 Remember, DO NOT RESIST ARREST. This will only compound the charge. If your lawyer can establish that the policeman had no reasonable grounds to believe you committed an offense, it will be possible to challenge him with false arrest.

Platonic platitudes of old

Fragments of a long-lost dialogue of Plato were discovered yesterday by John Johnson in the attic of classics professor J. M. Rist, one-time chairman of the Association of teaching staff, all-time opponent of parity, and present member of the 15 Disgruntled Faculty, a group trying to put students in their place.
 Called The Ironocles, it deals with an alleged student movement at Plato's Academy in the Athens of fourth century B.C.
 The students, scholars have inferred from the manuscript were demanding an equal voice in the government of their school. The Ironocles were intended as a part of an actual debate. In the interests of scholarship The Varsity reprints part of this work:
 Soc: The University is a community of scholars engaged in original and useful research and teaching, is it not?
 Dem: That is so.

Soc: Then it follows from this that those to whom the greater interest is allowed partake more greatly than those to whom the lesser interest is allowed Dem: You could say that.
 Soc: And those that partake more greatly will therefore participate in inverse proportion to their number. Just as...
 Dem: Okay, okay.
 Soc: The professors whose virtue it is to teach his class is like the philosopher king who rules the Ideal State. So thus JUSTICE demands that those most fit to rule should do so and further than the ruled are not to interfere with their government.
 Dem: And therefore that students who do not understand the art of education are not to be preferred over the professors who possess knowledge.
 Soc: You're catching on. Since the talented amateur is a menace to the art of any craft, so too, students should not teach nor should they rule.

You have the power

On November 24 and 25, 5,912 students in the faculty of arts and science turned out to vote cast ballots in a referendum. The turnout represented almost 50 per cent of 12,300 students in arts and science.

These were the results.

This commission to have equal staff student membership and to report by March 1, 1971."

U of Victoria students fight faculty firings

CUP (VICTORIA) — Student opposition to hiring, firing and tenure policies at the University of Victoria is fast approaching crisis proportions.

A short-notice general meeting last Tuesday attracted 700 of U of Vic's 5,000 students. They unanimously passed motions demanding the immediate reappointment, promotion or granting of tenure to 12 U Vic profs. The motions are to be forwarded to the Board of Governors.

The dispute arose last month when nine professors were denied tenure, promotion, or re-appointment after receiving the support of their departments.

In one case, that of chemistry prof Tika Jain, students feel the denial of tenure resulted from clashes within the department.

In the past two years, the chemistry department has had three heads and two acting heads. Students believe that the turmoil has resulted in hard feelings among the faculty and that Jain's denial of tenure has been one of the results.

In the other cases, students will press for the re-appointment of Robert Sward and Derk Wynand. Both were denied re-appointment by the English department.

Both men are considered poets of high calibre in the creative writing division, but they will be given the axe due to conflicts with the department head. Student President Bob Mac Dougall says enrolment in creative writing courses has doubled and is expected to continue rising. Mac Dougall feels that the department can hardly afford to cut down on good staff.

Under the terms of the present tenure, adopted by the faculty association in 1968, a person may remain at the rank of lecturer for a period of four years, after which he or she must be considered for promotion to the rank of senior lecturer or assistant professor. If at that time promotion is not granted, a one-year terminal contract is offered.

Partridge has re-defined the terms of appointment to senior lecturer status without consulting the faculty association and has since had the terms approved by the Board of Governors.

Under the new terms, a senior lecturer will teach a 15-hour course load instead of the previous nine-hour load, and waives the right to sabbatical leave.

When the faculty association refused to accept the new terms, Partridge decided not to appoint faculty to senior lectureships until the "dispute" was settled.

"There is no dispute as far as the faculty association is concerned," said association President Donald Harvey.

Harvey said the executive has been mandated to state a position by Jan. 31 for consideration by the members.

The students council at the campus, which called Tuesday's general meeting, introduced three motions, all of which received unanimous support. The motions were:

- Immediate re-appointment, promotion or granting of tenure to the nine profs who previously had departmental support;
- Immediate re-appointment of Sward and Wynand on the basis of their teaching ability and the quality of their creative writing;
- Granting of tenure for Jain on the basis of his teaching ability.

UWO profs reject reps

CUP (LONDON) — The faculty association of the University of Western Ontario is holding firm to its power position within the university "community."

The association voted three to one against student representation on committees dealing with the hiring and promotion of faculty. (These committees also have some say in the firing of faculty.)

The faculty voted 329 to 129 against a student voice on department hiring committees and 359 to 165 against participation on those bodies determining promotion.

The conditions of appointment of faculty has been an issue at UWO since October when the board passed a resolution leaving students with representation on senate teacher evaluation committees, but no voice on the selection committees.

Faculty association chairman John Humphreys, a business professor said students now have "a fair indication of how faculty feels about student representation on the committees."

"The faculty is currently not convinced of the merits of student representation."

The results, released this week, were compiled by a mailed questionnaire. About 500 of 900 faculty responded.

Firing goes to arbitration

By MARCIA SINGER
Unable to reach a settlement, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, representing fired library worker, Patricia Garcia, and the University of Toronto will begin arbitration procedures.
The union and the university met Wednesday to reach an agreement over the firing of Garcia for alleged insubordination. Both sides presented their cases. No settlement was reached.
To reach a legal settlement, the union and the university are going into arbitration. This means that both sides will present their arguments in a hearing to a three-man arbitration board. Whatever decision this board reaches will be legally binding. This board consists of one representative from CUPE, one from the university, and another selected by both CUPE and the university. No date has yet been set for the hearing.

"We feel we have a pretty good chance of winning it," claimed Frank Kitchen, of CUPE, referring to the future hearing.
Chief librarian K. H. Blackburn refused to comment in light of the coming hearing.

Report calls for cutbacks in engineering programs

LONDON (CUP) — A report setting definite enrolments and standards for engineering education in Ontario was presented Friday to the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario (CPUO).

At a meeting at the University of Western Ontario in London, Philip A. Lapp, Director of the committee which formulated the report, said he expected most of the recommendations to be accepted.

These include the demand that existing engineering programs at Laurentian University be terminated, and no freshmen admitted for 1971-72. Laurentian has only four faculty members for their engineering school and not enough space for expansion, Lapp said. He considered Queen's and the University of Toronto better equipped to churn out the metallurgical engineers required in the Sudbury area.

The report sets ceilings on enrolment at all levels for the other Ontario universities continuing in engineering education. U of T should be limited to 600 freshmen a year with no more than 480 graduate students by 1971. Queen's should be restricted to 400 freshmen a year until 1975, then 500 in years after 1980.

Waterloo should level off at 650 freshmen and 385 grads.

Other universities should have smaller enrolments, the report said.

It also gives some direction to the nature of engineering education. UWO should be assigned the role of environmental engineering and no further students should be admitted to the existing doctoral program, Lapp said.

No new engineering school should be established before 1980 to allow the directions given the present universities time to develop into a unified system.

The report must still be approved by the Committee on University Affairs.

Strike hopes for U of T's support

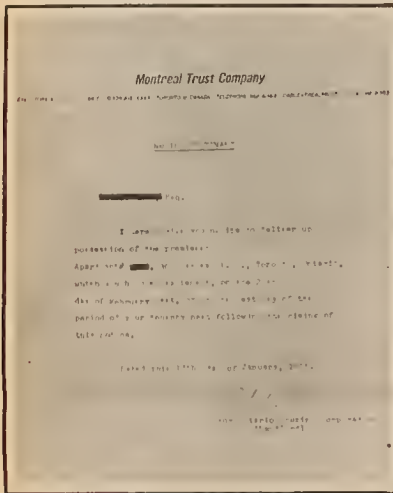

The administration is expected to deliver its much sought-after statement on the Charles St. Residence Rent Strike on Wednesday, January 13 at 1:00 p.m.

Striking tenants are hoping that the university administration will use its power and prestige to support them in efforts to bring U of T's graduate residences into line with other such projects in the province.

The Tenants' Association has expressed its desire to have mass student support at the rally in front of Simcoe Hall. Representatives from the association will be on campus Monday and Tuesday, distributing leaflets in an effort to have a large turnout on Wednesday.

"The campus campaign has a two-fold purpose," explained Fern King, a prospective evictee. "First we hope that a large turnout will convince the administration that the 700 tenants represent the principle that university housing should be accessible to both rich and poor.

"Secondly, students will not stand by idly as 130 families are put out on the street by the Ontario Housing Corporation."

Striking tenants got eviction notes like this.

McMaster at Hart House Wednesday Varsity hoopsters soundly trounced 92-50

By PETER WHITE

NOTES FROM THE BASKETBALL FRINGE: Saturday night the essence of absurdity was distilled by the sad display of Toronto's Varsity Basketball Blues.

BLUES WILL send home no postcards from Waterloo this year bearing messages like 'having fun, wish you could have been here.' In fact, Blues only solace from this their worst defeat in recent times was the absence of their harshest critics and fans. What kind of disaster warrants such blues: 92-50 disasters! Yes, read it and bleep. Waterloo 92, Toronto 42 points less. Guess that's pretty spaced out!

Blues looking out of place and out of shape beside their timeless opponents edged from expressions of determination in the first few minutes to the indolent stares of remorse and utter hopelessness which result when one fixes upon the idea of nullity and equates it with himself

BY THE END of this game, even coach John McManus, usually of the hot but not necessarily bothered variety, could do little but passively close his eyes to a personal judgment being enacted, in dream-like logic, on the court.

Toronto on this night proved to be simply an embarrassment; in all departments they were outclassed

On the court they appeared disorganized and undisciplined. To ask whether their good guards, Ron Voake and Garth Evans could have stabilized their demise is rhetorical.

In this one Blues ineptness was as sure and ordered as geometric progression for miles. Different variables may have altered the proportions of the series but surely this Toronto defeat was a tautology

Blues will have to swallow (or regurgitate) the odious stuffs of Saturday night quickly. Wednesday they face McMaster and on Saturday their old nemesis Guelph, a team similar in style to Waterloo. Both games will be played in Hart House. Something is going to happen but don't expect much

The Waterloo laughter will be re-broadcast at 2:00 p.m. Saturday on Channel 11. ha, ha, ha!

McMaster wins by a single point Swim girls come a close second in tri-meet

Even without the services of three of their top swimmers, the Varsity Women's Swim Team was barely edged by McMaster (127-126) for first place in a tri-meet at Queen's on Saturday.

The host Gael girls were a distant third with a 59 point total.

Varsity's Liz Daniel emerged as the outstanding swimmer of the meet, placing first in the 100 free, 100 individual medley and the 50 fly, then anchoring the winning 200 free relay team.

Backstroke specialist Randy Croome was a double winner, taking both the 150 and 100 back events. Janice Hines was second in the 200 free.

In the diving, Leslie O'Brien was peerless on both the one and three meter boards.

Short Dips: Francis Flint, Merrily Stratton and Joan Dolson were the missing stars this weekend. The girls travel to Waterloo Friday for their next pool action.

Defeat Guelph 5-3 but . . .

The real test awaits Blues later this week

By LYNDON LITTLE

Although the local hockey heroes delighted a packed crowd at Varsity Arena Friday evening with a 5-3 victory over the Guelph Gryphons, the real test of their recent regeneration will come this Friday when Blues are due to travel to Waterloo.

Before they meet the Warriors, however, Blues must first entertain the pesky McMaster Marlins here Wednesday night. But there is little doubt that thoughts right now center on that vital clash with those perennial pretenders to Varsity's OQAA hockey supremacy.

big improvement

"That was about a 100 per cent better," said a more relaxed coach Tom Watt after the Guelph match. "We made three glaring mistakes in our own end which resulted in the Guelph goals; but on the whole, I thought we were much improved."

"Whether we really are or not," he added, "we should find out this week."

The victory, Blues seventh in eight league starts, gives them a four point bulge on Waterloo; but in the all-important loss column, they're all even.

Unlike several previous Guelph Varsity encounters, this one was in doubt until captain John Wright fired home his second goal of the final period at 19:18.

Bill Buha, Nick Holmes and Scott Seagrist scored the other Varsity goals.

Jim Mitchell, Pete Turner and Tom Schoon connected for the stubborn and tough-checking Gryphons.

It was only the second game for Blues' newly concocted forward line combinations which were shuffled radically after that uninspiring performance against the Windsor Lanears. The new groups have produced 14 goals in the two games.

The most effective line Friday night was the Wright — Gord Davies — Seagrist troika. Davies, who spent the first half of the season with Brian St. John and Terry Peterman, picked up three assists.

"John (Wright) is beginning to realize that if he gives the puck to his wingers he just might get it back again," kidded Davies after the game.

jarringly effective

Also very effective in their own bone-jarring manner, was Blues' new shock trio of Nick Holmes flanked by Danny McCann and Kaz Lystonek. Holmes and McCann, especially, dealt out some of the most crushing checks seen at Varsity this season.

Prettiest goal of the night was Buha's first period marker — his third in last two games and eleventh of the year — which equalized an early Guelph score.

St. John led Buha a perfect pass just as the speedy winger neared center ice and a great burst of speed carried him by the defence for a clear-cut breakaway.

Blues' defence, which has yielded 15 goals in the last three games, had its shaky moments but was playing under some stiff handicaps. Regular rearguard Bill L'Heureux missed the game and Terry Parsons played under extreme duress with a heavy bout of the flu.

Blue Notes: Each team was fingered by referee Zip Thompson for six minors. Two of the Guelph penalties went to their goaltender, Kenny Lockett who was outstanding in the nets. Linesman Fred Haughten finished the game despite picking up painful shin bruises on two separate occasions. . . . Gryphon coach Denny Mooney feels the semester system in practice at Guelph is a hinderance to his team. "We have guys graduating at Christmas and leaving the team then we've got some new players to fit in," he explained. He also figures Blues-Waterloo will be a toss-up.

The Varsity — Don Andrews

WHY CAN'T YOU BEHAVE! Linesman Fred Haughten delivers a lecture in hockey etiquette to Blues' winger Terry Peterman after a skirmish in the second period of last Friday's game with Guelph.

The Varsity — Mike Krugel

JUST BAT IT IN! Blues' captain John Wright appears all set guide the puck into the Guelph net with his free hand. There was no goal, however, as the Gryphon netminder Ken Lockett reached the puck first.

ever, as the Gryphon netminder Ken Lockett reached the puck first.

Swim Blues beat Western

With Alex Fedko and Mike Guinness leading the way, Varsity's defending national championship swim team drubbed the Western Swim Mustangs 75-38 Saturday afternoon in a dual meet held in the Benson Building.

The convincing victory, helped erase the memory of last week's meet at McMaster which, despite an impressive point total, was described by coach Robin Campbell as "a bit of a disaster".

"Considering the guys were obviously tired I thought the results and the times were encouraging," commented Campbell.

Pedko flashes

Fedko, who is in his first year with the team after transferring from Simon Fraser U in BC, established a first for Canadian college swimming according to his coach when he broke the 50-second barrier for the 100 yard free in dual meet competition.

Guinness, who was a member of Canada's World Student Games Team which competed in Turin last fall, was also a double winner, taking both the 200 and 500 ft eestyle races.

Ken Fowler of Western, last year's CIAU 200 breaststroke champion, finished first in that event and in also the 1000 free.

Other event winners were: Jim Shaw (Varsity) 200 fly, Ross Farquhar (Varsity) 200 backstroke and Jim Adams (Varsity) 50 free.

In addition, Blues were victorious in both relay events while Western, as expected, dominated both the one-meter and three meter diving. Doug Darling was the three-meter winner.

Darling, who is considered the best diver in Mustang history, was second at the CIAU's on the one-meter board.

Adams time for the 50 free (:22.3) and Fedko's 100 I.M. time (2:06.7) were also mentioned by Campbell as very outstanding performances.

False Starts: Blues have two more dual meets before they travel to Ann Arbor a week this Friday to battle the University of Michigan, US college swim power. They're at Guelph Wednesday and then host Waterloo Saturday. . . . Fedko's efforts Saturday earned him "player of the meet" honors.

STRIKE VOTE: noon at Sid Smith

Varsity editor David Frank last night disclaimed any complicity in the controversial Action Plan printed in Monday's Varsity. The Plan, which detailed what to do in the event of police attack was subject of much wail and woe on the part of senior administrators. It was officially disclaimed in the Faculty Council

Students screwed; building occupied

By MARIS PAVELSON

A student sit-in and "Parity Festival" began at Sidney Smith Hall last night after a plenary meeting of the Arts and Science Faculty Council smashed the principle of parity.

The Council voted 285-192 in favour of a motion that "the proposed committee to study restructuring of the Council be abandoned." In effect, this puts the last legal nail into the coffin of a committee which would have consisted of five students and five faculty members plus the dean of the Faculty.

After the vote was announced, student representative Norman Rogers told a cheering audience, "We no longer recognize the legitimacy of this body."

All 44 student representatives on the Council immediately resigned and walked out.

"We are withdrawing, not for a day, not for a year, but until we get a parity committee," Rogers declared.

The motion which passed yesterday was introduced and seconded by Profs. W. H. Nelson and J. R. Rist, respectively.

In his defence of the motion, Nelson stated that he was actually a liberal and just seemed reactionary because the really conservative faculty are silent. "We're left of centre in this faculty," he said.

Ripples of laughter flowed through the hall as various signs such as "Take a student to luncheon", "F! Y!", "hire Marx", and "Higher Marks" sprang up.

Nelson had advice for all sections of the university. He told the administration that it is its "primary duty to operate the university on behalf of its permanent members."

He advised the students "not to attempt to translate these very complex matters (of parity) into political ideology."

"This isn't Cuba," he said.

Nelson said that if the Faculty of Arts and Science is to have an educational and academic purpose, it must be dominated by teaching members. Parity would be justified only if there were no distinction between scholarship and politics, he stated.

Brian Morgan, speaking against the motion, later countered this argument. "In dealing with academic issues, we are intrinsically bound to social and political issues."

Nelson told his "conservative colleagues" to listen to students and to take a more "humane" attitude toward them.

Ending his speech with a Churchillian flourish, Nelson defiantly stated, "We will fight this battle this winter, next winter and every winter until hell freezes over."

J. M. Rist urged the faculty to "end all this nonsense about parity once and for all" and went on to praise the Council for its patience

A faceless student. Faculty vote makes him voiceless too.

Support wanted for strike

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

Two hundred and fifty students declared war on the faculty of Arts and Science last night. At a meeting at Sidney Smith last night, they passed the following proposals and requested support for:

- a strike of all arts and science students and that this strike be voted at a mass rally to take place at 12 noon today in Sidney Smith Hall free speech area, unless the Dean of the Faculty or the president of the university, by the time of that rally, agrees to our basic demand that parity between faculty and students be implemented at all levels of decisionmaking in the faculty;

- that the education festival started last night in Sidney Smith continue and efforts will be made today to mobilize students in all classes, colleges and residences, in support of our basic demand.

- that this body elect a 5-member committee responsible to this general body to formulate the demands of the strike in detail and to contact and negotiate with sympathetic members of the faculty.

Amid shouts of student strike and occupation of Simcoe Hall, it was decided by the 200 left at Convocation Hall that any action to be taken should be centred at the very heart of the Arts and Science faculty — Sidney Smith. Most of all, everyone wanted it to be festive — a festival against oppression, someone said

And everyone moved to Sid Smith

"This is going to be our home for a while"

Bring down the chairs from the lounges, the rugs from the entrance way. And someone collected money and delegated people to go out and buy food.

It was almost taken for granted by many that we were here to stay — at least for a while.

By seven o'clock the crowd thinned out a little as people went home to collect a sleeping bag, food and whatever else they might need to spend the night in the sterile brick atmosphere of Sid Smith foyer.

By 8 p.m., the tables that are usually covered with every kind of literature on regular days looked more like a buffet dinner: bread, milk, peanut butter, fruitcake left over from Christmas, dried fruit, Dad's cookies and baskets of apples and carrots.

The room filled with music on a sound system that, I had heard, was "borrowed" from Vic.

And the poor extension students, coming for their night classes and just gazing at the gathering in utter amazement.

Meanwhile the Graduates Students' Union, during its regular council meeting passed a motion condemning "the action of the Faculty of Arts and Science in establishing a non-parity committee and unequivocally supporting the University may kill Food Sci

By MARCIA SINGER

Without consulting either its teaching staff or students, U of T is recommending the phasing out over a three year period of the Faculty of Food Sciences.

Dr. John Hamilton, vice-president, health sciences, introduced this proposal to the executive committee of the Senate this week.

Hamilton announced his unexpected proposal to the faculty council of Food Sciences last Thursday.

"We were just formally told about it today," commented Irene Sakata, student society president, yesterday night.

A statement sent to The Varsity from the Department of Information indicated that Hamilton considered a brief from the senior committee of the Food Sciences' faculty council which consisted of suggestions from academic staff, alumni, and representatives of the undergraduate and graduate body."

The faculty have been given ten days to present a brief to the Senate indicating the value and future direction of the faculty. Many faculty and students feel that ten days is much too short notice. According to fourth year student Maureen Conway some students have suggested asking U of T president Claude Bissell for a presidential advisory committee to research the proposal thoroughly.

Insufficient demand, high cost per student, and the availability of similar courses elsewhere in the province were the three points that Hamilton stresses to support his proposal.

There are only 93 students in the faculty this year. While the average student-teacher ratio in the university is 10 or 11 to 1, the ratio for Food Sciences is 5 to 1.

Existing laboratories may have to be renovated in order to keep pace with rising standards. More courses may also have to be introduced to meet new College of Education requirements for admission to studies leading to a Type "A" certificate.

The renovation of facilities need not be necessary. We can use neighbouring institutions for research such as hospitals, suggested Krontl.

The Food Science student society will meet Thursday at 4:30 to discuss what action they will take in light of this recent development.

Police arrest campus caterer

By TOM WALKOM and DAVE VID

Metro police are cracking down on curbside vending services around campus.

One operator, Pat Brooks, operating for Lawrence Caterers who serve students in the Faculty of Pharmacy, was arrested at 12:30 Monday for obstructing police after receiving three parking tickets that day.

Under city by-laws, a caterer is only allowed to remain in one spot for 10 minutes at a time.

Monday, however the campaign against the trucks gained intensity.

Brooks was ticketed at 7:30 in the morning for illegal parking outside the Pharmacy faculty. Half an hour later, the same policeman charged her with parking illegally on private university property, claiming he had received a complaint about the truck from the faculty office over his car radio.

At 12:15, as Brooks was operating from the corner of Russell and St. George, the same policeman summoned her for standing in one spot over the ten-minute limit. She was told to move along.

When Brooks returned for one sale, the constable drove up, arrested her and took her to Station 52 on College St.

At the station, Brooks was fingerprinted, charged with obstructing police, and told that she was being made an example of to scare other drivers.

Metro police last night said that Brooks was cautioned at 12:04 p.m. Monday that she was selling from a catering truck contrary to city by-laws and later arrested and charged with obstructing police."

"It's hard to deal with these kind of people," the policeman said, "when they're parked across the road from somebody and taking business away from them."

"We don't look for these kinds of charges," he continued, "but if we get a complaint — the law's there and we have to enforce it."

Brooks' arrest came only three days after 210 pharmacy students, or about half the faculty, signed a petition requesting that caterers be permitted to service the area free from interference.

The Pharmaceutical building itself has no cafeteria, and with labs ending late and classes beginning early, most students have only 15 minutes to half an hour for lunch.

with the student activists. "Their willingness to let students take part in the decision-making process of this faculty has been abused from beginning to end," he said.

Rist warned the faculty that if it accepted the proposed parity study committee, there would be no end to student demands. If students had parity with faculty on a 25%-25% basis this year, they would want 30% next year and 35% the year after that, Rist maintained.

Brian Morgan and Peter Hall, two of the organizers of the November referendum spoke against the motion. Morgan said that Rist viewed students as "voices with no power." He further stated that that kind of attitude "denies that students have a competence to make decisions while it says that students have competence to express opinions."

Morgan went on to debunk the idea of students as a unified sector within the university community as the "myth of monolithic unity." He stated that students are as divided on most matters (except for parity) as the faculty.

Hall said that it was extremely important that a parity committee to make recommendations for restructuring of the Council exist. "Compromise must be made between equals."

"The question at hand is whether we're going to discuss it equally or with us (the students) in the galleries and the faculty on the floor," said Hall.

The answer came soon enough. The galleries gasped, almost in disbelief, as a seemingly solid mass of faculty members stood up to vote against a parity committee. The motion passed.

Jumping to the mike, SAC officer Bob James advised the students to make sure that the Faculty Council finds it impossible to work without students if it does not wish to work with them. He urged them to "stay until the faculty leave or even longer."

Chairman Jack Sword quickly adjourned the meeting, and as students flocked to the floor to make plans, faculty members scurried out of the hall.

A second item dealing with first-year examinations in the Faculty had been scheduled on the agenda. Under the circumstances, Sword considered it expedient to dispense with the matter for the present.

The meeting had begun with the sounds of a drum and tambourine, but the noise level rose with emotions as the meeting progressed. It finally culminated in wild cheering as the disappointed and angry Faculty Council student reps stomped out of Convocation Hall.

meaningful participation of students in the decision-making processes at University of Toronto.

The Scarborough College Student Society disapproved of any "student strike or any sit-in or violent action", although it supported parity in principle. It requested that students take another approach.

It was almost 9 p.m., the time scheduled for the students to concretize the demands and actions of the sit-in. Close to 250 students gathered in Sid Smith.

St. Michael's College Council gives its support to the sit-in and donates $50 to the food money fund; Erindale donates $50.

Now down to business. What is to be done? SAC president Rod Hurd recommended "rocking the boat" of the university. If the Arts and Science Faculty won't give parity, the president and the Senate can force them to. Hurd pointed out.

"We want to build to some sort of student boycott of classes" to apply pressure on the president, Hurd suggested.

But the president had dodged that one before by saying that the departments have relative autonomy, one SAC member pointed out.

Plan scared Sword

An apprehensive Provost Jack Sword pointed to a copy of Monday's Varsity on his desk and asked the six students before him what it all meant.

Sword who chaired yesterday's meeting of the Faculty Council of Arts and Science was fearful that people would take seriously the action plans printed in Monday's Varsity which called for students to block all exits if the Nelson-Rist anti-parity position carried the day.

Members of the Referendum Action Committee were asked to explain the Varsity centrepiece at a meeting in Sword's office yesterday morning.

"The idea was to increase student attendance as much as possible," SAC President Rod Hurd explained. "Students wish to allow the debate to continue but what happens after the debate depends on the vote."

"It would be in the students' interest not to intimidate the faculty," Hall said.

"Well I am satisfied that certainly no one in this room is taking the Varsity article seriously," Sword said. "But it certainly is open to interpretation as intimidation, that as soon as the vote is taken there would be some kind of action."

Back to square one (apprenticeship)...

It's been three or four years now since students started to ask for their fair share in how the University of Toronto is run.

It's been a year and a half since the Commission on University Government set forth the principle that students and faculty, as equal partners in the multi-faceted learning process that goes on here, require equal status in making decisions that affect their work.

The arguments were stated by CUG and have been repeated many times.

In November, students in arts and science expressed their opinion in a surprisingly enthusiastic vote — a turnout of almost half the students voted 88.5 per cent in favour of parity.

Now, the only real attempt ever made since the CUG Report, to turn the ideal of parity into a reality, has been quashed.

Students have been told that they may consult, advise, exhort, supplicate — and even vote (if there aren't too many of them) — but that they may not be full partners in the business of studying the world around us.

Under the terms of the referendum, the student members of the faculty council have been forced to withdraw, until the council agrees to allow a parity committee to discuss the restructuring of the council.

This means that as of yesterday arts and science students have absolutely no say in the fundamental issues affecting their education.

The faculty council can end courses, change students' marks, withhold standing from students, decide to put more emphasis on lectures, decide to have exams in all courses — and even to suspend students.

It can go ahead and do this as it has always done in the Good Old Days, when there were no students involved and everything was very hush-hush and secret.

A strike vote will be taken at a mass meeting set for noon today in the Sidney Smith Free Speech Area. A number of students will have been waiting there all night to talk about why this kind of vote must be taken.

The vote must be taken because a certain number of faculty — 285 to be precise — have decided to ignore the existence of students.

These faculty members, led by W. H. Nelson and J. M. Rist, have committed the very crime which they say they loathe most. By trying to turn the validity of the faculty's undoubted academic superiority over students into a legalistic question of how much power they require, they have polarized the issue into a political spectrum that threatens to include only two categories — students and faculty.

They have turned the university into that dreaded monster — a "political" institution.

We are all, students and faculty both, here as students who want to study the world around us.

Some of us want to use our analysis as a tool for changing what we can perceive as grave social problems. Others of us are interested only in the fascination of intellectual exercise. And others still, care only about the kind of living we can earn either inside the university or, with a degree, outside of it.

But for all of us the tool of our collective trade is disension, study, reason and analysis.

To their credit, 192 faculty members stood up to be counted as being willing to welcome students as partners in the pursuit of knowledge.

Those faculty who opposed Rist and Nelson evidently have enough confidence in their own academic competence that they will be able to exert all the influence they require inside our community.

These faculty members understand that the only real future for the university lies in co-operation between students and their academic superiors. They understand that students, while not "permanent" in their identity, represent the vital input into the university from society at large, an input that reflects what the real needs and frustrations of people outside the university are.

The student presence in the university is, in a sense, a trusteeship — a guarantee to the people of Ontario who support this institution through their tax dollars — which will ensure that the university meet its social responsibilities.

Faculty members such as J. M. Rist — the man who yesterday at the council meeting said he just plain wanted to "end all this nonsense about parity" and never talk about it again, — well, perhaps there is no place for such faculty members in an academic community.

Perhaps, if they truly believe in the master and apprentice theory of education, and do not feel secure when students co-operate on an equal basis with faculty, perhaps then they should all leave the university and set up their own trade schools and research institutions.

We hope that universities will be able to play an important part in bringing about basic social changes in Canada. One way is by expressing in our work, a commitment to the interests of the Canadian people. The other, is by becoming adventurous and creative in the structures we use to govern ourselves.

In this perspective, the "hard-line" faculty are playing a dangerous game. Student spokesman Brian Morgan put it very aptly when he told the council that they might as well put chimpanzees onto their new commission — they are far tamer and less trouble.

It what the faculty want is tameness and no trouble, then the future of the university is indeed a very bleak one.

Today, when the strike vote is taken, and in the days that follow, students will refuse to be chimpanzeed into submission.

They will no longer be put off with promissory notes. The student voice was heard in the referendum and it looks like students will have to back that opinion up with more than ballots.

Business as usual simply cannot continue when that means going back to the days when masters were masters and students mere apprentices.

To do that would be to succumb to the unreasoning paranoia of some faculty and to destroy the possibility of a co-operative and creative learning process at this university.

Rent fight goes today to Simcoe

A mass meeting will assemble in front of Simcoe Hall today at 1 p.m. to hear U of T's official response to the eviction of striking tenants from the Charles St. married students' residences.

Speakers at the meeting will include Mel Watkins, NDP leader, Mike Carson, leading spokesman of Ontario Housing Tenants Association, and Fern King, a prospective evictee.

The administration will make a statement on tenant control, eviction tactics, and the extent of the University's commitment to the strikers at the Married Students Residences. Initially Simcoe Hall was extremely reluctant but finally assured strikers that Executive assistant Wim Kent or Vice-President Don Forster would speak to the gathering.

A striker bulletin reads: "It has been eminently clear to all of us since we first walked into the University Housing Service to be okay'd as tenants, that the university is very much involved in these married student residences.

"However, since we first contacted the administration to support us in our bid for reasonable rents and control over our environment, the University has claimed that they are not involved in these buildings."

Sexual Politics is a farrago of blunders, distortions, vulgarities and nonsense: Howe

Sexual Politics, by Kate Millett. Doubleday, $9.50.

Reviewed By CLIF BENNETT

The prime difficulty in reviewing this as one book lies in the fact that it is two books. The first two-thirds of it, with the exception of Chapter One, stands — with more or less equilibrium — as a re-evaluation of changes in relationship between the sexes during the past century and a half. The last third, with Chapter One, which seems to have been added as part of an effort to paste together the literary and historical aspects, is a criticism of Lawrence, Miller, Mailer and Genet.

Genet comes out on top; the reversal of position may provide social interactionists with empirical data on the influence on one's self-image of the audience view of author prestige and economic affluence.

For this reason, Irving Howe's objection that Miss Millett promises undelivered connections between the literary and historical is — to coin a phrase — irrelevant. The work gives every evidence of having been hustled into print by author and publisher to meet a possibly ephemeral demand. Scholarship isn't: a rousing polemic it is.

As a polemic, the book apparently irritated at least one reviewer to the point where he placed pen in hand and steel-mesh codpiece where it would do the most good. Irving Howe's recent attack in Harper's denounces Miss Millett as an ideologue, highbrow popular-izer, polemicist, old-fashioned bourgeois feminist, leftist snob, fanatical, intellectually feckless and morally shameful, squalid, notably vulgar, simplistic, heavy-handed and tendentious, a little girl who knows nothing about life. Her writing is utterly circular, reckless, a crude simplification and a piece of historical reductionism. It exhibits middle-class parochialism, profound distortion of values, an imperious condescension, sexual monism, methodological sloppiness, ideological assaults and manipulations, arrogant ultimatism, nightmarishly utopian fantasies, comic ignorance, rashness, lack of intellectual sophistication. Howe concludes the work is, in short, a "farrago of blunders, distortions, vulgarities, and plain nonsense" which amounts to "intellectual goulash."

For this work of little merit, the editors of Harper's put nearly thirty columns at the disposal of Professor Howe. It would be instructive to check if their review of Toynbee ran any longer.

Certainly the language of polemic is irritating; it is meant to be. The language of Miss Millett falls gently on the ears of no man.

But the language of an aroused Eldridge Cleaver similarly falls gently on the ears of no white. Shall we argue, as Professor Howe appears to do, that although women have "had it hard," they have not had it hard as women? And of the black, does history justify us in claiming that while he, too, had it hard, he must not assume this happened to him because he was black?

Miss Millett sees sexual relationships in terms of power-centred strategies designed to maintain a system, similar to state control systems. She also argues a mutual-support structure uniting the patriarchal family to patriarchal government. Stalin's Russia and the Third Reich are equally damned for their reactionary fiats against the sexual revolution. Here, logic seems to point in the direction of Bakunin and Kropotkin, although Miss Millett is not yet up to making the connection openly.

In the generalized rejection of male-dominated political structures, which Miss Millett shares with much of the radical feminist movement, there is potential strength, present weakness, and some irony. The weakness inheres in our shortage of tested alternatives, although sections of radical feminism are experimenting with cell structures, small group dynamics, and "consciousness raising." Irony is sharply present in current splits within the Canadian "sisterhood" — along political lines developed by male-dominated organizations.

There is irony in Miss Millett's own methodology, and it would strengthen her position if she could accept the steady, objectifying, and distancing virtue of the ironic view. She castigates Ruskin for depending largely on poetry and literature rather than history, in developing his essay on ideal woman.

Yet Miss Millett turns aside constantly into literary byways for her own material, at one point voyaging for several pages through Tennyson's The Princess, something that is virtually unread outside English Lit. She sees Freud on "the other side of the fence," yet uses essentially Freudian concepts in her own analysis of literature and authors. It is also remarkable that so much time is given to demolishing the theory of penis envy instead of presenting the fairly strong case for the opposing positive view-point advanced by Bettelheim in Symbolic Wounds.

Unfortunately, the publisher has been of no particular help. The volume is riddled with typographical errors: "masculature" instead of "musculature," two misspelled German words in consecutive footnotes on p. 162, and at least one prize-winning blunder on p. 210: "A male can only pair with an awe-inspiring and therefore dominant male."

Needham charts Chinese science, says it was more advanced than that of West until Renaissance

THE GRAND TITRATION: SCIENCE AND SOCIETY IN EAST AND WEST

by Joseph Needham

Reviewed By TED WHITTAKER

This over-priced collection of eight overlapping essays, lectures and broadcasts, handsomely accompanied by fifty-four photos, drawings, graphs, maps, provides an excellent introduction to the indispensable work of Professor Needham, the eminent British sinologist, whose seven-volume Science and Civilization in China is a major monument of historical scholarship.

Needham is concerned here to show that up to the time of Galileo, Chinese technology was generally in advance of Europe's and, as is beginning to be well-known only now, that China exported westward such inventions/discoveries as the magnetic compass, gunpowder, and printing, to mention only the three which Francis Bacon trumpeted about and which likely he did not know the origin of. Here are a few more we got from them, in mere ignorance: mechanical clockwork, iron-casting, stirrups and efficient horse-harness, segmental-arch bridges, the stern-post rudder.

Needham's claim is that Chinese, thoroughly stabilized (by European standards) for over 2000 years mostly by the Confucian scholar-bureaucrats, absorbed these inventions and discoveries without cataclysm, whereas their appearance in Europe coincided with great changes in that society. The wheelbarrow appeared in Europe about the time of the great cathedrals, for example, though its appearance in China presumably at the beginning of the Christian era only made work a little easier, didn't accompany any great technological leap and did not seem even to have put great numbers of laborers out of work.

Seeking to explain the differences between Europe and China which could account for the rise of modern science only in the west, Needham discusses thoroughly the creative tension between Taoism and Confucianism. He proposes a political interpretation of the Tao Te Ching, claiming the Taoists continually proposed against the mandarin's consolidation of power, a return to the unspoiled Way, the classless, tribal, and communistic society which, he says, likely did function before feudal lords battered it apart between the fifth and third centuries B.C.

Chinese philosophy has always been profoundly humanitarian and, according to Needham, much tosh has been preached about Oriental despotism which, whatever the justice of that term, never existed on the backs of slaves, as Western tyrants did, in theory and in practice. The order dear to Confucians had room in China for the overthrow of tyrants, which occurred. That order was civilian, too, and the ethos of state service has always been strong enough to prevent the rise of the mystique of wealth which has plagued the West, especially since the Renaissance. Witness the teat which Ezra Pound has sucked for sixty years — imperial China, a society in which scholars were more powerful than merchants, where their wisdom often was heeded and venerated!

A central philosophical difference between China and the West lay in their differing concepts of Nature. That truism is clarified fully by Needham in a long paper, "Human Law and the Laws of Nature". His thesis is, in part, that we have, in the West, an idea of respectable and lengthy pedigree (forbearing any discussion of its obvious consequences) which says the physical universe operates by discoverable laws, whether these laws are considered to be given by a Divine (and rational) Lawmaker or not.

In China, however, the Confucian sages were concerned with political affairs. The Taoists, though keenly interested in Nature, deeply distrusted logic and reason and favoured, to oppose them, intuition and spontaneity. They founded alchemy and had no lasting belief in a personal super-human lawgiver.

"The harmonious co-operation of all beings arose, not from the orders of a superior authority external to themselves, but from the fact that they were all parts of a pattern, and what they obeyed were the internal dictates of their own natures." "With their appreciation of relativism and the subtlety and immensity of the universe, they were groping after an Einsteinian world-picture without having laid the foundations for a Newtonian one. By that path science could not develop."

(Two authors on the history of the idea of the Laws of Nature should be read in conjunction with Needham — Ernest Zilsel, in the Philosophical Review, 51, 1942, and Francis Oakley, in Church History, vol. 30, No. 4, 1961.)

A note by Kenneth Rexroth, on Needham's style: "Too often works of scholarship in fields as remote as this are technically inaccessible to the common reader. Needham's book is not. Although the high scholarship, not just in Sinology, but in dozens of related fields, is patent, it is never oppressive, but explains itself as it goes along. Furthermore, Needham writes English prose, not the professional thieves' cant of the typical academic 'paper'."

I guess Needham would not be too disliked by the present regime in China; he says of his sociological approach to Chinese science and technology, "such a point of view may or may not be a Marxist one — for me it is based on personal experience of life and study." And it enables him to make some startling and, at times, humorous observations — that the traditional Taoist disdain for position and wealth may well be seen to be vindicated today in the official and unofficial distrust in revolutionary China, of capitalism, and etiolated intellectualism, and that country's strident pronouncement of the virtues of manual labour. "Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose."

Williams' rears salutes centé

By LORNE STEPHENS

For some reason 1970 was an unusually popular year for artists celebrating anniversaries. The complete works of Beethoven, books about Leacock, and revivals of Coward popped up almost every other day.

One very important gentleman, however, was neglected: Charles Dickens died 100 years ago. But last Wednesday, in the Eaton Auditorium, this discourtesy was rectified, as Emlyn Williams performed superbly as the Great Novelist Himself in dramatic reading from various stories and scenes.

Dickens was by far the most successful writer of his day (people would crowd the docks in New York and yell to the captain of the ship bringing the latest installment of his novels for information about the story.) In 1853 he began regular tours doing dramatic readings from his works. It was a new idea in its day and became immensely successful.

Reading of Charles Dickens Anniversary of author's death

In 1951 Emlyn Williams first performed as Dickens reading. And now, for the Centenary, he has prepared new items and is touring the world, fortunately choosing Toronto as one of his stops.

The stage is center lighted, a spot focused on a specially-designed podium, with a raised rest for the left arm and a ledge for the water glass; it is an exact replica of the one Dickens used. William enters, head erect, in a gleaming white shirt front, black suit, and a red carnation in his buttonhole. He removes his white gloves bit by bit, examines each of the several volumes piled on the podium, and begins.

It is a true performance. For Williams submerges himself in Dickens (just as he did in the same auditorium two years ago as Dylan Thomas), and Dickens begins the narratives.

The selections chosen are, for the most part, from the lesser-read works, such as Dombey and Son, The Commercial Traveller, and Little Dorrit.

The entire evening is orchestrated, so that the audience laughs, cries, is horrified, laughs, and sits spellbound. And the choice can only be faulted in one or two spots, for the Signalman was second rate and the finale ludicrous. But Mr. Chops, Paul (from Dombey and Son), and Moving in Society were outstanding.

And even the lesser material was acceptable, simply because of Williams' performance. Every Dickensian characteristic came to life: every pause, unique to Dickens, upon which the narrative or humour or personality trait plunges to its essence with a twist, was perfectly timed.

Very few gestures were used; Williams' voice alone as an instrument, conveyed the life of the prose, especially as in the battleground landscape from The Battle of Life. Problems presented by the horrible acoustics forced Williams to adapt his delivery several times, and usually successfully. But this was but a small blight on an evening of excellent theatre.

Here's why we desperately need a student film centre on campus

By DAVID PEEBLES

There have been, more or less, three film groups at U of T. First, David Secter's production of Winter Kept Us Warm, but that was pretty well a private project. A few years later there was the free U. of T. course on filmmaking; it collapsed in a year. Then S.A.C. created the Centennial Film Board; according to the minutes of the SAC meetings and the two letters which are the only records of the CFB I could find in the SAC Office, the Board spent about $3500 on making a film last year. We can find neither the film nor the people who made it. (If anyone from CFB reads this article, please call me at 362-0571.)

This fall we formed the University of Toronto Film Board (UTFB), and received encouragement and assistance from the staff at Media Resources Unit (of the Instructional Media Centre) for which we're grateful. Last spring the IMC was optimistic about scrapping a used Bolex camera on the campus for student use, but now that their equipment survey has been completed, our chances of getting that camera don't seem very good.

Our SAC grant will cover making a 16mm film OR buying a camera ourselves but not both. We could rent cameras and editing equipment, but that will mean that next fall, when we, or any other student groups try to make films, they will face the same problems that we have been fighting all year.

Our open seminars on the techniques of film-making have collapsed — you can't teach film if there's nothing to make film with. Our production is at a standstill: we have two films started in super 8; in 16mm we have nothing but 200 ft. of test footage shot with a borrowed camera. Without seminars, without concrete projects underway we can't hold the eighty or ninety students who have indicated their interest in making a film or at least learning about it. All our meetings are advertised in the Here and Now, newcomers are always welcome, but, at the core, there are only about ten of us left.

Many of these students have used Arriflexes, Nagras, Bolexes, Eclairs, Movielas; they know the emulsions, the negative processing, sync-sound A-B roll editing. We have the writers too. In the past few months I've seen at least half a dozen scripts that I wouldn't hesitate to commit to production at once.

But they aren't being produced. We have the crews, the scripts, the casts, even the time and some money. We don't have the cameras.

Why is it so hard to keep a film body alive? It is at first surprising that there should be virtually no student film making at Canada's largest university. One would think that it would be relatively easy to find the people and materials necessary to put a film together.

Unfortunately just the opposite is true. Communications inside a monster the size of U of T are difficult at best, college faculty and departmental divisions make it hard for film-makers to get together. It is also hard to get administrative support, since the bureaucracy is big enough that there is always some other department with whom the responsibility should lie. To some extent SAC feels that film should be taught by the university and that the administration should support it, while the university considers film an extra-curricular activity which should be supported by SAC.

What we desperately need is a student film centre — a place with the vital cameras and editing equipment which can serve as meeting-room, editing room, and camera storage. Such a centre, properly equipped, will immediately draw together film-makers from all across campus, and give them a common meeting ground and centre of operations.

This centre is not just a pipe-dream of a long-frustrated filmmaker. Major proposals for the adoption of the film board will go before the Hart House Board of Stewards tomorrow. There is some hope that the space for the film centre can be found in Hart House, which, as the cultural centre of the campus, is the ideal location. In the next few weeks we will be presenting SAC and the administration with proposals for the purchase of the equipment necessary. It is expensive but, only the initial cost is prohibitive. It is within reach.

The film centre will have practical uses as well. It can film commercials for SAC, Pollution Probe and other campus organizations. It can shoot film for orientation. It can record and interpret the University to the community at large. It could, perhaps, even pay its own way in a few years.

We should not forget, however, that film is art. The most important films we can make, I believe are the films we create for their own sake, films we put together because there is something we all wanted to say, or because it will make you happy or sad, or just because it was something beautiful and we wanted to share it.

Whir of Gold builds on past for modern tale

Whir of Gold, by Sinclair Ross (McClelland and Stewart, $6.95)

Reviewed by STEPHEN CHESLEY

For the generation of Canadian writers weaned in the Thirties, personal failure is permanent backgrounds for the ideas of literature. Transplanted to another city or country, the slum decay or prairie dust affects all of the senses. Sinclair Ross's new novel, Whir of Gold, builds on the past in an intricate fashion, in order to present a moral tale of today.

Ross was born and raised on a Saskatchewan farm and his prose style reflect the stark human life of the prairie. Certainly his literary output does so: he has published only two novels. As For Me And My House, a tension-filled story of an artist-preacher's and his wife's attempt to escape the hypocrisy of the false-fronted prairie Main Streets, and over a decade later The Well, an unsuccessful attempt to combine moral philosophy and the maturing of youth with melodrama. In between came The Lamp at Noon, a collection of stories, and no more books.

But his first novel is rightly considered a masterpiece, so the publication of A Whir of Gold was eagerly awaited.

The setting is Montreal, the small, cockroach-infested rooming houses, cheap restaurants and bars, and human beings relying only on hope, for all that is visible and real is failure.

Sonny McAlpine, twenty-four, has lost hope. He has come East to achieve success as a clarinet player. He has only two dollars, does chores for his rent, and cannot find a job. In the Slough of Despond, Sonny has only his pride, and feels he is a derelict and failure.

But one whir of gold arrives, thirtyish Madelaine, named after the saint, blond hair smiling endlessly with dreams, cruising from man to man, enjoying the present while knowing it will be lost and never losing hope.

She offers Sonny love, care, and impetus. But Charlie, living next door, offers quick cash from a petty robbery, which Sonny accepts because his pride will be soothed (no longer will Mad support him) and he will be able to make a fresh start. Sonny chooses Charlie's route, ending in a bungled robbery, and finally, inevitably but not because of his crime, losing Mad.

However, Sonny learns, and from soying at first "You've got to take your own measure, come to terms with what you are. It's easy to want, to dream; the pinch is adjusting to what you have a right to . . . the ghost of a might-have-been goes with you all the way", he is able to build on this statement, and include dreams and success with realistic self-evaluation.

He redeems his pawned clarinet, but now his visions of applause are tinged with bitterness and guilt. When he was young he had trapped and accidentally killed a flicker that seemed like a whir of gold, he kills his relationship with Mad in the same way, but grows from these events.

Ross uses symbolism to reinforce his ideas constantly, and usually very effectively. During the robbery Sonny is wounded, the bullet ruins the new shoes he has just purchased. Told in the first person by Sonny, the imagery rises from the prairie, and is of horses, physical exertion, crop yields, and weather.

The prose style is spare and vivid, and very seldom does its richness seem unsuited to Sonny's character.

Only in the characters does Ross succeed to a lesser extent. Sonny and Charlie are well drawn, but Mad at times becomes so repetitious that one wonders if she is capable of saying anything besides "You'll be all right, Sonny". A fuller, more believable character is necessary, because it is obvious not only that her role is crucial to Ross's ideas, but also so that we can accept her as the powerful influence on Sonny that she is.

But the very intricacy and subtlety of the many levels of Whir of Gold redeem whatever faults the novel has.

Best chamber music this year

Rampal's flute inspires orchestra

Of the post-Christmas glut of symphonic and chamber music around Toronto, several events were especially interesting, and worth recording.

French flautist Jean-Pierre Rampal, featured soloist with the Hamilton Philharmonic last Sunday (Jan. 17) is in a class by himself. He performed flute concertos by Jacques Ibert and Mozart. If the cello is closest to human voice, the flute surely must be closest to human thought. The unfashionable musicality of the man was especially apparent in the slow movement of the Mozart. One would suddenly find a breath of melody in the ear without perceiving how it got there, from the outside or the inside. His playing created absolute, immediate beauty that for all time justified music as an expressive medium.

Rampal's inspiration also took hold of the orchestra as they finished the evening with Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2. It was lush, expansive and shimmering Ravel, the best performance by the HPO this season. The opening work, "Three Atmospheres" commissioned from Canadian composer Norman Symonds, was the evenings only neutral spot. Symonds, using tools better wielded elsewhere, said things of little import, better stated elsewhere. He created a piece of confection for the mass market. Nothing special. A shame, since the Hamilton Orchestra last Sunday was an able and inspired vehicle for much greater things.

Probably the strangest work in recent memory was "Quartet for the End of Time", by the contemporary French composer-mystic OLIVIER MESSIAEN. It was featured in the excellent Faculty of Music Scholarship Fund Series last week. The piece is in eight movements, scored for piano, violin, cello and clarinet. Messiaen's fundamental problem was the evocation of timelessness through the ephemeral and temporal medium of music. A painting lives for a thousand years, a poem for some hundreds. A note of music lives and dies in a second. In his score, the composer dispenses with bar lines so the music must pulsate and throb according to its own inherent rhythmicity alone.

Messiaen at times writes extremely slow music, as others attack us with a unison line of jagged fortissimo cross-rhythms. In these ways he seeks to break out of our conventional time-structure concept. To suggest eternity, Messiaen employs a haunting supernatural solo clarinet voice which is awesome in the way it outlines the timeless silence around it. This most dramatic depiction of the eternal abyss evokes rather than illustrates, and is truly overpowering.

The performance was yet another instance of the high standards of excellence maintained by the Scholarship Fund Series. It is perhaps the best chamber music series in Toronto this year, and very poorly attended. This is unfortunate; the performers most featured in the series, members of the resident Orford String Quartet, are some of Canada's best chamber musicians, and perhaps not long for this city.

Tickets are available before each concert at the box office for a paltry $1.25 (student rate). So if you want to hear good music, you can afford it.

The next concert, Jan. 31 (Sunday) will feature the Orford players in quartets by Beethoven, Brahms and Papineau-Couture.

Canvas-bruising on Saturday

Once again, exhibition boxing will form one of the main features of Athletic Night at Hart House this Saturday.

Thirty-six rounds of boxing (12 bouts) are expected starting at 8:00 p.m.

These exhibition bouts will be used as the basis of the selection of the 10-man team that will represent Varsity in the dual meet at RMC next Saturday.

Those expected to see action are returning team members John Byrnes (St. Mikes), Bob Maton (St. Mikes), and the Glenn brothers, Des and Pat, from Vic. Also on the card are novices Ron McNeil (PHE), Michael Minshall (Trinity), and George Peroff (Scarborough College).

Langlois calls for English action

By DREW HUTCHESON

Speaking on campus Monday, sedition defenct Jacques Larue-Langlois asked that English Canadians, especially students join in the struggle to liberate Quebec by "demonstrating to the people the degree of alienation, the degree of colonization through imperialism that they have been submitted to. He spoke and answered questions at a meeting at Hart House sponsored by SAC and the Committee for Free Quebec.

Langlois asked that people interested join the Emergency Committee for the Defense of Political Rights in Quebec in the planning and execution of a giant protest to coincide with that for the Montreal Five on Jan. 31 in Montreal and Quebec City.

In answer to questions following the meeting he pointed out a few interesting facts concerning the prisoners in Quebec. He said that the Rose brothers are presently in provincial police cells with the lights on 24 hours a day without showers or fresh air, reading material or any other amenities, under the surveillance of Sgt. Lysa-check, "a known bastard".

However he said that the Montreal Five had a common room with typewriters, a TV set, and conditions that are "comfortable to a certain degree."

The women who were arrested under the War Measures Act had conditions, he said which are "even better."

University should avoid protest: English lord

By DOUG HAMILTON

The university should be a bastion of the intellectual where scholars can survive amid a "rarified atmosphere of abstraction," said a Provost of the University of London Monday.

Lord Noel Annan was speaking at Scarborough College the night before Arts and Science students dissatisfied with the traditional image of the university, occupied Sidney Smith Hall.

The university, said Lord Annan, has two other basic functions. It is a "transmitter of high culture," and must "make men and women civilized." Furthermore, a university must "select and certificate" students for their "own purposes."

Lord Annan stated that the university should provide students with a medium "to disturb their fellow men." However, he warned that "protest can enslave the mind" just as effectively as the ideology of "the establishment."

He was alarmed that some students attend university "because it is fun" and because it is a simple way of escaping the rigours of working for a living.

The audience responded enthusiastically when Lord Annan terminated his speech, except for U of T President Claude Bissell who offered no applause.

Grant Cole: Blues lone consistent factor

By LYNDON LITTLE

Blues' most outstanding hockey player this year? That's easy, sophomore netminder Grant Cole.

While both the defensive and offensive platoons have had their ups and downs at various points in the season, there has been one consistent factor — sharp goaltending when Cole has been guarding the Varsity nets.

A second-year Arts student at Erindale, Cole has backstopped 13 of the 18 games Blues have played this season and carries a fancy 2.80 average for his efforts. That's especially good when you stop to consider that last year, Windsor's Don Brunner won the all-star spot with a 6.20 mark!

Cole's play has been so consistent that, invariably, Varsity sports dispatches finish with a terse note: once again, lanky Grant Cole was a standout in Blues' net.

A Calgary native, Cole moved to the Toronto area when he was 10 and started to play minor hockey. He spent five years in the Metro Junior B league, four with the St. Michaels Buzzers and one with Etobicoke.

Last year, his rookie season with Blues, Cole started by alternating with incumbent Adrian Watson. By the end of the regular season, however, he had assumed the No.-1 role. He hit his peak just in time for the OQAA finals and then went on to star in the national playdowns in Charlottetown where Blues blanked Alberta 6-0 and then defeated St. Mary's 3-2.

The Varsity — David Lloyd

Economical with his words, Cole feels that his goaltending style has changed somewhat since he started playing for Blues. "I guess I'm more of a standup goalie now than I was in junior B."

he observes. "As a rule, they shoot harder in college hockey so you can't commit yourself as soon.

"At one time I patterned my style after Glen Hall, but maybe I'm not as flexible anymore."

Cole's fine play hasn't escaped the attention of coach Tom Watt who offered this assessment:

"A lot has been said about this or that player on our team as being a good pro prospect. As far as I'm concerned, Grant deserves as much consideration as anyone.

"He's especially good at covering the play around the net and at setting up the puck for the defencemen and the forwards. His easy-going manner would be well suited for the pressures facing goalies in pro hockey."

Against McMaster tonight, Watt is planning to start the other half of Blues' fine goaltending duo, Tom Little, who owns a 6-0 shutout over the Marlins when the two teams met for the first time this season in Hamilton on December 11. Cole will likely get the nod Friday evening in Waterloo.

Notes: Only other lineup change for tonight's game will see defenceman Bill L'Heureux return to action... Center Brent Imalch is still nursing his tender groin and is religiously taking daily whirlpool treatments... Waterloo won a pair of exhibition games on the weekend in the capital city over U of Ottawa and Carleton... If everything goes as planned, there should be a limited number of tickets to Friday's game in Waterloo available today at the Hart House ticket office.

Bar does record business as curlers lose

Visiting rinks took home all the silverware from the Erindale College-University of Toronto Curling Club Bonsel held last Saturday at the Royal Canadian Curling Club.

First place was taken by the University of Western Ontario entry skipped by Dan Herder with wins over Toronto (Dave Patroch) 9-7, Toronto (Tom Takenaka) 10-6, and York (Rill Schultz) 11-8. Curling with Herder were Mike Pick, Mike Smith, and Paul Reekie.

Hugh McCarrel, skipping the University of Waterloo 'A' Team, ended in second place by beating the Toronto entries of George Carr 10-7 and Tom Takenaka 9-4. Other members of the McCarrel rink were Pete Hindle, John Pearson, and Brian Fisher.

York University finished third, on the strength of two wins over Laurentian, 10-4, and Waterloo (Mark Schacter), 6-3. Consolation prize for high one-game winner went to McMaster.

Toronto entries won five of their nine games, as George Carr downed Brock 8-5 and McMaster 8-5; Dave Patroch beat Brock 7-6 and Waterloo 'B' 10-4, and Tom Takenaka won over Queen's, 8-6. Curling with Carr were Craig Burch, Dave Richardson, and Jim Stewart; Patroch was supported by Leigh Follitt, Mark Burch, and Nico Meijer; Takenaka's rink included Walt Klein, John Dance, and Harv Pasternak.

HOG LINES: George Carr lost his second game largely because of a 7-end dropped on him by Hugh McCarrel. Carr made both his shots, but fine takeouts by McCarrel left Toronto down 9-3 after three ends... Barry Bartlett, Erindale College Athletic Director, presented the prizes after the closing banquet... Gary Thaler, U of T Curling Club President, served as Umpire for the spiel and entertained visiting curlers with his monologue on the 1892 Brier... Bob, the friendly Royals bartender, indicated that a new one-day record for draft beer sales was established.

Basketball Blues host two crucial games

By PETER WHITE

Varsity Blues face the first of three crucial contests when McMaster University basketball Marauders hit Hart House for tonight's rub-tickler.

If Blues, inadequate to this point, are to have a chance at all to make a season of it, then it must be made in Hart House which offers them a considerable home-court advantage. On Saturday, Guelph is here and a week later, the devastating Windsor Lancers. Without success in these games Blues season will have vanished — pool!

McMaster, last year's runners-up in the Canadian College Championships, come into Toronto without of victory in league play. They are led again by Paul Mazza, a strong guard, with a good shot and fine court sense.

Replacing John Diguano, ineligible half of last year's guard duo, is Joe Martino, another complete ballplayer from "old where's it at" (Brantford). At centre for the Marauders will be Walt Szpilewski, for three years a forward and now trying to replace the graduated Jim Noble.

This, then, is a must game for McMaster.

Blues expect the return of Ron Voake at guard. His appearance should free Larry Trafford from the severe defences which throt-ted his game in Waterloo this past Saturday. Garth Evans remains sidelined with a pulled hamstring. What kind of game will Blues produce in reaction to a 42 point annihilation? It's worth 50 cents to find out! Hart House, 8:15. Preliminary at 6:30.

Men and women fencers both triumph

Varsity fencers won the Carleton Invitational sabre and epee team events and finished a close second to RMC in foil last weekend.

Toronto's first visit to this competition exposed Varsity fencers to an unusual event, that of direct elimination and repechage. Two defeats and the team was out of competition.

The foil squad defeated Trent five bouts to one then lost to U of Ottawa, 2-5.

In the repechage, Blues beat Queens 5-3, McMaster 5-2, Ottawa 5-3, and Carleton 5-0 to meet RMC in the final. The fresh RMC team with only three previous matches to contend with, took Blues 5-1.

Dave Brown led the sabreurs to a convincing team victory over Ottawa, Queens and McMaster.

Paced by the peerless Helmut Microys, Varsity swept through the epee event.

Short Stabs: Varsity's women's fencing team also had a good weekend, successfully defending their Carleton Invitational title. Team members were: Lilit, Zekulin, Sharon Takasaki, Dorrit De-Demeter and Anne Gutierrez. The team, coached by Ken Wood, host their area sectional tourney this Saturday.

Swimmers to avenge loss

The Swim Blues will be out to avenge their only loss in OQAA dual meet competition as they travel to Guelph tonight for an exhibition tilt with the Gryphons.

Varsity coach Robin Campbell expects to use several rookies in Blues lineup, both to give some veterans a rest and to get a good look at the new swimmers under actual meet conditions.

Among the newcomers seeing action are Ian Dalrymple (free), Zui Eldar (fly), Russ Farquhar (back), Gordon Wong (free) and diver Alex Law.

Since Blues have so much talent and experience, they could conceivably sweep every event but the diving if Campbell chose to go with his best swimmers. However, he rarely employs the OQAA team in dual meets. "We could win by fifty or sixty points, but there's no fun or purpose in that."

In 1969, Campbell's humanitarian instincts got the better of him in the now infamous loss to Guelph. "I used too many rookies," he explains, "but it won't happen again."

Blues next home meet is Saturday night against Waterloo. Campbell indicates he will use all of the team's seven OQAA record holders to give Varsity swim fans an indication of just how good our national champions really are.

MEETING: 1 today at Sid Smith

AMOS/JOHNSON DIALOGUE

At a mass meeting at 1 p.m. today in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall, Arts and Science students will decide whether they want to begin their strike immediately, or delay until next week.

Last night the ad-hoc Strike Committee unanimously voted to ask today's mass meeting to start building a non-obstructive strike, to be ratified by a referendum Monday and Tuesday.

The strike, called to protest the Faculty Council's rejection of staff-student parity, would include a boycott of classes, educational picketing, and a continuation of the educational festival. A rock festival will begin in the foyer tonight and carry through the weekend.

Today's mass meeting will decide between the Strike Committee's latest proposal — to strike now — and its earlier suggestion to delay the strike until next Wednesday, after the referendum, but regardless of the outcome of today's vote, next week's strike ballot will be held as planned. If students go on strike this afternoon, it will read as follows:

"The Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science has vetoed the decision to set a restructuring committee with equal staff/student representation.

"To protest this veto and to support the demand for a parity council, a strike has begun which will be reassessed at a mass meeting on Wednesday, January 27 at 10 a.m.

"This strike includes a boycott of classes by students, voluntary cancellation of classes by faculty, non-violent demonstrations, and educational activities

"Do you support this strike?"

Strike vote set for 13,000 on Monday, Tuesday

By JUDI SMITH

Seven hundred people jammed into the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall Wednesday and voted almost unanimously to hold an Arts and Science student strike vote.

There will be a referendum on Monday, January 25, to find out how many of the 13,000 Faculty students support the idea of a strike. It was decided at the meeting that a strike should be of limited duration, with classes boycotted and the festival in Sidney Smith Hall continued.

Only two students spoke in opposition to strike action.

The sole member of faculty who spoke, Jim Prentice (Physics), reminded those present that 130 faculty had voted for parity at the Tuesday meeting. This demonstrated the split faculty opinion on parity, and Prentice urged that this dissent be continued.

"Don't allow the faculty to get together and become united in a stand . . . keep them divided!" he said, bringing out cheers and applause from the listeners.

The first motion to be passed condemned the Faculty Council for disregarding the majority opinion of the students in the Faculty as expressed in the November referendum. Included was a tribute to the members of the teaching staff who "upheld the principle of parity by rejecting the Nelson-Rist motion . . .

Following this motion, there was vigorous discussion of what course of action should be taken. A student pointed out that to implement the motion, "we must use tactics. There should be a motion to decide what these tactics will be." Cheers were the reaction to another comment . . . We can start controlling the courses we take and the professors who teach them."

Expressing the frustration of many who had put a great deal of time into the preliminary work for parity, GSI president Larry Hoffman told the audience: "I spent a year on the committee, we got CUG, and here we are today. We need something more than just another committee."

The motion prepared by the Festival Steering Committee read

"That mobilization for a strike of the students of the Faculty of Arts and Science begin immediately, and that this strike be ratified by ballot vote among all the students of the Faculty, beginning Monday, January 25, 1971

"This strike will protest the attempt of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science to repudiate parity as an operating principle in the decision-making process of the Faculty."

700 students jammed Sid Smith at noon hour Wednesday to vote a Monday strike referendum

Faculty petition supports parity

The student opposition to the Nelson-Rist anti-parity stand within the Faculty of Arts and Science is not without support from the teaching staff. A group of Arts and Science professors have launched a petition which reads:

"We, the undersigned faculty members deplore the decision of the Faculty Council against parity, and will support a boycott of classes should the student referendum succeed."

The petition may be signed at a table in the north-west corner of the Sidney Smith lobby. The table will be manned from ten a.m. to four p.m. today and from ten to two on Monday.

The main petition is for full-time members of the Arts and Science staff. A supportive petition of the same wording is available for teaching assistants and professors from other Faculties.

In addition, a meeting of faculty members has been called to discuss the present situation. They will discuss possible alternatives; places where students and faculty can work together, and possible support for student actions. The meeting is called for noon today in Room 1021 of Sidney Smith.

A faculty spokesman will report to students at the student rally scheduled for 1 p.m. in the Sidney Smith lobby.

Approximately 130 members of the teaching staff of the Faculty of Arts and Science voted against the Nelson-Rist motion at last Tuesday's meeting. Many others abstained in opposition to the motion

PAC meets on parity under strict guard

By PAUL CARSON

"Hello, I'm the Principal of University College," said Professor Archie Hallett, who is the Principal of University College.

"I'm sorry, sir, but your name's not on the list," replied the Campus Cop quietly but firmly. "You can't go in."

It was that kind of day for the emergency meeting of the Presidential Advisory Council, summoned Wednesday afternoon to discuss the parity crisis.

The locale was suddenly shifted from Simcoe Hall to the plush Dean's Conference Room in the new Medical Building. Fearing a possible student sit-in, the Campus Cops had sealed off an entire wing of the $38-million dollar building, and would admit only a person whose name was on a list hastily prepared by President Bissell's secretaries.

Engineering Dean James Ham, a PAC member, eventually arrived and vouched for Principal Hallett's authenticity. However, similar identity problems later befell university registrar Robin Ross who was also turned back by the eight-man police guard when he tried to enter the meeting area.

After a flurry of discussions, Ross did get in, but the hyper-active police security network kept out any student observers apart from one Radio Varsity reporter.

Moreover, the 11,000 arts students who chose not to battle the police barricade made the right decision; PAC, as it turned out, talked a lot but decided nothing.

The excessive and embarrassing police precautions came under fire several times during the PAC meeting.

"I think the Campus Cops have over-reacted," said graduate student member Jim St. John.

Board of Governors member Sidney Hermant called the police action "unsettling".

"The only similar treatment I can recall was when I visited defense production plants during wartime," Hermant added.

"Of course," he cautioned, "we must prevent the students from becoming an ugly mob and making a pig-sty out of university property."

Most PAC members appeared to be unaware of the actual situation within the Faculty of Arts and Science, and were especially concerned about the mood of the student strikers.

However, the worried administrators and faculty were quickly reassured by associate Arts dean G. A. B. Watson, political economy professor H. A. Green, and graduate student St. John.

"It's just a boycott, not a strike," said Watson, adding, "the students are not in an anti-faculty mood."

"They are a very rational mob," said Green, who had attended the mass meeting in the Free Speech Area at noon on Wednesday.

"The potential for violent disruption is not present," said St. John.

"Well, I see we are progressing from a strike to a boycott to a sit-in to a festival," quipped President Bissell. "That's very welcome news."

Arts dean A. D. Allen said that the Faculty Council would not reverse Tuesday's vote rejecting parity on the proposed restructuring committee.

"Well, the real problem in the faculty of arts is a total lack of governance," said Prof. R. A. Spencer.

Bissell suggested that the entire situation is actually "a problem concerning the theoretical structure of the university".

Bissell presented two views of parity. "There is Naked Parity with only students and faculty represented on a committee, and there is Complex Parity when there is equal representation from several university groups including administration and the Board of Governors."

"Students have come a long way, but parity can never be won by revolution, only by evolution."

The PAC search for a workable compromise acceptable to both sides was seriously hampered by its lack of precise information as to the exact student demands.

PAC has had no representatives of the full-time Arts and Science undergraduate body since the withdrawal of four SAC appointees last fall.

After more than two hours of rambling debate, PAC decided it was powerless to intervene in what it considers "purely an internal matter within the Faculty of Arts and Science."

There appeared to be a consensus favoring some form of compromise, but Allen said, "we can't do anything now but talk."

"Perhaps the situation might disappear," he added hopefully.

As the meeting adjourned without a formal statement on the parity crisis, Bissell muttered, "let's resolve never to use the word 'parity' again."

Apparently he means it.

A call to the President's Office yesterday produced the terse reply that the President is not available for comment on "that parity thing."

Striking tenants get no help from Bissell

By Brian Bannon

U of T president Claude Bissell has endorsed the eviction of striking tenants from the Charles St. Married Students Residence.

In a prepared statement delivered by Executive Assistant Wim Kent to a mass meeting in front of Simcoe Hall Wednesday, Bissell said the university would fill any vacancies created by the 130 eviction of striking tenants who asked the U of T for support.

The four-page brief went on to say that the University cannot change any of the financial agreements between OHC, the Rubin Corporation (the builder), and striking tenants. Bissell refused to support any kind of tenant control or collective bargaining.

Wayne Roberts of the Charles Street Tenants Association said that since the landlords have automatic power and the courts back them up, strikers cannot win legally. The only recourse is to force OHC to negotiate and recognise tenant power. In much the same way, Roberts said big business has power over the University to the detriment of student interests. Therefore, Bissell must make clear his stand: "Bay St. or

On Wednesday, U of T's Claude Bissell endorsed OHC eviction of 130 tenants at Charles St.

Charles St.

The only positive action that the statement took was Bissell's assurance that he had written to William Davis, Minister of Education, requesting further meetings to discuss the strike.

Tenant reaction to the whole statement was violently negative. Heckling accompanied Kent's remarks on several occasions and at one point he was attacked by a two-year-old guerrilla soldier — the son of a striking tenant.

After Bissell's statement, Fern

King, a recipient of an OHC eviction notice, blasted Simcoe Hall for not condemning "profits from the poor" and for implicitly supporting the eviction of 130 families.

Larry Hoffman, president of the GSU, promised 100 per cent support for the strike. Economist Melville Watkins demanded that "the University get off its ass and say where they stand on these matters."

The Charles St. action is the longest and strongest tenants strike in North America reported Mike Carson of the Ontario Housing Tenants Association. He promised that "nobody will walk out because they were given an eviction notice." Obstruction of evictions was a necessity he said; "united we can buck the landlords".

Carson went on to describe the case of the non-student poor in public housing who were in an even more powerless position. He urged all supporters of the strike to attend a monster rally this Monday, January 25 at 11:30 a.m. at the Toronto-Dominion Centre to dramatize the plight of the poor

Food Science still has room to breathe

By MARCIA SINGER

Student action may keep the Food Sciences faculty alive for one more year.

A group of about twenty second-year Food Sci students were responsible for postponing an executive committee meeting of the university Senate until mid-February. The committee was to meet next week to discuss the proposal by Dr. J. Hamilton, vice-president, Health Sciences, to phase out the Food Sciences faculty over a three year period.

The three week to a month extension will give Food Sci teaching staff and students necessary time to organize a defence against eliminating the faculty. This comes as almost a miracle since both faculty and students were only informed of Hamilton's proposal this past week.

Unless an emergency session of the Senate is called, the postponement will ensure the Food Sci issue won't reach the Senate until March. This will most likely be too late to stop first-year students from entering the faculty in September.

The way the students got their extension was like a fairytale come true. Wednesday, they walked over to U of T president Claude Bissell's office in Simcoe Hall. Unable to talk to him immediately they waited outside his office.

At which point, according to Rosie Fuss (FSC II) Robin Ross, vice-president, meandered over to the group and offered his services. "There seems to be a problem here. Can I help you?"

Inside the senate chamber, the group explained to Ross why the extension was needed. Later on Wednesday, a Food Sci acting-dean Iva Armstrong was officially informed about the extension.

Students are using this extension to prepare a defence showing how valuable the faculty really is. At a student society meeting yesterday, a plan was formulated.

Some students will research how Food Sci graduates greatly contribute to hospitals, research institutions, and industry. They will find out how many graduates will be needed in the future in these fields.

Others will compile what present and future services the faculty does, and could, provide to the university and community. At the present, about 200 students in health sciences and medicine take some classes from the Food Sci faculty.

The defence also stresses the uniqueness of the Food Sci course in this university. Guelph is the only university in Ontario that offers courses somewhat similar to those given here.

In a press release yesterday, Armstrong condemned the proposal to phase out the faculty.

"A move to discontinue the Faculty seems incredible in view of its increasingly important role in the areas of health and human ecology. Our graduates are in great demand at a time when employment opportunities in many fields are scarce," she protested.

The teaching staff's plans are not known at the moment. They are meeting this morning to discuss the issue.

Alumni are also contributing to the drive to retain the faculty. An ad-hoc committee has already been set up.

"A lot of the alumni are strong people. They hold important jobs and are well thought of by the university. We have in-roads into the Senate and into the Board of Governors," claimed one.

Next Friday evening, the alumni will meet with Hamilton to discuss the proposal.

A staff member of Child Studies has volunteered to instruct faculty and students in techniques for winning this issue.

14 U Vic profs denied tenure

VICTORIA (CUP) — About 3,000 angry students at the University of Victoria showed up at a meeting called by administration president Bruce Partridge Tuesday so he could try to refute charges made that he was purging 14 progressive faculty by denying them tenure.

Partridge attempted to deny what he called "rumours" on the campus that the administration was getting rid of undesirable faculty members by denying them a tenure and that Partridge was attempting to avoid confrontation by flying to Mexico.

But Partridge failed in his attempts to quell mounting anger among students on the campus.

When Partridge said the administration would not discuss the qualifications of the 14 faculty members in question, in "order to protect the faculty," Dick Martin, one of the 14, protested that "I don't need to be protected."

Partridge also unsuccessfully tried to defend his conduct and refusal to co-operate with an investigation under way by the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

The CAUT had invited university representatives to testify during their regular sessions of the hearings last week but Partridge was absent cruising on his yacht until Tuesday (Jan. 19).

The commission is investigating the cases of 3 of the 12 profs involved in the tenure dispute. Two other profs are not fighting their dismissals.

Partridge asserted that the suggestion that the University would not be entering negotiations with the CAUT commission was ridiculous because the CAUT recommendations are not binding on the University and because the negotiations are not within the terms of reference of the commission.

"It would therefore seem that the action of the president in sponsoring a renewed public discussion at this time cannot be in the interests of the legitimate processes which are not yet completed," former Alma Mater Society president Norman Wright said at the meeting.

At the start of Tuesday's meeting called by Partridge, the credibility of the administration was shattered when the Board's vice-chairman Lloyd Mackenzie sardonically said: "I am very impressed with the quality of education here. Not only can I find someone who can say bullshit but I can also find someone who can spell it."

He was referring to students placards, which also backed the student newspaper, The Martlet, that has been attacked recently by Partridge and cronies.

Replied one student: "We found someone who can speak it."

The University administration was also attacked by several department heads at the campus.

"The recommendations of the best qualified people were turned down by one or two people — neither of whom were qualified to make decisions about teaching in the Philosophy Department," said Philosophy chairman K. W. Rankin.

He was referring to the denial of tenure to the professors in his department by Partridge and Arts and Science Dean Climenhaga.

The heads of the French and Hispanic and Italian Studies Department also spoke in favor of total departmental authority in the hiring and granting of tenure to professors.

"I'd like to know when this University is going to be run in our interests and not in the interest of the almighty big business?" asked Mary Trew, of the Young Socialists.

"I'd like to know how long you gentlemen expect to maintain your stronghold at this University without blowing it wide open?"

None of the administration could answer because of loud cheers from the 3,000 students and so left, for another crisis meeting.

Sid Smith cornerstone has the mark of the student drive for parity in university government.

Gov't will be next, Nelson says

By JANET HORNE

Anti-parity spokesman W. H. Nelson warned his history class yesterday that allowing students a voice in decision-making bodies would be the first step to the interference of government and big business in the university.

Nelson was discussing the parity crisis in a regular class Thursday, with most students in attendance.

Nelson suggested that American universities survived the attacks of conservative "Hed-baiters" only because of "the mysterious and protected right of faculty decision-making".

"Students have the competence and experience to make parity committees function successfully, but that's not the issue," he said.

"I am opposed to parity because as a faculty member I am paid by the government to make decisions at this university and I intend to exercise this responsibility."

Nelson was pessimistic about the possibility of significant university reforms.

"The only way to make U of T into a happy, generative place is to physically reconstruct the entire university."

"When I came here in 1963, the university was more rigid but human relations between faculty and students were much better."

Nelson termed the parity issue "a tempest in a teapot" but warned against what he called "any false compromises" designed to avoid the strike.

"The student strike will not influence faculty opinion, but a solution involving parallel faculty-student decision-making bodies might be acceptable."

Bissell backs parity, but ends up waffling

By LAURA KELLY

Claude Bissell, U of T President, said last night that he wouldn't have voted down parity as did the faculty Tuesday afternoon.

"It's not a position I would have taken," concluded Bissell, after answering a barrage of parity-focused questions from residents of UC's Sir Daniel Wilson and Whitney Halls.

Bissell modified his position when he commented that, "Any university which does not look upon its staff as primary is doomed."

Bissell lost credibility as a parity supporter; when informed of the U of T architecture faculty's policy of student parity in course design, hiring, firing, and tenure, he said, "Well, I certainly didn't know that. I couldn't support that policy."

Bissell made general comments on the growing bureaucratic nature of education, the increasing government control, and the temptation of bureaucrats to take over when tensions split the university.

The student movement received a Bissell laurel, however, for closing the gap between theory and action, by making students more aware of real problems.

When questioned about the next university president, Bissell said that an outsider would have a difficult time adjusting, and a non-academic would only increase the bureaucratic overtones of the university.

Rock culture captures festival focus tonight

U of T's new Cultural Palace, the Sid Smith foyer will rock to the big band sound tonight starting at 8:30 when the Parity Festival's Cultural Revolution Committee presents a free concert.

Labelled originally Altamont II, the festival which goes on all week-end has been renamed the Ristful Sounds of Whiz Nelson and his Parity Purity Palpaters.

Friday night's concert will feature Terry and the Pyrates, and one other group.

The week-end climaxes with The Big Dance Saturday night — but the fun rolls on all the time.

Arts and Science work goes on as usual

By TOM WALKOM

With a roomfull of students looking on, the Evaluation Committee in Arts and Sciences yesterday allowed five departments to make first-year exams optional.

Two courses, Italian 128Y and NSC AO14 (a Scarborough programme) failed in bids to eliminate the big finals, but English, History, East Asian Studies, Anthropology and French emerged smiling and confident for the next bout.

The petitions must be now approved by the Arts General Committee, but if passed there, can still be reversed by a full plenary session of the Faculty Council.

The General Committee last month rejected an Evaluations Committee recommendation to make first year finals optional.

The Scarborough course lost out because its request had not gone through the proper committee channels. Italian's request lost since it proposed to hold a two hour final in the regular class period.

Chairman A. D. Allen had noted earlier that the General Committee might be suspicious if too many requests were passed.

"Perhaps we ought to grant those whose proponents are vigorous speakers," he quipped merrily.

On the surface the meeting was all smiles and chuckles, but underlying tensions generated by the student parity festival were evident.

In a tightly worded statement, ex-faculty council representative Bob Spencer officially informed the committee that student members were required to withdraw and could only remain as non-voting observers.

Faculty opposition to the softening of exam procedures centred around Larry Smith of Political Economy.

"This university is going through an erosion or deterioration of standards," charged Smith, who apologised for repeating his arguments.

Members jovially passed around suggestions for avoiding the strictures of final exams, such as telling students the questions beforehand.

At this point, Sociology professor John Lee chastised the committee for levity.

He accused compulsory examinations of lowering "the standards of student respect for professional skills" — the kind of thing the university stands for.

UC residence council decides on coed living

By J. SUTHERLAND BROWN

The Council of University College will be asked to approve the introduction of co-educational residence living at UC in the fall of 1971.

It is believed that the Council's Staff-Student Relations Committee approved a compromise coed proposal Thursday night.

However the parity committee, which includes five students, three faculty and two deans of residence, met behind closed doors to hammer out its proposal, which it is refusing to make public before the college council meets February 15.

The committee has been considering a residents' plan for coed accommodation in Sir Daniel Wilson Residence, now for men, and for two of the tour houses at Whitney Hall women's residence to be set aside for men only.

The student plan has been developed over the last year by a residences committee headed by Sir Dan's president Laurie Watkins.

In a referendum held this fall, 85 per cent of Sir Dan's men and 66 per cent of Whitney women accepted the plan and were willing to live in either coed or celibate residences.

No physical alterations would be necessary except for new fire doors and fire exits in Whitney Hall. Many Whitney residents have expressed concern over the possibility of non-resident men entering Whitney Hall through its proposed men's wing.

While no committee members opposed the student plan outright, the deans of residence had some reservations.

At a previous meeting Tuesday Dean of Women Charity Grant suggested that the terms of the university endowment under which Whitney Hall was constructed might prohibit its use for men.

Dean Grant also pointed out that Whitney Hall is "the last feudal establishment of the university" with respect to its separate administration, staff, and pay scales, and that administrative integration with Sir Dan's and other university owned residences would present many problems.

Michael Howarth, Dean of Men, regretted that those men who, by choice or from lack of space in a coed Sir Dan's, were to live in men-only accommodation, would have to move to Whitney Hall, where they would have little or no sense of community. He also felt that the coed proposal did not make allowance for possible disenchantment with it once implemented.

Howarth suggested on Tuesday that two of six houses in Sir Dan's could be coed next year, two female, and two male.

Wall hangings with-a-message bring the parity festival message upstairs in Sid Smith hall.

Why student opinion isn't enough

Today at 1 p.m. students will be asked whether they will support their endorsement of parity with something more than ballots.

Since the referendum last November, it has been made very clear that the overwhelming opinion of students is not enough to bring about real changes in the structure of the university.

Why is this?

First, student opinion has always been channelled into the labyrinth of academic committeeedom. Selected students are co-opted into groups of distinguished faculty, where they can be intimidated into acquiescence. Students are, except for a number of significant exceptions, granted only advisory status or a feeble voting strength.

The most fundamental part of this process of suffocation through delay is that there is almost never a direct confrontation on either basic or final issues.

It is an unpleasant fact that the structures of power in this university are inexorably weighted against both students and faculty who want basic changes in the nature of our institution.

The overall effect this has is to reinforce a prevalent atmosphere of despair — of the hopelessness of any collective creativity in the university community.

The second reason that opinion alone is not enough to change the nature of this institution is that, sad as it is to point this out, there are many people here with longstanding vested interests to protect. These are not simply personal interests — rather they are the interests of an entire way of life which, in these troubled times, is being repeatedly challenged for its failure to create a just and humane social order.

"The university is not the place to start a revolution," history professor W. H. Nelson told the faculty council Tuesday in his arguments against paying too much attention to arguments for student parity.

By invoking this kind of argument he is trying to project the image of a small "activist" vanguard of students demanding parity on behalf of a disinterested and generally complacent student body.

But why do complacency and disinterest even exist in the central cultural institution of society?

The crisis that exists inside this university now is the direct product of more than a century of authoritarianism in education and of a tradition which relies on the master and apprentice thesis as the founding guiding principle of university life.

Our experience at university is in many ways little different from the general experience that millions of Canadians go through every day.

At this point in time our fight is to develop some kind of alternative to the boring, repetitious, submissive, and yes, childish, roles we are required to play in life. Our preparation begins very early, and continues right through our educational experience and into our place in the future in productive work force.

Over the last three or four years increasing numbers of students have realized this — and the results of the November referendum indicated that they have come to care very strongly about their place in the university, and to feel that it can be changed.

This issue of parity in the faculty council has crystallized the central issue of what kind of university this is — and what it may become.

It would be the ultimate absurdity to suggest that it is a case of students revolting against the faculty, for many faculty support the intending to overthrow the professoriat and establish a student dictatorship.

Many faculty are strong supporters of parity precisely because they believe that in the welding of a strong bond of mutual respect between students and faculty lies the future strength of the university.

Students are asking only for two straightforward things. First, that students be accepted as full and necessary members of the university community, with the power to participate on an equal basis with faculty in making decisions.

And secondly, that, because student frustration and dissatisfaction have reflected the fundamental deficiencies of the quality of Canadian life, we will begin to use the university to change those inadequacies.

The classroom is not education

The classroom is not education. That's what parity is all about. When we talk about the referendum, when we talk about parity, we are talking about you — the way that you relate to your professor and the students next to you, the way that you relate to the society around you.

Learning cannot happen when there are four hundred students in one classroom. Learning cannot happen when we listen to a professor who is more interested in his research than in us. Learning cannot happen in a tutorial or laboratory where the mark is more important than the ideas shared.

We learn more in coffee shops, in pubs, in professors' offices than we do in the classroom. We learn more through political campaigns than we do in political science classes. We learn more through Pollution Probe than we do in biology classes.

Parity means that we would like to know other students in our classes as well as we know our professor. Parity means that we do not like compulsory first year exams. Parity means that sudden essay deadlines, unfair laboratories and tests, and often marks themselves, are not constructive to our education and should be changed.

It cannot be claimed that parity is the cry of a small student elite. That was true three years ago. But the process of three years of committee work by students and of the increasing frustration of the student body with the education that they were getting has led to the referendum results of last November, when over 5,000 students voted for the concept of parity.

Those five thousand students were not asking for democracy in the university. Parity is not the same as one man-one vote; the logical outcome of democracy within the university. But parity represents a step in that direction. It states that students should be able to help determine the direction of their education. And, more importantly, it states that we have learned through our experience that we can only do this if we are on an equal level with the faculty. Only through equality can we work through our differences to create the kind of educational community described in the CUG report.

Even though we have little control over admissions, grading, class sizes, staffing, we are most directly affected by all those things. Administrators, deans, departmental chairmen, and senior professors make most of those decisions. The students are in a position of being second-class citizens within their own university.

Students can listen to their lectures, but have little control over their content. Students read for courses and prepare laboratories for classes, but have little say in reading lists and lab outlines.

Students relate more directly to their professor, demonstrator, or tutorial leader than they do to other students. We all know how we react when a student asks a question. It is not often that we can accept student contributions as educational.

But the issue is wider than the campus. Parity can be the first step in building a university which is more involved with the outside community. If we can begin to work out curricula together, then we can begin to take in our classes about pollution, about the Spadina Expressway, about Canadianization, about Quebec. If we can work to place more emphasis on teaching within the university, then we can begin to have professors who talk about these things.

The people in Sidney Smith are people who have spent a lot of time trying to change their education through Faculty Councils and Departmental chairmen. They want to take education out of the classroom and into the halls.

Five thousand students voted in favor of parity. Two hundred and eighty-five faculty members overturned that vote. Look at the figures.

You have the power.

Tragedy, absurdity and joy in the classroom

BY DR. JAMES HARDING

The Varsity — Errol Young

WHEN A TEACHER acts in a traditional authoritarian way (e.g. giving standard assignments, essay topics and exams; scheduling "course content"; making rigid deadlines; pre-determining texts, etc.) he or she is creating a milieu having the main effect of stereotyping the behaviour and experience of students (and teachers). And the stereotyping of human experience is one of the most effective means of controlling human behaviour, and of establishing a viable authoritarian scheme.

In an authoritarian setting meaning does not come from individualized experience, since such experience is abolished. Individual acts (not to be confused with the ideology of "individualism") and encounters among those acting upon each other are required for ideas to develop. Words and ideas are not the same. Words are needed to communicate ideas, but words can also be conditioned and uttered in such a way that no ideas are communicated. Thus with the destruction of individualized acts goes the destruction of ideas.

It is becoming common for conditioning terminology, extrapolated from behavioristic psychology, to be used to justify authoritarian education. This contradicts some of the actual findings about the effects of rewards and punishments on learning; but, being rationalizations, anything goes. Behaviorism is useful to authoritarian education since it ignores human experience, and the relation of much behaviour to the meaning of experience in a social situation. Appearances and observables are the basis of behaviourist theory building, and consequences are evaluated within this narrow-view of humans.

The tragedy is the tautology in the situation. Authoritarian environments (stereotyped seating, centralized technology, etc.) and authoritarian teaching create a behavioristic student who behaves so as to fit into the behavioristic models used to rationalize such approaches. However, a tautology is not an adequate description or explanation of behaviour. Experimentation is required to understand how means and consequences are related; and how alternative means have different consequences. Such experimentation with authoritarian conditions is not possible, by definition of the use of authoritarian means and reliance on authoritarian motives for learning. Experimentation would subvert the very system.

Words are learned. Ideas are destroyed. Persons become objects, and any experience that conflicts with this process is either dissociated, or turned inward as self-hatred. The word "love" will still be used. But the frightened eyes — which rarely meet — are the reality of authoritarianism in the classroom.

REPRESSIVE TOLERANCE

For every authoritarian in our society, there are several good liberals. In the corporate society, authority is not used in a blatant way (unless it is challenged, that is). To keep people consuming, competing and sufficiently mobile to fill new and changing corporate slots, there must be freedoms from blatant authority.

These are the liberal freedoms associated with the period of free competition and private enterprise (combined as "free enterprise" to serve an ideological function in early capitalism). They are freedoms from the appearance of direct uses of authority. They are not freedoms to act creatively so as to evolve new social relationships within which new human experience, behaviour and meaning can occur. Liberal freedoms function to integrate the corporate institutions that have grown out of the productive and marketing systems of state (or neo) capitalism.

These liberal freedoms are exposed as repressive tolerance once the reality of arbitrary and undemocratic decision-making is recognized. And repressive tolerance (liberal freedoms) in the classroom are becoming the fad as education is expropriated for corporate purposes. With the corporatization (not communication or socialization) of education comes a new form of authoritarianism.

Indirect and subtle uses of undemocratic authority are deceptive. In such a setting, say a tutorial, both teacher and student can come to believe that they are in dialogue, that they are equals as people, and that a new and revolutionary kind of learning is occurring. And these myths are viable as long as students and teachers perceive what happens solely in terms of appearances. Lectures are minimized or sometimes abolished. Opinion is tolerated. Tangents on "subject matter" are even encouraged. "Free at last. Free at last".

But what are the forces acting on both teachers and students? The administrative bureaucracy goes on. It becomes more rationalized and autonomous each day. The calendar, the curricula, the departmentalization, the hierarchy and ranking, become more and more sophisticated. The bureaucracy becomes more and more unrelated, and in contradiction to the autonomy of both academics and students. The criteria of the bureaucracy, which abstracts and reduces the quality and meaning of experience into quantity, becomes more and more a replica of corporate organization and management.

The tolerance involved does not reflect greater autonomy of student and teacher to learn experimentally. It is a snow job. Instead of "you have to do it, or else", you get "it's in your best interest". More common now is "we're all in this together" which results from the co-management tactics used to cloak arbitrary controls over education. No matter what form the repressive tolerance takes, the underlying authoritarian reality remains. It is not that greater freedom exists to do things. It is rather that teachers have become more fully integrated into the bureaucratic farms — they are more bureaucrat than educator in most cases — and thus no meaningful education to contrast sharply with the bureaucratic perversion of learning exists. A good teacher is restricted as much by a co-management institution with its repressive tolerance, as by a more traditionally authoritarian one. The grading bureaucracy shows the absurdity of repressive tolerance more than anything.

For those (whether teacher or student) with institutionalized and role identities, human encounter is often perceived as terror. The sexual dynamics that can begin to flower within repressive tolerance frighten many. "Education" is thus stereotyped as absolutely different than "therapy", and the avoidance of human encounter is rationalized.

Most teachers don't have the skills or concepts to even begin to help students (or themselves) make sense out of this process. Their heads have been conditioned to specialized languages which exclude an understanding of classroom experience and behaviour. They themselves are split: their training and roles keep their minds abstracted from the realities (including their own experience) in the classroom. Often they "put down" any behaviour that contradicts their own world-view. They are probably not even aware of their world-view. If so, they are rotten teachers.

Those teachers that don't regress may naively go on acting within the precepts of liberal freedom. They may believe that no institution affects them, or that the effect is unimportant for their teaching. In fact, their relationship with students, whatever its form, is dependent on the bureaucratic organization of rooms and courses, and the grading system, will enter into it at some point. This is not unimportant since it reflects the lack of control over approaches, content and methods of evaluation in the class.

REVOLUTION AND JOY IN THE CLASSROOM

When a student is realizing the absurdity of grades he or she often has nothing with which to replace motivation based on authoritarian learning. And it is common for students caught in this ambiguity to begin to go through the motions (turning in papers) without any involvement whatsoever. Some believe that they are "having their cake and eating it too!" but it's not their cake. When this happens it is necessary to challenge students with intellectual values; to challenge the student to engage in learning outside of the bureaucratic norms.

This does not mean dropping out. The bureaucracy is viable as long as those who recognize its absurdity simply drop out. What is necessary is the creation of counter values — intellectual ones to counter bureaucratic ones — in the midst of the university. Otherwise the institution is not challenged. Again this comes down to one's commitments. A commitment to learning, and to obtaining the freedom and control required, is a commitment to changing the institution.

"Individualism" is what stands in the way of developing these real commitments. Because they have to, students can often continue functioning — going through the motions — even after they have seen through the rhetoric of the bureaucracy. "Individualism" must also be challenged intellectually. And this is no easy task. People must come to realize the "individualism" fails to describe human behaviour and experience, whether one analyzes language, ideology, or whatever, to show this. Individualism is what complements the repressive tolerances of the corporate society for freedoms from are what individualism emphasizes. Freedoms to do things require people acting communally — on the basis of common needs that present institutions don't fulfill. A communal commitment is required for intellectual work to be done.

The bureaucrats (whether academic or administrative) won't like the nurturing of intellectual values in education. In institutions where totalitarian democracy reigns (you accept the corporate institution and are allowed to make decisions that don't conflict with its control), creative research is subversive. In institutions based on rhetoric, ideas are subversive. When students and teachers begin to develop understanding and meaning from the acts associated with words, and a skepticism of the meaning authority attaches to words develops, the institution is no longer secure. Education, if it works, is simply subversive.

That is why there must be a willingness by those engaged in learning to make the transition from intellectual work to political activity. This does not mean a mechanical teaching of a political ideology in the classroom, or a mechanical advocacy of political action. It is easy for those with verbal intelligence to replace one set of symbols with another. Elistic beliefs can be replaced with democratic ones in a classroom without there being any implication for behaviour. It is the teacher's commitment to nurture critical, methodic intelligence, and a comparative understanding of ideas, as a basis for the student's creative inquiry that is vital. This process will itself create values counter to the bureaucracy, and, if passion exists in one's study, conflict with the bureaucratic institution is inevitable. And we must not forget that the meaning of words used by a teacher will result from the acts students associate with them. In the final analysis, a teacher teaches by the way he or she lives.

'We all share common sense and honesty equally'

From the welter of distortions, half-truths and provocations dispensed in the name of rational debate on Tuesday afternoon, at least a couple of clear messages emerged.

The first is that some members of the academic staff want the university to be run by and for the benefit of its "permanent members". The last phrase, left undefined, was certainly intended to include tenured academics and possible assistant professors and lecturers, but clearly exclude students.

Prof. Nelson also strongly implied that he believes his opponents are not the students, but student activists. It is easy, but dishonest to frighten professors with the prospect of serving on committees with some real or imagined student demagogue.

But a short time spent in conversation with students would reveal to many faculty that the present movement is led by constructive and ineffective members of a most impressive body of students.

Parity is an issue with the faculty because they are afraid to, or refuse to allow, these students an effective part in decisions which directly affect their education.

It is vital to students because it was enshrined in CUG as a symbol of equality. It is a rare faculty meeting at which casual or explicit reference is not made to U of T's place as Canada's best university. Some faculty members are now suggesting a clearly subordinate role for the very people on whom the merit of this university is clearly based. The wonderful thing about U of T is the quality of the students it has somehow managed to attract.

Parity as a principle of equality must first be accepted, but as a numbers game must ultimately be bypassed. Such a simplistic formula is a loaded weapon for those who would block progress in university reform. It is clearly inapplicable as a practical formula in our diverse community of full and part time undergraduates, graduate students, administrators, academic staff and support staff.

When parity has been accepted as a symbol of equality amongst all the members of this university, we will be able to work out detailed solutions to its administrative problems in a spirit of mutual trust.

We have all at some time been offered consultation as a substitute for participation in decisions. I have advised enough committees which afterwards decided behind closed doors and I have sat behind the closed doors often enough to know how honestly, honourably, and humanly faculty members behave in these situations. I do not expect the students to need the benefit of my experience to draw realistic conclusions about the realities of that technique.

The members of this community are not equal in experience. For some, experience has brought wisdom. But no group in this university has any more than its fair share of honesty, common sense, and capacity for good judgment.

Effective and just decision-making requires the participation of all those whose lives will be affected by the outcome.

The capacity of students to make effective contributions has been well demonstrated in the past. A committee of five students, five academic staff and the dean of arts and science tabled a plan for restructuring the faculty council in May 1969 before parity was an issue which may now form the basis for a compromise.

Many of us find the decision of Tuesday's meeting as unacceptable as the ludicrous format of the debate. In a body of 1300 faculty and 68 students the motion was posed as one supported by faculty and opposed by students. The separation was further emphasized by the ridiculous class device of titles "Professor" for some members of the faculty council and "Mr." for others.

And as soon as the scene had been thoroughly set, closure was imposed before any faculty views except those of the proposer and seconder could be heard. Some more effective form of dialogue must be found if we are to make progress in the reform of the faculty of arts and science in this, Canada's "biggest and most important university" (quotation from speech at the closed meeting of the Association of the Teaching Staff Tuesday evening; source available on request).

'Transients cannot equal professionals'

In the course of his remarks at that rather sad meeting in Convocation Hall on Tuesday Mr. Peter Hall warned that the issue of parity would go to the students in the classroom. I am glad to have the issue referred to them and ask The Varsity's co-operation in addressing them briefly on the possibly erroneous assumption that some of them read your Letter column.

I trust that they do not need to be told that they were not "screwed" to use the inelegant wording of your Wednesday headline and that the majority of faculty simply have a different concept of the nature of a university than do the small elite of student activists (I do not use the word in a derogatory sense) who run for student office.

From my experience in talking to the students in the classroom over the years I do not believe that the vast majority of them take seriously the claim that in the few years that they are in the university students can play an equal role to that of the faculty who have accepted university teaching and research as their life's work and who have been selected for the task after a fairly rigorous process of qualification.

The faculty are here for two reasons that cannot be separated: to "extend the frontiers of knowledge" (as the phrase goes) and to serve students by teaching or directing them in the first stages of research. The students as a consequence have rights and the faculty responsibilities. This justifies the students in having some say in the running of the university to protect those rights and to get the sort of service to which they are entitled as fee-payers and citizens.

But the transient member of the community, who in most cases has not yet reached his peak of development, cannot expect to play an equal role to the permanent member who has a lifetime professional commitment. Despite what has been said to the contrary in recent years students have had enormous influence on decisions that have been made on curriculum and examinations and this without any acceptance by the faculty of the will-o-the-wisp of parity.

Student argues vs. walkout and vs. strike

For many years now I along with many others have tried to transform the university into an institution that is more responsive to student needs and wishes. I have grown exhausted and frustrated from my uphill struggle to make the kind of changes that I and the people who elected me wish to implement. Progress has been slow and progress has been hard in coming, but there has been progress. I have always believed and still do believe that the only meaningful and legitimate way to get the changes I want is by gaining a substantial voice in the decision-making process.

When I began there were students nowhere in the power structure of this university, now there are some here and some there, some with positions of great influence and some with less, some that are taken and some that are real.

But wherever there are students there is a dialogue; students are engaging in discussions and decisions, they are learning about the power structure and they are learning how to use power. Many places in the structure could be filled by students if it was not that they were so self-righteous that they will only participate on their terms.

How many changes have we not affected because we were too busy screaming over numbers, how many students will write exams this year because we abdicated our responsibility to first year students because we walked off the Council before that issue was decided.

It is not that I do not believe in the principle of parity. For large councils I believe in the principle of one-man one-vote, and in small committees the composition in some cases should have more students that staff. I was not, am not and will not be except for one particular case in favour of leaving the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Likewise I am vehemently opposed to the whole concept of a student strike.

A strike is a declaration that dialogue, discussion has stopped. THIS STATE OF AFFAIRS DOES NOT EXIST.

To the best of my knowledge the committee that was proposed and passed at that meeting is the first time that the issue has been set up for discussion in a committee that was not advisory to some administrator and was voted directly by the Faculty membership. This is a great victory. This motion says that we want students to be involved in our affairs and we recognize that students should be involved in our affairs. I doubt that even two years ago we could have won this principle at this level in the university.

Will a strike change the faculty's attitude? I think not.

Yes, we have argued persuasively sometimes but many times we have set up a climate that is not conducive to allowing ourselves to be heard by open minds. Walking off the Council is another demonstration of our attitude in this regard. Every time that a decision goes against us we raise our hands in disbelief, congratulate ourselves on how good a case we made and then wash our hands of it by withdrawing. This is a very childish and petulant attitude and one which is not conducive to power. With power there is responsibility. That responsibility is at the very least to use the power reasonably and responsibly. We have not altogether shown the capability to do this.

Regardless of whether the strike goes on or not, whether it fails or succeeds, it is wrong. It is wrong because because strike means confrontation and there is no genuine dialogue in confrontation. It is wrong because we do not need to go outside the existing structures to continue to fight, to make gains.

The fate of this university to function as a university lies in the hands of the strike organizers. I only hope that once they get the cork off they can get the thing back in the bottle.

Food Scientists defend value of their school

On Tuesday, January 19th the students of the Faculty of Food Sciences were officially informed of the proposed motion by Dr. J. Hamilton to phase out our faculty over the next three years.

We would like to make it clear that we intend to oppose this motion in any way that would seem necessary. We will fight for the existence of our faculty, our course and our degree.

It appears that the reason behind this motion is the lack of funds to support our faculty. We do not deny that we are in need of money to maintain and modernize our building; however, we feel such an expenditure is justified. The demand for our graduates is certainly not insufficient, and undergraduate enrollment would probably be increased if we could offer better facilities, and if the public were more aware of the uniqueness of our programmes.

The food industry is one of the largest industries in Canada, and hospitals will always be in need of nutritionists. Where will qualified personnel in these fields come from if the Faculty of Food Sciences is phased out?

In our world with the need to feed its rapidly increasing populations, who can deny the necessity for Food Science graduates?!

Pyramids, says Clarkson, not layers

I intended to make two points had not debate been prevented on Tuesday:

1. The issue was not the technical problems (of mutual veto, concurrent majority etc.) raised by the word "parity" but rather whether students are to have a reasonably equal say with faculty in making policy concerning the future of the university.

2. In the large, fragmented Faculties of our campus, the basic academic communities are tending no longer to be groups of professors organized in Departments but rather groups of professor-plus-students organized in courses. Speaking personally I find that the bulk of my academic thinking and research work is done with student colleagues in project-type courses designed to grapple with specific questions like American control in Canada.

If we are to talk of communities within the university, these communities are less horizontal layers of faculty as distinct from students than pyramids of academic activity made up of professors and students working together.

Once students are seen as members of the university community, then their active participation in university policy-making can be seen as a functional necessity not a political threat.

Bravo Nelson! Bravo Rist!

Bravo Nelson! Three cheers for Rist!

After all these months of parity-fighting, the REAL Mr. Nelson and Mr. Rist have revealed themselves. These brave, just left-of-centre souls are not merely university professors on an academic faculty council — not at all!

Both are deplorably bad speakers; three quarters of an hour was enough to send most of the gallery of Con Hall to sleep. They use words like "honesty" and phrases like "faculty generosity to students"; no academic could be dishonest and inflexible, while vehemently denying this practice.

Each is a prize manipulator; together they have employed democratic procedures to over-rule a previously-made democratic decision of the faculty council. What a team!

The lack of integrity of Messrs. Nelson and Rist, combined with their colorful tactics and characteristic quaintness of expression, have unmasked their true designs. The length of time this team has forced the council to stay on Political rather than Academic work can mean one of two things.

Either they intend to run for Parliament to be real politicians, or they expect one day to be on the Board of Governors. In case you can't wait, sirs, I hear there are vacancies in the offices of President and Chancellor: why not let your teamwork lie resplendent there?

BOOKS

The Varsity ran a giant review of the 4-volume Collected Essays, Journalism and Letters of George Orwell, when they appeared in 1968. Now Longmans Canada (Penguin Books to you) has issued the set in softcover for $2.15 apiece. These books would be a steal at twice the price and are indispensable to a study of English literature, 20th century European politics and the craft of journalism. Orwell's career is spanned in over 2000 pages of small type, from the first essay he sold in 1928 to a journal entry he wrote in 1949, the prophecy of which he was not to live to fulfill: "At 50, everyone has the face he deserves."

Still in the same period, Longmans/Penguin has issued a giant anthology of pictures and articles called Picture Post 1938-50, at $5.25. Picture Post, defunct since 1957, was the British equivalent to Life; it was raunchier, perhaps, or I am simply given to thinking old styles of dress are really earthy. Anyway, it chronicled, usually intelligently, all the horrors of the last wheeze of liberalism, the Depression and appeasement, World War Two is here also, and the Cold War. The copy and photos (V at right) are arresting, and when one clears away the propaganda, one is left with a world-view amazingly optimistic, given the circumstances in which it was formulated.

"Hindsight" articles by various British journalists accompany the reprints. The pictures of famous and unknown people who are, or should be still kicking, remind us of our mortality, pictures of destruction, more than those depicting peace and hope, show us our own faces.

Closer to home, now: another poetry magazine No. 2 (c/o 32 Marchmount Road, Toronto 4 — for sending mss. or getting copies, at $95 apiece, $2.50 for a subscription of three) is a collection of new poems by new and slightly-used poets.

There's much more in the magazine than I have room to talk about. The styles are often the authors' own or, more specifically, Clif Bennett, Paulette Jiles, Bill Howell are the best ventriloquists. A wide range of subjects and moods is explored. Here for a fillip is Bill Howell's "The Particulars", saying more than is on the page. "We started with God/Now we have gotten/down to particulars /We remember about dentists /We leave each other/money and cigarettes/for the morning."

THEATRE

There's lots to do this week end if you have the time, the inclination, and the necessary financing. At the O'Keefe Centre, Beryl Reid and Patrick Cargill star in the funniest play I've seen all year — BLITHE SPIRIT. The only problem was that everyone else thought so too — I could hardly hear the lines for the laughter. Tickets from $2 to $7.50 — take your ATL.

The Royal Alex is reentering the short run business with BORSTAL BOY, the story of Brendan Behan, who happens to be the playwright of the Toronto Workshop's new show THE HOSTAGE. $2 & up at the Royal Alex. $4 flat rate at TWP ($4.50 weekends).

Theatre Passe-Muraille is presenting a rather off-beat OUT TO BREAKFAST end the St. Lawrence Centre is opening its fourth (repertoire) show MARY, MARY. And to top it all off, somewhere in the Ward Price Building at 23 Grenville, there lurks WIDOWER'S HOUSES, one of Shew's "plays unpleasant".

I must apologize to all my faithful readers whom I have led grievously astray. FEIFFER'S PEOPLE are alive and well, and living in the back pages of the Globe & Mail's Business section, Tuesdays. How shy can you get?

P.S. I have been belatedly informed that the Vic College Dramatic Society is presenting 2 plays tonight for only 75c in the New Vic Theatre. To all of those campus groups who complain that I never list their productions, I would be most happy to, but please, tell me about them before they're over OK?

ROCK

Lenny Breau is currently at the Riverboat, and will be followed by a two man group named "Herold". After that the local palace of folk will feature Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee, and Bruce Cockburn.

The Colonial has Sam and Dave's band there till the week end, and they will be followed by the James Cotton blues band, which made a very impressive showing in Toronto at Manposse a few years ago.

Jimmy Castor continues at the Coq d'Or. A highly recommended folk singer by the name of David Kaufman opens the new club at the Hill House this Saturday evening 186 St. George. Word has it that Robert Charlebois will be in the city at the end of next month, as will Laura Nyro. Chicago brings its big band sound to the Gardens on the first of February.

For R&B fans the best club in town appears to be Soul City still operating with a minimum of publicity.

Grit heavy criticizes PET gov't

By ERIC MILLS

Edmonton publisher Mel Hurtig attacked the Trudeau government Wednesday for making what he called "a whole string of ad hoc decisions" on the question of foreign ownership.

Speaking to a small band of student Liberals, he predicted that Revenue Minister Herb Gray's task force on foreign ownership will bring in a "very good" report that "will be emasculated by the Liberal government." Instead, he thought a "key sector" approach would become policy, in which extent of ownership and other regulations would be adopted on an industry by industry basis.

Hurtig, a Liberal himself, said the country will be "in trouble" if this is Trudeau's response to the growing demand of the "new nationalism", which he described as essentially a desire for independence.

"What point is there in Canadian content (in broadcasting) when the CBC budget is frozen?", he asked. "What does Arctic sovereignty mean when 70 per cent of it is leased to American oil firms?"

Describing some of the foreign ownership, Hurtig noted that the primary goal of multi-national (American) corporations is the maximization of profit.

Hurtig cited several examples of American subsidiaries trading with their parent firms in which there occurred pricing detrimental to Canada. His remarks were a refutation of the common theory that American and Canadian-owned firms perform in a similar fashion.

Aveneri speaks on today's Israel

Sholomo Aveneri, an Israeli university professor, said yesterday that the tragedy of Arab nationalism was its failure to transform socialist political ideology into actual socialist life styles.

Lack of "social cohesion and integration" inside the Arab nations is evidenced by the power of the military castes that reinforce the gap between the classes, said Aveneri, speaking to C. B. Macpherson's graduate political science seminar.

Aveneri cited the conscious activity of the Israelis dating back to the 1920's, to translate socialist thought into action by taking predominantly mercantilistic people and making a nation where all occupations, especially manual labour, are looked upon with equal respect.

He told a story of a student of his who stood out in his studies of politics, but left the university in 1967 in order to manage the six-day war in the Sinai, and who now wishes to return to his original profession of plumber.

Aveneri chuckled about the qualitative difference in student-faculty relationship that exists when the student is also the military commander.

"You better not speak downstairs at the parity festival," laughed Macpherson, who voted against student parity in the Faculty Council.

The kibbutz system (although it Head of Jewish Defense League still encompasses only 4 per cent of the population), the retiring of army officers at 45, which encroaches on any formation of a military elite, and the widespread use of reserves for military action which insures an educated, and not "barbarian" military, are all methods of encouraging egalitarianism in Israel said Aveneri.

Aveneri could offer no explanation for the lack of socialistic "praxis" in Arab countries, except that while Israel has broken away from the heavily religious overtones of Zionism, Islamic thought has not yet been reinterpreted secularly.

"A lot of American Jews who come to Israel are disgusted with this godless country," said Aveneri.

Kahane urges Jewish solidarity

By CARLEY McDONALD
"Peace is one of the biggest cop-outs of all time" stated Rabbi Meir Kahane, Chairman for the Jewish Defense League, Thursday at Sid Smith.

Members of the JDL have claimed responsibility for bombings and riots stemming from their opposition to the fate of two Soviet Jews who were sentenced to death.

Stressing the need for solidarity among Jews and "love of Jew", he criticized the traditional Jewish ethic of pacifity as regards the plight of Jews in the Soviet Union. He urged his audience to abandon their veneer of respectability which he believes is based on a fear of anti-Semitic backlash.

"Forget your respect", he pleaded. "You get it by having self-respect."

Kahane stressed the necessity of a boycott on those North American firms trading with the Soviet Union. Defending the militant action of the JDL against Soviet foreign missions, he stated that they provided the necessary publicity for Russian Jewry.

Kahane said all Soviet Jews wanted to emigrate to Israel and that this should be the goal for the true Jew everywhere.

"There is no difference between the physical loss of Jews in Russia and cultural genocide" in North America, he contended.

He expressed his faith in the growth of the JDL, which last month alone added 4,000 new members to its roster. Membership forms were distributed following the Rabbi's speech.

Cagers in best effort, lose 78-68 to Mac

By PETER WHITE

Wednesday evening Varsity's basketballers added another chapter in their exclusive and eloquent testimonial to the glories of the ways and means of failure in the game they pursue but have yet to catch.

In this episode, Blues demonstrated the technique of looking good enough to be remembered as doing a credible job but not playing well long enough to win. No one can get too upset by the defeat. A near miss — yet on this night a real fluke if they had won.

Blues led a stumbling McMaster well into the second half. Cheers rang out. First for a decent game; second in hopes of the unreal, a victory; third in reassurance that should Toronto lose (a reasonable consideration) it would be no rout.

Well it wasn't exactly a rout but Blues did manage to fold in a way that is only theirs dropping it by ten. Final score: Mac 78, Toronto 68.

Blues opened the game with a flurry — Angus Braid made some deft moves to the bucket; guard Gerry Barker, who is establishing himself as a Varsity leader, riddled the Mac defence with some snappy passes and some equally snappy driving lay-ups.

However, when Mac switched into a zone in the latter part of the half, the Toronto impetus and point production waned drastically. Play sunk to its oft-seen levels of confusion and inconsistency. Mac was unable to do much better but led at the half 40-37.

For Varsity it was a good twenty minutes. We solemn and sick Blues supporters gathered for our usual solemn and sick half time read outs — we figured this might be it. Mac, is not after all so shit hot either. We should have known better.

Blues bullied (yes they were doing some ripping on the boards) their way back into a small lead as the second half progressed. Consistently able to break a Mac press, Toronto put together some neat and polished fast breaks.

Young Dave Watt, a 6-foot-5 rookie from Cedarbrae Collegiate, playing his best game to date, finished off some of these breaks and added what at the time seemed some crucial foul shots.

Mac was kept in the game only by the deadly shooting of forward Jeff Daw who was to make a 20-point night of it. Blues play, however, dropped off noticeably as the game entered its final eight minutes and Mac slipped back into a small lead.

And then the FIREWORKS: Scrambling for a loose ball, Ron Voake and the Marauders' Mazza came up swinging. Each team was assessed a couple of technicals. Toronto was also called for a two shot foul on the play itself. The heavyweights were ejected from the game. Mac's Peter Hamilton converted three of their four free throws and Mac waltzed out of the altercation with a six point lead, 66-60.

Blues tried hard but their ineffective play haunted them to the end.

Afterwards the Toronto side was feeling solemn and sick again. A good game for a while; a sad result. Toronto for all the excitement and effort they generated still did not deserve a win — they simply could not respond to the crucial situations they faced, especially late in the second half when the game was not yet out of reach.

Saturday night Guelph leaps in for a quickie. Well drilled and disciplined by mentor Garney Henley they should make Blues wish every game was against Mac — They are led by brilliant guard Mark Walton and Phil Smith who carries a 17-point scoring average into this game. Game time 8:15. Prelim features New College and Vic 1 at 6:30.

BLUES SCORING: Barker 10, Katz 5, Trafford 9, Braid 9, Voake 2, Evans 8, Boston 14, Watt 9, Caskey 2.

Blues rally late for 9-2 win over Marlins

Waterloo showdown tonight

By LYNDON LITTLE

Thanks to a third period scoring outburst in Wednesday night's game with the McMaster Marlins, the hockey Blues can head for their crucial game in Waterloo tonight with the considerable momentum generated by a seven-goal period.

Finally breaking the spell cast by Mac goaltender Garry Inness, Blues' forwards wiped away two periods of frustration and pumped in seven unanswered goals for a 9-2 runaway victory.

"Looking toward the Waterloo game, I think it was important that we broke out in a scoring way tonight," said right-winger Terry Peterman who scored once on a blistering 40-foot shot to the top of the net and added three assists.

"For the first two periods it looked like the Windsor game all over again," said defenceman Brent Swanick. "The big difference tonight was that we didn't let our frustration beat us, we kept at it until we broke through."

For the first forty minutes, Blues outshot the Marlins by a 36-12 count; but a 2-2 draw was the best they had to show for their efforts.

But then, after just 90 seconds of the third frame, Peterman scored on his bullet-like drive and the deluge was on!

Center Brian St. John and left-winger Bill Buba, Peterman's two linemates, led the evening's goal scoring parade with a pair each. Buba's two markers came within a space of 20 seconds late in the third.

The magic dispensed by McMaster goaltender Garry Inness finally wore off. Here, Blues' Scott Seagrist (8) connects.

Heureux scored the other Varsity goals. Greg Higson and Russ Stephen replied for the Marlins.

Buba and St. John each drew two assists to go with their pair of goals to give each member of that line four points for the evening's work.

It was by far the finest game St. John has played on Varsity ice this season. The big center made all the right moves as he buzzed the Marlins into confusion whenever he was on the ice.

Dave McDowall, whose soft drift shot late in the second period dropped past Inness for Blues' second goal, was the most effective member of a defensive corps that was, by in large, reasonably steady.

Final shots favoured Blues by a 49-23 count.

Blue Notes: Peterman's four point outing propelled him into the OQAA Western Division scoring lead... Len Burman, one of Blues' regulars last year, is working out with the team again... Waterloo downed York 3-2 on Tuesday...

Mike Boland, who left Blues early in December, has scored two goals to date for the Springfield Kings of the American Hockey League.

Swimmers win big; host top meet Saturday

It was supposed to be just a tune-up before a tune-up, but the Swim Blues decided to let it all out Wednesday night against the helpless Guelph Gryphons. The predictable result: Varsity 84, Guelph 29.

Blues' next dual meet is tomorrow night at 7:30 in the Benson Building; victims on this occasion are the Waterloo Warriors.

Despite the absence of several top names, including coach Robin Campbell, the Varsity swimmers throttled Guelph with a solid and spectacular team effort.

Diver Alex Law (I APSC) came up with his finest performance of the season, gaining two second-place finishes. Lack of scoring punch in the diving events has long been a Varsity handicap, but Law's inspired acrobatics could herald even more lopsided victories in the future.

Reliable Jim Adams (II Vic) produced three Toronto victories in free style events as Blues lost only one of eleven races overall.

Other double winners for Blues included Ross Ballantyne (III PHE) in the 200-yard breaststroke and medley relay, John Twohig (II SMC) in the 200-yard butterfly and medley relay, and Alex Fedko (II PHE) in the 200-yard backstroke and 50-yard freestyle.

Coach Campbell hadn't expected the team to produce such a convincing rout, but in his absence diving coach Jim Lacrosse and manager Dave McWatters guided the team to its best showing of the season.

"Just call me SuperCoach," McWatters quipped later.

The results from Guelph indicate Waterloo could be in for a rather painful drubbing tomorrow evening.

Blues will probably start most, if not all, of their veterans and if the swimmers decide to go all out, Warriors will be lucky to win even the diving.

One highlight of the meet is the expected return of Theo van Ryn, winner of the OQAA 50-yard free-style sprint every year since 1966. Theo, who's also won several CIAU titles, had more or less "retired" to pass his final year of medicine, but then decided to return for one more crack at the national title.

A rough comparison would be if the hockey Blues suddenly picked up Paul Laurant or Murray Stroud; Theo's return gives the swimmers even more depth and experience, especially in the relays.

With ten consecutive OQAA titles to their credit, plus four straight national CIAU championships, Blues only apparent weakness lies in fan support.

Only 85 swimming buffs, mostly wives and girlfriends, turned out for last weekend's romp over Western. Tomorrow's meet should be the best display of college swimming available in the Toronto area this season. Blues deserve more fan support, and it's going to be a very enjoyable and exciting evening.

Blues could conceivably surpass their performance against Guelph by shattering one or two OQAA records, a virtually impossible task in a dual meet at this stage of the season. However, as Varsity already holds fourteen league and CIAU marks, the ability is certainly there.

"We're not swimming for the press," says rookie freestyler Ian Dalrymple, "but we're not slacking either."

Which indicates that if you want to participate in a sure-fire Varsity victory Saturday night, be at the swim meet.

Soccer team training!

After decades of OQAA domination, the Soccer Blues, apparently, have not taken lightly their reversals in the past two seasons.

Once the most consistently winning team in Varsity sports history, Blues are determined to regain past status by fielding the fittest side in college competition next year. To help accomplish this, the team will initiate an off-season training program this Saturday.

Anyone who feels they might be interested in trying out for the 1971 edition of the Soccer Blues and who is interested in participating in the training program, should meet in the main locker room of Hart House tomorrow at 10:00 a.m.

Poli Ec students meet to set demands

Political Economy students who want to formulate a list of departmental demands and take action to achieve them are meeting today.

The action meeting is at 3 p.m. in the second floor lounge at Sidney Smith Hall.

Political Economy students have a long history of watching their faculty ignore fighting for a strong student voice in the department. Last spring the Political Economy Course Union declared the chairmanship of J. Stefan Dupre illegitimate because he was selected for the job by a small group of administrators and senior academics.

Nominations close today for a seat on the presidential search committee.

Three student seats are available on the committee which will select a candidate to succeed outgoing president Claude Bissell. Two of the student members must be undergraduates, and one a graduate. Phone either Robin Ross at Simcoe Hall or Rod Hurd at SAC.

Election dates for choosing members of the committee are Feb. 1, 2, 3.

Mathews, Hagggar speak

Robin Mathews and Gedrg Hagggar, two of Canada's foremost radicals will speak tomorrow at 1 p.m. in the Sidney Smith Hall Free Speech area.

The rally is to be part of the ongoing educational festival surrounding the parity crisis and will centre on the topic "Canada Must Have Canadian Universities".

Sponsoring the rally is the recently launched 85% Canadian Quota Campaign, which calls for a nationwide quota for Canadian citizens in Canadian universities.

Larry Haiven, chairman of the CQC, said yesterday that "the rally will link the just demand for student parity to the important nationwide issue of the takeover of our universities by American imperialism. We have invited two of Canada's leading 'outside agitators' because the struggle for students' self-determination is one of the struggles in the fight for self-determination for Canada. Robin and George are two people in the forefront of this struggle."

One of the two speakers, George Hagggar, said of the parity struggle here, "Parity is a demand that any self-respecting student must make. It's a demand that says we are not going to be treated like children."

Arts and Science students vote today and tomorrow on whether to strike Wednesday.

The three-day strike including a voluntary boycott and cancelling of classes by students and teaching staff, would be reassessed in a mass meeting Friday.

All 13,000 full time students in the Faculty are eligible to vote, as are special students.

Extension students however will not be voting, according to SAC Education Commissioner Bob Spencer, because the Association of Part-time University Students is too involved with the presidential search committee to worry about a strike.

All Arts and Science staff can vote, but their ballot will be differentiated by a special F.

The list of eligible staff is comprised of those names in the U of T Staff Directory, and includes secretaries and clerical assistants.

Referendum polling stations are located in Sid Smith, the MacLennan Laboratories, Ramsey Wright, Lash Miller, Sigmund Samuel Library, the SAC office and all colleges.

Graduate students, although not eligible to vote in the referendum are being asked to sign a petition supporting the strike.

According to referendum spokesmen, the disenfranchisement of the graduates is for bureaucratic rather than political reasons — no overall list of arts and science grads exists.

The last referendum in the faculty, which favoured parity, got a turnout of almost 5,000 or 49 per cent of the student body.

During the referendum the parity festival will go on with special speakers and meetings in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall.

Bissell seeks solution in secret meeting

By J. SUTHERLAND BROWN

U of T President Claude Bissell and other senior administrators have had unpublicized meetings with student leaders in an attempt to sound out possible solutions for the current impasse over student-faculty parity in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

SAC president Rod Hurd told a strike organization committee meeting Sunday night of details of a meeting held Friday between himself and Bissell to discuss possible action by Simcoe Hall.

Bissell has repeatedly insisted that he has no power to impose a solution on the faculty. However, the Board of Governors, which has complete power to restructure or alter any academic division, would give great weight to any proposal by Bissell, who is the Board's only academic member.

The Board of Governors could:

- establish a parity restructuring committee with power to implement its recommendations without recourse to the present

Faculty Council; or

- set up a new Faculty Council with parity.

However Bissell refused on Friday to commit himself to any specific course of action.

Hurd and SAC University Commissioner Peter Hall had met previously on Thursday afternoon with Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen, Associate Deans G. A. B. Watson and W. T. Sharp, and University College Principal Archie Hallett.

Hurd and Hall reminded the faculty officers of the explosive potential of the student strike proposed for a Wednesday opening, and of the need to find some sort of workable structure for Faculty Council.

Most members are agreed on the need for a more manageable Council, but a structure which does not have student support could easily be hamstrung by student non-co-operation and obstruction.

There are two ways in which

Council could change its decision of last Tuesday which rejected a parity restructuring Committee:

- it could rescind its decision by a two-thirds vote;

- it could pass a new and necessarily complex restructuring motion by majority vote.

Neither alternative is considered likely given the present state of faculty opinion.

Sunday's strike committee meeting agreed that student-administration talks were valuable, but that they did not constitute official negotiations.

Joe Young of the Young Socialists proposed that a demand for parity restructuring be made to the Board of Governors, and that Bissell or another Board member appear at a mass meeting to respond on behalf of the Board.

This motion was easily quashed and the committee agreed to continue to emphasize the "broadside" general demand for parity in the Arts and Science faculty, and await a response from the administration. Rod Hurd concluded, "It's their ball, it's their move."

While Simcoe Hall is maintaining a calm front in the present crisis, senior officers are concerned about the effects of a disciplined and widespread strike. Many of the more liberal administrators are privately sympathetic to student demands.

'Strike a traditional weapon'

By ERIC MILLS

Economics professor Melville Watkins, one of about 45 faculty attending a meeting Friday considering ways to support students, urged students to vote in favour of a strike in the referendum this Monday and Tuesday.

In an interview after the meeting, Watkins said that it was unfortunate that the strike was not immediate. However, now that there will be a vote on striking, he termed it "essential" that its seriousness be realized.

"A NO vote will be an invitation for faculty and administration to run roughshod over students indefinitely", he said. "The present impasse must be overcome by muscle and collective action".

Watkins dispelled the notion that a strike is a radical and dangerous action.

"A strike is a powerful and traditional weapon of the working class," he noted. In the present circumstances, "to imagine action (towards parity) without a strike is naive".

Because many students come from a tradition of middle class individualism, they must realize that they have to overcome this background, he said. "Students can seize power by acting collectively".

International Relations professor James Eayrs said he would not support a strike as such, and would continue to lecture if students appear at lecture times.

However, concerning parity, he claimed to be "a believer in the scientific method; I'd like to give it a try and see how it works".

Eayrs also described the Sid Smith free speech area as more civilized in its present form — with music and carpets, chairs and students spread out all over the floor — than it has been previously.

"I would like to see it this way all the time," he said.

CHUMMING UP TO "CHIMPS"

Vic's CUG suggests student-faculty parity

By BEN FORSTER

Mini-CUG, Vic's version of the now defunct U of T Commission on University Government, in its first interim report, has recommended that students make up 20 per cent of the governing body of Victoria University.

The nature of the report released Thursday, and the lengthy discussions held by the Vic Commission in 45 meetings, made it apparent that the most controversial recommendation concerns the composition of the governing body to replace the Board of Regents. The Board is presently composed almost entirely of alumni. The Anglican Church of Canada, and co-opted individuals.

The recommendation was finally formulated as percentages: 10 per cent administrators, 10 per cent to be co-opted by the new governing body as a whole, and 20 per cent each to the students, faculty, alumni and church — basically the parity with faculty that the students had wanted.

Student Commissioners had originally proposed that the faculty and students on such a governing body form an absolute majority, with students and faculty each occupying one third of the seats.

Faculty had countered this with a proposal that 50 per cent of the governing body be made up of faculty and students — but with 35 per cent of the seats going to the faculty.

The alumni and the church had both recommended a very minimal number of faculty and students.

As a result, the composition of the new board was one of the few recommendations on which not everyone on the Commission could agree. The voting record shows that one faculty Commissioner dissented, and one student abstained, when the composition of the governing body was decided upon.

The Commission felt that as the new governing body was to be a working body, rather than a rubber stamp, the size could not practically exceed forty members.

The terms of office, the report added, would be staggered, with students being elected to a two year term, the faculty to a two year term, which would be renewable once — and all others, those that the report dubbed as "external" members — holding a four year term, which would also be renewable once. Four administrative officers of Victoria University would hold seats on the governing body ex officio.

According to mini-CUG, membership on committees of the board would reflect the composition of the board itself.

Getting out the vote...

"Come on, let's vote," Al said.
"There's plenty of time," Garfield said.
"You fellows go and vote now. Annabelle and I will vote later," Tom said.
"We can all vote together," Annabelle said.
(James T. Farrell, "Getting out the Vote for the Working Class")

The mass meeting Friday afternoon began with the sounds of the Jefferson Airplane booming out "We Can Be Together" as hundreds of students crowded into every available inch of space in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall.

Radically transformed in the short space of time since Tuesday evening, the foyer — also known as the Free Speech Area — had come to look like your typical student union building. It was only the posters — with slogans, demands, announcements of upcoming events — that betrayed a sense that something out of the usual was afoot.

For complex political reasons, U of T is one of the few Canadian campuses to lack a student union building. Last week, out of the pressing need for a focal point for student activity, students spontaneously created one.

A manifesto issued by a group of architecture students summed up what was happening when it urged students to "practice architecture now on the buildings we have" and to begin to break the rules which have been built into university buildings.

And that's what the present issue is about — breaking the rules that have been built into our lives.

"My name is Bob Bossin," said Bob Bossin, popping up to the microphone at Friday's meeting, "and I think we should be good and do what we're told."

We have already broken the main rule. We have expressed our overwhelming support for the idea of student equality with faculty in making decisions about how the university is run. We did that through our massive turnout and 88.5 per cent margin in the referendum conducted last November.

The main rule still remains as it always has been — that we shall wait, patiently, for changes to be brought about from on high. By the president of the university. By the board of governors. (Perhaps.) By the faculty council, by our teachers, by our masters, by our superiors.

The argument for student parity is stated in strong and unequivocal terms in the article on the centrespread of today's Varsity. In it Gary Webster, one of four student representatives on the Commission on University Government, argues that if anyone is going to begin to change the university, to make it more aware of its social responsibilities, it will be the students.

He is right.

It is clear that "negotiations", so to speak, have broken down.

Conservative faculty have precipitated a confrontation over principle. By calling the full faculty council into session and vetoing the parity commission set up in December, the hard-line faculty have demonstrated that they will not yield any of their privileges without a struggle.

At present, one of their privileges is to sit in judgement upon themselves and to run the academic side of the university pretty much as they see fit.

It is interesting to note that those faculty who are most creative and stimulating in their teaching methods are at the same time those faculty who experience little insecurity at the thought that students might become fully involved in the running of the university.

It would be wrong for students to back down now and say we will wait for another five years or more to achieve our goals.

Men such as John Rist have made it clear that they want to "end all this nonsense about parity" and never discuss the issue again. If they can force students to back down, they will have successfully intimidated students once more with their authoritarian account of learning and education.

The only hope students have for success in the present crisis is through a form of action that will force the "proper channels" to question their own appropriateness to the situation.

Already there is talk of a compromise solution which would take into account the overwhelming opinion of students on the issue.

To vote no in this referendum means that you are willing to leave the fate of parity — and of the entire educational process — in the hands of a self-sufficient academic guild.

To vote yes means to demonstrate our determination to back up our opinions with the only weapon left to us — the strike.

If students can show solidarity in the balloting today and tomorrow, our battle will be more than half won.

A strike — a nonviolent, probably no more than symbolic action — would show that we will not allow ourselves to be intimidated into defeat.

Today is Poor People's Day of Protest

Today, Jan. 25, has been designated as a National Day of Protest for Canada's poor. Here we reprint a statement made on behalf of the Toronto organizing committee by Doris Power at the conclusion of last weekend's meeting on Quebec at the College of Education.

At 11 a.m. today in the Sid Smith foyer a speaker from the Just Society will urge U of T students to support the protest by coming to the Toronto Dominion Centre.

ARE WE GOING TO continue the charade of appearing to support those in Quebec who have begun the struggle? If that is the case, you have a rather comfortable perspective.

Recently, Toronto was the host city to a national Poor People's Conference. As poor and powerless people, we know the FLQ was not terrorizing poor people. Terrorizing poor people is the job of the government. The FLQ was terrorizing those responsible for poverty and their apologists.

If any of us truly supports the fight in Quebec, then we must discontinue public discussions and begin the very hard work of organizing ourselves and others in order to defeat that which oppresses all Canadians: the corporate power structures in this nation and North America.

A war on poverty — for us — means a war on the rich. Capitalism is my enemy. Is it yours?

What have any of us really got to lose? We have nothing to lose but robot-status within the present system which oppresses and exploits all of us.

THERE ARE TWO CHOICES. You can appear to continue to support the fight of the people of Quebec against economic exploitation and political manipulation, and then return to the comfort of your personal status quo. Or you can get with the people, who at this moment, are organizing others across Canada to continue the same struggle which is occurring in Quebec.

Stop talking to the establishment. Start listening to the people. We no longer can stomach this meaningless concern. We are asking you to start showing a real god-damned commitment.

In small groups and large numbers, we must commit ourselves to increasing acts of civil disobedience in all those varied areas within which we exist. We must also gain the analysis to understand that the divisions among us — social, political, racial and cultural — are the result of economic factors within our class-ridden society. We must overcome these divisions, or place them aside. We must come together.

THE NATIONAL POOR PEOPLE'S CONFERENCE, brought together over 400 delegates of low-income groups from across Canada who are working towards varying degrees of social change. The working poor, those on welfare, the disabled, young and old, Indian, Metis, black and white, French and English. The moderate and the militant came together in recognition of a common cause: that their lives are being controlled by a ruthless, anti-human, profit-motivated society.

A National Day of Protest has been organized for Monday, Jan. 25. A variety of actions will occur across this nation. People across this country are free to take whatever means they feel necessary to protest their poverty.

Toronto groups have come together and a committee has been set up to co-ordinate efforts in Toronto. These efforts will be focused at the Toronto-Dominion Center, a symbol of power and wealth. The action will begin at 11:30 a.m. We are seeking your participation and support. Donations may be sent to the National Protest Day Fund, 392 George St., Toronto 2.

The struggle has begun and sooner or later all Canadians will have to choose sides. They will be forced, by circumstance to do so.

WE, THE POOR, want to serve notice on the power-brokers of this country that their tucking idea of a "Canadian Dream" stinks.

For people like myself, the decision is very clear:

NO SLAVE SHOULD DIE A NATURAL DEATH.

On parity and unity...

The strike action in the Faculty of Arts and Science, if supported by a majority of the members of that faculty, will demonstrate two things: 1) that the results of the November referendum endorsing the principle of parity for the restructuring of the faculty council were not meaningless; 2) that the parity issue focusses a widespread desire among most students and a significant minority of teaching staff to work together for educational reform.

When the council of the Faculty of Arts and Science vetoed the decision to set up a parity restructuring committee, it seemed as if all existing channels to achieve a mutually acceptable solution had been closed.

However, if large numbers of students and teaching staff commit themselves to a non-violent boycott and cancellation of classes, combined with demonstrations calling for substantial action, new channels can be opened through which we will be able to act for the recognition of equal staff/student membership for the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The non-violent character of this protest will be maintained and no individual will be prevented from attending classes or labs not cancelled.

We urge all students and teaching staff to vote in the strike vote on Monday and Tuesday. We hope a clear commitment will be made to the three-day general strike.

Faculty actions deplored

As a somewhat detached observer of university politics these past few years, I feel obliged to censure the irresponsible action of those faculty members who once again cynically sabotaged efforts to reform the Faculty of Arts and Science Council, with predictable and — need I add — justified reaction from students.

Once again members of the teaching staff have frightened themselves with imaginary threats of student terrorism, banded together to proclaim spurious principles — and then went home, leaving students and administrators, janitors and campus police to clean up the wreckage of the Faculty Council.

Clearly, the large size of the Council and the overwhelming preponderance of faculty contribute to this separation of power and responsibility, and of the apparent indifference of the teaching staff to the consequences of their behaviour.

Robert H. Factor

explains Arch decision-making

There are certain inaccuracies in a Varsity piece today ("Bissell backs parity, but ends up waffling") and as you are quoted as being unable to support the "U of T architecture faculty's policy of student parity", I believe some clarification is called for.

The Council of the Faculty of Architecture, Urban and Regional Planning and Landscape Architecture has 43 staff members and 4 student members. I imagine the Varsity piece refers to the Department of Architecture which, in March 1970, established a Department Council following exactly the recommendations of the CUG Report (that is to say, a Negotiating Committee was formed and its recommendations were accepted by staff and students of the Department).

The Council has 59 members; of these, 29 are staff (all the full-time and part-time academic staff), 29 are students (officers of the Student Society and elected representatives) and one representative of the support staff.

Immediately after its inception, the Council formed a number of standing and ad hoc committees to deal with problems within the Department. These are: the personnel committee; The Curriculum Working Party; The Selection (Admissions) Procedure Working Party; The Technical Studies Working Party.

Again, the Varsity piece must refer to the work of the Personnel Committee which, in its 10 months of operation, has been charged with proposing and interviewing prospective staff members. So far, there has been one case of unsatisfactory performance by a junior staff member considered by this Committee. At no time has the Committee considered an issue of tenure. In all cases the Committee (of 3 staff members and 3 students) makes its recommendation to me and, in all cases, I make my recommendation to my Dean. (This procedure is the basis of Recommendations 2 and 5 of the CUG Report.) In all cases to date, I have been happy to endorse the Personnel Committee's recommendations.

To sum up (and to comment on my experiences), I have found that "parity" is not the issue within this Department. I have found a group of concerned people, some staff, some students, who are anxious to work very hard to improve this Department. I can add that, by and large, I find this not only helpful in the discharge of my duties, but, more importantly, exhilarating. I am certain that we have a working climate that encourages mutual respect that will lead to academic excellence.

From the Varsity piece, it is difficult to know exactly what it was you were asked to support. I hope, however, that you do support this Department in its work and working methods.

'Patience--- change will come'

I wish to make an observation on the subject of the student withdrawal from the Faculty of Arts and Science Council.

Do the students not realize that by walking-out they are rendering themselves completely ineffective? Do they not realize that a limited voice is better than no voice at all, and that change among people who don't want to change is a process that cannot happen overnight?

Change can only be brought about by continued pressure from within the organization. It may not come within the scholastic lifetime of the present agitators, but it will come.

By withdrawing, and applying pressure from outside the organization, the students are causing backs to stiffen; the result will be more hard liners, not less, and change, if it comes at all, will be very, very delayed and very, very grudging.

I do not fault the leaders of the walkout for their desire: I merely counsel patience. Too much, too soon (in the eyes of the hard-liners of Council, at least), only begets nothing — ever

Mary Chadwick

PECU urges 'yes' on strike vote

A meeting of the Political Economy Course Union Steering Committee has decided to actively support a yes vote on the strike ratification today. We hereby encourage all students in the department both to vote for and participate in a boycott of classes in support of parity.

It is a basic right that every individual have a voice in the determination of his environment. "The system" has failed to respond to this right by rejecting the clearly expressed demand for parity. One may wonder why the faculty should change the rules of the game when these rules are weighted in their favour. Why should they live up to their half of the CUG compromise? It would seem that only a minority of the faculty have the degree of democratic morality necessary to answer these questions.

Students are not monkeys and cannot be satisfied with bananas. To demonstrate this, we ask students to show that their commitment goes further than just voting for parity; that they are willing to ACT on their beliefs.

"Students are neither children nor barbarians..."

The case for student parity

This article sets forth the reasons why it is essential that students achieve parity with faculty in the decision-making bodies of the university. The central argument is that it is only students who can begin to transform the traditional university, often called "the ivory tower", into a university where the ideals of freedom and equality and relevance to social needs are the focal activities. Written by political economy graduate Gary Webster, a student member of the 1969 Commission on University Government, this article served as a basis for discussion within the Commission.

THE ASSUMPTIONS UNDERLYING this discussion are at radical variance with the conventional wisdom concerning the nature of the University of Toronto and other institutions of higher education.

It is posted that: the university is not now primarily a place of freedom but rather a place of conformity, authoritarianism, training rather than learning for the vast majority of students; that staff are not employed primarily for their qualities as "helpers in the learning process", but rather on the basis of the conservative criteria of a classic guild whose major purpose is self-preservation and self-perpetuation; that the primary interest of most staff members is not teaching but status, salary, comfort and professional advancement; that students are neither children nor barbarians to be civilized, but are sensitive, thinking adults, whose range of experience is different than, often more limited in range than, that of the teacher, but is not necessarily less valuable in the academic world for all that; that the "utilitarian" vision of the university held by some faculty as the ultimate horror is in fact an accurate description of the socializing role played today by the University.

The rhetoric of academic freedom and academic competence is a mask for just this sort of "community of scholars."

While the present University is the capstone in the process of training elites and their professional sidemen, and inculcates values which tend to alienate the "properly finished" student from the bulk of the population, the good university must be democratic in aim and form.

Its product should be a man with healthy (i.e. not elitist) attitudes toward all of his fellow citizens; with a capacity to think critically about his environment and his society, and to analyze the role which his work plays in helping or hindering the improvement of that milieu.

He should be a man who never takes the constituted authority's professions of wisdom at face value when he has the time, the interest, the personal resources to check up on its assertions.

HE SHOULD, IN SHORT, be a free and equal member of a community of free and equal men (equal with respect to political power; not to personal qualities.)

He should also be a man capable of performing some specialized social role with a measure of competence at least equal to that demanded by society as a minimum criterion for useful fulfillment of that role with the exception of teachers, and some researchers whom the University does specifically train, however, university graduates should in general be equipped with a talent for learning about and adapting to their chosen profession's job requirement, rather than given specific job skills.

GIVEN SUCH A PRESCRIPTION for a good community, there arises the question of the relationship of student involvement in teaching, hiring and promotion to the achievement or approximation of such a goal. In the ensuing discussion, equality with staff is assumed as a minimum requirement for the creation of the proper learning environment.

On almost all committees, total or majority student control could be justified on the grounds that the students alone are primarily interested in the creation of an environment where learning how to learn gets top priority. At least a parity position is also required to destroy the colonial mentality which the entire structure of education has up to now created in students (and most adults).

Free and equal men exist only in a context of equally shared power to shape the environment. After a transitional period in which the entire educational atmosphere is transformed, and teachers again become interested in teaching, the principle of equality of every staff member to every student will be perfectly acceptable.

In the transitional period, the principle of equality is best expressed through the instrument of parallel structures. The dangers to development of free men posed by a student elite are nearly as great as those created by the elitism of the faculty: thus mere parity on decision-making committees must be rejected. Joint-negotiating committees responsible to the two constituencies would work out details of agreements. This system is now in operation in PSA at Simon Fraser, in Social Science departments at Regina, in Political Science and Management at McGill.

Beyond the department level, parity on committees is the only workable solution. After the transition period, the principle of one-man-one vote should be implemented at all levels — although a representative mechanism will be needed beyond the classroom and departmental levels.

The concept of a continuum of teachers and students proposed by Professor Etkin (a faculty member of CUG) is a fruitful one, so long as it does not lend to hierarchical patterns of human relationship. Teaching is, in fact, the best stimulus to learning. The best teacher (esp. in a tutorial role) is not an older student but one's peer, as experiments at primary and secondary levels have shown. Rather than extend the teaching assistant concept, which is not a very successful one, we should stimulate a system of mutual peer education under the guidance of an experienced senior specialist. This plan could be very usefully integrated with the Friedman-Aristol plan of giving students power to purchase their own education. Part of the purchasing power provided should be pay — as recognition for their teaching role vis a vis other students — while part must be subsidy (in the case of more costly courses) and part a loan. The Friedman plan of course requires elaborate safeguards to protect non-conforming students from governments' grants Commission on which students (or people directly responsible to them) had parity would go a long way to meeting this problem.

THE POWER OF APPOINTMENT must devolve onto (1) policy committees based in the parallel principle and (2) ad hoc selection committees where decisions are made by representatives (rather than delegates) area.

There is no reason at all why students cannot get access to the same information presently available to staff on hiring committees — if the Chairman and others with relevant information will provide it. Teaching ability most certainly can be assessed here — and there is an available student input from many other universities.

One of the disgraces of the present system is that while much of our hiring is done at prominent Ivy League and State Universities, in many of which highly respected and public student evaluations are published annually, those now in charge of hiring have apparently made no effort to find out what students thought at those institutions.

If the argument is advanced that a new Professor would not want students to have a look at his dossier and we will thus lose good men, the response is that we must redefine what we mean by "good". So much of the argument against student involvement in staffing repeated ad nauseum in briefs is based on the professor's unwillingness to be seen as a human being by his students.

We must demystify the teaching role and those who are unwilling to be judged by their actual rather than by their imagined qualities will have to be dispensed with. An analogy to colonial affairs could again be made the white man took great pains never to appear in a human role before the natives.

IN THE CASE OF PROMOTIONS, the argument for equal involvement of students on a parallel structure basis is very strong. It is admitted by our most frank academics that they really know nothing about their colleagues' teaching performance. Yet the case against student involvement is usually based in arguments about the students' ability to judge one's professional contributions. This argument falls down, first, because the seniority and greater familiarity with research standards of certain students is overlooked, it is to be presumed that students, being, like staff, intelligent and concerned to put on a good show, will give a keen ear to the voices of the senior and graduate students among them who can help them to evaluate research and publications. In many cases, a mere reading of book reviews in professional journals would provide considerable enlightenment. The principle of collegueship, which is often invoked against student involvement, must simply be redefined.

Henceforth it will be necessary for faculty members to be able to get along as human beings with students as well as staff. Collegueship up to now has in any case often been used as an excuse for weeding out the non-conformist whose approaches to subject matter were often most stimulating to students. The truly destructive individual will be deprecated by students as well as faculty.

The argument that students will promote those who curry their favour seems based largely on the projection of guilt from old to young. The young are far less susceptible to the blandishments of apple-polishing than are numerous Departmental Chairmen and Senior Professors.

What has the Professor to offer the student except a stimulating learning environment? Easy grading is more often regarded with contempt than with fondness, despite the myth reigning among the professoriate. Moreover — if we de-emphasize grades what has the professor left to offer but his creative faculties?

THE MOST TELLING ARGUMENT in favour of student involvement in hiring, promotion and tenure (if we retain it) is the far greater tolerance of the young for new and challenging ideas. While the professorial establishment has a vested interest in perpetuating the values and methodology demand for which is the source of its livelihood, students are interested only in approaches which appear to clarify the subject matter and bring it into a comprehensible context.

Adaptation to the rapidly changing world of ideas can only be assured by allowing students a key voice in shaping the curriculum of the future curriculum is made by personnel, as many have testified. If there is to be an argument about fads, let us at least be frank and acknowledge that the debate is merely about replacing the fads of the late "40's" and "50's" with those of the "70's".

Student involvement may be particularly important in the coming wave of furor over Americanization of Canadian campuses. There will certainly be stormy demands for more Canadians on the staff. The contemporary professoriate has tried to pretend there is no problem, while students are well aware that it is crucial. De-Americanization for the old guard will mean the refusal to hire young Americans or to promote recent additions to staff — and the debate is often not about that type of American, while students are apt to use their power to concentrate fire on the real threat — the Americans in tenured positions who have used their influence to de-Canadianize the Canadian university.

To sum up, the radical argument here presented is that to leave control of the teaching profession in the hands of the teachers leads to the dead-end of higher education — including the physical confrontations which have laid waste many American campuses.

THAT TEACHERS HAVE LITTLE INTEREST in teaching and even less in the learning process is amply demonstrated. An American Political Science Association poll showed that teaching was the least of ten factors considered relevant for promotion. Graduate schools, which train our professors, spend all their time professionalizing and none in inculcating approaches to teaching and learning.

Those who associate with professors on a basis of relative equality know that teaching is the last thing they discuss. Salaries, publications, status, vacations, tenure and retirement are uppermost in their conversations.

Students alone can save teaching for the taught, and make the university a place in which freedom, equality and the relevance to reality are permanent values.

Craighton blasts U.S. materialism

By DEBBIE BALTMAN

Canadian historian, Donald Craighton has suggested that Canadians chuck the idea of U.S. growth economics, and go back to a subsistence living.

Craighton was speaking at Hart House last Tuesday evening.

Craighton cited as an example the youth movement which has abandoned the only religion the American leaders know — the religion of bigger cars, houses, etc.

"Ever since Mackenzie King, our subordination to the U.S. has increased, until today we've become a cultural colony," said Craighton, although he could offer no helpful solutions in order to save our present day economy from a complete U.S. takeover.

Craighton then went on to say that in the past, "the hideous imbalance of North America has only been corrected by the alliance of Great Britain with Canada, and in opposition to the U.S."

Craighton also said that if we continue to allow the U.S. to drain our northern resources, we will turn into a "pretty miserable people."

Our mistake

A printing error in Friday's edition changed part of the substance of a statement by physics professor Jim Prentice in the Write on column.

In the fourth paragraph of his statement the phrase "constructive and ineffective" should have read "constructive and effective."

Selectivity in research advocated

Science Council Chairman and U of T Chancellor Omand Solandt has recommended cutbacks in basic research not directed towards "national goals."

"We should be more selective and more generous with the scientists that we support in the area of intellectual research," he stated. Solandt added that although basic research is important, Canada's science policy must be directed to national goals.

Solandt did not elaborate on the nature of these goals.

The Chancellor also wants to see a Social Science Council set up as an advisory body parallel to the Science Council (which includes only members from the natural sciences and engineering).

A Social Science Council would not include political scientists, said Solandt, noting that one "had to draw the line somewhere."

Solandt, who has recently resigned as vice-president of ERCO, a company held responsible for dead fish in Newfoundland and dead cattle in Dunnville, had nothing to say about pollution.

One engineer in the audience said that although he has been trying for years, he has made no progress with Ottawa. He has an invention that can soak up sea slicks as quickly as they are spilled.

Solandt agreed that Ottawa has proven itself "not a very good manager."

Solandt also complained about the poor communication between government, universities and industry. He suggested one solution: the government should give industry money that can be spent only on work done within universities.

Guelph trims Blues 82-61

Blues' lanky forward Dave Watt (53) passes safely over the arms of Guelph's star guard Mark Walton (35) into the waiting arms of teammate Bill Boston (52). Blues lost 82-61.

By PETER WHITE

The Guelph Gryphons coolly disposed of a game, but easily out-classed Varsity team at Hart House Saturday night, 82-61.

Playing to their smallest home crowd of the season, Blues simply could not get enough offence together to make a contest of it.

On this night, Blues employed a three guard offence in an attempt to overcome their previous punchless performances (70, 50, 68 points). Still they came up empty. Shot after shot danced off the rim and into the hands of Guelph's strong defenders.

Except for the flair of Ron Voake this Varsity game was a bore. Voake seemed well on the way to confirming Guelph coach Garney Henley's contention that someone is going to get "killed" playing in Hart House. While Voake didn't quite verify Henley's prediction, he did establish a new Toronto record for 'court falls' in running up a total of 12. (First known count of such falls was taken Saturday night — nice to have something to keep up the interest).

Besides this daring, Voake proved (after several mediocre games) the superiority of his basketball skills. Driving and shooting, either lefty or righty, he led Blues with 19 points. He'd have had more were the officials not blind to the fouls he should have drawn on many of his dashes to the board.

The rest of the Blues played pretty much as they have all year — not well.

It's going to be a long month before their season ends at Mc-

Master. Maybe other things will end then also. Two such disasters as this season and last warrant some new thinking on a change in Varsity's crumbling basketball establishment.

BLUES SCORING: Barker 4, Trafford 11, Braid 6, Voake 19, Evans 1, Boston 6, Watt 12, Caskey 4.

Benson Bldg. program registration to start

A new program of skill, instruction and recreation in athletics for women has been introduced this year at the Benson Building.

With the deletion of the Required Physical Education Regulation from the concerns of the Board of Governors, the Department of Women's Athletics have extended their offerings to encompass all women in the University community.

These offerings include instruction in more than twenty activities and cover all levels of skill. Elective courses run for only six weeks at a time, and written recognition for participation is provided on request.

The third six-week instructional unit is scheduled to begin on February 1 with registration this Wednesday and Thursday. All women in the University community including graduates are eligible to join at an extremely nominal fee (undergraduates free).

Varsity swim teams star in weekend action

By PAUL CARSON

Alter defeats in hockey, tencing and basketball, Double Blue successes in weekend action depended on the exploits of the two Varsity swim teams.

Both squads responded to the challenge with crushing victories over none other than the University of Waterloo Warriors.

The Waterloo Invitational on Friday night was really two meets in one as the U.S. powerhouses Arizona and Michigan State were in a class by themselves, while the Bluettes and Waterloo conducted their own private war for third place.

With a lot of help from Merrily Stratten, our side came out best 134-113.

A member of the Canadian team at the 1970 World Student Games, Merrily shocked the Waterloo crowd by establishing meet and pool records in winning the 100, 200 and 400-yard freestyles.

Sweetest win of the lot was the 200, as she defeated Arizona's Digidie Blain, a member to the 1968 U.S. Olympic team.

Randy Croome placed sixth in the 50-yard backstroke and the Varsity gals also picked up valuable points in the diving as Leslie O'Brien took a third and a fifth, Andrea Kensman an eighth, and Ainslie Grey a tenth.

Saturday night, the men's team demoralized the hapless Warriors 83-30. Stroking through the hyper-chlorinated lanes at the Bensun Building, Blues simply had too much talent and desire for the hopelessly over-matched visitors from Animal U.

Blues won ten of eleven races and might have smashed two OQAA records if Alex Fedko hadn't died (figuratively) and if co-captain Mike Guinness had been sicker (literally).

Way ahead in his specialty — the 200-yard butterfly — Fedko took dead aim on the OQAA record of 2:06.2 with an amazing 100-yard split of 57.8; alas, as the new record seemed almost in his grasp, smiling Alex ran out of gas in the last ten yards and had to settle for 2:08.

Guinness shouldn't have been at the pool at all. Fighting a serious case of the flu, he wasn't expected to be a factor in the 200-yard freestyle. Swimming almost entirely on desire, he stunned Warriors by recording a victory in 1:52.0; the OQAA record is only 1:50.5!

If Guinness manages to stay sick till the OQAA finals in late February, Blues could add to their accumulation of seven league and seven more CIAU records.

Although he didn't win any events, the most hopeful Varsity performance came from rookie Alex Lau who recorded two strong second place finishes in the diving.

Lau, a slender freshman engineer, has been diving seriously only six or seven months but may be Blues first serious contender off the boards in many years. Waterloo's Lester Newby took the one and three-meter events but Lau's steady improvement contributed six unexpected points to Blues' total.

"As with most inexperienced divers, Alex must work on his consistency," said Varsity diving coach Jim Lacosse after the meet. "If he hadn't missed a couple of crucial dives, he might have won both events."

Lau's best dive? "Without doubt, anything involving a twist."

"Alex has a lot of work ahead of him, but he'll be an important member of our team," Lacosse added.

Varsity's big guns had another good night, and only coach Robin Campbell's humanitarian tendencies kept the score from reaching 85 or 90.

Besides the 200 fly, Fedko anchored the 400 medley relay win and just out-touched John Twohig in the 50-yard freestyle; both were timed in 22.8.

Backstroker Jim Shaw was the only other individual winner in two events as he easily took his specialty at 200 yards and also romped thru the 200-yard individual medley.

Ross Ballantyne added Blues other individual victory, taking the 200-yard breaststroke about four seconds off the OQAA record.

Distance man Terry Bryon won the 1000-yard freestyle and promising rookie Jock MacRae was the official winner in the 100 free as the Waterloo winner was ineligible.

Varsity's Ross Ballantyne churns towards his victory in the 200-yard breaststroke.

SWIMSTUFF . . . Blues (natch) won both relays with Twohig, MacRae, Bryon and Fedko in the freestyle and Barry Bowerman, Bob Heatley, Twohig, and Russ Farquhar in the medley . . . next weekend the team travels to Michigan for meets with Univ. of Michigan and Univ. of Eastern Michigan; the results will probably be Blues only losses of the season as Michigan is ranked sixth in U.S. and EastMich is close behind . . . only disappointment Saturday was as usual the size of the crowd — about 95 — . . . take away girl friends, wives, highschoolers, and misdirected basketball nuts and you have about three dozen swimming fans from Varsity's 27,000 students . . . hardly adequate support for a championship team.

Waterloo hands hockey Blues 3-1 setback

By LYNDON LITTLE

Lite as Canada's defending national college hockey champs is never easy.

If you're ever beaten, the fans of the victorious team immediately claim they're the new No. 1. After all, we've beaten the best haven't we!

Already this season, Blues have made No. 1s out of Loyola, York and Windsor. Friday night, they added the Waterloo Warriors to their growing list.

The 3-1 loss at Waterloo before 2,500 hyperecstatic fans, leaves Blues one game behind the Warriors in the all-important loss column. Provided both teams win all the other games, Blues can still finish first with a win over the Warriors on February 17 at Varsity Arena. A tie will do no good.

Two early penalties, to Dave McDowall for a high stick at 1:05 and to Bill L'Heureux for slashing at 3:12, set Blues back on the defensive right from the start of the game and they never really recovered. While L'Heureux was off, Warrior's Dave Farago scored the first of his two goals to send Waterloo on their way to victory.

The Warriors broke the struggle wide open midway through the second frame with two quick markers. Farago's second of the night and one by Bob by Bauer Jr.

Left-winger Bill Buba registered Blues' only score on a speedy dash down the wing early in the third.

Defensively, Blues were reasonably sound. Offensively, however, all three forward combinations lacked effective punch. They never really tested Waterloo netminder Ian Young who looked much steadier than he did in the December 9 game at Varsity Arena.

The Warriors have made two noticeable improvements in the team which Blues defeated 7-4 in the OQAA finals last year. Young, their amazing one-eyed goaltender, has given them dependable netminding and, what's more, they now appear to have the depth in personnel to ice an excellent third line.

Buba's goal was his sixth in his last four games and his 14th of the season, one less than club leader John Wright.

Danny McCann, who has been playing regularly since the post-Windsor shakeup, was Blues' most dangerous forward.

Blues play in Guelph tomorrow evening then get an opportunity to make amends for their 2-0 loss to York in the Hockey Canada Tournament when they host the Yeomen at Varsity Arena Friday night.

The Varsity — Francois Reber

In one of their few good scoring chances, Blues' Scott Seagriss slips puck through Young's legs and wide of post.

STRIKE BALLOT FAILS BY 54 VOTES; Action meeting called for 10 a.m. today

Record turnout in close vote

By LINDA McQUAIG

A strike referendum in Arts and Science has failed by 54 votes.

A record 66.5% of the 13,000 students in Arts and Science voted over the past two days in an unprecedented turn-out at U of T.

The results were followed by an evening of confusion.

At a SAC executive meeting immediately following the results, there was considerable debate over whether the Erindale results should be included in the total vote. It had been stipulated by the Student Administrative Government at Erindale that these students would not be bound by the results of the overall vote.

The SAC executive voted in favour of including the Erindale results, which opposed the strike 499-407.

SAC External Affairs Commissioner Vince Dolan said that the results were invalidated due to voting irregularities. Dolan charged that 63 ballots from SMC had no names on them, and many more were not initialled by the polling clerk.

Cliff Jenkins, SAC Returning Officer, said that the voting at Sid Smith had been "an incredible screw-up" in which voter registration lists had been scrambled around among the ballot boxes.

A decision was reached that the votes should be recounted, but Jenkins has said that the recount cannot take place before the weekend.

Peter Hall, SAC University Commissioner noted that: "Both the turn-out and the yes-vote were much larger than I expected. I think we should remember that students have already overwhelmingly supported the principle of parity in the November referendum. And the important thing to remember today is that we are only divided on the tactics."

"I don't know what to say," said Classics professor and parity opponent J. M. Rist. "I'm fairly pleased. I wasn't impressed with the idea of a strike; I thought it was rather stupid. I expected the vote to turn out in favour of striking, and I am surprised and pleased."

Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen said the vote demonstrated student concern about the university.

"Very interesting," said History professor W. H. Nelson of the referendum results. "I rather expected those in favour (of a strike) to win."

When asked if he were pleased by the results, he said, "I couldn't honestly say I'm very pleased with anything that's happened all year."

SAC president Rod Hurd said the referendum results gave no mandate for a student strike. He attributed the large pro-strike vote at Scarborough to their concentration on the educational aspects of the issue.

Wildcat strike action planned

In spite of the narrow defeat of the strike ballot, it looks like strike action is still on the order of the day for the arts and science faculty.

Meeting late last night in Sidney Smith Hall, the group of more than 100 students active in organizing for the two-day ballot, decided to spend the night preparing for a strike to begin this morning.

They are asking that today's 10 a.m. meeting be considered a mass meeting to plan tactics for the strike.

"We are on strike," a statement released last night said, "and we have the support of nearly 4,000 students."

"It is a non-violent action which includes a voluntary boycott of classes, but that will not obstruct students from attending them . . ."

"Our attack is not directed against the students, but against the faculty and administration who have denied us a voice in our own education."

Talk of more militant action — such as barring access to the office of arts and science dean A. D. Allen, just around the corner from the Sid Smith Free Speech Area — gained wide approval as a tactic, but action was put off until after this morning's meeting.

No mandate, says Bissell

Following announcement of the referendum results, U of T President Claude Bissell issued a brief statement.

"The results of the vote," he said, "make it clear there is no mandate for a strike."

He appealed for a resumption of debate on the issue of the structure of the faculty council "in a spirit of patience, tolerance and understanding."

"We face complex issues," he continued, "which cannot be resolved in terms of opposing absolutes."

"Fundamental change can come only if it has widespread support in the total academic community."

Anti-strikers fizzle out

Too few students and no faculty caused a potential student faculty anti-strike coalition to fizzle out.

A meeting called by Howard Feldman on Monday at University College was attended by about nine students. Feldman reported that W. H. Nelson had stated that he would be willing to compromise "on a few small issues."

Originally called to discuss the possibility of a coalition it was dominated by a vocal anarchist who declared any political action irrelevant. After half an hour the students started to leave and the chairman adjourned the meeting.

No further action is contemplated.

Arrests made at immigration protest

Four professors from various Ontario Universities and three University of Toronto students were arrested at 7:30 last night during a sit-in at the Department of Immigration on University Avenue.

The seven were later released, with no charges being laid for the time being.

The demonstration was called by Carleton Professor Robin Mathews (one of those arrested) to demand that the Federal government place a temporary ban on visas for non-Canadian professors.

Those arrested were: Mathews, Professor George Haggart of the University of Waterloo, Gail Dexter, lecturer at Ryerson and a York University faculty member; U of T students Larry Haiven, Greg Keilty and Pat Keilty (all members of the Canadian Liberation Movement) were also arrested.

Seventy-five students marched across the campus and down University Avenue with Mathews, Haggart and Haiven at the head of the crowd.

The demonstrators entered the Immigration Office and asked to speak to the Toronto area director to present their demands. His immediate response was to call the police.

The police dragged the demonstrators out of the office and the sit-in continued in the lobby. An information table was set up to talk to prospective immigrants. The demonstrators made it clear that they are not opposed to immigrants in general but only to those are aiding in the take-over of Canada — such as the vast majority of U.S. professors in our universities.

Some in the building came to the table, expressed their support and signed the petition of an 85% Canadian Quota. Rallies were held throughout the afternoon.

At 7:15 p.m., the building owners demanded that the demonstrators leave. During a meeting to decide on this, George Haggart pointed out that if they went along with this, then it would mean that private landlords would have the right to decide whether the Canadian people can speak to what is supposed to be our government.

When the demonstrators refused to leave, re-inforcements arrived from the Metro emergency task force and a paddy wagon drew up in front of the building.

Demonstrators were dragged and carried bodily from the building and the five arrested men were thrown into the paddy wagon — but the two women were given "special" treatment and driven to the station in the back of police cruiser.

The protest climaxed an emotional rally held in the Sid Smith Free Speech Area, in which Mathews and Haggart, spoke. The rally was sponsored by the 85% Canadian Quota Campaign, which calls for a nationwide quota for Canadian citizens in Canadian Universities.

Mathews denounced the large number of non-Canadians, especially Americans, in Canadian graduate schools and faculties.

"We have sell-out administration," said Mathews. He cited the example of Loyola College in Quebec, where 100% of the history and classics faculty are American. At Waterloo there are only two Canadian philosophy teachers in the department of over 20. At our own U of T, the English departments operate only one graduate course in Canadian literature out of 106.

The sell-out is nation-wide. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics quoted by Mathews, only 56% of faculty in Canadian universities are Canadian. In Ontario, 44% of PhD students are non-Canadians.

Most university administrators and faculty are irrelevant in the crisis of this American takeover of Canadian universities, said Mathews.

The Carleton professor offered proposals to keep Canadian universities Canadian. He demanded two moratoriums, the first on the hiring of non-Canadian faculty, the second on the admission of all non-Canadian graduate students.

Engineers back parity strike

by SUTHERLAND BROWN

It Arts and Science students begin to strike for parity on Wednesday, they will have the support of Engineering student leaders.

The Engineering Society Executive voted eleven to seven Tuesday night to endorse "equal student participation in the affairs of U of T" and "non-destructive student action in the Faculty of Arts and Science" in the attempt to achieve parity.

SAC representative John Brower, in making the motion, pointed out that most engineers take at least one Arts and Science course, and that the question of effective student participation in decision making is one facing all faculties.

Earlier the executive had heard Engineering faculty council representatives complain of the frustrations of the minority position on their council.

When Brower referred to "non-destructive student action", Toike Oike editor Brian Leatham shouted, "There's a lot of red paint splashed around Sid Smith." "That's what happens at the slave auction too," countered Engineering Society President Mike Sefton.

Opponents of the motion claimed that the Arts and Science strike was a "moral issue" outside the responsibility of the executive. One engineer in the audience said, "You've got no right to speak for me."

Sefton summed up the majority position by stressing the importance of involvement in educational issues to the role of the Engineering executive.

While he did not support parity as a rigid doctrine, or as essential in the Engineering faculty, he felt that parity was for Arts and Science students "the only way to equal and active participation."

No penalties in Geography

The Geography Departmental Council unanimously agreed Tuesday afternoon that "no academic penalty will be incurred by students" boycotting geography classes in support of a strike.

Faculty will interpret whether "no penalty" involves cancelling classes, repeating lectures, or discussing the strike in class.

Poor hit Big Business in Day of Protest

By BOB GAUTHIER

The offices of E.P. Taylor's Argus Corporation and a downtown welfare office were occupied Monday, following a protest at the Toronto-Dominion Centre of over 500 people.

The protest was organized against unemployment, inadequate housing, low wages, poor working conditions, and the poverty of six million Canadians. Carrying placards with slogans such as "Give People Work, not Welfare", "Up the Ass of the Ruling Class", and "Trudeau: Big Wheel Behind Manure Spreader", the protestors marched in a circle around the Toronto-Dominion Centre.

Fighting erupted when a Maoist tried to tape a sign reading "Organize National War Against U.S. Imperialism" 75 plain clothes uniformed and motorcycle police appeared to stop the fight. Three people were arrested for obstructing police and causing a disturbance.

Speakers at the T-D Centre, Rabbi Abraham Feinberg and welfare recipient Doris Powers emphasized that the protest was only part of a nation-wide protest and warned that future actions would not be as non-militant as a demonstration.

Organizer Steve Penner then urged the crowd to march two blocks along King Street to the building of the Argus Corporation, E.P. Taylor's holding company.

Demonstrators poured into the Argus building until a police cordon prevented further entry. While the crowd outside held an open forum of speakers which included U of T economics professor Mel Watkins, the delegation inside presented a list of demands to an officer of Argus.

The demands statement identified the enemy as "the corporate power structure" and blamed it for "cycles of inflation, large-scale unemployment, and continuing, expanding poverty. The corporations have exploited both people and resources for the sole purpose of making large profits without regard for human needs."

"In response to this threat against human lives, we have singled out one individual whose enterprises — vast in number — are sheltered under the name Argus Corporation. The individual is Edward Plunkett Taylor. In the weeks to come, other individuals and corporations will be chosen to answer to the community. In the past we have passively allowed them to exploit us for far too long. Now, we are ready to tight back."

The statement demanded that Taylor hold a meeting to discuss the contribution Argus Corporation must make toward 24-hour day-care centres, free community-controlled health clinics, and alternative methods of education."

The delegation also demanded that, "a positive reply be available to us by February 10, or militant actions will be instituted against Mr. Taylor's holdings." They did not say what these would be.

The delegation then returned to the larger group which marched to a welfare office on Adelaide Street. Some protestors entered the welfare office and said they would wait in the building until everyone who was waiting for a cheque received one.

George Romanson, district welfare administrator asked the protestors to leave the office so business could continue. The protestors replied with complaints about the degradation of seeking assistance through the welfare office, and the long line-ups for welfare cheques.

The protestors remained in the office waiting room and lobby for four hours. At 6:30 p.m., two hours after the regular closing time, the protestors left the building. They said that their objective had been achieved.

About 40 demonstrators later marched to Queen's Park where they burned the General Welfare Assistance Act as a symbol of their dissatisfaction with the unemployment and welfare situation. A spokesman said they would return to the welfare office on Adelaide Street.

"True, the students of the University have no voice in its management.

"And, therefore it might seem vain and presumptuous for them to enter upon a discussion which can bear no immediate fruit.

"However, the future is at least as real a consideration as the present, and where is the future hope of the University if not in the young men who eventually must come to the direction of its affairs?"

Strike vote solves nothing

The confusion and contradictions in the stories that appear on the front page of today's Varsity accurately reflect the outcome of the two-day referendum which has just been completed.

Some insist that in a democracy, it is the rule of the majority that ultimately wins the day. The 54-vote margin which the 'nays' managed to garner, they say, means that the game is over and their fellow 4,000 students, who wanted to strike, should forget about it.

A second reaction expressed last night was that the outcome of the referendum was meaningless — and that the whole idea of the referendum was a silly one in the first place.

Others — the students at Scarborough, the strike committee which met late last night after the results came out — say they have enough support to launch a strike — and win.

In all this brouhaha over how to interpret the results of the balloting, we must not forget to take a good look at what the results actually mean.

First, the November referendum. Two months ago students voted overwhelmingly (88.5%) in favour of the principle of parity. There is no doubt that student support for parity has only swelled in the course of the events since then. There can be no question that students still see parity as the only way of achieving a new kind of community at this university, one entirely based upon mutual respect and co-operation between teacher and student, and on an understanding of the university's role in resolving urgent social problems.

Secondly, the results of last night.

Claude Bissell, in a tersely worded but obviously relieved statement last night, pointed out that there was "no mandate" for strike action at his university.

He forgets that does not mean that there is no problem.

And when he appeals for students to resume discussion on the faculty council, he forgets that the faculty council has closed discussion itself.

Not only did the faculty council decide last week, as a matter of principle, to veto parity on a simple advisory body, but it has also gone ahead as if students were no longer to be involved in any of its decisions.

A meeting of the general committee of the faculty council, set for this coming Monday, was not advertised to any of the student members of the council. These are the students who have withdrawn from the council, as they were required to by the referendum of November.

The result of the strike vote is an impasse. The upcoming recount, which might reverse the decision, will not matter.

A "return to business as usual at U of T would mean to give up any hope of effecting significant changes in the nature of the university anytime in the next five years — perhaps longer.

A return to business as usual is simply not a possible alternative to those students who voted to support their belief in parity with a symbolic three-day strike action.

It remains their responsibility to show, through mass action, their intention to stand by their vote.

We believe that those students who chose either not to vote or not to support a strike, should seriously reconsider their decision. By joining in with their fellow students and faculty in strike action, they can still do so.

For those who wish to strike, it is essential that they take command of their own affairs into their own hands — and do so now.

STRIKE

In 1895 U of T students went on strike — for the first time (and won)

Here we reprint an account of U of T's first — and so far only — student strike. This article is an abridged version of an account written for the 75th anniversary issue of The Varsity in 1955 by Ion Montagnés, then a Varsity staffer and now a projects co-ordinator for the University of Toronto Press.

A MASS STUDENT strike on the University of Toronto campus 60 years ago (now more than 75 years ago — ed.) struck a blow for freedom of the student press and, incidentally, raised one of Canada's most controversial political figures to early prominence — or shame.

When young William Lyon Mackenzie King called for a general boycott of all lectures at an excited protest meeting in 1895, he was greeted by loud cheers.

Yet a few days later, according to some of his classmates, he had been "sent to Coventry" — ostracized — for being among the first to break the strike and attend lectures.

Thus the man who held Canada's prime ministership for more than 20 years was first dubbed by his enemies "The Great Compromiser."

KING'S LEADERSHIP — and reported defection — were only part, however, of a turbulent storm which broke over the campus early that year and ended only after the Ontario government appointed a Royal Commission to investigate alleged university mismanagement.

Before it was over, one editor of The Varsity had been forced to resign and his successor had been expelled. A popular professor who took his students' side had been dismissed. The university council had been attacked for tyranny, hypocrisy, bigotry and nepotism.

And for nearly a week the corridors of University College had been packed with agitated students while professors lectured to empty or near-empty halls.

If King, as some say, was the villain of the piece, the hero was undoubtedly Jim Tucker, a slim fourth year arts student with a flair for poetry. As editor of a Varsity which refused to kneel down and print an apology demanded by the university council, he became the symbol of student resistance.

THE FALL OF 1894 was a troubled one on the University of Toronto campus.

As classes opened, whispered charges of nepotism filled the air. George M. Wrong, the Chancellor's son-in-law (and later internationally famous as an historian) had just been appointed Professor of English History.

Dissident staff members and downtown papers were quick to pick up the family relationship, connecting it with rumours that it had taken only 15 minutes to choose Wrong for the job from among several applicants.

TUCKER LISTED THE CHARGES in an editorial without judging them either true or false. He asked only that, if false, the university issue a formal denial.

Two weeks later The Varsity again called for an official statement. It was to remain disappointed.

Rumour had it that The Varsity had been ordered by authority to change its tack.

Tucker laughed at such suggestions, said there had been no attempt to muzzle the paper, nor was one likely.

As if to prove his point, he immediately launched a fierce attack against incompetent faculty members, demanding their dismissal if the university was not to be known as a "Home for the Helpless."

The paper also continued its campaign for increased provincial grants, but took time off to discuss the growth of college spirit and the desirability of holding the annual conversation in the college building.

When the new term opened in January 1895, Tucker, according to custom, turned the editorship over to another staffer, J. Montgomery.

BEFORE MONTGOMERY was more than settled in the guiding seat, a new crisis arose on the campus. The university council had banned a meeting of the political science association — just formed that year — at which two prominent laborites were to speak.

Official reason for the cancellation was that neither the council nor the head of the political science department had been asked to approve of the speakers.

"A decidedly lame reason," jeered The Varsity. It quoted reports that the meeting was really suppressed, "because of the unorthodox religious views of the speakers."

RETRIBUTION WAS SWIFT. Montgomery was ordered to appear before President James Loudon. The upshot was an apology which acknowledged the inadvisability of some of the editorial statements, admitted one error in fact — but made no major retraction. Montgomery promised to print it.

He did not reckon, however, with his colleagues on the Varsity staff. Backed by popular student sentiment, they refused to print any apology. To do so, they said, would compromise the principle of free discussion for which they were fighting.

Montgomery's only course was to resign. Tucker was given his old job back.

Because he also refused to publish the apology, Tucker was suspended from all lectures indefinitely.

But this did not stop him. Some 200 students gathered to hear Tucker promise to continue the fight, even if it meant expulsion.

A PETITION BEGAN CIRCULATING asking the Ontario government to investigate student complaints.

The students also promised to support Tucker financially at another university, should he be expelled.

As a fierce debate raged in the pages of the downtown daily press over the two issues, there was little action on campus.

Tucker and seven other students presented their petition for an investigation to Education Minister G. W. Ross. It bore 500 signatures, more than half the student body at U of T at that time.

ON THE MORNING OF FEB. 16, word spread that Prof. Dale, a history professor who had supported some of The Varsity's questions publicly, had been dismissed.

Students stood about the corridors, heatedly discussing this treatment of a favourite professor. Few went to classes.

About 11:30 a.m. Dale entered the building and was surrounded by a cheering crowd.

That afternoon, as President Loudon lay sick at home, the college campus was almost deserted.

ALMOST EVERY STUDENT — 700 of them — had jammed into Wardell's Hall on Spadina Ave.

Loud applause greeted Tucker when he climbed to the platform to urge concerted action. There were cheers, too, when it was announced that one of Dale's faculty colleagues, F. B. R. Helms, had resigned in protest.

But the most prominent speaker of the day, judging by contemporary reports, was Billy King.

Anyone could see that students were forbidden to criticize the university, cried King angrily. Now the faculty could not state the student case either. All they asked was that their charges be investigated.

He himself, King added, would not graduate at Toronto unless there were an investigation. He would be ashamed of an institution which dismissed a professor for such a cause.

IT WAS KING, ALSO, who first called for a general boycott of all lectures until Dale's dismissal had been reconsidered or a Royal Commission granted.

His resolution was seconded by Tom (later Sir Hamar) Greenwood. As a prominent British politician, Greenwood was to return to Toronto in 1938 to receive an honorary degree from the same university.

The motion passed unanimously. The next day was Saturday. There were few lectures scheduled — and for those no one appeared.

On Monday, the corridors of University College were alive with students, but classrooms remained empty. Professors either cancelled their classes or gave token lectures to two or three persons.

THE HANDFUL WHO DID ATTEND lectures met no opposition from the strikers. Many students spent the strike days in the library or gymnasium.

The second day a few more people attended lectures — sometimes live or eight would be seen in a classroom.

That day, too, science students were warned they might be barred from the use of labs, if they continued to skip lectures. Some coeds said they had received letters from the President threatening expulsion if they were caught persuading other students to join the strike.

As if to whip up any flagging spirits The Varsity appeared that morning with a special "Mourning" issue bordered in black.

Tucker's editorial was vitriolic. "Here, in this year of grace 1895, we behold the university torn by dissension rent in twain by the fatuous policy of selfish, small-minded men."

"And the tragic aspect of the matter is that he who would dare to speak out, must be willing to sacrifice himself before the blind hatred of those who are determined to rule though the heavens fall!"

On Wednesday afternoon the strike was called off. President Loudon offered to meet a student committee to discuss grievances, and after more than three hours of discussion, the students finally agreed.

THE NEXT MONDAY, when the Ontario legislature convened, after its summer holiday, the government promised a Royal Commission study of the university. It was quick to point out, however, that the commission was requested by Dr. Loudon and not a result of the strike.

U.C. girls at Vic

We have just had the pleasure of attending the Vic Winter Carnival. It certainly was one of the most appalling displays of college spirit. One event after another was cancelled since practically no one showed up to participate.

Perhaps one of the reasons was the fault of poor advertising. The fact that we, two University College students, appeared to take part in the pancake-eating contest and were the only participants is indicative that even Vic students were not aware nor interested in their own carnival. By the way, exactly five Vic students came as spectators for that cancelled event and they were shocked by our intention to be participants.

The lack of organization was also quite apparent when we inquired as to the place of the pancake eating contest, they appeared to be unaware that such an event was planned. We were finally told that it was to be held somewhere between Burwash Hall and Wymilwood. After making several trips to each site, the few students who were supposedly organizing the event decided calmly that there would be no contest.

What we have just described applies also to the toboggan races, snow sculpturing, broomball tournaments, and we were also told that even the house parties failed to materialize. Rather disgusting for a university with so much prestige. We suggest the people at Vic visit the University of Guelph Winter Carnival.

This will do just nicely

Sirs:

I heard that in the course of your hectic production night, what with driving through snowstorms and waiting for late-breaking election results, you did not have quite enough copy to fill page 6.

In order to help you in this dilemma, I have composed this submission to the write on: column in the hope that it will give you comfort.

Yours sincerely,

Parity on all bodies?

The reason the faculty council voted down the committee to implement parity was that the issue has come to be understood as parity on every decision-making body or nowhere. Those faculty who voted against the committee believed that once any body was established on an equal basis every other body would be so constituted — and student militants have been pushing this too. Reconstitution of decision-making groups should not be made on this assumption.

Certain areas must have a majority of faculty (hiring, firing, promotion, tenure); others should have majorities of students; others, administrators; others should have parity. Unless this is recognized as the realistic solution at this time, many faculty and students will remain polarized and hostile. A strike will only add bitterness to an already destructive atmosphere.

A negotiating group of students and faculty who endorse a revised structure should meet with conservative faculty and hammer out the realistic solution which I have suggested, and which many support. Students should write Negotiate on their referendum ballots to show agreement to the solution stated herein. Not a fist, but an open hand.

'Food Science plays vital role in fight for human ecology'

We would once again like to draw your attention to the proposed action by the Administration of the University of Toronto to phase out the Faculty of Food Sciences.

This is a drastic action we wish to oppose for the following reasons:

- Financial reasons have been cited as the basis for such a proposal but the Food Sciences Faculty has already cut its budget by the 15% the Administration has asked for, and will expand their programme without further expenditure.

- While we realize the significance of economic factors in such a matter, we feel that they are outweighed by the contributions of the faculty to the community, the province, and the nation. In a time of massive concern for health and human ecology, our faculty is playing and will play a most significant role. It is unique in that it deals with the scientific aspects of man's basic needs, namely those of food, clothing and shelter.

We shall not continue at length to reiterate the arguments for our existence.

We ask only that you become alerted to this situation; that if you are concerned, to voice your opinion on such a distressing matter.

'Star editorial gave distorted impression'

Toronto Daily Star denounces Claude Bissell as a militant!

This is just one of the glaring inaccuracies and confused statements in the Star's lead editorial last Friday.

The editorial represented the demand for parity with faculty as that of only a small group of "militants". It ignores the vast majority of students who voted for it on the referendum and it ignores the fact that Claude Bissell recommended parity in the CUG report. Then it states that the demand for parity is "so that students will have a veto power over curriculum and the appointment and promotion of professors." Of course, parity does not mean a veto power; and, the Faculty Council has no control over the appointment and promotion of professors. That is a department matter.

By stating that we are the "consumers" of the institution's teaching, the Star reveals a frighteningly immature view of what an education is. Education is not and never can be a commodity. It is a uniquely individual enriching and developing process.

The editorial continues implying that we want to decide questions like the hiring and firing of professors.

By comparing this movement to that of Sir George Williams the Star attempts to appeal the emotions of her readers with an entirely different situation. Such tactic is an example of yellow journalism at its best.

Rambling on, the editorial attempts to take in the broader issue of university government. Here it quickly devastates its own denunciation of parity by recommending student parity with faculty in a body to replace the Senate and the Board of Governors.

Such an editorial demonstrates that the Star was completely void of any intelligence on the issues. Their research was obviously nil since a visit down to Sidney Smith would have corrected all the inaccuracies. Getting your story straight is the first lesson one learns in high school journalism; one wonders why the Star has yet to learn it. And one wonders how many other "stories" are similarly researched.

The voice of the swan

No-one would suppose because the voice of the swan is heard only once in his lifetime, that the rest of the time he does not exist. Similarly, just because conservative students rarely are heard from is no reason to assume they are not there.

There will always be a radical voice. Change is the nature of things, and the people who help bring it about — for better or worse, will always be around. Given the foregoing, there will always be an audible response from the reactionaries — again either good or bad depending upon where you stand.

But at the same time, there exists now, and possibly at all times, at least one other voice which should be recognized even when silent. The conservative student exists! For his own reasons; political lethargy, academic preoccupation, contentment with the status quo, conviction in the utility of upheaval, deafness or stupidity, he is not involved with either radicals or reactionaries. In the hubbub of "rights" being sought and defended, it should be remembered that students who would like to carry on with their business, without their non-participation being interpreted by either side, should be entitled to that "right".

'Students are not irrational power-mongers'

By STEVE GRANT

A Victoria College graduate now enrolled in Law at U of T, Steve Grant was one of the four elected student members of the Commission on University Government.

The vote being held today in Arts and Science has been a long time coming. Two years have elapsed since the Commission on University Government first started meeting and over a year has gone by since its Report was distributed. Though it was made abundantly clear that the Report was a compromise, nonetheless, I found faculty reaction and student lack of action to be overpowering, even to a calm discussion of the Report.

Student indifference had not been so high since the early 60's and the emotional, irrational and visceral reaction of many faculty members, hereinbefore noted liberals, left the campus stunned. It left a bitter taste and some very bitter faculty members and students, who, while not wholeheartedly accepting CUG's Report, would at least participate in a discussion of its merits and defects on a rational basis.

Let me go back one step. Looking back on the whole CUG experience, I realized some time last year that CUG had made a fundamental mistake. That mistake was the assumption that the great majority of faculty were willing and capable of transcending their own self-interest to act in a way which may have been good for the University.

This failure to throw off those ties brings about a concomitant proposition. That is, the faculty has failed to recognize the right of the student to act and be treated as full and equal participants in the governing of the University. The lack of recognition of this fundamental CUG-type principle has resulted in the dispute in which the Arts and Science students are currently engaged.

I can't say that those of us on CUG weren't warned. A conversation with a student friend of mine during the CUG deliberations stands out more clearly than ever during this present conflict.

My friend said to me two things: one, that the Board of Governors was not the most reactionary element on campus, and secondly, that to make any progress the faculty would have to be dealt with somewhat more than convincingly. Apparently, it seems he was right. The community concept which CUG put forward is based on mutual trust and respect; self-interest is anathema to that ideal.

From the CUG discussions as well, I think we either deluded ourselves or got a distorted view of the 'community' around us. As late as a year ago, I, for one, was still convinced that rational discussion would point out the obvious fallacy in the statement, "there is no such thing as power in the University". Whereas I could write this off as an aberration or fanciful naïveté, it's difficult to do that now.

Power obviously does exist in the University as it always has; the difference now is that it's being recognized for what it is.

Too, paranoid statements pervaded the atmosphere. There were those who knew what power was, that power relationships did exist, but that they were too important to be sloughed off.

From medieval times on, those who were "masters" in the guild never wanted to share control and direction with the "apprentices". Those who knew this and would maintain the status quo cloaked their self-protection in the rhetoric and polemics of high ivory-towerism. "The University should not be a democratic training ground," was the claim.

As well, of course "those student minorities of the Left would entrench themselves in such positions of power to disrupt the proceedings and tyrannize the members (permanent) of this stately place". The irony was, however, to be found in most classrooms where an ideology of "Value-free thought" was and is being subtly preached. This is known as politics of the podium.

Consequently, it doesn't take much imagination to deduce how the present impasse has arisen. The external manifestation of the issue is parity; that in itself is important as a mode of action.

But deeper than parity is the need for the majority of the faculty of this University to realize that the students are not a monolith. That is, students are individual, thinking, rational human beings who desperately want to share in the decisions which affect their lives, the well-being of this and the outside community, now and in the future.

This fearful and conspiratorial belief that the student is part of a herd, a mass, dull-witted, transient and disinterested is not a hard belief to dispel in most situations. But under the aura of intransigence and reaction which has been cultured over time, this belief becomes harder to dispel.

To show that the student is not a power-monger and is not irrational will not be made any easier when even sensible arguments are not listened to.

Irrationality begets dissension. That claim that the University is no place for democracy deserves a closer examination: that belief that students lack responsibility and awareness and rationality is a frightening belief.

It shows a dogmatism unequalled by groups of comparable position and intelligence; that lack of trust implicit in the situation does more to convince others of the faculty's inability to persuade than it does to show a denial of the necessity for any student rights at all. It shows a skepticism, a destructive, unhealthy and retrogressive one, which should have been abandoned some time ago.

The students who have been arguing and fighting for their rights deserve support. They are alleviating a discouraging bitterness some of us have left for a long time.

GSU opposes 30% reduction of grants

By PHILINDA MASTERS
 Graduate student representatives from Ontario universities yesterday unanimously opposed a provincial recommendation to reduce grants to the universities at a meeting called by U of T's Graduate Student Union.

This plan will mean in effect a reduction of Post-Graduate Fellowships by 30 per cent, and an increase in graduate student fees of about $300.

"The Province is intent on starving out graduate students," said Larry Hoffman, President of the GSU.

Hoffman explained that since the province pays a certain amount of each graduate student's fees, the reduction will result in a net loss of one million dollars to the U of T. "But the Administration tells me that this can be absorbed by the university," he said.

The situation isn't all that simple according to Hoffman. The number of post-graduate fellowships will be reduced by 250, from 850 to 600 next year, if the recommendation is accepted. Graduate students usually make from two to three thousand dollars as Teaching Assistants, but the provincial recommendation suggests setting the maximum at $1800.

Those graduate students who manage to survive in the system may not be able to support themselves, and companies who would normally hire Canadian graduates will likely turn to importing foreign graduates.

Another consequence of the reduction would be discrimination on the basis of financial means, rather than on academic merit. "Financial discrimination does exist already," said Ron Dougal, Ontario Representative of the Canadian Union of Graduate Students. "But the tighter money gets, the greater its effect will be."

John Bosley, a representative from York, suggested that rather than reduce the number of graduate students, universities should over-produce them. "We should take the risk of having more graduates than teaching positions," so that there will be no vacuum which foreign graduates, particularly Americans, can fill.

CAMERA LOST IN SID SMITH

CFTO-TV news cameraman Duncan Macfarlane finished filming some Sid Smith balloting and an interview with student Edith Anderson yesterday, put down his equipment in the second-floor gallery, and left for twenty minutes. When he returned the camera and mikes were gone, with only a battery and sound amplifier left behind.

Students occupying the Sid Smith free speech area embarrassed about the theft, searched the six floors of Sid Smith with the staff and newsmen.

Channel 9 staff reported the theft, a take valued at over seven thousand dollars, to Metro Police, but the equipment has not been recovered.

"This has never happened to us before," said CFTO reporter George Duthie.

The shoulder-mounted sound-on-film camera had CFTO emblazoned on the side, and could not be resold for commercial use. Macfarlane, after five years with CFTO was fired but the union, the International Association of Theatre and Stage Employees will have grievance hearings.

Varsity's stories not run in west

CALGARY (CUP) — Three articles will not appear in this week's Gauntlet, student paper at the University of Calgary, as a result of a decision taken by the paper's printer.

The Albertan Job Press, part of the local Sifton-Bell (FP Publications) morning newspaper, refused to print "A Woman's View of the Clitoris" by Leah Fritz, "I'd Love to Turn You On" by Liz Willick and a letter from a homosexual using the pseudonym "Rammann."

"The nature of the articles is such that we do not want to print them," the shop superintendent told the Gauntlet.

"I'm not going to censor what you're running," he said "I'm just not going to run it."

The censored articles will appear in a later Gauntlet edition as a special supplement. They are being printed by The Peak Publications Society at Simon Fraser University.

U of T's Godfrey analyzes post-colonial Africa in powerful, complex first novel

The New Ancestors,
by Dave Godfrey,
New Press, $10

During the past ten years, the disenchantment with the American myths and dreams has led many writers to a negative position where they dissected and destroyed the myths in order to fulfill the dreams. For Dave Godfrey, new sources and viewpoints were necessary so he went to Africa. Out of his three years there comes The New Ancestors, a powerful, ambiguous, complex novel.

Godfrey is a Canadian, now teaching here at Trinity, and a founder of New Press and House of Anansi publishing houses. But in 1960, he left the grey Canadian literary scene for the stimulation of African artistic heroes. Studying with Philip Roth and others, participating in Kesey's acid literature, and producing fine short stories, he began to realize that America was lost.

He joined CUSO and spent two years in Ghana, where his Canadian nationalism was born, and where he developed a very complex and original view of the influences which determine our lives. The New Ancestors is an attempt to state these views, and, with much work on the reader's part, it succeeds.

The African country of Lost Coast has expelled the old imperialists and, trying to create an independent identity through socialism, constantly confronts the political realities working for and against successful nationalism.

The country is led by Dr. Kofi Kruman, known as The Redeemer. He is the absolute power source. But from one side the new imperialists, the Americans, Russians and Chinese, are attempting to influence him. At the same time he must contend not only with his own countrymen who are against him, but also with the contradictions in the revolution itself (free public schooling is fine, but then jobs must be found for graduates; and how does one justify torture as a means of achieving utopia?).

So the setting is political. But it is conveyed through the actions and eyes of four individuals, thereby creating a more complex novel. For Godfrey says that the individual is the basis of a socialistic society. America has only individual goals; therefore greed is the result. But a true socialism means that individual desires will be satisfied, as the individual acts to benefit society as he benefits himself. This result is achieved because society's structures allow it to happen.

But Godfrey is writing a novel, not a political tract. He has much more to say so he embodies his ideas in human beings. However each character is much more than a spokesman for a viewpoint, for each carries within him the problems and contradictions and departures from the ideal that the society as a whole carries.

Michael Burdener, an English Marxist, Gamiliel Harding, obsessive supporter of the Redeemer, First Samuels, liberated colonial now disenchanted with the Redeemer, several females, and the American Rusk, agent of the new imperialism, all interreact on personal and political levels. But each also reacts inside himself, as he searches for his own identity.

One's identity is determined by several factors. First is the family. As Burdener and Samuels struggle with memories of their fathers, we realize that our descendants are created by us; we are their myths and their ancestors. Culture, influencing our minds and being influenced by other cultures, helps to create our identities. And the land is the focus for our success and is instrumental in realizing it.

Politics builds on all these factors, and brings with it problems of society's structures and corruption and violence. The latter are indigenous to the society, but can also be imposed from without. Hence the concern with imperialism.

Similarities to the Canadian experience are obvious, but Godfrey never proclaims them. He presents the situations and leaves the implications to the reader.

The real power of the novel lies precisely in the way all of the ideas are presented. It is divided into five parts, with each section told by one of the main characters. Time shifts constantly from past to present, reality is layered on reality, and in one section, the death of Rusk is described as occurring in three different ways. The effect is film-like, as scene adds to scene and an impression results, as well as resembling a more coherent stream of consciousness.

The prose soars, constantly verging on poetry. Politics is described in sexual metaphors, lives are given worth and strength by the vividness of the style.

Perhaps this is the source of the effect of The New Ancestors. For even though the characters sometimes seem less than alive or unique, and the politics seem to overwhelm the art and the human beings, there is a dichotomy in the situation and in Godfrey which creates a powerful tension. Perversities are described in beautiful prose, and perversions are condoned as means to an end. The end is a utopia, but the world described is reality. The distance between the two makes The New Ancestors a book worth returning to again and again.

—Stephen Chesley.

Student symphony sounds good

Last Friday's University of Toronto Symphony concert was a "sold-out" affair. Whether the audience, sitting and standing in the EJB's MacMillan Theater, came for love of music or out of family loyalty is of little consequence, since the concert programme was well chosen and generally well presented.

A possible reason for the full complement of aunts and uncles was Ralph Vaughn Williams' Serenade to Music, performed by a mixed choir, soloists and symphony orchestra. It is a beautiful work, smacking of that "country morning" atmosphere which is the indelible trademark of English composers. I usually find this type of music insipid, but the "Serenade" was harmonious and very effective. The choice, presumably by conductor Lloyd Bradshaw, was wise since the register lay within easy reach of both singers and instrumentalists. Solo parts were sung by choir members who possess generally clean, though obviously undertrained voices. While there is danger in assembling programmes of easy but effective music, it was a joy to hear Bradshaw's choir and orchestra giving full rein to their musicality, unencumbered by technical difficulties.

Technical difficulties came in droves in the solo part of Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1. It was delightful to experience the flawless finish which the work attained in the hands of soloist Kathryn Wunder. She convincingly presented the almost schizophrenic bouts of frenzy and lyricism which abound in this concerto, attacking the piece with gutsy aggressiveness which is a sine quo non for Prokofiev. She is a very talented violinist who possesses both the technique and confidence required for solo concertizing.

Rounding out the evening, an enthusiastic performance of Strauss' Death and Transfiguration. Like his other top poems, this one also proved technically and musically taxing for every instrument in the orchestra. In general, the Strauss work was grandly conceived with powerful fortissimos and sweeping climaxes. Closer scrutiny however, revealed sloppiness in detail which detracted from the unified success of the performance. To choose a random example, the cello passage immediately preceding the first appearance of the "transfiguration" theme was murky and inarticulate. Focussing the attack and slightly exaggerating the phrasing within the section would have given the reading more eloquence. Again, the first statement of the "transfiguration" theme in the first violin section ends on a ceding arpeggio which was out of tune and disjointed, was a malapropism, punctuating the lyric motif like a candlelight supper ending with a burp.

Blithe Spirit hits funnybones

Noel Coward's Blithe Spirit is the funniest play I've seen all year; not the best perhaps, but certainly the funniest. Basically it's a situation comedy which derives its hilarity from the plot, and its sparkle from the counterpoint characters.

Charles Condomine (Patrick Cargill) is an English author living in an old country mansion with his (second) wife Ruth (Rosemary Martin), and their helter-skelter maid Edith (Sylvia Braysbay). A hilarious, if unfortunate sea voyage with impish Madame Arcati has conjured up the ghost of Elvira, (Amanda Reiss) Charles' first wife, resplendent in whiteface and shrouds, and invisible and inaudible to all but he.

Elvira makes herself completely at home — she is beautiful, saucy and spoiled, and the advantages of being invisible do not long escape her. Ruth, on the other hand, though intelligent, is middle-aged and respectable, and the intrusion of this uncontrollable sprite turns her comfortable well-ordered world topsy-turvy. And to her complete frustration, there isn't a thing she can do about it. Madame Arcati, delighted by this turn of events, succeeds only in complicating the situation.

The production as a whole was decidedly good, with, as usual, several exceptions. The acoustics of the Centre were not kind to this play — many of the best and funniest lines were completely inaudible to much of the audience. And acting of Patrick Cargill (which may be blamed on director Nigel Patrick) was exaggerated, nervous, and jerky; a more unlikely creature for two women to fight over. The production would have been much better served by a smooth dignified performance.

The rest of the acting, though not spectacular, was quite credible, and did produce a few small gems (for example, the short scene between Ruth and Madame Arcati). The costuming was particularly noteworthy; Madame Arcati (each time in fresh garb) broke up the house every time she made an entrance. And the startling effect of Elvira's first appearance sent a thrill of apprehension through the whole audience. Ghosts are unusually hard to stage, and this one was handled beautifully. The set itself was rigged to produce various effects, and was imported for the occasion from England. The play began almost on time, and ended before it became tiresome. Hallelujah!

Blithe Spirit will be at the O'Keefe Centre until Sat. 30th, at 8:30 p.m. Student tickets are available a half hour before performances.

Bawdy Borstal Boy leaves audience hanging

In 1961 Brendan Behan descended upon Toronto, burned the ears of the city, and landed in jail. Three years later, at age 41, he was dead; had, despite saying he would not, "pulled a Dylan Thomas". He has returned, however, for now playing at the Royal Alexandra is an award-winning adaptation of his autobiographical work. Unfortunately, despite its success in the mechanics of theatre, only the first half of the play is true to the profundity of Behan.

The plot is simple. Sixteen-year-old Behan is sent to bomb some ships for the Irish Republican Army, and is caught by the British. He is sent to the physical and mental destruction of Walton prison to await trial, and then sentenced to three years in a borstal (something like a reform school) in Liverpool.

The story is related by two Behans. The elder sits in the corner of the stage, commenting and narrating; while at the same time we see the story itself unfold on stage as a younger Behan participates.

Director Thomas MacAnna very effectively manipulates his large cast and multitude of scenes, in a film-type style, using brief dialogues and having only the most essential props and wall frames on stage. The rest of the stage is black and deep, with no backdrop, suggesting Behan's relative importance in the midst of Ireland's troubles.

The characterizations, for the most part, reflect the partial quality of the set. More caricature than full character, they nevertheless establish the various views of church, state, and police, as well as people in the street. The acting supports and fleshes out this method. Stephen Scott as the Borstal governor and Francis Bethancourt as the warden of Howland are particularly good.

In each prison the parts of Behan's cellmates are performed by the same actors, and all are totally competent in their roles. Each individualises his character, creating a fuller view of Behan's prison life, and therefore of his education in life itself.

Michael O'Haughusa as the elder Behan is superb. Plodding across the stage, hair messed and his stomach drooping in a creased grey suit and tieless, his physical department is perfect for Behan's shrewd insights into human foibles and bawdy but wry humour. George Connolly is equally as effective as the young Behan. Skinny, curly-haired, laughing and crying, bumbling and succeeding, he conveys an optimism and naivete, as well as intimations of the future Behan.

With such potential richness, it is a shame that after the first act the play changes for the worse. The most important component of the Irish character has always been a sense of humour that is profound, comic and tragic at the same time. Only with such a viewpoint could the harsh realities of Irish politics and economic hardship be endured. Added to this trait is a language so musical that it automatically sings. But there is always a tension between harsh reality and comedy, a subtlety that Behan himself maintained. During the first act, this subtlety is there, as younger Behan grows into himself and in the comments and songs of the elder Behan. But in Act II, the play loses all depth, and becomes nothing more than an adolescent farce, bawdy songs, and juvenile use of four letter words.

The play never loses its excitement as theatre, but we know that Behan would only have been partially pleased.

Little Big Man vividly portrays old west legends

I doubt that Ingmar Bergman was too far from the truth in identifying Arthur Penn as one of the world's greatest living directors. Penn's films have a remarkable agility about them and a lingering sense of vitality. No matter how small or subdued, every piece of action and movement that crackles throughout his work is like an emphatic punctuation mark placed there to help us move a little deeper into the perfect centre of his characters' minds.

All this preamble is by way of saying that Arthur Penn's seventh and latest film, Little Big Man, is a brilliant continuation of his folk legend cycle which began with The Left-Handed Gun and represents exactly what we have come to expect from a film-maker of such penetrating virtuosity.

Little Big Man is a startlingly vivid chronicle of the genocide perpetrated by the White Man against the Indian. It is also a stunningly graphic panorama of the legends of the Old Wild West. It is a film of intelligence and humour and sadness, of humane understanding and of bitter fatality.

As with other Penn outcasts, there is a certain touch of fantasy to the life of Jack Crabb/Little Big Man (Dustin Hoffman), tossed by circumstance back and forth through the legends of the White Man and the Cheyenne in turn. But Penn is not out to romanticize in Little Big Man. Crabb searches for some identity in his private limbo, but he also searches for some way to simply survive.

If it is opportunistic to scream "God bless George Washington" to escape being cut down by a cavalrman's saber or to pander to General Custer's monstrous egomania to escape hanging, well, words and slogans are irrelevant as compared to life. For Penn, to endure is basic, and all means are justified considering the incredible odds against seeing the future become the present.

But it is the Cheyenne tribe to which the film keeps returning, the self-identified "Human Beings" who adopt Crabb, which receives so much of Penn's passionate concern for detail. Not a single shot is generalized. Every scene has a centre and every movement, a focal point. It is as if Penn is, in some small way, repaying with physical detail the humanity and love which the White Man seems determined to annihilate it, for no other reason, than he cannot experience love removed from ego, love without an implied end. What kind of hideously warped, twisted mind would order the massacre of women and children? With Little Big Man Penn answers that there is no one face, either past or present, to match that evil. The Cheyenne, for Penn and screenwriter Calder Willingham, are the tortured victims of an age of progress in which railroad cars stacked with burlap skins stand squarely in the centre of countless western Mainstreets.

Yet, if the brutality in Little Big Man is less shocking than in The Chase or Bonnie and Clyde, it is, I think, because Penn has stressed life more than death, has remained more mindful of creation than destruction. Legendary folk heroes like Wild Bill Hickock and General Custer filter in and out of his film but unlike the heroes of The Left-Handed Gun or Bonnie and Clyde, here the legends are emblems of fallibility. And that, it seems to me, is what Little Big Man ultimately says — that living with any identity in any age is precarious, but the point is to go on living regardless of fatality. There is an incredible beauty and truth in the attitude of Old Lodgeskins (Chief Dan George) — "Sometimes the magic works and sometimes it doesn't".

Syrinx offers an electric evening

Last weekend Syrinx performed at Meat and Potatoes. This novel group consists of Allan Wells on hand drums and gongs, Doug Pringle on alto and soprano saxophone, and the feature attraction of John Mills-Cockell, who writes all the music on Moog synthesizer. The Moog looks, sinister with its four black boxes, dials, wires, and electric gadgetry. With electric piano and organ fed through, the Moog yields a vast array of sounds, noises and electronic intonations.

Yet the music is not as far out as might be expected. Rarely does it lack some kind of form or structure. However, the exciting aspect of the group is that within that structure there lies a limitless number of variations. No song is the same any two nights. There is continuous improvisation among the beat of congas, blaring of saxes and vibrations from the Moog. One could listen all night with keen interest. The overall effect of the trio is entrancing. At low volume they would be perfect for a mystical setting. Live, at high volume, they induce on the mind an intricate rhythm pattern that flows from level to level.

In the past year their reputation has steadily increased. They have composed original music for films and shorts like Icon by Film Canada, or the play The Effect Of Gamma Rays, for the Toronto Dance Theatre. A second album on True North will soon be recorded and a single is to be released soon. Their potential is enormous and should be expanded by more appearances on campus.

Neil Young returns with something old, something new

"Well I'm going back to Canada
On a journey to the past"

Returning to Toronto last week at Massey Hall, Neil Young poured out his soul to two packed audiences. Despite a tendency to sameness, his modesty made it an intimate and personal experience.

Preceding Young, John Hammond displayed superb playing marred by a forced voice and somewhat trite statements. By contrast, Young's good qualities were made more apparent. His hesitating guitar and piano served only as a framework for his dialogues and thinking aloud, so emphasis was placed on his words of suffering and hope. "Cowgirl in the Sand," though lacking the auditory impact of the version with Crazy Horse, was all the more painful and emotionally effective.

Most of the songs he did were written immediately before the concert, which partly accounts for their loose structure and somewhat repetitive melodies and images. Old songs received the greatest applause, not only because they were more familiar but also because they seemed more complete. "Ohio" retained the power and impact of the single, even without CSN & Y. In most cases more variety of treatment was needed to pull together the rambling melodies.

Young's new songs of experiences and visions are pretty much in the mold of all he has done, but they do add something worthwhile, particularly in the distinctive sentiments and lyrics: "To live a love You've got to give a love./ To give a love You've got to be part of."

Mary Mary reflects comic repartie

Well we have had another St. Lawrence Centre premiere, perhaps the most controversial. For some reason a place to promote Canadian talent has sunk to doing a dated Broadway comedy. Mary, Mary, Belief in the centre is rapidly dwindling and if the building were not so concrete the concept would certainly vaporize.

As was expected, the play is successful at entertaining. The plot, Bob McKelloway wants to clear up some financial problems before marrying, and his ex-wife, Mary, is called in by a lawyer friend to help with some unidentified cheques. After a series of incidents they of course decide to remarry.

Mary was a plain child and has perfected the art of repartie as a means of avoiding personal involvement. Such lines as: (Bob): "You are beautiful, you remind me of white porcelain. (Mary): You mean like the kitchen sink, are standard fare and the source of much of the humour. Dawn Greenhalgh, although occasionally strained, is convincing in the role. As Mary, she shows outward poise, and yet you feel that it only thinly coats her insecurity.

Ted Follows is less successfully cast as Bob. He should be meticulous and self-centred but he gives more the impression of acting meticulous and self-centred. As such he is annoying and unconvincing.

Bernard Behrens surpasses everyone as the lawyer-friend. He has all the polish of an accomplished actor and his character seems to come naturally to him.

Although 3 hours should be too long for a comedy, Mary, Mary is successfully entertaining all the way and a delightful way to spend an evening.

Didion probes our nullity

Play It As It Lays

by Joan Didion;
Farrar, Straus & Giroux, $7.25

"What makes lago evil? For some people ask. I never ask." Maria Wyeth in Play It As It Lays doesn't bother with 'whys', not anymore. Not after her divorce, not after her daughter's brain damage, not after aborting her fetus of dubious paternity.

The big rules — moral, or social, or religious — don't hold, not in the Los Angeles-Las Vegas landscape of desert nights where rattlers stretch across the hot asphalt roads, of palm-shaded villas where burnt-out hedonists pick at morsels of drugs and sex.

So Maria steers her life at breakneck speed through an obstacle course of self-imposed rules. She drives aimlessly all day, and must be on the freeway (not on the way to the freeway) by 10 every morning. She lives on cottage cheese, but buys gallons of grapefruit juice, huge roasts, 20 pound boxes of detergent, because she knows all the indices of the idle lonely: one lamb chop, some cat food, a magazine in the shopping cart on Saturday night. She makes lists of things she would never do, walk through Sand's or Caesar's alone after midnight, hall at a party, do S-M unless she wanted to.

But her regimen of trivia doesn't stop her peculiar cancer from spreading. After the abortion she dreams the drains back up, but if she calls a plumber he will find them clogged with hacked pieces of baby flesh. Then, when a sink does back up, she moves out of her villa into a furnished apartment. When the shower there drains too slowly, she moves on.

As if from nerves stretched taut as E-strings Joan Didion bows the music of Maria's disintegration. Readers of her brilliant essays in Slouching towards Bethlehem will know the style, the pitch: an almost ultrasonic tone that snakes into the soul and outlines vague shapes of terror beyond the periphery of articulation. All the connecting tissues, all the traditional cohesions of a novel, have been snipped away, leaving only 84 short, discrete glimpses, graphic as radar scans.

Joan Didion works in a new literary mode — a sunshine gothic, a form that extracts its terror not from locked cellars and aestheticians of evil, but from banal backdrops of luxury hotels, food marts, freeways. Its characters are the casually abandoned rich who play bigger, more dangerous games, betting the highest stakes in mute desperation to get out of the game once and for all.

But Maria, now in an asylum, keeps playing. Her friend BZ, who played his last game with a handful of Seconals, would ask why. But she knows what "nothing" is, and says "why not".

The crystal most finely attuned to our erratic vibrations may turn out to be Joan Didion. With dead accuracy she deploys the flat phrases that obviate volumes, the dropped conversational beats that betray passions crackling underneath, the blocked mazes of modern communication. She is tuned, as she would put it, to the thin whine of hysteria, to the dead still center of the world, to the quintessential intersection of nothing.

Bill MacVicar

Hostage grafted; it suffers

Toronto Workshop Productions is one of the few Canadian theatre companies which has a true personal style. And if any play would seem to be suited to that style, it would be Brendan Behan's The Hostage. But in their current production of this play, the TWP has allowed its style to overwhelm the play to such an extent that only superficiality remains.

Behan's play concerns the capture of a British soldier who is to be held as hostage for an Irish Republican Army prisoner scheduled to be hanged in Belfast. If the prisoner dies, the soldier will be executed. Set in a brothel, with the Irish Troubles and current unrest in Belfast as background, Behan presents a complex discussion about political prisoners, nationalism and so on, set off by dance and song.

The similarities to the recent events in Quebec are obvious, and not content to allow the audience to realise this fact, director Geoffrey Read has grafted on to the Revolution and middle cities of Belfast and the interview with the woman about the Rose house where Laporte was murdered, "I thought it was a brothel" she says. The audience, obviously slow-witted, sighs deeply, and understands.

So much movement has been added, and the lines are delivered so fast, that all speeches of consequence are lost. The audience is too busy looking and laughing at something else, be it a social worker and male struggling to remove their clothes or a nude running around the stage. For example, when the owner, Pat, and his consort, Meg, reveal Pat's own nostalgic creation (in a scene that is great theatre itself), the audience is merely confused. No emphasis had been placed on their relationship before.

The acting is quite well done. It is, however, in the visual presentation that the TWP is most strong, and The Hostage is no exception. Bodies whirl about the tiered stage, scenes shift at lightning speed, and the words are machine-gunned. This is the first TWP production that Luscombe has not directed, and his influence is obvious. But Read shows that he too has the ability to create a visually dynamic and exciting presentation.

The trouble is that he has not learned when to stop the visual effects. Chicago 70 was a perfect choice for the TWP: a three-ring circus where the words added to and reinforced the absurdity seen; but there is more to The Hostage than a three-ring circus can convey, so that when you leave the theatre you know you have spent an enjoyable evening, and your eyes are happy. But your mind remains unsatisfied, for you have been given only surface, and no substance.

Play unpleasant, unpleasant production too

Widowers' Houses is not one of George Bernard Shaw's most famous plays. May it rest forever in its well-deserved obscurity. In Widowers' Houses, Shaw, always the champion of the poor, strikes out gently at the wealthy London landowners whose fortunes were made by renting old and poorly repaired houses "by the room and hall room" to impoverished widows and widowers. Although Shaw's specific target is the "slum landlords", the play is a general condemnation of the unjust social, political, and economic structure of Shaw's England. For all his lofty aims, the play is a resounding failure: there is a remarkable absence of the famous Shavian wit; there is none of the kinetic craxiness that makes Heartbreak House such a success. In an age when the "poor people" are organizing for greater welfare benefits, when any number of magazines and satirists are taking pokes at government and traditional institutions, Shaw's satire seems almost apologetically nice.

Many a dramatic weakness has been hidden by a successful production. This, I'm afraid, is not the case in the current production of Widowers' Houses at the Ward-Price Building. The Academy of Theatre Arts is not up to the task of improving on Shaw's inadequacies. What little wit there is, is lost in a morass of confused accents. Alwena Jones, as the heartless and snobbish daughter of the landlord, and Richard Gabourie as her off-and-on fiance, are especially guilty of this.

Some of the best comic moments are, ironically, provided by the supporting players: Judy Galant is especially amusing as the sulking and sexy parlor maid.

Vallieres book on sale in US 10 weeks ahead of Canada

OTTAWA (CUP) — An English translation of Pierre Vallieres' book White Niggers of America will be on sale in the United States about 10 weeks before it is published in Canada.

The book, a lengthy autobiography and analysis of the position of the Quebecois oppression, has formed the basis of Government criminal charges that have kept Vallieres in jail for most of the past three years.

A spokesman for Monthly Review in New York, a Marxist publishing house, said the American edition of the book will appear at the end of January or the first week in February in America.

Monthly Review sold Canadian publishing rights to McClelland and Stewart of Toronto, because, the spokesman said, "It is the usual custom to license a book in countries where we have no distribution apparatus."

A McClelland and Stewart PR woman said Wednesday (Jan. 20), that a tentative publishing date has been set for the Canadian edition in April. John Newlove will be the Canadian editor.

The Canadian book will have a preface written by Social Democrat Laurier Lappierre, but the PR woman said that the text of Vallieres' writings that will appear in Canada will be the same as the American text.

Monthly Review has held publishing rights for the English translation for over two years and their spokesman said the delay in publishing was caused by the difficulty of translating the lengthy book.

Editions of the book in its original French that have been allowed in Canada have been severely censored.

Perhaps it is not coincidence that the route taken by Vallieres' book describes once again the relationship of Canada to the U.S. — a colony — and that of Quebec to Canada — a colony within a colony.

PhD tells of 6 years spent in Red China

Per-olow Leijon spent six years in Red China, three of them as a PhD candidate studying Chinese painting, and three years as cultural attache for the Swedish Embassy. The following is the account of a short telephone interview last night with Laura Kelly. Leon presented a slide show on the Cultural Revolution in China Wednesday at Sid Smith Varsity: What were the most obvious effects of the 1966 Cultural Revolution? Leijon: There were so many effects, that it is hard to be brief. For one thing, there was a democratization of Chinese society. Not that the ordinary people can now make decisions, but those who do make decisions must now listen more to the people. They were trying to get away from the misuse of power in party administration and in unions.

Varsity: What was Mao's role in the revolution?

Leijon: Mao certainly started it — but he couldn't have begun it unless it appealed to most of the people, especially the young. His position of leadership was not threatened by the changes, but there was much discussion about how his role would be defined.

Varsity: What did you think of the North American press coverage of the revolution, especially the emphasis on the violence?

Leijon: Of course there was a lot of chaos, and unpleasant things happening during the revolution. These things got enormous coverage but they are not the important things. The basic changes were not covered. Most of the Western press was not very good, except for the Globe and Mail reporter Colin McCullough who knew a lot of what was going on. If you look back two years to issues of the Globe and Mail you'll find good stories.

Varsity: What was the reaction in China to the negotiations for and the final recognition of Peking by Ottawa?

Leijon: The discussions about recognition were going on in Stockholm, and while most diplomats and people in the government service knew about them, the people of China did not know until the recognition was made official. Since Canada trades with China, and there are Canadian journalists there, the attitude of the people is favorable, and friendlier than the attitude toward the United States.

Varsity: What is the situation in universities in China?

Leijon: I studied in the Central Academy of Fine Arts, which had a high level of instruction with good teachers. In addition to lectures, I had a teacher assigned to me for one or two hours of tutoring each week, which was an enormous help.

Varsity: What is the composition of university student bodies?

Leijon: Up until 1966 the entrance into higher institutions was based on academic capability, but still the children of educated parents, as those in the government, had a better chance and were thus over-represented. The split in university was 50-50 between upper class and peasant students, while in society, the split is 20-80. After the cultural revolution, class background became a more important qualification to insure the peasant representation.

Peking has three major universities and a number of institutions of higher education, such as arts, medical, music, and industrial schools. Each university has about 15,000 students, and there are more than 200,000 in all the schools together.

Varsity: What is the status of the military in China?

Leijon: Men and women must apply to the army, and acceptance is considered a mark of excellence. In the army soldiers are given technical education, so it's pretty valuable. About 70% of the private soldiers are peasants, so it is a fair representation of the society.

Varsity: What is the reaction in China to their new nuclear power?

Leijon: They are very proud of having been able to develop nuclear weapons, but of course their force is still very small. The government says that the use will be only defensive.

INSTITUTE FOR THE HISTORY & PHILOSOPHY OF SCIENCE & TECHNOLOGY

"Astronomy as a Historical Tool", by Prof. Asger Aaboe of Yale University, 1 February, 1:10 p.m. Room 203, McLennan Laboratory, Physics Bldg. Sponsored by the Varsity Fund and the School of Graduate Studies. All members of the University Community are invited.

Holiday in Britain. Before you're too old to enjoy it.

Don't wait till you're rich and respectable—and tired.

Because a holiday in Britain is liable to get you involved and keep you running from the moment you step off the plane.

Everybody knows about London, where the King's Road is a permanent pop-generation fashion parade, and the discotheques jump till dawn.

But Britain was swinging long before Time magazine 'discovered' Carnaby Street.

You'll know what we mean when you've spent a day or two at the anything-goes experimental Fringe of the Edinburgh Arts Festival. When you've seen Grand Prix motor racing at Silverstone—or the rip-roaring sports-car meets at Brands Hatch. Or when you've seen Shakespeare where he belongs—staged by the crack theatre company at Stratford-upon-Avon.

And then, of course, there are the people. Friendly and welcoming, in a language you don't need a phrase-book to cope with.

Best of all, you don't need to wait till you're rich. A 9-day trip to London with your hotel (and 2 big meals a day) goes for as little as $175. And if you're a member of a group or club, and can get a charter flight, the fare's practically peanuts. We'll send you details on all this, if you just clip the coupon.

Come on. Store up a few memories for your old age.

Welcome to Britain.

Political Economy plans await poll results

By ERIC MILLS

A mass meeting of students in political economy yesterday voted to wait until the results of the strike referendum were known before considering direct action in the department.

The meeting, called by some students anxious to give the strike more content and to press further demands on Political Economy, was a continuation of a smaller meeting that had earlier chosen to present an action plan.

The action plan would include a demand for "equal representation now on all levels of departmental decision-making including hiring, firing, tenure curriculum, grading, and budget allocation."

This motion was passed by a margin of about two to one of the approximately 100 students present.

The meeting next considered backing up these demands "by taking direct action aimed at halting the operations of the Political Economy Department."

"Direct action" was interpreted by graduate student Andy Wernick, speaking in favour of the motion, as an occupation of the hall in the third floor of Sid Smith in the area in front of the department's offices.

Wernick was opposed to obstructing students, calling this "absolutely crazy", but proposed that those occupying attempt to prevent the office staff and Department Chairman J. S. Dupre from entering the office in the morning. However if these people "insisted" on going to the office, the occupiers would permit them to do so.

GSA backs parity and boycott

The following is the wording of a motion passed at a regular meeting of the Graduate Sociology Association executive on Tuesday January 26, 1971:

"The Graduate Sociology Association executive deprecates the Faculty Council decision of January 19 and supports the central student demand for a parity student-faculty Council of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences. The GSA supports the proposed boycott of classes should the student referendum succeed. The GSA executive also urges all graduate students who hold teaching assistantships in the department to cancel their classes during the duration of the strike."

The motion was carried 5 to 1 with no abstentions.

In speaking in favour of direct action, Wernick referred to the three and one half years he has been on campus in which there has been no action usually due to "bad timing". He noted that January is a good time for drawing support, and said that the parity crisis provided a good opportunity to mobilize students.

Wernick defended departmental action saying that while a strike hurts students, it doesn't force faculty or administration to respond.

He noted that the Poli Ec dept has been one of the leading forces against parity among faculty. This department should lead others, he said, especially as it has already been through most other channels.

Graduate student Jim St. John agreed that talk had led nowhere in Poli Ec, describing the non-progress of a parity restructuring committee last summer. He said the essential recommendation of that committee, parity parity (i.e. a majority of both faculty and students would have to vote in favour of a motion) is now "just sitting" and "probably dead".

Third year student Brian Beaven opposed the motion, saying that although he had voted in favour of an immediate strike on Friday, the mood of that meeting was clearly that action must wait upon the result of the referendum "We must honour the wishes of that majority" he said.

SAC University Commissioner Peter Hall, last year's PECU chairman, also opposed the motion, stating he was against being obstructive at all. He termed the strike goals of parity on the faculty council or the restructuring committee as "substantive".

The motion was defeated by approximately 80 to 9

The Varsity—François Heber

Rookie fencers show well

Varsity rookie fencers were given an opportunity to demonstrate their deftness against top-flight competition Saturday afternoon when the club hosted a tri-meet with RMC and Brock.

The inexperienced team acquitted themselves well as they were narrowly edged by RMC, 16 bouts to 11, after earlier dismissing Brock 19-8.

"Considering two team members failed to score at all, I thought it was a good result," was the comment of team manager and assistant coach Rowland Griffin.

Individually for Varsity, Michael Kerwin maintained the excellent form found at Carleton last week as his bouts with John English of the RMC team in the foil were the best of the meet.

Rookies Mike Kacynski, Mark Taylor, John Roth and David Duthie also contributed a great effort.

The team will have one final tune-up this weekend when they host McMaster and Windsor before facing the OQAA Western Division finals a week later.

Snowstorm saves Gryphons from certain death

Varsity hockey fans who are wondering why your slack sports department has no brilliant dispatch from the Blues game at Guelph last night, we have but one weak excuse to offer — there was no game!

Unnavigable roads saved the Gryphons from certain death.

Women fencers top

Last Saturday, the Varsity women's fencing team played host to five other universities in the first of two round robin tournaments to select the two representatives for the WFFCA intercollegiate championships on February 20.

The Toronto girls came up with their second consecutive top showing to finish first with a record of only 10 defeats in 64 bouts.

The Western squad, Varsity's strongest opposition, finished second, followed by Ryerson, Waterloo and McMaster.

Stamina played an important role as competition began at 10:00 a.m. and went continuously until 7:00 in the evening.

Sharon Takasaki and Lilit Zekulin led the way for the victorious Varsity team, finishing first and second in the individual standings.

Pam Chellew, Anne Gutierrez and Oorrit deDemeter were also important factors in the victory with their steady and well executed foil play.

High bar, not Blues, collapses

Once again operating without a full team, the Varsity Gym Blues excelled in the individual standings at Saturday's tri-meet at the Royal Military College in Kingston.

Because of the collapse of the high bar during the warm-up, there were only five instead of the usual six events on the card. Consequently, overall team totals were not tallied.

Individually however, Al Forest had a good day with a second on parallel bars, a third on rings and finished in fourth place overall.

Gary Wicks put in a brilliant performance; he gained a tie with teammate Philip Michaelis in vaulting and added thirds on parallel bars, side horse and floor exercise. He finished an amazing second in the total point standings.

Hans Frick, the outstanding Toronto competitor at the York meet in early December, is still recovering from an ear operation, but is expected to be in shape for the Western Invitational in two weeks.

Mass meeting in Sid Smith at 12 today

A mass meeting in Sidney Smith foyer at 12.00 noon today will be asked to approve ending the boycott of Arts and Science classes in effect since Wednesday, but to continue the fight for parity on other fronts.

A strike committee meeting last night agreed to put the following proposals to the mass meeting:

- * That the boycott of classes end effective Monday morning;
- * That a parity counter-committee be set up to recommend a new structure for Faculty Council;
- * That the parity principle and the illegitimacy of the present Faculty Council be re-endorsed;
- * That harassment of Faculty operations continue, in particular harassment of the meeting of the general committee of Faculty Council, scheduled for 4 p.m. Monday in the Senate, Simcoe Hall.

The counter-committee would include five students to be elected by the mass meeting and five faculty to be elected from among themselves by those faculty sympathetic to parity parity.

This restructuring committee is intended to gain sufficient support and legitimacy that its recommendations would be acceptable to a large number of teaching staff. At the same time, the Faculty Council's proposed restructuring committee of six faculty and two students would be further discredited.

The strike committee meeting also agreed that some sort of physical presence would be maintained in Sidney Smith Hall after the end of the strike. Educational programmes, guerrilla theatre, and the renovated foyer will continue for the time being.

Secret faculty petition blasts student parity

An anti-parity petition, passed hand to hand among conservative arts and science faculty, has gained more than 500 signatures in the last week.

The petition, which has not been posted or circulated publicly, sets out a comprehensive hard-line position. It was not offered to known parity supporters for signing.

The petition states unequivocally that faculty members — "people who have the experience and competence necessary" — shall "play the determining role" in the business of the faculty council.

The government of departments likewise requires faculty control, the petition asserts.

"The awarding of marks and the formal evaluation of students should be under complete faculty control," it continues.

Decisions regarding appointments, tenure, promotion and dismissal of faculty should be made solely by members of the academic staff, it adds.

The role of students, as outlined in the petition, lies in "supplying evidence in areas in which they have knowledge."

Convocation — a bright idea?

A Convocation can "consider all questions affecting the interests and well-being of the university" and make "representations" to the Board and Senate.

A Convocation can be called into session by any 25 alumni of the university.

Besides including all academics and board members, such an assembly would include all living graduates of the university — some 150,000 people in all.

The Varsity — Erol Young

On Wednesday morning parity strikers successfully closed the Arts and Science Faculty office in Sid Smith.

Protest alive as students sit-in

THE Varsity TORONTO

VOL 91—NO. 45
FRI., JAN. 29, 1971

Groups of Arts and Science students carried on the parity fight Wednesday and Thursday with lecture boycotts, sit-ins, and the educational festival.

While the Wednesday morning meeting failed to mobilize mass support due to the narrow referendum defeat, students involved in wildcat actions numbered over 400.

Difficulties arose in determining the exact number of boycotters because of normally diminutive lecture attendance.

Sit-in action began early Wednesday morning, as 20 people occupied the corridor in front of the Arts and Science Faculty office.

When the office staff arrived, they followed previous administration instructions, and went home rather than cross the student line, although the students would not have prevented them from entering the office.

Upstairs in Dean Allen's office, students repeated the sit down tactic that morning and when Allen left his office at 2 p.m., his staff left also.

Arts Dean G.A.B. Watson said "they look radical but act jovial", and added that there was little to fear from them.

However, reports following a closed meeting of the Presidential Advisory Council indicated that the U of T was prepared to seek injunctions ejecting and arresting students who obstructed any offices Thursday morning.

Yesterday the education festival included discussions on parity and university research, and a jazz concert at New College.

Plans were discussed by strikes for interferences in the "business as usual" aspects of the faculty:

- disruption of the Faculty Council's General Committee meeting Monday at 4:10 at Simcoe Hall.
- continued calling of the Faculty Council by the legal, 15-man petition.
- bottlenecking the administrative offices with continued requests for transcripts and course changes.
- Calling a university-wide convocation a 25-man petition of alumni. The convocation would cost an estimated $50,000.

The Varsity — Erol Young

A piano, moved to a strategic location outside Dean Allen's second floor office, livened up proceedings at the sit-in. Some officials, however, viewed the instrument with suspicion, fearing it might possibly be used as a battering ram.

People power. That's what the Credit Union is all about.

Put your mouth where your money is. That's the operating philosophy of the U of T Credit Union. You could call us a financial commune.

We pool our savings. We lend ourselves money at the least possible cost. We elect our own Board of Directors to manage our money.

If we think the Directors are doing a bum job, we give them the bum's rush. We have the power.

A Credit Union member's first $5.00 deposit goes into a share account. It earns a dividend (6%* in 1970). It also gives the CU member a vote.

So, if we don't like the dividend on our share deposits, or if we think the rebate on our loan interest is less than it should be, we can throw out the Directors. Compare that with your bank.

Participation, however, has its limits. So, we set ourselves up with payroll deductions for savings and loan paybacks. And the niggling details are taken care of. Save with us in the U of T Credit Union. Or borrow up to $5,000 more than the money in your share account. You can even vote yourself a rebate on your interest. We'll life-insure your savings and your loan. And even provide you with charter flights.

The U of T Credit Union is chartered and supervised by the Ontario Government. We belong to a federation of 5.5 million Canadians, with total savings of $3,590,000,000.

If you are on staff at the U of T, O.I.S.E., R.O.M., Centennial, Humber, or Seneca Colleges you can join us.

Disruptions may force Bissell's intervention

By PAUL CARSON

U of T president Claude Bissell may be forced to intervene in the parity dispute if a significant number of students and faculty succeed in disrupting next Monday's meeting of the Faculty of Arts general committee.

This intriguing possibility was raised by Arts Dean A. D. Allen during Wednesday's special meeting of the President's Advisory Council.

Bissell has maintained that the current dispute is purely an internal matter within the Faculty of Arts.

"Because of this (parity) fantasy, I can't pay attention to the proper business of the university," he said Wednesday.

Dean Allen insisted at the PAC meeting that the various sub-committees of the 169-member general committee are still functioning normally.

"However, if the Feb. 1 general committee meeting is significantly disrupted, I will not hesitate to request some action from the President," he warned.

Most of Wednesday's meeting was taken up in various factual reports from students, faculty and administration members with first-hand knowledge of the strike action occurring in Sidney Smith Hall.

Commenting on one of the two office sit-ins underway Wednesday morning, associate arts Dean G. A. B. Watson said, "It's just a group of students who found something to do and are rather enjoying it."

"They look radical but act jovial."

According to history professor Robert Spencer, the students doing picket duty were also in good spirits.

"I said 'Good Morning' to them and they said 'Good Morning' to me. This is after all a civilized strike," Spencer said.

W. D. Foulds, major domo of the Faculty of Arts bureaucracy, suggested students are the real losers from the sit-in that has shut down the normal office work in the faculty.

"The results of the first-term exams in half-year courses are being held up, not to mention the flood of transcript requests," he said.

The faculty office issues almost 3,000 marks transcripts per month.

As the meeting moved in camera to discuss possible university responses to any escalation in the strike, graduate student member

Jim St. John warned that, "students have the right to expect more from the PAC than just informational meetings."

"The students are impatient; inaction will not produce a solution to this problem," he said.

SAC President Rod Hurd told PAC the student strike was "perfectly legitimate" even without official SAC support.

Hurd also hinted that faculty members sympathetic to the student position might use the normal petition procedure to force weekly meetings of all Arts and Science teaching staff, thus virtually destroying the governing structure.

Candidates' political platforms stifled in presidential search

By ERIC MILLS

The Senate office is deleting any information deemed "non-biographical" from literature published about candidates in the presidential search committee.

Third year student and candidate Doug Bennett was phoned Tuesday night by the Senate office, which is handling the distribution of material about the election, and told that his views about the necessary qualifications of a university president submitted to the office would not be printed in ads to be taken out in The Varsity Monday, in the Starecase Friday and in the University Bulletin yesterday.

When asked how students were expected to vote without any idea of the candidates' platforms the spokesman from the Senate who would not identify himself in a later interview, said that students would have to campaign on their own.

"I realize it's an arbitrary decision", said the spokesman. "All I can do is offer you my apologies".

The election was decided upon by the Board of Governors, which will set up nine person committee to find a new president, of which two will be undergraduate students and one will be a graduate student although SAC was not consulted about either the composition of the committee or the method of election, it has taken no stand on the matter.

The Senate spokesman said he was acting on a directive from Chancellor O.M. Solandt, which had originated with the President's Council. He also claimed to be acting in the tradition of past elections.

(In elections to the University-Wide Committee last spring, any and all material from candidates was published, including statements about their stand on parity.)

Another candidate for the committee Bernard Teitlebaum, said "anything under 75 word limit and not derogatory towards other candidates should be printed". Teitlebaum himself had limited his submission to biographical information.

SAC External Affairs Commissioner Vince Dolan, another candidate, declined comment.

The Varsity will print political statements from candidates on Monday.

'Mass attendance' planned for Arts meeting; location secret

The student Strike Committee plans a "mass attendance" and possible disruption at this afternoon's meeting of the Undergraduate Studies Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The faculty office has refused to divulge the location of the meeting. Those interested in attending are asked to meet at 3:30 p.m. in the Sidney Smith foyer.

No legitimacy, group disbands

About 40 elected student representatives from the Arts and Science Faculty council, course unions, and college student councils met Thursday in University College to discuss the parity strike situation. They decided they had no legitimacy as a group to take any action.

The group discussed possible tactics for continued disruption of the faculty, but agreed that the strike committee in Sidney Smith Hall should remain the principal decision-making group.

SAC Education Commissioner Bob Spencer proposed the formation of a student union for Arts and Science. Most present felt that this was a desirable long term objective but divisive in the present crisis.

Faculty still support struggle for parity

About forty sympathetic faculty members Wednesday reaffirmed their support for student parity demands.

The meeting adopted Math Professor Chandler Davis' motion that "the ad hoc faculty group calls on all faculty members to convert all their class meetings into discussion sessions on parity and related issues."

It was agreed that students observing the boycott of classes should not be penalized.

Geography professor Jim Lemon suggested faculty continue to attend classes and focus their discussions on the educational process.

The Wednesday meeting was the third for progressive faculty who had voted in favour of parity in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

University College English professor Stephen Martineau opposed continued progressive faculty participation in the Faculty Council.

"Can't we implement the changes we want by ourselves?" he asked. "We could be a bloc of faculty members carrying out decisions they don't like in the higher echelons."

Slightly over 100 faculty have signed the faculty petition "deploring" the action of the Faculty Council and announcing support for the student boycott. The petition is being circulated in the Sidney Smith lobby.

Exam results questioned

Saskatoon law students go out on strike

SASKATOON (CUP) Law students at the University of Saskatchewan Saskatoon campus voted overwhelmingly to strike on Wednesday over the results of some Christmas exams.

The second year marks from these exams resulted in massive failures. In one class, although student papers were given a bonus of 30 marks, the class average was still only 59 per cent. A 60 per cent average is required for students to remain in the college.

At a general meeting, Monday, before the strike, Law students drew up a directive for the college professors, stating that student-faculty relations had deteriorated and pressure on students to pass was increasingly unbearable.

A vast majority of students had gone deep into debt to obtain a worthwhile legal education and felt their attempts were being thwarted by an unjustifiable marking policy, the directive said. It gave faculty until Wednesday to reply.

Among other demands, the directive asked that second year exams be re-marked at no cost to students. Law Dean, Roger Carter, said students could apply for re-reads at a cost of $50 per student.

He also said he would set up a Dean's committee to investigate the situation; he made no mention of student participation.

The Wednesday general meeting rejected the Dean's proposal as unacceptable.

The students passed a motion to set up a committee of six students and six faculty, students having full voting and representational rights, to investigate exam procedures and establish an exam review board.

Then Larry Brown, former president of the Saskatchewan Association of Students, called for a strike, saying that three years had shown committees didn't work and students must have at least some power

The strike became effective immediately after the 144-19 vote for an indefinite period of time. Students will hold another general meeting on Feb. 1 to assess faculty response and determine action.

Scar students scuttle strike

By DOUG HAMILTON

Scarborough College students rejected strike action yesterday in a mass meeting sponsored by the Scarborough College Student Society.

On Tuesday the SCSS tacitly endorsed a strike to back up demands for parity on the Faculty of Arts and Science restructuring committee because of the overwhelmingly positive strike vote at Scarborough.

A "Strike It Up" campaign was initiated by the pro-strike element within the Student Society, but it failed to mobilize the student body.

No pickets were stationed within the College, and no strike committee was organized to co-ordinate activities.

Business as usual?

Business as usual needn't be a reality in the Arts and Science Faculty if students employ a few anti-bureaucratic tactics that are simple and practical.

Any third or fourth year student can request that a transcript be sent to: any department of the U of T Graduate School, any department, the Faculty of Medicine, or OCE. (Transcripts to schools outside of U of T cost $10.)

If in first or second year, students must invent (remember how?) a name and number which must begin with either 67 or 68 and be nine digits long.

A friendly phone call to your favorite administrator or faculty member can further student-staff relations, but unfortunately slow down the business end of school. Call and find out how many students are Lithuanian Baptists.

Remember too that this is petition time of year — there are lots of different-coloured forms at the strike information office in Sidney Smith.

"They have learned one thing and perhaps only one thing during those twelve years: obedience. They've forgotten their algebra. They're hopelessly vague about chemistry and physics. They have grown to fear and resent literature. They write like they've been lobotomized. But, Jesus, can they follow orders!"

What now?

Editorial comment today is brief because it is not up to The Varsity to tell you what to do. All we can do is to record some of what is going on — and try to point out what that means.

The stories in today's paper indicate that fairly clearly!

- most students still want parity, but are uncertain about how to achieve it;

- many faculty do not want parity of any sort, and are wandering about enveloped in an air of paranoia, shocked by what they perceive as a fundamental rudeness in their students;

- many administrators perceive accurately that there has been a real breakdown in the spirit of mutual respect, trust and cooperation which are supposed to be guiding principles in an academic community. They don't know why.

The cartoons on this page also try to point out some of what is going on.

makes some apt comments on some of the issues involved in majority rule and perception of reality.

At the right, there is the case of those who find themselves unable to make any progress against what seems to be intransigent positions.

But the most important things that are happening in these days of crisis are those inside people's heads.

The rigidity of the faculty position has astonished many.

But none have been more astonished than those students who have, for the first time, found out what many of their academic superiors actually think of them. The stories on page five and seven demonstrate this in some detail.

What we are faced with now is not a quick return to normal after the weird aberration of the parity crisis, but, rather, a university which, although not strikebound, is revealing more and more clearly, that it is in a state of paralysis.

'I am just a student, sir . . .'

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Johnson is a third year English student at University College

There was quite a blowup at my 12 o'clock class Wednesday, which I went to anyway, although I was on strike for parity, among other things.

When I raised my hand at the start of the class, Prof. Barry Hayne gestured that he would get to me in a minute and then proceeded to raise Brighton Rock, which is a clever book by Graham Greene. It looked like a normal day in English 328, a program which is also called Modern Novel. About 20 students, two-thirds of the regular viewer-audience, were present.

A classroom is a program, but it's live television, and we know that anything can happen in live television.

"I will recognize your question if it pertains to the course," Hayne told me, interrupting himself after an honest minute of delay.

I told him the question pertained to the course, then suggested to the students that we discuss the strike for as short or long a time as we wished. I said I didn't want to discuss an abstract strike or a principle of parity, but talk about the final exam scheduled for the course.

Hayne said he was not going to waste his time talking about a strike and insisted there was going to be a final exam, no matter what we thought about it. This was not surprising; Hayne is an arch-conservative, a strong opponent of student participation, a principled defender of the discipline from subterranean threats, and the Chairman of the Combined Departments of English at the U of T.

Hayne noted that he disliked the derogatory use of the word "legalistic", which I didn't use, and said he liked legalism if legalism meant legality.

He said he did not believe in democracy in a university, and that he was the established authority.

"I am paid for my expertise," he added. I told him I wasn't paid. Expertise costs many years of student loans and salaries from non-existent summer jobs.

Again I asked Hayne to let the students talk about the final exam, and again he refused until our student representative to the course committee said she wanted a discussion for informational purposes — so she could report to the committee.

"Let's stop talking about whether we should talk about the exam," said another student, "but talk about it instead."

Hayne said I only wanted to talk about the strike — which was just not true.

"I introduced the exam issue by mentioning the strike, because the two issues are related," I said.

"Only insofar as any two issues are related in time," said Hayne.

"And space," I added.

Hayne reluctantly granted the subject 10 minutes of his time, but argued that the exam issue was bogged down in committees now anyway.

He spent the next five minutes telling us why he believed exams were good.

"Are there any other opinions?" I asked. Hayne frowned from the lectern, where he always stands, and there was an embarrassing silence.

We were scared. A free discussion was impossible under the glare of authority vested in that man behind the lectern — an articulate, intimidating and powerful professor, who just knew he had more marbles than we did. If we were consumers of this generous training in picking apart books, he controlled the market, judged the contest, and gave out all the points for literary fetishism.

And there's no free choice when there's no free speech in a pinball-rigged classroom. Our professor is not just an expert but a chairman, who is paid not just to teach but to keep our views from running into one another.

One student suggested the exam was not very important since it only counted for a fifth of the final mark, and she looked to Hayne for approval.

Hayne admitted it would be more like one-third, but that nothing was definite because the question was in committee.

The person sitting behind me said the final exam didn't matter much since it was just another item in a rotten system.

That was brave, I thought.

"What's your alternative?" someone else asked me.

How can we talk about alternatives, I said, when we are told that our opinions don't matter, that there will be an exam no matter what we think. Our discussion is academic and abstract when all our questions are answered before they are posed.

Hayne asked me why I registered in his course, since he made it clear at the beginning of the term there would be a final exam.

"Because last Fall there was a regulation passed in your Combined Departments of English," I said. "The new rule requires all professors to consult with their students about evaluation."

A polling booth and a biology test

By BOB JAMES

(James is a fourth year Victoria College student and one-time SAC executive member)

Who says you don't really learn anything when you are not in school? I've learned a lot just in the last two days.

TUESDAY BEGAN BY MY BEING in the SAC office where they needed more people to man the polling stations. There had been a fairly well organized attempt to man them all, but there had been some irregularities.

The library was the culprit here. Now, I'm sure we can all tell stories about the library, and the whole bunch of ways that it can screw up the works, so to speak — I mean, what with checking briefcases, having to go through all manner of red ('scuse — blue) tape to get out of the damn place. But I was faced with the job of getting a polling station set up in the library.

An easy matter, said the old SAC bureaucrat. A little direct action is all that is needed. You just have to go over and set up a table. Easy. But there's this cop there, and he's not so sure that it's a good idea, and he's bigger than me. And there's another guy too, also bigger than me, and so on. So I ask why.

"FIRE REGULATIONS, YOU SEE," I was told. Well, one thing that I've learned in this university (are you listening, Claude?) is that there are FIRE REGULATIONS for everything (EVERYTHING). So I ask who can tell me more.

"You just go up to room 26, and ask them up there." OK, I'm easy. Room 26 is upstairs in the old library and is called Reader Services.

THEY say that it's fire regulations, too (let's hear it for bureaucracy), and it's really a drag for them too, but those ARE the rules.

NOW, ONE OF THE THINGS that being a SAC bureaucrat does for you is that you get to meet all the people in Simcoe Hall. So you pick a bureaucrat, any bureaucrat, and come up with Wim Kent (928-2196) who has been known to fix little hassles like this before. HE says, yes, it's a shame, and really a drag for him too, and he will call Blackburn (Chief of the Library) and see what he can do.

Blackburn was out of town. But we can put up a table in the smoking room and a sign or two to tell people where it is.

SO WE MAKE UP SIGNS to put outside the library, and one for the table, and one to put on the wall inside . . . but wait a minute, it's against the rule to put signs up on the wall inside.

Where do I go . . . the janitor . . . no janitor? . . . check room 26. And awaaay we go.

The signs outside were taken down (very neatly, I must admit) by two in the afternoon. The sign that I finally got to put up inside was taken down this morning although it went back up for a while.

AND — OH, YES — WE did finally get to Blackburn this morning and got to set up a polling station in the foyer. One catch — we use their table. Their table? it's about one foot by two feet.

Forget it. That's why we're voting for a strike

AND THEN THERE'S THE ONE about my biology test. I take Bio 120. And there are a lot of people in that course. So they set up three different test times. Two on Monday, right after each other, use the same test. And one on Tuesday.

And that was good 'cause there was this thing going on in Sid Smith, and I didn't get a chance to study before Monday, so I could write it on Tuesday.

But strange things go on in the land of the wise. One of the wise decided that the test would be on Tuesday, all right, but at 5:

Hayne said he interpreted "consult" to mean that he made the decision.

I reminded him that an amendment to the regulation stated that if a class couldn't reach an agreement, the course committee could arbitrate. As Combined Departments Chairman, he should know better, I said.

By this time, you could cut the tension in the classroom only with a very sharp knife. I felt scared, angry, and isolated. The other students were either shocked — tacit and silent, or hostile towards me. To be otherwise would mean breaking a rule and taking a risk.

Classroom confrontation? Perhaps — I felt existentially trapped in the heaviest conflict I've ever seen in a classroom. The conflict was always there, but invisible. My only demand was that Hayne allow us to discuss whether we wanted to have any voice in our own grading, hardly an unreasonable demand. Free speech versus McCarthy.

Hayne said students were incapable of deciding such questions. He compared us to children capable of tantrums.

Hayne hands out an attendance sheet in every class, and I told him he sees us as children because he treats us as such, and that the last time I signed attendance sheets was in high school, and even then they were becoming outdated.

He said his characterization of us comes not from a priori assumptions, but from observations.

(What you see depends upon your point of view. Paternalism sees children everywhere. Anyway, I like kids.)

After half an hour of conflict, I got up to leave the class. Hayne denounced me for being childish and rude. I said I would no longer push a minority position, for it was anti-democratic; I said there could be no discussion under conditions of total intimidation; that, besides, I was on strike.

After asking permission, I left the room, hurt and angry. Hayne returned to Graham Greene, I was told later.

I suppose I will have to return to that class sometime if I want to get a mark, get a degree, get a job-maybe-if-I'm lucky.

"There must be some way out of here," said the joker to the thief. Less confusion, but no relief. Organize. It's the only way out. Not on principle, not for parity alone, but because we need to survive and live a little bit more. It's hard to escape. Everything is a university, a school, a factory, an office, a jail, an asylum, a hospital, a family — and we can't go home. We can come together.

That's what happened to me Wednesday. It broke the boredom.

00 instead of 6:00. And we didn't find out until this week. So if we happened to skip a lecture, we were shot.

That's what happened. About twenty people showed up at six to write the test which was just over.

IT SEEMS SIMPLE ENOUGH to allow those people to write the same test starting at six — they couldn't see our tests at all, and so on.

In comes the Knight in Shining White Lab Coat. Mr. Kisko comes to the fore:

"There's just one thing you have to do boys and . . . uh . . . girls. You will have to go and see Dr. Churcher and see if he will set up another test for the people who fouled up." (But it was you who fouled up.)

EITHER THAT, OR TAKE POT LUCK, and just count the former test and the one you write at the end of the term. You'll have to go and see Dr. Churcher." (Can we write the thing now — we haven't seen the test?)

"No, we have appointments at six-thirty and have to leave right now. And a separate test would have to be made up. If you ask me, boys and girls, you should see Dr. Churcher about getting another test made up."

Forget it. That's why we're voting for a strike.

Error in strike pamphlet

I would be grateful if you will permit me to point out a misstatement of fact in the four-page brochure headed Why which was circulated this week in connection with the Strike Referendum.

The misstatement is in the answer provided for question 4 (Did you attempt to enrol in any of the very popular CIN series courses?): "The Faculty Council refund extra sections for these courses and as a result most of you did not get in."

The CIN courses are funded in the Innis College budget, which being entirely separate from the budget of the Faculty of Arts and Science does not come under the Faculty's control.

We regret that our budget was not larger since this meant that it was necessary to limit enrolment in certain CIN courses, notably the film course; but the villain in this case was not the Faculty but either the Central Budget Committee or the Committee on University Affairs.

'The best things at Vic aren't always free'

I have just finished reading an article in the Varsity in which two students give their opinion of the Vic Winter Carnival.

I don't consider the article as destructive, or bothersome to the idea of a Vic Carnival. As you probably know or should know, this is Vic's first attempt at a Winter Carnival, but believe me it will not be our last.

I agree with you that the spirit and participation for some of these events was less than satisfying. Think for one minute how I felt having only 5 or ten people show up for a toboggan race. It's comparable to spending months researching and writing an essay and getting a failing mark. It hurt!

I also agree that some events were poorly organized and I can assure you that I know why. I was responsible for organizing the events and the blame rests on my shoulders.

One thing I do question is your thoughts on advertising. My committee put up 200 small posters, and 100 large silver posters. We also advertised in the Varsity, on Radio Varsity and extensively on CKFH. I don't think the fault was in poor advertising, but not advertising far enough in advance. This was unavoidable this year.

In reading your article, I got the impression you didn't go to any paying events. You should have! It's funny, but they were the best attended things of the whole weekend. We made money on each paying event except one, and as far as I'm concerned, that's a good start. For your personal information the house parties did materialize and I thought they were great (so did other people).

Overall, I think the weekend was a success and from our numerous mistakes, as you would have people believe, we learned many important things. If you don't believe me, try us again next year! Oh and by the way, next year purchase a ticket. The best things in life are not always free!

'What ideas?'

not

'Where was he born?'

Your article describing Robin Mathew's visit to the University was completely inaccurate. Mr. Mathews went beyond his usual call for keeping American professors out of Canadian Universities. He spoke of unemployment in Canada generally, and in particular said that 40% of U. of T. students graduating would not get jobs. He said that this was due to the fact that Canada was a branch-plant economy and also the fact that "foreigners had taken jobs that should have gone to Canadians."

He made it clear that he was not merely speaking of Americans by referring generally to "aliens", and by mentioning the large number of Asiatic students as "an unfair burden on Ontario taxpayers." As he went on and on talking about "aliens" many in the audience began to realize that this man was a right-wing, racist nationalist.

When Mathews ended his speech and the so-called Canadian Liberation Movement began exhorting people to join Mathews on his march, the microphone was turned off and many people began to line up.

But some people in the crowd started shouting "wait a minute".

"let's not follow that racist". "let's have a discussion about this," etc. The crowd turned back to the microphone, it was turned back on, and a lively discussion started.

Speaker after speaker pointed out that the enemy was the ruling class of the U.S., and the ruling class of Canada, not immigrants. People understood that the question "What ideas is he teaching?" is more important than "Where was he born?" They pointed out that Mathew's speech could have been made by Enoch Powell, or Adolph Hitler. Fascists attempt to convince people that their problems stem from racial or national groups whose influx into the country has caused their unemployment. Robin Mathews was attacked as a racist by almost all the speakers, with the clear approval of the crowd.

A maximum of 25 people joined Mathews' demonstration. The overwhelming majority of the crowd stayed and continued talking about their real enemies, and against racism and nationalism.

Whoever wrote your article obviously grossly distorted what went on. But 200 people saw what happened.

NDP meeting supports struggle

In a straw vote, at least eight of 13 members at a general meeting of the St. Andrew-St. Patrick NDP Riding Association voted to support "the struggle of students for equal representation with faculty in decision-making".

But the support motion can in no way be taken as official, as less than a quorum was present.

Guerrilla tour offers insight in academia

By LAURA KELLY

The Tour Guide led the sign-carrying group to the door and explained the next exhibit.

"This class is taught by one of those men from upstairs in Political Economy, Sandy Lakoff. He considers himself a liberal and is from a place called Harvard. He doesn't like students, and after he was here one year he got tenure. He teaches Modern Political Theory."

"Let's go in and see him," begged the group. The double doors of the Sid Smith lecture hall swung open, and boycotters-cum-tourists, exploring the main academic building, faced 60 students and their professor.

Lakoff strode from the lectern, as the Tour Guide tried to focus the tour's attention on the students.

"This is a classroom not a charade," fumed Lakoff. His students applauded.

"Hey, they're awake!" said the insurgent touring strikers.

"I'm just trying to point out the social relations within the building," said the Tour Guide.

Lakoff closed the doors and the guerilla tourists continued.

The tour, conducted in the spirit of comic reality, had begun in the foyer and culminated in the doorway of the Arts and Science Faculty office with a three-chorus rendition of "Solidarity Forever", as amused but disinterested workers looked on.

All tour members were warned of the roaming radicals rumoured to be in the building.

In the History Department on the second floor the group made a brief pilgrimage to Prof. W. H. Nelson's office.

"He's our twelfth century piece, and very fragile, so try not break him," said the Tour Guide. "He's one of the few who recognizes the power struggles through history, except the one in his own department."

Throughout the tour, hostile staff shut classroom doors and locked faculty offices, as the guide pointed out the architectural style as "cheap functional," the predominant mood as "pedagogic gerontocracy," and the students "at play" in the foyer.

At the computer room, the tour saw living examples of the tendency of U of T scholars to "count up anything and everything" instead of analyzing the structures within the society.

The sixth floor fine arts department inspired tourists' questions about the altitude of the building.

"This whole place is out in space," the Tour Guide answered. "The telephone is the only link with the outside world."

Another tour will leave Sid Smith lobby at 11 a.m. today.

MOBILE TAC SQUAD ON MOVE

The Mobile Tactical Squad, toured Sid Smith asking questions.

SAC seeks moratorium

SAC has called for a two-day moratorium of classes and the election of a new University-Wide Committee.

In a carefully worded statement passed by the SAC executive Thursday morning, the student council "recommended" the move to U of T's Board of Governors.

The moratorium on "the normal functions of the university" is being suggested because this week's strike vote "indicated enormous concern and intensive division among students."

Although no specific mention of the ongoing Arts and Science strike or the two day sit-in at the Faculty office was made in the resolution, observers see the SAC move as an attempt to give U of T's administration a way of ending the strike by police action.

Last summer's University Wide Committee passed a watered-down version of the Commission on University Government's recommendations to reform the university's top governing structure. In a minority report issued in December, student members of the UWC rejected UWC recommendations since they had been compiled over the summer when no students were on campus.

The SAC recommendation, which gives no specific starting date for the moratorium, calls for new UWC elections to be held immediately following the shutdown.

Lakoff blows up at visit by strike tour

By TONY USHER

Sandford Lakoff, a professor, was writing the outline for yesterday's third year lecture in modern political thought on a Sidney Smith blackboard.

A student ricocheted his lunch bag off the board. He missed both Lakoff and the wastebasket.

And except for the subsequent invasion of the class by strikers "touring" Sidney Smith, it was the usual serene lecture for Prof. Lakoff and his class.

The strike cut attendance to about one-third of normal. Lakoff tried to put the 60 students present through a catechism:

"What kinds of economic factors would give rise to anti-semitism?"

Silence.

"Well, I don't want to spend too much time on this. You might say that . . ."

Lakoff continued for 15 minutes. The student in front of me was reading his letter from the girl back home. Then the strident voices of Andy Wernick and his guided tour of Sidney Smith became audible outside. Students began to shift uneasily in their seats.

Lakoff had just dismissed the Marxist view of anti-semitism with "I wouldn't throw it out entirely," when the door opened and the strike group crowded onto the floor.

The strikers, who had come to view an "exhibit" Political Economy class, found themselves confronted by the professor.

"I'm asking you to leave," said Lakoff. "You have no right to be here. If these people had wanted to join you, they would have."

Striker Brian Johnson questioned, "Isn't this building open for inspection?"

The class did not seem to agree with Johnson, however. Students cried "Get the hell out," and one shouted, "Button up and leave."

Lakoff returned to the lectern and tried to make himself heard. "I will give these people two minutes to leave. If they do not do so, I will adjourn the class, but I will protest this incident and ask that our classroom be protected."

The class applauded wildly

The striker-tourists left. Lakoff stated his credo on extremist disruption, concluding to general approval, "The autonomy of the learning process and of the university must be protected at all costs."

The class then proceeded to take notes on nineteenth-century American nativism, while outside the tourists embarked for Lakoff's Political Economy department.

No recount planned in strike ballot count

SAC Returning Officer Cliff Jenkins says there will be no recount of the ballots in strike referendum and that the totals printed in yesterday's Varsity stand.

Jenkins also said that irregularities in the balloting have been ironed out and that "Erindale definitely counts".

Thus the referendum on support of the strike loses 4114 to 4060.

Charles St. tenants rally at Queen's Park for control tomorrow

The 130 married residents from Charles Street who have been served with eviction notices, are rallying tomorrow at 3:15 p.m. on the steps of the Queen's Park Legislature.

The rally will be addressed by Liberal leader Robert Nixon, NDP chief Stephen Lewis, and several of the candidates in the Conservative leadership race.

Tenant control, collective bargaining, and non-profit policy for housing, will highlight the speeches. From Queen's Park the Charles Street tenants will march to the OHC building at Bloor Street West, where they will demonstrate against their eviction on a platform of "Hell no, we won't go."

BOOKS

Don't miss the first (and current) or subsequent copies of Transformation, a new head of the hydra Canadian opposition press. Marjaleena Repo edits this bi-monthly magazine, which is available on wide-awake newsstands.

What distinguishes Transformation is its refusal to shriek or to depend on dogma, though the editorial policy does encourage the formulation of theories of social change, applicable to Canada, our country, right now.

The most piercing insights are in an article on children's literature, which calls for parents and others to whom children are subject to look anew at the shocking prejudices that blare at kids each time they look at their gaudy books. The magazine hopes to co-ordinate a project for rewriting children's literature so as to promote "communal values and a realistic, scientific world view."

The article explains that phrase, which, it demonstrates convincingly, is not as sterile as it might appear. Transformation has a warmth that hones its earnestness, and a sense of humour — Milton Acorn listens in on an embarrassing conversation between an American Manager and a Cabinet Minister.

Transformation needs subscriptions and articles — it's only 40 pages now, and does the best it can on newsprint and with a sizeable proportion of its copy reprinted from other sources. It costs 50¢ per issue and $5.00 per year, or $10.00 yearly for an institutional subscription. Send money and mss to Transformation, P.O. Box 6179, Terminal A, Toronto 1.

man went to Montreal to begin his career. There he had his poetry published in 1969 (Before Sunstreet) and made a name for himself as a songwriter and singer. He has appeared in many Canadian cities as well as New York and Boston, on coffeehouse and concert tours.

His style is very, very much like John Sebastian, with simplistic guitar background and a deep, roughish voice, and each set was a combination of songs and poetry of related themes — childhood, love, and the other complexities of life. His first set, on childhood, best related the poems and songs Myth of Myself No. 1, 2, and 3 spoke of a child's dreams, and the songs, notably I'll Wait Till Spring and The Pilgrim described children's thoughts, in terms of David's life and travels. Almost every city he has been to had a song of his experiences in and around the city. He provided the many people in the Looncloth that night with some eloquent, easy-going, distinctly Canadian entertainment.

FILM

No words of praise are too lofty in describing the best feature-length cartoon ever made, Yellow Submarine. Sure, sure, it's the Beatles myth with sugar coating. Perhaps it's ultra-simplistic as far as plot goes. But, man, it has Disney beat hands down. It's not often that Yellow Submarine has been or will be re-released, so if you can make it to Cinecity tomorrow at midnight, by all means go.

As part of its World Classics series, the U of T (Innis) Film Society presents Orson Welles' Magnificent Ambersons (1942) on Monday, Feb 1 at B 00 in UC 104.

Monday night at 8:00 is also York University's Experimental Film Series. To be screened for free next week in lecture hall 2D are David Rimmer's Migration, Cellophane Wrapping, Square Inch Field and others.

On Wednesday, Feb 3 Cineclub Enndale presents Kon Ichikawa's Fires on the Plain. Admission is free. Buses leave Convocation Hall at 1:15 for the 2:00 show in Room 292, and return at 4:15.

If you're any kind of nostalgia nut, don't miss Wednesday evening's programme at Pandora's Movie Box, 191 Lippincott St. (cor. Ulster St.). On tap are the Marx Brothers in the 1932 classic Horse Feathers, and Laurel and Hardy in another 1932 feature, The Music Box. The latter film which won the Oscar as best short subject, involves the delivery by Stan and Ollie of a piano to a house at the top of a hill. If any one film personifies L & H at the peak of their career, it is The Music Box.

At Cinema Lumiere next week Jan 29-Feb 2, Kobayashi's Kwaidan. Show times at B 00, plus a 4:00 Sunday matinee. At this writing, I have not received any information on CL's schedule for the remainder of next week. If you're interested call CL at 920-9817.

ART

An interesting and unintentional game is being played by the galleries Pascal and Moos on Yorkville. It is the game of art appreciation-depreciation, with the gallery Pascal decidedly the winner.

The Pascal gallery cleverly counterpoints the kinetic art of John Savoie with the oriental simplicity of Michael Bidner's metal-plate prints. However, the works in the Gallery Moos, which are by such highly-reputed artists as Henry Moore and Riopelle, appear third-rate in comparison, due to the haphazard arrangement and thoughtless juxtaposition of uncomplimentary works.

John Savoie's motorized work, Oscillations, assaults each new visitor to the gallery Pascal from its position opposite the door. The energy produced is sustained throughout the exhibit, from the three-dimensional, layered hangings of paper and glass to the flat-surface lithographs.

But with Michael Bidner's series, J. P. Bradish, all movement and tension disappears. His calm white surfaces and pale green, rhythmic designs are soothing after Savoie's frenzied patterns. His social statements are both subtle and perceptive and add a comic relief seldom enjoyed in art.

Officials, faculty in confusion

On this page and the next you find faculty and administration reaction to the on-going crisis. The stories on this page were written by Art Moses.

Old report may be clue to compromise, says Greene

"I have no idea what is going to happen now," said Professor R. A. Greene, faculty proponent of a never-discussed 1969 plan to restructure the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Greene felt the next move in the dispute was up to the students. He said the down-the-middle split on this week's strike referendum "showed the students had more sense than the faculty by being less monolithic although he doubted the strike would be effective.

Greene was a member of a restructuring committee of the Arts and Science Council which in 1969 recommended the Council be restructured through reforms in its individual departments. The proportions of faculty and students agreed to at the departmental levels would then be reflected on the Faculty Council. The committee recommended that students get no less than 25 per cent representation in each department and could be represented up to a parity level. This report was tabled in May 1969 and never debated.

"I think this could be the basis for a workable compromise," Greene said yesterday. "But it would take a tremendous effort to sell it to the faculty."

A member of the President's Council, Greene said Wednesday's Council meeting did not agree to issue an injunction against students who were blockading the Faculty of Arts and Science and Deans Offices. Greene said he personally did not favor the injunction move.

Other sources had indicated that the President's Council during an in camera session had agreed to seek an injunction against the students.

Greene said he could see no move to restructure the Faculty Council outside of the six faculty — two student committee established Jan. 19.

"That committee has been legally constituted and the Dean (A. D. Allen) feels bound by it even though students feel it is unfair," he said.

Referendum tie muddles matters muses Hallett

"I think the restructuring business is pretty well at an impasse," said University College Principal A. C. H. Hallett.

Hallett seconded the motion establishing a parity restructuring committee which was overturned by the Arts and Science Faculty Council Jan. 19. That meeting set up a committee of six faculty and only two students.

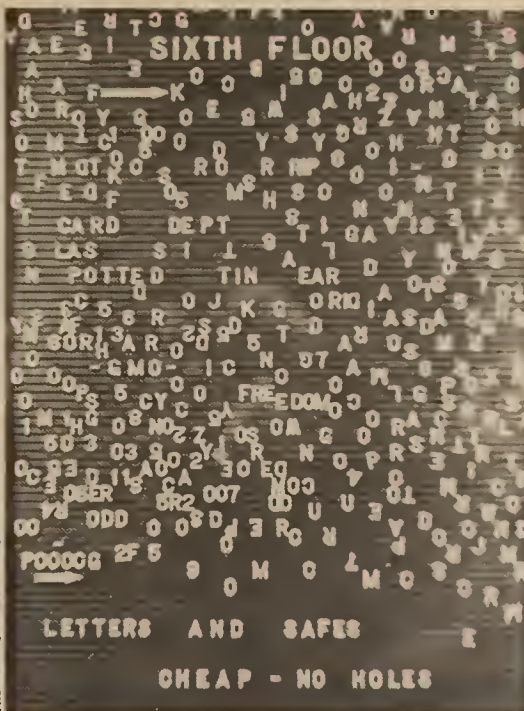

"I doubt if the students will take those seats and therefore I doubt whether that committee is functional. I would cast doubt on its deliberations if the committee did meet and students did not sit on it," he said.

Hallett said it was "rather awkward" to judge whether the student strike could be successful, feeling that "the vote muddied the waters."

"The significant point is that about two-thirds of the students felt sufficiently motivated to turn out to vote. I take encouragement from it as it shows the students are still alive," he said.

Hallett saw no way out of the current situation. "I've given the matter some thought but have come to no conclusions. There is no way out that I can see. I don't see how the (six-two) motion is an implementable one."

Hallett also disagreed with the use of an injunction against the students in front of the Faculty and Deans offices, on Wednesday. He said there were "insufficient grounds" and the situation was "inappropriate" for such a move. Hallett could not attend Wednesday's in camera President's Council discussion since he is not a member of the Council, although he was present until the closed session began.

SCRAMBLED SIXES

When students went to work on the sixth floor roster of room numbers, here's what they came up with.

HARRIED DEAN

A shirt-sleeved Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen confers with student faculty council members in the Sid Smith foyer.

'I can't find right answer', says Allen

"We're in a box and I don't know the way out of it," was the way Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen summed up the situation in his Faculty.

"All we can do is stand by and be willing to talk to anybody. The freedom and independent action we have is zero," he said. "All we can hope is that through discussion we can discover that the two sides are not so far apart."

"I don't think there is any action we can take. I'm still looking for the right answer and can't find it," he said.

Allen also said he did not agree with the issuing of an injunction to remove students blocking the door to his office Wednesday.

"I think the circumstances did not justify extreme action of any kind."

Allen felt the restructuring committee established Jan. 19 had a "difficult task" but could try to carry out its work. He conceded it would be hard for it to proceed if students refused to serve on it.

Allen also doubted the effect of the strike saying that people are reacting to it in different ways which tend to offset each other.

However he was encouraged by the student response to the parity issue.

"Whereas a few months ago there were signs that students were losing interest in university reform, there are now clear signs they have regained their interest," Allen concluded.

'So what?' says Ham to parity fight

By MARINA STRAUSS

Engineering dean J. M. Ham, casting a glance at the troubles over in the arts and science faculty said he didn't think the issues involved were very important.

"The issue of parity is an unreal way of achieving student participation in university affairs," he said.

"Suppose we had a one-to-one ratio of student to staff on the central committee of the Arts and Science faculty.

"I would say, so what? "The university isn't going to magically change." Structures, said Ham, are only "instruments" to serve the learning experience.

"Students are always quarrelling about how many there should be on a committee. What we need is experimentation in learning."

Ham, who has been often mooted as one of the few men from inside U of T who could step into the shoes of retiring president Claude Bissell, appealed for "mutual trust."

"Good will has been lost," said Ham. In his home faculty, the engineering society voted Tuesday to endorse the principle of "equal student participation in U of T affairs."

Ham notes that the proposed executive council in engineering would have equal staff-student membership.

Watson lauds student action, asks for more

Arts and Science Associate Dean G. A. B. Watson had warm words for student actions during the current crisis in the Faculty.

"The way the students carried through their activities was a remarkable thing to watch," he said. "They are handling things with good sense and good humor and are behaving intelligently and forcefully. They have won a tremendous number of supporters from people who formerly were not impressed with them at all," he said.

Dean Watson said further action on the restructuring issue must await today's meeting of the Faculty Council's Undergraduate Studies Committee.

"We must discuss this with them rather than having the Dean's office take unilateral action. It is important to have the faculty involved as many faculty have been watching the current events with great respect for the students."

Reports from the student Strike Committee suggest that the Undergraduate Studies Committee meeting will be disrupted this afternoon.

Dean Watson said it would be a mistake to think the parity issue will dissipate.

"For the moment things seem to be stable but on the other hand I think we still have to move. The students expect some development and some response to their concerns and we have to respond to them," he said.

Watson said Faculty administrators want the current use of Sidney Smith foyer to continue.

"The place has never been more human and we would resent any move to return it to its old barren nature," he said, hoping "to persuade the authorities to provide extra furniture if necessary."

No stand: Friedland

Law Professor Marty Friedland declined to take a stand on the parity crisis.

"I'd rather not say whether I'm for or against the parity issue," he said.

Friedland was chairman of the controversial implementing committee set up after the report of the Commission on University Government was published.

Russell gets nod as new Innis College principal

Peter Russell, professor of Political Economy, was chosen yesterday as the new principal of Innis College, to replace Robin Harris, who resigned last November.

Russell was recommended to the Board of Governors several weeks ago by a selection committee consisting of three students, three faculty members, and two Alumni, all from Innis College. Also on the committee was A. D. Allen, Dean of Arts and Science, and Provost J. H. Sword.

Russell has been on the Innis College Council since it was set up in 1964, and in 1968-9 was Acting Principal of Innis.

It was during this year that work was done and approval received for the College's highly successful CIN courses. Russell played a leading role in the preparation for these courses, which were instituted the following year.

Russell is now in Kampala, Uganda on a leave of absence of two years. He will be back by the first of July to start work in his new position.

Students united on parity: Kelly

"I really don't know what's going to happen," said St. Michael's College Principal Father J. M. Kelly yesterday.

Kelly said he would have "taken a chance with the parity committee" although he did not vote at the Jan. 19 meeting of the Arts and Science Faculty Council.

"I can't see where the parity question is any further along now," he said.

Kelly would not term the present Faculty Council inoperable, preferring to wait until Monday's meeting of the General Committee before passing such a judgement

"The General Committee was itself set up by a parity committee and I don't think we gave it a fair trial," he said.

Kelly doubted the present restructuring committee could work if the two students did not take their seats "unless we reverted to a pre-1965 situation." (No students were on the Faculty Council before 1965.)

He said the current strike could not be effective because of the closeness of this week's vote.

"It showed that although the students were fairly united on parity, on tactics there is no solidarity," he said.

Parity works well at Innis/Harris

By MARINA STRAUSS
Robin Harris, Principal of Innis College, believes that the membership of a council should be derived from its functions.

Asked whether he supports demands for parity on the Faculty Council, he replied: "Yes and no.

ATS opts for democracy in picking executive

The Association of the Teaching Staff (ATS) democratized the method of choosing its officers in a meeting held on January 19.

The president and other officers will be elected by the membership from among candidates nominated by members of the ATS Council, a body of about 50 faculty elected for three year terms by various constituencies within the university.

Formerly a slate of officers was simply presented to the association by the Council.

The first election will take place in March, and officers' terms begin July 1 (the effective date of all constitutional changes).

In addition, New College was added as a constituency for the council and the ATS name was changed to University of Toronto Faculty Association.

The ATS also voted to contribute $500 to the Spadina Review Corporation, which is fighting a legal battle against the Spadina Expressway.

Parity is appropriate and works well at Innis College. But every Council has different functions."

The Innis College Council is the only college council on the University with student-non-student parity.

Harris confirmed that he is in complete support of the restructuring committee, consisting of five students and five faculty. "This body will make the analysis of what the functions of the Faculty Council are," he said, and from this Harris can make his decisions on its membership.

Profs, Aretha back Davis

NEW YORK (CUPI) — Twelve black law professors from 11 colleges will provide advice and counsel to the defense of Angela Davis against charges of murder, kidnapping and conspiracy.

"These professors are saying no, never again will a black scholar be persecuted by the ordeal of a criminal trial, and the black academic community not speak out," Howard Moore, defense attorney for Davis said.

Davis is considered by Herbert Marcuse, prominent left wing philosopher, to be one of his most brilliant students.

Davis, a former philosophy instructor at the University of California at Los Angeles who was fired because she was a member of the Communist Party, was charged on the ground that she bought the gun used in a disruption of a trial in Marin County, California on Aug. 7. Judge J. Haley of superior court was seized and the judge and three other persons were killed in a gun battle with police.

The panel of law professors will be headed by Paul Miller, dean of the Howard University Law School, Washington. It's members, instead of simply lending their names will take an active part in helping the defense team in California.

Other law teachers on the panel come from Yale, Harvard, New York U, State U at Buffalo, Wayne State U (Detroit), Boston U, UCLA, U of Illinois, Rutgers and U of Colorado.

A motion to dismiss the indictment against Oavis as well as allowed bail and to permit Davis to act as a co-counsel will be heard March 4.

Singer Aretha Franklin has offered up to 250,000 dollars in cash to go toward Davis' bail if it is granted.

Trinity plays Still Life

By ROB VINEBERG

For those Noel Coward addicts who enjoyed Blythe Spirit there is another treat in store for you.

The Trinity College Dramatic Society's production of Still Life opened last night to a large and enthusiastic audience.

Coward's short five scene play is set in the lunch room of a rural English railway station, and portrays the development of an illicit love affair. The meetings of the lovers are in sharp contrast to the mundane life at the station.

All the humour of the situation has been caught by the urbane and witty Coward.

Trinity's production started rather slowly last night, but by the end of the second scene was moving well. Shawna MacIvor and Rod Beattie play the lovers with apt seriousness, while comic relief is constantly provided by the barmaids played by Debbie Kerr and Ann Wilton.

But the loudest laughs come when Joanne Pauli enters as the friend who suddenly breaks up the lover's final rendezvous.

Roberto Navarro's set perfectly evokes the circular style of public buildings in the nineteen-thirties.

Blue'n White invites you to Winter Carnival

The Blue and White's Winter Carnival poster didn't quite make it from the print-shop this week, so the very gracious Varsity staff has undertaken to remind you that Winter Carnival goes from tonight straight through to tomorrow nite, with 30 hours of solid entertainment. (see opposite page.)

The Blue and White has a pretty good record this year and Winter Carnival is no exception. According to Chairman Mo and his king-pin, the Blue and White is risking the works on this show. If you don't give them the support that they need, it appears that it's all over for a University social program this year.

You won't find entertainment of equal quality anywhere in the city at these prices, so blow your mind, and support Winter Carnival.

Junior faculty win Sociology Dept. election

By MANNY GORDON
Junior faculty appear to have captured effective control of the Sociology Department's Staffing Committee, as a result of elections held Wednesday at a meeting of the Department's General Assembly, a parity body.

Junior Faculty are often thought to be somewhat less conservative on many matters than their seniors.

Two undergraduate members of the Assembly later expressed great satisfaction at the results, pointing to the names of Assistant Professors Janet Salaff and Tony Smith, and lecturer Jim Turk. The students were also satisfied with the fourth person elected, Ken Walker, a recently promoted Associate Professor.

Three full professors, Norman Bell, Oswald Hall, and Warren Kalbach, were acclaimed in a separate category. No students are entitled to sit on this committee, which deals with hiring, firing, promotion, and tenure within the department.

At least one graduate student was displeased by the results. He pointed out privately that Salaff and Smith did not yet have their PhD's, and commented bitterly that, "it is obviously to their advantage to keep competition out of the department."

PhD candidates in the department face a dismal job market upon graduation, and some are currently further threatened by a proposed cut in their wages for their work as teaching assistants.

Earlier in the meeting, the Assembly flexed its muscles and implicitly rebuked the outgoing staffing committee, the Executive Committee, and indirectly Chairman Jim Giffen for violating the constitution.

Assistant Professor Lorne Tepperman said that the Staffing Committee had not consulted certain parity committees that were supposed to pronounce on the teaching performance and academic credentials of any staff member up for promotion.

After long discussion and some contrite explanations, the Assembly in effect directed the Staffing and Executive Committees to follow the procedures laid down in the constitution. This means that many staff and students have a great deal of reading to do in the next few weeks.

Still earlier in the meeting, the Assembly had nominations and elections for a Committee on Canadian Content, the motion for which had emerged some months ago from the undergraduate caucus as a watered-down replacement for their proposed committee to investigate americanization.

The questions of americanization and Canadian content must always be handled with great delicacy in the Sociology Department because of the large number of American professors and the small quantity of Canadian content.

Gary Teeple, a graduate student, asked if the committee was to be concerned with the content of the department, or just with the content of the reading lists. When told the latter, he commented cryptically: "As far as the number of Americans in the Department — I think that there is enough for an election."

In addition to Americans, people from Japan, Britain, Germany and parts of Canada were nominated to the Committee. The results of the election have not yet been released.

The meeting adjourned before a resolution supporting parity on the Faculty Council and prohibiting academic penalty to people taking part in the current strike action could be debated.

Snildians nix babies

By LINDA McQUAIG
The St. Hilda's College Committee voted to donate $100 to the Abortion Campaign Committee of the U of T Women's Caucus, despite a petition from twenty of its residents.

The motion to give the money was originally passed at a January 24th meeting of the Committee.

A group of disgruntled students who opposed abortion on moral grounds called a meeting of the entire College in an attempt to override the decision of the Committee.

When only thirty-six students showed up at the general meeting, they were unable to invalidate the Committee's decision.

Mary Finley, one of the organizers of the petition, charged that the proposal had been presented under false pretenses.

She said that the money was supposedly to be used to present an educational and unbiased report on abortion. She suspected that the report would, however, be slanted in favour of abortion on demand.

At the Committee meeting yesterday Maylaine Maybee, Resident Head of St. Hilda's College, moved that the motion to donate $100 be rescinded on the grounds that the money might be used for political rather than educational ends.

Her proposal was voted down by the Committee 6-5.

She later commented that her opposition was based on religious convictions.

"Abortion would encourage irresponsibility," she said. "Deciding the future of a human life is the prerogative of God."

She said that she personally wanted to have as many children as she could.

When asked about over-population, she said that an individual had the right to decide the number of children she wanted.

Garcia's firing printed

By TONY SMITH
Tuesday's edition of the library Staff Newsletter contains the Deputy Librarian's account of events surrounding the dismissal of Patricia Garcia.

This account was printed despite objections from a member of the Newsletter's editorial staff. She suggested that, since the case is going to arbitration, much relevant information could not be disclosed, and that no account should be published without a simultaneous statement from Mrs. Garcia.

The reply to the editor's objections stated, "We (the chief librarian, his deputy, and the chief editor of the newsletter) felt that the Newsletter should be a vehicle for official news which the Chief Librarian or his Deputy may wish to impart to library staff."

Enclosed with this note was a copy of a 1969 memorandum forbidding the reporting of all union activities in the same newsletter. The 1969 memo was enclosed to be useful in the task of formulating a written policy for the newsletter.

The new editorial policy is at odds with its own printed statement of this policy — "Articles in the Newsletter are the opinions of individual authors and as such do not reflect Library policy."

Heavyweight action on Athletic Night at Hart House Saturday

Varsity boxers at RMC

Following the boxing trials last Saturday at Hart House on Athletic Night (see pictures), coach Tony Canzano named his 11-man squad to meet the Royal Military College in Kingston tomorrow.

Canzano expects strong competition as both groups have six former team members and five novices.

Varsity veterans John Byrnes, Kevin Cavanaugh and Bob Minton (St. Mike's); Des and Pat Glynn (Vic) and Jim Beckman (SGS) all meet such RMC strength as Art Rent, Ralph Tait, Reed McKay, Clark Little and Alan Whissell, all of whom saw action last season.

Varsity novice boxers are Jim Gorsline (Forestry), Greg Allemano (St. Mike's), Geoff Ellwand (Scar), Ron McNeil (PHE), and Mike Minshall (Trinity).

RMC makes a return visit, boxing at Hart House on February 20.

Cook calls upon Liberals to unite Canada

By FRANC STURINO

Canadian historian Ramsay Cook of York University called upon the Liberal Party to muster its resources in an effort to preserve Canadian unity.

Addressing a local Liberal meeting of St. Paul's riding at the Park Plaza Wednesday night, he said that only the Liberals have a national party which enjoys considerable support in Quebec, and that only they could seriously help heal the wounds of the recent F.L.Q. crisis.

Completely ruling out the Conservatives as having any viable role to play in Quebec, Cook did endorse N.D.P. national candidate, James Laxer's proposal that the New Democrats "align themselves with the Parti Quebecois." In that event "at least the Canadian people would have a clear choice between separatism and federalism," he said.

Cook expressed surprise that the Canadian people acted as though they had "lost their innocence" during the October crisis.

Canadians were wrong to suppose that violence was an exclusively American phenomena.

He added that "Canadians were confusing the loss of their own individual innocence with the country's innocence."

Had Canadians been more attuned to the plight of the Quebecois they would have realized that the fall kidnappings and murder were part of the same continuum of violence which stretched deep into Quebec's history.

In answer to a question concerning the possibility of further strife in Quebec, Cook said he did not rule out the feasibility of civil war either in Canada as a whole or within Quebec itself.

HART HOUSE BASKETBALL STADIUM

THE GYM ISN'T TOO SMALL! THE PLAYERS ARE TOO BIG!

THAT'S RIGHT! THEY SHOULDN'T ALLOW ANYONE ON THE TEAM WHO'S OVER FOUR FEET TALL!

Platooning Windsor hoopsters Basket-Blues guests tomorrow

Students of unorthodox basketball tactics will be in for a treat tomorrow night when Dr. Paul Thomas brings his razzle-dazzle, two platoon Windsor Lancers into cosy, comfy Hart House for a date with Blues.

Thomas feels that he has such depth of talent on his team this year that he can create two complete squads, both being well-balanced and effective.

The two units practice together and Thomas alternates them frequently during the games.

Guard Mike Crowe leads the "B" group while rookie Dennis Smith has been the most prominent member to date of the other five.

This will be a vital game for the Lancers as they will be looking to get back on the winning track after suffering their first loss of the season last Friday night in Waterloo by a score of 81-76.

For Blues, they're still looking forward to pulling off the big upset that destroys some other team's playoff plans.

Jump shots: Up-to-date standings show Waterloo (4-1), Windsor (3-1), Western (3-2), Guelph (2-2), McMaster (1-3) and Varsity (0-4).

In an Ottawa-St. Lawrence game recently, Loyola Warriors humiliated arch-rival Sir George Williams, 141-42.

Meet Michigan

Weakened Swim Blues head south

A depleted Varsity men's swim team left earlier today for two weekend meets south of the border.

With five key veterans sidelined due to illness or academic commitments, the Blues will probably have their only opportunity to brush up on the neglected art of being a good loser.

After ten straight OQAA titles and five consecutive CIAU championships, Varsity swimmers aren't exactly accustomed to coming out second best. However, tonight they face Michigan — rated in the top ten among U.S. swim teams — and winning is out of the question.

Saturday, Blues compete in a double dual meet involving Eastern Michigan (also in the top ten) and Northern Illinois. One victory in the three matches would be an excellent showing.

Making the trip are breaststrokers Ross Ballantyne, Nick Rottman and co-captain Barry Bowerman; freestylers Jim Adams, John Twohig, Jock MacRae, Chris Rockingham and Adam Gesing and John Peters; backstroker Russ Farquhar; Alex Fedko and Zvi Eldar in the butterfly, plus distance specialist Terry Bryon.

Healthy Swanick helps steady

Blues' defence

York game tonight

By LYNDON LITTLE

Friday, November 4, 1969 represents the nadir in the hockey career of Blues' defenceman Brent Swanick.

That night, in a pre-season exhibition game at Varsity Arena against Laurentian, Swanick caught his skate in a rut in the ice while trying to check the Voyagers' Ron Dussiaume and suffered his second serious knee injury in a period of six months.

Shelved for the remainder of the season following surgery to repair damaged ligaments, his shiny future was in doubt, a questionable hockey commodity at the ripe old age of 18.

However, thanks to a strenuous summer rehabilitation program, Swanick returned last fall for another shot at Blues' lineup and, so far this time, has formed a regular defence duo with Dave McDowall. After a slow start, he's gradually fulfilling the considerable promise he showed when he first attended Blues' training camp at the age of 17, after helping to lead his Markham team to the provincial Jr. B. finals the year before.

TEAMMATES on that Markham club were Rick Kessell and Dan Maloney, now NHLers with Pittsburgh and Chicago.

"When I thought of all the hockey I had missed last season, I was determined to try and get the knee in shape for this year," he recalled. "The day after Blues returned from the CIAU championships in Charlottetown, I started to work out with the weights.

"I spent three, 90 minute sessions a week with the weights throughout the summer; most of it was on the leg but I also worked to put on some weight on the upper part of my body. Then in mid-August, I started doing some running.

As you might imagine for a defenceman who is 5-foot-10 and only 159 pounds, Swanick relies on skating and puck handling rather than brute force to get the job on the blueline done effectively. He played all his minor hockey in the Marlie system where he represents somewhat of an anomaly. The Marlboro organization, supposedly, goes for the big players; they consider size as their main criterion for advancement.

Brent Swanick

"Confidence wise, especially," Swanick confessed, "I found it pretty tough early this fall. Now, however, I feel more assured that I can either hit the right man coming out of our end or else, if necessary, carry it out myself.

"That's what playing defence is all about, moving the puck."

Swanick and the remainder of the Blues have been putting more emphasis in recent practices on cutting down the number of mistakes in their own end.

They'll have to be at their best tonight when the York Yeomen invade Varsity Arena for an exhibition game.

IT WAS YORK, of course, that bumped Blues out of the Hockey Canada Tournament with a 2-0 whitewashing at Maple Leaf Gardens. On that night, however, it was the offensive platoon that was lacking.

Recently, York has murdered some of the weaker teams in their OIAA league (eg. Brock 19-2) but were tripped up by Blues' OQAA Western Division rival, Waterloo Warriors, 3-2 in an exhibition game.

As far as Blues are concerned, they're now in the unenviable position of having to win their remaining four league games to be certain of finishing first.

Coach Tom Watt plans no lineup changes for tonight. Game time is 8:00 p.m.

Blue Notes: This is the rubber match with York this season. Blues won earlier, 5-4. . . Blues' league game at Guelph which was cancelled last Tuesday because of the storm will be played this coming Tuesday. . . Blues' rearguard Nelson Debenedet leads the league defencemen in scoring with three goals and nine assists. . . York's all-star defenceman Dave Kosoy, who will likely play tonight, is planning court action to fight his OIAA ineligibility ruling. The OIAA wants to count his years of football played in the US at Akron, Ohio. . .

RICK MORRIS of Laurentian is also fighting his OIAA hockey ineligibility; he played pro hockey last season with Dallas of the Central Pro League.

SHOWDOWN SET FOR 4 P.M. TODAY

Council, glee club to meet same time, same place

The General Committee of the Faculty Council of Arts and Science meets today at 4 p.m. in the Medical Sciences Building auditorium.

The meeting's location was changed yesterday from the Simcoe Hall Senate chambers.

Assistant Dean W. D. Foulds denied that the change in location stemmed from a fear of possible events should a large crowd of students gather in the Senate chamber.

"It was felt that if we were going to have a number of observers it would be better to find a location where we could accommodate observers. We felt the Medical Sciences auditorium would be better for this purpose than the Senate chamber."

It is possible today's General Committee meeting will be disrupted by students demanding parity on the Faculty Council, the same way Friday's meeting of the Undergraduate Studies Committee was brought to a halt by students singing from observers' chairs.

According to Foulds, today's agenda covers numerous committee reports including those of the Undergraduate Studies Committee, the Scarborough and Erindale committee and the committee on evaluation.

The General Committee is the executive of the Faculty Council and consists of 169 members including 34 students. Last fall, this body set up a parity restructuring committee which was vetoed by the full 1300-member Faculty Council Jan. 19, triggering the Faculty's current parity crisis.

A second campus organization, the Nelson-Rist Memorial Glee Club, plans a free concert for 4 p.m. today at the auditorium of the Medical Sciences Building.

Strike called off, parity restructuring body set up

By MARINA STRAUSS

The Arts and Science voluntary strike was officially called off at the fourth mass meeting, a "re-assessment" meeting, last Friday at noon.

A motion was overwhelmingly passed to set up a committee of five students and five faculty to look at attempts at restructuring over the last ten years — especially those of the past four years.

The group was directed to draw up a constructive, concrete proposal which will be taken directly to the President of the university within two weeks.

Naming the committee a "Parity Committee", the meeting indicated that parity is non-negotiable.

Also passed was agreement on the five student representatives elected to the new committee by the Faculty Council reps: Thom Schofield (UC English), Eden Anderson (Trinity, French), Bob Spencer (UC Physics), Vince Dolan (SMC), and Brian Morgan (Trinity).

The faculty will elect their own representatives in a meeting on Monday. Suggested nominees are Larry Lynch (SMC), Philosophy, Jim Prentice, Physics, Milton Wilson, Chairman of Dept. of English at Trinity, Bob Greene, English UC, and Chandler Davis, Math.

Ken McEvoy proclaimed that the cancellation of the strike did not mean a failure: "Other tactics will be more effective". He pointed out the many positive effects of the strike. The Sid Smith lobby has become an inviting "people" centre, a place for congregation.

"Victory Number One!" shouted out someone from the floor.

McEvoy continued: "People have been educated to an incredible extent. Everyone on campus has become aware of the parity issue, some classes have been cancelled or held in order to analyze the situation, and discussions everywhere are centred on the crisis.

"Even a lot of Faculty members opposing parity have recognized the illegitimacy of the Faculty Council's motion."

Support for parity has spread to the Engineering and Law Societies; the governing body of the Physics Department unanimously back it up; the student council at York U has sent a telegram supporting the issue.

Jim Prentice affirmed: "You have had reasonable support. The interest is there, and the faculty isn't that much against you. We are all the Faculty — we can restructure ourselves. The Faculty Council is bankrupt."

Parity committee strike focus for Sask students

SASKATOON (CUP) — Law students at the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon voted Saturday to continue the strike which began last Wednesday.

At the Saturday general meeting, the students declared the strike committee as the sole bargaining agent of the students and that only another general meeting of law students could end the strike.

The general meeting directed the Law Students' Association not to engage in any negotiations with the administration or faculty.

The strike blew up over the massive failure rates which were given the second year law students on Christmas exams. In one class student papers were given a bonus of 30 marks and the class average was still only 59 percent.

The issue was apparently the focus of a much more general dissatisfaction of students with the school, and with student-faculty relations there.

The law students demands, re-ratified at the Saturday meeting, included a call for a parity committee of six students and six faculty to investigate examination policy and a demand for a permanent exam review board.

The Saturday meeting also directed the strike committee to meet once more with Dean Roger Carter to explain the issues and directives arising out of the Saturday meeting, and then to hold no more negotiations until the Law Faculty council meets to discuss the merits of the strike and the demands made.

The faculty of the college has so far made no response to the strike demands.

Dean Carter refused to give the general meeting a commitment about the committees they demanded, stating any such committees would be formed by him, and its members selected solely by him.

So far the strike has been a major success. So few of the students attempted to attend classes that none have been held since the strike was first declared.

Another general meeting is planned for today, to consider faculty response to Saturday's meeting and decide on further action.

On-campus Abortion Day Wednesday

Women campaign for abortion on demand

By AGILUKACS

Over 100,000 illegal abortions occur in Canada every year. One thousand women die or are severely maimed after such operations.

These statistics changed very little with the introduction of a new, "liberal" abortion law in 1969. Vancouver's five major hospitals, for example, serve approximately one million people. It reports a rise of only four abortions a month (from 21.3 to 25.3) as a result of the new law.

Such figures are behind the organization of a U of T-based Abortion Day. Its slogan is "Abortion on Demand." A coalition of various women's groups — U of T Women's Caucus, Women's Liberation Abortion Collective and New Feminists — will man booths on campus on Wednesday.

Black arm bands will be symbolic mourning for the thousands who have died under the abortionist's knife. There will also be free pamphlets, movies, and a panel of professionals.

Signatures will be collected for a brief requesting an abortion clinic on campus. Federal law states that the province can establish new "hospitals"; the brief will request a simpler clinic, whose abortions would be approved by an external hospital board, as law requires. Present hospitals do not have enough room to provide an effective abortion service.

"The brief should be presented to U of T President Bissell on Thursday by as many women as possible," said Ellie Kirzner (SGS), one of the organizers. A protest will be made in Ottawa February 13 by the Toronto-based Association for the Repeal of Canadian Abortion Laws, she added.

"Pregnancy can interrupt or terminate a woman's studies", Katie Curtin (II SMC) explained "Fear of pregnancy involves psychological maiming, and unsafe abortions involve physical maiming," she continued. "There is social and economic pressure on the pregnant women and on the mother to drop out of school," feels Heddy Swanson (II UC), another organizer.

Illegal abortions are much more dangerous than legal ones, comparative statistics from various countries indicate. Yet, a Women's Liberation pamphlet estimates that only 1% of Canadian abortions are legal.

Federal law is partially responsible for this. It allows abortion only if "the continuation of the pregnancy would be likely to endanger (the mother's) life or health". This is a liberalized version of the law which, until 1969, had only considered danger to a pregnant woman's life.

The new law will lead to greater availability of abortion if the medical profession co-operates, noted Prime Minister Trudeau, among others. But medical associations tend to have conservative and powerful leadership. The required concurrence of several private doctors, plus a hospital board, in each abortion, leads many women to have illegal abortions before their pregnancy advances too far.

Safe, legal abortions are easier to obtain in England, for example, which has had a liberal system since 1968. The law considers the mental health of women requesting abortions, requires the concurrence of only two physicians, and doesn't stipulate that abortions be performed within limited hospital space.

Canadian public opinion, as tested recently by Gallup Poll, is almost evenly divided on the question of abortion on request. "Most women support the issues, but don't join the movements," said Susan Garber, a third-year exchange student from an American women's college where women's roles are easily visible.

Women become conscious of how discriminatory abortion laws are to women, when they suspect pregnancy and realize they have nowhere to go, explained Ellie Kirzner. She worked at Toronto General Hospital one summer, where the emergency section finished abortions women have started without qualified help.

"Women have a raw deal," feels Katie Curtin, who made a strong showing in a student council election on a Women's Liberation platform at predominantly Roman Catholic St. Michael's College, last year.

Because unwanted children result in nervous breakdowns and unhappy marriages, as well as troubled children, a Women's Lib pamphlet writes: "The right to abortions on request is both a symbolic right and a most urgent medical right for women. It will inevitably lead to... extension of choice and control in all other... circumstances that affect our lives."

Pleasant, peasant parity song dovetails

By ERIC MILLS

The University of Toronto was honoured on Friday by the presence of the reknowned (C.B.) Macpherson Memorial Glee Club, which toured the campus singing Christmas carols.

The club was also looking for radicals, having heard that the U of T had some, who were reported to have been especially visible earlier in the week. However, they could only find a few radicals (more later) and subsequently changed their name to the Nelson-Rist Memorial Glee Club.

But, back to the beginning.

The Glee Club, which numbered about 40 persons at the beginning, met in a plush room in New College that had been booked months in advance with the U of T computer. However, due to some bureaucratic foul-up (they seem so common at this university), another group also thought it had booked the room.

This group was none other than the Undergraduate Studies Committee, a committee of that very august body, the Arts and Science Faculty Council, of about 1300 scholars and 68 assorted chimpanzees.

However the Glee Club knew its rights and began a singsongfest, singing Christmas carols and other less relevant songs such as "Solidarity Forever". The committee soon realized its mistake and adjourned its meeting barely minutes after it had begun.

The Glee Club then decided to entertain the whole campus, not merely one room, with its mirth and intricate choral arrangement. Choirmaster Brian Johnson, Mus. Bach, A.R.T.C., led it first to the office of Prof. Barry Hayne, whom Johnson had eloquently praised in that morning's Varsity.

Although Hayne's office light was on, it was so quiet that it was obvious that the poor man had left his office and forgotten to turn it off. In spite of that, the assembled multitudes decided to sing "We Wish You a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year" to Hayne's empty office.

Then the Club proceeded on its merry way through the halls of New College, Sidney Smith and University College, singing carols and picking up new members, but losing more (they now numbered about 25). By this time the club had raised its elaborate red flag on the traditional staff, a broomhandle.

All along the way, members had asked passers-by if they were radicals, being sure that there would be some around, and were amazed at their apparent paucity (they must be a very small minority).

The MM Glee Club was soon to meet some radicals, but in a totally unexpected manner.

The Glee Club reached Simcoe Hall only to find the blue-uniformed radicals inside unwilling to release any of their captives, nor to pay heed to any of the club's tuneful requests.

The Varsity — David Lloyd

Not wishing to confine its good spirit and fine voices merely to faculty and students, the club trucked on down to sing carols to Claude Bissell and all his merry elves in Simcoe Hall.

But here they ran into the greatest shock of all:

A bunch of wild-eyed, blue-shirted, uniformed and capped radicals had occupied Simcoe Hall!

As the merry songsters approached, these radicals had locked the main set of doors. Being resourceful, and wanting to spread their good wishes and show the radicals they were friendly, they tried another door.

Suddenly, two of the radicals, led by a man in a white shirt (does this mean Big Business?) forced the doors closed and locked them.

Here was democracy!
So all the stories about extreme radicals and their elitist nature were true!

Here they had occupied a whole building, not merely some Senate chambers, in the name of democracy, and yet they would not let the people in!

No one could even ascertain their demands.

Terrified secretaries, forcibly held captive by the radicals, looked on helplessly as anxious Glee Club members tried to gain entrance through windows and save them. They did what they could.

Led by a fresh choirmaster, the Macpherson Memorial Glee Club solemnly sang more Christmas carols before going off to write new and entertaining songs.

Oh! What of democracy when the main administrative building of a university owned by the people is occupied by blue-shirted radicals?

Faculty not governable, compromise needed, says Lynch

"I think that it is time for a compromise. Some group should come forth with a middle position," said Prof. Larry Lynch, St. Michael's Philosophy Department Chairman commenting on the student strike over parity.

"As far as the vote went, a lot of people voting against the strike were not voting against parity; most of them were just afraid of violence," said Lynch.

"The fact that the vote was evenly divided shows that the Faculty is not governable. We are clearly divided. There must be some compromise," said Lynch.

Parity would bring paralysis: Spencer

"Absolute parity would bring the university to a standstill," said history professor R. A. Spencer, in an interview last night.

"Nobody is saying that students shouldn't be involved on all levels of university government. But now that they've withdrawn, they have no voice at all. They shouldn't disrupt the Faculty Council, but continue to talk," he said.

Spencer said that students had gained increased representation in the Faculty Council, but instead of contributing "substantively" to the committee work, they used their power to overturn the Faculty Council structure.

"The Faculty council has shown that it rejects faculty-student parity. We should drop that issue, and have the students join in the work of committees. They may find they have a more important role," said Spencer.

"My aim is to get business done, not to politicize the university," he continued.

Spencer said he considered the faculty better equipped to run the university, and committed for a longer time, and the fight for parity indicates that students don't trust the faculty.

"The institution of higher learning is being threatened. That's my view of the university and I guess where I differ with the students. Politicization tends to bring the downfall of academia," he said.

Friday meeting ends strike

The crowd of 200 were agreed on most principles. The attitude seemed to be one of mutual co-operation between staff and students. "We are working together now" said Bob Spencer. "We don't want to Americanize the university with violence."

Bob James spoke up against the motion to end the strike. "Now we're going home and doing what we're told. We were beginning to get some things. We can continue guerilla actions . . . Where's the democracy? The people who were involved in this strike were involved in no decisions on the composition of the Parity Committee."

Later he added, against the motion of setting up the restructuring committee: "We don't want a parity restructuring council, we want a parity Faculty Council!"

But it was argued from the floor that this Parity Committee is the only legitimate body that can accomplish something.

Bob Spencer outlined future manoeuvres: "The Faculty Council as it now exists is illegitimate. We must keep it from making any decisions. The General Committee of the Faculty Council is meeting on Monday at 4. We must harrass it. We can all attend and vote and make it hard to continue business. Anything will help we can even sing."

Spencer also proposed: "We can get petitions calling council meetings every three days, ask questions, challenge the chair . . . drag meetings on. We can constitutionally achieve our aims."

Spencer urged all to bug the bureaucracy any way possible, change your courses, call your local Dean or ask for a transcript.

Said McEvoy: "The strike was weak because of insufficient numbers. But the struggle will be escalated"

"Is dissent permissible only so long as it remains ineffective?"

—Saul Alinsky

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1890 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto. Printed by York Globe Publications. This opinion expressed in this newspaper is not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Faculty complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Why we should bother about parity

The current difficulties in the faculty of arts and science have highlighted a couple of common misconceptions about the nature of student demands for a bigger say in their education.

The first misconception, frequently voiced by faculty members who consider themselves "progressive" in their outlook on the world, is that student parity is a non-issue, a silly question unrelated to the real crises facing education. These faculty contend that it is enough for students to voice well-reasoned, articulate criticisms of their education in order to have necessary reforms implemented.

There is some truth in this contention, but only some.

Many faculty consider it their responsibility to find out how their students feel about the format of their courses and the content of their lectures. Prominent among these are teaching staff who believe that education is a co-operative venture in which students and faculty, together, attempt to probe their external surroundings. It is they who have played a significant part in changing the traditional "consumer" model of education into a creative and valuable activity.

There is some truth, then, in these feelings that parity is an issue extraneous to the educational process.

But to argue that some professors give due regard to the requirements of students, is to fail to prove the irrelevance of student demands.

Parity has been linked, as an issue, directly to the style and nature of education by those faculty who are the jealous guardians of an out-moded concept of education.

W. H. Nelson made it entirely clear that he was taking a principled stand on the issue of parity. It was his stand that students have no place in making decisions about education. Their advice may be listened to, but they must not be allowed to behave as if they had the power to help decide.

It has been a long time since these professors sat in lecture halls, humbly taking notes. Few, if any of them, adequately understand the de-humanizing effects a complex mechanical institution can have on students. Fewer still understand why students require, so urgently, to transform the old methods of education into instruments of learning.

It is true, then, that many faculty feel honour-bound to listen to and interact with their academic inferiors — the students — on an equal and respectful basis.

Others don't.

That is why it is a simple matter of common sense to ensure that students will be fully consulted and fully involved in making decisions about their education through a structural arrangement such as parity.

In a true community, parity does not pose a threat. It is only for those who do not regard the university as a community (or rather, see it as a guild which excludes both students and the public), that parity represents a source of insecurity.

It has been said by some administration observers of the present crisis that the recommendations of the CUG report bear little weight on the present situation. (CUG, a parity body itself, recommended the right to parity representation to both students and faculty in decision-making). The members of CUG they claim "went through a unique educational experience", and that is why they came up with parity.

Certainly, that's no argument for rejecting parity.

The question is, if the experience of CUG was such a valuable thing, why can't everyone's education be transformed to be more like it?

Our contention, then, is that it is time for the faculty of arts and science to be taking a principled stand on the kind of education it wants.

By rejecting a parity restructuring commission, the faculty council did take a principled stand.

Now, the council must face the question of its own legitimacy.

That council was bound, practically by definition, to reinforce the existing patterns of education and decision-making.

By supporting a different view, students have challenged the legitimacy of the faculty council.

They have understood that the issues at stake are basic issues of principle — and that drastic changes must take place.

So far, established channels have given no satisfaction to the widespread student demand for parity. The disagreement among students over the tactic of using a strike to achieve their ends, should not be taken as a disagreement over what student goals are.

Perhaps new tactics, such as the attempts planned to harass the work of the faculty council, will prove more fruitful.

It is time for both faculty and administrators to live up to their responsibilities towards their students.

Another misconception is that students, in demanding parity, are ignoring the taxpayer.

A prime culprit here is the Toronto Star, which in its editorial comment of Friday Jan. 22, first chided students for striving to be more than "consumers" of education — and then said students were ignoring the people of Ontario who support this institution through their tax monies.

In the first place, the Star's objections were ill-voiced, since, at the end, they do come out in support of parity at the top governing level of the university. Their suggestion for a governing council is to have four students, four faculty — and four public representatives.

The main misconception the Star displayed is that it is the students who are ignoring the needs of the taxpayer.

If anyone represents the "public's" viewpoint in a university, it is the students. It would be absurd to suggest the boards of governors do this to any extent at all.

The constant influx of students into universities represents an input of the most talented and capable of future citizens of the province. The truth of this statement should be taken with some reservations about the accessibility of higher education to all classes of people, but there is considerable evidence to show that students, within the university structure, represent a dynamic source of change and re-adjustment of the institution to pressing social problems.

It is no accident that it was students who started up Pollution Probe here at U of T two years ago. They did it because they knew it was needed. It was students who first began to mount opposition to the Spadina Expressway.

Surely what the public wants is not a placid, irrelevant, but safe institution of indoctrination — but a place where the freedom exists for students and faculty to give their full commitment to resolving social problems.

The fight for parity within the university must be understood as part of a larger struggle for a more just and rationally organized social order.

When the taxpayer understands that the reasons students are fighting against their "consumer" status in the learning process is so that, ultimately, no-one need be relegated to "consumer" status in life, they will throw their full support behind our fight to transform the university.

A funny election

There is something disturbing about the elections this week for a search committee to pick a new U of T president.

Obviously, this is an important kind of committee to be electing people to. The kind of decision it makes will affect the entire direction of U of T takes in the next decade.

Whether or not many of the recommendations of the CUG Report are ever implemented, will depend upon what kind of a president we have. At present, for instance, we have a president who, together with four students and four faculty, signed his name to that report — but has done almost nothing to see its suggestions transformed into reality.

The composition of the search committee, while questionable in some respects, could not be called grossly unfair.

What alarm us are two factors.

First, the elections are being conducted in a quiet, almost un-noticeable manner.

Almost all the candidates are running solely on their names, reputations and curriculum vitae. Only a few have mounted any kind of campaign; there have been no public forums or discussions; and no attempt has been made by those running the election to familiarize the electorate with the views of their future representatives.

We have attempted to fill some of this gap by printing brief political statements from the 21 student candidates on page 9 today.

But secondly, of the 14 people who will pick the new president, six will not be elected members.

The unelected members include:

- U of T Chancellor Omond Solandt, appointed by the board of governors to chair the committee;
- the president of the U of T alumni association, plus one other member of the UTAA executive;
- three members of the board of governors, which, as we all know, represents the public interest in this matter no more than the president of IBM (Canada) — who sits on the board — represents Canadians at large.

Apparently it is only among the rabble — the students, faculty and administrators — that elections are required.

Students, at least, have a fair choice of candidates in this election.

A cautionary note, however, should be added to all the ballots in this election. We are not really electing a committee to select a new president.

The committee will have the power only to recommend names to the board of governors, which ultimately accepts or rejects each name.

The Rist-Nelson Memorial Glee Club Songbook

The Argus — Ken Campbell

The Rist-Nelson Memorial Glee Club will join the Lady Godiva Memorial Band in a free concert at 4 p.m. today in the auditorium of the Medical Sciences Building. But before the free concert, there will be rehearsals.

First, at 1 p.m., the Sidney Smith Hall Campus Centre is hosting a joint meeting of the R-NMG, the PAC (Parity Action Committee), the Student Mobile Tactical Squad ("to serve and protect (students)" is its motto), and Campus Tours Incorporated, a fledgling organization which made an auspicious debut last Thursday.

Following choir practice and rehearsal of these and other Glee Club songs, there will be campus tours to encourage attendance at the 4 p.m. concert.

At 3 p.m. students are encouraged to bring whistles, noisemakers, and musical instruments to a rally at the Sid Smith Campus Centre. They will then proceed to the free concert, where front row seats have been reserved for students.

An extra added attraction at the free concert will be the Faculty Council general committee circus.

A good time will be had by all.

Four profs may lose jobs for helping Wisconsin strike

MILWAUKEE — Four faculty members of the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee are facing dismissal for their participation in last May's national student strike. All four have received letters from university president Fred Harvey Harrington presenting charges considered to be "adequate cause for dismissal."

The four are James Cockroft, associate professor of history, charged with blocking a set of doors to a building May 7; Dr. Arnold Kaufman, associate professor of psychology, charged with "disrupting a class May 11"; Morgan Gibson, associate professor of English charged with "aiding and abetting students in cancelling a class," and Barbara Gibson, and English lecturer, charged with "disrupting and interfering with a class."

The state attorney general's office is playing an unprecedented role in the proceedings. It has sent letters to students requesting information about "unlawful acts" during the strike, and has subpoenaed some for hearings on what is a purely university matter.

Last August Harrington told a special House subcommittee on education, "We have come to recognize that we must use force against the students, and we are prepared to move against the faculty. We want to do this very carefully, because if you do it out of hand, you run into trouble with the courts..."

Bernard Ziegler, president of the reactionary Board of Regents wrote in the Aug. 24 Milwaukee Sentinel, that the board was pressing for the professors' dismissal because "we have to talk from a position of strength."

The threat of dismissal is not the only form of harassment of the faculty members have endured.

The four professors did not receive the merit raises recommended by their departments. Professor Cockroft was not paid his full salary for May, though in a poll of 104 of his students, 100 thought he had fulfilled his responsibilities and four had no comment.

Hundreds of faculty members on the Milwaukee and Madison campuses played an active role in the strike last year, yet these four were singled out to "set an example."

An adhoc committee of student and faculty groups has called for actions in support of the four. A boycott of classes was held recently and rallies are being held daily.

The University Student Government, has urged students to support the rallies. The statement also called for an end to harassment of anti-war activists.

Mistake

Varsity Reader Donald Baillie graciously pointed out some contradictions in our coverage of the referendum returns. Our mention of a 66.5% turnout in the Arts and Science Faculty should have read 62.8%. Also, the totals in the college-by-college break-down mysteriously failed to add up to the grand totals of 4,060 and 4,114. We counted St. Hilda's twice. Sorry.

Future conflicts to be with faculty

Conflict with teaching staff, not university administrators, will be at the root of future student unrest, Douglas Wright said two weeks ago.

Wright, chairman of the Ontario government's Committee on University Affairs and also a man considered quite eligible to replace U of T President Claude Biswell, was speaking to the Toronto Board of Trade.

Campus instability will not abate, but rather increase in the next few years, said Wright.

"The issues still to be fought out are the relative emphases between teaching and research, and the egocentric nature of most university or college departments as organized around disciplines," he added.

Wright cited students of the social sciences as a natural source of dissatisfaction because of their greater awareness of social issues.

Student hopefuls speak

Presidential Search Committee candidates

On this page we outline the platforms of student candidates for the Presidential Search Committee. Candidates were asked to prepare a 50-word statement. For those who did not submit their platform we have included the remarks which appeared in the U of T bulletin.

The entire full-time and part-time undergraduate student body will choose two representatives from a list of 16 candidates. The two winners cannot be members of the same faculty. Graduate students will elect their single representative from among five candidates. Meanwhile, faculty and administrators will also be choosing their representatives.

ATL cards are required for students to vote.

Polling takes place today through Thursday at various locations across campus.

UNDERGRADS

Gus Abols

Third year Law student. President of the Students' Administrative Council 1969-70.

Clifford Brown

Peace, order and good government. Gain parity by legal means. Implement PACE as extension students' charter. Revamped non-discriminatory UT Act. CTF professional security scale superseding patronage tenure. Extended public hearings before Educational Opportunity Bank replaces OSAP grants.

S. Christensen

Interested in an open world with it academic world which is interested not only with the world at large but the people at university: students, faculty and administration are important.

Doug Bennett

The fulfillment of the academic and administrative requirements of the new president will be amply seen to by faculty and administrators.

Student members of the committee should be more concerned with the candidates' opinions on students as equal members in a democratic university community and on the leadership role of the university within society.

Chris B. Cragg

The choice of a new president involves a deep search of both personal and professional attributes necessary for this position which affects everyone of us. We must find a man who best qualifies to improve both the university's role within the community and as a community for today and for the future.

Joyce Denyer

Equality of educational opportunity is a much-touted political phrase. My aim is to make it a reality. I have neither time nor money for political campaigns. I am an action type who put part-time students on the map. Right now I am working at the federal and provincial levels on financial support for all students. I think I know what sort of president this university needs.

Vince Dolan

— As the CUG Report clearly stated, this University must move toward community in its government; that community inspires the recognition of all its elements as fundamentally equal. Equality is not something that can be handed down from above; we all must work for it, but the job can be more or less painful. The office of the President is a very powerful position, almost omnipotent if used as such. Dr. Bissell's successor can do much to facilitate the transition our University must make. I would look for the man who will make our move toward Community in University Government as painless as possible.

Peter Gilchrist

If I am elected I will attempt to contribute as responsibly as I can, but from a student point of view to the search for a president who can lead this university through the pressures of the 1970's, while students and faculty establish their relative positions in the power structure.

Aron Goldberg

My views on the type of person suited to be U of T president:

A reasonable person, willing to discuss policy and changes in policy openly; a humane person, ready to use the presidential powers to cut the red tape that is always entangling an unfortunate few in bureaucratic nightmares; a flexible person, able to balance the conflicting needs of the various sectors of the university; a person with some past experience in a university situation, whether as student, teacher or administrator but definitely not requiring a lengthy row of letters embellishing his or her name; an innovator, ready to experiment with new ideas and accept the associated risks.

Norma Grindal

It is unfortunate that the Board of Governors saw fit to give the graduate students a seat on the search Committee for a new U of T President and discriminate against the part-time student by forcing 5,500 students to compete with 22,000 for two seats on the committee. However, part-time students have the stamina to try anyway. If part-time students put all their eggs in one basket and vote for their President Norma Grindal, they might have a fighting chance.

Paul Jones

If you liked the Faculty Council, you'll love the Presidential Search Committee: two undergraduates, fourteen members. What can a student do? Eloquently divide and subdivide the opposition until only the points of agreement are obvious: build from there. We won't get Socrates, we can stop Spiro Agnew, and maybe we can settle for Zhivago.

S. Kanowitch

As a Yippie, I feel that the prime prerequisites for the next president of the U of T are a great sense of humour, and a sincere desire to transform the educational experience into a fun one. This University is shockingly uptight, and features a very untogether student body. The next president must be willing to undertake the awesome task of trying to instill a community spirit within the bosom of 27,000 stolid zombies. More importantly, he must be willing to descend from the ivory towers of Simcoe Hall and walk among the riff raff on campus. (Where are you Claude Bissell? All I've seen of you since coming here is a picture in the Varsity with the caption "Well, Gee, I couldn't support that.")

Stephen Kauffman

Since undergraduate students are represented by only a token minority on the Search Committee their disavowed desire must be boldly defended. These desires include the determination to bring about progressive change in course structure and to participate significantly in the decisions which will affect their destinies. One of these decisions is the selection of a new university president. This man must be willing to respond and compromise on issues substantiated by student voting. A vote for me defends this platform and guarantees strong undergraduate representation on the Search Committee.

Brian Morgan

Students on this committee will have to keep in mind that the new president must wear a cloak of many colors in dealing with the tremendous diversity which makes up this university. They will have to be acquainted with all aspects of the position in order to make a complete contribution to the selection process, while naturally ensuring that the new president will be someone who understands the changing nature of the university and will be skilled at encouraging and implementing effective student participation in all aspects of the university.

Edward Moroney

Students of this university want a president who is liberal without being radical, an administrator free from faculty and minority pressure groups. They need a strong man to guide this university through the next decade.

Persuasive diplomacy under a musical facade works! I have gained more ears by playing honky-tonk at the "Chez-Moi" than many do by harangues at Sidney Smith.

B. Teitelbaum

I have a genuine concern (without the rhetorical bullshit) over the distinct possibility that nobody of any value will want the job of President.

How the hell can you shape this campus into a community of interests (remember the title of CUG?) without the urgent fulfilling of the need for trust? Which candidate is going to convince the Search Committee that he can overcome these obstacles in the urgent issue in the selection of a new President.

GRADUATES

Fred von Dreger

Unless we want to continue to follow the U.S. campus examples towards anarchy, crisis and violence, we need a president who will lead this university to re-examine its objectives and priorities at every level, to initiate a dialogue between all the constituencies of this university on the basis that students, faculty and the community at large as its clients and servants are all of equal weight and importance.

John Gero

Unfortunately, due to the make-up of the committee, the student members' power lies in the vetoing of an unsatisfactory candidate. Our next president must not be a man with a past history of conservative stands with regard to students. Rather, he must be attuned to today's needs.

Suanne Kelman

The university needs a president who sees students as responsible and reasonable members of the campus community, with whom he can communicate without rhetoric or histrionics. He must recognize that students, particularly graduate students, have a genuine stake in the university's future, which is seriously threatened by the current polarization and by diminishing job opportunities.

Chris Taylor

Open-minded about president. He should be: — representative of continuing academic excellence; — interested in standards of teaching; — concerned about proposed monetary cuts for graduates by CUA; — in support of main principles of CUG report; — in favour of pluralistic university community with self-autonomy for all departments and equal rights for all individuals.

Gary Wasserman

Some people have accused me of being prejudiced, narrow-minded, and ignorant. Well, I guess they may be right. I am prejudiced against incompetent people, narrow minded when I have to be, and ignorant of some facts. I feel, however, these rather dubious qualities are necessary for the Search Comm.

This committee will offer students an equal opportunity to participate in the future and direction this University will follow. Show your care about your future. Vote!

Me and the harried faculty office

I was not sorry to read in Friday's Varsity that Dean Allen is "harried" these days.

In September I wrote to him regarding incompetence by members of the administration of the Faculty of Arts and Science which almost cost me admission to law school.

The situation was this. I was an extension student and had completed 13 of the 16 credits required at that time for a B.A. when I applied to the two Toronto law schools. Both schools asked for transcripts of my record to date and told me they would defer their decisions until the transcripts from my last three courses, which would be released during the summer, were also forwarded to them.

A woman in the Faculty Office at Sidney Smith Hall took some money and told me she would send the available transcripts immediately and would forward the remaining results as soon as they became available.

The summer drew on, the new school term drew inexorably closer, and still the law schools sent me neither an acceptance nor a rejection. 'Phone calls to the schools were of no assistance. Deluged with applications and 'phone calls, the schools refused to dig out any particular student's application.

One week before the school term was to begin, I found out by visiting U of T Law School that the Faculty of Arts and Science had never sent out my second set of transcripts. The secretary at the law school told me to go to the Faculty Office and they would give me an unofficial record to bring back to the law school since they couldn't supply an official transcript without considerable red tape.

At the Faculty Office a different woman told me coldly that the money I had paid only covered the first set of transcripts. Each set must be applied for and paid for separately. (Why should extension students have to apply and pay twice for the same number of courses day students have sent out for one application and one payment?). She also refused to give me an unofficial transcript or telephone the law school. I would have to wait for it to be sent through the mail.

I informed the law schools of the problem and was accepted three days after the term had begun. I later learned that there had been wholesale bungling by the Faculty. Quite possibly, if the Faculty hadn't caused a great delay in sending out everyone else's applications, the final choice would have been made long before I ever found out that U of T did not intend to send my transcripts at all.

It's been over a year, Dean Allen. Will you please answer my letter now?

Universities are for scholarship, not struggle

To most people who have been watching the "parity" issue unravel in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall one of the most striking facts has been the variety of things that this slogan has meant to the students participating. For the most part, "parity" has meant the same as a student "voice" in University affairs. The fact that this voice exists, and has existed to one degree or another on so many levels of University government has forced students to refine considerably the meaning of "voice".

Voice is now taken to mean an equal voice with professors on the Faculty level, and the rhetoric of the day demands this as an inalienable right. While this equal voice may indeed be such a right, the fact that, to the best of my knowledge, it is conceded nowhere on earth, neither in capitalist nor in socialist countries, neither in reactionary nor in revolutionary societies, at least ought to give one pause. Perhaps "right" is not the best word...

Perceiving that "parity", strictly speaking, is not exactly the strongest cause to be fought for in the world today, many students have made the best of a weak issue, and have moved quickly to broaden the struggle with as little legalism as possible. The next most common theme which I have heard relates to the quality of education at the University of Toronto. And here, I think, students have made one of their strongest points. Poor teaching, inaccessible instructors, professors whose courses have stifled individual thought and creativity — all of these have been flayed, and justly so, by students who were once the passive and even willing victims of those in authority.

The trouble with this approach, however, is that students have generally been reluctant to get down to specifics or to spend much time or effort over them. What formal restraints the University curriculum once imposed have now largely disappeared; and in the various departments, where matters like evaluation, course content and the assignments of teachers are controlled, there is extremely little student involvement or pressure.

In my own department, History, students have not participated extensively in the curriculum committee (a parity body) which deals with such questions. Moreover, in all of the excitement it looks very much as if there will be no student evaluation of history courses this year — and this is the only formal means of communicating student feelings outside of committees.

As so often in the past, students, like everyone else, have been seduced by the allure of prestigious committees and the ways of bureaucracy. Meanwhile, nothing gets done. I suspect that this is true in many departments. In any case, it is difficult to see how the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences has much relevance in these matters.

But it is clear that poor teaching is not the real issue for a substantial segment of those who have gathered under the parity umbrella. For these it is largely society which is at fault, a capitalist society which is engaged, to various degrees, in the business of exploitation.

The university, as a major social institution, is linked with this society and is to be attacked along with it. The point which has been made here, however, is not that the university must be made independent of social pressure — quite the reverse. It becomes increasingly clear that a substantial number of activists have no use at all for the university as a place for detached and thoughtful scholarly inquiry; their notion is rather one of the university as a political and social weapon, a tool to be used in what is still quaintly referred to as the class struggle.

This is, of course, a large and important issue. Yet I think that it should be plain, if the past has anything to teach us, that the university is bound to be a hopelessly inefficient weapon. Designed for scholarship, it has never really been able to do any other job well. And why should it be otherwise? People who want to use scholarship chiefly for class struggle, I would argue, have not seriously gotten down to class struggle; people who want to use scholarship primarily as a social tool have a very impoverished view of scholarship.

Finally, there are those whose struggle for parity is based upon the personal need to assert themselves in some vague and ill-defined way, against those in authority. As one student put it, "without power you cannot define yourself in the world." Since this is the students' particular arena, the urge to control must proceed here. Somewhere, we have all heard this before. It is the power trip. Whether it is Richard Nixon, Pierre Trudeau, or whoever, the search for power goes on; after all, they are just doing their thing. So much for reason, self-discipline, and learning.

Michael R. Marrus
Professor of History

Faculty activists not responsible

A letter from Prof. Conacher expressed the heart of the position about parity taken by most of his colleagues. A few comments are in order.

It is dismaying that he, like many others, should be so fearful of the illusory threat of student politicians. This, despite the fact that the speech of Mr. Morgan (at the faculty council meeting Jan. 18) was calmer and better reasoned than was that of Prof. Nelson.

Are student "activists" such as Mr. Morgan whom events and a leadership vacuum have thrust to the fore to be viewed as a destructive threat? If so, what criteria does one apply to activists such as Prof. Rist, who crystallized and led the faculty crusade?

Perhaps, if there had been fewer suspicions, less emphasis upon the two "estates" and more channels of communication outside the classroom, neither Mr. Morgan nor Prof. Nelson would now be an activist. Likely, both would be happier.

Further, there is the issue of faculty responsibility and commitment to the university. Generalizations about this come easily. Yet where Prof. Conacher's assumptions are being tested, as increasingly is the case in colleges like Trinity, no deterioration is visible. On the contrary, the result has been a growing openness and mutual regard.

With all respect, Prof. Conacher has a wide reputation independent of this university because of his scholarship. By contrast, students here, especially many like myself attempting to earn their degrees at U of T, are much more dependent upon the reputation of this institution. A feeling of openness would be a "shot in the arm."

I have met at least six faculty who frankly admitted they wished to work elsewhere if possible, usually in the country of their origin. Surely Prof. Conacher will pardon me if I doubt that they have a sense of loyalty, commitment and interest in this university which equals my own.

Further, many of us have met others who appear so concerned with their own careers and professional interests that students begin to feel like mere tools or encumbrances.

To this one might add the process called "empire-building" which at some institutions has been fudged by wider use of committees. In sum, meetings of college councils and the Graduate History Society make me question Prof. Conacher's easy generalization.

It would be a rash person who, knowing both Mr. Morgan and Prof. Nelson, would proclaim one obviously more responsible than the other.

But a university is hardly creditable which fails to ensure institutionally that concerned students may always have a significant voice in as many areas as possible.

Even if parity were a "will-o-the-wisp" Prof. Nelson's motion and speech which Prof. Conacher supported, clearly indicated that no significant student voice, in all the variety of which it is actually composed, will be countenanced by the majority of faculty.

What a sad conclusion! Responsible? One might doubt!

Blue and White plots its own referendum

The Blue and White Society, has decided to hold a referendum asking students to support its request for a $20,000 SAC grant for the coming year.

To inform the student body of this action, the Blue and White, SAC's social committee which now operates on independent funds, printed a brief informational note on the back of the Friday edition of its newspaper "Starecase." Presumably, the vote started Friday; it is scheduled to end 4:00 today. There will be no polling booths; correctly filled out ballots must be delivered personally to the SAC office.

Without daring to suggest that "Starecase" is less well-read than the Varsity, might it nevertheless be suggested that the student body has not received adequate notice of this ballot? It took a week of mass meetings, pamphletting, front-page news in both the Varsity and the public press to inform the 13,000 students in the Faculty of Arts and Science of the strike referendum. The Blue and White Society, wishing to poll 36,000 students, announces a referendum three days before the vote ends by placing a notice on the back page of its newspaper, where it looks like an advertisement for some free sample.

And then they have the audacity to add: IF YOU DO NOT VOTE, WE WILL REGISTER A NEGATIVE VOTE (i.e. a vote in favour of their proposal) FOR YOU. THERE WILL BE NO APATHY IN THIS REFERENDUM. If the strike committee had interpreted every non-vote as a vote in their favour, the strike would have been passed by more than 4,000 votes, and that was despite an outstanding turnout of more than 60% from a forewarned, well-informed student body. The Blue and White Society will be lucky to get a 1% turnout, which it feels it can interpret as 99% support for its petition.

Furthermore, even those few of us who may have chanced to notice the announcement of the referendum have not been well-informed. The Society has not indicated how it has managed to operate in the past, nor why it has been refused a SAC grant. It has not listed any alternative means of financing, nor whether it can continue to operate without a SAC grant.

If this referendum was meant as a joke, it was certainly a poor one. If it was not, it deserves to be treated as such.

Short-handed Swim Blues come close to major upset

By PAUL CARSON

"Oh, for just one more sprinter," moaned coach Robin Campbell as the swim Blues came within ten agonizing seconds of a major upset Saturday in Ypsilanti, Michigan.

Competing in their second meet in two days against top-rated U.S. college opposition, Blues needed a victory in the 400-yard freestyle relay to edge Northern Illinois University. However, with five key swimmers missing, the undermanned and exhausted Varsity squad managed only a second place finish and went down to defeat 63-50.

In the other half of Saturday's double dual meet, Varsity lost to Eastern Michigan 78-35.

Friday night, Blues faced Michigan — ranked fourth in U.S. college swimming — and the expected happened as Varsity absorbed a 89-24 drubbing.

Despite the three losses, several Blues turned in excellent performances which indicate another Varsity victory in the upcoming OQAA championships.

Diver Alex Lau defeated NIU in both the one and three-metre events — the best Varsity showing off the board in several years.

Even when winning, Blues often had to concede opponents a 14-point margin in diving events, but Lau's amazing improvement gives the team a useful supply of extra points in case of upsets in swimming events.

John Twohig gained Blues only racing victory Saturday by registering a personal best of 2:11.1 in the 200-yard butterfly.

In the 200-yard breaststroke, Nick Rottman bettered his own personal best of 2:28.5 set just the previous night as he churned to second place in 2:26.8.

Battling against two teams comprised entirely of athletic scholarship recipients, Blues only other second place finishes came in the relays. Based on the race times, the five missing Varsity veterans would have assured a victory over NIU and could perhaps have pulled an upset over East Mich as well.

Friday night, Blues produced some pleasing performances but Michigan's depth was simply too much to overcome with a depleted team.

Jim Adams and John Twohig finished one-two over Michigan's best entries in the 50-yard freestyle, Adams winning in 22.5 seconds — just three-tenths off the OQAA record.

Alex Fedko swam brilliantly in the 200-yard individual medley to win by sixth-tenths of a second, and Adams came back strongly to take second place in the 100-yard freestyle against fresh Michigan opponents.

POOLTALK . . . Alex Lau wins Swimmer of the Meet honors for Saturday's two diving wins and Nick Rottman's short-lived personal best in the breaststroke gets the nod from the Friday action . . . Blues take to the road again this coming weekend for meets with McGill and Queens . . . only home event left on the schedule is the expected drubbing of McMaster set for February 10.

Slow finish for Blues

Playing a first 20 minutes of superb basketball, the Varsity Blues were unable to maintain the pace and finally bowed 103-76 to the first place Windsor Lancers Saturday night in Hart House.

"I warned my guys they (Blues) would give us all we could handle," credited Lancer coach Dr. Paul Thomas after the game. They played just one helluva first half.

"Last year, although they only managed to win one league game, our two toughest matches were with Blues."

Driving and rebounding in splendid form, Blues blitzed the Lancers from the start and held a 49-47 margin at half time. However, Windsor settled down and, aided by great outside shooting, pulled away from Blues in the final 20 minutes.

Jerry Sovran paced the Lancer attack with 20 points, centre Bill Boston was tops for Blues with 16. Guard Mike Katz, who held a hot shooting hand form from the outside, picked up 14 as did Ron Voake.

Windsor fencers surprised

Toronto's rookie fencers surprised OQAA hopeful Windsor, winning 14 bouts to 13, and then dismissed McMaster 12-6 in a tri-meet at Hart House Saturday.

Blues started slowly, losing the foil to Mac 3-6. The epeeists answered the challenge dominating the opponents 9 zip Mark Taylor, Ron Keitb and David Duthie sparked Toronto's recovery.

Varsity sabre fencers underestimated Windsor determined attack losing 3 to 6, only Vladimir Hachinski (2 victories) and David Brown (1 victory) scoring. Blues epee team then started on a losing streak in the early bouts but the great victories of John Roth and David Duthie gave Toronto the edge 5 to 4. This was against the Windsor ploy of doubling up their most experienced fencers, Richard Wong and Karl Blass to cover the lack of a 9 man team.

The foilists knew it was up to them.

Johannees Kacynski responded taking 3 wins, defeating Wong, the reigning OQAA and ex-Varsity champion, and Mike Ciccotelli — a great performance. Oscar Wong and Finn Matteisin sewed up the victory taking 3 wins and a team victory 6-3. Toronto's well deserved triumph in the meet was their best team performance of the year.

Four Toronto veterans will join the team for next week's OQAA championships in Waterloo.

Yeomen crunched 9-1 in Blues' best effort

By LYNDON LITTLE

Friday night at Varsity Arena, in their best team display of the season, the hockey Blues swept aside the bitter memory of a frustrating evening at Maple Gardens as they hammered their country cousins from North York by a 9-1 count.

It was York, who shunted Blues from the Hockey Canada Tournament over the holidays with a 2-0 whitewashing in the semifinals.

Some 4,000 Varsity fans braved near blizzard conditions in the hope of seeing their favorites come up with a good showing against the talented Yeomen. They weren't disappointed. Blues were full measure for their eight goals margin, dominating every aspect of the match.

The decisive victory comes at an opportune time for Blues, just as they were hoping to muster momentum for a late drive in their OQAA western division battle with the Waterloo Warriors.

"When we're working together like that, we're hard to beat," smiled coach Tom Watt. "I think the guys really wanted this one."

York coach Bill Purcuss agreed: "They were ready for it and we weren't," he said. "I had a feeling this was coming."

Jet-like winger Bill Buba continued his torrid pace of late to lead the onslaught with a pair of goals. Captain John Wright, Brian St. John, Scott Seagrist, Gord Davies, Kaz Lysionek and Bill L'Heureux added singles.

Bob Modray spoiled Grant Cole's shutout bid with York's lone marker mid-way throughout the middle period.

Missing stars

In fairness to York, who have clearly established themselves as one of the top college teams in the county, they were operating under some obvious handicaps.

Ex-Blue Murray Stroud, their captain and team sparkplug, was missing with the flu. Also extremely conspicuous by his absence was blueliner Dave Kosoy, a no-nonsense type of defenceman who has a slight shoulder hurt.

Without Kosoy on patrol, Varsity forwards appeared to have an open invitation to harass Yeomen netminder Bill Holden. However, the presence of Stroud and Kosoy Friday night would have only made the core more respectable.

The turning point came mid-way through the opening period with Blues already ahead 2-0.

Yeoman forward Licio Cengarle snared a loose puck in front of Cole but banged the shot off the post. Seconds later, Blues' Mac Hiecox scooped up an errant York pass and broke in alone to give Varsity a 3-0 margin.

That appeared to take the steam out of the Yeoman as Blues added two more markers before the period ended.

The most encouraging aspect of the victory was the way Blues worked as a unit. All three forward lines threw the puck around well while the defence broke up rushes and passed effectively.

The officiating was extremely lax which led to chippy play on both sides. Blues suffered their share from the rough going as three players picked up injuries.

Defenceman Brent Swanick re-injured his rehabilitated knee when checked early in the first period. Right winger Terry Peterman suffered a deep gash on the top of his head when he tripped over Holden's stick and crashed head-first into the boards. He took seven stitches then returned to set up L'Heureux's third period goal.

Buba caught a stick in the fact late in the game, cutting the inside of his lip and chipping a tooth.

Crash McCann

Both teams hammered each other heavily. However, the game's stiffest check saw two Blues collide. Dangerous Dan McCann was all set to introduce a Yeoman forward to the fans in the third two row of seats; a slight miscalculation, however, left teammate Nick Holmes the victim.

"I thought I was playing a pretty fair game until that point," quipped Holmes.

Blue Notes: The defensive corps adjusted well after Swanick was forced out of action. Terry Parson moved over to the right side with Dave McDowall. Bill L'Heureux, who played his finest game of the year, teamed up with Nels Debenedet. . . . Buba's pair of goals were his seventh and eight in the last five games to tie him with John Wright for the club lead in goals with 16 each. Buba, a Sudbury native, was the league's all-star left-winger last year in his rookie term. . . . Brent Imlach, who has been working himself back into condition after a series of groin misfortunes, saw a lot of action in the third period. . . . Blues' next action is tomorrow night in Guelph, a game originally scheduled for last Tuesday but cancelled because of the storm.

Jumpers save day

Skiers win at Carleton

Varsity Nordic and Alpine skiers won the Carleton Invitational four-way ski meet for the second year in a row Friday and Saturday at Mont Ste. Marie, Quebec.

After Friday's giant slalom and cross country events and Saturday's slalom, the Queen's team held a substantial lead of 21.5 points. However, Varsity's jumpers out-classed Queen's by 24.6 points to give Toronto a final winning total of 1113.18.

Queen's finished, only 3.1 points behind. Points are contributed by the best three skiers from each team in each event.

The jumpers were led to victory by Rein Brand who finished second with 99.83 points out of a possible 100. Keijo Laine and Jay T. (Bud) Fisher of Varsity were fourth and fifth while Rick Bagg and Bill Glover nailed down the eighth and tenth spots.

Doug Carter's win in the two-run slalom led the Alpine skiers to second place behind the Gaels. Carter's score of 100 was followed by Curtis Eastmure who finished fourth with 96.56 and Peter Boyd, who placed 18th with 90.0.

Other Toronto racers Gard Shelley and Bagg crashed in their second runs.

Laine led the Nordic skiers to third place behind Carleton and Queen's in the 5.5 mile cross country event gaining 91.46 points for fourth. He was followed for Varsity by Glover (8th), Brand (13th), Jay Fisher (14th) and Doug Garfield (16th).

In the giant slalom, Carter once again led the Alpine team to second place behind Queen's as he finished second in the individual standings.

Carter's victory in the slalom and his second in the giant slalom earned him the individual combined Alpine medal.

The Carleton meet is unique in that it is the only four-way collegiate contest in Eastern Canada that brings both Nordic and Alpine teams together at the same place and time. For four-way combined meets seem to be fading away much to the despair of all those concerned, including coaches Bill Beck and Bob Galway.

Next weekend the Nordic skiers will compete in the OQAA meet at the University of Montreal. The following weekend, sees the Alpine skiers at the OQAA's at Mt. Sutton, Quebec.

New job categories shake staff security

By DAVID FRANK

A re-shuffling of job categories and salary scales for U of T's non-academic non-unionized employees is creating doubt and insecurity among staff affected by the changes.

The number of job categories has been slashed from 19 to 12 under the new system, which went into effect Monday.

The immediate implications for the up to 4,000 support staff affected by the new category system are these:

- re-classified employees who are now earning less than the minimum set for their new category, will get immediate pay hikes;
- employees who have been re-classified downward, will suffer no immediate cut in income;
- employees whose job categories have been downgraded are now watching the ceiling fall dramatically on their future earning potential as long as they remain at U of T;

- employees re-classified downward and now earning in excess of the maximum for their new category, will be allowed no future salary increases — except for the standard yearly cost-of-living allowance, which was pegged last year at four per cent.

Although job titles and categories have been re-vamped, administrators insist nobody's actual work will be changed. No employees will suffer immediate cutbacks in income under the new plan, either.

The new scheme was initiated more than a year ago by Alex Rankin, U of T's executive vice-president (non-academic), as part of an overall attempt to streamline U of T operations and trim expenses in a time of budgetary cutbacks.

The project, officially titled a "classification review program", was conducted under the supervision of U of T's Personnel Office. Employees were asked a year ago to begin filling out questionnaires describing the nature of their work.

At that time Rankin assured employees that "under no circumstances will the programme result in a decrease to the salary of any

Saskatoon lawyers win parity

SASKATOON (CUP) — A general meeting of striking law students voted Monday to end the five day old boycott of classes. The vote was 101 to 71 with 19 abstentions.

The action came following reception of a letter from Dean Roger Carter which offered the establishment of a five-member Dean's Committee composed of two law students, two faculty members and a chairman from outside the college. The committee will be asked to review examination procedures and methods of evaluation and to make recommendations to the Dean on the establishment of an examinations policy in the College of Law.

The vote was preceded by lengthy discussion on whether or not Dean Carter's letter was a substantial improvement on his original position which has been twice rejected by students. The settlement offered no commitment to provide student involvement on admissions or tenure committees, nor on faculty council.

The 2 student members of the committee will be chosen by Carter from ten nominees of the Law Students' Association.

Dissatisfaction with the Dean's letter was expressed by most speakers at the meeting, but most also felt that continuation of the strike would not better the students' position.

Chairman of the Strike Negotiating Committee, Jack Thrasher, indicated that further negotiations, with faculty were urgently required to discuss student involvement on the decision-making bodies within the college.

Monday's meeting was called by a strike meeting Saturday (Jan. 30) and was to receive the report of the Strike Negotiating Committee after its weekend meetings with Dean Carter.

At a special general meeting of law students held Saturday, Jan. 30, it was decided to continue the strike begun the previous Wednesday.

PECU to demand voice in Poli Ec at noon

Three years of fighting for a voice in decision making in the Political Economy Department may come to a showdown tomorrow. The Political Economy Course Union is meeting with department chairman Stefan Dupre at 12:00, in Dupre's office. All concerned students are invited.

The action follows Dupre's refusal to attend a PECU meeting Monday to discuss parity. Other student demands were for parity in hiring, firing, and tenure committees. He had objected to the tone of the letter inviting him to the meeting.

In the Political Economy department there has been a complete deadlock between faculty and students.

An early curriculum committee in 1968-69 died when student members asked to be able to make decisions rather than just talk. The next year, after much haggling, the faculty agreed to talk about restructuring the department. A parity negotiating committee was set up.

The committee recommended parallel structures for the department but a last minute revision by the faculty resulted in the position that certain matters could not be discussed within the parallel structure. The system of government was deemed by them to have only an advisory capacity.

Tension increased when the committee reported after three months the faculty decided to do nothing than have the Curriculum committees rubber stamp prior departmental decisions.

The meeting with Dupre tomorrow will last a half hour in an attempt to resolve these problems.

Student chorus brings faculty council to halt

U of T students, fighting for parity in governing the university, blocked the Arts and Science Faculty Council General Committee's procedures Monday by commandeering the Medical Sciences auditorium 15 minutes before the faculty arrived.

The 50 students who arrived first sat on the front rise and scattered throughout the small hall, occasionally joining in verses from the Rist-Nelson Memorial Glee Club Songbook.

They had arrived in parade formation, complete with a red flag, after marching from Sid Smith, through the JCR common room, the UC refectory, and past the library to the Meds auditorium.

While few onlookers were seen to join up, the enthusiastic marchers were able to call attention to the disruption techniques.

As the faculty filled the auditorium, greeted with cries of "here come the radicals", about 150 more students jammed the back of the hall. A self-appointed student chairman called the meeting to order.

"The faculty are later for this meeting than they are for your lectures, so we'll have to start this meeting," he said and quickly introduced a motion endorsing the interim parity committee that Friday's mass meeting passed, and declaring the Faculty Council's General Committee dissolved.

Gleeful students passed the motion as most faculty watched stolidly.

Jack Sword, Faculty Council Chairman, took over the rostrum and announced that due to "confusion in classroom allocation, I declare this meeting adjourned."

The faculty moved out of the hall, and congregated in the foyer, conferring briefly before breaking up in different directions.

Meanwhile Dean A. D. Allen, chairman of Arts and Science, stood to the side smiling, apparently enjoying the student-created entertainment. Questioned later, Allen saw the disruption as "rather silly, pointless, stupid but not terribly uncertain."

About 50 students remained for a more serious caucus in the same hall and voted not to place a time limit for Bissell's response to the parity demands, but they asserted, "now we've passed the ball over to Bissell."

Allen says disruption was silly

In a telephone interview with a Varsity reporter last night, A. D. Allen, Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science, considered Monday's disruption of the Faculty Council meeting "rather silly, pointless, stupid, but not terribly uncertain."

Asked his opinion on the success of Saskatoon law students in gaining a parity structure, Allen declined comment on the grounds that, "I only know about it from what I've read in the Varsity."

Claude Bissell, U of T president, could not be reached for any comment on either of the two issues.

staff member of the university."
 Although the new system went into operation Feb. 1, details of the new classifications and salary ranges have not yet been published. Most employees remain in the dark about how they have been re-evaluated — and how this will affect their future income.

Strictly speaking, administrators remain correct in asserting that no employees will suffer direct pay cuts.

But under the new system, some employees now find themselves at or near the maximum of their earning power, whereas before Feb. 1, they could have expected regular increases in line with their old salary range.

One Arts and Science Faculty employee, whose job has been re-classified downward from a "Secretary II" to a "Secretary I", finds the ceiling on her future earnings has dropped by $780.

Under the old system she could expect to earn up to $7,200 if she stayed in her present job. Now, she may earn up to $6,420.

A starting salary for somebody taking a similar job will now be $4,740, as opposed to the old minimum of $5,220.

Other employees may find that the new categories and scales drop them below the $5,300 per annum mark. Employees earning less than this are not eligible for pension contributions on the part of their employer, the university.

The main effect of the new system, explained Jack Brook, an executive assistant to Rankin, has been to raise salaries for about 500 people who had been earning less than the new minimums set for their jobs.

Comparative studies, done on about a dozen large employers, including government, Brook added, confirmed that some non-academic staff were earning salaries which "fell below the average for a similar job in the community."

Brook consented to discuss the little-publicized plan after first wondering whether "it's any of The Varsity's business."

Brook agreed that "in theory" there could be "a few cases" in which the category changes could affect the earning power of support staff.

He pointed out that staff who feel their re-classification has been unfair, have the right to appeal the decisions of the Personnel Office.

Appeals must be made through departmental chairmen and supervisors, and must be filed by the end of this month.

If the Personnel Office cannot supply redress, staff may also appeal to a three-man appeals committee, said Brook. This committee has not yet been set up. The re-evaluation of job categories applies only to U of T's non-unionized staff.

Most non-unionized staff — ranging from secretaries, technicians, lab assistants and including administrators — are hired on a one-year contract basis.

Salary scales are not normally published, although many supervisors do discuss them openly. Annual pay increases — besides the cost-of-living increase — are not made according to a formal schedule, but vary with each department and the availability of funds.

The University of Toronto Staff Association, an organization open to all U of T non-academic staff, has played no part in implementing the new job classification review.

The job re-evaluation did not extend to employees with salaries in excess of $15,000.

Obtained degree by mail order

Campus paper exposes U Vic President

VICTORIA (CUP) — Students and administrators are in a state of shock and confusion at the University of Victoria, following an article which appeared in the latest issue of U Vic's student paper, The Martlet.

The Martlet devoted two full pages and an editorial Thursday (Jan. 28) to charges that U Vic President Bruce Partridge holds some questionable law degrees.

The paper stated that Partridge's Doctor of Jurisprudence and his Bachelor of Law were obtained from a mail-order college.

Partridge was awarded a Bachelor of Law degree by Blackstone College of Law in Chicago, 1950, and received the degree of Doctor of Jurisprudence from the same institution in 1952.

Students and faculty at the University expressed shock and dismay at the Martlet publication, which included a reproduction of a page from the July 1965 issue of Popular Mechanics magazine carrying a Blackstone advertisement.

The ad was sandwiched between an ad for an "Electric Eye Insect Trap" and one for a "basement toilet which flushes up".

Below the reprinted ads, The Martlet ran an article by the late Morgan D. Parmenter, former professor of Guidance, the College of Education, University of Toronto, from a magazine called "You and the University".

Parmenter warned of "phony degree mills" which "sell worthless degrees at prices as high as 200 dollars".

A list of 32 of "some of these outfits" saw Blackstone in the seventh spot.

Students interviewed Thursday night expressed shock and confusion concerning the story. Some didn't believe it. Several faculty members said the shockwaves were still being felt in departments, but generally felt The Martlet was justified in running the story.

Friday morning a lengthy meeting of the Board of Governors, the ultimate decision making body at U Vic, was held to discuss the situation.

Following the meetings, R. B. Wilson, former chancellor of U Vic and chairman of the selection committee which chose Partridge for the presidency in 1968 issued a statement which, among other things charged The Martlet with "character assassination".

"This committee agreed unanimously that he was the outstanding candidate for the presidency and so recommended to the Board of Governors" said Wilson.

"A great deal of research was undertaken into his background including a visit to Baltimore by the three Board of Governors' representatives on the Presidential Selection Committee."

Wilson's final statement on the matter was: "I regret that The Martlet has started what appears to me to be a campaign of character assassination."

Partridge also released a statement:

"When I graduated from Blackstone College of Law, its degrees were recognized by Bar Associations in a number of states. Blackstone graduates are now practising law and hold other responsible positions in legal and other professions. In at least one state, a Blackstone graduate is a State Supreme Court Justice."

The Victoria Daily Times in its front page coverage of the situation was in touch with W. G. Harms, vice-president of Blackstone. He said that Blackstone has always been a Correspondence School and has no facilities for classroom instruction. He said it is he who approves or rejects correspondence submissions and evaluates these that are the basis on which Juris Doctor degrees are granted.

He confirmed that Partridge obtained his LLB degree in 1950 after completing the "required courses".

He said the post-grad program leading to the degree of Juris Doctor now costs 158 dollars and requires the Blackstone LLB as a pre-requisite.

Mrs. Teresa Williams, Chief of Institutional Eligibility in College and Universities, attached to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, said, "The American Bar strongly disapproves of correspondence schools offering law courses. Only one state (California) allows a man to sit for a Bar examination with a degree from a correspondence school."

Health Service cuts abortion red tape

By AGILLUKACS

A 22-year-old Toronto woman, separated from the husband who has threatened to murder her, consults the women in the clinic at Harbord and Spadina. She is pregnant by another man. If her husband finds out, he may carry out his murder threat. She wants an abortion.

The Women's Liberation abortion collective sends her to Toronto General Hospital. A doctor tells her to go home and think about it. The women send her back, tell her to try again, but to avoid the two reputedly unsympathetic doctors on staff. She is turned away by one of them and leaves, screaming. It is only then that the hospital telephones her. They will grant her abortion.

This incident occurred in January 1970, six months after the Abortion Collective was organized. Women's Liberation started a bi-weekly Birth Control Centre, later adding a 24-hour answering service for abortions.

As many as 50 women a week contacted the collective, many of whom saw its ad in the Toronto Daily Star.

"The women who came represented a wide cross-section," notes Harriet Kideckel, a recent U of T graduate, who worked at the clinic.

Some clients were U of T women who did not know what to expect at the Health Service; most were non-university women, in their twenties, often poor or on welfare, sometimes recent immigrants, she added. Kideckel said the women had often heard that abortions were illegal. All knew they would have a difficult time getting an abortion.

Most did not have a private doctor who could work them into his hospital's abortion quota.

"Hospitals give preference, like everyone else, to their own," is the slightly wry explanation of Dr. G. E. Wodehouse, director of the U of T Health Service.

Hospitals also give preference to the university's own. Of the hundred university women who have approached the Health Service, resolved on an abortion, since September 1970, all but one were successfully referred to one of three hospitals.

(The one exception was a pregnancy so far advanced that the girl preferred a faster, though more expensive, operation in New York State, to Toronto's two-week waiting period.)

These statistics clearly negate a section of the brief on abortion to be presented to U of T President Bissell by various women's groups tomorrow. The brief says in part: "When a woman unwillingly becomes pregnant, the university will provide no help of any kind".

The statement is a residual reaction to the Health Service's refusal, in former years, to refer women to non-authorized abortionists. This was before the amendment to the Canadian Criminal Code, May 1969 and the New York State law of July 1970, which left the abortion decision up to a woman and her doctor. The law in Canada still requires the approval of "three medical practitioners at an accredited or approved hospital".

The Women's Lib. Birth Control Centre had provided the information when the Health Service refused.

"We'd pull out all the stops — we have a stable of psychiatrists", said Dr. Wodehouse of Health Service procedure in previous years, "but that stupid business of the mother's 'health' meant that only 60%-70% of our referrals were successful."

Previous to the amendment abortions were only granted if they threatened the life of the mother. The present law allows 'threat to health' to be interpreted as mental as well as physical health.

The Toronto hospitals to which the Health Service refers its pregnant women — Toronto General, Sunnybrook and Women's College — co-operate for several reasons. The elitism of preferring nicely-dressed, middle-class students whose studies would be interrupted or terminated by pregnancy, was recognized by both Wodehouse and Kideckel.

Also the university has strong ties with hospitals, through present students and teaching staff, and graduate doctors there added Wodehouse.

If a hospital board, manned by three doctors, approves a patient referred by other doctors, her abortion will cost under $100, if she doesn't have hospital insurance.

But the problem, even for the privileged woman, is not as simple as it seems. Toronto General Hospital placed its weekly abortion quota at 30 this summer.

Abortions are speedy and too simple, ironically enough, so they provide no challenge to interns or other doctors. They are not interested in performing abortions en masse, explains Dr. Wodehouse.

The psychiatrists, who usually number one or two of the three abortion board members, often find the job too time-consuming, Dr. Wodehouse adds.

Abortions should not be performed without lying-in facilities, he cautioned, since periodically a woman almost bleeds to death at home after the short operation in a doctor's office.

And there aren't enough beds for this treatment, he argued.

"Several years ago, we had a weasel policy", he admits. "We would give sex education to anyone, but talk about contraception to married couples and legitimate premarriage cases — we stretched it to fifty or sixty kids a year."

In 1970, 600 birth-control prescriptions were supplied.

"Unmarried women or women under 21 are not given different treatment," he explains, "because the best way to prevent abortion problems is to practice contraception."

Food Sciences: an irresponsible decision

Here's a true or false question.

Is this statement true or not: 'we are being poisoned to death'?

We can't give the answers here; all we can do is speculate.

Sometimes, deep down in your guts, you get to feeling that, for sure, we are being poisoned.

Especially if you live in residence or eat regularly at an on-campus cafeteria. The greasy, starchy, unbalanced kinds of meals many of us experience from day to day can't help but have a debilitating effect on both our bodies and our minds.

If you take a close look at the kind of food we regularly buy at restaurants and supermarkets, you will come to some sad conclusions about the state of our national health. Books like William Longman's The Poisons in Your Food reveal some astonishing facts about where our food comes from and what effects it has been shown to have in experimental situations.

All over North America people are beginning to take a second look at what we have been shovelling down our throats — and trying to see if there are any alternatives.

We can't find out alone.

That's why institutions like U of T's Faculty of Food Sciences could play a vitally important part in the decade ahead of us. As people become more and more conscious of the need to pay more careful heed to the quality of our environment and our own possibilities for survival, such an institution becomes increasingly significant.

Yet late last month, without prior consultation with either staff or students involved, U of T administrators announced a plan to kill off the Faculty of Food Sciences over the next three years.

Swift student reaction to the decision has delayed approval of the phasing out of the Faculty by the Senate. Students will now have time to prepare a defence for the continued existence of their Faculty.

It strikes us that, in the first place, no such decision should ever be taken without full consultation between all groups affected.

A central recommendation of the Report of the Commission on University Government was to decentralize decision-making as much as possible.

Certainly, administrators should not be allowed to make such decisions on the basis of what they perceive as expediency and cost per student ratios.

Secondly, as students in Food Science have pointed out clearly, here is an opportunity for the university to assert its sense of social responsibility — by sponsoring practical research into the quality of our foods.

"In a time of massive concern for health and human ecology, our faculty is playing and will play a most significant role," write several Food Science students.

To abolish the Faculty of Food Sciences would be an irresponsible move, something like abolishing a school of Pollution Control at a time when coping with pollution is just becoming an urgent social priority.

Whether or not we are being poisoned to death is a question that can and should be answered by students and faculty, working together towards an important social goal.

More irresponsibility?

Above, you can read some comments on how the university is forgetting its obligations to the society it is supposed to serve.

But, from the evidence of the latest news, there appears to be yet another area in which the university is forgetting itself.

The new job classification system which went into effect this week (see front page story) has left a lot of U of T's non-unionized employees with a situation they had no part in creating.

The university was correct, of course, to ensure that none of its support staff is being underpaid. That was one of the objectives of the new plan.

But the other side of it is the re-evaluation of jobs.

Many employees, while not facing direct salary cuts, have been demoted to categories with lower maximum possible salaries than they originally expected to be able to earn.

Some employees find themselves being paid more than the university says their particular job is worth, and that they can expect no further salary increases as long as they remain on the job.

Surely there must be a more humane method of making decisions about the business operations of the university. Employees have been faced, much like students usually are, with a 'fait accompli' which they can only appeal individually.

The only significant body of unionized employees on campus are the library workers, who belong to the Canadian Union of Public Employees. The university, of course, did not attempt to interfere here, and try to re-adjust job definitions and salary scales. They would have had to deal directly with the staff involved.

For U of T, it is easy to make cut-and-dried arbitrary decisions about the fate of a fragmented and disunited group of workers.

Until collective bargaining is gained as a right for all U of T non-academic staff, the university will continue to make arbitrary decisions.

For students, many of the parallels should be obvious.

Sports and politics

"Sportsmen" in the United States howled with indignation when Tommy Smith and John Carlos, two black athletes raised black-gloved fists at the 1968 Olympic games in solidarity with their black brothers and sisters fighting racism at home in America.

But these same sportsmen enraged at "uppity niggers" bringing 'politics' into athletics, staged an incredible display of National Chauvinism at the Super Bowl football championship on January 17.

For any readers who missed it the pre-game show of U.S. Air Force fighter-bombers was a frightening testimonial of just how far the U.S. has gone in becoming a militaristic nation. Not only did the jets fly past but they even staged a mock dropping out of formation to signify the shooting down of a U.S. plane by Vietnamese peasants.

The half-time show of this spectacular extravaganza, viewed by millions of people around the world was no less propagandistic. The announcer raved about his love of this 'great nation' with the obvious implication that the Vietnamese were threatening it. He then introduced Anita Bryant as the 'Voice of America' to sing the Battle Hymn of the Republic.

Widely advertised was the fact that players on the winning side received $15,000 and the losers $7,500 each. Less widely broadcast was the enormous profit made on the whole show by the owners of the various clubs. Gate receipts approached ¼ million dollars, and television rights amounted to several millions.

How much will that CDC really cost us?

OTTAWA - (CUP) - With much fanfare on the part of the National press, for that of course is what it is being paid for, the Canadian Development Corporation was introduced to the house of commons last week by Trudeau's finance minister Edgar Benson.

Its job is to buy back Canada wherever possible (profitably?), so that Canadians can regain some control of their economy. Which Canadians and the contradictions in the plan were, of course, not gone into very deeply by Benson, or the national press.

The following is an article by Claude Henault, former Ottawa bureau writer for the Toronto Telegram, and now working as a free-lance journalist. The piece was broadcast on the CBC television program Viewpoint.

No matter where you stand in the political spectrum, the Canada Development Corporation offers something for you to criticize.

The ultra-conservative will see in the project the sinister shadow of that old spectre, creeping socialism. The progressive (small p) conservative will probably be angered not on the basis of ideology, but because the government is moving into a holding company field which already seems saturated. Liberals will object on similar grounds, to which will be added the complaint that the corporation will not do anything to further Canadian economic nationalism. Those further left will be angered by the fact that, in effect, public money is not to be used to further the interests of the general public, but of the investing capitalists.

A good case can be made, depending on your original political beliefs, for all these arguments. However, as my point of view is one from the left on this issue, I won't try for false objectivity, but instead will attempt a subjective critique.

The way I see it, the corporation will use as its nucleus tax revenue in the amount of a quarter-billion dollars, over three years. This money, which came from all Canadians, including the poor and the economically marginal, who have no money to invest because all their revenue goes for essentials, or in taxes, this money will be put at the disposal of those with enough money to indulge in investment. So, my initial objection is that money collected from all classes is to be put at the service of a minority, those who are neither poor, unemployed or underpaid.

This situation might have been tolerable if the aims of the corporation had been established as being the creation of jobs, or the setting up of industries for which there is a social need, or even if it had been aimed at doing work which the private sector is reluctant to undertake because profit ratios are either too low, or profits too far off.

However, the Canada Development

Corporation does not have such aims. Finance minister Benson said, and I for one believe him, that the primary consideration of the corporation will be profits. Because the corporation plan proposes a mix of private and public enterprise, profits must be the only criterion, otherwise, private capital will not be attracted.

What this means is that, despite the massive government input of funds, the Canada Development Corporation will be no better a corporate citizen than, for instance, Dunlop, which, in Toronto for reasons of economy, closed a plant and put hundreds out of work. It means that the Corporation will not be able to set up low-profit industries, even if these would have the advantage of stimulating the creation of private-sector satellite industries. In other words, no specifically social role for this organism.

What else will it do for us? For one thing, it will take part of our collective present, and our future. Polymer, one of the rare crown corporations which consistently rewards the taxpayer by making a profit — which comes back to the taxpayer in the way of public spending — will be sold to the corporation which, Mr. Benson says, will be mainly in private hands.

Panarctic Oils, a private-public mix which now is effectively under government control because of its 45 per cent investment, will also slip into private hands, taking with it oil reserves which show tremendous promise.

Eldorado Nuclear, another federal property with a shaky present but a glowing atomic future, also slips out of your hands.

The faults of the Canada Development Corporation plan will become glaringly obvious the day the first corporation holding is sold to a U.S. corporation, for profit reasons, the day a corporation holding fires staff, for profit reasons, the day Polymer, Eldorado and Panarctic, which your money developed, pay profits not to you, but to a limited number of investors.

On that day, the Liberal party may realize that in establishing the Canada Development Corporation, it hung an albatross around its neck.

What evil lurks behind the Liberal smokescreen of Edgar Benson?

Who will end up owning the CDC? Well, maybe The Bank of Nova Scotia's directors or some other equally powerful group

(The following information is taken from the Financial Post Directory of Directors for 1969.)

The Bank of Nova Scotia, not the largest by any means of Canada's nine national banks, has 32 members on its board of directors.

Those 32 directors hold executive positions on:

- 147 corporations (manufacturing and industrial kinds)
- 38 investment and development corporations
- 27 insurance companies
- 23 trust companies
- 6 savings, loan and mortgage companies
- 5 real estate companies
- 2 newspaper groups
- 6 banks other than the bank of Nova Scotia — all of them foreign banks, most of them in the Caribbean

- 11 boards of universities and colleges.

It is impossible to estimate how much all those corporations and companies are worth, but the names of some of the institutions involved will give you some idea of how wealth and power are concentrated in the hands of a few.

Corporations include Gulf Oil of America, Gulf Oil of Canada, Bermuda National Bank, Canadian Life Assurance Company, Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada, Canada Permanent Trust, Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada, Brasecan Ltd., Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd., Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada, Ralston Purina of Canada Ltd., Bell Canada, Algoma Central Railway, Canada Tungsten Mining Corporation, Consolidated Bathurst Ltd., Atlantic Sugar Refineries Co. Ltd., Dominion Stores, Alberta Gas Trunk Line Co. Ltd., Royal Trust, F P Publications, the Investors Group, Canadian Pacific Railway, Northern Electric Co. Ltd., Noranda Mines Ltd., Noranda Copper Mills, Kerr-Addison Mines, St. Lawrence Cement Co., The Steel Company of Canada Ltd., Quebec Iron and Titanium Corporation, Salada Foods Ltd., Dominion Oxygen Co. Ltd., Ocean Maid Foods Ltd., Union Carbide of Canada Ltd., Parker Pen Co. Ltd., Anglo-Rouyn Mines Ltd., International Helium Co. Ltd., Scott Restaurants, Arthur Guinness Son and Co. Ltd., Empire Life Insurance Co., Great Canadian Oil Sands Ltd., Interprovincial Pipe Line Co., Dominion Foundries and Steel Ltd., Polymer Corporation, Federal Grain, International Nickel Company of Canada Ltd., Molson Breweries of Canada, Texaco Canada Ltd.

This doesn't mean the Bank of Nova Scotia controls these companies, just that the bank's directors also hold director positions or higher on all of them.

Now, the Canada Development Corporation says that no one corporation or individual can own more than five per cent of the shares in the company.

A bank like the Bank of Nova Scotia through its 32 directors and the myriad of companies they have a voice in because of the corporate connections could very quickly, legally and efficiently own all of the Canada Development Corporation, except the government's 10 per cent — that is if the directors of the bank thought they wanted to do that.

But, Trudeau's finance minister Benson says that won't happen, in fact he leads us to believe that it couldn't happen. The history of development in the kind of economic games corporate capitalists now play, shows that wealth and corporate control tends to centralize.

Restructuring discussed daily

By TONY USHER

The Arts and Science parity restructuring committee set up by last Friday's mass meeting held its first working session last night.

Five staff and five students have been named to begin preparation of a realistic and acceptable proposal for a new faculty council, which will be presented to the university community as soon as possible.

At a meeting Monday of faculty who have backed the parity cause, the names of five staff willing to serve were announced.

Since then a telephone poll of sympathetic faculty has elicited general support for the choice, which will be confirmed by another faculty meeting Friday.

The five faculty commissioners are: Lawrence Lynch (Chairman, Philosophy, St. Michael's). Lynch was co-chairman of the Commission on University Government which unanimously recommended faculty-student parity in U of T structures including faculty councils.

• Chris Plowright (Zoology; acting Academic Co-ordinator.

Innis College). Plowright has been active in Pollution Probe and on Innis College's parity council.

• Mel Watkins (Political Economy), best known as a radical economist and as a leader of the NDP's left wing Waffle group. Watkins has been prominent in organizing progressive faculty during the parity crisis.

• Milton Wilson (Chairman, English, Trinity).

• Fred Winter (Fine Art). Winter was chairman of the Association of the Teaching Staff in 1968-69, when the ATS endorsed parity membership on the CUG commission. In a 1969 Varsity interview, Winter endorsed parity and saw the ideal university as a community in which "ideas are discussed and attitudes promoted which would help to rectify society's wrongs."

Last Friday's mass meeting approved the five student members: Eden Anderson, Vince Dolan, Brian Morgan, Thom Schofield, and Bob Spencer.

The committee has already begun substantive discussions on the role and structuring of the Faculty Council and has agreed to meet daily in an effort to find a constructive proposal for a new Faculty Council within the next few weeks.

Liberals call halt to student-teacher ratio decrease

An Ontario Liberal policy conference two weeks ago called for a halt in the reduction of the average number of students per teacher and an examination of means of increasing the number of students per teacher, as one facet of their blueprint for universities.

Anne's granola recipe

Health food really works — it gives you energy that is packaged out of most foods — but it can also be expensive, especially if you're buying more than the basic ingredients for your own concoctions. Like bags of crunchy granola can get to be a bit more expensive than giant boxes of Rice Crispies. So, make your own:

Combine:

- 3 lbs. oats
- medium bag of wheat germ
- 1 lb. sunflower seeds
- 1/2 lb. sesame seeds
- 1 bag unsweetened coconut

This recipe is large quantity — 5 lbs. costs about $2.50 — so you'll probably need two large baking pans. Put ingredients in the pan and pour over it a mixture of:

- 1 cup water
- 1 cup soya oil
- 1/3 cup vanilla
- 2 cups brown sugar or raw sugar

Bake at 350 for three and a half hours, stirring at least every half hour until crunchy and golden. If you like less of a cereal taste and more sweetness, another cup of sugar and more oil can be added.

THE FALSE IDEOLOGY OF SCHOOLING

BY IVAN ILLICH

DURING THE PAST DECADE, we have become used to seeing the world divided into two parts: the developed and the underdeveloped. People in the development business may prefer to speak of the developed nations and the less developed or developing nations. This terminology suggests that development is both good and inevitable. Others, especially protagonists of revolutionary change, speak of the Third World and wait for the day when the wretched of the earth will rise in armed revolt against the imperialist powers and shift control over existing institutions from north to south, from white to black, from metropolis to colony.

A vulgar example of the first assumption is the Rockefeller report on the Americas. Its doctrine has been aptly summed up by U.S. President Richard Nixon: "This I pledge: The nation that went to the moon in peace for all mankind is ready to share its technology in peace with its nearest neighbors." The governor, in turn, proposes that keeping the pledge might require a lot of additional weaponry in South America.

The Pearson report on partnership in development is a much more sophisticated example of the development mentality. It outlines policies that will permit a few more countries to join the charmed circle of the consumer nations, but that will actually increase the poverty of the poor in these same countries, because the strategies proposed will sell them ever more thoroughly on goods and services ever more expensive and out of their reach. The policy goals of most revolutionary movements and governments I know — and I do not know Mao's China — reflect another type of cynicism. Their leaders make futile promises that — once they are in power for a sufficient length of time — more of everything the masses have learned to know and to crave as privileges of the rich will be produced and distributed. Both the purveyors of development and the preachers of revolution advocate more of the same. They define more education as more schooling, better health as more doctors, higher mobility as more high-speed vehicles. The goals of development are always and everywhere stated in terms of consumer-value packages standardized around the North Atlantic — and therefore always and everywhere imply more privileges for a few. Political reorganization cannot change this fact; it can only rationalize it. Different ideologies create different minorities of privileged consumers, but heart surgery or a university education is always priced out of range for all but a few, be they the rich, the orthodox, or the most fascinating subjects for experiments by surgeons or pedagogues.

Underdevelopment is the result of a state of mind common to both socialist and capitalist countries. Present development goals are neither desirable nor reasonable. Unfortunately, anti-imperialism is no antidote. Although exploitation of poor countries is an undeniable reality, current nationalism is merely the affirmation of the right of colonial elites to repeat history and follow the road traveled by the rich toward the universal consumption of internationally marketed packages, a road that can ultimately lead only to universal pollution and universal frustration.

The central issue of our time remains the fact that the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer. This hard fact is often obscured by another apparently contradictory fact. In the rich countries, the poor have access to a quantity and quality of commodities beyond the dreams of Louis XIV, while many of the so-called developing countries enjoy much higher economic growth rates than those of industrialized countries at a similar stage of their own histories. From icebox to toilet and from antibiotic to television, conveniences Washington could not have imagined at Mount Vernon are found necessary in Harlem, just as Bolivar could not have foreseen the social polarization now inevitable in Caracas. But rising levels neither of minimum consumption in the rich countries nor of urban consumption in the poor countries can close the gap between rich and poor nations or between the rich and poor of any one nation. Modern poverty is a by-product of a world market catering to the ideologies of an industrial middle class. Modern poverty is built into an international community where demand is engineered through publicity to stimulate the production of standard commodities. In such a market, expectations are standardized and must always outrace marketable resources.

In the United States, for all its gargantuan prosperity, real poverty levels rise faster than the median income. In the capital-starved countries, median incomes move rapidly away from rising averages. Most goods now produced for rich and poor alike in the United States are beyond the reach of all but a few in other areas. In both rich and poor nations, consumption is polarized while expectation is equalized.

During the decade now beginning, we must learn a new language, a language that speaks not of development and underdevelopment but of true and false ideas about man, his needs, and his potential. Development programs all over the world progressively lead to violence, in the form either of repression or of rebellion. This is due to neither the evil intentions of capitalists nor the ideological rigidity of communists, but to the radical inability of men to tolerate the by-products of industrial and welfare institutions developed in the early industrial age. In the late Sixties, attention was suddenly drawn to the inability of man to survive his industry. During the late Sixties, it became evident that less than 10 per cent of the human race consumes more than 50 per cent of the world's resources and produces 90 per cent of the physical pollution that threatens to extinguish the biosphere. But this is only one aspect of the paradox of present development. During the early Seventies, it will become equally clear that welfare institutions have an analogous regressive effect. The international institutionalization of social service, medicine, and education generally identified with development has equally overwhelming, destructive by-products.

We need an alternative program, an alternative both to development and to merely political revolution. Let me call this alternative program either institutional or cultural revolution, because its aim is the transformation of both public and personal reality. The political revolutionary wants to improve existing institutions — their productivity and the quality and distribution of their products. His vision of what is desirable and possible is based on consumption habits developed during the past hundred years. The cultural revolutionary believes that these habits have radically distorted our view of what human beings can have and want. He questions the reality others take for granted, a reality that is, in his view, the artificial by-product of contemporary institutions, created and reinforced by them in pursuit of their short-term ends. The political revolutionary concentrates on schooling and tooling for the environment that the rich countries, socialist or capitalist, have engineered. The cultural revolutionary risks the future on the educability of man.

The cultural revolutionary must be distinguished from not only the political magician but also both the neo-Luddite and the promoter of intermediary technology. The former behaves as if either the noble savage could be restored to the throne or the Third World transformed into a reservation for him. He opposes the internal combustion engine rather than oppose its packaging into some product designed for exclusive use by the man who owns it. Thus, the Luddite blames the producer; the institutional revolutionary tries to reshape the design and distribution of the product. The Luddite blames the machine; the cultural revolutionary heightens awareness that it produces needless demands. The cultural revolutionary must also be distinguished from the promoter of intermediary technology who is often merely a superior tactician paving the road to totally manipulated consumption.

IT'S THE ONLY GAME IN TOWN

Let me illustrate what I mean by a cultural revolution within one major international institution, by taking as an example the institution that currently produces education. I mean, of course, obligatory schooling: full-time attendance of age-specific groups in a graded curriculum.

Latin America has decided to school itself into development. This decision results in the production of homemade inferiority. With every school that is built, another seed of institutional corruption is planted, and this is in the name of growth.

Schools affect individuals and characterize nations. Individuals merely get a bad deal; nations are irreversibly degraded when they build schools to help their citizens play at international competition. For the individual, school is always a gamble. The chances may be very slim, but everyone shoots for the same jackpot. Of course, as any professional gambler knows, it is the rich who win in the end, and the poor who get hooked. And if the poor man manages to stay in the game for a while, he will feel the pain even more sharply when he does lose, as he almost inevitably must. Primary school dropouts in a Latin American city find it increasingly difficult to get an industrial job.

But no matter how high the odds everyone plays the game, for there is, after all, only one game in town. A scholarship may be a long shot, but it is a chance to become equal to the world's best-trained bureaucrats. And the student who fails can console himself with the knowledge that the cards were stacked against him from the outset.

More and more, men begin to believe that in the schooling game the loser gets only what he deserves. The belief in the ability of schools to label people correctly is already so strong that people accept their vocational and marital fates with a gambler's resignation. In cities, this faith in school-slotting is on the way to sprouting a more creditable meritocracy — a state of mind in which each citizen believes that he deserves the place assigned to him by school. A perfect meritocracy, in which there would be no excuses, is not yet upon us, and I believe it can be avoided. It must be avoided, since a perfect meritocracy would not only be hellish, it would be hell.

Educators appeal to the gambling instinct of the entire population when they raise money for schools. They advertise the jackpot without mentioning the odds. And those odds are high indeed for someone who is born brown, poor, or on the pampa. In Latin America, no country is prouder of its legally obligatory admission-free school system than Argentina. Yet, only one Argentinian of 5,000 born into the lower half of the population gets as far as the university.

What is only a wheel of fortune for an individual is a spinning wheel of irreversible underdevelopment for a nation. The high cost of schooling turns education into a scarce resource, as poor countries accept that a certain number of years in school makes an educated man. More money gets spent on fewer people. In poor countries, the school pyramid of the rich countries takes on the shape of an obelisk, or a rocket. School inevitably gives individuals who attend it and then drop out, as well as those who don't make it at all, a rationale for their own inferiority. But for poor nations, obligatory schooling is a monument to self-inflicted inferiority. To buy the schooling hoax is to purchase a ticket for the back seat in a bus headed nowhere.

Schooling encrusts the poorest nations at the bottom of the educational bucket. The school systems of Latin America are fossilized records of a dream begun a century ago. The school pyramid is abuilding from top to bottom throughout Latin America. All countries there spend more than 20 per cent of their national budgets and nearly 5 per cent of their Gross National Products on its construction. Teachers constitute the largest profession, and their children are frequently the largest group of students in the upper grades. Fundamental education either is redefined as the foundation for schooling and therefore placed beyond the reach of the unschooled and the early dropout or it is defined as a remedy for the unschooled, which will only frustrate him into accepting inferiority. Even the poorest countries continue to spend disproportionate sums on graduate schools — gardens that ornament the penthouses of sky-scrapers built in a slum.

Bolivia is well on the way to suicide by an overdose of schooling. This impoverished, landlocked country creates papier-mache bridges to prosperity by spending more than a third of its entire budget on public education and half as much again on private schools. A full half of this educational mis-spending is consumed by 1 per cent of the school-age population. In Bolivia, the university student's share of public funds is a thousand times greater than that of his fellow citizen of median income. Most Bolivian people live outside the city, yet only 2 per cent of the rural population makes it to the fifth grade. This discrimination was legally sanctioned in 1967 by declaring grade school obligatory for all — a law that made most people criminal by fiat, and the rest immoral exploiters by decree. In 1970, the university entrance examinations were abolished with a flourish of egalitarian rhetoric. At first glance, it does seem a libertarian advance to legislate that all high school graduates have a right to enter the university — until you realize that fewer than 2 per cent of Bolivians finish high school.

Bolivia may be an extreme example of schooling in Latin America. But on an international scale, Bolivia is typical. Few African or Asian countries have attained the progress now taken for granted there.

Cuba is perhaps an example of the other extreme. Fidel Castro has tried to create a major cultural revolution. He has reshaped the academic pyramid. Yet, the Cuban pyramid is still a pyramid. There is no doubt that the redistribution of privilege, the redefinition of social goals, and the popular participation in the achievement of these goals have reached spectacular heights in Cuba since the Revolution. For the moment, however, Cuba is only showing that under exceptional political conditions the present school system can be expanded exceptionally. But there are built-in limits to the elasticity of present institutions, and Cuba is at the point of reaching them. The Cuban Revolution will work — within these limits. Which only means that Dr. Castro will have masterminded a faster road to a bourgeois meritocracy than those previously taken by capitalists or Bolsheviks. Sometimes, when he is not promising schools for all, Castro hints at a policy of de-schooling for all, and the Isle of Pines seems to be a laboratory for redistribution of educational functions to other social institutions. But unless Cuban educators admit that work-education effective in a rural economy can be even more effective in an urban one, Cuba's institutional revolution will not begin. No cultural revolution can be built on the denial of reality.

As long as communist Cuba continues to promise obligatory high school completion by the end of this decade, it is, in this regard, institutionally no more promising than fascist Brazil, which has made a similar promise. In both Brazil and Cuba, enough girls have already been born to double the number of potential mothers in the 1980s. Per capita resources available for education can hardly be expected to double in either country, and even if they could, no progress would have been made at all. In Brazil and in Cuba, waiting for Godot is equally futile. Without a radical change in their institutional goals, both "revolutions" must make fools of themselves. Unfortunately, both seem headed for manifest foolishness, albeit by different routes. The Cubans allow work, party, and community involvement to nibble away at the school year, and call this involvement radical education, while the Brazilians let U.S. experts peddle teaching devices that only raise the per capita cost of classroom attendance.

The production of inferiority through schooling is more evident in poor countries and perhaps more painful in rich countries. In the United States, the 10 per cent with the highest incomes can provide most of the education for their children through private institutions. Yet, they also succeed in obtaining ten times more of the public resources devoted to education than the poorest 10 per cent of the population. In Soviet Russia, a more puritanical belief in meritocracy makes the concentration of schooling privileges on the children of urban professionals even more painful.

In the shadow of each national school pyramid, an international caste system is wedded to an international class structure. Countries are ranged like castes, each of whose educational dignity is determined by the average years of schooling of its citizens. Individual citizens of all countries achieve a symbolic mobility through a class system that makes each man accept the place he believes he merits.

The political revolutionary strengthens the demand for schooling by futilely promising that under his administration more learning and increased earning will become available to all through more schooling. He contributes to the modernization of a world class structure and a modernization of poverty. It remains the task of the cultural revolutionary to overcome the delusions on which the support of school is based and to outline policies for the radical de-schooling of society.

The basic reason for all this is that schooling comes in quantities. Less than so much is no good, and the minimum quantity carries a minimum price. It is obvious that with schools of equal quality a poor child can never catch up with a rich one, nor a poor country with a rich country. It is equally obvious that poor children and poor countries never have equal schools, but always poorer ones; thus, they fall ever further behind, as long as they depend on schools for their education.

Another illusion is that most learning is a result of teaching. Teaching may contribute to certain kinds of learning under certain circumstances. The strongly motivated student faced with the task of learning a new code may benefit greatly from the discipline we now associate mostly with the old-fashioned schoolmaster. But most people acquire most of their insight, knowledge, and skill outside of school — and in school only insofar as school in a few rich countries becomes their place of confinement during an increasing part of their lives. The radical de-schooling of society begins, therefore, with the unmasking by cultural revolutionaries of the myth of schooling. It continues with the struggle to liberate other men's minds from the false ideology of schooling — an ideology that makes domestication by schooling inevitable. In its final and positive stage, it is the struggle for the right to educational freedom, economy, and efficiency.

A cultural revolutionary must fight for legal protection from the imposition of any obligatory graded curriculum. The first article of a bill of rights for a modern and humanist society should parallel the First Amendment of the United States Constitution. The state shall make no law with respect to an establishment of education. There shall be no graded curriculum, obligatory for all. To make this dis-establishment effective, we need a law forbidding discrimination in hiring, voting, or admission to centers of learning based on previous attendance in some curriculum. This guarantee would not exclude specific tests of competence, but would remove the present absurd discrimination in favor of the person who learns a given skill with the largest expenditure of public funds. A third legal reform would guarantee the right of each citizen to an equal share of public educational resources, the right to verify his share of these resources, and the right to sue for them if they are denied. A generalized GI bill, or an edu-credit card in the hand of every citizen, would effectively implement this third guarantee.

Abolition of obligatory schooling, abolition of job discrimination in favor of persons who have acquired their learning at a higher cost, plus establishment of edu-credit, would permit the development of a true market for educational services. According to present political ideology, this market could be influenced by various devices: premiums paid to those who acquire certain needed skills, interest-bearing edu-credit to increase the privileges of those who use it later in life, and advantages for industries that incorporate additional formal training into the work routine.

A fourth guarantee to protect the consumer against the monopoly of the educational market would be analogous to antitrust laws.

I have shown in the case of education that a cultural or institutional revolution depends upon the clarification of reality. Development as now conceived is just the contrary: management of the environment and the tooling of man to fit into it. Development is the attempt to create an environment and then educate at great cost to pay for it. Cultural revolution is a reviewing of the reality of man and a redefinition of the world in terms that support this reality.

Your Future!

When you graduate --- if you are going to be a "have" rather than a "have not," the "White Paper on Taxation" will effect you more than any other group of Canadians!

Thousands of alarmed Canadians opposed a number of proposals in the White Paper. Since then, the reaction has been overwhelming in violent opposition to the ill-conceived designs outlined in the White Paper. The government encouraged and called for the filing of briefs to ascertain reaction. Reaction was critical and outspoken, almost without exception. . . associations, accounting firms, investment dealers, farm groups, companies large and small interpreted for the government the ill effect of the White Paper proposals.

Quite apart from this response and the massive public outcry. . . 9 out of our 10 provincial governments recorded criticism of the proposals. Some time (and many dollars) later, the Senate committee released a most devastating attack on the issue, only to be followed by the Commons committee report which suggested alterations.

Why this ad - now - at this time?

The government must be reminded that we still are alarmed at what this White Paper tax team will produce.

Should we not demand an opportunity to voice our opinion on the revised White Paper? Much legislation in the past has been "pushed" through after the tumult and the shouting dies. . . let us not have this happen with the white paper on taxation.

Many Canadians already have reason to believe that we may not get a reasonable period for further study of this important issue.

If you have any question on this issue it is best to write to your M.P. and send a coupon.

"Soak the rich and help the poor" is old-fashioned and is no longer valid. It is now the middle income group who will get soaked. (Such as students after graduation.) The rich are already being soaked and are too few in numbers. If those making over $25,000 a year were taxed an extra $1,000, and it was given to those making under $5,000, the amount would only be $7.00.

"Soak the rich companies". They are now being soaked more than companies in the U.S. or Britain. Let us not forget, they can always go away - leaving thousands of unemployed.

THE SHOCKING FACT:

The same men who wrote the complicated, ill-conceived plan are now behind closed doors writing the final document deciding Canada's social and economic future.

Your M.P. votes on your behalf.
Let him know you are concerned.

The Hon. Ross Thatcher, Liberal Premier of Saskatchewan said, "I contend that Canadians haven't any idea what the White Paper will do to them, and they won't wake up until they have had their first tax bill. People should acquaint themselves and then they certainly should get in touch with their member. And the M.P.'s, if they want to continue to be M.P.'s had better listen to them."

BLUNDERS

On original White Paper

1. It has been recognized by leading accountants that Canadians pay approximately twice as much income tax as their U.S. counterparts. The "White Paper Highlights" released by the Department of Finance gave highly deceptive figures. Example: Income $8,000, the Department said, the Canadian tax was lower by 7.22% (New York vs Ontario) when in fact after all proper U.S. deductions are made, the U.S. is 54.69% lower.

2. The proposed "tax integration" - a method combining company tax and personal income tax, becomes so complicated even tax experts (including government tax experts) are still unable to supply the answers as to how it works.

3. They proposed to tax investors gains every five years even though they have not actually realized, or been paid, the money. (A sure way to discourage anyone investing in Canada but a sure way to ultimately have all financial wealth in the hands of the government.)

4. To tax Canadians holding Canadian stocks more than foreign investors. (Foreign investors could not be forced to pay the five year capital gains tax.)

5. Mr. Benson repeatedly claimed the White Paper was necessary to cure the abuse of a person paying a lower tax rate by owning several different companies. This is a gross deception since an effective law was passed in 1964 empowering the government to prevent this practice.

6. Under the White Paper many Canadian companies would find themselves in the position that the more successful they were in business, the faster taxes would force them to sell control of their company (which usually would be to a foreigner).

7. Hopelessly ridiculous tax situations could appear under the White Paper . . . for example the total estate gift, and income tax in relation to a property could exceed the value of that property.

B. The new taxes will result in making it less attractive for foreign investors to invest in developing Canada's natural resources than in other countries (such as Australia). If these dollars were encouraged to come to Canada, they would produce new jobs for Canadian workers.

9. The Government said the White Paper would help the less fortunate, yet on examination one sees that a single person making as little as $3,900 a year would have to pay more tax.

Yes, there have been some corrections promised but how did "brilliant" men with all the time and research at their disposal produce such a mess?

Howcum Johnson came to class on Wednesday?

I sort of wonder howcum Brian Johnson (Varsity, January 29: 'I am just a student, sir...') came to his 12 o'clock Modern Novel class last Wednesday. Since he was on strike, a non-violent strike calling for no disruption of classes, he obviously couldn't have come specifically to shit disturb. So I have to assume that he came out of a real, live interest in Graham Greene's clever book Brighton Rock.

I'm not going to talk much about what I thought of Johnson's arguments during that class (yes, Virginia, I was there, and as student rep to the course committee even have the honour of being misquoted in Johnson's article). I agreed with a lot of what he said was wrong with the system under which we are all forced to operate.

But that ain't the point. The point is that it's childish (and when Hayne remarked that he bases his characterisations of people as being children on observation, I'm very much afraid he was talking specifically about Johnson, not "us", as Johnson said) to think anything is going to be solved by raising shit in Hayne's class. Hayne certainly is not going to magically change his views, and even if he did that doesn't change the system of grading in the Combined Departments of English.

The proper place to raise shit is in the course committee or in a meeting of the C.D.E. (where, unless I'm very much mistaken, English students have PARITY). If Johnson tried that, maybe something could be done to change the ridiculously ambiguous rulings now in force as to grading procedures. All Johnson did with his little exercise in confrontation tactics was to waste his breath and ours.

be projecting his feelings onto the rest of his classmates. Maybe he felt "existentially trapped in the heaviest conflict I've ever seen in a classroom." I felt existentially trapped in the midst of a series of ad hominem arguments between Hayne and Johnson that were so futile as to be almost laughable. Johnson said that "We were scared. A free discussion was impossible under the glare of authority vested in that man behind the lectern".

Maybe he was — the rest of us simply had nothing to say on the issue of a course exam. Hayne had given us the option of writing it or of leaving for another section at the beginning of the year and everyone (including Johnson) had made the decision to stay. Maybe Johnson feels that the sole purpose of going to class is "to get a mark, get a degree, get a job-maybe-if-I'm-lucky". Personally I'm there because I actually enjoy learning about English Literature, and actually do think Brighton Rock is a clever book.

A desire to change the system is laudable, until you get to the point where the sole purpose of your activities is to "break the boredom".

Some important facts which should be added

There are a few important facts that should be added to the much abbreviated article submitted by Tony Smith and printed in The Varsity Friday Jan. 29.

When I made my objections to the article in question at the editorial meeting, I never presumed I could stop its printing. It was agreed, however, that since my objections were so strong on the principle of such a thing going in the Staff Newsletter, I could add a footnote, as a member of the committee, to state my disagreement.

This privilege was later denied me, since the article was "official" and hence my anger, because to me it made a complete farce of the whole idea both of an editorial committee, and the supposed freedom to express oneself.

It should also be added that most members advised against the printing of this article in the Staff Newsletter at this time. Since we are more at the grassroots level, we have more idea of what the response could be, and felt it to be somewhat inopportune and insensitive to the general atmosphere that has often prevailed in the library recently.

CLM cites Lenin to refute charges of racist nationalism

AT THE END of a mass meeting at Sid Smith Hall last week, Robin Mathews asked members of the audience to join him in a march to the Canadian Immigration Office to protest against the active discrimination against Canadian academics and the preferential hiring of foreign professors in Canadian universities. The march was led by the 85% Canadian Quota Campaign, which calls for an 85% Quota for Canadian citizens in Canadian universities.

At that point, Professor Peter Rosenthal, a self-professed American, started raving and foaming at the mouth. "I'm a Jew, I'm a Jew," he cried, "I'm an American and a Jew. I'm an alien, hang me!" And other hysterical utterings which had nothing to do with what Mathews had said.

Adding to the chorus was an "unholy alliance" of Trotskyites (from Canadian Party of Labour and Young Socialists), "Internationalists, and open reactionaries" such as Michael Marrus. They actually fought one another to denounce us.

Next we see Rosenthal's ravings in the Friday's Varsity, where he calls Mathews a racist, an Enoch Powell, an Adolf Hitler. Now we know life under American imperialism is hard but surely our professors must learn not to lose control of themselves in this way. Especially when we entrust our children to their care.

But Rosenthal, the professed expert on nationalism, is nothing more than an imperialist, a racist, a liberal, a liar and a hypocrite.

WE IN THE CANADIAN LIBERATION Movement are not bourgeois nationalists. But even if we were, the struggle of Canadians for their rights as a nation is a just struggle, an anti-imperialist struggle. It is a struggle that progressive people all around the world will support.

Lenin put it succinctly in his The Question of Nationalities, (1922) and described men like Rosenthal perfectly:

"In my writings on the national question, I have already said that an abstract presentation of the question of nationalism is of no use at all. A distinction must necessarily be made between the nationalism of an oppressor nation and that of an oppressed nation, the nationalism of a big nation and that of a small nation.

"In respect of the second kind of nationalism, we, nations of the big nation, have nearly always been guilty, in historic practice, of an infinite number of cases of violence; furthermore, we commit violence and insult an infinite number of times without noticing it . . .

"That is why internationalism on the part of oppressors or "great" nations as they are called (though they are great only in their violence) must consist not only in the observance of the formal equality of nations but even in an inequality of the oppressor nation, the great nation, that must make up for the inequality which obtains in actual practice.

"Anybody who does not understand this has not grasped the real proletarian attitude to the national question, he is still essentially petty-bourgeois in his point of view and is, therefore, assured to descend to the bourgeois point of view."

Everybody knows that the overwhelming majority of the thousands of American citizens who come as professors to Canada are reactionary. This is not to mention the outright stooges and a number of CIA agents (about which Rosenthal of course, would know nothing). Professors from other countries, except Britain, are negligible in number and would benefit by a quota. Surely anybody who looks at the present situation and says we should not call for Canadian universities for the Canadian people is nothing more than an imperialist.

Rosenthal is a racist.

- although we have constantly repeated that the 85% Quota is for citizens, not for Canadian-born, he and his ilk grossly distort our words. Obviously they judge a man by his country of birth. We judge a person by his commitment to a country.

- The Progressive Labour Party in the States (big-daddy to CPL of which Rosenthal is a close friend) has a policy attacking preferential requirements to get more Black students into universities. Such an influx of Black students, will create a Black bourgeoisie they feel. Yet they demand preferential hiring of Black janitors. Ergo Black people are good to sweep floors, not to be professors. Like good branch-plant radicals, they have the same line in Canada, where they urge us to leave the thinking to the Americans. This sounds suspiciously like that great British imperialist Cecil Rhodes. White man's burden anybody?

- Such Canadian capitalists as E. P. Taylor, Garfield Weston and Roy Thomson are no longer Canadian citizens. They know where it's best to go.

- The Canadian Liberation Movement supports progressive Americans. We have actively supported the struggles of American professors Victor Wightman at Lakehead University, Philip London at Windsor and Gabriel Kolki at York University, when nobody else would give them the time of day. We are anti-imperialists and internationalists in practice, not just in words. What has Rosenthal or CPL done on behalf of these men? Nothing.

- we judge a man not by his place of birth, but by his ideas and his practice. In 1969 Peter Rosenthal refused a job at Michigan State because it didn't pay as high as we do here. He is obviously a man of principal.

Rosenthal is a liberal.

- in his letter and in his ravings he has presented himself as an individual. Poor Peter Rosenthal, wounded, hurt, martyr to the cause of individual freedom. Nasty Canadian Liberation Movement, an organization, trying to take away his privileges. This the line all American professors pull when it is suggested that maybe they have more privileges than we humble Canadians. It's the liberal American game; when somebody doesn't like you, you're an individual, when you don't like somebody, you're the biggest imperialist power in the world.

- Rosenthal never mentioned that he has very close ties with the Canadian Party of Labour. Is he ashamed to come out in the open and show his politics? Is he ashamed of CPL? Obviously it is in his self-interest to be an individual in this case. Or is he ashamed of the "unholy alliance" of reactionaries and other fools who rose with him to denounce us?

- CPL call themselves Communists. Lenin says it is the duty of Communists around the world to support national liberation struggles in all oppressed countries, even if they are not led by Communists. Yet CPL and Rosenthal along with all the other phonies attack us and red-bait us depending on the circumstances. Rosenthal, like Trudeau, has one line for some people and another line for other people. But in practice, he is always the same.

Rosenthal is a liar.

- we did not turn off the microphone. We couldn't have. The sound system was controlled from the balcony, and music started to play after the meeting was over.

- Mathews did not cite the large number of Asiatic students as an unfair burden on Ontario taxpayers, as Rosenthal insists. Mathews did cite the outright discrimination against Canadians and the sellout administrations. Mathews revealed that in all faculties across the country, (including professional faculties) Canadian citizens are barely 56%. That in Arts & Science faculties, Canadian citizens are a 47% minority. That of the 3000 new hirings this year, 2500 will go to foreign citizens, mainly American, while thousands of Canadians qualified to teach in our universities go jobless.

- the Toronto Star, known for its conservative estimates of protest marches, said there were at least 75 marchers. Rosenthal, more conservative than the Toronto Star, estimates 25. Pretty good for a Mathematics professor.

- Mathews never said that the problems of the Canadian people stem from racial or national groups who come here to cause unemployment. This is a lie perpetrated by the Trudeau government and the Toronto Star. We know that the federal government actively discriminates against working-class immigrants and actively encourages American professors with two-year tax holidays and high salaries.

THE PEOPLE DOWN AT THE Immigration Office knew what we were there for. An American applicant for immigrant status born in India, who was fired from Waterloo University, signed our petition immediately. So did his wife. The support we received from immigrants was overwhelming. The Greek-Canadian janitor told us it was a crime that foreign professors should teach our children. He directed the post man and truck drivers to the table we had set up outside the office.

- Rosenthal neglects to mention that many of the people who stayed behind, stood up to defend our actions — members of the Waffle, student council members, foreign students. Those who denounced us were, for the most part, members of the "unholy alliance".

Rosenthal has shown that there are clearly two sides to this issue. On the one hand, there is the pro-imperialist alliance, composed of all kinds of left-wing phonies who rant and rave and obscure the issues along with their right-wing buddies. They exposed themselves beautifully on this issue.

On the other hand is the anti-imperialist alliance, made up of the Canadian Liberation Movement, the Waffle, student council members, GSU members, and the great mass of students who support the 85% Quota Campaign, who sign the petition and who volunteer to help every day. These are progressive people of every political stripe who oppose — in practice — the American imperialist takeover of our country.

We, of the Canadian Liberation Movement, urge any serious students to join us. The struggle for Canadian universities is part of the great struggle against American imperialism, right here in Canada and all around the world.

Poor students suffer most Grads get the election-time pocket pinch

By ROBIN ENDRES

The Committee of University Affairs proposed cutbacks in graduate student aid present an ominous threat to graduate students and to the future of higher education in Ontario.

As far as graduate students are concerned, the cutbacks will mean belt-tightening in an already severe financial situation. With spiralling costs in food and housing, the average graduate student's income is less than $3,000 a year, including summer grant money.

The majority of students who are not lucky enough to pick up a Canada Council grant (average $3500 in humanities to $5500 in social sciences) supplement their grants with extra research fellowships, marking papers for professors, part-time work outside the university (breaking the SGS 10-hour per week work rule) or spouse's earnings. Married male students with no dependants are usually the most secure financially, with single women receiving the smallest slice of the grant money pie.

The two major sources of grants are the Ontario Government Fellowships ($1500 for winter term, $750 for summer research), and teaching fellowships (average $200), and these are the areas in which the government plans to drastically reduce student aid. Next year 250 fewer OGFs will be given, and all grants for teaching assistants, markers and research assistants will be reduced to a ceiling of $1800.

Take for example a student in his or her M.A. year who did receive an OGF this year, but is counting on one to continue in the PhD programme, a customary pattern. The grant is denied, and the teaching fellowship is cut to $1800. Unless this student can depend on money from parents, a wife or husband working, or a summer income of $2000, he or she will be forced to drop out of a graduate studies programme.

The cutbacks provide no criteria for financial need or academic ability as far as the government is concerned.

Some departments do have an official rating system — the English department, largest at U. of T with 300 full time students, groups its students into three categories, and awards most of the grant money to students with the highest "Is there any place you'd rather be . . . ?" Well, Bill, we may not have much choice.

marks. Even this system discriminates against students with the lowest income sources.

It is difficult to get high grades when one is constantly worrying about where next month's rent is coming from, especially when forced to take an outside job. Across the board, there is no criterion for financial need, unless the student is able to plead his case effectively — and unofficially.

Clearly the present government of Ontario has embarked on a programme of starving out the hungry, while allowing the wealthier but not necessarily better qualified students to remain in graduate school.

The OGF Programme is financed entirely by the Province of Ontario, in other words the taxpayers of Ontario, who presumably would like to see their own children have the opportunity to receive the best education and training available in the province.

The programme was initially set up 12 years ago by John Roberts precisely for this reason, as well as to encourage students to remain in the province as teachers of higher education once they receive their degrees. Yet, these students will be most harshly affected by the withdrawal of 30% of the OGF grants.

Furthermore, even assuming that costs of studying in graduate programmes at the University of Toronto rise sharply, the cost of attending an institution of comparable standards in the U.S. will still be at least two or three times as expensive. The number of students in Ontario who are independently wealthy must be a tiny minority.

The number of students in the U.S. who can afford graduate education is rather large. Coupled with the further attraction of a supposedly more stable student situation at the U of T will accentuate the influx of American students to the graduate school.

And in five years, when students protest that Americans are being hired over Canadians, they will be told that there are no qualified Canadians. And that will indeed be the situation.

The nature and timing of the CUA proposals have somewhat insidious implications. The Committee of University Affairs is headed by Douglas Wright, who was appointed by the Minister of Education, William Davis, presently top contender for the leadership of the Conservative Party.

Davis' tenure of office has been continually joggled with protests of fiscal irresponsibility and general mismanagement of the Province's educational budget. He has been under heavy fire this past year for the rise in school taxes in the rural areas of Ontario, the traditional Conservative stronghold. Farmers and public school teachers have withheld taxes to protest the educational policies of Queen's Park.

By an immediate cut in spending of $1.5 million just prior to an election, Davis hopes to quell much of the rural dissatisfaction.

Someone should inform the voters of the province that the recent campaign of Stanley Randall — "Is there any place you'd rather be . . . ?" cost the taxpayers $1.6 million.

Meanwhile, the CUA has also proposed that undergraduate enrolment be increased by 10% and the Placement Office has released figures stating that an estimated 40% of B.A. graduates in 1971 will be unemployed.

If graduate student enrolment is severely limited through the proposed cutbacks, there will be fewer trained Canadians to teach the ever-increasing numbers of undergraduates, and there will be less and less opportunity for those undergraduates to continue their education in graduate programmes. It seems clear that both graduate and undergraduate students, faculty and administrators, the taxpayers of Ontario and the overall economy are threatened by what amounts to an election tactic on the part of the Conservative Government of Ontario.

A steering committee of three graduate students has been formed to organize a province wide campaign to protest the proposed cutbacks. Anyone concerned about the effects of the CUA proposals can do two things:

1. Attend the open meeting to be held Monday, February 8, from noon to 2 p.m. in West Hall, University College. Speakers will include: Tim Reid, Liberal education critic, W. D. Baines, Dean of SGS, and Donald MacDonald, president of Ontario New Democratic Party.

2. Sign the petition. Signatures will be presented to William Davis at the Conservative Party Leadership Convention, February 10 at Maple Leaf Gardens. All petitions should be returned to:

There will also be an information in Sidney Smith foyer until Monday.

Robin Endres is secretary of the Graduate Students' Union, and president of the Graduate English Association. She is working towards her doctorate in English at University of Toronto.

THE CUA PROPOSALS

1. The total amount available for Ontario Graduate Fellowships for 1971-2 should be reduced from the present $5 million by at least $1.5 million.
2. Fees for enrolment in the School of Graduate Studies will be increased from the present rate of $435 a year. The initial proposal was to raise fees to $750 a year, but this has not been made definite. Watch for a major fee hike to be introduced during the summer months.
3. Formula support will not be provided in 1971-2 for enrolment in new graduate programs.
4. Graduate students receiving in excess of $1800 per annum for university teaching and like duties should not be eligible to be counted as full time students. (The reasoning behind this proposal is as follows: each department receives a certain number of Basic Income Units for each full time student enrolled in the school. The rating for part-time students is 70% less than for full-time students. Obviously, no department chairman will pay a student more than $1800 for teaching duties in order to reduce the departmental budget by 70%. In some cases the ceiling will mean a reduction of $500 in a student's annual income.

THE PETITION

The Committee on University Affairs' proposed financial cutbacks constitute a severe threat to the future growth of higher education in Ontario.

Therefore, I the undersigned demand the immediate retraction of the CUA proposals, and the creation of an impartial policy board responsible for long-term educational planning in the province.

Bra-burning myth buried

By SUSAN PURCELL For The Montreal Star

MONTREAL — The myth about bra-burning women radicals was laid to rest once and for all last night and replaced with a story of women who want to be themselves.

The raconteur was Kate Millett, author of last year's best selling "Sexual Politics".

The action was planned for the Atlantic City Miss America Pageant, "but an official asked them not to, because there'd been a fire there lately and they were worried about damage. So they called it off."

The real point of Women's Liberation is "getting rid of stereotypes" of men and women, letting people break out of a "sex-role system" and into a revolutionary "human" one.

Neither sex is happy playing roles, said Millett, and women will not be free without a corresponding liberation of men.

Millett has exerted considerable pressure in the women's movement to take up the cause of male and female homosexuals, whom she feels are denied basic civil rights such as employment and freedom of movement.

Western society insists on a "patriotic heterosexuality," she said, whereby people feel obliged to mimic their own sex by enacting the accepted sex role.

"Can you imagine if you had to prove all day long you were right-handed?" she asked a motley clan of young women and almost as many men, jam-packed into unmonitored fire exits.

Marriage becomes "ownership of persons under the disguise of affection" — and children suffer the consequences.

"People think they own each others genitals," said Millett. "Next thing you know they're thinking they own each other's children."

"What we need is 'Kid Lib'. People reproduce out of vanity, boredom, frustration. No other way of life is open to them. Minors live in a sort of thralldom to their parents."

To eliminate this kind of servitude, new alternatives have to be discovered — communes, the single life, collective child care.

"Not this pseudo-child-care — it's no more than a new kind of children's hell. We're not interested in kiddy parking lots. In the states and maybe here, I don't know, they run child-care franchises like kids were chicken delights."

One young man responded to Millett's comments on homosexuality by asking pointedly, "What happened to you, what family background have you had that accounts for your views..."

"I think I can answer that question very briefly," she replied sweetly, "I was born a woman." The audience cheered.

Women don't just stick around women's lib groups and suddenly become "liberated" Millett explained.

"I hate that word 'liberated'. No one can be liberated in our society as it is. What is needed is a free society."

That means revolution, "Taking our entire culture as our paradox and our model."

"It may not begin as a revolution... it becomes one."

Gryphons rally

Guelph upsets Blues 6-5; first place now doubtful

By PAUL CARSON

Guelph — Break out the black crepe gang — the Varsity hockey Blues' string of seven consecutive first place finishes appears to be at an end.

Blues were beaten 6-5 here last night by their old nemesis, the Guelph Gryphons, for Varsity's third loss in eleven OQAA western division starts.

Blues now trail Waterloo Warriors by two games in the all-important loss column and it is highly unlikely that the Warriors will lose more than one of their remaining seven games.

Hare gets winner

Gryphon defenceman Rod Hare scored the winning goal mid-way through the final period on a screened shot from the point during a Guelph power-play. Two Blues, MacHickox and Nels Debenedet, and Guelph's Pete Turner were off at the time.

Hare's goal ruined a brilliant Varsity comeback from a 5-3 deficit in the third frame. Two goals from speedy left-winger Bill Bubba pulled Blues even at 5-5 but the pesky Gryphons refused to die.

The Guelph team, whose record now stands at 4-5-1, were full measure for their victory as they outlasted and out-fought Blues by a wide margin in the final 30 minutes of the game.

Trailing 3-1 mid-way through the second period, Guelph coach Denny Mooney abandoned his team's usual plodding and fore-checking style in favor of hockey's equivalent of basketball's fast break. The new tactics confused Blues' forwards and exploited some unusual clumsiness in the Varsity defence.

Bob Halpenny and Tom Schoan evened the score at 3-3 on successive breakaways, stepping around Debenedet and Dave McDowall respectively. The Gryphons continued to feed the long passes to their quick-breaking forwards and Ian Douglas put Guelph ahead 4-3 on a power-play effort with Blues' Bubba in the penalty box.

Douglas split McDowall and Terry Parsons then slid the puck under a falling Grant Cole.

Turner and Jim Mitchell scored the other Guelph goals.

Blues early lead was supplied by Scott Seagrist, Kaz Lysonek and Hickox.

Bill Bubba: two goals in losing cause.

Lockett solid

Guelph goaltender Ken Lockett turned in a solid effort, facing 40 Varsity shots and made some clutch saves in the third period.

Schoan should have made the final score 7-5, but his shot at the empty Blues' net ricocheted off both posts and died on the goal line.

Despite the loss, Blues seem virtually assured of second place and should meet Eastern Division leaders, the Carleton Ravens, in the first round of the OQAA play-offs on the 19th of this month in Ottawa's Civic Arena. Ravens lost to Blues 10-6 two years ago in the semi-finals but this time they'll have the advantage of home ice.

RMC mittmen give Blues' boxers lots of trouble

Bob Maton, Geoff Elwand and Jim Beckman were the only Varsity boxers to pick up victories last Saturday when the club ran into stiff competition at RMC.

The Glynn brothers from Vic (Des and Pat) both lost to RMC's talented Ralph Tait who will be representing Ontario in the Canada Winter Games in Saskatoon.

Varsity coach Tony Canzano attributed superior conditioning by RMC as the main factor in their success.

Next boxing card is on Athletic Night, February 10 at Hart House.

Varsity women turn it on at McGill

Pool records tumbled right and left as the Varsity women's swim team invaded McGill. Above, Merrily Stratten (left) takes off for a new butterfly mark.

Beginning with football matches late in the last century, Varsity-McGill athletic competition has formed the foundation upon which was built intercollegiate sports in this country.

Women's athletics have also played a valued, though often unrecognized, role in this Varsity-McGill tradition.

For years now, the "McGill weekend" has formed the highlight in the women's program with dozens of athletes on a variety of teams taking part in a festival of competition.

Last weekend, 85 U of T girls and their coaches descended on the Expo City for what, due to McGill's financial cutback in sports, may be the final year of such an event.

This year's teams taking part were:

● Swimming and Diving — In what is becoming an established pattern, both the Varsity swimming and diving teams, coached by Sue Kinnear, gained impressive victories in their sections of the weekend action. With every first place finish establishing a pool record, Merrily Stratten, Liz Daniel, Joan Dolson, Randy Croome and Vicky Porter set the pace with outstanding performances.

As for the diving, with selections for the national meet to spur them on the Varsity girls once again stole the show. All-everything Leslie O'Brien led the way with firsts on both the 1-metre and 3-metre boards. Teammates Andrea Kinsman, Kim Maybee, and Pamela LeMay also placed well.

● Fencing — The fencing girls turned up for the second part of their sectional playdowns, which will be held this weekend, with a first-rate display at McGill, winning 46 out of a possible 80 bouts.

Individually, Lilit Zekulin kept her unbeaten record intact, winning each of her 12 matchups while Pam Chelweo also showed excellent form, suffering only one defeat.

Maitre Ken Wood was also extremely pleased with skill of Dorrit de Demeter, Dominique Baldasaro, Debbie Brown and Kathy Stevens in the novice contingent.

● Archery — The Women's Archery Team, coached and directed by "Robin Hood" Wilton, shot their way to a 773-783 victory over McGill's best Saturday morning. Team members were: Anne "Sherwood Forest" (Vic III), Susan Hanley (Vic IV), Sandra West (PHE III), Donna Dick (Erin I), Christine Grant (PHE I) and Brenda Robinson (POTS I).

● Basketball — Coach "Signorina Nimone" and her intermediate squad of Bambinos bounced back from a 33-32 defeat by the McGill crew a few weeks earlier to take a decisive 36-29 victory. Fired up by the big win, the girls then went on to trounce an outclassed Loyola crew, 59-16.

● Volleyball — Battling an attack of sleeping sickness which struck suddenly at 9:00 a.m., the Varsity intermediate Volleyball team (affectionately known as the Retards) managed to pull themselves together and shock McGill's Super Squaws by a count of three games to one.

The first match, won handily 15-3, featured a rare, non-stop serving streak by Heli Kaur which accounted for all the Toronto points. Then, hit with a rash of overconfidence, the girls proceeded to drop the next game 15-11.

However, after a few words of wisdom (or anger) from coach Nancy Hill, they recovered for 15-3 and 15-4 pastings.

● Ice Hockey — Gord Bullock's Baby Blues went straight to the Winter Arena after a long train ride Friday and lost a 6-1 heartbreaker to the McGill side. They bounced back the next morning, however, to thrash the Loyola Tommies, 12-0. Allison McGee led the onslaught against Loyola with a four-goal effort; Anna Radecki picked up a hat-trick while Ritva Horvonen netted two and Barb Spence, Terry Midghall, and Barb Greaves added singles. Judy Bell was in the nets for the shutout.

● Figure Skating — Meanwhile, on the other side of the mountain, the figure skaters were in action at the University of Montreal. Led by Jane Patterson's first place senior singles finish, the team finished second overall in the six-school competition.

PECU says talk now, parity later

Students in political economy are pressing for parity on the department's overall policy and planning committee, rather than revert to negotiations with the faculty.

A mixture of 25 graduate and undergraduate students made the decision after meeting with Department Chairman J. Stefan Dupre, who said the faculty rejected any notion of students' involvement in hiring, firing, and promotion, but did welcome the student voice in other matters.

If definite action is not taken to implement parity participation, the PECU resolved to withdraw from further committee participation and devote time to building up PECU influence among students.

Dupre had said that students have a legitimate interest in who shall teach them and what should be taught, and urged that the students resume discussions with certain authorized faculty about their exact committee roles, in terms of numbers and functions other than direct staffing.

These struggles over student representation broke off last fall when PECU students decided that negotiation was not the channel to either party, or hiring, firing, and tenuring powers.

"If you go to the faculty with demands for power in hiring, quite frankly, you'll find no welcome. But if you want to talk about general policy, then there'll be quite likely be a favorable response," said Dupre.

While Dupre called for "meaningful input" by students, Political Economy student Phil Resnick asked how students could contribute to staffing decisions if the files on potential staff were not available to students.

Dupre replied that students were welcome to any seminars that candidates for the staff might give but any further information would be a matter for the negotiation committee to decide.

Dupre explained that the pressure of the budget is behind many staffing decisions even tenure, and that the exact budget is dictated by the Dean of Arts and Science.

"We're a poor department," he said.

When Dupre explained that the negotiation results would take the form of a report to be approved by department faculty, students pointed out that the faculty would have no reason to approve anything they didn't basically agree with already.

Dupre agreed, warned against making unreasonable demands, and ended the short conference for a luncheon appointment.

Students then assessed the negotiation proposals as regressive, and sent a letter to Dupre with the plan for equal student-staff on the policy-planning committee.

Bissell refuses to be liaison for parity group

By TONY USHER

U of T president Claude Bissell has temporarily refused to act as "public spokesman" for the parity committee now meeting to propose a structure for the Arts and Science Faculty Council.

The group of five students and five faculty sympathetic to parity is looking for someone who can act as a channel of communication between themselves and the university community.

However, the administration has decided to keep the faculty running "as normal" and not to recognize the parity restructuring committee.

Bissell, Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen, and several college principals met Tuesday afternoon and agreed to make every effort to find six faculty and two student representatives for the restructuring committee set up by Faculty Council on January 19.

The six-two committee has been repudiated by students, however, and if it does not get under way in the next few days, Bissell may be compelled to recognise the five-faculty committee.

The parity restructuring committee has been meeting nightly this week. Its members hope to produce final proposals by February 22.

On Tuesday night the committee agreed first to consider the powers and responsibilities of the Faculty Council, and produce a public statement thereon by Monday.

This statement will indicate in some way that decisions on appointments, promotion, and tenure and on the makeup of appointments committees should be outside the scope of the Faculty Council.

The committee is also concerned about the Faculty Council's lack of control over Arts and Science finances, and will recommend the establishment of a budget committee on a new Council.

Disruption fear may push faculty inside barricades

The faculty of arts and science council and its committees may move underground in order to avoid student disruption of their work.

In the last week, two meetings were forced to adjourn because of large student turnouts and disruption of their business.

The latest steps taken by the office of arts and science dean A. D. Allen seem to be a clear attempt to avoid repetition of these incidents.

Tuesday afternoon Norman Rogers, a student member of the faculty council, requested information as to the times and locations set for upcoming meetings of the 16 standing committees of the faculty of arts faculty council.

Faculty council secretary W. D. Foulds refused to reveal the details, saying only members of the committees would be informed.

Although all the student members have withdrawn from the faculty council over the parity crisis, they still remain officially members of the council. None have submitted resignations as of yet.

There are two student seats on each of the committees, except for the Undergraduate Studies Committee, which has five student members.

Students had sent representatives to only the Undergraduate Studies and the Evaluation Committees before the crisis broke and students, bound by the results of the November referendum, were forced to withdraw from the work of the council.

"It's difficult to tell the status of the students on the committees because they've withdrawn their right to vote but not their right to participate," said Allen.

Arts and science dean A. D. Allen yesterday told Rogers he would not reveal when and where the meetings would be held.

Rogers then pointed out to Dean Allen that among the published Rules of Procedure for the faculty council, was the following:

"Any member of the council shall have the right to be present at any meeting of any Standing Committee . . ."

Allen agreed that as a member, Rogers had a right to attend, but that he would not be informed of where the meetings would be scheduled.

Allen also speculated that if students were to fill the vacant student seats on the remaining standing committees of the council with "non-participating" members, these students would not be informed of the location of meetings either.

"Norman saw it as his duty to keep the Faculty from going about its business, and I saw it as my duty to enable the faculty to do its business. So we obviously came into conflict," said Allen in an interview last night.

Allen said that the general meetings of the Faculty Council would be announced, but the "little committees" were not subject to the same publicity.

The outline of procedures for the general committee of the faculty of arts and science states that all committee meetings shall be open to observers.

Disruption of lecture stirs righteous rumbling

The disruption of a political theory lecture last Thursday by the parity festival's student mobile tactical squad has caused some righteous rumblings in the Arts and Science Faculty.

Prof. S. A. Lakoff, who was lecturing the class, and angrily shooed the disrupters out of the Sidney Smith lecture hall, told his students Tuesday that he reported the incident to the department chairman and the university president.

"At the very least I expect some definition of disruption to come out of my complaints," said Lakoff.

"As an isolated incident the disruption is not worth making a fuss about, but on the other hand disruption is the deadly sin of the university," said Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen.

"If that same class were to be disrupted again, it would be a serious matter," said Allen.

J. S. Dupre, chairman of the political economy department, said his "grave concern for the sanctity of the classroom" motivated him to report the incident to Dean Allen and President Bissell.

"This goes to the heart of the chairman's role. He has the responsibility for looking each staff member and student in the eye and saying 'Yes we do deliver the classroom to you here,'" said Dupre.

Both Dupre and Allen deferred any further initiatives to President Claude Bissell, who can take the complaint to Caput, the disciplinary body which he heads.

Bissell said that in the course of the case the Caput would lay down the definition of disruption, but he added "there's no move to make any charges."

Decision is a surprise

Alberta students gain parity with faculty

EDMONTON (CUP) — Students at the University of Alberta yesterday gained parity with faculty on the major decision-making body of the university.

At a special meeting of the General Faculties Council, as it is called, parity recommendations were supported in a vote of 42 to 33.

The special meeting was televised to over seven hundred students gathered in the nearby students union theatre to witness the outcome of the deliberations.

The General Faculty Council endorsed a report prepared by an ad hoc committee of student representatives.

Chaired by university president Max Wyman, the committee said the GFC should include 49 students, 49 faculty, and 29 other university representatives, for a total of 127 members.

The old GFC structure had three students — two from the student council and one from the graduate students association — and 49 faculty members. Total composition was 82 members.

The new recommendations were prepared by a committee set up in September 1969 after intense student pressure for restructuring of decision-making in the university.

Although acclaimed as an important victory by student leaders at the University of Alberta, the students union maintains it should decide the method of selection of student representatives itself. The new GFC proposals, however, set up a constituency-style election procedure.

The outcome of yesterday's special three-and-a-half hour meeting surprised many people, as indications showed wide support for a dissenting report submitted by associate professor of law D. T. Anderson, a faculty member of the ad hoc restructuring committee.

In his report, frequently labelled as "insulting to students", he suggested that while there are areas in which students have shown themselves to be competent — such as food services and the organization of sports and other extra-curricular activities — the overall situation should not be altered.

Many individual faculty councils submitted briefs stressing their objection to the ad hoc restructuring committee's majority report, with some favouring Prof. Anderson's viewpoint.

In the GFC, however, which endorsed the new structure, faculty members vote on their own preference and not on instruction of the faculty they represent.

The lengthy session yesterday acquired something of the appearance of a revivalist congregation meeting as academics stepped forward to enunciate their fundamental principles on education.

The thesis of the "student as child" was frequently cited, as well as the transcendence of students as a group, as objections to parity.

Many faculty seemed to fear that equality of numbers implied a qualitative measure, rather than a quantitative one.

Some suggested that neither faculty, students, nor the community were ready for parity at this time.

"Perhaps this time next year," was one suggestion.

Some faculty saw a threat to the credibility of the university's degrees if parity were implemented, pointing out that students were mainly there simply to obtain credentials. Their biggest contribution could be made once they had graduated and were able to feed back information as alumni of the university.

At the same time, however, numerous speakers indicated they had been prepared originally to oppose the report, but after listening to arguments had changed their minds.

When the vote was taken, there was enough support for parity to carry the recommendations through.

The Alberta reforms represent roughly what U of T's Commission on University recommended in October 1969. The CUG Report, never implemented, called for a top governing structure of 66-members, 20 of them students, 20 academics, and 20 lay members, and 6 administrators.

At U of T parity has been gained on a number of departmental committees on one college council, but has been decisively rejected — so far — by major decision-making centres such as the arts and science faculty council.

Western to poll campus on student role in hiring, tenure

LONDON (CUP) — The faculty and students of the University of Western Ontario will vote later this month to decide whether or not students should sit on committees dealing with the hiring, promotion, and tenure of faculty.

The referendum however, will not be binding as it is sponsored by the UWO student's council and has no official sanction from the administration. This will be the first time the faculty as well as the students will be polled in a single referendum.

A similar referendum circulated among faculty last month showed they preferred not to have students on such committees. The motion failed three to one with half the faculty voting.

A petition circulated among students last fall received four hundred signatures opposed to leaving students off promotion, hiring and tenure committees.

Students have complained that the present student participation procedures set up by the university Senate give them no guarantee their opinions will be heard by the committees.

The Senate committees have no untenured faculty and no faculty below the rank of associate professor on them.

Faculty friends of parity to give reps OK today

Faculty sympathetic to the student fight for parity are meeting today to ratify the selection of five faculty for a parity committee set up to provide proposals for a reconstituted Arts and Science Faculty Council.

The meeting, set for noon today in room 1071 at Sid Smith, will also hear reports on what work the committee has done so far.

Simone Chartrand to seek support at two rallies for WMA victims

Simone Chartrand wife of jailed Montreal labour leader Michel Chartrand, will be in Toronto this weekend to address two rallies in support of political prisoners in Quebec.

Saturday at 2 p.m. she speaks at the Friends' House at 60 Lowther Avenue. On Sunday she will share the platform at the Ontario College of Education auditorium with Pierre Bourgault and Michel Bourdon at 2 p.m. before a protest march to Queen's Park. Bourgault, former head of the Rassemblement Pour l'Indépendance Nationale, is now editor of the Quebec weekly "Point de Mire." Bourdon is vice-chairman of the Montreal Central Council of the Confederation of National Trade Unions.

Mrs. Chartrand's husband is President of the Montreal Council of the CNTU. He has been jailed for one year for contempt of court. Other charges are pending.

ELECTION DRIBBLE

Although four days were given for students to cast their ballots, response to the elections for the presidential search committee appears to have been slight. After the final polls closed last night, ballot boxes were taken to Simcoe Hall, where polling officials had to wait outside in the freezing rain until a U of T policeman arrived to unlock the doors to the administration building. Results of the election will be tabulated today, and published Monday in The Varsity.

Canada's political trials: the background

This is a winter of political trials in Quebec. In this commentary, prepared jointly by Canadian University Press and the staff of the newsmagazine The Last Post, questions are raised about the nature of the trials which have now begun.

The predominant themes in the trials of Quebec's political prisoners so far have been questionable evidence (in the cases of alleged FLQistes Robert Langevin and Come Leblanc) and determined challenges to the judicial system itself (by Paul Rose and the "Big Five").

Outside the spotlight, meanwhile, obscure, long-standing case which began in May, 1966 clearly illustrated when it finally ended week, that questionable evidence in political trials predates the War Measures Act, and the judicial system deserves to be challenged.

Like last October, the FLQ was on the offensive in the spring of 1966. The Front placed several bombs in and around Montreal at factories involved in labor battles, like the La Grenade shoe factory and Dominion Textiles.

The 1966 offensive prodded police to arrest Pierre Vallieres, Charles Gagnon and others. One of the others was a recent immigrant from France called Richard Bouchoux, then 25.

BOUCHOUX WAS SUSPECTED of being the organization's bombmaker, and was hit with several charges, based on a "confession" which police attributed to another young man arrested around the same time (a familiar tactic which continues to surface during the 1970 re-run).

Bouchoux was held without bail in Montreal's notorious Bordeaux jail, where he soon suffered a nervous breakdown, and was transferred to the jail's "observation centre".

His fellow prisoners in the ward were pyromaniacs, sexual assaultants, murderers and paranoiacs. The window of his tiny cell looked out on one of Bordeaux' twin gallows, hardly the most therapeutic view for someone in Bouchoux's condition.

After 17 months in jail, Bouchoux was acquitted on one charge after the state's witness repudiated his "confession" to police. Bouchoux then received bail, but charges still hung over his head.

A charge of illegal possession of dynamite was still pending when the young man showed up for trial Tuesday. The crown dropped the charges for lack of evidence.

FIVE YEARS AFTER his arrest, Bouchoux was finally free.

"His only crime was having friends more or less involved in the La Grenade affair," wrote the tabloid Le Journal de Montreal, the only one of Montreal's six daily newspapers which interviewed him.

Le Journal said Bouchoux is more than ever attached to his adopted home, Quebec, and is not bitter about his experience although he considers it "a miracle" that he did not become a criminal.

"In prison, I learned how to kill a man on a crowded street, to crack a strongbox, to rape girls, to steal, and to get myself out of it without being caught," he was quoted as saying.

TUESDAY, WHILE RICHARD BOUCHOUX was being liberated, five other men were appearing in another courtroom nearby.

Charles Gagnon and Jacques Larue-Langlois were asking Mr. Justice Roger Ouimet to withdraw from their case on the grounds that he could not judge them impartially.

Their arguments were numerous, notably that Ouimet is the judge who last month sentenced Chartrand to a year for contempt of court, and that Ouimet made uncomplimentary statements about Vallieres and Lemieux in refusing bail.

At one point during the hearing on the withdrawal motion, Ouimet tried to assure the defence that in the end, justice would be served, as always.

"If there is prejudice (here), you are forgetting that there is a court of appeal," he said.

VALLIERES IMMEDIATELY REPLIED: "I have already spent 44 months in prison for nothing — I'm not interested in staying there another year and a half waiting for an appeal."

The cases of people like Richard Bouchoux, and Vallieres' comparable experience, explain why he and the other political prisoners are vigorously seeking justice this time around.

OUMIET, 63, AND JUSTICE MARCEL NICHOLS, 43, both formerly active in Canadian politics, have come under fire for their alleged lack of competency to handle the two new trial divisions set aside for about 60 alleged subversives of the Front de Liberation du Quebec.

Nichols, who presides at the murder trial of Paul Rose, has expelled the accused twice, found him guilty of contempt of court and has threatened to exclude him from the courtroom for the duration of crown testimony. Rose is conducting his own defense, and will repudiate any defense lawyer appointed by the court.

Almost every ruling in the murder trials arising out of the slaying of Quebec Labour Minister Pierre Laporte could become a precedent.

Nichols was President of the Liberal riding association of Drummondville West for many years and served as Mayor from 1960 to 1966.

HE IS A PERSONAL FRIEND of federal Trade Minister Jean-Luc Pepin, and Quebec Highways Minister Bernard Pinard.

He was recommended to the bench in 1968 by the then Justice Minister Pierre Trudeau, a candidate for the Liberal Party leadership.

The judge is a member of the Knights of Columbus, the Rotary Club and the golf club in Drummondville where he still resides.

Ouimet, frequently accused of being a "fervent federalist" and member of the Quebec establishment, lives in the wealthy English Montreal suburb of Westmount.

He is a brother-in-law of Lieut.-Governor Hughes Lapointe, and son-in-law of the late Justice Minister Ernest Lapointe. He once worked in the Quebec law office of Louis St-Laurent, later Prime Minister.

He wrote in his official biography that he spoke "for the Liberal Party" in every federal and provincial election campaign from 1930 until his elevation to the bench.

Twice he lost by wide margins as provincial liberal candidate. He served as Crown Prosecutor in Montreal during the Second World War, and as special federal prosecutor in drug cases during the post war period.

IN A 1963 SPEECH HE WARNED that the separation of Quebec would have "catastrophic repercussions", and that Separatist agitation could one day lead to an armed uprising.

He said the FLQ terrorist wave of that year was caused by irresponsible statements by school teachers, university professors, historians, and various "hotheads".

According to Ouimet, bombs were going off because the young generation of Quebec ridiculed morality, law and order, and read "agnostic" authors like Jean-Paul Sartre, Albert Camus, and Simone de Beauvoir.

The judge's frequent resort to summary convictions for contempt has aroused a growing debate in Quebec on the relevancy of contempt and seditious charges.

upon us. As a self-proclaimed Marxist you should have known that it is bad politics to argue from a minority position — bad for you and for everyone else, not to mention the "cause", whatever it might be.

It is also true that Prof. Hayne stated unequivocally that there would be an exam, yet that hardly comes as a surprise. We were given the opportunity to transfer to a section of that same course which would not hold students to a final exam. When we were told that the alternative of an essay was available, you pouted somewhat and retorted that the essay would be a penalty for not writing the exam. You surprise me. Do you not submit yourself to some sort of discipline in life outside the classroom, even in terms of your "Marxist" philosophy? Surely you cannot object to the discipline involved in internalizing learning presented in class?

There is, I believe, a multitude of students (and, perhaps, professors) who see horrors every time they come into contact with "revolutionary" politics, student or otherwise. They have been thrown off balance by the sad lack of sensitivity shown in such tactics as you made use of the other day, although it must be granted that you did not have absolutely the "glazed look" of the Internationalists in your eyes.

You talk of democracy? You do not add to the democratic nature of the university one whit by the compulsion to impose your particular belief on others in such a fashion.

Could you not have been satisfied to wait and meet with interested English students after class, as your leaflet suggested? Were you not being slightly redundant at the very least?

If you would care to listen, Tol-stol presents a valuable lesson in human relations: when asked if he thought there was a difference between revolutionary repression and counterrevolutionary repression, Tolstoi replied, "Of course there is. It is the difference between cat shit and dog shit."

(Ed. note: The assumption made in this response to Johnson's behaviour is that he was acting out of a tactical political analysis which was unwise and incorrect. In fact, his behaviour probably reflected the alienation which an authoritarian style of education reinforces. Perhaps Johnson was merely giving vent to the frustrations we all experience but often hide.)

Two days to find a ballot box

Before the results of the elections for student and faculty representatives on the Presidential Search Committee are in, I feel compelled to comment on the insipid nature of the whole procedure used in this election. The turnout in all categories is surely going to be far under ten per cent of those eligible to vote and I am wincing already at the cries of "student apathy" I know we are going to hear.

In this case I think we must clearly identify the culprit — not the individual student but the administrators in Simcoe Hall who arbitrarily set up the electoral procedures. The period between nominations and election allowed no time for campaigning. The information distributed by Simcoe Hall specifically avoided discussing any of the real issues involved. Candidates were allowed only 50 words of purely biographical information. And even if you could decide who to vote for it was almost impossible to find a poll box at which to vote.

It took me two days just to find a ballot box in some out-of-the-way corner of the Library. The box in Sid Smith was camouflaged like a guerrilla demolition corps, hidden in the corner, without signs, surrounded by trash and a polling officer in a coat reading a newspaper.

I believe the question of the new President's selection is one of the most important issues before the campus this year. I would have liked to hear some of the candidates express how they felt about the university and the President's role before I voted. I would have liked to be able to vote at least as easily as in a SAC election. Instead the election has been characterized by a non-existent and superficial discussion of the issues and a thoroughly incompetent balloting arrangement.

If we pretend to believe in democracy in this university let's not just stumble through its forms for appearance's sake.

Food Sci crisis is approaching

It was a pleasure and a relief to read the Editorial on the Faculty of Food Sciences in Wednesday's Varsity.

With the parity controversy, it was feared that the plight of Food Sci would go unnoticed except by the relatively few concerned.

I'd like to bring to your attention that the whole controversy will be brought to a head on Wednesday Feb. 17 when there will be a joint meeting of the executive committee of the Senate and the Council of the Faculty of Food Sciences.

This is a public meeting in the Senate Chambers and it is hoped all interested will attend.

'Armband-wearers evade moral issue'

Many students wore black armbands on Wednesday which, as Varsity's Monday edition explained, were meant as "symbolic mourning for the thousands who have died under the abortionist's knife." I propose another demonstration for the forgotten thousands who have died under the abortionist's knife in the wombs of Varsity's "thousands".

Varsity's report is clearly behind the demonstrators and is unscholarly since it evades the gravest and most complex of all the issues, namely, whether or not the unborn fetus is alive in some sense and whether or not this sense precludes the practice of abortion on moral or other grounds. Certainly, until this main issue is resolved and it is shown that the fetus has no form of life sufficient to warrant the prohibition of abortions, arguments such as, "There is social and economic pressure on the pregnant women and on the mother to drop out of school", ring very hollow.

Aside from the question of the fetus' right to life, there is another critical question: If we cannot show that the fetus is not alive and yet we accept the practice of abortion on demand, are we very far from accepting euthanasia or the practices of Huxley's "Brave New World"? Is this satisfactory?

(Ed. note: This letter was received on Tuesday.)

Rosenthal replies to CLM charges of hypocrisy, etc.

Dear Editor,

Wow! I wrote a letter which was printed in The Varsity (29 January) describing the events that occurred after Robin Mathews concluded his recent speech in Sidney Smith Hall, events that had not been reported in The Varsity article dealing with Mathews' visit. The response by Larry Haiven of the Canadian Liberation Movement, that was featured in the February 3 Varsity is incredible.

Haiven doesn't seriously counter any of the facts or arguments contained in my letter — instead he devotes two-thirds of a page to "proving" that I am "nothing more than an imperialist, a racist, a liberal, a liar and a hypocrite." (Nothing more? That would surely be enough!) His evidence on these points is not exactly overwhelming, in spite of the fact that it consists almost entirely of lies and distortions.

Before dealing with some of these lies let me reiterate a basic political point. Marxists, and many other people, are against American Imperialism but not against "Americans". This is no contradiction — it is clear that American Imperialism is run by and for the ruling class of the United States. Within the boundaries of the U.S. this same ruling class viciously exploits most Americans: the working class, black people, etc. Any kind of internationalism demands a feeling of solidarity with those Americans who are fighting against their own exploitation and American Imperialist exploitation of the world. Failing to make such distinctions leads to the kind of nationalism preached by Mathews: the enemy is "aliens" and "foreigners". It's my impression that Mathews doesn't make these distinctions publicly because he doesn't make them privately. Is Mathews really some sort of "progressive"? Does he identify with the oppressed, in Canada and around the world? Is he fighting for socialism? Does he support the Canadian working class in its daily struggles against foreign and domestic bosses? Does he support students in their struggles to make the university better serve their needs? Does Mathews consider himself some kind of Marxist? Is the kind of appeal that Mathews makes a traditional fascist appeal? Is talk of "aliens" and "foreigners" designed to attempt to make Canadians forget their real enemies?

Haiven's letter doesn't help to answer any of these questions. Haiven doesn't talk politics. Haiven thinks a clumsy attempt at a smear campaign is the appropriate response to the questions like this which were raised by a number of speakers and by my letter.

Some of Haiven's specific lies and distortions: After Mathews' speech was over I said "Don't go down to the immigration office to attack aliens. If you're after aliens, attack me, I'm an alien, I'm an American." Was I "raving"? I don't think so — I was shouting to compete with CLM loudhailers and to try to get heard before CLM'ers could hustle people out the door. I knew many in the audience, I knew they weren't racists, and I felt that some of them were mistakenly reading their own views into Mathews' speech. When he said "Americans", they, not being racist and being genuinely anti-imperialist, would read "American imperialists". I hoped that pointing out that Mathews' attack on "aliens" was an attack on individuals, such as myself, would help to realize the distinction. Anyway, then someone in the crowd shouted "Yeah. Next thing you know these guys will be telling us to attack the Jews!" I said "I'm a Jew too. You can get two with one blow, an American and a Jew. If you're after aliens, why don't you hang me."

Other people had been shouting other things — then the microphone was turned back on and discussion began. I spoke briefly, saying that Mathews' speech was pure nationalism, had no progressive political content, and was a fascist-like appeal. Then many others spoke, making the points which I enumerated in my original letter to the Varsity.

Haiven writes "Next we see Rosenthal's ravings in the Friday's Varsity, where he calls Mathews a racist, an Enoch Powell, an Adolf Hitler". I hope that anyone who contemplates taking any of Haiven's ramblings seriously reads the letter that Haiven refers to and decides whether or not it consisted of "ravings". The sentence that mentions Powell and Hitler in my letter reads "They pointed out that Mathews' speech could have been made by Enoch Powell, or Adolph Hitler." "They" is not me — some other speaker said that, and I so reported it. I do think it's an excellent point. What would Enoch Powell have done differently? Haiven doesn't consider the question.

Haiven writes "We in the Canadian Liberation Movement are not bourgeois nationalists". What are they? It's hard to say. Haiven doesn't attempt it. Haiven quotes Lenin I like the quote. Is it supposed to contradict something I wrote or said? Is it supposed to imply that Mathews is a Leninist? That CLM is Marxist Leninist?

The proof that I'm a racist is interesting. Haiven says I'm a "close friend" of the Canadian Party of Labour (which is true and well known to anyone who ever talked politics with me); the Canadian Party of Labour has fraternal relations with the U.S. Progressive Labour Party (which is true), and then he proceeds to distort Progressive Labour's line on "open admissions" of several years ago, claims that since this distortion is racist, I am a racist. Fantastic.

By the way, I'm not a "self-professed" American. The only time I think of myself as American is when Mathews type start saying "You American professors". It's true that CLM emphasizes Canadian citizenship rather than Canadian birth — I realized this only after my original letter. So what I can't apply for Canadian citizenship (I've been here 3½ years), and radicals apparently have trouble getting approved. Do CLM'ers really think that it's important that I swear allegiance to the Queen of England? Will that increase my commitment to the Canadian people? Haiven says I have red baited them. Where and when? He lies. I don't think they're even pinkish.

He says "Rosenthal is a liar. We did not turn off the microphone". Lucky for Haiven that my letter wasn't on the same page. I didn't say that they turned off the microphone (read it yourself!).

Mathews did say that foreign students were an unfair burden on Ontario taxpayers. Ask him. I bet he'll say it again.

Another outright lie of Haiven's: "In 1969 Peter Rosenthal refused a job at Michigan state because it didn't pay as high as we do here". I've been offered lots of jobs in the States — always at higher salaries than I receive here. But I like it here.

Well, there are lots of other lies and distortions in Haiven's letter. The most striking thing, though, is the lack of political content. I guess that's because Haiven is embarrassed about outlining a political line that would describe Mathews as "Canada's foremost radical".

Griffin and Rice laud Merton as contemporary saint

The Man in the Sycamore Tree: The Good Times and Hard Life of Thomas Merton: An Entertainment By Edward Rice Doubleday Publishers $9.50

A Hidden Wholeness: the Visual World of Thomas Merton Photographs by Thomas Merton and John Howard Griffin; Text by John Howard Griffin Thomas Allen and Son Limited $19.50

My favorite image for what usually happens to dead authors at the hands of their undead critics is that of buzzards wheeling down from a desert sky upon a dehydrated corpse. Thomas Merton (rest his soul) has been dead for two years, and now we are treated to the decorous squawks of two quite friendly buzzards, who have left alone the private parts of their prey.

If we drop the imagery, let us call these two handsome and outrageously costly books hagiographies, for I don't doubt many of Merton's fans liked to think of him as a saint.

Griffin, author of Black Like Me, who is also Merton's "official" biographer, presents the story of the famous Trappist's late-flowering fascination with photography. His book has a different and more limited sort of intimacy from Rice's (the latter was a friend of Merton's since their Columbia days at the end of the Depression, just before Merton became a monk, whereas Griffin begins his account in 1963), is more proper, but likely no less accurate, and portrays Merton as a happier and a far less troubled man.

The tone of Griffin's book is a result of many factors: the stance of its author (CATHOLIC), its focus, the time of Merton's life about which the book was written and photographed. Personal reminiscences finish before Merton left for Asia on his last and longest journey beyond the holdings of the Trappist monastery near Gethsemani, Kentucky, in the autumn of 1968.

Merton had been a full-time hermit in a small cement-block cabin on monastery property since 1965; withdrawing from communal life, he had also withdrawn from an earlier exclusive concern with Catholic orthodoxy and was publishing essays on Eastern religions and translations of Taoist texts. Some of his photographs have a marked resemblance to Chinese painting; others show that he sought subjects, indeed that he might have sought an entire environment, that afforded him a glimpse of Nature's (and human nature's) "from-the-beginning" face spoken of in the Zen koan.

The penultimate photo is a rather dull one, of the Bangkok river seen likely from a closeby high building. Griffin notes a passage from Merton's Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander, in which the monk discussed his own death in terms of the picture he had yet to take: "Suddenly I came to a dead end, but on a height, looking at a great bay, an arm of the harbour."

It was Griffin's loaned camera that took the picture, and it was sent back to the States loaded and intact. The language which Griffin uses to describe what he did with that film, though not typical of the rest of his commentary, is an indication of the love he bore his dead friend: "More carefully than I have ever done anything in my life, I removed that roll of film and held it in my hand, realizing that on eighteen frames were undeveloped images of scenes Tom had been the last to see when he clicked the shutter and we would be the first to see when they assumed form and detail in the developer what had registered in his brain and senses, existed there latent in that undeveloped emulsion.

"I mixed fresh chemicals and worked with great care. Rarely have such tensions cluttered the small space of my darkroom. If those negatives were scratched or spotted or improperly developed, they could never be replaced; those images could never again be photographed with the special vision of Thomas Merton, never again be composed and captured with the whole culture of Thomas Merton."

Whether that writing is good or not, it does demonstrate that the saint's life is not a dead genre.

Both these books are brimming with pictures of Merton's round bald head. In 1967, he wrote to Jonathan Williams, poet: "Proud of facial resemblance to Picasso and/or Jean Genet or alternately Henry Miller (though not so much Miller)."

That was puckish Merton, who perhaps gave up everything to find it was not necessary to give up much. He gave away his humour and his talent and they came back to him, whistling. He drew for college magazines, and ended by publishing his own abstract calligraphs. (Some are in these two books.) He gave up sex (Rice says The Seven-Story Mountain, Merton's autobiography, was bowdlerized) and the day before his death, at a meeting of monks in Bangkok, he implied that obligatory celibacy was an outmoded practice for the religious orders. He gave up the entire world for "God's face" and found, ultimately, his own path lay in attempting to awaken others, in not resting while any sentient beings were in need of salvation.

We should trace his career as a published writer — first poems, then the autobiography, a number of heavily orthodox works on such subjects as the Church year, prayer, the history of his order. Even before the fresh air of Vatican Two, Merton had become deeply immersed in a study of Eastern religions and this resulted in a steady flow of books about them, along with numerous works on civil rights and pacifism, and frequent collections of poetry.

Edward Rice's book chronicles Merton's life almost from the inside, though the monk understandably kept many secrets. It is an "entertainment" in the same sense that Dante called his great work a comedy, or in the sense that Kazantzakis portrays St. Francis dancing in front of a pope. Much of Merton is here, at least that about him which can be put in words or pictures — his history, the story of his changing concerns, the photos, clear and fuzzy, that go with the changes.

Toward the end of the book and the end of Merton's life, his friends felt he'd gone beyond them, beyond even this world, had reached some awareness even his words, by their nature or by his, encompass. He never seemed sorry for this, rather, he welcomed it, and realized, says Rice, his study of Buddhism was its own way and not something he could use to benefit the formal Catholicism he'd embraced almost three decades before and against which he'd long been chafing.

In his 54th year and half his life after had become a monk, on December 10, 1968, Thomas Merton, Father Louis of the Order of the Cisterians of Strict Observance, attended a session of a conference of Christian monks studying the future of the monastic life in Asia, and then went to his hotel-room for a rest.

He was killed when he touched a bare wire on a large electric fan, and his charred body was found later with a serene smile on its face.

Orford next quartet too bold with Mozart, display an uncertain unity

At last Sunday's Orford Quartet concert I felt for the first time a tangible imbalance among the instruments of the ensemble.

The quartet is certainly the best in Canada today and with every concert offers proof of an increasing technical development and musical maturity. And yet, especially in the closing Quartet No. 2 in A by Brahms, Marcel St Cyr's cello provided insufficient counterbalance to Andrew Dawes' first violin. Rather it seems that the direction of their individual development is following a different path from the collective development of the quartet. In the past year Mr. Dawes has developed what has always been a very "leading" first violin into an overt soloistic virtuoso tone. As a result the quartet possesses a heavy prow and a wide shallow stern.

This particular problem was not too apparent in their first selection, Mozart's Quartet in C, K. 465, but there are other aspects of the performance worth discussion. It is a late work the type of revolutionary tonal experimentation which would have characterized Mozart's next decade. Dead at 35, he never fulfilled his harmonic prophesies which remain sketched in these late works, tentative groping suggestions. It came off with a bold, swaggering sound, rather too enthusiastic to evoke Mozart's journey into the unknown. The overall impression was sharp and glossy, stylistically inappropriate.

The Orford sound seemed tailor-made for Jean Papineau-Couture's Quartet No. 2. Sunday's public premiere began in a mood best described as experimental. As the performance progressed, the adjective "exploitative" became more apt, since the work relied chiefly on sound effects new and rebuilt, with little actual thematic content. The work did not justify the selection of a string quartet as the performing medium, indeed its paucity of invention hardly justified performance. The quartet indicates an unwelcome trend in modern writing, namely that the implementation of anything new or different, however unnecessary or absurd, justifies a compositional framework. I especially resented the composer's abuse of the Orford Quartet, because these players have exceptional ability in the field of contemporary Canadian music. A reference in the programme notes to the "surprising conciseness (15 minutes) of the work" left me wondering whether this represented a miracle of condensation or dilution.

Brahms' Quartet No. 2, which ended the evening, was (at least in Toronto) the Orford's first performance of this composer's music. The question of balance became quite crucial here, since Brahms writes fully for all four instruments, with even less solo-accompaniment approach than the Mozart work. A further consideration is the heavy chordal character of this music which demands equal emphasis from each instrument contributing to the harmonic components of a theme. Brahms is unwieldy, in a sense the true test of an ensemble's maturity. No amount of surface fire can substitute for the solid internal combustion that propels this piece. One instance of the need for reconsideration of balance came in the last movement. Opening a fugato section, the cello sounded anaemic and softspoken, swamped by the vehemence of the violins.

The Orford players are definitely developing. But if this development is to augur well for the ensemble as a unit, they must seriously consider the matter of balance between their instruments and their approach to performance.

Fairley turns Faust to English prose

Goethe's Faust, translated by Barker Fairley University of Toronto Press, $12.50

One of the glories of our slender library at home was a second-hand copy of Milton's Paradise Lost with the gloomy and detailed Doré illustrations. With this translation of Faust in hand, an old conviction concerning the devil of both Milton and Goethe is reconfirmed in literary terms, he is far more real than the God of either.

Long before anyone told me about a past-time called literary criticism, Milton, assisted by Doré, introduced me to a three-dimensional demon with a Stanford-Binet somewhere over 180 and a grasp of social science that would have made him the preferred campaign manager for most of the national political efforts of the last fifty years. By contrast, the Divinity, once He had ordered the expulsion of the participatory democrats, appeared to retire into relative passivity.

Professor Fairley's translation brings Mephistopheles and his friends into modern idiom, dispensing with the metre and rhyme of the original. The translator says he has nothing against those who insist on holding to poetic form, provided original meaning and modern idiom are present. However, he holds little expectation that all three conditions can be met in translation from the German, and anyone who has witnessed the butchery of Rilke's poems will probably agree.

Modern readers will probably find the section up to Gretchen's death — Book One in the German — more readable than the sometimes confused phantasmagoria of the following portion, including the tragedy of Helen. The confusion is hardly the fault of the translator, growing as it does from the profusion of scenes involving a wide range of characters real and mythological, varying locale and action, and the occasional suspicion that the ongoings have an uncertain relation to Faust's dealings with good and evil.

Part of this unevenness is understandable when the time taken in writing the work is considered. Although Goethe began to put the poem into script form between 1771 and 1775, it had been running through his mind for some years prior, fed by the folk theatre, puppet plays, and Lessing's Faustfragment. The section up to Gretchen's death was in final form by 1808. He had begun work on Book Two in 1790, but this was not brought to its present form until 1831, with the addition of the Helen-tragedy, written in 1826.

The almost insurmountable difficulty of staging the work appears in the history of first performances: Dresden, 1849 for the Helen-tragedy, Hamburg, 1854 for the whole of Book Two, Weimar, 1876 for the complete Faust.

Looked at as literature rather than as theatre, the hard question is whether the work in its present form will be seen as having current meaning. At the time it was worked over by Goethe, the devil remained a manifest force in the real world for most Europeans. In spite of his charm and abilities as a conversationalist (he has all the best lines), Mephistopheles has latterly become redundant. Auschwitz and Treblinka got along very well without him. On the surface, it looks as though it remained for the Nazi movement to accomplish that internalization of evil which the Romantics never quite succeeded in grappling with.

But with the absorption of the devil into the technology (and into the personalities of nuclear physicists), we have lowered the curtain on our prime source of dramatic conflict in the celestial theatre. As a fundamentalist preacher pointed out some years ago writing the devil out of the script will be followed by considerable trouble keeping God in. Our, as The Lord puts it in the prologue to Faust, "You act as a stimulant and so serve a positive purpose in spite of yourself."

We may argue, as Lewis did for Milton, that his theology — and Goethe's — are acceptably traditional. The point remains that the deity of each, as a literary character, takes up very little room on stage.

Henri Costa-Gavras watches the action of his latest film, The Confession, which concerns Stalinist purge trials and stars Yves Montand.

A similar difficulty confronts the illustrator, one Randy Jones, whose crisp sketches occasionally spruce up the Toronto Star. With all his own creative talent, plus a dash of Durer, Hieronymus Bosch, Bruegel the Elder, and Aubrey Beardsley, he evidently has a lot more fun animating evil than good. Perhaps, confronted with the need to visualize the Supreme Good, the best we can do is the resplendent fish fry of Green Pastures.

The entire publication, including illustrations, is first rate. Typographic design, proof-reading, paper, binding, are superbly in character. Whoever had the courage to imprint the title black-on-black on the cloth binding inside the dust jacket is hereby hailed as a person of discrimination and understanding. One can wish only that this individual, and the general management of the University of Toronto Press may some day experience such complete creative fulfillment that they may say with Goethe upon the completion of the Faust, "My further life I perceive as a pure gift, because basically it does not now matter whether or what I produce."

Admit it! The Confession is tedious

The Confession, the latest movie by Henri Costa-Gavras, opens today in Toronto. It was with great anticipation that I previewed this film the day before yesterday at a special Paramount screening in the Ontario Science Center. But sad to say, I think The Confession is going to be remembered as one of the lesser works of the man who made Z.

On the surface it would seem that The Confession has all the ingredients for success. Dealing with the political purges in the USSR in 1951-52 under the Stalinist regime, the film is based upon the actual experiences of Artur London, a former Czech Minister who is one of only three survivors of the 1952 Prague trial. In addition, the entire movie has a distinct air of reality, thanks to the excellent camerawork of Chris Marker and the art direction of Bernard Evein.

Nevertheless, I found The Confession highly claustrophobic and quite tedious (although never really dull) in many places. Not even Costa-Gavras has been able to salvage Jorge Semprun's screenplay, most of which takes place in various cells and interrogation rooms. It is not until the trial and the lament to the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia at the end of the film that the director finally breaks out into the open and drives home the point.

Confinement should not mar an otherwise good movie; it was well handled in the single apartment of Wait Until Dark. Nor should political films be dull; Costa-Gavras himself proved that brilliantly in Z. Nor should we be bored by the constant presence of a prisoner resisting interrogation: Norman Jewison's The Fixer was intriguing throughout. The Confession, however, does not deal properly with the inherent problems of such situations.

Sustained interest in a political film should not have to rely upon the vents alone. As in Z, the pace must remain brisk in order to avoid getting bogged down in clichés, slogans and dogmas. The Confession creeps and crawls from cell to cell to cell, and succeeds only by virtue of its visual clarity and attractiveness.

But if confinement is absolutely necessary, as in The Fixer, then the audience must have some means of identifying with the central character, other than the usual physical deprivations. Yakov Bok (Alan Bates) drew in the viewer, since his imprisonment flowered into a philosophical questioning of self-respect, human individuality and moral strength. But Gerard (Yves Montand) does little else than suggest, "Oh, I am suffering terribly", or point to his jailers and say, "Look what they're doing to me. Isn't it disgusting?"

I am in total agreement with the opinions Costa-Gavras expresses in The Confession, but this can in no way excuse cinematic faults that have produced my indifferent reaction. This may sound a little harsh, since it is not really a bad movie at all. It's just that, coming as it did after Z, The Confession was something of a letdown.

Costa-Gavras was supposed to be at the Science Center on Wednesday night to chair the discussion that followed the screening. Instead he sent a telegram from Paris, explaining that the filming of a new movie had kept him in Europe. As such, I've filed The Confession under "D" for "disappointment".

and am eagerly waiting for Costa-Gavras to redeem himself.

Sixty Poets lacks unity and flavour

How Do I Love Thee?
John Robert Colombo (ed.)
M. G. Hurtig
$2.95

The cupid on the cover is shooting up with a maple leaf forever. How Do I Love Thee? is more than pretentious anthology of "Sixty Poets of Canada (and Quebec)", some virtually unknown except to other poets. Leonard Cohen, Earle Birney and Irving Layton are in LARGE PRINT.

The homey kindling of imagined mutuality, did not warm most of the poets. Thank God I find anthologies such as these as disastrous as trying to put Canada on the map — art-wise, that is. Most of us still think that books like this are as self-evidently justified as calling Leonard Cohen Canada's best poet, simply because he is the most well known. Anthologies tend to presume that there is some distinct unity of purpose in the poets of this or any other country.

The poets here "select and introduce their favourite work". Now get this; Colombo says the poets are "Of Canada (and Quebec)" (italics mine), and continues, "This circumlocution may sound too clever by half, but I wanted the younger Quebec poets to feel at home in the anthology."

It is impossible to speak of these poems in relation to each other. There is no flavour left to taste except, maybe, bad. One of the themes that I find so compelling in Canadian poetry is that of solitude, brought to us by one person's response to and re-creation of it, in the act of writing a poem. The poem is the explanation. It does not have to be followed, or introduced or explained in terms of other poems and poets.

The book is a waste of money to buy, a waste of time to read (except perhaps to give to an ill-thought-of friend).

Afterthought: I just found a George Bowring poem that I really liked — the page it was on just fell on the floor.

Gospel rock featured at Blue Orchid

Armageddon, a Gospel Rock festival which opened at the Blue Orchid last Wednesday, may well have been doomed before it even opened. Initial press releases on the show were improperly prepared, and the advertising was error-laden. Even the poor maitre d' seemed unfortunately unaware of what was happening around him. Worst of all, the show itself presented nothing to indicate that it deserved a better fate, or to relieve the confusion of the evening.

The play, conceived and written by Tobin Lark (with occasional help, largely from Eric Robertson or Tom O'Hanley), sets out to deal with the eternal torment of man's soul as it is torn between good and evil. This theme is much too complex to be dealt with in a mere 90 minutes. As a result, Armageddon scurries from song to song, with little time to sort out chronology or character, and with an end result which is largely pandemonium.

Further, Miss Lark has chosen to try and carry the show virtually single-handedly, though she has enlisted several of her co-performers in Hair. Despite the fact that her background and voice are particularly suited to this gospel-oriented work, she is simply not capable of supporting the musical on her own. Those who have seen "Hair" will crave the presence of those by whom they were most entertained in that show, in my case Harriet Cohen. For my part, the stretch of three numbers in the later part of the show when Miss Lark did not appear proved to be the most entertaining. This was largely due to the very capable work of Miss Cohen and Shelley Sommers, the former shining through particularly in "Dilemma of the Sugar Plum Fairy".

In fact, of the entire cast, only Lark, George Lee, Cohen, and sometimes Dorian Clark show any life or enthusiasm. Graham Teear, endowed with the only effectual costume, adds little in his presence as an "Evil Force". Shelley Sommers' voice was pleasant enough, but here presence radiated little warmth. Lynda Squires and Ron McLean were incapable of carrying their solo numbers.

Further, the Blue Orchid is hardly a place conducive to presenting such a show. The constant scurrying of waiters and whispered "Would you like another drink sir?" are a distracting nuisance. The "stage" is confined to a small area set with a series of steps, the entire thing being obstructed from most patrons view by a railing. Director O'Hanley and choreographer Clark have done admirable jobs considering these obstacles. Clark's choreography and his own dance work were, in fact, notable highlights in this dismal production.

Costuming was effective but trite, and reflected little imagination. The music, though played well, was overpowering, and it too followed too simplistic lines, treating the audience almost contemptuously. The lyrics, when audible, also were bland. In fact, to create a poor pun, the technical aspects the lighting was the only bright spot in Armageddon. It was well conceived and managed, especially considering the inadequate equipment available.

Ed Silverberg, owner of the Blue Orchid, had threatened to close it, should his newest venture also be a loser. Anyone want to rent a building on Bloor Street?

judge the book: Nixon Agonistes is not another pink polemic, but an original and complex study of America. It can be read as eyewitness reporting, as a biography, as an essay on recent history, as a critique of the Marketplace. It should not, pace Mr. Wills, be read as a toot on the Gjallar horn, as the downbeat of a philosophical Gotterdammerung.

The political reportage is as exciting as Mailer's and far less subjective (though Will's loop-the-loops into prose poetry usually end up as nose-dives): Chicago reeling from the street fracas and the meiosis of the democratic party, Baltimore turned jungle the night of a Wallace rally. A backgrounder to the much-mocked Checkers speech shows it as the master gambit it was: Nixon, hanging onto the '52 ticket against the general's will, reached out "... across (the audience's) heads to touch swords in a secret dual with Ike." He won that bout, as later he lost to a man who knew the tricks better than Dick Kennedy in '60 made Nixon play a defensive game, and, Wills reminds us, played Anti-Communism far more ferociously than the old veteran of the Hiss affair.

Wills' forte is distilling documentation into epigrams. Recalling Nixon's discreet reminiscences of Kennedy during the '68 campaign, he says "There is something glamorous about a survivor of Camelot, even if one played the role of Mordred" Goldwater in '64 "... loved his country too much to put it in the hands of a lightweight." But the virtuoso verbalist can skewer anybody on a sharp phrase, and Wills succumbs too often to easy bitchery, compromising his work, pungent quotes tend to drive out honest analyses.

Nixon Agonistes is hard to sum up in a pungent phrase, probably because you could take a scissors to it and end up with two good books and a floorful of bewildering fragments. Reading it is like trying to follow a fascinating radio transmission which inexp-icably lurches all along the short-wave band in a political sense, that's just what it does.

Garry Wills once authored a famous and eloquent interpretation of Conservatism, "The Convenient State". But now National Review, that right-wing Curia, has promulgated in extenso its doctrinal objections to Wills' theses. Apostates are, after all, more dangerous than pagans. But though he has journeyed far from Rome, Wills ambles in an ideological limbo. Time and time again he approaches the altars of Revolution, of Anarchism, but turns his head at the last moment, spurning sacraments. His last words to us are that we must simply wait for a second coming, a new epiphany. Hardly a creed to win converts, hardly a rousing finale to a daring and often brilliant book. Wills' promise is unambiguous, but the performance has not yet matured.

Patience succeeds for Chicago

Monday's Chicago concert made for a memorable evening — the kind of memorable evening, though, you would just rather forget. The string of misfortunes that hampered the success of the performance began with the non-arrival of the band's elaborate sound equipment, which had apparently been held up at the border. When waiting any longer seemed futile, the band went on with some "shit" (Terry Kath's word, not mine) borrowed from a local Canadian group. Maple Leaf Gardens is as poor a concert auditorium as exists in Toronto; trying to reproduce Chicago's special sound with inadequate borrowed equipment was absurd. When their own equipment finally arrived midway through their third number, Chicago wisely opted to wait for it to be set up before pushing on.

When the actual concert got under way, some four hours late, the band's playing was energetic (especially drummer Daniel Seraphine) and expert, but was drained of the enthusiasm necessary. Yet the young crowd, the bulk of which was still on hand even at 1:15 was determined that Chicago would be a success in any case. It lifted the band's spirits, gave it a standing ovation after the finale (a suite on "Make Me Smile" from the second album) and demanded an encore. It was the audience who should have been applauded, for its patience was what saved the evening.

Sorry, we do not love Love Story at all

About a month ago I had the dubious privilege of seeing the movie version of Erich Segal's novel, Love Story. By an interesting coincidence I happened to attend a special matinee that was letting in women at half-price. It was not long before the ¾ female audience had filled the theater with sobs of bitter grief and moans of torment and anguish.

But why is this happening?, I wondered. I swiftly reviewed the plot in my mind. Rich boy meets poor girl. Boy rejects inheritance of a hundred chillion-kazillion dollars in favour of marrying girl. Boy and girl live in near-poverty, punctuated by romantic lovers' spats. Boy finally makes it big of his own accord. Suddenly girl dies. End. Cliches fly with astounding regularity, and yet the audience weeps louder.

On the way out I heard a teenybopper sniff to her red-eyed mother, "That's the BEST movie I ever saw!" Why? "I cried through the whole thing!" And so she and millions like her have chosen to assume the value and validity of the plot solely on the basis of a soggy Kleenex and a stuffed-up nose.

My abhorrence for Love Story is not unlike my disapproval of pornography, and indeed both are engineered so as to elicit responses in a similar way. Russ Meyer and his cohorts are well aware that a significant number of people have an unrestrained desire to see copulation and deviation on the big screen. For this reason, sex, instead of being the means of attaining an important end (e.g., Women in Love), becomes the end in itself. And when this happens, man is represented as nothing more than an animalistic fucking-machine.

In the same way, Love Story, with its total absence of originality of plot and character conflict, panders to those who have an unrestrained desire to cry. Weeping another means to a noble end (e.g., Gone With the Wind, West Side Story), now also becomes the end in itself.

Just as we now have a thriving porno-flick industry, Europe of the 30s used to churn out films known as "maids' movies." These were directed at the housekeeper, the spinster and the old maid who, after a hard day or a hard life, had nothing better to do than sit in the show and cry themselves toward some sort of emotional pseudo-security. If anything, Love Story is not, as Time Magazine believes, a return to simplicity, but rather the first of a possible invasion of new "maids' movies."

Nixon branded at last -- he's a liberal

Nixon Agonistes:
The Crisis of the Self-Made Man
by Garry Wills
The Houghton Mifflin Company, $12.95

The firm is going bankrupt. There hasn't been any new stock for years, things on order never seem to arrive. Some customers never get served, others find their goods defective and demand refunds. Out of desperation the we-try-harder rival, Mr. Nixon, is brought in to run the show: he revamps merchandizing, gets new directors, extends credit. But the loyal complaints clerk, Mr. Wills, knowing it's hopeless, slips a note in the suggestion box. It's not really Nixon's fault, nor was it old man Johnson's. For Classical liberalism, that abstraction of the market place, is wheezing to the grave, and Nixon will probably be the Last Tycoon, the last liberal.

Mowat seduced by Siberians and Siberia

Sibir: My Discovery of Siberie By Ferley Mowat McClelland and Stewart $10.00

In My Discovery of Siberie, Farley Mowat tells of about new ways of life in the North. An example: truck transport that gets through to any community, on snow roads — no sand, no salt, your life in the hands of the highly paid drivers. The book is rich in facts, in anecdotes, and captures some of the thrills Farley experienced in two visits to northern Siberia. The first trip was with his wife Claire, in 1966, and the second in 1969, with John DeVisser, photographer.

Sibir is both humorous and human. Farley has used his background of outdoor life to excite us about reindeer breeding, herring fishing, and the quixotic behavior of Eternal Frost. These fascinate us through thousands of miles of travel to the ports of the Eastern Arctic. Two excellent maps, and endpapers of the top of the world, help visualize the route.

Siberia becomes a land alive, exploding with development, not exploitation, of its natural resources. The Yakut, the Evenk, the Yukagir, and other Small Peoples maintain their roots and their awareness of themselves. At the same time, they are moving into the technological age, along with the many other Russians flooding into Siberia. The New Frontier, burgeoning with cities is warm to those who love Her.

Any notions of an empty land are dispelled as Farley and Claire are hosted from one group of friends to the next. The tradition of northern hospitality can threaten even Farley's capacities, whether extended by hunters, scientists, or Madame Ovchinnikova, Chairwoman of the Yakut Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic.

Farley admits that dealing with a forthright woman is always difficult. Venturing some remarks on the advances of feminism to this lady President, he was quickly taken up: "In the old days the wisdom of women was held to be the true wisdom of the people. Yakut men and woman have always understood each other."

Madame Ovchinnikova had recently played hostess to a delegation of Canadian government officials and politicians, and was quite willing to say what she thought, telling Farley: "You can publish anything I say — if you feel brave enough!" Her anger stemmed from a visit to Canada during Expo year, when the officials had refused to show her any of the Canadian native people, or where they lived and worked, and she was determined that she was going to show them her people when they came to visit.

"Can you believe it? They wouldn't look! All they wanted to see was how we manage to build mines and mining towns in eternal frost! Don't they care at all about people? Are they only interested in the quickest way to turn their country into a colony for exploitation by the Americans, the Germans and Japanese? Such foolish little men! You really should get rid of them!"

Farley freely dips his hand into the pot of reindeer meat, freshly killed, and bubbling over the fire, near the campsite of the Varange, where he has been flown by helicopter. This services the breeders who still prefer to remain nomadic and travel with the herds.

He tells of the patient research that has gone into these herds, and says this succulent meat is supplied fresh and cheaply to thousands in the northern towns, who enjoy it and who would otherwise have to depend on vastly more expensive imported supplies. Young herders urge him to arrange with the Canadian government that they might go and work for one year in Canada teaching closely related Indian and Eskimo people some of the skills that have made their lives well-paid and comfortable.

The Canadian government should take a good look at the USSR. It might keep us from melting our permafrost prematurely, and letting our Northland melt down the drain. Better still, Farley Mowat's book is a real argument for a socialist Canada — a sure guarantee that the North will be developed, with plenty of jobs and challenges ahead.

New plays open at Factory Lab

Snails and Creeps (rather revolting if intriguing titles) are two short plays being presented at the Factory Theatre Lab.

Snails, by Michael Mirolla (UBC) is sponsored by Renaissance '71. The play is about parenthood, about the inevitable struggle between a need for support and a desire for independence. The basic idea the author is trying to express and even to an extent the method he has used (a series of tableaux and sketches depicting the family struggle, the son's departure, the loneliness that is left and the adjustment that leaves no place for him when he returns) are promising. With some work it ought to be a good play. But it needs to be cut, especially the episodes on old age which drag on long after everything is said that is going to be said. There is also much too much repetition and hammering in of the childbirth theme, issuing from my belly and all that. It is interesting, but only to a point.

The monotony of the text is in no way relieved by the production. Kay Griffin is very monotonous as the mother. Her performance is one unvaried, uninterrupted lament. She has introduced no subtlety or psychology in the role. Keith Mills as the young father also lacks finesse; his gestures and speech are too artificial, but as the blind, deaf and senile old man he is more convincing. The technical efficiency could also be improved since the light cues are slow and the transitions between scenes are not always smooth. It would be interesting to see the play produced with more subtlety, in a trimmed and tightened form.

The snails by the way are the father's obsession, they keep eating his cabbage leaves.

The second play, Creeps, by David Freeman is set "in the washroom of a sheltered workshop for cerebral palsy victims." It has all the bitterness and black humour of the cripple looking at himself. The jokes are vicious but they are funny, and so is the play.

The washroom is the characters' refuge; there they meet to talk of problems and ambitions; each one's story unfolds, and the mood is one of despair. The play ends as the youngest of the group decides to try the world outside.

The demand on the actors in such a play is considerable; one keeps expecting someone to forget which arm is crippled or how he is supposed to walk, but each is well into his role, there are no slips. Pete, played by Victor Sutton, presents an unusual problem. His speech is impaired by his illness and consequently he is extremely difficult to understand. While this is certainly a very real situation, it is difficult to cope with in the theatre. The play however is sufficiently captivating to carry it, and the only suggestion one might make is that each tale might be enlivened or condensed.

Part of SAC meeting devoted to 'nothing'

By PAUL CARSON
The Students Administrative Council finally satisfied its harshest critics by spending almost thirty minutes at Wednesday's general meeting in a serious discussion of "nothing".

Actually, the "nothing" was the core of a motion by external affairs commissioner Vince Dolan instructing the SAC elections committee to do "nothing" about a proposal to hold all SAC constituency elections on the same date as the presidential election.

"Attempting to force a uniform voting day on all constituencies is a flagrant SAC intervention in their internal affairs," Dolan said.

"If this serious meddling continues, I'm sure several arts colleges will consider withdrawal from SAC," he added.

Miss Anderson blushed, several members protested, Mr. Speaker squirmed, SAC president Rod Hurd remonstrated, and the uniform voting day proposal was politely killed.

The SAC presidential elections will be held on March 17 and 18; nominations open February 24 and close March 3 when formal campaigning begins.

SAC also officially repudiated the results of last summer's University Wide Committee as representing "the kind of political, anti-rational procedure which we wish to avoid."

A motion proposed by university commissioner Peter Hall called for a unicameral Top Governing Structure with an academic majority "to ensure the university the autonomy it requires to remain a constructive critical force in society".

Hall favored a balanced representation from students, faculty and lay estates "so that no one element can effectively dominate the deliberations and turn the Council into a forum for political bickering."

In a brief discussion of the parity strike in arts and science, SAC approved the establishment last week of the parity restructuring counter committee and requested U of T president Claude Bissell "to intervene personally to mediate this dispute" to achieve parity representation on the Arts and Science Faculty Council.

In a jibe at the intransigence of the Association of Teaching Staff, SAC also urged Bissell to form the advisory committee on the trimester system first proposed by SAC almost three years ago.

"I'd really like to sit on a Presidential Committee being boycotted by the ATS," Hall said.

In routine housekeeping decisions, SAC voted to hold a special meeting next Wednesday to discuss the proposed campus centre, and chose Owen Dick (IV UC) to replace the resigned Brian Hayes as communications commissioner.

SAC also appointed the following hardy souls to the following tedious Simcoe Hall committees:

- Chandrakant Panchal — Bookstore
- Richard Peachey — Social Responsibility of the University
- John Scarrow — Health Services

- Darel Dillabough, Pat Burhill and Marshall Korenblum — High School Relations
- David Peebles and Mike Wolfson — Instructional Media
- Mike Waters — Computer Users

- J. Rodney Hurd — International Students Centre
- Bruce Couchman — Placement Centre
- Tom Johnson, Tony Usher and Dave Gallagher — Student Housing

For what may be the first time this year, the SAC meeting was blessed with the presence of a quorum from start to finish.

"That's because we were at Erindale," said Rod Hurd, "and people couldn't leave until we completed the agenda."

To forstall any future exiles to Erindale, the assembled members promptly voted in principle to lower the quorum and establish some form of voting by proxy.

Four of five students will find jobs

By MARINA STRAUSS

"Four out of every five post-secondary students will find jobs this summer in Ontario."

Dr. Neil Perry made this prediction Wednesday afternoon speaking to U.C. students in a "Career Counselling Symposium" sponsored by UC Alumni (in cooperation with UC Literary and Athletic Society) to acquaint students with knowledge of job opportunities available today.

The graduating classes of 1971 will be 50% larger than in 1970 in Honors Psychology, 25% larger in Honors Politics, 20% larger in Bachelor of Science (with a greater demand for geology graduates) and 15% higher in the graduating class of BA degrees. Perry added that with a B.Ed. degree, jobs in teaching can be found quite easily at any Board of Education. Perry is Assistant Deputy Minister, Programme Development Service, Department of Manpower and Immigration.

"An arts degree leads mainly to white collar apprenticeship, or it is merely an interim step to a professional degree. An employer is looking for someone who is prepared to join the enterprise. The liberal arts college cannot present miracles for job opportunities," he said.

Perry summarized the employment outlook for '71: In Canada, out of 2,180,000 people, 345,000 will be seeking permanent jobs and 989,000 will be seeking summer employment. In Ontario alone, out of 803,000, 386,000 people will be seeking permanent employment.

110,000 summer employment.

Perry's address was followed by a number of separate informal workshops in the form of panel discussions by experienced individuals representing Government, Communications, Finance, and General Business.

Architecture students abolish their council

Students in the Faculty of Architecture have abolished their student council, the Architecture Students Society.

"We were worried about elitism, so we held a mass meeting and terminated the existence of the student society," Barry Sampson (IV Arch) told the SAC general meeting Wednesday night.

"Now when we have a problem, we just hold a big tea party and discuss it."

The position of ASS president has been replaced by an all-purpose functionary, the "Mad Hatter of All That Matters."

Sampson, who lost his SAC seat with the demise of ASS, called the Tea Party concept "an irresponsible exercise in self-delusion."

"The idea is interesting, but it's becoming just another unworkable committee."

Women's Caucus presents brief to Bissell

By ELEANOR JOHNSTON

The U of T Women's Caucus proclaimed Wednesday the Day of Mourning for the women of Canada who have "suffered and died because of the injustice of our present abortion laws."

Mourners wore black armbands in memory of the estimated 1,000 women who die or are severely maimed as the result of the 100,000 illegal abortions which are performed each year in Canada.

The Caucus sponsored a panel to discuss abortion in Sid Smith 1070 on Wednesday afternoon.

Prof. Barret, of the U of T Zoology Dept., spoke about the results of a survey of student opinion on the subject of abortion, in 1968. Of the 520 who responded, 6½% did not approve of abortion under any circumstances, and 42% approved of abortion for any reason.

Various reasons for abortion received different percentages of approval: Harm to the mother, 93.5%; rape, 84%; child deformity, 79%; childbirth out of wedlock, 43%; economic inability to support the child, 46%; child unwanted, 47%.

Generally, there tended to be no difference in opinion caused by the sex or religion of the respondent, except for Roman Catholics, who were more intolerant in their approval.

Dr. G. Tolentino, a physician and psychiatrist at the Queen St. Mental Health Centre, said: "There is a need for a change in national policy; there should be free abortion on demand."

Dr. Tolentino said that abortions can be carried out cheaply, from $25 to $50, and quickly; a doctor now can perform ten such operations in an hour. He said that abortions are not medically dangerous, and that OHSIP will pay for abortions performed in New York.

He read clippings from medical journals and newspapers, pointing out the liberalized trend of opinion toward abortion. For example, on Feb. 2, the General Council of the United Church of Canada stated that abortions should be legalized, and that they are matters private to the women and doctors involved.

Dr. Tolentino supported the efforts of the Women's Caucus to publicize the necessity of the legalization of abortion. He said that contraception and sterilization are only two ways of preventing unwanted pregnancies, but that the issue of abortion can and often does become a desperate crisis and is especially psychologically harmful to the young unmarried woman.

Mary Cornish, a Law Union Member, said that the present laws on abortion can cause injustice. For example, by the time a woman has procured the required signatures of three doctors, she may well be more than three months pregnant. Therefore she is refused by the hospital committee, and she must resort to a more dangerous illegal abortion.

Yesterday, termed "Abortion Day of Protest", the Caucus presented a brief to President Bissell, asking him to pressure the Ontario Government for new abortion laws and to set up an abortion clinic on campus.

A demonstration for new abortion laws is planned for Feb. 13, in Ottawa.

During yesterday's Abortion Day on campus, women built support for a Feb. 13 march on Ottawa.

'Eat shit' — Trudeau delivers elegant insult

OTTAWA (CUP) — The super-cool carefully cultivated facade slipped a little Tuesday.

"Maudite Traire" shouted the Lapalme drivers, still manning picket lines outside the Parliament Buildings, at Canada's Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

"Nagez la merde" replied the elegant PM, thumbing his nose.

Later Trudeau commented, "If these guys come here to harass and insult me, then they can expect to receive insults in return."

The Toronto dailies translated the PM's epithet as "Go to hell: but Brian McKenna of the Montreal Star was a little less fastidious in admitting that "literally the expression means 'eat shit' — but has the force of the English expression 'kiss my behind'".

The Lapalme truck drivers have been out of work since they lost their jobs in a Montreal Postal dispute last April.

Many of the 400 men were later offered jobs in the Post Office but declined when they learned they would have to give up their union affiliation with the Montreal-based Confederation of National Trade Unions.

Frank Diterlizzi, spokesman for the men, said 25 of the former drivers had been offered jobs by Jean-Pierre Cote, minister responsible for the Post Office, at $3.25 per hour.

He called the offer "blackmail" and said that it was refused, adding that the government "was trying to buy us drivers off one by one like sheep or prostitutes."

The government would have to use guns before blackmail would ever work, he said.

The men expect to be back at work in March when their unemployment insurance runs out. In the meantime those who get their cheques put them in a pot and everyone gets an equal share.

They drive into Ottawa every day that Parliament meets and return to Montreal the same day.

Since Christmas, they have been wearing the green, white and red toques of the Quebec Patriotes of the 1837 Rebellion. The men said the toques had been an anonymous gift to them. They wear them in honor of the Patriotes.

"Canadian workers must have Canadian unions" will be the topic of this week's CLM-SUNDAYS, a series of public, informal, educational seminars sponsored by the Canadian Liberation Movement.

The need for a Canadian national labour movement at this time is of crucial importance in opposing the imperialist takeover of the country, says CLM.

This week's seminar will be led by Caroline Perly CLM member and Carman Cole, Vice-President and founding member of the Council of Canadian Unions.

CLM-SUNDAYS meets in the Upper Lounge of the Graduate Student Union, 16 Bancroft Street (just south of the Textbook Store) at 2 P.M.

PHE A clinches top hockey spot

By STAN KOROLNEK

In one of the best played games of the interfac hockey season, Tuesday, PHE A (10-1) defeated Victoria College (6-4-1), 3-1. The win enabled PHE to clinch first place in the first group. The loss dropped Vic into a second place tie with Sr. Engineering.

PhysEd, without star players Rod Brown and Robbie Ellis in the lineup, still managed to control most of the game. All the scoring came in the first period, with Steve Burton, Mick Weiner and George Nuppola scoring for the Jocks and Don Sharpe replying for Vic.

Nuppola and Burton (another former Riverdale great) were outstanding for PhysEd. Nuppola was especially effective in breaking up Vic rushes during their powerplay.

Referees Jeff Karstoff and Jim Richardson handed out nine penalties, five of them to the Jocks. Most of the penalties came in the second period when the checking got close and the play chippy.

Notes: In other first division games this week, Trinity (2-8-1), still hampered by the loss of star Dave Burt, lost another one, 5-1, to fourth place St. Mikes (3-5-3). Brukkett (2), Tate, Pagnutti, White with Parksie McCann adding three assists. Halpenny scored for Trinity. Sr. Engineering (Cooper, Hawes and Hunt) defeated hapless Law 3-0. Scarborough (Beddome, Thomson, Prebble and Boyles) shot down Erindale (Perds) 4-1.

The Varsity — Errol Young

Varsity vaulter faces the best in Games tonight

By LYNDON LITTLE

About 8:00 p.m. this evening, Bruce Simpson, a second year PhysEd student, will carry his "Cat-a-Pole" onto the floor of Maple Leaf Gardens and match skills with the best in his particular business.

It won't be a new experience for Simpson, but it will be the first opportunity for local sports fans to see this gifted athlete do what few in the world can do better — pole vaulting to heights over 16 feet.

This is the first year at Varsity for Simpson who is 20. Last year was spent at UCLA on a scholarship earned as a result of the great promise he displayed as a high school vaulter at Agincourt High School.

As a member of Varsity's track and field team this fall, he set a new OQAA standard at the finals in Hamilton with a vault of 16 feet, 3/4 inches.

BECAUSE OF HIS OUTSTANDING RECORD as a freshman at UCLA — he did 16 feet, 9 3/4 inches to become the current Commonwealth record holder — Simpson has won almost automatic invitations to the big meets on this winter's North American indoor circuit. Since the start of the new year, every weekend has been spent at some meet somewhere in the US. Tonight, it's Toronto's turn to play host to the world's best track stars in the Maple Leaf-Telegram Games.

So far, he has established himself as the most consistent vaulter on the circuit. His record to date: Saskatoon Indoor Games, 2nd; Washington Indoor Games, 2nd; Philadelphia Track Classic, 2nd; Millrose Games, N.Y., 2nd and Boston Classic, 1st.

Tonight, Simpson's main competition will come from John Pennel (California Striders); Bob Seagren (California Striders); Sam Caruthers (Maryland), last year's winner and current Games record holder; and Kjll Isaksson, a native of Sweden who is now attending Southern Cal.

"Considering the handicaps, I'm a fairly well satisfied with my progress this year," commented Simpson on Wednesday. "I'm just breaking in a new pole that U of T bought for me. It's a little stiffer and, now that I've moved my hand hold up a little, I think I should be able to take a good shot at 17 feet soon."

THE BIGGEST OBSTACLE SIMPSON must overcome is the adjustment he must make when he comes up against the 128-foot approach — which is standard in the big meets — after practising on the short, 95-foot, runway at Woburn Collegiate where he trains each weeknight.

"If I could just have more room I could concern myself more with my vaulting technique rather than always worrying about making the proper adjustment for the short approach."

Earlier this year, Simpson had been hoping to be able to use the Exhibition Coliseum for his nightly workouts. There was plenty of floor space but one other small problem. A vault of 16 feet, 5 inches would have landed him among the rafters!

Notes: Thirteen other Varsity track team members will participate in the annual Canadian college section of the Games which takes place in the afternoon. Erik Little will see action in the high jump and 600 yards; Dave Barrett and Ron Nastiuk in the pole vault; Keith Hotrum, 50 and 300 yards; Ken Jeffers, 50 yards; Paul Glynn, 60 yards; Mark Minden, 100 yards; Al Tucker, 300 yards; Norm Cumming, mile; Brian Penny, high jump; Alex Romaschin, two miles; and Richie Pyne, relay.

Edging closer to the 17-foot mark, vaulter Bruce Simpson will star in Indoor Games at Gardens.

Mustangs here tonight

Optimism replaces post-Guelph gloom

Quiet concern rather than panic pervades Varsity hockey workouts in the wake of Tuesday night's debacle in Guelph which saw Blues blow a 3-1 second period lead and eventually lose by a 6-5 score.

The loss, their third defeat in eleven league starts, means simply one thing: Blues will now need help to finish in top spot in the OQAA Western Division standings.

Blues' rivals, the Waterloo Warriors, remained two full games ahead in the loss column when they handed the Windsor Lancers a 8-2 pasting Wednesday night in Waterloo. The Warriors have one game left with Blues (Varsity Arena a week tonight), one with Windsor (originally scheduled last Saturday but cancelled because of the snow storm), one match with Western, and two with Guelph.

"I'm not taking anything away from Guelph," commented coach Tom Watt last night after the workout. "but we should never have blown that lead."

Blues have an excellent opportunity to get back on the winning track tonight when the Western Mustangs, currently 1-6-3, visit Varsity Arena

Watt plans one lineup shuffle for the game. Kaz Lysionek becomes the right winger for John Wright and Gord Davies with Danny McCann slipping into Lysionek's old spot as the right flank for center Nick Holmes. Mac Hickox, who had been sharing the left side of the same line with McCann, becomes the full-time left winger. Scott Seagrist will be the tenth forward.

Notes: Mike Boland, the three-year veteran who left the team in early December for a shot at pro hockey, has successfully completed his tryout period with the Springfield Kings of the American League and has been signed to a professional contract.

Simone Chartrand

Michel Chartrand "talks too much"

By MARINA STRAUSS

"The only reason my husband is in jail is because he talks too much. That's the truth," said Simone Chartrand, wife of jailed labour leader Michel Chartrand, Saturday.

Chartrand was speaking in an informal discussion sponsored by the Voice of Women.

"Michel has been denied bail because he's too suspicious. They don't want him out. The trials in Montreal are political trials, questioning the defendants' ideas, principles and values, not their criminality. These trials show the political nature of intimidation against the Montreal Five.

"There were two kidnappings and one death in Canada. But all those people put in prison had nothing to do with it. When someone talks too loud, Trudeau puts him in prison. Now that these five French Canadians are in jail, he thinks all the trouble is gone and there will be peace.

"Michel and I never knew the members of the FLQ. Michel has always been a member of a democratic group. Democratic means having your own opinions and ways of thinking. But now anything can be seditious. If you say there has to be radical change in the capitalist system, then you're FLQ. To ask questions is not even a right now. That's not democracy.

"We have to stand on our feet and say what's right is right.

what's wrong is wrong. Egalite doesn't mean justice all the time."

She spoke sincerely and passionately, and was eager to discuss the problems in Quebec.

"I don't like being a propagandist. I'm a citizen. I don't need slogans. I didn't come here to defend Michel. He's strong enough to talk for himself." And she added, smiling, "That's his problem. Even if he's not English, he has a good sense of humour."

Chartrand talked openly of her love for her husband: "We write love letters — he's only allowed one a week. We send each other poems — there's no use in talking about our principles and politics."

The crowd of over 100 was touched by her charming warmth, responding in a feeling of closeness and frankness towards her. One woman asked Simone what the intent was of invoking the WMA. "Who made such a gross reassessment?" she questioned. "To so many of us it looked like a temper tantrum on Trudeau's part, as if he was saying, 'I'm not going to let you play with my toy.'" Chartrand replied: "It was not a question of ideology; it was a question of prestige. Even well-informed and knowledgeable people would do this or else they could lose their jobs.

"Political action is something that must be done for the people

With 5.6% of the students voting — the lowest electoral turn-out in U of T history, the committee to choose a successor to president Claude Bissell has been elected.

Gus Abols, a third year law student and last year's SAC president, and Joyce Denyer, past president of the Association of Part-time University Students will represent undergraduates on the fourteen-member committee.

Faculty representatives are political economy professor A. E. Safarian, J. B. Conacher from the department of history, and conservative law professor Stanley Schiff.

Gary Wasserman, a York grad enrolled in the School of Business, easily won a five-way battle for the SGS position.

Administrators chosen are University College principal Archie Hallett and U of T executive vice-president for non-academic matters Alex Rankin.

Only 2,689 of the almost 40,000 eligible voters cast ballots during the four-day election conducted last week, but a mere 2,024 of the 36,164 students voted.

In the undergraduate section, Denyer easily topped the poll with 479 votes.

She was followed by two other extension students — current APUS president and PAC member Norma Grindal (450) and Clifford Brown (403) who, at 50, had termed himself U of T's "oldest student radical."

However, as election rules permitted only one arts student to win, the second undergrad position went to Abols (349). Abols finished over 100 votes ahead of arts parity strike leader Brian Morgan (II Trin.)

Bernie Teitelbaum (IV UC), missed again as he finished eleventh in the sixteen-person race.

The faculty race saw only 518 staff members bother to vote as Safarian, dean designate of graduate studies, headed the list with 192 votes.

Conacher, a leading member of the right-wing faculty group opposing parity in the faculty of arts, was a close second at 186 and Schiff, another parity opponent, came third at 162.

Narrowly missing out in the search committee sweepstakes was the arch foe of student parity, classics professor John Rist, who received 158 votes, just four behind Schiff.

With three student and three faculty members, the search committee is a parity body

In the administration category, nine candidates divided 110 votes in the race for two seats. Hallett was on top with 40, and Rankin just beat St. Michael's College principal Rev. J. M. Kelly, 34 to 32.

Appointed members of the search committee include three delegates from the Board of Governors, two representatives from the U of T Alumni Association, and chancellor Omond Solandt as chairman.

Although no break-downs by faculty have been made available by Simcoe Hall officials who handled the election, rough estimates place the undergraduate full-time student vote at 5%, the part-time student vote at 6%, and the graduate student vote at 7.5% of their respective totals.

Faculty participation was an overwhelming 11%, while administrators topped the list with an estimated 44% turn-out

The elections have been held in the midst of official student confusion over the legitimacy of the presidential search committee

The procedure and format of choosing a committee were decided unilaterally by the Board of Governors without consulting students or SAC. SAC responded a few days later by lodging a protest.

Dissension within the Student Council over whether or not to recognize the elections as legitimate was ended by the simple expedient of tabling the discussion.

At one point, SAC planned to take out an injunction against the administration's holding the election but canned the idea later.

Although the elections took place in the frosty non-recognition of SAC, the part-time students, through their organization, APUs were wasting no time

Sources revealed that APUS spent $500 to send letters to all of the 9000-odd part-time students in a successful effort to put in extension candidates

Prior to the election, complaints were raised about the failure of Simcoe Hall to publicize the affair. Elections were called only one week after nominations for the candidacies closed. In official statements published by Simcoe Hall in The Varsity and the Bulletin candidates were not permitted to express political views on the presidency.

Even the voting procedures came under severe criticism, as students complained that the polling booths were difficult to find

SAC president Rod Hurd noted that he was "not particularly pleased with the composition, — although Joyce Denyer is a bright light, and Principal Hallett too."

"I think people ran mainly on reputation which was unfortunate," added Hurd, who also found the preponderance of hard-line faculty "unfortunate"

Wim Kent, executive assistant to registrar Robin Ross, and administrator in charge of the election was "disappointed that more people didn't vote."

Claude Bissell, president since 1958, will retire effective July 1.

The search committee starts work on choosing a successor sometime this afternoon. The Board of Governors retains the right to veto any nominee.

Presidential searchers seem proper, pedestrian

By LAURA KELLY

If the winners have their way, the presidential search committee will be the most undirected, secretive, and affectedly apolitical group yet devised, despite the carefully arranged representation of all "estates" within the university.

Interviewing 7 of the 8 new elected committee members by telephone, one could even begin to believe that the U of T presidency is a casually-held post which has fewer implications than a SAC commission.

Few of them could say what they thought were the necessary qualifications for the president, or the needs of this huge institution. To the man, however, they all admired Dr. Claude Bissell.

Of course the search group is only first meeting today with O. M. Solandt, U of T Chancellor, appointed chairman and real power behind the committee, according to Gary Wasserman, the elected graduate student.

"You really should call Chancellor Solandt. He's the one who knows what's going on," said J. B. Conacher, one of the faculty members. Several others mentioned Solandt as the man with the information.

Solandt has been soliciting candidate suggestions, said Alex Rankin, and apparently will set the procedures for the search, and will direct the early investigations.

If they are not impressed with their importance, they are prepared to protect their "in camera" status.

"How could you be conducting the search in any other way," said Stanley Schiff, law professor and faculty member.

"If you want to get good people you have to meet in camera. People don't want to have their name bandied about," said Rankin.

When you're discussing people's qualifications, meetings should be in camera," said Wasserman.

What's happened to that old free-tradish, fiercely independent, competitive spirit?

But even a shrouded atmosphere could lend itself to some productive discussions between the three university segments, faculty, students and administrators, if the representatives of each group were equipped and committed enough to confront each other.

What seems to be going on is a folksy, hand-in-hand dance around the pinnacle of the presidency, as each member affirms their duty of looking after the good of the whole university.

"One should be able to operate in this committee by looking for somebody who acts in the best interest of the university. I don't believe you can really think for one particular segment, said Joyce Denyer, an undergraduate representative.

Schiff, speaking on the danger of students acting as a group, said, "I know Gus Abols (one of the three elected students) is a very good guy. We might have had students that were dead-set on a president that wants parity on the top-governing structure.

"I hope we don't get into that kind of nonsense," he said. "I don't see myself as representing an interest group," said Archie Hallett, Principal of University College.

Wasserman was an exception, saying students should persuade faculty to recognize the student view, but continued, "Once we play their game, we have to play by their rules."

"We'll make up the rules as we go along," said Conacher.

The Board of Governors must approve any candidate the search committee chooses.

Simone Chartrand speaks

The Establishment is doing things against the needs of the people. Everyone's personal politics is their own choice. But when it comes to public affairs, if you don't agree with something, it doesn't mean that you are not a pacifist or that you are violent. It means you are looking for justice."

Simone pointed out the problem of the Montreal Five in finding lawyers. If a lawyer defends the Five, he will be ostracized; if he belongs to a big law firm, he will lose his job. "It is not a just trial."

The audience was in complete sympathy with Chartrand. One man compared the situation with the McCarthy era of the 50's in the States. "We will pay a high price if we let this happen in Canada," he warned.

Simone was questioned about the response of the younger generation. "Although some are more independent from the big powers, others are still indifferent. They are satisfied to go to university, work for the Establishment, and make money."

"Those youth who want to help in our fight, they're not interested in going to Parliament and going through all the tedious tasks. The FLQ also are too impatient to do this. After the April elections, they wanted more radical solutions."

"Although I don't agree with violence, we must realize that the capitalist system is violence too. It is violence against old people and underprivileged people. And Trudeau is a spoilt child. It doesn't mean anything to him. He's rich and powerful."

People in Quebec have more information now, Simone affirmed. She said that at first it was "all emotion", but now there are some intelligent sources, and people "can read between the lines." "There are good papers and magazines — the Quebec Presse is free from big enterprise." She also highly recommended "The Last Post".

"After returning to Quebec City from western Canada, the French people were interested to hear me speak. Five years ago I would have been considered a traitor," she remarked with optimism.

Chartrand insisted that meetings, discussions, and demonstrations are important all across the country, both for democracy and civil rights, and to help for justice in the trials. "Write your Member of Parliament, ask questions, get information, ask about the trials," she urged.

At this point one member of the audience stood up and started to question: "What if each of us here sent a letter to Trudeau and..."

But Chartrand interrupted him before he could finish, and, with a charming laugh, replied to the unfinished query: "No use."

The audience didn't push the prediction.

After the meeting, most of the 100 present signed a petition, to be sent to Ottawa, demanding the release of the political prisoners.

Parity committee broadens representation

By TONY USHER

The parity committee now attempting to rapidly formulate a workable proposal for a new Arts and Science faculty council has come under fire for being unrepresentative.

The committee has agreed to invite three teaching assistants, one female member of the teaching staff, and one extension student to its Monday meeting as assessors. It will then decide whether or not to seat them as members in addition to the present five students and five staff.

On Friday, faculty sympathetic to the parity cause met to confirm their choice of staff to the committee. Barbara Martineau (English, Scarborough) and other faculty objected to the five's all being men.

Teaching assistants were also present and made a case for their not being disenfranchised.

The faculty meeting unanimously ratified the selection of its five representatives, on the condition that the restructuring committee consider adding extension teaching assistant, and female faculty representatives.

Martineau and three teaching assistants then appeared at the restructuring committee meeting Friday afternoon in Innis College.

Committee members agreed with the validity of their claims for representation but were uncertain about the legitimacy of altering committee membership at the present time. They pointed out that all were welcome to attend as observers.

The committee is now preparing a statement on the role of a new Faculty Council which it hopes to release on Tuesday.

One of the teaching staff who led the Faculty Council move to quash self-evaluated marks in CIN 193 last year also sat on a special committee which examined the distribution of all marks in the faculty before their release. Foulds revealed.

Faculty Council replaced the students' appraisal of their own work in the Innis College interdisciplinary course with marks based on the averages of the students' other credit courses.

The restructuring committee was also surprised to learn of the existence of an Examinations Review Board which has the power to upgrade averages marginally below class cutoff limits on the basis of its appraisal of the merit of the student's academic work.

The committee will be meeting daily this week in its effort to produce final proposals by the end of reading week.

U.S. nixes kiddies' Vampire blood toy

VANCOUVER (CUP) — A Vancouver importer has returned a shipment of 7,200 tubes of "Vampire Blood" to United States suppliers after a federal food and drug laboratory test showed it contained an organism which it did not identify, a spokesman for the federal drug directorate said.

Described as a children's toy, U.S. advertisements of Vampire Blood say "a few drops on your skin or in the corners of your mouth looks like the real thing."

The U.S. food and drug administration issued an earlier warning that Vampire Blood contained a "highly dangerous" bacteria known as pseudo-mona and that it could also cause lead poisoning.

Scar council's future on line

By DOUG HAMILTON

Scarborough College students will meet at noon today to debate a proposal to dissolve their Student Council and to replace it with a non-elected directorate.

SAC representative Bob Stewart has dismissed student democracy as a sham, and has recommended that the present democratic constitution be discarded and a seven-man "junta" be instituted to manage student affairs within the College.

Stewart emphasized that the endorsement of such an authoritarian structure was contrary to his beliefs, but he insisted that there was no other solution to the problems which the Scarborough College Student Society has experienced throughout the year.

The SCSS has been leaderless since erstwhile president Carmen Palumbo resigned in December.

The present Student Council, said Stewart, "has no financial policy," it has failed to provide a "student voice for committees," and could promise nothing "but the status quo."

Late sports: Bridge at Brock

The Hart House Bridge Club finished second to McGill this weekend in the 1971 Canadian Inter-collegiate Bridge Championship held at Brock University.

In the field of about 12 universities and 50 pairs of players, McGill placed first and second in the pairs championship and won the team of four contest as well.

A Toronto pair, Mike Man and L. Sai-jack came third in the pairs game.

A Toronto team of four recovered strongly enough from a mediocre first half to come second out of 25 teams. Mike Schoenborn, Andy Altay, Abe Greenspan and Jim Kavanagh had a phenomenal 83% game to steal second and win the second session.

Another Toronto team, Mike Kolin, Bruce Waugh, Dave Oakden and Eric Mills won the first session and came fifth overall.

The proposed dictatorship, according to Stewart, will be "an efficient bureaucracy." It will have absolute power over the allocation of funds, and will appoint all student members to College committees and SAC representatives. The directorate will be self-appointed and self-perpetuating; elections for student government will be eliminated.

Opposition to Stewart's proposal has been voiced by former Student Society vice-president David Onley.

Onley claims that he is "trying to defend democracy" and believes that the SCSS can still function efficiently. He is confident that the majority of students will back his demand to retain a democratic council.

Jim Cozzi, another Scarborough SAC representative, is also hostile to Stewart's plan. Cozzi feared the directorate would be established if Scarborough students did not protest effectively.

"The only way the directorate can be legitimately established," asserted Cozzi, "is by referendum. Any attempt to create the directorate by any other means will meet with my opposition."

Whether a dictatorial student government is instituted at Scarborough College depends on how vigorously students oppose it.

"Unless they complain," says Stewart, "I assume they want it."

Whazzzzat? A fast one!

Now that the results are in for the presidential search committee, somebody must be laughing.

Somebody (and we really can't imagine who that might be) has succeeded in achieving two remarkable political accomplishments.

In the first place, he's conducted an election of unprecedented importance in a casual, almost unnoticed manner.

There were no public forums; only a few of the candidates mounted any campaigns; and there was no attempt to allow the candidates to articulate what they thought were the criteria by which to select a new university president.

The interval between the close of nominations and the opening of the elections was less than a week — a week, dominated, we might add, by intense strife in the structurally paralyzed faculty of arts and science.

Not surprisingly, arts and science students, who were able to turn out more than 60 per cent of their number for the strike ballot, displayed little interest in the committee election, with ten times fewer students casting ballots.

The referendum was conducted over a two-day period, and the committee elections spread over a four-day period, but even this device didn't help.

But the second — and even more remarkable accomplishment of the strategist behind last week's elections — was that on such a politically sensitive issue, he was able to bring about the election of what looks at this point to be a politically innocuous search committee.

Never before has our ruling board of governors allowed its power to select the university's chief executive to be interfered with by the other estates of the university.

It was a risky venture to throw some of this power out the window — without any requirement to do so beyond an anticipated threat of student disgruntlement.

Of course, the board made sure that not all the seats on the committee — which is only an advisory one, mind you — would be elected the rabble.

Six of the 14 members are not elected, anyway. They represent the Board, the alumni association, and the Chancellor of the university, who chairs the committee as well.

The university's high-ranking administrators picked two of their number to fill another two seats on the committee. Forty-four per cent of them voted.

All three faculty representatives are uniformly longstanding anti-parity stalwarts.

Only the student representatives — former SAC President Gus Abols (although in third year law, he technically qualifies for an undergraduate spot), former Association of Part-Time University Students President Joyce Denyer, and graduate representative Gary Wasserman, offer any hope for a committee which will try to carry into practice some of the principles begin the Commission on University Government Report.

Left out in the cold in that roundup, are the more than 8,000 arts and science students who have been involved in intense debate over the future of their faculty for the past month. They failed to put any of their number onto the committee.

One of the faculty members expressed great relief on learning of the composition of the new committee, saying a danger had been avoided in not picking students who were "dead-set on a president that wants parity on the top-governing structure."

All these factors must be giving great satisfaction to those to whom the selection of a new president is a dangerous venture which could mean a radical shift in the nature of the university.

They have practically been assured that at least a majority of the committee will opt for a traditional kind of president, one who will use a firm hand to keep the lid on the explosive social pressures which are challenging the contemporary university.

And the social pressures?

Well, they'll just have to wait.

"I've just finished my PHD program..."

In this article, which he originally called "Is the Current Ph.D. Program Worthwhile?", U of T graduate student Robert Langevin, offers some criticisms of graduate education programs.

I HAVE JUST COMPLETED my Ph.D. program and I am so glad to be finished that I am very tempted to forget this whole article. I think I was a rather typical graduate student, and I feel that I have a responsibility to say something about my graduate experience, so here it is.

I use the words "graduate experience" rather than "graduate education" because I do not feel that education is currently being offered. My main reason for saying this is my impression that graduate school is preoccupied with quantity of facts, courses — credits accumulated by students, rather than with quality of education. This is not through neglect, for it seems quantity and quality in graduate experience are equated.

In this "acquisitive" approach, students with so many credits are granted an M.A. and with so many more credits, they received a Ph.D. With some exceptions, there is little attempt to nurture originality or individuality, judgment or enthusiasm. The course is set and a student is "put through the mill".

I CANNOT HONESTLY SAY I was interested in most of my graduate courses, they were a mere extension of undergraduate courses which were enjoyable at the time, but I was looking forward to a new approach by then.

As a student, I have found that when I want to know something I'll listen with avid interest. Most things are like that now because I love my work. Jerome Bruner of Harvard argues this very point — discovery learning is most effective in education. I found most teachers failed to convey a sense of enthusiasm or intellectual curiosity which would be inspiring at least.

I find the most appalling aspect of graduate school is that it is a dead serious business. Students want to get in and get out as soon as possible. For some, it is a means to money. I recall talking to one student on the first day of lectures last year. She was about to attend her first lecture but she forgot what the course was about and had to look in the school bulletin to see who was teaching it.

When I asked if she was really interested, she said it was a salary increase and one course was much the same as another. Interestingly, businesses, the public and high school systems are the agents who reward this accumulation of credits with money.

AN AMUSING CONTRADICTION in this "quantity" logic is the fact that university professors who presumably are teaching "at the highest level" are unqualified. They have no formal teacher training in terms of course credits or practicum. I hope someone does not take it upon himself now to add this useless course to the present excess.

It is interesting how sacred credits are to the graduate school. If you ever try to change universities after your M.A. you will find it very difficult gaining entrance. Should you be accepted, you may find yourself losing credits and/or repeating courses you had taken in a former university. Not only must you accumulate many credits they must be our brand.

But a rose is a rose is a rose.

I HAVE ASKED MYSELF on more than one occasion what I was doing in graduate school. I kept telling myself that this was the ticket to open new vistas, to allow me to do research, to play with the ideas and topics that fascinate me. However, I kept finding that the "ticket" was like a theatre ticket; it gained you admission but it bore little relationship to the performance of the play.

I wondered what happened to some student drop-outs who impressed me as being imaginative and involved in their field. One young man is now writing poetry, another has several exciting publications in spite of the fact he could never finish a thesis. When they dropped out, I felt it was their graduate department's loss.

Today, I wish some of these drop-outs could be my fellow-colleagues.

I found that the people who were to show me the joy of creating were serious and up-tight people. The execution of a Ph.D. thesis is a perfect example of this.

Once you find a topic, there is the serious business of selecting a compatible committee and therefore I recommend selecting the minimum number necessary. For these professors, there is the serious business of their reputation. If a thesis failed or had flaws in it, the professors on the committee are failures.

If the candidate fails his first senate oral exam (which I hear is becoming a fad), the professors fail too. Thesis committee meetings are like a game of chess in which the student is the pawn. It is an "ego trip" as one student labelled it but it is also a bad trip for some committee members.

THE UP-TIGHTNESS OF THE WHOLE THESIS situation is no fun for the student. He is subjected to anxiety, frustration and abuse, in short, everything that militates against creative production.

The student must please everyone on his thesis committee, however unreasonable the demands. Fortunately for him the committee members fight each other off. The paradox of the thesis for a student is that he must do exactly as his committee dictates and yet he must strike out on his own and be original.

For example, one professor commented to his Ph.D. candidate after a sharp argument with another committee member, "Look it doesn't matter if you argued him down, it doesn't matter whether you are right or wrong, it is his opinion that the thesis should change the way he wants and you do it: he is signing the papers (for your degree)". Thus a student is constantly presented with schizophrenic messages which put him in a double bind.

Cad Weekly — Waterloo

The oral exam presents a trauma for many students because while one must accept all changes in the thesis deemed necessary by the committee, however, contrary to his own ideas, he must defend the thesis as if it were his own "perfect" work.

This sort of demand can become a sadistic game for the uptight and/or frustrated committee members who subject their students to a variety of abuses. For example, one student who had a series of publications in his field, waited 6 months to receive back the first draft of his thesis. He ended up a year later counting the spaces between words in his thesis.

AND THE SYSTEM PERPETUATES ITSELF. As one liberal professor said, "You will be a reactionary in a few years and you'll do unto your students like they did unto you." Surely more can be offered in graduate school.

I wish to offer a few suggestions at this point. Basically, the university could be a version of the "open plan philosophy" at graduate school level. This involves non-graded groups and discovery learning which forms an essential part of a creative environment.

This includes first the elimination of courses and examinations altogether. Courses do not teach judgment, imagination or creativity and exams measure one's ability to memorize what someone says you should.

Rather, there could be interest area and discussion seminars. The student should work on exactly what interests them and pick up the necessary tools and information as he requires them. In this way, when professor and student met, it would be to share a common interest. What is important will be remembered of necessity.

Secondly, the student could do projects in interest areas. This research could be reported in a student departmental journal set up to report such work. He could learn about his errors in this way and improve upon his former work. This sort of free environment would be much more conducive to creative work.

FOR THE DISCIPLINES WHICH ARE PRACTICALLY oriented e.g. psychology or medicine which would involve practitioners as well as researchers — an apprenticeship may be of great value. Their whole experience can be practical and if they wish to do graduate research they can be the same as any other group. The professional and the specialist are highly overrated. The credit system insures a minimal level of information and perhaps of techniques but their training does not necessarily generate flexible persons who see their discipline as one to be improved upon.

I feel that a change to a more open system where ideas can be played with rather than memorized and regurgitated, would go a long way to improving creativity in the university environment.

From starvation to semi-starvation

A small article in the latest U of T Bulletin, and subsequently followed up in last Wednesday's Varsity, announced to the University community that an overall reclassification of non-academic job categories and wage scales had taken place.

The first step of this, we were told, was to raise salaries of those people paid below the minimum levels. I want to applaud the University for this certainly generous activity. However I have yet to actually meet any support staff member whose salary was raised. I have heard of people who were being paid starvation wages who are under the new system being paid semi-starvation wages.

Most, if not all, of my department co-workers have been downgraded. Many high level departmental and administrative secretaries have been downgraded. Many women in the Faculty of Arts and Science office do not yet know if they have been reclassified. Most didn't know their old wage category and maximum-minimum scales anyhow so wouldn't know how much a reclassification means in terms of actual income.

In my own case, and several others I know of, it means a drop of over $700 in my maximum salary — it means that I can only receive one more merit raise if I remain at the University. After that I would receive only the mandatory cost of living increase (4 per cent last year when the real cost of living rose over 10 per cent). It means many people will not be eligible for the University pension plan because their salaries will not be allowed to raise to the exalted figure of $5300 per annum.

About a year ago support staff (who do we support?) were asked to cooperate with the Personnel Office by filling out job descriptions with a promise that no wages would be cut. And no wages were cut — this year. I felt uneasy about cooperating at the time, but I did. I feel now that we were dealt with in bad faith and regret very much cooperating.

Such a system is meant to protect workers from being paid less for doing the same job as someone else. But if it is initiated it should not be applied ex post facto to salary scales of present employees whose lives are based on an assumption of regularly increasing income.

It is rumored that Mr. Sword is concerned and has talked to President Bissell about this situation. Unfortunately the support staff has no organization capable of keeping on top of things like this and keeping us informed of the current developments. On the one hand I guess it is good that a senior member of the administrative staff is concerned about the plight of other support staff. On the other hand I bitterly regret that we are so fragmented and unorganized that we do not protest and protect our own interests.

Steering clear of xenophobia

Manny Gordon's treatment of the Sociology Department's newly formed Canadian Content Committee in his article of last Friday contains some unfortunate errors and presentation of opinions as fact.

The committee is not restricted, as he suggests, to reading lists. On the contrary, the Assembly left the terms of reference of the committee vague and general, by design, for it is not yet known what the "degree and nature" of Canadian content in the Department is, and thus it is not known just what factors influence it, and are therefore appropriate areas for making recommendations. The task of the committee is to explore the question and then to make recommendations in the light of the knowledge it has acquired.

Of course, if Manny already knows, as he states, that there is only a "small quantity of Canadian content" in the Department, and that this is due to what he calls a "large number" of American professors, then it was probably a waste of time to form the committee. The Sociology Department could just have appointed Manny Gordon to handle the task. We hope, at any rate, that he will share his perceptions with the committee, for it will need all the help it can get if it is to write a report that will replace some of the uninformed discussion now going on with a sounder factual and analytical framework.

It is also not correct that the committee is "a watered-down replacement" for one to investigate "americanization"; rather, the word "americanization" was specifically rejected by the undergraduate caucus as a negative concept which not only prejudged the issue, but which has at this time little or no commonly agreed-upon meaning. Furthermore, the association of the word "americanization" with the views of certain individuals who come close to confusing nationalism with racism has given it, at least in the eyes of some, unfortunate connotations of watch-hunting and McCarthyism, things we know are as repugnant to Manny as they are to us.

We therefore welcome the fact that he pointed out in his article that the members of the committee come from diverse national origins. A committee with such a background, we feel, will steer clear of chauvinism and xenophobia, will have a commitment to academic freedom — freedom to teach and to learn — and will make a positive contribution to the University.

We're not from Mars—we're people

During the past two weeks members of the University of Toronto Homophile Association have been selling newsletters and handing out leaflets in the university cafeterias. It's been an interesting experience and quite an eye-opener. Having been relatively quiet on campus this year working on community-oriented projects, we've had little contact with university students.

Being only in touch with helpful people one begins to think that perhaps there's less bigotry around than one thought. What a lie! The reactions we got from the U of T students were incredible. The great student liberals laughed and stared at us as if we came from Mars. People get nervous and giggle stupidly whenever sex is mentioned but such incredible ignorance and cheap bigotry was shocking. I wonder if any of those people ever think about why they laugh, why do they get hostile?

Are we such a threat to their sexuality or just too much of a temptation. In the seventeenth century they burned witches to fight temptation, today they laugh at queers. Does it make them feel better to play oneupmanship? The blacks and women won't take it any more. Now the homosexuals are going to refuse to take it.

We'll stick around campus until people realize we're people, human individuals whose lives are as valuable as any one else's. Stop us in the cafeterias, come speak to us in Sid Smith lobby. We're not faggots and dikes, we're people and proud to be gay.

The Campus Centre File

Although at least one set of working drawings has been prepared, and it has been planned, hoped for, cursed and prayed for over many years, the University of Toronto has no Campus Center. It is among the very few major campuses in North America in this particular way.

This is the first in a series on the Campus Center Project, the second of which will appear in Wednesday's Varsity.

A brief history of campus planning and development

View looking North "McCauley's Pond", near the site of Hart House, circa 1880.

This 1861 map of the university, shows the now-invisible Taddle Creek and McCauley's Pond as well as University College, and the Old Observatory (since moved and occupied now by S.A.C.). College Street runs across the bottom.

IN 1792 THE IDEA of a university was first proposed. In 1827 George IV granted a royal charter and King's College was formed. A large tract of land (168 acres) was provided for the college in 1828. This land is where the university is now located and at the time it was far from York being one mile from the town limits.

The main force behind the establishment of a university was Reverend John Strachan. He successfully broke into the old Family Compact (good grief, ruling elites are everywhere) and pushed for the granting of a Royal Charter. The original charter set the university completely under the Church of England (Strachan envisaged a "missionary college" for the Anglican Church). In 1837 the charter was amended but still gave no real power to the other religions, forcing them to establish their own colleges. In 1837 there was hardly a religious denomination in Upper Canada that didn't regard the teaching of its particular tenets as essential in any institution of higher learning which would have its confidence. Thus we see the seeds of the petty provincialism that abounds not only within the university's educational units but also within the province's educational system.

By 1850 the University of Toronto came into being as a non-sectarian institution but lacked popular support because people considered it a "godless institution". In 1853 the university was changed to an examining body with instruction being given by colleges. University College was established for this purpose and the new college was built between 1855 and 1857. The sectarian colleges also developed during this period.

WITH CONFEDERATION IN 1867 the Provincial University of Ontario, under government control was established. Federation of the university with Victoria, St. Michael's, Knox and Wycliffe was achieved in 1889 and many professional schools and faculties (law, medicine, practical science) were developed. Trinity College joined federation in 1903 and the University of Toronto Act of 1906 established the university's present framework of administration and property.

From federation to 1950 there was a gradual development of the university. During this period the city grew up to and surrounded the institution placing it in the middle of, not outside of, the urban environment. Construction was limited to east of St. George Street and plans into the 1950's called for expansion south of College Street. However, with the building of Cody Hall and the School of Nursing on the west side of St. George in the early 1950's a pattern of development was set.

THE MASTER PLAN OF SEPTEMBER 1957 called for expansion west of St. George. The results of this plan were Physical Plant (215 Huron), the Power House and Steam Plant, Sidney Smith Hall (Arts), Ramsay Wright (Zoology), Lash Miller (Chemistry), New Physics Building, Galbraith Building (Engineering), Benson Building (Women's Athletics), New College and the Edward Johnson Building (Music).

Many of these buildings provide excellent facilities, but through the 50's and 60's the university became a bastion of single functionalism. Structures were created for only one purpose — academic space (labs, offices and lecture rooms). There was never any consideration of creating a true community or neighbourhood — a university quarter. There was never any consideration of the city that had surrounded it. No effort was ever made to integrate or communicate with the surrounding communities. Expropriation notices, demolition crews and silence are the tools of university community relations.

In June 1967 a new master plan was unfolded for the "northwest campus" bounded by Spadina, Bloor, St. George, and Harbord. This area was made up of co-op residences, private homes, many stores, fraternity houses and university offices. The only results of the new plan are the chiller plant, the new library, blank swaths of expropriated and demolished homes and even worse community relations. There is no money for further development in the area so there is a brief reprieve.

STILL, THE UNIVERSITY SHOWS no consideration for the surrounding community or the development of its own community. There are now only two or three on-campus commercial facilities and the single purpose attitude towards building has established a 9 to 5 "business campus".

The Campus Centre Manifesto

“A thing, exclusively made for one purpose, suppresses the individual because it tells him exactly how it is to be used. If the object provokes a person to determine in what way he wants to use it, it will strengthen his self identity.

“Merely the act of discovery elicits greater self-awareness. Therefore a form must be interpretable — in the sense that it must be conditioned to play a changing role. It must be made in such a way that the implications are posed beforehand as hidden possibilities, evocative but not openly stated.

“Everything must be formed so that one can make it relevant to himself according to his own nature, with adequate implications for everyone.”

dents the University of Toronto, in its growth, has effectively converted a large area of the city into the expression of a single function. It has turned itself into a ghetto.

The pressures of population and from Government forced its growth. However, the size of its institutions is not necessarily what damages the rich fabric of urban life. In fact, particular kinds of growth can give increased richness to other parts of the city. After a fashion the University has done this in its decision to create Erindale and Scarborough Colleges. However, the growth of the University at the St. George Campus has been particularly destructive. The University has chosen to expand by the creation of monumental blocks of buildings. In this fashion it converts large areas to single function use, leaving whole city blocks that harbour only a limited expression of human life and activity.

It is sad that when one of the goals of education is to give individuals the opportunity to appreciate a full and vigorous life, the University should begin its job by destroying those very expressions of life that it has on its doorstep. Because of economic pressures placed on it the University has evolved into a place for the conduct of academic business; it shuts its office doors at 5 o'clock and goes home for the night. In a sense the University is in the position of being an absentee landlord, a common ghetto phenomena. The people who make decisions affecting the quality of life available on campus don't have to live with those decisions. The Campus Centre Project sees itself as being in the position of an urban husbandryman, nurturing the growth of new life by breaking down the University's single functionalism. As a guide to action it has chosen the concept of a "good neighborhood" as being the antithesis of a ghetto.

We Canadians are quick to point out that the diverse multi-ethnicity of our country provides a much richer nationhood than the homogenizing process of the "melting pot" favoured by the Americans. In a similar manner the attractiveness of urban life lies in the wide range of choices available. Aside from range of employment and leisure, there are choices that can be made according to the style of life you want to live and where you want to live it. As a consequence the urban fabric takes on a rich weave whose threads are the tremendous variety of options that can be pursued. To live in the Annex is different from living in the Kensington area or Rosedale and as a place to live is chosen by a person seeking a different style and qualexample, the fence between St. Hilda and Massey College), providing bicycle racks, providing outside waste receptacles, having parking regulations on streets changed, providing poster board space at strategic locations, putting newsboxes for campus publications in various places, making ice rinks, and the strategic planting of trees and shrubs to relieve severe micro-climatic conditions.

The Campus Centre Project is particularly desiring to receive suggestions from the community at large as these kinds of projects are easily accomplished and can be a useful means by which individuals learn that they can effect changes in their environment.

Also, the Campus Centre Project is concerned that responsibility for many improvements it would like to see done really rests with the University. Therefore it intends to conduct negotiations to see that obligations are fulfilled. We want to influence the planning of such projects as the enormous graduate complex and student housing. The university should rethink its entire planning procedure from administrative levels to expropriation rights. For creation of a real community the university should promote the idea of living on or near the campus. Thus a complete change of approach for housing accommodation is required.

The Campus Centre Project proposes intervention on a larger scale of a kind that will begin the breakdown of single function use of the University and that will begin to suggest to people the rich diversity of life that can be harboured in its framework. We would also hope that a larger scale effort would help create a blend of public and private realms combining accessibility with the need for individual privacy. Some precedent exists in the use of lecture halls as public movie houses by film societies, but, for example: the roof of the service area between the Ramsey Wright Building and Sidney Smith Hall could become a sun terrace, or a children's playground, or an outdoor cafe, classrooms could become inexpensive hotels. There exists a wealth of shop equipment and photographic dark rooms whose potential should be opened up. The opportunity to work on your car or motorbike, to build book shelves for your room would be of great benefit to all members of the University community. The Campus Centre Project is also considering the possibility of roofing over areas between buildings, for example, between the McLennan Physical Laboratories and the Lash Miller Chemical Labs, in such a way has something to do with the kind of physical environment the University has created for itself.

It is difficult to maintain a positive concept of the society in which you live when its home is a ghetto. The shallowness of the quality of life found at the University could have a great deal to do with the difficulty there is to effect change on Campus. It is difficult for people to appreciate the value of other ways of doing things when they have had no experience of their own on which to evaluate the change.

The Campus Centre Project intends to begin the fight to bring to the University of Toronto the growth of environment and life that will stimulate the growth of a concerned body of citizens committed to the maintenance of the "university neighborhood," and make possible a wide range of life and human activity on Campus, so that the University can become a truly critical social institution, and a place where communication is not a cheap platitude but is a very real fact of life.

student based organizations whether political or of such a nature as the Radio Repair Service.

The Campus Centre Project is also concerned with making the variety of life that already exists on Campus accessible. In particular it is concerned that there exists a multitude of common rooms and lounges whose life would enrich the University and be enriched themselves by the strategic placement of doors and windows. The Campus Centre Project is also concerned with making the University a more attractive destination for people who live in the surrounding neighborhoods and the city at large. An existing drawing card is the Toronto Public Library on College St., further possibilities may be in the particular kinds of commercial activity that could grow up under the auspices of the Campus Centre Project (second hand book stores for example). But more important, the wealth of display cases, working models, special lectures at the University could be opened to the public.

The University could become the counterpart of the Science Centre, and probably be a much more effective vehicle for public education.

The University has already admitted its responsibility as a public institution. By opening its doors and making its resources accessible, the University could begin to live up to its name and really become the University of Toronto. By doing so new life would appear on Campus while at the same time promote understanding to grow up between the University and its neighbors. It could also make the option of postsecondary education more attractive as a goal.

The Campus Centre Project has turned down the opportunity given it to be instrumental in the creation of a traditional "Student Centre Building" because it rejects the University's present policy of building monumental single function towers. It feels that its energies can find better direction in the proposals outlined above. The members of the Commission on University Government saw the University operating in a manner similar to the classic ideal of a Democratic Society. Perhaps they were naive in their expectation that there already existed a strong base of citizens who would begin to exercise their rights and duties given the appropriate legal structure. The Campus Centre Project suspects that the lack of this solid base is one of the mechanisms that ensures that a neighborhood retains a particular character over a long period of time.

Toronto has become a much richer city to live in now that neighborhoods have grown up around its ethnic communities. However, it should be pointed out that as these ethnic communities congregated in an area, attracted at first by reasonable rents, they gave that area its special characteristics by being the dominant group, not by forcing other groups out. Unfortunately, when the University of Toronto moves into an area it does force out all other life.

Aside from the attractiveness lent a neighborhood by the character of its inhabitants, its health is dependent upon the availability of a wide range of goods and services. Grocery stores, banks, drug stores, shoemakers, barbershops, hardware stores, cleaners, bowling alleys, restaurants, billiard halls, and taverns are only a few of the many essentials whose quantity and quality enhance the attractiveness of a neighborhood as a place to live. Unfortunately, many of these primarily commercial enterprises are considered to be incompatible with the Ivory Tower concept of itself held by the University. By excluding their existence on campus it practices a peculiar kind of censorship and fails to recognize that its own being and reason for existence is inextricably bound with all the diverse expressions of human life and activity in the world. Again, in this censorship the University robs its people of another chance to experience differing scales of human activity.

The aim of the Campus Centre Project is to turn this ghetto, the University of Toronto, into an attractive place to live, a place that will be recognized as the "university neighborhood". It intends to begin the process of bringing this about in a number of ways. First, by providing the vehicle for the entry on Campus of a variety of commercial operations. A need for a Beckers or Mac's Milk type store has been suggested, also a co-op food store, a drug store, an all-night restaurant, a hairdresser, a tavern, a book seller, a hotel or hostel.

Commercial viability, at least at the beginning stages of development, will not necessarily determine the existence of an enterprise. The University community might consider it to be wise to subsidize those operations that it feels would improve the kind of life on campus. Yossarian Records is a good example of free rental or low rental costs at first to establish a business. After a period of time commercial situations would, of course, be investigated. The Campus Centre Project is concerned with the prospect of exploitation on the part of a commercial operator and thus we prefer non-profit or co-operative ventures. It is felt it could do no worse than the present danger of exploitation by University sponsored monopolies. Also it is felt that valuable lessons can be learned by consumers concerning the control of their supply of goods and services by permitting commercial operations on Campus.

The Campus Centre Project also intends to undertake a number of small scale interventions in the physical structure of the University. Aside from the alleviation of bad conditions, these interventions are seen as a means to test and to evaluate needs and desires in the University Community. A partial list of things that could be done include: the opening of locked doors (for example, the doors leading to the basement at the south end of Sidney Smith Hall), opening gates in fences that can't be torn down (for NONSENSE! How do you expect to live with Pete and Urmahy in this chessboard world of ours without obeying and studying the rules of the game?

The members of the Commission on University Government (CUG) sought to improve the quality of education at the University of Toronto through a reformation of its academic and administrative structures. They desired a genuinely critical university that recognized that the value of an education lay in the confrontation of the individual student with conflicting ideas and life styles, and not in its end product. The University's granting of a Degree. Although the aims of the Commission implied some criticism of the present effectiveness of the University of Toronto as an educator, it was in no sense a radical document. Unfortunately their Report was not sufficiently potent to provoke the recommended changes and today, as an agent for reform, it is largely being ignored.

The Campus Centre Project is in agreement with the criticism of the present form of university education that underlay the Commissions Report. Although the Campus Centre Project does not see itself as a political instrument seeking academic and administrative changes, it does conceive of itself as being an agent to effect changes in the physical structure of the University, changes that will begin to accomplish its common goals. The Commission saw a quality of life on the campus of the University of Toronto characterized by self-motivated individuals who had control over decisions affecting their lives, living in an environment that stimulated the development of their critical faculties on many levels.

The quality of that environment is in large part dependent on the richness of choices open to the individual. By richness of choice is meant the opportunity to observe, experience, and evaluate a wide range of social values and life styles. Here the individual is given the chance not only to determine what he wants to be and to do, but also to appreciate the choices made by others. Such an opportunity exists only on a very limited scale at the University of Toronto, and is indicative of the shallowness of the range of life experiences available on campus.

A ghetto is a particular urban phenomena that occurs when the fabric of city life has been so broken down and destroyed that it can only support a very limited expression of human life. Severe poverty is a force that robs an area of life, unwise urban redevelopment is another; restrictive zoning regulations that prevent diversity also damage the urban fabric. It is unfortunate that in seeing itself as having a social responsibility to open its doors to more and more stuarchitects' views . . .

By DUNLOP, WARDELL, MATSUI, AIKEN

"The present university offers a wide range of opportunity and stimuli; however, the trend of its growth is toward increasing the apparent standardization and masking the available choices. The single most important endeavour for university planning and design is to understand the developmental function of environment and find ways to improve it. The university within an urban region is sitting in an immense storehouse of information. Its stimuli, diverse ways of life, events and facilities are a prime occasion for learning. Developmental policy should aim at making this information available.

The university could make much greater use of the city environment by dispersing its scholarly activities more widely in time and space. Students would be drawn into contact with other students/citizens/children, and learning would not be sealed off, but intimately mixed with other activities. Working and Learning might be combined, as they sometimes are in research institutions or cooperative colleges. The university would be affirmed as a crucial institution within the city rather than be defined simply by its physical plant. The city/university should be a purposefully designed "school" a place for learning throughout life."

A University Quarter:

A university quarter is part of the city: but a special part. Its implications are much less specific than "campus" and more encompassing than "a good neighborhood". Overlapping other urban areas with indeterminate boundaries, it is more the expectation of a particular "presence" — certain style, a mode of behaviour — than a physically definable place.

In effect, the city is extended to include a place of special use and significance to some of its citizens and of general interest to all of them. In contrast to its present role, the University becomes a benevolent force: providing many "new" public places and investing the area with its special character.

The QUARTER develops its own traditions and sanctions, its own "style" of life. Its boundaries are blurred and can change freely — in response to the life style ambitions of its inhabitants rather than to real estate or zoning definitions.

The "Italian" parts of Toronto work like this: they welcome and support new immigrants, encourage visitors, maintain distinct and recognisable qualities and manners, accommodate an Italian community without imprisoning and have no specific edge or boundary.

People live in a QUARTER — some of them as more or less permanent residents, some for just a few years or a few months.

In some ways the situation is analogous to a resort town where the two populations — permanent and temporary — support each other reciprocally, imparting a vigour and richness or experience not found where they are separated.

The student's time of life at the University is (relatively) short, intense, somewhat unpredictable, (ideally) regenerative and probably influential in determining his later style. The concentrated presence of students in a part of the city where that presence impinges upon ongoing city activity, generates a QUARTER with unique qualities: food, drink, entertainment, services, street life, theatre, films, political activity, artistic pursuits and so on are all affected. In isolation the student input is too homogeneous and tenuous to achieve this sustained liveliness and diversity. As a catalyst in a diversified urban area the students bring support for special qualities and pursuits.

The concept of UNIVERSITY QUARTER has potent social implications:

- The students' dependency on institutional apparatus is reduced by the presence of alternative forms of enterprise and heterogeneous population.
- The overlap of city and University encourages more people to use the University in more ways.
- More congenial everyday surroundings and the special enterprises developed by the QUARTER provide a richer university life and for students, a more evident connection to the "real" world.
- Students are readily seen (and see themselves) as citizens with similar opportunities, rights and responsibilities to other citizens.
- Students operating in this more dynamic role could change present planning processes (by University or City) and help to establish worthwhile basic principles for these processes (self-determination, accountability, etc.)
- A permanent population with homes and business having a continuing stake in the QUARTER reinforces the political basis necessary for effective self-determination.

POLICY

- Existing streets of mixed use and diverse ownership are nurtured
- The use potential of old buildings is imaginatively explored
- Suitable locations are found — both outside and inside existing structures — to accommodate small-scale, low-profit, low-overhead enterprises (old buildings, basements?)
- Greater density and continuity of population within the University is encouraged i.e., more housing is established for a greater variety of users
- The safety and convenience of the pedestrian and cyclist are given priority. Fast car traffic is controlled.
- Actively public places are developed — places where people can linger on their daily routes and which can become foci for informal activities. The qualities of good city streets — convenience, comfort, activity — should characterize the routes through the university

"The Campus Center Project has turned down the opportunities given it to be instrumental in the creation of a traditional "Student Center Building" because it rejects the university's present policy of building monumental single function towers." — Campus Center Project Manifesto.

"The University forms an integral part of the community and must therefore be concerned with its role in society. Instead, it seems to be a cocoon feeding upon itself. Education is a privilege — in spite of universal support, the university inevitably excludes a large part of the population and, consequently, the privileged section of society must fulfill its responsibilities and obligations to the entire spectrum of the nation. Far too often the university does not educate, but merely reinforces previous socializations. In order to develop true learning experience (which should be the university's prime function) it has to give up academic incest and cease to provide "academic welfare" as Richard Needham so aptly describes it. Whether he likes it or not, the graduate becomes a leader — but how can he be effective when his consciousness of the society he is supposed to lead is restricted? How can he evaluate the needs and aspirations of the working classes and the poverty group without exposure to them? Education implies exposure to total learning experience and requires outreach beyond one's milieu to all others in society.

"The whole is greater than the sum of its parts" — this concept forms an element of synergy, which Buckminster Fuller defines as "the behaviour of whole systems unpredicted by any parts of the system". One of the fundamental problems of our age is the inability to think comprehensively enough to realize how the various specializations inter-relate. Man, a specialist, finds his own specialization, but is, all too often, unable to see how it relates to others. In spite of his unique mind and general adaptability, overspecialization leads to a gradual loss of adaptability, with extinction being the ultimate consequence of lack of perception and inability to relate."

Reluctant Prophet: quasi-comic, average

My theatre odyssey at the Edward Johnson Building last Saturday night — Edwin Turner's The Reluctant Prophet began with a man's brusque announcement that tickets would be sold at the door "in seven minutes." I always arrive at a theatre early, but this is ridiculous. The over-priced, simple silk-screen prints in the hall offer a slight diversion. The ticket receptacle is delivered to the door. This part of the Renaissance '71 program is about to take wing.

A glance at the program shows a) the cast has average range and depth of theatrical experience, and b) we are about to go Jonah-like on a crusade! (The Macmillan Theatre is in Functional Utilitarian style; it looks good, is nondistracting, and seems to have good acoustics — the real worth of any theatre.)

The set is Medieval-Modern Avenue style; looks durable and portable. Another glance at the auditorium reveals that, apart from 53 other people, I will watch this production alone. That poor level of audience participation is even worse than seaside weekly rep matinees!

The play itself is a quasi-comic expose of the difficulties of being a prophet — especially with an unco-operative god. The comment I found most applicable to the meaning behind Turner's work is: "Free religion must be true." It opens up fascinating possibilities which were never fully realized, as there were too many excursions into freshman humour.

The lead role is that of Jonah, a human who hates humanity; in his prophet-like pose he can gloat in his supposed superiority over others. He has a pleasure in omens; he has a martyr complex; he has a chip on his shoulder; he has a death-wish for others. It is his disappointment that he realizes he's normal. Richard Davison tries hard for the role, but he lacks power to project it. His lip is a severe drawback; often it was difficult to understand what he was saying.

A mild plaudit to Neil Freeman, who is above the standard of the other players in this production, but! A question? in the inquisition scene, while Jonah was being ingested by the whale, was Freeman reading his opening lines?

For Bob Fix, the less said the better, and for Brian Speck, even that would be too much. Barbara Reese, as Jonah's wife, was considerably older than the rest of Nineveh's population, but a sort of good woman on the ship — a sort of nautical Mae West.

A word about the technical difficulties. To have a theatre so designed that the apron cannot be lit is criminally fatuous — and could someone please design a quiet air-conditioning system? Finally, Edwin Turner has promise; some scenes were very good, others not so. I enjoyed Ken Graham's direction (a charming man to speak to), in spite of all the technical difficulties he met with in Toronto. The cast did well after sleeping in Rochdale, without blankets.

Of hippies and queers

A "Novel-Play" by Justin Thomas, which goes "beyond comedy and tragedy" and is called (so they say) Once and For All, OR How I Overcame my Fear of Whores, Royalty, Queers, Teachers, Hippies, etc. will be "performed" Tuesday, February 9, at 9 p.m., in the New Vic Theatre, New Academic Building, as a hitherto unpublished part of Renaissance '71.

In the piece below, writer-director Justin Thomas describes some of the bureaucratic problems he ran into working with Renaissance '71. After some weeks of hassles, Thomas' play, "Once and for All, etc." opens Tuesday as part of the 10-day Renaissance program.

How I overcame my fear of Renaissance officials

When a friend called and suggested I do my "novel play" Once And For All or How I Overcame My Fear of Whores, Royalty, Queers, Teachers, Hippies, etc. in conjunction with Renaissance '71, I agreed. After all, Renaissance and I are Canadian and I thought we shared similar values and goals.

An appointment was made with the official director, Ken Gass. When he wanted to read my script I told him that although I have one, the play is a new evolution in theatre beyond comedy and tragedy and since its non-anticipation, I did not feel it necessary to give him or anyone a preview. He insisted on judging its worth first. I pointed out that his brochure says that there will be no restriction on subject matter, time or staging. He finally agreed that my "play" could be done with Renaissance without him overseeing it first, and that he would find me a small classroom to perform in if I did not mind. I mentioned that in addition to my studies I do guest teaching incorporating parts of the "play" and if the response to the program was any indication of audience interest, we might need a larger room or theatre. He told me that I was unreal, on an ego trip. I mentioned I worked in encounter groups and I felt that I might be a catalyst for his projections at that moment. He insisted that I was a phony, that he didn't trust me because he didn't really believe that I cared anything about him. I wrote his comment down, showed it to him, asked him to sign and indicate the date, and told him I would show it to him again, when he might better be able to relate to me person to person.

Meanwhile I decided to call the Royal Alexandra, O'Keefe Centre and St. Lawrence Centre. I booked the latter, which had seating capacity of 500 for February 4th.

Gass told me he was having trouble finding a place for my "play". I told him about my booking Town Hall. He told me that was no good. Renaissance was the 5th to 14th. I had booked it for the night before. That would make things difficult for them, publicity-wise. I personally couldn't see why, and told him so. I also added that an agency wishing to represent me offered to send out the necessary press releases. He said that he would take care of publicising the "play" if I'd be willing to do a second performance between the 5th and the 14th. He suggested Thursday 11th, 8:30 p.m. He said he would locate a place on campus.

He also mentioned the date and place of the press conference for Renaissance.

A few days later, I received a call from his associate, Alex Mercer, the woman who gave birth to Renaissance and was a head official. She said she had to read my script or I wasn't going to be in Renaissance. I told her that I had been through that already with her associate and he had confirmed our agreement to work together and that a date had been set for two performances — all I was waiting for was the location on campus for the second one. She insisted that she wouldn't let it go on without her reading it first. I told her that I was under the impression that Renaissance was an opportunity for the expression of artistic freedom and their official attitude seemed to be taking an authoritarian position.

She said she had heard about me from her associate and that I was on an ego trip. I told her that I'm sure she didn't enjoy being labelled and categorised and I was available if she wanted to sum me up for herself. She came to my room for a few minutes and stayed a couple of hours, sharing with me deeply personal feelings. She told me that obviously her associate had been projecting, she would clear things up with him, not to worry, and would I promise to let her read the manuscript after the play was done.

I said yes. We kissed goodbye.

The agency sent out a release mentioning the Town Hall and U of T dates of performances. A couple of days later I got a call from Alex saying that Renaissance had never told me I was officially with them. I said that Gass had clearly told me otherwise, and I asked her what she was trying to do. I told her I heard Renaissance was having financial difficulties, with their "establishment" and were they playing "establishment" to me? Had I become a symbol to them of themselves trying to do their own thing? I said that my play, coincidentally, was exactly about that. I added that I felt the basic goal of the Canadian Arts Festival was not to have anyone eat shit. She said she hadn't realized that I had been given the second date for the performance and they had been so busy with so many things and she guessed it was okay.

I called Gass to get the location of the second performance. He told me the 11th was not convenient any more but the 9th would be fine, at Brennan Hall, St. Michael's College. He said to call their office at 12:30, Jan. 21 and if there was no message for me, then Brennan Hall would definitely be the place. I called on the 21st and there was no message for me. I also learned the press conference was that evening. When I arrived there, not a mention of my play was in their release to the press. The newspapers had heard about the play through the St. Lawrence Centre and the agency. Gass and Mercer were pleasant with me at the press conference and Mercer asked if I was going to leave before sending some drink with her. She joined a friend of mine and I for a time afterwards, then she kissed me goodnight and my friend drove her home.

Gass called me one morning. "How are the tickets for the Town Hall going... having any luck?"

I told him they were all gone, in fact 250 special stage tickets were printed to accommodate the overflow, and the Centre's box office people said they had more requests for tickets than for all their other events together. He said "Oh! Town Hall can be a white elephant with only twenty people showing up." He said he had to go now and hung up.

On Feb. 4, the day of the Town Hall performance, the Renaissance secretary called me just as I was leaving for the Centre to ask me if I thought I was doing a performance at Brennan Hall on the 9th. I said "Yes".

She said, "Well, somebody goofed. Somebody forgot to confirm it. We don't have a place for you." I told her that Gass personally booked the place. When I got to the Centre, I had a note from the stage doorman asking me to call a number immediately. The person at the other end of the line was Mercer.

She said, "Justin?"

I said, "Yes."

She said, "Are you at the Centre?"

I said, "Yes."

She said, "Are you going to do your play tonight?"

I said, "Yes."

She said, "I have to talk to you."

I said, "I'm just about to go on, I'll call you tomorrow at noon — is that convenient?"

There was a heavy silence. She said, "Yes."

The following day I called her at noon. The line was busy. I asked the operator to interrupt. When we were connected I said, "Hi. It's Justin." She said, "Goodbye, Justin," and hung up.

Saturday, the Renaissance secretary phoned me and told me that they found a new theatre for my play. She also mentioned that their publicity folders had no mention of my play, and I was to come down and work out some publicity.

I arrived at Renaissance headquarters on St. George St. at 1 p.m. Ted Whittaker, Varsity Review editor was there to get some sort of story on the organization. The secretary said that she and Gass are about the only ones left. All the rest departed or were removed. Even Mercer is not allowed to do anything, not even answer the phone.

I suggested I might do a story on my experience with Renaissance.

"Oh, no!" the secretary gasped. "Gass wouldn't want anything written he hasn't seen and okayed."

Ho-hum. Another exhibit of "artistic" photographs, this one at the New Medical Sciences Building as part of some big art carnival that's going on at the university.

Most of the photos prove one thing — that the entrants and the selectors have a lot of ideas about Aesthetics and know a lot of slick developing techniques. With a few exceptions, they all scream This Is Art and very little else. Some of the subject matter is so cliched it's embarrassing: won't people ever get tired of fire escapes, baskets of vegetables, sensitive children, wrinkled old people? There are a large number of portraits and all are very carefully posed. How else can you get all those arty effects? A couple of things, one a close-up of a camel's muzzle laughing, could probably make it on "Life" magazine's big last inside page that leaves you with a yuk-yuk before the big mentholated cigarette ads taunt your lungs in full colour.

A few exceptions in this show do have something to do with some reality as experienced by the average North American. One has a beat-up, rusty not-too-old car sitting in front of a billboard depicting a super shiny up-to-the-minute one with the verbal message that "Plymouth Makes It!" Another is a nice, unpretentious shot of a cluster of drain pipes against the upper part of a brick wall with a bicycle leaning against the lower part. Photos like this, notice given to corners of our everyday lives that we usually hurry past, touch the viewer in a way that all that other slick studio stuff cannot: tricks just can't be expected to replace real feeling.

The most striking photographs to appear anywhere in a long time are found in the most recent issue of "Guerilla". They are the pictures of Laura Jones giving birth to a son and they are taken by John Phillips, the baby's father. It's the perfect contrast to the noninvolved, cool aesthetics of most of the prints at the Medical Science Building. Real love, as in the birth pictures, or real anger, or real slight make for real photographs.

Animated films steal the show

Animated films stole the show at Renaissance '71's first screening Saturday. Most professional were the Sheridan College pilot films: Dan Morris filmed watercolor for his impressive Freedom Equality Brotherhood about the Berlin Wall. Peter Miller's What A Way To Go stenciled bright figures over a graveyard photograph. Bernie Thompson presented a Canadian flag which insists on sprouting Stars and Stripes. All used whimsy to make a point.

The program by the Ontario College of Art was less satisfying. Several college technique films made their points too heavily; a three minute piece just can't hold up under the weight of Viet Nam or overpopulation. But Mrs. Pennyweather's Fascination, Peace and Quiet, and especially Peter Spuzak's Post Graduate were simple, controlled, and very funny.

Caught Fishing, a talented attempt at silent comedy, dominated the narrative films. Such mimicry is a good apprenticeship in filmmaking, teaching the history of cinema and imposing discipline. Two friendly complaints: the actors played to the camera (though this was inadvertent), and the sense of detail essential to his sort of comedy was deficient. A Flower and a Penny had some arresting yellow filter scenes.

Some common faults in the other films: those with sound tracks suffered from flat, stilted narration, like Senior Play tryouts: there was too much of the madcap romps and ad-lib mugging that characterized some British comedies a few years back.

Again, social comment proved a blight. Most of it was the old Silent-Night - and - the Seven o'clock-News juxtapositions. Techniques and details are what to aim for in student films, a perfection of the rudiments. Thus, the least pretentious films were the best, though there were few really poor films shown.

Films continue through the week at the Medical Sciences Auditorium, nightly at 8 o'clock.

Serious music set atune at Renaissance

A concert of serious music by young Canadian composers, the first in the Renaissance '71 series, opened to a small audience at the EJB Concert Hall Saturday evening. Two other programs are to be given Wednesday and Saturday this week, both beginning at 8:00 p.m. in the Concert Hall.

The concert began with a performance of three pieces for solo flute by Robert Muczynski. Composing with the normal tonal vocabulary, Mr. Muczynski succeeded in fascinating his listeners with unusual melodic sequences.

Jim Leonard's "Pastoral and Dance" for clarinet and piano was conventional in concept but unique in style. Both serious and lighter moods were evident in this well-written work. The rhythmic elements, especially of the Dance, were ingenious. Musically, this was the most satisfying composition of the evening.

Those who complain of the limited sonority of the piano in contemporary music were well contented by Mayan Mozevitch's piano opus, "Mom's Apple Pie". The exhilarating effects produced were of an almost physical intensity.

Next, George Salow performed his own composition on the kannu, a zither-like Turkish instrument with 78 strings. The piece, though improvisatory in character, was given an overall sense of unity by the frequent recurrence of the opening theme.

The closing work, John Fodi's "Seven Fantasies for Solo Flute" (1967) were ably interpreted by flautist Kathy Cernauskas. These pieces, each based on a fixed series of notes, had about them a mystical quality of becoming. Although only one of the pieces required actual improvisation by the soloist, each created an atmosphere of spontaneity.

Crisis in Asia mounting

U.S. academics withhold advice on Asia

NEW YORK (LNS) — The United States government is having trouble these days getting American academics to co-operate with them in handling the situation in Southeast Asia.

The latest reported case involves Thailand.

"Many of the best American academic specialists on Thailand seem so beset by criticisms and attacks within the United States that significant assistance cannot be expected from them," an official of the Agency for International Development complained recently.

According to the New York Times, it seems that AID desperately needs anthropologists and sociologists to evaluate U.S. counter-insurgency programs designed to "win the hearts and minds" of the Thais. The programs are particularly directed at people who live in areas "threatened by the Communists."

Three different AID requests for American specialists to come to Thailand have been turned down recently, the Times reports. In one case, a professor at a mid-western university accepted the AID offer, but his administration, bowing to campus pressure, refused to approve the trip.

At another school, a man who had already done research in Thailand and was offered an assignment had his file burned and his office ransacked.

U.S. officials have refused to release the names of the scholars' involved in these abortive requests for assistance.

Politicians live longer and better

WASHINGTON (LNS) — U.S. Congressmen live longer than other men, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. reports.

The death rate for all Congressmen who took office after 1930, for instance, was 20 per cent less than that of men in the general population.

One reason suggested was that Congressmen come from "the more favoured socio-economic segments" of the population.

Ireland... where your friends are

Where freedom songs were born and the pubs are built to withstand vocal pressures like no place on earth. In Ireland the age gap is measured by the repertoire and not by years. It is a country where poets are heroes and the art of conversation has not died.

Unlike many countries, Ireland is not dominated by one great city. The culture, the charm and the character of the country is the country itself. Listen to balladeers at medieval banquets in ancient castles and see just how closely they compare in the musical styles of today. Roll back the centuries in almost every town, village and castled hilltop and learn how the country was born. In every Irishman you meet, you will find an open heart and an open mind, a love of life and the things that make life worth living.

See Ireland as it should be seen... intimately. Travel by hire car or motor coach, on an individual or a group tour, but mix with the people. "Student Tours" are just tours of Ireland designed to suit student budgets with nothing omitted.

Mail the attached coupon for precise Student Tour information... then see your travel agent... you'll have the time of your life.

Aer Lingus, the Irish International Airlines, takes you there non-stop from Montreal in 5 1/2 hours—and makes sure your vacation begins the moment you step aboard. In association with Air Canada.

Split with McGill and Queen's

Hair-raising bus trip jolts Swim Blues

By PAUL CARSON

How's this for a throwback to the great old days of torrid romantic sports writing . . . you've got a national champion swim team that barely survives what could have been a tragic highway accident en route to a key meet with their arch rivals, then rushes from bus to pool with just minutes to spare, pulls off some early upsets then charges on to a glorious victory . . . what a lead! what a story! shouts the sports editor of ye applauding campus rag . . . ah, 'twas nothing shrugs the sports writer . . . just routine, smiles the kindly youthful coach . . .

THE SWIM BLUES did it all Friday night . . . eight hour bus ride to Montreal . . . almost a nasty accident as the bus swerved and skidded during a hair-raising flight (or so it seemed) over a twenty-mile section of freshly ploughed glare ice . . . arriving hours late with no time to rest or prepare for the meet . . . then rush to the McGill pool where the considerate hosts insist on starting in less than half an hour.

Tired, tense, still thinking about that glare ice, Blues begin strong romping through the medley relay and then Mike Guinness destroys arch-rival Dave Johnson in the 1000-yard freestyle in a time of 10:42:1, the best posted in Canada this year.

Guinness then comes back in the very next event — the 200-yard freestyle — and only a judge's ruling keeps him from taking second place behind a fresh McGill swimmer . . . visions of the penultimate swim story begin to dance in reporter's head.

And reality takes over as McGill wins two close decisions from the placing judges, Jim Shaw loses the 200-yard backstroke, and McGill doesn't need its incredible 3:18.5 freestyle relay to defeat our heroes 66-47.

And reporter decides to write about momentum . . . how Blues had it early then lost it in the 50-yard freestyle, butterfly and backstroke.

DESPITE THE LOSS, there were those golden moments . . . Guinness taking Swimmer of the Meet honors for besting Johnson in the 1000 . . . Nick Rottman's gutsy win in the breaststroke . . . rookie Alex Lau missing a first in the three-metre diving by less than three points.

Even under perfect conditions, Blues would have had trouble beating McGill in a dual meet, since the DM format is topheavy in freestyle events . . . the McGill specialty. Friday, Varsity had five OQAA and CIAU record holders in stroke events sitting on the bench while the wornout freestylers desperately tried to keep up with fresh opponents.

However, comes the OQAA championships in Kingston later this month, and more stroke events on the program, and McGill gets hosed.

Saturday, Blues met Queens in Gaels new pool and we really tried to be humanitarian. Jim Shaw abandoned the backstroke for the 50 free; Alex Fedko swam the butterfly — in the 100 freestyle . . . it was like driving with your putter or playing John Wright in goal.

Blues stopped laughing long enough to obliterate Gaels 89-22. Dual meet scoring gives a team 13 points just for showing up at the pool, so the effective score was 76-9 . . . and remember this is less than fifteen hours after McGill.

The Varsity — Jim Adams

Varsity's Nick Rottman churns to victory over McGill in the butterfly.

ALMOST EVERYBODY either won or finished second at least once so think of your favorite and assign him some firsts and seconds . . . re-capping in detail would be somewhat repetitious.

Adam Gesing gets Swimmer of the Meet honors for a personal best in the 1000 freestyle and Alex Lau won both diving events . . .

the others won taking a bath.

Blues last home meet of the season is Wednesday night in the Benson Building against McMaster . . . coach Robin Campbell still has 21 swimmers hantling for spots on an 18-member team . . . say a prayer for Mac.

The Varsity — Dove Lloyd

Varsity vaulter Ron Nastiuk clears bar at 13' 6" to win college event.

Track stars in Indoor Games

Three Varsity track stars won individual honors in the college section of the Maple Leaf-Telegram Games last Friday.

Ron Nastiuk pulled one of the meet upsets when he won the pole vault over Western's Don Anderson at 13 feet, 6 inches.

Anderson was second to Bruce Simpson in the Oqaa vault championships last fall.

Varsity's Dave Barrett, who was third in the OQAA's, took third spot.

Pat Glynn ran a strong race to place second in the mile with a time of 4:26.6.

Gym Blues close second in tri-meet at Western

This year's gymnastics competition at London, with York and Western, was once again of the informal variety since a few of the judges failed to show up.

Toronto coach Julio Roncon was asked to judge, but this time declined, leaving only three judges, one of which was the Western coach.

As with last year's competition at Western, judge conferences following individual routines were frequent, something which is indicative of an excessively wide separation of scores.

Hans Frick, fully recovered from his injuries, easily took firsts on pommel horse, parallel bars, vaulting, and high bar. His dazzling performance on the pommel horse was awarded a 9.1 and would have been worth more, as one of the judges later remarked, had Hans included some reverse scissors (basic parts), in his routine.

Hans finished first in the all around standings with a total score of 50.4, a whopping five points ahead of the second place Western competitor. He also had a second on rings and third in free exercise, 0.1 behind teammate Phil Michaelis.

Soon after Frick had recovered from his injuries, Gary Wicks, Toronto's third all-around competitor, tore ligaments in his fingers and will be out for the remainder of the season. However, with the help of newcomers Andre Lessard and Peter Bloxham, and veteran Phil Michaelis, Blues will be able to enter at least the OQAA minimum of three per event.

Al Forest performed brilliantly on high bar for a third, and a fourth on rings, finishing fourth in the standings with a commendable 40.7 points.

In the overall standings, Blues finished second with 123.1 points, a scant 1.0 behind York. Coach Julio Roncon feels that the results are encouraging and have helped to bolster the team spirit, something which will be needed for next week's OQAA Western preliminaries at Guelph.

Nordic skiers place 4th

Varsity's Nordic Ski Team placed fourth in the OQAA championships held last Friday at the Viking Ski Club near Morin Heights Quebec.

Carleton placed first, followed by Queen's, Laval and then Toronto

Doug Garfield was the first Varsity skier to finish, placing seventh with a time of 43:11. Bill Glover was next in eleventh spot then came Keijo Lane, 12th; Jay (Tips Down) Fisher, 19th; and Rein Brand, 22nd.

The jumping events were to have taken place on Saturday at the University of Montreal but unusually strong winds forced their cancellation which was especially disappointing as the Varsity team had justifiably high hopes of winning these events.

The OQAA Alpine championships will be held this weekend at Mount Sutton Quebec.

Stangs coralled 8-3

John Wright: Lets just call it two points

By LYNDON LITTLE

Backed by a six-goal first period blitz, the hockey Blues went on to pummel the last place Western Mustangs 8-3 at Varsity Arena Friday night. The effort, however, failed to impress team captain John Wright.

"Those last 40 minutes were just terrible," he groaned. "We just couldn't seem to do anything right. Let's just call it two points and leave it at that."

Over on the other side of the rink, Mustang coach Ron Johnstone, in his first season as Western's hockey mentor, provided some possible clues to Blues' unesthetic performance in the second and third periods.

"For those final 40 minutes, I told the guys to just go out and check," he said. Then he paused. "Maybe I should have said that before the first period!"

Johnstone, however, didn't appear too upset that his team had dropped their eighth game in twelve league starts. "Listen," he said, "we've got 12 freshmen on this team. They're all coming back next year and we're going to have ourselves a helluva team."

THE WATERLOO WARRIORS, Blues rivals for first place, remained in a deadlock for top spot when they edged the McMaster Marlins 7-5 in Hamilton the same evening. However, the Warriors have played two fewer games.

Waterloo visits Varsity Arena February 17. Right now, the Mustangs' biggest visible weakness is a defensive corps that yields breakaways at the slightest provocation. Two Varsity forwards in particular, Terry Peterman and Kaz Lysionek, finished the game on an intimate, first-name basis with Mustang goaltender Mac Smith.

Peterman notched three goals and an assist to stretch his league scoring lead over teammate, and linemate, Brian St. John to five points. Lysionek, who has been one of Blues' most effective attackers in the last few weeks, scored once but easily could have had as many as four in the first period alone. He appeared to have been granted an unrestricted travel visa down his right wing lane.

Defenceman Dave McDowall with two, Wright, and Gord Davies were the other Varsity marksmen. Ray Lisk, Dick Oudederk and Bob Jeffery, the league's leading goal scorer, replied for Western.

MCDOWALL WAS SUPERB in heading up the defensive quartet, displaying all the skill he showed last year when he was the league's best rearguard though he was overlooked at all-star time. The pair of goals gives him a total of four for the year.

Two Blues picked up injuries. Dan McCann was forced to leave the game early in the second period with a leg hurt and didn't return. He was to have an X-ray Saturday. Lysionek pulled a muscle in the second period but finished the game.

Brent Swanick, who has become the fifth defenceman since he twisted his knee in the York game, was used as a forward in penalty killing situations.

Tommy Little, starting his seventh game of the season in the Varsity nets, stopped 21 Western shots.

Blues have two home games this week, McMaster is here Wednesday and Laurentian is in town for an exhibition match Friday night.

Blue Notes: Left winger Bill Buba's six-game scoring streak finally came to an end. He scored ten times during that period to take over the club lead in goals with 19. . . Gord Davies is the league's top assist man with 17. . . Mike Boland, a Varsity defector to the pro ranks, was a spectator at Friday's game and reports his stats with the Springfield Kings of the AHL as three goals and five assists. He's sporting a broken nose courtesy of a Providence defenceman. Bookie is playing on a line with Garry Dineen, former Canadian National team star.

WHY IS THIS BOY SMILING? Western goalie Mac Smith grins as he makes futile attempt to prevent Blues' Kaz Lysionek (far right) from tucking in a goal. John Wright (behind net) set up score with a pass.

THE BACKBREAKER: Dave McDowall scored Blues' fourth goal on this play. Left, he breaks in alone after stealing the puck. Right, he throws puck into the far corner after deaking Smith to his knees.

Kaz Lysionek (far right) from tucking in a goal. John Wright (behind net) set up score with a pass.

Waterloo on Wednesday

Basket-Blues stopped 78-57

Windsor, Ont. (Staff) — The Windsor University Lancers moved into sole possession of first place in the OQAA Western Division basketball race here Saturday night when they downed the University of Toronto Varsity Blues 78-57.

The victory brings the Lancers' record to five wins and one defeat. Waterloo Warriors hold down second place with a 4-2 mark.

Blues, who suffered their sixth straight defeat, successfully blunted the Lancers' powerful attack however, poor shooting on their own part (31 per cent) cost them a chance for a major upset.

Blues scoring: Larry Trafford, 15. Dave Watt, 10; Bill Boston, 8; Ron Voake, 6; Garth Evans, 4; Angus Braid, 3; Mike Katz, 2; and Gerry Barker, 2.

Blues play their final home game of the season Wednesday night when they host Waterloo.

Rookie forward Dave Watt hit for ten points

Varsity curlers hexed again

Curlers, no less than other athletes, have their little superstitions, one of these being the hex.

George Carr, who skipped the Varsity team at the OQAA Western Division at Guelph this past weekend, has had a hex on Gord Runtz, last year's OQAA winner from McMaster, whose only loss last year in the competition was hung on him by Carr.

Unfortunately for Carr, the University of Waterloo skip Hugh McCarrel has a hex working on him, dating from two years ago when he beat Carr in the finals of the Ontario Junior Tankard.

All three skips were in action against each other again this year, but while McCarrel's hex worked,

Carr's didn't, and Carr, curling with Craig Burch, Dave Richardson, and Jim Stewart finished third behind both Waterloo and McMaster in the five team round-robin playdowns.

It has been many years since three such evenly matched teams have dominated the OQAA Western Division, and it is unlikely that the East will be able to muster much opposition to the McCarrel and Runtz rinks at the finals at Queen's next week-end. For Carr, however, the only consolation is that his entire team will be eligible again next year.

Final Standings: Waterloo, 4-0; McMaster, 3-1; Toronto, 2-2; Western 1-3; Guelph, 0-4

MAN OF THE DECADE

VOL. 91 — NO. 50
WED., FEB. 10, 1971

The Varsity — Enrol Young

Sure hope we can fill your shoes, Claude

It's tough work running a big branch plant like the University of Toronto. But back in '58, we put our money on you and we've never regretted it.

You're the kind of man who had what it took — the administrative know-how to keep the big shit machine running smoothly (and always expanding), while maintaining a balanced political climate on the campus.

All you had at your disposal were the traditional tools of the trade — ivory towers, valises, fellowship behavioural sciences, castrated courses on "social problems", bulldozers, lecture halls, committees, examinations, and, of course, the BA, the BSc, the MA, the PhD and others.

Using these tools you've managed to turn out record numbers of university grads to meet our specifications. These fine men and women are already setting their hearts and minds to work on preserving a tranquil, Canadian-type atmosphere all over your country.

From time to time, of course, you've had a few difficulties keeping the lid on the whole mess. We understand. And you've had to give in here and there. But only a little.

Thanks for all you've done. We like to rank you as one of our top operators.

But after 12 years at work, who doesn't get hankering for a change? We hate to see you go, but we've already got a top notch task force down to work looking for a man who can fill your shoes.

Hope we can find him.

PHDs have jobs, report says

OTTAWA (CUP) — A recently released report by the Ontario Council on Graduate Studies shows that only 15 of 624 PHD graduates from all Ontario universities in the fall of 1969 and spring of 1970 show a radically different employment picture than had been indicated during the fall from other sources.

The statistics, however, do not indicate whether the jobs obtained were in accord with individual preference and qualifications.

The report, which is based on statistics collected by each Ontario university shows that 284 are employed in Ontario, 112 in the rest of Canada and 228 in other countries.

The largest number of the graduates, a total of 257, are employed in university teaching — 132 in Ontario, 51 in the rest of Canada and 74 in other countries. In industry 28 are employed in Ontario, 12 in the rest of Canada and 18 in other countries.

Sixty-one have found jobs with government — 30 in Ontario, 11 in the rest of Canada and 20 in other countries. Research fellowships and private research institutes account for 197 of the graduates. The breakdown in this area shows that research fellowships in Ontario have gone to 54, in the rest of Canada to 29, and in other countries to 86. Private research institutes employ 14 in Ontario, three in the rest of Canada and 11 in other countries.

Eighteen are employed in other varying areas and of the 624 total only 18 could not be accounted for.

Levesque claims victory

MONTREAL (CUP) — Rene Levesque, leader of the Parti Quebecois said Monday the party had taken up an impossible challenge and won, as results in the by-election in Chambly showed the PQ had gained slightly in their popular support in the voting results.

"We would have considered it a victory merely to hold our position," Levesque told a rally following the election Monday. "It is a triumph."

Former Union National Labor Minister Jean Cournoyer won the seat for the Liberals in Monday's election, with almost 66 per cent of the vote.

Pierre Marois the PQ candidate, polled about 33 per cent. In the April general election, the first contested by the PQ, Marois got about 31 per cent of the vote.

The results "Shows that the huge vote polled by the PQ in its first election last April was not a passing fancy on the part of Quebecois," Marois said.

"We had to fight against tremendous odds. Our militants were still exhausted from the general election only nine months ago, we were opposed by a minister and we had to face a subtle campaign of slur on the part of our opponents," he said.

Simone Chartrand and Pierre Bourgault (right) march arm-in-arm at the head of a demonstration Sunday protesting the undemocratic jailing of Quebec activists.

Bourgault: 'Quebec's fight is yours too'

PQ leader speaks at demonstration

As 200 marchers protesting the detention of the Quebec political prisoners reached the steps of the Ontario Legislature Sunday afternoon, they were reminded that "there are not just 48 political prisoners in Quebec, there are 15,000".

The speaker was Pierre Bourgault, former head of the Rassemblement pour l'Indépendance Nationale and unsuccessful Parti Québécois candidate against Quebec premier Robert Bourassa.

Bourgault described his Toronto speaking invitation as the first he had received in a decade to talk to English Canadians "who have decided to fight our fight" because it's their fight too.

Should these people avoid becoming discouraged along the way, their supporters would become more militant, he advised.

Bourgault had not come to Toronto to urge English Canadians to fight the French Canadian struggle. Instead, he told his audience that it is "extremely important for you to wage your own fight as Canadians."

The free Quebec of the future will not want to talk to a colonized Canada, according to him. So, the best way to help Quebec is by changing Canada, freeing it through revolution. His cry of "Long live free Canada! Vive Quebec libre!" was enthusiastically repeated by his listeners.

The danger to the movement for a free Canada lies in the possibility of transferring the political fight, adopting instead the struggle of others, such as the blacks or American anti-War protesters. This has happened too often in the Canadian past, Bourgault warned.

Discussing the current political situation in Quebec, Bourgault declared, "We are all responsible for this crisis", responsible because of our silence, our lack of action and of conscience.

We should not try to evade this responsibility, but responsibility is not guilt. Should we accept this guilt tag, we're finished, he said.

Although English Canadians will find it nearly impossible to feel what is happening in Quebec, they can understand it. "So," according to Bourgault, "we don't ask you to feel it, but to understand it, to talk to each other about it."

Bourgault rejected immediate consideration of the relative innocence of the various persons on trial in Quebec for their alleged crimes. He reminded his audience that under our legal system defendants are supposed to be presumed innocent until proven guilty, the fight now is not about the defendants' innocence, but about their right to have just trials.

He denounced the trials as "a farce, a mockery" as the defendants prove each day in court.

Another rally speaker, Michel Boudron, a Radio-Canada journalist fired for protesting CBC censorship and vice-president of the Montreal CNTU, said there was just one reason for the political trials: "because in October, Trudeau and the Government in Quebec made up a revolution and nobody came".

Boudron drew a parallel between the situation in the U.S.

regarding Viet Nam and the situation in Canada regarding Quebec. "We are your VIET Nam", he warned, and should English Canada seek to impose its will on French Canada it'll suffer the same ruinous fate the U.S. is enduring.

He questioned whether there are enough reasonable people in English Canada to prevent Trudeau from sending troops into Quebec following a Parti Québécois victory.

Examining the state of English Canada, Boudron concluded it has a long way to go before it will become independent.

When a visibly tired Simone Chartrand, wife of the imprisoned CNTU labour leader, rose to speak, she was greeted by a standing ovation. She discussed how Trudeau is not the Trudeau she knew years before, concluding that her husband "is much freer in prison than Trudeau is in Ottawa".

Lamenting the dearth of honest journalists and honest professors, Chartrand cautioned that we must read between the lines of the articles about the current Quebec situation. Professors, students, youth, and artists must get more people involved in the issue, she urged.

The fundamental question posed by this whole crisis, according to Simone, is whether we live in a democracy. She commented that the only thing of which many of the Quebec Five are guilty is of having created democratic associations, such as the CNTU.

She concluded, declaring that she won't ask her husband to change his ways. "He's the kind of man we need."

Poor plan to protest at Tory convention

By LAURA KELLY

The Toronto poor are mounting strength for a demonstration at the Progressive Conservative Convention at noon on Friday.

A newly-forged umbrella organization, the Metro Action Co-ordinating Executive (MACE) is directing the efforts of 14 poor people's groups to unite in the pressure campaign for improved government poverty programs.

Married Students Tenants Association Chairman, Wayne Roberts, is one of the leaders in MACE, which includes welfare rights associations, other OHC tenants associations, unemployed groups, and an ex-convict group.

There have been 28 long years' of injustice under the Conservative rule. Their trend in policy is discrimination against the poor," said Roberts, yesterday.

MACE represents over 5,000 Torontonians, and hopes to mobilize 1,000 for the Friday demonstration, which will aim at getting on the convention floor.

MACE has yet to obtain a march permit, but intends to demonstrate even if official permission is withheld.

"There'll only be violence if they bring in cops and start pushing us around," said Mike Carson, from the OHC Tenants Association.

MACE's biggest gripes are poor housing conditions and inadequate welfare payments.

"The OHC only has contempt for the tenants, and there's only one answer to that, tenants' control," said Carson.

"OHC continues to give the same contractors, despite their previous shoddy workmanship, all the business. It's the taxpayers that are getting screwed," he said.

"I've invited the Liberal MP from Davenport to live on welfare payments for one month. He immediately turned me down. I don't blame him," said John Roubles, another MACE worker.

Claude Bissell: on his birthday

Today is Claude Bissell's last birthday as U of T president. Over the last 12 years he has served his university well. On these pages you will read something about him and who he is. It is not meant to be a biography or even a life story. Probably, it falls somewhere between an appreciation and a critique of his career. It was written by Varsity editor David Frank.

IN THE FALL OF 1958 Donald Creighton, then chairman of the department of History at this university, delivered an elegant speech on behalf of the academics and administrators of U of T, welcoming Claude Bissell to take his place as ruler of a mighty empire.

"For do not be deceived by the modern republican connotations of the word 'president'," Creighton continued in a grandiloquent manner. "The University of Toronto, like all the best governments in the world, is fundamentally a constitutional monarchy."

Continuing his elaborate analogy, Creighton indicated the "grand duchies" (the colleges), "the great earldoms" (modern occupational interests), the "marcher lordships" (the "department of extension"), and, finally, the "royal household" (Simcoe Hall), all of which comprised the "academic kingdom of Toronto."

"We are all here," Creighton added humbly, "We have come to do homage and swear fealty."

Looking westwards, "across St. George's Channel," Creighton foresaw a mighty work ahead in the next decade colonizing "this new world to the west," this "new territorial dependency."

And in this new world, this new empire, Creighton predicted, the new ruler and his academic cohorts would be faced with insistent needs and demands, many of which the new ruler would have to resist.

"We shall have to try to maintain our old character in the new empire, just as we shall have to attempt to preserve the university tradition in a modern world which presses clamorously in upon us with insistent needs and demands."

On this note Creighton concluded his "coronation address," pledging loyalty and support to the new ruler in the mighty tasks that faced him.

SUCH WAS THE RHETORIC through which Claude T. Bissell was "installed" in 1958 as the eighth president of the University of Toronto.

The selection of the new ruler was not, of course, made by his subjects. As outlined in the U of T Act, the power to pick a president belongs to the board of governors. Appointed by the provincial cabinet, the board of governors then consisted primarily of retired politicians and businessmen, the same as it does now.

It is an important measure of the change in the climate of the university, that the board now feels compelled, in finding a successor for Bissell, to work upon the recommendations of a committee representing the university community. The feudal allegory, promulgated today, could only arouse shock — or perhaps laughter — if it were seriously intended.

It is not known whether there were other candidates for the prestigious job Bissell was awarded. Such decisions are shrouded in secrecy.

For behind all the allegorical feudal rhetoric Creighton articulated, lies a portion of truth

IN RETROSPECT, BISSELL seems to have been the perfect man for the prestigious post.

He was a man with solid roots in the institution. As an undergraduate at U of T, Bissell stood at the head of his classes in English and History and acquired a half dozen scholarships for his intellectual prowess. After receiving his MA in English here, he spent three years at Cornell University in upper New York State writing a prize-winning PHD thesis on Samuel Butler.

In 1941 he obtained a lectureship at University College, and — after taking time out to fight in the Second World War — never looked back.

While keeping up his teaching duties, and rising to become a full professor in 1952, Bissell also took on administrative duties. For more than ten years he was dean-in-residence at UC, worked as a special assistant to then-president Sidney Smith, and, in 1952, was appointed vice-president of the University of Toronto.

Two years before he clinched the vice-presidency (a post that had been unfilled for several decades), the Carnegie Foundation handed Bissell a special grant to do an administrative study of higher education in North America.

"THE CARNEGIE FOUNDATION," wrote a Globe and Mail reporter several years ago, "recognized there was something special about Claude Bissell."

In Canada, too, universities were quick to recognize that Bissell had a unique combination of qualities which would make him an excellent administrator.

In 1956 Bissell took over the presidency of Carleton University in Ottawa, but, after two short years away, he was back at his alma mater again — this time as chief executive officer.

FOR THE NEXT 12 YEARS his guiding hand would attempt to steer the university forward — without yielding to the pressures that beset it from all sides.

For, in spite of all Creighton's effusive rhetoric, U of T could no longer claim to be an autonomous academic kingdom, sufficient unto itself.

Bissell understood this, and this is where we can begin to observe the unresolved ambiguity in his approach to the university.

On the one hand he could say, in his first opening address to students, that the university was no longer an "aristocratic adornment", but a training ground which had become "the key to social progress."

Quoting economist John Kenneth Galbraith, Bissell could perceive that the economy was shifting rapidly from "investment in things," to "investment in people."

His frankness is astonishing, when you read Bissell's thesis on the class nature of the university:

"To take the place of the elite class (now extinct), whose badge was independent income and leisure, we have produced a new class . . . if you like, a class of professional intellectuals — engineers, doctors, teachers, civil servants, business executives."

As an administrator, Bissell was able to generate a number of significant reforms within the university. One of his primary objectives has been to reverse the division set up in 1906 between academic and "policy" decision-making in the university.

IT CERTAINLY IS A JOB, KEEPING THIS PLACE CLEAN.

An ardent advocate of a unicameral top governing structure, Bissell developed a model of what he hoped would replace the board and the senate, in the form of his president's advisory council, established in 1965.

It includes no students, but then, despite Bissell's respect for the student viewpoint on many matters, and his understanding of the student's central place in the educational process, he has been less than pushy about ensuring students the same rights as faculty in the university's governing structures.

BUT IF BISSELL UNDERSTOOD that in a modern world, the good university administrator had to be bold, adventurous and innovative in his techniques, he was nevertheless firmly rooted in a traditional set of cultural values.

The second face of his approach to the university embodied a great kind of humanistic feeling.

For an administrator, Bissell has always had a fantastic rapport with students and faculty. Respected by faculty for his intellectual verve and his role as a patron of the arts (for two years, in the early sixties, he even chaired the Canada Council), Bissell has also been well regarded by more than one generation of students.

As a dean at UC, he appears to have been an almost perfect YMCA-type leader. One UC student from the early fifties remembers Bissell as "one of the boys" who would come out and toss a football in the yard with his students.

"We used to have water fights and dump ash cans on the lawn in front of University College. We were bad boys . . . But he would give us a little speech on conduct and put us in our place."

Even after becoming president, Bissell continued to satisfy his penchant for small informal situations — visiting residences for coffee and informal chatter, or speaking to this or that club or association.

But Bissell's essential humanism is reflected in factors far more significant than these superficial indications.

IN HIS FIRST OPENING ADDRESS he generously informed the assembled audience of students that "at this university, students are indispensable."

"You," he said, "are the raison d'être of the institution."

In a more temperate mood, weighed down by the experience of his years in office, Bissell would likely tone down such a statement. But with roots deep in the academic tradition, Bissell apparently saw it as his duty to stimulate the unfamiliar and growing student body into creative activity.

The theme of his speech was that students ought not to be afraid to be adventurous — but to be bold and inquiring.

"ANGULAR — NOT SPHERICAL," was his call to battle. "Middle age is the time to be spherical," he exhorted his audience. "I urge you to be sceptical of those who hold up the pseudo-ideal of being 'well-adjusted', and who speak of the 'well-rounded' man or woman, as if the highest aim of university education were the production of dumplings."

In that early, good-humoured and enthusiastic speech, perhaps Bissell had not fully comprehended the real nature of the position he now occupied. Perhaps he was still too much the teacher, too much the academic, when he practically pleaded with students for them to become more aware and more involved politically.

"If in any country, the students are passive and tractable" he warned, "if passionate concern for the general good, enthusiasm for ideals, and zeal for reform are not to be found in academic halls, then that country is prey to a malignant disease."

PERHAPS, AT FIRST GLANCE, there might appear to be no real contradiction between the two impulses we can discern in the early Claude Bissell. Perhaps even now, he is unable to resolve the conflict between his task of social engineering — running the plant well and efficiently — and his personal sense of what a good liberal education is.

But as the years wore on, the contradictions became a schism, the schism a crack, and the crack a gulf which can probably never be bridged.

The change did not come about by chance, and the personality of Claude Bissell did not have very much to do with it. He has been as much a victim of the changed conditions we have been going through, as we all have been.

CLAUDE BISSELL PRESIDED over the great period of expansion of the University of Toronto. Undergraduate enrollment has almost doubled during his tenure, the graduate school has mushroomed beyond the fondest dreams of the '50's, the number of faculties, institutes and schools has multiplied, and U of T, after spawning York University, sprouted two suburban campuses as well.

St. George St. has been so thoroughly colonized by the university that Bissell has pressured the city (unsuccessfully as yet) to change it from a Metro road to an on-campus pedestrian thoroughfare.

The hallmark of Bissell's decade has been expansion of the physical size of the university. As the campus gobbles up the last available spots of land between itself and Spadina Ave., its final building boom appears to be levelling off.

The cornerstone of the post-Bissell campus will be the gigantic Social Sciences Research Library, occupying an entire block on the northwest campus. At a time when the Ontario government has frozen funds for new projects such as a co-operative Innis College residence, this huge $42 million project goes booming ahead.

Jocularly, Bissell refuses to reveal where the funds came from to build the new library. All he will say is that the money came from a substantial private grant.

But, again, it's not just physically, and in material bulk, that Bissell has wanted U of T to shine.

more on Bissell

When the Globe and Mail, in 1967, dubbed Claude Bissell "the Mr. Big of Canadian higher education", they were thinking of other things as well.

The name aptly fits the man who has dreamed of the day when U of T would join the select circle of the world's greatest universities.

"I know it's customary on the banquet circuit to refer to our university as great," Bissell told a reporter in 1966. "But although we do provide a good university honors degree, we are not in that top world group of 10 or 15."

"NO CANADIAN UNIVERSITY IS," he added. "We intend to be."

In asking for special consideration from the Ontario government's Committee on University Affairs last November, Claude Bissell put it rather bluntly.

As a guardian of a rich tradition of excellence, and because of its status as a national university, grants if it was not to slip into "mediocrity." He boasted as well of U of T's high record in the academic olympics — the Woodrow Wilson fellowships.

All these things are very close to the heart of Claude Bissell.

Excellence, scholarship, wisdom and culture, he once remarked, were the primary attributes a university community should strive to have.

Bissell has always stressed the importance of culture as the mark of the good life.

The questions he has never been able to ask in a genuinely critical way are "What kind of culture?" and "Culture for whom?"

INSTITUTIONS ARE BLIND, and Claude Bissell has seen it as his work to try to humanize the most complex university machinery in Canada. Surely he feels a nostalgia for the old days, when students and faculty got along well enough, thank you, without any of this parity nonsense dividing them into hostile factions.

Bissell has always stressed the importance of culture as the mark of the good life. In his university cultured and civilized people were always able to get along with each other.

In the early years of student activism, when students were only beginning to transform themselves from "pupils" into full participants in the learning process, Bissell greeted the activists with enthusiasm.

He was quite willing to play a gentle game of one-upmanship with students he could trust and understand. On one occasion, meeting with student leaders in 1968 over a campus crisis, he could admit quite frankly that they'd beat him at his own game and that he'd blown that particular issue.

In those days — before the Commission on University Government Report — he was willing to be responsive to intelligent and well-argued student positions, however radical they might appear at first. Although this is now forgotten by some, Claude Bissell did not originally favour the idea of setting up CUG as a student-faculty commission, with alumni and board members as non-voting observers. He was pressured into the ultimate form of CUG by the combined efforts of student and faculty activists both.

BISSELL HAS ALWAYS PLACED a premium on "civilization", and following the publishing of the CUG Report he waded into the growing faculty backlash against some of its specific recommendations (student-faculty parity on the top governing council, the student right to equal say with faculty in advising departmental chairmen), with a warning:

"If we repudiate the group of student activists who participated in and supported CUG — intelligent, idealistic, deeply concerned about the University — then we shall lose the entire student body to apathy and cynicism," he told members of the Association of the Teaching Staff.

"And the activists," Bissell predicted, "will be supplanted by the apostles of incivility and brutality, who in these days wait expectantly in the wings."

On his return from a year's sabbatical at Harvard, to which he retreated in the fall of 1967, probably in order to set his bearings straight on what education really meant, Bissell faced a changed campus.

Students, frustrated by the normal channels then existing for university reform (appeal, supplication, submissions and advisory committees), had taken more militant forms of action.

Perhaps the most traumatic experience of all for Bissell was the disruption of a guest lecture delivered on campus by former University of California President Clark Kerr by a group of student radicals.

Bissell had what he called a "gut reaction" to the disruption and the student attempt to take over the microphone in the middle of Kerr's speech.

His reaction has lead him more recently to distinguish clearly between what he calls "activists" and "saboteurs."

The students who disrupted Kerr's speech were trying to ask some difficult questions.

FOR ALL HIS VERSATILITY and urbanity, even an administrator like Bissell will never be able to handle these challenges.

The challenges simply cannot be dealt with in terms of the tradition Bissell knows and has grown to respect. For him, the university is a social tool — but not one which must be used to transform society.

Given that universities are institutions of "culture", the questions run something like "culture for whom?" and "what kind of culture?"

The definition Bissell and other liberal academics place on the university is that it is "a-political", that it endorses no particular views as an institution and is the proponent of none.

The only social issue on which Bissell has taken a definite stand in recent years (outside of university affairs), is the issue of the Spadina Expressway. (He came out publicly against it). Otherwise, he has avoided the public spotlight.

Fearing disruptions, he has failed to continue the traditional president's welcoming address at the outset of each fall term.

On such vital issues as the Americanization of our universities, the social relevance of the work done by students and professors on campus, he has given no leadership.

The only thing of importance he has had to say recently about university and society was to reassure businessmen that their investment in university education was being well looked after.

The university, he told members of the Canadian Life Assurance Association, remains "a strong ally" of business, filling many of its "major needs."

As for the changing relationships between university and businesses, "I think that the changes governing structures that are now being advocated will bring the businessman more into the centre of the academic process . . ."

Even on the vital issue of implementation of the CUG Report recommendations, Bissell has abdicated his leadership role. He has allowed the faculty to ride roughshod over the original hope extended to students of full participation in the educational process.

ON THE CURRENT ISSUE OF PARITY in the faculty of arts and science, he has maintained an aloof and apparently disinterested silence. He has made no public utterance, and refused to act as public spokesman for the informally set up parity restructuring committee.

Perhaps he has learned his lessons well.

For a man in his position can do little else but watch.

IT'S TOO BAD, but that's what universities do to people.

U of T is fake Harvard in flick

Have you noticed the Avis trucks and Winnibago trailers parked at the corner of Harbord and St. George? Or perhaps you have tried to use the phony phone booths there?

Claude Bissell has finally had his hidden ambitions realized. Warner Bros. is filming a movie supposedly taking place at Harvard (Boston) here, at U of T.

The reason it is being filmed here is that the moviemakers thought the weather here would be better than in Boston. But we fooled them all.

This full length movie called "The Dealings" is a love-adventure type story.

The heroine, Susan, is played by Barbara Hershie of "Last Summer". The "heavy" as production manager Ben Chapman calls him is a crooked cop who arrests dope pushers and then sells the dope on the side, naturally keeping the profits.

Ironically enough the two policemen who are nicely helping traffic around on the corner (Harbord & St. George) asked for a "good word to be put in for the cops."

Fac. Council seeks student members for new '6-2' body

By LINDA McQUAIG

In a last ditch move to set up a restructuring committee of six staff and two students, the Arts and Science Faculty Council is attempting to co-opt student members.

In a letter to the 34 student delegates on the council Associate Dean W. D. Foulds asked students to make nominations so that "an election can be held next week."

A list of those students eligible for nomination was included in the letter. Only the 34 delegates themselves, and not their 34 alternate delegates, are eligible to nominate or be nominated.

According to Bob Spencer, (III UC), an ad hoc committee of the student delegates have decided to decline the offer "as a tactic to legitimize the 5 - 5 committee, which is progressing at a very rapid rate."

He suspected that only a small number of the student delegates were considering making nominations.

In the November student referendum 82% of the voters decided that if the Council rejected the motion for parity on the restructuring committee all students would withdraw from the Council.

Following the defeat of the parity motion at the Jan. 19 Council meeting, the students withdrew as planned.

Since then they have set up a counter committee of five staff and five students, which "is doing very good work," according to Vince Dolan, one of the students.

Foulds said that the Council would proceed to set up the proposed 6-2 committee, regardless of student participation.

"It would be desirable to have students on it," he said, "but it is not absolutely necessary."

When asked if he felt this action ignored the wishes of the student body as expressed in the November referendum, he said "it was unfortunate that they took that view."

Birth control handbooks jolt education boards

By ART MOSES

Pollution Probe has stopped delivery of its teachers' pollution kits after two borough Boards of Education objected to the inclusion of a birth control handbook.

The kits, containing articles on aspects of the ecology issue, were to be sent to all senior public and secondary schools in Metropolitan Toronto. They were not to be directly available to students.

On Monday, the Scarborough Board of Education asked that delivery be suspended two weeks while the handbook was studied by Board officials.

Tuesday, the North York Board ordered that delivery be cut off immediately unless the birth control handbook was excluded.

"This means the Board doesn't trust individual teachers to deal with the handbook as they see fit," Probe member Bob Spencer said yesterday. "We wanted to include the birth control handbook, as we felt it was relevant to the whole question being discussed in the kit," he added. Spencer said Pollution Probe receives grants from the Metropolitan Toronto Board of Education and that the grants would be in jeopardy if Probe refused to tailor the kit to the demands of the balking Boards.

Probe officials are now meeting with representatives from both Scarborough and North York in an effort to iron out differences.

Prof can bar students from class: Giffen

By ART MOSES and DAVID FRANK

A sociology professor panicked Monday when he spotted six unfamiliar students seated in his 1 p.m. class in a Sidney Smith lecture hall.

Assistant professor W. Phillips told the six students who were not enrolled in his course that he would not begin his lecture until they left.

IN RESPONSE to this opening broadside, three of the "uninvited guests", as the professor called them, left.

The other three remained seated among the 40 students who had turned up for the lecture.

The course in question was Sociology 104 — Industrial Society.

"If you don't get out I'll have you thrown out," Phillips continued, recollects one of the unwelcome students. "Then he used rude language, the kind you wouldn't expect to hear from an academic."

FOLLOWING THIS ULTIMATUM the students pointed out to Phillips that they all had Admit-To-Lecture cards and that they were interested in sitting in on one of his lectures.

"We asked him if he thought perhaps the students in his class should have a say in whether we could stay," says Frank Rooney, one of the "intruders". He said he didn't think so.

Then, says Rooney, the three appealed to the class to decide whether they should be allowed to stay.

No one defended their right to stay; others suggested they should leave.

Only then did the three unwelcome students leave the lecture hall.

"WE JUST WANTED TO WATCH the course," said Rooney afterwards. "We heard it was interesting."

"We were not there to disrupt," he asserted. "Of course if we'd had questions we certainly would have asked them."

Phillips yesterday told The Varsity that "access to the classroom is contingent on the consent of the instructor."

"No student has the right to drop into a course he is not registered in, nor does the president of the University nor any of my colleagues," he said.

He pointed out that several of the unwelcome students were in fourth year and "fourth year students do not sit in on a first year introductory class unless they have something else in mind."

"THE THING TO DO is to ask the professor for permission to audit his course, as a matter of courtesy. This is not a jungle that we work in and study in," he said.

Sociology department chairman P. J. Giffen said "There is no rule that a student has no right to go into a class he is not enrolled in."

"It's up to the individual instructor to allow or not to allow people into his class as he sees fit. He should play the issue by ear," Giffen said.

The calendar description for Phillips course innocuously reads, "Industrial Society. An introduction to sociological analysis with an emphasis on the social sources and consequences of economic change and political stability and instability."

ONLY STUDENTS WHO actually take the course are in an adequate position to judge what that description means in practice. Phillips' course is generally referred to as an "industrial sociology" course and Phillips is counted among the more conservative members of the sociology department.

Evaluation for the course is by midyear and final examination based largely on the reading of the required texts. Written reports are also required on the following paperbacks: Peter Berger, Invitation to Sociology; Clifford Geertz, Pedlars and Princes; George Orwell, The Road to Wigan Pier; Michael Young, The Rise of the Meritocracy; and J. K. Galbraith, The New Industrial State.

Phillips lectures twice weekly at 1 p.m. Mondays and Wednesdays in Sidney Smith Room 2117.

Health Service gave help without red tape

I was really glad to see Agi Lukacs' article of last Wednesday. "Health Service Cuts Abortion Red Tape."

It's true. If that article had not appeared, this letter would be saying the same from personal experience. I am one of the 100 "who have approached the Health Service, resolved on abortion since Sept. 1970," and the statement in the Women's Caucus pamphlet was clearly untrue.

Without the serious and sympathetic help given me by a Health Service doctor, the experience of an unintended pregnancy (rhythm, you know) and the personal aftermath would have been much worse than they were, had I been able to get an abortion at all.

I was lucky. With 20/20 hindsight it is obvious (as it should have been with any kind of foresight) that the pill is a very simple ounce of prevention that would have been worth many times the pound of cure that became necessary to avoid messing up three lives.

With or without red tape, an abortion is something less than easy to cope with.

A few cents worth of unexpected beefs

I often wonder if the students at U of T raise the ruckus about things that really matter.

For example, the new management in the xerox shop at Harbord and Huron is now charging 29 cents for three copies. There is no sign whatsoever about change in management or increase in price. I know because I had three copies made this week of a poem that I had written, and was charged 29 cents.

Not a cent less would the budding young businessman accept. This was a bit hard on me because I am unemployed, was used to paying five cents per copy plus tax, and took two extra copies of the original assuming the old rate was in force.

Why are the students now being socked an increase in price of approximately 100 per cent? Why does the bloody government of Ontario squeeze a sales tax from xerox copies of a poem written up by an unemployed person?

Another example concerns pollution on the campus. Every time the Spadina end of Bancroft Street gets filled with snow from the adjacent parking lots, the Works Dept. hires dump trucks, at the cost of a small fortune, to remove the pile.

Why don't they let the sun melt this snow without any cost to the U of T? Why must this dirty snow be dumped into the lake to pollute our drinking supply and help create another dead lake? And what about the gas exhausts from all those trucks needlessly polluting the air on the campus?

These are just two things the kids should be "rebellin'" against. Why aren't they? Regarding the snow removal, what do you say about it, Dr. Chant?

A non-academic.

An academic calculation

Whenever people decide to carry out calculated murders on a grand scale, they usually excuse themselves by discrediting the victims' humanity — according to a definition which they conveniently adjust to their situation. (History bears this out.)

The abortion issue is really just another example of the same.

It is also ironic to find that so many of us who complained of the plastic culture of the "older generation" are now ready to plasticize life itself. It shows just how messed up we are.

And how dangerous.

$50 fee hike next year for grad students

By MARCIA SINGER

Graduate student fees will be increased by about $50 next year, revealed W. D. Baines, dean of Graduate Studies at a meeting Monday, sponsored by the GSU.

In January, the Committee on University Affairs recommended that graduate fees should jump from the present $435 to $750 for one year's tuition.

The CUA has now recommended to set graduate fees at the average level of undergraduate fees in the specific course.

Baines also disclosed to the group of about thirty at the meeting that graduate students who now earn up to $2,200 as teaching or research assistants will not face a $400 cut in wages. The CUA had proposed a ceiling of $1,800 for graduate teaching or research assistants to go into effect next September.

Now the CUA has decided that the $1,800 ceiling will only affect those entering an Ontario graduate school in the future.

This means that any undergraduate who plans to attend an Ontario graduate school can earn up to $1,800 as a teaching assistant while students now enrolled in graduate schools can earn up to $2,200 at the same job.

The CUA has also proposed a 30% reduction in the number of Province of Ontario Government Fellowships which translates into 1½ million dollars throughout Ontario.

Both Tim Reid, Liberal-MPP, and Donald MacDonald, NDP-MPP, joined Monday's meeting to protest the financial cuts which they interpreted as a political manoeuvre to win back support for Education minister William Davis. Davis, contending the Conservative provincial leadership, has come under attack for the large slice of the provincial budget, over 40%, that his department spends.

Reid attacked the false assumption that there is an excess supply of Canadian graduates. The reason they can't get jobs is that American firms won't hire them, he said. He warned that a cut in the number of Canadian graduates in the next few years would probably cause Canadian universities, within the next ten years, to hire non-Canadians for lack of Canadian graduates.

MacDonald deplored the uncertainty in university affairs caused by the Conservatives government's short-term approach to planning. The university is entitled to plan for a five year period, not for one or two years, he said.

The CUA proposals and the question of graduate support doesn't affect only present graduate students.

"It's not a graduate issue. It's not an undergraduate issue. It's a university issue," stated Larry Hoffman, GSU president.

Tonight Bucky will be on campus at Brennan Hall to share in a panel discussion with Michael MacLamir, W. H. Auden, and Marshal McLuhan. The hall has somewhat inadequate dimensions to accommodate the event which was sold out some weeks ago.

What follows are fragments representing a small part of the vast array of creatively ineredible things Fuller has said and done. The whole house was packaged for air-delivery, anywhere, on earth. It could be erected on site in one day and weighed only 1 per cent of traditional construction.

This was in 1927, the same year that Le Corbusier, Mies van der Rohe and Walter Gropius were building the Weissenhof Siedlung in Stuttgart. Modern architecture emerging in its new orthodox uniform. (could this be one of the reasons we are a fascist society? We have adopted the architectural forms that developed in the setting from which fascism emerged.) They were talking about machines for living in and the great new industrialization. But the dymaxion house really was a machine for living in. It was and still is an indictment of modern architecture's technical obsolescence.

A one hundred foot diameter geodesic sphere weighing three tons encloses seven tons of air. The air to structure ratio is 2:1. When we double the size so that geodesic sphere is 200 ft. in diameter the weight of the structure goes up to 7 tons while the weight of the air goes up to 56 tons — the air to structure ratio changes to 8:1. When we double the size again to a 400 ft. geodesic sphere — the size of several geodesic domes now operating — the weight of the air inside goes to about 500 tons while the weight of the structure goes up to 15 tons. Air weight to structure weight ratio is now 33:1. When we get to a geodesic sphere one-half mile in diameter, the weight of the air enclosed is so great that the weight of the structure itself becomes of relatively negligible magnitude. For the ratio is 1000:1. When the sun shines on an open metallic aluminum geodesic sphere of one-half mile diameter, the sun penetrating through the frame and reflected back from the concave far side, bounces back into the sphere and gradually heats the interior atmosphere to a mild degree. When the interior temperature of the sphere rises only 1 degree Fahrenheit, the weight of air pushed out of the sphere is greater than the weight of the spherical framed geodesic structure. This means that the total weight of the interior air, plus the weight of the structure, is much

Don't destroy. Change its context

What changes and what building forms will create a university quarter? There are many more things to be done. Do them.

Invite all citizens to use the university. Let the public have access to this public space. Establish residences as co-educational.

If the food is bad in your canteen, or if it costs too much — demand change. If that doesn't work, set up your own food concession with good food and reasonable prices.

Move lounges on campus.

Drink and smoke on campus. Bring food, drink, hot plates to your buildings. Catering trucks on sidewalk plaza.

Use free faculty phones. Use faculty lavatories. Women use Hert House; men use the Benson Building Clean your own buildings and know what it's like.

Use furniture into halls and live in the lounges. Sleep overnight on campus. Stay in buildings more than 8 hours a day; give them full use. Celebrate, party in your buildings. Tour buildings look around and get to know the place.

Look and eat at the university. Cook in labs. Park

Ignore signs on doors and buildings. A building is only a container for human action. Change the symbols of your university by using them.

Take the path of least resistance; go through instead of around.

Jaywalk, paint crosswalks on St. George and Queen's Park, demand traffic lights.

Use the O.I.S.E. subway entrance (open until 6 p.m.); and yes it does exit to street — ignore the sign in the St. George station.

IN 1967, MOSHE SAFDIE was asked to submit an application to do a student union building (campus centre) for San Francisco State College. This story, told by him in his book, Beyond Habitat, begins with his first meeting with the students. It was a very good meeting.

"I spoke of morphology; of the design process, of the need to be unarbitrary, of spaces that could be randomly changed to meet changing needs, and I spoke of the vernacular, of the idea of a village made with discipline yet infinite variety.

Of even greater significance was the question of the relationship of the building to the people coming into it. Watching the students at lunch time as they approached the existing cafeteria gave me an indication of what would happen once the union replaced it. Literally thousands of students approached the building from all directions simultaneously. Three of four thousand students could reach the union within ten minutes. It was obvious that a building with one entrance was inappropriate, it would be a caricature of the kind of entrance that this structure should have.

Then, one day, as I digested these observations, there emerged the concept that the building should allow people approaching it from any direction to just walk up the walls. You should come toward it and simply climb up or down its exterior surface until you reached the restaurants, meeting rooms, or offices. You should be able to move from one area to another outside as well as inside the building. Thus the building evolved with an outside surface that was a series of steps, terraces, and inclined planes covered with planting.

We tried to determine the facilities that would be required to accommodate the student government. Every student society had a pretty clear idea of the number of offices it needed and the number of meetings it held every week or month. But it became apparent that these changed continually, that there was no way of pre-determining the number of offices, or whether they should be for groups or individuals, or even whether it would be better to have ten meeting rooms accommodating fifty people each or two rooms accommodating three hundred. Nor could the students afford to duplicate the facilities.

We decided that the ideal solution would be one in which the office work spaces could be quickly redivided into private spaces or opened up to accommodate groups and that this conversion should not be something that involved technicians or carpenters but rather that the students should be able to move walls themselves and redivide the space. Similarly, the meeting rooms should accommodate several hundred people, but be subdividable. When someone pushed a button, a series of walls could come down and sub-divide a large room into five workable rooms, and instant space changer.

You could not ignore the environment, you could not turn your back on the existing campus, you could not build a structure that would ridicule it, and yet it was the expression of another culture, of another life style and another set of values. As Doug Shadbolt put it, when I told him of this: "When there is social change you must expect that there will be a change in architectural expression."

As designed, it is a complex building with an intricate variety of spaces, small rooms, medium-sized rooms, and very big rooms. There are offices that measure ten by fifteen, private work areas, bookstore, dining halls, a theater, meeting rooms to seat twenty, fifty, a hundred, or seven hundred people. The biggest room is a hundred by a hundred feet of column-free space — a hundred times bigger than the smallest room.

This quality of setting the generic qualities through the "space-maker" extended itself to every aspect of the building: its form made a stair and terraces on the outside surface, it made a place for planting; in combination it formed not only efficient space structures but also a network for the distribution of mechanical services and a repetitive heating-cooling system, it formed continuous hollow vertical spaces for shafts containing escape stairs, elevators, and other services.

But it also raised an interesting question of scale. If one was building a total campus, would it not be almost like a forest of leaves without trunks and branches? I think the answer is "No." As the scale of construction increased to encompass the total campus — a small city — so would the number of elements of space-makers, major walkways, services, transportation, horizontal and vertical elevators. Great open meeting places would form a hierarchy, the branches and the stems and leaves all working together, a structure that could be added to, changed, extended.

We all looked forward to seeing the building go up. But then we started to run into problems with the chancellor's office. They resented the decision to include a new dining facility and demolish the existing cafeteria. They questioned our decision to incorporate the book store. They asked how such a design could be accurately priced. They considered the building too "far out." I met the chief architect, Harry Harmon, and went over the plans with him.

He himself was amiable, but I had the feeling that there was some nervousness about the building. The trustees had to approve the schematic design, but for months we couldn't get it on their agenda. Finally, we were told that we could make an off-the-record "pre-schematic" presentation to the trustees, which would be followed a month later by an official meeting for a decision.

The students had prepared their own brochure which they submitted to the trustees. In concluding their report they stated: "By virtue of its setting, by virtue of its uses, and by virtue of the ideals to which we are committed, the building should be designed in an idiom distinctly its own. Such an idiom should be a confident, even powerful language of form, and a language which would translate easily back and forth with the present buildings on the campus. We see the design as an intelligible architectural concept. The architecture is based upon a conviction about methodology and process, and within its own parameters of forms, of engineering, and of visible and articulate harmonies this design will be judged."

In introducing the building they stated: "Other things being equal, we wanted a building which would be composed of various and energetic forms, which would stimulate the most creative uses of it, which would be enhanced by the play of natural light upon it and through it, which would transcend the question of luxury versus utility, which would integrate part to whole, inside to outside, which would be an expression of comprehensive anticipatory design science, that is a building flexible, adaptable, generating new uses as new generations of students come to use it."

The formal presentation to the trustees took place in Los Angeles on one of the state college campuses. I presented the building, again only after insisting that I should, but this time there were formal presentations against the building by the chief architect of the chancellor's office and the state architect from Sacramento. They felt the design was incompatible, technically unresolved, etc. The college president, Robert Smith, made an emotional plea for the building, and the president of the associated students also presented his case. Some amazing comments were heard around the room that day. One trustee commented: "How are you going to get the snipers out of that building?"

All this was happening simultaneously with other conflicts on the campus. Another confrontation was taking place between the college and students on one hand and the trustees on the other. George Murray, a part-time teacher who was also a member of the Black Panthers, was giving militant speeches around San Francisco. The agenda that day included the Murray issue together with the building issue. I think the building was viewed by many as an expression of the independent spirit of San Francisco State. I don't think the building was being judged just as a building, or as a design; it became, as the magazine Revolution later stated, "an important symbol."

The building was rejected five to two. But the college was encouraged to return with more technical information and more detailed cost estimates. I came to the conclusion that the only way to deal with this situation was to get a contractor to make a guaranteed bid on the basis of more detailed drawings. We decided to go ahead with part of the working drawings, at least those which were necessary for obtaining a bid, or of areas about which the trustees expressed concern, such as window details, connections, heating and ventilating, etc. We did some of the preliminary working drawings, then chose two contractors and asked them to look at the job, not just to make estimates, but actually to be prepared to sign a negotiated contract. H. C. Beck, one of the larger U.S. contractors, came up with a price that was within the budget, just over five million dollars, and were willing to sign a contract immediately. We got formal letters from many of the sub-trades: from window manufacturers to the maintenance people who clean windows; from waterproofing people to mechanical suppliers, each saying something to the effect: "Yes, we have examined the drawings and it is technically all right."

TO BE CONCLUDED FRIDAY

By then he had already written his remarkable book Nine Chains to the Moon and by the early fifties had already installed his first of what is now many thousands of Geodesic domes.

atoms there around it. As geodesic spheres get larger than one half mile in diameter, they become floatable cloud structures. If their surfaces were draped with our warily hung polyethylene curtains at night, the sphere and its internal atmosphere would continue to be so light as to remain aloft. Such sky-floating geodesic spheres may be designed to float at preferred altitudes of thousands of feet. The weight of human beings added to such prefabricated "cloud mines" would be relatively negligible. Many thousands of passengers could be housed aboard one mile diameter and larger cloud structures. The passengers could come and go from cloud to cloud, or cloud to ground, as the clouds float around the earth or are anchored to mountain-tops. While the building of such floating clouds is several decades hence, we may foresee that along with these floating tetrahedral cities, air-deliverable sky-serapers, submarine islands, sub-dry surface dwellings, domed-over cities, flyable dwelling machines, rentable, autonomous-living, black boxes, that man may be able to converge and deploy around earth without its depletion.

— R. Buckminster Fuller

Formula for a Floating City: To shelter concepts such as the Dymaxion House and the Geodesic Dome now must be added an even more ambitious design—a floating tetrahedral city.

"We have learned that the most stable structure is the tetrahedron," he says. "Following this design-science clue, we find that a tetrahedral city, to house a million people, is both economically and technologically feasible. Such a vertical tetrahedral city can be constructed so that all of its 300,000 families have balconied outside apartments. All of the organic operative machinery can be housed within the tetrahedron.

requirements using atomic reactors. The by-product of heat from these reactors will be used to desalinate water supplies."

Tetrahedrons are unique geometrical, he explains, in that they may be added to on every one of their four equilateral triangle faces and increased symmetrically in size by additions to any one of the faces. Thus the cities can begin with a program for a thousand occupants and grow to hold millions without changing their shape.

"Salvage of materials from obsolete buildings on the land can produce enough of these floating cities to have relays of them in various sizes around the oceans of the earth, at distances negotiable by relatively small boats such as those that operate between the Florida coast and the Bahamas. This will allow new habitation possibilities on that three-fourths of the earth's surface that is covered by water. It also will permit mid-ocean cargo transfer within the cities' calm harbors, extraordinarily increasing the efficiency of distribution of the world's raw and finished materials as well as aiding passenger traffic."

Is a tetrahedral city, like many other Buckminster Fuller concepts, too advanced to win adherents in our time? The Japanese, he reports, already are interested in trying the concept, and a pilot-scale model may be built in Japan.

Indians must keep culture and learn from whiteman

By PHILINDA MASTERS
 "We Indians are seriously thinking of establishing our own anthropological study of the white man," Chief Andrew Rickard closed, sarcastically, after speaking to a packed lecture hall at New College on Monday. He was speaking on the problems of Indians in white society, and what the Union of Ontario Indians is trying to do about it.

The major objectives of the Union, as Chief Rickard outlined them, are: to protect treaties and treaty rights; to preserve Indian tradition through education; to improve communications between Indian communities and with the outside world; to provide a liaison with religious authorities. ("Although sometimes I wonder about that!" Rickard remarked); and to promote respect for Indians and protect them from injustices.

While Rickard recognizes the need for financial aid from the government, as "compensation for illegal seizure of our land," he sees the problem as a much deeper one.

To improve the Indian way of life, attention must be paid to economical depression and unemployment along with social problems, he said.

The most important thing according to Rickard is that Indians retain their culture, "since it's the only culture left. A basic Indian concept is that of sharing, which doesn't correspond to your materialistic concepts."

The hippies are trying to live this concept, he added, "but unfortunately are going about it the wrong way."

Rickard dislikes the word 'assimilate' which he thinks means to "dissolve the Indian way of life," but he admits that Indians must adopt some white culture in order to survive.

"Most Indians are willing to compromise, but some of them have been brainwashed into thinking they have no culture and no existence as an Indian," commented Rickard.

The Union is trying to foster education at the local level, so that young Indians, ironically, will be exposed to their own languages, legends and traditions; and Rickard hopes Indian education will spread across the province.

Rickard's attitude towards the Department of Indian Affairs, is that his people should co-operate. "We wear different kinds of hats. Sometimes we go to negotiate, and sometimes we go to raise hell."

"There is no point in infiltrating the department and gradually having it taken over by Indians," he said. "We don't want to interpret Indian Affairs the way it is done today. We shouldn't just replace the people in the old bureaucratic system."

Instead, the Union is starting from scratch and doing things its own way. It is not likely to use Indians as objects to be studied, for instance, as the white man has done.

"Indians are fed up with being studied, so they are hesitant to be part of research even by their own people."

Anti-parity petition gets support of 602 A & S members

The anti-parity petition quietly circulated, last month among conservative faculty members surfaced yesterday, signed by 602 faculty members.

Drawn up by the Committee of Concerned Faculty, the petition calls on faculty members to play "the determining role" in the business of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science and stands for "faculty control" of departments.

The petition rejects any direct student voice in matters of hiring, tenure, promotion and dismissal. It also calls for the "formal evaluation of students" to be under complete faculty control."

Rohmer expansive in describing Canada's north

By TONY USHER

Richard Rohmer, prominent Toronto lawyer and chairman of the Mid-Canada Development Foundation, sang the praises of northern development at U of T last night.

Rohmer, active in the Ontario Progressive Conservative party, has also recently been appointed chairman of the Royal Commission on Publishing.

Carefully qualifying his remarks so as not to sound too expansive, Rohmer portrayed for the audience of about 100, a continent-wide region of vast resources, mostly unexploited, with a climate "perfectly acceptable to the people of Canada South."

The Foundation's idea of an integrated development plan for Canada's "near-north" mining and forest area, was first publicized by Rohmer in 1967 and has since been bolstered by a Mid-Canada Development Conference held in Thunder Bay in 1969.

This vision of massive northern development bears more than passing resemblance to previous schemes, many of which placed thousands of people on farms or in northern communities of dubious and insecure viability, and which committed governments to extravagant and unnecessary works projects.

Rohmer was aware of these pitfalls and emphasized that his foundation exists simply as a research body to assess Mid-Canada's needs and resources.

He advocated the creation of an independent agency by federal and provincial governments and private enterprise to oversee the development of the "near north" region.

Rohmer's expansiveness was marred only once, by a question about the bankruptcy of Churchill

Forest Industries. He acknowledged that "this kind of thing does not speak well for the Mid-Canada sector."

CFI was recently expropriated by the Manitoba government after going into receivership. The massive foreign-owned project at The Pas in northern Manitoba was largely subsidized by public funds.

Rohmer sprinkled his remarks with nationalist sentiments. To a question about North American society, he responded, "I don't think I want to be included in that package." He also ventured, "In Canada we have some of the best brains in the world."

At the same time he attacked Canadians as "one of the most regional, parochial people on the face of the earth. Something is going to change. Someone is going to articulate a national purpose."

Waterloo grabs hockey spot

Guelph (Staff) — The University of Waterloo Warriors moved into sole possession of first place in the red hot Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association hockey race here last night with a 2-0 whitewashing of the Guelph University Gryphons.

The Warriors, perennial runners-up to the University of Toronto Varsity Blues for Western Division honors, jumped two points ahead of the idle Varsity team.

Blues, winners of five straight OQAA crowns and four Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union titles in that period, get a chance to remake that deadlock tonight when they host the McMaster University Marlin's at Varsity Arena. The Warriors, however, hold two games in hand on Blues.

The victory was the Warriors' tenth in eleven league starts, their only loss a 5-3 decision to Blues December 9th at Varsity Arena.

The Waterloo team is coached by Bob McKillop, star performer of the Kitchener Panthers of the Ontario Inter-County Baseball League.

For the Gryphons, who were the architects of Blues' third league loss a week ago, the defeat brought their league record to four victories, seven losses and a single tie.

The top two teams in both the OQAA Western and Eastern sections meet in a playoff tournament in Ottawa February 26 and 27. The winner of that tourney then advances to the CIAU finals at Laurentian University in Sudbury March 11, 12 and 13.

22% have job offers, centre says

Only 22 per cent of students interviewed by U of T's Placement Centre have had firm job offers, according to interim results of a telephone poll by the centre.

So far, 500 of the 834 students interviewed have been contacted in the poll. Most are seeking permanent employment.

In Engineering, only 29 per cent of those interviewed have found employment. Placement Centre director David Curry estimates that last year at this time, 60 per cent of the engineers interviewed were set up.

The winners in the student job bingo are commerce students, almost all of whom have landed offers.

The centre's poll, which will be completed some time this week, will be followed by one four weeks later to check on students with tentative job offers.

Disappointing and silly films make Renaissance '71 competition drab

By BILL MACVICAR

There were a few colourful splashes in otherwise drab programs of Renaissance '71's film competition Sunday and Monday. P. W. Lee's Pinball was a delightful career through a Penny Arcade, and R. K. Rigelhof's Laser was a tangle of neon vermicelli pulsating to the Beatles' (remember?) A Day in the Life.

Flights of Frenzy by Anderson and Lock was an imaginative piece about a boy playing with toy tanks and soldiers which, in close-up, metamorphose into Viet Nam newsreels. Their Base Tranquility, etched directly on film, had a vivid, vibrating quality.

The documentaries were a disappointment, tending to lack a consistent filmic style, sometimes even a viewpoint. Rochdale College 1970 tried to make a case for the controversial experiment and was bold enough to film an actual, very perplexed meeting. An earnest young girl said "If (Rochdale) succeeds, it will be something... greater than anybody has ever done before." That inadvertent sweeping away of five thousand years of civilization told more about the experiment than all the PR in the film.

It is only fair, in judging the narrative and abstract films, to ignore content altogether, so silly was it. (Rather surprisingly so — the makers would instantly recognize how bogus the narrations were if they were playing on Yonge Street for $2.50). Book of Ambivalence had some visually adroit scenes: a slow motion squash game, shots in a mirror, a toaster.

The Two Friends and Wolf Lanigan's Death attempted costume drama; it was unfortunately unclear whether or not the latter was tongue-in-cheek. Lloyd Chelsey, who also appeared in Caught Fishing, has a real flair for silent acting.

A few final, and hopefully helpful, carps: an overloud or fuzzy sound track can totally overwhelm an otherwise creditable film; and certainly the documentaries can find another musical backdrop than boobly-boobly Bach; the titles and credits were unprofessionally (illegibly) hand-lettered, or badly arranged — Rochdale College was the only one that showed attention to its credits; and there was just too much inane detail (close-ups of nostrils or ears, etc.), although Vacuum had some good use of detail.

Sunday's Renaissance '71 happenings centred around an informal gathering of about sixteen people in Vic's Wymilwood Music Room to listen to the poetry of Eli Mandel and Miriam Waddington.

Each poet talked a little about her work — the poem, the experience and the experience of writing poetry. Miriam Waddington, author of six books (among them, Call Them Canadians), is also a professor of English at York University.

The most magnetic poem of the afternoon, by Eli Mandel, was An Elegy for Jimi Hendrix and Janis Joplin which described Hendrix and Joplin as artists, as symbols really. They like so many artists become their art, and by being embodied, are destroyed.

On Byron and Baudelaire:

"Both found themselves rejected; both chose solitude purposely so that it should not be inflicted by others. Both felt unique. Both appearing to live, love and participate, refused themselves to others. Their pride fed on itself. Their sensibility rejected the natural in all its forms, eschewed immediacy. Their problem was to intensify awareness of themselves without the contrast of others."

It is strange, how Joplin and Hendrix, each in their own way, in our time, faced the human soul and found it utterly alone.

By Judy Keeler

He tells people they are God

Edward English, Toronto-based poet, will give a reading of his work Friday, February 12, at noon in the Terrace Room of Victoria College.

English, 55, has been described by Guerilla as a "spode poet who flits from country to country like some sort of chocolate ghost and tells people that they are God and generally blows their minds a bit before moving on to Timbuktu or Homburg or wherever his essentially religious trip takes him."

That will do until you see him. English's reading, likely not his last in these year hills, will be part of the Renaissance '71 program.

Renaissance replies

Playwright Thomas accused of lies, exaggerations, insinuations

By ALEXANDRA MERCER

Nothing seems to make more enticing copy than lies. I shouldn't have been surprised that the Varsity could dedicate a half page to a piece of smut ("How I overcame my fear of Renaissance officials") written by Justin Thomas.

Justin fabricated a telephone conversation, attributed words to people who did not speak them, and turned truths into half truths, exaggerations and insinuations.

A brief discussion with Justin discloses the fact that he is in a sorry psychological and emotional state. One pities such people, but one does not take them seriously.

The fact that the Varsity assumed that he had something valid to say sends shivers of fear up my spine. Are these the kinds of people that our press looks for and encourages? The printed word has great power over people's minds, a power which I thought carried a responsibility to find out exactly what the hell is going on and make people aware of it.

The Renaissance organization made the mistake of being too kind to Justin and thus bestowing upon him a credibility which he did not, and does not have. This treatment, of course, encouraged his illness. In essence, we did neither ourselves or him a favour.

Many people have now been misled to see his "play", which indeed is not a play.

"It is a piece of self-aggrandizing drivel," according to one viewer. Justin bores the audience by talking about himself for two hours. My childhood was not exactly Disneyland either, but one does not use them as a tool for demanding people's attention.

We decided to use Justin in the Renaissance programme, albeit grudgingly, so that our audiences could at least make a firm statement on what they did not want to see in a theatre. However, we owe an apology to that portion of our audience which did not take too kindly to our logic for giving Justin room on the Renaissance programme.

Certainly there is enough substantial Drama in the Renaissance programme to offset the negative impressions which Justin's "Theatric" leave.

Bureaucratically, the Renaissance organization did have problems with Justin. He insisted that it was impinging on his artistic freedom if we read his "script" — which I shortly discovered was non-existent.

There is also the time wasted assuring people that both I and the Renaissance staff have not departed or been removed as Justin claimed in his Varsity article. Justin has been a slight headache and waste of time for all involved: the Renaissance organization, The Varsity, and the campus.

W. H. AUDEN

Fencers win OQAA semi-finals; set to defend crown in finals

Varsity's defending OQAA championship fencing team took another step towards a successful defence of their crown last Saturday when they won the Western Division tournament at Waterloo.

Blues will now meet the Eastern Division winner (as yet unknown) in Montreal February 20 in the finals.

Toronto and Windsor fencers dominated the individual standings while in team totals, McMaster provided Blues with their toughest opposition.

Helmut Mieroy and Rowland Griffin finished one-two in the epee individual standings while Vladimir Gettler was sixth. In the foil, Oscar Wong took third behind two competitors from Windsor while Finn Matheson gave his best to take fifth spot.

The sabreurs, meanwhile, felt that the President had, at least, a subconscious edge against Toronto but David Brown still finished fourth and Andrew Benyei eighth.

The top three in each weapon travel to McGill for the finals.

Toronto's first action Saturday was against Mac, where Blues emerged victorious by a narrow 14-13 bout margin in an exciting duel. Mac's strength at foil and sabre was offset by Varsity's overpowering epee squad (foil, 3-6; sabre, 2-7 and epee, 9-0).

Windsor resisted briefly but collapsed 6-3 to the sabreurs and 9-0 to the epeeists. The foilists were just edged 4-5 and Oscar Wong beat the individual foil champion, Bruno Ciccotti, 5-2ip.

Finally, the Western team were dismissed 20-7 with the sabre team avenging their impressions of previous injustice six bouts to three.

This great team victory depended on the outstanding performances of Brown (sabre), Wong (foil) and the steady controlled fencing of the remainder of the team, Vladimir Hachinski, Michael Kerwin and Mark Taylor.

Nine-bout boxing card tonight at Hart House

A nine-bout card of exhibition boxing featuring Varsity team members, boxers from the Bramalea and Centennial College teams and playground bouts is slated for tonight's Athletic Night at Hart House.

Varsity team members Pat and Des Glynn, John Byrnes, Bob Maton, Jim Gorsline and Kevin Cavanagh will all see action. Their bouts are a last tune-up before meeting RMC for the intercollegiate championship of February 20.

In the last encounter on January 30, only Maton defeated his RMC opponent.

Coach Tony Canzano describes Corsline as a very promising novice, weighing 147 pounds. Gorsline was sidelined by flu last month before his RMC bout.

Novices Stephen Clark (UC) and Niels Carl (Forestry) will also see action.

Group seeks 'rules to games'

The Urban Workshop in the Department of Sociology is trying to ascertain "the rules of the games" in everyday life.

They are interested in the "unwritten" and real rather than the shadows of morality which we often pretentiously cling to. In an age of soul-searching for a common code of action and non-action they are asking the Toronto community to suggest to them their ideas as to what the "unwritten rules" actually are.

Specified areas of interest to them are: a) the university, b) being with friends, c) behaviour in public places such as the streets, subways, elevators, etc.

Interested persons are asked to submit their ideas, "however trivial, silly or obvious they may seem." They maintain, and it seems rightly so, that it is the simple things that rule our lives.

A contribution to their survey will be rewarded by a complete copy of the compiled results. Contributors will remain anonymous.

Mail ideas to: The Urban Workshop, Department of Sociology, University of Toronto, 563 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 179, Ontario.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1971-72 WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24th 1971

This is the fourth year that a revised method of electing the five student representatives to the University of Toronto Athletic Directorate, will be followed. To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 126 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" Collage and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows.

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"

The nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph.

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives under the Athletic Directorate.

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport"

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at this University meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence, also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner.

This year, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

University of Toronto Athletic Association.

Host Mac swimmers tonight

Swim Blues battle for spots on OQAA team

By PAUL CARSON

Varsity Swim Blues battle McMaster tonight in an apparently meaningless dual meet that ironically could indicate whether Blues will continue their amazing string of ten straight OQAA titles and five straight national CIAU championships.

Blues slaughtered Mac 78-35 earlier in the season, so victory is not really the question. However, as college swimming has become a somewhat peculiar mixture of performances in the pool plus politics in the back room, how Blues win is vitally important.

Varsity can enter 18 swimmers in next weekend's OQAA finals, but as of now there are about 21 swimmers still working out with the team. From this number, about 15 have already qualified for the OQAA events, so that leaves six hodies competing for the three remaining available places.

Coach Robin Campbell has indicated he will select the lucky three on the basis of their times tonight.

"I would prefer what you might call a 'generalist' — someone who could win points for the team in two or three events — rather than a specialist who could produce for sure in only one," Campbell explained yesterday.

Based on dual meet scoring, three second place finishes produce nine points whereas a first, third and fourth are good for only six.

ANOTHER INTERESTING problem at the OQAA level is the concept of "Seed Times" — a technique much like handicapping a horse race — which restricts the entries in some events to the best eighteen swimmers based on times posted during the dual meet season.

In the 1000-yard freestyle and 440-yard individual medley, Blues have several swimmers who can easily make the top eighteen — but they still haven't posted seed times. Tonight could be their last chance.

The pool action gets underway with the annual Interfaculty Meet at 5:30 and several members of intercollegiate team will be competing . . . for the glory of their college of course . . . but on a more practical level, for those all-important seed times.

One feature of the interfac meet will be the 200-yard breaststroke for the McCarty Trophy, won by Varsity co-captain Barry Bowerman since 1968. He'll probably be back to defend against Nick Rottman and perhaps Ross Ballantyne.

THE BLUES-MCMMASTER contest begins at 7:30 and locale is definitely the Hart House Pool, not the Benson Building as reported in Monday's paper.

Theo van Ryn, who was supposed to have "retired" after winning six consecutive CIAU titles in the 50-yard freestyle, has decided to swim for one more year and will compete in his specialty plus likely the freestyle relay as well.

Blues other ranking freestylers, Jim Adams and John Twohig, will also see action, as well as most of Varsity's OQAA team. It should be the best college swimming available on campus this year, and also the last chance to watch Blues in meet conditions before the championships.

POOLTALK . . . Adams and Van Ryn share the OQAA record for the 50 freestyle at 22.2 seconds . . . backstroker Jim Shaw announces he produced a 23.7 in last weekend's big effort in Kingston but modestly demurs to predict a better time in the future . . . diver Alex Lau could make the team with a good showing tonight . . . the OQAA finals are in Kingston Feb. 19 and 20 and the CIAU is in Waterloo Feb. 26 and 27 . . . more on the strange world of OQAA/CIAU swimming politics in Friday's Varsity.

Watt seeks a more consistent performance

By LYNDON LITTLE

Varsity's hot and cold hockey Blues will be out to keep alive their first place hopes alive tonight when they host the fast-improving McMaster Marlins in the Bloor Street Ice Palace at 8:00 p.m.

An injury to left-winger Danny McCann will force coach Tom Watt to once again shuffle his deck of forward combinations.

McCann, who had just worked his way into a full-time spot on a line with Nick Holmes and Mac Hickox, picked up a leg hurt in the second period of Blues' 8-3 victory over Western last Friday night. A possible fracture was first feared but X-rays proved negative and, according to a press communique from trainer Howie Ringham, the injury is now diagnosed as a tendon bruise.

McCann will be off skates for about a week.

Watt will be looking for more consistency from the group that played a sparkling first 20 minutes against the Mustangs but could do no better than to hold their own scoring wise the remainder of the way.

"I'd much rather see us outscore the opposition by a couple of goals each period than really sock them in one frame and then close up shop in the other two," said Watt after practise last night.

Grant Cole will likely get the nod between the pipes.

The Marlins, currently 3-6-2, threw a scare into Blues' main rivals, Waterloo, last Friday night before finally bowing 7-5 in a game played in Hamilton. They have a young team composed mostly of Junior B grads from the Steel City area and have been improving from game to game.

They usually get great goaltending from Garry Inness.

Varsity fans will remember Inness as the chap who frustrated Blues' snipers for two periods when Mac played here January 20th before the proverbial roof finally caved in in the final 20 minutes of the 9-2 shellacking.

Notes: The first game this season between Blues and Mac on December 11 in Hamilton ended in a 6-0 shutout for Varsity. Tom Little was in goal that night . . . In the eastern section of the OQAA hockey, the Carleton Ravens appear to have first place locked up but there is a four-way fight for the second play-off spot between the University of Montreal Carabins, the Laval Saints, the McGill Redmen and the Queen's Gaels . . . Laurentian downed York 3-0 last weekend in the first meeting of the OIAA hockey giants . . . Out west, the U of Manitoba Bisons appear to be the class of the WCIAA with the UBC Thunderbirds a close second.

Three grid stars go in CFL flesh market

Three members of the 1970 Varsity football Blues were selected yesterday in the annual CFL college draft.

Halfback Walt Sehr went to Hamilton Ti-Cats on the second round, split end John Chapman was chosen by B.C. Lions on the fourth round, and versatile receiver Jack Buchan was a seventh-round pick of the Edmonton Eskimos.

Sehr, enrolled in third year at Vic, played both offensively and defensively for Blues this year and was selected to the OQAA all-star squads in both 1968 and 1969. Blues' most versatile back during the past three years, he also specialized in punt and kickoff returns.

Chapman was rated the best split end in the SUFL in 1970, missing a unanimous all-star selection by only one vote. A runaway leader in receptions and passing yardage, he's indicated a desire to play pro ball in any other city than Toronto. He can't get any further away than Vancouver.

Buchan rarely attracted much publicity while performing well at end or flanker, but made several key catches in Blues 26-26 tie with McGill and 27-18 victory over Queens.

Sociology prof deserts lecture

By ERIC MILLS

After threatening and insulting six students not enrolled in his course, assistant professor W. Phillips walked out of his sociology class Wednesday. In a repeat performance of an episode on Monday when a different six students also wishing to hear the lecture attended, Phillips again told the class he would not begin the lecture until the "uninvited guests" left.

This time, however, the "guests" did not leave and attempted to talk to Phillips and the class about why they were being asked to leave. Phillips and most of the class eventually left without hearing the scheduled lecture.

When he came into the class, Phillips immediately strode over to two of the visiting students (the others were sitting in groups of three and one) and said:

"What you do when you want to attend a lecture is to ask the professor in private before the class. Since you haven't asked me, you should leave. If you don't, there will be no lecture."

After repeating this to the other visitors, Phillips said:

"I will ask you to get out.

"I will tell you to get out.

"Either you go or I go."

Asked why he would not lecture, Phillips said "Access to a class is a privileged matter. That is true in any university worth its salt and this university is worth its salt. It's part of academic freedom."

One of the six visitors, explained that he had an ATL card and only wanted to hear the lecture, having no intention of disrupting it in any way. He also said they would not have come if the class had been full (there were about 35 students in the large Sid Smith lecture hall).

Phillips refused to lecture, saying "the principle is more important than you. I don't give a damn about you.

"All you have to do is ask me. My students know this. ("They've been socialized", he had said earlier) If you don't understand, that's a deficiency in your education."

The six students said they felt that they had a right to hear lectures in the university as long as they were not interrupting anyone. They emphasized they had said nothing until well after Phillips had tried to shoo them out.

Phillips disputed this: "When six overgrown children come in, sit down and beg to be noticed" (by sitting in the second and third rows at the side), they form a constraint on a professor, he claimed.

"I have complete discretion in this. I'm telling you what the norm is.

"The lower order often doesn't know what the norm is. Norms are less binding on the great unwashed."

One of the students said he was trying to evaluate the class, since he was thinking of taking sociology next year.

"That's no way to evaluate it" said Phillips, "after coming out of the gutter."

"I came from the same place you did," said David Lloyd (UC III).

"No you didn't", said Phillips.

After some discussion with the class, with everyone who spoke supporting Phillips, most of the class and Phillips left. Some stayed behind to talk with the visitors.

In later interviews, both Wim Kent, assistant to registrar Robin Ross, and Dean Albert Allen of Arts and Science said there was no written rule that students had to obtain a professor's permission before "assessing" his class.

However, they noted that there is an unwritten rule supporting Phillips, but there is some doubt about whether it is enforceable.

First negotiation

Tenants joust with OHC

By BRIAN BANNON

For the first time, striking tenants from Charles St. and the Ontario Housing Corporation have met in an effort to negotiate a settlement for the six-month rent strike deadlock.

In terms of past OHC treatment of tenants the meeting was seen as a qualitative breakthrough by tenants striking for the principle of tenant participation.

The three-month old strike, however, is still in operation. Paul Goyette, OHC director, refused to reconsider his policy of mass eviction of strikers.

The strikers' bargaining committee elected at a mass meeting of tenants in the two Charles St. Married Students Residences, put forth a list of demands at the meeting which stressed tenant control and lowering of rents in recognition of the low incomes of students.

Included in the committee was Chris Trower of the Toronto and District Labour Council who advised students on matters of collective bargaining. Trower acted as arbitrator several times when tempers flared between Mr. Goyette and tenants.

The main demand of the strikers involved proposals which would give tenants an equal basis on which to meet the OHC landlords. These demands included opening of OHC books, a voice in changing leases, tenant right to hire management, and representation on the board of directors. Goyette displayed a conciliatory attitude to all of these demands.

One contention of the tenants was that an advisory committee of four tenants and four managers (including University officials), which was created in 1969 should be given power over financial decisions.

Wayne Roberts, president of the Tenants' Association, promised to send Goyette a formal copy of the demands through legal channels.

When asked if they would abandon the rent strike, the tenants refused on the grounds that their only power to gain a hearing lay in withholding rent. Goyette, in turn, refused to abandon eviction proceedings.

But the two sides did agree to meet again "It's a beginning," Roberts said.

Missing prof inspires class cooperative coup

In an attempt to provide adequate teaching, students in a sociology statistics class are trying to introduce co-operative student-run lectures.

The student proposal presented to SOC 201 lecturer J. Wilkins followed a decision Monday in the class to replace the scheduled test with a co-operative lecture.

The student coup in the Monday class resulted from the failure of Wilkins to turn up and administer the weekly test. When his secretary arrived instead with the test, students rebelled and voted to hold the co-operative lecture.

Using the test as a basis, students discussed questions and tried to work out unfamiliar concepts in the course, although several left the room to write the required test.

The complaints centre around inadequate lectures and tutorials in the course. Only one two-hour lecture is held every week, and most of this is taken up by the test.

After reading week the class will decide whether or not to hold co-operative lectures.

Wilkins said yesterday that he is willing to go along with any decision the class makes, as to which periods to use as co-operative, and which as testing. He noted that to his mind, some form of test was mandatory.

SOC 201 is a required course for those wishing a "specialist" degree in sociology.

Fanning blames rent

Books cost 17% more at U of T

Frequent complaints about high costs at the U of T Bookstores are borne out by research done by two graduate students.

Hiko Shima and Tsong-Yuan Lin did some checking on their own of 25 required sociology and anthropology hardcovers and paperbacks. The Canadian equivalent of the original list prices was $86.02 total, and the 25 books cost $89.95 at the University of Calgary bookstore.

At U of T the books cost $105.15, 22 percent more than list and 17 percent more than U of C. The students found the difference on hardbounds higher than that on paperbacks.

When these results were presented to bookstores manager Charles Fanning, he and his secretary spent the day verifying their accuracy. Four of the texts were out of stock. Fanning also sent a $25 wire to Calgary to check prices there.

The U of T Bookstores operate on a non-profit basis as a division of the U of T Press, but receive no subsidy from the administration.

Unlike other student services on campus, the bookstores must pay $25,000 annual rent to Simcoe Hall on the textbook store building and they must cover all salaries, overhead and advertising, said Fanning. Special discounts to faculty were discontinued this year and the only discounts offered are five percent for cash payments on hardcovers.

The Credit Union loan: We give you back some of the interest you pay. Try that on your bank manager.

Watch the poor guy come apart at the seams. He's probably not even aware of how a Credit Union loan works.

These are the facts. An initial share account deposit of $5.00 makes you a member of the U of T Credit Union. With $25.00 on deposit, you can apply for a loan of up to $5,000 more.

Interest is 1% per month on the unpaid balance of your life-insured loan.[†]

However, at the next annual meeting of your Credit Union, the Directors may propose a rebate on interest paid by borrowers in good standing. You'll vote on it. We can't guarantee the rebate. It depends on how things go for the Credit Union. Rebate for 1970-10%*, making simple annual interest 11%.

This year, you can also get a Line of Credit. Qualify and you can help yourself to as much as $750 with no formalities, any time you need it.

With payroll deductions for your loan paybacks and your savings, you don't even have to worry about niggling details.

The U of T Credit Union is sort of a financial commune, chartered and supervised by the Ontario Government. We belong to a federation of 5.5 million Canadians, with total savings of $3,590,000,000.

Competence not criticized

Globe fires reporter for political views

By ERIC RUMP

Tony Seed, an ex-reporter for the Toronto Globe and Mail newspaper, will be today holding a press conference at U of T to denounce his firing by the Globe this Tuesday.

Seed is a supporter of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist), and voiced opposition to a specific editorial published by the Globe. He attended two press conferences and a meeting held to protest the editorial and Globe and Mail editorial policy.

SEED WAS A GENERAL NEWS REPORTER who worked for the Globe for 1½ years. The quality of his work is not in question. In fact, the week preceding his firing, Globe editors advised him that if he submitted a series of articles he wrote last year on the Unemployment Insurance Commission they stood a good chance of winning a National Newspaper Award.

Seed, 25, was fired for his political views.

A memorandum handed to him Wednesday by managing editor C. W. Davey stated: "This will confirm our conversation of last night resulting in your dismissal for cause and particularly for your stated support for the campaign to organize against the standards of fascist papers like The Globe and Mail."

The press conference, to be held in the Pendares Lounge of the International Students Centre at 12:30, is the third of a series sponsored by the Shpikula-Biley-Cruise Defence Committee under the general theme "Who Are The Real Criminals in Canada".

Both Seed, and Barbara Biley, the committee's chairman and chairman of the Canadian Student Movement, will be speaking on the topic "Who Is Tony Seed? What Was His Crime?"

THE COMMITTEE WAS FORMED TO PROTEST a Globe and Mail editorial published Jan. 27 which led with the sentence "Robert Allen Cruise, 28, is a petty criminal" and referred to "Maoist and FLQ psychos."

The committee contends that the editorial was a character assassination of Cruise, arrested Aug. 19 in a Progressive Books and Periodicals Ltd. bookstore in Hamilton, of any Canadian who takes a political stand against U.S. imperialism. In 1970, there were 120 arrests of 70 Communists across the country.

An invitation being circulated for today's meeting notes that the Globe and Mail had refused to attend a Feb. 1 press conference on the topic "Is Robert A. Cruise a Petty Criminal" and a second conference held last Friday on the topic "The Globe and Mail is a Fascist Newspaper." The speaker was Barbara Biley, herself out of jail on appeal bail after being sentenced to 9 months for obstructing a police raid on a Gerrard Street West branch of Progressive Books in December.

But Seed did attend.

On Tuesday, Seed said he was called on the carpet shortly after getting to work and asked by Davey whether or not he supported what Barbara Biley was saying about the Globe, and whether or not he had attended a third meeting Feb. 6 on the topic "How to organize against the slanders of fascist newspapers like the Globe and Mail."

"I TOLD HIM THAT I WAS PROUD to support what Barbara was saying about the Globe, that I had fundamental disagreement with the Jan. 27 editorial and that it was a form of revived McCarthyism."

"And I said that I had attended the meeting and there was nothing wrong with that."

At the same time, he added, Davey was counterpointing his questions about Seed's support for what Barbara Biley was saying with statements that the Globe just couldn't have anyone working on the staff "who was denigrating his own newspaper."

Seed said that he asked Davey what was new because he had always been quite open about his politics — that he supported anti-imperialist revolution — not only outside the Globe but inside the newsroom as well.

"I TOLD HIM THAT I HAVE A RIGHT to my views about the Globe's editorial position, that concoction of lies, slander, character assassination, anti-communism, etc. are the basis of fascism, that after first creating a hysteria among the people about Communists as "criminals" and "psychos", then dictatorship is applied against the working class, and that you can only fight it by taking a stand."

"And I asked him to justify the editorial on the basis of truth, what is right and just, which he wouldn't, or couldn't do."

When Davey continued on about dismissing Seed on the spot that night — "he said you can clear out your desk and pick up your cheque tomorrow" — Seed said that he told him that "he was being anti-democratic. This isn't new at the Globe: other reporters have been harassed for their politics. Seed told Davey that he was making a serious mistake.

"He just jumped. What kind of mistake," he asked me. I just told him that it was a serious mistake to think that he could fire somebody for their political ideas, that it isn't right, that you don't get away with that sort of thing anymore, and that he was simply afraid."

"AFRAID OF WHAT?" he asked me. "Afraid of people like Barbara Biley going around and saying that the Globe is a fascist newspaper."

"Davey even said at one point that I wasn't being fired for my political ideas, but that is why I am being sacked." Seed concludes, "because of what she is saying and my support for her."

"Davey said I was actively campaigning against the Globe and Mail I told him that whether or not I was before, I would certainly campaign against the Globe, for freedom to criticize, from now on."

"If the Globe and Mail will not tell the truth, then I will tell the truth."

Asked about what stand his union, the American Newspaper Guild was taking, Seed said that "so far" they've indicated they would grieve. "They have to take a position. It's a dangerous precedent for journalists."

Besides Barbara Biley, Cruise is serving an 18-month sentence in the Guelph Reformatory and Bill Shpikula is serving 2½ years in the P. I. Federal Penitentiary after being arrested in Vancouver while he was distributing Maoist pamphlets.

SAC may withdraw discipline review reps

Stalemate over demonstrations

By ART MOSES

The Students Administrative Council may withdraw its representatives from the committee re-vamping U of T's discipline machinery.

The moves comes 18 months after the Implementation Committee began deliberating on ways to put into effect the Campbell Report on campus discipline published in October of 1969.

Faculty have been adamant in opposing the meat of the Campbell report causing a total stalemate on the committee for 1½ years.

"There are two crunch points," SAC representative Michael Scherk (UC IV) told the SAC executive Wednesday night, "the sections on the classroom and demonstrations."

The Campbell Report called for co-operation in the classroom whereby students and faculty would have to reach "operational agreement" on course content and procedures. Any disputes would go before a student-faculty mediation committee.

"The faculty's line on the committee has been that nobody can tell the teacher how to run the classroom," said Wayne Hankey (SGS), another SAC representative.

At last week's meeting students proposed a compromise whereby students could appeal classroom disputes to a dean or departmental chairman and his decision might further be appealed to the departmental council.

Students were willing to drop the idea of special mediation committees. But the faculty refused to allow appeals to go past the deans to departmental councils. Hankey pointed out appeals to deans are possible now anyway.

"So after four months of discussing this question we have reached the great accomplishment of enshrining into university law the status quo." Hankey told the SAC executive.

The Faculty's hard line has been guided and led by conservative law professor Stanley Schiff, who is also on the presidential search committee.

The committee has recently not even touched the contentious issue of disruptions, due to its deadlock on the classroom question. The Campbell Report says that since "disruptive demonstrations" may be justified, negotiations should be directed as much to their cause as to their alleged disruptiveness, and that force should be used only as a last resort.

A student walk out from the committee would probably mean the end to hopes for any implementation of the Campbell Report. As Hankey pointed out it is impossible to acquiesce in establishing a new court system in the university unless there is agreement on the principles that system is adjudicating.

The Implementation Committee is a parity body containing five faculty, three SAC appointees and one appointee each from the Graduate Students Union and the Association Part Time Students

Scarboro snacks as democracy births dictatorship

By DOUG HAMILTON

A mass-meeting to discuss replacing the Scarborough College Student Society with a non-elected directorate was ignored by munching students in Scarborough's cafeteria, Wednesday.

The directorate was proposed by SAC representative Bob Stewart.

Stewart reiterated that the SCSS like many student councils had failed. He said "student activism is on its way out", and that the "age of participatory democracy has passed."

Stewart described his proposal to Scarborough's unconcerned cafeteria crowd as "a new type of government" which will be "different than any type of student government" ever established.

Stewart asserted that his recommendation to dissolve the present student council "might frighten some people". He conceded that the concept of the directorate could be construed as a "dictatorship."

David Onley, Stewart's opponent in the debate called for "large scale reform" of the current democratic constitution, and "improved communication within the College." Onley denied that Scarborough students were apathetic.

Neither Stewart nor Onley could get the attention of the audience — students ignored them both, and continued eating, talking, and playing cards.

It is obvious from the reception which Stewart and Onley received that the vast majority of students at Scarborough College do not care what happens to the SCSS nor the $30,000 budget which it administers.

A concerned second year student, Phil Weir, described the prevalent attitude of students who were present at the meeting. He said bitterly, "the Student Society is trying to do something . . . but no one cares. The flunkies out here will rot in their own apathy and disinterest."

If Scarborough College students do not protest, Stewart's proposed dictatorship will be implemented. The verdict to accept the directorate will finally be decided at the next meeting of the Student Society.

All students at the College are allowed to vote on matters not involving expenditures, and it will be the last chance to preserve a democratic council.

No aid in abortion fight: U of T

U of T has refused to take a lead in pressuring for the repeal of abortion laws

In a letter replying to a Feb. 3 demonstration demanding U of T state its position on abortion, President Claude Bissell claimed that "the university does obviously serve as a forum for discussion of this and other problems, and by that means contributes to change in existing legislation."

Bissell also refused to allow the U of T Health Service to set up an abortion clinic, noting that this would be "outside present University policy."

He advised that students wishing a change in this policy bring the matter before one of U of T's newer additions to the committee family — the Presidential Advisory Committee on Social Responsibilities (Internal).

But his letter was pessimistic about a policy change, noting that "the Health Service is very strictly limited in the kinds of service it can offer."

Saturday an abortion march in Ottawa hopes to attract thousands of concerned marchers. Buses leave 188 Adelaide St. W. (and University north of King) at 7 a.m. tomorrow. Costs are $8 for students and unemployed and $10 for other people. Daycare will be provided for those wishing to leave their children in Toronto.

Demonstrators will march to Parliament Hill and return the same night.

Two classes

Two different sociology classes have been thrown into turmoil this week over the behaviour of their professors.

In both cases, the authority of the professor as the guardian of the sanctity of the "learning process" has been challenged.

In Sociology 201, a course entitled "Statistics and Research Methods", students have felt frustrated by a weekly ritual of writing tests based on assigned readings. Since the course only has one lecture period a week, valuable discussion time was taken up under this system.

When the sociology professor in charge of the course, J. Wilkins, failed to show up on Monday (and why should he have bothered, if it was only a test?), but instead sent the text in with his secretary, the students became extremely upset.

After taking a vote, they decided to do away with the test, and devote the period to an open discussion.

To many of those who were there (some did choose to write the test), the experience proved a meaningful and worthwhile adventure in a kind of education not promoted in this university.

While the students accepted the need for some form of regular evaluation, especially in a highly technical course such as their own, they found the emphasis was not satisfying their needs and interests.

Since Monday, students have discussed the issue with their professor and he has agreed to abide by the wishes of the class as to the format the course should follow.

Why did it take so long for the students in Sociology 201 to challenge the structure of their course?

Perhaps one of the answers is that over the past month and a half, arts and science students have gone through a significant collective political experience.

They have seen their aspirations for a full voice in decision-making in their faculty unceremoniously spurned by a solid core of professors who promulgate an authoritarian "master and apprentice" theory of education.

Perhaps many students have realized that, if their goals are to be unrewarded at the highest level of the faculty, they will have to begin to win them at the lowest level — in the classrooms, in their day to day experience.

But the students in Sociology 201 did not challenge the absolute authority of the professor to determine the structure of their course until a day when, by chance, he was absent.

The fact is that simply by virtue of their positions, most professors intimidate their students into a state of acquiescence, complacency and submission.

While many faculty openly deplore the passivity and apparent complacency of students on the other side of their lecterns — and are exploring together with students alternate, co-operative ways of learning, together with others are absolutely unaware of the extent to which they terrorize their students.

Which brings us to the second class of the week. In Sociology 104, as we reported on Wednesday, the professor, W. Phillips, has refused to lecture if he spots any unfamiliar faces in his audience.

On Monday he expelled six sociology students who had ventured to take seats in his lecture hall by proclaiming "If you don't get out, I'll have you thrown out."

On Wednesday, when a different six students turned up to watch him lecture, Phillips spent 20 minutes insulting them and explaining why they had to go.

In the course of doing so, he provided an extremely interesting lesson in the sociology of higher education. These and principles that have been hotly debated over the last half dozen years were dramatically illustrated by Phillips' behaviour.

"It's part of academic freedom," was one of Phillips' claims.

To refuse students the opportunity of sitting in on a lecture is to defend academic freedom? Surely it is the opposite.

But Phillips' stand was even more explicit:

"Access to a class is a privileged matter," he contends, it should be restricted only to those who have duly registered and paid for the privilege.

The basic right in the university is the freedom to information. Students have the right to attend as many classes as they wish to, if they feel they can gain something.

But the implications of Prof. Phillips' behaviour are wider.

One wonders what his reaction might have been had a group of businessmen wandered into his classroom. After all, Phillips' does teach a course in something called "Industrial Society", which they might find of direct relevance.

One also wonders how he might have reacted had a group of factory workers turned up to find out how university professors were explaining "industrial society".

We predict the reactions would be quite different.

Although not enrolled in his course, both groups are directly paying for the university. To argue that if you're not paying for it, then you can't have any, must not apply in a university that has any responsibility either to its own members or to the community at large.

Another failure on Phillips' part is that he completely misunderstands his function in the classroom situation.

By delivering a series of insults at a group of students, calling them "overgrown children", he revealed what he really thinks about the students in his first year class.

It's little wonder none of them dared to speak out and criticize him to his face, once he, singlehandedly, had turned the scene into a confrontation.

Phillips also revealed some of what he thinks about how sociology works.

He pointed out that the students who turned up in his class had not been "socialized" into understanding that first, you must go to the professor and get permission.

"I'm telling you what the norm is," he stressed, when challenged.

We'll bet he tells students what the so-called norm is in other areas as well.

These two classes illustrate the sharp conflict of values which is taking place in the university.

"Any university worth its salt" restricts the right of students to attend classes, according to Phillips.

Any university worth its salt, we say, will not abide any secrecy about its ongoing activities — and that is exactly what Phillips' behaviour amounts to.

The conflicts these cases illustrate are the issues of the structure (how does learning really take place?) and the content (what purpose does the learning serve?) of the university.

Martin Nicolaus' speech on the opposite page gives some rather pointed answers to the second question.

A leading American sociologist, Seymour Martin Lipset, gave vent to different feelings in an article called "Students and Politics."

"A high incidence of intense student political activity is in some sense an indication of the failure of the university . . ."

We think different.

We think that students, acting out of the pressures of their everyday life, can and must change the nature of the university.

The crisis in Sociology:

"It all depends on where you stand"

In these remarks, originally made at the 1968 convention of the American Sociological Association, Martin Nicolaus angrily attacks the main function of sociology in our society — to keep the powerful in full knowledge of the political climate among those they rule. Nicolaus has taught at Simon Fraser University and at San Francisco State College.

In his opening paragraphs, Nicolaus is referring to the previous speaker at the convention, Lyndon Johnson's Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.

THESE REMARKS ARE NOT ADDRESSED to the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. This man has agreed voluntarily to serve as member of a government establishment which is presently fighting a war for survival on two fronts. Imperial wars such as the one against Vietnam are usually two-front wars, one against the foreign subject population, one against the domestic subject population. The Secretary of HEW is a military officer in the domestic front of the war against people. Experience in the Vietnam teach-ins has shown that dialogue between the subject population and its rulers is an exercise in repressive tolerance. It is, in Robert S. Lynd's words, dialogue between chickens and elephants. He holds some power over me; therefore, even if he is wrong in his arguments he is right, even if I'm right, I'm wrong.

I do address myself to the Secretary's audience. There is some hope — even though the hour is very late, — that among the members and sympathizers of the sociological profession gathered here there will be some whose life is not so sold and compromised as to be out of their own control to change or amend it.

WHILE THE OFFICERS of this convention and the previous speakers were having a big meal in the hotel, I was across the street in a cafeteria having a hot dog and two cups of coffee. This may be why my perspective is different.

The ruling elite within your profession is in charge of what is called Health, Education and Welfare. Those of you who listened passively to what he had to say presumably agreed that this definition, this description of what the man did, carried an accurate message.

Yet among you are many, including the hard researchers, who do know better or should know better. The department of which the man is head is more accurately described as the agency which watches over the inequitable distribution of preventable disease, over the funding of domestic propaganda and indoctrination, and over the preservation of a cheap and docile reserve labor force to keep everybody else's wages down. He is Secretary of disease, propaganda and scabbing.

THIS MAY BE PUT TOO STRONGLY for you, for you, but it all depends on where you look from, where you stand. If you stand inside the Sheraton Hotel these terms are offensive, but if you gentlemen and ladies would care to step across the street into Roxbury you might get a different perspective and a different vocabulary.

If you will look at the social world through the eyes of those who are at the bottom of it, through the eyes of your subject population, — and if you will endow those eyes with the same degree of clear-sightedness you profess to encourage among yourselves — then you will get a different conception of the social science to which you are devoted.

That is to say that this assembly here tonight is a kind of lie. It is not a coming-together of those who study and know, or promote study and knowledge of, social reality. It is a conclave of high and low priests, scribes, intellectual valets, and their innocent victims, engaged in the mutual affirmation of a falsehood, in common consecration of a myth.

SOCIOLOGY IS NOT NOW and never has been any kind of objective seeking out of social truth or reality. Historically, the profession is an outgrowth of 19th century European traditionalism and conservatism, wedded to 20th century American corporation liberalism.

That is to say that the eyes of sociologist, with few but honorable (or honorable, but few) exceptions, have been turned downwards, and their palms upwards.

Eyes down, to study the activities of the lower classes, of the subject population — those activities which created problems for the smooth exercise of governmental hegemony.

Since the class of rulers in this society identifies itself as the society itself — in the same way that Davis and Moore in their infamous 1945 propaganda article identified the society with those who run it — therefore the problems of the ruling class get defined as social problems.

The profession has moved beyond the tearjerking stage today, 'social problems' is no longer the preferred term, but the underlying perspective is the same. The things that are sociologically "interesting" are the things that are interesting to those who stand at the top of the mountain and feel the tremors of an earthquake.

SOCIOLOGISTS STAND GUARD in the garrison and report to its masters on the movements of the occupied populace. The more adventurous sociologists don the disguise of the people and go out to mix with the peasants in the "field", returning with books and articles that break the protective secrecy in which a subjugated population wraps itself, and make it more accessible to manipulation and control.

The sociologist as researcher in the employ of his employers is precisely a kind of spy. The proper exercise of the profession is all too often different from the proper exercise of espionage only in the relatively greater electronic sophistication of the latter's techniques.

IS IT AN ACCIDENT that industrial sociology — to name only a few examples here — arose in a context of rising 'labour troubles', that political sociology grew when elections became less predictable, or that the sociology of race relations is now flourishing?

As sociologists you owe your jobs to the union organizers who got heat up, to the voters who got fed up, to the black people who got shot up. Sociology has risen to its present prosperity and eminence on the blood and bones of the poor and oppressed; it owes its prestige in this society to its putative ability to give information and advice to the ruling class of this society about ways and means to keep the people down.

THE PROFESSIONAL EYES of the sociologist are on the down people, and the professional palm of the sociologist is stretched toward the up people. It is no secret and no original discovery to take public note of the fact that the major and dominant sectors of sociology today are sold — computers, codes and questionnaires — to the people who have enough money to afford this ornament, and who see a useful purpose being served by keeping hundreds of intelligent men and women occupied in the pursuit of harmless trivia and/or the streets.

I am not asserting that every individual researcher sells his brain for a bribe — although many of us know of research projects where that has happened, literally — but merely that the dominant structure of the profession, in which all of its members are to some extent socialized is a structure in which service to the ruling class of this society is the highest form of honour and achievement. (The speaker's table today is an illustration.)

The honoured sociologist, the big-status sociologist, the fat-contract sociologist, the jet-set sociologist, the book-a-year sociologist, the sociologist who always wears the livery, the suit and tie, of this masters — this is the type of sociologist who sets the tone and the ethic of the profession, and it is this type of sociologist who is nothing more nor less than a house-servant in the corporate establishment, a white intellectual Uncle Tom not only for this government and ruling class but for any government and ruling class. This explains to my mind why Soviet sociologists and American sociologists are finding after so many years of isolation that, after all, they have something in common.

TO RAISE AND EDUCATE and train generations after generation of the brightest minds of this country's so-called educational system to let them survive in a sociological ethic of servility; to socialize them into this sociocracy, is a criminal undertaking, one of the many felonies against youth committed by those who set themselves up in a loco parentis situation that is usually far more oppressive than any real parental relation.

The crime which graduate schools perpetrate against the minds and morals of young people is all the more inexcusable because of the enormous liberating potential of knowledge about social life. Unlike knowledge about trees and stones, knowledge about people directly affects what we are, what we do, what we may hope for. The corporate rulers in this society would not be spending as much money as they do for knowledge, if knowledge did not confer power.

So far, sociologists have been schlepping this knowledge that confers power along a one-way chain, taking knowledge from the people, giving knowledge to the rulers.

WHAT IF THAT MACHINERY were reversed? What if the habits, problems, secrets and unconscious motivations of the wealthy and powerful were daily scrutinized by a thousand systematic researchers, were hourly tried-into, analysed and cross-referenced tabulated and published in a hundred inexpensive mass-circulation journals and written so that even the fifteen-year old high school drop out could understand it and predict the actions of his landlord, manipulate and control him.

Would the war in Vietnam have been possible if the structure function and motion of the U.S. imperial establishment had been a matter of detailed public knowledge ten years ago?

Sociology has worked to create and increase the inequitable distribution of knowledge; it has worked to make the power structure relatively more powerful and knowledgeable, and thereby to make the subject population relatively more impotent and ignorant.

In the late summer of 1968, while the political party currently in power in convening amidst barbed wire and armored cars, the sociological profession ought to consider itself especially graced and blessed that its own deliberations can still be carried on with a police-to-participant ratio smaller than one-to-one. This may be because the people of the USA do not know how much of their current troubles stem — to borrow Lord Keynes' phrase — from the almost forgotten scribbles of an obscure professor of sociology. Or it may be that sociology is still so crude that it represents no clear and present danger.

IN 1968 IT IS LATE, very late, too late, to say once again what Robert S. Lynd and C. Wright Mills and hundreds of others have long said that the profession must reform itself. In view of the forces and the money that stand behind sociology as an exercise in intellectual servility it is unrealistic to expect the body of the profession to make an about-face.

It and when the barbed wire goes up around the ASA convention in a future year, most of its members will still not know why.

Knowledge is power. What knowledge? Whose power?

Class taken over by students in Sociology 201

It's when you have to request permission to participate in your own lectures that it becomes evident that professors believe that their opinions of what should be taught and how it should be taught take priority over those of the students.

A case in point is SOC 201, where students had long complained to the professor and his assistants about what they consider to be an ineffective system of teaching statistics.

For example, weekly tests are given to force students to study material in the book, and although weekly tests are better than major term tests, they must be based on adequate in — class teaching and discussion of the basic concepts of the material. When the statistics course hadn't provided this basic need, the weekly tests became a round of Monday morning cramming, noon hour gension, and afternoon regurgitation.

Because this system was so useless, frustration finally prevailed and the class was taken over by the students. In the professor's absence a very successful co-operative lecture led by a few students and participated in by many was held after a vote showing the support of the great majority of the class. A decision was made to cancel the test and use it as a basis for the discussion.

The atmosphere of enthusiasm in the co-operative lecture — as opposed to the usual low attendance and low interest in the professor's lectures — seems to indicate not only a feeling of relief at not having to write a test based solely on the unexplained required readings, but also a high motivation to really understand this material and material that had previously been skimmed over.

In order to keep on holding these co-operative lectures students approached the professor to keep from feeling threatened by students taking over a course which has proved unsuccessful to date.

After reading week, the class is going to be asked to decide whether they wish to continue co-operative lectures in addition to the regular tests. It is hoped that if they decide to do this, they will also back up this decision with participation in making this learning experiment work.

Celebration of a normal day

re: your Bissel story. When I awoke I was somewhere else.

It was February 10 about 4:45 p.m. that I saw a Rolls Royce (licence 141-354) scratch its side while trying to park at Hart House.

It was the day after an earthquake in California and of the 2 a.m. eclipse of the Moon and Buckminster Fuller was to panel truck right here in U of T. Cold-clear beautiful day. A few days earlier the Rolls Royce Co. had gone into receivership and perhaps the driver was responding to the newly diminished status Rolls Royce owners must now experience in the ownership and use of a 12 to 40 thousand dollar limousine . . . but maybe he was just a shitty driver I dunno.

It could also have been one of those rare isolated and unrelated random events that are only related in that feature of being random and unrelated . . . the I doubt it . . . Dave had arranged to distribute some of 19,000 copies of his paper which had a cover review of Claude Bissel and evocative photos of people who fly with wings, people who fly in Buckminster Fuller floating-in-the-sky-domes, and Superman! Circuses, picnics and a creative extremist Buckminster Fuller poster.

The Bissel story was particularly kind to Bissel while not failing to point out the contradictions of his role and behaviour. Incisively using the important questions: "What kind of culture?" and "Culture for whom?" cleverly repeating them to multiply their force a few paragraphs later . . . "culture for whom?" and "what kind of culture?" all to reveal the existing and viciously destructive class nature of the present university environment.

We are writing to celebrate this day and say thankyou to all who participated in it. Thankyouall.

Thank you.
regards, yrs truly

Compleat Relief!

Sociology 104 students object to "intruders"

We as students of Sociology 104, would like to comment on the article entitled, "Prof can bar students from class: Giffen" (Wed. Feb. 10th, Varsity) We feel in an "adequate position" to reflect on Professor Phillips' teaching abilities and methods. We are better qualified in this respect than are the six young men who attempted to sit in on Monday's lecture.

But we do not pretend to be at all qualified as an authority to question or change Prof. Phillips' methods of teaching or content of lectures. We leave that to the people who are paying him.

At all times during lectures we have had ample opportunity to discuss matters with Prof. Phillips, but if we are in total disagreement, then our option is to drop the course.

Any student who is not enrolled in Sociology 104, does not have the right to enter the classroom without permission from the professor. It was overheard that the non-disruptive tactics of the 6 "observers" on Wednesday's lecture were to "make sure he (Phillips) sees you; just keep staring at him."

Acknowledged visitors are certainly welcome, but unpeaceful intruders are not. We don't feel any student has the right to disrupt by any means the lectures that other students are enrolled in and have to pay for. It is Prof. Phillips' right to demand the courtesy of any person not registered in his classes to ask permission to attend them.

We should also like to correct the reported "facts" of the issue from Monday. Contrary to the belief that Prof. Phillips "panicked" at the sight of the six young men, we do not consider that remaining calm, smoking a cigarette, and scaring the shit out of them is any indication of panic. The lecture hall was filled with at least 60 students, rather than the 40 reported.

The article then continued: "Then he used rude language, the kind you wouldn't expect to hear from an academic." We hope the young were not offended by this so-called "rude language" used in their presence. How many degrees are required of a person before what they imply as offensive language is not expected?

And finally, why should we have defended the "outsiders" when by remaining in our class they were disrupting it? We would have "suggested they should leave" even further, removing them physically, if they had not left so obligingly.

The same situation arose in Wednesday's lecture, Feb. 10th at 1:10 p.m. This second group of uninvited guests refused to leave by 1:30 p.m. But this time the class of Sociology 104 reflected their Prof. Phillips' "conservatism", and together, the Professor and class got up and left.

Streamlining power bloc

Parity people redesigning Faculty Council

By TONY USHER

Another small advance on the road to student-staff parity in the U of T was made this week.

The restructuring committee of 15 now meeting has come to tentative agreement on a proposal for a new parity Arts and Science Faculty Council.

If the parity restructuring committee gets its way, the new Council will be more streamlined, more powerful, and more representative than the present council of 1300 faculty which is set out in the U of T Act.

Yesterday the committee of six faculty, six students, and three teaching assistants approved, subject to minor changes in its final reports, a formula of 100 faculty, 100 students, 25 administrators, and 25 teaching assistants.

The new council would have budgetary powers for the first time and extended rights of review of administrative decisions.

The proposal emerged after two weeks of daily meetings, held mostly in the crowded Innis College attic office of committee member Prof. Chris Plowright.

The committee has had to cope with non-recognition by the administration, pressure of time, and occasional friction between its members. Also its membership was expanded from 10 to 15 half-way through its deliberations.

Now the committee faces the problems of gaining public acceptance for its plan, and of circumventing the U of T Act.

The Act defines the membership of Faculty Council as all faculty not including "lecturers and instructors whose appointments are temporary" — and no one else. There is no provision for a Council role in the faculty's finances.

The restructuring group has tentatively agreed upon the following major committees for the new faculty council:

- A budget policy committee which would take over the allocation of funds to departments from a present informal group of department chairmen and Dean A. D. Allen.

- A curriculum committee or committees, as yet undecided, which would provide interdepartmental consultation and communication.

- An interdisciplinary studies committee which would have expanded jurisdiction over the faculty's interdepartmental programmes and spin off new departments in areas such as film and environmental studies.

- Committees responsible for administrative aspects of faculty operation such as timetables, which would be dominated by administrators with some faculty and student representatives. Their decisions would be subject to review on the initiative of Council.

The restructuring committee has not decided what guarantees of representation, if any, should be made for the various estates on Faculty Council committees.

However it agreed on several of the finer points of Faculty Council representation.

The bulk of students would be elected on a college basis while faculty would be elected by department. Other faculties such as Applied Science which have teaching relationships with Arts and Science would have an opportunity for student and faculty representation on the Council.

The committee will meet for the last time today to finalize its proposals and plan the writing of its report for presentation after reading week.

Non-parity plan digs for compliant students

By EDEN ANDERSON

Hopes are high among conservative faculty members that the Arts and Science Council "6-2-1" restructuring committee will get off the ground some time during Reading Week.

The nine-member committee to be composed of six faculty, two students and the Dean (or his representative) as chairman, stems from the Nelson-Rist motion passed at the January 19th meeting of the 1300 member Faculty Council.

Originally, student membership on the restructuring committee was to be drawn from the 34 representatives on the General Committee. However, a curt memorandum sent Wednesday by Foulds' office entitled "Amended List" includes the 34 student alternates to the Faculty Council.

Asked if the increase in number of students eligible for the committee resulted from anticipated difficulties in obtaining nominations for the two positions, Foulds replied that there had been a misunderstanding on the part of a member of his staff and that the alternates could run for the positions. He said yesterday that he had forgotten to inquire from his secretary whether any faculty or student nominations to the committee had been received.

Some observers fear that several of the 68 students, many of whom have been uninvolved in the long parity struggle in Arts and Science, will consider sitting on the committee, in direct opposition to some 5,000 of their constituents who voted in favour of the parity principle in the November referendum, and oblivious to more than 4,000 students who voted to strike just 2 weeks ago in support of student-staff parity representation on the Faculty Council.

Foulds confirmed that the "6-2-1" committee will "deal with the matter at hand" with or without student members.

N.S. Tech president is under fire, quits

HALIFAX (CUP) — Following repeated demands from the faculty and students at Nova Scotia Institute of Technology, administration president G. W. Holbrook handed in his resignation this week.

Heavy opposition to Holbrook developed after the dismissal of seven professors. The administration maintained they could not obtain enough funds from the provincial government to cover the salaries of the men and to grant pay increases to other faculty.

Holbrook was accused at a mass rally Feb. 2 of using the seven as a political ploy to obtain additional government grants.

Holbrook tendered his resignation to the Board of Governors on both Feb. 1 and Feb. 2. Both times it was rejected. At a board meeting on Feb. 8, the resignation was accepted at Holbrook's insistence.

The president's resignation was followed the next day by that of the Dean of Engineering, Dr. E. L. Holmes. Although Holmes made no public explanation, he had announced at a student rally that he would accept blame for the decision not to reappoint the seven faculty members.

On Feb. 3, students staged a protest march to Province House to deliver a three point brief to Premier Gerald Regan. The brief contained demands for a change in the pre-engineering programs and the initiation of a four year degree program in engineering. There has been no response as yet.

PC games!

Poor people and tenants will demonstrate at the Progressive Conservative extravaganza today.

The protest is organized by the Metro Action Co-ordinating Executive to protest the Tories' 'fat cat' rule.

The demonstration begins at noon in front of Maple Leaf Gardens, winter home of Ontario Progressives.

Quebec singer Robert Charlebois likes to "put people together."

Not political, just a singer says Charlebois, chanteur Quebecois

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

The language he likes to sing best is "Italian, of course," says Quebecois singer Robert Charlebois. He rhymed off a few verses of an Italian song, then repeated them in French, yesterday afternoon in his room at the Royal York.

He leaned back smiling. Charlebois does not speak Italian.

"I just sing it," he laughed. Of course most of his songs are in French.

Charlebois, 26, one of Quebec's leading pop singers, is a man of dreams. His answers about the Quebec political scene are slow and cautious.

"I couldn't be separatist or federalist, capitalist or communist," he says. "I'm searching: I'm an invader. I put people together... like a plug."

Though a native Quebecois, he does not take a firm stand on Quebec independence.

"I think that separation is absurd in itself. The most important thing in life is others. Just to be someone alone is nowhere," he says. "Freedom is essential."

About his refusal to sing at the Union Nationale leadership conference two years ago, Charlebois says he has "no politics."

"I wouldn't sing for the Parti Quebecois or the federalists or the Maoists."

He calls himself "Mr. Freedom."

"I hope everybody gets free," he adds.

Charlebois' ideas of being free are intermingled with his attitudes toward music. One of the performers in last year's high-priced Festival Express that played in Toronto, Winnipeg and Calgary, he comments that "a festival that sells tickets at $15 shouldn't be called pop."

Unfortunately, Charlebois' concerts have not been as widely received in English Canada as they have in Quebec.

"In Quebec, we have to turn people away, here we have to advertise," Charlebois says regretfully.

He looks forward to breaking into the American pop scene, especially with a new song about to be released that he says "is the greatest idea"; it is patterned after Jimmy Durante's style of singing.

But he still feels he needs "at least four genius songs to send them (Americans) a ladder."

Despite his poor reception in Canada and U.S., Charlebois is a singer of international renown. Just last summer he won the Amber Nightengale award, at the Polish music festival. Among the competition were Joan Baez and singers from Italy, France, and Yugoslavia. Charlebois has himself been warmly received in many western European countries.

Though Charlebois has a 6-man backup group that he calls the "best musicians on earth", what he really likes is the backup of a symphonic orchestra.

"I'd like to sing on ice," he said. He rose and pretended to glide around the floor.

"... On skates," he added. "With a symphonic orchestra; I'm the only person on earth who can do that."

Last July he proved it too in a highly-acclaimed performance with the Montreal Symphony Orchestra — without the skates.

He plays this Saturday night at Massey Hall, presented by La Chasse-Galerie, a group of Toronto Francophones who have brought such Quebecois talent here as Gilles Vigneault and Pauline Julien.

Festschrifts praise authors, are forums for criticism

Edward Dahlberg: a Tribute edited by Jonathan Williams
Methuen Publications
$9.50

Herbert Read: a Memorial Symposium edited by Robin Skelton
Methuen Publications
$9.95

These are two festschrifts, the former for an acerbic 70-year-old American mythographer and polemicist lately prolific and too little known, the latter for a genial British critic who dies in 1968, aged 76, and who perhaps was too well known and as a result wrote too much. Read and Dahlberg were close friends for many years, and partisans of some of each other's works, though Dahlberg has always been a fire-breathing moralist and Read a sweetly reasonable aesthete.

Dahlberg's Confessions will be in Toronto bookstores any day now; it is the second installment of his incendiary autobiography. What makes his work remarkable is his style, his advocacy of social simplicity and his unfaltering scorn of human folly. There are graveyards of writers who have scorned humanity, but Dahlberg combines an epic humour and great compassion with his rage. He began in the 30s by writing clanging proletarian novels, which he later disavowed in favour of a truly patrician and individual style that takes its cue especially from the masters of English baroque prose. But let him speak, here in a truly revolutionary derogation of Moby-Dick.

"There is now a pederastic hagiography composed of people who prefer the bad to the good, who like excrement instead of pond-apples, sumach, dogwood, or hyacinths, and who choose men rather than women to be their paramours. Intellectual sodomy, which comes from the refusal to be simple about plain matters, is as gross and abundant today as sexual perversion and they are nowise different from one another. This kind of pathic in literature has won, epicene affections. A misogynist, he takes ophidian pleasure in the misuse of words, and his sacerdotal gibberish sounds more like the cries of animals than the holy Logos or the alphabet of the god Thoth. Is there a genius in Christendom whose holy credo is not. In the beginning was the Word? Specious rebels, they are the advocates of the rabble arts."

Such words have never been popular with liberals and indeed, Dahlberg has been frozen out of more jobs and his books have been tossed out of more publishers' offices than it is easy to count. Too many who have crossed him, he has, been a curmudgeon. In the last decade alone, he's written an average of one book per year — (bad) poems, myths (especially erotic), autobiographies, critical essays social and literary, aphorisms, letters.

One would have to look far, as the New York Times noticed, to find another author about whom Allen Tate and Jack Kerouac concurred. Between these covers are poems for and about Dahlberg, critical articles, "burnt-out paragraphs" and longer lauds in memory or thanks, pictures, especially of him and of the places of his frightful childhood as the bastard and orphaned son of a lady barber. Further, there are selections from Dahlberg's work, letters to Jonathan Williams, and a special treat — one of the stuff books lists Dahlberg will poke at anyone immediately upon being asked.

I invite you all to buy this book, or to read the original text in a recent issue of TriQuarterly magazine. I am confident you will be rewarded, and perhaps driven to glean wisdom from a further perusal of Dahlberg's works or those of his masters. It is my firm belief that he is the greatest prose stylist in the English language in this century, and that in American literature, he can only be ranked with such as Thoreau, Melville and Whitman.

Sir Herbert Read, anarchist, poet, literary and artistic critic, political philosopher, educational theorist, novelist, essayist, prose stylist also, never suffered the neglect of his friend Edward Dahlberg, and it may be that the future will judge him facile. Now, however, an honest appraiser would dub him the most important post-Bloomsbury English art critic, a competent novelist and poet, a pioneering advocate of the use of art (taken broadly as Plato meant it) as the basis of education.

Skelton's handsome festschrift for Read reflects his prejudices and position — who writes poetry he's a professor — as does Williams' — he's a poet who also publishes. The Read festschrift is clannish, like all festschrifts, the Read clan members are justly illustrious, and most of them have nothing but good to remember of him — how he helped them and others when they were younger and struggling to establish themselves as painters, sculptors, writers.

Here they are, George Woodcock on Read's politics, Kathleen Raine on his criticism, poet and translator Anthony Kerrigan on Read's utopian fantasy. The Green Child, tributes, poems, reproductions of artwork, photos of Read (on nicer paper than the Dahlberg festschrift, it's true), from Roy Fuller, G. Wilson Knight, Skelton himself, George Barker, Walter Gropius, Henry Moore, Ben Nicholson, Sam Black, Denise Levertov, Barbara Hepworth and others.

There are also letters between Read and Dahlberg — they sent hundreds to each other and wrote Truth is More Sacred, a naughty and now out-of-print epistolary slam of our contemporary Parnassus, which high led to a sundering even of their durable friendship.

As festschrifts go, these two are fascinating, in that they present a variety of responses to their subjects, whereas most festschrifts one sees are collections of essays presented to some famous or old professor by colleagues whose beaks are on the same line as his own. The Read book is understandably more grave than that for Dahlberg. Read is dead. Both books contain valuable bibliographical information. Skelton's edition details in some 70 pages the Read papers at U. Vic., and Harold Billings lists Dahlberg's books (he's preparing a definitive bibliography of the Dahlberg papers, at the University of Texas).

Finally, a note on Read's style and philosophy unlike Dahlberg, he was a poet, and wrote both prose and poetry. His autobiography and fiction are memorable stylistically, as is some of his poetry, he has been called the last Romantic, and here are a few words from The Contrary Experience, the marvellous hymn he wrote to his childhood and his coming of age.

"If only I can recover the sense and uncertainty of those innocent years, years in which we seemed not so much to live as to be lived by forces outside us, by the wind and trees and moving clouds and all the mobile engines of our expanding world — then I am convinced I shall possess a key to much that has happened to me in this other world of conscious living. The echoes of my life which I find in my early childhood are too many to be dismissed as vain coincidences, but it is perhaps my conscious life which is the echo, the only real experiences in life being those lived with a virgin sensibility — so that we hear a tone once, only see a colour once, see, hear, touch, taste and smell everything but once, the first time. All life is an echo of our first sensations, and we build up our consciousness, our whole mental life, by variations and combinations of these elementary sensations. But it is more complicated than that, for the senses apprehend not only colours and tones and shapes, but also patterns and atmospheres, and our first discovery of these determines the larger patterns and subtler atmospheres of all our subsequent existence."

—Ted Whittaker

Brooks misses comedy in Ilf and Petrov's Twelve Chairs

After weeks and weeks of serious, though excellent, films of marital conflict, government domination and alienation from society, one longs for the smiles, chuckles, guffaws and belly-laughs of a really good comedy. The Twelve Chairs tries to fill this vacuum, but only leaves Toronto more in need of a comedy than ever.

Based on a novel by the Russian writing team of Ilf and Petrov, The Twelve Chairs in its movie form emerges as a tired and uninspired imitation of Stanley Kramer's all-star madcap, It's a Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad World. The former tells of a minor Soviet official (Ron Moody) who learns at the deathbed of a close relative that thousands of rubles in gems were sewn into one of twelve chairs before the Revolution. Moody is forced to take on a helper (Frank Langella) whose wits and agility are used to get to the chairs before they fall into the hands of a defrocked priest (Dom DeLuise). The priest, present at the deathbed, also managed to learn the secret of the treasure-laden chairs.

The Twelve Chairs is a film by Mel Brooks, the man responsible for a top-notch comedy, The Producers with Zero Mostel. In this opus, however, Brooks falls flat. The dialogue is leaden and devoid of any really memorable one-liners, insults or socko punch-lines. Instead, Brooks is content simply to deliver "witty" jabs at the Russian way of life. For example, the money-hunters begin looking for their chairs in a Furniture Cataloguing Building that contains a chair bureau, a table bureau, a chinaware bureau and a bureau bureau. Ha. Ha. Later, a servant (Brooks himself) recalls a night long ago when there was so much noise outside he couldn't sleep. "Oh, yes", he adds, "I think it was called the Revolution." Har-de-har.

As for the production itself, there is a remarkable gulf between the Slavic old-world atmosphere of certain street scenes and the incredibly phony-looking Siberian house set. In the latter, one can almost see the stage hands throwing buckets of plastic snow at the actors. In another instance, wherein Moody and DeLuise fight for a chair and chase each other, Brooks employs that cliché, fast motion. Now if anything takes the suspense, humor and reality out of such a scene, it is noticeably sped-up action.

Of the actors, only Dom DeLuise succeeds in drawing a genuine laugh. DeLuise, in tone of voice, mannerisms and changeability, is second only to Jonathan Winters as a comedy character-actor. His attempted suicides, which fail due to deep-down fear and cowardice, are a thrill to behold. In moments of possible failure, DeLuise's ex-priestly appeals for forgiveness and divine intervention strike a note of hilarity that the film does not otherwise supply.

Moody and Langella, on the other hand, whether through their own ineptitude or Brooks' material, have no distinctly identifiable personalities, and so become pawns of the plot. In addition, they do an uncanny job of totally alienating the audience. Moody, a most desperate case of overacting if there ever was one, attacks the chairs with truly fearful ferocity and shows determination by slobbering food all over his face and clothes. To balance Moody's hamming, Langella offers non-acting of a sort. Just when the audience might conceivably begin to identify with Langella, he passionately calls Moody a vile, contemptible, filthy parasite, and goes downhill from there.

By the end of The Twelve Chairs the two central characters are at their "height of humor." Reduced to begging, Langella cons crowds of people into throwing coins at Moody who fakes epileptic fits. Black humor may not always be offensive but when it degenerates into this kind of sick humor, the production invariably becomes a write-off.

The Quality of Life
James Michener
J Lippincott Co
$5.95

This book comes from a richness of experience that reveals James Michener to be an expert on the quality of life. He is well travelled, well read. But more importantly, he is the author of The Source and Iberia. He knows the scope of mammoth undertakings. In The Quality of Life, in less than one hundred and thirty pages, Michener is capable of synthesizing a great breadth of experience. He is able to penetrate society's dilemmas, draw together the specific and the general in analysis, and design a building for our future.

His architecture is symbolic of man's creative energy, but also as an obstructing monolith the view beyond. Michener's focus is the structure of America, her strength and weakness. These are fourfold — constitutional, educational, economic and religious.

History is seen as mainly an account of what has happened in the cities, therefore how they are going to shape the land is of primary importance. Michener sees them as a marketplace, a nucleus for cultural and recreational activity, a powerful imaginative and inspirational force for young people. It is essential that the middle class return from the suburban sprawl. The cities must be revived through education. "As complexity grows, education becomes more important, not less." Michener's ideas on education are consistent with his other theories in the book, the base (whether it be political, economic, social or environmental) must be broadened, not narrowed. Our reason, sensibility, and enthusiasm must be pulled together to face the expanse. Only through discipline can we strive toward freedom.

Though Michener's commentary on blacks, youth, communication, and environment is short, each is seen with amazing acuity. The adjustment to the race problem, for instance, should not require instant integration. Getting jobs and generating self-respect may well require a period of reflection, an identity crisis, if you will. Blacks need "separate facilities in order to find themselves."

Youth, dropping out, total rejection seems more reactionary than evolutionary, according to Michener. To live at Walden Pond, Thoreau first had to undergo a "solid training from which his decisions were made or the noble purpose to which they were put." Competence will still be the essential requirement for the creative life. Michener reflects upon the misconceptions of tradition, the American myth, but he is in no way prepared to throw all of them out at once. The availability and sheer speed of communication poses the central problem of intelligent selection of information in the future.

The crux of The Quality of Life is an examination of the human structure — the number of people and the environment which surrounds us. No nation is better off because of overpopulation. The psychological implications are even more startling than the physical pressures.

Four arguments against these premises are examined: 1) that agriculture will be able to feed the doubled population; 2) that the disappearance of plankton and aquatic life shows that the oceanic sources are more susceptible to extinction than we used to believe; 3) that more humans will not improve the quality of life. The expansion of space needed may well bring parks, riversheds and animals to extinction. Michener says: "The planet devoid of its natural inhabitants — animals and birds and fish and trees and flowers — would be a desolation. It is quite possible that men require deer to keep them human. It is quite possible that we need cleaner air and quieter cities to keep us sane." 4) that the possibilities of emigration to outer space is not yet practically feasible.

Michener's alternatives are closer; they are all possible right now. He has several ideas. firstly, we must stabilize the population. Businessmen must discard the idea that the larger the population, the better chance one has of pulling down a larger share of profits. We must stop the idea of prolonging life through contrived means. The emphasis should rather be placed in a good life during the productive years.

From ideas, Michener moves to action. The war in Vietnam must be stopped. We must adopt a new spiritual agreement. Democracies, in particular must be careful to preserve a commonly agreed-upon set of values against which to judge courses of action as they develop. "We do not need pressures dictated by the ritualistic preferences of one religion as opposed to another but we do want awareness derived from the inherited experience of mankind, and these are most often found in religious teachings."

If the disruptive forces of crime, fighting among blacks and whites, revolutionary students continues, they will continue to threaten freedom. The average citizen, the author says, will find himself so repelled that he will flee to stronger types of government to impose control. If anarchy threatens, we will turn to dictatorship. We must work toward a balance between stability and freedom.

Flamboyant phrases are played down in favor of a well-developed logical and facile style of presentation. The message of the book comes across as, "Life will continue. The American soil will continue. It is the quality of life to be lived on that soil that is under question." The way and means by which that quality is determined is left for us to decide.

Nureyev pratfalls, his choreography slovenly also

Rudolph Nureyev is one of the most over-rated dancers in the world. Now that may be an extravagant generalization, but it is certainly not far from the truth (your truth).

Appearing at the O'Keefe Centre this week as a guest artist with the Australian Ballet, the man who defected from the Kirov Ballet 10 years ago in a blaze of glory and publicity to become the sometime partner of Margot Fonteyn is proving that his reputation as a dancer and his pretensions to choreography are enormously inflated.

Tuesday's opening performance was his own version of the Russian ballet Don Quixote (sic). It is hardly a brilliant ballet to begin with. Even the Bolshoi has conceded this by doing the third act alone as a technical showpiece for its younger dancers. But it is hard to believe, as Nureyev would have us do, that this is an improvement on the original.

Pay no attention to the title. The Cervantes character, the old self-declared knight-errant searching for chivalric adventure, serves here as a buffoon, merely an incidental character to the romantic problems of the innkeeper's daughter, Kitri, and Basilio the barber.

Nureyev's choreography is decidedly one-level (so's this criticism), with few of the spectacular lifts and feats distinguishing at least the Bolshoi third act. The steps are earth bound and repetitive — the Gypsies in the second act do the same floor-tapping and plies as the supposedly more sophisticated street dancers in the third and all of them set the scene with pseudo-Spanish gestures.

Though he makes his living dancing to music, Nureyev proved Tuesday night that he doesn't really listen. His choreography is never informed by a sympathy for melody or musical nuances, he pays attention simply to the beats. The most blatant example of such complete musical ignorance comes at the end of the lover's third act pas de deux. As the music reaches its climax with loud flourishes in the brass, Nureyev partners his Kitri (Lucette Aldous) in a lyrical arabesque, turning her slowly around.

It may be that the dullness of his own choreography weighed down Nureyev's dancing. In any case, the only exciting moment came when he made a clumsy fall (because the O'Keefe Centre's multi-purpose stage floor was slippery with an oil residue!) at the beginning of his first variation in the final act and then walked off the stage to thunderous applause by the capacity audience.

Technically sloppy (like this review?), his landings were erratic, his knees bent in every extension. With his head down and back forward (Huh?), he often had a round-shouldered appearance on stage, by no means the carriage a dancer can take pride in.

While Nureyev must take much of the blame for the torpid quality of opening night, the Australian Ballet, directed by former Sadlers Wells (now the Royal Ballet) dancers Robert Helpmann and Peggy van Praagh is no help.

The corps work from both the men and women lacks discipline and cohesion. Among the featured dancers, only guest artist Lucette Aldous, a pert brunette, brought life to her role as the mischievous Kitri.

But then the company is not the main attraction on their first North American tour. The sold-out audiences are obviously for Rudolph Nureyev. What a pity that it is an irresponsible (like this review?) and often lazy (like this writer?) dancer who can draw such crowds to the ballet.

Vic Music Club scores with Celebration

Celebration is a collage of music and dance on the subject of youth and old age. This year's Victoria College Music Club presentation, it tells the story of a young naive orphan, of how he brings back feeling to the life of a rich old man, both losing his innocence and killing Mr. Rich in the process.

Potemkin, played by Scott Walker is a sort of narrator cum magician who directs the action. He is also the only character with a voice rich enough for solo, although the chorus is very good. The choreography is also too ambitious for focus on individual dancers while the ensemble is used to dramatic advantage. Bob Wilson is hilarious as the lewd old man, although he was unable to give expression to his few lines of dialogue, the gestures and costume took the evening.

It is an entertaining show but very demanding for amateurs. John Goddard the director did very well.

How King Raez An Eastern Euro

Once upon a time, somewhere just east of the sunrise, there flourished a little kingdom. The kingdom was ruled by the wise and powerful king Raez. Although his country was small, Raez was well protected by a ring of mighty mountains which surrounded the kingdom. Now these mountains made general trading and traffic almost impossible but Raez, being a wise ruler, spent much time travelling beyond the mountains to learn the ways of other peoples. Whenever he returned from his explorations, he would apply what he had seen and learned to his own kingdom, and he took great pride in the peace and order within his country.

In fact, Raez had a passion for peace and order that was legendary. Citizens with petty grievances were well advised to work out their problems among themselves. If stories of such disagreements ever reached the ears of mighty Raez he would immediately summon the litigants to the royal court. He would then command them to stop disturbing the order of the kingdom, and might even give them a parting taste of the lash to emphasize his point. In such ways would wise Raez restore peace in the kingdom.

One particularly cold winter, Raez returned home from one of his sojourns abroad, filled with foreboding. A great and severe famine was plaguing the neighbouring kingdoms. Raez, realizing that the ring of mountains could not stave off the inclement weather indefinitely, made plans accordingly.

Now you should know that Raez was a very old king, older than any of his subjects. Legend had it that a long time ago, before the oldest citizen was born, Raez had taken a solemn pledge. He pledged to rule his country wisely and to protect his subjects from any disaster. And, indeed, the country had grown prosperous in firm belief of this ancient oath. In this way, Raez had gained the confidence of his people.

A fortnight after the king had returned, famine arrived in the kingdom. Dwindling food supplies became exhausted and, as the mountains were high and all passes blocked by snow, there was no hope of outside assistance. The citizens, confident in royal providence, tightened their belts and awaited Raez's help.

But the royal granaries remained locked. Starvation was now rampant in the whole countryside and with it, disease had come to destroy the weakened populace. And yet, the gates of the palace remained shut. For the first time in memory, citizens begun doubting their king. They assembled in the town square, all who could still walk, and drew up a mighty appeal for royal help. They all signed the document and affixed it to the castle that very night.

The morning had brought an answer. A scroll of parchment, lettered by the king's secretary, informed them that the king had received their petition. His majesty was now considering the problem, it said, and would be informing his subjects of his solution that selfsame afternoon. The people were overjoyed. Much time was frittered away that day as citizens attempted to guess what mighty Raez's solution to starvation might be.

It was a dreary cold winter afternoon, as the whole kingdom assembled in front of the palace to hear Raez' solution. Suddenly all eyes were raised as the huge wrought iron palace gates swung open. The king appeared, flanked by several heavily armed palace guards. He looked around, then slowly ascended the platform which had been constructed that morning for this very purpose. And he spoke, as follows.

"My people! Words have reached my ears that you are in great distress. You are starving, and have asked me to help you. You have done rightly to turn to your king in your plight. After much thought, I have reached the following solution to your starvation." — The king raised his voice and it echoed through the cold winter air. — "I hereby royally decree that you are not starving. Starvation is hereby officially outlawed. YOU ARE NOT STARVING!" The king now began to leave the platform, then stopped. Almost as an afterthought, he called out "If you are not happy here, feel free to leave my kingdom!" — and with this, he gestured broadly towards the impenetrable mountains looming all around the horizon.

His subjects shrugged their shoulders and returned to their homes.

In this way did wise Raez conquer starvation and maintain peace and contentment among his subjects.

Perth County and Thog conspire

Incense, babies' cries, Perth County weed, and a general feeling of happiness diffused through the Bathurst Street United Church all last weekend for the Youth Anonymous Benefit, presenting the Perth County Conspiracy with Thog. The church was packed to overflowing each night for the celebration, and rightly so.

Thog is a community theatre group endowed with vocal and acting talent that seemed to draw the audience into most of their presentations, from chanting to forming one mass of hugging people in Come Together. The dramatic presentations were just as forceful, notably John Henry and the Adam and Eve scene.

City folk finally seem to be getting into the ideas and music of Perth County, and I've never heard a more together or happier Conspiracy outside the Black Swan. Accompanied by light piano work (courtesy Thog) and bass (Michael Butler), Cedric Smith and Richard Keelan combined intricate, flowing guitars with soft, rich, expressive lyrics to produce dreamlike visions of love, beauty and country life. Their messages have feeling as well as meaning, so that there were a few moments of thoughtful silence after each number before the great bursts of applause. For the knee-slapping country numbers such as Uncle Jed Say and Keep Your Head HIGH, everyone was on their feet, dancing and clapping, always smiling. The Conspiracy wrote a song last spring that says it all today is the very first day of spring today we have gathered here to sing to be in tune with springs creation a time for jubilation . . .

Garber rubs our noses right in it

Circuit
by Lawrence Garber
House of Anansi
2.50

When Norman Mailer described the Vietnam experience as a grand debauch and an obscenity, he was also proclaiming one of the two means of literary expression in our era: the use of the previously obscene, ugly aspects of human physical life as the only adequate source for metaphors to examine our existence. The other means is the comic mode, for our angst is too serious to treat seriously and still get the message across.

In his second novel, Circuit, Lawrence Garber accepts these two modes, and builds upon them to create a parody of them and at the same time to destroy several of our life-giving myths.

Circuit is not really a single novel. It is two novellas and a short story, united only in theme and in basic method. The first novella, "These are the Sacred Places", concerns itself above all with the movies as the source of our myth. Reynolds Hall is a Rex Reed-Tom Wolfe-type journalist doing a story on the return of a great Star Bruce Karle. Karle's career in Hollywood was marked by rape cases, ruin and suicides of prominent people, and legend of his insatiable sexual prowess.

Now Karle is in Spain making spaghetti epics (The Rape of the Sabine Women) produced by an Aristotle- and Kafka quoting mogul named Hal Makadosh. The latter sees deep philosophical truths in all of the junk he makes, but Karle, the myth, sees everything for what it is: false, shallow and sick. Reynolds is also sick, physically, with hepatitis and who knows what else, and smuggles his reports past the hospital's ever-present profane nun, written on toilet paper and other scraps. As Reynolds decays, more of the decay in this myth-world is exposed.

The form in this work is similar to recent films: fast Richard Lester cuts in time and space, from the shooting location to the hospital to a screening room. Scenes are juxtaposed and seemingly disjointed, with a cumulative effect resulting. This is the most successful part of the book.

Next comes a short story, based on the ghost or horror type. A friend revisits the author; but the friend was buried only a short time earlier. They talk, the author shows him all his useless worldly goods, and finally follows him through damp, clammy decaying streets. As the friend becomes more articulate, the author pounces on profound thoughts about life, such as "There are no private Hells, public utilities are everywhere." The imagery is of disease and decay, of pus, cretins, drunks and mice. Finally the author finds his place, in a sewer.

The last section, "Death by Toilet", appears to be a spy story, as secret missions among princes and embassies are conducted all over Europe. The Count Greendorf-Friedzredck is sent on these missions which are really routes to his own existence, each phase of his destiny is revealed, whether in a palace, on a train, in a church, or in the Bois de Boulogne, in a toilet and the means of revelation is feces. Garber cleverly parodies a genre and illustrates the literary decadence of today, while making points about existence in general.

Two more aspects of this work must be brought to the reader's attention, for they raise the work well above the average. One is Garber's style. He loves words and knows how to use them. In his first novel, Tales from the Quarter, he became carried away with his great gift for highly vivid description and metaphor, but here he is well in control. Words such as 'squelch' appear nonchalantly on the page, and the imagery is riveted on your mind.

And Garber is simply one of the funniest writers around. Puns, straight humour, bawdy insults, and hilarious adventures and descriptions are commonplace. Every twist producing the humour is precise and alive.

The third section of the book is too long and consequently drags somewhat because the conceit is limited, but the whole work is worth reading (as is his first book).

Full Moon shines but production is a bit stiff

A Full Moon in March, a 1935 one-act play by the most neglected of the great dramatists, W. B. Yeats, is being presented here in conjunction with the Irish Seminar.

A mythic Celtic Queen, in the winter of her virginity, invites men to sing for her during the full March moon. But her beauty is cruel and kind, and she destroys all who attempt to win her, including the present insulting swineherd.

But this is mystic, symbolist, Japanese Noh influenced theatre, and exists for poetry as its main means of expression. So the veiled, white-robed Queen becomes, after the beheading, a dancer. Against a set, perfectly expressive, of red, black-bordered panels with phased moons on them, Judie Colman descends the white throne in a filmy flowing white robe with red splotches, and superbly dances the sexual embrace with the swineherd's severed head, to the frenzied drum and electric violin and guitar.

But the rest of James Flannery's direction is too stiff, despite basically good staging. No variation in pitch or loudness occurs in the speaking of the chorus. Poetry is missing, and the performance becomes less passionate and only tragic, the sexual exuberance and primitiveness is lost.

The swineherd is made up to be powerfully filthy, and the red-caped chorus' black and white drawn body stockings are only slightly too bold.

Student art derivative, and some just rigid

The Renaissance '71 visual arts exhibit, which is currently showing at various university and city gallery locations, is quite an eventful presentation. The impressive factor of the show is that it is the first composite of the Canadian university art program. Selections from the show include original works from almost every province.

This type of national show gives young Canadian students a chance to exhibit and also brings to the attention of the general public the talent and creativity within Canadian universities. An event of this kind is a long-awaited opportunity for the Canadian university art departments. Ten years ago, most universities didn't offer courses or degrees in visual arts. Now, the nation-wide festival places a serious and necessary aspect to the art departments themselves. Results from such a showing can only be valuable in constructive criticism and in analysis of individual work.

Objectively speaking, the works involved in the show seem to lack completion. The experience of the artist with his media is not evident. The initial attempts are made with new ideas to direct them, however, most of the pieces lack a finished statement. There is a lack of substance and presence about the works.

Two factions of art seem to have influence throughout the show. I shall refer to them as the slick school and the unkempt school. Each is dependent upon the media to pull all of the weight in expression of the individual piece. The smooth, often over-polished effect of the slick artist is most commonly seen in acrylic paintings. The flat acrylic work too often offers a field of color with an intersecting form. The isolation of the form is a handsome effect, however, the supposition is made that it is enough of a visual statement. The unkempt artist allows his media to ride rough shod over the work. The intent here is to create order with disorder. Most often the latter emerges as victor and sole statement of the art work. Both factions lack intellectual fulfillment and are quite dependent upon media alone.

In the show, I am reminded of the discipline used in the French Academy of Art (c. 1855-1906). It allowed its young artists no freedom of experimentation or expression in their paintings. Instead, it saddled them with technical and rigid blueprints of what art was and how it was to be done. In a similar way, the artists here, have not allowed themselves the freedoms they could attain.

This exhibit shows a strong tendency to conform to the existing methods of making art. The influence for these artists seems to have been Oldenburg, Gorky, and Kandinsky. Several works from the university exhibits (the Hart House gallery and Victoria Alumni Hall) have soft textured, organic shapes emerging from flat canvas hangings. Others are shaped canvases, creating a two-fold presentation. Those carved in low relief on plaster and combined with acrylic are quite expressive, offering a delicate sculptural-painting effect.

I am intrigued by the possibilities this first national festival offers to all those involved. The exhibit seems most beneficial to the student. It is a directing force raising him to a professional level and involving him in the Canadian art scene.

BOOKS

McClelland and Stewart have just published six more titles in their useful New Canadian Library Series: The Incomparable Atuk, by Mordecai Richler, $1 95. A Search for America, by Frederick Philip Grove, $2 95. Winnowed Wisdom, by Stephen Leacock, $2 35. The Seats of the Mighty, by Gilbert Parker, $2 95. The Betrayal, by Henry Kreisel, $2 50. and Mad Shadows, by Marie Claire Blais, $1 75.

These much needed paperback reprints cost twice as much as did the early numbers of the series, but the pretentious and boring covers are less stiff and printing and paper are shabby.

Herewith also two fine anthologies, from Doubleday: Inside Outer Space, New Poems of the Space Age, Robert Vas Dias (ed), $2 25. and The Bird/Poem Book: Poems on the Wild Birds of America, selected by Hayden Carruth, drawings by Mel Hunter, for $5 95.

The introductions are short in both books and most of the poems excellent. The Bird/Poem Book would be great to give to a city child of 10 or 12 but the pictures are pedestrian. The inner-and-outer spaces anthology has enough good work in it to keep a concerned reader delighted for months. —t. w.

ART

At the Ontario Art Gallery, the Archipenko and tapestry displays remain until the 21st. The tapestries, by such artists as Jean Arp and Sonia Delaunay, are restricted in design to geometric and optic effects. The Archipenko exhibit contrasts effectively with its organic, growing forms. With Archipenko, space becomes as important as mass.

The O'Keefe Centre is displaying works of students and master craftsmen until March 6, an exhibit arranged by the Ontario branch of the Canadian Guild of Crafts. Works shown range from metal design to tapestries.

A dive up north reading week should include a visit to the McMichael exhibit near Kleinberg. This is the largest collection of Group of Seven paintings in existence, and the log cabin gallery provides an effective touch of Canadiana.

Another northern exhibit, at the Thornhill Library until February 17, Joan Timmins presents a one-women show of charcoals, watercolours and oils. Mainly portraits and landscapes, the exhibit covers several years' work. —i. c.

DANCE

Ballet fans have only this weekend, including two Sunday performances, to catch up with Rudolph Nureyev, one of the most overrated dancers in the field, leading the Australian Ballet at the O'Keefe Centre.

Sometime partner of Margot Fonteyn, Nureyev is appearing in his own versions of Don Quixote and Raymonda. As for the Australian Ballet, what makes it interesting is its historical context. Both co-directors Robert Helpmann and Dame Peggy van Praagh, as well as principal dancer Elaine Field, were with the Royal Ballet when it was still called the Sadlers Wells Company, many years ago. —s. c.

THEATRE

Toronto is being glutted with theatre. Around campus there is Flowers of Paradise by Martin Hunter at the U.C. Playhouse (free), two short plays at the Studio on Glen Morris (presented by the Drama Centre and also free), Celebration, by the Fantasticks authors is being presented by Vic at Hart House. All these are on tonight and tomorrow.

Renaissance '71 continues with theatrical attempts, including Creeps and Snails at the Victory Lab, workshops in the gym. One, Two Three, Alary at St. Hilda's tonight, and especially Dracula III by Martin Brenzell on the 14th at the Macmillan Theatre. And the Irish Seminar is offering Yeats' A Full Moon in March at 14 Elm Street each night at 11 p.m. and The Heart's a Wonder, a musical version of Synge's Playboy of the Western World at the Macmillan Theatre, Feb. 12-20.

In the hinterlands, the O'Keefe offers The London Palladium Show until March 8th. A Yard of Sun and Enemy of the People are closing this week at the St. Lawrence Centre, and Marigolds and Mary, Mary continue. The Royal Alex is presenting a puppet Pinocchio from the 16th. Vampyr opened last night at 11 Trinity Square. And The Me Nobody goes to closes tomorrow night.

After the holidays Miss Julie by Strindberg opens at the Studio (4 Glen Morris Street, and free) on the 23rd and should be very good. And D. H. Lawrence friends have a rare chance to see his play The Widowing of Mrs. Holroyd and a dramatic reading by Anne Tait at the Central Library Feb. 17 — Mar. 2nd, call 924-8950 for details. —s. c.

ROCK

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee will continue at the Riverboat till the end of reading week and will be followed by Bruce Cockburn. The Riverboat will also present Lightfoot in concert on the 19th, 20th, and 21st of March at Massey Hall. Upcoming concerts include Charlebois at Massey Hall on the 13th, Melanie at the same hall on the first of next month, and Dionne Warwick at the O'Keefe on the 28th of this month.

Mozart's "Don" a joyous show

Any art form developed to perfection is a thrilling experience, including the rather esoteric skills of puppeteering. The three day engagement of the Salzburg Marionette Theater which finished last night at Eaton Auditorium was no mere Punch and Judy show. The infinitesimal care that this Austrian family (founded in 1913 by grandfather Prof. Aicher, and in the hands of his son and grandchildren now) lavishes on building and manipulating their elaborate puppets and sets made it perfectly natural that they should tackle two of Mozart's operas as part of their repertoire.

If we consider puppeteering a perversion of theater, then Mozart's "Don Giovanni" staged on an 8 foot wide set seems unjustifiable. Yet, the action was so realistic, the movements so precise that one would lose awareness of the mechanics and actually become involved in the opera. The colourfully costumed 3-foot high figures would stride across the stage (rather than sweep across, suspended by strings, the usual spectacle at marionette shows), they would gesticulate and plead. Don Giovanni would draw his sword and fight a duel, then caress Zerlina for a tender love duet. Following the fiery finale the puppets took their curtain calls with all the solemnity of first-nighters at the Met. And finally, from around the side, the black cloaked and white bearded Prof. Aicher, magically smiling, and looking like a beautiful cherubic Gepetto. It was the most beautiful moment of the evening. —tony john

Films clever, show sloppy

Renaissance '71 films were fresh and clever Tuesday and Wednesday, but sloppy projection technique almost spoiled the nights' fun.

No mere cinematic byblow of Warhol's Cream of Tomato and Brillo Pad aesthetics, King Heavy is an entertaining, even enlightening film. This lengthy pastiche of television commercials demonstrates by sheer persistence the tawdry mythological world that has been created for America — its new taboos like Jungle Mouth or the Soggy Bottom Crust, its peculiar populace like that disgusting lady plumber or the plastic-wrap faggots. The view that the TV commercial foretakens the inner rot of capitalism etc. is not one that I find cogent, but they surely present a petty and vulgar picture of human relationships: the vicious laundry-room vendettas, the marriages kept happy through the magic of some 59¢ drugstore talisman. A worthwhile film, and one that has found a distributor.

Queasy Rider by Ian Leach and Charlie Dean is a parody of the (ill) manners of a cycle clique, done, quite cleverly, without motorcycles. Cyclone of the Saddle and Kapitan Kanada take off the old Perils-of-Pauline melodramas; the latter, though it could have been scripted by the editors of Toke Oike, is gloriously corny.

Ryerson's program of narrative vignettes shows, on the whole, a refreshing technical competence in filming and editing. Two deserve particular mention: Albatross filmed crowds on Yonge Street hurrying in dreamy slow motion to a seductively lazy Hawaiian twang, and another film, whose title unfortunately eluded me in the chaos of the showings, watched a woman wake to her baby's yowls, take a bottle of sleeping pills, and go back to bed, presumably forever.

A word about the chaos, which, though it was probably the fault of no one person, was so extreme that at first I suspected sabotage. When things got so casual that films were running long after the showings were scheduled to end, or were shown so poorly that darkness would have been better, it's time to insert a little structure. Let me soften that grump by saying that to do so is not so much for the convenience of the audience, but for the filmmakers, for whom Renaissance '71 was to have been an opportunity to display their work.

Flowers of Paradise idealistic and real

Martin Hunter's new play Flowers of Paradise is about a young woman, Flora, hired by a downtown church to bring back some life to the community. She is a strange girl, both idealistic and real. She manages to attract to her both the youth and the solid pillars of the community, but neither group will go far enough towards really living and so life returns to normal, but with everyone a little bit changed.

The play has the same complex nature as its protagonist. It is not tragedy or comedy, but it has some of both; the characters are in some degree stereotyped but they have more than one dimension; they are real, convincing.

Unfortunately Beverly Miller as Flora is the weakest element in the play. While she is very good in scenes of anger or stubbornness, the vision that wins her the kids' favour never becomes real. The rest of the cast handle their parts well.

The music, composed by Jeffrey Cohen complements the text very well. Far from clashing, the songs, and the dramatic dances that accompany them flow naturally into the intrigue, expressing a dimension of the characters that the words can only suggest.

Brennan Hall panel truck has flat tyre and broken muffler

"Your Excellency, Ladies and Gentlemen..." with that slightly fantastic revelation of the cultural influence of Empire, chairman Norman Jeffares opened a panel discussion with Pomp and presence.

The panel speaking at St. Mike's Brennan Hall, was made up of oracle Marshal McLuhan, actor Michael MacLiammoir, poet W. H.

Auden and a very quiet Bucky Fuller. In the best moments of the unfortunate discussion, Auden and McLuhan matched wits, which had the effect of silencing the others on the panel.

The chairman who professed favour for Auden's work had an offensive habit of making trite observations while asking patronizing questions.

"You are designing a theatre at Oxford, and it's quite small. What? Five hundred?" asked Jeffares.

"Yes, half that," said Fuller. "Oh! two hundred?" "Yeah."

McLuhan stated that Apollo 14 was representative of a new type of theatre, while Auden proudly claimed a profound dislike for theatrical nudity, audience participation, television, the twentieth century, rock and folk music.

"It is very arrogant, but then I'm a very arrogant man," Auden announced.

McLuhan joined in suggesting that "the telephone was evil but not as evil as the automobile."

After the discussion was ended at least one of the audience thanked Fuller for not joining in the verbal competition.

"It was impossible," said Fuller who also acknowledged that we would be better off without politicians and that people have to do things themselves, spontaneously, and not wait for leaders to tell them what to do.

Everyone gradually left, though some took time to try more of the drinks being served downstairs. Oh well. At least we gave Bucky a copy of the Varsity for the cronicle.

THE HEART'S A WONDER
ONE OF THE FOUR OR FIVE FINEST PLAYS OF THE 19th CENTURY PLAYERS

IN WEDNESDAY'S VARSITY we ran the first part of an article about young Canadian architect Moshe Safdie's work to help the students at San Francisco State College build a radically creative student centre. Thousands of people in the community wanted the building. A half dozen university trustees didn't. ROWER!!! The story is told by Safdie in his important book about change in architecture called Beyond Habitat.

MOSHE SAFDIE

THE SPACEMAKER

The whole campus became extremely involved with the building and by the time we went back to the trustees, six thousand student signatures had been collected, requesting that the building be approved. The faculty senate unanimously voted support of the building. San Francisco State College has an advisory committee of distinguished members of the community and it unanimously voted support for the building and asked that it should be approved. Mayor Alioto sent a telegram saying the building was good for San Francisco State and good for San Francisco. To my great delight, the architectural profession turned out in support of the building. Telegrams were sent by over twenty members of the faculty of the Berkeley department of architecture and planning, urging that it be approved. The American Institute of Architects, San Francisco chapter, circulated a petition and obtained many signatures including that of the president of the chapter. The San Francisco Museum of Fine Arts held an exhibit of the building. There was overwhelming public support. And we had the estimate from the contractor who was prepared to sign a contract, and we had a very comprehensive technical report.

Meanwhile our relations with Mr. Harmon's department in the chancellor's office were getting more and more complicated. They would ask a question and we would respond by sending material; it would not be acknowledged, and months later the same questions would be asked all over again. When we presented the letter from the contractor who was prepared to sign a contract, they said: "Well, he does not really mean what he says, he's just trying to get his foot in the door for a negotiated contract."

The crucial trustees' meeting took place in Fresno this time. It would have made a good movie. The committee that had to approve buildings consisted of eight members of the board of trustees. The chancellor's chief architect and the state architect opened an attack on the building. This time there were (surprise!) new objections. The chancellor's chief architect had measured the areas of the building. Since the structure consisted of bents with inclined walls, there were areas which had no headroom. We had considered this fact by omitting these areas in the effective cost tabulations. But, by playing around with these numbers Harmon tried to show that this was really a very expensive building. I corrected the record and showed that his figures were distorted, and that turned into a lengthy discussion which became quite heated at times. Charles Luckman honestly summed it up that day. Pleading against the building, he said, "We are against extremes. Any extremes. Good or bad, we are against extremes." Other trustees also attacked it bitterly, while still others supported it strongly. It came time to vote. The motion was that building should be rejected. Four members said "No," it ought not to be rejected; three members said "Yes," it ought to be rejected. The chairman added his vote to the "Yes," making it a tie.

It was then transferred for decision to the entire board of trustees. Sixteen of them were present at that meeting in the afternoon. (Governor Reagan, who is a member of the board, was absent.) There was only a short discussion. Two trustees made pleas for rejection. The chancellor himself, who is a voting member of the board, said he felt it was an ugly building, but the union was needed and if San Francisco students wanted to live with that ugliness, let them have it. Two members of the board made pleas in support, and the final word came from President Smith, who said he couldn't function on the campus without that building, a rejection would be a slap in the face to the entire community. A score of supporting telegrams were read by the chairman, and then the motion that the building be approved. The vote was eight in favor, seven against. The chairman then exercised his prerogative and cast his vote no, to make it a tie. For the second time that day the building was not approved.

Still later that day the trustees ordered President Smith to fire Murray, the Black Panther lecturer. There was complete insurrection on the campus, a strike of students followed by a strike of the faculty. Rejection of the building was a factor in it. Shortly thereafter Smith resigned. All of this took place in November 1968.

For several months the campus was totally disabled, hardly functioning. Dr. S. I. Hayakawa was appointed acting president, but had little if any contact with the students. At one last meeting Hayakawa expressed support for the building, but at that time the students refused to attend any meetings with him.

I relived some of these experiences again several weeks after the trustees ordered President Smith to fire Murray and rejected the Union design. At that time the campus erupted with demonstrations and strikes. On this occasion I arrived to find thousands of students on the campus green, marching with placards and chanting. There was, so far as I could see, no violence. The famous San Francisco riot police surrounded the campus, and suddenly there was silence. From four different directions approached, at double pace, phalanxes of riot police, ten abreast, blue uniformed, helmeted with acrylic guards across their faces, arms holding riot sticks horizontally across their chests. Each phalanx was led by two officers carrying what looked like a laser machine gun, actually, it was a weapon for tear gas. Beating and fighting began. A group of us stood by the site for the College Union and watched until waves of fear-filled students, withdrawing before the police, forced us to move away.

Looking back I find it incredible that fifteen thousand students who were prepared to pay for their own building, and who had support from the president, the faculty senate, the advisory committee, and some of the most respected members of the architectural profession in San Francisco, could be frustrated by sixteen trustees who meet once a month to run eighteen colleges. And that is a state where Reagan was elected on a platform of "conservatism," which we are told supports decentralization and community control of community functions. This was a project that surged on the constructive energies of students over a period of five years — a campus effort to get a building built with their own money. If the building had gone ahead at that point, it would have involved the whole campus, had everyone working together creatively. We were going to buy looms and all the textiles in the building were to be woven by the students. Students were going to become involved in planting the building in collaboration with the department of botany. Students were going to make the furniture, and make the graphics, all kinds of things. So what do the trustees do? They say "No." And then they're surprised when the campus blows up.

Most disappointed of all by the rejection of the Union design were the individuals on the Union Council who had devoted years to it. Most of them left the campus in disillusionment. Albert Duro had been one of the most active Council members. Six months later he wrote me the following note from Italy: "Though San Francisco and the College Union affair are very, very distant for me now, the legacy of love for architecture and the friendships that are the only tangible results of that experience will never be forgotten."

Epilogue

In June of 1969 the board of directors of the Associated Students was dissolved. In one of their last meetings they unanimously moved a resolution that Moshe Safdie, Burger & Coplans were to remain the architects of the Associated Students and that the future student government was to make an effort to realize the building. In September 1969, I met with the newly elected student government. It reaffirmed support for the building and the wish to realize it. At that time San Francisco State College students were in receivership, frozen and under control of the Attorney General of California. Until the receivership is lifted the students are unable to act.

York says 1/2 year long enough

Year 'too long' to study Indians

TORONTO (CUP) — The anthropology section of the sociology department at York University has rejected a request by a professor to teach a full year course next year on contemporary Canadian Indians.

Roma Standefer says she is only being allowed to teach a half year course which in her opinion places the study of Canadian Indians on the same level as studies of Asian and African cultures, which are also half year courses.

Standefer feels there is a need for more Canadian content in the sociology department and is upset that she is not being allowed to teach a full course.

"I am willing to teach this course and I am not being allowed to," she said. "I offered to teach it as an extra load. I thought it was so important that I was willing to teach three full courses." (She is required by the department to teach only two and a half.)

"There is so much material you could sit and read two years and not read everything," she said.

"Lack of material is not a problem."

Gustav Thaiss, who co-ordinates the seven-man anthropology section in the department, said the section was not yet sure it wanted to major in Canadian studies and was presently developing a "basic program" before specializing.

He said the section wanted to be careful "not to go overboard to become a completely Canadian studies program." Standefer, he said, was reacting to "the emotionalism of Canadian content."

A half-year course is being offered next year on "North American Indians", he said, which would include some material on Canadian Indians. Other universities in Ontario have Canadian studies programs so there is no real need to develop one at York.

"We felt there is already enough being done on the Canadian Indian. Other universities are doing a good job," he added.

Thaiss also argued that Standefer is now teaching a course on anthropology and development that deals with Indians and claims the two courses would be "essentially the same."

Standefer denies this and says she is spending only three weeks on Indians in the course he referred to.

"I feel that students at York who are interested in Canadian Indian people should have an opportunity to take a course that specifically focuses on Canadian Indians," she said.

Library Council on sic-em search

By PHIL CHARKO

A move by the Library Council yesterday to garnishee faculty wages for unpaid fines was delayed until next meeting because of sharply divided opinion within the council.

However it defeated a motion to refer the report back to a subcommittee which means months of delay.

The council had accepted in principle the collection of fines from staff. A sub-committee had been set up under engineering professor G. R. Slemon to investigate and recommend an enforceable procedure. Its recommendations included the creation of a Tribunal of appeal and the garnisheeing of wages.

History Professor M. R. Powicke called the report "unbearable" and termed the whole "... performance of returning books... fines... unacceptable." He mentioned that it was sometimes necessary to keep a book out for a whole year.

R. A. Spencer, also from the History Department, but who is not a member of the council also spoke against the report. Due to time considerations the vote on the motion to accept the report was delayed to next meeting.

It was pointed out that the faculty represent about 6% of the library borrowers and that the present faculty can in effect get permanent loan on particular books.

Even normal borrowing regulation for faculty members are remarkably generous. After a two month loan they can obtain a two month renewal but special circumstances will allow the book to be held indefinitely until called for.

A team of management consultants is presently being employed by the university to suggest a more efficient system.

Elections for the Library Council have tentatively been scheduled for March 23.

Auden echoes into past

BILL MACVICAR

Looking like nothing so much as a retired prizefighter (as a distinguished professor of literature remarked to me), he made his way through crowding admirers to the lectern. Indeed the simile, while startling, was apt: dark glasses occluded the eyes of that extraordinary battered face, so gouged and furrowed that it might have been sculpted slowly by sea and wind out of the limestone cliffs he once praised.

The tumult, the spontaneous applause, subsided, and he was simply and fittingly presented as the greatest living poet. (Will Graves in his Majoreca garden, and Pound in his palazzo on the Grand Canal acquiesce so meekly to the Muse's absconding to the Austrian hills? She is no wanton, but she's not ready to settle down into drab monogamy yet.) And so did Wystan Hugh Auden begin to read his poems

Or more precisely, to recall them. For he primed his memory banks with a few glances at the text (Faber paperbound edition) and then the voice that sounds like its own echo took over. He addressed the poems casually, even distractedly, to his audience.

But perhaps the distractedness is implicit in the work of this poet, once enfant terrible of the literary world, who mourned Yeats in resigned doggerels and (in a poem he now disowns) watched collapsing Europe, on September 1, 1939, from one of the dives on fifty-second street.

That echoing voice (an almost sepulchral echo, not a weak or tinny one) was lured only twice off the slow, distracted course it set for itself. It was speeded by mirth as it sounded a series of formulaic, four-line epigrams about famous people, and it became even more resonant with some private emotion as it traced through the lines of "The Cave of Making" in Memoriam Louis MacNeice.

A brooding on the first moon landing was the concluding piece, and Mr. Auden, looking somewhat abashed was given an elaborate Irish thanks. He gathered up his papers and Faber paperbound edition, and quickly left the hall, followed by demurely sincere applause.

The North American Tiddlywinks Continentals, which will be held in the Debates Room at Hart House tomorrow and Sunday from 9-5 each day, is the major competition for which all teams strive for representation.

Teams are expected from MIT, Cornell, Philadelphia, Waterloo and Somerville, Mass. to play on the home mats of the Varsity team, the current top Canadian entry and second in the nation for individual play

Members of the Toronto team: Bryon Ateixandroit (captain), graduate engineer Mel Solman; law student Lindsay Horenblas and Wendy Levinson, Glen Kezwer and Barry Corbin — all U of T students. Lani Nathanson is the substitute.

St. Mike's all but clinched fourth place in first division inter-fac hockey play Tuesday by whipping fifth place Law 7-3.

St. Mike's now have 11 points (4-6-3) to Law's (3-8-2) with two games to play

The game was marred by a fight in

The game was marred by a fight in the second period in which St. Mike's Doyle received a five minute major for fighting and a game misconduct. According to the referee, Doyle got his misconduct for giving a Law player a "cheap double-handed shot in the face."

Don Pagnutti led the St. Mike's attack with three goals and an assist. Paul McCann, taking time off from his Parks Department job, added two goals while Brian Burkett and Taylor notched singles. Burkett also set up two of the St. Mike's goals

Duehterlony had a hand in all three Law goals, scoring two himself and setting up John Pennal for the other.

Referees, little Jeff Allen and "Smooth" Angus called nine penalties in the hard-hitting game with five of them going to Law.

St. Mike's outshot Law 21-11.

Notes: In other action U.C. 1 defeated Dents A, 2-1. Bob Snowdon and Larry Nebeta scored for U.C. While Ian Akiyama replied for the Dentists. Innis 1 doubled the score on Knox College, 4-2. MacDonald with 2, Walker and Fromit with singles were the marksmen for Innis while Brian Fraser and Sandy Henderson scored for Knox.

Varsity fights swim politics

College swimming used to be such a simple sport. Each school would enter its fastest swimmers in each event, and the team with the best swimmers would win.

However, at the championship level today, swimming has become a frantic chess game with the student swimmers as the pawns, the pool as the chess board, and an apparently non-existent CIAU team title as the prize.

BUT TO GET TO THE CIAU FINALS, Varsity must first compete in the OQAA league championships — this year set for the new Queens pool on February 19 and 20. Blues have won ten consecutive OQAA titles and are a sure bet for number eleven, but it could be a pyrrhic victory.

Due to the confused state of CIAU swimming politics, should Blues win the OQAA title by, say 150 points (as they could by using only their best swimmers), repeating as national CIAU champs would be virtually impossible.

Well, technically, the CIAU finals are a competition between the five intercollegiate leagues, of which the OQAA is the strongest.

IN REALITY, THE ACTUAL BATTLE is for the individual team title, which doesn't officially exist but for which there is a very real trophy that has been resting in the Hart House trophy case for the past five years.

Thus, the CIAU swimming finals are an all-star meet with an unofficial team meet built in.

"The present situation is really farcical," says Varsity swim coach Robin Campbell.

"At the CIAU level, our swimmers are competing for the U of T — not the OQAA — despite what the league officials might insist."

THE OQAA TEAM WILL UNDOUBTEDLY WIN the official CIAU league championship, but to have any hope of retaining the prestigious team title Blues cannot win the OQAA title by much more than 50 or 60 points.

"To win the CIAU, we have to qualify at least ten or twelve Varsity swimmers at the OQAA finals, and we can't do that and win by 150 points," Campbell explained yesterday.

The OQAA team will consist of 22 swimmers, mainly the first and second place finishers in next weekend's finals plus the best of the third place people to fill the remaining spots.

Varsity will enter 17 swimmers plus diver Alex Lau in the OQAA meet; each swimmer can compete in four events, and there are seventeen pool events plus the one and three metre diving.

And the chess game begins.

BLUES COULD PILE UP A BIG SCORE by using their best ten swimmers four times each, but then only six or seven would make the CIAU team. As last week's 66-47 loss to McGill indicated, Blues great strength lies in team depth, so artful manipulation counts for more than sheer muscle power.

By skillfully arranging his lineup Campbell hopes to induce McGill, McMaster and Waterloo to knock each other off the CIAU team while Blues pick up extra spots from numerous second and third place finishes.

Another irony of the rules is that a swimmer can qualify for the CIAU finals in, say the butterfly, then never swim it at the actual meet. Thus a swimmer specializing in the breaststroke might be too slow to take first or second at the OQAA level and would switch to the backstroke against somewhat slower opponents, then switch back to the breaststroke at the CIAU. It's as if Brian St. John suddenly became a goaltender to make a OQAA all-star hockey team because the coaches already had picked three other centres.

BECAUSE THE WESTERN CONFERENCE is so weak, the powerful University of Alberta will send at least fourteen swimmers to battle the ten or so from Varsity for that non-existent CIAU team title.

"As the rules stand now, McGill and Toronto will cut each other's throats at the OQAA, and Alberta will pick up the pieces at the CIAU," Campbell says.

The situation could be reformed somewhat for the 1971-72 championships as McGill will be in the new all-Quebec league, and with four conferences instead of the present five, each league could send up to thirty swimmers instead of the present twenty-two.

Another possibility for next year is official recognition of the team title by the CIAU so that the Ontario league would be represented by the champion (likely the Blues again) plus any swimmer from another school who happened to win an individual event at the league final.

IN EFFECT, THIS WOULD CREATE a legitimate team competition plus the league competition so highly cherished by the powers at the CIAU.

"It's tough winning a title with only ten swimmers when Alberta has fourteen," Campbell says.

He could have added, but didn't, that it's even tougher when you have the best college swimmers in the country but backroom politics keep some of them off the CIAU team.

The CIAU team should be based strictly on performance in the pool, not on artful political manipulation or the need to soothe a coach's ego.

B-Ball Blues sunk 90-59

By MARTY MEHR

In what was perhaps their worst performance of the season, the basketball Blues were humiliated 90-59 Wednesday night by the Waterloo Warriors in Hart House.

Indeed, had it not been for some cold shooting by the Warriors in the last ten minutes, the point differential would have been much greater.

Blues stayed with the Waterloo team for the first 10 minutes and for a while it looked as if they might repeat last year's surprise upset over the Warriors. However, by half time they trailed 52-22.

Waterloo's talented guard Jaan Laaniste then hit on his first six shots from the outside and that appeared to demoralize Blues who had the coldest half of shooting since a fellow named Naismith nailed a peach basket to a tree.

THROUGHOUT THE game, Waterloo's forwards owned the backboards to such an extent that they were called for offensive goaltending twice in the second half. The red hot shooting Laaniste injured his ankle early in the half and didn't play the remainder of the game.

With eight minutes left and Warriors leading 77-37, Larry Trafford hit on a 20-footer to start Blues on a four-minute scoring binge which brought the score to 79-48 and enabled them to eventually clear the 50-point barrier.

Blues Ron Voake and Bill Casky didn't return from the dressing room after the first half.

Blue Notes: Tops for Blues was Larry Trafford (12), Jerry Barker (11) and Dave Watt (9). Blues complete the season at Western tomorrow, at Guelph next Wednesday and at McMaster next Saturday.

The Varsity — Francois Reber

Blues Dave Watt is man in the middle as he battles for rebound with Warriors Paul Bilewicz (12) and Mike Zuwerkalow (55).

Fem. fencers to finals

Varsity's women foilists continued their winning ways last week by taking first place in the second half of their regional sectional tourney held at Ryerson.

By virtue of their victory in both sectionals, they now advance to the WITCA finals to be hosted by McMaster next weekend.

Lilit Zekulin's consistent and well-executed fencing earned her first place in the individual rankings. Following her were Sharon Takasaki, Pam Chellew, Dorrit deDemeter and Anne Gutierrez, providing a steady back-up to clinch the triumph.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1971-72

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24th 1971

This is the fourth year that a revised method of electing the five student representatives to the University of Toronto Athletic Directorate, will be followed. To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 126 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"

The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"

The nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph.)

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport"

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at this University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence; also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quote properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner

This year, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives

J. P. LOOSEMORE, Secretary
University of Toronto Athletic Association.

York says 1/2 year long enough

Year 'too long' to study Indians

TORONTO (CUP) — The anthropology section of the sociology department at York University has rejected a request by a professor to teach a full year course next year on contemporary Canadian Indians.

Roma Standerfer says she is only being allowed to teach a half year course which in her opinion places the study of Canadian Indians on the same level as studies of Asian and African cultures, which are also half year courses.

Standerfer feels there is a need for more Canadian content in the sociology department and is upset that she is not being allowed to teach a full course.

"I am willing to teach this course and I am not being allowed to," she said. "I offered to teach it as an extra load, I thought it was so important that I was willing to teach three full courses." (She is required by the department to teach only two and a half.)

"There is so much material you could sit and read two years and not read everything," she said.

"Lack of material is not a problem."

Gustav Thaiss, who co-ordinates the seven-man anthropology section in the department, said the section was not yet sure it wanted to major in Canadian studies and was presently developing a "basic program" before specializing.

He said the section wanted to be careful "not to go overboard to become a completely Canadian studies program." Standerfer, he said, was reacting to "the emotionalism of Canadian content."

A half-year course is being offered next year on "North American Indians", he said, which would include some material on Canadian Indians. Other universities in Ontario have Canadian studies programs so there is no real need to develop one at York.

"We felt there is already enough being done on the Canadian Indian. Other universities are doing a good job," he added.

Thaiss also argued that Standerfer is now teaching a course on anthropology and development that deals with Indians and claims the two courses would be "essentially the same."

Standerfer denies this and says she is spending only three weeks on Indians in the course he referred to.

"I feel that students at York who are interested in Canadian Indian people should have an opportunity to take a course that specifically focuses on Canadian Indians," she said.

Library Council on sic-em search

By PHIL CHARKO

A move by the Library Council yesterday to garnish faculty wages for unpaid fines was delayed until next meeting because of sharply divided opinion within the council.

However it defeated a motion to refer the report back to a subcommittee which means months of delay.

The council had accepted in principle the collection of fines from staff. A sub-committee had been set up under engineering professor G. R. Slemmon to investigate and recommend an enforceable procedure. Its recommendations included the creation of a Tribunal of appeal and the garnishing of wages.

History Professor M. R. Powicke called the report "unbearable" and termed the whole "performance of returning books... fines... unacceptable." He mentioned that it was sometimes necessary to keep a book out for a whole year.

R. A. Spencer, also from the History Department, but who is not a member of the council also spoke against the report. Due to time considerations the vote on the motion to accept the report was delayed to next meeting.

It was pointed out that the faculty represent about 6% of the library borrowers and that the present faculty can in effect get permanent loan on particular books.

Even normal borrowing regulation for faculty members are remarkably generous. After a two month loan they can obtain a two month renewal but special circumstances will allow the book to be held indefinitely until called for.

A team of management consultants is presently being employed by the university to suggest a more efficient system.

Electrons for the Library Council have tentatively been scheduled for March 23.

Varsity is world wink capital this weekend

Toronto will be the host this weekend to five teams from across Canada and the United States for the ultimate tiddlywinks competition of 1971.

The North American Tiddlywinks Continentals, which will be held in the Debates Room at Hart House tomorrow and Sunday from 9-5 each day, is the major competition for which all teams strive for representation.

Teams are expected from MIT, Cornell, Philadelphia, Waterloo and Somerville, Mass. to play on the home mats of the Varsity team, the current top Canadian entry and second in the nation for

individual play

Members of the Toronto team: Bryon Alexandroff (captain); graduate engineer Mel Solman; law student Lindsay Horenblas and Wendy Levinson, Glen Kezwer and Barry Corbin — all U of T students. Lani Nathanson is the substitute.

The rise of the popularity of tiddlywinks has been exponential since the time that it was introduced to North America approx-mately six years ago.

Teams have literally sprung up across the nation with expansion clubs in Montreal, Cleveland, California and Florida. Upwards to three teams are forming in some winking towns and playoffs are usually necessary to decide which team will be invited to attend the Continentals.

The Toronto delegation of six winkers anticipate tough competition, mostly from the Ivy-League colleges, but hope to fare well due to the hundreds of hours of practise they have accumulated

St. Mike's all but clinched fourth place in first division inter-fac hockey play Tuesday by whipping fifth place Law 7-3.

St. Mike's now have 11 points (4-6-3) to Law's (3-8-2) with two games to play.

The game was marred by a fight in

The game was marred by a fight in the second period in which St. Mike's Doyle received a five minute major for fighting and a game misconduct. According to the referee, Doyle got his misconduct for giving a Law player a "cheap double-handed shot in the face."

Don Pagnutti led the St. Mike's attack with three goals and an assist. Paul McCann, taking time off from his Parks Department job, added two goals while Brian Burkett and Taylor notched singles. Burkett also set up two of the St. Mike's goals.

Duchterlony had a hand in all three Law goals, scoring two himself and setting up John Pennal for the other.

Referees, little Jeff Allen and "Smooth" Angus called nine penalties in the hard-hitting game with five of them going to Law.

St. Mike's outshot Law 21-11.

Notes: In other action U.C. I defeated Dents A, 2-1. Bob Snowdon and Larry Nebeta scored for U.C. While Ian Akiyama replied for the Dentists. . . Innis I doubled the score on Knox College, 4-2. MacDonald with 2, Walker and Fromit with singles were the marksmen for Innis while Brian Fraser and Sandy Henderson scored for Knox.

Varsity fights swim politics

College swimming used to be such a simple sport. Each school would enter its fastest swimmers in each event, and the team with the best swimmers would win.

However, at the championship level today, swimming has become a frantic chess game with the student swimmers as the pawns, the pool as the chess board, and an apparently non-existent CIAU team title as the prize.

BUT TO GET TO THE CIAU FINALS, Varsity must first compete in the OQAA league championships — this year set for the new Queens pool on February 19 and 20. Blues have won ten consecutive OQAA titles and are a sure bet for number eleven, but it could be a pyrrhic victory.

Due to the confused state of CIAU swimming politics, should Blues win the OQAA title by, say 150 points (as they could by using only their best swimmers), repeating as national CIAU champs would be virtually impossible.

Well, technically, the CIAU finals are a competition between the five intercollegiate leagues, of which the OQAA is the strongest.

IN REALITY, THE ACTUAL BATTLE is for the individual team title, which doesn't officially exist but for which there is a very real trophy that has been resting in the Hart House trophy case for the past five years.

Thus, the CIAU swimming finals are an all-star meet with an unofficial team meet built in.

"The present situation is really farcical," says Varsity swim coach Robin Campbell.

"At the CIAU level, our swimmers are competing for the U of T — not the OQAA — despite what the league officials might insist."

THE OQAA TEAM WILL UNDOUBTEDLY WIN the official CIAU league championship, but to have any hope of retaining the prestigious team title Blues cannot win the OQAA title by much more than 50 or 60 points.

"To win the CIAU, we have to qualify at least ten or twelve Varsity swimmers at the OQAA finals, and we can't do that and win by 150 points," Campbell explained yesterday.

The OQAA team will consist of 22 swimmers, mainly the first and second place finishers in next weekend's finals plus the best of the third place people to fill the remaining spots.

Varsity will enter 17 swimmers plus diver Alex Lau in the OQAA meet; each swimmer can compete in four events, and there are seventeen pool events plus the one and three metre diving.

And the chess game begins.

BLUES COULD PILE UP A BIG SCORE by using their best ten swimmers four times each, but then only six or seven would make the CIAU team. As last week's 66:47 loss to McGill indicated, Blues great strength lies in team depth, so artful manipulation counts for more than sheer muscle power.

By skillfully arranging his lineup Campbell hopes to induce McGill, McMaster and Waterloo to knock each other off the CIAU team while Blues pick up extra spots from numerous second and third place finishes.

Another irony of the rules is that a swimmer can qualify for the CIAU finals in, say the butterfly, then never swim it at the actual meet. Thus a swimmer specializing in the breaststroke might be too slow to take first or second at the OQAA level and would switch to the backstroke against somewhat slower opponents, then switch back to the breaststroke at the CIAU. It's as if Brian St. John suddenly became a goaltender to make a OQAA all-star hockey team because the coaches already had picked three other centres.

BECAUSE THE WESTERN CONFERENCE is so weak, the powerful University of Alberta will send at least fourteen swimmers to battle the ten or so from Varsity for that non-existent CIAU team title.

"As the rules stand now, McGill and Toronto will cut each other's throats at the OQAA, and Alberta will pick up the pieces at the CIAU," Campbell says.

The situation could be reformed somewhat for the 1971-72 championships as McGill will be in the new all-Quebec league, and with four conferences instead of the present five, each league could send up to thirty swimmers instead of the present twenty-two.

Another possibility for next year is official recognition of the team title by the CIAU so that the Ontario league would be represented by the champion (likely the Blues again) plus any swimmer from another school who happened to win an individual event at the league final.

IN EFFECT, THIS WOULD CREATE a legitimate team competition plus the league competition so highly cherished by the powers at the CIAU.

"It's tough winning a title with only ten swimmers when Alberta has fourteen," Campbell says.

He could have added, but didn't, that it's even tougher when you have the best college swimmers in the country but backroom politics keep some of them off the CIAU team.

The CIAU team should be based strictly on performance in the pool, not on artful political manipulation or the need to soothe a coach's ego.

B-Ball Blues sunk 90-59

By MARTY MEHR

In what was perhaps their worst performance of the season, the basketball Blues were humiliated 90-59 Wednesday night by the Waterloo Warriors in Hart House.

Indeed, had it not been for some cold shooting by the Warriors in the last ten minutes, the point differential would have been much greater.

Blues stayed with the Waterloo team for the first 10 minutes and for a while it looked as if they might repeat last year's surprise upset over the Warriors. However, by half time they trailed 52-22.

Waterloo's talented guard Jaan Laaniste then hit on his first six shots from the outside and that appeared to demoralize Blues who had the coldest half of shooting since a fellow named Naismith nailed a peach basket to a tree.

THROUGHOUT THE game, Waterloo's forwards owned the backboards to such an extent that they were called for offensive goaltending twice in the second half. The red hot shooting Laaniste injured his ankle early in the half and didn't play the remainder of the game.

With eight minutes left and Warriors leading 77-37, Larry Trafford hit on a 20-footer to start Blues on a four-minute scoring binge which brought the score to 79-48 and enabled them to eventually clear the 50-point barrier.

Blues Ron Voake and Bill Casky didn't return from the dressing room after the first half.

Blue Notes: Tops for Blues was Larry Trafford (12), Jerry Barker (11) and Dave Wait (9). Blues complete the season at Western tomorrow, at Guelph next Wednesday and at McMaster next Saturday.

The Varsity — Francois Reber

Blues Dave Watt is man in the middle as he battles for rebound with Warriors Paul Bilewicz (12) and Mike Zuwerkalow (55).

Fem. fencers to finals

Varsity's women foilists continued their winning ways last week by taking first place in the second half of their regional sectional tourney held at Ryerson.

By virtue of their victory in both sectionals, they now advance to the WITCA finals to be hosted by McMaster next weekend. Lilit Zekulin's consistent and well-executed fencing earned her first place in the individual rankings. Following her were Sharon Takasaki, Pam Chellew, Dorrit deDemeter and Anne Gutierrez, providing a steady back-up to clinch the triumph.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1971-72 WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24th 1971

This is the fourth year that a revised method of electing the five student representatives to the University of Toronto Athletic Directorate, will be followed. To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 126 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"
- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"
- The nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph.)

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate.

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport"

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at this University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner.

This year, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

Bully Blues molest meek Mac Marlins 9-0

Voyaguers visit tonight and Waterloo Wednesday

By LYNDON LITTLE

While Varsity's unpredictable hockey Blues have had their problems this year against blue-ribbon competition there's one thing they do better than perhaps any other team in the country — work off their frustrations against weaker opponents.

McMaster was the latest victim Wednesday night as Blues turned on the power for a 9-0 hosing of the fifth place Marlins.

It would have been worse had Blues not spent most of the first period neutralizing questionable penalty calls.

Blues will be tested to a greater extent tonight when they play host to the Laurentian Voyaguers at Varsity Arena. Then comes the real biggie, Waterloo's here next Wednesday night.

Coach Tom Watt who had been hoping for a more consistent effort, said "I was pleased. We worked for the entire 60 minutes and did a lot of things right."

ALTHOUGH IT WAS FINE third straight pasting at Varsity hands this season, Mac coach Bill Mahoney indicated he felt Blues haven't been playing as well this year. "I don't like their (Blues') style as well this year," he said. "Last year their defencemen would move ahead with the forward lines as a unit. But this year, the separation between the forward line and the defence, what we call the contact distance appears to be greater."

"I think Blues can be upset this time," he added. "Waterloo looks hungry and very aggressive."

John Wright led the blitz with his first hat-trick of the season. He had registered two-goal games on five previous occasions this year.

Terry Peterman and Bill Buba each added a pair of goals while Kas Lysionek and Scott Seagrist had singles.

Grant Cole stopped 27 McMaster shots to record his first shutout of the season. He also drew an assist on the game's opening goal by Buba.

"You can't heat that," chortled Cole. "A shutout and an assist on the winning goal."

ALTHOUGH HE DIDN'T SCORE, center Brian St. John picked up three assists and gained ground on teammate Peterman in the league scoring race. Peterman leads with 28 points while St. John is second with 24. Wright, who added an assist to his three goals, is in a tie with his left winger Gord Davies for third spot with 22 each.

Waterloo's exceptional first-year star, Dave Farago, is fourth.

For a while it looked as if Blues just might end up on the short end of the penalty totals for one of the few times this season. They began the third period even with Mac but then referee Zip Thompson went to work and the final tally was 10-7 Varsity, all minors.

Blue Notes: Brent Imlach got on for three or four shifts, set up Seagrist's third period marker with a nice pass from the corner and didn't look out of place.

Loyola Warriors clinched first place in the OSLAA Wednesday night when they downed Les Patriotes from Trois-Rivieres, 5-3. The Warriors make the same journey to St. Louis that Blues made over Christmas. They'll play the Billikens tonight and tomorrow. Blues are undefeated on home ice this season. Actually, they have a 16-game streak going that stretches back to the 2-1 loss to Cornell last February.

Varsity goalie Grant Cole had several anxious moments in recording his first shutout of season.

Blues' swimmers may win 11th OQAA

Depth, experience and some talented rookies will be the keys as the Swim Blues seek their eleventh consecutive OQAA title next weekend in Kingston.

Each member of Varsity's eighteen member team has proven he can pick up points in at least one event, and for the most part, Blues will be adding to their totals with two and three finalists in all seventeen races.

Coach Robin Campbell expects victories from Blues seven OQAA record-holders, but is even more optimistic at possible CIAU performances from some of the lesser known swimmers on the squad.

Blues need a strong showing from all eighteen swimmers to provide the points cushion that will permit Campbell to do the lineup juggling necessary to gain more Varsity personnel on the OQAA team going to the national CIAU finals. (see column)

While another OQAA title shouldn't be in much jeopardy, Blues hopes for substantial representation at the CIAU meet will likely depend on such unsung stalwarts as Chris Rockingham, Jock MacRae, Ian Dalrymple, Russ Farquhar, Adam Gesing, John Peters and diver Alex Lau.

Rockingham, in third year arts at Vic, is strictly a free-styler but can place well at any distance from 200 to 1650 yards. Last year, he took fifth in the 1000 and sixth in the 500; this time, Campbell expects something even better.

MacRAE CAME OUT of nowhere to star in several of Blues dual meet triumphs and should be right at home in the pressure of the league finals. A capable performer in several strokes, he gives the team important versatility in the medley and relay events. An accomplished medical illustrator, he designed Varsity's attractive swimming brochure as well.

Dalrymple almost didn't make the final team, but overcame illness and a slow start to posted several respectable seed times for the 100-yard freestyle. He'll be used mainly in the distance events, where Blues hope to pick up a lot of free points from psyched-out opponents.

Mother Farquhar commutes daily to practice from the wilds of Scarborough College, but has stopped complaining about the distance long enough to grab spots in the 100 and 200-yard backstroke. After he involuntarily sheds about two pounds in surplus plumage, Farquhar should make the top three in each event.

Gesing seems to be Blues forgotten freestyler, yet he won two events in Wednesday's 65-29 romp over McMaster and can hold his own in both distance and relay events. With each swimmer eligible for four events at the OQAA meet, Gesing should have ample opportunity to qualify for the CIAU showdown.

PETERS WON THE consolation final in the 200 freestyle last year, and should be able to make the top six this time plus help out in the freestyle relays.

Lau, of course, is the slender freshman engineer who gives Blues their first solid contender in the diving in many years. He'll have trouble making the CIAU standards this season, but any points he picks up will afford Campbell that much more leeway in his hattle permutations.

Barring a complete collapse, Blues will take OQAA championship number eleven, but the wacky CIAU rules and the greed of opposing coaches demand a 100 per cent performance from each swimmer if Varsity is to have any hope of retaining that all-important (but technically non-existent) CIAU team title.

The 200-yard backstroke begins in meet with Mac Wednesday. Blues won 65-29.

Faculty Council takes hard line

Backed by threats of punitive action on the part of the administration, the arts and science faculty council has declared itself virtually in a state of siege.

The next meeting of the council's general committee will be held behind closed doors Monday. No location has been released yet, but the possibility of moving the meeting off-campus has been discussed.

This decision was taken at the end of a stormy general committee meeting last Friday which was continuously disrupted by student members present.

Council chairman and U of T provost Jack Sword ruled that one student member, Norman Rogers, could no longer participate in the council's meetings.

The status of the remaining 33 students on the council remains uncertain.

University lawyers were in attendance at the Friday meeting to give advice on whether the university could seek an injunction to halt student disruptions of the normal business of the arts and science faculty council.

Meanwhile, the parity restructuring committee, set up following the defeat in January by the faculty council of a proposal to establish a similar body, has entered the final stages of its work.

A preliminary draft of their report, written by the body of six students, six faculty and three teaching assistants, appears on pages 6 and 7 of today's Varsity.

The committee continues to meet this week to finalize the report and is expected to release a full text by the end of the week.

The highlight of the draft is a proposal to replace the present 1300-man faculty council by a body of 100 students, 100 faculty, 27 administrators and 27 teaching assistants.

A mass meeting has been set for students for 1 p.m. tomorrow in the foyer of Sid Smith to discuss what tactics students should adopt in the face of the new hard-line displayed by Simcoe Hall and the faculty council.

Injunction, cops may be used to stop disruption

By SUTHERLAND BROWN

The door is open for the U of T administration to seek police assistance against any further student disruption of Arts and Science faculty business.

However, the university is not yet committed to legal action and is apparently still undecided whether to ignore or to crush student obstruction on the parity issue.

It was suspected at last Friday's disrupted meeting of the general committee of the Faculty Council that the administration was preparing to take legal measures.

Two university lawyers were in the audience taking students' names, it is believed. The lawyers then investigated the possibilities of securing an injunction preventing the named students from further disruption, or of laying conspiracy charges against the offending students, rumours said.

The advantage of a court injunction would be that anyone violat-

Disruption stops; 6 courses win pass-fail

By ALEX PODNICK

Students active in the parity struggle suspended their disruption tactics last Tuesday, Feb. 16, to allow the Arts and Science Faculty's Evaluations Committee to approve a pass-fail grading system for six arts courses.

The implementation of the system is contingent upon the approval of the general committee of the faculty council which has so far been unable to meet due to student disruptions.

The courses under discussion are CIN 203, CIN 301, CIN 303, FSM 300, CIN 201 and University 100.

The faculty members rejected a student invitation to participate in an open meeting to discuss evaluation proposals.

Erindale Dean E. A. Robinson, maintained that the existing university legal system must operate in its present form until legitimately altered. Dean Albert Allen of Arts and Science supported him, demanding students either accept the committee as officially constituted or settle for no meeting at all.

Both speakers later attempted to intimidate the students, warning that their fellow undergraduates would hold them responsible for any effects of the disruption tactics.

Robinson noted, "Only one group will suffer... it's the students".

Allen threatened that unless the disruptions stopped nobody would get their examination results or degrees. Claiming both faculty and students had ignored his advice, he told them not to expect "the administration to get anyone out of this mess".

Despite Allen's insistence that students accept the committee rules, he and committee secretary Assistant Dean W. D. Foulds did not feel similarly bound.

When questioned about the time and place of the evaluations committee meeting, Foulds, who described student non-recognition of the Faculty Council and its sub-committees as "bloody nonsense", refused to tell student Faculty Council members about the meeting. Backing him up, Allen assumed full responsibility for the decision.

According to Faculty Council rules, any Council member has the right to attend sub-committee meetings.

Allen and Foulds later refused to tell students where and when the Undergraduate Studies sub-committee meeting scheduled for Wednesday would be held.

After Allen claimed not to know the details, Foulds was asked for the information. He refused, saying he would reply only on the orders of the chairman of the General Committee, Vice-President Jack Sword. Allen consequently refused to order Foulds to reply, confessing, "We operate within our own framework".

Despite these attempts to disenfranchise the student members of the committee and Allen's intransigent adherence to the formal rules of the Council, the students cooperated with the faculty in discussing the various proposals for pass-fail approval.

In evaluating the requests CIN professor Chris Plowright advocated the pass-fail system, commenting that the professors requesting the system for their courses "don't feel students' performance in all courses can be ordained". Since it's impossible to compare different types of work, it doesn't matter what the mark is, he said. However, since some students involved in the concerned courses need marks for admission to other institutions, the professors were recommending that they be allowed the option of requesting a mark.

Allen expressed reservations about the proposal. University regulations require students to receive a minimum number of Cs or better for their B.A.

Allen suggested the Faculty would regard pass grades as the equivalent of a D and that this could have an adverse effect on a student's success in obtaining his B.A.

he proposed avoiding this problem by modifying the pass-fail system to include "credit" standing. A credit would be the equivalent of a C or better, according to Allen's plan.

Unless this modified system were adopted, faculty members who felt a pass grade should be a C or better would have no alternative but to fail D students, Allen commented.

FSM Professor Jim Lemon dismissed Allen's objections as hypothetical and "not really relevant". He doubted whether there would be any D students in the courses under discussion. Either the students will have made an effort to accomplish something worthwhile or they will have done insufficient work.

Allen warned that "you can expect considerable opposition to the pass-fail system", especially from graduate and professional schools and students applying to them.

Plowright and most of those present, including the students, rejected Allen's argument. Plowright noted that as long as we provide regular grades, professional and graduate schools will continue to demand them.

At present, undergraduates need a C or better in three-fifths of their courses to qualify for a B.A. Since pass standing in a pass-fail course would not be considered a C, the Evaluations Committee recommended to the Committee on Standing that the requirement be changed so a student would only require Cs or better in three-fifths of those courses he takes which have numerical or letter marks.

Other business of the committee included its ruling that the Erindale College section of HIS 100 must hold its final examination in the regular examination period, although the college may give the exam questions to students in advance. The college had wanted to hold the final examination during class time.

The committee refused to endorse a student suggestion that it disband itself as proposed by the parity negotiating committee report.

If Food Science abolished. . .

Property windfall accrues to university

By MARCIA SINGER

If the university decides to eliminate the faculty of Food Sciences, it will be losing a faculty, but gaining control of property worth $742,250.

According to K. S. Gregory, administrative assistant, Simcoe Hall, the Food Sci building is worth $350,000, and the land $392,250.

Situated at the corner of Bloor and Queen's Park, the building was donated by Lillian Massey Treble in 1907 for the use of the faculty of Household Sciences, now Food Sciences.

According to the gift deed, on elimination of the faculty, the university has the option to buy the building from Victoria College. If the university decides against buying the building, Victoria College has the option to buy the building and the land from the university.

Whether Victoria College or the university become the owner, the property may be used in any way desired.

While the university or Vic would probably not sell the property, according to David Claringbold, secretary to the Board of Governors, they could very well rent it to a developer.

Vic now owns the land on which the Colonnade is built and rents the land to the Colonnade.

The land on which the Food Sci building is situated is now zoned as residential for all types. This includes high-rise apartments. A re-zoning of the land as commercial would greatly increase the value of the land. This re-zoning is quite conceivable since land on the north side of Bloor and to the east of the building along Bloor is zoned as commercial.

A month ago, Dr. John Hamilton, vice-president health sciences, proposed a phase-out of the faculty of Food Sciences without consulting faculty or students.

Last Wednesday, the executive council of the senate heard briefs prepared by faculty and students of Food Sci arguing for the continuation of the faculty. Up to now the council has made no decision as to the future of Food Sci and the $742,250 investment at Bloor and Queen's Park.

That proud mistress of Avenue Road could become the object of greedy land speculators.

Senate executive focus of massive protest

By ART MOSES

The Faculty of Food Sciences got a chance to defend itself against oblivion Wednesday Feb. 17 before the executive committee of the University of Toronto Senate.

Faculty, students and alumni of the faculty all disputed the proposal of U of T vice-president (Health Sciences) John Hamilton to begin phasing out Food Sciences, by not accepting first year students next September.

The Senate Chamber was packed for the occasion although U of T President Claude Bissell told the audience the executive committee would not make any decision until it had a chance to consider the briefs presented to it.

Acting Food Sciences Dean Susan Armstrong told the executive committee "the concept represented by the Faculty of Food Sciences should have a place on the U of T campus."

In the faculty brief she presented Armstrong recommended that the Food Sciences faculty re-institute courses required for Type "A" certification in home economics. This was a point repeated by others who spoke to the executive committee.

Alumni representative Shirley Cornfield said since the announcement of Hamilton's proposal she had received 700 letters from Food Sciences graduates asking that the proposal be shelved.

"After 68 years of giving to the community so many respected professionals the University is doing a great disservice if it can't give satisfactory answers to the alumni."

Cornfield said the Food Sciences faculty was necessary for many segments of the community.

She was supported by Eleanor Sorhorne, executive director of the Canadian Dietetic Association who said while Ontario hospitals currently require 725 dieticians the actual supply is only 446.

Debbie Laskin, president of the Food Sciences student council, said it is unrealistic to suppose the faculty could be phased out smoothly as Hamilton envisaged, since many faculty members would leave and standards would drop.

"The students believe in the future of the faculty as we can see from the numbers here today even though it is Reading Week. The faculty is relevant to today's life style because man's basic needs will always be food, clothing and shelter."

Faculty proponents were supported by several outsiders including representatives of the College of Education, Canadian Institute of Food Technology and the Toronto Nutrition Committee. All pledged support for the Faculty's efforts.

No decision was reached by the executive committee which used Wednesday's meeting as an informational session.

Injunction or cops may be used to stop disruption

• from page one

it would automatically be in contempt of court and subject to arrest. The university could in this way avoid some of the stigma of "calling the cops".

U of T President Claude Bissell's statement read at the close of Friday's disruption certainly implied harsh action:

"These disruptions must cease. Any student contributing to or participating in such disruptions is committing a serious offence and will be dealt with accordingly."

Bissell told the Varsity yesterday that he still stands behind that statement.

However the mostly constitutional nature of Friday's disturbance caught senior administrators off guard. They apparently anticipated overt physical obstruction of the meeting. Simcoe Hall lawyers advised that the case for an injunction on the basis of Friday's events was weak.

Accordingly the injunction proceedings have been prepared, but not proceeded with. Until yesterday it appeared that the university would await the results of the General Committee meeting scheduled for next Monday.

Yesterday, however, a high administrative official told one student leader that an injunction would be sought today to take effect Monday. Metro police would be requested to attend Monday's meeting and serve the injunction, he said.

The student then phoned a police official who confirmed that 50 police had been requested for Monday.

President Bissell and Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen could not be reached for comment last night on the police rumour.

Obtaining an injunction against disruption by student non-members of Faculty Council would be straightforward, particularly if General Committee votes to meet in closed session.

If student members of General

Committee continue to filibuster and otherwise use the committee's rules to keep the committee at a standstill, legal measures against them would be difficult, however.

The student members could retaliate with legal action of their own. The General Committee and its chairman, Provost Jack Sword, clearly violated committee rules on several occasions last Friday, and faculty as well as students participated in "disorderly" conduct in the heat of the conflict.

Fac council suspends Rogers after procedural hassle

Procedural disruption of the general committee meeting of the faculty of Arts and Science on Friday was followed by noise disruption as Chairman Jack Sword refused to obey the council's own internal rules and suspended student member Norman Rogers.

Nearly 100 students, both members and observers, had arrived close to two o'clock the scheduled meeting time, while Sword awaited late faculty.

Sword asked Rogers if he recognized the authority of the Faculty Council. Amidst calls from the floor that Sword had no right to ask questions of that nature, Sword asserted that if Rogers did not recognize the authority of the council, he could be present but could neither speak at the meeting nor vote.

Sword disagreed, ruling that Rogers could not speak, and suspending him from the body — an illegal move under Faculty by-laws.

Challenged by the floor, Sword held a vote on his ruling in which many of the non-members sitting in the audience voted (mostly against Sword).

Sword declared he had been upheld and tried to proceed with the agenda of the meeting in the middle of several points of order.

One student member wanted a roll call vote on Roger's disenfranchisement, which he may request according to the rules of the faculty council.

Sword ignored the request.

Finally, bowing to the pressure of repeated calls from the floor, Sword said "I am putting to the meeting that there be a roll call vote on the motions that there be a count of ayes and noes."

He then changed the motion again to ask if all votes should be by roll call. (By the rules of the council, while occupying the chair, the chairman cannot take part in the debate and thus is not empowered to move motions in any case)

On the motion put forward by Sword, a vote was held and it was decided by 11 yes, 56 no and 1 abstention that future votes would not be by roll call.

Several students pointed out to the committee that the motion was unconstitutional in any case.

Rogers read from these rules that the rules of the house could only be suspended in emergency and by unanimous consent. By no stretch of the imagination could it be said that there was unanimous consent to these rule suspensions.

Sword proceeded haltingly.

The committee then approved a vote that all future meetings of the committee be held in camera. This contradicts Rule 10 of the council which states that "The Council may move into closed session to consider a specified item of business." By the House of Commons rules, a rule may only be permanently changed if there is advance notice given.

"What happens to a dream deferred?

The Faculty Council: retreat into childishness

The faculty of arts and science is in a state of bankruptcy, verging on total collapse.

The issue of student participation in the governing of the faculty has simply refused to die.

The faculty council has demonstrated an astonishing capacity to head back into the dark ages.

This tendency was first displayed by the decision in January to disallow the establishment of a faculty-student parity committee to make recommendations on the restructuring of the council.

But last Friday, (the general committee of the faculty council met Friday, figuring few students would be on campus during Reading Week), the council took an even more ominous step.

Council chairman Jack Sword strove valiantly to propell the meeting through its agenda of "regular business", but was constantly interrupted by various "legal" and perfectly "constitutional" forms of obstruction — points of order, motions for adjournment, requests for roll call votes.

During the course of the meeting one professor attempted physically to prevent a student from indulging in his particular form of disruption — playing taped music from time to time.

That intervention was, it seems, merely a taste of stronger things to come.

Lawyers were present Friday to advise the university of the possibility of obtaining a court injunction to prevent students from disrupting any further meetings of the council. It is reported that as many as 50 Metro police will be in attendance at the Monday meeting to enforce such an injunction.

But the most significant backward step taken by the council Friday was a decision to hold its next meeting behind closed doors, in secret.

It was almost exactly four years ago that the governing bodies of the university began, one by one, to open their doors to the rest of the university community and make their formal decisions in the public eye.

Students insisted that they would refuse to participate in any university bodies which did not meet in open session, where non-members could not observe and participate in their deliberations.

The Varsity — Dan Griffith

At that time, administrators and faculty who sat on these various bodies — ranging from the Senate itself down to faculty, college and departmental meetings — insisted that they had nothing to hide about their decision-making, and that secrecy was a hangover from a different kind of university.

Openness was the initial gesture of good faith which initiated the process of student participation in running the university.

As a principle of operation for a university which considers itself a "community", openness is an unquestionable pre-requisite.

What, it may be asked, does the faculty council have to hide?

The answer appears to be very straightforward — it wants to hide its refusal to deal in a responsible manner with demands favoured by the overwhelming majority of students in arts and science.

Behind closed doors, of course, they will not have to worry about embarrassing questions from mere students about the childishness of ignoring the fact that students are no longer content with their apprentice status in the university, but are demanding a full citizenship in the educational process, with the rights and obligations that carries.

In contrast to the panicky behaviour of the faculty council, another group of students and faculty have managed to perform some fruitful work together.

The parity restructuring committee — including six students, six faculty and three teaching assistants — is entering the final stages of the preparation of its report on how best to restructure the faculty council. (We might remember that the council itself did set this work as a priority for this academic year, but seems to have abdicated that task rather than deal responsibly with students.)

On pages 6 and 7 of today's paper, you can read a preliminary draft of the parity committee's report. Although the report will not be finalized until later this week, and sections may be added the bulk of it is available for discussion at this point.

At 1 p.m. tomorrow students will meet in Sidney Smith Hall to consider what tactics to adopt in order to keep the faculty council aware of an important political fact — the existence of students.

So far administrators — right from Claude Bissell himself — all down the line — have refused to recognize this.

Instead they have resorted to punitive threats and a menacing retreat into the past.

Only a united effort on the part of students and faculty who support an open and socially responsible university can challenge this retreat.

Who are your gods, Dr. Bissell?

By PETER HALL

DEAN ALLEN IS STANDING at the microphone sonorously moving adoption of a committee report, a student stands simultaneously reading from the Rules of Order, the Chairman calls repeatedly for a vote — suddenly the sound of the Internationale rises in the room and a hundred students begin to sing Solidarity Forever — a hundred faculty members wave their hands in the air; many shout and shake their fists at the students.

The Faculty of Arts and Science has broken down.

Faculty members and students are facing each other across a widening emotional chasm. Each side reacts to the other with bitter alienation. The students, after a year of patience and working through the normal channels without results see no alternative but disruption. Faculty members, already afraid to let students come near committees affecting their jobs, are progressively appalled at the behaviour of the disrupting students.

BUT I AM APPALLED at the complacent 'laissez-faire' attitude of the administration of this university which refuses to take any constructive action to resolve this issue. From the very beginning of the present crisis Simcoe Hall has stood aside quietly while its largest Faculty disintegrated into chaos.

At no point has President Bissell made any statement concerning the underlying issues here. His only move, an abortive proposal to get a court injunction, was designed forcibly to restore order, not to resolve the basic questions. I am reminded of Gladstone's comment about another administration: "If the people are silent you call them content; if they protest you say they are given to disorder; and in the one case as in the other they can look to you for nothing."

THEIR ONLY SIGN of concern has been for order, stability and procedural normality. Ignoring calls for debate, rules of order, and most other trappings of democracy, Jack Sword, Vice-President of the University and Chairman of the Faculty Council tried to ram through committee reports unread and undebated, just for the sake of having them rubberstamped. The work of the university must go on — even if its mechanisms are a farce.

Eventually the administration is going to be able to keep the students in the Faculty Council quiet. If that is all they are concerned about they can simply outwait us. But if they have any more fundamental concern for the basic issues behind the students' actions they are going to have to treat the causes of those actions. They are going to have to investigate and resolve the basic inequities and defects in the education and organization of the faculty of Arts and Science.

The Faculty of Arts and Science is deadlocked.

WHAT WE NEED NOW is an opening for dialogue not a passion for order or normality. That can only come from the administration of this university. I want to know: What are your gods, Claude Bissell? — order and stability or a concern for the people and the education you direct? What are your gods?

The faculty council: a fantasy

By BRIAN JOHNSON

THE GENERAL COMMITTEE of the Faculty Council creeps around the campus looking for a quiet place to talk. Students are everywhere. The senior faculty are chiefs-of-staff exiled from their armchairs, and dreaming of an insulated war-room with maps and pins and lights that flash on and off in times of emergency.

Claude Bissell, chief surgeon at the Simcoe Hall Hospital for Campus Disorder, huddles with his magicians and prescribes sedatives to cure the most recent convulsions in the student body. Meanwhile, the governing structures, suffering from severe coronary pains, are gingerly wheeled into the operating room.

Students disrupt the business, stop it and demand that something happen.

BISSELL PEELS OFF HIS marshmallow mitts and shakes his fist. He offers to discipline the student noise. Curt messages prophesying law and order easily replace the old-style rhetoric of compromise and good faith, of committees lubricated with sherry served up to student leaders.

A President who used to walk around campus and mouth parity in public now peers from his well-appointed trench and sends his note via U of T Vice-President John Sword, who reads the words to some students who were enjoying the General Committee meeting he was chairing last Friday.

IF YOU LISTENED CAREFULLY, behind the music you could hear the motion to shift business behind closed doors being moved and passed. With protection guaranteed by Simcoe Hall, the General Committee looks for a quiet spot to complete its frustrated business without being caught in the act by student observers SPRING CAME LATE that year.

A column of hunched figures, cloaked in white from head to foot, trudged through the snow to an abandoned barn that stands near an unused concession road in rural Southern Ontario.

The door opens for each member who knocks correctly, performs a complicated and mysterious hand-shake, mutters the password.

Inside the barn, the General Committee of the Faculty Council sits to do business. After choral pounding of gavels and waving of rules, the entire assembly rises with clasped hands and prays for a safe return to its cloistered homeland.

"THE FIRST ITEM on the agenda is heresy," says Vice-Magician John Sword-in-Hand.

A young faculty member, bearing the emaciated posture of someone not unfamiliar with the dungeons of the academic guild, steps up to a makeshift witness stand.

"You are accused of heresy," the Chairman tells him. The conch shakes slightly in the inexperienced hands. "Are you now, or have you ever been, in league with the students?"

"Just some casual friends. No working relationship," the young professor answered.

"TAKE HIM OUT to the Holy Waters of pure thought," the Chairman commanded, "Tie his hands. Blindfold and gag him. Throw him in. If he sinks, he is proved guilty, and if he floats he is granted tenure . . .

The war is over

The latest available figures indicate that in the last month or so food prices in Toronto have increased by about three per cent.

In this article Mary Omatn takes a quick look back at the "price war" which has apparently already been won and lost.

BRUCE WEST WROTE in Monday's Globe and Mail that "the war is over." He wasn't alluding to the wars in South-East Asia, the Middle East, South America, Africa, and the American cities unfortunately. The particular war in question, was a Canadian war (not involving the FLQ), the one waged in the aisles of our supermarkets. And certainly a casual stroll through Dominion or Loblaw's would only prove that this is so.

Prices are starting to edge their way back up, and once more, we are being forced to return to the 101 delights of hamburger. Now that some degree of normalcy has returned to the grocery shelves, we can look at the past six months' wheeler-dealing with some objectivity.

DOMINION'S PRESIDENT, Tom McCormick, certainly did not seem to have any Machiavellian plan up his sleeve, when he started the ball rolling. Said McCormick:

"Dominion's actions were simply part of a well calculated risk to increase volume sales sufficiently (at the expense of their competitors) to make up for any losses through price cuts."

Those of us with more suspicious minds have credited Dominion with other motives:

1) weed out the independent competition. The small independent businessman, with his smaller selection, lack of shelf space and shorter hours, was finding himself hard pressed to compete with the large chains, even before the price cutting began. One can only surmise how many have survived the past six months.

2) cut overhead costs

The reasoning behind this argument goes like this: with more food for his money, the consumer will put up with longer lines at the checkout counter, less service, lower quality meat, and less selection. As a result of this move, supermarket staff have either been laid off, been asked to work fewer hours, or been denied usual pay benefits. A. & P. workers went on strike to protest against their company's economy drive policy, that was largely at their expense.

3) destroy discount shopping as a marketing policy.

Marketing economists believe Dominion wanted all the large chains to become discount, and thus destroy the advantage the discount chains had over the non-discount stores. Then they reason, with prices fairly equal across the board, market shares of the major chains would return to their pre-discount level, with most customers returning to their original supermarket.

In other words, a return to the pecking order established long before Miracle Mart, I.G.A., and Busy Bee first threatened the status quo, two years ago.

MOST PROBABLY ALL of these factors played some part in Dominion's decision to go discount. Stock brokers advise that retail (grocery) stocks are "unhealthy." Compared to other large businesses, profit margins in the food industry are very small. Dominion's is 1.1%, Steinberg's 1.4%, as compared with, for instance, Stelco's 8-10%.

Although food sales increased in the past year, so did wages and other costs. Consequently, profits for companies like Dominion fell slightly. The retail food business perhaps more than most other industries is closely tied to the cost of living index, and since government controls inhibit the chains from raising their prices proportionately, and consumption does not increase very significantly from year to year, the chains have been finding themselves hard put to keep up with spiraling costs.

Certainly, the events which will follow are more important than the short term "price war". Retail analysts predict that shopping will become "more automated", that warehouses will be huge inventory centres, and that chains will branch out into other related businesses. Currently more are buying their own farms, building their own bakeries, and pushing their own brand products. There is speculation that Dominion will buy a jug milk chain, and Leon Weinstein of Loblaw's has publicly mentioned that his chain is thinking of going into the ready-to-serve food industry. Steinberg is buying controlling shares in various other lines of operation. These include Miracle Mart, real estate (Ivanhoe Corporation) and a drive-in menu business called Pik-Nik.

WHERE DO WE THE CONSUMERS, fit into this highly competitive game of board room politics? No doubt at the pay-out counter. Ultimately, it is we, who will pay for the past six month's extravaganza.

The sad part is that just as we played no part in lowering the prices, we will have no power in keeping them down.

Draft proposal for a new Faculty Council in Arts and Sciences

After three weeks of meeting, the restructuring committee for the Faculty of Arts and Sciences has prepared draft proposals for a new Faculty Council. The restructuring committee was set up by a mass meeting Jan. 29 following the boycott of classes and festival that sprang up after hard-line faculty dumped parity in an action-fraught Faculty Council meeting. Students walked out declaring the existing Council illegitimate. A new restructuring committee was formed consisting of six students, six faculty and three teaching assistants.

(a) INTRODUCTION:

These recommendations are being made with the profound hope that the structure herein suggested will be palatable to all groups involved in teaching and learning in the Faculty of Arts and Science at the University of Toronto. We have attempted to draw on the experiences, successes and failures of previous restructuring attempts and thus some of the recommendations in this section may be familiar to some of you. Finally, with respect to individual recommendations, we have attempted to be as specific as possible and where confusion could arise we have attempted to provide a short rationalization for our point of view.

OBJECTIVES

We have endeavored as far as possible to offer specific recommendations on the restructuring of the Council. The recommendations have been framed, however, within a broader set of objectives.

The Council should be a policy-making body and to whatever extent possible matters of detail should be dealt with by committees of the Council. Certain functions performed by the Council, that is, at present by the General Committee of the Council, should be devolved to departments so as to further tidy up the work of the Council and to permit greater flexibility among the departments of the faculty. Finally, if the Council is to make serious policy decisions, it must be permitted to discuss and advise on the budget of the faculty.

In our view, there are four constituencies which should be represented on the Council: students, teaching staff, teaching assistants, and the administration. Teaching assistants are not presently represented on the Council but this is not defensible given the amount of teaching which is in fact done by teaching assistants. The first two constituencies are the largest, and they therefore deserve much heavier representation than the other two. Furthermore, there should be parity in the representation of these two constituencies. We believe that these criteria would be met on a Council with the proportions of four students, four teaching staff, one teaching assistant and one administrator.

We have endeavored to clarify and give substance to the concept of parity. This issue, however, must be settled with reference to the constituencies which should be represented on the Council and to the functions which should be performed by the Council vis a vis the departments, the Dean's Office, and the committees of the Council.

Principles of Membership to the Full Council

Recommendations
(1) The meetings of the Council and its committees shall be normally open with the committees being required to petition to the Council for permission to set any other policy for their meetings.

(2) The Council instruct the Dean's Office to negotiate with the various student and faculty organizations to set up election times and procedures which are convenient for those organizations.

(3) Each elected member of Council shall be empowered to appoint one named alternate from his/her constituency to act as full voting member of council in his/her absence and that each member and alternate be eligible for full membership on the committees of council. We further recommend that because of the specific difficulties with representation for the Part Time Students that they be allowed two legal alternates for each member they have on council.

(4) A quorum of 100 shall be set for meetings of the council and a quorum of 50% of the members be set for any committee except the divisional committees.

(5) The full council as herein described meet regularly (we suggest not more than four times per academic session) but infrequently.

(6) The full council meet at such time in the day as to allow full and meaningful debate before policy items on the agenda.

(7) The Dean's Office shall set up an appeals procedure to the new General Council (herein described) which allows:

a) Special Meetings of the council to be called for matters of substantial importance.

b) Items to be added to the agenda of the regularly scheduled meetings which have been considered and rejected by the Steering Committee.

This appeals procedure should be presented to the first meeting of the full council as restructured for approval.

This recommendation supports the principle that the council should be directly accessible to its constituents provided any item has enough support to meet the requirements of the appeals procedure.

(8) We further recommend that the basic structural composition of this council be reviewed by an internal review committee after the council has met for two full academic sessions.

(9) We recommend that for the purpose of election constituencies teaching Staff in Arts and Science be defined as those members of the Faculty of Arts and Science of the rank of lecturer and above excluding those administrators who are specifically defined in the recommendations for the administrative estate to follow:

STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE COUNCIL

(a) INTRODUCTION:

We have examined the function and membership of the existing council's committees. These recommendations attempt to concretize our principles with respect to devolution of authority to the area(s) where it is most efficiently and fairly held.

(b) COMMITTEES:

Committees of the Council struck by Council shall consist of ten members. Students and teaching staff are entitled to two, not more than five, representatives each on any committee. Teaching assistants and the administration are entitled to at least, if not more than three, representatives each. In this way, each constituency on the council is ensured of some, but not excessive, representation on each committee. In the event the council while applying these rules cannot elect the full complement to any committee, then the rules should not be applied in choosing additional members either by election by the council or by the elected members of the committee exercising power to add.

Because of the special role of the Steering Committee, relative to other committees, it shall be larger, meaning 21 members, and the constituencies represented in the same proportions as on the council, namely eight students, eight teaching staff, two teaching assistants, and two administrators, with the Dean of the Faculty as chairman.

STANDING COMMITTEES

1. STEERING COMMITTEE — no legislative power FUNCTION:

a) Set Agendas for the meeting of the council which must be approved by that council.

b) Receive all reports and decide on their disposition (within the constraint that anyone may specifically request a copy of a particular report and be entitled to it, even if they are not members of the council).

c) Review carefully all reports to determine if they require policy changes of council and if they do require change this committee shall have the power to request that a clear statement of the policy change involved be framed by the committee or persons writing the report so that it would be possible for council to vote on that policy change at its next regular meeting.

d) To recommend the creation of "ad hoc" committees as required and to be the striking committee for such committees.

e) Receive requests for additions to the agenda of council and refer them to the correct committee if possible.

f) To be struck by council.

2. BUDGET COMMITTEE — no legislative power

a) Must have access to all budgetary information affecting the faculty, including only blocks of salary allocation (eg. Department allocation). Therefore, departments should deal with individual salaries.

b) Must be an open committee except where the Council makes a specific policy on closure for specific areas of discussion.

c) Responsible for receiving curriculum, reports and particular requests for funds and then recommending priorities and total needs to the council, which in turn will recommend to the Dean or proper financing body.

d) Responsible for discussing and recommending to council the broad distribution policy of the actual budget.

e) To be struck by council.

3. INTERDISCIPLINARY COMMITTEE Reports to council directly through Steering Committee

a) To coordinate and discuss the ongoing interdisciplinary courses sponsored by the faculty.

b) To act as idea generator for new experimental courses and area studies.

c) Able to recommend the beginning of new departments of whole groups of courses.

d) Responsible for recommendations to the Budget committee as to the cost of its proposed programmes.

e) Responsible for setting priorities on its proposed programmes.

f) Responsible for division of this budget according to the priorities in (e) after they have been approved by council.

g) Promote interdisciplinary studies and area studies wherever it feels there is a need for such promotion.

h) To be struck by council.

RELATION TO THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ACT AND THE EXISTING FACULTY COUNCIL

(A) INTRODUCTION

The committee recognized that changes in the University of Toronto Act will require a good deal of time but we also recognize the great importance of bringing about immediate change in the governing of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

(B) RECOMMENDATIONS

1) the existing full Council of the Faculty as defined in the University of Toronto act devolves its powers to the restructured council as detailed in this report.

2) Upon amendment of the University of Toronto Act the legal council of the Faculty of Arts and Science become the council as structured in this report.

waving and energetic vocal response required at all appropriate times." I didn't want my losenge that badly. But BILL might know when I'd be able to get in to see how power works.

Knock, knock, Whadyawant? When does the Convention start? Three. Shut the door. When can I get in the doors? I dunno. Shut the door. Listen man, I'm not trying to cause trouble, I'm interested. When can I get in? Go to hell, kid. I dunno, dunno. Now shut the Jesus door. It's getting cold. So much for the friendly friends of Bill.

A New Wave.
I'm not a delegate.
Screw me.

Back at the Gardens the voting machines had just arrived. The doors weren't open, but I've never seen a voting machine before. So I take a look. Funny numbers on them — NY2998. They belong to the Board of Elections of the City of New York. Nobody knows why. Why does it matter where the hell they came from, a YOUNG PROGRESSIVE tells me, they work.

Sure they work.
So do I.

It's nice to see that the New Wave is working for somebody, though.

Roar of the Wave, as heard by student

A New Wave. THE FUTURE. A New Leader. THE FUTURE. New, New, New.

It's Thursday afternoon (Feb. 11 — ed.) and I just came here after trying to get into the Progressive Conservative Leadership Convention.

"No, sir, I'm not a delegate, I'm just a student. But I'd like to see what's going on. Please."

Well, said the scaly old man at the EAST exit, you can get into the greens and the grays on the WEST side.

Thank you. Of course when I tried the WEST side, I was told that the public was only admitted on the EAST side. Of Course. Then the man on the EAST side laughed and told me that the doors wouldn't open until twelve.

Fine. I came back at twelve. The doors were opening at one. At one they would open at one-thirty, maybe. Nobody seemed to be really sure about it, and nobody cared. Twelve old men, blue and shiny, ignorant and ugly, protecting the Conservatives — all at one door.

Believing rather naively that I could get a meaningful response from one of the delegates, men who were, after all, concerned with what I, as a voter, thought about them, I headed for a trailer across the street from the Gardens. Outside were hideous yellow signs screaming

DAVIS

DAVIS. I looked at a ticket someone had shoved in my hand a few moments earlier. It entitled me to a sign and one free throat losenge, to be used simultaneously at six o'clock at the time of the Davis demonstration. It told me where to sit, what to yell, and ended with the statement, "Brisk sign

It seems to make no difference either that, according to the security of Wilson Hall, there have been fewer complaints about unwanted men this year. The number of women who want extended hours doesn't even seem to matter past a certain point. (I had difficulty in obtaining the following results of a ballot held earlier in the year. They were never made public to the women of Wilson Hall, and the council seemed reticent about giving them to me, even though I am a resident.)

Even though one third of the residents voted, on a preliminary ballot, to have open hours, this was struck from the final ballot as it would be totally unacceptable to the New College Administration, according to the Residence Council. For statisticians and the credibility of New College, the vote was 90 out of 300 for open hours, certainly a large enough ratio to merit representation. Only 70 out of 300 wanted extended hours. The other 45 per cent are satisfied, but this minority seems to rule the rest of us decadents.

As it stands now, of the final ballot 127 women want to extend the hours to 10:00 p.m., and 135 want to extend hours to midnight. (We were not given the alternative of open hours). Since it would anger fewer people to open the hours until 10, the majority is ruled out.

MEMBER OF THE BETTER BUSINESS BUREAU.

An open letter to the students of Sociology 104

Prof. Phillips has stated, in his inimitable scholarly fashion, that we, the students who attempted to attend his lecture before reading week, are "fourth year students", members of the "lower orders", of the "Great Unwashed", who "crawled" into the class "from the gutter."

This is a lie. We are not fourth year students.

If the letter from the "two enrolled students" in The Varsity of February 12 is representative of the views of your class, then, you might profit from examining your opinions in some other areas as well.

The letter uses the expression "unpeaceful intruders". The use of this term is on a level with Mayor Dennison's remark at a City Council meeting last fall, when he said, after the gallery applauded Karl Jaffary, that, "we'll have no violence here". It is dishonest and dishonourable.

The letter states that we were "disrupting" the class by remaining in it. This is double-think. It is like saying that the 1968 attack on Czechoslovakia was the fault of the Czechoslovaks, since it would never have happened if they had not displeased the Russians.

To disrupt a class is to act in such a way as to prevent the normal business of the class from going on. We did not disrupt. We did not prevent Phillips from lecturing — quite the contrary. We did what everyone else in the class did: we sat quietly. It was Phillips alone who prevented the class from going on — by not lecturing. He disrupted the class.

The letter alternately refers to "his class" and "our class"; it states that evaluation of teaching methods and content should be left "to the people who are paying him", yet three paragraphs farther down it claims that the students "pay for" the lectures.

You can't have it both ways. If it is his class, then you must agree with his statement in the Monday period that "the class has no say in the matter (of whether we stay) whatever". If you agree, keep quiet and do what you're told.

If it is your class, then don't just announce it anonymously to The Varsity: have the courage to tell Phillips and see what he says. The view that this is your course does not seem to be supported, however, by your statement that if you are in disagreement with Phillips, then your option is to "drop the course." Are your rights in your class restricted to accepting what the professor offers?

It is true that you pay to attend university. (So do we, by the way.) Most of the money, however, comes from people who work and support the university through their taxes. They are paying for our education, even though many of them can't afford to send their own kids to university. Since they are "the people who are paying" Phillips, do they have the right to attend and criticize his classes?

Three questions: Your tuition works out to about $1 per lecture. Are you getting your money's worth? If you could get your course credit without attendance at lectures, would you go to them? Do Phillips' ideas about authority in the classroom have any connection to the way he interprets the structure of society to "his" class, or is he "objective" and "value-free"?

It is our view that education is an interaction, not the selling of a commodity. We believe that what goes on in a classroom should be decided by all the participants in this interaction, not just the "teacher". We know that the historic meaning of academic freedom is not only freedom to teach but freedom to learn. We maintain that the principles of openness and academic freedom imply that classrooms should be open to anyone so long as they do not disrupt the educational process. We reject the view that the classroom is the private preserve of the professor.

We enjoyed our visit. Good luck to all of you!

Love and Kisses,

Coed living for Sir Dan's

By TONY USHER

Co-educational living will be introduced to the U of T campus next year in the residence named after U.C.'s second president, Sir Daniel Wilson.

University College Council approved without dissent Monday a plan to alter to co-ed living space allocated in Whitney Hall, now for women, and Sir Daniel Wilson Residence, now for men.

Sir Dan's will have one male house, one female house, and four houses with men and women in alternate rooms.

Whitney Hall will be divided by floors instead of houses, with allocation depending on demand. It is anticipated that the first floor would be part or all coed while one upper floor would be male only and the other female only.

The changes were approved before reading week by a residence referendum in which 84 per cent in Sir Dan's and 66 per cent in Whitney voted in favour.

College Council unanimously approved the coed scheme after less than ten minutes' proceedings. The real decision was made in the council's parity Staff-Student Relations Committee.

After a year's preparation, a student committee headed by Sir Dan's Council president Laurie Watkins presented a proposal before Christmas for coed living in Sir Dan's and two male and two female houses in Whitney Hall.

The staff-student committee reached an impasse over the flexibility of the student plan and its conflict with fire regulations. Dean of Men Michael Howarth and Dean of Women Charity Grant reserved their approval.

Finally a closed meeting on January 21 produced the present plan which the committee endorsed unanimously. From there ratification by college council was a formality.

While Sir Dan's and Whitney Hall will be the first established residences to go coed, Innis College has operated one temporary residence on Spadina Ave. and several houses off-campus on a coed basis for two years.

R. F. Keating and W. R. Winslade of the Sault Ste. Marie Board of Education will be at the Student Placement Centre on February 25, to discuss secondary school teaching in Sault Ste. Marie with prospective graduates.

Arrangements for interviews may be made through the Student Student Placement Centre.

OHC to study contract from graduate tenants

Striking Charles St. tenants have presented the Ontario Housing Corporation with an eight-page contract demanding representation on the OHC Board of Directors and tenant say in management and rent-setting policies.

The contract, drawn up with the help of the Metro Labour Council, is based on a collective bargaining agreement.

OHC managing director Phil Goyette accepted the contract at a meeting Thursday for further study by the Board of Directors.

The contract will be discussed by the board March 3, and the results presented to tenants at the next round of negotiations, March 10.

Strikers also gave Goyette a list showing that 82 per cent of the tenants recognized the Charles St. Tenants' Association as their sole legal bargaining agent.

Meanwhile, the rent strike goes on with neither side budging. So far the OHC has served 130 eviction notices. However to physically evict tenants, OHC must first file a court brief.

Reporter cracks Phillips' ban on intruders

For the first time, an uninvited student managed to audit Walter Phillips' Industrial Society (104) class without being thrown out.

Varsity reporter Tom Walkom escaped the keen Phillips eyes by crouching unobtrusively in a back row of the huge Sid Smith lecture Hall.

In his past two classes, Phillips interrupted his lecture to challenge the presence of several students not enrolled in the course. On Feb. 8, after spotting unfamiliar faces among his 60-odd students, Phillips evicted three interlopers for not asking permission to listen.

When six more uninvited students turned up, Feb. 10 Phillips walked out after referring to the sextet as "coming out of a gutter."

In both cases, according to students enrolled in the class, the auditors had been sitting quietly until Phillips attacked them.

Walkom, who looks like somebody that might take Industrial Sociology, entered Sid Smith 2117 by the back door and nervously crept into a vacant seat.

He was not the only one nervous about his presence. A friend who recognized him as a Varsity reporter asked Walkom not to sit beside him, in case Phillips erupted.

Fearing he might be the last outsider to independently crash the course, Walkom furiously took notes during the lecture.

From 1:10 to 1:25 Phillips assigned reading.

"Something here for everybody," he said.

From 1:25 till 1:40 he covered "some material I would have liked to go over last Wednesday."

Phillips, pacing back and forth in his colour co-ordinate suit, with pants bagging academically around his slightly scuffed shoes, described an experiment to prove that status consistent people suffered little mental illness, little liberalism, and much class consciousness.

"Or you could say status is caused by power, as The Varsity might claim," (chuckles from the class).

Phillips also read aloud from a questionnaire — "Have you ever been bothered by heart beating too fast," — following the reading with a quip — "That's what my mother called palpitations," (titters).

At 1:36, the first question of the period was asked by a girl in the front.

"Where did Wilson (the text) cover that."

Phillips was most helpful.

From 1:40 till 2:00, Phillips said the family is the basis of the social stratification system. He stopped only to glance at the clock at 1:50.

An enrolled student in the course, who asked not to be identified, praised the course as "really good", although he noted that yesterday's lecture was not very exciting.

Phillips, when contacted yesterday maintained his right to throw anybody out of class he wants, although he said he would not always use the right.

"But I don't intend to debate it in the Varsity," he added disgustedly, "I think that's a waste of time."

Required reading for this section of the course, on The Family and Socialization, is chapter 10 of "Sociology", by Everett Wilson. Lectures are Monday and Wednesday at 1:00 in Sid Smith 2117.

THE EXPLOITATION OF EXPERIENCE

Each mortal thing does one thing and the same:

Deals out that being indoors each one dwells;

Selves — goes itself; myself it speaks and spells,

Crying What I do is me: for that I came.

Queen: But look, where sadly the poor wretch comes reading.

Polonius: Away, I do beseech you, both away: I'll board him presently.

So begins one of the finest speeches in Shakespeare's Hamlet, where Polonius attempts to discover the cause of the Prince's 'madness' and Hamlet uses the old man's illusions to expose the deception and corruption which surrounds him. The scene is a masterpiece of ironic wit, darkly intensified by the disgust and anguish from which Hamlet is suffering and which Polonius refuses to recognize. Yet in all my years as an English student, the only discussion of this scene that I remember is one in which a class argued for two hours about whether Hamlet had seen the King and Queen talking with Polonius and therefore was or was not putting on an act to spite them. As I remember it, debate hinged on whether or not the Queen could see Hamlet coming without being seen by him. That is all I remember of the discussion. For many years now, I have been trying to forget it.

But perhaps I cannot forget it because it points up so (if you will pardon the pun) dramatically the way literature is dealt with in academic circles. In an average discussion of Hamlet, say, the following questions will be raised: did Gertrude sleep with Claudius before they killed Hamlet's father? does Hamlet know that Polonius is hiding behind the arras during the impassioned scene with Ophelia? did Hamlet love Ophelia? was Ophelia sleeping with the king? was Hamlet mad? a coward? suffering from an Oedipus complex? This will be augmented by discussions on language, imagery, wit, the origins of the 'play within a play' and an analysis of the major soliloquies. All of these will politely skirt, but never "People do not see 'culture' in general, or literature in particular, as an articulation of their own hopes and fears, loves and hates, because the study of literature is not regarded as an exploration of human problems. . ."

confront, the fundamental problem of human indecisions which is the dominant theme of the play — and none will attempt to relate that problem to the experience which we all share

Vladimir: We have to come back tomorrow.

Estragon: What for?

Vlad.: To wait for Godot.

Est.: Ah! (silence) He didn't come?

Vlad.: No.

Est.: And now it's too late.

Vlad.: Yes, now it's night.

Est.: And if we dropped him.

(pause) If we dropped him?

Vlad.: He'd punish us.

For one reviewer Godot, the mysterious person who will never come for Vladimir and Estragon, represented "the outside." The reviewer was a prisoner at San Quentin, where the play had been shown — the first live entertainment in over 20 years. Waiting for Godot created consternation and rage among intellectuals: the prisoners at San Quentin responded immediately. Most of them had never heard the term 'Theatre of the Absurd' and were fortunately ignorant of the tiresome debates surrounding the phrase. Yet because of them, Beckett's play succeeded in performing the most important function of literature. It confronted them with their humanity, with their experience of others and of the world around them and they responded to that confrontation from the centre of their own lives. The play was for them a powerful expression of their own loneliness and despair and because of their response a series of words and movements became a living whole.

What took place at San Quentin contrasts sharply with what usually happens in classrooms and universities or wherever students meet to discuss literature. Too often we take the potential life of a poem, a novel, or a play and kill it. We dissect a living organism; we fragment a total experience into 'tragic modes' or 'comic modes' or 'lyrics' or 'epics' or 'anti-novels'. We make of human experience an object to be classified.

MASS CULTURE IS A FORM OF ESCAPISM

analysed, and put aside. What we read comes to have no relation to what we know and feel about ourselves because it is never confronted in terms of our own situation. The study of literature, then, ceases to be an exploration of our humanity; it becomes instead the objectification of human experience itself.

This is not to say that literary analysis is not an important and worthwhile function. For one thing we are not all literary geniuses and a certain amount of analysis and dissection may be necessary to understand the workings of something which we could never create. The process is somewhat similar perhaps to dismantling a fine machine and its purpose is not to classify the separate parts, but to understand more fully how the whole works. This is even more true of literature where we are dealing with human expression and all analysis must be directed towards a fuller understanding of what is expressed. The purpose of the exercise is not to 'do' a poem, or a play, or a novel, but to gain an insight into the experience it articulates and to relate it more fully to our own.

The study of literature now, however, does not accomplish this end, but rather results in a situation which is diametrically opposed, a situation which has dangerous and far-reaching implications. For at present the study of literature is an esoteric cult; it has its hierarchies and its mysterious rituals; "understanding literature" has become an exclusive, complicated art which only few can master. To discuss a poem or a novel, one must know the 'proper' terms, the requisite approaches; any deviation from the rules set down is regarded as 'unscholarly'. The result is that not only the method of studying it, but also literature itself is regarded as mysterious and complex. Any student who naively believes that there is some common element in all human expression will soon discover, after a few years, that he shares nothing at all with these semi-divine beings who write literature. "The poet", wrote Emerson, "tells us how it was with him", but we, it would seem, require complex skills or at best a middleman in the person of a critic, to comprehend what he was telling us.

Gradually what was once the possession of a whole people, the expression of their shared experience, becomes the exclusive domain of the few. The rough human comedy of an early miracle play exists only as a dusty manuscript in the scholar's library; the heroes and events which gave rise to the street ballads cease to have any meaning and the ballads themselves are often regarded as quaint examples of 'popular culture'. Shakespeare is a name of those who can afford to go to Stratford and most of us forget that when the plays were first performed the actors played to the pit where the audience participated in the comedy scenes and voiced their opinions of the major characters. And what is true of the literature of the past is equally true of the present, for writers like Beckett and Albee who try to articulate the experience of modern man are generally regarded as too complex and sophisticated for most people to understand.

The effects of this attitude are extremely dangerous for both students and non-students. Because the study of literature is removed from any experimental context, the student gains the impression that all literature is written in a vacuum. In my many years of study, I remember only two professors who sincerely tried to explain the political and social background of what we were reading. Those who take this approach are known among academics as "history of ideas men" and are regarded as a lesser breed by many. I particularly remember one professor, who, during a discussion of this approach, swept its merits aside with the angry comment, "After all, we are teaching literature and not sociology". In his mind there was a definite separation between the two and the result of such an attitude is that the study of literature often lacks any human perspective whatsoever. Take for example Swift's essay A Modest Proposal. This piece is lauded by critics as a masterpiece of satire, a perfect example of Swift's cruel irony, his double-edged wit, his horror of excesses on any side. Taken without the social context, the piece can be pleasantly analyzed as an ingenious intellectual exercise, whereas it is in fact the outraged protest of a man who saw that the upper classes treated the Irish peasants like cattle and who attempted to point up the horrors of the situation by suggesting that it be carried to its logical conclusion so that the nobility would actually dine on the carcasses of the children whose parents they exploited. The piece is a masterpiece of satire, but it is first of all an anguished human protest; without the social context, the work loses its power and the very life of its expression.

Because literature is regarded as existing in a vacuum, students gain the impression that they can understand it by adopting the jargon and rituals of the cultists who initiate them into its mysteries. They cease to regard what they read as having any relation to their own lives; and students who responds subjectively to a poem or a novel in an essay is generally marked down. Gradually, enthusiasm and intensity are stifled to be replaced by a dry intellectual objectivity better suited to the rational discourse and pedantic analysis which scholars love so much. Any student who refuses to be stifled either loses interest in literature altogether or adopts a counter reaction which is equally dangerous: all his responses become subjective; work is categorically bad if he does not like or does not understand it and gradually anything learned in the classroom is regarded pejoratively as "culture", unfit for common human consumption.

It is this misuse of the word "culture" which best points up the effect that the academic attitude to literature has on the non-student, or the majority of the population. The people do not see "culture" in general or literature in particular as an articulation of their own hopes and fears, loves and hates, because the study of literature is not regarded as an exploration of human problems whose basic end is a greater understanding of ourselves. Instead the study of literature is looked upon as a sterile art practised by 'egg-heads' only; the expression of human experience has become an object of scholarly investigation rather than the subject of human understanding. Literature speaks of the human condition, but removed from the human context and lacking any human response, whatever it says is meaningless. And for most people literature is meaningless; Shakespeare and Swift, Albee and Beckett are often sneered at, not because their work is worthless but because the approach to it has removed the vital human link. The people have been deprived of the right of seeing and understanding the most beautiful human expressions of their own experience and because of that all of us are gradually being deprived of experience itself.

Our experience is being exploited and eroded and the most obvious way in which this is happening is through what is commonly called 'mass culture'. Because I am speaking about literature alone, I use the term 'mass culture' to refer to the short stories which appear in widely read magazines (particularly women's magazines) to the novels most widely purchased in book stores (hospital dramas, gothic romances, James Bond, etc.) and perhaps most important to popular films which, for most, have taken the place of the theatre. Much of this is, quite bluntly, trash; it is insipid and superficial, but these pejorative descriptions do not explain why it is thrust upon us, or, more important, what it does to our understanding of ourselves. Perhaps a few examples — with comparisons — will help to show what I mean.

The film is a good place to start and one example that springs readily to mind is The Lion in Winter, a film which purports to be a historical representation, in lavish living color, of the lives of Henry the Second, his wife Eleanor of Acquitaine and their sons Richard, Jeffrey and John. The plot revolves around the struggle for the crown among the three sons, with each parent backing a favorite and Jeffrey going it on his own. Richard is a homosexual war-monger, John is a slovenly half-wit, and Jeffrey a two-faced schemer. During the film bargains are struck and broken, valuable women are passed from one son to another and the insidious nature of the struggle for power supposedly revealed. Yet the film is little better than a situation comedy, perhaps best exemplified by Eleanor's own comment: after her husband has left the room in a rage upon discovering among other things that she slept with his father, Eleanor calmly reviews the mass of intrigue and corruption around her and remarks "Oh well, every family has its ups and downs."

What is particularly dangerous about this film is that it is presented as a great cultural achievement, the best our society can produce. To take this and compare it with, say, Shakespeare's King Lear which is also a study of the struggle for power is to reveal how shallow this film really is. The sight of Lear wandering half-mad on the stormy moor is a more gripping experience than that of listening to Eleanor's trite complaints, because Shakespeare attempts to elucidate the human experience, to study the effects of intrigue on the human personality. He talks of the responsibility of power and reveals the effects of the misuse of that responsibility. The Lion in Winter treats power as a game where people are shifted about like pawns. Even after 400 years, we leave Lear with some fresh insight into ourselves and our society; we leave The Lion in Winter after having been dubiously entertained for a few hours with the feeling that something very important has been mocked and that we have been duped. One piece is an exploration of the human condition, the other is an escape from that condition and a blatant refusal to understand it.

Escapism is perhaps the key word in mass culture. In women's magazines for example, we are treated to stories of marriages where the problems are too easily solved and the balance between husband wife happily restored. Little countenance is given to the real problems of women in society or in personal relationships. In this type of fiction women accept their role with good grace; oppression is an unknown word; exploitation is pleasantly disguised and these cherubic creatures seem blissfully unaware of the tensions and anxieties which drive real women to read these little stories — as an escape. Meanwhile, the novels of the Brontë's, George Eliot, Simone de Beauvoir and Doris Lessing — women who write honestly about their experience — remain on the shelves of university libraries, and Albee's portrayals of the desperate realities of marriage are presented to audiences of bored intellectuals.

Men can find the same sort of escape in the countless novels of the James Bond type where a totally unbelievable hero performs absolutely incredible feats. The life styles of men like Bond are totally alien to the people who read these novels and yet by identifying themselves with the hero men, they can forget for a few hours the real world of seemingly insoluble problems, which such novels ignore. These pieces offer neither exploration nor a deeper understanding of actual human situations, but are rather an escape from them and their appeal is greatest for those who feel that in their everyday lives they are powerless. In the meantime, Dickens, whose novels first appeared in daily newspapers remains a name for university students only, and yet, for all their faults, his were novels which attempted to portray honestly the actual situations in which the majority of men lived and worked.

It can be argued of course that great works of literature are readily available in one form or another to most people. This is true however only in a very narrow sense. There are cheap paperback editions of most literary masterpieces and TV and the film occasionally present a Shakespearean drama or a modern play, but the best of live theatre — say at Stratford — is still prohibitively expensive for most, as are productions at the O'Keefe Centre in Toronto or the new National Art Centre in Ottawa. The largest, cheapest purveyors of mass culture are still magazines, TV and American film and their fare seldom rises above the level of banal escapism.

The question of costs, however, is a minor one at this point except as it is seen as a symptom of the wider problem. And the wider problem — the problem of culture — has its roots in our economic system and in the class nature of our society. In North America, "mass culture" is an industry whose main objective is the production of consumer goods (in this case films, novels, TV shows, etc.) for profit. It is therefore concerned only with producing a saleable commodity; its concern is with the increase of return on investment, not with an increase of human understanding or awareness. Therefore, our experience is mercilessly exploited for "subject matter" and returned to us in a form so distorted and so superficial that it is almost impossible to recognize in it the problems and questions, the resolutions and victories that make us human.

But by distorting our experience the mass culture industry carries out a second more important function: that of socialization. Like any other, this industry is closely related to a power structure which has a vested interest in the way we think and act. As long as women continue to identify with the image of themselves which is presented in magazine fiction, for example, they will continue to want the consumer goods which seem to bring them closer to the ideal. Capitalism depends on women to buy 75 per cent of all consumer goods, everything from fashion products to household wares. And all of these industries depend for their survival on the need created in women either by direct advertising or by the more subtle socialization process which the mass culture industry provides so adeptly.

And the concern is not always directly related with getting us to buy. Mass culture shapes our attitudes to every moral and political question confronting us. A brief analysis of the few films produced in the last few years reveals the following 'message': Guess Who's Coming to Dinner: inter-racial marriage is ok in certain situations where the black man has made it in white terms at which point he would not want to marry a black woman anyway. Wild in the Streets: the hippy-drug-youth revolt scene present no significant distinctions; all these types are in the same bag, their primary concern being a distrust of people over 30; the discontent is primarily a result of the generation gap and has no political or moral motivation; the victory of these types would cause mass chaos and destruction. The Fixer: even in Czarist Russia, justice exists; the man with integrity will eventually win his case and the private victory of one individual is proof that things were not — and are not — as bad as they seem and therefore any kind of broadly based social revolution is unnecessary. If . . . in some cases, student revolt is justifiable; but it is essentially anarchistic and its main proponents are concerned only with their own private battle; they see no need to overthrow the entire social structure and indeed there is no necessity for their doing so.

These examples have been chosen at random. There are thousands more and each medium — film, TV, novel, magazine — complements and compounds the message of the others.

I had said earlier that an essential element of mass culture is escapism and it is important that we understand how subtly this process works. Much of mass culture is overtly escapist in the presentation of unreal people and incredible experiences, which deflects our attention from the world of common day in which we live. But other pieces, like those outlined above — are more tenuous. In them we seem to see some vague outline of our own experience, but here our identification with the hero does not lead us to explore that experience more deeply. Rather we accept vicariously the resolution that is presented, we do not work through it ourselves. The hero's victory makes us feel that our situation is not as oppressive as it seems; his defeat convinces us that we were mistaken about the nature of the problem. Because this experience is vicarious and immediate, it provides no opportunity for the type of distancing which is necessary for a deeper understanding, nor does it encourage action or resolution. It merely calms our anxiety and reinforces our own sense of powerlessness.

All of this may seem far removed from the attitudes towards literature in the university; but in actual fact the one perpetuates the other. Mass culture is deceptive in that it seems to reflect our experience when it is actually distorting it and preventing our understanding it. Yet the great literary masterpieces, those which offer the insight and understanding of sensitive minds remain in the hands of men who objectify experience and sap it of its vitality, removing it from the human context. The possibility of a popular understanding of literature is prevented by this objectification and by the esoteric methodology which surrounds its study. Scholars have made the expression of the experience of all people the exclusive domain of the few. Thus the term culture shifts in meaning; it no longer describes the entire life-style of a people and the many forms and mediums through which they express their common condition, but refers rather to an extraneous and unessential area of experience open only to the leisured, the wealthy and the intelligent. In a class oriented society, culture becomes a symbol of status and it is therefore no accident that the nouveau riche have always been satirized for attempting to acquire culture by collecting paintings, attending the theatre and reading 'high-brow' novels. Culture is regarded as a thing, an object to be acquired because it the attribute of a particular class. The way in which literature is studied perpetuates this attitude. Once literature is removed from the human context, it becomes the possession of a privileged class. The people are deprived of any valid expression of their experience and no attempt is made to prevent the distortion and exploitation carried on by the mass culture industry.

The best recent example I have had of the elitist attitude of many scholars was a comment made to me by a colleague of mine who objected to the Zeffirelli production of Romeo and Juliet because it "popularizes Shakespeare." Now the film had many faults, but popularizing Shakespeare was not one of them. Shakespeare is essentially "popular" in the sense in which that word means 'of the people.' I believe that and I think that the teenagers I know who want to see the film — sometimes 3 or 4 times — believe it too. For the first time — after hours of stifling classroom analysis — Shakespeare suddenly became for them a living person speaking to them and about them. The fragile vitality of adolescence, the tragedy of growing up, which is the theme of the play, suddenly become real and solid and the people whose experience the play expresses, responded. For a while the work of a genius was returned to the common human domain where it belongs.

SOME CONCLUSIONS AND DIRECTIONS

*Follow poet, follow right,
To the bottom of the night,
With your unconstraining voice
Still persuade us to rejoice;
With the farming of a verse
Make a vineyard of the curse,
Sing a human unsuccess
In a rapture of distress;
In the deserts of the heart
Let the healing fountain start,
In the prison of his days
Teach the free man how to praise.*

W. H. Auden

The preservation and study of literature is an important task which should be carried out, not for sentiment or pedantic reasons, but rather from the recognition that it is an important part of a people's heritage.

Marx wrote of progress that it is "the absolute elaboration of (man's) creative dispositions." It is a situation "where man does not reproduce himself in any determined form, but produces his totality. Where he does not seek to remain something formed by the past, but is the absolute movement of becoming." Literature is the conscious articulation of this act; it is man analyzing, exploring and giving form to his human condition. It provides all men with the opportunity to stand back from their situation and see it in all its beautiful wholeness and complexity. It may be the product of great and sensitive minds, but it has its roots in the common emotions and aspirations of all people. A street ballad is as valuable as a Shakespearean play; one may exemplify a greater insight and sensitivity, but both have their ultimate value in the fact that they make public and external the private, internal world of experience and it is partly by reading literature that man comes to recognize his fellowship with others. To deprive him of his right is not only to pilfer common property, but to pilfer and exploit experience itself.

This is what goes on in universities today and it is the responsibility of students to prevent its continuation. In our classes we must begin to give the study of literature a human context once more, by forcing our professors and our fellow students to relate what they read to their personal experience and to the experience of society. We must demand that literature be taught, not in a vacuum, but in the context of social, political and economic forces and events in which it is written.

We must also challenge the trash that is dumped upon us by the mass culture industry. We can do this by writing critical reviews of current films and books and by talking to people about them. We must relate what is produced to the wider social and economic context and show how it performs a socializing function which is valuable only to those who have a vested interest in distorting human experience. We must also force those in the university to recognize their culpability in this area and to insist that those who study literature combat rather than compound its effects.

It is valuable too, to encourage the use of literature in study and discussion groups outside the university. Our most important task is to combat the belief that 'good literature' is too difficult for people to understand.

But besides fighting elitism by repopularizing what has been written we must also create a situation where new expression can take place: by trying to involve people in guerilla theatre, by working with children in creative drama sessions, by encouraging people to act out or write about the things they experience.

If we are serious about the new society that we wish to build, we must recognize, as Che did, that society will create a new man. He will not be totally separate from the experiences and motions of the past, but as he partakes of "the absolute movement of becoming" he will acquire new forms to express the limitless possibilities of experience. And we must all begin to lay the groundwork of a new culture in which all will share in expressing and exploring the common experience of our time and of the new time which is beginning to appear.

People's Poet to rap on Cdn. liberation

Milton Acorn, Canada's "People's Poet", will be speaking today on "Poetry and the Canadian Liberation Struggle".

The talk is one of the series "If It's Wednesday, This Must Be Canada", sponsored by the Canadian Liberation Movement.

Acorn gained the title "People's Poet" a year ago when a number of Canadian poets, disgruntled at the Canada Council for choosing George Bowering for the Governor General's Award, decided to give their own award to Acorn.

At a special ceremony, the poets thumbed their noses at the Governor General's selection committee on which an American citizen, Warren Tallman presided.

Acorn told the Varsity yesterday: "One of the features of a nation is a distinct school of poets — good poets. Canada certainly has that. But Canadian poets must become more aware of themselves as members of a nation — a nation threatened with extinction by the efforts of American imperialism which, in an era where its expansion is increasingly limited by world freedom struggles, tries all the harder to expand into areas where the resistance is weak." He will be speaking today at 1 p.m. in Room 1070, Sidney Smith Hall.

ChemEng seeking jobs

Chemical engineering students are banding together to fight the summer job shortage.

The Chemical Engineering Club is approaching 1000 chemical and related companies in the Metropolitan Toronto area to see if they will provide jobs during the summer months. The club will also list all students interested in summer jobs along with their field of work they prefer.

Already some affirmative replies have been received from companies. Procedure to be followed will be to match company requirements with preferences which students state on their applications with the Chemical Engineering Club.

Names of all students qualifying will then be placed in a hat and drawn.

Chartrand to talk here

Quebec labour leader Michel Chartrand is coming to speak at the U of T in two weeks.

The controversial president of the Montreal section of the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU) was recently released from jail on bail after a charge of seditious conspiracy was quashed. He is still awaiting trial on charges of being a member of the FLQ, outlawed retroactively by the War Measures Act.

On the same panel of a teach-in sponsored by the U of T Waffle on Thursday March 11 at Convocation Hall will be former CBC commentator Laurier Lapierre. Lapierre is a former NDP vice president and unsuccessful federal parliament candidate.

Paint spree makes Trin colorful academia

By JOHN STRACHAN

A revolution in consciousness hit Trinity College over the weekend as a group of midnight skulkers applied their artistic talents to improving the color-coordinated decor of the college.

The general student body, which is accustomed to seeing its world as an inoffensive melange of beige, cream, and grey, was greeted in the morning by bright purple, orange, pink, and blue doors, trim, and frames all over the most frequently used areas of the college.

A group of disgruntled representatives of the General Student Body have been vigorously pressing for the discovery and apprehension of the culprits. At least 15 of those responsible for the new psychedelic look will be charged before the Discipline Committee, an all student body that supervises the peace, order, and good conduct of the men of college. (There is another committee for women).

One Trin student commented that the bright colors create an entirely false impression about the nature of academic life, and disturb the tranquility of mind of those serious students using the library and the washrooms, the doors of which have been entirely transformed in the new color scheme.

"This sort of cultural imperialism by a small group over the wishes of the majority cannot be tolerated in a liberal-democratic society," he continued.

It is rumoured that highly-placed officials in the student government at Trinity are behind the painting spree, but definite identities will not be established until the Discipline Committee confirms its charges.

Trinity's Discipline Committee is one of the few bodies on campus that has been set up following the recommendations of the Campbell Report.

This report, which was issued in September, 1969, recommended changes in the entire discipline procedure of the university. It has not yet been implemented generally or at the university level, due to a faculty-student deadlock about the role of students in disciplining their peers.

Ireland... where your friends are

Where freedom songs were born and the pubs are built to withstand vocal pressures like no place on earth. In Ireland the age gap is measured by the repertoire and not by years. It is a country where poets are heroes and the art of conversation has not died.

Unlike many countries, Ireland is not dominated by one great city. The culture, the charm and the character of the country is the country itself. Listen to balladeers at mediaeval banquets in ancient castles and see just how closely they compare in the musical styles of today. Roll back the centuries in almost every town, village and castled hilltop and learn how the country was born. In every Irishman you meet, you will find an open heart and an open mind, a love of life and the things that make life worth living.

See Ireland as it should be seen... intimately. Travel by hire car or motor coach, on an individual or a group tour, but mix with the people. "Student Tours" are just tours of Ireland designed to suit student budgets with nothing omitted.

Mail the attached coupon for precise Student Tour information... then see your travel agent... you'll have the time of your life.

Media panel split

Disparate views on TV advertising

By GRAHAM STAFFEN
A sampling of current T.V. commercials drew strongly opposing reactions from a panel discussing Misleading Advertising, Friday evening.
Jim Allard, Vice President of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, vigorously upheld the existing situation in advertising.
"No one is forced to buy a product" he asserted and "Only dough-heads could be manipulated by advertising."

According to Allard the middle-class orientation of commercials provides an incentive for lower classes to emulate what they watch on T.V. and to get ahead financially. He said consumer protection legislation was unnecessary and the consumer should be smart enough to protect himself.
Prof. Daniel Baum, of Osgood Law School, taking a much more critical stance, declared the commercial sampling "nauseous".

He attacked Allard's complacency towards existing standards of advertising. He noted that a child before reaching school age watches 350,000 commercials.
He pressed for advertisers to remove the emphasis from "emotional appeal" and place it upon the "functional utility of the product".
Rafe Engles, a Toronto lawyer, was convinced the advertising industry could regulate itself. He said all advertisers are not out to cheat the public.

George D. Orr, a representative from the Department of Consumer Affairs, was content that present legislation and his department were doing an adequate job.
The five man panel, part of the U of T Law School's Conference on Communication, reached no agreement on the present state of advertising.

Committee halted

The Committee on Undergraduate Studies of the Arts and Science Faculty Council had a parity meeting during reading week — but it wasn't intended to be that way.
About 15 faculty faced student disrupters last Wednesday in the conference room of the Ramsay Wright building.
After the student meeting had gone on for ten minutes, replete with whistles, buzzers and points of procedure, Dean A. D. Allen called for order.
Student Norman Rogers began to read aloud the report of the parity committee on restructuring Faculty Council. Other students sang, joked, and quoted Marx and Mao.
Allen once again attempted to open formal proceedings. The disrupters broke into "Solidarity Forever".
After the students had exhausted their vocal repertoires, Allen gained silence long enough to make a plea for the committee to be able to continue its work. He maintained that disruption was not in the best interests of the students and would prejudice a solution to the parity impasse.
"Will you allow this meeting to proceed?" he called.
"Solidarity forever . . ." the students answered.
Allen called for adjournment and students and faculty dispersed.

ST. JOHN'S (CUP) — The student council at Memorial University in Newfoundland voted Wednesday (Feb. 17) to use $2,000 budgeted for community involvement to help finance an alternate newspaper in St. John's.

One of the newspaper organizers, Ian Wiseman, Canadian University Press vice president-elect, called it "strictly a community newspaper for St. John's."

It would carry in-depth feature articles in areas such as tenant rights, slum housing, welfare and unemployment and the taxi-cab industry.

The growing hunger for the good old days

Our new fascination with silent films, comic books and the heroes of yesteryear

By Henry Mietkiewicz

FEW HAD ANTICIPATED THE INVASION. Many were completely unware of its actual approach. And then it was too late. In 1967, the Camp Movement slithered relentlessly across our southern border and yanked Toronto kicking and screaming thirty years into the cultural past.

First came the personality posters. W. C. Fields in tails, white gloves and top hat mysteriously contemplates the desirability of his poker hand. Atop the lights and glitter of the New York City skyline, King-Kong tenderly clutches Fay Wray in his sausage-thick fingers, as he swets away the airplanes attacking his Empire State Building perch. Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy smile sweetly and revel in empty-headed innocence.

Next, the old movies were unearthed. "Must you always think like a marshel? Can't you think like a humen baing just this once?" demands Dorothy Melone of Ronald Reagan. "Remember", exclaims Groucho Merx to Chico in reference to Margaret Dumont, "you're fighting for this women's honour, which is probably more then she ever did!" Yvonne De Carlo confronts Richard Greene and discovers, "So, a lowborn black-smith is the famous Desert Hawk!"

And the comic strips came to life. Cato revs up Black Beauty and spirits the Green Hornet away to solve another crime. Hunched over gleaming test tubes and bubbling solutions, Batmen determines the contents of a certain flesk end deduces where the Joker will strike next. Seturday morning sees the animation of Captein America, Supermen, Graen Lantern, Iron Man and the Hulk.

CAMP BECAME THE RAGE for about a year, when, just as suddenly as it appeared, its popularity began to diminish. And no wonder. The whole "raison d'etre" of this cultural novelty was not to admire the ingenuity, originality and inventiveness of bygone days, but to hold up to ridicule any and all films, personalities or art forms which were strange and/or outdated. For no reason whatsoever, Charlie Chaplin ended up shering a well with a Campbell's Soup can. Humphrey Bogert was almost as famous as the Brillo Soap Peds box. Batman became transformed into an eddle-brained degenerate in poorly-bleached thermal underwear. It was not long before the Camp Movement, sado-masochistic at haart, ran out of steam and, to the relief of millions, committed suicide.

However, when the smoke had cleared and the debris had been heuled away, there remained a small core of individuals who could not bring themselves to reject all the trappings of Camp. They were the ones who had dared to look through the glossy commercialism of the very things they themselves had until then baan mocking. Why had audiences been so attracted to certain movies? they wondered. What did the children of the Depression see in pulp-magazine fiction? they asked. All at once Harry Langdon and Flesh Gordon became reasonable figures of escape and entertainment, rather than pop-art refuges. Doc Sevege and The Showdown once again assumed their proper roles. Did advertisements provided more insight into the mind of a past generation then could a hundred history and political-science texts. Ever so slowly an insatiable craving for the good old days arose. And nostalgia was born.

For collectors of antique comic art, dated megezines and old movie posters there is to be found in all of Canada no richer gold mine than Memory Lane. Owned and operated by George Henderson (or Captein George as he is known by friends), Memory Lane is nestled cozily in the heart of quiet, colourful, almost out-of-the-way Mirvish Villege. Its wells are lined with hundreds of large, screaming placards warning the visitor of the approach of the dreaded Cosmic Men or of the upcoming duel between the Thing and Godzilla. On other posters the Allies march fearlessly into the fece of certain death, while nearby America's Favourite Lovers are passionately locked in an eternal embrace. The shelves and tables are stuffed end stecked with back issues of Mervel and DC Comics, Med Megezines, science-fiction and detective pulps, old newspapers and ancient periodicals. And all of Memory Lane is heavily cloaked in the intoxicating perfume that nostalgia collectors know so well: the fragrance of damp basaments and of dusty ettics where newsprint has been eged end mellowed like the best of wines.

MEMDRY LANE DID NDT simply come into existence. It evolved. About five years ago Henderson opened a normal bookstore at 694 Markhem St., but before twelve months had passed, he was already bored. "I was just another guy selling books", explains Henderson, "and I didn't went to do that because my interests were much wider. I decided to teke a chance end begen a greduel process of first getting some old material and then all old material". And the witch has paid off many times over. Memory Lane now has fens end correspondents in California, Sweden, Denmark, Mexico end parts of South America. Quite recently, Henderson himself was even invited down to Seo Paulo, Brazil, to take part in e symposium on comic art.

In order to avoid e high customs duty end so keep prices as low as possible, Henderson sells only items which he has purchased within Canede. Although supply end demand reelly determines the going cost of an article, Henderson generally finds out what e piece commends in the United States end then chops off about 25%. Herein lies much of the reason for his shop's popularity. "There are tons of stores like this in the States", he exclaims proudly, "but the people who run them are strictly interested in one thing: making e buck. I teke a real interest in my product end have made Memory Lane famous es e kind of museum".

However, if certain prices are quite high, it is for e very good reason. Memory Lana sells only original posters and comic books, and will not deel in chaep reprints. As e result, a Mae West poster from the 30's is absolutely guaranteed to be the genuine article, but, due to its rarity, it must necessarily cost about $50.

According to Henderson, nostalgia is enjoying such a great degree of popularity because of the political and social parallels between the 30's end 60's. The general unrest, the threat of war, the uneasy political climate end unemployment have ell led people to entertain themselves in similar ways. It is in effect e shering with the old deys those aspects of life which made existence less difficult to beer.

IN HIS DESIRE to share his fondness for nostalgia, Henderson has become an associate editor of a two-year old bi-monthly magezine called "The New Ceptein George's Whizzbang". Under the general editorship of George Harris of Star Weak, Whizzbang is also the product of the telents of Don Deynerd of CFRB radio end Derek Cartar, an artist and film animator. Capt. George has thus been able to provide his fans with exceptionally well-written articles by the Whizzbang staff on Doc Sevege, Hopelong Cassidy and the old movie studios, for example, Whizzbang also reprints old commercial end film ads, portfolios of yesterday's comic art, end book and movie reviews with a special nostalgie slant to them.

At one time Henderson thought that Memory Lane would attract only the very old end the very young. "It's gratifying to find this isn't so", he says. "I get a very strong college-age clientele which is, on the whole, reelly serious about old movies end comic material".

Because of this renewed interest in the past, Henderson and his friends in the Vest Whizzbang Drgenization would like to show the old movies they talk so much about. They are "looking for e big warehouse of a building which would house a thaater at the rear, end, es you come in, e mini-museum on the left end the store on the right. It would be not an extension of, but a replacement for the present Memory Lane building. But that's still very far away because it's such an expensive proposition".

As far as the abundance end age of stock goes, there is no comparison to Memory Lene. Cine Books at 692a Yonge Street does sell limited quantities of movie posters, press-books and publicity stills, but its material is not espacially old and has e generally Cempy taste to it. In addition, it is devoted primarily to books on serious film theory, aesthetics and the intellectual appreciation of the cine. Although it is indeed possible to find buried treasure there, Cine Books deals with the mind, while Memory Lane appeals to the gut.

sortment of old-time notices such as "Ladies and gentlemen, please remove your hats" or "Positively NO whistling, stamping or loud talking allowed in this theater". While waiting for the usherette to announce the beginning of the feature, one may partake of the free candies or leaf through a most extensive selection of books on films and movie-sters of the past.

"We don't pressura anybody", explains Kemp. "People can come here to do research or use the library free of charge. You can sit here and rap and meet other nostalgia nuts. And if you want to come to the show, okay, great. It's a fun place".

THE SILENT CINEMA ALSO ENCOURAGES its customers to request the pictures they prefer to see. Kemp owns all the movies he shows, and, with a film library of over 300 titles, he can plan a great number of fascinating series. In addition, there is a continuing popularity poll of favourite features and stars. A bulletin-board on wall reflects the opinions of many Silent Cinema moviegoers according to questionnaires they voluntarily fill out. At the moment Charlie Chaplin leads the race with 513 votes, followed by W. C. Fields with 328, Laurel and Hardy with 226 and the Marx Brothers with 189. The most enjoyed films are Phantom of the Opera, King Kong, The Hunchback of Notre Dama and Intolerance.

Kemp believes that the interest in old movies is a direct result of the general public's growing interest in films of all kinds. He adds, "There's a curiosity to see how certain things used to be done, especially since many old techniques are still being practised today. Most people come strictly for nostalgia value and a few for Camp. The big lure is that it's such a contrast with what you see anywhere else".

It should be noted that the name "Silent Cinema" is really a misnomer, and that theatre screens both silent and talkie classics. "We've often thought of changing the name", says Kemp, "but it's stuck. Although we've shown material dated as late as 1939, we're just too well known as the 'Silent Cinema'."

In terms of frequency of showings, excellence of material and regularity of audience attendance, the Silent Cinema's only rival worth mentioning is Rochdale College. Located in the second-floor north cafeteria, Rochdale's film club has, since its inception, probably screened every major Chaplin, Fields, Laurel and Hardy and horror film in existence. It has featured among other events a complete 26-episode Buck Rogers marathon and an all-night show of every single Frankenstein film. Last August Rochdale held a six-day festival of seven to eight hours per day, screening such silent graats as Birth of a Nation, Battleship Otamkin, The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, Nosferatu, The Golem, Blood and Sand, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, The Lost World and Matropolis.

Rochdale's multi-coloured handbills plastered all over the University of Toronto campus attract large numbers of student nostalgia connoisseurs and film buffs. However, despite the value of the programmes, Rochdale rarely draws "straight" or adult audiences who are quite fearful of that building's nefarious reputation for police raids and drug busts.

A NEW ESTABLISHMENT in Toronto's classic film community is Pandora's Movie Box at 191 Lippincott St. Its owner and manager, Serge Denko, is not all that engrossed in nostalgia for its own sake, and instead chooses to screen those features which are marked by a complete break from the world of reality. Thus, his programmes include not only the musicals, comedias, horror movies and cartoons of the 30's and 40's, but also a relatively large number of recent films.

Denko, a film-maker in his own right, prefers to champion the short subject and avantly hopes to invite Canadian directors to talk about movies. He does, however, acknowledge the fact that the movies of W.C. Fields, the Marx Brothers and Judy Garland have drawn the largest audiences of his theater's six-month existence. While Pandora's Movie Box may not cater directly to nostalgia hobbyists, it does screen a good number of the movies on any cultist's "must see" list.

The presentation of old classics has always been the domain of the small, specialized movie-houses and film societies. However, from time to time one or two links in the large commercial theater chains have presented a little of yesterday's material. The Uptown, for example, has shown Birth of a Nation, the International Cinema has had the re-released version of Chaplin's The Circus, and the Marx Brothers tend to appear anywhere at irregular intervals. But The Cinema in the Toronto-Dominion Center is now in the successful final weeks of what is probably the most ambitious venture yet undertaken for a regular theater: the screening of a series of 15 time-tested oldies from the 30's, 40's and 50's.

Bert Brown, manager of The Cinema, remarks that the initial response to the series was so great that Wuthering Heights ran for six weeks instead of the expected one week. In addition, The Best Years of Our Lives was held over for three weeks. Hans Christian Anderson for two and Little Foxes for two.

BROWN CALLS THESE FEATURES his "Goldwyn Goodies", as they are all 35 mm. prints of films produced and still owned by Sam Goldwyn. He adds that attendance, while generally very good, "has been up and down just as happens with newly-released movies. The age groups are quite diversified, since we have a lot of families coming in to see these pictures. But it's really surprising that the young people have taken such a liking to these old features". Among his papers, Brown keeps a "fan letter" from a 23-year old student who, along with a few of her friends, have expressed their appreciation for the presentation of movies which are so refreshingly different from the current standard.

The Cinema is trying to lengthen the series, but there are a number of problems involved. Of all the available films, some are just not worth re-releasing, while others might be hard to procure in 35 mm. form from the original negative. Brown must also determine exactly who owns the negative rights and whether the films have ever been sold to television.

The remaining film clubs of Toronto are dedicated primarily to showing films from the intellectual and artistic point of view. As in the case of the Toronto Film Society, most of the features are from the 60's and hardly give a passing glance to nostalgia. While the TFS silent series does include a little something by Kaeton, Chaplin and Feirbanks, it does not elicit nearly the same tingling sensations of a few Laurel and Hardy one-reelers at Silent Cinema or of a Dracule marathon at Rochdale.

In certain instances, television can also be of some comfort and interest to the nostalgia cultist: Despite the commercials, the tiny sound, the small screen end, very often, the lack of colour. TV nevertheless affords the odd opportunity to catch up on a missed masterpiece. For example, CBLT (Channel 6) has hosted an Alfred Hitchcock series, while WKBW (Channel 7) has done the same for Humphrey Bogart. Channel 7's Friday night Fright Night Late Show, for all its slushy SF, has frequently aired such horror classics as The Bride of Frankenstein and the original Dracula. Those with cable hook-ups or UHF adaptors can also take advantage of the films on Channels 17 and 29. The latter is the more important of the two, as it is a Buffalo station devoted completely to the broadcasting of old TV series and cobwagged movies. Should one wish to do so, he can watch vintage Hollywood daily from 10 p.m. until 5 a.m.

Hang a poster. Read a comic book. See a silent film. Watch the late show. And above all, remember. Remember...

selves back in time by leafing through piles of old magazines. But for the majority, there is no more powerful drug than the peddled chair and the flickering image of the movie theater. At Kemp's Silent Cinema at 133 Avenue Rd. has become the focal point for those who require frequent and powerful injections of the past in this form.

In the space of a scant 1 1/2 years, the Silent Cinema has already attracted a large, regular audience, together with a mailing-list of over 4,000. Like everyone else in the nostalgia business, Kemp finds that his service attracts people of all ages. "We get a lot of freaks, a lot of old people, and at the matinees, plenty of kids. On the whole, attendance varies according to programming. When we show classics, the older buffs tend to show up. But when we present something like Flash Gordon, everybody comes — especially university students."

Like Mamory Lana, the Silent Cinema prides itself in the fact that it is in spirit much more of a cultural museum than a commercial enterprise. Its carpeted floors and muted dcor radiate an atmosphere of warmth and genuine hospitality. At the same time, the theater itself, with its limited and intimate seating capacity of only about 50, creates the impression that the audience is actually a group of close friends enjoying a pleasant evening together.

The walls of the second-floor lounge are decorated with massive blow-ups of famous movie scenes, notably the incredible Babylonian palace set of Griffith's Intolerance. To one side, a self-operating slide projector displays an amusing as-

Cops sneak in, end occupation

Montreal CEGEP students stay on strike

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Students at the CEGEP Vieux Montreal are still on strike following meetings this weekend with Robert Lemieux, the Montreal lawyer recently released from prison following the FLQ crisis, and with members of the Teachers Union.

Lemieux told the students that a controversial letter the principal had sent them was a flagrant violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights. The letter said the students had to promise not to participate in any activity that might impede the normal class routine and to promise to conform to rules outlined in the student handbook before they would be readmitted to their classes.

Last Thursday teachers and members of the Teachers Union expressed their unconditional support of the strike and demanded the unconditional return of the students.

Students at the CEGEP occupied their Social Science Pavilion after college officials refused to allow them to continue their free course program.

The program allows students to choose what they want to do in the classroom.

On Thursday, in a letter from the administration, students were told if they wished to return to class after leaving in protest they would have to sign a declaration to observe new rules.

Students refused to sign the letter and 800 of them demonstrated outside the school chanting "We want to have our classes and we will not sign the letter".

The students then occupied an arts building with the support of arts and science faculty members who agreed not to give regular classes until the students were readmitted without repressive measures being taken against them.

Thursday night the students were evicted from the building by riot police who snuck in when a student opened the door for an administrator who asked to be let in to discuss things.

Since Thursday students have been protesting outside their school and say they will not return to classes unless they can do so without signing any "fascist" documents and if they can continue their classes as they have done in the past.

We'd like to make a few promises

If you use Tampax tampons you'll never again be bothered with pins, pads and belts. Nor with odor, chafing and the bulge.

* * * * *

Because Tampax tampons are worn internally, you'll be comfortable. So comfortable, in fact, that you might even forget all about your period.

* * * * *

You'll have a choice of three absorbency-sizes: Regular, Super and Junior. No one else can offer that, and the Juniors are just right for girls just starting to menstruate.

NO BELTS
NO PINS
NO PADS
NO ODOR

* * * * *

You'll never touch the tampon. The smooth container-applicator enables you to place the tampon properly.

* * * * *

You'll get real protection. Tampax tampons are made of pure absorbent cotton. They expand in three directions to conform with the contours of your body.

* * * * *

Disposal problems just don't exist because both the tampon and the container-applicator are flushable.

* * * * *

Another promise, a most important promise, is freedom. Freedom to swim, dance, ride, run, or just relax. All because of Tampax tampons, the world's most trusted tampon.

Holiday in Britain. Before you're too old to enjoy it.

Don't wait till you're rich and respectable—and tired.

Because a holiday in Britain is liable to get you involved and keep you running from the moment you step off the plane.

Everybody knows about London, where the King's Road is a permanent pop-generation fashion parade, and the discotheques jump till dawn.

But Britain was swinging long before Time magazine 'discovered' Carnaby Street.

You'll know what we mean when you've spent a day or two at the anything-goes experimental Fringe of the Edinburgh Arts Festival. When you've seen Grand Prix motor racing at Silverstone—or the rip-roaring sports-car meets at Brands Hatch. Or when you've seen Shakespeare where he belongs—staged by the crack theatre company at Stratford-upon-Avon.

And then, of course, there are the people. Friendly and welcoming, in a language you don't need a phrase-book to cope with.

Best of all, you don't need to wait till you're rich. A 9-day trip to London with your hotel (and 2 big meals a day) goes for as little as $175. And if you're a member of a group or club, and can get a charter flight, the fare's practically peanuts. We'll send you details on all this, if you just clip the coupon.

Come on. Store up a few memories for your old age.

Welcome to Britain.

Our free 48-page booklet - "Britain - Vacations '71" will make you an expert! See your Travel Agent, or send to British Tourist Authority, PO Box 635, Scarborough, Ontario.

Dalhousie grad student fined

Dalhousie graduate math student Greg Newmann was fined $250 by the Dalhousie University Senate for "disrupting" two December classes.

Newmann taught two Transitional Year Program (TYP) math classes until November 20 when a communist speaker was introduced to a joint meeting of Newmann's and other TYP students.

The math class was cancelled and students could leave at any time. Some students complained to TYP director Dr. Pillay that they did not want to hear political speakers.

Pillay told Dr. Tingley, who was responsible for the TYP math program.

November 23 Tingley told Newmann no speakers could be introduced without the TYP director's permission. Newmann said he would consider giving an assurance that permission would be sought in future, but Tingley refused him time to consider and dismissed him as a TYP instructor.

Newmann knew of no avenue of appeal and ignored the firing, returning to teach. When Tingley arrived and asked him to leave on Dec. 2, he refused. Teaching this class constituted one of the two "disruptions."

Newmann returned to teach again Dec. 4 but did not, discuss the situation with Pillay and others instead.

The same day Newmann visited Math 100 class taught by Tingley to "quietly observe" it. Tingley insisted he leave. He did but returned five days later to explain his position and distribute leaflets, delaying Tingley's lecture by ten minutes before he left.

Tingley and Pillay formally complained to the Senate Discipline Committee (SDC) which consists of three professors and two students.

The SDC conducted an investigation Jan. 13. In its report the committee acknowledged Newmann's dismissal as an instructor. Two charges of name-calling and one of disruption were dropped but Newmann was convicted of the two mentioned disruptions.

On February 8 the Senate accepted the SDC report, and Newmann was fined $250.

The Varsity — Mauro Dipasquale

To Waterloo's Larry Bryant (bottom), Varsity's Ken Shand is a real pain in the old neck.

Varsity grapplers fourth in finals

Varsity wrestlers gained a year's worth of experience in the two days of the annual OQAA wrestling championships held February 19 and 20 in Kingston.

Six members of Blues nine-man team produced points as Varsity gained a commendable fourth-place finish behind perennial mat powers Waterloo, Western and Guelph.

Top performances came from Ken Shand (118 lbs.) and Ted Cooper (126) who narrowly missed gold medals in what would have been the upsets of the tournament.

Shand needed a pin in his last match to take first place but could manage only a decision and settled instead for the silver and second place. Cooper battled to two consecutive draws in the round-robin finals and also ended in second place.

Blues other points came from a string of fourth-place finishes — Ken White (134), Mauro Dipasquale (142), Jon Davis (158) and Ernie Friedrich (167).

Western's Al Baran won the final match of the meet to give the Stangs a 62-62 tie with last year's titleists Waterloo Warriors, and the two teams were declared co-champions for 1970-71.

Guelph was a distant third with 33 points, then came Blues at 22 closely followed by McGill (20) and Queens (19). Windsor, McMaster and Carleton rounded out the field.

Blues coach Jack Edgar was decidedly pleased with the teams performance, especially the ability to place well in six different weight divisions.

"We have a young, eager team that's going to get much better with more experience and training. Varsity should be a major contender next year."

V-ball girls win trip

Varsity's talent-rich women's volleyball team earned themselves an all-expense paid trip to sunny Calgary Saturday when they swept all nine of their matches to win the WITCA championships.

The University of Waterloo Athenas finished in second place and will also be present when the national finals open March 5th in the Alberta foothill city.

This is the first year for such a tournament organized under CWIAU auspices.

The Toronto girls were sparked by the outstanding play of Julie Kucharachuk and Halya Stefanjuk.

Trafford takes trophy

The Varsity Basketball Blues completed their season Saturday afternoon as they were narrowly edged, 82-75, by the McMaster Marauders. Veteran guard Larry Trafford led the Blues attack.

Trafford, a graduate of Mimico Collegiate, has been named the 1970-71 winner of the Dr. W. A. Potter Trophy as the team's most outstanding performer.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1971-72 WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24th 1971

This is the fourth year that a revised method of electing the five student representatives to the University of Toronto Athletic Directorate, will be followed. To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 126 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"
- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"
- The nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph.)

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate.

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport".

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at this University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence; also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner.

This year, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

J. P. LOOSEMORE, Secretary
University of Toronto Athletic Association.

Win final five games

Blues carry momentum into OQAA playoffs

By LYNDON LITTLE

For the first time in eight seasons, the Varsity Blues have failed to come up with a first place Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association hockey finish.

However, the momentum generated by a closing charge of five consecutive victories (including a moral-boosting triumph over Waterloo Warriors) may, in the final analysis, prove to be more valuable in Blues quest for a sixth consecutive OQAA shiny crown.

Since that embarrassing 6-5 debacle in Guelph Jan. 28, Blues have straightened around and have defeated Western (8-2), McMaster (9-0), Laurentian (9-4), Waterloo (5-1) and Windsor (4-1).

Unfortunately, this late bid fell just short of the mark. Blues finished in second spot in the OQAA Western Division with a 12-3-0 record.

Last Wednesday's 5-1 thriller over Waterloo the Bloor Street Ice Palace brought the local heroes to within one point of top spot. However, Bob McKillop's Warriors clinched the pennant with a 5-2 home victory over Guelph Friday night; thus Blues' final game the following afternoon in Windsor was strictly to keep the ball rolling.

Blues will leave for Ottawa and the OQAA playoffs Friday morning. They scheduled to meet the Eastern Division winners from Carleton in the first game Saturday night (6:30 p.m.) while Waterloo faces Queens in the second match. The two winners battle for the OQAA title Sunday afternoon at 2:30.

Tom Watt's defending champs

The Varsity — Doug Fraser

Varsity centre Brian St. John (12), gets slammed into goal post by Laurentian's Mickey Jurynech.

tuned-up for the Waterloo showdown with the 9-4 Feb. 12 bash with the Laurentian Voyageurs at Varsity Arena. The Vees have been playing outstanding hockey lately, tripping up York twice to take top spot in the OIAA, so the convincing victory had that much more significance.

Tommy Little, starting his seventh game of the season in the Varsity nets, had to be especially sharp in the opening 20 minutes to hold the opposition off the scoresheet. But after that, it was no contest.

Terry Peterman and John Wright each scored twice while Bill "The People's Choice" Buba, Brian St. John, Mac Hickox, Gord Davies and Brent Swanick added the others. John Valliquette, Brian Slywechuk, Ed Taylor and Bob Delpapa replied for Laurentian.

The Waterloo game, played before a rafter-clinging crowd of close to 5,000, featured an outstanding goaltending display by Grant Cole, a clutch performance from last-minute substitute centre Ivan McFarlane and a Buba hat-trick.

Davies with his 15th of the season and Peterman with his 20th scored the first two Varsity goals while Dave Simpson tallied the lone Waterloo marker.

Two of Buba's goals were from shots 40-feet in front of the net while the other came on a classic Buba swoop from the left wing. Brent Imlach set up that one with a nifty pass.

In Windsor, as he has so many times this year, St. John got the team off to a fast start with a goal after only 46 seconds of play. Then, instead of going into a deep sleep as they did against the Lancers on Jan. 9, Blues went on to play a solid game.

John Wright fought off a debilitating bout of the stomach flu to score his 23rd and 24th goals of the season while Davies added the other. Cole again came up with a sharp show as the Lancers outshot Blues in the first period.

Somerville retains tiddly title; Varsity 3rd

By BARRY CORBIN

While you other sportsies were out on the slopes, breaking your legs during Ski Week, a quiet, intense struggle was being staged at Hart House: the North American Tiddlywinks Championship.

Teams of six poured in from all over the North-Eastern U.S. and Southern Ontario for these Continental: M.I.T., Waterloo, Somerville, Cornell and Hythnbtwoe ("Hark! Yon tree hath no leaves but they will out! - Club).

The Toronto team, composed of Glen Kezwer, Barry Corbin, Lindsey Horenblas, Wendy Levinson, Bryon Alexandroff, and Mel Solomon, put their talents on the line in a final bid to cop the crown after four years of frustration.

After Hyth. knocked out Waterloo in a sudden-death match, a round-robin tournament took place, each team playing 9 matches against 4 other teams. After a disheartening first round loss to Cornell, (most analysts agreed it was the "fluke" of the tourney;) Toronto settled down to play steadily improving matches, culminating in an overwhelming 40-23 wallop of Hyth.

But the early setback to Cornell proved to be Toronto's undoing. Defending champion Somerville played consistently to amass 144 points in 36 matches to take first (hence retaining the Trophy they left back home). M.I.T. (whom, incidentally, Toronto also trounced) stole 2nd place with 136 2/3 points to Toronto's 132 2/3. Far behind were Hythnbtwoe with 118 and Cornell with 105.

While the Toronto six proved themselves the best in the western region, they were forced to acknowledge the eastern region's laudable mastery of the squidge, the squop and the pot. (Actually, they were just damned lucky!)

Varsity fencers do it again!

Varsity's amazingly successful men's fencing team surprised no one this past weekend in Montreal as they rolled to their ninth Ontario-Quebec AA title in the last 11 years.

The fencers, coached by Imre Hennyey, defeated the Eastern Division winners, the University of Montreal, 18 bouts to nine to take the Walters Trophy for OQAA team competition.

Toronto also came away winners in the individual standings as Varsity's peerless epee duo of Helmut Microys and Rowland Griffin gained a 1-2 sweep in that weapon. For Microys, who along with Griffin were to have represented Ontario in the recent Winter Games, it was an unprecedented fifth OQAA epee crown.

WITH THE NEW five-year eligibility rule in effect, that's a record that might conceivably be matched but never broken.

The sabreurs opened the action against the Montreal team with a narrow 5-4 victory. Vladimir Hachinski and David Brown carved out two wins each while Vladimir Gettler picked up the fifth decision.

The foilists were initially overawed by the Montreal skill in this weapon but recovered from a 0-4 deficit to win four of the next five bouts and tie the overall standings at 9-9.

Mike Kerwin was the top Varsity foilist, winning two bouts, while Oscar Wong and Johannes Kacynski registered the others.

Then it was time for the epeeists to come on the scene as they quickly dashed any Montreal hopes with a prompt 9-0 whitewashing in this event to provide Blues with the winning margin. Microys, Griffin and Mark Taylor each had three wins.

Swim Blues splash to eleventh OQAA title

Defend national crown at Waterloo

By PAUL CARSON

They came, they yawned, and they conquered.

And that's just about the story of Varsity's eleventh consecutive OQAA swimming championship, captured by the Blues last weekend in Kingston.

The swimmers methodically did what they had to do — win the title and gain a large representation on the OQAA team for this weekend's CIAU finals in Waterloo.

Varsity and McGill each won six of the eighteen events but Blues won out easily on points with 498 to 421 for the fired-up Redmen. Guelph was third with 218 and McMaster edged Western for fourth 174-170.

BLUES ALSO PLACED ten swimmers on the 25-member OQAA team and should be in a good position to successfully defend their unofficial CIAU team title against University of Alberta.

For much of the two-day competition, Blues were their own worst enemies as several Varsity stalwarts seemed content to swim on their reputations while psyched-up opponents exhibited far more guts and desire.

Perhaps it was the lousy weather, or the poor lighting and lane markings in the new Queens pool, or even the knowledge that the title was really not in doubt, but Blues certainly didn't swim up to their potential.

Granted, each member produced at least one excellent race, and some came through two or three times, but the overall impression was of a sleeping giant — who stayed asleep.

However, many of the veterans are undoubtedly peaking for the CIAU championships and that all-important battle with Alberta. Given Varsity's depth and experience, it's really not surprising that a few swimmers approached the OQAA meet as little more than a warm-up before the main event this weekend.

MOST CONSISTENT VARSITY swimmer was reliable veteran Mike Guinness who bested arch-rival Dave Johnson of McGill in both the 200 and 1650-yard freestyle. Mike's two crucial victories gave Blues a 42-point lead after Friday's events and virtually clinched the championship right then and there.

Johnson recovered to win the 500-yard freestyle in a thrilling finish Saturday night but by then only prestige was at stake.

Both swimmers established new records in winning, and in all twelve OQAA marks were either set or tied — with Blues accounting for exactly half of them.

Guinness obliterated Johnson's old standard of 18:27.8 in the 1650 freestyle by recording an amazing 17:43.5 in the timed final as he swam against the clock since Johnson was in a different heat.

The 200 final was a far different matter as the two classy performers were in adjacent lanes, and Guinness won by a long finger nail in 1:49.4, about a second better than Johnson turned in last year.

Versatile Alex Fedko romped through the 200-yard individual medley, establishing a record in 2:05.4. A most welcome transferee from Simon Fraser, Fedko also made the finals in the 100 freestyle and the 400 I.M., finishing third and fourth respectively.

Bob Heatley, one of two Blues affected by the five-year eligibility limit, went out in style with a 52.6 record-setting display in his specialty, the 100-yard butterfly. Heatley also finished third in the 200 fly and came fifth in the 200 I.M.

GOVERNMENT FITNESS SCHOLARSHIP recipient Jim Shaw tied his own mark of 55.2 in taking the 100-yard backstroke and also set a most unofficial record by picking the lock of his motel room Saturday night (or was it early Sunday morning) in just under two minutes flat.

Lanky Jim Adams lost several battles with the dull brown pool markings and almost wiped out on some hair-raising turns but was able to maintain Toronto's hold on the 50-yard freestyle sprint, tying his own record of 22.2 in Friday's final.

The Queens pool, part of a new multi-purpose athletic complex, drops suddenly from just over four feet deep to almost twelve feet at a moveable bulkhead. Because of the inadequate lighting and dull colors, Adams was unable to see the underwater lane markings at the deep end and seriously misjudged several turns, being fortunate not to break his ankles on the bulkhead.

"I just couldn't see the markings," he moaned later, "sometimes I simply didn't know where I was." Thankfully, the Waterloo pool has excellent mercury-vapor lights and Adams doesn't foresee any unusual problems.

IT WAS QUEENS first major swim meet, and the turns were only one of the nagging mistakes the various teams encountered during the lengthy competition.

Lane dividers broke, announcers mumbled, and the referee appeared determined to break the OQAA record for nit-picking disqualifications.

Ironically, Blues were the chief beneficiaries from Terry Bryon flashes victory gesture after finishing second in 400-yard I.M. to qualify for CIAU's.

what has become known as The Great Breaststroke Debacle which saw the winner and two other finalists thrown out of the 200-yard breaststroke for a series of mostly imaginary violations.

Eventually, Nick Rottman was moved up from third to second and thus gained an automatic berth on the CIAU team.

Ross Ballantyne, the heavy favorite in the 100-yard breaststroke, may have been looking ahead to the CIAU races one week too soon, and came second behind Western's Ken Fowler, main victim of the Great Debacle.

Ballantyne joined Adams, Shaw, Rottman, Fedko, Heatley, Guinness and Terry Bryon as Blues automatic qualifiers . . . any swimmer finishing first or second in a final makes the CIAU team and the remaining positions are filled on the basis of a performance points chart devised by Varsity coach Robin Campbell.

Bryon's gutsy second-place finish in the 400-yard I.M. was unquestionably Varsity's emotional high point in the entire meet.

TERRY HAD EARLIER registered a victory in the consolation final of the 200-yard I.M. and a fourth in the 200 butterfly, but needed a first or second in the 400 I.M. to ensure a CIAU spot.

Paced by Shaw and Fedko, Bryon held on grimly to edge out McGill's Rick Zajchowski in a true photo finish that required almost ten minutes to sort out.

Doug MacIntosh and John Twohig gained the coveted

CIAU berths on the basis of overall performance, and Russ Farquhar was selected first alternate.

Meanwhile, back in the foothills, Alberta laughed it way through the Western finals and will have at least a 14-10 manpower advantage in the upcoming struggle for that officially non-existent national team title that everybody wants to win.

Unlike in Kingston, the outcome in Waterloo is by no means predictable . . . unless, of course, Blues decide to give 100 per cent in all their events. In that case, it will be another year in Hart House for that very real national championship trophy.

POOLTALK . . . one promising feature of the OQAA weekend was the display given by some of the lesser known Varsity swimmers . . . Jock MacRae, Jim Peters and Adam Gesing won consolation finals, while Chris Rockingham turned in three consecutive fifth-place finishes in freestyle finals . . . Ian Dalrymple swam a solid 1650 and did a great job on the stats . . . it was a lost weekend for diver Alex Lau who pulled a ligament in his right foot during the diving warm-ups and was forced to withdraw; his replacement, Zui Eldar, took a second and third in two consolation events . . . Blues were the victim of the wierdest ruling of all when the referee decided to disqualify the winning 400 medley relay entry despite the reluctance of the start judge to concur . . . co-captain Barry Bowerman had a disappointing meet but still managed to grab the second alternate position for this weekend.

Seeking injunction information

Student squad invades Simcoe Hall

A student reconnaissance mission yesterday took Simcoe Hall by surprise, penetrating to the doors of U of T President Claude Bissell's office without interference.

Caught with their pants down by the sudden student invasion, officials and security men quickly began scurrying about and locking doors.

At Bissell's locked office door, the students, fresh from a noon-hour meeting in the lobby of Sid Smith, were told "the President is out to lunch and cannot see students without prior notice."

But faculty council chairman and Provost Jack Sword found himself hemmed in by 30 restless students in the corridor on the second floor of the administration building.

It was to Sword that the students addressed their questions.

Challenged about the possible use of injunctions to prevent student disruption of future faculty council meetings (in particular, Monday's meeting), Sword said he didn't know anything about that.

Sword said that no injunction had yet been served.

Asked what he thought of the Faculty Council's violation of its own rules of procedure, Sword replied: "Oh well, the rules have never been invoked anyway."

When students asked exactly what was meant by Bissell's statement last week that disruptions were a "serious offence" and would be "dealt with accordingly", Sword could only refer his anxious audience to the president himself.

Three seconds later a noisy group of students was sitting outside Bissell's office. Although the president did not appear, the students held a wide-ranging strategy meeting on his doorstep for half an hour.

One suggestion was that Monday's scheduled meeting of the faculty council's general committee should be turned into a general assembly of students and staff or "parity in action."

Following this discussion the group tried in vain to gain admittance to a freshly closed meeting of the Campbell Implementation Committee, then taking place in the Senate Chambers.

The students next went on a quick tour of the Simcoe Hall labyrinth. As they moved through the halls, singing "Solidarity Forever," curious secretaries and staff deserted their offices to socialize with the invaders.

Monday plans set

Yesterday's meeting in the Sid Smith foyer, attended by more than 100 students, included a recapitulation of the Faculty Council parity saga, a progress report from the informal parity Restructuring Committee and the inception of plans for student action at the Faculty Council meeting on Monday.

Students voted to meet in the foyer outside the auditorium in the Medical Sciences Building at 2:30 Monday afternoon. The Faculty Council meeting is scheduled for 4:00 p.m.

Frank Nacsa, SAC representative from St. Mike's, said that there is the possibility that an injunction could be taken against the Faculty Council to prevent it holding closed meetings. The next SAC executive meeting is discussing the question.

Bob Spencer, SAC Education Commissioner, stated that the Restructuring Committee had worked from the premise that the new Faculty Council should be comprised of equal staff-student representation. Spencer said the Committee also added that "everyone who has an academic voice in the Faculty of Arts and Sciences should be represented."

Hence the breakdown: 100 students, 100 staff, 27 teaching assistants, and 27 administrators. It was felt by the Committee that as the administration was to carry out the policy of the Council, it should have a minimal (10%) say in the Council. CUG recommended that a council be comprised of 20 per cent administration.

The full report from the last meeting of the Restructuring Committee held last night will appear in Monday's Varsity.

Norman Rogers, one of the students who successfully disrupted last Friday's meeting of the Faculty Council, said that "if they (the Faculty Council) follow their own rules of order we can successfully disrupt their meeting Monday."

Library worker drops grievance procedure

By ALEX PODNICK

Ex-library worker Pat Garcia, fired for refusing to take on extra duties without a pay raise, has dropped her grievance procedure against the university.

In a letter to the president of the library C.U.P.E. local, Emrys Evans, Garcia said she felt that "any decision arrived at through arbitration by Library management and Union officials would . . . in no way affect the real conditions in the library."

In a previous letter to her, Evans had stressed that "as far as the Union is concerned there is an injustice on the part of the Library authorities which deserves to be aired before a board of arbitration."

Some of Garcia's supporters pointed out that had she returned to the library if she won her grievance, library officials would have made it difficult for her.

One friend of Garcia said she withdrew her grievance because she had no source of income to support her four year old child and herself. Although she had two temporary jobs during the two months since her firing, she is presently unemployed.

Evans said C.U.P.E. does not have funds available to help support members appealing a grievance.

The union was concerned that the Garcia case proceed through the full arbitration procedure because of the general principle involved. In reply to her letter, Evans wrote Garcia that the growing practice of the library asking employees to do work that falls outside those areas legitimately within their job categories places the whole wage structure established by the collective agreement in jeopardy.

C.U.P.E. wanted to use her case to illustrate these abuses. Evans advised Garcia that without her co-operation in proceeding with arbitration "the foundation of the case disappears and we will not be heard."

The union felt Garcia's claim was legiti-mate and would have been upheld by the arbitration board.

Garcia had criticized the lack of militant support for her grievance by her fellow workers. "Working people must organize themselves to fight on such immediate issues . . . and eventually must fight to gain control over their own lives by destroying the capitalist system," she wrote.

C.U.P.E. rejected Garcia's assumption that the union and management are partners in an economic system designed to deprive members of the bargaining unit of their rights and freedom. Evans wrote, "we can in no way accept your suggestion that the Union is opposed in interests to the employees, or that it is, as you infer, a tool of the establishment."

Evans told the Varsity that C.U.P.E. in no way wishes to criticize Garcia's decision. However, they wish to make it clear that the decision not to continue with the arbitration process was Garcia's personal choice and "not a result of any default on the part of the Union."

Garcia's complaint had been rejected by the university's grievance board in January. The next step was appeal to an arbitration board composed of one union nominee, one university nominee, and a chairman chosen by the two nominees.

Before Garcia withdrew her grievance, the union had appointed its nominee. A general meeting of the library C.U.P.E. local had approved the expenditure of funds for the arbitration hearing. The union pays half the cost of the hearing.

The university had also appointed its nominee. The two nominees had chosen Howard Brown, a former vice-chairman of the Ontario Labour Relations Board, as chairman of the arbitration board.

Following C.U.P.E.'s notice to the university that they no longer wished a hearing, it is impossible under any circumstances to re-activate the grievance procedure.

Rejects South African invitation

Macpherson refuses to speak

Professor C. Brough Macpherson has refused an invitation from a racially segregated university in South Africa to be a visiting lecturer.

Macpherson, a well known political philosopher in U of T's political economy department, was invited to the University of Natal for a six week period next summer.

In a letter to Principal F. E. Stock of Natal, Macpherson says that acceptance of the invitation would enable the South African government "to say that a prominent member of the academic community of the West was willing to be the guest of a racially segregated university. I have no reason to doubt that my acceptance of your invitation would be used as evidence that the Western academic world had no serious objection to the subjugation of South African universities to the apartheid system."

"I do understand that the University of Natal opposed the segregation of South African universities and submitted to it only by government compulsion. I cannot, nevertheless, do anything which could be interpreted as making the South African Government's racial policy respectable. I must therefore decline your invitation."

Since 1959 there have been rigid restrictions on non-white participation at South African universities.

Laxer defends Waffle

By PHILINDA MASTERS

Waffle candidate for the NDP federal leadership, Jim Laxer, said at a press conference Wednesday that he objects to Ontario NDP leader Stephen Lewis' suggestion that the Waffle has passed the bounds of legitimate debate.

Lewis was referring to the Waffle groups support of Quebec's right to self-determination, and their position on public ownership of Ontario's energy resource industries.

On the question of self-determination for Quebec, Laxer said, "Our position is not separatist." Instead, the Waffle wing's position acknowledges the right of Quebec to decide its own future, and that English Canada and Quebec should join in redefining their political and economic relationship.

"We can't have a conference with Quebec on the basis of the rigid federalism of the old BNA Act," Laxer said, "we must evolve new bonds of alliance that are mutually acceptable to both English Canada and Quebec."

Laxer said that Lewis' attempt to limit legitimate debate "... does a disservice to the party and amounts to interference in the Federal leadership campaign." The issues have already been raised, and further dialogue within the NDP "would show that our party is strong and ready to run the province," he said.

Lewis' fear that a policy of widespread nationalization would frighten off Ontario voters is invalid because most of our energy resources are already publicly owned, Laxer said.

Lewis is more likely to be afraid that the "radical" reputation of the Waffle wing will frighten off those voters, but Laxer said he could not avoid airing controversial issues just because it might be inconvenient for the elections:

"Frankly," said Laxer, "I had hoped Mr. Lewis would spend his time campaigning against the Tories," instead of the against the Waffle group, but he said he had no objection to Lewis "disagreeing" with specific Waffle policy suggestion.

"We are enthusiastically united behind the leadership of Mr. Lewis and looking forward to doing everything we can to elect him to the Premiership of Ontario," he concluded.

MAKE HART HOUSE YOUR CAMPUS FOCUS

Campus centre design plan accepted

An offer from Dr. Peter Prangnell for the Department of Architecture to formulate a design concept for the campus centre was accepted by SAC two weeks ago.

As Campus Centre Project Co-ordinator Wayne Richardson describes it, the use of the department will replace a professional architect. The cost of the study, which is expected to be implemented almost fully, is estimated at close to $20,000 by the time it is completed next September.

Since the budget of the committee is about $21,000 ($1 from each SAC fees-paying student in a special levy), and about $10,000 has already been spent this year, the study may require a significant amount of next year's budget, which has not been set.

However Richardson says the project will ask the administration on March 9 for money to cover at least part of the cost in the form of a research grant.

An administrator will likely be one of about seven persons on a SAC advisory board which will work with the department while developing the concept design. This board will also likely include a faculty member, a representative from the Board of Governors and three students appointed by SAC.

The Centre, as Richardson envisaged it in a brief report to SAC, would emphasize the importance of developing a livable university quarter, rather than a single-function building. The report suggested the project take shape around things like overnight accommodation for non-resident students, a pub, administrative offices etc.

Tabled for further consideration was a proposal to request $20,000 for small scale intervention projects designed to ameliorate living and working conditions at the U of T.

SAC also decided to retain Richardson full-time until April 1st to ensure the continuity of the project.

NSIT profs rehired

HALIFAX (CUP) — Seven engineering teachers who were to be dismissed at the end of the year, have been granted three year contracts by the Board of Governors of the Nova Scotia Institute of Technology.

The administration decision to let the men go was denounced by students and faculty as a political ploy to get more money in provincial government grants. The administration had said they could not maintain the salaries of the men in question and grant raises to others in the department as well.

The Board now claims that cutbacks in other parts of the college made the reappointments possible. The dispute led to the resignation of administration president G. W. Holbrook officially accepted by the Board on Feb. 8 after two refusals.

This was followed the next day by that of Dean of Engineering, Dr. E. L. Holmes. Although he had announced at a Feb. 2 rally that he would accept blame for the decision not to reappoint the seven, students had not pressed for his resignation, and he has given no official reason for submitting it.

NCCCU asks for Moratorium

Montreal (CUP) — The national committee for canadianization of Canadian universities (NCCCU) is calling for a moratorium on the hiring of non-Canadian university staff until a national policy is formulated on the subject.

The NCCCU which calls itself "an organization of academics conscious of the need for a free and cosmopolitan climate in which to teach and conduct research" is trying to "initiate and promote a complete investigation into all aspects of the question of Canadian content and Canadian staff at Canadian universities."

Two exceptions are "where it has been clearly demonstrated to a senatorial committee that no qualified Canadian citizen is available in the field for which the appointment is sought; or when the candidate holds a Ph.D from a Canadian university." These exceptions would be temporary only.

'Human gov't' in at UBC

VANCOUVER (CUP) — University of British Columbia radicals are in danger of taking over the student council executive.

Three of four candidates running on a "human government" slate won executive positions during elections last week.

Despite the general radical win, presidential candidate Steve Garrod went down to a narrow defeat on the third ballot at the hands of Weatherman (he goes which way the wind blows) Hanson Lau, a fifth year education student.

However, irregularities in the election have caused nonaligned student council treasurer Stuart Bruce to challenge the validity of the presidential election results.

These irregularities include polls opening up to two and half hours late (in Garrod's strongest constituencies) and students being told to vote preferentially when in fact they are allowed to make only one choice on the ballot.

Major points of the "human government" program include Canadianization of the university, democratization of the university and the student council, and end to discrimination against women on campus.

Parity report work is done

The parity committee working out a new governing structure for the Arts and Science faculty has finally completed its work.

The six student, six faculty, and three teaching assistant members agreed unanimously last night to sign their draft report printed in Wednesday's Varsity.

The report calls for a new faculty council of 100 students, 100 faculty, 27 administrators, and 27 teaching assistants.

The restructuring committee will not meet further and has mandated faculty members Lawrence Lynch and Milton Wilson to rewrite the draft report including explanation and justification of the committee's proposals.

The rewritten and final report will appear in Monday's Varsity.

There's oil in Vietnam!

Moscow (CUP) The United States doesn't want to withdraw its troops from Indochina (Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, etc) because of "the huge deposits of oil stretching along the whole coast of the Peninsula of Indochina," says Moscow's biggest newspaper, Pravda.

The paper says that ten American corporations carried out large-scale preparations in 1969 for the extraction of oil from the seabed in the countries of Southeast Asia whose regime depend on U.S. money and fire-power.

The article quoted a geological report prepared by Americans as saying that "in five years the underwater oil fields along the coast of South Vietnam, Cambodia, Thailand, Malaysia and Indonesia could produce daily 400 million barrels of oil."

Companies that have already invested millions of dollars prospecting for oil in the region are Standard Oil Co. of California, Tenneco Inc, Gulf Oil Corp, Continental Oil Co, Union Oil Co. of California and British Petroleum Inc.

No support for campaign

By a vote of 16 to 9, a motion to endorse the 85 per cent quota campaign was defeated by SAC in general meeting held at Scarborough College on Wednesday night

The Canadian Liberation Movement, one of the sponsors of the campaign, is demanding that the federal and provincial governments restrict the number of foreign nationals employed in the departments of Canadian universities and colleges to 15 per cent of the total staff.

SAC president Rod Hurd supporting the motion, said that "there should be a quota system in Canada." Hurd condemned the continentalist policies of University of Toronto President Claude Bissell.

Opposition to the motion was voiced by External Affairs Commissioner Vince Dolan and Financial Commissioner Mike Hofstetter.

Hofstetter said that nationalism in the academic world was repugnant to him. He asserted that a quota system would not assure that academic excellence would be preserved in Canadian universities, and dismissed the claim that Canadian professors were interested in establishing programmes in Canadian studies.

"Nationalism", said Hofstetter, "is inherently racist."

Larry Haiven, a spokesman for the Canadian Liberation Movement rejected Hofstetter's statement.

"To equate the nationalism of the oppressed Canadian people against American imperialism with rabid racism promoted by imperialist Germany and the United States is an absolute outrage", he said.

The proposal to support a quota system will be presented to SAC again at a future date.

A virtually identical motion failed at the Scarborough College Student Society on the night previous to the SAC meeting. The argument which helped defeat the Scarborough motion was that the quota system advocated by the CLM and other groups would violate the Ontario Human Rights Charter.

Haiven rejected this argument and stated that the question of a person's citizenship was a matter of public information.

"Only ten per cent of foreign professors ever take out Canadian citizenship," said Haiven. Taking out citizenship, he added, is the minimum commitment that an academic can make to this country.

SAC refuses to help new book about Quebec

SAC voted 12-10 against a motion to give a six-month, 600 dollar loan to NC Press, the publishing arm of the Canadian Liberation Movement, to publish an English-language edition of Leandre Bergeron's Petit Manuel d'Histoire du Quebec.

The Petit Manuel has been on the bestseller list in Quebec for several months, and the French version has sold 45,000 copies.

Despite the reluctance of SAC, the English edition will appear as a paperback on April 1.

The book will be translated by Bergeron, a professor of Quebec literature at Sir George Williams University in Montreal.

The Petit Manuel has been described as the most important book that has been published in Quebec, and it is being used as a history text by citizens' committees and study groups of the Confederation of National Trade Unions.

SAC drinks up

Approximately 27 SAC members and assorted friends gathered Wednesday evening amid the comfortably well-appointed surroundings of the Scarborough College Faculty Lounge to drink some sherry and spend some money.

Three hours and much sherry later, the assembled revellers departed having spent only a little money, refused to endorse the Eighty-Five Per cent Quota Campaign, watched Gloria Jean Bubba get pleasantly smashed, and talked about reducing the quorum long enough to run out of a quorum.

Between drinks it was announced that the Men's Athletic Directorate will no longer provide its $7,000 subsidy to the Blue and White Band. Sic transit Gloria Teitelbaum.

"What happens to a dream deferred?
Maybe it just sags like a heavy load
OR DOES IT EXPLODE?"

— Langston Hughes

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto. Printed by Web Offset Publications Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

A short note on contradictions

Reading the front page of Wednesday's Varsity, the reader might be struck by an apparent contradiction in the position of students who feel that the faculty council in arts and science must not be allowed to continue business as usual.

On the one hand, students are actively preventing the council from transacting "normal" business because they consider the body "illegitimate". (The students are bound by the results of the November referendum not to participate in the work of the council because it has refused to set up a staff-student parity committee to restructure the council.)

But on the other hand, the reader might ask, why did these same students allow one of the council's committees to transact some of its business last week? (For a short while disruption of the Evaluations Committee was suspended in order to allow approval of a pass-fail grading system for six courses.)

The answer is that students are fighting not for some abstract principle of "parity or bust", but for real, concrete changes in the style and content of education now dispensed at U of T.

It would have been a betrayal of these objectives to block implementation of changes which are directly relevant to that goal.

It would be wrong to suggest there is any contradiction in continuing to see the faculty council as an "illegitimate" body which must be forced to recognize the overwhelming sentiment of students, while still cooperating, from time to time, in the implementation of changes which students strongly favour.

A book we should help publish

U of T students missed an opportunity Wednesday night to play an important part in making English Canadians understand the roots of the crisis in Quebec.

We missed out by a scant two votes when the Students' Administrative Council, meeting at Scarborough College, decided not to aid in the publication of the English edition of Petit manuel d'histoire du Quebec.

Since the events of last fall, this paperback volume has been topping the best-seller lists throughout French Canada.

None of the major publishers in English Canada have rushed to try to publish a translation. This is not surprising. In French Canada, the book was published only with trade union support in the first place. The French edition carries a warning that the book may not be sold for more than $1.00, and the English edition will likewise have a low price when it appears in April.

If, that is, the book does appear.

The publishers, New Canada Press, are trying to raise the cost of printing an initial 10,000 copies of the book — $4,500 — by seeking interest-free loans from various groups and individuals who see the need for English Canadians to reach an understanding of French Canada's struggle for national survival.

There is no question the costs of the book will quickly be recovered, since this remarkable book fills a gaping hole in what little good literature is available in English on the history of French Canada.

A review of the book which appeared in this paper last December gives a more exact idea of what contents the book has. Basically, it represents a kind of history different from what we arc usually taught in schools and universities.

History, as Bergeron understands it, must be used as a tool for understanding and changing the present:

"In order to change our situation, we must first comprehend it," he writes in his preface.

Judging from the readership the book has acquired in French Canada, this task has become an important priority for many Quebecois.

The SAC should reconsider its decision not to make a $500 loan towards publishing this important book.

"We can't wander through the forest much longer without some smart-alec teaching assistant or student asking us where we are going..."

A conference for non-communication

Someone apparently forgot to tell panelists participating in last weekend's Student Law Society conference on "Communications and the Public Interest" what the theme was.

When a member of the audience was audacious enough to question panelists about the public interest, they thought it wasn't worth their while to answer.

Cable television operator Ted Rogers, who earlier lauded cable t.v. for its community programming, suggesting it was a matter for Parliament to decide. Another participant, documentary producer Doug Leiterman, declined any comment on the topic.

Toronto communications lawyer, E. A. Goodman discounted the community groups dissatisfied with the type of press we have, saying the media accurately represents community interest.

Later, he angrily rejected a suggestion from the floor that public ownership of the media be considered to make it accessible to all segments of the community.

When he then swore at a questioner who dared challenge the status quo further, his adversary noted that the "important questions asked in this conference were ignored by that type of cheap humour".

He was right. Whenever the status quo was challenged, someone would attempt to defuse the issue, rather than discuss it.

But then, that was to be expected. The conference was dominated by various vested interests — cable television operators private broadcasters, advertising agency personnel, newspaper bureaucrats, Bell Telephone, media technicians, communications lawyers, and other media people.

The debate about control of coaxial cables between operators and Bell Telephone was of more personal interest to the participants than a discussion of the public interest.

Communications lawyers in a like vein devoted their time to an attack upon fellow panelists Pierre Juneau, chairman of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, rather than waste it by dwelling on how their client stations might serve the public interest.

Although the conference was a student conference, there were very few students to be found attending. Similarly, there were no community or citizen group representatives present (invited?) to articulate their position.

Consequently, it's not very amazing that those present tended to equate the public interest with their corporate interest. After all, they had financed the conference in great part. The list of those donating financial assistance includes several cable television companies, radio stations, banks, and communications lawyers.

One conference organizer accurately described the "serious business of the conference" as "drinking and eating". On more than one occasion, embarrassing questions were dealt with by declaring that the session had to adjourn for cocktails.

When CBC Information director Knowlton Nash was scolded by a conference official for CBC's failure to cover the conference, he is reported to have commented that "the public is just not interested in this type of thing". And, right he was.

This boring conference wasn't for the people. It was for the corporate elite.

The Spadina Expressway: Who wants it?

Lost week the Ontario Municipal Board, in a split decision, approved further construction of the controversial Spadina Expressway. Although OMB Chairman J. A. Kennedy favoured an intensive review of the project, his two vice-chairmen, William Shub of Timmins, and R. M. McGuire of Cornwall, teamed up to give the expressway the green light.

In this article, U of T graduate Paul Reinhardt, a member of the Stop Spadina - Save Our City Coordinating Committee steering committee, analyses the OMB decision.

THE UNPRECEDENTED 2 TO 1 VICTORY of the Ontario Municipal Board, approving Metro's request for additional funds, has been a stunning blow to everyone in the anti-Spadina movement.

If we are still convinced that the expressway should not be built and that our criticisms of the project are valid, then how do we interpret the rejection of those criticisms by the two vice-chairmen?

It appears that Shub and McGuire, along with the majority of Metro politicians, see the Spadina as a basic element in the growth of Metro Toronto, an element so basic that we can readily sacrifice valuable neighborhoods and ravine land for it.

MOREOVER, all these gentlemen seem very concerned that Metro remain "reliable" in its development patterns.

THE SHUB AND MCGUIRE decisions must assume that the Metro politicians, as duly elected representatives, speak for the majority of people in their constituencies, and that the "pro-expressway" position represents a "majority" sentiment in Metro.

We know, however, that the appearance of public support for the Spadina has largely been the work of a few politicians, such as North York Controller Irving Paisley, Webb & Knapp, who built Yorkdale, and Simpson's and Eaton's who have stores there.

CONTRAST PAISLEY'S BOAST that he could get "thousands of signatures on a pro-Spadina petition with the more than 16,000 signature "stop-and-review" petition given to the Metro Transportation Committee last spring.

Contrast the short list of groups favoring the expressway with the long list of rate-payer groups, church, home and school, political and other groups opposing or wanting a review of the project.

BOTH SHUB AND MCGUIRE not only assume that the majority wants the Spadina, but conclude that the Spadina would benefit the majority of citizens as well, while stopping the expressway and undertaking a transportation review would benefit only a few people.

When we consider the widespread opposition to the expressway which crosses regional, class and generational boundaries, we might well question who is the majority and who the minority on this issue.

Furthermore, given Metro Council's enthusiastic support of the project, we might ask Metro councilmen to tell us who among their constituents is asking for the expressway. (The Willowdale Enterprise took an opinion survey of its readers last spring and discovered an even split for and against the expressway.)

Rather than assuming that the majority of citizens in Metro want the expressway, Shub and McGuire would have done well to ask Metro politicians how they came to vote for the project in the first place.

ALTHOUGH KENNEDY was out-voted by his colleagues, his dissenting opinion can be seen as a landmark in the anti-Spadina fight and the history of the OMB. A recognition of all the major points of the anti-Spadina, anti-expressway position can be found in the Kennedy brief.

In voting against Metro's request for further funds, Kennedy accepted many of the arguments against the expressway which have been ignored or ridiculed by Metro politicians and planners.

He acknowledged that

- A "great many important factors had changed" since the OMB last considered the Spadina project, namely our awareness of "social costs" and the dangers from "air and noise pollution."

- Inner-city residential areas and ravines are considered "unique on this continent", a "priceless heritage" and strong efforts should be made to preserve them.

- "Majority needs should prevail over minority and individual rights only if the project proposed in the public interest can be justified and supported."

THE OMB CHAIRMAN considers Metro Council squarely to blame for not adopting an official plan as is required under the statutes of Metro Corporation. He suggests that if Metro Council had gone to the board five years ago when the unofficial plan was prepared, the question of Spadina Expressway could have been fought out then, through the channels of citizen involvement provided for in the official plan process as set up by the Province.

Perhaps most important for Kennedy, the expressway could then have been discussed in the proper context, taking full consideration of proposed land use and development densities. Furthermore the Official Land Procedure would have encouraged public discussion and approval of the project.

Metro Planning Commissioner Wojciech Wronski was criticized on two counts by Kennedy. First for not pushing for the adoption of the official plan, and for his weak excuse that outside municipalities objected to a Metro plan governing their land use. Indeed, if Wronski's argument were taken to its logical conclusion, there could be no integration of planning between municipalities, and the rationale for a Metro-wide planning staff or even Metro-wide government, would be lost.

WRONSKI WAS ALSO CRITICIZED for his role in suppressing the controversial Kates, Peat, Marwick & Co. 1965 Travel Demand Study, which was submitted to his department in March of 1970 but was never made available to the Metro Planning Board or Council or even Sam Cass, commissioner of roads and traffic.

The Kates, Peat, Marwick study calculated average 1965 travel speed as 12 miles per hour and the average trip time as 56 minutes and called into question the adequacy of the road system of which the Spadina Expressway is a vital link.

KENNEDY FEELS that the present inadequacies of the transportation system in Metro cannot be solved simply by building more roads.

He makes a simple comparison of the capacity and cost of rapid-transit vis a vis expressways and concludes that there are major advantages to building rapid-transit facilities.

He suggests that Metro undertake a cost-benefit study of public transit, rapid transit alternatives before any more expressways are built.

In giving his preliminary instructions to his colleagues and to the counsels, he stressed that Metro's application would be treated as a new application, and full consideration would be given to "necessity and expediency" despite the fact that work had already been done on the project.

IN CONTRAST, Shub argues that he is primarily concerned with discerning whether Metro Council, in 1963 and 1969, had established in its own mind that the facility was needed, and would not cause undue harm to the community.

Shub and McGuire share a strong belief that the OMB should not halt a project of the size and magnitude of the Spadina Expressway once it has begun.

This can be understood as a concern that the planning process of municipal government be "reliable," that projects develop in an orderly fashion without major alterations. Shub characterizes this "reliability" as a basic right of the public.

Kennedy, whose request that Metro adopt an official plan shows his concern with an orderly, planning process, places his emphasis on the preservation of inner-city residential neighborhoods and the natural beauty of ravine land.

LET US LOOK BACK to the early days of the Spadina. The following summary is taken almost verbatim from The Bad Trip by Nadine and David Nowlan:

In 1956 our elected representatives shelved the plans for the construction of a northwest artery into the city in what is now known as the Spadina Corridor when a Planning Board Report showed that there was very little need for a facility in that area. But two years later the project was again being discussed, in terms of improving transportation for the northwest part of Metro. In 1959 Metro Council approved the $1,000,000 construction of a cloverleaf at Highway 401 between Dufferin and Bathurst. Reliable reports at that time indicated that been given to Eaton's and Simpson's who were considering construction sites in North York, that the Spadina Expressway would be built to assist in the development of this area in spite of the fact that the cost of the project was not known, the Metro Council had not approved it, nor had the Ontario Municipal Board been asked to approve the rapid transit portion of the project. It was over a year later that the general public learned of the plans, when Metro Chairmen Frederick Gardiner announced that the construction of the "Spadina Expressway" should start as soon as Eaton's and Simpson's begin construction of their new North York stores.

A STATED COMMITMENT to provide transportation to the North York community was actually preceded by a commitment to the two retail giants to provide easy access to their new stores.

The Metro politicians involved might well argue that developments such as Yorkdale benefit all of us, if not directly as property owners, then directly through increased tax revenues, through the creation of jobs, and through the increased availability of goods and services. Such arguments have some validity, for such benefits, though indirect, are still benefits, and reach more people than simply those few who made the major financial profit from Yorkdale.

But we must also point out that a great many of the North York community and in Metro at large either choose not to shop at Yorkdale, or are unable to shop there because they lack transportation or find it inconvenient or too expensive.

To argue that a segment of the community benefits through jobs, and another segment benefits through shopping at Yorkdale should not cause us to forget that the major benefits from Yorkdale accrue to the wealthy few who own the land and major concessions.

We should also remind the advocates of development that the taxes of all Metro citizens went into constructing the cloverleaf and expressway which now serve Yorkdale. Whether or not we receive benefits, we have paid indirectly for the development of the area.

IF WE ARE STILL CONVINCED that the Spadina should not be built, if we want a city in which the politicians listen to the people and not just to developers and big business, what can we do now that the OMB has ruled against us?

First of all, there are a number of legal channels still open to us. There is the possibility of appealing the decision on procedural grounds to the provincial court of appeals. This could lead to the granting of a new hearing before the OMB.

There is also the possibility of appealing to the Cabinet. A Cabinet appeal could lead either to a new hearing before the OMB or to a complete reversal of the decision.

FINALLY, there are many legal procedures which individuals might take, such as fighting appropriation of their house by bringing suit against the Metro Corporation or the construction companies.

In regard to the appeal to the Cabinet, we have some important advantages. There is a provincial election approaching, and if the Cabinet attempts to ignore our request for a halt to construction and a full scale review of transportation, they must face the consequences that it will have at the polls.

There are some of the anti-Expressway forces who expect the Cabinet not to listen to our appeal, and therefore think that the battle has been lost. They should ask themselves one question: Do you still believe that the expressway should not be built? If so, then we should waste no time in letting the Cabinet know that we have not given up.

Library fines should be abolished

A fines charging system in any library draws only contempt from me. The method of charging varies between libraries but essentially I detect two purposes as served by it. It may maintain a reasonable flow of material within the library community and simultaneously serve to remind the library community of the might and existence of the librarians. The latter characteristic may so often be accentuated that contact with the fines system and library must be equal only to contact with an octopus. On the other hand, some libraries depend on the fines to supplement their book fund. Several libraries refuse to use a fines charging system.

Since students do contribute towards the library in their fees, I am proposing (whether or not it supplements the book fund to a large extent) that:

1) Reading week be made an AMNESTY WEEK so that all books overdue between September and Reading week can be returned without charge of a fine. Amnesty week is commonly practised by libraries that put service before any other concern.

2) That the practice of withholding marks until fines are paid be replaced by withholding marks until books are returned.

3) That registration of the continuing student be associated with the return of books still overdue and their return to the library. This refers to the point at which the library validates the ATL card as including library privileges. Even if this was done at the point of registration into a year it would make little difference.

4) That the system of charging fines be abolished. (The implementation of all three suggestions above give a reasonable chance for retrieval of overdue books).

5) In addition, an in term control method could concentrate on a reasonable limit being placed on the number of overdue books allowed a student. Students will need books and the return of overdue books will still be achieved without the charging of a fine.

Cease the extraction of the student's pocket money in addition to the library fee.

Why continue to ask the student to pay fines so many months after the books have been returned to the library and especially where the book may have been only a few hours or even an hour late? Is the library here to aid or to hinder academic work?

The exit control system is a fitting choice and well keeping with the atmosphere created at the library. It reminds one of the experience of passing through an Iron Curtain check point.

So then if nothing is done and the exorbitant, disgraceful fines system is allowed to continue to terrorize students, at least let them use the library during Reading Week.

They don't even answer their mail

I would like to comment on a tactic proposed for the striking (although slightly dated, this letter remains interesting - ed.) students. It was suggested that students write to the Faculty of Arts and Science to request transcripts and course changes, etc. to tie up their normal functioning.

I would say this is probably a waste of time, because it has become apparent to me that this office disregards any mail they receive anyway. I wrote to the Faculty of Arts and Science requesting information about advance standing in September, and as yet have received no reply.

I did receive, however, a refund of the tuition for the summer course I had taken, written the exam and passed. I kept the cheque, then wrote and asked why they had sent it. The next day I was called at work and asked to return the money, even though they had no record of my having taken the course. I asked them to verify that I was credited for this course, but of course have not heard from them, even though I did write again.

My husband has experienced the same incompetence when requesting transcripts for law school.

The only way to get any results from this office is to wait at the desk and refuse to leave until your information is supplied. Now if a thousand students lined up at the Faculty office...

Have you seen Vic New College?

I would like to ask a rhetorical question regarding the poor management of the Drama Section of Renaissance 71. Sure, the idea of an Arts Festival is great, as long as you can put yourself at the disposal of the public at large. Pertaining to the Drama Section however; publicity has not been poor — it has been non-existent. The exception of the rule has been one advertisement in the Varsity (I am referring to 2 plays by Allan Stratton of Vic.) — Unfortunately however these plays were both advertised as being in "Victoria New College"; which for the poor souls who struggled to find it, was really the New Vic Theater, Rm. 3, New Academic Building, Victoria College. Needless to say, we had a great audience, between 7 and 9 people, being friends of the cast, with the exception of two avid ticket collectors who had come on behalf of Renaissance and one man who had seen the plays when they were presented in January and who wanted to see them again.

One would think that an organization with the efficiency to send over people to collect money from the audience that never was could have had the forethought to send along one of those professional adjudicators, which rumour has it were supposed to offer criticism from their own professional standpoints.

As you can imagine, I read Mr. Thomas's remarks (The Varsity Feb. 8) with a feeling of appreciation for his plight (which I am able to gather as well from my association with Renaissance). Needless to say, I was amused by Mrs. Mercer's reply. Among other things in her diatribe, I emphatically question the tactful comments made about Mr. Thomas's play, as I do not remember seeing Mrs. Mercer as a critic before. I would say that Renaissance needs all the shit they can get. (they would even get an audience — if they were to publicise).

Renaissance is partially excused however; it has been beset from the very beginning with resignations from section after section, of producers, directors, secretaries, and volunteers, who left largely through difficulties arising with Mrs. Mercer, and the lamentable credibility gap between the words and deeds of the powers that be. If the drama section is a cue to the way the entire thing is run, God help them.

Mr. Thomas's description of the trials of dealing with Renaissance are born out by my own sources, indeed, Mr. Thomas possibly understated Mrs. Mercer's relationship with himself. I hope that the august powers that be take heed and publicize the remaining shows, or I do not see a successful festival.

Reply from Knight in Shining White

Regarding an article published in the Varsity of Friday, January 29 written by a Mr. Bob James, I found it impossible to refrain from replying even though my time can be used on more interesting things.

For clarity, let it be known that of the six hundred and fifty students enrolled in the Bio 120 course, fourteen kiddies (i.e. boys and girls) did not know enough to show up at appointed time. Now think about who it was that fouled up.

It is true that on the evening of their foulup, neither I nor the other invigilator could remain for another hour and a half to allow them to write because of prior commitments.

However, through a great deal of consultation, and a re-arranging of the test, it was held for the benefit of these few on the Thursday of the same week.

Considering the cynical and rather unfavourable comment given about me, it rather irks me now to think that I gave up any time worrying about the matter. I am not employed by Mr. Bob James, nor any of these students and nowhere in my agreement with this university is there a request for specialized treatment of any individual or minority group.

The best recommendation that can be offered in this case is that perhaps it would have been wiser to forget about that 'thing' in Sid Smith and attend lectures and labs on a regular basis. This way you may find out what's happening and when.

Parity: the emasculation of a concept

By CHRIS HUXLEY

THE REPORT OF THE RESTRUCTURING Committee for the Faculty of Arts and Science Council once more affirms a halting commitment to the general principle of parity of representation between faculty and students. So did the Commission on the Government of the U of T (CUG) in its 1969 report.

Both CUG and now the Restructuring Committee have each served to emasculate the concept of parity by proposing to include administrators as full voting members of an academic body which should be responsible to students and teachers. One of the many problems with the so-called "Community of Scholars" at present is that a small group of non-scholars at places like Simcoe Hall have gradually begun to assume more and more power. Functionaries have become the day-to-day rulers of the university.

AS MATTERS STAND at present, university administrators are neither democratically elected nor accountable in any sense to students at the university. Yet they wield unwarranted power over students' lives. The Restructuring Committee urges the inclusion of senior administrators as voting members of the Council on account of their "expertise and experience" and because "they are deeply committed to the operation of the Faculty."

But there is no reason why that expertise, experience or commitment would be lost to the operation of the Faculty Council if 27 administrators were to be regarded as non-voting members accountable to the Faculty Council.

The proposal to provide representation for teaching assistants is obviously more attractive. But certain problems seem to have been ignored.

First, teaching assistants do not appear to have given much indication that they consider representation important. Second, teaching assistants are hired on a notoriously casual and last-minute basis which makes the election of representatives problematic.

Third, we should ask whether teaching assistants are being considered as teachers or as graduate students? If their contribution to the Faculty Council is as teachers we see a further weakening of the possibility of a student veto on such questions as grading policy.

ONE POSSIBLE WAY TO PROVIDE for the representation of teaching assistants would be to regard them as part of a broadened constituency of teaching staff incorporating both faculty and non-faculty teachers.

This would not upset any model for a Council containing equal numbers of representatives from teaching staff and students.

Teaching assistants do unquestionably have real grievances to express over pay and working conditions. Unionization suggests itself as one obvious response. Teaching assistants, in addition to being teachers, are also graduate students. As such they should be working to change the School of Graduate Studies as well as their own departmental graduate programmes.

For the present, it might be better for students to abstain from advancing any immediate plans for the representation of teaching assistants on Faculty Council. We might also note that no proposals have so far been made for any representation of non-teaching employees of the university. These and other questions should remain open for further debate. Groups affected should formulate their own proposals.

FINALLY ONE MIGHT ASK why the Restructuring Committee is recommending a Faculty Council of some 254 members? Could this not amount to a prescription for the same sort of dead-lock situation we have seen so often before?

And throughout our discussions about reforming the Faculty Council we should remember that even if someday this restructured bureaucracy were to get around to actually doing something (like abolishing exams) it could always find its rulings vetoed by some higher body such as the Senate or the Board of Governors.

Regardless of whether the proposals of the Restructuring Committee are accepted by students in their present or in some amended form, the main priority must be to build a mass movement of students who are prepared to assert their collective power. Students on this campus and elsewhere have learned that nothing is ever won unless a significant proportion of the student body is mobilized. And it is naive to believe that anything significant can be achieved by compromising the central student demand before students are in any sort of bargaining situation. Students have already agreed to a significant compromise with faculty. We must reply to those who say we are being intransigent that 50% student representation is the only realistic compromise to which students can possibly agree.

And in the course of the struggle we should not lose sight of the notion of a university that is run by general assemblies of all those who study, teach or work at the institution.

Jottings on a recent panel discussion

By MARIE TIIDO

JOTTINGS at Panel Discussion, a Part of the Irish Seminar, featuring: W. H. Auden, famous poet; Buckminster Fuller, renowned architect and originator of brilliant ideas; Marshall McLuhan, author of The Medium is the Message; Jack MacGowan, Irish actor; and A. N. Jeffares, (Chairman), of the University of Leeds.

McLuhan, wiry and alert, is leaning forward in his seat.

Auden, settled very comfortably, clears his throat in his very peculiar manner. His face is ancient and wrinkled like a desert Arab's and very much alive.

Fuller, dour faced, looks awkwardly out of place. He is prepared to say very little. He is probably bored. He seems a bit defensive but remains polite and attentive.

Asked: "Do you feel that TV is a good educational medium?" "Yes, that's right", he answers.

McLuhan assumes control and begins diligently to dart questions at the other parties. Auden ignores McLuhan's first question and, by way of answer, defines himself as a nineteenth century man.

McLuhan, undaunted, gives the audience a brief description of Auden's theory of the modern subconscious. Auden retorts that it isn't true.

The Chairman has style and presence and diplomatically maintains his own form of control. He introduces the subject of audience participation in drama.

Mr. MacGowan, the Irish actor, pleasant, unpretentious, and informative, admits that, although audience involvement is an important part of drama, audience participation just won't do. It ruins the mystique of the thin line between the trained actor and the actors on the stage that Shakespeare named life.

Auden wholeheartedly agrees. While McLuhan, with school-boy enthusiasm, speaks of the theater of astronauts and the theater of no audience, Auden, partisanlike, turns to McGowan and gurgles loud enough for the first ten rows to hear: "Audience reaction — I don't like that".

Fuller is asked to tell the complete story of the Beckett theater that he is designing for Oxford University in England. Fuller says that he has never designed a theater before and that the theater will be underground.

"Not underwater?" quips McLuhan facetiously.

MacGowan suggests that the Greek theater should be his model, in answer to the Chairman's bid for suggestion. MacGowan assures Auden — "But they were open weren't they?" — that it could be indoors.

On the subject of television again, McLuhan makes the statement that it is necessary for our survival to do away with TV. Audience awaits the reason in profound suspense.

Because, he continues to explain, TV will continue to upgrade the Oriental and Negro images until these groups arise and crush the white image in a blood battle.

McLuhan agrees with Auden that TV is harmful in general and questions why it continues to exist. Auden answers to the effect that "they" meaning people, like it.

McLuhan asserts that Auden knows nothing about TV and that it is not the images that are the message of TV but, rather, "that rush of fire that reaches your gut. Images have nothing to do with it."

"Yes, they do", says Auden and goes on to another topic.

On the subject of the dying written word, which McLuhan has introduced, McLuhan sums up: "Obsolescence is super-abundance." The enormous production of books is indicative of its dying out.

Auden: "I don't think so." McLuhan asks Auden to comment on the relation between the English word and jazz.

Auden: I know nothing about it. I live in an apartment in York.

McLuhan: This is the original York — Toronto. Do you mean York, England?

Auden: No NO. I mean New York.

McLuhan proceeds to tell Auden about the relationship between the English word and jazz. Have you ever noticed, he asks, that no other language can adapt itself to rock rhythms as well as English.

Auden answers that he likes German and he doesn't care if it doesn't adapt itself to rock rhythms as well as English, upon McLuhan's objection, because he still likes German.

McLuhan cleverly points out many more relations between things in the course of the panel discussion.

Auden clears his throat a few more times and continues to cheer the audience with his forthright statements, aware of, but paying no heed to McLuhan's condescension.

All parties agree that the silent majority is the dead.

The whole thing reminds me of The Wizard of Oz and the funny little man behind the facade, whose kingdom was splendid only to those who wore green tinted glasses, which was the majority of the populus.

Quebec studies military system

PARIS (CUPI) — Quebec justice minister Jerome Choquette and a high-powered delegation of officials are secretly in Europe to study police methods with a view to an eventual reorganization of Quebec's police forces.

According to the Montreal Star, informed sources said the group, which included Quebec provincial police director Maurice St. Pierre (who at one time had control of all Quebec police forces), police commission chairman Roger Gosselin, assistant deputy justice minister Robert Boisvert, and lawyer Robert Dermers who represented the government during the October-November FLQ negotiations, is taking a look at police organization in France and England.

In France the police forces are reported to be extremely repressive. There is a specially trained riot squad called the SRS which closely resembles the Hitler SS squad both in its manner and its dress. On their big motorcycles with all kinds of riot equipment they present a terrifying sight.

The SRS don't like people with long hair and usually go out of their way to stop these people and demand the identity pass French people are obliged to have with them at all times.

The main object of the Quebec study group is to find out how Quebec's forces can be more centralized, how citizens' rights can be better protected, and how standards of recruitment can be raised and the police more efficient.

The government feels, on the basis of the October crisis, that it is important to organize the police in such a manner that there is a more direct chain of command so that officials know what is going on and can co-ordinate efforts in a serious manner.

The group is interested in the centralized structure of the French police and the clear apportioning of tasks to different elements of the force, such as criminal investigation, subversive radical activities, etc.

The Quebec group is particularly interested in attracting university graduates to their ranks. They feel a higher level of education will make the men more equipped to deal with such things as organized crime, contestation, or kidnapping crises.

A higher level of education, they feel, would mean the creation of units where the men have an understanding of human nature and the technical ability to understand such problems.

Another advantage would be the protection of citizens' rights because senior officials would have a better idea of what is going on, the Quebec study group believes.

The police are inclined to use unorthodox methods, one source said, in cases where they feel isolated and have no reference or help from other qualified officers. It is important to change this.

All this investigation will form the basis of a white paper ordered by the Quebec government in November.

Purdy's poetry is of and for the common man

"If inferior in power or intelligence to ourselves, so that we have a sense of looking down on a sense of bondage, frustration, or absurdity, the hero belongs to the ironic mode. This is still true when the reader feels that he is or might be in the same situation." (Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism)

Purdy is ironic, that much is obvious.

Notice both the man — cigar-puffing, home-brew wine-making poet of every street-corner's language — and the character who appears as persona in so many of his poems:

*Man's sole gesture of defiance at a hostile or indifferent universe is standing outside at night after the requisite number of beers and with a graceful enormous parabola trying to piss on the stars failing magnificently ("Attempt", Wild Grape Wine)*

Obvious, perhaps, but not so obvious that it doesn't bear stating once, and then forgetting.

For Purdy stands accused of unromanticism, of being "hard-boiled". At least such is the charge laid against him (in the introduction to his latest book, Love in a Burning Building) by two figures who should know better — his publisher, Jack McClelland, and artist Harold Town — "with a kind look, drawing his cloak closer around him."

They expected maybe . . . sonnets?

No, it couldn't be. Purdy is a common man, a man for whom love is to be found in Ameliasburg, in an A-frame house he built from scraps of lumber with carpenter-friend turned-poet Milton Acorn . . . and he is an honest man. His love poetry could be no more romantic in terms of Irving Layton's sense of glorification of the physical sex-act, than it could be romantic as the fragility of Leonard Cohen's lyricism.

What, then, is Purdy's love poetry? A short poem, from Love in a Burning Building:

*Seeing the sky darken & the fields turn brown & the lake lead-gray as some enormous scrap of sheet metal & wind grabs the world around the equator
I am most thankful then for knowing about the little gold hairs on your belly — ("Winter at Roblin Lake")*

A superficially impersonal poem — there is (as was the case with "Attempt") no overt narrator — but the presence of the man remains strong. A delicate touch, in the last line, but delicate in the sense of the proverbial bull-in-a-china-shop . . . that the same hands that worked the fields and the sheet metal, that those hands should seek "the little gold hairs" on his wife's belly, and it is a belly, not a damn stomach or midriff.

Again, the presence of the man, 6'2" and "so typical looking . . . that everybody in the interior of British Columbia looks exactly like (him)" (George Bowering, "Purdy: Man and Poet") is overpowering.

At the core of Purdy's poetry is a sympathy, an understanding of the common man. The poet is most often alone, and will admit it:

*I am a sound beyond hearing past Arcturus still moving out ("Night Song for a Woman", Love in a Burning Building)*

but yet, he is not the man to preface a reading (as did Leonard Cohen once) with the remark, "the person in this room in the most pain is me". The following three lines of that same poem, "Night Song for a Woman", reassert Purdy's sympathy:

If anyone were to listen they'd know how it is with humans.

George Bowering (in his article in Canadian Literature, 43) states unequivocally that "Purdy is not a 'labour poet', and he is not sentimental in the bourgeois sense about the working class." Perhaps not, but along with his Milton Acorn, he must be considered one of the Canadian poets most eligible for that dubious title.

Surely Purdy's sensibilities must be seen as "working class", as would any poet's whose collections include such poems as "The Winemaker's Beat-Etude" (Wild Grape Wine) and "Home-Made Beer" (Love in a Burning Building). His images, too, run in much the same vein:

*I am drinking
I am drinking beer with yellow flowers in underground sunlight ("At the Quinte Hotel", Poems for All the Annettes)* as does the kind of sentimentality he displays.
*My last visit was by moonlight and flashlight to Bud's Auto Wreckers where the old Pontiac waited
I turned the speedometer back to 5000 miles changed the oil*

*gave it back its ownership card and went away
puzzled by things. ("My '48 Pontiac", Wild Grape Wine)*

The poems which are Purdy's most political (in its purest sense) are those dealing with his experience in mattress factories on the coast in the early fifties (when he was fired for trying to introduce the Vancouver Upholsters Union):

*The days fled into smoky weeks and he learned to operate one machine after another learned them all how to gauge the "spock" of a needle plunging hard thru cloth beside his hand adjusting the varied rhythms of flesh with the balanced shifting stance of a boxer anticipating his steel opponent. ("The Machines", The Cariboo Horses)*

But a true "labour poet" or not, Bowering is never closer to the mark than when he comments that Purdy is "deeply and habitually allied with the underdogs — the mattress workers, with the Tsimshian Indians of the B.C. interior, with the Sons of Freedom on their freedom march to Agassiz prison, with the Eskimo hunters of Baffin Island."

Any kind of consistent appraisal of Purdy's development as a poet is well-nigh impossible due to his erratic publishing history. The Cariboo Horses (1966) is his earliest "important" book, but I think he has done better since. North of Summer (1967) is his poetic account of a year spent on Baffin Island and is illustrated by A. Y. Jackson. The problem there is the cost ($5.00) and the lack of availability of the book Wild Grape Wine and Poems for all the Annettes both came out in 1968 and are both readily available, but the latter is largely a "modernizing" of an earlier chapbook of the same title and contains what I consider to be poor flirtations with broken-line verse. I would recommend, then, Wild Grape Wine and his new book, Love in a Burning Building (1970). To a large extent Love is also an updating of earlier work, but in it Purdy seems to keep more within his own forms than he did in Poems.

Because a poem is published does not necessarily mean it is perfect and couldn't be revised, because Al Purdy is an honest man.

U of T big enough to hold famous opposing theologians

Religion, Language and Truth
By Leslie Dewert
Methuen Publications
$5.95

Before I read it, Leslie Dewert's new book was described to me as "a counterblast to Bernard Lonergan's scholasticism".

While I have merely dipped into Lonergan's fat and famous book Insight for background, its subject matter seems to validate Professor Dewert's classification of Lonergan as a staunch neo-Thomist. The last sentences of Insight brand their author indeed as a Thomasolater or at least as one who supposes Aquinas's work to be permanently definitive. This in an age of unsurpassed speed of change in virtually every field and discipline — certainly in philosophy and theology! I quote Lonergan: " . . . only through a personal appropriation of one's own rational self-consciousness . . . one can hope to reach the mind of Aquinas (italics mine), and . . . then it is difficult to impart his compelling genius to the problems of this later day."

Dewert's approach to a radically new philosophy of language is based on symbol rather than on sign. In answer to Lonergan's Aristotelian-Aquinian semantic theory, Dewert says the philosophy behind that theory could only lead to "religious 'renewal' during an age when rapid, self-initiated evolution is actually called for." That phrase follows a beautifully-executed left-handed compliment to Lonergan: "Lonergan is indeed a rarity: he is an original thinker" and has a multitude of disciples and scholarly admirers without parallel "in North American Catholic circles today." Dewert assumes that Lonergan has "the same difficulty as, say, linguistic analysts do" and posits rather that knowledge "is not the reduplication of another, but the creation of oneself." (italics mine) This might be called the nub of Dewert's argument with Lonergan, especially as it relates to the "imitation of renewal" in the Catholic Church (see Dewert's Appendix passim).

What of the origins and main thesis of Dewert's book? It is an expansion of a series of lectures delivered last year in the First United Methodist Church of Portland, Oregon (a fact significant and hopeful enough in our ecumenical age), under the title "Human Reason, Christian Faith and Catholic Crisis". The Appendix is a revision of a paper contributed to the First International Lonergan Congress in Florida (Both Dewert and Lonergan teach at the University of Toronto.) Dewert is right when he says the Appendix helps clarify some of the views expressed earlier in the book, and he considers them basic to the needs of contemporary Christianity.

Dewert's thought seems a sort of parallel in the field of semantics and epistemology to Marshall McLuhan's theories about communications media. For example, "the message is the mind", writes Dewert; again, "linguistic form is the condition of the possibility of thought." Further, relating the philosophic argument regarding truth and reality more specifically to religion, he says: "Consciousness is linguistic self-relation to reality. Truth is the transcendence that is typical of man." Whitehead is criticized for thinking that "reality as such is process", where Dewert prefers to say that "reality as such is relativity — from which it follows, to be sure, that it is in process".

Faith thus becomes for Dewert man's self-understanding.

Chapter 6 is so similar to much of Teilhard de Chardin's thought that one is amazed at there being no reference to that genius. "If God is not the Supreme Being of Greek philosophy, but the gratuitous, self-giving reality of the Gospel, then the ground on which God can claim worship from man is not his absolute power over creation, but the absolute openness of creation to receive within itself the gift of the presence of God"; and "the kingdom of God, or heaven, is the outcome of history when history is created by man in the presence of God." The latter citation at least could surely have been written by Teilhard. Finally and particularly "God's role in creation is . . . being present to it as man creatively invents it, and thus invents himself". This refers to "a free and imaginative creation which obeys no pre-established plan".

Miss Julie enthralling

Miss Julie, a Strindberg version of the eternal triangle, but weighed down by all the problems of class and history, is being presented this week at the Studio Theatre on Glen Morris.

The one act play has only three characters: Miss Julie of course, a count's daughter; Kristin, the cook; and Jean, the footman. Miss Julie Seduces Jean, partly to dominate him, and partly to defy order and social norms. The next morning, Jean confronts her with reality. If she wants him, he will get what he can out of her. She is shocked, and tries to return to her role of mistress; but she has lost her servants' respect. She wants to leave, but not alone, and the conditions under which Jean would leave with her are impossible, yet how can she stay and lose face?

Eleanor Lindo gives an uneven performance as Julie. In the seduction scenes she is not sufficiently provoking, which makes Jean's accusations the next morning more difficult to accept. She is much better in scenes of anger, and in the scene with Kristin at the end, where she describes the life they might have in Switzerland, using all the words Jean had used before her. Graham Whitehead is very convincing in his roles as Jean the servant and Jean the master, but he does not prepare us for the switch. There is no suggestion of deceit in the opening scenes, and we are not prepared for the radical change the next morning. Both aspects of the man are convincing, but they do not seem to be related. Louise Nolan succeeds well in conveying the down to earth reality of Kristin's less prominent role.

The scene of the bird killing is not handled very well. Whereas it ought to be shocking, it only provokes laughter. The dramatic pounding of the hatchet is too much: it would have been better to be more discreet, to underplay it. The set, a Scandinavian kitchen, by Thomas Doherty, is very impressive. He has done marvels with the church facilities and the actors move easily within it.

In spite of its flaws, the Studio Theatre's production of Miss Julie is captivating, the characters' problems are compelling and the play is well worth seeing.

Pink Floyd, other groups summed up

PINK FLOYD: Atom Heart Mother (Harvest SKAO-382)

This 1 p. finds the "interstellar band" pretty much back on Earth, with dull pseudo-folk and a grandiose suite that combines electronic, choral and orchestral music. In this epic, demented horns and wordless wailing voices wind among the floating guitars and organ. Live, it's exciting and original, but on record it gets boring after a few hearings. Ummagumma's power of punctuated understatement and repetition will never lose interest, but once Atom's novelty has worn off it becomes tedious and obvious

—M.L.

TYRANNOSAURUS REX: A Beard of Stars (Blue Thumb BTS 18)

"T. Rex play woodland rock for the children of the universe," say this duo of themselves. By going electric on their fourth British album, T. Rex have added a new dimension to their elfish rock 'n roll. Bongos thump and the electric guitar's joyous sound of almost childish simplicity plays along Marc Bolan's strange high wavering voice. Lyrics about dragon's ears, magical moons, and other fairytales visions may not appeal to some, but the bobbing beat and disarming joy can't fail to ease your spirits. It's as infectious as early Beatles.

—M.L.

IT'S A BEAUTIFUL DAY: It's a Beautiful Day (Columbia CS 9768) and Merrying

Maiden (Columbia CS 1058)

This above average California group has become lost in the multitude of new efforts but deserves attention because of its superb use of electric violin to individualize its soft rock-folk sound. WHITE BIRD, on the first album, has had some airplay, as has the instrumental DON AND DEWEY. Personnel problems of replacing two of the six do not alter the sound significantly; David Laflamme's violin soars and sings your brain on both albums. The first is the better of the two, but both are more than pleasing.

—S.C.

ARETHA FRANKLIN: Spirit in the Dark (Atlantic SD 8265)

Queens are not immune from bitter attacks, and Aretha is no exception. Cries of selling out went up when she began doing cover versions of songs of white groups, even though she treated them with remarkable insight and honesty. However rock is as great a part of her music as soul, blues, and showbusiness, which has allowed her to adopt elements of each. The backgrounds are more basic and less flashy: little use of horns, restrained rather than overbearing instrumentation highlighted by her own gospel piano, and a chorus that really interacts with her. And although half of these songs aren't particularly memorable, her voice flows effortlessly with its incomparable depth of tone and feeling. The understated but tormented vocals on "The Thrill is Gone" alone make the record worth getting.

—M.L.

REDBONE: Potlatch (Epic E 30109)

Throaty and soulful vocals, chanting or lyrical, mesh with the compelling "pre-historic rhythms" and instrumentation on the second album of this group of American Indians. They have radically transformed the conventional guitar/bass/drums format, largely by treating the guitar with a startlingly new approach which probably owes more to Indian music than to rock. The inventiveness, beauty and feeling of the new sound they are forging, together with the variety of songs they have written on both their albums, places Redbone as one of the few truly original groups with enough variety and excitement to gain much more than an underground following.

—M.L.

GEORGE HARRISON: All Things Must Pass (Capitol STCH 639)

This album has been much heralded, and my impression is that it deserves every bit of praise possible. It is a simply brilliant musical collection, brilliantly conceived and packaged. The writing, playing and production are generally of the highest quality. There can be no doubt that this is the best album put on the market in years, and it replaces Sgt. Pepper as my favorite album.

MIGUEL RIOS: Song of Joy (A&M SPX 4267)

The title song of this album is its strong selling point. Beyond that there is nothing exceptional about it. The production values are good but the music itself is unspectacular, and terribly same sounding.

MELANIE: Candles in the Rain (Buddah BDS 5060)

Once one has cut through her rather peculiar voice pattern, the music on this album is definitely first rate, and deserves to be listened to frequently. The plaintive voice and soulful lyrics make the album a religious experience. All the original material is well written, and the borrowed material well arranged.

—I.D.

EKSEPTION: Beggar Julia's Time Trip (Philips PHS 600-348)

Classical rock has more or less been discarded, but the Dutch Ekseption is still trying to unify music of widely different periods. They do mostly reinterpretations of classical works, but instead of transforming them into bad rock songs by jazzing them up, they recreate the spirit of the originals while giving them a new flavor. Their absorption and understanding of different styles combined with their mastery of a great variety of instruments helps produce a satisfying multi-layered sound. The attraction is in its subtleties and sensuous effect, so don't expect to be knocked out by a brilliant new approach; it will only make the record seem inconsequential.

Olson plots human decline

Maximus Poems IV, V, VI
by Charles Olson
Clarke Irwin
$6.00

These sections of The Maximus Poems are more difficult than the preceding ones. In sections I, II, and III Olson had clear normative statements to make about the way of life appropriate to man and about the deterioration of American life as seen in his Gloucester, Mass. These gave the poems a readily available frame of moral interpretation which could carry a reader thru most of Olson's private and local allusions to Gloucester history. In IV, V, and VI Olson works chiefly at demonstrating Gloucester to be a "park of eternal events" — both a recorder and a forecaster of cosmic history. Whereas before Olson's "Maximus of Tyre" role was used to define the poet's function as a moral critic, here it is used to define Gloucester as a counterpart of Tyre — a Tyre founded by Poseidon's son Agenor and Symbolic city of the Piscean age.

Much of IV, V, VI seems superficially to little purpose — histories of Gloucester families, Greek mythology, Gloucester legend, translated passages from Hesoid's Theogony, maritime incidents befalling Gloucester's sailors, to none of which Olson appends interpretive commentary. The structure depends on riming/recurring events, designed "to make evident the world / is an eternal event and this epoch / solely the decline of fishes . . ." To work out the full extent of the interwoven allusions will be a work of scholarship too lengthy for any book review. Some facts, however, can make the poems readable if not fully clear.

Most important, as in the first Maximus Poems, there is no overstructure to Olson's attempt at history. As Maximus, Olson makes no effort at order or objectivity; he allows fact and story to enter the poems in the sequence and strength to which they come to his attention. His view of history is Whitehead's: "Whitehead, who cleared out the gunk / by getting the universe in (as against man alone / & that concept of history (not Herodotus's / which was a verb, to find out for yourself: / 'istorion, which makes any one's acts a finding out for his or her / self, in other words restores the trauma: . . ." The universe defines itself thru the beholder. "I am making a mappemunde. It is to include my being."

Next in importance are the correspondences. In Gloucester legend there is a venomous serpent which seduces a mortal woman; in Greek legend there is Typhon. Tyre begins as an island but is joined to the mainland by Alexander the Great's mole; Gloucester (Cape Ann) begins as a peninsula but in 1641 is transformed into an island by the man-made "Cut." Tyre is where "Ousooos the / hunter / was the first man / to carve out / the trunk / of a tree / and go out / on the water / from the shore / . . . Gloucester is where the schooner, "the type of vessel / which changed fishing from that point on / was built or invented . . ." Tyre stands at the beginning of the Piscean age, an age of sailors, ships, and fish; Gloucester at the end: "this epoch solely / the decline of fishes, such a decline Bayliss, / my son calls her his first teacher, suggested / to her husband Gorton's have an aquarium / to show what fish look like — or it was already said / it won't be long, with fish sticks, pictures / will be necessary on the covers of the TV dinners / to let children know that mackerel is a different / looking thing than herrings."

On its way, of course, is Aquarius, to Olson apparently an age of human decline, an age of coal: "the greater the water you add / the greater the decomposition / so long as the agent is protein / the carbon of four is the corners." It is to be the "love" age, when avaricious man has vanished and a burning earth has returned to nature's building block, carbon. "Age the soft (Coal love / hung-up burning / under the City, bituminous / Heart to be turned to Black / Stone / the Black Chrysanthemum / is the Throne of Creation / Ocean / is the Black Gold Flower."

John Cage (front seat) with compo

Mystic-musician Cage listens to sounds of nature makes us hear the

JOHN CAGE
Richard Kostelanetz (ed.)
Burns & MacEachern
$5.95

John Cage is a philosopher. The philosophy he lives also happens to be shared by Warhol in films and Rauschenberg in painting. Cage is obsessed with time, with sounds in time, their spontaneity, simultaneity or nonentity. His medium is sound (certainly not music in any conventional sense) and his compositions serve a useful illustrative function. Taken out of context they seem absurd.

From this collection of essays by and about Cage, the reader will find three main tenets in his philosophy. Cage wants to show that music is in the ear of the beholder, that is, music is not something absolute and predetermined but defined in the mind of the listener. For most of western musical history this "definition" was outlined by the composer and accepted by the listener as convention. Cage unshackles us from rigid convention. The listener becomes the composer. Presented with a set of aural data, the listener assembles and distills a "musical" experience.

Thus, Cage shifts the act of creation from composer to listener. He facilitates this by randomizing the sounds, presenting non-intentional music, composed in a non-determined way. Cage thus reaffirms individuality at the perceptive level.

A story I tell sometimes in relation to this is about visiting Hamada the potter in Japan. I arrived while he was still making the pot, sitting at the wheel, and he said, "I'm not interested in results. I'm just interested in going on". Now what this nonintentional music wants to do, by that means and other means, which can be theatrical or architectural or whatnot, to make it clear to the listener that the hearing of a piece is his own action — that the music, so to speak, is his, rather than the composer's. . . . (It) signifies a change from conception, which the totally determined people can get, to perception, which is what the listener can have. . . . You can have art without even doing it. All you have to do is change your mind.

By becoming the act of perceiving, the listener/creator assimilates the aural environment at a level where questions of purpose or value judgments become meaningless. Conventionally notated music then is unacceptable, since it denies the absolute freedom and individuality of perception, tries to regulate the mind with rigidly defined instructions of notes, expressions, etc. The trick, says Cage is to listen to a Beethoven

Composer Karlheinz Stockhausen — 1958

Cage of silence, them also symphony and hear something the composer didn't put into it.

Cage's second main purpose is to explore the nature of silence. In his study of Zen he realized that if opposites define each other, then silence defines sound. Silence and non-silence (for sound and non-sound) form the fundamentals of the aural experience. This ultimate on/off (which is a matter of convention) is the basis of the most modern binary codes; it is also a cornerstone of Zen and other ancient philosophies. For Cage, a haiku says this: (describing the situation of a farmer taking nap): "By going to sleep, I found the rice". The attribute common to both sound and silence is duration in time, and true music must treat sound/silence through this means. By ignoring the basic idea of time interval in favour of more sophisticated and narrow ideas (such as harmony), Beethoven has crippled musical development for almost a hundred years. It remained for Satie and Webern to reaffirm the eternal principle.

Conventional Western music exposes us to hours of uninterrupted sound. John Cage's notorious 4'33" presents 4½ minutes of silence. The piece is performed as follows. The pianist enters, seats himself at the piano. He gestures with his hands, as if playing. For the next 4½ minutes he performs three sets of gestures, to suggest three movements. No sound. Through this work (ridiculed, then acclaimed), Cage presents his most important ideas. He emphasizes the importance of non-sound. He demands individual perception. He thirdly shows us that there is no such thing as absolute silence. The air-conditioning, the rustling of the programme, the ticking of a wristwatch, the beating of the heart — these become the piece.

At first non-hearing, 4'33" seems to be presumptuous. Actually it presents Cage's oriental humility most poignantly. His piece says "Life goes on very well without me."

This collection of articles and interviews at first appears to be an "apologia pro arte sua". Then one realizes that his music, his essays, all his output in every field is but a reflection of the man's mind. An exhibition of some pages of a Cage manuscript earned rave reviews from New York art critics as interesting calligraphy. On another occasion Cage won $6000 on an Italian quiz show, posing as a mushroom expert. The phenomenon is the man himself, in all his manifestations.

One can only wonder whether some contributions by Cage's family and personal associates (such as Xenia Cage and the dancer Merce Cunningham) might not have brought us into closer proximity of his genius

Justice done Group of 7

The Group of Seven by Peter Mellen McClelland and Stewart

$25.00

However honourable the owner's intentions, art books rarely merit more than a cursory flipping of pages. They are soon relegated to a permanent and prominent station on a book shelf or coffee table, where they subtly attest to their owner's existent or non-existent culture and breeding. If such is their intention, buyers of Peter Mellen's book, The Group of Seven, will be well satisfied. This book is a visual masterpiece. The lay-out is at all times extremely vital. The changing type-set and the exchanging of newspaper-like columns for long paragraphs at intervals, creates a kind of rhythm throughout the book, a sense of acceleration and deceleration which wards off boredom.

The photographs, mostly in colour, are far superior to the usual art book reproductions, which tend to flatten works and rob them of any sense of paint or texture. Many of the works in Mellen's book are reproduced close to their actual size, and the brush strokes are as immediately perceptible as the vibrancy of colour.

Although such qualities are commendable, Mellen's book has much more to offer than beauty. It is a highly readable work. Mellen has a knack with words; his analyses are as flowing as his descriptive passages. His own writings are interspersed with often amusing and always intelligible quotations from critics and members of the group themselves. Such fragmenting of the work is effective, increasing the tempo, preventing the laboured feeling of many critical books.

If Mellen's goal was to rid Canadians of their delusions about the Group of Seven, he has succeeded. No longer do the painters seem greater than their paintings. Although each artist emerges strongly as an individual, they are entirely too human, too self-indulgent to maintain positions as Canadian heroes. Instead, their work gains in importance. In his closing paragraph Mellen states, and with good reason: "At present the Group of Seven is passing into history. The era in which their story was told by the artists and their contemporaries is over. It is now time to dispel the myths that have grown up around the artists during this period, distorting their true accomplishment. The Group's importance for future generations lies in the works they produced and in the expression of their unique vision."

Fraser views tragicomedy, is not amused

On Tuesday night I went to see the DR of the New Vic College production of The Imposture, by James Shirley. A hodge-podge cast from PLS, the Drama Centre and St. Mike's was directed by Bruce Salvatore. The level of organization was much higher than with other DR's I have known and loved, a generous allotment of delightful pre-show music and I was even given a cast list — an unusual bonus on such occasions. I must start off by confessing two strong prejudices, for the type of music and, if not completely for the style of play, most certainly for the surrounding period.

Mantua is being besieged, and despairing of relief from Ferrara's son, he sends his daughter, Fioretta, away. Unfortunately, Leonato does arrive expecting to see his betrothed, Fioretta Flaviano, the badly persuaded old flame, Juliana to take Fioretta's place. Mantua is suspicious and persuades Juliana not to comply completely with the plot — but Leonato steals the im-poster from the nunnery and Mantua, his son, Honorio and Flaviano are annoyed.

The real Fioretta discovers the fake and is confused. Honorio meets with Leonato, they have a tiff ending with the eternal parry. Juliana arrives on the scene but Honorio doesn't blow the gaff. Meanwhile, in the comic sub-plot, the coward Bertoldi contracts his mother to two colonels (Volterrio & Hortensio) simultaneously. In the words of a Victorian monarch, she is not amused. And so on.

As you may imagine, it's not the simplest of plots nor is it of language. Uncommon language has to be uncommonly well spoken. Too often, in this production, garbled noise replaced precise speech. Besides that fault, too many of the cast had dull repetitive vocal inflexions — Mantua and Juliana erred most in this. Another failing was the almost complete lack of awareness of costume, in C16 garb you do not slouch nor amble around. It's a proud mode of dress, and you must wear it proudly. The whole carriage of the body must be altered. With greater attention to these two aspects, it would have been a far more enjoyable evening.

Michael Erdman's Leonato looked fine if a bit chalky. Tony Stephenson's Flaviano was assured but received little help from the author. Pier Giorgio di Cicco's Honorio was wispy but Gielgud-like, I never had any trouble hearing him. Randolph del Lago thought himself hilarious as a jellyfish Bertoldi but he's in a solitary minority. The two colonels, like two sides of a cheese slice, weren't too embarrassing, but someone should teach Nigel Spencer about make-up; it may come as a surprise to him that he's not playing Dracula. Richard Green had a nice bit as the Taverner and Peter Noy wasn't noisome (apologies). Gillian Gilliland should perhaps toy with the idea of another career. Judy Robinson was adequate and both Diane McConnell and Elizabeth Whitcombe were witty.

Mr. Salvatore's plotting was competent but didn't fully utilize the set — what he was allowed to have to stand in for one anyway. My sympathies. Full marks to Jon Moynes for his lighting. Finally, the blurb I received called The Imposture "a Jacobean 'kill yourself laughing' tragicomedy", but I didn't die.

Charlebois sings down boundaries

Robert Charlebois is a strong ambassador for the cause of internationalism. His sound, his ambitions and all that he does are inspired by this underlying philosophy.

His music was born of a broad and varied background. He has a versatile sound, beyond any previous style, and intensely personal. This versatility is exemplified by the fact that at Massey Hall on Feb. 13, Charlebois gave a concert backed by five heavy Montreal musicians, but has also given a series of highly successful concerts accompanied by the Montreal Symphony.

Charlebois' lyrics are in a mixture of French, French-Canadian jargon, and slang English, with occasional use of Italian or Spanish for special effects. The result is an international sound which has something for everyone, but cannot really be entirely appreciated by anyone. Perhaps the total effect is meant to be more important than the words in some instances. All of his tunes, though, are very much of today. The songs sung in English were only more or less comprehensible, varying with the style of the accompaniment and the complexity of the lyrics. The Greatest Idea, because it was slower and softer paced, enabled one to appreciate all of the man's poetry and imagination.

Charlebois wins primarily through the dynamism of his personality. It is rich with the fruit of his years at the National Theatre School, very dramatic and yet undeniably personal. Not only does he act out his songs on stage, but he actually lives them. The concert at Massey Hall was fantastic. It is a pity more people did not see it.

Early play by Lawrence well presented

In D. H. Lawrence's early play, The Widowing of Mrs. Holroyd, now playing in a fairly successful production at the Central Library theatre, we see more beginnings than final philosophy; nevertheless much of his emotional power and compassion is already evident.

Written in 1913, only three years after Lawrence had left his home mining town, the play owes its form to straight naturalism, and its content to the rigid lives of the town's inhabitants, gritty, desperate and isolated. Lawrence had not yet evolved his complex theories of the male-female relationship that are so marvellously proclaimed in his novels (perhaps he needed the novel form to do so completely), but the roots are here as his sharp eye delineates the various psychological situations of the characters.

Caught in the sea of primitiveness, physical strength, and class conflict is Mrs. Holroyd, and she is drowning. Educated and feeling superior to her miner husband, she desires escape but sees none. Mr. Holroyd, the brutish, loud miner, to get revenge from his wife, becomes a drunk, and finally brings home two tavern women. His wife finally admits defeat in this arena, and accepts the invitation of an electrician to run away with him.

But Holroyd is killed in a mining accident, and in a powerful final scene, as his body is centrally spread on their home rug under a single light, Mrs. Holroyd and her mother-in-law wash the body as in a primitive religious ritual. Over his black hulk, Mrs. Holroyd strives for forgiveness for her sins, and begins her penance.

Director Brian Meeson aims for the author's voice and mind, and tries to achieve absolute fidelity to his vision. To the greatest extent possible Meeson succeeds, as his direction is functional, efficient, and adheres strictly to the naturalistic form. He instils as much life as possible into his actors, but his task is impossible.

The first problem is Lawrence as playwright. Only Mrs. Holroyd seems fully developed, while all the rest are two-dimensional. For characters who enter and leave quickly, this defect is acceptable, but in order to make Mrs. Holroyd and her predicament credible, we need more than a cardboard husband and lover on stage. Why was she attracted to this loud brute? Why is she attracted to this sympathetic, simpering lover? They must be more than simply two sides of a coin, or her final decision to remain is unbelievable.

The minor characters are acted functionally, with Elizabeth Adams standing out as the tavern wench Clara, moving from a suitable giggle to seriousness very well.

Nicolas Bacon as Mr. Holroyd is uniformly loud and abrupt; Dennis Mills as Blackmore conveys intensity by staring and speaking haltingly. The second problem lies here, for given little to work with, the actors are unable to surmount the deficiencies of the written play.

Maureen Fox succeeds to a great extent in conveying Mrs. Holroyd's desperation and dilemma; she is physically suited to the part, and carries herself well, hunched over by the years, and her voice quivering as she approaches the breaking point. The parting of her and her lover is not sad, and she digs insufficiently into her character, but the emotion is there and is conveyed.

In front of a set that is not grimy enough, and in (thankfully) only an indication of vocal accent to convey the dialect, a good evening of theatre is achieved, despite the defects, for D. H. Lawrence deals with basic human needs and daily existence in a powerful way and this much does reach and involve the audience.

Frisco poet writes to end time

Love and the Turning Year: 100 More Poems from the Chinese

by Kenneth Rexroth $2.35

McClelland and Stewart (New Directions)

The Collected Longer Poems of Kenneth Rexroth
McClelland and Stewart (for New Directions)
$2.95

Kenneth Rexroth is a poet supremely ready to die; he long has been, according to his work, and that preparedness gives his poetry its aching sense of the sweetness of gypsy time and the world that will not be grasped.

Here we have two facets of his work — new translations of old poems, and a large book of his five discursive poems. One style pervades most of the poems in the two books; the one diversion (and not a curious one, when one thinks of a few of Rexroth's contemporary intellectual sympathies — French poetry, anarchism, surrealist painting, the absolute cutting edge of the best avant-garde art, music, poetry and thought all Europe has had to offer in this century) into what the dustjacket of the Collected Longer Poems coyly calls "Literary Cubism", doesn't call for comment beside the other work, which has no neon lights at all, is quiet and insistent, like a river at night, marshalled into sentences and lines flushed left, but yet which bears an open rhythm so intense it does not bear escaping.

The translations are all short, and exquisitely crafted, of works by poets known and unknown in the West. They call mortality to mind, and are never abstract; images of things continually resonant and appear as if looked at for the first time. Criticism falls on its face before the competent lyric, so here are a few lines about a spring breeze, for flavour: "You can't see it or hear it, it is so soft. But it is strong enough/ To dust the mirror with pollen./ And thrum the strings of the lute."

The Collected Longer Poems of course are companions to Rexroth's Collected Shorter Poems, out in paperback for five years. The longer poems compass his precocious "The Homestead Called Damascus" written, as he says, "before I was twenty" — and he had his mature style then! — to a small gathering of meditations that can be seen as one.

That peace Rexroth can always draw upon, it seems. The longest poems here, "The Phoenix and the Tortoise" and "The Dragon and the Unicorn", are records of journeys, the first inward (no action there is beyond a stroll on a California beach), the second inward and outward (descriptions of a trip through Europe and America, just post-World War Two, are counterpointed with sometimes identifiable quotations from great books, all bearing from different vantages, on his great concern — "the only Absolute is the Community of Love with which Time Ends.")

Rexroth is (in no specific order) a visionary, an Anglo-Catholic, a sexually free man, an anarchist, a Buddhist, a mountaineer, a bitter and hilarious moralist, a catalyst of the San Francisco Renaissance of the 40s and 50s, a deeply learned and sensitive poet who is not afraid to heap praise and blame where he thinks they are needed.

He has had no criticism worth recalling, and this is perhaps why he has provided us with as good an introduction to his longer poems as they are likely to get. Unfortunately, Rexroth usually writes chatty prose — though not here — he dictated his autobiography into a tape-recorder, and says of his essays — four books of them, so far — that he did them solely for money; they are fascinating, but bear only a ideological resemblance to his poetry.

In the longer poems, there are flat passages of description and narration; they are to be expected. There are also a few passages of rampant and silly prejudice — Rexroth is the archetypal drop-out, and has nothing but contempt for academies and for much intellectual fashion, although he likes jazz and the best rock music, and has written penetrating essays about them. To return, no ideas but in things, and Rexroth's eye for objects is never dim. Whenever he's rapt away, he's always spurred from and by love of and for the things of this world, and to it and them he continually returns.

As he says in his introduction, "The holy is in the heap of dust — it is the heap of dust." Or, finally, to get it from "The Dragon and the Unicorn": "Coming up the road/ Through the black oak shadows, / See ahead of me, glinting/ Everywhere from the dusty/ Gravel, tiny points of cold/ Blue light, like the sparkle of/ Iron snow. I suspect what it is, / And kneel to see. Under each/ Pebble and oak leaf is a/ Spider, her eyes shining at/ Me with my reflected light/ Across immeasurable distance."

Henry likes Husbands' improvising

In 1969 John Cassavetes created Faces, a portrait of a crumbling marriage, and proved that insight into true human nature can be best examined on a level no higher than everyday actions and dialogue. The actor-writer-director has used this method again in Husbands, which emerges as a searing probe into the psychological make-up of the aging, discontented married man.

Gus (Cassavetes), Archie (Peter Falk) and Harry (Ben Gazzara), while attending the funeral of a very close friend, suddenly realize that the best years of their lives have nearly passed and that death can come swiftly and without warning. Overcome by fear, they go on a mad two-day drinking spree in New York City and then, on an impulse, hop a plane for London. There they buy expensive clothes, gamble and invite some girls up to their hotel rooms. That's all there is to the plot of Husbands; the story is in itself basically unimpressive. Cassavetes' mastery lies in the true-to-life dialogue of argument and camaraderie he uses for the slow character revelation of the husbands.

The close friendship of Harry, Archie and Gus stems from the fact that each one sees in the other two a vital characteristic which he himself lacks. Harry makes up for his mental immaturity by depending upon Archie and Gus.

Archie admits that he is a very poor lover and hides behind the sexuality of Gus and especially of Harry. Gus finds it difficult to relate his physical and emotional desires to others and has in Harry and Archie a couple of buddies who do not mind his silly laughter, his wise-cracks or his tired jokes.

These are the personalities Cassavetes cultivates in New York. But in London he pulls the props out from under his characters by separating one from the other. Now in an undefended position, the three heroes are made to disclose through their relationships with the girls they pick up, just how each man's shortcoming has rendered him a failure in marriage.

Cassavetes has had some pretty sharp criticism levelled against him because of the very loose, freewheeling, improvisational techniques he used in Husbands. Except for transitional sequences between bars or between New York and London, editing is not used to contract time. One minute of Husbands almost always equals one minute of physical reality. Many people feel especially bored during the restaurant beer-and-song fest or when the friends chat in a washroom and throw up together. However it is this very actuality of time that makes Husbands seem so very much more real than the fictionalization of montage. Here again is the age-old problem of conveying boredom without boring the audience in the process. But although Cassavetes does cause a certain amount of fidgeting during the screening of his film, the long stretches, when examined in retrospect in relation to the whole work, become a vital element of the movie. It seems hard to imagine what the impact of Husbands would have been, had each important scene not completely surrounded and immersed the audience.

The result is a finely polished gem that succeeds in every respect to convey the attempts of three guys to keep the boy in the man alive.

Three by Peake make Clif peaked

The Gormenghast Trilogy: Titus Groan
Gormenghast, Titus Alone.
Methuen Publications
$9.95 a volume.

Mervyn Peake died before final editing of the third volume of his major work, thus removing from the world one of the few originals who could refer to romantic love in terms of an affair between a currant-cake and a steel dinner-knife. "That's the way the cookie crumbles" might have been the unwritten motto of that tradition-swathed mummy of mouldering stone which was Gormenghast. In the brooding ovens of author Peake, however, the rambling castle universe with its curiary caricatures becomes a most unique cookie, each of its crumbs carefully, lovingly, obsessively identified. Peake requires two hundred pages of the more than one thousand in the trilogy to introduce his key characters — gargoyles all.

As gargoyles, they are rooted in the masonry containing them, whose varied corners, angles, corridors and towers are specified in the dusty pages of custom as locale for the unending ritual of their roles into this static round of formalized meeting and parting comes the shrewdest, most power-starved manipulator since Uriah Heep. A kitchen scullion named Steerpike, the clever lad inches and insinuates his way upward in the hierarchy, until by the end of the first volume he is understudy to the keeper of the rule-books. Another few hundred pages remain for him to get his, and in a concoction where a would-be assassin is temporarily blinded when half a pair of courting spiders accidentally set down on each eyeball, it's grue galore and every man for himself.

The resident Poet announces his romantic loneliness to the early morning air from the privacy of his high window, but discovering a lost servant on the acres of stone roofing below, who begs him for food, frenziedly crams every available object into his window until the barrier is complete. The act is symbolic of Castle relationships, possibly describable as organized anomie. Each character is obsessed in a complex pirouette within his own fragment of heavily brooding architecture, the fragments touching only within the articulation of the precedents of the House of Groan.

Yet the joints of this society of stone resist dislocation. When old Sourdust, somewhat over ninety musty years, perishes in the arson of the library, retainers unearth his son Barquentine, just a shade over seventy, to carry on as ritual adviser to the seventy-sixth Earl, Lord Sepulchra.

The whole ponderous artifice creaks like the kneecaps of Flay, manservant to his Lordship, as it revolves around its dead centre of custom. It denies linear motion, development, progress, change. The denial roots even in conversation:

"It is the ninth day of the month", said Sourdust.

"Ah", said his lordship. There was a period of silence, Sourdust making use of the interim by re-knotting several tassels of his beard.

"The ninth", repeated his lordship.

"The ninth", muttered Sourdust.

"A heavy day", mused his lordship, "very heavy."

Sourdust, bending his deep-set eyes upon his master, echoed him: "A heavy day, the ninth . . . always a heavy day."

Consequently, if you're looking for quick triggers in the old corral, try something by Millen Brand. But if you delight in things not quite of this world, such as the organically creeping evocation of atmosphere in H. P. Lovecraft, this may be just your jumble of granite and ivy. Up to the end of the second volume, that is. The author's fatal illness invades both his prose and the illustrations: with all available assistance from editors, friends and family, the concluding book is a failure of atmosphere, characterization, plot.

This re-reading, after more than twenty years, confirms the original response of delight in a unique talent at odds with his time. Again, the two initial volumes construct, block on block, an alternate world of impressive solidity. And again, the final volume is an outsider, something unnecessary, an alien load to be dragged along by the balance of the work.

Formally, the floor plan is held together by the birth and growth of Titus, seventy-seventh earl of Gormenghast who, with the sociopathic Steerpike, appears as an unwitting change agent. By the close of the second volume, Titus has turned his back on Gormenghast and abdicated. His return to its borders at the close of the last volume results only in his fleeing once again — presumably with a maturing motivation. Nothing tangible is added.

Of the first two-thirds, I wish you enduring memories from that world of the macabre impinging on the human. May the old earl salute you, having climbed down from the mantel where he has been hooting and demanding fresh fieldmice. Now, he turns at the base of the Tower of Flints, tugging at the rope fastened to the bulk of his chief chef, Swelter, whose inelegantly skewered corpse he has decided to offer to his brother owls. Happy dreams . . .

UC players lose keys to No Exit

"Well, let's get on with it!" he says. But they never do, for that is the end of the play.

Undoubtedly, it would have been a much more enjoyable evening if the cast had taken its own advice, for their performance never got off the ground. The play? Jean Paul Sartre's No Exit, presented in the U.C. Playhouse each evening this week by the U. C. Players Guild. It is of dramatic interest, but, unfortunately, it is not good theatre.

It is a measure of the effect of Jean Paul Sartre (and others of his convictions) on modern philosophy that the Hell he sketches is quite what one might expect (though in his own day it was a shocking and unforeseen horror). Ironically, this was the very source of my disappointment with the script: I was attracted to the play by the name of the playwright, but my familiarity with his philosophy took from the play what life it might have had: its surprise, and its sting.

No Exit (in translation of course), is the story of three souls, newly dead, and damned in Hell. Each arrives expecting racks, bamboo-under-the-fingernails, beds of hot spikes and other such minor amusements. Instead, they find themselves doomed to live together for the rest of eternity, each tormenting the other two; a job they are demonically well suited for. They are inseparable in their hatred.

The production itself was wooden and uninteresting. The actors did not "get into" their lines; they moved, empty of passion. This play, which must be desperately real, came out like a story which affected no one . . . how nice.

Paul Jones was notably miscast as Garcin. His acting was rough and awkward; his miming (required by the lamentable lack of props) was unconvincing. The rest of the cast were rather better, though none gave a complete performance. Inez (Rona Maynard) especially, would have benefited from proper makeup — she looked much too young and pretty for the part. But the most outstanding flaw was the lighting; when the script clearly calls for broad daylight, why use uneven red floods?

Historically and philosophically, No Exit has had a wide influence. But it's not worth your time to go see it performed; not this show, anyway.

BOOKS

In his gigantic Foodbook (Fitzhenry and Whiteside, $18.75, 577 pages) James Trager does for what we put in our mouths about what Burton did for Melancholy 350 years ago, though Trager's style shows to best advantage in his chapter and section headings, which read like cute newspaper headlines or titles of bad funny novels about racoons or stewardesses.

Unlike Burton, Trager is essentially a journalistic stylist — easy to read, casual, and he sometimes endeavours to keep his opinions out of this fat omnium gatherum of facts, figures, and fantasies about foods. He's full of digressions, and has obviously done his research — his repetitive chapter bibliographies cover 13 pages of works by authors ancient and modern. He's a bit too self-consciously hip, a reason why this book may soon go out of date. Trager is given to jumbling of citations and sources — Levi-Strauss, Barry Commoner, David Reuben, Paul Ehrlich, Columella, Euel Gibbons, Brillat-Savarin.

A second look at the dust-jacket could let him off the hook, though "The Foodbook is at once a history book, an anthropology book, an archaeology book, a sociology book, a biology book. It has a dash of geography and more than a soupcon of super-market expertise, all well-spiced, scientifically seasoned and leavened with economics, ecology, etymology, and ecumenical good humour."

Well, yes, Trager writes somewhat better than Richard Needham, but is in the same league. If you live in part to cook and to eat, and are not poverty-stricken, this book will serve you well as desultory bedside reading and as a source of gastronomic arcana that will astound your friends.

A far less dispensable work is The Gentle Art of Flavoring, by Robert Landry, (translated from French by Bruce H. Axler, Abelard-Schuman, $10.75), which stands squarely in the footsteps of Brillat-Savarin and other great French gastronomes who took the trouble to write elegantly about food.

Landry is a snob about French cuisine, and as the information about it in this book shows, he has the right. Still, he's fun to behold, here he is after exhorting chefs to the barricades on behalf of linguistic and culinary accuracy. "At a time when foreigners tend to be conquering — and very rapidly — the gastronomic independence of France, the French must avoid routine and narrowness. This is the price for remaining the first cooks of the world."

Quite simply, this book is the best dictionary of flavorings I have seen. Perhaps only Andre Simon's huge gastronomic dictionary might contain most of the information here. There are no recipes, just papal dicta on what to do, everywhere. Many of the best recipes are like that — if you dare, follow your nose and tongue, and try out what you read, learning proportions and techniques and (re)ally scientifically by intuition, trial and error.

The illustrations are of major herbs and spices, taken from an old herbal.

ROCK

Not having heard Bruce Cockburn live for almost two years, it was a most gratifying evening to hear him perform at the Riverboat on Tuesday evening. As he performed a wide selection of his songs, both old and new, I was content to sit and let myself be entertained by a most personable, shy young man who has risen to become one of the best talents in the folk world.

His infectious, Cheshire smile and bouncy delivery make him one of the most affable on-stage personalities whom I have ever seen. Further, this young man from Ottawa displays a musical poise and savvy beyond his years. He plays a most proficient piano, guitar, dulcimer, and even a mandolin. More importantly, he has learned to use these instruments not as ostentatious outgrowths of his ego, but as musical tools to help him shape his craft. His lyrics combine poetry, wit, and insight; his instrumentalization is first rate; stage presence reserved, and personality engaging. Cockburn closes at the Riverboat on Sunday, and must be heard before then.

Scar dictatorship defeated council elections in March

By DOUG HAMILTON
A motion to replace the Scarborough College Student Society with a non-elected directorate was defeated 11-8 at a Tuesday meeting of the Society.

Democratic elections for next year's council will now be held and are scheduled for mid-March.

The foremost proponent of the directorate, SAC representative Bob Stewart, contested the validity of the vote, and claimed that it was illegal. He suggested that the question of establishing the "junta" should not have been decided at that time because too few students in the College were aware of the proposal.

Although a majority of SCSS executive members voted to dissolve their council, a sufficient number of students were present to vote down the motion. All students at Scarborough College can vote in council on all matters not involving expenditures.

Students opposing the directorate were not impressed with Stewart's argument that the dictatorship of seven people would be more efficient than the present form of student government. They asserted that the directorate could degenerate into a nepotic oligarchy if implemented.

Lunchtime Soprano: Bald at UC

The Bald Soprano, Ionesco's absurd tale about life in suburban London, or non-communication, or something else, is now playing in the U.C. Playhouse lunch-time series.

It is entirely made up of artificiality, boredom, irrelevant dialogue and absurdity in general. Contrary to what one might expect, the result is quite humorous, the very nonsense being the source of most laughs.

The long tirades, repetitious and devoid of logic for the most part, are quite demanding of the actors; and they do occasionally slip, especially David Kendall. Lisa Hicks as Mrs. Smith gives a very good performance; and the directors have done well. This is a much more pleasant way to acquaint oneself with Ionesco than to read his work.

Reaney: play on

Well-known Canadian poet and playwright James Reaney will present his "One-Man Masque" at 1:15 today in the Vic New Academic Building, Room three.

Reaney teaches English at the University of Western Ontario.

The half-hour presentation, sponsored by the Victoria College Dramatic Society, will be followed by a question period. Admission is free.

'Jokes are perceptions', says McLuhan

By ERIC MILLS

"Jokes are perceptions, not conceptions...," says communications expert Marshall McLuhan.

Speaking at a panel in the Faculty of Law's conference, Communications and the Public Interest, McLuhan was the only speaker to really get beyond the mundane and technical at the first panel Thursday.

The conference, the eighth annual conference held by the faculty of law and the student society, took place at the Medical Sciences auditorium from Thursday to Saturday last week.

"Jokes are perceptions" seems to be a key to understanding McLuhanesque style, as demonstrated both by his speaking style and books. His 'arguments' depend on instinctive recognition of truth and may be found in witty perceptions and anecdotal examples, rather than logical analytical development (which may be classified as the basis of "conception").

"There is no past or future at electric speeds (of present informational services), only now," McLuhan said.

"It is not the message but the sender who is sent via electronics"; hence "angelism: everyone is everywhere all the time. We are completely involved in what we're doing."

Perhaps some evidence of the truth of McLuhan's perceptions is that we do understand much of what he says, even if we cannot logically describe it. Information is so pervasive and instantaneous that we all have some common background of similar experience and understanding that McLuhan strikes a chord on, even if we cannot conjure up the complete piece or even a bar.

Everyone is completely involved in what he is doing, says McLuhan, we're all actors playing roles. Thus the subconscious has disappeared; a person shooting off a loaded gun cannot claim he did not know it was loaded.

He also noted that the content of any communications vehicle is the user, for example TV: "You don't have to worry what (content) to give the watcher. He just wants to flip it on."

Because of the nature of modern communications, particularly its electronic implications, "the concept of national identity is a dodo from another planet."

And a few words on advertising, "the twentieth century art form".

Advertising is always 'good' news, according to McLuhan, in the sense that it presents nothing but new products and services that people would like to have, but it threatens you because you haven't got the time for it or the necessary money.

On the other hand supposed 'bad' news, of disasters and tragedy, is subjectively good, simply because you have survived it and therefore feel better, he added.

McLuhan also claimed people enjoy things more if they know others are also enjoying them. They want to be a part of a mass audience; witness the coverage of the first moon mission, Apollo 8.

The panel session, the first of the conference, began with a film presentation of a CTV program, "Here Come the Seventies", depicting many marvelous technical advances in electric communications with grandiose predictions about their applications. (This film revealed its sterility in an unexpected way: three times it used the female body in nothing other than a plastic Playboy objectivity, for no apparent reason other than to create interest).

Gordon Keeble, a cable television company president was the only panelist to attempt to temper the assumed pro-technology-at-any-cost attitude, when he questioned "should something be done simply because it can be done?"

Sruki Switzer, a cable TV engineer, noted that economics will dictate the applications of communications possibilities. "What happens is what will sell", he acknowledged.

'Balls, fuck off': Goodman

A member of the audience at the final forum of the Law Conference last Saturday rejected the panelists' contention that concentrated ownership in the media was beneficial.

He declared that "the same people who own the media own the government of Canada".

Toronto lawyer E. A. Goodman, a panelist, retorted, "Balls!" When his questioner objected, he mouthed the Trudeau phrase "fuck off" at his audience.

The audience member commented that every attempt to discuss the public interest at a conference supposedly on "Communications and the Public Interest" had been ignored with the same type of "cheap humour".

Delegates in an earlier session had accused cable television operators and a Bell Telephone representative of having neglected any concern for the public interest in favour of fighting their own private battles over control of coaxial cables.

Goodman's adversary said the panelists and many of those attending, primarily people with a vested interest in the media, had constantly equated the corporate interest with the public interest.

'That was a political speech' says Acorn

By PAUL CARSON AND
BILL MACVICAR

"Poets, being sensitive souls, are supposed to commit suicide, so at 48 I often wonder why I'm still alive . . . actually I'm hoping that the capitalists will all commit suicide."

Canadian poet Milton Acorn is very much alive, a fact he amply demonstrated Wednesday in a rambling discourse sponsored by the Canadian Liberation Movement that touched on Indians, Black Panthers, nationalism, revolution, poetry and publishers, Quebec, and politics.

Last year, a group of Canadian poets at Grossman's Tavern named Acorn the "People's Poet" after he was rejected by the Canada Council in its annual poetry awards.

"The Indians in Canada are a nation, and they don't want the alienation caused by the white man's world,"

Acorn said. "We should compensate them for the crimes committed in the past and just leave them alone."

Acorn defended the Black Panthers as "a group who are not racist but believe Blacks should organize Whites and Whites organize Whites."

"Actually, there are no Whites since most of us are really Pink."

"A nation is a particular slant on reality. You must acknowledge your nation; Canada is a country and we're stuck with it."

Acorn described himself as a "working-class poet with something to say to the people of my class."

"All working-class revolutions have been national revolutions, but revolutionaries should be concerned about life, not preoccupied with death."

In this respect Acorn differs with Che Guevara, whom he says he loves and honours. He claims Che's "preoccupation with death was wrong."

"As a nationalist, I support the people of all countries; as a revolutionary I support the liberation struggle in Quebec since those fighting in Quebec stand up for all the Canadian people as well."

Acorn read some selections from his latest collection, I've Tasted My Blood, published by Ryerson Press.

"My publisher has sold out to the Americans so don't buy this book . . . xerox it in the library and by all means steal a copy from the bookstore."

(Acorn resigned from Ryerson's stable of writers and poets last November when it was bought by McGraw-Hill of New York).

"I'm a poet and I'm poor," Acorn concluded, "but if the capitalist system continues we are all going to be poor when we get old and cease to work."

"The bourgeois system can't create jobs since it wants a pool of unemployed to keep wages down and destroys people, jobs, resources and landscape."

" . . . and that was a political speech. I might make a poem of it one of these days."

'Dupre reneges on agreement' PECU

By ALEX PODNICK

P.E.C.U. steering committee chairman Doug Bennett and Political Economy Department chairman J. S. Dupre disagreed Thursday over the status of departmental restructuring report approved by a student-staff committee last October.

The report proposes the establishment of a General Student-Staff Committee requiring a concurrent student-staff majority for approval of matters before it.

Bennett and P.E.C.U. students prematurely started celebrating victory last week when they thought they had obtained Dupre's agreement to implement the report. They immediately began searching for student appointees to an "implementation committee" on the understanding the principles of the report were accepted by both students and faculty.

Contacted by the Varsity Thursday, Dupre disputed the P.E.C.U. report of their agreement. He stressed that the name of the committee had never been discussed in his reading week meeting with Bennett and P.E.C.U. treasurer Lynn Laidlaw.

According to Dupre, he merely agreed to reconfirm the appointment of the six staff members of the negotiating committee which prepared the restructuring report. He said that they and the student appointees would be responsible for developing an actual model of a "general policy committee" for the department on the basis of the negotiating committee proposals.

Political Economy students had rejected an earlier invitation from Dupre to return to the negotiating committee.

The same P.E.C.U. general meeting had instead demanded parity representation on a senior faculty policy planning and co-ordinating committee recently established by Dupre.

When the steering committee learned that the committee had no real power delegated to it, they proposed that the negotiating committee report be endorsed by faculty and implemented. It was at this point that the disputed meeting February 15 occurred.

Bennett claimed Dupre had implied that there would be no trouble in getting a report of the implementation committee adopted, describing the negotiating committee report as a good basis from which to proceed.

Although Laidlaw admits Dupre never used the term "implementation committee" himself, she says he accepted its use by her and Bennett.

She says Dupre described the proposed concurrent majority structure of the general committee as the only one that both students and faculty would accept. The only thing left to do was "just to work out the details", according to her understanding.

However, Dupre told the Varsity that he had no personal opinion on the negotiating committee report and would leave resolution of the matter to faculty and students.

Although the P.E.C.U. representatives said Dupre hinted he would encourage the faculty to accept an implementation report based on the negotiating committee proposal, Dupre said he felt it would be wrong for him to attempt to influence either students or faculty about the report.

The negotiating committee report proposed that the general committee be a parity body, requiring majority approval by both students and faculty. Majority approval of both the student and faculty representatives is required for a decision to be adopted.

There would be both a student and a faculty chairman of the committee.

The only power the general committee will have is to make recommendations to the departmental officers responsible for exercising departmental powers. Where the recommendation is not accepted, the officer will be required to attend the next committee meeting to explain the reasons for his decision.

The report allows the committee to appoint parity sub-committees to which it may delegate any of its powers.

While students endorse this provision of the report, Dupre expresses some reservations about it. He questions whether it might be preferable to have the negotiating committee establish standing sub-committees with specific references since there are certain matters which might only concern specific people, for example staff, and would not justify a parity committee.

The committee failed to agree on how the agenda of the committee will be approved. Three alternative proposals were included in the report.

Half the staff members of the committee favoured allowing any item to be placed on the agenda.

The other half wanted to allow either of the co-chairmen to veto any item proposed for the agenda. The chairman's veto could consequently be over-ruled by a concurrent majority of the committee.

The other alternative is the inclusion in the final report of a list of items which could not be placed on the agenda. This list would probably include personnel matters, individual cases concerning students, certain aspects of the budget, and certain matters concerning academic standards.

All faculty members of the committee opposed this proposal. They described it as being practically inoperative. Either there would be agreement about which matters could not be discussed (in which case there would be no need for the list) or there would be constant debate over the meaning of the excluded topics.

Students demand that they have the right to place any item on the agenda. They point out that the requirement for concurrent majorities sufficiently protects both sides from having a decision they vehemently oppose adopted.

Dupre admitted many faculty members view the concept of concurrent majorities with "some hesitancy and cautious optimism."

He described the idea as having "real possibilities" and very probably being "the key" to the structure of whatever general policy committee will be adopted by the department.

However, Dupre has frequently advised students to stop demanding decision-making power regarding individual cases of faculty appointment, promotion, and tenure. He says a vast majority of the faculty reject student-staff committees having any power in these areas.

Dupre emphasizes that the department is interested in devising structures to make policy recommendations as opposed to discussion of individual cases.

Professor W. E. Grasham, staff co-chairman of the negotiating committee, supports the proposal to allow any item on the agenda. "If the safeguards about the agenda items have to be used, the system will break down," he commented.

Once the committee was functioning, Grasham suggested, "almost anything could be discussed".

The negotiating committee report was to come into force after ratification by the student and staff constituencies.

However, the report has never been officially approved or rejected by the faculty. Its release coincided with a faculty referendum on the degree of student participation in departmental decision-making. The referendum results were unsympathetic to student power demands and it has been suggested that this led to the report's tabling.

The P.E.C.U. steering committee decided to participate in an implementation committee to clarify the few ambiguous areas of the report, before holding a general meeting to endorse its proposals.

Chief among these areas, according to both P.E.C.U. and Dupre, is a decision about the exact student representation on its delegation. Both sides say that graduates, undergrad Political Science, Economics, Commerce and Extension students must be represented. There also must be representation from the Scarborough and Erindale campuses.

Dupre seems rather vague in his position regarding the negotiating committee proposal. While refusing to admit that he wants the implementation committee to rehash all the old arguments about the appropriate structure of the general committee, he constantly refers to the need to "draw up a specific proposal".

Bennett is relatively satisfied with the report.

"While it isn't all that students hoped for, it's nevertheless as much as we can practically expect to achieve at this time."

Nationals begin today

Top effort required to retain CIAU title

By PAUL CARSON

"It's our only real challenge of the season, so we'd better not blow it."

That's how one member of the Varsity swim Blues looks at this weekend's CIAU championships in Waterloo.

Blues have won the five previous unofficial CIAU team titles but the Varsity swimmers have never really peaked to their potential at any time during the current season.

In winning their eleventh straight OQAA title in Kingston last weekend the team swam just well enough to finish first but that calibre of effort won't be adequate this time.

BLUES USUALLY depend on their great depth to overcome foolhardy opponents but at the CIAU meet their strongest rivals, University of Alberta Golden Bears, will enjoy a manpower advantage. The Golden Horde should have at least 13 competitors, perhaps as many as 15 or 16; Blues will have 10. Each swimmer may enter three individual races plus one relay so Alberta has a minimum of 52 chances to pick up points compared to a maximum of 40 for Varsity.

Blues do enjoy an advantage in that eight of their ten man team swam at the CIAU finals last year when Blues overcame Alberta 370-249.

Jim Shaw set two backstroke records in the 1970 meet and Bob Heatley registered a 52.7 mark in winning the 100-yard butterfly.

Jim Adams and Ross Ballantyne each won one main event final while John Twohig and Mike Guinness each contributed a consolation event victory. Both Terry Bryon and Doug MacIntosh produced two second place finishes.

But that was last year. This time 'round, Blues must place at least two swimmers in almost every final since the Alberta depth will produce dozens of points in the consolation events.

BLUES' SECOND advantage is that their two newcomers to CIAU competition should do extremely well. Alex Fedko has laughed his way to victories in all the exhibition dual meets but now with a national title on the line he could win two finals with a 100 percent effort. Nick Rottman will be out to prove that his selection in the Great Breaststroke Debacle was no fluke; the best proof would be a win in the 200.

Blues third advantage is coach Robin Campbell, who has won two national titles already and doesn't like to lose. As an undergrad, Campbell was always at his peak for the CIAU finals, setting a series of national records in the 200-yard freestyle. As a coach, he doesn't intend to mar that perfect record. Officially, there is no team championship since the CIAU potentates don't recognize the existence of individual university teams at national meets.

But no-one is concerned about the official league championship — the OQAA defeated the West last year 812-545 and this year's margin should be even greater. The eyes of Canadian swimming will be focused on that pool in Waterloo to see if ten athletes from Toronto can do a better job than fourteen or fifteen from Alberta.

Gym Blues in finals at Mac

Varsity gymnastics star Al Forest

Toronto gymnasts performed surprisingly well at the OQAA Western preliminaries Feb. 11. Again without Gary Wicks, Blues finished in second spot, good enough to qualify for Saturday's OQAA finals at McMaster.

Hans Frick combined a first on pommel horse with seconds on floor exercise, rings, parallel bars, and high bar, finishing in second place, less than a point behind McMaster's olympic competitor Steve Mitruk.

All-around competitor, Gary Wicks, injured a few weeks ago, hopes to enter a few events this Saturday, thus improving Blues' chances for a first.

Boxers bounce RMC; tie series

Varsity boxers won four bouts on the five-event card against arch-rival RMC Saturday night at Hart House to tie their season series at 7 decisions each.

Coach Tony Canzano obviously had a well-psyched, well-conditioned team as Nels Carl (Forestry), Kevin Cavanagh (St. Mike's), Jim Gorsline (Forestry) and Bob Maton (St. Mike's) won their matches. The only loser in a gallant battle was Pat Glynn, who gave away a weight and conditioning edge to RMC's talented Ralph Tait.

The most spectacular bout of the evening saw Cavanagh take a first-round TKO over RMC's Poirier.

Synchronized swim girls tops

Varsity girls had great success both as individuals and as a team this past weekend in the WITCA synchronized swim championships held at Western U.

Final standings showed Toronto with 39 points, far ahead of York and Queen's who tied for second spot with 21 points each. Host Western followed with 16.

Outstanding ability in the Figures competition was shown by Toronto's Mary Lou Hawkins and Janice Hughes who placed first and second respectively out of 26 competitors. Mary Lou also placed first in the solo competition and paired with Janice to win another first for Varsity in the duets.

In the team competition, Sue Maddock, Heather McIvor, Sylvia McVicar and Debbie Tisdall placed third, narrowly beaten by the Queen's and Windsor groups.

The girls would like to express many thanks to their coach Evelyn Cairns whose expert coaching ability and positive encouragement helped culminate in their outstanding season.

Defence the key as Blues head for Ottawa

Meet Carleton in first round of OQAA playoffs

By LYNDON LITTLE

The Varsity Blues scored a potent total of 35 goals in their final five games of the 1970-71 regular OQAA hockey season.

But a more heartening, and perhaps more significant, statistic was that they allowed only eight enemy replies in return.

There's little question that if Blues harbor any hope of advancing to the national finals (March 11, 12 and 13 in Sudbury) for the sixth consecutive year, the defensive pairings of Bill L'Heureux — Nels Debenedet and Dave McDowall — Brent Swanick plus the goaltending duo of Grant Cole and Tommy Little will have to come up with blue-chip performances.

BLUES MEET THE OFFENSIVE-GEARED Carleton Ravens (eastern division winners) in the first semi-final game Saturday night in the Ottawa Civic Centre at 6:30 p.m. The other semi-final match features Waterloo against eastern runners-up Queen's Gaels.

"They (the Carleton Ravens) have a very fine set of forwards," assesses Blues' boss Tom Watt. "We'll have to play heads-up defensive hockey to beat them. Energetic forechecking to keep the defencemen from feeding the forwards will be a must."

The Carleton attack is paced by high-scoring skaters Derek Holmes, Wayne Small and John Heslop. Centre Holmes, a former member of the National team, finished second in the eastern scoring race and was chosen as the first-team all-star centre. Small, a left winger, was a second team selection.

The Raven defence allowed a total of 65 goals this year in comparison to only 37 for Blues. Terry McCarthy, another first-team choice, heads the rearguards while former Loyola star netminder Andy Molino and John Haggland are their set goalies.

THE RAVENS, WHO WEREN'T in the playoff picture at all last year, feel their chances are good this time around.

Their coach, Bryan Kealey, commented to an Ottawa reporter earlier this week: "The East could surprise this year. The fact that Blues finished second raised a lot of eyebrows — and hopes!"

Although Blues were narrowly edged by Waterloo for top spot, individually they fared quite well in the division all-star balloting released earlier this week.

The smooth line of centre Brian St. John and wingers Bill Buba and Terry Peterman were chosen for the first team as a complete unit. Peterman was the league's top scorer while St. John was tied for fourth spot and Buba, the loop's premiere goal producer, was sixth.

Second-year defenceman Dave McDowall was the other Toronto first-team pick. Waterloo's talented Ian McKegney was the second blueliner while comeback sensation goaltender Ian Young of the Warriors completed the first team.

THREE MORE VARSITY STARS were on the second team. Slick centre and team captain John Wright, first-year left winger Gord Davies and goalie Cole (tied with Guelph's Kenny Lockett) got the nod.

After a slow start, Wright set a torrid scoring pace in the final third of the season to finish in a tie with St. John for the fourth-place scoring spot. Davies, a Marlie grad, was second only to Peterman in the league standings on the strength of a league-leading assist total of 20.

Notes: Blues and Ravens meet in the first-round of the OQAA's two years ago and Varsity took a 10-6 decision. That was at Varsity Arena; this time Carleton will have the homefan advantage. York Yeomen hockey coach Bill Purcell was burned badly last Sunday while on duty as a Metro area fireman.

Students mount challenge at 3 p.m.

CLOSED MEETING GOES AHEAD TODAY

As the General Committee of the Arts and Science Faculty Council prepares to hold its first in camera meeting this afternoon, students will be gathering outside the doors.

Students have been asked to meet at 3 p.m. in the foyer of the Medical Sciences Building to plan strategy for the meeting at 4:10 in the Medical Science auditorium.

If the Committee persists in its hard-line attitude towards students, running roughshod over its own by-laws and rules, today could produce the third consecutive disruption of the executive body.

Trouble seemed imminent last Tuesday as a senior administrator told one student leader that U of T would seek an injunction and had asked for 50 Metro policemen to guard today's meeting.

But since Tuesday, the extremist sections of the faculty who have called for police action seem to have been brought under leash. At a meeting Friday, conservative faculty members assured student leaders that no injunction had been sought by the university.

The series of strikes and disruptions began after the Faculty Council turned down a student compromise that would have set up a parity restructuring committee purely to recommend changes.

A parity restructuring committee set up by students and faculty outside the Council has released its final report, printed in full on pages 11, 12 and 13.

Half-century tradition broken

Women may gain admission to Hart House

Hart House will admit women, plus administrative and support staff into its exclusive fold of all male members if the recommendations of the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Future Role of Hart House are accepted.

The committee has been meeting since Feb. 1969 and has accepted submissions from many segments of the university community.

The admission of women, one of major recommendations, may put a strain on Hart House facilities. But the report counts on the eventual construction of a men's athletic building and a campus centre building so as to leave Hart House a quiet place for informal education.

Until new men's athletic facilities are built, the athletic wing of Hart House will remain for men only.

The report explains that the "university has expressed strong interest in the proposal" by SAC for a campus centre and seems to feel that the university will act upon the "expressed interest" in the near future.

The University administration first approved the SAC plan for a campus centre in 1965.

Female membership in Hart House will require a change of the Deed of Gift from the Massey Foundation as will admission of "administrative and support staff" since the deed now states that the house is for "men only" of the university (i.e. not staff but students, faculty and alumni) except for "special occasions".

According to the report, this rule has been greatly relaxed in practice so that "the house is now open to women most of the time".

The report envisions that eventual remodelling of the north wing of Hart House for expanded facilities such as "an art gallery, a large area for social events . . . and enlarged facilities for many of the clubs in the house, after completion of a men's athletic building. The pool, locker room and health service area would be for coeducational activities.

In the meantime, cost of renovation and general demand for physical recreation indicate that the north wing should be left experimentally for athletic use to determine if the present structure might be more desirable, the report says.

The committee presents two possible views for the future financing of Hart House: one is to retain the old system of a compulsory fee to students, now including women and voluntary system of comparable fees to faculty, alumni and now administrative and support staff; the other calls for compulsory fee of $20 to all students to be included in their university incidental fees (as it is, directly, now), this money to be turned over to Hart House similar to the arrangement for SAC fees — there would be no charge for faculty.

Both proposals are still under discussion by the committee which hopes to arrive at a consensus before the report is released. The eloquent 33-page report supports "the conception of the House as a learning place where its members would develop their abilities and could follow their interests without the formality of classes, examinations and grades."

Among its recommendations are:

- university financial aid to the expanding food service in Hart House.
- expansion of the Hart House staff and university aid to its financial resources.
- that the finance committee of the House include more students. Only one of its nine members is now a student.
- a retention of the committee structure of government of the House.

The committee will continue meeting weekly until the report is finished, hopefully in the near future.

Committee members include: on behalf of SAC, Bob Vernon, Gary Segal, Harriet Kideckel; Ed M. Bridge, and Bob Hoke of the Board of Stewards; Prof. P. E. Burke and Prof. L. Lynch representing faculty; W. Jack Eastaugh, U of T alumnus; Prof. Don Forster, presidential nominee to the committee; Sidney Hermant, Board of Governors; Carmen Guild, Assistant Warden of Hart House; and E. A. Wilkinson, Warden. Students reject deal with faculty tories

By ALEX PODNICK

Student representatives on the Arts and Science Faculty Council Sunday repudiated a deal made Friday with conservative faculty to prevent further disruptions of Faculty Council.

Fearing the complete breakdown of the Council, 20 "concerned" faculty had met Friday afternoon with moderate student leaders.

The committee, formed on the initiative of SAC Education Commissioner Bob Spencer and Arts and Science Dean Albert Allen, is composed of leaders of the Committee of Concerned Faculty, sponsors of the faculty anti-parity petition, and several SAC moderates.

Since the Faculty Council rejected a parity restructuring committee in January, students have declared the Council illegitimate and disrupted all but one subsequent Council meeting.

It is expected that today's meeting of the General Committee will be similarly disrupted.

The most the committee could do was offer four minor concessions to students.

If students agree in advance not to disrupt today's General Committee meeting, History professor W. H. Nelson will introduce a motion at the beginning of the meeting calling for an open meeting.

The committee members will then propose an immediate 20 minute general discussion of the student role in the university.

They will also ask the General Committee to instruct its 6-2-1 restructuring committee (set up in the face of student opposition in January to consider the 6-6-3 parity restructuring committee report as the first brief before it.) However, the General Committee will not be asked to endorse the parity restructuring committee report or ask the 6-2-1 committee to treat it preferentially.

The CCF will ask the General Committee to hold a special meeting within the week to discuss the student role in Faculty decision-making.

At the Friday meeting, John Rist, a Classics professor, declared, "No self-respecting faculty will put up with

RCMP intelligence expands

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Trudeau cabinet believes the RCMP intelligence network let them down during the crisis brought on by the Front de Liberation du Quebec, according to an article in the Montreal Star.

Defence Minister Donald Macdonald said recently that both the RCMP and the armed forces have been reviewing their procedures for dealing with such emergencies.

One of the major tasks given Trudeau's new Solicitor General Jean Pierre Goyer, has been to ensure that the internal "intelligence" network does not let the government down again, according to the Star.

To help the new man with his job he has "been given a whopping budget increase of $20 million for the RCMP next year" the Star says. "A healthy chunk of it will be channelled into reinforcing the intelligence network," said Goyer.

Some of it will be going into a new $5.7 million national police services centre in Ottawa, which is scheduled for opening in 1972.

Into the new building will move, among other things, the accumulation of 60 years of RCMP fingerprinting. The prints, dating back to 1910 (13 years before the FBI started its file) will be recorded on electronic tape.

The new automated systems will record the more than a million fingerprints of Canadians and non-Canadians now on file as well as those to come. They will accommodate simultaneously any number of identification calls from anywhere in the country.

the type of conniving that we have put up with in the last year."

The faculty then suggested that student leaders present work with them to prevent further disruptions and inform the faculty in advance of any student plans to disrupt today's meeting.

History professor J. B. Conacher said he is "more interested in talking to the students elected to the Faculty Council than to the 100 or so students who meet in Sid Smith (at Thursday's mass meeting)."

UC principal Archie Hallett insisted that there is no united student group. Instead, he described three factions — members of the Faculty Council, the disrupters, and the disinterested.

St. Mike's SAC rep Frank Nacsa told the faculty that "whether the student Faculty Council members like it or not, we're stuck with the commitment to disrupt all Faculty Council business".

For the students to abandon their disruption tactics, they must feel that there is a meaningful commitment to discuss the student position, he said.

Spencer told the meeting that "there will be a disruption on Monday and I'm trying to prevent it".

The faculty disagreed about how firm a commitment they would accept "the absence of incense, tambourines, bizarre costumes, and radios" as proof of student acceptance of the agreement.

Craig Heron, SAC Education Consultant, observed that he found it "hard to believe that the offer to open a meeting that students believe should never have been closed would be regarded by the students as conciliatory".

Spencer later agreed to the faculty proposal and promised to attend student meetings Sunday and Monday to argue in favour of suspending the disruption tactics.

Rist warned that there will be a "very, very unhappy reaction" if a disruption occurs after the students have accepted the CCF proposal. Such a "deliberate slap in the face" would move the student power position back five years.

Leo Zakuta, a Sociology professor, commented that the recent disruptions had so damaged the student position that faculty could now for the first time in five years accept the possibility of a Faculty Council without student representation.

St. Mike's Philosophy professor W. Dunphy objected to spending any time rehashing why students and faculty behaved as they did at the last General Committee meeting at Monday's meeting.

However, Nelson spoke in favour of the 20 minute general debate. There would be "some sort of benefit of release to allow people to get their grievances off their chests", he said.

In proposing that the 6-6-3 report be accepted as the first brief before the 6-2-1 committee, Innis College principal Robin Harris described it as a "symbolic gesture on the part of those faculty who support the 6-2-1 committee".

Jack Robson, an English professor, was hesitant about approving any concessions to the students. He said he couldn't see how the parity restructuring committee report could be given priority.

Heron advised the faculty that anything sponsored by the 6-2-1 committee will not be accepted by the students. Similarly, the students have almost no confidence in the General Committee.

Rist insisted that the General Committee special meeting not have the right to take any action. He said they should just talk and possibly make recommendations to the 6-2-1 committee.

Spencer agreed. He said that Rist's no-vote idea was "a good one" since it would postpone any decision about parity.

One faculty member summed up the committee position as "a small enough price to pay" for pacifying the students.

Young NDPers defy party leadership

By ERIC MILLS

The Ontario New Democratic Youth (ONDY) replied to an apparent attempt by the NDP's more conservative leadership to smash it this weekend, by decentralizing and staking out a more autonomous position.

In its annual convention attended by about 75 delegates from across Ontario at the Westway Hotel in Toronto, the ONDY passed a manifesto describing the main emphasis of the group as "agitational and propaganda work at a mass level among young people".

Decrying the Ontario NDP's almost exclusive preoccupation with electoral politics, the manifesto stated that "the NDP's visions of the political tasks and of its role in them as represented by existing leaders are gravely inadequate."

"We believe in confrontation politics and they do not. We believe in class politics . . . We believe in anti-imperialist politics."

The militant tone of the manifesto and that of the convention was at least partly a result of the action of the party's provincial council last weekend. The same council which heard NDP leader Stephen Lewis attack the Waffle also cut the ONDY's grant of about $3000 to about $800, the minimum it could constitutionally give to the youth group.

Last year's executive secretary (and this year's president) Gord Cleveland interpreted this as meaning the ONDY doesn't fit into Stephen Lewis' electoral plans.

"The ONDY grant was cut off because the left wing of the party is getting too strong and is presenting a challenge to Stephen Lewis and his views," he said in his report to the convention.

The manifesto states that the ONDY believes in the possibility of democratically electing a socialist government and intends to remain within the party.

However Cleveland stated he would not advise its members to work for candidates in the coming provincial election simply because they are NDP, but only if they personally support those candidates. He suggested he would not support Lewis or former leader Donald Macdonald.

The manifesto included an analysis of high schools, universities and young workers. It advocated student, faculty and community control of high schools and universities, and workers' control over factories.

To cope with a drastically reduced budget, the ONDY reduced its executive from 15 to 7, prepared to give up its central office and one full-time secretary and set up a decentralized structure. It made plans to raise money in several ways and created a new type of associate membership which does not require membership in the Ontario NDP.

On the last day of the convention the delegates hear Azael Trevino, a representative of the United Farm Workers, who are conducting a boycott of non-union lettuce under the leadership of Cesar Chavez' The ONDY voted full support of the UFW.

The convention also rejected overwhelmingly a resolution on Quebec which would repudiate "any proposition for collaboration, alliance or veiled support for those who seek the dismemberment of our country."

Instead a motion recognizing the full right of self-determination of the nation of Quebec was endorsed by a large majority.

The ONDY also went against party policy when it advocated the cessation of public grants to separate schools.

Mo throws hat in ring

The gauntlet has been thrown down in the SAC race, as Blue and White Chairman Mo Wortzman became the first officially declared candidate Friday for the vice-presidential spot.

Wortzman, who acted as bodyguard and campaign manager last year for perennial Bernard Teitelbaum's unsuccessful SAC preidential attempt, has dropped out of sight temporarily, according to supporters.

Wortzman's campaign is being directed by masterpolitician Teitelbaum, who for the first time will be using his recently written Six Steps to Winning as a blueprint for success.

"But I won't reveal what the Six Steps are until we've won," said Teitelbaum yesterday.

Today's meeting—a vote of confidence

The most important fact there is to know about this afternoon's arts and science faculty council general committee meeting is that it is closed to non-members.

The decision to move behind closed doors has been an extremely embarrassing one for faculty members bent on preventing any further student interference in their normal "business".

For to move into secret means to move the clock close to five years backward, to a time when students were assumed not even to be interested in what decisions were made about their learning situations, let alone participate in making them.

Moving in camera was a desperate act of faculty paranoia, taken at the end of a stormy council meeting more than a week and a half ago. Most of the faculty who supported it, history Professor J. B. Conacher admitted last week, "didn't even know what they were voting about."

But his next words are even more revealing:

"They just had confidence in the mover and the motion."

That is precisely the point.

Students simply do not have confidence in the present council of the faculty of arts and science.

They do not have confidence in a council chairman who willfully bends the rules of order to suit his political purposes, nor do they have confidence in faculty members who have declared, as has classics professor J. M. Rist, that he wants never to discuss the issue of parity again.

Ever.

It is clear that the faculty, in their paranoia about student involvement in university government; have gone beyond fanaticism and into the realm of the ridiculous.

Nevertheless, some of them are acting rather fearful about the situation they have created. Presumably, it's the old story about the master and his apprentice.

History professor W. H. Nelson has taken on the unfamiliar role of faculty moderate, offering students a token gesture of peace.

He is suggesting that

- students refrain from any disruption of the council's meeting, and
- in return for this, students will receive (1) open meetings, as required by the council's rules of procedures, and (2) 20 minutes of debate on the role of students in university government.

Incredible, but true. Nelson apparently sees this as a genuine offer of good faith.

In fact, it is simply an attempt to salvage some of the council's lost respectability after so hurriedly retreating into secret session.

Oh yes.

Prof. Nelson is also offering to make the new faculty council proposal prepared by the parity restructuring committee (see pages 11, 12 and 13 of today's paper), the first brief to the famous "chimpanzee" committee the council still wishes to establish.

At the January 19 council meeting, you will recall, the council vetoed the establishment of the parity restructuring committee and replaced it with a committee of six faculty and two students. It was remarked that any student who served on such a committee might as well be a chimpanzee for all the effectiveness he would have.

Today's faculty council meeting should be a massive vote of confidence.

But not a vote of confidence in the power of faculty members to unilaterally decide the affairs of the educational process at U of T.

It must be a vote of confidence in the necessity of students to play a significant role in making the fundamental decisions about the faculty of arts and science.

Today's meeting will be an open meeting. Not because faculty are afraid of holding a closed meeting, but because the simple fact of the political existence of students requires it to be one.

Students will begin to assemble outside the Medical Sciences Building Auditorium at 3 p.m. today. The meeting is set for 4 p.m.

Students uncertain on disruption tactics

By TONY USHER

The students who have led the movement for parity in the Faculty of Arts and Science are uncertain about how to react to the conciliatory overtures being made by conservative faculty.

Strategy meetings over the weekend produced little except agreement to "play it by ear" at today's meeting of the General Committee of Faculty Council at 4 p.m. in the Medical Sciences auditorium.

Anti-parity faculty leaders proposed Friday that today's meeting be opened to observers and include a 20-minute discussion of the parity crisis. A special General Committee meeting next Monday would be set aside for a full debate on parity, possibly including the report of the parity restructuring committee.

How much of these moves would be unconditional acts of good faith on the part of faculty and how much they would depend on the willingness of students not to disrupt or obstruct today's meeting is unclear.

The strategy meetings of various groups involved in the Arts and Science strike and disruptions agreed that no binding commitment or guarantee not to disrupt could be given.

SAC Education Commissioner Bob Spencer will ask history professor W. H. Nelson, who offered to move that the meeting be opened to observers not to act.

Instead, Trinity College student Brian Morgan will move the meeting be opened. If the motion is not passed, all students involved have agreed that overt disruption should continue, since openness is an essential precondition to any form of disruption.

Should the meeting be opened, the tactics to be followed will depend on the general atmosphere and on the number of students present.

"Whoever turns up is really going to decide the situation," Brian Johnson, an English student active in the crisis told The Varsity.

It is believed that Provost Jack Sword will not chair the meeting and that someone who can command the respect of most present will replace him. Sword infuriated students at the last General Committee meeting by disbaring Physics representative Norman Rogers and by using dubious procedural rulings.

The weekend strategy meetings indicated divisions between SAC and Faculty Council student representatives, and other strike supporters not holding elective positions.

Wanted: 150 eaters for food co-op

A group of citizens who are attempting to set up a direct charge co-op store in the Ward 5 area are looking for 150 members.

The group will hold an open meeting at 8 p.m. tonight at the Friend's House, 60 Lowther Ave. to discuss their plan with prospective members.

The store, which would stock groceries, hardwares, paper and drug products, would sell all items at cost. Each member would be required to pay a small weekly charge to cover management and operating expenses.

"This simple policy eliminates a whole range of false advertising and puts the emphasis where it belongs — on the quality of the product," according to an announcement made by group organizer David Weston.

In addition to these weekly charges, however, each member would be required to purchase a number of shares over a period of time. Weston estimated that it would amount to a total of about $50 per member.

He pointed out however that the savings would be considerable; on groceries 10-12%, on paper products 15-25%, on hardwares 25-30%, and on drugs 25-100%.

The co-op would be a non-profit organization, in which the members would have a say in determining management costs. Members would be called into a general meeting four times a year to approve the budget for the upcoming quarter year.

Even similar co-ops already exist in different parts of Ontario, including two in Toronto.

"I was the token woman. . ."

The inside story on the Hart House Report

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

About four years ago, I heard about some women who tried to force their way into Hart House (I think it was just the Arbour Room before 2 p.m.) and were bodily ejected.

It was all very vague then. But after I entered the University of Toronto and heard that the best food on campus was in Hart House, some of the rarest books were in the Hart House library, some of the best records were in the Hart House music rooms, the finest photography equipment on campus belonged to the Hart House Camera Club — and that I couldn't use any of it because I was a woman — I began to wonder where I could find those women I'd heard about; I wanted to join them.

By the middle of third year I finally got my chance to have a say in the future of Hart House. I became what I grew to call "the token woman" on the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Future Role of Hart House, affectionately known as Pacofroh (pronounced pak-o-froe).

When I first joined Pacofroh in Feb., 1970, it had been in progress for one year and its report was a month and a half overdue. Dr. Bissell had suggested to the committee when it first started meeting in February of '69 that "it would be helpful if the committee could report by Christmas '69."

AS I ENTERED MY FIRST MEETING with the committee in the Bickersteth Room on that February afternoon, I was greeted by the strange and smiling faces of seven men; the committee is composed of men from different sectors of the university, including the Board of Governors — but rarely are all present at the same time.

By coincidence, I knew one, Gary Segal, and greeted him with an embrace — we were old friends and besides, it was good to see someone I knew. The other men in the room were agast by my overt emotionalism. I sat down.

Ed Bridge, chairman of the committee and a U of T English tutor, began the meeting by introducing himself to me and me to the other members.

"And I gather you already know Gary . . ." he said with a sly tone. The other members chuckled.

At its inception, the committee had had two women members, both SAC appointees. One quit early in the committee's proceedings and was replaced by Bob Vernon, a law student.

The other had left in the summer to study in Europe and was replaced by me. The committee itself had never sought female members; the appointment of women was SAC's decision for their delegates.

SO I SAT ALONE IN A ROOM with seven male academics who outlined for me that the committee, prior to my entrance, had already accepted two basic principles:

1) that women be admitted to full membership in Hart House (except for the athletic facilities, of course; "You have the Benson Building, after all, ho ho . . .")

2) that the "essential character of Hart House" be maintained, (and they were all very quick to explain that the essential character had nothing to do with keeping women out).

Carmen Guild, Assistant Warden of Hart House and secretary of the committee explained that the true "essential character of Hart House" was found in the Founders' Prayer, which is inscribed at the east end of the main corridor of the House.

That is, to serve "the highest interests of this university by drawing into a common fellowship the members of the several colleges and faculties . . . the teacher, the student, the graduate and the undergraduate . . . that the members of Hart House may discover . . . the true education that is to be found in good fellowship . . ."

That all sounded very nice — possibly like the free school ethic, where teacher and student are one, learning together as equals. It didn't say anything about Vincent Massey, Vice-chairman of the Massey Foundation that gave U of T Hart House in 1919, being a misogynist. Nor does that lovely prose mention that the deed to Hart House stipulates that the "fellowship" is for fellows, only.

But attitudes change — or at least modify.

AND THE MEN on the committee smiled at me and acknowledged the necessity of this change in Hart House's attitude toward women.

Well, most of them did.

At one Saturday all-day meeting in March, we began debating again what had been an accepted recommendation of the committee for almost a year now — the admittance of women as HH members.

W. Jack Eastaugh, the committee member who represented alumni of Hart House, said that he felt the "tone of Hart House had gone down since he went to U of T."

Carmen Guild, who always remained calm and above all, diplomatic during times of debate, commented, "Now Jack, you know I've heard that from every graduate member who comes back to the House."

"Simple hallways from which rooms open as in a large private house" — Pacofroh report

"WELL," JACK REPLIED STERNLY, "I was passing by your office one day, Carmen, when I saw one young man kissing his girl by the door and as I passed I heard another House member comment . . . and they want to admit women to Hart House!"

Jack went on to explain his fears that next they would be necking in the library — that would certainly "bring down the tone of Hart House."

Despite his suspicion that he "might be old-fashioned" Jack felt all this "immoral" activity was a lowering of moral standards. Why he had even seen students from the high school where he is principal kissing at the bus stop after school — he did not approve.

It didn't matter though, because the committee had already accepted the principle of female membership.

"We're just a rubber stamp committee, that's all . . ." Jack said in a huff. I began to think about that, too.

Indeed we were members of a Presidential Advisory Committee which essentially means that if we advised that Hart House be taken over by youth organizations to help alienated youth and provide a summer hostel, the president could just take it as bad advice and ignore it.

IT BECAME CLEAR TO ME that President Bissell had not forgotten those women four years ago either. With a women's liberation group developing right under his nose, often meeting in Sidney Smith lounge (and more recently in Hart House itself) with members who were U of T students, he must have seen that the time was ripe to act upon admitting women to the House's all-male preserve before something happened.

So, like all good university presidents he established a committee to advise him on what to do about Hart House. He knew what the committee would recommend and the committee knew what it should recommend.

It was always careful never to go beyond its own jurisdiction.

This powerless advisory capacity did not bother most members of the committee who, as Carmen Guild was fond of saying, preferred to use "informal channels" to accomplish things rather than rigid structured ones.

The idea of "informal channels" crept up again and again during the committee's deliberations. On that one long Saturday we began to discuss the policy of membership in Hart House.

8 Members included all students, graduates and faculty of the University of Toronto who paid a fee for each year.

Apparently, that was the only criterion for membership — except for the "informal" criterion of the membership committee, which Carmen mentioned only once and then preferred to drop from further discussion.

Gary, who had been active in Hart House and its committees for years had never heard much about the membership committee before.

But when asked who was on it, Carmen declined to answer saying it wasn't very important. He said there were only two or three people on it and it was mostly concerned with suspending members "informally" for misconduct or, if I remember correctly, for something to the effect of not deserving Hart House membership.

THE FIRST REASON WAS OBVIOUS; someone who was rowdy or destructive to the House should not be allowed to use its facilities.

But the second reason intrigued me.

The membership committee was little known, its members were secret and its criterion for House membership restrictive. What could make a man not worthy of Hart House membership if he normally qualified?

"Well," said Carmen, "there was an instructor here who applied for membership and while reviewing his credentials we found them to be false. He was appointed to teach as a result of false credentials. We didn't think that type of person should be a member of Hart House."

"Was he a bad teacher?" I asked.

It was the fact that he had falsified his credentials that was objectionable, according to Carmen.

"We are only concerned with his membership in the House. What he does otherwise is no business of ours," Carmen said.

"Then you didn't tell anyone? You didn't report what you knew?" I asked.

"We are only concerned with Hart House membership," he answered.

"OH, I SEE," I SAID. "And if someone was murdered in Hart House and no one saw it, but a member of the membership committee had gleaned some facts revealing who the murderer was, all he would do is suspend his membership without reporting what he knew to any authorities?"

Carmen just smiled.

If this was part of the "essential character of Hart House" it was not the type of character I wished to retain. But when I voiced that opinion few members supported me. The topic was dropped.

One of the major controversies of Hart House's future was how it would be financed. Hart House was run into a deficit at the end of each fiscal year for the past few years. Carmen preferred to stick to informal channels in trying to get more money out of the University administration, while retaining the present fee structure with the inclusion of women.

In this case, informal channels meant touching the sentimental purse-strings of Simcoe Hall, perhaps over dinner with Claude to help Hart House out.

This system had apparently worked in the past.

But Bob Vernon, who had set himself up as Pacofroh's financial wizard, was always coming up with new and ingenious schemes for making Hart House an integral part of the University financially.

The bickering about the financial end of Hart House went on continually. Vernon supported the admittance of support staff and faculty, along with male and female students — but only the students would pay fees.

BUT HIS PLANS were too convoluted for me. And Carmen kept mentioning problems with the auditors.

I never paid much attention to this part since whatever we recommended regarding finances had to be approved by the administration. I was willing to leave it to the auditors — or even "informal channels" — and get on with the actual form and content of Hart House.

Those first debates were in the early days when the committee was not only supplied with food for thought, but for the stomach as well.

Most meetings I went to were accompanied with tea, coffee and little cookies or tarts.

But one night in May, I rushed to an evening meeting right after dinner, expecting to have tea to help my hurried digestion.

Hart House bickering goes on

When I arrived at the meeting I found no cookies, no tea, nothing.

"What? No tea, tonight," I complained.

Don Forster, executive assistant to the president and the presidential nominee to the committee, smiled apologetically.

"We've been drinking a lot of tea," he said. "We've run out of our budget."

IT SHOULD HAVE BEEN no surprise; the committee was already a half-year late in reporting and it looked like no report was in sight for the near future.

We barely met over the summer; everyone was out of town at different times.

When school started last fall I ran into Carmen on campus and asked what was happening with the report. I had hoped it would have been completed months before so that women might be full members of Hart House by that fall.

I missed most of the meetings in the fall and winter until I was notified of the meeting for Sunday, Feb. 28. The notice said, "This meeting will continue until the report is finished".

But two days later I received another notice: "Pacofroh will meet for the next three Sundays until the report is finished."

I went to the meeting on Sunday. And Bob Vernon continued to argue about finances, and Jack Eastaugh puffed on his pipe and when we were trying to decide whether to include a summary

"Entrances of a modest scale" — Pacofroh report with the report or not, Carmen's diplomatic opinion was "I'll go along with whatever you say."

And it goes on . . .

And at the end of the meeting we agreed to meet again next week, and the week after, until it is finished.

REPORT ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN FACULTY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

U of T, Canada's largest university, has more than 2,300 faculty members. Of these, less than ten per cent are women. To be exact, there are 225 women faculty at U of T.

As well as recording some fairly interesting statistical data, our profile probes more controversial issues — how housework and caring for children affect women academics, how being a woman affected the individual's career, the attitudes of both students and male colleagues towards women faculty.

Several months ago we mailed questionnaires to all 225 women faculty, asking them to respond to a list of more than 20 questions. The rate of response was slightly over one-third, although discrepancies in total are accounted for by the fact that not all women answered all questions.

The results of this questionnaire form the basis of our report. Basically all we have done is tabulate the answers and add appropriate comments made by respondents or information from other sources.

The report appears in two parts, the first of which is printed on the next two pages. Part Two will appear on Wednesday.

The Report on Women: Part One

1. What position do you hold in your department?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.
Sciences and Professions:	13	14	6	1
Social Sciences and Humanities:	4	19	8	6
All women:	17	33	14	7

At first glance there appear to be almost equal numbers of women in either the sciences and professions or in the social sciences and humanities, with 34 and 37 in each division respectively. Within the first category, however, women are concentrated primarily in the "professions" — teaching, nursing, music, social work, food science, child studies and library sciences.

A report prepared for the Commission on University Government in 1969 showed that of 39 departments in the professional faculties 12 had no women faculty and another 15 were more than 85 per cent male. Only four faculties — the School of Social Work, the Institute of Child Study, Food Sciences and Physical and Health Education — had more than 50 per cent women on their staff.

2. Are you the only woman in your department?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.
Sciences and Professions (Yes answers)	2	2	0	1
Social Sciences and Humanities (Yes answers)	0	1	1	0

One woman noted: "In chemistry there is not a single woman on the permanent staff, i.e., Ass't. Prof. or above, nor a single organic PhD student."

Another woman added that in Ethics there is one woman at Trinity, one at Scarborough, one at Erindale and one in the combined university department.

A woman in Social Work suggested that "there might be some attempt to manage a better representation of men in a faculty that has been traditionally weighted with women."

A fourth woman explained that in many cases the reason there are any women faculty at all is because "they could not obtain a man because of the salary offered."

3. What is the highest degree you hold?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.
Sciences and Professions:
Diploma	2	--	--	--
Bachelor	3	1	--	--
Masters	6	7	3	1
Doctorate	2	5	3	--
Social Sciences and Humanities:
Diploma	--	--	--	--
Bachelor	--	1	--	--
Masters	2	6	2	1
Doctorate	2	12	6	5
All women faculty:
Diploma	2	--	--	--
Bachelor	3	2	--	--
Masters	8	13	5	2
Doctorate	4	17	9	5

Unfortunately, there are no comparable figures available for men. But it does appear surprising that there are at least four women PhD's at U of T who have not advanced beyond the rank of lecturer.

4. How long have you been employed at U of T?

All women (averages):	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.
Sciences and Professions	3.5 yrs.	4 yrs.	11 yrs.	21 yrs.
Social Sciences and Humanities	3 yrs.	5 yrs.	12 yrs.	16 yrs.

Glancing back to Question 1, you can see that in the Sciences and Professions there is only one woman who is a full professor and she has been at U of T for 21 years. Similarly, in Social Sciences and Humanities, even though the average stay shows up in the results as 16 years, of the six full professors, four of them have been here for over 20 years. Without comparable figures for men, no judgement can be made as to whether it really does take women much longer than men to advance up the academic ladder. Several questions in Part Two of this report probe women faculty's own attitudes to this issue.

5. What was your position when you were first hired?

	Sciences and Professions	Social Sciences and Humanities
Instructor	10	2
Lecturer	10	21
Asst. Prof.	10	10

6. What is your current salary?

Averages (in $ 000's):

	Lecturer	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.
Sciences and Professions	10	13	15	18.5
Social Sciences and Humanities	9	12	14	18

The following breakdown shows where various academic levels intersect with the salary scales:

Sciences and Professions:	Income Range	No. of women

The distribution of women faculty, according to these results, does not accurately reflect the overall distribution of citizenship at U of T. A report prepared for the Commission on University Government in 1969 showed that 41 per cent of the faculty in arts and science, for instance, were non-Canadian. It would seem that non-Canadian elements at U of T are disproportionately male.

Of U of T's 225 women faculty, 28 are married to men who are also on the university's academic staff — 12.4 per cent. This figure was calculated separately, not on the basis of the questionnaire results

11. Do you feel the university has a responsibility to finance day care facilities for its employees?

	Yes	No
All responses:	30%	63%
Response of those with children under five years of age:	37%	62%
Response of those with children over five years of age:	40%	60%

Among those who replied "no" on this question, many were not against the principle of day care, but opposed the university financing such projects, saying the government should pay

One woman wrote that it was important to assist university women with children without "violating the principle of equal treatment". She had two suggestions:

"Tax relief for those who need housekeepers. My housekeeper is a business expense: without her I could not do the job which my country has spent time, energy and money training me to do. I am contributing to the economy by providing full time work for another person

"The university could be more lenient in hiring women have been home five to ten years with children, but who are well trained"

12. Do you do all your own housework?

Yes 43%

Many of the women who did not do their own housework indicated that this was because of commitments either to their children or to their academic work.

In commenting on how being a woman had affected the development of her academic career, one woman replied:

"My career has been adversely affected not because the university has been loath to promote me, but because of the requirements of domestic life.

"It is still impossible, I feel, for a husband and wife to have two equal careers so long as there is a division of labour based on sex in the home.

"When managing a home and children is exclusively a female task, then there is good reason for business industry and other institutions to be biased in their treatment of women.

"This problem is much more basic than this questionnaire suggests. It is the education of little boys and girls that must be altered if you want to have professional equality for women."

LIBRARY COUNCIL ANNOUNCEMENT OF ELECTION

Twelve student representatives and four teaching staff representatives will be elected to the Library Council. Student candidates must be full time students in degree or diploma courses except for the candidates in the Extension constituency. Teaching staff candidates must have full-time appointments. Nomination forms may be obtained at any University Library. Completed nomination forms must be returned to the Office of the Vice-President and Registrar, prior to 2:00 p.m., March 5, 1971, to be valid. Elected student members will serve for a one-year term, twice renewable.

Elected teaching staff members will serve for a three-year term, not immediately renewable.

Voting will be by the ballot-box method, on, or about, March 23. With the exception of extension students, who may show library or A.T.L. cards, library cards will be required to vote in the Library Council election. Facilities are available in Room 23, Sigmund Sommel Library, for the issuance of library cards to any voter not now in possession of one. Full and part-time teaching staff not eligible to vote as students, may vote in the appropriate teaching staff constituency. Full and part-time degree and diploma students may vote in the appropriate student constituency, except for the Extension constituency in which only degree students are eligible to vote.

Final proposal for a new Faculty Council in Arts and Sciences

The restructuring committee for the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, after a month of meetings, has released their final report for a new Faculty Council. The committee was set up by a mass meeting Jan. 29 after faculty members opposed parity in a Faculty Council meeting. Students walked out declaring the existing Council illegitimate. A new restructuring committee was formed consisting of six students, six faculty, and three teaching assistants. The final report has been approved by all fifteen members of the Committee, and they hope "That it will receive serious consideration by all members of the university community."

The report was signed by the following: Eden Anderson (student), Kay Armatage (teaching assistant), Connie Chapman (teaching assistant), Victoria Conlin (teaching assistant), Vince Dolan (student), Warren Gallagher (part-time student), Lawrence Lynch (faculty), Barbara Martineau (faculty), Brian Morgan (student), Christopher Plowright (Faculty), Tom Schofield (student), Bob Spencer (student), Mel Watkins (faculty), Milton Wilson (faculty), Fred Winter (faculty).

SECTION I

The structure and composition of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science have been under virtually continuous discussion for ten years. Various proposals have been made by various groups and some modest changes have been put into effect. This has now culminated in what can only be described as a crisis. The Council as presently structured does not function effectively, if at all, and its major constituencies of student and teaching staff are in open disagreement. It is to the advantage of no one in the University community for this situation to persist. We are bring this report forward in the hope that it will help to make a resolution of the crisis possible.

In late January, 1971, out of meetings of concerned students and staff, it was decided to strike a Committee of the nature approved by the General Committee of the Council in November, 1970, but rejected by the Council in January, 1971, namely, a Committee composed equally of staff and students which would recommend on restructuring of the Council. The original Committee that emerged out of these meetings consisted of five staff members and five students. This Committee lacked representation from teaching assistants and part-time students and had only one woman member. To make itself more representative the Committee added three teaching assistants and one part-time student, and then one additional staff member to maintain staff-student parity; of the resulting fifteen-person Committee, ten were men and five were women.

We cannot, of course, pretend to be a Committee chosen by the Faculty community at large. We are simply the creation of many people who felt that it was not enough to deplore the crisis and to feel concern. As a Committee, our justification and our status come simply from the intolerable situation and from the obvious need to make initiatives and to offer specific proposals.

SECTION II: THE COUNCIL OF THE FACULTY

(a) Introduction

These recommendations are being made with the hope that the structure herein suggested will be palatable to all groups involved in teaching and learning in the Faculty of Arts and Science. We have drawn on the experiences, successes and failures of previous restructuring attempts and thus some of the recommendations may be familiar. Finally, with respect to individual recommendations, we have attempted to be as specific as possible and where confusion could arise we have attempted to provide a short justification and explanation of our point of view, as in the paragraphs on the Council which immediately follow.

The Council described below is intended to be the basic legislative body of the Faculty of Arts and Science, not a larger version of the present General Committee. It should, in due course, by statutory changes, replace the ultimate body for the Faculty as outlined in the University Statutes. The interim between the full coming into being of such a Council and the amending of the Statutes should serve as a kind of guaranteed review period; but we are strongly of the opinion that in the interim the new Council (if it is to be given a proper trial) should operate without recourse to the total statutory membership except under the rarest of conditions and as the result of the most demanding of procedures for calling it into session.

It is because we see the proposed new Council as the ultimate legislative body in the Faculty that we have recommended such a large membership. It was suggested to our Committee and also within it that a small body might be proposed, with perhaps no more than 25 members, and perhaps elected at large, without departmental and college divisions. But such a body would in practice be simply a reduced version of the present General Committee and would almost certainly imply another larger body regularly available for ratification of decisions and perpetually waiting, or demanding, to be called into action in a crisis. We were not looking for a revised General Committee but for a more appropriate and practical ultimate body and decided that, while to make it small might be convenient in some senses and might help to stimulate new legislative initiatives, the result would be unacceptable as an ultimate body to the wide variety of constituencies certain to be disenfranchised in it. If there is anything corresponding to the present General Committee in our proposals, it is the small Steering Committee (21 members) described in Section III, although it has no specific legislative powers.

(b) Membership of the Council

(i) Students: a total of 100 elected student members and 103 appointed student alternates. Representatives should be elected through legitimately constituted student organizations (such as course unions, the student constituencies in departmental councils and college student meetings).

MEMBERS ALTERNATES

(a) Each of the 20 University Departments (including the new Department of Computer Science)	20	20
(b) Interdisciplinary Studies	1	1
(c) Each of the Combined College Departments	6	6
Full-Time Special Students	1	1
(e) Part-Time Undergraduate Degree Students	3	6
(f) Proportional representation by College population, with the provision that, if possible, procedures be set up within Colleges to elect students from as diverse constituencies as possible.	62	62
(g) Students from other faculties who are taking at least one course in Arts and Science (to a maximum of 7 elected from the appropriate faculties as chosen annually by the Dean of Arts and Science — see also iv, f)	7	7
TOTALS	100	103

(ii) Teaching Assistants in the Faculty of Arts and Science: a total of 27 elected members and 27 appointed alternates. Representatives should be elected through the Graduate Student Union or Departmental Organizations of Graduate Students and Teaching Assistants.

MEMBERS ALTERNATES

(a) Each of the 20 University Departments	20	20
(b) Interdisciplinary Studies	1	1
(c) Each of the Combined College Departments	6	6
TOTALS	27	27

The number of 27 was arrived at in order to insure the representation of all Departments by a Teaching Assistant.

(iii) Administrators MEMBERS

(a) President of the University or his appointee	1
(b) The Heads of the Colleges	8
(c) The Dean of the Faculty	1
(d) Associate Deans of the Faculty	2
(e) The Chief Librarian of the University	1
(f) The Director of the Division of University Extension	1
(g) The Deans of Scarborough and Erindale Colleges	2
(h) The Registrars of the Colleges	8
(i) The Assistant Director of the Division of University Extension in charge of Degree Courses	1
(j) One Representative of the University-Wide Budget Committee (selected by that Committee)	1
(k) The Assistant Dean and Secretary of the Faculty	1
TOTAL	27

The Committee considered at some length the possibility of having administrators on the Council as non-voting resource people. It was argued that many administrators (for example, the Assistant Dean and Secretary of the Faculty) were most useful to the Council in the information which they brought to it.

Further, it was pointed out that administrators, as voting group, might very well exert undue influence by holding a balance of power in the Council as proposed. We did not want to arrange a Council in which administrators might be able to exercise executive power in a stale-mated situation. It seemed best, nevertheless to leave administrators on the Council as voting members. For one thing, the presence of a fourth group (teaching assistants) made it unlikely that administrators would hold a balance of power. For another, to think it essential for someone to be a regular member of a body and then to deny him a vote seemed to many objectionable on principle.

But, more fundamentally perhaps, we felt that most administrators were deeply affected in their university lives and responsibilities by decisions of Council and should have a say in its decision-making. We would like to avoid a situation in which such members of the community are recognized for their information but not for their voting rights. On balance, therefore, we are proposing a category of 27 administrators, all with full voting rights.

(iv) Teaching Staff (of the rank of Lecturer and above): a total of 100 elected teaching-staff members and 100 appointed staff alternates.

Restructuring committee brings in final report

(a) The membership of this group (as listed below) was divided up proportionately according to the size of the staff in each Department. Its proportions should be adjusted annually (if necessary) according to changes in the departmental complements.

(b) A maximum of 7 seven representatives from any Department and a minimum of 2 representatives was adhered to (for an exception see item d).

(c) We have recommended that (where numerically feasible) a minimum of 1/3 of a Department's membership in the Council be composed of non-tenured faculty.

(d) We have recommended that one teaching-staff representative be elected from Interdisciplinary Studies (see also our student and teaching-assistant recommendations).

(e) In anticipation of the formation of a Department of Computer Science we have recommended that it receive 2 seats on the Council.

(f) We have recommended that representatives should be elected from other faculties of the University to a maximum of 7 representatives, the choice of appropriate faculties to be made annually by the Dean of Arts and Science and subject to review by Council. The students (already referred to) from other faculties and the staff members (mentioned here) should come from the same faculties (as chosen by the Dean).

(g) Each member of the teaching staff shall be elected to the Council by his/her constituency.

(h) Each member of the teaching staff shall appoint his/her own alternate member.

Committee feels compelled to state its view of this so-called principle. The Committee does not consider parity a universal principle; it does not deem it a sacred right to be observed in every committee and in every decision-making process in the University. The Committee feels, rather, that the structuring of councils and committees in the Faculty should be determined by the task each group is assigned; the numbers game is unimportant when compared with the responsibilities to be carried out. There should be different "mixes" of faculty and students in keeping with the requirements of different situations.

Thus, the tasks which we have designated as proper to the restructured Council that we have conceived are such that they affect the vital interests, welfare and lives of staff, students, administrators and teaching assistants alike. We are convinced, for example, that debate about the Faculty's future in the face of the recommendations of the President's Advisory Committee on Extension will deeply influence the daily lives of all of us and the kind of work we do — the hours of classes, the mixes of students, teaching assignments of staff and their normal workload, the order and progression of courses, budgets, relations with colleges, etc. These are all policy matters that deeply affect the interests of everyone in the Faculty; they represent the kind of task we foresee the Council performing; to wit, setting the basic policy and operational lines of the Faculty. In our view they dictate that the Council should be structured on parity lines, so that all may debate their vital interests in an atmosphere of dignity and security.

This being said, we do not support a "domino theory" that would see this recommendation as a precedent or model to be followed either all the committees of the Council (as our specific recommendations make clear) or in the structure of departments. We were not charged with making proposals on the structure of departments and our decision on parity should in no way dictate or set a precedent for the decision each university Department makes about the way to determine such matters as hiring, promotion and tenure. Whether this should be done by one committee or more, whether students should have a voice, structured presence or formal role in the policy or decision-making is for the Department to determine. As far as this Committee is concerned, we do not see that parity is automatically required; if each group should freely decide that it is appropriate, that is quite another matter. It should be determined by the individual situation, not by precedent.

It is our hope that an agreed-upon structure for the Council will be forthcoming to assure peace in the Faculty. We foresee a grave danger in a continuing faculty-student stand-off, namely, the temptation for administrators to take unilateral executive action in the interests of "getting things done." We see in parity, where it is appropriate, a guarantee that staff and students will be able to work in mutual respect and harmony so that they may determine their own lives. We would hope that administrators, by active participation in the work of Council and in voting to influence its decisions would feel themselves integral parts of the Council and responsible to it for the executive decisions they take.

(d) Specific Recommendations

(1) The meetings of the Council and its committees shall be normally open, with the committees being required to petition to the Council for permission to set any other policy for their meetings.

(2) The Council shall instruct the Dean's Office to negotiate with the various student and faculty organizations to set up election times and procedures which are convenient for these organizations.

(3) Each elected member of the Council shall be empowered to appoint one named alternate from his/her constituency to act as full voting member in his/her absence, and each member and alternate shall be eligible for full membership on the committees of the Council. We further recommend that because of the special difficulties with representation faced by part-time students that they be allowed two legal alternates for each member which they have on the Council.

(4) A quorum of 100 shall be set for meetings of the Council and a quorum of 50% of the membership set for any committee except the divisional committees.

(5) The Council shall meet regularly but infrequently (we suggest not more than four times in each academic session).

(6) The Council shall meet at such time in the day as will allow a full debate before policy items on the agenda are voted on. (With the Council as structured, and with the responsibilities as outlined, full-day meetings may be desirable).

(7) The Dean's Office shall set up an appeals procedure to the Council which allows:

(a) Special Meetings of the Council to be called for matters of substantial importance;

(b) Items to be added to the agenda of the regularly scheduled meetings which have been considered and rejected by the Steering Committee.

This appeals-procedure should be presented for approval to the first meeting of the Council as restructured.

This last recommendation supports the principle that the Council should be directly accessible to its constituents provided that any item proposed for consideration has enough support to meet the requirements of the appeals-procedure.

(8) The basic structural composition of this Council shall be reviewed by an internal Review Committee after the Council has met for two full academic sessions.

(9) For the purpose of election constituencies, teaching staff in Arts and Science shall be defined as those members of the Faculty of the rank of lecturer and above, excluding those administrators who are specifically defined in the recommendations for the administrative estate.

The Council described above and the Committees about to be described below depend for their proposed operations upon assumptions about the proper business of the Council and the proper delegation of authority. These matters, especially the functions of the Council, were discussed at length by our Committee. We noted that the present General Committee has spent little of its time initiating and debating new policies in the fundamental areas of academic concern, but has instead followed the custom of reviewing matters where decision and debate might best be assigned to committees, or, in many cases, to individual departments.

Our proposals try to make it possible for the Council to develop new areas of study, to give proper attention to proposals concerning part-time students and their likely increase in numbers, to reconsider admissions policy (who comes to University and why), and to include on its agenda such matters as student identity in the New Programme, the relations between teaching and research, the University's changing role in teaching teachers, the relations of the Faculty and the University to outside agencies and the general public, the relations between the colleges and between the colleges and the University, etc. In particular, we are anxious for budgetary decisions and the allocation of resources to be openly discussed, first in the proposed new Budget

(c) General Procedures and Principles of Membership in the Council

Within the past two years "the principle of parity" has become part of university rhetoric, and this Committee and then in the Council. But for most details of curriculum and of evaluation methods we are proposing decentralization to at least the departmental level.

We do, however, wish to assign to Divisional Committees the function of mutual communication between departments on curriculum and evaluation changes and the function of preparing reports on these changes for the Steering Committee. But their powers should be mainly advisory and they are not expected to bring decisions to Council for ratification except where the Steering Committee considers such decisions to involve important departures in policy.

SECTION III: STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE COUNCIL

(a) Introduction

We have examined the functions and membership of the existing Faculty committees and are making proposals about the retention of many, the elimination of some, and the addition of others. These recommendations attempt to implement our principles with respect to devolution of authority to the areas where it is most efficiently and justly held.

(b) Committees

Committees of the Council are normally to be struck by Council and shall consist of ten members. Students and teaching staff are each entitled to two, but not more than five representatives on any Committee. Teaching Assistants and administrators are each entitled to at least one, but not more than three representatives. In this way, each constituency on the Council is assured of some, but not excessive, representation on each Committee. In the event that the Council, while applying these rules, cannot elect the full complement to any Committee, then the rules should not be applied in choosing the remaining members either by election by the Council or by the elected members of the Committee exercising power to add.

Because of the special role of the Steering Committee relative to other Committees, it shall be larger, specifically, 21 members, and the constituencies represented on the Council shall be represented on that Committee in the same proportions as on the Council, namely, 8 students, 8 teaching staff, 2 teaching assistants and 2 administrators, with the Dean of the Faculty as Chairman.

Committee Functions and Procedures

1. Steering Committee (without legislative power)

- (a) Set agendas for the meeting of the Council (which must be approved by that Council.)
- (b) Receive all reports from all Committees and decide on their disposition (with the restriction that anyone may request a copy of a particular report and be entitled to it, even if he is not a member of the Council.)
- (c) Review carefully all reports to determine if they require policy changes by Council, and if they do, this Committee shall have the power to request that a clear statement of the policy change involved be framed by the Committee or persons writing that report so that it would be possible for the Council to vote on that policy change at its next regular meeting.
- (d) Prepare nominations for Standing Committees to suggest to Council; recommend the creation of "ad hoc" Committees as required and act as the striking committee for such Committees.
- (e) Receive requests for additions to the agenda of the Council and refer them to Committees when possible or needed.

2. Budget Committee (without legislative power)

- (a) Must have access to all budgetary information affecting the Faculty, including, however, only blocks of salary allocations. (e.g., Department allocations). Individual salaries are not its concern.
- (b) Must be an open Committee except where the Council has a specific policy for it to move in camera for specific areas of discussion.
- (c) Receive reports on new curriculum developments and particular requests for funds and then recommend priorities and total needs to the Council, which in turn will recommend to the Dean or proper financing body.
- (d) Discuss and recommend to the Council the broad distribution policy of the actual budget.

3. Interdisciplinary Committee (normally reports to the Council through the Steering Committee, but can insist on reporting directly)

- (a) Coordinate and discuss the ongoing interdisciplinary courses sponsored by the Faculty.
- (b) Act as idea generator for new experimental courses and area studies.
- (c) Recommend the formation of new departments or groups of courses.

(c) Develop and maintain communication among the Departments in each Division and promote interaction between Divisions.

(d) Report to the Steering Committee on the curriculum and related changes in each Division for that academic year. The Steering Committee will decide whether policy changes are required and will pass those on to the Council.

5. Timetable and Accommodation Committee (basically an administrative Committee, struck by the Dean's Office)

(a) Set the timetable for the Faculty.

(b) Advise on needs for room allocation.

(c) Fix the examination timetable of the Faculty.

6. Registration and Enrollment Committee

(a) Recommend a registration and Enrollment policy for the Faculty with respect to procedures, dates, scheduling, etc.

(c) Consider in the spring who is to be exempted from regulations with respect to suspension, refusal to further registration in the Faculty, etc.

(d) Consider interpretations of regulations with respect to standing and, where desirable, recommend to Council through the Steering Committee changes in these regulations.

9. Petitions Committee

(a) Recommend general policy of individual petitions to the Council through the Steering Committee.

(b) Rule on individual petitions, provided that it remains within the bounds of adopted Council policy

10. Committee on Study Elsewhere

We recommend that the new Council devolve the functions of this Committee to the Departments and the Dean's Office in consultation.

11. Committee on Scholarships and Other Awards

We recommend to the new Council that the functions of this Committee normally be undertaken by the Secretary of the Faculty who will represent the Council through the Steering Committee.

12. Evaluation Committee

We recommend to the new Council that most of the duties of this Committee (such as exemption from examinations by individual courses) be devolved to the departmental level. Evaluation matters that need discussion may be raised in the Divisional Committees and reported to the Steering Committee, which will decide whether they need consideration by the Council.

SECTION IV: RELATION TO THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO ACT AND THE EXISTING FACULTY COUNCIL

(a) Introduction

The Committee recognized that changes in the University of Toronto Act would require a good deal of time, but also recognized the great importance of bringing about immediate change in the governing of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

(b) Recommendations

(i) The existing Council of the Faculty as defined in the University of Toronto Act shall devolve its powers to the restructured Council as described in this report.

(ii) Upon amendment of the University of Toronto Act the legal Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science shall become the Council as described in this report.

Engineers will vote on remaining in SAC

Engineers will be voting before the end of the year whether or not to remain in SAC, according to the Engineering Society's new president, Eric Miglin.

Miglin, the present SAC vice-president, was elected Friday by about 80 per cent of the 590 voters in the Eng Soc elections.

On the same ballot engineers were asked whether they wanted to negotiate a new arrangement with SAC.

According to Miglin, well over 80 per cent voted yes on the question, and many of those who cast a 'no' vote, wanted to pull out of SAC completely, rather than merely re-negotiate.

Miglin, although he sees the need for a central campus organization, "has been a bit disappointed the way SAC has worked out."

"It can't make itself completely a political organization," said Miglin, who favours a balance between dances and activism.

Miglin also hopes to "change the Toike Oike a little bit."

U.S. birdmen come north

The U.S. Air Force Band is performing in Toronto Saturday night, with a little help from the U of T Faculty of Music ticket salesmen, but a planned picket line could inspire the wild yonder blues.

The Faculty committee on Vietnam has voiced objections to the university's co-operation with the concert, and has urged the Faculty of Music to stop selling tickets, and students to join the picket line.

At this very instant, according to U.S. Senator George McGovern, the U.S. Air Force is committing the cruelest and most barbaric crimes since Hitler; any co-operation with the U.S. Air Force is deplorable," charged the committee.

"According to Le Monde, the explosives dropped in the last five years in Southeast Asia by the U.S. are equivalent to the force of 500 Hiroshima-type atomic bombs," the committee stated.

Last May, the U.S. Army Field and Soldier's Chorus' performance in Regina was disrupted, and twelve demonstrators were charged with "participating in a riot."

The trial of the demonstrators proved farcical as prosecution witnesses could not pick the alleged rioters out in the courtroom, and descriptions of the defendants' apparel by witnesses were contradictory. Charges against the twelve were dropped.

The Air Force Band will perform at the CNE's Queen Elizabeth Theatre at 8 p.m. Saturday. Details of the planned demonstration will be announced in Wednesday's Varsity.

Although Blues gave up nine goals in winning two playoff games over the weekend, the defensive corps was by no means outplayed. Here, veteran Bill L'Heureux and Grant Cole cover a rebound.

Defencemen lead scoring

"That's the third goal I've been wrongly credited with this year," commented Swanick after the game. "The scores really belong to Billy (Buba), Scotty (Seagrist) and Nicky (Holmes)." Sunday's goal was a shot from the point that appeared to deflect in off Holmes' skate as the left winger cruised in front of the Queen's net.

Lysonek and Peterman shared goal scoring honors with three each. Peterman, Western Division scoring champ, produced a hat-trick against Carleton, setting the stage for Lysonek's eventual winner.

First-year star Davies played strong defensively in both games and gave Blues' a crucial 3-2 lead Sunday with a perfect wrist shot during a Varsity power-play.

Hickox got the first goal of the final on a blistering 50-foot slapshot and Wright notched the opening goal against Carleton, tapping home a rebound on a power-play.

Ironically, power-plays were almost Varsity's undoing as Carleton clicked on no less than four occasions with the man-power advantage and Queen's struck twice.

Penalties were almost even in the semi-final but in Sunday's final Blues' took seven of nine minors with Swanick and Nels Debenedet serving two apiece.

Although Blues retained the Queen's Cup, Gael's classy centre Morris Mott was the individual standout of the tournament, producing four goals and five assists. Mott and winger John Smith sparked Queen's rally against Waterloo as the Gaels scored five second-period goals to overcome a two-goal deficit.

Let's Get It Straight

THE NEW MORALITY

"I wish you wouldn't talk so much about sin," said a church member to his pastor. "The more our young people hear about it the more easily they'll become sinners. Call it a mistake if you will, but don't say so much about sin."

The minister took down a bottle of strychnine that was marked "Poison" and said, "What if I were to label this 'Essence of Peppermint'? Don't you see that the milder you make the label the more dangerous you make the poison?"

The "New Morality" sounds attractively modern, but it is just the same filthy brew stirred up by Satan in the Garden of Eden, under a false label. The Bible never hesitates to call sin by the blackest name it can find. "Filthiness," it calls it - not "human weakness" or "psychological instability." It is sin, corrupt and death-dealing, and no whitewashing can change it.

A young man interrupted an evangelist with the challenge, "You talk about the burden of sin, yet I feel none. How heavy is it? Eighty pounds? Ten pounds?" The preacher countered with another question: "Tell me, if you laid four hundred pounds weight on a corpse, would it feel the load?" "No, because it is dead," replied the young man. "That man's spirit is dead, too, that feels no sin," replied the evangelist. If you feel no guilt about breaking the Ten Commandments, you are spiritually dead, even if you don't realize it.

Maybe you think you haven't committed any great sins. Consider the Indian proverb that says, "There is no distinction between big and little, when talking about snakes. They are all alike - snakes." Apart from God, no man is righteous. And the self-righteous are the worst sinners of all, for they have set up their own standards in place of God's, and feel no lack in themselves, no need for redemption by Jesus Christ who died to make them acceptable to God.

Hockey Blues win 6th OQAA title

OTTAWA — Varsity Blues won their sixth consecutive OQAA hockey championship here yesterday afternoon with a thrilling, come-from-behind 5-4 victory over the cinderella Queen's University Golden Gaels.

Queen's, runners-up in the Eastern Division, gained the final with an exciting 8-5 decision over the Western Division pennant winners Waterloo Warriors. However, in the championship game, Blues' depth and playoff experience were the decisive factors.

Varsity's victorious coach Tom Watt credited Queen's with an outstanding performance. "If you can pinpoint a difference between the two teams," he said, "I think it was our depth. All three of our forward lines played a regular shift in both games. Queen's seemed to rely heavily on their two top lines, so in the latter part of the third period we appeared to be a little fresher."

REBOUND TO OUST RAVENS

Blues gave a loyal contingent of 75 highly vocal Varsity fans a rare treat in Saturday's semi-final against the Carleton Ravens by coming from behind twice before emerging with a close 6-5 victory.

For the most part, Blues' success stemmed from several unsung heroes who didn't receive much publicity during the regular season's play.

Right-winger Kas Lysonek, a most welcome transfer from Laurentian University, scored the winning goals in both games. Sidelined with pneumonia early in the season, Lysonek replaced the departed Mike Boland beside captain John Wright and Gord Davies. With three goals in the two games, the Sudbury native should be in top form when Blues compete in the CIAU championships scheduled for his home town March 11, 12 and 13.

Rookie utility forward Scott Seagrist gave a strong performance in both games with clutch, aggressive penalty killing and a series of punishing body-checks. Seagrist's hustle paid off in the second period of the final against Queen's when he and Mac Hickox were killing off Brent Swanick's holding penalty.

Netminder Grant Cole steered a Queen's shot out to the Varsity blueline where Hickox gained control of the puck and fed a pass to Seagrist who skated in alone and coolly picked the top right-hand corner of the net. The goal tied the score at 2-2 and Blues never trailed thereafter.

Another clutch display was turned in by centre Brent Imlach, who starred two years at Western but has been restricted to limited service with Blues this year due to a recurring groin injury. One of the most effective face-off men in amateur hockey, Imlach worked his magic in two similar last-minute situations.

DRAMA IN FINAL SECONDS

The last 30 seconds of the championship game contained enough excitement to last an entire season. Blues had just successfully weathered their fourth consecutive penalty when Terry Peterman fired a loose puck down the ice to relieve the pressure. The puck, however, glanced off an official's skate and when Brian St. John couldn't control it, Queen's quickly regrouped for another rush.

Massive Dave Field, a former Varsity all-star defenceman now in Medical School at Queen's, trapped the puck just inside the Varsity blueline. It was almost a David and Goliath situation as Blues' Mac Hickox battled Field for the puck. Hickox was knocked to the ice but somehow managed to slap the puck into the centre ice area. Seconds later, Queen's were back but L'Heureux and Dave McDowall teamed up to force a face-off with only three seconds remaining.

With four centres to choose from, Watt settled on Imlach and that was it.

Saturday night's game saw an identical situation as Carleton scored at 19:37 of the third to cut Blues' lead to 6-5, then forced a face-off at 19:57. This time also, the choice was Imlach and again the results were successful. Imlach also picked up three assists at key junctures.

Although Blues scored 11 goals in the two games, two defencemen, McDowall and Swanick, emerged as the team's leading point-getters. McDowall, who finally achieved the all-star recognition denied him last year in his rookie campaign, registered four assists including three in yesterday's final with the Gaels. Swanick gave Blues a 4-3 lead over Queen's with a goal late in the second period and in addition picked up three assists.

Swimmers gain 6th CIAU crown

By ANNE LLOYD

In what was described as "the fastest indoor short course meet of the year", the U of T swim team successfully defended its unofficial CIAU team title and took home what looked like a very official team trophy from the national intercollegiate swim championships held at the University of Waterloo on the weekend.

Although Varsity had only a seven-point lead after the first night's events, some exciting and determined performances on Saturday left no doubt that Blues would take the title. Final standings show U of T first with 364.5 points, U of Alberta second with 301, McGill third with 262 and UBC fourth with 123.

Highlighting Friday night's events was Jim Shaw's CIAU and Canadian record-breaking swim in the 200-yard backstroke. It was a classic race with Jim outlasting John Hawes of McGill, the man who beat him for the Commonwealth Games team. Shaw's time was 2:00.3 in an excellent performance.

FEDKO TAKES TWO SECONDS

For smiling Alex Fedko, it was the first of two frustrating evenings — frustrating chiefly because on both occasions (the 200 and 400 individual medleys), he came up against Doug Jamieson of U of A. Jamieson took both events setting CIAU records on the way. Although Alex had looked a little tired on the mornings of his heats, he turned in a solid race for second in the 200 I.M. Alex also swam a fine leg in the 400 freestyle relay, but again to no avail. Both McGill and Toronto finished under the old CIAU record, with McGill out-touching Toronto for the win. All eight swimmers on the two teams went under 50 seconds for their leg in the race. Swimming for Varsity were John Twohig, Fedko, Doug MacIntosh and Jim Adams.

Adams just missed setting a CIAU record as he won the 50 free in 22.0, one tenth of a second over the mark held by Theo Van Ryn (alias Theo Von Rin second cousin of Rin Tin Tin, as the Waterloo PA announced). MacIntosh also swam a fine race in the 50 free, just losing third on a judge's decision.

Other Varsity performances Friday evening were as follows: Twohig and Bob Heatley finished 1-2 in the 200 butterfly consolation final (Bob also took a fifth in the 200 I.M.); Terry Bryon took a sixth in the 200 fly and won the consolation I.M.; Nick Rottman chased Ken Fowler of Western to a CIAU record time in the 200 breaststroke; MacIntosh took second in the 200 free consolation; Ross Ballantyne stopped snapping his fingers long enough to take fifth in the consolation backstroke and a sixth in the 200 backstroke final.

BLUES WIDEN MARGIN

On Saturday it was a different story. With coach Robin Campbell recovered from the flu, Blues set out to widen the gap between themselves and Alberta.

MacIntosh took off in fine form to win the consolation final in the 100 butterfly. Inspired by this performance, or perhaps determined to go out on a winning note, Heatley won the final in the 100 fly, setting a CIAU record of 52.6, beating his old record of 52.7. Twohig was fourth; Shaw took sixth.

Ballantyne swam "a man's race" to win the 100 breaststroke. Although his time of 1:00.7 is well off the record, Ross's performance really "separated the men from the boys" to use his expression, as the second place swimmer was a full second behind. Rottman, Varsity's promising young breaststroke specialist, took fourth.

SHAW BEATS HAWES AGAIN

Shaw had an interesting rematch with Hawes of McGill in the 100 back, as Shaw won the race in 55.0, with Twohig fourth. Adams showed the results of ten minutes of careful coaching in backstroke turns as he won the consolation final in the same event.

In the 400 medley relay, Toronto's team of Bryon, Shaw, Ballantyne and Heatley went out in 3:44.4 to take the final event and sew up the title. Alberta finished second in that race and McGill third.

Rookie Rottman gallantly hid his disappointment at not being allowed to enter the three-metre diving and took a fourth in the consolation finals of the 400 I.M. Coach Campbell was more than pleased with Nick's performance and is expecting even more from him next season, but certainly not as a diver.

The team title, though unofficial, was the most closely contested of the meet as the overwhelming strength of the Eastern teams made the conference race a pure farce. The OQAA won the conference title with 829.5 points. The WIAC was second with 528.5, and the other conferences weren't even close.

Force doors open

Students scuffle with cops

Faculty resist mill-in

By ALEX PODNICK and ART MOSES

U of T students scuffled with campus police and faculty Monday afternoon before the doors to a closed meeting of the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Arts and Science Dean Albert Allen finally ordered the doors open allowing all into the meeting. For the third time business of the General Committee was procedurally disrupted.

Students who had arrived an hour early for a strategy meeting in the foyer of the Medical Sciences Auditorium were unable to get in past campus police.

They milled around the doors instead.

Students decided to have their representatives attend the meeting to move that it be open.

If the student motion were defeated, their representatives were to walk out, opening the doors for the rest of the students to enter.

As faculty arrived for the meeting, scuffling broke out between them and students who had blocked the doors.

As more and more faculty arrived tension and anger grew. A photographer with the U of T Information Department had his camera deliberately smashed by a demonstrator who objected to having his picture taken. Both police and students were pulled to the ground in the confusion.

After hurried consultations with student and faculty leaders, Arts and Science Dean Albert Allen

The Varsity — Erol Young

Prof Nelson opens the doors to students at Arts and Science Council meeting Monday afternoon came out and reminded students, "As you all know it's a closed meeting to the members of the Faculty Council." However, he told them that no one would physically prevent anyone from entering the building.

J. R. Vanstone, associate professor of Mathematics, kept lunging into the crowd of students blocking the doors. He threw his fists at them wildly as they chanted "don't fight" and tried to calm him.

According to some observers, UC principal Archie Hallett was punched in the nose by a student. Students had expected Hallett to be chairman of the General Committee meeting, but he was apparently too upset by the incident to chair the meeting and was replaced by Allen.

Hallett denied that he was punched. He told The Varsity that he was merely "bounced about" by the crowd.

Hallett said Allen had been prepared to suggest that Hallett be chairman of the meeting, but the manner in which the meeting had started had prevented this move.

After moving inside, SAC Education Commissioner Bob Spencer proposed that all regular business be tabled and called for a special debate to discuss the current crisis situation in the faculty.

Allen ruled the motion out of order. He was challenged by student General Committee representative Norm Rogers who asked that the ayes and nays be counted.

In disgust, one faculty committee member moved that the meeting be adjourned. Allen ignored this motion and took the vote. The chair was sustained.

Student committee member Bob James immediately rose to request an emergency debate about the crisis. After more procedural wrangling, Allen ruled that such a motion must have unanimous consent. Political Science professor Peter Silcox denied this consent.

Physics professor Derek Pau had supported the motion for an emergency debate, stating his willingness to stay until midnight if necessary to continue the discussion.

Rogers then began a lengthy procedural debate about the inaccuracy of the minutes of the previous General Committee meeting.

As he continued proposing amendments to the minutes, faculty members became restless. Several began taunting him and other student speakers.

After 40 minutes, a faculty motion to adjourn the meeting was successful. Most of the irritated faculty members hurriedly left the meeting, while a few remained for a student-faculty meeting to decide what to do next.

Disruption may cost library worker his job

U of T Registrar Robin Ross Monday threatened possible dismissal of part-time library worker, Tony Leah, in retaliation for his presence at Monday's disruption of the Arts and Science General Committee meeting.

Although he was overheard discussing possible legal action against students active in the disruption with U of T's chief of security, The Varsity has been unable to confirm whether action has in fact been taken by U of T.

Ross was attempting to identify activist students during the General Committee meeting. If it was possible to get just a few names of these students, they could be prosecuted, he told the security chief (who refused to give his name), and another official.

Ross was particularly irritated by the presence of a student, Tony

Leah, employed part-time in the library at the disruption. "Well, why don't we dismiss him?", he asked his associates. "He's here today at a perfectly unauthorized meeting."

Leah returns to work for the first time since the disruption today. He has not yet been informed that he has been dismissed.

Leah, a member of the Canadian Parity of Labour, claims Ross followed him into the Medical Sciences Auditorium and sat down behind him. When Leah left to make a phone call, Ross shadowed him, according to Leah.

Leah says Ross stopped him as he left the building, demanding he identify himself and accompany Ross to the campus security centre. Ross grew angrier with his refusal to answer his questions, especially his persistent inquiry about whether Leah is a registered student, Leah recounts.

Leah is a third year sociology student.

The Varsity attempted to contact Ross Tuesday afternoon and evening, but he was unavailable for comment.

Ross has been observed at at least one previous General Committee meeting trying vainly to identify student disrupters.

Students leave peacefully

Identity card sit-in ends in Mtl police invasion

MONTREAL (CUP 1) — Police Monday ousted some 500 students who had barricaded themselves in the basement cafeteria of the CEGEP Vieux Montreal following a dispute over identity cards.

The students objected to being asked for identification each time they entered the building. They also said the administration was being aggressive by inviting Montreal police to stay at the school.

For the past week and a half city policemen have been in the school watching students to prevent any action by them against the repressive measures of the administration.

On Feb. 18, students occupied an arts building after the administration told them they could not return to classes until they signed a declaration to observe new rules outlined by the administration for classroom behaviour.

Since then police have been checking the identity cards for everybody who wished to enter the building.

Monday a group of students surrounded six policemen and pushed them into a corner. One of the police was slapped across the face.

The administration then decided to call in the riot squad to restore order; but by the time police reinforcements arrived about 500 students had barricaded themselves in the basement cafeteria.

Pushing tables and chairs against the door they began to sing and shout slogans urging students to go into the streets.

At 3 p.m., roughly two hours after the demonstration began, the students were evicted by riot-equipped policemen.

When the police moved into the cafeteria the students left peacefully without incident.

Once outside the school the evicted students paraded around the streets, then headed for L'Ecole des Metiers trade school where the riot squad had to evacuate another 1,000 students.

Direct charge co-op saves consumers money

About 40 people met Monday night to discuss the possibility of setting up a member-controlled food co-operative, which may be going by next fall.

The co-op as envisioned by organizer David Weston will be able to save its members about 20% of the cost of food at comparable supermarkets, even accounting for the large chain discount war (which is dying in any case).

Weston described the proposal as a 'direct charge' co-op, in which each member would pay membership charges of approximately $5 per three month period until an upper limit of about $50 had been reached (these credits could be accumulated even if not continuously obtained).

There would also be a weekly charge of about two dollars to cover operating expenses, which would be owed whether or not the service was used each week. This would allow the selling of food and household goods at cost.

An umbrella organization, United Co-operatives of Ontario

(UCO), with which the new co-op (at the moment nameless) may affiliate, could act as a wholesaler and thus obtain even lower prices.

A survey basket of goods produced by Weston at the meeting showed the co-op would save about $4 on an A and P store basket of $18.

A survey by the Canadian grocer last November of 30 supermarkets and an Oshawa co-op shows that as a percentage of sales, supermarket overhead costs are 19%, co-op, 9.4%.

A co-op run by the members also has the option of the types of goods to be bought. Free-range chickens, returnable pop bottles and union picked fruit and vegetables are examples of goods that could be exclusively bought.

Some of the persons attending the meeting suggested a dividend co-op instead of a direct charge co-op might be preferred.

A dividend co-op normally charges an annual fee and obtains operating costs by levying a fixed percentage on each good bought. Members get a 'dividend' at the end of the year depending on profits in proportion to the goods bought.

The argument in favour of these is that they would allow non-member participation and thus become much more open to the community. They could become the basis for further community projects and organization.

A direct charge co-op would be inflexible in that only members could shop, because goods would have to be ordered the previous week.

Weston explained that the direct charge co-op could allow non-members one shop without paying a membership fee to attract more members.

Ralph Staples of UCO added that most dividend co-ops in Canada have either folded or changed over to direct charge. It would appear that one of the problems of a dividend co-op is that the necessary stocking of goods causes larger costs.

The meeting voted for a direct charge co-op.

One of the chief organization problems is finding a suitable location in the mid-town area west of Yonge St. Any suggestion would be welcome.

The next meeting will be on Monday March 15 at 60 Lowther fruit.

Proposal for female HH members no replacement for campus centre

By next year, if a presidential advisory commission report is accepted, Hart House will allow women through its massive male gates the first time since its opening in 1919.

Yesterday Varsity reporter David Lloyd put his finger and a tape-recorder in the wind of campus opinion to find out what people thought of women in Hart House. Hart House Porter: "Let's put it this way: no comment." Michael Gorrman (SGS-Classics): "It seems very strange that women are excluded. Also what's strange is that you just don't have the capital here to develop a big-time student centre. That's obviously what you need. Whether Hart House can be turned into that is a question. This place is so tiny for a university of 30,000 people. It's really incredible."

"I guess the problem is getting money out of the university for a student centre. It would be nice to turn this into an art centre, a co-ed art centre, but I could see where the Massey Foundation doesn't want to open the floodgate because the place would be ruined just physically by a lot of people." Joe Smith (II Vic): "I think women should be allowed, but if they use all the facilities they should pay the fees that the males are paying. The money could be used to expand the facilities. It would be a good idea to add on and make Hart House an art centre since it's already a kind of centre."

Maria Felice (GSU-Humanities): "I don't think women should be allowed in Hart House. Why shouldn't men have a place where they can sit and be quiet and not have women there? Why can't women have a donor who was as generous as Vincent Massey was? Anonymous (III Vic): "There's no reason to object to women in Hart House. The big problem is that there's no student centre. Not that Hart House qualifies as any great centre, but it's the closest thing we have to solve the problems."

Jouni Knaff (SGS-Chemistry): "Hart House should be co-educational — we can follow the example of the Americans in their attitude toward the female sex."

Dave Johnson (SGS-Math): "I think it would be a good idea to make Hart House into a general campus centre. The sports facilities should be put somewhere else. I came from a smaller university where there was a common meeting area. It would be a good idea for a campus like this for students to have a place to meet."

Trudeau will brave crowds and outhouse for dinner tonight

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau may be able to use some of his pungent prose this evening as he faces a Poor People's Banquet, outside the Royal York Hotel, where wealthy Liberals will meet at $50 a head to honour the chief.

The annual Liberal fund-raising banquet will be the target of the jobless and poor protesting rising unemployment. As Trudeau steps out of his Detroit machine, a pickup truck will deposit another speaker in front of the Royal York to address the demonstrators.

Guerrilla theatre, using an outhouse so as to take advantage of the Prime Minister's penchant for defecatory material, will be performed outside the hotel.

The banquet will consist of Bologna sandwiches, which people are asked to provide themselves. It is sponsored by the Committee for a Free Quebec, Guerrilla, the Woman's Liberation Movement, the Young Communist League, PLUS, the Donvale Tenants' Association, the South of Carleton Tenants' Association, the Ontario Tenants' Association, the Just Society, MACE, Queen and Coxwell Welfare Rights.

Daycare centre to be given operating licence

The long-suffering Campus Community Day-Care Centre may finally be awarded an operating licence next week.

For the past 1½ years, parents and volunteers have been operating the centre illegally while awaiting approval from the province's Day Nurseries Branch.

The major stumbling block has been in getting "properly trained" staff for the centre. Government regulations stipulate that a nursery have at least one official trained either by the Nursery Nurses Education Board of England, a school for nannies, or by Mothercraft (a course with limited enrollment offered at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.)

Parents have insisted on their right to choose the staff they want.

The break in the deadlock came this week, when after 2½ days of hearings before the DNB, Director Elsie Stapleford proposed a compromise to the daycare people.

The centre would form an Advisory Board of professionals from the community, including doctors, psychiatrists and social workers. Using this board as a consultative body, the day care centre would not be forced to hire special staff.

According to a spokeswoman from the centre, other problems with the government have been cleared up. The operations, on 12 Sussex Ave., have been approved by both health and building inspectors.

If the centre gets its licence, it will not have been without a long fight. At the hearings last week, a battery of six field supervisors from the DNB laid into the daycare centre for being too unstructured. Criticism was also directed at the practice of having men care for small children.

Even before the centre became involved with government, it had to battle the university for space and money to house the operation. Only after a sit-in staged in Simcoe Hall last spring, did U of T's administration cough up money to renovate the Sussex St. house

Arts and Sci general assembly meets in week

Arts and Science faculty and students will vote next Thursday in a General Assembly on the proposals of the 6-6-3 parity restructuring committee report.

Classes may be cancelled next Wednesday and Thursday afternoons for the Assembly.

The decision of the assembly will not be binding on the Faculty Council. However, Norm Rogers, a student member of the assembly steering committee, told a Monday meeting of faculty and students that any decisions made by it would be "very weighty".

The assembly was suggested by faculty and students following the disruption of yesterday's General Committee meeting.

Students elected by the meeting met with History professor W. H. Nelson Tuesday afternoon and report that he is willing to work with them.

The students will meet today with a group of faculty, including some conservatives, interested in helping plan the assembly. They are optimistic about having their proposal accepted.

Mac students strike over U.S. hirings in poli sci

HAMILTON — McMaster political science students are boycotting classes as of Monday, to protest the lack of Canadian courses and the over-representation of Americans on the faculty.

The strike was sparked by the failure of the administration to hire a Canadian professor for any of the four professorships presently open in the Canadian politics section.

Students have no representation in any of the hiring committees.

While there are no picket lines, and apparently some students are still attending classes, the boycott is to continue for the week.

The Silhouette, the McMaster student paper, reports that neither the faculty or the administration has taken any action on the boycott.

Gallery now private club as wine flows at Hart House

By ERIC "CUISINE" RUMP

Vincent Massey's ghost might blanch, but Hart House has now supplemented its Black Hart pub by making beer and wine available at meals in the upper gallery of the Great Hall.

The Gallery Dining Room is a little-known island of serenity where Hart House members can be served a genteel lunch or dinner served at table. Steaks as well as Great Hall fare are available.

Starting Monday a modest beer, wine and sherry list was offered to diners. The catch to obtaining a liquor license was turning the Gallery into a private club.

All members (men only, of course) of Hart House may purchase a membership card for $1. Members may escort anyone as their guests, however. Those under 21 receive a special card not entitling them to buy beer or wine.

Profs petition against War Measures Act

Over 20 well-known Toronto figures, including U of T political economy professor C. Brough Macpherson and Globe and Mail sports editor Dick Beddoes have signed a statement protesting the trials held in Quebec under the War Measures Act.

The statement which has been refused publication in all three major Toronto daily papers is reprinted below.

We believe the future of freedom in Canada depends on public understanding of the current Quebec trials, and the issues they raise:

The federal government, contrary to its implied promises of last October, produced no evidence to justify the use of the War Measures Act and the passage of the Public Order Act.

These Acts are being used not to prosecute criminal activity but to suppress political opinion, in the same way opinion is suppressed in fascist and communist states. Since these are federal Acts, all Canadians must accept responsibility for this situation.

The trials of those now charged under the WMA are not criminal but political trials. Canadians now face prison sentences not for what they do but for they think and say. We do not refer to the charges relating to kidnapping and murder.

The War Measures Act is being used, therefore, not as most Canadians expected it to be used — to oppose violent revolution but as a means to silence political opposition.

We believe freedom and democracy in Canada will be best served if the federal government withdraws the Public Order Act immediately, and if the Quebec government withdraws the indictments under the War Measures Act. We urge that the Canadian and Quebec governments be petitioned to do so.

Last, we urge especially that English-speaking Canadians, who have been shamefully silent on this issue, speak out against this perversion of Canadian justice.

"I'm preaching a political philosophy directed towards democracy . . ."

Meeting the people . . .

Prime Minister Trudeau has not visited Toronto for more than a year now (unless you count a quick excursion to the Grey Cup Game last fall, where he put his ceremonial boot to the ceremonial kick-off.)

He was supposed to be in Toronto in early June — for an open meeting at the Town Hall, where he would "meet the people" and conduct one of his off-the-cuff tutorials in the rudiments of political science.

But Trudeau's advance men had taken the pulse of the city accurately that time, and warned him he had nothing to win — and a lot to lose — if he turned up for an open meeting, where all sorts of ordinary riff-raff might ask embarrassing questions. So, he cancelled out.

Today, however, Trudeau is coming back to Toronto.

Social conditions have changed little since the summer — except to worsen. Unemployment, his strongarm tactics in Quebec, and his own personal arrogant disinterest in the plight of the victims of his political decisions, have all turned Canadians more and more against him.

But tonight, Trudeau is on business. He is attending a $50-a-plate Liberal Party fund-raising dinner at the Royal York Hotel, on Front St.

Of the more than 2100 people expected to dine with Trudeau, 80 per cent of them will have obtained their tickets from corporations and businesses they work for.

Net profits on tonight's dinner (after the food has been paid for) are expected to be more than $70,000. Profits will be divided almost evenly between two Liberal war-chests — the Toronto party's and the provincial party's.

So you can see why Trudeau won't miss this engagement.

As you can read in today's paper, people who can't afford the price of admission — and that includes a very large number of people — are organizing to show their opposition to Trudeau and what he stands for.

At a similar gathering early last year — when the people turned out at a Calgary fund-raising dinner — Trudeau was forced to come out and meet with the people.

And by doing this, he let people catch a glimpse of the iron fist behind his famous visions of a Just Society.

The Just Society, he retorted to a challenge, "That's just a slogan."

It's up to everybody who believes in achieving a just social system to come out and force Trudeau to "meet the people."

Let him show where his real loyalties lie.

The Argus — Ken Campbell

Even The Varsity had a women's editor. . .

THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO was one of the last universities on the North American continent to admit women students on an equal basis.

Although women had been allowed to receive degrees as early as 1877, they were not permitted to take instruction and lectures until the great revolution of 1885.

In 1885 the doors of University College, the secular college of the university, were thrown open to women. That year there were 11 women registered at U of T.

RESISTANCE TO THE ADMISSION of women took many forms, including doubts that women could take the same physical and intellectual strain as the men, and that "the promiscuous intermingling of members of both sexes in the College lecture rooms and corridors would lead to intrigues fatal to those who indulged in them and to scandals ruinous to the institution . . ."

At first, it was suggested a separate women's college be established, but lack of money dictated another answer.

There was some adverse reaction to the admission of women. In 1904 one student exclaimed: "THE WOMEN MAKE THE MEN less vigorous and manly, and they do not like girls to know more than they."

Circumstances were forcing the advent of coeducation at sometimes a greater rate than male values could accommodate.

As enrollment increased, suggestions were again made to set up separate women's colleges, but this was dropped because it would mean the expense of new buildings and a doubling of the lecture load.

THE GREATEST SETBACK the cause of equality for men and women within the university community ever received was the building of Hart House, designated for the exclusive use of men.

Coming after a mounting demands for some kind of social and academic facilities for all students, this private endowment stopped the process of integration short, and has kept it that way for more than 50 years.

The opening of Hart House in 1919 was an added insult because the exclusion of women appeared to denigrate the role women had played during World War I, when they dominated the academic life of the university.

BUT THE EVER-GENEROUS Massey family did not fail to recognize the presence of women on campus in ever-increasing numbers.

While Hart House was to preserve a "masculine" character for the men, the Masseys at the same time endowed a second building, now at the valuable corner of Bloor and Avenue Rd.

THE LILLIAN MASSEY BUILDING was to serve two functions — to provide training in the proper "feminine" pursuits of home economics (it is now the home of the Faculty of Food Sciences, an almost exclusively female faculty), and, secondly, to offer social and recreational facilities to women.

Before construction of the Benson Building as a women's athletic building, the Lillian Massey Building, containing a gym and swimming pool, served as an all-female student union building.

In this way, the Masseys guaranteed that their view of the proper social activities and functions of men and women were embodied in the actual physical structures of the university.

INDIRECTLY, THE POWER OF these two endowments — the Hart and Lillian Massey Buildings — have, for more than 50 years, made the necessity of a co-educational campus centre for social and recreational activities appear an idle and less than urgent dream.

The pattern of separation of men's and women's activities was followed all across campus by students who were being properly socialized into their "male" and "female" roles.

The Victoria College Union, for instance, took a radical step forward when it became the first college council to integrate the running of social clubs and activities at the student level in 1929.

In 1931, The Varsity, which then had a separate women's editor, women's office and women's staff, could remark:

"COEDUCATION HAS DEVELOPED considerably since the days when men and women were given moral gene degenerates if seen walking to lectures together, but it is not yet perfect."

In hoping that co-education could some day be made "perfect", the Varsity was ignoring the fact that men and women are trained to perform entirely different social functions by the nature of the social and educational experiences they go through.

That is why it surprises no one today to learn that of more than 2,300 faculty at U of T, less than one in ten is a woman.

Or that certain faculties are almost exclusively female, while others are the preserve of the male.

That U of T is beginning to recognize at least the surface features of this problem is shown by the recommendations of the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Future Role of Hart House, reported Monday in The Varsity.

Admitting women and other so-called "minority" groups within the university to Hart House would be an important step forward.

BUT NOTHING WILL CHANGE until the very nature of our education begins to eliminate the separation of "male" and "female" roles which it reinforces.

But more on that Friday.

WMA: a lesson for the youth of Quebec?

MONTREAL (CUP — LAST POST) — Although obfuscation and creating confusion are integral parts of his job, special Crown Prosecutor Gabriel Lapointe recently unwittingly authored one of the wiser statements about the wave of repression which began to sweep Quebec on October 16, 1970.

Lapointe was pleading before Judge Roger Ouimet at the sentencing of 22-year-old unemployed Come Leblanc, the first person convicted of an offence under the War Measures Act.

While it would not be right to make Leblanc the scapegoat of "the events of October," Lapointe told the judge, his sentence should be exemplary:

"In providing a penalty of five years for this offense, the legislator wanted to make young people understand that the FLQ is not a sport. He wanted to show those youths who occupy themselves with such activities instead of studying or working, the serious consequences of their acts."

Leblanc received ten months, for "advocating the aims and principles" of the FLQ. The jury which found him guilty of having FLQ ideas had acquitted him of membership in the "unlawful association" and of distributing statements on behalf of it.

What were the "activities" with which Leblanc occupied himself — the activities which young people must be made to understand are no junior olympic games?

According to a "confession" Leblanc made to police, and used as evidence to prove his FLQ connections, the youth participated in numerous Quebec demonstrations since 1968, worked for the Parti Quebecois during the April, 1970, elections, and took a course from radical Quebec historian Leandre Bergeron. He also attended two meetings of the Front de Liberation Populaire and owned a copy of Pierre Vallieres' Negres Blanc D'Amerique.

That's not all. Come Leblanc wore a red-white-and-green patriote tie, had a poster on his living-room wall showing Jesus carrying a rifle, and owned a briefcase which bears a sticker supporting the Lapalme mail-truck drivers. Books seized at his apartment, and entered as evidence, included writings of Marx, Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber, Che, and Tolstoy.

In court, the accused admitted distributing copies of the FLQ manifesto and a leaflet calling for a general strike, before the War Measures Act was introduced. The literature was picked up at a meeting Come Leblanc attended at the University of Montreal, along with about 1,000 other young people, on October 14.

The crown also noted he had been laid off from his job as a brass-polisher, wondered why he had quit school last year (the reason is a lack of money), and considered that his long period of unemployment prior to arrest should be held against him, even Judge Ouimet thought this was stretching things just a bit, and told the jury so.

Finally, it was known that Come Leblanc and his friends spent fair lengths of time engaged in "political discussions".

In Quebec today, there are thousands of young people as guilty as Come Leblanc. Their crimes can not be specified in the laws of a supposedly civilized country. So new laws are made, a few are singled out to serve as examples, to "make young people understand".

There are over 50,000 students in the CEGEPS and another 50,000 in the universities. Over 200,000 Quebecois, many of them young, are officially unemployed. Thousands of others have jobs but feel they are working for nothing. Very many of them go to demonstrations, read Pierre Vallieres, and proudly wear the patriote colors.

Originally, Come Leblanc and four of his friends were to be among the "stars" of the show trials. Their arrest on October 25 was heralded as the dismantling of "an FLQ communication cell". They were charged with seditious conspiracy and became known as "the little five".

It is now evident that they were not attacked because they themselves represent a particularly strong threat to the state, but because countless more will identify with them and, the state hopes, will cease their "activities".

Most of the accused are under 25, long-hairs, students, workers or unemployed, they have varying histories of political activity, ranging from passing interest to full-time movement involvement. In October, most of them were engaged in the series of student strikes and popular assemblies which was just starting to swell when the War Measures Act came crashing down.

Will the repression succeed in silencing the thousands of dissidents still walking the streets? One experienced observer of political movements in Quebec, an older man who has managed to retain a youthful spirit, offered this comment last week:

"The governments are afraid," Michel Chartrand said shortly after his release from jail, "they are afraid of youth and of new ideas, so they put people in prison."

"But they will never have enough armies and police to stop the millions of young people."

An open letter to the students of Biology 120

Six hundred and fifty of us wrote a Biology test on January 25 and 26. Of those who wrote the test on Monday, around 36% failed. Of those who wrote the test on Tuesday, about 70% failed. There were some irregularities around the actual administration of the test (see Bob James' article in the Varsity January 29), but this does not account for the incredible failure rate which actually occurred. One possible explanation is that the test was too long for the time allotted (this is universally agreed on, even by those who administered the test). Also, around half the material on which the test was based was a mechanical system of plant classification — material which could only be memorized.

The faculty members for the course met over Reading Week to try and straighten out the marks. The solution that they came up with was to allow us to discount this test if we wanted, and base our term mark on the first and last tests only. This, however, was the original plan for the course. We believe that they worked to find an equitable solution, and their failure to do this should not be cause for condemnation.

But their solution does not question the nature and use of tests in the first place.

The course consists of two parts: the lectures and the labs. It makes some sense to test us on the material we have covered in the lectures; it makes no sense to fail seventy percent of us. We can agree with some form of evaluation in the laboratories; we do not feel that we can agree with the way in which it is now carried out. Our lab mark is based on our lab books (marked twice a year for completeness and layout) and nine out of eleven lab tests. These tests have been based more on the details in the lab manual than on the actual lab work. And often, in the labs, we have begun to do work which is interesting (and is thus learned without the coercion of a test), and have not had time to go farther than the lab schedule permitted. In this way we have been denied the possibility of learning in any other way than by fear of subsequent testing. (One of us was told in the first lab period by the Knight in Shining White Lab Coat that he "frankly didn't trust students to learn biology without some kind of coercion!")

The laboratory is certainly the most valuable part of the course. We feel the labs are fairly well planned. However, the assumed need for standardization allows no flexibility within the labs. More could be learned if we were allowed to experiment and move at closer to our own rate. In the chemistry department, for instance, students may come in at other than their assigned times to complete or go beyond their labs. More could be learned if the class were not forced to readjust to a new demonstrator (and his different approach) half-way through the year. We could be more creative in the lab if those who are in closest contact with us — our demonstrator and fellow students — had more power over the content of the labs and their evaluation.

Similarly, much of the lecture material this year has been good. But we feel that some parts of it should be changed in approach and content. Again, we feel that students should be an important part of that process.

There would not be so many people annoyed at the results of the test last January if there were less emphasis on tests: the rules of the game are not ours, but the faculty's. We feel we would like to do more work — and different work — in the course, if we could help to determine the content and presentation of the course. But we would like to talk about it. We would like to meet with other interested students from Biology 120 at one o'clock Thursday in Sid Smith 1005. p.s. Hugs and kisses to Mr. Kisko.

Beth Savan (II UC)
Bob James (IV VIC)

Detrimental note on Mr. Kisko

Re Mr. L. M. Kisko's letter of Feb. 26:

Mr. Kisko is right when he instructs students to "... attend lectures and labs on a regular basis. This way you may find out what's happening and when." That, sir, is the trouble with Bio 120 — listen, and you MAY find out what's happening, but then you equally well MAY NOT — depending on your luck and the laws of probability.

Certainly, Bio 120 is a difficult course to organize. It has many students, and perhaps more important, is not taught by one professor, but rather by a team. But Bio 120 organizers defy nature's laws in their overwhelming tendency toward maximum entropy.

Witness the term test Mr. James wrote about: My lecture section was told that there was to be a test on Monday at 5 or 6 o'clock (either could be written) and that, for those students who could not write on Monday, there would be a test on Tuesday.

Would it not seem reasonable to assume the same times on Tuesday as on Monday? Especially since CHM 120 labs last 'till 6 o'clock? At LEAST a dozen students assumed this — but there may be many more who, like myself, believed there was a six o'clock Tuesday test but, by chance, chose another time.

Similar confusion early in the year caused me to miss some (good) demonstrations. I attended ALL lectures, ALL labs, but by chance, because of my combination of lectures and labs, I never ONCE heard a word about these demonstrations. Indeed, I probably never would have found out about them had it not been for a question on a lab test.

There is no excuse for this confusion. In CHM 120, which has twice as many students, there is less confusion over what is going on. Why aren't Bio 120 students told what is happening without having to depend on luck of finding the appropriate lecture section or lab demonstrator?

Because someone isn't doing their job of informing students. If necessary, test times and other "points of interest" should be mentioned during lectures, written on the board, printed on lab tests (a bi-weekly affair), and mentioned in labs.

A note to Mr. Kisko: Beware EOB and CORSAP — you may soon be employed by Mr. Bob James, myself, and 10,000 other students. (I would hate to think of you giving up time to do your job.)
Name withheld

P.S. If you use my name, please edit any comments detrimental to my Bio 120 mark.

Why they won't take me in . . .

It would be difficult to say who invented the reams of red tape which entangle the whole concept of entering a university, but the University of Toronto has the whole situation down pat, particularly in Admissions.

It all started quite innocently when I telephoned the office in September to ask information regarding Anthropology courses. It has become a chain of phone calls and visits, still going on, involving everything from the Faculty of Arts and Science to student services and counselling.

The one and only problem, it seems, is that I have not taken a Grade 13. It doesn't matter if you graduate with Honors, or how you rank in the class if you haven't had a Grade 13 that's it. Period. Amen.

But all I want is one Anthropology class. Won't my qualifications do? Does it mean anything to graduate with Honors from Grade 12, in the upper sixth of the class, with one term in Anthropology chalked up at the Vancouver City College? Come on, Ontario, don't be difficult.

Undaunted, and slightly paranoid by this time, I began the circuit once more. And more. And More. Apparently, red tape runs thicker than anything else in the education field, since there seems to be no way around the requirement.

The purpose of this dissertation, if anybody is still listening, is to ask the reason for all this fuddle-duddle.

Granted, Ontario does have high standards.

Can't it have qualifying exams, as an alternative for entering under varied conditions? And how does one get sufficiently worked up to gum up all the red tape surrounding the University of Toronto. By the way, the explanation for my marked absence in Grade 13, which must be unlucky, is that there was none. The United States secondary school level ends at twelve.

Somebody likes us

I write to say that I greatly enjoyed your editorial of Wednesday, February 10th. I appreciated your serious attempt to analyze some of the problems that I have faced during the last twelve years.

I am sending you a copy of a speech that I gave last April that you may have missed. It is my attempt to come to grips with the problem of the University as social critic. I doubt whether you will agree with the conclusions, but I think you may be interested in the process by which I reached them.

Yours sincerely,

Claude Bissell

Lemon explains evaluations discussions

The discussion on the evaluation committee by Alex Podnick (February 26) should be clarified on at least three counts.

First, the article failed to make clear that the FSM 300 request for Pass-Fail was based on the nature of the programme. Students are working in projects in the city some of which are difficult to define functionally and others even disappear from under the students. Consequently so as not to discourage students from participating in trying situations, the members of the course have favoured pass and fail. (As pointed out by Chris Plowright on CIN, some students have requested letter grades because they intend to go to professional school; of course, we know a contradiction is built into the request.) This course is different than most; whether it is the model for future education is very much an open matter.

Second, I did not quite "dismiss" Dean Allen's "objections." His comments on the need for Credit, Pass equalling a D, and Fail were statements of fact about our current system. I don't think he was objecting to our request. I did suggest to the Committee that we probably would accept Credit-Pass-Fail as a technicality though the Pass/D would not likely be used. We could hardly do otherwise given the nature of the course.

Third, that the meeting went on "as if" it had legitimacy was good, at least to this visitor. It struck me that Dean Allen was conciliatory as were some of the students and other faculty persons. Hopefully a cooperative spirit will prevail in the present dispute.

I wish that all sides look carefully at the proposals of restructuring committee.

Associate Professor,

REPORT ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN FACULTY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

In the first part of our profile of U of T's 225 women faculty, we concentrated on statistical data. Part Two, which appears on the next two pages, probes the attitudes of women faculty towards their career choices, opportunities for employment and promotion, the behaviour of male students and colleagues. There was strong agreement among those who answered our questionnaire that there are too few women faculty at U of T.

The Varsity — Errol Young

REPORT ON WOMEN: PART TWO

1. Do you feel that employment opportunities have been restricted for you because you are a woman?

A) Within the university
	Lect.	Asst. prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
YES	6	3	6	0	15
NO	10	29	10	5	54

B) Outside the university
	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
YES	7	7	1	1	16
NO	8	21	10	3	42

Several female faculty members indicated they had never sought employment outside the university because of restrictions, i.e. their sex. In replying to this question, one woman said yes and continued that it was not only because "I am a woman, but a married one, and especially a mother".

Another female faculty member felt that employment was restricted because of a "lack of day care and paranoia re: pregnancy".

One faculty member said "there have been considerable changes during the 25 years that I have been on staff. At the beginning there was prejudice against women. I am not conscious of any now".

A fourth faculty member replied "it hindered my promotion until I threatened to resign. I was just a woman hired by my Department on the strength of having written a well known book".

2. Does the fact that you are a woman affect the behaviour of your male students?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
A) in lectures and seminars
YES	2	13	1	1	17
NO	8	18	11	4	41
B) In informal situations
YES	2	13	2	1	18
NO	8	19	10	4	41

One woman commented that "a few of the men sometimes at first resent or dislike being taught by a woman, but once the course is well underway these attitudes disappear".

Another woman said "I have met some male resentment in class and also some male presumptions regarding the 'weaker sex'."

3. Does the fact that you are a woman affect the behaviour of your female students?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
A) in lectures and seminars
YES	0	13	1	1	15
NO	14	19	12	4	49
B) in informal situations
YES	2	13	2	2	19
NO	11	19	11	3	44

One woman in Food Sciences said: "since my students are women their attitudes are affected in the sense that they are increasingly eager to combine career and marriage and are interested in talking to people who have".

Another said that "male students are inclined to skip classes or boast themselves in front of other students. I imagine that girls would act similarly with a male teacher".

A third faculty member thought that "women students participate more in a discussion with a woman group leader. They also discuss career problems more freely".

Some faculty members said that they were not male so that they could not tell if they would be treated differently.

4. Do the women in your classes play a less active, more active or equal role as compared to the men?

	Lecturer.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
Less active	4	6	3	2	15
more active	-	1	1	-	2
equal	6	20	6	3	35
none or few men	2	3	-	-	5

Several faculty members expressed the view that participation depended upon the personalities of the students involved.

5. Do you feel that the men in your department treat you more as a woman than as a colleague?

	Lecturer	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
YES	4	-	1	-	5
NO	7	14	15	3	39
BOTH	-	3	-	-	3
NO MEN	2	2	-	-	4

Several women felt that they were treated as colleagues. One faculty member said "some treat me as colleague, others as a woman. A good number treat me according to some strange idea of what they think a woman is".

One woman said, "they all want to sleep with me".

Another commented, "No chivalry, but I carry a heavier load than many of the men".

A fourth faculty member said: "this is partly determined by the woman's attitude too. In my case it is because I am a mother with duties to my children which make me need to be home more than men have to be".

Another woman indicated that her treatment by fellow male colleagues was "perhaps a symptom of the emasculation of male intellectuals".

Yet another female faculty member stated "I find this annoying occasionally, but usually I feel that I am treated as a knowledgeable, competent woman". Generally however, the following comment summarizes how the women felt:

"They treat me as a colleague but the fact that I am a woman certainly affects their attitude".

6. Do you think that your department or faculty would hire a man in preference to a woman to fill a vacant position, if both were well qualified?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
YES	7	9	6	3	25
NO	6	21	9	1	37

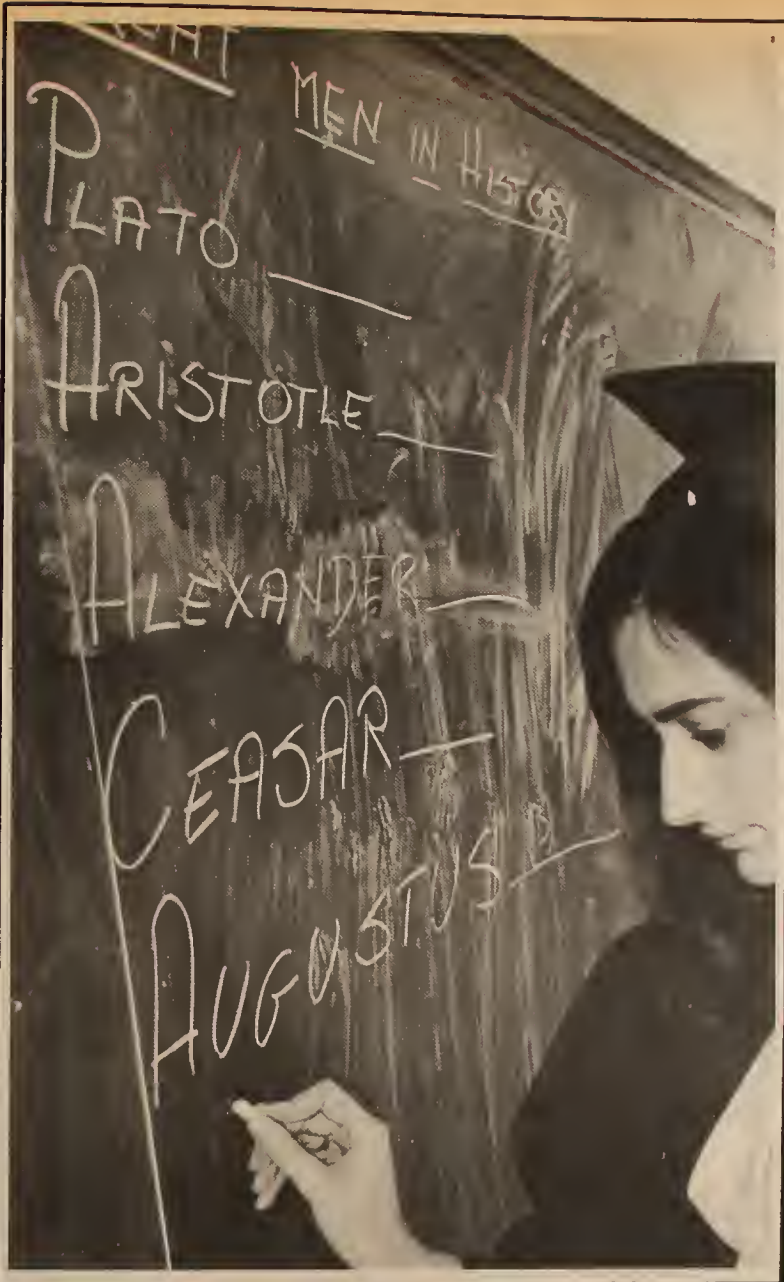

Many faculty members were not really sure of the hiring procedures, others were not sure of what their department would do. Others expressed the opinion that there might be some attempt to manage a better representation of men and women in the faculties where they are lacking.

One woman who said yes felt that this was because "men are not so apt to be bothered with family problems".

In a similar vein another said yes because "women are likely to get married and withdraw from teaching".

One woman noted that in the French Department more women are hired as teaching assistants and as lecturers — especially if they are attractive — rather than as professors.

7. Did your being a woman influence your choice of discipline, field, or subject matter?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
YES	10	12	5	2	29
NO	5	19	11	4	39

One woman in Food Sciences said "I got into a totally wrong field for me, due to guidance and the expectations for women at the time".

Several said that they did not realize so at the time, but looking back on their lives they could see that their sex influenced their choice of careers and discipline.

One woman said that her sex did not influence her "in any definable manner, but I picked up my interest in literature from my mother".

A third woman said "our society and our schools influence the sexes differently from early childhood".

Other comments that were made were:

"My family told me that being a teacher was suitable for a woman for there were long holidays to look after husband and kids".

"I was pressured by my parents to study something "nice" e.g. languages".

"My field includes the study of Children". (A woman from the Institute of Child Study)

"Personal interests are always affected by male-female orientation".

8. Do you feel that opportunities for advancement are greater for women in university than in business, industry or the professions?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
YES	6	12	4	2	24
NO	9	17	6	6	38

Many women were not really sure as they were never involved in industry or business etc.

However one woman said that she chose a university career "because the hours are more adaptable for someone also trying to run a household".

Another woman commented that "some departments seem less disposed toward women but this seems to be less evident in the Humanities".

9. Do you think that there are too few, enough, too many women faculty members at U of T?

	Lect.	Asst. Prof.	Assoc. Prof.	Prof.	Total
too few	7	8	6	3	24
enough	3	5	1	0	9
too many	0	0	0	0	0

Most faculty members expressed ignorance about the total number of female academics on the staff at the University of Toronto.

One woman said "For U of T as a whole I cannot answer this, I work in a faculty (Library Sciences) where there are more women than men and I feel that a good balance of both makes a good department".

10. Generally has your being a woman affected the development of your academic career?

TV, technology will be part of new style of university

TORONTO (CUP) — A new kind of university is being planned for Ontario that would integrate television and other technology with traditional teaching methods into "a systems approach to higher learning."

The concept is outlined in a report on television and technology in university teaching, prepared for the Committee on University Affairs (CUA) and the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario (CUPO).

The new style university would have its central headquarters somewhere in the province with a president and a senior faculty and administration located there. Students would attend full-time at regional "learning centres" across the province. The university would be self-governing and have the power to grant degrees.

A main theme of the report, written by Bernard Trotter of Queen's University, is that television has little future in university education if it is treated as a separate technique.

The report advocates, instead, a completely new method in which basic instruction would be in the form of a package made up of television, audio and printed materials prepared by inter-disciplinary teams.

Students would view the packaged material at the regional centres. Professor-tutors would be available at the centres to guide their work.

The preparation of material by course teams is probably the most radical feature of the plan since it breaks down the traditionally non-personal relationship between student and teachers.

It also means that the professor has to forgo some of his individual status and reputation in order to work as part of a team.

The report favors creating the new university as a separate entity, mainly because Trotter does not believe that the traditional university system could be adapted fast enough to cover the "student explosion" over the next decade.

The report is to receive detailed consideration by both the CUA and the CPUO in the next three months.

Hallet has what it takes to be U of T pres

By TONY USHER

Two years ago, Archie Hallett was a witty and popular physics professor and a little-known administrator in the Arts and Science faculty.

Two weeks ago, a shy Hallett winced as administrators, faculty, and students showered him with praise at his formal installation as principal of University College.

Next year, Archibald Cameron Hollis Hallett could well occupy the most prestigious university presidency in Canada.

Archie Hallett's sudden rise to fame has been one of the most unique and interesting phenomena of the power struggles that have preoccupied the U of T for the last few years.

During his first year as principal of University College, he has enhanced his reputation built up, when associate dean of Arts and Science, as a competent and skilled administrator and sophisticated diplomat.

Hallett's administrative prestige was demonstrated when he was one of the two successful candidates for administration representative on the U of T presidential search committee. He topped the poll.

He would have to resign his position on this committee if nominated for the presidency.

Born in Bermuda, Archi Hallett, 44, graduated from Trinity College in 1948 and took a Ph.D. at Cambridge. He began his teaching career at U of T in 1951, specialising his research in low temperature physics.

One student recalled him as being "very humorous — his principal attribute as a lecturer." Hallett's Christmas lecture and problem set were apparently among the annual highlights of the old honour maths, physics, and chemistry course.

In 1966 Hallett became one of the three associate deans of Arts and Science. During his tenure he took much of the brunt of implementing the New Programme. Hallett presided over the radical structural and administrative changes necessary to make the new system work.

Archie Hallett

At Hallett's February 12 installation as principal, Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen said that "without the skilled prenatal, natal, and postnatal care by your principal, the New Programme would not be in existence." Another administrator commenting on Hallett's career in the faculty administration called him the "Red Dean".

While Hallett gained respect among his colleagues as an administrator, not everything he touched turned to gold. The computer registration system which frustrated and baffled students in 1969 and 1970 was his brainchild.

In 1970 a representative committee selected Hallett to succeed Douglas LePan as principal of U.C. after an exhaustive search.

University College has for a long time been a convenient point of departure for the presidency. Sidney Smith was principal of UC for a year before his elevation. Claude Bissell was UC Dean of Men for many years until shortly before he became president.

The collapse of the new registration system and the simultaneous arrival of Hallett in UC prompted the resignation of popular registrar R. M. H. Shepherd, a long time defender of decentralised and personalised dealings with college students.

Shepherd's departure has been the only event marring Hallett's principalship, however. Hallett has established himself as a defender of college autonomy and an adept chairman esteemed by both faculty and student leaders.

Hallett's most important public exposure was as chairman of the University Wide Committee which met at the beginning of June 1970 to discuss a new U of T Act in the wake of the CUG Report.

In the volatile assembly of 160 representatives from all parts of the university, he used his skills of conciliation and compromise to the utmost to produce consensus on all items except the actual composition of the new top governing structure, and to keep student acrimony over the defeat of parity on the governing structure to a minimum.

Hallett's stature acquired at the UWC has allowed him to try the role of mediator in the parity struggle in Arts and Science.

Hallett seconded the student motion for a parity restructuring committee which was passed by General Committee on Nov. 30. In doing so he emphasized that his prime motive was practicality and the importance of finding a workable structure for Faculty Council.

During the parity strike Hallett attempted to persuade Simcoe Hall to take positive action; since he has several times acted as a middleman between anti-parity faculty and student leaders.

His apparent combination of liberal principles and administrative practicality and efficiency have made him one of the few people at U of T who can command the respect of a wide spectrum of students and faculty.

How long Hallett's equanimity and composure could stand up under stress is unknown. He has not been faced with any serious crises or confrontations during his short term of office at U.C.

After his appointment last spring, Hallett expressed his feelings on the recent day care centre occupation of Simcoe Hall.

"I don't think I like the tactics too much... one accepts it as part of life, and the way one group of people expresses their dissatisfaction. The same way we got used to the telephone."

At Monday's meeting of the General Committee, Hallett was roughly handled by obstructing students and, according to reports which he has denied, was punched in the face.

Archie Hallett doesn't come on strong. His patience and tolerance are one side of a nature which is also shy and retiring.

At his installation Hallett, his lean frame draped in an ill-fitting dark suit, writhed in uncomfortable embarrassment as President Bissell, Dean Allen, and student, faculty, and alumni representatives heaped compliments upon him.

The praise could "only be described as unwarranted flattery" responded Hallett.

Hallett contrasts sharply with Bissell who is physically imposing and a commanding speaker. One U.C. student who worked closely with Hallett last year expressed concern that he lacked the presence so important to a position which must represent the university in its increasingly contentious dealings with the outside world.

Yet Hallett's skills and experience and his mastery of the arts of conciliation may well make him the most desirable successor to Claude Bissell for administrators, faculty and governors increasingly concerned about change in the university going beyond their control.

At the same time Hallett's liberalism and humanism will make him acceptable to most of the more progressive elements of the university.

The unanswered question is whether all of Archie Hallett's undoubted skills can restore order and tranquility to a university in turmoil within and under attack from without. The conflicts and contradictions within U of T require more than papering over by brokerage politics.

Conference to talk about Cdn education

The Canadianization of higher education will get the attention of at least 100 delegates in a two-day seminar March 5 and 6, at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

The conference is sponsored by the Graduate Students Association of OISE and the Committee for an Independent Canada.

Speakers at the four seminar sessions ranging from the who, what and how of Canadian Education, to the recruitment of teachers will include Douglas Wright, Chairman of the Ontario Commission on Post-Secondary Education and the Committee on University Affairs; George Martell of the Sociology Dept. at York University and editor of "This Magazine Is About Schools"; Mel Watkins, from U of T Political Economy Department, and Abraham Rotstein, editor of the Canadian Forum.

Participants have been invited from the faculty, administration, and student population from universities and community colleges across Canada; politicians and civil servants, and members of the publishing industry are also expected to register.

Rush registration is being thrown open to local university and community college students this week, at two dollars a ticket.

The conference, says Bruce Rusk of OISE, will be aimed at the "future directions, policies, and approaches which could make post-secondary education in Canada more distinctively Canadian".

Mac takes second gym crown; Varsity team a solid second as Blues' Hans Frick stars

The Varsity Gym team performed before a large and enthusiastic crowd at Saturday's OQAA finals at McMaster.

Coach Julio Roncon's pre-competition "computer" analysis predicted that Blues would finish first with 125.5 points, followed by McMaster with 125.3, and Ottawa with 121.0. The results for Toronto were close at 126.0, but Ottawa and McMaster did surprisingly better with 127.3 and 138.5 respectively. This very close third, however, is considerably better than last year's OQAA fifth position.

Hans Frick easily took second spot next to McMaster's Steve Mitruk, thus Qualifying for the Canadians this weekend at York. He combined seconds on free exercise, parallel bars, and high bar with thirds on pommel horse and rings.

Specialist Phil Michaelis placed fifth in floor exercise and Al Forest finished ninth in the all-around competition with 38.3 points, a significant improvement over his OQAA preliminaries score.

Commendable efforts also came from Peter Bloxham and Andre Lessard, who competed this year for the first time, and particularly from Gary Wicks, who entered five of the six events with a badly injured hand.

Coach Julio Roncon feels that the results are encouraging for next year at least, considering that at no time this year was the team able to compete in full force.

Gym Gossip: McMaster will be joined by Alberta (WCIAA winner) and York (OIAA champs) in the national men's team finals at York this weekend. Competition gets underway Friday afternoon at 1:30 p.m. . . . The Women's national championships are being held at the same time at York . . . Top six competitors in each event advance to the finals Saturday afternoon at 1:45.

Varsity Fund sets '71 goal of $300,000

U of T alumni phone for dollars at Varsity Fund Telethon Monday.

Monday night telephone dials clicked in U.C.'s East Hall as the Varsity Fund began its 1971 campaign.

Assistant Director Tom Daly explained that last year $240,000 was donated by alumni as a result of the campaign and that the goal this year is $300,000.

Of the 80,000 alumni contacted, about 30 per cent pledge and finally donate money.

These donations support various scholarships and research projects.

The Varsity Fund also helps finance academic programmes such as Comparative Literature and English as well as the purchase of art works.

Praxis, the controversial social action organization which recently burned down after sponsoring the Poor People's Conference in January, is also supported by the fund.

The campaign, which will take place this month and in the fall, involves 3,000 to 4,000 alumni who volunteer to canvas for an evening.

Suicide rate in prison 50 times higher than outside

OTTAWA (CUP) — Conditions in maximum security prisons run by the federal government drive men to try to kill themselves at a rate 50 times higher than suicides on other parts of Canadian society. Figures disclosed by the federal government this week show there have been 23 suicides and 80 attempted suicides in prisons reported to the federal government in a 15-month period starting Sept. 1, 1969.

All but two of the suicides took place in six maximum security prisons, where most of the attempted suicides also took place.

The six prisons hold about 2,800 people.

The suicide rate for the rest of Canadian society is 10.9 suicides for every 100,000 persons in the country.

The rate in prisons is about 500 suicides for every 100,000 persons.

Nine of the 23 suicides occurred last year at St. Vincent de Paul, north of Montreal. The prison holds about 450 men.

Kingston Pen in Ontario, "home" for 702 men reported three suicides — two of them last month — and 35 attempts.

Saskatchewan Pen in Prince Albert, with 368 prisoners, reported three suicides and 24 attempts.

British Columbia Pen, population 434, had two suicides and three attempts.

Dorchester in New Brunswick two suicides, and Manitoba Pen one suicide and one attempt.

In-camera motion is passed by Conacher's sleight-of-hand

History professor J. B. Conacher, long-time champion of faculty responsibility, admitted Friday that faculty members who voted in favour of holding future meetings of the General Committee in camera "didn't even know what they were voting about. They just had confidence in the mover and the motion."

Conacher confessed there was too much noise for the motion to be heard when it was read at the last General Committee meeting.

Conacher said he waved to fellow faculty members to support the motion and they did.

Women swim stars in action at Waterloo

Ten to compete in national championships

Diving standout Leslie O'Brien will be one of the ten Varsity swim team stars competing in the CWIAU championships.

The University of Toronto will be represented by one of the strongest contingents when the women's national intercollegiate swimming and diving championships open this Friday at Waterloo University.

The championships, which conclude on Saturday, will mark the first time that swimmers from the four women's athletic conference have been brought together for a national competition.

Groups representing Western Canada, the Ontario-Quebec Association, and the Atlantic Association will also be present. The ten Varsity girls will be competing as part of the WIAU contingent as there is no national team title for women.

Selected from the Varsity team, coached by Sue Kinnear, that was just narrowly edged by Waterloo for the WITCA title early in February are: Leslie O'Brien, one and three metre diving; Andrea Kinsman, 1 metre diving; Anslie Gray, three metre diving; Merrily Stratten, 400 free, 100 free, 100 butterfly and 200 free relay; Randy Croome, 400 free, 100 backstroke, 50 backstroke, and 200 free; Janice Hines, 200 free and 400 free; Liz Daniel, 100 I.M., 200 I.M., 200 free relay, and 100 breaststroke; Francis Flint, 100 butterfly and 50 butterfly; Kathy Smith, 50 free and 100 free.

Miss Kinnear has been named the diving coach of the WIAU team.

Women fencers take WITCA complete season undefeated

Varsity's women's foil team successfully fought its way last Saturday to a first place finish in the WITCA finals.

In a tense battle against Western, the Toronto girls were hard pressed until late in the round when they rallied to take the match 10 bouts to 6. With the momentum of this important victory behind them, they moved on to score decisive wins over Queens and McGill, taking both by identical scores of 11-5.

The victory in the finals provided the climax to a season that saw the Toronto team, coached by Ken Wood, go undefeated through both preliminary sectionals as well as the finals themselves.

The star of the finals was Lilit Zekulin, who continued to demonstrate her excellent foil play by dropping only two bouts in the course of the championships. Her efforts earned her the title of the meet's top individual fencer.

Sharon Takasaki provided further backup strength with only three losses, while Pam Chellew and Dorrit de Demeter helped clinch the triumph for Toronto with the crucial wins needed to ensure the final victory.

On Sunday, Feb. 28th, the girls entered the Central Ontario Branch Championships. For some of them, it was their first time in open competition. There was a top-class entry of 24, five of whom were nationally ranked A fencers.

Zekulin, Anne Gutierrez and deDemeter placed fourth in each of their respective pools and very narrowly missed going into the next round. Miss Takasaki initially made it past the first round by a very close margin and from there continued on to fight her way into the finals where she made a seventh place finish.

Maitre Wood was extremely pleased with his girls' victory at the WITCA finals and was also very happy with their showing against such skilled competition at the branch championship level where the average fencer had two or three times the experience of the Varsity team.

Regular season ends; Jennings Cup playoffs begin this evening

The interfac hockey playoffs for the 1971 Jennings Cup winner begin this evening at 8:45 p.m. when Erindale College, third place finishers in the second division, meet third division champs. Forestry A, at Varsity Arena.

While the eleven teams competing in this year's playdowns have been decided, the final standings in the first division will be settled this afternoon when Trinity A meets Sr. Engineering at 12:30 in the last game of the regular schedule.

The following teams have earned spots in the playoffs:

First division: PHE A (11-2), Sr. Engineering, Vic, and defending champion St. Mikes (4-7-3). Second division: Business I (9-2-3), Scarborough (9-4-1), and Erindale (7-5-2). Third division: Forestry A, (9-2-1), and Vic B (8-3-1). Fourth division: Pharmacy A (8-4) and Innis College (8-2-1).

The finals are scheduled to begin on Wed. Mar. 17.

Intramural Notes: Basketball playoffs for the Sifton Cup are slated to begin on Monday . . . Dave Breach, prominent in both intramural and intercollegiate water polo, has been announced as the recipient of the Sidney Earl Smith Award for his extensive contribution to intramural athletics at U of T . . . Plans are underway for a touch football league next fall to operate over the lunch hour. Regular footballers in intercollegiate and interfac leagues will not be eligible.

Boxing Club announces award winners

Jim Gorsline and Pat Glynn were named the recipients of individual awards announced by the Varsity Boxing Club earlier this week.

Gorsline, who competed in the novice division this year, was selected as winner of the Zierler Trophy as the seam's most improved boxer.

Glynn, a club veteran of three years who has been boxing since childhood, was chosen as the Massey Foundation Award winner as the team's most worthy member.

The Varsity club, coached by Tony Canzano since 1946, has just completed a very successful season that saw them battle to a stand-off in their annual series with the RMC cadets.

Cops panic, bust 13 at Trudeau protest

By ALEX PODNICK

While 2,400 Liberal Party supporters munched leisurely on steak inside the Royal York Hotel Wednesday evening, Metro police were beating hundreds of less affluent people — mainly youths and poor people — who were demonstrating outside.

The street fighting began at 6:45, about an hour after the people began picketing the $50-a-plate fund-raising dinner.

POLICE PANICKED WHEN the demonstrators began throwing sandwiches, bread and rotten fruit at them and late-arriving guests, and pushed into the crowd at several points to nab the garbage-throwers.

As the police moved into the crowd, the people closed around them and attempted to protect those being sought by the cops.

During the melee, at least four hotel display windows were broken either by cops pushing people into them or protestors smashing them with the ends of their picket sign sticks.

After about five minutes, the cops had pushed the people into the middle of Front Street. All traffic was stopped but police, in an effort to further disperse the people, ordered cars to drive through.

AT ABOUT 7 O'CLOCK, police again charged into the crowd of people. This clash was particularly bloody, as cops and demonstrators fought each other with picket sticks, flagpoles and fists. The cops, particularly incensed because the people were defending themselves, severely beat up those they captured.

After a few minutes, the cops chased the people across the street to the front of Union Station where they regrouped.

A few demonstrators began to advance on the hotel again, throwing signs and swinging them at the cops. They were met in the middle of the road by the cops where both sides held their positions.

THE POLICE BEAT BACK all future attempts by the people to cross the street. By 8 o'clock, the confrontation was over and most people had left the scene. Thirteen had been arrested and some injured. Five cops needed hospital treatment.

U of T student Norm Rogers was taken into custody by the police and later released without being charged. He described the incident.

A cop accused Rogers of hitting him. Rogers said he didn't. He wasn't sure whether

'Perhaps it does start as a small child'

U of T lecturer Mrs. M. E. Brereton teaches in the Chemistry department where there are five women on staff. She was interviewed yesterday by Varsity reporter Laura Kelly.

Varsity: Did you think that the questionnaire on the status of women at U of T was relevant to your position in the university?

Brereton: Well the whole questionnaire was based on feeling and not facts. It was difficult to answer in this department where all the women have lower degrees than the men to begin with.

Varsity: Why are there so few women PhD's in Chemistry?

Brereton: I didn't want to go beyond a masters because I considered myself better suited for education than research. I don't think it was because I'm a woman, but I don't know. I didn't have any difficulty getting a grant for my masters degree.

When I was a student I didn't feel any discrimination over sex. We were just names to the instructors, no one cared if we were women. Many studied chemistry for the discipline, and didn't worry about whether they'd have difficulty getting jobs afterwards.

Varsity: You were never aware of any condescending attitudes among your male teachers?

Brereton: No. It's difficult to know why there are fewer female chemists. Maybe it's a matter of interest, or perhaps they've just wiped out women in the stages before they get to PhD. Ten years ago people followed a pattern more, and women stayed in their roles. Perhaps it does start as a small child.

Varsity: What do you think of the Women's Liberation Movement?

Brereton: The radical faction is not doing too much to further women's situation on campus. It's the women's attitude that hurts them. Many women tend to follow their roles in society and they dislike women who are in a man's role. I'd like to see tolerance of women whatever they choose to do. When I was an undergraduate people would ask me what I was studying, and were very surprised that I was in science. I don't find that now because of the people I'm working with.

Men and women are different, and women do affect men. I don't like to see women who use their femininity to work around men in a business situation. Women should act as the situation calls for, and be able to control their emotions. I think that's where the change will come with women who don't abuse their roles.

There are a significant number of women who choose to be homemakers. To manage the care of a family and a career you have to be close to super human. I don't know how it's possible to split family care between husband and wife. Someone has to give up or postpone their career if you want to raise your own family.

But there are people who are forced into both work and family who are not superhuman, and that's where there is a need for government assistance, like day care.

Varsity: Would the growing ambitiousness of women cause a reaction among males in your department.

Brereton: Some on the staff now may still be of the Old School, and opposed to women PhDs., but many are changing. I think that as long as the women are competent they can be hired. There does seem to be a growing registration of women in undergraduate Chemistry, but I don't get a chance to talk with them about Women's Lib and I'm not sure if they intend to go further in Chemistry.

'Sex issue never raised:' Bliss

By LINDA McQUAIG

How do male faculty react to female faculty? What problems do they think their female colleagues face at U of T?

Michael Bliss, a history professor, was selected at random and interviewed by The Varsity.

He showed no signs of discrimination against women in his attitudes and, as far as he knew, such discrimination did not exist at U of T.

In all his answers he emphasized his belief that faculty members should be scholars, and that sex was an insignificant factor.

WHEN ASKED IF HE THOUGHT that discrimination against women existed at U of T he said that he was not experienced enough to know for sure. The issue of sex had never been raised on any committees in which he had taken part.

"But I do remember one situation where the department tried to hire a woman but she turned us down because she didn't want to move to Toronto", he said.

Bliss felt that in situations where both husband and wife work full-time, they should share the work, "including looking after the car," he said.

Bliss is married, and his wife works part-time.

He said that in his case housework was not a problem since they hired a cleaning lady.

WHEN ASKED IF HE THOUGHT U of T should provide day care centres for the children of its women faculty, he said, "Yes, if the demand were great enough."

"However, I think this is basically a government responsibility."

He added that if U of T were to provide day care facilities for the children of women faculty, they should also provide them for the children of male faculty and students.

Bliss has recently done research on Victorian sexual morality. When asked if he preferred the Victorian woman to the modern career woman, he said that he thought that a woman should be able to combine motherhood with a career if she wants to.

Do most men faculty share his views? Bliss thought so.

Being a woman is detrimental

By PHILINDA MASTERS

Fifty-four out of 69 women faculty members at U of T questioned on the status of women in the university answered that they felt employment opportunities had not been restricted because they were women.

Lorene Smith, only woman faculty member in the Department of Philosophy, found it "really amazing" that any woman could believe this. She was equally surprised that so many women are labouring under the impression that their department would not hire a man in preference to a woman with equal qualifications, or that their being a woman doesn't affect the behaviour of students and colleagues.

"THERE IS REALLY NO QUESTION that being a woman is detrimental," and that the obstacles a woman encounters "are psychologically degrading," Professor Smith said. It is also obvious to her that a woman has to put up a fight to be offered positions traditionally held by men.

As the questionnaires on the status of women (in the last two issues of The Varsity) indicate, many women don't seem to be aware of any discrimination. Smith observed that this could be because many women still accept their position as the natural state of affairs.

More to the point, though, Smith's opinion is that most women prefer not to rock the boat, and "are afraid of being labelled as 'those horrible' militant feminists."

AS FAR AS HER OWN EXPERIENCES are concerned, Smith said that as a student she was confident of her own intelligence and capabilities, and that she "did not worry about the difficulty of getting a position," once she graduated.

This confidence was encouraged by the fact that she took her degree in England where colleges within universities are segregated on a basis of sex. Naturally there was no lack of women in top positions and so no sense of a raw deal for women, she added.

When she returned to Canada, Smith was offered a position in the Philosophy department by a former Chairman because she was a woman. The department thought it should have female representation, but the Chairman "didn't intend it as an insult. He was very sincere about wanting a woman on the faculty."

Professor Smith is still the only woman in the U of T Philosophy department, and she is likely to remain that way. Her colleagues are aware of her views on the status of women, but, "They still treat it as a joke. They are quite paternalistic — as if they were patting me on the head and saying 'j'here, there, dear'."

"THE FUTURE OF THE STATUS OF WOMEN in universities depends on the state of the job market," according to Smith. If the job market is bad as it is now in Canada, there will be a tendency to hire mainly men. "But if the job situation eases up," she continued, "The status of women will probably improve, at least for a few years when it may level off."

"It's also true that a lot of people are sensitive to the problems of women, and that others will bow to the pressure of groups like Womens Lib.," she said.

Unfortunately, Smith added that U of T is more conservative than other Canadian universities, particularly the smaller ones. "U of T didn't bother to answer a questionnaire on the status of women for last fall's conference of the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada," she said, so U of T's got a long way to go before women will achieve any measure of equality with men.

the cop had run into him or whether he had been pushed into the cop.

The cop grabbed Rogers, pushing him to the ground, according to Rogers. Rogers went limp, offering no resistance. As he held Rogers down, the cop bashed him in the right eye, continued Rogers. His eye was still slightly swollen yesterday.

The cop then pulled Rogers to his feet and began dragging him towards the hotel. Rogers regained his balance and walked passively with the cop to an interrogation room set up in the Royal York.

"I repeatedly told the police officer that I didn't hit him," Rogers said.

After Rogers overheard the interrogating officer telling his supervisor that he doubted whether Rogers had in fact jostled him, the cop released Rogers.

"He told me that he didn't want to see me around," Rogers recounts. He warned Rogers that if he saw him around in five minutes, he would arrest him

An American youth fared much more poorly.

"They were really hassling him hard," Rogers reported. They told the American that the sooner Canada gets rid of guys like him the better, says Rogers; they suggested all the young Americans living in Canada should be shipped back to the States.

The people had picketed the heavily-guarded Royal York for an hour before the police-provoked streetfighting began.

As the Liberal supporters got out of their limousines and taxis they were greeted by shouts of "I hope the food sticks in your throats" and "Have a bologna sandwich and save $50." (The people had brought along their own food.)

As they marched along Front Street, the people chanted, "Trudeau, Eat Shit" and "Free Vallieres, Jail Trudeau". They demanded "jobs now," "Free Abortion On Demand," "All Power To The People", and "Death To Fascists".

Some demonstrators wore army surplus gas masks while others donned surgical masks in case of tear gas.

Anxious cops constantly kept pushing the protesters back onto the sidewalk, insisting they continue walking and not obstruct the hotel's front door or the arriving limousines and taxis.

The demonstration, aimed primarily at the unemployment crisis and Trudeau's repressive measures against the Quebec people, was sponsored by 11 local political and community groups, including the Committee for a Free Quebec, Women's Liberation, the Just Society Movement, the Ontario Tenants' Association, and other tenants, poor people, and left wing political groups.

Metro Police Chief Harold Adamson described Wednesday's demonstration as the "worst for violence against a visiting dignitary" that he could recall.

He warned, "We'll use whatever force is necessary to prevent future incidents of this type."

13 protesters were dragged from the demonstration and charged with public mischief, police obstruction, and damaging private property.

Photog bounced

Varsity photographer David Lloyd managed to sneak his way into the $50-a-plate dinner for Trudeau on Wednesday night at the Royal York Hotel.

Dressed in a buckskin coat and work boots, Lloyd convinced Don Schacter, who was in charge of press accreditation, to give him a press pass.

Although he was turned back by an RCMP official just before he reached the receiving line, Lloyd returned to the press line opposite Trudeau where he took a series of pictures.

Staff, students agree to meet

Students and faculty who have been meeting for the last two days have reached tentative agreement to hold a General Meeting of Staff and Students on the Faculty of Arts and Science on March 16 and 17.

The purposes of the meeting is "to discuss the nature of the impasse in staff-student relations in the Faculty of Arts and Science" and "to propose ways of resolving the impasse".

Students on the meeting's organizational committee have called a meeting of interested students for two p.m. today in Sid Smith 1067 to solicit student opinion on the tentative agreement.

The student members were elected at a student meeting following the disruption of Monday's General Committee meeting.

They were instructed to meet with interested faculty to plan a two-day series of joint meetings to discuss the 6-6-3 parity restructuring committee report.

Faculty involved in the preliminary negotiations leading to the tentative agreement will also consult their constituency for acceptance of the proposal within the next few days.

Tenants receive summonses

By LINDA McQUAIG

Fifty-three of the striking tenants in the Married Students Residence on Charles St. received court summonses Tuesday.

The summonses arrived during a two week recess in negotiation talks between the tenants and the Ontario Housing Corporation.

The two week break was called at the request of OHC at the end of February, so that they could examine a contract drawn up by the tenants.

Wayne Roberts, spokesman for the Charles St. Tenants Association, said the summonses, which were sent to the tenants who had taken part in the rental strike since November, were signed by the OHC lawyer.

He said that OHC had shown "disgusting bad faith by requesting a recess and then sending out court orders in the middle of it."

The tenants are requested to appear in court at different times throughout the week of March 22-26.

Roberts suspected that OHC might just be attempting to "scare" the tenants.

Tenants are trying to get in touch with the OHC lawyer and still hope for an out of court settlement.

At the table, and in the street

There's not much space on the pavement in front of the Royal York Hotel, especially when it's dark and cold and 750 people have just spent more than an hour marching back and forth chanting and shouting.

Somewhere along the line there was a homemade portable shithouse somebody had brought along for its symbolic value, while others carried around an effigy of Trudeau, complete with a pig's head on top.

And as the line shuffled back and forth several volunteers dished out bologna sandwiches and buns to the demonstrators, calling out "Have a sandwich — save $50 bucks".

And between bites on their free food, demonstrators chanted "Troo-doe Eat Shit! Troo-doe Eat Shit!" and sang "Pow-er to the People" and waved their picket signs, which carried short terse demands for "Jobs Now" and wordier political comments such as "5 million political prisoners in Quebec."

This was the People's Banquet — no black ties, no minks, no $50 tickets, street clothes only — and it was happening right there outside the Royal York Hotel to remind the Prime Minister of Canada that upstairs in the Royal York he was not dining with the people of Toronto.

Upstairs, with 2400 cronies who had paid $50 a head to attend the affair, Trudeau was trying to soothe some of the bad feelings his audience must have got when they had to face jeers and oinks and even eggs and apples as they stepped from taxis and limousines and walked between two solid walls of policemen to get into the hotel.

What were they doing here? Why did they come?

They came because they were expected to. For most of them the price of admission was a business expense, not a personal donation. And as upright and solid Liberal Party members of the Toronto business community, they were the only group of people Trudeau could possibly find to perform his well-rehearsed act of political hypnosis on.

"Trudeau! Why don't you stop eating steak and come down and eat what we have to eat!" somebody shouted from the crowd.

The Toronto Telegram printed the menu for Trudeau's dinner in full, explaining how you too could eat the same dinner at home — for $5 a plate.

An old man with a short grey beard clenched a sandwich firmly in both hands and peered apprehensively at the crowd and the police, pausing for quick hungry bites.

What was he doing here? Why did he come?

Perhaps he heard that the Prime Minister was coming to Toronto to finally do something about the plight of the jobless . . . that the prime minister cared, that the prime minister would be able to help . . .

But the prime minister was upstairs and he had been there since lunchtime and never had to brave the crowds the way his guests did, faithfully flocking to his feet.

On CHUM yesterday, a news commentator said the dinner reminded him of the opulence and corruption of the France of Louis XIV. Next time, he said, he'd be with people in the streets.

"One, two, three — fire!" and a dozen demonstrators let loose with rotten peaches, apples, potatoes and buns in the direction of arriving guests.

Some of the projectiles hit placards, while others landed dead square in the corridor police had cleared in front of the door.

Again, and again, missiles were hurled forward, often hitting their mark. The shouting intensified.

"Free Vallieres — Jail Trudeau"

The crowd was no longer moving, but pressing forward.

Toronto's very own riot squad, otherwise known as the "Emergency Task Force", stepped out onto the pavement from inside the hotel.

Few in the crowd could see what was happening ahead of the sea of placards; it took it took several minutes for the shock waves to flow back through the closely knit crowd.

A flying apple — or maybe it was an orange — struck one of the police in the chest. The cop lunged forward, seeking his assailant.

The line of demonstrators held fast and would not let him through.

The police line moved out now, trying to heave the crowd back. The crowd still held firm.

Placards came flying from inside the crowd, forward into the light.

The police began to grab picket signs and use them to shove the crowd back. After several minutes, they succeeded in breaking into the crowd.

As the crowd spilled backwards and into the street, cops sprinted along the pavement throwing people out of the way as they chased down their quarry.

One youth jabbed his picket sign through a plate glass window. There was a quick flash of light as shattered glass sparkled in television and camera lights, and glass showered the pavement. The youth dashed off and several cops barrelled after him.

Seconds later, another window went.

At night, in a crowd, with burly policemen charging through from behind you, it's hard to know how to move, how to keep standing. People started shouting "Stop running! Stop running!" but it made no difference.

Police threw people to the ground and clambered on top to stop them from struggling and to fight off people trying to spring them free.

The crowd had spilled out onto Front St., stopping taxis, limousines and cars, shouting, screaming, and eventually chanting "Fuck Trudeau! Fuck Trudeau!"

The police, now getting organized, formed a line along the sidewalk, with extra men in front of the four windows with gaping holes.

Just above the first storey, the hotel had been splashed with red paint.

The police edged forward, into the street, to confront the crowd again as it regrouped.

The police scored 13 arrests Wednesday night. That's not counting people they detained and later released. And not counting people they tried to get, but couldn't.

The Liberal Party made $70,000.

The police chief got a chance to warn "We'll use whatever force is necessary to prevent future incidents of this type."

Trudeau got fine coverage in the daily press for his speech on the right of women to "full participation in the Canadian community."

One columnist apologized profusely that Trudeau could not find time to comment on unemployment.

And the people in the street got to eat bologna sandwiches.

"... the bourgeoisie is not a political party but a ruling class . . . Once profits are really in question, private property really in danger, then all easy-going talk of democracy immediately comes to an end . . ."

"Street demonstrations, like military demonstrations, are only the start of a battle . . ."

"... the organization of revolutionary actions can and must be learnt in revolution itself, as one can only learn swimming in the water . . ."

Stop Spadina meeting is like 'Panthers in the Pentagon'

By ERIC MILLS

"This is like the Black Panthers holding a meeting in the Pentagon."

The speaker was referring to a meeting of the Citizens' Forum held Tuesday night, where members of the Stop Spadina Committee came to talk about the recent Ontario Municipal Board expressway decision, right in the lion's den—a room in City Hall.

Alan Powell of Stop Spadina reported to the forum that a meeting of the group last Tuesday had declared unanimous support for the Spadina Review Corporation in its appeal to the provincial cabinet over the Ontario Municipal Board's decision to allow Metro Toronto to go ahead with the expressway. The corporation represents about 12 ratepayer's organizations who had presented a case against the expressway to the OMB.

Powell also said that Stop Spadina had decided to undertake massive distribution of a four page special report of the Toronto Citizen on Spadina, (one article of which was reprinted in last Friday's Varsity).

Included with the Citizen supplement is a letter suggesting to readers that they write to Premier Bill Davis, his Toronto cabinet ministers.

The organization, almost broke because of the long fight needs money to pay for the printing costs of the 20,000 leaflets, and has asked for donations to be sent to Alan Powell, Dept. of Sociology, U of T.

At the Forum, Alderman Karl Jaffary suggested there are two alternatives for the Cabinet in ruling on the appeal since it will be wary of having a hot issue like Spadina at election time.

Jaffary said one possibility is that the cabinet will make a fast decision, within two or three weeks, and hold off the election until the fall. The other is to have an earlier election and delay making the decision until after the election.

A member of a provincial study of transportation in Kitchener-Waterloo told the meeting that the study's responsibility had been to get cars off the road. The report advocated giving subsidies to public transportation to keep fare prices low.

Another expressway issue brought to the attention of the Forum was the Gardiner expressway extension, which was recently passed by Council. Although there were few objections to the present addition, the next segment of the expressway planned has many houses in its path.

Gerry Thompson of "Forward 9", a community organization in Ward nine, says the construction was not to go ahead until 1975, and residents are not prepared to consider whether they want the expressway this early.

He also claimed there has been road widening being going on in Scarborough that is really preparation for the expressway.

Faculty members picked for 'chimpanzee' comm

By CHARITY RUMP

The faculty-dominated restructuring committee set up by the Arts and Science Faculty Council on January 19 now has most of its members, though no beginning for its work is in sight.

The committee was to include two students, six faculty, and a representative of Dean A. D. Allen. No one has been nominated for the student posts.

The six faculty were elected by mailed ballot last week: J. M. Daniels (Chairman, Physics); H. C. Eastman (Political Economy); Mrs. J. E. Foley (Psychology); J. M. Robson (English, Victoria); R. N. Savory (Chairman, Islamic Studies); and A. P. Thornton (Chairman, History).

Associate Dean G. A. B. Watson was also elected and will serve as the dean's representative.

Daniels, Robson, and Thornton have been leaders of the conservative faculty bloc.

Among those defeated were Derek Paul (Physics) and Robin Harris (Principal, Innis College), both considered as faculty liberals on the parity issue.

Pimlott says Wolves may outlast man's attempts to exterminate them

Last of the Loners
By Stanley Young
Collier-Macmillan
$11.95

This is a book about wolves and about the men who eliminated them from the United States. But if, as you read it, you let your mind wander from poisoned wolves to air that is unfit to breathe, to beaches that are unsafe for swimming, to parks desecrated by logging companies, you may also attain a very unusual perspective on the environmental mess the world is in.

A note on the dust jacket refers to Stanley Young as a noted ecologist. He was in fact a predator control man, a trapper and poisoner of a vast array of wild life. He was also one of a tremendous army of our kind who have had an absolute sense of man's divine right to exercise dominion over the universe. Young referred to wolves as being "... by far one of the most interesting groups of all the mammals".

But throughout his career he worked with holy zeal for their total extermination wherever their paths crossed those of men. He wrote, "It is to be hoped that they will never cease to be part of the North American fauna". But in his view they could only be tolerated if there was "no direct conflict with man".

As I read, my mind drew parallel after parallel between Young's ambivalent attitudes about wolves and society's ambivalence about the environment. As Young wrote warmly about the wolf, while masterminding their extermination for the ranchers, so the P.R. types write about the pristine streams while their industrial masters hurry to convert the rivers of the world into open sewers; and they, like Stanley Young, always use the high-sounding words and seemed to hold a deep abiding sense that the greater good of man gives us a license to trample on anything that stands in the way of progress.

The book has 16 chapters. Eleven of them tell the stories of the last of the loners — single wolves that had a reputation as cattle killers — and of the men who pursued and finally killed them. They are written after the fashion of Ernest Thompson Seton and make easy reading. Two chapters trace the historical aspects of wolf-man relationships. They are not as readable as the loner chapters, but they draw together many of the threads of a truly remarkable story.

I have written disparagingly of the parallels between the attitudes of wolf killers and polluters of the environment. But I am not a total pessimist about the future of either the wolf or the environment. In Canada, for example, a remarkable change of attitude has occurred during the past decade and the future of wolves looks much brighter.

In the U.S., people are now fighting for wolves in Alaska, Minnesota and Texas. Somehow wolves have returned to Yellowstone Park, the heart of the country "cleansed of the depredators".

The Last of the Loners, was written by the last of the Wolfers. Wouldn't it be funny if the wolves end up having the last word?

Robards real villain of Caesar film

The 1970 filmed version of William Shakespeare's Julius Caesar is a tragedy in more ways than one. With all the best elements of theatre and cinema combined into this production, the film is nevertheless sabotaged by the incredibly lifeless portrayal of Brutus by Jason Robards.

At first it appears as though Robards interprets the hesitant assassin as an overly cautious man whose ideas are laden with all manner of intended and involuntary irony. This is so because Robards speaks as if the words of his script had been separated one from the other by a series of dashes. The measured and spaced result is not too bad in sequences demanding indecision on Brutus' part. However, when this choppy style intrudes into scenes of deep emotion, the audience realizes that Brutus' slowness and deliberation are in fact gross errors in acting on Robards' part.

In all fairness it must be admitted that Jason Robards screams and yells nicely. When addressing the throngs over Caesar's body or arguing with Cassius on the eve of battle, Robards manages to hide his shortcomings behind the quasi-emotionalism of a loud voice. But during Brutus' quiet encounter with Portia, such tactics cannot be used. And just as surely as Brutus kills Julius Caesar, Robards kills Julius Caesar.

What makes Robards' failure so unfortunate is the fact that he is in direct opposition to the smooth and competent performances of every other member of the cast. Luckily, he does not manage to completely stifle the efforts of Sir John Gielgud who shines as the fatherly Caesar. In tone of voice and kindness of facial expression, Gielgud seems so very benevolent that he justly causes disturbing doubts as to the actual tyranny the conspirators claim he exercises.

Charlton Heston does an excellent job as Marc Antony. Almost from the very beginning he succeeds in shucking off his Ben Hur-Moses-El Cid stereotype and completely assumes the role Shakespeare intended. Heston seems very careful not to mix up hamming with acting, and so pulls off the "Friends, Romans, countrymen" oration with believability and vigour.

Robert Vaughn, though plagued by his suave Man From UNCLE image, also manages to reject the past and become thoroughly involved in his portrayal of Casca. Equipped with a closely-clipped black beard and a frightening scowl, he lends a definite air of malevolence and butchery to the conspiratorial group. His stabbing of Caesar is especially vicious and convincing.

Although Richard Johnson is not exactly outstanding as Cassius, his work is quite adequate. And even the minor roles of Portia (Diana Rigg) and Octavius (Richard Chamberlain) are at least satisfying.

The acting is further enhanced by the unobtrusive and highly effective "cinematization" of Shakespeare. Throughout the film there exists a sensible balance between long-shots and close-ups, the moving and stationary camera, and the use of colour and music to set the mood.

In addition, the freedom of the play from the confines of the stage allows for the inclusion of realistic special effects and a number of striking visual images. The most noteworthy of these is Calpurnia's dream in which the queen suddenly sees a shiny, white bust of Caesar spurting several hideous jets of crimson blood.

Julius Caesar, unlike so many film adaptations, is also to be commended for increasing the realistic atmosphere by moving large portions of the action outdoors. Thus, the thunderstorm on the night before the killing is all the more frightening and the battle scenes, complete with rows upon rows of soldiers and horses, seem perilous to Brutus, Cassius and the viewer.

But not even all this can wipe away the bitter after-taste of Robards' stilted dialogue. Although the movie is definitely worth seeing, having Robards around is a lot like not being able to take a little pebble out of your shoe. You can get by all right with it in there. But think how much more comfortable and pleasant it would be if you could get rid of it.

Writ, Acta, Inkster, Nichol in one stewpot

A poetry chapbook, by Tim Inkster, photography by Paul Campbell.

Still Water, by B. P. Nichol, Talonbooks.

Acta Victoriana, Ed. William Horton et al.

Writ. No. 2, Eds. Bill Reoch, Roger Greenwald, Daryl Fridenberg.

For the poets, despite whatever faults they may have in these works (you know — they are often gratuitously esoteric, theatrically cynical, annoyingly filigreed with bewildering typographical schemata), show an intoxication with language, a sense of quite outrageous verbal couplings, a flair for whimsical, rococo detail.

Tim Inkster (who writes in these pages), has published a tiny untitled sheaf of his verse. Here is "Queen's Park Fall":

this wind is slowly breaking skeletons of rotting leaves

Inkster's poems have an unobtrusive charm, a quiet appeal, even those whose evocations are bizarre: "the girl who lived/ down-/ stairs/ kept our bath-/ tub/ plug/ on her dresser."

There is in this book no affected obscurity, no pompousness; the poems thrive on precise detail without dissolving into insignificance.

Most attractively presented is B. P. Nichol's Still Water. The poems are printed on fine white squares of stiff paper held in an attractive black and silver box. Perhaps the designation "poems" is not really apposite to these typographical and visual puns — not the raucous sort featured in Playboy, but simple and serious ones — "st r" is such a one, "em ty" another. More elaborate ones are of course impossible to reproduce within the strictures of his column.

The format — each piece a detachable, individually designed unit — is quite appropriate to the work, facilitating a "Gestalt" response, the grasping of the whole which such puns require. Pleasant to look at and hold, certainly imaginative is Still Water; whether a creation whose artistry lies in the spatial arrangement of words, or in the emphasis of syllables or letters to make visual points can be considered primarily a literary work, is moot.

Acta Victoriana is a welcome package; its format is a large manilla envelope chock full of bright sheets of paper, drawings, and itty-bitty envelopes with more sheets.

Brent Orenstein collected, in that tiny little envelope, two Kathmadu wall poems: "sudden prayers/ make God/ jump", and "My outhouse having burned down, my clear vision of the moon was not impeded." Killing Spiders is an intriguing piece by David Berry:

*Got one in the kitchen yesterday not too bright, not too fast ground it into grease spatter on the tile, got to clean the floor.
What a crummy lonely uncatastrophic way to go out of the way not to avoid and hardly think to resent, most are on their way to some entirely different business and seldom notice, they're such big eaters.*

The collection included some notable drawings by Heidi Burkhart and Tulk.

Writ is published by an Innis College group, but includes prose and verse contributions from across Canada. There were arresting translations from Guenter Eich, done by Peter Anson, some quite good poems by Christopher Cotter. Many vivid images, good phrases tended to be lost in a somewhat more-than-usual use of private detail and puzzling connexions in this most obscure of the collections. — Bill MacVicar

Northcott friendly

Giving Toronto another try after working with the likes of Nilsson and Leon Russell in L.A., Vancouverite Tom Northcott showed himself to be a capable if not exciting performer. Though he was understandably nervous on his first night at the Riverboat, he still managed to convey his easy-going attitude in his songs.

It is surprising these days to see a songwriter singing primarily songs of other people, and it is even stranger in Northcott's case, since he has even written a symphony. His own songs, dealing with the feelings and attitudes of people in general, show a considerable talent at fusing melody with lyrics: a child beginning to question, a girl poisoned by city (social) pollution, a man whose dream is over because the girl he loves is going away. The hope he expresses transforms even his indictment of the FLQ kidnappings into a gentle chiding: "Thought we had a better way/ Someone didn't care/ Took the way of hate and fear."

The songs of others are seen also from his point of view, as the joyful abandon of "Mr Tambourine Man" shows. At times he seems to overdo them by wringing out all the melodic values and almost destroying the subtleties, but he does give them his own interpretation instead of turning out a carbon copy. Lines like "Human kindness overflowing" seem almost to be an extension of his own personality.

His personality and feelings are so attractive it would be hard to dislike him, and his songs and interpretations are quite adept. But at the same time, this very quality of easy-goingness, his average good voice and fairly predictable songs lack the element of the unusual that would make him stand out of the current crowd of folk singers.

Engraving of Galileo published in 1613, when was 50.

Galileo's image buffed up

Galileo Studies by Stillman Drake
V Longmans Canada Limited $9.35

There is a current trend in academia to resist the too-hurried labeling of specifics to fit into pre-determined generalities. The secondary school syndrome of parading the term "Renaissance," followed by the term "Enlightenment," is too pat a habit.

Obviously there were individual strides which seemed to bear no relation to what preceded them, but this is too simplistic an outlook. Nothing is created out of a vacuum (save perhaps the cosmos itself), and one man's work is always founded in some predecessor or contemporary. So it was with Galileo.

Galileo, however, has suffered through the years. He is painted, historically, perhaps not so much as a villain, but in so gray a manner as to cloud over his very considerable achievements. Professor Drake — who teaches at U of T. — in his Galileo Studies has toiled assiduously on Galileo's behalf to set the record straight.

In his collection of thirteen essays, he ranges over the influences Galileo received from his father and his peers, and touches on Galileo's contributions to astronomy, the telescope, hydrostatics, sunspots, tides, free fall and inertia. He corrects a few of the historically-garnered errors of previous commentators, editors and translators to burnish up the image of Galileo.

In Galileo's time, the main source of all scientific knowledge, and the base of all experiment, such as it was, was Aristotle from his attempts to contradict and disprove Aristotle. Most of Galileo's discoveries came. This action was not motivated by any personal animus, but was purely in the interests of truth.

Galileo's early discoveries were popular because he usually wrote about them in Italian, not Latin, and because he related them to mechanical observable facts. Fortunately, he in himself also united the orthodox physics of Aristotle (force and motion) with the Peripatetic impetus tradition (philosophic).

Galileo treated the physics of sound as his father, Vincenzo, had done before him — based it on ratios and tension, but also on cubes rather than on squares when sound production was related to volume. He was a member of the short-lived Lincean Academy, the forerunner of modern scientific societies, owing its existence principally to the fact that university channels at that time were closed to any new science. He was the first person to unite mathematics, astronomy and physics in a triad of sciences, at the very base of modern physical science.

Perhaps the most famous of Galileo's exploits is his development of the telescope. He himself never claimed that he had invented it, but he had great good fortune in its improvement — up to a thirty-power one by the end of 1609.

It was partly due to this excitement over the instrument that interfered with his relations with Johannes Kepler; Kepler himself had complete faith in Galileo despite interfering efforts of small-minded intermediaries. By the observation of sunspots, he made yet another argument in favour of a heliocentric system as opposed to a geostatic universe.

His theory of the tides is a mistaken one, but ingenious; he was too little concerned with the gravitational effect (although at that time there was no such term for the phenomenon) of the moon. Finally, Galileo first discovered the law that governs the speed of falling bodies related to time elapsed, and distance to the square of the elapsed time, this law, second only to the law of inertia, another non-Aristotelian point of view.

Einstein wrote of him, "A man who possessed the passionate will, the intelligence, and the courage to stand up as the representative of rational thinking against the host of those who, relying on the ignorance of the people and the indolence of teachers in priestly and scholarly garb, maintained and defended their positions of authority. His unusual literary gift enabled him to address the educated man of his age in such clear and convincing language as to overcome the anthropocentric and myth-ridden thinking of his contemporaries."

Professor Drake's book, as either a companion source book, a text book, or a general supplementary pleasure book is witty, well-written and intelligent. He is to be congratulated on gathering a store of technical data which is always readable by either the serious or indolent student. It is a worthy addition to any library shelf.

Prison diary shows Berrigan rationale for non-violence

Prison Journals of a Priest Revolutionary by Philip Berrigan Holt, Rinehart & Winston $7.25

J. Edgar Hoover and Philip Berrigan need each other. Philip Berrigan and his brother Daniel, both pacifist Roman Catholic priests, are leaders of the East Coast Conspiracy to Save Lives. Last November Hoover charged in testimony before the U.S. Senate that Philip and his co-conspirators were conspiring to use kidnapping and sabotage to force Nixon to end the war.

In January Hoover asserted that the specific plan was to blow up heating ducts in government buildings on George Washington's birthday, 22 February, and, on the following day, to whisk away presidential adviser Henry Kissinger. Six persons were hence indicted on the ever-more popular charge of conspiracy.

Hoover's motives are easy to guess at if not to apprehend. He has long seen "masterminds" behind bizarre subversive plots. Skeptics noted, however, that Hoover first articulated the plot while asking Congress for $14.5 million to support 1,000 new agents.

The Berrigans' answer to the indictment was to assert that Hoover sought to stampede the American people into supporting a policy of repression of domestic dissent against militarism. "The objective is a simple but deadly one — to destroy the peace movement by creating caricatures of those who oppose the war in Southeast Asia."

Philip Berrigan's motives are more elusive. The present accusation may smack more of governmental — rather than revolutionary — conspiracy, but Berrigan has practiced direct action in the recent past more than any other American cleric outside the civil rights movement. His Prison Journals are notes of meditations which evidence the feelings as well as the thoughts of the man.

Race was the radicalizing issue which led Philip Berrigan away from the pseudo-life of pontifications. He went through the boot-camp training of a dedicated activist by working with CORE, SNCC, and the Urban League in ghetto parishes in Baltimore, Washington and New Orleans. In 1967, as a member of the "Baltimore Four," he poured blood upon draft files and waited for the police to arrive. "As for the blood," he writes, "it was ours. The FBI made sure of that." In 1968, while on bail, as a member of the "Cattonsville Nine," he napalmed still more draft files.

Believing in the "sanctity of life," he saw these acts as sane in an insane society, as non-violent action against the system of violence. But what was the intended purpose of these acts? They were only nominally obstructive of the machine. As calls to action by fellow dissenters or fellow Catholics they were somewhat lacking. Their theoretical basis is no more than a vague concept of Catholic humanism.

The answer implicit within Berrigan's journals is that these concrete actions of protest serve as public and, more important, personal disassociations from evil. Manichaeism, the conflict of the good and the evil, is perceived as the context of contemporary America. Berrigan feels a constant need to assert that he is part of the solution and not part of the problem.

"What I'm trying to say is this: Our lives, to be agencies of peace, must stand the scrutiny of both God and man, and by man I mean not our peers but the billions of people suffering from war, tyranny, starvation, disease and the burden of color prejudice."

— Jim St. John

New musical of Synge play is quite close to original and is a delight

At first glance it seems like blasphemy. What deviate could take J.M. Synge's Playboy of the Western World, the closest work to poetry in English prose drama, and bring forth a musical comedy? But the transformation from Synge's comedy to the musical The Heart's a Wonder (now playing at the Playhouse) is handled with such good taste that a reasonably successful production results.

In great comedy and poetic flourishes Synge reveals the reality of the village, and the limitations of its inhabitants. Into a shebeen (pub) comes Christy Mahon, frightened and whimpering. To gain food and lodging, he creates an elaborate lie about how he killed his father, and the townspeople treat him as a hero. Gradually Christy is transformed into a poet and playboy, but when his father enters, they are both tossed out.

Adapters Nuala O'Farrell and Maureen Charlton have left Synge's script stand almost uncut. For the songs and dances they have taken traditional Irish melodies and added new words; with the latter they have attempted to retain the flavor of Synge's prose, and usually they succeed. The main complaint about the songs is that, short as each is, there are too many of them, and most are superfluous, for they progress the action hardly at all. But the ones that work are very well-done. Christy's musical telling of his father's murder consists of a lively tune and absolutely grisly facts, exactly what is needed.

Each dancing segment is wonderful. Never too long, and occurring at exactly the right time, each conveys the joy and illustrates Christy's transformation, especially in the picnic celebration. Of course one almost expects this result for the hand, or rather leg of Alan Lund is in top form. One of the best choreographers in Canada, Lund employs long leg stretches, effective manipulation, and original finishes.

But it is Lund as director that raises the production to a higher level, for we see happiness on the stage and an artistic teamwork. The blocking is simple, almost stationary, yet each character is individualized and realized to a great extent.

Vocally problems do arise. When Synge's play was first performed at the Abbey Theatre, the actors could not recite his lines, for they are not normal Irish speech. They solved the problem in 1907 and passed on the answer, but sometimes in this production the words are too fast, and so are blurred. But for the most part reverence is given to Synge's language, and we are able, especially as Christy waxes more eloquent, to indulge ourselves in his superb excesses.

Michael Burgess as Christy and Barbara Kyle as his bold, brassy love (Pegeen Mike) are both effective singers, but neither offers a full characterization, especially when speaking their lines. The supporting company is very strong, with Michael Fletcher as a suitably meek and cowardly suitor to Pegeen, and Bill Hosie and Dennis Thatcher very effective as the drunken permanent inhabitants of the pub. Ann O'Dwyer brightens the stage with her portrayal of the worldly Widow Quinn.

The set is much too large for a shebeen, but is so effectively stylized, and Lund uses its area so well, that we accept its lack of realism. This stylization, as well as the costumes' combination of brightness and dinginess, illustrates the basic dichotomy in the play — poverty and meagre existence, yet joy in living — very well.

It is a good evening of theatre, and is in for at least three weeks, hopefully an indefinite run, and then perhaps Charlottetown this summer. Student rush seats are available at the too high price of three dollars.

ART

At the Ontario Art Gallery until March 23 is an exhibition of seventy-five paintings, drawings, collages and documents by Francis Picabia, a key figure in the early decades of the twentieth century dada movement. Three of his larger works which were shown at the Guggenheim exhibition were not allowed to travel to Toronto, but the collection is otherwise complete. A series of evening lectures and avant-garde films will be shown in conjunction with the exhibition, and will feature films by such greats as Man Ray, Marcel Duchamp and Salvador Dali.

The Las Manantas gallery at 31 Prince Arthur Drive has arranged a showing of Feliciano Bejar's Magiscope, sculptures of glass, metal and plastic in which solid surfaces are broken by their prismatic, kinetic treatment.

At the Isaacs Gallery, 832 Yonge, works by Gar Smith entitled Notes on Light: Prints and Flags will be shown until March 13

The Gallery Pascal, on Yorkville, presents recent etchings of Betty Goodwin until March 21. New paintings and sculpture by Ivan Eyre will be on display at the Morris Gallery until the thirtieth. — L.C.

Edward Albee was in town Wednesday to speak to an enthusiastic audience; indeed, only in Convocation Hall was there room for them all! Albee himself is (surprisingly) young, of course, a good and witty speaker. Unfortunately, as he himself confessed, he had given this particular speech so often that it bores him to hear it again, and it showed; but he shone in the question and answer period that followed. He insisted on the right and duty of a playwright to write "serious, responsible drama" without having to explain it to his audience, and the audience's responsibility to raise itself to his level. In fact, though he titled his Speech The Playwright vs. the Theatre, he meant "the playwright vs. the audience"; his targets were the intellectual sloth of most playgoers, and those of the theatre who bow to their wishes. — D.S.

ROCK

Tom Northcott will close at the Riverboat on Sunday, and will be followed by Kristofferson, a very proficient writer with a mediocre voice who made his mark at the Isle of Wight pop festival last fall. Buddy Rich continues to prove that he is one of the world's top drummers, at the Imperial Room of the Royal York. The World's Greatest Jazz Band tries to live up to its name at the Colonial, and Duke Ellington is drawing large audiences at the Beverly Hills. All of these establishments are somewhat high-priced, and may require shirt and tie.

On March 6th, Delaney and Bonnie will be at Massey Hall, on the 11th, Ravi Shankar will be at York; and from the 19th to the 21st Massey Hall will play host to Lightfoot.

Two folk clubs started up in the city this year, Grumble's on Jarvis and the Fiddler's Green on Eglinton near Yonge. I have been to neither, but both have often been highly recommended lately. i.d.

MUSIC

On Sunday, March 7 at 3:00 p.m., Shambu Das, a disciple of Ravi Shankar and mentor to George Harrison will give an afternoon recital of Classical Indian Music. At the Sivananda Yoga Centre, 193 1/2 Mutual St; phone 863-0565 for information

Tuesday and Wednesday Karel Ancerl conducts the Toronto Symphony in Mahler's Symphony No. 2, Massey Hall, at 8:30 p.m. Also Tuesday at 1:00 p.m., a free lecture by Prof. R. Chandler, "Music Education — Some New Developments" Free, in the EJB Concert Hall.

Thursday (March 11) at 2:00 p.m., a free recital by the Collegium Musicum baroque ensemble at the EJB Concert Hall. At 8:30 p.m. flugelhorn player Fred Stone solos with the TS, Victor Feldbrill conducting in a concert of Handel, Symonds and Sibelius. At Massey Hall. — t.j.

Hart Hutch pix syrupy

A visit to the 49th Annual Exhibit of the Hart House Camera Club at the Hart House gallery is a voyage in time — back to the good old days of Grade 3. How easy life was then, with its swings, puppy-dogs, and water-fountains. Oh how lovely!

"Lovely" was the word most frequently used by the judges, as they pranced about the show. "Beautiful" and "Perfect" received their share of usage as well.

Through the use of our cameras we show the world we live in. Do university students still live in this Grade 3 world? Where are the guts in any of these photographs?

Two of the prints came across quite well — a close-up of an old lady, and a boat at sunset; but an 8-photo essay of a news boy reading the comics is an insult to the intelligence of Mickey Mouse.

I think it's about time the members of the Camera Club stopped patting each other on the back and started thinking what their pictures are all about

Ozawa zowiee

When Seiji Ozawa first came to Toronto in 1965, the Toronto Symphony was a third-rate orchestra recently abandoned by the complacent Maestro Susskind. What Ozawa did with the TS in his four-year tenure here amounts to an almost miraculous metamorphosis.

Ozawa's visit last Tuesday was well timed. Since Karel Ancerl left for his tour a month ago, the orchestra has gradually relapsed into its old habits. Recent occasions have presented weak and wayward violins, insensitive horns and a general lack of unity of thought among the sections. Tuesday's concert cleaned the strings, polished the brass and left us with the promise of better music to come.

The most striking feature of Ozawa's approach is the absolute clarity of purpose he conveys to the orchestra.

The evening's two major offerings, Charles Ives' Fourth Symphony and Witold Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra. The works, written almost fifty years apart, are virtuosic pieces for both conductor and orchestra, yet their juxtaposition seems too much of a loud thing. The question is not one of interpretation but of programming.

The Ives Symphony, written a half-century ahead of its time, presents a complex score interweaving melodies of New England, 1900 AD. This sound collage of popular songs is scored for full orchestra, two pianos, celesta, organ and an expanded percussion section. The actual performance was quite impressive, and the players exhibited rare finesse along with admirable lung power.

The Lutoslawski Concerto is a product of the hard-line communist aesthetic of the fifties, which smiled on folk motifs in music. Yet the concerto maintains an internal unity, contrasting themes and moods rather than groups of instruments. Both in this work and the Ives it was a thrill to hear a rejuvenated cello and viola section and the general coherence of all the voices.

The opening work, Rossini's overture La Gazza Ladra was too fast and brusque. In spite of the obvious military allusions of the snare drum, too fast a reading destroys the tragic dignity of the opening and satirizes the faster parts.

Cop? who's a Cop?

Cops shadow woman in library

By TOM WALKOM

The Sigmund Samuel Library was well guarded Wednesday afternoon, as stone-jawed uniformed and plain-clothes police agents protected the building from a lone woman pamphleteer.

Four undercover agents, nattyly dressed in identical topcoats, with some sporting motoring caps, melted unobtrusively into the normal library crowd while four campus police in uniforms crowded around a walkie-talkie.

The eight policemen were there in case Barbara Joan Biley, a member of the Maoist Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist), attempted to pass out her leaflets inside the library foyer.

By U of T bylaws, it is forbidden to hand out material in the library.

Biley, who was advertising for Wednesday's poor people's banquet, said that early in the day she had entered the building twice. Each time, a secret agent had shadowed her from the distance of approximately two feet, so as to prevent her doing anything illegal.

"At one point," said Biley, "I got so bugged by him that I turned a corner really quickly, whipped around, and he was so close he almost ran into me."

"Boy, was he shook up," she reminisced.

The third time she entered, said Biley, the original pair of police had been reinforced by four others. Biley was told that under no circumstances could she enter the building, and a scuffle broke out as guards tried to evict her.

"At that point I kept yelling 'Why won't you let me in the library!'" said Biley, "and so many students came out to see what was going on they had to let me in."

According to one third year economics student who witnessed the shoving match, Biley did not seem to be passing out literature, but was heading downstairs to the washroom when grabbed by police.

Biley claims she had no literature in her hand the third time.

Police on the spot would not admit they were there for any reason except coincidence. One plainclothesman, when asked what he was guarding, replied: "Guarding? I'm not guarding anything, I'm not a policeman," and hurriedly ran out the front door, returning a few minutes later to confer with uniformed police.

Another uniformed officer told one anxious student there was "no trouble, no trouble at all son."

Police remained huddled inside the huge glass doors, conferring in low tones while Biley distributed newspapers outside.

Waterloo student strike fails

WATERLOO (CUP) — The two-day student strike at Waterloo-Lutheran University on March 1 and 2 over the issue of parity of representation on the contract renewal committee failed to achieve its goal. The strike was called after a strike motion was passed at a general student meeting on Feb. 11. The issue originated with the firing of philosophy professor Joel Hartt last fall.

The Faculty Association, which had previously talked of a three to two faculty-student ratio on the committee, voted Wednesday night to allow student involvement in hiring and firing decisions in an advisory capacity only.

A few classes were interrupted by picketers. Student supporters from the University of Waterloo carried signs and marched through the buildings. Small groups, gathered around each guest speaker. At one point a business professor attempted to oust a student picketer who tried to mobilize his class. The professor however was reprimanded by security.

At present the issue of representation still centres around the dismissal of Hartt, refused contract renewal last fall. Hartt is presently appealing the decision according to the rules and procedures set up by the appeals committee. Early in the appeal, before the strike, the appeals committee sent a letter to the faculty proposing a change in their procedure which would in effect deny the right to appeal.

At a university council meeting the proposal was unanimously rejected. However, the incident underlines the university management's determination to get rid of Hartt and in doing so directly oppose student opinion.

Under these conditions student representation has little hope when the senate meets Monday to make the final decision on parity.

Amazing success of Varsity's swimmers

By PAUL CARSON

A few years ago, a Varsity editorial writer quipped that "nothing's certain about U of T anymore but exams and Claude Bissell."

With both exams and Bissell on their way out, for Varsity sports the only certain thing is a swimming championship — Blues this year won their eleventh straight OQAA title and sixth consecutive national CIAU crown.

Despite an almost total absence of fan support from U of T students, the swimmers have become as predictable as exams and Bissell used to be. Another year, another championship.

Asked to pinpoint the major reason for Blues success, youthful coach Robin Campbell said recently, "it's our concentrated team effort . . . eighteen swimmers dedicated to a common goal — winning."

"Our morale is excellent, and the strong identification with the team brings out that little bit of extra desire from each athlete."

Campbell at 26 is Canada's youngest college swim coach, yet has already produced three national champion teams.

In his undergraduate days, Campbell was always able to peak himself for the important meets and seemed to have a stranglehold on the OQAA and CIAU titles in the 200-yard freestyle.

"Thanks to Robin," says CIAU breaststroke champ Ross Ballantyne, "we are undoubtedly the best prepared team, psychologically at least, in the entire country."

Campbell: swimming not for softies

Coach Robin Campbell, at 26 Canada's youngest swim coach, has already won three nationals.

But you don't win too many meets on psychology alone; Blues also specialize in talent and hard work.

Varsity swimmers currently hold an amazing total of nine OQAA records plus another six at the CIAU level. Last weekend in the national finals, Jim Shaw set a Canadian open record in the 200-yard backstroke and added a CIAU mark in the 100 back. And he's just one member of an eighteen-man team.

Under Campbell's system,

Butterfly specialist Bob Heatley: an example of Varsity's successful development program.

swimming is a six-month sport, sometimes with two practices each day.

"Swimming isn't for softies," he says, "our practices are hard, long and drudgerous."

"Most of the team members are in the pool ten months a year. Of all Varsity athletes, I'd say swimmers are in the best physical condition and I think our success reflects that stress on conditioning."

Because of the close identification of each individual athlete with the success of the team, most Varsity swimmers compete for the full five years permitted by current CIAU standards. This situation creates a solid core of experienced veterans and allows rookies to spend a season or two developing their best stroke.

CIAU butterfly champ Bob Heatley is a classic example of how well the Varsity system operates.

As Campbell explains, "Bob spent two years swimming distance freestyle races before he settled on the butterfly. We had the other veterans to pile up the points 'till he was ready, then he took over. Now Bob's unbeatable in the 100 fly and a finalist in the 200."

Heatley went out in style, breaking his own record with a 52.6 for the 100 fly at the CIAU finals.

Sidelined by the five-year eligibility rule, he'll become "strictly a social swimmer", play some water polo and get through law school.

Altogether Blues lose four swimmers by eligibility and graduation — Heatley, freestyler Doug MacIntosh, Terry Bryon and co-captain Barry Bowerman.

"If you want to stay on top, losing four of the top twelve swimmers is not a good idea," says Campbell tearfully.

Then one sees the results of his active high school recruiting campaign and suspects the tears are largely of the crocodile variety.

POOLTALK . . . Blues famed swimming depth also applies to the coaching staff which included SuperShrink Jed Graef (a former All-American swimmer at Princeton) plus diving mentor Jim Lacosse from California . . . kudos as well to rookie manager Dave McWatters and physiologist Gaetne Godin . . . Blues co-captains had a good year as breaststroker Barry Bowerman is going on to the summer national trials and freestyler Mike Guinness won twice at the OQAA finals and a personal best in the 200 at the CIAU ranks him among Canada's top five freestylers . . . outstanding rookie Nick Rottman broke Mike Chapelle's venerable team record in the 200 breaststroke with a 2:21.0 at the CIAU's.

New, Erindale win; hockey playoffs are near quarter-finals

Erindale and New College became the sixth and seventh teams to earn spots in the 1971 Jennings Cup intramural hockey quarter-finals with playoff victories earlier this week.

The eighth and final berth will be decided this afternoon when defending champion St. Mikes (4th in the premiere division) meets Innis College (2nd in the fourth division) at 12:30 p.m.

PHE A, Scarborough, Sr. Engineering, Vic 1 and Business won automatic quarter-final positions as a result of their regular season record.

Erindale, who easily trounced Forestry A 7-0 in a preliminary round game Wednesday evening, will meet the Engineers (2nd in the premiere division) Tuesday night at 7:30 p.m.

New College, coached by Varsity Blues' star Bill Buba, edged Vic II, 4-3, in an overtime game yesterday afternoon and will face the powerful PhysEders Monday afternoon at 12:30.

John Wright's PHE crew topped the first division with an impressive 11-2 mark.

Other quarter-final match-ups feature Scarborough — Vic I (Monday, 9:30 p.m.) and the winner of today's St. Mikes clash with Innis against Business (Tuesday, 9:45 p.m.).

Gareth Gostlow was the man-of-the-hour in the New triumph over the Vic II's as he scored twice, including the winner in extra time.

On the water polo scene, play-down action for the Echhardt Trophy has advanced to the semi-final stage.

First-round results saw Knox College edge Medicine, 11-10; Dentistry nip U.C., 7-6; Engineering down St. Mikes, 6-3 and Law best Innis, 11-8.

Semis feature Law — Engineering and Knox — Dents battles.

Both games are slated for Tuesday night in the Hart House pool.

SAC presidential hopefuls off and running

THE Varsity TORONTO

VOL. 91 — NO. 57
MON., MAR. 8, 1971

By A. WALDO RUMP

The annual U of T thoroughbred steeplechase, otherwise known as the SAC presidential election, has burst upon an unsuspecting student body.

The current epidemic of signs, speeches, and sloganeering will culminate in an unprecedented two day frenzy of votecasting on March 17 and 18.

Four students are vying for the $4,800 full-time presidency and another four are competing for the part-time vice-presidency.

Two slates are running from the SAC establishment: Bob Spencer (III UC) with Phil Dack (II Erin), and Owen Dick (IV UC) with Dave Slater (III ApSc).

Spencer is this year's SAC Education Commissioner while Dick is Communications Commissioner. Dack and Slater are both SAC reps.

Alice Klein (II Innis) and Katie Curtin (II SMC), the only women in the campaign, are running on the Young Socialist ticket.

unattached vice-presidential entry.

Larry Dahlke (II ApSc) is the fourth presidential candidate.

Wortzman and Dick-Slater are interviewed in today's Varsity. Profiles of the other candidates will follow on Wednesday.

This year's campaign does not promise to be excessively exciting as issues seem to be few and far between. No public forums or debates between the candidates are planned.

But if the candidates devote all their energies to individual "meet the folks" campaigning, they may yet give the student body a run for its money.

Only The Shadow knows for sure.

Dick-Slater appeal to 'average student'

Candidate Owen Dick (right) for pres and running mate Dave Slater.

By TONY USHER

Owen Dick and Dave Slater are coolly and crisply organized in their drive for the SAC presidency and vice-presidency. Behind their guarded and careful public image lies a deep commitment to reorienting SAC to the more traditional role of a student's council.

Dick and Slater were both SAC reps this year. Dick from University College and Slater from Applied Science. Both were active on council and Dick became Communications Commissioner in mid-year.

They form one of the two "insider" tickets in the race and are portraying themselves as somewhat more conservative than their rivals Bob Spencer and Phil Dack.

Owen Dick would like to see the SAC concern itself primarily with problems facing the whole student body. He views educational issues as being primarily local questions to be dealt with by students in the faculty concerned.

"I'm prepared to stick my neck out a bit — we need parity on the top governing structure of the university", said Dick. But "confrontation should be a last resort."

"I can talk quite well to (history) Professor Jim Conacher", he noted, and Slater suggested, "if you took him down over a few drinks and discussed parity..."

Dick criticized SAC involvement in the strike, which he sees as a local issue. "During the strike you couldn't find (Education Consultant Craig) Heron or (Research Assistant Ken) McEvoy in their offices. Their first duty should be to SAC."

Slater and Dick are gunning at SAC's "fiscal irresponsibility", and would cut

Mac's George Grant to go if strike fails

HAMILTON (CUP) — Unless McMaster's political science department meets the demands of striking students, it will lose one of its most noted professors.

George Grant, philosopher and political scientist, announced Friday to hundreds of cheering students attending a Canadian nationalism teach-in that he is prepared to quit unless a Canadian studies program is set up.

Close to half the university's political science students have been on strike since Monday. They are protesting too little Canadian content and too many American-trained professors.

Grant, author of "Lament for a Nation" and "Technology and Empire," said it was ridiculous for students to have to resort to a strike to have the university teach Canadian subjects.

"I do not blame the Americans. I blame the administration for allowing such a situation to arise," he said.

Students may buy McLelland-Stewart

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Students' councils across the country are being asked to support a scheme to keep the McLelland and Stewart Ltd. publishing firm in Canadian hands.

The proposal, hatched last week by a committee of students at the University of British Columbia, calls for purchase of the company by a consortium of student societies, university administrations and the public through debenture sales and operation as a non-profit company.

The proposal would preserve publishing of important Canadian authors and would make Canadian content textbooks available at a more reasonable cost to students.

The Ryerson Publishing Company was recently purchased by American interests and it is feared the McLelland and Stewart firm may suffer the same fate.

Jack McLelland, sole owner of the 63-year-old firm which was offered for sale last month, told the committee that it would take between 3- and 3.5 million dollars to take over the financially ailing business which has debts of about 2 million dollars.

The student committee believes it is possible to raise the money and McLelland has indicated he is "intrigued" by the proposal.

"McLelland considered it a serious idea. When we make a concrete proposal, he will be willing to consider it a serious proposal," said committee chairman Jerry Owne. "We have to show him within the next month that the funds are available."

Councils across the country have been asked to consider the proposal in principle and commit themselves tentatively.

"With commitments, we can get short term bank loans and be in a position to bargain," Owne said.

There are no formal plans yet as to how the company would operate but it is clear that a university financed national publishing house would go heavily into textbook publishing for elementary and secondary schools as well as universities.

Student demands can be met: Watkins

If it becomes clear to provincial authorities that students demand change, these authorities will influence the universities to grant the student demands. U of T economics professor Mel Watkins said Friday afternoon.

Speaking in the same session. Trent University political science professor Denis Smith asserted, "Our universities are more than ever before the creatures of the state."

If Premier Davis declares a priority for Canadian university teaching appointments, the universities will respect it, he said.

Alec Lucas, a McGill University English professor, maintained that there is a strong correlation between course content and nationality of the staff teaching the courses.

He insisted, "We have a Canadian imagination and a distinctive cultural perspective."

Lucas said university calendars reveal a "disregard, if not a denigration for our literature." "Many Americans (teaching in Canada) have seized upon Canada as their last hope" to bring the American dream into fruition, he claimed.

However, Smith placed more blame for the lack of a Canadian perspective in his discipline on structure and attitude rather than the nationality of teaching staff.

Canadians must be cultural producers

If the problem of parallel power was legitimate during the Quebec crisis, then it is definitely legitimate in the case of foreign control of Canada, according to U of T political economy professor Abraham Rotstein.

He was opening last weekend's conference on "The Canadianization of Post-Secondary Education," co-sponsored by the Committee for an Independent Canada and the Grad Students' Association of OISE.

Speaking later, he said that many feel it is already too late to save Canada. "It's not clear that we'll win the struggle, but we have no option but to give to it a total commitment."

Canadians can either remain perpetually dependent consumers of culture or can become producers of their own culture, he said.

He dismissed the myth about culture being international in character. "No production of culture derives from anything resembling an international environment," he maintained. "Production of culture must be national, consumption of it is international."

Although enjoyed by the world, the Abbey Theatre is distinctively Irish in character, he noted.

Unless we recognize the rights of our community as at least as valid as individuals' rights, there's no hope for saving Canada, he said.

The "national mood is beginning to move and stem the tide," he concluded.

Most of the new Canadian political science appointments are "little influenced by the Canadian spirit and have little bearing on our political Canadian destiny."

That's because whatever the purported subject matter, Canadian political science is merely imitative of American political science, he said.

Smith declared that we "need a philosophical and moral study which penetrates the political malaise of the study and offers alternative visions of a better social order."

The present emphasis on political science as opposed to political theory rules out such a development, he said, because it accepts systems as legitimate simply because they exist. He described political science as "the cement for the system."

Political theory, on the contrary, aims not at rigour and economy but instead at a humane, practical prescription for social improvement, according to Smith.

Such political thought is awkward and at awkward times, like in Quebec in November, people resent political thought. Although most political scientists are afraid to be subversives, they shouldn't be, he said. If they weren't afraid, we'd have a really distinctive Canadian approach to political science, he concluded.

"Our hope lies in a new generation of students," he said. He noted that students in his department are more interested in political economy than his colleagues.

Another peek into the future . . .

Skuleman could occupy Bissell's hotspot

By BERNARD REDBARN

• One of a series.

(As the Presidential Search Committee embarks on its round of endless secret meetings in order to pick a new president for U of T, we take a peek at one of the candidates.)

UNLESS THEY ACT QUICKLY to block such a move, the engineers may find themselves with new U of T president who was a SAC rep, and who speaks Russian and has visited the USSR — their own dean.

Dr. James Milton Ham, Professor and Dean of the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering since 1966, is considered by many to be one of the most likely candidates for Claude Bissell's job from within the U of T.

Ham, now 50, was born in Coboconk Ontario. He attended Runnymede Collegiate in Toronto, and received his B.A.Sc. from the University of Toronto in 1943, graduating from the department of Electrical Engineering with the highest marks ever awarded in the Faculty (they've been tied once).

He spent the rest of the war in the Navy, returning to teach in the Veterans' Rehabilitation program. He then went to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where he obtained his S.M. in 1947, and his Sc.D. in '52. He was appointed Assistant Professor of Electrical Engineering at MIT in '51.

Dr. Ham returned to Toronto in 1952 to become Associate Professor of Electrical Engineering, in charge of teaching and research in feedback control systems, an area of study that is vital to automation and automatic control. He quickly became a consultant to various companies engaged in processing. It was at this time, in fact (55-'57) that he was a staff representative on the SAC.

Ham became a full professor in 1959, and chairman of the department in 1964. In 1966 he was made Dean of the Faculty.

He is the author of the widely used textbook "Scientific Bases of Electrical Engineering" (which he co-authored with "smooth Gord" Slemmon, who replaced Ham as chairman of the Department of Electrical Engineering).

HAM IS GENERALLY VIEWED as being a "tough liberal". He was instrumental in getting student positions on the governing council of the Faculty of Applied Science. He has always been concerned with the quality of teaching in Engineering, and he is interested in alternatives to present methods of education. Recently he has shown interest in teaching evaluations, which would be a fairly radical step for a professional faculty.

In 1970, Ham ran for one of the 20 positions open for senior academic administrators on the University-Wide Committee. He placed second, with 96 votes, narrowly exceeding two other presidential possibilities, Arts and Science Dean Albert Allen and UC Principal Archie Hallett who tied for third with 92 (there was a total of 141 votes cast, out of a possible 168). He was elected by his "estate" in the UWC to serve on the Steering Committee, which became the only forum for any real discussion.

He surprised many by voting for staff-student parity on the new top-governing structure in the vote of the plenary session of the UWC on June 2, 1970.

DURING MEETINGS of the steering committee of the UWC, Ham was loathe to allow the word "power" to be used when discussing decision-making in the university — he always insisted that it be broken into its constituent parts; authority and responsibility.

SAC Information Officer Ken McEvoy, who served with Ham on the Steering Committee, commented:

"His view of university governing structures appears to be hierarchical or authoritarian. Even though he supports student participation, perhaps even to parity, he does not seem to believe in democratization. His major areas of disagreement with student positions could be accountability and recall."

Often made fun of in the Engineering Society newspaper, the Toike Oike, Ham has also used the pages of the paper for more serious purposes.

Last fall, for instance, he handed out some free advice on job-hunting to his students, in an item headlined "an epistle to the masses."

"IF YOU WANT TO BE A CHIEF before you prove yourself to be a good Indian," he counselled, "acquire modesty before it is too late."

Engineering, he stressed, is not a narrowly technical skill. There are no barriers to stop an engineer from applying for a role in a field outside his strict sphere of competence, he stressed.

"Engineering is based upon understanding, creating and managing technological change as an agent for shaping, with economy of resources, the physical informational and organizational environment for man."

"There are more roles to be carried out than there are 'jobs' on the lists," he warned.

Just as Claude Bissell used to urge students to be "angular — not spherical", Ham likes to stress the challenge, excitement and creativity of the engineer's social function.

"BUILD CANADA," HE EXHORTS, "It's a great place!"

Ham is married, and has three children. According to Who's Who, he is a Liberal, an Anglican, and a member of Sigma Xi. His hobbies are sailing, skiing, pottery, and Russian.

Can an Engineer find happiness as the president of Canada's greatest multiversity?

Will they even let him try?

Dick-Slater want more social activities

• from page 1

"handouts" to outside organizations which have little relevance to the campus and don't involve large numbers of students.

They singled out for criticism the Varsity Downtown Education Project, which received $14,000 this year, as "primarily a welfare organization", and the Black Student's Union, which received $5,000.

Dick also wants to trim the expensive SAC bureaucracy. "Several positions could be eliminated without a decrease in efficiency."

He sees The Varsity as "irresponsible and unrepresentative of campus opinion" and wants to trim its budget by about $10,000. To complement it, Dick would publish a SAC bulletin about every two weeks to give students a better idea of SAC activities.

"Let's get onto the social problem", enthused Dave Slater. Dick and Slater want to channel more funds into the Blue and White and other social activities.

Slater's U of T is "a cold place basically, with one of the worst social programmes of any university around." Name entertainers, an Oktoberfest, and a giant winter carnival using Scarborough and Erindale would provide campus focus and draw the disparate parts of the university community together.

Dick and Slater would also channel more funds to the professional schools. The local councils in the other faculties would receive a per capita rebate equivalent to that granted to Arts and Science for course unions.

Dick is also pushing for an early start on the campus centre plans developed by SAC and the Architecture faculty.

In these ways the average student would receive "more direct benefit for his $13 SAC fees".

While Owen Dick and Dave Slater talked of a role for SAC in securing parity, and in fighting for better student aid and against the Educational Opportunity Bank, their main concern seems to be to relate to the "average students" conspicuous by their noninvolvement in the university.

"Students are basically social creatures and if SAC gives them something they won't be down on SAC", was Slater's rationale.

"At a football game you get 'rah, rah, U of T' and it's neat because it's almost electric", he added.

Owen Dick had the last word. "It may be old fashioned but this is what we need."

Ubiquitous Bernie helps out

Blue and White's Mo to try for office

By LAURA KELLY

"Day One was a fiasco. The people were trying to run their own little Woodstock, but they didn't know where to get cheap groups, or the right sound system, and they had bad publicity." Mo Wortzman sat in the Varsity office last night and talked about his plan for the Vice-presidency if he wins the coming contest.

Wortzman is a third year political science student at New College and chairman of the Blue and White Society at U of T. He was accompanied by the ubiquitous Bernie Teitelbaum, his rather wordy campaign manager.

"The Day One people spent about $5,000, the amount of our whole year's budget at Blue and White, and they only got about 800 people. We've had 8,000 people at our events this year," said Wortzman.

Wortzman identified the problem as one of expertise. Social organizers around campus have little knowledge of efficiency or organization, even the men and women of SAC, asserts Wortzman.

"Mo here is in the position of knowing the social situation on campus. He could be the coordinator of events, and create a system that stretches financing," urged Teitelbaum.

Wortzman figures that the vice-president is more than just an extension of the president, but able to have his own interests and goals for the year. Wortzman is running alone.

"If there were someone on the SAC executive to whom the social organizers could turn, someone who understands how to get activities going, and someone who can interest the rest of SAC in these programs, we'd get around all the apathy here," said Wortzman.

The Blue and White Society had to forego the annual Lightfoot concert, and even the traditional formal dance because of lack of funds this year.

Wortzman and Teitelbaum maintain that the money they did wrest from SAC came too late. "A good program has to be planned a year ahead of time. You can't plan an activity in mortal fear that you'll be broke," said Wortzman.

All the same, the Blue and White still broke even on their budget loan of $5,000, and they'll be able to repay the whole thing.

"In September when we got the money everyone thought we'd be back in two months for more. There was no way SAC expected us to get through the year on the budget," said Teitelbaum, who edited the Starecase, the Blue and White paper.

"But people won't be interested if we don't get some more money. With a small budget you can only have small events, and then everyone accuses you of not running a good program because there are small turnouts," said Wortzman.

Competence and expertise can expand any budget. "With $300,000 SAC should be able to deliver $2 million worth of services," says Wortzman.

He explained that the money that was given to the Black Students' Union from SAC could have been raised by SAC through benefits or shows, but apparently SAC didn't feel that it was worth the effort. "It was easier just to give the $5,000," said Wortzman.

So Wortzman is running alone with the aim of expanding the U of T on-campus life. "If you get people down here on campus, then they'll get involved in other things," said Wortzman.

McMaster in crisis: Chairman is American

By SAMUEL LOUNT

Hamilton's McMaster University is in the throes of a major crisis over the Americanization of Canadian higher education. The political science department has been strikebound for seven days.

Reporter Lount this weekend visited McMaster, where a highly successful teach-in called "Keep it Canadian" was the focus for intense argument and political fireworks.

HAMILTON — The political science department at McMaster University has 13 American citizens and five Canadians.

It is chaired by an American — Howard Lentner — who was imported three years ago from the United States in order to chair the department.

"He's been running it like a tight business, actively discriminating against Canadians," says one Canadian who looked for a job at McMaster but didn't get one.

This kind of charge seems to be well-supported by the evidence.

Early last month Lentner and his colleagues decided to change a proposed Canadian foreign policy course into one in international politics.

Lentner defended the change by saying the Canadian foreign policy course was "too restrictive for hiring purposes."

It was this development which sparked the beginning of student attempts to halt the de-Canadianization of their political science department.

Last year, in an attempt to organize a graduate school at McMaster, Lentner imported more than 20 graduate students from the United States.

All of them were awarded $3500 fellowships. This is an especially sore point with students in view of the Ontario government's recent announcement of a 30 per cent cutback in graduate fellowships, making it even more difficult for Canadian students to gain financial support.

BOTH OF THESE INCIDENTS sum up the reasons for the now-tense situation at McMaster.

The students on strike are demanding student parity on the departmental council and active steps to ensure the Canadianization of their department.

The students also want the dismissal of Lentner as department chairman.

One of Lentner's main contentions is that "there are no qualified" Canadians to teach political science."

But he was put on the spot at this weekend's teach-in, while sitting on a panel discussion on Canadian education.

U OF T STUDENT LARRY HAIVEN, chairman of the 85 per cent Quota Campaign (which is collecting a petition in support of Canadianizing Canadian universities), chased Lentner off the stage with his persistent questioning and ridicule of the chairman.

Haiven asked Lentner if he thought a PhD from Columbia was a good degree. Lentner refused to answer.

Haiven went on to point out that a qualified Canadian with a gold-medal PhD from Columbia and a renowned expert in Political Theory is without a job.

"Dr. George Hagggar is one of the foremost political theorists in North America," said Haiven.

"IF YOU WANT A QUALIFIED CANADIAN, we all know he's one — and he's looking for a job right now. I want you to stand up here, Mr. Lentner, and say you'll hire George Hagggar, or I call you a liar and an imperialist," Haiven continued.

Hagggar has been blackballed by every university in Canada where he has applied.

Hagggar is a leader of the Arab Federation of Canada and an outspoken opponent of American control of Canada.

LENTNER'S POLICIES HAVE ALSO come under attack from inside McMaster, where one U.S. professor, Klaus Pringsheim, charges the "departmental mafia" is ignoring Canadians in favour of Americans.

"The Canadian is nigger in his own country," says Pringsheim.

The Myth of Canadian Generosity

THIS IS A NEW YEAR, and it's the time to make new resolutions and demolish old myths. For me there is one myth that I would like to send to hell and back and that is the myth of Canadian generosity.

At a New Year's party one inebriated celebrant proceeded to tell me just how generous he and his fellowmen were since they were paying for my higher education. My reply to him was frankly unprintable. But just in case there are others who think that the few students from the Caribbean are responsible for the tight money situation in Canada, I shall take some time to put them straight.

The plain truth of the matter is that Canadian business is slowly milking the Caribbean islands dry. Furthermore, if present trends continue, the natives would have to look for shelter under the Atlantic Ocean. Since Jacques Cousteau has not built his undersea kingdom as yet, these folks would indeed be in big trouble.

IT IS ESTIMATED THAT CANADIAN businessmen have invested close to one billion dollars in the Caribbean — in Guianese bauxite, Bahamas hotels, Trinidad oil, Jamaican minerals, and in banks, hotels, and insurance companies through the islands. These investments bring in close to four hundred million dollars in profits annually. In other words, one million dollars a day or six hundred dollars every minute of every day.

O.K. — let us say that a twenty per cent profit on investment is reasonable. Clearly this figure of forty per cent is unconscionable, and there are those who say that is a conservative estimate. Men like Taylor of Toronto, and Kramer of Regina, have their hands deep in this kind of commercial robbery. Only they call it playing the businessmen's game.

But this, my friends, is a very ruthless game, where the big boys make the rules, which they change to suit their convenience. If you play along with them, you are a nice guy, even if your country is being viciously raped. If you don't play their game, they have nice words for you like "Commun---", you know the rest.

THE LATEST DEVELOPMENT IS LAND SPECULATION. Some Canadian businessmen are buying out the land in the islands at exorbitant prices. Naturally the local people can't compete, and will soon become landless in their own country. The only alternative is to throw the damn Canadians and Americans out, before it is too late.

As for other examples of Canadian business, let us take the case of a bottle of rum. It is bought in the islands for one dollar, brought to Canada, diluted and bottled, then sold for six dollars. That is a six hundred per cent increase and all the extras go into the pockets of Canadian businessmen and the Canadian treasury. This is known as having a preferential market. (Ha, ha, ha.)

NOW IN ALL THIS, THERE IS ONE PERSON whom I blame more than any other, and that is the West Indian politician. Too many acquiesce in the rape of their countries, too many fill their own pockets (via Swiss numbered accounts, what a ghastly device!) Too many are just plain stupid. They don't realize that in the game they are playing with big business, the cards are stacked against them, and they don't have a hope in hell of winning. I say let's find another game with fairer rules.

To return to this figure of four hundred million dollars. If we take the annual operational budget for Regina Campus to be thirty million dollars, then we see that the islands donate the equivalent of twelve such campuses to Canada every year in profits. To put it another way, if there are one thousand Caribbean students in Canada now, then it costs our governments one thousand dollars per student per day. Pretty high class education, wouldn't you say. Just imagine the kind of exchange program we could inaugurate, if we had these twelve campuses available in the islands.

But that "if" takes me back a bit. If the British had not kept the slaves uneducated for two hundred years — if they had built universities, instead of filling the British Exchequer. If they . . . I could go on and on, but I won't. All I will say is that we remember the British for many things, all of them bad.

BUT LET ME RETURN TO THE CANADIANS. I don't know what their exact foreign aid figures are, but I would hazard a guess that it is no more than the profits received from the islands. In other words, we replace all the foreign aid expenditures that Canada undertakes.

Are West Indians mad about the situation? The answer is yes! What can we do about it? Plenty . . . and soon too! Meanwhile we manage to keep our cool, until someone accuses us of sponging off the Canadian taxpayer.

THE TRUTH OF THE MATTER IS THAT THERE are generous Canadians. But the Canadian government is not especially generous with its aid, and Canadian businessmen have yet to hear the word.

The troubles of a transexual in Toronto

By DEIRDRE HUNTER

The word "transexual" is possibly the most misunderstood word in sexual terminology. It does not mean homosexual as many people believe, and it certainly doesn't mean transvestism. The fact is that it is a combination of both.

The basic differences are that a homosexual is quite happy with homosexual partners, whereas a transexual is interested in having a normal relationship with a member of the opposite sex. This causes great social conflict.

Mine is a case in point:

Since my early years I have always identified with the feminine things in life. I found it very difficult to get along with boys and was much more comfortable with girls. My early sexual drives were directed towards males.

As I got older, I got involved with the homosexual community. This was the only course open to me if I wished to have sex with other males. The most attractive males to me naturally were the most masculine ones (about .0005 of the gay world.)

As time passed, I became a drag queen (we do evolve, don't we?). Eventually, it became my way of life.

After several years of drag, I approached a doctor in Toronto who promised he could help me if two psychiatrists agreed. Both did.

The operation involves castration as the first step, followed by the creation of a vagina (usually constructed from the sensitive penial skin). This usually guarantees a reasonable sex life.

The great white doctor booked me into a Catholic hospital and performed mammary implantations (silicone bags inserted into the breast cavity, after extensive hormone therapy to elasticize the tissue). He promised to do the remainder of the operation in 3 months.

Deirdre Hunter

At the end of that period I approached him. He voiced moral trepidation about the whole thing. I complied by seeing one of Canada's leading theologians. He came to the conclusion that if you could not fit the mind to the body, it may be necessary, and quite morally acceptable to change the body to fit the mind. The doctor still refused to do it.

I wandered about Toronto trying to find a physician to help me. Eventually, I found one who would castrate me. He charged me $100 and that was that. Even after this irrevocable step, I could find no further help.

If I had a letter from two doctors saying that I had to have my tonsils removed, they would be removed. I do have a letter that states my penis should be removed and it is not. How far have we progressed when the very question of anything sexual has doctors running in a scurry. When a medical man doesn't even have the decency to carry out his promises both as a doctor and a person, who can one trust?

I understand that the operation would not be the complete answer. It is, however, a partial answer to an impossible situation. I don't suppose that I shall ever be a real woman, but as it is, I am certainly not a real man.

Women's Lib states that a woman should be able to make decisions about her own body. I ask to be permitted to make a decision about mine. I certainly do not need any psychiatrist's opinion (they are every bit as maladjusted as you or I). If I decide that this will benefit my life, I should simply have it done. Who has to live my life? "It's gotta be me."

I am not the only person in this position. Two of my friends committed suicide because of the futility of this situation. I won't. I'm not really strong or brave enough to. I am brave enough to stand up for my rights, not so much as a man or woman, but as a human being. (I'm one of you, you know.)

'Creativity is not escapism'

Albee's theatre is free dialogue with society

By MARINA STRAUSS

Edward Albee walked inconspicuously to the podium. Slow, steady, and serene, he looked around at the huge crowd in Convocation Hall, gripped the lectern, and with a scant smile on his face, asked forgiveness for "the natural disorder of my mind. It is an occupational disease."

Albee, the 42-year-old playwright from New York, whose plays include "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf," "The Zoo Story", and "The American Dream," was originally to speak at 4:30 last Wednesday afternoon at Hart House Theatre. But on account of an anticipated large turn-out, the playwright was rescheduled to the auditorium of the Medical Science Building. By 4:15, the auditorium was overflowing with people right out to the lobby, and there were scores of disappointed Albee fans. The crowd was soon informed of the change of location, and the masses pushed their way, like a herd of sheep, to Convocation Hall to secure a seat. The Hall was practically filled up.

It was worth the trek through the cold air and rushing mob; it was worth the extra wait, the extra worry. Albee was cool. He was alert. He said what he had to say, clear and short, a subtle humour, and he captured the attention of his audience with ease.

"A play is a political activity. It has a function to change the status quo. It has to be the national conscience." He viewed the attentive crowd placidly. "When I speak at universities, they say 'Oh, He's off to corrupt youth'. I suppose I am. If it wasn't for you, there'd be no use. You can do something about the general semantic breakdown in the arts. The audience can't be a vacuum."

Albee urged that our arts must begin to serve us. "Art is not escape, it is engagement". He said that in the Sixties, dialogue had begun between the writer and his public.

"If society doesn't have the will and stamina to support a free dialogue with the playwright, then it deserves what it gets".

He compared the good writer to the bad writer: "The good writer states reality, the bad writer restates reality; the good writer puts fact into truth; the bad writer puts truth into fact; the good writer says what he believes is true; the bad writer says what the audience believes is true; the good writer places the public's intelligence on the same level as his own; the bad writer placed it below his own".

Now Albee pauses. Very dramatic. He continues. "And, of course, the good writer dies; the bad writer reproduces".

The crowd at Convocation Hall was certainly put to its test. Moved by Albee's forceful convictions, challenging as they were, it reacted in general awe and praise of the man's commitments.

More people are exposed to bad work than they proportionally are to good works, Albee observed, because good works are not escapism. He tried not to blatantly put down Neil Simon, (a successful Broadway writer) but his point wasn't lost.

"Neil Simon makes $100,000 a week in his trade and profession; Samuel Beckett is lucky if he earns half that in a year in his trade and profession".

Albee spoke pessimistically about the present conditions in the United States today. His discerning, quiet style would constantly catch the audience off guard:

"We have quite a lot to worry about" he started, in a methodic and simple tone of voice. "We have a President".

Pause . . . Reaction. Pause again.

We wait.

"He is the most unpopular President since . . . well, since his predecessor".

The laughter that ensued was largely from the unexpectedness of the comment.

Albee is disturbed by the American government. "It thinks it can get out of a war by invading any country that gets in its way".

Of the general public in the States, Albee is dismayed at its willingness to give up a great many of its freedoms for security.

"But I do not admire the society of the Soviet Union" he declared. There is the same stultifying atmosphere of self-delusion and repression both in Russia and in the U.S., but, he finds, in the former, the arts are controlled at the top, and in the States, the arts are controlled by the proletariat, away from the status quo.

Albee added, in his unassuming way, that the most creative persons are put into mental institutions. "The home of sanity is the insane asylum".

"There is no theatre culture in the U.S." Albee stated. "It is even considered an erotic, indecent act to go to the theatre". Albee believes that American writers are being encouraged to lie to their audiences. "They congratulate their audience and tell them that everything is alright".

But live theatre has not yet been weighed down by commercialism. It still has its use — both in education and in entertainment. The critics were sharply attacked by Albee. "The creative writer is the only critic. If we have people who can't judge for themselves, how can we have an art form?"

It is the responsibility of the artist not to leave the art form where he found it. It must progress. The people who receive the arts have a responsibility to be willing to "suffer an important occasion." The artist must choose between what he wants to say and what the critic wants him to say. Albee does not find fault only in the critic: it is the general public he also blames.

Albee sees himself as the creative artist. He is confident of his abilities, and he is conscious of the world around him and his relationship to it as an artist. For the world around him is his art. One of the most dynamic of contemporary playwrights, he exposes the fundamental essence, corruptness, and wounds of modern society.

Albee showed himself as being in contact with this society. He is not withdrawn, though perhaps aloof. He does not fear challenge; he fears apathy and adherence.

It's a cliché that the artist seeks Truth. Albee seeks communication with his audience. Truth will be obtained through dialogue.

Albee's most recent play, "All Over", is now in rehearsal and will be performed in three weeks in New York.

LES SOLDATS SONT PARTIS.

IT'S A LONG WAY TO OTTAWA

La mission de l'armée prend fin

C'est à la fin de leur après-midi que l'armée de la Justice... Les forces de la Justice... Les forces de la Justice...

L'armée est partie! Je ne m'en étais pas aperçue!! pensz donc. C'est vrai que j'arrive de vacances et qu'il se passe un tas de choses plus importantes de ce temps-ci!! Comme par exemple les 100,000 jobs qu'on cherche encore et toujours!!!

C'est vrai qu'il est fait ça bien chèrement.

He bien croyez-moi, le départ des soldats, c'est un grand malheur! Parceque les armées d'occupation apportent toujours quelque chose. Souvent c'est la prospérité!!!

Retrait graduel mais non définitif des troupes par exemple, en juin 1940, l'occupation allemande a apporté un peu d'excitation dans un Paris qui s'ennuyait.

Et puis ce fut le seul moment où on peut trouver à Paris un bon orchestre Bourgeois, et boire une bonne bière.

après 1945 les USA ont occupé le Japon. C'est ce qui a aidé ce pays à devenir la deuxième puissance industrielle au monde.

... et à avoir un des meilleurs clubs de baseball au monde.

Maintenant ils sont au Viet-Nam. C'est sans doute par souci de humanité, pour aider les petits enfants pauvres à se faire un peu d'argent de poche avec le marché noir.

He bien au Québec, c'est la même chose au temps de l'occupation, les soldats, il fallait bien qu'ils mangent... ça faisait des jobs et de l'argent pour les cuisiniers qui faisaient les sandwiches aux tomates...

ça donnait du travail aux boulangers qui cuisaient le pain pour faire les sandwiches.

ça donnait un surplus de revenus aux cultivateurs qui produisaient les tomates pour mettre dans les sandwiches.

Et puis 6000 soldats qui font le trottoir... ça fait 12,000 semelles qui s'usent...

ce qui donnait du travail à 12,000 cordonniers...

les cordonniers eux employaient le cuir fournit par les... du Québec

Et puis il y avait beaucoup de jeunes filles qui...

Sans compter l'entretien des nombreux véhicules moteurs de l'armée d'occupation...

voici un organigramme qui montre bien comment la présence de l'armée peut aider l'économie québécoise...

Et puis comme ils sont partis... tous ces honnêtes travailleurs québécois... décidément Bourassa n'a pas de chance avec ses 100,000 jobs.

Great support for quotas

By ALEX PODNICK

Overwhelming support for a quota system for foreign teaching staff at Canadian universities was expressed at this weekend's conference on Canadianization of post-secondary education held at OISE.

This support indicated rejection of a directive issued by the Ontario Human Rights Commission last spring. The OHRC cautioned Ontario universities against treating Canadian applicants for teaching positions preferentially.

The directive and subsequent letters between University of Waterloo president H. E. Petch and OHRC officials were produced by Carleton University English professor Robin Matthews during a conference session. OHRC officials recently refused to provide Matthews with copies of this correspondence.

On June 9, 1970, Petch wrote the commission to express his approval of the directive. He complained that "the universities are coming under considerable pressure to restrict employment of non-Canadians."

There is rapidly growing support on Canadian campuses for a quota system. One petition currently being circulated demands that 85% of all university teaching staff be Canadians.

Petch asked the commission whether its directive also applied to non-Canadians not resident in Canada. OHRC director Daniel G. Hill commented, "We would hope that nationality would not be considered when you are reviewing job applicants from other countries."

He noted that the commission would have to consider processing any complaint from non-resident foreigners who felt they had been denied positions because of their nationality.

McLelland up for grabs

• from page 1

Owne said the Canadian publishing of textbooks — an ever increasing number of which are being published by American controlled firms — is essential to an independent Canada.

"When you start talking about elementary and high school texts — that has a lot to do with forming a Canadian identity. And if the company were associated with the universities, it would go a long way to increasing outright Canadian content in courses," he said.

McLelland, who is heavily involved in the Committee for an Independent Canada, told the committee that he has two other serious offers from Canadian interests and indication of interest from American sources.

McLelland has said he will send a copy of the private company's books — which are not made public — to the UBC committee so they can start work on a formal proposal.

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the Canadian Association of University Teachers will be approached for support.

"A lot of these associations have supported Canadian control of the economy in principle, and this is a specific case where we can ask them to put their money where their mouths are," Owne said.

Students plan for fac meeting

By HERMAN SCHERK

A poorly attended meeting of students on Friday ratified the plan for a general meeting of the Arts and Science academic community to discuss the impasse over staff-student parity.

The general meeting, negotiated by pro-parity student leaders and a conservative faculty group, will take up the afternoons of March 16 and 17.

Classes will not be formally cancelled but the faculty administration will urge staff and students to attend.

The tentative plan is for small group meetings of staff and students on Tuesday the 16th, and a joint general meeting followed by separate faculty and student plenary sessions on Wednesday the 17th.

The plena would report to each other, and should some form of agreement or consensus appear possible, the plena could return to joint session.

The student negotiators will meet again today with faculty to finalize details for the assembly and attempt to agree on mutually acceptable procedures and a chairman.

Students will meet again tomorrow at 1 pm in Room 1088, Sidney Smith Hall, to discuss the results of today's meeting.

Gay Lib Union comes to Western Ontario

LONDON (CUP) — More than 40 homosexuals attended the first general meeting of the UWO Homophile Association, better known as the Gay Liberation Union, last week.

Association chairman Wayne Thompson, a third-year sociology student at the University of Western Ontario, said that as far as he knows the UWO group is the third Gay Lib association on a Canadian university campus.

Gay Liberation was organized at the University of Toronto in 1969, and another group was started at York University this year.

"We feel homosexuals are people and should be entitled to all the rights that heterosexual people have," Thompson told the meeting.

"I'm really gratified at the support . . . what we need to do is support each other. We need support from within as well as from outside." Thompson said that at present the whole situation of homosexuals is vastly distorted and misrepresented.

"There have been many suicide attempts in London in the past several months by people who are homosexual and don't know what to do about it," Thompson said.

The group plans to establish a counselling service for people who are unsure of their sexual orientation.

Charlie Hill, president of the U of T Homophile Association, said "most people know there are homosexuals around . . . but by asserting our presence, by having an association, people have to cope with it, and are forced to think about it."

Homophile associations are expected to be organized at Guelph and McMaster in Hamilton before the end of the spring term.

St. Mike's gains quarter-finals

The eighth and final quarter-final spot in the 1971 interfac hockey playdowns belongs to the defending Jennings Cup champions from St. Mike's thanks to a 2-1 decision over Innis College Friday afternoon.

Two quarter-final games are scheduled for today with the other two slated for tomorrow.

This afternoon at 12:30, John Wright's strong PHE A crew, winners of the first division, meets the fourth division champions from New College. The New Club, handled by another Varsity Blues' star, Bill Buba, downed the Vic II's 4-3 in overtime last Thursday in a preliminary round game.

The second game today will feature Scarborough College (2nd in the second division) against Vic I (3rd in the second division) at 9:30 p.m.

Tomorrow, first division runners-up, Sr. Engineering, tangles with Erindale (3rd in the second division) at 7:30 in the evening while immediately following, St. Mike's meets Business (2nd division winners). The Business team is led by former Cornell and Varsity standout, Bob McGuinn.

A game Innis team gave St. Mike's a struggle before finally succumbing in the final period.

Taylor fired what proved to be the eventual winner at the 9:30 mark.

Innis was led by Larry Dobkin, who scored the lone goal, and by big Peter Hill in the nets.

CBC angers swimmers

By SUPERPEN

In a rare display of emotion, the SwimBlues issued a press statement last night condemning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for "gross dereliction of duty".

"The CBC is gross . . . even worse than the Toike," said one swimmer after the emergency team meeting held Saturday night between drinks at Blues annual victory party.

Cause of the swimmers' discontent was the CBC decision to preempt coverage of Blues victory in the CIAU swim finals in favor of the playoffs of the national curling bonspiel won by Don Duguid of Manitoba, 11-6.

Noted Varsity swimming writer, Frankly Unctious, saved the day by producing a tape of Duguid's classic raise-double take-out.

"Speaking frankly," spoke Frankly, "I understand versatile veteran Terry Bryon intends to use the double takeout as part of his individual medley next season; it can't be any slower than his breaststroke anyway."

Mighty mentor Robin Campbell passed the time at the victory party quaffing glasses of Chateau de Reims '49 and disassociating himself from the CBC protest.

Campbell at 26 already l'enfant terrible of Canadian college swimming said "the whole thing is a pretty devious way of getting another swimming story in The Varsity."

Which it is.

or not toboggan?

Toboggan, of course!
Even if it's that time of the month. Because with Tampax tampons, you're free to do anything you want to do right from the start of those difficult days.
Tampax tampons were developed by a doctor to give you internal sanitary protection that's both safe and comfortable. They have a silken-smooth container-applicator that enables you to place them in the proper position every time.
And for extra safety, the withdrawal cord is chain stitched the entire length of the tampon. Disposal is no problem either, because both the container-applicator and the tampon are completely flushable.
With Tampax tampons, you know that there's never anything showing. No chafing or odor. They just give you real protection. And . . . confidence.
Which is something else you should take along if you're going tobogganing!

Varsity swim girls shine in national finals

By LYNDON LITTLE

WATERLOO — A strong contingent of six swimmers and three divers from the University of Toronto paced the Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association conference to a solid section place finish in the first women's national swim championships held here Friday and Saturday.

The Western Intercollegiate conference — led by powerhouse teams from UBC and Alberta — finished on top with a 539 point total. The WIAU had 329 while the OQWCIA and the AIAA trailed.

In the individual team totals for the 12 universities competing in the two-day event, Alberta was first with 252, the UBC girls second with 238, Waterloo third with 162 and the Varsity team next with 148.

"The meet was just tremendous," enthused Varsity coach Sue Kinnear. "It's just the thing we need to improve the calibre of women's intercollegiate swimming and diving across the entire country."

Once again, the top Varsity swimmer and one of the meet stars was freestyler Merrily Stratten who hydroplaned her way to victories in the 200 and 400-yard free events and added a third in the 100 free for good measure.

Shirley Gate (100 fly and 100 backstroke) and Karen James (100 and 200 I.M.), both of UBC, were other two-event winners while Dianne Gate of Alberta topped the meet with three victories (50 free, 100 free and 50 backstroke).

Varsity diving standout Leslie O'Brien personally contributed 26 points to the WIAU total with seconds in both the one and three metre diving events; the winner on both occasions was Kathy Rollo of Saskatchewan.

Teammates Ainslie Gray and Andrea Kinsman backed up Leslie in the diving, picking up key points for the WIAU. Ainslie was a strong third in the three metre event while Andrea finished in fifth spot off the one metre board.

Versatile Liz Daniel was another top Toronto performance with firsts in two consolation finals (50 free and 200 I.M.) and added a consolation final second place finish in the 50 fly.

Randy Croome contributed a sixth in the 100 backstroke final on Friday then swam a gutsy race Saturday afternoon to take second in the 400 free consolation final.

Butterfly specialist Fran Flint won the consolation final in the 50 fly and added a fifth in the 100 fly consolation final. Janice Hines was sixth in the 200 free consolation final Friday evening.

POOLTALK: Merrily was named the outstanding swimmer for the WIAU team while her sister, Joy, was selected as tops from the OQWCIA, swimming for Waterloo . . . Both days of the meet were well attended . . . Miss Rollo of the Sask. team has been a U of S student for only two years but has been working under the direction of university coaches in Saskatoon for many years . . . Liz Daniel and Randy Croome are the only team members expected to be lost through graduation.

The Varsity — Lyndon Little

Randy Croome swam a great race to gain a second in the 400 free consolation final. Right, she begins final lag while left, she finishes in exhaustion.

The Duke handicaps the basketball playoffs

Editor's Note — One of the most popular of the interfac team championships, the basketball Sifton Cup playdowns, begin tomorrow with four quarter-final games at Hort House. In this, the first of a series of such articles, Duke Carlyle of the Varsity's interfac sports staff, handicaps the opening round of play.

By DUKE CARLYLE

This year's interfac basketball tournament shapes up to be another U.C. affair.

On the eight teams involved, only three — PhysEd, Vic and St. Mikes A — can match U.C. man-for-man. However, all three of these teams are in the opposite half of the playoff bracket (along with Sr. Engineering) to the U.C. team.

The bracket of U.C., Law, and St. Mikes B promises to be at cakewalk for the U.C.ers.

With these things in mind, the betting lines for tomorrow's opening four games are as follows:

U.C. over New College by 24 points — 12:00 noon

Under the able bench leadership of Mike Katz, the New College Raiders, undoubtedly the surprise of the league, will terminate their season when they oppose the U.C. Bombers. The Raiders earned the dubious right to play U.C. when they defeated Erindale in their final game of the regular season.

The mid-season acquisition of Brian Sickle to New's front line of Lindsay "Squalls" Horenblas and Mark "Perimeter" Cosman (alias "the flipper") strengthened the Raiders considerably. Still, they are no match for U.C.'s front line of Mike "Bumper" Betcherman, Jumping Jack Pascht, and Steve "the Haberdasher" Singer.

U.C.'s backcourt strength is deep and should prove the equal of New's fine guard combination of Brian Gilbert and Ivan "Little Pearl" Betcherman.

St. Mikes B over Law by five points — 5:00 p.m.

Of all the games in the quarter-finals, this contest promises to be the closest and to offer the greatest possibility of an upset.

Both teams boast a fast-breaking "run-and-gun" type of offence. St. Mikes overall great speed (led by Jim "Mullins" Mooney) should neutralize the overall good height of the Law squad that features the effective duo of Richie Pyne and Allen "the Goon" Sternberg in the backcourt with Jerry "Morton" Saltzman up front.

Vic over Sr. Engineering by 10 points — 6:45 p.m.

Mark "the Vault" Slater's Sr. Engineering troops defeated Vic in their earlier meeting via a tough, scrambling man-to-man defense led by guard Jim "the Pancake Man" Sworeatockie.

However, they should not be as fortunate this time. Guards Dave "the Executioner" Quick and Tommy Franklin should outscore and forwards Mike "Orange Julius" Eban, Dave Ferguson, and Peter "Munchkin" Tommison should outbound the Engineers. But if Vic becomes complacent or starts looking ahead to the semifinals, the scrappy Engineers could take Brian "Cold Duck" Stevens' crew.

PhysEd over St. Mikes A by six points — 8:30 p.m.

Coach Cheeseman's PhysEd troops are favoured to win this ball game on overall physical prowess complemented by the outstanding play of guard John "Tads" Chapman.

PhysEd is this tourney's muscle squad and should prove the maxim that power on the boards is of utmost importance to a team. The front line of Eric "Herr" Quackenbush, Randy "Milo" Filinski, and Ken "nine lives" Harris will dominate the ball game.

St. Mikes does not have a big team and Mike "the Orbit" Mullins will have more than he can contend with underneath. However, St. Mikes backcourt pair of Steve "Kodiak" O'Neill and Tom "the Spider" O'Connor could lead the Mikes to an upset; but it is unlikely that Cheese's boys will under.

Blues to face Birds

WINNIPEG, Manitoba (Special) — The University of British Columbia Thunderbirds will provide the opposition for the U of T Varsity Blues in the first game of the 1971 CIAU hockey championships Thursday evening in Sudbury, Ont.

The T-Birds were surprise winners of the Western Canada finals when they defeated the league pennant winners from the University of Manitoba 7-6 here in overtime Saturday night to sweep the best-of-three final series two games straight.

The UBC team is led by former Edmonton Oil King star Dave McAneeley.

Other weekend action saw the Loyola Warriors earn a spot in the finals by taking the final of the OSLAA playoffs with a 3-1 victory over Les Patriots from Trois Rivières. St. Mary's Huskies, who were defeated by U of T, 3-2, in the national final last year in Charlottetown, emerged as the Maritime representative once again with a 5-1 decision over Dalhousie.

The winner of Thursday night's Blues-Birds battle goes directly into the final Saturday afternoon.

Plans for parity dialogue collapse

By ALEX PODNICK

Plans to hold a two day general meeting of Arts and Science students and faculty have collapsed.

History professor J. B. Conacher and J. M. Daniels, chairman of the Department of Physics, advised student members of the General Meeting Organizational Committee Monday that those faculty they had consulted had rejected the proposal.

A sampling of faculty opinion was taken at two previously scheduled meetings on the weekend. The first was a sparsely attended History department meeting Friday afternoon. The matter was raised at the end of the meeting and only a few speakers discussed it.

The Committee of Concerned

Faculty, sponsors of the anti-parity petition circulated prior to and during the parity festival, met Saturday. Their meeting was attended by 10 to 40 people, according to all reports.

Professor Conacher said only two or three members of each department are invited to CCF meetings.

A sentiment apparently shared by those opposing the general meeting was that by agreeing to hold it faculty would be "breathing life into a dying creature."

In a report released yesterday, (see page 6 for the full text), the student members of the committee accused Faculty of holding an intransigent position.

The Faculty, the report notes, refused to admit that there was a "crisis" in the Faculty of Arts and Science despite the inability of the Faculty Council to carry out its business. Finally, it continues, Faculty consented to allow the current situation to be called an "impasse".

The tentative student-staff agreement reached last week had compromised the mandate given

Spencer, Dack want fair fees

By ALEX PODNICK

SAC presidential candidate Bob Spencer and his running mate Phil Dack want students to have more control over how their fees are spent.

At registration, each student would receive a sheet listing those groups involving university students but operating mainly off campus which were seeking SAC support. Zero Population Growth, Black Students Union, Pollution Probe. He would check off those groups which he wanted to support. These groups would then get a percentage of the total external grant budget (projected to be 5% next year) equivalent to the support they received from students, according to Spencer's and Dack's plan.

Spencer and Dack to consider external grants, the "social responsibility of the university". The concept of the university as an island unto itself doesn't appeal to them.

Spencer, a third year UC Physics student, is SAC Education Commissioner and has been one of the leaders of the student move to gain parity on the Faculty Council.

Dack, a third year economics student, is Erindale's safe member of the SAC executive. He also sits on Erindale's College Council and its Undergraduate Studies Committee.

Both Spencer and Dack are strong proponents of an active SAC.

"SAC has never interfered in the classroom and will not do so," they insisted. But, they continued, it does have an important role as an initiator of educational reform.

"SAC can and should play an important role as far as education goes," according to Dack. He believes, as does Spencer, that SAC hasn't yet exhausted its potential. "We feel that we can help SAC achieve its potentialities," they said.

Spencer and Dack are aiming for an organized education programme with set goals and tactics. They propose "devolving more responsibility for educational and social programmes on college councils and course unions where they (the course unions) exist."

In order to do this, they talk of establishing an Arts and Science SAC sub-committee to handle faculty problems.

Spencer and Dack are opposed to the Contingent Repayment Student Aid Plan. The plan would have students repay the cost on their income tax following graduation.

Bob Spencer

Phil Dack

They pledge to prove to the government that "students have a social value" by being off the labour market. They said they don't agree that's what the role of an university should be, but that's what it is.

"The government is currently screwing Scarborough and Erindale because they're affiliated with U of T," Dack said. As a result of this affiliation, these col-

Klein, Curtin see SAC potential

By LAURA KELLY

Alice Klein and Kate Curtin are running for the top SAC positions because they see the council as a "battering ram" in the university, a tool to initiate issues and inform and mobilize students.

But along with the view of SAC as providing a strong student leadership against an oppressive university, the candidates, both from the Young Socialists, are committed to a philosophy of mass decision-making.

"During the parity struggle, the SAC leadership had a fear of doing anything that left decisions in the hands of the students. Their concept of a mass meeting was one of a rubber stamp," said Klein.

"You had to be in Sid Smith and catch the 'ins' as they went by to be sure you knew what was going on," she said.

They believe that a real student movement would have mass meetings on a regular basis to develop the process of collective thought and action.

"We're all so used to the individualistic way of thought. I think mass meetings could be really inspiring," said Klein.

The two candidates were also disappointed with the stand of the SAC leaders on their definition of parity, since they disagreed with the inclusion of any administrators on the governing body of the university, while support staff were given no recognition.

Curtin said that students at the U of T seem conservative because they are reacting to the radical leaders who are elitist and thus alienating.

Alice Klein and Katie Curtin

The two went on to chide the other SAC candidates who talk about communication with the administrators. "I'm not interested in communicating with the people who are controlling my life," said Klein.

Curtin said that parity in the university is the only answer.

"What can you do when you have a prof. who refuses to be influenced?" said Curtin explaining why parity is necessary to the university.

"The potentials of the university are really spectacular. We just don't want the university doing things like supplying scabs in

Grad fees hiked; undergrads' may follow

By TOM WALKOM

Minister of University Affairs, John White confirmed money cutbacks for Ontario graduate students yesterday.

Speaking at a press conference to which the student press was not invited, White also chopped off provincial aid to new graduate programs which may duplicate others in the province.

Fees for graduate students will rise to $485 next fall from the present $435.

In addition, graduate students enrolling next September will be limited to earning $1800 during the year for university work. Students earning more are not considered full-time students by the government and therefore, the university department in which they are enrolled will not receive a government grant for that student. The government grants the university a certain amount of money according to the number of full-time students enrolled.

The amount of money available for graduate fellowships has been cut by 30 per cent to $3.5 million.

Highly placed U of T officials have hinted at a similar announcement within a few days announcing harsh surprises for undergraduate students, as well.

Any cuts in the formula financing to undergraduate faculties could wreak havoc next year.

A recent ruling that elementary school teachers must now have one year of university will flood Ontario campuses with an estimated 3500 extra students next fall.

Calling on the Committee Presidents of Universities in Ontario to quickly prepare a report "rationalizing" graduate programs, White has, in the interim, cut off any support for new studies which in the minds of the Dua appear to duplicate existing programs.

The decision differs significantly only in one area from the widely publicized January recommendations of the Committee on University Affairs. Whereas the CUA had suggested fees rise to $750 for a three-semester year, White's decision keeps the level to $485 whether a student enrolls for a two- or three-term year.

According to School of Graduate Studies Dean W. D. Baines, only one new program at U of T may be affected by the duplication restriction. This is the Urban and Regional Planning Studies, planned tentatively for next year. A similar course is already offered at Waterloo.

'Faculty close debate', students charge the student members by the meeting that elected them after the disrupted General Committee meeting.

Although they were instructed to arrange a student-staff general assembly to discuss and vote on the 6-6-3 parity restructuring committee report, the General Meeting proposal made no specific provision for discussion of the report or any voting.

Despite "this dilution of the General Assembly concept", last Friday's student general meeting endorsed the tentative agreement. However, the small sampling of faculty surveyed by faculty committee members rejected it.

A student member noted that "faculty were unwilling to share power". "This selfish defence of their archaic positions has blocked all change in the University."

"The last channel of debate has now been closed," the report concludes.

Conacher told The Varsity that faculty committee members had agreed to "sound out faculty to see whether they would agree" to the student-staff proposal.

In addition to the two scheduled meetings, Conacher said he had spoken to several other faculty members, although he admitted no progressive faculty were contacted.

"We presumed what they wanted was to get a discussion going with persons holding opinions opposite to theirs," Conacher said.

Describing the CCF as a "fairly representative group", he commented that without CCF endorsement there would be minimal faculty support for a general meeting.

He defended using these sparsely attended meetings as a gauge of faculty opinion, saying that the "people concerned about university affairs are the type of people who go to meetings" and speak there.

History professor W. H. Nelson was the faculty committee member most inclined to support the student-staff proposal. Conacher said.

Arts and Science Dean Albert Allen was very understanding about the faculty reluctance to agree to the General Meeting proposal. "It's very difficult to be enthusiastic about it for faculty at this time when the schedule is drawing to a close" and they need the time to complete their courses, he said.

Allen expressed the hope that the student-faculty organizational committee would continue meeting to attempt to resolve the situation. He said they deserved "tremendous credit" for the effort they had put into arriving at the tentative agreement.

When he was told that the students had stopped meeting, he suggested that they were exhausted from their recent negotiations and would begin meeting after awhile.

married students' residence strike," said Curtin.

They had several ideas about how the university could improve women's situation: a recognition of the initial oppression of women from childhood, preferential hiring of women by the university, and a department of women's studies.

"Many times when women do research into their past, and find out that women have contributed a lot to society, it gives them pride in being a woman," said Curtin.

"A women's department can go into the society, and research things like unions or day care centres," said Klein.

If they win the presidency and vice-presidency, Klein and Curtin will be working on devising channels for student participation in university government.

"And even if we don't win, we'll continue to talk about the issues," said Klein.

The candidates will publish a campaign newspaper on Thursday, and are trying to organize talk meetings for all the candidates.

War Measures victim Chartrand to speak here

By ERIC MILLS

Michel Chartrand, Montreal labour leader will be at Convocation Hall tomorrow night at 8 p.m., as part of a two-day teach-in on Independence In Canada, sponsored by the U of T Waffle.

On the same platform will be Laurier Lapierre, a former CBC political commentator and vice-president of the NDP. While supporting some form of special status for Quebec, Lapierre is not a separatist.

Chartrand, on the other hand, advocates an independent and socialist Quebec.

For his outspoken views on Quebec, Chartrand, Montreal president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, has been severely criticized by the leading bureaucrats of the CNTU.

Last October, Chartrand was arrested under the War Measures Act and charged with being a member of the now-illegal FLQ.

He was also charged with seditious conspiracy under the Criminal Code, along with Charles Gagnon, Pierre Vallieres, Robert Lemieux and Jacques Laroue-Langois.

The seditious conspiracy charges were quashed in February, and Chartrand finally released on bail. The Five are still awaiting trial on the FLQ membership charges.

Chartrand has been sentenced to a year in jail for contempt of court, because of occurrences during his seditious conspiracy trial. This sentence is being appealed.

This will be the first time since October that Chartrand has spoken in English Canada.

The story of two teachers

By BOB CHODOS

(Chodos is a member of the Last Post editorial collective.)

GASPE, Quebec (CUP - Last Post) — "In a big-city university they wouldn't stand out as being particularly radical. But here..."

That was how one student described the situation that has become the major topic of conversation at Gaspé Peninsula College as it opened for a new semester last month — in fact, virtually the only topic of conversation, aside from the usual ones of course changes and first-term marks.

"They" are Casey Dunning and Greg Kremenliov, both of whom had taught at the small college in this community at the eastern tip of Quebec's poorest region, six hundred miles northeast of Montreal, since last September. On January 28, Dunning received notice from the administration that he had been fired. The next day, Kremenliov was suspended pending a hearing on his case. The hearing will take place this week. THE OFFICIAL REASON FOR DUNNING'S FIRING remains unclear. The administration of the college said at different times that his dossier was incomplete, that it was inadequate, that it was not submitted on time. Dunning had been told to submit the dossier by January 25; he submitted it on January 25, a Monday.

There had been two previous attempts to fire him, once for academic incompetence and again for insufficient academic qualifications. Neither of these reasons was able to stand to the cold hard light of fact. Dunning's qualifications include some credits toward a doctorate in psychology.

In any case, most people around the college suspect that the real reasons for the administration's desire to get rid of Dunning lie elsewhere.

GASPE PENINSULA COLLEGE is a lonely outpost of Quebec's far-flung network of CEGEPs — the general and professional colleges that have been hastily thrown together in the last four years to produce the trained work force that Quebec so badly needs. Because they were required in a hurry the CEGEPs were created out of existing institutions — mostly the traditional, clerically-oriented Colleges Classiques that had been created to serve a different purpose and a different society.

Many of the features of Gaspé Peninsula College are common to all CEGEPs and arise out of this history. The red-brick building in which it is housed still has a sign identifying it as 'Seminaire de Gaspé'. To become a CEGEP, the Seminaire simply incorporated part of a local school. The director-general of the college is a cleric, l'Abbe Jude Hughes. Georges Lamy, director of pedagogical services and l'Abbe Hughes' chief deputy, is a former trade-school administrator with a trade-school education.

The difference between the college and its sister CEGEPs are a reflection of the special characteristics of the region in which it is located. The administration is a bit more conservative, a bit more frightened, its control is a bit tighter. The students, who come from all over the Gaspé coast as well as the north shore of the St. Lawrence and northern New Brunswick, are poorer, have had less exposure to new ideas, are less receptive to change.

There is yet another difference. Scattered among the small villages that dot the Gaspé coast are a number of long-established indigenous English-speaking communities. As a result, the Gaspé CEGEP is the only bilingual one in the province, maintaining a separate English section under Dean Raymond McGrath. The Gaspé English are not the stereotyped fat-cats of Westmount and St. James St.; they are as poor, as down-trodden, and as resigned to their fate as their French neighbours.

Greg Kremenliov, originally from California, got a job teaching in the English section of the Gaspé CEGEP after getting his Master's degree at Sir George Williams University in Montreal. Casey Dunning, also an American, and his wife had been running an experimental school in New York. They were travelling in the vicinity of Percé, about forty miles south of Gaspé, and liked the area so much that they decided they wanted to stay and work here. Dunning, too, was hired to teach at the English section of the Gaspé CEGEP. Almost immediately, he and Kremenliov found themselves in conflict with the college administration.

THAT ADMINISTRATION HAD NEVER had much time for teachers who did not subscribe to its ideas of education. The previous year, Serge Morin had been giving a course in Marxist philosophy. A student brought a complaint of 'anti-theistic teaching' against him. The administration eventually cleared him of the charge, but in the process made his position so unpleasant that Morin had to leave.

Dunning and Kremenliov's first falling out with the administration came over the ten-percent rule — the administration had imposed a rule that any student missing more than 10 percent of the classes in a course would automatically fail it. Along with some of their colleagues, they opposed the rule in staff meetings; they submitted blank attendance sheets as a protest; they insisted, with Raymond McGrath's support, that they be allowed to count meetings with students in the cafeteria or at their homes as class attendances. Despite their efforts, the ten-percent rule stood virtually unaltered.

Dunning and Kremenliov also had the unfortunate habit of being too close to students for the administration's taste. The subject matter of their courses (Kremenliov's courses included a sociological study of the CEGEP as an institution), the length of their hair, the style of their dress, and the fact that they are Americans were additional factors.

And there were several incidents in which Dunning and Kremenliov offended tradition-bound Gaspesian sensibilities. In one of these, Kremenliov wrote the word 'bullshit' on a student's paper. In another, Dunning posed a question on a psychology examination that asked students to consider the problem of frigidity from the point of view of learning theory. It is not known which of the students complained about that one, but suspicion falls on a nun who had taken an immediate dislike to Dunning. NOBODY DOUBTED THEIR QUALIFICATION to be teaching at the CEGEP — except the administration. As teachers Dunning was universally liked by the students, Kremenliov somewhat less so, although his competence was never called into question.

The attempt by the administrators to brand Dunning as incompetent seems to be an expression of their own insecurity. Because Gaspé is far from Quebec City and Montreal, they have been largely permitted to go their own way without much interference. They fear that if there is any noise at the college, their own dubious suitability to be running a CEGEP will be revealed and their cosy position disturbed. (The web is so tight that even the teachers' union is regarded as an arm of the administration. The union president is Jean Lamy, Georges' brother. To further complicate matters, Jean Lamy is married to the sister of l'Abbe Hughes.)

Georges Lamy, short and dapper, has aroused particular distrust among students and teachers. He refused all comment on the Dunning-Kremenliov case.

"You understand that we cannot comment on the confidential files of our teachers. If I went to Canadian University Press and asked them for confidential information about you, I would not expect them to give it to me." He insisted that it was "an administrative matter" and "not a political question."

Very different from Lamy and most of the other administrators is Raymond McGrath, Dean of the English section. IT WAS MCGRATH WHO HIRED Dunning and Kremenliov and others like them, with full knowledge of what their beliefs were and what they would try to do. This was consistent with the kind of CEGEP he wanted to build. He repeatedly went to bat for them with his superiors on the French side, several times putting his job on the line in their defence. He is also known as being approachable and sympathetic to students, and has helped many of them with personal and financial problems.

But by the end of the first semester, McGrath and Kremenliov had come to a parting of the ways. January 28, the day Dunning was fired, was the next-to-last day of the semester. Only a handful of students were still writing exams, and most did not find out about the firing until the new semester opened on February 8. But already, on Friday, January 29, Kremenliov and others were talking about organizing action around Dunning's dismissal.

According to Kremenliov, McGrath walked into a room where students were writing an exam and warned them not to go on strike, telling them that if they did there was a danger that the English side of the CEGEP would be closed. Kremenliov rushed in "because I knew he was lying" and began to argue with him; the exam quickly degenerated into confusion. Some of the students finished the exam, others didn't. McGrath reported the incident to the rest of the administration, and Kremenliov was suspended for "gross insubordination."

McGrath is caught in the middle in the Dunning-Kremenliov case, although Kremenliov hastens to add that "he put himself there." Kremenliov is bitter toward McGrath, as toward someone who betrayed a trust. McGrath evidently has similar feelings toward Kremenliov.

McGrath's fear that the English CEGEP will be closed is an understandable one — he lives with the possibility that his own independence will be curtailed, that his superiors will crack down, that his work will be undone. To a certain extent that has already happened with the firing of Dunning.

AND IN THE TOWN THERE IS A WIDER FEAR — the fear that the position of the CEGEP itself will be called into question. For the college is one of two mainstays of the town's economy (the other is a mental institution that has also been having its problems — it has been operating since September without a psychiatric staff), and many of the townspeople depend on the students for their livelihood.

Meanwhile, Casey Dunning has become a hot item on the town's gossip circuit. "They say Casey Dunning was peddling drugs" . . . "They say Casey Dunning is a draft dodger." Nobody ever bothers to explain who "they" are.

In fact, Dunning was not peddling drugs, and he has a 1-Y draft exemption. But his firing has created some unusual problems for him. The first blow was a note from Jean-Roch Landry, lawyer for the Gaspé CEGEP, warning him "that you are by the present formally forbidden to appear on the premises or in other buildings rented by the CEGEP."

THEN ON WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, two RCMP officers came to his door and informed him that he was going to Quebec City. He would be kept in a detention centre there until a hearing was held on his deportation. He had worked in Quebec illegally, he was told.

Dunning's official papers had never been set in order, and he had worked at the CEGEP — with the knowledge and consent of both McGrath and the immigration officer in Gaspé — on the understanding that they would be forthcoming from the United States. There were repeated delays. At the time of the firing, the immigration officer (whose wife is McGrath's secretary) evidently turned against Dunning and it was on information received from him that the local RCMP detachment acted.

Dunning was cleared at his hearing on Friday, and returned to Gaspé to reapply for his position at the CEGEP. But talk of a possible student strike had already begun to grow.

Sympathetic teachers and students figure that at least seventy-five percent of the students on the English side, most of whom had classes with Dunning and Kremenliov, would support strike action. But they consider it critical that French students, for whom the issue is more abstract, participate in any action that is taken as well.

UNTIL THE END OF JANUARY, Gaspé Peninsula College was a bilingual CEGEP in name only. In reality, it was two unilingual CEGEPs: the French and English sides occupied different buildings, in different parts of town. But last Monday morning the English students moved into the former seminary building along with their French colleagues. Any division along language lines would be glaring and harmful and a strike of English students alone would be worse than useless.

"This is not a French-English issue," emphasizes one teacher, "and we can't let it appear so." Kremenliov says "this is an important time not to make mistakes."

There are still many obstacles to overcome before a successful strike can be brought off, but the nucleus is there. One student waited outside Georges Lamy's office on Monday to get a copy of the official rules of the CEGEP. Another student happened by and asked him what his second-term courses were.

"Don't have many yet. They've fired all my teachers."

"Really? Who was fired?"

"Greg and Casey."

"Looks as if we'll have to raise some shit."

Students say faculty have closed dialogue

Following the successful disruption of the arts and science faculty council's general committee on March 1, a group of five students was delegated to negotiate for a General Assembly of all students and teaching staff in the faculty.

In the following statement, the five students accuse faculty members of closing the last chance for dialogue and discussion in the faculty of arts and science.

After the meeting of the General Committee on March 1 a meeting of some students and faculty agreed to the concept of a General Assembly of all students and teaching staff in the Faculty which would attempt to resolve the present crisis in Arts and Science. A committee of 5 to represent the student constituency was elected to negotiate the creation of this General Assembly.

The student committee immediately entered into discussions with the Committee of Concerned Faculty. Our original position was that classes should be cancelled for 2 afternoons to allow for discussion in small groups (on the first afternoon) and in a plenary session (on the second afternoon). We hoped that a means to resolve the crisis would arise out of these discussions.

The members of the staff only reluctantly admitted that there was a crisis in the Faculty although the disruption of Faculty business deprives the teaching of a decision making role in the University. Furthermore, the denial of a full student role in decision making this fall and winter has placed past student gains in jeopardy.

The student committee and the Committee of Concerned Faculty reached the following agreement:

1. Classes would be cancelled on the afternoons of Tuesday, March 16 and Wednesday, March 17.
 2. On Tuesday small groups would meet to discuss "the nature of the impasse in staff-student relations".
 3. On Wednesday from 1:00 - 2:30 p.m. a plenary session was to have been held in Convocation Hall to generalize the discussions of the previous afternoon.
 4. Following this the students and staff were to move into separate caucuses to discuss "means to resolve this impasse".
- This agreement was dependent on the support received from the 2 constituencies.

The students were willing to accept this dilution of the General Assembly concept. However, on Monday morning (March 8) we learned that the faculty members consulted had refused to take any part in meetings of this kind.

It was obvious to us that faculty were unwilling to share power although this is the only way in which students and teaching staff will be able to wrest control of the University from anonymous administrators. This selfish defence of their archaic status positions has blocked all change in the University.

The last channel of debate has now been closed.

Last chance to drop courses creeping up

Still want to drop that sixth course?

Fraid that the little men at GM or LSE or MIT won't like seeing that big D on your transcript, even if it doesn't count (averagewise)?

Don't sweat then because the boys at the Arts and Science faculty office have decided to let the deadline for dropping extra courses run 'till March 15.

That's next Monday, and this is a Varsity public service by the Varsity Public Service Department running under the auspices of Eric Rump.

Lakehead strikes

THUNDER BAY (CUP) — Eight hundred students of the Sociology-Anthropology department at Lakehead University are boycotting their classes over the firing last spring of faculty member Victor Wightman.

Soc-Anthro majors voted almost unanimously Sunday to strike Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday until a meeting planned for today between student representatives and faculty in the department. After that the students will decide further strategy.

The students were originally to go to departmental meeting Wednesday where they hoped to have a motion passed calling on the Canadian Association of University Teachers to investigate and make a binding decision of the Wightman firing case.

The Wightman firing was highly irregular, students charge. Wightman drew much criticism from the other faculty in the department for his unorthodox teaching methods and he was the naturally most expendable member of the department at the time of an austerity drive. His original firing was invalidated because of when it was carried out and it was later shown that the financial grounds for the firing had also been negated.

But he was fired a second time for ostensibly the same reasons anyway. According to the Argus Lakehead's student newspaper the real reason for Wightman's dismissal is that circumstances surrounding the firing have proved him to be a threat to the department (faculty) because he didn't oppose the unsolicited student support and ensuing boycott which followed his original firing.

Both the Alma Mater Society and the Faculty Association have recommended that the CAUT be brought in to arbitrate but the department voted eight to seven to refuse arbitration earlier this year. This situation was unacceptable to the great majority of the students in the department and lead to the present strike with full support of the Students Administrative Council

Holiday in Britain. Before you're too old to enjoy it.

Don't wait till you're rich and respectable—and tired.

Because a holiday in Britain is liable to get you involved and keep you running from the moment you step off the plane.

Everybody knows about London, where the King's Road is a permanent pop-generation fashion parade, and the discotheques jump till dawn.

But Britain was swinging long before Time magazine 'discovered' Carnaby Street.

You'll know what we mean when you've spent a day or two at the anything-goes experimental Fringe of the Edinburgh Arts Festival. When you've seen Grand Prix motor racing at Silverstone—or the rip-roaring sports-car meets at Brands Hatch. Or when you've seen Shakespeare where he belongs—staged by the crack theatre company at Stratford-upon-Avon.

And then, of course, there are the people. Friendly and welcoming, in a language you don't need a phrase-book to cope with.

Best of all, you don't need to wait till you're rich. A 9-day trip to London with your hotel (and 2 big meals a day) goes for as little as $175. And if you're a member of a group or club, and can get a charter flight, the fare's practically peanuts. We'll send you details on all this, if you just clip the coupon.

Come on. Store up a few memories for your old age.

Welcome to Britain.

Our free 48-page booklet — "Britain — Vacations '71" — will make you an expert! See your Travel Agent, or send to British Tourist Authority, PO Box 635, Scarborough, Ontario.

Non-faculty workers to organize at UBC

VANCOUVER (CUP) — The non-faculty teachers union at UBC is on the move.

The NFTU is an organization of teaching assistants, researchers and prospective teaching assistants or university employees engaged in a non-faculty (non-professional) capacity.

The grievances of IAs and other non-faculty academic staff are many. The principles are wages and working conditions neither of which are covered by any clear policy either at the university or departmental level.

"The problem is general fragmentation of policy at the university, faculty and departmental level," said Jim Arthurs, of Grad Studies and a member of the NFTU.

"There is no policy which decides ages or working conditions."

The NFTU met with Arts Dean Doug Kenny early last week to discuss these and other grievances.

"Kenny was sympathetic but in many ways powerless," said Mark Madoff, NFTU treasurer.

"We actually enlightened him on matter of wages and other things of which he was not aware," Madoff added.

Steve Anderson, NFTU Chairman, described Kenny's TA policy as a "non-policy". "Salaries vary as much as $600 within a single department," he said.

"There is no policy on contracts," Madoff said. "The only thing a TA might get from a department is a statement of his salary. There is nothing about class size and working conditions."

"Kenny said he would look into things, especially working conditions," said Anderson. "On the matter of money he maintained the position of the status quo, that there was not enough around for salary increases."

The essential thing, said Madoff, is that there is no rationale for TA's salaries: it is done on the whim of the department.

One of the main concerns of the NFTU is for clarifications and guide-lines to be provided for TA's and other non-faculty staff.

"Poor communications lead to screw-ups on the departmental level," Arthurs said.

"Kenny essentially referred things back to the departmental level. He referred to himself as the court of last appeal and matters should be handled at the departmental level," he added.

The priority of the NFTU is to take action and to secure wage agreements and contractual guidelines.

Halifax SAC takeover threatens student paper

HALIFAX (CUP) — The Student's Administrative Council at St. Mary's University, upset over the left-wing political stance taken by the St. Mary's student newspaper, The Journal, is trying to suspend the charter of the newspaper and take over direct editorial control.

Among other changes planned concerning the running of the paper is making the printing of council minutes every week compulsory. Members of the paper's staff say the only weapons they have to prevent the take over is public opinion. There is only one issue of The Journal left to be published this school year, but The Journal Editor Frances Abbott feels national coverage of the council's proposed actions might prove to be somewhat of an embarrassment to the councillors.

The Journal is a member of Canadian University Press and the takeover by council would contravene the statement of principles necessary to student papers to be members of CUP.

The council is to make a decision on issue today.

CATCHING FLIES

An adventure story in which Bob Bossin and Rufus the Radical Reptile embark on a voyage of discovery with R. D. Laing →

Flies in your eyes

1 I remember someone once asking Andy Wernick how he first became a radical. He answered that it was a process, although there were moments that stuck out. The most prominent occurred when he was still a quiet, straight medieval history student at Cambridge. He had gone into London for the original London School of Economics teach-in, and was sitting on the floor of a lecture hall, when the speaker, a young British psychiatrist, walked up to the blackboard and drew this diagram.

"A person is born", he said, pointing to the top of the circle. "The organism, the self, wants to grow and become (pointing clockwise) sane. His parents, however, and the schools and the church, want him to move the opposite way and become normal. Some people become so normal, and are so far from being sane that they go insane; some people are so sane, and so far from normal, that they too might go insane. It may only be a slight jump from insane to sane, but the person's family and the people they hire will try to drag him all the way back around to being normal."

"It blew my mind", Wernick said, "It just blew my mind."

2 EVERY TRIBE, NATION, COMMUNITY, culture or sub-culture has its own wisdom, with which it cuts through the jungle of data the world throws up. what's good to eat, what's good for health, who, when and where to touch; when and where to eliminate; what work is; how to decide the use of scarce goods; how to greet strangers; how to deal with differences. The wisdom orders what is done, and also how one sees what is done which perceptions are to be blessed with words like "real", "true", "good", "visionary" and which are to be damned as "bad", "wrong", "deluded" or "crazy".

A new member quickly learns the tribal law — from words, gestures, rituals, commands and soon ceases to think or speak of it as a learning; the wisdom becomes the world, the way it is, what is right, what's natural or normal.

As Orr says in Catch-22, we have flies in our eyes, which we can't see because we have flies in our eyes. A challenge to the tribal wisdom, the "way it is", to our basic assumptions and mental syntax, — the flies in our eyes — is a threatening thing.

In 1970 it is safe to say that the Anglo-American wisdom itself is being challenged: in practice (new patterns of family, 'marriage', child-raising, eating, work, sex) and in theory. (Marcuse, Watts, Cleaver, Leary, Charles Reich are a representative mixed bag of names.) Nowhere, though, is the challenge deeper, more systematic or more threatening, than in the work of a young(ish), Scottish psychiatrist named R. D. Laing.

3 I THINK THE WORLD WOULD be a better place if everyone quit telling everyone else what to do; if teachers talked less and sat around more; if people bearing unsolicited advice took cold showers. And yet I would like you to know about R. D. Laing, or at least that he is there, in paperback. For those who would like to be further introduced, here is a bit of The Politics of The Family:

"One is expected to be capable of passion, once married, but not to have experienced too much passion (let alone acted upon it) too much before. If this is too difficult, one has to pretend first not to feel the passion one really feels, then, to pretend to passion one does not really feel, and to pretend that certain passionate upsurges of resentment, hatred, envy, are unreal, or don't happen, or are something else ..."

"After this almost complete holocaust of experience on the altar of conformity, one is liable to feel somewhat empty, but one can try to fill one's emptiness with money, consumer goods, position, respect, admiration, envy of one's fellows for one's business, professional, social success. These, together with a repertoire of distractions, permitted or compulsory, serve to distract one from one's own distractions; and if one finds oneself overworked, under too great a strain, there are perfectly approved additional lines of defence, concoctions to taste of narcotics, stimulants, sedatives, tranquilizers to depress one further so that one does not know how depressed one is ..."

SOMETHING IS WRONG HERE. I am not happy writing. I want you to know about Laing, about experience, politics, and rules, but I do not know who you are.

It feels out of sequence, like saying "I'm fine" before you ask how I am. I suppose that is the order of writing, yet it harrasses me, because I do not think it is under control, but like some late show substance from outer space, it's got a hold of us and has made us its servant. It has turned us into flatterers.

Print causes deafness. Typewriters steal the soul. Behind the scenes, I am uncomfortable as Hell about going on like this.

Sometime early in his psychiatric career, Laing realized that normal men had killed 100,000,000 of their fellow normal men in the last fifty years. His practice began to reflect the realization:

1951: He treated a delusional army private by his listening to his fantasies of himself as Robin Hood and Julius Caesar. He gave companionship and reassurance, no drugs or other treatment. The man got better.

1951-3: He treated a Glasgow mental hospital's twelve worst cases nicely. They got better and went home to their families.

1954: The twelve were back in hospital. Laing thought the families might be what was driving them crazy. He started studying the families of schizophrenics, and decided that, in context, the patients' schizophrenia made a good deal of sense. And much that happened among the normal members of the families was crazy as hell.

THE INTELLIGIBILITY OF MENTAL "ILLNESS" and what Freud called The Psychopathology of Everyday Life are opposite sides of the same coin. Leaving aside the question of why we do it all to one another — a Marxist would say in the interest of the ruling class, a Freudian, to displace and appease our fathers, a traditional Catholic, original sin — leaving this aside, there is the question of how. Again, it is hard to see for the flies in our eyes. We have to look around our way of looking. Laing suggests a perspective from which I have abstracted three central concepts.

Experience:

We can observe another person's behavior but not his experience, the combination of perceptions, thoughts, imagination, fantasies, projections and fears that make up what he sees. For example:

Jack Jr. is Jack and Jackie's son. But he himself may not feel like his parents' child. He may not experience Jack and Jackie as his parents, as related to him, or as anything other than distant strangers. One day he makes public the experience and starts telling people that his parents are not his parents. This is a gross disruption of perceptual tact. The announcement is greeted with horror, or tears, or punishment, or even a trip to a child psychologist — possibly all distort, or better still, forget the experience.

We have learned, effectively, to all but deny the existence of the world of experience, limiting the category "real" to the little area where your and my experiences overlap — the greater the overlap, the more assuredly real.

My friend RoseMarie says that there are so few ghosts in America because our collective disbelief is so strong that it has driven them away. To our loss.

Perhaps one explanation for the wild fancies of madness might be that we may become so far alienated from our experience that our biology, sensing a danger to survival, steps in and takes the matter out of our hands.

"What needs to be explained," Laing writes in The Politics of Experience "is the failure of so many who embark on the voyage to return from it. Do these persons encounter circumstances in family life or in institutional care so badly maladaptive that even the richest and best organized hallucinatory experience cannot save them?"

7

IT IS EMBARRASSING TO ME to find something clever that someone has said, and then to mutter stupidly, "Isn't that clever?" I do not have to do this. I have my B.A.

The next time I am in a lecture hall will write blackboard on the blackboard. The next time I see a sign saying "Scenic View" I will throw a rock at it

8

Politics:
Events occur in social space and often become more understandable when their social space is considered.

"Someone is gibbering away on his knees, talking to someone who is not there. Yes, he is praying. If one does not accord him the social intelligibility of this behaviour, he can only be seen as mad" (Laing again.)

However, social space is also political space: some people tend to have more power than others, and can exercise that power in defining the situation that they and those less powerful then inhabit. Some examples:

In Rosemary's Baby, the woman next door insists Rosemary go to Dr. Abe Saperstein, "the best gynaecologist in New York". When Rosemary discovers that he too carries the symbol of the coven of witches she fears are after her child, she rushes from his office and runs to see a young gynaecologist she once met. She presents him with all her evidence. The young doctor is silent, and then says, yes, he believes her; he doesn't believe in witches, but he does believe there are a lot of crazy people in New York. He asks who was Rosemary's previous gynaecologist. She answers, "Dr. Abraham Saperstein".

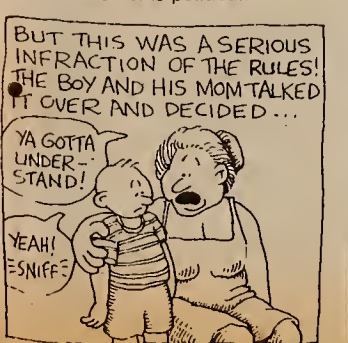

The young doctor's expression shifts slightly (as the politics of the situation shift completely). Then he tells her to lie down and immediately calls Saperstein about the delusional young woman.

The power of definition is crucial. In the university, professors and senior administrators defend the university as they have defined it from attacks that become attacks when they are defined that way by professors and senior administrators.

In the family, the parents may have an unmanageable child put in mental hospital and then kept there. Although a sharp child may manipulate his parents politically as well.)

The teacher's word is taken over the pupil's: the cops' over the suspect's; the husband's (often) over the wife's — so that a mutual problem of sexual relation becomes her problem of frigidity.

When a mother finds a funny cigarette in her son's pocket, there arises a drug problem. But whose problem is it? The answer is political.

Rules:

Political control is maintained as we all know by laws and rules. However, we do not know all the laws and rules. I do not mean that we simply haven't learned them all, but that, in some cases we have learned not to learn them, (and learned to forget that we learned not to learn them). While this may sound paranoid, it must be admitted that such a system would be convenient.

For a rule, by its nature, implies that if there were no rule, one might want to do what was ruled out. An unknown rule implies no such thing. It isn't even there.

Step one: invalidate the subject's experience.

In Summerhill, A. S. Neill talks about giving a kid absolute Hell for not returning his screw-driver. There was no moral lesson involved, he assures the reader, Neill just figured that the screw-driver was his, and he wanted it and it wasn't there.

Neill's was a straight forward, honest attack. However, he might easily have, by virtue of his political position, built on it: first, not that Neill was angry, but that the child was wrong, and then, not that the child was wrong, but that the child was wrong — incapable of choosing to do the right thing, a moral (or intellectual) invalid.

"Too young", "Too old", "Only on campus for four years", "Wet behind the ears", these are typical invalidations, telling the subject not just that he is mistaken, but that he is incapable of not being mistaken, that he must not trust his own experience.

In The Emperor's New Clothes, the little boy was not the only one to see the emperor's nakedness; he was the only one who had not yet learned to fully distrust and repress his own perceptions.

The story's denouement, left out in many versions by the way, has the emperor, returned from the parade, angrily declaring compulsory schooling for all children five to sixteen, and even more schooling after that, to the extent of the family's ability to pay

Step two: Rule by Attribution:

This is simply the inverse of invalidation. I do not tell you "Do x", but rather I tell you that you are the sort of person who does x

Try: "Mary is such a good girl, she always does the right thing. Don't you, dear?"; "Mary's the best daughter a mother could want. She tells me everything. She knows that no-one knows a girl's mind like her mother. Don't you, dear?"; or "Son, you're getting to be a big boy now, and I'm sure you'll be the man your father always knew you would be."

A good rule by attribution is a clean thing, for it carries no punishment and no negative. I respect or love you for being the kind of person I respect or love. What reason for being anything else?

Nor does rule by attribution have to be tied to words. The most effective form can be conveyed by smiles, looks, cringes, hugs. "Repression of a good deal of infant sexuality", Laing writes in Politics of the Family, "is sanctioned, the act of repression is itself denied, and repression, its sanction and the denial of repression, are denied. Nothing has happened."

don't know what you are talking about." For instance who ever heard of a good boy, or a normal man, ever having wanted to suck his father's penis?"

Is it any surprise then, that so many are driven normal?

9

TALKING ABOUT THIS PIECE to a friend today I remarked that Laing thought Freud was the greatest psychological writer. I told her that Laing thought Freud was the best psychological writer!

A man points to the moon, and another to the man pointing and another to that man. Do you see where the pain comes in?

I spent sunset to sunrise once in a Native American Church peyote ritual. Among others there, was Matt Cohen, who has been an economist, a novelist, a professor and a socialist. He said nothing until near dawn when he said, "I used to believe you could teach people things. I don't believe that now."

And yet my friend was interested to know. Perhaps the part of her that was Freud was happy to know that Laing liked him.

"The truth is the lie that enables the species to survive." (Nietzsche) What a relief to come across, say, Nietzsche . . . Not because it is necessarily true, but because he was at least able to think and say it before he was carried off to the madhouse. (Laing)

Everywhere I went this past year, I heard that Laing had committed himself to a mental hospital. It was not true. He must not yet have thought and said so much as Nietzsche.

11

HOW MANY HAVE READ THIS FAR? (My phone number is 928-2738, address 631 Spadina Ave.) Because I do not know who you are, I do not know what all this says to you: if it is redundant, if it rings true;

if it sounds paranoid, biased or distorted (If I seem crazy, mind you, remember it is your word against mine.)

A friend gave her father The Politics of the Family, which he dismissed saying he had never wanted to suck his father's penis, it was never even a question. A man on a recent t-group weekend said that he was no longer hung up about premarital sex, although his parents, of course, disapproved of it. It had taken time, but he was free of their teachings; casual sex, however, was out of the question.

I suppose Laing points, and I point to his pointing, in order to bring into question what is out of the question. Even then it is as a finger to the moon, it is flattery. But perhaps it is such a long way back to our experience, that even the reassurance of flatterers can be of help.

Brecht play gets first Toronto performance

By DIANNE SHULMAN

"Don't write that you admire me! Write that I was an uncomfortable person, and that I intend to remain so after my death." So wrote Bertold Brecht. And though the St. Lawrence Centre's production of Puntilla and Matti, His Hired Hand may not be as savage as he might have wished, it is a good one, and well worth seeing.

Though Puntilla and Matti has not been performed professionally in Toronto before, its style is familiar from the more popular plays, The Good Woman of Setzuan, and The Caucasian Chalk Circle: eleven scenes, each heralded by a verse (here a song) describing the events to come. There is a curious sense of timelessness in this play; time and people come and go, but at the end nothing has really changed. And if there is a God, He is busy elsewhere.

Simply, this is the story of Puntilla, a Finnish landowner; Eva, his daughter, and Matti, his chauffeur. Anthony Palmer gave a commanding performance as Puntilla, in both of his schizophrenic halves. Puntilla, when sober, is what (in a woman) would be called a bitch: strict, hard-hearted, humorless, and intolerant. But, as for Puntilla, drunk: he is forgetful of land, class and property, mortally offensive to his peers, and playing havoc with the lives of his hapless peasants. Reeling and reeking with good humour, (but never overcome; he has a prodigious capacity for liquor!) he seeks an audience and companion, like a blasphemous parody of Don Quixote on his quest.

Anne Anglin, undulating as Eva, has a smaller role, played much less well. She is good in most of her scenes with Matti, as the coy and artless object of his lust and contempt. But, in the eighth scene, when Puntilla offers her to Matti, to test her suitability as his bride, a great dramatic scene is thrown at her feet . . . and she leaves it there!

Ken James, as Matti, gave a performance as strong, if less accomplished, as that of Anthony Palmer. Matti is vigorous, self-reliant, 'salt-of-the-earth', brimming with vitality, and scorn. Though he toys, for a while, with the idea of seducing Eva, he is grimly aware of the realities of his life, and snatches instead a moment's passion with Fina the chambermaid. At the end of the play, faced with the costly and outrageous pranks he had played the night before, Puntilla takes an oath of abstinence. But to celebrate it he gets roaring drunk, and falls into a sodden slumber on a pile of tables and wreckage he calls 'Mt. Hatelma'. Knowing himself the better man, Matti turns his back in disgust, and stalks off to find a better life elsewhere.

But the basic mood of the play is set, not by these three, but by the wordless tapestry behind them: beggars, farmhands, and a hungry blind child, cringing about their business. Their faces are fearful and empty, grey like their rags, blending into the floor and walls, invisible until you look for them. The only spot of colour is the slash of red on the sallow faces of the younger maids, still looking for husbands.

Murray Laufer deserves a special commendation; his set is a work of art, well-crafted for its play. I do take exception to his lavish use of banners (copied from Brecht's own 'Berliner Ensemble') which unnecessarily stylize the action; otherwise, it is equal to the best I have seen. He was also responsible for the very effective use of costume, (and, presumably, makeup) to define the place of each character. For example, Puntilla and Matti were set apart because only they, of all the men, wore good clothes and healthy face colouring; but Matti's suit had a patch on one elbow!

Gale Garnett, as Fina, sang the interludes forecasting the plot (very pleasantly, to my ear), besides giving a realistic and joyful performance as a welcome foil to Puntilla. Nevertheless, Kurt Reis should be reproached for his adherence to Brecht in this matter; in this play the element of surprise would be a potent addition, and there is no good reason to waste it.

Gale Garnett as Fina in Brecht's play Puntilla and Matti

Tenants charge more bad faith from OHC

An Ontario Housing Corporation spokesman yesterday denied that OHC had agreed to a two week stay of proceedings in their dispute with the rent-striking students.

Wayne Roberts, spokesman for the Charles Street Tenants Association, noted that a two week break had been requested by the OHC.

He said that OHC had shown "disgusting bad faith by requesting a recess and then sending out court orders in the middle of it."

Fifty-seven students whose rent is in arrears for two months or more have been served with "copies of depositions" requiring them to appear at a subsequent hearing, according to R. R. Snell, Director of Information Services for OHC.

A number of others who have been withholding their rent for a shorter period have received letters threatening them with eviction, he said.

The first 20 hearings will be held in the week of March 22. The remaining 37 will have hearings in April.

Tenants can dispute OHC's contenation that the strikers have violated their lease, but if they lose, they will be required to pay up their overdue rent or face forcible eviction, Snell said.

A closed meeting of the OHC and the tenants will be held tomorrow to discuss a "collective agreement" which the tenants proposed two weeks ago.

Students as patients? Orchestra?

Lakoff sings out against parity

In a stirring Ben Casey metaphor, Political Science professor Sandy Lakoff explained to his third year class yesterday why he doesn't believe in staff-student parity.

"Would you want a hospital where the patients voted on the major issues, or one where doctors are in charge but subject only to review for malpractice?" Lakoff asked his class in the dying minutes of the lecture.

Waxing musical, Lakoff also explained his contention that faculty should make more decisions than students, by pointing to the need for a conductor in an orchestra.

Although Lakoff admitted there are some similarities between the university and a democratic political organization, he noted that the bills are not paid by members of the university community.

The changing scene, in Canadian science policy

BY DAVID ROGERS
PHYSICS DEPARTMENT

OVER A TWO-YEAR PERIOD beginning in March 1968 a special Senate Committee on Science Policy, chaired by Maurice Lamontagne, held public meetings at which all government agencies concerned with science and over 250 groups from industry, universities and the professional scientific societies gave their views on Canadian Science Policy. The first volume of the committee's report was published last December and the second volume which will contain the actual recommendations is due to be released in 6 weeks. Unlike the report of the Senate Committee on the Mass Media, this report is the forerunner of major government legislation and policy changes.

Not only have its hearings stirred a great deal of discussion in the scientific community on the subject of science policy but the federal cabinet is already drafting legislation. As a result of the report and impending government action there are going to be major changes in Canadian science policy in the next few years, changes which will have an effect not only on the scientists themselves but on the entire society.

One of the major by-products of the senate committee's work has been the formation of a national organization called SCITED. The purpose of this group, which embraces nearly all phases of science and technology (including engineering, medicine, basic sciences and social sciences) is to encourage scientists from all disciplines to work together with a broad outlook on questions of common concern to all scientists. As an example of this, there will be a major conference held in Ottawa soon after the release of the second volume of the Senate report. This will act as a formal vehicle for the scientific community (including students) to make its response to the recommendations.

The report itself deals with two broad areas. One is the reorganization of the government's science policy machinery. The other is the recommending of a basis for formulating an overall science policy (i.e. a discussion of suggested targets and strategies).

The distinction between these two related but dissimilar aspects of the report is not always made and it can lead to a great deal of misunderstanding.

Anyone who has studied Canadian science policy will agree that a major administrative reorganization is necessary and the report makes this point very forcefully. The report is very careful to distinguish between overall science policy and individual policies. "It must be emphasized again that the role of an overall science policy, like that of a macro-economic policy is not to replace specific policies but to support them with a basic framework, broad terms of reference and criteria to assess their efficiency"

The federal cabinet has already moved in this direction and following one of the reports major recommendations, it is establishing a new cabinet post for a minister of science (the first minister will be a Toronto businessman, A. W. Gillespie).

Although the formal recommendations will appear only in the second volume of the report, the major points of emphasis can be summarized as follows:

- a call for a minister of science (without a department) is made,
- a proposal for a reordering of research priorities is made with emphasis on:
 - i) engineering and technological development rather than basic science,
 - ii) life sciences, especially the social sciences vs physical sciences,
 - iii) social and economic objectives vs curiosity oriented research
- the need to develop a new approach to stimulate research and development (R&D) in industry is stressed
- the need for more research in the social sciences is pointed out (although it carefully notes that there are already too many students in the social sciences to be usefully employed.)
- it recommends that Canada's R&D effort should be doubled while holding the universities' share constant,
- it wants the results of R&D made more relevant to the people in our society (but note that this only means doing the research in industrial labs as opposed to government labs),
- the need for a better manpower inventory and control is stressed,

- it recommends that the lab and granting aspects of the NRC be separated,

- it suggests the development of a high-level information system for Canada,

- it recognizes the very tricky question of teaching vs research at the university and then ignores the problem.

As well as the major thrusts of the report given above, it notes that the role of foreign ownership on the amount of R&D done in Canada is not as clear as many people believe: "All the available evidence shows that at least until recently, foreign-owned subsidiaries spent proportionately as much on R&D in Canada as similar Canadian companies" (they quote Mel Watkins to this effect). However with this brief comment on foreign ownership, consideration of the effects of the Canadian-American relationship on Canadian science policy is virtually dropped.

Throughout the report the committee frequently quotes the various views they had received on a given subject and then adopts the one which fits into their grand plan. One example is their claim that Dr. Steacie (president of NRC 1952-62) was betraying his trust by stating "A direct responsibility to produce the kind of graduate industry wants would be a degradation of the university to the level of a vocational school." This is a fairly widely held view and yet the report easily dismisses it. This emphasizes another aspect which the report fails to even consider; what effects will the report's recommended changes have on the role of education at the university and what will the students' reaction be? It is implicitly assumed that the government and industry can change the university's role to suit their purposes with little consultation with the faculty, much less the students!

It is content to point out past failures and suggest changes with no overall aim in mind other than to allow our industry to do well in the "technology race". That this is not the main role of science policy is stressed strongly in many places. For example the OECD report "Science, Economic Growth and Government Policy" points out "it appears that science and technology do not constitute a perfect mixture that will automatically make a big contribution to economic growth and social development" and "thus the formulation of a national science policy must take into account non-economic objectives as well as economic ones; and the former may even sometimes take precedence." It is important to realize, that although the senate report may pay lip service to these ideals, it does not in fact pay serious consideration to them in practice!

Since the report is so superficial it puts a great deal of emphasis on international comparisons (since if we follow the rest of the world we can blame the results on them). And even here it is content with the most shallow statistics which tend to fit into the report's analysis in a simple way. This is an important point and since so much weight is attached to it in the report it is worthwhile to briefly discuss some of the figures they have used.

The report uses statistics to show two major conclusions: i) Canada does far too little research and ii) her distribution of effort is wrong. In Table 1, the figures in the first column which show Canada far below the other major industrial countries in total R&D effort are from the senate report. However using the figures given in the OECD report on Canadian Science Policy (Paris 1969) which explicitly distinguish between the social and economic purposes of R&D (as opposed to military, space and atomic R&D) one gains an entirely different picture of Canada's position. The OECD report points out that military research has no necessary or direct relationship to economic growth. Even the senate report is confused on this issue since at one point it claims that there have been important spin-off benefits from the huge American defence and space R&D programs. But in another place it points out "Instead of indirectly assisting an area of technology with spin-off, why not promote it directly by projects whose objective is to meet the real need?"

Other figures presented by R. W. Jackson of the Science Council are also very revealing in that they show that the simple comparisons made between the distribution of effort in Canadian and American science can be very misleading. He has divided American companies into civilian oriented and military-space oriented components (very roughly). He notes that there is a strong correlation between the emphasis in research and the orientation of the industry (see Table 2). These figures should not be used to infer any simple cause-effect relationships, but they do point out the weakness in comparing the total Canadian vs total American figures since Canada's industry is almost entirely civilian oriented.

These figures have been presented to demonstrate that both the major conclusions drawn from the statistics in the senate report are at best misleading and require a much deeper analysis than given so far.

The above criticisms are concerned with the errors introduced by a blind comparison of the Canadian vs American systems. However this is begging the even more crucial question:

do we want to emulate the Americans? The report does not even ask the question!

There have been a large number of writers recently who have placed much of the blame for the mess in American society on the relationship between science industry and the government (J. K. Galbraith and H. L. Nieburg) and yet the report takes no account of this (even Fortune magazine this month has taken to defending science from this attack!)

We are fortunate in Canada that we can still avoid some of the problems the Americans have run into if we start worrying about them now. Unfortunately the senators did not adopt this approach.

There is one all pervading bias in the report and that is the pro-industry, anti-scientist bias of the committee (but what do you expect from a group of businessmen?) Although the report tries to jump on the "lets make science relevant to society" bandwagon and refers to its proposals as revolutionary, it is actually a very establishment-oriented document. The report is revolutionary, however the proposed revolution is one in which the vested interest in science is taken away from the scientists and given to the industrialists. The report is written in such a manner as to make the scientific community react strongly against the way science has been shown and thus divert attention from the real point of emphasis of the report which is to strengthen industry. This strong pro-industry bias can best be seen by a comparison of the following two quotes referring to the same requests but from the industrialists and the scientists respectively: "Most briefs presented by industry recommended stronger more comprehensive and less restrictive federal government incentives to stimulate innovation in industry. The Committee was struck by the fact that this suggestion also received broad support from the 'wise men', individuals and non-industrial associations."

Along the same lines, with reference to scientists: "They are asking at the same time for more public money and less public control. Society and government as a guardian of the public interest, obviously cannot accept a request that in too many cases would amount to a social security measure or job-creating program for scientists."

Even as a scientist, I must agree with the ideas involved in the second quote, but the same comments must apply to industry as well. This strong bias which pervades the entire report has unfortunately greatly weakened the analysis given to some of the major problems.

The report has very clearly seen the need to redirect Canadian science policy but it has emerged with no significant insight into how to make science relevant to the real needs of society.

It is clear that this report will stimulate major changes in Canada in the next few years although the government will not be tied directly to the reports recommendations. It will be very easy to criticize the government five or ten years from now over its actions in the next short while. An informed and vocal response now (which is a much more difficult task) has the additional benefit of actually being capable of having some effect.

University overhaul urged

George Martell, editor of "This Magazine is About Schools", Friday advocated a major overhaul of the country's university system. Friday at the Canadianization of Post-Secondary School Education conference.

University students should not get caught up in the mind-bending bureaucratic work of universities, he said. In his opinion they should seek programs that allow them to get off campus and organize the community.

They should return to campus when they want "to make sense of their experiences" and clarify them, he added.

"We don't have much of a country because we haven't made ourselves a country," Martell stated.

Since our lives are city lives, the only way for us to reclaim our country is to go into the cities and organize block-by-block, neighbourhood-by-neighbourhood, taking control of our institutions, he said.

Martell said the Canadian school system is being tremendously increased to absorb youth who would otherwise be on the job market. The whole expansion in community colleges and vocational schools is primarily a system of social control which "doesn't prepare people for honest jobs".

Martell said the reason for the lack of emphasis on literacy in city core schools is that people without skills won't bitch when they don't have jobs.

'Rat Race Sweepstakes' to be held at Regina campus July 10

REGINA (CUP) — Everybody talks about the "rat race" but until now no one has done anything about it. Not only are students at the University of Saskatchewan, Regina campus doing something about it, they are involved in a rat race of their own.

Members of the Fine Arts Society at Regina campus are conducting the first annual Rat Race Sweepstakes to be held July 10. Ten tickets will be drawn for the 10 rats that make it through preliminaries to the final race. The person holding the ticket on the winning rat will receive $750 or 15 per cent of the gross receipts from ticket sales up to $15,000, whichever is greater.

Second prize is $150 or 3 per cent of the gross up to $3,000, and third prize is $101 or 2 per cent of the gross up to $2,000. A lawyer and chartered accountant firm are looking after the receipts.

The society has been granted a license from the attorney-general's office and it is the first student lottery sweepstakes in the province. Tickets will be available throughout the province at various outlets. Dr. John Archer, principal of Regina campus, is fully supporting the project.

Proceeds will provide a scholarship fund for students wishing to study the fine arts at Regina campus, award grants-in-aid to student artists and establish an art activities centre in Regina.

Rat race headquarters are located in the fine arts building on the college avenue campus in Regina.

"It took me 5 seconds to say 'Yes'.

But I said 'no' to shopping for bargain-priced rings."

"Frankly, that 5-second decision had several months' solid thinking behind it. I'd even done some research on diamonds and on the jewellers who sell them.

I learned that there is no such thing these days as a bargain or a 'good wholesale deal' in diamonds. You save nothing — often you lose — by cutting corners. Some rings, I discovered, are actually first marked up so they can be slashed down for a fantastic 'special'.

I, (I mean we), selected Birks because they now have diamonds of different qualities at prices to match each quality. Also because they've got a thing about ethical selling... a thing that guarantees us full value for our money, (I mean his money), no matter how little or how much we spend."

Thatcher helps himself to U of Sask funds

REGINA (CUP) — The Thatcher government is dipping into the University of Saskatchewan's budget for $1.1 million to help finance the Government's newly announced scholarship fund.

All university departments in Saskatoon and Regina have been forced to cut all funds that normally go for student assistance and sent the total on up to the university budget committee who in turn pass it on to the Government.

The money includes all university-granted scholarships and at least two-thirds of the money paid to teaching assistants.

The reason for the move is that the Liberal Thatcher government wants to appear to have injected large amounts of money into a scholarship fund for students without actually having done so.

When asked by a concerned university official whether or not the action on the part of the Government constituted infringement upon the autonomy of the university, one Government official responded by saying that the Government only wanted to see its name on the scholarship cheques.

However, despite such assurances and an apology for the Government's action circulated by university administration President John Spinks, concern for university autonomy in the face of the government action continues in faculty circles.

The Faculty Association at Regina campus unanimously passed a resolution which expressed its "alarm that a line item of the university budget should be removed, an action which implies danger to the autonomy of the university."

At a meeting between the Student Council-Board of Governors Liaison Committee some board members faulted the student unions on the two campuses for the situation. The board members said the government was acting in response to student groups who improperly applied pressure to the government by bypassing the board.

Scarborough phase two may come in August '72

Scarborough College, still only an embryo of its planned size, will move into the $5,500,000 Phase II(a) construction stage by August 1972 if the recommended bid is approved by the Board of Governors.

This second stage includes a gymnasium complex, faculty offices, secretarial areas, student activity areas, additional dining space, and seminar rooms, but no residence space.

The addition will be built on to the administrative core at the junction of the Humanities and Science wing and the service road parallel to Military Trail.

The architects of the John Andrews firm intend to blend the new construction with the original building, and to allow for the connection of future additions.

Scarborough now has an enrollment of 1,811 full-time and 1,048 part-time-students.

Spencer, Dack want fair fees

o From page one

leges receive less government financial assistance.

Similarly, he noted, there is no adequate housing accommodation for students at either Scarborough or Erindale. Spencer and Dack would ask SAC to guarantee mortgages for co-op housing near the suburban campuses.

On the housing front, they also propose complementing the current off-campus housing service by publishing "a critical survey" of boarding houses and rooms and pressuring "the city to enforce its regulations."

Spencer and Dack also plan to better meet the needs of the various course unions and professional faculties by grants to them based on the number of students they cover.

"It is more fiscally responsible to finance education and in fact most programmes on a per capita basis," Spencer says. This system would significantly increase the schools and course unions operating budgets, allowing them to expand their activities.

They hope to cut down the exorbitant cost of textbooks by forming a SAC "co-operative importing and wholesaling body to eliminate the book distributors' mark-up."

Spencer and Dack believe the Blue and White Society should restrict itself to self-sustaining campus-wide activities, with professional student societies and college councils responsible for most social programmes. They propose increasing the Blue and White loan by another $4,000 and giving the Society a $1000 grant.

PHE, Vic to meet in semi-final

Two first division teams, PHE A and Vic I, will meet in one of the interfaculty Jennings Cup hockey play-off semi-final series.

The Vic—PHE series will be a two-game, total point affair with the first game tomorrow afternoon at 12:30. The second match is slated for Monday evening at 6:30 p.m.

PHE A, run away winners of the first division championship, had to battle a scrappy New College team coached by Bill Buba in a quarter-final game Monday afternoon to gain the semi-final berth. The New crew held their own for two periods before a pair of quick PHE goals by Don Olsen and George Nuppola settled the matter.

Rod Brown, Rodger Wright and Paul Comerford scored the other PhysEd markers while Gareth Goslow and Rick Ramsden replied for New.

Former Varsity Blue players Dick Barnhouse, Robbie Ellis were also prominent for the winners Ian Smith played a standout game in the New nets.

Vic I, third place finishers in the first division, downed Scarborough, 4-1, to gain a semi spot. Harpur, Adams, Howard and Johnston clicked for Vic while Liley notched the lone Scar score.

Blues-UBC game to be broadcast live Thursday

The Varsity-UBC game will be broadcast live by RADIO VARSITY beginning at 5:45 Thursday afternoon. Game time is six o'clock.

Radio Varsity sports director Paul Carson and Varsity sports editor Lyndon Little will handle the coverage direct from the Sudbury Arena.

If you have Rogers Cable, the RV broadcast can be picked up on an FM radio in the following way: detach the cable from your TV set and attach it to the input (or antenna) connections on your radio, then set the radio dial to 97.1 FM.

Results will also be broadcast on CFRB and on the late sports shows on both CBC and CFTO.

New College goaltender Ian Smith was a standout as the New crew bowed to PHE by a score of 5-2.

Dr. Fager to help The Duke with B-Ball

By DR. WILBERT FAGER

Some 2100 fans were present at the quarter-final playdowns of the Sifton Cup. Of the eight teams involved, UC, Law, Vic and PhysEd advanced to the semis. Yesterday's results were as follows.

GINNY WINS $5:

Throwing a wrench into the Duke's point spread, Coach Ginsburg of UC pulled his starters after they had built a 23-point margin with 4:30 to go in order to win a five dollar bet.

What had been a close battle was turned into a romp with the insertion of Bill "Mr. Peepers" Birnbaum who added virility to the impotent UC board forces. UC beat New, 103-91, on Jumping Jack Pascht's 20-point performance. Lindsay "Squabs" Horenblas scored a tournament record 44 points for New.

LAW BLOWS OUT CHILLY ST. MIKE'S B'S:

Shooting a dismal 11 per cent in the second half, SMC B was routed, 78-59, by Law after being tied 28-28 at half time.

Allen "The Goon" Sternberg supplied the bulk of the Law offensive thrust until retiring early in the second half. However, Vic "The Gearbox" Alboini finished the game with his daring end-to-end rushes. Despite adverse fan reaction to the Duke's prediction for this game, it must be admitted that the proofreader in Monday's Varsity accidentally interchanged the names of Law and SMC B in the headline.

Thus, the Duke picked it!

HONEY BEAR BURIES THE PANCAKE MAN:

Midway through the final stanza, Tom "Honey Bear" Franklin literally burrowed a den beneath Jim "The Pancake" Man Choreatockie, rolling him (ie, causing him to travel — definitely the highlight of this tournament to this point).

Awesome board work by "Munchkin" Tonisson, "Orange Julius" Eben and "The Executioner" delivered the crowning blow in Vic's 63-47 roughshod victory over the Engineers.

For the Engineers, Ken "Waxdue" Landrum was a tower of strength throughout the game.

In the final five minutes, Brian "Cold Duck" Stevens whipped his menagerie into a frenzy in order to beat The Duke's point spread of 10.

KODIAK'S BUBBLE GUM BURST BY PHYSED:

St. Mike's A's and Steve "Kodiak" O'Neill's respective bubbles were burst as PhysEd beat SMC A, 68-66, on Milo Filinski's basket with three ticks left on the clock.

PhysEd dominated the boards and only torrid shooting by the Mikes — especially "Orbit" Mullins and Tom "The Spider" O'Conner — kept them in the game.

Coach Cheeseman called a strong game for PhysEd as Cheese's boys overcame the highly partisan Mikes rooters.

Here then, are The Duke's spreads for Thursday's games at Hart House:

UC OVER LAW BY 8-POINTS — 5:00 p.m.:

The Iron Dukes of Law proved they too have good shooting, great speed, hot rebounding, and depth in reserve. These talents should provide the UC Bombers with a stern test in Thursday's semi-final.

VIC OVER PHYSED BY 4 POINTS — 7:00 p.m.:

This game will feature the animal squads. Both are exceptionally strong rebounding teams. However, Vic's overall good shooting should be enough to allow Vic to prevail.

Notes: Both semi-finals series are two-game affairs. The second game in the UC—Law set is scheduled for Tuesday at 7:00 p.m. while the second match in the Vic—PhysEd tussle goes Wednesday night at 7:00 p.m.

Leave for Sudbury today

Blues in search of fifth national ice title

By LYNDON LITTLE

At approximately 1:30 this afternoon, Varsity's hockey Blues will hop aboard a Gray Coach limousine and depart on a trip that, at several points this season, few people would have given them much chance to make.

The nadir of the season came on Feb. 12 when Blues dropped a 6-4 decision to Guelph, effectively killing their chances for a first place finish. At that juncture, the CIAU's looked, to say the least, a little remote.

However, since that undistinguished performance in Guelph, Blues have gathered themselves together for a string of seven consecutive victories, the final two coming in the OQAA playoffs over Carleton and Queens.

THE BLUES' ENTOURAGE, which includes 19 players, a coach, two sturdy trainers, a team manager and assorted press hangers-on, are on their way to Sudbury to defend the national shiny crown they have held four of the past five years. Sudbury, in fact, is the place it all started back in 1966 when Blues took their first title defeating the U of Alberta Bears, 8-1, in the tournament final.

Of the five teams competing this time around, three of them, Blues (OQAA winners), Loyola Warriors (OSLAA champs), and St. Mary's Huskies (AIAA winners) were present at last year's tournament in Charlottetown.

THE TWO NEW TEAMS will be the University of British Columbia Thunderbirds from the West and the host Laurentian Voyageurs who defeated York, 5-3, in the OIAA finals this past weekend.

The role of the defending champions is never an easy one to carry: but for Blues, there are certain benefits accruing from their 3-2 victory over St. Mary's last year.

Blues will meet the Thunderbirds in the opening game of the championships tomorrow night at 6:00 p.m. A win in that game shoots them straight into the national finals Saturday afternoon. That would mean a day off Friday (hopefully for rest) while the other teams would be battling through semi-final and consolation games.

THE SECOND GAME tomorrow night features Laurentian and Loyola. The winner of that tussle will go against St. Mary's Friday for the other spot in the finals the next day.

Blues have never played a national championship game at Varsity Arena but for four members of this year's team, playing in Sudbury will be as good as a home-ice advantage. Left winger Bill Buba, right wing Kas Lysionek, centre Ivan McFarlane and defenceman Nels Debenedet are all Nickle-Belt products.

Buba, the OQAA western division all-star left wing in each of his two years at Varsity, starred for the Sudbury Junior A Wolves of the NOHA. Lysionek, a mercurial skater with good size, was also a member of the Wolves in addition to a year with the Voyageurs.

Debenedet and McFarlane hail from Copper Cliff, a hockey hotbed just west of the Sudbury city limits. McFarlane was a standout for the village's powerhouse high school team while Debenedet spent four years in American college hockey at Michigan State before finally finding his way into a Varsity royal blue uniform.

THE ONLY MAJOR AREA OF CONCERN is how Blues will react to the ten-day period of inactivity that has followed their league playoff triumphs in Ottawa. The OQAA is the only conference that declares its champion two weeks before the CIAU's.

"I don't anticipate that the lay-off will be a major problem," said coach Tom Watt earlier this week. "I think that as soon as the guys hit the atmosphere of the national tournament in Sudbury, they'll snap into top form. After all, we've got eight members on the squad that have never been to the CIAU's before."

THE EIGHT ARE Gord Davies, Lysionek, Brent Imlach, Mac Hickox, Scott Seagrist, McFarlane, Brent Swanick and Debenedet.

The early line on the UBC team is much like the story of the OQAA eastern division squads: top-flight forward combinations with uncertain defence. The T-Birds had four of the top eight scorers in their league. Bob McAneeley, their captain and leader, shot 30 goals while Dave Buchanan had 18, Tom Williamson 17 and Barry Wilcox 15.

UBC goaltender, Ian Wilkie, was the first-team all-star netminder in the Western Canada league.

BLUE NOTES: CBC will telecast Saturday's final live beginning at 2:00 p.m. . . . Tournament officials say there will be ample tickets available at the gate for Varsity fans wishing to attend. Gray Coach has a Friday midnight bus run to Sudbury . . . This will be the first time Varsity and UBC have ever clashed on the ice lanes; back in the mid-fifties, they met in exhibition football matches . . . Acadia University's All-Americans defeated Manitoba's All-Canadians, 73-44, to win the CIAU basketball title.

Volley girls are second in CIAU(W) tourney

After 22 league and 10 tournament matches — amounting to 60 games without a single loss — the Varsity Women's Volleyblues finished second in the CIAU(W) national intercollegiate finals held in Calgary last Saturday.

Earning berths in the nationals were the University of Manitoba Bisonettes (WCIAA), the University of Waterloo Athenas (OQWCIA) and Dalhousie University Tigerettes in addition to the Varsity team.

The four-team event began with a round-robin competition to decide the two teams that would advance to the championship final.

Although off to a slow start, Toronto downed Dalhousie, 2-0, and in their fifth meeting of the season with Waterloo, scored another win, 2-0. Back on the court after a short lunch break, the Blues ran up a gainst a stunning Manitoba defence and dropped their first match of the season.

Pulling themselves together before the finals, Blues could not fend off the Manitoba attack led by Winter Games star and national team prospect Claire Lloyd. Two hours and many long, hard-fought rallies, the Bisonettes emerged the national winners, defeating Blues, 15-8, 16-18, 5-9, 15-3.

Key to the Manitoba success was a strong defence and a consistent attack.

The Toronto crew consisted of national team prospects Julie Kucharchuk and Halya Stefaniuk, Winter Games team member Anne Malowany, as well as Agra Alberts, Lydia Eliashevsky, Roxsolana (Rocky) Wankewycz, Marg Oakley, Joan Schwartz, Anu Pettai, Lynne Shearson and Anne Chellew. Team manager was Judi Bowness.

COURT TALK: Coach of the Manitoba team is Mrs. Lois (Kennedy) Boyle, a U of T PhysEd grad. A member of Canada's Pan-Am team in 1967, Lois played on Blues' teams coached by our own Marj Shedd — herself a member of five national volleyball championship squads.

Engineers, SMC

Sr. Engineering will meet St. Mikes in the second semi-final series of the inter-fac hockey playoffs.

Sr. Engineering downed Erindale, 4-1, in the first game last night while St. Mikes scored six times in the third period to salvage a 7-6 victory over Business.

First game of the series is Friday at 8:00 p.m. while the second goes Monday at 9:00 p.m.

Capitalism is exploiting Quebec, says Chartrand

By DOUG HAMILTON

Michel Chartrand denounced the federal government as fascist last night at U of T Waffle-sponsored meeting held at Convocation Hall.

Chartrand described Trudeau's regime as "the government of the CIA." "We are a colony," he told the audience of 800, "we don't live in a democracy."

"It's a peculiar situation," added Chartrand, "when people who do not agree with the Liberal Party — the federal party — are sent to jail for three or four months."

Chartrand complained of being tried by judges "who are good federalists." He spoke little of his imprisonment except for the fact that the jail roof leaked.

Michel Chartrand, left, the renowned Quebec socialist labor leader held forth last night in Toronto about his experiences in Quebec jails under the War Measures Act.

Erich Young/The Varsity

The CNTU Montreal leader asserted that he dared Trudeau to put him and fellow independentists in jail.

"He found the guts to put us in jail," added Chartrand humourously, "and then he got married."

Chartrand questioned Trudeau's motives for invoking the War Measures Act. He said there were no anti-insurrection laws implemented when politicians were assassinated in the United States. The British, he said, had not utilized such laws even though they were fighting a civil war in Ireland.

"Those who were writing in papers, and those who were demonstrating and working for peace," added Chartrand, "were arrested." He said Jean Marchand's list of 3000 conspirators were "the young Canadians working in the slums of Montreal."

The capitalist economic system was bitterly assailed by the fiery trade unionist.

"We have been conspiring for years with international bandits" who are exploiting the Third World. Furthermore, he claimed that Quebec was dominated by American economic imperialists and their branch-plant subsidiaries.

The workers of Quebec, he said, were constantly threatened by unemployment created by American companies which had left the province. Chartrand decried the high rate of unemployed skilled workers: Montreal alone, has 100,000 men out of work. "This is the efficiency of capitalism," he remarked sarcastically.

"Capitalism," bellowed Chartrand, "is fascism" — "capitalism is exploiting Quebec for the benefit of Ontario."

Chartrand regretted that Quebecois "were not as good socialists" as some English-Canadians, and he announced that "we would be glad to co-operate with socialists in English Canada" provided Quebec retained the right of self-determination.

"We want a government of our own," he said, "this is democracy."

Lapierre tired of being a problem

By ERIC MILLS
and ALEX PODNICK

Laurier Lapierre, a former well-known advocate of Quebec special status, is moving towards the separatist position.

The former NDP national vice-president told a crowd of about 800 people last night, "I'm not yet independentist, but I hope to become one."

However, he does not believe either federalism or separatism can be imposed upon the Quebecois. They must decide themselves — without the interference of others — what their future relationship to Canada will be.

"Self-determination: that's the essence of what it's all about," he said. "The Quebec people must find a solution themselves with complete freedom."

At the beginning of his remarks at the Waffle teach-in on Independence in Canada, Lapierre said in French, "I want to give you a different testimony than that of M. Chartrand."

"I was not arrested (as Chartrand was). It is not an easy thing not being arrested I am irrelevant."

trand was). It is not an easy thing not being arrested I am irrelevant."

Instead, he spoke as one whose belief in federalism had been shattered not by personal repression under the War Measures Act, but by witnessing the "profound blackmail" against those who had the "courage to denounce the destruction of the Quebec people."

Lapierre said he viewed the October events as more than two kidnappings and a murder; it was a crisis for Quebec.

"For once in one's lifetime, one had to make a choice, between being co-opted in the system or

Dahlke would streamline SAC

By LAURA KELLY

Lawrence Dahlke, running for SAC president, is pledging the conversion of the U of T student council to a streamlined, apolitical body which can simply re-allocate student fees.

"SAC should be totally apolitical, but should be sociologically involved by giving grants to groups like Stop Spadina and Pollution Probe," said Dahlke, a second-year Engineering student.

Dahlke described outside political groups, such as the Black Students Union which this year got a $5,000 grant, as "non-deservative."

"I don't believe in support of any political group or any minority group. I'm not taking any stand against them. I just don't think SAC should support them," said Dahlke.

"You could say that Stop Spadina is political, but it's also sociological. We could specify that our grants be used for only apolitical functions of such groups," said Dahlke.

"With a reduced size and expenses cut, we'd be stronger, and could draw funds off private organizations, like companies. But then our allocation of funds would have to be in a responsible fashion," said Dahlke.

Rebates to the professional faculties would join community service groups and the Blue and White Dahlke's top priority list. About 5% of the budget would be allocated to outside groups.

Dahlke emphasized the importance of a campus centre, but didn't know how the financing could be accomplished.

"It's a matter of finding out when you get into office, because without the power all one can do is read. I feel what has been done is negative," he said.

A non-partisan, and therefore efficient SAC, goes along with Dahlke's idea of the university as a non-interpretative institution.

He sees the course unions, in to which he expects most of the education reformist energies to be channelled, as working towards more courses with varied ideologies, especially in Political Science.

"Now political science is set up from a left point of view and I think people would like to see a more varied point of view — after all it is education.

"Of course it's up to the people in the courses since they understand better," said Dahlke.

Dahlke rejects the use of disruptions in the current parity battle between students and faculty, saying "it's a nice party."

He did endorse the parity restructuring committee made up of students and dissenting faculty, since the presence of faculty made it "relevant," although he would rather see the concept be worked out by the students and faculty on the Council of Arts and Science.

Lawrence Dahlke

Beyond donating to campus groups Dahlke recommended that SAC fight the new government student loan program (CORSAP), and the proposed suburban college fee hikes.

"Since I'm the only candidate running on an apolitical platform, I'd consider it a mandate to change SAC if I were elected," said Dahlke.

APSC to hold referendum on SAC fees

By JEAN BUBBA

The mythical big stick of the Engineering Faculty — the referendum — was finally taken up and carried by the new Engineering Society President, Eric Miglin (III APSC) Tuesday night.

At the first executive meeting on March 17 and 18 concurrent with the SAC election chaired by Miglin, the Society voted to hold a referendum to demand a 50 per cent rebate of Engineering SAC fees. If obtained, the rebate would amount to approximately $14,000.

Speaking softly, Miglin said, "Any demand for a rebate must be made now in order to fit into the new SAC budget."

"It's a golden opportunity because now the SAC candidates will have to publically commit themselves either for or against Engineering as they present their policies," said Miglin.

The referendum should come as no surprise to the Engineers since, for the past three years, Engineering SAC reps and Society members have at various times advocated a redefinition of the position that Engineering holds with SAC. However, until this week, no concrete action has ever been taken on this sensitive issue.

Response to the referendum has been enthusiastic, Miglin expects a 75 per cent turnout.

This response was inevitable since for years the Engineering Society has been trying to increase their annual budget of $15,000 without raising the $7 per capita student activity fee.

"There are too many fixed expenses that strain the limitations of the budget already to allow money for innovative programs in Engineering," said Brian Leatherman, former Toike Oike editor.

For the next week Engineering will be subjected to a massive educational campaign complete with posters, flyers, and Tiny Toikes.

Referendum chairman and veteran SAC rep, Paul Cadario (II APSC) said. "The $6.50 rebate would be used to provide increased educational projects, questionnaires a working budget for the Engineering Faculty Council Reps, and financial aid to technical clubs on campus. The $6.50 that would remain with SAC would go towards subsidizing such things as Radio Varsity, the Blue and White Society and special university-wide projects sponsored by SAC, like an EOB educational campaign."

The forceful position that Miglin and his executive has taken might spawn similar demands from other colleges and faculty councils.

Scarborough and Erindale Colleges presently receive a 50 per cent rebate on their SAC fees and are bargaining for an increased rebate.

Speculating on the effect that their action might have, Miglin said, "This is not a move to pull out of SAC. The Engineering Society feels that the Engineers have not received the most from their SAC fees and that the Society could best administer a portion of their fees to improve the quality of education the Engineers now receive."

VUSAC election results

Murray Davidson (III Vic) was elected president of the Victoria College Students Administrative Council yesterday in what he called an "uphill battle against good candidates." He received 291 votes, over Reg Foster (II Vic), the only other presidential candidate, with 210.

Davidson promised to continue to help Vic and "give it the benefit of his experience". He was VUSAC University Government Commissioner this past year.

Debbie Lewis (II Vic) was the successful vice-presidential candidate, in a vote almost 3-1 in her favour, over Ian "Mac" Broad (I Vic).

All other positions were acclaimed. They are: Education commissioner, Karen Eubank (II Vic); Finance commissioner, Doug Blair (II Vic); University Government commissioner, Rick Raczkowski (II Vic); Communications commissioner, Marilyn Waugh (II Vic); Social Activities, Doug Hurst (II Vic); Production commissioner, Bill Ostrander (II Vic); and members-at-large are Linda Hall (I Vic) and Ruth Wilson (I Vic).

Sincere suit worn by Lewis

By ERIC MILLS

Wearing his "sincere suit and sincere smile" (according to one speaker), Ontario NDP leader Stephen Lewis wowed a Hart House debating audience on Wednesday night.

The House voted 73 to 19 in favour of a motion of non-confidence in the present provincial government.

Lewis seems to have taken the advice of his public image advisors, and discarded his corduroy suit and obtained the services of a barber. He wore a 'mod' bright blue jacket with a 'swinging' yellow shirt.

Much of the debate before Lewis spoke centred on pollution, foreign ownership, and education.

Ken McEvoy (SAC Information Officer), speaking for the ayes, described former Minister of Trade and Development Stanley Randall as singing a song of continentalism with his intense desire for foreign investment.

Now that Randall is not a Cabinet minister, said McEvoy, "his song has gone, but the malady lingers on."

With regard to the proposed Educational Opportunity Bank, he also noted that a likely debt of about $20,000 upon graduation would prove "prohibitive" to lower class ambitions for university.

Bill Coote (APSC) castigated the Tory government for spending only 1/4 per cent of its budget on environmental control. He called the cutting of education grants announced Tuesday "propaganda and public image work."

The supporters of the government based their case primarily on the alleged inadequacy of the NDP, which they admitted was the only credible alternative.

Lewis described as "perverse" the proposed arbitrary slashing of grants to universities, while admitting that selective cuts could be justified.

Waterloo wins concession

WATERLOO (CUP) — Students at Waterloo Lutheran University have won a partial victory in their struggle for parity on academic committees, but not without a confrontation with the Board of Governors.

At a meeting Tuesday, 800 students narrowly defeated a motion to occupy the university building. A motion demanding that student union president John Boute be admitted to a meeting of the Board of Governors going on at the same time was passed.

Students gathered around the room where the board was meeting, and after some scuffling, Boute and another student were admitted to the meeting.

The board finally directed administration president Frank Peters to present a plan designed to allow rehiring of a philosophy professor, who's contract was not renewed last fall, to the April meeting of the board's executive.

The board also directed a report due in May by a Senate commission already established "to define the responsibility of the various segments of the university community" contain some decision on the parity issue. The commission has 10 members, three of which are students.

However, following Tuesday's decision by the board, administration president Frank Peters told the Toronto Globe and Mail that "militant" students from the University of Waterloo who "invaded" Waterloo Lutheran University for the student meeting will be charged by the police as soon as their identity is learned.

There were two scuffles when the students went up to confront the Board of Governors meeting.

One was when the crowd surged forward when the door to the room was opened, and the second scuffle occurred when a university administration photographer tried to take pictures of the students outside the meeting.

Faculty may lose privileges

By PHIL CHARKO

Faculty failing to return books on time will face harsher treatment at U of T libraries according to a new Library Council report accepted yesterday.

Professor D. A. Joyce rejected the notion of granisheeing faculty wages recommended in the original report as being too objectionable. Instead, any fines or charges outstanding with a member of faculty at the end of the school year will result in his Faculty card not being renewed in the succeeding year.

Faculty would have the right of appeal to the Library Tribunal to be set up.

Now, after a two week period faculty receive a notice to return the book within ten days. If not renewed, fines would be levied. Replacement charges are also liable to faculty. Normally 30% of faculty require overdue notices.

A motion to delay implementation of a sub-committee's report by H. Hayworth till such time as differences between the library's jurisdiction were cleared up was defeated. It was pointed out that at present the system adopted applies to only nine of the 32 libraries within the U. of T. system. Departmental libraries and St. Michael's, Victoria, Scarborough and Erindale college libraries are unaffected.

SAC president, Ron Hurd, was present at the meeting to attempt to keep open nominations for the six of the twelve undergraduate positions which remain unfilled after nominations closed last week.

Students were prepared to fill those positions but their nominations did not meet the deadline. Council voted 12-11 against the extension and acceptance of their nominations.

Chief Librarian R. Blackburn said that the library would prefer not to service a new library for proposed new college and was also not in favour of special library privileges for extension students. These comments came in request for opinions from the Senate Executive investigating the issue.

"Tonight was a big night at The Varsity And a blow for freedom. We killed — deliberately — our first ad of the year. Not because of content, but because a story was so important it couldn't/shouldn't be cut."

How can we see the flies in our eyes?

Whatever happened to the struggle for parity in the faculty of arts and science?

The answer is simple — it died a long, sputtering and perfectly polite death. It was less the determination of hard line faculty members that killed it than the inability of students to know where and how to take a principled stand.

It always seemed fair to settle for another meeting, another committee, another delay; it always seemed somehow not right to demand an immediate solution to the crisis.

Students never could, it seems, decide that it was time to stop giving in and force administrators and faculty members to face the full consequences of student demands.

One of the most incongruous themes of the whole parity crisis was that while students were demanding a "full" and "equal" role in all aspects of the educational process, they still went around rather apologetic about the whole thing.

As if students were worrying — what if we get caught . . .

Our failure was a failure to break rules, as R. D. Laing would have suggested.

By allowing the faculty to take the initiative — it was always their offices, their meetings, their reactions — we allowed the issue of their status and power to become the focal issue.

We allowed them to define the issue in a very narrow and inaccurate way. We allowed them to convince most members of the university and most members of the public that all students were after was the right to fire unpopular professors.

And this was an issue all faculty members could rally around, and the public could not get excited about.

We failed to explain to the public of Toronto and Ontario what consequences a student and faculty operated university would have for society. How it would, instead of cutting out programs and cutting down on students in a time of economic crisis, instead apply its resources to solving urgent social problems.

For if anything, a university community that ran in a cooperative basis within its walls, would most be able to serve as a catalyst for social change outside its walls.

The reason we failed to do either of these things — put up a strong and determined fight, and make very explicit the nature of our demands — is due primarily to one fact.

As a group, we have not yet understood the social dynamic which is at work in us, among us, between us, throughout the educational process.

We have not yet accepted the educational process as a systematic process of brainwashing in which we are robbed of initiative, creativity and adventurousness.

A process through which we are made "respectable, employable, and civilized."

The process is most pronounced in the earlier years, and is breaking down all over the place inside universities.

Nevertheless, this process of "preparation for responsible adulthood" remains the basic framework of education. It is attested to not only in the very actual authoritarian structure of teacher-student learning, but also in the content of our education.

As a general premise, it would not be wrong to state that the content of our education is designed to implant in us certain distinct culturally valuable versions of experience while ignoring our own actual experiences.

We are being trained to experience only what it is worthwhile experiencing, what it is proper to experience.

We can't see the flies in our eyes, because we have flies in our eyes.

It was proper to conduct referendums, sit on committees, write reports, plan general assemblies, because these are the very processes by which the university has always operated.

The means we used in the parity struggle were means that had been sanctioned and approved by decades of parliamentary legitimacy.

We were never able to put forward as really valuable factors such experiences as our own inability to relate to our education, the obsolescence and ridiculousness of much that we experience.

We were not able to break out of the approved channels of dissent; we did not realize that our very dissent was a challenge to an entire system of education.

Predictably, we were ignored by the system which had spawned us.

Although there were a few tense moments — a very close strike ballot (but majority rules — that is the rule), and a series of successful disruptions — the administration has felt confident in the ability of the university, the great marshmallow of a university that we have, to ride out to drain away the energy which had first made us question what was being done to us.

But the issue has not been resolved. It looks like U of T will be able to wait out this storm — to wait until the exams and essays preoccupies most students and makes them wish only to be out of the university.

But the traditional university is fighting a losing battle.

Unless it changes — both in structure and in its work — it will come increasingly under fire, especially as more and more people are subjected to the same experience of the same education, an education designed and operated to preserve the existing social order.

The story of a high school student

THIS STORY READS MORE LIKE a parody or an allegory than like a true account, but the story is true and real and is about what happens in high schools, in Toronto, late in the winter of 1971.

The story has only a couple of central characters:

- o a high school gym teacher (his name is Gertner — that's Mr. Gertner)
- o a grade ten high school student (his name is Danson — Tim Danson, son of a prominent Toronto Liberal Member of Parliament),
- and third, but not least, :
- o a pair of red gym shorts.

When you threw these three elements together out at York Mills Collegiate Institute three weeks ago, you ended up with a major incident in which high school discipline "triumphed" and a high school kid found himself expelled from school.

PART OF IT, YOU SEE, IS THAT York Mills is a "really conservative" school, explains Tim Danson, who is not very reserved at all, but a talkative, lively kid who would be just the type to break rules and ask questions and generally cause problems for high schools.

Yes, another part of it, of course, is kids like Tim Danson, who want their education to be a real part of their experience, and don't want to be "trained and programmed" anymore.

But I'm jumping way ahead.

Let's get back to the red shorts.

Red and grey are the school colours at York Mills, and because Tim Danson plays (that should be 'played') on one of the school basketball teams, he owns a pair of red gym shorts.

Three weeks ago he arrived at school for his first class of a routine day, and put on his gym clothes.

He did it wrong.

HE PUT ON HIS RED GYM SHORTS and headed into the gymnasium to join the rest of his class.

He was supposed to be wearing blue shorts!

"That's how pathetic it is," says Danson.

The hawk-eyed gym teacher "yelled at me for two minutes, telling me I had two minutes to change my red shorts for blue ones or else earn a detention."

"I WALKED OUT, PUT EVERYTHING in my gym bag, and left," says Danson.

He went upstairs, and the gym teacher, who thought Tim had gone to change his shorts, was following him.

"Get inside the office," the gym teacher ordered loudly. Both vice principals jumped out of their office, the students watched, and Tim ignored them and walked out of the building.

THE WHOLE ISSUE SIMMERED for a week, but his "case" could only be resolved against him.

IT WAS JUST AN INCIDENT, but one of those incidents that reveal what a system is really like.

And because Danson had chosen to challenge the wanton authoritarianism he saw all around him, the incident turned into much more.

It was a symbolic thing, for instance. You know how there is always wild fantastic talk in the cafeterias and outside the lockers in a high school . . . At York Mills the fantasy became Everybody Putting on Red Shorts and Walking Up and Down the Halls.

That was just a fantasy, but Tim has much wider inclinations about what to do to fight the high school system.

"Schools," says Tim, remembering something A. S. Neill, the author of Summerhill, had written him in a letter (Tim had met Neill while in Europe one summer), "Schools are barracks for little tin soldiers who are taught how to obey orders . . ."

"THE ONLY EDUCATION I HAVE IS what I get through my own reading," says Tim.

His reading is wide enough that he can see through a lot of the lies, omissions and distortions in prescribed texts.

The Grade 10 history book, for instance, says Tim, gives a distorted version of the 1919 Winnipeg General Strike.

"They don't mention the violence that took place," he points out, "It's interesting that they don't want us to know about it."

One of Tim's plans is to distribute a fuller and more accurate account of the strike, so that students will know that they should not always trust the teacher and the text as the only sources of information.

The strike leaflet isn't the only plan of action Tim has. In the past he's distributed leaflets outside his school, and he still plans to.

It's one of the ways he can get fellow students to join him in his fight to change the system.

WHEN SCHOOL ADMINISTRATIONS and teachers thrive on intimidation and fear, it's only natural kids will be "scared shit" to do anything, says Tim.

"They have a horrible weapon to use against us," he says. "Failing."

And that's what he wants to fight.

Just because he's now expelled from York Mills (officials would prefer to call it "transferred", since he is now at Don Mills Collegiate), he doesn't plan to forget about what happens inside the more repressive schools like York Mills.

"It's important that people start to get an idea of what's being done to them," he says. "They have to find out what they are all suffering from and what they have in common.

"IF WE COULD GET STUDENTS TOGETHER, we could really do something."

How I was expelled from York Mills . . .

By TIM DANSON

LAST WEEK ON ANOTHER WEDNESDAY at York Mills Collegiate Institute, on a typical day, I tumbled down the hall, into the boys' change room, and prepared my uniform for gym class.

If you don't attend York Mills, you wouldn't know what I mean by a "typical day". Have any of you been behind bars, or had someone smash you in the head with a baseball bat? For you to understand what a "typical day" is, I say it's a day of complete frustration, no freedom, and an authoritarian atmosphere.

While preparing my uniform, consisting of a white T shirt, white socks, running shoes, and blue gym shorts, I realized that my blue gym shorts were not there. Time to press the panic button, I figured. But wait, do not press. I still had another pair, a red pair.

RULE NUMBER 203-647000 of the teachers' "screw the kids" handbook states: "If any student dares to come to gym class without proper equipment then he or she shall serve 72 years in the nurse's toilet, or a few detentions, or expulsion."

So then I tumbled to the gym office to speak to General Ken Gertner, my gym teacher, to ask him if it was OK if I wore red gym shorts (which happen to be the school colours) instead of the regulation blue ones.

General Gertner looks like one of those people who, when getting up in the morning, orders his wife to get his breakfast ready, while he goes and looks in the mirror for half an hour combing his wiry hair and mustache, singing gaily: "I am beautiful, I am great, that is way I can relate. . ."

NOT TO MY SURPRISE,

THE GENERAL turned around in his chair and in his authoritarian voice said: "You've got two minutes to get a pair of blue shorts or else you'll get a detention."

The General is an expert in handling difficult situations. We all know that if a kid won't listen to his teachers or any other bureaucratic pig, then the most fun solution is to scare the shit out of him until he does what you want through fear, not willingness. Have them drop to their knees, so the bureaucrats can raise their arms in victory and have a satisfied ego.

Yes, Mr. Gertner, Sir, your Royal Highness, an excellent idea . . .

It was too early in the morning to hassle with him, so I left the office in search of a pair of blue shorts.

Speeding up my tumble in order to beat the two minute requirement, I met a friend who told me about a meeting of what we call "ICSNY" which is an organization of student councils, allegedly to reform the educational system. It has two representatives of every school in North York — picked by the principals or someone else, but by no means representative of the majority of students and it gets together every other week at the North York Board of Education building to talk about generally nothing.

IF YOU BELIEVE THAT CHANGE CAN only come very slowly, and that the administrators should be the ones who make the decisions and no power to the students, then you should join "ICSNY".

Anyway, I went back into the gym, past the class, which was listening to the General's orders, into the change room, got my gym bag, and walked to my locker, to get my coat.

Then, as I was walking down the hall towards the parking lot, in front of the office, the General appeared.

Once again the general is on stage, and at the raise of his voice, the students in front of the office will cease to talk or move.

"GET INSIDE THE OFFICE!" ordered the General. I said No.

"Get inside the office," repeated the General. I said No.

Get inside the office, he bellowed again. By this time there was dead silence, and the tin soldiers cleared off to the side, and I said "I quit" and walked out of the school. The students who saw it, applauded, and many came up to me to congratulate me.

The next morning I went to the school office, to give them a note saying I had been at the ICSNY meeting the day before. I talked to the vice principal and we agreed that I wouldn't go to gym class until we straightened things up. The next day I didn't go to gym, and I didn't have gym on Friday and Monday, and I was away on Tuesday.

SO NOW, WE'RE BACK TO WEDNESDAY. That day we were having an assembly. The first one was for grades 12 and 13, and the second for 10 and 11.

I spent the first assembly in the office — sitting out my gym class — but I planned to go to the second assembly.

Bzzzz! The period's over. So I left the office and started to walk towards the cafeteria, where the assemblies are held. I hope you notice that I say "walking" instead of "tobbling", which is very unusual for me, since I only say "walking" when I'm interested in where I'm going. I like assemblies because I have an opportunity to express myself in front of a lot of people.

Well this was one assembly that they weren't going to let me express myself in. It was about war, and Jews and Arabs.

Halfway down the hall I was stopped by the vice-principal, who likes to refer to himself as "Vice-President", and he told me to get in the office and that we were going to straighten out the "shorts" problem "right now". I asked him if we could do it after the assembly and he said "no, right now."

I SAT IN THE OFFICE from nine to 12., taking a break in the hallway after the first hour and a half.

So who comes along . . . but General Gertner. Once again he is on stage, and once again he goes off on an ego trip.

"Get inside the office," he said. I said No. "Danson, get inside the office, you're in enough trouble as it is, you're just making it worse for yourself," he said with an air of great authority.

"Who do you think I am," I answered, "a piece of dirt? Who do you think you are — a king? What makes you so great? I'll treat you and anybody else with as much respect as you or they treat me."

He said: "Are you going to get in the office" and I said no.

Then the other vice-principal came out and asked me very politely to come and sit down (or whatever) in the office, so I did.

Another hour and a quarter went by and shortly after noon, I was called into the principal's office to talk it over.

THE PRINCIPAL AND THE TWO VICE-PRINCIPALS were sitting down, so I started to sit down as well.

"Stand up," said the principal, and when I asked why, he said "Because you don't deserve to sit down. You have no rights in this office . . ."

After arguing for a little while, I sat down. He made a little speech about the "power invested in me" and so on.

Then Gertner was asked to come in to tell his side. He said everything right, except he said he asked me nicely to "GET INSIDE THE OFFICE."

The principal said it wasn't a matter of wearing red shorts instead of blue ones, but a matter of principle. If kids could wear anything they wanted, then they wouldn't learn self-discipline.

SO IT CAME DOWN TO THIS. Either I obey the laws of the school which I and the rest of the students, have no say in making, and also obey the orders of teachers — or I leave.

I told him to fuck himself and I was expelled.

Not for telling him to fuck himself, but for trying to free myself from the sickening god-damn fucking bureaucracy of the educational system.

And it all started because I wore red gym shorts instead of blue ones.

I am now at Don Mills. I rapped to Bruce Cox, the principal, for a few hours last Friday. As I walked into his office, he said "Hi Tim, I'm Bruce Cox," not "Hi Tim, I'm Mr. Cox, the principal of this school so watch yourself around here."

We both sat down and he offered me some coffee and we talked. He's a really cool and friendly guy. We need more principals like him. We sat down and worked out a really great time table for me.

OSHC says No to tenants association

By DREW HUTCHESON

The Ontario Student Housing Corporation said a flat "No" Wednesday to requests of the tenants' association of the Charles Street married students residence for representation on their Board of Directors.

The corporation offered as a "compromise" an advisory board with tenant representation and no power.

The funny thing about the proposed advisory board is that it has existed since 1969. It seems possible that OSHC has not known about it all this time.

Said J. B. Rose, Divisional Director of Property Management, "We see this morning's meeting as a constructive one which may go a long way towards solving any matters of discord between this Corporation and our tenants.

"The decision is in keeping with the Corporation's desire to maintain meaningful dialogue with its tenants."

Since January, the OSHC has been sending eviction notices to over 130 of the striking tenants but a court action is necessary to have them physically evicted.

The corporation has recently begun sending summonses to some of the tenants, but, typically, they are not sure how many. The bailiff says 53, the company says 20, and the association knows of only 17.

What is apparent, however, is that the corporation is treating the strikers as individuals in arrears, instead of recognizing the association as a collective bargaining unit.

The actions will come to court in the week of March 22 to 26.

The conflict is in effect a test case for collective bargaining for tenants.

About 300 families have been withholding $50 a month of their rent since last August, in protest of poor heating, poor insulation, an inadequate playground, and very poor management. Tenants resent a rent ($176 for a two-bedroom suite) that is designed to leave the "non-profit" OSHC with a $3 million profit in 50 years.

The Housing Corporation is an interesting place. A Varsity reporter had to talk to 11 people before he was told that the official he wished to speak with wasn't in.

Scarborough to develop Can. studies

By DOUG HAMILTON

A committee will be formed at Scarborough College to develop a program in Canadian Studies.

The formation of the committee will be the responsibility of Scarborough Dean John Colman.

The faculty at the College disagree on the content and structure of a Canadian Studies programme.

Colman stated there is "an absence of concrete curriculum proposals" and that "the nature of Canadian studies still has to be explored."

L. K. Doucette, professor of French-Canadian Literature, suggested that Canadian Studies could be defined as "mutually related courses with Canada as a focus."

However, John Moir, a history professor, rejected any proposal to make Canadian Studies an interdisciplinary programme. "I have never seen an interdisciplinary course," said Moir, "that was worth the paper that it was printed on in the calendar."

The number of Canadian courses offered at Scarborough College this year is 15 out of a total of 136.5 offered by the Humanities and Social Sciences Divisions.

The final decision on when the committee will be created will be left to the discretion of Colman.

Respectable

Bigotry . . .

By LINDA McQUAIG

Can a bigot find true friendship and happiness in our modern world?

Apparently, yes. The trick seems to lie in picking the "right" prejudice, or at least expressing the "right" prejudice. It boils down simply to this: some prejudices are acceptable, some are not, and anyone aspiring towards social success must learn not to choose his prejudices indiscriminately.

This isn't necessarily difficult, since society provides us all with a wide scope of potential objects of derision. There are well-established prejudices for just about every group of people (the inventive mind can always dream up new ones anyway.)

Among the popular standbys — discrimination on the grounds of race, religion, nationality, and sex — some have recently become socially taboo. Prejudice against blacks, for instance, is currently unacceptable (even though it still runs rampantly through our culture). I'm not suggesting for a moment that we look beyond the colour of a person's skin to the human being inside. We don't. It's just that we stare less openly. Our racism is below board, under the table, not expressed on the cocktail circuit. We don't go in for anti-Negro restaurants officially. "Nigger" isn't a polite word.

Our society pays lip service to racial equality. Even the skillful racist will have difficulty putting this one across.

Male chauvinism, on the other hand, is a simpler, safer, and more effective form of bigotry. A male chauvinist can express his views openly without fear of social censure. He can eat in men-only restaurants, belong to men-only clubs, hire men only for high-level jobs, and still be an upstanding member of the community. This is possible simply because we accept male chauvinism as an integral part of our society. The most blatant, extreme examples of it don't even make us stir.

Dennis Braithwaite wrote in his column in the Telegram, (Dec. 30, 1970) "It is natural for women to think more highly of men than of women."

This comment provoked little reaction. Many readers probably disagreed with him, but there was no outrage, no condemnation. No one demanded his resignation. The Telegram obviously felt his opinions were safe to print.

Yet, imagine what the public reaction would have been, had Mr. Braithwaite expressed the same view on blacks? Consider the result if he'd written instead: "It is natural for blacks to think more highly of white people than of black people."

One of the most interesting features about this article was Braithwaite's insistence that his opinions reflected fact. He said that "nature, or God" was responsible for designing the roles of men and women. In other words, these words weren't merely Braithwaite's opinions — they were God's plan. So when he suggested that women stick to "male supporting activities" such as "stenographers, waitresses, nurses, clerks, salesladies, hunnies, airline hostesses, cleaning women, script assistants" because "men should handle the more important and more responsible tasks" he didn't feel bigotted in saying so. As far as he was concerned, he wasn't expressing a prejudice, he was expressing a fact. Perhaps he revealed himself best in his opening:

"There is discrimination against blacks, there is discriminations against Jews, there is some discrimination against every ethnic minority in this country including, even, the English.

"But there is no such thing as discrimination against women."

He then directly proceeded to illustrate a chronic case of discrimination against women (his own.) His failure to recognize it as such only proves that, to him, such attitudes are justified.

The southern planter was well aware that he discriminated against his slaves. However he didn't consider himself a bigot simply because he felt his discrimination was justified. To him, Negroes were inferior, and that was a fact of life (or nature, or God.)

Braithwaite also poses a question about high level career women: "Does the system need them in these jobs?" Again, would this argument be acceptable if applied to another minority group? Even if the system doesn't need Negroes, Jews, Italians, etc. most people would agree that they have a right to a place in it.

Tom Jones, in his current song "She's a lady" illustrates an interesting attitude towards women. Here's how parts of the song would be sung if "Negro" were to be substituted for "lady":

*"He knows his place
He's got style
He's got grace*

He's a Negro

*He's never in the way
Always something nice to say What a blessing*

(Wo-oh-oh)

*He takes what I dish out
And that's not easy.*

Tom Jones sings about ladies . . .

The fact that people (especially women) buy this record illustrates further the social respectability of male chauvinism. Not only is it condoned, in many ways it is actually encouraged. Many women insist that they be continually dominated and outdone by their husbands. The corollary of this, of course, is our acceptance and encouragement of submissiveness in women.

Tom Jones is actually praising his girlfriend for "knowing her place" and not getting "in the way". Right after he howls, "she's a lady" in the second chorus he whispers proudly, "and the lady is mine."

This high value we place on ladylike behaviour helps to explain why many women endorse their subordination so enthusiastically. A woman who asserts herself the way men traditionally have is quickly labelled "pushy" and "unfeminine". The message comes across clearly to any would-be dissenters: for a woman to step outside her "feminine" role is to deny her female sexuality, to become "masculine". More bluntly stated, she would be a "misfit".

Compare this destiny to the one available to "ladies" in our society. As long as they maintain their place they're respected, praised, and pampered. As Tom Jones points out:

Dennis Braithwaite: . . . Nature has assigned men and women their roles in life."

*"She never asks very much
And I don't refuse her.
Always treat her with respect Never want to lose her."*

Is it any wonder women make a cult of their "femininity"?

The social respectability of male chauvinism can perhaps best be seen in the nonchalance of those who express it. John Bulloch, owner of John Bulloch tailors, labelled feminists "crazy, maladjusted women" on CBC-TV news last January. Since Bulloch's success as a merchant, is dependent upon selling to the public, it is unlikely that he would voice an opinion that he felt might offend potential customers.

There's no need to go so far afield, of course, to prove this point. We have some excellent examples right here on campus. Hart House quickly springs to mind. Although Hart House wardens have traditionally had Vincent Massey to use as a scapegoat, it is clear that the exclusion of women had not until recently been exactly a pressing problem among U of T officials. Consider the disgrace to U of T, and consequently the different reform spirit, had Massey left his building for whites only.

Strachan Hall, the dining room for men of Trinity College, has an amusing policy. Women guests are allowed only on weekends.

Male guests however, are permitted at all times. St. Hilda's, its sister college, is more liberal, allowing lunch and dinner guests of both sexes.

If male chauvinism is respectable, it follows that the Women's Liberation Movement is not respectable. In fact Women's Lib isn't even considered a valid cause by our society. It doesn't even have the dignity of a real movement.

This is a sharp contrast to the attitudes we have towards the Civil Rights movement for example. Martin Luther King was considered a national hero, a devoted humanitarian. Compare his status to that of Betty Freidan, Kate Millett, or Gloria Steinem — all non-violent intellectuals, equally dedicated to a different social cause.

The famous bra-burning episode which happened once several years ago is frequently seized upon in an attempt to dismiss the women's liberation whole cause as ludicrous. This however is no more valid than reducing the peace movement in America to the burning of the American flag episode. In this case, however, everyone acknowledged flag-burning to be a symbolic gesture, not the issue itself.

To many intelligent people, women's liberation isn't even considered an issue. As one Rhodes scholar commented, when asked his opinion of the movement, "I don't know, I don't really think about it."

When John Gilbert took over the program "Speak your Mind" on CHUM Radio station this January he immediately chose the topic "Male superiority" (which he himself supported with considerable vigour). This has been a recurring theme for him throughout the last two months, as well.

In an interview with The Varsity Gilbert stressed that he felt blacks and all other oppressed men to be equal. Women, however, were a different matter. Here he echoed the words of Dennis Braithwaite when he said, "God put two sexes on earth, and he said man shall be the superior sex."

Gilbert also dismissed women's liberationists as "frustrated, pseudo-intellectuals" who were a threat to the privileges he, as a male, was given at birth.

He said he planned to fight the Women's Liberation Movement, since he saw it as a personal threat, which is an interesting view for a "happily married man" who claims to think highly of his wife.

He disapproved of racists and said he would be extremely upset to be considered a bigot.

Thus, a man such as Gilbert, who is progressive and humanitarian in much of his thinking (which came across very strongly in the interview) does not extend these attitudes to women.

John Gilbert speaks his mind: "I am a man!"

Essentially, the American Declaration of Independence summed up the attitude which still exists today; "All men are created equal". Women are a different matter.

Even more amazing is the dismissal of Women's Liberation by many members of the youth counter-culture, who are supposedly concerned about social problems. One female staff member of Guerilla, wrote in the March 1971 edition: "Ever since Guerilla began there has been a hassle with the fact that women have had a hard time on the paper. The atmosphere hasn't been good for them. Women's Liberation as a movement has been looked upon as silly and not a part of our mutual struggles toward a better society."

Rock music which has become a promoter of social causes, has been totally disinterested in the Women's Liberation cause. This was illustrated most dramatically in the song "We gotta get you a woman" in which Runt, the singer, tells his friend Leroy that "they (women) may be stupid but they sure are fun".

Male chauvinism is a respectable bigotry. Our society accepts it. We don't consider there to be anything "maladjusted" about a man who feels the need to be superior to the woman he "loves". Rather it is women, who merely want the same things that men have traditionally felt entitled to (dignity, a sense of worth, the right to career opportunities) who are "maladjusted."

The question might better be put: Can a liberated woman find true friendship and happiness in our modern world?

Dora's gone to have her baby.

She was only seventeen when she applied for a job as tailoress. There, all dressed in black her face unadorned with paint, her dress well below the knees. Shy-timid, unable to speak English, accompanied by mole members of her family. After deciding I was to be trusted she got their permission to work on the quality tailoring your suit demands. Everyday on the job her needle flying, every stitch perfect, singing her Italian songs, smiling her sweet smile.

Then marriage to a boy from Colobrio, marriage and honeymoon worked into the annual holidays. So no time lost. A house bought, then a baby coming. Doro every day on the job, her fingers never stopping their fast accurate pace. After a long day's toil, housework; waiting on her husband in that old fashioned Italian way.

One baby, two, third now expected the 23rd of February. We miss Doro, her sweet singing, her back arched on the chair for comfort, your suit resting on her stomach, fingers flying fast as ever.

Now the farewell party, Pizzo, cakes, drinks. Presents for the new baby, Doro her eyes swimming with tears kissing us all. Her promise to be back as soon as Mamma can take over again. We have many Italian girls devoted to their art and families just like Doro. What a comparison to those liberated abortionists, pitiful, unfruitful, unnotorious in mind and body. Doro's gone to have her baby and she wants six more.

Barbiana boys' letters flay useless schooling

Letter to a Teacher by the Schoolboys of Barbiana
Random House
$7.50

What more could possibly be said about education and schools? Haven't the progressive educators said it all? The schools are bad, period, the progressive critics are confined to proving over and over again that there's nothing wrong with the children, and that they are, when allowed to be, creative, intelligent and eager to learn.

These books, however, are written from a liberal middle class perspective, and do not touch upon social class realities. Lacking class analysis their solutions become hopelessly utopian, like Ivan Illich's recent writings. He wants to abolish schools and introduce videotape machines for every school child! He never tells you HOW, though.

One recent book introduces with full force the class realities of the school systems in all capitalist countries. Letter to a Teacher, perhaps the strongest indictment of class education anywhere, anytime, has been written by eight Italian boys from working class and peasant backgrounds (it could have been written by eight boys in any working class district in the world) All of them have tasted failure and humiliation in the public schools, and their letter, directed at the average teacher and administrator, puts this personal experience into a class perspective. The book is from the beginning to end a call to working class parents to organize against the abuse and destruction of their children.

"Dear Miss", the letter begins, "you won't remember me or my name. You have flunked so many of us... you flunk us right into the fields and factories, and there you forget us." Flunking, the boys consider flunking a crime against humanity. It demonstrates to them the average teachers lack of respect for the children under his/her power and influence, and his/her inability and unwillingness to educate, in the real sense of the word. The boys insist that they have a right to be educated, since only through education can one be truly human. But not through the kind of education that the schools provide.

Language is abused in these schools, literature, geography, mathematics, foreign languages, you name it, made boring. Exams and tests are the Procrustean beds on which working class children are mutilated, often for good. "Languages are created by the poor", the boys write, "who then go on renewing them forever. The rich crystallize them in order to put on the spot anybody who speaks in a different way. Or in order to fail him at exams."

The school composition topics, identical in bourgeois societies all over the world, demand that the student spin words around a topic like "The railroad car speaks." "If I wanted to be honest I should have left the page blank. Or else criticized the theme and whoever thought it up." Of such resistance are school "failures" and drop-outs made.

Geometry to the boys reflects the same anti-people mentality and is just another trap in which they are to be caught and injured. "The geometry problem on the exam brought to mind a sculpture in one of the modern art exhibitions: 'A solid is formed by a hemisphere superimposed on a cylinder whose surface is three-sevenths of that... There is no instrument that can measure surfaces. Thus, it never happens in life that we know the surface without knowing the dimensions. Such a problem can only be conceived by a sick mind'."

In the bourgeois schools the boys, hungry for real knowledge, real understanding of the world they live in, are forced to digest Homer's fables, translated into incomprehensible, ornamental Italian (reminds one of all that perverted "poetry" school children in this country are forced to read.) (The Italian reading program would have done better to include the contract of the metalworkers' union. Did you ever read it, Miss? Aren't you ashamed? It means the life of half a million families."

All through the Letter the boys contrast their definition of relevance, which is at all times profoundly concrete, with the absurdities of the "educational" system. In the school set up by a progressive priest (and where they write this book), they practice what they preach. They are intent first on mastering the use of everyday language, since "it is the language alone that makes men equal. That man is an equal who can express himself and can understand the worlds of others." They learn to practice some basic rules of good writing (not applicable to topics such as "The railroad car speaks", or "The first day in fall" or "My holiday").

"Have something important to say, something useful to everyone or at least to many. Know for whom you are writing. Gather all useful materials. Find a logical pattern with which to develop the theme. Eliminate every useless word. Eliminate every word not used in the spoken language. Never set time limits."

The "gathering of useful materials" has resulted in statistical proof of the workings of the class society, interspersed within the text (includes a table titled "Slaughter of the poor"). There they are, all the children of workers and farmers and fishermen, struggling to survive through the elementary grades, while the "daddy's boys", so eloquently described through the pages, ride on smoothly right to the top.

One of the latter is Pierino, the doctor's son: "The doctor's chromosomes are powerful. Pierino could write when he was only five. He has no need for a first grade. He enters the second at age six. And he can speak like a printed book. He, too, is already branded, but with the mark of the chosen race." At the university the Pierinos constitute 86.5% of the university students, labourers' sons and daughters, 13.5%, with the percentages of the different populations just about the reverse.

The boys from Barbiana know what they are talking about, since they are the "imbeciles", "retardates" and "failures" of the system, born, according to the class society they live in, to push the broom and carry the shovel. They also know what has to be done:

- 1 Do not fail students
- 2 Give full-time school to children who seem stupid (NOTE: In Italy only the bourgeois class has full-time education; the working class is not "burdened" by full-time education. Translated into Canadian conditions the second demand would mean: Give only the best, the most interesting, the most challenging education to children who seem stupid.)
- 3 Give purpose to the lazy.

It's a program that would have the full approval of the one billion, nine hundred million people the school boys of Barbiana are writing about. This is their statistic, located in U.N. Statistical Yearbook, and presented with the usual directness.

"Lucio, who has thirty-six cows in the barn at home, said: 'School will always be better than cow shit.' That sentence can be engraved over the front doors of your schools. Millions of farm boys are ready to subscribe to it. You say that boys hate school and love play. You never asked us peasants. But there are one billion, nine hundred million of us. Six boys out of every ten in the world feel the same as Lucio. About the other four we cannot say."

There is only one problem with the Letter to a Teacher. Although it is written by the working class for the working class, the politics of publishing will make it unavailable to that class until the publisher sees fit to bring it out in paperback later this month.

Ancel's back! TSO, choir do justice to Mahler

The second balcony at Massey hall is an accurate barometer of the popularity of a concert. Tuesday night it was sagging with crowds backed up to the rafters to welcome Karel Ancel home. The occasion was marked by the monumental Second Symphony ("Resurrection") of Gustav Mahler with the TSO, the Mendelssohn Choir and soloists Roxolana Roslak and Anna Reynolds.

Both in terms of general symphonic writing and context of Mahler's personal musical development, the C minor symphony is a major event. It deals with the eternal theme: death, life remembered, the sojourn to life beyond death. But where Berlioz is lushly romantic and Strauss syrupy lyrical, Mahler remains stern and ascetic. His approach is epitomized by the ending of the first movement. The sparse lyricism of the second theme (in C major) turns sour in our mouths with a trumpet E flat and the orchestra hurtles down chromatically to a grim C minor conclusion.

Somehow the opening shortchanged our expectations. The guttural declamation of the low strings sounded muffled, full of bass bulk but lacking cello bite. Later in the movement as the opening five notes return in higher strings the violins lacked the concentration the incisive attack to impart the music its tragic inevitability. A certain jittery lack of ease marred some lyrical passages such as the beautiful solo violin theme. And that final descending passage, the final inexorable crash of the coffin lid into C minor failed to gain the momentum that Ancel had intended. Unless the strings can build a good unison accelerando, perhaps Klemperer's straight reading is more valid.

There is something unearthly about the opening of the second movement. It is awesome that an immense orchestra should engage in a lilting Ländler with the intimacy of a string quartet. Ancel took the movement at true Ländler tempo, which works. Even more effective would have been a slower, more ethereal pace, a dream-like pastel suggestion of the past recalled at death's door. Should the conductor try for contrast here or attempt to remain coherent to what preceded? Without quibbling about tempo, the pizzicato return of the theme could have been more delicate and certainly more together.

The truly beautiful part of the evening began with the Scherzo and built through the vocal parts to the choral finale. Mezzo-soprano Anna Reynolds has a voice of rich quality and subtle control. Hearing her intone "Urlicht" in the fourth movement makes one hope that she will attempt Mahler's other works for voice and orchestra on subsequent visits. After the festive "Urlicht" the scherzo tempo returns growing insistent as the doomsday trumpets sound. There is a drum roll and a passing nod to Beethoven's Opus III, the "final word" of a different era.

The entrance of the choir is solemn and glorious. The Mendelssohn singers served most eloquently with a hundred shades of piano with only occasional tendencies towards harshness in the forte sections. There was something inutterably satisfying about the huge choir and the mighty orchestra singing and ringing, and the solo soprano soaring above the glorious din. That last movement in itself justified the inordinate length of the work. It excused the minor technical miscalculations of earlier movements. It completed a beautiful evening. Welcome back, Maestro Ancel!

First-rate records spun, none spurned

CAT STEVENS, Tea for the Tillerman (A&M SP4280)

In this, the latest of a succession of albums by this English folk singer, he has finally begun to display some of his first-rate talent as a writer and singer of first-rate contemporary folk lyrics. The album, which promises to be a smash commercial success, is highlighted by the song 'Father and Son', but all of the tunes are first-rate.

CAROLE KING, Songwriter (Ode SP77001)

Miss King, who along with Gerry Goffin has written some beautiful material for an illustrious list of artists, finally has released an album of her own. Unfortunately, the drive and spirit which she instilled in her work at the recent James Taylor concert is not captured here. However, the lyrics and tunes retain their haunting beauty, and should be listened to despite the heavy-handed production which has reduced Miss King's voice from its deserved status.

ROBERTA FLACK, First Take (Atlantic ST8230)

Miss Flack, a jazz singer who has become very popular of late, made this album quite a while ago, however it captures her very well, displaying her strengths and revealing her weaknesses. She is at her best when doing the slow bluesy ballad, while her voice seems incapable of carrying the upbeat numbers. The album could be purchased solely for her rendition of 'The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face' if for nothing else, as this number is one of the best I have ever heard.

DOUG KERSHAW, Spanish Moss (Warner Bros.)

On this album the Cajun sound which was so unique when Kershaw popularized it begins to sound very stale. The same fine quality of musicianship still pervades, but the tone of the music leaves one feeling almost bored. But for those who have never heard Kershaw, or who are looking to buy an album of his, this one will suffice.

JAMES TAYLOR, Sweet Baby James (Warner Bros.)

This is the album which skyrocketed Taylor's career and deservedly so. All of his hit parade tunes are included here, and the production is first-rate. Further, this album is consistently good, rather than having only the occasional highlight. Those who were understandably miffed at Taylor's first album with Apple will certainly redeem him after hearing this disc.

BRUCE COCKBURN, True North (TN1)

On this, the debut album for both Cockburn and Columbia's Canadian series, a major success has been achieved. The album is a first-rate production both artistically and commercially. The wisdom in recording Cockburn au naturel — without schmaltzy arrangements and backgrounds — is boundless, as for once we are allowed to hear the artist perform rather than be overpowered by ostentatious engineering. This album is a must purchase for every devotee of folk music. — I.D.

New wave cowboy flick drones off artlessly in desert

With guns blazing and minds blowing, Zacharia obviously hopes to be considered a pace-setter by claiming the dubious honour of being "The First Electric Western". Unfortunately, all this film succeeds in doing is to prove that a promising, really hip movie can sink into artless mediocrity as effortlessly as can a straight production.

The soundtrack of a New-Wave Youth Picture is usually a fairly accurate way of estimating how well the producer and director know their subject. Simon and Garfunkel (The Graduate) and Jimi Hendrix, The Byrds and The Band (Easy Rider) were fairly safe bets. But when movie companies boast the talents of The Strawberry Alarm Clock and Pink Floyd, watch out.

However, Zacharia is the exception to the rule. Despite the help of Doug Kershaw, The New York Rock Ensemble, The James Gang and Country Joe and The Fish, the film practically dwindles away into nothingness. Even the Fire-sign Theatre's occasional moments of writhing brilliance are to no avail. In short, Zacharia is wasted potential.

In the very opening sequence, director George Englund has the James Gang playing hard rock right in the middle of an open desert plain. Not far away, Zacharia, oblivious to their music, hastily opens a package containing the Colt he intends to use as a fearless gunfighter. Thus, from the start the audience is prepared to be spinted away into another timeless dimension in which booming amplifiers and humble blacksmiths are both very much at home. Such a world of unreality succeeds magnificently in Brewster McCloud, since the insanity of the whole situation props up the film at every point. But Zacharia falters and deviates between the worlds of simple fiction and of outlandish fantasy. Attempting to come to grips with both it portrays neither satisfactorily.

The plot also abounds in clichés and holes, especially in the ending scenes. Zacharia has chosen a farmers' life in preference to gunslinging, while Matthew, a former friend, has worked his way up to Fastest Gun In the West. Then, for no reason at all, Matthew comes gunning for Zach. The farmer smiles and walks away from the duel, leaving his murdering companion To Consider The Error Of His Ways. Suddenly Matthew sinks to his knees, buries his face in his hands and begins to bawl uncontrollably. Then, in a bit that has been done at least a thousand times before, Matthew's sobs turn into the maniacal laughter of Realization. Seeing The Light, Matthew tosses his gun symbolically into the air and runs after Zacharia in a fit of ecstasy. Finally, both friends (I kid you not) Ride Off Into The Sunset Together.

Of course, Zacharia does have its brighter moments. Zach and Matthew learn to rob by joining a rock 'n' roll band of outlaws known as The Crackers, superbly played by Country Joe and The Fish. Upon encountering Zacharia, Joe dead-pans, "We're looking for people who like to draw in their spare time". Later, the hero meets Belle Starr, a super-prostitute who has had an entire town built around her. Enthusiastically she tells Zach, "I've made it with the biggest names in the West: Wyatt Earp, Bat Masterson, Wild Bill Hickock and Marshall McLuhan!" But such moments are rare.

On the whole it is a fairly shoddy piece of cinema. The sets look incredibly phony, and the cinematography, though sometimes beautiful, is on the whole just a little too much like a picture post-card — colourful and flat. John Rubinstein is unexceptional as Zacharia, mainly due to the film's fixation for "now" dialogue and "in" gags instead of credible characterization. Only William Challee as the old man and Elvin Jones as Job Cain manage to break the tedium.

For a while it seemed as though the fast-buck Hollywood directors had given up trying to cash in on the Relevant Youth Market. Zacharia proves this isn't so. It just reaffirms the time-tested truth that any movie relying more on gimmicks than on originality of characterization and plot is hopelessly doomed.

World's Way yummy

Perhaps the most difficult type of play for a company to attempt in 1971 is a Restoration comedy. It is a form very alien to our present theatrical tradition. The production of Congreve's Way of the World at the U.C. Playhouse last week, was a valiant effort that, in spite of minor defects, succeeded admirably.

The first hurdle facing the cast is the required acting style. We are accustomed to acting with a naturalistic design, the Restoration calls for speaking directly to the audience, poetic delivery, rhetorical flourish, and grand gesture, all very foreign to our actors' training. But most of the cast were very effective in precisely this way. Maarten van Dijk was outstanding as Mirabelle, the central male character. He milked every word of its poetry, and every gesture was at exactly the correct level of grandiloquence.

Similarly, Frances Halpenny as the phony dowager Lady Wishfort, Ken Mews as Witwoud, Doris Cowan as Mirabelle's goal Millamant, and in supporting parts Ann Baynes, Barbara Orenstein, and Mary Hogan as three very different but delightful maids, all caught the requisite sense of Congreve's dialogue and characterization. In varying degrees the rest of the cast could not overcome the problem of naturalism; their speech and movements were more suited to current movies than to this play. But each achieved some measure of success, and none was so wide of the mark as to destroy the tone of the production.

For it is the tone of the play that constitutes the second essential, and director Hans de Groot maintains a consistent point of view which provides complete fidelity to Congreve's vision. The superbly-done bargaining scene between Millamant and Mirabelle provides a method for coping with the way of his world.

Congreve did not condemn the society he depicted, he pointed out its pretenses and foibles with a wit centred in elegant language. Fainall's characterization falters only because he is painted too darkly, and Sir Wilful is not enough of a country bumpkin.

As Millamant speaks the epilogue against a brilliant frieze, I could only think that I haven't enjoyed any other theatre as much as this during the past year.

BOOKS

The seed catalogues have arrived again, and window, backyard and back 40 gardens sprout in the mind. If not through the dirty snow (or clean, depending where you hail from) bearing down on spring and term's end I want to mention two books put out under J. I. Rodale's aegis — Encyclopedia of Organic Gardening (Nelson, Foster and Scott, $13.75) and The Organic Way to Plant Protection (Musson, $7.25).

The former is a huge and definitive compendium of everything one might hope to know about how to garden with virtue, as well as intelligence and sweat; the latter book might be described roughly as an expansion of the Plant Disease and Insect Control Encyclopedia articles to over 355 pages. (There'll be a series of these expansions coming out, says the Musson catalogue.)

The plant protection book is perhaps a bit too overwhelming for the beginner, but it is simply arranged alphabetically by vegetable, fruits, trees, flowering plants, lawns, shrubs and vines, general plant pests. There are also general articles on organic plant protection philosophy. I would hazard that city gardeners could do well enough by the Encyclopedia, but for farms which are not afraid to experiment, both books should be welcome and necessary.

The Encyclopedia is a substantive book in many ways. In addition to his pioneering notions about organic gardening, Rodale tells how to raise various barnyard animals. If there were now some brave rabbit- or chicken-raisers in this city, more of it might begin to become human again.

Coles Canadiana Collection has just given birth to a facsimile reprint of the 2-volume set, The Life and Times of William Lyon Mackenzie and the Rebellion of 1837-38. Written by Charles Lindsay and first published in 1862, this contemporary account of the Upper Canada rebellion has long been recognized by historians as the standard work about it (and Mackenzie) to be published in the nineteenth century. — T.W.

MUSIC

Music from the Baroque, a concert of pre-classical motets by Bach, Schutz and others, presented by the Toronto Chamber Society and Toronto Chamber Players on Saturday, March 13 at 8.30 p.m. at the EJB Concert Hall. Student tickets are $2.00, reservations at 929-0985.

Sunday (March 14) at 8.30 in the EJB Concert Hall, pianist-composer John Hawkins. Mr. Hawkins is a pioneer of avant-garde music in Canada and last appeared here a month ago with the Societe de Musique Contemporaine de Quebec in performance of his own "remembrances". That concert, which I was unable to review was the first convincing performance of contemporary music I've heard in Toronto. If Mr. Hawkins can bring the same intensity and integrity of approach to Sunday's concert, it may well be the second. He will play works by Webern, Skalkottas, Crumb and Hartwell, assisted by members of the Faculty of Music, as well as Debussy's "Estampes". Tickets and info at the box office.

Next Tues Wed (March 16-17) Series "8" at Massey Hall continues with the TS, Ancerl and violinist Pinchas Zuckerman. The concert features works by Lalo, Morel and Bruckner. Concert time 8.30 PM, tickets at the box office.

Amazing! Even Canadian English has an identity

Speaking Canadian English
by Mark M. Orkin
General Publishing Co., Ltd.
$7.95

How do Canadians speak? What are the roots of the language we speak? Do we mislead ourselves in supposing that we talk anything different from a general North American?

Mr Orkin, in a surprisingly vibrant book, discusses the shibboleth of excessive American influence by showing that most of the early settlers into what was to become Canada were Loyalists, fresh from the American revolutionary war, and of course, bringing their language as well. This was essentially a combination of New England and New York state traditions.

As Stephen Leacock said: "In Canada we have enough to do keeping up with two spoken languages . . . so we just go ahead and use English for literature, Scotch for sermons, and American for conversation." With pronunciation, as with spelling, we fall fairly frequently between the two stools of English and American usage. We have made occasional forays into new territory, however as with the word, khaki (from the Urdu - dusty): "kahkee" (Eng), "kakee" (Am) and "karkee" for Canadians. Canadian English has much in common with both of its parents, but it is something more than a mixture of the two.

Canadians are not conscious of speaking in any special way whatsoever, and although many pronunciations, spellings and usages are American in origin, we hotly deny such influence if accused of it. However, this U.S. influence, as said earlier here, was considerable by the end of the first half of the C19. There is no evidence of any contamination of the Canadian by the American English — what started off as a Canadian English was basically a North American English.

Canadian English has been influenced by other strains — most notably by Scottish or Gaelic, but also by Irish, Indian, Eskimo, German, the Chinook jargon and Newfoundland English (a fascinating sub-type with Shakespearean, Spenserian and even Chaucerian flavours.)

As regards pronunciation, we abhor the so-called Standard English but we speak in a manner close to the speech of central and northern England. Although British spelling is the standard officially, we are assaulted on all sides by the onslaughts of American spelling, our standard, again, is an amalgam of both.

Mr. Orkin also deals with Canadian nomenclature, both of places and persons, and also with railway nicknames (Duluth, Winnipeg & Pacific - Derailments, Wrecks & Profanity), plant & animal names, and fabulous beasts — Caddy and Ogopogo predominate, slang, underworld argot, and the bright future of Canadian English.

Creation is literature and chat

Creation. by Robert Kroetsch, James Bacque, and Pierre Gravel
New Press,
$3.50

In the whirlwind of debate about Canadian publishing now reaching even the population at large, one process seems certain: as the rhetoric rises in intensity the content of information presented will descend in quantity and quality. So this volume is even more welcome, for it shows, appropriately in book form, and very successfully, exactly the most pertinent facts we need.

These facts are not listed, because the book is not a political tract or Royal Commission report. Rather it is three very Canadian writers presenting excerpts from novels, short stories and poems, and then discussing them with a critic. The writing is constantly involving and interesting and enjoyable, and when each author discusses his aesthetic views, his views on "what Canadian writing is" are more than stated, they naturally flow into the conversation, for Canada has formed each participant.

James Bacque's contribution is more important for its aesthetic information. He mentions Canadianism only seldom in a direct form, and concentrates in a long discussion with critic Milton Wilson on his philosophy of life and aesthetic ideas. His writing is experimental but very clear, he juggles time, disposes of punctuation, and uses identification in his prose very effectively. Yet the narrative and philosophical thread in each of his stories is perfectly apparent. He has great talent for taking complex, subtle human facts and weaving them into prose, now soft, now harsh.

His subject matter is Toronto, Indians, growing up, generations, and reactions to suffering; universal themes in a local setting, with neither restricting the other, but constantly enlarging their import. Discussing the state of CanLit is one thing; doing it is another.

(As Pierre Gravel is French Canadian, and his contribution, as well as his discussion with critic J. Raymond Brazeau, is in French, my comprehension was somewhat limited. Gravel is the author of the novel A Perte de Temps, published here last year by Anansi. Judging by the rest of this volume, it would be well worth the effort to dig in with a dictionary).

Robert Kroetsch received the Governor General's Award in 1969 for his novel The Studhorse Man. He is from the West, and the stories included here range from his earliest work to the present. What begins as straight-forward narrative in his early story becomes a similar form and content later, but with the addition of a penetrating analysis of our myths. Kroetsch returns to his Western prairie roots in order to decipher Canada, himself and all of us.

In his conversation with author Margaret Laurence, also from the West, we see almost the clichéd Canadian writer's life. Departure from provincial stifling Canada for the States (Kroetsch) or Africa (Laurence) and then a return, spiritually, artistically and finally physically to Canada and their roots. And the simple fact that Canadian literature lost its remaining isolation and provincialism in the Sixties offers only a partial explanation for this return, and in enunciating the most important part of the repatriation, Laurence and Kroetsch offer excellent insight for our Ottawa and Queen's Park geniuses.

In returning to their sources, both writers discovered that while desiring escape, they were greatly excited in their youth when a W. O. Mitchell story appeared or when Sinclair Ross' novel As For Me and My House was published, they saw that their lives could be the subject for fiction. Literature was possible. And in creating this literature they discovered themselves, in a sense invented themselves or found their reason for being in fiction. Paradoxically, the fiction made them real. The story of their land and as human beings was being told.

Arch to get pass-fail credit

Students enrolling in the faculty of Architecture next fall will face a pass-fail-honours grading system.

The change, the first for any faculty as a whole at U of T, was approved by the Senate last month. At this point, according to Architecture's Mad Hatter of all that Matters, Dan MacAllister (formerly called president of the Student Society) it is not certain whether the new system will apply this year.

The pass-fail-honours system replaces the traditional letter grading system used by most universities. Any student who, in the minds of the faculty has done better than average work will receive the word 'honours' on his transcript. All will receive written evaluations of their work.

MacAllister said the honours part was added to aid students transferring to other universities.

Architecture has been a trail-blazing faculty in unstructured education. A few years ago it became the first part of U of T to replace regular course credits with a core program, where students work on one project rather than attending classes or lectures.

ISC open house

Students wondering what to do this weekend will find tasteful displays for the eye, and wild frolics for the spirit, at the International Festival Saturday.

The Festival, at the International Student Centre free to everyone, starts at 3 p.m. and ends at 10, although organizers have intimated the planned festivities will be followed by a free party.

Vodka, Saki, and Armenian delicacies are available to both gourmets and gourmands alike, although it is debatable whether these will be provided gratis.

STEPHEN GARETY (Innis I) and John Helliwell (Innis II) were elected Innis College SAC representatives Wednesday. One hundred and seven students, 18% of those eligible, voted in the election.

Tales of Cuba

'And the people are really friendly'

"Can we walk out without being shot?" cried a voice. Laughter. The middle-aged, energetic and dapperly-dressed professor had just promised his audience of thirty that he could equal Fidel Castro, and speak for four or five hours on his week's visit to Cuba.

Prof. G. R. Slemon, head of U of T's Electrical Engineering, had accepted an invitation to the University of Havana, and a dozen professors who packed the first two rows of the classroom leaned forward in their seats.

"I spoke informally with Canadian Immigration, and they told me in their usual guarded tone to proceed." The fastest possible route to Cuba is via Mexico, since there are no direct flights. Pictures are taken in the Mexican airport. "There is a rumour — totally unfounded, I'm sure — that they are then sold to the CIA", the professor said generously, with a controlled humour.

He was met at the airport by an interpreter and a Cadillac which dated before the 1959 revolution. The official visitor has it easy all around; others travel by bus, as the few taxis are mainly for ambulance use.

The professor stayed at "the palatial Havana Libre — formerly Hilton. The slide of his room features a bottle of rum and cigarettes, supplied by the hotel, along with "the inevitable" official newspaper.

"Havana is a reasonably clean city. There is not much traffic — that's one way of solving the smog problem." But buildings are not in very good condition. "Havana is running down. It's government policy to concentrate on the countryside."

The slides showed some "beautiful houses" in the vicinity of the Faculty of Engineering. "They would cost $125,000 to $300,000 here." They had formerly belonged to individuals who "wouldn't feel comfortable there" after the Cuban revolution, and emigrated. The houses are now assigned to students and others.

"It is rumoured that our friends, the FLQ people, are there, as well as hijackers. They are given a normal ration book, and ignored."

There are some 4500 students in Engineering at the University of Havana. Of the new engineering faculty, 22% are women, half of whom are in architecture or chemical engineering.

"The choice of discipline is up to the student", though they are considering a change, he said.

All the students pick sugar cane part-time and enjoy it. Everyone talks about sugar-cane (Cuba's main crop).

"Most of the university's staff is under thirty. Almost all former staff left when the revolution occurred. Now the best students are quickly trained to teach," Slemon commented.

"The university acts as the main research arm of the government. The students are thus close to some fascinating planning problems".

"One of the most heartening things about the place" was Cuban recognition of the need for aid.

"Why give aid? Here my prejudices show . . . it is an alternative to Russian domination." Why does Cuba want Canadian contacts? We are "a good source of Western technology. Also, Fidel has said we should have closer relations, and that speaks for itself."

"It is possible to be highly critical, now", after a recent speech by Castro criticizing the economy — "an unusual thing to have happen in a socialist country", Slemon stated. "It's O.K. to be very critical, as long as it's creative criticism. I didn't feel constrained."

"But the revolution is now the establishment. No one can be really against it," he said.

Regarding Castro, there is "a great fondness, a sense of identity, and no sense of alternative" among Cubans, claimed Slemon. There are no representations of Fidel among the murals of revolutionary heroes (like Che Guevara or Ho Chi Minh) which are the only visible advertising in Havana. "A revolutionary is his own monument", the professor remembered Fidel saying.

"The sort of publicity I read about Cuba was not very much help," asserted Slemon. "Cuba is no place for the tourist. There are almost no stores operating and everything works by rations. But it's adequate by lower-middle-standards, despite disparaging remarks by others."

There is a free health service. "The streets are safe. There is some petty thievery, but violent crime has been harshly eliminated." There are no soldiers on the streets; no sense of military tension, and there are no restrictions on travel.

"And the people are really friendly," Slemon said. "All this comes as somewhat of a surprise."

Lapierre is tired

saying the system is corrupt and had to be overthrown by responsible men."

Recalling English Canadians' traditional view of Quebec as "a problem", Lapierre noted Ontario Premier William Davis' pledge to demand an accounting from Ottawa (not Quebec) of how Quebec spends its equalization grants. "Ontario's surplus," Davis, he said, "has had no policy other than to emerge from the womb some years ago."

There should be no policies developed by the NDP or any other federal party "that would thwart the free choice of the people of Quebec". The acceptance of self-determination for Quebec would remove the problem from the federal sphere and restrict it to the provincial field. Then, the barons of Westmount will find that " Trudeau cannot be bought on the shelves of supermarkets as something to put Quebec in its place," he said.

He wants the Quebec people to have a clear choice between Bourassa's "mitigated federalism" and the Parti Quebecois independence. He dismissed the Union Nationale as having no constitutional policy "because the spirit of Duplessis has not come down to them."

Desperate economic straits deliberately created "in the name of welfare, affluence, and American ownership" have caused Quebecois to lose confidence in their ability to affect the political system. "Many have lost the capacity of even wanting to become masters of their own destinies," Lapierre asserted.

Lapierre did not want Quebec's progressives and English Canadian socialists to be completely isolated.

Those Quebecois who advocate self-determination are "seeking a new alliance of a people who are free and independent with another people who are free and independent", he said. This relationship between equals will not destroy "love and friendship".

Lapierre advised English Canadians to build "a society that is meaningful". French Canadians are already building their society, he noted.

"Vive le Quebec libre!", he concluded.

Hockey Blues move to final

SUDBURY (Little Staff) — Varsity Blues won their way into the C.I.A.U. finals here last night with a solid team effort.

Blues defeated the University of British Columbia Thunderbirds 3-2 in a hard fought battle that saw Blues come from behind to take the crucial victory. The win sends the Blues directly into the National final tomorrow afternoon beginning at 2:00 p.m. It was the 3rd successive play off game Blues have won in a margin of a single goal. The first two games came in the OQAA playdown February 27-28, over Carleton and Queens.

Veteran right-winger, Terry Peterman, fired what proved to be the winning goal at 29 seconds of the 3rd period. Peterman's wrist shot from 30 feet out gave Blues a seemingly insurmountable 3-1 lead.

However, less than a minute later UBC had closed the gap on a goal by Doug Buhr.

With a strong checking display, Blues made a one goal lead stand up for the rest of the way — a hectic final 19 minutes.

The game featured outstanding goal-tending by Blue's Brant Cole and the UBC duo of Wilkie and Rod Silver.

Silver guarded the UBC nets for the last 8 minutes of the first and the first 60 seconds of the second. While Wilkie recovered from a shot by Blue's Dave McDowall which struck him on the face mask, Wilkie was cut for several stitches, but returned to finish the remainder of the game giving up all 3 Varsity goals.

Cole, a second team OQAA all-star, made numerous outstanding saves throughout the match especially in the final ten minutes. As in the OQAA finals, centre Brent Imlach provided the margin of victory by winning three crucial face offs in the last minutes.

Blues have the day off today, while St. Mary's Huskies, whom Blues defeated 3-2 in last year's final, meet the winner of last night's Loyola-Laurentian clash.

Varsity swim team has an excellent year

Contrary to popular rumours, Varsity swimmers do not fade away into the chlorinated depths once the regular OQAA and CIAU schedule is finished.

Each afternoon, Hart House pool is awash with activity as several of the more talented mermen prep for the Pan American Games trials set for Edmonton in early April.

Actually, with the water temperature now set at a torrid 85 degrees, Hart House probably boasts the world's biggest sauna. Another friendly athletic association service.

REGARDLESS OF THEIR SUCCESS (or possible lack of same) at the Pan Am trials, 1970-71 has been another excellent season for Varsity's oft ignored swimmers.

Co-captain Mike Guinness provided the leadership at the OQAA finals by churning to two gold medals and one silver in his distance freestyle specialties. The team's resident hypochondriac, Mike also recorded a personal best time in finishing second in the CIAU 200 free.

Blues other co-captain, Barry Bowerman, wasn't up to usual form in the OQAA meet but should be peaking in time for the summer nationals several weeks hence.

FIVE-YEAR VETERAN BOB HEATLEY went out in style breaking his own record with a spectacular 52.6 clocking in the CIAU 100-yard butterfly, while sophomore Jim Shaw set CIAU and Canadian records in the 200 backstroke.

The year ended in illness for versatile Terry Bryon but he produced an emotion-filled second place and silver medal in the 400 individual medley at the OQAA finals. Terry swam in all of Blues exhibition dual meets, usually the punishing 1000-yard freestyle, and gave over 100 per cent each time.

Due to the five-year eligibility rules, it's farewell to college swimming for freestyler Doug MacIntosh as the methodical Medsman contributed valuable CIAU points in the 50 free and the 400 free relay.

LANKY JIM ADAMS FINALLY WON the battle of the bulkhead to maintain Varsity's stranglehold on the 50-yard freestyle sprint. His CIAU time of 22 seconds flat is just one-tenth slower than the record held by Blues sprinter supreme, Theo Van Ryn. Theo entered Varsity in 1964-65 and as far as the 50 free goes, he won and won and won and won and won and retired.

After a so-so display in the OQAA, talented John Twohig emerged as a possible successor to the amazing Bob Heatley by registering a fourth in the CIAU 100 butterfly final, while finger-snapping Ross Ballantyne glided to a gold medal in the CIAU 100-yard breaststroke.

Coach Robin Campbell's recruiting prowess resulted in Alex "The Manchurian" Fedko, a fly and free man from Royal York by way of Simon Fraser. Smilin' Alex was the terror of the dual meet season but had his troubles in the league and national finals, if you can call consistently making the finals "troubles".

ROOKIE OF THE YEAR HONORS must be split between rambunctious Russ Farquhar and taciturn Nick Rottman. Mother Farquhar placed third in both OQAA backstroke finals and Rottman made the CIAU team then calmly proceeded to shatter the team record for the 200 breaststroke.

Most improved swimmer award should go to steady Chris Rockingham who came to Varsity without the benefit of an extensive high school swim background yet produced personal bests in both the 200 and 1650 freestyles.

BLUES UNSUNG HEROES — Ian Dalrymple, Zvi Eldar, Adam Gesing, Jock MacRae and Jim Peters — also contributed their share of effort, thrills and OQAA points.

Dalrymple swam the 1650 meatgrinder and can be expected to produce greater things in '72, Eldar showed well in both the 100 and 200 butterfly as a last minute replacement for injured diver Alex Lau, Gesing won a first color in waterpolo and could be Blues next champ in the distance freestyle, MacRae can do everything well and Peters shows promise of replacing MacIntosh in the freestyle relays.

However, for all these accomplishments, 1970-71 could be marked as the year Blues finally obtained a diver of intercollegiate calibre. Freshman engineer Alex Lau seemed headed for a sure fifth or sixth place finish (an unattainable goal for 10 these many years) when he tore a ligament in practice the night before the OQAA meet. However, guided by coach Jim Lacosse, Alex has remained in training and should be ready for the Ontario Open championships in mid-April.

POOLTALK ... Swimming is guaranteed a strong voice on the athletic directorate with the election of both Heatley and Ballantyne ... the other student reps are hockey captain John Wright, ruggerite Bill Anderson and footballer Derek Turner ... that very real trophy for the supposedly non-existent CIAU team title is currently resting in the intercollegiate office and should be on display in Hart House trophy alley very soon.

Blues win 5-4 in thriller

By PAUL CARSON and LYNDON LITTLE

Pride.

Seventeen Varsity hockey players had it Saturday afternoon in Sudbury to give Blues their fifth national title in the past six years.

Trailing St. Mary's Huskies 3-1 after two periods, Blues exploded for four goals in the final twenty minutes and a heart-stopping 5-4 victory in the first nationally televised CIAU hockey final.

It was Varsity's fourth straight playoff win by the margin of a single goal. In the OQAA playdowns Blues edged Carleton 6-5 and Queens 5-4. Thursday night, Varsity advanced to the championship game with another narrow victory, 3-2 over the UBC Thunderbirds.

For dramatics the final was similar to last year's excitement in Charlottetown when Blues won 3-2. Saturday's game featured close checking by both teams, brilliant goaltending by Grant Cole and Chuck Goddard, and the winning goal scored in the final period by a veteran centre.

Last year, Paul Laurent backhanded the winner at 19:46 of his final Varsity game; this year, four-year veteran Brian St. John won the title with a 25-foot blast at 15:54.

In the happy Varsity dressing room, St. John described his goal this way:

"Bill Buba made the perfect play from behind the net. He fed me a great pass and I took a quick semi-slap shot to Goddard's stick side."

Buba, performing in the same rink where he had starred for the junior Sudbury Wolves, provided this version of the key play:

"Goddard dumped the puck behind the net and I took it away from a St. Mary's defenceman. The pass went out to St. John and he triggered it beautifully."

TWO QUICK GOALS KNOT MATCH

The over 3,200 screaming fans in the Sudbury Community Centre sensed a major upset as the third period began, but Blues fired two goals within the first 48 seconds to tie the score at 3-3.

After only 25 seconds, speedy Kas Lysionek swept around Huskie defenceman Bob Dawson and slid a perfect goalmouth pass to Gord Davies. The ex-Marlie whipped it home and was immediately smothered by jubilant teammates.

"It was just unbelievable," Davies said later. "Even in my days with the Marlies there was never anything to compare with this. I've never been this excited about a hockey game in my life."

Twenty-three seconds later, Terry Peterman, Blues' leading scorer in the tournament, stole the puck from Bill McNally and served up a deflection special for a streaking Buba who made no mistakes.

Peterman combined with Davies to give Blues a 4-3 lead at 5:34 while Dave McDowall was serving a debatable tripping penalty.

Davies carried the puck into the St. Mary's zone, then passed to Peterman who beat Goddard cleanly from 25 feet out.

However, St. Mary's bounced right back to score a shorthanded goal of their own from the stick of 24-year-old senior Ed Hebert.

Hebert, one of at least four former pros on the Huskies' roster, intercepted a John Wright pass and skated in alone to beat Cole's desperation lunge.

Eight minutes of wide-open hockey followed before St. John connected in the clutch.

BLUES PRESERVE SLENDER MARGIN

Blues checked tenaciously but messed up a line change at 18:10, resulting in a crucial minor penalty for too many players on the ice.

As St. Mary's mounted their final assault, Blues countered with St. John and Peterman up front and a defence pairing of McDowall and veteran Bill L'Heureux, playing the last game of his college career.

Blues forced a face-off at 18:54 and L'Heureux managed to clear the puck down the ice. St. Mary's regrouped quickly and with about fifteen seconds remaining in regulation time, Cole made the key save in a goalmouth scramble despite losing a contact lens after being punched in the mouth.

L'Heureux again cleared the loose puck, and after several chaotic seconds referee Jim Ramsay indicated a face-off outside the St. Mary's blueline with four seconds remaining.

Peterman ended his college career in the penalty box after strenuously berating Ramsay for not awarding Varsity an automatic goal when Ron "Red Dog" Hindson appeared to throw his stick at L'Heureux's shot.

For the fourth consecutive game, Brent Imlach won the final draw to clinch the tenuous victory.

It was only a one-goal margin but to St. Mary's it might as well have been one hundred.

Sitting in the Varsity dressing room for the last time as a player, L'Heureux summed up his feelings about the team.

"I've never been associated with a group that has so much heart and pride.

"We've now proven that we possess the two major criteria of a great team — the ability to come from behind and the tenacity to protect a one-goal lead late in the game."

HUSKIES HAD EARLY LEAD

Reflecting on Blues' third period outburst, right winger Mac Hickox recalled, "Somebody said during the last intermission, 'Where are all the guys who've done most of the scoring during the year?' And wouldn't you know it!, before six minutes had gone by, there they were — Davies, Buba and Peterman."

St. Mary's grabbed a 2-0 lead in the first period as Blues were off-balance and sloppy in their own end. The Huskies fore-checked relentlessly and were rewarded with the two goals from tournament MVP Hindson, a 25-year-old sophomore.

"I've never seen our entire team so tense," said defenceman Brent Swanick afterwards. "We just couldn't do anything right."

Hickox cut the margin to 2-1 at 15 minutes of the second period but St. Mary's retaliated at 16:40 when Ken Martin counted during a Varsity powerplay.

Although overlooked by the tournament all-star selectors, netminder Cole was at his best while Blues floundered during the first 40 minutes. The best of many sensational saves was a crucial glove-handed stop robbing ex-National team star Richie Bayes when Huskies led 2-0.

Blues had a 36-24 edge in shots but Cole was forced to thwart breakaways by Carl Bostwick, Hebeet, Darrel Maxwell, Bayes and Dale Turner.

Watt's words of wisdom work

• from page one

Tom Watt justified his selection as college Coach-of-the-Year with a moving pep talk to the players before the final period.

Watt reminded the team that Blues first CIAU title in 1965-66 was sparked by a four-goal outburst late in the final period against another Maritime opponent, St. Francis Xavier.

He then spoke to each player individually, asking simply, "Do you really want to win?"

Forty-eight seconds after the face-off, Watt had the answer.

BLUENOTES: Blues and Huskies each placed two players on the tournament all-star team: Peterman and McDowall, Goddard and Hindson; the others were Laurentian left winger Ed Taylor and UBC defenceman Jack Moores. . . . McDowall also made the Canadian Association of Hockey Coaches' first ever all-Canada team along with Morris Mott (Queens), Murray Stroud (York), Chris Hayes

(Loyola), Steve Carlyle (Alberta) and UNB goalie Keith Lefebvre; John Wright got an honorable mention. . . . Loyola again failed to advance past the opening round, losing 6-3 to Laurentian and then 6-4 to UBC, blowing a 3-1 lead in both games; St. Mary's edged Laurentian 4-2 but the hometown Voyageurs won the consolation title outlasting the weary Thunderbirds 7-4. . . . as usual Blues' training corps of Howie Ringham and Ed Armstrong plus dapper manager Mickey Weiner made it a successful team effort all the way. . . . Laurentian fans opted for St. Mary's but about 25 dedicated Varsity fans made the trip north for the final.

The Duke picks UC and VICmen

By CHIP PIGLEY

In last week's semi-final action both UC and Vic advanced into the second game of their two-game, total point series with five-point wins over Law and PhysEd respectively.

Attendance for the tournament now stands at 3800.
BUMPER AND BUTTERBEAN CAGE THE GOON

The Law Iron Dukes led by Allen "The Goon" Sternberg ran wild for 28 minutes before the UC Bombers took the lead for good on the strength of Gordie "Butterbean" Betcherman's two consecutive three point plays.

The Iron Dukes appeared strong from the outset and posted a 35-31 count in their favour at the half.

With three minutes gone in the second half, Law still led, 43-36.

However, Mike "Bumper" Betcherman's 26 points in the second half (35 for the game) and the aforementioned Butterbean put UC over the top for a final score of 82-77.

For the Iron Dukes, Richie "Stash" Pyne, Vic "Gearbox" Alboini, and, of course, The Goon figured prominently in Law's attack against the odds on favourite to take home the Sifton Trophy.

EXECUTIONER VINDICTIVE AS SCADS AND TADS DROPPED

Smarting from a late season setback, Dave "The Executioner" Quick literally axed "Scads" Fawcett, flooring "Tads" Chapman in the process.

One would have thought he was in a zoo as Cheese's and Cold Duck's aggregations went at it tooth and nail.

The final score of 71-66 in Vic's favour belies the fact that this game suffered from some beastly ball handling. The game should not have been as close as the final score indicated.

Heads-up play by either team could have turned this game into a cakewalk.

Stellar play by Randy "Milo" Filinski crashed PHE into an early lead (34-32 at the half), but some great shooting by Dave "Jugs" Short brought Vic back and put them into a 41-34 lead which held up to the game's conclusion.

Paul "Boots" McKay displayed a fine touch for PHE in this game, literally canning buckets from out of doors. Only some vicious defense by the Executioner prevented Boots from chalking up a heavy total. Overall, Vic's tar-and-feather defence allowed them to win this match.

Noting that The Duke's point spreads for the first games in the semi-finals were off by a combined total of four points in the two games, Jimmy "The Greek" Snyder has decided to set up an off-court betting shop (call 923-4053 and ask for The Duke) which handles bets on U of T interfac basketball games. Naturally, The Duke will handicap them.

With this in mind, here are The Duke's picks for this week's second games.

UC OVER LAW BY 10 POINTS — TUESDAY, 7:00-9:00 P.M.

UC should establish that they are the team to beat in the finals with a convincing display against Law.

This game is especially noteworthy, also, because UC's coach Ginsberg will once again don the red-and-white in order to give UC additional bench strength.

VIC OVER PHE BY 5 POINTS — WEDNESDAY, 7:00-9:00 P.M.

Another barnburner!

Rumour has it that if Brian "Cold Duck" Stevens' Vic crew wins this semi-final, he will live up to his nickname by sponsoring a champagne party for his machismo mob and by inviting The Duke.

A happy group of Blues circle around Bill Buha after his third period marker tied the score 3-3.

Referee punched in hockey clash

By PAUL and ANNE

The story in the interfac hockey semi-finals was, as usual, the officiating which may have been either brilliant or abominable, depending on which team you are supporting.

It appeared to be visitors' night at the zoo as about 57 human animals provided a screaming rowdy background for the SMC-Engineering tilt Thursday evening.

Both teams preferred to play chippy, scumbly shinny with numerous penalties and a series of crushing (if somewhat illegal) bodychecks handed out by SMC rearguard Masher Merlocco.

The Plumbers took a 1-0 lead in the opening round on a powerplay slapshot by Gord Currie, but the game then descended to the level of a petulant penalty parade.

Skule made it 2-0 from a play that appeared to be at least six inches offside, especially to the St. Mike's defenders who stood around awaiting the whistle that didn't blow.

A heated argument followed, but it was abruptly terminated when SMC player J. (for Just a minute ref while I plough your teeth into the back of your head) Doyle connected a vicious left uppercut to the jaw of referee A. (for arrrrggghh!!) Hemphill. It is presumed Mr. Doyle will be playing his hockey elsewhere for the next few years.

When play resumed St. Mike's retaliated goal-wise with a tally by Paul Noble, and after maintaining continual pressure on the SPS goal, tied the score at 2-2 with about six minutes remaining to slash, hook, trip, elbow and board. Which both teams did with gay abandon.

The coaches contracted an interbellum treaty for the weekend, but warfare resumes today in the two-game total-goals series. The bloodletting begins at 9:00 p.m.

In contrast, the PHE-Vic semi-final opener Friday noon was a case of yawnus maximus as the jocks emerged with a 2-0 lead on goals by Steve Burton and George Nuppola.

PHE won without the services of coach John Wright, who was occupied elsewhere over the weekend, and must be rated heavy favorites to proceed to the finals after tonight's second game (Varsity Arena at 6:30)

SWEET VICTORY: Blues' John Wright takes long draft from national trophy after 5-4 triumph.

SAC voting for president drags over today, Wed.

Voting began this morning for next year's SAC president and vice-president. Four candidates are seeking each of the positions.

Two polls are located in Sid Smith and one each in Lash Miller, New Physics, Ramsay Wright, Sigmund Samuel, and the SAC office.

There will also be polls in all colleges and in most professional schools.

Voting continues today and tomorrow from nine a.m. until five p.m.

Hoping for a larger turnout this year, SAC has broken with precedent to hold balloting for two days.

Last year, 6,066 students voted. About 20,000 students are eligible to vote in the elections.

Of the 12,300 Faculty of Arts and Science student body, nearly 6,000 voted in the November parity referendum and over 8,000 cast ballots in the February strike referendum.

Envious SAC officials are apparently attempting to match this turn-out by the extension of the election.

The presidential candidates are Owen Dick, Alice Klein, Lawrence Dahlke, and Bob Spencer. Running for vice-president are Katie Curtin, Phil Dack, Dave Slater, and Mo Wortzman.

Their replies to a series of five probing Varsity questions are printed on pages 12 and 13.

See page 4 for The Varsity analysis of the candidates and their platforms.

Herbert Marcuse spoke at U of T and predicted a successful revolution within the century.

Marcuse envisions most radical revolution within next century

By ALEX PODNICK

Herbert Marcuse, the internationally renowned Marxist philosopher, predicted the possibility of a successful revolution "more radical than any other" within the next century. This revolution would be able to lead to "new modes of human relations" both with other men and with nature, he said, last Saturday.

Marcuse delivered a lecture on "Beyond the One Dimensional Society" in the packed Medical Sciences Auditorium Saturday morning. Most of those present had not been invited to the Philosophy department-sponsored lecture, but had heard of Marcuse's presence on campus and decided to attend anyways.

UNTIL NOW, MARCUSE SAID, ALL forms of social revolution have only replaced "one unfreedom of man with another." First in which radical change may appear as a qualitative rather than a quantitative change of the existing modes of production and production relations, he observed.

Citing the Third World, the black and brown peoples, and the rebellion of youth in the industrial countries, he declared that this image is alive in the protest movements.

Marcuse described our consumer society, precipitated by an unprecedented rise in productivity, as a "new and possibly last stage in global capitalism".

He denounced the American "social system which can apparently only sustain itself by neo-colonialism, neo-imperialism", waste of natural resources, unnecessary poverty, and the repression of protest.

THE WORLD-WIDE "PREVENTIVE COUNTER-REVOLUTION" against protest has occurred without a preceding revolution to suppress, he said. This "blatant conflict can no longer be rationalized" on the basis of scarcity of supply or justified for ontological reasons.

"The driving power of change is no longer primarily material want and deprivation," according to Marcuse, but it is a "struggle for an essentially different mode of existence". In the future, the reproduction of the existing society can only occur through increasing violence and manipulation, he said.

Marcuse spoke of the "emergence of a new type of man and woman, especially among the youth," who experience in their minds and bodies the repression of the system.

MARCUSE STRESSED THE CENTRAL IMPORTANCE of the senses in restructuring our society. "It is with our senses that we experience most directly" our world, he said.

Our senses are not passive, but help to shape our world. "If we want a less aggressive and less repressive world we have to conceive of different modes of perceiving, hearing, feeling, and tasting," he advised.

Instead of competing against nature, man should work with it, developing his unique faculties, his aestheticism and creativity, as a productive force in the radical redirection of his society, Marcuse said.

THE WELL-KNOWN PHILOSOPHER AND WRITER ATTACKED encounter groups as one of the more "devilish" ways the Establishment tries to co-opt youth. "The development of a new sensibility cannot possibly have anything to do with the administration of this new sensibility," he asserted. "Love can never be learned out of organization and administration, nor out of textbooks."

If emancipation of the senses is to contribute to radical change, it must be more than mere personal ego satisfaction, he said.

Marcuse gave his criticism of the New Left, lamenting the "fatal role of anti-intellectualism" which he claimed, replaces reason with activism.

THERE CAN BE NO MEANINGFUL REVOLUTIONARY action unless it is "exercised by a revolutionary mass", a mass which he claimed does not exist now.

He described the New Left's failure to realize that a mass base will only develop over time as one of its major shortcomings. Furthermore, they are plagued with an outdated "labour fetish", looking exclusively to the working class for their mass base, he said.

When Marx wrote, Marcuse noted, the blue collar workers were the majority of the population and were the natural mass base for a socialist revolution. This is not the case today, he continued, yet the New Left has not widened its search for mass support.

EARLIER, MARCUSE HAD DESCRIBED THE malaise and discontent with their society which has led many students and junior executives to drop out, withdraw from society. This structural rather than ideological exploitation of many more than just the blue collar workers, all dependent upon monopoly capital, provides a potential mass base, he said.

If universities are pillars of the Establishment, it is, "to a large extent, the fault of the students themselves", Marcuse said. Just as it's possible for universities to socialize students to passively accept the system, it's possible for students to wrest control from the administrators and to "restructure universities according to today's needs rather than destroying them", he suggested.

If students are really interested in destroying the universities, he advised them to apply for jobs in (U.S. President) Nixon's and (California governor Ronald) Reagan's offices because that's where they can do it.

Grandiose summer arts festival planned for Rochdale College

Rochdale College will hold a summer arts festival this year.

In the typically grandiose manner of Rochdale, the Festival will stretch between the months of May and September.

Consisting of a series of seminars, workshops, plays, gallery showings, films and concerts, the summer Rochfestival will be exploring such facets of Canadian culture as music, the visual arts, theatre, writing and film. Part of the program will be devoted to political and social problems.

The festival will start on May 2 in Nathan Phillips' square at 2:00 p.m. Areas of the square will be set up to demonstrate Kundalini Yoga, pottery, leather work, weaving, and wine and beer making.

later in the summer, May 29 to June 11, seminars will be held on ecology in conjunction with the Yonge St. closing. The City of Toronto plans to close part of Yonge Street to vehicular traffic during this time to create a pedestrian mall.

July 10-23 is music; July 24-Aug. 6 is theatre; Aug. 7-Aug. 20 is Canadian writing and publishing.

And to welcome in the harvest Sept. 4-Sept. 17 is being devoted to beer and wine making. Over the next few weeks the blank spaces in the program will be filled up.

Festival registration can be obtained during the day at Rochdale, in the library.

MAKE HART HOUSE YOUR CAMPUS FOCUS

300 hear Marcuse lecture

Nearly 300 people, most uninvited, discovered where the unpublicized meeting with Professor Herbert Marcuse was being held Saturday morning. Anticipating the discovery, officials responsible for the meeting moved it from the relatively small UC Croft Chapter House to the Medical Sciences Auditorium.

A Philosophy department spokesman denied that Marcuse's visit had been kept secret or that the department had intended to exclude persons without invitations to the lecture. He claimed the Marcuse lecture was part of a Philosophy department series of guest lectures for which notices are sent to department faculty and grad students. The lecture was not announced in the staff bulletin's column on guest lectures.

He said the notices are not an invitation necessary for admission, although he admitted that the department did attempt to "discourage" outsiders interested in attending the lecture.

The spokesman said the decision to hold the meeting in a larger room was delayed until Marcuse had agreed to address a larger gathering.

Auto-atrocities

A single automobile consumes an average of 700 gallons of motor fuels per year, and belches one full ton of pollutants into the air. A single car also requires $17,000 worth of roadways, not including parking space.

DANCING DOLLY (left), HOT PANTS (amerikan-style) and the amber-headed SPOOK.

Don't believe it? Look who's editing the Varg!

Billed as Dancing Dolly and her amber-headed Spook of 320, a couple of Varsity regulars captivated the staff and the board, and were subsequently reduced to the editorship of the '71-'72 Varsity, Monday night.

Known in journalistic hack circles as Linda McQuaig (1 UC) and Tom Walkom (11 UC), the two seem headed for a delightful year.

"Well, it's a job, ya know. Something to do when you're not doing anything," said Spook, lounging in the recently redecorated, plushy plump editorial office.

"When you're trying to get into Carleton, anything helps," said Walkom.

"I'm rather looking forward to it. Wow, I mean you get to meet some guys — a position like this could only help to enhance and expand my social life," cooed svelte McQuaig, dressed in a modish below-the-ankle denim with matching pique belt and two-toned suede shoes (the outfit cleverly disguised her torrid pink hot pants).

The Victorious, but jaded, duo seemed confident, despite the un-subtle exodus of present staff through doors and windows following the appointment announcement.

"The Varsity was nice as a breakfast cereal, but gollee" gasped Eric Rump, "can you imagine it as brunch?"

Food Sci faculty wins two month survival battle

In a meeting Friday night, the U of T senate agreed to continue the Food Science Faculty, despite attempts by the university to terminate the department.

Conflict over the Faculty of Food Sciences began in late January when Dr. John Hamilton, vice-president of the department, asked for an evaluation of the Faculty, then recommended it be dissolved. Reasons were an insufficient demand for the offered courses, high cost per individual student, and the availability of similar classes in other areas.

As there were only 93 students registered for this year, and student-teacher ratio was rated as half of the university's standard ten to one, the matter was taken into consideration by U of T.

At a Senate meeting of Feb. 17, the suggestion was brought up for discussion from Food Science Faculty and students with violent response. The University explained its position by pointing out that credit could not be given for the department's courses in nutrition, textiles, and food chemistry by the Canadian Institute of Food Technology, and the program could easily be phased out over a three-year period, providing no new students be admitted in following terms.

However, the executive committee of the Senate, which called for the continuation of Food Science courses, was supported by alumni, students, incoming secondary school graduates, and the Faculty itself, all represented at the meeting, and taking an active part.

Students claimed the smooth phasing out of the department would be both impractical and unrealistic, and that standards would drop in the Food Sciences division.

Written response, in the form of over 700 letters protesting the department elimination, have also been received by the University.

Civil service or militia?

Gov't has plans for unemployed students

OTTAWA (CUP) — The federal government will spend almost $58 million this summer on its youth pacification program.

Details of the program came at a press conference Tuesday attended by four senior cabinet members and about 40 representatives of the press — the parliamentary press gallery.

THERE WILL BE BETWEEN 1.3 AND 1.5 MILLION students out of school this summer, about 980,000 are expected by the government to be looking for work.

This summer the federal government is almost doubling last summer's spending on youth. The ministers said that the program for jobs will favor post-secondary students.

Here is the government's plan: Chosen on a basis of university attended and unemployment rates in the region 23-000 students will work for the public service of Canada in Ottawa doing meaningful, worthwhile jobs and at the same time learning about how Canada's civil servants operate.

SEVEN HUNDRED STUDENTS WILL STUDY the use of drugs by youth "to provide a system of information from youth to youth during the summer as a basis for ongoing programs throughout the year" (The health minister wasn't there so this wasn't further clarified).

Six hundred athletes will get educational grants to keep them in school, giving them a chance to excel as athletes and at the same time to continue their studies.

About 38,000 students will participate in group travel programs backed by the federal treasury.

An equal number of students will take advantage of Canadian Armed Forces and Militia Training Programs. About three or 4,000 of the 38,000 will be working as civilians.

THE MILITIA, WHICH IS ROUGHLY EQUIVALENT to the U.S. National Guard, participants in Kent State and other campus and ghetto riots, in particular is increasing its role in taking care of young Canadian students. An additional 8,000 men will be allowed to enter it.

An estimated 400,000 students will be travelling on the roads, taking advantage of a "network of hostels" to sleep in, run by volunteers or organizations within the community.

But the biggest lump sum goes to the "Opportunities for Youth" concept out of Pelletier's office. Fifteen million dollars will go to voluntary organizations and citizens groups "aimed at stimulating communities across Canada to put forward and operate imaginative and useful projects expected to employ tens of thousands of young Canadians during the summer months."

"THE SCOPE OF THIS PROGRAM will be limited only by the imagination of the young people themselves and the participating citizens' groups and voluntary community organizations."

To clarify exactly what the government meant, a woman asked:

"Does this mean that if the Ladies Auxiliary in . . . say, Moose Jaw organizes a pollution clean-up project that it could pay students to do the job?"

"Yes, that's it exactly," said Pelletier with a broad smile.

THEN SOMEONE ASKED IF that, because of course it was federal government money being used, if the federal minimum wage of $1.75 an hour would be paid to the working students.

"I'm not going to quibble. Whatever they (students) are offered. . . ." Manpower Minister Lang chipped in.

Lang also said at one point that he didn't think a means test to ensure that students who really need work to get back to school got the jobs could be handled. He did say that that sort of thing might be done by local groups if they wanted to.

When it boils down to actual numbers, the government will be creating 62,300 positions or occupations for the Canadian young. That leaves a residue of 320,000 projected job-hunters with few prospects in the private or public sectors.

Pelletier's $15 million "opportunities for youth" program divided among the remaining unemployed yields only $50 per person.

FOR THE HITCH-HIKER, THERE WILL BE the Government funded hostels, how many and where and how many beds hasn't made exactly clear because the community involvement still has to be pulled together.

But there's something new for hitch-hikers. It's called the roadside kiosk, located at strategic points along the highways where a youth has simply to stand when waiting for a ride or when wanting information about the road or the city or whatever.

The kiosks, apparently gaily painted stands, will also have what Pelletier termed a "security dimension" incorporated in them. The stands will register the name of the student hitch-hiker along with the license plate number and the name of the driver who is offering the lift. Then if anything happens (what could happen wasn't specified) the authorities will have a better chance of dealing with it, he said.

Later on in the press conference, a reporter asked Pelletier: "WHAT WOULD YOU SAY TO SOME UNEMPLOYED CANADIAN who was in his middle twenties and who couldn't find a job, when he asked you why you weren't spending money to let him travel around Canada for the summer?"

Pelletier replied that the man would have a legitimate question, and one the government is working on, but that travel for young people is easier to arrange than for adults, because young people are willing to put up with less amenities than adults.

But, he assured all present, the government is working on making travel possible too for those kind of people.

Election drones to an uninspiring end

Today and tomorrow, students may vote for next year's SAC president and vice-president.

Now you know.

The paraphernalia and rhetoric of the current campaign have passed most of us by, sinking to our bottommost mental recesses in an indigestible and undigested lump.

Perhaps those of you who have maintained any interest in the campaign are asking: who should I vote for? and why aren't any of my first-choice candidates running?

Perhaps more of you are asking what's it all about, and why the fuss?

The successful presidential candidate will receive $95 a week next year. He or she will have one vote on a new SAC of sixty-odd.

The winning vice-president will be employed by the SAC over the summer but will remain a full-time student next year. He or she also has but one vote on council.

A committed and active president and vice-president, however, have considerable influence on the SAC, and will assume much of the responsibility for council's dealings with outside agencies, especially with the administrators of Simcoe Hall.

But what can be said of council? This year the SAC has done virtually nothing to justify its collective existence. During the one major student crisis of the year, — the Arts and Science parity strike — council passed vague motions of support after the fact.

At the same time, SAC representatives — acting as concerned and committed individuals — plunged into the parity fight and played a leading role in the spontaneous development of student organisation in Arts and Science.

It was the SAC that went to the students in their hour of need, not the students who went to the SAC. For the ten days of strike and occupation, Sidney Smith Hall was a hive of students creating, acting, interacting. The SAC office was forsaken and ignored.

And thus the question becomes academic of why X, Y, or Z did not run for SAC president or vice-president this year. It is pointless to ask what would be happening if they were in the race. They are not running because there is little or nothing for them to run for.

A dynamic and creative organisation which performs a useful and meaningful function attracts to it the most capable and most impressive people around. When that organisation is no longer central to the principal issues and conflicts of the time, those people move into other spheres of activity.

There are some very critical issues now facing us, both as U of T students and as citizens of a larger community. The role and responsibility of the university in a corporate capitalist world, Americanisation, Student aid and the Educational Opportunity Bank, Increasing faculty and administration resistance to parity and internal democratisation, Degrading and dehumanising educational processes, Growing government and public hostility to universities and university financing.

Obviously students are not properly organised to meet these challenges. No new organisations have emerged lately that can clearly fill pressing student needs. That's why so many of us are apathetic and disillusioned about the possibilities of challenging the basic assumptions of the university.

Clearly — and this is accepted by most people who have worked around the SAC — the council, at least this year, is no longer capable of acting as a catalyst and focus for student involvement and social change.

The results of this election, then, will have a minimal impact on the shape and style of the University of Toronto and on the role of students within it.

The conscientious voter is left to choose the most appealing and capable individual who has the most cogent and lucid analysis of student problems.

Owen Dick exudes coolness and confidence. On page 12 he tells us that he will be "unruffled" by his year in office. Dick and Dave Slater would be a "safe" choice unlikely to disturb anyone in the seats of university power.

Dick and Slater constantly emphasize the need of building university community. They unquestioningly accept the myth that there is a university community, that the disparate and conflicting interests in the U of T need only a few drinks and calm words to settle down and make up.

Dick doesn't say what the purpose of university community is, or why he wants to achieve this political nirvana. For Slater the phrase is only a mask for his one issue, a bigger and better social programme.

Blue and White chairman Moe Wortzman is also intent on expanded social activities. Wortzman does perceive a social programme as a means to involving more students in the university and in its problems, although he has made little attempt to proceed beyond this stage of analysis.

Wortzman is an engaging and sincere personality who has had considerable experience in the social field as Blue and White chairman. Whether he can apply this experience to any other student problems he might face is unclear.

Young Socialists Alice Klein and Katie Curtin cannot be faulted for ignoring the issues. They have a clear and explicit socialist analysis of the university which squarely confronts many of our problems.

But Klein and Curtin don't know how to communicate their politics or involve meaningful numbers of students in changing the university. Their world is one of endless mass meetings and "mass democratic struggle". If rhetoric could win an election, they would have been acclaimed.

The Young Socialist point of view is actually not at all democratic. They are the Calvinist elect of the student left. They brook no contradiction and accommodate no criticism.

Bob Spencer and Phil Dack have little reason not to face student problems. As the SAC establishment "left liberal" candidates, they are the latest inheritors of the "SAC tradition" epitomised by 1968-69 president Steve Langdon. Spencer has been in the forefront of this year's SAC and of the parity movement in Arts and Science. He knows how the university works and what's wrong with it.

Yet Spencer and Dack devote most of their energies to a superficial gloss of student problems which boils down to a commitment to more and better services. SAC involvement in student housing, summer employment, co-operative stores, and so on, will only serve to further inflate and expand a largely irrelevant student bureaucracy.

Dack and Spencer are now so committed to and involved in student bureaucracy that one doubts their capacity to look at SAC's problems in a detached manner, or to be able to think in terms of broad approaches to fundamental issues.

Presidential candidate Larry Dahlke is the "mystery man" of this race. He hasn't run very hard and he hasn't given much indication of why he's running.

Dahlke has ranged over all the issues with viewpoints running from one end to the other of the political spectrum. He has continually emphasized, however, that he is the only "apolitical" candidate in the race.

Pity the poor voter. Thanks to an extra polling day set by a SAC Elections Committee despairing of student apathy, he or she may yet be agonised into making a decision.

"A choice, not an echo", goes the old cliché to which all good politicians pretend to aspire.

Unfortunately this year we are faced with too many echoes and too few choices.

U of T secretes Marcuse

Quietly — you might even say surreptitiously — U of T played host this weekend to Herbert Marcuse, the California philosopher who has been dubbed by the news media as a patron saint and guru of the radical new left.

Marcuse's visit was never announced publicly by the university. Only faculty members and graduate students in the department of philosophy were notified that the Saturday morning event was indeed going to take place.

The University of Toronto, it appears, operates in a naturally secretive and elitist manner when academic matters are at stake.

It was not deemed worthwhile to issue an open invitation to students — as well as faculty outside of the philosophy department — to listen to what Marcuse might have to say.

One consideration, perhaps, was that the university wished to avoid any bad publicity which might accrue as a result of the philosopher's visit. This seems a likely explanation, since normally when a prominent intellectual visits the campus, the university is quite anxious to have as much publicity as possible for the guest.

But a second aspect of the issue is that Marcuse is an intellectual who is very comfortable in the kind of university environment that his visit typified.

Although he has been acclaimed as a "Marxist", a "prophet" and a "revolutionary", Marcuse remains primarily an academic whose philosophical speculations, based on the work of Hegel, Freud, and, to some extent, Marx, once captured the imagination of the "new left."

This is not to deny that Marcuse is able to make an extremely useful contribution to the development of political awareness among youth. Quite simply, however, "awareness" is not enough.

Student and youth involvement in various forms of political struggle during the last few years — from election campaigns to strikes, sit-ins and community and working class organizing — has led them into an arena where being intellectually agile and well-read is not enough to initiate radical social changes.

In short, the distinction is between theoretical and practical work.

Marcuse, ironically, has never made that transition at any time during his lengthy academic career.

On the basis of his theory, universities would appear to be major repressive and regimenting institutions within society. Yet, the nature of his actions has been to go along with the status quo within the academic community.

It comes as little surprise then that Marcuse is reported to have been offered the presidency of at least two different Canadian universities.

It is a rare tribute to the importance of Marcuse's theory of repressive tolerance that the technique should be used in tempting an academic with the highest post a university has to offer.

Why you should vote 'no' in the referendum

Is the Engineering Referendum a hoax? Or is it little children trying to play revolution? . . . think about it!

On the eve of March 9, the New Eng Soc. Executive, voted on a "50 per cent rebate referendum", to finance what was termed as "special engineering services, social activities, and educational projects."

The following morn found the engg. buildings littered with leaflets which not only pushed the DEMAND FOR A REBATE, but also said, "an overwhelming turnout in the referendum will greatly strengthen our position."

Fellow engineers, does a demand at one end and then a negotiating position at the other go along simultaneously? Does it make sense? Does inconsistency abound? Do the leaflets serve to ignite "our legitimate discontent" with SAC?

But earlier in the year, the Engg. Soc. made an attempt to raise its fees of $7 per student: a special general meeting was held, and in fact a "budget", covering specific areas of expenditure, was distributed. Despite the great cannonballs, big bashes, grand dances, and course evaluations it offered, we turned it down!

$300 was allocated for the publicity of this referendum campaign. In the posters and leaflets, we find a "YES" campaign only. Is this campaign a one-sided bull-doing affair? (An engineer approached the Chairman of the Referendum Committee for $150 for a "NO" and "ENGINEERS HAVE THE RIGHT TO KNOW" campaign. His verbal request was turned down!)

Other flyers and verbal deliveries in the classes project social events of an immense magnitude; one of our biggest year end dances, the Skule at Home lost over $1650 last year, it was then discontinued, the Cannonball lost money this year, other dances have either lost or almost broken even: does this mean under-attendance? Despite the lavish publicity, does it mean that dances have served their usefulness? But more important, does this mean that we spend more and more on dances? Furthermore should not social events pay for themselves?

Speaking of course evaluations, which people seem to be pressing on so much: apart from the fact that the Engg. Soc. already has $2000 as a SAC grant to cover course evaluations; really, how much does paper and gestetner ink cost?

A three-page flyer put out by the referendum committee seemingly consists of inconsistencies? . . . I mean things like the offer of fantastic "dances, smokers, social events" on the one hand and then supporting the Blue & White Society on the other, that is attempting to run two similar organizations simultaneously . . . examine them further at your leisure.

The referendum committee seems to capitalize on the Black Students' Union controversy and continually harp, in print and verbally, on this grant of about one per cent of SAC's total budget.

But it prefers to IGNORE a SAC Press subsidy of $7000 — the very place where the referendum posters were printed, the very place where our dance and other posters come into existence; it prefers to ignore the U of T Chorus, the Cheerleaders and the Blue & White Band, the Hart House Farm, the Remedial Reading Program, the Student Loan Fund, the Birth Control Bureau Publications, The Varsity, Radio Varsity . . . and many, many other subsidies. We mustn't forget that SAC has an operating budget of about a quarter of a million.

If we get an overwhelming YES, then what:

First and foremost, of the approximate 600 engineers who voted in the fall elections, about 500 voted that we "re-negotiate our position with SAC".

Does this demand in any way define the "position" of the 500 interested students? Would questionnaire have been a better idea?

Furthermore, what are its implications? Does this essentially mean that we are voting for a 50 per cent pull out from the university community? Does it then imply that we wish to be "narrow-minded technicians", non-participatory and unrelated to the rest of the campus?

Should the other faculties subsidize expenses that students, including Engineers, on this campus are supposed to benefit from? Then if this is so, does it mean that all the other faculties should also get a 50 per cent rebate? Hence, if financial ends don't meet, will SAC raise its fees? It did, a year ago!

But then again, 50 per cent is an arbitrary figure!!!. And no specifics as to how and where the money would exactly be spent have been nailed down. Does it cover what 2300 engineers need? Maybe we need more?

The Engineering Soc. went into a $10000 debt about three years ago . . . this forced it to curtail and tighten its budgetary expenditure.

Is the Engg. Soc. itself fiscally responsible? . . . There are questions ad infinitum, think about them!. VOTE!

former Engineering SAC and faculty council rep.

—John Brouwer,
former Engineering SAC rep

Why you should vote 'yes' in the referendum

For the last several years, there has been a growing demand in Engineering for a "new relationship with SAC". Those engineering students who have been more intimately involved with the SAC organization have become convinced that SAC is not adequately serving the needs of the students of professional faculties, and more particularly, the needs of engineers.

The Engineering Society is calling for a 50 per cent rebate, to the Engineering Society, of all SAC fees paid by Engineering students. The rebate would allow Engineers to decide how Engineers' money would be spent.

The principle at stake here is the principle of local autonomy, a principle that SAC has strongly endorsed over the years. Clearly what the engineers are demanding is the same as what SAC says it supports — the right of students to determine their own priorities.

The 50 per cent of the SAC fees which are rebated to the Engineering Society will be used to provide services and programs at a local level for engineering students. These services will include such things as course evaluations and questionnaires, aid to course clubs and course unions, an orientation program, a Handbook for Engineers, and improved communications among the students in Engineering. In determining priorities, the first principle will be "to spend engineers' money the way engineers want it spent".

The proposed 50 per cent rebate of SAC fees should not be interpreted as a move to withdraw from the SAC. As part of the University of Toronto, Engineers have a right — indeed, a duty — to express their opinions on matters affecting the whole university.

The traditional role of Engineering SAC reps as a moderating force on SAC will be especially important next year, the year of CORSAP, the new top-governing structure, and the selection of President Bissell's successor. Engineers re-affirm the importance of a central, representative student organization to deal with these problems, and we will continue to support SAC's actions with respect to these significant events . . .

The demand for a 50 per cent rebate is neither excessive, nor is it unreasonable. For services that are better provided by SAC, the 50 per cent that remains will suffice. For services that are better provided on a local level, the 50 per cent rebate will provide adequate resources for the Engineering Society to do things for the students they represent.

—Paul Cadario

An open letter to engineers

Fellow Engineers:

I am writing this letter to you, not only because I have spent the last year working on the campus centre project but also because I feel a deep commitment to our faculty and to us — the students.

I graduated last year, but still remain, as a graduate student in mechanical engineering. What I am going to say is not innuendo or misrepresentation — everything I want to discuss is based on my experience as a class representative on the Mechanical Club, from the three years on the Engineering Society, and from two years on SAC. Well, now to the point!

You will no doubt, have seen or will see the posters in our buildings and the pamphlets demanding a 50 per cent rebate of SAC fees. Why is this campaign being run? What is the other side to the story in the pamphlet?

The pamphlet says that the $14,000 provided by the rebate will provide "special Engineering services, social activities, educational projects" — but doesn't indicate what these will be. It says that the Engineering Society is "closer to your needs". Three years ago this Engineering Society was so corrupt and financially mismanaged that we were in debt over $10,000 dollars. Through the hard work of Art MacIwain, (Treasurer two years ago, President last year — '69-'70) we managed to pretty well obliterate the deficit.

This past year again, there have been indications of poor handling of your money. You indicated one of your "needs" when you refused to raise the Eng. Soc. fees at the general meeting this year. Now the Eng. Soc. intends to get double what they presently have. This is somewhat of a contradiction.

We already have a better faculty than anywhere else on campus (except perhaps in areas of educational reform, food services, social amenities). We have the Stores, the LGMB, the best social events on campus and we have had, in previous years though not now, the strongest and most influential voice on the SAC.

"Now is the time to say what we want and fight for it, September will be too late". Yes! That's right! BUT what do they want to DO with your money? Statements such as "If Arts and Science can get a 50 per cent turnout, Engineers can certainly beat that" and slogans such as "Have your $20 better spent!" are the worst forms of simplistic manipulation. They arouse your dissatisfaction but they say nothing and provide nothing to replace the present situation.

Last year Art MacIwain, also a former SAC rep, and myself were the main force behind our getting representatives on the Faculty Council. We fought long and hard for over a year to obtain what we got (only a small part of what we wanted — a reformed Council and parity where it was necessary). We did it outside of the Eng. Soc. budget. How?

The Eng. Soc. went and got SAC to give us $2,000 just for that one project and we used SAC's research material in our efforts. The Eng. Soc. had no trouble because everyone on SAC knew that it was justified, that we had a plan laid out as to exactly where the money was to be spent — and we had the threat of over 2,000 of us withdrawing from SAC. The withdrawal idea was seldom used in getting things like this from SAC because it's a terrific club to be used only when absolutely necessary.

A 50 per cent rebate will destroy the Engineers as a real power and influence in the university, it will drain the SAC and probably start a chain reaction, and we will all lose. The inevitable result will be that all faculty and college councils will want a rebate and the SAC will have to double its fee in order to maintain its services for the whole university.

There are many things that must be done together. The job crisis is not just a problem facing engineers alone — the same with financing our education, educational reform, the cheap travel bureau (A.O.S.C.), providing communal facilities such as stores, overnight accommodation, inexpensive newspaper printing, more or better equipped lounge space.

SAC must become more service oriented and that is why I have worked on the campus centre project all year. It is just now beginning to change its direction. Plans are taking shape for a design concept for the Campus Centre Project — to be done by the Department of Architecture and paid for by the SAC. The university has (through constant discussion by the SAC) decided to finance social amenities such as bus shelters, benches, trash cans, bulletin boards and free phones (operating cost for phones paid by SAC) and other such things that benefit everyone.

In conclusion — there are still 3 out of 5 empty seats on SAC from Engineering! Now is the time to do something, but it is not to demand a 50 per cent rebate. Instead you must ensure that SAC, when the budget comes up, is going to make sure that there is enough money set aside to provide the necessary capital for the printing press (which York, Ryerson and U. of T. student councils are considering and which will provide really inexpensive printing costs for our Toike) and that more money is channeled into providing major services that benefit everyone but that individual groups find difficult to finance.

I have barely touched on the finer points of why you should vote NO for the 50 per cent rebate. SAC can, under strong pressure from articulate and strong representation, be made to go where we want it to. If they don't produce a budget that indicates a change — then we should consider withdrawal. The rebate idea appears to be a sensational issue. It is a fence sitting position and the reasons for it, given so far, are inarticulate, unfounded and indicate nothing to replace what we already have now.

I hope you'll vote NO this week. I would hate to see so many people work on the past Engineering Societies all go to nought, because of a decision made in haste and without well considered and lengthy evaluation.

How we can stop the Arctic oil rip-off

By STEPHEN WOHL

(The author is a Montreal mechanical engineer and former teaching assistant at McGill University)

THE RICHEST COUNTRY IN THE WORLD, per capita, is little Kuwait. And because the oil producers of the Persian Gulf recently decided to get tough with the American-dominated oil cartel — and proved that you could get away with it — the Kuwaitis will soon be enjoying even higher incomes.

But the title "world's richest people" could belong to Canadians with the income far more equitably distributed here than in the sheikdoms, if only we resolved to rationalize our own vast oil wealth, now in process of being quietly squandered.

We've come to look upon the riches of Canada's north as our national birthright. Properly so. There are between 100 and 155 billion barrels of oil sitting up there, 20 times what North America consumes annually. The value of that oil is at least 350 billion dollars in clear profits. The question however is, who is going to reap those profits?

ARCTIC OIL IS UNDER FEDERAL government land and water — the Yukon and the Northwest territories — belonging, at least until now, to each and every Canadian. It will be exploited and marketed in one of two ways, either by private oil companies or by a government crown corporation. In the former case, the astronomical profits will accrue to those who control the companies (mostly Americans with a few Canadian helpers). In the latter case, the quarter of a trillion in profits will be allotted to 20 million shareholders. To all the Canadian people, $12,500 to every man, woman and child in our country.

In either instance Canadian taxpayers are going to be burdened with the lion's (or camel's) share of development costs — Ottawa will require us to finance access roads, airports, town sites, power supply, communications, etc. — so is there any justifiable excuse for granting private entrepreneurs license to siphon off even a penny of the upcoming returns?

ONE MIGHT SAY, "OF COURSE OUR government will not allow the private interests to steal what is so obviously ours". But when the oil companies are looking forward to billions (thousands of millions) in profits, they can afford (if they wish) to spread tens of millions under the table and to generously grease available palms.

For whatever reason, Ottawa is diligently signing away exploration and exploitation rights to thousands upon thousands of acres every single month. As Joe Greene proclaims (Dec. 4, 1969), "It is not important who gets the dividends, Wall Street or Bay Street." It doesn't seem to enter government minds that maybe neither Wall nor Bay Street, but the Canadian people should get the dividends.

I propose that Canadians immediately put out of business all the private resource developers in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, nationalize "their properties, and turn over to a new, imaginative and potent Canadian Arctic development corporation, a 100-per cent crown agency, the function of exploiting and marketing the entire spectrum of resources with which our north is so richly endowed: not only the oil, but also the tremendous natural gas and mineral resources which promise at least equal profit yields.

(This is not to be confused with the so-called Canada Development Corporation, the abortion of Walter Gordon's original idea, or with pan-Arctic Oils Ltd., the 45-per cent government-owned operation which effectively serves to give all the other companies invading the north, the private ones, the smoothest possible entree into the north regions pan-Arctic "opens up" and the greatest possible leverage on co-opted government functionaries. Both the DCDC and Pan-Arctic foster the notion that Canadians ought to be thankful for being given the privilege "shares" what is already theirs.)

THE CADC THAT I PROPOSE would borrow capital within this country as well as on the international money markets, repaying at fixed rates of interest from the profits its enterprises generate (there is a world of difference between borrowing and the selling-out of ownership).

"Deals" previously negotiated can be disavowed until the CADC has taken the reins. We will then find Canada's resources being sold for the highest price that can be gotten — not as now, the lowest, where American parent companies railroad to themselves through their own resource subsidiaries.

The United States needs us a lot more than we need the United States. The American economy is today on the verge of energy starvation (which is why all the talk about "continental energy development"). Their domestic wells, the way they are currently being depleted, will run dry no later than 1990. When they are ultimately forced to turn to Canada, the laws of supply and demand could and should have them paying us much, much more than the present $3.50 a barrel.

We need feel no more guilty about driving hard bargains than do they.

WE WILL BRING HOME REVENUES commensurate with the worth of our resources, and every Canadian will personally reap the $12,500 dividend to which he is entitled just for oil ($50,000 to his family, assuming four members), if and only if we become tough businessmen via the one means we have available: if and only if we right now take a fresh and serious look at national, democratic socialism.

Otherwise, the great rip-off.

NOTES FROM THE UNDERGRADUATE DEMILITARIZED ZONE

An introduction to an undergraduate essay on Bertolt Brecht, written in a demilitarized zone of consciousness:

There is a war going on out there. A hard rain's a-gonna fall, said Bob Dylan ten years ago, and he was right. So was Bertolt Brecht, who might have said, 'You don't need a weatherman to know which way the wind blows', if Bob Dylan hadn't been around to say it later.

At this moment, I don't know who I'm writing to, or where I'm writing from, so I should pretend I'm writing to a comrade, but I don't want to give away any (secrets).

My existential space is someone else's outer space

It's raining over here where I am.
Is it raining over there where you are?

There's a lot of desperation in politics, which is a drag sometimes, but then so are a lot of things.

This introduction is supposed to put the essay in context, but I write out of a sense of frustration, a tenuous intellectual insecurity coupled with disgust.

Writing an essay in the U of T English Department is like folding a lengthy memo into a paper airplane, calculating the projected velocity and altitude as you make each fold, then deciding the right place to throw it from so that it lands in the right place to land.

I try to tell you that class warfare is going on right now, that the need for collectivity is not just another idea but a material urgency, that writing a Marxist critique of Brecht is low on the list of my political priorities, that all of this is not just a trip.

The true academic works on the 19th floor of an 18-storey building.

Plainclothed mind-police walk the streets twice a day and design billboards that read: "Me? I never read billboards."

They can do whatever we can't stop them from doing, says Catch 22, a book which reproduces as much American insanity as it explains and thus fails to be a revolutionary book.

Revolutionary art is only as revolutionary as the movement which produces it.

Put politics in command, and aesthetics will follow.

When will they start to fail students' essays for conspiracy to incite ideas?

A university is a place where you don't need drugs. Last week I was in a classroom where a student talked about the advisability of wiping out the human race.

"Not everybody?" the professor asked.
"Oh no, not everybody." Just the uncreative people, those who don't have very much to offer and who are just needlessly filling up the world. A university is an academic freedom centre, one of the few sanctuaries where reasonable men can discuss genocide as an idea.

Notes from the demilitarized zone

War is business, says Mother Courage by Brecht. So is education. And eating and drinking and clothing and housing and fucking and smoking and hockey and termites and peanut butter. Everything, especially pleasure, is business. And none of it is any of our business.

Looking through my own Marxist telescope at Brecht's Galileo is Alice stepping through the looking glass.

It's difficult to write about a writing block, because that's precisely what a writing block looks like from the inside.

Paradox is fine and dandy, and fascinating. Contradiction is quicker. Finding an identity crisis at the hub of intellectual work is not new either. The whole trick is to be discreet if you are to avoid the label of the self-conscious artist. An invisible cloak is the uniform of the bourgeois intellectual.

But this introduction is about Brecht, not me, not you. With theatre, Brecht tries to lift Marxism out of the mud of scholasticism and dogma. The Communist Party, the same one that rides roughshod over Eastern Europe, eyes this man suspiciously. The Marxist intellectual is faced with the question of strategy as each word unfolds, and with each act of creativity, Brecht is forging a new definition of historical reality and of Marxism, and within that process he poses the problem of acting as a left-wing intellectual — an ongoing crise de conscience which underlies his work and surfaces in Galileo.

Brecht, of course, comes from Europe, where they've got a nice tradition for this sort of thing. Jean-Paul Sartre comes from Europe too, and he said, "I do not believe that one can be an intellectual without being left-wing" which sounds very arrogant but might be correct.

It is correct because of the war in Vietnam . . . in Laos, Cambodia, Pakistan, Quebec, Ireland, Brazil, Greece, Uruguay, Los Angeles, the Middle East, Kansas, Italy, England, Spain, Russia, France, New York City, Yonge Street. It could even happen in a quiet provincial town like Toronto.

I quote again from Jean-Paul Sartre's comments on "Intellectuals and Revolution", an interview published in Ramparts magazine (Dec., 1970). This excerpt is about the invention of telescopes:

"A hundred years ago it was possible to believe in the bourgeois notion of disinterested scientific inquiry. Today we know that sooner or later all scientific research finds a practical application. Consequently, it is impossible to conceive of a body of knowledge which is strictly non-practical. The sociologist in America, for instance, studies ways to improve the relations between employers and workers in order to blunt the class struggle. And I do not need to point out, of course, that atomic science is immediately practical.

"The intellectual, then receives an education in universal knowledge, but in the context of a particular society with particular interests and a class ideology — an ideology which is in itself particular, into which he was bred from infancy, and whose particularity is opposed to the universal quality of his social activity. Moreover, the intellectual is dependent, in that it is the ruling class, with its financial power, which decides on his position and payment.

"So you have this very peculiar individual, a true product of contemporary society, who finds himself in perpetual contradiction between, on the one hand, an ideology which comes to him from infancy and in which all the particular bourgeois concepts are given — racism, a certain type of restrictive humanism — and, on the other hand, the universality of his profession. If this man manages to compromise, to hide from things; if he succeeds, by some kind of pretense, vacillation or balancing act, in not living that contradiction in uncertainty, I do not call him an intellectual; I consider him simply a functionary, a practical theoretician of the bourgeoisie. That he might be a writer or an essayist makes no difference, because he simply defends the particular ideology which he has been taught.

"On the other hand, from the moment he sees the contradiction, and his profession leads him to confront, in the name of the universal, the particular in himself (and hence everywhere) — then he is an intellectual."

It's difficult to tell you how bad I think things are. But I think things are so urgent that aspiring young Marxists can't waste any more time being angry young men.

Varsity lauded for accuracy

I am writing to express our regret that you chose to publish an article on the work of the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Future Role of Hart House in your issue of Monday, March 1, 1971.

While all proceedings of our committee are open to the public, we feel that it is dangerous to publish a story which in some sense assumes the outcome of our deliberations.

Like that of any other advisory committee, our work is not completed until the members have signed the final report. While the news story, by and large, was accurate, we are doubtful of its usefulness since the way in which it was presented might tend to mislead the reader as to the eventual outcome of the committee's work. Edward M. Bridge, Chairman Presidential Advisory Committee on the Future Role of Hart House

Springs are biased not the doors

The current debate as to what form the admittance of women to Hart House should take seems to me to be irrelevant. This is not because the principle is unimportant but because of the doors. The doors themselves do not discriminate against women; the blame lies in the springs that close them.

To open the doors however, it is necessary to contest their position with the springs, a challenge fit for a budding Hercules or a fully-fledged football player, but only to be attempted by less physical mortals at risk of muscle strain. Middle sized people run a special risk as they may wilt suddenly halfway through their arduous endeavour and be crushed. These door-springs then, are more selective and prejudiced than any misogynist could even wish for.

Thought you saw a unicorn, huh?

"A man taking a break in his journey", says Guildenstern in Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," sees a unicorn cross his path and disappear. That in itself is startling, but there are precedents for mystical encounters of various kinds, or, to be less extreme, a choice of persuasions to put it down to fancy; until — 'My God,' says a second man, 'I must be dreaming, I thought I saw a unicorn.' At which point a dimension is added that makes the experience as alarming as it will ever be. A third witness you understand, adds no further dimension, but only spreads it thinner, and a fourth, thinner still, and the more witnesses there are the thinner it gets, until it is as thin as reality, the name we give to the common experience . . . 'Look, look', recites the crowd, 'A horse with an arrow in its head. It must have been mistaken for a deer!'"

Meds progressive

In an article in Friday's Varsity you stated that the faculty of architecture is the first to adopt a pass-fail-honours grading system. In fact, such a system has been operating in the Progressional Course in Medicine since the commencement of the academic year.

You further stated, and I certainly agree, that Architecture has been a trail-blazing faculty in unstructured education. But I must add that since 1969, an electives programme has been offered to all medical students, and electives amount to 20 per cent of the teaching time in each of the four medical years.

The student chooses whatever elective he wishes to take from a growing catalogue of standardized electives, or he may originate one on his own. The sole requirement is that the elective be an educational experience, not necessarily medically oriented. For instance, electives are offered in computer programming, educational research and French. In fact, electives are not restricted to the University of Toronto, but may be taken at other universities or non-university centres; indeed fourth year electives are offered across Canada, in the USA, and even in Europe.

So you see, the ultra-modern Medical Sciences building houses a progressive and forward-looking faculty.

U of T as military school?

Every Wednesday the second year mechanical eng students must be in the class by 9 o'clock. The reason is simple Prof Rimott demanded that no assignment would be accepted after that time. So bearing that in mind, I tried to do my best and be in class in time, to get the work done which it will help me to go ahead with my studies, get a degree . . . become an engineer . . . find a job . . . etc.

In other words I showed a quite bit of understanding. That was all good until Wednesday morning Feb. 10, 1971 when I was late an hour due to SUBWAY power failure. Prof assistant told me that I will get only 50 per cent marks as it was late though I explained him the reason. Then I went to see Prof Rimott who also told me the same thing.

I don't understand Is University Of Toronto a Military Institute or A Learning Institute, where such rigid laws exist. You see what happened — I got 50 per cent less marks.

Do you see how my education is connected with the SUBWAY BREAKDOWN.

Abortion makes me sick

I have heard so much about abortion lately, that it is making me sick. It is about time these immature people were told a few facts, such as the good a campaign on contraception equal to the one on abortion would do to prevent pregnancy in the first place. Perhaps contraception is too much trouble for you?

You would rather murder your unborn child than discipline yourselves in your self-gratification. What women needs is liberation from their insecurity, not legalizing a means of covering up the consequences of their actions and preventing themselves further trauma by murder.

1871: the Paris Commune

This week marks the 100th anniversary of the Paris Commune, a remarkable chapter in the history of revolutionary struggle.

In this article graduate student Philip Resnick recounts the story of the Commune, and points out its relevance to contemporary struggles.

HISTORY IN THIS COUNTRY is decidedly the property of the bourgeoisie. The fiftieth anniversary of the Winnipeg General Strike, one of the most important events in the history of the Canadian working class, received only scant attention two years ago. But the hundredth anniversary of the joint stock corporation of 1867 became a pretext for an all-out binge on the part of our national and provincial bourgeoisies. The fiftieth anniversary of the great imperialist war of 1914-18 was duly noted by the custodians of national virtue, trumpeted forth in every newspaper, public school, and television network. The hundredth anniversary of the 1871 Paris Commune, one of the key events in the history of the international working class and socialist movement, is ignored.

But the Commune is not ignored in France or Italy, in China or the USSR, indeed in large parts of the world where the spirit of internationalism, of which the Commune was one of the earliest examples, lives on. And even in Canada, for so long on the margins of world history, there are those who remember, knowing that the Commune was in many ways the antecedent to the kind of socialist society which we, in supposedly advanced capitalist societies, will one day seek to evolve.

THE EVENTS LEADING UP to the Commune are straight forward enough. The defeat of Napoleon III's armies at the hands of the Prussians in the summer of 1870 set loose a wave of political sentiment that had been pent up for 20 years. With the abdication of the Pretender-Prince in Sept. 1870, Paris immediately pressed for the establishment of a republic, and for national unity against the occupier.

But the French bourgeoisie, led by Thiers, had other ideas, and through the fall and winter of 1870-1, bolstered by the support of conservative, rural France, it negotiated with the Prussians, seeking to crush the spirit of republicanism and radical Paris.

Despite the economic collapse that had followed the French defeat, the Versailles Assembly tried to enforce rent collection from the destitute working poor. Despite the presence of the Prussian Army at the gates of Paris, that same Assembly sought to disarm the Paris National Guard, a popular militia, and hence a threat to the monarchical and bourgeois forces that had already sold out France. It was this attempt at suppression by the troops of the right-wing Versailles Government that led to the proclamation of the Commune on March 18, 1871.

Henri Lefebvre, in his account of the Commune, has recreated the atmosphere that surrounded the event:

ON THE NIGHT OF THE 18th to the 19th of March, the state, the army, the police, everything which weighs down human lives from outside and from above, was dissolved, evaporated, disappeared, the state, this cold monster among monsters, falls to pieces, while its debris, its clerks and bureaucracy are removed to Versailles. . . .

Paris awakens to a new youth; in one stroke it has put into practice what a man who is scarcely known, Marx, has proclaimed in theory: the end of human alienation. It is necessary to act quickly and with imagination. That morning everything is possible, because the things which make life impossible had disappeared

Paris awakens free, the first free city since cities came into existence. She will attempt to live a new life, the new life in which men take their destiny into their own hands.

On a well-defined social base, neither too large nor too small - the district, men will participate in public affairs, their own affairs. They will create a system of direct democracy, of free and joyful work; they will organize decentralization.

LIKE ALL TRULY REVOLUTIONARY EVENTS, the Commune seemed to open the door to a new era of history, to the direct assumption by the working people of Paris of control over their own lives, to political and social relations totally different from those prevailing in bourgeois-dominated states.

The anarchist Bakunin first observed that the Commune was a repudiation of the very concept of the state. Or at least of that state which throughout history had represented the oppression of people by their rulers, of workers and farmers by arrests and police and courts and government administrators, of regions by an all-powerful centre.

To the forced unity of the bourgeois state, the Paris Commune opposed the free union of autonomous communes, in which the people, through direct democratic assemblies, would regulate and administer their affairs, and collectively control the decision-making of the nation at large. To the old power of the administrators and exploiters, the Commune opposed the power of workers, militiamen, and citizens to directly control their institutions. To the division of labour between capitalist and worker, ruler and subject, the Commune opposed the collective right of the people to take equal part in determining their political, economic and social relations.

DURING THE TWO SHORT MONTHS of its existence, besieged by the troops of Versailles, cut off from communication with the workers and peasants in other parts of France, the Paris Commune provided a lesson of revolutionary practice not soon to be forgotten.

All officials were elected by the people, came from its ranks, and could be recalled at any time. Old debts going back to the Second Empire were cancelled, and closed workshops and factories were turned over directly to the working class for operation. The militia was popular in composition, its leadership was democratically elected, including in its ranks Poles, Hungarians and representatives of other oppressed nationalities, a symbol of proletarian internationalism. Women played a crucial role in the organization and defence of the Commune, and were to suffer as severely as men in the executions and deportations that followed its destruction.

But the Commune was not a revolutionary utopia. It included in its ranks not only workers, but shopkeepers, middle class patriots and others disgusted by the treason of the Versailles Government. It came far short of challenging capitalist property relations head on. Although the Communards occupied the Bank of France, they refused to confiscate its assets for their own use. Nor was the Commune, for all the enthusiasm of its population, able to produce the kind of revolutionary leaders, civilian and military, that would have helped translated its dreams into enduring reality.

THE CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH it had to operate were difficult in the extreme. The Versailles army was merciless, executing all prisoners, and forcing the Communards to react with revolutionary violence against the far smaller number of hostages in their hands. The city was weakened from the 1870 War and from the siege, with food supplies running low. The population, not least the working class, was far more preoccupied with survival than with working out the niceties of a future socialist society.

Nonetheless, as Marx observed, the Commune was the harbinger of a new society. To the class government of Versailles and the appropriating few it opposed the rule of the working majority.

Martyrs, alas, the Commune produced in great abundance. During the bloody week at the end of May when the Versailles armies entered Paris, thousands and tens of thousands of working class Parisians died in the street and house fighting and summary executions which were the marks of bourgeois "justice".

MEN, WOMEN, AND CHILDREN were shot dead, while many of the survivors were deported, under indescribable conditions, to exile and slow death in New Caledonia. Thus did the bourgeoisie celebrate its triumph over the people of Paris.

But the spirit of the Commune was not snuffed out that easily. Among the many songs and poems of the Commune figures the "Internationale", with its uncompromising call to revolution:

*Debout! les damnés de la terre!
Debout! les forcés de la faim!
La raison tonne en son cratère
C'est l'éruption de la fin.
Du passé faisons table rase,
Foule esclave, debout! debout!
Le monde va changer de base.
Nous ne sommes rien, soyons tout!*

Wherever revolutionaries have fought and gathered, it has been the anthem of their struggle. During the May 1968 events, the streets of Paris vibrated once again to its sound.

BEYOND SYMBOLISM, THE COMMUNE has a particular relevance to us in North America a hundred years later.

For the Commune occurred in what was, at the time, one of the most advanced bastions of industrial capitalism, and against a bourgeois state in more than one way analogous to our own. The distinction between ruler and ruled, between administration, courts, police, and army on the one hand, people on the other, is no mere metaphor in describing the nature of power relationships in contemporary Quebec and Canada. The events of October, 1970, with the massive deployment of repression by Ottawa in defence of the bourgeoisie and its status quo is eloquent testament to this, if we needed any reminding. The relationship of Trudeau to American imperialism bears no small analogy to that between Thiers and his patron, Bismarck. The Commune carried within itself the seeds of the kind of socialism which despite tremendous changes in the scale of technology and capitalism, still speaks to our own needs.

THE MODEL OF A DECENTRALIZED SOCIETY, based on direct worker and popular control over social institution, the disappearance of the distinction between governor and governed which has been the dream of all great revolutionaries including Marx and the Lenin of State and Revolution, a society serving the class interests of those who work, not those who appropriate social wealth for their own use, a sense of community and nation which is at the same time profoundly international in its embrace, are all elements which conscious revolutionaries would scorn at their peril.

In celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the Paris Commune we are not simply commemorating the past. We are, rather, renewing our ties with a tradition of class struggle and revolutionary imagination which is the mirror of our own future. There is no more fitting way to salute the memory of the Communards — than in dedicating ourselves to the struggle for revolution and humanity in our own society.

BLACK SUDANESE CRY OUT

RUSSIAN-ARAB IMPERIALISM CONTINUES IN SUDAN

Considerable attention and sympathy has been given by western news media and student circles in recent years to the Black struggle for freedom and dignity in South Africa, Angola, and Mozambique. But the Sudanese war, the largest and bloodiest Black African struggle for freedom, has escaped western attention. Lately, Black Sudanese students in America have organized in an attempt to publicize their cause. The following is one of their reports.

UBSSA Fifth Annual Conference

BLUFFTON, OHIO

DECEMBER 26-29, 1970

RESOLUTIONS

We the members of the Union of Black Sudanese Students in America, meeting at Bluffton, Ohio, between December 26 - 29, 1970, resolve the following:

1. We fully and whole heartedly support and solidly stand united behind the struggle of the Southern Sudanese Black Africans for their human survival, cultural identity, political, economic, religious, social freedom, human dignity and justice. We will do our best to contribute to these causes in the areas which are compatible with our duties as Southern Sudanese African students. In this respect we will emphasize the following activities:
 - a) Educating our masses at home and abroad to recognize their obligations and duties to their cause.
 - b) Educating the world public opinion to the plight of the Southern Sudanese African people.
 - c) Exposing to the world in whatever way possible, the atrocities, and the genocide being committed against the Southern Sudanese African people by the Sudanese Moslem Arabs, who have declared a systematic war of racial extermination in the Southern Sudan, with the help of the Arab countries, the Soviet Union, Red China and other Communist block nations.
2. We call upon the Black African people of the Sudan to rally together in a stronger solidarity than ever before to face the struggle for their racial and cultural survival. It is note worthy that the Arabs have overplayed the religious issue in the struggle of the south in order to divide the African population in the country. Some of the present vanguards of the Southern Sudanese African struggle are Southern Sudanese African Moslems. We strongly urge all Black Africans, Moslems and Christians alike, to unite and fight the Arabs for their very existence.
3. We appeal to individual African countries, their governments and leaders to intervene to end the Arab genocidal war in the Southern Sudan. The liquidation of the Black Southern African people by the Arabs makes meaningless the notion of African unity and independence.
4. We call on the organization of African Unity and heads of African states and governments to recognize the double standards with which the Arabs are dealing with them; they are permitting no discussion of such grave racial, political, social, economic and cultural conflicts such as the Southern Sudan problem in the OAU on the pretext that it is an internal issue, while at the same time, allowing the Arab League to act as a war cabinet against the Black African people of the Southern Sudan. The Arab League participates in the War in the Sudan by ordering the Russian and Egyptian military planes and pilots, as well as 25,000 Egyptian and Libyan ground troops, against the Black African people of the Southern Sudan.
5. We appeal to all peace loving nations and people of the world to support the just cause of the Black African people of the Southern Sudan against Arab subjugation and enslavement and against Russian and Chinese imperialism.
6. We call on all of the Southern Sudanese students wherever they may be to mobilize and regard themselves as the torch bearers of the Southern Sudanese people's struggle and to do whatever they can to help inform the world at large about the Arab criminal acts and genocide in the Southern Sudan.
7. We call on all Black Sudanese students and their Unions wherever they may be to consolidate and to form an overall Black Sudanese National Students Union immediately before the end of the year 1971.
 - a) To spearhead unity within the Black Sudanese people.
 - b) To act as a spokesman for the Black Sudanese Students and people at international student organizations.

Your world — as the candidates see it

This week The Varsity asked each SAC presidential and/or vice-presidential slate to answer six questions, formulated, by the Varsity staff after much discussion to attempt to ferret out any relevant issues in the race. Candidates were requested to keep their answers to a 750 word maximum.

The unexpurgated (er, um . . . except for limitations of space at the printer — jon) questions and answers are printed here below.

- QUESTIONS:
1. What do you consider to be the major goals for the student movement within the university?
 2. What tactics do you consider to be legitimate for the attainment of these goals?
 3. What role do you see for the SAC in achieving these goals?
 4. What is your reaction to the strike and subsequent disruptions in the Faculty of Arts and Science?
 5. Why do you think you can do the best job as president/vice-president?
 6. Aside from glory and prestige what are you after?

Dahlke

- The major goals of the student movement within the university should be the achievement of relevant education and relevant contributions to the society.
- Any non-violent action can be considered to be legitimate.
- In achieving these goals SAC should support course unions and the professional societies, and if necessary, SAC should become directly involved.

- Strikes and disruptions if sanctioned by the student body can be relevant and useful tools in achieving these goals. However, the last strike was not sanctioned and should not have received SAC support.
- I would like to see SAC assume a position of non-political involvement.
- The Blue and White Society should receive increased support in the form of grants from SAC. SAC's loan and legal aid plans should be expanded. Professional faculties should receive rebates from SAC in relation to the services received from SAC. SAC should oppose suggested fee hikes attributed to transportation costs at the suburban colleges, and oppose the new government loan program (CORSAP).

Reduction in the size of the SAC bureaucracy and the assumption of an apolitical policy would allow SAC to reallocate student fees more responsibly.
p.s. (glory and prestige — fuck off)

Dick-Slater

There are many goals for the student movement within the university. However, the SAC is a large and often unwieldy body, and should therefore concentrate its efforts on a few major areas. Alternate proposals to the EOB-CORSAP scheme must be initiated, with the initiative coming from the students themselves.

Another major area for student involvement is under the broad title of "university government", an area in which a workable solution for student representation in the decision-making process must be achieved.

But, undoubtedly, the prime goal for the student movement is attaining a sense of community within this university. And, along with it, we are faced with the task of making the present educational process more meaningful to the students.

We condemn any sort of violence or disruptive tactics that may be used towards the attainment of our goals. Confrontation should be an absolute last resort, only after every alternative has been exhausted, namely negotiations on a one-to-one level. Confrontation leads to alienation, and, if our case is not great, public reaction could kill the impetus of the movement.

Students could easily be mobilized in opposition to the present EOB-CORSAP proposals, but only after an educational orientation on the gross inadequacies in the present scheme. This opposition could successfully be carried to the general public and the government.

Perhaps the best method of attaining some measure of community within this university is to strive for the rapid completion of the Campus Centre Project. We would also advocate an increased Cultural Affairs budget in order to allow for an extensive programme of social activities and student services, such as the Blue and White, Legal Aid and SHOUT.

The SAC is representative of the entire student body of this university and is, in effect, the only body having sufficient prestige and power to campaign effectively in opposition to the EOB and CORSAP proposals. SAC has a definite role to play in disputes which affect the entire university. Local educational reform is best left to the course unions.

SAC also has a role to play in university government, as it can effectively serve as a mediator (representing the students) among the various estates of the university.

The SAC can also take the initiative in trying to unify the various colleges and faculties, and provide a greater sense of communication between them.

How can one expect faculty to be convinced that students are responsible enough to accept the responsibility of parity if the students cannot deal rationally with the attainment of parity.

Owen Dick will do the best job as president because he can effectively deal with the administrative tasks inherent in the position. His enthusiasm and energy will carry him unruffled through the emotional, political, and bureaucratic troubles of the SAC presidency, as well as the normal day-to-day turmoil.

Dave Slater will do the best job as vice-president because he has the experience of co-ordinating attempts to produce a feasible scheme of finances for the SAC. He also could contribute to the realization of enthusiasm in the realm of social activities and student services.

Quite simply, we are after the attainment of the goals which we have described above. We are certainly after the satisfaction which is inherent in the successful completion of anyone's original purpose.

The SAC presidency and vice-presidency does not really provide one with an opportunity for glory and prestige, but it does provide one with the opportunity to implement various policies that will directly benefit you, the U of T student. It is an opportunity to draw this multiversity into a closer-knit university community, and this is primarily what we are after.

Klein-Curtin

We want to turn this university upside down — to make it serve our needs and the needs of the society at large. We don't want to just change the university — we want to change the world. As students, this is where we can start.

Right now we have no control over this place. They can raise tuition, cutback grants, decrease enrollment, neglect student housing — make it hard for us and impossible for our brothers and sisters who don't have the means to get to

We could turn this university into a useful institution. During the War Measures Act crisis or during the parity struggle SAC could have attempted to mobilize the students.

The major goal of the student movement is a university which serves the society, which is relevant to us.

The goal is the end of the universities' oppression of women, its war research, its irrelevance.
The goal is the liberation of humanity.

stamps rather than as forums for mass democratic decision-making.

We never really formulated concrete demands. Although the administration was clearly the body who had the power to change the situation, we never focused pressure on it.

The council was disrupted, because it was making illegitimate decisions, which were going to affect our lives as students.

Sure a lot of mistakes were made during the struggle, but we have to remember that this is only the first percolation (sic) of the student movement and that we've learned a lot from this experience. Next time we won't make the same errors — we've got a lot more to learn — this is the only the beginning; we'll continue the struggle.

● We think that we would be the best candidates for the positions, not because of individual strengths or weaknesses, but because of our program. We are the only ones who have a conception of how to combat the alienation and oppressive atmosphere of the university. We know that it's not going to just come by piecemeal reform here and there but by a fundamental change.

● The other candidates don't have a clue as to what needs to be done to solve the problems of students. They think it can be done by sitting on committees and passing motions in SAC. We know that the only way students will get the kind of university they need is by mass struggle, and that it's not going to be easy. The Board of Governors that makes the decisions at this university aren't going to give up their power willingly.

In 1968, SAC's University Commissioner persuaded the Association of Teaching Staff to endorse the SAC proposal for the Commission on University Government rather than President Bissell's plan.

When other tactics fail, we are prepared to ask the student body to take firm action. Tactics such as boycotts should only be employed if they are endorsed in a referendum. The changes which students are seeking can never justify violence.

● SAC must avoid violent disruption and recognize that a solution to the current impasse will only be found in reasoned discussion. Legitimate filibustering has thus far prevented conservative faculty from dictating the terms of future student participation on the Faculty Council.

● SAC is facing an erosion of student support. It cannot afford to spend another year drifting without direction. SAC must firmly commit itself to university reform.

We ask for your support; Bob Spencer: Education Commissioner, Parity Restructuring Committee member, Math and Physics Course Union president, Education Co-ordinator for Pollution Probe. Phil Dack: SAC Executive member, Students' Administrative Government of Erindale, Presidents' Advisory Committee on Housing, Students' Facilities Committee.

Services to students are also greatly lacking. Parking, housing, residence costs, a campus centre, textbook costs, summer jobs, day care, legal aid are all issues on which the Vice-President can give detailed emphasis where the President can give only passing concern.

I have dedicated this year to the revitalization of the Blue and White Society, and I present this success to you as my assurance that I would make every effort to accomplish my goals in the social, cultural and service activities, if I am elected.

I offer my experience and my expertise for the improvement of SAC's service to you.

● I am not after glory and I have all the prestige I can handle. I am after making SAC a financially and administratively competent body, that can meet the needs of the students in an efficient and effective manner. Otherwise more and more faculties and colleges will wish to withdraw from SAC. I could not oppose such a move unless SAC begins to show that it can give students value for their money and their confidence. I am also after making the job of vice-president a more responsible position on the executive of SAC, in which the man elected makes a specific contribution that is not duplicated by other executive members, or is not duplicative of other executive members.

● We don't think sitting on presidential advisory committees or in little rooms in the SAC office are going to change much. Little groups of people conspiring to trash Simcoe Hall aren't either. It is only when SAC uses its resources to involve and mobilize the whole student body, when we all join together to demand what we need, that we will get what we want. We stand for mass action. Tactics in particular situation depend on the extent of support and the decisions of the people involved. SAC shouldn't decide the tactics and make it a pre-condition for their support — we have to do these things together.

● SAC can use its resources to research exactly what's going down in this institution. But that's not enough! SAC must take all the results of their research, their resources and put them to use through informing, mobilizing and uniting with the students. SAC must implement the concept of mass democracy. Mass meetings which really discuss alternatives and make decisions must become a tradition on this campus.

● There were lots of problems in the whole parity struggle and the way it was organized. Not enough was done to involve students; mass meetings were looked on as rubber pupes co-operatives have successfully reduced textbook prices, housing costs and food prices.

Any serious student union must deal with the employment crisis facing students in the summer. SAC should insist that the federal government properly utilize its $50 million allocation for students.

The annual student employment crisis is a result of the large number of students who flood the labour market in the summer months. A semester system permits university enrollment to be rationalized.

But open meetings are not sufficient. The low priority given to student housing, to teaching and to curriculum reform reflects the distribution of power in this university. Fundamental change is essential.

Although we recognize that parity is not a universally applicable principle, we insist on implementation of the CUG recommendations for equal faculty/student representation on the higher levels of university government.

SAC has an important role to play in helping Scarborough and Erindale students to obtain suitable housing, and resist the proposed parking and transportation fee.

● There are some areas in which the most effective tactic is a strong presentation of the student view. In 1967 and 1968 student loans were increased substantially after SAC organized a protest against the provincial government. Also wonder why $150 is allocated for SAC for the election expenses of a Vice-Presidential candidate, when his ultimate usefulness to the organization is questionable.

In order to become a useful position, the Vice-Presidency must be reformed and recast as a significant executive member of SAC. It is with this intention that I am running.

The President must be familiar and involved in all aspects of SAC activity. Though hopefully the Vice-President will be equally well versed in SAC's affairs, he must be so only as an independent guardian of the student interest. If his ideas are only a duplication of the President's, then he himself is a duplication of the President.

The Vice-President is not a full-time bureaucrat. He should devote his scarce energy and resources to solving only a few specific problems for which he has some expertise. Each year these problems may be different but they should always be distinct from the areas handled by the other executive members.

At the present time the social and cultural life on this campus is at an all-time low because SAC has progressively lowered its budgetary emphasis on this part of university life. For example, SAC no longer supports the Blue and White Band or the cheerleaders and its allocation to the Blue and White Society is a paltry $5,000 loan, (compared to the $80,000 social grant at Waterloo University).

omitting the Indians, Women, and the Québécois. They can hire who they want — Americans over Canadians, men over women. They can research war and neglect pollution.

This university upholds the status quo of poverty, unemployment and racism.

It doesn't take a stand on social issues. It doesn't use its facilities and resources for the benefit of the majority of Canadians.

And it doesn't give us a decent education either.

We want to take the power out of the hands of the Board of Governors. The Young Socialists have stood for student staff control since their birth. We want to build a powerful united student movement with a SAC that leads, organizes and mobilizes, that can ally with staff and do this.

We want power over our own lives in this institution. During the Kent-Cambodia crisis last May in the States, ten million American students went on strike. In Seattle, Berkeley, Chicago and other places they occupied their campuses. They gave counter classes on the nature of the war, they opened up the school to the community and the anti-war movement, they used the mimeos, the telephones, the lecture facilities to organize massive anti-war sentiment in the country.

● During the past two years SAC has failed to develop concrete programs to meet student needs. Rhetoric has too often been substituted for action.

Some candidates believe that SAC should concentrate on improving the campus social life. With the slogan "more for you" they seek a mandate to return to the 1950s. But surely the increasing concern over education and university government is proof that a better social program will not meet all the needs of university students.

We believe that SAC must continue on the path of university reform. The 1950s cannot be recaptured.

SAC's priorities should include (a) improving its services, (b) lowering the cost of university, (c) democratizing the university, and (d) working for educational reform.

● We recognized the need for a revitalized Blue and White Society. That organization should receive an increased loan and a $1,000 grant. However, the primary responsibility for social programs rests with local student councils. Centralization will not improve social life on this campus.

Specific services that SAC should expand include the loan fund and the legal aid service. Money should also be made available for expanded circulation of college and professional student publications.

SAC can make a major contribution by initiating programs to reduce the cost of higher education. On other cam-

● There are no goals for the student movement because there is no student movement on this campus. Before SAC can instigate action on student needs, it must first learn what those needs are. In the past SAC has dictated what it felt the student needs were.

If I am elected I will make the effort to see that the legitimate needs of students are recognized. This year I have been close to the pulse of the students, and I feel that I have a good knowledge of what students want.

● From a concern for student needs SAC will be able to define its goals more clearly. It will be surprised to find that when the students are behind it, heavy-handed tactics will not be necessary to attain these goals.

● SAC can only have a role in achieving the goals of the students of this university, if it is willing to adopt those goals from student needs, instead of dictating the goals to us.

● The campaign for strike action in the Faculty of Arts and Sciences was poorly managed. The strike vote was lost because of poor campaign strategy. Competent leaders could have gotten the message across a lot better than those who were assigned.

● What is a Vice-President? According to the SAC Constitution the sole official duty of the Vice-President is to be the President when the latter is not around. This makes one Part of the summer camp idea described here, is a set of semi-permanent structures like this.

Counsellors would be the key at this summer camp for boys

This article, written by U of T students Don Ross, Gary Price and Norm Hiscocks, describes a project they hope to see get underway this summer. Their proposal for a summer camp for "juvenile delinquents", has a radical focus which departs from standard social practice.

WE ARE THREE UNIVERSITY STUDENTS, two architects and an artsman, who feel we can set up social programmes to alleviate some of the problems which occur in our society. We may be radical in our thinking but not in the methods by which we hope to implement our programmes. We have no desire to protest or blatantly destroy the system, but to slowly change the system from within. All we ask is to be given the opportunity to attempt to find out whether our concepts are feasible and if so to see some changes implemented in the existing system.

One of our tentative programmes is to build a summer camp for so-called incorrigible juvenile delinquents. The camp would last for a period of two to three weeks, but the radical difference between this camp and others would be the staff.

The counsellors would be ex-convicts, men who have participated in the extreme forms of anti-social behavior and have paid the penalties that society extracts from those who deviate from the accepted social norms.

We feel that if these men were willing to share their experiences and wisdom that they have gained by paying their dues in life, the boys would listen and empathize with these men much better than they could with any social worker. It is a concept that has been tried with great success in the treatment of chronic alcoholics and drug users.

WE HOPE TO BE ALLOWED TO TAKE 24 wayward boys from a provincial correctional institution, these boys would range in age from fourteen to sixteen. We also hope to scour the federal penitentiary system for four men who have the tact and ability to act as counsellors.

We fully realize the dangers of putting 28 people together who have demonstrated their anti-social behaviour patterns so we would like two of the best social scientist available in Canada, a psychiatrist and a sociologist to observe the interaction in the camp. These men would be able to judge the success or failure of the purpose of the camp.

WE ARE NOW NEGOTIATING with the University of Toronto and the Department of Lands and Forests for a projected site at Dorset in the U of T forest in the Haliburton area. We have designed a set of structures which we feel would be conducive to promoting the type of interaction we hope to see take place in the camp. These will be semi-permanent structures so that when the camp is not in use only three tent platforms will be left behind which can be used for any other purpose the University sees fit to use them for.

We are negotiating with various influential persons to sit on the board of directors of a charitable foundation we hope to establish to solicit the funds we will require to implement our programmes.

THE SUMMER CAMP IS ONLY ONE programme we hope to start. We have plans in the areas of student summer work programmes, perhaps a chain of student boutiques to merchandise various items students could manufacture in small workshops. We hope to set up a capital fund to assist various groups of students to get their own small businesses or programmes off the ground.

There is no end to the number of goods and services various students could provide the public if they had the capital and the initiative to work on their own. Babysitting, confectionaries, collecting re-saleable scrap, refundable bottles, doing various odd-jobs, you name it and a group of students should be able to acquire the capital and the knowledge to accomplish whatever task they set out to do.

WE FEEL THAT WE CAN ACT AS CATALYSTS, we enjoy being idea men, dealing with influential people, building real things to help others help themselves. We feel that our charitable foundation, University Social Action Programmes, is the method by which we can accomplish our various goals. Canadian society must worship the god of technology less and become more "people orientated" and we intend to do our small part to see that this basic change in values and thinking comes about.

SAC candidates vie for Architects' votes

Debate centred around the parity issue and the membership of professional schools in SAC at a SAC meeting presidential and vice-presidential candidates meeting Monday afternoon in the Faculty of Architecture's main foyer.

Presidential candidate Owen Dick maintained that professional faculties "get screwed financially" by SAC.

But Bob Spencer, another candidate for president, explained the issue was distorted and that the per capita expenditure on the professional faculties was greater in the last fiscal year than on the Arts and Science faculty.

Alice Klein, a member of the Young Socialists vying for SAC presidency, felt the discussion was a false issue, perpetrating a divide and rule policy.

However, the parity issue most effectively displayed the differences between platforms.

Dick's views on parity and its implementation never became clear, although he was closely questioned. Spencer continued to advocate the recommendations and spirit of the CUG report although he saw it as a serious compromise of the student position and only one step in the direction of student control.

Klein stated the Young Socialist position on parity — students should have parity on all top governing structures equal to the representation of all other university estates combined. Implementation depended, in her view, on a mass mobilization of students to pressure the administration into parity.

Bob Spencer and his running mate, Phil Dack, stated their intentions to keep the Campus Centre Project above the political in-fighting of the SAC where they feel it has languished for the past year.

Owen Dick's and Dave Slater's main platform was "fiscal responsibility" in the coming SAC government. They intend to expose what they call the incompetence and inconsistency of the previous council. They gave as an example of this, the $5,000-grant to the Black Students Union.

Bernie Teitelbaum represented Mo Wartzman, who was in Waterloo at a Conference on Campus Recreation at the time of the forum.

Teitelbaum said that Wartzman stands for an expanded "social policy" — a channeling of more SAC resources into promoting the social functions that will hold commuter students on campus after classes.

Skule to vote today on SAC fee rebate

By JEAN BUBBA

Today and Thursday, Engineers will go to the polls to determine whether or not they want a 50 per cent fees rebate from SAC.

Under the direction of referendum campaign manager, Paul Cadario (II APSC), all engineering classes were approached by referendum supporters distributing information flyers and encouraging people to vote.

"The response has been better than we expected," said Cadario. "If the Faculty of Arts and Sciences can get a 60 per cent turnout, there is no way Engineering will get less than an 80 per cent turnout. The issue is too close to home for any engineer not to realize what is happening."

Eight ballot boxes, specially marked with the referendum colour yellow, have been set up in various strategic locations in Engineering. In previous years the faculty has had five ballot boxes.

"Although SAC elections never caused much interest among engineers, we are expecting a heavy turnout and we want to make it easier for them to vote," said Derek Smith (III APSC), the returning officer for APSC.

"Once we get the rebate, we will finally be able to give engineering students more value for their fees dollar," said Miglin.

The response to the engineering referendum from SAC has been minimal.

Since no public forums on the issue were arranged, SAC President, Rod Hurd has been non-committal.

Some concern, however, has been voiced by SAC Information Officer, Ken McEvoy.

"What will I tell Pharmacy and Meds and Forestry when they ask me if they can have a rebate as well?" he asked Cadario.

"Tell them if Engineers can have one, they can have one too," replied Cadario.

"We're not elitist," he added.

Lakehead students sit in to fight professor's firing THUNDER BAY (CUP) — A general student meeting Tuesday called to discuss the non-renewal of Professor V. G. Wightman's contract resulted in a sit-in at Lakehead University.

The students planned to present administration president Tamblin with a petition calling for the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) to arbitrate the case of Professor Wightman.

But Tamblin was off campus at the time of the meeting, so the students decided to wait for him outside his office until he returned. Tamblin showed up about half an hour later and agreed to meet with representatives of a "Students of Arbitration" group along with a faculty representative.

Meanwhile the sit-in is continuing.

IF YES

(a) Would this responsibility be adequately fulfilled by the provision of on-campus residence facilities?

(b) Should residence facilities be augmented by the acquisition of houses for co-op living?

(c) If houses are to be acquired initial capital should come from:

- (i) Student Senate fees
- (ii) SMC Administration
- (iii) Both.

2. Should SMC provide a counselling programme for off-campus housing in addition to the U. of T. Housing Service?

3. Should we assert pressure on the provincial government to provide subsidized housing similar to the Married Student Residence on Charles St.?

4. Do you live in residence, at home, or in off-campus housing?

Marcuse raps on man, freedom since war

The following excerpts are taken from an hour-and-a-half lecture delivered at U of T Saturday by philosopher and writer Herbert Marcuse. The lecture was taped by Erindale lecturer Andre Bennett, and later transcribed and edited by Alex Podnick.

I would like to state at the beginning very frankly my prejudice. I believe that in one way or the other, philosophy is inherently social philosophy and that pure reason inherently tends toward practical reason. A prejudice which, however, I think is very well-founded.

The proposition that philosophy comprehends the world in order to change it didn't have to wait for Marx, to be formulated.

*I believe that it is a central proposition in such a not-at-all radical or revolutionary figure as Plato. What else could be the probable meaning of the famous allegory of the cave in the very centre of The Republic than that man should be free from the prison in which he actually spends his life and brought out into the sunlight where the true potentiality of man and nature, subject and object, can be fulfilled.*

I believe that philosophy from the beginning is based on the notion that in the light of critical thinking the condition of man and the condition of nature appear . . . even as one.

The actual condition of man constrains and distorts the potentiality of man and in this sense I think one can say . . . that the "ought" is indeed implied in the "is". It is implied in the "is" since the philosophical experience of the "is" is not that of a natural fact but as a condition in flux and in concert and that the condition in which men and things exist immediately is a negative condition and that man and things are other than in essence are and can be.

What we have if we add anything to this notion is the division of the world of thinking and the world of reality into essence and appearance, idea and reality. I think we should rather say essence versus appearance, idea versus reality.

And the "is" which becomes the object of philosophy is just a two dimensional antagonistic totality. This is the original conception of philosophy, a conception which drastically from the beginning was retrenched in philosophy.

I think we can speak of philosophy's alienation from this original conception. The inherent imperative, namely the human condition ought to be other than it is. This inherent imperative has become a statement recognition — knowledge, pure knowledge rather than change of existing conditions.

In other words, the relation between idea and reality, essentially between essence and reality, becomes an epistemological or moral tension. Or, in less philosophical terms, what philosophy originally considered and continued to consider as the very essence of man, namely freedom, has been culminated, has been turned into a transcendental conscience.

The freedom of the inner man, freedom of thought, freedom of conscience, freedom of worship, in other words, ideas rather than ideas to be translated into reality. Ideas and values rather than stimuli for action.

In this way, the "is" has been freed from the burden imposed upon it by the "ought", reality has been purged, cleansed from transcending forces and possibilities and not even primarily from metaphysical transcendence . . . out also and equally from empirical and historical transcendence.

In this way, it came about that philosophy hardly ever considered itself responsible for social action nor equipped to contribute to social change. And, if philosophy did contribute to social change, it happened behind the back of the philosopher and without his intention.

For example, the situation of Descartes at the beginning of the modern period: the Cartesian philosophy certainly contributed greatly to actual social change. But certainly not in the intention of Descartes who once said that one could and should guide everything but one should, and I quote, leave "the great public body alone because the philosopher cannot possibly deal with their problems."

It was in this context that capitalist society, that the notion of alienation was developed — alienation as an empirical condition of man, meaning that in their work and in their leisure men do not develop and do not satisfy their own individual needs and faculties. They rather support roles, functions imposed upon them by the requirement of the existing society. You only have to consider this notion formula in order to see that . . . alienation . . . is an historical concept.

Alienation is a social phenomenon.

Alienation is in no way a psychological condition. Personal problems, personal will, personal identity crises, whatever the nice words may mean, have nothing to do with alienation. Alienation is a social phenomenon conditioned by a specific form of society and can be dealt with only on a social scale and in a social practice.

Now, this means recognition of alienation as a social condition, a historical concept that is the result of two interrelated developments, first the secularization and rationalization of society which approximately begins with the French Revolution.

We can distinguish two stages or periods in the struggle for radical change. One goes up to the period after the First World War and to the Bolshevik Revolution. The second period beginning after the Second World War

During the long first period, radical change, should it occur at all still appeared as quantitative change, improvements of already established modes of production and modes of life in general for a large part of the population — even a considerable if not radical change in the basic production relation in the socialist countries

But one thing did not change. The freedom of man as real self-determination has not been established, and unfortunately it makes good sense, in saying that all historical revolutions so far mainly replaced one form of repression by another. And in the last analysis, the unfreedom of man was retained

Now, I do believe and I do admit that what I do here is only to submit to you hypotheses. I don't think that at this time I can go any further. We have indeed entered a new historical stage, a stage in which for the first time quantity may turn into quality. And I believe that we can indeed speak of the spectre of a 20th century or a 21st century revolution which, if it occurs, would be far more relevant and far more total than all preceding revolutions, because for the first time in history it would be and if it can develop itself it would be able to develop new modes of human existence, leading to not alienated relationships between human beings, and to an entirely new relationship between man and nature.

It is in this spectre, or if you prefer image, that such a qualitative revolution actually subverting not only the conscience but also the unconscious, not only the mind but also the sensibility of man, not only the production relation which remains the basis of all social change but also the modes of existence, the modes of life in all its spheres of culture and civilization. This indeed the image, and not only the image which is alive in many protest movements and opposition to wars over the days, in the national liberation movements of the Third World, in the rebellion of oppressed black and brown minorities, and indeed the rebellion of youth in the advanced industrial countries

I believe that after the . . . Second World War what we have reached is what we could call in Marxian terms "the highest stage of the internal contradictions of the capitalist system."

We have on one hand an unprecedented rise in the productivity of labour, a vast material gain attributed to the developed, industrial countries, the impact of technical and scientific progress . . . the consumer society which marks a new and possibly a last stage in the development of the capitalist system on the global scale.

We have, on the other hand, in the face of these unprecedented possibilities for liberation, a social system which apparently can sustain itself only on the basis of neo-colonialism and neo-imperialism, which strives on waste and destruction of resources on an unprecedented scale, which perpetuates poverty although it has all the technical means to abolish poverty, and which has now entered the period of intensified repression of all militant oppression groups

This blatant and very real conflict between potentiality and actuality, between the available possibility of liberation and the reality of the intensified struggle for an alienated existence, this blatant conflict can, I believe, no longer be rationalized for any length of time. It can no longer be justified, because it is obviously untrue, by scarcity or by the immaturity of the human intelligence in these matters

It can no longer be justified, introjected as being presented as the condition of man, the ontological or existential condition of man. Nor, I believe, will the struggle for liberation remain contained in the traditional forms of politics, parliamentary or otherwise.

Job market tough, U of T Placement says

U of T placement director David Currie will be releasing a report soon showing that U of T students are facing an increasingly tough job market.

The first part, which should be available Thursday according to Currie, polls students who have enrolled with the placement centre this year, to find out who has received firm and tentative job offers.

In both cases, the figures will be low, Currie intimated, noting that the report "merely quantifies a gut feeling" that jobs will be near impossible to find for students.

One preliminary result released by the placement centre early in February showed that only 22 per cent of the students interviewed has received firm job offers.

In his one optimistic note Currie last night said that Chemical engineering students have raised their employment percentage to 58 from 38.

The Chemical Engineering Club has been operating its own placement service for some weeks now.

A second report, which Currie refers to as more subjective may produce far-reaching ramifications in the whole placement-centre set-up. It deals with the centre's individual referral service, a sort of sell-them-one-at-a-time system open only to graduating students.

Currie will give no details on this report until it goes before the Placement service advisory committee next week.

ENGINEERS DEMAND 50% SAC REBATE

WHY?

- The rationale behind a 50% rebate is based on the strong position that SAC has taken during the past year in support of the principle of local autonomy. The rebates to Scarborough and Erindale, the support given to Food Sciences, and the strengthening of course unions affirm this principle.
- As a local council, the Engineering Society is in a better position to initiate our own social, educational, and service programs. The rebate will enable the society to undertake these activities.
- With the Engineering Society looking after matters of local concern, SAC will be better able to devote its resources to University Government reform, the Campbell Report on discipline, and the problems of student aid and employment — in short, the problems that concern the University as a whole.
- Engineering Students feel that SAC has an important role to play on this campus. For this reason, we will continue to support the Students' Administrative Council and to participate in its university programs.

600 sit-in, - Saskatoon campus to demand rehiring of Richards (SASKATOON (CUP) — In the face of threatened disciplinary action from the administration, over 600 students re-occupied the upper floors of the University of Saskatchewan Arts tower Monday.

The protest over the department's refusal to re-hire economics professor and NDP Waffler John Richards, culminated in a three day sit-in the preceding week. The sit-in was suspended over the week-end to show students' good faith to faculty, who were meeting.

The department of economics and political science met in closed session on Saturday, and headed by Leo Kristjanson, reaffirmed its decision not to offer Richards a teaching position for next year.

Kristjanson and some administration officials have promised that Richards' planned course on the political economy of Saskatchewan will be created for the fall.

Members of the student steering committee met with Kristjanson and campus principal R. W. Begg on Sunday.

Begg threatened disciplinary action against any students who continued the occupation Monday.

The university administration has been trying to quiet student dissatisfaction with the Richards' case for about six weeks. They appointed a committee, but then decided the committee should make no report because it would set a precedent for non-tured faculty.

Montreal's riot squad busts poor

MONTREAL (CUP) — Montreal's riot squad, 22 carloads and one paddywagon strong, arrested 22 low-income citizens, welfare recipients and social workers Monday.

The arrests marked the end of a four-hour sit-in at one of Montreal's welfare offices.

The welfare officials called in the police and the 150 protestors were ordered to move.

Those who didn't were arrested.

The group spearheaded by the welfare rights and anti-poverty organization, presented welfare officials with a list of demands

- Review of a dozen cases they consider poorly handled by officials
- That welfare recipients be informed of changes in the amounts of their cheques, and told right to appeal and the procedures involved.
- That emergency cases be handled the day they arrive.
- That FRAP be allowed to operate a booth in the welfare office.

They charged the welfare bureaucracy with intolerance and inhumanity.

Intellectual elite meet

Picture yourself and about 15 other students sitting round a blazing fireplace in the cosy living room of trendy political economist Stephen Clarkson and his television hostess-cum-novelist wife, Adrienne.

The group is discussing, in best scholastic academic tradition, two papers, one by law student Kathy Newman on working class organization in London in the 1790's, the other by UC history student Michael Scherk on "respectable thuggery".

Former SAC Communications Commissioner Brian Hayes is shuffling around on the floor, trying to cover up the mud marks his shoes left on the carpet.

Rhodes Scholar and former UC Lit president Herman Siegel parades in on crutches halfway through the first paper, throwing the gathering into an uproar. Siegel tore his leg ligaments in an intramural hockey game last week.

Scherk climaxes his paper on aristocratic violence with the remark of one English peer to another in an Elizabethan land dispute: "Stuff a turd between your teeth". The listeners try not to laugh.

The scene is the most recent meeting of the U of T Historical Society, last Thursday evening.

The Historical Society originated as an academic discussion group sponsored by the History department. Financial support ended about five years ago when the Society was considered no longer particularly relevant to the department's academic program.

The tradition continues, however, of senior faculty and administrators inviting the group to their homes for discussion and refreshments. Among this year's hosts are University College principal A. C. H. Hallett, Arts and Science dean A. D. Allen, History chairman A. P. Thornton, Provost Jack Sword, and President Claude Bissell.

Some of the hosts have ventured that the Historical Society is somewhat less historical and more society than they were led to believe. The graciously proffered food and beer seem at least as important to Society members as the opportunity for academic conviviality.

Now that ethics of openness and democracy are rampant in the university even the Historical Society is bending to the winds of change. This spring, invitations for membership will be sent out as usual, along with an ad in The Varsity. The first 12 to 15 responses will be accepted without examination of pedigree.

Did the Iron Dukes Dive?

Duke sees shady dealings in UC-Law game

By THE DUKE

Having witnessed UC's rape of the Iron Dukes of Law, the other teams remaining in the 1971 inter-fac basketball playoffs are no more than pretenders.

LAW TAKES A DIVE!

At the Jarvis House on Monday over a brew, the Duke witnessed a large pecuniary interaction involving three prominent Iron Dukes (Yunkus, Slates and The Black Hand) and a seedy Mafioso, known locally as Big Ralph.

On Tuesday night, this seemingly meaningless exchange took on insidious connotations as the UC Bombers dropped trou all over Law by a 90-57 count.

The sibling rivalry between Allen "The Goon" Sternberg and Ron "The Platypus" Sternberg which was to be the highlight of the evening was no contest.

The Platypus and Mike "Bumper" Betcherman each scored close to thirty points for UC.

After the game, The Duke conducted an interview with Bumper at Grossman's. Having imbibed a number of beer, Bumper approached his hero, The Duke, whereupon laudations evolved.

The Duke was praised for his fine sense of judgment and for his insight into the integral activity of basketball. The Duke recovered momentarily and praised Bumper on his fine overall play.

At this point, Bumper suggested a one-on-one between The Duke and himself. When The Duke consented, Bumper replied that "I feel honoured that The Duke would personally agree to play one-on-one with me."

When The Duke went on to tell

Bumper that he was one of the five finalists for the MVP award, Bumper was flabbergasted.

Coach Ginsberuo of UC, who reportedly was to suit up for the Law tilt, was benched by a case of hives.

Notes: Because of the untimely death of our beloved Chip Pigley who, in a fit of despair resulting from a violent quarrel with The Duke, became Metro's 10th sub-way suicide, Dr. Fager and The Duke were left with the task of choosing an interfac all-star team.

FIRST TEAM: Dave Quick, Vic, guard; John Champman, PHE, guard; Randy Filinski, PHE, forward; Mike Betcherman, UC, forward; Jack Pascht, UC, forward; Bob Cheeseman, PHE, coach.

SECOND TEAM: Gordie Betcherman, UC, guard; Ivan Betcherman, New, guard; Allen Sternberg, Law, forward; Lindsay Horenblas, New, forward; Mike Mullins, SMC A, forward; Brian Stevens, Vic, and Mark Slater, Sr. Engineering (tie), coach.

Vic and PHE continue their semi-final series tonight beginning at 7:00 p.m. in Hart House. Vic won the first game of the two-game total point match-up by a 71-66 margin.

The first game of the best-of-three Sifton Cup final between UC, defending chaps, and the winner of tonight's Vic-PHE game will be played next Tuesday evening with the second game scheduled for the following night.

A third game, if necessary, will be played next Friday.

Riflemen end with gang bang

The University of Toronto Rifle team recently sent its six-man team to Kingston for a shoulder-to-shoulder match rifle competition with host RMC and another guest team, Sienna College from New York State.

Varsity's young squad had difficulty steadying their aim because of their 6:00 a.m. departure time from their home range at Hart House.

Overall, the match was a success although the U of T team did not defeat RMC or Sienna. However, they did gain a great deal of experience and should be a strong contender for RMC next year when they meet again.

Notes: Last Saturday, the team travelled to Guelph for their final meet of the year. When the smoke had finally cleared, the rifle Blues had been narrowly edged, 1066-1061... A five-man team represented the club at Guelph.

TOYOTA

Meet again today as at 12:30

Even overtime can't settle Vic-PHE series

By LYNDON LITTLE

PhysEd A and Vic I will meet in Varsity arena at 12:30 this afternoon to continue their interfac hockey squabble they couldn't settle Monday night.

Monday's game was scheduled to be the final match of their two-game, total point Jennings Cup semi-final series but the two teams finished regulation time tied 4-4 on the round and then battled through four scoreless overtime periods.

The PhysEders, champs of the first division, took the first game last Friday by a 2-0 score but the Vic crew fought back to take Monday's tilt, 4-2.

THE WINNER of today's game will meet Sr. Engineering, who defeated St. Mike's, 4-3 Monday afternoon, in the Cup final slated to begin Friday night at 6:30 p.m.

Vic shocked John Wright's PHE squad as they came out flying Monday night and by the end of the second period led 4-0 in the game and 4-2 on the round.

Phil Adams scored twice in the first period and Wayne Howard once while Gerry Kalata notched the only score of the second, a power-play effort late in the stanza.

However, Wright — perhaps taking a lesson from his Varsity mentor, Tom Watt — managed to shake his team out of their lethargy as PHE began skating, scoring the only two goals of the stanza on markers by Rod Brown and Pat Cumerford to tie the series 4-4.

The PhysEders had a great chance to win it all in regulation time when Vic assessed a bench minor for too many men on the ice with just a little more than a minute left to play.

ON THE ENSURING PHE powerplay, both pointmen, Kent Duncan and Robbie Ellis, let go with dangerous blasts. Duncan's shot rattled off the crossbar then Vic netminder Greg Lyons had to come up with a great save to snare Ellis' sizzler.

PhysEd forced a faceoff in the Vic end with only four seconds remaining but were unable to get a shot on Lyons.

"I thought about pulling our goalie (Paul Rocks) for an extra attacker for that final faceoff," said Wright. "However, the guys wouldn't go for it."

Both teams had their opportunities during the four scoreless five-minute periods of sudden-death overtime but neither group was able to get the goal necessary to put them in the final.

"I think I'll need at least a week's rest to recover from all this," said a shaky Wright who has just finished captaining the hockey Blues through four consecutive playoff victories — each by a one-goal margin — to their fifth national title in the last six years.

A three-goal second period outburst that tied the score at 3-3 sparked the Engineers to their victory over St. Mikes. The plumbers then went on to score the winner late in the final stanza.

The first game of the series, played last Thursday night, ended in a 2-2 draw.

THE ENGINEERS, who emerged from the regular season's play as runners-up in the first division, got two goals from Greg Cleland plus single markers from Wayne Hunter and Gord Currie. Pete Cullen drew two assists.

For St. Mikes, who were fourth place finishers in the first division, slick centre Don Pagnutti scored twice with Steve White getting the other. Tony Merlocco had a pair of helpers.

NOTES: The second game of the final series between Engineers and the winner of this afternoon's Vic-PHE clash has been pushed ahead to Monday afternoon at 12:30. The third and fourth matches, if necessary, are set for next Tuesday and Thursday night starting at 6:30 p.m.

Spencer, Dack sweep SAC race

New pres.
wins by 796 votes

By LINDA McQUAIG

The Spencer-Dack team has captured the leadership of SAC for next year.

In a 25 per cent voting turnout, Spencer got 2,625 votes, edging out his nearest presidential rival, Owen Dick, by 796 votes. Phil Dack gained a margin of 668 votes over his closest vice-presidential competitor, Dave Slater.

Spencer and Dack's heaviest support came from Erindale (Dack's own college), St Mike's and the Sid Smith polling booths.

In the presidential race, Lawrence Dahlke came third with 98D votes, followed by Alice Klein with 519. Mo Wortzman was third in the vice-presidential category with 655, edging out Katie Curtin who picked up 59D votes.

The engineering vote heavily supported the two engineering candidates Dahlke and Slater, (as well as Dick, Slater's presidential running mate).

The large engineering turnout was the main source of support for the Dick-Slater team. Slater gained 858 of the 12D2 vice-presidential votes from the engineering polls. The engineering presidential vote was more divided, with 567 going to Dahlke and 488 to Dick.

The Young Socialist candidates, Alice Klein and Katie Curtin, who ran on a women's liberation ticket, almost doubled the YS vote of last year. This gain was relative, however, since both came last in their categories.

The Spencer-Dack team was victorious at all the college polling booths, with overwhelming support for Dack coming from Erindale where he captured 632 of the 739 vice-presidential votes. Dnce again a suburban college was the key to the election.

The Scarborough turnout was small compared to Erindale, but also supported Spencer and Dack.

Dick and Slater drew their support from several of the professional faculties, Engineering, Law, Dentistry, and Forestry.

The surprise of the election was the Architecture vote, which went to both Klein and Curtin.

"We'll try hard," say winners

By MARIS PAVELSON
and ANDREA WAYWANKO

"Where's Spencer?" Except for "Where are the engineering voting lists?", that was the most frequently asked question last night in the Debates Room at Hart House. Spencer remained the mystery man all evening until the final results were announced.

Spencer finally appeared after spending a quiet evening at home reading magazines (so he said) and drinking with his brother.

Red-eyed and obviously moved by his victory and the enthusiastic cheers of his friends and supporters, Spencer waded through the crowd accepting congratulations.

Aside from the elated speechlessness, Spencer's only problem last night was how to celebrate.

"There's room for 14 people in my van!" he said jubilantly.

Later, in a more serious mood, he said, "Just remember, we promised to do a lot of things and we'll try hard."

"The student movement is not quite dead."

Asked what his plans for next year are, he referred to his priorities paper, "Dur platform — that's it", adding, "I guess we're sort of left liberals at this point."

Spencer's partner in the campaign and the win, Phil Dack, displayed a more cautious profile.

Dack initially appeared at Hart House during the early evening when the first results from the New Physics and Hart House polls were fore-shadowing a win.

"I'm stoned," quipped Dack. "It must be pretty heavy having to stand around all night waiting for results."

Despite results which consistently showed him ahead, Dack refused to claim success. Told by supporters it was in the bag, he said, "Don't say so positively — it's definitely bad luck."

Analyzing his campaign and subsequent win, Dack reflected, "I consider my election a mandate to continue the fight for parity."

Dack heartily disapproved of the fact that the Engineering Society held the SAC fees rebate referendum yesterday too. Dack would like to see this rebate go directly to each individual engineer.

Skule fiasco enlivens SAC election count

By TONY USHER

Last night's SAC election results almost didn't appear, thanks to a snafu in the Engineering polls.

But aside from this mishap, the election night count, traditionally an annual highlight for U of T student political heavies and groupies, lacked its usual colour and emotion.

The candidates, election officials, and assorted interested persons gathered in the tatty Hart House Debates Room, a far cry from the usual cathedral-like West Hall of University College.

The subdued atmosphere seemed to be a most fitting end to an uninspiring election campaign. Yet the element of comic blunder provided by the engineering fiasco provided an appropriate ending as well.

The campaign had been replete with charges of mismanagement, resentment over the two-day poll and cancelled election advertisements, climaxed by a candidates' forum at Convocation Hall Tuesday that attracted 1D spectators.

Thus when commotion arose over the Engineering votes last night, no one was particularly surprised.

When the engineers came to count their polls, five voters' lists were nowhere to be found. Under SAC election rules this means invalidation of the poll results.

The Elections Committee met and argued bitterly. Finally everyone was ordered out of the room and a search was begun.

The more jaded drifted downstairs to the Arbour Room while the younger enthusiasts waited outside the Debates Room's locked doors.

Jubilant The missing lists had been stuffed underneath the ballots in the bottom of one of the boxes. The count continued

One by one, the candidates arrived. The atmosphere began to liven up as faces from the past drifted around the room, telling jokes and recalling gut-wrenching political moments of the past.

Former SAC president Gus Abols dropped by. Incumbent Rod Hurd counted ballots, smoking nervously while the engineering wrangle droned on.

Modish head of Trinity Richard Reoch, dressed in Mao jacket and beads, did his best to entertain the politicians, but they weren't in the mood for laughing. They were just bored.

Finally some kind of tension began to develop. The non-electronic tote board showed Bob Spencer and Phil Dack well ahead, but the delayed engineering votes had yet to go up.

The word began to spread that the Spencer-Dack lead would hold. Dack came up from the Arbour Room where he had been staring morosely into his coffee. He broke into a smile and got a round of applause.

Spencer-Dack campaign manager John D'Grady reached over a pile of ballot boxes and grasped Dack's hand. The election was in the bag.

The results were posted to mild, anticlimatic applause. The candidates emerged from their corners for the ceremonial rounds of handshaking. Bob Spencer burst through the door. Suddenly all eyes were on the New Man.

"The student power movement is not quite dead!", enthused an otherwise over-come Spencer to his supporters.

And on that note, the Spencer-Dack crew headed to Sai Woo's to celebrate, while the disappointed and disillusioned drifted off into the night.

Crispo falters on $1,000 bet at union seminar

By ALEX PODNICK

Prof. John Crispo of U of T's Centre for Industrial Relations almost bet $1000 on the spot during a seminar on international unions Wednesday

DURING THE SESSION, which was one of four on the Canadian-American dilemma sponsored by Seneca College, Crispo challenged the claim of Kent Rowley, vice president of the leftish Canadian Council of Unions, that the CALURA (Corporation and Labour Union Returns Act) Report conclusively proved that Canadian branches of international (read American) unions send more money out of Canada than comes into it. Rowley said the report found that between 1962 and 1928, American unions took out $80 million more than they brought in.

"Give me that money and I'll organize Canadian unions", claimed Rowley

Crispo said that the report did not have complete and accurate figures, and thus no definite claim could be made

Rowley challenged that and offered to bet Crispo $1000 that the report proved more money went out than in. Crispo responded eagerly and appeared anxious to accept the bet, but only if he could have the bet state that the CALURA Report "categorically" proved Rowley's claim

ROWLEY STUCK TO HIS ORIGINAL WORDING and Crispo did not accept the bet

After the panel was over, argument between the two flared up again, and a $100 bet was almost accepted, but again they shied away from a final agreement

Earlier in the panel, audience members angrily challenged Eamon Park, assistant Canadian director of the United Steelworkers of America, when he claimed Canadian branches of international unions are independent.

ONE PERSON TOLD how he had been prevented from voting in a certification election by international union thugs who terrorized Sudbury. This was in reference to the Steel Workers taking over from the International Mine and Mill workers in INCO mines

When Park cited workers' certification of the international unions as proof of their acceptance by a majority of workers, one person accused the international unions of rigging the certification election. He pointed out that in any case the Steel Workers had won by only 12 votes out of thousands cast Eamon said the "test" of a union's structure should be whether it is "effective", presumably meaning whether or not the union members voted to change unions.

HE ALSO CLAIMED that Canadian units of international unions have "considerable influence in the conventions of their American parents. He said this as if it was to compensate Canadian unions for their absence of some autonomy in their own affairs Earlier, Rowley had described members of the Seafarers International Union, an affiliate of the Canadian Labour Conference, as "gangsters". He said "the American trade union movement is riddled through with racketeering, murderers, and thieves

ROWLEY DECLARED that there is no such thing as international unions "What we have is American unions with Canadian branches" characterized by a "colonial mentality", he said.

John Crispo disputed these claims. He described the CLC as being "relatively autonomous from the AFL-CIO". The CLC's industrial unions make their own decisions about affiliation and settle their own labour disputes locally, he said.

UNLIKE THE AFL-CIO, "you can still find a majority of workers at CLC conventions". At these conventions, the CLC freely opposes AFL-CIO policy, such as support of the American war in Viet Nam, he claimed

Although he would prefer Canadian unions, Crispo doesn't think it's likely they'll be created. He termed it "foolhardy" to attempt to counter multi-national corporations with national unions

As an alternative, he suggested the creation of truly international unions, which would be interdependent where necessary, such as in collective bargaining, and independent in other matters

Disputing suggestions that George Meaney, international president of the AFL-CIO, will grant Canadians more autonomy, Rowley said the only way "George Meaney will leave Canada is when he's kicked out and he's going to be kicked out!"

MADELAINE PARENT, of the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU), agreed "a big American union is a business proposition" with large, well-paid staffs and large investment funds

Because they stand to lose too much, international unions will fight to retain control of their Canadian affiliates, she said

Whatever the decision about Canadian unions, Crispo said it should be the choice of Canadian workers and not the vocal nationalists currently shouting about the issue. Leaving these nationalists unnamed, he accused them of being nationalist because of economic self-interest.

"SAC elections like children's play games"

By LAURA KELLY

Mo Wortzman, Blue and White chairman and vice-presidential candidate, waited out the election returns puffing on his plastic-mouthpiece cigar and never even bothering to take off his plaid wool coat.

Bernie Teitelbaum was close by, the loyal campaign manager, alternately chiding and supporting his candidate-friend. All around politics and groupies were chomping on the Bernie-inspired bubblegum that was the Wortzman trademark this week.

"We had a plan, 'six winning ways', but we didn't want to use overkill," piped Bernie.

Wortzman was relaxed during the ritual process of vote counting, and even the engineering ballot box mix-up didn't worry him too much.

Exiled from the counting room with the rest of the election non-elite, Wortzman leaned against the Hart House brick wall and chatted with Bernie.

"I've got three years to go in Law School, how many times do you think I can run," Bernie joked. Wortzman grinned. Most of us trooped down to the Arbor Room for a break.

When the crisis cleared and the more votes came in, Wortzman's chances, which never looked good, got worse.

One watcher commented on the similarity between election nights and bingo games, and Wortzman added "Except everybody loses in this one."

Wortzman said he'd probably head up the Blue and White again next year, although he still thinks the projected loan of 9,000 and grant of $1,000 are not enough to run a good social organization.

"At the Lakehead, they have something like a quarter of a million dollars. Can you imagine?" Wortzman said with a far-away look.

Wortzman felt that the Blue and White did benefit from his campaign, but he grew rueful when questioned about the actual campaign.

"We only worked about two hours a day and we didn't put up any posters until Monday. It was like playing a game with a child, that's why we didn't put up much effort," said Wortzman.

"I felt more involved last year," he said. Wortzman handled Bernie's campaign last year.

When Wortzman's defeat was official, Lawrence Dahlke, presidential candidate and co-loser, fervently shook Wortzman's hand saying "The best man lost. Mo."

Wortzman stood in the crowd and stared at the nearly illegible results scrawled on the blackboard.

"I can't believe it. I was sure Owen Dick and Slater would win. I just don't understand," he said.

Dahlke is downed

By GRAHAM STAFFEN

SAC Presidential elections left "the serious" Larry Dahlke down but hardly disillusioned.

Dahlke, running as a "mystery candidate", described the emphasis of his campaign as lying in the "relevant issues concerning this university."

However, when pressed for further comment he begged the question, noting only that The Varsity had not been fair in its coverage of his viewpoints.

His stated goal of keeping his own personality out of the contest proved unsuccessful, when one obviously enraptured female approached him in speechless amazement. Dahlke commented "It happens all the time."

Slater's body language strikes out

By DREW HUTCHESON

Early yesterday evening Owen Dick was unavailable for comment as the ballots were counted, but his running mate Dave Slater had sloopy comments on "a bad election."

Why a bad election? "A shitty turnout this way it was just Engineering versus Erindale.

A girl from Whitney Hall had explained her theory of the Slater failure. "His smooth 'Hi, I'm Dave Slater, I'm running for SAC vice president'... He's read Body Language pointing his crossed legs at you and stroking your hair.

tries to make every girl feel like she's the only one in the room."

When asked if he had tried to win the election on sex appeal, he smiled enigmatically and said "That's funny."

Then his eyes lit up. "How do you win an election on sex appeal?"

Happiness: running as a woman

By WAYNE ALDRIDGE

Happiness is being thanked for running as a woman. While the SAC presidential winners were being announced last night two women approached the very happy Alice Klein and thanked her for running on relevant issues, but most of all for running as a woman.

To testify to their success stands their one victory at the Faculty of Architecture.

"They are a student movement," commented Klein about architecture students.

"They had parity first and they are a unified student body" She noted that where male chauvinism is most ingrained, the Nursing Faculty, she won only two votes.

In response to her paltry 65 votes at the Engineering Faculty she replied "I am sure there are a few guilty engineers" calling it the "faculty with the most illusions."

Engineers come out strong for SAC rebate

By ERIC MILLS

A conflict between the Engineering Society and SAC is brewing as a result of overwhelming support for a 50% rebate of SAC fees in a referendum yesterday.

The referendum, held in conjunction with the SAC presidential elections, produced a large turnout of engineering students, as 66.5% of those eligible to vote did in fact vote, and 93.2% of these wanted the rebate.

The question on the rebate was "I support the proposed 50% rebate to the Engineering Society of all SAC fees paid by the students of the Faculty of Applied Sciences and Engineering."

The phraseology "I support" makes the referendum biased in favour of a "Yes" answer, according to one graduate student in Political science contacted last night.

The vote was 1341 yes; 98 no, with 2164 eligible according to referendum chairman Paul Cadario.

The turnout was not the 75% expected by Eng Soc president Eric Miglin, but organizers last night were delighted that it was about one per cent higher than the much vaunted Arts and Sciences referendum.

Cadario said the society would present the results of the referendum to SAC through Engineering SAC reps as a request for a $650 per student rebate.

Cadario claimed the referendum enjoyed large support because students were behind the principle of local autonomy, and because of class to class organizing.

He admitted that the result was partly due to simple antagonism towards SAC by engineering students.

Former Toike Oike editor Brian Leatham claimed the result was due to "genuine discontent."

Meanwhile, SAC president-elect Bob Spencer did not share the same prediction about the outcome of the referendum.

"I don't see how the Finance Commission can do it," he said last night. "Both Owen Dick and I agreed that the rebate cannot be outrightly granted."

Spencer observed that to be representative, "we can't have half members." He suggested SAC might rebate money for services SAC could not provide to engineering students.

This year's SAC president, Rod Hurd, also said he is against an unconditional rebate. Hurd said the engineers might get money for specific educational projects, but predicted that council will refuse an unconditional rebate.

Finance Commissioner Mike Hofstetter agreed with Hurd. "The budget will not allow for a rebate," he said.

Hurd said he would debate Eric Miglin, former SAC vice president and Hurd's running mate last year, "anywhere, anytime" on the rebate issue.

CPUO hints at ending tenure

The Committee of Presidents of Universities in Ontario has suggested that professorial tenure be abolished and replaced with some form of collective bargaining.

In a report predicting educational trends to the year 2000, the CPUO noted that to many "Tenure is something of an absurdity and an unusual privilege." Working conditions, salary, retirement and protection for traditional forms of academic freedom could be won through collective bargaining, the report notes.

In a sole exception, the CPUO recommended that "top-level professors" bargain for themselves so that Ontario universities be allowed to "get their share of the very best" What this means is that salary levels would be standardized except for those few faculty designated by some unspecified agency as extra-special.

The tenure problem arises in the report's fear of redundancy and obsolescence in the academic world.

Noting that, "It is likely that our recruitment policies will continue to place a high value on the doctoral students from those leading (American) institutions, particularly returning Canadians," the CPUO sees this younger generation coming into conflict with "the 50-year-olds entering a phase of obsolescence."

"If there's one thing Pierre Trudeau is hooked on it's public order..."
—Dennis Braithwaite,
Toronto Telegram.

The Varsity a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto. Printed by Web Offset Publications Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

How come we get all the attention?

Dennis Braithwaite, who writes in the Toronto Telegram, has a funny way of making a piercing analysis of the superficial sides of social problems.

In yesterday's paper, for instance, he hits the mark right on when he picks apart the federal government's summertime youth pacification program.

Braithwaite has no illusions about what the government plans to invest its $57 million in this summer.

"The government knows it won't get five minutes worth of useful labour for its $57 million; that's not the intention," he writes.

"What the program really amounts to is a big fat bribe, a desperate and probably futile plan to buy juvenile peace during the summer ahead."

Faced with the experiences of previous summers — when youth unemployment led to great bitterness and frustration in the cities, sometimes erupting into confrontations with police — the government has decided to invest in some social controls.

Unemployed youth are probably the most volatile sector of a population increasingly disillusioned with the competitive and cutthroat civilization capitalism has created in Canada. From its point of view, the government has acted wisely in investing its money this summer.

Like Braithwaite, we can see quite clearly that the government's plans amount to nothing less than a complete set of social controls to keep track of people and to keep people in line during the summer.

How else can you construe such projects as these:

- paying up to 15,000 young people to engage in military training (we thought that went out of style as a method of inculcating social virtues, when high school cadet training was ended).
- hiring up to 4,000 students to work for the Department of National Defense doing research and developing programs for them (seems like the universities haven't been doing enough work like this during the regular year).
- an undisclosed number of youth will be put to work at Canadian forces bases, doing manual labour.
- roadside kiosks will be established along the major highways as checkpoints for transient young people (it's like phoning home, except the government's looking after you, not your parents).
- travel programs will be organized to allow more than 35,000 students to go on conducted tours of other parts of the country.

What these programs add up to is a series of ways to keep young people busy and looked after during the summer. Give them a job — any job you can create — is the reasoning, and if you can't get them a job, for heaven's sake make some arrangements to have them looked after.

Otherwise they might get out of line.

Dennis Braithwaite calls it a "glorified system of baby-sitting" and he is right to be pissed off.

Last month there were 675,000 unemployed in Canada, and the government has not moved quickly to solve their problems.

Why not?

One reason is that it is generally accepted as a premise in capitalist economics that in a stable labour force there will inevitably be an unemployment figure of three or four per cent.

This is considered healthy. It keeps up competition and holds wages down. It provides a resource pool of cheap labour for seasonal jobs and requirements.

So when unemployment rises beyond normal levels, it is treated as a sign of temporary flux in the economy, not as a measure of human difficulties and miseries.

A second reason the government doesn't feel it has to move quickly to solve permanent general unemployment is that this sector is not as volatile or angry as young people.

Expectations among Canada's working people are deliberately kept at a low level through long years of systematic exploitation and struggle to make ends meet.

Unemployment insurance and welfare payments keep unemployed Canadians at a level of just managing to get through — and not having time to force the government to respond more actively to their plight.

Unlike youth, most of the unemployed in Canada are men with families and commitments to friends, homes, neighborhoods, ways of life. They are more likely to suffer quietly — and blame themselves for being inadequate in our social system — than to demand proper respect from government.

These attitudes are changing of course and there is a new militancy among Canada's poor, as shown for instance by the January poor people's conference in Toronto. But the government does not consider the problem as urgent as that of the possibility of youth explosions.

With their dual policy of speedy aid to young people and no help at all for the unemployed public at large, the government hopes to drive a wedge between young people and the Canadian people.

Braithwaite's column of yesterday is evidence that it is very easy to stir up this kind of backlash. Braithwaite's predictable reaction is to label young people as "spoiled", "sheltered", "coddled" and "redundant".

But what is needed, is for young people, and all Canadians, to understand that the unemployment crises — both summertime and year-round — are not temporary accidents, but symptoms of a general crisis in Canadian society.

The crisis is quite simply the crisis of a social organization which is unable to make proper use of its human resources.

For students to spend their summers in make-work projects, or in featherbedded projects provided by government money, is scant recognition of their usefulness to society at large.

For any Canadian to be told that his creative energies are not needed and to be thrown on the scrapheap of human labour, is a tragic blow.

There are, however, a few glimmers of hope in the government's announced plans.

Allocating $15 million for various forms of community research and organizing, is an important step. Hopefully the projects that arise out of this will generate an awareness of the need for radical social change in Canada.

Providing hostels for transient youth is also a recognition of a vital social need which the government is finally taking notice of.

It's simply a shame that the government has never displayed the same compassion — or is it fear — of other groups in Canada who have not been able to find any reality to match the vision of a Just Society.

Some further adventures of Rufus the Radical Reptile and R. D. Laing...

By SUSAN PERLY

I would like to respond to Bob Bossin's article on Laing, which left me unsatisfied and disappointed.

I approached the article not as someone being introduced to Laing's theories for the first time, but as someone who has read three of his works (Politics of the Family, Politics of Experience, and the Divided Self) and as someone who has been very definitely affected by what Laing has to say.

Bossin did a fair job in choosing selected excerpts from Laing, but he didn't do much to show people what these had to do with their own lives. These excerpts came across as little more than graffiti, cool comments: wow isn't that a right-on statement gang, dig it!

Likewise, you could try and explain Marx's theories by quoting quotable passages from his works, but if your audience has never read Marx, they will not be 'turned on' until you can show them what all those theories have to do with the fact that they drag around the university depressed about courses, depressed about relationships with people, depressed about jobs; in short the sources of their own real and immediate alienation.

Something else about the feature which I found irritating was Bossin's self-consciousness. Some of the best writing which has appeared in The Varsity have been personal, honest accounts of the university experience, for example, Brian Johnson's response to his English class. Let's face it, print is a one-dimensional, limited medium, a very frustrating one to deal with when one is attempting to communicate. But if Bossin decided to work within that medium and to write down his thoughts about Laing, rather than verbalize them, then he should be able to do that without agonizing over them.

Certainly most writers, whether they be journalists, poets, novelists (or any combination of those) have experienced the feeling that "print causes deafness. Typewriters steal the soul."

Why not concentrate on helping us understand R. D. Laing, not Bob Bossin suffering to tell us about Laing. This is just what Bossin says is the problem, that he is pointing at Laing pointing. Yet in his little comments, which go so far as to include phone number and address, he is doing even more: he is pointing at himself pointing at Laing, etc.

When an artist attempts to convey reality to his or her readers, it is always important to keep the contradictions of print in one's head. But the important thing is to honestly and forcefully explain that reality, not to remain hung up about the sad existential position of one who is fortunate enough to have gained that knowledge. To do that is to put oneself above the reader and not to express empathy with his or her suffering.

I found the most relevant part of the article became the cartoons. Rufus' experiences are events everyone can relate to immediately and graphically.

* * *

Over the last two months I have visited the Nova Scotia Hospital in Dartmouth about half a dozen times, to see a friend's brother who is 16 years old and has been classified as a schizophrenic. He is kept in a closed ward, where you have to knock at the steel door before an attendant will let you in. Most of the time there is a handwritten sign on the door:

"CAUTION!
"PATIENT TRYING TO ELOPE"

Inside, patients ranging from 11 years old up, line the hall playing cards or chess or watching television. Mostly, they just smoke and stare. Over the loudspeaker's

"Something's happening here,
"What it is ain't exactly clear."

The walls are white and bare, no posters are allowed; they might peel the paint off. There are bars on the windows and a nice high barbed wire fence.

What the hell is a 16-year-old kid doing here? What the hell is anybody doing here? Who is crazy? Who is schizophrenic? And more importantly, who says who is crazy?

Willy, (the patient) says, "Who's to say what's normal" or when they put the speakers from the stereo in two different rooms he comments, "This is a mental hospital, what do you expect?"

One Saunday afternoon, a bunch of us went to visit and sat around laughing and telling stories and giggling: singing the Fish cheer, smoking and generally carrying on. Then I turned and realized that no one could tell who were the patients and who the visitors. All of us, young, in jeans and sweaters.

Yet I knew that I could get up and walk out at any time. I was free to go beyond that locked and guarded door. I had the power and they didn't. The politics of experience.

A few of the kids were in there for doing acid. One of them was stretched out on the bed, wordless; he had had at least five electro-shock treatments in a couple of days.

Another one was told by his doctor, "If I ever catch you doing drugs when you get out of here, I'll show you what a hard ward this really is."

The Mind Police. Others get busted on the outside; others are "lucky" enough to keep on going, keeping their drugs and their schizophrenia hidden — acting normal. Who does define what's normal?

Laing says: "Our normal adjusted state is too often the abdication of ecstasy, the betrayal of our true potentialities, that many of us are only too successful in acquiring a false self to adapt to false realities."

So when the patients get too aware, too happy, they put them on strong downers. Eyes become glazed and they don't respond. If they get too low, they make them high. If they step out of line, they stick them in solitary, naked. If they still aren't quiet, electro-shock.

I remember thinking, the only reason I can visit here is because I know I can leave. If I had to stay here, I'd go crazy.

Exactly.

If they ever stopped giving tranquilizers to mental hospital patients, there would be bloody riots, there would be violence and killing.

Peter Weiss' play Marat, Sade is not fiction; neither is Ken Kesey's novel One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. You can't tell people about Laing without including such works.

When you hear a patient in solitary pounding and pounding, desperately crying to be let out and then you hear that next week that "they did him up well" by burning out his brain, you don't know what to do.

The reality of what it means to act "abnormally" in this society, the reality of who has the power and what they are doing to us becomes overwhelming and frustrating. You feel like blowing it up. But that would mean all the schools and factories, mental hospitals, office buildings. And that won't work. So we have to begin, and struggle to build alternatives.

How many of us get through devastating personal experiences by having friends to talk to, communes to live in where we don't feel alone. People to love us and take us through the trip creatively. It's a start.

We must begin to understand why we have become schizophrenic, why it is the only way one can survive under capitalism. We must see how the politics of the family, of experience, of education, of mental institutions all destroy us, daily. We must find ways to fight against them.

And it's in this context that we should use R. D. Laing's learning and writing to further the struggle.

P.S. There are more people in Canada in mental institutions than in universities.

Classified discussion

I have been a student at this university for four years. In that time, I have always paid my fees in time, never asked a question in a lecture, and, in general, always tried my best to maintain a "low profile".

Now that I am about to graduate, however, I feel that I can no longer keep silent about a gross crime against the working class, the knowledge of which burns in my heart, and which is committed anew in every issue of your alleged newspaper.

I refer to the short advertisements collected under the rubric of "CLASSIFIED".

Under market relations of production, as in any pre-capitalist economic formations in which they have emerged, classified advertisements must be classified, that is, grouped under various appropriate headings for The Varsity, appropriate headings might include "Lost and Found", "Essays for Sale", and "Kinky Sex Partners Wanted".

But your advertisements are not so classified; they are unclassified; yet, they are called classified.

This is a contradiction. You may argue that you have been unintentionally dialectical; but, to paraphrase the Master, "You cannot aufheben (i.e., elevate, conserve, and abolish in the Hegelian sense) classified advertising without realizing it." You have neither elevated nor preserved; you have not abolished but mystified. You have created false consciousness.

Dixi et salvavi animam mean — I have spoken and saved my soul.

Anti-semitism is part of Cold War

The recent Teach-In on Soviet Jewry, and continued propaganda of the same order since, looks like part of a "spontaneous" protest rising in Western Europe and North America against alleged systematic persecution of Jews in the Soviet Union. We think this campaign is in fact a rather well-organized political move to put new life in the Cold War.

The 'communist plot to enslave us all' has been the justification for US aggression all over the world since Hitler left off twenty-five years ago. The Jews have been a pawn in this lying game from the start. First it was the 'Jewish-communist' plot of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, murdered by the US government in the McCarthy period.

Now it is crocodile tears for Jews as victims of communism.

East European, Ukrainian and Estonian rightists, many of whom live in Toronto, are shedding some of the soggiest tears over the Jews living under socialism whom they tried to wipe out when they were nazi collaborators in 1939-45. Quite a few such war criminals were given shelter by the US and Canadian governments after the Red Army smashed the Hitlerite regimes.

People all over the world hate anti-semitism, and this sentiment is being used by the cold-warriors for their own purposes; namely, promoting war, and the profits attendant thereon. We do not deny the existence of anti-semitic sentiment in the USSR. And the Polish government, for example, has admitted that anti-semites got into high position in that country. But it is interesting that the current attack does not even mention Poland, where the problem is far worse. The fact that the Soviet Union was chosen again suggests the political cold-war nature of the campaign, rather than genuine concern for the well-being of Jews.

Anti-semitism is not a policy in the Soviet Union. Unlike in Canada, anti-semitism is a criminal offence. There is a Jewish Autonomous Region (Soviet Birobidjian formed in 1934), which is highly productive in both agricultural and industrial terms, but most Jews preferred to remain in the western areas rather than live in a separate national territory. The best evidence that anti-semitism is not a policy is that there are Jews in all walks of life: blue-collar workers, scientists, generals, artists, and Communist Party officials and members.

There would be no Jews at all today in the Soviet Union if the Soviet Government hadn't saved Soviet Jewry from Hitler's final solution by evacuating them to the east in 1941-45 (Hitler occupied the Jewish-inhabited areas of the USSR.) The result is that today there are relatively more Jews in the Soviet Union than in Eastern Europe, where Hitler had a free hand.

Why won't the Soviet Union "let the Jews go"? The first question is, do many want to? Where is the evidence? Second, the fact is that quite a few have been allowed to leave. As for Soviet Jews of military age (male and female, both being draftable in Israel) how can the Soviets be expected to let them go to engage in Israeli aggression in the Middle East, as the United Nations has rightly called it.

Where are those who are so worried about the rights of Jews in the Soviet Union when it comes to the rights of the Palestinian people, and of the people of the Arab states who have had their lands grabbed by the expansionist Israeli war hawks? Egypt has offered peace with recognition of Israel's right of passage through Suez and the Straits of Tiran, as well as recognition of the pre-1967 Israeli boundaries, to be guaranteed by the great powers and by a non-withdrawable UN force (in the past UN force have had to withdraw at Egypt's demand). Any violator would then find itself at war with the countries supplying peacekeeping forces.

Of all minorities in the world, why such a to-do about the Jews of the Soviet Union? What of the victims of Canadian imperialism in the West Indies and Anglo-Canadian capitalism in Quebec? The current attack on the Soviet Union is being used to divert attention from the problems faced by the working people of Canada here at home, which includes most Canadian Jews.

The propaganda we are being fed at U of T often masquerades as merely informational or "educational". We condemn it as being basically just more of the same old cold-war trash that has plagued the world for a quarter of a century.

Danson's story was nothing compared to this

I read with great interest the saga of Tim Danson and his Red Shorts but what I have gone through can top that by a mile.

You will better understand how Tim can be treated as he is when you hear my story. I won't go into all the morbid details but suffice it to say that I as a teacher in a post-secondary institution with twenty years of teaching experience am presently 'relieved of duty' and now am awaiting word from the great white father to see if I am worthy of being re-instated in my position as a teacher.

Let me state that I know that I am outstanding in the teaching profession (but I'm sure only the students that I teach are aware of this) and because of this simple fact I am now ostracized by staff and administration. The latter is upset because I insisted on telling the truth when I was asked my opinion. This of course did not sit well with the powers that be and I was formally told not to expose my ideas to any more of the students. I might add that I also complained about shocking conditions that the Humane Society would not tolerate never mind a so-called Christian Democratic Society. I soon realized that if you wish to tell the truth you'd better have one foot on the gas or else a fat bank account.

The staff also became highly disturbed (which they are anyway) when I had published in the school newspaper two articles which they said criticized them indirectly. This gaggle of goons actually signed a petition condemning me and my actions. I formally answered their charges by asking them to tell me what had upset them and by challenging them to a public debate to clear the air. They refused to answer any challenges. They are a bunch of scum, lackeys of the establishment who live off the blood of the students.

And so I sit. I know that I have truth on my side and time also. I am willing to die for what I believe in for what is the good of living each day like some vegetable? I realize that conditions are getting so bad that revolution is upon us and that the ruling class refuses to see the writing on the black-board.

I would be glad to assist any students who are dissatisfied with conditions in their schools. I have organized a group made up of students only who are willing to sacrifice something to gain everything so that together we can rescue thousands of students all over this country who are prisoners in a decadent system. My group is called R.I.S.E. — which stands for RELEVANCE IN SOCIETY AND EDUCATION. The First letter also stands for REFORM, REVOLUTION and then RIOT. If our demands are not met then we will resort to each of these steps as distasteful as they may seem to the establishment.

Are you concerned enough to want change and will you work for it? Perhaps we can save ourselves and our country and finally the world. It's worth a try, don't you think? So please concerned students only

The fact is the Commune lost

In his brief article on the subject of the Paris Commune, designed as an antidote to the bourgeois history which apparently is predominant in this country, Philip Resnick neglects one obvious fact which might be of relevance to contemporary revolutionaries.

The fact is that the Commune's revolution lost. Not only did the utopian aspirations of the Parisian revolutionaries suffer utter defeat, but the uprising itself cost over 20,000 in dead alone, and close to 100,000 in dead, fugitives, and prisoners. More than this, the repression which followed may have set back the cause of French socialism for over two decades, at least until the 1890s. Demoralized politically, deprived of most of its leadership, the French working-class movement, which had shown real strength in the 1860s, went into an eclipse which put it considerably behind other countries of western Europe.

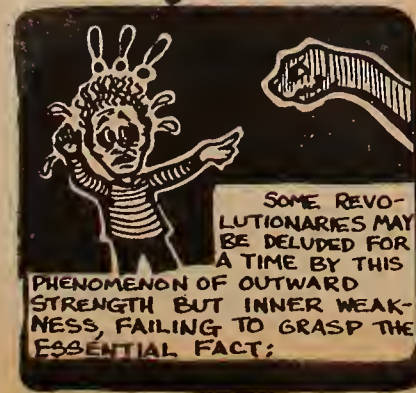

None of this was a surprise to Karl Marx, who had continually warned against premature insurrection and who, after a brief flirtation with revolutionary upheaval about the period of the revolutions of 1848, saw the advantages of the long, steady work of organization and the maturation of objective conditions as being much more likely to yield success than romantic insurrectionism. This was part of the basis of his quarrel with Bakunin in the International. Once the Commune was underway, of course, Marx could hardly disavow the effort, and had to see it through.

But Marx emerged from the terrible experience much more chastened about old revolutionary techniques than are many of his followers today. Seeing the cost in blood, and predicting the cost in terms of political power, Marx made a clear condemnation of elitist revolutionary adventurism.

Would Mr. Resnick do the same? Michael R. Marrus

Forced rent payment

OHC changes its tactics against tenants

By LAURA KELLY

The Ontario Housing Corporation has changed its tactics from eviction to forced rent payment through court proceedings, and the striking married students are feeling the blow.

Twenty of the OHC rent strikers at the St. Charles Street apartments have received court summonses and sixty more blue-cornered papers are on the way.

Scheduled to appear in court the week of March 22-26, the student tenants hope to have the first twenty cases consolidated into one case. If successful the move will not only save court costs but will set a precedent for later cases.

The tenants association at Charles Street had been expecting the OHC to move in on the other striking tenants.

The earlier OHC threat of eviction, delivered to over 130 tenants, would have been more dramatic, if followed up by action, and thus a rallying point for further sympathy and action by other tenants.

The Court proceedings which now embroil the tenants cost money and time that few can afford, especially during the exam rush.

Wayne Roberts, the Tenants Association chairman, said Wednesday night that a straw poll indicates only 25 tenants are prepared to fight the court battle to the "bitter end."

Roberts capsulized the strike's progress since its beginnings in August with a rent strike of 350, at a general tenants meeting Wednesday.

"When the strikers were threatened with eviction in September, we immediately pulled back and paid up on our rent. I guess you could say it was the height of our naivete," said Roberts.

The second phase was a one-family test case, which OHC refused to prosecute, and so the present phase of renewed rent strike began in November.

"First we were after the reduction of rent, but now we are working toward tenants' control. This has generated broad public interest," said Roberts.

Although the court proceedings may be an anti-climatic result to a year-long struggle that could have ended in the confrontation of eviction, the tenants who were at the Wednesday meeting were not resigned.

"Getting tenants' control is a process. The OHC isn't going to say 'Students, your wish is our command.' It takes time," said one striker.

Women's Studies offered

By WENDY SMITH

U of T will give its first course in Women's Studies next year.

"Women in the Twentieth Century", the new course to be offered by the Committee on Interdisciplinary Studies, is still in its planning stages.

Taught in sections of no more than 30, it will stress student-staff co-operation in organizing the direction which the course will take. In the 200 series, it is open to everyone (including males), and has no prerequisites.

The programme will involve songs, films and other cultural phenomena related to women, and could cover anything from a historical survey of what women have done through the century to a direct focus on what they are doing now. Those involved in the planning would like it to be a nucleus for further courses on women and their role in society.

The ten planners, all women, include several graduate students, one undergrad and one full-time faculty member, some of whom are Women's Liberation representatives. Erindale English Professor Barbara Martineau is the co-ordinator.

In conjunction with this new program, Prof. Annette Baxter of Barnard College in New York, initiator of the first university course in Women's Studies in North America, will speak on "Women's Studies" in Cody Hall at 4 p.m. Monday, Mar 29. She is presently teaching a course called "Women's Self-Image."

Lakehead sit-in continues

THUNDER BAY—Lakehead University's sit-in goes on, following the refusal Tuesday of university president Tamblyn to make a statement about the principle of arbitration.

The sit-in outside the university administration offices which has included both senior faculty and students, began last Tuesday after the administration refused to agree to the investigation and arbitration of the firing of Sociology-Anthropology professor V. G. Wightman by the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

Tamblyn also said it was unnecessary to call a meeting of the Soc-Anthrop Department, a meeting which is now three weeks overdue. So far, 47 percent of the department members have signed a petition calling for a meeting.

Tamblyn issued his statement along with a warning that demonstrators may be charged and tried by the university, after meeting with three representatives chosen from the sit-in. Economics Department Chairman K. J. Charles, one of the demonstrators chosen (along with two students) to meet the president, later called on occupiers to discontinue the sit-in. His appeal was voted down by a sizeable majority.

Mathematician to discuss political side of his speciality

A world-famous mathematician visits U of T early next week to speak on both the academic and political sides of his subject.

"Scientists, Survival and the Military Apparatus" is the topic of a discussion French mathematician Alexandre Grothendieck will lead next Tuesday night in the Medical Sciences Building, Room 2172.

Grothendieck, a professor at the Institut d'Hautes Etudes Scientifiques in Paris, will be a guest of the U of T Mathematics Department, and will give two afternoon seminars Monday and Tuesday as well.

Math professor Chandler Davis, describes Grothendieck as "one of the best known mathematicians in the world."

Non-parity restructuring council continues its work

Although boycotted by students, the 6-0-1 restructuring committee for the Arts and Science Faculty Council is boring ahead in an attempt to produce a report by April 1.

According to chairman of the committee Psychology professor J. E. Foley, an attempt will be made to see whether the proposals are satisfactory to students.

"But even if they're not," warned Foley, "the only point is whether or not they are acceptable to the faculty council."

At least four members of the seven-man committee have been known to take a hard-line towards student involvement in the faculty business. Foley, however voted for the original motion to set up a parity restructuring committee.

Last month, a student-faculty restructuring committee set up after an unsuccessful strike referendum, released recommendations for a parity faculty council. Attempts to discuss the report in an Arts and Science General Assembly fell through.

Presumably the parity report could be submitted as a suggestion to the 6-0-1 committee, but Foley has said that she will have no truck with an equal-staff-student council.

Right now the committee is asking for ideas and suggestions.

Two students have taken advantage of the offer according to Foley.

Poet Miron uses award three ways

French Canadian poet Gaston Miron visits Toronto next week to read his poetry and meet with Torontonians.

Miron, one of the more than 400 Quebecois imprisoned under the War Measures Act last October, makes no secret of his political beliefs.

Ten days ago Miron was awarded Montreal's "grand prix litteraire", a prestigious award bearing a $3,000 cash value. Immediately, he announced he would spend the money in three ways.

- $1,000 to the Mouvement pour la defense des prisonniers politiques quebecois, an umbrella civil liberties defence fund.

- $500 to the Front pour l'action politique, the Montreal community-based political alliance crushed by Mayor Jean Drapeau during the last civic elections.

- the remainder will be spent on the publication of new literary works.

Miron will be reading at Glendon College's Junior Common Room Tuesday evening at 8:30 p.m., in a "soiree-rencontre" co-sponsored by Glendon College and La Chasse-galerie. Admission for students is $1.

This week a second Quebecois poet, Fernand Ouellete, turned down the Governor General's Award, saying that he could not allow himself to be honoured by the head of state who had proclaimed the Emergency War Measures Act.

Hodgett's used to wearing several hats

By TIM YOUNG

As a candidate for U of T president, Dr. J. E. Hodgett is a man to be considered. You may know him as a political science professor, Principal of Victoria College, Commission on University Government (CUG) member, or as the recently appointed President of Victoria University.

Ted Hodgett is accustomed to wearing several hats at the same time.

Few contenders for Claude Bissell's office could match Hodgett's impeccable academic qualifications. A 1939 Rhodes Scholar from Victoria College he did post-graduate work at Chicago due to the War.

He has emerged as the leading expert on Canadian public administration having written or co-edited over one third of the literature in this area. While in the Political Economy Department at Queens he was a senior member of the ROYAL (Glassco) COMMISSION ON GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION as well as a prominent member of both the Canadian and International Political Science Associations.

Though considered a dull lecturer Hodgett is approachable and concerned about his students whom he enjoys, especially in a seminar setting. His clearly worded expositions on liberal democracy and "how to keep the civil service civil" result in excellent notes but few questions.

During his three years as Principal of Victoria College it became a foregone conclusion that he would be selected as President of Vic on the retirement of Dr. A. B. B. Moore after his twenty years in office. On assuming his new position last July Hodgett was faced with the problem of leading an institution through a difficult period of transformation which it was ill-prepared to face: a "community" with a long agenda of unfinished business, a faculty body more inclined toward visceral reaction than rational discussion, a student government gaining in political influence and a traditionalist Board of Regents — all without the bond of Moore's respected personality.

J. E. HODGETTS

The question of the moment was (and still is): "How will Dr. Hodgett approach leading Vic to resolve its discussions on discipline (Mini-Campbell), university government (Mini-CUG), co-ed residences, a new campus centre, defining tenure, curricular expansion and adaptation, finding a new Principal and negotiating a new financial sharing agreement that wouldn't result in the bankruptcy of the federated colleges?"

Hodgett's approach has become clearer though these problems still beg resolution. Steve Grant, a student member of CUG defines Hodgett as "deliberate in making up his mind — a sleeper. He's the prototype of a true liberal. He listens to both sides before making a decision."

There can be no doubt that Hodgett is a principled liberal academic. In the committee reviewing Canada Council graduate grants he insisted that the application of Stanley Gray, a radical Montreal graduate student, be considered on academic grounds only. Gray got his grant. Hodgett also signed the CUG report though under strong pressure not to from the Department of Political Economy.

However, the principles of CUG are perhaps a poor indication of Dr. Hodgett's view of the university. Many statements that he has made seem to deny the basic assumptions of the report. At the Vic Grad Banquet last February he stated that students become members of the university when they graduate and go out into the world. Many students present spoke of their amazement that they could only be considered members of a community after they had left it.

He also stated at a Mini-CUG meeting that he felt that the Department of Political Economy had always considered the student viewpoint and in its deliberations had made constant changes to accommodate student requests only to be faced with different demands the next year. Nevertheless, Hodgett is clearly committed to establishing a new order in the university and does not shy away from change. His approach to reform is from the bias of a functionalist. Reforms should not be based on "hollow principles" like parity but should be governed by efficiency. In his view, the function of a committee or governing body should determine the representation on it.

When prepared, Hodgett has a cool command in meetings. For instance, faced with a determined move by Vic's faculty council to fill the office of Principal (their administrative head) immediately rather than wait for Mini-CUG's recommendations on the role and function of administrative officers, Hodgett took a firm stand. In a meeting of the Victoria College Council he firmly stated in a clear, concisely written presentation, his intention to reduce the power of the Principal and to hire an executive assistant for the President. In so doing he proposed changes rather than the expected return to the traditional system.

The majority of the university community would see Hodgett as an ideal President. But does U of T provide a rational interplay of mature opinion — the atmosphere in which Hodgett's approach would flourish?

Though he is admirably equipped for any encounter or negotiations which afford ample time for preparation of his viewpoint, though he is politically adept at compromise and though he possesses the proper public image, is Hodgett able to deal with the fringe elements of the political spectrum, the on-the-spot decision-making and personal encounters that sweep position papers under the rug? — perhaps not. But for that matter, who can?

Lawson could start Sid Smith food booth

"I know the people want it and need it"

By PHILINDA MASTERS

Who needs a food catering truck? Thousands of students and faculty, that's who. Bill Lawson, who operates an Andrew's Food Commissary truck outside Sid Smith, intends to stick around to provide it.

Lawson, the friendly guy with the longest line-ups, has been doing a roaring business around the U of T for about five years. Not without problems though: his licence was suspended for two weeks last year, he's on probation this year, and he's had two summonses. All this for parking his truck longer than ten minutes.

Four years ago, Lawson explained, when restaurants started to complain, "The drive was put on catering trucks. Eventually the cops will get rid of them. As a matter of fact, I think I'm going to lose my licence this year — at the next hearing, whenever that is."

When that does happen, Lawson hopes to be prepared. He has formulated a plan to set up a catering booth inside the lobby of Sid Smith, or just outside the door on an unused part of the balcony. The service he'll provide would be essentially the same as the truck, only he'd add homemade soup to the menu.

As to whether the university would accept such a proposal, Lawson was unsure. "But I know the people want it and need it. They're usually in too much of a hurry to go to a cafeteria, and my food's better anyway," he said. "In fact, they'd be tickled to death if it was accepted."

"If Sid Smith had a catering booth, all the other buildings would want one too, because the catering system works — it's the one everyone's used to," Lawson said. The important thing to Lawson is that he wouldn't need a licence to operate on university property — so it's the only system that will allow him to keep in business.

Wayne Richardson, SAC Campus Centre Co-ordinator, said yesterday that he is in the process of writing a report on university services. He intends to recommend that part of the area in front of Sid Smith be paved over for the trucks to drive up on, but agreed that "Maybe it would be better to have a permanent set-up as Lawson suggests."

U of T's Food Services Officer, a Mr. Medleton, said that a similar proposal was submitted last year, but was turned down by the Faculty of Arts and Sciences. He added that another proposal would have to be submitted to "a President's Committee for that sort of thing."

Asked whether he thought Lawson's idea a good one, Medleton responded forcefully, "Uh... no, I don't think so."

Bill Lawson figures he'll lose licence for his catering truck sometime this year.

Anarchist probes nature of "republican institutions"

PRISON MEMOIRS OF AN ANARCHIST
by Alexander Berkman
Schocken Books
(Book Center, Inc.)
$2.95

In 1892, Alexander Berkman, a young Russian Anarchist, attempted to assassinate Henry Clay Frick, whom Andrew Carnegie had hired to fight a striking steelworkers' union at the Homestead, Pennsylvania, steel mills. Frick in turn employed the paladins of American property, the Pinkerton Agents, to evict and kill the strikers. Berkman's attempt failed, and he was sentenced to twenty-two years in prison, of which he served fourteen. The selflessness of his act was neither questioned nor understood by the public or the strikers or the courts. The meaning of his violent deed remained, except for a minuscule coterie of comrades, primarily and intensely personal.

But the importance of Berkman's life — or the portion of it revealed in these memoirs and letters — lies not in the reason for his imprisonment, but in the wisdom and stature he acquired during imprisonment. Berkman attributed his survival of fourteen years in the midst of perpetual insanity, suicide and murder to his belief in the Anarchist cause.

"It was the vision of an ideal, the consciousness that I suffered for a great Cause, that sustained me. The very exaggeration of my self-estimate was a source of strength: I looked upon myself as a representative of a world movement; it was my duty to exemplify the spirit and dignity of the ideas it embodied. I was not a prisoner merely. I was an Anarchist in the hands of the enemy; as such, it devolved upon me to maintain the manhood and self-respect my ideals signified."

The proper response to the unmistakable nobility and purity of Berkman's life in the sadists' realms that are prisons, is only incidentally one of admiration and wonder. To understand how and why a man's life is noble is not a really difficult task, even though we ourselves are often ennobled by doing so. Neither is it difficult to feel deep anger at those who torture and torment their fellow men, whether superior men like Berkman, or "the social refuse: the lame and the halt, the broken in body and spirit, past work, past even crime." These feelings of wonder and indignation come very quickly, and though they are trustworthy, they are incomplete.

It may be, that the best understanding of Berkman's confessions must be accomplished at the level of his most rational thoughts. (This has been done by J. W. Ward, in an excellent review article on Berkman in the New York Review of Books Nov. 5, 1970.) In this way, one may analyze, qualify, verify and even reformulate arguments such as Berkman's mature, pragmatic rejection of the utility of Leon Czolgosz's assassination of President McKinley: The real despotism of republican institutions is far deeper, more insidious, because it rests on the popular delusion of self-government and independence. That is the subtle source of democratic tyranny, and, as such, it cannot be reached with a bullet. Taken together, the life inspiring and the thoughts probing, these aspects of a noble man would seem to constitute a complete example. — Paul Norton

No Known Survivors: David Levine's Political Plank (Macmillan, $9.95 — in paperback!). Whether he's drawing historical figures or our present-day men of power, David Levine's political cartoons are among the best of the past decade. Levine uses props, features taken to their extreme, and superb craftsmanship to pinpoint his feelings about the person portrayed and that person's basic character. Nixon's shifty eyes leave no doubt as to his true nature, and Dean Rusk peering out of General Ky's pocket sums up Vietnam very well. It's too bad the book's price is so preposterous, and that its pages come away from its spine five minutes after you open it. — Stephen Chesley

Westcoast myth and marriage mapped

Frank Davey's four myths for Sam Perry, talonbooks (1911 Acadia Road, Vancouver B) $2.00

Five Readings of Olson's Maximus By Frank Davey, Beaver Kosmos Folio No. 2. (From George Bowering, c/o English Department, Sir George Williams University, Montreal) $1.00

Weeds By Frank Davey, Coach House Press $3.50

There is a notable contrast in form between the first two and the last of these small books by this comparatively unnoticed Canadian poet. The Sam Perry myths owe their stance at times to the lessons Davey learned from the Black Mountain poets — Robert Duncan, Robert Creeley, especially Charles Olson — and from the unfashionable and excellent Vancouver critic and friend to poets, Warren Tallman.

The prime need to locate the self explicitly as part of a natural landscape has occupied Davey for three and part of four of his five books of poetry, a Ph.D. thesis, and his little book of criticism here mentioned. It is Olson's concern in the Maximus Poems too — the staking of one end of a tether (to & in & Gloucester, Mass.) and the moving on and from it, charting (the senses wide) the universal in the local and the idea always in the thing, and returning. Perry was a Vancouver poet and film-maker who committed suicide in the 1960s, occasioned a lurid story in Weekend and who likely meant a lot to the early Tish poets — Davey, George Bowering, James Reid (now a Maoist), David Cull, David Dawson, Fred Wah, Lionel Kearns — though I gather he wasn't readily understood.

Davey claims a mythic quality for Sam Perry's fucking in an island basin where hot spring- and tidal-waters met; local Indians considered the place holy. With the knowledge of connections gained there, Perry returned on his locus to another source, Vancouver, where there were winter-bound sentient beings in need of what light accompanied him, what rebirth: "Sam moved thru the crowd, smiling. His eyes/were desperate to explain, his hands were turned upward/& motioning. . . The day Sam Perry returned to Vancouver/snowdrops bloomed in the city park/& leaves unfurled in the houses of his people"

The approach of the rest of the book is more noticeably occasional; despite the focus of the title, it deals with subjects less sequential or less patterned than the two Perry poems. For example, pieces about Vietnam.

It's not considered good manners (now and here) to write approvingly about most Americans, but Five Readings of Olson's Maximus is a useful bit of guerilla criticism, by its very existence sniping at nationalist orthodoxy. Davey had access only to the first volume of The Maximus Poems when he wrote these little locating essays.

Weeds is a book of a form Davey hasn't explored before — the prose poem. He's been given, for years, to his own adaptation of Olson's projective verse, with its breath control pointing and syntax. Much of that is gone in this handsome green book with weeds showing palely and modestly under the black print. There's the Duncanesque phonetic spelling (the type face makes the book like something from Duncan, too), some tortured punctuation for emphasis, a bit of concretism, but (most importantly) the work here has lost the need to name the place where it occurs. It could be any house, any garden, any where. Meaning is achieved primarily from thought and action, not from locale.

The subject is mainly that of a marriage, dropped and sharded in the turning year, a poem to a page. Here are memories that are now useless because no bond is strengthened by them, the dead air between a man and woman who have nothing to say for or to each other. "Six years together, our house, our books, nos meubles et notre chat, dead leaves on naked soil, & another year lurking, another year, another year of frost, & falling leaves, & garden"

But the book is beautiful in its stillness, and so are the forms of the poems — their words, too. It isn't a shriek of grief or disgust, and suffusing the whole work is a sense of relief at being empty, without tension, quiescence with life girding itself somewhere to come through.

Frank Davey was schooled at UBC and at Southern Cal., where he did an add-water-and-stir Ph.D. thesis on the Black Mountain poets. He spent several hilarious years teaching at Canadian Services College Royal Roads (Victoria, B.C.) and now teaches at York University. He is married and has one son. His poetry deserves to be read.

— Ted Whittaker

Macina marvels at Shelley

Toronto Workshop Productions SHELLEY, or THE IDEALIST, by Anne Jellicoe is among the best shows of this year. It is nuanced, thoughtful, inventive and clean to near-faultlessness. The merits of the show itself are many, growing out of the happy admixture of a mature cast and the creative approach of director George Luscombe; the play itself is not as impeccable as its presentation, but could easily stand on its own.

The hero of this production must surely be the director, George Luscombe. The technique of continuous tableaux is not new to Toronto audiences, but its inventive success is almost beyond belief. The double- (and sometimes triple-) casting is partially implied in the play, but it is Luscombe who chose to have one character break from vilifying Helen Shelley to playing Helen Shelley herself, and for another to change from a well-fed judge into a waddling duck!

The changes are not gratuitous; they keep a simple script from tedium, and the evening passes with amazing speed. The effect can be poignant. Shelley's desire for his Harriet to breast-feed her child is played against his own burlesque attempt to feed the child himself. The doubling of parts creates similar tableaux between Shelley and actress Diane Grant: twice she is the woman who fails to reach his ideal.

The less than formidable script should be understood by the spectator. It is based largely on the life, not the poetry of the man. For every scene which romanticizes the author of "The Necessity of Atheism", there is a scene in which a heady ideal is drowned out by a dripping minor key sonata. The frivolity of the beau monde, of the poet maudit at Byron's house in Pisa is not allowed to pass; Mary Shelley questions their six-year "rattling around Italy". Hers is, I think, the point of view of the play, not Shelley's own unworkable ideals: "pure, rational, disinterested friendship" and a menage a trois in Italy!

The company is led by three fine women. Diane Grant shines in the roles of Helen Shelley, the poet's sister, and his second wife, Mary Wolstencraft. Her performances exhibit a marvelous technical exactness and a real spiritual intensity. Maja Ardal is delightful in her three parts as a playful schemer. And, Suzanne Couture is simply beautiful as Harriet Westbrook, Shelley's young first wife.

The male lead, Shelley himself, presents a crucial problem in that he must be a romantic hero. Barry Flatman's flamboyance seems slightly out of context; it is part of a lifestyle of grace and dash rarely seen nowadays.

Ray Whelan, as General Utility, must be signaled out for a great variety of dramatic abilities. His mere entrance is an immediate spark to the action. Like the other members of the cast but best among them, he can make instantaneous shifts from being a baby, to an old woman, to a judge, to a Gregorian chanter, to a singer of Alleluias and so on. The cast is of such all-round proficiency that ballet lessons, French lessons, love vows, departure vows, railery and serving as coat hangers all come off happily.

Student opera sampler presents scenes by Weber, Offenbach, Verdi

Take single acts from three different operas, by composers of three different nationalities. Put three different directors in charge, then mix and serve together. The result, The Magic of Opera, playing till Sunday night at the Faculty of Music is not really all that chaotic. In fact the show, which opened last night at the MacMillan Theater, shows an internal coherence which is all the more evident for the independence of the three acts. After last year's "operatic nightmare" production, the directors wisely abandoned attempts at an all-encompassing story line and have decided to present cameos of works by Weber, Offenbach and Verdi as they are. The result is a delightful operatic sampler which is just enough off the beaten track to possess universal appeal.

During the course of the evening it became evident again and again that this production is open and experimental in its sets and costumes. As with all experiments, some work, some don't. Beginning with Act II from Weber's Der Freischütz, director Georg Philipp successfully mobilized the congenitally static first scene. Weber calls for spoken dialogue here, which should be clearly and understandably spoken to sustain the interest between arias. The actual singing was variable. Raisa Sadowa's Agathe seemed less than convincing in voice and gesture. Ann Matthiessen, singing the role of Agathe's cousin Annchen, was well cast with a bright, strong voice which projected both singing and speaking. The second scene, in the forest by the Wolf's Glen, was ambitious visually, but the actual mechanics of screens, slides, movies etc., tended to distract rather than emphasize. One notable exception is Max's (Peter Barcza) evocation of the demon Zamiel, who appears simultaneously on six screens. In general, the scene lacked the frightening, haunted feeling it needs. Someone once commented that in Freischütz the main character, the main theme is the forest. I missed the forest. Yet, although man's aim often tangibly exceeds his grasp, there was a unity of intention, a parallel philosophy between director and composer which made this Freischütz presentation satisfying.

In Act III of Offenbach's The Tales of Hoffmann, this feeling was not there. This opera, Offenbach's last work, represents his one real bid at serious stage writing. After hundreds of comic operettas, Offenbach wanted to leave this tragic dream-fantasy as part of his legacy. To treat it as another "Orpheus in the Underworld" is to sell the composer short. Admittedly, "Hoffmann" can be slapstick, but to aim for the quick laugh is to miss the real point of the opera. Here again, an experimental element in sets and costumes with patches of colour, furniture topsyturvy, suggesting the drunken fantasy of the story-teller, Hoffmann. The outstanding singing of coloratura soprano Clare Bewley as Antonia made this segment a certain vocal success. Tenor David Meek has a pleasant voice which however seems straining and breathy at full power. "Hoffmann" is a good show, fun but perhaps too funny.

The evening climaxed with, of course, Verdi. Falstaff is the last work by the composer, written in his eighties, his one comedy. It is interesting that Offenbach, the incurable composer of comic operettas felt need to compose seriously in the end, while Verdi wanted to sign off with an understanding smile. Verdi's comedy is gentle, with slapstick merely embellishing the comedy of humanity. Avo Kittask as the corpulent Sir John Falstaff was authoritative both vocally and in circumference. Mr Kittask belongs to the select few in opera who can sing, act and enjoy doing both. The sets were apt, never distracting, although the whole stage was perhaps too widely spread. Verdi conceived "Falstaff" as a chamber opera with a small orchestra and small stage. Some of his intimacy is lost as groups of characters polarize at opposite ends of the stage. Yet, stage and sets were well utilized in a skillfully choreographed and professionally tight production.

Picabia styles shown

The Francis Picabia exhibit at the Art Gallery of Ontario is like a survey of twentieth century artistic trends. His earliest work, Spanish lady, is within the tradition of Ingres' mingling of linear and plastic treatment. Picabia's earliest landscapes show progressive attempts to master the mature estheticism of impressionistic art, while later works pass through the styles of Fauvism, analytic cubism and hermetic cubism.

However, it is the later works which capture the viewers' imagination. These works, completed between 1915 and 1922 in his New York and Paris periods, show Picabia's assimilation of the anti-art spirit of the times. His earlier machine works of this period, although essentially within the tradition of painting, are decidedly anti-tradition in their subject matter, draftsmanly presentation and metallic, industrial colours. They stress the relationship between man and machine by endowing machines with human psychology. The inability of these machines to function suggests man's impotence in face of the problems of life, although he has the potential, he lacks the power to "connect".

Several works from the early 1920's, constructed after Picabia's exposure to the original dada school in Zurich, are aggressively anti-art. One of these, Tabarac, is basically a wooden frame with four heavy cords strung from top to bottom and supporting crude cardboard name-tags. The work was originally intended to be placed a few feet from a wall, with a cage of live chickens between, and a guard was to be placed to stand before the work and throw breadcrumbs to the chickens. Unfortunately, Picabia's instructions were not followed at the gallery, and the work hangs, like any other painting, on the wall.

This is an extremely interesting exhibit, varied and never boring. In addition to the paintings, documents and poetry by Picabia are included in the exhibit, giving the viewer a more complete understanding of the breadth of rebellion in the arts during the first two decades of the twentieth century.

Two hits: one about, one in French

"God was great for the big stuff, but He has no eye for detail!" So Coco Chanel, Made moiselle Extraordinaire, set out to finish the job.

Coco isn't just a musical, (and it's certainly not serious theatre) it's a SHOW in the best of the old tradition, the kind laid down by Barnum and Bailey, the Zeig field girls, and the superstars of Hollywood.

Gabrielle "Coco" Chanel came to Paris with the first of her many lovers at the end of the 19th century. In her driving search for independence, she opened a small shop of dress design — and stormed the citadel of fashion! Besides the famous fragrance that bears her name, she discovered ladies' legs: legs in suits, pants, and the basic little black dress were, among others, her creations. She was the toast of Europe, and fashions undisputed queen until her retirement in 1939.

Finally, in the fall of 1953, she determined to re-open the House of Chanel. To her shame and fury, Paris greeted her with derision, but when Saks Fifth Avenue imported her clothes to America, she became once more the rage of the fashion world.

Coco is the story of Chanel's return, interwoven with her memories of the men who shaped her life, and the love story a young girl in whom Chanel saw herself. Though in the end it goes on without her, the frenetic, emotionless world of the fashion mannequins takes a moment's poignancy from the life of this young innocent.

Most of the show is simply a vehicle for the display of the seemingly endless stream of clothing created by Chanel, and a beautiful display it is. The set is gorgeous and overwhelming, whirling great processions of richly clothed (and unclothed) mannequins (real people, not plastic) dizzily around the stage. Chandeliers appear and disappear, as indeed do entire salons, the whole choreographed with a mad genius that leaves one begging for rest.

Katherine Hepburn is largely responsible for the pace and energy of the cast. Her enthusiasm is contagious, at one point the cast jammed the stage to celebrate Chanel's success in a wild parody of American dance, from a country hoedown through the can-can, Charleston, and Tennessee Walk. Few other actresses have the charm and power to play the indomitable Coco, to her credit, the challenge suited her well. Unfortunately, though, her new, much publicized vocal prowess was composed of rather more vigour than virtuosity.

Lana Shaw (Noelle) is beautiful, simple and sweet, but lacks the power of voice and character to fill the stage in the absence of Miss Hepburn. George Rose (Louis Greff) and Jeanne Arnold (Pignol) are steady, able foils to the massive excitement that surrounds them, especially in comparison with the sinuous evil of the homosexual Sebastian Baye (Daniel Davis). Don Chaistain (Georges) gave a merely adequate performance as Noelle's Hollywood-style lover.

Yet for all its lavishness, the show is reminiscent of the artless Gabrielle (who but Chanel would dream of a red Communion dress?). The music has a lolling upbeat, some of the lyrics are witty, and even profound, but I very much doubt that the songs will ever succeed on their own. Likewise, without Miss Hepburn, the show will die: it's lots of fun but is a play of gloss.

For those of you with a passing knowledge of French, do make an effort to see the Touring Players Foundation when it returns to Toronto later on this year. This is a bilingual company presenting two plays, Goldilocks and The Three Bears (for children) and Room 110, in both English and French. Chambre 110 (as I saw it) is a situation comedy all the more hilarious for the effort involved in understanding what is going on. The cast speak slowly and clearly for the benefit of those of us whose French is less than perfect, but the people beside me (whose mother tongue is French) found the pace quite enjoyable.

Once more, John. John!

Oh that we had been spared Puritanism! The Middle Ages had such a healthy attitude towards fun. Take for example the two Medieval farces now being presented by the P.L.S. tonight and tomorrow at the New Vic Theatre: Once More (anonymous) and John John by John Heywood

Both are about a cowering husband, a bold wife and a somewhat less than pious priest. The language is often quite suggestive, and where one might not otherwise understand, the actors are very careful to illustrate. In Once More, Jan tries to frighten his wife into submission by replying "once more" to all that she does or says, thereby convincing her that he is possessed. Unfortunately she finds out and he is worse off than ever. Richard Green handles the part of Jan successfully, but unfortunately Francie Doyle lacks the forceful-ness and mobility necessary to enliven the character of the wife. John Cartwright is excellent as John John, the cuckolded husband, brave in word but not in deed. He handles the long opening monologue with a variety of tone and expression that is absent in Brenda Weeks' rendering of the wife. George di Cicco makes an excellent priest and lover, marvellously haughty and lustful.

Although the first play is slow moving, largely because of the curtain used to change scenes, and in spite of the deficiencies in the playing, the evening is one of farce.

The two plays are complemented by a delightful musical interlude of 16th century recorder music with two very amusing bawdy songs accompanied by the lute, songs taken from Pills to Purge Melancholy.

The Pocoli Ludique Societas gives us a rare occasion to see seldom-played works done in a style hopefully near the original, with a minimum of props and a maximum of costume and slapstick gesture. Since the verse plays are very difficult to read this is a painless way of getting around it and it will cost you nothing but an evening; they even serve coffee at intermission.

Modern Masters series helps you to appear hip

The Modern Masters Series William Collins/Fontana $.95 or $ 1.25

The latest fad among with-it paperback publishers these days is to update the "great ideas" approach to publishing.

The most ambitious project is one undertaken by Fontana Books, the paperback wing of British publishers Wm. Collins.

Their series, "Modern Masters", manages to achieve two goals at once. First, it breaks in on the important new "radical ideas" market. And secondly, and perhaps even more importantly, it carries out a subtle put-down of the authors covered.

As I suggested, the "masters" are all men of a more or less "radical" tinge, men whose names are bandied about in the newspapers and in academic chatter as the inspirers of any local revolution that might happen to be going down. Volumes on Herbert Marcuse, Frantz Fanon, Albert Camus, George Lukacs, Che Guevara and Claude Levi-Strauss, are among those already published.

The slim paperbacked books have an eye-catching design (the covers of the first ten volumes, we are told, fit together to form an abstract mosaic pattern when you spread them out on the floor. The "right" combination reproduces a painting by Oliver Bevan, but you may use your individual esthetic judgment as you see fit), which more than compensates for the occasional misprint in the text of the books.

The format of the texts is straightforward — biographical data first, and then an account of the master's published career.

The whole concept of such digests (Read all about it! The real story about Herbert Marcuse's thinking! In just 94 pages! We cover Che in 93 pages and Frantz Fanon can be made a valuable part of your cultural heritage in the short space of 97 pages!) can easily be questioned.

But of course, the books simply reflect a popsize style of education that is very much with us. Once you have read one of these books, you will be capable of holding forth in seminar rooms and in essays with the appearance of great insight into the particular "master" at hand.

But the second achievement of the series, which I alluded to earlier, is that it manages to achieve an important ideological victory over its subject matter.

The victory, it seems to me, is primarily a reflection of the erratic nature of the academic marketplace which spawned the books.

The net effect of the series is a popularization which has a definite hit and miss flavour about it. The suggestion is that the "masters", interesting as they may be, are dealing just in ideas, after all — and ideas are always subject to interpretation.

Alasdair MacIntyre, the author of the Marcuse book, explains on practically the first page, that he thinks "almost all of Marcuse's key positions are false." His critique, as it turns out, is that Marcuse is really not a Marxist at all, but a "pre-Marxist", who has put none of Marx's important scientific discoveries to practical use.

There is a lot of validity in this view, but MacIntyre, after launching this critique shifts his ground dramatically when he starts to set forth his own ideas about the social phenomena Marcuse has dissected.

"The most impressive political fact of our time is the accidental character of most of the policies which government is forced to embrace," writes MacIntyre.

Far from being a Marxist himself, MacIntyre has no better answers to offer than Marcuse. He is able, with apparent sincerity, to describe "American imperialism in Vietnam" as a "myth".

If the weight of his attack on Marcuse is to doubt Marcuse's orthodoxy as a Marxist, surely he cannot be expected to do this from a non-Marxist standpoint.

Unlike the Marcuse book, the rundowns of the life and works of Guevara, Fanon, and Camus are generally sound expositions of their basic themes. Because these men were not abstract theoreticians only, but men of action also, they cannot be reproached with the same complaints MacIntyre lodges against Marcuse — that the man appears to be wise, but does not bother to substantiate any of his ideas.

The volume by Edmund Leach on the French anthropologist Claude Levi-Strauss proved the most rewarding.

Levi-Strauss' books, widely read in Europe, are only now being translated for English audiences, and so Leach's book performs a valuable office of first introduction.

After reading Leach's exposition, my impression is that Leach places too much emphasis on the empirical side of Levi-Strauss' work and less on his contribution to the structuralist approach to social phenomena.

Levi-Strauss deals in myth and archetypal structures. Unlike Frye, however, who bases his theories in the world of literature, Levi-Strauss finds his structural theories on a more basic human activity — language itself.

His thesis is that structurally — by the very nature of human things — certain categories develop in human beings.

Once you elaborate and expand upon this basis, you develop "a kind of algebraic matrix of possible permutations... the empirical evidence is merely an example of what is possible."

The limitation of Leach's exposition of Levi-Strauss is that he stresses the biologic aspects of the application of this kind of theory.

Levi-Strauss is irrevocably a materialist.

No ripoffs at Round Records: owner not in it for the dough

Larry Ellenson, a bearded young man who still speaks with an accent which reveals his roots south of the border, was, until recently, not unlike many University graduates, unemployed. However, he has since become the engaging entrepreneur behind Toronto's newest discount record outlet, Round Records. Coming to Toronto after receiving a degree at Berkeley, and wishing to avoid wearing the khaki, Ellenson enrolled himself in the School of Business at U of T and received his M.B.A.

However, not wishing to sacrifice himself to any "pig" corporations, and being unable to find employment in any suitable firms, Ellenson began to research the possibility of opening a record store. The idea had been with him since his days as an undergrad at Berkeley, where he saw a campus dealer rise from the ranks of a small on-campus operator to become the major record distributor in the area. Further, not unlike many other music devotees in the city, he realized that records here were grossly overpriced, and resolved to do something about it.

After many hassles in first finding a site, and then receiving cooperation from rental agents who were wary of any possible legal complications arising from having a "hip" establishment on the premises, he finally was given a one month lease on his present site at 110 Bloor St. W. on the second floor.

Starting out with a very small stock of albums, Ellenson has resolved to try and increase his stock by channeling his returns back into his stock. However, any record not in stock will be ordered for you at the same price which is charged for albums of that list price already in stock. These prices are the lowest in the city at $3.49 for $5.29 list, $4.15 for $6.29 list, and generally one third off list price. Further, I am informed that the opening special still persists at $3.90 for the newest Hendrix and Pearl albums.

The store also offers posters, pipes, and other bits of handiwork, which Ellenson is willing to sell on consignment for any person wishing him to do so. Last, but not least, the store offers Ellenson himself — an engaging and intense young man who is genuinely trying to make a fair dollar. He has some candid viewpoints and recollections which he is willing to share with patrons.

When the manager of the Record Treasury, Ellenson's nearest competitor, was asked his opinion of his new neighbour, he professed ignorance of its existence, but offered that maybe he would go over and give it a look. It is a very good idea for you to do the same.

By the way, when asked what he would do if the store became a major success, Ellenson replied simply that maybe then his wife could quit her job at the bank, and then spend more time in the store with him. He's that kind of guy.

Issy Dubinsky

following many of the lines pointed out by Engels in his anthropologic writings. The question Leach fails to explore sufficiently is the structuralist approach to the analysis of human activity. Yet it is these very directions which are now becoming increasingly significant through the work of such "social" structuralists as R. D. Laing and Louis Althusser.

A reading of this book on Levi-Strauss, then, can prove a useful introduction to the man, but you can leave it with a sense of the tedium of anthropological overkill. It is best read with an open mind.

To sum up, the Fontana Modern Masters series will perform several functions

- It's a handy set of short cribs, which deal in a sophisticated way, with the most original and challenging men of our century.

- it's a good introduction to them, or, good light reading for readers familiar with the original work.

So far, only half a dozen of the books are out, but more than a dozen more are in preparation. Most are written by prominent scholars in the fields, but one would be wary of the authors' tendencies to (1) deprecate the importance of the achievements of their subjects, and (2) to be blind to the most obvious social correlates by which we can measure, ourselves, the relevance of the work.

BOOKS

Two extremes of the Americas this week — Jorge Luis Borges and Geronimo. The former has his base in and around Buenos Aires but all the world's literatures are his playthings; illiterate Geronimo moved around a bit more in Mexico and Arizona, but his roots, though of a different kind, were just as deep.

Geronimo: His Own Story (eds S. M. Barrett, F. W. Turner III, Clark Irwin, $8.35) is a bitter and understated tale of the tough brave's life and of that of his band, the Chiricahua Apaches, their myths, laws, customs and the savage grace of their wars against the U.S. cavalry and the Mexicans.

"We are vanishing from the earth, yet I cannot think we are useless or Usen would not have created us. He created all tribes of men and certainly had a righteous purpose in creating each."

"For each tribe of men Usen created He also made a home. In the land created for any particular tribe He placed whatever would be best for the welfare of that tribe."

Hardly the kind of talk that would go easily down the craw of 19th century expansionists in the U.S.A. or Canada. But Geronimo could say it. Although he dedicated his autobiography to President Theodore Roosevelt in the hope that he and his people would be allowed to get back to the southwest to end their days, Geronimo dies where he dictated this memoir, at Fort Sill, Oklahoma, where he was a prisoner of war.

The Aleph and Other Stories (re-thought into English from Spanish by Borges and Norman Thomas Di Giovanni, Clark Irwin, $9.95) is the second of a ten-book series of Borges' works to be Englished. The stories here are accompanied by their author's commentaries and by a lengthy "Autobiographical Essay."

Some tales are retranslated, and formerly appeared in other English collections of Borges' work. Unfortunately, English copyrights to some of his best stories — "Tlon, Uqbar, Orbis Tertius"; "Funes the Memorious"; "The Search of Averroes" — were denied Borges and Di Giovanni for this edition.

We are still left with a representative sampling of naturalistic pieces about gauchos and thugs, the gnarled metaphysical fictions, labyrinthine detective stories — all from the pen of the most justly celebrated contemporary writer of Spanish prose.

Now in his 70s and blind, Borges is director of the National Library in Buenos Aires. He opposed Peron when that greedy creep held his foot on the neck of Argentina. Peron retaliated by making Borges inspector of poultry and rabbits in the public markets.

Violence and the mind of man before the inscrutable changing universe — the labyrinth, the knife and the mirror being their Geronimo, aged 57, in 1886.

major symbols for Borges — have always fascinated him.

He says, in his collection of parables, Dreamtigers: "A man sets himself the task of portraying the world. Through the years he peoples a space with images of provinces, kingdoms, mountains, bays, ships, islands, fishes, rooms, instruments, stars, horses, and people. Shortly before his death, he discovers that patient labyrinth of lines traces the image of his face." —T.W.

ROCK

Ampex Records, a Toronto distributor, has recently taken over the circulation of Vanguard Records, a firm which once put out the most comprehensive line of folk music on the market. Since many of the finer artists have left the label, the company has seen fit to release two-record composites of many of these artists. Thus, the early material of artists such as Eric Andersen (VSO 7/8), Joan Baez (VSO 6560/61), Ian and Sylvia (VSO 5/6), Jim Kweskin (VSD 13/14), and Buffy Ste. Marie (VSD 314), is available at the very reasonable list price of $6.29 per two record set. The cuts are lifted right off the original albums, so the production values are not always the highest, but the material is well chosen and very representative of the "best" of the artists.

HOT TUNA is a one night group formed for a blues concert at the Fillmore in New York. Featuring three lead guitarists from various rock groups, the playing is first rate, but because the recording was done live, it lacks any sort of quality. The album may be worth having for its musical quality alone, however. RCA LSP 4353

JOHN PHILLIPS, former lead singer and chief writer for the Mamas and Papas, has released a solo album for RCA (DS 50077). The album retains the soft, lyrical quality of Phillip's writing, and further goes on to highlight his soft, romantic voice. However, the dynamism of the performer, which comes through very well live, is clouded on this album.

THE BANU, perhaps the Canadian pop group of the greatest notoriety, have left me terribly disappointed with their third album STAGE FRIGHT (Capitol SW 425). The album is terribly same sounding after their first albums, and thus the group seems to be plagued by a lack of new directions for their music to follow. Further, this album offers no new great individual song, as their others did. Altogether, a major disappointment.

JOE COCKER also has done a live recording — one which has been captured not only on record, but will also be the core of an upcoming rock film vignette. This album, MAD DOGS ANO ENGLISHMEN (A&M 9P 4269), while far from a good production, does manage to capture the fantastic energy of the man, and thus any musical quality which is lacking is more than compensated for. Any fan of Cocker, or of the Woodstock film will cherish this album. —I.D.

"To us, marriage is a forever kind of thing. And the Diamond Ring makes it even more forever.

I suggested Birks because I'd heard about their new young designers and the fantastic new ring settings they're dreaming up. Some were even too avant garde for me... and I'm nineteen!

Tom knew nothing about diamonds. (Who does!) So he was determined to go where he could get real answers and a straight deal. That had to be Birks, too. Their new expanded range of diamonds meant that we could choose from stones of different qualities at prices to match; and with the Birks guarantee of getting full value for our money—no matter how little or how much we were spending."

Work for MAB earns Adamson the Loudon

Peter Adamson, a third-year Medical student who has been the chairman of the coordinating committee for a proposed new men's athletic building, was presented with the T. R. Loudon Trophy last night as the Athletic Association gathered for their annual backslapping and award night at Hart House.

The Loudon is presented each year to a person "either student or a staff member for outstanding services in the advancement of athletics." Last year's recipient was retiring athletic director Warren Stevens.

"When the final goal of our new athletic building is finally achieved," said university Vice-President Don Forster who presented the award, "his work will be the decisive factor."

Crying need

The need of a new athletic building to supplement the outrageously overtaxed facilities of Hart House has been widely recognized for decades but either one factor or another has always intervened to block its completion.

Presently, the university administration has promised land for the site but it is up to the Athletic Association to raise the capital building costs.

"Maybe I'm a little too optimistic," said Adamson later, "but I think we might see a new men's athletic building in the next two or three years. We now have permission from the university to start a fund drive which we hope to get under way within about six months."

Another special award recipient was university president Dr. Claude Bissell who was presented with a special gold T. Dr. Bissell the school's top administrator since 1958, is stepping down from the presidency at the end of June.

Lacrosse prowess

"I know my connection with athletics is a little tenuous," admitted Dr. Bissell. "However, once I did receive a short line in The Varsity sports for my lacrosse skill which I will always treasure."

Other individual award winners were: Brian St. John, Dr. George Biggs Trophy as the top undergraduate athlete and also the Dr. Bill Dafeo Trophy for hockey; Glen Markle, Johnny Copp Trophy, football; Larry Trafford, Dr.

Vic rallies on ice, PHE on court

Vic meets Engineering in final

By LYNDON LITTLE

Victoria College handed the PHE A's a little of their own medicine Wednesday afternoon to advance to the finals of the 1971 Jennings Cup interfac hockey championships.

In the second game of the series Monday night, PHE spotted Vic the first four goals then roared back with two third period markers to deadlock the series on the round, 4-4 (PHE won the first game 2-0). However, in Wednesday's game — a special tie-breaker match — it was Vic's turn to spot PHE and early lead then retaliate for a 4-2 victory.

VIC, WHICH FINISHED the regular season in third spot in the first division, will now meet Sr. Engineering in the first game of the finals tonight at Varsity Arena. Game time is 6:30 p.m.

Goals by Robbie Ellis and Kent Duncan staked the PhysEders to a quick 2-0 lead before Phil Adams counted Vic's first goal late in the opening period. Duncan's score was a picture effort on a blazing shot from the blueline that found the mark just under the crossbar.

However, the second period was all Vic as Bob Sharpe, Ted Toye and Jerry Kalata connected to provide their team with the margin of victory.

"I THINK OUR OVERALL SKATING ability may have made the difference," said Vic coach Ray Payne later.

"We've had our problems during the regular season — especially getting a full team together because of various time conflicts. But I think things are starting to work out finally."

"LOOK AT JERRY KALATA," he added. "He was just an emergency replacement but he gets a big goal Monday and another this afternoon!"

Payne, a special student in PhysEd feels the key to the final series with Sr. Engineering — who defeated Vic two out of three games during the regular season — will be Vic's ability to outplay the plumbers' defensive corps. "There's no doubt about it," says Payne. "The Engineers have a couple of fine defencemen that control their attack."

NOTES: The second game of the finals is scheduled for Monday afternoon at 12:30 with the second and third games, if necessary, slated for Tuesday and Thursday evening. The final hockey game at Varsity Arena this season will be played next Friday night when the NHL old boys will meet the Flying Fathers.

PhysEders advance to meet U.C.

By THE DUKE

A miracle second half finish led PHE to a 73-62 victory over Vic in the second game of their two-game point Sifton Cup semi-final series.

The 11-point margin enabled PHE to take the series on the round by a 139-133 count and to advance to the finals against the U.C. Bombers, the defending champions. Vic had taken the first game, 71-66, last Thursday.

DOWN 38-29 AT THE HALF, PHE stormed back to outscore Vic by 20 points to gain the berth in the finals.

Before Wednesday night's game, Vic was talking of knocking out PHE and hence completing the triple crown of Vic — PHE rivalry. Earlier, Vic had knocked the PhysEders out of the Mulock Cup (football) and Wednesday afternoon had upset the jocks in the Jennings Cup semi-finals (hockey). However, Vic's basketball loss to PHE destroyed their dreams of a triple-crown in 1970-71.

The PHE Pioneers started pressing right from the locker room and never let up throughout the entire game.

DESPITE THIS PRESS, the Pioneers never took command until PHE coach Bob Cheeseman inserted "Nine-Lives" Harris into the game. "Nine-Lives" aggressive play served as the catalyst to Randy "Milo" Filinski's scoring and to Eric "Hen" Quackenbush's rebounding which won the game for PHE.

In the Black Hart pub following the game, The Duke held court as he interviewed various members of the victorious PHE team.

Even before he could begin his first interview, Milo Filinski begged The Duke to play him a little one-in-one. The Duke then informed Milo that he was one of the three finalists for the playoff award.

NEXT UP WAS FIRST TEAM all-star guard John "Tads" Chapman. Tads, who may be playing professional football for the B.C. Lions next year, said to The Duke: "You know, you can forget the Grey Cup! I just want to win the Sifton Cup before I leave Varsity."

Nine-Lives then stated that he would not shave until the Sifton Cup belonged to PHE.

Finally, all-star coach Cheeseman took his turn and told the Duke about his strategy for the final against U.C. All The Duke will say at this point is that it involves sandwiches.

FOR VIC, DAVE "LONG GONE" Ferguson scored 23 points and first team all-star guard Dave "The Executioner" Quick lived up to his advance billing by coming up with 19 points.

Despite Brian "Cold Duck" Stevens crew's elimination in the semis, it must be remembered that Vic had to upset the third place finishers from Sr. Engineering to get that far.

Praxis painted as security risk

Liberal MP Harold Stafford said last week that Praxis Corporation, a Toronto based non-profit research and social change, organization, could affect the security of Canada.

He was questioning RCMP Commissioner W. L. Higgit before the Commons Justice Committee last week.

A Canadian Press Story says: "Mr. Stafford asked whether Commissioner Higgit is aware of the Praxis Corp. which had been given $68,000 in federal funds to promote dissent.

"At the poor people's conference last fall in Toronto, the corporation had been the organizer and the conference had passed controversial resolutions, including one indicating support for the FLQ and its demand for the release of the so-called (sic) political prisoners.

"Mr. Stafford said the organization could affect the security of Canada.

"Later David Orlikow (NDP, Winnipeg North) noted that Stephen Clarkson, a Toronto Liberal, is on the board of Praxis Corp."

Contacted last night, U of T

Prof. Abe Rotstein, also on the Praxis board, said "I don't find that surprising", he said. "It's their (the RCMP's) business to know what's going on."

APPLICATION DEADLINE: April 8, 1971

Last May a night watchman who works for the University of Toronto submitted a routine statement of grievance to his superiors.

The grievance was a simple one — the University of Toronto, he charged, was deliberately violating the collective agreement it had signed with his union.

"It's not what the contract called for," says Fred Routley simply.

Routley, one of the 700 campus members of Local 204 of the Service Employees Union, is union steward for his fellow watchmen.

"Unbelievable as it is, this is what's happening," says Routley. "I just can't reconcile myself to the fact that this is what the university has been doing."

What has the university been doing?

According to Routley, U of T has failed to pay night watchmen the correct wages as required by the agreement signed in July 1969 between the union and the university.

The Agreement, which comes in a green-jacketed well-thumbed-over booklet, states clearly:

"All hours worked in excess of eight (8) hours per day or forty (40) hours per week, shall be considered to be overtime and shall be paid for at the rate of one and one half times the regular hourly rate."

Further, the agreement also says that personnel working afternoon and overnight shifts are eligible for "shift premiums" in the amount of 10 and 15 cents per hour respectively.

U of T has not bothered to perform either of these obligations. Nobody really noticed at first, since, as Routley points out, "They don't explain how they pay us."

The grievance, then, was a simple one — full retroactive compensation was required for the time span of the agreement (July 1969 to July 1970), as well as an explanation of the calculations arrived at.

After filing his grievance, Routley consulted a lawyer at his own expense and the lawyer wrote that it was his view that the grievance was "sound" and that Routley, for one, was "entitled to overtime pay which is on a recurring pattern of 12 hours per week, and 16 hours per week."

The life of a watchman is an extremely disorienting one. You work at night. You rarely, if ever, see your fellow workers, because you work alone. And you work long hours — mostly 12-hour shifts.

The university schedules its men on rotating nine-week shifts. A nine-week shift averages out to more than 450 hours per man — 90 hours more than you would expect in a regular work week.

But there has been no overtime pay. In spite of the Agreement.

The story of Fred Routley's grievance against the university deserves to be told in some detail. For one, it shows the underside of an institution that pretends to be somehow "purer" than other social institutions.

But it also illustrates how cosy a relationship U of T has managed to foster with the SEU, an organization ostensibly dedicated to working for the rights of its members.

And Routley's story, as you will read here, is not an isolated one at all.

Neither the university nor the union have tried to help Routley and his fellow workers gain satisfaction.

On July 13, 1970 Bruce Ounsford, the general representative for Local 204 of the SEU, wrote a short one-paragraph letter to U of T's manager of personnel services, John Parker.

"I have carefully considered all of the circumstances," Ounsford wrote, "and, therefore, agree to settle the grievance for the university's favour."

A copy of the letter went to Routley.

Routley's lawyers quickly shot off a letter to Ounsford, inquiring why the union would take steps "which apparently disregard the collective agreement."

The issue simmered for the next six months. The university was quiet, the union was quiet, and Routley just watched.

During this period, the union and the university were busily negotiating a new collective agreement, to cover the period from July 1970 to July 1972.

Miraculously, it seems, the new agreement, to cover the period

Miraculously, it seems, the new agreement took Routley's grievance into account. But not favourably.

The new agreement was worded more ambiguously, making special provisions for the peculiar hours worked by watchmen.

"Regular hours" for watchmen were defined as an "average" of 40 hours per week over a 9 week nine week schedule. This means that no overtime is provided for men working more than the eight-hour day.

But Routley makes it clear that his case against the university applies only to the period of time when the earlier agreement was in effect.

Two months ago, he and his lawyers launched a major effort to have the university and the union

How U of T cheated its workers admit their responsibility for cheating men out of the pay they had earned.

Similar letters were sent to both union officials and the board of governors of the university, threatening legal action to recover retroactive pay.

The letter to the Board of Governors was quite explicit.

After citing the relevant section 15, paragraph 2 of the Agreement, Eastman (Routley's lawyer) pointed out that Routley had been working 48 hours a week on a regular rotating basis, but had never received overtime pay.

Eastman charged that a settlement was reached in July between Parker (the university's personnel man) and the union, without consultation with Routley, and against his wishes.

Eastman requested the board of governors to consider intervening in the situation.

Eastman's high pressured intervention did bear some results, however.

The Service Employees Union arranged for him to meet with their lawyer, and the lawyers sat down and talked things over.

In a written account Eastman reported that the union was not about to make any settlement.

The SEU lawyer, reported Eastman, said "the union decided to 'settle' with the university as a result of a meeting between 'some' watchman who 'decided' that the 'true intent' of meaning of the collective agreement was the same as in 1968 that is to say that there was no overt intention to be paid to workmen working the peculiar hours that regulated their weekly schedules."

The union then, it seems, was quite willing to admit that the actual wording of the agreement had been correctly interpreted by Routley. It was the spirit of the agreement which had been misconstrued.

The university, needless to say, must have been overjoyed to find it was dealing with a union which was willing to ignore the actual agreements they both signed in favour of a spirit of mutual cooperation.

Fred Routley doesn't know what will happen to him now. A strong trade unionist for years, he's simply flabbergasted by the kind of union he's found since he came to work on the U of T campus.

"He's never lost faith," says his daughter, a part-time student. "He's spent his whole life being a fighter, working through the structures. But he's losing his faith."

"But he's losing his faith," she adds, "it's bad to see somebody lose their faith."

"When you file a grievance," concludes Routley, "it gets settled in favour of the university."

A second incident provides more evidence for this kind of judgment.

In December a caretaker who had worked for U of T for four years was abruptly fired by his supervisor.

The employee, Harold Fahey, was informed in early December that he would be out of a job New Year's Eve.

His dismissal note stated that although the university had spent "considerable time and effort" in trying to make a "useful employee out of you," Fahey had turned out to be "not suitable for this type of work."

The union steward for the night cleaners, Allan Mutch, filed a statement of grievance on behalf of Fahey.

Fahey was being fired for insufficient cause, argued Mutch, considering how long he had worked for the university.

"There's a probation period of 60 days," says Mutch. "If the fellow was unsuitable for work, why didn't they fire him then. But not after four years."

In January John Parker, whose new title had now become "Manager, Management/Labour Relations", held two meetings over the firing, and decided the firing was justified.

The university was satisfied, the union made no protest, but Mutch is still angry over the outcome of the meetings.

"It's one of the worst cases I've seen," says Mutch. "I couldn't tell who fought hardest to keep him out — the union or the university."

"I was shaken beyond belief."

Fahey's firing, says Mutch, is just another example of the cosy kind of relationship that exists between the SEU and the university personnel office.

You expect the university to take a tough line against its employees. When the university bargains over pay schedules with its non-academic employees, it is never generous. It refers obediently to wage guidelines.

What is less expected is that the union which represents employees, would be almost indifferent on issues which affect the day to day existence and even the livelihood of its members.

"If your job was on the line," says Mutch, "is this the kind of representation you'd want. Of course not."

"You need people with guts, courage, intelligence. We'd like to belong to a decent union."

The workers who belong to the Service Employees Union, Local 204, are among the one-fifth of U of T's non-academic employees who are unionized in any form at all.

Next to the Canadian Union of Public Employees, which represents library workers and student council employees, the SEU is the major campus union.

It has 700 campus members in such categories as caretakers, service men, gardeners, grounds men, drivers, watchmen, parking attendants, guards, and employees at University College's Whitney Hall.

U of T deducts $4 a month from these employees wages, and hands it over to the SEU.

The SEU is an international union, with headquarters south of the border.

The SEU is generally known as one of the more conservative craft unions. Membership is restricted to persons of good moral character and excludes Communists, subversives and anyhow who supports their ideas.

The $4 check-off is about the only contact many workers have with their union.

And vice versa. The $4 they get from the university is apparently the only interest the union has in its members.

The negotiations for the latest contract highlight another example of the disdainful attitude of the union officialdom towards its workers.

Negotiations were conducted up until the morning of Sept. 11. Last fall.

Ratification took place that afternoon, at a meeting of less than half the membership, hastily assembled by word of mouth invitation.

Not all employees, of course, could attend the meeting, since many were at work and others simply were never notified.

A special meeting of the entire Local must be called with at least 48 hours notice, by mail. Since U of T workers are only a segment of the total local's full membership, these reasonable regulations set forth in the constitution did not apply.

A lawyer, consulted by one of the union stewards (who had not been informed of the ratification meetings) gave as his opinion that "very possibly the execution of the collective agreement was not authorized", but thought it unlikely any courts would overturn a working agreement.

In short, if the university and the union were both happy, there is little the workers could do.

"We're isolated as a group," says one union member. "Many of us never see the men we work with at all."

Many university employees are recent immigrants to Canada, understand little English and even less of the intricacies of unions, grievances and arbitration.

The unionist recounts an incident to illustrate his point.

"One Portuguese fellow hurt his back on the job, and was afraid to go to the hospital for fear of losing his job."

What will happen now to the handful of active men — some of them among the union stewards responsible for doing the union's work — who are dissatisfied with the treatment their union metes out to its members?

These men have been pushed from pillar to post," says Marianne Routley, "it hurts my heart to see them treated this way."

"It kills them to work a 12-hour shift four days in a row. It sounds like something out of Dickens, but it's really happening here."

What happens to men who cannot sleep because they know they are being injured by powerful institutions?

Do they knuckle under, thankful to be working at all?

Or do they start to fight?

Or do they face the ultimate penalty — losing their jobs — for being troublemakers?

Some of them came to The Varsity to tell their story because they thought it was one of the last resorts. They thought students could help somehow, or at least that students should know what was happening.

They cannot afford legal expenses to wage a long battle in the courts.

This is the only conceivable way they have of fighting now," says Marianne Routley. If they could find some way of creating a spirit of togetherness, maybe they could win this.

"To me, the purest form of writing is good journalism. Not the daily press poppycock but the type every new generation for the past three or four has called or thought of as the New Journalism: free, not uncolourful reportage whose sole aim is truth in all fields at any cost."

Projects for a liberated university

"The price that is paid for this great freedom, is that it will not be translated into action. In a place where reason is king, action can only impair someone else's right to reason."

—Richard Lester,

Chairman of the Board of Governors at Simon Fraser University, speaking in July 1970 at the annual convention of the International Association of College and University Security Directors.

At the corner of Queen and Jarvis, a man is walking east along the sidewalk. It's about 9:15 in the morning.

He gets to the curb and pauses. Very slowly, almost gracefully, he careens forward, his joints and limbs seeming to freeze for a momentary second before he falls forward, striking the pavement with his forehead.

A block further along a young woman is traipsing in a long dress and wooden shoes up Church St., tottering, and trying to keep her balance as well.

Behind me on the streetcar, a man is moaning behind his teeth in a low, sharp, grinding wail.

At one of U of T's colleges, a professor is being fired because he did not do enough research

What kind of research? Would it have helped?

Next year U of T will offer more courses in French Canada and in women's studies.

Very good.
But there is still no course offered in the history of the Canadian working people. Last year there was a course in "American labour history", but it is not listed in next year's calendar.

Constitutions, political science, ages of reform and progress.

But little to learn why there are more than three quarters of a million Canadians unemployed now — more people than there were at the depths of the Depression of the 1930's...

And nothing to learn about what can be done.

One professor tells me that a well-known U of T academic operates a virtual one-man research and idea industry out of his offices.

He gets foundation grants, and then buys ideas and projects from himself.

The first move of university affairs minister John White, on getting his new job, was to announce he would be firing ten per cent of his department's employees.

(That's all right John, you'll still have a 90 per cent survival rate, and that's good enough, isn't it?)

His second move was to cut back aid to graduate programs in Ontario universities.

(The taxpayers will love you won't they John. Those pampered students...)

"I am a single mother on Family and Social Service Benefits (Welfare), and a full-time student at the University of Toronto. I applied for a Student Grant (OSAP) and found myself caught in a policy bind between the two departments. As soon as I was granted a Student Award, my Family Benefits were cut down. This left me in a difficult financial situation and one that I feel is unjustifiable.

"Since there is no legislation covering a situation such as mine, all decisions are made by policies which are made arbitrarily by the Social and Welfare Service Dept.

"On discovering that there are approximately 100 single mothers attending post-secondary education institutions — i.e. U of T, York, Ontario College of Arts, Ryerson and Community Colleges — a group of us felt it was necessary to take some positive action in establishing a just legislation.

"When we approached the government with the hope of finding names of other women in the same situation, we were told that such information is "confidential."

"We would very much like to get in touch with women and men who have found themselves in this situation and would like to understand the rationale behind the policy and/or how to do something about it.

"Please contact me by writing to Mrs. O. Dobosh, or phone me at 694-1930."

Secretary of State Gerard Pelletier kicked off his massive youth pacification program for this summer with a major expenditure last weekend.

He flew several dozen student council members and campus newspaper editors to Montreal to meet him face to face and get the lowdown on the project. He would not say what this cost.

His plan was to "appeal to the creativity, imagination, and inventive spirit of the youth of Canada". He would not explain why it was not worthwhile to establish the same kind of priority for dealing with general unemployment.

"We just don't know how the money will be spent," said Pelletier. "That's the beauty of it, that's the value of the project."

You could hear the Canadian taxpayer groaning again at the coddling of the pampered youth of the nation.

The Opportunities for Youth Program is allocating $15 million to youth projects, none of which have been approved. Applications can be had from Canada Manpower and Summer Employment Centres, says the Secretary of State.

"Create your own summer job," the brochure invites.

No permanent jobs will be created by the program.

POLITICS 1970 (Ontario) — This course will focus on the vital political issues in the province in the forthcoming decade and try to identify the directions in which we must move to forestall social, economic, cultural and ecological disaster.

Emphasis will be placed on the distinctive characteristics of the exploitation of the working people of this province, and students will attempt to indicate the ways in which working people can organize to change this system.

Students participating in the course will collectively prepare a thorough study of written study of the province's problem, outlining the conclusions they have reached from their analysis of Ontario's real situation.

In anticipation of the forthcoming provincial elections, students will engage in province-wide publicity around the results of their course, employing all forms of creative media — including theatre, music, film, television, posters, the printed word.

U of T students face job discrimination

By PHIL CHARKO

The U of T Placement Centre is looking for ways to combat racial discrimination against foreign students seeking employment.

Unless a new method of aiding job applicants is found, a "hard core of unemployables" will remain on file at the Centre, warned director David Currie.

Eighteen people received jobs out of 160 openings at the Centre from October to March, Currie said Wednesday, citing racial and cultural discrimination as some of the reasons.

He outlined the problem to the Centre's Advisory Council — the placement Centre is losing credibility with employers. When questioned by the council Currie suggested the Centre become involved in making an active evaluation of the students before informing them of jobs.

At present only academic qualifications and student interest are considered before the centre informs the student of a job opening. A subjective evaluation procedure by the centre would result in only those best suited for the job being informed. Currie had no specific recommendations on how such an evaluation could be made.

Currie said students are not getting jobs because of unrealistic expectations, cultural and racial problems. For instance, he noted that many students are not prepared to move out of Toronto and some expect too high a wage.

Many Chinese, Indian and Pakistani students do not get jobs because of discrimination, the director said. Out of the 800 students still in the Placement Centre's files from the '70 graduating class perhaps 300 fall into that category.

After a year of searching large numbers of students no longer have the right attitude in seeking jobs, he said. For example, although there was an opening for an in-perienced M.A. in Psychology for Director of a social agency in Hamilton, none of the seven people contacted by the Placement Centre got the job.

Community college students are obtaining jobs that might have gone to U of T people. Of the Science students of the '71 Arts and Science graduating class only 9 per cent got jobs. A subjective evaluation procedure would optimise employment for the students contacted. Currie noted that although certain individuals would be hurt by the new procedure — particularly those who are not aggressive — the Placement Centre would be able to maintain its service to students as a whole. Those people whom the Centre considered inadequately prepared to obtain employment could be helped through additional services provided by the Centre or they could be sent to other agencies such as the University Advisory Bureau.

Currie stated that he did not have too much confidence with the people in the Advisory Bureau.

Currie identified two problems, summer and long term employment.

"As far as I'm concerned, any U of T student can get a summer job if he wants one. He may have to accept the minimum wage however," said Currie. The longer term problem involves the question of the role of the Placement Centre in preparing them for jobs.

Currie also noted that government expenditure on student employment is "not up that much from last year."

The high unemployment is not just due to Trudeau's recent monetary and fiscal policies: at least some of it is due to structural unemployment. Also as Currie put it, "We've made a lot of gross errors," although he did not elaborate.

Despite their problems David Currie considers his agency to be one of the best in Canada.

Manpower picketing produces 5 arrests

A demonstration at the Manpower Centre Wednesday morning resulted in five arrests.

Clifford John, 18, a Cree Indian from Alberta, had been having difficulty obtaining service from the Manpower Centre. At one point he was told: "Go back to the reservation."

As he had not met the criteria for job retraining he was advised to see the Department of Indian Affairs.

He returned to the centre backed by about 25 people from the Canadian Party of Labour. A commotion ensued which resulted in $100 worth of glass partitions being broken and the five arrests when the police arrived.

New courses next yr. on Quebec and women

U of T will offer two new programs next year. One of them is called Understanding Quebec as part of the interdisciplinary studies (FSM).

The second new program, in Women's Studies will be open to both men and women, but in case of over-registration, priorities will be given to women. The course will be given in two terms; the first term containing the syllabus of the subject, and the second term individual projects.

The Understanding Quebec program is the beginning of what Dr. B. Z. Shek (Dept. of French) hopes will be a program offered in French-Canadian studies. The course will be divided into five areas: history, literature, music, fine arts and social development.

Black-shirted South African Police manhandle demonstrators at Sharpeville protest Saturday.

Sharpeville slaughter relived

By DAVID LLOYD

Black uniformed police armed with menacing rifles burst from a 'paddy wagon' Saturday at the British Consulate, on University Avenue.

The well armed constables quickly moved into the crowd of demonstrators and subdued and dragged away the leaders of the protest. This was much to the surprise of the dozen or so members of the Metropolitan Toronto Police who were also in attendance.

The officers using the more dramatic tactics depicted the South African Police force that fired upon a crowd of blacks on March 21, 1960 in Sharpeville South Africa killing 69 and wounding 180.

This display of guerilla theatre caught most of those in attendance by surprise but the Metro police were quick to react for as soon as the van full of prisoners had pulled away, it was quickly stopped by the police and the driver taken into custody. He was later released. The police it seems didn't appreciate the fact that their counterparts were carrying real guns. One of the "South African" officers who remained unidentified said the guns were rented as stage props. "We didn't know it was illegal," he said.

The demonstration organized by the Toronto Committee of the African National Congress had two purposes, according to its Secretary-Treasurer Y. Salojee. One was to commemorate the massacre of the 69 black Africans killed at Sharpeville and the other to protest the sale of British arms to the South African government. Salojee quoted as a specific example the purchase of heavily armed helicopters to be used by the army in the protection and patrolling of the territorial waters of South Africa. These helicopters could be used to further the oppressive nature of the apartheid system and to combat any civilian disorders.

"The military and civil authorities are closely linked," said Salojee.

Soc grads may face U.S. exam

By BOB GAUTHIER

Students entering graduate sociology next year may be writing College Board-type entrance exams if the recommendations of the department's graduate curriculum committee are accepted.

The tests, called Graduate Record Exams, are prepared in Princeton, New Jersey.

Whether by coincidence or design, the sociology department has one of the highest ratios of American professors to Canadian in the university. In 1969-70, 18 were Canadian citizens, and 15 Canadian, while 30 of the 39 had received their final degrees in the U.S.

Leo Zakuta, professor and member of the Graduate Curriculum Committee in the Sociology Department, said yesterday that the suggestion is only a recommendation to the department. The recommendation still has to be taken to the departmental assembly. If this body approves it it will go into the calendar.

When asked why the exams were required Zakuta replied that "the Graduate Committee feels that it wants all the good evidence it can get"

A graduate student in the Sociology Department, who preferred to remain anonymous, said the committee's recommendation was "another step on the road to the continentalization of sociology".

No essay - no credit, say profs

By ERIC RUMP

University budget cuts are fouling up the students in at least one department. Six political economy voluntary teaching assistants have been told they must either write a two-hour final exam or "a good paper" in order to receive credit for their work.

Since last fall, the six have been masquerading as students enrolled in a reading course to compensate for the department's inability to pay T.A.'s for political science 202, a simulation course in Canadian-American relations. In return for acting as tutorial leaders and helping plan the course, the six were to receive a "Reading Course" credit but no money.

Despite their professed commitment to new modes of education, Stephen Clarkson and Abraham Rotstein, the course professors, are falling back on the system to justify their demands. They claim that all students enrolled in a regular reading course must submit written work.

However, Peter Silcox, undergraduate supervisor of political economy, told The Varsity that the specific requirements for a reading course are left up to the individual professor. He said the department has never been asked to decide whether an essay is a reading course requirement.

The lecturers, especially Rotstein, insist that they must have some written work on which to mark the TAs.

The students oppose writing anything for a grade, since it would legitimize the sham of their supposedly taking a reading course. In fact, their role has been a functional one. They have been leading tutorials, marking papers, planning the simulation scenarios, (almost entirely without the involvement of the professors), and helping plan plenary sessions.

Rotstein sees no injustice in marking the TAs on the basis of some written work instead of their major, year-long activity. However, he accuses them of waging a "symbolic" battle over the principle of their not being judged on the basis of this written work.

The professors rejected a group leaders' offer to record impressions of their teaching and learning experiences in the course, at a later date. They had earlier said they wanted a written report as a record of what the TAs had learned by participating in the course.

THE CHARLES STREET TENANTS Association appealed a court order this week to pay their outstanding rent to their landlord the Ontario Housing Corporation. Rent is being withheld as a strike measure.

The tenants are striking for reduction of rent, and more specifically, for tenant's control of their housing affairs.

A straw poll of the tenants indicated that only 25 tenants are prepared to fight to the "bitter end".

Bissell bows out amid bubble-blowing barrage

By TONY USHER

Claude Bissell delivered his swan song to his old college as U of T President Wednesday night.

But the audience at the University College graduation banquet wasn't in a particularly receptive mood.

The general atmosphere was one of irreverence as 300 grads and college dignitaries ploughed through the standard mass-production banquet of the King Edward hotel.

Some of the students dispensed marshmallows and bananas, blew bubbles, bounced balloons around the room, smoked what looked like joints but weren't, and waved sparklers during the after-dinner speeches.

The scene reminded guest speaker Bissell of "more decorous evenings in the Faculty of Arts and Science".

"I've been waiting for a long time to speak to a genuinely elitist audience", opened Bissell. He warned, however, of his resolve "never to be meaningful or relevant at an affair like this".

Accordingly Bissell strung together anecdotes from past speeches and earlier days, somewhat nervously attempting to pace himself against the patience of the audience.

In closing, he noted that his wife had said that his original speech, which he had discarded, "sounds rather chesty". "But then again you are chesty", she had added.

Bissell was followed by an unscheduled speaker, graduating science student David Peebles, speaking for what he called "the pissed-off plurality".

Peebles attacked the "living hell" of U of T and also slammed the UC Literary and Athletic Society for failing to involve students.

UC Lit President Marty Goldberg accepted the criticism. "It's nice to know that a university as imperfect as ours can create an atmosphere of dissent."

As they departed however, most grads seemed more impressed by the nearness of exams than by Bissell's meanderings or Peebles' politicisation.

B of G slows coed plan

University College Council has approved a proposal for coed residences, but its implementation for next year is by no means assured.

The proposal, approved unanimously last month, provides for both Sir Daniel Wilson Residence and Whitney Hall to be divided into male, female, and mixed rooms sections.

However the Board of Governors has apparently raised questions about the coed plan, and UC Principal Archie Hallett will seek the Board's approval so as to clarify the situation.

Since the plan is an internal rearrangement of college facilities requiring only an estimated $300 in capital expenditure, there is no legal requirement for Board approval.

It is believed that objections to the plan were raised by Board member and UC alumnus Sydney Hermant.

Old grey elected pres.

John O'Grady, Spencer-Dack campaign manager, was elected Saint Mike's Student Senate president yesterday. His running mate, Tom Doris, was elected chairman of the Student Senate.

"Looks like the Saint Mike's

Ann Grutterez, Dan Leckie, John Gladki, Frank Naesa, and Al Nigro were elected SAC reps.

Fac comm will try meeting on March 29

The 169-member General Committee of the Arts and Science Faculty Council will attempt to convene Monday, March 29. Dear Albert Allen said yesterday the meeting likely would take place at 4:10 p.m. in auditorium of the Medical Science building. "Some fear the meeting has been scheduled."

Some fear the meeting has been scheduled for Monday deliberately to isolate any students who may attempt to carry on the parity struggle by procedural disruption. If administrators clamp down on demonstrators Monday after campus media such as the Varsity have stopped publishing, there will be no way to let students know what is happening. Similarly, a severe reaction at this time would catch exam-cramming students with their academic trousers down.

And some faculty and administrators are chomping at the bit to hit hard on the parity disrupters. Last week the Globe and Mail, reported in a wind-up interview with Claude Bissell, that only the customary restraint of the U of T president had kept Registrar Rob Ross from calling in Metro police at the last Faculty Council meeting.

Norman Rogers (UC IV), one of 34 students on the committee, said yesterday he went to the office of Assistant Dean Bill Foulds, whose secretary told him Foulds and Allen would decide later in the day when, where and if the meeting would occur.

Rogers said that when he pointed out that notices mailed today perhaps would arrive too late for committee members to know the time and place of the meeting, the secretary was "uncooperative".

Rogers said he then went to Dean Allen's office and said the dean was surprised Rogers had not received his notice about the meeting.

Varg plugs Bengal Restaurant

Less than a year old, The Royal Bengal Restaurant on the corner of Carlton and Jarvis St. is proving to be the finest Indian restaurant in Toronto.

It doesn't just serve meals. It serves trips in colour, texture, and taste, and you might meet a student there.

Design your own dinner by choosing just the right combination from the wide variety of Indian and Pakistani dishes. For a group, the choice can be an exercise in applied communism.

It's difficult not to sound like Toronto Calendar in-praising what it calls "cuisine."

But the Royal Bengal is not as pretentious as its name suggests. Nice people work there. The owner is also the cook, and he is more interested in offering edible esthetics at low prices than in making a profit.

A reasonable meal costs about $2 per person and students receive a 10 per cent discount.

This story is clearly a plug. But people should know about the Bengal.

Allen said all the notices had already been sent out, and knew nothing of Foulds' plans to talk with him about the meeting.

Rogers said that when he suggested such inconsistencies be ironed out, Allen replied, "I'm getting tired of your self-righteousness".

Monday will mark the fourth time the General Committee has attempted to meet since January 19, when the Faculty Council rejected student demands for a parity restructuring committee. The meetings since then have been disrupted by students.

Rogers noted that on the bottom of this year's final exam timetable is a notice that Monday's meeting would ratify exemptions of some courses from final examinations.

The notice adds, "If it is necessary to hold final examinations in these courses, this entire schedule will have to be superseded by a new one."

Rogers said he interpreted the notice as blackmail against expected attempts to disrupt the meeting by student favoring parity on the Faculty Council.

$280,000 enthuses SAC reps

By GRAYNE STAFRIDGE

Optimism for next years SAC is running high. SAC hopefuls see all the problems and answers clearly and they are enthusiastic about spending $280,000 to prove it.

Quiet elections on college campuses reflect a lack of interest in SAC. At UC, elections were dispensed with in favour of the more democratic process of acclamation.

Victoria College SAC candidates are showing marked reluctance to confirm their nominations. Only Don MacLeod (Vic II) has made his intentions clear to run again.

St. Michaels at a Forum Wednesday put college politics first tending to take SAC representatives lightly, but they did elect five last night.

Erindale elected four. The Engineering Society has decided to appoint interim members for its three vacancies and hold elections in the Fall.

Rod Hurd, this years president and Finance Commissioner Mike Hofstetter shine with SAC office enthusiasm. They see next year's SAC as more efficient and enthusiastic.

Hofstetter would like to continue next year in his present post developing a new budget scheme. This would make money available in the fall for new programmes.

The campus centre would be based on a concept of nodes with recreational and service facilities integrating the campus. Students from the Faculty of Architecture will be employed in the designing and will have plans for next years campus.

MacLeod cited problems in SAC this year. The old communications problems were still haunting SAC this year and it lacked a focus for problems.

Presidential pickings

Forster could be white line on slushy road

By Coriolanus

The appearance of Donald Forster's name on the list of presidential candidates is, at first glance, an obvious improbability, added merely for the same reasons that Robin Ross and Jack Sword were added, that is, as Simcoe Hall mandarins they deserve some passing recognition that costs the University nothing, a Toronto equivalent of awarding a K.C.M.G. to a senior British Civil Servant.

Sword and Ross will not receive serious consideration. The merits of Donald F. Forster, Vice-Provost, require a more careful analysis.

Forster meets the superficial requirements for a new president, i.e. Canadian, young, scholarly credentials, but in each of these categories his image is slightly blurred, out of focus, the centre line on a slush-covered highway. His Canadian identity is the most impeccable. A graduate of Toronto's Parkdale Collegiate and an Honours Graduate in Political Science and Economics at the U of T, he went to Harvard with a Woodrow Wilson Fellowship before returning to Toronto. On the way back he stopped off for a two year stay in Ottawa as Research Assistant to H. B. Neatby, working on the official biography of William Lyon Mackenzie King. Forster is a Canadian of the King type: intuitive, slightly defensive, and sure of himself in all Canadian environments by virtue of his deep-rooting in the dense Ontario amalgam of Protestant Ethic, Orange Parades, and the annual northern trek to the summer cottage.

Youth he certainly has, at least chronologically, but at 36 he does not possess the swinger image that the current mindless trend to charisma demands. His age makes him a product of the late Depression — World War II years that inculcated a deep respect for order, tradition, and, in its original sense, honour. No long hair or corduroy suits, nothing of the Trudeau-John Turner glamour is visible.

Forster has been and still is a consistent person, following a life style that reflects inner liberal conservative convictions. This has resulted in a marked increase in his personal gravitas since Claude Bissell made him his Executive Assistant in 1965. The change to a certain extent, masks a natural good humour in a figure that looks, with his horn-rimmed glasses tilted over his ears, like a Tenniel drawing that started out to be the Dormouse and ended up as Howland Owl.

Forster's scholarly accomplishments are largely centred on his work with Jack Pickersgill on The Mackenzie King Record. Its publication assured him of widespread footnote publicity which, given the ephemeral nature of most U of T scholarship, should enhance his position in the academic hagiology. The collaboration with Pickersgill also strengthened his ties with the Liberal Party, ties which he carefully maintains.

This habit of keeping lines open to people, many of them ex-students, is an important facet of Forster's character. As Senior Don in the Sir Daniel Wilson Residence at University College he knew many of the politically active undergraduates on the campus, and he still maintains personal contact with a group diverse enough to contain an executive assistant to the Federal Minister of Revenue and the resident naturalist in Algonquin Park. As Senior Don he was also the trusted confidant of Ian Macdonald, then Dean of Men and now Grand Economic Poobah of the Ontario Government.

Added to this network, which produces a continuous informational input, is the information he has acquired as Vice-Provost and member of virtually every influential committee in the University, including the Central Budget Committee and the Presidential Advisory Committee on Accommodation and Facilities. Forster is, as a result of this blend of personal effort and strategic position, probably the best informed person on campus.

What sort of president would he be, and would he even want the post. To the latter question the answer is obvious. Although he has long disclaimed any interest in the presidency it seems unlikely that, as a competent and ambitious person, he would be impervious to the heady perfume of power, especially when many far less qualified are jostling for the bauble.

To the first question the answer is less clear. Forster, like Bissell, communicates easily and effectively with undergraduates who know him outside the classroom or committee meeting. It is a long step, however, from the Sir Dan of the pre-dreg era to the present, when the eldritch cries of a gaggle of Women's Lib harridans may at any time shatter the fusty silence of Simcoe Hall.

Forster's main strength here is his capacity to spiritually ignore such intrusions. He is imperturbable when facing situations which have little relevance to the power structure with which he is so intimately familiar. He would not be interested in the (to him) petty minutiae of faculty-student squabbles. His Olympian Weltanschauung regards issues like parity as being trivial. But he is quite capable, for example, of endorsing parity — not because he believes in it but because it is preferable to have such a mosquito feeding on the elephantine vastness of the university than to endure the buzzing.

No choice of the Presidential Search Committee will be greeted with universal acclaim. In Forster's favour is the lack of a sharp-edged image that attaches to all the older candidates and produces instant enemies. With his Mackenzie King character that shifts and alters with his intuition he might be able to defer, and possibly avoid, the confrontation that, with a burning death-wish, so many faculty and students seem to desire. Forster is not cast in the King Stork mould, but as King Log he might force the University to live in an environment in which its members are dependent on their own intellectual resources.

Job situation bleak for 1971 grads, artsies suffer most

Over 80 per cent of the 1971 U of T graduates, excluding those with Master of Business or engineering degrees, are still unemployed, according to a report prepared by David Currie, head of the placement centre.

A job offer has been received by less than one in five of the arts, science and forestry bachelors' level graduates, and graduate students (excluding MBA's). Approximately one half of the engineers and MBA's have obtained job offers but only in the Commerce and Finance class are the jobless scarce. The statistics are for those seeking a job since the beginning of the year or earlier.

Besides Commerce and Finance, Geology and Metallurgical Engineering graduates often had multiple job offers.

Although 52.2 per cent of the '71 engineering graduating class report job offers, the market for chemical, electrical and mechanical engineers is markedly down. Almost all the offers received by MBA's were from chartered accountancy firms.

Three year program people have received slightly more job offers than four year. Marks made very little difference, even in Engineering.

Telephone interviews of those who had on-campus employment interviews provided the information. Job offers received through the students' own initiative were also counted.

Student complaints of the employment service at the Placement Centre included the long line-ups and the low number of small and medium sized companies. Arts people complained that there were no social service agencies interviewing and science people reported too few lab jobs. The report originated in an attempt to measure the success of the Placement Centre's efforts. The report concludes that Arts and Science people, who are the most ill prepared group, may have to become more job-oriented and aggressive. The report says the Placement Centre must reach more, and communicate more effectively with the students earlier in their university careers, possibly through the vehicle of course unions and the Engineering Society.

As only one in 22 interviews resulted in a job offer the report recommends a pre-screening mechanism where students would submit resumes to prospective employers. This would end the long sign-up lines ups, offer an equal opportunity for every student to be in contact with the employer and reduce the number of wasted interviews. The report cautions that this will make it easier for employers who are not interested in hiring non-WASPS to discriminate. The opportunity for personal contact with the employer would also be lost.

....the class goes on: i nearly explode the class explodes: i nearly go on...

this energy-event is dedicated to Four Kent, the weaponless knight, mounted and murdered.

responding to . . . the invisible electro-psycho-environmental classroom-or-tracing the future onto the present!

I try to keep it simple and direct. Immediacy and simplicity. Simplicity of form and immediacy of awareness, using them as a 1-2 structure to develop and work from.

The class begins. Modern Poetry 348, Commanded by Sgt. Marshal McLuhan. By some primordial justice one of the images conjured up is of the poet (Thomas) "screaming at the inevitable, of raging! Raging against the light . . . and the dark." I nearly do. I nearly rise up in fury and rage against the submissive silence of long-suffering "apprentices" and the oppressive re-enforcing monolog of the "master." I roar, scream, shout, sing, call, speak, whisper. I say nothing. — I'm an apprentice. . .

Another time, another course, I wanted to tell you what I understood about competition and how it is insidious because it is ignored, and unconscious; destructive because it is predatory and creative only if it is recognised and acknowledged in our own personal behaviour and intentionally made into a secondary and consciously controlled game. Kipness first. Play second.

If you think that's hard, you're right — but no one said it would be easy.

"Let's play," reply. "I'm not playing, I'm being serious!"

"Well, now your competing with me by saying that play can't be serious," reply. "I'm not competing!"

"Ok, we won't play."

no one said it would be easy. we don't need art, we need help.

. . . the class goes on: I nearly exploded something is moving in my room . . . the newspaper is alive! crawling with cockroaches — no wait, it's only two. I stop to kill them. It makes my skin crawl. An important interruption: A question. Might not all of us learn a lot more, if all students and teachers, trainers, lecturers, ministers, professors, baby-sitters and police, quit teaching until everyone, including students had something approaching a reasonable private place of their own? Space to live in? . . . that wasn't economically crippling? Housing? I don't need instruction, I want some fucking help! There is a goddamn housing crisis that's killing me, driving me insane! I can't live a reasonable life and spend half my time chasing cockroaches folks, I can't, you can't, Jesus can't. It killed him. Christ help us.

You can stop right here: think about it. Not what I'm saying but about the reality that we experience together, that we share. Class. Personal relationships, immediate physical realities (housing crisis). Unemployment. Automation. Yah! We have both a housing, a ridiculous, unnecessary, destructive, mindless, housing crisis and we have unemployment . . . even Hitler could do better than that.

Tree-fucking mend us! Crucifixion tree.
Back, back, everywhere, nowhere here, here . . . simple, unconscious competition is vicious and destructive. We need kind-ness, co-operation, and we I you want housing . . . the class goes on. I'm afraid . . . I die in it. It's a mythologically irrelevant, oppressive, mechanical ritual of word-filled blanks (check one) so, I don't explode, you see, as thee, I go hup.

I wasn't asking about whether or not your relationships are Good or Bad "but you do anyway, don't you jon," she interrupts me mockingly and because my pride is hurt I attack her, when what I was going to do was end right there with a summation of the perception of competition and how I was sure the addition of kind-ness could transform it into something creative, but instead I get completely derailed by one small remark playfully thrown at my train of thought. So much for my kindness. . . . She looks directly at me and quietly says, "No one said it would be easy, jon."

the class goes on: I nearly explode
Forgive me . . . please forgive me . . . the class goes on. I'm trying to be inclusive in representing elements which seem to affect and effect the experience and give it meaning. I'm very tired, weary like Dave, this is difficult, it is too late, 5:52 am. I must sleep.

It's a day later now, I mean I must still be asleep. I mean I'm still writing this outrageously necessary, improbability . . . what is it, oh yeh! class notes from my notes class. I still don't know what Parkins really meant when he kept insisting that class existed and is something very important that should be clearly understood by everyone. But the result was that I became obsessed with the word and groped for connected images and meanings. Class: our aim is a classless society. Class: how have you I we shared an experience of it that can be the basis of a mutually verifiable dialog? Can it be changed? Should it be? For instance the idea that the government serves and is maintained by a discreet minority, ruling-class, status quo or "just-as-is-society" is familiar and no doubt important and true, but what have I experienced in my daily experience that demonstrates the effect of this? Class.

Do you have a class right now? Modern Poetry 348? Eng? Hist? Math? Mech? Chem? Psycho? Poli Sci? Soc? Phil? Lower? Working? Middle? Ruling?

Class is a force that divides us. That gives us different languages and in that division conquers us. With differing languages we no longer feel we can identify, communicate or understand each other. We become specialists in the same way that criminals develop a language with which they not only define themselves and each other but effectively cut themselves off from all the rest of society, excluding all those "not in the discipline".

. . . the class goes on: I nearly screamed

It all gets so predictable — or so it seems — like the not particularly good-or-bad movie that you've already seen. "Naw, naw I have seen this one, turn it off. . . ." from The Firesign Theatre. But it can't be turned off, only you can be turned off, you can only turn yourself off. AND SO—

"We shall not cease from exploration
And the end of all our exploring
Will be to arrive where we started
And know the place for the first time
— T.S. Eliot

(and "The unexamined life isn't worth living."

— Socrates

(and "I refuse to teach but to awaken." — Meher Baba

(so) "Wake-up! niggers, or we'll through!!!"

— The Last Poets

CLASS and CLASSIFICATIONS:

Male, female, black, white, brown, yellow, have-not, haves, religion, nation, working, lower, middle, down-ruling, normal, mutant, healthy, sick, sane, criminal, insane, normal, clever, foolish, illegitimate, bastard, legit . . . shit! remember all this before your first day of school. It is already a continually re-enforced part of your semantic responses, linguistic habits and automatic reflexes. You don't express your words, your words express, form, define, limit and classify you.

"As soon as you're born they make you feel small" You have already become a (something) defined by form, space, time, genitals, material, and above all, language (which is more than words folks, more than words).

That is why I celebrate Korzybski's "rejection of the 'is' of identity," and Fuller's ecstatic perception that, "I seem to be a verb."

"I have a class now," pre-school, nursery, kindergarten, grade 1, grade 2, grade 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, (now sub-classification with 9a, 9b, 9c, 9d, etc.) "keep you doped with religion and sex and t.v." 10, 11, 12, lucky and ohwouniversity, ascent to "and you think you're so clever and classless and free" specialisation, professionalisation, discipline and the ritual method to join the elite. Excitement! Freedom! Status! Power! The Ruling Class . . . "but you're still fucking peasants as far as I can see" and you've been even further removed from life and reality. Further trained in the way you are expected to act: alienated, made irrelevant, obedient and of course competitive . . . and yet I wonder and I am amazed, Stranger than that we're alive. "Stranger than that, stranger than that, stranger than that we're alive!" sing the Incredible String Band and I wonder because as they sing elsewhere, "whatever you think it's more than that, more than that!" So, I wonder, I experience the mechanics, rules, red-tape, bullshit, habits, rituals and predatory competitive habits, but I'm still improbably convinced that I'm positively connected with everyone else. I'm definitely related to everything that exists and yet am mysteriously myself. "I am he as you are he as you are me and we are all together."

I wonder because I'm trying to generate a fitting response to the numbing, mindless anti-participatory nature of our classrooms. Our class. Our classes. Classification. Classics. Take off your Glasses! Eye see!!

. . . the class goes on: I nearly exploded
I want to thank all the students, instructors, lecturers, profs, trainers, pigs, predators and victims. Everyone! and especially those who despise and because of everything really did teach (mostly other students) which is always a matter of love rather than sport-ing. I love you and thank you even the constipated administrators, manipulators, masterbators, and now celebrating that connection I ask you to not forget that it is precisely because of it that I ask you to at least figuratively, that is in the form of your behaviour and habits, to DIE! Kill! Destroy! annihilate you're numbing, oppressive, somnabulist roles! Start your own school! Make a movie! Teach in the streets! Print a newspaper! Publish a book! Make a record! Do a show! Appear on t.v! Go home with your students! Study you're prof! Take over! Build a Human Universe City! anything, but but fuck this CLASS shit!

Board won't take a stand on its Alcan stock portfolio

THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO, a well-known Toronto business institution, owns about $84 million in market investments. Bonds account for $77 million of this, and $7 million, nothing to sneeze at, is invested in stock holdings.

The most interesting category of U of T investments is a rather mysterious trust and endowment fund.

"We have almost 2,000 trust accounts," reveals Jack Brook, executive assistant to U of T vice-president (non-academic) Alex Rankin. "Many of these are subject to restrictions and specified uses of various kinds."

The U of T Act forbids the university from speculating on the stock market. Financial policy, however, is directed by a Board of Governors committee which is committed to "provide the best possible return within their terms of reference."

THESE TERMS OF REFERENCE include support of South Africa's policies of racism and economic expansionism.

U of T holds an undisclosed number of stocks in Alcan and the Aluminum Company of Canada.

Alcan, it seems, is planning to sell six million tons of aluminum rod to Portugal for the building of the Cabora-Bassa Dam, 70 per cent larger than Egypt's Aswan.

The dam, built in Portugal's South African colony of Mozambique, will open the door for a million new white settlers in the sensitive area. It will also assure abundant hydro-electric power for the racist regimes in South Africa and Rhodesia.

A group of citizens, having purchased a small number of Alcan shares, planned to go, Ralph Nader-style, to this weekend's general stockholders' meeting in Montreal to challenge the sale. The group, calling itself, This Organization to Stop Alcan, yesterday approached the Board of Governors, together with SAC, yesterday and requested they register an objection to the sale.

THE BOARD (WHICH MEETS IN SECRET SESSIONS) decided it could take no political stand with any investments held in trust. Chairman O. D. Vaughan, a retired Eaton's official, pointed out that the University could not use any trust funds against what might be the will of the people for whom they held the trust.

The Board yesterday decided to set up a committee to study the whole question of stock and bond holdings.

INFORMATION IS VERY difficult to obtain about U of T's financial interests.

The Students' Administrative Council began last August to try to elicit information from a tight-lipped administration.

U of T President Claude Bissell promised in December to take up the issue with the Board of Governors, but also warned:

"I am advised that a public list of these holdings would inspire a whole set of questions that could not be answered except in terms of the conditions of the trust funds.

"We might very well be involved in an additional burden of enquiry and response with no discernible advantage and clarification."

THERE WAS NO FURTHER

WORD from the Board, until the disclosures of this week.

SAC External Affairs Commissioner Vince Dolan, who first launched the investigation, reports that besides trust funds, there are two other categories of capital holdings — current operating funds and capital funds — in the form of cash or short term bank notes.

Dolan wants the Board to protest Alcan's policies in southern Africa.

"IS NOT THE BOARD COMPLICIT in those policies of racism and colonialism?" he asks.

"They may want to ask themselves what kind of university they think they run, and what it is supposed to do."

EMPLOYMENT

Have you ever seen sophisticated strip tease as presented at the Crazy Horse Saloon in Paris, The Pigalle in London, or The Sands in Las Vegas?
Probably Not.

Because there's never been any good sensual entertainment in Toronto. However, I am offering Toronto's top night club a series of strip tease acts comparable to those found in Europe. At this time, I still require a few more girls who have the potential to be sensual artisans. What does that mean?

I want people with imagination, so that they can put themselves into their act and not just take off their clothes. I want people who are well balanced emotionally, so they'll regard this as being just another job, — no more, no less.

Dancing or dramatic experience is not necessary, although it would, of course, be helpful. But you must be able to assume different roles and mime a story to an audience. Naturally, a well proportioned figure and a pleasant face are also requirements.

I will train you in the mechanics of an effective strip and I will develop, with your co-operation, an act which complements your personality and figure.

Now, money?

The pay is $175.00 per week. I provide costumes, props, Make-up hairstyling, and wigs (if required). Hours are 8:30 to 12:30, six nights per week. There is a reasonable amount of job security during this summer, but in the entertainment field nothing is certain.

If you think this might be for you, Please call me at 783-8990, or write to: P.O. Box 525, Postal Station "F" Toronto 5, Ontario. Thank you for taking the trouble to read this rather long ad.

Do grades prevent learning?

A student's guide to the grading system

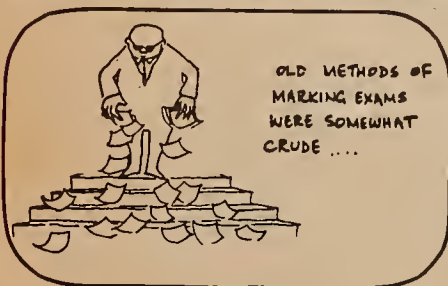

By JERRY FARBER

THERE'S NO QUESTION that the grading system is effective in training people to do what they're told. The question is: what does it do for learning?

Grades focus our attention. But on what? On the test. Academic success, as everyone knows, is something that we measure not in knowledge but in grade points. What we get on the final is all-important; what we retain after the final is irrelevant. Grades don't make us want to enrich our minds; they make us want to please our teachers (or at least put them on). Grades are a game. When the term is over, you shuffle the deck and begin a new round.

Oddly enough, many of us understand all of this and yet remain convinced that we need to be graded in order to learn. When we get to college, twelve years of slave work have very likely convinced us that learning is dull, plodding and unpalatable. We may think we need to be graded; we assume that without the grades we'd never go through all that misery voluntarily. But, in fact, we've been had.

We've been prodded with phony motivations so long that we've become insensitive to the true ones. We're like those sleeping pill addicts who have reached the point where they need strong artificial inducement to do what comes naturally. We're grade junkies — convinced that we'd never learn without the A's and F's to keep us going. Grades have prevented us from growing up. No matter how old a person is — when he attends school, he's still a child, tempted with lollipops and threatened with spankings.

LEARNING HAPPENS WHEN YOU want to know.

Ask yourself: did you need grades to learn how to drive? To learn how to talk? To learn how to play chess — or play the guitar — or dance — or find your way around a new city? Yet these are things we do very well — much better than we handle that French or Spanish that we were graded on for years in high school. Some of us, though, are certain that, while we might learn to drive or play chess without grades, we still need them to force us to learn the things we don't really want to learn — math, for instance. But is that really true? If for any reason you really want or need some math — say, algebra — you can learn it without being graded. And if you don't want it and don't need it, you'll probably never get it straight, grades or not.

Just because you pass a subject doesn't mean you've learned it. How much time did you spend on algebra and geometry in high school? Two years? How much do you remember? Or what about grammar? How much did all those years of force-fed grammar do for you? You learn to talk (without being graded) from the people around you, not from gerunds and modifiers. And as for writing — if you ever do learn to write well, you can bet your sweet ass it won't be predicate nominatives that teach you. Perhaps those subjects that we would never study without being graded are the very subjects that we lose hold of as soon as the last test is over.

STILL, SOME OF US MAINTAIN that we need grades to give us self-discipline. But do you want to see real self-discipline? Look at some kid working on his car all week-end long. His parents even have to drag him in for dinner. And yet, if that kid had been compelled to work on cars all his life and had been continually graded on it, then he'd swear up and down that he needed those grades to give him self-discipline.

It is only recently — and out of school — that I have begun to understand self-discipline in writing. It grows out of freedom, not out of coercion. Self-discipline isn't staying up all night to finish a term paper; that's slave work. Self-discipline is revising one paragraph fanatically for weeks — for no other reason than that you yourself aren't happy with it. Self-discipline is following a problem through tedious, repetitive laboratory experiments, because there's no other way of finding out what you want to know. Or it can be surfing all day long every single day for an entire summer until you are good at it.

Self-discipline is nothing more than a certain way of pleasing yourself, and it is the last thing anyone is likely to learn for a grade.

COERCION INSIDE SCHOOL probably leads many of us to develop our self-discipline in areas untouched by the classroom. Who knows? If movie-going, dancing and surfing were the only required subjects, there might well be a poetic renaissance. I suspect that most kids fool around with writing on their own at some point — diaries, poetry, whatever — but this interest rarely survives school. When you learn that writing is intellectual slave work, it's all over.

Do you think you're a lazy student? No wonder! Slaves are almost always lazy.

Suppose I go to college; I want to be a chemist or a high school teacher or an accountant. Are grades really my only reason for learning the field? Is getting graded going to turn me on to my subject? Or is it more likely to turn me off? How sad this is. History is so engrossing. Literature is so beautiful. And school is likely to turn them dull or even ugly. Can you imagine what would happen if they graded you on sex? The race would die out.

WOULDN'T IT BE GREAT to be free to learn? Without penalties and threats, without having to play childish competitive games for gold and silver stars? Can you even imagine what the freedom to learn might be like?

Perhaps this kind of freedom sounds attractive to you but you're convinced that it isn't suited to our society. Even if the grading system can be shown to work against learning, you may assume that grades are still necessary to evaluate people for various kinds of work.

But think about it. Do you really believe that the best way to determine someone's qualifications is to grade him — A, B, C, D, C, — week by week, day by day, in everything he studies for sixteen years of school? Is this monstrous rigmarole honestly necessary in order to determine who gets which jobs?

THERE ARE FAR BETTER WAYS to determine a person's qualifications. Many fields already do their own screening by examination; the bar exam is one instance. In some areas — journalism, for example — supervised on-the-job experience would probably be the most effective screening and qualifying technique. Other fields might call for a combination of methods. Engineers, for example, could be qualified through apprenticeship plus a demonstration of reasonable competency on exams at various levels — exams on which they would, of course, get an unlimited number of tries.

In a great many fields, no screening technique is necessary at all. Countless employers, public and private, require a college degree for no really good reason, simply because it enables their personnel departments to avoid making any meaningful individual evaluation and because it indicates some degree of standardization.

There is no reason why a person should be forced to spend four years of his life in college just to get a decent job and then discover that he would have been much better off working in the field itself for four years and pursuing his own learning interests on a less rigid and formal basis.

Still it might be argued that eliminating grades entirely would require too sudden a shift in our society. I would maintain that the sudden shift is desirable. In any case, though, society is not likely to face the simultaneous abandonment of grading by every school in the country. Furthermore, on a campus where there is enormous resistance to abolishing grades, one could put forth a fairly good half-way compromise — The Credit system — which is, from my point of view, worth trying even though it falls short of what should be the goal: no grades at all.

Under this system, some courses could be made totally free of grading: basic algebra, say, or drawing or poetry writing. The rest would be run on a Credit basis. If you meet the minimum requirements of a course, you get credit for it. No A's or C's or silver stars. Just credit. And if you don't meet the requirements, nothing happens. You don't lose anything or get penalized; you just don't get credit for that course.

THIS IS NOT THE PASS-FAIL SYSTEM. Pass-Fail is a drag; if you don't pass a course, you get hurt. Under the Credit system you simply either get credit or you don't. All that your record shows is the courses you've earned credit for (not the ones you've attempted). And when you get credit for enough courses, you can get some kind of certification or credential, if you want one, according to the number and type of courses you've taken. And there should be not just a few assembly-line four-year degrees: BA, BS and so on; there should be scores of more meaningful and varied certifications and degrees. Or maybe there should be none at all, just a list of the courses for which you have credit.

What's wrong with that? College becomes something more like a place for learning and growth, not fear and anxiety. It becomes a learning community, not a gladiatorial arena where you're pitted in daily battle against your fellow students. In elementary and secondary schools, of course, there is an even weaker pretext for grading and even more to be gained by its abolishment.

And we mustn't be too quick to assume that abolishing A's and F's would make our colleges still more overcrowded. If we eliminate the pointless Mickey-Mouse requirements that are foisted on everyone, if we eliminate the gold-star games and all the administrative paperwork and class busywork that go along with them, if we reduce the overwhelming pressure for a meaningless, standardized degree, then perhaps we'll end up with learning facilities that can accommodate even more students than the number that get processed in the factories that we currently operate.

AND IF AN EMPLOYER WANTS not just degrees but gradepoint averages too, the colleges will explain that that's not what they are there for. Graduate schools, for their part, will probably not present a serious problem. They already put heavy emphasis on criteria other than GPA's. They stress interviews, personal recommendations; most of them already given their own entrance exams anyway. Besides, the best graduate schools will probably be delighted to get some live students for a change.

But what about the students themselves? Can they live without grades? Can they learn without them? Perhaps we should be asking ourselves: can they really learn with them?

A BA isn't very helpful

Reminiscences of a graduate job-hunter

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

"I'VE GOT A JOB!"

Now I can meet the rent and pay off the huge student loan I accumulated over the past three years.

Armed with a BA in sociology and a file of articles from my three years at The Varsity, University of Toronto's student newspaper, I finally landed a job — as a $70-a-week clerk in an insurance company in Toronto. And I was able to get that job only because I had summer experience in the field. I shouldn't have bothered going to university at all.

And, it seems, neither should a lot of other people. Of the 675,000 unemployed Canadians last month, more than 106,000 were between the ages of 19 and 22 — the same age span as a bachelor's degree graduating class.

EVEN AMONG THOSE WHO stayed in school, 70,000 could not find summer employment last year.

The situation will be sorse still for this year's graduating class, according to Bill Rutledge, director of the University and College Placement Association in Toronto.

He says there is a "20 to 25 per cent drop" in the number of jobs offered to graduates by on-campus recruiters this year. This includes professions such as engineering as well as jobs for arts and science graduates.

Unlike many arts graduates, I knew what I wanted to do. After three years working for The Varsity, I wanted to write. Many former Varsity reporters have easily entered professional journalism in previous years. But it wasn't that easy anymore.

IN JANUARY LAST YEAR, six months before graduation, I applied for the summer training programs of the two Toronto dailies. One said it was not considering new reporters, but was only rehiring the students from the summer before; the other said it was hiring fewer students and besides, wasn't planning to hire any of them full time in the fall.

The want ads held even less hope. The only openings for the aspiring female journalist were the women's pages of small-town papers, and friends who had worked on these papers told me that very few women who start there ever manage to go on to news reporting. I wanted to write, but surely I could do better than covering socials, weddings, fashion shows and charity bazaars for the rest of my life.

By the way, when the same papers wanted junior news reporters they always advertised under Help Wanted: Male. (This was before the Ontario Women's Equal Employment Opportunity Act, effective Dec. 1, 1970, which prohibits discrimination according to sex in hiring practices. It doesn't really matter, since ads are still separated according to sex; instead of the usual Help Wanted: Male and Help Wanted: Female, one Toronto paper has substituted "Help Wanted: Male and Female" for the former and "Help Wanted: Female and Male" for the latter. Another uses the terms "Jobs of Interest to Women" and "Jobs of Interest to Men". The third Toronto daily retains the standard division with a little explanatory note about the act under each heading. The division is still there.) BUT, PERSEVERANCE AND some naivete led me to apply anyway for the ads requesting the opposite sex. I always included in my letters:

"I realize that the ad you placed was under 'Help Wanted: Male' but when considering qualifications, I am sure that sex will be of no consequence."

I knew it wasn't true — and so did they. Only one newspaper even bothered to reply:

"Thank you for your letter. The position has been filled. We will keep your application on file should on opening arise."

Soon even those few journalist ads disappeared from the want ad columns. When these opportunities ran out, I tried related fields.

I DIDN'T QUALIFY AS A COPYWRITER for a department store catalogue because I was in the habit of writing in sentences, giving descriptions instead of concise ad copy.

"Some of the best writers can't write ad copy," he said. That helped my ego but left me still jobless.

There were other journalist-type jobs: writing promotional copy for educational television, public relations writing for a fundraising walk-a-thon, rewriting Canadian news for a condensed news fact sheet.

The responses were always the same: "We were extremely pleased with your qualifications, but we found someone with a couple of years experience in this field. I'm awfully sorry . . ."

One employer said they had found a man with previous experience. I wondered whether it was the applicant's experience or sex that got him the job.

IT BECAME CLEAR THAT WRITING jobs were scarce. On top of that, a lot of top writers were out looking. Employers who offered jobs at all, had their pick of the crop — that meant they could demand professional experience and get it. The rookie was out in the cold — especially the female in a male-dominated profession. After all, women are still not admitted to the Toronto Men's Press Club, although members say discussion of the issue is on the future agenda. (There presently is no Toronto Women's Press Club).

I did answer one ad for a female editor's assistant but was refused over the phone. The employer required "at least five years' experience". When I was the right sex, I didn't have the qualifications.

Meanwhile, the summer dragged on and my savings were running low. I decided to contact Canada Manpower, since in previous years, I had heard of people getting jobs with Manpower's help. My Manpower counselor showed me all the ads I had just applied for which she had clipped from the newspaper. She had nothing else to offer. She advised me to keep looking and keep in touch.

IN DESPERATION, I BEGAN LOOKING for non-writing jobs. Surely a sociology graduate could get a job in personnel, I thought.

"Well, I'm sorry, dear, but we wanted someone with some previous experience in this field."

I was quickly working my way down the white collar hierarchy. I tried a clerical job next.

"General office clerk. Some office experience required. Minimum grade 12," the ad said.

"Are you sure you want this job," the interviewer asked.

I NODDED ENTHUSIASTICALLY, thinking how much I needed the $90 a week the job promised.

"But your application says you have a university degree. This is a junior position. Surely you could get a better job than this?"

At that point I told him how I had been unable to get any job because I was inexperienced, or a woman, or — now — over-educated. I got lots of sympathy, but no job.

On another occasion, one personnel manager told me that she'd hoped I wouldn't show up for the interview — after I'd borrowed the bus fare to get there — because I had too much education for the job.

"You must understand our position." (Personnel managers get personal very quickly — especially when they are not going to hire you.) "You see, we can't take the chance of hiring you, training you, then losing you to a better job."

It seemed irrelevant to these people that most offices lose less-educated employees to better-paying jobs as well.

At one of my summer jobs, I was the longest employed clerk in my department because this was my second summer there. No one else had been there for a year.

BUT THE EMPLOYERS PAID LITTLE attention to that fact. And as I went through the rejection routine about 10 times, I realized that they had no intention of acknowledging it. My much-sought-after degree was turning into a ticket to the bread line rather than a job, so I decided to pretend I didn't have a university degree.

I answered an employment agency ad this time.

"INSURANCE PERSONNEL: clerks, typists, underwriters. Some experience in insurance required."

I told the interviewer that for the past three years my father had forced me to work in his office in the winters; then in the summers, when I was laid off, I worked for insurance companies. Now I'd moved away from home, I explained, and wanted a permanent job.

The story sounded pretty suspicious, but it at least explained away the past three years, without university. The interviewer said she had very few openings right then.

But on the chance that I might be telling the truth, she proceeded to give me a few "tips" on a "business-like appearance", to help me land other jobs I might apply for.

"You should wear a little make-up," she advised. I NEVER UNDERSTOOD WHAT make-up had to do with typing speed or intelligence. But fear of rocking the already-shaky employment boat with such a quip made me reply, "make-up makes me break out in pimples."

"Well, at least a little eye make-up," she urged.

"You can see I wear glasses. If my eyes get irritated, I'll probably rub them, then the make-up will get all smeared on . . ."

"At least a bit of lipstick . . ." She was almost pleading.

Now I was getting the feel of the melodrama and I played my role to perfection.

"Oh, you wouldn't believe the trouble I've had with lipstick," I moaned. "I've tried every shade on the market — even the palest colors; they all turn bright red on my lips."

She looked at me in amazement and despair.

"Well, at least tie your hair back," she sighed.

Anyway, she would try to place me with one of the few job openings she had.

She told her clients that I was "a very hard-working, stable girl"; this she said after talking to me for 10 minutes and hearing my fantastic employment history. None had jobs for me, anyway.

FOR HER RECORDS, she decided to check my former employers for references. The first question she asked was why had I left their employ.

"Oh, is that right? What school?" she said into the phone, eyeing me coyly.

"I see," she nodded. "Thank you."

"So," she said, "you went to the University of Toronto, eh? How far did you go in university?"

"I graduated," I admitted.

She exploded. Why had I lied; surely my chances would have been better had I told the truth? And, anyway, she thought I was too smart to be just a Grade 13 graduate.

"You look too smart," she told me.

BUT "SMART" OR NOT, I still had no job.

Welfare was beginning to look attractive until a friend of mine, who had been on welfare, explained the routine I'd have to go through at my local welfare office.

"Get there about 7 a.m.," she explained.

"There'll already be a line-up. As soon as the doors open — about eight, I guess — rush in and turn right. You'll see numbers like in the butcher shop: grab one. If you get under 50 or maybe even under 100, you might stand a chance of being interviewed that day.

"They call your number and give you an application form and you sit down again. After they've called everyone once, they call you again for the interview. They ask you everything and have you sign all kinds of stuff. One form gives them permission to look into your medical records. You might lose welfare if you're on birth control because they think that if you're having sex with a man he should support you — or, if you are both out of work, he should apply for welfare with you as his dependent. You get less assistance then.

"IF YOU'RE LUCKY, you'll finish at the welfare by about 5 p.m. You probably won't have a seat most of the time; but don't leave because if you miss your number while you're out, you have to wait until the end.

"And one more thing," she added, "take a hatpin or something for protection because the men there pinch and grab you while you're waiting."

I decided to put off applying for welfare as long as possible.

I continued to watch the want ads every day until finally I answered an ad for an insurance company that would accept me, even with my "outrageous" education and my minimal experience.

"You mean that you've been refused jobs because of your education?" the personnel manager said.

He warned me about the salary; I didn't expect much.

SO IN MID-OCTOBER I became a clerk with a BA and some journalistic experience, for $70 a week. I even considered myself lucky: I knew MAs who still didn't have jobs.

Boo Dad! Hurrah Mom!

The Department of Political Economy will be offering a new course next year in Comparative Economic Ideas.

Professor Michael Denny, who is teaching the course has subtitled it "If you don't like your father why not try your mother." Essentially it will examine and compare the theoretical structure and practical operating experience of capitalist and socialist economic systems.

"At the theoretical level we will be interested in those who bless as well as those who damn capitalism and socialism", says Professor Denny. "Selecting an economic, political and social system involves seeking a vision."

As a result the course will take a critical look at several Utopian visions of the "good life" including those propounded by Mannheim, Hertzka, Manuel, and Marcuse.

From there it will discuss some of the foundations of neo-classical economics to introduce some of the problems of political economy and the applicability of the conventional theory to reality.

"Underlying this whole debate is the broad question of how is man to live in the age of science and to what purposes he puts his increased command of the physical world," says Denny.

He stresses that the direction of the course will be influenced a great deal by the students' interests but has prepared a tentative reading list which includes works by Hayek, Myrdal, Sweezy, Weber, Friedman, Galbraith, Marx, Keynes and Guevara.

The course which will be labelled ECO 224 should be flexible enough in format to appeal to any students in second or higher who are interested in comparative political economy. Some interest in and experience with economic theory would be useful but the seminar format should accommodate several different levels of experience.

Denny is quick to point out that he has no easy answers for the kind of questions the course is likely to pose. He will be happy to provide the framework for a systematic examination of the two economic systems — capitalism and socialism — and their hybrids. Because the course was formed too late to get into the calendar students seeking further information on it can consult the booklet prepared by the department or phone Denny at 928-8637.

Due to increased academic pressures, the law students manning the office will be unable to continue the service after that date and may have to reject cases involving protracted work which come into the Centre in the meantime.

All students have been instructed to make every effort to clear up all cases which are pending. In no event will a client who is presently relying on the services of the Centre be abandoned.

Persons having urgent legal problems are advised to contact the Ontario Legal Plan at 73 Richmond St. W. (phone 366-9361) or, if you are able to afford the services of a lawyer, the Law Society of Upper Canada Referral Service in Osgoode Hall, 30 Queen St. W. (phone 362-4741).

For landlord-tenant disputes, there is the municipal landlord-tenant advisory bureau in the new City Hall (phone 367;8572). C.L.A.C. will be re-opening in the summer for approximately 10 weeks commencing June 7 to render whatever assistance it can to students and others having legal problems.

The first year of operation has been quite successful in the opinion of all of those involved. The total number of cases handled should be approximately 180, the vast majority of whom were students. A large number of the cases have involved merely advice and/or referral, however many have required protracted negotiation or court appearances.

Who are the real traitors

In April 1838 two men — Peter Matthews and Samuel Lount — were executed at a downtown Toronto street corner for their part in the uprising of the previous year. Here we print a rare historical document, an appeal for her husband's life written by Elizabeth Lount to the Chief Justice of Upper Canada, John Beverley Robinson.

Sir:

Woman cannot redress her wrongs. Her feeble arm is powerless; even were justice to be reached with certainty through fatigues in the tented field, and liberty be given to an oppressed, enslaved and insulted people, 'tis not woman who should lead the way. It belongs to the "lion heart and eagle eye" of your sex, sir, to lead in war, to maintain a people's rights, to do or die on redressing their wrongs, to save their country from oppression and slavery. But to you, sir, Canada can never look for assistance. It has been said by an eminent author that every man has his price, and however unjust the remark is with regard to others, I conceive it well applies to yourself.

In this letter, intended as a partial exposé of the sufferings of myself and family, and of the execution for treason of my beloved husband, Samuel Lount, M. P., I would remark that my husband was born in the state of Pennsylvania, in the year 1791, and emigrated to Canada when about 23 years of age. He had taken the oath of allegiance, and had become an adopted citizen of the Province.

He was a reformer and a loyal subject. He had become familiar with the constitution and the laws of Great Britain, and where they were regarded and justly administered it always gave him pleasure. During his lifetime he had frequently been requested by his fellow citizens to become a candidate for a seat in the Provincial Parliament, but refused repeatedly. At length, however, he was taken up and elected.

While in Parliament he became acquainted with the leading men of the country, and being a liberalist in his opinions, united his political fortunes with Doctor Rolph, Mr. Mackenzie, and other distinguished gentlemen, who beheld with regret the corruptions of the government.

They saw a rich and fertile country, almost prostrate and ruined — a hopeful people possessed of the feelings and sympathies of men, trampled upon by the mercenary wretches, whose places in office gave them power. Year after year Canadian grievances became more alarming, until almost the entire population groaned for relief — groaned beneath the yoke of their bondage. True it is that my dear husband, whom your laws have torn from me and from his helpless children, espoused sincerely the cause of reform. Had their plans succeeded, that reform would have been obtained — the Governor secured — and the Province freed without shedding of a drop of human blood.

Had not the mistake been made for the rally, the arms of the Province would have been seized by the patriots, Toronto would have been taken by consent and Sir Francis held in their power to answer for his oppressions.

Those with whom my husband acted were moved by the impulses of noble and generous sympathies. They panted not for offices, for those they enjoyed — they thirsted not for blood, for Canadians were their brothers — they were determined to drive a Nero from his throne, to rid Canada of a tyrant, and to effect a civil revolution that would give happiness and prosperity to the country.

Had they been successful, Canadians to the latest posterity would have blest them.

But, sir, all is not over yet. No government whose only acts are those of violence and cruelty, whose statute book is stained with the blood of innocent sufferers, and whose land is watered by the tears of widows and orphans, can long stand contiguous to a nation abounding in free institutions.

O Canada, my own country, from which I am now exiled by a party whose mercy is worse than death — I love thee still.

Destruction has overtaken thy brightest ornaments, and the indignant feelings of thy sons burn their hearts, but they dare not give utterance to their thoughts. How many mothers have suffered, like me, the loss of a home and all that could make that home pleasant. This, however, could have been borne. I do not write to excite your sympathy, for that I neither respect or covet. I write that Canada may know her children will not silently submit to the most egregious outrages upon private property, and even life itself.

Sir, it beggars description, and is beyond my competency to relate my sufferings while a subject of Canada. For the generous acts of a brave and noble hearted man I have seen his son taken before his mother's eyes, tied like a galley slave and driven to prison as a felon — aye, more, I have seen the innocent youth covered with wounds received from a drunken and brutal soldiery whose election it was to do the work of the officials. I have seen my husband's house pillaged, and his parlor made a soldier's camp, his property confiscated, and his heart-broken wife and six children cast upon the charity of the cold world.

I have beheld the husband and father in prison, condemned to death without the least shadow of a crime proved against him.

ors?

Sir, the officers of the government of Canada, civil and military, are placed over the people without their consent. They form a combination too powerful for the prayers of an humble citizen to move. Be their acts however corrupt, the law is by themselves administered, and consequently they are beyond its reach; while if the private citizen offend he is neither safe in his property or person.

If these things are so, I ask you, sir, how long will the people of Canada tamely submit? Will they not soon rise in their strength, as one man, and burst asunder the chains that bind them to the earth and revolutionize and disenthral Canada from the grasp of tyrants?

Sir, savage nations respect my sex, and their female captives are treated with kindness. Your Governor and his Council, together with a majority of your party during the late difficulties neither respected private property nor harmless unoffending women. With him and his minions all were fit subjects upon whom to practise cruelty.

After my lamented husband had been convicted, I learned that Governor Arthur had visited the prison and it was hoped that mercy had called him thither. But there was no mercy in his obdurate heart — cruelty is the reigning demon of his passions. When Mr. Lount was arrested and carried bound to Toronto, I immediately repaired there, but was not allowed by the Governor to see him. He told me that my husband "looked well." This I afterwards found to be false as he had suffered much.

Captain Fuller finally obtained a pass for me, and I was allowed to go with him and once more see my husband. I found him a shadow, pale and debilitated. Poor man! here I beheld him in prison, not that he had burned a city, for he had saved Toronto from flames — not that he had taken the lives of his enemies, for he was opposed to the shedding of blood.

But he opposed himself to the oppressors of his countrymen — and for this was doomed to suffer death, which sentence was pronounced by Your Honor, and on which occasion, I am informed, you trifled with his feelings and acted the demon.

When I learned the result of the trial I was again permitted to see my husband. Learning that the Governor had been to see him, I was anxious to know the result of the interview. He told me "it would give me no satisfaction to know." I asked him if the Governor spoke kindly? He said "No, he spoke harsh and only added insult to injury."

The day before my husband was executed, I, in company with a lady of Toronto, visited the Governor. On entering the room he requested me to sit down — but my errand was of importance. I told him I was the wife of Samuel Lount, and had come before him to plead for mercy. He appeared obstinate, and refused my petition.

Thirty-five thousand of his subjects also asked him to interpose his power and save my husband from the sentence of the law. I then kneeled before him in behalf of my husband.

With an air of disdain he told me "not to kneel to him, but to kneel to my God!" I replied that I was kneeling in prayer to the Almighty that he would soften his heart. I told him that my husband did not fear to die — that he was prepared for death, but it was his wife and children asking for his life to be spared.

To this he sneeringly replied "that if he was prepared for death he might not be so well prepared at another time!" O monster that he was to rule a virtuous people.

He said they did not condemn my husband because he was guilty — "I do think," said he, "if Rolph and Mackenzie were here mercy would be shown to them. Two lives were lost at Montgomery's and two must now suffer."

At another time he said "there were others concerned in the rebellion," and intimated that if my husband would expose them he might yet go clear; but my husband always said he would never expose others or bring them into difficulty — the cause they enlisted in was a good one, and before he would expose Mackenzie's Council he would himself be sacrificed.

Thus far neither prayer nor petitions could subdue the hard heart of the Governor, and I gave up my husband as lost to me and Canada.

The sad morning came — the victim was led forth — and the endearing husband and father fell a martyr in the cause of Canadian reform. Though thousands had petitioned for his respite, all was of no avail.

Petitions moistened by virtuous tears, nor the humble supplications of an almost heartbroken wife at the feet of the Canadian Governor could touch his heart or move his compassion. Did the law of honor or of justice require this useless flow of blood then I could not censure him. Everything high and honorable, all that was generous and great in Canada, called upon Sir George Arthur to interpose his power and rescue the life of a citizen whom thirty-five thousand Canadians had petitioned to save. Call you this English humanity? Call you him a fit Governor to rule Canada?

Sir, could a tale of human suffering lead you to feel another's woe, I would relate a series of hardships brought upon me and my orphaned children by you, and others of the tory party in Canada, that would call the full grown tears to manly eyes.

Was it for fear of an enraged and insulted people that Governor Arthur refused a defenceless woman the corpse of her murdered husband? No, for that people had no arms to defend themselves with. Why then when upon my bended knee I begged the body of my husband, did he send me from his presence unsatisfied?

The wrongs of Canada, and the blood of that innocent man continually preyed upon his mind, and he, like a coward and a tyrant, dared not let my husband's friends behold the iniquitous work he had done.

He feared that, when they saw the manly corpses of Lount and Matthews, the generous sympathies of a noble people, who have been too long ruled by threats, might rise, and in retributive justice fall with tenfold force upon himself and those who were his chief advisers.

But, sir, this painful relation is sickening and heartrending, and I shall close my letter to you that I may draw my mind from the horrible subject.

Canada will do justice to his memory. Canadians cannot long remain in bondage. They will be free.

The lion will give way, and a bold star will eventually ornament the Canadian standard sheet. Then will the name of Canadian martyrs be sung by poets and extolled by orators, while those who now give law to the bleeding people of Canada will be loathed or forgotten by the civilized world.

And now, by the cruelty of the government, I find myself a widow, driven from home and kindred and a stranger in a strange land. I shall close this letter by saying that my husband, just before his tragic death, said "that he freely forgave them (the tories) for their cruelty, and that he was prepared to meet his God in peace."

Stephan Kogitz was acclaimed

Arts and Sci white wonder wins widespread acclaim

By IAN MACLAREN

The year has rolled around once again to that favourite of favourite pastimes, perusing the annual We've got just-what-you're-looking-for booklet, officially recognized as The University of Toronto Faculty of Arts and Science (St. George Campus) Calendar.

Displayed strategically on this year's 284 pages of not-so-glossy velum are brief outlines of the officially approved proposals for course outlines, explanations of how to win big marks in your spare time, and a number of other nifty little ditties not least of which is a two-year Calendar which gloriously unfolds itself on the last page.

One of the big features of this year's Calendar is,
 "Standing in a Course", a subject which is not to be confused with a growing paucity of seating facilities in some lectures. This section presents a delineation of the Faculty's solution to border-line students — they've changed the borders. Under this sytem of marking students, a 50 now nets you zip while with 50½, you pass. On the other hand, the Faculty has deemed it necessary to make the admission that 100½ per cent is a possibility. Also enclosed is the return of the popular symbol "R" to signify Thursday, the logic behind which seems somewhat arbitrary.

Unfortunately, the course outlines in this Calendar which, in many cases, are the only sources of information available to aspiring Grade XIII hopefuls, adequately describe what you're getting but not what you're getting into.

The discrepancy is noteworthy as it may quite possibly make the difference between a course sounding great and then ending up a "lemon" (the 1950's answer to the bumper).

The course outlines are an excellent guide as to what course will form an adequate basis for further study, and when used together with suggested programs of study, provides an adequate frame of reference for students who either find the New Programme too vast and limitless or who would rather opt in favour of a major-minor program of study.

The description of individual courses, though dry, is as informative as such brevity permits. With the outstanding pressure of meeting publishers' deadlines and having to be approved by the Faculty Council as early as Jan. 4, the outlines are remarkably definitive. However, for any university or high school student who wants a more detailed and current explanation of course content, or the methods by which a course is to be taught, more specific addresses for getting information than those presently offered, should be offered.

Another proposal for specifying course outlines, voiced by a number of interviewed students, would be a separate Calendar issued by each College for an individual description of its College courses. Admittedly, anything which can aid in reducing the overwhelming size of this institution's image, will be a benefit to prospective students and the great many present students who are still searching vast corridors and lecture halls for some sort of identity.

Regardless, this year's Calendar is: (a) fast — breaking from cover to cover, (b) looks a lot more like a telephone directory than ever before, or (c) makes better reading than most prescribed course readings; it must be admitted by one and indeed all that it has a lovely back cover which can be readily likened in expression and imagination to the embryo monolith emerging at Harbord and St. George.

It couldn't be! It is — before his really good pictures

Chartrand to speak here Sunday

Labour leader Michel Chartrand and radical lawyer Robert Lemieux will speak at U of T's Convocation Hall at 2 p.m. on Sunday at a mass rally in defence of Quebec political prisoners.

Lemieux and Chartrand, both members of the so-called "Montreal Five", were released on bail following the quashing of seditious conspiracy charges against them last month. They still face charges, however, of membership in the outlawed Front de Liberation du Quebec.

Chartrand's appearance here will conclude his cross-Canada tour sponsored by the Toronto-based Emergency Committee for the Defence of Political Rights in Quebec, which defends Quebec political prisoners and seeks repeal of the Public Order Act.

 The tour has taken Chartrand to eleven Canadian cities in the past two weeks.

A spokesman for the Emergency Committee said the tour "revealed encouraging resistance to the repressive policies of the Trudeau government and a surprising degree of sympathy for the Quebec political prisoners."

Lakehead sit-in sticks

By LAURA CUP KELLY

Lakehead students are maintaining a 24-hour a day sit-in in opposition to the dismissal without arbitration of a Sociology professor Vic Wightman.

Forty to 50 students stay all night while about 200 altogether are involved, and there has been no stated opposition to the sit-in from either students or faculty.

Wightman, an American professor educated at the University of Michigan in sociology and linguistics, was dismissed on the grounds of his inadequate credentials and a reduced university budget.

The protesting students say that the department is presently hiring new staff, and that Wightman is being dropped because he supports the Canadian Liberation Movement 85% quota movement, and has made public statements against American imperialism.

Wightman holds a masters degree in sociology, and a degree in linguistics from the University of Michigan, but does not have a Ph.D.

However he is the only sociology prof qualified to teach linguistics at Lakehead.

One of Wightman's targets, the Kimberly-Clark Company, is represented on the Lakehead University Senate.

Students who have about 20% representation in the Sociology and Anthropology Department, have received no administration reply to their demand for arbitration for all dismissed faculty who request it.

The department chairman is absent from Lakehead, and the remainder of the officials refuse to call a meeting.

However, some officials approached a small group on the student government executive with a compromise to the student demands.

The executive members, including the students' president, appeared to give in to the officials, and were subsequently impeached
 by the council members.

They stand trial today.

Wightman, who is hoping for an impartial panel to hear his reinstatement plea, has not appeared at the sit-in nor made any public statements.

Cowboy hat and a vest? Oh no!
 And tobacco in the pipe?!

I'm really getting pissed off!

It was Lenin who warned that it is after a revolution that the hardest part of the struggle commences:

"The transition from capitalism to communism represents an entire historical epoch. Until this epoch has terminated, the exploiters inevitably cherish the hope of restoration, and this hope is converted into attempts at restoration. And after their first serious defeat, the overthrown exploiters — who had not expected their overthrow, never believed it possible, never conceded the thought of it — throw themselves with energy grown tenfold, with furious passion and hatred grown a hundredfold, into the battle for the recovery of the 'paradise' of which they have been deprived...."

The seeds of revisionism can be seen to have been growing from the start of the Russian Revolution and the main agents were the artists and the intellectuals. No cultural revolution stemmed the tide as in China.

To be certain, the big bourgeoisie had been overthrown. The means of production had been taken from them.

Perhaps the most important and pressing problem was that of the intelligentsia, the artists and intellectuals and the technicians whose valuable knowledge was greatly needed in order to build a new order. This class had both its good points and bad points.

On the one hand the radical intelligentsia, because of their inquisitiveness and radically progressive character, avidly supported socialism and the revolution. Many were in the forefront of the struggle with the proletariat. Many became members of the Party. On the other hand, because of their middle-class origins, many were wavering in their commitment to the revolution and to the working class. They tended to be too idealistic, to dream too much. Because of the great artistic freedom after the Revolution, they experimented with new forms. They indulged themselves, they departed radically from old conventions in theatre, art and literature. Some of it was brilliant and innovative but a great many not only departed from old conventions — they also departed from the great mass of the people. They did not go among the workers and peasants and soldiers but rather made their art the most important thing. This was the most effective fifth column of supplanted bourgeoisie in the ranks of the revolutionary masses and its constant wearing away at the fibre of the revolution was a major factor in the ascendancy of revisionism.

George Lukacs is a Hungarian Marxist literary critic and one of those progressive intellectuals thrown forward by the proletarian revolution in Russia. He was born in 1885. His father was a director of the leading bank in Hungary. Lukacs was one of a group of revolutionary intellectuals who were prominent in the socialist movement in Hungary after World War II. He joined the Hungarian Communist Party in 1919 and was Commissar of Education in the brief Socialist-Communist coalition government shortly thereafter. When Admiral Horthy's 'White' army invaded and took over, Lukacs was forced to flee to Vienna where he was arrested. A successful campaign on his behalf was waged by Thomas Mann and other German literary notables and he was released.

In the twenties, Lukacs, an exile, wrote literary criticism and took part in the political struggle in the emigre Hungarian Communist Party. In 1928-29, he wrote down an action programme — called the "Blum theses" (Blum was Lukacs' 'party name' in the illegal organization). The theses, though couched in Leninist language, attempted to work out a strategy for a Hungarian democratic revolution, casting socialism to the side. His theses were rejected by the Party and the Communist International. He was excluded from all decision-making processes and obliged to confine himself to philosophy and literary criticism.

He spent most of the thirties in Moscow writing and editing literary publications. In 1945, he came back to Hungary when it was liberated by the Soviet Army. While holding the chair of Aesthetics and Cultural Philosophy at Budapest University in the new socialist government, he again was censured and withdrew from active Party life.

But he emerged again and during the 1956 Hungarian uprising, he became a member of the Party's central Committee and Education Minister in the government of Imre Nagy. Having survived the latter's fall and execution, he returned from a brief period of exile in Rumania and was allowed to resume a normal existence in Budapest under the government of Janos Kadar, although his writings fell under an official ban. Readmitted to the Communist Party in 1967, he was understood to have protested privately against the invasion and occupation of Czechoslovakia. But in March 1969, on the fiftieth anniversary of the brief Hungarian Soviet Republic in 1919, in which he had participated, he was officially decorated with the Order of the Red Banner and once more allowed to express his opinions publicly in interviews with Eastern and Western correspondents.

The back cover of a study of Lukacs by George Lichtheim says, "George Lukacs is an unusually difficult writer to assess and explain." The Historical Novel, Essays on Thomas Mann, The Meaning of Contemporary Realism and Writer and Critic, a book of Lukacs' essays, provide a comprehensive and valuable insight into the life and work of one of the most famous Marxist critics. But it is hard to follow.

Lukacs' work, like his political life, is uneven, confused, and erratic. At times, he adheres to a strictly Marxist-Leninist line, but in his major works, he runs all over the map, from a pre-Marxian Hegelianism to Luxemburgism.

Lukacs' writings on Thomas Mann and the German realists are invaluable. But Lukacs has had what has been called "an intellectual love-affair" with Thomas Mann. This love affair has extended to other "critical realist" authors. Lukacs has very little use for socialist realism, although he insists that much of it is 'revolutionary romanticism'. In The Meaning of Contemporary Realism, he says, "it reduces perspective, to the level of practical day-to-day exigency. Life is thus robbed of its poetry." But as with much of Lukacs' writing, it is difficult to cut through the words to find what he is really talking about.

What he is really talking about is the fact that literature and art that serves the working class and the revolution must necessarily go beyond Lukacs' favoured 'realism'. This he does not like. He insists on defining literature in terms of realism and naturalism, instead of defining it in terms of its service to the revolution. It would not be surprising to learn of his dislike for modern revolutionary Chinese literature.

Yet we have so few genuine Marxist literary critics and even fewer Marxist aesthetic philosophers. This is perhaps why Lukacs has won so much fame. The only other prominent Marxist to write on culture is Mao-Tsetung himself who, in his classic Talks at the Yanan Forum on Literature and Art, wrote of just such intellectuals as Lukacs. "Coming from the petty bourgeoisie and being themselves intellectuals many comrades seek friends only among intellectuals and concentrate on studying and describing them. Such study and description are proper if done from a proletarian position. But that is not what they do, or not what they do fully. They take the petty-bourgeois stand and produce works that are the self-expression of the petty bourgeoisie, as can be seen in quite a number of literary and artistic products. Often they show heartfelt sympathy for intellectuals of petty-bourgeois origin, to the extent of sympathizing with or even praising their shortcomings. On the other hand, these comrades seldom come into contact with the masses of workers, peasants and soldiers...."

Lukacs' work is comprehensive and valuable and offers great insight into Mann, Goethe, Kafka and other writers, but he is not to be regarded as a foremost Marxist critic. Perhaps a cultural revolution would have sent him and many other Soviet-influenced intellectuals among the people for reeducation. Rumour has it he is busy now working on a major opus on Marxist aesthetic theory. We'll have to see.

Lukacs, Mao and the Proletarian Cultural Revolution

Larry Halven

In March of 1969, George Lukacs, 83 years old, was officially decorated with the Order of the Red Banner in Hungary. At the same time, many thousands of miles away, at the peak of the Chinese Cultural Revolution, the Shanghai Revolutionary Mass Criticism Writing Group was writing the following statement: "The historical process of the dictatorship of the proletariat peacefully degenerating into the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie in the Soviet Union teaches us that a bourgeois dictatorship in culture will inevitably lead to an all-round restoration of capitalism, politically and economically."

A year before, the workers-PLA Mao Tsetung Thought propaganda team had come to The China Opera and Dance-Drama Theatre and started to reeducate the members of the troupe who, for the seventeen years since the revolution, had degenerated in many ways. They were guilty of an over-emphasis on professionalism; they cared little for the workers and peasants; much of their work consisted of foreign operas glorifying romantic and thoughtless themes; they sought fame and professional adulation.

In order to rectify their practice, the theatre's "literary and art workers" (as they are called in China) went to work in factories and rural people's communes. They learned from the people and gave performances for them. In turn the workers and peasants educated them and joined mass criticism sessions where new directions for the Chinese theatre were forged. The process of criticism and self-criticism and going among the people is now a permanent one.

Beethoven — by J. D. Boehm

Beethoven biography easy-going

Beethoven: Biography of a Genius
By George R. Marek
Longman Canada Limited
$16.00

There are countless books about Beethoven's music, and quite a few about Beethoven himself. Almost none of those biographies have the easy-going erudition, the persuasive conversational style of Mr. Marek's book. Every major composer seems to have one official biographer, whose lengthy tome is consulted as the final authority. This volume is not meant to be consulted but to be read. When I received this 600-odd page book for review, I had intended to skim and skip through it in the best book-reviewer tradition. After reading the first chapter I felt compelled to read the whole volume.

Actually Marek calls Beethoven a genius only in the title. However throughout the book he marshals fact after lucid fact in a narrative that testifies to the composer's geniality more than any outright paean of praise. Much of the book is devoted to the social history of Beethoven's times, the milieu in provincial Bonn and urbane Vienna. Marek writes simply rather than simplistically, illuminating the personalities and the philosophies which affected Beethoven's life. The writing is now lyrical, now downright prosaic (Marek quotes from the autopsy report on Beethoven's lung and thorax to dispell the myth that he suffered from respiratory disease).

As with facts so also with illustrations the author selects those that further his narrative. The size, format and illustrations all destine this book for the bed-side bookshelf rather than the coffee table. It is boring to look at but absolutely engrossing to read. Some readers might find the book almost too intimate (read, gossipy): one section is entitled "Did Beethoven Have Syphilis?" But on my shelf it takes its deserved place beside those more ponderous volumes of another age by Tovey and Thayer

Verdi, Schumann on new records

Many are promised but few are sent! Of the records that did arrive, three albums are worth a listen. The first is RCA-Victor's recording of Verdi's Rigoletto, LSC-7027. The opera features Robert Merrill as Rigoletto, Anna Moffo as Gilda and Alfredo Kraus as the Duke. Mr. Merrill is predictably good, if not too exciting, and Miss Moffo certainly compensates in musicality and subtlety what she may lack in absolute security of pitch. But young Alfredo Kraus, who is a relative newcomer to international opera turns in a delightfully lyric performance as the Duke. Conductor Georg Solti commands the RCA Italiana Opera Orchestra with sensitive authority. It is a very musical performance, although I personally dislike the extremely close miking of the singers which distorts any illusion of stage and distance. Still, voices and orchestra are first-rate, and an essay by Ernest Newman prefaces what certainly ranks as one of today's authoritative versions of this work.

Boyd Neel conducts Handel, Elgar and Holst on a Deutsche Grammophon record, DGG 253D D15, and does a pretty good job. Actually the record possesses an average side (Handel) and an outstanding side (Elgar and Holst). The three overtures by Handel are pretty standard fare, in type at least, complete with clinking harpsichord. The Elgar Serenade is an early work which is at times Brahmsian but with a pastoral English mood. Dr. Neel evokes a fresh lyricism from the Hart House players which turns to considerable virtuosity in the Holst Fugal Concerto. The taping is excellent and the sound elegant but persuasive.

Finally, a new recording of Beethoven's Bagatelles, Op. 126 and Schumann's Fantasies-tucke, Op. 12 by Toronto-based pianist Pierre Souvairan, on CBC-Select CC-15 037, released here by London Records. Before discussing the record, I would like to comment on the cover. Like it or not, records are often bought on visual appeal. Now someone at CBC-Select headquarters, someone with the business survival instincts of a kamikaze pilot commissioned artist Ritha Gingras to design the cover for this album. That design might appeal to someone looking for drapery for a dentist's office but it does not enhance this album.

The actual performance shows a respectful, mature and cerebral approach to Beethoven and Schumann. The Beethoven is lyrical, suffused with the quiet joy of amn beyond earthly suffering. Having been weaned on the Schnabel performance I miss the stormy abandonment in Bagatelle No. 4 and the opening of the last, and the repeat in the first half of No. 4, but this is a matter of personal taste. With the Schumann, no disagreements. Mr. Souvairan's performance is the result of a 40-year love affair with the Fantasies-tucke, and his interpretation here is translucently simple, a simplicity borne of complete understanding.

Theall examines McLuhan

The Medium is the Rear View Mirror: Understanding McLuhan
By Donald Theall
McGill-Queen's, $3

During the past couple of years some sort of eclipse has covered Marshall McLuhan. Or rather it has covered his critics, which is a good thing, for McLuhan criticism has been so silly, either stridently for or against, that most of it has been useless. Finally, however, a sane, complete, and stimulating critique and handbook has appeared. Donald Theall's The Medium is the Rear View Mirror: Understanding McLuhan.

Previously, critics simply viewed McLuhan as either a prophet or the Devil, depending upon how much of a stake each critic had in the ultimate truth of McLuhan's views. And in the background Tom Wolfe's question hovered: "What if he is right?" Theall avoids this trap. A former student of McLuhan's and a friend, he sits objectively, and never damns or blesses. Instead he explains McLuhan's ideas, and, especially useful, he examines McLuhan's forms.

For initially he recognizes that above all McLuhan's approach negates most rational criticism. The use of the pun, absolutely necessary for making his points, enables McLuhan to transmit, in much the same way as the non-linear communications, his ideas, for the pun is at once multileveled. Added to this are McLuhan's wit, and especially his roots in literature and art — his knowledge about science and other components is mostly from secondary sources.

Theall therefore sees McLuhan as an artist, essentially a poet. And for his poems McLuhan has developed a new form, what Theall calls the "essai concret", similar to a concrete poem, and operating in much the same way.

The real value in this book, then, is that Theall recognizes that McLuhan offers no answers, only probes, which ultimately may prove true in themselves, but even if false do not destroy the fundamental concept of the effect communications have on our lives. So Theall creates tools for an approach to McLuhan, and for the first time real insight is brought to bear on his ideas.

Dianne Likes Edward

With trumpets and clashing of swords, Brecht's adaptation of Christopher Marlowe's Edward II has come to the UC Playhouse this week, with all of its slaughter and pomp. And, aside from various minor quirks and its overwhelming length, it is by far the best production I have seen in that theatre all year.

Paul Mulholland, the director and designer, deserves great credit for this production, his first. The acting is what one expects from a college production enthusiastic but less than polished, though the miming in the battle scene was of a most professional caliber. Rather, the attraction of this play lies firstly, in the "stumbling verse" of Lion Feuchtwanger, Brecht's epic sense of the dramatic, and Marlowe's original grasp of the compelling history of the time.

But, once written, the play is left in the hands of its director. Last year's production at the Royal Alex lay limp and gray upon the stage; this one varies from kingly splendour to desolate dungeons, true to the promise of its name. But Brecht, as usual, has written a very long script, and Mulholland chose to use it all. The first and longest act moves quickly; so much so that the thick, fast spoken dialect of the peasant soldiers is almost unintelligible. But the slow scenes between Mortimer and the queen (whose name, inexplicably, has been changed from Isabella to Ann), and the degradation and death of Edward, make the second and third acts drag far too long, the play would be better served were they almost frighteningly quick. The set, too, though magnificent, is quite hollow, and the clatter involved in moving props out-bellows even the loudest actor.

But aside from that, I have nothing but praise for this play. Costumes, props, lighting and set were fitting and imaginative both in design and execution; the conversion from court to Parliament to battlefield and back was particularly well done, as was the cell in Shrewsbury wherein was lodged the king, Mortimer, Ann, Winchester and Kent were notably well cast, and each actor fitted well in his role. Don't miss this play if you can help it.

More discs for Issy's collection

The latest in a series of attempts to merge the pop and classical fields is the evolution of the rock opera, heralded by Tommy and now continued by Jesus Christ Superstar. This work is much more opera-like, featuring full orchestra, chorus, and a menage of voices drawn from many groups. The result is much more cohesive than one would imagine, and a very pleasant musical experience. The album is on Decca - DXSA 7206.

Steven Stills of CSN&Y fame has released a sole album for Atlantic Records (SD 7202), which leads one to believe that it would have been more prudent of him to forget this venture. The tunes are capably written, but Stills is simply incapable of bringing them off without the first rate backing of his cohorts.

Van Morrison is one performer whose discs are consistently better than his live performances, and his latest record is no exception. The album (WB 1884), his newest for Warner Bros., has some first rate tunes and features production of a quality which he never experienced while with Bang Records.

Neil Young's latest album, After the Gold Rush (Reprise RS 6383) is perhaps his finest ever. Unlike his cohort Stills, he has the ability to stand out as a solo performer. Further, he has chosen an ideal collection of songs to put on the album. Thus we are not bothered by his voice which, like Melanie's, has the potential to destroy any song if not controlled. A first rate bit of music.

Led Zeppelin's third album serves to indicate that this British group is as uninteresting when using acoustic instruments as electrical ones. For die-hard fans, the album is on Atlantic - SD72D1.

Kris Kristofferson's debut album for Monument (SLP 18139), serves to demonstrate what most observers have said about him — he writes beautiful and poignant material, but it is a pity that he feels compelled to sing it. He does however, put a great deal of feeling into his interpretations.

The Moody Blues started out as the group who could best handle the combined pop and classical media. However their originality seems to have worn off, as their Threshold of a Dream album crams all the enjoyable material into the second side (Deram DES 18D25).

Bob Dylan's comeback was a striking success, reaching a pinnacle with Neshville Skyline. However, with the release of New Morning (Columbia KC 3D290), Dylan has put his second successive clunker on the market. Only the title songs are all meritorious.

Laura Nyro's Beeds of Sweat (Columbia KC 30259) has the potential to be a first rate album, but my copy, with inaudible lyrics, was a force. The lyrics, as read from the back cover, are promising, and "Upon the Roof" is always an impressive song.

Miles Davis' Bitches Brew is the most heralded jazz album in a decade. For those who enjoy progressive jazz, the album is a can't miss bet. The quality and inventiveness of Davis' playing are unparalleled. Back-up work is controlled and first rate.

Tom Rush's most recent albums on Columbia (CS 9972 & C30402) feature him doing the type of song he enjoys most — the rhythmic tune of the 50's. On those occasions when he resorts to pure forms of folk, my pleasure in his work maximizes. The more recent album features a fine rendition of Sweet Baby James, and the first large sample of original Rush compositions.

Santana's Abraxis (Columbia KC 30130) is a first rate album which I can't help but enjoy. Once again the group has been wise enough to let the instrumental shine through, and the result is most satisfying listening.

Don Ellis at Fillmore (Columbia G 30243) features this innovator at his best. Some wild trumpet sounds are brought about by electricity, wild sound production, and the intense drive of the Ellis himself.

Terry & McGhee have been on top of the folk music scene for a lot of years, and so their newest album (Bluesway BLS 6D2B) comes as a disappointment because most of the memorable tunes have already been recorded in superior fashion. This is not to detract from their individual talents which shine through brightly on this disc.

Cyclop's Sunglass is a group which has risen from nowhere to become a sensation with the staff of the Varsity. The group, from little-known Gormley, playing music which is best described as primeval, is unfortunately doomed to oblivion by unpopular public reception.

Studio Lab revue dull

With the proliferation of revues in Toronto, it was inevitable that some decline in quality would occur, and the first casualty is

Where Do We Go From Here, now offered by the Studio Lab company for a limited run

The main trouble with the show is that it simply is not funny. No writing credit is given; perhaps the cast evolved the material, but in any case no belly laughs and very few chuckles result from the writing. The music by Tom Sankey is mediocre and unmemorable, mostly commenting on some aspect of society like drugs, or simply there for intended pleasure.

Revue requires short, precise skits, and are usually topical in subject matter. So we are presented with newly-weds diving into kinky sex, a young man and his neuroses, and a song about how to cope with the fuzz. But in order to be succinct, skits must be slightly extreme or ludicrous. Norman Quinlan's toothless old man ranting about germs spreading from unclean can openers, or a prissy bureau lady's attempt to explain birth control to three native men are such cases, which are, unfortunately, few.

Only Rosemary Burris displays enough variety to indicate talent, but only she has opportunities to do so, the rest of the cast are given variations on one limited character. Norman Quinlan's old man and Janet Sankey's mother are well done, but we never know if their capabilities are this limited.

The timing and pacing, under the direction of Ernest Schwartz are very good, the staging is pleasing and informal. But without better content, no amount of quality in form can salvage any production.

Simmons and Whiting are afraid of true love

The inevitable has finally happened! Say Hello to Yesterday, the first illegitimate son of Love Story, has arrived to further the cause of Mediocrity through sentimentality and mush.

Admittedly, Say Hello to Yesterday is not all that violent a tear-jerker, but its Segalesque influences are there just the same. The plot is simple to the point of childishness, the dialogue sweet and pseudo-hip, and the characters one-levelled and uncomplicated.

The film takes place in colourful, mythical Swinging London and involves a one-day love affair between the Boy (Leonard Whiting) and the Married Woman (Jean Simmons). Although one keeps hoping to find out the real names of the central characters, this information is never disclosed. Evidently the viewer is intended to take this half-hearted stab at symbolism to mean that the hero and heroine can be your best friend, the mailman, or (gasp!) even you. For the sake of clarity, I'll call the boy "Innocence" and the woman "EXperience".

Innocence is in his twenties, the son of working-class parents and, judging from his attire and behaviour, draws something like $300 a week in unemployment insurance. It is his birthday and he is determined to lay the first girl he can get his paws on as a sort of present to himself. His choice is Experience, who, in her early forties, is bored with marriage and (what else?) confused about life.

As expected, Experience is at first shocked and then secretly pleased to find that some men still consider her attractive. Naturally she staves off the advances of Innocence, but breaks down completely when her mother tells her in so many words that adultery can be refreshing, healthful and morally uplifting if handled properly.

Innocence cons a furnished apartment from a rental agency and finally makes it with his lady love. But Experience, deflowered as she is, still has burning within her the moral essence of chastity, fidelity and purity. Deciding that after all, like it or not, the woman's place really is in the home, she goes back to diapers, dishes and hubby. Whew!

Hackneyed phrases and worn-out images abound. Most conspicuous is the film's balloon hang-up both in action (a yellow balloon trapped against the black ceiling of a railroad station) and in speech ("Love is like a balloon, if you squeeze too tightly it bursts").

The 90-minute film is especially tiresome, since no less than the first hour consists of his saying "Let's" and her saying "No" about a hundred times each. This time is spent chasing through an endless number of playgrounds, boutiques, cabs and buses.

It is also interesting to note that, whether because of Jean Simmons' personal beliefs or due to some oversight in shooting, there is no nudity in the entire movie. One would have thought that a nude scene might help to depict illicit sex as either beautiful or repulsive, depending on whose point of view you accept. But the absence of skin just makes Simmons seem all the more prudish, while reducing Whiting to little more than a loud-mouthed eunuch.

If, despite all this, you are still intrigued by Say Hello to Yesterday, try for a little while to fight off the urge to see it. It's bound to turn up on the Late Show in a month or two.

Atwood's poems of & for the lost & ruined

The Animals in That Country (Oxford $2.75)
The Journals of Susannah Moodie (Oxford $1.95)
Procedures for Underground (Oxford $1.95)
Power Politics (Anansi, $2.25)
 By Margaret Atwood

By nature a poet is some sort of double-sided creature: standing at a distance from mundane life in an objective position, he nevertheless reacts with powerful subjectivity to what he sees. His poems are his reactions, and in creating them he creates a world to serve as a context for his vision. Margaret Atwood's world has been described as "drowned", "destructive", and "hell", but it is certainly one of the most consistent, tightest, and poetically exciting worlds in Canadian poetry today.

And prolific. Now thirty-two, Atwood first published in 1966; her first effort, The Circle Game, won the Governor General's award. Since then she has presented the four above titles — the last just last month — and a novel, The Edible Woman. Through every book Atwood's world is never unclear, though slight changes can be seen.

Beginning with The Animals in that Country, Atwood's main concern is her search for an identity: not simply who she is, for she recognizes that there is no single, definable "she", but who she is in relation to others, or at certain times, or especially what her position is in the landscape. Metamorphosis, destruction and futility are constants, she searches, sometimes winning, most often losing.

Her search takes her through her own past, her own events. Or she seeks concrete information in a museum. Patriotism may be a means. In Boston she sees an exhibit of a relief map and photographs of Canada; but, she asks, "Who lives there?"

and "What do they wash with?" Myth perhaps remains, the green, endless forests, concrete symbols of Canada and her own life.

So she places her basic characteristic, vulnerability, in these landscapes, but either she becomes lost, as in the museum, or, in pioneer land, with no walls or borders, the vastness suffocates, and she cries "Let me out!" For essentially the human is helpless. To compensate he assaults, and does so usually for possession, to satisfy a form of hunger.

If he could cram his mind into my body and make it stay there, he would be happy.

("Part of a Day")

Or he dissects the other. But none of these work, for there is no communication possible. Each has his own position, each sees the other in his own way ("My skirt was yellow/small/ between his eyes") but horror and destruction are usually the results. Even the ceremonies, which rationalise but don't communicate in the end, supply no meaning for existence. All is darkness, and the other's mind is "a lost civilization I can never excavate."

Atwood tries another way in her next book, a series of poems inspired by the writings of pioneer Susannah Moodie (1805-85) of Belleville. She uses the Modie persona to examine Canada, a country so big that we all are immigrants, for no one can ever inhabit such a vast space, and whose unknown parts inspire fear. So living here is a choice, but involves a love-hate relationship with the potential and the destruction of the land. The book is really a tour de force, and can be interpreted in any number of ways: the individual, art. It is really one long, tight, unified poem, and its power is greater because all of the physical reality Atwood uses so well is organically present.

Her world changes slightly in her next collection, Procedures for Underground. The old threatening, destructive world is there: typewriters, desks and lights become so animate that the poet becomes paranoid, afraid to touch them because pain will result. A vantage point is sought through a frame window she views the world, but she can't get outside; she can't connect, and she is trapped. But there are also gardens. Gardens are ordered, geometrical, and thus offer some pleasurable refuge, but Atwood's optimism is very small, for in the same poem ("Two Gardens") she, seemingly safe in her refuge, is threatened by the uncontrolled growth outside.

Power Politics, her most recent book, is another tour de force based upon a single idea: two lovers, their time together, their reactions (they "commit" love), and eventually their parting, leaving bruises as on their thighs. But bruises heal, and this positive note complements an ironic, detached tone. The latter is unfortunate, for the poems are written in the first person. Furthermore, the limited idea of the book remains so, for too much abstraction and too little physical reality prevent the resonances which made her earlier efforts so rich and powerful.

Atwood has lived all over Canada, and her poetry gains a concrete reality from her vivid imagery: water, foliage, machines, above all the tactile of our urban and rural worlds. Her forms are unexciting, but her rhythm, smooth and colloquial, with a great variety in sound, responds to her themes beautifully. The world is an arena, a curiously asexual being (her poems, for the most part, could be recited by either sex, no matter how intimate) sits in the stands and comments. Life itself is justified simply by the search.

Sanders sends up porn, pigs, politicians, Yippies

Ed (Fug) Sanders has written a novel of the Yippies, Shard of God (Grove, $95). No matter what you may think of two other nasty authors — whether mention of him beside them would make you read the book howling with laughter or whether it would cause you to steal each copy you could find and file it under G — Sanders' work puts him on a level with William Seward Burroughs and the Norman-Mailer (of Why Are We in Vietnam?)

The book is disgusting. It is a surreal history of the Yippies and (in the main) of the plans they made and carried out for the destruction of Hubert Humphrey in Chicago. Also, it is a sendup of every kinky pornographic novel ever written, parodying that earnest style to exalt the good guys — Hoffman, Rubin, their wives, Yippie girls generally, the whole international counter-culture — and debase the bad guys — (you guessed it, sports fans) Nixon, "Humpho", the CIA, the FBI, all cops, James Dickey (Sanders, a poet, can't stand Dickey, who writes poems about how lovely it is to drop bombs and who thinks it's good for U.S. soldiers to be in Vietnam and who wins a lot of prizes in the States for his work).

Really, Shards of God is preferable to Mailer and Burroughs because Sanders is appaered in innocence. He believes in love and his heroic characters show it, constantly. Admittedly, and for effect, they fuck a lot on stage, and that's part of love. Sanders (and the Yippies, I'd say) has a pretty accurate notion of Everyman's private fantasies and he brings them up front with their legs spread and shoves them into your face: no delayed gratification for his heroes, nothing but delay for the twisted villains.

The main drawback of the book is that its resonant sense of the past — Sanders is an erudite man and his style and references to Egyptian mythology show that, at times — is too often obscured by local slang and references to events, friends, enemies and products. I showed this book for a few seconds to a learned professor the other day, and said it made me mad I wasn't living a fuller life. He looked at it and said that in ten years no one would be able to understand it. Well, he was right, though it was no consolation.

One awful citation. Abbie Hoffman (all right, I'm a victim of cultural imperialism, but so are you if you read this review!) is laying a rather inexperienced girl at the Chicago riot when he finds out she's 14 and the daughter of a cop on duty in Lincoln Park. Hoffman, says Sanders, knows Hatha Yoga, which "teaches one to control the muscles of expulsion so that, for instance, one trained in the science can reverse the action of the bladder muscles so that things can be sucked back in as well as emitted. Abbie had thoroughly mastered the ability to use his member as a straw . . ."

Miller's Price ok : audience needed

Arthur Miller is one of the most noteworthy playwrights that America has produced in this century. His play, THE PRICE, which has been running at the Science Centre for the past few weeks, and will continue there till the 29th, does much to uphold that reputation.

The play, set in contemporary America, deals with the interactions of four characters: a cop — Victor Franz, played by Sean Sullivan; his wife, Esther, played by Deborah Turnbull; his brother, a doctor named Walter, portrayed by Rick Campbell; and a used furniture dealer, an 89 year old Jewish gentleman named Gregory Solomon, played by E. M. Margolese, who also produced and directed the play.

The plot, as in all Miller works is apparently a very simple one: Victor and his wife decide to sell off the old furniture left by the brothers' late father. The sale is complicated by the fact that the brothers have not spoken in sixteen years, apparently because Walter has seen fit to ignore his brother now that he (Walter) has become successful after letting Victor support their sick father while he pursued his medical education.

As the confrontation between the brothers develops, spurned on by Esther, the true nature of the family is revealed. It turns out, as revealed by Walter, that their father was still wealthy by post-depression standards, and merely used his Victor's demented sense of loyalty to keep him close to him. Further, we are made aware that Victor was aware of this all along, but his nature condemned him to his fate. The family then has not been held together by love and loyalty but by mutual lechery.

The first act of the work serves to introduce us to the background of the family, gives us an insight into the personal life of Victor and Esther, which is apparently degenerating, reveals Walter's role in the state of affairs, and introduces us to Solomon, an aptly named character. The act terminates at the point when Walter makes his entrance, just as a deal for the furniture is about to be concluded. This proves to be a most unnatural break, as it signals no change in the flow of the action. The second act could much better be commenced after Solomon leaves the stage to set the stage for the confrontation between the brothers, which comprised the majority of the second act, anyway.

The character portrayals are generally first rate. Sullivan, as the cop, gives a performance which serves to more than adequately exude a character who needs to be abused. Campbell, a local disc jockey, has the physical appearance to make him credible as the doctor. Further, he puts into the role a certain feeling which makes us understand the burden he bears, being the only one who has come to understand the way things really were in their family.

Miss Turnbull, though playing the least demanding role in the play, has the most dramatically significant lines. However, she does not deliver them with the dramatic impact necessary to inform the audience of their significance.

Margolese, for his part, has reserved himself the most attractive role in the play. Even though the part of the dealer seems to be merely a perfunctory one — to serve as a comic sounding board, the part entails much more significance. If there is any fault in Margolese's portrayal it is that he lets his character become too much the comic role, so that his dramatic significance is all too easily overlooked by the audience. However, his voice intonation, mannerisms, and makeup are all designed extremely well.

His direction is at fault though, for letting plot override character, reversing the normal trend in Miller plays.

Technically, the play is extremely well done. The lighting and acoustics are first rate. The theatre itself, though not designed for stage work, is not detrimental to the staging. The set is adequate, but there have been obvious difficulties in obtaining the antique furnishings called for by Miller's script.

The major problem with the play is the poor public reception which it has received. Seats are not inexpensively priced, and student tickets are available at half price before performances. Aside from Miss Turnbull's weaknesses, and the occasionally stilted mannerisms of Campbell, the play is handled most meritoriously, especially by Mr. Margolese, and is deserving of a better reception.

Quebec crisis from a civil rights view

Rumours of War
Ron Haggart and Aubrey Golden
New Press $6.95

The main reason this new book exists, explained co-author Ron Haggart at a press conference yesterday, is that last fall more than 400 Canadians were arrested and jailed — and later released without ever being charged with an offense.

"We don't know how this example will be used in the future," said Haggart. "But it appears to be generally accepted by Canadians that it is all right to jail people not for anything they might have done, but for their politics alone."

Toronto Telegram columnist Haggart, and Toronto lawyer Aubrey Golden, hope that their new book on the kidnapping crisis and the imposition of the War Measures Act last fall will spark wide public debate over the threat to civil liberties which the actions of the federal government created.

Even now, the authors warn, Justice Minister John Turner is delivering careful speeches about the necessity of enshrining permanently in law a modified version of the soon-to-expire emergency measures. In short, the danger is that police will be granted the right to detain — "to intern" says Haggart — without charge.

But not only was the suspension of civil liberties a dangerous precedent, the authors warn, it wasn't even necessary.

"The War Measures Act," said Haggart, "made no contribution to the solving of the kidnappings."

The authors pronounce it as their opinion that the "provisional government plot", under which Le Devoir editor Claude Ryan was to become "the first FLO prime minister" was a myth and a fabrication.

They pinpoint the precise role that various government officials played in the crisis, from Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau (who, in 1969, they note, spoke jealously of countries where "they can pick up 500 people at random and keep them in jail . . . as long as they refuse to talk), his right-hand man Lucien Saulnier ("the real author of the War Measures Act"), Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa ("under great pressure . . . we pretty well absolve him") and the federal duo, Pierre Trudeau and Jean Marchand ("they played a Mutt and Jeff routine, one was the reasonable cop, the other one the tough cop").

Rumours of War is the first English language attempt at recreating and analyzing the events of last October in a critical and coherent way. As such, it is a welcome book.

The authors' preoccupation is with the ins and outs of the civil libertarian aspects of the crisis — generally a much neglected facet of Canadian history — but ultimately this focus has its limitations.

Of course it is necessary for English Canadians to understand exactly what it means for customary legal rights to be suspended — and no one in English Canada is more qualified for such a task than Haggart and Golden — but this must not be at the cost of failing to explain the larger social issues involved.

EDGAR CAYCE: ...the eighth day of creation

Edgar Cayce

With challenging and inclusive integrity, Edgar Cayce spoke simply of a human history that is at once infinite and completely personal. I don't believe his experience and example can with any honesty be dismissed so, here is a small presentation and review of readily available books about him and his extra-ordinary work.

Conflicting with and disturbing his own "Bible-Belt" southern, fundamentalist background, Cayce found himself giving form and verbal expression to a view of human experience which assumed and gave consistent examples of the effects of "karma" (simply our actions, thoughts, attitudes, ideals etc.) as developed through different life times or incarnations. This became a new development of his by then thirty years and many thousands of "physical readings" for people with various ailments who had requested a physical reading. Cayce responded with a consistent stream of precise diagnoses and strikingly effective prescriptions. Cayce had no medical training. Clearly impossible, right? Right... but there it is. We can ignore it or try to use it.

He once gave a reading in which the question was asked, "How can you do this?" He said that this type of ability was available and innate in everyone but was generally left undeveloped... and that his particular precision with medicine originated in a previous life when he had been a physician in Persia.

Of the various books about him and his work by far the best are those that most extensively quote directly from the transcripts that were made of over 14,000 readings he gave during his life. The worst tend to make comment and interpretations that simply don't fit.

He is one of the Great White Magicians of this entirely incredible century. A friend.

Edgar Cayce — The Sleeping Prophet by Jess Stearn (Bantam 95c) was the popularised representation of Cayce and his work. Good but superficial compared to Many Mansions by Gina Cerminara (Signet 95c) a brilliant psychologist. This woman's writing is second to no other author I have read. She is among the two or three who were equal to the special problems of writing meaningfully about a contemporary being like Cayce.

There is a River, by Thomas Sugrue (Dell, 95c) this is the most personalized image of Cayce in print. Written by a close friend it represents his very real humanity rather than sensationalizing his clairvoyant talents. It also has a very fine summary of the "Philosophy" and "system of metaphysical thought which emerges from the readings of Edgar Cayce..." Copyrighted in 1942, it was the first of what is now a small library of books on Cayce, and the only one before his death in 1945, which he said was the opening year of a new cycle. The Aquarian age.

Edgar Cayce's Story of Jesus, by Jeffrey Furst (Berkley Medallion 95c) The only written thing about Jesus that I wouldn't hesitate to recommend to anyone. It's not about the church (you are the church) and it's not about Christianity (dogma is bullshit) and the cover is ridiculous, but it's a magnificent presentation of the first man.

Edgar Cayce on Reincarnation, by Noel Langley (Paper Library 95c) has some good stuff about children and an extensive account of how the precept of reincarnation got fucked-over by some diabolical power-trippers in the sixth century. The parts about children are very fine.

Edgar Cayce on prophecy, by Mary Ellen Carter (Paperback Library 75c) has some of the most apocalyptic quotes: "Lands will appear in the Atlantic as well as the Pacific..." "The greater portion of Japan must go into the sea..." "The upper portion of Europe will be changed as in the twinkling of an eye..." "Even many of the battlefields of the present (1941) will be ocean..." In America: "All over the country many physical changes of a minor or greater degree. The greater change will be in the North Atlantic Seaboard. Watch New York, Connecticut and the lake."

"Los Angeles, San Francisco, most of all of these will be among those that will be destroyed before New York

"New York City itself, will in the main disappear. This will be another generation, though... while the southern portions of Carolina, Georgia, these will disappear. This will be much sooner.

"The waters of the Great Lakes will empty into the Gulf of Mexico.

"If there are greater activities in Vesuvius or Pelee, then the Southern coast of California — and the areas between Salt Lake and the southern portions of Nevada — may expect, within three months following same, an inundation caused by the earthquakes.

"Safety lands will be the areas around Norfolk, Virginia Beach, parts of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois and much of the southern portion of Canada and eastern portion of Canada.

"... for there will be the breaking up, until the time where there are people in every land who will say that this or that shows that nature is taking a hand — or the hand of divine interference — or this or that is the natural consequence of good judgments..."

Though Mary has singled out some of the most vivid of Cayce's statements, her own comments are sometimes distracting and silly, as when, for example she calmly says, "an outstanding example of modern progress toward this goal (faith, hope, love) is the Alliance for Progress in South America." Something I'm certain Cayce himself would not agree with and that I think is damn near psychotic (oops! I'm thinking of O.A.S.; they may not be related. Sorry.) Anyway, I wish Gina Cerminara, and I had worked on this book with her.

Venture Inward, by Hugh Lynn Cayce (60c) Cayce's son writes a fair account of the uses and meaning of meditation and the awakening and control of psychic ability — but of all people! you get a strange impression that, even though this type of phenomenon was a part of his daily life as a child, he doesn't trust it, or at least by far prefers the ordinary world and is perhaps only enjoying the publicity generated by his dad. I hope I'm wrong and I did enjoy the book a lot. He rejects the use of LSD for psychic exploration but like most of those who reject it I'm sure he hasn't tried it.

Edgar Cayce on Atlantis, by Edgar Evans Cayce (75c) by Cayce's second son, is unremarkable, but I enjoy it a lot because it concentrates on one of my favourite mysteries, Atlantis: the legendary Lost Continent. It says Plato was right, and gives details.

"And Poseidia will be among the first portions of Atlantis to rise again." More on that in September. I hope to go there with the blessings of orthodox archeology since it is suggested that the whole mystery may be solved by 1976. It should cause quite a stir... what do you think Bruce?

Edgar Cayce on Diet and Health by Ann Read, Carol Ilstrup and Margaret Gammon (Paperback Library 75c) is filled with insights and practical, immediately useable recipes, as well as overview on food, eating and health in general. There is a chart on page 48 dividing alkaline forming (fruits, vegetables, milk) and acid forming foods (animal fats, vegetable oils, cereal grains (brown rice is less acid forming), high starch and protein foods, nuts, meats and egg whites (yolks aren't). This compares to the Yin Yang division that macro-biotics makes extensive use of. It is a straight-forward, readable presentation throughout. The "Mummy Food" recipe is incredibly good!! One of the very last things in the book is appropriately about fasting.

In the last year about half a dozen new Paperback Library books on Cayce have appeared, none of which compare to There is a River, Many Mansions or The Story of Jesus, but all have something. They do share a superficial weakness in that they all have the interesting illustration of Cayce printed with a screen that centers on his right eye see picture. I think it means they need some cover design artists.

More books stuffed in

The last week, whew! but business as usual, and a few good books have come in recently (and not so recently) which deserve mention.

The Confessions of Edward Dahlberg (Doubleday, $7.75) is not as good a work as Because I Was Flesh, the first installment of his autobiography. This one starts more or less where that one left off, and Dahlberg describes his battered life through Berkeley and Columbia, between the legs of various women, on endless dirty streets and during the Thirties, when for a while he was a Communist.

The book is suffused with Dahlberg's inimitable baroque style, but it lacks a sympathetic focus — Because I Was Flesh told his beloved mother's story better than it told his own — and so lacks coherence.

Dahlberg "gibbets" himself, Charles Olson, Edmund Wilson, the literary poobahs of America, pet dogs or cats, Communism, capitalism, he has praise for Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Renaissance authors and other writers he likes, lamenting the while what he considers the present cheapening of the English language.

Charles Olson's Archaeologist of Morning (Clark, Irwin, $14.00) is expensive but worth it, being the collected poems of that author except for the Maximus Poems (a third and final volume of which should be published later this year). The beautifully presented present work contains "all previous Olson collections: Y & X, In Cold Hell, In Thicket, O'Ryan, The Distances, 'West', as well as scores of poems of major importance previously available only in rare magazines, journals and quarterlies."

The poems are presented chronologically, with an index that gives the date and place of their first publication, though it doesn't mention what poems were collected when and where. (That would have been nice to know.) Archaeologist of Morning is part of a set uniform with the two published volumes of the Maximus Poems and Letters to Origin: 1950-1956.

A New Charter For Monasticism edited by John Moffitt, (Firzhenry and Whiteside, $15.00) is overspecialized and consequently overpriced, but I mention it in connection with two other books that bear on ecumenism. Aelred Graham's Conversations Christian and Buddhist (Longman-Canada, $2.95) and Gary Snyder's Regarding Wave (New Directions, $2.10).

The monasticism book is the story of the 1968 Bangkok conference of Christian monks (many of them Asian) which attempted to find a grammar for dialogue between Christianity and the great religions of the East. It was the conference at which Thomas Merton died and the text of his informal talk, on monasticism and Marxism is reprinted here.

Aelred Graham is an American Benedictine monk, a concerned and humorous iconoclast and a former prior, who made a trip to Japan for thirteen discussions "with representatives of the Buddhist faith and with two Western students of Buddhism — an English psychiatrist and Gary Snyder". It's the talk with Snyder that interests me most, as it sheds light on this remarkable poet who was saying quietly and fully twenty years ago all the important things about wilderness, satori, ecology that are so popular today.

He tells Graham, "I was never able to accept Christianity as child because the two or three times I went to Sunday school I raised the question about the future of animals and was told that animals didn't have souls. My spiritual career has been half in the realm of peyote and shamanism... and the other half concerned with the study of Sanskrit and Chinese and the traditional philosophies of the Orient."

Snyder's new book of poems, Regarding Wave has these concerns, in brief; it is full of songs for his wife and child, poems West and East and of from and for the earth, litanies, haikus and spells for life implicitly and explicitly against wanton destruction, both spoken with reserve and no fuss. The book is at one with itself, some of pretty well all Snyder's, concerns appearing in each of the five sections. Most notably, "What You Should Know to Be a Poet" involves the beginner in the entire world of plant, animal and mineral, all that man creates and loves or fears, all that he is, within and without.

BOOKS

A press release from The House of Anansi says that with a lot of help from its friends, the press has been able to avoid that bankruptcy it thought was inevitable following the extensive water damage its partially insured stock suffered during a disastrous fire above its basement stockroom March 3.

The publishing firm's statement says that no accurate assessment has yet been made of the gap between the value of the stock lost and the insurance coverage.

Fewer books were damaged than had been suspected earlier; many of the undamaged titles are going at half-price at S.C.M. during the annual week-long sale there, which finishes tomorrow. Catch this sale, the bargains on thousands of excellent books are often tremendous.

A note on the books chosen for review this past year: I chose them, for the most part. It happens I'm not in phase with much Canadian literature, though other reviewers were and corrected my biases there. Figuring no one can write outside his own skin, I thought it best to give as full a picture as possible of a few writers or topics rather than struggle to be eclectic — that small confession in explanation of reviews of more than one book by Olson, or about Oehlberg, Merton, Rexroth, cooking, gardening.

Thanks to all the publishers for sending us books to write about; thanks to all the reviewers who got their copy in (and no thanks to those who didn't); I hope you enjoyed reading about what we read, listened to or went to see. I take it you did, most of the time; we heard few complaints.

ART

The Art Committee of Hart House is presenting the continuum series by Jim Tiley in the Hart House Gallery until April 12. His works are large plastic designs, of acrylic on plywood, which are reminiscent of the amoeboid shapes of the Zurich dadaist Art.

In conjunction with their Pica-bia exhibit, the Art Gallery of Ontario is showing a series of Wednesday films by avant guard directors. March 31 promises to be an exciting showing, as the master of the surreal, Salvatore Dali, dominates the evening with four films. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. On April 1, there will be an evening showing at the gallery by the Ryerson Photoarts Centre.

A news release from the Art Gallery of Ontario states that Bards Conolly, from Massachusetts, has been appointed public relations and information officer for the gallery, and will assume his new position immediately. William Withrow, director of the gallery, is delighted with the appointment, as Mr. Conolly's record as war correspondent, international advertiser and public relations counsellor promises to give the gallery an added boost, at a time when both its physical dimensions and public appeal are growing.

Mario Bernardi, Toronto-born conductor of the National Arts Centre orchestra

In the Trinity College Buttery, a showing of posters and poetry, in an attempt to relate various art media. The poems, some about alienation, most about love, far outweigh the design, although the print is sometimes so obscured by the picture that the words cannot be read.

MUSIC

Well, boys and girls, the clock on the clubhouse wall says we have to go. If you still read this column after the times I've misled you, thank you. Beyond the usual Watsup this week I will list some other worthwhile events in the not-so-immediate future, like maybe after exams.

CBC concerts are always free and usually good. Among the many tapings within the next two months I've marked the Orford String Quartet, April 26 and Lorand Fenyves, violin and Anton Kuerti, piano in a concert of Brahms' complete works for those instruments on May 10th. Tickets for these (and many others, lots of singers) are yours at 925-3311, ext 4835.

The Guelph Spring Festival

fills the first two weeks of May with recitals, opera, theater and art exhibitions. Information from the Festival Administration Offices at (519) 821-3210 or (519) 824-4120, ext 3958.

The TS series continues into May, and also the Faculty of Music Concert Series. Phone them for information.

Of special note in the immediate future are three events: On March 29 (Monday) Mario Bernardi the National Arts Centre Orchestra debut at Massey Hall, April 5, Monday at Eaton's Auditorium, the Geza de Kresz Memorial Concert presents two outstanding Hungarian artists, Lorend Fenyves, violin and Janos Starker, cello. Tickets and info at P.O. Box 96, Adelaide St. S., Toronto.

Finally, Wednesday April 7th, the Canadian Premiere of The Passion According to St. Luke by Krzysztof Penderecki. This major work by today's leading Polish composer will be performed by the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir and the Toronto Symphony in Massey Hall. Tickets at the box office.

One notable P.S. A workshop production of Donizetti's Lucia de Lammermoor, which should be of interest to opera fans and Scott fans, at the Central Tech Theater, March 31 to April 2. Ticket info at the box office, 925-1111. Goodbye — hope you pass.

THEATRE

Well, this is the last Watsup of the year, so after today you'll all have to forage by yourselves. The weekend papers usually have good outlines of the professional theatre, and since campus theatre soon will come to an end, that will be reasonably complete. Do keep your eyes open, though, come July, summer theatre will sprout up all over the city and surrounding countryside, including — (notably) the Stratford festival, The Shaw Festival at Niagara on the Lake, and the Red Barn Theatre at Jackson's Point. Stratford this year is presenting Macbeth and Much Ado about Nothing, plus Labiche's Italian Straw Hat, a farce, Feydeau's There's One in Every Marriage, Webster's Duchess of Malfi, and Jonson's Volpone. In addition, there is a new, third stage opening in a pavilion in the park, with a schedule of mime and marionettes, and The Red Convertible, a new Latin American play. I haven't received the schedule for the Shaw festival yet, but I understand that they are producing two Shavian plays, and a clutch of one act plays during their two month season. If you want tickets for some performances at either of these, you would be best to order them now.

Meanwhile, this week on campus includes two good productions. Brecht's Edward II at the UC Playhouse, 8:30, free, a dance-drama production at Hart House. It has just been brought to my attention, rather belatedly, that the Division of University Extension is running a New Theatre Laboratory July 12 - August 13, which should be very interesting. Inquire at 928-2400. Good bets off campus in the near future include the Royal Shakespearian Company's presentation of A Midsummer Night's Dream at the O'Keefe opening April 13, acclaimed as one of the best productions of Shakespeare of all time. Peace be with you, and have a good summer.

FILM

Tonight at 7:30 the Film Sub-committee of the Hart House Library Committee will show Captain Video, episodes 9-15.

Also tonight the U.C. Lit presents Janis and Jimi in Monterey Pop and W. C. Fields in The Man on the Flying Trapeze. The movies take place in the Medical Sciences Auditorium at 8:00.

On Monday, March 29, the U of T (Innis) Film Society will screen the final feature in its Triple Antonioni sub-series, Il Deserto Rosso (Red Desert) is to be presented at 8:00 in UC 104.

Pandora's Movie Box, 191 Lip-pincott at Ulster, is screening Jack and the Beanstalk (1952) and Astaire and Rogers in Shall We Dance (U.S.A., 1937) next Wednesday, March 31. Show times are 7:00 and 9:15.

Also on the 31st the Film Sub-committee at Hart House will present the subtitled version of Black Orpheus. The free feature begins at 7:30 in the East Common Room of Hart House. Ladies welcome.

At the Silent Cinema: March 26-28, Valentino in Son of the Sheik (1926) and Charlie Chase in Midsummer Mush (1933). Show times are 7:00 and 9:30 with Saturday and Sunday matinees at 2:00 and 4:30.

Next week at Cinema Lumiere: March 26-30, Pontecorvo's The Battle of Algiers. Screenings on weeknights at 7:00 and 9:30 and on Sunday at 4:30 and 7:30.

Have a pleasant vacation and think cinematically.

Erindale prof axed for failure to fulfil research requirements . . .

By ALEX PODNICK

Erindale Botany professor J. R. Harle, described by his students as a "fantastic lecturer", has been fired effective this spring because he has not met research requirements.

N. P. Badenhuizen, chairman of the Botany Department, confirmed the reason for Harle's dismissal. "It may be that he is a good teacher, but there's the other part," said Badenhuizen, referring to his insistence that a professor must also do research.

"The task of a professor in a university is to teach and to do research," he said. "Teaching can become bad without research" just as research without teaching is unacceptable, he maintained.

Mel Chrysler, a student of Harle's for the last two years, described him as "one of the best lecturers in the college". "His lectures are always well prepared, well researched, concise, easy to follow, and well delivered," he said.

Chrysler and his fellow students say Harle's teaching assets alone should be sufficient to warrant his continued employment. Over 80 students signed the petition to rehire Harle last Wednesday, the first day on which it was circulated.

Badenhuizen told The Varsity Harle hasn't produced any research in the last few years. "The university has been trying to convince him" to do research for some time. Consequently, the tenure committee decided not to grant Harle tenure and to recommend his dismissal.

Badenhuizen doubted whether the student petition would convince the department to reverse its position. "These are not decisions that are taken lightly," he said, when speaking of the dismissal decision.

Some students suggested that the chaos caused by the recent transfer of Erindale's professors from their preliminary (temporary) to main building may have inhibited research. Badenhuizen discounted this, commenting that "anybody who really wants to do research can do so."

Harle confirmed his dismissal, but refused further comment.

Skule courses loosen up

Engineers will be facing complete half-term courses next year and no reading week.

The change in the curriculum was finalized Friday at a meeting of the Senate, U of T's top academic body.

Except for first year students, engineers will be evaluated and graded at the end of each semester, where exams will be held in regular examination sessions.

The change also opens the door to more individual choice in the traditionally rigid Applied Science course structure. Elective choices in technical subjects will be available to first year students after January, and will be increased substantially in following terms.

Right now, electrical engineers, for instance, have no technical options in their first three years, but eight in fourth.

The changes keep the compulsory non-technical elective in each term of first and second years.

Non-technical electives are described as those having as their central theme "the study of man as an individual or social being," and must be chosen from a prescribed list of acceptable subjects.

In the upper years, however, the student must take one elective each term, chosen from any non-engineering credit course offered at U of T.

This could allow engineers to tackle nursing or a dietician's course, as well as the traditional German or economics electives.

In addition to the cancellation of a second term reading week, the new proposals bring engineers back to school immediately after Labour Day, rather than allowing the two-week period of grace as at present.

First year students must take a 48 unit load each term, although after next year those in higher years may vary between 40 and 60 units per term. Each course is worth a certain number of units.

An interview with Dalt White

'We're just emerging in national sports'

Recently, to no one's surprise, the U of T Board of Governors confirmed the appointment - effective July 1st, 1971 - of A. Dalton White as Director of Men's Athletics and Director of the Department of Athletics and Recreation.

Dalt - a man who brings to the job a long association with athletics both at Varsity and also in the provincial secondary school system - has been Acting Director in both posts during the current academic year while Warren Stevens has been on retirement leave.

VARSIITY: What do you feel should be the proper role of athletics within a university structure?

WHITE: There is a great argument for a university to, say, run just an intramural program. However, I feel a university should also provide an opportunity for the outstanding athlete to achieve a top level of development.

That's where our intercollegiate sports program comes in.

VARSIITY: How do you see the present state of intercollegiate athletics in Canada? What changes do you foresee - or would like to see - in the next decade or so?

WHITE: Assessing the present state, I would have to say that we're a little confused right at the moment.

Canada is probably just emerging as far as intercollegiate athletics is concerned - certainly by comparison to the U.S., which has reached a very high level of organization that we have not as yet attained. We are having a lot of growing pains, especially as far as organizing our national championships.

As for changes, the biggest single change I see emerging is more and more of the co-educational type of competition, such as college gymnastics, which this year held a combined national men's and women's championship.

Swimming is another college sport that is likely to grow along these lines.

VARSIITY: What is the present state of the plans for the new men's athletic building? How long do you feel we can continue to operate with Hart House as our only men's facility?

WHITE: The situation at the moment is, simply, that the university has no money. Therefore, any step that is taken now will depend on the availability of private funds.

As for Hart House, it is, of course, a very old building but I wouldn't like to think of abandoning it completely. What we're considering at the present is a new building of the field house type of structure that would supplement the Hart House facilities.

The Varsity — David Lloyd

Dalt White

VARSIITY: Were you satisfied with the attendance at the football and hockey games this past year?

WHITE: No. I was very dissatisfied with the attendance - especially at the football games. We're taking some steps at the present time that I hope will be productive.

We may perhaps have to take a new look at the whole business of student books and consider the possibility of selling the tickets on a straight, per-game basis. Then again, the answer may be a more energetic promotion of the books themselves.

VARSIITY: How do you rate the intramural program here at Varsity?

WHITE: Thanks to Mr. McCutcheon and various other people who have worked very, very hard on it, I think our intramural program is probably the best in North America. I feel this is a very important thing and wouldn't like to see any de-emphasis in it. I've felt this way ever since I participated in the program myself as a student.

VARSIITY: Do you see any chance of lacrosse becoming an intercollegiate sport?

WHITE: Well, just for personal reasons I'd like to see the game become an intercollegiate activity. Since I've come here, I've seen a big improvement in the caliber of play, perhaps because the high schools have begun to emphasize it more.

It would be a relatively inexpensive sport but once again we are limited by the amount of time available on our practice fields.

VARSIITY: Is it a set Athletic Association policy not to hire coaching personnel for the major sports as full time coaches but rather as PhysEd school staff members?

WHITE: I think basically what we've done is try to hire people who would fit in to the teaching program and if they could also coach, then fine. I don't know if there is any room for a high-class professional coach here.

For instance, when we hired Tom Watt he didn't really have any reputation as a hockey coach, we hired him for his all-around ability. Now, he's proven to be perhaps one of the most successful coaches around and, in our opinion, has done a terrific job.

I don't think we are going to go outside to the professional ranks to hire a coach for any sport; we just don't think that way.

VARSIITY: Do you think we are understaffed as far as the number of coaches we have to carry the work load?

WHITE: Yes. Compared to perhaps Waterloo, McMaster and Guelph we are. Maybe it is just a personal opinion, but I feel that a lot of the others have a definite job and that all there is. If you're a basketball coach, that's your major function.

Here, we have people doing two or three things.

Varsity swimmers prep for Pan-Am trials

By PAUL CARSON

Although intercollegiate competition ended exactly one month ago, for some Varsity swimmers the season is just beginning.

Between three and six members of Blues national championship team will be competing in the Pan American Games trials scheduled for Edmonton in early April.

Smilin' Alex Fedko, rookie Nick Rottman and veteran Bob Heatley are definite entries, while John Twohig is undecided, Ross Ballantyne is nursing an injured knee and Jim Adams might go as the swimming equivalent of a secret agent for a dastardly foreign power.

Adams, a second year U.C. artist, is a citizen of Brazil and would have to compete for that country at the Pan Am Games set for Colombia in mid-July. However, there seems to be no rule barring him from the Canadian trials and the experience certainly can't do him any harm.

Of the three Varsity "Canadians", Fedko appears to have the best chance of grabbing one of the coveted eighteen Pan Am positions up for grabs during the trials.

Normally, only the first and second place finishers in each event are chosen for the national team, but the third-place finisher in the 100 yard freestyle is often selected to add depth to the relays. Fedko will be swimming the 100 fly and the 100 free and should be good enough for a third place in the freestyle . . . and that will be his ticket to Colombia.

Rottman would have to produce a major miracle to finish in the top two in either breaststroke event, but just making the finals will gain him a prestigious national ranking - not bad for someone who was an unknown high school swimmer at this time last year.

During his sensational freshman year, Rottman placed second in the CIAU 200 breaststroke and won the McCatty Trophy for the same distance at the intramural meet.

Heatley, in first year law, has run out of college eligibility, but finished a strong seventh in the 100 butterfly at last year's summer nationals.

He'll be facing stronger rivals than at the CIAU's but the difference between second and sixth is often only a few tenths of a second.

"In national meets of the Pan Am caliber, psychology is usually a greater factor than physical ability," says Varsity coach Robin Campbell.

"With so little difference between the top six entries in any event, it's often a matter of who really wants to win. The swimmer who most wants to win usually wins; the others die in the final 25 yards."

Federal government grants pay the air fare for all competitors, including the top-ranking Canadians studying (but mostly swimming) at American colleges.

Heatley's chances in the butterfly won't be helped by the presence of Byron Macdonald, born in Canada but raised in Chicago and enrolled at Michigan. Armed with his valid Canadian passport, Macdonald flies north two or three times annually, breezes to the 100 butterfly title and then goes back to his home in the States. Tougher residency rules and a broken leg are the only things between him and a spot on the Canadian team, and neither seems possible this year.

Talented freestyler Merrily Stratten will be challenging for a spot on the 18-member women's team, and her best opportunity seems to be in the 100 free.

She was a member of the World Student Games team and finished sixth in last year's summer nationals. Although Canada boasts several excellent female freestylers, Merrily should be able to gain at least the relay spot on the team.

Vic takes Jennings Cup in straight games

Victoria College survived a late Sr. Engineering rally Monday afternoon to take a final 4-3 victory giving them the 1971 Jennings Cup final series in two straight games.

Vic won the first game decisively Friday night by a 8-4 count.

The Jennings Cup — emblematic of interfac shinny supremacy — has been up for annual competition since 1898 when William T. Jennings, a city engineer, donated the trophy.

The Vic team — which sidelined first division champs, PHE A, in the semi-finals — picked up where they left off Friday as they scored twice in the opening stanza. John Icceton poked home a loose puck at the 7:00 mark then captain Dave Sharpe banged in his own rebound at 7:32.

Vic stretched the lead to 3-0 early in the second frame when Wayne Howard scored with his team short handed. However, just two minutes later, John Dolan started the Engineers on the way to their rally with a score.

Bill Cleland closed the gap to 3-2 before the period ended with his first of two goals as he connected with a golf swing past netminder Greg Lyons.

Sharpe, Vic's smooth centre who was the individual standout of the series, restored Vic's two-goal margin at the 12:45 mark of the third.

Cleland again put the plumbers back in the running with less than a minute remaining to play when his shot from the point beat a sliding Lyons. Vic, however, successfully killed the remaining seconds with Lyons having to be sharp on another screened shot from the point.

"We made it a bit hard on ourselves with all those penalties (10 of 14 minors)," said Payne later. "We didn't fore-check as well as we did Friday night; we let them get started coming out of their own end.

"Lyons has been great all year," he praised. "I can't say enough about him."

Notes: Dave Sharpe (2), Stevie Mills, Steve Johnston, Phil Adams, Wayne Howard, Bob Sharpe and Jerry Kalata scored for Vic in Friday night's game. Bill Cleland, Jim Hawes, Brian Larkin and Dave Voino replied for the plumbers . . . Vic took eight of the 14 minors called by refs Gordie Bullock and Andy Hemphill . . . The final hockey game of the season goes at Varsity Arena tonight as the "Flying Fathers" battle the "NHL Old Boys" in a charity game.

John E. McCutcheon

McCutcheon retirement leaves void at Varsity

A large part of Varsity sports life will be missing from the campus next year as a result of the retirement at the end of this academic term of the Director of Intramurals Athletics, John E. McCutcheon.

Better known as simply "Mac" to everyone who has had the pleasure of crossing his path, Mr. McCutcheon rivals Soldier's Tower as the most instantly recognizable landmark in the Varsity environs.

Arriving on the Varsity sports scene in 1925 — just as Calvin Coolidge was settling into his second full year as U.S. President — to coach the basketball team, he then moved on to organize the biggest and best intramural athletic program on the continent.

In 1962, Jim Proudfoot, now Toronto Star sports editor, wrote:

"Very few negotiate the U of T's hallowed halls without coming under the influence of this ruddy-faced, round little man. The university spreads from St. Michael's on Bay St., to the School of Political Economy on Bloor and down to the College St. engineering complex. Mac's sports program is an adhesive that sticks the thing together."

Thanks, Mr. Mac!

Second game today at noon

PHE draws first blood in Sifton Cup show

By THE DUKE

Randy "Milo" Filinski — winner of the Webb Trophy — propelled PHE to a rousing 67-65 overtime victory over the UC Bombers late yesterday afternoon at Hart House in the first game of the 1971 interfac basketball finals.

PhysEd could take the Sifton Cup with a victory in the second game beginning this afternoon at noon.

Towards the end of the game, it didn't look as if Milo could finish without the immediate implementation of a body transplant. However, a quick massage by coach Cheeseman provided the necessary rejuvenations as Milo went on to score 25 points.

Still, this was not the entire story for PHE. Eric "Hen" Quackenbush was a monster on the boards, repeatedly flailing the smaller, less muscular UC forwards. In addition, Hen's theatrics (ie. his over-the-head-behind-the-back stuff shot) brought the crowd to its feet.

It must be mentioned that Hen scored the final two baskets in overtime for PHE.

Also, stalwart performances by Paul "Boots" McKay and John "Tads" Chapman on the score sheet and by Ken "Nine Lives" Harris on the boards were important factors in PHE's victory.

UC, led by the omnipresent Jumping Jack Pascht, trailed by as much as nine points at one point in the game, but managed to close the deficit repeatedly. In addition, Ron "The Platypus" Sternberg's early heroics helped jump UC into an early lead.

However, he, along with the rest of the team went stale — with the singular exception of Jumping Jack.

At this point, The Duke would like to go editorial. It must be recommended that the referees for the interfac basketball league playoffs should NOT be "in-house" officials.

The constant intimidation of the refereeing crew was evident throughout — especially that by the aforementioned Pascht.

For today's game, The Duke's pick is: UC OVER PHE BY 5

Having picked the first game right (PHE over UC by 2), The Duke will attempt to make it two-in-a-row. UC will bounce back to take this one.

The Varsity — Francois Reber

UC wins this battle for a rebound but PHE controlled the boards on the way to a 67-65 win.

The Varsity — Lyndon Little

PHE's Randy Filinski: Webb Trophy winner as interfac basketball MVP.

The Duke fingers Filinski for interfac Webb award

PhysEd's Randy "Milo" Filinski was named the 1971 recipient of the Dr. D. W. Webb Trophy as the most valuable player in Interfac Basketball.

The Webb — named for Varsity's first real upper gymnasium star and innovator of the spare tire — was presented to Milo following yesterday's PHE-UC game.

Milo said: "I feel honoured to win this award and would like to give chunks of it to Scads, Tads, Boots, Hen, Nine Lives, and all the rest of the guys. This trophy belongs to the team."

In addition to the many points he has collected this season, Milo has collected numerous accolades.

also. The comments about Milo by his fellow competitors tells the story best.

Steve "The Haberdasher" Singer, UC: "They used to call me Mr. Defence. After Milo scored 35 points on me in a game this season, I decided to close up shop."

Mark "Perimeter" Cosman, New: "I can animal the boards, but Milo is a beast above me."

Bob "The Rack" Hirsch, Inns: "Milo scored 49 points against us — need I say more."

Brian "The Caterpillar" Shaw, Erindale: "I've got four inches on Milo, yet, when the ball's on the rim, Milo's there first."
