Blues Rugger Team of the past has been reborn. The group of thirty fans was dumbfounded by the Blues fervor, as they trounced both Western teams Saturday by identical scores of 27-0.

The first ten minutes of the game were very frustrating as Blues kept the ball within twenty yards of the Western goal but were continually stopped by a good Western tackle or a knock on.

Finally, from a clean lineup pass by Ellwand, the back line succeeded in getting the ball to fleet footed Sid Segsworth. He eluded the Western winger and touched the ball down between the posts for the first score of the game. The convert by Owens made the score 5-0 for Toronto.

By now, the Blue pack was fired up and ran roughshod over the intimidated Western side. The drive paid off with tries by wing forwards Harley Griffiths and Dan McAlister.

Wind and unfavourable angles foiled the convert attempts so it was a penalty goal by scrum half Andy Cairns that completed the scoring in the half.

With the wind and the sun at their backs, the Toronto team was able to kick more effectively. Fly half Ian Owens began the scoring with a rare drop goal from a tight scrum. Then winger Segsworth scored his second try after shedding several weak Western tackle attempts. Owens' toe was still accurate and the convert was good.

Now it was centre Larry McKenna's turn to score. The excellent hooking of Toronto rookie Mike Code won the ball for Cairns who fed the ball to Owens. He flashed the ball to centre McKenna. The cunning McKenna had spotted a weakness in the Western line, and when he tested, it was successful and he dashed over the line for a try. Andy Cairns' "Golden Toe" produced the two point convert.

The final score was Toronto 27, Western 0.

The second Toronto team put on an equally fine show. The first half was slow moving but as the players got used to each other, a strong side developed. Tries were scored by Kutzch, Burke, Pierre and Zepp. The rest of the scoring came from kicking of penalty goals and converts by captain Tony Pierre. Final score 27-0.

Blues clobber Stangs 41-16 for important win

By PAUL CARSON

It was supposed to be a glorious farewell for Western's Johnny Metras, ending 30 years as head coach of the Mustangs.

But when the afternoon was done, Metras had quietly faded into history, and the fans had a new hero, Varsity flanker Eric Walter.

After four starry years at McGill in the early 'sixties, Walter came to Toronto last year to take up Dentistry, and play a little football.

Saturday afternoon, at 11:22 of the third quarter, he took a short pass from Vic Alboini and ambled 85 yards for his third touchdown of the day. The Varsity bench exploded with joy, Walter was mobbed by his team-mates and presented with the ball.

What had begun as an innocent-looking down-and-out pattern became the play that makes Eric Walter the leading scorer in the 71-year history of the SIFL.

The touchdown, Walter's sixth this season, is the 30th of his career, breaking the old record of 29 set by Ronnie Stewart during five years at Queens (1953-57).

McGill Redmen retained their first place tie with Blues by trouncing Queens 21-3.

A report of that game is on page 13.

A 72-yard pass and run touchdown in the first quarter enabled Walter to erase the old career scoring record of 166 points set by classy Toronto quarterback and place-kicker, Bryce Taylor, from 1962 till 1966.

BLUES COMPLETELY DOMINATE

Walter's heroics overshadowed Varsity's first solid sixty-minute performance this season. Blues finally played up to their championship potential, and but for a series of fumbles and poor passes late in the game, they could have made Metras' departure even more embarrassing. The final score 41-16, is an accurate reflection of the game.

For the fifth time in as many games, Blues offensive line was out-weighted by the opposition front-four, but it didn't really matter. VanBodegom, Whitaker, Enno, Turner and Kellam produced perhaps the best blocking of the year; Blues total attack breaks down into 103 yards rushing and a whopping 287 yards through the air on only 12 completed passes of 23 attempts.

Blues held leads of 28-0 and 34-2 before Western turned a recovered fumble and a pass interception into two touchdowns in the fourth quarter. Then Mustangs got delusions of grandeur and tried a short kick-off; Ian Kirkpatrick caught it on the fly and scampered down the sidelines to the Western nine. Two plays later, Walt Sehr iced the cake on a sweep from the six.

While the offence piled up the points, an aroused Varsity defence made life miserable for Mustangs vaunted ground attack.

Remembering that sickening first half in Kingston, Blues hammered Stangs into the ground for the first 30 minutes, and when half-time relief came, Western had scrimmaged 30 times for a net result of 24 yards — 27 running and minus-three passing.

Murph protected against injuries in the second half and Mustangs finished with 121 yards on the ground and 11 of 25 passing for only 77 net yards. With Blues ahead 24-9 in the fourth quarter, offensive miscues allowed Western to run 10 plays from inside the Varsity 20-yard line, but the Metrasmen mustered only one touchdown.

BLUES SCORED EARLY AND OFTEN

Metras had predicted his experienced secondary would throttle Blues passing attack, and from the outset he challenged Alboini to throw against a tight 4-3-5 defensive alignment.

On Varsity's second series, diminutive Vic gave a preview of later histrionics by calmly hitting Walter for a 72-yard TD that broke Taylor's record; Walter easily beat the futile coverage from Jim Henshall and Peter Werry to make the play look ridiculously easy.

After some monotonous plunge-and-go-nowhere football, Blues capitalized on a short Fabiani punt and a no-yards penalty to score on the last play of the half. With Murph stomping up and down the sidelines and spotter Tom Watt going noisily nuts, Wayne Dunkley hit Walter from four-yards out. Dunkley had taken six plays to go 16 yards; the Western timers were most cooperative.

Ian Kirkpatrick broke the game open early in the third quarter galloping 35 yards with a pass interception; a few minutes later Fabiani tried the most obvious fake-punt in living memory, passing to flanker Doug Digby; Bob Bloxham plastered Digby for no gain, and on the next play Alboini hit John Chapman

Photo sequence shows all-star flanker Eric Walter scoring his record-breaking 30th career touchdown Saturday against Western. Walter easily eludes Mustang defender Peter Werry to catch Vic Alboini's perfect pass (top), then outruns safety Bill McTeer and is all alone crossing the goal-line 85 yards later (middle). While trainer Ed Armstrong cradles the ball, Walter accepts congratulations from guard Gord Whitaker (50). The jacketed left arm belongs to Varsity coach Ron Murphy. photos by jim cowan

CUS considers alternatives, pays off debts, dissolves

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Students will phase itself out of existence by the end of November, meeting all its debts and possibly even showing a surplus before it finally disappears.

Members of the CUS National Council met Monday to assess the position of the union and chose the phase-out over two other alternatives: continuing operations in a reduced capacity in line with reduced revenue, and continuation as a voluntary union.

In a press release yesterday the council said that an assessment of the union's finances had revealed CUS was "in a sound financial position and could meet all of its obligations and have a surplus."

The surplus, which council members said was still only a possibility based on payment of all outstanding fees from member or former-member student councils, would be divided pro rata among the remaining less-than-a-dozen members of the union.

Students at the University of Toronto finally broke the back of CUS, which has been fighting for survival for the past 14 months, when they voted to withdraw — along with their $20,000 — from the union October 22.

The National Council also announced that arrangements would be made to insure the continuation of the CUS Travel Plan, which provides low-priced overseas flights for students.

CUG releases Drache's research

Report blasts committee politics, autocratic chairmen

By BRIAN JOHNSON
Varsity Editor

After being charged with censorship and suppression over the past week, the Commission on University Government announced yesterday that it would release Danny Drache's controversial Research Report on the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Drache, a research associate hired by CUG last year, presented his report to the Commission nearly two months ago but it was not released.

CUG stated there was some confusion about the open or confidential nature of the interviews Drache held with departmental chairmen. CUG said it must meet with those quoted before the report could be released.

Last week Drache made public the private war he had been waging with the Commission for the past two months. He brought the question to an open meeting of the Students' Administrative Council, which tabled it, and sought support from The Varsity.

Monday's Varsity editorial threatened to publish the report if CUG did not release it.

The Varsity ultimatum was set for Tuesday.

Tuesday afternoon, the Commission issued the press release that stated it would release the Drache Report.

RELEASE PERMITTED

At a Monday night meeting, the Commission talked in terms of the ten faculty members (The tenth was unavailable.) who were quoted. They gave CUG permission to release the report as it stands, "although all expressed concern about the use of their words in some instances."

James Feely, another CUG research associate who supported Drache during the controversy, said last night that the pressure The Varsity applied to the Commission had something to do with the immediate release of the report.

"Getting the problem out in the open helped the release," he said. "Your honesty — in admitting you had a copy of the report — helped force the issue. Prof. Hodgetts (CUG member) was quite irked that we put the pressure on."

Unlike the CUG report, Drache's report is an investigation into the nature of the university as it exists today, not a blueprint for the model university of tomorrow.

ANALYSIS OF POWER

The document is an analysis of power in the university, an attempt "to understand the structural, organizational, and ideological complexion of the University as it is."

Drache bases his analysis on six months of empirical research into the structure of decision-making in the departments "to assess the viability of the departments in initiating and setting policy in a number of areas."

He also probes the basic organization of the university by asking, "who are the governors of the University and how do they govern? What is the role and power of faculty, administration and students in University decision-making?"

Drache launches an incisive critique of the reform movement at the U of T. which, he says, has just set up committees to speed up the efficiency of decision-making without answering "the class question of knowledge for whom and knowledge for what."

"There has been the implicit assumption," the report reads, "that the problem of democratizing the University is in large measure an administrative problem depending on the creation of more committees and an extensive network of consultation at all levels and between some levels rather than a change in what is taught, who teaches and how learning occurs. . . .

"... The type of reforms which have taken place in departments are ones which fall under the general heading of improving administrative efficiency and strengthening the departmental committee system. These are not important in themselves but by themselves they have not altered the exercise of power in departments. The litmus test of reform or for that matter of any social investigation is who governs and where does power reside?"

"The answer in most departments is unequivocally with the chairman and his small group of advisors."

Ironically, most of the sources for Drache's statement come from the mouths of the departmental chairmen themselves — the controversial interview quotations that CUG was worried about.

For instance, when Drache asked Mathematics Dept. Chairman G.F.D. Duff if he felt bound by the majority in the Senior Policy Committee, Duff answered:

"No, I don't think I have to be. I shall seek the advice of the department, expressed through a representative committee of senior members or a meeting of the whole department. I think if it really comes down to it. I wouldn't have to take that advice."

"In comparison to the chairman's position," the report states, "the departmental governing structure is a minimal centre of power. . . . Contrary to expectations the creation of committees has not seriously made inroads on the chairman's power. On the one hand they have made the policy-making process more tedious and cumbersome.

AUXILIARY BODIES

"On the other hand, the committees are not designated as independent agencies of policy; rather in practice they frequently turn out to be auxiliary bodies to the chairman himself."

Physics Chairman J.M. Daniels adds ammunition to Drache's argument:

"The decisions we make seem to be inevitable decisions. No matter who had to make them, any reasonable person would have to come to more or less the same conclusions. So it may be nice to have the student point of view, but I don't think it would make an awful amount of difference."

Geology Chairman E.W. Nuffield says, "I don't feel that there is time to go to the staff about every detail of the operation and then go to the students. Life is too short for that."

Most departmental chairmen see the students' role as one of such informal consultation.

"Informal arrangements encourage students' indifference," Drache says. "It is not surprising that students express disinterest in the department, and that faculty then express lack of confidence in the students' judgements."

All the chairmen come down against student-faculty parity control over hiring, firing, promotion and tenure.

"No, I would resign immediately," Nuffield answers. "I couldn't do it. They are not qualified to reach decisions on promotions and tenure. Their advice is very important, but when you say parity that means it's a vote for a vote isn't it? And certainly not on appointments."

Quebec students mobilize against bilingualism bill

MONTREAL (CUP) — A four-day period of student mobilization began yesterday at Université de Montréal, building toward a mass demonstration Friday against the Quebec Government's controversial Bill 63, which supports and ensures a bilingual policy in the French-language province.

Teach-ins on the bill began yesterday at Université de Sherbrooke and Université Laval as well as at U de M, where 13,000 students gathered to hear Raymond Lemieux, leader of the Ligue pour L'Intégration Scolaire, and other nationalist and unilinguist leaders.

At a closed meeting of French nationalist and student leaders Monday, detailed plans for a week of protest were drawn up, with its main focus a march Friday night on the Renaissance Club, headquarters of the ruling National Union Party. More than 10,000 are expected to march.

French high school students and students from post-secondary CEGEPS — Colléges d'Enseignement Général et Professionnel — boycotted their classes to attend the U de M Teach-in and cheered an announcement that students at Université Laval had begun a class boycott as well.

In Quebec City Monday students at the Ste-Foy CEGEP broke up a public hearing of the Gendron Commission on the Status of the French Language in Quebec. Approximately 1,200 protestors, chanting "Quebec Français" forced the commissioners to leave the CEGEP.

And 64 professors at U de M have petitioned the university's administration to suspend all classes during what they describe as a "state of national emergency."

Protest against bill 63 is drawing support from the entire political spectrum in Quebec under the cloak of the Front du Quebec Francaise, a broad-front organization formed to combat the legislation. The FQF is organizing demonstrations in all major cities in Quebec for today and tomorrow as preliminaries to the massive protest scheduled for Friday, which may include work stoppages as well as the protest march.

Bill 63, introduced in the Quebec Legislature last week, insures the province's parents the choice between English and French in the education of their children while naming French as a "priority language."

Opponents of the bill say passage of the legislation will open the door for the eventual cultural extinction of French in Quebec, and have said opposition is crucial to the maintenance of a French identity.

$2 awakening

Mass group sensory awakening will take place this Sunday afternoon at the "Buttery", Trinity College, under the auspices of the Blue and White Society.

Sensory awakening is a form of non-verbal communication. At first, the individual becomes fully aware of himself and of his immediate surroundings; the air, for example. This is achieved through concentration and body movements.

To reach a state of complete sensory awakening and communication the person must break through the barriers that inhibit our relationships and be willing to risk high levels of openness and warmth. The awakening will be conducted by "Explore", a Toronto-based organization. The charge is $2 a person.

VARSITY CONTEST: What goes on in Simcoe Hall?

U of T Registrar Rabin Rass, who is also the Secretary to the Commission on University Government, wrote the following two letters and dated them October 24. They were both mailed from Simcoe Hall on October 27.

The letters were a response to Friday's Varsity editorial which quoted from our copy of the Drache Report, a document that CUG had not yet released at that time.

The first letter was sent to the two CUG research associates, Danny Drache and Jim Feely. The approach is somewhat direct; the second letter was sent to The Varsity editor; the approach is somewhat ... what shall we say ... cool yet diplomatic?

Memorandum to: Mr. D. Drache
 Mr. J. Feeley

I notice that the editorial of today's edition of The Varsity contains a precise quotation from Mr. Drache's report, and in general shows some knowledge of the contents of the report.

I am certain that the Commission will wish to know if this report has already been given to the editor of The Varsity. May I know if either or both of you can assist me in discovering if The Varsity has received a copy of Mr. Drache's report?

I shall be grateful to have an early reply to this query.

Robin Ross,
 Secretary to the Commission.

 Professor L. E. Lynch
 Mr. A. G. Webster

Dear Mr. Johnson,
 I am writing to ask if you will kindly give me some information pertaining to the editorial called "Academic Freedom" on page 4 of The Varsity of the 24th October 1969.

The editorial includes the following passage which I assume to be a quotation from a document:

"A dramatic manifestation of the importance of the chairman (of a department) can be glimpsed from the data collected from the 19 departmental chairmen regarding the number of extra-departmental committees they or individuals are members of in the university, in the province, in the nation, and professionally."

However, the editorial does not indicate the source of this quotation.

I shall be glad to know if this is a quotation from the report compiled by Mr. Drache for the Commission on the Government of the University of Toronto. I shall appreciate your early reply to this question.

Yours sincerely,
 Robin Ross,
 Secretary of the Commission.

: the traditional view of academe

During its deliberations, the Commission on University Government recognized and outlined "two quite opposed general views about the university," each held by a large segment of the university community. In an effort to characterize these two viewpoints, the Commission set itself the task of representing each in as pure a form as possible. The first of these, the Traditional View, is published below. On Friday, The Varsity will reprint A Radical View and use the same space in future issues for articles of comment and criticism on the CUG report.

One view — and it is held by some members of the Commission — sees the modern multiversity very much in continuous tradition with the older university. Indeed, members who see the multiversity in this way simply carry into a new setting convictions that were held in a previous day about the nature of the university and its role in society. Thus, they look upon the university as an academic institution, its character largely determined by academic considerations, rather than as a social institution.

As a group of people, the university is a community of scholars; as an organized activity, it is dedicated to the preservation, transmission and advancement of knowledge. By and large, it is the teaching staff that takes the more active role in the classroom and laboratory; students come to receive basic instruction in the main disciplines and to develop fundamental technical skills that will later be put to use in one or other of the professions. As a consequence of years of preliminary and advanced study, members of the teaching staff have become identified over a long period with the university, and in time build up an experience in teaching, scholarly work and administration that combines to give them a pre-eminent position in the community. They see themselves as more or less committed to the institution for a longer period of time than most students, and possessed of insights into the intricacies of the university that are not possessed by their students. As a result, many have come to think of themselves as the university.

One condition is deemed essential if this whole enterprise is to prove viable — the university must be free, and members of the community must enjoy academic freedom. In the case of the university, freedom means a no interference in the workings of the university, i.e. in its academic work, can be tolerated from any source or agency outside the university, be it church, government, military, business or industry; the course followed by the university in its development must be determined only by the members of the community. Sir Eric Ashby has defined it in this way:

The idea that scholars in universities ought to be free to teach and learn what and how they wish goes back to the middle ages but the custom of guaranteeing this privilege by popular consent dates only from the nineteenth century. It was formulated in Germany, in universities which were directly under the supervision of the state, as Lehrfreiheit (a privilege of the teacher) and Lernfreiheit (a privilege of the research worker and the student). (Minerva, IV, 3, Spring, 1966, p.318.)

Sir Eric adds, rather wryly, that whereas Lehrfreiheit for staff has flourished, 'Lernfreiheit for the undergraduate has not fared so well.' As far as teaching staff is concerned, however, tradition dictates that there can be no interference from within or without the university in the individual's freedom to do research, to teach, to study and practise the arts. Academic freedom, in this sense, is the life-blood of the university and of those who toil within it.

By and large, devotion to his discipline in an atmosphere of freedom characterizes the academic. As long as his discipline is respected and allowed to develop according to its own requirements, and he is provided with books, libraries, laboratories and technical services in keeping with the university's resources, the academic is content to leave the overall administration of the university to others and to encumber himself with as little administrative responsibility in the faculty or department as is consistent with common decency.

Academic work and academic decisions — his teaching and research, curricular development in his department, appointments to staff, and so forth — are his primary concern, and he is convinced that academics alone are possessed of the expertise required to make such decisions. His dedication is to his discipline; and even when he engages in writing, research and consultancy outside the university, he usually sees such activities as contributing to his work in the discipline.

In this view, students are considered to be engaged in two main areas of university activity — one academic, the other social. In his academic role, the student is an apprentice who has come to the university to study under a master. It is very much an old-style guild relationship. As such, the gap in age, intellectual attainment and professional expertise makes the student largely passive in everything that has to do with academic organization and decision-making. In his social role, however, the student plays an active part — he organizes his own clubs in the university, plans such things as athletic events and social activities, and provides the political organization needed to administer those functions. As the staff member sees himself, by choice, relieved of administrative responsibilities, so too, does he see the student relieved of any academic responsibilities apart from those involved in study. The teacher's responsibilities to his students are discharged when he introduces them as intimately and deeply to his discipline — as he and his fellow teachers in a department define the discipline — as he can and, as a result of suitable examination, certifies to the academic community and to the world at large that he is satisfied with their performance.

The university, in this view, does not adopt a political posture towards the 'outside' society. Even though it should become totally dependent on the resources of the community for its support, academic freedom dictates the sacrifice of any official university stance on political decisions that have to be taken in the civil community. The university's relations with society at large are strictly at arms' length; it sets, or helps to set, the conditions under which members of the outside community can enter its halls for instruction, considers them under its jurisdiction as long as they stay, sends them forth to take whatever post in society they as graduates decide to take, and is content to influence society through the individuals it helps form. To repeat, the university is defined by its academic rather than its social role; its organization and structure are dictated by the needs of academic disciplines, not by social or political considerations. Its ethos is individualistic, not collective.

BLOOD DRIBBLE DISAPPOINTING (SO FAR)

With 154 fewer donors than last year, U of T's semi-annual bleed-in for the Red Cross has so far proved a distinct disappointment.

The drive began with a bang at Loretto College on Monday but it soon dwindled to a whimper as fewer and fewer donors showed up.

After two days' bleeding the total stands at 530 pints as compared to 684 last year. St. Mike's leads with 334 pints.

Yesterday at Trinity blood flowed like the ketchup that's worth waiting for, with some of the staff simply waiting for someone to show up.

Donors' comments ranged from "great" to "mediocre" to "Did you see the blonde nurse?" SAC President Gus Abols and Provost John Sword were among the first enthusiastic bleeders.

Today's clinic is in the Recreation Room of Margaret Addison Hall. Tomorrow and Friday New College hosts a clinic in Wetmore Hall.

Dents, last year's winners of the hemorrhagic competition will bleed on Friday in the School of Dentistry.

No experience required. All welcome.

Ethiopian feudalism feeds on i

By GARD SHELLEY

The myths about the good life under Haile Selassie in Ethiopia were exposed yesterday by Hagos Yesus in a speech at the International Student Centre.

Yesus, a 34-year-old Ethiopian currently studying History at Dalhousie, is a member of the Worldwide Union of Ethiopian Students.

He described the feudal system in Ethiopia as one that "thrives by maintaining total ignorance of the population."

Of the 25 million people who live in Ethiopia more than 90 percent are landless serfs. Of these serfs between 95 per cent and 98 per cent are illiterate. The entire country, said Yesus, is split equally among Haile Selassie, the feudal landlords, and the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, which Yesus referred to as "the most backward and banal institution in the world."

The feudal landlords receive 75 per cent of the serfs' produce. The peasants have to pay taxes on the remaining 25 per cent. Serf families are exploited in every sense by the landlords and are considered a possession along with the land they live on.

Yesus made special mention of "abuse of the female population for sexual pleasure."

The average life expectancy of Ethiopians is 31.

Haile Selassie, now 76, rules by divine right in conjunction with the church. Yesus said the church has created and maintained the myth that the "Ethiopian rulers are cousins of Christ and grandsons of Moses."

GREAT HOAX

Selassie demonstrates his concern for progress by participation in the Organization for African Unity.

Yesus said, "The OAU is one of the greatest hoaxes where Selassie and other tyrants who call themselves presidents, prime ministers, etc., drink champagne and martinis."

"In the last 15 years U.S. imperialism has been incorporated into the system — superimposed over and into the social system," he added. The society is now "semi-colonial and semi-capitalistic."

The Peace Corps provides more than half of the teachers at all levels of education and is seen by Yesus as an imperialist tool. The U.S. has a 10,000-man military base in Ethiopia, the largest in Africa.

"As long as a capitalist is making a profit in a country he will hold on to it tenaciously. These people are real estate agents, any scrap of land is important," Yesus said.

Selassie, who Yesus referred to as "The Tyrant", has visited the U.S. eight times in the last eight years asking for "more dollars for his own pocket" and arms, Yesus said. Selassie has more than a billion dollars in forty different banks around the world.

To combat Selassie and the feudal system, peasants and students have organized guerrilla units all over the country.

SOCIAL REBUILDING

Yesus said that the student uprising is concerned more with the social rebuilding of Ethiopian Society than with the educ. process. The aims of the students and the peasants are the same.

Although the guerrillas have been brutally suppressed, their membership is increasing. "Bombardment by the forces of the regime is supported by the U.S." Yesus said.

Ethiopian schools at all levels have been closed for the last six months. Three thousand students, mostly from the universities, are now in concentration camps. "Twenty-six students were murdered in the streets in the last two weeks," he said.

The slogan of the student-peasant uprising is "Land to the tiller." The Union of Ethiopian Students, which has been banned in Ethiopia, is anti-feudal, anti-monarchist and anti-imperialist.

Selassie has recently enacted two new laws. Yesus quoted them

Calgary students oust The Gauntlet

CALGARY (CUP) — Students at the University of Calgary voted by a narrow margin Monday to withdraw financial support from the campus newspaper, The Gauntlet. In an attempt to end the paper's left-wing editorial policy.

But the Calgary student council took the students' mandate a step further, and prevented publications of the Gauntlet's last publicly-financed issue, which was scheduled to appear on the campus today.

In a referendum ballot the Calgary students voted 1,288 to 1,236 to cease financing The Gauntlet, which has editorially taken a militantly anti-capitalist stance under editor-in-chief Jim Rudy. Rudy officially resigned as editor following the council's decision to prevent publication.

The referendum was instigated September 24 after the paper ran a front-page story under the headline "three capitalists appointed to ruling body". The story was on analysis of the financial backgrounds of three recent appointees to the Calgary Board of Governors.

After the referendum, The Gauntlet staff announced the paper would continue to publish on the basis of its advertising revenue. This move inspired the student council to demand that the printer cease work on the final council-financed issue of the newspaper.

"I want the paper stopped," said Lee Richardson, council vice-president. "You know the kind of things they're going to write now for Wednesday. I don't want that paper to appear on this campus."

Rudy said The Gauntlet staff had anticipated loss of The Gauntlet, and would probably devote their time to an independent left-wing paper, The Spark, which began publication in Calgary during the summer.

"The Gauntlet is only a small part of the activity we're engaged in," he said. "What they've done in smashing the paper is very little, actually, except in exposing some of the real contradictions inherent in so-called representative government."

On the same ballot Calgary students rejected voluntary unionism by a vote of 1,566 to 968. They will continue paying the mandatory $32 fee levied by the university administration at the beginning of the school year.

At present only one Canadian campus, the University of Guelph, has a voluntary student union.

So there I was with Bissell ...

By JOHN BENSON

So there I was — sitting with Dr. Bissell and a hundred or so other lit. buffs listening to Margaret Laurence speak in the Edward Johnson Building yesterday afternoon.

Mrs. Laurence who is writer-in-residence at U of T is best known for her novel A Jest of God which was later made into the movie "Rachel, Rachel".

The atmosphere was subdued as the audience was made up mostly of bright-eyed but aging academics searching anxiously for pearls of wisdom to present to their next first-year English class.

When Mrs. Laurence spoke of her difficulties in finding a suitable form for her novels several members of the audience nodded their heads and sighed in agreement, having felt the same struggles that the artist must endure.

Mrs. Laurence, who is one of Canada's best known novelists and whose home is now in England, has recently purchased a cottage in Ontario in an attempt to reaffirm her Canadian heritage.

She said she felt a real desire to attempt a radical new form of novel which would include some "bizarre illustrations by a really good artist".

President Bissell smiled. Maybe he's thinking of using the idea in his year-end report.

Ignorance: Yesus

as being:

SIX IS ILLEGAL

• No more than five people can meet for political purposes without a permit from the minister of the interior.

• Any person suspected of political activity is liable to imprisonment for six months without trial and this sentence is renewable indefinitely by the minister of the interior.

The second law makes legal activity as defined in the first law illegal also.

In the U.S. 15 Ethiopian students are awaiting trial in Washington in connection with demonstrations made during Selassie's visit.

Among other allegations, the students have been charged with burglary. Yesus was outraged, "Burglary for entering our own embassy!"

He added, "If the students are deported (back to Ethiopia) they will move into the gallows of the Tyrant." He said they would be "hanged for seven days in a public street."

Hagos Yesus was very brief on what kind of system he would like to see replace Ethiopia's feudalism. He said he wanted "a society that is egalitarian and progressive."

Most of his passion was expressed in negating what now exists in Ethiopia.

Panelists are pessimistic about 'Western' democracy in Africa

"Democracy in Africa has come to an end."

These were the opening words of Prof. D.F. Walker of the U of T Political Economy Dept. last Wednesday night at a panel discussion on the meaning of democracy in Africa.

Prof. Walker condemned the "all-embracing legitimacy" of the one party system in Tanzania, saying that under such conditions "democracy means no more than the right to elect the man who already has the power."

Emmanuel Fagbamiye of the Department of Engineering, while also pessimistic about the future of democracy in Africa, pointed to illiteracy, poverty, and foreign economic control as its greatest enemies.

All panelists agreed that democracy in Africa must be modified to take advantage of pre-existing ruling structures on the village level. Western concepts (i.e. the multi-party system) were shown to be not always applicable to Africa.

Africa, it was agreed, by developing after the rest of the world, should benefit from the economic, technological, and political experience of others.

OAAA harrier championship set for Nov. 1

Veteran runners Dave Bailey and Brian Armstrong will lead a seven-member Toronto team into the OAAA harrier championships Saturday in Kingston.

Meet officials have decided to use a six-mile hilly course which is expected to favour Varsity's chances, as defending champion Waterloo is stronger over the shorter courses used in the past.

Other Toronto runners Saturday will be Bob Knuckey, Bob Cairns, Ross Kidd, Peter Pimm, and former Varsity sports editor Rich Pyne.

Last weekend, the Toronto team easily won a special meet in Western 23-36.

Western's Chris Bolter captured first place over the five-mile course with a record time of 25:56.5, but Varsity runners took five of the next six places to win handsly.

Rich Pyne led the Blues with 26:48, and Bob Knuckey was third in 27:01.

The Varsity Waterpolo Blues made it three in a row defeating RMC 9-7 in a closely fought match at Hart House on Saturday. The Blues had to overcome a two-goal deficit at the half to win what coach Kirk Thompson called a "sloppy game".

He felt that the Blues had horseshoes in their trunks to win the game. Says Thompson: "the team has a lot of potential but will have to improve if it hopes to win the OQAA championship this year."

Alex LeRoy played well for Varsity and was their high scorer netting four goals. Theo Van Ryan and Jim Adams also played well scoring two and one goals respectively. Other Varsity scorers were Hunter Milbourne and Brian Barras.

The Blues shored up their defence in the second half allowing only two goals. Andy Hackett and Brian Barras played well on defence but the truly exciting moments in the game were provided by the two goalies.

Hartly Garfield, in the Varsity nets, was especially spectacular when he blocked a penalty shot late in the third quarter. His overall goaltending was the deciding factor in the Toronto victory.

McGill, Gaels lead football rankings

McGill Redmen and Queens Golden Gaels top the national football rankings released this week by the CIAU and the College Bowl committee.

Although tied with Varsity for first place in the SIFL, Redmen have apparently impressed the selectors with their 144-52 point spread, as compared to Varsity's 141-93.

The committee also considered the 24-0 half-time lead

Queens amassed over Blues two weeks ago in Kingston.

Blues tremendous second half surge in that game, as well as the solid team effort against Western appears not to have registered with the selection committee.

The rankings are:

1. McGill
2. Queens
3. Manitoba
4. Carleton
5. Varsity
6. Waterloo Lutheran
7. St. F. X.
8. Guelph
9. Western

Field hockey team is very good; Field hockey writers are better

By MELANIE POTTS

MARTHA TOPPS

The Toronto Women's Field Hockey Team continued its scourge of the intercollegiate circuit with successive victories over McGill (5-2), Guelph (11-0), Macdonald (7-0) and Waterloo (7-0) over the weekend at Macdonald College in Montreal.

High scorer for the tournament was "super frosh" Lorna Tanner with ten goals closely followed by Sally Manning (PHE II) with nine and Anne-of-Belleville Thompson with seven.

The Long sisters complimented each other on the wings and popped in one apiece while petite Jackie Cheng pivoted the team from her center half position and scored two goals herself.

It became clear early in the weekend, despite the cold and the ice, the wind and the rain, that once again Marina Van der Merwe's troupe of lady field hockey players were far superior to their opposition in nearly every facet of the game, with the possible exception of humility! Special mention must go to goalie Sharon Wilson who got three shutouts after a slow start in the McGill game. While maintaining these shutouts Sharon was frostbitten in four toes and part of her left ear.

Meanwhile, on the side line, injured Sue Peck (manager of the team) was having her wounds licked by "Tigger" the team's new mascot. What could be more frustrating than having your twenty-first birthday on a intercollegiate weekend! (No booze Suse. Happy birthday, mother!).

Back in Toronto at York U., McMaster defeated all comers in that section of tournament (Western, Queens and York).

Coach Van der Merwe maintains that McMaster will be the team to beat next weekend at Guelph. However, Toronto has met McMaster several times this season and beaten them.

Mac has assured us they will rise to the occasion and anything can happen.

In the words of Alice Shank, Buxom back and Captain, "We have but to do our own thing, in our own position, and the result will be brilliant!"

Phe C got goals from Taylor and Skinner ("Dry, lifeless skin? Make the change to-day — "skinner", the new miracle skin. Buy one to-day at your neighbourhood skin shop — better yet, buy two: they're cheap") to edge Trin, 2-1. Hall scored for Trin ("Fortrin" is a computer-programming thingie.)

Dents (Drury 2; "drury" is an Old English word describing a down acid-trip on a rainy Sunday in November; OED; Southward, Ross) 4; For B (Dunn 3) 3.

Suppelsa ("Mild-mannered dietician Buzz Sa has only to utter the magic word DUNG to turn into Suppelsa, king of Beasts, complete with x-ray eyes and skinner.") scored four, Sprags 2 and Harvey one to lead Scar over Eng II (Mills), 7-1.

LAW 4 (Pashby 2, Ochterlony "2) FOR A 4 (Winged Griffin 3, O'Reilly)

RUGGER

Pink (present tense; cf. preterite "pank" and participle "punk") had two points and

Smith 3 as Innis beat SMC and O'Neil, 5-3. Innis then tied Trin B, 3-3. Sutherland and Burgess scored tries.

UC ochterlonied PHE, 11-3. UC scorers were Goldenburg 3, De Fretton 2, Stankiewicz 3, Arnott 3.

PHE (Phillips 4, Nicholson 6) 10, Vic 0.

Ledoor (if you ever want anyone to ledo, he's your man) and Murray had 5 each and Trin B blanked Emm, 10-0.

Compton had 10 to lead Trin A over Law (McArthur 5), 13-5. Trin's remaining three were scored by Dunkley (a word describing a wet doughnut.)

Scar (Seery 7, Goldlust 6) 13; Eng (newland 3) 3.

SOCCER

Beyar and Creater (the greater Tycho on the moon is named after one of his ancestors) gave Innis a 2-1 win over New; Da Rosa scored for the Gnu. (The gnu is a small South African antelope related to the ingmarbergman)

Trin (Smith, Baker) 2; UC (Flood, as indeed Louis XIV had prophesied) 1.

Bisoeno's goal was enough to put Jr. Eng. past Law, 2-1.

Sr. Eng. 1. SMC 0. Albanese (a dialect spoken by the inhabitants of Upper New York State) was the scorer.

Da Rosa had 4. Maibaum (surely you recall "Dr. Strangelove; or, How I stopped worrying and learned to love Maibaum") 2, and Boulos the other, Dan McInnis hitting for Knox (nominative absolute) as New adironadacked Knox, 7-1.

Ellerton had 2 and Tongian (the secret language spoken in Tong-wars) as Wyc took Meds B, 3-0.

CONTEST CONTEST CONTEST

Varsity Sports contest judges to-day announced, with some misgivings, that David Frank had won the recent Contest. Mr. Frank's answer to the query, "Did he who make the Lamb make thee?" is reliably reported as, "No, I'm the other Volkmar Richter."

Mr. Frank has been rewarded Rod Mickleburgh as his prize.

Important soccer and rugger tilts this afternoon at three chimes with Blues hosting the McMaster Marauders in two battles for first place.

Soccer is at the Stadium; rugger on the back campus, east field.

Also today at three — Vic and St. Mikes decide second place in Division one of inter-fac football — west field, back campus.

Also today — athletic events calendars on sale at the Benson Building; a real bargain at 50c.

Also today — space going fast on the Engineers buses to McGill next weekend; info at SAC Office or EngStores.

Drache's Report

people and I'm very interested in their comments. Again though no."

The report says that Nuffield's authority and the power of the committee system intersect; but that Nuffield holds the balance.

Drache lists six factors which create "the elitism of the committee system:"

- The chairman is responsible for appointing faculty to many committee positions. Faculty who serve on committees do so at his discretion.
- Only a few departments use either a voluntary system or have instituted democratic elections to fill committee positions.
- Full professors are over-represented while instructors and assistant professors are under-represented on committees.
- Tenure creates a class structure between academic ranks.
- The most important committee, usually the senior policy committee, is neither duly elected nor composed of all ranks of faculty.
- In many departments the committees function inefficiently with lack of clear purpose which discourages many faculty from taking an interest and participating.

As well as examining the internal structure of individual departments, the Drache Report examines how the departments are related to each other and the central administration.

He exposes "departmental autonomy" as a "non-system" that prohibits change rather than protects academic freedom.

"Theoretically departmental autonomy is designed to give departments maximum control over their internal affairs," Drache writes. "Like any system of social organization divided into neatly defined jurisdictions, its main selling point can only be realized in its negative aspect of isolation."

Often, departmental autonomy means that departments are kept in a state of isolation, ignorance, and secrecy.

East Asian Studies Chairman A.K. Warder comments:

"There is the question of secrecy whereby some chairmen think it tactfully wise not to say too much about the things they are doing. There is a tendency of the Dean to negotiate separately with each chairman and it is a sort of a battle of wits."

"I find myself woefully ignorant of salaries in other departments for example," Warder adds. "I'm not sure whether our people get a fair deal compared with other departments or not. Perhaps I could find out but I haven't had time."

Zoology Chairman D.A. Chant complains that he was not consulted on the look-ahead plans the U of T presented last winter.

"I don't see how plans can be formulated that bear very heavily on the future of sciences at this university without the science departments being consulted and being involved. I feel that is really scandalous."

Most departmental chairmen were upset about their powerlessness in budgetary matters.

"If I make a budgetary appeal I have a feeling that it goes before some vague tribunal who may all wear black hats for all I know," says Chant.

STRATIFICATION

Drache explains that "departmental autonomy" does not constitute real departmental power, but rather stratification of power, ignorance and secrecy.

He says the power is shifting more and more away from the departments, and that this is the real process that lies behind structural reform.

The Philosophy Department, one of the most "reformed" departments in the university, is Drache's case in point.

"I get a feeling of uneasiness about the procedures that are being followed and whether or not the University is actually in academic or non-academic hands," says Philosophy Chairman J.G. Slater.

"I found myself locked into an organizational system," he adds, "where there didn't seem to be any way in which, as chairman, I could affect changes which would feed back into University policy."

In January 1968, Professor Goudge, who was then Philosophy Chairman, was told his department would be evicted from its new building.

THREATENS RESIGNATION

Goudge said he would resign if forced to move. The move was called off, but it had nearly caused a major crisis.

When Drache asked him who authorized the decision to evict the department, Goudge replied, "I simply don't know the answer to that question."

"Were you ever interested to know?" Drache countered.

"No, because I was so much concerned with the consequences of the decision... It seemed to be an academic decision to find out who had authorized it."

VARSITY STAFF:

Where are you? Come in hoardes to the tune of mass democracy. We're having a staff meeting Friday 1 p.m. in The Varsity office to discuss what the hell we're doing.

Drache interprets the move to centralize the university and keep the departments in confusion as part of a key process in the "structural reform movement": "The corporate strengthening of the university is carried out by weakening the base."

He cites three factors as attempts to "rationalize" that corporate structure:

- government formula financing
- program budgeting ("a sophisticated accounting and planning device developed by the Pentagon to ensure greater uniformity between ends and means, or between the amount of money allocated for a specific purpose and the results achieved.")
- the computerization of university decision-making. (Professor Richard Judy of the U of T's Institute of Quantitative Analysis received a Ford Foundation grant of three-quarters of a million dollars to study such a system.)

Drache's basic criticism of the structural reform movement — and implicitly of the Commission on University Government itself — is that it does not answer the class question: "knowledge for whom and knowledge for what?"

He focuses the problem here on a traditional departmental attitude — the ethos of the "academic guild".

"The emergence of a post-industrial academic guild parallels the growth of the corporate university," he says. Drache describes the guild as a structure in a department that permits only one approach to the discipline, the approach favoured by the senior faculty, who control the hiring and firing mechanism.

For example, the Philosophy Department is totally dominated by the analytic school of philosophy, Drache explains.

Many professors blankly accept the concept of the guild.

"The brotherhood has to be perpetuated by people who have the real interest of the brotherhood in mind," says Physics Chairman J.M. Daniels.

"Well there's something to a guild," says History Chairmao A.P. Thornton. "a guild has a certain craft or art which it has perfected, it has made rules about, it has developed a professionalism about. That's not phony. They know how to build a better mousetrap, or they have yet to have it proved to them they can't. I think that this whole hooesoo about democracy in an academic institution is fundamentally phony. And that's why, if you want to talk about guilds, I'll talk about guilds."

"The pattern of power in the University," Drache concludes, "denies students their political-intellectual rights, discriminates against non-tenured faculty, concentrates power in the hands of a few administrators, and transforms the University into a modern capitalist institution."

"The democratic University begins to exist as a fact when the relations which keep its internal class system alive, are no longer part of the University's learning and decision-making structure."

41 per cent of arts and science faculty are non-Canadian

By MARY KATE ROWAN

Almost half the arts and science faculty at the University of Toronto is non-Canadian, says Daniel Drache, researcher for the Commission on University Government.

The Drache Report states that the largest number of foreign faculty are American. British nationals make up the second largest group.

Forty-one per cent of the faculty's teaching staff are non-Canadian; Canadian citizens make up 54 per cent.

Drache obtained his information from questionnaires sent to all arts and science department chairmen.

The study defined both native-born Canadians and naturalized Canadians as citizens.

The Drache report says:

- not one of the 19 university departments is 100 per cent Canadian;
- only one (Political Economy) is more than 75 per cent Canadian;
- only three of the 19 university departments are more than 60 per cent Canadian;

• Canadians in 8 of the 19 university departments are in the minority;

• in another eight departments Canadians have a majority of less than ten per cent.

"On the basis of these results", Drache says "it is clear that in every department there are Canadian nationals."

"However," he adds, "It is also clear that in a large number of departments Canadian citizens do not comprise a significant majority of the faculty."

Americans constitute the largest number of non-Canadians in eight departments while British faculty are the most numerous non-Canadian group in six departments.

"What is most significant about the pattern of concentration", says the report, "is that the eight departments where there is a decided American presence do not overlap with the six departments where there is a concentration of British subjects."

"In short, the concentration of for-ign nationals is pronounced not in a few departments but in seventy-five per cent of the University departments."

NOT 'INTERNATIONAL'

According to Drache, the University of Toronto is not an 'international' university.

"The international character of this university," he explains "depends upon recruiting faculty from two English speaking countries."

"The university has at most token representation from the third world academics of Africa, Asia and Latin America," he adds.

The report says that it has been "a long-standing practice" at the U of T and other Canadian universities for students to do their graduate work out of the country.

In 1967-68 there were 3,546 Canadians studying for masters and doctorate degrees in American universities and 691 Canadians attending British universities, says Drache.

He argues "The trend for the elite of Canadian graduate students to be educated in two countries has reinforced the Anglo-American presence at this and other universities."

The report states that numbers do not merely influence the character of an institution, they determine it.

"In terms of the nationality of teaching staff," says the report "one can do more than suspect that the presence of one American to three Canadian faculty has greatly affected the policies of departments, the teaching of disciplines, and the hiring of new university faculty."

"What has changed Canadian universities," the report continues "is the introduction of a social and scientific viewpoint which makes the American historical viewpoint the Canadian historical viewpoint."

"The devastating effect of this structured colonialism has left its mark on Canadian studies with the result that they become mere imitations of American studies."

United Appeal blasted for 'excluding poor'

The United Appeal guarantees poverty by making it "less degrading to the sensibilities of the middle class". This charge was leveled by third-year political science student Peter Demarsh (III Pol. Sci.) last Wednesday at a meeting of the Student Christian Movement.

At the same meeting U of T chaplain Eilert Frerichs charged that the various agencies are merely "maintaining minimum standards of service without producing any changes in the structure of the society that produced these conditions."

The U.A. also received a scathing attack from the Just Society movement, an organization composed of social workers and poor people.

In an open letter they charged that the UA is run by business and trade union executives who do not allow the poor to be represented on the various boards of directors. They cite last May's meeting of the Ontario Welfare Council, a U.A. agency as a case in point.

At that meeting two young people and two welfare recipients were elected to the board of directors.

As a result, the Just Society says, the U.A. has decided to review the Ontario Welfare Council's right to continued support from the fund.

Moreover, they charge that the success of the campaign is "often viewed in terms of how it was pleased its corporate givers and its board directors."

John Yerger, director of the United Community Fund, has disclosed that he was warned of withdrawal of funds by a large financial backer, unless the democratization of the agencies was halted.

The Just Society is calling on the U.A. to stop its "totalitarian control" and allow the recipients of the benefits to have a say in the running of the agencies.

Biafran nationalist charges:

'Canada is waging a conspiracy of silence'

by DOUG VAREY

Canada is waging a conspiracy of silence over Biafran genocide, Samuel Ifejika, Editor of the Biafra Times said Wednesday.

"What I want to ask Canadian students is why there is a conspiracy of silence? After the Second World War, people said: 'We didn't know that 6,000,000 Jews were being killed.' People won't be able to say that about Biafran genocide at the end of this war."

Ifejika was on campus Wednesday and he made it clear Biafrans are puzzled by the response of the international community to the destruction of Biafra and Biafrans.

Ifejika is co-author of The Making of a Nation: Biafra. From his perspective, the Nigerian-Biafran war is largely a British creation.

"Contrast the attitudes of Britain toward Rhodesia and Biafra. Rhodesia revolts directly against the Crown and nothing happens. Biafra secedes from Nigeria and Britain supplies arms to the Nigerians. One is forced to conclude that Harold Wilson is a racist.

"On two occasions prior to this bloody war, Biafrans and Nigerians were near agreement. Each time, Britain stepped in and advised Nigeria against such terms. Britain wanted to hold Nigeria together at any cost for economic reasons.

200 GROUPS

"For the colonial rulers, Nigeria, the largest country in Africa, was a most intellectually satisfying concept. In fact," said Ifejika, "Nigeria was an anthropological nightmare containing over 200 distinct tribal groups."

"The word united is being bandied about in the international community as if it were the end of life itself," said Ifejika. "The word covers a multitude of sins: United States of America, United Nations, United Arab Republic, United Kingdom. Unity is being forced on Biafra by an international community that considers any other course heresy.

"Is the union which people seek to impose on Biafra to be a union of the living or the dead," asked Ifejika?

"What makes a nation is not the size of the country or of the population, but the potential for unity among the people, the willingness to live together, a desire for the common good. Nigeria was not such a union."

Ifejika continued, "Some say that 30,000 Eastern Nigerians were killed, wounded or disfigured before secession. Thousands more moved back to the Eastern Region so that if they had crossed an international border, a very large refugee crisis would have been created. But because we were part of Nigeria, the Biafrans were expected to lick their wounds quietly.

NATIONAL FEELING

"Some people say that this is Colonel Ojukwu's (Biafran leader) war. This is not so. If we surrender to the Nigerians, we die; if we continue to fight, we die. We are united by national feeling. The war has forced the Biafran people to reassess everything. Self-criticism has been accepted as a way to change. This has never happened in Africa before."

According to Ifejika, Biafra is undergoing a revolution. Several members of the audience wanted him to "pigeon hole" it with some sort of name. He refused.

"Our revolution is very pragmatic. Education has become utilitarian. No one goes to school in order to get a degree and a nice position. Our scientists are involved in solving practical problems which the war and revolution present. Many new ideas and terms are heard.

"The revolution has its roots in the towns," said Ifejika. "The people begin to ask why a permanent secretary has a whole house when they have no shelter."

TAINTED OFFICIALS

Several high ranking police officials have been dismissed because they were still tainted with corruption they learned in Nigeria. Every Wednesday, government leaders meet with representatives of the people to learn from each other and to reach solutions. We are already planning for our reconstruction after the war.

"All over Biafra people say to one another: 'This is what the basic document on our revolution says. Are you following it?'"

In response to a question

Ifejika said, "There is something I can't understand about Black Power. Why do its exponents not see, in Biafra's struggle, a focal point for their struggle? 'Here is an African people engaged in Africa's first war of independence, ignored by the international community and killed with British and Russian armaments. And yet they do not understand it.'"

This is Don McCulloch

His job is talking to students

By STEVE COWLEY

The University Advisory Bureau, a conventional-looking set of offices above the Royal Bank at 631 Spadina, hardly fits one's expectations of a staid, well-organized university service.

A friendly, casually dressed fellow invites you to sit down in a room which seems to be a general meeting area, a few people group themselves around on the floor, and there you are.

Then they start to crack your conventional ideas about counselling.

Phil McKenna, "Community Development Facilitator" — the title embarrasses him — at Innis College, and full-time worker at the Advisory Bureau, typifies the bureau's attitude towards its function in the university.

"What has happened to the notion of counselling over the past few years is that we now realize it does no good just to try to adjust people to society as it is," says McKenna.

"It just isn't that simple."

McKenna, who shuns any specific definition of his role considers the bureau to be a group of people who are "out of the power rat race", and who want to talk to people.

COMMUNITY START

"We've got to realize that we're all in the shithouse together," he says. "We won't tell students how 'glorious' the university community is. I try to discuss with them points where community could start."

Dr. Don McCulloch, Advisory Bureau director, and associate professor in the Faculty of Medicine, shares McKenna's desire to keep his role anonymous.

McCulloch feels that defining his role in the bureau alienates him from students.

"My main function is just talking to people," smiles McCulloch. "I'm concerned to find out what's going on between people on the carpus."

"I help organize the Free University of Toronto sensitivity groups on the weekends," he says, "and quite often people know me only as a trainer. They don't know what the bureau is. They don't even know my last name. They just look at me as someone who is friendly with them and willing to help them."

DISILLUIONED

He adds that the "T-Groups," which involved about 200 people last year are designed to increase people's self-knowledge. "They enable people to make their ideas explicit to each other," says McCulloch.

McCulloch's disillusionment with conventional approaches to counselling began 13 years ago when he was director of outpatients at the Ontario Hospital on Queen St.

"I suddenly realized on my way home from a meeting of the Canadian Psychiatric Association that I was getting really pissed off just fiddling while Rome burned. Situations of any consequence never involved psychiatrists."

There was nothing much they could do for patients," he says. "About all you could do for them was be kind to them for an hour and then let them go."

At the time McCulloch felt he wanted to "get out where it was at, not sit in an office where people came to me."

The powerlessness of people to have a say in anything of significance in their lives bothered me."

DIRECTION

When invited to head the Advisory Bureau in 1965, McCulloch had to decide the direction in which it would go.

"The university already had a Health Service to deal with casualties," he says. "But there was nothing to help people who lived in an un-human place."

"We had to try to create a human environment in an institution which was a community only in a geographic sense."

McCulloch feels the Bureau's ability to organize communities which often have radically differing views depends on its "neutral position" in the university.

NO POWER

"One thing the bureau shouldn't have is power," he says. "This place has got to be neutral."

"To the extent to which we have power we are not able to function in a neutral way."

Bureau involvement in CUS seminars and congresses has led to fears by the university administration that the bureau is going radical, admits McCulloch.

"But we often disagree with radicals," he maintains. "For example a lot of them think or T-Groups screw up people's minds."

McCulloch feels his most important task is showing genuine friendliness to individuals on the campus.

He smiles. "I think one of the most important things I'm doing right now is just talking to people around the university and finding out what they're doing."

Moratorium launched

A group of about 60 faculty and students met in Sid Smith yesterday to plan the U of T Vietnam Moratorium Day scheduled for Nov. 14.

The meeting, chaired by History professor Elliot Rose, made several organizational and policy decisions.

Philosophy professor Frank Cunningham said that enough names on a petition had been collected to force a special ATS meeting on Nov. 10 to ask for support of the Moratorium.

The group elected a ten-man executive to plan and coordinate events on Moratorium Day.

Their immediate goal was to send a delegation to President Bissell to ask him to suspend all classes on Nov. 14.

The moratorium received further support last night when the Victoria College Union Council passed a motion supporting the demonstration.

The motion, passed by council president John Elton, stated that the VCUC believed that all students concerned about the war should take part.

Council defeated a motion from first year member Glenda Stark, calling on the Vic administration to cancel all classes Nov. 14.

BLOOD TRICKLES

Nearing the end of its first week, U. of T.'s blood drive smacks of disaster. So far only 1010 pints have been collected, making this year's goal of 3500 pints seem like a Mittyesque dream.

To find the reason for the apparent failure The Varsity conducted an informal survey. Almost half the donors had not noticed any of the posters that were supposed to be plastered all over.

The letters which the Red cross mailed out seemed to be the second main source of information and some only found out about the drive when they saw the big sign in front of the clinic. A few (yes, Virginia) got the message from The Varsity.

Today's clinics are in New College and in the School of Dentistry, Monday and Tuesday in the Galbraith building.

Obituary of a panel

Five old men talking about obsolete youth.

Sad.
Sixteen people listening, well re-actly thirteen when you subtract me, my wife and the photo.

Sadder.
"Any social group described in psychoanalytic terms would sound sick," said Aron.

Aron looked hopeful, you know, long kinky hair like Abbie Hoffman, moustache. But he sounded like Humphrey.

Bragg: "What was the source of violence in Chicago 68? I think that's fairly evident that the instigators of violence in this case were the police." He shifted a little... silence, Oh well.

He tried again: "They're no longer interested in the whole achievement game, but are now working towards self-actualization."

The panel was discussing Dr. Bruno Bettelheim's four month old paper about youth and stuff. It's called "Obsolete Youth."

Bettelheim had written: "I know that student revolt offers an opportunity for the paranoid person to act out his paranoia..."

It was one of those well-I-haven't-really-got-time-to-go-into-detail-so-I'll-gloss-over-it discussions.

There were even spotlights shining down on the panel, reflecting on the bald heads... beautiful.

Dr. Solorsh: "I don't even know why we're playing the game, I think it's a linear struggle."

Well, that really did it, cliches everywhere.

"So the kid's a needle freak"

"Youth isn't ready to enter the industrial complex."

"Don't get motivation confused with cause... there is no valid political opposition... youth has reached a point where it has a choice... dribble... dribble..."

Everyone went home.

'How long will this witch-hunt continue?'

Last week Fred Freeman, "radical" chairman of the Inter Collegiate Student Council of North York (ICSCNY) was forced to resign. The importance of this action at the high school level cannot be overlooked, for it further exemplifies the backlash taking place against "radical thought" throughout North America.

The high school administration's policy has been to ignore "student radicalism" and then to curb and repress it when it becomes prominent.

The ICSCNY consists of fourteen student members from fourteen North York schools representing approximately 20,000 students. The executive was comprised of Chairman Fred Freedman, his three vice-chairmen and five adult members (four being on the Board of Education and one, a member of the advisory council). In other words, no student parity exists, and the five adult members can easily veto the decision made by the students.

On accepting his position last year, Fred stated, "I will work with the Board, but I will not be dictated to by the Board."

In former years, the students of this council have been allowed to make their own decisions. But this year Mr. Griffiths (member of the Board) knew Fred's views on education and thought it safest to organize the executive as such has been described.

A few weeks ago the ICSCNY passed a Bill of Rights which called for student's rights (not privileges):

- the right to assemble and organize;
- the right to publish without a staff sponsor;
- the right to bring in speakers.

The only tabled provision called for the right to form political clubs. It was tabled on the basis that, as one member said, "It might encourage radicalism."

The student council followed this Bill with a series of amendments designed to change the executive structure. Fred and his colleagues suggested the adult portion of the present executive become an honorary body, to be used for advice alone, without voting power. Thus, as it should be, the student executive would be in control of their own council.

Terribly disturbed by this threat of student control, Mr. Griffiths blackmailed the executive into retracting their amendments. He threatened to convince the Board of Education to withdraw their support from ICSCNY, and their grant of $500.

The executive decided that the destruction of their Council could not be risked. Therefore, in the interest of the 20,000 students to whom they are responsible, they retracted their amendments.

The fourteen-member Council, which is of a conservative nature, concluded that a chairman holding political views was not practical. They decided to force Fred's resignation for the following reasons:

1) Fred "has his own personal way of thinking" — even the retraction of his amendments did not blot out his convictions.

2) The Toronto Daily Star, in their coverage of ICSCNY, gave the impression that the Council as a whole desired some form of radical change. Although this was by no means a critical account, the students felt that it was not representative of the Council's views. Voting went as follows to accept Fred's resignation: five for, four against, two abstentions, and three schools absent.

Fred has not yet been permitted to make a resignation speech, as Mr. Griffiths fears that again Fred will "display his own personal way of thinking."

As Fred has said in the past, "Schools should be a lab for life, not a workshop for a job."

How long will this witch-hunt for radicals continue?

CIA moves in?

Sir,
In an article by Miss Rowan in the Varsity issue of Oct. 29, 1969, the following statement is made:

"Forty-one per cent of the faculty's teaching staff are non-Canadian; Canadian citizens make up 54 per cent."

It is interesting to speculate on who the other 5 (41 + 54 - 95) are. CIA undercover agents?

Another point: why didn't The Varsity print the Drache report in its entirety including the actual statistics of foreign participation in each department?

Ivors Petersan (III UC)
David Kane (III Inn)

(Ed. — The other five per cent were unaccounted for in the Drache Report, where some departmental chairmen were either unable or unwilling to give the nationality of certain faculty.)

The Varsity did not report the whole report, since the document is 240 pages long, and since it is now available from the Commission on University Government, which released it Tuesday.)

There will be a meeting (yes another one) of all Varsity staff or any one wishing to join that great body of collective democracy. We will discuss all sorts of cups — ORCUP, cup CUP and conferences. We will discuss the community issue. We will discuss — Just come and see. TODAY at 1 p.m.

the radical view of the multiversity

During its deliberations, the Commission on University Government recognized and outlined "two quite opposed general views about the university," each held by a large segment of the university community. In an effort to characterize these two viewpoints, the Commission set itself the task of representing each in as pure a form as possible. The Varsity published the first of these — The Traditional View — on Wednesday. The second argument — The Radical View — is reprinted below. The Varsity will use this space in future issues for articles of comment and criticism on the CUG report.

A second view of the university and its work is motivated by what, in the eyes of certain radicals, seems to be the conservatism of the university and the repressive nature of the society that supports it. In this radical view, the university must become a critical institution, one that cannot and in fact, does not work in an intellectual or social vacuum. It must understand academic work as something defined as much by social need and social consequence as by the abstract demands of a discipline. Radical criticism of the North American multiversity and the state of academe — which has a tradition going back to Thorstein Veblen and Stephen Leacock, Frank Underhill and C. Wright Mills — has been particularly powerful since the beginning of the 1960's. It is a criticism both of society at large and of the university; it focuses on the social and economic function of the university and what is taught there, as well as on the position of students, professors and administrators inside the university. It is a critique strongly supported by several members of the Commission. What follows is a description of that criticism.

The University of Toronto, in this view, never was an ivory tower, nor is it now a community of scholars: to say it is a multiversity, a conglomeration of faculties, institutes, research centres, and professional schools — all serving a particular social and economic purpose in the life of the province and the country. Clark Kerr has described and documented the growth and expansion of the American multiversity since 1945, with the tremendous increase in federal aid, the wealth of foundation funding, and the power of expertise developed inside the university. A similar, though not identical, pattern of growth and expansion has taken place at the University of Toronto (and many other Canadian universities) since 1955. The university has, in short, entered the market-place. The American institutions of higher learning, as one would expect, have done so with gusto; we have done so with more trepidation, more blushing, as befits a Canadian institution. But we have arrived. That the University of Toronto is a key institution in the political economy of North America is quite clear. The role our professional schools and institutes play in the corporate economy is the most self-evident: we train lawyers, doctors, businessmen, social workers, nurses and engineers. Enrolment is planned on a province-wide basis according to what it is thought the economy and the social system will need.

The radical points out that the vast majority of students come from upper-middle and middle class homes. An examination of those who attend universities in Ontario and Canada at large reveals startling inequalities according to the occupational background of families. The conclusion that can be drawn from the figures presented is that the university is both an elite institution and a class institution. This is regarded as an intolerable situation in a democratic society. The social role played by the institution in this case is clear: it trains the sons and daughters of an economic and social elite to continue performing that role, in the broadest sense, and provides an important source of mobility for those in non elite homes to join the elite.

In radical eyes, the growth in power of the academic guild and the resultant specialism and professionalizing of academic work are other features of the modern multiversity. Curriculum in many of the humanities and social sciences is often a reflection of the self-defined goals of the professional academic and the market society. Criticism and questioning should surely go to the roots of disciplines; the growing inability of curricula to look at important questions is a result of the self-enclosed academic guild. Specialization feeds a burgeoning graduate school. A scanning of the faculties reveals a barren vision: a depoliticized political economy department, economists mere 'garage mechanics to capitalism,' literary studies that feed on technical analysis, an engineering faculty that fails to question goals as it teaches techniques. Most disciplines, in the name of 'relevance,' are mere apologetics for or appendages of the welfare capitalism of rapidly disappearing Canada.

Radical fear of 'ideological imperialism' in disciplines is particularly strong in the social sciences and humanities. Many American departments of philosophy, for example, have been torn apart because of the rise and domination of linguistic and alytic philosophy. There is a noticeable fear that the same development could take place in other disciplines because of the tendency of particular schools of thought to dominate a department. There is much talk of 'pluralism,' but an examination of many a department would reveal a deplorable lack of any real differences in approach to the discipline amongst its staff. The curriculum of some departments presents mere variations on the status quo.

The role of the student, both in the classroom and outside, appears to the radical to be a hangover from the age when the young were to be seen and not heard. His learning role is distinctly passive. Regurgitory examinations and arbitrary, impersonal evaluation constitute the 'academic environment' for the vast majority of students. The cult of competition that is a way of life in the market society is carried over into the school system in the incessant striving for a standard of "intellectual excellence" that is defined by the academic guild. Similarly, the ethos of gerontocracy and seniority, along with the university's gentlemen's club rules of deference and consensus, combine to keep the student firmly placed as a distinctly second-class member of the community. There are staff washrooms, staff elevators, a faculty club — all reflections of the exclusiveness of the guild, the academic brotherhood. There is what appears to be a determined and often conscious effort to keep students and faculty from approaching each other as social equals, from getting to know each other as people. One of the strongest indictments that can be made of this 'community' is that vast number of students pass through it without ever talking to a professor, let alone getting to know him as an individual.

Thus, both the content and process of education in the university are stultifying. The institution is run on an autocratic, or at best oligarchic pattern. The formal structure of this particular university is positively Byzantine: most younger and untenured faculty, and students, are quite beyond the pale of the academic franchise. They have no rights. The same is even more true for the administrative and support staff.

In short, according to this radical view, the university is based on a series of anti-communitarian principles. It has become a market institution, a laissez-faire, mass production knowledge factory. Within it there is no equality of rights or responsibilities, certainly no social equality, and very little genuinely critical education. Passive consumers are fed through the assembly line of mass lectures, memory examinations and arbitrary evaluation. The model of governance of the university is a kind of congenial oligarchic despotism. The divergence between talk about the 'community of scholars' and the reality of the modern university is stark. The growth and strength of the professional academic guild simply reinforces the gap between the student and professor. There is community and collegiality of a kind, but students and support staff — because they are not members of the sacred priesthood — have merely to watch, in reverent silence, the performance of the academic ritual.

Outside, a large corporate university like ours plays a key role in the provincial and national political economy. We are not autonomous. The radical is convinced that old-fashioned liberals and conservatives who talk about the freedom of the university, its role as a 'place of liberty,' and the dangers of utilitarianism are, in fact, living in a daze. The close connection between economic growth and education industry has been made clear in recent studies of the Economic Council of Canada. To be fair, many staff members are humanists, and they are quite right in saying that most of their students do little to increase the gross national product. But an analysis of the whole institution and a study of the socio-economic function of the corporate multiversity would show that the university 'looks more like a centre for industrial activity than a community of scholars.' Stephen Leacock's peppy professional go-getters have replaced the tweedy sages immortalized in the mythology of alma mater.

The university's social role is also reflected in the research and consultancy work carried on by its professors. Here, the pull of the market is strongest; here, too, is where radical criticism is often harshest. Consultancy work is done for those elements in society that can afford to pay for it: government and corporation. Toronto's poor, the Indians of Northern Ontario, the unorganized, those who are not wealthy, cannot and do not take advantage of the academic's expertise. Involvement in research and consultancy accounts for the recent development of the professor as entrepreneur; no longer the retiring maiden waiting for her talents to be noticed by the wise and the wealthy, the Canadian professoriate is now quite openly plying its wares in the market-place to those who can afford to pay for their expertise. Knowledge is power, and academics are increasingly willing to flog their merchandise for a profit.

From the perspective of this radical critique, the problem is to establish a genuinely critical university, a university that would, as a community, combat the tremendous homogenizing and managerial tendencies that develop in the technocratic university. Alienation and distrust amongst students and faculty are clearly not going to disappear overnight; the university is only part of society, a partial environment. But the objective of the radical persists — the creation of a humane, cooperative community in a democratic society.

Thus, radicals see a different role for the university in society at large, as well as quite different relationships within the university community itself. The two goals are integral: the university must no longer be merely the pale reflection and servant of the market society, but an independent and critical force; patterns of authority and status that smother genuine criticism and the development of real intellectual enquiry must be broken down inside the university as well as outside.

George Grant has said that the essence of the university is its curriculum. This is, indeed, true if we take curriculum in its broadest sense: the course and quality of intellectual life in the university. To have control over curriculum, the members of the community must also have control over budget and the appointment of staff. The three cannot be realistically separated; all are keys to the independence of the university and the equality of its members. The task for the democratic university is to give students and staff the ability to control the decisions that affect them, i.e. to give them the means to make the university critical.

LETTERS

OPEN LETTER TO THE EDITORS OF THE TOIKE OIKE:
Gentlemen,

I was tempted to write a rebuttal to your last issue, but decided that, since to rebut all the misrepresentations, half-truths, and outright lies, would be a major work, it wasn't worth the trouble. (One example only should suffice. You quoted Gus Abols to the effect that Greg Kealey and myself had acted in bad faith in the interim discipline committee, and not in the interests of students as a whole, but rather in the interests of the New Left Caucus. In fact the position taken by Mr. Kealey and myself throughout the summer was worked out at the summer SAC meeting at Glendon College and approved unanimously. Mr. Abols being present! Moreover, the New Left Caucus was not even started until August. Both those facts can be very easily verified with a relatively brief look at the SAC files.)

It was my opinion at that time that either you knew that what you were printing was misrepresentation, in which case you were without integrity, or you didn't, in which case you were merely ignorant and lazy. (Ignorant, because you printed without being aware of the facts; lazy, because you made no effort to find them out.)

Your latest issue, however, demonstrates that my first hypothesis was correct; you are without integrity. You have chosen the easiest and most intellectually impoverished form of journalism, the form which depends least on information and fact, and most on emotion, red-baiting, and half-truths — yellow journalism. Red-baiting, gentlemen, displays an intellectual bankruptcy and lack of principle which I find disgusting in the editor of a major campus paper, and depressing in the context of a university community. If this is the best that the University of Toronto and the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering has to offer, then indeed, we have a community here, but not of scholars — rather a community of cretins.

I expect neither answer nor improvement. (Though I suppose I still harbour some faint hope that my expectations will be proved wrong.)

Simon Fraser strikers violate court order

BURNABY, B. C. (CUP) — The Administration of Simon Fraser University, backed by court injunctions prohibiting nearly every form of protest, continues its crack-down on striking students and faculty in the Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology Department.

Administration President Kenneth Strand said in an open letter to the campus that any further picketing, distribution of literature or mass gatherings would bring charges of contempt of court under injunctions issued October 24.

"Mass gatherings adjacent to academic or service entrances or exits, unless authorized by the university, are in contempt of the order of Judge Hinkson," Strand said.

The strike began Sept. 24, when the administration refused to negotiate the demotion and phase-firing of 11 PSA professors, and refused to recognize the total student parity operation in the PSA department.

The 14 defendants are also involved in a civil suit brought against them by the administration. The university has charged them with causing loss of university revenue entailed when students withdrew from the PSA faculty. They are also charged with trespassing and unspecified damages.

Strand said that he now considers "the university has taken all reasonable steps to inform the defendants of the court order," and that "any further breaches such as the incidents of Oct. 28 or 29 will result in contempt of court proceedings without further notice."

Lawyers advising strike participants have said the court order makes violators liable to six months to one year in jail.

Reporter goes for big money

By HEATHER MOORE

I showed up at the Old Physics Building about one o'clock Thursday. Engineering students were prowling the halls, looking for unsuspecting females. "Want to do a good deed for United Appeal? Sure you do, c'mon down this way."

The United Appeal white slavers had me in their clutches.

I was led to a small room down a side corridor, a lamb to the slaughter. There was a muted roar in the background, like feeding time at the zoo — the Engineering students were getting ready for their fun.

In the waiting room, known affectionately to its inmates as the pen, there were about seven girls, getting more and more nervous, more ready to back out by the minute. Some had come in pairs; there was no way anyone was going to make them go out alone.

More girls arrived. Then, singly or in pairs, my fellow inmates disappeared through the door. The howling in the background got louder.

There were six Skule cheerleaders in the room, and when they left it suddenly seemed empty, and ominously quiet. They sold for $91.

It was getting late, I had a class in half an hour, and besides, I didn't want to be the last girl auctioned. "Can I go next, please?" God, they're ready for me.

A big guy in one of those blue leather jackets took me to the door and elbowed his way through a crowd of onlookers. The sale was held in a barn of auditorium, with a counter running the length of the front.

Three girls were up there, dancing. The air was hot and steamy, and the noise was deafening. It sounded to me a bit like a Roman mob yelling for a few more Christians to feed to the lions. I was scared stiff.

In the end it wasn't so bad. I got up on the counter and jiggled around a bit in time to the Lady Godiva band. There were a couple of very rude comments from the audience (unprintable in a family newspaper). The auctioneer (Jack Meof) egged the bidders on: "Going once, going twice, sold to the gentleman in the corner there." My price ($55) wasn't anywhere near the highest; Fernne Kane sold for $69 and established an all time high.

By auctioning off 28 vests (or not-so-vests) the engineers raised $700 for the cause.

is rod (gulp) gone?

The winner of the "Is Rod Mickleburgh Alive and Living If So Where, If So Why" is Frank Meighal of Hamilton, Ontario. His prize is the secretary of the Penticon Herald described as having the morals of a retired Roman Catholic Saskatchewan wheat farmer by a friend.

Sir:
To answer your recent question concerning Rod Mickleburgh's state of consciousness, I am happy to report that Rod is not alive, nor living. He is, in fact, dead, quite dead. Moreover, reliable evidence suggests that he has been dead for three years now, and has enjoyed every minute of it. There exists a wealth of clues forcing the conscientious inquirer to this conclusion. To facilitate abstracting and microfilming, I'll list these clues for you in ascending order of photon generating activity.

1) In last year's Varsity feature story on him he was reported to have "done cartwheels in the snow". Now, careful reading of ancient Hebrew mythology reveals that there once was a cat called Ezekiel who "saw a wheel inside a wheel" rolling way in the middle of the air.

This was, in fact, Ezekiel's psychodelic peep into the sweet world of shadows. The Varsity article thus reveals the glorious message that Rod had passed on one crisp snowy morning.

Another Varsity clue lay in the published picture of last year's Review Staff. In that picture everyone else looked stoned — except Rod, who looked sick, with a ghastly smile. Now it just so happens that the ghostly smile is an old Brazilian death symbol.

2) Rod's name affords us two important clues. First, run the name through your mind, liberate your imagination, draw the proper association. Now, as a man, tell me, does it not rise and flash and burst like a golden meteor in the night? And our Rod, the Big R, leaping with life in the foreplay, too soon bursting into orgasmic pentubulations, now sleeping in a Chelsea morning!

3) The second clue generated by his name was brought to my attention by an eminent west coast mathematician/philosopher. Some mathematics is required to appreciate this clue and if the logical rigor leaves you in a sweat, remember that even the Supremes can stay dry with New Ban. Now, count the letters in Rod's name. One, two, three. There, don't you see the marvellous simplicity of it, the awesome elegance of a cosmic truth! Rod Mickleburgh died three years ago!

4) There is a filthy slogan crawling about among the atheistic, hippie, professorial, plumbing and other despicable subcultures of our glorious Canadian society — "God is Dead". Our research has traced this revelation back to Aristotle who, in fine democratic madness, got it from the plebians. The old fellow was trying to tell us something quite different, it turns out, but got shafted by the populace-typographical complex. "Gimme an 'R'." Aristotle demanded, and got a 'G' instead. Aristotle, for all his sexual exoticism, knew the truth about dear Rod.

5) In modern times we find yet another explicit clue concerning the location of Rod's head. The Illinois Speed Press, in masterful, baroque subterfuge, lays the story bare when they sing:

There's gotta be more than just two lines in the Oklahoma City Times.

What is the "more" of which the Speed Press sing? What revelation about Rod had to be expurgated from that great paper lest the masses be stirred to sedition, rape and littering?!!

And is it really only coincidental that the initials OCT when rearranged into COT and manipulated in standard elementary fashion (first letter decremented by unity, third letter augmented by two) give the name of our dearly beloved the late brother ROD?!!

6) The last and most compelling clue is really so obvious that only the brittle sophistication of our age could have kept the truth veiled for three years. Look about you. See the devilish inhumanity of the times, the crashing shadows of frustrated aspirations that dance in our twisted psyches, the brutal oppression of traditional institutions stamping imagination into the dust.

How can the star-children survive the corrosive lovelessness of the now generation? Poets crawl in the gutters, Eleanor Rigby leaves her vice, her half-darned stockings all, follows silver bells over green dark waters. And gentle Rod, too, took the rainbow ride.

Om, Om, Om.
Yours truly

You know girls like this

Active. Well liked. How does it happen? In most cases it's simply a matter of being yourself. And, of course, that includes good grooming. Believe it or not, the sort of sanitary protection you use makes a difference, too. That's why girls who are admired use internally worn Tampax tampons.

Tampax tampons are comfortable, so you're at ease every day of the month. They can't cause odor or chafing. And naturally nothing shows, no matter what you wear.

Tampax tampons were developed by a doctor. The satin-smooth applicator makes insertion easy. Disposal is no problem. These reasons and many more have made Tampax tampons the most trusted tampons in the world for more than 30 years. But don't take our word for it. Ask your friends. And try them yourself.

more than a fiddler

Isaac Stern played at Massey Hall last Tuesday. It was magnificent.

What has placed Stern in the elite of the world's great musicians is that he is much more than a violinist. His instrument is really no more than a medium. On one end, there is Isaac Stern, the Brahms Violin Concerto in D, a great deal of power, a great deal of artistic reverence, and something more intangible and deeply human. On the other end are we, the audience.

When the two connect, you want to forget everything else. You want to forgive the affected way in which the man jerks his hair back every time he stops playing. You want to forgive his occasionally unsuccessful impetuosity. You don't care about the fact that he missed a note here and there in the first movement and that the tutti was too loud at his entrance. It doesn't matter.

From the first note to the last, the second movement was one of the most beautiful pieces of music I have ever heard. Stern hardly ever lifted his eyes from the floor as he played; he appeared to have lost himself. His music was sometimes no more than a whisper, and sometimes it grew into a full rich song that rose above the orchestra and filled the hall until it was the only thing in it. The music was sad, it was tranquil; and it was very profoundly peaceful and happy. It was Brahms. And, when he finally lifted his face, I was pretty sure it was also Isaac Stern.

It would be unfair not to mention that the beauty of the concerto as a whole was greatly enhanced by the performance of the orchestra. Stern — unlike many soloists who tend to disengage themselves from the tutti and think only about their solo — actually seemed to be sharing the duties of leadership with Ance1. In the major tutti sections he would turn to the first violins and play a few bars with them here and there, moving his body extravagantly to indicate the rhythm or broadness of tone that he wanted. The violins followed every indication lawlessly.

The vitality of the music infected the orchestra in a very short time. They were playing with Stern, not beneath him.

Shown in this picture is Rod Mickleburgh kicking Mike Ignatieff. Now Ignatieff spelled backwards (Feitangil) is the Zulu word for "bucket". Did Rod "kick the bucket"?

The woodwinds introduced the second movement so well, that anything short of Stern's superb entrance would have been a letdown.

Indeed, the quality of the sound produced by the orchestra seems to have improved a great deal since their first concert two weeks ago. The technical difficulties have disappeared; Ance1 is directing with perfect control and complete mastery over the music. In the first movement of Fantasies Symphoniques by Martinu, he evoked a soft but rising and incredibly rich musical texture; one repeatedly had the pleasing impression throughout that the orchestra was a single, though very complex instrument. Ance1's conducting is very precise, and filled with countless details and nuances. He produces the kind of music that you might have to listen to several times to catch everything that is in it.

faced when it presented the first British production of the play.

These might seem to be petty points about which to carp. But where the Theatre of Fact is concerned they are of utmost importance. This is not because facts take precedence over art but because in this art a great deal depends upon gaining the absolute confidence of the audience. You see, when Paul Crouch was mentioned and joked about in the trial, those members of the audience who remembered the McCarthy years (and there were many of them) laughed too. And for that moment a perfect expression of the confidence was made — the audience became part of the ritual, not through some artificial breakdown of the actor/audience barrier which forces the spectators to become actors, but through respecting their special role as an audience and through using that respect dramatically.

It is, as I said, a torturous process. I have no wish to discuss the political implications of the inquiry or of the special emphasis that the play gives: that would be to ruin Kipphardt's intentions. Kipphardt's play is monumental in the extreme use to which it puts the concentrated effect of that old standby of dramatic exposition — the trial scene. Dramatists from Shakespeare to Shaw (George Bernard and Robert) have realized that the trial is the perfect excuse for a character to stand up and openly give the argument of the play. The irony is of course that as well as realising this Kipphardt has worked it all from the other end. The proceedings in the Oppenheimer case/play may be occasionally boring, occasionally simplistic, occasionally pretentious but they have an overall effect which is powerful (or do I mean "wearing"?)

The Lincoln Center actors have approached the play with intelligence and some sense of deep reality. W. B. Brydon as the chief prosecutor deserves a medal for high-pressured concentration and for some nice moments when he turned to the tape recorder in order to make sure his clever point was recorded clearly. William Myers was endearing as the one scientist of the judging panel and Frederick Rolf chilling as the father of the H-bomb, Edward Teller. But the overall effect was a horrifyingly unified one of a self-adoratory, self-critical, boring Voice of America. I say this despite the fact that one would imagine that J. Robert Oppenheimer would have been the one character separated from this large Voice. Somehow it didn't work like this. The moments in which Paul Sparer as "Oppie" worked with the rhythms of the play and cut across the prosecution's rapid flow with a deliberately phrased, slowly spoken comment of his own were embarrassing moments. Rather than faulting Sparer for this (he was casually effective elsewhere) I think that the enigma lies within the play itself. Gerald Searle's sketch depicts a hunched, bewildered, somehow admirable tragic individual Kipphardt's play raises enough political, philosophical and aesthetic issues to keep you thinking for a month. But the individual has gone. The scratching behind the ear, the caressing of the cheek, the stoop, the pipe — the actor has put them all in. But eventually they are lost in the welter of words. We are concerned with the outcome of the man's case as it comments on the idiocy of American bureaucracy, not as it involves us in his particular emotional plight. Based as it is upon factual proceedings of national concern, the play is concerned with the Freedom of The Individual before the freedom of the individual and this can never be the right way round.

It's a problem that the Theatre of Fact will have to face, I think — Oppenheimer's final speech attempts to make amends but the responses have been set by then. As we left the theatre and wound our way through the foyer, the loudspeaker told us that drinks were obtainable in the bar and that dancing was permitted. The man behind me on the stairs turned to his friend: "By the way, Marshall, what exactly has happened to Oppenheimer now?" Who was I, in the plushness of the O'Keefe, to turn to say quite simply "He's dead!"

here's uncle johnny in the bath tub... whoops!

Arthur and Evelyn Baron, camera in shaking hand, occasionally out of focus, have managed to put together a home movie, Johnny Cash, The Man, His World, His Music. D. A. Pennebaker did the same thing with Bob Dylan, on the Dylan destroyed his work. Cash, on the other hand, gave something to the Barons — a thin slice of just what Johnny Cash is.

The movie, like most home movies, is occasionally boring; scenes of Cash visiting friends, his old home, and just conversing about the old days, reveal a simple man doing just what everybody else does. Offstage, he is a warm and gentle man, devoid of the electric magnetism projected from behind a microphone. The man's basic sensitivity and ability to communicate pervade the whole film.

His music flows throughout. Singing at home, with the sensitive June Carter at his side, onstage, strumming, sweating, or in a Nashville studio with a fuzzy checked Bob Dylan, it's a personal statement, beautiful in its simplicity and rich in the evocative phrasing. Andrew Wyeth with a guitar.

The other members of the Cash entourage are also featured. Carl Perkins, a Beale favourite, picking out his blues. Suede Shoes, points out the common roots of country and early rock. June Carter, the woman of fire and ice floods the screen with her stirring magic. The flashing eyes, the sensual smile, the guttural rendering of Jackson are potent. With Cash, she's more subdued, but the crackling tension is still there.

The man from the Bible Belt, a labourer from Kingland, Arkansas, a gentleman pioneer with the easy homespun grace, joins with the young kid, prophet to millions of the Love Generation, the people who grew up on acid, pot, and revolt. The Barons are to be congratulated for obtaining the scene of Dylan and Cash together. It's enough for seeing the film. Cash's easy confidence and Dylan's the great fun songs of all time. An album well worth owning.

GORDON LIGHTFOOT. Sunday Concert. United Artists UAS 6714.

Lightfoot's latest features old songs such as Canadian Railroad Trilogy along with two great new songs. For an album recorded live (Massey Hall, March, 1969) the sound quality is exceptional. Though the large number of repeats makes it less interesting for those familiar with his work, new fans of Lightfoot will find the record essential.

LEONARD COHEN. Songs From A Roam. Columbia CS 9767.

This record has beautiful poetry set to music which shows flashes of brilliance. However, wouldn't it be better to record Cohen in a reading of his poetry (McKuen style) — rather than having him sing his poems? Best of the songs are Story of Isaac, The Partisan, and Lady Midnight.

Pianist Antonin Kuhalek's first North American appearance, for which he chose Toronto, went almost unheralded, and was poorly attended — the audience managed to fill the Edward Johnson Building's Concert Hall to less than one third of its capacity.

Those who did come to hear Antonin Kuhalek were given very fine and intriguing performances of works by the Czech composers Plosman and Smetana, as well as Beethoven's famous Les Adieux sonata, Ravel's piano cycle Miroirs, and Hindemith's piano suite 1922. Any one of these last three technically difficult showpieces would have been more than satisfactory as the mainstay of a concert performance, and in choosing to play all three of them Kuhalek set himself quite a task. In concert he showed he was well up to it.

Kuhalek has a fine touch which produces a limpid, delicate tone. Also particularly enjoyable were his sparkling and smooth runs and arpeggios in the charming Smetana polkas and the Beethoven sonata. If the interpretations lacked a little warmth this dropped his pick piped piper to the radicals

Somehow along the line somebody forgot to tell Phil Ochs that he was playing as part of a conference about radicals, not for them. But then, as it turned out, it would have been an even greater mistake to have had an even greater mistake to have told him. Playing before an almost capacity audience at Ryerson auditorium Friday, Ochs lived up to all their expectations, and while putting on a second-rate show, still had such a command over his audience that they applauded and stamped their feet at every turn.

Ochs did all those things which are not expected of a professional performer. He forgot lyrics, showed up late, mixed up his verses, broke his guitar strap, cracked his voice, and dropped his pick, yet the boots in the audience applauded vigorously.

Most intriguing of all was the fact that Ochs responded to his audience's radical leanings to the extent of even changing the songs so that they would have the greatest appeal to that audience. Most appalling of these instances was his adaptation of the last verse of "Here's to the State of Mississippi" from "Mississippi find yourself another country. To be part of."

Richard Nixon find yourself... not that I object to radicalism or I am anti-left or pro-Nixon. Rather, when I go to a folk concert I expect to be entertained by the artistry of his music, and has resorted to politicking while accompanying himself on guitar or occasionally on piano — a venture about which the less said the better.

There is, no one can deny, plenty of room for improvement in the U.S. both politically and socially. There is also no denying the value of Ochs's music and the fact that what he wants to say he says well, although his songs tend to become long and too poetic. However, the two encodes which the audience commanded on Friday evening were not a reflection of the musical quality of his concert, but rather an expression of thanks and encouragement for his continued existence as their political "Pied Piper".

at OCE, as part of their tour of North American colleges, sponsored by Campus Crusade for Christ International.

The program could best be called schizophonic. The first half was largely made up of material done in Lettermen/Swinging King Cousins/Brazil '66 style. The only thing missing was "Little Green Apples". All terribly antiseptic, Lawrence Welk would have loved them ("You see, not all college students are young rabble-raisers.") But in the second half, the number of spirituals went up, along with the interest value. If you are going to have a more-or-less choreographed group, wanting to put across a religious message, spirituals, with their opportunities for vocal duels ("I saw the light", B: "He saw the light", C: "He saw the light", ALL: "Ye ALL, saw the light"), and natural forcefulness are well-nigh perfect. About 30% of the group's material is original, and one of the best of their own songs, which totally zonked me out, was Pam Jovick's "Life is out of Tune". Unfortunately, they mangled the vocal to "God Bless the Child".

The only difference between the New Folk and countless others is their religious slant. For that reason I found the inclusion of so much CFBP-We-Are-in-Tune-With-Youth pap so incomprehensible.

As to individuals, besides the aforementioned Pam Jovick, I also noticed Jon Gilbert, for his vocals, and Gary Lesniewski, for being that ranty, an interesting bassist. God bless.

luke out yonder

Luke Gibson, formerly of the Kensington Market, opened a one week stand at the Riverboat last Tuesday. His first set, before a sparse crowd, was a miserable flop except for "True Me" and a stirring rendition of "I I True A Carpenter" written by Tim Hardin.

At the urging of Bernie Finkelstein, Gibson's manager, I stayed for the second set which promised to be better, and was infinitely so. It featured beautiful renditions of "speaking of Dreams", "River Flows Through My Window", and "The Rock and Roll Band" (original compositions, as is about 50% of Gibson's material) a very cute tune about his reminiscences of the good old days of Luke and the Apostles, the passage of whom Luke still regrets sorrowfully.

Despite the potential which he displays, Gibson still desperately needs to improve his stage presence, phrasing, voice range and quality. He also seems to miss having a band around him, despite his contention that he really digs going it as a single. Next week, another former Marketeer, Keith McKie returns to the Riverboat for a two week stand.

A great highlight of the evening was watching Blank Kirby, senior entertainment writer of the Globe and Mail, sprain his wrist while trying to write with his fancy flashlight-pen which cast a shadow over his paper so that he had to strain to write. If nothing else this proves that the struggling campus reporter has something in his favour.

JERRY JEFF WALKER, Mr. Bagan-gles, Atco SD33-259.

Ranging from poor to very good, this country-influenced album has one constant feature — the excellent guitar playing of Walker. Be warned that the recording quality is not the best.

IAN AND SYLVIA, Nashville, Vanguard VSD 79284.

The last album the Canadian duo performed for Vanguard was a poor farewell. Compared to their other records, the singing is weak, especially where Sylvia sings solo. About the only salvaging factor is the fine guitar accompaniment of David Rae. Oddly enough, there is no real Nashville theme on the record.

DOC WATSON, Good Deal in Nashville, Vanguard VSD 79276.

Unlike the Ian and Sylvia Nashville record, this is the real thing, serving to remind us that Doc Watson is still the best country style guitar and banjo player around. Though the vocal performances are solid, it is the instrumentalists that are outstanding.

BOB DYLAN, Nashville Skyline, Columbia CS 9825.

The second album by the "new" Dylan continues with more of the excellent sounds of the first one. Girl From the North Country, performed by Dylan and Johnny Cash, is one of potent cheap music is'

In a rush of sister generosity and bad taste, my girl once bought our mother a brooch on which a few too many rhinestones were arranged with absolute symmetry. Its Woolworthian origins were obvious, but nobody cared. Aside from its consecrated status as gift, the sparkle of the patented surface was fun to watch.

Years later, it's a bit duller, but in a bright enough light and against a rich velvet background, it still has its dazzling moments.

APA Repertory's production of Noel Coward's Private Lives, now in pre-Broadway tryout at the Royal Alex, is attractive in a similar way. The play takes its title from the heroine's assertion that "Very few people are normal, deep down in their private lives. It all depends on circumstances."

So does the play — the circumstances in this case being so contrived as to enable a divorced couple to end up next-door to each other for their second-time-around honeymoons. Bear in mind that the play's organization is equally artificial in its symmetry, and you can work out the plot from there.

But you'll never duplicate the dialogue. If it no longer seems as "jagged with sophistication" as the heroine describes her heart, and though it has few pretensions of cutting deeply, it is still brilliantly funny on the surface of word play, nonsequitur, and well-wrought witicism. The uniformly competent cast accordingly played for the dialogue, polishing their lines with the appropriate, studiously careful pauses and intonations.

The play was chosen to commemorate Coward's 70th birthday. Its age is showing, and the APA production exploits the potential comic effect of this datedness with rich 1930's costumes, female makeup, dancing, mannerisms, music, and an elaborate II and III Act set that looks like the child of the Chrysler Building in New York. The symmetricality of the script is extended through this mounting, even to details like costuming the females in complementary colors.

The thorough professionalism adds up to an amusing evening, if you don't mind spending money on rhinestones.

to hell . . .

George Kaczender's Don't Let the Angels Fall is yet another attempt to overcome the barrier of timidity that has long stifled the National Film Board's feature production program. Also, the appearance of tycooness Sharon Acker and the witty sarcasm of The Collectors do not a feature make.

Kaczender's film is built around anti-thesis — involvement and non-involvement, sentimentality and emotionlessness. But there is a basic lack of definition surrounding the theme of the film — a feeling that although the film journeys cleverly from the mundane truths of marriage and family to the sheer fantasy of escape and freedom, there is little to which we can fasten our attention. The characters of fastened father, near-deaf mother, disgruntled eldest and rebellious youngest sons might as well be cardboard cutouts. To put it bluntly, Don't Let the Angels Fall suffers mightily from an absence of credibility.

The film opens with a powerful scene of non-involvement and violence. A dog is dying on a shady street, its pathetic wails drifting into a bedroom. A Montreal investment broker lies musing on a past affair, deaf to the world.

The film closes with an equally effective sequence. The youngest son, confronted with the disintegration of his family, is seen in an extreme long shot, breathing his way through the steel supports of Buckmaster Fuller's geodesic dome — his escape ended.

Although each scene of the film forms a concise, purposeful statement, there is no cohesiveness. Somehow the sense of disunity that Kaczender plays with so well in a long series of flashbacks at the beginning of his film continues throughout and our attention is lost by the final scene.

Conveying the breakdown of relationships in the film by breaking down the unity of his film itself into scenic action, although well intended, is not enough. The impression left by the technique is only one of confusion and lack of belief.

Jack Kerouac died last week at forty-seven. Le Devoir ran a big spread since he was French-Canadian.

Don't know much about him: he left about ten books, was the prototype for the beats, is supposed to have become middle-aged, married, fat and conservative. He had long periods of despair ("I am a heart-sick clown like all the world"), handed in a new manuscript two weeks before he died. Critics say he never matched On the Road.

Still On the Road is enough, like the few James Dean movies, catching those times, those feelings. It has the frenetic, turned on, run on incidental rhythm of criss-crossing the country looking for. But also the non-rhythm of purposeless, futile, negative early fifties. The paperback came out so early that the sales blurb on the back cover mentioned sex and didn't mention and wrecking cars and didn't mention drugs at all.

So in America when the sun goes down and I sit on the old broken-down river pier watching the long, long rows over New Jersey and sense all that raw land that rolls . . . and in Iowa I know by now the children must be crying in the land where they let children cry, and tonight the stars will be out, and don't you know that God is Pool Beer? The evening star must be brooping and shedding her sparkler dimms on the prairies which is just before the coming of complete night that blesses the earth, darkens all the rivers, cups the peaks and folds the final shore in, and nobody, nobody knows what's going to happen to anybody beside the faintest rags of growing old. I think of Dean Moriarty, I even think of Old Dean Moriarty, the father he never found, I think of Dean Moriarty. Who died two years ago.

lincoln henriess

The Canadian Union of Students is now a corpse. Before the burial, it deserves at least an autopsy.

What was it? The centre of radical student activity in Canada, the source of most of the ideas for university reform sought at U of T, and a union that tried to be a movement and failed. Its failure was its death, and its death was next to inevitable.

CUS was always more a group of committed people than a broad-based student union. The group had a democratic legitimacy based on their election by and accountability to student council delegates from around the country; but it also was in a sense, a world unto itself. Central in Ottawa, the secretariat did research and policy analysis; fieldworkers went campus to campus trying to build a radical base and work with local student councils.

What happened was not surprising. CUS looked at this country. A massive student means survey showed it how little chance the working class of Canada has to get to our expensive universities. CUS looked at these universities; the sense of semi-bored cynicism was only too apparent among students there; education wasn't alive, creative, but constricted, limiting. The country had poverty, pollution and priorities more shaped by profit goals than by social needs.

CUS was made up of ordinary people who saw this, who spent their working days studying it. They couldn't be unmoved. They had to try to understand why these things were so and how they could be changed. As a group, they developed; they became socialists of a radical and democratic sort. They tried to make the union they led a movement trying to deal with the social realities they saw.

Leadership changed, and developed further. CUS looked at an underdeveloped third world, living in poverty of the grimmest kind, a third world pawn-played by the powers of west and east; again a CUS made up of people couldn't help trying to understand — and act accordingly.

ACT MILITANTLY

The conclusion was clear: "We have to become a national liberation front for Canada," one leader put it. An outside empire, centred in the US and reflecting the values of corporate capitalism, controlled Canada as it did much of the third world. Canadian students had to fight to free their nation from such a system so as to build a humane co-operative society here; they had to stand with other parts of the world fighting for independence too — from American or Soviet control. They had to be prepared to act militantly to bring such changes about — in their universities and elsewhere.

This trend reached its height with Pete Warrian as President. The union became explicitly anti-imperialist, effectively socialist, militantly activist. Then its rapid death began. Runaway rhetoric at Congresses played a role; disputes in the secretariat hurt too. But the real causes of decline were much less trivial.

Our national politics are not based on principle, but on pragmatic reconciliation of diverse regional and ethnic demands all within the context of a general capitalist economic consensus. CUS refused to play that game. That meant three things:

First, CUS wouldn't operate as a lobby-interest group in the reconciliation system. It saw clearly that basic change wouldn't come that way. That was unacceptable, however, to many students who could rationalize CUS membership only in terms of students' needs to have a fork in the national fight over a larger or smaller share of the cake. When anti-CUS people attacked CUS because "my local M.P. says he'd never listen to them" it was a compliment for CUS's action but a blow against the union's future.

Second, since CUS people wouldn't play pat-a-cake politics in the national context, they refused to play inside the union. They wouldn't give in to regional pressures and local campus student council barons. They wanted a clear-cut national movement, not fragmentation compromise. But local barons have their positions because they have power on local campuses.

So when CUS wouldn't compromise with them as with Edmonton in 1965, or Gus Abols this year — they came home to lead their students out. Again the national movement concept limited the national unions future.

Third, and most important, CUS was challenging bluntly the national consensus on a capitalist economic system. That consensus works on students too, though; they've gone through a school system which implicitly — occasionally explicitly — supports it; they read newspapers themselves run on a capitalist basis that consequently support the profit system. That means the campus members of CUS were largely not anti-capitalist while the union was.

The only answer was to try to persuade the membership CUS was right; the time, though was too short and the major means of communication, privately owned newspapers, radios, and TV, the government run CBC, were hardly sympathetic toward the project. The union hadn't enough money to do it alone; the CUS people had moved to their position too fast to take their membership with them.

In short, they had honestly said what they thought, and tried to act on it. CUS hadn't played politics. The remarkable thing is that on that basis they took some campuses with them, they gained some parts of the country they needed. Regina, Simon Fraser, Laurentian in Sudbury, Lakehead, Glendon, Brock, Kings College and Mount Allison in Halifax all voted to stay in a solidly anti-imperialist CUS. We even persuaded St. Mike's College at U of T to vote 2 to 1 for CUS last spring.

LONEYS CUS

Martin Loney's CUS was a little different. He and his secretariat felt some compromises could and should be made to save a national student union. He played down anti-imperialism, tried to work with moderate student council leaders and even attacked the radical left on occasion. It ed t come off. He and his group had too much conscience to really turn CUS back into a liberal union at the 1969 Congress; left-wing socialists were disillusioned, nevertheless, and refused to help CUS win its referendums; and students just didn't trust the new, essentially ambivalent image Loney tried to give the organization. Carleton students, for example defeated the "new, more moderate" CUS by much more this year than they did the old solidly socialist CUS last year.

Some of that, mind you, is a result of external social factors. The press has been getting more and more hysterical about CUS. Student protests and the Ontario University presidents fanned that with their hattle-trumpeting over "extremists" in September; students are influenced by fear of disorder too — no matter how little validity there is to the threat of chaos. Still, the CUS revisions of this year seem, in itself, to have badly hurt the union.

It's like the NDP moderates who try to fight shifts to the left in party policy by pointing to likely election losses. Voters watching understand manipulation when they see it and aren't going to trust NDP moderates who can't meet left-wing criticism intellectually; they'll suspect, rightly, that the moderates really believe in what the left is saying. The party would be much better off electorally if it honestly put forward its socialism and tried to persuade people it was what the country should adopt. Voters are a lot more sophisticated, I suspect, than the poll-takers tell us.

One shouldn't overlook the obvious in analyzing CUS's death; the union, after all, did receive a specific death blow — the referendum at U of T. And much of the general factors I've been discussing were operative here, at least one particular murder weapon should be mentioned from the local campaign. That is the vicious, degrading, infuriating red-haiting which went on at this University. I've been here four years now, and I've visited other campuses during CUS votes; I've never seen anything like the spurious lies, misrepresentations and innuendo which circulated here. The anti-CUS moderates like Art McIlwain and Gus Ahols, tolerated it; they didn't condemn it; so they share the same as much as the far-right Edmund Burke-types who actually paid for the reprehensible anti-CUS posters the campaign saw.

Red-baiting takes the content from radicalism; it leads people to deal with left-wing groups like CUS in terms of caricatured stereotypes; people don't have to deal with the issues and analysis being raised. Thus the anti-CUS people at no time presented their answers to the question of US control; they never critically analyses CUS policies. They didn't have to, for stereotyping, even if it doesn't condemn an organization outright, raises enough doubts about it that people play it safe and vote it down, especially when, as in this case, needed reforms seem to be coming anyway.

INTERNATIONAL TACTIC

It's an international tactic, of course. McCarthy in the US in the 1950's, Agnew now in America, George Drew in Ontario, even Pierre Trudeau and the Globe and Mail regarding Quebec, illustrate the same method. And in each case it permitted, or permits people to effectively ignore the real questions being raised; in Quebec now, for example, it's easier for Trudeau to seem to be fighting Communists in the CBC and CYC than Quebecers seeking to protect their language and culture. The fact it's not a solely local phenomenon, though, doesn't lessen the shame of those who tolerated it at U of T.

In any event, CUS is dead. what happens now?

Social realities stay the same. The United States will still take $6 billion more from Latin America in profits than it gives in aid and capital — as happened these last 10 years. Two teenagers have still committed double suicide in the US over the Vietnam war their country is fighting. Young Cabbagetown kids will still get screwed from the day they're born. Workers will still be cogs on factory assembly lines over which they've no control. Most students will still sit passively in classrooms over which they've little influence. American capitalism still owns two-thirds of Canadian industry, and makes priority decisions that leave the Maritimes poor, the cities polluted, and low-cost housing a rarity. The Czechoslovakians, the Biafrans, and the blacks in southern Africa are still getting crunched.

And the student movement will still continue — only with a different pattern of response than has been the case with CUS.

I've discussed the "national liberation" model CUS tried to follow. It's an approach which has worked for national student unions in third-world "colonial" areas, Algeria for example, or Mozambique at the moment. CUS hoped it could work in a Canada whose relationship with the US is at best semi-colonial. Our economy is, after all, directed toward US needs, our business and political elites are largely "clients" of that country, and our regional underdevelopment has hints of similar third world problems.

Yet, the US-Canadian relationship has another dimension. We are perhaps so deeply integrated into the Americans' national economy that we have come to share much of their prosperity. Canada is that strange anomaly — a rich underdeveloped country. That means that in a sense we are not a "colony" at all by simply a northern extension of the centre of empire itself.

We are likely, then, to begin to see a student movement that increasingly reflects this second interpretation of Canada's position in the world. In short, student radicalism in Canada will likely follow present US patterns of diverse, decentralized radicalism — at least for a while.

DOING THEIR OWN THING

There is no national radical organization in the USA; the only group with such pretensions, SDS, has split wide open. Instead, there is a loose, amorphous, unco-ordinated "Movement" made up of small groups in particular regions or parts of the economy, each "doing their own (radical) thing," often in competition with other left wing organizations. Research and analysis grew systematically done on a national level; unaffiliated, groups, like the Radical Education Project in Michigan, play that role. Communication is also ad hoc, through various left-wing magazines like the Guardian, Monthly Review or even Ramparts.

Herbert Marcuse called this diversity "creative" last year and in many ways it is; experimentation and imagination operate more effectively in such a system. It's a reflection of the New Left ideology of decentralized decision-making too. Yet it's also a sign of weakness, of the difficulties of fighting for basic change in the heart of the strongest world force for the status quo. There is no national liberation front in the USA because challenging for national power is unthinkable at this point. Guerilla skirmishes with Chicago police hardly mark the beginning of revolutionary war.

The student movement here is coming to reflect these US patterns. With the death of CUS, no real national communication exists; there is Toronto Research Project, similar to REP in Michigan. In the CPUO discipline crisis, Ontario radicals met then decided no co-ordination was possible and each campus group had to "do its own thing". We seem to be getting a branch plant radicalism, reflecting our branch plant economy where too many US subsidiaries operate inefficiently in a small market. At U of T alone we have the New Left Caucus, the Student-Worker Alliance of the Canadian Party of Labour, the Trotskyites, the Communists, left and right-wing Maoists and the inevitable anarchists. The effectiveness of all is limited.

FREE OURSELVES

The "US Extension" view of Canada is too simple. A rich colony is still a colony and the social realities we see around us would suggest that "rich" standard of living is not really very satisfactory in terms of the iniquities and misplaced priorities that result. Before these realities could basically be changed, however, one of the two things would have to happen. Either we would have to free ourselves from US control or the USA would have to radically change. While the first is difficult, it seems easy in relation to the second.

Besides, being rich and underdeveloped has its advantages. Unlike Russia or China, Canada could start from a high base and move quickly to a planned and equitable economy, without the regional and urban poverty of the present. Furthermore, we would have plenty of resources to aid other third world countries if we were to resolve to free ourselves then help them to likewise.

So the "colony" view of the Canadian condition still deserves consideration. CUS showed the difficulty of acting on this view — within a particularly difficult structure, a national union for all students. Yet CUS also showed a large potential base for its anti-imperialist policies last year; probably 30,000 or more students voted for them. The surprisingly large number of NDP delegates willing to support the anti-imperialist Watkins Manifesto at the Winnipeg Convention is another indication.

Clearly the simple reproduction of US radicalism here neglects important factors in the Canadian situation. We need a national movement which can build on the "anti-colonial" base CUS developed. It may be that the left-wing NDP group coalescing about the Watkins position will be the focus for such action. Or it may be that a new organization is required. The death of CUS may not after all, be that important if such a less structurally inhibited radical movement can continue the fight for an independent Canada that CUS began.

It will be created by Lejaren Hiller who, lost summer, created a five-hour happening with John Cage at the University of Illinois.

Avalanche will be one of six experimental works that will be performed that evening by the Creative Associates of Buffalo, a group of the world's foremost experimenters in the field of electronic music. SIGHT AND SOUND
 WINTER 1966/67 *
 FILM QUARTERLY
 august 1969 4s 6p

CINEMA CANADA

read any good films lately?

With a marked drop in the ages of serious film-goers has come a rise of interest in film magazines. Time was in Toronto when those who read Sight and Sound on the subway immediately betrayed themselves as producers at the CBC, or at least queer production assistants playing the role of producers. Now if you are seen reading Sight and Sound on the subway you run the risk of being mistaken not only for a queer but also for a student.

The following is an unabashedly personal evaluation, in no particular order, of some of the reading material on film usually available at either the U or T Bookroom or The Book Cellar on Yorkville Avenue.

TAKE ONE

Take One is published bi-monthly by Peter Lebensold (also publisher of The Five Cent Review) and Joe Medjuck. The magazine originates in Montreal and is the only comprehensive, non-specialized national publication on film in Canada. A pulp magazine with a homey 'ah shucks' appearance, Take One always communicates a good deal of information and usually much sane opinion, although at times it does tend to include the odd slightly pointless piece (ie. last month's interview with Frank Zappa). Unfortunately, a valuable guide to Canadian films in production that Take One initiated under the banner, "In the Works", has since been discontinued. Nevertheless, the magazine is still one of the most reliable sources of information on Canadian films (the recent issue contains a short review of David Cronenberg's much-discussed-seldom-viewed feature, Stereo). Unlike many of its counterparts, Take One manages to be knowledgeable without pretension. Among the best features of the magazine is its price — 25 cents.

CINEMA CANADA

Cinema Canada appears six times a year on alternate months and is published by the Canadian Society of Cinematographers. The magazine is primarily intended as a trade publication for Canadian film-makers but contains enough material on domestic production to satisfy a reasonably wide range of interests. Although staff writers like Gerald Pratley tend to approach films in a slightly dull functional manner and although the magazine might be a good deal more introspective, Cinema Canada partly fulfills the need for a more particularized survey of significant Canadian productions. The most valuable aspect of the magazine is that it provides a commentary on the current work of both English and French Canadian directors. Cinema Canada is the best way to follow the activity of film-makers like Jean-Pierre Lefebvre and Gilles Groulx with a distance. All this for a mere 50 cents.

FILM QUARTERLY

A more costly magazine ($1.00), Film Quarterly originates at the University of California at Berkeley and, reasonably enough, appears four times a year. Film Quarterly provides an extensive yet concise treatment of film in both contemporary and historical terms. Generally the viewpoint in feature articles is that of an over-view and although features are highly comprehensive and factual, the magazine is genuinely absorbing if you can penetrate the formidably uninspired layout and format. The Review section of Film Quarterly contains some of the most original commentary available on recent releases, despite the fact that staff reviewers frequently detach films from reality and view them simply as representing a quaint art form. The latest issue contains two noteworthy pieces — a study of the relation of soundtrack music to film and an extensive review of I am Curious (Yellow) and (Blue). A magazine for the film society goer.

FILMS IN REVIEW

Over-priced (90 cents) and unoriginal. Published by the National Board of Review of Motion Pictures in New York, Films in Review usually appears monthly and contains some of the most pointless examples of film criticism being written. If you admire a film, Films in Review will undoubtedly have something ignorant to say about it. Features and interviews are consistently superficial and boring. The magazine as a whole reads like something written by a nine-year old in conjunction with a thesaurus. The October edition devotes six pages to a list of useless, unreadable amendments and corrections to a recently published dictionary of American movies. Consistent only in the extent of its low quality.

FILMS AND FILMING

A British magazine published monthly and one of the most attractive looking magazines on film available. Films and Filming devotes about a third of the magazine to stills from upcoming releases and divides the remainder of its space between features, reviews and a guide to international productions currently under way. A very balanced magazine covering a wide range of subjects (the August issue included an analysis of 'Underground USA' and the exploitation market), Films and Filming usually strikes the middle note between Films in Review and Sight and Sound. Writers and reviewers assume very little foreknowledge about features due for release which makes the magazine especially useful for conveying information (and criticism) on the recent work of international film-makers. The Life magazine of film publications.

SIGHT AND SOUND

The definitive word. Published quarterly by the British Film Institute and edited by Penelope Huston, Sight and Sound is the Delphic Oracle for film-makers, distributors and audiences in general. The longest running film magazine, Sight and Sound is a slick, expensive ($1.00) publication containing consistently high quality commentaries on films and directors of the past and the present (although at times it tends to be slightly self-indulgent and stuffy). The tone of the majority of the writing is highly literate and features and reviews generally treat films as part of a continuing chain of cine-history, often fielding analogies from deep in the outfield of past releases. Sight and Sound is conventional in its attitude and perhaps devotes too much of its format to commenting on established film heroes while glossing over new movements. Yet, Sight and Sound has spawned a lot of brilliant commentary on film and is still probably the best film publication around. Read exclusively by CBC producers and queer production assistants.

FILM

The Centennial Film Board is (was) a production unit established on campus two years ago under the guiding light of Carlo Buchman and Mary Omatsu. Last fall the CFB sponsored a film contest — the winner of which would receive a grant of $400 to produce a short based on a submitted script. Joe Medjuck is currently in production using the CFB grant to complete a film with the working-title, Walls.

As for Eldon Garnet's film, scheduled for completion this fall and financed with $1200 from the CFB, information is scarce.

To make this short story even longer, the Centennial Film Board has been allocated $900 for the current year and is presumably to operate under the auspices of the Cultural Affairs Commissioner on SAC. As of now, no one has assumed leadership of the CFB whose $900 budget is due for review by the SAC Budget Committee in mid-November. There is a definite possibility that the Centennial Film Board will disappear unless someone assumes responsibility before that date.

The potential on this campus for film production is enormous. The CFB could become one of the most active producers of independent shorts in Canada if only it possessed a determined executive. That $900 budget still awaits.

The Film Committee of Hart House is sponsoring a National Student Film Festival in November. The festival is divided into four categories — Documentary, Dramatic, Experimental and Animation with first prizes of $75 being awarded to the best film in each category. Deadline for entries is November 1 with an open screening of all award-winning subjects to be held on Friday 14th November. For further information write to: Coordinator, National Student Film Festival, Hart House.

REVIEW staffers and all others (including people) who want to determine, or at least comment upon, the nature of our ongoing ontological experiment: take note. You are COMPELLED to attend a meeting TODAY at 2 p.m. in the Review office. New writers — please show up. After the meeting, the body of the late Rod Mickleburgh will be served, suitably cooked and garnished.

ART

Often an example of artistic mononucleosis, Hart House Art Gallery this week presents a stimulating show.

Robin Collyer's sculptures, with their vitality and sureness, are among the best things to be seen in Toronto. Particularly interesting is an untitled floor piece of thin steel rods and a rectangle of translucent plastic which weaves under the rods, establishing itself as a shadow on the work that is in fact in it.

Shirley Wiitasalo (now ~~Robin Collyer's~~) does some canvases whose quality matches the sculpture of her husband. Extremely lyrical things, the paintings treat the picture surfaces in a very sculptural way.

Among the remaining three artists exhibited here, Roger Piotrow is the only one who doesn't look like the reproductions one sees in history books on modern art. What makes his work interesting is the surface he paints on — daeron. Looking like skin over the frame, this gives the surface a very sensuous appearance totally at odds with everything

BOOKS

Two Canadian student magazines arrived in the office this week. One is Campus (Canada's Magazine for Graduating Students). The other is Le Quartier Latin, put out independently by students at L'Universite de Montreal.

Campus Magazine has always been a burn, a magazine that most intelligent Canadian university journalists refuse to write for, a liberal cop-rag that appeals to the success-oriented type. This month, however, is the final straw. The entire issue is devoted to two things: Sking and Marketing Careers (Bilingualism Doubles ins man's chances, It Takes People To Market Computers, AT 26 He's Within Reach of the Top). If you want to reach the top fast this magazine is a must. Otherwise the magazine is pure unadulterated shit.

Le Quartier Latin! c'est la révé d'un éditeur. Le copy et la montage sont tout les deux excellents. Das Weltanshauung sieht ganz radikal und wichtig aus. MUSIC

The big pop musical event of the weekend is LED ZEPPELIN'S two appearances at the O'Keefe Centre on Sunday (shows at 5:00 and 8:30). The Zeppelin's second album, which has been available for some days as an import and will soon be released here, has some great blues-based rock on it, and if the group can reproduce the sounds in O'Keefe, it ought to be a good show. Tickets at Sam's and Le Chateau.

We should have had a review of BIG MAMA THORNTON at the Colonial, but we ran out of space before it got written. Big Mama is an over-powering and beautiful singer and performer, and she shouldn't be missed in spite of an inferior backup band. She can carry the show. Tonight and tomorrow are the only chances left to hear her. Luther Johnson, who has been playing with Muddy Waters, shares the sets.

JOHN LEE HOOKER opens at the Colonial Monday.

THE UPSETTERS are at Soul City (167 Church St.) tonight, tomorrow and Sunday. JOHNNY TAYLOR, of "Who's Making Love" fame, joins the group on Sunday.

LUKE GIBSON, formerly part of the Kensington Market and now going it on his own, is at the Riverboat through Sunday. KEITH MCKIE opens on Tuesday.

FREE EVENTS

There are several things of interest. On Sunday mezzo-soprano SONIA ROHOZYNSKI sings at the Art Gallery of Ontario at 3:00. The U of T CHOIR is singing at Scarborough College at 3:45, and, still on Sunday, the ORFORD STRING QUARTET will play at the Edward Johnson building at 8:30. Finally, next Thursday at 2:00 there will be a lecture demonstration on Ta-Ku Chinese drum singing, also in the Johnson building.

If you feel you'd like to say something in print about these or any other sort of music to be heard in Toronto, The Review is still interested in finding music writers. Call Peter Hatch, 921-2434.

THEATRE

Happy Halloween. Tonight's scheduled student preview of Mourning Becomes Electra in Hart House is cancelled due to illness and will be seen Thursday, November 20th at 5:30. The Production is directed by Leon Major and stars Kate Reid and is Eugene O'Neill's version of the curse on the house of Atreus with Kate Reid as the civil war Clytemnestra. Monday evening at the usual 8:30 is Slawomir Mrozek's Tango, which had its student preview this past week. The two plays will alternate through 22 November, with Mourning on weekends and Tango on weekdays.

Drama Centre opens Next Time I'll Sing to You, by James Saunders, at 8:30 on Monday evening. Admission is free, and the show is only playing through Saturday 6 November.

On Tuesday and Wednesday at 1:00, Poorhouse Theatre Company ("a media co-operative") will present a play, Two Soldiers, by Carlos Jose Reyes, and a reading of South American poetry by Enrique Buenaventura. Latin American addicts can find the Poorhouse people in Vic's Old Gym, behind the Colonnade.

Thursday evening Theatre Mickities opens their production The Tempest at 8:30 in the St. Mike's Student Centre. Admission $1.50, and it is running through Sunday.

Also opening Thursday is an original musical, directed and authored by Jim Betts, entitled The Ten of Us. Curtain at 8:00 in the New Vic Theatre of Vic's New Academic Building. Admission 50¢. Plays through Saturday.

And opening off campus Academy of Theatre Arts opens Monsieur Lambertier, a contemporary French play, on 6 November at 23 Grenville Street.

Also, Rochdale's Theatre Passe Muraille will be performing Memories for My Brother, written and Directed by John Palmer, at 8:30 on 4-16 November (Mondays dark) at 11 Trinity Square. Admission $2 for students.

25,000 students against bilingualism bill

MONTREAL (CUP) — Chanting and singing, 25,000 demonstrators — mostly high school and post-secondary students — marched through the streets of Montreal Wednesday night in a massive and self-disciplined protest against the Provincial Government's Bill 63.

The demonstration was the largest yet against the Union Nationale Government's bilingualism legislation, now in its second reading in the Quebec National Assembly — but it will probably be completely dwarfed today when an anticipated 500,000 demonstrators march on the Assembly buildings in Quebec City.

Universities, high schools and post-secondary Colleges D'enseignement Generales et Professionnels across Quebec emptied Wednesday, as student opposition to Bill 63 continued to grow into a major factor in the plans of the Front Du Quebec Francais, the broad-front organisation which is uniting right-, left- and centre-wings of Quebec political life against the bill.

Outside of Montreal, student walkouts are bringing the French-language education system to a virtual standstill.

And in Montreal itself, students were joined by teachers, trade unionists, housewives — the entire spectrum of working French society — as they marched through the downtown streets to City Hall in a protest against Mayor Jean Drapeau's support of Bill 63.

Observers termed the parade the greatest-ever demonstration of French-speaking solidarity, as the demonstrators hummed and sang their way good-naturedly through the streets.

Both the Union Nationale and the Liberal Party issued statements before the march Wednesday, attacking French teachers for "encouraging" students to take part in opposition to the bilingualism legislation.

Both Premier Bertrand and Liberal Party Leader Jean Lesage said teachers were organizing sit-ins across the province, culminating in today's march.

"I hope," said Lesage, "that those who are responsible for our youth — whether they be parents or those to whom parents delegate part of their authority — will realize the immense blunder they are making in the way they prepare tomorrow's citizens."

"The future of French Canada is really in danger if mob rule becomes part of a child's upbringing."

So far, the Union Nationale Government appears determined to continue pushing Bill 63 through the National Assembly.

The bill gives parents the choice between English and French as languages of instruction for their children in Quebec schools, while declaring that French is the "priority language" in the province.

Opponents to the bill say its passage will legitimize the eventual destruction of the French language and culture in Quebec, as increased immigration dilutes the French-speaking majority in the province.

The New Left Caucus, Women's Liberation Movement, and the Young Socialists will hold a rally at 1 p.m. today in the free-speech area of Sidney Smith to talk about Quebec independence.

The groups are calling for a demonstration tonight against the federal government.

The demonstration, a follow-up to Monday's protest against the Globe and Mail, will leave Nathan Philips Square 7 p.m. tonight and proceed to government offices on Adelaide Street.

The left will organize a further protest for November 7 — a support demonstration in sympathy with the anti-repression demonstrations that will take place on the same day.

For (Winged Griffin 2) 2, PHE BO.

Eng 11 (Plaxton- "Plaxton Fantastic Lover", Jefferson Airplane, "Surrealistic Pillow"; Martin) tied Dents (Moebus, Ross), 2-2.

Dev House got goals from Munro and Devonshire Howse — three from each — to down SMC, 6-5. Bulger had 2 and Travers 3 for the losers.

Vic (Hart, James, Hiseler 2, Cousin Clem, Ryan 4 — no relation to Ryan Ginger — Somerville) 11, Erin (Pelech 2, Krill 4, Cheravaty), 7.

RUGGER

Eng scothed Law, 20-0. Kocur (2), Tibbo (8), Seppala (3); Quebec politics is confused by the Seppalatistes, Newland (6) got the points.

Scar 16, Vic 0.

SOCCER

SGS (Sahara desert Grapefruit Suppliers, who are being exploited by American Imperialist terribles; see forthcoming Varsity story. Boycott Sahara Desert grapefruit!) got goals from Sodek (2) and Hughes (2) and beat Sr. Eng., 4-0.

Meanwhile, SGS B blanked Meds B on goals by Marafioti — a member of the Marafia, dreaded Sicilian underworld syndicate. SGS, of course, stands for "Sicilians Get Sucked", the Marafia catchword; Hercules, and Frotz (It's Hallowe'en, and the frotz is on the pumpkin)

Emm (Anderson 2, Haupe, Joblin — "a little job" — OED; cf. "here's the job for the man, and here's the mannikin for the joblin." — Dumont) 5, Wyc 0.

The Hummel Sponge had the at trick as PHE beat Vic (Campbell), 3-1.

And speaking of hats, Astaphan, a Russian variety of same, scored twice and Skelton once. Context: Dents' 3-1 win over Knox (Glen).

Scar (Galati 4, Moore, Henry, Taylor, Rajtek, Bubrin) 9, For 0.

... But they didn't want to nominate anyone

By ALF CHAITON

Alf Chaiton is a Varsity staff writer and acting president of the Political Economy Course Union. The following is a first-hand account of a meeting with Dean Foulds last Friday.

Associate Dean W. F. Foulds spent Friday afternoon frantically trying to get student members for a Faculty Council meeting today.

This search resulted in one of the most bizarre events that I had ever been involved in.

On Wednesday afternoon Dean Foulds told me my department was "entitled" to send representatives to a meeting on Friday to elect some members to the Faculty Council. He gave me the total responsibility of choosing the "representatives".

"There just wasn't any time to do anything else," he explained, when I questioned just how constitutional such a move would be.

Without really understanding what was going on, I arrived at the meeting to find about six other "representatives" from other departments, as well as Dean Foulds.

After asking several pointed questions about the composition of the Council, we unanimously decided not to nominate anyone.

We felt the Dean's office was following a policy of "divide and conquer": we were segregated from the other three divisions, as well as from our own General section. We therefore decided to refuse to nominate anyone for our "division". We wanted representatives selected from the total student body, not fragmented as we were.

FOULDS UPSET

Foulds was visibly upset by our action. He refused to carry our decision to the Faculty Council, saying that if we wanted to make a statement we should write it down.

He then dismissed us.

We stayed to try to encourage the next group to follow our example. At first, Foulds tried not to recognize us, but we did present our views to the group.

Tom McLaughlin (III New) moved no one be nominated.

Foulds ignored the motion. Through the initiative of Peter Beyer (II New), we took a vote, and the motion passed 5-2.

Foulds ignored the vote. And he also ignored the result of the vote.

He called again for nominations. Mary O'Donohue (III SMC) volunteered (She had voted against the motion that no one be nominated.). There followed a vigorous debate about the irregularities involved.

During this debate, we several times asked Foulds for the names of those who had been elected from the other divisions.

He ignored us.

At 2 p.m., which he had said was our deadline, Foulds again asked for nominations. We argued we still needed a little more time to iron out our differences. And again we asked him for the results of the other elections.

He refused and walked out — without a nominee.

As Foulds left, Bernie Green (IV UC) pointed at him and said, "There's the 'responsiveness' of the Faculty Council to students."

The Faculty Council is made up of all those staff with at least a rank of associate professor (a total of about 1125) — and 16 students.

A meeting of the Faculty Council will be held today at 4:15 p.m. in the Senate chambers of Simcoe Hall. It is open to everyone.

This is the first-place winning float, Erindole's.

Québec Nationalists demonstrate against Bill 63

By ROBERT ISSENMAN and PETER STARR

QUÉBEC CITY (CUP) — Approximately 40,000 demonstrators, self-policed and peaceful, massed in front of the Québec National Assembly Buildings Friday at the culmination of four days of protest against the Provincial Government's Bill 63.

But their protest was overshadowed by violence which broke out after the demonstration dissolved, when a hard core of 4,000 militants charged police guarding the Assembly Buildings and rampaged through the provincial capital.

Provincial Premier Jean-Jacques Bertrand announced beforehand that the protest, like others during the past week, would not change the government's resolve to pass the bill, which gives Québec parents the choice between English and French as languages of instruction for their children, while declaring French to be a priority language in the province.

Hundreds of demonstrators were held overnight by the Québec Provincial Police after Friday's demonstration. Forty-eight persons faced magistrates Saturday on charges of disturbing the peace.

Hundreds of others were treated for injuries, mostly tear gas asphyxiation, though at least one youth was severely injured when thrown through a plateglass window by police.

REPORTER STRUCK

Canadian University Press reporter Peter Starr watched in the basement of the National Assembly as plainclothesmen kicked a prisoner down a flight of stairs. Starr was later struck with riot clubs as he tried to produce his press pass in another section of the city.

But the official protest was generally quiet and orderly: mainly due to student police who formed a barrier, arms linked, between the demonstrators and police surrounding the Assembly Building. Provincial police later discussed sending a letter of thanks from their association to the marchers.

Demonstrators, mostly students, have mobilized since last Tuesday in opposition to Bill 63, although their numbers fell far short of the half-million which optimistic organizers hoped would appear in Québec City.

MOOD CHANGE

Authorities ringed the Parliament Buildings with 400 riot police while approximately 300 plainclothesmen mingled with the demonstrators. A reserve force of 1,300 provincial police were held out of sight during the evening protest.

Relations between demonstrators and police remained friendly until 9 p.m. when the mood of the crowd began to change and the events of later in the evening were foreshadowed.

An unidentified demonstrator threw a Molotov cocktail into police ranks, and other protestors pushed a panel truck to within 15 feet of the student marshalls. It appeared militants would overcome the marshalls, who were frantically chanting "pas de violence."

Unilingualist leader Raymond Lemieux, one of the chief organizers of opposition to Bill 63, scrambled atop the truck and beseeched the demonstrators to keep back from the Assembly Buildings.

"You are not going to take the Parliament Buildings in an old jalopy," he shouted. "Those of you who want to start a civil war today come with a thousand rifles and carbines and 150 tanks. But not tonight."

Lemieux prevailed, and the panel truck retreated.

The march organizers declared the protest over at 11 p.m. and most of the demonstrators and student marshalls left in a cavalcade of 400 buses brought from Montréal. But the remainder of the demonstrators began throwing bot-ties and stones at the Assembly Buildings.

Police responded with a barrage of tear gas, and plainclothesmen in the crowd laid down a 200-yard smokescreen over the demonstrators.

Squads of police scrambled over barriers and cut through the demonstrators' lines, driving the crowd away from the Assembly Buildings.

Two groups compete in anti-RCMP protest

Potential RCMP recruits at the Placement Service today will be met by members of the ew Left Caucus

A S.U.C.-IN (Students Under Capitalism), organized by the NLC, will meet at noon in the Free Speech Area of Sid Smith and "slowly proceed" to the Placement Centre.

Announcing the S.U.C.-IN, NLC member Denis Cochrane said last night it would be a support demonstration for "peace and solidarity with the RCMP".

"We think they're groovy, a really nice bunch of fellows doing a fine job. No mother could want any more," said Cochrane.

The Committee to End the War in Vietnam also plans to march to the Placement Centre. This group will meet at Simcoe Hall at 12:30 p.m.

Joe Young, a member of the Young Socialists, said, "We will try to send a delegation into the building to speak to Dow and the RCMP to demand their removal from the campus."

Young added, "We don't want to hold a sit-in but I don't know what will happen when the delegation tries to talk to them."

The Young Socialists, said Young, don't intend to provoke an incident, but rather will use the demonstration as a "building action for the Nov. 15 Vietnam moratorium."

Young called the NLC's S.U.C.-IN a "pretty juvenile" means of protest.
