ENGAGEMENT!

Marvel as Claude Bissell performs astounding feats of repression, cooption and rhetoric in the grand old tradition!

Boo as the nasty radicals try to CONTEST and DISRUPT CB's home stomping ground!

Thrill to the suspense and excitement as the Good of the University triumphs!

All this and more is coming to your neighborhood this fall with the annual opening of The Claude Bissell Movie. Now in its 13th and final year, this film picks you up and never lets you go. The producers regret that today's performance, the annual president's opening address has been cancelled for the second year in a row.

THE CLAUDE BISSELL MOVIE

In speaking of the bourgeoisie I include also their representatives in the fields of education, culture, media, political life, labour and military and vote bureaucracies, who ally with and defend the interests and policies of resident and non-resident bourgeoisie.

Marx describes the function of these people: "as the active conceptualizing ideologists of the ruling class." A few of the leading spokesmen for the bourgeoisie in the nation include President Bissell of the University of Toronto, Dr. Solandt, Chancellor of the University of Toronto.

HELP-FULL INFORMATION!

Where is the Textbook Store?

The Textbook Store is on Huron Street just below Willcocks Street. To help first year students and others unfamiliar with the campus at the beginning of the fall term we hang a 56 ft. pink Textbook Store banner on the outside of the building which looks a bit like an old warehouse.

What is the University Bookroom?

It's the other Bookstore on the front campus directly across from the main library on the other side of the circle. It has picnic-tables on the front steps where you can eat your lunch or just sit and rap. It's one of the University's great meeting places, where you can buy stationery and supplies and all your other reading material. 25,000 titles in stock.

How to find books

At the Textbook Store, books are arranged in alphabetical order by author or editor. Books on English, Psychology and Modern Language courses are on the ground floor.

Books on other courses are on the second floor.

We have a good selection of used books in all subjects and you will find them identified by a red sticker on the shelves right next to new books on the same subject.

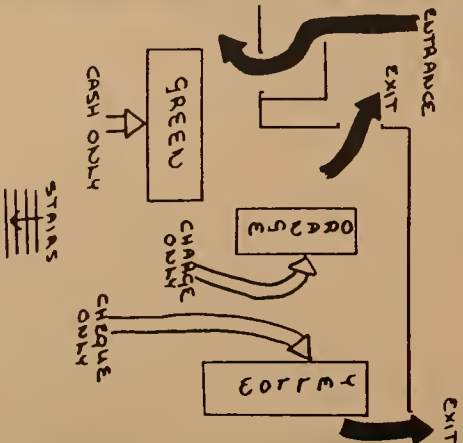

How to open a charge account

Every registered student may open a charge account. The place to open one is the second floor of the Textbook Store. You just fill out an application and show your Admit to Lecture card, and a plastic charge plate will be issued on the spot. This service is chiefly provided to help students who receive cheques or student loan payments only once or twice a year so that they may obtain necessary books and materials when money is not immediately available. There is no charge for opening an account and there is no interest charged. For this reason our discounts apply to cash sales only. There are only two strings attached. There is a $100 credit limit at any one time and although we urge you to pay up your account when your money comes in we insist that you pay your account in full by the end of the spring term each year.

How to get out of the Textbook Store quickly when it's busy

After you have found your books it should only take 5 MINUTES to get through the check-outs if you do two things: 1. separate hardcovers and paperbacks before you reach the check-out. 2. follow this instruction:

If you are paying CASH go through the GREEN check-outs.
 If you are paying by CHEQUE go through the YELLOW check-outs.
 If you are using your CHARGE ACCOUNT go through the ORANGE check-outs.

If you have any problems of any kind or require more information please call Carol Thomeycroft at 928-4016. We're here to help you so let us know if you have any problems.

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO BOOKSTORES Hours

Monday to Friday 8:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m.
 Saturday 11:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m.
 Starting September 21, 1970
 To October 3, 1970
 Closed Friday night at 5:00 p.m.

How to write a cheque

We accept personal cheques for any amount purchased. But you need to show your Admit to Lecture card or other identification to the cashier. Your written cheque should look something like this:

If you have forgotten your own cheques we can supply you with a counter cheque.

How to get your discount

There is a 5% discount on hard cover textbooks on course when you pay by cash or cheque. You can make the Textbook Store experience more pleasant and save everybody's time (including yours) by separating hard cover textbooks and paperbacks before approaching the cash register and presenting the hard cover textbooks to the cashier first. If you are buying a lot of books at one time, use two shopping bags to separate hard covers from paperbacks.

If you make a mistake, and buy the wrong book or change courses, we will be glad to refund your money in full for ten days after October 12, 1970 BUT you must present your cash register receipt. So it's a good idea to file it away in a safe place. ALSO, any books you may return must not be marked in any way so PLEASE don't write your name in a book until you are absolutely sure you will be needing it.

Abbie cancels out of Festival

Yippie leader sparks SAC guerilla theatre

Abbie Hoffman won't be here on Friday.

The U.S. Yippie leader, one of the Chicago Seven sentenced to five years in jail for conspiracy to incite a riot, cancelled out of his U of T engagement Friday afternoon. Instead, he will fly to Los Angeles for another speech.

Invited by the Students' Administrative Council, Hoffman was to have spoken this Friday during the course of a full day Festival sponsored by the SAC. His fee for appearing was to be $1,000.

The Festival, commonly known as Day One of the New University of Toronto, will go ahead as planned, with guerilla theatre, films, discussions, workshops, booths set up by campus clubs, and rock bands.

Although several names have been discussed, no speaker has been picked to replace Hoffman.

News of Hoffman's cancellation caused relief in several quarters of the university.

Simcoe Hall officials were thrown into a flurry Thursday morning when they learned from a front-page Globe and Mail story that Hoffman would be appearing on front campus. Festival organizers had discussed plans for the Sept. 25 events with administration officials, and mentioned Hoffman's impending visit Tuesday.

"When we told university vice-president Robin Ross last week, his chin dropped about a foot," recalls Kaufman.

Administrators attempted to convince the Festival organizers to move Hoffman's speech off the front campus and into a building such as the College of Education auditorium.

They feared the visit would attract unprecedented thousands on campus and possibly result in damage to university grounds and buildings.

Thursday morning, says SAC Education Consultant Craig Heron, one of the Festival organizers, "they were really thinking of quashing it."

Organizers feared Simcoe Hall would refuse to co-operate in setting up the stage and sound facilities on front campus in front of University College.

A showdown meeting Friday morning at Simcoe Hall resulted in a tentative agreement to switch Hoffman's speech to Varsity Stadium.

"They were worried people would start occupying buildings," said Michael Kaufman, another Festival organizer, "In Varsity Stadium, crowds can be physically contained."

SAC would also have to recruit marshals to maintain order in the crowd.

The following day, Saturday, the SAC executive met to reconsider the wisdom of inviting Hoffman. The news that Hoffman had himself already cancelled out was kept secret by Festival organizers.

"You could call that some guerilla theatre," commented Kaufman.

"I am afraid of what might happen," said SAC President Rod Hurd, "And I'm afraid of what it might cost."

"We've got the real makings of an incident," said Hurd, "Incidents are easy to manufacture in a large crowd."

With the "selective cover-

The Yippie eloquence that might have echoed off Convocation Hall will go to Los Angeles instead.

age" the Festival has been getting in the press, Hurd added, "what we're going to be sponsoring is a rock festival with Abbie Hoffman as keynote speaker.

"Costs have been spiralling," he said, adding that property insurance would be almost impossible to obtain for the event, and that security and marshalling costs would also be high.

Finance Commissioner Peter Boswell maintained that since "one of SAC's principles is free speech", Hoffman should be kept.

"Admit it," he said, "You want to cancel him not for ideological or philosophical reasons, but just because pressure has been put on us."

Because of Hoffman's performance on campuses in Calgary and Edmonton a week ago, suggested Heron, it might not be worth bringing him back to Canada again.

"He knows nothing about Canada and our problems," said Heron, "We've never been exposed to race riots, never had to make decisions about the draft — we can't relate to that at all. But that's what he's going to talk about."

In Alberta last weekend Hoffman told Canadian students that the Canadian role in the New American Revolution would be as a secondary supply base.

"Even though we can identify with his role in the international youth struggle, he doesn't have any knowledge or analysis of Canada," said Kaufman, "—if he has any analysis at all."

"We're really kidding ourselves about any kind of communication we think will go on with Hoffman there," said SAC Vice-President Eric Miglin, "Hoffman was put there for entertainment, as our central attraction."

Over a single dissenting vote, the SAC Executive decided to cancel Hoffman's visit.

"For a myriad of reasons," said Hurd.

It was then that Kaufman revealed Hoffman had cancelled out anyway.

No speaker will be chosen to replace Hoffman as the focus of the events of the day.

Classes begin as scheduled

Computer confused, timetables uncertain

With timetables still uncertain after a massive computer foul-up, Arts and Science students are filling into their classes this morning.

Registration for the thousands of first, second and third year students enrolled in the New Programme has been a hectic week of line-ups, frustration and red tape.

Those who pre-registered last spring to avoid complications, were handed printed timetables containing blank spaces, conflicts and extra courses.

Science students found that most zoology courses had been arbitrarily eradicated. Course changes mailed in over the summer in accordance with pre-registration instructions were added to the student's timetable, while none were deleted, leaving some officially enrolled in up to 12 courses.

For the past week, fifty students hired at $3.00 an hour have been working in Sidney Smith Hall's Central Office, amending the botched timetables by hand. Dean A. D. Allen and his associates are barricaded in their office on the second floor of the big arts building, virtually unreachable, not even emerging for lunch.

Communication between Faculty, departments and colleges have broken down completely. In courses requiring enrollment at both the Faculty and departmental levels, some students are receiving different times for the same course.

Rumours that this week's classes had been cancelled spread throughout the offices of the bureaucracy. Faculty people blamed the colleges for starting them, while the colleges blamed Simcoe Hall.

The computer mix-up results from the introduction last year of the New Programme, which was designed to create individually tailored course combinations. This demanded a computerized, centralized set-up to avoid conflicts between the 4000 sections of the 1400 first, second and third year classes.

At the beginning of the summer, programmer Jim Gillen, with only one assistant — a third year computer science student — and one key punch operator, set out on an ambitious project to create a complex system that would sort out and section classes.

The new Toronto Academic Scheduling System (TASS) was supposed to replace a programming system that had taken eight years to develop. From the beginning, TASS ran into difficulties. Computer time had to be relinquished to other U of T users, resulting in delays of up to 12 hours. Mechanical difficulties caused inexplicable delays in the computer's output.

Programming difficulties also stemmed from the history of the university itself. For instance, the U of T Act requires that all non-arts faculty who take arts subjects, must take them at University College.

In early September, after two unsuccessful printouts, the computer presented the college registrars with timetables. Reaction to the forms, which contained numerous errors and blanks was mixed.

The University College registrar's office put up a sign that read "Welcome to Fantasyland 70" and admitted to incoming students that they were totally in the dark. Gillen, however, estimated the number of hand-corrected timetables at only about 20 per cent of the total.

Only last Monday, as the pressure grew intense, Gillen was given top priority on the computer. On Wednesday night, the entire first year programme was reissued in a slightly improved version.

The bad feelings between Faculty and college over the computer mess reflect a basic change in the whole college system at U of T. For the first time transfers this year will not have to be submitted to the colleges, but will be handled directly through the Faculty Central Office.

College administrators see this erosion of their power as the end of any attempt to personalize the multiversity. To Faculty administrators it is the only possible way to co-ordinate a complex academic system.

Opinionated book review:

There's nothing human in this $7,800 book...

To speak plainly, you are here simply to "assimilate" (their word, not ours) knowledge.

What the editors have done in this book — partly intentionally and partly unwittingly — is to focus on the information which the institution, the university, has defined as being important.

Which only makes it easier for the institution to function more smoothly. You are left with the overwhelming impression that U of T is a place where dreary students ho-hum burrcaeratically about civilization and the temple of knowledge.

Fortunately, the real world is much different.

U of T is an exciting, human, exploding place. Real people, like yourself, with very real problems, populate it.

There are a lot of things very wrong with it, and if we don't succumb to the complacency we can act to change this institution.

Very very soon you will experience perhaps for the 9,000th time a desperate and sinking feeling of routine and boredom as you sit in a lecture-hall and wonder why you ever thought this would be entirely different from high school.

The only help the book offers is from the faculty viewpoint: "The student-faculty relationship assumes the faculty members know more than the students."

There is no discussion at all of what education is all about and of the new directions which this staid and traditional university has been forced to venture into in the last several years.

Beyond noting that the university transmits "knowledge", there is absolutely no discussion of the most important question of all — what kind of knowledge.

If the goal of the university is to produce dull-minded and clomplacent citizens who will perform well in a particular job function, then its courses are entirely adequate. Yet if the university is to try to show Canadians how some of our outstanding social problems can be resolved, the content of its work will need to be radically altered.

Concretely this means organizing within each department of the university to challenge, first the traditional structures and relationships between students and students, students and faculty, and secondly, challenging the content of what we actually do as work in the university.

As a "responsible" student, the editors assume, you should not be interested in these things. Other things you shouldn't be interested in are, for instance: • the possibility, if you are a woman, that you will be sitting in a lecture-hall some morning wondering if you are pregnant because you did not know enough about birth control. • the fact that most of us at this university come from families with incomes of more than $8,000 a year. We are here because fellow students have been filtered out of the educational system. They could not afford the luxury of an extended education and have been channelled into society's dull, meaningless and mechanical jobs.

• the increasing Americanization of our country — and the role which the university plays in supporting that process.

• the difficulties you will find in getting a job once you have received your B.A. or M.A. or even Ph.D. The universities are being used as a place to absorb surplus labour which our economy really can't take.

These are only a few of the real problems the handbook doesn't mention. We'll try and fill in some of those holes as the year goes on.

The handbook reflects precisely the alienation and sterility which this institution survives on. That's why it's a fantastic book if you want to get by safely. In fact, it's so good it could have been written by Simcoe Hall. So it's not surprising to discover that Simcoe Hall did put up some of the money for it this summer.

The pervasive superficiality of the book comes across most strongly in the section on "Political Groups." Instead of printing a concise statement of what each group stands for, the editors insist on playing a tasteless in-joke. The effect is to reinforce all the hysterical stereotypes which the daily press and media have planted in our minds.

Anybody who seriously believes that women's liberation means "not having babies because they practice birth control" . . . (to) . . . liberate their men from the responsibilities of a family so that they may better fight for the revolution. . . is just plain unwilling to understand the world around him.

Contrast this style of treatment with the write-ups of the non-political "campus clubs", who are each allowed brief objective statements of their purposes.

They paid $475 when the editors agreed to run several pages on the university bureaucracy. Advertisers paid $3,500.

You, as a student paying fees to the Students' Administrative Council, picked up the rest of the bill: $4,300.

Butterflies oppose Hoffman visit

Sir:

We are writing to comment on the forthcoming visit of Abbie Hoffman to the University.

We do not at all oppose free speech; we feel Abbie Hoffman should be welcome to come and speak on the campus at any time, but we do not wish to invite him although that is suggested by the Student Administrative Council's bringing him here. We are not criticizing SAC, merely demonstrating that there are elements of the student body and the Toronto community who respect the University, who are not represented by SAC's invitation.

Because we are interested in maintaining U of T's efficacy, we feel that Hoffman's advocating irresponsible, destructive or at least disruptive acts is not in the best interests of the community as a whole. While we defend Hoffman's right to speak, we reject the idea that his philosophy should be accommodated by Student Body Representatives: Abbie Hoffman is not worth $1,000. to the University of Toronto.

Abbie Hoffman has demonstrated no familiarity with Canadian issues, yet he is invited (and paid) to speak to and influence Canadian students at a time when U.S. colonization of the mind is a crucial issue in the development of our country. Regardless of his relevance to U.S. society, he is not a student of Canadian culture or Canadian politics. His value in the Canadian educational experience is dubious: His recent "educational" videotape essay on shoplifting is his unique qualification for addressing university audiences. Of his and Jerry Rubin's rhetoric, Peter Goddard has said, "Everything is Pig this Pig that Pig this — if nothing else that's boring. . . ." And its contribution to a young Canadian's intellectual growth is questionable.

He has frequently openly advocated antisocial and criminal acts. In a central, powerful position in a civilization — a world — that only might survive if all people work together, Hoffman would require his followers to be willing to "kill their fathers and mothers." This is not a responsible answer to the population explosion.

Hoffman's motives are suspect. The most consistent criticism of him maintains that he is egotistically power-hungry. This cannot be proved true or false but to chance furthering a demagogue's ascension is foolhardy. By contrast, William Kuntzler, pursuing many common goals with Hoffman, has not been similarly criticized, and makes a more rational appeal. Yet Abbie Hoffman was invited to speak.

Still, Hoffman might provide a good — even important — initial university orientation experience. We feel that blood all too often does flow from a stone. If Hoffman's visit can be interpreted constructively, we would like to help with that interpretation. If good is affected by so unlikely a stimulus, we support that good. We indicate our presence merely to counterpoint Hoffman's appearance, to add perspective, to brighten the landscape.

Write-on: is a page of letters and opinion which is open to readers. Preference will be given to letters which are typed, double-spaced, on a 64-stroke line. The deadline for letters is 2 p.m. the afternoon before publication. All letters must be signed.

We declare our faith in growth as change and in U of T as a positive influence on students and society.

We are willing to work for better education and a better world: Abbie Hoffman is a small enough obstacle.

Soaked and wiped

Anarchy initiates frosh

By LINDA McQUAIG

Bewildered University College freshmen were greeted by water pistols and flying toilet paper at their initiation dinner Tuesday night in the Great Hall of Hart House.

The UC freshmen's dinner was disrupted last year by members of the then New Left Caucus, one of the situations that fomented the "discipline crisis" of September 1969.

This year's performance, which led behind broken glass and soggy tablecloths, was led by Mark Golden, the guest speaker.

Golden was an unsuccessful candidate for the SAC Presidential Election last year, who ran on a ticket of anarchy and free-oranges-for-everybody.

The planned outburst came at the end of an otherwise traditional gathering. University College Principal A. C. H. Hallett welcomed the freshmen in the usual manner urging them to communicate with their professors, since "many of these people are human." Martin Goldberg, the President of the UC Literary and Athletic Society followed, advising everyone that "Libraries are good — use them." Then Golden took over.

"You are not people. You are a thing — an audience. I am not a person. I am a thing — a speaker," he said.

As he spoke, a young man stepped up to play the piano; a clarinet player appeared, with approximately 25 costumed, body-painted, ball-throwing, water-pistol-tolling followers who wandered throughout the audience emptying glasses of water on the tablecloths and the heads of freshmen.

There were various reactions. One freshman retaliated outright by dumping a cup of coffee down the back of a water-pistoller.

Another, who "didn't want to get caught in it," left.

"There's going to be a riot," said one freshman as he hurried out the door.

"What will they do when they find out?" asked another.

"Frankly, it's boring," said a faculty member, walking out the door.

"I was hoping something like this would happen," one boy commented, while to Michael Scherk (UC IV) it was "The best freshman dinner I've been to in four years."

Most of the audience sat motionless and seemed to enjoy it passively, as they were sprayed with water and covered by tablecloths.

Goldberg tried to regain order by telling people to sit down and stop breaking glasses.

"There are other ways to express yourself," he said, directing everyone towards the East Common Room to hear a folk singer and drink coffee.

As for the success of the performance — "It went well," said Golden, "except the atomic bomb didn't go off."

Political games are set for Poli. Ec. students

Political Economy students have an opportunity to experiment with political roles and government games this year in a simulation course which will study the Canadian-American relationship.

The course, Political Science 202, meeting today in Medical Sciences 2172 from 4 until 6, requires that each student first research a particular role, whether labor leader, or cabinet minister, before participating in a classroom-conducted political-economic situations

While Professors Clarkson and Rotstein head the course, they will be aided by graduate students or senior undergraduates in organizing the "sectors" of student actors who must meet to discuss their preliminary research on their common roles.

The roles will be chosen from both American and Canadian models and the games will relate to problems such as Arctic sovereignty, relations with Communist China, and nuclear policy.

Worries over the effects of airplane hijackings on the jittery Middle East situation and concern over a possible strike in the auto industry resulted in lower prices on the New York Stock Exchange this week.

The president of the Association of Stock Exchange firms predicts that 50 more brokerage firms may disappear in the next six months and estimates that the securities industry is losing money faster today than during the depression.

Canadians are not ready yet for the 15 cent candy bar, L.D. Griffiths, president of Laura Secord Candy Shops Ltd. of Toronto told the company's annual meeting, and it may be a few years before it is ready.

A spokesman for Ford Motor Co. of Detroit says Henry Ford II, chairman, plans to explore the possibility of establishing "mutually beneficial" business relations with the Soviet Union.

Multi-national corporations will become the most important marketing and manufacturing forces in the world in the 1970's. Andrew Kershaw, president of Ogilvy and Mather Inc. of New York says:

"Whether you like them or not, the world cannot progress without them."

"We have hitched our star to the fastest growing segment of business and we will, as time goes on, make ourselves more and more indispensable to them," says the advertising executive.

Mark Stein of Montreal, past president of the Canadian Construction Association commenting on the 54th session of the International Labor Organization meeting in Geneva recently:

"It was sobering to observe the degree of dedication of the majority of trade unions to the principles of socialism and the erosion of property rights."

It was disconcerting to observe "the degree to which socialism has been impregnated in the minds of worker delegates of the developing African nations."

However, the vested interest of free trade unions in the capitalist economic system prevented for the time being any radical change in the ILO structure, Mr. Stein said.

Canadian business failures rose by 310 in the first seven months of 1970 to 1,364 from the comparable period last year.

Largest increase in failures occurred in Quebec where 697 firms failed, compared to 544 last year in the same period.

Boo Spiro!

The Vice-President of the United States, Spiro T. Agnew has declined an invitation to address the SAC Festival September 25.

The invitation, extended by Festival Co-ordinator Michael Kaufman, requested Mr. Agnew to comment freely on "Problems of American Society." The Vice-President has gained considerable reputation as an authority on this subject.

Mr. Agnew's refusal was due to his "projected schedule of campaign commitments for the fall."

The cool tragedy of the chiller plant

By GAIL GLICK-

It's been several months since the homes along Spadina and Sussex Avenues were razed to make way for the chiller plant which, according to K.S. Gregory, administrative assistant to Vice President Alex Rankin, had to be built immediately.

The proposed plant was to service air conditioning in university buildings in the area.

Despite protests from the Huron-Sussex Residents Association, ten homes were demolished, including a variety store owned by Jack Dimanstein for fifteen years. This has exacerbated an already serious lack of student housing.

When contacted, Mr. Gregory stated that work had been held up because of preoccupation with the Spadina Expressway. However, the contract has been let, money was granted by the provincial government and the work could begin immediately.

This summer the area was named People's Park and became the site for a night-long concert with the People's Revolutionary Concert Band. People sat on the sidewalk, listened to the music, smoked, and tore down the fences. Shortly the police arrived to clear the area of the noise-makers.

Another casualty of university expansion was Macdonald's, a small store on Harbord which was vacated some months ago and has yet to be demolished. The lot is owned by the Province of Ontario, but ownership is to be transferred to the university. Conveniently located on the construction site of the new library, the store is now being used for storage by the work crew there.

Unknown to the majority of undergraduates, Macdonald's was an integral part of university life for many of the U of T alumni. Its value may only be a question of sentiment, but its destruction is part of a serious decrease in the availability of student services on campus.

Uof T group passes student loan plan

By LAURA KELLY
A U of T study group, headed by Vice-President Robin Ross approved the basic principles of the Educational Opportunity Bank, a student loan program which would replace the present loan-grant plan operating under OSAP.

The Provincial Ministers of Education have also endorsed the plan, and the Ontario Department of University Affairs is studying the EOB.

The EOB plan calls for students to invest in their own future by borrowing all necessary funds from a central bank with the expectation of repayment out of the student's future income.

Upon graduation or after termination of post-secondary education, the borrower applies a specified rate of repayment, which depends on his income, to his gross annual income until either the repayment period has expired or the initial principal is repaid.

The EOB makes no allowance for female graduates who marry and do not enter the labour force. They must repay the loan at least in part, and thus women students are assuming a debt which may soon become a "negative dowry."

Coupled with this change in student aid from partial grants to complete loans is the possibility of tuition rising to represent the real cost of education: from $500 to $2,500 or $3,000.

The EOB idea originated with the Chicago economist Milton Friedman and has since been studied by U of T professors, G.C.A. Cook and David A.A. Stager, who are Associates of the Institute for the Qualitative Analysis of Social and Economic Policy.

Both the rising cost of supporting the universities and the failure of the present student aid program to bring about universal accessibility to post-secondary institutions has sparked the government search for a more efficient and equitable program.

The EOB is under special consideration because it not only places the financial burden of education on the most obvious benefactor, the successful graduate, but it is intended to open the university doors to the lower classes.

The U of T study group, however, felt that the abolishing of grants would hinder rather than help economically disadvantaged students who would naturally hesitate to incur a large debt in order to continue schooling.

The study group reported: "Accordingly, the Committee would strongly recommend that a very large grant component similar to (or preferably greater than) that presently provided by large OSAP awards should be available to needy students in first year."

Innis wants re-examination

By KARL HAVENSTEIN
The Innis College Council unanimously approved a resolution that the Arts and Science Faculty Council be asked to set up a committee to re-examine the action taken by the Council with the CIN 193 marks, last June.

CIN 193, was run as a student-centered course, in which the students decided their own areas of study and their own marks. Last June the Arts and Science Faculty Council rejected the student's marks and the re-evaluated the students, giving them mark based upon an average of their other four courses.

Wednesday's Innis Council meeting pointed out that this action had taken place without adequate representation from the college to "engage in a rational discussion of the course and its methods."

The Innis Council, composed of the principal of the College and members of the faculty and student body rejected the Faculty's action.

In a letter to Arts Dean A. D. wallen, Innis principal Robin Harris said that the action of the Faculty Council could not fail to imply a lack of confidence in the instructors in the course, the College administration, the Academic Affairs Committee of the of the College Council and in the Council itself.

The action of the Council had done much to "set back the future of experimental education at this University," added Harris.

The council has requested that a committee on evaluation be established as soon as possible, preferably at the September meeting of council and that this committee do a detailed re-examination of the action taken by Council in the CIN 193 issue.

How do you pay if you can't get a job?

By BRIAN MORGAN

After what is generally agreed to be "the worst summer yet all across Canada" as far as summer employment goes, government officials themselves are now admitting the necessity of finding some alternative to the present system of financing higher education.

John Nelles, of Canada Manpower, said Friday that he expects that there will have to be some form of guaranteed income or guaranteed work for students during the summer to deal adequately with this problem in the future. At the U. of T., Placement Service Director David Curry said that "we cannot continue to put this many students out in the market at the same time each year and expect any measure of success in the long run."

Presently many students are forced to find substantial summer employment in order to go back to school each fall — just as jobs for them become scarcer than ever. Also, most of these students lack the "connections" that keep the devil's work from the idle hands of those less needy.

The proposed alternative, the Educational Opportunity Bank, would merely saddle these students with a massive debt upon graduation.

Although the problem is extremely complex, the main cause of the acute situation this summer was obviously the tight situation in the general economy caused by the government anti-inflation measures.

In a series of band-aid therapeutic measures, the government tried to alleviate the situation for students by urging businessmen to increase their staff by 5% for the summer whether they needed it or not, and by taking far more students than ever onto the government payroll.

"The worst summer yet across Canada"

One of the most significant parts of the government effort was a vastly expanded militia program. Apparently feeling that military discipline and knowledge of parade-square tactics were more important than participation in socially useful tasks, the government opened up large new projects in the Dept. of National Defence, providing employment for around 10,800 students.

Part of this consisted of an increase of 5,000 in the regular summer militia program — just as regular units are being cut across the country. Much of the rest was for maintenance of military bases, such as the use of 1,000 students for "range clearing" at Camp Gagetown, N.B., an army camp originally created to give our soldiers experience in bush terrain resembling battle conditions.

Several groups across the country arose to oppose this scheme, and to show that not only were there many important community service projects that desperately needed young people, but also that there was an abundance of people willing to do this kind of work on either a full or part time basis.

In Vancouver, one of the most active of these groups, The Action Committee for Unemployed Youth (TACUY), organized young people who built parks, cleaned up litter, built sanitary facilities on beaches, and did other similar work, and then billed the government after each project.

The situation in B.C. was one of the most grim in Canada as unemployment generally reached levels about 12%, and the province was beset by continual strikes, with construction and large parts of the logging and pulp and paper industries, both important sources of summer work, out much of the summer. B.C. also became filled with transient youths who were unable to find employment in other parts of the country and who had simply taken to the road and headed west.

In Ontario, Placement Service and Canada Manpower officials both expressed the feeling that this summer had been quite successful "in light of the general situation". Both dealt with more students than in past years, basically because fewer students could find jobs on their own. At Manpower about 50% of applicants were placed, while at the Placement Centre the figure was closer to 62%. In both cases many "unplaced" students managed to find some employment sometime during the summer, raising the number of applicants who got work to perhaps as high as 84%.

In other parts of Canada conditions were more severe, said Curry:

Past ideals of getting a job suitable to one's courses or interests have virtually disappeared except for students who managed to get research positions or some government work.

In some parts of the country there were reports of students driven by desperation to taking scab labor jobs.

High school students had even a more difficult time than university students, as they had to search in a market already extensively picked over by earlier comers.

Now, as the pressure comes off with the start of the fall term in all kinds of educational institutions, officials are trying desperately to find ways both to lower the demand for summer employment and to increase the number of expressly student jobs, especially in community service areas, urban projects, pollution and conservation.

Speaking on Alberta campuses

Hoffman sets out Canada's role in U.S. struggle

"Fuck Canada," shouted Abbie Hoffman last week to Canadian students in Calgary and Edmonton, Alberta.

"The whole world is at war with the USA. Canada is the only country in the world which has surrendered without a shot."

With $3750 (thirty seven hundred fifty dollars) in his pocket in speaking fees from the students of the University of Calgary and the University of Alberta, Hoffman, one of the 'Chicago Conspiracy 8', confidently laid out Canada's role in the world revolution.

He envisioned Canada as a buffer zone for the draft dodgers and political exiles, a place to rest for a while before heading back to "the belly of the monster".

Canadians, he said, could help by aiding exiles and acting as a secondary supply base.

The loudest applause of his Calgary speech came when a member of the crows protested that "the rebellion in the U.S. is not the same as what we're rebelling against, and Canada is not the States."

Another member of the audience pointed out that Canada's difficulties have a great deal to do with American imperialism.

Hoffman did best when he talked about the Chicago conspiracy trial at which he and six others were convicted on charges of conspiring to cross state lines with intent to incite a riot.

The conspiracy charges evolved out of the 1968 Chicago Democratic Convention which was described in a government report as a 'police riot'.

All seven defendants were found guilty and sentenced to five years in prison, but an appeal will be heard in January and Hoffman is out on bail trying to raise money for the appeal and other trials such as Bobby Seale's in New Haven, Connecticut next month.

The trial, he said "was not based on evidence, but on a metaphysical charge, conspiracy. We couldn't conspire to have lunch."

The average age of the jury, Hoffman noted was 52, and they were all registered voters at the Democratic Convention. "We were tried by people from another planet."

He called for a redefinition of violence and pointed out that the system sanctions and breeds it. "A math-science building sitting on a campus is an act of violence. Lead poisoning of kids in slums is violent."

The essence of revolutionary activity, Hoffman pointed out, is a young bourgeois kid growing up to realize "that burning down a bank is the superior alternative to becoming a life insurance salesman. The system is making people into revolutionaries. In the states, fun is revolutionary."

Metro Toronto police restrain one of about 5,000 who tried to break into the Festival Express on June 27.

Summertime 70...

Into the streets, Off the pig

Since the May 9 demonstration at the U.S. Consulate, over 200 people have been arrested in Toronto. Most of the busts have come out of political actions and most of those busted have been youth. Clayton Ruby, a Toronto lawyer who was charged with obstructing police at the May 9 demonstration, talks with The Varsity about what has happened this past summer between youth and police in Toronto.

VARSITY: There are many things about this summer that make it different from a lot of others, especially the large amount of political activity in Toronto and the number of people who were busted — there must have been about 200 altogether on various political charges — and just what that's done to people's consciousness over the summer. Starting out with the demonstration at the U.S. Consulate on May 9 and continuing until now, there seems to be a real continuity.

RUBY: I think May 9 is the turning point in Toronto's recent history concerning the relationships of youth to the police. It was on May 9 that people saw that the police attacked them viciously with no concern whatsoever for whether the press saw it or not. We learned that the press will, even if they report it, justify the police actions, whatever they are.

Perhaps you recall The Telegram of May 11 had a front page picture of a guy having his head held back — long hair, grabbed by the hair — having his head held back by two or three officers for photographs. Well, that's illegal. You can't force somebody physically to have a picture taken. Nobody can do that. Not the police, not anybody. The Telegram puts it right on the front page and doesn't give a damn about it. And then goes on to justify police actions, not just that one action, but all of them — the beatings, the senseless assaults, the dispersing of what was by and large a peaceful demonstration.

The other way in which May 9 is important is to try and look at what would have happened if the police hadn't been there at all. And what would have happened is that you would have had maybe $50-$60 worth of broken windows at the Consulate and another $100 worth of paint damage — that would have to be removed; total of maybe $200. But because the police moved in, you have instead thousands and thousands of dollars in damage on Yonge Street and on stores, you have hundreds of kids with criminal records who oughtn't to have criminal records, and you have both police and citizens injured.

You can balance that off in terms of social forces and social goods involved and it's just insane. You know, it's the police "machismo" coming out. They must act like men. They're kept to do their job. When in fact, doing their job, as they conceive it, entails more harm to society, to the demonstrators, to themselves, than if they'd simply not been there at all.

And my conclusion to that is that if that is the result, then there's something wrong with the way the police conceive of their jobs.

May 9 is the first time that people decided to strike back, that instead of being cowed and afraid and dispersing when the police horses charged, they said to hell with this, let's take it out on Yonge Street.

And they did. And that attitude of "we're going to strike back, we're not going to take being beaten by police and charged at by horses, as we have in the past," started on May 9 and was continued at the Festival Express rock concert, when people again said rather than have a peaceful picket, rather than leaflets, rather than cause minor disturbances inside, we're going to strike back at the promoters who are ripping us off, and at the police whose job, objectively, is to protect their purse.

And they proceeded to do just that. Successfully. That's a carryover from this attitude that we will strike back by any means necessary, which started on May 9.

And then, of course, you've got the Hydro, where again, instead of relying on the press to convey the story on peaceful picketing or solely on lobbying — although they did that as well — when the police and the Ontario Hydro private police force struck at them, they decided to go ahead and act by any means necessary, using whatever was at hand.

I think that's a trend and I think it's going to continue.

VARSITY: I think it's going to enlarge and develop.

RUBY: Part of the problem is internal to the police department as well. They've got this thing called the Intelligence Squad, which does nothing by and large but collect data on various radicals in Toronto. There's about ten or fifteen men on that, fulltime and then they add on as necessary.

But their intelligence is very bad since they rely on informers who are usually on the very fringes and who make stuff up in order to justify their relationship with the Intelligence Squad.

The Intelligence Squad, in turn, is regarded with some suspicion by the department as a whole because, well, they don't really do anything. Other cops walk the beat or catch criminals and you can see that they do it and they can justify themselves in terms of ordinary police values. The Intelligence Squad sort of sniffs around and has to keep justifying itself to the higher-ups. In order to do that they take the information they get from their informers and they do what's called, you know, "making it coherent", making predictions and plotting intelligence in the orthodox sense. Which really means they make stuff up to justify their own role. It's quite true. So that by the time it filters up to the very top and then goes back down to the guy on the beat, through his superior officers who tell him what to expect and how to act, there's a tremendous anticipatory fear. So the officer who goes to the demonstration expects thousands of rabid Marxists with guns and knives, acid and explosives, you know, all these crazy stories that come via the informers to the Intelligence Squad to the deputy chiefs and then back down again to the uniformed branch.

And, in a very real sense, just from the internal structure of the police department, the way they operate, tensions are created through that alone.

On the other hand, in all fairness you have a number of pigs on the left, who are determined for no good political reason that I can see, to take out police officers. Now, I'm not knocking violence, I'm knocking what I see as a very senseless doctrinaire violence that assumes you see a cop and you get him. There are other groups which say that they will defend themselves if attacked and I make no comment at all with regard to those groups, that seems like a reasonable position to take in some circum-

But if I had to lay the blame I'd lay it squarely on the department, on its own internal functioning.

And then you've got as well, the growing intolerance of the department as a whole — that is, the average police officer's mentality is getting less and less liberal and more and more anti-youth, anti-longhair, and anti-drugs, anti-demonstrations, and less willing to deal with people as if they were people. And more willing to deal with them as crowds, incipient riots.

VARSITY: But there are real contradictions within the police. For instance, out in front of the Consulate, several nights before May 9, kids would come down and group around the individual policemen guarding the building and talk to them for ten or fifteen minutes, when one of the superiors would come around, tap the cop on the shoulder, and say You go around back, to cut that kind of thing out. I also know of one policeman who was at the Hydro occupation, when they were really manhandling people, grabbing them for just for no reason and showing them into the paddy wagon, and he said he went out back, in between the houses and just stood there until it was all over.

RUBY: I had a talk after May 9 with a police officer who's a friend of mine and what he said was that he was disgusted by what the police had done on May 9, and that if it kept up he was going to quit the force. Now I don't know what his reasons were, but he's now left the force. He quit.

I suspect there's a good deal of that going on, and that's part of the hardening in the police department. Anybody who doesn't go along with the hard line finds it intolerable to work in the police department and either leaves or gets transferred to juvenile work where you don't have to cope with that kind of nonsense, or into the Mod Squad.

In order to be fair to the department, however, you should mention that some people, Deputy Chief Jack Ackroyd, to name one person, are trying to work against this trend, but my perception is that he's one guy in a sea of hostile views and he's going to have a very difficult job in conveying to the department that young people are human and that if you deal with them as humans then you're going to have far less trouble than if you deal with them as bodies that have to be moved. That's putting it at its mildest.

VARSITY: To what extent is a lot of the political activity in Toronto directed against the American Empire to the detriment of dealing with concrete things here.

RUBY: I worry more about the Americanization of our tactics and analysis than I do about the American targets that are chosen, because I think that the American targets do cause most of the problems in Canada. The danger in it of course is that you say, OK, make Canada safe for Canadian capitalists. I think that's silly. But it really alarms me that you find a tactic being developed in the United States, and then a few months later Canadians are doing exactly the same thing — be it sit-ins or whatever the hell it is. That's ridiculous.

But there's a real preoccupation with what's happening in the U.S. To some extent that's somewhat justified, because after all the United States is the world's major power, and does cause our difficulties in one way or another, but it would be nice to concentrate on our own problems. For example, it's interesting that when the kids went through the downtown on May 9, they were predominantly the Canadian institutions that they chose to rip off, Eaton's, the Canadian banks, and so forth. They didn't, as they might well have done, go out of their way to pick out American institutions.

The Varsity — Erael Young

Gatecrashers at the Festival Express crowd around a police public announcement

VARSIITY: At the time of May 9 one police official was quoted in the papers as saying something like These are the worst riots we've had since the Thirties, that kind of thing. And something struck us the other day, when we were looking at some figures, in 1935 there were half a million unemployed people in Canada and in 1970 there are practically 600,000 men without jobs in Canada, which is exactly the same number . . .

RUBY: You have to adjust that for population, of course.

VARSIITY: Yes, it's different percentage of the population, but it's still more than half a million people.

RUBY: And once again, predominantly urban, predominantly young.

VARSIITY: And then you would have to add on to that all sorts of young people and women who aren't considered part of the regular labour force. And it really seems to me that we're heading into the middle of some kind of political, social, economic crisis. I really see a lot of parallels with the things that happened in the Thirties.

VARSIITY: This all in the context of the global scene which in the Thirties, although fascism was on the rise, did not have the atomic bomb. It was still relatively human, and in spite of the propaganda, you could still conceive of even a fascist perhaps being a reachable human being. But now there's the spectre of cybernetics and atomic bombs.

RUBY: Even in the short run, watch what happens as more and more people become disenchanted with Trudeau and the electoral option. They're going to take to the streets and we're going to see those people getting involved in street confrontation. Their number will grow very very quickly, I think. Because Trudeau is going to be, given his principals and his position, incapable of dealing with inflation and unemployment. He's going to be incapable of changing the quality of life of people in Toronto, for example, because the forces that are going on are beyond the means that he chooses to deal with them. He's going to be incapable he's going to be impotent. I think those factors are going to develop into a great deal of political awareness on the part of young people, and a great deal of frustration in the next two or three years.

VARSIITY: What do you think of the analysis that says that youth are a revolutionary class which can bring about a complete restructuring of society?

RUBY: Very ambivalent. I mean intellectually it doesn't hold water. It's emotionally very attractive because the people I see acting sensibly are by and large young people. But I think that intellectually you've got to admit that there's no way that young people a) are a class in any orthodox definition of class, and b) by themselves can effect change. Therefore you're talking about coalitions. And in

The Varsity — Errol Young

He wasn't caught. The crowd closed in around him.

Canada it's hard to see who the hell you're going to coalesce with. . . I'm not hopeful at all about revolution. I don't anticipate revolution — you know, it'd be nice if there was one, but I'm not sitting around here waiting for it to happen because I don't think it will happen. But I don't think that should prevent anybody from acting in the way they believe is right and just simply because they don't see how the change that they know is necessary is going to occur.

VARSIITY: Why isn't there going to be a revolution — simply because of Canada's historical experience?

RUBY: Not primarily because of that. I look more to see who is angry in the society, and who accepts the way of life that we have and I think that those who are angry are young people in universities and colleges and to a very small degree in high schools and technical schools — and that's by and large it.

I think working people couldn't give a damn about anything except getting a bigger slice of the pie. Although it's a just demand — you can't live on $90 a week, with a family and you ought to have more — but it's not a demand that leads to revolutionary change in my view. I have great respect for those who hold opposite views and want to work with people who are at that stage and try and broaden their understanding of what the problems are. I work with them and I support them, but I don't think it's going to develop into much. So I'm pessimistic because I see young people alone.

VARSIITY: The only other thing I want to talk about is what's going to come up now — what's going to happen to the people who are going to come up on their various charges in the next couple of months. . . .

RUBY: By and large they're going to be convicted. I think most of them are going to be convicted to some time in jail, because the prevailing judicial feeling seems to be that it's time for some deterrents. We'll teach these kids that they can't get off with a fine, or they'll go back and do it again.

VARSIITY: What effect is that having on the people who were arrested as a group? Are they being subdued and intimidated or outraged?

RUBY: I think those who were arrested are being somewhat subdued and intimidated. I think that's true of the vast majority of people who have to spend some time in jail. The effect on those who weren't arrested has been the opposite. They're outraged and they're going to go out and get arrested the next time.

VARSIITY: What kind of chance does somebody have who brings in three of his friends to give one story and cops bring in two cops to give another story. I know a couple of people who are in exactly that position.

RUBY: I think it's likely they will be convicted. In part it depends on how bright the cops are when they give their evidence. A good defence by a lawyer can often bring out the weaknesses in the officer's evidence. You couple weaknesses in the Crown's case with a good honest defence — that will be enough for an acquittal, even in a hostile court.

But if the officers — we're going on the assumption that their evidence is perjured, which happens quite often, all right — if their stories are tight and together, then I think that the police officers' evidence is going to result in a conviction, regardless of the friends' evidence.

But I don't want to mislead anybody by saying that this has to do only with demonstration cases, I think this is true of our system of justice as a whole. Police officers get believed. Period. And the accused and his friends don't.

VARSIITY: What kind of resources are there for defending people in court. How many lawyers are there?

RUBY: Well, there's nobody I know who lacks a lawyer. I think there are enough people who volunteered. That's a significant improvement over most cities on this continent. And I think that most of those lawyers are intelligent and will work fairly hard to try and get their clients acquitted.

It's important not to be intimidated by the fact that you can get convicted on perjured evidence, it is important not to get intimidated by the fact that you may go to jail, it's important to keep on doing what's right. And I can speak for a number of young lawyers in Toronto, saying that as long as people keep doing that we'll keep defending them.

Communists control Canada

The current issue of American Opinion, a right-wing magazine edited by Robert Welch, says 70 to 80 per cent of the political decision-making in Canada is Communist-controlled.

This estimate is cited in a world-wide scoreboard of how powerful Communist influence is today. Estimates range from a low of 10 to 20 per cent in Nationalist China to 100 per cent scores for the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. The U.S. scores 60 to 80 per cent.

In 1958, the chart notes, Communists controlled only 20 to 40 per cent of the decision-making in Canada.

Engineers rip off SAC doors

The newly painted front doors of the SAC office were ripped off yesterday by a roving band of engineers who plan to modernize all the old buildings on campus.

The SAC office is the starting point as it is the oldest building on campus. Eventually they plan to hit University College and Simcoe Hall.

The doors are somewhere on the Toronto Islands right now either intact or used as firewood for a barbecue.

The only loss to you is the $250 the SAC spent repainting the front doors.

METAMORPHOSIS

"met-a-mor-pho-sis (Gr. meta, over + morphe, form), 1. a change in form, structure, or function; specif., the physical change undergone by some animals, as caterpillar to butterfly. 2. any marked change as in character."

— from Websters College Dictionary by good ol' Webster.

"I am a student of what acceleration is and what the great changes are, and I simply say to you that what will happen in the next ten years is going to be much more surprising than what happened in the last hundred."

— from Utopia or Oblivion by Buckminster Fuller.

"In our society, at certain times, this interlaced set of systems may lend itself to revolutionary change, not at the extreme micro or macro ends; that is, not through the individual pirouette of solitary repentance on the one hand, or by a seizure of the machinery of the state at the other; but by sudden, structural, radical qualitative changes in the intermediate system levels: changes in a factory, a hospital, a school, a set of schools, a university, or a whole area of industry, medicine, education, etc.," — from R. D. Laing's essay 'The Obvious' in the Dialectics of Liberation edited by David Cooper.

"We have chosen to be powerless criminals in a time of Criminal Power."

— Father Berrigan: poet, Jesuit, burner of draft files, convict, humanist, revolutionary and Christian.

"The old feel that there have been far too many changes too quickly. The young feel that there have been far too many changes but no change. External changes in discipline, ritual and even doctrine but no real change in attitude."

— from a recent letter in The Globe & Mail announcing the resignation of Father Edward Boyce as Provincial of the Toronto Province of the Redemptorist Congregation.

"metamorphosis, n. (that should be VERB, I AM a verb!) change of form (by magic or by natural development, etc.); changed form; change of character, conditions, etc."

— from The Concise Oxford Dictionary.

"I swear you have the power — as the angels do spread out your fingers and make all things new/change the world by the things you say/by the things you love and the games you play..."

— from I Looked Up (When You Find Out Who You Are) by the incredible The Incredible String Band.

Metamorphosis is real. It is happening. So is stagnation and so is extinction. Choose! Check the difference and choose. Live it.

—collage by jon karsemeyer with an important thank you to Jouko. also a thankyou to Marshall McLuhan who is quoted on the back cover of TWO-FACTOR THEORY: The Economics of Reality, as saying he "had a ball reading that metamorphic parable," thereby suggesting the theme of this peace. Dig it. Do it. Metamorphosis.

Orientation: NOTHING to think about

U of T's freshmen were accosted with both the traditional and the new during last week's orientation. With the exception of Victoria University which made a vain try at shaking up their new members, colleges on the St. George Campus did pretty well what was expected. SAC tried to offer an entirely different approach, but nobody really noticed.

Operating out of a tent set up in the St. Mike's quad, SAC members, according to Dan Leckie, (SMCII) "tried to put a bit of content into the Mickey Mouse stuff." Their counter-program consisted of attending and attempting to disrupt College President Father Kelly's address Sunday night, distributing questionnaires afterwards and posting the results, organizing a sensitivity group and generally making themselves available to St. Mike's freshmen who, were unimpressed by what their college orientation committee offered.

SAC is depressed with the results of their efforts. "We did a fair job, but it just didn't work," said Dan. "The only students we reached were those who were completely alienated by everything else that was going on."

The sensitivity group, held the same night as one of the dances, was intended to be an alternative way of meeting people. Only about 35 showed up.

Frosh at St. Mike's apparently preferred The Fine Old College Tradition of orientation rites, or else they were not aware of what was in the tent on the quad. They were easily distinguishable in their beanies, even in bed — failure to comply with the college rule of round-the-clock beanie wear obligated sops and seniors to douse the sleeping non-conformist and his mattress with cold water and/or impose caelesthenic punishment. That's what happened to girls at Loretto.

First year students at St. Mike's were also taught that first year students should adopt the decorum of dead bugs and pregnant camels. A dead bug lies on its back and shakes its arms and legs in the air whenever a senior screams "Raaaaid!" A pregnant camel arranges itself in a push-up stance and goes hump hump.

The non-peoples' reactions to this type of welcome varied from: "Just because you have to get on your back and act like an ass hole — shit, that's part of the fun." to . . .

"I decided it was such idiocy that it wasn't worth it. The whole thing's a colossal waste of time."

Vic's orientation committee attempted to give first year students both the traditional and the radical in their program. New students were treated to a skit showing the malice behind admission requirements, and also had to sit through a "question period" in which an attempt was made to challenge Dr. Hodgetts, president of the college.

It was a fizzle. The freshmen weren't ruffled about this intellectual challenge to the administration. They had been expecting something like this — but not the first night they were there.

"It didn't go over at all," most said. "They tried to get us to be anti-everything so quickly. We weren't even settled in our rooms yet."

They were surprised at the "animosity and hate" implicit in the questions directed at Dr. Hodgetts. Freshmen say the questions were irrelevant to the situation and just a bunch of cliches anyway. Words like bureaucracy and elitist and dehumanization just didn't shake them up. Everybody's heard them before.

Orientation of Trinity was traditional.

No political issues — campus or otherwise — interrupted anything. "We have had no contact with this," said one. "So far you're just having fun and getting to know people so that you will be well armed against anyone who is really radical. You get a good footing."

When asked if she wanted to encounter any "radicals", she replied, "Oh yes! It would be too flat otherwise." She believed that she would keep an open mind to both kinds of people.

Others were asked if any part of the program had so far been designed to make them think. They replied, "There is NOTHING to make us think!"

No luck in finding Bissell's successor

By MARINA STRAUSS

Since U of T President Claude Bissell announced his resignation in June, there has been no progress in the choosing his successor.

At Simcoe Hall, W. Kent, Executive Assistant, and D. S. Claringbold, Secretary of Board of Governors, would make no comment on who would replace Bissell. Bissell has been president for 13 years.

In a letter to the Board of Governors, SAC President Rod Hurd, recommended a search committee "empowered to make the final selection, composed equally of faculty, student, and lay representatives".

The Commission on University Government in a little-read report issued at the beginning of last year, recommended that presidents be chosen by a "Governing Council," composed of 20 lay members, 20 elected students, 20 elected academic staff and six ex officio administrators.

Hurd's letter was acknowledged as having been received.

Legally at this point, it is the Board of Governors alone who make the choice.

Mr. O. D. Vaughan, Chairman of the Board of Governors, said that there will be an acting President after Bissell's resignation next June, as the newly-appointed official will himself have to give a year's advance notice of leave from his present position.

The first Board of Governors meeting of the year is on September 24th. This issue will probably come up.

Board meetings are held in secret.

CUG report in demand

The demand for copies of the CUG Report reached unprecedented proportions this last week.

The document, originally intended as a basis for re-structuring university government at the University of Toronto, has been included on a scavenger hunt list by the Engineering Society.

Engineering freshmen, as part of their orientation program, can be sighted on campus searching out copies of the report, published last fall.

The major recommendation of the CUG Report, equal representation for faculty and students on a future top governing council for the university, was rejected this summer by a body called the University-Wide Committee.

The UWC, composed of 120 elected people (40 students, 40 faculty, 25 administrators and 15 support staff), favoured a governing council in which faculty would have 21 seats and students 14. The remainder of the 72-person council would consist of alumni, support staff, administrators and presidential appointees.

at Rockdale, we feel more like we do now than when we first came here

The best thing about Rockdale is that it's ours. A six million dollar 18 storey building in downtown Toronto owned by its residents. Who annually elect a council who hires the "administration"; who are from, and work for the community. Community. The key word in Rockdale's present development. A small town of 850 people — a community with its own government, its own bureaucracy, police force, stores, restaurants, movie theatres, drama group (Theatre Passe Muraille), printing house (Coach House Press), its own daily newspaper (comes out twice a week) and a library. Plus a few odds & ends like art studios, a medical clinic, photography workshops, a bookbind-operation, music rooms, and a day centre. These facilities are not provided by Rockdale's "administration". The creation and development of all projects are a result of individual commitments. You must create your own environment for living and working.

The development of our community is a natural organic process, influenced and directed by all residents. We deal with real problems, with solutions that have immediate and actual results. We learn from the consequences of our actions. As our community develops, so we develop.

Life in Rockdale is not restricted by rules of behaviour set down by an impersonal landlord. Limits are defined on a personal basis, between residents, only when the freedom of an individual begins to infringe on that of others. Communication of mutual needs act as our law makers.

Rockdale started as a "free school" defining itself in terms of that which it was not. As we enter our third year, we have discovered the positive direction of our learning — through our experience as a human community, Participation in our experiment is simple: come live with us.

Secret White House memo published

NEW YORK, July 28 — Vice President Spiro Agnew and others in White House circles are secretly discussing the repeal of the Bill of Rights and cancellation of the 1972 elections, according to a confidential memorandum from the Vice President's office published in the August issue of Scanlan's Monthly, on the newsstands today.

Predictably, the memorandum has been denounced by Agnew as fraudulent, but he has taken no steps to sue the crusading magazine, one of its editors.

The memorandum—in fact page 2 of a four page memo dated March 11, 1970—outlines plans for the "spontaneous" hard-hat demonstrations supporting the Administration's Indochina war policies.

The demonstrations were to be organized, according to the memo, in association with Victor Borella, Special Assistant on Labor Affairs to Governor Nelson Rockefeller of New York, and representatives of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Little notice here
Treated as a sensation in Europe last week when proofs of the memo were first made public by Scanlan's Monthly, the document has received scant press attention here. Few newspapers probed its authenticity or its inner logic. The New York Times, with its vast investigative apparatus, contented itself with an inside page story on July 22 under a one-column headline, "Agnew Attacks Memo as Fraud" but apparently did not follow it up with any independent research.

Editor Zion, a lawyer by profession, was an assistant U.S. Attorney in New Jersey who left his Federal post to become a reporter for the New York Times. There he specialized for five years in covering the courts and various investigations.

A skilled investigator himself, Zion emphasized that he and his co-editor, Warren Hinckle, III, and others had checked out the document thoroughly and were completely satisfied as to its authenticity. He received it from the source that frequently gave him valuable leads when he was a Times' reporter, he told the Daily World in a telephone interview, "and that source never misled me."

Earlier he had said, "The document came directly from Mr. Agnew's office, and he knows it. We do not hesitate to submit our credibility against his."

'Judicious leak'
The memo portion published by Scanlan's begins with a discussion of "a judicious leak" of a study on cancelling the '72 elections reportedly made by the Rand Corporation, a California research company frequently serving as a "think tank" for the Pentagon. Brief reports of the study appeared some months ago in a syndicated news column from Washington.

Cancellation of the elections was presumably to be sought because "radicals" would allegedly "disrupt" the polling. The memo called for the "leaks" in order "to test the water" of public opinion.

Repeal of the Bill of Rights, that is, the First 10 amendments to the U.S. Constitution, was to be extra hush-hush, according to the memo. "Under no, repeat no, circumstances" was the study on the repeal to be made public, the memo warned.

Under the heading, "New Developments," the memo details plans for "a series of 'spontaneous' demonstrations by labor groups publicizing their support of this Administration's Indochina policies and their discontinuance of any silent indulgence of peace groups."

"Target cities," for the demonstrations, according to the memo, were to be New York, Pittsburgh, Chicago, St. Louis and Seattle. In fact, such demonstrations were held in New York, St. Louis and Seattle and, last week, in Cleveland. They were marked in some instances by violent attacks on peace advocates. They were organized primarily by the building trades union leaders in cooperation with building contractors who paid the men for the time taken off work.

Panthers open office in Algiers

ALGIERS (CUP) — The Black Panther Party opened an international section Monday, Sept. 14, and has been formally accorded the status of a liberation movement by the Algerian government. The Minister of information, said the international section would serve as a rival to the Rogers (U.S.) State Department.

Cleaver has been living in Algeria for the past year. He left the United States after being ordered to surrender on charges of parole violation in California.

He said the establishment of the office marks the first time in the 400-year-long struggle of black people inside the United States that we have established representation at an official level on the international stage.

Gov't threatens Charles St. residents

By MARG COTTRILL

The Ontario Government has threatened to prosecute striking students at the Charles St. married students' residence if rents are not paid by October 1.

The threat was made at a meeting on Friday between representatives from the University of Toronto, the Ontario Student Housing Corporation and the Tenants Association.

Since August 1, about 300 of the 700 families in the apartments have been withholding $50.00 of the monthly rent from their landlord, the O.S.H.C.

Students calculate that this $50.00 pays municipal taxes from which other University residences, including the married student residence at York, are exempt. Says Paul Goyette, managing director and vice-chairman of the Board of Directors of O.S.H.C., "Married students' residences both on and off campus at Queen's, Waterloo, and Western Universities do pay taxes. The students didn't know that."

Tenants point out that they are actually buying a piece of land in the heart of Toronto for the O.S.H.C. which claims to be a non-profit organization. Goyette says that someone has to pay for the government loan and if the tenants withheld the rent, then other tax payers would suffer.

Besides complaining of poor service, a small playground, and lack of luxuries, the tenants argue that since O.S.H.C. is a branch of the government, the money does not need to be repaid. They propose that O.S.H.C. give the lease to the U of T and therefore grant the residence special tax status.

Even tenants who still pay the rent, begrudge the O.S.H.C. ownership of the land. Considering the ideal location, they are willing to pay the same rent — but only if the U of T were the owner so the property would become university tax-free land.

Goyette replies that this proposal is not feasible because he predicts that in the future tax exemptions on university property, will cease. Gordon Martel, chairman of the Tenants' Association, also disagrees with the moderate tenants' solution because with the present rates it would take 50 years to pay off the grant. The building was originally constructed to last for only 50 years.

The students are as yet undecided as to what course of action they will take and intend to make further plans at a meeting on Thursday, September 24 at 8:00 p.m. at 30 Charles St. W.

Need legal assistance?

On September 21, 1970 the University of Toronto Campus Legal Assistance Centre will commence operation at 44 St. George St.

The Legal Assistance Centre will be open to all students of the University from 12:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m. from Monday to Friday, and will be staffed by volunteer law students from the U. of T. Law School.

Sid Valo, a third year law student and Director of C.L.A.C. stressed two points:

(1) those people working in the office are students, now lawyers; and (2) every resident of Ontario has a right to the benefits of the Ontario Legal Aid Plan which provides lawyers to those unable to afford counsel. He pointed out that C.L.A.C. seeks to aid those who do not qualify under the Ontario Plan and who cannot afford a lawyer.

C.L.A.C. may be reached at 928-6447.

Profs outline mercury threat

By PAUL PERELL

Two Toronto University professors outlined the extent and threat of mercury contamination at a special press conference last week.

The conference was held in response to increased U.S. interest in the findings of a University of Toronto research team headed by Dr. Robert E. Jervis, professor of Chemical Engineering.

Using a process called "neutron activation" Jervis was able to discover the quantity of mercury in the foods of our regular diet.

They said that our regular diet has levels of mercury concentration as great as those that prompted government action in banning the sale of Great Lakes fish. More than half the foods analysed had concentrations greater than the 0.05 parts per million suggestion by the World Health Organization.

The doctors pointed out, however that this was not a crisis or panic situation. Tests on average Canadians showed mercury concentrations 98 per cent below levels that produce overt clinical symptoms of mercury poisoning.

Science to vote on A & S Council boycott

Students will vote on a boycott of their 34 seats in the restructured Arts and Science Council later this month.

The referendum will be held by the Students, Administrative Council to give students the opportunity to boycott the seats until a body more representative of the students is considered.

The old Council was restructured over the summer on the premise that the previous structure was too large. Formerly the Council consisted of 1,212 full-time Faculty teaching staff (including 13 students).

A smaller structure would make individual members "feel that they are playing a significant role in running the University," said Dean A.D. Allen in a brief presented to the Faculty last May.

Riverdale Project is recruiting

By JOHN RIVISTO

The Riverdale Youth Project is recruiting students this week at Sidney Smith Hall to assist them in their efforts to aid disadvantaged youths.

The goals of the project are to discover the reasons for the high dropout rate from the high schools in the Riverdale area (70% from a sample of 88 taken in 1968) and means of lessening it.

The project located in a trailer at Broadway and Dundas budget of $60,000. A group of 159 students between the ages of 14-17 is being given special aid and attention: tutorial help, help in finding summer and part time jobs, visits to various parts of the city and its institutions.

The project had little success in securing summer jobs for the youths. Mr. Powell said that university students had managed to get hold of most of the few jobs that were available this summer. Business men were slow in responding favourably to requests of employment.

More success is being had in locating part time jobs (about four a week) for the students. More jobs are now available and the staff is now more experienced in job hunting. The youths are given every possible chance to make money around the trailer doing or making and delivering pamphlets.

The staff members and the youths have an open and informal relationship. The students, who show a marked hostility to all authority, have responded amicably to the carefree atmosphere. Staff and students participate together in games of catch and football.

Students are not probed about their personal problems, said Powell, unless they choose to talk about them.

The new Council consists of 169 members, 34 of which are to be students.

At a meeting of "The People of the Faculty of Arts and Science", a group of 22 students and SAC representatives on July 7, this proposed restructuring of the Council was reluctantly accepted "only on an interim basis of one year, even though it ignored the philosophy of the CUG report".

It was decided at the time to accept the 34 student seats on the Council, provided the representatives were chosen by democratic election.

Since that time, SAC has decided that the student body should make the decision on whether to accept the new body. If the referendum rejects it, any measure passed by the Council would be considered illegal and a new structure would have to be implemented.

This structure is intended only for a period of one academic year when restructuring will again be undertaken.

The students are to be elected, one from each department of the Faculty of Arts and Science and one from each of the eight colleges.

In addition there will be representatives of the teaching staff of each department, depending on the size of the department and the number of student courses taught, with a maximum of eight and a minimum of two.

The Great Clean Air Car Race

By JOE SHEPPARD

It started in the late January cold and ended in a September downpour, and in between it provided the most dramatic example of what could be done about air pollution, if...

It was the 1970 Clean Air Car Race, seven months of planning and eight gruelling days of driving across the continent. The 44 vehicles entered by schools and universities in the United States and Canada proved that automobiles don't have to be the source — as they are now — of 50 per cent of urban air pollution.

The U of T involvement started when Doug Venn, a 23-year-old graduate engineer student, returned from a Detroit conference at which the race was announced. Determined that Toronto should enter a vehicle, he began planning to build a steam-powered car.

But it was soon apparent that the technology was simply not available to build a practical steam car. Eventually, the U or T's rapidly growing team and settled on an electric-propane hybrid.

Propane powered cars are really nothing new; they've been used in Los Angeles for several years. Electric cars have also been touted as the solution to air emission problems, but they've never been developed to the practical stage. Simply combining the two systems was no great innovation, but the way the U of T team did it was.

At present, automotive pollution results from the incomplete combustion of gasoline. Because it is not completely burned, it produces carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide, various hydrocarbons, particulates, and nitrous oxides. It's the latter emissions which react with sunlight to produce the yellowish smog which cloaks cities like Los Angeles and threatens at times to choke Toronto.

Switching to propane solves some of these problems. Propane is a "clean" fuel, producing very few particulates. This in turn allows the use of catalytic mufflers which chemically neutralize some of the other exhaust components.

Engines also create more exhaust during acceleration or deceleration. To keep the U of T car's propane engine running under a constant load, the design team linked two electric engines to the drive train. These provided the power to accelerate up to about 15 miles per hour, when the propane engine cut in, and kept the engine at work charging storage batteries as the car decelerates.

Designing and building a car literally from scratch is an expensive proposition. The Toronto team entry was financed principally by two grants from U of T engineering funds, named after professors J. Roy Cockburn (pronounced Coburn) and W.A. Wallace. The generally-accepted figure for the car is $20,000, but this must be conservative.

The development of the car took place under the general direction of a committee made up of Doug Venn and Prof. I.W. Smith, head of the Cockburn Unit, and Prof. Frank Hooper. The two alternate drivers, who became involved at an early stage, were Steve Baker, a third year mechanical engineering student, and Juri Otsason, who graduated from mechanical engineering last spring. The body was designed by a recent Ontario College of Art graduate, Ken Bell.

Other members of the team were Simon Ng, a third year electrical engineer who took care of the car's elaborate electrical system, and F.A. Venn, Doug's father, who drove one of the team's two support vehicles during the race.

As the time came for the team to leave for Boston and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the pace picked up. For the last few days, the entire team worked almost around the clock, catching a few hours of sleep at a time in the mechanical engineering building's staff lounge.

On August 14, the day the car was to leave, it still wasn't finished. After the car, by this time sporting the name "Miss Purity" and license number "UT 1", rolled out to meet the press, the front bumpers were bolted in place. The front air scoop and a new windshield (the original was cracked the night before as it was installed) would be installed in Boston.

Fuel problems plagued the car all the way to Boston, but once it arrived, it immediately became the hit of the show. It was featured in the local papers and magazines, and was chosen to carry an official banquet invitation to the State Governor.

The team continued to work through the following week to get the car ready for the race. Exhaustive emission tests were carried out at MIT to see the cars met the prescribed standards. While the U of T car handled better than expected during performance trials, its emissions were not as good as they should have been, chiefly because the engine "ran hot" during the stationary tests.

Finally, in the cold grey light of dawn on Monday, August 24, the cars rolled out for the start of the race.

Trouble struck almost at once. The first fuel stop for the propane-powered vehicles was at a Highway Department station 150 miles out of Boston. Miss Purity was the first car there, but the promised propane tank truck had not shown up.

Running on reserves, the cars headed for the second fuel stop after almost an hour's delay. But when they arrived, there was again no tanker at the designated spot.

A commercial propane depot was finally located some miles off the race route, and the cars once again headed for Toronto, arriving shortly after 6 p.m. at Varsity Stadium. That night, they paraded down University Ave. to a civic reception at City Hall.

Miss Purity continued to be dogged by bad luck. As she backed over some boards laid to protect the stadium grass, one of them tilted up and bashed against the muffler and tail pipe. The already-tired crew worked through the night and the following morning to repair the damage.

The U of T car was not the only having problems. An MIT car burned out a generator on the first day and was towed into Toronto for repairs. The steam cars never did leave Boston, and the pure electrics were held up by the frequent need to recharge their batteries.

The second day's run took the surviving cars to Detroit for further pollution tests. On the third day, headed for Champaign, Ill.

Just to keep things interesting, on the way to Champaign, Ill. during the third day's run, Miss Purity snapped one of her connecting rods. It took almost a full day to replace it in an East St. Louis garage.

But finally on Sunday, August 30, Miss Purity rolled into Pasadena, California, sixth in the race and the first of her class to make it.

At an awards dinner three nights later, she was named joint winner of the electric-hybrid class and received a cheque for $5,000 from the U.S. government's National Air Pollution Control Agency, which in return will use the car in a two month study.

Ironically, the overall winner was a car powered by lead-free gasoline. Only days earlier, two major oil companies announced plans to introduce low-or-no lead gasoline in Canada.

The most often asked question about the U of T entry was "When can I buy one like it?" The answer is, probably never.

Miss Purity was built as a research vehicle to demonstrate certain ways of fighting air pollution. Systems developed through this kind of research could be used on production models, but the car itself could never be practical, if only because of its overwhelming complexity.

But collectively, the cars in the race showed that auto pollution can be controlled. It may be difficult, it may cost money, but it can be done.

NOTICE OF ELECTION

LIBRARY COUNCIL

Nominations Open to 11.59a.m. Wednesday 14th October. Voting Wednesday 31st. October

Constituencies

Elected Representatives of the full-time Teaching Staff

(Members to serve for a three-year term not immediately renewable) 3 Members from each of: Humanities, Social Sciences, Physical Sciences, Life Sciences.

NOTE

It should be understood by members of the teaching staff elected to the Library Council that at the first meeting of the Council the elected members will be asked to select by lot those who will serve for one, two or three years. Those members asked to serve for a one-year period will be eligible for re-election for a full three-year term in 1971. Those asked to serve for a two-year period will not be immediately eligible for re-election. The reason for this arrangement is the wish to establish continuity of membership within the Library Council.

Elected Representatives of Students

(Members to serve for a one-year term, twice renewable)

1 Student from each of the Divisions of the School of Graduate Studies a) Humanities, b) Social Sciences, c) Physical Sciences, d) Life Sciences

1 Student from each of the Divisions of the Faculty of Arts and Science a) Humanities, b) Social Sciences, c) Physical Sciences, d) Life Sciences (Candidates may represent any Division in which they are taking a course)

1 Student from the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering

1 Student from the Faculty of Medicine (who is not enrolled in the School of Graduate Studies)

Faculty lose 10% discount at bookstores

By ANN WILTON

To-day more than 11,000 students and faculty members will go to the university bookstores but surprised faculty members will not receive their traditional 10% discount.

During the summer, the student-faculty book sub-committee decided to remove the faculty's 10% discount at the bookroom. Students and faculty alike, however, will still receive a 5% discount on textbooks.

"The basic aim of the bookstores" as stated by Charles Fanning, general-manager of the four university bookstores "is to operate as a service business. We look like a business but are without the profit motive."

"The terms of reference of the university book trade," Fanning explained, "means that the bookstores must break even without asking for subsidy."

The four bookstores — Erindale, Scarborough, the Bookroom, and the Text book store — are under the same control. Erindale and the Textbook store lose money.

Prof. J. Kornberg, a member of the book sub-committee outlined the reasons for loss at the textbook store. "It is the publishers' policy to give a 20% discount on textbooks, instead of the 40% discount, say, to the bookroom for non-textbooks. Perhaps its because they have a captive audience.

"Most of the books are published in the States and since the American companies don't have direct subsidiaries a middleman system has evolved making it more expensive."

Fanning said that the university salary bill is 11% of sales compared to others which have up to 18%.

The bookstore sales each year are about $2,500,000 but the advertising is between $5,000 and $7,000 and generally "informative" if "freaky" in nature.

Free student charge accounts are provided interest free which is a constant money loser.

"Its the publishers," said Fanning when asked who does make the profits in the bookstore business. "We are in a squeeze. Criticize the system, not them."

"Well, that's what we have to put up with if we want the benefits of the free enterprise system," he philosophised.

BLUES ROMP PAST MUSTANGS

The Varsity - Doug Fraser

SPORTALK

Lyndon Little
VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

The first task of the Varsity Sports Department this fall seems to be to bring sports readers up to date on happenings over the summer months.

In April, at the OQAA meetings, it was announced that the U of Ottawa and Carleton U have been admitted to full membership in the OQAA. Both schools have been virtual members of the conference for some time as they had playing privileges in every sport but football up to that time.

Now, it appears that the SIFL will expand once again next year and take in one — and maybe both — of Carleton and Ottawa plus Guelph and Windsor.

Dr. K. D. Fryer, associate dean of math at U of Waterloo, was named the new president of the OQAA Board of Governors.

All tennis buffs at Varsity are doubtlessly aware of the recent summer achievements of former U of T net star, Peter Burwash.

Peter, who graduated from the Varsity PhysEd course in 1967, brought home the OQAA singles title in 1964, '65 and '66 and, just to underline his versatility, he also played on Blues' 1966 and '67 hockey teams.

Upon graduation, Peter decided that a world tennis tour was in order. Since then, he has been turning tennis balls into fuzzy white bullets in such far as away places as India, Burma and the Middle East on the amateur circuit.

While he has achieved considerable success on these tours, until this summer Peter had been frustrated in his life-long ambition to win a place on Canada's Davis Cup team.

This year's Davis Cup Selection Committee chose Mike Belkin and John Sharpe for the first two spots but couldn't decide between Peter and another fine Canadian player, Dave Brown, for the third and last position.

The selection committee finally agreed that a best two-of-three matches elimination contest would be the fairest method of settling the last berth.

The first match was held at Brown's home club here in Toronto, the Toronto Lawn, on May 19. Dave drew first blood as he swept to a straight set 6-4, 6-1, 6-4 victory.

The next day, they moved to Peter's home ground, the Cricket Club, where Peter evened the series with a hard-fought 10-8, 6-2, 3-6, 2-6, 6-4 decision.

The rubber match was held two days later at a neutral site, the Badminton and Raquet Club, where Peter saw his ambition fulfilled taking an exciting 3-6, 6-0, 9-7, 2-6, 6-2 triumph.

It's part of the record now, that our 1970 Davis Cup team of Belkin, Sharpe and Burwash went as far as any previous Canadian Cup squad has by reaching the American Zone final against Brazil.

In July, during the NHL expansion draft, the newly formed Vancouver Canucks took the pro-rights of Blues' star center John Wright from the Toronto Maple-Leafs roster.

Considered as one of the best pro prospects in Canadian college hockey, John has one more year at Varsity before his graduation.

We have word out of the intramural office from Miss Boyd and Dave Copp about interesting changes in the box lacrosse rules for the coming season.

Always one of the more popular of the intramural sports, box lacrosse has been played in the Hart House gym since 1931.

This year, the Lacrosse Rules Committee is going to experiment with rule changes designed to remove some of the judgment calls that are the plague of officials in every sport.

The biggest change involves the adoption of a dotted line three-feet from the boards on both sides of the gym. With no body-checking permitted outside this line, it is hoped that some of the unnecessary roughness will be eliminated.

In conjunction with the rule changes, the intramural people are sponsoring a three-evening clinic to take place on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of next week from 7:00 until 8:30 pm in the main gym.

Former Varsity lacrosse players, Bert Naylor and Don Artburns will be on hand to assist. The first session will deal with rule interpretation while the last two will center on skills.

Attendance is mandatory for coaches and officials but prospective players are also invited to attend.

Brazil takes Cup But are they world 'football' champs?

Editor's Note — John Cobby was captain of last year's Varsity soccer team. During the past summer, he realized the ultimate dream of every soccer buff — a trip to the World Cup finals in Mexico. In this article, John shares some of his impressions)

By JOHN COBBY

A sports-loving, but out-of-touch visitor from outer space might well inquire on landing, "Who are the current World Football Champions?"

If by some chance he found himself in North America, the answer would probably be, "the Kansas City Chiefs".

Of course, the true answer is "Brazil", which would be the reply obtained from the other 95 per cent of the world's population.

Every four years the World Cup Football Championships are held to decide which national team is supreme. The game as we know it is of course soccer!

Each national team is selected from the cream of the players in each country. This is similar to the NHL All-stars in composition rather than to the now defunct Canadian National Hockey Team.

All players are professionals of the highest degree, which leads to manifestations of ultra-nationalism. For instance, Brazil has nationalized Pele, the world's greatest soccer player, as if he were a national resource similar to oil or gas.

This ruse made it illegal for an Italian team to purchase his services a few years ago.

Since the previous championships, won by England in 1964, 68 teams battled to produce 16 survivors. These survivors then came to Mexico this summer to decide the ninth World Football Championships.

The 16 teams were divided into four groups with each team in a group playing the other three in turn. The top two teams in each group then progressed to a sudden-death competition.

All games were watched avidly throughout the world by TV (with the isolated exceptions of Canada, the U.S., China, Albania and South Africa).

The Brazil-England game drew the largest TV audience ever known.

Few foreign fans were able to make the journey to see the games, but, 3,500 English supporters were present at each game in the 70,951 seat Guadalajara stadium.

Depending on one's nationality, the sudden death games resulted in either national disaster — or else complete euphoria.

Italy quickly became the most-hated team by overwhelming the host Mexicans 4-1. This gloom was soon tempered as the despised English team were eliminated 3-2 by the West Germans who thus gained immediate popularity with the Mexicans.

The semi-finals pitted Brazil against Uruguay, the former triumphing 3-1 without great difficulty. The other game in the semifinals saw the hated Italians face the beloved West Germans and was widely acclaimed as the most exciting contest ever seen.

The Italians grabbed an early 1-0 lead and held on grimly amid mounting abuse from the Mexican fans. Thankfully for civil order, the rampant West Germans equalized the score ten seconds from the end of the scheduled 90 minutes causing ecstasy amongst the spectators.

The weary players continued for 30 minutes of extra play, during which time fortunes swung dizzily.

In quick succession the score became 2-1, 2-2, 3-2, and then 3-3. Finally the peerless Italian ace, Riva, scored the decider. The crowd was so emotionally exhausted at the game's conclusion that they almost forgot that the "bad guys" had won.

The championship final could hardly fail to be anything but an anticlimax.

Contrasting styles

Even so, it was a good game in which the tactical differences between European and South American teams were clearly demonstrated.

While both teams probed continually, as in chess, for weaknesses in their opponent's defense, the Brazilians did so from a more attacking base than did the Italians. On the day, the attacking genius of Pele and the constructive subtlety of Gerson proved overwhelming in the second half and Brazil became World Champions by a score of 4-1.

And so, amid firecrackers and other manifestations of South American joy from the 110,000 spectators, who would dare tell a Mexican that life cannot have a happy ending?

From the games I saw, this is my world dream soccer team. The number of players of each nationality does not indicate the relative worth of each national team for, above all, soccer is a team game.

Soccer dream team

Goalkeeper — Banks (England); Backs — Alberto (Brazil), Chesternev (USSR), Moore (England), and Cooper (England); Halves — Gerson (Brazil), and Beckenbauer (West Germany); Forwards — Jair (Brazil), Muller (West Germany), Pele (Brazil) and Riva (Italy).

As a method of obtaining national unity, international sport may be supreme. Perhaps, Canada should form a National CFL Football Team!

But I forgot, international competition would be next to impossible as the United States is the only other country playing the game.

Could that be significant?

Blues' rookie fullback Guldo Iantorno smashes his way into the end zone for his first touchdown as a Blue during second quarter action in game against York. The Varsity — Errol Young

'Stangs, Yeomen fall to Blues' attack

Blues 38 - Western 15

By LYNDON LITTLE
VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR
"If you can't win the first one — you can't win them all!"

That's what Blues' assistant coach Dave Copp shouted as the 1970 edition of the Varsity Blues football team broke their final practice before their first exhibition game against York.

Not exactly the most profound statement in the world — but it served to illustrate Blues' new attitude to the annual pre-season games.

No more embarrassments

In past years, Blues have come up with less than inspired performances in exhibition games against weaker opponents such as Guelph and Mac. As a result, they often started the regular season on a low note.

Not anymore.

This year, Ron Murphy's Blues went all out to win the pre-season games and as a result picked up two impressive victories over York and Western.

After two weeks of practice and a pair of games, these facts are already discernible:

(a) — Blues have a veteran-packed team, many of them playing their final year for Varsity. This could be their best opportunity for some years to come for a Yates Cup victory.

(b) — The veteran players obviously want to go out as winners — they are in the best pre-season condition of some years.

(c) — Blues have come up with another good group of rookies to match last year's bumper crop of Wayne Dunkley, Jody Ortved, Cor Doret, Brian Sickle and Jack Buchan.

(d) — With two fine performances against York and Western, fifth-year pivot Vic Alboini appears to have won the starting QB spot over sophomore Wayne Dunkley and freshman Bob Billinghamurst. Dunkley, who showed great promise as a rookie last year, has been hampered this fall by injuries to both hands.

Blues draw first blood

In the inaugural meeting with York September 19 here at Varsity Stadium, Alboini directed an attack that picked up a total of 435 yards — 301 along the ground and 134 through the air — as Blues dominated every aspect of the game.

Alboini, a second year law student, combined with rookie wide receiver Ken Lee on a 71-yard pass-and-run play for one TD and added another himself on a one-yard keeper.

The most impressive feature however, of Blues' attack against Nobby Wirkowski's two-year-old York squad, was the strong inside running of fullback Glen Markle and halfback Bill Stankovic.

Markle, a veteran of many seasons with the Blues was absent from last year's team. His presence gives Varsity the strong, straight-ahead running that they lacked at many key junctures last term.

Markle bulled his way for 102 yards on 20 carries including a 11-yard plunge off right tackle for Blues' first touchdown.

Stankovic, the Hamilton native who ran out of the fullback slot last season, showed he fitted well at the halfback spot as he rambled for 110 yards on 11 carries — most of them between the tackles.

Rookies show well

Because of injuries to some of last year's front line troops, rookies like Monarch Park's Lee, Bloor's Guido Iantorno, Northern's Billinghamurst and Peter McNabb from Trinity College School got an opportunity to show their talents.

Besides his own touchdown, Lee, who packs a solid 160 lbs. on a five-foot, ten-inch frame, set up Markle's major with a 43-yard reception of an Alboini pass late in the first quarter.

Iantorno, an all-purpose type of back, indicated that he will be a valuable back-up man for Markle and scored Blues' third TD on a two yard dive in the second quarter.

Billinghamurst replaced Alboini late in the game and completed three of the five passes he attempted.

McNabb showed well both as a starter at right safety in the defensive secondary and as a replacement for Stankovic at running back.

The Varsity — Doug Froser

Blues' wide receiver Ken Lee grabs an Alboini pass despite interference from Western's Bill McTeer.

Third-year man Walt Sehr scored Blues' other touchdown on a 19-yard scamper through the left side of the York defense while Stankovic kicked four converts and Alboini ran for a two point conversion to complete the scoring.

Nick Holmes, Varsity hockey star trying for a spot in the defensive secondary, made the prettiest tackle of the game when he came up fast to dump York's Don Paterson on a third down gamble late in the first half.

York threatened twice

York had only two good opportunities to score.

The first one was on the opening series of plays when the Yeomen moved all the way to Blues' 14-yard line only to miss an easy field goal.

The second, was late in the game when a pass from quarterback Rick Frisby went off the fingertips of flanker John Ried who had worked behind. Blues secondary in the end zone.

Against Western on Saturday, Blues spoiled Frank Cosentino's debut against SIFL teams as they spotted the Mustangs a quick touchdown then roared back with 17 points in the second quarter and 14 more in the third.

Dunkley started the game at QB but disaster struck early.

On Blues' second play from scrimmage, Dunkley dropped back to pass and was forced to scramble out of the pocket.

A fumble ensued and a Western lineman recovered.

Two plays later, Western quarterback Joe Fabiani hit his speedy flanker Mike Tucker in the end zone for a quick 7-0 lead.

Alboini shines again

On the next Toronto series, Dunkley re-opened an old wound on his left hand and was replaced by Alboini.

Diminutive Vic came on and directed an attack that picked up 346 yards in total offense.

He scored one TD himself on a one-yard sneak and passed to Bob Morrow and to seven-year veteran Eric Walter for two more.

Varsity's other scores came on a 58-yard punt return by Morrow and on a four-yard dash by McNabb.

Morrow, who was on Blues' taxi squad for most of last season and saw little action, got classic blocking on his punt return touchdown.

If Blues demonstrated in the York game that they could run inside, against the Mustangs they showed they could also go to the outside.

If the Mustangs got an "EDUCATION", AS Cosentino claims they did when they lost 13-1 to Windsor last week, then they all picked up their doctorates playing against Blues Saturday!

Blues now turn their attention towards preparation for their league opener this weekend in Montreal against the defending Yates Cup champs, McGill.

SAC doors brought back alive from Island

By LINDA McQUAIG

The engineering escapade which left the SAC building doorless for approximately six hours last Sunday is now over.

The illustrious doors have been restored to their original position, suffering from nothing but the occasional minor scratch, and the initials LGMB engraved prominently on the back of the door.

The Lady Godiva Memorial Band, the infamous engineering choral group, allegedly stole the doors during the annual freshman scavenger hunt, held at Centre Island. Despite the obvious pride SAC takes in its newly-painted doors, the officials offered little resistance while the scavengers removed them.

Still the LGMB firmly maintains that they are innocent of the prank. They claim that they just happened to be playing on the island when they came across the SAC doors lying in the grass, and, as a public service, returned them.

The story about the stolen doors was reported inaccurately in the Monday issue of the Varsity, according to SAC Vice-President Eric Miglin.

"The $250 painting job included the interior of SAC as well as the doors," he said.

Victoria College is now only school to ring hour bells

By MARIS PAVELSON

Victoria College remains the only school on campus which rings bells hourly to signal the end of classes.

Nobody whom The Varsity approached can remember a time when the bells have not rung. When the New Academic Building was opened, it was decided as a matter of course to program the bells into the new master clock there.

Reaction to the bells at Vic ranges from mild annoyance to appreciation. Mrs. A. M. Patterson, a professor of English, finds herself dependent on them: "When a person without a watch gets very engrossed in what they're doing the bells are a noisy necessity. In fact, since they didn't ring on the first day of classes, I was embarrassingly late for my first class."

House gone, Probe homeless

By JOHN KIVISTO

Red tape and returning classes are keeping Pollution Probe homeless this year.

During the summer months Probe was housed in two laboratories and one office at Ramsay Wright Laboratories. SAC also had donated two rooms at 44 St. George.

As classes again resumed one laboratory had to be relinquished at Ramsay Wright. SAC has other plans for the rooms at 44 St. George. There is a good chance that they will go to the AOSC Travel Bureau.

When contacted by phone, research worker Bob Spencer said a good location had been missed because of the ever present red tape. A house at 426 and 428 Huron Street would have housed Pollution Probe efficiently. Since then the house has been demolished.

The house was owned by the City Department of Works. Land is to go to the extension of the Ontario College of Education. Probe decided to put in a bid for the house since construction would not begin for two years.

Pollution Probe was finally granted the use of the house but on that same day the wrecking crews had started their work. When Probe arrived at the scene $8,000 worth of damage had already been done. It was then agreed that the demolition should continue.

Spencer wanted to make it quite clear that he was not putting the blame on anybody. Efforts had been made to give Probe the house; they were not in time. As he said, "It was one of those things."

Still, Spencer is pounding the beat looking for new and desperately needed accommodation.

No student questioned would consent to be quoted on this question. However, one first-year student, recently from George S. Henry Secondary School ventured the opinion that "... it's almost a regression to high school. The bells are a symptom because we haven't had them in high school for a long time."

It would appear that Vic will have its bells for some time to come. Says President J. E. Hodgetts, "There hasn't been any great revolt of the masses against this. . . From my point of view, it hasn't been an issue."

Everyone else seems to agree.

Mel Watkins to address first Waffle seminar

A recently organized Waffle group on campus will sponsor a seminar this afternoon in Sid Smith 1071 at 1 p.m. on the "Branch-Plant University - The American Empire and the U of T". Featured speakers will be Mel Watkins, a national leader of the Waffle movement within the N.D.P., Bret Smiley, and John Warnock.

The noon-hour teach-in is the first activity of the new group which was organized last week at a meeting of about 20 Wafflers, students, faculty members, and support staff, who decided that a campus Waffle group was necessary to give a "reasonable left viewpoint on campus affairs."

Saul Ship, a member of the group, commented that there wasn't any serious left group on campus, and that a Waffle group, representing an independent socialist position, would fill this need. It would be closely affiliated with the New Democratic Youth, and probably replace the dormant U of T N.D.P. Club.

Radical historian

York professor denied immigrant status

Special to the Varsity

A radical American historian who has just taken a job at York is being denied landed immigrant status by the Canadian government.

Gabriel Kolko, an internationally known scholar of American history, has received a tenured position with York's history department but has not been able to obtain the landed immigrant status needed to teach.

Without landed immigrant status Kolko cannot apply for certain Canadian grants and may, in fact, be unable to remain in Canada at all.

Kolko has been a constant critic of American foreign policy and has written books on U.S. economic and military domination of underdeveloped countries.

In his book, The Roots of American Foreign Policy, Kolko calls for "profound social change" in the U.S. which he says is trying to create "total world economic integration not on the basis of equality but of domination."

York's history department and John Saywell, dean of arts, have declined to comment on the situation although they are negotiating with immigration authorities.

Sydney Eisen, history department chairman, said yesterday, "I'm very much interested in having Dr. Kolko here."

Kolko, who is now in Toronto, had "no comment" last Tuesday.

He said, however, he has no idea why he would be refused landed immigrant status since he meets all qualifications.

Kolko, a graduate of Kent State university, obtained his M.A. from the University of Wisconsin and his doctorate from Harvard.

His books include, The Triumph of Conservatism, Wealth and Power in America and The Politics of War.

Kolko believes the root causes of U.S. foreign policy are economic.

He has outlined America's attempt to control the world's natural resources and insists that such military ventures as the war in Vietnam are not 'mistakes' but "the logical outcome of a consistent reality we should have understood long before the United States applied so much of its energies to ravaging one small nation."

"Ultimately, the United States has fought in Vietnam with increasing intensity to extend its hegemony over the world community and to stop every form of revolutionary movement which refuses to accept the predominant role of the United States in the direction of the affairs of its nation or region. . .

"On the outcome of this epic contest rests the future of peace and social progress in the world for the remainder of the twentieth century, not just for those who struggle to overcome the legacy of colonialism and oppression to build new lives, but for the people of the United States themselves."

Abbie replaced by free stew

By RICK ROBINS

Even though Abbie Hoffman has cancelled out of the SAC-sponsored festival Friday, Beaver Foods, a well-known campus catering service has agreed to supply enough free stew for 9,000 people.

In addition to the Beaver offer, Commercial Caterers will provide free hot chocolate and Canada Caterers the cups to put the hot chocolate in.

"The purpose of Friday's Festival is confrontation," says Craig Heron, festival organizer.

Advertised under the optimistic title "Day One at the New University of Toronto," the SAC-sponsored festival will be an attempt to present an alternative concept of a learning environment.

In terms of concrete presentations, the festival will be quite diversified. There will be five rock bands. Various speakers including Claude Bissell, Bruce Kidd, John Sewell and Melvin Watkins will chair small discussion groups on the front campus. Films will be shown all day in the Old Physics Building and in the Medical Science auditorium.

Topics will be contemporary such as "No Vietnamese ever called me nigger"; further political documentaries on present American life will also be presented.

Guerilla theatre, compliments of the English Students Union, will occur as students hand out marshmallows to emphasize the marshmallow nature of their department.

Theatre groups from all over the city will perform, major production being at 7:30 p.m. on the front campus. Renaissance 71 will have a paint-in in the UC quad and a writers workshop will be held in Innis college where aspiring poets can read their latest works.

The festival is being advertised under the optimistic title, "Day One of the New University of Toronto." By the way, the organizers are looking for volunteers to help them erect the stage on Thursday and give out food on Friday, so all budding organizers are invited to place their bodies where they will do the most good.

The festivities are meant to be a pleasant atmosphere in which to observe and reflect on more important things.

Heron suggested that festival was a bad term to use. "Music will not be the main component although five rock bands will operate at various times throughout the day."

Rather than strictly entertain, the organizers are trying to create a spirit, trying to bring education out of the classroom. In this regard an attempt is made to isolate the problems of students and Canadians.

Michael Kaufman, chairman of the festival steering committee emphasized that this is not part of orientation. "Rather," he stated, "it is disorientation, a rejection of what the University of Toronto presently is."

"The festival is purposely being held at the end of the first week of classes so that students will have some experience in establishment learning and can better judge the necessity for alternatives."

Five telephones have been installed in the SAC office to handle inquiries about the festival.

What's that we hear now?

At one college on campus, there is a "Go" signal governing the learning process.

And also a "Stop" signal to cut it off. As one story in today's paper reports, Victoria College has hourly bells before and after every lecture or seminar. One Victoria College student put it this way:

"When the bell goes, the professors start to do their thing, and towards the end of the class, people start looking at the clock, waiting for the bell to go . . ."

The bells are symbolic.

The bells are an archaic feature which, surviving into today's educational system, only makes realize that, in substance, little has changed. Many high schools — and of course most universities, — have done away with bells to try and disguise this fact.

Victoria College, however, never did get around to changing that hang-over.

They represent an ideology which says that education should be dispensed in small, digestible packages.

The stop-now-start-again system, defined by the bells, marks a fragmented approach to the learning process as well, an approach which reinforces a purely "academic" education.

And that helps to define people as being real and being themselves only outside of the context of their classroom, lecture hall or place of work.

Some readers may think that drawing attention to the ringing of bells at Victoria College is being petty and superficial.

Of course, it is only a symbol we are attacking.

But if students can organize to force changes in the symbols which govern their education, they will also discover they have the power to effect real changes in nature of their experience at this university.

THE FIFTH COLUMN

By FRANC STURINO

In Monday's Varsity from both the editorial section and letter column came a sigh relief that Hoffman's visit had been conveniently cancelled.

The fact that he would not appear was welcomed primarily on the ground that what he has to say is irrelevant to Canadiana. To this one must ask if the future physical survival of mankind is irrelevant to the Canadian people. Since most of us are part of mankind (unfortunately, there are those among us who are part of pigkind) we can assume that the survival of "Homo sapiens" is indeed relevant.

The fact is that every Canadian, like every human being on the face of this mucked-up, facked-up earth, is faced with one supreme question: To join the Revolutionary Movement and help fight for global social justice and an end to the escalation

"Universities are the key institutions of the Twentieth Century. Not only the functioning of our complex industrial society, but the very survival of civilization, do depend on the knowledge and skills of our universities." Gus Abels and Paul Carson, Editors, U of T Handbook, 1970

"The Second American Revolution is more than 'national'" into World War III: or to suffer the global consequences of self-interest whether on a national level or a personal level, that is, to suffer certain annihilation.

The Second American Revolution is more than a "national" revolution for in its success lies the hope of sensitive men and women throughout the world. In its success lies the hope of an authentic Canadian independence: of ending the domination of the poor by the rich and of quantity over quality (which entails a meaningful re-shuffling of societal priorities so that clean air rules over the buck, humanism over scientific dogma etc.)

The success of the Second American Revolution means the death cry of the American Empire. Hoffman's role for Canada in all this, far from being irrelevant is irrelevant for it is easier to bull-shit about our narrower,

The Movie

The producers of the Claude Bissell Movie, advertised in Monday's issue of The Varsity, wish to make it clear that they are in fact all members of the community of the University of Toronto.

The sponsoring corporations and banks are among the major representatives of the Canadian bourgeoisie whose directors sit on the Board of Governors.

It was the Board of Governors of the university, for instance, which 13 years ago, in 1958, selected Claude Bissell to run the University of Toronto. Today, the Board still has the power to appoint the President, and, from its public statements at least, still intends to exercise it when Bissell leaves next June.

In a little-reported speech this summer, Bissell, speaking to members of the Canadian Life Assurance Association, pointed out that the university is "a strong ally" of business, meeting some of its "major needs."

As for changing the relationships between universities and business:

"I think that the changes in governing structures that are now being advocated will bring the businessman more into the centre of the academic process where his experience and his skill in making decisions will operate in a wider and more influential context."

The latest installment of The Claude Bissell Movie will be screened Friday at 1 p.m. on the back wall of the Students Administrative Council building.

As numbers on computer punch cards? And what price tag does this freak show command? Sums running into the billions and supplied primarily through the god, Pentagon.

And again, who in reality, is the espouser of criminality: Hoffman or Tricky-Dick and his pet pig Agnew, who, not satisfied in murdering Vietnamese have moved into Cambodia and Laos and who on the home front have launched a systematic reign of repression on all dissent — ranging from Dr. Spock and psychedelic rock to the Black Panther Party.

The evidence stands: A choice must be made. There are no sidelines.

If we can do it, why can't they?

I'd like to point out a few implications that can be drawn from Mr. Sheppard's article The Great Clean Air Car Race. It seems strange that a car meeting so-called "standards" for pollution-free exhaust emissions can be produced by a handful of university students and professors in nine months while the president of American Motors has been quoted as declaring a similar machine impossible to produce within five years.

What is General Motors doing with an almost $2 billion profit anyway? Helping us to live a better life no doubt. And even if particulate emission is reduced, that will still leave tremendous amounts of carbon monoxide, nitrous oxide and other gases that will contribute to clean smog.

What is required here is more than the stop-gap solution of reducing automobile pollution, an answer that merely allows the car companies to continue to reap in stupendous profits at the expense of our environment. The whole concept of mass transportation, its necessity and its methods must be reexamined if a permanent solution is to be found.

'We need a new way to pick courses'

Please excuse this rather untidy copy, but, with no secretarial assistance and very little time, I would still like to get this letter to you.

Your article in yesterday's Varsity reports on the current mechanical difficulties of the timetable programming. What concerns me much more than the system's bugs (which can be de-bugged) is the system itself. The curriculum reform resulting from the Macpherson Commission were meant to make course selection more flexible for the students and, presumably, make the content of courses more responsive to student needs.

On both these counts, the new system seems to be falling.
o Course selection, in fact to be more arbitrary since students must give the computer a decision on what they want to take six months later. Their choice must be made before the course union critiques have been published and so have to be based on the often wildly inaccurate calendar description.

The Departments are pressed to make decisions on their own offerings for the coming year long before it is clear who will be teaching.

A personal example will illustrate the problem. The content of the two courses I am giving was worked out this summer in response to the views of the students who took them last year, the interests of some prospective students and my own concerns. Admission to the courses was to be by personal application. Yet I was informed last week that interested students were being turned away because the courses had been filled by pre-registration. Students who wanted to take the courses were prevented from doing so by other students who might well not want to take them, once they found out what they are about!

I am not suggesting that we should scrap either the new programme or the computer. The course selection procedure must, however, allow at least:

o adequate information about the courses

vations about some aspects of EOB schemes does consider that the basic principles of such schemes do have merit and that therefore it is incumbent on the university to ensure that the weaknesses and disadvantages are clearly identified and proper investigation undertaken to determine whether these weaknesses and disadvantages can be eliminated or minimized to the point that the overall concept becomes an acceptable and more equitable alternative to the current student aid program.

Robin Ross,
Vice-President and Registrar.

(Ed. note: While we acknowledge the study group's emphatic opposition to certain aspects of the proposed Bank, such as "full cost" tuition and an all-loan plan for first year students, the acceptance of an all-loan, or contingent repayment assistance program, for second year and beyond was quite clear.

Our primary concern is not the timing out of technical difficulties in the EOB plan but a close examination of its underlying principle: that education is an individual commodity acquired for the purpose of boosting one's income.

that will be taught the next year before students make their decision.

o personal contact between professors and prospective students where a restriction on class size will force some choices to be made between students.

o maximum delay of pre-registration deadlines so that students can make a reasonable choice.

o some provision for students who are not able to get into their preferred courses to establish a worthwhile programme

Marshmallow roast is planned

Five thousand Marshmallows will await the arrival of the students and teachers from the Combined Departments of English this Friday on the Front Campus from six to eight. A marshmallow roast has been planned.

It is the hope of the Departments that the companionship resulting from the close nuzzling of marshmallows (and one another), together with the presentation of a play "ENGLISH MARSHMALLOWS ARE COMING (AND SO ARE THE STUDENTS)" and group singing will lead to a new atmosphere within the Combined Departments of English.

The relationship between students and teachers and the status of students within the Combined Departments will be altered during the course of the evening. It is believed that final examinations will be abolished in all courses offered by the Combined Departments in order that true learning can begin with the resumption of classes next week.

The principal justification for the evening is to create a pleasant occasion and to allow members of the Combined Departments of English to become aware of one another. It is sincerely hoped that they will not become aware of their collective power in the process. Anyone who takes or teaches a course in English is Welcome and Expected.

Here's why you should study Sanskrit

Jeff Masson, an assistant professor in the Department of East Asian Studies, this fall starts a course in Spoken Sanskrit, EAS 110, the first of its kind to be offered at U of T.

By JEFF MASSON

If a student is interested in modern literature, literary criticism and comparative literature, why on earth should he study Sanskrit? Will not the Sanskritists be the first to have their fat little asses put up against the wall, studying, as they do, a dead past with no possible relevance? Indeed they will, cranky carry-overs from the last century with no life in the real world of today.

That is the problem: Sanskrit studies at present is over-run with a group of reactionary, backward-looking, up-tight, career-heads who can't stand the joyous side of Sanskrit literature. That is precisely why I am writing this article. Because I want to convince people, young students who are not like this and never could be, that they must enter a field like this to save what is there from being lost.

And there is a lot there. Consider what most modern scholars of Sanskrit will never touch: The whole Tantric tradition. Over fifty thousand manuscripts, as yet unseen, unread, untranslated. Buried away there are ideas of enormous interest, not only to students of comparative religion, but to psychologists and historians of culture. One British scholar of the last century (almost) called it "The most loathsome, disgusting, anti-Christ material I have ever seen". With a build-up like that, its got to be good!

The material is there, its richness defies description, and almost all of it is yet untapped. And Tantrism is just one area of research that has been neglected. Consider the fact that Sanskrit love poetry, perhaps the most elaborate in world literature, has never been seriously dealt with. The most famous work of erotic literature, the Amarusataka, 100 verses dealing with sexual love, has never been translated into English except in ponies. It is a simple poem, that any student should be able to read after one or two years of Sanskrit. If a good modern poet would take the trouble to learn Sanskrit, he would have at his disposal an entirely new world of poetry. Students of English often complain to me that their advisers force on them the least interesting topics for their Ph.D. dissertations, claiming that everything good has already been written to death. Then why do they not turn their attention to Sanskrit, where a tradition even richer than that which exists in English still awaits serious and sympathetic attention?

Consider the fact that not a single Sanskrit play has ever been translated into an English that any of you would want to read. And yet some of the most beautiful plays in world literature have been written in Sanskrit between the second and the twelfth century A.D. And many of them are simple and short. Consider the tragic Urubhanga, a one-act play ascribed to the first Indian drama artist whose works have survived, Bhasa of the second or third century A.D. It is a beautiful piece, less than ten pages long, written in simple and austere Sanskrit. With just two years of Sanskrit, a good poet would be able to translate this into modern English for the first time. Present Sanskritists just can't seem to do this. They are out of touch with the language as it is really spoken today.

And the verses are not only exquisitely beautiful, they are completely anti-establishment. For while all other Sanskrit poetry dealt with the lives of the rich, these poems deal with the love lives of villagers.

Then think of the millions of stories, so bizarre that they even seem surrealistic to us today, yet with profound philosophical implications: tales from the Mahabharata about butchers who see the truth whenever they cut up an animal without hatred, stories from the Yogavasisthamaharamayana (surely the greatest collection of philosophic tales in world literature), where, in the twelfth century, a man runs away into the forest, stumbles into a sun-beam, and creates a whole new universe there. Ten generations later one of his descendants discovers the truth, that we are always dreaming within a dream, and the man is once again running through the forest.

In many of the pieces I read, I realize with a strange sensation, that I am probably the first Westerner to look at this material. For example, nobody seems to have noted the following exquisite verse, from a little-known tenth century collection:

"When my lover returns to me, I shall do things to him that nobody has ever heard of before.

Like water vanishing into the clay of a new earthen pot,

I will dissolve my entire body into his."

In what other tradition can one look at a beautiful poem that only a handful of people have ever seen?

Of course you cannot have access to this material unless you are willing to do at least two years of hard work at Sanskrit. It is true that Sanskrit is a tough language, but not really much more difficult than, say, German. If students in the past have not been able to learn a significant amount in two years, it is because of the teaching methods.

In my first year course in Sanskrit, emphasis will be upon spoken Sanskrit (the idea being that the more you use a language, the more you will learn of it). Tapes will be used a well. The course will not be easy (you have really got to work at it if you want to learn anything significant) but it will, I think, repay those serious students who want to be able to look at something entirely new, and something in which they can find ideas that are only now becoming current in the West. I hope that my first year course will attract such students.

Stop Spadina in debt, near bankruptcy

By MICHAEL MAZUREK
The Stop Spadina Committee is going bankrupt and is in danger of folding. Some $1400 in debt, the Committee has been unable to attract grants from such institutions as the U of T Urban Affairs department to continue to finance its campaign.

This news that SSSOCCC may collapse is disturbing in light of recent indications that victory is within sight.
The Stop Spadina group has, since its inception a year ago, raised considerable question as to the desirability of urban expressways in general, and of Spadina in particular.

An inkling that this campaign is beginning to bear fruit came last week when Metro Council appealed to the Ontario Municipal Board for the additional $66 million required to complete the freeway. Much to Metro's dismay, the OMB ruled that the Council would have to convince the Board at a public hearing of the expediency of Spadina before any further money is doled out.

At this point, then, Metro is left with two unattractive options. It can accept the OMB decision and attempt to defend its position at a hearing where the anti-expressway forces, led by SSSOCCC, interested citizens and lawyer J. Robinette, will be free to present the armada of anti-Spadina arguments which have surfaced in the past year. Or it can take its case to the Court of Appeals, and try to have the OMB ruling rescinded.

In view of these developments, it seems most inappropriate that Stop Spadina's campaign should fizzle out just when its opponents are on the ropes. However, it is likely that this will be the case unless sales of posters and booster buttons pick up remarkably.

Faculty moonlighting report completed

By BOB GAUTHIER
A report on faculty "moonlighting" has finally been completed. It has not been made public.
Prof. John Crispo, Chairman of the Committee on Supplementary Income and Related Activities, said Monday that the report had been turned over to the Central Budget Committee and the Association of the Teaching Staff.

Crispo said he would "defend" the report when it was made public. He also commented that "It was very frustrating, as are many other matters at the university".

Prof. J. M. Rist, Chairman of the ATS said Monday that the report is now in the hands of Prof. D. F. Forster, Chairman of the Central Budget Committee, who has just returned from Tanzania. Rist said that "a decision will be made" after Forster has read the report.

Among the issues concerning the committee are payments for academic and administrative work during the summer, consulting and other outside income, and the consequent effect on teaching. The committee was set up by the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Budget and the ATS.

Five-year delay

Calgary day care conflict

CALGARY (CUP) — The steering committee for day care at the University of Calgary have asked that the provincial government's social development department appoint a mediator in the dispute between the committee and board of governors within a week.

Five years of lobbying and committee work on day care facilities at the Calgary campus have yet to yield any concrete results. The committee has asked U of C administration president A. W. R. Carrothers and the governors to approve use of a dining lounge now used as one of many faculty cafeterias.

"It is not a matter that can be put off year after year at the convenience of university governments," the steering group said. Day care setups allow students and staff women to continue with their education or job without being tied down to children all day, or worrying about the expensive and erratic supervision of babysitters.

Last year at the University of Toronto the same issue exploded into the first occupation of Simcoe Hall. The Toronto uprising forced Claude Bissell to accede to demands for funds to cover the cost of renovations to the old house which was purchased to house the day care facilities.

Loan plan favored

The Economic Council of Canada in a report issued Monday came out strongly in favour of an Educational Opportunity Bank scheme.
EOB, which was approved both by a council of provincial ministers of education and a study group headed by U of T Registrar Robin Ross last summer, would replace the present part loan, part grant student aid system with an all-loan scheme.
The loan would be paid back through an income tax surcharge placed on the borrower.
The Council also recommended a higher proportion of university costs be covered by tuition fees.

In some situations, to worship means sitting as spectators to a musical variety show, or it means being dominated for an hour by a minister or priest. In University Lutheran Chapel, a dozen or more people are directly involved in leading and serving the people. Moreover, the entire congregation participates in the drama and music of worship to an unusual degree.

Some will ask "why worship at all?" Many activists and protesters might well feel they are doing more for their fellow man. Larry Martin, the University Chaplain for the Lutheran Church and Pastor of the Chapel, would agree such activities are very important. He, in fact, has often risked his life and family welfare fighting for civil rights movements and for more human campus administration and learning.

But worship in the sense of the bowing of heart, mind, and spirit in adoration of Christ is the most important single act. This is more difficult than protest and demonstration, or mere passivism. As one educated as a psychologist and theologian, Larry Martin can say that more identity crises are solved in worship here described than in merely negative or passive roles. Indeed, worship in this sense could well be the first place one loses his life to Christ in order to gain a new identity marked by health, wholeness, and power.

The Chapel is open daily for meditation, coffee, study, ping pong, chess, etc., or conversation with students and Pastor.

To go stereo

Radio Varsity wants $

Radio Varsity has asked SAC to allocate $26,800 for two new sound systems designed to improve sound quality as well as audience size.

At present it operates on a closed-circuit system to most cafeterias and common rooms throughout the campus. However the system is now obsolete due to the poor quality of transmission and the lack of private listeners. To save itself from total extinction Radio Varsity needs money for two new sound systems.

One is carrier-current, which operates over standard telephone and electrical wiring. It allows most large residences on campus to receive transmissions to their common rooms and cafeterias, while also permitting private reception.

The second expenditure would be for new stereo transmission equipment ($18,800 needed) for the station's city broadcasting via Roger's Cable FM. This would permit it to compete with other city stations, all transmitting in stereo. (Stereo provides better quality sound and also tends to attract advertisers, who desire the best quality sound to sell their products.)

California capitalists get revolution-shelter

SAN FRANCISCO — West Coast businessmen can rest easier these days. There will be someplace for them to hide the next time there's a riot.

Belkins Moving and Storage Co. announced June 25 it had purchased a 200-acre site 250 miles south of San Francisco where it will build a $10 million bomb-proof shelter for corporate executives in case they have to flee the cities in event of insurrections.

Turkey shoot bags man

IZMIR, Turkey (Cup) — A youth watching a cowboy film in Izmir, Turkey, pulled out a pistol and said: "That's not the way you shoot, man. This is how you do it." He fired, and the man in the next seat collapsed. The man was taken to hospital in critical condition. The youth was arrested. Police quoted him as saying: "Those cowboys in the film could not handle a pistol properly."

The shelter, 40 feet underground, will start being constructed next year. It will have all necessary facilities for living as well as a surgical room, dentist's office, morgue, recreation facilities, library and two computers. There will also be space to store business records.

All told, the shelter will be able to accommodate 1000 executives for up to 30 days.

MAY 1968: A PARIS BARRICADE. A red flag. A beer advertisement. Gas-mask handkerchiefs and goggles. A medic in the rear. Even staid publishers cash in on photos like this: titillating glimpses of heady spectacle. But observe: the actors do not show off for you. This unposed photo presents an integral moment of the scenario of a daring struggle to acquire state power and distribute it among popular councils. "The more I make love, the more I want to make revolution — the more I make revolution, the more I want to make love" (writing on a Sorbonne wall). The scenarios for the two activities are interrelated, and are contrapuntal to C. Wright Mills' remark that private troubles mask public issues. The scenario potentials of affection and eroticism will be held to a grotesque and often perverse sector of fools' liberty within a sea of exploitative repression, will remain a force for privatization and privation, as long as the deepest needs which can unite people do not become the effective ends and, to a great extent, the means of everyday "politics."

the world...

The Varsity — Errol Young

“We seem to have entered an era in which the human dramatic potential is to be realized foremostly in life, and for life”

-- Lee Baxandall

In the streets of Paris, of Chicago, of Prague, in campuses in almost every country in the world, on subways, in factories, in high schools, even in that centre of power and wealth the New York Stock Exchange, a new form of theatre has been developed, theatre which is created by the actors themselves, and which arises from the events around them, and which takes place everywhere, rather than in the hallowed walls of the auditorium.

It is the appearance of this type of theatre, which some have devised as a theory put into action, and others have just done out of frustration, which gives one hope, both as a person who dearly loves theatre, and as someone who sees the need for revolution in this country and elsewhere.

If theatre has moved from the auditoriums of the world into the streets, from the imitations of acts to real acts, what role is there for those of us who want both to work in theatre, and also to help create the change we feel is necessary? If the demonstrations and actions of the last couple of years can be described as theatre, then where do the playwright, the director, scene designer, technician and actor belong?

It would seem, at first glance, that they have nothing to do except join the struggle in the streets, and create theatre there, moving from unreality to reality, from the reflection of reality to reality itself. But most theatre people are involving themselves in the perpetuation of a system many want to change. They involve themselves in the producing of the spectacle, reinforcing what needs to be changed. Yet the alternative seems to be a denial of everything we have learned, or want to do.

I think the answer lies in the development of theatre which understands that the action is not on the stage but in real life, and that it is there that the theatre must go. It should reveal to the audience the world around them, demand they act, and enter the world itself to learn, and to teach. The theatre can no longer imitate reality, but must show up reality so people may understand rather than accept the world they are in. Today, life is the real drama, both because of the need to act and because of its insanity, and so it is in life that the action must take place.

Political theatre today is an attempt to help create a revolution by developing people's consciousness both individually and collectively. It gives us the will to act both as members of the audience and as members of a theatre troupe in our day to day work and in our struggle to gain power for ourselves.

The role of those in theatre, who are trained in that profession, is to use their knowledge and experience to create theatre everywhere. Brecht, in the Messingkauf Dialogues, explains why theatre as a profession rather than a way of life is necessary:

Actor: But isn't it essential to raise the theatre above the level of the street, and give its playing a particular stamp, since it doesn't in fact take place in the street or by accident and isn't performed by amateurs or occasioned by some incident?

Philosopher: The factors you mention raise it as much as it needs, I'd say. All these differences between theatre and street scene ought to be particularly emphasized. . . . But however clearly you differentiate the two kinds of demonstration, something of the everyday one's function is bound to be carried over into the theatrical. And it's precisely by underlining the element of difference, of professionalism, preparation and so on that you keep this function fresh.

This is not to deny that the spontaneous theatre of the streets is not theatre, but rather to show that it is possible to use "professional" theatre to reach people and lead them to act.

It has been argued that all theatre is political, and certainly to the extent that theatre either challenges or reinforces the status quo, it is political. But that definition is somewhat too simplistic since the form, the content and the manner of presentation all make a play an active piece of political theatre rather than a passive one. The ultimate political theatre is the one that gets people out of their seats, or wherever, and into the streets, demanding control over their own lives.

Brecht, Artaud and Hoffman all indicate ways in which this can be done. By combining their ideas we can develop a political theatre which uses all forms, including many of the plays which have been written, and which at present are being used to reinforce the status quo.

It would be insane to ignore the old masterpieces, most of which were produced at moments of change in their society. It would be equally insane to ignore the old theories and old methods of theatre. Where, for example, would the San Francisco Mime Troupe be without Commedia? These works must be placed in a context which does not allow the audience to watch them as that, but instead be confronted with their meaning in the context of today. Brecht, who fortunately had little reverence for the text, said:

What really matters is to play those old works historically, which means setting them in powerful contrast to our own times. For it is only against the background of our time that their shape emerges as an old shape, and without this background, I doubt if they could have any shape at all.

In other words, the plays must be presented so their context is understood, both historically and now, not as museum pieces but something living which have something to say about our times.

Before going much further we must examine the whole phenomenon of spectacle, which is such an important part of our culture. Today's theatre, the theatre of Broadway and its carbon copies across the continent, the theatre of television, of Hollywood movies, and of all the various forms of entertainment which are supplied allow the population to sit back in their comfortable chairs, cling to whatever drug we are hooked on, and see in the hero much of ourselves. We identify with the hero, and cannot therefore see the whole. Because of our identification, we receive some form of catharsis at the climax and then sink back into our chairs and relax, not having any reason to act.

This feeling is reinforced by the knowledge that it is all a play anyway. We can live vicariously on the products of the culture and the media men, having our interests in anything out of the ordinary, anything mildly dangerous, anything demanding curiosity, met without ever having taken part in the actual experience and discovering the reality of the experience. Instead, someone interprets for so there is no room for imagination. There is someone telling us what to perceive, what to think, showing us there is always a hero who can do the dirty work and take the cuffs, giving us emotions without having to feel them.

It used to be bread and circuses which kept the populace down, now its beer, dope and 007. The methods are the same. Give the plebs something to identify with, let them enjoy the thrill of an experience without experiencing it, either physically or imaginatively. That'll keep them quiet.

In an article in the Tulane Drama Review (44) on political theatre, a gentleman called Lee Baxandall has come up with one of the best analyses of modern political theatre. I have read and he concentrates on the concept of spectacle. He puts his finger on the problem we are continually faced with:

Empathy and catharsis permit the public vicariously to live and fearlessly to purge their curiosity about the most dangerous kinds of denied experience. The spectacle of allowing the imaginative events to be staged, shown or written about meanwhile builds the reputation of government for liberality and stability. Finally, a flourishing culture scene comes to appear to the great majority as the sole terrain for serious practice of human aesthetic capacity. This illusion diverts many radicals as well from realizing the aesthetic dimension of their politics.

Today's theatre, dominated by the technique of naturalism and much influenced by Aristotle, plays into the hands of those who do not want change. And we in the theatre aid the rather than counter that. While theatre becomes more explicit in terms of sex and nudity, the basic premises are still there. The audience are observers, nowadays often voyeurs. Art for art's sake separates the artist from his fellow men, rather than letting him use his talent to turn his and others' lives into an art.

The theatre is separated like all art and artistic facsimile, from people in general, and while certain methods of presentation are maintained that separation will continue, despite outward "involvement." For that "involvement" is in fact still just part of the spectacle.

It is the fusion that we want.

Thus, Hair, one of Toronto's great successes, can be dismissed as nothing more than a put on. The original attempt to present on stage something of the world of the hippie was soon absorbed into all the old games of "success", of box office receipts and of being an "in" affair. Once again the media men had found a spectacle to discuss people, this time at the expense of exploiting a movement which is/was attempting to develop new methods of living in the world.

So a Toronto junior executive can go watch the hippies in their cage, maybe see a little harmless nudity, and if he really digs it, go up and join in. But it is illusory. He is still observing. And he is being manipulated, because, in fact he really is not part of the action of the play.

And he knows the whole thing is operating in the same way as any Royal Alex production. As Rubin says, "A communist ethic built upon a capitalist base" becomes part of the spectacle, and in many ways is more dangerous than the more blatant forms.

We all need what spectacle seems to offer us — mystery, excitement, real life, creativity, Artaud's "superior and heroic attitude" — we all have that craving to be part of a full and rich life, to be actors in it. Today those needs are answered by supplying the ultimate in experiences without ever having to experience them. It is more subtle than the Nuremberg rallies of Nazism, but in fact is the same thing. Baxandall says that spectacle is used to give multitudes the illusion of participating in a dramaturgy which would realize their potential, that is, involvement in a show, rather than the real thing, so people remain puppets.

The Church is another organization that over the centuries has used spectacle with similar effectiveness. Even the hierarchical rituals of businesses and educational institutions play the same role. Give people an illusion of being human beings, and they will be so busy in it, that they will never have a chance to examine the whole of the picture. Today's theatre, today's culture, today's art all reinforce this.

Artaud's comprehension of what was needed, combined with the Yippie's ability to turn his dreams into a reality, has produced the beginnings of the type of theatre which involves the full potential of people, and the full potential of theatre. It is not for nothing that the chapter on Chicago in Revolution for the Hell of It carries the following quote:

Theatre of Cruelty proposes to resort to a mass spectacle; to seek in agitation of tremendous masses, convulsed and hurled against each other a little of that poetry of festivals and crowds when, all too rarely nowadays, the people pour out into the streets. . . . The theatre must give us everything that is in crime, love, war or madness if it wants to recover its necessity. . . . We want to create a believable reality which gives the heart and senses that kind of concrete bite which all true sensation requires. . . . We wish to address the entire organism through an intensive mobilization of objects, gestures and signs, used in a new spirit. The Theatre of Cruelty has been created in order to restore a passionate and convulsive conception of life and it is in this sense of violent rigor and extreme condensation of scenic elements that the cruelty on which it is based must be understood. This cruelty, which will be bloody when necessary but not systematically so, can thus be identified with a kind of severe moral purity which is not afraid to pay life the price it must be paid.

But, of course, it is not as simple as that, especially when one is attempting to maintain other forms of theatre as well. And that is why the combination of the above and Brecht is such an exciting concept, even if it seems somewhat contradictory. The Yippies, in a world where Brecht said "not fulfilment of desire but forgetfulness passes for wisdom" have refused to forget, and they refuse to let other people forget.

In fact they force people to confront their lives, and they show people how to live lives which begin to reach towards Artaud. They are revealing the "links in the chain" that bind us, not all of them to be sure, but enough to show the chain exists.

In Canada we must also show the links. Because our culture is a colonial culture, derivative and only a pale imitation lacking the more obvious contradictions of the Empire itself (Vietnam, ghettos etc) the uses of theatre are somewhat different. And, in fact, we have the opportunity to be more flexible.

That is why it is possible to link Brecht, Artaud and the Yippies. Brecht, like Artaud, would not or could not put into practice his theories. (How much it was his own inability, how much the pressures of a state fast moving towards the worst form of Stalinism we shall never know.)

But, in a generation which has grown up in affluence, under the threat of the bomb, through the insanities of the cold war, and, most important, with the television as a noisy witness to the world, his theories now seem possible, and in fact one can go beyond them. Linking his theories with Artaud, conceivably his antithesis 50 years ago, seems to me eminently sane.

What then, can we deduce from these two, to make a new political theatre?

- An enjoyment of life and of people. Not a cynical appraisal of the world's insanity but real enjoyment which comes from being in the middle of it all, which makes people laugh and act, rather than sneer and dismiss.

- A demand for imagination from everyone, rather than the offer of illusion which asks nothing more than gullibility.

- A recognition that the actor is a human being. Says Brecht:

His actors weren't waiters who must serve up the meat and have their private, personal feelings treated as gross importunities. They were servants neither of the writer nor of the audience. His actors weren't officials of a political movement, and they weren't high priests of art. Their job as political human beings was to use art or anything else to further their social cause.

- A refusal to offer the audience a way out. Brecht's theory of alienation refused the simplicity of empathy and catharsis. Artaud demands a theatre which is whole. Together they demand "a theatre of the man who has begun to help himself."

- A desire to move into all realms of consciousness and use all forms of art to do it.

- A willingness to act everywhere, and not to use "art" as an excuse not to act when action is necessary, as the Living did during the People's Park struggle.

- Theatre belongs everywhere because life should be theatre and theatre should be life.

- A theatre troupe has to attempt to organize itself as well as other people. It is no good trying to change other people if the way you operate is what you preach against. As the Yippies have it — "Live the revolution, now."

Once again it is Baxandall who defines what must be done:

Dramaturgy retains its dictionary sense: "the art of making dramas and placing them properly on the stage; dramatic composition and representation." We add that the world stage takes precedence and that most human beings freed of spectacle obsequy, could well compose and realize in activity their root nature. Radical is thus to be understood in its original sense: "going to the roots". Class domination and its spectacle society sharply frustrate, pervert your root potential. If overcoming this material and psychological alienation requires a role condemned by spectacle managers as "radical", that is "extremist", take heart in knowing the spectacle oddity to be the authentic extremist: alienated most radically from his humanity. Activity in our sense is therefore not a mere expenditure of energy in movement, but a unification of theory and sensuous conduct, a praxis, a free intelligent activity: a performance of capabilities, taking into account all biological and social data, which ignores no biological and social potential.

The dramaturgy is realized in scenarios, which are — rather like the improvisa of the commedia dell'arte — projected and agreed beforehand in part, and in part created as opportunities and fortuities arise in performance. . . . Needs and capabilities are transposed to interactive expression by an invention of specifics which strive towards universality."

Practically, how does one go about putting these theories and precepts into practice? The alternatives range from handing out TTC transfers to anyone who wants them (it's amazing how people love it, they feel so brave taking them, and the straightest middle class couple will soon catch on to the insanity of a public transport system for which you have to pay), to copying the yippies and throwing small bills down into the stock exchange (and as the brokers grovelled said one visitor from Missouri "I've been throwing money away in New York for five days now. This is sure of a hell of a lot quicker and much more fun; he understood) to a full scale production in the parks, factories and schools of the city.

Theatre can go far in showing the absurdity of a situation. A careful group analysis of a structure, and then an attack on the most vulnerable point to reveal the structures one is caught in, and the absurdity of it all. At the University of Alberta in Edmonton the local Students for a Democratic University created a whole scenario that included 25 freaks running for the position of council president. At a university which regards student council elections with much the same solemnity and froufrou as our neighbours to the south regard the election of a president, such an action quickly showed up the absurdity of a struggle for power which did not exist.

Other theatre can be small playlets in the streets, plays about whatever issues seems important, be it the grape boycott, abortion, Vietnam, pollution or whatever. People react when suddenly confronted with a woman dying of an abortion, or GIs murdering Vietnamese, egged on by big business, or someone polluting the sidewalk very obviously.

This type of theatre is most effective and was, and still is, being used in France since the revolt in May 1968. It confronts the people in the streets with theatre, a surprise because one is not attending a ceremony but instead people are acting before one's very eyes. In addition it brings into reality much of which is repressed, because there is a feeling of powerlessness when it is considered. These plays almost invariably produce a reaction. This normally leads to discussion, and from there an opening towards real action. And these short playlets can be the foundations for more ambitious projects which any theatre troupe can do, and with a small stage do anywhere.

"Let people see theatre," says San Francisco Mime Troupe founder Ronnie Davis, "They may like it."

It is in the Mime Troupe that the answer to political theatre lies. That troupe has been engaged in evolving a political theatre that is theatre at all levels, and which allows both actor (in the classical sense) and audience to act when necessary. The troupe, along with many of the rock bands (another whole area of theatre I would love to discuss, but no room and no time) have been at the head of much of the action on the West Coast. They began in 1963 or '64, long before the hippies had appeared, and just at the beginning of the development of the New Left political movement in the U.S.

Even given the differences in climate, culture and temperament, the beginning in '63 of the Mime Troupe and its effectiveness show that in Canada just such another troupe could be as effective, in fact, more than one.

The Mime Troupe, rejecting aid from foundations and other money brokers, took a form of commedia dell'arte into the parts of San Francisco.

They were faced with an audience which ranged from "non/intimidated 10 year olds to society matrons, in competition with dogs, birds, bells and city traffic," but the experience of people discovering that it was possible to see live human beings performing before their very eyes, as opposed to a television screen created a theatre which was both effective, and a joyful experience for both actor and audience.

The simplicity of the props, costumes and stage made it possible to reach an audience who would have been neutral (if not hostile) to the theatre presented in the mausoleums of art dotted around the continent.

They were not setting themselves apart from the audience, but instead offering to become one with them.

What can be said for the parks, can equally be said for anywhere else. The actual problems may differ (e.g. skepticism in factories, lack of concentration in high schools etc etc.) but the demands are the same. And because of those demands, and because it rejects the old definitions, and demands of everyone similar concentration and effort, the load has to be shared:

Only in the most loosely ordered, free swinging, direct structure is it possible to keep the interest of the non-organizational man and avoid falling into the posture of institutions. And distance between "management and labor" is death. If the director isn't pushing the broom the lead actor gets sore; at the same time, whilst pushing the broom the director begins to learn about the actor who is holding the dust pan.

Chaos must rule — anarchy within a framework. An idea can come from the least expected source. With a loosely ordered framework, one can hear the timid voices. A small rambling group can manoeuvre itself when an emergency call; a direct-action group can maintain its spontaneity more easily than a well-structured large organization.

Brecht and Artaud indicate the form and the content, the Yippies the immediacy of now and how, and the San Francisco Mime Troupe show us where theatre as a profession can be used. This essay is an attempt to sketch the beginnings of a theory which, if put into practice will become a theatre which allows aesthetic radicals to be political, political radicals to be aesthetic, and for everyone to make the revolution politically and aesthetically, because that is the only one that is going to work.

NOTICE OF ELECTION

LIBRARY COUNCIL

Nominations Open to 11.59a.m. Wednesday 14th October. Voting Wednesday 31st. October

Constituencies

Elected Representatives of the full-time Teaching Staff

(Members to serve for a three-year term not immediately renewable) 3 Members from each of: Humanities, Social Sciences, Physical Sciences, Life Sciences.

NOTE

It should be understood by members of the teaching staff elected to the Library Council that at the first meeting of the Council the elected members will be asked to select by lot those who will serve for one, two or three years. Those members asked to serve for a one-year period will be eligible for re-election for a full three-year term in 1971. Those asked to serve for a two-year period will not be immediately eligible for re-election. The reason for this arrangement is the wish to establish continuity of membership within the Library Council.

Elected Representatives of Students

(Members to serve for a one-year term, twice renewable)

1 Student from each of the Divisions of the School of Graduate Studies a) Humanities, b) Social Sciences, c) Physical Sciences, d) Life Sciences

Goin' Down: the outcast East and a feeling for Canada

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

Goin' Down the Road is not the very first Canadian feature film. But it is the very best.

After a glut of slushy porno-flicks and lifeless NFB sleepers, moviegoers can finally sit back and thoroughly enjoy a Canadian film that deals intellectually and emotionally with fictional material.

The focus is on Toronto, with its alluring pseudo-psychedelic Yonge Street lights, and timeworn downtown flophouses. Peter (Doug McGrath) and Joey (Paul Bradley), two Maritimers, have just arrived in the City of Opportunities, in the Province of Second Chances. Like so many high-school dropouts before them, they eagerly comb the want-ads for firms in search of $20,000-a-year executives. A few days later Joey finds them a job lugging cases in a soft-drink bottling plant.

AS THE MONTHS pass, Peter finally sees the reality of their situation: nothing has changed — the treadmill is just that much bigger now. But Joey has other things on his mind. He must marry his pregnant girlfriend, Betty (Jane Eastwood), and try to make three live as cheaply as two.

A biting Toronto winter sets in. The plant cuts production. Lay-offs. Eviction. Poverty. It is not long before Peter and Joey, having tried both legal and illegal ways to make ends meet, find themselves once again goin' down the road.

THE THEME of the foreigner, the little man, the outcast caught in the wheels of society has been the subject of all kinds of films from Chaplin to Midnight Cowboy. What makes this picture so appealing and unique is the unmistakably Canadian flavour of the plot, and, above all, the unnerving realism of the central characters.

Actors McGrath and Bradley in appearance and mannerism are the perfect Nova Scotians. Armed with William Freut's unusually true-to-life dialogue they appear to be recreating not so much a fictional story as one of their own past experiences. The illusion is further intensified by the sensitive and accurate camerawork of Richard Leiterman.

UNTIL NOW, Canada's film industry has received praise almost exclusively for such documentary pictures as A Married Couple and A Place To Stand. The man who will probably be responsible for changing all this is the producer-director of Goin' Down the Road, Don Shebib.

Shebib, a Toronto resident and U of T graduate, received his M.A. in film from UCLA in 1965. Unlike many members of the entertainment industry, he did not find the United States especially inviting or promising, and decided to return to Canada.

"There's more of a chance here", believes Shebib, "and it's much easier to get started. There isn't really all that much film-making to be done in the States. Educational TV has opened up some opportunities for the documentary, but other than that there is nothing at all. Period. Flat. Nothing exists. Nothing at all".

WORKING HERE has satisfied Shebib in terms of both quality and quantity. His material, which includes documentary films on surfers, revival preachers, a basketball team, a motorcycle gang and war veterans, has been seen on CBC's Telescope and The Way It Is. Goin' Down the Road, Shebib's twentieth film, is also his first venture into fiction.

The eight-weeks' shooting for this film was spent entirely on location here in Toronto. Shebib took his cameras to a Wilson's bottling factory, all along Yonge Street and inside a real house on Pembroke Street. The scene in the park with the folk-singers and bums is one of the parts that makes Goin' Down the Road so fascinating. It was absolutely real.

"I saw these kids sitting in the park playing the guitar", Shebib recalls, "so I went over and said,

'Hey I'll give you fifty bucks to play your guitar in my film'. They said, 'Okay'. And the three actors, two guys and the girl, and these other three or four guys and their girls showed up, and they started singing. My actors were so good they just melted into the scene. They didn't at all stand out as actors.

"THE BUMS JUST CAME over on their own. They were totally oblivious to the whole thing, and just kept walking along and jumped into the scene. There's always an awful lot of luck in that kind of shooting and you generally pick up lots of things on the way.

"There may be things that are wrong or amateurish about the film, but it is real and honest. It's so real sometimes that you think it's a documentary, and half the people who have seen the film think that these were real Maritimers. Or they think all the dialogue was improvised.

"Every scene, except for the one with the bums in the park and the scene where the waiter tells Peter and Joey to keep their language down, was all written word for word. Because the actors were so natural, people say my film has a documentary flavour to it".

IT IS JUST this sort of action, whether staged or genuine, that Shebib tries to capture in his work. "The last thing I want to make is something 'hip' or 'in'. I'm looking mainly for atmosphere through films about social outcasts, out-and-out rebels, or people who are just laughed at by everybody else. It was a general sort of feeling, rather than a message, that I wanted to convey".

The Varsity — Errol Young

Goin' Down the road has also been a shot in the arm for Bruce Cockburn, who wrote the haunting title song and scored the entire picture. "I told Bruce what I wanted and we worked pretty closely", says Shebib. "A lot of music he had to do was kind of crummy music, but it was supposed to be crummy. It was rock n' roll of the 50's, the kind of stuff Peter and Joey would listen to and play most of the time. But with the other music he had a fairly free hand".

Shebib is eagerly awaiting the October premiere of his film in New York, but is not at all sure what the reaction will be. He hasn't had "anything less than a rave review" from Canadian newspapers and magazines, but "the American critics could rip it to pieces".

"IF IT'S SUCCESSFUL in New York it goes somewhere else", explains Shebib, "but if it dies, well... That will be the first real test of the film.

"In any case I don't see any identification problem with Peter and Joey. These could be people from Appalachia. You can't find people more alike than Kentuckians, West Virginians and Maritimers. They're all hillbillies in essence."

For his next film Shebib has again decided to collaborate with William Freut and examine another social castaway, the shiftless teenager. His upcoming movies, given the impetus and drive of Goin' Down the Road, will no doubt be instrumental in making the future Canadian feature film a credit, rather than an embarrassing blunder.

COC's Traviata: no cinema verité, but beautifully sung

By TONY JAHN

How does one go about writing a "rave review"? The thesaurus lists only so many synonyms for "good", and they all apply to Saturday's premiere of Verdi's La Traviata.

Unlike Don Giovanni, this work hinges on three characters only, and the COC wisely chose three outstanding singers to carry the production. Violetta Valery was sung by Urszula Koszut, the Polish soprano who premiered last year in Toronto as Gilda in Rigoletto. Her voice is a strong, pearly ringing soprano, reminiscent of Leontyne Price. Alfredo Germont, as sung by tenor John Arab was powerful and always in tune. In quality, his voice was somewhat less pleasing, but his duets with Miss Koszut were always exciting.

Must have the mightiest vocal delivery in the Opera Company. His is a tremendous sustained baritone that, complement by Miss Koszut made last year's Rigoletto an international success. As Giorgio Valery, Quilico's vocal talents and imposing stage presence completed the perfect trio of the production.

I suppose one can always find some shortcomings in any production. The violins of the orchestra were often out of tune, especially in exposed passages such as the opening of Act IV. Also, the acting abilities of Miss Koszut and Mr.

Arab seemed limited, especially in comparison to their vocal power. The dance production number in Act III was whimsically choreographed, since the dancers were doing Spanish dances to Italian tarantelles.

Those who love good singing and beautiful music should see "La Traviata". While the story and acting is no stage attempt at "cinema verité", this is a strong musical production, imaginatively staged, beautifully sung. Student standby tickets are available for $2.00 on the night of performance, at the box office.

Mink masquerade for Mozart

Dowagers come to see Don Giovanni prance

By TONY JAHN

As a social event, first night at the Opera is always an unqualified success. Friday's Canadian Opera Company opening at O'Keefe Centre with Mozart's Don Giovanni was no exception. The mink masquerade was complete with wrinkled dowagers, shiny young escorts in tow, stumbling through the darkened aisles to the final strains of the overture.

For those who went to see the opera, it was a generally rewarding evening. Don Giovanni is a difficult work to stage. It is a longish opera, with a preponderance of bass roles. Librettist Lorenzo da Ponte designates it a "dramma giocoso", and for three hours "Don Giovanni" must hover between slapstick comedy and tragedy with overtones of a morality play. Allowing the "Punch and Judy" element to obscure the tragic implications of the story is an easy way out of this dilemma.

Creditably, stage director Herman Geiger-Torel maintained the stability of the opera though at the cost of rather static stage action, especially in the first act. Working within a rigid choreography, the ensemble performed well together. The colourful costumes compensated for the sparse, two-dimensional set which served as back-drop for both acts.

Musically the opera was satisfying, this in spite of the O'Keefe orchestra pit's notorious habit of swallowing orchestras alive. In ensemble arias such as the closing sextet, orchestra and soloists achieved an ideal synthesis of instrumental and vocal sound.

Justino Diaz as Don Giovanni was exciting both in stage presence and vocal ability. A soloist with the Met, Mr. Diaz was on familiar terms with his role. Complemented by the almost flawless soprano of Heather Thomson as Donna Elvira, he could have carried the production alone by the sheer strength and clarity of his voice. Leporello was sung by Jan Rubes who seems most at home in this type of basso buffo role. His patter-songs came off in spite of a tongue-twisting English translation, and his acting ability compensated for a diminished vocal strength.

Eileen Schauler as Donna Anna fared rather poorly. Admittedly this is a difficult role, and no one can be expected to grieve credibly for three hours. Vocally, however, her range is also limited. Some coloratura passages were hooted rather than sung, and even this out of tune. Garnet Brooks as Don Ottavio possesses a strong tenor but in quality it is harsh and ill-suited for bel canto arias. He also suffered from intonation problems which were especially distinct in contrast to Mr. Diaz and Miss Thomson's performances.

Gwenlynn Little as Zerlina and Claude Corbeil as Masetto provided excellent comedy, although Miss Little's strong, clear voice overshadowed Corbeil's soft-spoken bass.

Music reviews are often pedantic; often it's a matter of seeing a forest as a mass of trees. On the whole, Don Giovanni is a good production, alive, colourful and musically satisfying.

Zerlina consoles Masetto, in the COC's new Don Giovanni

at Rochdale, we feel more like we do now than when we first came here

The best thing about Rochdale is that it's ours. A six million dollar 18 storey building in downtown Toronto owned by its residents. Who annually elect a council who hires the "administration"; who are from, and work for the community. Community. The key word in Rochdale's present development. A small town of 850 people — a community with its own government, its own bureaucracy, police force, stores, restaurants, movie theatres, drama group (Theatre Passe Muraille), printing house (Coach House Press), its own daily newspaper (comes out twice a week) and a library. Plus a few odds & ends like art studios, a medical clinic, photography workshops, a bookbinding operation, music rooms, and a day-care centre. These facilities are not provided by Rochdale's "administration". The creation and development of all projects are a result of individual commitments. You must create your own environment for living and working.

The development of our community is a natural organic process, influenced and directed by all residents. We deal with real problems, with solutions that have immediate and actual results. We learn from the consequences of our actions. As our community develops, so we develop.

Life in Rochdale is not restricted by rules of behaviour set down by an impersonal landlord. Limits are defined on a personal basis, between residents, only when the freedom of an individual begins to infringe on that of others. Communication of mutual needs act as our law makers.

Rochdale started as a "free school" defining itself in terms of that which it was not. As we enter our third year, we have discovered the positive direction of our learning — through our experience as a human community. Participation in our experiment is simple: come live with us.

ISC: five-man board to empty the easy chairs

By BRIAN ANDREW

Acting on the recommendation of the student advisory Board of the International Student Centre a five man commission will be established to assess the role of the Centre.

Over the Centre's four year history the student-inspired Advisory Board had reached a quasi-official state, but because it was inherently an in-bred unit the Board moved last year to ask the University Vice-President and Registrar, Robin Ross, to establish a broader based forum for international student affairs.

THE VAGUE TERMS of reference given the committee — "to examine and assess the role of ISC" — are intended to let the commission find its own level among the needs and problems of the ISC. Mrs. R.G. Riddell, ISC director suggested that the social, service and intellectual spheres might be of concern to the commission. The very existence of the ISC and what it should be doing will be discussed.

The ISC at present offers supporters, kind advice and comfortable chairs to foreign students. The commission could well develop a programme to exploit the political and cultural variety of the 1200 odd students from seventy countries.

U of T REGISTRAR, Robin Ross, under whose responsibility the ISC falls, set the commission's size at five members, comprised of students, (foreign or domestic), faculty and any interested extra-university people. The ratio of these factions is not an issue.

The selection is to be made by Ross from anyone who wishes to be considered for a position. However, W. Kent, Executive Assistant to the Registrar maintains that if more than five genuinely interested people apply, the commission will swell.

Guerrillas vs. psychiatrists

The Lone Ranger fired, the Indian fell...

The psychiatrists were talking at the dignified american psychiatric association conference, about why Indians kill themselves. They had before them, many statistics and far-reaching facts on the sorry plight of north american Indians: a suicide rate ten times that of the rest of the population. Unemployment, ten times the national figure, infant mortality 1 1/2 times greater than the national average, squalid, chaotic, living conditions on the reservations, epidemic alcoholism, loss of pride and identity.

"I keep wondering," commented Dr. Karl Menninger of Kansas

"why more Indians don't commit suicide under the conditions of life our society has forced upon them for a century or more."

For quite a while, psychiatrists probed the Indian condition — the "systematic stripping of tribal identity," the banning of "primitive and barbaric rituals," the forced sedentary, nuclear family set-up for a nomadic people used to travelling in extended families, the dependency on government handouts.

Perhaps the psychiatrists were about to embark on therapeutic recommendations; perhaps a position paper was about to be drawn up. But suddenly the radical caucus of mental health workers who had throughout the convention intervened to bring up the topics of war, imperialism, racism, and the conspiracy against the Panthers, went into action.

The appearance of a half-naked young man who jumped into the room, war-whooping, rather startled the doctors.

"I'm a crazy Indian," he shouted at the silence-struck room. "Look I, crazy, I'm an Indian!"

Just as suddenly, the Lone Ranger appeared. Rushing down the aisle, he faced the Indian with a cap pistol, and cried, "The only good Indian is a dead Indian!"

The Lone Ranger fired, the Indian fell, and the Lone Ranger turned to the psychiatrists.

"The point," he said, "is this: your talk here may be relevant and important. But genocide is just as important to understanding Indians as suicide. Remember."

The stunned audience of doctors applauded guiltily as the guerrilla actors departed. (UPS)

Portuguese army lieutenants say U.S. trained them for colonial wars

STOCKHOLM (CUP) — Six lieutenants who deserted the Portuguese army said they had been trained in West Germany by U.S. army guerilla experts for action in Portuguese colonies.

The six, who are seeking political asylum in Sweden, said they deserted and came to Sweden last week after being posted in combat units to Guinea and Mozambique, both Portuguese colonies.

The deserters also stated that more would leave the Portuguese armed forces as few people in the army now believed in a military solution to colonial problems.

SPORT TALK

Lyndon Little
 VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

CONTRARY TO POPULAR OPINION, the biggest bargains to be found on Bloor Street this week are not at Honest Ed's emporium. If you step up to the ticket wickets at Varsity Stadium you'll discover that the people who run the Athletic Association have upstaged old Ed this week and are selling season football tickets at the ridiculous rate of $2.50.

It's encouraging to discover that in these times of run-away costs and spiraling inflation at least one can still watch his favorite football team at the same old prices.

The student ticket books go on sale tomorrow and Friday, from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

IN TERMS OF LEAGUE BALANCE and of the number of star performers, this could be one of the greatest SIFL seasons.

It's our turn to have the extra home game this year, so you'll see Queen's, Western, McGill and McMaster.

If you think this is the hard sell — YOU'RE RIGHT!

At the risk of sounding corny, these guys deserve your support. They practise their butts off five nights a week hoping to come up with a pleasing show on Saturday.

Let's prove that there is still room for football in the Age of Aquarius.

IT'S ALL A LITTLE DIFFICULT to believe, but the possibility exists that this could be the last year for McGill in intercollegiate sports.

The withdrawal is the recommendation of a McGill budget cutting committee which has laid their eyes on the university's reported $200,000 intercollegiate athletic programme.

Whether educational institutions such as public universities should be subsidizing intercollegiate sports is a question in itself.

The fact remains however, that most university intercollegiate programmes run at a deficit. In the case of McGill, powerful forces have decided that these programmes rank low on their priorities.

THE REDMEN FOOTBALL TEAM, currently the defending OQAA champs, appear to be the biggest expense. According to McGill head coach, Tom Mooney, the football teams (both senior and junior) cost in the neighbourhood of $90,000 annually to operate.

With only $15,000 realized each year in ticket sales this leaves a deficit of nearly $75,000 on football alone!

However, the whole intercollegiate programme at McGill represents only about one-fifth on one per cent of the total university budget of 38.4 million.

The general reaction to the McGill situation around the OQAA is that the threatened suspension of the intercollegiate sports programme — and especially of the football team — is simply a ploy to shock a sluggish alumni and student body into more active support of athletics.

In any case, the budget cut is still only a recommendation — albeit a high-level one — which gives the athletic establishment at McGill some time to mount a counter-offensive.

A football season without a McGill weekend? Practically unthinkable!

Response to our first appeal for sports staff was heartening, but to make Varsity's sports coverage for 1970-71 even more jocular, how about more of you finding a spot with Varsity Sports? Phone 923-4053.

QUAKER MEETING

The common form of Quaker worship is an hour of silence. We find that in this silence there may be a real meeting of people, one with another, and each with something deeper. The experience may be refreshing, challenging, disturbing or merely dull, according to what each brings to it. Any of those present may be moved to speak, or the meeting may find its strength in silence.

For further information, call 921-0368, or come to a Meeting for Worship at 60 Lowther Avenue (north of Bloor, east of St. George) any Sunday at 11 a.m. or Thursday at 8 p.m. Coffee or tea is served after the meeting, and there is time for informal discussion.

The other teams

By Lyndon Little

If McGill goes out it could be as winners

Forget for the time being all that talk about McGill dropping out of inter-collegiate football. They're here for the present season, they're the defending champs, and that's all that really matters right now.

With all the publicity and ballyhoo that followed the Redmen's Yates Cup championship last year it is easy to forget that it wasn't many "Mooneys" ago that McGill was having trouble beating cross-town rivals Loyola. For example, in his five seasons at McGill, head coach Mooney has yet to win a ball game in either Toronto or London.

This could be the year however, when that situation is changed.

The Redmen have the horses to repeat. Twenty-five of last year's team are back again. The main losses are on the offensive line where Sal Lovocchio, Bob Taylor, Jack Sutton and Pat Rahming have graduated. All-Star corner linebacker Bob Berke will also be missed.

Two of last year's regular defensive linemen, Bob Bell and Dan Dulmage have been shifted to the offensive line while defensive back Bill Holt moves to split end and running back Dave Doherty goes to the defensive secondary in the other changes.

Dan Smith will be back at the QB spot. As for new faces, Larry Smith, MVP in the CCIFC with Bishops last year will combine with Hec Creighton winner Dave Fleiszer and Ken Aiken to give the Redmen the strongest running in the league.

In their only exhibition game, McGill trounced Loyola 44-7.

On any other team complacency might be a problem — but that's one word you'll never find in Tom Mooney's vocabulary.

Gaels pack punch in air and on ground

Down at Tindalltown Ont. they would like you to believe that a major rebuilding job is underway.

Granted, there is an impressive list of veterans who have decided to hang up the boots but, the off-season recruiting job seems better than average — or maybe just average for Queen's.

One thing for sure, the Gaels are knee-deep in talent at the vital QB spot. Besides holdover Bill McNeill there are newcomers Skip Rochette, Tom Taylor, and Mike Sharpe.

Rochette is the former U of Bridgeport, Connecticut star whose talent and experience will probably earn him the starting job. Taylor, former UTS star and younger brother of Blues' great Bryce Taylor, is most likely the Gaels' pivot of the future.

Biggest absentees for Queen's fall on their offensive line where veterans Bob Climie, Brian Parnege, Dick Van Buskirk, Queen's defeated Blues twice last year and will be strong again.

Paul Gordon and Byron Fordyce have graduated.

Former Duke Blue Devil Mike Lambros and hard-tackling "monster-man" Jim McKeen anchor the Gael's defense that will also feature newcomer Burns McPherson, a well-seasoned linebacker from St. Francis Xavier.

Queen's are also deep at the running back spots with the league's most explosive rusher, Keith Eaman in addition to Carl Leesti, Brian Warrender, Heino Lilles and rookie Stu Lang from Upper Canada College.

In exhibition play this year, the Gaels drubbed Waterloo Lutheran 35-15 and the Carleton Raver Ravens 26-13.

If the new offensive line can give Rochette enough time to make his handoffs and passes then Queen's could be national champs come Nov. 21.

Brian Beatty, a running back from Beal Tech in London, and Ben Akelaitis, a linebacker from Runnymede C.I. here in Toronto, are the best of the rookies.

Warriors must find a new punter as Paul Knill has moved over to Western along with Scorgie.

Waterloo played a brutal exhibition schedule featuring three games in a space of six days. They defeated the Saskatchewan Huskies at home then went out to the east coast where they downed the St. Francis Xavier X-Men and lost to the St. Mary's Huskies.

The Stangs are coming, but not this year

The Mustangs of Western U fame may not set the league on fire this season but, at least no longer will the sports hacks be able to joke and say:

Hey!, did you hear that a fire swept the coaching offices at UWO and destroyed all their passing plays — both of them!

With former Mustang great Frank Cosentino at the helm the Western attack promises to be more varied — if not more potent.

Graduation has hit hard at two key areas — the defensive backfield and the offensive line.

The Mustangs graduated two defensive backs to the CFL from last year's squad. Bob LaRose is with Winnipeg and Jim Henshall has caught on with Edmonton. Bill McTeer is the only one left with experience in the defensive secondary.

On the bright side however, in Steve Derbyshire, Larry Bird, Jeff Wadsworth (younger brother of Argo's Mike Wadsworth) and Ed Scorgie, Stangs appear to have a blue-ribbon, or rather purple-ribbon, defensive line.

On the offensive side of the ledger, Western's pre-season games indicated that they may have an incipient passing attack with Steve Stefanko throwing to big receivers Tom Mattingley, Joe Pennachetti and Doug Chocki.

As far as the running attack goes — it just may not!

The Mustangs are on the way back. But don't expect too much from them this time around.

McMaster Consolation: they can only get better

According to all grid reports drifting over from Hamilton this fall this appears to be a "rebuilding year" for Ray Johnson's maroon clad warriors.

Unfortunately, this immediately begs the unkind comment — rebuilding from what?

After two seasons in the SIFL, the Marauders have won only two ball games — both against fellow expansinities, Waterloo, during the '68 season.

For starters, two of Mac's top performers last year, defensive back Jay Graydon and fullback Jim Chalkley, have defected to play ball for the Burlington Braves who are currently running over everybody in the Ontario Junior loop.

The pivot spot was the most obvious weakness for last year's Mac team. Barry Finlay, a sophomore who has shown best so far, will probably win the starting call with Alec Lockington in reserve.

As far as the running game goes, the Marauders were next to last in this department last year and prospects don't look great for much improvement. Jamie Spears, Dave West and Jim Handson will handle most of the load.

As for passing, Bob Baytor, their leading receiver last year, will not be back.

Returning linemen include some of the league's best in tackles Joe Watt and Mike O'Shaughnessy, guard Paul Perras and center Russ Mitchell.

On the defensive side, unless several rookies become instant stars the linebacking and the secondary are questionable.

Defensive half, Jim Washbrook could be the best of the newcomers which also includes big Mike Zuk from Etobicoke as well as Larry Faseurak and Ralph Corvino.

In exhibition play this fall, Mac opened with a 25-8 triumph over the hapless Huskies from Saskatchewan (oh how it hurts to say that) and then dropped a decision by the same score to Guelph of the Central Canada Conference.

But of course, losing to Guelph in exhibition play is something that can happen to the best of teams — right!

Editor's Note — On Friday we'll have a separate look at our own Varsity Blues on the eve of their important clash with the McGill Redmen in Montreal.

Claude Bissell

"The intellectual says that you are apathetic, incapable of rebellion and given to bland acceptance of the status quo... here at the university you will have a chance to confute this indictment!" — Claude Bissell, 1959.

Born in the charming rural setting of Meaford, Ontario, Claude Thomas Bissell culminated a brilliant academic career in 1958 with his appointment to the U of T presidency.

As Dean-in-Residence at University College in 1946 Bissell started on the road to becoming a professional administrator.

"We used to have water fights and dump ash cans on the lawn in front of University College, recalls a former student of Bissell's. We were bad boys but he would give us a little speech on conduct and put us in our place. I remember he used to toss the football with us."

Bissell's handling of student bad boys changed little over the years as he moved up the administration ladder from Vice-president at U of T to president at Carleton to his present position.

Last fall for instance he sub-merged a budding crisis over discipline by appealing to a packed Convocation Hall to "get on as quickly as we can with the job" — to the cheers of thousands.

"If we rudinate the group of student activists — intelligent, idealistic, deeply concerned about the University — then we shall lose the entire student body to apathy and cynicism, and the activists will be supplanted by the apostles of inactivity and brutality, who in these days wait expectantly in the wings."

In February 1969, these same apostles rushed out of the wings of the Royal Ontario Museum to disrupt a speech by former Berkeley president Clark Kerr. Bissell, who was present on stage at the time lost his proverbial cool and engaged in a shouting contest with what he called "the lunatic fringe."

"These students espouse ideas that are irrelevant to our society. They enlist in their support, people who are obviously acting not from any conviction but simply from a desire for stimulation."

In his incessant attempts to create a "university community," Bissell has looked for support to student government.

I've got faith in the integrity of the student leaders. A good deal of this (radical) talk is simply tribal war dances picked from other areas."

Bissell is resigning next June after 13 years in the presidency.

"Nothing would please me more than to live in a garret."

Alex Rankin

Alexander Rankin, Executive Vice-President (non-academic) was pulled into the administration game in 1967 to act as a trouble-shooter in an attempt to smooth increases in the payroll division of the university's accounting department.

The position was specially created for Rankin, a U of T graduate, by the university administration who realized the value of his extensive work in the business world.

Since he assumed this position he has gradually assumed control of all non-academic affairs at the university.

But Rankin didn't come into business at the university from out of the cold. It is reported in '60's who he shown us the fragility of liberty, (relations with such not subject to inquiry into the use of provincial funds.

"These inquiries will not be limited to the business area, but will extend to the effectiveness of the professor in his classroom, a scrutiny of library expenditure, equipment purchases and research expenditures," he reported at a dinner of the Toronto Board of Trade recently.

At that dinner he expressed one of his constant fears: "So long as we have any appreciable proportion of our population who feel disenfranchised, are impoverished and lack opportunity for education and employment, then we can expect eyeball-to-eyeball confrontation."

"Waves of social unrest have shown us the fragility of liberty, (relations with such not

Omond Solandt

University Chancellor since 1965, Omond Solandt can draw on years of military and corporate experience for performing his present duties.

Solandt was a top student at the U of T and earned both medical and engineering degrees. He started World War II as the director of a blood bank, and finished as a leading Canadian tank designer.

A member of the Joint Military Mission, Solandt travelled to Japan to evaluate the effects of the atomic bomb; a decade later, representing Canada at East-West talks on nuclear tests, he commented: "Radiation from this source is not as catastrophic as many people think."

From 1947 to 1956 Solandt chaired the Defense Research Board which did much to develop germ warfare under the rationale of "The real value of defense research lies in the contribution toward the strength of the free nations of the world."

Moving on, Solandt became the vice-president in charge of research and development of the CNR. In 1956, and in 1963 filled a similar post with De Havilland Aircraft, which soon became a supplier of Caribou planes for the U.S. military in Vietnam.

An unextinguishable ball of fire, Solandt sped upwards: from the top of a new De Havilland subsidiary, DCF Systems Ltd., to the U of T Board of Governors, and vice-president of Electric Reduction Ltd., famed for being the only Canadian producer of red amorphous and yellow phosphorous for military use.

ERCO's Port Maitland Ontario plant, which refines the phosphorous, was recently the subject of a judicial enquiry into the effects of fluorine gas from its stacks on local residents.

ERCO has already paid over $200,000 to farmers for poisoning their crops and animals. ERCO testified that the gas, while fatal to cows was not harmful to people. Doctors contended that local farmers, stricken with a "mysterious disease" showed the same symptoms.

In 1966, Solandt became chairman of the Science Council of Canada, a part-time position which has brought him under the fire of politicians who charge a conflict of interest between the $16,500-Council job and his ERCO position.

Recently, Solandt has warned of the adverse economic effects of closing down industries because of their pollution of city air.

A staunch believer in a system of free enterprise and exploitation, Solandt stated "workers in the cities have to come around to the view that they might have to earn a little less in order to live in an unpolluted environment."

John Rist

John M. Rist, associate professor of Classics at University College, is also chairman of the Association of the Teaching Staff.

Rist got the job through the normal channels by which ATS chairmen are selected — without a platform or election. What happens is that the outgoing chairman nominates a slate of candidates for the ATS council, a group of about 20 faculty, who make the choice. Rist describes the ATS as "a body designed to represent the widest interests of the faculty."

Rist makes no bones about his hard line on student participation in decision-making in the university. Last fall he seconded

So much for student power. As far as education itself goes, Rist remains uncompromising.

"It is true in one sense that faculty and students are the university, but the relationship between the two groups should be

“Those interested in keeping people in oppressed positions understand it's necessary to control the learning process to camouflage the true nature of this society.”

By Eldridge Cleaver, Minister of Information, Black Panther Party

One way of understanding what's going on, on the college campuses and the high school campuses, is to take a look at what the essence of education is all about.

Basically, an education is simply passing on the heritage, learning, the wisdom and the technology of human history, passing it on to the coming generations. We want this information to be passed on to enable and to help mankind to continue to survive and to cope with our environment.

In terms of surviving and coping with our environment, basically, we have two worlds to deal with. We have the natural world, the task of surviving against the given world, for which technology has been designed. This has to do with the natural resources, the task of eking out a living from the earth itself. And on the other hand, we have the social world, the social situation.

The struggle against the physical environment, of course is primary. We have organized our social situation in order to cope with the physical environment. The way that we organize the economy as a whole, the way we organize the political situation, all of this historically has been towards facilitating and better enabling us to cope with the physical environment.

Over the centuries a very complex situation has developed. At this point I think it would be useful to clarify a little terminology. The best terminology I know of for discussing this distinction between the struggle within the physical environment and the struggle within the social environment is the terminology developed by Marx.

He designates the struggle against or within the physical environment as taking place within the economic base of society, and within the economic base of society is erected its superstructure. So that the struggle within the social realm takes place within the superstructure and the struggle within the physical realm takes place within the economic base.

Now in the economic base we find the natural resources, the technology, industry, all the machines and the tools and the means that mankind has developed for coping with the physical environment; these are designated as the means of production, the means of producing the material wealth, goods, and commodities from the natural resources themselves.

ALL OF THE INSTITUTIONS OF SOCIETY, everything from the educational facilities to hospitals, the postal service, etc.

you how to fish or your father could teach you how to hunt with a spear or a rock, or a bow and arrow. But as the situation becomes more complex and as the level of information and knowledge and understanding of the environment increases to the extent that it requires people to specialize in passing on this information, this is where the problem really sets in.

When it is necessary for people to be designated as teachers and to specialize in or devote all their time to passing on this information, then the learning situation itself had to be centralized. Schools, universities, what have you were developed so that the maximum use of man's time and energy could be made under the situation, under the circumstances.

Now you can readily understand how in a very simple social situation it would be understood by the community, by everybody involved in the social unit, that these places of institutions of learning were there to serve and to benefit the community as a whole.

It would be absurd for a teacher or one who is charged with administering the learning process as a whole — it would be absurd for him to alienate himself from the community as a whole or to claim that he owns the body of information that is a heritage of mankind. This would be absurd. It would not be tolerated by the community and probably those charged with disseminating this information would take a period of time to alienate the learning process from the community and consider it as their own private property.

Of course, I have been talking about this as though society were an organism in which they co-operated with each other and in which were not waging wars of aggression against each other and not in conflict with each other. But in actual fact and in terms of human history this has not been the case.

IN HUMAN HISTORY, we see that society has been broken up into classes, into antagonistic ethnic groups that struggle against each other for survival as they see it. They enslave each other and make their living at the expense of other groups, special interest groups are formed, etc.

And so that when we look at our own situation today, we find that those who are very powerful in our society because of their relationship to the means of production, because they are rich, because they own the factories, because they own the natural resources, so that they have an advantage in the social situation,

“In the old days, human genius, the brain of man created only to give some the benefits of technology and culture, and to deprive others of the bare necessities, education and development. From now on all the marvels of science and the gains of culture belong to the nation as a whole, and never again will man's brain and human genius be used for oppression and exploitation. . . . The working people will perform this titanic historic feat, for in them lie dormant the great forces of revolution, renaissance and renovation”

V. I. Lenin

“do or die” necessity that a craftsman in some forgotten time in human history had to struggle against the natural elements.

In reality, our adversaries are other men, other women and other social classes. In terms of racial strife within the United States our class struggle is often hidden by our ethnic struggle, we are manipulated along the colour line as well as along the class line. We are exploited economically, and we are discriminated against racially also.

TODAY, AS ALWAYS, the struggle of the exploited people within the United States is taking place on all fronts, the most sensational and explosive clashes are being centred and focused more and more on the college campuses, and on the high school campuses.

We understand that those who control the mind can control the body. Those who are interested in keeping people in oppressed positions and then dominating their perspective and their outlook on life, understand that it's necessary for them to control the learning process in order to brainwash people, in order to camouflage the true nature of this society.

So they can sanctify their system, teach the exploited people and the oppressed people to virtually love the system that's exploiting them and oppressing them. So that they have an interest in seeing to it that the content of the curriculum is to their liking, and that it does not expose the true nature of the decadent and racist society that we live in.

On the other hand, the exploited and oppressed people have the opposite interest. They have an interest in exposing the true nature of the society and in educating themselves and their children on the nature of the struggle and in transferring to them the means for waging the struggle so they can be aware of the level of the struggle, of the progress and the history of the struggle and the nature of the enemy and the true vulnerability of the enemy.

What we have to realize above all else, is that our enemy, and that which we in fact are struggling against, is not an individual college president or high school principal, or a board of regents or the board of education, but it's the entire social structure.

We're struggling against the capitalist system, which organized itself in a way that purchases our lives, that exploits us, and forces us into positions where we have to wage a struggle against the social organization in order to survive.

that they go through, in the last analysis are a continuation of the desire and the necessity of the slavemaster, of keeping us ignorant and unable to manipulate ideas.

We must have knowledge of ourselves and our enemy, and of the situations that we find ourselves in, in order to organize a true revolution to move against them.

ONE OF THE GREAT WEAKNESSES in the Movement at this particular time, is in the campus focus of the attack upon the ruling class and the power of the ruling class. And this has to do with the compartmentalized thinking of the traditional American society in which the college community and the college campus is viewed as something separate and distinct from the rest of the community.

The college is not really looked upon as part of the community. People who are not concerned with themselves going to college or who have no children in college feel like what's going on, on the campus is none of their business. But nothing is farther from the truth, because in reality, your colleges and institutions have been set aside to perpetuate the human heritage, and to pass on human wisdom, the knowledge, and the technical skills for the further development of society and civilization.

And every single individual living in a given society has a stake in what's going on, on the college campuses.

The attacks focused on the college campuses serve to expose the nature of power in the United States. Because when we look at the composition of the board of regents and administration and councils that control the colleges we find them replete with military men, retired generals, foundation personnel and big business men.

So that we could say that the boards that administer the universities are a good barometer, or a clear barometer of the stratification of power in the society as a whole.

If they did have the power they would be in a position to see to it that some of their members were appointed to these boards. But those who control the economy, those who control the various sources and levels of power in the community and around it are able to have their lackeys and their flunkies appointed to administer these institutions of learning.

IT'S A MISTAKE TO THINK that the ruling class cannot be successful if a proper response is not made from the Movement. This is a mistake that's been made time and again in the history

MONOPOLY R

The idea of the game is to monopolize — buy, swap and sell knowledge and property at the university and in the surrounding community.

Just as at the University of Toronto, where students are processed year by year into their various degree-carrying categories, the players in the game are aiming to buy up knowledge in the faculties and gain a monopoly of property on the campus and thus gain power over other players.

The game is triggered to allow all students of all income classes a gamble at life at the University of Toronto. But as players move gingerly around the hoard buying knowledge, property and power, they will realize that only a certain number of deserving students gain control and power to manipulate others.

Take a crack at it and guess who!

The game is played on the board provided, with spaces indicating administration buildings, faculties, college property and residence accommodation with two spaces provided for secretarial staff and food services.

Starting from GO! move the tokens you've just made, around the board according to the throw of Dice. When a player's token lands on a space NOT already owned, he may buy it from the university; otherwise it is auctioned off to the highest bidder.

Once a monopoly is gained, you may double rents and begin to build up your property.

Rentals are greatly increased by the erection of buildings on a lot so it is wise for the player to build up his property.

If you find yourself in financial difficulty having gambled with the scant student loan you were given at the beginning of the game, lots may be mortgaged to the university to raise money.

Community Chest and Chance spaces give the drawer a card, and instructions which must be followed. Cut these out.

There is a title deed for every property, which should be cut out

RULES

1) Each player should make himself a token to represent him on his travels through the university. Also samples of money denominations are shown and players should make up enough of their own or to find something to represent their money.

2) A banker at the university is elected with a throw of the dice. The player with the highest total is the banker.

3) The game can be played by a group of six players. Each player represents two upper class students and the player with the highest number represents the other class students at the university.

4) MONEY: Every player starts with a $1,000 grant from the Provincial Student Awards Program. This is unusually generous. If you are an upper class student you receive another $1,000 representing a gift from your parents. If you are middle class you receive the $1,000 and if you are a working class you receive $500 as a poor man's grant. This has to be returned with 10% interest at the end of the game along with 10% of your net worth.

5) Dice: If you are an upper class student you roll your own dice. If you are a working class student you are allowed to use the dice if available. If you are a middle class student you are allowed to use the dice if available. If you are a working class student you are allowed to use the dice if available. If you are a working class student you are allowed to use the dice if available.

The tokens remain on the spaces occupied and proceed from that point on the players next turn unless otherwise directed by the Chance or Community Chest. ONE OR MORE TOKENS MAY REST ON THE SPACE AT THE SAME TIME.

7) According to the space which his token reaches, a player is entitled to gulp up university property or other properties, i.e. Rochdale, or be obliged to pay rent or fees if another player already has a hold on that property.

8) A player gets out of Erindale or Scarboro by a) throwing doubles on any of his next three turns. If he succeeds in doing this he immediately moves forward the number of spaces shown by his double throw. b) by purchasing a Get Out Or Erindale Or Scarboro Free Card from another player at a fee agreeable to both (unless he already owns such a card by having previously drawing it from Chance or Community Chest. c) by paying $50 to the university before his next throw of the dice. A player may continue to build up his property if in Erindale or Scarboro.

9) Reading Week: Players who land on the space don't receive any money or awards of any kind. This is just a "free" resting place.

10) If a player buys a monopoly of Trinity and is able to build it up to its fullest, he can retire to Massey College and quit "this silly undergraduate game" but is permitted to continue collecting rent from players landing on his property.

Editor's Note: The game is played following the rules of a Monopoly game. But instead of building up property with houses and hotels, players attempt to gain control of property and faculties at the university and build additions to these properties, at the same time exploit those who land on their property.

Players should find their own tokens dice and money. Such items as coins, bottle caps etc. can be used.

Equipment should be no problem though. Get an original Monopoly Game and paste our chance and community chest cards on top of theirs and use their money, tokens, hotels and houses etc to represent property on our game.

The Students' Administrative Council, sponsors of today's Festival, has requested all teaching staff to "use your discretion in the cancellation of classes so students may attend the events."

The Varsity suggests students also use their discretion.

Through a typographical error Monday's Varsity erroneously reported that participants in the U of T Campus Legal Assistance Centre are "now lawyers". In fact, they are students, not practising lawyers. The Centre, located at 44 St. George St., can be reached at 928-6447.

everything that you find or are going to the organized aspect of society takes place within the superstructure. This is where our lives have been built and sustained by our means of producing material wealth.

Now let's get at an essence of an education. In a very simple structured social organization, where technology and learning have not become complex, it would be possible for one's father or one's uncle to pass on the technology. Your father could teach they are able to appoint people who themselves may not own stock or any control over the means of production or the natural resources, but because of their educational capabilities they are able to be appointed to positions of managing society.

At the top of our social organization, we have a ruling class and because of the wealth of this ruling class it is able to dominate American society, determine who is appointed for instance to the judicial system, the judges, able to determine who is appointed to the Board of Regents to administer the colleges, able to determine who is elected to office, because they control the wealth and we all know that it's necessary to have vast amounts of money at one's disposal in order to wage a campaign.

So those who control the economy of the United States of America are able to control the rest of society, so that we find ourselves in a situation (those of us who are not in this advantaged position) Black people, Puerto Ricans, Mexican Americans, Indians, Eskimos, virtually every ethnic group including poor white people and also middle class college students, we all find ourselves in the position where our lives are manipulated and controlled by those who have this advantaged social position.

It is very important to us to understand that we are called upon to wage this struggle with the same desperation, and the same college campuses, our struggles to have black studies added to the curriculum across the nation. This is a struggle that the enemy sees as a grave danger. The enemy also recognizes the struggle of young white people on the college campuses and high schools, as a grave danger, and he is right. Because what we realize is that the education being given out is designed to perpetuate a system of exploitation. On the one hand it's to keep the masses of white students in harmony with this system, to keep them supporting the system, to indoctrinate them to fight the wars, that protect the system, and that extend the influence and the power of the system.

We're all becoming conscious of the evil of the system, conscious of the fact that this system can no longer survive. We have a historic opportunity for attacking the system and destroying it at its roots. So that all of the manipulations that the capitalists go through are designed to destroy the thrust of the Movement. It designates as criminals those who are in the forefront of the struggle, and those who are guiding the struggle. Historically, the struggle in the educational arena, in terms of black people, has been from, on the one hand the slavemaster not even wanting black people to learn how to read and write, to black people, on the other hand learning how to read and write, and then the struggle transposed itself over into what black people were allowed to read and write until today black people have reached the point where they want to control totally what they read and write.

This has been a steady struggle against the opposition of the slavemaster. It's been defeat after defeat for the slavemaster, until now we have burst into consciousness, until now we have realized the necessity of taking control of our education. And when you see this long line of progression from the struggle to become literate to the struggle to control totally the education, you can see the true nature of the opposition that we face. All of their rhetoric, all of their arguments, all of the changes of the "revolutionary movement being... an advanced, highly organized, much more organized, than we are, in the United States, with a higher theoretical understanding, and with very good party machinery, etc., and they have been crushed because the power structure would resort to unlimited means of brutality.

So it's a question of time. The Movement is always behind. The Movement has the initiative. The power structure, by over-reaching, seeks to buy time for itself, and the pressure that the Movement puts on the power structure determines the amount of time left. Because if things develop and progress at such a pace that allows the ruling class to devise means of coping with the Movement, then all is lost and the Movement is doomed to failure. So that a broadening of those involved or those concerned, and those whose support is now latent is what is required.

Poor black people and poor white people and other middle class people who are not themselves directly involved in the college situation, need to be made to understand that something of their own precious liberty, which either never had or which they thought they had is being decisively determined in the struggles that are going down on the campuses today.

BECAUSE IT IS THE DUTY of any society to see to it that every individual in that society is invested with the human heritage and provided with the technology, the skills, and the knowledge that will enable him to cope with his environment to survive and to live a good life. This is the duty of the society to provide that. Just as it is the duty of the society to provide the highest level of medical assistance, housing and also employment, every benefit that exists in society, it's the duty of the government to provide that.

As long as the government is not providing that, it is not worthy of existing. And under our form of government, which is called representative democracy, it is not possible for a capitalist economy to provide a universal brainwashing that people. What it has been providing is universal brainwashing that masquerades as universal education, the quality of the education is contemptible. It's inhuman and it's only geared to provide a level of intelligence or a level of competence that will enable the product of the educational system to be exploited by the capitalistic economic entities.

We must not get into a bag of thinking that we're involved in a game. A revolution is not a game. It's a war. We're involved in a war — a people's war against those who oppose the people, and this is the war in the clearest sense of the word. It is only that our resistance is under-developed, the repression is over-developed, because the ruling class has arsenals of the materials of war to unleash upon us.

Student

Average Student wandered onto the campus last week along with 5,000 other soggy footed bleary eyed freshmen wondering why in God's name he was here.

But little did he realize he was one of only a few who find university education accessible.

His parents have an average income of $10,000 and over one quarter of the students in his classes come from homes equally well off while only one tenth of the families in the country ever reach that income.

He would have liked to enter the professional faculties which offer more job opportunities upon completion of the courses, but professional faculties are open to still a smaller minority of students.

Twenty-eight per cent of the law students and 22 per cent of the medical students come from families with incomes of more than $15,000. Only 3.3 per cent of Canadian families had incomes greater than that last year.

During the summer Average Student trod the hot streets in countless Canadian cities looking for a job that would give him enough bread to pay the balance of tuition fees and put food in his mouth for the rest of the year.

At least he found some part time work. Most kids found nothing and you don't see them around the ivory towers of wisdom this year.

But after paying fines for dope and trying to bust a tip-off music festival along with 5,000 other angry kids this summer, he has scanty funds to buy $75 worth of books, pay compulsory Hart House fees and pay rent.

And while he saunters on up Philosopher's Walk he thinks of finding a seat in a cramped lecture hall with 250 other average students.

Oh but it's all right, he ponders. And even if I feel alienated and hate my courses, and find them irrelevant to what's going on around me and can't stomach the paternalistic attitudes of the prof, and have to starve to get here, there's got to be something in it for me.

At least that's what they told me in high school!

Arts and Science Faculty Council

by W. H. Nelson, which would lead a major battle to obtain a 22 per cent wage increase for university faculty.

University administrators thought the demand "unrealistic" and, when faculty members refused to support their negotiators' demands last March, the university unilaterally awarded a 10 per cent average pay hike.

This raised income levels of, for instance, an Associate Professor, from $12,300 to $13,000.

Rist's exploits have been celebrated in verse by Tom Talkon. His Ode to Chairman Rist begins thus:

Sing, O goddess, of the wrath of Benevolent pedagogue, 'spectacle, fierce,

Who came to the aid of the faculty nation When threatened by leftists — the young generation —

By parity, Bissel and Ekkin and theirs,

By student involvement in student affairs.

Robin Ross

As early as 1966, for instance, Ross was raising such issues as whether universities "depend over-much upon the lecture", attacking the mythology which surrounds the university degree, and questioning the "in loco parentis" role which the university still performs.

At that time he also pointed out that "...in Canada our wealthy society does less for the financial support of university students than that in any other western country."

"It is important to... arrange things so that the academic community becomes a real partnership of faculty, administrators and students," he said.

His sense of responsibility to the institution and its procedures often conflicts strongly with his idea of what should be done.

Nevertheless, Ross is generally earnest and sincere, and in times of crisis is able to maintain a cool and unruffled exterior.

He lists golf, climbing and fishing as his favourite hobbies.

Help!

This is the first in a series of special issues of the Varsity that will appear this year and we're lurking about town looking for people with skills and a rabid interest in a rather patriotic (radicals can have fun too Virginia) paper. But it won't be just a piece of paper to wrap your garbage in. We will be experimenting in other forms of media including posters, tapes, more fun and games etc. If interested at all anybody will receive you in the ground floor offices of 91 St. George St., at 1 p.m. Monday.

Scott's of Canada acting as their British Columbia Vice-Chairman.

And from 1955-1967 he dealt with B.C. Forest Products, a huge forest rapping monopoly with headquarters in Vancouver, acting as their vice-president of finances.

With his shrewd calculating abilities he managed operations of the conglomerate which had a 33 per cent increase in profits last year alone.

Most of the company's lumber products which come from the raped forests of B.C. are sold as export products which attract higher prices.

Now Rankin sits comfortably behind a pregnant orange wall in a deep blue push office in Simcoe Hall and gambles with the university payroll trying to control the running of all capital projects at the university.

Rankin notes with concern that the university will soon be

Blues strengths are depth and experience

Coaches looking for better ground game

By LYNDON LITTLE

ONE THING IS CERTAIN ABOUT THIS YEAR'S Varsity Blues football team.

It is most likely that never before in the 72-year history of the team have Blues had so much accumulated inter-collegiate experience on one squad.

For a starter, of the 24 players that started Blues' final league game last year, 21 are back.

Most of these starters have had at least two or three years SIFL play — some have had many more.

Flanker Eric Walter leads with seven years while Jim Kellam has had six and Paul McKay, Alex Squires, Vic Alboini and Gord Whitaker have had five years apiece.

However, before we get carried away with visions of championships, the key question to ask is this:

These starters could not win at all the last two years — should they be picked to take it this time?

In the last two seasons, Blues have gone down to the final game of the year with a chance to win it all but have come away empty handed.

Perhaps it is for this very reason — the veterans wanting to go out as winners — that will result in the supreme effort needed for a Yates Cup.

OF THE STARTERS in last year's final game, only Peter Lamantia and Ian Kirpatrick from the defensive secondary and center Rein Enno will not be back.

Blues' greatest strength this year should be their balanced attack.

In veterans Eric Walter, John Chapman and Mark Slater plus Jack Buchan (who saw spot duty as a rookie last year) and newcomer Ken Lee, Blues have the receivers to make more than one set of defensive backs wake up screaming in the middle of the night.

With Vic Alboini, sophomore Wayne Dunkley and freshman Bob

Billingshurst at the quarterback spot, there should be no dearth of footballs in the air for this fine group of receivers to latch on to.

BLUES WERE A POOR third in team rushing last year and this is an area where the greatest improvement must be made.

Returning to Blues after a year's absence is running back Glen Markle.

It's no secret that Blues lacked straight-ahead running power at key junctures last year. This is where Markle should be practically invaluable.

Glen certainly didn't earn the sobriquet "The Bull" from running the end sweeps!

Speedy Walt Sehr, durable Bill Stankovic (give me more like him says Murph), last year's rookie standout Cor Doret and Bob Morrow in addition to rookies Guido Iantorno and Peter McNabb give Blues depth at the running back spots.

ONE AREA OF BLUES' ground game that must improve if they hope to win is in the number of fumbles they gave up last year.

Next to Waterloo, Blues ran the ball the fewest number of times from scrimmage yet by a wide margin they gave up the most fumbles.

One factor that should help the running game is the fine offensive line that Blues will have this year.

The only changes on the front line has former all-star center Rich Agro moving back to that spot.

In Gord Whitaker, Derek Turner and Don Fraser Blues have three excellent guards while Jim Kellam and Peter Van Bodegom handle the tackle positions.

ON THE DEFENSIVE SIDE of the field, at one time it looked as if the defensive secondary might be a possible trouble spot.

Initial plans had Walt Sehr moving back to the defensive backfield. However, the return of veteran halfback Paul McKay after a tryout with the Hamilton Ti-Cats where he was their final cut will keep Sehr on offense.

Stew McSween, who appears fully recovered from a multiple leg fracture that kept him out of football last year, sophomores Jody Ortved and Brian Sickle plus rookie Peter McNabb round out the defensive backfield.

THE LINEBACKING CORPS should be another of Blues' strengths this year.

The return of Bill Bennett to full-time service in the middle position is the big plus that enables Agro to move back to center.

At the corners, Bob Bloxham and Hartley Stern should be strong contenders for All-Star honours.

Along the defensive line, where Paul McKay

championships are often won or lost, Blues appear set with big Alex Squires and Bart D'Onofrio at the ends, Jim Bennett at one tackle position and either Jim Orfanakos or Bill McNamara at the other.

BLUES HAVE BEEN WORKING hard this week in preparation for tomorrow's opener at McGill.

The depth that has made Blues one of the contending teams is already getting a testing.

Several front-liners are hurting and are questionable as starters tomorrow.

Doret injured his knee early in the training camp period and will sit this one out as will split-end Chapman who has a badly pulled hamstring muscle. D'Onofrio cracked a wrist in Tuesday's work-out but is expected to play with his cast.

Pre-season victories over York and Western served to build up momentum. The next two games, against the Redmen and then Queen's should pretty well reveal what chance we have for a Yates Cup in 1970.

McKay will play for Esks

The Hamilton Tiger-Cats of the CFL Eastern Conference have persuaded Paul McKay, Blues star defensive back and kicker, to join them in Edmonton for their interlocking game with the Eskimos tomorrow evening.

McKay, who went through the Ti-Cats training camp this summer and was their final cut, was to have begun his fifth season with the Blues.

A student at OCE, McKay informed Blues head coach Ron Murphy of his decision at last night's practice and will leave by air sometime today to join the Hamilton club.

Michigan here for rugger

The intercollegiate sports schedule swings into action this weekend.

Tomorrow, the Rugger Blues play host to Michigan. The seconds square off at 1 p.m. on the east field of the back campus while the top squads tangle at 3 p.m. at the Stadium.

Meanwhile, the Soccer Blues travel to York for a noon-time kickoff against the Yeomen while the Cross-Country team gets their first taste of action at a meet at Guelph.

Blues get captains

All-time SIFL scoring champion Eric Walter has been chosen as Blues' captain for the coming season.

Three-year offensive tackle Don Fraser and defensive lineman Jim Bennett were also named as alternate co-captains.

Spadina artery

SMC menaced by road expansion

By JEAN BUBBA
and
MARINA STRAUSS

Road builders are threatening St. Michael's College.

The proposed widening of St. Joseph Street, an artery running through the college, provoked a meeting last night of one hundred students and faculty in Brennan Hall. They decided to send a delegation to the Public Works Commission meeting this morning at City Hall.

THE MEETING IS AT 10 a.m.

Implications of the road work, which got underway on Friday morning, were exposed by the 'Do it in the Road' committee.

"The building of highways splits communities," said Ted McGee (IV), a spokesman for the committee. The area of St. Joseph Street has a "cultural milieu and cohesiveness. It is an historical area. The proposal to widen St. Joseph Street is not practical regarding the moving of traffic since the creation of roads generates more traffic," McGee said.

Besides the obvious effects — more traffic, more dirt, more noise, more confusion — the widening would "frustrate the growth and development of public transportation systems in the city. This would aggravate and not alleviate traffic problems," he added.

FATHER KELLY, principal of St. Michael's College, has so far been reluctant to act because of the lack of support from both students and administration.

However, though he has known since August 27, Kelly has made no effort to tell students.

Since Saturday, interest has been sparked. Tomorrow breakfast, classes, rehearsal of 'As You Like It' and folk-singing will all be held on the road in front of the library. Coffee will also be served to the workmen who are putting up hydro wires near the library. AN ATTEMPT at protest on Friday brought only 10 people.

Although today's protest will likely be well supported, there is no intention of illegally blocking the road.

"A big group of people can peacefully get between the workmen and their work," said Harvey Fox (SGS), co-ordinator of the 'Do it in the Road' activities for today. "Serving coffee to the workmen will give them an alternative to work. We don't have to block the road.

"But if you want to wrap your body around a tree, that's O.K."

HE ADDED THAT "We're against more traffic going down the street. In the interest of St. Michael's College we want St. Joseph's St. closed the way King's College Road is closed, except to local traffic. Hopefully we can get it left alone.

Prof. W. B. Dunphy of the Philosophy Department at SMC said that "the College and the University Community have a right to hear the possible justification that the city can give for disrupting the community. The students' classrooms are on one side of the street and their library is on the other side. Work must be halted until reasons are given and justified."

THIS MORNING when the deputation is brought before the Public Works Committee by Ted McGee and (hopefully) Fr. Kelly, the principal of SMC, the strategy will be focussed on fairness. They will be stressing the necessity of public discussion of the decision, as suggested by Dunphy, as opposed to presenting alternatives to the city plans.

However, the Urban Sociology Department of the U of T is working on alternative solutions to the traffic problem.

The fact that St. Joseph St. expansion is a corollary of the Spadina Expressway involves the whole university in the SMC struggle.

Just as the U of T has been trying to close St. George and Huron Sts. for years, so Fr. Kelly has been trying to close St. Joseph St. to all but local traffic. Both sets of administrators have failed and seemingly have given up.

The motion to widen St. Joseph St. was defeated once by the Public Works Commission but was passed in a barrage of motions before two unknowing aldermen, June Marks and Horace Brown. "Both the aldermen and the administration were led astray by the middle bureaucracy," said Fox.

Today's delegation goes before the Public Works Commission, headed by Ray Bremner.

Fox quotes Bremner as saying that "traffic makes safe streets," and questions the Commissioner's interest in the community.

He also adds that Bremner alone can remedy the situation if he wishes. "He can do permanently what any radical can only do temporarily."

Crowds of up to 5,000 people turned up on front campus last Friday for Day One. See Story and Pictures pages 6 and 7.

Day One at U of T was a sprawling lawn party

By LAURA KELLY

The U of T lawn party, officially known as the Day One Festival, was a casual affair, organized by the Students Administrative Council.

Across the front campus Friday afternoon students wandered into hour-long jam sessions by the Northern Lunatic Fringe of the Youth International Party, past the steady chants of the Hare Krishna advocates, and through workshops on sports and politics.

The driving beat of the Lunatic Fringe that inspired the unconventional free dancing of Prof. Logan, a U of T physics instructor, brought many observers to their feet with the culminating chant for "freedom, peace, freedom!"

This centre of attention was rivaled only by the unidentified "Christian" who could quote the Bible at length and emphatically announced the hopelessness of the Hare Krishna believers and anybody else who failed "to love God above all else."

Along the sidewalks campus groups formed an ideological midway where one could obtain information on anything from Women's Liberation to Pollution Probe.

Originally the festival was intended as an effort to orient students to the massive U of T organization, but it was hampered by the separate colleges' refusals to devote full time help for the program because of preoccupation with their own orientation plans.

Several kinks in the machinery dulled the festival itself, however, as defective sound equipment provided Edward Bear with an excuse to leave after one song and the Crowbar, another rock band, as well as Claude Bissell, never came at all.

While disappointments in the entertainment line-up thinned the crowds in the evening, nothing much will dilute the SAC bills for the venture, now estimated from $4,300 to $5,000.

The biggest break for the festival was Beaver Foods' donation of stew for 10,000 people.

'Do anything,' McLuhan urges at SMC

By CHRIS DYMOND

As city work crews start ripping up St. Joseph Street this morning to create a potential artery for the Spadina Expressway, a delegation from St. Michael's College will go to City Hall to protest the move.

Professor P. R. O'Driscoll, a St. Mike's faculty member, said he will demand a public hearing into the matter. He said an alternative such as a one-way street or a ban on parking could eliminate the traffic problem.

The month-long construction period will divide the campus with a four lane highway between Queen's Park and Bay St. Construction noise and added traffic threaten to disrupt serenity in the new library and other college buildings.

16 mature trees along the route will be destroyed.

The college was first notified of the plan on Aug. 27 and given just five days to show cause as to why the city should not proceed. A legal advisor said that while St. Michael's could delay action a year they would eventually lose since the city owns land.

Father John Kelly, SMC President pointed out the similarity between this case and one in 1920. Bay St. was being extended north across the college property. The five year court battle was decided against St. Michael's by the Privy Council.

"We don't have the legal grounds now we had in the 20's and we lost then," points out Kelly who considers the issue lost.

Marshall McLuhan who teaches English at St. Mike's considers further action imperative. "Since legalism is playing the role of the enemy," he urged the SMC Students' Council to "Climb trees. Do anything. Protest. Throw these people out."

The library's year-old flagstone terrace has been torn up already, though the city's earlier acceptance of the plans constitutes a contract according to librarian J. B. Black.

The terrace cost $10,000. SMC, long isolated from the main campus is now threatened with internal fragmentation. The route will sever the library, new classrooms and the St. Joseph's residence from the rest of the campus.

Moreover, traffic hazards have plagued the campus every term. Last year two students were struck by cars on Queen's Park Crescent. J. E. Bruns, a faculty member, suffered a broken collar bone and shoulder last year on a Bay St. crosswalk.

Greg Duffey, President of the SMC Students' Council said they plan no formal protest against the action.

"St. Michael's students aren't really interested in demonstrating. We'll protest if the street isn't restored but that road is going through."

Most college students were unaware of the expansion plans as Duffey's decision was made without consultation with students on the matter.

"If people manifest rage, you get action," says McLuhan.

SACpress poster error creates confusion

Ethic ethnic? Ethnic ethnic?

The dubious joys of the English language were lost on the SAC print shop, which created a mass of Day One posters advertising an "Ethnic Imperialism" seminar.

Firebrands of various minority groups no doubt found the title quite provocative, though it is difficult to say how many of them turned up at the workshop to discover that it was really all about "Ethical Imperialism".

That's "ethical" — the theoreticcal question of the validity of ethics and moral principles. Those who organized the workshop at the International Students' Centre wished to discuss the use of persuasive tactics to make people ascribe to norms.

The typesetter's slip that transformed "ethical" into "ethnie" occurred at a forever-lost moment in the SAC print shop.

The speakers — James Graff, Philip McKenna, Lorene Smith and Graeme Nicholson — expounded their views for about two hours in an atmosphere of dead silence while the audience slowly tiptoed out the door.

Three students who had come prepared to discuss the rights of minority groups in Canada and the B & B Commission in particular, expressed their disappointment concerning the misrepresented topic and commented that "the speakers didn't know what they were saying."

The speakers, however, maintained that the discussion concerned "hot issues".

Wafflers rap on colonial university

By KEN Mc EVOY

Over 100 people crowded into Sid Smith 2118 Wednesday to hear Wafflers Mel Watkins, John Warnock, and Bret Smiley discuss "The Branch Plant University — The American Empire and the U of T".

The teach-in was the first event sponsored by the new campus Waffle group.

WATKINS TOLD the gathering that Canada was the most advanced colony of the United States, and that there was more American ownership in Canada than in any other country — about the same as in all of Europe.

Regarding the proposed energy sell-out, he said "Because of recent events in Peru and Chile, Canada is the last safe colony, and Canadian officials are only too pleased to go along with the deal".

U of T political science professor Mel Watkins said that a campus Waffle group would have to concern itself with issues of curriculum, governing structure, and discipline. "We must ask if changes in the governing structures have any real meaning in the terms of a grass-roots democratization which will give people control of the decisions that affect them. It is our duty as intellectuals not to rationalize the society we live in, but to criticize it."

JOHN WARNOCK, a former professor at the University of Saskatchewan now teaching at Glendon said that the Waffle should attack the university from within the university.

"Most jobs are terrible but our parents have adjusted. We must promote a rebellion against an alienating society by working within the educational system. We must confront the ideology in the department and in the classes to break down the philosophy of liberalism which is presently rampant."

Warnock told of the situation at Saskatoon, where there is a boycott on the hiring of any graduates from Simon Fraser, and any undergraduates transferring from S.F.U. must re-enroll in first year.

BRET SMILEY, a former CUS organizer now at OISE explained that the university had become integrated into the political economy of the country, and was essential to the running of capitalism.

"The university had become an institution that prepares men to sell themselves on a white-collar labour market."

He called on the campus Waffle group to begin by pointing out the contradiction that exists between the rhetoric and the reality of the university, which manifests itself in apathy on campus. "There must be a struggle for democratization, and a transformation of power relationships within the university."

"AT THE UNIVERSITY, students go through a socialization and a destruction of their critical faculties, if they have any left after 13 years of schooling."

"Students", he pointed out, "are a social force. They have real power to affect changes."

"All the demands (that a campus Waffle group would make) are related in that they oppose one central dynamic: the dynamic of resource accumulation, the dynamic that puts profit above people."

ON AMERICANIZATION ISSUE, Smiley commented that, "in this country, power is centralized in the hands of a few people, most of whom aren't in this country".

The Waffle group's next meeting, to formally establish and discuss organization of a campus group, will be held this evening in the Bickersteth room in Hart House at 7:30 p.m.

Tennessee Guard will carry live ammo in campus disruptions

NASHVILLE — The Tennessee National Guard greeted the opening of universities this fall with a resolution to bring live ammunition onto any campuses where disorders occur.

The state adjutant general, Major General Hugh B. Mott said in a local TV station interview:

"I will not send my troops into any engagement of this sort unless they have live ammunition."

Asked if Tennessee could have an incident similar to the shooting of four students at Kent State University last May, Mott replied:

"In all honesty, I would have to say there is that possibility."

Is there a Day Two?

We came together, but what happened?

...Through an extraordinary strategy of anti-student architecture, the university keeps the community of students apart; away from each other, ignorant of each other's needs, oblivious of their collective powers and therefore unable to exercise them.

— Marjaleena Repo
The Varsity, January 20, 1970.

Friday, students at U of T issued a challenge to this time-honoured university polity. Since we, as students, control none of the buildings on this campus (and are barred from many), and, unlike most Canadian students, don't even have a campus centre building we had to do it on the lawn on front campus.

1,000 red balloons, with fists.
300 gallons of stew.
$1,000 worth of music.

Sound equipment, a stage, lighting.
For a rock festival it went fairly well.

There were the usual problems, of course. Edward Bear played about half a song (but will still get paid), and Crowbar didn't turn up at all.

The politics of the event (the Political Politics) remained discreetly in the background, hawking their papers, rapping with bypassers.

The rock music was the dominating focus of the day, and it shouldn't have been. Even the guerilla theatre was forced to fit into the structured pattern of events: as another spectacle.

For an orientation program, it was fine also. We avoided the petty humiliations which characterize traditional initiation rites, and we took people's minds off of their boredom for at least a few hours.

Day One did not turn into the massive orientation program it might have. Day

One failed to confront and challenge either the structure or the behaviour of the university as an institution.

The New University of Toronto does not exist. It's still the same old place.

And students look on it either as a mythical temple of knowledge or simply as a place to get the education to get the job to get the money to get ahead.

As one of society's primary institutions, it contains all the main contradictions which beset the world at large.

It will take a long time even to begin to understand this institution, to understand the ways in which it prepares us to accept, by and large, the way the world is.

That's one thing The Varsity should do this year, especially by examining closely, with your help, the real work of the university which takes place in the lecture halls and seminar rooms.

Social controls are not great imposing prohibitive edicts issued from on high by the powers that be. They operate in far subtler fashion, mostly by becoming an integral part of the subject to be controlled.

The inculcation of values which will reinforce the status quo and which will deprive people of independent initiatives and fit them into noncombustible packages, is the primary function of the university in training its population.

We don't know what the rules are, because they're inside of us.

The only way we can get to see them is by breaking them.

The trouble with Day One was that we didn't break any rules.

We behaved as consumers.

We came together, but we failed to find out anything about either ourselves or this university.

Some they like, others they shaft

I find the case of Professor Gabriel Kolko reported in Wednesday's Varsity very ironic and very telling. Professor Kolko is an expert in American foreign policy who is being denied landed immigrant status even though he has a tenured position at York University.

Is it not strange that our government likes some American professors so much that they are willing to give them a two year tax holiday so that Canadian students can have the privilege of hearing their liberal, pro-American-imperialist doubletalk?

Is it not also strange that when one of the only American academics who might have anything to offer the struggle for Canadian liberation tries to obtain landed immigrant status, he finds it harder to get into Canada than a deserter from the U.S. army?

But then that's because Kolko is a bit different from 99.9 per cent of the American academics who preach here. He is a well-known anti-imperialist who has analysed carefully the American colonization of the world, including Canada. He also acknowledges, as do few American academics here, the necessity of a national liberation struggle of the Canadian people against U.S. imperialism. Other American profits will tell you that it's a sorry shame that the U.S. is in Vietnam but then that's why they came here (aren't we lucky?) to escape the nasty pigs, to breathe the freer and to shun the intellectual flea market to the south (well, for two years at least). Now, class, let's get back to Soc 297 (Elites and Strata in a Small American Midwest Town).

Let's take another example of an anti-imperialist American prof getting it in the ear. Professor Victor Wightman, a professor of linguistics and sociology at Lakehead University, was handed notice last year after he appeared on a television show and exposed Kimberly Clark Pulp & Paper Co. as exploiter of the people of Terrace Bay, a company town.

The company headquarters in Wisconsin, USA dashed off a letter to Lakehead recipient of donations from KC Co.), suggesting that maybe Wightman might be more suitable away from Lakehead. No sooner said than done.

'Radicalism for the hell of it'

The Varsity headline read "Welcome to Day One of the New University of Toronto". In the middle of the morning, I was trying to find Mike Kaufmann (rhymes with Hoffmann) to inform him that there was a CBC man crying on my shoulder, informing me that disorder was not the same thing as disorientation and "nobody knows what the hell is going on". He continued:

"For Chrissake, I've never met such a bunch of idiots in my life. I'd get in there and show them how to organize it, except that newsmen aren't supposed to do that sort of thing."

Mike was too busy to do anything about the fuming media man, so I dashed back to the U.C. Quad where Renaissance '71 was organizing a paint-in for Day One. The paint-in went very well. Essels were set up in the Quad grass, and students worked on them, in groups or singly, as the inclination struck them, until the end of the afternoon.

Elsewhere on campus, things were not going so well. Sound systems failed and scheduled Notes from under the marshmallow...

English students provided Doy One of the New University of Toronto with one of its few moments of excitement on originality.

They handed out more than 4,000 marshmallows to the assembled students and few faculty who turned up for the marshmallow roast. The reason the faculty failed to show, as the following story points out, was that the chairman of the Combined Departments of English took the threat of the marshmallow roast seriously enough to send out an official memo disowning it.

In addition to marshmallow distribution, the event featured a sample exomino-fion.

Tomorrow of noon, English students of University, New and Innis. Colleges gather in the West Hall of UC to discuss two important matters:

- the necessity of exams in 100, 200 and some 300 Series courses,
- the faculty-made rule that students who have not enrolled in at least three English courses cannot represent students in the department.

The following discussion was prepared by William J. Hevey.

A few people attempted to alter the nature of the English Departments last week by seizing the initiative to create a situation in which the rules were not broken but were also not relevant, where it was possible to be political but not malevolent, educational yet celebratory.

The English Marshmallow Roast developed out of the awareness of some students that our Department was to a large extent busy answering the questions that no one asked, while remaining deaf to the relevant questions that could change the nature of our education.

We had found ourselves powerless as individuals, co-opted and engulfed by the marshmallow nature of the bureaucracy when we attempted to negotiate through course unions and staff-student committees — where confrontation is gentlemanly until the system graduates you — always before it is possible to change the essential nature of the learning process.

The Marshmallow Roast was, in fact, particularly suited to the nature of English. Since it involved the presentation of theatre, the writing of song and script, it was a legitimate exercise in the use of the language that we teach and study. Nonetheless, the response from the bureaucrats was systematic and predictable: "To all members of staff, in response to several queries, it might be noted that the invitation to the Marshmallow Roast, from the Combined Departments of English" was issued not from the CDE office but from an undergraduate source. . . . The fact that we were deemed to be undergraduates (although not all of us were) was a sufficient statement to the effect that it was believed that we had nothing relevant to say.

For the great majority of the staff the nature of the event and the fact that it was student-initiated could be seen only as a breach of decorum, a slander upon the discipline, an event outside the realm of their dignity. They expressed their feelings by slaying away even though the chairman did not "admonish them not to attend the function". As for the staff who came many showed their willingness to accept the fact that students exist as human beings outside the context of the classroom.

Some others appeared as critical witnesses to

The Varsity — Gary Wieland

English students parody examination procedures at the Marshmallow Roast.

One could also speculate as to whether Day One was all about "Peoples' Culture"; I think it was set up so that we could view those who are already exclusive and call it involvement.

Free food (courtesy of Beaver Foods) does not mean free money (courtesy of Day One organizers). The Roman Empire at one time had a policy of Bread and Circuses. There's something radically wrong when our culture is a standstill, our civilization has over a sixty per cent chance of dying and the Big Talk around campus for a week is Abbie Hoffman's cancellation. There are real radical issues, but but I think we're back to another year of radicalization for the hell of it.

Alexandra Mercer, Renaissance '71 Canadian Universities' Arts Festival

a "spectacle". And as one prof noted "the presence of a bullhorn must be seen as a classical instrument of oppression." One feels that the real oppression is not the means that we might use to speak, but the fact that we might speak at all and that we might even have something worth saying about our educations.

As for the students, it might be said that we failed, since only about a hundred of the several thousand who study English took the trouble to attend. But again, it was predictable that many students don't care about the content of their education if it gets them a degree and a job at the end. It is also obvious that one cannot give political awareness to someone who doesn't want it. The majority of those who respond to the failures of the university as individuals will continue to do so, regardless of their failure to create changes.

Deeper insight shows that we did not fail and in many ways the Marshmallow Roast was the best thing that has ever happened in the English Department. First of all, it was fun for the people who came. Secondly, most of the people involved in putting on the marshmallow roast were old negotiators. Students who had sat on committees were aware of the political structures and conscious of the failures in terms of the content and the undemocratic nature of their education.

That we began to speak our own language, that we began to relate to ourselves and friends who appeared, that for at least a brief period of time we overtook the language and engulfment of the bureaucracy, represented a degree of personal liberation. In the process, we also learned that we were not alone and that there were a few people on the staff, among fellow students, and in the graduate school who understood what we were talking about. We will be together with these people and will take responsibility for our own educations — continuing to put on theatre to attempt to convert but in the attempt to discover ourselves and the true nature of the discipline we are attempting to study.

There is no going backwards toward the Marshmallow nature of committee meetings, endless debate and ultimate co-optation. For those who are alarmed at the fact that we are aware of our freedom to act (however non-violently) prior to our graduation, it will not be a quiet and civilized year. For our brothers and sisters who have not yet acted with us, know that we love you and welcome you to the next attempt. And if you want to do it, and ask us to come, we will.

Watkins attacks U.S. in Day One speech

By FRANC STURINO

U of T professor Melville Watkins, leader of the Waffle faction of the New Democratic Party vigorously attacked the American Empire on Canadian campuses Friday at Day One of the New University of Toronto.

Keeping a diversified audience of about 200 attentive and provoked he came out in support of the Mathews-Steele thesis which proposed that a quota system be introduced to limit the number of American professors in Canadian faculties. Not only would this save Canadian jobs for Canadians but it would help stop the infiltration of American scholarship and culture into the campus, he said.

He also pointed out that the Canadian Immigration Department controls the selection of scholars who are able to reside in Canada and that, in general, only those who meet the political philosophy of our capitalist government are allowed to reside here. The Canadian government's refusal to grant citizenship to Prof. Gabriel Kolko (a historian critical of American policies) of York University is a case in point, he said.

Watkins suggested his own criterion for the selection of American scholars: that they be aware of Canada's problems and its distinct way of life.

Watkins was also critical of the class bias in universities and called for greater representation of the working class: "Why isn't this a free university? Why do we still have a class structure?" he demanded.

He called the Ontario Conservatives' scheme to remedy the situation (the Educational Opportunity Bank) a useless gesture which would leave the class bias basically unchanged.

Referring to the student protest movement, Watkins reminded his audience that for revolution and socialism to succeed, the support of the workers was necessary. He remarked that only through socialism could a viable Canadian independence be obtained. "Our complaints about capitalism are too serious to replace American capitalism with Canadian capitalism," he said.

Switching over to the topic of American domination of Canadian unions, Watkins criticized U.S. control of Canadian unions, which he said complement American run industry.

He urged that Canadian unions dissociate themselves from their U.S. bosses. This is necessary he said, because "with strong imperialist unions we cannot have an independent, socialist Canada." He added that union independence was possible since "there is more nationalism in unions than is suspected.

Watkn

Watkins also advocated a new democratization within unions with the introduction of the secret ballot as a first step. "Presidents of unions stay in power longer than presidents of universities", he said.

Kidd protests export of athletes to U.S.

By IAN MACLAREN

"There is no protest of the wholesale export of hockey players to the U.S., a condition parallel to the export of energy and many other of our community resources," said Bruce Kidd, speaking Friday at U. of T.'s Day One.

Kidd proposed his own solution; a plan to establish a truly Canadian hockey league of 15 teams, providing that the organization of each franchise is democratically run by the members of the community on a non-profit basis.

"Professional hockey as it is now is basically the commercialism of a community activity produced by the community wherein membership on a minor league team is a puberty rite."

He also maintained that there would be a better chance of keeping Canadian talent Canadian if there were more examples of people such as Bill Crothers, Beverly Boys, Elaine Tanner who made it big while remaining in Canada.

Kidd went on to discuss the predicament of athletes: "There are no adult athletes in Canadian sport because athletes are treated by coaches and spectators alike as delinquents or epsilon semi-morons." As a result, "many young people and adults are reluctant to follow sport because they consider athletes children."

"Those in power in sport have always tried to drive a wedge between intelligence and sport. Conn Smythe, for instance, always said that he never trusted a player who had more than a grade XII education. Well, many athletes don't realistically consider an academic future because the demands that schools make on athletes are abnormally high."

Says Kidd, "The tradition of conservatism among Canadian athletes is hard to break. Most athletes refuse to counter any of the indignities imposed upon them. They find it easier to play up to the image expected of them than to fight it and continually get hassled for fighting it. Until you get a political consciousness among athletes, they will not protest their position and their image will not change.

"Even when that consciousness unites athletes, they will still have to contend with groups such as the IOC (International Olympic Committee) the most autocratic committee in the world. After all, how do you make changes within a committee that appoints its own members?"

Commercialism of sport certainly doesn't help. Watching commercials where big league stars advertise products with sales pitches such as, "Thas right Mel, this stuff here is real good fur ma hairs," certainly don't give one a favourable impression of the athlete.

Speaking of the participation in sports by young people in Canada, Kidd said, "Playing a sport is an opportunity cost that not everybody can afford. Most sports demand two hours of work a day, and for kids who have a job after school to help the family or on weekends when the meets take place, two hours playing a sport is money down the drain."

And for those who want to play sports? "Hart House is the only building in Toronto where a community has access to sports facilities, and who (what class) has access to the university?"

Sitting, listening to Bruce Kidd, a very articulate and sincere guy, makes you think that the image of athletes and the future of Canadian athletics will change. Among his long-range plans are hopes for a berth on the next Olympic team. He still trains everyday "for the pure physical pleasure derived from running. It's therapeutic to run in the evening after fighting people in meetings all day."

Presently, Bruce Kidd is seeking the NDP nomination in the Toronto riding of Beaches-Woodbine.

Long distance calls liberated by theatre

by A. G. BELL

A totally irresponsible skit on how to make free long-distance telephone calls at the expense of large corporations was part of Friday's festival.

Here's how. Call from a pay telephone and give the operator a credit card number in the name of some large company. The formula for the number is as follows: S- followed by the phone number of the company, followed by 478. Call station-to-station. If the number at the other end is questioned they should deny receiving the call.

Some telephone numbers are:
 Dow Chemical — 920-5520
 Electric Reduction (ERCO) — 239-7111
 Imperial Oil — 924-9111
 Eaton's — 861-3111

Cleveland attacks resource exploitation

By JEAN BUBBA

Canadians may have a tradition of forgive and forget, but it's doubtful whether they would enforce it, as far as Gord Cleveland is concerned. When Cleveland, an organizer for Ontario New Democratic Youth, talks about exploitation of Canada's resources, not even Canadians are safe from the young Waffler's grill.

Under the shadow of a faded Canadian flag, Cleveland brought forth the Waffle figures:

"The U.S. consumes 65 per cent of the world's natural gas resources but has only 7.6 per cent of the world's population," he said. "A socialist resource policy advocates export and foreign trade, which does not favour the U.S. Since the U.S. has enough already, we don't want what the States has anyway, and they are suffering from over-industrialization."

Public ownership of resources is an integral part of the practical working of this policy. "The Canadian public is owner of Canadian resources and has control over their allocation," said Cleveland.

But U.S. imperialism alone does not an angry young man make.

What about the Maritimes, an economically depressed region?

According to Cleveland, the Waffle arm of the NDP is seeking "the end of exploitation of the Western and Eastern provinces by Central Canada. This would prevent the prices of consumer goods from being artificially high and bring processing plants to the Maritimes."

"Resources (in the Maritimes) are exploited so badly that people up here don't even know there's any resources down there," he said.

And as Canada ignores her provinces beyond Quebec, the U.S. is buying up large tracts of land in this same area to modernize and mechanize the farming industry.

"Which proves that Americans are better capitalists than the present owners," said Cleveland.

He did not want to attach ecological arguments to enforce those against imperialism, and made a distinction between pollution and resources. "They require a different solution. Those who can pay for a solution will get one."

Hesitant optimism

Palestinian describes revolution

By RICHARD DOLLINGER
The hesitant optimism of the Palestine revolution was described by Maad Zaida, a Palestinian guerrilla as he spoke at a forum sponsored by the Young Socialists at the College of Education Friday night. Recently returned from Jordan, where he has had an active part in the guerrilla movement, he attempted to give a character to the movement against the reactionary government of King Hussein. In a barely audible monotone, he proceeded to discuss the development of the movement and its apparent successes. He denounced the regime of King Hussein as a "criminal puppet of the imperial powers." Included in this was a vivid description of such atrocities as the murder of children in Amman and the slaughter of prisoners on the order of the King. Despite the overwhelming pessimism of such ideas, the keynote of the speech was optimism in his reflections on the revolution. He said that the people were learning new facts of life and that they would be able to rule themselves. He cited towns where the Arabs had already succeeded in establishing forms of local democracy, though these are still few in number.

Butterflies were waiting to protest Abbie

By BECKI WEST

If Abbie Hoffman had shown up for his speaking engagement at Day One of the New University of Toronto Friday, there would have been BUTTERFLIES in the crowd.

BUTTERFLIES are — or were — creatures interested in Better Universities to Transmit Education Realistically For Living in Efficacious Societies. The movement, a "positive" and "apolitical" one in the words of its founder Peggie Karfilis (Vic II), was hatched less than two weeks ago, just after the exciting announcement of Hoffman's proposed visit.

"Our reason for being in existence was to respond, positively, to the negativism of Abbie Hoffman," said Miss Karfilis Friday. "I object to Hoffman imposing his life style on me. Free speech, yes. Definitely. But that means that I have my say too.

"We did not want to criticize SAC for inviting him, we did not even want to criticize Hoffman himself. We are not reactionary. We just wanted to make a same and positive statement to the students that they have a third choice — Hoffman, the Burkers, or us.

"But when Hoffman copped out," Miss Karfilis continued, "our raison d'etre was gone. We would have been uninvited at the festival, we would have no purpose."

The BUTTERFLIES' reason for flocking together had not been to disrupt or actively challenge Hoffman's performance.

Plans were to set up a little butterfly booth called the "Demilitarized Zone", where those not incited to riot could peruse pamphlets and Dear Abby letters, sip pink lemonade poured by a human being enclosed in a gorilla suit, or pick up a butterfly button.

BUTTERFLIES do not assault people with ranting and raving and four-letter words. "We could not profit unless people made a conscious effort to talk to our group," said Miss Karfilis.

"It's a matter of wanting to be left alone to live my life," she said. "That sounds so corny, but Hoffman and his followers are intent on making it clear that everybody's divided up into their side and "Them". If their side ever won, and since I'm not on their side, I stand a chance of being shot in the back just like the students at Kent.

Miss Karfilis said that even though their Day One non-demonstration could not come to pass, the Butterflies made their point and the people noticed. CBC wanted to do a program on the BUTTERFLIES, but since Hoffman was unable to attend Miss Karfilis declined.

And getting those eye-lashes on in under 15 minutes is next to impossible. That monthly period is a drag. Well, that is, unless you use Tampax tampons.

Tampax tampons are modern sanitary protection worn internally. You don't have the bother of uncomfortable pads and belts. Tampax tampons are great. They don't show — no one will ever know it's that time of the month. And you can't feel them when they're properly in place. A doctor developed Tampax tampons, so you know you can trust them. Millions of women all over the world do. How about you?

Tampax tampons come in three absorbency-sizes — Regular, Super and Junior — and a little folder in every package explains exactly how to use them.

Called 'mindless show'

Trinity frosh fail to plate cake

By ANN WILTON

In what one student called "a mindless show of virility," first year Trinity men attempted Friday to physically overpower their second year opponents at the annual Trinity cake fight.

The object of the cake fight was simply to place some cake dutifully baked by first year women on the sundial in the Trinity quadrangle.

The second year men formed a human wall in an archway to defend the sundial while third year thrill-seekers, leaning from their lofty turret, poured a mixture of dog food, wall paper paste and manure on the hapless contestants.

And the outcome of the Olympian combat? Second year repulsed the first year thrust — successfully defending honour, pride and sundial.

The reaction of the spectators varied,

Arlen McFarlen deemed the event "a horror show," while to Robin Philpot "it was really good. It was gory."

"It's one of the wonderful traditions of Trinity College," mused Don Robson.

Rugger teams open as winners

By STUDLEY

The Rugger Blues opened their 1970 season with two well-fought wins over the University of Michigan in exhibition play on Saturday afternoon.

With only six members returning from the team that won the OQAA championship last year, Blues fielded relatively new blood on the "first fifteen".

The rugby was good in spurts and Blues opened the scoring early in the first half when Ian Owens split the uprights with a penalty kick.

The play seasawed throughout the first half with the score remaining 3-0 Blues.

Michigan came back strong and tied the game with a penalty goal by David Thomas early in the second half.

Remembering the defeat in last year's confrontation, Blues came back with a good effort in the loose and defensive play led by Dan McAllister and Mike Code.

Ian Owens again put Blues out in front 6-3 with a penalty drop-kick midway through the second half. Michigan threatened with downfield kicks but McKenna, last year's defensive stalwart, was sure with his tackling and kicking as fullback.

Blues capitalized on good rucking by the forwards and hard running by the backs when Eric Seery went over for an unconverted try over the corner flag on the left wing to account for the final 9-3 victory.

Blues second fifteen were equally triumphant led by Sifto Salt to a win over the Michigan seconds.

Ross Gobby scored a try early in the first half which was converted by Ian Jones.

Michigan came back with a try by Hendrickson while Jones kicked a penalty for the Blues making the score 8-3 at the half.

A late try by Michigan's Johnson was the only scoring in the second half and gave Blues seconds a well-earned 8-6 victory.

Last minute TD earns Blues a tie

Blues 23, McGill 23 in opener

By LYNDON LITTLE

After 10 pages of notes and a handful of quotes it still comes down to only one word — incredible!

That's just about the only way to describe Blues' heart-stopping, come-from-behind, tie with the McGill Redmen Saturday afternoon in Montreal.

Blues trailed Tom Mooney's defending Yates Cup champs by 23-15 with little more than six minutes remaining to play. With a touchdown and a two-point conversion Blues could still salvage a draw.

Blues were pinned deep in their own end on the 10 yard line.

UP TO THAT POINT. Varsity, had not been able to mount a sustained march in the second half. This, they realized, would probably be their last opportunity to score.

With veteran quarterback Vic Alboini mixing his plays well, Blues moved from their own 10 to the McGill 11 in nine plays.

Now, came what everybody expected was to be the moment of truth as Blues faced a third and 12 situation from the Redmen 13 with only a minute and a few seconds remaining.

On the play, tight end Mike Brierley, a transfer from McMaster who had come into the game earlier in the quarter, was open at the goal line but Alboini threw short into the ground.

Game over — right!
Game over — wrong!
AT THIS STAGE McGill needed only one first down to run out the clock and preserve victory — but someone forgot to tell Blues' defense the game was as good as over.

With the Redmen taking over first-and-ten on their own six yard line, middle linebacker Bill Bennett broke through to throw McGill pivot Dan Smith for a five yard loss. Two plays later, the Redmen were forced to punt and Chris Rumball got away a short kick which Blues' rookie Dave Lodu returned to the McGill 28.

With only 54 seconds remaining, Blues had time for two, maybe three plays.

As it turned out, they needed only one.

The Varsity — Doug Fraser

Blues split end Jack Buchan eludes McGill defender and heads up field for 66 yard gain in first quarter action.

ALBOINI CAME BACK with a similar pattern to Brierley and the 6 foot, 3 inch, tight end grabbed the 28 yard pass over two shorter McGill defenders then stepped over the goal line.

This brought the score to 23-21, and even the drunken Engineers in the stands stopped fighting to watch Blues go for the game-tying, two-point, conversion.

Will the ball spotted on the five thanks to a new rule change, Alboini rolled to his right. In the end zone Eric Walter, Brierley and Bob Morrow were fighting to get open.

It was Morrow, a second-year halfback starting his first league game, who caught the pass.

"I didn't see Bob until the last second — just before I was about to be snowed under", said Alboini in a chaotic Varsity dressing room after the game.

Morrow explained the key play this way.

"Eric went down and cut to the left towards the goal posts. The safety followed him so I broke towards the sidelines and Vic hit me perfectly."

AS THEY LEFT the game, every Toronto fan was bubbling about the last-minute heroics of Alboini, Brierley, and Morrow. However, without four key defensive plays earlier in the game McGill would have had the contest out of reach long before.

Middle linebacker Bill Bennett was in on three of them.

Late in the first quarter, the Redmen had driven to Blues' 43 and a normal punt would have sent Blues back into the proverbial shadows of their goalposts. Bennett broke through to deflect McGill punter Ron Kelly's kick.

Referee Jack Gurney ruled that big Bill hadn't touched the ball and called him for roughing the kicker. Two plays later, Bennett led another fierce Varsity rush that forced a hurried punt from Kelly and Blues were out of danger.

The importance of the second decisive defensive play didn't manifest itself until late in the fourth quarter — but here's what happened.

Following McGill's second touchdown at 2:57 of the second quarter, Blues center Rich Agro executed his normal kickoff-return assignment to the ultimate.

"My job is to go after the kicker", said Agro. "Kelly had his head up watching the flight of the

Soccer tie

A strong second half comeback against the York Yeomen earned the Soccer Blues a 5-5 tie in a game at the York campus on Saturday.

Blues, coached by Bob Nicol, trailed 4-0 at the half but outscored York 4-1 in the second period.

Tony Lavelle had two goals for Blues while John Gero, Ken Cancellera and Ersen Ozerding had singles.

Blues next game is at home against Buffalo State on Wednesday.

ball and I caught him going full speed."

Kelly never knew what hit him and after several minutes of attention from the trainers he retired to the dressing room for the remainder of the afternoon.

The Redmen drove to Blues' 10 yard line late in the fourth quarter and could have put the game out of reach at that point with a field goal. With Kelly unavailable to handle the place-kicking, QB Smith had to try the crucial kick from a slight angle.

Fortunately for Blues, it caromed off the right upright.

The third crucial incident occurred on the last play of the first half with McGill third down on Blues' 15.

Coach Mooney decided to go for the touchdown but Bennett and his linebacking mate, Hartley Stern, blitzed Smith into the ground back on the 27.

The last big play was a blocked convert which followed McGill's third major mid-way through the third quarter. Bennett broke through the Redmen blocking and cleanly smothered Smith's extra point try.

BLUES JUMPED into an early lead in the first quarter when fullback Glen Marckle bulled over from four yards out. The score was set up on a 66 yard pass from Alboini to split end Jack Buchan.

McGill then tied the score before the quarter ended on a 12 yard pass from Smith to speedy flanker Peter Bender.

Blues got that one back at the seven minute mark of the second period when Alboini scored on a two yard keeper behind the blocking of Blues' left side led by guard Gord Whitaker and tackle Peter Van Bodegom.

A two point conversion off a high snap gave Blues a 15-7 lead.

KELLY HIT for a field goal of 28 yards three minutes later to narrow the gap to five points. Then, with only two minutes left in the half Smith and Bender combined once again on a short touchdown pass to give McGill a 17-15 half-time lead.

A 48 yard pass from Smith to flanker Rick Morgan, who got behind Blues' Brian Sichel, set up Bender's second major.

The Redmen widened their margin to 23-15 at 13:18 of the third quarter when shifty Chris Rumball returned a Peter McNabb punt to Blues' one yard line.

Smith slipped over from there then Bennett came on to block the convert setting the stage for the last-minute heroics.

BLUES NOTES . . . The Redmen surprised Blues with their polished pass attack which netted 215 yards. Smith was good on 13 of 32 attempts . . . The McGill running game, however, didn't live up to expectations netting only 10 yards total. Credit Blues' defensive line of Alex, Squires, Jim Bennett, Jim Orfanakos, Bart D'Onofrio and Bill McNamara with a fine effort . . . Blues' all-star flanker Eric Walter was a very weary boy after the game. He filled in at the right defensive halfback spot for the departed Paul McKay and also saw spot duty on offense . . . Alboini had another fine afternoon at quarterback throwing for 242 yards and completing 13 of 28 attempts. Buchan, getting his first chance to start, was the top receiver with 134 yards on 4 catches. KenLee grabbed 6 receptions for 52 yards .

Markle was Blues' top rusher with 63 yards on 13 carries through the tough McGill line . . . Other action in the SIFL's opening week-end of league play saw Frank Cosentino's Mustangs from Western put up a determined show in Kingston before bowing to the Gaels 18-4. Meanwhile, at Waterloo, Ray Johnston's Marauders from McMaster were upsetting this Department's form chart by taking a free-wheeling scoring battle from the Warriors by the score of 1-0.

The Varsity — Doug Fraser

Big tight end Mike Brierley beats McGill's Chris Rumball and cradles last-minute pass for quarterback Vic Alboini.

Vertigo '70 rejects CODA grant

CODA: a 'unique' anti-drug group

THE varsity TORONTO

VOL. 91 — NO. 5
WED., SEPT. 30, 1970

The Council on Drug Abuse is mounting a $1,500,000 campaign to provide the public with the "straight facts" on drug abuse.

Vickers and Benson, a large advertising agency which has done more than $20,000 worth of free work for CODA, prepared the slick black-and-white posters which now saturate the city with explicit messages like: "Sniff, smoke, pop, shoot, die." "You can hide drugs from everyone but yourself." "Drugs are for the sick,"

Vertigo '70, a student-organized week of events focussing on drug use, has turned down a $7,000 donation from the Council on Drug Abuse.

Organizers of Vertigo '70, scheduled for the U of T campus during the week of October 16-24 say they gave back the money because of basic "philosophical differences" with CODA.

"They were doing something we didn't agree with," one Vertigo organizer commented. "Part of our philosophy is not to get involved in the media, to concentrate on small groups.

"We're not into steamrolling, we're not publicity-oriented," he added.

Vertigo '70, organized by the U of T Medical Society, is billed as a "multi-levelled approach" to the use and abuse of drugs. It is aimed primarily at students in the eight Health Sciences programs.

"These students will soon be the legal peddlers of drugs," reads a Vertigo press release, "and will soon be out in the community dealing with the whole drug situation."

But, the organizers point out, there is not a single course in any of the Health Science curricula which deals with problems of drug use and abuse.

Originally, last fall, Vertigo '70 was conceived of as a giant teach-in, probably taking place in Varsity Arena. Since then the concept has been altered to become more of a "learn-in".

The focus will be on making it possible for Health Science students to discover something about the real world of drugs.

The week of main events will be preceded by a weekend retreat for 150 selected students in Algonquin Park, where small groups will meet to probe their own attitudes towards drugs.

The week of Oct. 19-23 will feature evening seminars which will be preceded by outlines of the area for discussion by prominent guest speakers.

A theatre group from Day Top Village, a New York treatment centre for drug addicts, will perform a psychodrama, The Concept, which relates the struggles they, as addicts, have gone through.

Vertigo will also attempt to make people familiar with the large number and variety of drop-in centres which exist in Toronto for drug users.

One important aspect of Vertigo is the contact the organizers hope will take place between Health Science professionals and ordinary kids.

"We hope to have a lot of street kids and drug users involved," said one organizer. "Medical kids have to talk to street kids for the first time and realize that they are human beings..."

Turning down the CODA grant means Vertigo will likely have to cut back on publicity and a projected display area in the Medical Arts Building lobby.

The Vertigo budget, which will exceed $10,000, is funded from several private foundations and service groups, as well as a $2,000 grant from the U of T Students' Administrative Council.

All events, except for Day Top Village and the weekend retreat, will be free.

By RAY CONLOGUE

St. Mike's has won two of three rounds in the road-widening bout at City Hall.

In a meeting of the Liaison Committee between the U of T and the City of Toronto Tuesday afternoon, Alderman William Kibbourn made a motion that City Council be asked to re-open the question of widening St. Joseph Street.

The motion was carried 3-1, with Alderman June Marks opposing.

As a result of the meeting, City Council will consider re-opening the question this afternoon. A two-thirds majority is necessary to get the issue under consideration again.

At the Liaison meeting, Traffic Commissioner Ray Bremner defended the widening, saying that traffic will increase regardless of anybody's feelings on the matter.

"Land use and development have been taken into account in planning work on roads in this area," he said, adding that the University was only one institution among many that had legitimate demands for better roads.

Under questioning from Harvey Fox and Ted McGee of the 'Do it in the Road' committee, it became apparent that only cars had been considered in road use studies. Pedestrian and bicycle counts were non-existent.

Many questioners could not understand how improving an east-west artery like St. Joseph Street would help with the primary problem of moving north-south traffic in rush hour.

Bremner replied that the street had an unused potential for moving traffic that would have to be developed, even if the usefulness of the move was not certain.

Laurentian closes all classes

SUDBURY (CUP) — Laurentian University Senate Monday voted to close down classes this week in a dispute over power relationships within the university's governing bodies.

The move, which amounts to a faculty strike against the Board of Governors, calls for a recess of classes beginning Thurs, Oct. 1.

The Senate wants assurance that "views of faculty and students and administration will be re-elected in university policy as determined by the board".

The feud between the Board, made up of appointees from the community, and the Senate has been developing since last spring.

Early this year, the Senate voted non-confidence in Laurentian Administration President Stanley Mullins.

After a sit-in by the students and cancellation of final exams by the Senate, the Executive Committee capitulated and replaced Mullins.

As the current school year started, faculty members and the Executive Committee were embroiled in a dispute over salaries and the faculty set Sept. 21 as a strike date.

To head off the strike, the Senate passed another censure of the Executive Committee Sept. 20. But the Board of Governors met Friday, Sept. 25, and reaffirmed its confidence in its Executive Committee.

MAN VERSUS DIGGER

SMC students decided to do it around a tree on Monday as the college legally protested the widening of St. Joseph St. Classes were held out of doors, despite the weather, and coffee was served periodically throughout the day. No illegal obstruction of the street took place as the students decided to 'Keep Kool for Kelly,' the principal of SMC.

The Varsity — Gerry Wiseland.

School kids drugged

'Troublemakers' silenced with injections of speed-like drug

WASHINGTON (CUP) — A United States Congressman plans to investigate the use of drugs to quiet overactive school children.

New Jersey's Democratic Representative, Cornelius Gallagher opened hearings Tuesday as chairman of a sub-committee to find out whether drugs are being confined to their medically recognized use in treating brain damaged children. There have been allegations that the drugs are in fact being used to keep normal, bright youngsters from fidgeting in boring classrooms.

One New Jersey man explained that he had refused permission for his seven-year-old daughter to be treated with drugs despite pressure from the school psychologist.

"(The Psychologist) was annoyed with me," he said, "and told me that soon my little girl would start to masturbate as a result of all this extra energy. She made me feel like a stupid, neglectful parent."

In Omaha, Neb., between five and ten per cent of the elementary school children have been led by their teachers into taking "behaviour modifying" drugs. That's 3,000 to 6,000 kids.

Ritalin is the product of early efforts to create an amphetamine-like drug without the negative effects of speed. However amphetamine abusers have begun to ask for it and the drug has been banned in Sweden.

They complain that drug companies encourage the program to increase profits.

There have been reports of the use of the drugs all across the U.S. and researchers in Canada, particularly in Montreal, are also recommending its use for classroom "troublemakers."

The people who run CODA

• from Page One
and "Do you know what you're doing?"

CODA also publishes a series of information pamphlets on drugs for both youngsters and parents. Clues provided for parents include:

"... Loss of interest in school or social relationships... development of furtive habits... wearing of sunglasses at inappropriate times to hide dilated or constricted pupils... long-sleeved shirts worn constantly to hide needle marks on the arms."

The largest donation for CODA's campaign so far has been a $25,000 grant from Koffler Stores Ltd., a drug manufacturer. Murray B. Koffler, president of the firm and a principal founder of CODA in 1968, is now chairman of the council's board of directors.

Seven of CODA's 15 directors are from drug companies.

The board also includes: Frederick Eaton, president of Eaton's of Canada; E.G. Burton, vice-president of Robert Simpson Co.; John F. Bassett, vice-president of the Toronto Telegram; J. Dean Muncester, president of Canadian Tire Corp.; Michael Harrison, vice-president of Southam Press Ltd., and Leon Weinstein, former president of Loblaw Groceries Ltd.

"Drugs are becoming a very big problem in companies," comments Nicholas Leluk, CODA's executive secretary and a 35-year-old pharmacist who joined CODA after working with the federal government's narcotics control division.

SMC is winning in road battle

"Traffic engineering is not one of the precise sciences," he said.

Answering questions from Professor William Dunphy, Bremner said he also had no accident figures for the road.

Among those who spoke in a more general manner about quality of environment was Father Robert Madden, who noted that "The University has the quality of an island," jeopardized by city growth.

In bringing forth his motion, Alderman Kilbourn questioned Bremner's basic assumptions about the future growth of traffic in downtown Toronto. "I foresee the day when there will be no vehicular traffic in large downtown areas of the city."

Contrary to earlier report, no trees on the street would be lost. In addition, St. Joseph Street would remain three lanes (not four, as indicated earlier) with a widening at the 'throat' on Queen's Park Crescent to facilitate turning.

The Public Works meeting featured eloquent speeches from College academics and students that officials found difficult to appreciate.

Marshall McLuhan in particular silenced the politicians with a speech that began: "Moreness... quantitative moreness is the dream of the alcoholic. Road builders are like alcoholics. They hope to find a cure at the bottom of the next bottle."

Although Mr. Bremner did not answer such analogies directly, he did say at Tuesday's meeting different approaches to such problems may be taken in the future.

"There are those among us who would like to have taken a different step, and in the future perhaps such a step will be taken."

The third and final round takes place at Toronto City Council this afternoon at two o'clock.

Simcoe Hall's free food programme

Today President Claude Bissell, will have lunch with the student council presidents of U of T in order to discuss matters of "mutual interest."

Two of the invited council presidents, Students' Administrative Council President Rod Hurd and Graduate Students Union President Larry Hoffman, are a little perturbed by this preferential treatment they are getting.

They think that the money which comes out of student fees and public support of the university should not be spent so that a small number of students can wine and dine with the university president.

Therefore, Hurd and Hoffman have issued a joint invitation:

"If this luncheon is just an opportunity to meet the president, we cannot in good conscience exclude the people of our respective constituencies."

They therefore are extending an invitation to all SAC and GSU members to join them and President Bissell in the Music Room of Hart House, today at 12:15 noon. Lunch will be served at 12:30 in the South Dining Room.

If you can make it, you should contact S. G. Hennessey at Hart House, 928-2436.

Contradictions....

This is Miss Purity, U of T's entry in the transcontinental Clean Air Car Race. It runs on a hybrid electric-propane engine and does not pollute. Building of the car had to be sponsored by foundation and private grants to U of T students and faculty. It cost about $20,000 to build.

Consider the following:

General Motors (for instance) nets over $1.7 billion in clear profit every year from its many products. But the same corporation spends only $40 million a year (two per cent of their profits) on cleaner engine research.

GM spends $600 million a year for style changes and $300 million for advertising.

CODA colours

All over the city people who are working with drug users frown on the scare campaign mounted by the Council on Drug Abuse.

The paranoia reflected in CODA's slick posters — "Drugs are for the sick" — will never succeed in talking to young kids who are hung up on drugs. All CODA will do is help cement unreasoning and distrustful attitudes towards drug-users among parents and the public at large.

The roster of top corporate executives which comprises the CODA board of directors reveals the seriousness with which business regards the use of drugs.

The tendency of euphoric drugs like marijuana is to dull the edge of the prized characteristics of individualism and competitiveness and acquisitiveness on which capitalism is based. Which is why business is paranoid.

It was unavoidable that CODA's outlook on the problem clashed head-on with that of the organizers of Vertigo '70 next month at U of T. Let's look forward to some valuable and analytical discussions.

OISE: how to de-Canadianize $60 million

The Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, which occupies a palatial $60 million building on Bloor St., is on the firing line today for being a heavily-Americanized institution.

Supporters of the Canadian Liberation Movement charge that OISE is "serving not the people of Ontario, but U.S. imperialism" and they have published a lengthy documentary report explaining how.

Ever since the institute, a policy-making and training centre for Ontario educators, opened in 1965, it has been going through a steady process of de-Canadianization, says the CLM report, published in the September issue of New Canada.

In that first year the faculty was 80 per cent Canadian; now it is only 50 per cent Canadian. Thirty-five per cent of the faculty are Americans.

Two years ago, three out of ten departmental chairmen at OISE were Canadians, and 11 out of 14 administrators were Canadians. Now, only three of ten chairmen and eight of 16 administrators are Canadians.

The chairmen of the two largest departments, Applied Psychology and Curriculum, are both Americans, the report notes. The latter department, which "has the primary responsibility for creating curriculum for Ontario Schools", had six Canadians and 9 Americans on staff last year.

"The effect of this trend," says the report, "is clear and frightening: the control of OISE is rapidly shifting from Canadians to Americans. If it is allowed to continue OISE may well be firmly controlled by Americans within two years."

In the Department of Educational Administration, where last year there were 6 Canadians and 9 Americans, the Department Head, Barr Greenfield, says:

"... the best way to improve Canadian education and our society generally is to increase the import of educated brains.

"I am glad many persons from other countries have come to assist Canadians in this task since it is clear we would have been ineffective without them."

"... Since Canadian society is not a unique and uniform entity, it may with justification be regarded as a variant of American society and both as manifestations of a broader western culture," he continues.

These quotes were taken from a lengthy reply Greenfield wrote to a report written by a colleague at OISE, Robert Laxer, who suggested research into the Americanization of OISE and possible implementation of a quota system at the Institute.

The CLM position is that "... Content of studies should take proper account of Canada, Canada's land, its peoples, their history, their culture, their means of livelihood, and their relations with other peoples of the world."

OISE's failure to do this is summed up in the fact that there are no French Canadians, Italians, Greeks, Indians or representatives of other sectors of Ontario's culture on the OISE staff.

The CLM report suggests there are two major reasons for the Americanization of OISE:

- the fact that there is a surplus of education professors in the U.S. who can't find jobs,

- the concern at OISE to rise above "parochial" standards and acquire prestige on the international circuit, which translates into setting American standards and using American professors.

The attractively high salaries at OISE (an average of $17,700 last year) are an added incentive. Furthermore, the federal government's income tax policy grants two years of tax exemption to all foreign professors in Canada.

The Canadian Liberation Movement will march from Hart House this afternoon at 3:30 p.m. They are demanding that foreign faculty in all institutions of higher learning be limited to 15 per cent of the faculty, and that administrative positions be held exclusively by Canadians.

Critics of the Americanization of OISE will march on OISE headquarters this afternoon.

ANNOUNCING.....

The first annual first Varsity staff meet-in'. Come and grind your axe, bury your crossness and tap your heels in scintillation thyme to the raps and vibes and stuff. There's a lot of things to talk about — come old, come new, anybody too — one thing is the next Friday supplementary issue of the paper which will be a week Friday. (The monopoly game was the first one.) Next Friday we zero in on PoPoPoPOLLUTION, the greatest thing since sliced bread, and hopefully will do a good solid critic of why things like Pollution Probe and Zero Population and etc. are so popular these days.

Check in at the meeting Thursday at 1 p.m. At the office. Boy, do we need help!

Music and protest

At certain times during its history, the United States has paused on the edge of a new epoch, unable momentarily to open the door. But doors must be opened and progress be made if a country is to maintain its national vitality and identity.

The sixties were the beginning of such an epoch, and the New Left is forcing open the door. The outset of a new political era is similar to the breaking of a dam. Problems which have accumulated in the years of apathy, issues that have suffered neglect, energies which have been discarded — all suddenly tumble as in a desperate, angry flood, cleansing many of the country's false ideals, and washing away many of its rotted institutions.

Bob Dylan, feeling the flood's first trickle, prophetically warns us not to oppose social change, or else we will find ourselves lost in the current:

*Come gather 'round people wherever you roam
And admit that the waters around you have grown
And accept it that soon you'll be drenched to the bone
If your time to you is worth savin'
Then you better start swimmin' or you'll sink like a stone
For the times they are a' changing*

Folk music not only reflects the thoughts, moods and events of a particular time, but it also inspires them. The sixties, with the growth of protest, produced a new era of talk music.

The activist leaders of the New Left are probably the brightest, most restless, most dynamic members of their generation. They are not unhappy rejects taking out their failures on society. Most of them have rejected affluence and success to say and do what they believe in, whether it be to "freedom ride" in Alabama, Protest against the war in Vietnam, or "occupy" university buildings for student power.

Although the New Left encompasses people of diverse beliefs and aims — hippies, anarchists, humanist, power seekers, revolutionaries, Maoists, Leninists, existentialists, and nameless others — most have the following in common: they believe that individual freedom and expression should not be sacrificed at any cost; they reject many materialistic and traditional values of the "establishment" (parents, schools, communities); and they are willing to challenge constituted legal authority and democratic procedure — classifying veterans of American movements for evolutionary social change as irrelevant failures. The determination of the American student to be allowed a say in government is expressed in the following song by Phil Ochs:

*I wish that you'd make up your mind
I wish that you'd decide
That I should live as freely as those who live outside Cause we also are entitled to the rights to be endowed and when I've got something to say, sir,
I'm gonna say it now.
I've read of other countries where the students take a stand They've even helped to overthrow the leaders of the land.
Now I would go so far to say*

*We're also learning how
But when I've got something to say, sir,
I'm gonna say it now.*

In April, 1965, the Students for a Democratic Society, an organization within the New Left, organized a march on Washington of 20,000 people to protest the war in Vietnam. The march consisted partly of students who during the previous four years had "freedom rode" to Jackson, Mississippi, joined the Peace Corps, tutored negro children in the slums, marched to ban the bomb, rioted against the House Un-American Activities Committee, risked their lives to register negro voters, and who had "sat in" at Berkeley for free speech.

Writer Jack Newfield noted: "Within an eight-week period, Time, Newsweek, the Saturday Evening Post, The New York Times Magazine, Life, and the television networks popularized the New Left. They smeared it, psychoanalyzed it, exaggerated it, cartooned it; they made it look like a bunch of potheads, beatniks, and Communist agents; they did everything but explain the failures in society that called it into being. . . ." We will now examine some of these failures.

The first failure is the American political system, with its two party system which resists ideological conflict. For example, those who were against the war in Vietnam could not find a political outlet for their grievances

*By Issy Dubinsky

by voting for either Republican or Democratic parties. Most students are not enfranchised, and therefore cannot use regular "democratic" procedures to voice their opinions. The government is so over-burdened that it doesn't act upon an issue or problem until it explodes, and by then it is usually too late.

The American politician has developed into a gutless master of procrastination, with a maximum of non-committal statements and the barest minimum of action. In the following songs Phil Ochs and Bob Dylan warn the politicians to stop stalling.

*O the games of stalling you cannot afford
Dark is the danger that is knocking at the door. . .
I've seen your heads hiding in the blankets of fear*

"For the times, they are a' changing"

When the paths they are plain and the choices are clear.

And with each passing day the cost is more dear. . .

*Now the mobs of anger are roamin' the streets
From the roof-tops their aimin' at the police on the beat*

*And in city after city you know they will repeat
For these are the days of decision.*

Come Senators and Congressmen, please heed the call,

Don't stand in the doorway, don't block up the hall.

For he that gets hurt will be he who has stalled.

There's a battle outside and it's ragin'.

It'll soon shake your windows and rattle your walls

For the times they are a' changin' . . .

The Liberal movement, the traditional political arm of social change, as well as the trade unions, had by the Sixties become part of the establishment and ineffective for student demands. The contempt held by the New Left for the Liberals can be seen in the following Phil Ochs's song:

*Sure, once I was young and impulsive
I wore every conceivable pin,
Even went to socialist meetings,
Learned all the old union hymns.
Ah but I've grown older and wiser
And that's why I'm turning you in,
So love me, love me, love me, I'm a liberal.*

Two of the most explosive and deep rooted problems in the United States are racism and poverty. The following illustrates the indifference towards these problems:

*Sweating in the ghetto with the coloured and the poor,
The rats have joined the babies, who are sleeping on the floor
Now wouldn't it be a riot if they really blew their tops,
But they've got too much already
And besides we've got the cops.*

A civil rights workers, recollecting the time he spent in Mississippi, once remarked: "When you're in Mississippi the rest of America doesn't seem real, and when you're in the rest of America, Mississippi doesn't seem real."

If you drag her muddy waters numerous bodies you will find

Oh the fat trees of the forest have hid a thousand crimes

The calender is lyin' when it reads the present times. . .

In the swamp of their bureaucracy they're always boggin' down

And the criminals are posing as mayors of the towns

And they hope that no one sees the sights and no one hears the sounds

And the speeches of the governor are the ravings of a clown.

... "The folks up north, they just don't understand"

And they tremble with fear in the shadow of the clan

Oh the sweating of their souls can't wipe the blood

From off their hands

*For they smile and shrug their shoulders
At the murder of a man.*

Just as critical as white bigotry and hatred towards the negro is the self hate and shame which many negroes have felt for hundreds of years. The doctrine of "black Power" attracts many Blacks in the Sixties, because pride of negro culture and identity might come along with it. In fact, the hopes for assimilation into white culture and integration in the white community loses its appeal in the Sixties. James Brown's "Say it loud - I'm Black and I'm proud" demonstrates this new feeling in the Sixties:

Now we demand a chance to do things for ourselves

We're tired of beating our heads against the wall and working for someone else. . .

*Now we're people. . .
We'd rather die up on our feet, than Keep living on our knees.*

Other diseases in American society are classified together by the New Left, as the hypocrisies of the American establishment. American involvement in Vietnam, extreme anti-communism, backward laws against narcotics and abortion, and the wealth and authoritarianism of the church, are considered such hypocrisies.

Now many Americans feel the United States is wrong in trying to "save" the Vietnamese from Ho Chi Minh, at the expense of their lives and Vietnam itself, even though many of them don't want to be "saved." In short they feel that the United States should stop playing polieman for the world. Phil Ochs summarizes the hypocrisies of the Vietnam war in the following:

*We've got to protect all our citizens fair
So we'll send a battalion for everyone there
And maybe we'll leave in a couple of years. . .*

*We'll spit through the streets of the cities we wreck
And we'll find you a leader that you can elect
Those treaties we signed were a pain in the neck. . .*

*We've got too much money; we're looking for toys
Guns will be guns, and boys will be boys
But we'll gladly pay for all we've destroyed. . .
We'll smash down your doors; we don't bother to knock
We've done it before, so why all the shock
We're the biggest and toughest kids on the block. . .*

*We own half the world, o say can you see,
And the name of our profits is democracy.
So like it or not, you will have to be free
Cause we're the cops of the world, boys
We're the cops of the world.*

The New Left reasons that since their own government is the only one which they are mandated to influence, they must stop the murdering conducted in their names, for they feel that the deaths are a blot of shame on their national honour. Many Americans want the war stopped not because they are against the purpose of the stand, but because an end to the war is not in view and too many Americans are getting killed:

*I don't know, but I find the speedy hands of time
Are wailing out a warning on the wall
But nobody heeds the call
And the soldier obeys, while the parson prays

Many young people oppose the draft because they refuse to fight for something they don't believe in; others refuse to fight because they are cowards; some are a little of both.—

*Call it love or call it reason
Call it peace or call it treason
But I ain't a' marchin' anymore.*

Those who don't openly burn their draft cards, either emigrate, stay in school, or get married to influence their classifications, or suddenly become physically or mentally incapable for military life:

*Sarge, I'm only eighteen, I've got a ruptured spleen,
And I always carry a purse, I've got eyes like a bat
And my feet are flat and my asthma's getting worse
Yes, think of my career, my sweetheart dear,
My poor old invalid aunt.
Besides, I ain't no fool, I'm gain' to school*

ter in the church. Typical of the satirical attitude of many youth towards religion is the following song by Ernie Mans:...

*I don't care if it rains or freezes
As long as I've got my plastic Jesus
Riding in the dashboard of my car...*

*Plastic Jesus shelters me
For his head comes off you see...
He's hollow and I use him for a flask.*

*When I'm in a traffic jam
He don't care if I say "damn"
I can let all sorts of curses roll.
Plastic Jesus don't hear
For he's got a plastic ear
The man who invented plastic saved my soul.*

Many southern churches are used as headquarters for Ku Klux Klan meetings, and as strongholds of hatred, bigotry, and even murder. The following song describes the churches of Mississippi where...

*The cross once made of silver now is caked with rust,
And the Sunday morning sermons ponder to their loss
Oh the fallen face of Jesus is chokin' in the dust
And heaven only knows in which God they can trust.*

The disciplinary, rigid, and narrow-minded attitudes of many churches are another cause of ridicule and rejection among the students:

*Oh the children will be sent to schools
Minds of clay are moulded to the rules
Learn to fear all of eternity
Worn the conons of Christianity.*

Many churches are profit-making businesses with huge investments, untaxed real estate, and lavish buildings. Quite often their congregation live amid poverty and hunger.

*Holy hands will count the money raised
Like a King the Lord is richly praised...
Build the castles amidst the poverty
Say the conons of Christianity.*

*Worship now and wash your sins away,
Drop the coins, fall to your knees and pray
Cleanse the world of all hypocrisy Smile the conons of Christianity.*

The last and perhaps most important problem in modern American Society, that being the degradation of human worth and individualism, is a combination of many of the more tangible of the country's ills which I have already discussed. When the younger generation of the Fifties and Sixties rejected their parents' values and institutions such as religion, nationalism, and sex only with love, they created a spiritual vacuum for themselves.

Computers aided dehumanization — colleges and corporations were assembly lines; conformity was the key to success, and capitalism was the country's biggest concern.

*Oh you've given me a number,
And you've taken off my name.
Why to get around this campus
You almost need a plane.*

Indifference, apathy, crime and suicide are the unfortunate results of human degradation and loss of individuality. The reflections in the following song are all too typical of the apathy found in large American cities:

*Look outside your window, there's a woman being grabbed.
They dragged her to the bushes, and now she's being stabbed.
Maybe we should call the cops and try to stop the pain,
But Monopoly is so much fun, I'd hate to blow
the game.*

Thus the strength of the New Left Movement grew as a reaction to the ills of these times in which it was born.

A prophetic minority creates each generation's legend. It is the active radicals of the New Left who are defining the generation of the 1960s. The best of the young have turned their backs on the elitist and crass materialistic values of the new affluence. This radical rejection of the prevailing values is shared in a more moderate form, by a significant portion of the college generation, which will make up an unprecedentedly large educated stratum in the United States of tomorrow. The spirit if not the letter of the New Left will probably become a practical political force in the United States in the 70s.

There is no doubt about Dylan's warnings that the times are changing. The questions that remain are whether or not the New Left will be able to correct its numerous faults, and whether by protesting against the ugliness of the present, they will bring beauty to the future for...

*In such a time of ugliness
the true protest is beauty.*

*And I'm working in a defense plant...
Wish you luck, Sarge, give 'em hell
And kill me a thousand or so, and if you ever get a war
Without blood and gore, I'll be the first to go.
13*

Many people who believe in what America is fighting for, do not find the draft dodgers quite so amusing:

*What's become of this notion, and the songs they sing,
Everybody's protesting...
There's an army of cowards, see them marching in line.
While the country's in danger they carry a sign.
They're burning their draft cards, refusing to fight
While they talk about freedom, they're dimming liberty's light.*

Further, says Billy Carn in What's Come

Over This World many soldiers fighting in Vietnam look back home at the students with contempt and anger — Pat Boone, leading teeny-bopper hero song:

*Well hi there buddy, thought I'd drop you a line...
Heard you've been leading those campus demonstrations.
You've been as busy as you can be
With the sit-downs, walkouts, other aggrova-tions,
That you hardly ever think of me.
Heard Uncle Sam nearly scored you to death
But you fooled him just in time
Just stuck a little match to your old draft card
And burned a future like mine.*

Probably ranking close to the downfall of patriotism among students is their rejection of established forms of religion. Some of the biggest hypocrites and bigots are given shel-

Ghost of CIN 193 course is resurrected

"After 15 years of formal education, it's very difficult to get your head unstructured for two hours a week."

"We're like a bunch of kids turned loose in a candy store — we have to discipline ourselves, 'cause no one here is going to do it for us."

The ghost of CIN 193 was resurrected last Wednesday, amid a hail of balloons, smarties, and crepe streamers.

The professor strode to the podium in flowing robes, and demanded to know: "Just what is it you people think you are doing here? Don't you know that this whole university thing is just a pile of shit?"

A student raised his hand: "Excuse me, Prof. Minden, do we have to know that for the final?"

The New Program calendar had promised that CIN 203 would deal with The Contemporary Social Environment and would feature specialists in such areas as Sociology, History, Medicine, and Religion.

It did not mention that this was to be an unstructured course, in which the students themselves, without the direction of a father-professor, would decide what they wanted to study, and how. Reaction to the guerilla-theatre nature of the first meeting covered a wide range of emotions.

Some objected violently to the chaos and the absence of experts, saying they felt cheated. There was some agreement with the soft-voiced girl who said: "I want to learn from someone who knows more than I do, a doctor or someone . . . we can communicate with each other outside of school time."

Ken McEvoy, SAC Information Officer, pointed out that communication between student and teacher was not only highly desirable, but could take place during class time within such a structure as CIN 203. There needn't be a power relationship between you and someone up there who's 'qualified' . . . you can choose to interact or not, and now you have all the resources of a gigantic university at your command."

When a few people started to leave, other members of the class challenged them to explain why they were "copping out". Several said they had to go to the washroom; most never returned. Of those who voiced displeasure with the course, however, only three were considering dropping it.

After an hour of heated discussion, people began gathering in small common-interest groups to rap about what they wanted to get out of the course. One group just traded trivia ("What was the name of Dale Evans' horse?"), others talked about theater, women's liberation, medicine, communal living, and clinical psychiatry. Even the structure freaks got together to talk about restructuring the course. In the end, it appeared that CIN 203 really did have something for everyone.

The class meets this and every Wednesday, in Sidney Smith Hall, Room 2118 at 4 p.m. Bob Bossin, one of the resource people for the course ("Everyone is a resource person") says that all interested people, including first year students, are welcome and needed.

Soccer Blues take on Buffalo State this afternoon

Last year, things weren't quite the same for Varsity soccer buffs.

For the first time in five years Blues weren't the OQAA champs as that honour went to a group of upstarts from Queen's.

However, word is out around the league that this year's Blues are out to set matters back to normal.

Bob Nicol, who is starting his second year as Varsity Soccer coach, has high hopes for the 1970 season and the squad is undefeated in pre-season play.

This afternoon they meet Buffalo State in their final tune-up for their league home opener Saturday against Guelph. Game time is 4:00 p.m. on the back campus east field.

Varsity Rowing Club needs your help!

The first regatta of the new rowing season is coming up on Saturday and already the Blues Rowing squad is in trouble.

Lack of personnel is preventing the freshmen crew from competition and the Varsity crew is racked by illness.

You can't be expected to do much about the latter, but, if you are interested in learning how to row — WE NEED YOU.

Pulling guards

During last Saturday's battle with McGill, Varsity photographer Doug Fraser caught two examples of the key to any end sweep — the pulling guards. Top: right guard Don Fraser (53) leads while left guard Gord Whitaker (50) and ball carrier Bob Morrow (23) follow. Bottom: This time, with the play going the other way, Whitaker leads while Fraser and Morrow trail.

SPORTTALK

By Lyndon Little
VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

With the Paul McKay incident still fresh in the minds of college football fans the time has come for a thorough normalization of the relations between Canadian college football and the CFL.

McKay, as most people know, is the former Varsity Blues' star defensive back and kicker who was signed by the Hamilton Tiger-Cats of the CFL last Friday night on the eve of Blues' league opener in Montreal against McGill.

Most of the problems between the CFL and our college football game stem from the general low esteem the latter enjoys with the professionals.

College football in Canada has just not been regarded by the majority of the CFL coaches and general managers — who are, by and large, American-trained and orientated — as a fertile system for the production of the 18 native football players that must occupy every CFL roster.

The preferred route, they feel, is to take the top high school products in their particular area and each year to arrange scholarships for these boys at American institutions.

The annual Canadian college draft — generally considered to be a travesty of nebulous rules and misinformation — is valued only as a method of picking up fringe talent to pad the next summer's training camp rosters.

Certainly, the occasional star emerges through this system.

However, the CFL establishment feels that the Russ Jacksons, the Whit Tuckers and the Ron Stewarts are only the exceptions that prove the rule!

Indications, however, are that this situation may be a thing of the past.

Each year, the number of football players trained in Canadian universities and colleges who find themselves employment on CFL squads is increasing.

Bob LaRose, Jim Henshall, Wayne Holm, Mike Eban, Gerry Sternberg Bayne Norrie and Doug Strong are only a few of the former college stars who are now pulling down a professional salary with the skills that they once displayed on our own college football fields.

As our college football game gets bigger and bigger every year, more and more potential professional stars will be performing for Canadian institutions.

This is why the people who govern our football game — the Canadian Inter-collegiate Athletic Union — must sit down with the CFL and hammer out a sound, comprehensive, agreement that will cover scouting, drafting and signing procedures.

Anything is better than the haphazard, grab-what-you-want system that exists today.

Word is out that last week's sale of student football books wasn't quite what it should have been.

No figures have been disclosed, but Mr. Loosemore, who handles financial matters for the Athletic Association, termed the sale as "very disappointing".

Some of the possible reasons for the initial low sale include all the commotion over the Day One Festival plus the fact that there was no home game last weekend.

In any case, students will be given a second chance for the remainder of this week. The coupon books will be available at either the Hart House ticket office or at the VARSITY Stadium Gate 3 wicket up until game time Saturday.

UC registrar resigns

After nine years in office, Professor R.M.H. Shepherd will leave his post as registrar of University College.

"The whole machinery of administration puts me at the mercy of the efficiency of the system," says the professor of Greek who will be quitting in December.

The heavy responsibilities of the job are not the only reason Shepherd has resigned.

Shepherd is frustrated and disappointed at the poor procedures of the planning and execution of registration this year.

"We've lost a lot of the values we've had at our office," he says. "Our aim was to combine the utmost efficiency in administration with utmost care for the individual". He stresses his value of efficiency as a way of getting essentials out of the way to be able to do what you want.

Shepherd finds the difficulties and confusion of the new registration "totally illogical" in its attempt to combine a centralized system at Sidney Smith Hall with a decentralized one. Students go directly to the individual departments to request course changes, but must clear their program as a whole with the Central Office. Previously the college was responsible for knowing each student's schedule and transfers, and with this information could offer advice. "We have no records here in the college, we don't know what the kids are doing. In November there will be a total mess."

Shepherd points out that those handling the course changes at Sidney Smith Hall do not have the experience and knowledge in this area. "Students will suffer."

Shepherd puts the blame of this system on the Office of Deans at Sidney Smith. A. C.

Hallett, newly appointed Principal of UC, was Associate Dean for the Faculty of Arts and Science and largely involved in setting up the new Program.

Last year was the first year that this computer system of registration was initiated. Chaos then was understandable. Shepherd adds to this, however: "Instead of learning from and improving bad practices, problems were added and infinitely worse this year". He resents not being consulted or listened to beforehand.

He is in personal contact with an average of 1,000 students every year. It is this role that concerns him the most. "We're never allowed to carry out what we know we are here to do because other offices that don't know what they're doing are in our way."

For the first time in 21 years, Prof. Shepherd is taking a leave of absence. But he said: "I want to come back to teaching Greek in college next fall."

Of his position as college registrar he summed up: "I liked the essence of the job."

Hallett will be appointing a committee of yet undetermined composition to choose the next UC registrar.

Student risks eviction on rent strike deadline

By MARG COTTRILL and DON McMAHON

Brian Shaughnessey, a third year law student, will face eviction by the Ontario Student Housing Corporation as a test case for striking students at Charles Street. Married Students' Residences.

Residents to occupy B.C. hostel

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Residents of the Jericho Hostel, a converted government army base, decided unanimously Wednesday to occupy the building after they were notified to leave by today.

The notice from the federal secretary of the state said: "We are deeply distressed that we have been forced to close this hostel without an alternate program. However to ensure the formulation of future programming we ask the cooperation of those currently benefiting from the facility."

"They just don't want the people to have a chance to organize anything," said hostel staffer Ted Mahood.

Meetings were held yesterday morning at UBC to plan support actions for the hostel residents. Two committees were formed at the same time.

One committee will investigate the possibility of hostel residents being moved to buildings at Vancouver City College, a two-year college that is being moved to a new site. The buildings will be vacant by Oct. 17.

Fritz Bower, a member of the Vancouver school board that operates the college said, "There is a possibility that the school board trustees could be persuaded to allow the use of the buildings as a hostel provided a "responsible group" were in charge and that the arrangements would not cost the school board any money."

The second committee is a mobilization committee to plan action in the event the hostel is closed at the set time.

The Trudeau government will be petitioned to delay closing of the youth hostel if the college facilities can be made available.

Shaughnessey has a predicted income of $1500. He also has a predicted rent of almost $1500. In addition, his wife Rita, will soon be in hospital for a spinal operation.

Of 300 tenants, Shaughnessey is the only one who will continue to withhold $50 from the monthly rent. The landlord, O.S.H.S., has threatened to prosecute any strikers who haven't paid by Oct. 1.

The Ontario Housing Tenants' Association (O.H.T.A.), a union of people living in Ontario Housing, intends to give the Shaughnesseys maximum publicity through letters to the Toronto papers and a demonstration at Queen's Park the same day that the issue will be raised in the legislature by liberal and NDP members. O.H.T.A., by asking for a donation of $20 from each family on strike, will also pay all the court costs.

At a September 24 meeting of the strikers, Paul Ross, the lawyer present at the meeting, emphasized that this tactic would give the residents a greater public base of support, and would allow the majority of residents to escape paying excessive court costs.

Chairman Gordon Martel said it was possible for O.S.H.C. to cede the land to U of T for $1.00 provided that both parties agreed to a full recovery plan proposed by the residents whereby all profits would be returned to the residence in the form of improvements in conditions.

When asked why all the tenants did not support the strike, a strike committee member explained that people who were new to Canada were afraid to protest since their visas might be put in jeopardy. Others were cautious over job security; while others are draft dodgers and want as few waves as possible. Many new tenants were unaware of the cause or did not agree with it on principle. This is the largest and longest rent strike in Canadian history, said Wayne Roberts, a strike organizer.

A number of representatives from local urban tenants' councils explained that this type of action against O.H.C. is gaining ground throughout Ontario. The O.H.T.A. has begun organizing for marches and other actions against similar situations involving O.H.C. or O.H.S.C.

There are similar plans under way to enlist broad support on the campus of the U of T and other regional universities. Queen's University residence quarters are experiencing rumblings of active discontent with O.H.C. policy.

Martel said that future strike actions could be contemplated after the court case. As of Sept. 25, all rents, with the exception of the Shaughnessey's, will be paid by the deadline of Oct. 1st.

SAC votes to accept 5 seats on PAC

By IAN MACLAREN

Amid threats of resignation, SAC voted Wednesday to accept five seats on the 19 member President's Advisory Council, ending a two year boycott of the body.

Backers of the motion felt that membership on PAC would give students a say in the selection of a new university president to replace retiring Claude Bissell.

"The selection of a president is very important to us and we must do all we can to bend our backs and get on that committee," said Brian Hayes, Communications Commissioner.

At this point those objecting to the motion attempted a tactical coup. If four representatives had left the 27 member meeting, a quorum would no longer have existed and no motions could have been passed.

Hayes jumped on the situation threatening, "If anyone leaves this meeting I am going to resign. If we have to resort to cheap theatrical tricks then I see no reason to stay on this council."

The motion, initiated by Peter Hall (University Commissioner) and later amended no less than three times, read: "That SAC appoint five undergraduates on an interim basis on the President's Advisory Council, that one of these appointees be a part time student, until such a time as campus wide elections can be held, and that the appointees have full voting privileges, that the appointees be accountable to SAC and that PAC must give students appropriate representations on all sub-committees."

By accepting these seats, SAC has rounded out a council composed of seven students (five undergrads, two grads) seven faculty, and five administrators. Says Hall, "This body is worth recognizing because we must grasp parity when we can get it."

However, Mike Hofstetter (III Scar.) claimed that, "No amount of representation will give us the power. Things on the council will result from a consensus of the council and by virtue of the numbers, 12 to 7, the consensus will be that of the administration. Have you forgotten what happened last spring? Have you forgotten parity?"

Last spring SAC turned down an offer of 7 student seats with 7 faculty and 10 administrators.

SAC President Rod Hurd backed the motion because throughout the debate no tactical reasons were given for refusing representation on PAC.

Ken McEvoy (Student Information Researcher) changed his view during the debate. Initially he said that, "The method of selection of a new president of this university is decided by PAC. The search committee for a president wants to have complete administrative control, so that to have students on the council would in fact legitimize an appointment of a president by the administrators. If all faculty and administration unanimously vote in a new president, then the students are outnumbered and have no choice (as members of PAC) but to accept the approved motion."

However, later McEvoy saw reasons to back student membership on PAC.

"The selection of a new president will be left up to the Board of Governors unless we put seven members on that council and take the 36% representational chance. We should get in there and look around and if we get screwed then get out." McEvoy voted in favour of the motion.

City decides today on the widening of St. Joseph Street

By WAYNE ALDRIDGE

The widening of St. Joseph Street failed yesterday to reach the floor of City Council to the disappointment of 150 St. Michael's Students present at the seven-hour meeting.

The council will decide the fate of St. Joseph Street at today's meeting.

In a survey conducted Wednesday morning by students from St. Michaels College it was found that there are approximately five pedestrians for every car on St. Joseph Street. They concluded that if people deserve the choice on which mode of transportation they desire (a city policy) then the people who use St. Joseph Street choose to walk.

The necessity for a survey became evident at the Liaison Committee meeting when Commissioner Ray Bremner stated that the city wanted a balanced traffic flow — the research the city conducted involved only automobile traffic. Pedestrian and bicycle traffic had never been considered.

The survey also discovered that over half of the cars that use Bay Street have only one occupant. It concluded that a more effective way to cut down on traffic would be to use car pools rather than making more roads.

A press release from James B. Trotter, M.P.P. Parkdale, criticizes the manner in which funds for the widening were arranged. The money was hidden in a block request and therefore the democratic right of appeal was lost to citizens.

Trotter made an appeal to keep a pleasant atmosphere around the university by staying away from the bustle of city life.

March demands teacher quota

By MARG COTTRILL

While one demonstrator shouted "Yankee Imperialist, Go Home!", 25 to 30 others marched Wednesday in front of the Ontario Institute For Studies in Education building to show their support for a quota system which would demand that 85% of teachers in Canada must be Canadian.

The demonstration was organized by the Canadian Liberation Movement, a group which is concerned not only for education but all aspects of Canadian life that are Americanized.

Greg Keilty, a member of C.L.M., spoke on behalf of the protestors: "Our demonstration is directed at (William) Davis, (Minister of Education). He can do something. We want to show our support for other groups who agitate for the quota system." One such group was composed of members of O.I.S.E. who expressed a desire for the quota system last spring.

Keilty predicted that in the future O.I.S.E. would become more Americanized. He pointed out that the 80% of the staff that was Canadian in 1965 has now dropped to a bare 50%.

Keilty also complained that Americans hold the important positions. One example is Dr. D. W. Brison who is the head of the department that creates the curriculum to be taught in Canadian schools. He was chosen over four Canadians by a search committee of which one of the members was Dr. Carl Bereiter, Brison's former colleague at the University of Illinois.

R. W. B. Jackson, Director at O.I.S.E., wrote in a pamphlet that the present proportion of Americans is only a temporary condition. "The supply of Canadians is now improving dramatically. This year we have been able to secure them for about 60% of our new appointments. We fully expect this trend to continue as the supply of Canadians increases."

Keilty feels that the ratio could be improved immediately if O.I.S.E. conscientiously hired Canadians. He uses the Department of Adult Education as an example. It is headed by Dr. J. R. Kidd, a Canadian, and is staffed by Canadians.

"The only department that tried to get enough Canadians did I think that proves something."

Abortion is now a fact of life ... if you're rich

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

She sits before you, slightly smiling — half-embarrassed, half-shy. You know she won't cry because her life has taught her to be strong. She has come to the Birth Control Centre for help in obtaining an abortion.

"Were you using birth control?" you ask.

"No," she says.

You know why she didn't, but you ask anyway. And for women like this the answer is always the same: "I couldn't take the pill and the hospital clinic wouldn't give me anything else" or "I can't afford a doctor".

THIS WOMAN is pregnant because she is human; she wants an abortion because she is poor. And though you don't counsel many poor women at the centre, you know there are hundreds like this one that you don't see. These poor and welfare women, often separated from repressive husbands in bad marriages, are always kept ignorant about their bodies. (Sex education in schools is scant and more prevalent in suburban than urban schools)

Yet these are the women for whom an abortion is most difficult to get.

Most of the women who come into the comfortable, carpeted surroundings at 631 Spadina Ave. for abortion information can afford a $300 abortion in Buffalo or can fly to New York city for a day. Or, if there is time, have little difficulty going through the Toronto hospitals under the year-old abortion law.

But it is a very different story for poor, and especially, welfare women. For them, the first two options are automatically out — no money.

THE THIRD, supposedly open to all women, is in reality, much easier for nicely-dressed, well-paying, middle-class women; it has always been a simple matter for upper class women willing to pay the price for a neat "D and C" (a simple operation that cleans out the uterus and, if a woman is pregnant, aborts the pregnancy).

Poor women, on the other hand, usually have problems.

According to the Canadian abortion law, a woman can obtain an abortion if she is less than twenty weeks (five months) pregnant and receives the approval of "three medical practitioners" at an "accredited hospital", who certify that the pregnancy is harmful or is "likely to be" harmful to the mother's health.

IN PRACTICE, this usually means the woman must see a doctor and one, possibly two, psychiatrists. The doctors then submit their reports to a hospital "abortion board" of "three medical practitioners" (they can be oculists or ear-nose-and-throat specialists but are rarely gynecologists) who judge whether the woman's case is acceptable. They do not see the woman. It is usually hospital policy that the doctor who examines the woman not be on the board. Most abortions are approved on the grounds of possible damage to mental health.

Though the board is usually a rubber stamp committee, the process a woman must go through to get her case presented is both humiliating and degrading.

Women have been required to go into details about their family and childhood; some have had to do ink-blot identification tests. Must a woman who does not want a child be crazy? If she cannot afford a child and cannot obtain reliable birth control, is she insane to request abortion?

Yet, for many poor women the problem is not the strength to undergo this trial by ordeal; most of these women undergo humiliation and degradation from society many days of their lives. Rather the problem is getting a doctor to take their case at all, a doctor to present their case to the board.

Repeatedly, when the woman is poor, the abortion is more difficult to obtain.

After all, a doctor can receive more money from people who can afford to pay. Ontario Health Insurance only pays a certain amount of the doctor's bill and the patient is required to pay the rest.

PRIVATE DOCTORS can charge what the traffic will allow, above the OHSIP rate, and going through a private doctor is always more efficient. But you pay for the service. And if you can't pay, you don't get that "efficiency".

But wait . . . aren't we talking about the medical profession, saving lives, preservation of human life? What is this about efficiency and higher profits?

Abortion is symptomatic of the ills that plague capitalist medicine — a cure for a profit. For many doctors the Hippocratic Oath has become the hypocritical oath: preservation of human life — for a price.

Even the "liberal" medics to the south have quickly learned to capitalize on abortion on request in New York state. One group of six doctors from Michigan has moved into the state, opened a clinic, and hired a business manager to arrange abortions for Canadian women — at $300.

AND IT IS NOT as if an abortion is a difficult operation. It takes about twenty minutes and can be done on an out-patient basis — that is, enter the clinic, have the operation and go home in less than an hour. Not bad, doc, at $300 an hour.

The demand of "abortion on request" has often been prefaced with the word "free", as have many demands for proper medical treatment. The right to control one's body is integrally related to the right to proper care for the body.

Medicine has become a business — and a highly profitable one. Those who cannot afford to pay will not wait much longer for the right to be healthy.

And how does all this relate to students? No doubt, by the time exams finish next spring, at least one hundred University of Toronto women will have become pregnant, without intending to. And many will have abortions.

SOME WILL HAVE no problem getting an abortion — even without their parents' knowledge. They will be able to raise $300 and spend a day south of the border.

Others will not be so lucky. Their student loans will not stretch that far; for many, summer earnings are non-existent. They will be handed the old adage about "an ounce of prevention".

But the "advisor" will not know that sometimes that "ounce" is so very difficult to come by. Our own health service on campus has been known to make it very difficult for a single woman to obtain the pill. And it offers no other method of birth control.

Students and poor people have a lot in common that way: they are treated like second class citizens. They cannot afford the expensive care of private doctors and, like the poor, the free medical care they are offered is low-calibre, as many health service patients will verify.

PROPER HEALTH CARE should be a right. It should be a demand of all people who don't and can't get it.

As an interim step, organisation of better free medical facilities is an outright necessity. Some of these are listed below:

The Kolko Caper

Gabriel Kolko can stay.

The American history professor who was refused landed immigrant status in Canada this summer because his presence would be "contrary to the Canadian national interest" will now be allowed to take up his duties as a professor at York University.

There are two issues involved here:

First, we saw with what decisiveness and effectiveness the federal government was able to step in and bar Kolko — for undisclosed reasons.

Compare his treatment with that given the overwhelming majority of American professors who enter Canada. Not only does the government refuse to set up any kind of rationally set out quota system which would give preference to Canadian applicants for jobs, but it actually encourages foreign faculty to work here by allowing them a two year tax holiday.

Could Kolko's problems in getting into the country have had anything to do with the fact that Kolko is strongly opposed to the Vietnam war and that within the discipline of history he is considered a radical because he accepts a materialist interpretation of history?

In this connection, we should remember the fact that of 14 new political science appointments made recently at Canadian universities, only one job went to a clearly identifiable Canadian.

Perhaps the Department of Manpower and Immigration was catching a few winks while they slipped in.

Or, more likely, Ottawa failed to get any warning signals from the FBI regarding "Canada's national interest."

Among the many qualified Canadians — particularly of either nationalist or socialist or both persuasions — who remain unemployed, is Raymond Rodgers, a political science PhD who lost his job teaching at the University of Winnipeg last year for refusing to use a prescribed list of exclusively American textbooks for a Canadian government course.

Clearly, then, government does not have a neutral policy with regard to foreign academics. It simply has a policy which does not support the development of strongly Canadian and radically-oriented universities which will present challenges to the social and economic status quo.

Now the second intriguing part of the whole Kolko caper is the remarkable ease with which Ottawa was able, practically overnight, to reverse its opinions about Kolko.

One of Kolko's leading defenders has been the man who hired him, John Saywell, the dean of arts at York University.

Many of us will recall that Saywell was one of the main backers behind Pierre Trudeau's successful capture of the Liberal leadership in 1968. Last week Saywell met with Trudeau in Ottawa over lunch and presumably they found enough reasons to let Kolko stay.

The fact that Kolko had powerful friends and connections means he can stay.

But none of the real contradictions have been resolved.

And the basic issue is not how many Americans or Canadians there are in any university. The decisive issue is how those people are chosen.

Presently any academic, with any kind of a radical tinge, be he an American or a Canadian, is liable to be blacklisted through informal inter-university grapevines (this is happening now with people from Simon Fraser's controversial Political Science and Anthropology Department) or to be barred from the country by the arbitrary edict of the federal government.

Until the hiring procedures at Canadian universities are taken out of the hands of ranking administrators and placed squarely and openly in the hands of students and faculty, our universities will continue to hire large rosters of faculty who have nothing to offer Canada.

"... It is unfortunate that ... a system has been constructed which considers profit as the key motive for economic progress, competition as the supreme law of economics and private ownership of the means of production as an absolute right that has no limits and carries no corresponding social obligation."

— Pope Paul VI, Populorum Progressio

One, two ... Many luncheons

The Simeoe Hall Free Food Programme opened less than hospitable doors Wednesday at noon to students who wished to dine with the president of the university and discuss matters of "mutual interest."

It was all very discreet.

All morning the man with whom you were supposed to confirm the fact you would be coming, was not receiving his calls.

Round and about Hart House, the scene of the affair, students were being turned away — not in enormous numbers, but in small groups — perhaps a couple of dozen in all.

Two actually made it to the door of the Music Room, where the invited guests were gathering.

Once it became clear that neither huge droves of people nor any organized disruption was on the verge of taking place, admission to the banquet table was granted to five uninvited latecomers.

President Claude Bissell joked that the affair had been "liberated."

In fact he seemed to enjoy very much the company of a handful of "irregulars" among the assembled student council presidents.

Perhaps there is something in all this.

One, two, three... Many luncheons?

Label Liberation enjoyed Day One

As an information service, supplying guest speakers to deans of students, politicians, prostitutes, housewives, teachers, and all manner of other people in various roles, we found Day One most exciting and a success.

Our badges reading "I'm a person first, (you name it) second" were snapped up by some U of T police. They either wrote "police" second, left it blank or added "Pig". A group of nuns added the label "Nun". A dean wrote "Dean." Some labelled their buttons "Woman" second. (Even a few women's liberation folk realized that they are people first, women second.) Gay representatives labelled their buttons "Homosexual" or "Gay" second.

Students, teachers, parents secretaries, librarians all showed us warmth and caring. They allowed us to experience their more "personal" sides. Many asked for more information and placed their names on our mailing list.

Yet the Sept. 28 Varsity left us feeling that you were disappointed with the event. "We came together, but what happened?"

We shared so much deep feeling and personal experience with such a wide variety of people that day that we wish to thank the organizers of Day One. We were provided with the opportunity to do our own things. We came together... and what happened was that we had fun learning.

Label Liberation Movement.

The Case of the Marshmallow Memorandum

I should like to correct a few misapprehensions contained in Mr. William J. Hevey's article and your preface to it in Monday's Varsity ("Notes from Under the Marshmallow..."). Conveniently a single sentence of yours will suffice for my purpose, the one embodying your assumption that "the reason the faculty failed to show" was "that the chairman of the Combined Departments of English took the threat of the marshmallow roast seriously enough to send out an official memo disowning it."

Now, apart from the evidently unconscious humour of this statement (the "threat" of a marshmallow roast?), there are three major distortions here. If the faculty stayed away because of my note, which was a statement of fact explicitly without a word of advice or direction, your implication is that without my note they would have come. If this is so, then they would have come in the belief that the function was other than what it was, and therefore they would have come in response to false representations.

In any case, my note circulated only at University College, and I rather think that my colleagues stayed away from the function because they believe there are more valuable, less bizarre ways of discovering that students "exist as human beings outside the context of the classroom" than a marshmallow roast seemed likely to provide (Incidentally, I have never known a colleague who for a moment thought that students did not so exist. Have you?).

As for the reason for my writing the note, I was not disowning the function, since presumably disowning implies denying ownership of something which in fact belongs to the disowner; rather I was pointing out that ownership resided elsewhere anyway, in the undergraduate group which arranged the function, and that communications in the name of "the Combined Departments of English," unless they are issued under false pretences, come only from the Executive of the CDE, that is from the Chairman or the Secretary.

5 p.m. with spectrums

By JON KARSEMEYER

Only when you are in a room with cut glass aimed at where the sun is at 5 p.m. on the only first day October will have in all of 1970 is it possible.

Is it possible to have streams of spectrums move across the face of a mapalmed vietnamese girl whose picture is reprinted at least a million times as well as across the centerpage of the Dreadnaught Bob gave me, as I hold it to the light.

And is it possible that Laura tries to work the magic telex and finds a roomfull starving mysteries who were waiting to get through but couldn't because the telex was not plugged in. It is. It really is.

Can all this and more and other mysteries really be going on in the world you know and love, so that at least to the extent that now you've read about it, it is happening to you as well? Is it, it is, it really is.

"No one has to tell you that a war is going on. You can feel it."

'A popular protest couldn't be mounted'

Dear Mr. Editor:

The Varsity article of Monday, September 28th, dealing with the threatened widening of St. Joseph Street stated that "Father Kelly, Principal of St. Michael's College, has so far been reluctant to act because of lack of support from both students and administration."

Might I say that, for my own part, I did act. The first possible day of action was August 28. The days of August 28, 29 and 31 were spent doing nothing else but acting on this issue. In this I was assisted by legal counsel. September 1st was the deadline for "showing cause" why the widening should not take place. There was no "legal" means at our disposal. Students had not returned to campus; a large number of faculty could not be contacted in so short a time and hence the possibility of a popular protest could not be mounted. To say that there was no support from administration is scarcely true since the administration did protest for the only three days available.

In so far as your article might associate faculty with administration, enclosed you will find the spontaneous reaction to your statement: 75 signatures indicating support from St. Michael's College faculty, 36 from the faculty of Victoria College and 21 from the faculty of Trinity College. (These signatures obtained in a matter of a few hours.) By now everyone has heard of the "Do It In The Street Committee" (the very concrete manifestation of student support). Might I suggest that your article did not recite the facts.

J. M. Kelly,

President,

St. Michael's College

(Editorial Note: Monday's paper pointed out that Father Kelly last week considered the issue a lost cause, and had made no effort to rally student and faculty support to challenge City Hall. It is the fact that students and faculty spontaneously initiated a protest against the street widening which has forced a temporary halt in the work. The protest was not sparked by the official leaders of the college, either students or administrators, at St. Mike's it arose in spite of their attitude. We were wrong to report Monday that Father Kelly remained inactive "because of the lack of support from both student and administration"

The Varsity — Gary Wireland

And now a word from Handbook '70 :

I wish to correct a number of factual errors contained in the "Opinionated book review" of Handbook '70 printed in The Varsity last week.

o Advertising income was $4,500 not $3,500 as stated, and due to the late delivery of address labels from the university computer the net deficit will be about $4,430.

o Regarding the "shallow" and "laconic" summary of bookstores... the discounts offered by the university bookstore were amply detailed in the bookstore advertisement, and we saw no need to repeat them again in complete detail; the 1969 Handbook used 61 words to discuss the SCM Bookstore so our section of 53 words, while admittedly shorter, is hardly "laconic" by comparison; the new store on Yonge Street referred to in the "opinionated book review" was not mentioned in the Handbook mainly because it wasn't open when our copy deadline arrived.

The section on political groups was not as objectively factual as some of the groups might have preferred simply because the groups didn't answer our letters requesting them to supply a brief summary of their policies. Women's Lib were perhaps the worst offenders, promising us material then failing to produce at the last minute; consequently, we had to write something quickly... the first paragraph by me and the second by the other editor, last year's SAC president, Gus Abols. The CLM submission arrived late so we used their decal "Continentalism is Treason" instead.

o The "non-political" campus clubs given greater space in the Handbook are those which replied to our letters and submitted material. These include, by the way, the campus Communist Club, the only "political" club to reply.

The editors of the 1969 Handbook decided their main priority was to politicize and hopefully radicalize their readers. In Handbook '70, we attempted rather to provide U of T students with as much useful objective information as possible, leaving the task of radicalizing to the other communications media on campus, principally The Varsity.

Paul Carson co-editor
Handbook '70

'We want students' say profs

Is a course in which students from various backgrounds come together with professors of ethics, logic, economics, psychology and physics more forbidding than it is challenging and exciting?

The new courses FST 200 and FST 300 were designed to break down the communication barriers between disciplines in such an informal seminar atmosphere. Is the university community ready yet for this kind of experiment? We hope so, but preliminary enrolments indicate that these courses are fighting for their very survival.

Watch out for rip-offs

In the Sept. 21 issue of The Varsity there is an unexplained omission in the list of places to buy books in town: Book World, at 75 Gerrard St. at Bay St. The article fails to point out that some stores jack up their list prices first and then advertise big "20 per cent" discounts". The result is not big savings, but big rip-offs. Book World does not offer such spectaculars, but it does sell books, especially in politics and history, at prices that students and working people can afford. Book World does also have occasional book sales.

P.S. Perhaps the way these courses have been brought to the attention of students is itself a good example of such failures to break down communication barriers.

Arts Faculty objects to student parity

By BRIAN MORGAN

Parity has raised its troublesome head in the restructuring of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

In a meeting Monday, faculty objected to a motion for parity on the restructuring committee for the council.

Kevin McCormick, one of the 34 students presently allowed on the 1300 member Council, moved that the committee be formed immediately to decide the nature of the body that would replace the present interim structure.

He proposed that the committee be composed of five staff, chosen by the Council, and five students, chosen by faculty-wide elections, as well as the Dean or his representative as chairman.

This move found support among many of the faculty. Assistant Dean Watson said that it was "a sensible suggestion, that should be dealt with earlier rather than later".

Much of the meeting was caught unawares, however. Several faculty members protested that they had not been informed beforehand and were therefore unprepared to deal with the matter.

Arthur Kruger, a well known opponent of staff-student parity, moved that the motion be tabled, since there was a "low attendance of people who would be concerned with this issue". In a close vote, his motion passed, and the whole matter was set aside until the October 19 meeting.

The present interim structure of the council was established during the summer by a committee containing some student representation, though not parity. It could not agree on a permanent structure, but came up with the present temporary solution in which there is a working General Committee of 169 members, including the 34 students. The decisions of this group are reviewable by the entire 1300 member Council.

This result was agreed to very reluctantly by the students, who felt that it grossly violated the spirit of last year's Commission on University Government report.

John Sword reminded the meeting that the success of the present arrangement would be reviewed anyway by the full Council in the spring.

Innis group to form centre for film art

The growing demand and enthusiasm of film buffs has resulted in the formation of the first major Film Society of the University.

Besides showing a wide range of films by directors such as Hitchcock, Peckinpah, Eisenstein, Welles, Godard, Truffaut, there will be free daily showings of movies, other free films exclusively for members, a library of books on film, discussion groups, assistance available for any questions you might have, and an opportunity for the amateur to show his own film and have it discussed.

"It is clear that this is not just another club, but a complete centre on the film art. We're trying to be comprehensive and educational" said George Edlestien, the co-organizer of the Society.

The Society is a complement to the CIN 204 course which was formed last year for the first time at Innis College. This year, about 270 students were unable to get into the one-year course. The Society will keep those students still interested in cinema involved.

American military should be given more leeway in the war in order to "establish a stable South Vietnam".

Fromm went on to criticize both Nixon and Agnew for not giving the military greater support and for being opposed to Ky's visit.

When asked why the war has been unresolved for the past eight years, Fromm answered that the "industrial magnates are purposefully subverting the war effort in order to fill their own pockets".

35 Burkers will march for Saigon

THIRTY FIVE Edmund Burkers will be going to join the March for Victory rally in Washington on Saturday, Paul Fromm, the society's leader announced today.

The Toronto group will be in Washington in support of the war in Vietnam and South Vietnam's Vice-President Ky. Fromm said they will also march on the Canadian Embassy to protest against Canadian "non-involvement" in South-east Asia.

Kaufman won't do anything

By IAN MACLAREN

"I came here to move that SAC be disbanded but that would be legitimizing it," said Michael Kaufman (II New) at Wednesday's SAC meeting. "Instead," he continued, "I am announcing that I just won't be coming to the meetings anymore."

Asked why he resigned, Kaufman replied, "I haven't resigned. By saying you've resigned you're legitimizing their own game."

Kaufman has been a SAC member since last January when he fought to get on SAC because, "You get delusions about wanting to do things and being able to change things. But I've found that a student council is not the structure to change things through."

Asked what it was SAC did that he objected to Kaufman answered, "It's not what they do, it's what they are and what they stand for. I find it a hypocritical organization. I find most of their activities foundationless and I just don't want to be a part of it. It's a sinking ship — students don't want it."

And what exactly is hypocritical about it? "It's based on hypocrisy, especially by those here who claim to be on the left."

Kaufman, who was chief organizer of last Friday's Day One, said that it didn't have anything to do with his decision to stay away from SAC meetings. "No, the festival was really a lot of fun and I enjoyed it."

When asked what he plans to do as an alternative to SAC, Kaufman replied, "That's a ridiculous question because if it were treated seriously it would mean that my actions are important, which they aren't."

Scarborough, Erindale gain representation on SAC executive Scarborough and Erindale students can rest assured that their problems will be recognized at the downtown campus.

At Wednesday night's general SAC meeting both satellite campuses gained single membership on the SAC executive. "The Erindale and Scarborough Executive Members shall be without portfolio, shall be selected by their College councils from among their elected SAC representatives before the spring Joint Meeting, subject to the approval by SAC."

Approval of the motion pleased Rod Hurd (IV Scar) SAC President, who was instrumental in the original proposal that the SAC executive include Erindale and Scarborough representatives, thus assuming a geographical representation of the city-wide U. of T.

French rejected by Quebec businessmen

MONTREAL (CUP) — Delegates to the Quebec Chamber of Commerce Sept. 19 rejected a proposal by the Chamber of Montmorency demanding the Quebec government adopt legislation making French the working language of Quebec.

The delegates at the conference were heavily influenced by the new director of the Quebec Chamber of Commerce, Donald Byers, an English speaking man who advised the delegates to reject the Montmorency proposal.

He said he preferred to leave the decision up to the discretion of the individual chambers of commerce. Most of them favored French, he said.

There is little evidence to support Byers' last statement.

Byers, the new president of the Quebec Chamber of Commerce, is a director of the Royal Trust, one of the most important finance companies in Canada.

Change, Lady? Don't Do It!

FASHISM, PART I:

"Basically, women are afraid to be different. They'll wear what's in, whether they like it or not."

BY SUSAN PERLY

The North American fashion industry is a $12-billion-a-year affair which depends for its survival on the creation of false needs among consumers. Today we focus on the crisis caused by the refusal of women to accept the midi as the latest fashion. In subsequent parts we will examine other aspects of the industry — how it inculcates "desirable" characteristics in both women and children, and how it functions as an important sector of the monopoly capitalist economy.

"Design is an attempt to make contribution through change. When no contribution is made or can be made, the only process available for giving the illusion of change is 'styling'.

"In a society so totally committed to change, as our own, the illusion must be provided for the customers if the reality is not available."

— designer George Nelson, in Industrial Design

Basically George Nelson's comment describes the function of the fashion industry in the North American economy.

The clothes women in the United States and Canada are wearing have been determined by the arbitrary designs of a group of European couturiers catering to the upper echelons of society.

Twice a year new designs are shown in various European centres, such as London and Rome, and from these showings a 'look' emerges. It is then up to the Paris designers to give the trend a seal of approval in their spring and fall collections. The 'style' then filters down to New York's Seventh Avenue, where modifications are made for the North American customer.

How do these fashion gurus manage, every few years, to convince women that they need a new 'fashionable' wardrobe?

First of all, it is not these European designers who attempt to sell women style changes. Their economic survival depends on purchases by wealthy 'jet-setters' who spend thousands of dollars per dress.

The people who continue to promote the concept of 'the latest (new) look' are those directly in-involved in the fashion industry: garment manufacturers, fashion buyers, clothing retailers.

Their livelihood, and more importantly their profit, is based on the a priori assumption that women must be constantly flocking to the stores to buy new clothes.

And if they do not do it naturally, then they must be induced to do so.

"Basic utility cannot be the function of a prosperous apparel industry. . . We must accept obsolescence. . . It is our job to make women unhappy with what they have. . ." said B. Earl Puckett, the chairman of Allied Stores Corporation back in 1950, and this basic tenet of the fashion industry is still the prevalent one in 1970.

It has to be prevalent because planned obsolescence is the basis for most industries in a capitalist economy. Automobiles, home appliances and furnishings are designed by mass manufacturers to function only a few years. If products were really built to last, there would be no need for the customer to continue buying. We would not be an obsessively consumerist society, with roots in an economy of throw-away efficiency.

Brook Stevens, a leading American industrial designer, puts it this way:

"Our whole economy is based on planned obsolescence. We make good products, we induce people to buy them, and then next year we deliberately introduce something that will make these products old-fashioned, out of date, obsolete. . . It isn't organized waste. It's a sound contribution to the American economy."

And the something which makes apparel appear 'worn-out' in our minds, two years after it was 'in', this obsolescence of desirability, comes from changes in style, most noticeably changes in length. New lengths are not functionally necessary, but they form the economic base of the fashion industry.

A small percentage of women buy the glossy fashion magazines, so it is up to the women's section of the newspapers to relay information about the newest styles to most women. The majority of advertising in the women's pages, besides food chain advertising comes from the large department stores and smaller garment retailers. These merchants base their businesses on a seasonal turnover of goods, which in turn is based on constantly changing styles producing obsolete wardrobes and bringing women into the stores for new clothes.

Fashion writers in the women's section of the daily papers express the needs of the fashion industry in the kind of copy they write.

By this season (1970), the mini fashion scene had become too stable. Women needed an impetus to buy.

And the designers responded with the midi.

"We need the midis from a business standpoint," says Jack Margolis of Montreal's Boutique Bagatelle line. "A woman with a closet full of minis isn't going to buy another one. The dress business was dead because there was no selling point. We have to change for change's sake, just like the cars that come out of Detroit."

Margolis reflects the view of other Canadian manufacturers and retailers who count on obsolescence of desirability to sell clothes, in the same way as their American neighbours.

Although imports from the United States make up less than two per cent of the total Canadian women's wear about 80 per cent of Canadian fashions are almost carbon copies of American designs. Usually a manufacturer from Montreal, where 72 per cent of Canadian women's fashion are produced, will buy a pattern from New York. He makes token or no changes in the design for Canadian consumption.

So the vibrations emanating from New York's Seventh Avenue, the centre of the garment industry in the United States, determine the decisions of Canadian manufacturers.

The fashion writers for Canadian newspapers are no different: they look to New York for trends, inspiration and direction.

In January, 1970, the Italian designer Valentino showed mid-calf fashions in his collection. Paris designers endorsed this move and the midi was on its way to New York.

Normally all the new fashion would need would be plenty of favourable publicity in the press. But something happened this time around on the false-need merry-go-round.

Women didn't respond.

In fact, most of them disliked the midi or were so confused by this sudden change being thrust upon them that they waited to see if it would gain wide acceptance.

In a story in the Toronto Daily Star in March, designer John Burkholder expressed women's confusions.

"Everywhere I go, I hear women discussing the new longer lengths. They don't know what to do. They don't want to buy short spring dresses because they fear they will be obsolete by fall. . ."

The hesitation of Canadian women to buy created a backlash in the retail business.

The word was out to the fashion writers. "Cool it. Don't push the midi women. Let them feel they can still decide, that they aren't being forced to accept this change."

So early newspaper stories on the new lengths were reassuring:

"The midi, the whole new longer look is great fun for fun, for a change. But the short skirt will reign supreme throughout spring, summer and fall in the United States."

"When the opinions come from a designer who is noted for contemporary clothes. . . these words are a great comfort to the women worried about lengths." (Toronto Daily Star, March 19, 1970, quoting Liz Clairborne, a New York designer.)

But the important trend was emphasized on the same page in a story from Rome.

"Rome couturier Valentino's entire spring collection was longuette. It was a smashing success.

For many years our eyes have been filled with short skirts, he says. . . Everybody is tired of seeing them."

Although women were confused about the new lengths, most had a good idea why they disliked them.

"I've never seen such resistance and confusion in fashion, said Morris Luow, who was editor of Canada's Style magazine for 18 years. "The resistance came from the realization that something which people liked was being changed for the sake of change."

And other Canadians weren't ashamed to admit it.

"The longer look is a fashion expressly designed to achieve success in a slipping business," said William Frohman, a Toronto garment manufacturer.

And John Warden, a Montreal designer, agreed. "Business is so bad, that, if it weren't for the midi, a lot of people wouldn't be doing any business at all."

And Eddie Creed of Toronto: "If the midi doesn't sell, there are going to be a lot of people in the clothing business out of jobs in the fall."

When women continued to avoid the stores in droves as summer approached, fashion buyers panicked. They didn't know what length of skirt to order for fall. At the same time, they realized they had little choice in the matter. Manufacturers were producing midis to keep in business and make a profit. It was the store's job, as a link in the fashion industry chain, to sell these midis and bring a constant influx of money from women shoppers.

So the buyers bought midis.

It was now up to the fashion writers in the daily papers to sell them. They had to somehow convince women that the midi was really a desirable piece of merchandise.

The ways in which the three main fashion writers for the three Toronto daily papers went about this reflects many of the contradictions implicit in their jobs: the myth of writing for women and their needs, when actually these women writers are pressured to produce copy which will promote the goods of those stores who advertise in their papers and the interests of the fashion industry generally.

Joyce Carter of the Globe and Mail, appears to be the fashion writer who expressed the most opposition to the advent of the midi.

In a June 1, 1970 column, she reports, "Midi skirts have been heralded by some as necessary devices to re-invigorate the garment industry by rendering present wardrobes obsolete."

Carter further elaborates on this theme, on June 22, 1970 from the American Designers showings in New York, where she notes that, although the stores are packed with mini bargains, nobody's buying.

She admits that designers are opting for the longer lengths, "despite growing opposition to the wardrobe antiquation this indicates."

Two days later, in another story from New York, she refers to "the midi clothes, designers here are determined we'll all be wearing come next fall" and adds that, "The designers can and perhaps should be blamed for attempting to make our wardrobe obsolete."

However she admits that she is wearing her new midi outfit for the first time. No doubt she was pressured to wear it, to create the illusion, even among fashion writers, that women are buying the midi. She is in the position of opposing the midi, while her job depends on her promoting it.

Stasia Evasuk, from the Toronto Daily Star responded in a similar way as Joyce Carter, appearing to sympathize with the helpless customer.

In her June 22, 1970 story from the designers showings in New York, she says, "The consumer is having longer lengths pushed at her, whether she likes it or not."

She quotes another fashion writer at the showings; "These longer lengths catching on for fall still depends on whether or not women will have them rammed down their throats."

The next day she reports, "Every designer is concentrating on the new longer lengths to get the message across that there's a major change brewing in the fashion industry. One designer was even bold enough yesterday to say that fashion must change because it's important for business. "In the fashion business, the essence is change," said Jerry Silverman.

In an attempt to respond to this admission, Evasuk claims, "Maybe so, but someone should tell him that the fashion press writes for its readers and not the trade."

But her June 26 story from New York is headlined, "There's no doubts that longer lengths are taking over for fall. In it, she consoles women who can't afford to throw out their old minis. "How to solve the problem. Wear your old minis with pants."

Evasuk insists that she writes for her readers. Yet she ignores the fact that, although she advises women what to do with their minis, she is still promoting the theory and practice of planned obsolescence. She encourages women to believe some styles are 'newer' than others; that some clothes are more 'fashionable' than others. While consoling women that they can wear 'old' (i.e. mini) clothes and not be ostracized from society, she convinces them that they are merely 'getting by'.

One fashion writer who never gives women suggestions on how to 'make do' or shows sympathy with their position as objects of designers' whims and manufacturers' (cares') Telegram.

She considers herself to be a fashion leader, one who must show the way to the vast fashion-ignorant and style-less masses. She sees herself as a member of a group of avant-garde women, who are always dressed in the latest. And so, more than Joyce Carter and Stasia Evasuk, she reflects in her writing the needs of the fashion industry.

In a June 24, 1970 story from New York, she says, "The fact that contradictions exist in fashion proves that women are not as dictated to fashion as critics maintain."

In a story two days later, she reflects all the philosophies of American and Canadian fashion capitalists, who promote the illusion of contribution through 'change.'

"Change: The one quality of fashion that is the most constantly criticized, yet is responsible for making fashion the fascinating subject and industry that it is..."

"Whether change just for the sake of it is valid or not it motivates women to purchase new clothes. If we produced the same styles year in, year out, an invaluable industry would die. And think how boring we would look."

"Give credit to the midi, as one of the most brave and devastating looks in seasons. And welcome it, because the new interpretations are so beautiful, that they are sure to win approval."

In her story from New York the following day all her impatience with those who won't accept 'change' and her contempt for confused and critical women shows through in amazing smugness.

"Whether you are ready for it, the midi is definitely fait accompli..."

"How so much controversy and dissension can be attached to a hemline is incredible. At times the issues of fashion are ridiculously frivolous..."

"The midi is faced not only with a reactionary public who are loathe to move ahead visually, but must also content with the same kind of press."

"Although they saw more than 2,400 garments during this press week, 98 per cent of them below the knee, fashion writers still turned to gawk when one of theirs timidly ventured forth in the new long length."

"Apart from myself, wearing entirely midi there, I counted only three other women among about 275 supposed fashion leaders."

"The essence of fashion is change (sound familiar?); to express today and anticipate tomorrow. Unfortunately it exists for people who are afraid of change and even more afraid of tomorrow."

This will, I hope end discussion of the midi, at least until it too must depart from favour."

"For the amusing thing is, that all those who decry it will be happily midi-clad as soon as their eyes slowly, very slowly become accustomed to the new length."

Her assumption is that women have no mind of their own and merely have to be gently brain-washed.

Although she derides women for not jumping on the midi bandwagon and states "we are irrevocably plunged into this length", she can also report, "Experts predict hems will go up again to hover about the knee as soon as 18 months."

Marni Grobba was promoting the midi, as well she had to, if the fashion industry was to survive. But someone (likely an editor, who felt she was pushing the line a little bit too hard) must have talked to her.

On July 16, 1970 an apparent reversal in her contempt for 'reactionary' women was seen in a front page women's section spread "MINI RAH RAH" a story very similar to those Stasia Evasuk of the Star had been writing. "Contrary to rumour, the mini is not dead. Ask any man."

"Many fall lines, especially Canadian, include the mini (only nine days previous to this story, she said "the trend setters IN THE US AND EUROPE are definitely long; are not wavering"). And then a patronizing "You see, designers are not really dictatorial ogres."

Although she tried to liberalize her previously dogmatic line on the midi, to give women the impression they have a choice in the clothes they wear, Grobba was still writing in terms of the principle of psychological obsolescence.

She continued, "Should the mini continue as a contemporary item in the wardrobe, it must however be rethought. No style can remain around for so long without refining, perfecting; some change."

Whereas Stasia Evasuk told women it was alright to hang on to the mini and wear it with pants, Grobba has to create a new concept, an illusion of change, in the mini, in order to remain in the fashion vanguard.

So: "First a new name. The word tunic suggests a more modern philosophy to the shorter length."

"Tunic intimates the garment is actually an integral part of a whole look, rather than a separate unit like a dress. "Tunic covers the body without the emphasis on length that the mini implies."

"So when wearing the tunic, for heaven's sake, do not present the stagnant style for the '60's. Try on a 70's look."

We can see from this story that Grobba has lost little of her contempt for the average woman. Her exasperated "for heaven's sake" indicates a frustration with women she considers stagnant and reactionary.

At the same time, the Star continued its schizophrenic look at the midi, in an effort to retain a 'family' approach (concern with household budgets, etc) while appealing to the fashion-minded.

In a July 16, 1970 story on the front page of the women's section, we read: "It may not be popular, but already its a fact of life. That's the midi..."

"Not everybody likes it. But despite us all it's here to stay. For a little while anyway..."

"So, if the fickle designers have decreed that we have to wear it then at least let's wear it correctly..."

The full page spread, entitled "How to wear the midi elegantly," then proceeds to demonstrate to the ignorant shopper the DO's and DON'TS of wearing the midi-the accessories, the hair-dos.

Besides being yet another feature on the midi, this article provides an excellent example of the lack of creativity and originality in fashion writing.

On July 2, 1970 an unaccredited story in the Star women's section began, "Women with short-skirted wardrobes don't need to panic about the new longer hemlines."

"With higher clothing prices and lower household budgets forecast for fall, fewer women than usual will have the cash in hand to indiscriminately buy a bounty of wardrobe baubles."

"For the majority, fashion purchases will be carefully considered and major investments made only after repeated trips to several stores."

Two weeks later in the front page feature on the midi mentioned above, under the DO's, we read: "Are you panic-stricken over the longer hemlines when you take a look in your closet at your short-skirted wardrobe?"

"With higher clothing prices and lower household budgets forecast for fall, fewer women than usual will have the cash in hand to indiscriminately buy a bounty of wardrobe baubles."

"For the (not so silent) majority, fashion purchases will be carefully considered and major investments made only after repeated (research) trips to several shops (and a spirited session with the keeper of the household exchequer)."

The first few paragraphs of the July 16 story are virtually a verbatim steal of the July 2 story. This is not surprising, nor uncommon, in the fashion copy on the women's pages.

What does this mean?

A fashion writer has one purpose in existing and one function to perform, to impose upon an unwilling female public the concepts of fashion, change, style and subtlety (or not so) convince them that they have a need for new clothes.

This function springs from, and is defined by, the fashion industry. Through the industry, further pressure is put on the daily papers by the large department stores, (like Simpson's and Eaton's) and smaller retailers.

We can see an example of this pressure by examining the July 2, 1970 mentioned above. In that article, we are advised, "Last year's mini dresses will still be fashionable or may get by with a lowering of existing hemlines."

Two weeks later in the July 16 feature, under the DON'TS we are told, "Nothing does more harm to the new midi look than the girl who lets down an old dress to mid-calf length and thinks she has achieved chic."

It's pretty obvious that advising women they could get by with a lowering of their hems wasn't helping the fashion industry very much. And the industry must have let the newspapers know it.

So the Star fashion writers responded by telling women that the ONLY way to wear a midi was in terms of a total look. In playing up this total effect, they attempted to convince women they must buy boots, dark stockings, floppy hats and giant satchels before they could look correct in their new midi.

In early January, 1970 in Canadian Magazine, Helen Meyer wrote, "Designers realize that the midi has more fashion potential. But their new look still needed a finishing touch to turn it into a fashion- and this was provided by special accessories that are absolutely essential to bring the midi coat to life."

On June 24 from New York, Stasia Evasuk said for "...the new longer clothes... the secret is in the accessories."

Accessories mean more money for the large department stores, which carry all these items as well as the apparel. But to profit from the added consumer output for accessories manufacturers and retailers first had to sell the concept of midi to women. They realized that the only way they could do that would be to introduce the longer length in a form that would be fashionable and at the same time fairly safe and practical.

Voila, the midi coat. The advantage of buying a coat first to get the feel of the longer length, women were told, is that you can wear it over any length skirt and still be in fashion.

"The languette coat can always go over the short dress," said designer John Burkholder. "Once a woman gets into the longer length she can get used to it and prefer it."

In other words, get the woman to buy something — anything — in the long midi and she will gradually feel that her short dresses are old-fashioned.

The idea of selling the midi coat as a first step in introducing a whole line of clothes followed the familiar process of top-down edicts from Europe to New York, to Canadian buyers retailers and fashion writers.

Last March, Valentino of Rome showed long coats over short dresses. "This was the way to start and introduce longer skirts," he explained.

Four months later, in the New York Times Business and Finance section, Mildred Custin, a former president of Bonwit Teller (an exclusive women's store) presented her ideas on merchandising the longer lengths. She blamed stores for holding back during the summer to test consumer reaction to the midi and advised clearing minis from stock at all cost.

"This wait-and-see attitude is contrary to the rules of the fashion business. Change has always been regarded as the essence of fashion (you really get the impression they all got together and decided this was the phrase to use. But they don't have to. As controllers and perpetuators of an economic structure which functions on this very statement, it comes naturally.)"

Custin saw the midi promoted according to the customer. "The high fashion career girl, the more mature conservative customer and the short skirt advocate."

In a Toronto Telegram story that same week, John Williams, group merchandise manager of Eaton's Toronto informs us that "Eaton's is involved in a three-phase program concerning the long lengths, which began with the indoctrination of buyers, then sales and display staff, management and finally the public."

No doubt Williams was conducting this indoctrination with some of Mildred Custin's theories in mind.

As she put it: "Change has always been a challenge to retailer's ingenuity for presentation and promotion. Change has always been welcomed as a sales stimulant."

"After all, the midi is the first major change in the fashion direction in many years. Stores should welcome this business as stimulating change and should present it and promote it with keen excitement and great expertise."

Teacher boycott continues at Laurentian

SUDBURY (CUP) — The boycott of classes by Instructional staff at Laurentian University entered its second day Thursday with no sign of any agreement being reached between the Board of Governors and the university Senate representing faculty and students.

The decision of the Senate for faculty to boycott classes is a continuation of a struggle that developed between the Senate and the Board's Executive Committee last year over the firing of administration President Stanley Mullins.

A Senate motion on Monday suspended classes for one week starting Wednesday "for the purpose of preparing a statement on Laurentian University, its government and future, for submission on Wednesday, Oct. 7."

Both the Board and the acting administration President Roland Cloutier have branded the instructors' actions as illegal, but Board chairman William Shea said Tuesday that he felt the move was legal.

The boycott is being supported by a majority of the campus' faculty, with only some science and math instructors still holding regularly scheduled classes.

Wednesday, about 1,100 of the 2,000 students jammed into a 700-seat auditorium to hear the Senate explain its position in the battle.

The faculty is conducting study sessions each afternoon centering on discussions of university government.

However, many students have left the campus for the weekend.

BERKLEY (CUP) — Eighty per cent of graduating students on ten American campuses endorse confrontation tactics — ranging from non-violent mass demonstrations to physical violence — as necessary to bring about social change.

The study made by two University of California researchers last spring used a representative sampling of graduate students who are predominately white, middle class men and women above the average students, attending different kinds of campuses in the West, Midwest and East.

Offered five possible responses, 52 per cent agreed "Non-violent mass protests or demonstrations are the only flexible way to persuade officials to respect the will of the people."

Nineteen per cent said "The use of disruptive tactics and the destruction of property is often necessary in order to change the status quo." Nine per cent said, "Although some may get badly hurt, actual physical confrontation and violence must, at times, be resorted to in order to effect social change."

and Thursday's sessions saw little student participation.

The Senate wants "a removal of the Executive Committee (of the Board of Governors) and the appointment of a new Executive Committee with limited powers of recommendation with membership to include faculty and students."

The Board and its Executive have rejected the demands and called for a return to "normality."

The Senate charges that the executive has "usurped powers pertinent to the office of the President and had made unethical use of confidential information in relation to details of proposed professors' salaries by releasing the figures to the press.

(Two members of the Executive Committee own Sudbury's only newspaper and the city's largest television and radio station.)

A letter released by administration President Cloutier Wednesday advising students that "If you want to destroy the university you will have to accept to be destroyed with it." has effectively removed any chances the President might have had as a negotiator in the dispute.

The student newspaper reports that privately many students feel that the university may remain closed until the university adopts a unicameral system, that is just one governing Board replacing the present Senate and Governors, that will give greater representation to faculty and students.

Group condemns Regina trials, calls for impartial study

By BOB GAUTHIER

The Regina courts are still pressing charges against one of twelve persons who demonstrated against the United States Army Band when it appeared in that city last May 14.

The U.S. Army Band is a public-ity organ for the U.S. military.

A letter was sent to Henry Baker, mayor of Regina by a group of prominent Toronto people including Tim Reid, MPP Scarborough West, Mel Watkins, professor at U of T, and SAC (U of T) a week before the trials began. The letter condemned the accusations as being politically based and called for the establishment of an impartial body to investigate the matter.

The letter objected to the trials on several counts. First, the demonstration was only declared a riot four weeks after May 14. Second, while all twelve people were charged with "participating in a riot" none of those supporting the visit of the band was charged. Third, most of the people charged are prominent in associations of legitimate political opposition in Regina (and Saskatchewan).

The Toronto letter supported the position taken by the Regina Defence Committee, a local civil rights group, which presented a brief to the Regina City Council

September 1. (The council appoints the Police Commission of Regina, which in turn controls police policy.)

As well as the objections raised by the Toronto letter, the committee noted the content of public statements attributed to Police Chief Cookson made the two days on which the first group of summonses was being served.

Cookson placed major emphasis on the political ideas of young people in Regina. The committee believed Cookson should not have emphasized these "ideas" and by so doing he was avoiding the issue of political "actions." Hence, a political trial and police repression.

The committee called for an investigation and public disclosure of its findings.

The trials which began September 21 have resulted in eleven acquittals so far. Only Barry Lipton remains charged with "participating in a riot." Many inconsistencies have developed in the trial. Five crown witnesses were unable to identify three of the accused from among those in the courtroom. Two of the witnesses gave contradictory testimony concerning Lipton. Others testified that they saw two of the accused at the demonstration, one of whom was in Mexico at the time, the other in Ottawa.

H.J. Boyce, the presiding magistrate, reserved his decision on Lipton's charges until September 30.

NEEDED

There is a number of things happening or about to happen on the Toronto music scene, and REVIEW desperately needs writers to help cover them. If you are interested please leave

THEATRE

Theatre on campus starts with the U of T Drama Centre presenting Ibsen's GHOSTS at Hart House Theatre Oct. 2-17. Directed by Desmond Scott. Costs students $1.75, others $3.50. Starts at 8:30 p.m.

The studio theatre season is beginning again. Theatre Passe Muraille is opening with Wedekind's story of youth rebelling against bourgeois values, SPRING AWAKENING this week. Martin Kinch is directing. Oct. 8-25. Students $1.50, others $2.50. For more information call 366-3376.

Factory Lab Theatre is holding open auditions today from 2:00 p.m. on. They are also offering classes in acting, playwriting, mime and movement. They started September 28, but if you're interested check them out anyway.

Studio Lab is planning a rerun of DIONYSUS IN 69. A new scaffolding, and new costumes are giving it a "new look," so it's now known as DIONYSUS IN 70.

THOG Theatre, the group that performed at Day One will be holding a benefit for themselves and the underground newspaper Guerrilla, probably Oct. 18. A week later they intend to open with their first full length show.

In straight theatre, HAIR is still going on, with a great many new faces in the cast. Both the Royal Alex, the O'Keefe and the St. Lawrence Centre are planning seasons for which it is possible to get tickets. The St. Lawrence season might be quite interesting. The others are just the usual extravagant imports.

At the St. Lawrence Centre Oct. 5-17 you can see LOVE AND MAPLE SYRUP. It's a Canadian Revue that first appeared at the National Arts Centre and is about to take off on a Canadian tour.

—L.S.

The Review intends to run this column on Fridays, so please have any information you want into us by 1.00 p.m. Thursday. If we can't give you a review or a story we can put you in here, so let us know. Review staff, please come in at noon on Tuesday to get assignments for the next week.

Robert Bourassa, Liberal head of the Quebec government, is off to New York early this month "to discuss" with Nelson Rockefeller, state governor, the sale of power from a hydro-electric project now in the planning stages in Quebec.

According to the New York Times, Bourassa is going to talk about the hydro project slated for the James Bay area "with prominent bankers, investment bankers and industrialists" in San Francisco, Los Angeles and New York.

He will also be seeking "private investment" for "predominantly French-speaking Quebec" to help him realize his campaign promise to bring 100,000 new jobs to the province in the next year and a half.

Spare productive capacity in western Canada is sufficient to permit crude oil deliveries to the United States to rise about 200,000 barrels a day over the present quota of 395,000 barrels a day now going to U.S. areas east of the Rocky Mountains.

There are 42 gallons in a barrel which means that right now over 16 million gallons of crude oil go south daily.

The discovery of the spare productive capacity in the west came in a new survey of the U.S. fuel crisis by a body called the National Petroleum Council.

According to "some observers" quoted in the Toronto Globe and Mail, the oil industry sees little likelihood that Canadian imports of crude oil will be increased before the November U.S. congressional elections.

Spoke French; dismissed

The largest cereal company in Canada has dismissed an employee in its Quebec branch who used French on the job.

Kellogg's of Canada, which controls 65 per cent of all cereal sales in Quebec, fired sales representative, Pierre Lalonde, September 8. Lalonde had been employed by Kellogg's for six months but in the week immediately prior to his dismissal he had insisted on making out all his reports in French.

Kellogg's, whose headquarters are in Toronto, has fifteen sales representatives, all French, in Quebec. They are under the supervision of a bilingual English-Canadian M.A.W. Beattie. This is the first time in Beattie's 10 years at the post that one of his employees has attempted to communicate with him in French.

The official reason for Lalonde's dismissal: he used all of his expense account washing his car.

It is not a unionized job.

CIVIL WAR IN SUDAN

Secret War of the Sixties

For ten years, this largest country in Africa has been racked by bloody civil war, pitting Arab against Black. In spite of the disgusting conspiracy of silence on the part of the News Media, Black Power groups and the New Left, occasional reports of this vicious war have leaked out.

The Opponents

Arab vs Black

The Arab inhabitants of northern Sudan are nine million strong, Moslem, and White. These descendents of slave traders are conducting a bloody war of oppression in their attempt to break the Black rebellion. Hundreds of thousands of Black refugees have already been driven into neighboring Chad (where another Arab vs Black war is currently being waged).

Arab allies: Russia, China and Egypt are all supporting the Sudan government with war material. Nasser wants Sudanese aid in his war with Israel, while the two feuding Communist giants are each attempting to extend its own influence in the Middle East. Russia and China have found a rare common cause in the suppression of Black revolution in Sudan. (In siding with the White rulers of Sudan, China has forgotten her bond with the coloured peoples of the world).

The Black rebels of southern Sudan are four million strong, Christian and Anamist. They have not forgotten who dragged their fore-fathers screaming into slavery. The Blacks deserve world recognition in their fight for their own free country! A free Anyidi!

Black allies: Only the State of Israel is supplying and supporting the Black rebels.

OPINION and COMMENT

The Middle East Forum finds it unbelievable that the News Media could possibly ignore this ten year old civil war! With all the 'front page' treatment given to Biafra and other African and Middle East trouble spots, the Middle East Forum questions the lack of news coverage on the Sudanese conflict.

The Middle East Forum remembers Rocky Jones, Canadian Black Power leader who last year on 'Under Attack' expressed solidarity with the Arabs in their perpetual efforts to destroy Israel. WE NOW ACCUSE HIM, AND THE ENTIRE BLACK POWER MOVEMENT, OF FORSAKING THE DESPERATE TEN YEAR STRUGGLE OF THEIR BLACK BROTHERS IN SUDAN. We also remember that no Black spokesman cried out in protest when Egyptian pilots dropped bombs on their Black brothers in Biafra. We believe this cowardly silence by Mr. Jones and his Black Power colleagues is a feeble attempt to keep alive the myths of 'Israeli Imperialism' and 'Third World Unity'.

The Middle East Forum finds the New Left's silence on this matter most puzzling. We would expect them to champion the revolutionary struggle of the Sudanese rebels. We wonder why they have joined the conspiracy of silence.

THE MIDDLE EAST FORUM SUPPORTS THE EFFORTS OF BLACK REBELS IN SUDAN IN THEIR STRUGGLE FOR A STRUGGLE FOR A FREE STATE. WE INTEND TO PUBLICIZE THEIR FIGHT.

Your comments and opinions are requested. If you sympathize with us, your financial support would help immensely.

U.S. companies make $$$ on Canadian gas sales

OTTAWA (CUP) — Four pipeline companies, wholly-owned, controlled or with some large shareholders in the U.S., will sell 6.3 trillion cubic feet of natural gas to gas companies in the U.S. with licenses granted by the Trudeau government.

The deal, announced in Ottawa Tuesday night, five days before Parliament is scheduled to resume sittings, is worth 2 billion dollars according to Joe Greene, Energy and Resources Minister.

Announcement of the sale came only a few hours after Washington warned that U.S. Energy Resources have hit a potentially disastrous low.

The four companies granted export licenses are Trans Canada Pipeline, West Coast Transmission, Alberta and Southern and Canadian-Montana.

The deal was immediately attacked by New Democratic Party spokesmen, both at the party level and from the Waffle group.

NDP leader T. C. Douglas said the deal would mean continued unemployment and inflation as it will stand in the way of development of secondary and tertiary industry in Canada.

Greene says the deal will mean, as well as the 2 billion dollars income for the four American-controlled companies, about 200 million dollars of pipeline construction in Canada and 13,000 man-hours of work.

The corporate ownership of the companies involved, whose directors include many of Canada's wealthiest people is complicated, as shown by a look at Trans Canada.

Trans Canada Pipelines Ltd. of Toronto was granted three licenses for sales of 1.8 trillion cubic feet for a period of 20 years.

Trans Canada is 14 per cent owned by Canadian Pacific Investments, 34 per cent owned by Gulf Oil Corporation through its Canadian subsidiary Gulf Oil of Canada Ltd., 17 per cent owned by Home Oil of Calgary, which is in turn controlled by Cygnus Corporation of Calgary. Cygnus, however, is owned by Coastal Oil Ltd., which according to the Financial Post, is a subsidiary of Home Oil.

Robert Brown Jr., a director of Trans Canada is president and managing director of Home Oil.

One of the licenses granted to Trans Canada was for shipment to Great Lakes Transmission, which it turns out, is a 50 per cent owned subsidiary of Trans Canada.

The New York Times says in its news columns announcing the deal: "The decision would seem to hold out hope, however, that the present Canadian government headed by Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau, is disposed to give the United States access to a substantial portion of Canada's vast natural gas reserves if suitable terms can be arranged."

The Southam News Service says the Trudeau government believes that because of the deal and new regulations regarding natural gas export prices, that if there is a significant increase in the price of gas on the American market, or a significant increase in the price of competitive sources of energy, the price of Canadian gas can be expected to move upwards.

Carl Nickle, who is an Alberta and Southern director, said Wednesday that the relaxation of natural gas restrictions will mean an increase in Canadian oil exports of more than 40,000 barrels a day beginning Oct. 1.

Unrest without parallel in U.S., commission says

WASHINGTON (CUP) — After four months of study the Scranton Commission on Campus Unrest says the crisis on American campuses "has no parallel in the history of the nation."

The commission, appointed by the president following the deaths of four students at Kent State University and two at Jackson State College last spring, said in their report released this week:

"This crisis has roots in divisions of American society as deep as any since the civil war."

The reasons for campus revolts can be traced to five major areas, the commission says. These are: the war in Indo-China; the changing status of youth; the special character of the American university; a general increase in violence; broad changes in Western culture.

"This crisis has two components; A crisis of violence and a crisis of understanding. We fear new violence and growing enmity," the commission says.

The commission recommended that the president of America take the lead "in explaining to the American people the underlying causes of campus unrest and the urgency of our present situation."

Since Kath and Ed were children, they always shared their playthings.

Blues confident but . . .

Defensive line and secondary hold the key

By LYNDON LITTLE

FOOTBALL COACHES are by nature notoriously non-committal.

One is immediately reminded of the old saw about the grid coach who had just returned from his honeymoon.

A good friend inquired anxiously, "how did it go?", and the coach shot back almost from reflex:

"I thought it was great — but I won't know for sure until I've seen the films!"

The resident football genius at Varsity, Blues head coach Ron Murphy, fits the mold perfectly.

One sometimes gets the impression that he would rather lose his right arm than to make a rash prediction about his team's chances in the big game against the Gallop-

Gaels from Queen's tomorrow.

But, predictions or no predictions one can sense a definite mood of confidence pervading Blues practice sessions this week.

The shock over the loss of star kicker and defensive back Paul McKay appears to have worn off. With a full week of practice the new defensive backfield alignment should be steadier than it was last Saturday.

TO FURTHER BRIGHTEN the picture, two of last year's front line troops who missed the McGill game with hurts, halfback Cor Doret and split end John Chapman, will probably be fit enough to see some action.

Doret, who earned the handle the "Runnymede Roadrunner" with his fine play as a rookie running back last year, picked up a knee injury early in training camp and has missed both exhibition games as well as the league opener.

John "the Jet" Chapman, who had the leagues best average-gain-per-completion record last year, has been bothered by a pulled hamstring muscle. However, he has been running with authority in this week's drills.

Blues will have to be in top form tomorrow if they hope to beat the Gaels.

"Passing and wide running are what we'll expect most from them," said Murph on Wednesday.

"I feel pretty confident we can contain their inside attack but, their passing and sweeps will be dynamite".

IN NEWCOMER Art "Skip" Rochette, the Gaels have a signal caller who can exploit the weaknesses in any pass defense.

With four years American college experience at the University of Bridgeport Connecticut, Rochette will have talented receivers like Tom Chown, Stu Lang and Tom Schultz to latch on to his passes.

As if one "Skip" wasn't enough, Queen's will also have Keith "Skip" Eaman to head an explosive running attack that also features veteran Heino Lilles plus sophomores Carl Leesti and Brian Warrander.

Last year, Eaman had a 51-yard kick-off return "average" so Blues will have to find some method of keeping Bill Stan-kovic's kick-offs away from him if they are to avoid being seriously hurt.

THE KEY FACTOR could come down to the ability of Blues' front four of Alex Squires, Jim Bennett, Jim Orfanakos and Bart D'Onofrio to put a good rush on Rochette.

Blues should at least one psychological factor going for them — they'll be out to erase the bitter memory of last year's last second defeat at the hands of Tindall's crew.

Blues Notes — Reports out of Montreal say that McGill's talented running back Larry Smith has left the team to return to Bishops University where he started last season. SIFL stats, after the first weekend of action show Blues classy pivot Vic Alboini as the league's leading passer with 223 yards on 13 completions.

Blues' Bob Morrow leads everyone on kick-off returns with a 34.5 yard average.

Another Varsity player who tops a category is split end Jack Buchan who is the leading receiver with 109 yards on three catches. The first edition of the CIAU top-Ten football teams shows McGill on top followed by Manitoba, Blues, Queen's Alberta and then St. Mary's.

Blues out-rugbyed 11-6

By MOSSY

WEDNESDAY NIGHT at Varsity Stadium a small crowd viewed an excellent and hard-fought open game of rugby.

The Varsity Blues took on the U of T "Old Boys" — the latter a team filled with a star-studded lineup — and came out on the short end of a 11-6 score.

The first fifteen minutes of play saw both teams testing each other with hard running and downfield kicking.

Then, the game was broken wide open with a try by Mike Hartley of the "Old Boys" which was converted by scrumhalf George Wraw.

A few minutes later, Hartley went over for another try in the corner following a beautiful exhibition of broken-field running.

Just before the half, Ian Owens kicked a penalty goal for Blues and at half-time the "Old Boys" led 8-3.

Blues came back strong and seemed to be wearing the opposition down when Sid Segsworth flew down the right wing taking the ball over for a try in the corner for Blues.

BEING PRESSED on their own line, the "Old Boys" tackled fiercely and called on their wealth of talent to keep Blues at bay.

Maris Apse, that Latvian Prince who resides at the Embassy, was a determining factor in the "Old Boys" strong play.

The game provided good experience for Blues and served as a final tuning up before the league opener against Guelph tomorrow at noon on the back campus.

Guelph upset Blues once last year and the Blues are out to show them that — THE PACK IS BACK!

Soccer Blues blanked

By DON MCMAHON

IN THEIR LAST pre-season exhibition game, the Soccer Blues walked their way to a weak performance against a hustling Buffalo State squad and, as a result, they ended up on the short end of a 2-0 score.

Despite strong performances from Ersin Ozerding, Mike Moores, Vince Pecorella and John Cobby, the majority of the Varsity eleven never rose to the challenge and preferred careless passing and weak coverage throughout the match.

Buffalo State surprised Blues with a first-half goal at the 20 minute mark.

Pecorella, in Blues goal, stopped the initial drive but was unable to prevent the rebound and Buffalo forward Bob Glenn pushed it into the net.

The second half saw a repeat performance of earlier play.

At the 35 minute mark, a fine play by the Buffalo back-line allowed Glenn once again to blast the ball past Pecorella from about 18 yards out while Varsity players grimly watched.

THE GAME WAS a relatively fast, cleanly contested match, with Blues missing a number of chances due to hard luck, poor finishing or lack of drive.

The best example of the day's action was a missed penalty shot by Blues' forward Ken Cancellera.

Buffalo goalkeeper Cal Kern, instead of guessing to either side, stayed in the center of the net and Cancellera hit him squarely — it was that kind of day!

St. Joseph St. widening okayed by City Council

By JEAN BUBBA
St. Michael's College has lost in its attempt to stop the proposed widening of St. Joseph St.

Motions to block the widening were defeated Friday morning at City Council.
In a last ditch attempt, SMC president Father John Kelly has written Mayor Dennison asking that the matter be re-opened since he was not able to make a representation before Council. Prospects for an eleventh-hour victory are gloomy though, since Dennison voted against St. Mike's Friday.

The debate polarized around expressway and anti-expressway forces.

"I'd like to be able to support that people are above the automobile, but I am not an engineer," June Marks said.

However, Marks did congratulate the SMC delegation on their attempt to approach her as their alderman. "These people have been most orderly and I hope in future that they can give me an issue that I can support," she said.

Joseph Piccinini claimed that the issue was merely the result of "a generation of arguments from a pack of untruths" and that trees were not going to be cut down.

It was originally reported that the street expansion would destroy century old trees on the street, although this was later found to have no foundation.

He then went on to say that there was no official protest registered from SMC.

Horace Brown, the other Ward Six alderman, on a point of order, read a verbatim telephone message from Fr. Kelly.

The message read: "I reluctantly agreed to the widening of St. Joseph St. when it was made clear to me that any protest was bound to lose. I am still opposed to the widening of the street and whole heartedly support the protest of the faculty and students."

When Piccinini protested that it was not a signed statement, Brown pointed out that it was difficult to sign a telephone call.

"No one can say that SMC and the university have not had an opportunity to voice their opinion," said William Archer.

St. Mike's was given four days notice for the widening.

Archer added that the morning's talks were taking place at the risk of upsetting the plans of the contractor. According to Karl Jaffery, St. Joseph St. owed its origin and history to the servicing of SMC. "That position has changed due to changes in Bay St. and Queen's Park Crescent," he said. "When we get into little streets that break up the university campus and nothing more than that, we ought to support the university. SMC and Victoria College ought to have almost conclusive say in the way these streets are laid out."

William Kilbourn also spoke in the defense of the College. "St. Joseph St. is the main street of the greatest campus of its kind in North America. They do not want St. Joseph St. widened. They want it closed. It is folly to proceed in view of the unequivocal objection to this most important campus. We are acting in bad faith with the university" he said.

The argument was put on a broader scale by Tony O'Donohue. "The fundamental solution is this," he said, "Where trades and activities are carried out we should try to preserve them from the onslaught of the automobile."

"We should admit our mistake for going along and widening the street just to make room for more

Council gets jump on referendum

In spite of a SAC attempt to boycott it, the new restructured Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science is gradually gaining legitimacy.

Elections are being held today for student representatives to the new council from the combined departments of Classics. SAC has been attempting to postpone election of students to the 169 member body until a new arrangement, giving more than the present 34 student seats can be worked out.

So far these attempts have been unofficial, with SAC approaching only departmental course unions and not the departments themselves. In college departments such as classics where there are no course unions, SAC has made no attempt to delay these elections.

Student strategy towards the new council has been confused and contradictory.

Immediately following the announced restructuring in the summer, an unofficial group of students calling themselves "The People of Arts and Science" agreed to accept the 34 student seats on the Council, while at the same time pressing for a parity composition.

By early September, however, most students involved were talking of holding a referendum to reject seats on the body unless it were restructured in a more acceptable form.

Last Monday, students on the 1300 man General Council of Arts and Science presented a motion calling for a total restructuring of the Council along parity lines. If the Council rejected the motion, the students were prepared to walk out and call for a referendum.

Instead of either passing or rejecting the motion, the Council tabled it until the next meeting, scheduled for October 19.

The October meeting, which will be the first one of the new 169 man council, will therefore be debating a resolution on its own legitimacy.

The new council will be neither fully boycotted by students, since departments such as classics are holding elections, nor fully represented to the extent of 34 seats since SAC has persuaded others to postpone their elections.

The composition of the smaller council may be irrelevant anyway since the 1300 man Faculty Council has a veto over all its decisions.

Erindale administrators rip off obscene posters

Ena Bandon has been seeing a lot of ups and downs in an election campaign she is running at Erindale College.

Administrators have been taking her posters down and she's been putting them back up.

The trouble started last Thursday when she arrived at the college only to find that the election posters she put up the previous night had been torn down.

When she asked a janitor what happened, she was referred to his superintendent. The superintendent referred her to the Principal of the college, J. Tuzo Wilson.

Wilson told her he personally considered the signs offensive, but that they had been removed because several students had complained about them to the assistant dean.

The Assistant Dean, W. J. Huggett, said he thought the signs "pretty childish" but that no students had complained to him about them.

The text of the original signs was:

"When I grow up I want to go to college..."

"Now that you're here and disappointed, elect somebody who does give a shit."

Following discussions with administrators, Bandon scratched out the offensive word and wrote in "Censored."

The signs have been taken down again.

Bandon is a candidate for the post of second vice-president of the Students Administrative Government at Erindale. The elections are tomorrow.

On-campus women will save time at Princeton

PRINCETON, N.J. (LNS) — Why are men's Ivy League colleges going coed? Because they think women deserve an education?

According to a special report prepared for the trustees, too many men Princeton applicants eventually rejected the school because there weren't enough women: "Princeton must become increasingly attractive to the best applicants, and we submit that admitting women will appreciably increase that attractiveness."

In addition, an elaborate time and motion study appeared in the report, showing how much the men were inconvenienced by having to go off campus to get laid — "The present Princeton undergraduate, like his predecessors before him, seeks the company of women — at the cost of much travelling to where the girls are."

Princeton women are a handy, time-saving device.

Bissell defends foreign profs

"I feel a collective university responsibility for every juvenile blast in The Varsity", said Claude Bissell, speaking to the University Women's Club of Toronto Thursday night.

This comment came during his speech concerning the future role of university presidents.

Reflecting on his own career, Dr. Bissell said that he had also felt responsible for "every indiscretion of a colleague, every building that fails to meet someone's concept of efficiency or beauty, every oversight in a university office."

Future presidents should spend less time in the office in order to play a more active role in interpreting the university to the public, he said.

He also pointed out the technical character of a university president's job.

"A meeting of university presidents these days doesn't sound like a meeting of educators but like a conference of statisticians and economists."

Dr. Bissell also strongly defended foreign professors in Canadian universities, blaming "breast-thumping nationalists" for their opposition.

"We should be proud that we have been able to attract distinguished foreign scholars to our universities. Many have come here because of a deep conviction that Canada is both a refuge from present ills and a hope for future relief.

Books on Canada-US relations

By IAN SCOTT

Use our natural resources as "an instrument to apply pressure" to stop pollution in the United States says Pollution Probe's Donald Chant, in a recently released book.

Chant, Head of the Zoology Department at U of T, edited Pollution Probe.

New Press has published this book along with two others based on Canada's survival in relation to the U.S. "Partner To Behemoth" by John Warnock, and "The Energy Game" by James Laxer. The three describe the Americans' economic, cultural, and ecological exploitation of Canada.

Laxer attacks the Canadian Government for being totally tied to American continentalism.

"Make the U.S. buy natural gas and oil on our terms," he stated at a press conference on Friday.

John Warnock, who worked in the U.S. State Department and is now teaching at Glendon College, writes that Canada's military position is that of America's junior partner.

"The trade structure runs north-south and the only solution is national control, public ownership," Warnock states.

Laurentian University strikers to meet Davis at Queen's Park

About 300 striking students and staff from Sudbury's Laurentian University are coming to Queen's Park tomorrow to meet Ontario Minister of Education William Davis to discuss both the conflict at Laurentian and the whole structure of university education in Ontario.

Before the official conference, the Laurentian representatives will gather in front of Queen's Park at 1 p.m. to talk with Toronto supporters about their mission.

The L.U. strikers, who have remained in Sudbury, are launching a study of the political problems that provoked the present crisis over administrative power.

According to Dave Dixon, a Laurentian student, the majority of faculty and students feel that the non-communication between their representatives, The Senate, and the administration represented by the Board of Governors, has led to an impasse symptomatic of the ill-designed structures of university government all over Ontario.

Laurentian students are seeking an alternative to the rule by the Board of Governors which will "let the university operate in an acceptable atmosphere."

automobiles. He should negotiate with the contractor to end the project at Bay St. This is not a case of losing face but of saving the city $40,000.

According to Public Works Commissioner Ray Bremner, St. Joseph St. will be 36 feet at Bay St. for a length of "no more than ten feet," the bulk coming off the ear lot on the south side of the street, and it will be 33 feet wide in the middle for a length of 190 feet.

The issue was then put to a vote. Kilbourn's recommendation was put on the floor first.

It read: "Moved that the matter of the widening of St. Joseph St. between Bay St. and Queen's Park Crescent be abandoned and that the balance of reconstruction work be done within present limits."

Nine votes were in the affirmative, twelve in the negative. The motion needed a two-thirds majority to pass.

The second motion by Hugh Bruce read: "Moved that the actions of City Council as of April 1 be reaffirmed."

Nine votes were in the negative, twelve were in the affirmative. The motion carried.

A backward step up

If you're a university administrator, happiness is having students on your most representative, and most respected governing body.

Especially if it's an unofficial body with only advisory powers.

And even more so if the students have a small number of seats and can easily be outvoted.

All of these conditions were fulfilled at U of T this past week, so there is some cause for jubilation on the part of administrators.

The president's advisory council is a body set up by President Bissell in 1965 as a place where the different elements of the university — administrators, faculty, members of the ruling Board of Governors — could get together and reach a consensus on issues that affect them all.

Students were hardly considered worth inviting at that time.

The council was intended to fill a vacuum of legitimate authority. It had become clear that separating academic from planning and business functions was inefficient.

Times have changed since then, and for the last two years a number one priority of the president's council has been to get student representatives to take up seats on the council.

To achieve this, the council has made several concessions:

In January 1969 the council stopped holding secret meetings. This was a sore and painful decision, but it had to be made.

Yet students still rejected an offer of seven seats on a council of 14 administrators and five faculty.

Last month the presidents council decided to cut back on the high proportion of administrators on the council. Voting members of the council will not now be seven students (one of them a graduate, the other part time), seven faculty, and five administrators.

When SAC boycotted the president's council back in 1968, and 1969, the reasoning was that participation in an unofficial advisory policy body would detract from the movement for thorough reform of the university governing structures.

That is still the case.

Accepting seats on an unofficial body with no permanent authority will not contribute to resolving the structural inequalities of the governing process.

The argument that student leaders have advanced — that we need to be involved in the presidents council in order not to be bypassed in such important decisions as selection of a new president — reveals a complete lack of faith in the ability of students at large to demand and get entirely new answers to the question of how the university should be run.

To participate in and help legitimate structures which can be replaced is a serious political mistake.

At this stage students should be fighting to get equal representation with faculty on the top governing structures of the university, and on the departmental and faculty levels.

To focus on the president's council will be to dull and discount the important edge of these struggles.

The Students' Administrative Council should reconsider its too hasty decision.

Juvenilia

President Claude Bissell chose to unburden himself last Thursday night at an unpublicized meeting of the University Women's Club.

Among his wide-ranging series of complaints was the following:

"At any gathering, I feel a collective university responsibility for every juvenile blast in The Varsity. . ."

As it happens, The Varsity is one of the few institutions in the university which is not structurally responsible to the university president.

President Bissell unfortunately chose not to point out in the same speech that a lot of the attacks directed at him are a direct function of the great authority vested in the university president.

If President Bissell resents the close identification of the president with the performance of the university, he should be pressing vigorously for structural changes which would alter the hierarchical scheme of centralized authority of which the president is the summit.

He shouldn't be engaging in vague generalizations about the sorry lot of a university president.

That strikes us as juvenile.

Support Laurentian!

The current crisis at Laurentian University should be given close attention and support by both students and faculty at all Ontario universities.

The situation that has developed over the last two years has simply reached the point where the senate has found itself unable to carry out its duties, due to the lack of cooperation of the Board of Governors.

The majority of students and faculty agree that there is little hope of the Board, under the guidance of its present executive committee, ever solving the numerous problems of the university community.

The Board's record of performance coupled with its questionable tactics in the last six months have raised the question in the academic community of whether there could ever be the kind of communication and decision-making required in a functioning university.

In order to try and correct this situation and let the university operate in an acceptable atmosphere the university community is trying to work on these political problems while recessed from normal classes. The result of this comprehensive study will be presented to the Ontario Government with the hope that some quick action will be forthcoming.

If you are interested in education and think that the current educational institutions are not serving the needs, then I urge you to support the students, faculty and senate of Laurentian by attending an "information meeting" tomorrow at 1 p.m. in front of Queen's Park.

We make more than $1500

As reported in "Student risks eviction on rent strike deadline," I did indeed predict to a general meeting of tenants at the Married Students' Residence an income of $1500. My arithmetic was hasty and horrible.

Leaving aside OSAP assistance, our combined incomes over the period of the lease should gross somewhere between $3800 and $4800. Our rent is $137 a month, or about $1650 per year.

This works out to a rent-to-income ratio of (I think) about 34 to 43 per cent, compared to the federally announced and provincially adopted guideline of 25 per cent maximum.

I should add that Rita and I are simply the least non-representative representatives that the tenants could have chosen. The really representative families are those who could not afford eviction and were reluctant to commit the $50 or $60 that a court challenge of OHSC would entail.

Brian Shaughnessy.

More students are welcome

There has been some misunderstanding regarding the Innis College Course 203, "Contemporary Social Issues."

Some students who attempted to register early last week were told at the desk in Sidney Smith Hall that the course was closed to further registration. This is not so.

No Little Girl Is Too Young

FASHISM, PART II:

Today we examine two further aspects of the gigantic fashion industry. First, we look at the way in which children are being carefully prepared for their future function in the world of adult fashion. And second, we take a look at the underside of the fashion industry — the fact that behind the fashion gossip and glossy ads lies the reality of U.S. monopoly capital which survives through imposing its fiat, both directly and indirectly, upon those it oppresses.

BY SUSAN PERLY

The socialization of women to dress a certain feminine way begins when they are still young girls. Likewise, the fashion copy written about children's clothing reinforces the stereotyped 'feminine', 'masculine' characteristics as well as creating, themselves, a model of what children should look like.

Last December, Helen Meyer wrote a feature for The Canadian Magazine on pre-teen fashions. She described the clothes little girls should be wearing to Christmas parties.

"... party dresses in solid-colour velvet trimmed with white lace and the designers suggest that they be worn with matching shoes, hair-bows and semi-opaque stockings. If you can't get matching panty-hose, dye a white pair.

"It's a delightful look; one that will make every other little girl in the room look overdressed. And no little girl is too young to learn how to accomplish that trick."

From this one article we can perceive how being a 'female' is stressed for little girls.

First of all, clothes must be pretty, with material like velvet and lace, which are considered feminine and sensual.

Mom Buys The Clothes

Second, the concept of 'total look' is inculcated at an early age (these are clothes for 6-12). One simple CANNOT wear a dress without matching panti-hose. (For a six-year-old?) We don't suddenly decide at 21 that this is how to dress — they've been telling us for years.

Third, little girls are taught to compete with their girlfriends; to look smart, while the friend turns up frilly and 'overdressed'. Bringing attention to yourself, feeding your ego, flattering yourself, gaining pleasure by appearing superior to others, all the qualities of a selfish, self-centered person are encouraged in little girls, by teaching them to dress to outshine others.

This spirit of unhealthy competition of rising upward, instead of learning to share your possessions, to love your friends honestly and not use 'tricks' to gain attention is the spirit of private enterprise and the spirit of each man out for himself. We are taught to believe in it from an early age. We are taught through the newspapers, especially through the fashion pages.

"Parties will find little girls in pant outfits just like mother's. . . smocked dresses come in pastel shades as fresh as Easter flowers. Young girls are wild about jewelry. Beads and chains and rings for every finger are now accessories." (Toronto Daily Star — March 19, 1970)

Whereas girls are described in terms of pastels, crochets and mother, "tie-dyed tee-shirts and corduroy battle jackets are other items to include on your list when buying boy's clothes. Watch for wild neck scarves that remind little boys of cowboys." (March 19, 1970 — Toronto Daily Star)

It is not so much that little girls emulate mother when they buy clothes, but rather that mother does the shopping and through the clothing she chooses, molds her little girl in her own image.

Many women see their goal in life as getting married and having a family. When their children, especially the girls, start to grow up, mothers become pre-occupied with 'raising them.'

Most of their time is spent thinking of their children, taking them to school, cooking and cleaning for them, playing with them, shopping for them. They cannot imagine their lives without their children; they have no job, or serious interests outside the home. As a result, many women, frustrated at interrupted careers or educations, project these stifled plans and dreams upon their daughters. They live vicariously through them. All the things they didn't do, their daughter will. She will become what the mother couldn't, because she got married and had children.

Ellen Henderson, a designer of children's clothes says, "If a woman is still wearing short dresses she'll want her daughter in them too, and the same goes for the midi."

Roslyn Walker, another designer, who works for Baab, a Montreal children's wear firm, calls her dresses 'showpieces' because, she explains, "it's only when a mother wants to show off her daughter that she buys an outfit like one of these."

So, when buying clothes, women are conscious that the way their daughter looks is a reflection of their own sense of 'style'. Although they may dress in the midi, many would probably admit they don't look so great in it anyway. They wear it to be fashionable.

However, as Helen Meyer, in a Canadian Magazine article called MIDIS FOR KIDDIES, put it: "Either way the daughter will look better than her mother. Grownups never did look any great shakes in the mini. Most of them were simply too fat. . . for such an extreme fashion. And they're going to look even worse in the midi, for the same reasons."

"Both styles, however, look marvelous on pre-teens. They've got the long, skinny legs and arms, the lean boyish torsos that are essential to extreme fashion."

While the mother is frustrated by her own lack of achievement, by her too-fat figure and how it looks in a midi, she sees in her daughter a hope, a light of creative potential for the future. She imagines that her daughter will retain her potential and her skinny figure.

What she doesn't realize is that her daughter will find it almost impossible to rise above the dilemma of being only a wife and mother, if she is being inculcated with the myth of 'fashion', of being feminine to attract boys, from an early age.

When the mother takes her daughter downtown to shop for a frilly pant suit, so she can be 'in' and popular with the boys, the way the mother wasn't — when she sees clothes as part of upward mobility, and making something of one's life, she is feeding her daughter into that same process that will inevitably lead her to seek security in a high-paying job, a well-off husband, and expensive clothes. The clothes will be necessary to maintain the job and bring status to the husband, and the husband will be necessary (after she has had children and quit the job) to pay for the wardrobe.

Therefore, the fashion industry is assisted by mothers who teach their daughters that dressing in the latest style is necessary "for women of all ages." They are unwitting accomplices in the oppression of women-perpetrators of a vicious social and economic circle, which their daughters will continue when they marry and have children.

Dressing With The War Machine

FASHISM, PART III:

By SUSAN PERLY

By 1960, women's clothing and accessories had become a $12-billion industry, much of it built upon the obsolescence-creating techniques which it pioneered.

But the fashion industry is not only an important sector of the economy, it is also a very typical one, displaying one of the major characteristics of monopoly capital.

Like all major industries in North America, the fashion industry is built upon creating artificial needs among consumers.

And, like all major industries, it pours money, materials, research and human power into an imperialist war economy.

Monsanto Research Corp., the 41st largest conglomerate in the U.S. produces acrylic fibres for women's clothing — and guarantees their product, a result of research and dedication to creating solid materials.

Monsanto also uses its facilities for chemical and biological warfare research for the Edgewood Arsenal, located nearby Baltimore, Maryland. Edgewood, the second largest employer in the U.S. (its 1965 payroll was $46 million), is the headquarters of the U.S. Army's Chemical Research and Development Laboratories.

The arsenal engages in open-air testing of CBW agents and was the first centre to test lethal agents on human beings. The arsenal's 10,000 acres are valued at $130 million and its budget runs in the vicinity of a quarter of a billion dollars.

Monsanto's studies of chemical agents for Edgewood Arsenal were done "in order to support the search for new agents, evaluate candidate agents and improve the stability and effectiveness of operational agents."

Monsanto's agricultural division in St. Louis produces Butyl Ester Herbicides, a chemical weapon used in war, at a cost to the U.S. Government of $3,278,224. A chemical component of these herbicides is 2,4-D, which has the effect, on humans who have had heavy direct exposure, of pulmonary constriction, digestive malfunction and bleeding from the mouth. The other chemical used is 2,4,5-T, which has the same effects as 2,4-D. Documentation shows that mice and rats given 2,4,5-T during early stages of pregnancy had offspring with a high number of deformities. This weapon is still being used in Vietnam.

Monsanto believes you get what you pay for and it certainly gives the U.S. Army good quality products for its money.

At the same time they manufacture the fibres used in all the latest fashions: the fashions we are encouraged to buy, in advertisements such as this one from Mademoiselle, September, 1969:

"TOMMY JAMES AND THE SHONDELLS DIG h.i.s. for her

"The in-sound of Tommy James and the Shondells go for this out-of-sight duo: her ribbed Acrilan acrylic sweater ($11), over the striped herring bone of her flared pants (with cuffs no less) at $14...

"GUARANTEED BY MONSANTO FOR ONE FULL YEAR'S NORMAL WEAR — REFUND OR REPLACEMENT WHEN RETURNED WITH TAG AND A SALES SLIP."

Monsanto's friendly satisfaction-guaranteed warranties don't of course, extend to the thousands of victims claimed by chemical and biological warfare.

"WHAT NICE GIRLS WEAR UNDER KNITS: CLING-FREE TAFFA-TRIM.

"ORDINARY SLIPS UNDER CLINGY KNITS REVEAL A LOT — INCLUDING A LACK OF SUBTLETY...

E.I. DuPont de Nemours is the 15th largest corporation in the U.S. and the largest chemical manufacturer in the world. DuPont nylon is used all over the U.S. and Canada for manufacturing women's under and outer wear.

The DuPont family has a large stake in maintaining the capitalist system. They thrive by oppressing the black population of Wilmington, Delaware, their company headquarters, and a town almost totally under the iron rule of the DuPonts.

The DuPonts believe that people who threaten the destruction of their economic status must be kept in place. And so, they provide facilities for production of lead azide for gravel mines at the Kansa Army Ammunition plant. For this service the Pentagon pays $1,072,401.

With a vested interest in maintaining a social system based on exploitation and force, it is not surprising that the DuPont slip ad emphasises that NICE girls don't wear slips that reveal.

That NICE girls are subtle and demure.

It is easier — and cleaner — to keep people in line by perpetuating myths of shyness, coyness and "femininity" through fashion advertisements, than to have to use troops and arms.

"AMAZING REVLON DISCOVERY MAKES NAIL ENAMEL WEAR UP TO THREE TIMES LONGER...

"From the Revlon Research laboratories comes a little miracle of a basecoat which changes the life span of a nail enamel. Tested for nearly a year in salons from Fifth Avenue to San Francisco, Wonder Wear Basecoat, invented by Revlon..."

Although Revlon is not directly part of the fashion industry, they are worth noting because their products (lipstick, nail polish, etc) make up part of the accessories — the "paint" which women use to create an illusion of beauty to attract men. Cosmetics, like women's clothing, are not created for the real enrichment of women, but for profit, and like the fashion industry this $2-billion-a-year cosmet-

What nice girls wear under knits:

cling-free 'Taffa-Trim'

Ordinary slips under clingy knits reveal a lot — including a lack of subtlety. "Taffa-Trim"™ gives a knit the free-swinging look it was meant to have. Of specially knit DU PONT NYLON. About $6.

Another loving touch from Warner's® THE WARNACO GROUP ic and toiletry business, exploits women to sell the goods.

Charles Revson, the founder of Revlon, gained his success, as did the clothing manufacturers, by introducing periodic 'style' changes. Every six months he presents the public with a new nail polish or lipstick shading which makes his old ones 'obsolete' — e.g. emphasizing bold colours, then switching to mute pastels.

Another amazing Revlon discovery which alters the life span (but not of nail enamel) is the arming device for the BLU 7A/B firebomb, which the Pentagon has contracted from them.

It is not a contradiction to find the same corporations doing research for both the fashion and cosmetic industry, as well as the war industry.

That simply reveals the high degree of integration which exists in a monopolistic economy. It also points out that the underlying basis of the war economy is no different from that of the fashion industry.

Both industries have to convince people that the money they spend on maintaining and expanding both of these sectors of the economy is not only worthwhile but necessary.

People must be made to think that they genuinely desire these things. People must continue to aspire to status through property (like clothes) and to believe that war is necessary to protect a particular way of life from outside challenges.

McGill calls riot squad to clear militant Reds

MONTREAL (CUP) — Arriving after most of the action was over, about eleven carloads of riot equipped police confined themselves to moving people off campus at McGill on Wednesday night.

Members of the Progressive Natural Sciences study group, a front group from the McGill Student movement (Marxist-Leninist) seized the microphone and blocked the guest lecturer from the stage, they charged the Americal pollution expert with being "a long standing agent of American imperialism".

The McGill student paper says the presence of undercover cops in the audience" has been verified by several students who recognized cops regularly assigned to McGill. Vice-Principal Robert Shaw has denied the presence of plain clothes police at the Commoner speech.

Although the action was confined to McGill's Leacock Building, the whole campus was cleared in about half an hour. "When you've got violence," explained Shaw, "you don't know where it is."

Hostel residents ignore Ottawa eviction notice

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Residents of the Jericho hostel, ordered to leave by last Friday have ignored the eviction notice.

The 100 residents of the converted army base said they would remain in the hostel until other facilities could be made available for them.

A government spokesman announced Friday that a short period to leave will be permitted, and said the government will pay travel expenses of any hostel resident who wants to return to his home town anywhere in Canada.

T.E. Jackson of the Federal Justice Department said there was no plan to throw out the occupants. He said such action would be considered only if the youths don't "move out in the normal course of events".

The city's Social Planning Department announced Friday it had found 140 beds which could be made available for the people now at Jericho.

The youths moved into Jericho three weeks ago after a hostel at a Vancouver army was closed.

Two rival budgets contend at tonight's SAC meeting to spend students' money

Tonight at 7:00 p.m. in Brennan Hall, St. Michael's College, is the annual SAC Santa Claus give-away meeting.

At the budget meeting, two prepared budgets will be presented. The official budget, which was worked out by the finance commission and council executive members, is based on a SAC fee of $14 which amounts to $286,752.00 in revenue.

The counter budget was prepared by a group of SAC members and interested students and is based on a SAC fee of $6 which amounts to approximately $131,000.00.

The decrease of $8 in the SAC fee as presented in the counter budget results in a cut in the full-time paid SAC bureaucracy, donations to campus clubs and community organizations.

Organizers of the Counter-budget hope to use their alternate budget to force SAC to talk seriously about how it spends student money.

Counter-budget cuts student fees to $6

The counterbudget is a drastic streamlining of SAC budget and is designed to indicate areas of misallocation of resources and overspending by SAC.

The counterbudget distributes the $131,000 that would be collected if SAC fees were reduced to $6 per student among seven categories:

- Student loans $20,000 or 15% of the budget.
- The Varsity $20,000 or 15% of the budget.
- Radio Varsity $10,000 or 7.5% of the budget.

- SAC bureaucracy $32,000 or 25% of the budget.
- Course Unions $36,000 or 25% of the budget.
- SAC working groups $4,000 or 3% of the budget.
- Rebates to Scarborough and Erindale $9,000 or 7% of the budget.

The counterbudget would mean a cut in nearly every SAC expenditure, and a complete end to grants to campus clubs, cultural groups, outside volunteer organizations, and plans such as campus centre research.

Although the budget is not expected to be adopted by the council, its proposers hope to spark a meaningful discussion of the purpose and position of SAC within the university community.

The meeting for the budget is tonight at 7 p.m. at St. Michael's Brennan Hall.

Varsity rowers survive early morning dip

By BILL ALLISON
G-G-God-d-d-damn, that's cold! was the general feeling expressed by the Varsity Crew early Friday morning.

If you happened to be crossing the Humber on the Gardiner Expressway in your nice warm car between 7 and 8 a.m., you may have noticed this crew apparently engaged in a synchronized swimming drill.

Immersed to the neck (except when inundated by a wave) in the chilly water of Lake Ontario, the crew was guiding their swamped boat to a suitable landing spot a cool 100 yards distant.

Fortunately, there were enough

Track and Harrier teams see action over weekend

By MATT DUNCAN

A small Varsity track team of eight members took part in the Waterloo Invitational track meet last Friday and managed a fourth place finish behind much larger teams.

Dave Watt in the triple jump and Dave Barrett in the high jump were the only Varsity members to gain firsts.

However, Andy Dzenis in the javelin, Alan Tucker in the 100 meters, Eric Little in the long jump and Matt Duncan in the 400 meters were also able to win points.

Meanwhile, the cross country "A" team of Brian Armstrong, Jim Smith, Bob Knuckey, Pete Pimm and Rich Pyne placed fifth in the overall competition in the 57th annual silver real relays held at High Park on Saturday.

early risers in Toronto to raise the temperature of the Humber those few degrees which meant the difference between surviving only 10 minutes and the 20 required to land the boat.

The freshman crew won their heat and finished a close third to Brock and Western in the final, in spite of damaged equipment. This was a creditable performance considering that many of these oarsmen rowed for the first time only a few days prior to the race.

The Junior Varsity also placed third behind Brock and Western winning the race handily, but within reach.

Though rowing an unfamiliar boat, the Lightweight won their race, Western pressing all the way with Brock a distant third.

Blues eke by Gaels 27-18

By LYNDON LITTLE

FORGET THE 1967 Boston Red Sox — we've got our own version of the "Cardiac Kids" right here at Varsity!

For the second weekend in a row, the football Blues came up with a hair-raising, heart-jolting performance as they edged the Golden Gaels from Kingston 27-18 before 13,000 drenched but happy fans.

The point spread may have been nine on the scoreboard — but in reality the margin of victory was hair-breadth thin.

Blues' quarterback Vic Alboini directed a Varsity attack that attempted no less than six third-down gambles — and they made every one of them!

Long after the stands had been cleared of fans and the goal posts ripped from their moorings, Ron Murphy's Blues wandered around in their quarters underneath the stands and savored the taste of their first victory over Queen's in three years.

In one corner of the dressing room, Blues' little field general Alboini held court for a cluster of sports scribes.

Not even the fact that he had sustained a painful shoulder injury that has clouded his availability for the remainder of his final year could mask the obvious satisfaction he felt.

In his five-year tenure with Blues, this was the first time Alboini had been at the helm of a Varsity triumph over the Gaels.

Alboini had picked up the injury late in the fourth quarter on a gutsy dash for the goal line that resulted in Blues' clinching touchdown.

A tackler landed on his left shoulder just as he fell into the end zone.

"The play was supposed to have been a hook pass to Slater (tight-end Mark Slater)," explained Alboini, "but he got held up by the Queen's linebackers so I had to scramble."

IN ANOTHER corner of the room, veteran guard Gord Whitaker fought back the tears as he watched Blues' medical staff wrap an injured knee that will likely require a cast to correct damaged ligaments.

It was a tough blow, because more than any other factor, it was the offensive line led by Whitaker, Peter Van Bodegom, Rick Agro, Don Fraser and Jim Kellam that made the victory possible with their superb blocking.

When Whitaker got hurt on a third-quarter kick-off Derek Turner, who was an SIFL all-star last year, was ready to replace him.

"That's what makes you feel so good," said Whitaker, "knowing that Derek was there ready to step in and do a job."

After a victory such as this one you could pick out any number of heroes.

FULLBACK GLEN MARKLE was Blues' meal ticket all afternoon as he lugged the ball from tackle to tackle until he had accumulated 112 yards on 28 carries including a pair of touchdowns.

Or split-end John Chapman who was starting his first game of the season, caught a key third-down pass to set up Blues' second major, and generally gave the Gaels' secondary fits all afternoon.

Or how about rookie quarterback Bob Billinghurst! A last minute injury to Stew MacDween forced him into a starting role in the defensive backfield and he acquitted himself admirably.

Or rookie defensive half Peter McNabb who for the second week in a row came up with a crucial interception.

Blues got off to a shaken start and for the most part of the first quarter looked for all the world like a high school team. They mixed up pass coverage assignments, missed tackles, and generally gave the impression that they were confused most of the time.

QUEEN'S TOOK advantage of this situation to run up a quick 8-0 lead on a single from a wide field goal attempt and a touchdown on a bootleg play by Gaels' talented pivot Art Rochette.

However, just as the first quarter was ending, Blues put together a solid, ball-control, drive that ended in a touchdown and seemed to settle them down and to give them confidence.

They moved the ball 95 yards in 14 plays in a march that featured no less than nine carries by Markle, a 24 yard pass from Alboini to flanker Jack Buchan, and two third-down gambles.

Markle capped the drive with a two-yard plunge showing great second effort as he was stopped initially at the line of scrimmage.

The try for the two-point conversion failed.

THE GAELS came right back and on a long pass to flanker Tom Chown moved deep into Blues' territory. However, they had to settle for a 22-yard field goal by Doug Cozac that increased their margin to 11-6.

Following Cozac's field goal, Blues took over on their 35 and then on Markle's running and an interference call on Chapman they found themselves in a crucial third-down and two situation on Queen's 45.

The situation obviously called for either a quarterback sneek or another power smash by Markle but, with all the ice-cool verve of a Mississippi river boat gambler, Alboini faked the run and pitched a deep strike to Chapman who wasn't hauled down until he reached the Gaels' one.

Markle took it in from there and Blues led 13-11 at the half.
A Gaels' fumble of a Van Bodegom punt set the stage for another Blues' score in the third quarter.

Alboini threw a short pass to Slater and Blues jumped into a 20-12 lead.

However, Tindall's crew came right back again following the kick-off and marched 62 yards in 10 plays with halfback Keith Eaman going over from one yard out for the major.

That narrowed the margin to 20-18 and that's the way it remained until Alboini's clinching touchdown.

HE'S GOT IT! Blues' tight end Mark Slater grabs TD pass from Vic Alboini. The major came early in the third quarter and gave Blues a 20-11 lead at that point.

Rugger Blues upset by Guelph

By HARLS

ON SATURDAY, the back campus was the scene of a dishevelled display of rugger by Blues as they were upset for the second year in a row by the hard-driving Guelph rugger Gryphons.

The first half went scoreless as both teams moved the ball between the twenty-five yard lines.

Blues missed a try when their right winger went over in the corner but went out of bounds before touching the ball down.

It was also in the first half that ex-Quebec star Peter Bellam re-injured his shoulder and may be out indefinitely.

Blues stormed back after the half and scored an early try when Chris Rous went over under the posts and it was converted by Ian Owens.

Guelph came back with their own try under the posts immediately after wing-forward Griffiths was forced to leave the field with an injury. However, this try went unconverted and Blues still led 5-3.

WITH APPROXIMATELY ten minutes left in the game, Guelph center Fillman intercepted an errant pass in Blues' back line and went 50 yards for a try which was converted by Hammond.

Blues tried to come back but the Gryphons' hard tackling kept them from scoring again and they wrapped up a 8-5 victory.

Tomorrow Blues take on Western in London. The rugger Mustangs have already defeated Guelph once this season by a score of 9-3 so Blues will have to play much better if they want to retain the Turner Trophy which they have held for the past three years.

Rugger Rubles — Blues' seconds fared better as they crushed Guelph's seconds 21-3. . . The seconds were led by McKenna who scored two tries before being forced to leave the game before the half with an eye injury. . . Guelph's only try came from Frank Marzo — a player Blues had lent to Guelph for the game!

Two rival budgets contend at tonight's SAC meeting to spend students' money

Tonight at 7:00 p.m. in Brennan Hall, St. Michael's College, is the annual SAC Santa Claus give-away meeting.

At the budget meeting, two prepared budgets will be presented. The official budget, which was worked out by the finance commission and council executive members, is based on a SAC fee of $14 which amounts to $286,752.00 in revenue.

The counter budget was prepared by a group of SAC members and interested students and is based on a SAC fee of $6 which amounts to approximately $131,000.00.

The decrease of $8 in the SAC fee as presented in the counter budget results in a cut in the full-time paid SAC bureaucracy, donations to campus clubs and community organizations.

Organizers of the Counter-budget hope to use their alternate budget to force SAC to talk seriously about how it spends student money.

Still-secret Davey Report leaked to press

OTTAWA (CUP) — Two principal proposals that the Davey Commission on mass media will recommend next month will be the cancellation of special privileges for Time and Reader's Digest, and the establishment of a capital loan fund for Canadian publishing enterprises, according to The Last Post.

Time and Reader's Digest are now exempt from an advertising tax levied on foreign publishers.

The Last Post, printed and produced in Montreal by a collective of radical journalists, says it has learned that the two recommendations form a principal part of the committee's still secret report.

The report is scheduled to be released in about a month. Here is what the magazine has to say about the Davey committee report:

"The Davey Committee recommends the cancellation of the special privileges of Time and Reader's Digest in Canada.

"Although Davey has personally been pressing for an immediate cancellation, other committee members have pressured for cancelling the privileges in five years only. It is still uncertain which formula will emerge.

"The committee recommends the setting up of a body which would judge that this or that publishing venture is professionally viable and competently administered, and approve a loan equal to the amount the publishing venture has been able to raise by itself from private interests."

The Last Post, says that while the two recommendations form a principal part of the report, the financial support proposal is the chief one.

A spokesman for the commission said no comment will be made on the last post story at this time.

Laurentian strikers invade Queen's Park

By FRANC STURINO

Two hundred angry students, faculty and Senate members from Laurentian University invaded Queen's Park yesterday to protest against the "dictatorial behaviour which the Laurentian Board of Governors has been manifesting for the past few years."

The purpose of the long march southward according to Victor Cormier, President of the Students Assembly, was to ask Education Minister Davis to employ "indirect mediation" in resolving the present impasse. When asked what he meant by "indirect mediation", Cormier answered that he wanted impartial to study and then force a solution which would be acceptable to both the Board and the student-faculty opposition.

The current polarization which has been brewing for more than a year revolves around four main issues: long-range planning; the appointment of a new president; faculty salary negotiations; and underlying all of these, power structure reform.

With respect to the issue of long-range planning, the students and faculty argue that no rationally formulated long term projects can be drawn up unless they are allowed to participate in the financial decision making of the Board. Although the Board agreed during last April's student strikes to establish joint Senate-Board Committees to engage in long term planning, the Senate's role has been stifled because of the Board's refusal to accept its advice.

What this means on a day to day level is a vast misappropriation of money. The wishes of faculty and special committees go unheeded by the Board. As a consequence, $70,000 were spent on a language laboratory last year without consulting the Language Department which did not even desire an additional lab.

Example two: The building of a student centre which had been due to start this year was scrapped and in its place the Board has decided to opt for an Olympic size swimming pool. Again no consultation was sought.

The second area of conflict concerns the appointment of a new president. Again in response to last April's strikes, the Board agreed to make the selection of a president more representative. A Search Committee composed of Board members, faculty, and students was thus born. The Committee then drew up a compromise procedure by which the president was to be chosen. Feeling threatened even by compromise, the Board refused its passage.

The third area of dispute — faculty salary negotiations, has been converted more to a conflict of principle than finances. The confrontation started when the faculty and the Board were unable to come to a salary agreement. Although the Board had agreed to accept arbitration if negotiations failed — when failure did occur, they renounced their agreement.

In "a Machiavellian tactic designed to con in the faculty," the Board sent out cheques for retroactive pay raises. These pay raises were for the amount which the Board was negotiating — a sum much less than what the Faculty desired. In addition letters setting out the 1970-71 increases were rubber stamped with the President's signature (but without his knowledge) were included with the cheques.

Having agreed to keep the salary negotiations secret, the Board now released confidential information to the mass media. This information was released to the Sudbury Star, whose manager, Manfred Meukes, is also a member of the Executive Committee of the Board. It was also released to CKSO television station which is controlled by Paul Plante, another member of the Executive Committee.

The fourth area of conflict — that of reforming the power-structure is of course at the bottom of the problems already outlined. What the students and faculty demand is that the artificial separation between educational (student-faculty) decisions and financial (Board) decisions be eliminated. For effective co-operation to take place the Board must open up its power over the purse strings to the legitimate claims of the students and faculty.

"The Board must act and it must act quickly," said Tom Manners, one of the marchers, "otherwise the present "informal recess" which was declared by the Senate last Thursday may turn out to be a prolonged student strike."

SMC petitions mayor over City's decision

By LINDA McQUAIG

A petition of 957 names protesting the widening of St. Joseph's St. was presented to Mayor William Dennison yesterday afternoon.

Harvey Fox, SGS, a co-ordinator of the "Do it in the road" committee set up by St. Michael's College, easily collected the names in three hours last night, following City Council's decision last Friday to proceed with the widening plan.

Eight-hundred of the signatures were from U of T students and the remainder from residents of St.

Joseph's, Charles', and St. Mary's Streets.

Although the widening was slated to begin Monday morning, so far no action has taken place, since hydro lines are still being laid.

Fox has also placed deputations before the Works Committee, asking for a crosswalk on St. Joseph's St., regardless of its width.

"If we get a crosswalk instead of a push-button light, we've won," said Fox.

"St. Joseph's St. will be nothing more than a parking lot with motors running," he said.

The "Do it in the Road" Committee is also trying to set up a car pool for U of T students to be used as a model for the city as a whole.

Father Kelly, the principal of St. Mike's, wrote a letter to Dennison Friday asking that the widening be postponed until next spring, in the hopes that an appeal could be made before then. Dennison has not yet replied.

Opposition to the widening plan is growing. U of T president Claude Bissell and his administration, the staff and students of St. Mike's, the Association of Teaching Staff of U of T, and the Student's Administration Council are all rallying behind the cause.

"This is not a protest which has been mounted by a dissident group of long-haired anarchists, as has been implied in City Council," wrote professor Robert O'Driscoll, a St. Mike's faculty member.

Black Students Union to request $20,000 at SAC meeting tonight

By LINDA McQUAIG

The Black Students Union will expose all the corruption and nepotism within SAC bureaucracy unless their request for $20,000 is granted tonight at 7:00.

They made their original request last night at a meeting of the External Affairs Commission of SAC, held at the home of Commissioner, Vince Dolan.

The members of the Black Students Union, wearing black suede shoes and vests, disregarded a "Please remove your shoes" sign on the door of the house, according to Ray Conlogue, a student living with Dolan.

The Commission, which only has $3,500 left in its budget, suggested they come back Wednesday night to the SAC Budget Meeting of the General Council.

"What are you people doing here if you don't help people who are really serious, really trying to do things?" asked a member of the Black Students' Union.

Their budget of $20,000 includes a plan for a $10,000 conference involving four black student representatives from every university in Canada.

"The way the SAC budget is set up it just isn't possible for us to give this amount of money," said Bill Cooper, a member of the Commission.

"Besides, their plans are too vague, and their manner too pushy. They made us feel that if we said no, we were a bunch of racists," he said.

Safarian gets post as new graduate head

A. Edward Safarian, a political economy professor, has been chosen as the new Dean of Graduate Studies at U of T.

Reactions to the new appointee who will replace Acting-Dean, Douglas Baines, next September have ranged from enthusiastic to non-committal.

"I think he's going to be an exceptional administrator," said Political Economy chairman J. Stefan Dupre in a telephone interview last night. "The search committee is to be congratulated for getting a man of his calibre."

Safarian was third choice according to Craig McKie (SGS) a student member on the search committee.

McKie is "quite pleased" about the choice since Safarian is a Canadian. "I didn't hear any negative things about the guy."

The search committee which chose Safarian has been meeting since last spring, under the chairing of U of T president Claude Bissell.

Composition of the search committee varied meeting to meeting. While graduate student representation was fixed at four, faculty membership varied day to day.

"Each time we met there'd be a new person," said McKie. "There were never the same people two times in a row."

After the number of candidates had been shorn down to ten through general discussion in the committee, a group consisting of four faculty, four students and Bissell took preferential vote.

Criteria for the candidates were set down by Bissell — the new dean had to be a recognized scholar in his field, and have experience in dealing with government. Students added the rider that he should be Canadian.

By tradition, the post which in past has rotated among the various faculties should have gone to a science man.

McKie described the search committee proceedings as "pretty boring... with a lot of rhetoric and a lot of not very funny jokes made by senior people."

Safarian, who has been described as a continentalist, is best known for his study of U.S. corporations in Canada.

Radio Varsity: All of us are a little abnormal

No. Sorry. You can't be on the radio.

David R. Cuddy, who has designated himself "Station Master and Omnipotent God" of our own Radio Varsity doesn't want you.

A recent Radio Varsity notice reads: "Anyone interested in doing a 'Morning Man' show from 8 to 10, preferable living on campus, please leave me a note. This is a difficult show for me to fill well. Freaks need not apply."

Dave's difficulty is understandable. All of us are a little abnormal.

Phoney bomb threat causes excitement at chemistry building

By BOB GAUTHIER

A bomb threat was phoned into the Lash Miller Chemistry Building yesterday morning.

U of T security at Lash Miller, told The Varsity that a janitor had received an anonymous phone call (believed to be from a male) at 7:59 a.m. Tuesday. The caller said that a bomb would explode in the building at the beginning of class time.

Fire trucks, arrived shortly after to search the building and no one was allowed in until 9:15 a.m. The fire department left at approximately 10:00 o'clock. No bomb was found.

"The class which has the means of material production at its disposal, has control at the same time over the means of mental production, so that thereby, generally speaking, the ideas of those who lack the means of mental production are subject to it."

"The ruling ideas are nothing more than the ideal expression of the dominant material relationships..."

On our 90th birthday, here's a look at UofT

The University of Toronto has never been an ivory tower. The image of the university as a disinterested and defiant precinct where academic inquiry reigned supreme, just doesn't fit the history of this institution.

Since its inception the University of Toronto has never been independent of the outside world. In fact it has played a major role in supporting the patterns of authority and privilege which have ruled the province.

The purpose of the University of Toronto has always been to inculcate a selected number of the youth of the nation with the appropriate set of values with which to rule the country.

The function of the university has been two-fold: to provide its students with the appropriate training required to perform their future jobs effectively, and secondly, to establish the sense of cohesion and identity of purpose appropriate to members of the province's ruling class.

Essentially, these two functions of the university have changed little since the concept of higher education was introduced in Upper Canada. All that has changed so far have been the forms in which that process of preparation and socialization has taken place.

U of T started out as a church institution — or rather a conglomeration of rival church institutions.

The University of King's College was set up in 1827 by Toronto's Anglican bishop, John Strachan. Although supported by public funds, the institution was run by members of the Tory church of England.

Strachan looked on this first institution of higher learning as a crucial instrument for preserving the Tory character of Upper Canadian civilization. He denounced suggestions that the colony should set up a non-denominational college as "atheistical", "monstrous", and predicted such a move would lead to "greater corruption than anything adopted during the madness of the French Revolution."

In those years each of the competing churches in Upper Canada — the Anglican, the Methodist, the Presbyterian, the Catholic — sought to imprint its particular mark on the civilization of the colony, and, consequently, each ended up setting up its own educational institution. The primary purpose of these institutions was clerical — to train youth to spread the word of God throughout the province, and to provide a focus and symbol for the church's prestige.

But the standing of Bishop Strachan's new educational institution was somewhat shaky

The old Tory establishment of Upper Canada was on its last legs following the rebellion of 1837. A new, secular structure of authority dominated by a new class of small businessmen was emerging to replace the Family Compact.

This was reflected in the decision in 1853 to turn King's College into a state-supported institution without clerical affiliations or orientation. In a huff, Strachan called this new institution a "godless imitation of Babel" and founded Trinity College as a private Anglican institution.

With University College taking in all state support of higher education, the ability of the church institutions to go it on their own waned, and by 1887 they had all become federated with the U of T.

The growth of a capitalist economy in Canada — which had led to the demise of church institutions — was reflected in changes in the curriculum of the university.

By the 1870's U of T was providing students with "an education which should not only cultivate the mind, but fit (the student) for the practical occupations, and help to share in the prizes of life."

In 1873 U of T set up an agricultural college and a school of practical science "for instruction in mining, engineering, and the mechanical and engineering arts."

As the development of capitalism escalated in Canada, U of T saw an increasing need to emphasize the "practical" at the expense of the traditionally "cultural" curriculum. This basic change in the primary values of Canadian society is reflected in this passage from a Royal Commission on the University of Toronto which reported in 1906:

"We have arrived at a critical juncture in the progress of university education. The question presents itself whether the main object shall be... intellectual culture, or the knowledge which qualified directly for gainful pursuits and opens the student's way to the material pursuits of life."

The Report pointed out that "in a new country like Canada, with an era of constructive undertakings before it, with undeveloped wealth in farm, forest, mine and water power" it was essential that the university provide men "with the requisite skill and training" to serve the burgeoning economy.

In its recommendations — which formed the basis for the present University of Toronto Act — the Commission suggested reorganizing U of T on the "business analogy", centralizing administrative authority and making the institution more efficient. Its basic feature is a separation of "academic" and "management and control" functions in governing the university.

Following the introduction of this new structure, the curriculum was expanded to include a department of forestry, a department of mathematics, courses in commerce and finance, and professorships in psychology, chemistry and pathology.

The changes of 1906 represent a landmark in the history of the university.

They reflect a basic change in the demands placed on educational facilities by Canadian society. And it was changes in the structure of Canadian society — particularly the advent of industrialization and the development of natural resources — which altered those demands.

But although the character of the institution changed, its function did not. It remained an instrument designed to service and protect existing social relationships.

The university's relationship to society at large has been viributory rather than cooperative. By society at large, of course, what is meant is a heavily authoritarian and economically differentiated class society. This is reflected in the fact that the "public's" representatives on the university's governing body quite simply do not represent the taxpayers of the province. Rather, they represent the major business enterprises in Canada. Although publicly-supported, U of T is not run by the people of Canada.

Universities still remain elitist and class institutions which are supposed to train the future managers and executives of the capitalist economy.

With this kind of background, it is important to take a close look at the few figures available to measure the characteristics of the present university student population.

No data on this subject have ever been compiled openly by Canadian universities, for an integral part of the university's self-image is to discount any suggestion of its own class nature and to preserve the myth of the scholarly community

In the first place, only a small percentage of Canadians group ever reach university. In Ontario, in the last decade, the percentage of youth in the 18-21 age bracket reaching university has jumped from 8.4 per cent in 1956 to 16.5 per cent in 1968. In the United States in 1968 one out of every three young people that age attended university.

Secondly, the composition of university populations is heavily weighted towards the middle and upper classes income brackets. A 1966 survey showed that less than 28 per cent of university students came from families earning $5,000 or less per year, although more than half the Canadian population falls in this bracket.

In contrast, while only 6.1 per cent of Canadian families earned over $10,000 a year in 1966, more than 25 per cent of university students came from families in this bracket.

In its composition, in its work of research and teaching, and in its preparation of students to fit neatly into Canadian society, the university has always served as a major bulwark of the prevailing social order.

It is necessary to understand this background before we can attempt to change our present institution.

In the last two or three years many basic and fundamental changes have been initiated in the structure of the university. Whether a genuine change in the function of the university will also take place is a real question. It won't happen automatically.

But that's another story.

Fighting Fashionism

"... advertising, product differentiation, artificial obsolescence, model changing, and all the other devices of the sales effort do in fact promote and increase sales, and thus act as indispensable props to the level of income and employment..."

"The prodigious volume of resources absorbed in all these activities does in fact constitute necessary costs of capitalist production. What should be crystal clear is that an economic system in which such costs are socially necessary has long ceased to be a socially necessary economic system."

Paul Baran and Paul Sweezy Monopoly Capital.

Our series on the fashion industry, which ends today, makes two major points:

Our economy, as it presently operates, is based not on an evaluation of real human needs, but on the creation of artificial unnecessary desires among consumers. The industries, in effect, operate for the benefit of the industries themselves, not for the people who support them.

The other theme is the way in which a capitalist economy squanders human resources — in particular through the way women are defined.

In the capitalist economy, a woman is assigned three functions:

- to perform the most mechanical and exhausting tasks required by factories and offices at the lowest possible wages.

- to give physical and material support to a male partner so that he can perform most efficiently in his job function.

- to make the majority of decisions about how the consumer dollar is spent.

Our series tried to show how one of the major jobs of the women's pages of the daily press is to reinforce this pattern of women's activities.

Until now, the fashion industry and fashion writers had been remarkably successful in keeping women in line.

"Every industry tries to emulate the women's fashion industry," says one market researcher, "This is the key to modern marketing."

Also, until recently, the U.S. war industry had been fairly successful in convincing people that it was essential to spend $80 billion every year to keep the armed forces in shape.

The crude patterns of manipulation and mystification which the fashion industry reveals are basic to our way of life.

When women refuse to go along with the latest innovation in the fashion world, they are challenging one of the basic principles of capitalist production, which is that production takes place not for use, but for profit.

One last point.

This series on the fashion industry could never have been published in the bourgeois press.

It makes too many connections.

As It Was in the Beginning

Volume I., Number 1, Page 1, Saturday, October 7, 1880

Controlled as it is by the ruling class of society, this university serves their needs (at the expense of the needs of the people) and as such is an instrument of oppression. What could be more obvious?

Robarts won't be mentioning a few things this afternoon...

Premier John Robarts today opens the $38 million University of Toronto Medical Sciences Building. He will ignore the issues that reveal the doctor and medical training as traitors to their oath of helping their fellow man.

There is a shortage of doctors in this province. This deficiency ensures doctors rich medical practices. The shortage persists despite the government's allocation of $100 million for new schools at McMaster and U of T. Last year the U of T Medical school graduated 168 doctors. The engineering faculty graduated 442. Of course, engineers do not make as much money as doctors.

Despite the deficiency of doctors in the province pre-medical students are made to compete fiercely for the few openings to medical school. This produces a fanatical, sometimes paranoid battle for the A-grade. Only one out of every seven applicants is admitted to first year University of Toronto medicine.

The shortage of doctors thus maintained by the medical schools is in direct conflict with the needs of society where doctors' services are increasingly difficult to obtain.

The doctor shortage has made the hospital a bureaucratic horror house. During the summer I went to the hospital to get a tetanus shot for a nail-pierced finger. My own doctor was out of town. I got into line and waited. In front of me was a middle-aged man dressed in labour jeans with his ten-year-old daughter. She had a cut running diagonally across her face from forehead to chin. I watched as a female secretary humiliated this man in front of his daughter. Form in hand she asked, "Where do you work?". "I'm unemployed."

Meanwhile as I next stepped up to get interrogated as to my occupation, OHSIP number, Hospital Insurance Certificate, age, residence, next of kin, family doctor and religion, a man who had been waiting at the end of the line holding an infant screamed, "Christ! Where's a doctor? My daughter's dying". A doctor appeared and the man was allowed to fill out his form later.

I then went to a nearby room to await my name being called. There I sat and watched an old Indian undergo some sort of attack. I could not determine if it was alcoholism, a drug overdose, asthma or some nervous condition. He was still waiting after I got my injection.

Interns and resident doctors in understaffed hospitals function on minimal sleep and under the constant pressure of life and death medical situations.

The innocent hospital patient is tagged, numbered, uniformed, scheduled for meals, sleep, medication, and visiting hours and then, when the bureaucracy is through with him, he is ignored. The alienation of the patient is complete when the doctor makes his short visit which only reaffirms the patient's doubt and worry. The doctor acts as if the patient's illness was none of the patient's business. It is amazing to note the embarrassment and fear with which most patients attempt to question their doctor. A stay in the hospital is dehumanizing, humiliating, depressing, and frightening.

House calls are becoming medical history and general practise consists of medicine by telephone or by appointment. The sick are made to seek the doctor and join other seekers in a convention centre of infection called a waiting room.

Concerning contemporary social problems the doctor is conservative and apathetic.

At the University of Toronto not a single course in the Health Science curricula deals with drug use and abuse.

Doctors do little to deal with the problem of abortion. The Canadian Criminal Code allows for legal abortion by approval of a three-member hospital board. Yet doctors refuse to make use of these provisions. In Toronto, at the end of July, 12 out of 42 hospitals had committees. These hospitals assign quotas and time schedules when they will perform abortions, as if patients could plan their unplanned pregnancies. Doctors ignore the horrifying reality of back street abortions. Their assistance comes after the fact when they stitch up the damage done or not at all when they perform the autopsy and sign the death certificate.

Who's running SAC?

Does the University Administration run the Students' Administrative Council?

The SAC is bogged down by its bureaucracy. It handles services such as Caps and gowns, efficient reading programs, room allocations loan programme, all of which should be handled through the Administration. For example Simcoe Hall does not want to deal with the numbers of people who want rooms reserved so it has allocated this function to the SAC which demands that these groups prepare a constitution which has to be ratified by the SAC before the SAC will allow these groups and other campus organizations to get rooms.

The SAC has been forced to increase its full-time bureaucracy to deal with administrative problems such as these and as a result council members spend all their time haggling over a budget-50% of which is spent to run the office.

Another case in point is the course unions who also get their money from the SAC to run things such as course counselling programs and course evaluations. The aim of most of political course unions should be to integrate with the departments and get them to provide these services.

The Graduate Students Union has been suffering from the same problems. Simcoe Hall decided to build them a bar at cost of about $125,000.00 (it only holds 40 people). As a result the GSU is bogged down. It spends 95% of its time and manpower discussing the bar. Needless to say student problems are not even being adequately discussed at the council meetings of the GSU, SAC and the course unions.

Are student councils the invisible occupation of the students by the administration?

There is no such thing as

Reason

Crazy? Yes, it is crazy to believe in Reason with a capital R. The above statement was made by Dr. Evan Runner ten years ago in a barn at Unionville, Ontario, to a bunch of Christian students. That there is no such thing as Reason is one of the cornerstones of the scholarly reformation that is beginning in Toronto and is proposed for all of North America.

Every other Saturday morning professors, grads and undergrads travel to Toronto from as far away as Syracuse and Pittsburg to hear Dr. H. Evan Runner shake the foundations of scholarship at his course in philosophical first things. He is developing a comprehensive Christian philosophical vision, and he has proposed the fundamental re-ordering of every part of North American society, including its cancerous university structures.

Dr. Runner has degrees from Wheaton, Westminster, Harvard, and a Ph.D. from the Free University. He knows what he's talking about; and he's talking about a reformation more radical than in the sixteenth century.

Dr. Runner doesn't fool around; if you don't either, come see what's happening.

Business Briefs

By ADAM SMITH

Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd. of Toronto will stop producing picture tubes for black and white television sets at the end of this year.

The decision means that 155 workers at the company's Rexdale production plant will lose their jobs.

A company statement said the decision to close the Rexdale production plant was made "after exhaustive studies of the rapidly declining market for black and white picture tubes."

The company will continue to produce the TV sets however, and will buy tubes from Canadian Westinghouse Co. Ltd.

Canada's level of welfare expenditure in relation to gross national product is well above that of the U.S., and proposals in the Trudeau government's white paper on unemployment insurance will add to the heavy burden already imposed on industry, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce says.

The Chamber opposes the proposal for sickness and maternity benefits as part of an unemployment insurance scheme.

It would be most unfortunate if Canada becomes engaged in the pursuit of the blue ribbon in welfare payments without regard to the country's economic condition, the Chamber says.

Stanley Randall, Ontario's Conservative Trade and Development Minister, has congratulated the Trudeau government for allowing four American-controlled pipeline companies in the U.S.

"I firmly believe that when you have saleable resources and commodities you sell them as possible and as profitably as possible to the guy who has need for them," he said.

"And you should create that need, too," he said.

Randall attacked Canadian economic nationalists for promoting an "anti-American diatribe of vocal diarrhea."

Randall said he was proud to be a "solid, dyed-in-the-wool internationalist."

If Canada runs short of gas because of the sale, Canadians will simply have to explore the North for more, Randall says.

Canadians can no longer assume that such concepts as the right to own property and the right to function in a free competitive market will remain eternally safe, Frank S. Capon, vice-president of DuPont of Canada Ltd., Montreal, says.

Speaking to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, Mr. Capon said civilization can achieve the objective of affluence and leisure for all "only by using private property, capitalist structures and institutions."

Socialism will produce only sharply lower wealth, continued misery for the under-privileged, and in general, economic mediocrity," he said.

Capon said man has not altered his biological make-up in the past 100,000 years and only capitalism satisfies the built-in urges to own what he produces himself.

Scott Foresman and Co. of the U.S. plans to acquire W.J. Gage, a Toronto based publisher of textbooks, for cash.

Gage has a plant in Scarborough, Ontario, which manufactures envelopes, stationery, school and office supplies and textbooks. Net income last year was $463,000 on sales of $15.5 million.

Being A Woman Is Like You're A Store Or S

There are two kinds of women in our society — according to the women's pages in the daily press.

First there is the 'midi-wearing' career girl, and then there is the suburban housewife.

The career girl is supposed to keep up in order to look good on the job and ensnare single men, while the housewife's job is to please her husband and his friends.

There is no mention on the fashion pages of women on welfare, of students, of unmarried mothers or women who support the family.

They all wear clothes, but these latter women can't afford to buy them on a whim or change wardrobes several times a year. For them, clothes are a basic necessity, and they usually buy the minimum amount needed.

There is no place in their lives for 'splurging'. They've probably worn most of their clothes for a few years. New apparel is hand-me-down, home-made or purchased at thrift shops.

Of course the women's fashion pages don't talk about these women. It would be too blatant a contradiction, when they ask us to spend $30 on a new dress, to also point out that most women will never be able to afford that.

When fashion copy does hint at the real world, it does so in an oblique, offhand manner.

"If you are an executive secretary you will have to wear suits and dresses. In a clerical job you might not need to be as well dressed."

This comment, from writer Bev Rosar, doesn't point out the fact that a clerk is just a shift worker, stuck in the back somewhere.

Something

You've got to have the biggest and brightest sign outside

The fashion industry, as we have seen earlier in this series, survives through creating false needs in women consumers. The cost of this has been to build a wall between the mythical world painted in the women's pages of the commercial press and the boredom and frustration of the ordinary housewife and working woman. By creating this gulf between what a woman experiences and what she aspires to, the fashion-mongers reinforce the guilt and sense of powerlessness felt by North American women. By turning women into consumers who will spend in a way which will aid our profit-oriented economy the most and also into creatures whose only goal is to be desirable to men, the fashion-mongers constitute a primary bulwark of the bourgeois social order.

By SUSAN PERLY

household chores. By describing these happy women who shop all day to cook all evening, they make others who are unhappy, and frustrated with their position, feel guilty. Each woman imagines that something is wrong with her — she is weak or neurotic or selfish to want anything more from life. Every day she reads stories in the newspaper about well-organized, well-dressed housewives who get everything done with ease, while keeping up to date in the fashions.

She thinks that perhaps a new outfit is the answer.

She is encouraged to think this by articles advising women that clothes will cheer her up and her family.

"On very hot days you may be tempted to loll around in faded shorts and an old tee-shirt, but with all the pretty summer clothes around, it's easy to give your family and unexpected guests something better to look at," says Betty Stapleton in the Toronto Daily Star (July 2, 1970).

Women are supposed to think: "Oh, so that's why I've been having problems with my family and friends. I'm not attractive in my jeans and tee-shirt." She takes the responsibility for family problems, and sees their resolution in terms of seeing herself as an object.

A nicely-dressed object.

Stapleton continues: "Mini or midi length tunics over co-ordinating trousers are another way to while away the hours in front of your television set."

"Weekends, when you are staying in the city to market, boutique-hop or visit a shopping plaza..."

Women are not portrayed as being involved in positive creative work, or struggling through a difficult life. Such women may be mentioned in "women who made it to the top" series, or patronizing 'welfare women' stories, but these women are not part of the fashion copy.

In other words, women aren't supposed to look at 'real people', seriously, or to emulate their strength. They must see these women as 'freaks' and themselves, trapped in a split-level suburb, as the normal ones. They are the people whom the fashion pages talk about — therefore they must be real. The media creates its own reality. Instead of informing women of the actual lives of other women, it convinces them that the only women who actually exist are those who wear the latest styles. If you wear a midi, people will notice you, they will see how fashionable you are, they will relate it in their heads to the models in the newspapers and to all the exciting things that midi-wearing people are supposed to do. You will be real. You will exist.

Women have to exist through the false illusion of fashion, if there is nothing else in their lives they can grasp, if there is nothing tangible they can point to as a definition of who they are.

If they did not work to develop their own "fashion personality", within the bounds of current styles, they would have to have some other work, some art, some creativity which would be an expression of their philosophy, their politics, their life. But if they spend all day typing invoices or washing clothes and cooking, they become frustrated with time spent on such apparently useless labour, which seems to have no end.

So, they attempt to fill the void in their existence by consuming, among other things, clothes. Days are spent searching out the right dress, shoes, hat, stockings, to go with a coat. They see themselves defined through the clothes and accessories they wear. It is their individual statement.

But, actually, other people define who these women are. Others decide the limits within which they can dress. Others give women satisfaction when they compliment the results of their hard shopping work.

Especially when the others are men. Women are taught as with everything else in their lives, that how they dress must be planned with men in mind.

"And that's what fashion's about: drama, self-flattery the ability to turn heads." (The New York Times Magazine, March 22, 1970)

When designers decided that this was the year of the midi, the loudest protests came from men.

But they were protesting more about the fact that they wouldn't get to see as much skin on women. To men changes in fashion are only relevant in as much as they affect their own ability to peruse women as sexual objects.

They become indignant and self-righteous when they feel someone is depriving them of their 'girlwatching'.

When the midi was first introduced, opposition groups in ten United States formed. In New York there was ICL (International Council of Legmen). In Los Angeles men formed SMACK (Society of Males who Appreciate Cute Knees). Instead of realizing how women are being exploited and oppressed by arbitrary changes in skirt lengths, men feel they are the group being oppressed, when fashion designers take away their pleasures of ogling passing mini-skirted women on the street and in the offices.

They feel that the fashion world does not exist, except to please them, to satisfy their need to see woman as 'the other'. They know that women dress to attract them, flirt with them, keep them interested and to bring them status. But they do not ask why women dress for men.

A woman must attract a man to get dates with him, eventually get engaged to him and, finally, marry him. Once married, she must be attractive at all times to keep him from the 'wiles' of all those pretty secretaries at work. A woman is made to feel insecure if she does not have a boyfriend, but once she has one, she is defined in terms of him alone ("oh, you know her, she's Joe's girlfriend"). Women are taught that there is something wrong with them if they are not married by their early 20s, or at least getting an MA and engaged to be married. And all the time, from teenage years right on through, the most immediate way women have of attracting men is through their appearance. They know that men like sexy clothing: witness the astounding success of the mini.

The mini showed a large expanse of leg for men to examine, whenever women were around. Men spent hours upon hours doing nothing but standing around construction sites or city parks or offices watching the girls go by. And each girl was judged by the brevity of her skirt and the shapeliness of her leg.

Woman, if she hoped to fulfill her dreams of a 'normal' life with a man, had to wear short skirts and compete with sister women. Many women were repulsed by constant whistles and catcalls from cars. At the same time, a lot of women who were insecure secretly enjoyed this degrading behaviour.

"At least it shows I'm attractive and feminine," they said.

And the garment manufacturers were ecstatic. The mini was a glorious success, because it strengthened sexual desires and brought into the open so many sexual repressions of men involved in dull, boring, tiresome, labour. Men who had nothing to do but watch girls and dream of getting laid. As a result, this behaviour gave people the impression that the mini created 'The Liberated Sixties'.

In fact, we remained as repressed as ever and we were being more and more exploited by being shown in our miniskirts along with beer, natural gas, toothpaste, cigarettes, and of course, a man. The mini was providing a great boost to the North American economy at the expense of women.

The newspapers, which are run by men, responded to the introduction of the midi by concentrating on the male reaction.

A United Press International story in the Toronto Star March 14 assured men that there was still hope. It described new midis with buttons up the front or side which could be unbuttoned to the top of the thigh.

"This dual slit fashion is for evening, however, so the street scene will be a little more covered up around the knees come fall. Sorry about that, fellows."

Another wire story (AP) in The Toronto Telegram May 28 consoles men: "Cheer up men! The midi hasn't hidden the leg forever. It just added a little spice to the game of watching.

"Faced by women who want to be chic with long hems and sexy with short ones, the fashion industry has come up with a compromise. The slit skirt.

The brief flash of leg is actually more appealing to some men than the full view."

For the duration of the mini era women were looking at their own legs in terms of how attractive (to men) they were. So they exercised and dieted until they had slim mini-wearing legs.

Mrs. Carthy, a suburban housewife interviewed by The Tely's Marni Grobba, lamented: "Just when women get their legs into good shape, they have to cover them again."

But her lament is resigned to the feeling that a group of mysterious people 'out there' who must know something, have decided that now is the time for a change. She feels no control over these decisions made about her life; she feels helpless against this tide of 'change' and fears being labelled as backward for questioning it.

And besides which, says Mrs. Carthy: "I don't know if my husband would let me wear one."

This is her most immediate problem: if she wanted to buy a midi, she would have to get her husband's approval.

"I wouldn't let my wife wear the midi, said Murray Stearns, a claims examiner in a Star story, July 16, 1970. "I just don't like it. I've changed my wife's entire wardrobe to all minis and it's not going to change."

These women are treated by their husbands as children, who cannot rationally decide what clothes to purchase.

This view of woman as a passive, immature child has been acquired by these men. They are taught that they are the strong aggressive human beings who make the decisions in this world and that women will blindly accept their authority.

The fashion industry encourages this thinking and the oppression of women that results from it. For this industry, like any other in a monopoly capitalist system, depends on those traditional functions of men and women.

As long as women define themselves in terms of men, and see themselves as object who must look pretty to attract and keep men the fashion industry will thrive and profit for them.

And as long as women remain an unpaid labour force at home, at the same time guaranteeing the stability of the nuclear family, the economic system will necessitate their subservient position.

So the fashion-mongers continue to view women as mindless creatures who must be guided (or more correctly, pushed) to the proper decision about fashions. That is, whatever they have decreed to be proper this year.

The fashion writers for the newspapers play an important part in this process, for it is up to them to not only push the fashions at women, but to convince both women and men that woman is inherently passive and wants to be told what to think and wear. They must do this as their part in the fashion-industrial complex.

And members in this complex are quite clear about how they feel about women and fashions.

"Basically, women are afraid to be different. They'll wear what's in, whether they like it or not," says Montreal designer Elvia Gabot.

"Women are insecure and need someone to tell them what to wear," says William Frohman, a Toronto garment manufacturer.

And good old Helen Meyer, of The Canadian Magazine who admitted most women would look terrible in the midi ANYWAY, commented: "Women will wear almost anything, as long as it's new and it's made out to be glamorous and exciting."

while the executive secretary is up front on display, to enhance the position of her boss. It's not that the clerk doesn't have to be well dressed, but that she is so poorly paid, she can't afford to buy a lot of clothes.

The reality of what it's like to be a suburban housewife also creeps through in the fashion copy. But newspapers are not writing about the frustration or the dullness; they are not taking a critical look at these women's roles. The only difference they observe between a housewife and the executive secretary is the kind of occasions for which they have to dress.

In a May 28 story on the front page women's section of The Toronto Telegram Marni Grobba asks:

"Who has time to look fashionable when you have children, a household and a husband to contend with?"

"Well, you would be surprised just how fashion-right the young marrieds of Toronto do look — whether it's a special occasion like a summer outdoor buffet party or just shopping at one of our incredible plazas.

"Unexpected company can be fun if all you have to do is slip into one of these type garments. They can be so appealing that the lock of make-up or a hair-do that is not up to par goes unnoticed."

"For shopping, small dinners at home, any of the many duties that fill their busy days, we choose easy to wear shifts."

The day of a housewife is painted as one of thrill-filled afternoons at the shopping plaza or sitting around the patio waiting for unexpected guests. For many women this schedule is real. However the women's section sees nothing wrong in this kind of life, where a woman spends her days performing routine 2700 free tickets worth $2 each for the Building Show at Exhibition Park are available from the Varsity at 91 St. George St.

The U of T School of Architecture has designed a Labyrinth for the third Building Show, Coliseum Complex, Exhibition Park, October 6-9.

The show is essentially a series of displays by the buildings trades and manufacturers. The sponsors of the show approached the department to present an 'exhibit' embodying its 'theories and principles.' The school agreed with the stipulation that there be 'no strings attached' to the arrangement.

The approach is what is called "support-fill-action". The "support", an outer-shell-structure of metal girders, is designed by the architects. The "fill" are the various object contents of the support-carefully selected by the project participants. The action is simply the inter-reaction of the other two.

The action is the key to the Dept.'s project. An open setting with familiar objects such as T.V., telephones, and newspapers at hand creates the effect of a calculatedly sophisticated 'lounge'. This effect of "action" is further brought about by its geographic location beside the cocktail and dining area.

Thus the effort achieves the desired result of a structure that is a counterpart of the human activity of leisure, and more important, sets it apart from the purely 'trade fair' exhibits of the various manufacturers and building-trade companies.

The exhibit was financed by the Building Show.

Sexual Politics

Millett reveals oppressive system

By DREW HUTCHESON

"We came on furious because we've been infuriated by the media," said Feminist

Kate Millett, author of Sexual Politics

Monday night at a press conference marked by emotional outbursts from male reporters, Miss Millett remained quiet, understanding, and rather mother-like, as she described her part in efforts to make people aware that "the present system is oppressive to everyone, but particularly to women."

She insisted that she is not a leader in women's lib, but says of the press, "they have to have a personality being everything." Time magazine called her "the Mao Tse-tung of Women's Liberation."

She has been involved in the production of a film, has done a study of prostitution, taught a course on the sociology of women at New York's Bryn Mawr College, kept up a heavy schedule of press and television publicity, and is currently writing a new book.

Her study of prostitutes was conducted as a series of taped interviews with prostitutes and their patrons last summer in New York City. "I didn't know it would take the whole damn summer. But it was an involving and enlightening experience. The prostitute is a symbol to keep the rest of us in line." When she read the "prostitution papers" by flashlight in the Bryn Mawr chapel, a capacity audience listened for 2½ hours.

"We kind of broke every rule," she said, "but there is a great deal of humour in it, which is something Women's Lib can probably use."

The new book is about what it's like to be an activist. "I don't know what to call it. It's kind of a shopping bag".

To illustrate how "the talent of so many women is withered" by society, she told of the frustrations of becoming a female scholar. At grad school, "they manage to kill your brain cells one by one". As her English thesis at Columbia she wrote Sexual Politics. "I was afraid to write, and I never wrote a word till I was thirty-four."

She was frightened to the end that the book would be rejected, because "I was writing a book I really wanted to write, and passing it off as a thesis." She said she expected to be told "You're a woman, you're biased".

"I was continually being obliged to satisfy masculine scholarship."

When trying to get a job, she wrote 1100 letters, and received three replies. At one time she was actually hired, then told that a man had been found and she was no longer needed. "They expected me to understand."

For Gertler, Bartok's music is a bridge between the old and the new

By TONY JAHN

Hungarian violinist Andre Gertler is internationally reputed to be one of Bela Bartok's foremost interpreters. A resident of Brussels since 1928, Professor Gertler first met Bartok at age 17. Many years of concertizing with Bartok followed, and Gertler's career to the present day is profoundly influenced by their intimate association.

From 1932 to 1952 the Gertler string quartet toured the international concert circuit to great critical acclaim. His solo concertizing spans over forty years, during which time he has introduced 42 new works for the violin. Recently Gertler recorded Bartok's complete violin music on Supraphon, and was awarded the Grand Prix du Disque. Presently he is teaching in Brussels, Hannover and Weimar and is adjudicating for the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium Competitions. Twenty of his pupils have taken first prizes in international festivals.

I met Andre Gertler in August in Budapest, where he returns each summer to teach at the Bela Bartok Seminar. I questioned him about Bartok's impact on present-day violin playing.

GERTLER: "For me, Bartok's music provided a bridge between the traditional repertoire and contemporary works. His progressive spirit and viewpoint awakened in me a dissatisfaction with classical and romantic music. I find now that interpreting the great masters from his point of view actually approximates the composers' intentions more closely than any of the traditional 'schools' of violin playing."

REVIEW: What in fact was Bartok's approach to performance?

G: "He approached his piano with the same persistent perfectionism and thoroughly analytical attitude as he did life itself. His son Bela, an engineer in Budapest, related an episode which typifies Bartok's insatiable hunger for knowledge. As an engineering student, young Bartok had to share his books and notes with his father, who every night would study engineering with him. When the subjects grew more complex, Bartok persuaded his son to keep teaching him, and the composer acquired considerable technical understanding in this fashion."

"His steely precision and forceful attack at the piano have been mistakenly imitated as harsh noisemaking. In fact, his playing was deceptive in its clarity and has helped to spawn a new trend in musical interpretation."

R: How does this new school compare to older methods of performance?

G: "This is difficult to verbalize. The aural is overwhelming. I recall one winter in the 1920's, two Sunday night recital series of Beethoven's 32 piano sonatas were presented at the same time, at opposite ends of the city, by Bartok and Ernst von Dohnanyi. Anyone who heard Bartok's approach as compared to Dohnanyi's "late-romantic" playing would understand what I mean by "new school".

"Some years back, I was adjudicating a competition in Bucharest with David Oistrakh, and he was asked which school of playing he considered best. He replied: Today there are but two schools, the good one and the bad one. It sounds like a pat answer, but the tendency today is towards meeting composers on their own terms. We shun senseless ornamentation and sentimentality. And always, the struggle for perfect intonation. As the human ear can discern about 60 gradations within a semitone, this seems a hopeless task on the violin, especially with a tool as blunt and insensitive as a linger. But as listen to the recordings of the great masters of the past, our old idols, the results of this drive for cleaner intonation today are inescapable."

R: Does this mean that standards of performance are higher today than, say, 30 years ago?

G: "The quality of playing has greatly improved. The quantity of violinists has sadly diminished, and as one scans the roster of competitors for any international prize, this becomes apparent. The scarcity of young string players is especially striking here in Budapest. Most of the students in my course here are private pupils who came with me from Brussels. Perhaps this dearth of Hungarian students is due to the professional jealousy of domestic teachers. Yet, by attending the Seminar — and it's free, state subsidized for Hungarian citizens, — they could be exposing themselves to a living link to Bela Bartok."

R: Has the musical life of Budapest changed since the time you resided here?

G: "The golden age of music here is gone. I am not merely sentimental when I say that. The musical life of a city cannot be measured by the number of guest conductors who fly in, bang out their two rehearsals and a concert, and move on. It is measured by the resident musicians, the composers who create there and the interpreters who bring their work to life."

"There was a time that you'd walk down Rakoczy Street in the evening and tip your hat to a Bartok, a Kodaly or a Dohnanyi. And even if your conversation consisted of "nice weather, isn't it?", you felt you received something. Their spirit animated a whole generation."

Twenty-five years after Bartok's death, Andre Gertler is still living in that spirit.

Young Toronto playwrights continue Ibsen's revolution

By DIANNE SHULMAN

In 1881, in the beginning of the modern revolution of theatre, Henrik Ibsen's "GHOSTS" shocked established society. Today the revolution continues, but Ibsen is no longer part of it. New plays are being written and new forms evolved.

This weekend I had the opportunity to compare "GHOSTS" with three new plays written this spring by Toronto high school students: the state of the revolution, yesterday and today. Each was written to deal with pressing contemporary issues, but today they are vastly different. "GHOSTS" is a study of the struggle of one family to emerge from the suffocation of Victorian respectability, foulness under the cloak of order. The new plays, "GAMES", by Glenn Ottaway, "ON BEING DEAD AND DIVIDED", by Anne Gutierrez, and "SAND, SEA, AND SAND AGAIN", by Tom Scandiffia, discuss each individual's efforts to deal with loneliness, insanity, boredom and despair.

The Hart House production of "GHOSTS", though technically polished was written for a society now so scorned that the pastor's righteous indignation provokes laughter instead of sympathy, and the strength and tragedy of Mrs. Alving are irretrievably diminished. The three Factory Lab plays, in contrast, suffer from their newness: the inexperience of the young playwrights, and the limited time and money available for rehearsals left many rough corners, but their immediacy is compelling. The fact that they were presented in a workshop setting made them in fact, Living Theatre. Discussions with playwrights, directors and actors after the plays added an entire new dimension to what we had seen. One scene for example, was re-acted several times in response to various suggestions for improvement, and we watched the play grow before our eyes.

One of the plays was a beautifully interwoven soliloquy by a young girl torn between the conflicting pressures of feminism and femininity. Her two choices were reflected in schizophrenic projections of herself as she moved up and down her tiny stage, changing constantly from one to the other. She battled against herself until finally her strength drained away, and as she sank back exhausted and helpless, Mankind appeared and raped her.

The Factory Lab Theatre is located on the top floor of a garage, bare, black, and not quite water-tight. (Next time you go to a theatre like Hart House, appreciate it a little more!) The set was constructed of barbed wire, scraps of foam rubber, two old army cots, and a small dais, variously scattered around the floor. Each person in the audience simply picked up a chair and placed it as they pleased, moving to follow the actors. Costumes were crude and make-up apparently non-existent, and unnecessary. The audience was intermingled with the play.

The production of "GHOSTS" was, as usual, of high quality, though there were minor flaws that detracted from its uniformity. The casting was good, though Carolyn Young, as Regina, was obviously inexperienced, Hugh Webster, as Engstrand, was marvelous; Set, costumes and makeup were accurate and convincing, and were quite effective in molding the identities of each character. Lighting, while somewhat too obvious, changed the mood of the set to fit each scene.

The smoothness of the production, nonetheless, could not redeem the play entirely, just as the roughness of the productions at the Playwright's workshop did them no overwhelming harm.

Love And Maple Syrup: happy show and an answer to Jacques Brel

By SUZANNE ROULEAU

Love and Maple Syrup is an evening of Canadian music and poetry. The script and songs are taken from the works of Leonard Cohen, Joni Mitchell, Stephen Leacock, Gilles Vigneault, and others. Somewhat in the tradition of Jacques Brel is Alive and Well and Living in Paris, it is sometimes serious, even poignant in places, but most of all it is fun. The players just seem to exude joy and pride and love.

The production is slow in starting, almost as if both cast and audience needed time to adopt the mood, to take on the spirit that makes love come to life. At the beginning the timing is wrong, the voices not quite adequate, the arrangements disjointed and haphazard. This improves steadily, but it is not until the second act that the audience can begin to live what it is seeing. Once this is achieved, there is nothing to do but be what they are being, enjoy their fun, marvel at their wonder, cry at their tragedy, all the while knowing that "they" is simply you. Then you have forgotten all the irritating flaws of the unfolding, and the "event" not to define it more closely, is an experience in being a Canadian.

The parts have been very well adapted to individual talents in the cast; thus Miss Peterson (whose acting is definitely not up to par, almost always sings (and her voice is perfect) or plays the guitar, the dramatic monologues are entrusted to Miss Anderson's awesome flexibility, the highlight being the extract from Margaret Laurence's novel The Stone Angel; and the ardour of the French Canadian spirit is admirably translated by M. Dorge. The use of slides and mime to help create a mood is very effective, especially in Circle Game by Joni Mitchell and in Leonard Cohen's The Levels.

Many things could be said of problems and errors, of first night jitters, and many more of resounding successes, but what really matters is "Love and Maple Syrup" as a whole, and it is beautiful. Every Canadian should see it with pride, and love it, for here is a vision which is proud, and shouts itself without inhibition. Canadian's need to shout themselves, now.

Godard skirts chaos again

By BILL MACVICAR

Godard's "her" is Paris, the postwar Paris of dreary apartment blocks with gas stations, not bistros, tucked into their corners, the Paris whose skyline is dominated not by the Eiffel Tower, but by a sweeping construction boom.

In one matchbox flat lives a thirtyish housewife who decides to supplement the paycheck through casual prostitution (shown in some humorous glimpses — she and a friend, their heads covered with airline bags, are paid to pace to and fro, naked, for a Vietnam correspondent from Arkansas). All day she muses on metaphysics, epistemology, semantics (in a dress shop she wonders "What if somebody goofed and called blue 'green'? Wouldn't that be a mess?"). Her small son has similar preoccupations: he dreams of a pair of twins who walk along a narrow cliff and merge into one. "And then I realized," he concludes, "that they were North and South Vietnam."

We begin to suspect, after a few minutes of this, that the film is not about hooker housewives at all, or, in conventional terms, "about" anything but Godard. Incessantly he whispers around the edges of the screen about his verbal, existential, and ideological obsessions, all the while indulging his peculiar cinematic ties: jarring disjointedness of movement; a horror/fascination with brand names, especially soap powders; a hysteroid anti-Americanism; his habit of strewing the screen with the debris of an exploding civilization (here, recurrent phrases of a string quartet).

Most marked among these ties, in its most extreme manifestation to date, is his distancing a la Brecht. The personae are introduced and commented upon as both actors and characters, and sporadically they address inane comments to the audience (I got up at eight a.m. today). The resulting yin and yang start to chase one another round in a lunatic whirl and are prevented from flying off in pieces only by the centric pull of Godard's uncanny aesthetic sense. For instance, he focuses a long, fragmented, distanced scene in a cafe around an obese woman wrestling determinedly with a pinball machine.

Godard is the most capricious of artists, and the film skirts the brink of chaos. The grisly metaphorical conception of Weekend, which gave it momentum, is lacking here, and the overlay of Marxism-Leninism (Peking Style), put to work in La Chinoise, is here otiose. But strip away Godard's fatuous social comment, and there remains an interestingly bred conceit study of the boredom bred of aimlessness and rootlessness, executed in his matchless style.

An on location shot of Goin' Down The Road, voted Canada's best picture for 1970. It won five other awards.

123 enter Canadian Film Awards

By RALPH BENAHAN

Although there were only a few entries from all across Canada, this year's number of entries in the Canadian Film Awards reached an impressive 123 films, 20 more than last year. Of these, only 66 reached the competition stage, though they were screened and preselected by a committee from the Film Production Industry in Canada. Mrs. Collier works for ACTRA (Association of Canadian Television and Radio Artists) and is their representative on the committee which she leads. The ten members of the committee each represent one of the Guilds or Associations involved in film production across the country.

The aims of the Awards are:

a) To stimulate exceptional creative work and encourage higher standards of filmmaking in Canada through the presentation of annual awards.

b) To make Canadian films better known to the public and to make the public's reaction to them better known to the film industry.

The Canadian Film Awards is supported financially by The Association of Motion Picture Producers and Laboratories of Canada, The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, The National Film Board, The Canada Council and The Ontario Council for the Arts.

The first evening show was quite well attended and the crowd was anxious. After a short NFB documentary, the screen came alive with a cineramic view of fat women's buttocks walking, and, the title in fat repulsive letters read "A MATTER OF FAT". Cut to a series of people eating french pastries; the audience is oohing and ahing to the extreme closeups of a chocolate éclair 35 feet by 15 feet. And then the golden, dulcet tones of the only real Canadian came on, quiet and pretentious. It was Lorne Green describing in infinite detail the hardships of fat people in today's society. While he talked we were exposed to a series of pictures of grotesque fat people, closeups of their buttocks once again, immense breasts and drooping waistlines. Lorne was cool, his voice always deadily vibrant with tones inexpressible in words. We were being led to a story.

It was the true-to-life story of a poor fat Montreal businessman who weighed 358 pounds, and with the money he got for making this film he decided to go to a special hospital in Montreal that treats fat people. He fasted for thirty days and stayed in the hospital seven months. We saw shots of him before and after. We saw him swimming with his children, eating a chocolate sundae, and having a jolly laugh. He told us of his sexual problems because of being fat. He related to us intimate details of his life as a fat person. All this was intercut with sequences in plush California resorts where people pay $400.00 a week to lose weight, or a meeting with the Weight Watchers club, presenting an award to a formerly fat, still fat girl. Ninety-nine minutes later the film ended. We did not know it yet but it would win the award for the best film over 30 minutes. It was produced by the National Film Board and directed by William Weintraub.

Next came the short subject Quebec en Silence, a refreshing nine minutes. The photography was magnificent, as was the choice of content. There was no sound throughout the film, which allowed the visual images to speak for themselves. The whole movie was interspersed with paintings of Quebec rural life, adding a kind of intellectual pittance. The real images were shot in black and white, while the paintings were shown in colour, as if the two realities had changed roles for nine short minutes. Highways appeared like cement sculptures. There were shots of people young and old, cars, smog, all leading to a montage, skillfully performed, of all the colour paintings used throughout the film, ending with a colour shot of old people given prayer books by nuns. A truly beautiful film. It was produced by the National Film Board and directed by Giles Gascon.

Q-pec-My-Love was directed by Jean-Pierre Lefebvre as was La Chambre Blanche, presented Thursday night. Though these two films are of two different approaches, subjects and natures, the director joins them as two articulate statements integrally related to one another.

It must be clear to all who have viewed these two features that Q-pec is the earlier work. The technical clumsiness both technical and visual reveal on first appearance a lack of coherence. Where Chambre is apolitical, Q-pec is all political. It deals with the personification of Quebec as a beautiful young girl, employed by Mr. Peter Ottawa. They work at an office, both in the nude, and Mr. Ottawa to our surprise does not reveal any intentions of seducing or violating this young maiden. Before leaving the office, they both help each other dress, always smiling and polite. On the other hand Q-pec is seduced by a delivery boy who becomes her lover temporarily. His name is Quebecois.

Winners

- best feature film: Goin' Down the Road.
- *Best director: Don Shebib for Goin' Down the Road.
- *Best actor: Doug McGrath and Paul Bradley in Goin' Down the Road.
- Best actress: Genevieve Boujold in Act of the Heart.
- *Best screenplay: William Freut in Goin' Down the Road.
- *Best cinematography: Richard Leiterman in Goin' Down the Road.
- *Best film under 30 Minutes: Blake.
- *Best film over 30 minutes: A Matter of Fat.
- *Best animated film: Psychocratie.
- *Best experimental film: The Legend.

When the relationship collapses, Quebecois obtains a plastic replica of a girl and the last we see of him he is making love to her as if she were a real woman. Then in comes Sam Washington who only humiliates her by his fascination for war toys and his lack of sexual interest in her. One scene depicts him playing with his toys while Q-pec lies naked before him. She finally conceives Sam Washington's child which turns out to be a bomb. Throughout this film one feels that Lefebvre has been greatly influenced by Godard. So much so that scenes appear for several moments as purely Godardish, black screen with whispering soundtrack, direct monologues with the characters facing the audience, sloganizing until one is blue in the face. In the last and most effective soliloquy by Q-pec, she says "you don't understand, they don't understand yet you are the responsible. I have a cancer and you have a colour TV and a brand new car. Death is the only moral, die for something, someone, some deed I may be dead by the end of this shot." The movie ends with a static shot of snow falling in a peaceful valley.

We are left depressed, anxious, maybe a little angry at the potency of this personification, but nonetheless we are touched by its sharp edge. We are bitter from the truth and yet helpless.

It is the latter work of Lefebvre that hits home hardest, that pries emotion from logic and logic from reason only to discover the absurdity of life. The musical introduction sets the mood for this realist's approach to the world. Like the last shot of Q-pec, La Chambre Blanche begins with a snow scene. Then, as if the creation of space were totally a visual concept, Lefebvre juggles man and woman about the sides and top of the screen, finally establishing in a dual essence the creation of space. The walls are white; Adam and Eve are created, Je, tu, vous. The man scribbles on a blackboard, "je suis etre un humain." He is reaffirmed. The girl sits quietly before a table smelling flowers and bottles of perfumes. She finds a connection between the two. She is reaffirmed. Next comes survival of the species. Adam, holding a live rabbit, beats it with a stick, as a harsh bongo drum beats in the background. The rabbit hangs dead. Eve removes the fur, and rubs her face in it.

The shots are all long, which slows the pace of the film. Time passes and we feel it. We move to shots of men in automobile factories, grandmothers before their Christmas trees, wrapping and addressing Christmas gifts. She becomes the country. He is the city. They talk to each other each in his own environment. A sequence occurs in which children play snowballs and the soundtrack is that of machinegunfire and bombs. He is saying "Je meurs partout Anne". She is saying "Il y a sur les branches des oiseaux invisibles."

The film ends with him giving her the name Anne and she giving him the name Jean.

Caro's Clearing now on exhibit at the David Mirvish Gallery

By STEPHEN LONG

A recent sculpture of Anthony Caro's, CLEARING, has arrived at the David Mirvish Gallery, and will be on exhibit until about November seventh.

Ever since the summer of 1966, Anthony Caro has been producing metal sculptures incorporating in one way or another, a dominant horizontal plane, or "table". This has been interpreted as Caro's distinctive way of further defining exactly sculpture's relation to the ground and space it resides in; that is, excepting a few pieces, most of his works negotiate the groundline intimately.

To borrow Modernist terms, for sculpture to firmly assert itself as sculpture, it must reassess and re-define the precepts of the three dimensional object on the ground in space which demands to be judged aesthetically. Since sculpture, and indeed all aspects of the visual arts have had to reflect degrees of the abstract in their formal presentation relative to their contemporaries in other media, Caro's work of the last ten years has been almost purely abstract in form (that is to say there are no nodal associations in his work). He has always questioned a sculpture's kinship to the ground by either imitating it or somehow relying on it heavily. CLEARING is an example of Caro's tremendous flexibility in exploring this essential nature of sculpture, or "sculpture's nature", in order "to entrench itself more firmly in its area of competence", as Clement Greenberg says.

The best way to approach CLEARING is to walk around it. The side facing the gallery is very pictorial, or flat, and there is a tendency to view CLEARING on a two dimensional plane. But this is its great strength. By appearing at first to be vaguely two dimensional, (in much the same way paint surface is two dimensional in a painting) or insisting upon being initially viewed this way, the third dimension is "presented" in much the same way as paint is in painting, and the vague second dimension is only a veil acting as a juxtaposition to the many varieties of the third.

As stated, the first view one gets of CLEARING is seemingly flat. Primarily this is affected by the farthest upright of the table. Caro has made it wider than the one in front of it, so the two uprights are seen as the same size, and parallel to each other. In other words, he has inverted a natural law of perspective i.e. telephone poles look smaller as they approach the horizon. But while it challenges perspective, it at the same time reasserts it. Whereas the slimmer upright in front of the wider one has been attached close to the end of the table, the wider, more distant one has been fastened further away from its respective corner. The result is a steep foreshortening, and the body of the sculpture is thought to be much shallower than it really is.

The nature and problem of perspective is therefore brought to our attention by exaggerating it in this way (just as the "problem" of perspective is evident in, for example, furniture in Mediaeval illumination). But obviously perspective is not a "problem" of sculpture, but is the "nature" of it, and Caro is underlining it, making CLEARING'S elements, one could say, somewhat didactic in their awareness of perspective.

Foreshortening of perspective also is closely related to the other great circular, arching and linear components of CLEARING. Again, from only one angle, the wider upright mentioned by equating it with the foremost elements, Caro centralizes it and gives it a pivoting quality, and as the great circle that is included to the left of CLEARING'S centre enters the table's perimeter, it meets a parallel arc, which the eye senses is a trigger to set the whole combination of abstract elements "under the table" in motion around this central axis of Caro's wide "upright"; the table being independent enough to allow such a circular illusion. But indeed, perspective is the main subject of the flanking view of the work. Even the grid reestablishes the truth of perspective (it is a second groundline), after undergoing Caro's manipulating "under the table", rather like the Early Renaissance perspective experiments. Caro, hence, is definitely asserting the boundaries of a sculpture; that there is a kind of vacuum around every self-sufficient sculpture. In this sense CLEARING is very didactic, a very insistent vehicle through which Caro is presenting this concept, a monument for Modernism as it now stands.

But I must reconcile the large segment of a circle attached to the table's underside, for it certainly suggests motion, or area "above and beyond" the boundaries set down by its support. Since it is cyclical, its motion beyond the table-limit is not great. Instead, it is interesting to view this particular part of the work from its southeast end; at this angle, both the great circle mentioned earlier and this arc appear to dangle, from the table's underside, dependent on it. Indeed this dangling motion is further augmented by the circular element already mentioned. This circle on the floor speeding through and away from the rectangular area implied by the table and its uprights, pushes against the fourth upright, and the "box" (table), is transformed into a parallelogram shape, or a great bent rectangle, "caught" in motion.

Also, compare how the Stella in the same room at the gallery resembles the manner in which Caro's arcs dissect each other in CLEARING.

Arts festival planned for U of T

By RITA BODE

A festival of the arts is being planned for the U of T campus.

Called RENAISSANCE 71, it hopes to offer young Canadian artists a chance to display their work, gaining them recognition, and an opportunity to compare and contrast their work with their fellow artists.

Alex Mercer, executive producer and mastermind of the festival says "Education is to refine one's sensitivities and broadens one's response to life. Art is in a unique position and a central one as far as the achievement of this goal is concerned. At a time when 'the human race must live together or perish', something more than the refinement of reasonging ability is needed."

She hopes the festival, which is open to anyone in a post-secondary institution in Canada, will begin to create some of these conditions.

Scheduled to take place at the U of T campus and surrounding area in February, RENAISSANCE 71 will be the first annual, nationwide university arts festival.

The U of T administration is supporting the festival. In a letter to the organizers, President Bissell said: "Student interest in artistic creation can provide force for cohesiveness within the university community that is deeply needed."

The festival is not a competition. It's purpose is not to compare but to emphasize and direct attention to the post-secondary artistic scene in Canada. Only films will have a material prize, because the cost of making them is much greater than the other arts.

Entries will have to be selected because of time and space. Mrs. Mercer says they will show as many entries as they can. The organizers are not interested in competitive struggles, but rather want to bring to the public's attention the very best examples of work in Canadian universities.

Some of Canada's leading professional figures in the arts have given the festival their support including Louis Applebaum, Dennis Burton, Hugh Garner and Boris Brodt.

Each entrant will receive a critique from a panel of three adjudicators, whether their work takes part in the festival or not. Selected works will be seen by a nation-wide audience. All forms of media - radio, television, theatre, publishing, music - will be represented at it.

Mrs. Mercer says she hopes the festival will become an annual event. To make this possible means a great deal of work has to be done, and she is looking for people willing to function as business and technical managers, also those willing to work in publicity, fund raising, p.r. and other type jobs. Contact her if you are interested.

Blues go west and drop a 2-0 game to Western

The Soccer Blues put together an impressive defensive game with strong mid-field control against Western yesterday afternoon, but stalled dramatically in their opponent's goal area, and suffered their first defeat of the season 2-0 at London.

The first half started with Western in command, but the Blues quickly recovered and threatened several times.

It was Western who scored first however, at the 16 minute mark, with a knife-like thrust down the right wing and into the net, off the foot of their outside right.

Blues pressed again and in the closing minutes of the first half looked ready to tie it up.

Ken Cancellera worked his way into the 20 yard area and blasted the ball just wide off a pass from Mario Darosa.

At the 30 minute mark, Western's mammoth winger Vivian Manswell received an off-side pass and raced towards Blues keeper Tony Bowker, crossing it head high to his forward who slammed it into the net.

The goal was bitterly contested by coach Bob Nicol, but to no avail.

This took the wind out of the Blues attack, and the match ended without serious threats from either side.

Impressive efforts were obtained from captain John Cobby, halfback Bruno Bruni, who marked Manswell effectively all game, and Ed Carter, a rookie who has shown steady toughness and resourcefulness in the past two games.

Coach Nicol has good material to build on for next Wednesday's game against McMaster, a must game.

PhysEd wins 29-0 over SMC

By PAUL RAPHAEL

What, in the past, has been known as the wars on the back campus, did not occur yesterday. Instead, Phys Ed and St. Mikes had a football game which was won by Phys Ed 29-0.

The lack of penalties (only 40 yards assessed in the game, all against Phys Ed) might possibly have been the result of the decision to have four officials on the field during first division games instead of the usual three.

The game itself was mainly a defensive battle. The Phys Ed defence intercepted four passes, including one returned for a touch-down, and recovered a fumble.

The offence scored two touchdowns following interceptions and kicked two field goals, one following an interception and the other after a short punt.

The other points came from a kick-off conceded for a single, two converts and a two-point conversion. The latter occurred on the last play of the game.

Outstanding on offence for Phys Ed were QB Kent Duncan, who was 9 for 15 in passing, and tight-end Ross Kleiberg. For St. Mikes, John Hasson was predominate on defence with his consistent rush on the QB and by blocking a field goal attempt.

NOTES: The two converts attempted by Phys Ed sailed into the middle of Hoskins Ave. On the final occasion, an individual ran into the midst of traffic, snatched the ball, and fled toward Devonshire House. I am sure the return of the ball to the Hart House Intramural Office would be appreciated.

PhysEd despite big turnover

By STAN KOROLNEK
FIRST DIVISION

(1) — Although they have had a big turnover in personnel, PhysEd still looks like the team to beat for it all. This squad is loaded with Varsity Blues' cuts that will make more than adequate replacements for the players they have lost.

(2) — Like PhysEd, Vic has lost many players from last year. However, Vic has always had the tradition of winning and it is unlikely that this tradition will be lost for the 1970 edition of the "Scarlet and Gold."

(3) — Coached by the very able Paul Rocks, the Engineers could upset a few teams before this season is very old. Coach Rocks had more than 50 players out for the first few practices and could mold a strong contender.

(4) — St. Mike's are an unknown quantity who are just unfortunate to be in this tough division. They may have trouble winning more than one game — if that!

SECOND DIVISION

(1) — Dentistry easily won this division last year and should repeat again.

(2) — The loss of impressive Hal Quinn should not hurt Scarborough too much. If you are a long-shot better than this could

Editor's Note - The 77th interfaculty grid season is under way once again. This season, as has been the case since 1894, it promises to be bigger and better than the year before. Today, the Varsity Sports Department's crack team of interfac football writers, Stan Korolnek and Paul Raphael, give you the product of their exhaustive training camp research.

(2) — The loss of impressive Hal Quinn should not hurt Scarborough too much. If you are a long-shot better then this could be your team.

(3) — Basketball is UC's sport. Their football team is rather unlikely to impress anyone but their own cheerleaders.

(4) — Medicine is another unknown quantity but has upset possibilities.

THIRD DIVISION

(1) — The Forestry lumberjacks should lead this division easily. The green-shirts are greatly strengthened by additions from Lakehead University who are just huge.

(2) — New College looks sharp in uniform — but will they look as good on the field!

(3) — Pharmacy is unlikely to do much in this division.

(4) — Trinity — are they still in the league!

Small turnout hurts Vic

By PAUL RAPHAEL
FIRST DIVISION

(1) — Phys Ed's practices emphasized fierce body contact. If this was typical of the way they intend to play, they should win their division.

(2) — Vic lost the Mulock Cup for the first time in 13 years. Since winners attract people to their midst and losers do not, Vic has not had its usual large turnout of prospective players. The result is a team with little depth at most positions.

(3) — Engineering appears intent upon improving on its poor showing of last year. If they can convert their determination into points, they could finish higher.

(4) — St. Mike's seems to have had a thin turnout. As a result, many players may have to play both ways. In a game dominated by physical exertion, the team may be worn out by the second half.

SECOND DIVISION

(1) — Meds, with the return of some seniors from the hospital, — where they were on duty, not recovering from injuries — and the passing arms of their quarterbacks, should score a lot of points.

(2) — Dentistry won their division last year. This season, however, they started practising later than most of the other teams. This lack of conditioning must hurt their chances.

(3) — UC exudes enthusiasm. From being considered the worst team in the league they have improved the most in terms of confidence and personnel. The turnout has been so good that they could possibly finish as high as first.

(4) — Scarborough, whose record was only just better than UC's last year, has not improved to the same extent.

THIRD DIVISION

(1) — Forestry won this division last season and have strengthened their team even more. They have had a good turnout. After all is considered, how can a team with a fullback over 200 lbs. lose?

(2) — New College may be second only because of their secrecy. Players were forbidden to speak to anyone. Carrying this cloak and dagger strategy to the extreme, the New team will be seen wearing grass-green uniforms — so that they may be better camouflaged!

(3) — Trinity has a strong nucleus back from last year. Although they began practising later than the other team, they may pass New in the standings.

(4) — Pharmacy is a truly unknown quantity. Much of the team is composed of rookies.

CONSENSUS — Phys Ed should win its second successive Cup.

Injuries strike Blues

Lyndon Little
VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

Back in early September, when the various sports hacks who cover the Canadian college football scene came to prepare their assessment of the 1970 edition of the VARSITY Blues they invariably listed "depth" as the team's main strength.

Why, they raved, Toronto has potential stars waiting four deep at every position. Even McGill coach Tom Mooney got into the act claiming that Blues had 100 prospects at their rookie camp alone!

Whether or not this depth really exists will likely be revealed in the next four weeks as Blues face the unhappy prospect of going without the services of three of their top stars.

PYRRHIC VICTORY?

All Blues football fans found immense satisfaction in Varsity's victory over the Gaels on Saturday. However, just how exacting a price was paid for that triumph wasn't fully revealed until earlier this week.

One loss that was readily discernable to every fan at Saturday's game was the shoulder injury suffered by Blues' little signal-caller Vic Albino. Vic was forced to leave the game late in the fourth quarter as he was hurt in the process of scoring Blues' clinching major.

It was a staggering loss.

This was the year that Vic had put it all together. The poise and confidence he had displayed in guiding Blues to four straight victories was almost uncanny.

The last-minute scoring passes against McGill and the daring third-down plays against Queen's speak for themselves.

After medical checks earlier in the week it also became known that starting guard Gord Whitaker and star center Rich Agro had sustained serious knee injuries.

Fortunately, there is a more than adequate replacement for Whitaker in Derek Turner the five-year veteran who was one of Blues' nine SIFL all-stars last year.

It is replacing Albino and Agro that Blues' depth will get its greatest test.

CONFIDENCE IN DUNKLEY

Both the players and coaches have expressed great confidence that sophomore quarterback Wayne Dunkley will be able to step in and keep Blues' attack in high gear.

Last season, as a highly-touted rookie from Monarch Park, Wayne did not start any games but played important roles in many of them.

In the crucial home game against McGill last year Dunkley came on to replace an injured Albino with 10 minutes remaining and directed the winning touchdown drive.

As for the vital center position, the task of filling the cleats of the aggressive, truculent Agro will likely fall to rookie Tom Robertson a 6-foot, 200-lb. former Cedarbrae Collegiate star.

Their first test will come this Friday night in Waterloo when Blues meet Walt Delahey's winless Warriors.

We have word from the inter-collegiate office that 250 tickets to the Waterloo game Friday night are available at the Hart House ticket office at a cost of $1.00 a head. Game time is 8:00 p.m. . . . College football has become so popular out west that CBC Radio has signed a contract to broadcast the games. . . . While we're on the subject of the WCIAA, the defending College Bowl champs, the Manitoba Bisons, have just successfully completed a brutal road trip that saw them whip the UBC Thunderbirds in Vancouver last Thursday night 46-2 and then down the Calgary Dinosaurs 21-6 on their way back Saturday afternoon. . . . Sir George Williams U in Montreal who play in the eastern section of the Central Canada Conference won their very first game of their three-year existence last Saturday when they dumped RMC 29-2.

Varsity golfers compete

Bob Kennedy, George Scott, Jeff Gollish, Kevin Hughes and Frank Crean will represent Varsity in the OQAA golf championships to be held at Western U tomorrow and Friday.

Kennedy and Scott tied for top spot in the qualifying rounds which were held at the Cherry Downs Golf Club last Tuesday with a 36-hole score of 156.

Gollish was third with 157 and Hughes fourth at 158.

Crean nailed down the final spot by taking a playoff on the third extra hole from Blues' hockey star John Wright. Both players had finished regulation play deadlocked for fifth place with 159.

Waterloo is the defending champions of the Rutan Cup emblematic of the OQAA title.

Pollution is uncontrolled excessive and unnecessary waste on all levels. It exists as inadequate housing which wastes energy in heating costs and repairs, but mainly human energy in health, dignity and sanity. It exists as the production of automobiles, as fashion objects rather than the meaningful and universally accessible transportation service that it could be. (G.M. wastes 600 million on style changes and 300 million on advertising each year.). It exists in the form of foods that are processed until they completely lack nourishment and are literally wasted before they are eaten. It exists as military efforts forced into situations where there cannot be a military solution (the situation, of course, is the situation of the whole world. e.g. there are no "military solutions" to human problems. Militarism itself is The Problem. Force is The Problem. Forcing, re-enforcing and maintaining systems and methods that do not work is The Problem.)

● Pollution is realizing that we could have 100 times more and better housing at the same prices we are paying for the concentration camps that people are now desperate enough to actually pay to live in (called apartments).

● Pollution is realizing that the ideas of Buckminster Fuller aren't being used to help change the situation.

● Pollution is thinking that the insights, realizations and discoveries of Fuller belong to him and not to you! We, The People!!

"From now on all the marvels of science and the gains of culture belong to the earth as a whole, and never again will man's brain and human genius be used for oppression and exploitation . . . We will perform this titanic historic feat, for in us lie dormant the great forces of revolution, renaissance, and renovation." (adapted, without apologies, from V.I. Lenin).

● Pollution is a Telephone monopoly that makes millions in profit yet has the numbing gall to ask for increased rates.

● Pollution is Pollution is Pollution is Pollution.

● Pollution is the irrelevance and obscene pretention of this university and particularly the injustice and unrepresentative nature of the Board of Governors.

● Pollution is having to pay tuition for an educational experience that those without the ability to pay need most of all.

● Pollution is man allowing himself to create literally, the mindless cruelty of Hell on Earth in the form of the ovens of Dachau, and Belsen the holocausts of Geurniea, Dresden, Hiroshima, Nagasaki and Pearl Harbour.

● Pollution is Napalm, tear gas and Radio-active Contamination.

● Pollution is being more worried about L.S.D. and grass more than about H-Bombs and Pollution.

● Pollution is Coke, Pepsi and beer bottles, thin cans, snap tabs, non-returnable bottles and most of the stuff in them.

● Pollution is not the Cat with Impossible Paws.

Why do half of us go to bed hungry?

Over one half the people on our planet go to bed hungry every night. Why?

"The world is hungry because we can't grow enough food to feed all the people." This is what TV analysts, government officials, businessmen and college professors tell us. They predict mass starvation within ten years, killing hundreds of millions of people.

They may be right about the famines. It's hard to say there are not famines right now when up to five million children, starve to death in a year, and when 650 million of the world's billion children won't reach adulthood.

But are they right about why these people starve? Has mankind swelled so much that there isn't enough food to go around?

To look at the pictures in the news or listen to the experts and officials, you'd think underdeveloped countries are hungry because they are overflowing with people.

You see miles of tightly clumped shanties, filled with gaunt, desperate people surrounding the cities of Brazil. Ask the slum dwellers of Brazil where they came from, however. Many talk of the vast empty countryside. They came because they had lost their land.

A few big landowners and some American investors control most of the good land. As these interests develop their property, trying to harvest profits from the soil, they evict the peasants who have always lived on the land.

And these families have no where else to go but to the city. And the slums continue to swell.

In America and Canada too we find ourselves packed even more tightly. Like the peasants of Brazil, more and more of us are compressed onto less and less of the land. Seventy per cent of the people live on less than 1% of the land in America.

The office-building skyscrapers rising in American cities across the country symbolize the fact that more and more people are being crammed onto less of the land. And every year tens of thousands of small farmers are economically forced off the land and flock to the cities.

The squeezing together of people is happening in many places. But the plain fact is there are a lot fewer people for a lot more land in most of the underdeveloped countries. Population density in Africa and Latin America is far below that of the countries in Europe.

Only a few of the Third World countries have high densities, India, Pakistan, Ceylon, the Dominican Republic and one or two others. But none exceed 450 per mile.

And yet Holland, with a population density of 972 per mile is not termed overpopulated. While countries as Venezuela with only 27 per mile have a "population" problem.

Virtually all the nations of Latin America are on this list and most of Africa (the black states) and Asian countries like India, Indonesia and Syria.

In other words, the poor nations and people of the world, are the ones said to have population problems. Experts see hungry people in thinly settled countries and tell us "If bellies are empty over there then there is too much population."

Does this kind of reasoning trouble you? It should, especially if you've ever been hungry, out of money and standing in the middle of a supermarket. Because that is a much more accurate description of the plight of the hungry.

America itself is the perfect example to prove this. In 1968, the Citizens Board of Inquiry into Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States discovered that there are over 30 million hungry people in the U.S.

They found that 10 million are not just hungry but are on the brink of starvation.

They saw starving children in the fields of Mississippi and in the slums of New York.

The U.S. is also the world's richest nation. It worries about growing too much food. In 1968 the government paid big-time farmers and agribusiness $4 billion to take 35 million acres of good soil out of production. Otherwise the bumper crops from this land would have glutted the world market and made prices fall.

Why does the government limit production in a world of hungry people even when some of them live in their own country? Said a top official in the Department of Agriculture (as quoted in Hunger USA), "It is true that there may be a greater need for food in some countries but not necessarily a market for such food."

Translation: In America food is grown for profit not to feed people.

What does this mean in human terms? It means for one thing, that places like Stanislaus County in California smack dab in the lush farmland in the world, can become an official "Hunger Disaster Area." That's what happened in December 1969 when thousands of unemployed people in the area did not have money to buy food from the fertile lands of their own country.

And this is exactly the same situation faced by hungry countries around the world.

According to the 1969 report of the UN's Food and Agriculture Organization, food surpluses — not shortages — are the looming problem in the near future. In the underdeveloped countries, their report points out, food production supposedly outpaced population growth in the last few years. Experts are starting to worry that too much food may accumulate.

People are hungry while the government in wheat-glutted Canada will plant no crop in 1970 and farmers who have grown it by starving to death and have to watch it rot because the government doesn't want to lose profits.

And American farmers are plowing under thousands of tons of potatoes to raise the world market price; while as much grain sits around the world as was exported in all 1969.

It should be clear that "overpopulation" is not the real cause of hunger. Does this surprise you? Let's take it a little farther.

Remember the list of "overpopulated" countries, a list composed of hungry people on four continents?

There are several countries that would have been on that list 25 years ago but aren't now. They are China, Cuba, North Vietnam and North Korea. Over a fifth of the world's people live in these nations. All have had a socialist revolution in the last 25 years.

Hunger is a "Free World" phenomenon.

What does this tell us about overpopulation and hunger? We can learn much from an interesting comparison: China, Brazil and the United States are more or less equal in size. China has 700 million people, the United States 200 million and Brazil has 90 million.

If lots of people means overpopulation and if overpopulation means starvation, then China should be incomparably worse than the other two.

But instead Brazil has 40 million hungry people, America has 30 million and China has virtually none.

A closer look at Brazil will show why so many people of the "Free World" are hungry. Brazil has, according to Latin American scholar John Gerassi, "More arable land than all of Europe."

But most of this land is controlled by wealthy corporations from America, and other wealthy western nations.

What do these landowners grow on these enormous plantations? Coffee!

Brazil's largest export is coffee. There is no food value in coffee, but there's a lot of profit in it. Unfortunately, the profit all goes to a handful of big landlords.

The same is true for the rest of the Third World. While landless people starve, the immense plantations and foreign-owned estates occupy the most fertile land and produce only one or two cash-crops for export.

All this tells us why there is hunger in a world with so much food.

It tells us that most production in the "Free World" is seen from a capitalist standpoint; "it's supposed to make profits for the farmers. If you can't afford it then you can't have it."

That's why in America, with 30 million underfed and in Canada with outport fishermen and farmers in Saskatchewan starving, the government holds down harvest to keep prices high.

Overpopulation is a hoax. Hunger in these "Free World" countries is not due to the limits of Nature. The people are poor and hungry because too often the resources of their land are gobbled up for the benefit of a wealthy few.

Their hunger is not a matter of too many people. It is a matter of too much theft.

"... if the contemplation of misery, physical suffering, and death does not lead to mysticism or evasion, the natural alternative is a scrutiny of the causes for the horrors of existence: a writer who is essentially a materialist will seek for a materialist explanation."

Pop Popu Popula - opulation Explosion?

BY JOEL HAGGLUND

The main cause of pollution is that there are too many people around. And if we let population double before the turn of the next century — as it is

FOR ONE THING, THERE'S TOO
MANY OF YOU

AND YOU'RE MAKING TOO
MANY MORE

likely to — it will get worse.

At least that's what supporters of an international organization called Zero Population Growth say.

They warn that the only long range solution is to reach a situation where the birth and death rates will balance each other off.

The ZPG button, which sells for 50 cents, carries the message "Make love, not babies."

No family, they say, should have more than two children. Tax laws should discourage large families and birth control and abortions should be available free of charge.

"Population is doubling every 35 years in Canada," ZPG-ers predict, "and we're seeing its ugly by-products in the form of air and water pollution, noise, clogged highways, overcrowding everywhere, shortage of hospitals and schools, soaring unemployment, increasing taxes, tension and widespread misery and discontent with society."

In short, ZPG contends that convincing people to have fewer offspring can guarantee us a liveable and stable environment.

The great guru and godfather of Zero Population Growth is a Stanford University professor by the name of Paul Ehrlich.

He sets forth his arguments in a runaway best-selling paperback, The Population Bomb.

The book abounds in highly dramatic and emotional tableaux picturing the peoples of the Third World gazing greedily at America's food resources, waiting for the opportunity to pounce on us and get their share.

Ehrlich's injunctions to control our own population are based on the philosophy of protecting what "we" have from the teeming, restless millions of "them" who threaten to engulf the world.

"We are going to have to adopt some very tough foreign policy positions," writes Ehrlich, and limiting our own population will let us do that from "a psychologically strong position."

"We must use our political power to push other countries into programs which combine agricultural development and population control."

Ehrlich's kind of blackmail extends to suggestions also that "We may have to announce we will no longer ship food to countries unwilling or unable to bring their population increases under control."

Ehrlich also alludes to the possibility of enforcing mass sterilization by doctoring food and water supplies.

Why this emphasis on cutting back on the numbers of people on this planet?

And why the hysterical phraseology of "race to oblivion," and "the population bomb keeps ticking"?

Well, the Rockefeller Foundation has one answer about why it is necessary to limit population in the Third World particularly in Latin America.

"The restlessness produced in a rapidly growing population is magnified by the preponderance of youth," wrote the authors of Prospect for America, a Rockefeller publication.

"In a completely youthful population, impatience to realize rising expectations is likely to be pronounced."

Such rising expectations could of course create difficulties for the far-flung Rockefeller empire which dominates the economies of many Latin American nations.

"Extreme nationalism has often been the result," says Prospect for America. What could be more threatening to the American Empire?

The Rockefellers have always stood squarely behind population control. In the fall of 1952 John D. Rockefeller himself spearheaded the founding of The Population Council — together with other representatives of U.S. big business.

The control of population is also a major concern of the World Bank, headed by Robert McNamara. Lyndon Johnson's former secretary of defence, The New York Times lauded his appreciation of the need for population control.

Just as McNamara concentrated on the cataclysmal — while at the Department of Defence, so at the World Bank he has chosen to make the population explosion, another cataclysmal problem, his central long-range preoccupation.

"For if populations are allowed to double every twenty years, as they do in low-income countries it will wipe out the effect of development and lead to chaos."

It should not be surprising to find the major supporters of the world-wide American Empire concerned about controlling population. To them it represents an investment in the preservation of the current world social order and distribution of wealth.

Supporters of Zero Population Growth correctly point to a number of crises in world population growth. They correctly describe the world the way it presently exists.

What they fail to do is to make a careful analysis of the structure of the world economy and of the possibilities of restoring the resources of the world to the service of the world's people.

Where does all the crap come from?

MAN HAS BEEN AROUND LONG ENOUGH — a million years or so and nature engineered us very carefully so we wouldn't interfere with the balance of life which supports all living things.

But things have been ruffled a little in the last century. Why? One would be a fool to say any one thing is the major cause of pollutions. Ecology is a matter of balance.

The rivers and lakes we drink from are vast open sewers and all the chemicals pesticides detergents and oils dumped into them wind up in the ocean which gets filthier every year.

Over 450,000,000 tons of garbage accumulate every year, trashing useful land and costing millions of dollars and much of the garbage is impossible to get rid of.

Every day in every city around the world, thick black smoke belches from the sordid gray smoke stacks of industry whistling the tune of death to the man on the street.

What do we do about it?

Who are the polluters?

POLLUTION has become the most revered issues of our time. But all too often the common man is pressured by government, industry (in many cases), and environmental control groups to bear the pangs of guilt for the filth of land and air.

We're sick of it.

Air pollution has many causes.

Most officials play up the role of the automobiles. Do you feel guilty about driving a car downtown?

We all agree that automobiles contribute heavily to air pollution in terms of sheer tonnage of pollutants released. Officials can't make up their minds about how much though. Estimates vary widely from less than 25% to over 50% of the total.

More important are the amounts of toxic chemicals that escape into the atmosphere.

Alcohol and arsenic are both poisons but it takes a lot more booze than arsenic to do you in and the same principle is true for the air we breathe.

Over 80% of auto exhaust aside from carbon dioxide and water vapour, is carbon monoxide a colorless, odorless, tasteless gas. It's bad stuff but the human body happens to have a good tolerance of it. Carbon monoxide is the booze of the air pollution; over a long period of time it might do harm.

But as long as people are made to think cars are the culprit, they can be fooled into thinking that cutting down auto exhaust will really make the air fit to breathe.

And this leads people to think air pollution is their own fault.

But let's follow it through and admit that cars are one of the serious polluters.

And let's also admit that we're the ones that feel we have to buy one and drive it.

But consider this:

FACT: The auto industry has always led efforts to block mass transit programs and push highway systems through the cities. Fifty percent of the space in American cities is consumed by cars and their needs.

FACT: General Motors' products net the company over $1.7 billion in clear profit every year. But they also account for 35% of the air pollution tonnage in the U.S.

Yet G.M. spends less than $40 million a year (equivalent to 2% of its profits) on cleaner engine research, as compared to $600 million for style changes, and $300 million for advertising (together equivalent to over 50% of their annual profits).

Moreover, auto companies buy up and suppress patents and designs that could lead to cleaner transportation (such as the Lear steam car bought by G.M. a year ago and quietly subverted).

FACT: The American auto industry designs its cars to last about three years. As a result over a million cars are junked every year in Canada creating a tremendous disposal and dumping problem the cost of which is borne by you and me.

To top it off they tell us that air pollution is our fault because we drive the cars so we should foot the bill of cleaning up the mess.

The auto pollutes — yes — but not the driver, the machine. Which means that the corporation that built these machines used the profits they got from us to make sure we'd have no other way of getting around, and spent all that money to sell us more and poorer quality cars — THEY POLLUTE.

Moreover it is difficult to even get an accurate picture of how much garbage filters through the air in Toronto since government agencies charged with the responsibility of policing polluters do not make their information public.

On to a few more bits of information.

"Ecologists are nothing more than communists who are trying to constitute a threat to economic expansion in Canada." — a spokesman for the mining industry in Canada.

In the past year major corporations in the country including giants like Kaiser Resources, a subsidiary of Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation of the U.S., MacMillan Bloedel, British Columbia Forest Products, Northwood Holdings and a host of lesser companies made their reaction quite clear as to the question of who should pay for the mess.

Some of their responses:

"We're doing all that needs to be done."

"Our expansion at all costs is essential to the growth and stability of Canada."

"Our little bit doesn't matter."

"If you continue to push us we will either leave the community or go broke."

Anyone who expects an attack of conscious self-realization to sweep through the ruling classes and thus save us before too soon, is nothing but an idealist.

In British Columbia the Society for Pollution and Environmental Control recently involved itself in an attack of the forest industry, both the single most mainstay of the B.C. economy and also the industry chiefly guilty of environmental devastation.

They arranged for a public hearing into waste disposal in the industry which was contaminating the air lakes and rivers, and the B.C. Forst Council of Forests immediately took it upon themselves to turn the hearing into a public relations forum.

Among other things, a poster depicting the atrocities of MacMillan Bloedel, B.C.'s largest industry, and famed forest raper, was publicly distributed, and the group naively approached the Vancouver Sun and the Province to print their accusations.

The group was told by the press: "Anti-pollution is all right but not anti-pollution against MacMillan Bloedel."

Both The Sun and The Province are owned by Pacific Press which operates with a hard hand in the dealings of MacMillan.

MacMillan Bloedel had profits amounting to over $40 million last year.

"Wacky" Bennet, famed chief of the political "mafia" operating out of B.C. lamented:

"SPEC after all shouldn't attack the company because it's the province's largest industry. He proceeded to deal with the federal government for a subsidy which would bring Bloedel to rights.

Dow Chemical, producer of Napalm, which stirred up the most liberal of liberals a few years back when it was being dropped on the fields of North Vietnam by the American military, also produces innumerable pesticides used on our croplands which have been proven to be harmful to humans because of their DDT content. Not to mention the reservoirs of mercury that stand around the Sarnia plant and are later flushed into the Great Lakes System.

Ivan Hillier, process operator for Dow in Sarnia last year informed his local MPP that men in the plant were not sufficiently protected from the poisonous substance.

"In the areas where mercury is used in the plant, mercury condensation is all over the place. It forms on the windows, the ledges and is allowed to lie around on the ground."

He says that Dow "appears" to be forewarned when government agencies come in to take samples of the lakes and rivers in the area.

Earlier this year commercial fishing was banned in Lake Erie and St. Clair River because of mercury contaminated fish.

Who suffered. Not Dow, but the fishermen who were told by the Ontario Department of Lands and Forests which licenses their operations that any fish caught would be seized and the fishermen would not be paid for their catch.

Government officials have been warned constantly that the mercury contamination prevalent in Lake Erie is spreading through the rest of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

Yet each year an estimated 200,000 pounds of mercury compounds are dumped into the nation's waterways.

On August 7, 1000 gallons of di nitro ortho secondary butyl phenol (DINOSEM common name) was dumped into the Port Hope Ont. harbour as a result of an accident involving Canadian National Railways which was freighting the substance for Dow Chemical (U.S.A.). The chemicals were being shipped from Michigan to Maine through Canada.

Taken orally, the chemical is fatal to human beings and in smaller quantities is harmful to small animal life and all plant life

On the same day the United States government had begun loading a "death" train full of highly toxic nerve gas, to be transported across the country in the same manner and ditched into the Atlantic Ocean between Miami and the Bahamas.

And there's the case of residents in Dunnville Ont. suffering ill effects from the flouride poison vomited from the stacks of the Electric Reduction Co.

government and it recommended ERCO compensate the farmers whose cattle had died but gave the company a clean bill of health otherwise.

ERCO is a chief producer of phosphates which are a common substance found in commercial dish detergents. Following public pressure, a phosphate ban was stamped on companies producing detergents containing phosphates by the government. However all other industries producing the material for other reasons such as ERCO, which produces it for military use, were exempted.

And a DDT ban enforced by the government exempts all tobacco growers, and upon application to the provincial government, farmers can be exempted from the use of pesticides containing it.

In the Maritimes copper and zinc from mill tailings have caused great concern for migratory fish populations in Newfoundland's Exploits River, already heavily affected by pulp mill wastes from K C Irving's giant conglomerates.

Part of the Miramichi River in New Brunswick has been ravaged and is no longer able to produce rearing grounds for young salmon because it contains fractions of parts per million of copper and zinc.

And in Prince Edward Island many trout streams have been blanketed with silt from road building or soil erosion. This fills in natural hiding places for fish, spoils their spawning grounds and drastically reduces production of fish food organisms.

PEOPLE POLLUTE! What a familiar saying by now. First we're told there are too many of us and that pollution is because there are too many people.

Did we kill Lake Erie, rape the forests of B.C., dump wastes into the Atlantic Ocean killing fish the means of survival for countless outport fishermen, fuck up the air and command bulldozers and cement trucks to pave thousands of acres of land last year?

Do people really Pollute. If you think so, stop driving a car, phone your MPP, ride a bike, etc. If you don't, what are you going to do to what?

America is a have-not nation. After years of waste and misuse corporations have used up many of our vital raw materials. Since the 1940's American companies have grabbed large holdings in more and more Third World countries to get these resources, the fuel of their runaway production.

And the outcome? American corporations and the powerful men who own and control them have reaped staggering profits.

Many Americans have lots of stuff but it's hard to say whether their lives are any easier or happier. Many others are still poor and hungry. And we've all been left with the mess.

So far, most of the people demonstrating against the mess and talking about ecology have been college students, suburban housewives, doctors, engineers, lawyers — by and large, middle class people.

Their complaints are legitimate. But there are many people in America and the rest of the world who suffer more from pollution and the system which causes it.

In America, they are black, brown and white working people, who are squeezed into cities and crowded together. They are the people with the worst jobs, the ones that leave men deaf. They are exposed to the most concentrated poison, the kind that rot away lungs.

They are the ones who have to live around industrial parks. You don't find factories in nice suburban neighborhoods.

They are less likely to have cars and take long trips. A few extra National Parks don't mean much to them.

They are the people that population control advocates were talking about at the American Association for the Advancement of Science in December 1968. These scientists recommended that urban planners build future cities more compact and narrow, so that the sheer psychological pressure of overcrowding would force people to have fewer kids.

It's the same story in rural areas. The poorest people, the ones that do the real labor are the ones who have to stoop over fields covered with poisonous chemical dusts. In California, growers have been known to spray fields while workers were in them.

It doesn't end there. The ecological pricy which has exhausted America extends beyond the American border. All over the world, people in underdeveloped countries are seeing their own natural resources dug up, cut down and pumped away.

The signs on the plant gates bear names like Standard Oil, Anaconda or United Fruit. The people know that they will never see a penny of the profits from these mines, plantations and factories. The big American companies divide their take with the rich overlords who control the land.

This is called imperialism. Imperialism lets American companies get cheaply from other countries what they have used up and need at home, it lets them convert these countries into captive markets for over-priced American goods, it lets them get away with moving factories overseas and paying dirt-cheap wages to desperate workers who have no other choice.

What big American companies do dirty at home they do dirtier in Brazil or Indonesia, or Ghana. In these places no officials will bug them about sooty smokestacks, oil slicks, dangerous pesticides or unhealthy working conditions.

In Peru, American mining corporations pay Indians up to $1 a day to mine copper in the Andes mountains. Here is one description of these mines. There are about 100,000 Indians employed in the big sierra mines where conditions (minerals lie at up to 17,000 feet above sea level) and poisonous fumes make a man thirty-five look sixty — if he has survived that long in the first place. Many companies . . . distribute coca (which produces cocaine) to the Indians before they go to work.

When they enter the pits they are unconscious of the dangers, hardships and the internal pains from the fumes (J. Gerasst, The Great Fear in Latin America, p. 129).

In Brazil most of the good land is controlled by American companies like United Fruit, Standard Fruit, W.P. Grace Co., and the Bank of America. These companies grow non-food cash crops like coffee, in a country which should be one of the richest producers of food in the world, and instead is one of the poorest.

They grow their crops on huge jungle plantations, on sensitive but fertile soils. George Borgstom, in his book The Hungry Planet, tells what happens to the farmland in the section called "Coffee on the March" (p. 329).

The almost predatory exploitations by the coffee planters have ruined a considerable portion of Brazil's soil. In many areas these abandoned coffee lands are so ruined that they can hardly ever be restored to crop production . . .

Therefore, the coffee plantations have always been on the march, grabbing new land and leaving behind impoverished soils. This march of the coffee plantations over the wide expanses of Brazil has been likened to a devastating giant wave. In some of these early coffee regions the abandoned soil is so crisscrossed by ravines and gullies that it almost resembles a lunar landscape.

Should Brazil be called "Brazil the Overpopulated"? Or should it be called "Brazil the Raped"? It is no coincidence that American corporations dominate the economy of many of the world's poorest and hungriest countries.

Peru, Brazil, Canada — the list could go on and on. It could include South Africa where black-men are paid slave wages to build Ford cars.

Or Liberia whose rubber plantations yield Firestone average net profits three times as great as the entire Liberian national revenue.

Or the Dominican Republic, scene of American military intervention in 1965, where American companies own the best plantation land on the island, make big profits from sugar crops, and pay hungry Dominicans about a dollar a day.

And of course the list would have to include Vietnam.

The American government and the American corporations are running the Vietnam war. The corporations build the war machine that the government directs. And polluting Vietnam is one of their basic tactics. They attack the people and destroy the ecology of their country.

The poisons they have sprayed to kill trees and destroy crops stays in the soil. Much of this soil is permanently destroyed and generations must pass before the soil can be farmed again.

In other places bamboo weeds grow in after the original plants are killed. So tough and stubborn are the bamboo plants that it is almost impossible to get rid of it once it has taken over the land.

American planes have also sprayed herbicides over 100,000 acres of mangroves which line Vietnam's estuaries. Estuaries are coastline bays and inlets where fresh water mixes with salt and where in Vietnam, shoreline mangroves provide breeding grounds that yield premium harvests of fish and shell fish. The Vietnamese have always depended on their estuaries for much of their protein supply.

One of the substances in the herbicides bombarded into the soils of Vietnam has been found to be 10,000 times more harmful than thalidomide and already there are reports filtering back of deformed and stillborn Vietnamese babies.

What does the ecological destruction of Vietnam have to do with the ecological destruction of America?

The same government that tells us about its concern for American environment, poisons the environment of Vietnam. The same corporations that pollute America and call it "pollution control" make products to pollute Vietnam and call it "saving Vietnam from the communists".

Saving Vietnam from the communists can be translated as saving the Vietnamese from Vietnam even if it means destroying the whole country and the people themselves.

When you get right down to it we really have much in common with the Vietnamese. The companies that run America make profits off both of us. And both of us are victims of their ecological crimes.

The fight against ecological disaster cannot succeed if it does not recognize the common obstacle to the solution of all these problems. In America the wealth from this system will use every weapon at its kind to preserve it. Once we understand these things it will be clear that there is only one way to deal with our ecology problem.

ATTACK THE PROBLEM AT ITS SOURCE

"SCIENCE GOT US INTO THIS MESS and science will get us out. Technology can cure the problems of technology."

Unfortunately, America, depending on technology to pull her out of the hole, is like a high-preserved, over-anxious businessman expecting a few TUMS to cure his ulcers after smoking and drinking coffee all day, and gulping down big dinners of extra-spicy, artificially flavored preservative-laden food. You can't tack a solution onto a problem and expect it to work if you don't deal with the cause of the problem.

Besides, you just can't say that technology is the cause of the problem. Someone controls that technology and uses it for specific purposes. If you don't consider those things, then "pollution control" won't even get off the ground. Basic laws of nature see to that.

One of the fundamental principles of science is that disorder tends to increase. In other words, making a mess is much easier than cleaning one up.

Oil spills are one example. The massive drilling rigs out in the water symbolize the complicated ingenious technology that had been developed to bring oil up from under hundreds of feet of rock.

But when that technology breaks down and makes a big spill the only way to clean the oil up off the beaches is with straw.

And when the oil companies try to use more sophisticated methods to break up the oil — by dropping detergents on it — they end up doing greater harm. People may be convinced that things are better because the messy goo is no longer visible, but detergents are even more poisonous to sea life.

Another basic principle of science makes the problem a little sharper; matter cannot be destroyed only transformed. There are three states of matter, and we suffer from three types of pollution: too much garbage (solid) water pollution (liquid) and air pollution (gas). When we try to deal with one we tend to make the others worse.

Take garbage for example. If you try to burn it you've got air pollution. So you develop special incinerators that cut down air pollution but then you have filthy filters and residues—more solids. If you dump that stuff into the water — water pollution.

It's the same story with dirty water. With advanced methods, water can be considerably changed, but one by-product is tons of sludge (solid). Getting rid of sludge brings in all the problems of garbage control.

The only possible solution includes something called re-cycling. This means finding ways to use waste products over again. The metal, plastic paper components of garbage for example, could be separated and re-used. The rest of the rubbish could be converted to compost which is nothing more than natural fertilizer.

But recycling requires total economic planning. Under capitalism, big companies sell millions of dollars worth of chemical fertilizer, and they will fight any program which sees city and state governments putting organic fertilizer on the market. In this country total economic planning for the best overall results is not possible.

Science can do Anything

The same goes for water and air pollution. Most by-products which could be re-cycled are already being produced very profitably by other companies. American corporations make more money digging additional resources out of the ground than recycling them. They're not about to sacrifice these profits just because recycling makes better ecological sense.

To make matters worse, many new products are made to be super-disposable. As a result they are harder to re-cycle.

Plastic beer cans for example have been developed to replace metal ones. But the only way to get rid of these after you've used them is to burn them — and then you end up BREATHING BEER CANS.

Behind all these difficulties is the sheer problem of energy. Most of our electrical power is generated by plants that burn coal or oil. This is why places like Richard Hearn Generating station are always the worst polluters. The air pollution is very visible so they talk up atomic generating plants.

Atomic plants, however, also pollute. They need immense amounts of water to cool the reactors, and this water, when discharged back into the rivers, is very hot and this causes what is something called thermal pollution. Hot water changes the balance of life and kills off many fish; rivers and lakes lose their ability to clean themselves and become much more polluted.

So atomic generating plants merely replace air pollution with water pollution. Technology takes us out of the frying pan and into the fire.

This leads to the most basic problems of all in America, as things are now, certain kinds of pollution are totally unpreventable.

As long as the American economy turns out immense quantities of missiles, cars, steel skyscrapers, spaceships and pointless appliances, then there must be an immense amount of combustion to produce and run these things. As far as we know now only combustion technology — the burning of fuel (mostly coal, oil) — can provide the tremendous concentrated energy needed.

But combustion consumes oxygen and releases staggering amounts of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere. The CO₂ is building up, especially as more and more plant life, (which converts CO₂ back to oxygen) is destroyed. All this CO₂ in the air is beginning to cause something known as the "greenhouse" effect: the light rays from the sun can get in, but when they reach the earth and turn into heat waves, the heat waves can't get out.

This tends to heat up the lower levels of the atmosphere. Nobody really knows what this is going to do, but most scientists are positive that it will do something bad.

What it really comes down to and what you rarely hear about, is that on the whole anti-pollution devices can only slow down the rate at which things are getting worse. Being poisoned a little more slowly is hardly a cure.

Fighting pollution with gadgets is like treating cancer by lopping off the most obvious tumors. While expensive devices can make a few processes less harmful, every year more factories send their stacks into the sky and run their culverts into the river. Bulldozers clear off hundreds of square miles of farmland to be paved over, and strip mines gouge immense scars across the country to get ores that feed insatiable smelters.

Countless forests are hacked away to make more and more paper. Leaky oil wells are drilled in more dangerous places. And freeways expand over the land. The skies get grayer, the rivers brownier, more people get sick, and life becomes more dreary for those without the means to escape.

It's not that the world is dying — it's being killed. The murder can be prevented. But technology won't cure pollution because the real cause of pollution is a lot more than just technology.

REMEMBER THE BOMB?

Big Daddy of pollution. Mother of us all. Back in the late fifties and early sixties people used to protest the fact that the warlords had means to destroy humanity. They tried to show their rage as best they could. But Bertrand Russel is dead, Dr. Strangelove has prevailed. And the Bomb is forgotten. Why? A no-testing treaty was concocted by the warlords to mollify the people by the appearance of rationality.

But in fact the bombs remain in their cradles, more menacing than ever; yet through political illusion the outcry stopped. A conspiracy? Yes, indeed.

HOW THE SYSTEM WORKS

The men who rule today's world live in the past. A past that has conditioned them to only one perspective — self interest. The world of the present baffles them completely, they think it mad, and thus ignore it. The Business Mind, the main component of The Power, can only think in terms of this year's profit, only in terms of its specialized

The successors of these people will be others created in their own image. Those who see the present and future danger try to point it out to The Power. But their result is only frustration. Years pass. There is no action. People accept their impotence, and forget that the problem could have been avoided. The population has thus been given a lesson by The Power, and, accordingly, keep quiet in the future. Already we have lost the ability to get angry.

Yet The Power, farmers who realize that contented cows give more milk, does pass a few token measures to create the impression that the problem has indeed been solved, whereas it has only been covered up, or, at best, de-accelerated without major inconvenience to The Machine.

ECHOES OF ECOLOGY

The question of ecology threatens The Power greatly, for intrinsic in the concept is the total re-evaluation of the system . . . dynamite beneath the economic foundations of the West. The Power reiterates that since The Machine was the greatest thing since Genesis, therefore its results can only be good.

Assuming The Power is not overthrown, what follows is a projection into the future of pollution based on our knowledge of how our system works. First the problem is identified; this stage was reached a few years ago with scientific thought that suggested the world would not live to 2000 A.D. Then public discussion brings the matter into the spotlight. The Power soon comes to realize that some action should be taken to remove the matter from public attention, to defuse it — for although they might not understand it, their sense of self preservation tells them that it provokes subversion.

Laws are passed to reduce visible signs of pollution. The matter becomes an issue for every hack politician. Business plays its part by advertising new products which aren't as bad as the stuff they were selling before. The technocracy shows off its ingenuity by producing gadgets to reduce pollution (gadgets which, by the way, could have been supplied years previously). Soon the populace is reassured. They are in good hands with The Power. The matter is forgotten.

But what happens is that pollution is not truly confronted; the ghastly end is only postponed. Homo Sapiens is extremely adaptable, Darwin's process of evolution continues, the people become accustomed to the small nuisances, think them to have been inevitable.

Perhaps an early sign of biological breakdown will be a compulsive, uncontrollable twitching as the nervous system disintegrates. The senses will be dulled, becoming inactive. Ears and eyes disappear, some form of mechanical radar replacing them. A filtration system grows onto the throat, greatly altering human posture. The air is so coarse that the skin reacts to it, growing scales of a rough texture. Then a day dawns when there are no men. A world of monsters.

the Price of Progress”*

Pollution as Big Business . . .

By Anne Boody

It is now vividly clear that we don't know what we are doing in the environment and it would appear that it responds negatively to a lack of care in general and violence, ignorance and greed in particular. It may therefore be a useful tentative assumption that if we get more interested in Human, rather than economic-industrial-military-legal priorities, that we will have a chance. Otherwise, the Game is over. Everybody lost.

Brazil, which has a smaller population than the USA or China while having approximately the same area, has more starvation than both. It is controlled by a tiny capitalistic elite who want to grow coffee which you drink so much of. The "official" explanation for starvation in Brazil is that it is overpopulated!!!

There is virtually no starvation in China. —bro. jon

"THERE'S CASH IN ALL TRASH."

That's how the business publication, Forbes Magazine, put it recently regarding the rising business of pollution.

Both government and industry are leading the fight against environmental pollution in 1970.

"While the government of Ontario has actively pursued pollution control, we recognize that our efforts must be supported by public opinion and that any new or expanded program must have public backing," Charles MacNaughton, the Treasurer of Ontario and Minister of Economics said recently.

And industry has quickly engaged itself in the fight against pollution — or so they claim because pollution has become a profit bonanza.

But can businessmen work for the best interests of all of us?

The federal government assumes so, but then most of the top positions are held by leading businessmen and corporation lawyers.

In January 1970 an edition of the Los Angeles Times carried a short article which demonstrates how a businessman's government responds to the problem of pollution.

It pointed out that after a Santa Barbara oil drilling disaster which resulted with hundreds of miles of California coastline slicked with oil, President Nixon, and Walter Hickel, Secretary of the Interior, appointed a special panel to decide whether or not drilling by Union Oil should be continued in the area.

The panel's decision was to allow Union Oil and other companies to resume drilling on the coast.

Coincidentally five of the eleven panel members were executives of Union Oil or its partners.

And it pointed out that most of the other panel members had dealings with large oil industries.

Many industries are taking a cosmetic approach to pollution. It's not unusual to hear of companies mixing steam with the black smoke that belches out of their smokestacks.

"If you can't see it then it is not there", they say.

Oil companies buy slick ads showing how their "special additive" gasolines make car exhaust so clean that a balloon can be filled with exhaust and remain nearly transparent.

A better test would be to stick an oil company executive in the balloon with the exhaust for a few minutes or blast the exhaust through a company board room while executives are in a meeting discussing how to cover up their pollution.

Not only does industry cover up their sins but they try to profit from them.

In January, Coca-Cola purchased Aqua-Chem, a leading manufacturer of water treatment systems and desalination equipment.

"The acquisition will permit Coca-Cola to enter the mainstream environmental systems," declared a spokesman for the company.

Perhaps the executives at Coke have seen the handwriting on the wall and realize their livelihood depends on having clean water to make brown.

But whatever their motives, the marriage of Aqua-Chem and Coca-Cola is just one of a rash of similar developments where pollution has become one of the hottest growth industries in the 70's.

For example, Research Cottrell, Inc., the largest of the companies devoted entirely to environmental systems, has quadrupled its sales in the last five years.

In the pollution control industry as a whole, the average annual growth rate for the next five years is expected to jump to better than 20% which is almost three times that of most manufacturing groups.

But most important to note is the integration of polluters and controllers. In the United States about two dozen pollution control companies are subsidiaries of divisions of the largest corporations and polluters in the U.S.

Represented among this latter group are Dow Chemical Co., Monsanto Chemical, W.R. Grace, Dupont, Union Carbide, General Electric, Westinghouse, Universal Oil Products and Honeywell.

Although these giants currently pull in less profits in sales from pollution control than do smaller firms like Research-Cottrell, their superior access to capital, resources, markets, management skills and political power will invariably be translated into a superior competitive position as the ecology movement flows and the control of the industry grows.

As Universal Oil Products put it: "We're all against pollution. We'd better be. The impact of polluted air and water on man and his environment is growing more severe all the time. We need more and better action now . . ."

"Universal Oil Products offers practical ways to cope with this acknowledged menace and UOP Air Correction is a leader in offering source testing service . . . economically."

"On the research and development horizon there is no end in sight. Wherever you are, whoever you are, UOP has a piece of action in YOUR life."

Quantum Science Corporation, a subsidiary of Samson Associates recently published results of a sur-

Pollution bonanza for ution brings anza profits r business

vey on pollution as business.

The survey said:

"The growing public awareness of pollution problems, and increasing Government air pollution control legislation will produce great investment interest."

Recently the Chemical and Biological Divisions of the American Ordnance Association, an organization of weapons contractors, held a two day meeting on "Environmental Pollution."

A rambling sample of nametags included the Pentagon, Army Munitions Command, Air Force Rocky Mountain arsenal (nerve gas headquarters), Fort Detrick (germ warfare headquarters), Dow Chemical, Honeywell, Union Carbide and a host of other conglomerates.

Corporate representatives attended to look into the possibilities of getting federal grants or contracts in the anti-pollution field.

A representative from Aerospace & Armaments Industry put it all too clearly:

"Ninety to ninety-five per cent of our industry is armaments. However, like any aggressive company, we're always looking for new fields to expand in. We're looking for contracting opportunities in the environmental field both because of the money and we think of course that it's a good thing."

Another corporate spokesman from Adgewood Arsenal in the U.S. quoted a line from Kipling:

"When it comes to slaughter, do your work in the water."

The Army must be more concerned about polluting water than they were in Kipling's day, he added. "Today's highly toxic warfare materials cannot be washed away by mere water; more sophisticated methods are required."

One distraught executive explained: "The public is not willing to pay a nickel to control a particular company's pollution."

Another chimed in that it didn't really matter whether or not the public was willing to pay for the control of pollution

"They'll have to either with higher taxes or steeper prices"

After riot control, pollution control is another area in which North American Rockwell, builder of Apollo and one of the country's biggest defense contractors, expects to make "important social contributions as well as profits," according to Robert T. Chambers, chairman of Envirotech, which is NAR's new pollution abatement subsidiary.

Though the stock exchanges have been suffering with drooping prices in the last few months, many highs have been marked by many companies who have jumped on the pollution bandwagon

Dorothy Fels, a consultant working in Pittsburg, estimates air pollution equipment is selling at $200 million annually and the market for water pollution equipment has jumped to twice that.

While many companies have established themselves in the field, hardly a day goes by without another company announcing their plans to invest in the business of pollution clean-up

But as Fortune Magazine admits: "American business since it organizes and channels a high proportion of the total action of this society, is still deeply implicated in deprecations against the environment"

It is not technology per se, but the way technology is employed (its organization and channeling) that creates the problem.

Is there any rationality to this? There is. But it is a private rationality. The essence of the private property system is that social technology and production are privately or corporately organized and channeled through the market

Thus in launching his new product, Henry Ford had only private costs to reckon (i.e. labor, materials, etc.) The individual customer who bought the car had only to reckon his personal preferences vs the purchase price

The question of who would pay for roads, or organizing traffic flow and of reconstructing cities was taken care of by Ford, the rubber company, the glass industry, the concrete industry and related interests getting together and twisting the arm of government

Our interests cannot be represented as long as wealthy people or people with powerful backers are put into office: when the press is controlled by the same men.

It's very rare that a black, an indian, or white working people or seewives get to become mayors, city supervisors — or pollution control officials.

In 1969 American corporations spent an estimated billion dollars on pollution control, while amassing after-tax profits of over $66 billion. They spent only 1.5% of their profits cleaning up their mess

Not only do we pick up the bill for their messes but the expenses of government anti-pollution programs also falls on our shoulders.

In other words, corporations want us to pay for their pollution, while making big profits out of pollution themselves. Pollution control is becoming Big Business.

They want to have their cake and eat it too!

The Supplement

This is the second in a series of supplements The Varsity will be producing this year. Though many people might not have realized it, the Monopoly Game issue was our first.

We've been having problems though! That is, people just don't know about us. Most everyone walking into 91 St. George either climbs to the second floor offices which house the grand old Varsity staff or fumbles through the main floor offices looking for The Review.

We've had very few searching us out and that's essentially because nobody knows about us.

The idea of the Supplement is to look in depth at various controversial issues concerning ourselves and our society in the 1970's.

Out of necessity, The Varsity News staff is tied mainly to hard news writing and features when space allows. Though because of a tight budget and the threat of a $7,000 chop by SAC, little of this muckracking analytical type of reporting has been able to hit the pages.

That's what the Supplement is for. It offers a chance for interpretive, digging and reporting on themes.

But we also hope to get away from the media of linear print. Hence the monopoly game. Though again because of tight finances and this threat looming overhead that more money will be swallowed by SAC, we have not had many resources to fool around with.

If you're already writing for the News or Review staff of The Varsity don't hesitate to express an interest in us. Hopefully we will be able to integrate the staffs in all three departments.

And if you're on campus and have ideas, we're on the main floor at 91 St. George.

Our next issue will be dealing with the question of "The Politics of the Family". Within this issue we will link the growing militancy among women in Canada and the States and around the world, the upsurge of a radically left homosexual organization in the States which is emerging in Canada — The Gay Liberation Movement, etc. Why the emergence of such groups? What are the forces dominating families, why the breakdown in the nuclear family? These are questions we will attempt to answer.

For those interested in working on this issue in particular, a meeting will be held at 1 p.m. on Tuesday Oct. 13 in the offices at 91 St. George.

The Varsity — Bob Weiler

Yesterday the pollution index in Toronto soared to 57, the highest level ever recorded. In this photo of downtown Toronto, you can see on Eaton's smokestack surrounded in the foreground by Eaton's properties. To the right is the Hermond Building, home of Imperial Optical. Sidney Hermond is a member of the U of T Board of Governors. Obscured by the smog in the background, is the Toronto General Hospital smokestack, the highest in the city.

Is Pollution Probe a political force?

"We look on Pollution Probe as a political force, an alternative for government". Next week, Survival Week, puts that 'political force', Pollution Probe, into the spotlight, and gives us all an opportunity to see how this alternative form of government is dealing with its issue in new ways.

According to Probe's press release on Survival Week, the theme is 'awareness of the problems and what each person can do to combat them'. Of the planned activities, all but three are exclusively concerned with disseminating information. These include panel discussions, lectures, a debate, information booths, 'underground ecology theatre', and sewage plant tours. The burying of a time capsule on the new library site, and a bicycle parade which are nothing but publicity stunts. Oh yes, and next Saturday (three days after Survival Week has ended), Probe is staging a clean-up of the Belt Line.

Yippee!

According to Probe's own figures as presented in their new book, the following crisis conditions should be upon us by 1990: overpopulation, famine, turbidity, oxygen deficit, urban air pollution, water and land pollution, and ecological collapse. Meanwhile Probe holds a mock funeral for the Don River and rides its collective bicycle down Yonge Street.

Publicity stunts are great stuff if the object is to have the flower pots in Nathan Phillips Square arranged in a square instead of a circle — Some people may prefer circles or even triangles, to squares. With these differing opinions to consider, and plenty of time to consider them, nobody minds the lobbyists playing games.

But it is abundantly clear that the majority of the Canadian population are in favour of strong pollution control measures and are willing to pay to clean up their own mess. The fact that those unwilling to do so happen to be the ones with the biggest mess to clean up, that is, industry and government, should have no bearing in our one man — one vote democracy. However, as we all know, it has.

In the face of this massive challenge Pollution Probe is abdicating its leadership in the fight for ecological preservation. The opposition but rears its head, and Probe runs for the shelter of its allies with admonitions to 'stop driving and use public transit', 'don't burn leaves or brush', and 'avoid all plastic'. And now, because General Motors produces death traps, and because William Dennison prefers expressways to subways, JOE PUBLIC IS MADE TO FEEL GUILTY.

Perhaps before continuing it would be wise to point out that there is some good to be said for Pollution Probe. Probe wants to stop ecological abuse. Probe wants to fight with, not for and certainly not against, 'the people'. To do this, Probe realizes that 'the people' must be directly involved in order to feel committed to the anti-pollution crusade.

But in this desire to stay with the people, Probe seems to have forgotten their own claim, that the important decisions will be made within the next five years. In twenty years it will be too late. Somewhere, somehow, Probe has mixed up its priorities. Fortunately, being as yet a young group, it should still be able to change its form of attack. If it can't do this then it may as well give up those three rooms in Ramsey Wright to the Zoology Department.

What the pro-ecology forces are trying to do, is, in effect, put forth an entirely new world view of society. To convert our planet from the ethic of exploitation to that of preservation can be called no less. As such, Pollution Probe can rightfully be called a political force. ALL THAT REMAINS IS FOR IT TO ACT LIKE ONE.

As intimated above, and as even the most casual observer can readily ascertain, Probe has great resources of popular support. CONCERNED INDIVIDUALS AND GROUPS ARE EVEN AT PRESENT WORKING THROUGHOUT THE CITY ON BEHALF OF, OR AT LEAST IN THE INTERESTS OF Pollution Probe. Probe's first task must be to mobilize these resources from so many splinter groups into one organized force capable of exerting a collective threat upon the resisting factions.

Beyond this Probe must re-define its priorities. It must recognize that a concentrated attack on government, and particularly industry (through government if possible), will eliminate virtually all forms of pollution. Not even that minority professing itself to be unconcerned with pollution can use phosphate detergents if manufacturers will stop producing them. Its much easier to cut down a tree to kill it than to pull off all of its leaves — even if the tree is as thick as a redwood it only means that the leaves are higher and harder to reach.

Finally, and perhaps this will ultimately prove to be most important of all, Probe must be prepared to compromise its legitimacy. We know that Probe's goals are just. We have at most ten years to convince three levels of government and the entire business sector that this is so. Petitions, boycotts and sound offs are bound to fail, as anyone comparing 'our' advertising budget to 'theirs' can easily see. And there isn't enough time for a proper revolution.

The only alternative beyond demonstrations and mass picketing which are also, let's face it, most unlikely to bring satisfactory responses from either government or industry, is civil disobedience, in the form of obstruction, outright defiance, and everything short of destruction which will prevent these forces from polluting our ecosystem.

This takes Probe a long way from bicycle parades. If our government is responsive, as it claims to be, then the collective protests of concerned individuals should move its agencies to the necessary actions to stop the real offenders: the industrial offenders. But if government, after a fair chance, should fail to respond, and it appears to be doing the latter, and the just nature of the anti-pollution cause remains undiminished, then Pollution Probe and all its supporters are not forced, but obligated, to work outside that system of government, and to force industry with its own hand.

SCICS overdue Counsellors aid puzzled

By MICHAEL MAZUREK
 "What are the long-range effects of The Pill on female hormones? What are the chances of getting a legal abortion in Toronto?"

As Tuesday night's meeting of the Sexuality and Contraception Information and Counselling Service (SCICS) so clearly demonstrated, these are questions which arise in the minds of most university students, yet which few can answer.

To clarify some of these hazy notions pertaining to sexual behaviour and birth control, SCICS has been established by SAC, the U of T Health Service and the Department of Gynaecology.

Judging from the enthusiastic response it has generated thus far, such an undertaking has been long overdue.

Two of the participants at Tuesday's session, for example, were students at the College of Education. They were hoping to get some ideas on how to attack the subject, should it ever crop in one of their high school classes.

Both felt that while the SCICS program is highly educational, it is "far too frank an approach to be adopted in a high school classroom setting."

The SCICS project meets every Tuesday evening in the Health Services Building at 256 Huron. The people who show up are channelled into informal lecture-discussion groups, each featuring an authority in the field.

A brief factual address by the group "leader" is followed by a rap session during which anything those present want to ask or discuss is dealt with frankly and thoroughly.

Pollution not fault of industry

By MARCIA SINGER

Wednesday night, a panel on Chemical Industrial Pollution agreed that industry is not responsible for the majority of pollution.

James Bullbrook, MPP, Sarnia, said that industry was not responsible, legally and morally, for pollution. He cited the case of Dow Chemical which has been dumping mercury into Lake St. Clair for past ten years under the approval of the Ontario Water Resources. He said that no one was aware that the mercury deposited by Dow, was being transformed into toxic organic mercury.

Dr. J. Martin of Imperial Oil said that industries caused only 15% of pollution while improper sewage treatment caused 60%. "No industry would produce something harmful to human life," he said.

The majority of the audience agreed that industry caused little pollution. One man felt that a "cultural revolution" was needed to stop pollution. Some suggestions: Don't drive a car. Don't use an electric can-opener. The best way to decrease sulphur dioxide in the air is to shut off electricity.

A girl suggested that instead of dumping waste in our lakes, we should burn it.

Subtle discrimination claimed at U of S

By BOB GAUTHIER

A subtle policy of discrimination is being practised at the University of Saskatchewan, toward both graduate and undergraduate students from other universities (most notably Simon Fraser University).

John Warnock, professor of international relations at Glendon

College first brought Saskatchewan's policy to the attention of those present at a campus Waffle Meeting September 23. Warnock said that there was a boycott on the hiring of any graduates from Simon Fraser. He also said that any undergraduates transferring from S.F.U. are forced to re-enroll in first year.

Warnock taught at U of S. for five years after coming from the United States. He said that the university would, of course, not admit this discrimination publicly but that it is a subtle fact.

Any proposed faculty appointments at U of S are first checked out by contacting the university of the prospective faculty member to find out if he (she) was politically active on campus said Sandra Foster, SAC Executive Assistant. If so, the university decides against hiring. (The Regina campus is worse than the Saskatoon one for this practice.) Foster, whose husband went to U of S corresponds regularly with people at the university.

Foster also said that ex-members of the Political Economy Course Union at U of T are particularly susceptible to the discriminatory policy. U of S would consider some of its "activists" as people to be avoided because the Course Union was "loosely organized" last year.

CO testing today

By BEN FORSTER

Motorists are being tested today to determine whether there is enough carbon monoxide in the blood stream after exposure to downtown traffic to impair their driving abilities.

The experiment is being run by Dr. A. D. Baines, a researcher at the Banting Institute and is sponsored by Pollution Probe, whose role is to provide subjects for Dr. Baines to test.

The tests will require about two or three millilitres of blood both before and after exposure to traffic. Subjects will be asked to drive or be driven around the downtown area for an hour with the windows of the car closed and the ventilation open.

Baines pointed out that "Carbon monoxide interferes with the ability of the red blood cells to carry oxygen." He went on to say that as yet an undetermined amount would interfere with brain functions, well before the substance actually became toxic.

As this is the first time such an experiment has been carried out, it will be at least a week before even a tentative statement about the results can be issued.

Council will reconsider widening St. Joseph's

By IAN MACLAREN

The proposal to widen St. Joseph St. has been placed on the council agenda at City Hall.

"This will probably mean that they'll reverse their decision although I can't guarantee it," said Harvey Fox, co-chairman of the Do It In The Road Committee.

Last Friday City Hall decided to go ahead with the widening of the street.

"We're glad the motion is being reconsidered. It may mean though that it will just be referred back to the Works Committee which we've already gone through," said Fox.

The decision to reconsider the question was made by Mayor Dennison, who voted Friday against SMC. "With the Mayor introducing it, it may mean that those who usually vote with him will change over too," said Fox.

Fox said that there will be SMC representation at the meeting.

The issue, as business arising from preceding meetings, will probably be discussed early in the Tuesday morning meeting.

There is no such thing as Reason

Crazy? Yes, it is crazy to believe in Reason with a capital R. The above statement was made by Or. Evan Runner ten years ago in a barn at Unionville, Ontario, to a bunch of Christian students. That there is no such thing as Reason is one of the cornerstones of the scholarly reformation that is beginning in Toronto and is proposed for all of North America.

Every other Saturday morning professors, grads and undergrads travel to Toronto from as far away as Syracuse and Pittsburg to hear Dr. H. Evan Runner shake the foundations of scholarship at his course in philosophical first things. He is developing a comprehensive Christian philosophical vision, and he has proposed the fundamental re-ordering of every part of North American society, including its cancerous university structures.

Dr. Runner has degrees from Wheaton, Westminster, Harvard, and a Ph.D. from the Free University. He knows what he's talking about; and he's talking about a reformation more radical than in the sixteenth century.

Dr. Runner doesn't fool around; if you don't either, come see what's happening.

SAC budget allows $5,000 to Black Students' Union

By CHRIS DYMOND

The Black Students' Union netted $5,000 from an exhausted Students' Administrative Council Wednesday night at the annual budget meeting.

Normal discussion was interrupted throughout the meeting by a dozen blacks. Horace Campbell, a York Political Science graduate, led the group with several abusive demands for recognition from SAC. His associates yelled, applauded and demanded despite the speaker's attempts to restore order.

Campbell outlined his budget to SAC —

- * $10,000 for a conference of black students from all Canadian universities.

- * $5,000 for speakers, these being on racism and other cultural aspects of society.

- * $2,000 for a Toronto Day for all black students in universities and high schools in Toronto.

- * $2,000 for a school for black education.

- * 1,000 for general expenses.

Protest against the union was mounted by Craig Perkins who pointed out that SAC could not recognize the BSU since it was not open to all races.

"This is an appeal to our white liberalism. If we give in to them every other group on campus will have the right to demand the same."

Debra Clarke expanded on BSU demands, pointing out that $20,000 of a $300,000 budget was peanuts.

"We are not asking you to do the charity work. We want to do it ourselves. But we need the money. We can't keep holding meetings in cafeterias," she said. "You must realize we have the same problems as the other side of the border. In a few years you'll have the same problems with Panthers on campus."

However the BSU indicated that it had no connection with the more militant Negro organization.

"I know we all look alike," said Clarke, "but we don't all act alike."

"We're asking for money this time. But we're not going to ask much longer. If you don't give it then we're going to take it from somewhere."

Wayne Pulver, Cultural Affairs Commissioner, pointed out the irony of the situation.

"We think we'd be doing you a big favor by giving you three grand and you think that's peanuts. No one has ever come in here before asking for this much."

The council passed a motion to commit themselves in theory to the BSU movement and to help as it could with the raising of funds.

However, BSU officials interrupted the meeting later with another demand for money. This time SAC voted the BSU $5,000 in a close vote.

A new student loan bank to serve the students?

By LAURA KELLY

The Educational Opportunity Bank is a proposed student loan plan that will shift the cost of higher learning from the government to the student, and Lois Reimer, U of T Director of Student Awards, thinks that "something like the EOB is almost inevitable."

In an interview Monday, Reimer and Patrick Phillips, U of T Senior Awards Officer, discussed the good and bad points of the basic EOB plan, which would replace OSAP with a central bank charged with loaning students enough funds to get through a full-cost university, and then collecting the funds after graduation or withdrawal.

The most contentious point is the cost-benefit implications, i.e., the student must pay the cost because the student receives all the benefits through higher income.

"There are obvious direct benefits to students. Your income is higher. Maybe that's a very sad fact, but as long as it's a fact, people are going to suggest EOB-type plans," said Phillips.

"It's that whole private versus public costs question. The money put into education has to be taken out of the budget somewhere else," explained Phillips.

"It must be compared to the other social responsibilities of the government to the people," he said.

"I'd be less unhappy if I really believed that the money saved would go to education in the lower grades," said Phillips.

Neither officer feels that the pressure of educational debts will force students to enter only high paying fields.

"For every person opting for a course that will pay back quickly, there might be just as many who would choose a low income field because that's where their interests are," said Phillips.

"Students aren't going to sit down and look at the loan situation before choosing their life occupations," he continued.

The Ontario government is pressured now by a tight budget combined with increasing educational costs, and the EOB is seen as a relief for the financial sting as well as some of the mechanical problems of OSAP.

The EOB would eliminate a means test for students, thus solving the occasional problem of a student who is refused aid by financially able parents.

The EOB would not assume that students are able to get summer jobs, which would relieve the pressure on OSAP-funded students now fighting in the tight job market.

However, no one has calculated what the effect of an EOB plan would be on lower income students.

The Clark, Cook, Fallis, and Kent Report on student aid indicated a strong aversion to incurring debt among the lower class students that were surveyed.

"We were amazed at the misconceptions of high school students about the cost of university," said Reimer.

Both Reimer and Phillips were part of the administration's study group which recommended a loan and grant plan for first year students only to "soften the blow" of educational costs.

But is the budget so tight, and is OSAP such a poor plan that this drastic alternative is necessary?

"I think it's criminal that no one has studied what OSAP has done over the past few years," said Miss Reimer.

She urged that there be extensive research before a "revolutionary" plan such as EOB, with its complex ramifications, is implemented.

"Perhaps we can also look to the use of the physical plant of the university. We might be using the money poorly," said Phillips.

He suggested such alternatives as a year-round, tri-mester university, or a curb on the physical growth of the university.

A while back, SCM had a few copies of The Alan Watts Journal. If you like Watts a lot and are moneied, get it (costs $1.50 retail). Watts writes a monthly 8-page essay on anything — incense, his ego, stars, food — and the paper and printing are a delight. Of course SCM takes a markup on the journal; it costs $12 yearly from The Human Development Corporation, 200 Madison Avenue, N.Y. 10016, N.Y.

If you like to keep up with the best educational criticism and have the money for hardback books. The Library of Contemporary Education might be an answer. It's a book club which offers about a 20 per cent discount on new books by Kohl, Goodman, Dennison, and many other excellent educational critics. You buy four books in one year and get one free. You also get one free if you sign up a friend. Their address is: The Library of Contemporary Education, Front and Brown Streets, Riverside, New Jersey 08075.

There will be a meeting of all Review Editors Tuesday between 12.00 and 2.00. It's imperative that you turn up. Issey is sick, reacting to something or other, so we lack a Rock watsup this week. But he should be back with us soon. All staff people — please drop your copy off after 12.00 on Tuesday, and have time to see it edited, unless you don't mind it being chopped around without your knowledge.

ART

Probably the most intriguing thing being shown at the moment in Toronto galleries is the new Caro sculpture at Mirvish entitled "Clearing". It is not a great work but like all Caro that one sees in fact or reproduced, it has his unmatched ability to create in space, which is after all what sculpture is all about. It will be at the gallery until at least the end of this month.

At Dunkleman Gallery the Jim Dine exhibit opened last Saturday. Having seen the "purity" of Hofmann, one is left agreeing with Greenberg, that a lot of other things do not make quite as much sense. This is the case with Dine although he draws beautifully and the colour is handled with a real elan. As Pop Art goes he is certainly one of its better exponents.

Yves Gaucher opened at Moos last Thursday. A rather disappointing exhibit in light of his highly disciplined painting of only two or three years ago, but it is worth seeing.

At the Faculty of Architecture, Urban and Regional Planning and Landscape Architecture, in the exhibition room, paintings and preparatory studies by Jim Tiley will be on show Oct. 16-26.

MUSIC

The opera enters its last week with Fidelio tonight and Oct. 13, Don Giovanni tomorrow night Oct. 10, La Traviata Oct. 12 and 15 and Carmen Oct. 14 and 16. All start at 8:15 in the evening, and student stand-by tickets are available for $2.00.

On Oct. 15 at 8:00 PM at the Edward Johnson Building, the first of three lectures by Prof. Ezra Schabas dealing with the current status of the symphony orchestra as a medium. It's free.

At Hart House, check the programme lineup of the Hart House Orchestra for the coming (18th) season. Cost of a subscription is $5.00 for the works, and they start next week.

FILM

U.C. Lit's series of Comparative Literature on Film presents La Vieille Dame Indigne on Tuesday Oct. 13 in UC 104. There will be showings at 7:00 and 9:15 with a discussion by Mr. H. Milnes.

Also on Wednesday, Oct. 14 the Ontario Science Center continues "Pandora's Movie Box" with Seven Authors in Search of a Reader (Holland, 1965) and The Bride of Frankenstein (U.S.A., 1935) with Boris Karloff and Elsa Lanchester. Show times at 7:00 and 9:15.

The U of T (Innis) Film Society presents Sam Peckinpah's tribute to blood, gore and the waning days of Old West gunfighters, The Wild Bunch. The movie starts at 7:30 in MS (Meds) 3154, Thursday Oct. 15. In the coming months, the society will be showing an excellent array of films of all types and from various countries. Your support in the way of a $1.00 membership fee and continued attendance will ensure the presentation of films that students most want to see.

FLICK OF THE WEEK: Don't be led astray by all the super-hype you've been seeing about Five Easy Pieces. It is without a doubt a well put-together film, containing some really earthy cinematography and Jack Nicholson's best performance to date. But it is not quite the best thing to come out of Hollywood since Citizen Kane, as the ads would have you believe.

As with Joe, Five Easy Pieces is such a box-office draw because of the portrayal of its central character. Nicholson, as Robert Dupea, is a pleasure to watch, regardless of whatever else happens to be going on at the time. Whether in a verbal joust with his girlfriend, Rayette (Karen Black), or in a pathetic attempt to communicate with his paralyzed, gray-haired father (Ralph White), he consistently draws the attention, identification and genuine sympathy of the audience.

But unlike Peter Boyle, Nicholson is lucky enough to be flanked by a dozen or so truly proficient, albeit unknown, actors. The most memorable of these is Helena Kallianiotes, a health and environment freak hitching to Alaska to escape the dirt and pollution of the big cities. Even a role as minor as hers, occupying no more than ten or fifteen minutes of screen time, is played so convincingly well, that it reminds you of Nicholson's own work in Easy Rider.

And it is the cast that saves the movie. This is not to say that the plot is worthless, since, with director Robert Rafelson's guidance, it mercifully avoids being "in", "now", "with it" or "relevant". However, it is so steeped in symbolism that it makes you want to find Meaning and Significance in places where such investigation may not necessarily be valid. And there are holes in the plot. Why does Robert ditch Rayette? Why does Pure Catherine entomb herself in the Dupea island retreat and then fall prey to Robert? Such questions might individually make for good cinematic mind-teasers, but there are just too many of them dotting the action.

Make no mistake about it, Five Easy Pieces is definitely worth seeing. A little analysis shows it to be a perceptive study of the need to shoulder responsibility in order to achieve true love. But don't go expecting the world. Just a plain ordinary good movie.

Counter budget rejected

The six hour SAC budget debate netted few results Wednesday night as members quarreled with the Black Students' Union, other interested parties and themselves.

The counter-budget proposal, an attempt to discuss what its supporters thought to be unnecessary SAC expenditures, lasted two hours. It was not adopted.

Results follow:

* $5,000 loan to the Blue and White society

* $5,000 grant to the BSU

* $2,000 to the U. of T. Film Facility Club

* 12,700 to the Varsity Downtown Educational Program

* $3,000 to the U. of T. Chorus

* $300 to Toike Oike

* $35 to the Reading Room

In an attempt to cut down expenditures SAC dropped the pamphlet project. The meeting continues next Wednesday.

Student wins $126

Lucky John Eng, a second year chemistry and zoology student, has won a year's free supply of textbooks from the University of Toronto textbook Store.

That's $126 worth of compulsory textbooks.

Eng's name was drawn yesterday from about 400 entries in the Textbook Store's contest. Ballots for the contest were included in copies of this year's Handbook, published by the Students' Administrative Council.

Kunstler is coming

Chicago 7 Attorney William Kunstler will be the Guest Speaker at a Hart House debate next Tuesday.

The question for debate is: The Government has no business in the private rooms of the nation.

Kunstler's appearance at the debate coincides with a trip to Toronto to face charges of assault.

This past summer at Convocation Hall, Kunstler's address was interrupted by protesters from the Edmund Burke Society. In the ensuing confrontation, Kunstler poured a pitcher of water over the head of Edmund Burke Society leader Paul Fromm. Fromm charged at the time that he was punched by Kunstler.

PhysEd takes interfaculty track title

By CLIVE HOBSON
Yesterday's interfaculty track and field meet at Varsity Stadium produced only two new records, but more important, it substantiated the fact that although the Varsity squad has very little chance of wresting the OQAA Track and Field title away from the powerful Waterloo and Western teams, Toronto athletes will have a very big say in who actually takes the title.

The meet yesterday was dominated by the strong PHE team, but a surprise challenge to the title came from Scarborough College who finished in second place just 12½ points behind.

Far behind at a distant third, 26½ points and out of contention was Victoria College.

Perhaps the biggest surprise of the meet was the failure of OQAA favourite, Bruce Simpson to win the pole vault. Simpson opted to pass until 14'6" then failed to clear the height on all three attempts, thus leaving first place in the hands of Dave Barret from PHE.

PHE produced a 1-2-3 sweep of this event.

There were three double winners in the meet.

The shotput and the discus were both taken by Grant Tadman of PHE.

Don Watt from Victoria College picked up his two firsts in the Triple Jump and the 120 hurdles. Watt was also one of the record breakers, when he cleared 44.0 feet in the triple jump, just half an inch further than the previous record.

The battle for the Cody Trophy, awarded to the individual athlete who accumulates the most points throughout the meet, was very close. Mark Minden took it with thirteen points.

Minden finished first in the 440 and the 880 and took second place in the 440 hurdles.

The high jump was close with both Brian Penny and Eric Little clearing 5'9", with Penny finally taking it on fewer misses.

Alan Tucker, from the School of Graduate Studies also had a good day with a first in the 220, second place in the 100 yards and fourth place in the long jump.

Although no official record exists for the six mile event, the winner Ritchie Pynes did better than the previous best time of 31.35 by 34.2 seconds.

The 440 relay was a tight affair with PHE winning in 47.3, Scarborough close behind at 47.4 and Meds finishing in 49.5.

The team to travel to McMaster for next Saturday's OQAA championship meet will be selected from yesterday's competitors.

Although we can't expect any records, look out Waterloo, because that Varsity squad is going to pull off a few upsets that could just offset the balance of power in the meet.

Golf Blues seventh after first round

After the first round at the OQAA golf championships yesterday at London the Varsity team holds down seventh place in the ten-team event.

With the best four scores of the five-man squads counting towards the team total, Blues scored 316. Windsor U had the lead after yesterday's round with a score of 300. Queen's and host Western were next, tied for second with 301.

Individually, Bob Kennedy had the best round for Varsity with an 18 hole total of 77. Jeff Gollish carded a 78 while Frank Crean shot 80, Kevin Hughes 81 and George Scott 82.

The second and final round began this morning at 9:00.

Waterloo is the defending champion of the Ruttan Cup.

Varsity plays host to Chinese soccer tourney

For two fleeting days this weekend, Varsity will be the Chinese soccer capital of Canada.

A soccer tournament organized under the auspices of the U of T branch of the Chinese Overseas Students Association is set for Saturday and Sunday on the Varsity campus.

Teams composed exclusively of Chinese students have been entered from Queen's, Ottawa, McMaster, Western, McGill and Toronto and the COSA organizers hope that last-minute arrangements will enable Waterloo and Sir George Williams U to field entries.

The preliminary rounds are scheduled for the front campus on Saturday commencing at 9:30 a.m. while the final will go at 2:30 p.m. at the Stadium on Sunday.

There will be no admission charge for any of the games and anyone wishing more information should contact Dave Chien at 923-5854.

Injuries force Blues to juggle line-up

By LYNDON LITTLE

It's been a small joke among football players for many years now, "that one man's fracture is another man's break!"

With the rash of injuries that have suddenly cropped up amongst the 1970 grid Blues, starting assignments have fallen to several backup personnel as head coach Ron Murphy juggles his starting lineup for tonight's encounter with the Warriors in Waterloo.

WAYNE DUNKLEY, the second-year signal-caller from Monarch Park, must step in and take over direction of Blues' attack from veteran pivot Vic Alboini.

Alboini had guided Blues to their first two league triumphs over McGill and Queen's.

"I feel the guys have confidence that I can do the job," Dunkley said Wednesday night, "and I know that I have confidence in myself."

The job of replacing abrasive star center Rich Agro will fall on the broad shoulders of former Cedarbrae Collegiate star Tom Robertson.

Another change will see McMaster Marauder transfer Mike Brierley, who hauled in the crucial touchdown pass against McGill, replace Bill Stankovic at the slot-back spot.

Stankovic, the Hamilton native who has been one of the mainstays of the backfield ever since he took over a starting role last year, picked up a broken hand in the Queen's game. The cast prevents him from carrying the ball but he'll still be available for placement kicking duties.

EXCEPT FOR Derek Turner replacing Gord Whitaker at left guard, the remainder of the starting lineup is unchanged.

Jack Buchan and John Chapman will be the wide receivers; Mark Slater the tightend; Peter Van Bodegom and Jim Kellam the tackles; Don Fraser and Turner the guards; while Bob Morrow and Glen Markle join Dunkley and Brierley in the backfield.

On the defensive side, Alex Squires, Jim Orfanakos, Jim Bennett and Bart D'Onofrio will be the starting "front-four"; Bob Bloxham, Bill Bennett and Hartley Stern the linebacking corps while Eric Walter, Peter McNabb, Jody Ortvad, Brian Sickle and Bob Bilinghurst are the front-line troops in the defensive secondary.

As far as Waterloo is concerned, the Warriors have had trouble scoring points so far this year but Blues' coaching staff is expecting a strong defensive battle from them as they try to break into the win column.

They lost a heart-breaker 1-0 to Mac in their first outing and then dropped at a 17-10 decision to Western last weekend.

"You have to remember," emphasized Murph, "after two league games Waterloo has a better defensive record than we do."

Blue Notes — After two weeks of action, the latest OQAA stats

Big shoes to fill

Net Blues in western zone show Blues as first in team rushing and second in passing. To no one's surprise, Blues' bruising fullback Glen Markle is on top of the individual rushing derby with 151 yards on 39 carries. Sophomore split end Jack Buchan has the league's best average-gain-per-completion record with 145 yards on five receptions. On the negative side however, Blues are leading in yards-lost on penalties and are second in the number of fumbles.

This year, the University of Western Ontario plays host to the OQAA tennis championships.

Our net Blues, champions for the past two years, will once again be sending a strong contingent of players to compete in the western zone playoffs today and tomorrow.

This year's squad consists of Don Steele (Vic IV), Peter Chow

(Meds IV), Brad Robinson (Eng. III), and Terry McNally (SMC III)

The championships are run on a round-robin basis with four singles and two doubles matches being played against each school.

Since there will be six schools participating in the western-zone playoffs, every competitor plays a total of 10 matches in the two-day event. One point is awarded for the winner of each match and the team with the greatest point total is declared champion of the western section.

Next Saturday, also at Western, the western and eastern team winners meet for the Canadian Lawn Tennis Association Cup, emblematic of the OQAA team title.

As well as the team champion there are separate singles and doubles winners declared.

This year the tennis Blues have had the privilege of working out with former Canadian Davis Cup star Harry Fauquier and as a result are much better prepared than in previous years.

Whether this added asset will be enough to bring home the championship once again remains to be seen.

So watch the foot faults boys, and keep your eye on that ball!

Vic trims Engineers 29-1

By STAN KOROLNEK

Led by the strong running game of Bruce Carroll, Peter White and Steve Stone, Victoria College completely overwhelmed Engineering 29-1 in a first division football game.

The Engineers were hemmed in their own half of the field most of the game as their offence fizzled under the constant pressure of the big Vic linemen.

The only bright light for Engineering was the excellent kicking of Doug Ellsworth, who hammered out some tremendous punts and managed to score their only point on a single.

Vic built up a 16-0 lead by half-time and just maintained control for the second half.

White, Carroll, Kartna and Rick Kioyona scored Vic majors. Joe Cornacchia, the ex-Riverdalian, showed the Peter Warren spirit as he added two converts. White also had a 2 point conversion.

Notes: Vic's next game is a showdown against PHE next Thursday and this one could be a preview of the Mulock Cup final.

In other action Wednesday, the Bobby Bates-led UC Redmen whipped the lightly-regarded Meds team 28-0. This one was just no contest as Meds were completely outclassed.

Kunstler makes plea for individual civil liberties in UofT 'bedroom' debate

By TOM WALKOM

"I would rather live in a world where people do not look into my bedroom, and in to the more private places where people talk and think," said William Kunstler last night at Hart House.

Kunstler, the attorney for the Chicago 7, was in town for a court appearance yesterday morning, but participated last night in a wide-open debate on whether governments have any business in the bedrooms of the nation.

Kunstler dwelt heavily on sexual examples to back up his plea for individual liberty.

Referring to the idea of electronic eavesdropping in the bedroom Kunstler said, "It is difficult to keep your mind on your business and hit the mark if you are being observed. The art of infant reproduction requires infinite concentration, and you can't do it if you're listening for beeps (of electronic bugs)."

According to Kunstler, all Canada is legally open to wiretapping by the police except for the province of Manitoba.

"The easiest way to see if your phone is being tapped is to not pay the phone bill," he said. "If the telephone company doesn't bother you and your line isn't cut off, then someone else who is listening is paying."

He condemned writs of assistance, a power granted in Canada to RCMP "recommended for great snooperability."

This writ, granted on request of the justice department from the exchequer court gives the officer the power to engage in "a lifetime of vicariousness."

Kunstler defended his concept of allowing no government controls in the face of arguments from Linda McQuaig (UC I) and Herman Seigel (UC IV) who spoke on the negative side of the resolution.

"It may cause (them) to go punish a rape or two, or a conglomerate. It will make the police work harder. They will have to gather evidence rather than sit in a cellar and listen to tape recorders."

"We can't be free if we're afraid," Kunstler said.

York in uproar

Senate suppresses citizenship data

The York University Senate has again refused to release figures on the citizenship of new faculty, and now students there are threatening to hold a sit-in in the president's office until he releases the figures.

The Senate's latest refusal followed a demonstration called last Tuesday by the CYSF, (York's Student Council) where 400 students demanded a special Senate meeting in one week to release the figures. On Friday, York administration president David Slater said no deal.

A group of students, led by the York branch of the Canadian Liberation Movement has issued a leaflet saying: "Dr. Slater, you have until 2:00 p.m. on Thursday to release the figures. Three strikes and you're out. TELL THE TRUTH OR WE CLOSE UP YOUR STAR-SPANGLED OFFICE!" (Three strikes refers to the number of requests).

Tomorrow, at 2 p.m. in Founder's College Common Room there will be a demand for the figures. Gary Perly, chairman of the Canadian Liberation Movement, and Leo Adler, an Osgoode Law Student, will speak. Slater has also been invited. If figures are not forthcoming, a sit-in will be called for.

Robin Mathews, well-known Canadian patriot and co-author of The Struggle For Canadian Universities, will speak at a mass meeting at 2 p.m. on Friday in the Founder's College Dining Hall.

The leaflet explains why the group has demanded the figures: "We all know why they (the Senate) are afraid to tell the truth; because the figures will show that, at least in the Arts departments, CANADIANS ARE IN A MINORITY. And let's be absolutely clear here: we are speaking of citizenship, not country of origin. Citizenship, as the Senate well knows, is a matter of public information. . . . This is a gross national insult!"

Originally the figures had been requested by the Ontario government's Commission on University Affairs. The Senate then refused on the basis of "privacy of information", claiming that it had to protect the privacy of certain professors. The Ontario government apparently has quietly backed down.

The latest figures for Atkinson College at York released recently show that the Senate does have something to hide. A solid majority of 60% of the teaching staff there are of foreign citizenship and the number has been increasing exorbitantly over the last five years in all universities in Canada.

The University of Alberta Students' Council recently passed a motion calling for a quota system to bring the number of Canadian teaching staff to 90 per cent. The Canadian Liberation Movement has launched a nationwide campaign for an 85 per cent quota.

Intolerable conditions revealed in a plea for striking fishermen

By SUSAN PERLY

HALIFAX (CUP) — Nova Scotia's Progressive Conservative government went down to defeat last night in an election contest in which 19-year-olds had the vote for the first time.

The votes of young people in Nova Scotia helped elect the first two New Democratic Party members ever in the province, and to hand over the government to the Liberal Party, which has been out of office for 14 years.

In the heavily student-populated Halifax riding of Halifax-Cornwallis, Conservative Attorney-General Richard A. Donahoe was unseated by a large margin.

Friday, the staff of the Dalhousie Gazette, the Dalhousie University student newspaper, urged students in Halifax-Cornwallis to cast a write-in vote for Everett Richardson, one of 250 Nova Scotia fishermen who have been on strike for the last six months instead of voting for Donahoe, "the man responsible for prosecuting the fishermen in his capacity as Attorney-General."

"It will count as a spoiled ballot but it is one of the few ways that we as students and as Nova Scotians can register our outrage against a system as brutal as this one. Everett Richardson is one of the millions of the Canadians who every day are being sacrificed for reasons of profit and political expediency.

"We are all Everett Richardson.

"By writing Richardson's name on the ballot we can affirm the right of Nova Scotia fishermen and of all Nova Scotians to control their own lives."

In Friday's Gazette, an editorial described some of the conditions faced by the striking fishermen:

"The lifeboats on the Acadian Neptune are rusted solid to the davits. Last year the Acadian Gull was taken to Pictou for her annual inspection. One of her lifeboats had a hole in the bottom larger than a man's head. The lifeboat passed inspection.

"Acadian Fisheries had economized in the name of profits on repairing and overhauling its trawlers by paying off the Department of Transport officials who inspect the trawlers.

"As a result Acadian Fisheries had been directly responsible for the death of at least thirty of its trawler crewmen. In the last eight years, at least four Acadian trawlers have gone down, two with all hands."

Crewmen who refused to sail until some minimum standard of safety has been reached, were threatened with blacklisting. Acadia blacklisted men for from ten days to 99 years, men who have homes and families to support.

Under the threat of losing all hope of a job with the fishing fleets, they usually sail. Some never come back.

Acadian Fisheries literally robs the crew of one-third to one-half of their catch. No fishermen are allowed to be present when the catch is weighed and graded so the fishermen are not only short-weighted but their fish are assessed at grade B or C by the company, bought at cheap prices, and then sold on the market as grade A fish.

And so the New Democratic Youth prepared stickers and posters to plaster all over the province. On a standard ballot form on which was written in black, "Liberal, Conservative, New Democratic Party", written in red "write in Everett Richardson."

The paper, the Dal Gazette, explains:

"Everett Richardson is a fisherman from Canso. He is a trawler for Acadia Fisheries. He has been on strike for six months. During this time he and the other trawler fishermen from Canso, Mulgrave and Petit-de-Grat have been denied the status of human beings. They have been harassed by the RCMP, and they have been the subject of the most vicious smear campaign.

"They have been served injunctions by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia which forbade them from fishing and they have been jailed for defying these injunctions. Everett Richardson was sentenced to nine months in jail for contempt of court by a judge who called him a "pawn in an international conspiracy."

Acadia Fisheries is owned by Boston Deep Sea Fisheries Ltd. of Hull, England and Booth Fisheries Canadian Co. Ltd. which is owned by Booth Fisheries of Chicago.

Acadia Fisheries has been taking 63 per cent of the catch, the remainder being divided among the crew.

Audience attacks spokesman on government pollution policy

By JUDISMITH

With the Thursday pollution index at a record high of 56, a frustrated Town Hall audience heard Ontario Government pollution control chief Lou Schenfield "cloud the issues with statistics" in response to questions.

During Schenfield's introductory comments, he stated "we can't tell industry what to do . . . problems are not solved in the court-rooms. We must work for the co-operation of industry."

"Why not?" demanded an impatient audience member.

Moderator Margaret Campbell intervened. "You will have your chance to question panelists after their opening comments," she said.

During the question and answer period of the panel discussion, almost all challenges were offered to Shenfield and to Earl Baldock, Assistant Director of Water Pollution Control for Metro. Their answers were ambiguous. Shenfield answered questions by stressing the government's "3 million dollar budget" and "knowledge of the seriousness of the problem."

"What exactly are you going to do about the problem?" Mr. Shenfield was asked.

"We are doing a lot of research and have the largest budget of any of the provinces," he replied.

In discussing the overloaded Toronto sewage system, Baldock said that there is a 25-year plan for improvement, and that only 5 years have gone by already.

"In view of the seriousness of the present situation, why can't the plan be speeded up?" he was asked.

"It was a 25-year plan, the costs of changing it would be too high. Besides, you know what workmen are like," Baldock replied.

Baldock was asked by an audience member about the figures for bacteria count in the harbour and rivers.

"The policy of the government is not to publish the figures," answered Mr. Baldock.

When questioned about this secrecy, Mr. Baldock replied, "The public may misinterpret the data."

"Citizens should be able to decide for themselves what priorities and problems are . . . the public is indifferent because they have not been told," he was told.

Stanley Burke attacked the government. "Experts say we are heading for trouble, you sit here giving us reassurances; why don't you tell us to get going!"

He lashed into the public too. "We elect our leaders to give us what we want, which is technological progress. We will fight pollution as long as it doesn't affect our growth rate; we're hypocrites."

Only 150 people attended the meeting. One disgruntled member suggested that the reason for this small number was that "they knew what would happen if they came here. They wouldn't get any answers."

Kunstler remanded to Nov

William Kunstler, charged by two members of the Edmund Burke Society with assault and assault with intent to cause bodily harm, has not seen the last of Toronto.

The defense lawyer for the Chicago 7 trial, has had his trial delayed until Nov. 30 and Dec. 1 because Provincial Judge Tupper Bigelow was ill.

Paul Fromm is charging that Kunstler hit him on the head with a water pitcher last June in Convocation Hall. Allan Overfield, Fromm's bodyguard, is alleging that Kunstler hit him with his fist.

Kunstler will be back at the end of November to face the charges.

Council to reconsider St. Joseph St. issue this afternoon at 2

Mayor William Dennison has bowed to pressure and decided to allow the issue of the St. Joseph St. widening to be placed on the City Council agenda once again. Council will consider the matter at a meeting this afternoon at 2.

On Oct. 2, Council had voted the issue closed but a petition presented to the mayor has prompted Council to take another look at objections to the widening.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students Administration Council of the University of Toronto. Printed by Web Offset Publications Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Today's Varsity is...

The Varsity tonight faces a major financial crisis.

The proposed budget brought down last week by SAC finance commissioner Peter Boswell suggests that The Varsity should receive 10 per cent of the total SAC income.

This means that The Varsity would receive a grant of $29,650 from the SAC. This would include a $16,000 charge for services supplied to The Varsity by SAC employees.

In effect, then, SAC has proposed a $7,000 cutback in the cash grant to The Varsity.

Last spring The Varsity Board of Directors, the newspaper's governing body asked for and received from SAC assurance that the newspaper would receive the same cash subsidy as last year — $20,000. There was no subsequent negotiation between the SAC and the Varsity Board.

Now, the SAC has changed its mind. $7,000 worth of it.

You are now holding in your hands the evidence of the effect that such a cutback would have on The Varsity. Today's paper contains 60 per cent advertising. This is the level at which The Varsity would be forced to operate to absorb such a drastic and unforeseen cut in cash income.

The choice of a 10 per cent guideline was arbitrary and unrealistic. It did not consider the fixed costs involved in printing a regular newspaper. Normally, the size of the paper varies with the amount of advertising we carry. By carrying the normal load of 40 to 45 per cent advertising, we can manage to break even on the cost of printing.

But to come up with another $7,000, it will become necessary to increase advertising content substantially — to the level of today's paper.

If tonight's SAC meeting — in the West Hall at UC — fails to restore the Varsity grant to its original level, both The Varsity Board of Directors and the staff of the paper will have to consider whether it is worth publishing a newspaper which rivals the commercial press in its advertising content.

In order to continue publishing until the end of our announced publishing year, and in order to maintain a high but acceptable ratio of advertising to stories, The Varsity requires two things from the SAC:

- the part-time services of the SAC advertising manager, accountant and secretary at 91 St. George St.,
- a cash grant of $20,000 (or 1.7 cents per reader per edition).

Otherwise there can be no guarantee the newspaper will continue to publish.

"I can't sleep! All I dream of is unions and unions and unions..."

—from The Ruling Class, A. Redfield, 1935

Sometimes you make it -- sometimes you don't

Some people make it. Some people don't. On Wednesday, October 7 at approximately 2:05 p.m. there was the usual move on campus for classes and the run across Avenue Road to make it through southbound traffic with Queen's Park as the objective.

A woman was hit.

The left side of her body bounced off the car and the right side hit the asphalt. The driver's new car lost the back reflector light when hit by another car. The woman was quickly lifted from the "Road" (no apparent consideration as to whether any thing was broken internally that might have pierced a vital organ) and placed on the Queen's Park grass with her knees bended over the stone step surrounding the park. A hospital ambulance made an appearance. A nurse looked to the patient and left. Perhaps it was the wrong accident. Until an Amalgamated Ambulance arrived, she remained on the ground. She was perhaps a student, perhaps a professor. In the ambulance it didn't matter if her clipboard and notes accompanied her.

Every day thousands of students cross that road. There are six lanes of heavy traffic before the split by Queen's Park, then, there are three lanes on each side. A bridge or an underpass would help save a life.

The east artery has, at least, lights with which students can cross. The west artery has luck.

Wonderful to know you're considered as agile an athlete as the cars whizzing in back of or in front of you. Good to know you're relatively spry as a car screeches to a slowdown. However, if you're "Joe Student" without running shoes, may Lady Luck accompany you through traffic.

Action can be taken. Tell SAC and The Varsity you want to live. Other students realize that increasing traffic is making it more difficult.

If you find this amusing, your thoughts may rapidly change while lying in front of a car and hearing some one say:

"Too bad, he didn't make it."

Irene Bork,
Victoria College

'SAC improperly intimidated'

I am writing this letter to express my disgust at SAC's timid capitulation to the Black Student's Union at last Wednesday night's budget meeting.

I am not opposed to the aspirations of black people, nor, I am sure, were any of the other Council members who voted to defer the matter to another meeting.

The fact of the matter is that the budget meeting was neither the time nor the place to consider that question. A budget meeting, even more so than a regular meeting, is particularly susceptible to completely undemocratic pressure tactics. And it is just these tactics that the SAC was subjected to Wednesday night.

By acceding to the demands of the BSU, those Council members who voted to give away the $5,000 abdicated their responsibilities as representatives of the students of the University of Toronto.

It has been my belief that most Council members were aware of how such techniques could be used to seriously undermine the rational democratic procedure of such a meeting. Perhaps a number of them are not. Perhaps some of them went ahead despite the realization of what was going on.

In any case, I am profoundly disappointed that the Council could not defer the matter until another time.

This irresponsible decision to acquiesce to the demands of the BSU will most certainly have serious repercussions elsewhere in the budget.

Cuts and perhaps complete deletions of worthwhile student projects will have to be made as a result of this decision. These are projects that have been planned and carefully considered at previous commission meetings, not projects that are rammed down Council's throat for approval at (literally) the eleventh hour.

Ex-registrar Shepherd explains

I should like to add two small footnotes to the article about my resignation as College Registrar, which appeared in The Varsity on Friday, 2 October

STAFF STUFF:

People who are now working on or want to work on The Varsity should try and make it to a meeting today at 1 p.m. where we can talk about money and ORCUP and writing stories and other matters of grave political importance.

1. It should be clearly understood that my decision to resign was taken before the end of June, and therefore problems in registration procedures could only help to prevent my feeling any great regret about the decision.

2. I think I must have said that the "value of efficiency is to get non-essentials out of the way" so that people may be free to do what really matters.

To add further modifying footnotes to the article might seem mere academic pedantry!

One woman charged

Making it on Queen's Park Cres.

Ruth Green, 49, was charged with joywalking by Toronto Police after being struck last Wednesday afternoon at the corner of Queen's Park Crescent and Hoskin Avenue.

She was taken to Toronto General Hospital, suffering from injuries to her left hip and lower back.

By IRENE BORK

Various students have just "made it". Making it is a game played by motorists and by students. The game area is on the west side of Queen's Park between Harbord and Wellesley on a strip called Queen's Park Crescent.

The following is a commentary offered by students who travel this way daily. Many were unable to give their names as they dodged the racing traffic.

Student with the giggling girlfriend: I don't know whether there are real dangers or not. It depends on how many people get together in a bunch. You can usually scare a motorist into stopping by having twenty people gather together.

Anonymous: It's pretty dangerous crossing as a group. If you see those cars coming over, some of them are hitting 40m.p.h.

Gemma Johnson (S.M.C.II): I've had to cross here for two years. It has come to be a guessing game, who will go first, the pedestrian or the driver.

Lorraine Pierce (S.M.C.I): It's unfortunate the situation of the campus should coincide with one of the busiest parts of the city. The place where the woman was hit was an especially bad spot because the cars cannot be seen coming around the bend.

Cautious male: It's dangerous. You have traffic going two ways and sometimes it's hard to judge which way traffic is going to turn.

Yvonne Zawierucha (S.M.C. I):

After witnessing the accident on October 7, I feel even extremely more angered against the authorities who could do something to improve the conditions. Unless they offer an alternative, such as, perhaps, a crosswalk, I suggest they might offer a pair of wings.

A male: Most students would have the good sense to use a crosswalk if it was there. It would be easier than dodging cars.

Stop Spadina rally features film

By ERIC MILLS

"The ripping down of posters advertising Stop Spadina's Thursday rally indicates the vehemence generated by the expressway issue," said Paul Reinhardt, SSSOCCC steering committee spokesman.

The Stop Spadina — Save Our City Co-ordinating Committee rally is being held tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in order to bring people up to date on the expressway controversy.

The meeting will feature the world premier of "The Burning World", a film made in Toronto by Marshall McLuhan and Jane Jacobs. Mrs. Jacobs, author of Death and Life of Great American Cities, will make one of her rare public appearances to discuss both the film and the implications of the Spadina controversy for the future of Metro government.

SSSOCCC chairman Alan Powell will report on the committee's past and present activities.

Conflicting reports in the media about SSSOCCC and the expressway itself have created some doubt about the future of SSSOCCC. However it is very much alive, even if not financially solvent.

Although Metro Council voted in June to proceed with the Spadina Expressway, it has almost run out of funds. Accordingly, Metro has had to ask the Ontario Municipal Board for permission to borrow an additional $86 million.

J. A. Kennedy, chairman of the OMB, is reported to have said "Surely an expressway costing $79 million is not the same as an expressway costing about $150 million."

The municipal Board will hold hearings before reaching a decision that will likely be much more than the rubber stamp that Metro would like them to be.

There will probably be some provision for citizen participation in the later stages of the formal hearings.

Meanwhile, the Stop Spadina Committee is preparing for the OMB hearings and is submitting a brief to the City Council committee, chaired by Reid Scott, on "Aims and Objectives of the City".

Bergman's Anna insists on personal frictions

By AGI LUKACS

Once upon a time, there was a gentleman who kept on making movies. But because he was a European gentleman and because he had made over thirty films as time went by, he was not trusted very much by very many of us in North America. Except for the members of the Cultured Minority — which counts among its growing number many a university type — which, sooner or later, went to see why all the fuss about this Ingmar Bergman fellow. And usually went back for more.

As I was hooked recently, in the course of New Yorker Film Festivals and last winter's series at St. Mike's, I couldn't stay away from Bergman's latest thing. In some ways, I'm not sure that was the best of moves. The Passion of Anna, playing at the International, is once again a different Bergman, and that's nice, because it provides another glimpse into the mind of a gentleman who has a very nice mind. But Bergman addicts may nevertheless be disappointed. The film is, I think, Bergman's first in colour, and he loses much of the dramatic effect of stark blacks-and-whites by the experiment. The Great Director — which he really was — has tried to gain wider appeal, I suspect, not only by the use of colour, but also by simplifying much of the dialogue. Simpler words can have various effects: they can lead the Intelligent Viewer to look for meaning not-at-all, just enough to make him happy, or much too much to make any director happy.

The prime passion of Anna, as emphasized by her at a dinner party, seems to be a passion for truth. But as we trip across the slowly unravelled history of the men and women at the party — history involving a fatal car accident and some swapping of lovers (not only of marriage partners, as in American suburbia) — we find that her prime passion is really an insistence on maintaining personal fictions. The passion extends to the capacity of causing the death of a man who refuses to maintain the illusion of their truthful love.

Though the dialogues are more straight forward than is usual in Bergman ("We should strive for spiritual affection"), the ever-present moral tension underlying the films occasionally rears its more profound head with lines like: "What is the poison that erodes the best in us — leaving only the shell?" The understated melodrama is somehow easier for us to accept in subtitled form; perhaps we are too familiar with spoken English.

Bergman's usual, powerful theatrical effects have given way to cinemascopic drama, some of which is borrowed from the other Great European Director, Jean-Luc Godard. Godard's techniques of alienation are there: a narrator's voice, a TV screen showing violence in the Third World; sections of a letter to Anna repeatedly flashed on the screen, driving home the words "physical and psychological violence"; a focus on blood reminiscent of Godard's Weekend. Perhaps Godard's techniques, including even the metaphor of the car-crash from Weekend, are used because Bergman shows concern (for the first time?) with the overt violence that Godard has continued to emphasize in both France and Amerika. Anna could be a creation of Godard, when, limping away from the car-crash which killed her husband and child, she says: "I wondered why no one wanted to help those people." She and the other principle actors are also acting out alienation when they are filmed as themselves, describing the characters they play. Max von Sydow explains, for example, that the most difficult thing for him as an actor is to express lack of expression.

The use of alienation is effective in itself, but it destroys some of Bergman's usual subtlety. However, he has not changed completely. He still relies on the excellent acting of Von Sydow, Erland Josephson, Bibi Andersson and Liv Ullman. The backdrop is till the barren countryside, against which men's characters are the more clearly outlined. Though he has brought back some of the lightness of Wild Strawberries, for example in the sophisticated seduction scene many of us expect from Sweden — his themes are still profound. The existential agony emphasized in Persona, portrayed in detail by von Sydow in Hour of the Wolf and touched upon by his suicide in Winter Light, appears again with all four characters in The Passion of Anna. The wife of a successful and blase architect cannot sleep. "I'm just a small part of his general weariness", she says, recalling the theme of Winter Light, the impossibility of love in the modern world. Anna's agony has a similar cause; she has nightmares. Her waking life is essentially little better: "You're like in a dream — you want to move and talk, and cannot." Similarly, the character Liv Ullman played in Sbane's account of wartime cruelties feels as if she is part of someone else's dream, someone who will be ashamed when he wakes up.

The treatment of collective agony, a theme which is being increasingly portrays both in North America and Europe, was emphasized both in Bergman's Sbane and The Seventh Seal, is again only touched upon in The Passion of Anna. There is a pathos-filled account of society's cruelty towards a hermit, who is a vehicle for questioning whether modern society permits any personal dignity. The themes are only touched upon, with less insistence than in the earlier films. But perhaps Bergman's much-touted genius is revealed in the profundity of even an understated approach.

The Exhaust Fume Death Trip

The world premiere of The Burning Would, a film-statement by Marshall McLuhan is being sponsored by Stop Spadina Thursday.

The film, made by Toronto film maker David MacKay, was the result of a six months' rap session between McLuhan, cities' expert Jane Jacobs and MacKay.

The 16mm colour short is a look at Toronto, and at the slow death of our city from the ever engulfing power of the motor car.

The 15 minute film reminds one of Godard's Weekend with its vision of non-stop metal boxes. But this is not a dramatic comment on the world, but rather a record of our city, and the attitudes of the citizens towards the car's domination.

Burning the Would is being shown at Convocation Hall Thursday October 15 at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are only $1.00. They can be bought at SAC or the Stop Spadina offices. Jane Jacobs will be speaking after the film.

'Flowers' is urban comedy on two levels

By SUZANNE ROULEAU

Flowers in the City by Ross McAllister is a comedy at two levels. For the most part it pokes rather inoffensive and amusing fun at society as it is today, but at times it becomes almost a political pamphlet.

The setting is "the only house in a downtown parking complex", a boarding house that comes complete with dirty old man, vain glorious old maid, ineffectual big talkers, beautiful young girl-hippie; and the landlord, who is the embodiment of the comedy of tomorrow today.

He is a 40-year-old grown-up hippie who dropped out, haunted by visions of what he wishes he were (the lady in white) and of those who he feels have kept him from it (his father). These he overcomes one by one for a happy ending.

Periodically we are transported to the local television station, and here the satire becomes more biting, attacking government generally, bringing into focus the incredible stupidity of its ideals and priorities, in a style of thinking imitated from the Dewey Education System.

While the story is quite Molieresque, this section is much closer to Voltaire; it makes explicit all that is merely implied in the rest. Although the ideas are contemporary, the style is reminiscent of long ago; the play is like a Restoration comedy about pollution, with interjected passages by Swift about the need to eliminate people to arrive at a clean world.

It is really difficult to know what the author is trying to do in this play. Is he bitter? Is he laughing? Is he frightened at what is being done to his world? Does he care, or has he become too cynical? This is a very puzzling and uneven production now, because, in a strange way, it is today, but seen through the past, and projected 20 years ahead.

Flowers in the City. Central Central Library Theatre until Nov. 1. Tue. to Sun. 8:30 p.m. Sat. 2:30 p.m. Tickets $3.50 or $4 on weekends $2 with ATL.

Women writers: manifesting the insecurity of our times

Styles of Radical Will, Susan Sontag, Delta $2.95
 Toward A Radical Middle, Renata Adler, Random House $9.50
 Slouching toward Bethlehem, Joan Didion, Delta $2.35

In the wake of one of Gloria Steinem's solo jamborees on a talk show a while back, I was brooding over one of her blithe presumptions: That traditional differences between men and women will, after the Liberation, be seen to be cultural rather than biological or psychological.

Hop-scotching through history, from Shub-Ad and Sappho, I began to list eminent women. Not many artists or composers of first rank, though women of worldly affairs (empresses, influential consorts) seem to have been no less forceful and pragmatic than men; in academics, the dirty diggings of archaeology are theirs almost by default, and the few women to persist with scientific careers have been superb researchers.

There is yet another area, I realized, of female primacy — occasional journalism. Three collections, by Susan Sontag, Renata Adler, and Joan Didion, have lately appeared, happily pressing between permanent covers some of the best writing of the day.

Though Susan Sontag seems to think of style as something to be circumvented rather than pursued (her pieces appear in either a cademose or unworked, memo-book prose) she deserves some persistence. Styles of Radical Will, her second book of longish essays, shows her at her best in critical explorations.

Immensely erudite (perhaps outstripping even the formidably equipped Adler), she tracks down forerunners and influences of avant-garde techniques, no mere source-hunting, but a necessary step to put an experimental artist like Godard or John Cage in a context that makes criticism possible.

Film buffs will know Renata Adler's perceptive collection of reviews for the New York Times. A Year in the Dark, Toward a Radical Middle is a gathering of earlier works of reporting and criticism which allows us to see her developing style.

The earliest pieces (a dissection of the New Reviewers, a study of Rock Music) display basic Adler — a brevity which forces her to the heart of the matter and a fast, puckish style. Reporting the march at Selma, she almost defines the craft: A selective eye, a good ear which let the story tell itself. Her solidness and control in a long piece on group psycho-therapy is admirable; she discusses the large and complex theoretical background with perfect ease, never sliding into obtuse jargon or "for the layman" simplicities.

In more recent studies she puts her reporting into perspective with commentary. Her most highly developed traits — a contempt of shoddy, sham intellectualism, and a laser-beam wit — are pressed into service in "Radicalism in Debacle" about a leftist convention where "... delegates seemed constantly to emerge, wet-lipped and trembling, from some torrent of abuse, some marathonic misrepresentation of fact, some pointless totalitarian manoeuvre, some terminal sophistry to pronounce themselves 'radicalized.'" The convention dissolved into vicious ideological bickering. "... the delegates seemed to be not so much discussing a New Politics as croaking mating calls to one another from adjoining lily pads."

Toward a Radical Middle, despite the title, is not a rallying post for the silent majority. Only in the introduction does she consolidate her liberal-centrist position. She belongs to that generation which call neither bourbon nor pot their own, and which consider themselves the last custodians of language.

Some commitments are deep, such as to civil rights, and she reserves no greater scorn than for that "... radical movement born out of a corruption of the vocabulary of civil rights — pre-empting the terms of a truly oppressed minority and applying them to the situation of some bored children... at a middle class institution in California." She dismisses the New Left as "... contributing as much to... the problems of war, racism and poverty as a mean drunk to the workings of a fire brigade."

Joan Didion started writing the fluff women's journals traffic in, but she crystallized it into something subtle and delicate, like ice tracings on a window pane. Slouching towards Bethlehem begins with a piece, about a bizarre murder in Southern California, which might have been a true crime story.

She makes it an inquiry into "... what might have a woman who believed in the promises of the middle class — a woman who had been chairwoman of the heart fund, who always knew a reasonable little dressmaker and who had come out of the bleak world of prairie fundamentalism to find what she imagined to be the good life — what should drive such a woman... to look out her new picture window into the empty California sun and calculate how to hurt her husband alive in a Volkswagen."

There are interviews with Joan Baez and John Wayne, vignettes of almost photographic technique on a Maoist, on Vegas marriages. The title piece is a long look at Haight-Ashbury which does not sneer or rage but describes with resigned sadness the drugged, asphasic San Francisco "where the social hemorrhaging was showing up."

Though no formal politics or Christian ethic informs her work, Eidion is a conservative. A remarkable essay "On Morality" concludes, "You see I want to be quite obstinate about insisting that we have no way of knowing — beyond that fundamental loyalty to the social code — what is 'right' and what is 'wrong'... questions of almost anything... are all assigned these facitious moral burdens. There is something facile going on, some self-indulgence at work... When we start deceiving ourselves into thinking not that we want something or need something... but that it is a moral imperative that we have it, then is when we join the fashionable madmen, then is when the thin whine of hysteria is heard in the land, then is when we are in bad trouble. And I suspect that we are already there."

Didion is thus the best bet for a permanent niche in civilization, though her hope for its survival is scant.

—Bill MacVICAR

Those Were The Days, My Friend... Awakening!

By DIANE SHULMAN

The next time someone starts to lecture you with the line: "In the good old days . . .", take her to see "Spring Awakening". Maybe it will ring a bell.

SPRING AWAKENING is a poignant story of early adolescence, set late in the nineteenth century. It's really more like a dream or a memory than a play, fleeing from image to image, reawakening myriad overlapping scenes you'd swear you had forgotten. Thus it's a very subjective play: you laugh if you stay detached, but you cry if you don't.

The continuity and tension of the play contribute to its dream-like quality. Each "moment" is crucial, yet flows into the next. The physical setting of the stage does a great deal to accentuate this feeling; it is a small grassed square in the centre of the room, and must therefore be played in the round.

The smallness of the cast created definite problems. The play contains many different characters, and the numerous multiple characterizations, each played in the same costume, created some confusion in the minds of the audience.

Nevertheless, each character shows with startling clarity the joys and agonies of the early teens. Few remember the embarrassments, absurdities and real pain of grappling with emerging sexuality, a first crush, or growing responsibilities. The costumes are old fashioned, but most of the problems are still the same today: sexual ignorance, suicide, and a fatally botched abortion. The parents too have their problems, but they lack the tormented sincerity of those of their progeny, and therefore fade in comparison.

The ending was rather odd in comparison with the relentless realism of the rest of the play. One of the protagonists meets in a graveyard with the shade of one of his dead friends who offers him death and peace. But the meeting is shattered by the appearance of a mysterious Harlequin figure who offers trouble and excitement and life, and in the end carries the day. It is highly symbolic, but too different from the rest.

Thus, it's a rather uneven production, but go see it anyway. And take someone who thinks he remembers the good old days.

SPRING AWAKENING Theatre Passe Muraille, until Oct. 25. Thurs. thru Sun. 8:30 p.m. $2.50 or $1.50 with ATL.

Canadian Almanac copies American 'Big Brother'

The Canadian Whole Earth Almanac published by the whole earth foundation printed by new press $3 per issue, $9 per year

This book concerns anything you want to find out about — stalking herbs or game; buying land; growing plants or bees; what-you-eat-is-what-you-are; medicine; shelter; any kind of guide. It is the Canadian kid brother of the venerable Whole Earth Catalogue from the Portola Institute in Califantasieland.

Even though it's smaller than its rich relation, the Almanac's variety is greater and it tries to be as CANADIAN as possible. It includes sources of information on: housing co-ops (tabulated by province); the Manual for Draft-Age Immigrants to Canada; the Arctic Institute of North America, whose home-base is Montreal; Paradise Below Zero, by Calvin Rustrum, who is "a true northern freak"; and a magnificent recipe for Ukrainian borsch, and more Canadian than that you cannot get.

There is a conditional objection to The Canadian Whole Earth Almanac. The whole thing is a political con game, dream book, or even worse, daydream book. While categories are by definition made up of editorial fragments, bits and pieces of endless inventory, this particular one is also blighted by a kind of ideological ragpicking disease. There are taxes to be paid and work to be done and elections to be voted in and wars to be fought and peace or pieces to be maintained and what business do grown men have mooning over a book that talks about making yogurt (p. 72) or which itself reviews such books as Altered States of Consciousness (p. 112) or Stalking the Blue-Eyed Scallops? (p. 16)?

The objection is irrelevant. It's the old argumentum ad hominem, suggesting that the explicit and exact purposes of the editors are compromised by the possible use to which an individual reader may put their book. Some people may moon over this book, or may use it as a substitute for action; but that isn't to say some other people won't find it the mustard seed which bears ineffable fruit.

Let me quote from an essay by "Marcia of Morninglory" (pp. 54-59) "What you eat is what you are": "Our first garden (3 gardens ago) was because we loved plants, and were living in the city with our heads in the country. So we planted the little back yard of the flat and watched them grow. The eating was an additional surprise."

"The food was real. Each step in learning how our bodies behave with different foods serves mainly to show us how many more steps there are to take."

"It is only a beginning. We've learned thus far that the most important food of all is love."

And this, from a notice of the Land Fellowship, in Smithville, Ontario (p. 40): "The Land Fellowship is a Canada-wide association of those who are concerned with the close relationship between soil, plants, animals, and man. They welcome all who share this concern. They welcome all who seek solutions to the ever-growing problems of environmental pollution and poisoning of soil, air, water, and food. Whether you approach these problems as a farmer, amateur gardener, doctor, scientist, housewife, parent, teacher, clergyman, naturopath, chiropractor, physio-therapist, or as a thinking citizen, as long as you are seeking biological and ecological solutions to the problems of life, then you are welcome to the association."

To put the matter as exactly as the editors of this book have done, The Canadian Whole Earth Almanac teaches us that we are part of nature and that utopia begins in harmony with nature, living begins in survival, and our humanity begins in being-at-ease-as-animals.

If these lessons are the stuff of dreams, which I doubt, the dreams are the only ones worth having. — DAVID COLLINS

David Mirvish Gallery is to exert pressure on art scene in Canada

There is so much talk about "relevance", today. So much in fact that one might be mistakenly led to believe that the people who mouth such sentiments held concomitant values of efficiency, social utility, work, and the aesthetics of social realism, pure construction or something in between. But the problem seldom reaches serious discussion, which is why I think it is useful to remember that "relevance", social value, and the value of art were exactly the issues raised in the beginnings of the New York School. It was in intense reaction to their own self-consciousness that painters like Kline, Pollock, Rothko, Hofmann, et al. so radically altered their means and in reaction to them that Kelly, Newman, Noland, et al so radically altered theirs.

These men in fact diverted the course of art history, and by virtue of United States wealth and influence made it an, or rather THE, international style. All of this however is available to the curious reader in far more places than the Varsity Review, but it is mentioned to put into perspective just how much of an event the David Mirvish Gallery is in Toronto.

When a Canadian art historian sets to work he must usually keep in mind at least a ten year time lag for Canada, at least before the first world war, and after the advent of the Group of Seven he might as well throw the clock away. Only with the fifties and the awareness of Something-In-New York did Canadian art bridge some of the time gap, even if it was only bridged with the likes of William Ronald and Harold Town. But for better or otherwise things pushed ahead and the annual or better visit, or the six month study in N.Y., became a regular feature in the biographies of leading Canadian artists. Some moved from Canada completely and a few even established American dealers. Others such as Ronald Bloore experienced the real thing on Canadian soil when the Miracle of Emma Lake occurred replete with Barnett Newman, Kenneth Noland, and the critical guns of Clement Greenberg.

What the David Mirvish Gallery means however is that Canadian art must now either stand on its own or see itself for what it is in the present tense (if you are interested in my opinion it is presently a large number of air mail stamps at the Carmen Lamana Gallery). Instead of reading Michael Fried on the Recent painting of Kenneth Noland we will walk over to Markam Village and have the object itself to supplement our opinion and Mr. Fried's valuable, if garrulous, remarks. It means direct economic competition for every dealer who is not framing or selling prints, on one of the larger scales in North America. For what little critical opinion that does exist in Canada the gallery offers a chance to broaden the Canadian critic's eye. Going from Kenneth Noland's "Double Zone" to the Yves Gaucher exhibit at Gallery Moos, who is now using a related method of composition, it is clear at a glance that Gaucher does not stand up. This does not mean dismissing Canadian art but it will offer us the chance to see ourselves and the quality of our culture in a less parochial way; it is a measuring stick.

The great problem in this stick however is the time at which it comes. In his "John Power Lecture" Clement Greenberg says that one might begin dating the present Noland-Stella-Olitski style of Post Painterly Abstraction with Ellsworth Kelly's 1955 exhibit in New York and that our now prevalent low-contrast, smoothly textured, highly linear style of painting slowly gained in strength after 1962 i.e. when it became a style. This is to say that both Post Painterly Abstraction and Denise Rene, Vasarely, Claisse, have been with us a fair length of time, and there is beginning to be something predictable in the style.

As beautifully done as the Mirvish Gallery is it all very "expected" somehow, and far too "right". If there are to be a few more years left to Post Painterly Abstraction the interesting phase should come when whatever is about to replace this is brought in. How will such an economically successful venture like the Mirvish Gallery adapt to change? Will change come through people like Michael Steiner or will the enterprise recede into a type of Greenbergian academism? If the Mirvish Gallery will act as a catalyst to critical thought, at least qualitatively, it will also be bearing a good deal of criticism itself. It's ability to create taste will be (and is) considerable; the kind of thing that makes arbiters happy and serious on-lookers depressed.

Yet all of this is not news. It is in fact a situation that has been with us for the past few years. But the opening of such a splendid gallery makes it all "official" and the level has been allowed to find itself — at a very high altitude. With Jack Pollock's connections in international graphics (it is very rarely mentioned in circles that should know better how a really fine Ellsworth Kelly print or the unusually good Hepworth can be purchased at Pollock's amid the Mary Schneiders and the Cathy Sennitt-Harbi-sons) and David Mirvish's umbilical cord to New York, Toronto, such as it is, the centre of art in Canada, has been offered a slow but thorough process of maturation.

Vertigo '70 activity begins Fri.

Vertigo '70, a student-run "learn-in" on the position of drugs in society, starts its multi-faceted program this Friday, when selected Health Science students head for Algonquin Park for a weekend workshop.

Organized by the U of T Medical Society, Vertigo aims especially at Health Science students, "the future legal peddlers of drugs", but also welcomes participation by all students.

Formal events start next week with a wide array of films, speakers, theatre and discussion:

- Daytop Village, a New York drug treatment centre, will present The Concept, a psychodrama on drug addiction and an off-Broadway hit, nightly at the OCE auditorium next week.

- films will be screened daily at the Medical Sciences Building from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. There will be an all-night film festival Oct. 23.

- The evening sessions will feature speakers including Alexander Shulgin, the world's leading psychotropic drug researcher, Joel Fort, a San Francisco drug expert, Helen Nowlis, a University of Rochester psychologist, and Erich Goode, a New York sociologist.

- the Wednesday night session will feature a panel discussion with Bob Barkwell, from the Student Health Organization of U of T, Friar Tuck, from the Rochdale Clinic, and health service experts from U of T, McGill, and the University of British Columbia.

Rowers win Brock meet, lead OQAA standings

By BILL ALLISON
Braving bad weather, as well as fierce competition from rival Canadian and American schools, Toronto oarsmen scored a convincing victory at the Brock Invitational Regatta on Saturday. The prestige events, Lightweight and Senior Varsity, were both taken by Toronto in tight races against Brock and Western with the remaining crews being totally outclassed in these events.

Toronto's victory in the latter event was a creditable performance, since Western's crew is composed of eight veteran heavyweights, giving them an advantage in leverage and muscle if not in experience.

The freshmen and junior Varsity crews improved on last week's performance, again finishing third in both events, but much closer to the winners. Another week's training should put these two crews on top of their competition.

The crews journey to Western next Saturday, where it will be determined if Toronto can maintain its slim 40 point lead over an aroused Western team.

At present the OQAA points standings are: Toronto 140; Western 100; Brock and Mac 50.

Library denies

By CARLEY McDONALD
Can female library employees at U of T wear pants? Their answer is a resounding "no - it's not permitted", even though rumour has it that last Monday the prohibition on pants came to a glorious, liberated end.

However, according to the Assistant Librarian for Personnel

However, according to the Assistant Librarian for Personnel at Sigmund Samuel, Michael McCahill, both the staff's conception of the rules and this rumour are false. He stated that "there has never been any rule against pantsuits" which are a "generally accepted" mode of fashion in the business world today.

Stressing that the library was reluctant to legislate attire, he said that no notices were ever sent out concerning dress, and thus, that some employees might misinterpret library policy. Mr. McCahill also implied that employees were practising self-constraint.

However, many employees feel that bosses expect "femininity" in attire, as one librarian called it.

One memo posted in the Sigmund Samuel library read: "The employees should be dressed suitably avoiding on the one hand the style that is degage and on the other a fashion that is outre."

Varsity golfers finish sixth in

OQAA championships

Varsity's golf team of George Scott, Bob Kennedy, Geoff Gollish, Frank Crean and Kevin Hughes finished in sixth place in the OQAA championships held last Thursday and Friday at Western with a two-round team total of 637.

Waterloo and Queen's ended the competition in a tie for first place with a team score of 608 and were declared co-winners of the Rutlan Cup.

Waterloo were the defending champions.

The McCall Trophy for the low individual went to Western's Kerry Short who took a sudden-death playoff from Waterloo's Dave Hollinger on the first extra hole.

Both players had finished the two rounds deadlocked at 149.

Kennedy had the best round for the Varsity team on Thursday as he carded a 77 while on Friday Scott's 77 was lowest.

Blues blank Warriors, remain undefeated

Tackle Queen's in Kingston Saturday

By LYNDON LITTLE

In sharp contrast to the style of their first two league games, the football Blues ground past the punchless Waterloo Warriors 27-0 last Friday night to keep their undefeated record intact at two victories and a tie.

The Varsity win, coupled with Queen's impressive 44-11 trouncing of the McGill Redmen Saturday afternoon left Blues alone in first place in the SIFL race and sets the stage for this weekend's showdown with Tindall's Gaels in Kingston.

AFTER THREE WEEKS of action, Blues hold down top spot with five points. Queen's and Western (winners 31-9 over Mac on Saturday) are tied for second with four points each while McGill has three, MacMaster two and Waterloo none.

"Sure we were a bit flat for this one," said Blues' head coach Ron Murphy after the Waterloo game. "But after the big win over Queen's the week before it was natural to have a little letdown."

Against Walt Delahey's Warriors, the Varsity defense was so dominant that the closest Waterloo scrimmage to the Blues' goal line was the 25 — and that was on the last play of the game!

Blues offence, with Wayne Dunkley at the helm, showed just as much as they needed to win.

They looked extremely effective in spots, but each Varsity score — four touchdowns and a single — was set up by a turnover by Blues' defense.

In all, Blues' defense grabbed off five errant Waterloo aeriels and recovered one fumble.

Peter McNabb, the rookie defensive back from Trinity College School, continued his outstanding play as he picked off three of the interceptions. Stew McSween had two while rookie quarterback Bob Billinghurst, who was starting his second game as a defensive back, grabbed the other.

BLUES' MAJORS came on a nifty 29 yard ramble by Cor Doret on the first play of the second quarter, a three-yard plunge by fullback Glen Markle a few minutes later, an eight-yard Dunkley to Mike Brierley pass in the third and another short dive by Markle in the fourth.

Halfback Bill Stankovic, who didn't see any action at running back because of a broken hand, converted two of the touchdowns and punter Peter Van Bodegom kicked a 44-yard single to complete the scoring.

McNabb's three interceptions led directly to Varsity scores — Doret's opening TD, Markle's first touchdown and Van Bodegom's single.

McSween's second interception set up Markle's final major while Brian Sickle's recovery of a Bill Hogan fumble deep in Waterloo territory resulted in the Dunkley to Brierley pass.

Dunkley, starting his first league game at quarterback, completed 13 of 16 passes for 132 yards.

"He played extremely well for us," said Murphy after the game, "and his play selection was excellent."

Split end John Chapman was Dunkley's favorite target as the speedy receiver hauled in six passes for 64 yards.

Doret, who was Blues' leading rusher with 73 yards on 11 carries, scored his touchdown on the prettiest play of the game.

THE SOPHOMORE from Runnymede Collegiate, started a sweep to the left side. When the Waterloo defense closed it off, he reversed his field and then cut up the middle.

After picking up a key block by left guard Derek Turner, he shook a couple of weak tackles and outraced the secondary to the goal line.

In terms of scoring touchdowns, Chapman continued to be Blues' hard-luck player.

In the game against Queen's the week before, Chapman was hauled down from behind on the one-yard line. Against the Warriors, he was stopped once again on the one and on a second occasion missed a major when he slipped and let his knee touch two yards short of the Waterloo goal line.

Rick Cheevers, who blocked two converts, and halfback Bill Hogan, who picked up 73 yards rushing, were Waterloo's top performers.

Blues picked up an incredible total of 159 yards in penalties. A repeat performance against Queen's could be disastrous!

Blues Notes — For Blues' star center Rich Agro, who was forced to sit out the Waterloo game with a knee injury, it was the first game he has missed in a career that includes high-school and three college teams. . . Markle's pair of TD's pushed him into a tie with McGill's flanker Peter Bender for the SIFL scoring title with five touchdowns each. . . In action out west last weekend, the U of Alberta Golden Bears dropped from the ranks of the undefeated as they were beaten by fellow Albertans, U of Calgary Dinosaurs, 20-10. UBC Thunderbirds won their first league game as they downed Sask. Huskies 9-8 out on the west coast. . .

. . . At Western, they've instituted an individual awards programme for their football team. The outstanding offensive and defensive player of previous games — as voted by the players themselves — receive purple horseshoes to paste on their helmets!

Harrier team wins

York Invitational;

Yeomen are second

The Varsity Harrier team won the York Invitational cross-country race last Saturday in the mud at York U.

The five-man Toronto squad won the team championship over the 5 1/4-mile course by compiling the lowest score of 36.

The host York team was second with 50, ahead of Laurentian with 61 and Guelph with 64.

The Varsity — Doug Fraser

With linebacker Hartley Stern leading the way, Blues rookie defensive back Peter McNabb heads towards the Waterloo goal line. He was knocked out of bounds on the Waterloo eight but three plays later, fullback Glen Markle scored a touchdown.

Meet Carlton in final

Net Blues win western title

Winning 28 of their 30 matches, the Varsity tennis team of Don Steele, Peter Chow, Brad Robinson and Terry McNally slammed their way into the OQAA net final by taking the western-zone play-offs at Western University last weekend.

The net Blues, defending conference champs, will now face Carleton University in the OQAA final this Saturday, also at Western U.

Carleton won the eastern-zone tournament held at McGill.

In the western-zone playdowns, the host Western team was a close second to Varsity with 26 match victories while Guelph and Waterloo were tied for a distant third with nine each.

In addition to the team championship, Varsity also took the individual singles and doubles competition.

Steele, a fourth-year student at Vic, defeated Western's No. 1 singles player, Gord Clarke, 8-6, 6-8, 6-2 for the singles title and then teamed with Chow to take the doubles from Clarke and Will Hawryliw 9-6 in a tie-breaker set. Marinus Wins, Carleton's top-rated singles player will be Steele's opponent in the singles final.

Last year, Wins was defeated by Varsity's Paul Kent in the title match.

The No. 1 doubles team for the tennis Ravens has not been announced.

Toronto team members credit the stiff workouts with former Canadian Davis Cup star Harry Faquier on the hard-surface Davistown Tennis Club courts for the necessary edge for the narrow victory at London.

Varsity Chinese soccer kings

The University of Toronto "A" team became the first winners of the Chinese students invitational soccer tournament as they defeated McMaster University 5-1 in the final Sunday afternoon at Varsity Stadium before a large and appreciative audience.

Besides two teams from Varsity, there were representative sides from four other Ontario universities — McMaster, Western, Queen's and U of Ottawa — gathered for the two-day event organized under the auspices of the Chinese Overseas Student Association.

ciation.

Patrick Fung was the scoring hero for the victorious host Toronto team as he booted three goals in the final. Joseph Wong and Dave Chien picked up the other two Varsity goals in the cleanly played and exciting contest.

Joseph Lau notched the lone McMaster tally.

The six teams were divided into two groups. There was round-robin play within each group with the two winners meeting in the final.

The Varsity "A" team emerged as the champions of their group with 7-0 and 4-0 triumphs over Ottawa and Western respectively.

Mac gained the final with a 6-2 victory over the Toronto "B" side and a 11-0 whitewashing of Queen's.

Tournament organizers are hopeful that this can become an annual event.

Soccer, Rugger teams try again at McMaster

Varsity's Soccer and Rugger teams will try to get back on the winning track today as they travel to McMaster.

After a loss and a tie in their first two league games, Bob Nicol's soccer team needs a big victory if they are to retain any hope of a Blackwood Trophy for 1970.

It was McMaster who defeated the soccer team at Varsity Stadium late last year to ruin Blues chances of a six-straight OQAA title. So the soccer squad could gain a measure of revenge with a victory.

The rugger Blues, coached by Graeme Wynn, are the defending conference champs but have lost both of their first two league games to Guelph and Western.

GREAT DEALS FINEST SERVICE

'Overstaffing' will be hit

Secret letter warns of cutbacks

A secret letter written by Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen warns that serious money-saving measures will be implemented in the faculty in the very near future.

Students and faculty will likely face substantial increases in the size of classes and the teaching load of faculty, as well as cutbacks in the number of teaching staff employed.

Dean Allen's letter was written in response to a request this summer from President Claude Bissell to point out areas in which Arts and Science could decrease its spending.

Allen's reply hit several areas:

- student-teacher ratios could be upped, and 'unprofitable' courses could be discontinued.

Allen pointed out that to "pay" for itself a course should have an enrollment of 39 students or more.

He suggested that the idea that small group teaching — especially in language courses — could be re-examined and a "complete change of approach" adopted.

- in departments which are "overstaffed", faculty may have to be fired.

Allen writes that to help achieve "a reduction in the number of uneconomically and unnecessarily small classes," several "painful" measures may have to be taken.

According to the letter, these would include:

- compulsory retirement at the age of 65 for all faculty,

- no further appointments anywhere, including the expanding Scarborough and Erindale campuses,

- a three-year warning to all non-tenured staff that their chances of getting permanent jobs are "remote".

- adding Extension course teaching duties to faculty without further compensation.

In the case of courses which attract few students, but which are considered "sufficiently desirable" to keep offering, Allen suggests such courses could be given only once every two or three years. Instructors could be required to accept a heavier teaching load, "because of the greater ease of teaching very small classes."

An effort should also be made, Allen wrote, to effect the "integration and coordination of the course offerings of all divisions of the university."

Allen's letter continues:

"These steps — critical examination of the need for specific small or redundant courses, consolidation of course offerings, and reductions in staff where feasible and warranted — can be taken within this Faculty, and the whole question will be under close examination this year, as last."

A final suggestion in the letter is that faculty on the St. George campus could be required to assume extra responsibilities on the Erindale and Scarborough campuses, where enrollment is steadily rising.

Allen's letter, which was circulated to all department heads in arts and science and other ranking administrators, has touched sensitive nerves among several faculty.

Since many professors are now involved in planning courses for next year, they are worried by the implications of the plans Bissell and Allen have launched for cutbacks.

Further, of course, faculty fear increased teaching loads, increased class sizes, and possible loss of their jobs.

In one of the departments designated as "overstaffed", Geology chairman E.W. Nuffield commented in this way on proposed cutbacks in budgetary allotments:

"We can't spare the money, it's as simple as that. We're not being extravagant."

Nuffield also commented that Dean Allen was looking at the situation "pretty wisely and we would have to accept his judgment."

Urbanologist attacks Expressway supporters

By ERIC MILLS

"It's often said that people get the government they deserve. I don't think we're that bad," said urbanologist, Jane Jacobs, in a hard-hitting attack on the supporters of the Spadina Expressway last night.

Jacobs, well known author of Life and Death of Great American Cities, was speaking to over 900 people at a rally on the birthday of the Stop Spadina — Save Our City Co-ordinating Committee (SSSOCCC) at Convocation Hall.

Claiming that the hearings last March on the expressway were fixed, she said "it's frightening when governors are cynical about their own democratic forms."

Jacobs also criticized Ontario Municipal Affairs Minister, Darcy McKeough, who said earlier this week that it is too late to stop the Spadina. She thought it was strange that he would say that just before an Ontario board was going to review the project.

In studying other anti-expressway fights, she noted two fallacies in strategy. First was the notion that citizens win fights "by being nice, by trying to be popular with the people doing them in".

The second mistake was that opponents were too inclined to look at the big picture, instead of fighting specific issues.

"I'm convinced that this is the way to change the big picture; by fighting and winning specific battles."

Marshall McLuhan, who with Mrs. Jacobs, contributed to "The Burning Wound", an anti-expressway film premiered last night, was unable to attend.

However he sent a message congratulating SSSOCCC on its first birthday. He said that "weak egos are afraid to use mass transit."

Earlier, SSSOCCC chairman Alan Powell said that the short term objectives of publicizing, educating, pressuring and thereby delaying have been achieved. SSSOCCC now intends to indulge in reflection of the lessons learned in fighting Spadina, as well as preparing for the Ontario Municipal Board Hearings.

Bulletin

A group of U of T students constituted themselves as the Quebec Action Committee last night and issued the following statement:

"Canada is facing its biggest political and social crisis since 1837.

"The federal government is choking off the Quebec independence struggle with an unprecedented wave of repression. Premier Robarts has already described the situation as one of "total war".

"We expect that the repressive backlash will be felt right across English Canada, including the universities.

"We call on U of T students to hold meetings in their colleges, departments, and classrooms to discuss the current crisis and its implications here."

Labourers protest Bill 167 at Queen's Park

By LAURA KELLY

Approximately 15,000 labourers massed before the Ontario Parliament building Wednesday to shout their protests against Bill 167, a proposed amendment to the Labour Relations Act.

Crowds of men in working clothes and hard hats stood stomach to back before the Queen's Park steps, shared a noon-hour bottle, and heckled or applauded the various speakers.

Major objections of the working men to Bill 167 are:

No province in Canada requires the new bill's 65% minimum requirement of workers' signatures for union certification.

—It makes "threatening" an unlawful strike an offence with a $10,000 penalty.

—The formation of an Industrial Inquiry Commission to investigate protracted disputes, but which could serve as a means for employers to circumvent negotiation.

—Failure to give all professional groups collective bargaining rights.

Bill 167 is the result of two years of legislative research work.

Dalton Bales, Ontario Minister of Labour, attempted a defense of the bill, but was repeatedly drowned out by angry workers, many of whom had travelled from as far as Sudbury to demonstrate.

"Bill 167 is meant to develop more formal bargaining units," said Bales.

"The employers' councils will cause increased stability in the union. This bill is not intended as an attack on the building trades union," he said.

Cries of "Out, out, out," boomed back from the crowd.

Stephen Lewis, the new NDP leader, found the crowd more receptive than Bales did.

Lewis described Bill 167 as a government attempt at "straitjacketing free collective bargaining," and isolating trade unions for political advantage.

"You are citizens of the province of Ontario and the government must realize that the objectives of working men and women are in the best harmony with the objectives of Ontario," shouted Lewis.

Lewis called for a defeat of the Progressive Conservatives in 1971 as the final answer to anti-labour laws.

David Archer, President of the Ontario Federation of Labour, echoed the political pressure with the threat "Either get rid of this bill or we'll get rid of you."

SMC road widening is back in committee

By MARIS PAVELSON
Toronto City Council voted Wednesday to refer the question of the proposed widening of St. Jo-

York pres. is cowed; sit-in off

York University president, David Slater, cowed by the threats of militant students, has abandoned his tough-line stance concerning the release of figures on the citizenship of new faculty.

In a statement issued Wednesday, Slater called for an emergency meeting of the York University Senate for next Wednesday, at which he will plead with the Senate to release the citizenship figures.

Only last Friday, Slater turned his thumbs down on a student request for such a Senate meeting.

The dramatic change in the president's posture was prompted by a threat from the York branch of the Canadian Liberation Movement to occupy his office.

Appeased somewhat by Slater's about-face, the students have agreed to postpone the sit-in until the results of next Wednesday's Senate session are known.

seph St. back to the Public Works Committee.

This will effectively suspend work on the street at least until Oct. 26 when the Public Works Committee has its next meeting.

About 30 members of SMC watched Council vote 18-3 in favour of a motion from Ward 6 Alderman, Horace Brown, that the matter be referred back to the Works Committee.

Marks was the sponsor of an alternate motion that Father John Kelly of St. Michael's College be allowed the floor to speak to all the aldermen present.

"It strikes me that we will have very little clarification unless we all hear it together," said Mrs. Marks, referring to the fact that most aldermen would not be present at the Works committee meeting.

The motion was defeated 16-5. If it had carried, Father Kelly (who really was not prepared to make a formal presentation at the time) would have spoken and work on St. Joseph probably would have resumed, making the widening of the street a fait accompli.

SMC students were generally pleased by the reprieve given their street. Harvey Fox, spokesman for the Do It In The Road Committee, said, "As long as the issue is alive, there's hope." The postponement might save St. Joseph St. at least until spring if, in two weeks, weather conditions for such work are prohibitive.

Marks has favoured widening the street. Asked if she might change her vote after the Works committee meeting, she said, "If there's no new information, I'll be voting as I did before."

According to Fox, there will be new information, including a 10-hour traffic survey of St. Joseph St.

Indeed, the information will have to be novel for most aldermen don't put much stock into the idea that the widening would erode the university community.

Bookroom drops Red paper

By MARINA STRAUSS

The University Bookroom refused last week to sell the Canadian Tribune, the Canadian Communist Party newspaper.

"We have to draw the line somewhere," explained Mrs. C. M. O'Marr, a clerk at the Bookroom. "The papers of this sort that we have now are not moving. It was not rejected for political reasons," Mrs. O'Marr added.

D. C. Stimpson, manager of the Bookroom, said that newspapers and magazines are chosen on the grounds of saleability. "The Canadian Tribune was offered to us at a bad time. It is infrequent that we refuse to carry a paper."

Amongst publications available at the Bookroom are the International Times, Private Eye, Guerilla, and Harbinger. But Stimpson can not get hold of all the papers he wants. He wrote to the Los Angeles Free Press, an underground newspaper, but didn't get a reply. And papers like The Black Panther are simply illegal in Canada.

The major problem, however, is the censorship at the border. "I find it intolerable the way the Canadian customs act as the official censor of stuff coming into the country. The easiest solution is not to have censorship at all," urged Stimpson.

The April, May, and June 1970 issues of the Evergreen Review were not initially allowed into the country at the customs because of a section of photographs, although the shipment did get through a few months later.

And Stimpson repeatedly commented: "Why should there be an official censor in this country?"

Alan Guettel, a communist club member, agreed with Stimpson.

"The Bookstore is not in the position of losing money in this matter. Everything should be exposed to the public. It's a matter of free speech."

SAC won't cut Varsity budget

By IAN MacLAREN

By a margin of one vote SAC voted Wednesday night to increase its grant to the Varsity by $7,400.

The Finance Commission had earlier proposed to cut back the subsidy by $7,400, but Varsity editor-in-chief, David Frank, and others managed to persuade the Council that the paper would not survive such a cut.

By allocating the additional $7,000 the SAC contingency fund sagged to approximately -$4,000.

Charles St. W. rumored as next U of T victim of Spadina widenings

The news of the SMC fight for St. Joseph St. has prompted speculation that Charles St. W. may be the next university artery to be widened.

Charles St. W. splits the Victoria College Campus in much the same way as St. Joseph splits SMC.

However, N. Vardin, Supervisor of the Planning and Programming

Section, Dept. of Public Works, insists it is "just a rumour."

Vic President J. E. Hodgetts says that he has heard nothing "either officially or unofficially" about a widening.

But according to Hodgetts, the threat "is always there as people begin to move in on St. Joseph St."

The only promise he has from the City is that Charles St. "will certainly never be closed off."

Rod Hurd, SAC President, asked whether the high percentage of advertising in this year's issues was due to a shortage of copy from the Varsity staff. Frank assured him that Varsity always needs staff but that so far there has been no copy shortage.

Brian Hayes, Communications Commissioner re-entered the meeting and declaimed to his surprise, "Are they still talking about the motherfucker?"

Frank said, "To undermine something like the Varsity would be dealing a serious blow to people interested in communicating and providing information."

He pointed out that without the full grant it was unlikely that the Varsity would continue past Christmas. This brought the question to the floor.

Bill 167 threatens workers' rights

Fifteen thousand workers from all over Ontario assembled at Queen's Park Wednesday to demand a very simple and basic right — the right to organize into unions.

Led by the Ontario Federation of Labour, they were protesting the Conservative government's proposed labour legislation, Bill 167.

The bill is based on recommendations prepared by a one-man Royal Commission run by Ivan C. Rand. In his report, Rand pointed out that government and police actions and court injunctions used against striking employees had caused great "bitterness against the employer and the public authorities."

There was, Rand lamented, "a reaction of strong community protest against what was felt to be...outrageous interference with legitimate activity of striking employees."

The main recommendations put forward by Rand were not to strengthen the rights of unions to wage their battle against their employers, but the very opposite.

His major suggestion was to set up an "Industrial Tribunal" which would have almost complete control over strike actions in the province — from censoring the wording of picket signs to deciding whether or not a strike could continue. The Tribunal's powers would be backed up with heavy fines.

Bill 167 provides for a skeleton structure for such a Tribunal, although the government, proceeding timidly, does not dare go the whole way yet.

The Bill attempts to limit the rights of workers in several ways:

- it raises the percentage of workers required to obtain union certification in a place of work from 55 to 65 per cent. No other province in Canada requires such a high percentage.
- it lowers the percentage of workers needed to initiate decertification from 50 to 35 per cent.
- it makes it illegal to "threaten" what the government calls an "unlawful" strike. Fines for violations of the act would be increased ten-fold, to $10,000 for unions and to $1,000 for individuals.
- it allows employers in the construction industry to band together formally (instead of informally as they now do) to use their collective power to break a strike or enforce an unsatisfactory agreement.
- The most serious threat to the effectiveness of unions is represented by the so-called "job-guarantee" amendment included in the bill.

The Minister of Labour, Dalton Bales, explained this provision this way:

"Workers involved in legal strikes

On the Line — Waterloo

will be guaranteed the right to return to their job at any time for a period of six months following the beginning of a strike."

The effect of this recommendation would be to place a powerful strikebreaking tool in the hands of employers. Already, the hiring of scab labour during strikes is an odious practice. But to set up a six-month deadline — after which a worker would likely not be allowed to return to his job — introduces a threat of legally sanctioned reprisals against workers who choose to organize against an employer.

Bill 167 represents the first steps of a government heavily supported by the employing class of this province — the contractors, factory-owners, entrepreneurs — to crush the ability of the people of Ontario to demand and obtain their just share of the wealth of this province.

Trudeau on law'n order

This is a conversation recorded by CBC reporter Tim Ralfe with Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau earlier this week. Not a word has been changed.

TRUDEAU: "I think society must take means to prevent the emergence of a parallel power which defies the elected power in this country. I think that goes to any distance.

"So long as there is a power in here which is challenging the elected representatives of the people, I think that power must be stopped. It's only weak-kneed bleeding hearts who aren't prepared to take these methods.

RALFE: "I would prefer to maintain 'a free and democratic society' rather than one that relies on soldiers carrying guns.

TRUDEAU: "That isn't my choice, obviously, you know. I think it's more important to get rid of those who are committing violence against the total society and those who are trying to run the Government through a parallel power by establishing their authority by kidnapping and blackmail.

"And I think it's our duty as a Government to protect Government officials and important people in our society against being used as tools in this blackmail. Now you don't agree with this, but I'm sure that once again with hindsight you would probably have found it preferable if Mr. Cross and Mr. Laporte had been protected from kidnapping, which they weren't because these steps which we're taking now weren't taken.

"Well, there are a lot of bleeding hearts around that just don't like to see people with helmets and guns. All I can say is: 'Go on and bleed.' But it's more important to keep law and order in society than to be worried about weak-kneed people who don't like the looks of an army."

RALFE: "At any cost? How far would you go with that?"
TRUDEAU: "Just watch me."

Man's last will and testament

A time capsule whose contents include vials of DDT, Don River water, and magnetic tapes of noise pollution, was enclosed in a small coffin and carried from Pollution Probe headquarters to the Humanities Research Library Site at noon Wednesday. There, it was lowered into the concrete and steel crypt.

The purpose of the time capsule is to warn other civilizations of the disasters of pollution. The bronze plaque on the wall of the crypt states, "In the hope that it be found by a civilization wiser than our own, we have buried here a record of man's folly on the planet he's outgrown."

THE MANIFESTO OF THE QUEBEC LIBERATION FRONT OR WHAT THAT REVOLUTION IN QUEBEC IS ALL ABOUT

(FOOTNOTES)

1 The Front de Libération du Québec is not the Messiah, nor a modern-day Robin Hood. It is a group of working people of Quebec who are committed to do everything they can for the people of Quebec to take their destiny in their hands.

2 The Front de Libération du Québec is a movement not of aggression, but of response to aggression — the aggression organized by high finance through the marionettes of the federal and provincial governments (the Brinks 'show', Bill 63, the electoral map, the so-called "social progress" (sic) tax, Power Corporation, Doctor's Insurance, the men of Lapalme ...).

3 The Front de Libération du Québec is a movement not of aggression, but of response to aggression — the aggression organized by high finance through the marionettes of the federal and provincial governments (the Brinks 'show', Bill 63, the electoral map, the so-called "social progress" (sic) tax, Power Corporation, Doctor's Insurance, the men of Lapalme ...).

4 The Front de Libération du Québec finances itself by voluntary (sic) taxes taken from the corporations which exploit the working people (banks, finance companies, etc. ...).

5 "The moneyed powers of the status quo, the majority of the traditional guardians of our people, have gotten the reaction they hoped for: the step backward, rather than the change we have worked for as never before, for which we are going to continue working." — René Lévesque, April 29, 1970.

2 Québécois: The French people of Quebec and those who have joined them. The term should be taken to exclude: Anglo-Saxons until they show they should be included; French Canadians who have already shown they should be excluded. "I do not consider Pierre-Elliott Trudeau a Québécois. Stanley Gray is." (Pierre Bourgois)

3 Do not use translation "Quebeckers", invented by English newspapers in Quebec, which implies that descendants of the garrison have as much right as anybody else to live here.

3 The Brinks 'show'. Early Sunday morning, two days before the April 29 election, Royal Trust paraded nine Brinks armored trucks up to the front of their CIL skyscraper on Dorchester Boulevard (They always used the garage entrance before) and appeared to load "securites" into them. Coincidentally, Gazette photographers appeared on the deserted street. Loaded with fleeing capital, the trucks roared off to the Ontario border, past waiting English TV camera crews. Almost all of the half-dozen French directors of Royal Trust's twenty-seven-man board are Quebec Liberal party wheels.

3 Bill 63, October 1969. The mass demonstrations (useless) will be remembered. Entitled "A law to promote the use of French," Bill 63 had as its only operative clause a legislative guarantee that anyone in Quebec could send his children to an English school whenever he wanted at state expense.

3 Electoral map. Heavily weighted against urban workers.

3 "Social progress" tax: Blatantly 'regressive' tax by federal government, admittedly for it to pay its share of medicare schemes. Drains $200 million a year out of Quebec as long as Quebec has no medicare.

3 Power Corporation: The frankness ends with the name. A huge conglomerate owning most of Quebec's media, a big slice of Quebec's finance company loan shark network, and countless other things great and small.

3 Doctor's Insurance: i.e. "medicare".

3 The men of Lapalme: I am not sure the importance of this was understood, it refers to a desperate interim victory of ruling class rollback earlier this year. The state sector of the economy is required to do the dirty work when an attack on real wage levels has to be mounted; in Quebec this meant the federal post office swathing its most militant union. It did this by cancelling its "contract" with a dummy subcontracting firm (Lapalme) it had previously set up and for which Les Gars de Lapalme worked. They had a long history of struggle and not too many hangups about violence. Mail trucks were damaged, garage doors were blocked, scabs were treated firmly, etc. At a seven-figure cost in rent-a-cops, etc (Mil policemen's brotherhood refused to moonlight as scab-protectors) Kierans persevered. Les Gars de Lapalme have still not disbanded (about 400 in all); they still meet every day at Paul Sauve arena.

6 We believed, once, that it was worth the effort to channel our energies, our impatience which René Lévesque expresses so well, within the Parti Québécois; but the Liberal victory shows clearly that what is called a democracy in Quebec is, and always has been, nothing but the 'democracy' of the rich. The Liberals' victory in this way is nothing but the victory of the Simard-Cotroni election riggers. As a result, British parliamentarism is finished, and the Front de Libération du Québec will never let itself be diverted by the electoral crumbs which the Anglo-Saxon capitalists toss into the Québécois lower courtyard every four years. Numbers of Québécois have understood, and they are going to act. Bourassa in the year to come, will see an idea ripen: 100,000 revolutionary working people, organized and armed.

7 Yes — there are reasons for the Liberal win. Yes, there are reasons for unemployment, for poverty, for slums, for the fact that you Mr. Bergeron of Visitation Street, and also you Mr. Legendre of Laval who earns $10,000 a year, you do not feel free in our country, Quebec.

8 Yes, there are reasons, and the men of Lord and Cie know them; the Fishermen of the Gaspésie, the workers of the North Shore, the miners or Iron Ore, of Quebec Cartier Mining, or Noranda Mines, they also know those reasons. And the decent, honest working people of Cabano whom they tried to screw one more time know lots of those reasons.

9 Yes, there are reasons why you, Mr. Tremblay of Panet Street, and you, Mr. Cloutier, working in construction in St-Jerome, why you can't afford "golden vessels" with beautiful string music and trappings put on by Drapeau

6 Simard family which owns Marine Industries. Only French-Canadian-owned corporation among Canada's top 100 (until Bombardier Ski-doo, now half owned by Que government (they needed capital). Major financiers of Que Liberal Party.

6 Cotroni-Mafia overlord in Quebec
6 100,000: Bourassa's April campaign promise was to create 100,000 jobs. There were at the time 206,000 people officially out of work in Quebec, over 40 per cent of total unemployed in Canada.

7 Visitation and other streets named are in areas of Montreal where poor people live.

8 Lord & Cie: Vicious steel-fabricating sweatshop. Strike broken there (right to organize) with governmental-legal-police help in 1968.

8 Fishermen of the Gaspésie: Thousands of people thrown on the dole by international division of labor, imperialist style. This summer began to shoot at U.S. trawlers here and there.

8 North Shore: of the St. Lawrence, downriver from the mouth of the Saguenay. Pulp and paper (Chicago Tribune, NY Times, etc.), hydroelectric development; politicized militant workers; only PQ MP elected outside Mtl.

8 Iron Ore Company of Canada, Headquarters Wilmington, Delaware. A rip-off by consortium of U.S. steel companies. Iron ore mined at Schefferville, Que, and carted off to Cleveland. For more info see Parks, Anatomy of Big Business.

8 Quebec Cartier Mining: similar. Wholly-owned subsidiary of U.S. Steel Co.

8 Noranda Mines, HQ Toronto. Stranglehold on non-ferrous mining in Quebec, gained by means too amazing to go into in less than 1000 words. The atrocities recorded boggle the mind.

8 Cabano. Town on Gaspé peninsula above N.B. border. K.C. Irving gained cutting rights to surrounding forest in return for promise to build a mill to employ people, majority on welfare. Began cutting, reneged on promise openly. People complained. Government, which had given cutting rights, refused to intervene. People burned lumbering facilities, wrecked logging roads, destroyed bridges, announced they were prepared to burn the forest. Government halted cutting, attempted to begin legal proceedings against mayor et al.

9 St-Jerome: town 30 miles north of MtL. 20 per cent unemployment.

9 Golden vessels. Le vaisseau d'or (the golden vessel) is the name of Mayor Jean Drapeau's restaurant in the Windsor Hotel.

THE WHITE NIGGERS REVOLT

the aristocrat — the one who is so concerned about slums that he puts colored billboards and fences in front of them so the rich tourists will not see our misery.

10 Yes, there are reasons why you Mrs. Lemay of St-Hyacinthe, you can't afford little trips to Florida, as the crooked judges and MPs can with our money.

11 The good, honest workers of Vickers and Davie Ship, the men who were given no reason for being kicked out of their jobs, know those reasons. And the men of Murdochville, smashed for the sole reason that they wanted to unionize, the men who were made to pay over two million dollars because they wanted to exercise this elementary right. The men of Murdochville know about justice and they know a lot of reasons.

12 Yes, there are reasons why you, Mr. Lachance of Ste-Marguerite Street, you went to drown your despair, your bitterness, your rage in that dog's beer, Molson's. And you, Lachance junior, with your marijuana cigarettes. . .

13 Yes, there are reasons why you, welfare people, you are kept on the dole from generation to generation. There are all sorts of reasons, the Domtar workers in Windsor and East Angus know about them. And the workers at Squibb and Ayers, and the men at the Liquor Board and Seven Up and Victoria Precision, and the manual laborers of the cities of Laval and Montreal and the men of Lapalme, they know the reasons well.

14 The Dupont of Canada workers, they also know them, even if soon they will only be able to tell about them in English (thus assimilated, they will increase the number of immigrants, Neo-Quebecois, the favorite children of Bill 63).

15 And the policemen of Montreal, the arms of the system, they must have understood those reasons; they must have seen that we live in a terrorized society, because without their force, without their violence, nothing functioned on the 7th of October.

16 We have had our fill of the Canadian federalism which penalizes the dairy producers of Quebec to satisfy the needs of the Anglo-Saxons of the 10 St-Hyacinthe: town 40 miles northeast of Mtl.

11 Vickers and Davie Shipbuilding: Shipbuilding shops at Mtl and Lauzon (opposite Que City) were closed on two hours notice in 1969 after corporation decided plants were uneconomic. 1000+ skilled workers thrown onto the streets. Fed govt had been handing our huge subsidies to these plants for years.

11 Murdochville. Heroic strike of 1957 at Noranda subsidiary copper refinery in Gaspé interior (name of town from founder of Noranda), smashed by Duplessis with hundreds of provincial police. PP attacked gathering of workers, who defended themselves as best they could. Noranda sued for unlawful something or other. Supreme Court of Canada finally decided this case this year: $2 million+ to Noranda from Steelworkers.

12 You, Lachance junior. All these phrases except this one are in the formal form, 'vous', used for respectful address. This one is 'toi, Lachance fils' in familiar form universally used by youth to each other.

12 Molson's, besides the brewery, owns the Montreal Canadiens.

13 Windsor, East Angus: towns 100 miles east of Mtl. In a bitter 1968 strike, workers at one point occupied factories (textile mills) with guns.

13 Squibb: Workers at Montreal plant (mostly women, by the way) struck this year in an attempt to stop being slowly poisoned by working conditions.

13 Ayers, Liquor Board, Seven Up, Victoria Precision: violent strikes of the last few years, a la Lord & Cie mentioned above. Workers in these had material help from 'left'.

14 Dupont of Canada workers: Dupont management went before the Gendron Royal Commission on the Status of French in Quebec and announced, with unusual frankness, their flat refusal to use French in their Quebec plants and offices. ("For one thing, we have to use English in communications with the head office anyway".)

14 The function of Bill 63 in the strategy of counter-revolution was to get all immigrants to Quebec to assimilate English rather than French, thus developing a working class split along language lines. Almost as good as black vs. white workers.

15 Mtl policemen strike, October 7, 1969.

16 The federal government is increasingly upset by the fact that Quebec farmers produce a natural surplus of milk products. The report of the task force on agriculture announced this summer that Quebec had 37,000 surplus farmers (perhaps we could sell them to Russia?) and made it clear that they would have to be driven off the land for capitalist rationalization.

Commonwealth; which maintains the decent taxi drivers of Montreal in a state of half-slavery while blatantly protecting the exclusive monopoly of nauseating Murray Hill and its assassin-owner Charles Hershorn and his son Paul, who repeatedly, on the night of October 7, grabbed the 12-gauge shotgun from the hands of his employees to fire at taxi drivers and so fatally injured Corporal Dumas, killed as a demonstrator; which carries out an insane import policy while throwing into the street, one by one, the small wage-laborers in the textile and shoe industries, the most downtrodden in Quebec, for the profit of a clutch of accused 'money-makers' in their Cadillac; which classifies the Québécois nation as one of Canada's ethnic minorities.

17 We, like more and more Québécois, have had our fill: of a government of hand-puppets which performs a thousand and one acrobatics to charm U.S. millionaires, begging them to come and invest in Quebec, La Belle Province where thousands of square miles of forests full of game and fish-stocked lakes are the exclusive property of these same all-powerful Seigneurs of the twentieth century;

18 Of the hypocrite, Bourassa, who falls back on the Brinks armored cars — the true symbol of the foreign occupation of Quebec — to keep the poor Québécois 'natives' in fear of the misery and unemployment to which we are so accustomed;

19 of our taxes which Ottawa's man in Quebec wants to hand out to the English-speaking bosses to give them "incentive." "I kid you not, to speak French, to negotiate in French: 'repeat after me: "'cheap labor means' maid-d'oeuvre a bon marche";

20 of promises of jobs and prosperity, when we will always be the faithful servants and boot-lickers of the 'big shots' as long as there are Westmounts, Town of Mount Royals, Hampsteads, Outremonts, all those fortresses of high finance of St. James Street and Wall 'Street'; as long as all of us, Québécois, have not driven out by any means necessary, including arms and dynamite, those economic and political 'bosses' who are ready to stoop to any level in order to screw us better.

21 We live in a society of terrorized slaves, terrorized by the big bosses. Steinberg, Clark, Bronfman, Smith, Neapole, Timmins, Geoffrion, J.-L. Levesque, Hershorn, Thompson, Nesbitt, Desmarais, Kierans. (Beside these, Rémi Popol the gasket, Drapeau the 'dog', Bourassa the Simard sidekick, Trudeau the faggot, they are 'peanuts'.

22 Terrorized by the capitalist Roman Church, even if this seems less and less obvious (but who owns the Stock Exchange Tower?), by payments to Household Finance, by the advertis-

16 Murray Hill: Until a few weeks ago, Murray Hill Limousine Service had monopoly of passenger traffic to and from Dorval Airport — downtown Montreal. . . no taxis could pick up passengers there. (Murray Hill gives courtesy limousines to Jean Drapeau and others). The Mouvement de Liberation du Taxi (see Last Post thing by Auf der Maur) had been fighting this and other conditions with all means available, including sacking the airport driveways at one point with student-left participation.

16 Hershorn, close friend of Quebec Tourism Minister Claire Kirkland-Casgrain, is another liberal Party financier. Son Paul is Murray Hill vp. The passage from "nauseating Murray Hill" to end of para was not printed by Gazette.

16 The night of October 7th: Night of police strike. Mouvement de Liberation du taxi organized demonstration down to Murray Hill garage, joined by other demonstrators. Set fire to buses etc. and shoved them flaming into garage. Shooting as described by Hershorn jr. from roof. Dumas was Quebec Provincial Police undercover agent, who had infiltrated crowd as demonstrator. There had not been enough QPP to intervene.

16 Textiles and shoes are the quintessential cheap labor industries of Quebec.

17 Begging them to invest in Quebec. This is precisely what Bourassa was doing in New York City at the exact moment this manifesto was being read over every French CBC station in Quebec.

17 Thousands of choice acres in Quebec are no-trespassers property of private fish and game clubs, mostly U.S. membership. This includes all of the best, unpolluted fishing streams.

20 Westmount and Hampstead are where the ruling-class rich people live. Town of Mount Royal is the expense-account-type rich people. Outremont is where French-Canadian rich people (e.g. Trudeau) live.

20 St. James street: Mtl branch of Wall Street (or Bay St.)

21 Steinberg, Clark . . . Members of the ruling class. Details on request. Note the French names.

21 Rémi Popol: Rémi Paul, former Union Nationale justice minister. Used to appear on campaign platforms with the leader of the Quebec Nazi Party: Really.

21 Bourassa the Simard sidekick: (see Simard above). Bourassa's is a Simard daughter.

22 Who owns the Stock Exchange Tower? Ans: the Vatican, through Societa Generale Immobiliare; though recently they sold part of their ownership to Gulf and Western

22 Household Finance: Corporate loan sharking, in every town large enough to have a gas

ing of the masters of consumption, Eaton's, Simpson's Morgan's, Steinbergs, General Motors. . . ; terrorized by the closed precincts of knowledge and culture called universities and by their ape-directors Gaudry and Dorais and the sub-ape Robert Shaw.

23 Our numbers are growing, we who know and are ground down by this terrorist society; and the day is approaching when all the Westmounts of Quebec will disappear from the map.

24 Working people in the factories, in the mines and in the forests; working people in the service industries, teachers, students, unemployed: take what belongs to you, your labor, your determination and your freedom. And you, workers of General Electric, it is you who make your factories run; you alone are capable of producing; without you, General Electric is nothing.

25 Working people of Quebec, begin today to take back what belongs to you; take yourselves what is yours. You alone know your factories, your machines, your hotels, your universi-pump, is practically the keystone of the structure of oppression in Quebec, especially outside of Montreal. An extremely high proportion of Quebecois are being fleeced daily at annual rates of 18%. It goes back to Power Corp. E.P. Taylor, NYC, etc.

22 Gaudry: rector (president) of the Université de Montreal; Dorais: rector of the Mil campus of the Université de Quebec; Robert Shaw: Vice-principal of McGill University. In 1964, when Shaw was president of the Foundation Company of Canada, it was convicted of criminal fraud "directed at the highest levels"; when he left Expo, $100 million could not be accounted for.

24 GE workers in Quebec struck with the international union last year.

ties, your unions; do not wait for a miracle organization.

26 Make your revolution yourselves, in your neighborhoods, in your work-places. And if you do not make it yourselves, more usurpers, technocrats or others, will replace the handful of cigar puffers we now know, and everything will have to be done over again. You alone can build a free society.

27 We must fight, no longer one by one, but together, until victory, with all the means at our disposal, as did the Patriots of 1837-1838 (those whom our holy mother the Church hastened to excommunicate, the better to sell itself to British interests).

28 Let all those, in every corner of Quebec, scornfully dismissed as 'lousy French' and drunkards, take up with vigor the battle against the club-smashers of freedom and justice, and strip their power to harm from the professionals of hold-ups and fraud: bankers, 'businessmen', judges, sold-out politicians. . .

29 We are Québécois working people and we will go to the end. We want, with all the people to replace this slave society with a free society, functioning of itself and for itself, a society open to the world.

30 Our struggle can only be victorious. Not for long can one hold in misery and scorn, a people once awakened. Vive le Quebec libre! Vive les camarades prisonniers politiques! Vive la révolution Québécois! Vive le Front de Libération du Quebec!

27 Patriots of 1837-1838 See Stanley Ryerson, Unequal Union, or Leandre Bergeron, Petit Manuel d'histoire du Quebec, Accept no other account.

28 Lousy French. Recall the Trudeau interview in English a couple of years ago, when he allowed as how the Quebecois spoke "lousy French".

Universities occupied as Quebec crisis mounts

MONTREAL (CUP) — The University of Quebec and the Ecole de Beaux Arts of the University of Montreal were occupied last night by students supporting the demands of the Front de Liberation du Quebec.

has had to recognize the FLQ as a real force."

"Now we can take our destiny into our own hands," declared Montreal union leader Michel Chartrand.

So far there has been no attempt to halt the occupations.

Quebec Provincial police and Canadian Armed Forces have downtown Montreal under close guard. Two truckloads of police spent about half an hour at McGill University, but left.

As the city of Montreal turned into an armed camp last night, students at almost all of the province's CEGEPS — post-secondary community colleges — were meeting to decide whether to go on strike today in support of the FLQ.

Further troops were flown last night from a New Brunswick base to St. Hubert, just outside Montreal.

At a mass rally in the Paul Sauve Arena, sympathizers expressed solidarity with the FLQ as the final hours of negotiation between the kidnapers and the Quebec government passed.

In Ottawa CBC president George Davidson told news departments to reduce coverage of the growing political crisis in Quebec.

At the rally Charles Gagnon, and Paul Vallieres, leading FLQ supporters, said that "this is the first time the government

BOOKS

Jewish Dialogue, a new Canadian magazine aiming to become this country's equivalent to Commentary, is a Toronto quarterly with two issues out and a long way to go. It costs $.35 per issue $1.00 for four and contains poetry, articles, stories, drawings and (so far) lots of advertising.

What may make it extraordinary are its editors, Anansi-poet Joe Rosenblatt and David Cohen, the UPI bureau chief in Toronto. They've put out poems by Eli Mandel and promise an article on women's liberation in Israel.

Jewish Dialogue pays for poems by the poem and pays $25 to $50 for stories and articles. All contributions are judged solely on their merits, and mss. should be sent to the magazine, at 6 Charles Street East, Toronto 5. The deadline for issue 3 is November 15.

George Woodcock's Canada and the Canadians published by the Oxford U. Press, is new at the bookstore; there'll be a long wait for a paperback, and it may be popular at the libraries. If you have $8.50 it's worth the price. Woodcock, one of our few men of letters, has been almost everywhere and has written a few books about his travels, in addition to editing Canadian Literature, being about the only professor to teach at U.B.C. without a degree, writing poems, essays, radio dramas, writing history of anarchism and collaborating on a giant study of the doukoboehrs. These are worthy credentials.

Canada and the Canadians has 83 black and white photographs, mostly by Woodcock's wife, and 5 maps. Woodcock's habit is usually to snout about a country, unearthing and extolling little groups of free men and praising local food, architecture and landscapes. In this book, however, he stands back a bit, looking at the history, present, and destiny of our country; like most Canadian writers, he makes a vigorous attempt — at which he succeeds, partially — to snare that elusive rodent, the nation's identity. Watch hopefully for a fuller treatment of his work in Review section later in the year.

FILM

Tonight, the Hollywood Theater is having a FREE midnight preview showing of Little Fauss & Big Halsy, starring Robert Redford and Michael J. Pollard. The doors open at 11:30 p.m. with any seat available to the holder of a university ID card.

On Monday Oct. 19, the U of T (Innis) Film Society is showing the first movie in a three-week series of John Ford films. Tobacco Road will be screened in the Mechanical Building, Room 102 at 7:30 p.m. Year memberships and series tickets are available at SAC and Innis College.

Word has it that U.C.'s Comparative Literature on Film series is sold out. Someone is finally taking an interest in the mOving image!

"Pandora's Movie Box" is showing To See or Not to See (Canada, 1959) and Busby Berkeley's Goldiggers of 1935 (U.S.A., 1935) next Wednesday Oct. 21 at 11 Trinity Square. Show times are 7:00 and 9:15.

FLICK OF THE WEEK: On Sunday December 7, 1941, Japan bombed the hell out of Pearl Harbour. Now, nearly thirty years later, 20th-Century Fox has recreated the event in Tora! Tora! Tora!, with just about the best battle scenes ever filmed.

As with most "slice of true-to-life history" pictures, the audience has to twist and squirm its way past a lot of introductory material and an intermission before the fireworks begin. Treaties are signed, orders are botched up and invasion plans are worked out to the last detail. All this preliminary action does round out the movie and provide a solid lead-in to the bombing, but it sustains tension and interest only in random situations.

E. G. Marshall, as Lt. Col. Bratton, and Martin Balsam, as Admiral Kimmel, are a welcome relief in a sea of hurrying faces. While most sequences are mere representations of history, those involving Marshall and Balsam manage to pierce the cloak of history and offer us a glimpse of the driving motives and personal fears that surrounded the Pearl Harbour incident.

Once the political sideshow has run its course and the bombers finally swoop over the sitting-duck military camps of Hawaii, Tora! Tora! Tora! explodes. One well-placed bomb lands on an American plane and a chain reaction destroys every other piece of machinery on the landing field. A Japanese bomber is hit, but its pilot guides the disabled craft on a suicide flight and completely demolishes a hangar.

American destroyers lie helpless victims of shallow-swimming torpedos, while the island sends out for defense exactly two small planes. You are almost ready to forgive the shortcomings of the first half of the film when Pearl Harbour begins its hypnotic road to utter destruction.

Tora! Tora! Tora! is historically accurate, since it had as technical advisors some of the men who masterminded and led the fateful invasion.

For this reason, Director Richard Fleischer avoids the pretentiousness and cliches of many war pictures. And if you can play along with the bits and pieces of background material, then it's downhill all the way.

THEATRE

THOG, the group which performed at Day One are holding a benefit for themselves and the newspaper GUERRILLA: Sunday October 18, 3-12 p.m. It will be held at Bathurst United Church, which is their rehearsal centre. They are offering theatre, films, food, a bazaar, art and music. Groups include the PERTH COUNTY CONSPIRACY and GOD AND I. You will be asked for donations, but there will be no tickets, it will be up to you. It should be good. If you enjoyed what THOG did at Day One, you'll enjoy the festival.

VERTIGO, the seminar on drugs is sponsoring the DAYTOP THEATRE COMPANY in their production of THE CONCEPT. The Daytop Village Community is a group which treats drug addiction through group therapy encounters to build a "Bond of hard work, commitment, trust and love." The play evolved out of the community's experience. They have experienced a total of 40 years of heroin addiction, and have now completed 12 drug-free years at Daytop. Should be good. You get a chance to talk to the actors after the play.

MUSIC

The Opera Company closes this weekend with Carmen tonight (8:15 PM), Don Giovanni Saturday afternoon (2:00 PM) and Faust Saturday night. For general consumption Carmen is the best production; if you've missed most of the season, catch this last performance. The box office number is 363-6633.

Also Saturday night (Oct 17) at 8:30 PM at Massey Hall, Greater Artists presents Israeli pianist Daniel Barenboim in solo recital. The all-Beethoven programme will include the "Hammerklavier" sonata. Tickets at 363-7301.

Sunday (Oct. 18) the Hart House Orchestra begins their season in Great Hall with music of J. S. Bach. Concert starts at 8:30 PM.

Tuesday (Oct. 20) the Toronto Symphony kicks off Series "A" with Karel Ancerl and guest pianist Emil Gilels. The concert will include music of Mendelssohn and Tchaikowsky and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Gilels. It starts at 8:30 PM, and will be repeated Wednesday night. Box office at 363-7301.

Thursday (Oct. 22) at the Edward Johnston Bldg., a free piano recital in the Concert Hall at 2:00 PM by Manitoba pianist William Alde, at 8:00 PM, the second in a series of three lectures on the symphony orchestra by Prof. Ezra Schabas.

ART

Both at Hart House and at the Jerrold Morris Gallery the Nakamura Retrospective continues. To my knowledge only the National Gallery and the Oshawa Art Gallery are systematically collecting the Painters Eleven so that this present show offers us some chance at evaluation. Nakamura tends to look very "arty" right now but he is certainly worth looking at.

Walter Darby Bannard opened at the Mirvish Gallery on Tues. of this week. Toronto seems a bit wary of Bannard's painting, preferring to think of him more as Greenberg's protegee than as an artist in his own right. He is however an expert handler of paint and is presently creating some of the most beautiful things in American art, even if that commodity increasingly looks like the luxury article.

Frosh rep. can't vote at English Council

By JUDI SMITH

"Certain students have been elected in violation of section. . ."

With this line, Professor B. S. Hayne, Chairman of the Combined Departments of English, started a vigorous discussion during Wednesday's Council meeting concerning the presence of illegal student representatives.

Regulations for election specify that student representatives must successfully have completed one course in English, which automatically cancels eligibility of freshmen.

With the firm conviction of someone who is sure of his position in a matter, the chairman continued his comments about the three elected freshmen who were present as Council members.

"We cannot take their votes. . . The subject of students' qualifications can be put before the sub-committee. This is the only answer for people who wish to see freshmen on this council."

An examination of the Council's constitution found that not three but only one student was illegal.

"In 1969 the Combined Departments agreed to accept these limitations," secretary Alexandra Johnston reported. "The report was brought in last year after a great deal of discussion. Only one student (at the meeting) is ineligible by these rules."

"We have a situation contrary to committee law," added the chairman. Obviously hoping to close the subject, he continued, "The only possibility is to amend the constitution. . . until then nothing can be done."

"There wasn't a referendum among students last year. . . there is some question as to whether this actually is the law," argued Tom Schofield (UC IV), a member of the audience.

"(It) was passed by constitutional members of Combined Departments of English, with student representation. . . passed within the law," answered secretary Johnston.

A motion "to dispense with the eligibility of enrolment in at least one course in English" was proposed by Richard Wright (Vic IV).

A voluble Council member, apparently faculty, who refused to give his name, answered impatiently.

"We debated this thoroughly last spring. . . we felt a fair measure of agreement had been reached. . . there were congratulations all around. If we begin with changes in this constitution, we have paralysis. I deplore questions like this at the beginning of our meeting," he said.

Robert Cook (UC IV) suggested a motion "for adjournment of Council meeting until we vote on the matter of student eligibility. . . to be decided by the general meeting (November 9). . . Despite reference made to harmony between staff and students here, it is a matter of numbers. Because of the ineligibility of one elected student member here, who has been denied a vote under the present legislation, until this has been cleared up proper representation of students is not here."

Sounding even more impatient, the unidentified faculty member attacked Cook.

"Adjournment for one member is spending one hell of a lot of time tinkering with an automobile to drive somewhere! If students don't elect members under constitution we agreed on, it is a matter of priority to get on with the business of the department," he said.

Blacks' $5,000 grant is reaffirmed by SAC

By IAN MACLAREN

The $5,000 SAC grant to the Black Students' Union was reaffirmed Wednesday night after reconsideration by the council.

"We asked you for financial assistance. We're not going to beg," said Deborah Clarke, 34, a student at Centennial College and Wednesday night's spokesman of the Black Students Union.

"Just forget we ever asked for the money. We absolve you of any further responsibility," she said.

Ten days ago SAC granted $5,000 to the BSU for its after school program, a breakfast program, and an office.

When the BSU question came to the floor Wednesday night, the council wasted little time in voting in favour of reconsidering the BSU grant. Bob Stewart (Jill Scar.) led off the discussion saying that it wasn't worth rehashing all that had been said last week, and that the discussion should not be prolonged because, "The BSU is one group that should not have to beg."

Clarke summarized the position of the BSU. "We came here hoping to influence this Council to participate and take interest in the BSU. We seem to think that the racial situations which exist in big cities in Canada don't relate to the racial problems in the States. But I fought my way out of one of the worst slums in Canada, in Montreal, and finally at 34 I'm going to College. I've learned not to beg. We asked for money. We're not going to beg for it."

Last week Clarke warned, "We're asking for money now. If we don't get it we're going to have to take it."

This week when asked how the money will be raised she said, "Maybe we'll have to clean streets or pick up garbage but we're prepared to do whatever we can to raise the money. We're certainly not going to get it from this institution."

Business Briefs

Canada Dry of the U.S. plans to introduce a new product to be test marketed in Berkeley, California — pure drinking water.

The water will be marketed in 28 ounce and half-gallon bottles to cost about 35 cents and 65 cents respectively.

The company will subject normal drinking water to "an extensive purification treatment."

The possibility of a new type of political structure uniting Canada and the U.S. is foreseen by a leading Canadian businessman.

Writing in the Financial Executive, Frank S. Capon, director and vice-president of Du Pont of Canada, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the American parent company, says:

"While we may talk emotionally of independence and while in many ways we can still make our own decisions, the scope of common interest between our two countries is so broad, and is increasing so rapidly that I see no way of either country achieving its objectives unless we follow fundamentally parallel or common paths."

R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. says its Winston and Salem cigarettes made of Canadian blends of tobacco will soon be manufactured and sold in Canada under terms of a licensing agreement with Macdonald Tobacco Inc. of Montreal.

Macdonald will manufacture the king size filter cigarettes in Montreal and start distribution in selected market areas by mid-October.

Toronto-based publishers Maclean-Hunter, seeking to purchase three foreign-owned cable television companies in Quebec's eastern townships, have run into opposition from Quebec businessmen.

The businessmen say they agree the companies involved should be brought back under Canadian control — but that control from Toronto would not be in Quebec's best cultural and economic interests.

Canadian auto sales are gloomy, picture-wise that is, with the three largest manufacturers reporting September sales 10 to 25 per cent lower than last year.

Rhodes scholarships offered

Eleven Rhodes Scholarships will be awarded to male Canadians this fall, entitling the winners to study at Oxford University for two or three years as of September 1971.

Application forms and particulars may be obtained from the university registrar. Deadline for applications for the 1971 awards is October 25, 1970.

CPL pickets at 'scab' GM dealer

By ANDY SOS

"Smile for the cop," yelled a marcher at a demonstration in support of striking Autoworkers outside Addison's on Bay, a local G.M. Dealership.

He was referring to two unidentified photographers taking pictures of the group of twenty protesters.

As explained by the Canadian Party of Labour spokesman, Bill Schabas (111 U.C.), the demonstration held a twofold purpose; that of showing support for striking autoworkers of G.M., and that of winning student support for labour cases.

Daniel Gorelick, an unemployed ex-student member of CPL, said that G.M. dealerships were maintaining pressure by selling or taking orders for G.M. cars because these assured sales would enable G.M. to hold out longer. Gorelick noted that yesterday's demonstration was only a beginning and that a financial squeeze would have to be applied to G.M. before the strike would end.

Guy Mills, an Addison salesman for over 20 years, explained that he was working on straight commission and if he didn't keep selling cars, he would starve. The strike hits him and other car salesmen harder than the workers because after the supply of cars is cut off there is no strike fund to compensate for their loss of revenue. Also, after the strike is over there is no increase in the salesmen's wages.

The manager of Addison's, Ron Edgar, countered CPL's claim that he is supporting G.M. by explaining that the cars that he is now selling were bought well before the strike started on September 14. He said he had about one hundred 1970 cars leftover because of low 1970 sales but, added that he is paying interest on the money owed G.M. for these leftover models.

"We're only trying to survive until the strike is over," he said.

Students could fight their 'purge' in court

By BOB GAUTHIER

Two students at Royal York Collegiate Institute, who were transferred to other high schools this fall, are considering taking the matter to court.

Rick Leswick and Allan Brighter were transferred to other schools in the Etobicoke area because their involvement with the student newspaper "Underwhere". The paper made several comments concerning faculty at Royal York. It was distributed the second to last day of school last spring.

Leswick was transferred to Martingrove, and Brighter to Etobicoke. All the details of the transfer were worked out by the Etobicoke Board of Education. Two weeks ago a demonstration involving approximately 75 students was held against the board. Leswick said yesterday that as yet, there are no results.

SAC is supporting the students. Two weeks ago a letter signed by Rod Hurd, SAC president, was sent to the chairman of the Etobicoke Board of Education. The letter said in part that SAC felt that the Board's action "constitutes a flagrant violation of a students' civil rights". The letter also called for a full apology by the board and the return of the students to Royal York.

Peter Dorfmann of the League for Student Democracy said that Paul Copeland has been hired as the students' lawyer. There is a possibility that the case will go to court but Leswick and Brighter are as yet undecided. The only outcome would be that the two would be compelled by law to attend Royal York.

Leswick said that if given a choice he would now stay at Martingrove because "I know what my marks would be like at Royal York."

Edgar invited Schabas inside to talk to him about the strike, but the latter kept on marching.

Later Edgar said that he didn't mind the picketers but he thought that they were wrong in choosing

Abortion supply is behind demand

By MICHAEL MAZUREK
 "Abortions are perfectly legal in Toronto. The trick is in getting one."

Gynaecologist Richard Willson was speaking in response to a question which was raised at one of The Secularity and Contraception Information and Control Service's Tuesday night meetings.

Dr. Willson, whose staff at Toronto General is the only one in the city performing abortions, explained why he and his colleagues limit their weekly quota of the operations to "between 40 and 50".

"When we made the decision to do abortions at Toronto General, we were immediately inundated with some 500 applications from all across Canada. It got so that most of our hospital beds were filled with abortion cases."

"Since an obviously impossible situation was developing, we have adopted a scheme whereby abortions are performed only on Friday mornings."

Willson acknowledged that these Friday morning clinics are open to anyone with an appointment, but pointed out the virtual impossibility of obtaining such an appointment.

"We won't perform an abortion if the subject is more than 14 weeks pregnant. But we're booked so far ahead that the chances of getting an appointment before you're 14 weeks pregnant are extremely remote."

In other words, though the abortions are technically available to the public, it's just blind luck if you manage to get one.

In deploring this situation, Dr. Willson censured the other Toronto area hospitals, who "are supported by public tax dollars, and yet refuse to shoulder their responsibility to the community."

The objection was raised that Catholic hospitals, for instance, equate abortion with murder, and hence do not see the performing of the operations as a "responsibility to the community."

In answer to this, one of Willson's Catholic colleagues pointed to an article by a Jesuit priest in the March (1970) edition of Theological Studies, which argues that abortion should not be equated with murder.

The arguments forwarded in this article, she implied, coupled with the fact that "one quarter of the women seeking abortions are Catholic" (Newsweek, April 13), would indicate that all Canadian hospitals, Catholic or not, have an obligation to perform abortions as a matter of principle.

The Athletic Association has announced that a limited number of tickets for the Queen's-Blues game at Kingston tomorrow will be available at the Hart House ticket office until 2 p.m. today.

Transients cleared by riot police

Vancouver — More than 200 riot-equipped Vancouver city police advanced 12 abreast along fourth avenue early last night to clear the street of about 200 youthful transients. The youths had been evicted earlier from nearby barracks at Canadian Forces Base Jericho.

The police, wearing face-guard helmets and carrying three foot riot sticks, were pelted with rocks, bottles, and obscenities as they cleared the main residential traffic artery of sit-downers who had blocked traffic for more than two hours.

About 100 of those dispersed later turned up at the university of British Columbia, a few miles further west. The university lands are policed by the RCMP and out of the jurisdiction of Vancouver city police.

The transients were granted temporary accommodation at the Jericho barracks six weeks ago after their hostel, at a downtown armory was closed.

Varsity track team is hoping for upset

By CLIVE HOBSON

The depleted ranks of the Varsity track and field team leave for the OQAA championships in Hamilton tomorrow, their hopes high, their chances slim, and their fortunes resting in the strong hands of a powerful field team.

Graduations, injuries and "other appointments" have left coach Fred Foot, in the unenviable position of having to put together a twenty one man team that is counting for the most part on third, fourth, fifth and sixth place finishes on the track, to bring home the points.

Undoubtedly the majority, in fact all of our first place finishes, will come from our field men. The squad here should with any luck gain at least four firsts.

LAST YEAR'S GRADUATION of speedsters Bill Franklin, and Dave Quibell has greatly weakened the track team and Fred Foot may find himself running in a relay leg just to complete a four man squad.

So, the track picture is none too optimistic. In the 100 and 200 metre events, Alan Tucker is strong and willing, but unfortunately lacks the speed to gain anything other than fifth or sixth place in either event.

The 400 and 800 metre events will be noticeable for the absence of perennial, Bill Franklin. Again we will miss out on the first three places, however MATT Duncan may pull off a fourth and Mark Minden possible a sixth place in the 800 metres.

The 5000 metres will have Pimm and Smith up against a strong field, but both runners are fighters and should come home in fourth and fifth places.

The 10,000 metres will be our strongest track event, here Ritchie Pynes has a good chance to pull an upset and finish first, and we can at least count on him for second place.

ON THE FIELD two of our first place finishes rest on the strong shoulders of Grant Tadman, Grant should take the discus, and if Waterloo's football team decides Cam Crosby is too valuable at quarterback to hurl a shot around, Grant will have first place in the shotput sewn up.

Brian Penny, a hot and cold high jumper, could have an exceptional day and collect seven points, but it is more than likely that he'll finish as far back as fourth or even fifth.

The polevault should produce a win for Varsity, providing Bruce Simpson doesn't pass the lower heights and then blow it at a height far below his best. Dave Barrett could pick up third place.

The triple jump, should produce our only other first place finish. Don Watt is jumping well and should have no problems with the competition.

So on paper our chances appear to be none too strong and without a consistent-to-form field team we could fall far behind in scoring. However, providing Tadman, Watt and Simpson come through and win their respective events; and we gain sufficient second and third place finishes in the 10,000 metres, polevault and the high jump our veteran and slightly out-classed squad could finish second behind Waterloo.

Vic star defensive half Aarne Kartna grabs PhysEd's fleet halfback Larry Theed.

Vic blanks PhysEd., leads division

By STAN KOROLNEK

Led by an extremely tough defence, Victoria College mauled PhysEd 13-0 in a first division football game yesterday afternoon.

The Vic "front four" led by Steve Duvenor and John Icton, stopped the strong PhysEd running game completely, forcing them to punt repeatedly.

The PhysEders had few scoring opportunities and fumbled the ball away when they did get in close in the third quarter.

Rick Kiyonaga, who was outstanding, scored the opening touchdown on the last play of the first half when he picked off the first PhysEd pass and ran it back 25 yards for the major.

The convert was missed and Vic took a 6-0 half-time lead.

Early in the fourth quarter, Vic quarterback, Terry Bridle, hit flanker Pete "Sonny" Wade with a short pass to the right flat and Wade ran the ball in from there.

Bridle played an excellent game in leading the Vic offence. He completed five of his seven pass attempts including the one TD.

Aarne Kartna also was outstanding for the winners, picking off another errant PhysEd pass and returning the ball into scoring range.

For PhysEd, halfback Larry Theed played a sound game although he was bottled up by an inspired Vic defence.

PhysEd is now in the position of having to beat Vic by 14 points in their next clash in order to end up in first place in the first division — assuming they both win all their other games.

The game boiled down to Vic being well prepared and PhysEd rather disorganized. PhysEd will probably improve when regular pivot Kent Duncan comes back healthy.

Notes — Grant Tadman, where are you? PhysEd and Vic meet again on Nov. 4th.

Grid Blues face crucial test

By LYNDON LITTLE

The football Blues slip out of town this afternoon and head for Kingston to meet Tindall's tigers tomorrow afternoon in what should be their most important battle of the season.

"It's going to be one helluva battle, offers Blues' guiding spirit, Ron Murphy.

"Of course, they (Queen's) are always tough. But, add to that the fact that they're playing on their home ground AND the fact that it's their homecoming, and you've got yourself real trouble."

After a relative slow start, the Kingston crew have been gaining momentum rapidly.

After their 44-11 thrashing of McGill last weekend, the Gaels appear as the biggest roadblock to a 1970 Yates Cup for Varsity.

A LOSS to the Gaels would leave Blues in the unhappy position of depending on an upset or a tie of Queen's by either McGill, Waterloo or McMaster in the last three weeks of the regular schedule.

Blues of course, would still have to win their remaining games — all at home — against Western, McGill and Mac.

Both teams face an injury problem that makes it difficult to make any sound assessment of their relative strengths.

It is likely that the starting line-ups of both squads will not be decided until kick-off time tomorrow as both Blues' Murphy and the Gaels' Frank Tindall will wait until the last moment to evaluate the injuries.

The biggest question mark on the Gaels' roster is their talented and experienced quarterback, Arthur "Skip" Rochette. Rochette, the Montreal native who performed for four years at the University of Bridgeport, sprained the thumb on his throwing hand in the triumph over the Redmen.

His back-up man, former UTS star Tom Taylor, was also injured in the McGill game and is lost for the season with ripped up knees.

IF ROCHETTE is unable to go, the vital pivot spot will likely be handled by Mike Sharpe, a regular defensive back who was a quarterback at Carleton last year.

For Blues, guard Gord Whitaker (knee), center Rich Agro (knee), and quarterback Vic Albino (shoulder) will definitely not dress.

Several others are in the doubtful category.

Halfback Walt Sehr, who has been an integral part of Blues' attack since his first game in '68, is in this group. He's been bothered by a pulled leg muscle and has not seen any action since the first exhibition game against York on September 11.

Blue Notes — After three weeks of action, the latest SIFL stats show Blues' outstanding rookie of 14 Peter McNabb leading in interceptions with five.

Varsity, McMaster tie 1-1

By DON McMAHON

The Varsity Soccer Blues, a sometimes glorious, often luckless eleven, finally settled down Wednesday afternoon in Hamilton and frightened the wits out of the soccer Marauders in a dramatic and closely fought 1-1 match.

All thoughts of former greatness — five championships in the last six years — were left behind as they concentrated on running the McMaster crew into the ground.

Mac was by far the best collegiate side Blues have faced this year and the Marauders controlled play for most of the first half, aided by a strong wind.

Blues' magnificent defense turned the tide during those crucial 45 minutes and there was not one player in the entire defensive line-up who failed to give 110 percent in stopping Mac cold.

Terrific tackling by Ken Franco, split-second thinking by Bruno Bruni, and accurate passing from Ed Carter were a few of the reasons Blues were still in the game at half-time.

Also, Ersin Ozerding, Mario D'arosa and new recruit Lou Lombardi were all stalwart members of a great first-half offensive effort.

The second-half was all Blues, as Tony Lavelle, Ken Cancellera and big Mario again brought the play to Mac, with the big goal coming from Lavelle at the 20 minute mark.

It was the first time Blues have been ahead in any game this season.

The breaks came, and numerous chances were offered and taken by Blues' dynamic offense.

Ozerding barely missed the net on a lovely ground ball off the right wing, Darosa's sizzling drive skimmed the post from 25 yards out.

But suddenly it all came apart. Blues' captain John Cobby, playing a tough game on defense, was called on a foul in the goal area which was violently disputed by Blues' mentor Bob Nicol.

Mae were awarded an indirect free kick just six yards from the goal line. They made no errors as Christensen hammered it home to tie the score with only eight minutes remaining.

It was a hard-luck finish for Blues which severely hurt their chances for a league title. But, with five games to go, and both McMaster and Western due in Toronto next time around, chances may be better than anyone imagines.

The next game is on the front campus Saturday at 1 p.m. against league cellar-dwellers, Waterloo.

Spectators welcome!

Notes — This was Blues' line-up for the McMaster match. Goal — Tony Bowker; Backs — Ed Carter, Bruno Bruni, Mike Moores, and John Cobby; Halves — Ken Cancellera, and Ersin Ozerding; Forwards — Miles Sosa, Lnu Lombardi, Mario Darosa, and Tony Lavelle; Alternates — Vito Polera, Dave Evans, and Vince Paccarella.

Arrest of 2 students for FLQ label

Two University of Toronto students were detained for two-and-a-half hours — apparently under the War Measures Act — by Metro police Friday.

One of the students, Steve Fudge, an American citizen and landed immigrant, had been wearing the letter "FLQ" clipped from Friday's edition of the Varsity.

One of the Metro policemen called the letters "FLQ propoganda", according to Bob Glover, the other student detained.

If the policeman was right, then every person possessing a copy of Friday's Varsity is liable to five years imprisonment and a $5000 fine under the emergency powers promulgated by the Trudeau government early Friday morning.

The two students were picked up in the gallery of the Ontario legislature, where they had walked — Fudge wearing the clipping — from Huron and Bloor Streets.

According to Glover, he and Fudge were sitting in different parts of the gallery when he noticed three Ontario Provincial Police officers. After a while, he noticed that Fudge and two of the policemen had vanished.

He went outside the building where he saw Fudge speaking to the police. Metro Police soon arrived and took them both to Station 52, just south of the front campus.

"We were separated, then stripped, searched, and questioned," he said. The two then waited together for the arrival of the RCMP.

Fudge told Glover that when he asked what he was being booked for, a policeman replied that under the War Measures Act, he didn't need to be charged with anything.

"We agreed with everything they said. Under the War Measures Act, you don't know if you're going to get out," said Glover.

When a policeman saw them looking at a clock, he said that they needn't look at a clock, because they were going to be there for a long time.

But the RCMP only questioned them briefly, and they were released after waiting 45 more minutes. No charges were laid, although, according to Glover, "We were told Steve would get it for 'sedition' and I would get it for 'accompanying' a seditionist. Glover was also told that Fudge might be deported.

All Canadians affected by law

Ottawa (CUP) — Any Canadian in any corner of the country, can be arrested without a warrant and held without charge under the sweeping powers the federal government has just given itself in the early hours of Friday morning.

This is the ultimate meaning of the new emergency laws as explained by officials of the federal justice department at a press briefing yesterday.

Justice Minister John Turner told the Commons that the law is aimed at terrorists and criminals who promote violent revolution.

But how the law is applied, Turner's officials made clear depends largely on the judgement and fairness of policemen and soldiers (who are now "peace officers" with wide powers of arrest).

Clearly by their language, the new laws are directed at the Front de Liberation du Quebec, its aims, its methods and its members.

But they apply outside of Quebec as well, and their power actually extends far beyond the ranks of the FLQ.

The Black Panthers, the officials conceded, could be a target.

The sweep of the new powers is illustrated in a regulation under the War Measures Act that outlaws the FLQ — and goes on to say — "any group of persons or association that advocates the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of or as an aid in accomplishing governmental change in Canada is declared to be an unlawful association."

At 3.59 a.m. Friday, a member of the FLQ who did not commit any crime under the country's statutes, as they stood then was a law abiding citizen.

But at 4.01 a.m. he became a criminal simply because of his membership on the organization.

As such, he could be awakened and arrested by any policeman or member of the armed forces and jailed for up to 90 days before being brought before a superior judge who could set his court trial date.

The accused could subsequently be sentenced to a maximum term of five years in jail even if there is no evidence that he committed any act of violence — or any other crime under the normal laws of the Criminal Code.

Meetings on Quebec organized

Several meetings are scheduled today to discuss the War Measures Act and the social upheaval in Quebec.

The U of T Waffle group has called off a major teach-in for this afternoon in the wake of the news of the killing of Quebec Minister of Labour Pierre Laporte, one of the FLQ kidnap victims.

Claude Ryan, editor of the Montreal newspaper Le Devoir, will participate in a Hart House debate tonight at 8 p.m.

Half a dozen other meetings are also planned for the next two days. Today these include:

- Political Economy Course Union Noon, Sidney Smith Hall, Room 1081.
- St. Michael's College students 4 p.m. Brennan Hall, Committee Room A.

Meetings have been called for tomorrow by:

- the U of T Young Socialists, Sidney Smith Hall, Room 2121, 4 p.m.
- U of T Women's Caucus, Sidney Smith Hall, Room 2106, 1 p.m.
- History Students Union, Sidney Smith Hall, 1 p.m.

Ontarion seized in Guelph

Guelph police Friday night confiscated all copies of a special edition of the "Ontarion," the student newspaper of Guelph University Friday night.

The paper had reprinted parts of the FLQ manifesto and the text of the War Measures Act, and what the "Ontarion" business manager, George Dickson, called a "liberal" editorial.

"We're intending to issue some sort of Gestetner newsletter tomorrow explaining the editorial stance of the paper and a story about the rip-off," said Dickson.

The Guelph administration has not discussed the police action with the staff of the paper nor have the police made any attempt to defend the confiscation.

Reaction against the Trudeau government's implementation of the War Measures Act spread across the country Friday.

In Regina, 2,000 students gathered to discuss the surprise federal action. Demonstrations were also held in Calgary, Vancouver, Ottawa and Toronto.

Three Quebec unions issue statements Fri.

The following is the statement made by the executives of Quebec's three major trade union confederations — the Confederation of National Trade Unions, (CSN), the Quebec Federation of Labour (FTQ), which is affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress, and the Quebec Teachers' Corporation (CEQ). The confederations represent a total of 500,000 people, and have recently come together over other issues. This joint statement was issued after a meeting Friday night in Quebec City.

Following a special meeting held Friday night in Quebec City, the executives of the three Quebec trade union confederations — the CSN, CEQ, FTQ — denounce the attitude of the Bourassa government which without apparent reason or justification went from one day to the next from a moderate position to an inexplicable attitude of total submission of the federal authorities.

As a matter of fact, the confederations, which had endorsed the position taken last Wednesday by a group of Quebec citizens (some of them officers of the confederations) supporting the intention of the Bourassa government to negotiate an exchange between the FLQ hostages and the political prisoners, didn't properly understand that, without any explanation or apparent reason, the government had decided to put an end to negotiations and beg the federal government to put Quebec under the yoke of militarism.

The confederations must denounce the regime of force opposed by the Trudeau government, and safeguarded by the surrender of the panic-stricken Bourassa government, pushing aside the civil responsibilities of Quebec citizens and establishing a sort of military regime of the most rigid nature like one might find in a banana republic where military juntas rule as lord and master.

We, representing the unions and also citizens of Quebec, 301,943 what seems to us to be a plot between Ottawa and Quebec to make the rest of the country and the entire world believe that anarchy, chaos and insurrection reign in Quebec at a time when the citizens of Quebec are beginning to prove that democracy is durable in Quebec.

The trade union movements are dismayed by the suppression of civil liberties that threatens democracy more than terrorism, when the two governments know very well there are a lot more social maladies to correct than anarchy to curb. We all deplore as much the FLQ's radical method and demand, as proof of their good faith, the release of the hostages.

Faced with the urgency of the situation, the executives of the three union confederations have decided to convoke an extraordinary plenary meeting, the supreme authority of their structures between congresses, in order to decide what action to take to save democracy in Quebec. This meeting will be held Wednesday, at 2 p.m. in Quebec City.

New plan for graduate students support

By TERRY STEPHEN

The Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario revealed a new plan for financial support of graduate students Friday which rejects the concept of the EOB.

The committee found that "the opportunity bank concept as exemplified in the Cook-Stager report is not a desirable approach to the problems of graduate student support since it assumes the existence of a sophisticated and quantitatively precise cost-benefit analysis of higher education, and because it introduces criteria other than academic merit.

Further announcements by the Committee of Presidents included:

— their intention to support the discouragement of academic research on campus, sponsored by government or industry, which is not publishable because it has been labeled "classified", by the sponsoring agency.

— a proposal for a computer communications network linking computers in a number of Ontario universities. This centralization would apparently maximize efficiency and minimize cost.

Dr. John B. MacDonald, Executive Director of the Committee, when questioned about dismal employment opportunities for PhD's stated the need for more accurate manpower forecasts by the Federal Government. In the Physical Sciences for example 42% of the PhD. graduates are not working in their field: Dr. MacDonald felt however that this is due to the considerable "horizontal mobility" of these people.

Clean up belt line in their bag

By ELLEN O'DONNELL

Close to 300 people armed with garbage bags gathered at the C.N.R. Belt Line track on Saturday morning.

As part of Pollution Probe's effort to persuade City Hall to convert the track into a bicycle and walkway, the group gathered truckloads of garbage for pick up along the line.

According to Michael Lockey of Probe, it is Mayor Dennison's idea that the scenic strip be split up. Some of it would go to lumber companies, parts would become extensions of local streets to facilitate the flow of traffic, and the rest would be sold to residents to increase their properties.

The crowd, many of whom were children, cleaned up garbage from Mt. Pleasant Cemetery to the Allan Expressway; pop cans, car parts, gum wrappers, rubber tires, rusty wire, rotten wood, broken glass, boots, socks, hangers and sneakers, plastic bags, paint cans, pop-stick sticks, empty mickies, varsol tins, etc.

At a gathering later, everyone urged that the Belt Line be left intact as a park.

Michael Lockey expressed gratitude to the C.N.R. which had, in a bureaucratic twitch, given permission for the clean-up. Thanks also went to Westons Bakeries for donating $2.00 worth of donuts, and to Pepsi Cola company for several cases of pop.

Two girls, aged twelve and fourteen, had earned $85 for Pollution Probe by walking from Port Credit to take part in the clean-up.

Applications are now being received for a vacancy on the Saint Pierre's Gospel Of Separatism

By CANADIAN UNIVERSITY PRESS

"Our Liberal approach is a non doctrinaire approach, not found in theories and doctrines which were made a hundred years ago. It is a pragmatic, idealistic approach, but it is not conservative because it is not afraid of change."

Edmonton 4 June 1968

"You cannot tell lies to the people; they will not believe you. People are more sophisticated now."

-17 June 1968

"In our society, justice is one of the most badly administered social functions. On the penal side, we are tied to a system that is closer to the middle ages than to the contemporary era."

May 1964

"I am opposed to nationalism in all its forms, whether it be French Canadian, Jewish, Irish or any other."

October 1965

"I feel absolutely certain that Quebec is turning against nationalism. The people in power are beginning to gasp at the magnitude of their task, particularly in relation to their tiny resources, both human and financial."

-January 1965

"We should be mature enough to show that we are a country of pluralistic composition which can go forward in liberty, rather than plunging back into an equivalent tribalism ourselves. In saying this, I am taking a dig at our separatists who, as I see it, are rather like African tribalists."

-February 1967

"The truth is that the separatist counter revolution is the work of a powerless Petit Bourgeois minority afraid of being left behind by the twentieth century revolution. Rather than carving themselves out a place in it by ability, they want to make the whole tribe return to the wigwams by declaring its independence. That, of course, will not prevent the world outside from progressing by giant strikes: it will not change the rules and the facts of history, nor the real power relationship in North America."

Federalism and French Canadians

Pierre Elliot Trudeau will be asking all Canadians to unite behind him. He will have on his side the anguish brought upon by the death of Pierre Laporte and he will draw upon it to "cut out the cancer" in Quebec.

The arrests, the censorship, etc., are expected to continue; and opposition, even of the civil libertarian — anti war measures act — kind appears still for the time being.

Is the Trudeau government's holy war against the FLQ and sympathizers simply action to defend the safety of all Canadians, or is it more than that?

The identity of many of the arrested lead one to believe that the government is attacking all left wing militant members and supporters of the entire separatist or independentist movement. It is more than an effort by legal authorities to round up law-breakers and terrorists: it is an attempt by the political authorities to eliminate and incarcerate a political opposition of a certain genre — that is to wipe out left wing Quebec nationalists.

To understand the attack of Trudeau, Pelletier, et al, on the separatist movement, we must go further back than to the kidnapping of James Cross, back further even than the birth of the FLQ in 1963.

In the 50's, Trudeau and Pelletier were among the Quebec intellectuals opposed to the conservative Duplessis regime, a group centered around the leadership of the CNTU (then CTCC) and the magazine Cite Libre.

While Trudeau acquired at this time some reputation as a radical a careful reassessment of his writings reveals that he was radical only in his opposition to Duplessis and that his own positive ideas were more or less those of an orthodox Liberal.

With Duplessis' death in 1959, intellectual unity ended, and many of the more dynamic, such as Rene Levesque and Michel Chartrand, as well as of the new generation, like Pierre Vallieres and Charles Gagnon turned toward Quebec nationalism.

With the failure of the Quiet Revolution to bring about real social and economic change in Quebec, this movement turned avowedly separatist within a few years.

Trudeau and Pelletier were appalled. Their classical Liberalism as well as their hatred of Duplessis' so-called nationalism made them avowedly anti all forms of Quebec nationalism.

While some of their colleagues were going to Quebec City to work with Lesage, Trudeau and Pelletier went to Ottawa, soon to take power within the Liberal establishment which lacked at that time the intellectual capacity to do anything with their power.

Trudeau had gone from small "L" Liberal to big "L" Liberal to the biggest big "L" Liberal of them all.

Any support he might have retained among the Quebecois, intellectual left disappeared at this point.

He is a vendu — a sell out — Peter Elliot. (Gerard Pelletier was less ignored and more hated). Yet Trudeau could not abide by this fact. Even before coming to Ottawa in his late days at Cite Libre, Trudeau denounced the whole idea of independence for Quebec.

Self determination was possible, as many Cite Libre articles suggested, even desirable for the Algerians, and Latin American countries might be better off freed from colonialism. Yet the whole idea of a separate socialist state of Quebec was beyond discussion. It was heresy.

Thus the new men in power were intellectual Liberals but... some advances in civil liberties were possible. But just as Locke argued that toleration should not be granted to atheistic heretics, so his disciple Trudeau was willing to allow civil liberties to all but political heretics. Separatism was a cancer that had to be rooted out.

Yet it was not only in intellectual circles that independentism was spreading.

In early 1969, there were "disturbing" reports that the population of Quebec was moving leftwards (and) — towards separatism.

Public opinion polls consistently showed this.

PQ membership increased, the language question grew in importance and labour and the students were becoming more militantly nationalist.

Soon there was almost no news to be heard on the national networks or in the media on Quebec. Consistently the CBC news would describe demonstrations on American college campuses but would fail to mention larger demonstrations on the streets in Quebec.

One effect of this policy has been clear. Canadians outside of Quebec have been kept essentially in ignorance about the growing movement.

Generally the only kind of information to be found has been the occasional hysterical news report of the type published by the Toronto Telegrams of the Nation Ignorance tempered by bias.

In Quebec however the movement grew. Even the muzzling of Radio Canada, the busts, arrests and seizures of literature of October 1969, the continued harassment of the citizens and workers committees as evidenced by the closing of CYC Quebec operations, and some hard line speeches of Trudeau have little effect. As many French Canadian voted PQ as voted Liberal in the 1970 April election.

A period of calm seemed to begin after the election. The people of English Canada were led to believe that all Quebec had united behind Trudeau and his man in Quebec — Bourassa.

Yet it was not so — and Trudeau knew it.

It is in this context that the kidnappings took place. The government waited then acted, imposing wartime emergency measures. The time had come to deal head on with this whole movement.

Not that it needed 12,000 soldiers and wartime measures.

The movement in Quebec, unfortunately perhaps, does not need an occupation army to be checked. Trudeau is just preparing Canadians for the day some time hence when the troops will be rushed in shooting. Then the shock of seeing troops around will have worn off somewhat.

Which is not to say three or four police forces are not trying their damndest to root out the cancer now, it's just that these gave a nasty habit of growing again.

But Trudeau knows that the separatist movement as a whole is a threat to his power and the Bay Street economic and political powers he represents.

Perhaps David Rockefeller is unperturbed by the PQ, but then again Quebec has always been a sea of tranquility compared to other areas of concern to him — like Bolivia. Toronto financiers have no Bolivias, they have only Quebec.

Thus, the independence movement finds its intellectual leaders and key organizers from former FLQer Pierre Vallieres to the head of the right wing nationalist organization, the St. Jean Baptiste Society, Francois-Albert Angers, in jail — for how long no one really can guess at this point.

Between those ends are people like the PQ organizers and candidates for the social democratic FRAP in the upcoming Montreal municipal elections.

This is the way the government hopes it can still the voice of independentism — using guilt by implication.

For good measure, the combined police forces have gone after the multitude of small groups in Montreal which are not directly involved in independentist politics: members of the association of Vietnamese students, for example, have been arrested.

The government hopes in this way to bring the people of Quebec into the unity created in revulsion to the assassination, hoping to kill the separatist movement. It is doubtful that such tactics ever succeed.

The left Liberal position in Canada has generally been that the people of Quebec must be permitted to decide their political future for themselves. Left Liberals have always considered Trudeau one of them — and perhaps he still is — except when it comes to Quebec. For he will not allow his own people the option to choose independence.

Trudeau is lately being called St. Pierre, an appropriate nickname as it appears in the light of the events of the past few weeks.

The unity he calls for is not the unity of grief for a dead man and his family. It is a unity enabling him to wage the holy war.

Quebec Action statement

A meeting of the Quebec Action Committee was held Sunday night and issued the following statement:

"In the current situation of extraordinary crisis in Canada, we consider it astounding that the normal "educational" processes in this university should continue as though nothing unusual has happened.

We call on all students to meet in their departments and colleges to discuss the crisis and to consider what action they should take.

Canadian troops are currently occupying Quebec. Following the passage of the War Measures Act, hundreds of people in Quebec have been arrested.

Civil rights in this country have been suspended.

We do not think that the normal processes of this university should be allowed to continue until civil and political liberties have been fully restored to the people of Canada.

There will be an open general planning session of the Quebec Action Committee in Convocation Hall on Wednesday at one o'clock."

The "Kidnap Crisis" vs. the Quebecois

The CBC was calling it The Kidnap-ping Crisis.

The Toronto Daily Star was calling it The Kidnapping Drama.

And the federal government was hoping as well that French Canadians would look upon the abduction of James Cross, and then Pierre Laporte, as just another kidnapping story.

The proper spectacle, the ultimate newspaper story. The suspense, the drama, the excitement — and a universal disapproving scorn.

It didn't work out that way.

The kidnappings — planned and executed with sophistication and determination, and linked to a series of major concrete political demands — precipitated a major social and political crisis in French Canada.

Quebecois were well aware that Trudeau's warning that the identity of the kidnap victims was irrelevant to the FLQ, was manifestly untrue.

They knew he was entirely and absolutely wrong when he said: "The kidnap-pers' purposes would be served equally well by having in their grip you or me, or perhaps some child."

For there is an important degree of difference between Trudeau and the Quebecois, namely, power and authority.

As one Montreal observer commented Saturday: "To some degree or another, the majority of French Canadians support the demands of the FLQ."

If the killing of Pierre Laporte shocks us and impresses us with the futility of violence and terror as political strategies, we should still not have been surprised that events took this turn.

By stalling and never seriously negotiating with the FLQ, the federal government was playing a dangerous game. It was hoping that the very tenacity and ruthlessness of the FLQ would turn against them, dividing Quebecois opinion and casting the FLQ in the role of fanatical, violent, unprincipled men.

By refusing to enter seriously into negotiations — but playing out a dangerous political game — Ottawa precipitated the present social upheavals.

When the upheavals threatened to get out of hand after Thursday — as public support for the kidnap-pers and for the widely published FLQ manifesto mounted, the government panicked and reached for emergency measures.

There were two reactions to the political murder on Parliament Hill last night, besides the humbled formal statements of distress and tortured conscience, feelings politicians rarely give an airing.

There were some calls for wholesale vengeance, but mostly exclamations of amazement:

"This could never have been expected to happen here," said John Diefenbaker, the former Conservative Prime Minister.

Robert Thompson, the former Social Credit leader, now a Tory, took his stand in the glare of television lights and pronounced this warning:

"There are young people in our country, young people in the universities, who are questioning the old establishment, the very law and order that gives them the privileges that they have.

"Violence and terror can only be met by that.

"We have a responsibility to the future of our nation to preserve law and order. We haven't seen the worst of it."

In contrast to this fear and incomprehension coming from Parliament Hill, there was also a second kind of reaction, one which said that the actions of the FLQ must be understood as part of a broad pattern of rising revolutionary feelings in Quebec.

The dead end of the parliamentary process was indicated clearly last April 29 when more than 600,000 Quebe-cois voted clearly for separatism — and elected only an insignificant handful of representatives.

It comes out of all the frustrations of recent Quebec history — the struggles so clearly stated in the FLQ manifesto, which appeared in Friday's Varsity.

To articulate such frustrations in the form of terroristic acts performed by secret cells is a suicidal course, one which will not ultimately lead to revolutionary social changes.

Yet, the facts remain that this is the form actions in Quebec have taken and that, at this point, the Quebec people have not renounced their fight for independence and control of their own nation.

At this point in history it is the particular responsibility of English Canadians to refuse to look upon the social upheaval in Quebec as a spectacle. We must begin to understand its roots and its directions in a complete and analytical way.

Further, we must begin to join the fight against state authority, as manifested in the suspension of law and civil rights in Canada.

Some words from Quebec

(The following is an editorial statement from Quebec Presse, a weekly left wing newspaper published in Montreal and supported by Quebec trade unions. The editorial appears in yesterday's edition.)

Repression is going on. Political repression.

The list of citizens put under arrest, of which Gerald Godin, a member of the editorial board of Quebec Presse, is one, says a great deal about the kind of operation underway.

We have no news of the incarcerated citizens. We haven't even got official confirmation of their arrests. The population is completely in the dark.

Under these conditions, panic is a result of fear.

Jean Marchand, Federal Minister, has publicly declared that the government has been astonished because the Quebecois 'en masse' have not condemned, with the last of their energies, the action of the FLQ. The attitude of Quebec and of the Quebecois startled the Ottawa government who became frightened.

Thus they found it necessary to work against the evident agreement given by a part of the population to the FLQ manifesto. It was necessary to act firmly. Where did the war measures and the entrance of the army come from? Where did the clearly political repression come from?

Second act of the operation: brainwashing.

The operation has been unfurled from Ottawa. It is Pierre Elliot Trudeau who shot first. Friday night he gave the word on radio and television. He had made people afraid and he wanted to make them afraid. In fact, he was terrifying, for more than one

"If there's going to be any opposition to the Act," said one Ottawa University student this weekend, "It has to come from English Canada. Nothing can be done in Quebec now. There's police everywhere."

There are several meetings planned in departments and colleges on campus today to talk about the Quebec situation. Students should initiate such discussions in all classes and departments in the next several days.

The government was counting on its emergency wartime legislation to intimidate and cow the Quebecois who has read the FLQ manifesto and supports its political demands; they were counting on the FLQ's actions to divide English Canadians from the Quebecois, and the Quebecois among themselves. This strategy hasn't worked.

We are entering a time when the institutions of authority and power in this country will be challenged more and more frequently and powerfully.

When it becomes illegal to organize and work for fundamental social change — as may be the case in Canada at this very minute — a revolution will begin to take shape.

good reason. After the violence of the army and the soldiers, a lie was born.

Very sweetly, as if in confidence, Trudeau told the population that the next victims of the terrorists could be "a director of a Caisse Populaire (Credit Union), a farmer or a child," and even: "you or me."

Trudeau told lies and was conscious of doing it. He cannot ignore it: "You or me"; that is from the fuming demagogue. Between "you" and "me" there is the power.

Already, yesterday (Saturday), in Hull, some sadists wanted to justify, without doubt, the prophesies of Trudeau. A young woman was mutilated by some maniacs. Allegedly in the name of the FLQ.

But it is clear the FLQ does not threaten the population at random. It threatens, as it has said itself, the representatives of the forces who control Quebec. That is very different.

It is sufficient, as proof to look where the military has been installed in the areas of Montreal. There are a few in Francophone east and there are a great many in Westmont (where most of the rich English live). It is the minority, those who have wealth that they must protect.

The army is not in Quebec to protect the population. It is in Quebec to protect the wealthy. Everybody knows that, especially Trudeau and Bourassa. Consequently it is necessary to resist by using all the imaginable pacifist means.

This resistance must be a common concerted effort of the popular movements, of the citizen's committees, of all the associations and of all the trade unions.

Five Conquests

By LEO JOHNSON

1759: After a long siege which destroyed much of Quebec and neighbouring towns, farms, crops, etc., the British army led by Wolfe defeated the French Imperial Army under Montcalm. Quebec City surrendered in 1760, and Montreal falls in 1763. By the Treaty of Paris, Quebec becomes a British colony.

1810: After a long series of disputes with the Lower Canadian Assembly, Governor James Craig dissolves the assembly, suspends the constitution and orders the troops into the major cities.

Three leading French political figures, Pierre Bedard, F. X. Blanchet, and F. J. P. Taschereau, the printer of the French language newspaper Le Canadien were jailed. Bedard was held without bail for twelve months. In 1811 Craig was removed by colonial authorities and returned home in disgrace.

1837: In response to the refusal of British authorities to allow responsible government, the French population, led by L. J. Papineau begin to form guerilla organizations.

On November 26, British authorities order the arrest of 26 principal leaders, then attack rebel positions. In a series of pitched battles at St. Charles, St. Denis and St. Eustache a dozen soldiers were killed and over a hundred wounded. The patriots suffered heavy losses and the leadership retreated to U.S. territory from where they carried out raids for the next eighteen months. The British burnt several villages in reprisal (St. Charles, St. Eustache, St. Benoit among others), and numerous prisoners suffered heavy sentences.

The constitution was suspended and remained so until the Union of 1841 came into effect as a device aimed at submerging the French Canadians.

1914-1918: Using the War Measures Act passed in 1914, close control was kept upon Quebec as conscription was forced upon French Canadians. Easter weekend 1918, however, saw a series of riots against police and military brutality. On April 1, soldiers machine-gunned civilians. Four civilians were killed, over 100 wounded and fifty-eight arrested. Habeas Corpus was suspended by the government. April 13th, a coroner's jury declared that the persons killed on that occasion were innocent and demanded pensions for their dependants.

The Economic Roots of the Quebec Revolution

Victory of St. Denis 1837 Patriotes defeat British troops

Quebec is part of the political and economic system of Canada, and so Quebecois are grappling with many of the same problems as Canadians in other regions — economic stagnation, inflation and a large scale lack of jobs.

At the same time, the large majority of the people in Quebec are French speaking and part of a distinctive culture and historical experience as a people, since their ancestors first settled the St. Lawrence Valley in the 1600's and 1700's.

As part of the present political and economic system of Canada, Quebec's economic and social development runs head on into many of the same problems that are hitting working people and students all over Canada.

With the second largest population in the second most industrialized economy among the regions of Canada, Quebec has been faced for a long time with the same economic and social conflicts that other regions in Canada are just beginning to experience acutely.

Quebecois refer bitterly to the fact Quebec has held the championship in unemployment in Canada for too long. From 1958 to 1968, average unemployment in Quebec was 7.3 per cent compared with 3.9 per cent in Ontario.

In the last 15 years, the number of unemployed workers in Quebec has ranged from 20 to 40 per cent more than Canada as a whole, and from 50 to 100 per cent more than Ontario.

Today, with unemployment rising rapidly everywhere in Canada, Quebec still leads with an 8.9 per cent unemployed as compared to 4.4 per cent in Ontario.

One in 11 people in the Quebec work force are out of a job. Although Quebec has just a little more than one-quarter of the total work force in Canada, it has 41 per cent of the unemployed.

Young people are especially hard hit — 42 per cent of Quebec's unemployed are under 25.

Thus, although Quebec is rich in human and natural resources as compared to other regions in Canada, the majority of people in Quebec are relatively poor in relation to people in other parts of Canada.

If we take the base figure of 100 as Quebec's per capita income, then Ontario's is 127, BC's is 118, the average for all Canada, 111, with the Maritimes and Newfoundland poorer than Quebec at 81 and 62 respectively.

As a people with a distinctive culture, language and historical experience, the situation of Quebecois within their own territory is characterized by the fact that although Anglophones make up only about 13 per cent of the population, they hold most of the decision-making positions in the economy, and consequently most of the high income and status positions.

This dominance of Anglophones in the economy is the result of the fact that English Canadian and American interests control all the important sectors of the economy: banking and finance, manufacturing, and the resource industries.

It is estimated that 50 large industrial corporations control 75 per cent of industrial (including mining) production in Quebec; only three of these are controlled by local Quebecois capital.)

Thus although 62 per cent of the work force in Montreal is Francophone, only 37 per cent of the salaried personnel in large manufacturing corporations earning more than $5,000 is Francophone. And most of those were not far above the $5,000 level — just 17 per cent of jobs paying more than 15,000 was held by francophones.

Thus, the average income of male Anglophone wage and salary earners in Quebec is 41 per cent higher than that of Francophones. And since Francophones are much more concentrated in jobs hit by unemployment and in seasonal casual employment, this income disparity between Anglophones and Francophones in Quebec is even more gaping if the total income per capita of each group is compared.

The social and economic conflict generated by the present political and economic system in Canada are beginning to shake loose all kinds of movements and groups among the people in all parts of Canada.

The effects of that same system on Quebec, with growing intensity over a long period of time, has given birth to a whole range of political and social responses.

These movements have developed especially among the Francophone people both because they are most directly affected by economic problems producing inflation and unemployment and because of the special situation they have as a majority people dominated within their own territory by a minority group.

These movements in Quebec have developed over the last ten years in almost every sector of Quebec society: in the slums of Montreal and Quebec City, among trade unionists, students, teachers, and most recently among the people in the outlying regions such as the Gaspé, the Abitibi, where annual incomes average less than $1,000.

Part of this development of political and social movements of people grappling with day to day problems, of work, language, welfare, schooling, has been a tremendous cultural flowering — in literature, the arts, theatre film etc.

Such poet-singers as Vignon, Vigneault, Pauline Julien, and Charlebois express the thrust towards self-affirmation of the Quebec people in the last ten years.

These various movements have grown out of the concrete social and economic problems caused by the economic system of Canada. The program and activities of these movements have changed over time as they have increased their understanding of what needs to be changed through experience with the present system.

Thus the trade union movement, traditionally exclusively concerned with wages, has increasingly carried the struggle for social change to the roots of the present political and economic system by challenging the power of corporations and businessmen to make the important political and economic decisions that affect economic development, wages, schooling, hospital and health care, etc.

Similarly, community organization that originally sprung up in working class districts in Quebec City, despite urban redevelopment schemes that deprived them of housing, have formed an alliance with the trade union movement to win political power at City Hall, so that they can make their own decisions about their own community instead of fighting city hall decisions.

People in outlying regions such as Cabano in the Gaspé who started by participating in government redevelopment programs and still found it impossible to stop the government's giveaway program of natural resources to corporations found that the only way to make the government move was by physically stopping companies from cutting wood or building plants, until the problems of jobs and wages had been settled.

People in outlying regions such as Cabano in the Gaspé who started by participating in government redevelopment programs and still found it impossible to stop the government's giveaway program of natural resources to corporations found that the only way to make the government move was by physically stopping companies from cutting wood or building plants, until the problems of jobs and wages had been settled.

People such as students and intellectuals who started by demanding bilingualism to ensure that French would be spoken discovered that bilingualism in Quebec meant that Francophones learned to speak English.

Mass mobilization in the last two years have demanded french unilingualism (French as the only language of schooling and work) as the only solution to the rapid decline in the proportion of Francophones in Quebec.

Finally, the 30 per cent of Francophones who voted for the Parti Quebecois last April did not decide independence was necessary to solve Quebec's problems until a whole range of reforms within the federal system had been tried and failed during the 1960's. Two of the PQ leaders, Rene Levesque and Jacques Parizeau, were active reformers in the provincial government during the 1960's, and decided after trying the federal system that political independence was the necessary pre-requisite for solving Quebec's problems.

While all these movements originally took root in different sectors of the Quebec people around very specific issues, the major phenomenon of the last year has been their convergence on a variety of major issues.

This convergence has brought the support for the independence movement and pushed it towards programs of radical change, thus posing a serious challenge to the Montreal and Toronto big business elite and the federal government.

The seriousness of this democratic challenge and the broadly based popular support for radical change first exploded in the English Canadian consciousness during the spectacular rise of the Parti Quebecois during last April.

The Montreal and Toronto business elites and the federal government blew their cool by staging the Royal Trust withdrawal of funds from Montreal to Toronto a few days before the election, and by circulating falsified figures of taxes collected in Quebec and federal spending in Quebec.

This campaign of terrorizing the Quebec people might have scared off some of the more affluent PQ sympathizers, but it couldn't stop the more than 30 per cent of the Francophone vote and six seats in solid working class districts of Montreal.

The fact that the Quebec Bourassa Liberal party formed the government with just 24 per cent of the Francophone vote and the remaining twenty per cent of the Liberal vote from Anglophones, after a campaign of terror and manipulation of public opinion caused countless Quebecois to question the possibility of effecting serious change, even with the support of the people within the present electoral system.

It is this movement as a whole — the increasing militancy of the workers who refused government rationalization for unemployment and wage restrictions, the expansion of the trade union movement to include struggles for political power for the majority of the people, the transformation of very localized community organizations into disciplined mass organizations capable of posing a serious challenge to the rule of Drapeau in Montreal and politicization of large numbers of students and teachers — which is the target of the massive crackdown in Quebec by federal and provincial authorities.

Active members of every one of the democratic opposition movements in Quebec have been thrown in jail for an indefinite period during the last few days.

● members and candidates of the Front d'Action Politique, coalition of trade union political action committees and community organizations in Montreal who are contesting the Montreal civic elections;

● the staff of community projects, including the medical director of the St. Jacques community Health Clinic in Montreal, the director of the Montreal Family Planning Centre, and members of a family budgeting service;

● the members of the Parti Quebecois all over Quebec;

● university faculty, students and staff, including the secretary of the Union of Professors at the University of Montreal;

● trade unionists active in the summer confrontations between the construction union and the government;

● trade unionists active in building political action committees in cities and towns throughout Quebec;

● newspapermen, CBC reporters, and producers;

● Gaston Miron, winner of Quebec's highest literary award this year;

● Pauline Julien, chanteuse known around the world for her songs of Quebec's new spirit of freedom.

The extremist response by the federal government, opposed in vain by a united front of all the significant democratic opposition forces in Quebec cannot achieve its goal of eliminating this popular challenge to the present system in the short or long run.

In the short run, it would have to build hundreds of jails to hold thousands of people who are part of this democratic opposition which is challenging the Drapeaus, Bourassas, the Trudeaus, Royal Trusts which now control Quebec.

In the long run, they would have to make a radical changes in the political and economic system these movements are working towards if they were to permanently remove the social and economic conflicts that they have generated these popular movements.

The lesson of history is that it will be the movement rooted among the people that will carry through these changes.

Are students being doomed to powerlessness?

By BRIAN MORGAN

The new streamline Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science votes at 4:00 p.m. in the Senate Chambers today on a student motion to restructure the body along parity lines.

Brian Morgan, a Varsity reporter who covered last month's Faculty Council meeting analyzes below the meaning behind student representation on this or any council.

Today's meeting of the Faculty Council of Arts and Science will give an important indication of the future of student participation in the governing structures of this university. Many opinions and factions that have been quietly contained in committees and coffee chats for the past few months will have to come out in the open as students again present their proposal for forming a parity committee to work out the Council's permanent structure.

The issues involved go far beyond the mere composition of this committee. The basic question here is why should we obey the decisions made by the Faculty Council. What legitimate authority does this body have for its making the final decisions affecting courses, classes, professors — really all aspects of our lives that have anything to do with the Faculty of Arts and Science?

By "we", I mean both students and staff, for principled staff should also question whether they can accept the decisions of any body that is not a legitimate representation of the entire community that it is governing.

Obviously it was felt that the previous structure of the Council, with no students, was not legitimate. Otherwise no more would have been made to change it.

After much discussion, the faculty agreed to allow 34 students to sit on the Council. Why does having 34 students on this 1300 member body correct all that was wrong with having no students on it?

The answer is simple, and is contained in the view many faculty have of the role of students in the governing structures of the university.

First of all, it is clear that most faculty do want to see students involved with these structures. But what role do they really see for students? Some, of course, want to see them take a responsible part in the decision making process. Many, however, see student representatives as being merely a communication link between the student body, and the group actually making the decisions for that body. They feel this link will allow the powers-that-always-have-been to make more satisfactory decisions for all. They want a controllable number of informative students.

There is a grave danger of students themselves meekly accepting the role of powerless informants, intimidated by the threat that if they do not accept what is offered, they will get nothing. They believe the myth that if no students sit on these bodies, all lines of communication will be severed, and students will suffer accordingly.

It is possible for this attitude to prevail today, if students accept less than a parity committee, or in the future, if they accept a final structure that relegates students to an ineffective, controllable role.

They may accept an unacceptable composition in order to have some contact with the issues the Council deals with. If so, the drive to legitimize the Council will have failed. The protest to the system itself will be institutionalized as merely parts of a number of conflicting points of view on substantive matters the Council deals with. The opposition to the totality of the way these matters are dealt with will have been absorbed and thus rendered ineffectual.

Many faculty believe that the present interim structure should be the model for the permanent structure if the decisions made this prove to be, on the whole, right and acceptable to the people they concern. They would like to legitimize the Council on the basis of the quality and acceptability of the decisions it makes during this short interim period.

First, they forget that the nature of the decisions a body makes during a trial period could have very little resemblance to its work over an extended period of time.

More important, they do not understand that even if a decision is satisfactory to all, there is an essential difference between whether it was made by a body containing an effective number of students, and by one containing no students or mere token representation. They do not understand the ramifications of people having a paternalistic system of government during their university years, while they are forming crucial parts of their permanent life style.

They do not see that the only education of this kind of governing structure is an education in having decisions made for you by those who are presumed to be more capable merely because of the group they belong to, and in whose selection you have no say.

I wonder at the kind of life-style this is preparing us for. I shudder at the society of which this is an exemplary part.

Is SAC necessary?

...cause for time immemorial, the so few on a council will mean something or perhaps even nothing to so many on campus!!

What is SAC? Is it necessary? Can our own college councils suffice in looking after our interests on a faculty wide basis? Should we withdraw from SAC? Is SAC RELEVANT?

We vote in REPS, but do they reflect what we want? Or do they act impulsively, perhaps, on the dictates of their own personal philosophy and moral conscience?

Is SAC doing what we expect it to DO? What are ITS PRIORITIES? Do we know of them? Or, more important, do they have any? Should we take a decision-making role on priorities, as such?

SAC handles a QUARTER OF A MILLION DOLLARS annually! A QUARTER OF A MILLION DOLLARS . . . ANNUALLY . . . did you say? That isn't NOTHING, is it? How does it handle it? Or even perhaps DOLE IT AWAY???? Or is it that SAC "MUST SPEND" it all! All at once? — in two or three nights? Does it have to? And that also WHERE????

... Or is it that SAC needs revamping? Perhaps not, eh? Why get rid of some of the fiasco, perhaps, and carry some of it over? Why not get it to do what we want it to do? And how we want to perform them stipulated functions? Well, . . . a . . . SAC means STUDENTS' ADMINISTRATIVE COUNCIL. Students' Administrative Council? Where does that "STUDENT" bit come into it?

... THINK ABOUT IT! . . . there are questions ad infinitum . . .

STUDENTS OF THE U OF T UNITE! YOU HAVE NOTHING TO LOSE BUT YOUR STATUS QUO! . . . INCIDENTALLY YOU'VE ALREADY been levied your SAC FEE, haven't you???? ??????????

Teachers told corporal punishment is bad

By JEAN BUBBA

The public has been deluded into thinking that the problem of corporal punishment in classrooms has been solved when it hasn't, according to John Holt, American educational theorist, speaking at a press conference Friday for the Ontario Men's Teachers Federation.

"I think it is very bad, but I don't think you can legislate it out of existence, particularly if the students are poverty-stricken or coloured" he said.

"There is some effective limit to government power. The most administrators can do it to give a lot of back-up to teachers and schools who don't want to inflict corporal punishment."

This back-up would be in the form of moral and public support.

However, the selective gathering of teachers listening pressed for acceptable disciplinary measures.

"The noise level which a great many teachers would declare impossible for working is not a great deal more than what we would encounter in the street from traffic," said Holt. "I would install a decibel meter as a noise level indicator. We should do anything for self-feedback whereby children can control themselves."

"However, I can't make a decision about punishment unless we establish what a crime is," Holt said.

"Coercive measures depend on the range of behaviour you are trying to coerce. A rigid classroom demands severe punishment procedures since it is farthest from the nature of children."

"The less we try to curb the exploratory and creative urges of children, the less rigid the discipline must be," said Holt.

Speaking on the teacher in the master-slave relationship, Holt said that adults have a natural authority by their very existence as adults. "But when we came into the classroom as walking tape-recorders children sense very early that the teacher is wearing a mask," he said.

"There is nobody who is not interested in anything," Holt went on to say. "There are children who appear not to be interested in anything, who have developed a strategy of failure."

Zionists clash with Palestinians at debate

By MARCIA SINGER
Emotions ran high as pro-Palestinian and pro-Israeli groups clashed verbally at a Palestinian teach-in Friday night at the College of Education.
"A Palestine where Jews, Christians, and Moslems can live peacefully side by side, is the aim of the Palestinian Liberation Organization," said Gason Oude, a speaker for the Palestinian cause. He refused to explain how this would be accomplished.
Samuel Haddawi, a Palestinian speaker, admitted later, "I think that this man (Gason Oude) has wasted money coming from New York to talk to you. This money should be used to buy guns and bullets."
"Israel must admit they have committed an injustice to humanity. This is the first criterion for peace," said Haddawi.

Haddawi, speaking for his brother Palestinians, stated, "We do not want peace. We want justice."
"What type of justice was killing a bus, occupied by children, on their way to school?" asked an angry girl from the audience.
Haddawi denied that this bus was carrying school children. Assuming that it was, he asked why the bus was travelling so close to the de-militarized zone.
Haddawi claimed that the descendants of Abraham are the Jews who have lived peacefully in Arabic countries, such as Iraq and Yemen, for centuries, and not Israelis and Western Jews who are the descendants of the Hazzars of Russia.
"Why did almost all of these Jews leave these Arabic countries after 1948 if they had lived there peacefully for centuries?" asked someone from the audience.

He replied that Israeli agents planted bombs in the Jewish communities of these countries to scare the Jews into immigrating to Israel.
Oude reaffirmed the Palestinian Liberation Organization's support to all liberation movements, including the F.L.Q.
At the end of the teach-in, a group lingered in front of the college, arguing heatedly.

Who's the fairest one of all?

Well, let's see. She's self-confident. She carries on a good conversation but knows how to listen. From fashion and beauty news she selects what's right for her. And she probably looks quite a bit like you. What's more, she uses Tampax tampons.

Tampax tampons are the internal sanitary protection that keep her calm, comfortable and confident no matter what she's doing. No pins, pads and belts for her. And no other tampon, either. Because each Tampax tampon comes in a silken-smooth container-applicator, both the applicator and the tampon can be flushed away. No stick or plastic tube to dispose of. And the removal cord is securely chain stitched the entire length of every Tampax tampon.

Of course you only have to use Tampax tampons a few days of the month. So why are they so important? When you're the fairest one of all, every day is important. Right?

Revolution in Quebec: a chronology

THE FRONT DE LIBERATION DU QUEBEC has an action filled ten year history.

The group of revolutionary youth was started in 1960 by George Sheesters, a Université de Montreal student who felt that the "time had come to sow in the province a spirit of independence."

The small group emerged from under the dictatorship of former Premier Maurice Duplessis, and there was a strong taste among university radicals for a state of liberation.

Too often they had seen French Canadian workers engaged in bitter, bloodshed battles with the police force of the province over the rights to strike for better wages and living conditions.

Because of the colonial situation, Quebecois were worse off than workers in Canada. As a conquered nation, Quebecois were oppressed as workers and as Franco-phones.

A NUMBER OF SPORADIC BOMBINGS in the posh English suburb of Westmount sparked fear among the Montreal ruling classes but the revolutionary group then lacked training, discipline, and money, and as a result, many of their attempts proved to be abortive.

Soon, however, the FLQ invoked strict disciplinary measures on those members of the group and the group became much more selective in its recruiting campaign.

What followed in the next four years were holdups of large banks, financial houses owned by English Canadians or Americans and large department stores, all of which have helped finance the organization against the English ruling class.

With the inflow of discipline, a firm revolutionary ideology and more financial backing, the FLQ has been able to extend its operations into cells technically free from each other with members not knowing the members of others. This cell network has made the work of the federal authorities an "almost unsurmountable task."

EARLY MONDAY MORNING, Oct. 5. James Richard Cross, senior British Trade Commissioner in Montreal was kidnapped from his plush home on the foothills of Westmount.

The FLQ demands were:

- 1) The publication of a manifesto they had prepared.
- 2) The liberation of 23 political prisoners in Quebec.
- 3) The freed political prisoners to be placed aboard an aircraft bound for Cuba or Algeria.
- 4) The Post Office must reinstate all 400 Lapalme employees who suffered when the government refused to re-employ them.
- 5) Payment of $500,000 in gold to be placed aboard the aircraft carrying the released political prisoners to either Cuba or Algeria.
- 6) Identification of the most recent man to inform of the activities of the FLQ and publication of his name and photograph in all Quebec newspapers.
- 7) Immediate calling off of any police activity in the hunt for the kidnapped diplomat.

The first waves of concern immediately rippled through government chambers at both the provincial and federal level and what was to follow was a chess game between flabbergasted government officials and the organized FLQ members.

On Tuesday Oct. 6, word was passed on by federal authorities to federal provincial and local police in Montreal and Quebec City to impose tight security measures but "to play it cool and don't panic the abductors."

That same day the Quebec government held an emergency three hour session in an attempt to come to grips with a situation they claimed "threatened" the freedom of Canadians.

Since Oct. 5, the provincial and federal authorities have been holding hands. The attempt to root out the FLQ abductors and halt "subversion" in Quebec has been carried on mainly by undercover police who are in touch with the FBI, Scotland Yard and Interpol.

External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp immediately called for police protection of all foreign diplomats in Canada and guards to watch the premises of every embassy and consular office.

THE MILITANT REVOLUTIONARY TACTICS by the FLQ shocked top government officials around the "Free World".

Canadian officials had considered the thought of any threat to their embassy or personnel had little part in the discussions that led to the establishment of a special 700 man executive protection service.

"But I guess this brings us very much into play," one official commented. "We're no longer simply observers."

Not before too long the newspapers across the country printed the manifest of the FLQ.

"THE FLQ is neither the Messiah nor a modern day Robin Hood," says the manifesto.

"It is a group of Quebec workers who have decided to get everything in motion so that the people of Quebec may definitely take their destiny into their own hands."

The FLQ describes itself not as a movement of aggression but "the answer to aggression, the one organized by high finance through the intervention of federal and provincial governmental puppets."

Reference was made in the manifesto to Premier Bourassa's promise to provide 100,000 new jobs in Quebec by 1971. The document states:

"BOURASSA WILL MATURE in the year ahead when he sees 100,000 revolutionary workers organized and armed.

"We are fed up and so are more and more Quebecois with a spineless government which makes 1,000-and-1 somersaults to charm American millionaires while begging them to come and invest in Quebec."

Tuesday Oct. 6, Sharp informed the abductors that the federal government would in no way comply with the ransom demands. But he added he was ready to make some kind of a deal with the FLQ.

And Tuesday night the government announced its agreement with Ottawa that the ransom price would be impossible to meet.

AT THE SAME TIME lawyer Robert Lemieux, legal counsel for many "feliquistes" held his first press conference. The conference turned into daily and international events within three days.

Lemieux said and reiterated that the government was playing games. It professed to wanting negotiations but kept up its intense police hunt.

He also continually emphasized that the FLQ had resorted to the guerilla tactics of kidnapping because of the way their colleagues had been treated in Quebec courts.

Pierre-Paul Geoffrey, for example, was sentenced to an unprecedented (anywhere in North America) 124 life sentences — 5-850 years in jail. In addition, he noted testimony from delegates to the FLQ trials from the International League of the Rights of Man which indicated that the men had been convicted — not for specific crimes, but for their political views.

TUESDAY NIGHT a second communique was received by radio station CKAC in Montreal from the FLQ stating if the demands were not met by 8.30 a.m. Wednesday, "we will do away with him."

The same evening Prime Minister Trudeau stated "the will of the minority cannot be imposed on the majority by force."

Wednesdays, tensions were mounting among baffled government officials taken aback by the sudden rise of militancy and in appeal to gain sympathy for the Quebec government, Justice Minister Jerome Choquette appealed to the kidnapers of Cross to call him to negotiate.

The same day another communique was found that extended the ransom until Thursday midnight. The FLQ stated it would not open negotiations with the government but asked the federal government which of its seven demands they found unreasonable.

BUT IN AN ATTEMPT to spare Cross's life, a further deadline was set. And on the same day Montreal police revealed they were searching for five prime suspects and Saturday they announced no steps had been taken by the federal government's penitentiary officials to prepare the exchange of prisoners for Mr. Cross.

Saturday, October 10, Premier Bourassa issued an initial ultimatum saying that none of the demands of the FLQ would be met by the government and he announced a final proposition to the kidnapers saying that if they would give themselves up and return the two officials unharmed they would be given safe passage out of the country to Cuba or Algeria.

The FLQ's reply to this proposition was not long in coming. Thirty-five minutes later, Quebec Labour Minister Pierre Laporte joined the ranks of the kidnapped in the hands of the FLQ. The minister was taken by two men armed with machine guns as he was playing football on his front lawn.

Laporte's capture was followed by another communique Sunday morning from the FLQ. The handwritten note revealed the second kidnap had not been carried out by the original "liberation" cell of the FLQ but by a group identifying itself as the Chenier cell.

ALTHOUGH AT THIS POINT the price of Cross's life had been reduced to the release of 23 political prisoners and the cessation of police activities with respect to the kidnappings, the price set for Laporte was somewhat stiffer: it composed all the seven initial demands of the Liberation cell with the exception of the publication of the FLQ manifest which had already been carried out.

A further communique Monday confirmed if these demands were not met both hostages would be executed.

In the meantime radical lawyer Robert Lemieux, named by the FLQ as their "negotiator", was arrested in his $16 per week room at the Nelson Hotel in Montreal on charges he was obstructing justice in the hunt for the kidnapers.

He was finally released Tuesday morning after the government realized he could be valuable to them in their negotiations with the FLQ.

A GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATOR was named. Thirty-three year old Robert Demers, a member of the Bourassa clan was to negotiate with Lemieux. The two lawyers first met in Lemieux's jail cell Monday evening. Their meeting highlighted two days of exchanges between the two cells of the FLQ and Bourassa, who broke what was a hardline government position when he announced Sunday evening that talks about the 23 FLQ prisoners could not be held until after the safe return of the two hostages.

That same day hundreds of heavily armed Canadian troops were brought into the capital city, Ottawa, to protect cabinet ministers, diplomats, prominent wealthy people and the federal buildings from possible FLQ attacks.

As many as 1,000 troops were brought into the capital from Camp Petawa, about 100 miles north east of Ottawa.

Thousands of troops were trucked into the Montreal area from Gagetown, New Brunswick and others were flown in from a base in Saskatchewan.

TROOPS HAVE BEEN GUARDING any prominent building for the last five days in Montreal and police began raiding homes of sympathizers of the FLQ and suspected FLQ members at the same time. The toll rose to over 250 by Friday night following the passage of the War Measures Bill in the House of Commons at 4 am Friday morning.

Police immediately took advantage of the situation to clean out all the left wing groups they had wanted to get rid of since Drapeau warned last year of a revolutionary conspiracy. They went after radical press shops, draft dodgers, deserters, radical Vietnamese students, militant workers committees. And for safekeeping they also rounded up a selection of lawyers, journalists, singers and doctors.

All negotiations broke down between the FLQ and the government when Lemieux resigned as the FLQ negotiator as it became apparent the government would not negotiate. He called the government's actions hysterical.

The action taken by the federal government shouldn't affect any peaceful democratic Canadian. Justice Minister John Turner said in a press interview. "Those who want to change the government through the ballot box have no reason to fear the measures taken by us."

WHAT ABOUT THE MOUNTING ARRESTS in Montreal and Quebec City area? "The Attorney General must have had some reason to suspect them," he said with a grin.

Since the War Measures Bill was put into effect, the Federal government has been given verbal support from Premier Roberts of Ontario, Premier Ross Thatcher of Saskatchewan, Premier Strom of Alberta and Joey Smallwood, premier of Newfoundland.

But the measures taken by the government have met strong opposition as well from labour, student and welfare groups across the country. Demonstrations against the government's actions began to flare up across the country in Calgary, Vancouver, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec City.

In defence of their actions the government officials said they put the act into effect following the receipt of a Montreal Police report on subversion in the city.

THE REPORT WAS APPARENTLY UNFOLDED by Montreal police.

But little else is known. Both radio and newspapers have had sketchy reports following a censor imposed on the media by the government.

Saturday night at 11 p.m., Quebec Premier Bourassa told the FLQ cells that they would be given safe conduct to Cuba if they would surrender Cross and Laporte to officials at Man And His World in Montreal.

An hour later, the body of Laporte was found in the trunk of the car used in his abduction at a military airport outside of Montreal. There were reports that Cross' body had also been found but this proved untrue. On Sunday afternoon, a private radio station received another FLQ communique and letters written by Cross showing that he was still alive.

WHAT IS TO FOLLOW IS ANYONE'S GUESS.

And the pollution debate drags on (yawn...)

Platitudes of politicians, regurgitations of known facts, and unanimity of panelists that pollution was bad, made up Survival Day's pollution debate. Disillusionment, for lack of a more exciting evening, is expressed in the following story by Irene Bork.

And the Great Debate goes on! Survival Week, which seems to live only for seven days, visited Toronto on October 12 and was greeted by a reading of 55 from Pollution Index. Of course, Sulphur Dioxide and Carbon Monoxide were also present laying down a thick orange carpet over the city in her honor.

And the Great Debate goes on! On October 14, contained by the walls of Convocation Hall, were approximately a hundred and fifty people and three panelists. One was Donald Collins from the Ontario Water Resources Commission, and the other two were, alas, politicians. The meeting of these men was through the effort of Pollution Probe.

And the Great Debate goes on! Who deserves the wrist slapping that makes our survival difficult? According to the Ontario government C.P.R., Ontario Hydro, Campbell (m-m-good) Soup Co., McGuiness Brewery, T. Eaton, the Wellesley and the Toronto General Hospital, Massey Ferguson, and York University, would you believe? You better believe it!

Questioned on the pollution caused by Consumer's Gas in Lake Erie, Collins stated that any further damage would be irreversible. But, he said the company's wealth could make pollution acceptable if argument and determination are sounded in the highest courts.

One question concerning the possibility of recycling was met with answers that suggested it was the only method of salvation. Toronto produces nine million pounds of garbage daily which cannot be ignored. Murray Young (NDP) stressed the need for public education in order to illustrate which articles could or could not disintegrate, and to instruct further how to separate these and dispose of them.

Further questioning included the size of Toronto. The politicians spoke of restricting the city to its present size, planning for developments in other sites, and constructing a vast transit system. Glendon Ghant (Liberal) stressed the need for research in pollution and population control.

Still in the cause of survival an answer was needed on the penalties of polluting. The panelists were united in their stance that air pollution SHOULD be a criminal offence and the top executives jailed or at least the factories closed.

And the Great Debate goes on! From the audience a man ventured to ask about universal environment control. Collins speculated that perhaps pollution might be the unifying factor of nations fore-ing them to meet and to discuss environmental standards, also, the possibility of discussing resource sharing with those peoples who exercise proper control over their earth, air and waters.

And the Great Debate goes on!

Petition circulates

Group seeks referendum on SAC

By ELEANOR JOHNSON

A petition calling for a referendum on last week's SAC budget is being circulated on campus.

Although the referendum asks whether SAC should be abolished, results of a simple referendum are not constitutionally sufficient to disband the $292,000 a year body.

Bill Scadding (Law I), who composed the petition said, "We're not trying to tear down SAC without proposing alternatives. We hope it will be an educational project, to make students aware of SAC and its activities. Just because we propose these questions doesn't mean we automatically say 'No'.

"It is not a 'Hack away at SAC day'. We're not calling for anyone's resignation. We just want to have open discussion. We're concerned that students have more say in deciding SAC priority."

According to External Affairs Commissioner Vince Dolan, "The person who wrote it has a poor analysis of what's going on. Many of his facts are sensationalistic."

However, some SAC members support the referendum.

Vic SAC representative Doug Mannis circulating the petition on the Vic campus. He said, "The basis of this petition is, I suppose, destructive — like the Counter-Budget. There are many parallels between the situation with CUS last year."

Some think they're just losing $13. Even SAC Vice-President Eric Miglin favours holding a referendum. "It might be a good idea to put before the students. I just hope that the students will consider it seriously. Some irresponsible people might put an end to SAC. The problem is with some people on SAC, not in the organization itself," he said.

Judicial Commissioner Craig Perkins said, "In view of what happened at the SAC meeting, some clearing of the air is necessary. We need a clear-cut decision."

The petition reads: "Whereas the present Student Administrative Council has displayed its inability to decide on priorities and whereas SAC has shown financial irresponsibility and insensitivity to the needs and desires of University of Toronto students, we the undersigned, SAC-fees-paying students, demand that a binding referendum be held as soon as possible on the following questions:

1) Shall the body known as the Student Administrative Council continue to exist?

2) Rank the following general areas in the order of priority SAC should give them:

A. continuing off-campus services
B. short-term off-campus projects

C. continuing on-campus services
D. short-term on-campus projects

3) Shall the revised SAC budget approved at the SAC meeting on October 14, stand?

4) Shall SAC have an operating deficit in any fiscal year?

5) Shall SAC give any money to the Black Student's Union?

6) Shall the SAC grant to the Varsity exceed $25,000 net after deducting costs of bad debts and services rendered by SAC employees?

THE MIDI IN OUR MIDST

BY WENDY SMITH

In the series of Varsity articles entitled "Fashism", an insight was given into the workings of the designer industry, causing speculation as to whether a woman really does have a mind of her own. With the advent of the midi, this has become a crucial question to the designers, the retailers, the girl-watchers, and the females themselves. The following is the result of an informal (and freely quoted) survey on the subject:

Janes Sujiman (UC III): "The midi can be attractive with the right accessories, and on someone tall and thin. The midi-vest is alright. I think it's just a passing fad, though: women will accept anything to be in. It might catch on better in the winter, when it is more practical." But would she buy one herself? "No."

Anonymous girl (VIC III): "I don't like the midi, but I would wear it if everyone else were wearing it, and most of my friends feel the same way. I think it will come to be the fashion, but I don't think it will last long."

Donna Martindale (VIC III): "I suppose if that were all that was being worn, I would have to wear one, but as long as I can wear the other, I will. A survey of the men where I worked showed that most of them were against it." Did she think there was any coercion on the part of the designers? "No. Women don't have to buy it."

Anonymous girl (UC II): "They're ugly, and I wouldn't wear one: I've never considered buying one, and I think they'll fade out."

Cheryl Casson (VIC II): "I have a long coat (just to the bottom of my knee), but I wouldn't buy everything long. I like the long coats because they keep you warm, but I don't really like the midi: the length makes you look like an old lady. I don't think the designers have the main say in whether we buy them: a lot depends on whether you like them."

Liz Grogan (VIC III): (wearing a midi coat): "I didn't like the midi at first, but I worked in a store during the summer and I really got involved in it. I wore one a couple of times and got to like it. I think it will catch on: the longer length will, anyway even if the midi doesn't." Would a woman buy them for their aesthetic value? "No. They get them because everyone else does."

Significantly, most of those polled were anxious to know the general consensus, and particularly the result of any survey of the male opinion. Significant also was the fact that the men were much more vehement in their stand: if their influence has ascendancy over the designers in the fight for control of the fickle female phren, the midi seems doomed to a short life:

From Apathy Corner in the UC Refectory:

Mike Cafferata: "I hate them. They're a step backwards. I've only counted about four on campus. The designers may be being coercive, but I'm being just as coercive in discouraging them."

Harry Abel: "I want a 'Save the Mini' bumper-sticker for my car."

Michael (Shoie) Schoenburn: "I like minis on everyone but 13-year olds (but don't tell my wife!) I agree with what a well-known comedienne said: 'The midi cuts the leg in an awful ugly spot.'"

Tom Russello, (Night-school student): "I think they're stupid: they're really ugly."

A Father (and Engineer): "I think they're on the way out, and none too soon. I sincerely hope that the dress-designers and suppliers incur tremendous debts over this."

Philip Peebles (NEW III): "I don't have any strong opinions about them... I hate them!"

Yossarian helps you beat the record rip-off

By Chris Dymond

"THIS STORE is an attempt to stop some of the record industry rip-off. So please don't rip us off or we will rip you off."

These words written on the walls of Yossarian Records introduce passers-by to the lowest record prices in Toronto. It is a strictly nonprofit venture operated at a minimum cost and designed to reduce our already inflated prices. It was originated by Paul Herman and Dave Hunder last June. Later they were joined by a third longhair, Phil Roebuck.

"There is no relation between the cost of production and the selling price of an album", said Phil Roebuck. "We take albums from the distributor and sell them at $.20 more than they cost us."

This virtually eliminates one middleman in the chain between producer and consumer and lets Yossarian sell at prices consistently lower than any but sale prices at other stores.

Yossarian opened last summer in a phone boot-like room on Rochdale's ground floor. Originally they had little or no stock and took orders only for records. This function is still provided. Records ordered usually arrive the same afternoon. Next week Yossarian will receive a stock of $5,000 worth of albums. Presently their stock is about $1200 of the more popular selections. The Woodstock album at $9.35 is their largest seller. Suggested list price for this is $15.95.

The proprietors point out that this is not just a discount but a free store. The first was in Berkley called Leopold. Hopefully free stores will continue to include other facets of our society.

"We're trying to turn people on to the fact that they don't need a lot of money to live on. Our salaries are $35.00 a week and we are not lacking" said Phil. "Ideally we'd like to see a number of other businesses lower their prices."

The idea of non-profit companies is apparently spreading.

"We have a friend starting a non-profit recording company," but Phil feels a reduction in other fields is less plausible.

"But the rip-offs have got to stop. . . A lot of people are starting to realize it doesn't take a lot of bread to live on. In the house where I live there's an electrician, a plumber, a lot of people living communally. If one guy needs his car fixed we do it and he does something for us."

The Varsity — Aeryn Weissman

The record industry is especially guilty of inflating prices. The manufacturers sell all records through distributors who in turn sell to the record company. If a company is large enough — Sam's, for example — it can handle both the distribution and the sale. Thus it could offer lower prices than other record stores by eliminating either or both of its sales mark-ups.

"Record prices are bullshit", says Herman, founder of the store. "What we're doing is constructive. Our low prices can take a lot of volume away from downtown stores."

The result has to be lower prices in other stores. Herman points out however that Yossarian's reduction is still eliminating only one of the mark-ups between the producer and the consumer.

Record companies will frequently release a large amount of records at a reduced price to get rid of stock. (These are called cutouts because there is a small hole in the cover of each.) The consumer then buys these sale records at low prices. The elimination of the substantial mark-up at the factory would reduce prices to much below the low sale price of a cutout now.

Yossarian had some trouble finding suppliers originally.

"They were reluctant to give us records on consignment because they thought we would rip them off."

"We were having a lot of trouble talking this one distributor into giving us a large stock. We would nearly convince him then he would call us the next day and say he was paranoid."

"After several meetings we had him almost convinced so one day all three of us went up to see him: A friend of ours drove us up in a truck and several friends had nothing to do so they came along.

"When we got inside there were stacks of albums all over. The three of us went in to talk to the manager. Then he discovered one of the guys with us had ripped him off for $40 worth of records. The whole deal was off."

Other distributors were wary of the non-profit group.

"They kept on talking to us with 'you don't have to use that free-store line with us' attitude", said Hunder. "They can't seem to understand why we're doing it."

Despite the suppliers' apprehension they realize Yossarian has an amazing potential to make money since at low prices the volume could be tremendous. Consequently distributors have agreed to giving them a large stock next week.

The store's success thus far has encouraged them to expand operations. By next spring Herman estimates as many as a dozen branches will be in operation. In the Rochdale store they plan to introduce several other items for sale.

A number of political works will also be there soon. Herman pointed out that "This isn't a peace and love trip. We're into politics and are waging a protected people's war." Through the sale of political material he hopes Yossarian will inform people of more political issues.

There are a number of other useful plans which include whole wheat health bread and a winter clothing project for those who can't afford expensive merchandise. A sign asks people to contribute used clothing which will be mended and given to the needy.

Yossarian is interested in marketing any saleable product. If you are adept at making candles for instance, take a sample of your work up there and they'll let you display it.

"We'd like to offer an alternative to creative people who sell their work to boutiques for $1.50 and then see them on sale for $5.00" says Herman.

Yossarian Records' potential induced Rochdale officials to give them accommodation rent-free until they are able to pay for it. With the recent movement into a much larger room it appears the College has confidence in Yossarian's expansion.

The store was founded by Herman and Hunder who attended Everdale, a free school near Toronto. After meeting again in Europe they conceived the non-profit record store idea.

"We delayed opening for a week," said Herman, "because we couldn't decide on a name." But Yossarian, the hero of Joseph Heller's book, Catch 22, was ultimately chosen. "I read the book 15 times and the name had to be Yossarian."

Later Roebuck, a U of T student for two years joined them. The trio functions quite effectively with no idea being inconceivable.

"I want to start a buy-your-own-rock-festival," said Herman. "People come in here, sign up and give a dollar. When we get enough money we buy a group like the Grateful Dead. It's such a crazy idea they'll play for a minimal sum."

A "rent-a-hippie" sign appeared in the window today. Someone had been evicted from Rochdale and was trying to sell his services. His absence during the afternoon testified to his success.

Despite some zany ideas Yossarian's triumvirate is sincere in its efforts to reduce the "cultural rip-off."

Varsity track squad runs fourth in OQ-AA

By CLIVE HOBSON

The opening and closing events at the OQAA Track and Field Championships, held at MacMaster University on Saturday, were two high points of an outstanding Varsity performance.

Throughout the rest of the day the gutsy twenty-one-man squad of runners, jumpers and throwers; ran, threw, and jumped their hearts out, in bloody determination to at least stay within sight of the all powerful Waterloo and Western teams.

What this team lacked in natural talent and style, they more than made up for in a worthy display of guts, determination and desire.

In a meet dominated by stars, record holders and veterans; Varsity, scratched, clawed and scrambled its way to a fourth place finish just one point behind the hosts, MacMaster. First place was taken by a talent-rich Waterloo team and second place by powerful Western.

The meet started off under dismal conditions, temperatures in the high thirties and rain falling.

This dampened the turf track just before the start of the 10,000 metre fun, and Brian Armstrong from Toronto made the right decision when he decided to wear spikes as opposed to the flats worn by many of the other competitors. This gave him a big advantage on the slippery, greasy track.

Brian took the lead on the first lap and never relinquished it. Gaining an average of three seconds a lap, Brian slowly pulled into an insurmountable lead over the favourite for this event, Brian Bisson from Waterloo.

Richie Pyne who won this event at the interfac meet a week ago ran a steady race to finish in third spot to give Varsity nine points.

Eric Little, a first year rookie on the squad had a busy day, he started off at 10 o'clock in the long jump, and six and a half hours later he was still going at it, this time in the high jump. In between he took time out to run in the heats of the 110-metre hurdles.

The sprints were Varsity's main downfall, we failed to score in anything from 100 to 800 metres. Yet we can't fault the runners that competed yesterday, people like Alan Tucker, Matt Duncan and Mark Minden all ran their hearts out, they went through a gruelling day of qualifying heats for at least two events each, then the finals, and lastly they combined with other overworked runners to form relay squads.

In the 1500 metre run, Paul Glynn from Toronto ran an excellent race to finish in fourth place behind Grant McLaren. Glynn's time was a commendable 3:58.9.

As expected our strong field team came through with three first place finishes, one second and three thirds. Grant Tadman threw the discus 152' to win the event. Earlier in the day he had heaved a shot to a personal best of 50'3" to finish second behind record breaker Bruce Hayman from McMaster whose throw measured 51'4".

The Javelin throw produced a sixth place for Andy Dzenis who launched his projectile 186'5". The winner was Glen Arbeau from Waterloo with a distance of 225'.

Brian Penny put up a commendable performance in the high jump to finish third on a jump of 6'3", just one inch below his personal best.

Ray Anthony, from Western went on to set a new OQAA record of 6'6".

Dave Watt showed good form in finishing third in the triple jump, he cleared 45' 11 1/2" for a personal best. Watt also ran sixth in the finals of the 110 metre hurdles.

The pole vault produced a grand finale for the staunch Varsity group as the entire team gathered to watch Bruce Simpson, who had shown amazing cool in sitting around all afternoon, after opting to pass at all heights below 15'.

He then moved into the competition at fifteen feet, cleared that with ease, eliminated the competition at fifteen feet, cleared that.

He then moved into the competition at fifteen feet, cleared that with ease, eliminated the competition at that height and had the bar moved to sixteen feet. Simpson cleared that, then sat back and waited as an ill prepared team of McMaster officials scurried around looking for ways to raise the bar to 16'6". A height totally unexpected.

They finally solved the problem by precariously balancing two nervous Mac students on top of two step ladders as they held the uprights in place.

Bruce then made three attempts to clear that height but narrowly missed. However the 16 feet he had cleared earlier was a new OQAA record, and along with the third place finish of Dave Barrett the Varsity team concluded the meet as they had started, with nine points.

Final top-four point standings — Waterloo 101, Western 63, McMaster 44 and Toronto 43

Blues lose, will need help to finish first

Gaels down Varsity 29-15 at Kingston

By LYNDON LITTLE

Saturday afternoon in Kingston is what Canadian college football is all about.

The weather was perfect: cool, crisp and sunny. To make the setting just right, it was the Queen's Homecoming and the arch-rival Varsity Blues were in town for the big showdown. The winner would be solidly in the driver's seat for the 1970 Yates Cup.

Blues made the afternoon complete, bowing to the Gaels 29-15.

It was the last game Blues will ever play in ramshackle Richardson Memorial Stadium. They're tearing it down and replacing it with a new football facility on another location.

AS FAR as the Varsity Blues football team is concerned, it would be most appropriate if the old site were turned into a graveyard.

For more times than anyone cares to remember, Richardson Stadium has meant just that — a graveyard for Varsity championship dreams.

Although it was Blues first defeat of the season, they are now in the position of having to depend on an upset of the Gaels by either McGill, Waterloo or McMaster in the remaining three weekends of the regular schedule.

This Saturday, when Queen's goes into Molson Stadium to meet McGill should have been the best opportunity. However, the Redmen were defeated by the lowly Waterloo Warriors 20-15 on Saturday and now appear headed on a downward slide to oblivion.

But the whole question may be academic.

The way Blues were battered in Kingston Saturday they may be hard-pressed to sweep their remaining games.

To add to their already crowded injury list, halfback Cor Doret and middle linebacker Bill Bennett also picked up serious knee injuries.

Doret, who was just rounding into the form that made him one of the league's outstanding rookies last season while Bennet was the hub of Blues' defense.

THERE IS no need for sophisticated analysis of Blues' defeat at the hands of the same team they had beaten 27-18 at Varsity Stadium just two weeks previous.

"They just did to us what we did to them at Toronto — beat us physically," said a disappointed Ron Murphy after the game.

"I know it's been said many times before," offered assistant coach Dave Copp, "but football is basically blocking and tackling, and we just didn't have it today."

The Gaels reversed the tables on Blues from the first meeting between the two teams.

This time, it was Queen's who had the all-important ball control.

The Queen's defense held Blues' league-leading rushing game to only 84 yards in the first half and forced them to go to the air in the second.

At the same time, the Gaels were moving the ball impressively along the ground with their trio of big backs Heino Lilles, Brian Warrender and Keith Eaman. They ended up with a whopping 288 yards rushing to only 91 for the Blues.

BLUES ENJOYED a short-lived 7-1 lead in the first quarter when quarterback Wayne Dunkley hit rookie flanker Ken Lee with an 18-yard touchdown pass. The score was set up when Jody Ortvad recovered a Lilles' fumble on the Queen's 21.

The Gaels erased that margin early in the second quarter when Warrender capped a 65-yard march in 10 plays when he went over from two-yards out for a major.

A Doug Cozac field goal on the last play of the second period gave Queen's a 11-7 half-time advantage.

They upped their lead to 14-7 at three-quarter time on another Cozac effort then outscored Blues 15-7 in the fourth on a 26-yard run by Eaman and a 71-yard punt return by rookie Stu Lang.

Blues ironically scored the game's last touchdown on their only sustained march of the game. With the Gaels in a semi-prevent defense, Dunkley took Blues 85 yards in eight plays before tossing a short pass to halfback Bob Morrow.

The overall disappointing performance overshadowed some fine individual efforts for the Blues. Jody Ortvad played a strong game from his defensive rover position while Morrow, who came on to replace Doret, ran hard, often with little help.

Blues Notes — Lilles was Gaels' top rusher with 114 yards on 21 carries . . . Besides their 288 yards rushing from scrimmage, Queen's picked up 172 yards in punt returns including Lang's for fourth-quarter major . . . Blues dominated the passing stats with Dunkley hitting on 16 of 31 passes for 201 yards while Gaels' "Skip" Rochette was good on four of ten for only 45 yards. John Chapman was Dunkley's favorite target as he gathered in six passes for 59 yards . . . In the other SIFL match on the weekend, Frank Cosentino's Western Mustangs picked up their third-straight victory as they downed the McMaster Marauders 23-5.

Sail to win

A team of U of T sailors composed of Ian Brown, Tom Shensstone, Peter Skelton and Alan Graham participated in an international invitational regatta last weekend, gaining five firsts, three thirds and two DNF's (did not finish) in ten races easily winning the series.

Other teams competing were R.M.C., Trent, R.P.I. (Albany), and Union (N.Y.).

One look tells the whole story! Rich Agro (right) and Blues' head coach Ron Murphy grimly watch action from the sidelines.

Poli Ec students challenge Ottawa

By LAURA KELLY

A plenary session of the Political Economy Course Union passed resolutions recommending student action on the Quebec situation at the end of the all-day teach-in at the U of T yesterday.

The resolutions are:

• We the students of the University of Toronto put the value of individual human lives above all other values. Therefore we request the Federal government of Canada immediately re-open negotiations with the FLQ to do everything in their power to save the life of British Trade Commissioner, James R. Cross.

• The plenary session of the PECU demands that 1) the Federal government revoke the War Measures Act and other repressive legislation; 2) all political prisoners jailed by the War Measures Act be released; 3) Federal troops be withdrawn from Quebec; 4) the rights of the people of Quebec to self-determination be recognized.

• The plenary session of the PECU calls on all students in Political Economy and all other departments to convert all classes to discussion and analysis of the situation in Quebec, the crisis in Canada, and the imposition of the War Measures Act with an eye to building an informed basis for further action on this campus.

The afternoon teach-in session of speeches and discussions from one until five p.m. was a forum for both student and faculty opinion. Conflict over the controversial situation was evident as speakers were followed by cheers and catcalls from the crowd of 300, and floor discussions became shouting matches.

Phil Resnick, a U of T graduate student, opened the session with readings from Pierre Vallieres, an FLQ leader now jailed in Quebec, describing the misery of working class life in Quebec.

Resnick, ended bi-lingually by declaring himself "A Quebecois" and "proud to be part of the generation of the seventies, the generation of an independent Quebec."

Michael Bliss, a U of T history professor, followed Resnick with a stinging negation of any pro-revolutionary stance.

"This is an unprecedented crisis of a terrorist, revolutionary conspiracy. The government has not over-reacted, but possibly has underreacted," said Bliss.

Bliss stated that the government had previously given the FLQ the benefit of the doubt and refused to imprison them because they say they are revolutionaries, but the kidnapping forced the government's hand.

CAREFUL! You're living in a police state now.

The Varsity — Errol Young

Bliss warned the left of harming itself by accepting extreme left political interpretations solely because they are left.

"If it is true that we live in a tyranny then perhaps revolution is right, but this is not the tyranny and the analysis is wrong. This left analysis is the worst kind of elitism declaring 'We know what the people want,' said Bliss.

Bliss' presentation sparked several students to declare that the War Measures Act is undisguised censorship and oppression.

Mel Watkins, U of T Economics professor, moderated the two sides: "The last two weeks have been frightening evidence of extremism on the right and the left. The left is being crushed in Quebec not just because of the FLQ. But we must ask ourselves if the acts that these revolutionary men have engaged in would create a democratic Quebec."

Watkins asserted that Trudeau and Bourassa never had the intention to negotiate with the FLQ, and that the War Measures Act is being used to suppress the legitimate demands of the people for separatism.

"Those of us on the left feel events here have caused a most serious split between the French and English," said Watkins.

Phyllis Clark, a U of T graduate student, stated. "There is introduction of legislation that would make possible the destruction of the whole labor movement in Quebec not just the FLQ."

Reaction to the pro-left attitude was expressed by many students as horror at La Porte's assassination and disgust with any separatist or radical movement in Quebec. Again one opinion was quickly met by another.

"Let's not be apologists for the FLQ. Deny them, because the Canadian left does not need them," asserted one student.

"I object to people being used, and the FLQ and the government is using the lives of two men for their own causes," said Peter Hall, SAC University Commissioner.

The intentions of the group crystallized when Gary Webster, U of T graduate student spoke on the over-all situation

"We have to realize that Trudeau takes a consistent stand. It's predictable that when the decision is between the elite state and human rights he will protect the state," said Webster.

"What they really want to do in Quebec is to prevent the feeling that the people could take power in labor unions, ridings, and other government bodies. That is what the FLQ manifesto talked about-what they did is something different," Webster said

The resolutions were formulated and passed by the remaining one hundred people and Phil Resnick was chosen as the spokesman of the group at the Quebec Action Meeting today at Convocation Hall at 1 p.m.

GSU damns act

The Graduates Students' Union General Council last night passed a motion condemning the War Measures Act and calling for its revocation

The motion read as follows
Whereas,

- 1) The War Measures Act passed by Parliament is a serious threat to the civil liberties of all Canadians; &
- 2) The Act goes much further than necessary to curb criminal activities; &
- 3) The Act is being used by the Federal Gov't directly against the democratic, progressive and separatist movements in Quebec.

Therefore, The GSU General Council calls for:

- 1) Immediate revocation of the War Measures Act; and,
- 2) Immediate release of those persons detained under the Act

Crisis causes reactions around the world

OTTAWA (CUP) — Reactions and repercussions of the FLQ kidnappings continue in Quebec, Canada and around the world.

The three biggest Quebec trade unions — the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the Quebec Federation of Labour and the Quebec Teachers Corporation — will hold a joint extraordinary plenary session of their groups today in Quebec City.

The unions, who will probably be joined by the Part I Quebecois, will discuss further action to protest Ottawa's actions in imposing The Wartime Measures Act (WMA) and Quebec's acquiescence to the federal power.

To date, combined municipal, provincial and federal police forces in Montreal have rounded up 343 people and carried out 1,627 raids.

The arrested are being held incommunicado and police will not specify how long that will continue.

The common front to be formed by the unions and the PQ will probably set up a lawyer's committee to deal with this matter.

A group of Quebecois studying in Paris occupied part of Canada House Saturday in sympathy with the demands of the FLQ.

The students left early Tuesday morning after being warned police would be called in if they did not.

Also in Paris, Claude St. Denis, Director of Montreal's Theatre De Mime cancelled the troupe's performance Monday night in sympathy with the student occupation.

While the press in France has been unanimous in condemning "Quebec Extremists", explanatory notes describe the French minority in Canada as people tied to France by history, language and culture but who play a second class role to the English speaking minority.

Nixon has termed the Laporte-Cross kidnappings as part of an "International disease". "No cause justifies violence," he told reporters Monday, obviously not referring to the war in Vietnam. He added he had been in touch with Prime Minister Trudeau to offer his government's support of Ottawa's tough line.

The University of Ottawa's Students Federation modified Monday its strident government stand of last Wednesday and is now calling for co-operation with MP to prevent abuses of the WMA.

The council had previously come out with a statement condemning the FLQ but placing the major blame for the crisis on the government and the police. That statement caused consternation among segments of the student population of the university, which is both French and English, and led Federation President Hugh Segal to threaten to resign.

An estimated 2,500 demonstrated Monday in Toronto in support of Ottawa's invocation of the WMA, and a united Canada The demonstrators were mainly York University students. Rally organizer Steve Harris urged students to "rise all collectively", to back the government in avoiding any future "political nightmare". Although the crowd was largely pro-government, most of the invited faculty were not. History professor Ramsay Cook warned against an "excessively emotional and highly repressive" reaction to recent events, and appealed to students to understand "the social and economic injustices suffered by the Quebec people."

A meeting held at MacMaster University in Hamilton and attended by about 1,000 students was marked by verbal scuffles between increasingly polarized pro-and anti-government factions. About 300 engineering and science students heckled anti-WMA speakers and threw leftovers from their lunches onto the stage.

In Toronto, guerilla, the underground paper is coming up against censorship — it can't find a printer willing to handle its copy on Quebec. Student papers in the Maritimes are having similar difficulties.

The Canadian Civil Liberties Association has demanded "facts not faith" to justify the imposition of the WMA. The CCLA in a brief sent to Trudeau Monday called on the government to reveal the contents of the secret Montreal police report removed to be the government's foundation for a "hard line", or to revoke the measures.

If the measures were then deemed warranted, the CCLA demanded they be limited by time, place and substance to the current crisis, with the government issuing a cautionary note to police agencies to confine their activities to the intended targets of the regulations.

In addition, people held under the act should be provided with legal counsel and access to their families, CCLA says.

Even water a drug, expert tells Vertigo '70

By JUDITH SMITH

"The word drug is defined in the pharmacology book as 'any substance which effects living protoplasm' — and that even includes water," said Dr. Erich Goode, a marijuana expert, last night.

Goode, a Professor of Sociology at New York State University, spoke mainly about marijuana use and research as part of last night's Vertigo '70 session.

Referring to public statements, Goode continued, "The statement 'we need more facts' translates to meaning they don't like the facts generated so far. It is saying that we need some kind of scientific basis to support the laws of society. If he thinks it is immoral, it must be damaging medically.

"In effect, they are trying — desperately — to get proof that marijuana creates a dependency.

"People who are true experts (have done research) are beginning to back away, so there must be found so-called 'experts' to do studies and give supportive propaganda. Nobody in a position of power in the American Medical Association has done a study, but their statements are accepted by the public. They tend to be older men, who think in the old way."

"We are seeing a transition from the hysterical 1930's when it was believed that a substance morally defined as repugnant must have dreadful side effects (users become mad rapists) in a pathological manner," continued Goode.

While discussing the widely-held belief that marijuana use leads to heroin addiction, he said,

"Someone who is a smoker or drinker has more likelihood of using any drug at all — marijuana, heroin, or anything else. Most heroin users' first drug was alcohol, not marijuana."

Research studies received special mention.

"Conclusions drawn from the same facts vary greatly depending on what the person is looking for."

As an example, Goode told about one case in particular.

"Someone did an experiment showing that even the most experienced marijuana user can become psychotic if exposed to enough of the chemical in marijuana. When asked his definition of psychotic state, the examiner gave a list of questions, a yes answer to any being considered psychotic. All questions were about usual reactions to marijuana usage; does time go slowly, is your skin more sensitive, etc."

Campus split on Quebec

The U of T campus is polarized regarding the Quebec crisis and the imposition of the War Measures Act. The debate is crystallized in the positions taken yesterday by J.E. Hodgetts, President of Victoria College and SAC President Rod Hurd.

"We have here a dramatic and sad concrete illustration of the two competing principles in a liberal democracy confronting each other," those principles being "the respect for individual rights and the respect for law and order," said Hodgetts.

"The government, faced with an internal crisis of this nature, really had no alternative but to act as it did."

SAC president Rod Hurd voiced the viewpoint of those who regard the implementation of the War Measures Act as "unjustified" and "a danger to the civil liberties of Canadians" which, as such,

"should be revoked immediately".

Hurd was quick to point out that he doesn't support the FLQ, or even believe that it has the grassroots support of the separatist movement, but feels that there was no need for the government to resort to the dangerous course of action it did.

"It would have been more prudent for the government to continue the policy it was pursuing prior to the adoption of the War Measures Act; i.e. to adamantly refuse the demands of the FLQ and keep open the opportunity of them to flee to Cuba, while the police attempted to locate and rescue the hostages."

Mixed reactions to government action aired at PECU teach-in

By IAN MACLAREN

Interpretations of and reactions to the Government's implementation of the War Measures Act were discussed Thesday at an emergency teach-in sponsored by the Political Economy Course Union.

The panel of speakers, moderated by Ken McKevooy (SAC Student Information Researcher), included: Desmond Morton, of the U of T's Faculty of Law and civil liberties expert; A. F. W. Plumptree, Principal of Scarborough College and former president of the World Bank; Andy Wernick, a Political Science graduate; Eilert Frierichs, United Church Chaplain of U of T; and Stephen Clarkson, defeated Liberal and Mayoral candidate.

MORTON ANALYZED the War Measures Act from a legal point of view saying, "We never had political prisoners in Canada before Friday. Now there are over 300 being held incommunicado without their existence being recognized or their detention recorded."

Morton called the Act, "a series of Draconian Measures that have seriously injured the entire legal process in Canada. The Government has recognized the kidnapers by negotiating with them while political prisoners have no chance to say anything and are not even recognized. The legal process in Canada has been done irreparable damage."

Plumptree, one of Canada's most renowned civil servants, was associated with the Government of Canada working under and implementing provisions of the War Measures Act during World War II. He commented, "All Canadians are apologetic because the FLQ went overboard. However, I personally was horrified that it became necessary to invoke the War Measures Act."

OSTENSIBLY THE War Mea-

asures Act was invoked. "To meet the state of unapprehended insurrection in Quebec." And yet provisions of the Act blanket the whole nation, thus presenting power to people such as Vancouver's mayor Tom Campbell who claims the Act will help him rid his city of what he called, "detestable hippies."

Plumptree pointed out how the legislation can be directed at any reasonable organization (and under martial law, it is the police who determine what is treasonous). "That," he said, "is what I find particularly horrifying."

Wernick noted the atmosphere in the country before the War Measures Act was invoked.

"Canada has the reputation of being the most repressive of western liberal democracies in terms of the penal code. In this country there is a greater tendency among judges to put people in jail. There was already in this country repression in the legislatures against people who wanted to form recognized unions."

"WHEN THE War Measure Act was imposed on the nation it was justified by the press (and who controls the press?) in two ways: the first, that we need martial law because we have to catch the kidnapers and smash the FLQ; and two, that the Act was invoked in order to protect our democracy which really means upon analysis that the government felt there was the possibility of a major popular uprising."

Stephen Clarkson was asked to speak as a token Liberal. He suggested, "Their (FLQ) actions have been counter-productive. They have provoked revolutionary tactics when the historical situation was not revolutionary. In so doing they have forced middle of the road people into an agreement with the government's actions."

Regarding the measures taken by the governments Clarkson said, "With the exception of Ontario, I would say that the federal and provincial governments have acted with caution and propriety. The government was careful not to push the FLQ into a corner. The Federal troops were brought into Montreal on the request of Bourassa's government."

HE BACKED the Government fully. "I feel freer in this situation than I did a week ago. I have faith in those people in the Federal Government whose integrity and scrupulousness I believe in."

Eilert Frierichs called the situation, "A mess of our making. Who is benefiting from the brutal repression of dissent? All of us are. And the solution to the future of Canada lies in all of us and not anywhere else. The solution lies in what we study at university, in what job we take after university, and in what we say to our children."

He drew the analogy that "The rhetoric used in Germany in 1934 is exactly the same as what the federal government used and, it makes me sick. It's frightening that someone cannot sympathize with the FLQ in this country right now. Today we aren't allowed to say that we believe in justice for people in Quebec."

When the discussion was opened to the floor, much of what had been said earlier was reiterated. One student who was in Quebec last weekend said the panel failed to see the main point, that many people who backed the FLQ were alienated from them when Pierre Laport was slain.

Gary Webster (SGS), drawing comparisons to Kenya and Algiers said, "We are going to have to face up to the proposition of independence in Quebec, a neo-colonialism under Rene Levesque. Colonialism as such is dead in Canada."

"During a revolution, millions and tens of millions of people learn in a week more than they do in a year of ordinary somnolent life. For at the time of a sharp turn in the life of an entire people it becomes particularly clear what aims the various classes of the people are pursuing, what strength they possess, and what methods they use."
 —V.I. Lenin

Hysteria is no answer

In covering the current upheavals in Quebec, The Varsity has come under some attack. Our position should be made clear.

We have tried to provide two basic things:

First, coverage of the upheavals from a student point of view. This is why our front page Monday carried stories about the detaining of two students Friday under the War Measures Act, and of the seizing of the Guelph University newspaper, The Ontarion. We have also tried to give some picture of the present ferment in Quebec universities which have either gone out on strike or been closed down by armed forces. To insinuate that our failure to carry a separate story on Pierre Laporte's murder reflects approval of that murder is ridiculous.

Secondly, we have tried to present as much as possible in the way of informed analytical comment, an area in which the commercial press in this and other cities have failed to cover.

Consequently, our Monday issue included an analysis on page 5, entitled The Economic Roots of the Quebec Revolution. Written by a history graduate student, it tries to point out that the terrorism practiced by the FLQ is not taking place in an historical and social vacuum. The resort to terrorism is a classic symptom of the failure of a social system to meet the essential requirements of a people. In Quebec that failure has been most intensely felt.

The article also pointed out, quite correctly, that the majority of those arrested in the last days in Quebec, have been leading figures in the cultural and political life of the province, not simply terrorists and their supporters.

Again, by printing the text of the FLQ manifesto last Friday, along with detailed explanatory historical and social notes, we placed in your hands information which has not been available anywhere else in this city.

Monday, as well as today, we reprint commentary on the crisis from the leading newspapers in Quebec, Le Devoir, the Montreal daily, and Quebec-Press, the left wing weekly tabloid.

Monday we also printed an historical recapitulation of Pierre-Elliott Trudeau's attitude towards separatism, a matter of some importance since Trudeau was himself once part of the movement which, after initiating the Quiet Revolution, went on to demand separatism as the means for achieving social justice.

Noting that today is the fifth time Canadian armed forces have occupied Quebec, we also printed a brief enumeration of the previous occasions.

We also print today an article by a Waterloo University teacher arguing that separatism in Quebec is part of a national crisis, the breakdown of Confederation.

In addition to providing such information to the campus, The Varsity is also attempting to cover campus reaction to both the federal government's emergency actions and the Quebec upheavals. Space is available for comments from readers.

The major function of a newspaper is to provide information to its readers. We have been doing exactly this up until now, and will continue to do so. If we are not printing verbatim what the daily press is printing these days, that may be an indication of the restrictions — either explicit or not — which the press faces under the terms of the War Measures Act.

Our printers have insisted on reading all "controversial" copy in order to determine whether, in our news reporting and commentaries, we could be liable under the terms of the War Measures Act. In Quebec campus newspaper editors have been arrested, in Ontario they have been cautioned and warned by printers, yet there are no explicit regulations governing the press in this situation.

The only guideline which does exist is this section of the War Measures Act:

"... any group of persons or association that advocates the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of or as an aid in accomplishing governmental change in Canada is declared to be an unlawful association."

There is some doubt, at least in our minds, that such an extreme step is necessary to capture a handful of terrorists — men who could be easily dealt with under sections of the Criminal Code covering such crimes as sedition, kidnapping and murder.

There is great danger — and the evidence of exactly who was arrested in Quebec to date supports this — that the Federal government is using its emergency powers to crush all democratic movements for fundamental social change either by arrest or by associating them with terrorism and the use of violence.

To understand Monday's editorial in The Varsity as a statement of support for the FLQ is something that will only be welcomed by the ruling authorities.

In fact, the Varsity editorial first attempted to place terrorist actions in the context of the growing support of Quebecois for revolutionary social change, and clearly condemned the cruel course of action represented by the FLQ:

"To articulate such frustrations in the form of terroristic acts performed by secret cells is a suicidal course, one which will not ultimately lead to revolutionary social changes."

Like the majority of Quebecois, we sense a feeling of powerlessness in the face of the federal government's strategy of identifying all who question its correctness with policies of violence and terror.

It is only through informed analysis and discussions that we, as English Canadian students, can reject the hysteria now being promoted by the federal government and daily press, and attempt to reach an intelligent position on the events in Quebec.

To this end, students should consider it a major responsibility to attend and participate in today's Convocation Hall meeting to consider how the university relates to the Quebec situation.

En apprenant toutes ces choses, les pauvres petits Zénfants vont se rendre compte que le monde n'est pas tel qu'ils l'imaginaient... eux pour qui la vie s'annonçait si belle, ils vont vieillir... décrépitude extrême...

Terrorist activity is nourished by injustice

By CLAUDE RYAN
 EDITOR
 LE DEVOIR

For several years Montreal has been the theatre of political and social upheaval that has been escalating continuously. At first, no one dared to speak of guerrillas. It was easier to categorize the new actions in terms taken from the Criminal Code. People who planted bombs were classified as arsonists. Demonstrators were arrested on charges of disturbing the peace. Many thought that violence would be dealt with principally by the Criminal Code and within the framework of liberal justice.

With the kidnapping of the British diplomat, John Cross, the situation takes on an unexpected turn... A completely new problem is posed, which cannot be dealt with by the simple invoking of legal and judicial methods...

What neither the police nor the courts, not any increased security measures can deal with are the intolerable social and economic situations which feed terrorist activity all over the world. Terrorist activity is repugnant for citizens accustomed to the classic freedoms of western societies. But it is nourished by the injustice which divides men into classes and the peoples of the world into the poor and the rich.

Urban guerrilla is rapidly becoming the most subtle form of modern war. Given the acuteness of the injustices which inspire urban guerrillas, and the extent of injustices around the world, the very idea of smashing the partisans of guerrilla activity by pure force is quite simply unrealistic. The real ground on which guerrilla activity has to be defeated is the area of justice and freedom.

A well-known jurist remarked yesterday that the present events, which have so shocked Canadian public opinion, are part of an extension of a climate of repression which has become increasingly heavy, especially in the context of recent forms of social and political conflict... But it is also true that violence generates repression... The vicious circle of violence is terrifying. It can only lead to profound conflicts... in the very areas where a vigorous democratic action could generate real progress in peace and freedom.

The State and Breakdown of Confederation

By DR. JAMES HARDING

DEPT. OF INTEGRATED STUDIES
UNIVERSITY OF WATERLOO

During this crisis we seem to be losing sight of the general conditions across Canada as a whole. And we seem to be stereotyping separatism as a solely Quebec fact.

The Atlantic Provinces have been the source of a strong separatist movement throughout the past 100 years. (In Nova Scotia a separatist-like party won provincial elections up until 1896.)

There have been recurring separatist movements in Northern Ontario, looking at Queen's Park as the government of Southern Ontario and calling for annexation to Manitoba.

The Prairies, especially since the wheat crisis and inflationary poverty there, have seen a separatist sentiment for forming within the last few years.

In some ways British Columbia began a separatist process when Bennett blackmailed the federal government into signing the Columbia River Treaty.

To add to this list, the native population, now larger than the farm owning population in Canada, is a growing source of separatist sentiment.

The breakdown of Confederation is clearly not something that has happened overnight. A simplistic polarization on a French separatism vs. an English federalist line does not and cannot acknowledge the above tendencies. Nor can it give us the necessary understanding of the political disintegration of Canada.

One root cause of this disintegration is the growing regional disparity across Canada. Then there are the mounting urban problems that cannot be dealt with intelligently or democratically with the present constitution (which provides many powers to the federal government that are needed by the cities, where the vast majority of Canadians live.)

Also, and likely most fundamentally, economic decisions affecting Canadians are increasingly being made by multinational corporations headquartered in the US, with the consequence that the Ottawa government has been unable to take effective measures to alleviate social problems in Canada.

Certainly the separatist sentiment has not developed in the regions of English Canada to the extent that it has in Quebec. The Parti Quebecois, one must remember, received more of the French Canadian popular vote than the Liberal Party in the last election (33 per cent, as against 21 per cent)

This could not happen elsewhere in Canada. But many of the same problems that exist in a more severe way in Quebec (such as unemployment) exist across Canada as well.

The language issue is, of course, an important exception, but even language issues are developing elsewhere. The so-called "third force" ethnic groups on the Prairies have themselves begun to organize for special rights on CBC radio and TV.

The vital question is whether the arbitrary use of state power is a progressive let alone democratic response to Quebec separatism. Those who say the War Measures Act is solely a response to the FLQ, must explain why most people arrested and detained in the last week in Quebec have been people engaged in opposition activities within Quebec that were clearly not terrorist, but electoral — unions, media, community-organizing, etc.

This hard line approach of the state has not been exclusive to Quebec. Injunctions against strikes have grown this last year with the fishermen of BC and Nova Scotia, and the construction workers in French and English Canada receiving strong severe repression.

If the logic of the federal government is generalized to all of Canada, (and it is in all of Canada that there is political disintegration), then groups organizing to alleviate the problems of regional and income disparities across Canada may find themselves declared unlawful. For example, is the state going to exterminate Red Power groups across Canada as their response to the growing militancy among Indians and Metis?

In considering the implications of the War Measures Act, we must consider what the aftermath of the military occupation of Quebec will be. Because many of the federalists could see that the War Measures Act might precipitate even more severe conditions in Quebec, they originally opposed, and still oppose Trudeau's own extremism.

I realize there is a strong tendency to try to reduce this crisis to the actions of the FLQ. But it takes two or more sides to have this kind of fight. And, in the interest of all Canadians, all positions must be scrutinized critically. The stand taken by the Trudeau cabinet is, in fact, obscuring the root causes of separatism and breakdown across all of Canada, and, more vital, is having the effect of polarizing Canadians in a way that tends to ignore the severe social problems existing in all Canada's regions.

At a time when violence is on the increase internationally and nationally, what is needed is more, not less freedom among the population. There is no gimmick that can allow the survival of humanity and dignity for all human beings, everywhere.

The creation of a police state in the face of the breakdown of Confederation only ensures that the necessary changes to create a society that meets human needs will not be undertaken.

This is not the time for polarized hysteria or irrational moralisms, but a time for deep reflection about the social changes that are required to provide all people in all parts of Canada with real freedom and self determination and a quality of living that is deserving for people in the 20th century.

'Trudeau comes on strong'

While the emergency measures invoked by Mr. Trudeau have met with scathing criticism by some and confused distress by many, I find myself applauding our Prime Minister for at long last showing some grit.

Mr. Trudeau has not in the past been what one would call a strong-armed or dynamically forceful leader. Had he taken more serious notice of the FLQ let us say two years ago and taken bolder steps to eradicate terrorism in the province of Quebec, perhaps his decision of last Friday would never have been necessary. But second-guessing is both easy and a waste of time; the fact remains that the decision to invoke the War Measures Act for the protection of the nation has been made. And it is a decision in which the Canadian citizen should find security — the security of one who mobilizes force to protect his rights, not the impotence of one who sits helplessly as his rights are stolen by the forces of subversion and anarchy.

Mr. Trudeau, one might argue, has fallen into the trap of many a leader who, feeling he has let the reins slacken in his grasp, tugs at them in such time of crisis overly hard. But given the present situation, who is to say what measures are too strict, what retaliation too severe when confronted with a war waged in bombings, kidnappings and assassination?

If the Prime Minister is unorthodox in resorting to the War Measures Act, he at least may not stand accused of insincerity and political expedience. The righteous concern of NDP leader T.C. Douglas on Friday was that the P.M. did not immediately confer with Parliament as to the implementation of the Act. While this gesture would indeed have shown political tact on Mr. Trudeau's behalf, I submit that such time-consuming adherence to protocol is probably very difficult to effect when one's life is in jeopardy.

Claude Ryan, publisher of Montreal's Le Devoir, condemns the Quebec government's requests for the declaration on the grounds that Mr. Bourassa "has relinquished his own power by putting the solution in federal hands". I find this dispute both as ludicrous and unfortunate as an argument between two lifeguards over who should rescue a drowning man.

Rene Levesque dismisses the FLQ terrorists as "insignificant". He interprets the arrests following the War Measures declaration as a "panic reaction" on the part of the P.M. We are to infer that Mr. Levesque, were he at the helm, would have responded to the murder of one Canadian diplomat and the threat of multiple assassination with infinitely more poise, more tact. I commend Mr. Levesque if not for his judgement, then for his most impressive display of calm.

Prime Minister Trudeau, who has shied away from dealing with the terrorist activities of the Front de Liberation du Quebec in the past, is at last realizing his responsibilities to the nation they threaten. Some argue that his actions constitute a repression — they do: the unsavory and violent elements in any society must be repressed. But one man or a handful of politicians cannot oppress a country, a handful of anarchists cannot destroy it. Either way, the decision rests in the hands of the people.

In any war — civil, ideological or otherwise, sacrifices must be made by all involved. Canadian citizens are involved whether they wish to be or not. The War Measures Act does regrettably impose temporary restrictions on an individual's civil liberties. But one must weigh carefully this imposition, this sacrifice, against the possible consequences of more tolerant measures regarding today's most intolerable of situations.

'Irresponsibility'

For four years I have read the Varsity and have gradually accepted the fact that responsible and intelligent evaluation of events is foreign to this publication. While last year's treatment of police action in Metro's student demonstrations was incompetent and misleading, comments made in Monday's issue are repulsive in their ignorance and lack of feeling. How can any intelligent, rational individual justify the abduction, torture, and humiliating murder of a man as "a kidnapping planned and executed with sophistication and determination?"

A newspaper is an instrument of great power and influence, but commensurate with power is responsibility; to the staff of that publication, and the students who read and subsidize it, that the views expressed are intelligent and informative by virtue of their accuracy. It is with shame that I admit association with a campus that produced such trash for public evaluation.

Ray Ashby
IV APSC

(Editorial Note: Ashby implies here that The Varsity supported Pierre Laporte's murder. Referring to Monday's editorial one can easily see that "the killing of Pierre Laporte shocks us and impresses us with the quality of violence and terror or political strategies." Ashby's insinuation is irresponsible. We have appealed for exactly what Ashby desires: "responsible and intelligent evaluation of events.")

What is to be gained is a view of reality which is meaningful, comprehensive, anticipatory and above all human.

What is to be lost is a view of law (and order) which sees only the letter (justice) of the law.

What is to be gained is a clearer view of the spirit of the law which above all, is mercy.

People are talking on television about "Avenging Murder". (A member of our Parliament appeared on television last night and suggested that we must avenge this murder.)

What is to be done? Are we to have a purge to crush the FLQ? Or do we know that vengeance and violence in ALL forms is what The Problem is. Or do we know that vengeance directed at the FLQ will enbiter and enrage all the relatives, friends, acquaintances and sympathizers of each individual involved and the front in general. Resulting in further vengeance.

The FLQ is to be feared. But what is to be feared far more is the corruption and numbing injustices that have created their presence. And what is to be gained is a view that recognizes and responds with courage and ability to the social needs that are implicitly screaming in the existence the fact and the warning of the FLQ. Listen. See. Feel it. Think about it. RESPOND TO IT.

In the struggle it may be easy to forget the reality that unites us all, and in this case to forget that the FLQ does not have the power or support the army and police automatically have. They represent a minority, even in the totality of their destructive efforts, that is so minute a percentage of the population that it is technically possible that one, solitary, embittered, clever and desperate man planned and committed the sum total of these actions. It could have been you. He is your brother.

So what will you do? Will you seek out and destroy this man? Or will you see that you are then doing exactly what he has done. Or will you see that even should you find him, even should you destroy him, in fact even should you "merely" arrest and imprison him, and finally even if you completely forgive him, that the social and human condition will REMAIN and continue to generate progressively more people like him unless you change that!

If we continue to apply violent force to problems which need the application of Thought, thoughtful people will tend to assume that force is the only way through which thoughts will be recognized. If we respond to threats and danger with war measures, we will not end the dangers, we will increase them to the level of wartime.

If our elected government accepts the reality and responds with ability and humanity, we will have gained. If it responds fearfully and violently we have lost. What is to be lost is the insanity of violence. What is to be gained is an affirmation of life.

Lose that "silent majority" and those "bleeding hearts". Gain those heating hearts and living majority! What more can I say?

US researches drugs for chemical warfare

By BEN FORSTER

Research into the use of hallucinogenic drugs for chemical warfare is being carried out by government financed laboratories, said Dr. Alexander T. Shulgin, at Vertigo 70 Monday evening.

Shulgin, a well known American researcher in drugs, and the synthesizer of STP and MDA, suggested that research into hallucinogenics was being financed by the American and other governments on the instigation of the military.

However, he added, though well financed, research in this area was probably very low in productivity.

The greatest quantity of research, if not the highest quality, is carried on in what Shulgin called, amid general laughter, the "social underground". Chemists working in this illegal area "are always trying to expand their market" and this results in a great deal of experimentation.

Academic researchers do only a small amount of work, for several reasons. Government laboratories will not release the results of their work and underground researchers never publish, said Shulgin, restricting the amount of information available to academics. Cost and government red tape have stymied research on the university and clinical level.

He cited the example of a colleague in California who had wanted to conduct an experiment with drugs. After phoning and writing to the authorities for eighteen months, the would-be experimenter got fed up, went to Europe, and had his experiment completed in two weeks.

Even medical usage was limited to only three areas, said Shulgin. Psychologically stable terminal cancer patients have been given LSD as a means of easing them through their death trauma. As well, alcoholics have been given hallucinogenics in an attempt to break their addiction; this application has been met with moderate success. The most widely known medical use has been in treating the mentally ill, in which the psychiatrist attempts to change the individual's behavior to a socially acceptable norm.

Hazards, physically speaking, Shulgin stated, were limited to pregnant women. Drug intake during the first three months of gestation might result in damage to the child.

Shulgin defined hallucinogens as drugs which allowed the real world and an equally real drug induced world to intermingle. After his speech, he explained some of the fine points of human reaction to such drugs.

Dentists challenge rest of campus to bleed better

The Annual Blood Drive will begin next Monday, October 26. St. Michael's Students will be the first ones to bleed in the Loretto College Lounge from 9 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

A cup, donated by Carling Breweries, will go to the College or Faculty which has the highest per capita percentage of blood donations. For the last three years it has been in the hands of the dentists, who once again challenge the rest of the campus to bleed better and more.

This year's goal is 3,400 pints.

LEAVE
W

Bleed now!

And bleed now! "bleeding hearts"
A good man is dead let us not argue over that — qualifying his reputation like historians or politicians.

Bleed fully as he bled. Moral men command it. A reprehensible death.
"Murder", a reprehensible act. So undemocratic. Your elected government did not choose it.

They are used to being able to choose death,
to define it.
Now they have defined this death, an assassination, a murder, a reprehensible death.

Now then, last week they did not choose to speak these words.
A young soldier died. Gun went off as he went to guard Edgar Benson from the enemies of the White Paper on Taxation.
"Accidental".
Yet the same wheels, the accelerating wheels of reinforcement trucks, the "aye to the civilian power" of the Dept. of National Defence, put him before death's firing squad as surely as Laporte.

They are used to being able to choose death, to define it.
They define it every day, into and out of existence, out of the picture tubes of the public consciousness.
Bleed, oh bleeding hearts an important man is dead. Important to the employers, important to the unemployed. Choose your perspective and weep as you will. Weep with the wives of miners killed in unsafe mines, or with the ruined eyes or lungs of creeping death. "Accidental". Weep with those with life ground out of them, in poverty, unemployment, misfortune.
With those who've lost their life's work, with those who never had any, with those who've lost their future, with those who've lost their past, with those who lose their lives in our war,
each, every day,
weep with the powerless, for powerless you are. Our elected government does not choose to regard these deaths as worth blood or tears.
Weep quietly, bleed silently, bleeding hearts.
The sobs may disturb foreign investors, insecurity we can ill afford. It might make necessary further trips to the capital capitals by elected governors "so exhausted by this ordeal".
Be earnest, be Canadian, bring order and law into the lives of your young. Crush the defiant, as quietly as possible.
Then, stop weeping you bleeding hearts, the troops in the streets are for your own good. The quiet, the order, is in honor of death.

Energetic work of Pop artist Jim Dine shows best of style

By NEIL MARSHALL

There is a very pointed comparison going on at the moment. At Mirvish's Darby Barnard is showing some rather thin examples of Abstract Expressionism and at Dunkleman the immensely energetic and more appealing Pop Art of Jim Dine is on view. Both men certainly do not make a movement even though they each contribute to one. Yet the movement like the individual artist cannot be accepted uncritically. There are certain things we notice and think about in an artist's work that strike us as being very good or as somehow out of place. The Pop movement, even though it now has less energy than it did, raises these questions and will force us to ask after the value of a movement from now on if for no other reason than the one that you and I have been weaned on it.

In his catalogue to American Painting and Sculpture 1940-1970 Henry Geldzahler cites the example of the air-conditioner repairman who, the year after Pop Art "arrived" pointed to a set of Warhol Marilyn Monroes and asked "Is that, Pop Art?". Thereby proving just how quickly Pop was assimilated by the American public and media. In fact it must be one of the most quickly digested movements of any pretension that has occurred in the 20th Century. It answers the North American guilt complex about popular culture and additionally soothes the nerves of those who find a need for recognizable images of the world in which, as the saying laughably goes, they "live".

It was felt and some will still argue the point that for High Art to ignore the billboards and television programs that surrounded them was unrealistic; chilling and European.

One can reply to this particular argument

Two Hearts (Smiths) 1970 by Jim Dine that High Art before or after Pop has never ignored culture; — High or Low. Rather, it expresses contemporary life on an abstract level far less obvious and much more sophisticated than any of Pop's finest hours. What is so irritating about the wholesale and superficial acceptance of Pop is less the general decline in sensibility than the lack of thought on what had come before. The discipline and genius of Kline's painting is incommensurate with that of Dine and the paranoid reality of the most expansive Pollock exists on a level unapproachable by even the best of Johns or Rauchenberg. If the discussion of Pop Art is of any value it is probably best conducted with the lesser lights of Judd or Stella than art in which we sense greatness.

Dine, with Johns, Oldenberg, and Rauchenberg defines that degree of quality we find in the Pop movement. But paradoxically the way he handles paint has far more to do with his success than the way he moulds boots, hangs coats, attaches sinks, etc. With Dine, as in the other three there is that consummate ability to make a mark. The test of the artist is to begin with the blank and end with the mark. It is the essence of art and the most explicit advantage of abstract art: — that it tests the artist's ability to confront art in its most basic form. These artists possess that necessary degree of sensitivity and talent.

But the use that such talent is put to must, I think, determine the importance of their work and should be one of the central values of criticism. With Dine the tendency is elegance over "meaning" (note combination of bright green to pink and its position) on the Two Hearts) and hedonism over discipline: — a decorative object, a bench with boot feet is admitted in the same statement as the painting. He is an inclusive artist who sees no clouding of his concept in hanging a raincoat in front of his painting e.g. Two Hearts. He is able to see aesthetic order (as distinct from natural and artistic order) in all matter.

In fact Dada-Duchamp-Pop Art would have us believe that there is no difference of value between art and matter — that the condition of non-art can be meaningful enough to supplant the condition of art. There is no need to "fly high". Would Dine really look as good if we had not seen Picasso's bicycle seat bull's head or collages from 1914?

Pop art does not differentiate between art and life — it fuses the difference into one ambiguous creation.

Hamilton series opens with oldies; Music a success

By TONY JAHN

In these dire times when the Toronto Symphony is in the throes of its annual threatening financial collapse it is almost disgusting to see the Hamilton Philharmonic in such ruddy good health. The opening concert of the Hamilton series on Sunday night played to a sold out house at the Palace theatre. The building ordinarily serves as a movie theater and both in acoustics and in facilities it favours the Saturday matinee crowd, but the 75 member orchestra under conductor Boris Brott delivered enough excitement and solid music to banish any thought of hot buttered popcorn.

Granted, the programme consisted of venerable pot-boilers, and those to whom Stravinsky's Firebird Suite and Bernstein's New York Philharmonic are synonymous might have gone home hungry. To my own ears, after some initial adjustment to the smallest orchestra and the unyielding hall, all the composers presented were well served.

For openers, Four Dances from "Estancia" by Alberto Ginastera, some extremely rhythmical ballet music by this modern Argentinian composer. Next, a beautifully lyric "Symphonie Espagnol" by Lalo, with soloist Marta Hidy. Miss Hidy is a violinist with musical and technical competence equalled by very few musicians in this country. The Lalo work was persuasive and almost seductive in its beguiling freshness.

The second half of the concert consisted of Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'une Faune" and Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite". The Debussy work, nicknamed "The afternoon on the phone" at times tended to sound as interminable as the above-mentioned conversation, and a livelier approach to rhythmic elements of the score might have helped to propel it along. In actual performance, the piece was overshadowed by the youthfully aggressive Stravinsky work which brought the evening to a successful close.

Breakaway in Can

Rising above the grips of the colonial culture, Canada

By TIM INKSTER

Butterfly on Rock, "A Study of Themes and Images in Canadian Literature", was published earlier this year by U of T Press.

It's interesting that a Canadian academic should feel moved to do other than apologize for his native literature, and interesting that a press renowned for its academic respectability should publish such a work.

But we have come a long way since Archibald Lampman's much quoted comment of the 1880's on reading Charles G.D. Roberts' first volume of poetry: "It is a wonderful thing that such a work could be done by a Canadian... one of ourselves."

Lampman goes on to say that he "... had been under the depressing conviction that we were situated hopelessly on the outskirts of civilization where no literature or art could be, and that it was useless to expect that anything great could be done by any of our companions, still more useless to expect that we could do it ourselves."

With Roberts, who is followed closely by Lampman, Bliss Carman and Duncan Campbell Scott, we have the beginnings of a national literature worthy of consideration. We also have the first feeble breakings with the problem of a "garrison culture" in Canada, a process which has continued for almost a century and which D.J. Jones documents fully in Butterfly on Rock.

The problem is one common to all cultures of colonized lands and stems from the early settlers' fears of an awesome hostile environment.

Jones' book describes the process by which western man, the colonizer, walls out the wilderness (the primeval chaos seen as a force of darkness) and attempts to transplant the old "mother" culture into the colonial outposts. Of course such attempts can only succeed in pale imitations of a culture which is alien to the hostile environment of the new land, the primary experience of the colonists' lives.

As such, the "garrison culture" leads to the further "problem of Job":

"... who has to contend with his comforters, each of whom is the mouthpiece of a conventional wisdom that is no longer convincing, and he must contend with Jehovah, with a universe that evinces an awesome creative exuberance and an almost equally awesome disregard for the creatures it has produced."

That Margaret Atwood can take the Journals of Susanna Moodie as raw material (the historical journals of a British settler) and turn them into poetic observations on the process of colonization is one sure indication of the death of the garrison culture mentality; for that mentality cannot admit the possibility of poetics dealing with the community's true function of settlement. Rather, it tries to "ease the pain" of existence on the cultural frontier by aping the "only culture" of the motherland.

Miss Atwood aptly notes in "The Progressive Insanities of Pioneer":

If he had known unstructured space is a deluge and stocked his log house-boat with all the animals even the wolves,

he might have floated.

That particular poem also recalls the extent to which D.J. Jones concerns himself with biblical imagery in Canadian literature; to the extent, in fact, that he uses the Old Testament as an archetype on which to hand the whole development of our literature.

Although examination of Adam and Noah imagery is no doubt justified in the case of such writers as Jay Macpherson, I find that type of tight academic poetry to be the exception rather than the rule in Canadian verse. Mr. Jones is trying rather too hard to create an academic Canadian verse for Canadian academics who wish there were some, but can't find it.

Jones is never more correct than when he says "the voice that demands to be heard is the voice of the land." Or at least, he is correct in as far as he goes, which is to include some discussion of the most recent additions to our literary hall of fame, names such as Newlove, Nowlan, Bowering, Gwen MacEwen, Cohen.

It is with these writers, the ones who have gained prominence in the past five or ten years, that we have finally buried the garrison culture and have entered into a meaningful relationship with the land. Jones looks forward to its solution at some time in the future.

I do not find that oversight much a flaw in the book, largely because our victory was perhaps unclear until we had a chance to see the poets who followed the group just mentioned.

On the cover of Victor Coleman's latest volume of poetry (Light Verse' Coach House Press, $3) there is a picture of a dirt road leading through thick stands of trees on both sides. It could be interpreted in a traditional sense as the path of light (civilization, order) leading through the dark primeval chaos of the wood.

It is a comforting picture. The forest is no longer completely alien, that someone has gone before; and yet, in terms of the highly individualistic, egocentric poetry in the book ("Today I'll talk about the weather / It's cold inside / my head where the meat is"). I find the traditional interpretation of such a picture somewhat lacking.

Carrie Snodgrass and Richard Benjamin star in 'Diary of a Mad Housewife'.

Diary of a Mad Housewife reveals housewife's plight but offers no solutions

By RALPH BENDAHAN

The Diary of a Mad Housewife may well be the first in a series of articulate visual statements to appear on the condition of women today. Produced by the Perrys who cranked out Last Summer, David and Lisa and The Swimmer, this film attains a visual and aural coherence so penetrating that the viewer is stunned, hypnotized from first frame to last. But even though the statement is clear, the story is not.

Since the movie deals with a young New York couple who are both university graduates, it makes the housewife (Carrie Snodgrass) intelligent, witty and perceptive while the husband played convincingly and well by Richard Benjamin, is an egocentric male chauvinist prick. It may be this first premise that sets the story rolling on the wrong foot. There is no depth of understanding in any of the males, all played as shallow, insecure human beings who are out to reaffirm their own masculinity by using and demeaning the pure soul of the darling housewife. Realizing that she has played the role of female masochist too long, the wife momentarily tries to forget her misunderstanding husband and monstrous children by partaking in an affair with a very crude writer.

But happiness is not to be hers. She discovers she is being used to reflect the depraved writer's latent homosexual tendencies in a light of pure virility and sexual dominance. The housewife is so disheartened by the whole thing that we seriously ask ourselves why she doesn't kill herself or her husband.

But it is here that the Perrys bring us back to reality. It is at this perplexing point in the film that we begin to grasp the real substance of their statement. What does a housewife do under these conditions? We have gone through the realization with her that this is a man's world, operated and run for men, and that women as a whole are second-class citizens used strictly for re-affirmation and pleasure. We begin to perceive that her duties as a wife consist of running a household, preparing dinners, taking care of her husband, of her children, of the dog, etc. etc. ad nauseum. That basically her function as a human being is strictly to serve others. But goddammit she is too nice. We are angered at her passivity as are the Perrys. She's just too nice a person to be getting all this done to her.

If there is any fatal flaw in this film it is paradoxically passive, mediocre nature of the housewife. We are given glimpses of her intelligence, wit and understanding, only to be brought to this dimly unclear conclusion. We are stimulated enough to think that this terribly bright individual will find a solution to her problem and those of the female liberationists, but it is just not done.

If anything capsulizes the mad housewife's plight, it is the brief conversation between two male onlookers in the party scene. Having just noticed her, one says: "Who is that?" The other replies, "Nobody. . . just Haxler's wife."

Canadian poetry

a's new poets examine themselves and their land

The road, physical testimony to an earlier initial conquest of the wood, points not only toward the town or village at its end, but also back toward the traveller. It suggests to me both movements, or, in general terms, man at home in a "hostile" environment. Expressed conversely: "to listen for human elements / what gives me fright."

Interesting that the U of T Quarterly was distinctly unimpressed with Coleman's lavishly illustrated volume, which it recognized as a trend among "minor" contemporary poets. Far from attempting to hide shoddy verse amid photographs, "minor" poets like Victor Coleman and Grant Johnston (A Compass of Open Veins, New Press, $3) are paying tribute to a basic external reality they recognize in the land and then going on to explore the highly personal workings of the mind of the poet at home in nature.

The academics (U of T Quarterly), caught in the last remnants of the garrison culture mentality, are still searching for a poetry that will establish a satisfactory relationship with the land.

The newer poets recognize that this task has already been accomplished by the poets of the previous generation, and content themselves with celebrating this victory in photographs (which attain a more accurate description of the land than any poetry could anyway) while proceeding to the more difficult task of portraying the minds and attitudes of the "new" poet. The poet, that is, who for the first time has a small but existent tradition of communion with the land

Perhaps the newer poets are not as technically competent as those of the most recent to gain academic notice, but they are a new force. And by the time this crop of poets surfaces in academia, they will have the necessary technical excellence, if they don't have it now.

In contrast to Victor Coleman we have an even more recent publication by J. Michael Yates (The Great Bear Lake Meditations, Oberon, $2.95).

The design of the book is simple, straightforward. The cover is almost more appropriate to a book of 17th century aphorisms than to a 20th century book of Canadian poetry. There are only four illustrations, black and white line drawings.

The apparent incongruity disappears when we realize that this book has moved rapidly away from primary concern with the land to heavy-handed interior soul-searching.

The land hasn't vanished, it is still here — Yates's book is divided into four sections exactly paralleling the seasons — as in Coleman, the land appears as an assumption, a starting point, rather than a goal.

Notice the title: Great Bear Lake Meditations, not Meditations on Great Bear Lake or Meditations. The land is not the object, nor is the poet's mind in a vacuum. The land, although not primary, is none the less necessary as a reference point to guide the interior monologue.

I quote Victor Coleman: I can't sing here / the perfect pitch in the air around me / too heavy a taskmaster after / the monotonous jingles of urban man / impotence / is importance when trees / are this close together

The break with classic European poetic styles had come earlier — with the colloquialism of Newlove for example — but it is taken further by Yates, who has the "gall" to write an entire book of poems in prose. But it isn't prose, more like flighty extracts from the type of diary form used by Scott Symons, to close the gap between the author and his work, to get inside his mind, to increase the personalization.

This type of egocentric descent is yet another sure indication of the death of the garrison culture mentality, which is so devoted to the re-creation of a "culture" a "society" on foreign shores. The key here is the individualism of the poetry more akin to the American experience of primitive self-determination on the frontier — than the European model of a "civilized" culture in a set social fabric.

Whereas the garrison culture would pit man, bolstered by society, against the "forces of darkness" his environment, the contemporary poetic struggle is of man as an individual with the environment he has assimilated to the extent that the struggle is entirely an internal one.

Dave Godfrey suggests that in the Canadian colonial experience the native population has not posed enough of a threat to be objectified into "the other" (in Frantz Fanon's classic five stage outline of the process of colonization and popular revolt). This lack has been filled to a large extent by the land itself as alien and hostile.

The colonial process has been a more intensely environmental, than social, struggle.

That ties in well with the silence of the landscape in Yates. He is not writing about it, but without it he could never hope to delve as deeply into his own mind, which has assimilated it, and thus, in a real sense, it is the land writing about J. Michael Yates.

This solution of the Butterfly (art) on Rock (land) dichotomy comes at a time when the world in general is engaged in MAN-ENVIRONMENT struggle, and puts Canadian literature in a unique position of interest to the rest of the world.

I agree with Jones when he says: "We may look to Canadian literature with every expectation of learning more about that obscure landscape that is our life and the world's." And the value of that learning cannot be overemphasized.

Cabbagetown novels reveal the other side of Toronto life

Hugh Garner, The Sin Sniper, Pocket Books, $3.95.

Juan Butler, Cabbagetown Diary, Peter Martin Associates, $2.95.

Cabbagetown is the city's economic sub-basement, the municipal eyesore, the confluence of all the brackish urban undercurrents — those whose pursuit of money, sex or narcosis has caused them to gravitate out of polite society to Southeast Toronto where a sullen tolerance serves for etiquette and morality.

Cabbagetown Diary, a purported documentary, is more likely fiction built around incidental reality. The repugnant narrator, Mike, chronicles with exuberant earthiness his life during a four-month shack-up with Terry, a girl. The story is told through adroit manipulations of clichés and succeeds because he describes a world of tough, unhappy people whose code, when articulated at all, is a brutal, contradictory folk-wisdom. Clichés insulate him from his feelings: He regards himself pitifully as "the biggest boozier and whorer in Cabbagetown", and when he boots out Terry because she is pregnant, he rationalizes it with "Somebody had to show her how to make out in this world."

There are good overdone comic scenes — two winos try to sell rotting stalks of celery for cash — and some hair-raising glimpses into gamier quarters: a girl, just 12, is raped by her drunken father and two friends who sing "Happy Birthday" the while.

Hugh Garner's book, The Sin Sniper, is in skeleton a crime story, replete with a psychotic killer who picks off whores with a rifle, police machinery, a bloody denouement. The true novel lies at the periphery, for Garner has used the homicidal terror to huddle together his frightened bewildered characters. A clique of aging, and alcoholic Lesbians, frightened young heroin-shooting hookers from mining towns and stateside slums, an assortment of bitter has-beens who circle around Moss Park. The focus moves slowly from group to group, each frozen in the strobe flashes of fear.

A technical quibble. Garner has the silly habit of using phonetic spelling to indicate speech below minimum BBC standards. Thus we get Gaws — God, a — of. Besides the fact that the Archbishop of Canterbury pronounces it Gawd, it becomes irritating as hell to decipher the dialogue.

Both books are detailed, I suppose accurate, recreations — Butler's from the viewpoint of the young who, to survive, anneal themselves in the cruel streets; Garner's from that of the aging and desolate who know they will die in Cabbagetown.

Phil Ochs' style shows little change

By MARCO LIVINGSTONE

Despite an animated rendition of "Okie From Muskogee," Phil Ochs proved on Saturday that basically he has not changed in five years. The small group that received him so well at Scarborough College could easily have inspired the caption on "Phil Ochs' Greatest Hits": 50 Phil Ochs fans can't be wrong!

"Greatest Hits" could have been the concert's title: "I Ain't Marching Anymore," "Outside of a Small Circle of Friends," "Crucifixion" and "Joe Hill" were among the songs he performed simply. What was lost in such a treatment was gained in an added emphasis on the lyrics, complete with additions and changes: "And Trudeau's men went riding up to the old mill door" in his version of "The Highwayman." Not even a bow-tied and flowered wedding party could destroy the attention he commanded.

Only twice did he deviate from the style of his old Elektra "In Concert" album. On "Jim Dean of Indiana" he showed he could play the piano, but with a stiffness. Somewhat more unexpectedly, he sang Merle Haggard's anti-hippie "Okie From Muskogee", stressing nuances with a sarcasm that completely reversed the meaning.

The concert was unfairly short, but it didn't take even one hour to realize that Phil Ochs is still marching, and with as much sincerity and devotion as ever.

Country sounds from Cajun man

By MARV BERNSTEIN

Doug Kershaw is from the heart of Louisiana, Cajun country, but his songs and style are more country than Cajun. During his opening number at the Colonial, "Battle of New Orleans", he had to replace his violin bow twice, but was stopped only when his backup men couldn't keep up with him.

Then settling down with his guitar and Cajun drawl, he began singing about many varied things, but always with the country and country life in the forefront. "Natural Born Man" and "Go Fight Your Fight" told one side of country life while "Need for the Swamp Grass Weed" told another.

Not only is he a good writer and talented musician (guitar, violin, and accordion), but he's a sincere folksy human being with a genuine appeal to and interest in his audience.

25 more indicted

Kent State student arrested

Kent, Ohio (CUP) — The student council president and a sociology professor were among those arrested yesterday as county deputy sheriffs began a roundup of 25 persons indicted by a state grand jury in connection with the protests against American invasion of Cambodia last May.

National guardsmen killed four students during the protest action. The grand jury report took blame away from the guardsmen and placed the "major responsibility" on the university administration for fostering "an attitude of laxity, over-indulgence and permissiveness."

Faculty members were also blamed for "overemphasis" of the right to dissent.

Student council president Craig Morton was arrested by a man in civilian clothes wearing an American flag in his lapel and charged with second-degree (would you believe it) riot for being part of a "tumultuous" crowd. He was released on $1,000 bail.

Thomas S. Lough, 42-year-old associate professor of sociology, was charged with incitement to riot and released on $5,000 bail.

Dr. Lough, a self-professed socialist on a faculty where liberals are identifiable by the beards they wear with their crew cuts, is popular among the students, but regarded with alarm by some of his colleagues (that means faculty) who fear, as one said, that "he's giving us a bad name."

The professor, who also directs an anti-poverty program, has been a controversial figure since he began describing the manufacture of molotov cocktails in his social problems course several years ago.

The first of those arrested was Richard Felber, 21, who left Kent State last fall. He is already in jail serving a 20-to-40 year sentence for possession of hallucinogenic drugs.

The news of the arrest of Morgan, an air force ROTC cadet who has been the major spokesman and organizer for the emphasis on nonviolence that pervades campus groups here, was greeted with consternation among the students.

As signs announcing the arrest were posted in the windows of campus newspaper, The Daily Kent Stater, students shook their heads.

"I just don't believe it," said one student.

Near Memorial Gate at the campus, one student asked what the student president had been charged with.

"Oh I don't know; I guess they just wanted to get him because he's a symbol," his companion said.

SAC president Rod Hurd has bravely laughed off any suggestion that he may be arrested in the wake of the arrest of the president of Kent State's student body.

"Ha, ha, ha," said Hurd in a telephone interview last night.

Mathews does not trust Trudeau

By MARINA STRAUSS

"The United States wants to eat Canada up and the Liberal Party is assisting at the meal."

Robin Mathews, professor at Carleton University, speaking Saturday evening at the Ontario Regional Canadian University Press (ORCUP) conference in Ottawa, outlined Canada's struggle against American imperialism.

Mathews and James Steele are co-authors of "The Struggle for Canadian Universities." They have never been interviewed on the English television in Ottawa, and the Carleton University newspaper did not review the book at all.

"I don't trust Pierre Elliot Trudeau. I have a contempt for him," said Mathews. "Canada has been robbed of freedom in Trudeau's police state."

He blames the government for passing by all the potential in Canada.

Canadian professors with excellent qualifications cannot get

Fort will speak tomorrow night

Joel Fort, the founder of the Haight-Ashbury Free Clinic, the first free drug clinic in San Francisco, will be speaking tomorrow night in the Medical Sciences Auditorium as a part of Vertigo 70.

Fort, who was a defence witness in the trial of Timothy Leary has attacked morality police, government bureaucrats and the tobacco industries.

Fort's address will be followed by workshops with "knowledgeable drug scene people".

jobs in the country. "The U.S. is over-producing graduates and dumping them into the periphery" said Mathews concerning the high number of American professors in Canadian universities. "Professors here are being appointed by nationality, not by ideology, and it is the individual departments choosing their faculty, not the Board of Governors."

He said friends and relatives of department members are being chosen, and Canadian aren't getting the positions. "There is a conspiracy."

In Graduate English at U of T there are 106 courses, one of which is on Canadian Literature.

Mathews is dismayed at the number of cultural jobs being taken over by Americans, especially recently. Directors of the Montreal Museum, the Stephen Leacock Museum, the Canadiana; are from the states an American was appointed by Eric Kierans to reorganize the post office; the new vice-president of Loyola College is an American.

"Any other country would have passed legislation" accused Mathews. Trudeau's response to the teaching situation — cutting down the number of graduates Mathews — "is assisting the American take over" Mathews claims. Trudeau has also said "I don't care who teaches."

However, questioning Mathews emphasis on the importance of professors and leaders being Canadian, Sandy Cameron (CUP) pointed out that Trudeau himself is Canadian university trained.

The non-Canadians here are not interested in learning about Canada and this is reflected in their teaching insists Mathews. "The struggle for Canadian Universities is a struggle for Canada."

The Americans are taking over our economy, our territory, our energy, the Arctic, our mind (Gage Text Book Co. has just been taken over), our university and our culture warned Mathews. "We're being rubbed out."

Erindale demonstration

Karate club starts with crash

The Erindale College Karate Club put on its first demonstration last Tuesday to a standing-room-only crowd in the common room.

The demonstration, though unrehearsed and the first one for many of its participants, was a success and possibly a breakthrough for Erindale's infant karate organization.

If the enthusiasm of the audience was any indication, Karate should come into its own at Erindale this year.

The demonstration was run by the new head instructor of the Club, Dave Manara, a first-degree black belt in the Shito-Ryu style of Karate.

Manara's career in the sport has been mercurial. Joining only four years ago, he has won almost every major tournament in his belt division and one year ago was awarded his Shodan (1st degree black belt).

Achieving a black belt in only three years is an almost unheard of feat in this style where the average time required to reach this level is five years.

Since reaching his black belt, Manara has continued his winning ways. He has entered five tournaments since then and has come out with two firsts, one second and one third and picked up one disqualification for accidentally knocking out an opponents teeth!

Taking part in the demonstration last Tuesday along with Manara were Rick Kerrigan, black belt and instructor at the Erindale Club during its first two years; John McDonnell, (blue belt) and one of the club's original members: Tony Royes (orange belt) and Rick Weslowski (yellow belt).

The Varsity — Roy Dierco

Sharon Evanoff breaks two one-inch boards with a flawlessly executed front kick for a packed house at Erindale College.

Putting in a special appearance were Sharon Evanoff, Canadian Girls brown belt champion and male brown belt champion Scotty Devine. Both are from the Japanese Canadian Cultural Center, an affiliated club.

Miss Evanoff, a first-year student at Varsity, has won every major event in her belt division for the last two years. She has more trophies than many of the top men and has still managed to be every bit as popular and as feminine as her friends outside the sport.

The demonstration tried to show what would go on in a typical class with somewhat more emphasis placed on the more spectacular events such as self defense, performed by Evanoff and Devine, and board breaking done by all the higher belts.

In the board breaking, Manara broke five, one-inch thick pine boards with his fist.

A demonstration of the sport aspect of Karate was also presented.

Free sparring was done by Royes and Weslowski then by McDonnell and Devine. Finally, Manara took on all of the above in a display of the reaction and technique which has made him a champion.

The club welcomes everyone (male or female) to watch or participate in their workouts which are held on Tuesday and Thursday evenings from 7 p.m. until 9.

Toronto's boats tie for first

By BILL ALLISON

Last Saturday's regatta at London was a surprise both for Brock, who tied the favoured Toronto team for first place, and for Western, who had to settle for second place.

Also surprised by Western's impotence, the officials did everything but sink the Toronto boats to protect the 1969 Champion's title. It was the officiating which permitted Brock to sneak into a tie with Toronto.

The U of T Junior Varsity crew finished far ahead of the pack, but unfortunately moved out of their lane at one point in the race. They were disqualified though no other crew was interfered with.

Brock was declared first, Wayne State second, and Mac third.

Women's archery team regains championship; sets points record

By KIT KOEHLER

U of T's Women's archery team regained the Outdoor Archery Championship last weekend in a match at the University of Guelph.

Varsity's six sharpshooters came out on top with 4,359 points to defeat last year's champion, McMaster, which tallied 3,865, and Western with 3,805.

The U of T score dwarfed the old record of 4,105 points, and Varsity's Linda Campbell shared a new individual one-round shooting record of 616 points with McMaster's Mary Grant. Also, all six Varsity shooters ranked in the top 11.

Cut off by both flanking crews, the Freshman boat was forced to drop back or collide, costing them the race. Inexplicably the offending crews were not disqualified. Results: Brock first, Mac second, and York third.

The lightweight crew, rowing with a last minute replacement for an ailing crew member, eked out a win over Brock, the only serious challenger. Western finished third.

The official manning the finish gun decided the Senior Varsity in Western's favour. Though Toronto reached the finish line first, the finish gun was not fired until the overtaking Western crew had gained the lead.

With more objective officials next week at Mac, the results should give a more accurate indication of who will triumph in the final contest to be held in St. Catharines.

So far, Toronto leads the OQAA total points race with 200 points to Western's 150. No one else is in contention.

Soccer Blues win 1-0

By DON McMAHON

After picking up their first league victory of the season 1-0 last Saturday against Waterloo, Bob Nicol's Soccer Blues get a chance to move closer to the pace-setting McMaster Marauders when they invade Guelph this evening to tangle with the soccer Gryphons.

It was Ersin Ozerding's opportune goal at 38 minutes into the first half that enabled Blues to down the Warriors.

The match was never outstanding for its action, but Blues played slightly below their potential in failing to stampee the Waterloo side who are winless in four starts.

Varsity now has four points in four games on one win and two ties.

The powerful Western Mustangs are here on Saturday for a noon game for what all hope will be a lesson in soccer.

Bruce Simpson, a second-year PhysEd student who spent last year at UCLA on a track scholarship, sails over the bar to set a new OQAA mark in the pole vault.

Eric Little strains as he competes in the long jump.

Tension

Last Saturday at the Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association track and field championships at McMaster, our Varsity track team, coached by Fred Foot and Hal Brown, came up with a fine performance to finish a strong fourth in the team standings. Defending champion Waterloo University was again first while Western took second and McMaster third. The Varsity's Clive Hobson was there to get the pictures. It was an outstanding meet for the OQAA. Six records, including one in the pole vault by our own Bruce Simpson, were established: 1500 meters — Grant McLaren (Western), 3:46.4; 300 meter steeplechase — Grant McLaren (Western), 9:10.4; Pole Vault — Bruce Simpson (Toronto), 16' 1/4"; Triple Jump — Bill Lindley (Waterloo), 48' 2 1/2"; Javelin — Glen Arbeau (Waterloo), 225' 4"; High Jump — Ray Anthony (Western) and Pete Zowebewych (McMaster), 6' 6", Anthony won the event on the basis of fewer misses.

Grant Tadman, who placed first in the discus, heaves the shot put.

War Act is used to threaten man sought by U.S.

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Despite reassurances from Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, police are using the War Measures Act to extradite Americans seeking political asylum in Canada.

George Harrington, an American citizen living in Toronto, was arrested Wednesday under the act and threatened with extradition to the United States, where he would face charges arising out of last May's riot at Kent State University in Ohio.

Harrington was living at Kent State as a "non-student" when four students were killed there by National Guardsmen.

He fled to Canada last month after receiving a subpoena from state authorities.

"And ever since, Canadian and American police have been following me from Vancouver to Toronto," Harrington said.

Two Metro police constables picked up Harrington near the Submarine boutique in Yorkville Wednesday and told him he was charged with assault and battery.

They said he had hit someone in the face at Regency Towers Saturday night.

Harrington, who said he was nowhere near Regency Towers that night, was taken to police station 52 on College St., where the charge was dropped.

"When I asked what I was being charged with," Harrington said, "a cop told me they didn't have to tell me anything under the War Measures Act."

He said when he asked to call his attorney, the policeman replied: "You call your attorney, and I'll kick your balls right up your throat."

"I looked at him," said Harrington, "and he was ready to do it."

He was introduced to two police detectives who told him they were arranging the paperwork to have him extradited as soon as possible.

Police then released Harrington but kept him under constant surveillance.

"I've been followed everywhere," he said. "My sister-in-law has also been watched. And there's been a cop car outside of my apartment on Bernard St. all the time."

Police also broke into and ransacked the Huron St. apartment of Harrington's girlfriend, Carol Grafton. They told neighbours they were looking for a member of the FLQ.

On the advice of his lawyer, and of friends in the U.S., Harrington flew out of Toronto Wednesday night to return to Ohio before he could be officially extradited.

"The police will be waiting for me at Cleveland Airport," he said. "They'll know, because all my friends' phones are tapped in the U.S."

"If I stayed here they'd try to throw me in jail for being with the FLQ, and I'm not going to be able to prove my innocence. I would have to sit in jail here, and then again down in the States. I might just as well remove one stage."

"My main objective was to get political asylum in Canada," he added, "but that's impossible now."

Harrington is charged on nine counts: first degree riot, outside agitation, intending to incite a riot, arson, obstruction of justice, assaulting a police officer, assaulting a fireman, and illegal flight to avoid prosecution. If convicted on all the charges, he could be sentenced from 40 years to life imprisonment.

Eleven students are already in jail on charges arising out of the Kent State killings, and 14 more are being sought.

Metro police at station 52 refused to comment about Harrington's arrest or any other arrests made under the War Measures Act.

CIN 203 women invade, disrupt engineers' annual slave auction

By PHIL CHARKO

"Fuck! Fuck! Fuck!"
"Squat! Squat!"

Catcalls and flying squids and chicken. (Background noises and action). The annual Engineers Slave Auction yesterday was disrupted by a group of furious students. The slave auction is an event held to raise funds for the United Appeal.

As few slaves were available, due to poor planning, a last-minute mob of about 25 engineers attempted to corral more women into the hall to be sold as slaves.

At this point eight women from CIN 203 course, who objected to the indignity of selling women's bodies, stepped in.

Heddie Swanson, Susan Garber, Sheila Maidstone and others talked to a few of the girls to tell them what was about to happen to them and remind them that they didn't have to take part. They had come down to observe the auction and had been enraged at the attitudes of the Engineers toward the women.

On one occasion the auctioneer said to a girl being auctioned off, "What are your measurements? . . . hmmm . . . 2" diameter but I bet you know how to use it." Noticing the women, several engineers attempted to drag Maidstone into the room for the auction. A pulling and pushing match developed as the other girls attempted to help her and the engineers came out second best.

Laura Beckon, one of the protestors, wondered at the engineers, "inability to understand what it's like to have your cunt sold." Also objectionable were the racist overtones in a slave auction.

All emphasized that they had nothing to do with any women's liberation group.

Twelve girls who through the persuasiveness of the engineers had decided to become slaves were "rescued" from being sold as slaves.

Not all girls felt this way. One, identified only as Stephanie, from Meds '72, stripped down to bra, panties and nylons.

The purpose of the auction was to raise money for the United Appeal. Hugh Morrison, Director of Public Relations for the UA said he wasn't happy with receiving money from that sort of thing.

Simcoe Hall's Room Allocation Officer, C. N. Tusiewicz is investigating complaints he received in the affair.

Campus centre study to continue

By IAN MACLAREN

In response to Wayne Richardson's report on his summer long study of the feasibility of a campus centre at U of T, SAC voted Wednesday night to continue the study.

The motion with the exception of the final clause was passed once, defeated as council retraced its steps, and then passed again just before adjournment.

The motion read, "That this Council set up a group composed of SAC members, interested students and other members of the community-at-large charged with the task of concretizing the need for a campus centre in terms of the needs of the human beings affected by such a centre and to direct the activities of the campus centre co-ordinator."

Wayne Richardson hired by SAC at $550 a month until this week was once again rehired for a period specified by motion as, "until the campus centre committee reports or until the end of December which ever comes later."

Richardson's report was accepted with mixed feelings by council members. It was generally agreed that since Richardson's task was outlined in a very nebulous manner at the outset, it was foreseeable that the report would be somewhat nebulous.

Richardson proposed in his report four possible locations for the centre: 89 St. George St. at Hoskin Ave., presently the site of the Newman Club; use of the Book-room, Innis College building and Graduate School building on St. George St.; use of the Borden Building at Spadina and College; an infill project using the open land around Sid Smith and Lash Miller Buildings.

Each site has its advantages and disadvantages, and consequently the selection of one particular site is difficult. The newborn SAC committee will be faced with this task as it continues the study. The committee will present a brief to SAC in January. The war drags on . . .

York senate will divulge faculty nationality data

In a meeting late Wednesday afternoon the senate of York University agreed to release a report concerning the background of its faculty.

The Canadian Liberation Movement had threatened a sit-in if the report with statistics on education and citizenship were not released by Wednesday last.

U of T president, Claude Bissell, stated in an interview yesterday, that the government will ask for information (about students and staff) it feels is socially desirable. "I have no objection to giving such information if the rights of the individual are controlled. Personally I feel it's somewhat irrelevant to education."

"We'll give information on the number of staff we have, and we are even prepared to give information on citizenship, but that's about the extent of it," he continued.

When questioned about giving "individual evaluations to the government on staff or students he gave an unconditional no.

"We're reluctant even to give academic information. If a university asks us for information about John Brown's applying for the graduate school that's one thing. If the government asks us for information, even if it's only academic, we're very skeptical because we could see no particular validity in their asking it."

Problems on problems

Conflict with board's interests started campus centre troubles

By BOB GAUTHIER

An effort is being made to revive the ill-fated campus centre now in its sixth year of planning.

At a SAC meeting Wednesday evening Wayne Richardson, Campus Centre Co-ordinator, presented a preliminary report. The report dealt in part with the philosophy behind the proposed centre. It discussed the on-campus attitudes of three of the university's functions — teaching, research and service.

It was over five years ago that an architect was first hired to design the new building. It was to be completed by 1969. The university has spent $211,000 clearing the site and paying the architect's fees.

An article in The Varsity last February was aptly entitled the Campus Centre File. Since its inception the centre has been plagued with enough problems to fill a few files.

The financial support was originally to come from the provincial government (50 per cent) and the student body (50 per cent). The student portion was to be raised in large part from either the Bank of Montreal or the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. The agreement was that the centre would lease space to one of the banks over a long term in return for financial support.

The Bank of Montreal was felt to have the better offer, but the Board of Governors didn't want to see the B of M as the exclusive campus bank (one of the terms of agreement) and the deal fell through.

In 1968 the provincial government changed the rules for financing the centre and agreed to support 95 per cent of the building costs. The Campus Centre Committee was unwilling to start over again and said its last proposal was final.

Innis College also figured prominently in plans for the centre. The administration had it slated as a commitment prior to the centre.

In addition to these problems, the city decided to "get tough" with the university enforcing zoning bylaws which stipulated how far back from St. George St. the building had to be set. Unfortunately the building was designed on the supposition of a master plan which allowed for the closing of St. George St. to vehicular traffic. The city's master plan demanded that St. George St. remain open.

The Spadina Expressway was another problem. In order to move the site of the centre the final form of the expressway would have to be known. This issue is still unresolved.

The report is supposed to be completed for the end of December and would serve as a basis for hiring an architect. At present six to eight firms are under consideration, including the firm which designed the old building. However, the whole building, which was originally intended to fit adjacent to the Physical Plant on Huron St. will have to be redesigned. Richardson would also like to see a totally new concept rather than the typical campus centre design.

Richardson hopes to obtain the money for the development of the centre from the university. The fact that U of T spent $220,000 in the past may make it hesitate.

"This is the first I've heard about it," said Alex Rankin, Executive Vice-president of U of T, when contacted last night. Rankin could make no comment on the request until he presented it to the Board of Governors for approval.

Working against the plan is the fact that the university space entitlement has been frozen until 1975.

Richardson is attempting to develop a "spirit of co-operation" with all concerned. He said he wished to avoid a levy on the student body for anything other than operating costs of the centre. In a referendum last spring the idea of a $15 levy per student was approved.

Where the money for the construction of the centre will come from is not known. After the report is completed several alternatives are open — the provincial government, the university or private enterprise. Richardson acknowledged that Queen's Park could be a major problem because of the legislative committee investigating education costs in the province.

He said he wanted to receive position papers concerning the centre from anyone who was interested. They could concern anything from the philosophy of the centre to the controversy over the university's needs.

Plan to cut budget approved by senate at McGill University

MONTREAL (CUP) — McGill University senate has approved a plan to reduce the university's projected 1971-72 deficit of $8 million by between $2.6 and $2.8 million.

Cutting the deficit will mean suspension of intercollegiate athletics (the original report recommended elimination of the program), closing of McGill's museums and the conversion of some residences to other uses.

A report drawn up over the summer under the leadership of former administration principal H. Roche Robertson, recommended the university reduce its projected deficit by $3.5 million.

The senate presented the plan to administration principal Robert Bell as "advice" when he prepares the 1971-72 budget submission to the Board of Governors.

Not necessarily democracy. . .

An important aspect of the imposition of the War Measures Act and the suspension of civil liberties in Canada is the effect this is having on municipal politics in Montreal.

In spite of the suspension, by government order, of normal democratic rights, civic elections will go ahead as scheduled in Montreal this Monday.

Well, not exactly as scheduled. It just happens that the joint Jean Drapeau-Lucien Saulnier machine which has ruled Montreal with a callous but fairly efficient hand for practically the last decade, has been facing the most serious challenge of its political lifetime in the last couple of months.

The challenge comes from a coalition of community-based groups called the Front d'Action Politique.

Their program is one of democratization, of returning power to the ordinary citizens of the city. They call for "a true urban democracy based on the participation of the workers in the decisions which are taken at all levels."

The FRAP was also among the section of Quebec society — one which Claude Ryan among others considers the most important — to support the political program of the FLQ last week and denounce the institutionalized violence of Quebec society.

The FRAP has been one of the many victims of the application of the War Measures Act's arbitrary provisions.

Two of the party's 32 candidates have been incarcerated and held incommunicado. One of them, Dr. Henri Bellemar, is chief internist at a hospital and operates a community health clinic in his riding.

The party's campaign manager and treasurer have been arrested.

The party's printer, along with all his employees, have been arrested. This has made it practically impossible for the FRAP to mount any kind of election campaign this week. Drapeau, of course, can afford expensive radio, TV and billboard spots, as well as the publicity he has been getting free.

In effect, the government has smashed the FRAP and guaranteed a massive law and order vote for Drapeau and his candidates. (There is no other viable alternative in the election.)

On top of all this, the federal manpower minister, Jean Marchand, has publicly labelled the FRAP, a "front" for the FLQ.

This, of course, is perfectly in line with the government policy of identifying all democratic opposition in Quebec with the terrorists of the FLQ.

Said Marchand:

"We had good reasons to believe that the FLQ, which as a front has the organization called FRAP in Montreal, wanted to disturb the elections by explosions of all kinds and further kidnappings or even shooting people."

Here Marchand ignores two really obvious things.

If the FRAP favoured terrorism as a political strategy, why is it running candidates in an election? The fact that FRAP is a democratically-oriented electoral coalition has brought it under severe criticism from many newspapers and organizations further to the left, including the student newsmagazine, Quartier Latin.

Secondly, Marchand rests his arguments — as the government has for the entire past week — on the assurance that "we had good reasons".

The very strength of the government's case has been that it has not had to present any evidence to anyone. It has only asked that we accept its word and place our trust in its omniscience.

The most incredible of Marchand's revelations is that the Federal government was requested by the city of Montreal to enforce emergency measures in order to guarantee a "peaceful" election.

The effect of Ottawa's compliance with this kind of request has been to create a climate in which Montrealers will shift strongly to the right — behind Drapeau.

The fact that civil liberties have been suspended and the entire nation thrown into a state of intense political paranoia where statements like "I don't care if they put a million people in jail" can be commonplace, and yet ostensibly "democratic" elections can go ahead as scheduled, is a serious contradiction.

To harass and cripple a democratic political party, and then go ahead with a "democratic" election, is a course of action which clearly reveals the true face behind capitalist notions of democracy.

So far there has been no strong public challenge to this hypocrisy.

This is because in Quebec the FRAP has been only one of the targets of the wholesale repression which has come down.

As we have pointed out before, the list of arrested is not restricted to FLQ members and supporters by any means. It encompasses a broad segment of Quebec's progressive intellectual and social leadership — poets, trade union leaders, writers, singers, reporters, doctors, lawyers, professors and student.

There has been some outcry — especially from the three leading union organizations in Quebec, but many of those who could now be leading a popular outcry against the hysteria promoted by Trudeau, Bourassa, and the daily press, have been silenced.

Because of this it has become necessary that any wide opposition to the excesses of Canadian state authorities be initiated in English Canada, where it is still possible.

What the War Measures mean to you

- All strikes can be hanned. Strike leaders and strikers can be arrested, charged and jailed.
- Demonstrations, canvassing, meetings for peace can be hanned.
- All public meetings can be hanned.
- Any newspaper declared to be in violation of the Act can be closed down.
- Just by declaring an organization subversive it can be hanned.
- There is no onus on the government, army or police, to prove their charges. Anyone arrested is no longer held innocent until proven guilty.
- Those who go to public meetings out of curiosity or sympathy, even though not members of the organization, can be arrested and jailed.
- Police and the armed forces can arrest anyone without a warrant, hold him in custody up to 21 days without laying a charge, and continue to detain him in custody for 90 days without right to bail, when further procedures may be taken.
- Evidence of a person's earlier activities within a hanned organization can be used to arrest him, and as evidence later.
- If you attended a legal FLQ meeting two years ago, you are liable to a five-year penalty today.
- You may not distribute leaflets or put up posters the authorities deem subversive.
- Your home and any other premises may be searched without a warrant. So may your car or truck.
- Assisting someone who is deemed subversive by the authorities leaves you liable to the same charges.
- Maximum penalty on conviction of belonging to an "unlawful" organization is five years' imprisonment and a $5,000 fine.
- Any group which according to the authorities advocates the use of force or the commission of a crime as a means of or as in aid of accomplishing governing change within Canada may be outlawed.
- It is unlawful, punishable up to five years in prison and a $5,000 fine, for any owner, tenant, agent, or superintendent of any premises to allow meetings of organizations declared unlawful on their premises.

What do the people of Quebec think?

By CLAUDERIAN

(Ryon is editor of Le Devoir and co-chairman of the recently formed Committee for an Independent Canada. Below we print a translation of his editorial of Tuesday this week.)

YESTERDAY IN OTTAWA parliament approved, by a vote of 190 to 17 a resolution supporting the federal government's decision to invoke the War Measures Act. This vote is not surprising. It reflects quite well the state of terror and panic that has swept up Canadian public opinion on the day following Mr. Laporte's death.

It might normally have been expected that the assassination of Mr. Laporte would raise reservations about the uncompromising policy adopted by the federal and Quebec governments regarding the kidnappers' demands. Quite the opposite reaction has prevailed. Since Sunday, thousands of citizens have concluded, rather paradoxically, that recent events have proved the correctness of the Canadian government's position. The number of those who questioned the wisdom of the government last Friday and Saturday has diminished since the weekend.

At first sight, then, the government is operating with the very solid support of public opinion. But one doesn't have to dig very deeply to see that things are far from being that simple. As proof of this I would like to call attention to certain indications of the past few days.

The first indications come from an opinion survey carried out for several Canadian newspapers, including Le Devoir, by a survey research firm in Montreal. The opinion survey was done last Thursday and Friday in Montreal, falling between the two radically distinct phases of the whole drama — the day before and the day after the proclamation of the War Measures Act. It was also two days before the discovery of Mr. Laporte's body. The results are naturally less relevant to the new situation that has followed. The researcher nonetheless has made some observations that have a certain value. These observations reveal the complexity and the extreme mobility of public opinion.

THE FIRST OBSERVATION is that of the 277 persons surveyed 109, or more than 35%, refused to answer. These refusals are doubtless attributable to a certain extent to a mistrust that has nothing to do with hesitation. At first sight, however, they also express a significant degree of hesitation.

The second revealing aspect: of the political leaders' statements that had been made on the event at the time of the survey, two were particularly important: That of the Minister of Justice Choquette and that of Mr. Bourassa.

Mr. Choquette had made a declaration October 10 (before Mr. Laporte's kidnapping) which was generally interpreted as reflecting a hard line. Mr. Bourassa's declaration the next day was generally understood, until last Thursday, as indicating a more conciliatory line. Of the two men, Mr. Bourassa received the most support by a margin of 50 to 1. Mr. Trudeau is mentioned by just 22% of the respondents. It should be noted, however, that he had not made his televised speech at the time of the survey. Even if we assume that Mr. Trudeau's speech would have gained him as much support as that given Mr. Bourassa a few days earlier, this fact would point to how easily public opinion can be changed from one state to another.

Third indication: the position of the respondents on the liberation of political prisoners. Liberation pure and simple is opposed quite strongly (52% against, 33% for) but in the case of the transportation of the prisoners to Cuba or Algeria, there is a majority favorable (46% for, 39% against).

With the changed situation today, public opinion has evolved a great deal in the last three days. But it would be wrong not to keep in mind the extreme diversity of views that this public opinion survey reflects. This diversity is perhaps more indicative of the deep tendencies of public opinion than the temporary monolithic opinion created by the shock on Saturday. If such is the case it should be said so to the governments and to the citizens. This fact will help us understand the crisis better and to define with more moderation the policies needed to resolve it.

Other indications come from the numerous responses to the two declarations made by a group of Quebec social leaders calling for a moderate line (Mr. Ryon refers to the statement ode Wednesday October 14 by union leaders, the Parti Québécois, several prominent Quebec citizens including Mr. Ryon himself. The essential point of the statement was that the Quebec government should resist the federal government's hard line and negotiate the exchange of the two hostages for the 23 prisoners designated by the FLQ. The some group of leaders reaffirmed their position after Mr. Laporte's death — trans.).

Montrealers line up early this week to view the body of slain labour minister Pierre Laporte.

FIRST, LETTERS AND CALLS from the Anglophone side. In majority, they are unfavorable. A major theme in them was: "We trusted you, but now that's all finished." But to complete this picture, I add that there were positive responses from Anglophones. They allow me to observe, once again, that in these questions the dividing line is not primarily ethnic or linguistic, but is rooted more in conceptions of politics, of man, and of democracy which go beyond ethnic divisions.

On the Francophone side, two principal types of reaction: telephone calls, usually more spontaneous; and letters, more considered and deliberate reflections. The telephone calls were frequently unfavorable. Letters (well over 100) were favorable by a large majority.

I would like to quote parts of a letter received from a person who has long been active in the religious, co-operative and social sectors, whose honesty and forthrightness I have always appreciated. He has only the interest of his people at heart; he is a keen thinker and observer, and is not at all a professional letter-writer to newspapers.

In the present dilemma, my correspondent opts for the primacy of human life. But this is not what is most interesting. It is rather the following:

"It's enough to dialogue for a few minutes with our children, our relatives, our friends, as well as with people in restaurants, to realize how serious the present situation is. My fear does not come from the FLQ, nor from separatism, but from the people themselves. Their aggressiveness is not directed against the FLQ. (It's manifestly approved by a very large number), nor against the state, but against those who are responsible for the present social and economic situation. This situation is more important in their minds than separatism. I am quite afraid that very soon there will not be enough police forces to contain this, because it will be expressed on several fronts at once".

JEAN MARCHAND CAN IMPRESS US with the quantity of guns and dynamite which are presently in dangerous hands. Mr. Trudeau can invoke the War Measures Act to combat the FLQ. But I find there is more truth in what my correspondent says than all that has been said by Messrs. Trudeau, Bourassa and Drapeau. I add this quotation from the same letter for their benefit:

"I have the impression that our public men do not wish to accept any change in their way of thinking and acting. The people's aroused consciousness is something that no one has the right to forget. Moreover there are leaders among them to make this effective."

We must understand the emergency situation of the authorities after the kidnapping of Mr. Laporte and Mr. Cross. It is understandable that, with no recourse, they devised solutions for the immediate situation whose physical dimensions go miles beyond the problem at hand, and whose logic could alienate them from, rather than bring them closer to a real solution.

But it is especially important to say to these authorities that they would be mistaken to fall asleep in imagining that they have public opinion behind them.

Instinctive, spontaneous, superficial opinion has supported them with force in the last few days. But these reactions take in only one sector of opinion. Other, equally important sectors are still to be heard from. And it is from those sectors, much more than from some criminal conspiracy, that could come, tomorrow, new crises.

Terrorism and revolution: the political implications

By MICHAEL MARRUS

(Marrus is a history professor at U of T)

Among the lessons which the radical left might draw from this sad week in Canadian history, the relationship between terrorism and revolution seems to me to be both the most obvious and the most ignored. There has been a great deal of talk, during the various meetings and teach-ins that I have attended, about repression and the aspirations of the repressed. The greatest emotion and the most deeply entrenched political feelings were released in attacks on the War Measures Act and the seizure of Canada's new group of genuine political prisoners.

But the striking element which was missing from any discussion among radicals which I heard was the sense of awe and horror which every person must face when confronted with the facts and details of political murder. To be sure, we ought all to know that both suffering and murder are not foreign to our society, and that a good deal of this might be prevented by some kind of political action.

But who among us, even the most cool and confident revolutionary ideologist, can deny that there was something particularly awful about the way Pierre Laporte died? Who among us can deny that political terrorism of this kind, undertaken in the name of revolution, represents some kind of profound assault upon the greater humanity which revolution is supposed to hear? To admit this is not to weaken one's revolutionary elan, but simply to accept one's own humanity.

But to admit this undeniable fact is also to be led to consider the political implications of terrorism. It seems to me that something more was needed than the mechanical disavowal of terrorism, which was quickly followed, in most cases, by the face-saving posture of militancy. What, after all, is terrorism such as that practised by the FLQ? It may well be, as Claude Ryan suggests, that terrorism is nourished by oppressive conditions. But oppressive conditions can nourish all kinds and forms of protest. In Quebec, certainly, this has happened.

Terrorism, on the other hand, is in our society that form of political activity, claiming to be revolutionary, which arises in the absence of any mass base in the population at large. The terrorist is cut off from a popular following, knows this, and is nevertheless committed to the most extreme and dramatic attack upon the social order in which he lives. Bombing and political murder, then, follow with inexorable logic. The important thing to recognize about terrorism is this climate of political isolation within which the terrorist moves. If the terrorist had a mass following, terror would certainly not be necessary; if there were genuine popular support for an assault upon the social or political fabric, a far more extensive kind of attack would be possible.

Now it is precisely this fact, I would suggest, that those who claim to be in the business of revolution must consider. If students who so eagerly style themselves revolutionaries are serious about this definition, they must recognize that they either have a mass following or they do not. If they do not, they may well find themselves driven by the momentum of political activity into the lonely and profoundly anti-human gesture of political murder. I would urge this thought upon those who stood up at various meetings to declare themselves revolutionaries.

The fact is, of course, that the people of neither Quebec nor of the rest of Canada are revolutionaries. Not yet, some will argue. Perhaps so, but the existing climate of opinion, however "engineered" or controlled, represents a political fact which must be contended with. The blindness of those radicals who assumed that the "brothers and sisters of Quebec" were on the verge of some sort of popular uprising staggers the imagination. To my mind they are reminiscent of the American State Department experts who decided that the Vietnamese were ripe for a U.S.-style democracy in 1965. They simply needed a few "advisors".

These thoughts are relevant, it seems to me, for we live in a time in which there is an extraordinarily promiscuous use of the term "revolution". Not only does the word drop lightly from the lips of many political activists who have scarcely considered its social implications, but, partly as a result, revolution must now face the troubling symptom of trivialization — revolution has become commercialized. And so we are invited to join the tooth-paste revolution, the Dodge rebellion, or whatever.

It would appear important, in the light of our experience this last week, to consider seriously, among other things, what it means to be a revolutionary, and, in particular, how a revolutionary relates to a non-revolutionary society.

Society, in the final analysis, is people, and it is the radical's frequent isolation from and even contempt for people which ought to be pondered in the present circumstance. Something might not only be wrong with our social system; something might also be wrong with the radical's definition of himself.

'PoliEc meeting spoke for itself'

As the Chairman of the plenary session of the Teach-In held by the Political Economy Course Union I want to clear up some misunderstanding about the nature of the resolutions passed there. That session explicitly agreed that those resolutions were not intended to represent the views of the course union itself or of all the students in the university.

Those resolutions represent the wish of the participants in the Teach-In to culminate their discussions with a statement of their own position and a call to the students on this campus to speak out on these issues for themselves in their classes and outside them.

There are a lot of people on this campus who are always ready to jump on the bandwagon to attack course unions for deliberately misrepresenting students whenever those unions are associated in any way with any substantive issue. These are usually the same reflex-reactionaries who delight in accusing The Varsity of "irresponsible radicalism" every time they print an article about a political, social or educational issue.

Course Unions are not perfect. Sometimes their actions are not really clear and easily misunderstood. The Varsity is not perfect. It is a very difficult thing to write a completely objective news story. But to assume that any group which tries to raise or report some issue is automatically a "far-left" group is wrong. The left does not have a monopoly on concern.

Those people who are so quick to attack course unions should realize that they are slowly destroying the only hope students now have of influencing the shape of their education at this university.

If you are really concerned do not stand back and attack the course unions — join them and make sure that they do reflect your views.

Puddled protest

In view of recent happenings and the reporting by the "so-called" U of T paper, the Varsity, I have come to the conclusion that this paper does not represent the student body, but the narrow-minded biased opinion of the editing staff of this piece of socialist garbage.

If The Varsity concerned itself more with the original ideas of what a university newspaper should be, it could, possibly, better serve all the students of U of T. Throughout my experiences at university I have found the Varsity good for nothing better than wiping one's boots, after walking through a puddle of mud. It is about time we saw in print a wider view of student thought and not just one faction.

Boswell resigns treasury, cites SAC irresponsibility

In a sharply worded speech attacking SAC's acceptance of seats on the President's Advisory Council and "fiscal irresponsibility", SAC Finance Commissioner Peter Boswell resigned Wednesday night.

Boswell, who is the fifth SAC member this year to resign, claimed that only the council's impatience stopped parity representation on the President's Advisory Council rather than merely the five seats accepted.

"There is strong support for accepting a deal whereby the faculty will not oppose the students having parity with them on PAC if SAC will agree to confirm the University Wide Committee results," said Boswell.

Students have been anxious for representation on PAC as this will be the body which chooses the presidential search committee. There is opposition however to confirming the results of the UWC which call for a non-parity governing body in the university.

Boswell's attack against SAC for spending most of its contingency fund on a grant to the Black Students Union and The Varsity, comes at the same time as a petition is being circulated to call for a referendum for SAC to repeal its latest budget.

The petition was not presented to SAC Wednesday night as it lacked the necessary 2000 signatures.

All SMC students support gov't: note

SMC student council president Greg Duffy, a staunch admirer of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's democratic techniques, has outdone the old master.

Students entering the cafeteria today were met by a poster declaring that a letter affixed to it would be sent to Trudeau in Ottawa by 6 p.m. tomorrow. The letter was to represent the "view of SMC students."

The letter said that the 2,300 SMC students all support the use of the WAR Measures Act.

Obviously wanting Trudeau to experience the unqualified joy of such support, Duffy failed to mention that none of the 2,300 had been consulted as to whether this was really their opinion.

However, with the fine touch of true democracy, Duffy affixed a provision that if 10 per cent (230) of the students signed a petition requesting the letter not be sent, their wishes would be followed. He generously gave them a period of slightly over 24 hours to collect the signatures.

The petition may be signed at the desk outside the cafeteria in Brennan Hall any time today.

"LAST DAY"

Surprised by what's h

You shouldn't be. Violence has always been part of the Canadian way of life.

The actions of the Canadian government in the last week have shown clearly that when necessary the state will not hesitate to drop its democratic mask and bring down the full weight of its violent authority upon the peoples it rules. The state, as Engels wrote, "is the admission that society has become entangled in an insoluble contradiction with itself, that it has split into irreconcilable antagonisms which it is powerless to dispel." Sometimes these "antagonisms" get out of hand. This article, written by University of Waterloo history professor Leo Johnson, points out that this has happened a number of times in Canadian history. It began to happen again this week.

WHEN CANADIAN HISTORIANS compare Canada to the United States, they unanimously agree that one fundamental difference between the two peoples is the non-violent nature of Canadians in contrast to the crime-ridden, six-gun-toting, Negro-lynching Americans.

Thus when a computer was smashed and a building damaged during anti-racism protests at Sir George Williams University, Canadian leaders, such as John Diefenbaker, reacted in shock and anger to this "unCanadian" resort to "mob rule."

"Because Canadians are a non-violent people," they concluded, "such violence must have been inspired and carried out by Communists, Marxists or other paid agitators."

Yet further investigation by police has demonstrated that no such "foreign" (except for the presence of a number of black, foreign-born students) inspiration was present.

Why then did the press and authorities claim that "Communists" and "foreigners" were responsible? A further examination of Canadian history is necessary before any answer can be given.

Is Canada a "non-violent" country? Every labour union member who has faced police protecting strikebreakers, every Canadian Indian who has to break through the barriers of legal discrimination, every French Canadian who has attempted to exercise his inherited language and cultural rights, knows that violence and repression exist in Canada.

BUT THE AUTHORITIES who claimed that the result of the protest at Sir George Williams was "un-Canadian" were right in one respect at least — Canadian workers and Canadian minorities (including students) have seldom protested against discrimination and oppression in a violent manner. It has been the "authorities" — government, business and civic leaders — who are most often responsible for violence when it occurs.

Moreover, when these authorities declare that extra-parliamentary protests (that is, demonstrations, marches and strikes) are unconstitutional or unCanadian their leaders cynically neglect to point out that the chief offender against the ideals of the British Constitution in Canada, has been the Government itself.

This is not to say that such authority-directed violence is necessarily illegal. If anything the opposite is true in Canada. As John Porter pointed out in his book, The Vertical Mosaic, a strong stable elite controls the Canadian government, civil service and judicial system.

The key to this control, of course, is money.

SINCE BOTH THE LIBERAL and Progressive Conservative parties are dependent on big business for funds to get into office and remain there, these parties must pass laws satisfactory to their financial backers or be removed from power.

This control, however, does not end with an ability to pour money into election campaigns. Since the elite owns the newspapers and controls the radio and television stations it can and does distort the news to serve its own selfish ends.

The importance of this control of the government and news media cannot be too strongly stressed. Since the news media shapes public opinion, and since our source of information is the media, by concentrated propaganda the public can be persuaded to demand laws which work against its best interest and destroy its rights and liberties.

Two such instances, the passing of Section 98 of the Criminal Code in 1919 and Quebec's Padlock Law, show how fragile our civil rights are, and how the facts are manipulated to allow their destruction.

IN 1919, CANADA WAS experiencing a severe postwar depression. Farm and labor unrest was widespread because of the profiteering and corruption which had occurred during World War I. When government and business leaders refused to recognize the desperate condition of the laborers, farmers and returning soldiers, they decided to force concessions by means of a general strike, which was touched off in Winnipeg on May 1, 1919, and quickly spread to other major cities.

In all some 54 unions including police, firemen, and civic employees voted to strike, although the police, firemen, waterworks employees and bread and milk deliverymen remained on the job with the approval of other strikers.

Although a Manitoba Royal Commission to investigate the strike later concluded that the causes of the strike were unemployment, low wages, bad working conditions and the rejection of basic union rights by employers, the Winnipeg newspapers mounted a vicious propaganda campaign declaring that the strike had been caused by Communist agents paid with "Moscow gold." After several weeks of this propaganda, the federal government responding to the demands of the manufacturers and the brain-washed public, passed the notorious section 98 of the Criminal Code.

Section 98, passed by these devious means, completely reversed the most ancient of British legal traditions — the right of an arrested person to be considered innocent until proven guilty. Thus, until 1937 when Section 98 was repealed, the accused person was considered guilty until he could prove himself innocent. This, of course, was not easy to do when you were locked in jail awaiting your trial.

IN ADDITION TO SECTION 98, the government amended the Immigration Act so that the Immigration Department could deport anyone, who belonged to a "subversive organization," without trial by jury. By these laws the government could accuse a striker of belonging to a "subversive organization" and if he failed to prove that he did not, then they would deport him.

Between 1919 and 1935, more than 10,000 men and women were deported under these immoral laws — laws which could only have been passed and maintained because of the Communist scare propaganda of 1919.

A similar use of newspaper propaganda was made by Maurice Duplessis in 1938. Duplessis wanted to destroy opposition to his corrupt control of the Quebec government, and to do this it was necessary to close the few small newspapers who dared to expose him.

His answer — like that of the government in 1919 — was to claim that the opposition was communistic.

After a lengthy campaign which repeated, over and over, that Communists killed nuns and priests, and that Quebec "Bolsheviks" were out to destroy the Catholic church, the state and public morality, Duplessis convinced the Quebec electorate that an anti-Communistic, "anti-subversive" law was needed.

The Padlock law gave the Quebec

What's happening in Quebec?

Brantford in 1952 and in Buffalo Narrows, Saskatchewan, today, the Indians' battle still goes on.

The 1952 Brantford Reserve "rising" illustrates the present-day use of the RCMP to crush resistance to the Indian Affairs Department's dictatorial rule.

The Iroquois Indians, having been England's allies in the American Revolutionary War, had been forced to come to Canada in 1784 when England lost the war. They came, however, not as a subject people, but as a free and independent nation which had been granted lands in exchange for those which had been lost in England's cause.

WITH THEM THEY BROUGHT their own religion and form of government, a hereditary council, which they maintained into this century. The hereditary council, however, resisted Canadian attempts to reduce their status from that of a free and independent people to that of mere dependencies — just another band of Indians to be bullied and dominated by the Indian Affairs Department.

In 1923 the Indian Affairs Department decided to break the ancient treaties and enforce their domination. To do so, the officials persuaded the Parliament to pass legislation which would allow Indian bands to substitute an elected council for their traditional councils, if they so desired. This act was passed, but the Brantford Six Nations people still decided to keep their old government and laws.

Not at all nonplussed by the fact that the new law allowed the Indians to decide if they wanted an elected council, the Indian Affairs Department now imposed a tame elected council on them. For almost 30 years the Six Nations people did their best to return to their own form of government but to no avail.

In 1952, with hope of justice gone, the Indians decided that a symbolic act was necessary. Late one night the hereditary chiefs and their supporters occupied the council house in hopes that the ensuing publicity would bring them public support. Unfortunately they underestimated both the willingness of the RCMP to use violence to dispossess them, and the honesty of the press.

The next day the RCMP moved in with riot guns and tear gas and made mass arrests. The press, in its usual fashion talked, not of the frustrating years seeking justice, but of the "irresponsible Indian lawbreakers." Today the Mohawk Workers, as the traditionalists call themselves, still are a majority on the reservation and still dream of a day when justice and freedom will return to them.

DESPITE THE POWER THAT control of the Parliament, the press and the police give the elite, still this is not enough. Their manipulations and control reach into even the so-called courts of justice. Trade unionists are very familiar with two situations in which the courts are abused: the political use of the conspiracy charge, and the ex parte injunction.

The charge of conspiracy is one which is seldom laid. First of all, it is difficult to prove. Secondly, it is more just to charge a criminal with his crime, than it is with his conspiracy to commit that offence. There is, however, one aspect of the conspiracy charge which lends itself to abuse. As strange as it may seem, the penalty for conspiracy is often more severe than that for the offence.

Since any planning which results in so minor an offence as spitting on the sidewalk can be called a conspiracy — punishable with heavy jail sentences — unionists manning picket lines can find themselves charged, not merely with obstruction (a handy catchall which generally results in a small fine), but with conspiracy to obstruct, and therefore, are liable to long years in jail. Since it is the Crown Attorney, a political appointee of the elite interests, who decides which charge to lay, it's not hard to understand why it is used politically against the elite's enemies.

AS STUDENTS HAVE RECENTLY discovered, the conspiracy charge can be levelled against them, as well.

The ex parte injunction is perhaps the best known of legal abuses in labor affairs. The essence of the ex parte injunction is that the judge is asked to make decisions and issue court orders after having heard only one side — invariably the owner's side — in labor disputes.

All the owner has to do is satisfy the judge that violence is likely to occur if strikers continue to picket his premises. The fact that the reason that violence occurs is that the owner is bringing in strikebreakers to take the workers' jobs, and that these scabs are assisted by the local police in breaking the picket line, has no bearing on the decision. The justice or injustice of such a decision is not the question that matters. Indeed, we do not have courts of justice, we have courts of law — law that is politically made and, too often, politically administered.

These few examples of the way violence and oppression operate in our society could be extended almost without end — from Alan McNab's rampage through Norfolk County in 1837 to the expulsion of the Japanese from British Columbia in World War II.

But why then, if violence has been so common in Canada's past, do its leaders continue to propagate the image of Canadians as a non-violent people? What would you do if you were in their position?

If Canadian press, radio and television told the truth, if Canadians realized how law is used to oppress them, and violence used to uphold those unjust laws, Canadians would rise up and demand an accounting.

But so long as Canadians can be fooled, and so long as the lying press can convince them that it is "un-Canadian" to throw off their yokes and demand such an accounting, Canadians — Canadian workers and Canadian students — will never be free.

was raised against these dictatorial methods, nor is "smashed" too strong a word. In Winnipeg on "Bloody Saturday" police attacked a peaceful demonstration and killed a man and a boy.

Over the years these episodes have been repeated again and again — in Stratford in 1933, in Oshawa in 1937, in Asbestos in 1949, and in Murdockville in 1957. In each case the tame press justified the use of the police or army to crush protest against exploitation by greedy owners by raising the Communist bogeyman.

Nor are the workers the only groups against whom violence is used.

Everyone knows that European settlers destroyed the Indian civilization, but few people know that this oppression continues today.

Not satisfied with having stolen a continent from the Indians, now the RCMP and government officials are attempting to steal the few remaining acres left to the Indians and to repudiate the rights they were promised in exchange for their freedoms. In government the right to close buildings, jail editors and confiscate the files of any organization which the Quebec attorney-general declared to be subversive or "communistic". No proof would be required other than his statement.

Not only did Duplessis silence his opposition with the Padlock law, he used it to harass such groups as labor unions, Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Liberal party.

THE SIMILARITIES BETWEEN the methods used to pass Section 98 and the Padlock Law, however are not the only common aspects of the behavior of the two governments. In both cases, having passed the laws to silence the opposition, the governments resorted to a program of calculated terrorism to subdue their critics. Businessmen and strikebreakers, who were sworn in as special constables, armed, and led by regular police, smashed any protest which Needed: Someone with a good knowledge of one or more of the native cultures of Africa and of that continent's literature in English, to write reviews for the Varsity. Phone Ted at 534-8908.

That paragraph is an indication of how I hope the book review section will be going this year. As editor, I resemble a midwife; I make sure the baby review gets out into print, cut the umbilical cord of useless words around its neck so it can gurgle or shriek. But I'm not responsible for its conception, gestation or reception. It stands on its own.

The style-content dragon breathes fire; although I value literary competence mightily for its own sake, I think someone with a first-hand knowledge of a subject, though he may have to fight battles of prejudice with himself as he writes (and if he doesn't, I'll fight them against him) likely would write a good review of a book on that subject.

Quixotic Canada has recognized China, and we shall be hearing about others who have tried to bring East and West together — Thomas Merton, Alan Watts perhaps, Aelred Graham, Joseph Needham, Gary Snyder, Kenneth Rexroth. There should be a piece on contemporary Catholic thinkers and doers: Dolci, the Berrigan brothers, Illich, de Camera. For Canada? what's to hand: novels, poems, essays, whilligogs (French and English). There'll be perhaps a piece on a Marxist literary critic too, and some words about education, and other jokes and surprises.

You can buy A Naturalist's Guide to Ontario (ed. William Judd and Murray Speirs, U of T Press for the Federation of Ontario Naturalists, 1970, $2.50) in the U of T bookroom. It has a general and non-technical introduction to the geology, flora and fauna (great on birds) of Ontario, 41 regional guides, diagrams, illustrations, maps, bibliographies and specialized indexes. The guides are written by various naturalists, clubs, and from what I've seen of the province, I'd say they are accurate. This book could be used with Euell Gibbons' foraging series, to tell you how to get where you want to go, and home again. At 6"x9", it's pretty bulky for carrying, unless you put it in a pack.

Frank Zappa and the Mothers will be seen in a long overdue concert at Massey Hall on the nineteenth of next month. Tickets go on sale Nov. 8.

MUSIC

On Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 28 at Massey Hall, the opening concert of Series B with the Toronto Symphony, Karel Ancerl and cellist Jaqueline du Pre featuring the Schumann Cello Concerto and works by Haydn and Brahms.

Thursday, Oct. 29 at 8 p.m. the second in a series of three lectures by Prof. Ezra Schabas on the Symphony Orchestra. Concert Hall, Edward Johnson Bldg. Also on Thursday at 1:30 p.m. at the Eaton Auditorium, the Toronto debut of pianist Augustin Anievas. Information at 225-0318.

Finally, a major event coming up in the near future, The Faculty of Music Opera Dept., the U of T Symphony, U of T Concert Choir and the Toronto Dance Theater are joining forces to present Glucks Iphigenie in Tauris. Performances on Nov. 4, 5, 7 and 11, and tickets may be reserved for Nov. 4 and 11 at the box office, 928-3477. —T. J.

ROCK

On Oct. 25, CBC will televise a rock music extravaganza entitled "ROCK 2" whose featured performers are Delaney and Bonnie and Friends.

On Sunday, Nov. 1, UC will present one of the better music deals available in the city as they present Lenny Breau, Simon Caine, and Murray McLaughlin in concert all for a mere $1.50 (or $2.00 at the door). Tickets may be purchased at the SAC office or in the college council office at UC.

A unique staging of Alice in Wonderland will be presented Nov. 6-8 and 13-15 at Ryerson Theatre. The show will be an integrated rock, dance, and drama presentation. Student tickets are $1.

In continuing my personal crusade against concert promoters and other hassle type persons I feel compelled to comment on a couple of items which have recently come to my attention.

The first deals with the cancellation of Van Morrison's concert which resulted from a sickness which he developed when FORCED to perform a show which he was too sick to do in the first place.

The other is the case of UC president Marty Goldberg who tried to arrange a Bruce Cockburn concert for the campus but was forced to abandon his worthy venture when price hassles and attempted throat-slitting became the ploys of Bernie Finkelstein, Cockburn's manager.

FILM

On Monday, Oct. 26, the U of T (Innis) Film Society is showing the second in its "Triple Ford" programme, Long Grey Line, at 8 p.m. in UC104.

I stand corrected. Series tickets to U.C.'s Comparative Literature on Film are indeed sold out, as reported last week. But it is still possible to pay at the door. That means anyone can catch Henry V on Tuesday, Oct. 27, at 7 and 9 p.m. with a discussion featuring P. Marinelli.

"Pandora's Movie Box," 11 Trinity Square, will be showing A (by Jay Lenica, 1964) on Wednesday, Oct. 28, at 7 and 9:15 p.m.

A special Halloween programme has been arranged by the Innis Film Society for Friday, Oct. 30. I Confess, The Wrong Man, and Fearless Vampire Killers will be screened at 7:30 in the auditorium of the College of Education.

You can look forward to a varied and interesting diet of films at Cinema Lumiere next week: Oct. 26-27, Hard Contract and Death Rides a Horse; Oct. 28-Nov. 1, King of Hearts; Oct. 28-29, Privilege; Oct. 30-31, Point Blank; Nov. 1, A Woman is a Woman. Call 920-9817 for exact times.

The best one-week series of films you'll see in a long time takes place every day next week. Hart House is sponsoring a film festival teach-in called "And the Second Horseman Was War" in the OISE Auditorium with all programmes starting at 7:30.

Here's the rundown on the war films: Monday, Neighbours and How I Won the War; Tuesday, The Magician and Thou Shalt Not Kill; Wednesday, Toys and Ballad of a Soldier; Thursday, 23 Skidoo and Fail-Safe; Friday, The War Game and A Plague Upon Your Children — H.M.

THEATRE

There's quite a bit happening in Toronto right now. The season at the O'Keefe has started and the one at the St Lawrence is about to start. The Yard in the Sun by Christopher Fry is the St. Lawrence's first offering. Fry has written very little in the last decade, so this should be of some interest to theatre fanatics.

The Crest Theatre, home of so much Toronto theatre, which finally became yet another flick house, is returning to theatre again with The Me Nobody Knows. It's about ghetto life in New York. The music is great. Should be quite interesting. Like Hair, the cast is taken from Toronto area.

On campus, Trinity College Drama Society is showing two one-act plays Foothall by Jon Swan and Imagination Dead

Imagine by Samuel Beckett. They are being shown Oct. 23, 29 and 30, free, at Cartwright Hall, Devonshire Place.

ART

At Isaac's Les Levine opened this week under the title Les Levine Copies. Everyone which isn't the whole story but it seems a fair enough description.

Until Nov. 2 at Moos and after Oct. 22 at the recently re-opened Penell Gallery (13 Hazelton) International Graphics are shown. Picasso, Braque, Magritte, Soutine are among the representatives at Moos.

One of the more interesting events to come up will be the Henri Saxe exhibition at Carmen Lamasna Gallery, after Oct. 31. Among Saxe's new work is a metal "Snow grid" that extends his interests with the floor into less hermetic conditions. After the Saxe will be a Guido Molinari exhibition.

At the International Student Centre an exhibit of Chinese Painting opens after Oct. 26. The work is Madam Cho Keun-Keun and Madam Liang Shou Yung.

At the Glendon Campus of York U. some recent work of Stephen Cruise opens tonight. There is a lot of Pop-Morris type work going on in Cruise as yet but beneath the surface is one of the most sensitive talents seen in some time.

Rezoning plan ignores residents

By ERIC MILLS
If the recommendations of the City Planning Staff are accepted by the Planning Board, the area bounded by College and Queen Streets, University Avenue and McCaul St., will become part of the downtown core.
This action, which will increase permissible residential densities (Windlass Holdings has applied for re-zoning), will have been taken with only "comment" from the Special Committee on the Chinese Community.
No other local representation will have been heard, nor will the rest of the city, for whom the spreading of the downtown core has important implications, have a chance to participate in the decision.

On October 13, the Planning Board voted 6 to 5 to accept the recommendations, but since seven votes of the 13 man board are required, another vote will be taken on October 27.

To accept the recommendations would be to ignore the Planning Act (sec. 10) which states that public meetings shall be held to involve the inhabitants of the planning area in its development.

Act imposed to squash Socialists: QUAC

By ELLEN O'DONNELL

About 200 people met at Convocation Hall Wednesday afternoon to discuss the crisis in Quebec. Phyllis Clarke, a U of T graduate student, spoke for the Quebec Action Committee:

"We are a group that has come together over our concern about the implementation of the War Measures Act. We feel that it is a threat to the democratic rights of all Canadians and to the democratic social aspirations of the Quebecois.

"We believe that the government action was not a question of over-reacting, but it was designed to behead the movements of the people of Quebec for social democratic change by putting their leaders in jail."

The Quebec Action Committee also urged that anyone arrested under the War Measures Act be released and that the troops now occupying the province of Quebec be removed.

Clarke concluded by urging that the maximum amount of debate and discussion be continued at U of T, and that it should be directed towards positive action for the democratic aspirations of the Quebecois.

A motion of the Graduate Students' Union General Council condemning the War Measures Act and calling for its revocation was read.

Phil Resnick, a U of T graduate student, outlined the discussion and the resolutions passed at Tuesday's Political Economy Course Union teach-in.

Peter Hall defended the position of the plenary session of the teach in, affirming that the resolutions represented only the opinions of the participants in that sessions. He said the participants were called on all students in the university to take a stand and to speak out as they had.

A spokesman for the Young Socialists proposed that a demonstration be held today to demand that the administration take a stance against the War Measures Act. He declared that the source of the violence was more with the government than the FLQ, and that the Young Socialists were in solidarity with the nationalist movement in Quebec.

Bill Dyer, speaking for the Law Union, said that the implementation of the War Measures Act was a profound threat to all civil liberties, and that it was imposed in order to smash the rights of the members of the left in Canada.

He said the act must be fought, that the Law Union will organize and support future demonstrations, and that a petition condemning the act had been drawn up.

At one point during the discussion a student from the audience demanded that a photographer by the door identify himself. The student said that there were police in the audience and that they were looking for people opposed to the government action.

The photographer announced that he was from the Toronto Daily Star, but would not give his name.

According to a Gallup Poll published in Tuesday's Star and taken before the death of Quebec Labor Minister Pierre Laporte, 54 per cent of Canadians supported the government action, 32 per cent thought the government hadn't gone far enough and 41 per cent were opposed.

After the meeting about 25 people met with the Quebec Action Committee to discuss further action and a possible demonstration.

No action has been decided upon by the group.

Educational campaign is to be discussed at student aid meet

All student council presidents, SAC Reps, and interested students, are reminded of the meeting of the Student Aid Working Group on Monday, Oct. 26 at 7 p.m. in the South Sitting Room of Hart House.

All colleges and faculties must be represented so that the administration of the student aid survey can be organized.

An educational campaign for the University of Toronto campus on the proposed Educational Opportunity Bank scheme will be discussed.

For more information, or if no one from your student council can be present, please call the SAC office at 923-2626.

Students get committee seats

By BRIAN MORGAN
Monday was a day mixed with success and frustration for the students sitting on the Faculty Council of Arts and Science. In a surprising show of confidence in students' ability to take part in all aspects of the work of this body, the Council passed a motion giving the students two seats on the committees on petitions and on standing. Students had previously been excluded from both of these strategic bodies. However, the main issue of the day, the formation of a staff-student committee to devise a plan for the permanent structure of the Council, was for the second time untouched as the meeting adjourned without discussing it. The most heated debate of the afternoon concerned the issue of whether students should be allowed to judge their fellow students in "the very private matters" of standing and petitions. Father Kelly, President of St. Michaels College, said that "grading has to be controlled by professors. It is not proper that a student have a voice in the academic merit of his peers." Other faculty felt that it would be "an invasion of privacy" to have students see the petitions of other students. Crawford Brough Macpherson, however, said that from his many years of experience with these committees, he could see no reason for it being either embarrassing or invidious to have student representatives there. Dean A. D. Allan reminded the meeting that the committee on standing merely made recommendations back to examining faculty, and that members of both committees were bound by an ethic of discretion to keep secret the matters they dealt with. J. Hall, the chairman of the computer science department, said that the Council should "welcome student representatives and the valuable contribution they could make to the work of both of these groups." Following his speech, the motion passed 68 to 48. Due to the length of the discussion, however, six o'clock arrived before the matter of the restructuring committee could be brought up. It had been placed last on the agenda. With many staff scuttling home for supper, and others complaining that they did not feel "psychologically alert enough to discuss this important issue," the meeting voted by a small majority to adjourn.

They all got up and left

"We are scapegoating youth to avoid facing up to the fact
"We are scapegoating youth to avoid facing up to the fact that non-medical drug use permeates our entire culture," railed panelist Dr. John Unwin at Wednesday's session of the Vertigo encounter on drugs program.

regard as socially acceptable the indiscriminate use of tranquilizers, sleeping pills, caffeine and alcohol." "Excuse me," interrupted a man from the audience. "A lot of us are getting restless. Let's split into small groups and discuss what's on our minds. Those who want to should feel free to leave." Whereupon 80 per cent of the audience of 400 got up and left.

Rugger Blues down Guelph 6-0

By UNCLE HARLS

Wednesday night in Guelph, the Rugby Blues put a halt to their losing slide by defeating the Guelph Rugger Gryphons 6-0.

In the rain-drenched encounter, Blues showed superior handling and ball control.

The forwards completely manhandled their opposition with veterans Paulie Hanry and Bill "Don Juan" Anderson leading their outstanding play.

Ian Owens' kicking was magnificent as he picked his way up the touchline at will.

Midway through the first half, Blues scored a heads-up try when Owens dropped the ball over the Guelph backs and into the end zone where Syd "Flash" Segdsworth pounced on it for a try. Syd's female companion was eager to get into the game but was wiped out by a beautiful rolling block.

Later in the first half, Blues went over for their second try after Griffiths (from the Royal House of Wales) deked two Gryphon backs out of position and then fed the ball to Chris Maher who in turn sent Dave Camp over for a classic try.

This was Camp's debut in a Blues' uniform and he complemented the team excellently.

Blues kept the play in the Guelph half for the remainder of the game and gained the well-earned victory.

On Saturday, for all you Home-comers, the Blues take on the division-leading Western Mustangs at noon on the back campus. Come out and give us your support.

Blues, Stangs meet at Homecoming

By LYNDON LITTLE

Frank Cosentino brings his surprising Mustangs into Varsity Stadium tomorrow for a Homecoming clash with Blues in what Toronto fans hope will be the end of Mustangs championship pretensions and the renewal of our own.

Western, who have won three and lost only one, are currently tied for top spot in the SIFL with Queen's — but the toughest part of their schedule is just beginning.

Two of their three victories have come at the expense of the weak McMaster Marauders while the other was over Waterloo. Their only loss was an opening game 18-4 decision to the Gaels in Kingston.

It may sound a little odd, but while the Western-Varsity clash is in progress tomorrow, the thoughts and prayers of Blues fans will be with Tom Mooney and his McGill Redmen when they battle Queen's at Molson Stadium.

As a result of their 29-15 loss to the Gaels last weekend, Blues must hope for an upset of Queen's by either the Redmen, Waterloo or McMaster in the last three weekends of league action if they are to retain a chance of finishing on top.

Because of the athletic cutback situation at McGill, this game at Montreal — the Redmen's last home encounter — is being billed as the final game at Molson Stadium for an indefinite period. Whether this helps to get Mooney's team up psychologically remains to be seen.

But of course, all these calculations are meaningless if Blues fail to win all their remaining games.

If Blues somehow manage to pull off a Yates Cut this year, head coach Ron Murphy should get credit for the greatest patch-up job this country has been since Prime Minister John Diefenbaker reshuffled his Cabinet in 1962.

With all the injuries that have rocked the Varsity squad this season, Blues post-game inventories are beginning to look more and more like the operating room scenes from MASH.

The list of Blues gridders definitely out of tomorrow's match are quarterback Vic Alboini (shoulder), guard Gord Whitaker (knee), center Rich Agro (knee), middle linebacker Bill Bennett (knee) and halfback Cor Doret (knee).

In the doubtful category are defensive end Alex Squires and rookie center Tom Robertson.

The possible return of halfback Walt Sehr is one positive factor.

Western also has a couple of hurts. Offensive guard Boris Polshuk injured his shoulder and backfielder Bruce Hough bruised his kidney in last Saturday's game with Mac and will join Bruce MacRae and Al Lockhart who are already on the sidelines.

The Western defense, which has greatly matured since Blues manhandled it in the exhibition game, will give second-year QB Wayne Dunkley a stiff test.

The only change from the Queen's game in Blues' offensive backfield will see Bob Morrow take over Doret's running back spot.

Cosentino has done a remarkable job in his first year as Western head man.

Among the most impressive newcomers is Davie Kerr a shifty running back from Sarnia who is currently the league's top kick-off return artist with an "average" of 41.7 yards.

Bob Wilson, a big, bruising runner is fourth in the rushing derby while flashy wide receiver Mike Tucker is second in pass receiving.

Oh yes, one other thing! Western has not won a league fixture at Varsity Stadium since 1961.

PhysEd wins 3-0 in mud bowl

By STAN KOROLNEK

In a game played in deep mud, PhysEd slipped by Engineering 3-0 yesterday.

Engineering, coached by PhysEder Paul Rocks, almost held the supposedly stronger PhysEd squad to a scoreless tie until Gene Vincze kicked a fourteen yard field goal to win the game for the jocks, half way through the third quarter. Neither team could muster much offence in the mud although PhysEd tried two field goal attempts and almost had one single on a punt.

With the victory, PhysEd remains one full game behind powerful Victory College in the race for first place.

Earlier this week Vic destroyed St. Mikes 22-0. In another game played yesterday, Forestry blasted New 20-14, mainly on the passing arm of Ray Giza.

His uniform coated with mud, an unidentified PhysEd runner breaks through Engineering line.

'Drop in the Bucket'

$50,000 is sought in cross-Canada plan to aid education in Third World countries

By RAY CONLOGUE

Did you know that it will cost only 25 cents to solve the problems of the Third World?

The Third World, to be specific, comprises Africa, Asia, and South America, but any region that supplies the raw materials for Western industry can qualify.

WHEN THE STATISTICIANS say that the U.S. has 6 per cent of the world's population but uses 60 per cent of its resources, those are Third World resources they're talking about.

Now, if you're one of the more sensitive U of T students in danger of seeing the connection between your fourth pinstripe suit and the fact that 12 people live in a tar-paper shack somewhere, help is on the way.

And if gassing up your car brings on fleeting visions of oil derricks in Biafra or rubber plantations in South East Asia, don't despair.

JUST PUT YOUR 'Drop in the Bucket'.

That's the name of a cross-Canada program to raise $50,000 for education in underdeveloped countries. According to the founder, John Gorman of Western University, it's an opportunity for every post-secondary student in Canada to get involved with his fellow man.

"Students are demanding social change," says Gorman, "and this is one way for them to do something about it."

DON'T SHRINK at the task. "If every student could give 25 cents — which to our standard of living is just a drop in the bucket — it would go a long way."

No doubt this challenge will bring out every Christian in the country. But in case they're both lonely, here's something to get the crowd going too. Twenty five cent dances.

KISSING BOOTHS. Slave-for-a-day, auctions. At Western, four students are going to camp out and live at subsistence levels. If their plight touches your heart, but you're too busy to join them, you can just buy a cup of coffee for a quarter.

The U of T has signed up for this program, and a press conference in Hart House on Thursday gave some idea of the spirit behind the movement. Upon entering, one is greeted by a group of students in the ubiquitous pinstripe suits, with fashionably long hair (the 'layered look' is in for guys this year).

The young ladies have no-run pantyhose, dresses defiantly mini or innovatively maxi, and a sincerity that, unfortunately, is no doubt sincere.

YOU WILL BE OFFERED a drink from an assortment of scotches. "Oh, we didn't pay for any of it," says an organizer, with a look of momentary martyrdom skating across a thin veneer of aftershave. "Schenley's donated it to us."

Schenley's? Well, yes, and not only that but Spitzer Mills and Bates have designed them a glossy poster, and RCA Victor is pressing a special batch of records of their theme song.

THEME SONG? Well of course, what social protest movement is without one? And then there's the bucket-push (two eight-foot buckets are being transported from Halifax and Vancouver to the various campuses involved. They meet at Toronto on Nov. 21 for the College Bowl.)

Those buckets'll create a real hit, and the air fare is cheap. It didn't cost Chrysler a whole lot, either, to paint up a fleet of trucks with the group's colors to chauffeur the buckets around in each city.

And, what's more, Imperial Tobacco has paid $6,000 for 10,000 plastic barrels to collect the money in.

NOW, THIS MIGHT seem like a lot of money to sink into something that's only supposed to raise $50,000. But it's one way for Canadian business to show their moral tenor.

And when they spend that amount of money, how can you help but notice?

However, says Gorman, "it's totally student organized."
THE PROCEEDS GO to the Canadian Save the Children Fund.

IF YOU HAVE any doubts that the money will be well spent, listen to Morgan's conception of "self help" in the Third World.

"What we do is build a $100,000 model school in Kingston, Jamaica. Then we can bring people in from all over the country to show them how it was designed and built."

Then the natives go out and build copies of Queen St. public school all over the country. Native culture and values cannot help but thrive.

City bids to restrict communes

Proposal would ban co-operative houses outside city centre

By BRIAN JOHNSON

A city planning staff proposal to ban co-operative houses and communes from residential areas outside the city centre will be discussed tonight by a public meeting of the city buildings and development committee at 8 p.m. at City Hall.

The committee planned the public hearing a month ago when about 50 angry opponents to the proposal packed a small room where the committee was meeting.

The planning staff recommendation, which was rejected by the planning board, would prohibit more than two unrelated persons from living in single family housing outside the area bounded by Keele St., Parkside Dr., Coxwell Ave., and St. Clair Ave.

The legislation was prompted by pleas from the North Toronto Amalgamated Ratepayers Association and the South Eglinton Ratepayers Association.

Their complaints originated in April, 1969, when a letter by Craighurst Ave. resident, V.J. Simone, complained that a group of five unrelated students renting a house next to him was running down the neighbourhood.

He said the students didn't cut the lawn or keep up the house and that they held frequent wild and noisy parties.

"They disturb the whole community," he said. "These young people want to come into a residential area and impose their standards on my community. You wouldn't believe what they do."

Simone compared the "young people" to his son, who "thinks there's nothing wrong with having a bash every Saturday night."

"It's not fair to some person like myself who has spent a lifetime acquiring a home should have its value decreased by someone like those people next door," Simone added. "You should see the place. It's like a pig-sty."

"They need housing somewhere. But there's plenty of landlords elsewhere who would delight in renting to those people."

But many students and unemployed youth renting houses in the inner city face exorbitant rents from slum landlords, argue opponents of the bylaw change. The landlords are often acting as middlemen for large corporations such as Meridian Development who hold the houses until they can be demolished for high-rise development.

"The by-law change would reinforce the creation of a ghetto inside the city," said Mike Constable of Guerrilla, a Toronto underground newspaper. "It's a discriminatory law to be used against hippies."

The Metro Tenants Association and the city's Social Planning Council will both oppose the proposal at tonight's meeting.

But some influential city politicians such as David Rotenberg, the mayor's right-hand man, are already in favour of banning co-ops and communes from outside the inner city.

Rotenberg admitted the proposal.

Claude Bissell waffles on War Measures Act

U of T president Claude Bissell refuses to be forced into a "black and white position" on Ottawa's declaration of the War Measures Act.

"I'm not going to give any ringing declarations on the subject," Bissell told assembled Varsity staffers in an exclusive interview Thursday. "I'm here as the president of the University of Toronto, not as a member of any political organization."

The president was asked what measures U of T's administration would take towards an on-campus demonstration opposing the act or supporting the FLQ.

"Well that's not a matter for my attention" he replied. "The university is not a preserve; it is subject to the laws of the land. To support the FLQ is illegal — no thing can be done about that."

To the president, the validity of the War Measures Act rests on "factual information — the extent to which there was a real apprehended revolutionary threat."

He was asked what further facts he required from Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau to justify the government's suspension of civil liberties.

"Well I won't require from the Prime Minister anything. I hope there will be more proof — we haven't enough evidence yet I think. I'm not a Marxist, so you can't ask questions and get a Marxist reply."

Bissell's interview is printed in full on pages eight and nine.

'Drop in the Bucket'

CANSAVE, and the students behind 'drop in the Bucket', do not seem to be aware of the fact that some foreign aid programs are in a state of spiritual crisis. CUSO, for example, is wracked with an internal split. A new faction is claiming that importing Western culture wholesale into the Third World is doing as much to destroy native initiative as the previous centuries of economic rape did to destroy their resources.

But Cansave hasn't heard about that, nor has John Gorman. And what is tragic is that John Gorman and Terry Morgan, behind their pin-stripe suits, are quite honest and quite concerned. Their consciences, like those of the majority of us, are in turmoil.

But as the subconscious is to conscience, so is the pocketbook to charity. And the subconscious is warning that an honest Western withdrawal from the "less fortunate" countries might fray the pin-stripe — and make it hard to find oil for the Chevy.

FROM THIS COMES the very human rationalization that what's good for us is excellent for them. Now, since 'Drop' speaks so feelingly of education in this regard, why not look briefly at what 'education' really means in their terms.

In 'Black Skin, White Masks' Frantz Fanon describes what happened when the French bequeathed their schools and teachers on Morocco... and created the endless broken drama of black mothers beating their children for speaking Creole:

Speak only French, only French French like the Frenchman French like in France French! French!

Does Fanon seem out of context in this article? Small wonder, when you mix charity, social change and kissing booths in your concept of 'education'.

AND IF FANON is out of context, how much more so is the larger question of whether we have anything to contribute to the Third World.

We give them the education that has deadened the minds of our own children.

From the education grows the industry and the society that's poisoning our own continent. The Western economy bears some comparison to the lung cancer patient who keeps a pack of cigarettes by his hospital bed to offer to visitors...

FAR FROM BEING DISCONNECTED, these matters are intimately interrelated. The occasional scientific voice is raising the possibility that the spreading of Western industry throughout the Third World would help destroy the already-precious oxygen balance of the atmosphere.

But if we only collect enough quarters, perhaps some galactic businessman will appear to peddle breath to us...

Inchoate, say the drop-in-the-bucketers. To them pollution, culture disruption, the end of communities — all are dreadfully unconnected. Fragmentary. Irrelevant.

THEY ARE the savants who go forward with a bucket of quarters to educate the — ignorant. World without end?

Deny support for PM

Enough signatures have been raised in St. Michael's College to prevent a letter of support being sent to Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau for his handling of the present nastiness in the country.

SMC student councillor Greg Duffy has threatened to send the letter in the name of the 2,300 man St. Mike's student body unless ten per cent of the students dissented.

A petition opposing Duffy's move because "one person does not have the right to speak for the student body on such an issue," picked up 260 signatures in St. Mike's on Friday and Saturday.

Duffy plans to "bring up the matter" at a meeting of the Senate (student council) next week.

Repression

Quebec weekly fights 'law 'n order'

MONTREAL (CUP) — Quebec-Press Sunday devoted much of its issue to analysis of repression and the effects of "law and order" in Quebec.

The left-wing weekly, financed partially by Quebec trade unions, was under police surveillance last week after publishing an editorial denouncing "political repression" and urging Quebecois to use non-violent means to resist the imposition of military rule by the Canadian government.

Jacques Keable, a member of the paper's editorial board, wrote an article this week entitled: James Richard Cross — A Life To Save At All Costs.

The article said: "The Morale of those being detained is not at all good. In certain cases, if incarceration continues much longer, nerves will crack."

Keable said the climate is ripe for people to phone the police on each other.

"It is currently enough for a citizen to phone the police and tell them something is fishy next door for the police to search your neighbour at any hour of the day or night, without a court order."

AMONG THOSE ARRESTED this week, was a 14-year-old whose principal phoned the police because the student posted the FLQ Manifesto on to a bulletin board. He was held for half a day.

In another case, a school teacher was arrested (and there has still been no news of or from him — remember that prisoners are held without bail and with legal counsel and can write or phone no one (because his principal while eavesdropping on the school intercom, caught part of the answer he was giving a student concerning recent events).

Into this already charged climate, several people have introduced elements which have only heightened the tension, the story said.

"JEAN MARCHAND, Wednesday night, shot a cannon ball into the back of a democratic political party, FRAP, the only serious opposition to Drapeau's non-existent Civic Party." (The Civic Party is tightly controlled by Drapeau.)

Marchand's Coup, like the Brinks Coup (the day before the April 29th provincial election, amid much publicity in the English press, the usually discreet Brink's Security Co. hustled a convoy of trucks filled with securities and bonds out of Quebec) is an exceptional example of violence and irresponsibility: a federal minister, worried about electoral democracy, denounces a party dedicated to the electoral game, and he does it on the eve of the election, the article said.

(Although he later claimed it came out wrong because he didn't speak English well, Marchand accused FRAP of being an FLQ front.)

"THE WAY Jean Drapeau, the following day, preferred Marchand's accusations by accusing many of these people of being terrorists and assassins, constitutes an indescribable violence, irresponsibility, and vulgarity."

"As for Real Caouette, his reaction amounts to a cry for revenge murder: 10 heads will roll for every hostage. If this man wasn't tied in with the powers that be, he would be in jail for years. Nevertheless, he is at large, and guarded by soldiers."

Keable's article was the introduction to a special section of the weekly entitled: "to establish real justice." It contained articles from "several well-respected citizens from a variety of sectors."

MOST WRITERS AGREED the government had to act, but felt it had been excessive.

Even Pierre De Bane, Federal MP for Matane said: "I am obliged to support the government because we must not give into blackmail . . . But I am against any excesses in the application of the law . . . Each arrest made must be carefully justified."

But while Federal Liberals are backing the government, members of the Quebec Liberal Caucus are demanding explanations from Bourassa, according to an exclusive article in Quebec-Press.

The weekly reports that to avoid a caucus crisis, "Bourassa will have to, in black and white, prove to the deputies that the measures taken, measures that led to the death of Pierre Laporte, were absolutely inevitable to avoid an insurrection in Quebec. If the famous 'plot' is bunk, there will be a crisis. The anguished Liberal MNA's are afraid of exactly that."

SEVERAL MEMBERS have already threatened to quit if the proof is not forthcoming.

In addition, three MNA's have told Quebec-Press they intend to resign unless the government changes its current super hard line: a policy these Deputies feel is being pursued without justification.

"Until now, there have been no resignations . . . But once the military crisis is over, certain MNA's and Ministers are going to be asking questions . . . What was 'the plot'? Why is Pierre Laporte dead? . . . Bourassa will have to justify the death of one of the most popular Deputies . . . Remember that at the leadership convention, Laporte received more support from caucus members than any other candidate."

Repression, etc

With the imposition of the War Measures Act, a number of the pillars of our particular Canadian brand of liberalism have been thrown into question.

To the suspension of ordinary civil rights, people have reacted by placing all trust and confidence in the government of Canada.

Trudeau and his colleagues have posed the issue in terms of whether one trusts or does not trust the government. By creating a monopoly of information — or the illusion of one — they have intimidated many Canadians into believing that their decisions should go unquestioned and unchallenged.

This is in spite of the evidence we and other Canadians can perceive, even through the self-censored spectacles of the daily press.

This reached an almost farcical extreme this weekend with the arrest of the two teenage children of Pauline Julien, the Quebecoise chanteuse who was picked up in the first round of arrests. To continue to believe that only FLQ members and supporters are being detained is impossible.

Secondly, calls for cancellation of yesterday's municipal elections in Montreal were ignored by the same government authorities who have suspended the normal bulwarks of democracy. Both federal ministers and Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau publicly libelled the opposition in the election, the Front d'Action Politique, as a terrorist front organization, as well as arresting several of its organizers and candidates.

Not surprisingly, Drapeau has been swept back into office on a wave of law and order sentiment.

If these two examples do not illustrate clearly the direction in which the hysteria of Trudeau and his government are pushing the country, perhaps another example or two, closer to home, can help.

In Toronto, last week, Mayor William Dennison, in a manner worthy of Drapeau, issued a blanket condemnation of the Rivendale Community Organization calling the group "Maoist" and comparing it to China's Red Guard. From what is known, however, the group is simply trying to put some of the rhetoric of participatory democracy into reality.

In Toronto, today, city authorities are going ahead with a plan which would preserve and protect the pattern of single-family housing in this city outside of the core area.

In effect, this labels the core as a ghetto, where such undesirables as rooming house tenants, people who rent flats, students, and working people who can't afford to purchase homes, will be forced to live.

It places a difficult obstacle in the way of young people who are discovering that the family, as a major bulwark of the capitalist social system, can and must be challenged and changed by individuals working to find collective ways of living and making decisions about their lives.

The equanimity with which many Canadians accept such arbitrary decisions about the nature of our society, has been thrown into stark relief by the success the government has met in carrying through its crackdown on groups in Quebec working for fundamental social change.

"In a democracy it is all too easy for the majority to forget the minority, and for a remote and powerful government to ignore its protests.

"It is all too easy, should disturbances erupt to crush them in the name of law and order. We must never forget that, in the long run a democracy is judged by the way the majority treats the minority, Louis Riel's battle is not yet won."

—Pierre Elliott Trudeau, at the unveiling of a monument to Louis Riel, Oct. 2, 1968

... Et Kurick ! c'est un moyen radical en effet. Reste à savoir si ça va régler le problème. ... Ca me rappelle en effet les purges organisées par Hitler après l'attentat monté contre lui ...

JE ME LA FERME, ET JE LASSE PARLER MES DESSINS.

Je me rappelle que la violence apparaît en substance et qu'il existe aussi des non-violence.

prenez par exemple le cas coquette...

J'AI HONTE D'ÊTRE CANADIEN FRANÇAIS

et puis il y a le 8 août 1968 Trudeau...

ça me fait penser que son gouvernement a fait passer une loi de pendant la dernière semaine et se propose d'appliquer contre les groupes armés...
... Et puis il y a eu le don de Trudeau.

FRAP: Marchand voulait dire "caution" non pas "couverture"

Quoi ! C'EST PAS MA FAUTE SI JE NE CONNAIS PAS L'ANGLAIS

Ca c'est la meilleure qu'on m'a pas entendu depuis longtemps! imaginez! un ministre d'Ottawa que ne comprend pas l'anglais! Et le bilinguisme? Et son futur que Trudeau veut? ... Et puis Marchand serait-il incompetent?

CROYEZ-LE OURNAN, JE N'AI PAS L'INTENTION DE ME FILER DES BICHES MUNICIPALES

VOULEZ-VOUS LA PREUVE? DEMANDEZ LE FRAP ET LE FLQ C'EST LA MÊME CHOSE!

TOUT LE MONDE SAIT QUE LE FLQ EST OPPOSÉ À L'AUTORITÉ...

OR L'AUTORITÉ C'EST MOI

ET COMME LE FRAP EST AUSSI OPPOSÉ À L'AUTORITÉ, C'EST-À-DIRE À MOI, LE FRAP ET LE FLQ C'EST LA MÊME CHOSE. VOILÀ, ASSEZ FORT CA!

DEPUIS LE TEMPS QUE JE VOULAIS QUE MONTREAL SOIT PLUS BELLE QUE VENISE!

Voilà, c'est ce que on appelle une déclaration d'intention. Quoi que dans le cas de Drapeau, la chose est...

DIRE QUE SI JE GAGNE HAUT LA MAIN, CE SERA UN PRÉJUGE AU FLQ!

HEÏ!

J'AI AVILÉ MA PIPE!

C'est très simple: si vous voyez qui se cache derrière la figure d'homme de nuire.

vous prenez Drapeau...

vous lui ajoutez ses choses et vous avez un homme qui dit que Jean Cournoyer est le problème principal. C'est le même nationalisme antidémocratique.

avant de terminer un dernier conseil à Marchand: Quand on ne connaît pas une langue on se forme la queue, on se rebrousse et il s'écoule... à Saint-Comard, par exemple.

Revolutionary Fantasies

If the Canadian army hadn't intervened in Quebec and if the War Measures Act had not been invoked, the government of Bourassa would have been forced to quit power. The government would have been replaced by a "provisional government" composed of, among others; the Parti Quebecois, the major union federations, and Claude Ryan, editor of Le Devoir. Sound like incredible fantasies? It comes from a perfectly reliable source, Jean Drapeau, the Mayor of Montreal. Drapeau peau outlined this course of events Friday evening to a group of reporters at a Montreal radio station.

Kindness

The Globe and Mail is kind to students. Today's paper devotes most of the first page of the second section to pictures of U of T students engaging in college hi-jinks at this weekend's homecoming parade. Funny thing is they missed one picture — the one we carry on the front page today. This was the one attempt students made to comment on the fact that we now live in a police state and that business just simply isn't as usual. Could it be that the Globe and Mail has some interest in preserving an image of college students as happy go lucky pranksters interested only in dances, foot ball and parades?

Quebec Presse — Montreal

A short factual lesson in Canadian history

The tragic events in Quebec in the last three weeks must bring home to all Canadians a bitter fact — Canada is a dream that is founded on a lie. The lie is that this country is for all people in it.

But Canada is not, and never has been a country for all the people. It was founded by war and bloodshed in the conquest of Indians and French, and it has been maintained by force of arms ever since. This country belongs to those who conquered it, the middle and upper class English-speaking Canadians, who play upon the needs and fears of the English-speaking working people in order to justify their continued ownership.

Twice in the past, in 1870 and 1885, the Indians and half-breed people led by Louis Riel have risen to demand that their just claims be recognized, and twice by armed might they were defeated.

Now the Indian has risen again under their young leader, Harold Cardinal, to demand their rights. But still they are ignored. Anger and frustration are the result, and more and more out of that anger, violence grows. But when an act of violence finally draws the attention of Canadians to their living conditions, their poverty and their exploited state, the only answer given is, "I agree with your ends but not your means. We will not negotiate with a gun to our heads."

Similarly with labour and the poor, the courts and laws are piled on each other to prevent the workers from getting a fair share of their labour, or a decent living. Elections are won with promises, but the laws are filled with oppression. Eventually the worker is forced to resort to his only weapon, the strike. Then when faced with a police force ordered to aid strike-breaking scabs, violence results, and labor is condemned from every paper and pulpit. Nowhere is it recognized that violence is not the opposite of peace and law, but is the result of the failure of the elite-dominated institutions to deal fairly with the workers, the minorities and the poor who are controlled by them.

So it has been with Quebec. Two hundred and ten years ago the French were conquered by the English. Surrounded by alien customs and law and exploited by British entrepreneurs, the French fought back to gain a measure of freedom. Three times, 1810, 1837 and 1917, when exploitation became unbearable, and every peaceful means had been exhausted, the French have forcefully resisted exploitation only to be crushed by armed might, and had their constitutional rights suspended.

Each time the authorities have filled the minds of English workers with racist propaganda intended to rally English workers to aid in the oppression of the French. Each time, by waving the flag and playing upon the workers' patriotism they have succeeded. Smart rulers seldom abandon a successful strategy.

What lies behind the current situation in Quebec? First of all there is terrible poverty. Unemployment rates in Quebec are far above the Canadian average — over 11 per cent in some areas — and for many, especially in the slums of Montreal or in the Gaspé, near starvation is their everyday existence.

During the last ten years in Montreal the number of welfare recipients has risen at twenty times the rate of increase in population. One survey of grade one children showed that 33 per cent were undernourished, 30 per cent were retarded in weight and height, and half had emotional problems. No wonder an anger began to show.

A second factor is racial discrimination by companies against French-Canadian workers. For example, the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Bi-culturalism shows that French-speaking workers make much lower wages than do English-speaking workers in Quebec. Moreover, even if a worker learns English, he still earns less than if he spoke only English.

Because most companies are owned by English-Canadians or Americans, all top jobs go to English-speaking employees. As a result, in his own province the French-Canadian earns 36 per cent less than do the English, and rank well below all other ethnic groups except the Italian immigrants and the Indians.

Faced with this situation French-Canadians began to demand a better deal from the owners and government. Numerous socialist and separatist groups began to form, including the Front de Liberation du Quebec (FLQ) who believed that the capitalist elite who controlled Quebec politics would never allow meaningful reform. Frankly revolutionary, the FLQ resorted to bombing attacks on Federal and Capitalist institutions in order to point out the tremendous degree to which Quebec was controlled by these groups.

Meanwhile, at Laval University, a new (for Quebec) political and social philosophy appeared. The professors at Laval argued that the reason the French were poor and at the bottom of Quebec society was because they had not educated themselves, nor trained themselves to suit the new capitalist, technological world. Among those educated in this new ideal were Rene Levesque and Pierre Trudeau.

Quebec's big businessmen, frightened by the growing radicalism of the masses, sent for a French Federal cabinet minister, Jean Lesage, to lead a "reformed" Liberal party dedicated to the "Quiet Revolution" as proclaimed by the Laval intellectuals.

Dozens of technical schools were opened, university enrollment boomed and a spirit of optimism was everywhere. But there was a flaw in all these brave plans — the big businessmen still refused to hire French-speaking people in top jobs. The Laval ideal, too, was a lie.

Soon thousands of young technicians, teachers and university graduates were demanding the top jobs they had been promised but there were none. In anger they looked for a solution, and found one — separatism and the nationalization of English-controlled industry.

Meanwhile, Montreal's mayor Drapeau was bringing home to the French worker how little the Westmount elite cared for their poverty. In a glorious spree, Drapeau spend over $300,000,000 of Montreal money for Expo '67, the Expo ball club, and in a bid for the Olympic games. Meanwhile, Montreal slums rotted and welfare rates were only half that of Ontario. Imagine the bitterness of the Montreal poor who saw their tax dollars poured into a gigantic show that they could never afford to see.

Gradually, in 1968, many of the socialist and separatist groups in Quebec drew together behind Rene Levesque to form the Parti Quebecois to contest the spring 1970 election on a separatist, social democratic platform. The P.Q. lacked everything but the enthusiasm of its backers, the unemployed middle-class students and the angry poor and the workers. Believing in democracy, they set out to remake Quebec.

They had a rude awakening coming. The Liberal party, backed by the multi-millionaire Simard family, the Power Corporation (who own almost all the French language newspapers, radio and TV stations) and the banks spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to make Robert Bourassa (married to a Simard daughter) leader of the Liberal party and premier of Quebec. Politics in Quebec are never clear, but the election of 1970 was outstanding for the degree of distortion and manipulation by the elite-controlled media.

The rest is history. The P.Q. won almost 33 per cent of the French vote, but only six per cent of the seats. By their perversion of the electoral process, the business-dominated Liberals destroyed the faith of thousands of the young in the possibility of democratic change. To them, only one way remained to get free of the oppressive hand of the English-Canadian, American and French capitalist elites. For them the revolution had begun.

MURDOCHVILLE, March 10, 1957 — On one side, employees of Noranda Mines, striking for the right to unionize. On the other side, armed to the teeth, Duplessis' Provincial Police. 13 years later the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the Noranda workers' union must pay $3 million in damages to the conglomerate owners of the Murdochville mine and smelter.

"... democratic nature of War Measures Act.."

Without trying to resolve whether or not the War Measures Act was absolutely necessary in this particular crisis which Canada now faces, (since history alone will judge), I should like to question the logic of the Act's most vehement critics.

Their particular expressed concern, as I understand it to be, is that the War Measures Act potentially, and in fact, limits the civil liberties of Canadians and hence jeopardizes the foundations of our democratic system. Such criticism is at least gratuitous, since the Act limits by design.

But more important, the Act is not legislation external to that democratic system which we are now so concerned is threatened. Rather the War Measures Act was long before incorporated as a safeguard for Canadian democracy in the event that chaos should arise as the alternative in a national crisis.

Thus critics of the Act itself, quite apart from the question of the necessity of its present enforcement, are in my view out of time and out of place. For if indeed the War Measures Act is not consistent with our system of democracy, then the critics should have spoken earlier.

Criticism is famous for its divorce from solution, so that when chaos threatens, it is not the time to question the inherent democratic nature of the War Measures Act. For if we reject it then, there will be no alternative safeguard for the system: individual liberty is no protection in the face of anarchy.

'The Varsity has made valuable contribution'

The Varsity has come under a lot of unjustified attack during the past two weeks. We feel that the people who are complaining that your paper is nothing but a "left-wing rag" have failed to see the importance of a newspaper capable and willing to take a point of view which is opposite to that of the establishment press. In no other paper have we read the manifesto of the F.L.Q. with annotations explaining background: something which we think is imperative to the understanding of the whole question of Quebec now.

It seems to us incredible that people would judge a political act with no understanding of the history of events leading up to that act. The Telegram, The Star and The Globe and Mail have succeeded only in publishing the "straight" news: news without background. Any background they have given has been to look on the whole question as an isolated problem. Loss of life, if that is the criterion, is more likely with the specialists out on strike, or even with a city occupied by troops.

The manifesto, the historical articles on economics, the FLQ, Trudeau's words on separatism, the poem by Simon Barsinister, etc. — all of these have been valuable contributions to a real understanding of the Quebec situation.

Insurance plan not run by university

I enclose a photocopy of an advertisement for a student health and accident insurance plan which was printed in a recent edition of The Varsity.

There seems to me to be a misleading implication in the advertisement that the plan, the title of which is "University Health and Accident Plan", is under the sponsorship of the university. This is not the case. I wish to make it quite clear that the plan is a private one, being underwritten by the Mutual of Omaha Insurance Company. Students who purchase the coverage offered do so on the same basis as any individual entering into a contract for insurance.

Robin Ross,
Vice-President & Registrar.

Boswell explains why he resigned

Your coverage, in last Friday's issue, of my resignation from SAC contained some inaccuracies and misinterpretations which I would like to correct.

I did not claim "that only the Council's impatience stopped parity representation on the President's Advisory Council". This was not my basis of objection. Rather, I was opposed to SAC's acceptance of seats on PAC under any conditions. Council's refusal to agree to a one-week delay resulted in a hasty decision taken before research could be done to assess the implications of the action. The issue is not parity on PAC (which with seven students and seven faculty has to some extent been achieved), but whether SAC should assist in "legitimizing" an advisory body whose collective decisions (5 undergraduates out of 19 members) may run counter to SAC policy.

Until such time as the new top governing structure comes into being, SAC must, if it is to have any serious function at all, act as the body to represent student interests. SAC's representative and negotiating power can only be undercut by having a second, albeit "advisory", group of students (in a 5-19 structure) deciding on many of the same issues and possibly arriving at conflicting conclusions.

When the new top-governing structure does come into existence, then SAC's role must necessarily be redefined, but until then, it is a real mistake to have dual decision-making groups at the top level.

Certainly students should be elected to whatever group will finally be designated by the Board of Governors to decide on the question of Dr. Bissell's successor. But, they should be elected at that time and for that specific purpose. The replacement of Dr. Bissell should not be used as a lever to justify SAC weakening its own bargaining power vis-a-vis the administration. It is to be hoped that SAC will reconsider its hasty decision.

Secondly, I did not "attack SAC for spending most of its contingency fund on a grant to the Black Students' Union and The Varsity".

In fact I mentioned neither of them. My disgust was not with these, or any other grants per se, but with the total lack of concern about where the money was to come from in a tight budget.

Members of the Finance Commission repeatedly stated that a contingency was necessary to allow major programs to be undertaken on campus for the interest and benefit of students and the community. While no firm plans had yet been formulated, some general topics such as student aid (the Educational Opportunity Bank), unemployment (what happens after graduation?), or pollution (with a somewhat more radical approach than that of Pollution Probe) had been suggested, and the principle of major SAC projects had been agreed upon last May.

We felt it was our job to provide money in the budget for such programs, in addition to an emergency reserve. Thus, if money was to be given to groups or functions not anticipated in the budget, then sincere attempts should have been made to curtail or cut other functions and programs felt to be less important to the students at this university. This did not happen, and in fact, a deficit budget was passed.

This means (barring any unexpected revenues from other sources) that to operate this year, Council must use accumulated reserves, built up by the surpluses of previous Councils, that are required to operate over the summer and to purchase capital equipment (desks, typewriters, SAC press equipment etc.). This type of action is not only irresponsible but is also shortsighted. It is as though members of SAC do not expect the Council to exist much longer. By their actions they may be ensuring this.

We need crosswalk or traffic lights on Queen's Park

Alderman Horace Brown
President Claude Bissell
Co-Chairmen of University-City
Liaison Committee

Gentlemen:

The recent automobile-pedestrian confrontation on Queen's Park Crescent: "Ruth Green, 49, was charged with jaywalking by Toronto Police after being struck last Wednesday afternoon at the corner of Queen's Park Crescent and Hoskin Avenue." (Varsity, October 14) has caused great concern within the University Community. It is the most recent incident pointing to a decided lack of thought and concern regarding the thousands of pedestrians using the University area every day.

We suggest that the University-City Liaison Committee recommend to the City of Toronto that:

1. A comprehensive survey of pedestrian patterns in the University area by conducted by the City.
2. Some form of pedestrian crosswalk or traffic light be located on Queen's Park Crescent, either at Hoskin Avenue or at the east entrance to Hart House.

Nova Scotia printers censor Quebec news

HALIFAX (CUP) — Talks are now under way for the establishment of a co-operative print shop somewhere in the Maritimes to combat attempts by printers to censor news of the Quebec struggle.

University papers which normally print at the Dartmouth Free Press, have been severely censored in the past week by the shop's owner, John Nesbitt.

Both the Dalhousie Gazette and the St. Mary's Journal have been forced to leave blank spaces in their newspapers' latest editions when the printer refused to publish copy dealing with events in Quebec.

The Gazette will appear today with a blank front page after Nesbitt refused to print three stories that appeared originally in the Montreal Star, which is not known as a heavily radical or anti-government newspaper.

The Journal came back from the Nesbitt print shop last week with a rather large hole on page 3 after the printer decided on his own not to print stories from Canadian University Press.

Nesbitt did not inform the Journal staff that he was not printing the articles. They (the Journal) intend to see what legal action can be taken against the printer.

In Newfoundland, the Muse was printed only after a call to the Federal justice department to get clearance of copy dealing with the Quebec struggle.

In Prince Edward Island, the Cadre at the University of PEI reported this weekend that much of the copy they wanted to run in their paper would probably not be allowed by their printer.

RCs want support

By MICHAEL MAZUREK
Twenty thousand students from all over Ontario converged on Maple Leaf Gardens yesterday to clamour for government support of the Catholic High School system.

Since the Gardens can hold only 19,000, over 1,000 kids, with adult supporters sprinkled liberally among them, were left swarming in the streets outside.

Inside, student leaders opened the program by stating why the Catholics feel themselves justified in demanding public support for their school system.

They were followed by Liberal MPP Tim Reid and NDP MPP Donald McDonald, both pledged the support of their parties to the Catholic Schools' cause, to the obvious delight of the crowd.

McDonald was particularly well received, as he implied that the Robarts administration was using the Catholics as political guinea pigs in an effort to regain its dwindling public support.

The government's claim that the extension of financial support to the 15,000 Catholic School students in grades 11, 12 and 13 would place an unbearable strain on the provincial coffers is preposterous, he alleged, and is merely an attempt to exploit the non-Catholic majority's desire to protect its pocketbook.

Following McDonald's rousing address, Minister of Education William Davis presented a token restatement of the government's position on the matter.

Bissell of Simcoe Hall

Several weeks ago when The Varsity arranged to interview U of T president Claude Bissell, the only buildings under the protection of Canada's armed forces were the privies of Camp Borden. By last Thursday when Bissell met with Varsity staffers, Piarra Lepouta was dead and the country confused and angry. The interviewers were heralded into the president's broadloomed but otherwise austere office by a plainclothes U of T security guard on duty in the outer reception room. Initially Bissell was wary and guarded in his answers, especially about the War Measures Act. However as the morning wore on, civilization and morning coffee took hold. The president relaxed, stopped tapping his matchbox on the desk and leaning back in the swivel chair, chatted about the presidency, university government, and the educational opportunity bank. Printed below is the taped part of the two-hour interview between the president and Laura Kelly, Brian Morgan, Tom Walkom and Errol Young.

VARSIITY: What do you think of the War Measures Act?

BISSELL: It's a question of factual information — the extent to which there was a real apprehended revolutionary threat — we don't know the nature of the threat as yet. As far as the War Measures Act itself is concerned, everyone deplores it, as they should. It's a question of the extent to which there was a general threat to the structure of society. It's purely a question of factual information.

VARSIITY: It's called a measure to protect liberal democracy. What do you think it's protecting if it's taking away these rights?

BISSELL: When a few people use non-democratic means, how do you react? Do you acquiesce in it and thereby gradually undermine the state? Or do you react in a violent way? It's a terrible dilemma, and there's no black and white. Don't force me into that kind of straight comment.

VARSIITY: Abe Rotstein in a lecture said that it was a over-reaction by Trudeau.

BISSELL: What other measures do we have? If there was evidence that the situation existed where there was a deliberate co-ordinated effort, presumably this would be the only justification for the use of the War Measures Act.

VARSIITY: Do you feel that in this case the line between nationalism and separatism, between self-determination and violent overthrow of the government, has been transgressed by the list of people who have been arrested and detained under the War Measures Act?

BISSELL: Well, I don't know, nobody has a list.

VARSIITY: There was partial list in Quebec Press.

BISSELL: By the very act that you talk about violent revolution you attract all the sadists and criminals to it who thereby placate their souls by murder for the sake of an idea. It's been the history of all revolution.

VARSIITY: What would you do in your capacity as President if there were some form of disruption or meeting on campus that could be construed as being in support of the FLQ or against the War Measures Act?

BISSELL: That's not a matter for my decision.

VARSIITY: Would you oppose the police intervening on campus? Would you think that would be an infringement of academic freedom?

BISSELL: Well, the academic community is not a preserve. It has no special exemption from the law of the land. If the laws of the land are operating, there is nothing that the university can do.

VARSIITY: What about a rally supporting the FLQ?

BISSELL: Well, to support the FLQ is illegal now and there's nothing that can be done about that. You can discuss the War Measures Act as a theoretical concept, as a means of dealing with a situation but you can't have a rally supporting the FLQ without risking the full consequences at the present time — I'm just talking about what actually exists.

VARSIITY: Well the reason I ask about this is that from the things that I've heard you say and from what I've read about you, you've always struck me as a spokesman for the great liberal tradition.

BISSELL: Great Liberal Tradition in quotation marks, eh?

VARSIITY: I'm not being facetious. The War Measures Act and all of the implications is a direct contravention of the great liberal tradition.

BISSELL: Well, the War Measures Act is a contravention under ordinary circumstances. The whole assumption is that they're extraordinary circumstances; it is a War Measure, as such.

VARSIITY: Would the University administration take any action similar to the action of the people at Lethbridge who tried to expel the editor from the student newspaper for publishing copies of the FLQ manifesto and War Measures Act.

BISSELL: For what purpose? For what reason?

BISSELL: Well publication of the FLQ manifesto is not necessarily a declaration of abiding support for the FLQ, although I gather from the editorial comment that there is a certain amount of support.

VARSIITY: Would the University administration take any action against students who supported the FLQ?

BISSELL: This is a question which would have to be handled under our ordinary legal processes. It's bound up with the whole situation... you can't ask me what I'll do under given circumstances if I don't know. But I do know what might happen in terms of the whole country.

VARSIITY: When the whole thing blows over and the War Measures Act is recalled, would you require justification of the War Measures Act from Trudeau?

BISSELL: Well, I won't require from the Prime Minister anything of course, but I hope there will be more proof. Some evidence has been published in the press but we don't have enough. I don't think. We have evidence that there are a fair number of FLQ who are not only willing but are desirous to use violent measures, we do know that's part and parcel of the program. We don't know to what extent this was a concerted and co-ordinated attempt to undermine the whole structure of Quebec society. See, I'm not a Marxist, so you can't ask a question and expect to get a Marxist reply.

VARSIITY: What's your opinion of the Educational Opportunity Bank?

BISSELL: It's still pretty vague. I still don't know the full implications of it.

VARSIITY: There'll be a central bank set up. There'll be no more grants and everyone, regardless of their financial situation, can get a grant and pay it back in a form of income tax according to their ability to pay. And there'll be a limit on the number of years they'll have to pay it back.

BISSELL: Well the aspect that I'm not clear on — is the analysis of given courses. Is a given course assessed on the basis of its probable returns to the individual? A lot of my colleagues are deeply concerned about the effect this would have on the choice of studies. They feel this would have a deleterious effect on the humanities, and even the social sciences. When you enter a course, you pay back according to your capacity to pay back. If you are a teacher, you pay back much less than if you're an executive. People might take courses where the possibility of paying back — is stronger. In other words, they'll go into Engineering or other professions because they'll be able to pay back more quickly and therefore get rid of this debt. Whereas a person in humanities, or in one of less well paying professions, social work for instance, will steer away from it because they'll be paying back less. In other words, it will have an adverse effect on the structure of the university; it will tend to twist the university in terms of those professions that are most remunerative. This is the point my colleagues are making. You're concerned with the fact that it might simply strengthen the tendency of middle-class people to go to university and workers not to go to university. From our point of view, we're concerned about the possible twisting of the university, into areas which are obviously socially desirable from the point of view of the economy, and personally desirable, from the point of view of income.

VARSIITY: The EOB seems to indicate that you're in school for the money, and it's taking the cost of education from the public to the private sector.

BISSELL: The crucial argument is the extent to which a given activity is private or public — in other words if I become a social worker, I'm 60% social and 40% personal; if I become a business executive, then I'm 90% personal and 10% social. These are the sort of vague distinctions that I find difficult to make and most distressing.

VARSIITY: Do you think that education is private or something that belongs to the public.

BISSELL: It's both of course. But in recent years, we've been trying to emphasize the public impact of education. It was one of the great arguments when we were trying to get money from the government which we did successfully. Education was seen as primarily a social asset and that the government should carry most of the burden. But now there seems to be a shift over to the private sector with this EOB, and it definitely is a shift away from the university and education as a public good to education as a private benefit.

VARSIITY: The removal of university costs from government will remove some of the government control from university.

BISSELL: This is an argument in favour of the EOB. If the individual is responsible for higher proportionate costs, then government interference will be less likely. There's something in that, but I don't find it terribly vital. I think government concern in education will manifest itself irrespective of the proportion of resources that come from the public or the private sector.

VARSIITY: How do you feel about government control of the university?

BISSELL: Do you think it exists?

VARSIITY: Well theoretically at the background of the U of T exists an act of Parliament.

BISSELL: All universities do have a provincial charter so that they are to that extent part of the provincial pattern. Do you think you can have a completely autonomous university in the sense that it has no dependence on the government whatsoever? I take it you're arguing for a greater degree of freedom and recognition of the social area that education occupies. You're then in the logical bind that the government after all is the people. Can you have a great pumping of government funds and still have complete independence whereby the university can have any faculty it chooses, turn down what ever student it chooses, do whatever it chooses? There has to be some control there.

VARSIITY: How far can government control extend?

BISSELL: Government control now simply operates as a means of distributing funds equitably to the universities. The first decision is always a political decision made by the government and that is what proportion of money will go to education. That's a fundamental government decision. Then distribution is according to a formula. That's the extent of control — they don't care what people we appoint — except they prefer we appoint Canadians.

VARSIITY: There seems to be more government control, if not actual control, then influence. What happens if they ask for information, like the Committee For University Affairs did at York?

BISSELL: It can ask for any information it so chooses. It will ask for information it feels is socially desirable if the rights of the individual are controlled.

VARSIY: How far would you go in giving information?

BISSELL: We'll give information on number of staff and their background and we're prepared to give citizenship — but that is as far as we'll go.

VARSIY: If the government were to ask for a file on individual evaluations of professors or students?

BISSELL: No. Under no conditions. We're very insistent on protecting the rights of the individual to control information about himself. We've never to my knowledge had any inquiry which asks for in a "curriculum vitae". We're reluctant even to give academic information unless its for an academic purpose. If a university asks us for information about John Brown's applying for graduate school that's one thing. But if the government asks us for information, even if it's only academic information we would be very skeptical.

VARSIY: What about the RCMP asking for information about student radicals?

BISSELL: Well we've had no experience with that. We've had experience with RCMP on people going abroad — staff — to occupy sensitive positions. Usually it turns out to be people who are impeccable, but other than that we've had no inquiries. I think we would be very reluctant to give it them. We look upon that as the responsibility of the RCMP themselves.

VARSIY: What about the whole question of control of university government. I'm confused on what happened with CUG report. What status does the University Wide Committee report have?

BISSELL: The UWC which was made up of 160 people who represented all of the constituencies of the university except the Board of Governors although two members of the Board attended and were present at the discussions. I think its status is simply this — that it represents the opinion of the university community and as such is a very high status. But the legal power is still under the hands of the Board and this everybody must realize.

VARSIY: What do you see as the impact of the CUG report on the life in the university? From its progress so far, do you see a major change in life of university students?

BISSELL: Beginning with CUG itself, there was a major change, since CUG was a parity committee by a curious set of circumstances. I think coming out of that has been a whole series of discussions in which students have been involved — either on a parity basis or on a very substantial basis. I think its changed the atmosphere a great deal. But as far as student involvement, its a matter of student choice — the extent to which students can respond to it and accept responsibilities. We've left the door ajar and we're looking for students to enter.

VARSIY: Are the students used as informants or as people whose opinions are interesting to have but remain powerless when it comes to decision-making? Also specifically having them sit on committees where there numbers are insignificant but their voices are valuable to have BISSELL: On the CUG committee of course, the student voice was raised in vigorous fashion and there was no doubt there about the influence of students on the whole outcome of CUG; it was a basic influence.

VARSIY: Regarding university government — in an attempt to overcome the veto and in an attempt to overcome the power of consensus, won't the numbers of different groups comprising the unicameral house be important?

BISSELL: All I can do is say that I hope that the new body is not simply congeries of special interests but that the faculty and student representations will be based upon elections from a broad constituency which cuts across departments. This does not necessarily deprive a man of his identity in a department on a given point of view, but I would say very frankly that if this new body simply becomes a set of special interests, we may be in for an even more chaotic time than we had in the past. A lot of it depends on the power of the president. In the future, the role of a president will become a lot more analogous to that of a prime minister than that of a corporation executive, and his power of survival and his power of doing things becomes dependent on his success in listening to the majority opinion on this governing council. A lot of people will be willing to bury their own convictions or assumptions or prejudice for the sake of a long term policy. This is what happens in politics too. I suppose that there individuals permit their own convictions to become swallowed up in the party point of view. But I'm not talking about party politics. I'm talking about the willingness of individuals to forget about some personal obsession, no matter how strong, in order to maintain the structure of university. I think it's going to be a delicate business. It's a basic question, how do you get authority that also has acceptance among those who elect.

VARSIY: What would you say are the priorities right now in the university?

BISSELL: We are trying to maintain the essential strength of the faculty of Arts and Sciences, the School of Graduate Studies, and the basic professional faculties. The real problems enters when we talk about the smaller professional faculties and some of the smaller divisions. We haven't solved that problem yet.

VARSIY: I'm interested in your conception of the role of office of the president. In this analogy of the president to the office of the prime minister, what should be the executive role in relation to the advisors he would have?

BISSELL: There's a good deal of discussion about this in CUG and there was quite a conflict between the student members and Principal Hodgetts. I think the tendency of the students was to say that the executive should be the hewer of wood and the drawer of water and exists simply as a servant and should be constantly subjected to scrutiny.

Hodgetts maintained that no government could exist without a wide latitude of power to be given to the executive role, and what you're concerned with in the governing council is the decision on policy. You leave it up to the executive to implement it and implementation carries with it a wide latitude in interpretation of particular events. So I certainly accept the idea that the administrator is accountable but I also think he should be given a very wide latitude in interpretation and I don't think he should be subjected to the kind of over the shoulder scrutiny that could lead to a stalemate in university. I think one of the weaknesses of any university is that the administration far from having too much power, has not had the scope to exercise what power he has. He intends to be bound by rigidities and to interpret things in terms of fixed patterns.

VARSIY: What happens when the governing council has so many factions in it that it can't do anything. Does that give the president a free hand? He can't be accountable to any body because that body can't make a decision.

BISSELL: It could make his job impossible if the president couldn't act on any subject because the council couldn't act on any subject. I think that if the president were wise, he would get out as soon as possible. I think he does have or must have the power of initiative. He simply can't be a person that reacts to discussions all the time; he must initiate and propound new policies. If he identifies himself with a policy and finds that he can't implement it, then it seems to me that there is only one course and that is to get out. You see, in the present system the B of G appoints the president and its possible legally for him to go on in the full panoply of his office without any support of the staff or students whatsoever. It is not likely but its possible because he's not accountable except in a broad social sense. If he's wise, he'd be aware of that. But in any new government, he would have this direct accountability and he would have this barometer to indicate where he stands and what his chances of getting certain things through are. If a governing council becomes a rabid warren of dissension, then God help the university.

VARSIY: Do you see the president more analogous to the prime minister than the US president — in that if you were to whole-heartedly endorse a position that was rejected, would you feel an obligation to resign or would you just concede on that issue.

BISSELL: It's a choice. If he's turned down in some minor matter, that he obviously doesn't worry too much about it. But I think every president and anyone in power must make a division between what he thinks are ultimate policy matters on which he stands and falls, and those which are minor. Then if he's turned down on major policy matters, then I think he's obviously in the position where he shouldn't continue. Under the old system, the president could come in and say "I'm going to make Toronto an Engineering school and try and stop me." Without any legal checks as such except the Board of Governors.

VARSIY: How do you see the changes in the structures around the president, such as the President's Advisory Council?

BISSELL: The concept of the governing council is that it would produce a whole set of subsidiary committees which are in effect executive committees, not just advisory. The president will still be embedded in a whole network of advisory committees and will have to sound out his ideas in a committee or have them sound out for him before they're broached in the wider council. I think that he will depend upon these committees more than he has in the past. In the present, given the some what loose balance of power that he has, the president tends to rely on a group of intimate advisors, who in effect make up an inner cabinet. But with the governing council, you'll have a set of committees which will reflect the structure of the governing council so that more power would pass to these, and the function of the major administrators in advising the president would lessen. Of course I can't obliterate advice every time I walk down the hall, but it would be more structured. There would be a built-in process by which you'd have representative groups that would feed in student and staff advice.

VARSIY: Are the results of the UWC the final word effective on university government?

BISSELL: The final word if you leave out the Board of Governors has taken the legal point of view that it is the ultimate power in the university and responsible for the university, and they will accept and transmit the findings of the university wide committee but they reserve the right to make comments about it.

VARSIY: The findings are going to be taken as the result of the university faculty and students?

BISSELL: Well it's up to the provincial government because they are making the legislation and they could in wisdom or lack of wisdom give any status they so chose and so obviously representing the whole university committee cannot be set aside. Anybody who sets that aside is setting aside an approximation, or as close as you can come, the voice of the university. Now I'm sure some people look upon the UWC as being illegitimate. Legitimacy is an unattainable goal in this world I suppose, but it is as legitimate as we could make it in terms of representation.

VARSIY: What status will the student minority report have if and when it does come out?

BISSELL: It depends upon how cogently it's written. It will be passed on to the government and the government has not been notably insensitive to student opinion. It will not be incorporated in the UWC report but it will be included separately.

VARSIY: A lot of people thought the students on the UWC had been co-opted and had circles run around them.

BISSELL: They're fine people to talk about that — they've been co-opting and politicizing themselves more successfully. This is part and parcel of the democratic game.

VARSIY: What will happen if the UWC report goes in and the students cry "Foul, foul?"

BISSELL: It depends on what they want to do about it.

VARSIY: Suppose they want another body?

BISSELL: You're talking about the future and thank God I won't be here to see it. But there may be an equal protest from the staff as far as that is concerned because I suspect that what comes out will not be precisely what the University Wide Committee ordered. I suspect that, because I don't think any politician will take any document and implement it word for word. It's hard to say whether the students, staff, or laymen will be most disgruntled about it.

VARSIY: So really the question now is revolving on the government rather than the university?

BISSELL: Are you asking about a technique to get your own way?

VARSIY: Well the results have gone past the university?

BISSELL: Well they've been sent to the government as such, so yes I would say that is so.

Revoke War Act, U of T Waffle demands

By ERIC MILLS

Calling the War Measures Act "a tool of the English-Canadian ruling class", the U of T Waffle, supported by the Ontario Waffle, demanded that it be revoked.

In a press release issued Friday, the Waffle said that "the principle danger to democracy and to the building of democratic socialism in Quebec and the rest of Canada comes from the Federal and Quebec governments themselves.

"The arrest of hundreds of prominent spokesman and participants in the Quebec movement for independence and democratic socialism attests to (the) real intentions of the Trudeau and Bourassa governments".

Professor Melville Watkins, speaking for the Ontario Waffle, said that there is "no evidence that the War Measures Act has anything to do with the FLQ".

Instead, "the democratic left in Quebec is being suppressed". The arrest of two candidates of the Front d'Action Politique (FRAP) was "chiefly to prevent them from campaigning for the election this Sunday."

The Parti Quebecois, which Watkins described as a "moderate democratic group", is "unacceptable" to the Trudeau government, he charged.

Gary Teeple (SGS), representing the U of T Waffle, added that the Criminal Code is adequate to handle the FLQ terrorists.

Like most left groups, the Waf-file, which is associated with the NDP, condemned FLQ terrorism while supporting the principle of self-determination for Quebec.

As well as demanding the revocation of the War Measures Act, it called for the release of prisoners held under the Act, and the removal of troops from Quebec.

Impeachment possible for five reps on SAC

At least five SAC reps are liable to impeachment for dereliction of duty in not attending any council meetings this year, according to Judicial Commissioner Craig Perkins.

"They're not serving anybody. Just filling in spaces," he said in an interview yesterday. He went on to say that the matter would be brought before Wednesday's SAC meeting. A two-thirds majority of members present can unseat any member missing for three consecutive meetings.

The only person in question available for comment was Fred Mandel. He claimed that he had attended one meeting and two others were on Jewish holidays. When asked about the idea of impeachment, he said, "If they want to, that's fine. . . it will do me good." He also voiced sentiments that due to dissatisfaction with SAC in Meds, they would have a hard time finding a replacement.

There are now nine officially vacant seats on SAC for which by-elections are pending.

'Be yourself,' ex-addicts advise

By MARINA STRAUSS

Ex-drug addicts acting in last week's Vertigo 70 play "The Concept", give to both drug users seeking help and those helping them this advice: "All you have to do is be yourself."

The cast of "The Concept" all attend Daytop Village, a rehabilitation centre for drug addicts in New York City. None of the actors or actresses are professional. As the program says: "The play evolved a total group effort through constant discussion and sharing of ideas."

There are now about 420 residents at Daytop, and it is run on government grants and donations. Kids who go there, says one cast member, are "so emotionally messed up they can't take it."

"The average stay at Daytop is 18-24 months" said Dianne Solomon. She has been there for 11 months now. "I don't plan on staying more than 18 months," she said.

Mark McInerney, who is relatively new at Daytop, said he'll leave for sure when he can, but, he added, "I could leave now if I wanted to. We're not chained down to this place; we can leave any time. I'm not ready to leave now, I need this place."

"At school teachers messed me up. They made me suspicious, except for the exceptional few, and I dropped out," said Roberta Jehu. "At Daytop there is no authority figure. Everyone works together in a family-type environment. We know the staff is one of us". The staff at Daytop are "graduates" of the community and have experienced it.

The play tries to show how the community operates, its philosophy of self-confrontation, the people involved, and their hassles and fulfillments. One line of the play, which seems to illustrate the main problem encountered, is: "People all over the world need love, but their images get in the way."

However it is obvious from the play itself that the spirit of communal sharing and togetherness being sought has to be developed slowly and painfully. "You didn't come here to teach, you came here to learn." was what the new member (in the play) was told when entering Daytop Village. Said Mark McInerney of his own reactions in the group: "Yeah, there were lots of times I couldn't stand taking orders, even now. But at Daytop you're told something, and you do it, and then if you're still angry you fight it out."

Not all the drug addicts who come to Daytop find their solution. "Some people can't respond to this" commented one cast member. "They can't take it so they leave."

Drug clinic tries new solutions

By PHIL CHARKO

"If you're on speed and you like it, that's cool. If you're on heroin and you like it, that's cool," says Dr. David Collins of the Toronto Free Youth Clinic. And he presents a different perspective on the whole problem of helping those who are suffering from drug abuse and other urban problems.

"As long as he's on drugs and he thinks he's doing something, I can't do anything." The clinic on DuPont St. will help anyone who feels he needs help, but, they will not force themselves on anyone. Dr. Collins, the only qualified doctor, and nine other persons, ranging in age from 18 to 25 use this simple philosophy to help reach many of the alienated and rejected in Toronto's urban society.

They represent an alternative for the paternalistic de-personalized clinics such as those in the hospitals or the Public Health Clinics. At the clinic, relationships are not as a professional to a patient but rather as one human being to another.

In operation for only five months no one who has so far been looked after has been given the wrong diagnosis or treatment. The clinic sends about three people a week to one of the hospitals and half those cases are unnecessary. Like their philosophy, most of their techniques are very simple.

For incoherence due to the smoking of marijuana, sleep with a tranquilizer, if necessary, is prescribed. For bad trips on acid they talk to the person to keep him in touch with reality. The speed freak who may have gone for eight days with no food, sleep, intellectual and emotional activity, gets sleep and talk. They're usually in a depressed mood. Heroin addicts are also treated at the clinic. Thus far Collins has taken 15 off heroin and has got them addicted to methadone. The crucial difference is that there is no withdrawal symptoms so they can kick the habit.

Girls who come there wanting abortions may sometimes be referred to a hospital, women's lib groups who get them to clinics in Buffalo or to a doctor. V.D. cases are all referred to the Public Health Clinic.

Collins said this about complaints against the system "It's not a matter of a system. It's a matter of people. Systems would work fine if people work well."

GOBLIN

If that Halloween mask happens to reflect the way you feel, the reason might be as simple as the wrong sanitary protection. Maybe you're just suffering from a case of an uncomfortable sanitary pad and belt.

The remedy is a simple one: internally worn Tampax tampons. They can't give you that ugly feeling because, very simply, you can't feel you're wearing them. And they don't show. In fact, there's nothing to cause you discomfort or embarrassment. No matter what your costume is.

Tampax tampons are easy to carry in your pocket or purse. Easy to use. Easy to dispose of. And very easy to get used to.

The U of T pavilion at the Building Show was one of the few in the exhibition that could stimulate children's imagination and relate to them meaningfully.

U of T exhibit generates mixed reactions

By ROGER HARPER

To an otherwise very dull Building Show, University of Toronto contributed an exhibit that was a main attraction. Various reactions were elicited by the University's presentation — joy among some of the people present who found inside the CNE Industrial Building many of the street furniture objects that have been part of their life elsewhere; consternation among the concessionaires whose sales were undercut by what U of T offered; confusion for the fire marshall who could not accommodate the sprawling, enveloping U of T set-up in his rigid conception of convention planning.

A rigid stereotype for the businessman at the Convention has been slowly built up; students and staff of the Department of Architecture hoped to undermine this image. The aura of conventioning has usually involved muted business conversations against the shifting backdrop of hotel living, drinking and agency bunnies. A convention like the Building Show which, for the first time has attracted salesmen from the United Kingdom as well as from across Canada, has the atmosphere of a marketplace and the inclusion of a University exhibit is, in this context, an incongruity.

The fact is that those from the Department of Architecture responsible for the U of T presentation, invited by the organizers to display at their expense, looked on the Building Show as a challenge, born out of recurrent discussions and observations, to identify the kinds of human experience a highly commercialized world inhibits and to make them once again possible.

Two carefully constructed continuous annotated slide shows to describe present concerns in the Department and the thinking behind the U of T exhibit were one of the few things in the Show that attempted to seriously engage human intelligence if only for a few minutes without the ulterior motive of pushing a product. Newspaper boxes were stocked in the hope that people, especially guests to the city, would have occasion to come together to talk about local or world events and a machine was geared to revive the 10 cent coke. For secretaries, nurses, and workmen, or anyone else on a lunchbreak or just wanting to relax, a television and dumpy sofas were brought in. A jukebox operated in the faint hope that the week long Convention might precipitate a party. A bubbling water cooler and paper cups were the only source of drinking water in the building.

An idea that a building is not finished when the ribbon-cutting ceremony is over, but when people have brought to it their objects and possessions — ultimately their actions — has caught the imagination of people in the Department of Architecture and the Building Show offered a chance to construct a full-scale model to test the validity of this notion. Introduced by Prof. P. Prangnell, the present Chairman of the Department, the trilogy "Support-Fill-Action" may serve to deliver architectural thinking from the mystery of "creative" design where it has languished for too long and tie it again to the needs and aspirations of the people. According to Prof. Prangnell, quality in built form is its capacity to receive gracefully and easily whatever people bring and the dignity and diversity of human actions precipitated. Hence, criticism or actual problem-solving is a matter of careful observation and prediction.

In this case, as "Support", a grid of steel columns was erected which extended into the aisles and adjacent cafeteria area. A raised platform made a clear path diagonally through the exhibit from the entrance foyer of the Exhibition Hall to the bar and cafeteria. The "Support", designed by Prof. D. Engel and D. McKay (Arch IV) was developed during the whole building process to fit the idiosyncracies of the exhibit siting. (For example, a last minute decision was made to change the column grid from wood to steel so that the Department could erect the structure themselves with standard tubular scaffolding.)

As a manifesto statement about the role architecture should play in people's lives, the U of T exhibit perhaps was ill-suited for the specific context in which it was constructed. Its chief value lies in its ability to welcome everyday objects and events which is a radical departure from current and prevalent ideas in the profession. The exhibit stands as an indictment against the exclusiveness of many modern buildings — either through lack of foresight in the planning stage or through uncompromising aesthetics.

The U of T phones, the only free ones in the building, found much use.

A poster wall displays information from the Department of Architecture.

Western fullback Stan Bogucki attempts to head ball out of danger during Saturday's 3-3 draw.

Soccer tie features late goal

By THE MAN IN BLUE

The Soccer Blues and Western University Mustangs fought to a standstill 3-3 tie Saturday in a game noteworthy for its share of unusual incidents.

Mustangs opened the scoring after five minutes with a fine header following a corner kick.

Blues rallied from this setback, and with every player showing great effort scored two goals before half-time. The first was due to the challenging play of Ersen Ozerding, who forced the Mustangs defence into error; the loose ball was rammed home by Mario DaRosa with calm assurance.

The second goal, scored by Vito Polera, came on an excellent shot after he showed tenacity and drive on a lengthy swerving run.

In the second half Blues again showed their soccer skills, and pressed the ailing Mustangs into defensive misery. However, it was the Western team who scored twice in quick succession at the 35 and 40-minute marks.

The first, a headed effort following a long throw-in, hit the boot of Blues' fullback John Cobby, whose unintentional intervention deflected the ball into an unguarded corner of the goal. Mustangs then took a 3-2 lead on another header from a corner kick; Blues goalkeeper Vince Pecorella was helpless on the play.

However, the Blues are a hard side to beat and their determination was yet to obtain them a just reward. With about thirty seconds left to play a free kick from outside the Western penalty area was deflected toward the onrushing Cobby.

The fullback, although in foreign territory, slotted the ball beneath the diving Mustangs keeper to salvage a merited tie. It is rare indeed for a player to score for both teams!

Blues coach, Bob Nicol, was particularly impressed with the all-out aggressiveness of every player, and is confident that combined with the undoubted skill of the individual players, the young Toronto side will be a force to be reckoned with.

Next game for the remodelled team goes against Waterloo on Wednesday, a "must" win if Blues are to win the championship.

Volleyball Blues take measure of Guelph 3-2

Taino Pallandi's Volleyball Blues opened the season in impressive fashion Saturday as they took an exhibition match-up from Guelph.

In the best-three-of-five series, Blues started well winning the first game 15-11. However, the volley Gryphons came back strongly and took a 2-1 lead in games by winning the next two by identical 15-13 scores.

But, evidently Blues had been saying something for the final going as they won the next two games 15-9 and 15-2.

Wrestlers ready to go

The wrestling season appears to be getting off to a good start this year. Coach Jack Edgar opened official practise sessions last week, and already an enthusiastic core of about ten wrestlers are hard at work.

We want to build a winning team and its success depends largely on the numbers that come out daily to practise. Whether your motives be overall fitness or you want a varsity level wrestling education, come out and give it a try. Practise outfits are provided. The workouts themselves are held in the wrestling room, Hart House, from 5:15-6:30 p.m. We'll be glad to see you.

Blues down Stangs to stay in Yates race

Blues outstanding rookie defensive half Peter McNabb drives the final nail in the Mustang's coffin as he speeds away after breaking up the final Western scoring threat with an interception.

Incredible as it may seem, Blues' halfback Bob Morrow (23) somehow broke out of this cluster of Mustang defenders to sprint 19 yards to score the game's only touchdown.

Rugger Blues drop close one

By UNCLE HARLS

The Western Rugger Mustangs came to Toronto Saturday undefeated to meet Blues for the second encounter this season.

After an earlier loss of 22-3, Blues decided they could make a contest of this game and came out to play rugby.

Western started in its usual explosive way and after the first fifteen minutes of play Blues has spotted them an 8-0 lead.

With the tough forward play led by Geoff "The Wand" Ellwand, Blues dominated the remainder of the first half and just before the half ended Ian Owens put Blues on the scoreboard with a penalty kick. At half-time the Mustangs led 8-3.

Blues came roaring back in the second half and after keeping the Western team within their own fifteen yard line wing forward John Burbe, who was outstanding in covering the loose ball, successfully blocked a kick and fell on it in the end zone for a try.

Owens converted to tie the score at 8-8.

Western came back fighting and within the next ten minutes they scored another try which they converted and kicked a penalty goal to put them out in front 16-8.

With the fine play of rookie Ken Shand at scrum-half Blues fought back valiantly.

After another blocked kick, Mike Code was awarded a penalty try when he was tackled while racing to touch the ball down.

Owens converted for a 16-13 score but that was the last tally Blues managed.

By LYNDON LITTLE

Despite the fact that they didn't get the helping hand they needed from the McGill Redmen, the football Blues kept themselves in the 1970 SIFL race with a 10-4 victory over the Western Mustangs before 12,000 Homecoming fans Saturday afternoon at Varsity Stadium.

The Gaels from Kingston maintained their one-point lead on Blues as they staged a late rally to down the Redmen 23-12 in what may have been the last college football game at McGill's Molson Stadium.

The Mustangs, who had entered Saturday's contest in a first-place tie with the Queen's crew, had any giddy notions of a Yates Cup dispelled as they dropped back into third spot.

ALTHOUGH it was a great disappointment to Blues that McGill failed to upset Queen's in Montreal Saturday, the players and coaches are determined that they will win their remaining two games and hope for the best.

That means a victory by either McMaster of Waterloo over the Gaels in the final two weekends of regular action.

"If we do get the break we need," said head coach Ron Murphy after the Western battle, "we want to make sure we don't blow it ourselves by losing one of our last two matches."

Blues play McGill and McMaster — both at Varsity Stadium.

Even if the local heroes don't win the Yates this year, they should at least be awarded some type of trophy for football's third-down gambling kings!

Two weeks ago against the Gaels at Varsity Stadium, Blues tried six third-down gambles and made every one of them.

Against the Mustangs, Murph decided to play it a little more conservatively this time — trying only five! Needless to say, they made them all.

THE MOST daring gambles came on a series early in the final quarter with Blues deep in their own end on the six-yard line, trying to protect their 10-4 margin.

A rush by Walt Sehr and another by Glen Markle left them one short of a first-down on the eleven.

Dunkley got the go-ahead signal and sent Markle crashing off right tackle for the crucial first-down.

A couple of plays later Blues found themselves in the same position, only this time they were two yards short.

On a superb call by quarterback Wayne Dunkley, he faked the dive to Markle and then pitched a short pass to Sehr who turned the play into a 25-yard gain.

When asked to comment on the third-down plays, assistant coach

Tom Watt, who handles the spotting duties said, "I just closed my eyes."

With a score like 10-4, it comes as no great surprise that Blues' defense was the key factor.

THEIR BIGGEST moment of glory came in the closing minute of the first half when a great goal line stand protected Blues' slim 4-3 lead.

The Western opportunity was set up when the Mustangs' huge defensive tackle Larry Bird blocked a Bill Stankovic field-goal attempt at the Western 26 and middle-linebacker George Hill picked up the loose ball returning it to Blues' ten-yard line.

A quick pass from quarterback Pete Quinlan to halfback Dave Kerr moved the ball to the two but the defense dug in and held on two rushing attempts.

The Varsity defense, coming off a rather shaky performance against Queen's last week, limited Western to only 90 yards along the ground and only 85 through the air.

Defensive halfbacks Jody Orved and Pete McNabb made key interceptions in the fourth quarter while middle linebacker Bob Potts did a fine job filling in for the injured Bill Bennett.

Place-licker Paul Knill accounted for all the Western points on a 39-yard field goal early in the second period and a single off another field goal attempt in the third.

THE ONLY touchdown of the game came mid-way through the third quarter when halfback Bob Morrow went 19 yards around the right side.

Dunkley had moved Blues from their own 47 to the Western 19 on four plays. On another third-down gamble he faked to Markle and pitched out to Morrow who broke several tackles on his fine dash for the goal line.

Stankovic added a 16-yard field goal and a single off a wide attempt to collect the other points for Blues.

One area that hurt Blues badly was punt return coverage which provided Western with good field position many times.

Blue Notes — The Mustangs put a good rush on Dunkley all afternoon dropping him for losses on three occasions. . . Rookie quarterback Bob Billingham from Northern, who has been playing regularly in the defensive secondary, replaced Dunkley for one series when the latter temporarily injured his arm. . . Blues dominated every aspect of the stats picking up 407 yards in total offense to only 175 for Western. . . Dunkley was good on nine of 19 pass attempts for 196 yards while Stangs Quinlan hit on nine of 20 for 85 yards. . . Split-end John Chapman was Dunkley's favourite receiver hauling in three receptions for 109 yards. . . Markle had another fine afternoon as he bulled his way for 118 yards on 19 carries behind fine blocking from Blues' offensive line.

Faculty and students resign after Council rejects parity

FACULTY JOINED STUDENTS in a flurry of resignations Monday following the rejection by the Faculty Council of Arts and Science of a student move to set up a parity committee to plan the permanent structure of the Council.

Barbara Martineau, a lecturer at Scarborough said that she was resigning from the Council, "conditional on the will of the students", and that she felt the students had been "most unfairly dealt with".

The Council, which is the top governing body of the Faculty of Arts and Science, presently has allowance for 34 students out of its 1300 members. The Monday meeting was of the General Committee of the Council, containing 169 members, including all the students.

THE STUDENTS' PROPOSAL would have created a committee of five staff and five students to plan the composition of the body that would replace the present interim structure. The students were to be elected in faculty-wide elections.

The rejection of the proposal was accomplished without a vote on the motion itself being taken, and with debate on the essence of the matter being cut off by amending and postponing motions.

IMMEDIATELY after the original motion was made, an amendment was proposed to eliminate the choosing of the students by faculty-wide elections. A very short debate mixing comments on both motion and amendment followed. J. B. Conacher, of the Department of History, then moved that the whole matter be tabled for six months, in what he called "a standard parliamentary procedure to remove an issue beyond the time when it has any relevance".

He was referring to the fact that Dean Allen will soon have to appoint some sort of committee anyway to review the present structure, since it is just a one-year interim body. The passing of his motion, by a 51 to 39 vote, effectively squashed the students hope for parity and elections. Any committee now will be merely an appointed one advising the Dean, rather than recommending directly to the Council itself.

In the debate that did take place, one faculty member maintained that a parity body amounts to student control. He said that students always voted together, and at least one faculty could be counted on to change camps and support them.

OTHERS FELT THAT THE ISSUE had been discussed for two years by several committees, and that it had really already been resolved as far as they were concerned. "We have already rejected parity, and we cannot continue indefinitely to put aside the decisions of committees and form new ones to deal with the same issues all over again," one said.

Kevin McCormick, who introduced the motion, said that its rejection would merely play into "the hands of the radical fringe on campus." Brian Morgan, said that delay in giving students an effective voice was giving them "sense of fatalistic despondency, and a feeling that even apparent changes are in reality changing nothing." He said that students generally do not see "the balance of terror that some faculty apparently feel exists", and that students would really like to co-operate, and work with the faculty as equal partners.

Although many student members resigned directly following the meeting, others were undecided, and it was clear that a few were going to remain on the Council. There will be a meeting in the SAC office at 7:30 tonight of all the members to discuss what their further action should be.

Erindale refuses to print article from Maoist paper

By MARINA STRAUSS

Erindale College has refused to allow a declaration of a Quebec communist party to be printed on college equipment.

"The Declaration of the Parti Communiste du Quebec (Marxist-Leniniste) on the Fascist Repression against the FLQ Sympathizers and the Quebec People," was originally printed in the People's Canada Daily News.

The News was banned under the War Measures Act.

"The document was clearly illegal by the War Measures Act. Although harmless, it contains phrases such as 'the FLQ along with other patriotic people and organizations'."

"One has to be careful when using public equipment," explained Lois Seppala, a member of the Varsity Board and Secretary for Dean E. A. Robinson of Erindale.

Says Dean W. J. Huggett, who was among those not permitting the piece to be xeroxed: "We can't disobey the law, that's all that's involved. University facilities can not be used for such means."

"I spoke to the student (who remains anonymous), pointed out it was against the law, but it was open to further discussion. He didn't accept this, tried to get it mimeographed without our permission, failed at that, and took it to the Erindalian, the student newspaper," said Huggett.

In an article titled "Censorship Comes to Erindale", one paragraph of the document was printed. It contained no support for the FLQ.

However Huggett questioned the legality of this printing. "Phrases like 'Wiping out our common enemy' have very ambiguous references. It takes a lawyer to be sure."

Seppala personally felt that "anyone reading the Declaration is not going to be changed into a revolutionary. The student should have tried to have it published somewhere else. It was printed and distributed by someone on main campus."

Varsity is 'censored'

Several copies of the Friday, October 16 Varsity had the centre-spread FLQ manifesto removed, at Erindale College.

The removal was "some individuals' demonstration in support of the War Measures Act" said Christine Cassin, a philosophy professor at Erindale.

"I don't think, to my knowledge, that the manifesto was deliberately removed in any official sense" she emphasized.

Many Erindale students did not see the Manifesto. Staff of the Erindalean paper said they didn't even get to see that issue of The Varsity.

5 students on search committee

The president's council came up with two methods of choosing somebody to replace retiring president Claude Bissell Monday.

The meeting of the council — which now includes 5 student representatives — voted on and approved two suggestions about who should choose a new president.

The first proposal — a committee of six students, six faculty, and six others (Board members, alumni, administrators) — was approved by a 10-8 vote.

Even U of T President Claude Bissell and vice-president Robin Ross, favoured this model.

However, it was only a straw vote.

Hours later, when the council got around to taking an official stand, the arrangement had changed.

The committee was now to consist of 21 people — five students, five faculty, three members of the Board of Governors, five administrators, two alumni, plus the chancellor of the university.

The search committee, as it will be called, will be a purely advisory body, as the Board of Governors still retains the prerogative of hiring the university president.

The first model was based on the structure set up this summer for the University's top governing structure. The equal proportion of students, faculty and administrators on this model reflected the composition of the top governing council approved by the University Wide Committee this summer.

Indians protest

Demonstration held at Queen's Park against racist jailing of two women

A group of about 30 from the Union of Ontario Indians demonstrated in front of the Ontario Legislature yesterday to protest the jailing of two Kenora women.

The pair, Doris Henry and Agnes Land, received sentences of 18 and 15 months for throwing rocks through the White Dog Reserve's Indian Affairs-operated school.

The UOI has maintained that charges against the women contained inconsistencies and that neither had legal counsel.

In a written circular, the union accused convicting judge J. V. Fregeau of racism. Fregeau is quoted in a Toronto Telegram story as saying, "The Indian here is different. It seems like this has been the dumping ground for the worst. I know jail doesn't seem to do any good, but it takes them out of circulation."

Representatives of the group met with Attorney-General Arthur Wishart for a short time, but according to UOI's legal consultant, Norman Zlotkin, the meeting was "not too satisfactory."

Wishart has promised to look into the matter.

The demonstrators called for an Ontario Commission of Enquiry to look into the administration of justice to Indians in the province.

The demonstration was supported by the Law Union which compared the rights

The demonstration was supported by the Law Union which compared the rights enjoyed by an Indian in normal times to those belonging to a Canadian under the War Measures Act.

"One arrested under the WMA is not entitled to legal counsel; in fact in Ontario in most cases an Indian arrested on a criminal charge cannot get counsel either," read a brief handed out at the demonstration by the Law Union.

Zlotkin is hopeful that as a result of the demonstration, "Word will go down through the bureaucracy that discrimination against Indians must stop."

Moreonit

Dr. David Collins of the Toronto Free Youth Clinic was cited in Monday's Varsity as using methadone as cure for heroin addiction because it incurs no withdrawal symptoms. The report needs clarification as Dr. Collins explains: "Methadone withdrawal extends over a period of ten to fourteen days. If methadone is stopped abruptly it produces withdrawal symptoms as bad as or worse than those of heroin."

Faculty and students resign

• From Page One

MANY BODIES HAVE BEEN BOYCOTTING the Council all along by refusing to elect any members at all, leaving 20 of the possible 34 student seats empty since the beginning of the year. It had been hoped that the immediate setting up of a parity restructuring committee would have encouraged groups to support the Council, and would have encouraged course unions to become more active. Many course unions — a strategic level in electing student members — have become virtually inactive, feeling that they are powerless and ineffective in dealing with any substantial matter.

Select pres secretly, Claude Bissell says

The selection of U of T's next president should be done secretly, according to current headman Claude Bissell.

Speaking in an interview Thursday, Bissell's stand on selection directly contradicted some of his earlier remarks on openness of committees.

"Four or five years ago I would have thought openness of meetings would have been ridiculous, and now I'm willing to say, partly because of the student influence, that secrecy is worse than openness," he said.

The president quickly qualified this statement when asked about its application to selection of next years president.

"When you're bandying about names, common sense says that it shouldn't be open. . . I'm not calling in question my previous statements on openness as a general practice, but in appointments it's a question of how you get your man. . . I would be opposed to openness in that area.

"If you had openness in the selection of a president or a dean, it becomes electoral — a popularity contest. It makes it almost impossible to retain the candidature of some people. . . it's not the world's most desirable job."

Bissell admitted that the initial stages of selection would probably be effectively open since everybody could guess who was under consideration.

However, the president was adamant on the final stages being held in secret.

City defers proposal banning co-ops

By VALERIE CHAVOSSY

A proposal banning co-operative houses and communes from residential areas was deferred at a public meeting of the city Buildings and Development Committee Monday night.

In the opinion of alderman John Sewell, had the proposal come to a vote, it would have been defeated by a margin of 4-3, possibly 5-2.

Among those politicians opposing the motion were Tom Wardell and Sewell.

"The problem people seem to have is with the condition of houses," said Sewell. "Since existing bylaws are adequate in dealing with these, passing another law (to regulate the number of unrelated persons in a single family dwelling) would be no solution."

The committee discussed the pros and cons for two and half hours until Alderman Ying Hope suggested that they defer the vote because he knew of other people who would be prepared to present further opinions. The issue comes up for discussion and voting again on November 23, 8 p.m. at City Hall.

Davis supports study of crisis at Laurentian

Dr. G. Hagey, former administrative president of the University of Waterloo has been asked to participate in a government-supported study of the governmental crisis at Laurentian University in Sudbury.

A delegation of student and faculty representatives from the Laurentian Senate and Students' General Association yesterday met with University Affairs Minister William Davis to discuss the proposal for a study into the problems which have shut down the university twice since last spring.

In the meeting, Davis told the delegation that the proposed study would be submitted to the Laurentian Community and would not constitute a government-imposed solution. Hagey, when approached by the minister, had requested that he be allowed to make a preliminary visit to the Laurentian campus to size up the situation and determine whether he felt he could contribute to a settlement and how this could best be achieved.

The basis of the Laurentian crisis has been the challenging of the power of the Board of Governors who have almost complete control of Laurentian's affairs. Students and faculty have proposed reforms to limit these powers by strengthening the powers of the Senate.

Most of the delegation expressed their wish to have faculty, lay, and possibly student membership on the team which would conduct the proposed study.

Students lose (again)

One month ago, the Students' Administrative Council decided to knuckle under to pressure from Simcoe Hall and accept five seats on the president's council.

One of the arguments for doing this was that this was the only way students could have their voice heard in selection of a new university president.

Round one was lost Monday.

Five students turned up to take their seats on the president's council and to discuss the composition of a search committee to select a new president.

But they didn't get far. They had no strategy and little idea of what they hoped to push for.

The initial student proposal (see our front page story) which passed by a straw vote, had to be set forth and defended by a student who was not a member of the president's council.

Students were steamrollered all the way through the meeting, through to the final decision about who should pick a new president.

The final outcome was a committee which doesn't even have a majority of faculty and students on it, a direct rupture with major principle of the Commission on University Government Report.

Putting students on the president's council has not put students into any kind of effective political position. The only beneficiaries are administrators and faculty who can use these students to legitimize their decisions.

REVIEW OF THE PRESS

The Canadian press has given federal authorities a lot of help in conjuring up an atmosphere of hysteria in Canada in the last two weeks.

As soon as Trudeau imposed the War Measures Act, newspapers fell over themselves in the rush to justify his actions.

Un-named "informants" and "police officials" were quoted in stories attempting to spread the idea that, as one Toronto paper said, the FLQ kidnapping was "part of a bigger conspiracy designed by key strategists to escalate into a full-scale bloody revolt."

They also rushed to convert Pierre Elliott Trudeau, from the playboy politician the press first created, into the Statesman of the Nation.

Roy Shields, writing in The Telegram on Trudeau's TV appearance the evening after he sent the Canadian army into Quebec, gushed:

"It was the Prime Minister's finest hour. He seemed older, his face more chilled and his eyes so remarkably blue that they took on a special steel hue. His suit was dark and conservative, and in his lapel he wore a white carnation."

The wistful comparison with Churchill was rather obvious, but in his excited adulation Shields went even further:

"He made you proud to be a Canadian... He was the right man with the right words at a time of great trial"

Getting the CBC to fall into line behind Trudeau was no problem. The CBC president, George Davidson, simply issued an order to his employees not to give the mounting crisis in Quebec any undue publicity. Coupled with the fact that many separatist-leaning CBC reporters in French Canada were among the first to be picked up in the mass arrests, this was enough to get CBC people in line, right behind the government.

But as the Canadian press leaped to the defence of the nation and the side of the prime minister, it forgot one important thing.

It forgot that the function of the press is to communicate information, not hysteria. Trudeau maintains that the public now possesses all the facts it needs to understand why the government took the emergency steps it did. Yet not a shred of evidence has been published anywhere to back up any of his wild claims.

Conveniently, the press has ignored this.

Even such a conservative-minded personage as U of T President Claude Bissell agrees that the government's actions should be judged in terms of "factual information" and he admits that he doesn't know just what the facts are.

When Marchand, and then Drapeau, for instance, accused the Montreal coalition of community groups, the Front pour l'Action Politique, of being an FLQ "front", Canadian newspapers did not pause to consider the laws of libel. They spread these allegations all over their front pages without attempting to determine the accuracy of the charges.

One simple example of the hysteria promoted by the daily press is provided by the Toronto Telegram, which ran huge front page headlines proclaiming that Pierre Laporte had been tortured before his death. When the official autopsy report came out, showing this was not true, The Telegram failed to give the story the same play.

The behaviour of the press has made it possible for Trudeau to intimidate Canadians by advancing unsubstantiated accusations. By placing full trust in government authorities, the press has made it almost impossible for most Canadians to reach any conclusion except that Trudeau must be right because he says so.

Many newspaper reporters don't buy this policy. Thirty-nine reporters at the Quebec City Daily, Le Soleil, for instance, signed a statement protesting the paper's hysterical tone and its failure to examine the real roots of the upheavals in Quebec.

In Canada newspapers, like all major social institutions, are controlled by and operated for the benefit of the ruling classes. That's why it's not surprising to find the Canadian press on the side of the federal authorities in their attempt to crush all groups dedicated to radical social change by identifying them as supporters of terrorism and violence.

How the city greets citizens

By GORD FLOYD

Last week members of the Riverdale Community Organization attended a meeting with the politicians who run our city. The way in which the politicians responded is remarkably reminiscent of the irresponsible manner in which Jean Drapeau, the mayor of Montreal, has behaved towards an alliance of community groups in his city, the Front pour l'Action Politique.

The Riverdale Community Organization went to the City Executive Committee last Wednesday for some support. Their request involved no money, only a letter of recommendation to the federal government, which would give them access to $28,000 already promised them.

They finally got the executive's grudging support, but not without a bitter, and occasionally vicious fight.

It was evident that no one on the executive approved of the organization, which has been funded since its inception a year ago with city monies. It was attacked by Alderman Pickett, Rotenberg, O'Donoghue, and most vociferously, Mayor William Dennison.

Dennison understood nothing. The following is an excerpt from a heated exchange (with frequent audience disruptions) between the Mayor and the President of RCO, Mrs. Consuelo Leslie.

Dennison: You believe that any group that seizes power is the democratic ruling group?

Leslie: We believe that we should work with existing forms of government.

D.: You are suggesting a new type of democracy?

L.: Not new. New to you perhaps. We are suggesting an extension of the present type of democracy to the grass roots.

D.: Do you consider it's money to use the democratic process — to have the courage to run for alderman?

L.: We are exercising the democratic process.

Perhaps one of the key questions during the session was placed by Rotenberg. In reference to that part of the RCO brief stating that among its aims was protection of the citizens of Riverdale against arbitrary decisions, Rotenberg wanted to know if City Council decisions were considered arbitrary. The President's reply that this was sometimes so, could not have created greater furor had it been accompanied by fireworks.

The other Ward 8 alderman, Tom Clifford, though not on the Executive Committee, was permitted to speak long enough to say that he agreed with the second part of Beavis' motion, but that he had a number of objections to the group. He then proceeded to present the Dennison theory of aldermanic duties, encompassing such functions as fixing streetlights, unblocking sewers, etc. He concluded that "we (Beavis and Clifford) have done everything we can and will continue to do everything we can for Ward 8."

But Dennison continued to fume: Dennison: You are suggesting that you have lost faith in the democratic process?

Leslie: The voice of the little people is suppressed by the system as it now operates.

D.: You are suggesting a dual democratic government?

L.: We are suggesting a real representation of the people.

D.: That's what Mao said when he organized the Red Guard.

Right on?

How the faculty is disenfranchising us

Last summer during the first three days in June a momentous series of meetings occurred — history was made — but students working in a vacuum were unable to win their rights even though they won the debate.

On June 1, 2 and 3, 40 students who sat on the University Wide Committee together with 110 assorted faculty, administrators, board of governors types, alumni and support staff, were powerless to stop the UWC from throwing out the idea of parity and the principles of the Report of the Commission on University Government.

The Faculty Council of Arts and Science may have just further disenfranchised the students of this university if they let it. Now, unlike last summer, the campus is alive with rational human beings who will not allow the injustices of the University-Wide Committee to be extended to their own faculty.

On Monday afternoon of this week after sitting through one and a half hours of the same type of inane debate that went on at U.W.C., I resigned from the Faculty Council of Arts and Science. I concluded that the faculty of this university do not want effective student participation in decision-making. They feel that one student to eight professors (political economy and mathematics staff-student ratios) is quite fair. The only role those students have is to legitimize the decisions of the council and provide a good set of committee workshorses.

(I hope all of you can see at some time in your lives a bit of the frustration that I felt at that meeting because then maybe you will understand my difficulty in writing this letter)

The Faculty Council is probably the most important body to you — the Arts and Science undergraduate. It is responsible for the New Programme, final acceptance of all marking schemes, petitions and standings.

For instance, this summer, when approving marks in various courses, the council decided to throw out the marks which students and faculty in one Innis College course had cooperatively arrived at.

In other words it is basically the final tribunal and as such is the most important place to have strong student representation. You are important. This university exists to serve the students so I will not sit on that body as one of 34 students out of a total of 169 unless and until someone like you can prove to me that it is not the right of a student to an equal say with the faculty in matters that profoundly affect student lives.

"Students are permitted to talk all they want so long as their speech has no consequences".

Mario Savio, Berkeley.

I do not want that statement to be true here in Toronto. Let the faculty know that what we say has consequence and that those consequences are action.

How you can help — run Sociology Dept.

The Sociology Department is one of the few departments in this campus which has followed the principles set down in the CUG report; namely, parity between staff and students on important decision-making bodies. Theoretically, sociology students have in their hands the power to make important changes which could make the learning process more suitable to the needs of students.

The Sociology Students' Union has been organizing an election for the 17 undergraduate members of the Sociology Departmental Assembly on the St. George Campus.

The Departmental Assembly is the final decision-making body on departmental policy. After visiting some 40 classes we are still quite short of candidates. I personally feel that student disinterest in this election results largely from a general attitude of "So What! What difference does a new Sociology Departmental Assembly make to my life?" The answer is that it can make a hell of a lot to your daily life here at U of T. To fill in that blank box of generalities I am listing here a few proposals for your consideration:

- limiting lectures to 1 per week (this was proposed in the 1967 MacPherson report which also eliminated the old honor system)

- more student participation in the planning process of specific courses at the beginning of each year.

- the addition of some half-year courses dealing with specific social issues e.g. The Drug Scene, Alienation in Modern Society, Youth as a Catalyst for Social Change.

The Sociology Student Union is having an important meeting today at 12:00, S.S. 1021 when we will be organizing this year's executive and planning-activities such as film series or seminars.

Canada isn't Greece say students in UK

I am from a group of Canadians (both English and French) who are temporary residents in Great Britain and who categorically oppose the suspension of civil rights in Canada and the ensuing political repression. Ad Hoc committees are being formed and we intend to participate in the fight against the police state in Canada and Quebec.

Among other things, we intend to do, we could arrange for the printing here of posters, buttons or any kind of political literature you may wish to distribute, in case it would be difficult to have these jobs done in Canada. Such kinds of publicity may be necessary to show the seriousness of the situation and to organize a peaceful (whether legal or not) resistance against political repression. You can contact us for any order of publicity material you may need.

For the time being, you can contact us by writing to me at my address, London House, Mecklenburg Square, London, WC1UK.

Please make sure that this letter is circulated as widely as possible. We have to show our government that Canada isn't Greece, Spain, or Czechoslovakia.

And now, the news:

To all my stoned friends—
(i.e. to the cosmic spectators, to those for whom the events of the last two weeks are just another Forsythe Saga. All the world's a film and we are just the audience in it.)

It won't go away, you know.

What won't?
The world won't go away.
What world?

Interviewer — What do you think the program is about?

Man-in-the-street — You mean the plot?

Interviewer — Is that what it's about?

The Algerians are building a statue to the Second American Revolution and the Second American Civil War. Out of the Sahara emerges this three-headed sphinx: Cleaver, Dohrn and Leary. What would Lenin have made of that symbol-in-exile? (More after reading Hegel in 1915 than before, I'll bet.)

(To all political prisoners: LEAVE HOME).

So the Quebecois have opened up a second front of revolutionary struggle on this Continent, just like Vallieres predicted. If that doesn't make sense, close your eyes and imagine what would happen if they did pull back the troops and release all political prisoners. What do you see? — chaos, death, blood in the streets? Or a general strike of workers and students followed by the reconvening of the National Assembly in Quebec followed by a declaration of independence, expropriation of Anglo-American business and a long and complicated social/political process through which sections of the population bargain and struggle with one another over how to proceed. . . . ?

What is the Canadian Government afraid of?

What would have happened if the FLQ had succeeded in kidnapping not an obscure British trade official (you think commerce is neutral?) but the Consul-General of the United States in Quebec?

Sorry, Hamlet: it's business as usual and you're not expected to get out of your head. We'll tell the world to go away and play with the stars and leave us alone to untangle the surrounding area of darkness in which we plot our lives.

What do you think moves in the darkness?

- Evil (St. Augustine)
- the unconscious (Freud, Durkheim, Althusser)
- Absurdity (Camus)
- Nothing (the "Left").

It's raining. Who'll stop the rain? Woodstock — islands unconnected by causeways. And please, world, stop shaking the room whose walls are Sight-and-sound and CHUM-FM and a stereo and warm colours and familiar shapes and surfaces and skin and flesh and we've got to get back to the garden.

Every cave is a grave. Every room is a womb (Norman O Brown).

Change your head — but how do you think 'heads' change? And what is a 'head'?

At half-time, our feet on the table a beer can in one hand a joint in the other we discuss the latest play in the play-off between the Trou d'eau Troopers and the Quebec FLQ. Aside from strategy there is the question of aesthetics: did Trudeau or the FLQ play dirty? But in this game, there is a struggle over who makes the rules. Where's the referee? — the State is the only philosopher. Vraiment.

There really is a language problem. Suppose you spoke and thought in a language of real problems, of material reality, and they put you in a work-situation where they forced you to talk a language of abstract categories, myths and mystifications. Bill 63 ("for the promotion of the French language") gave people the right to be educated in either language. But to get a job you have to speak English, because of who controls the factories and institutions.

False analogy? It's all a question of interpretation. We need interpreters.

(Sorry to keep flipping channels, but I'm not sure I like any of the programs. Let's go outside. . .)

And now, the news.

"It was reported yesterday that a group of unknown intellectual bandits kidnapped an Idea in the Department of Philosophy at the University of Toronto.

"The kidnapers were prepared to return the Idea back to the Department (or to any other group of intellectuals) in return for the release of 22 million political prisoners in the country called Canada. The Department described the kidnapping as a "most barbaric act" and said that the terms of the ransom note were "unacceptable".

"They offered in return for the safe return of the Idea to the Department, safe conduct for the kidnapers to any Department of their choosing. The Chairman of the Philosophy Department, from his Headquarters in the building which houses the campus police, computers and the financial administration of the University, is said to be negotiating with the Departments of Political Economy and History both of which have indicated a willingness to give asylum to the kidnapers.

"In a later development this morning, two political science majors hijacked a jumbo-lecture and ordered the Lecturer to fly them to Cuba. There are over two hundred students on board, and fear has been expressed for their safety."

And now, over to Louis Macniece at the weather room:

"at last report it was still raining. Forecast for tomorrow: more rain. Outlook: rainy."

"We conclude this transmission with a recording of Oh Canada sung by the combined choirs of Westmount, Forest Hill, the QPP, the Van Doos, and a handful of rather bedraggled patriotic citizens. They are accompanied on the piano-forte by Richard Milhous Nixon. . ."

Oh Canada. Oh Canada. Oh Canada. Oh Canada. Oh Canada.

'We are a proud country'

Concerning your publication on Monday, October 19, 1970, we would like to make a few comments. We do not feel that The Varsity is a good newspaper, and it is for this reason that we have hesitated to pass comment before.

However, when we face the particular crisis that Canada is in, we feel that it is time to stand up and speak out against anybody who presents obviously biased reports, or anybody who supports the behaviour of some of the demented perverts who become the members of the Front de Liberation du Quebec.

On the first page there was a report about a M. Fudge and a M. Glover who were temporarily arrested and detained, but not kept in jail. The police, we imagine, felt that Fudge and Glover supported the FLQ, and under the War Measures Act, they agree to the terrorist activities, and ought to be declared enemies of the state.

We also refer to your other article entitled, "All Canadians Affected by Law" on page one:

"But at 4:01 a.m. he became a criminal simply because of his membership in the organization."

Yes, he is a criminal, in response to your obviously opinionated and biased report. If he supports the FLQ he is a criminal. We don't want our tax money to go into the development of buildings only to have some group destroy it with dynamite. There is an organization which cannot promote itself democratically, a group which kidnaps and consorts to murder, in order to get their manifesto published. Yes, anyone who supports that kind of destructive group is a criminal. According to Trudeau, the FLQ has no mandate but terror, no solution but murder. They are beneath contempt. We couldn't agree more.

We are a proud country and we ARE big enough for dissension and protest, but only by democratic methods. The War Measures Act was introduced not to make Canada a police state in which no dissension or protest can occur, but to rid us of the cold-blooded murderous disease that calls itself the FLQ.

Gary Robertson (II Vic), John Goddard (SGS), Maureen Kaukinen (IV Vic), Scott Walker (III Vic), Carole Peck (II Vic), Alayne Marr (I Vic), James Thompson (IV Vic), Gordon Whitely (IV Vic), Karen Campbell (II Vic).

(Ed. note.) What the authors of the above letter call "your obviously opinionated and biased report" is almost verbatim the same couple of lines which appeared Friday Oct. 16 on the front page of the Toronto Star. Sometimes, it seems, even reality is "biased".

Further, it is a matter of fact that neither The Varsity nor the Toronto Star supports "the behaviour of some of the demented perverts who become the members of the FLQ."

The real Drop in the Bucket

What is the real story behind the "Just a Drop in the Bucket" article that appeared in The Varsity on Monday? It seems according to the author, Mr. Conlogue, that it is now wrong to assist in international education. Mr. Conlogue seems to have his obviously strong sentiments of imperialism disastrously mixed with an attempt to do something worthwhile on this campus.

This campaign is not designed, to paraphrase Mr. Conlogue, "for the wholesale importation of Western Culture into the Third World so as to destroy native initiative."

The whole approach and theme of the "Just a Drop in the Bucket Campaign" is summed up in the following:

GIVE A MAN A FISH AND HE WILL EAT FOR A DAY.

TEACH HIM HOW TO FISH AND HE WILL EAT FOR A LIFETIME.

—Coady Institute Motto
H. G. Wells once wrote that human history was "a race between education and catastrophe." The "Drop in the Bucket Campaign" is a student project to assist in the winning of this race.

Students, having always been strong advocates of social change, and realizing that this year has been proclaimed by the United Nations as International Education Year, have decided to attempt in a positive manner to effect some small alleviation of the vast and appalling world educational problems.

To achieve this, students from 33 campuses across Canada have organized and will be undertaking a week long campaign to raise funds for international education programs. It is hoped that each student in Canada as well as each person in the community, will donate 25 cents towards the cause. To our standard of living, a quarter — two bits — is "just a drop in the bucket," but, to citizens in Africa, India, South America, Turkey, it can mean a brighter future through education. The actual University of Toronto campaign will run, November 7-14, and will culminate on the weekend of the College Bowl with an open air dance at Nathan Phillips Square on November 20 and the College Bowl Game and Parade on November 21.

"Vast and appalling world educational problems" is a catchy phrase which seeks to generalize, but consider these as specifics:

- o Nine hundred million children live in developing areas of the world.
- o One out of two of these children will receive no formal education at all.
- o 45% will not receive even primary school education.
- o one third of the human race is hopelessly illiterate.

CanSave has incorporated an element of education in almost every program in over 26 countries around the world — day care centres, basic schools, primary schools, vocational and agricultural training, aid in the form of building and equipment grants, teacher training, nutritional guidance and updating. These programs are designed to "help them to help themselves."

Message to the Staff and Students of the University

You will recall that I announced in April of this year the establishment of a Presidential Advisory Committee "to consider the nature and extent of university social welfare responsibilities in their broadest context". Since that time a group consisting of the administration and the existing welfare services has been meeting to discuss the question of a possible composition and terms of reference for this committee.

This group has now reached a resolution of these problems, with which I am in complete agreement.

The composition of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Social Responsibilities will be as follows:

- 3 teaching staff
- 3 students (1 undergraduate; 1 graduate;
1 part-time degree student)
- 2 support staff
- 2 administrators
- 1 representative of the existing welfare service in the university

The general terms of reference that I outlined when I announced the establishment of the committee will include discussion of the following topics:

(a) General University Policy Relating to Social Responsibilities

(e.g. the provision of services such as nurseries and day-care centres, the provision of subsidized or free tuition for staff members' children, discrimination against various groups, including women, in hiring, admissions and services provided, etc.)

(b) University Community Services

- (1) Student-oriented services, such as University Health Service, Career Counselling and Placement Centre, the Advisory Bureau and other counselling services on campus, the International Student Centre, the Housing Service and university-operated housing on or off campus, Hart House chaplain service, athletic associations, etc.
- (11) General Community Services, including cafeteria and food services, police and security services, publication of university newsletters and bulletins, the aesthetic environment of the university, provision of social/academic centres and of social facilities in academic buildings, etc.

(c) Relationship of the University to the City and Surrounding Community including such matters as use of university-owned property in the community, involvement of the university in city and community decisions affecting the university etc.

This is by no means an exhaustive list of matters which might be discussed as possible social responsibilities of the university. The committee will also welcome any matters that are brought to it for consideration by members of the university at any time during its deliberations.

It is expected that the committee will give consideration to the long-term involvement of the university in many of these areas of social responsibility. This necessarily involves analysis of the university's present and past commitments in these areas, and the development of a philosophy for the future on which decisions about priorities in the use of funds can be based and which will give the university sufficient flexibility to deal with new and evolving social responsibilities. I expect that the Committee will also consider the financial basis of the services which the university is committed to provide, (i.e. partial university subsidy, total self-support, etc.), and the extent to which the university, rather than the public at large, can be expected to find funds for the additional social responsibilities which it may take upon itself as part of its responsibility to the public in the area of higher education.

C. T. Bissell,
President.

VIOLENCE

By BILL MacVICAR

On Violence
Hannah Arendt, Harcourt, Brace & World,
$1.95

A contribution from Hannah Arendt is welcome in a time when political comment is as casual as cocktail chatter, for she's been there — in Hitler's legislated Hell; her impeccable academic credentials are reinforced by these existential ones.

The book would be worthwhile if its sole merit were its precise evaluations of terms grown treacherously slippery with glib use: force, power, authority, strength, violence. As dispassionately as a navigator plotting vectors she discusses the interplay of these social dynamics and predicts their political resultants. Refuting Chairman Mao, she maintains that political power and gun barrels are incompatible.

Her sober analyses are sprinkled with astute notes on recent history. She observes that the New Left, perhaps unwittingly, has abandoned classic Marxism for the anarchism of Bakunin and the existential rebellion of Fanon.

Miss Arendt has relied on journalism for documentation of very recent events. Frequent references to the People's Park incident at Berkeley are drawn from that ecstatically leftist team, Wolin and Schaar. On Violence is thus open to attack from the right and center, even by those acknowledging the author's scrupulousness, as biased in its foundations; such demurrals will not imperil the essay's immense value.

It is not inconceivable that the word "violence" was uttered by every adult Canadian within the past weeks; in how many facile condemnations, in how many sham rationalizations is anyone's guess. Everyone concerned, beyond the sheer thrill of the grisly and unexpected, with the serious issues raised, should march his thoughts under Arendt's klieg-light analysis.

"HELLO ... "SIMCOE HALL? "HOW ABOUT A FILM DEPARTMENT?"

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

ROOM 104 OF UNIVERSITY COLLEGE serves quite adequately as a small movie theatre for 100 people. Except for one thing — it has an unnecessarily large screen that stretches from ceiling to floor and from wall to wall. As a result, the moving image fills only a fraction of the available area. The rest is wasted.

The auditorium of the New Medical Sciences Building serves quite adequately as a large movie theater for 500 people. Except for one thing — it has an undersized screen that cannot take the full image of a good set of Cinemascope lenses. The cost of ripping out the old screen and building in a new one will be about ten times that of installing the proper large screen in the first place.

These and other interesting bits of information, discrepancies and red tape crossed my path during what started out as a not too unusual feature story on campus film. Originally intending to present little more than a glorified who's-who of university cinema, I slowly discovered that such an article could not ignore the obvious and undeniable need for a properly administered and co-ordinated Department of Film at the University of Toronto.

The study and making of movies by students is by no means a novel undertaking. U.C.L.A., for example, boasts some of the finest courses available in film production, direction, editing, camerawork, etc. Closer to home, one need look only to the highly successful North York film project to realize what dynamic potential Toronto has in the way of young movie-artists.

The U of T administration may be correct to some extent in claiming that film production is a technical skill best cultivated at institutions such as Ryerson. But because cinema theory is now recognized as a bona fide academic study of art, this statement can in no way justify the over-enrollment and inefficiency plaguing what pitifully few courses in film aesthetics and history exist at all.

At present, a number of departments offer courses in film only to supplement work in fields such as French or graduate drama. This is not to say that these movie courses are valueless. On the contrary, some appear so interesting, the instructors have had to turn away literally hundreds of students due to a lack of room and projection personnel.

PETER MORGAN'S CLASS IN ENG 375, "Poetry and Film", is doing an extensive screening of such silent classics as D.W. Griffith's Intolerance, Wiene's Cabinet of Dr. Caligari and Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin. These movies are then compared to the attempts of man to express himself "cinematically" before the invention of the camera, through sculpture, painting and especially poetry. Teaching this class involves squeezing 30 students into a cramped University College room designed to hold the expected 10 to 15 registrants.

"The Theology of Ingmar Bergman", offered by the Religious Studies Department at St. Michael's College, was over-enrolled as soon as the calendars were distributed last April. Only a chosen few will be able to complete a comprehensive study of films including Wild Strawberries, Through a Glass Darkly and Persona.

At Innis College, Joe Medjuck is in Charge of CIN 204, "Modern Arts (The Cinema)", which revolves around the work of D.W. Griffith, Jean-Luc Godard and Alfred Hitchcock. Believing that "at university we're still too linearly and literally oriented", Medjuck hopes his programme will teach his students how to see. In September that sounded like a good idea to 300 people. But 225 of them were turned away.

IT IS THIS GREAT UNQUENCHED student interest in movies that accounts in part for the relatively large number of participants (about 25) in the U of T film-making club, the Student Film Facility. Organized by David Peebles, (IV, UC) the Facility is now operating on a $2000 SAC grant which will be used to buy basic pieces of equipment.

Because these amateurs still need a definite campus headquarters, Peebles is trying to get an editing room in Hart House, where, he hopes, film will eventually become another standing committee. With a little luck, the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Future Role of Hart House will create enough of a restructuring shake-up that requests for a film room will be reviewed and granted.

In the meantime, Peebles is looking into the possibilities of incorporating as an independent Canadian film company based in Toronto. Such a move could result in substantial support from the federal government, which has lately become interested in promoting a film industry in Canada.

The Facility has been slow in getting started mainly due to a lack of operating funds. Although he can manage for a while with the SAC grant, Peebles estimates his eventual inventory needs at $20,000, since he is determined to have the Student Film Facility own all its own equipment.

"Renting just won't work", he explains. "Having the equipment on hand is a terrific impetus because it means that anyone can walk in and be taught how to make a film. We have to have total flexibility, which essentially boils down to the fact that we can't stand in line for someone else's camera."

THE UPSURGE OF INTEREST IN THE CINEMA has resulted not only in film production, but also in film festivals and weekly screenings. "And the Second Horseman Was War," a teach-in sponsored by Hart House and held this week at O.I.S.E., devotes five consecutive evenings to the examination of war through film-makers' eyes. The series aims for an international scope in such movies as Ballad of a Soldier (USSR) and Thou Shalt Not Kill (France-Germany), with a balance between feature presentations like Fail-Safe and short subjects including Norman McLaren's Neighbours.

The University College Literary and Athletic Society has also begun to dabble in film. Under the direction of Sima Godfrey (III, UC), the weekly series entitled "Comparative Literature on Film" has succeeded beyond all expectation. Instead of being stuck with an expected $200 deficit, the U.C. Lit has sold all 250 series tickets and always fills to capacity at least one of the two Tuesday-evening screenings.

It is not only films like Rasbomon, Finnegan's Wake and the Russian Hamlet, or discussion groups led by Mr. S. Martineau, Mr. P. Marinelli or Marshall McLuhan, that account for the good fortune of this series. A great deal of credit goes to its organizer, Sima Godfrey; to Principal Hallett of U.C. for granting free use of UC 104; and to the U.C. Lit for investing $1000 in the project. All three were interested in providing a worthwhile film programme of value and interest to students.

UNFORTUNATELY, THINGS ARE NOT QUITE SO ROSY at Innis, according to that college's film society director, George Edelstein. With only a $200 SAC grant, a $500 SAC loan and no assistance at all from Innis, Edelstein and his co-ordinator, John Lang, have been on the go since September, trying to stretch each penny into discussion groups, a library of film books, free daily screenings and a weekly movie series.

The line-up of Innis' Monday-evening shows is quite impressive, with the entire year's programme sub-divided, for purposes of analysis and comparison, into eight sub-series. To be seen this season, for example, are Truffaut's Shoot the Piano Player in the "Father and Son" category, La Grande Illusion in the "Quadruple Renoir" series, and Peckinpah's Ride the High Country in the "Modern Classics" section.

With 200 series members and a group of 25 or 30 lunch-hour devotees, Edelstein and Lang feel their much-needed service is being quite satisfactorily performed in light of the shortcomings of campus screening facilities. To some extent, the Innis Film Society also allows students with either a casual or a dedicated interest in movies to study some of the material that might have otherwise been available in a comprehensive cinema course.

"A LOT OF KIDS COME HERE WITHOUT ANY IDEA of what they really want to do", says Edelstein. "Of this group, some think they might want to go into movies. But it's a big decision to go to a technical school like Ryerson to cultivate a casual interest that might not make a good career. They should be able to fully explore that interest here, but the U of T doesn't offer anything significant in cinema other than interest groups and the odd course. And here the university is, without the facilities and without the courses, but with hundreds of kids crying to get into film".

On November 10, 1969, seven instructors of various U of T departments and colleges under the direction of Innis' Joe Medjuck officially expressed the need for establishing a film department in their Report of the Committee on Cinema Courses. The ideal recommendation suggested that "a department of cinema be established within the Faculty of Arts and Science with its own staff and adequate film-making and film-showing equipment to offer a number of courses on the history, aesthetics and social implications of the cinema; this department would assist already existing departments in giving courses in the cinema or using film as a teaching aid".

In July, 1970, the U of T, in an attempt to co-ordinate campus media facilities, rather than to directly implement the aforementioned report, created the Instructional Media Center at 123 St. George. Its director, Douglas Todgham, is presently supervising a university-wide media inventory, the operation of Scarborough College's television center and the university instructional services involving film, videotape, photography and graphic art.

David Smithers, the Media Center's film co-ordinator, does point out, however, that the institution of a film department will probably be hastened by his and Todgham's work in centralizing campus film rentals, advising professors on viewing areas and issuing portable equipment. In addition, he suggests that people interested in the cinema can use the Media Center to present a united front to get the administration working toward improved film courses.

"SAC and course unions are one way of achieving this goal", notes Smithers, "but they're pressure politics, and we've all seen that such tactics don't work very well around the university. Students have to go to people like Joe Medjuck and say, 'Can't we do something?' Which is the best way to act? Briefs can be written and submitted through these instructors to a committee. But above all, the students must get behind these people not as statistics, but as real voices."

According to Medjuck, his Report of the Committee on Cinema Courses has been all but disregarded in the past year. Nevertheless, he and the other movie instructors plan to attend a meeting on November 2 at the Media Center to see what headway can be made.

BUT FOR THE TIME BEING, U of T students must do without a four-year film programme, such as is currently offered at York University. They must continue to watch movies in cavernous Sidney Smith lecture halls, equipped with a couple of finny speakers and a ridiculously short projector-to-screen distance. They must contend with rooms like New College 1016, where the outlets are at the side of the room and the projector must be placed in the middle of the audience. They must be satisfied with the few, though well-planned and executed, film series and festivals to achieve a good over-all view of the cinema.

One point must be made clear. Film courses are not the only ones subject to over-enrollment, over-crowded classrooms, a shortage of qualified professors and a need for improved equipment and facilities. In addition, a film department will not solve these problems overnight, just as the English, Philosophy or Zoology Departments have not achieved total self-improvement.

However, a film department will be able to satisfy the needs of a great number of obviously existing movie enthusiasts who wish to become involved in one of history's most imaginative and dynamic art forms. Such a cinema discipline could be a lot more efficient and thorough in organization and procedure than the Media Center, which is even now burdened with many more projects than film.

It's about time the University of Toronto realized that film, like pictures and words, can be both an aid in teaching a variety of subjects, and also an artistic medium which in itself deserves to be seriously studied.

Hair dying, cast lacks life, audiences thin

By ISSY DUBINSKY

After re-viewing Hair on Sunday night I can't help but predict that the show will soon close. The near empty theatre bore witness to the fact that even the show's financial successes have dimmed.

Artistically, the show now is a mere shadow of what it once was. Hair is a production which needs to exude enthusiasm, but the cast seem too tired to try. In fact, there were frequent occasions when members of the cast had difficulty summoning the energy to sing and instead were seen with jaws drooped and mouths agape.

Politically and sexually, the play has become almost passe and so even the middle-class suit and tie people could not manage to be offended by it.

Further, plagued by frequent personnel problems and cast changes the show finds itself relying on personnel who were once second best for major roles. Thus, I saw a lifeless Sheila played by Shelley Sommers and a senseless Woof played by Freddie Nicolaidis. Robin White and Paul Ryan as Berger and Claude respectively were good, but still could not command the same empathy as when the show was in its earlier stages.

Technically, the show has always been weak. The Royal Alex is simply too confining and traditional a theatre for a show of this nature. The set has been simplified somewhat, but this only serves to make the show look more out of place.

The musical mastery that once was Hair has been destroyed by an uncontrolled pit band that seems intent on blasting the roof off the theatre and the players with it. As a result, the sound system breaks down at times.

This is not to say that Hair is now entirely without appeal. Harriet Cohen continues to be simply excellent. Wayne St. John, tho' no Rudy Brown, was engaging in the role of Hud, and Michael Rudder, tho' obscured in the tribe, exudes warmth and personality. Musically, the show is still a masterpiece, and such songs as 'Where Do I Go' and 'Three-Five-Zero-Zero' retain their haunting beauty.

Given a somewhat more free structure, which would allow the personalities of the cast to shine through and would tend to loosen up the play, a more liberating theater, a more controlled pit band, and some careful editing and price restructuring Hair could resume the high level of social and artistic respect it deserves.

If it is not to be given this needed freedom, let it close soon, for its continued existence in its present form is shattering a memory of a most memorable, together, contemporary artistic experience.

Cast makes Brel unwell

By LIB SPRY

Jacques Brel is a chansonnier who is able to reach down into our emotions, and just when we have relaxed into a state of happy nostalgia, he twists his fist into our guts with a statement of bitter reality. He is also a man who has the habit of speaking the truth.

His music and his words often contradict each other, so it is possible to be gently lulled into oblivion by the gaiety of the music, until suddenly the words become clear. In Carousel, for example, the horror of the words is there much earlier on than the change in the music. Jackie is another such song.

Brel's work is very personal, and for others to make it effective, especially in North America, demands an empathy with Brel, which the present cast of Jacques Brel is Alive and Well and Living in Paris is unfortunately lacking.

Brel's honesty with himself and with what he sees around him is now shown to its best advantage when wrapped up in the sugary wrapping of Tom Jones-like poses, and empty interpretations.

Emotional honesty is one of the hardest demands which an actor has to meet, but that honesty means the difference between true theatre (or true anything for that matter) and a faint facsimile of reality. Ultimately, good technique cannot save a show, although it can dazzle. In a piece such as Brel, emotional honesty is a necessity.

The present cast at the Playhouse are not able to meet the demands of their material. Only Arlene Meadows makes any attempt to reach below her larynx for her interpretation. Judy Landers, who took over from Elly Stone, has a beautiful voice, but her articulation made it often hard to hear the words. Brian McKay and Shawn Elliot were not overly prepossessing as Brel younger and older.

It is sad that the cast was unable to meet the demands made on them, because the content of the show is so fine. Rather than spending money on seeing it, I'd buy the record. The original cast seems to have got closer to Brel's truth. And if they posed as much as the present cast, you can't see them, and it won't impede your concentration on the material.

"What Do I Do Monday"

How to break loose from the totalitarian classroom

By TED WHITTAKER

FIRST, A FEW WORDS about how this new book about schools by John Holt, the American teacher-writer, differs from his other books, How Children Fail, How Children Learn, The Under-Achieving School. All these works are dedicated to finding ways to keep sane and learn, or teach, in the awful public schools or in humane little private schools parallel to them.

Usually the children mentioned are prepubescent, but Holt has worked with graduate students, and finds them as victimized by their educational history as are most elementary school children. The first three books deal primarily with Holt's experiences as a bad teacher becoming a good one; the first two are books of diaristic letters about the simple joys and terrors of good and bad education.

The Under-Achieving School was perhaps hustled into print. Mainly a collection of articles and speeches, it contains the start of Holt's explicit political belief that humane teaching and learning is essential to a decent society. Edgar Friedenberg has remarked that children who "grow up" asking permission to go to the bathroom are not to be expected to have a highly-developed sense of human rights when they become "adult".

What I Do Monday? is as much about tools and the works of other education writers as it is about Holt's own ideas. It contains 30 short chapters, most of which are about the title, a mathematical proof and a comprehensive bibliography on radical education. The bibliography has references to appropriate films and hardware, books and articles, as well as addresses of places and people to contact if you need help as teacher, parent, student, or horrified observer of the public schools. The whole list is useful to Canadians; Holt was in Toronto a few days ago, talking to teachers. This Magazine is About Schools gets his hearty approval, though he notes coyly its Canadian emphasis.

IN ONTARIO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS are in general much less totalitarian than the universities, which in turn are more sensible about human freedom than the high schools. All three can and must improve, and Holt offers eminently lucid and practical advice about how improvements might occur.

Anyone could take from What Do I Do Monday? something interesting to do with children, in school or out. Its genius is to propose viable and all-too-unnoticed connections between the banal fiddling each person does with words and numbers, and that real world which must shatter the walls of the classroom box.

This may not sound exciting in theory, but let me note a few ideas Holt mentions: taking class time to write or tape private thoughts, which don't often get expressed even to friends, let alone parents or teachers; increasing fluency by writing or speaking intelligibly and continuously for a given length of time; making detailed and self-exploratory lists of likes and dislikes, by free association.

ALL THESE STRATEGIES are devoted to keeping children free, helping them to "nibble" on the world and avoid the crazy-making strictures the schools place upon them, whether accidentally or by conscious malevolence. Holt quotes George Dennison (The Lives of Children) on jargon, with which the schools and the rest of society is raddled: "The man who speaks it... means to hold us at a distance; he means to preserve his speciality... He does not mean to draw near to us, or to empower us, but to stand over us and manipulate us."

It is the concern of Holt and other writers he discusses approvingly — Herbert Kohl, James Herndon, Daniel Fader, Frances Hawkins, Ivan Illich — to defeat this abstracting in human relationships and in the transfer of knowledge. Their rebellion is in favour of the sense that has become uncommon, and of magnanimity.

HE TAKES AS HIS GUIDE R. D. LAING, noting that though the Scottish psychiatrist doesn't write about "education" in particular, his conclusions are horribly germane. For example, teachers too often even today believe that they make children knowledgeable, and practically deny the student proper access to his own perceptions. Laing says: "The loss of the experience of an area of unqualified privacy, by its transformation into a quasi-public realm, is often one of the decisive changes associated with the process of going mad."

Such a statement may easily be applied to the concern of school authorities and other politicians with respect for something called authority, "order" in halls and classrooms, "standards" of dress and behaviour — especially when this concern is coupled with unconsciously schizophrenic unctious about its being "good training".

John Dewey has a marvellous statement to the effect that education isn't for life, it is life. (That is the lesson the dropout learns from school.) Anything less than such a whole is not education but rape of the mind and spirit, and it is to John Holt's credit that he shows ways to apprehend and use this wholeness, the birthright of the human being, his due.

Holt devotes a few chapters at the beginning of What Do I Do Monday? to a discussion of insanity, which often occurs as a reaction to the kind of cheapening, deceit and denial of experience daily practised on the inmates of our schools.

Women's group researching discrimination

By KATHRYN KEATE

"I should like to welcome you to the department. We've never had a lady philosopher before."

"Oh, so you're going to try and be an intellectual, eh?"

It's attitudes expressed in comments like these that have prompted a group of university women to investigate discrimination at the University of Toronto.

Made up of women in both graduate school and faculty, the group grew out of a questionnaire on the status of women at the university distributed to graduate students at registration.

Many of the more than 200 questionnaires completed expressed real anger and frustration with the attitude of university administrators towards women in academic life.

The group, which is tentatively called the Union of Graduate and Faculty Women, hopes to do research on discrimination against women in admissions, hirings, grants, and fellowships, as a preliminary to action on the departmental level.

The group also hopes to have a seminar on women in January, with discussions on such topics as stereotypes of women presented in literature, psychology, sociology, and history; the needs of academic women with regard to grants, daycare, pension and insurance plans; and results of the research done on the status of university women.

The first general meeting of the union will be held tomorrow at 7:

30 p.m. in the upstairs lounge of the GSU building at 16 Bancroft. Sympathetic males are welcome, too.

NDY teach-in

FLQ has succeeded: Harney

By ERIC MILLS

"The FLQ has succeeded beyond its wildest dreams" because of the strong reaction of the federal government, according to NDP national leadership contender John Harney.

"After these acts, Trudeau will neither be able to keep Quebec down, nor seduce it into remaining part of Canada."

Harney was speaking to a teach-in Saturday sponsored by the New Democratic Youth and attended by less than 40 people.

Organizers blamed police harassment of NDP members putting up posters and fear in the minds of the public for the poor attendance.

Earlier, graduate student Philip Resnick said the sending of over

5,000 troops to Quebec "has clinched the idea of independence in the minds of the youth of Quebec."

He predicted that within 10 possibly 15 years, independence will be achieved in Quebec.

Lawyer Alan Borovoy, general council for the Civil Liberties Union, charged that Canadians "are giving up our most vital liberties overnight on faith."

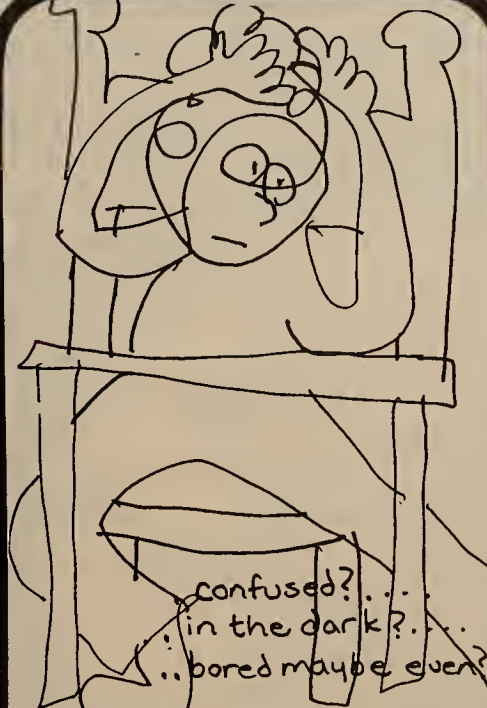

"People feel intimidated, especially the democratic left."

He attacked the use of the War Measures Act, saying that the Criminal Code seems adequate, but claimed only "doctrinaire libertarians claimed measures like this are never justified".

Works Committee halts street widening

By BEN FORSTER

St. Joseph Street has been saved — to an extent — from being turned into a feeder street.

A meeting of the city Public Works Committee this Monday morning was unable to decide whether the street should be widened. The Works Committee was unable to resolve two conflicting motions; one proposing that St. Joseph Street be widened by four feet, and the other asking that the street not be widened at all.

Originally, the street was to be widened as much as twelve feet. By virtue of the heavy traffic the street would then have carried, the St. Michaels College campus would have been cut in half.

Representatives from the College argued that as the street was heavily used by pedestrians, mostly students, any excessive widening of St. Joseph Street for the purpose of greater traffic flow would seriously impede students.

City rezoning postponed

A rezoning proposal threatening the downtown Chinese community has been postponed until residents of the area can be consulted.

The City Planning Board agreed yesterday to call a public meeting of the residents bounded by College and Queen Streets, University Avenue and McCaul St.

This area will become part of the downtown core if the recommendations of the City Planning Staff are accepted by the Board.

The proposal, which allows for highrise commercial buildings, presents a threat to the Chinese community in the area.

The Planning Board will decide on the time and place of the public meeting on November 10.

low the free flow of students to the library at the center of the block on the south side. It was also recommended that the speed limit be lowered to 25 mph, — as low as Provincial law will allow.

To make way for the expected traffic, the Works Committee recommended that parking be banned on the street, and also that St. Joseph be flared out at Bay, however, not as much as originally planned.

Construction on St. Joseph Street will be halted until spring, to allow the city to study the suggestions made, and giving the College one more year of seclusion from heavy traffic.

LSD to march for student rights

By LINDA McQUAIG

The League for Student Democracy is planning a protest at Queen's Park tomorrow at 4 p.m. to demand the democratization of the Ontario secondary school system.

The organization, involving students from over 50 secondary schools throughout southern Ontario, will present a brief to the Hon. William G. Davis, Minister of Education.

"Students do not relinquish their membership in society when they enter secondary school. As such they are entitled to the same rights as any other system," the students claim.

Their cause focuses on three main areas of concern: the student's right to determine his learning environment, to participate in the school government, and to hold certain freedoms.

They claim that the present school system is authoritarian, and thus defeats the spirit of learning as a "co-operative intellectual effort."

How can there be a co-operative effort when such divisions exist between staff and students, the students ask.

They are asking to be treated as human beings within the school system in the same way that they are in the society as a whole.

Outlining their rights as those put forward by the Canadian Bill of Rights — such as freedom of speech, assembly, publication and distribution — they claim that "membership in the school community does not take precedence over membership in the society."

A punishment which aims to humiliate the student, such as forcing a gum-chewing pupil to place the gum on his nose, is undemocratic according to the League.

They also challenge the present school system for "gearing its efforts towards efficiency, uniformity, and rigidity", as expressed by the Principal of Leamington High School when he said that "We turn out a product to pass examinations, to get jobs in industry — commercial and technical. You cannot beat success and I am rather inclined to believe that this is a successful school."

The students offer instead the system outlined by Carl Rogers in "Student Centered Teaching": "The goal of education is to assist the students to become individuals who are able to take self initiated action and to be responsible for these actions."

"You cannot teach another person, you can only help him to learn."

Poli Ec rejects seats

The Political Economy Course Union voted Monday not to send a representative to the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

It was felt that since students have been granted only 34 of the 169 seats on the Council the student vote will be impotent, whether or not Poli Ec sends representatives.

It was hoped that by refusing the seats offered them pressure might be brought on the administration to reconsider its decision not to grant students parity on the Council.

A second motion was passed in answer to the faculty demand that matters pertaining to the hiring and firing of staff, the budget, and academic criteria be excluded from the agenda of the faculty-student negotiating committee.

The Poli Ec faculty was meeting last night over the student proposals.

With chrome in short supply, the U.S. ban on importing the ore from Rhodesia seems to be bending, the U.S. News and World Report reports. The original ban "arose in a controversy over Rhodesian racial policy," but growth may take precedence over political principle.

Jean-Paul Sartre, left-wing intellectual leader in France, told a group of Renault automobile workers that they were "slaves" and "victims of bourgeois violence."

Sartre was supposed to appear as a defense witness for a young revolutionary leader on trial in Paris for inciting to riot, but he announced that he would "testify in the streets" instead.

Rising unemployment in mid-1970 struck most severely at the poor, the black and the young, according to the U.S. Labor Department.

Hardest hit of all were young black men, who are also the poorest.

Many indebted families living on low incomes appear to be using credit to supplement their inadequate income, the Senate poverty committee learned this week.

The U.S. Interior Department, in offering to lease 593,000 acres

Strong effort at Mac, gives Varsity OQAA rowing crown

By BILL ALLISON

The University of Toronto emerged from last Saturday's regatta in Hamilton as convincing winners of the OQAA rowing championships.

The winner was chosen on the basis of points accumulated throughout the season, and the final standings were as follows, Toronto 292, Western (perennial champions) 227, and Brock 204.

The lightweight race was between Toronto, Western, and Brock, though the latter two never did seriously threaten the leading Toronto boat.

The Senior Varsity race was a bitterly contested affair between Toronto and Western. Western led off the start, but by the 1000 meter mark their style had deteriorated and Blues eased past to win by a length.

Mac won the Junior Varsity, with Western second and Varsity third. Toronto and Western were ahead of MacMaster for most of the race, but Mac's strong finish won the event.

Toronto's Freshman crew was disqualified for leaving the assigned lane.

Next Saturday, the Eastern

Canadian Intercollegiate Rowing Championships are being held in St. Catharines on the Henley course. The races will be a regulation 2000 meters, which should be advantageous to the Toronto crews, who are in better condition than their opponents.

Beer-drinking contest organized for Saturday

The Engineers are off again on a free-for-all, frolicking expedition which is sure to produce spirited enthusiasm in the participants.

The name of the game is the Pub Rally which will take place this Saturday. The participants will each be given a route map in which they find directions to various pubs in the city. In each pub the competitors are to down three or four glasses of draught beer.

The one who passes all the required checkpoints and drinks the required amount in the shortest time will be declared the winner.

The maximum amount to be consumed will be about 16 glasses.

Registration fee is three dollars. Anyone can compete and registration will occur daily in front of Hart House from 12 p.m. to 2 p.m. or all day in the Engineering Stores.

Harrier team comes second in prep for OQAA championships

Cross-country running Blues had a dismal warmup for the OQAA finals Saturday in Waterloo as they lost to defending champion Guelph 47-58 last Saturday. Host team Waterloo was third with 59 only because seventh place finisher Paul Pearson disqualified himself for straying off the five mile course from time to time. Western and York finished fourth and fifth.

York's Dave Smith won the individual battle ahead of Waterloo's Brian Bisson and Dave Northey. Varsity finishers were Jim Smith (seventh), Brian Armstrong (eighth), Bob Knuckey (twelfth), Peter Pimm (fourteenth) and Norm Cummings (sixteenth).

Varsity's Glen Markle (above left) and McGill's Dave Fleiszer (above right) should provide Blues' football fans with plenty of action Saturday afternoon.

McGill game to feature rushing showdown

By LYNDON LITTLE

Nobody will argue with the old cliché that football is a team game. The fact remains, however, that individual battles often add a great deal of interest to any grid match-up.

When the McGill Redmen tangle with Blues this Saturday afternoon at Varsity Stadium, two of the league's premier running backs — Blues' Glen Markle and McGill's Dave Fleiszer — will be fighting and straining for every yard in a contest that will go a long way to deciding who wins the 1970 SIFL rushing crown.

Going into the game, the latest

OQAA stats show Fleiszer with 417 yards and Markle with 360. Both players had big games last weekend with Markle gaining 118 along the ground against a tough Western defense while Fleiszer picked up 130 in his team's loss to the Gaels.

One important factor should also be noted; Fleiszer's yardage has not added a single point to the McGill scoring column while Blues' Markle has scored 30 points on five touchdowns.

Fleiszer, of course, is the talented second-year medical student who was honored as Canada's top college player last year as he won both the SIFL rushing and touchdown titles while leading the Redmen to the Yates Cup.

At 6' 1" and 180 lbs., Fleiszer is not big as fullbacks go but the secret of his success is the amazing quickness with which he pops through the holes and also his exceptional balance.

He's a native of Ottawa where he starred at John Rennie Collegiate.

On the other hand, partly because of his versatility and partly because his six-year career with Blues has been interrupted by injuries, this is the first year that Markle has seriously challenged for league rushing honors.

Markle's first three years with Varsity, 1964 through '66, were spent as a fixture at corner linebacker. Then, a shoulder injury that made tackling difficult resulted in his shift to offense.

He picked up 199 yards in on 49 carries in '67 and 202 yards on 45 carried in '68.

He sat out last year to give his bad knees a rest.

This year, the Richview Collegiate grad has been the single constant factor in an otherwise chaotic backfield situation. He's been the only backfielder to start all five league games.

"I'm not much in the open field," Markle readily admits, but the almost certain two or three yards he can produce on a line smash is essential to any winning team.

That's especially true on this year's Blues squad were a "third-and-two" situation doesn't even rate a bat of the eyelash!

With opposition defenses having to respect the inside run, the remaining backfielders have found the going easier in many ways.

"It's quite simple," says head coach Ron Murphy, "Glen's running makes the rest of our offence go."

Interfac third division is still deadlocked

By STAN KOROLNEK

In a game that should have decided first place in the third division, Trinity and Forestry battled to an 8-8 tie yesterday. This was the second time these teams had drawn this season, and as a result they remained tied for first with identical 2-0-2 records.

Forestry had been heavily favoured in pre-season polls to win this division and Trinity had been lightly regarded. However, Trinity looked like anything but a weak team yesterday as they controlled much of this game and probably deserved to win.

Trinity scored the second time they had the ball when quarterback Dave Baker tossed a 45-yard bomb to John Simonton. With Larry Morley's convert Trinity led 7-0.

In the second quarter, Forestry chopped down the Trinity lead when Bob Giza returned a Trinity punt 50 yards for a major. Ham Faulkner's convert tied the score. (Ham's name ranks with great football names like Fair Hooker, Jeff Allen etc.)

In the second half the teams exchanged singles and the game ended deadlocked. Bruce Pamplin kicked the Forestry single and Herkler replied for Trinity.

Notes: The brother combination of Bob and Ray Giza was very effective for Forestry. John Simonton's running was strong feature of the Trinity attack.

Field hockey girls win season's first tourney

Varsity's perennial women's field hockey powerhouse it at it again! Although, according to their coach Miss van der Merwe, the team "did not play brilliantly", they still had enough to destroy the three teams they met in the tournament at Waterloo last weekend which represented the first half of the intercollegiate championship.

The Toronto field shinny girls defeated the McMaster maroon maids 3-0, the Guelph girl Gryphons 7-1 and the host Waterloo wicked hockey women 7-0.

Lorna Tanner led the Varsity attack with five goals while Sally Manning had four and Nan Flindall contributed a pair. Single went to Sandy Stevenson, Marilyn Richardson and Kim Fenton.

VOL. 91 — NO. 17
FRI., OCT. 30, 1970

All the signs indicate that life is rebelling against the oppressive forms into which it has been forced. The struggle for a 'new life' is taking place, although as inevitable at first, mainly in the form of the most severe disorganization, material and psychic, of individual and social life.

But if one understands the life process one has no reason to fear for the final outcome. A healthy individual who is sexually happy does not need an inhibiting 'morality' or a supernatural 'religious experience'.

Basically, life is as simple as that. It becomes complicated only by the human structure which is characterized by the fear of life.

—Wilhelm Reich

The family: a class institution

IN ORIGINS OF THE FAMILY, Private Property and the State, Friedrich Engels describes the change from a primitive communal society, with group marriage and collective work for collective ends, to a property-oriented pairing social structure that developed class differentiations of work and life style.

Tribles, Engels said divided labour so that men cared for cattle and woman maintained communal farms and cared for children and domestic chores.

In this early period there were no status differentiations between men and women. Both were necessary for survival, and both contributed to the good of the whole community.

Then early forms of trading began. Cattle became the early unit of exchange around which all other forms of trade were measured. Trade broke down the concept of work for the necessity of the community. This subtle trade spelled the end of communal production and the beginning of private wealth vested in the hands of men

SEVERAL GROUPS OR CLASSES EMERGED: those men who owned cattle, and those who did not. Secondary to this were women who were the property of either the owners or the labourers.

Marx emphasises that the superstructure of society develops around the economic base, of the means of production.

We begin to examine the roles of members of a family and can see why the existence of such a group especially given the social and economic structure of our society.

We have all seen too, marriages crack up and wonder when a man is unfaithful to his wife: "Why he has such a fine wife, and ah, what's to happen to his children?"

A girl from infancy is educated to believe it is proper for her to have sexual relations with only one man. And man for too long has attempted to prove that marriage and monogomy are "natural phenomena" that is to say are biologically determined.

On the one hand when the marriage problem is being discussed from the point of view of biology, then the fact is overlooked that promiscuity is the rule of animals; then all of a sudden, man is different from the animals and thus will have to attain the "highest plane" of sexual activity, monogamous marriage.

Then man is a "superior being" with an "inborn morality" and sex economy is fought because it has proven that there is no such thing as "inborn morality".

But if morality is not inborn it must be acquired by education?

'Do you — take — to be your lawful wedded wife to have and to hold from this day onward, through sickness and health, in richness and poorness
'till death do you part?'

EDUCATION BY WHOM?

By society and its ideology factory, the authoritarian family based on compulsive monogomy. This shows clearly enough that the family is not a natural phenomenon, but rather a social institution.

But reactionary arguments are long lived and when one has to admit that marriage is neither a natural nor a supernatural but a social institution one begins to try to prove that people have always lived in monogomy, and denies any development and change of sexual forms.

One overlooks history which shows that polygamous and promiscuous sex life has always played a role. Instead, one replaces the point of view of development by that of morality. One discovers the development of sexuality to "higher planes"; that the primitive lived in bestial immorality, and that we can pride ourselves in having overcome in having overcome such "anarchic" conditions in sex life.

We have for too long attempted to justify morally, metaphysically or biologically social phenomena which long since were doomed.

But if one deals with the facts a question presents itself:

WHAT IS THE SOCIAL FUNCTION OF MARRIAGE?

The social function of marriage is threefold: economic, political and social. It is identical with that of the authoritarian family.

Just as marriage, in human history began to develop with the private ownership of the social means of production, so it continues to have its reason or existence in the economic basis, that is, as long as these economic conditions continue to exist, marriage is a social necessity. The form of marriage is based not only on economic factors, but also on the ideological moral atmosphere and on human structure.

That is why most people are unconscious of the real basis of marriage; they always think of it in terms of ideological rationalizations. However when material reasons demand it, society will change the ideology.

MONOGAMOUS LIFELONG MARRIAGE is the nucleus of the compulsive family; and this in turn we have seen is the ideological training ground for every member of authoritarian society. In this lies the political significance and importance of marriage.

And the economic dependence of the woman and children in the family is a chief characteristic of paternalistic society and marriage thus becomes an economic and moral (in the terms of patriarchal interests) protection for women and children. Therefore patriarchal and authoritarian society must of necessity uphold compulsive marriage.

But it isn't a question here whether marriage is good or bad, whether it is socially justified and necessary. One cannot want to abolish marriage in a society in which marriage is economically rooted.

One can only introduce minor "reforms" such as substituting the principle of incompatibility for that of guilt as a reason for divorce. No such reforms however change the fundamental in the least.

Here R. D. Laing presents to us sets of sequences that will be vividly, and painfully familiar to us all. The examples he has given include only such as he has seen. Call them as you will: tangles, impasses, binds. . .knots. He attempts to trace patterns followed in our families. Rather than show them in the context of actual situations in which they occur, he follows these knots.

My mother loves me.
I feel good.
I feel good because she loves me.

I am good because I feel good
I feel good because I am good
My mother loves me because I am good.

My mother does not love me.
I feel bad.
I feel bad because she does not love me
I am bad because I feel bad
I feel bad because I am bad
I am bad because she does not love me
She does not love me because I am bad.

I don't feel good therefore I am bad
therefore no one loves me.

I feel good therefore I am good therefore everyone loves me.

I am good.
You do not love me
therefore you are bad. So I do not love you.

I am bad
You love me
therefore you are bad.

Mother loves me because she is good
I am bad, to think she is bad therefore if I am good she is good and loves me because I am good to know she is good.

I am bad to doubt she punishes me for doubting she loves me by punishing me for doubting she loves me

She says it must be her fault
if I doubt she loves me

She feels bad because I don't think she loves me because she feels bad when I don't think she loves me.

She feels it is her fault that I can be so cruel
as to doubt she loves me
when she makes me feel cruel, to think she tries to make me feel cruel. . .

LIFE AMONG THE CONSTIPATED BY R. CRUMB

'MEN AND WOMEN ARE RACES APART'

By MARY OMATSU

Billy Edwards, the flamboyant star of Allen King's "A Merriad Coupla", whom we all remember for wearing red jersey jockey shorts, in what seemed like one-half of the film, is just as colorful off-camera as on.

In conversation, one becomes aware of his 44 years, in both attitudes and hang-ups. And perhaps that is why the therapy of stripping cinematically for the cameras helped save his marriage. The experience gave the Edwards a legitimate excuse to shed many of the middle class inhibitions that paranoically can destroy a relationship.

For all the ease with which he can discuss life, marriage, and feckarhood, one realizes that beneath the facility, the childish insecurities that revealed themselves in the film era still present. As he tries to approach the problems that he, as well as we, must all confront in ourselves, and those we love, we come face to face with our "immaturity" and prejudices.

With lots of gusto, hilarious allusions, and groin varbiage, he agreed to this interview only on the grounds that it be "philosophical."

VARSITY: WHAT IS YOUR PHILOSOPHICAL INTERPRETATION OF MARRIAGE?

Men and women are races apart. The coming together of these two races is the sorrow and beauty of it. Don't get me wrong. I'm not against women's lib, but we're physiologically different. Women are cyclical. Sure as the lunar cycle every month you're going to have a period and be depressed and any man living with a woman has to make allowances for that.

Sure men get depressed but not with such predictability. But these differences, add to the mystery. I'm taking a very romantic approach but I'd think that a homosexual marriage more boring — like you know how the other guy feels, you come at the same time, you don't have to guess.

VARSITY: WHAT'S WRONG WITH MARRIAGE?

Society accepts the double standard. Men can have a hard on when a beautiful woman passes him in the street, or be a stud every once in a while. And a woman can't and I don't mean just physically. But it's partly their own fault — they're mostly to blame for supporting the status quo. Like the whole virginity thing — they say you can't shatter my hymen, unless some conditions are met, mainly marriage and life-long support.

But the double standard is cruel and inefficient. It's wasting a lot of brains and creativity. This is Billy Edwards, 44 years old, and it's 1970, but it's still a tricky thing for a woman to go and talk to a man who isn't her husband, in a public place. She probably doesn't want to fuck with him, but she won't be able to do it. Her husband can have lunch with some one or drop in at a bar after 5:00 on his way home, but a woman's cloistered into a small world that is partly her own making.

"On another level, what's wrong is the norm thing. Society's created a massive simplistic die, and we've all got to fit the pattern. Let's face it, the establishment as it is now, pressures people not to live together. What they're rather have is two people who don't know a hell of a lot about each other, be dropped into two small rooms, twenty seconds after they've got the official paper and live together, for the rest of their god damn lives.

"Oh that reminds me, I just saw a movie in which Elliott Gould said that when marriage was invented, about 3,000 years B.C., we got married at sixteen and were lucky to live to twenty-three. Now they expect us to stay married six times as long, and that's not working.

I think it's either one-quarter or one-third of all marriages in North America are supposed to be breaking up. And it's just that they've made marriage too long, my God, people get bored. I'm not saying that we should get divorced every seven years, but I think we should think that having two marriages in one life time as being the norm.

VARSITY: WHAT DO YOU THINK IS IMPORTANT ABOUT MARRIAGE?

Marriage is the greatest source of pleasure; the greatest anti-loneliness thing.

I know this is a terrible cliché but a marriage is essentially team work, each one doing the thing he does best. The marriages that survive, do so because they've learned how to take from each other. It's not giving — it's taking what the other person likes to do. And that is the pleasure and joy of it — being taken for the thing you like best to do. When you give all the time, you drown the other person in your shit, and probably didn't even ask for it.

To make your marriage work, your expectations have got to dove-tail. You've got to know what you want; like the guy who wants to go golfing on the weekends, and his wife didn't know this five years ago when she married him, is in bad trouble.

As far as I can see the sole reason for the existence of marriage is for children. They certainly help to hold the marriage together.

The trouble with most marriages, and these are nice, intelligent people, because they're friends of mine, is that they don't communicate their needs. Like I'm dying of thirst in the desert, and you come prancing by with a freshly baked sponge cake, and I say that I don't think I want sponge cake at the moment, but what I'd really like is a glass of water. And you burst into tears, and say you don't love me anymore.

VARSITY: DO YOU THINK PEOPLE CAN EVER COMMUNICATE?

I don't know the answer to that question. I just know that I'm getting more and more paranoid. They throw so much information at us, and most of it is terrifying and unless you're an unconscious paranoid, you can't get away from it all. Like the average person is subjected to 50,000 commercial messages a year, (that's about 140 commercials a day or about one every six minutes ED) and that's just commercials, how do you fight something like that, how do you get away?

One of the prerequisites to communication, in a family or a marriage is privacy, and a respect for privacy. Everyone should have a place to go, a place that's inviolate. Then maybe we can be reached.

But man's the only species who's smashed the territorial system, we don't have our own private turf, we don't do the survival of the fittest. Although I'm not putting that down, either I don't believe in euthanasia. They might be a little stupid, but I don't believe in killing children."

VARSITY: DO YOU SEE ANY ALTERNATIVE TO MARRIAGE?

Like I said before I think the heterosexual union is the most satisfying, so I'll only talk about that.

The difference between being married and living together, is the joy and sorrow thing again. You live more on a day to day basis, and if you're more pleased than sorrowful, or you're not pulled out of the relationship by someone or something else, you'll stay together. But when you're married you've got a target commitment. And because we're somehow conditioned to respect a contract, it's tougher to split up if you're married.

Like if you're having a great affair with some man, but you're married, and your husband is a pretty nice guy, and you've got a couple of kids, and you've invested 7 or so years in that marriage, you're going to think twice, before you pack your bags.

The bad part of all this, is that society says that when you want out you've got to cool it on society's terms. In that way, the government is a pimp, because it forces you to become an adulterer, and you probably won't even enjoy fucking for the evidence.

But a man and woman together is a great thing. I mean we really fit, it's so nice, so really nice.

Draw up your own 'fucking' contract', says minister

By GORD FLOYD

"Most of them have been living together, and if they haven't been, I hit them hard on that."

That's Jim Fisk, trained marriage counsellor and minister of Holy Trinity Anglican Church talking. His office is on the second floor at 10 Trinity Square, right above the Distress Centre manned 24 hours a day by his congregation.

THE OFFICE IS, BLUNTLY, A DUMP. The couch and chairs may have been in style 30 years ago, the small door in one corner appears impassable for the junk on the floor, and the bookshelves in the opposite corner are equally inaccessible.

Jim slouches in what is obviously his favourite of the overstuffed easy chairs, and he continues to talk about the revolutionary attitudes toward marriage that the unusual situation of his church has caused him to adopt.

"I guess I see my function as getting at the underlying assumptions that people make with regard to a life-long relationship." Any couple who comes to Jim with their planning as far along as the date of the wedding, will have to find someone else to officiate.

"Sure, six years ago I tried to give every couple about seven hours of pre-marital counselling. I asked them questions like 'why do you want to get married?' and 'what does it mean to you?' but being a downtown church, a lot of couples came here who had no religious affiliation. All this 'in sickness and in health' 'till death do you part' business was pretty meaningless for them. It got so bad that I wouldn't marry anyone outside the congregation."

This hiatus probably allowed two things to happen most important is that it seems to have crystallized Jim's early inclinations that couples should be more involved in their own weddings, and secondly, although he doesn't mention this, I imagine he needed the time to muster the guts to assume his present course.

I wouldn't think that it is very easy for a minister to tell his church that it's away off base on one of its sacraments. But that is Jim Fisk's message, not only to the Anglican Church, but to all organized religion.

"THE PRIEST, MINISTER, RABBI OR whatever, is no longer the expert couples have to take the responsibility of their concept of marriage if a couple feels they need a contract to fuck then their view of marriage needs to be especially examined from this angle."

He elaborates on this point "Yes, I try to get people to approach marriage as equals, but again, I insist that they establish their own ground rules. I don't think they can do this unless they try intercourse before marriage.

but most people haven't changed on these things as much as they think"

This leads to the central aspect of Jim's present form of 'counselling'. The couple do things for themselves. They work out their own problems, make their own rules, reach their own conclusions. "This brings the church back to its original intention — couples who say 'such and such a minister married us' are wrong. Couples marry each other, the minister or priest only officiates."

After this is done, the couple sets about what Jim feels is an equally important part of their pre-marital preparation — the design of the actual wedding ceremony, again the sole responsibility of the couple.

No ground rules, no pre-fabricated formula, only a service that means the most to the only two people who matter.

"THEY HAVE TO DISCOVER RIGHT NOW, before marriage, what it's all about. Let's face it, divorce is an accomplished fact when the couple separates, but the court ritual afterwards is rough on everyone. The ones hurt most are the kids, and perhaps the best way to protect them is being explored now in communal living experiments, where all the children relate to all the adults as parents. This way a divorce or separation doesn't leave any of the kids out in the cold.

Co-ops: a continuum of possibilities

"And besides, it's important to have someone to bitch at"

By Agi Lukacs

"LEAVE THE DOOR OPEN AT NIGHT so Barbie can see the hall light," says a directive addressed to the ten adults who inhabit a large house in downtown Toronto.

Barbie is the name of the three-year-old who, along with four others ranging in age from seven months to four-and-a-half years, are in charge of ten adults in turn.

The house is a co-op, one of an increasing number of households structured on a new basis. Toronto co-ops are now being threatened by city legislation.

THE 17-ROOM HOUSE where the five kids and ten adults live was rented by its present occupants in August. They didn't know each other well before moving day. Most had met through a Toronto day-care centre where all the children are in the day time.

One of the single house members, age 19, works full-time at another day care centre; some of the married house members do part-time work there. Most have this in common, and their ages — in the twenties — and most are part of a more-or-less-official couple. But they are involved in many different things outside of the house. "It's better that way" says Bill, the 19-year-old, who is completing high school at night.

Janet teaches English to immigrants; Karen is a graduate secretary at the U of T, while her husband Jerry is at its Institute of Science and Technology. Rob is a political science undergraduate. Jack is a graduate history student. Susan writes for a radical magazine. Several "full-time" house members do art work; one "part-time" member, Barry, is working with an out-of-town experimental school.

ORIGINAL ART WORK covers the walls of the heavily-paneled house, giving it a homey effect. The living-room looks "lived-in". There is a study room which holds all the house's books; there is a sewing room, a dark room, a nursery and a change-room for the kids, and a room which hosts periodical invasions from the experimental school. Four bathrooms, a central kitchen, and the bedrooms complete the count of seventeen.

The house, which took the group three months to find because of the size required, rents for $450 a month. Couples, who had first choice of bedrooms, contribute $90 toward the rent, and have the larger rooms. Single house members pay $60 each for smaller rooms. There has recently been an added "head tax," of $7 to pay for heat and other extras, so the house is not as economical as it could be.

But most co-ops are financially successful. This is partly because the individual's obligation not to miss a single payment is less strong here, explains Tom.

If someone isn't drawing a regular salary, the others will support him for a while. He is now designing a playground for a day-care centre. But he does a lot of work around the house, Jerry is quick to explain.

FOOD MONEY is pooled. It works out to approximately eight dollars per week per individual. "Money isn't really a problem, because most of us are either working or on scholarships. We eat too well," Jerry says with a smile. "We show off sometimes, when it's our turn to cook." He was cooking that night, and the menu featured eel.

There are two cooks every night. There is a schedule in the front hall that regulates cooking, shopping, cleaning. There is also "Morning Baby Duty" and "Evening Baby Duty" — changing and feeding the kids. "P.M. Baby Duty" involves babysitting the kids in the evening and sleeping in their room at night.

"There is no sex differentiation in terms of work, as there is in the 'nuclear family,'" notes Karen with satisfaction, speaking of the usual husband-wife-children arrangement for a household.

THE KIDS PICKED OUT colours they liked at a hardware store, and painted furniture in their rooms. There's been a great deal of work, several people complained. "But that's to be expected at first," says Valerie, "because several households are being combined."

"I have an intensive work period two days of the week," explains Karen, "but the other days are free. Living in a 'nuclear family', we did more work, but it was less concentrated." "When you're living by yourself, you can let things slide," her husband had said.

"THIS CO-OP creates real problems for singles individuals," feels Barry, who has a daughter. "Not even the parents understood the implications of taking care of five kids."

"This is the first time it's been tried in a co-op on this scale," says Rob. He is not a parent. He couldn't sleep at all when he was on "P.M. Baby Duty". "Some kids want to play in the middle of the nite, and if they're not allowed to, they woke the others."

But taking care of several children is less expensive, two of the mothers explain. There are no baby-sitting costs; several kids leave less food at a meal than one or two; clothes and toys can be passed on from one to another.

But the new situation requires adjustments. "Though the kids themselves tend to accept whoever is with them," says Valerie, who grew up in a large family, "I have to realize that others can take care of my kids just as well as . . ."

"Just as well as you can?" I interrupted.

"Just as well as I can take care of theirs," she answered. "I like my kid more now; I'm not as tired." Karen confesses. "My life is more integrated. I have more time to do what I want — like work at the day-care centre."

"I USED TO RESENT the heavy work on my father's farm — it was meaningless, and I had no say," says Tom.

"Chores are more meaningful when they're done with and for other people," affirms Valerie.

"I'm living more politically. You have to be willing to struggle together; that's politics," Bill had said earlier, enigmatically.

Tom, who has lived in a 'nuclear family' structure for the past four-and-a-half years, finds the co-op better. In the usual family, "there's role-playing . . . no matter how much you do with your kids, they need other kids and other people . . . otherwise you tend to take too much out on your family . . . it gets unhealthy and rigid."

"I've told everyone here to fuck off at least once," interjects Bill, "but you can walk back in in five minutes." "You learn to express anger and most things in a constructive way," says Janet.

People get together and discuss things, at house meetings on a more-or-less weekly basis — whenever something needs to be discussed. Most people are home for dinner.

"There is never any lasting bitterness," feels Jerry.

HE HAS NEVER LIVED in a co-op before. "There is a fantastic amount of change," he notes. "At first I was fed up with so many people around and so much to be involved in. I couldn't sleep. I was tired, didn't do much school work, panicked about the amount of housework, and got depressed."

But he's enthusiastic now. "There is a wider variety of social contacts than one person would usually be exposed to," says Jack. "There is a more valid political consciousness too. The news isn't just between the TV and you." His wife Valerie adds: "If the two of you are going the same direction, it can be boring. There are few good discussions." "Two people in an apartment draw an enormous amount out of each other," Karen elaborates. "You'd like to provide all to the other, but you can't." There are more opportunities for friendship in a co-op, they agree.

"Friendships happen between individuals, not couples," notes Valerie approvingly. "A united front isn't expected here, as it was in the last co-op we lived in. There we were the only couple," she adds.

"Here, couples don't always do things together," says Karen. "Jerry and I could never cook together, but we do work well with each other on baby duty, so we schedule it that way. Also, we can go out together more easily now, because there are no problems with babysitters."

"I LIKE COOKING," her husband says. "Here you can kibitz other people's cooking. There is always something interesting going on. The first week was like a perpetual party ("with its higher tension level, his wife later elaborated"). But you get used to it."

Bill comes home sometimes to see who's home, and wonders, if not, why they're not home. "It's really important to have someone to bitch to. It's so strange now, walking into an empty house."

Privacy isn't a problem, several co-op members agreed, although I heard casual and critical remarks about some relationships. "We have our own rooms, and it's a large house, so there's always someplace to hide," says Jerry. "You can stay in your room if you're in a bad mood, or come down for attention," feels Karen. "Even in the living room, you don't usually feel you're tripping over people," said Janet.

"We've all maintained outside relationships — this isn't an escape," Karen adds. There are no problems with visiting hours, because no one comes late.

"I feel a lot of warmth for people here. I was amazed," confesses Karen.

"Everyone is relaxed with each other," adds Valerie. "If you couldn't hack it, you really couldn't, because there are so many people here," says Janet.

"ONE INTERESTING THING about a co-op is the continuum of possibilities," added Tom. There was one house which was more communal than theirs, he explained. There was complete income sharing; there were no private rooms and no couples. "It didn't work too well. What we've tried to do is to tailor what's comfortable for us, and not put ideology first."

But most people in the house seemed to me to be more or less radicals, at least on questions like Women's Liberation. When I used the word "chick" while talking to three of the men, it was quickly corrected to "woman." "Theories must fit life-styles and vice versa," says a "part-time" woman house member. Her boyfriend agrees: "There's a lot of learning to go."

He never understood why they called him lazy or careless, the people at the welfare office.

They said he should have provided better for old age;
that he should have worked harder, or saved more or —
I don't know what they expected of him.

We'd had a bit put away, but with drugs and dentist bills and my special diet it didn't last long.

He tried to explain but they didn't were rude to him.
It hurt him to be treated like that.
He'd always tried his best to be a good husband and father.
He'd tried so hard, he never understood where he failed.

H'd tried to...
but I'm a widow now

At least I have this apartment.
It's hard enough to get by with prices going up the way they are.

When he was a caretaker we were given an apartment in the building.

He was proud of being able to make his own way.
He was 69 when they decided to close the building. We applied for Ontario Housing then. He said we were lucky to get it because there's thousands of people on the waiting list.

He said we were lucky.
Well, I know it would be terrible to be facing the burden of heavy rent along with everything else.
It's just, rather barren here.

I miss the old neighborhood, the friends I had tea with, the grocery I liked. I'm not well enough to get out much if I could afford a taxi — well.

It may seem like small things to fuss about, but when you have so little small things mean a lot.
It's e pretty package for a prison but I'm confined here all the same.

If only there was a garden here.
He loved gardening...
But I'm alone now.

IT'S STRANGE HOW YOU believe it will never happen to you — it just can't happen here.

If you are a woman with children in our society, and find yourself, widowed, separated divorced deserted and in the low income level, you probably will end up under the Deserted Wives Act. The Deserted Wives Act entitles you to the right to apply for assistance for you and your children under our laws.

What does this mean? It means that you can get money for shelter, food, clothing, utilities and household goods. So far it doesn't sound bad, if you can swallow your pride about being "on welfare."

But you're stuck — the rent is due, the kids have to eat and you have already wasted too much time trying to make ends meet.

Now it begins. A way of life. You go to the welfare office, you sit and after awhile, you get to fill out all sorts of forms then sit some more.

By now if you have the kids with you they are dirty, tired cranky and you don't know what to do. Finally you are called in for your interview.

YOU ARE ASKED ALL KINDS of questions. Why aren't you working? Where is your husband? Where does he work? Did you work? Do you own anything? Do you have money in the bank, real estate, bonds or stocks? (Really!) You are then told that someone will be out to see you at home.

Since most people don't know that you can ask for money than and there if you really need it, you go empty handed and tired with a long wait to come.

When the worker visits your home there are more questions, more forms, you sign papers, that you do not understand and then the worker says you'll here from them and again you wait.

If you are lucky, your cheque will come in the mail, if not, then another trip to the welfare office.

If you are not a widow, you are asked to sign desertion papers against your husband. This puts you in the position of suing your husband for support. If you know where your husband is and he is willing or able to pay support, the money you get from him is deducted from your welfare cheque.

If your husband is not willing then there is a steady stream of court cases in Family Court that drives you up the wall and your husband resents you because "you are going after him."

AFTER THREE MONTHS YOU ARE ELIGIBLE for Family Benefits under provincial law. More papers to fill out, more visits from your case worker. The worker may or may not explain your rights to you and what you are eligible for (i.e. drugs, bedding, furniture, eyeglasses.)

You are told that you will earn $X per month, but you are not told how they arrive at this amount.

Rent allowance is $95 for an unheated shelter, plus $5 for each child. If you have three children you are allowed $110.

Where in Toronto can you find a place for yourself and three children for $110? Your budget includes hydro and gas but not a telephone. After you pay the phone bill the rest has to cover food clothing transportation, household expenses and children's needs. Of course, what is left can hardly cover your food, never mind the rest.

THE PROVINCIAL DEPARTMENT DOES NOT ALLOW YOU TO GO TO WORK. With three children you are allowed to earn $60 a month plus 25 per cent of anything over that — the rest is deducted from your monthly cheque. Where do you get a job?

Babysitting is not an allowable expense. No one considers the extra hardships or pressures in taking on another job — being a homemaker and a mother is a JOB.

What kind of job can you get, now especially with unemployment rising? If you find something are you further ahead?

What happens to your social life? It's bad enough being a woman on your own with three kids, but now you have an extra label, "welfare case."

People don't talk to you anymore.
WOMEN DON'T TRUST YOU. You can't dress properly to go most places even though you get over feeling like a fifth wheel. Your children are considered "culturally deprived".

Have you looked at the price of children's books lately? The museum or the park are no longer free when you think about where you are going to get the car fare.

Music, dancing, swim lessons — forget it. Theatres, shows, bowling sports are something that is not allowed in your budget. God help you if the washing machine, TV, oven or fridge break down.

—e welfare mother

10 The Variety

THE LESBIAN MINORITY in America, which may run as high as 10,000,000 women, is probably the least understood of all minorities and the most downtrodden.

She has two strikes on her from the start; she is a woman and she is a homosexual, a minority scorned by the vast majority of people in our country. If in addition she is a member of a racial minority, it is hard sometimes to understand how she survives.

A Lesbian is a woman who prefers another woman as a sexual partner, a woman who is drawn erotically to women rather than to men. This definition includes women who have never experienced overt sexual relations with a woman — the key word is "prefers".

THERE IS REALLY no other valid way to define the Lesbian for outside of the sexual area she is as different in her actions, her dress, status and behavior as anyone else.

Just as there is no typical heterosexual woman, neither is there any typical Lesbian.

However, there is a popular misconception or stereotype of the Lesbian. She is believed to embody all the worst masculine attributes of toughness, aggressiveness, lack of emotion, lack of sentiment, overemphasis on sex, lack of stability — the need and desire to dress as a man or at least as much like a man as possible.

At some time in her life the Lesbian may fit this stereotype — usually when she is very young and just finding out about herself. After all, the Lesbian is a product of her heterosexual environment and all she has to go on, at her first awareness of Lesbian feeling in herself, is society's image.

PART OF THE REASON for her over-masculinization is the sexual identity of being attracted to women. At this point the Lesbian feels in order to be attractive to another woman she must appear masculine.

Another reason is for identification purposes. How will she meet other Lesbians? How will they know her to be one of them unless she indicates herself in outward appearance?

A third reason is one of releasing her hostility against society of defying the mores which she finds stifling to what she considers her very being.

A fourth reason is comfort. Any woman who says that girdles and high heels are comfortable is simply lying.

WHILE IT IS TRUE that occasionally a Lesbian gets trapped in this way of life (emulation of the male) and never finds her way to being a person rather than a symbol, the vast majority pass through this phase and learn to accept their femininity.

As a Lesbian she comes to realize she is a human being first, a woman second and a Lesbian only third. Unfortunately however, society places the emphasis on the third-sexual identification — and does not acknowledge the Lesbian as a woman or a person.

But the average Lesbian (if there can be anything approaching "average" in our very complex world) is indistinguishable from other women in dress, manner, goals and desires, in actions and in interests.

THE DIFFERENCE is only that she looks to women for her emotional and sexual fulfillment. She is a member of the family — a distant cousin or perhaps a maiden aunt. But more than likely she's closer to home — maybe a daughter, a wife and mother, a grandmother or a sister.

She may work in an office, in a factory production line, in the public school system, at the corner grocery. She is not bound by lines of class distinction or educational level, or race or religion.

What causes a woman to become a Lesbian? How can it be that two sisters raised by the same parents in the same home can turn in two different directions — one toward heterosexuality, the other toward homosexuality?

VERY SIMPLY, the answer is that no one knows. A great deal of research and study has been done in this country on the male homosexual, but very little has been done on the Lesbian. The reason for this we believe lies in the status of women in the country. Because the male masculinity is so highly valued, it has been deemed to be imperative to research out the reasons for any deviation from this American norm.

Also the majority of people working in research are men. Research on the Lesbian, has for most part been confined to women who were either psychiatric patients or in prison — which hasn't made for a very accurate picture.

Why then, if the Lesbian is by and large indistinguishable from other women and if her sexuality is not abnormal, does she face such genuine problems in her search for self-fulfillment?

Consider the stereotyped "box" most women in this country are placed in from birth: that of becoming wife and mother, nothing else. Consider then, the girl brought up in this box who finds her sexual identification to be Lesbian. How then express the "wife and mother" role?

THIS CONFLICT often starts the process of self-searching which goes on for years and which, for some, is never resolved.

Toward a Quaker View of Sex, which came out of England and is more enlightened than most religious treatises on male homosexuality, fails utterly in its chapter on female homosexuality. The only statement with which we can agree is in the first sentence.

"Homosexuality is probably as common among women as men."

The Quaker view of the Lesbian is apparently that of the wishy-washy namby-pamby old maid who holds hands with another old maid (or preferably with an adoring younger girl) because she was never able to catch a man and fulfill her deep yearning for the rewards of the pangs of childbirth.

The Quaker view indicates that women's prime requisite is her "maternal tenderness" that her only reason for being is to have babies by del martin and phyllis lyon and that the Lesbian is warped and frustrated because she isn't doing her fair share toward the population explosion.

THE ART OF MOTHERHOOD in the human species is not instinctual. It is learned. We have courses in the care of babies, and there are countless books on the market to help the young mother to deal with the problems she may encounter during the course of the child's growth and development.

It simply does not follow then, that every Lesbian is suffering untold qualms because she is frustrating her "natural" birthright for giving birth.

There are many other ways for women to contribute creatively to our society. The Lesbian who does feel frustrated because she doesn't have any children of her own may work in the teaching profession, she may be a social worker or a nurse. But the majority of Lesbians we have known have not expressed in any way the "void" they feel because they have no children.

To the contrary, the expression, "I would prefer to lead a heterosexual life if I could", is much more apt to come from the male homosexual than the female.

IT MUST BE SAID however there are many Lesbians raising children — some successfully, some not so successfully.

The rate of success of course is determined by the degree of self-acceptance and self-assurance of the mother and the permanence and stability of her relationship to her Lesbian partner. It takes guts, grit and determination.

For if the mother is determined to be a Lesbian the courts will assume she is an "unfit" mother on the face of it and take her children away. It seems as if children must have the protection of heterosexuals, regardless.

The fact that all homosexuals are products of heterosexuality seems to escape those who would judge the homosexual relationship.

THE TEENAGE LESBIAN has a particular problem which has not been dealt with. Many homophile associations have had to refuse membership to those under 21 for fear they will be charged with "contributing to juvenile delinquency."

The teenager has no one to turn to. The teenage Lesbian is whisked off by her parents to the family doctor or clergyman to put a stop to this nonsense. However, in the cases that have come to our attention, the teenager has no doubt about her sexual orientation. What she wants to know is what to do about it. She wants to meet others like herself, she wants to socialize and discuss the problems she faces.

She is looking for Lesbian models, those who have worked out their problems and have established long term relationships.

Because of the absence of role models in working out her way in life, and because the only marriage she has known is that of Mom and Dad, the young Lesbian usually gets hung-up in the "butch-femme" syndrome in her early relationships.

It is only with painful experience that she learns the Lesbian is attracted to a woman — not a cheap imitation of a man.

THE LASTING LESBIAN LIAISON (and there are many) is one based on mutuality of concern, love, companionship responsibility, household chores, outside interests and sex.

The successful Lesbian relationship cannot be based on society's exaggerated male-female dominant-passive roles, as depicted in the flood of Lesbian novels on the newstands which for the most part are written by men for heterosexual male consumption.

It is the realization that, contrary to cultural myths, all human beings have both feminine and masculine traits and that a person has to find her own identity as a woman and as a partner in this love relationship that makes for success.

The fact that Lesbian relationships are generally long-lasting without benefit of religious ceremony or legal sanction is indicative of a strong bond of love and respect which sees the couple through all the obstacles society places in their way.

THE STIGMA attached to homosexuality has just as much effect on the Lesbian as she tries to deal with fear and society-imposed guilt in the problem areas of employment, family relationships and religion.

The Lesbian is just as subject to the sanctions of certain laws as the male homosexual; she is just as subject to arrest when she enters a "gay" bar; she is just as subject to blackmail and police harassment.

Some Lesbians claim they have been aware of their lesbianism since childhood, others since their teens. Yet there are some women who make the discovery about themselves much later in life — after they have been married and have had children.

IT ISN'T EASY for a woman to say to herself, let alone anyone else, "I'm a Lesbian."

But once the words are said, has she really changed? Isn't she still the same person she was?

But to protect her family and her job she is forced to live a lie to take on a dual life.

The Lesbian, being a woman, comes out of the same cultural pool as do heterosexual women. Therefore on top of everything else, she may have the same hang-ups and inhibitions about sex, dress, work, actions etc., as do her heterosexual sisters.

Even when the Lesbian accepts her sexual identity as a person, she still faces very real discrimination from society. If she is a professional she can lose her job with the point of a finger.

THIS IS ESPECIALLY TRUE of teachers, social workers, lawyers and doctors but it can also be true of file clerks and secretaries.

If she divulges her identity she automatically becomes vulnerable. She faces loss of job, family and friends. Yet until she opens herself to such possibilities, no one will have the opportunity to come to know and to understand her as the whole person she really is.

CRACK, CUMMIBLE AND FALL

d o w n

AT THIS VERY MOMENT the world is involved in a transition period between two radically different epochs of human evolution. On one side a brave new world looms before us, a world where man has learned to live in harmony with himself and nature, where he has set out on a journey into the infinite realms of the spirit; on the other rim of the abyss, we can see the past refusing to die — old institutions and social definitions that had made an attempt to cope with a violent, struggling world.

A WORLD SUBDIVIDED INTO FAMILIES IS NO LONGER RELEVANT.

The old family was a political unit necessary in a world where self sufficiency was imperative. It was the prerequisite for all of our social and economic structures. As such, the individual had to be subverted to the family. This had the side effect, however, of creating neuroses that collectively built up in the system, becoming more intense, exploding in our time. Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? mirrored the nervous breakdown of the world.

Where culture is used as a force of repression in defining sexual roles for social purposes the result is the plastic world that conceals human sickness. Abnormal is normal. Sex and violence are synonymous. Life becomes obscene.

Hollywood, once the mythic centre of the West, produced cultural fantasies to give the world re-essurance of its false identity, to massage it with romance and violence, to rock it to sleep in the face of the holocaust.

When the movie became reality, vacuous human symbols substituted for true identities. Television has assumed this role today.

FREUD WAS THE NIGHT WATCHMAN OF THE OLD ORDER.

The culture produced grotesque manifestations of sublimated humanity. ELVIS PRESLEY: THE SOLID GOLD PENIS OF THE AUTO-EROTIC FIFTIES. Technocracy became a substitute for flesh. THE PROSTITUTE IS THE MOTHER OF G.M. AND THE GRANDMOTHER OF THE EXPRESSWAY. Movie stars reflected inner fantasies. MARILYN MONROE: THE INCEST FANTASY OF THE COLLECTIVE UNCONSCIOUS. Voyeurism is the public passtime. RAQUEL WELCH: THE OEDIPAL DREAMBOAT OF THE PEPSI GENERATION. While the medium of television constantly reviews these mythic realities. TINY TIM: FRANKENSTEIN OF WESTERN MORALITY.

The American business culture was based on masturbatory imagery. The inhabitants of that weird landscape with their Las Vegas dreams, their topless wonders, their suburban Ponderosas, their gangster heroes, their greasy eyeballs, their whiskey helitosis, were heading for the biggest jack off of all time. But if you take a look around you, into the Time Squeres of their dreams, you can see them dying.

"I have met the new men. He is intrepid and cruel. I was afraid of him." — Hitler.

SPEAK THE VOICE ELECTRIC

Our electric culture is an unending dream. A manifestation of what Jung called the 'collective unconscious'. We are engulfed in myths that, if we pay attention, can tell us where we've been and where we're going. Human sexuality is a delicate, complex, multi-dimensional experience; our journey into its mythology is an odyssey into a vortex.

THE AGE OF SEXUAL SPECIALIZATION IS OVER.

Gone are the days when to be a man meant "do not feel" and to be a woman meant "do not think".

The need for armies created a major necessity to instill in the male certain "virtues" such as the ability to kill. It is necessary for the soldiers to be taught that sex is a selfish act of self gratification, and it is a sign of weakness to love — otherwise he would not put up with military life. Sex must be channelled into violence, as Hitler well knew. In Mike Nichols cinematic masterpiece, Catch 22, the decadence that underlies Western civilization is exposed with unprecedented savagery — in this one film centureis of myth are demolished forever.

A MAJOR REASON FOR THE AMERICAN FAILURE IN VIETNAM IS MODERN YOUTH'S FAILURE TO CONFORM TO THE SEXUAL ROLES IMPOSED BY THE OLD GUARD.

As Phil Ochs sings, "I ein't a' marchin' anymore."

CEREBRAL REVELATIONS

"Some of the greatest crimes ever committed were committed in bed. And no weapons were used."

— Normen Meiler.

In The Graduate a young man had to make the jump from the old culture to the new. Little wonder modern audiences identified with the film so greatly. "Where have you gone, Joe DiMegio?" asks Mrs. Robinson with the poignant realization that the myths which had made up her life are now fading.

The american hero came home from the range in Midnight Cowboy and found grim realities behind the myth. Was the wild west ever like this?

THE NEW DAY

Our sensation of the world is more tactile and leads us back to tribal roots where we must rediscover an all-encompassing form of being, an omnisexuality.

Sex becomes a form of communication, communal; the categorizing of roles vanishes, partners do not merge as 'men' and 'woman', but as 'being' and 'being'.

ROCK STYLE

"We effect little teenage boys between the ages of twelve and fifteen more than anybody. They consider us the heroes of our time for some reason. They always come into the dressing room and say, "Can I have a picture taken on your lap?""

Alice Cooper, rock, star

Rock is the art form which is tuned in most directly to the new media environment. The rock life style is the pargon of youth; the major cultural changes of our day are shown most clearly in this art.

We may be far from Utopie, but at least we have passed the threshold into a new and exciting stage of human evolution. But brace yourself for the war as the old culture tries to destroy the new. The battle lines have only just been drawn.

"L.S.D. is the ultimate aphrodisiac."

— Timothy Leery.

"We went the world and we went NOW."

— The Doors.

Detto. Deyedhvam. Damyette.

Hobbs quits VUSAC job

By BEN FORSTER

Ernie Hobbs' resignation from his $2700 a year job as Victoria University Student Council's full time research assistant came among a flurry of other resignations at last night's Council meeting.

Hobbs' job had come under considerable fire in the past few weeks as a portion of the student body had made its dislike of paying him, instead of having more social functions at Vic, well known.

A petition demanding a referendum on Hobbs' job is circulating at Vic, and at recent VUSAC budget meetings, the priorities of the Council in hiring a full-time Assistant went under severe attack.

Hobbs denied that his resignation had anything to do "with the petition for a referendum on my position" that is circulating at Vic. Yet he did say he resigned "because Council has not reacted positively and educated students toward the position of Council assistant."

"I don't like to be bound to the position of saying nothing while Council says nothing as well."

In a move intended to counter Hobbs' resignation, Tim Young, the Council's President, moved an amendment to the constitution, which would make the president's job a full time paid one. "I've been confused and unable to provide real leadership," said Young. "With a full time president Council can get out of the doldrums." As an afterthought, he threatened to resign if this constitutional amendment was not passed in the next two weeks.

As well as Hobbs, John Sparks, the Communications Commissioner, Tammy Shack, Communications Commissioner, and Glenda Stark, the Internal Affairs Commissioner resigned, the first two citing excess work loads as reasons and Stark declaring that "as a Council member I cannot operate under the priorities which the Council has set."

Quebec crisis inevitable

By FRANC STURINO

Over 200 Toronto Wafflers and sympathizers crowded into a Bloor St. auditorium Tuesday night to discuss the present crisis concerning the War Measures Act.

James Laxer, a Queen's University lecturer and author of the "Energy Poker Game," lashed out at the Federal government but pointed out that by the very nature of Canada's birth, the present events were inevitable.

"Confederation was the work of the English capitalist class who won over French Canada by certain sham concessions: giving them a province, establishing a federal system, and granting certain language rights. But no recognition of a French nation in Canada was made. As a consequence we have a national colony within Canada," he said.

It was the awakening consciousness of this "colony within Canada" personified by the birth of the radical trade union movement and the Parti Quebecois that brought Trudeau to the point of dictatorship on October 16. The Front de Liberation du Quebec was merely a scapegoat by which to "get at the large number of people in Quebec which Trudeau and Bourassa could not stomach," Laxer said.

Laxer lamented on how easily "war hysteria" can be manipulated. The arrest of 14 union leaders including Michel Chartrand of the CNTU and Theo Gagne of the United Steelworkers (remember the Murdochville strike?) as well as rank-and-file activists in the Front d'Action Politique (FRAP, the labour-backed municipal party in Montreal) and the Parti Quebecois, were cited as perversions of justice.

Pointing to the fact that Quebec contains 41% of all the unemployed in Canada, that wages are 20% lower than in Ontario, and that it currently faces an acute urban crisis due to the movement of rural families into the cities, Laxer demanded that social ills be fought with social solutions. He criticized Bourassa's trip to New York this week to try to raise two billion dollars for resource "development" as a selling out of our resources which can only lead to greater unemployment.

Laxer's solution for keeping Canada together called for a coalition of the left in English Canada with that of French Canada, each respecting the other's right to self-determination.

"The left must oppose the War Measures Act and its substitutions and it must educate people about their exploitation," he said.

The second speaker, Toronto Civil rights lawyer Clayton Ruby emphasized the legal aspects involved in the War Measures Act.

Ruby said that the Sedition and National Defense Acts gave plenty of power to the federal government with which to handle whatever "emergency" there was.

"There has been no attempt to show that parts of the Criminal Code were not workable," he said.

Ruby agreed with Laxer as to the real purpose of invoking the Act.

Ruby was especially bitter about the section which made it a crime "to communicate or to have communicated information of an unlawful organization." This made against the law what was not against the law yesterday. The weight of this section was aimed at one man-FLQ lawyer Robert Lemieux. Along with the clause outlawing "advocacy of the FLQ" it has in fact imposed censorship of the press since printers will not print anything which can be seen as even mildly controversial.

Ruby was harsh on the sections of the Act which made it legal to imprison an innocent person and to defer charges for 21 days after which he can still be detained for another 90 days without trial. "They can then let him go and as soon as he takes two steps outside the station they can re-arrest him", he said. Ruby noted that this is an exact parallel to the detention laws in fascist South Africa.

In his conclusion the civil rights lawyer volunteered a perceptive observation that "we in Canada do not have a tradition of civil liberties like the United States, but a tradition of trusting the government. The past two weeks have shown that this can no longer work."

March against War Act

Demonstrators will march from Queen's Park to City Hall tomorrow to demand the repeal of the War Measures Act.

The march, organized by the Vietnam Mobilization Committee, was granted a parade permit yesterday although similar VMC demonstrations have been harassed by officials in Edmonton and Vancouver.

Vancouver police refused Thursday to grant a permit to VMC demonstrators in that city. However, in a last minute development yesterday Vancouver mayor Tom Campbell over-rode the police decision and granted the marchers their permit.

In Edmonton, the VMC were banned from marching down Jasper Avenue Saturday. The marchers will take a different route.

"Our Vietnam protest demonstration will be an assertion of the right to public assembly and the right to demonstrate," said Toronto VMC organizer George Addison in a printed release Wednesday.

Demonstrators will mass at Queen's Park at 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Announce new Dean

The appointment of Dr. A. E. Safarian as Dean of the U of T Department of Graduate Studies was officially announced yesterday by Simcoe Hall, some two weeks after news of the appointment first appeared in both the Varsity and the U of T Bulletin.

The new Dean, a Canadian continentalist economist, is widely known for his studies on foreign ownership of business in Canada.

Zolton speaks 'Trudeau is a kidnapper'

By LINDA McQUAIG

"Prime Minister Trudeau has no business criticising kidnappers when he himself is a kidnapper," said Zoltan Szoboszloi, who calls himself a traffic summons consultant.

Mr. Szoboszloi claims that he was arrested without charge last February, and that false arrest is equivalent kidnapping.

"We are living behind the limey curtain," he said. "Canada is nothing more than a British colony."

According to Mr. Szoboszloi, the British North American Act is a criminal conspiracy for the exploitation of Indians, Eskimos, Irish, Scotch, immigrants, and even the English men who immigrated to Canada to escape the British Crown and infamous British justice.

He refers to the Act as the "Junk", and the "thalidomide baby of some criminal-minded Britisher which causes the exploitation of everybody in this colony."

"God save everyone from the Queen and from the infamous British justice!"

For the past several years Mr. Szoboszloi has devoted much of his time to defending accused traffic violators from "British imperialism."

He also claims that many of our Canadian laws are criminal, such as the Food and Drug Act, under which confiscated drugs become the property of the Queen.

By this the RCMP is in fact peddling dope to the Queen, he suggested.

At present Mr. Szoboszloi is attempting to sue the city and the TTC because the subway vent in front of his Yonge St. office pollutes the surrounding air, and blows girls skirts up as they walk past.

The one and only BORIS KARLOFF strikes again in a double horror bill.

Students at Montreal teach-in condemn War Measures Act

MONTREAL (CUP) — The 1,000 people who turned up for the teach-in at L'Université de Montréal Wednesday night were all of one accord in their condemnation of the War Measures Act.

The teach-in, held in an auditorium at U de M was sponsored by Le Comité Québécois pour la Défense des Droits Démocratiques, and attracted mainly students.

Police were in small attendance dressed as spectators.

CBC reporter Michel Burdon protested the interference with the news. He said the control of the CBC French language station has been so strict during the kidnap crisis that "We are always half an hour later than all the other stations."

Jean Drapeau was allowed in to preview a news film dealing with municipal politics and when the film was shown a piece was cut out of the interview with Paul Cliche, leader of FRAP, where he refuted FRAP's connections with the FLQ.

Julles Gariepy of the Syndicate des Journalistes, said there was a psychosis of fear that had gripped many journalists during the past week and which had resulted in them holding back publication of all that they knew.

Several speakers drew applause from the audience by comparing the present military occupation of Quebec with earlier anti-military statements made by present members of government.

Lawyer Paul Unterberg quoted a passage from Pierre Trudeau's book Federalism and the French Canadians: "Now as everyone knows the army is not a good school of democracy whatever the worth of the cause which it is defending."

All speakers accused the federal government of using repressive actions to maintain themselves in power.

During the meeting those attending also discussed the formation of small civil liberties committees to ensure that prisoners are treated well. As well groups are being formed to study the War Measures Act in greater detail.

Canada can hurt US weapons manufacture

"Canada has supported every step in the American escalation in Vietnam", stated George Addison, Executive Director of the Toronto branch of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee Monday night.

During a discussion at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, he also clarified Canada's role in the U.S. war operation and suggested that by cutting off nickel sales to the States, Canada could seriously hamper the manufacture of weaponry.

The speaker's anti-war sentiments were graphically impressed earlier upon the discussion group by the film "How I Won the War," a surrealistic attempt to show the absurdity and the brutality of war.

Have you considered this Leadership Profession?

The qualities of leadership show up in men who have chosen Chartered Accountancy as their profession, since those who are resourceful, have a keen analytical sense, enjoy meeting and working with people and can stand strong on their convictions, are the business leaders of today. Museum downs Varsity

The Varsity will be distributed under the counter at the Royal Ontario Museum henceforth, the museum's secretary-treasurer has decided.

J. H. Harvey this week informed ROM staff, by memo, that copies of The Varsity will be kept at the Information Desk at the Museum, but not in public view.

"... Members of staff wishing to pick up a copy, may do so by asking," he instructs.

Harvey explains that this move was necessary because of "increasing use of 'adult' language in The Varsity."

"I think it is unwise to leave supplies of this paper in full view as has been done in the past," he adds. "in view of the number of small children and their parents entering the Museum."

Until this week 50 copies of the paper were dropped off in the museum front lobby.

Campus police bust pub

Campus police threw ten people out of the Black Hart Pub for singing bawdy songs at approximately 7:50 last night.

Larry Chvertkin, who was playing the guitar to the full pub of about eighty, explained what had happened.

"After we went through milder songs, like the engineer's Lady Godiva song, I started playing some better, i.e. more bawdy, songs. All of a sudden, a group of about 15 to 20 males joined in on the North Atlantic Squadron song etc."

After about ten minutes of playing bawdy songs, "the lights went on and we were told by the fellow who was in charge of the pub that we could sing clean songs but not dirty songs. He threatened to call the cops. Within two minutes, a few campus cops busted in and started throwing people out," Chvertkin added.

Valliere's book still in library

Repression does not exist at the University of Toronto.

Students inclined towards violent revolution can pick up a copy of Pierre Valliere's "Les Negres Blancs d'Amerique" in the Sigmund Samuel Library — but not for a while.

Two copies of the book, which was removed last week from the shelves of McGill's library, are registered as being in U of T's main stacks.

One copy however is signed out to a faculty member until December 23; the other, although missing from the shelves, is not signed out.

According to H. C. Sholler, Assistant Librarian, the library has been under no pressure to remove Valliere's book.

"Do we have a copy?" he asked. The U of T Bookroom, although out of stock of Valliere's book, has more on order.

"As far as I know there's been no hassle," said a Bookroom spokesman. "But," she added in an undertone, "you'd better be careful if you're going to get it."

34 students withdraw

"We do not consider the decisions of the faculty council legitimate" since the withdrawal of 34 student members of the Arts and Science Faculty Council last Monday, said Brian Morgan, a spokesman for the 34 students.

Dean A. D. Allen of the Faculty of Arts and Science was not available for comment on Brian Morgan's statement, last night, since he was reported away for the weekend.

A referendum, written by the 34 student members, will be finalized at an open meeting at Bickersteth Hall, Hart House at 4:00 p.m. today.

A letter will soon be sent out explaining why the student members have withdrawn. It will announce a future referendum which will probably take place in three weeks.

BOOKS

Here is bibliographical information on John Holt's What Do I Do Monday?, a review of which appeared on October 28 in the Varsity. Published in Canada by Clark, Irwin, it costs $8.35.

Ann and Myron Sutton have done a book called Exploring With the Bartrams; (Thomas Allen has the Canadian rights, and charges $5.25 for the book. I jumped at it because hooks by or about John and William Bartram, Quakers and colonial American naturalists, are rare enough.

The only limitation of the Suttons' book is that it was written primarily for an intelligent teenage audience; I was stung by curiosity and meagre information in a catalogue. The facts in it I believe are accurate: the Bartrams explored and described southern Ontario and what are now the southeastern United States, giving names to various plants and animals and sending samples to England for the estates of royalty and other rich patrons.

The Suttons' hook is decorated with maps of the Bartram's horseback travels, and many drawings, some of them reproductions of Bartram originals. The dialogue is natural, though some of it may be invented, and there are numerous passages from the Bartrams' writings.

The difference between father and son is striking. John Bartram, died in 1777 at the age of 78, after a life devoted to vigorous study, correspondence and travel. His six-acre Philadelphia garden, in 1850, 27 years after William's death, had 2,000 species of plants in it.

William Bartram, born in 1739, marched to a different drummer. He shunned social intercourse and took to the southern woods, living peacefully among Indians while he made his most important discoveries. John Bartram lost his cool when he contemplated Indians. The Suttons report him saying to William: "God Almighty be praised for your goodness toward the Indians, my son. I still maintain that the only way to make peace with them is to bang them stoutly."

William wrote that the Cherokees were "... tenacious of the liberties and natural rights of man; ... honest, just and liberal, and ready always to sacrifice every pleasure and gratification, even their blood, and life itself, to defend their territory and maintain their rights."

Of course such praise wasn't beloved by local reviewers, but in Europe, William was recognized as an excellent scientist by his peers and the English Romantic poets mined his Travels for referenceto exotic Americana.

Information about the Bartrams is dismally sparse in Toronto. An excellent hook by Josephine Herbst, New Green World, is out of print, but is in the library up at York. Editions of the Travels are not in S.C.M., but are in the library of the ROM. John Bartram's works are available in the U. of T. holdings, in microfilm and micropint.

FILM

Tonight you can catch the fifth and final segment of Hart House's Film Festival Teach-in, "And the Second Horseman Was War". The War Game (Peter Watkins) and A Plague Upon Your Children (BBC) begin at 7:30 in the OISE auditorium. Following the films, there will be a discussion on chemical and biological warfare, led by Dr. Ursula Franklin.

The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance, the last in the U of T (Innis) Film Society's "Triple Ford" sub-series, will be screened on Monday, Nov. 2 at 8:00 in UC 104.

On Tuesday, Nov. 3, U.C.'s Comparative Literature on Film Series presents Great Expectations. Show times are at 7:00 and 9:00 with a discussion by Mr. de Groot.

If you're a film maniac and still haven't caught King Kong (USA, 1933) on the Late Show, do not despair. On Wednesday, Nov. 4, at "Pandora's Movie Box" 11 Trinity Square, you can see the great prehistoric beast wrap his hairy fingers around poor Fay Wray and do battle with a squadron of airplanes from atop the towering Empire State Building! On the same bill at 7:00 and 9:15 is Run by Jack Kuper, 1962).

Cinema Lumiere has a good line-up of revival films next week. You can catch: Nov. 1-4, Godard's A Woman Is a Woman (1961); Nov. 1, King of Hearts (1966); Nov. 5-6, John Ford's Seven Women (1965); Nov. 5-11, Before the Revolution; Nov. 7-8, The Night of the Following Day (USA, 1969). Call 920-9817 for exact times.

FLICK OF THE WEEK: After having seen Genevieve Bujold in Paul Almond's Act of the Heart, I am doubly happy that it was Goin' Down the Road that won the Etrog as Canada's best feature film.

As you recall, Act and Road were the leading heavyweight contenders for the title of Best Movie in Canada's version of the Oscar Awards a few weeks ago. Although the star and the director of Act of the Heart netted individual honours, the film as a whole fell short of greatness.

Bujold plays Martha Hayes, a hick-town Quebecoise in her late teens who comes to Montreal to look for a job as a singer. With misfortune as a companion, she finally decides to stay at a widowed friend's (Monique Leyrac) and offer her services for free in a church choir. During rehearsals for a large concert she falls in love with Father Ferrier (Donald Sutherland), and the two of them try to find a middle road between love of man and love of God.

DANCE

It's an event of singular importance Monday when George Balanchine's New York City Ballet, one of the top companies in the world, takes over the O'Keefe stage. There are four different selections. So, either save your money or select the night very carefully. After 7 p.m. student standby tickets are available for $2.

Toronto Dance Theatre is a good contrast to Balanchine's classicism. It's playing at 12 Alexander St. until Nov. 8. It is a finely honed ensemble run by a choreographic triumvirate. Peter Randazzo's works are inspirations. David Earle's sensual, and at her best, Patricia Beatty's dances are good fun.

MUSIC

The Faculty of Music Scholarship Fund Series continues this Sunday, Nov. 1 with the Orford String Quartet and tenor Garnet Brooks. Ticket info at 928-3744.

Soprano Christa Ludwig will make her Toronto debut at Massey Hall at Monday, Nov. 2 as part of the Greater Artists Series. Tickets at 363-7301. The Toronto Symphony Series "A" continues Tuesday and Wednesday (Nov. 3 & 4) with pianist Alicia de Larrocha in works by Dvorak, de Falla and Beethoven.

Also on Tuesday, then Wednesday and next week, the U. of T. Opera Dept. at the Faculty of Music presents Gluck's Iphigenie en Tauride, considered to be his greatest (and last work). Tickets are $2.00 at the box office, 928-3744.

ROCK

A large number of things is about to break forth on the Toronto music scene, so save your pennies. Upcoming folk shows include:

David Rae at the Riverhoat for another week and a half, followed by Seals and Crofts. Tom Rush and Livingstone Taylor at Massey Hall on Nov. 20, followed by Leonard Cohen on Dec. 7, and James Taylor on Dec. 10. Tickets for all shows are scaled from $3.50 to $5.50. Bruce Cockburn has been signed to do a show at York, also in the near future.

Miles Davis at Massey Hall on Dec. 3 is not to be missed. Jazz devotees may also be interested in seeing Gary Burton at the Colonial and Ramsey Lewis at the Town till this Sunday.

Rock shows include Chilliwack (formerly the Collectors) in concert with the Toronto Symphony which is cancelled. Little Charles at the Cog d'Or followed by the Platters on Nov. 2, and the UC music show at Convocation Hall this Sunday for a paltry $1.50.

The special show of Alice in Wonderland will take place at Ryerson Auditorium in early November. Last hut not least Rod McKuen's first Canadian appearance will occur at Massey Hall on Nov. 23 & 24. Tickets will go sale at Massey Hall Nov. 9 and are scaled from $4.50 to $6.50.

If all those who have expressed an interest in writing music articles could try to drop by the Review office on Tuesday afternoon between noon and two-thirty, I would greatly appreciate it. Any new prospective writers are more than welcome.

Strong Harrier team prepares for finals

By CLIVE HOBSON

Varsity runners are out for revenge. After a disappointing second place finish at Guelph last Saturday, Varsity's cross country team are looking forward to tomorrow's University of Western Invitational cross country meet at Waterloo.

This meet should prove to be an excellent warm up for OQAA championships to be held next Saturday.

Varsity is fielding a strong team and has amongst its runners, recent OQAA 10,000 metre winner Brian Armstrong, Interfac 10,000 metre winner Ritchie Pyne, and hopefully veteran Dave Bailey.

Coach Fred Foot has put Bailey's name on the list, although it is not certain whether he will run, but it should give Western a pre-race fright.

The course will be about five miles in length and this should favour runners like Matt Duncan, Jim Smith, Peter Pimm and Paul Glynn, all consistent at five and ten thousand metres. Varsity's main opposition should come from Western and Guelph.

Western has two strong runners in OQAA triple winner Grant McLaren and OQAA triple runner up Chris Bolter.

Waterloo's Brian Pearson is always a threat and after his disqualification last Saturday, Pearson may just be up to make amends this week. Another Waterloo runner to be regarded highly is Brian Bisson. Bisson finished second last week and also ran second in the OQAA ten thousand metres. Both he and Pearson could easily displace a few runners in the top ten, although overall the Waterloo team should be no threat to the Team Title.

Dave Smith from York was the individual winner last week. Smith is a consistent runner who has four years experience and one Canadian Championship behind him. He definitely poses a threat and should place in the top three. Again York with very few secondary runners, should present no threat to the team title.

Varsity will probably have about nine runners competing. However, under OQAA rules only the first seven finishers will count, with only the first five scoring, the sixth and seventh finishers will serve as displacers.

Water Polo Blues dunk Guelph

The season opened with a splash last Saturday. The Varsity Water Polo Club rolled to a pre-season victory in convincing style, as they trounced the University of Guelph Gryphons 20-1. The scene of the lopsided victory was the Hart House pool, home ground for the Blues for the remainder of the season.

Returning letterman Dave Breech and Chris McNaught dominated the first quarter. Rookie Alex Fedko scored two goals and the quarter ended with Blues holding a 7-0 lead. The play continued in much the same manner for the remaining three quarters as the game was totally dominated by the offensive play of Varsity.

Every man on the squad scored, and veteran goalie Tap Aavasalami backed all this up with solid goaltending as the Gryphons only managed to get on the score sheet with a lucky second quarter goal.

On paper the line up looks strong, they have the much needed experience in McNaught, Breech and Makesky; they have speed in Alex Fedko and Terry Bryan. Goalie Tap Aavasalami is consistent and reliable, and a flood of rookies Gagnon, Brydon, Wilson, and Jamieson look to be excellent prospects and give the team needed depth.

This Saturday presents their bona fide trial and if they live up to expectations the University could see another championship team this season. Game time is 12 noon in the Hart House pool... and girls, they wear bathing suits!

Rally falls short as Engineers upset Vic.

Vic running back Steve Stone (30) dashes 20 yards to score the first major in a last minute rally that just fell short.

By STAN KOROLNEK

In the biggest upset of the inter-collegiate football season, Engineering (2-2) knocked Victoria College (3-1) from the ranks of the undefeated 13-12 on Wednesday. At one point in the fourth quarter, Engineering led 13-0.

On the second play of the game, Vic lost their brilliant quarterback Terry Bridle through injury. Later in the second quarter defensive stalwarts Steve Duvenor and Balmly Beacher Jake Lipssett were tossed out of the game. This left Vic short-handed in three vital positions, for the remainder of the game.

Engineering linebacker Dedur, playing a sensational game, scored the lone plumber touchdown on a 40 yard interception. Doug Ellsworth's toe supplied a field goal and the Engineer's defense counted two safety touches when the Vic punter had two snaps sail over his head into the end zone.

For Vic, back up quarterback John Baird heaved TD passes to Sonny Wade and Steve Stone, Wade's touchdown coming on the last play of the game. Instead of going for the game-tying convert, Vic went for broke and Baird's pass to Wade was caught just out of bounds.

The loss dropped Vic into a tie with PhysEd. This tie will be broken next Wednesday when the two teams meet for the second time. Vic won the first 13-0.

McGill-Varsity rivalry is finished

By LYNDON LITTLE

It's as good as official now; intercollegiate sports at McGill have been suspended indefinitely beginning next fall. Tomorrow's football game with Blues at Varsity Stadium could be the last McGill-Varsity battle in a rivalry that dates back to 1898.

The miserable trail of events which began early this fall and which has finally culminated in the suspension last week have already been widely publicized.

Facing an eight million dollar operating deficit for the 1971-1972 academic year, a special high-level budget cutting committee was formed this summer. With their goal set at a 3.5 million dollar cut, this group immediately set their eyes on McGill's 223,000 intercollegiate budget.

Last Wednesday, the Board of Governors approved the committee's recommendations.

THE SITUATION is especially sad when one considers that, next to Varsity, McGill has accumulated the nation's best overall championship record with 252 intercollegiate titles to their credit.

Who murdered intercollegiate sports at McGill?

Three prime suspects have been rounded up and grilled by the Montreal press in the last few months.

The culprit mentioned most often is the provincial government at Quebec City; which has been accused of taking a prejudicial attitude to the province's number-one Anglo-Saxon educational institution when time comes to split the post-secondary educational pie.

The McGill authorities claim that they have only received 25 of the 35 million dollars they expected this year.

Another suspect is the McGill Athletic Department itself. The athletic establishment, it has been suggested, has been aware for quite a while the present situation was coming up and yet failed to mount a counter-offensive.

The third incriminated group is the McGill students who, despite the fact they are admitted free to the football games, have not shown up in significant numbers. Even more unfortunately, the ones who have, generally behaved themselves so badly that prospective alumni season ticket holders have been driven away.

AS FOR tomorrow's game with Blues, Redmen head coach Tom Mooney will be trying everything in an attempt to terminate the McGill-Toronto series on a winning note.

With Dan Smith their fine passer still sidelined with broken ribs suffered in the humiliating loss to Waterloo, the Redmen can be expected to rely heavily on their strong running game which features Dave Fleiszer, the leagues top rusher.

For Blues, the expected return of star center Rich Agro is a big plus, especially so considering the way they were plagued with inaccurate snaps in last week's Western game.

Walt Sehr, who tested his injured hamstring last week against the Mustangs, could start at defensive rover.

Blue Notes — With the grid season quickly coming to a close, there are important games in the other football conferences this weekend. Out west, the Manitoba Bisons, or Henry's Herd if you prefer, meet the U of Alberta Golden Bears in Edmonton in a game that will likely decide the WCIAA title. For a while, it looked as if the Bisons had it all locked up. But last weekend Harvey Scott's Bears went into Winnipeg and broke the undefeated string of the defending champs at 13 games with a 29-24 victory.

Goals, goals for Soccer Blues

By DON McMAHON

"When it rains, it pours" and as the saying goes the hapless recipients of the Soccer Blues' wrath, Waterloo Warriors, suffered a humiliating 7-2 schelach on their home campus Wednesday.

The game nearly failed to start as the officials never showed. However, this writer volunteered his services and in short order, Blues were ahead 2-0 on goals by Mario DaRosa and Dave Evans.

The Warriors showed signs of life when J. Edwards hammered in a carelessly handled ball, however big Da Rosa came through with two more and Ersin Ozerding did the hat-trick route, one coming on a penalty shot, as Blues completely dominated the game.

This was the first game Blues have realized their great potential and their extreme efficiency in ball-control, passing and scoring will set the pace for Saturday's big finale against McMaster, at Toronto.

Standout play was the hallmark of the forward line and, although defensive errors cost Blues two unnecessary goals against Waterloo, the general defensive strength was a key factor in their domination. Blues complete their schedule on Wednesday at Guelph in a match which might well mean the O.Q.A. championship — if fortune comes to Varsity's aid. Fans are welcome on Saturday . . . front campus at 12.00 noon.

Notes: Some credit should be given to the Engineering front four, of Altman, Brydn, Lemmon, and Wiecek, for holding the strong Vic running game for little yardage throughout the game.

Frustration is over for Ruggerites

By UNCLE HARLS

The Waterloo Rugger Warriors met their Waterloo at the hands of the Rugby Blues Wednesday afternoon for an impressive 28-3 win for Varsity.

Playing against a gale-force wind in the first half, Blues stalemated the Warriors keeping them pinned down in their own half.

Blues took the lead when scrum-half Bill Gray went over for a try which Ian Owens converted. Just as the half ended, Waterloo kicked a penalty goal to make the half-time score 5-3 for Toronto.

With the wind at their backs in the second half, Blues exploded from the opening kickoff.

With both wingers dazzling all onlookers with their speed and the forwards running roughshod over their opposition, Blues turned on the scoring machine that has been dormant for most of the season.

Blues take on McMaster Saturday at noon.

Playing their final game at Varsity Stadium due to the suspension of their athletic program, the McGill Redmen were hammered 34-0 by Blues. Stepping over the goal line with Blues' final score is split end John Chapman.

Two arrested in Saturday march

By DREW HUTCHESON

Two men were arrested following a scuffle Saturday at City Hall between members of the Edmund Burke society and some anti-War Measures Act demonstrators.

The Toronto police, 100 strong and calmly efficient, arrested Vujica Radijov Savin, 44, of Pinewood Avenue, on charges of assault and bodily harm, and Kenneth Roy Wilson, 26, of Lakeshore Road, Port Credit, on a charge of common assault. When police intervened in a placard joust between a few members of each faction, Savin allegedly kicked Constable Burke in the stomach and Wilson punched Constable Waddell in the nose. Thereafter all violence was verbal.

The shouting, booing, groaning, and whistle-blowing of the Burkers rendered it virtually impossible to hear anyone speak, so the speeches that had been arranged by the Vietnam Mobilization Committee were cut short.

The demonstration, arranged by the VMC, started at 2:30 Saturday afternoon at Queen's Park. About 300 marchers, protesting the Vietnam War, the War Measures

The demonstration, arranged by the VMC, started at 2:30 Saturday afternoon at Queen's Park. About 300 marchers, protesting the Vietnam War, the War Measures Act, Canadian complicity in the war, oppression of auto workers, pollution, the recent arrests at Kent State University and all the cars that honked at them during the march, that led up Avenue Road to Bloor and down Bay to City Hall.

Their chants were varied, bilingual, and noticeably half-hearted until they met about 40 Burkers at City Hall. Then it became necessary to scream louder to be heard, and the marchers' unity improved.

The master of ceremonies of the proceedings at Nathan Phillips Square announced that the following telegram will be sent to the students of Kent State University:

"Dear friends: we share your outrage at the indictment of the 25 brothers and sisters in Kent, Ohio, on 'riot' charges. This is but another attempt by the U.S. government to blame the victims for its violence at home and abroad. We will do all we can to defend the Kent 25."

The Burkers sang "O Canada", and the leftists cheered.

The VMC speakers tried to control the tension among their numbers with such advice as "There's no need of us getting into a big hassle or conflict with a bunch of nuts. . . These characters from the Edmund Burke Society are just dupes for the powers in Vietnam."

Waffle sponsors teach-in today

Jacques Yves Morin, a major Parti Quebecois spokesman and candidate, will speak today at a 1 p.m. teach-in at Convocation Hall concerning the recent imposition of military law in Canada.

Morin is also a professor of International and Constitutional Law at the Universite de Montreal and president of the Estates-General, a federation of French-Canadian organizations ranging from the Roman Catholic Church to the Front d'Action Politique (F.R.A.P.). The teach-in is sponsored by the University of Toronto Waffle movement.

David Lewis, the Deputy Leader of the New Democratic Party and a probable candidate for the federal leadership will also speak.

James Eayrs, professor of Political Economy at the U of T and James Laxer, author of The Energy Poker Game and a Queen's University lecturer, will also address the rally.

Specifically, "a recent Waffle newsletter states, the teach-in "has been organized to discuss the causes and implications of the War Measures Act and the risks it posed to Quebec in particular, and to Canadian society in general."

A third phase of the teach-in will be held at 8 p.m. at the O.I.S.E. Auditorium, 252 Bloor St. W. As well as having Jacques Morin and David Lewis participating, Melville Watkins, co-author of the Waffle Manifesto and Ed Broadbent, a N.D.P. Member of Parliament from Oshawa who has declared his candidacy for the federal leadership will speak.

Special Quebec report

Today's Varsity carries a special report on developments in Quebec as a four page insert.

The report, entitled "The Santo Domingo of Pierre Elliott Trudeau", was written and prepared by staff of The Last Post, a radical Canadian newsmagazine.

On the centre pages of today's Varsity we publish excerpts from the biography of FLQ leader Pierre Vallieres, "Les negres blancs d'Amerique."

Food vendor's license suspended by city

By DEBBIE BALTMAN

Remember Bill Lawson, the friendly Andrews food vendor? Well it's happened again. His license has been suspended for the next ten days.

Last February, Lawson, who hadn't renewed his license since '66 applied for a license and was given a probational one for three months. The condition being that he didn't receive any more summonses. But he did receive more. Bill failed to pick up his license last year, so when he was brought before the court, he was also charged for operating without a license.

Lawson's boss, Stanley Pogson, said that he'd rather have Bill down here working than risk the chance of losing him. So for the next two weeks Bill keeps his driver company.

Stan, described by Bill as a "pretty nice guy", is not only paying Bill for the two weeks his license is suspended but also fought for him in court.

Lawson and his first-stop customers (taxi drivers, professionals) at the corner of Prince Arthur and Bedford Rds., get along well. One of them once asked him why there was a policeman hiding behind a tree across the street, Bill replied, tongue in cheek, "I guess the city's worried about me."

Lawson, when asked why he liked the university so much, since it causes him so much trouble, said, "It's the first place I started and it's here that I built up my business." "I also appreciate all the support that I've had in the past from The Varsity and the university's faculty and students."

Bill's case came before Judge Graham, a Chairman of the License Committee, on Oct. 27th and he was suspended for two weeks. On Nov. 11th he will receive his license on probation for three months.

It's Feb. '70 all over again.

Disposable research urged

Two films which were considered "too powerful for home consumption" concluded the Hart House's Film Festival Teach-in at OISE on Friday night.

The films, "The War Game" and "A Plague upon your Children", described the tactics and results of nuclear warfare and biological and chemical warfare. Both films showed the uselessness of our defense systems.

Dr. Ursula Franklin, a member of the university faculty led the discussion which followed. Dr. Franklin felt that "If we are concerned with protection we should protect everyone in the world." She pointed out that the resources used for scientific warfare might be redistributed, allotting a large portion for public health.

In response to a question about the disposal of nerve gas, Dr. Franklin said, "It's not that they don't want to burn the stuff, it's that they don't want to open it. They suddenly find it's poison." She suggested that a whole new branch of disposable research might develop.

Dr. Franklin said that biological and chemical warfare must be made into a legitimate subject of debate. She pointed out that the Canadian government never thought that its link to American scientific warfare was a problem. The first step is up to the individual and this is to make the argument against scientific warfare "legitimate and pertinent and to present some suggestions for a solution," she said.

Enrolment increase

Does there seem to be more of us around these days? The Senate announced that a preliminary report on enrolment counted 31,126 students enrolled as of October 1, 1970.

19,596 students are in full-time undergraduate programs, 5,894 in full-time graduate programs; 3,735 are part-time undergraduates, and 1,901 are part-time graduate students.

This preliminary report from the Office of Admissions indicated a slight increase of students on the St. George Campus.

Fed up writing essays?

This is directed particularly at everybody who has written anything for The Varsity so far this year. Why not come and write for The Varsity?

We're having a huge meeting this week to talk about newspapers and stories and what kind of work and stuff. Hopefully the first of a continuing series. This includes political animals like Quebec and male chauvinism, if you want it.

A feature attraction will be a genuine live workshop in news-writing.

As you can see, this will be a bang-up marathon meeting. Starting at 12 noon on Wednesday at 91 St. George. It could last for many hours (would you believe two) and it's more important than classes.

If you've never been in The Varsity office before and are interested, please come on up. (Even today or tomorrow, why not?)

Oh yes, lest we forget. The week will end with a monster party. So come up and get the details.

Message to the Staff and Students of the University

You will recall that I announced in April of this year the establishment of a Presidential Advisory Committee "to consider the nature and extent of university social welfare responsibilities in their broadest context". Since that time a group consisting of the representatives of the A.T.S., G.S.U., S.A.C., A.P.U.S., U.T.S.A., the administration and the existing welfare services has been meeting to discuss the question of a possible composition and terms of reference for this committee.

This group has now reached a resolution of these problems, with which I am in complete agreement.

The composition of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Social Responsibilities will be as follows:

- 3 teaching staff
- 3 students (1 undergraduate; 1 graduate;
1 part-time degree student)
- 2 support staff
- 2 administrators
- 1 representative of the existing welfare services in the university

The general terms of reference that I outlined when I announced the establishment of the committee will include discussion of the following topics:

(a) General University Policy Relating to Social Responsibilities

(e.g. the provision of services such as nurseries and day-care centres, the provision of subsidized or free tuition for staff members' children, discrimination against various groups, including women, in hiring, admissions and services provided, etc.)

(b) University Community Services

- (1) Student-oriented services, such as University Health Service, Career Counselling and Placement Centre, the Advisory Bureau and other counselling services on campus, the International Student Centre, the Housing Service and university-operated housing on or off campus, Hart House chaplain service, athletic associations, etc.
- (11) General Community Services, including cafeteria and food services, police and security services, publication of university newsletters and bulletins, the aesthetic environment of the university, provision of social/academic centres and of social facilities in academic buildings, etc.

(c) Relationship of the University to the City and Surrounding Community Including such matters as use of university-owned property in the community, involvement of the university in city and community decisions affecting the university etc.

This is by no means an exhaustive list of matters which might be discussed as possible social responsibilities of the university. The committee will also welcome any matters that are brought to it for consideration by members of the university at any time during its deliberations.

It is expected that the committee will give consideration to the long-term involvement of the university in many of these areas of social responsibility. This necessarily involves analysis of the university's present and past commitments in these areas, and the development of a philosophy for the future on which decisions about priorities in the use of funds can be based and which will give the university sufficient flexibility to deal with new and evolving social responsibilities. I expect that the Committee will also consider the financial basis of the services which the university is committed to provide, (i.e. partial university subsidy, total self-support, etc.), and the extent to which the university, rather than the public at large, can be expected to find funds for the additional social responsibilities which it may take upon itself as part of its responsibility to the public in the area of higher education.

Robin Harris, Principal of Innis College.

Robin Harris resigns

Robin Harris, principal of Innis College has resigned, effective June 30, 1971.

Harris denied that the cancellation of the building project influenced his decision. "Absolutely not, the delay has nothing to do with my resignation," he said.

Freezing of building funds for the university had forced the cancellation of a proposed building containing classrooms, offices, and a residence for 576 students. Its construction would mean that Innis would need 1500 students to make use of the facilities. "It's an excellent design for that many students," Harris said, but he feels that Innis should remain "about the same size as it is now with a maximum of 800 students."

He sees an advantage to the present size of Innis and thinks that the university should continue to provide small colleges as well as large ones.

Harris, who taught English at UC before his appointment to the principalship, said "I am basically a teacher and I wish to devote the remainder of my time to teaching and research."

The new principal will be chosen by a selection committee with students, faculty and alumni represented.

Ryerson sale announced today

TORONTO (CUP) — American control of the Canadian school room will become even greater in the future with the announcement today of the sale of Ryerson Press to the Canadian subsidiary of McGraw-Hill of New York.

The sale of Ryerson, a major text book publisher for Canadian schools, comes just five weeks after an announcement of the sale of W. J. Gage Ltd., Canadian textbook publishers based in Toronto to a Chicago-controlled company.

Ryerson Press, which has been owned by the United Church of Canada, and which was founded 140 years ago by the Methodist Church, publishes elementary and high school Text books used across the country, as well as paper back books and the United Church Observer.

The cost of taking over the Canadian publishing house by the Giant U.S. company has not yet been announced.

According to published reports, Maclean-Hunter Ltd. of Toronto had made an earlier offer of over $1,000,000 to purchase the firm.

Apparently, Ryerson is losing money quite rapidly — $500,000 over the past three years according to a spokesman for the United Church.

Students 'Grass Poll' favours legalization

VANCOUVER (CUP) — An overwhelming number of those students who bothered to vote in the nation wide campus "grass poll" have called for the legalization of marijuana.

At the University of British Columbia, of the ten per cent of the student population who voted, 1,698 were in favor with 568 against. At the University of Victoria, 67.3 per cent of those who voted said yes.

From Notre Dame University also in B.C., came 200 votes in favor with 82 opposed and 11 abstentions.

Only 423 voted in favor at the University of Calgary, but there were just 132 who said no.

The turn out at Carleton with 742 yes votes and 237 no votes was not much better.

Results from Quebec came from Bishop's in Lennoxville where 42.5 per cent of the student population voted — 76 per cent of them in favor and 25.1 against.

Additional reports from last week's Canada-wide poll are still filtering into the University of British Columbia where results are being tabulated.

Publishit or be...

Sometime today it will be announced that Ryerson Press, one of Canada's largest and oldest publishing houses, will be sold to an American publishing corporation.

The Ryerson Press was founded almost a century and a half ago by Egerton Ryerson, the Upper Canadian cleric. It was owned by the Methodist Church, and its successor, the United Church of Canada.

The reason for the sale is simple — Ryerson has been losing large amounts of money, totalling about half a million dollars in the last three years. When Ryerson is sold, ownership will go to McGraw-Hill of Canada Ltd., the U.S. subsidiary of a huge publishing corporation.

Five weeks ago, another Toronto publishing firm, W. J. Gage Ltd., was acquired by a U.S. corporation, Scott Foresman and Co.

Both of these sales are simple reminders of the fact that large sectors of the Canadian economy are daily being transferred to American control.

Last year there were 102 corporate takeovers; in 1968 there were 155. Since 1963 more than 600 Canadian firms have sold out to foreign interests.

The fact that two major Canadian publishing houses have been forced to sell out indicates something very significant about the Canadian book market.

Every year English Canadians spend more than $178 million on books.

Yet of that expenditure more than 70 per cent is spent on books published outside of Canada.

The U.S. was the major supplier, selling more than $100 million worth of books in Canada in 1969. This figure had grown substantially from the $63.4 million American booksellers cornered in the Canadian market in 1966.

With the disappearance of two more Canadian firms, the proportion of Canadian produced books sold in Canada can only plummet further.

A little known sidelight to the Canadian publishing scene is an important difference in copyright laws. U.S. authors are forbidden by law to publish their books outside of U.S. borders and then have them sold in the U.S. Canada has no comparable provisions.

This means that Canadian publishers are forbidden to lure U.S. publishers into mutually profitable arrangements, while best-selling Canadian authors can easily be convinced to take their books to U.S. rather than to Canadian firms.

The structure of the Canadian publishing industry is clearly subordinate to that of the U.S. industry, when you consider this kind of information.

But the question which is always raised at this point is what difference does it make to us who controls the Canadian economy, who controls the publishing industry.

Both Ryerson and Gage were publishers heavily involved in supplying books for the lucrative public school and university markets.

The sellout of the textbook publishing industry is simply one further step in the total Americanization of Canada. Universities — both students and faculty in particular — should be alarmed by this latest development.

For Canadian students and faculty who are trying to rescue the Canadian social sciences from the oblivion to which the North American ruling class has consigned them, the emasculation of the Canadian publishing industry is a major setback.

For students and faculty who want to make education here at U of T and throughout the country responsive to their priorities, the increasing Americanization of the textbook industry is another major challenge.

The fact that these two book publishers have been forced by market conditions to sell out, important as a result of the fact that they, like other corporations, operate on the principle of maximum profit.

From these latest developments we should draw the conclusion that the ownership of the means of communication should not rest with private corporations.

This is a concession which nobody is willing to make.

Although the federal government has set a precedent by establishing a corporation to aid the development of a Canadian film industry, it has been remarkably silent on other similar issues.

And of course, on this particular issue, there hasn't been a squeak out of Ottawa at all.

Could it be they're not on our side?

Tricky Dick's "super-mammoth" peace offensive!

Military rule (not next door)

As US President Richard Nixon desperately tries to steer America right, he may have occasion to gaze up north where he has a laboratory example of what would happen in North America should the government wish to suspend civil liberties. Here we reprint an editorial from the Daily World, a left-wing New York daily. The editorial was entitled "Military rule next door".

The events in Canada are crucial for that nation and, simultaneously, have grave significance beyond Canada's borders, especially for ourselves.

Prime Minister Trudeau has imposed a military dictatorship over Quebec, under the War Emergency Act. He did so without even consulting the Canadian parliament where he has a solid majority.

In comments to a TV newsman outside parliament in Ottawa, Trudeau reveled opponents of his militaristic action as "weak-kneed" and "bleeding hearts." This is the language, also, of the forces of repression in the U.S.

As one Canadian newspaper columnist said, "Trudeau 'out-Agnewed Sprio'."

That embraces not merely the anti-democratic cry of Agnew, but the anti-student incitement of President Nixon in his four-state barnstorming tour at the weekend.

The search and seizure powers invoked by Trudeau are mirror images of the provisions of the anti-'crime' bill signed last week by President Nixon and of scores of similar state enactments here.

Trudeau has acted, in the context of the Canadian situation, in the spirit of the police-state toward which capitalism is resorting in increasing measure. Trudeau is carrying the banner of totalitarian rule. That is the banner which Nixon, Agnew, Mitchell, and Hoover would hoist here.

The French Canadian population of Quebec is discriminated against in wages, educational standards, health facilities, housing and employment opportunities. The recession in the Canadian economy, paralleling our own, has aggravated the plight of the Quebecois still further.

The blow struck at Quebec is a blow to maintain that inequality, a blow against democratic rights. It is therefore a blow at democracy in Canada as a whole, for continuing the subjection of part of the nation.

Trudeau's actions should remind all workmen and women how ready big business and its handmen are to dispense with democratic institutions and rights.

Anarchist actions, including murder, were made to order for Trudeau, for Canadian monopoly, and for all the fascist-minded in Canada. They have imposed an unconscionable burden on that struggle. They have helped Trudeau, not the cause of French Canadian liberation.

The people of Canada, especially those of Quebec, have the firm moral support of all U.S. democrats who see in Canada the emergence of a garrison-state system which threatens all of us.

'Terrorism does not make revolutions'

The terrorism in Quebec and its present consequences illustrate once again that repression issues from the barrel of a gun more often than fundamental social change.

Indeed there is no case on record where bombing, arson, robbery, assassination, kidnapping, or sabotage have rallied large numbers of people to any cause or brought down an establishment. Such methods have been successful only in carrying out "palace revolutions" or, when used by the establishment, in beheading or destroying potentially revolutionary movements.

Terrorist tactics, and even terrorist rhetoric, have always led to political demoralization, isolation, and annihilation when practiced by the left. Typically, the terrorists (often aided by provocateurs) give governments the excuse to engage in repression that goes far beyond their ranks. Moreover, their actions and propaganda assure wider popular support for such repressive measures than would otherwise exist.

It is for these reasons that the mainstream of the socialist movement and its greatest leaders, such as Marx and Lenin, have condemned terrorism.

The only positive result for which one may hope from the current disaster is that sincere ultra-leftists may turn away from the childish, romantic cult of violence and toward the hard work of winning the support and participation of the millions of people who alone are capable of bringing about the revolutionary changes required if mankind is to survive.

Student architects challenge Victoria campus centre plans

Dr. Hodgetts, President of Victoria College found he had to deal with a group of interested U of T student-architects, outsiders to Vic, at the Wednesday Teach-In planned to publicize the evolving plans for the Vic campus centre and to elicit student and faculty opinion. Chairman Hodgetts opened the meeting by making it clear that the presentation would be uninterrupted and inconclusive.

Architects Weller and Ross of Gordon Adamson and Associates have researched the project for nearly a year but agreed that their presentation was "deliberately vague" because they are not sure what the campus centre should be now, or in ten years. They are anxiously awaiting returns from a survey of Victoria College members.

The architects presented an underground centre connecting existing Birge-Carnegie, Victoria College, and Burwash Hall buildings. Slides of vague drawings and of a model deemed by Weller as "too detailed" were shown. The architects reminded all present that the proposal was just a site selection and not a building, yet the most important decision (i.e. building underground) had already been made. A questioning Vic librarian was told that building the centre would freeze spending which she felt was needed for an expanding library. Oddly, the Vic library has no windows in the main section, yet is built above ground while the centre is underground.

Ross then explained land-use economics governing site selection. The site was chosen to maintain present spaces between buildings and to pursue a notion of centrality. Questioners were told by a student on the centre committee that it was felt that the building should be as central as possible, reasoning that "It has been shown that people won't walk a hundred yards to go to it."

Dr. Hodgetts squelched an effort by a student-architect to demonstrate that the lecture-like proceedings defeated the idea of a teach-in involving everyone's public participation.

A brief presentation by Mr. D. W. McGibbon followed, assuring that financing of the campus centre could be worked out. An ensuing question period during which Dr. Hodgetts gave priority to members of Vic over any outsiders, exposed issues of: 1. the validity of developing an autonomous, isolated Victoria College community via the proposed campus centre, and 2. the general uncertainty of what amenities for whose use will be housed in the centre.

It was disclosed at the meeting that at present 70 per cent of the Vic enrollment take classes outside of Vic and do not return. It is thought that the new centre would encourage these people to return. One Vic professor asked whether, since this percentage has increased from 60 to 70 per cent in 3 years, a Victoria campus centre was the answer. He suggested perhaps that changes were needed in courses and teaching methods at Vic to improve interest.

For the student-architects, the real issue was: Who will be invited to use the campus centre? The 'outsiders' criticized the architects' deliberate vagueness in masking a presentation with 'shoddy' uninformative drawings and an unmeaningful model. The students recommended that the architects think in terms of human use rather than land use.

Surely, if you are trying to fashion a community as Vic is attempting to do, it is important to give people a reason to come together. Architects rely on providing artificial elements of community such as 'common' rooms, but what is needed is common ground. Restaurants, laundromats, shoe repair shops, movie houses, and grocery stores ensure use by everyone including children, secretaries, grandmothers, visitors, as well as citizens of the university.

The campus centre could guarantee public access and use by renting space to private restaurants, not caterers, which must have public business and contact with the street. Connection to the Museum subway stop would initiate planetarium-museum-college contact by establishing a doorway to the campus centre on the west sidewalk of University Avenue.

Shortly after the 3 p.m. bell, Dr. Hodgetts, having evaded any issues of conflict, concluded the meeting.

US college editor says Varsity 'outstanding'

A friend of mine just sent me about five issues of The Varsity; including the FLQ Manifesto. They're all outstanding.

The implications of the FLQ are international; she writes: "The implementation of the War Measures Act... will help establish a precedent for future reactions of established governments to revolutionary movements within their countries."

Consequently, I would be interested in subscribing to The Varsity; and securing permission to reprint articles relevant to educating American students as to how the FLQ affects them.

From White Niggers of America

ONE OF THE FIRST PEOPLE to be arrested on Oct. 16 under special wartime powers was Pierre Vallieres, an intellectual leader of the 1966 FLO and author of Negres Blancs Blancs d'Amerique — White Niggers of America. As a result of his involvement with the FLO, Vallieres spent three-and-a-half years in jail without bail, awaiting trial. While in prison, he wrote the largely autobiographical Negres Blancs, in which he describes the Quebec society in which he grew up and outlines the alternatives for which he is working.

Since his release on bail in May, he has worked towards building a broadly based Socialist movement in Quebec. Thursday night, Oct. 15, just hours before his re-arrest, Vallieres spoke at a student rally to support the FLO. He called for all Quebecois to come together and fight for the liberation of their nation. But he warned that provocation of the army and police at this point would be suicide and he implored the students to play it cool. Although his call to action received prominent publicity, his latter remarks were largely ignored in the English press in Canada.

Vallieres was born in 1938 in the squalid east end slums of Montreal, the son of a workbr in the CPR's Angus Shops. When he was seven, the family tried to escape the slums by moving to Longueuil-Annexe (later Ville Jacques Cartier) a new community on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. But, as Vallieres describes in the following excerpt from Negres Blancs, Longueuil-Annexe was no paradise either.

"The shack was made of wood covered with 'papier brique', a kind of tarpaper designed to look like brick. In the centre front was a little white porch. Inside, only three rooms: in them middle, a kitchen, which also served as dining room, living room, bath room, etc.; to the left, a large bedroom which my parents shared with Raymond (who was not yet walking); lastly, to the right, a tiny room with a double-decker bed and a chest of drawers; this was the room of 'the two oldest,' Andre and me. The rooms were separated by walls of 'donnacona' a kind of hard, thick cardboard which could be bought quite cheaply from any dealer in building materials."

Manufactured by Domtar in the Portneuf region (I think), 'donnacona' was easy to cut up, install and paint, and it was usually sold in panels four feet by eight. Many of the shacks that went up in Ville Jacques-Cartier in the years following our arrival were built entirely out of two-by-fours and broad panels of this economical cardboard, which was then covered with tar-paper. It was not exactly warm in the winter, but it didn't cost much, and with this miraculous material you could build a little house in two days!

Our shack seemed almost luxurious compared to most of the hovels in Longueuil-Annexe, which were covered with black tarpaper and looked like sinister old shanties abandoned in a swamp. On rainy days especially, Longueuil-Annexe looked like a burnt-out shantytown. The only trouble with this shantytown was that it was inhabited, to adopt the phrase of the Quebecois poet Roland Giguere.

AS CAN BE SEEN, paper played an important role in the construction of the houses, which were also called "shit houses", "Papier brique," tarpaper "donnacona" . . . From the surplus wood and paper they did not export back

These pages are written in Montreal in the midst of a whirlpool of events whose final solution one can only begin to glimpse. This is not an explanation of the grievances of Quebec—that must come later, and some even think it's already too late for that, years too late.

This special preliminary report has been prepared by the staff of Last Post magazine, working with journalists in Montreal, Ottawa and Quebec City, whose examination of events, and their treatment in the English press outside Quebec, has given them the profound conviction that too much has not been told, and too many questions have failed to be raised in the explosion of events.

It is our aim—those at the Last Post and those of us in the papers and broadcast media who have joined the Last Post in this effort—to raise questions about the motives of men in power in the cataclysmic days of October, perhaps not to answer many of them, but to begin the urgently needed examination of what some have already begun to call:

The Santo Domingo of Pierre Elliott Trudeau

In the peak of the hysteria about "apprehended insurrections", "coups", and "armed uprisings" that was being cried from Ottawa, one reporter remarked, in the wry wit that sometimes comes out of frightening events, that "This is the first time in this country we've had a counter-revolution before having had a revolution."

The remark won't stand in stead of cold analysis, but it has a grain of truth in it, and at least it underscores some of the unreality of the events that exploded on the cool morning of Monday, October 5.

It had been a singularly quiet year in Montreal, which has been accustomed over the last few years to rushing mass demonstrations in the streets, gunfights at the Murray Hill garages, police strikes, student strikes and occupations.

The most significant political event was the April 29 election, in which the liberal-separatist Parti Québécois of René Lévesque won one quarter of the popular vote and a tenth of the National Assembly's seats. But that had been an electoral battle, fought in the ballot box. The streets have been quiet, relatively. The largest demonstration this spring in eastern Canada had been in Toronto at the American consulate after the invasion of Cambodia, and nothing approaching it occurred in Montreal.

Much of the organized left was in disarray, the rest of it was either working in the Parti Québécois or working with citizens' committees. The rise of the citizens' committees, which reflected the left's shedding its student image and working in clinics and with labor unions reflected a very peaceful form of political activity.

Quebec's novice Liberal premier, Robert Bourassa, hopped down to the U.S. to make his first major plea for American investment and for loans—a reflection of his assessment that things were cool and that investors would be more prepared to shell out in the apparent climate of stability in the province.

In Ottawa, Prime Minister Trudeau delivered a glowing Throne speech at the opening of parliament, expressing his confidence in the state of Canadian confederation.

Parliament was gearing for its first major debate on the most immediate critical issue—pollution.

Then, the whole balloon began to burst.

In the early morning of Monday, October 5, James Cross was kidnapped, whisked away from his home on wealthy Redpath Crescent by four men in a cab. Hours later, the police announced that it had received, via a popular French radio station, a communique from a group that claimed to be a cell of the FLQ, and that James Cross would only be released if the government released 23 men jailed for terrorist and other activities, read the FLQ's manifesto on the crown's television network, delivered $500,000 in gold bars, released the identification of an informer who had turned some previous FLQ men in, and rehired the Lapalme postal delivery men whom the government fired for striking.

The government, in a series of statements that culminated the following Saturday with the televised speech of Quebec's Justice Minister Jérôme Choquette, said "no".

Within half an hour of Choquette's speech (too soon for it to be a response to his speech), Pierre Laporte, the Labor Minister of the Quebec Government, and Bourassa's number two man, if not the strongman of the Liberal government, was kidnapped by four other men outside his home in suburban Montreal.

The confusion in government circles in Ottawa and Quebec City following this resulted on Thursday, Oct. 15, in the entry into Montreal of 7,500 federal troops armed to the teeth, reportedly to "aid the police" by guarding principal buildings and people. The troops were later called into Ottawa's exclusive Rockcliffe Park section to guard members of parliament and cabinet ministers.

On Oct. 16, at 4 o'clock in the morning the Trudeau government invoked the War Measures Act, the most powerful document at its disposal, giving it next to dictatorial powers.

On Saturday night, following a curious set of events no one has yet been able to explain, the body of Pierre Laporte was found by the police in the trunk of a car near the St. Hubert air force base in suburban Montreal.

A nation's hysteria is unleashed.

Suddenly we are back where we were five years ago. A cold civil war is being fought along national and linguistic grounds. The country is polarized, but not on social issues, on issues of language and race.

The political life of this country is never going to be the same. Quebec is never going to be the same.

What happened to so disturb the calm of a listless October and so hurl a nation into a tortured vortex of political explosions, so violent a shift of the forces in this country, so sudden an alteration of the stakes of the political game? Who wins, who loses?

What happened between October 5, and today?

Who was making what decisions?

What were their strategies?

What may be the fruits of their strategies?

Was it a hunt for kidnapers and terrorists, a hunt that went wild, or were there more basic, long-term motives that directed the men in power over the first four weeks?

With an urgency that cannot be underestimated, we must begin to piece together the beginnings of answers to these questions.

The plot

Of all the strange answers that have blown in the October wind, none has been stranger than the coup d'état that never took place. This supposed plot—or these plots, for the exact details depend on which government spokesman you happen to be listening to—has been referred to again and again since October 16, and it is worth examining closely.

The most recent version of the conspiracy theory is that of Defence Minister Donald MacDonald.

According to MacDonald, we are on a "revolutionary timetable", and the kidnappings are part of a "well-known revolutionary formula." In a CTV interview, October 25 he said that "on the whole, you had a pattern of incidents here which, given the revolutionary ideology we're talking about, in other situations and in other countries has escalated itself up into a state of disorder in which it will be virtually impossible to carry on the normal processes of government and which would provide, if you like, a situation ripe for revolutionary action."

Another important characteristic of the FLQ is "the fact that they're not organized. If in fact there had been a highly structured organization it would have been even easier for the police to break."

On October 15, however, Montreal police chief Marcel St-Aubin, said he was having difficulty investigating the FLQ because of "the internal organization of the movement, as it is divided into numerous small cells." It was St-Aubin's statement, along with covering letters from Mayor Drapeau and Premier Bourassa, that was used in the House of Commons the next day to justify the invocation of the War Measures Act.

According to Nick Auf der Maur, a CBC Montreal broadcaster and member of the Last Post editorial co-operative who was arrested under the Act and spent three days inside Quebec Provincial Police cells, the police in their questioning appeared to believe that every demonstration, bombing, and strike that had happened in Quebec in the last two years was part of the conspiracy. He says they see the FLQ as being organized along the lines of the Mafia, and they believe that if they could only find Comrade Big the game would be up.

St-Aubin said the kidnappings are "only the beginning" of "seditious and insurrectional activities." But Bourassa the next day said the FLQ had reached the "final stage" of its plan. The first three stages of the plan had already been carried out: violent demonstrations, bombings, and spectacular kidnappings, in that order. "The fourth step—the most important—is selective assassinations." The government had "every reason to believe" the FLQ was now prepared to carry these out. He added that "already" political leaders had received assassination threats.

There were hints at more than this. Federal Justice Minister John Turner said October 21 that "it might not ever be possible to disclose to the public the information on which the government made its decision."

Prime Minister Trudeau, however, said in the House October 26 that "the facts on which we did act are known to the people of Canada and indeed to this House." When Opposition Leader Stanfield immediately pointed out the apparent discrepancy between Trudeau's statement and Turner's, the Prime Minister said there was in fact no discrepancy. There may be information, he said, that the public doesn't know. But that is irrelevant, since the known information was what the government had acted upon.

Perhaps the fullest exposition of the conspiracy theory came from Jean Marchand, once a prominent Quebec labor leader, and today not only the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in the Trudeau Cabinet, but also the man charged with keeping an eye on his five million restless countrymen who live in Canada's second-largest province.

"Those who are well-protected behind the Rockies or even in the centre of Toronto don't know what is happening in Quebec right now," declared the Quebec expert in the House of Commons a few hours after the War Measures Act had been signed. There were conspirators who had "infiltrated all the vital places of the province of Quebec, in all the key posts where important decisions are taken." There were at least two tons of dynamite, detonators and electric circuits for setting off bombs, thousands of rifles and machine guns, bombs. "For whoever knows the FLQ right now," said the shuddering expert, "whoever knows this organization will cannot do otherwise than recognize that the provincial state of Quebec and the federal state are really in danger in Canada."

As the startled members of the House of Commons soaked this up Marchand perorated: "If we had not acted today, and if, in a month or a year separation had come about, I know very well what would have been said in this House: 'What sort of government is this? You had all that information in your hands and you could have used emergency powers and you did not do it. It's a government of incompetent people.'"

Just to make sure that the people who lived behind the Rockies, well-protected from the fanatics of French Canada knew what was going on, Marchand re-stated and even elaborated his claims on a British Columbia hot-line show a week after the government had struck. He had a new sensation to offer: the Front d'Action Politique (FRAP), the main opposition party in Montreal's civic election, only days away, was a front for the FLQ, (whose membership had now shrunk to "between 1,000 and 3,000"). There were to be explosions, more kidnappings, perhaps assassinations on election day. Anarchy was then to spread through the province, and after the province the nation. Thrones were to topple as the conspiracy leap-frogged across the continent.

In the end, of course, none of this happened. And perhaps more surprisingly, remarkably few conspirators were turned up by police. Even with the awesome powers of the War Measures Act, with its license to search, seize and arrest on no stronger grounds than mere suspicion, and with so many raids that, after 2,000, even the most conscientious reporters lost count, the police could come up with fewer than 400 captives. And of those, they could hold onto only 150 as October closed.

Is it these 150 people then who have placed the established order in Canada in grave danger? If so, they must indeed be supermen. And the police do not appear to be trying very hard to find out. According to Auf der Maur, Robert Lemieux, the lawyer who had acted as negotiator for the FLQ, was questioned for a total of two minutes during the first eight days of his imprisonment. Pierre Vallières, a leader of the 1966 FLQ, was also questioned for two minutes in these eight days. Charles Gagnon, another leader of the 1966 FLQ, was not questioned at all.

On one occasion, Prime Minister Trudeau observed to a bemused House that Kerenky too had been "pooh-poohing the possibility of an insurrection."

Mr. Trudeau is wrong; Kerenky knew very well that there was going to be an insurrection, and with good reason. For to state the parallel is to see its absurdity. Was Montreal on October 16 Petrograd, where in the Putilov plant 40,000 workers were prepared to go out into the streets, and the Grenade works had its entire work force mobilized in the Red Guards? Or was it Moscow, brought to its knees during the final weeks of the old order by widespread strikes?

Still the government now chose to spread scare stories about a sudden revolutionary upheaval, a notion it had repeatedly dismissed in the past. A year ago, Montreal's Drapeau administration journeyed to Ottawa for the government's investigation into the activities of the Company of Young Canadians. Piles of captured documents were produced to demonstrate that a far-ranging conspiracy was on the move. It was repeatedly noted at the time that, while the documents showed lots of smoke, it was difficult to find any fire. Beyond the well-known fact that FLQ cells existed, and might carry out isolated, anarchistic acts, the rest was vapor. The Drapeau administration's evidence was laughed out of town.

Two previous, abortive attempts (according to the police) at kidnapping people in high places, including the American consul-general in Montreal, had been taken with equanimity. And so, indeed, had the kidnapping of James Cross: there had been no indication in the first week of the crisis that upholders of the status quo had better nerve themselves for the crunch.

Nor did even the second kidnapping, that of Pierre Laporte, bring about sudden fears of insurrection. Why then did the government choose to unleash the vast conspiracy theory on October 16? Why did it give credence to a picture of the FLQ that could not be believed by anyone who had any knowledge of the situation in Quebec, that it could not have believed itself, but that might conceivably be widely believed in English Canada since the government and the police are the only sources of information?

One clue comes from Jean Marchand's Vancouver interview, for it contains more than the accusations that made the headlines (reaction to his statement about FRAP was so adverse that Prime Minister Trudeau had to dissociate himself from it the next day, and Marchand himself had to back off). Marchand made some other statements in that interview that, in the long term, may be a lot more significant. Having averred that there are between 1,000 and 3,000 members of the FLQ, Marchand says:

"Now all members of the FLQ are not terrorists. But there are enough to create a lot of trouble and a lot of killing and this is what we are trying to prevent."

Not all FLQ members are terrorists!

Then what are they?

Who is the FLQ?

Or more to the point: Who isn't?

If not all members of the FLQ are carrying arms, planning assassinations and stashing bombs, what are they doing? Organizing in the labor unions, perhaps. Organizing demonstrations, or working with FRAP and the Parti-Québécois.

Maybe if you're a leftist or a Péquiste, you're in effect FLQ? The net is suddenly a little wider, and out for more fish, than we have been led to believe from the impression that the government was just hunting two or three kidnapping cells.

Is Marchand saying that the FLQ is everyone who is working for a socialist or independent Quebec?

Let's follow more of Marchand's interesting analysis.

He says: "How in a society like ours can such a movement like the FLQ flourish. You knew a year ago, two years ago or even five years ago that there were FLQ members. But as long as they do not recourse to violence, under which law can you do anything?"

None, Mr. Marchand. If they do not resort to violence they are not violating the Criminal Code. But perhaps exactly what Marchand is saying is that we need laws by which the government can arrest and prosecute those that follow their political aims even by peaceful means. This seems incredible, so let's follow what he said further:

He makes the point that "it is not the individual action we are worried about now. It's this vast organization supported by other bona fide organizations who are supporting, indirectly at least, the FLQ."

Mr. Marchand is not worried about the kidnappers, he seems to be saying, but about the people who "do not recourse to violence." People—it's now a "vast organization"—who are supported by bona fide groups.

What are these people doing? Where are they?

Marchand refers to "many important institutions in Quebec" that have been "infiltrated" by this strange breed of non-violent FLQers.

If there are so many people, in so many areas and institutions, it's going to be pretty hard to ferret them out. Especially if they lack the decency to commit a criminal act and facilitate the government's job of destroying them.

And so we come to the most distressing statement of all, and Marchand states the aims of the government bluntly.

"Well, if it had been an isolated case of kidnapping I don't think we would have been justified in invoking the War Measures Act because there the Criminal Code would have been enough to try and get those men and punish them. But there is a whole organization and we have no instrument, no instrument to get those people and question them."

Let's summarize the implications of Marchand's logic.

There is a vast conspiracy of people numbering from 1,000 to 3,000.

They are not all terrorists, in fact some hold highly respectable and critical positions, and some have the protection of other bona fide groups.

They must be rooted out.

The Criminal Code permits us to root out kidnappers and killers, but not people who commit no crimes.

Therefore we need an "instrument" by which we can go after these people who commit no crimes, and it's not simply a question of kidnappers.

Is the Trudeau government seeking a circumvention of the laws of this country in order to launch a hunt that extends into the highest reaches of Quebec, into the most respected, bona fide groups, in order to ferret out these dangerous people?

Whom is the Trudeau government after?

The politics

The apprehended insurrection-coup-plot-uprising-revolt grows more ridiculous every day, and it is evident that it does so from statements made even by federal ministers. Certainly, as far as armed uprisings of one to three thousand people are concerned, the government never believed its own case. It allowed and encouraged the story to spread in order to use it as currency to buy time and public support to keep the War Measures Act in force.

It is possible to piece together with some certainty that Trudeau, on the eve of implementing the emergency powers, feared he was losing control of the situation in Quebec, of French public opinion, to the nationalists and moderate separatists.

The Prime Minister had grounds for such fears. Contrary to the early statements by both federal and provincial spokesmen, a significant portion of the Quebec population had not recoiled in revulsion at the FLQ's action. Predictably radical youth, certain labor organizations, and a startling percentage of average citizens were reacting favorably to the content of the FLQ's political analysis, if not to their modus operandi. But even while most of the sympathetic repudiated the acts themselves, the FLQ's highwayman élan and the governments' inept responses left many Québécois inwardly pleased.

That much can be established. Whether Trudeau thought the strange events in Quebec were bringing the province as close as it had ever come to separating, however, can only be speculated right now.

What is very probable is that, as hints in the Marchand interview might suggest, Trudeau at least saw the opportunity to move decisively against the separatist-nationalist tide in Quebec and set it back for years, if not stem it forever.

One of the most significant statements of the motives of the Trudeau government, and the steps by which it arrived at making the drastic move on October 16, is to be found in a column by Toronto Star Ottawa editor Anthony Westell appearing the day after the Act was invoked. Westell, a long-time Ottawa columnist formerly with the Globe and Mail, has extremely good sources inside the Liberal cabinet, and, along with Toronto Star editor Peter Newman, is one of the three or four most important Liberal Party intimates in the national press gallery.

Writing under the heading "The Agony Behind Trudeau's Decision", Westell examined the basic premises on which Trudeau approaches the current situation in Quebec:

"The answer begins with Trudeau's analysis of the rise of separatism in the past five years. The decline and fall of the Lesage Liberal government, he believes, left a power vacuum which Union Nationale premier Daniel Johnson did not fill because he never took a firm position for federalism. René Lévesque left the Liberals to lead the Parti Québécois into the void, and win almost a quarter of the votes in the election this year."

The Trudeau administration's entire strategy toward Quebec is to make sure that the vacuum of social contradictions and frustrations is never left as open territory to the separatists, and particularly to René Lévesque. The Trudeau government fell over backwards pumping money and organizational talent into the election campaign of new Liberal leader Robert Bourassa, scarcely concealing the influx of everything from top advisers to Trudeau's personal hairdresser to Bourassa's side. The province was saturated with a well-oiled campaign that reeked of money, and no one had any doubts that much, if not most of it, came from the federal Liberals.

When the FLQ struck, Westell reports, "Trudeau's instinct was to refuse negotiations or concessions to the terrorists. Nor were there any doves in the federal cabinet."

But he stresses that "... Trudeau grew increasingly concerned at the threat to Bourassa's fledgling and inexperienced government posed by the new terrorism."

Initially, the threat came from one specific source—the vacillation of the Quebec cabinet in the face of Laporte's kidnapping five days after Cross's abduction.

Trudeau's strategy of strength depended on Bourassa emerging as the strongman, the pillar of fortitude around which Quebec could rally, the dam that could keep the flood-tides of nationalist and separatist feeling from moving into that dangerous political vacuum of which Westell spoke.

"But with the kidnapping of Quebec Labor Minister Pierre Laporte, the crisis changed and deepened. It became at once a terrible question striking deep into the hearts and consciences of Bourassa's own ministers. Many Quebec Liberals owe more friendship to Laporte than to Bourassa, a relative newcomer. In the cabinet pressing around the young minister at the moment of crisis, there were agnized men who wanted nothing more than to save their colleague."

"The pressure on Bourassa was enormous. The danger last weekend that he would cave in, opening a disastrous new power vacuum, seemed terribly real."

It has been reliably reported by several journalists, and Westell carries the information, that Trudeau spent hours on the phone at his Harrington Lake summer home encouraging the premier to hold fast.

Marc Lalonde, one of Trudeau's top advisors, is believed to have rushed to Quebec City to buttress the premier at this juncture, when, according to several reports, Bourassa's cabinet was on the verge of crumbling.

The leadership of the crisis, which had appeared to come largely from Quebec with Trudeau in the background making sure things went as he wanted them to, suddenly began to revert to Ottawa.

Here the crux of the entire crisis developed.

It centres around the way public opinion in Quebec was reacting to the kidnapping. Trudeau made at least one tactical error, and one massive political blunder. Those mistakes proved to be the factors destroying his strategy.

Pierre Desrosiers suggests in the weekly Montreal paper Québec-Pressé an interpretation that has also been voiced by Parti Québécois economic expert Jacques Parizeau, and backed up by some reporters in Ottawa. It is this:

Trudeau's initial tactic had been to remain firm, in an effort to force the FLQ's hand. They might have killed Cross: Desrosiers and Parizeau suggest Trudeau was prepared to let that happen, betting public opinion would swing to him out of revulsion. But instead, the FLQ upped the ante. It kidnapped Pierre Laporte. Trudeau's tactic to back the FLQ into a corner had failed.

This unexpected response to Trudeau's immediate strategy, however, would only have been a temporary tactical setback, if Trudeau had not made one critical political error of judgement. He totally misread the climate of public opinion in Quebec.

Westell himself makes this point:

"Another minister feared that after the first shock and outrage at the kidnappings, Quebec opinion was being won around to the rationalization that while violence may be wrong, the terrorists were somehow glamorous patriots fighting a noble cause—the same sort of shift of opinion that happened after Charles de Gaulle's 'Vive le Quebec Libre' speech in 1967.

"A backbencher close to Trudeau expressed much the same fear more precisely," Westell states, "when he said that the Quebec media—television, radio, newspapers—were heavily infiltrated by FLQ propagandists and suggested drastic action would be necessary to eventually deal with the problem." By "FLQ propagandists", of course, the backbencher meant journalists who were expressing the sympathy felt by many in Quebec for the goals and principles expressed in the FLQ manifesto.

"A Montreal MP, on the other hand," Westell continues, "told the Liberal caucus Wednesday that the FLQ was appealing dangerously well to real grievances among French Canadians, and that it would not stand for repression."

We have confirmed that this "Montreal MP" was Marcel Prud'homme, who was taken aback when he took a poll in his constituency and found that the vast majority of the young supported what the FLQ did, and that the older constituents violently condemned the tactic but frequently expressed some sympathy for the content of the manifesto. Prud'homme communicated these facts to an emergency caucus meeting.

Trudeau himself let slip in the Commons a thought that had been more and more in his mind by now—the media were playing into the hands of the FLQ by giving them too much publicity.

The government was so frazzled by this PR problem that, while the cabinet was planning the emergency regulations, it actually considered press censorship, of which Trudeau was the leading advocate.

Trudeau's aides had initially tried to suppress the publication of the FLQ manifesto in the Quebec papers, one of them arguing for an hour with the editor of the National Union paper Montreal Matin, in vain, against running the text.

"As the week wore on," Westell reported in the Toronto Star, "the question as to how to quiet the Quebec media came more frequently into conversations around the government."

"This was because the critical battle was seen as the struggle for public opinion. Would Quebecers rally to law, order and a strong Bourassa government, or drift towards a new 'moderate' position?"

Others arguing in support of this thesis report that Trudeau, when he was unable to prevent the spread of the manifesto in the Quebec press, himself ordered the CBC's French network to broadcast the manifesto, as the FLQ had demanded. They argue that this was a sign of Trudeau's overconfidence that the broadcasting of the manifesto would actually cause Québécois to react against its "extreme" language.

In any event, on October 8, the manifesto was broadcast over the CBC's French network in Quebec, as demanded by the FLQ, and subsequently published in most of the province's major commercial newspapers. The document, broadly expressing many of Quebec's long-standing grievances, states that the FLQ is a "response to aggression", emphasizes the foreign exploitation of labor and resources, and voices the need for a mass-based revolutionary upheaval. Its spirit was one with which many Québécois found they could identify, and their clearly established failure to retreat in horror provided the federal government with its greatest shock.

FRAP, Montreal's union-and-citizen-based civic opposition movement, publicly endorsed the objectives of the manifesto, while rejecting the FLQ's tactics. It added that it could not condemn the violence of the FLQ without condemning the violence of the system, and its statement enumerated a long list of labor and political conflicts. It also noted that the FLQ's terrorism is directed not against wage workers but against the violence of the establishment. However, FRAP said it opted to fight with democratic means.

The executive committee of the Laurentian and Montreal Councils of the Confederation of National Trade Unions expressed their unequivocal support of the manifesto.

Montreal Council president Michel Chartrand (now in jail) said the authorities were getting extremely agitated by the possible death of two men but did not seem to be able to summon the same anxiety for thousands of people whose lives were potentially threatened by a walkout of medical specialists.

Later he said "who's scared of the FLQ? Are the workers terrorized by the FLQ? Are the students terrorized by the FLQ? The only people who are afraid of the FLQ are those who should be scared—the power elite. So who says the FLQ is terrorizing the population?"

The union-financed weekly Québec-Pressé editorialized that the FLQ's analysis was "exact", and that the horror of an armed, clandestine movement should be counterpointed to the horror of the better-armed, equally clandestine established authority.

A survey of opinions on "hot-line" programs on popular French stations in Montreal showed that the vast majority of callers condemned the actual acts of the FLQ, but over 50 per cent supported the spirit of the manifesto.

A CBC interviewer took a survey in front of a French Catholic church after 11 o'clock mass on Sunday, and found that condemnation of the acts was almost universal, but that half the people he talked to expressed sympathy for the things said in the FLQ manifesto.

Student newspapers came out in favor of the FLQ, some with grave reservations about the tactics, others not. At l'Université du Québec, virtually the entire student body went on strike in support of the FLQ's aims. About 30 per cent of the faculty walked out too. At l'Université de Montréal, 1,500 students struck and said they would go into the community to muster backing for the FLQ's goals. Several junior colleges and even some high schools closed down.

Only hours before the War Measures Act was brought in, with federal troops already patrolling Montreal's streets, about 3,000 students rallied at the Paul Sauvé Arena to hear Michel Chartrand, Pierre Vallières, Charles Gagnon, and the undisputed hero of the day, Robert Lemieux. Fists raised, they chanted "FLQ FLQ!", just as Ottawa was preparing to make their cry illegal.

Opposition was also coming from other, more unexpected sources. On Wednesday, October 14, a group of French-Canadian moderates, led by René Lévesque and Claude Ryan (whom no one had ever imagined as political allies) issued an attack on Trudeau's statements, lambasted the premier of Ontario, John Robarts, for shooting his mouth off, and urged the government to release the 23 prisoners the FLQ wanted transported to Cuba or Algeria. The group criticized "certain outside attitudes... which add to an atmosphere that has already taken on military overtones—a situation which can be blamed on Ottawa."

It is a matter of general agreement among the Ottawa press corps that it was this statement that tipped the balance. Trudeau realized he was losing ground in Quebec, that a flood-tide of opposition to Ottawa was rising. With the Bourassa government shaking in the corner, a new alliance of nationalists and liberals and separatists threatened to fill the vacuum.

In a Calgary speech on October 20, Liberal MP Patrick Mahoney said that the statement by ten Quebec leaders (the Ryan-Lévesque statement) urging the exchange of 23 prisoners for the kidnap victims prompted the government to invoke the War Measures Act because these statements tended "to give leadership in the direction of eroding the will to resist FLQ demands."

Anthony Westell confirmed the motivation:

"Only a few weeks before, Lévesque's separatists had been extremists on the Quebec spectrum. With the emergence of terrorism as the new extreme, the perspective changed. Suddenly Lévesque was appearing with Montreal editor Claude Ryan, a nationalist, on a platform urging peace with the FLQ—a new, moderate centre, as it appeared to some."

"For Trudeau, the moment for decisive action to stop the drift in opinion was rapidly approaching."

In a democratic society, drifts of opinions are supposed to be countered by other opinions. Opinions are legal. But the opinions of Québécois who did not support the FLQ but shared some of the views the FLQ and the left have been voicing for years were apparently not to be tolerated.

Pierre Elliott Trudeau had to suspend democracy. He could not triumph in Quebec by moral leadership or by the reason of his position. He had to suspend the laws of the country and the constitutional rights of citizens to combat a drift in opinion.

On Thursday, October 15, 7,500 federal troops moved into Montreal.

At four in the morning of the next day, the War Measures Act was invoked.

The purpose

In the last week, the Trudeau government has written a new and still more implausible chapter into this already strange history.

This is the affair of the provisional government.

Rumors that some prominent French Canadians had planned to set up such a government just before the passage of the War Measures Act had been circulating in Montreal police circles for a week, but there was no public mention of it until Sunday, October 25. Mayor Jean Drapeau, who has just swept into a fifth term as Mayor with control of all 52 City Council seats, referred vaguely to the danger from a "provisional committee" that had planned to seize state power in Quebec.

The next day, the Toronto Star published a story saying the Trudeau government had implemented the War Measures Act because it was convinced "a plan existed to replace the Quebec government of Premier Robert Bourassa."

The story quoted "top level sources" saying "... a group of influential Quebecers had set out to see whether they might supplant the legitimately elected provincial government with what they conceived as an interim administration having enough moral authority to restore public order."

The Star credited the story only "from our Ottawa bureau"; there was no byline. However, the next day Toronto Telegram columnist Douglas Fisher wrote that "both the run of rumour among reporters and the internal evidence of the style and material in the story suggest that it was really the work of Peter Newman, now editor-in-chief of the Toronto Daily Star." Other sources confirm that Newman, a major Liberal Party confidant, was in fact the author of the story.

Drapeau's story now had to be taken more seriously. In an interview with an American reporter the same day, the mayor said "conversations had been held" by influential Quebecers of "good faith" to set up a regime. Although these men of good faith did not intend to open the door to the FLQ, Drapeau said, they would be used by the FLQ.

Predictably, Robert Stanfield was on his feet in the Commons the next afternoon asking the Prime Minister to account for the reports. Was this part of the unrevealed information that had led the government to invoke the War Measures Act? The Prime Minister said no. But he also refused to repudiate the rumors unequivocally, saying it was not the government's "habit to deny or confirm such reports."

Other journalists report that Newman not only went to "top-level sources", he went to the top source of them all, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and that the basic outline of the story, at least, came from him. Other cabinet ministers and high civil servants were only too happy to confirm the story to their favorite reporters. There appears to be little doubt that the story got out not only with the Liberal government's knowledge, but with its active encouragement.

Newman's story did not name names of people involved in the supposed provisional government plot, but it was clear he was implicating the "influential Quebecers" who had signed the statement of October 14 calling for an exchange with the FLQ. Claude Ryan and René Lévesque both denied the report Wednesday morning, Ryan in an editorial in Le Devoir, Lévesque in his column in Le Journal de Montréal.

Ryan strongly denounced the government for playing the game of the deliberate leak. "This is so gross," he said, "that the more one tries to untangle it, the more it appears ridiculous and stupid. I was going to write: malicious. I am not sure of that. Mr. Trudeau and his friends are out to get certain dissidents; I nevertheless don't believe them capable of such baseness. I would rather believe that they were carried away by panic."

The next day, a far more plausible version of what had happened appeared in several newspapers, and has been confirmed by the Last Post's own sources. The alleged plot to overthrow the Bourassa government was in fact, a plot to save that government.

Just before the passage of the War Measures Act, there was widespread concern in Quebec about the position of the Quebec government. All the direction in dealing with the Cross-Laporte kidnappings was coming from Ottawa, which was imposing a hard line in refusing to negotiate with the FLQ.

In addition, Bourassa was facing extreme pressure from the Drapeau-Saulnier administration in Montreal. Most of the intelligence upon which government decisions were based was provided by the Montreal police force and their go-between, Michel Coté, the city's chief legal counsel. Earlier in the week, the Montreal police had arrested lawyer Robert Lemieux and seized all his confidential legal documents, in defiance of the provincial government. Montreal police were operating independently of the provincial government, while the Drapeau équipe consulted directly with Ottawa.

Bourassa was left with the feeling that he had virtually no control over Quebec's most powerful police force, while being faced with a Trudeau-Drapeau axis that was calling all the shots.

Within Bourassa's own cabinet, there was considerable support for the idea of making a deal to save Laporte, but, reports Dominique Clift in The Montreal Star, most of the political heavyweights—Justice Minister Jérôme Choquette, Education Minister Guy Saint-Pierre, Finance Minister Raymond Garneau, and Health Minister Claude Castonguay—supported the hard line. Choquette even placed his resignation on the table as a gesture of determination, Clift says.

Bourassa, who privately shared the doubts about the hard line and the concern about the position of his government, was caught in the middle. This was the reason for his ambiguous public statements during the crisis, carefully designed to pacify both the hard-liners and those who wanted to negotiate.

It was in this context that proposals were made that Bourassa open his cabinet to include a broad spectrum of Quebec leaders, to enable it to deal more credibly and effectively both with the FLQ and with Ottawa. Claude Ryan broached the idea to many people who, along with him, might be included in such a cabinet.

Clift concludes that treating the suggestion as a plot to overthrow the government "was in fact a smearing and dishonest representation of Ryan's proposal which had nothing subversive in it but had been naively inspired by vanity and misplaced sense of his own political importance."

The idea of opening his cabinet came up in one conversation between Bourassa and a friend after troops had already entered Montreal and just hours before the passage of the War Measures Act. "I thought of that," Bourassa said, "but it was too late."

What concerned Ottawa when it heard about the proposal, however, was that it might indeed have worked, that such a Quebec government might have been able to deal firmly with Ottawa and take its own course in dealing with the FLQ. There was nothing unconstitutional about the proposal, but it was one more indication of the degree to which Ottawa was losing control over opinion in Quebec. Like Lyndon Johnson, faced with the prospect of a democratic, left-liberal government in Santo Domingo, Pierre Elliott Trudeau moved in.

LBJ had his lists of "known Communists" to justify the invasion. But the New York Times found that several of the "known Communists" were in fact dead, others were out of the country, still others were in jail.

Trudeau's revelations of conspiracies are of the same order. He will no doubt come up with documents to "prove" his charges: such documents have been popping up for years. On October 29, the Toronto Telegram came up with an Alice-in-Wonderland report of terrorist plots to assassinate five hundred prominent Quebecers; these reports will recur.

But the real coup d'état this October was carried out by Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who with one stroke effected a vast shift of political power. Trudeau "seized the opportunity of the Cross-Laporte kidnappings," says Parti Québécois economist Jacques Parizeau, to carry out "the inevitable confrontation which had to come sooner or later between Ottawa and Quebec." He set back political dialogue in this country ten years, even beyond the stage of "what does Quebec want?" to "what kind of people are we dealing with?"

Initially, Trudeau attempted a policy which depended on broad support in Quebec. The policy failed because that support did not exist. The result was a new policy—a policy of making a virtual desert of all opposition in Quebec, radical, liberal, nationalist, even, in some cases, conservative. The instrument of that policy was the War Measures Act.

This policy too depends on public support, this time the blind, uninformed support of English Canadians. It cannot succeed without their support. They are being used as pawns in a cynical and destructive game.

English Canadians must decide whether they are willing to be used in that way.

THE LAST POST, P.O. Box 98, Station G, Montreal 130, Que.

home, the Americans made cheap building materials to be sold to the cheap labour of Quebec to make them masters in their own house!

Unlike most of the houses, our shack was located not at the back of the lot but in front. There was a little hay growing around, which we were going to try to make into a lawn! To the right, between the street and the house, there was a cement well where you pumped water by hand. My father was supposed to install an electric pump soon, and he was already thinking about building on another room. He was forever making plans, while my mother scrubbed the floors and my brother and I went looking for Indians in the woods across the way.

While my father was expanding the house, to make it more livable, my mother hardly dared invite "the relatives" to visit us. She was so ashamed of "the surroundings" as she said. In spite of the misery that encircled and penetrated his domain, my father was happy to have something to build . . . even if it was only an extension to this jerry-built shack. But my mother dreaded letting others — city people — see our poverty.

It was as if our entire existence was nothing but a daily obscenity. We had to hide THAT from the people of the big city . . .

BUT THE PEOPLE of the big city and the rest of the province soon learned the truth from the newspaper headlines in capital letters reading: THE WHOLE TRUTH ABOUT VILLE JACQUES-CARTIER — BABIES DYING OF COLD IN COTEAU-ROUGE — CITY OF SHEET-METAL.

We would read these reports with rage in our hearts. What were we GUILTY of? Of having wanted freedom? We had never had it. Painfully we were trying to achieve it. Why did these newspapers talk about us as if we were barbarians spewed out by Montreal, like bile spewed out by an unhealthy liver?

For some newspapers, which I need not name, we were not men but "the dirty masses" of Ville Jacques-Cartier, the human "scrap" of the biggest garbage dump in the metropolitan area.

After the stories in the newspapers came the "collections", the distributions of food and whatnot, the CHARITY of all the people who had guilty consciences or who simply adored helping the poor. Fortunately we were not armed; otherwise the Church would have acquired a few more martyrs and the statue manufacturers would have made more money.

EVERYTHING was increasing: the population, the slums, the publicity, the taxes, the number of unemployed, or sick or crippled children and of unwed mothers, the churches, the thugs, the grocers, the thieves, the murderers, the drunks, the wretched . . .

Angus Shops, Vickers, Canada Cement, Canadair, etc., were laying off hundreds of workers every week. And each time the unions said it would only be temporary.

Some families converted their sheds into lodgings, moved into them and rented out their shacks, so as to be able to buy enough "baloney" and Weston bread to feed the "little ones." Others sold their houses — because of the taxes — and went off to build others in Saint-Amable or Sainte-Julie, beyond Boucherville.

More than one mother tore her hair in despair, and more than one man thought of stealing, killing or committing suicide. Some set fire to their houses in order to collect the insurance and try to start over again somewhere else. The Established Order declared that henceforth laziness and slovenliness would be forbidden in Ville Jacques-Cartier, that norms would be established, that those who did not meet them would be expelled and that taxes would be raised in order to force the "lazy" (that is, the unemployed) to leave the city.

THE UNDERWORLD, which with the support of Duplessis controlled the city, tried to put up a respectable front and held numerous press conferences announcing reforms such as Quebec had never known. They began to build schools and distribute little gifts to their friends. Overnight, grocers, wrestlers, bandits became "entrepreneurs" and contractors for primary schools, churches and administrative buildings. All this was financed with government subsidies or "Sunday collections" — in other words, with money stolen from the people, with the broad, hypocritical smile of a gentleman-thief.

The purpose of building schools was not to educate children, but to grant "paying" contracts to supporters of the regime. So it was that Duplessis, financed by his friends on Wall Street, created his own class of petit bourgeois, out of the very misery of the workers and farmers of Quebec who, taken in by a cunningly organized system of patronage, voted for him en masse AGAINST their true interests and without quite realizing what was going on.

Around 1950, a vast, slow construction project was undertaken to provide a complete system of aqueducts and sewers for "the dirty masses" of Ville Jacques-Cartier. The underworld rubbed its hands at the thought of the enormous profits it was going to reap from this very humanitarian enterprise. They began by raising taxes.

One after another, all the streets of the city were transformed into long trenches eight feet deep, with heaps of earth on either side about six feet high. Paths were improved between the houses, piles of earth, trenches, steam shovels, etc. The daily dynamiting cracked the walls of the shacks and ruined the wells, which ran dry or filled up with muddy water.

A FEW PUBLIC drinking fountains were installed here and there, on the privileged streets, which were served by the aqueduct from the first year on. But after a lightning beginning, the work slowed down. Everywhere there were trenches, unusable wells and mud . . . mountains of mud. And the work did not progress: lack of funds, people said. But Quebec had put millions into the project. Where had the money gone? The people asked questions while the months and years passed. The work advanced at a snail's pace, a little here, a little there. In winter all the machines fell silent. The long trenches filled up with snow.

Most families had to collect rain water in huge barrels or buy water by the pail every day from a tradesman to whom the city authorities had granted a monopoly on the sale of water. Water cost five cents a pail. Many families, including mine, had to tighten their belts to buy water for cooking, bathing, doing laundry, etc.

That lasted for years, years during which Duplessis was letting the Americans loot the rich iron deposits of northern Quebec.

The Americans were making billions off OUR iron. Duplessis was making millions off the Americans, the political machine of the Union Nationale was distributing its millions to the supporters and thugs of the regime . . . and we, poor starving wretches, we had to buy water!

Canadian army doesn't allow conscientious objector status

By DEBBIE BALTMAN
 "There is a possibility that what is happening in the U.S. as far as conscription goes, can happen right here in Canada," said Jack Pocock of the Canadian Friends Service Committee, Tuesday. Pocock was speaking as a part of the Hart House Film Festival "And The Second Horseman Was War".
 Pocock, who fought in the Second World War describes himself as "a late blooming pacifist". He said that only one critical difference exists between the Canadian and American armed forces — there is no provision for a conscientious objector in the Canadian Military Code.

He later suggested that conscientious objectors could be tried under the catch-all phrase "dumb insolence".

An American conscientious objector, still fighting his case back home sadly remarked, "There is two different sets of standards, what the law says, and what is put into practice". "If you don't fit into a pattern then you are not qualified to get out of the army."

He described the certain "Catch 22" which prevented his deferment. He had applied for status as a conscientious objector before being drafted and was told to re-apply after signing up. On later re-applying he was told that he should have applied before entering the service.

"It just gets to the point where things don't matter any more," he concluded.

Renaissance '71 seeks new executive producer

The Renaissance '71 project, a Canadian Universities arts festival, is accepting applications for the position of executive director until November 7.

The new director will replace Mrs. Alexandra Mercer, the originator of the project, who is resigning for health reasons.

All candidates for the position are requested to call the project office (921-3859) between 12 and 8 p.m. to obtain information about the project. Applicants will then be asked to submit (in writing) proposals for the organization and personnel of Renaissance '71.

The final choice will be made by the Executive Committee Sunday, Nov. 8, after a preliminary screening by a three man board.

Supplement meeting today, discussion as well

The Varsity supplement staff is having a meeting to organize the next issue, which is on city politics, at 1 p.m. today in the office at 91 St. George.

ALL WELCOME

The Varsity, an elitist left wing rag of biased and unprincipled intent was founded in 1957 by John Foster Dulles, and is published by the United States Information Agency. Hand-printed by a tribe of forgotten Lithuanian pygmies in the basement of the new graduate library, this paper sometimes expresses views which are not necessarily the opinions of anybody, and which usually result from spelling errors. Biased and unprincipled people who were upstairs in the spacious grandeur of the Grauniad last night included such all-time favorites as Barslatt, DeBaltman., Linda and Lyndon McVince, John the Visto and Henry the De-sexer; plus of course Waylogs, bro. jon, daFrank, Laura (who was Tom), Tom (who was Laura), Andi (who was Bob), Jim who was in the dark, and Errol who is. All others need apply. For a free female preying mantis phone 635-8672.

No end to ego

'We're entranced by words!' philosopher

The American Philosopher Allan Watts told a nearly-full house at the St. Lawrence Market Friday night that we are not what we say we are. "The little man inside our head is not there;" there is no end to "the skin-encapsulated ego."

Thanks to Western philosophy, we are, as Dr. Watts put it, "entranced by words," fusing them with reality. But we must know what the categorizing intellect is and does before we can honestly sacrifice it to an apprehended reality.

Watts said we have learned it is impossible to talk about "unclassifiable reality," and so we are "busily engaged in committing suicide." (Here the audience laughed and applauded politely.)

To say reality is spiritual is another falsification of experience, resulting in linguistic statements, since spirituality is a category only partially understood by intellectual comparison of it to whatever is physical.

"The reality is" — and Watts struck a small prayer-gong with its hammer. The sound faded slowly in the quiet hall.

Watts said the 19th Century tried mistakenly to be objective about nature. The psychology of Freud was a result of this attempt by man to separate Self from Other. Watts claimed Freud invented "psychohydraulics" — Newtonian physics applied to a study of the mind. He quoted a phrase of common psychological jargon — "Damning up the libido."

Dentistry takes lead in U of T blood drive

Has the War Measures Act made your blood curdle? It almost seems so, for the turnout for this year's Blood Drive is far below expectations. The optimists at the Red Cross Centre hoped for 3400 pints of blood; only 1231 men and women have so far offered to bleed.

Dentistry has again taken the lead with 311 blood donations so far.

The Blood Drive is on for one more week. Today and Tuesday, the clinic will be in the Galbraith building (the third floor Common Room). Everyone welcome.

"You're doing," Watts said emphatically to everyone, leaning forward from his kneeling position while on a small dias on the west side of the Market. There was incense in front of him, but the smell didn't go far, and the auditorium was hot with the closeness of the crowd. "We don't come into this world, we come out of it," he said.

Glossing over such aphorisms as "The past is the trail of now," "Creation is now," "We have no time," Watts led his audience through a breathing exercise, after he instructed them to shut their eyes and try to let thought-words and images fall away from their minds. Then he had them participate in the chanting of mantras, oral aids to the meditative expansion of consciousness.

One mantra was of Hindu origin, another Islamic, the third Armenian orthodox. In the last one, the audience hummed or droned, either in monotone or in their own tune, while Watts sang over it an eerie, swooping, plaintive Alleluia.

These and other meditative practices take a lot of time, Watts said, noting that Zen monks sometimes sit still for 48 hours. He said a quick way to meditate was described to him by a zen monk who claimed it was the best he knew.

Watts then instructed everyone to stand up and place his hands on his hips, wrists up, fingers sprayed down, elbows akimbo. "Now laugh," said Watts. And we did.

"Who am I?" is the wrong question said Watts, lapsing into discourse when the laughter died away; but "laughter is the conversion of anxiety into joy." Watts said a learned Western orientalist once visited a fat Taoist who was sitting in front of his hut on a mountain. The orientalist asked the sage whether Taoist spirituality was still viable. The sage heaved with laughter like a hill of jelly, and the interview was at an end. (Do you understand this, JON?)

Water Polo Blues go under 9-6

By CLIVE HOBSON

The Varsity water polo team took a 9-6 dunking at the hands of a not too polished McMaster team and an even less polished referee on Saturday.

With an incredible display of incompetence the "Toronto" referee drove even the most veteran Blues to the edge of despair.

VARSITY OPENED the scoring in the first quarter when defence man Andy Hackett lobbed in a shot from halfway down the pool. Mac then rolled back with two fast goals to end the quarter ahead 2-1.

The second quarter saw the beginning of Blues troubles.

An amazing string of penalties saw two Toronto players leave the water consecutively. Despite this setback, Mac was encouragingly held off the score sheet. . . . Then the referee went mad again and this time a player from each side was forced to sit on the side of the pool. Varsity managed to score during this exchange of penalties.

MacMaster threw in two fast goals then Chris McNaught retaliated by tipping in a seemingly impossible shot on a pass from Dave Breech.

The half ended with the score tied 4-4.

IN THE THIRD period it was a disgusted Blues team that hit the water. MacMaster took advantage of this apathy to throw in four unanswered goals and take the lead 8-4.

The fourth quarter saw Mac content to sit back on their four goal margin and play defensive polo. Dave Breech scored his second goal of the game minutes after the quarter opened and it appeared as though Blues were rallying.

Then with three minutes remaining Mac threw Varsity off their stride with a lucky goal. That almost put the game out of reach, until with one minute to go, McNaught tipped in his second goal of the game. Hunter Milbourne followed this with another marker and Blues were only behind by three with fifty seconds to play.

Unfortunately, the Mac team managed to control the ball for the remaining time and Varsity failed to even get a shot on goal.

DESPITE THE loss, which incidentally did not count as a league game, the performance of the home team was not an indication of their playing potential. As mentioned, the refereeing was atrocious and time after time Blues fell victim to unnecessary penalties. The Mac team played the kind of clutch and grab game that tended to force opposing players into silly retaliatory acts and even the veterans found it difficult to maintain their cool.

The game should indicate to coach Alan Pyle that the whole squad is in desperate need of some coordinated team practices in order to establish the type of team work that is so necessary in this game. The close checking Mac forwards time after time tied up the Varsity forwards and prevented them from shooting.

Centre forward McNaughton found himself alone in front of the Mac goal on a number of occasions but only once or twice was he able to receive a pass.

BLUES HAVE an easy game on tap next Saturday, when they take on the Warriors from Waterloo, again in their home pool. This is their final exhibition game before they join a powerful group that will include teams from McGill and Queens.

No mistakes can be afforded against these teams and any problems Blues have must be ironed out in this week's practices and next Saturday's game. Failing that, and another performance like Saturday's will see Blues take an early exit from this year's OQAA finals. . . .

Lions 34-Christians 0, as Blues blast McGill

By LYNDON LITTLE

Nothing's worked out right for McGill this year.

You're the defending Yates champs and people are expecting a lot from you. But before the season even gets under way, the university pulls the rug out from under you and announces that, no matter how well you do, it's to be the last season for your team.

You stumble to a miserable 1-3-1 record and you come into Toronto for your final game at Varsity Stadium.

So with your luck, you'll probably run into a team with a fast-maturing young quarterback who will select that afternoon to put on his finest college performance. You'll get stomped 34-0.

An entirely predictable 31-17 victory by Queen's over McMaster in Hamilton Saturday leaves Blues with just one more hope for a Yates Cup this year. A Waterloo upset of the Gaels next Saturday at Kingston coupled with a Varsity triumph over Mac would do the trick!

IN THE GAME of football, nothing can be more dangerous than a talent-packed team that's both frustrated and loose.

Blues fitted that description perfectly on Saturday as they treated a small crowd of 5,000 wet fans to their best display of the year.

In directing the onslaught, sophomore pivot Wayne Dunkley added pin-point accuracy to his already well established powerful arm and connected on 14 of 18 passes for 223 yards and three touchdowns.

"The Kid really came of age out there this afternoon," said Blues' flanker Eric Walter who, as the league's all-time scoring king, should know a quarterback when he sees one.

Walter was the recipient of two of Dunkley's TD passes on plays covering 27 and 10 yards.

Split-end John "the Jet" Chapman picked off the third touchdown toss on a short pass while fullback Glen Markle and halfback Bob Morrow carried the ball in for two more majors.

Place-kicker and short kick-off specialist, Bill Stankovic, completed the scoring with four converts.

CRIPPLED BY injuries, and without any of the depth that has kept Blues alive this year, the Redmen made a good game of it for 30 minutes before surrendering 20 points in the third quarter.

Blues' defensive platoon came up with their second consecutive outstanding show as they limited the Redmen to only 30 yards rushing and 119 passing. McGill penetrated beyond the Varsity 40-yard line on only one occasion.

The conference's top ground-gainer, Dave Fleiszer, was held to only 16 yards. The defensive line of Alex Squires, Jim Bennett, Jon Dellandrea (before he got hurt), Jim Orfanakos and Bart D'Onofrio peeled off anything resembling offensive blocking while the line backing corps of Hartley Stern, Bob Potts and Bob Bloxham mopped up anything that got that far.

Bob Billingham, Pete McNabb, Walt Sehr, Brian Sickle, and Jody Orved in the defensive secondary held McGill to the short passes while McNabb and Sickle filched two errant throws from McGill quarterback Bill McKenna.

Typical of Saturday's action, McGill's Dave Fleiszer makes little gain as Bob Potts makes tackle

Doug Fraser

Fleiszer for rushing honors, was used mainly as a decoy in this one as head coach Ron Murphy put in a new running series.

Morrow, who has been one of Blues' most dependable runners all season, was the focus of the rushing attack as he broke clear for 140 yards on 19 carries.

WITH FIVE receptions for 95 yards, Chapman was the game's top receiver for the third Saturday in a row. Dunkley, however, spread his passes around well as Mark Slater, Mike Brierley, Jack Buchan as well as Chapman, Morrow and Walter caught aeriels.

After being hauled down inside the five-yard line on innumerable occasions this year, Chapman finally picked up a touchdown. But it took a compassionate call by Dunkley in the fourth quarter to get it!

Blues Notes — Conference titles were decided in three other leagues on Saturday. Out west, the U of Manitoba Bisons captured their second consecutive WCIAA crown with a 34-14 trouncing of the Alberta U Bears in Edmonton . . .

The Ottawa Gee-Gees took the CCIFC western division with a 29-24 victory over Guelph in Ottawa and will now meet the eastern winner, the Bishops Gaiters, this weekend . . . In other SIFL action Saturday, Frank Cosentino's Western Mustangs downed Waterloo 3-2 with the Warriors pulling their goalie in the last minute in an attempt to gain the equalizer.

Same old story, Soccer Blues tie Mac 1-1

By THE MAN IN BLUE

In a repeat of the 1-1 tie played in Hamilton Oct. 14, the McMaster Soccer Marauders once again played a draw with Blues and walked off with the OQAA western division title in a match played Saturday afternoon on a sloppy front campus pitch.

Blues are now unbeaten in their last six games. But, as was the situation last year, although there have been few Toronto defeats; there also have been few victories.

After winning the OQAA championship five consecutive seasons (1964-68), Blues have now missed out on the Blackwood Trophy the last two years.

CONSIDERING THE importance of the game to both squads and the rice-paddy conditions of the field, it was pleasing to see the players giving a display of fine attacking soccer.

Sensibly using the less wet wing areas, Blues were unlucky not to lead after the scoreless first half. Ersin Ozerding's headed "goal" being judged offside.

Meanwhile, with Blues defence showing a mean streak, they held the Marauders' offence in check. Mike Moores clamping a vice-like grip on a potentially dangerous McMaster right-winger.

Although the pace became more furious in the second half, the play retained its high quality. Blues' offence was unfortunate not to score when Dave Evans' shot cannoned off a goal post.

The Marauders put together the opening goal when a skidding half-volley was turned aside by Blues' keeper Tony Bowker. A McMaster player scored a headed ball from the resulting corner.

As regular spectators will know, the results of Blues' soccer games are invariably close and not decided until the final whistle.

WITH STAMINA and determination, Blues pressed a relentless attack on the visitor's goal area.

Less than five minutes remained to play when a panic-stricken McMaster defender handled a through ball and Ozerding, who has yet to miss from the penalty spot, converted the obvious award.

Once again, Blues' coach Bob Nicol praised the effort shown by the Varsity team. The Marauders are the best team they have played and are worthy champions — even if it is recalled that the only team they failed to defeat this year was Toronto.

Blues conclude their league schedule Wednesday evening in Guelph and are fully expecting a triumph.

Quebec is seen as 'trick democracy' by PQ spokesman

By LAURA KELLY

"The profound message of the FLQ was 'please pay attention,'" warned Jacques-Yvan Morin, Parti Quebecois spokesman and University of Montreal law professor, at Monday's Quebec teach-in at Convocation Hall.

Morin urged reforms for Quebec, which he referred to as a nation, such as minimum income, increases in minimum wages, right of association of all wage earners, consumer protection, high status for and protection of the French language, and answers to the constitutional questions.

Morin also called for the implementation of some form of socialism, "adapted to the needs of Quebec."

"It's been said in the past that Quebec would not accept socialism. That's not true, they are only afraid of a centralized socialism. They will have a Quebec socialism, not an Ottawa socialism," said Morin.

Morin described Quebec as underdeveloped, with excessive unemployment, and too little citizen participation in decisions that have real effect in the province.

"It's a trick democracy," said Morin, referring to the recent election where the P.Q. netted 24% of the vote, while winning only 6% of the seats.

Both Morin and speaker James Eayrs, a U of T Political Economy professor, decried the political stance of Pierre Trudeau on the Quebec question.

"Trudeau has put liberalism in a trance," said Eayrs, contrasting Trudeau's cutting, critical viewpoint of the 1950's with his present views that Eayrs termed as "rhetoric."

Eayrs deplored the strict federalism and strict fiscal policies that Trudeau endorsed and said that these programs sparked the present Quebecois discontent which panicked Trudeau into enacting the War Measures Act.

"Trudeau has said his government will stand on the War Measures Act. He's confident it will stand. I'm sure it will fall," said Eayrs.

Earlier in the program, as Eayrs was being introduced, Ian Wahn, MP from the St. Paul's riding, grabbed the microphone to protest the one-sided nature of the teach-in panel.

"As a member of Parliament I think I'm entitled to speak at such a panel. There should be a pro-government speaker," said Wahn.

Organizers of the teach-in from the U of T NDP Waffle movement suggested that Wahn should organize his own meeting.

During the question period Wahn spoke again to justify the War Measures Act as a necessary defense against the FLQ plans to foment revolution in Quebec.

David Lewis, MP and deputy leader of the NDP, called the War Measures Act "an unforgivable use of power," even though he declared "I oppose with all my strength the terrorist actions of the FLQ."

"The Prime Minister and his government will stand stamped in history as irresponsible authoritarians," said Lewis.

Morin, Broadbent clash over Quebec and independence

By FRANC STURINO

Parti Quebecois spokesman, Jacques-Yvan Morin, and New Democratic Party federal MP Ed Broadbent, clashed Monday night over the issue of whether or not Quebec could solve her problems within confederation.

Addressing a full auditorium of attentive Torontonians at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, Morin stated in response to a question that the issue at stake in Quebec was "Not whether Quebec would get independence. That is inevitable." Rather, it is the type of independence that the French-Canadian nation is to have that worries Morin.

Although the Parti Quebecois advocates a "common market and monetary policy" with English-speaking Canada, it holds that in virtually all other spheres, such as foreign relations and immigration, it would have to seek its own solutions. In these areas, its problems are unique and cannot be looked at from an English-Canadian context.

"Quebec must define its own social solutions and priorities. For example, the money which Ottawa is spending on medicare could be used to solve the more urgent problem facing Quebec — education," Morin said.

He admitted that health was a problem in French as in English Canada, but that education was simply more urgent in Quebec and should be dealt with first. "Ottawa has also planned Quebec for English Montreal," he said.

Broadbent disagreed with Morin and said that "the basic structure of the constitution" could be made to work to meet the demands of French-Canada if certain concessions were made. He emphasized that all possible avenues must be explored before the British North America Act is declared null and void and discarded.

Morin agreed that before the election of Trudeau, who "was put in power by English Canada because he was going to kick those frogs in the pants", a settlement without separatism might have been possible. Since then Ottawa's drive to increase centralization at the expense of Quebec interests has made no other option plausible but self-determination.

Morin and Broadbent also clashed over the future of democracy within Quebec. Broadbent stated in his speech that because of the War Measures Act, we are "in store for a rapid growth of the Parti Quebecois". He added that the social and cultural leaders are going to see Ottawa as a repressor and are much more likely to vote in a separatist direction in the next election.

Although Morin felt flattered at such optimism he assured Broadbent that many Quebecois are "not assured that one can be so optimistic about the survival of democracy in Quebec."

Morin pointed to the 400 plus political prisoners now being held. Among these is a personal friend of his, a doctor, whose only crime was to have opened a free clinic for the Montreal poor. Dragged out in the middle of the night he was not even allowed to refer his cases to another physician.

Referring to the Montreal election, Morin said that the Montreal police issued an order that "there could be no distribution of political literature." Not only were subversive writings banned, but legitimate literature, such as Front d'Action Politique pamphlets were also outlawed.

"Of course, Drapeau could still issue his propaganda," he added.

Pointing out that the Parti Quebecois received four times less seats in the Quebec Assembly than its popular vote entitled it to, Morin wondered just how much political democracy ever existed in Quebec. As for economic and social democracy, not even an attempt at creating these myths was made.

Both the fear of the English Canadian Establishment in Montreal and the presence of the army will make the road back to the democratic process difficult. "It's easy to get the army in, but how do you get it out?," he asked.

Morin added that especially if the Quebec unemployment figures reach 15% this winter as projected, the army might entrench itself for a protracted stay. Such a course could only further deteriorate the situation.

Picket set for Ryerson

Waffle-inspired demonstrators will picket Ryerson Press today to protest its sale to the U.S.-owned publishing firm of McGraw-Hill.

The demonstration will "demand public ownership of Ryerson (Press) and the entire textbook publishing industry," said a Waffle spokesman last night.

"It is too vital an industry to be U.S. dominated," he said, emphasizing that "any public ownership should include a certain amount of worker control."

Demonstrators meet at the Press, 299 Queen at 4:30 this afternoon.

Simcoe Hall gets a new copper roof

By ANDY SOS

The $77,000 copper roof now being installed on Convocation Hall is not meant to reflect the sun and thus ward off low-flying airplanes.

Deterioration of the old roof had caused it to leak so badly that it had to be replaced completely. Pat Reeve, the engineer in charge of replacing the roof, says that even though the copper roof would cost $19,000 more than galvanized steel, it would be much more durable and better looking. To show the durability of copper he stated that the copper roof of the Parthenon had lasted from 130 AD until the Second World War

A leak in the roof has once before caused some difficulties in Convocation Hall's history. On the occasion of the first graduation ceremonies to be held in the Hall, the roof had not yet been completed and of course, it was raining. So much water poured in the students were not only graduated, that they were also baptized.

The University Monthly of December, 1904, stated that the total amount of money raised for the Hall was only $102,000. Therefore, the almost $80,000 that is being spent on the roof must substantially raise the overhead of those occupying the building.

Despite administrators' demands that the noisy roof-replacing work be stopped during important meetings, the new copper cover of Convocation Hall will be finished by Christmas.

This resplendent roof will then insure that "this Hall will in time become a splendid object-lesson, pointing a moral of high order to the flower of the youth of our country who flock to its greatest seat of learning." (1904 Monthly).

Workmen put last touches on Convocation Hall's new $77,000 roof.

Student Presidents call for protest against War Measures

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Twenty-eight Canadian university student union presidents voiced their support this weekend for a nation wide day of protest over the implementation of the War Measures Act and subsequent legislation.

In a caucus held in Winnipeg in advance of the annual conference of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC), union presidents tabled a resolution on disapproving of the federal government's actions and demanding that recent events in Quebec not be used as an excuse to improve further restrictive legislation.

"It is contradictory to argue that it is necessary to destroy democracy in order to save it," the resolution said. "Adequate provisions for dealing with seditious activity and terrorism such as occurred in Quebec," are already in the criminal code the caucus continued.

The day of protest is tentatively

Dentists lead bleeding in drive ending Friday

With three days left, the U of T blood drive is crawling along at a snail's pace. Only 1,653 pints out of a total goal of 3,400 have been collected thus far and Dentistry leads again with 311 pints out of an enrollment of 544.

Tomorrow's clinic will be held at the Medical Arts Building for Meds, Pharmacy, Knox, Innis, SGS, PhysEd, and Pots, and winds up Friday at Sir Daniel Wilson Residence.

scheduled for November 13.

In other business, the presidents discussed matters such as student parity on university governing bodies, whether student unions will have to be re-structured to meet the needs of students, the structure of the AUCC and its failure to be representative of the students.

The concept of a revived national union of students was also considered briefly but was then dropped.

Caouette backs out

Fiercely federal Creditiste leader Real Caouette will not be in attendance at a Hart House Debate tonight, due to the government's recent anti-subversive law.

Caouette, who in the midst of the Quebec crisis, recommended that the government shoot hostages until kidnapped James Cross was released, informed the Hart House Debates Committee yesterday that his presence was needed in Ottawa during Parliament's discussion of the act to replace War Measures.

The debate, on whether French Canadian nationalism requires a Quebec national state, will go right on regardless.

Kids from 5-50 dig Grange area centre

By MARINA STRAUSS

The University Settlement House means a lot to many of people. To many kids, this is where there fun is, this is the place to hit after school and on the weekend. To many families, the Settlement House is their major source of information and even guidance.

Referred to as a "neighbourhood centre", the Settlement House is not a glorified day-care centre. It is a full-time retreat for anyone living in the Grange Park area.

This summer I worked as a volunteer in the Summer Fun Program. The children enrolled were placed in small groups of four or five. A "leader" supposedly "supervises", which can mean anything from stern dictatorship to flexible anarchy (depending on what you ate for breakfast).

Of the four 10-year-old girls in my group, three were of Oriental background, the other was of European origin. I had been told by my "superior" — Do what you want with your kids; have fun.

And that's an easy thing if you let it ride; dig your children; enjoy your children; listen to your children; follow your children.

They wanted to do special things. Swimming was a big thing, and we had that scheduled every day for an hour. On hot days we'd sneak in for 2 hours.

But they still wanted to do special things — trips to a beach, the country, the Science Centre. "We want to see your house. We want to meet your mother" was their constant request. I figured if I was meeting their mothers, they could meet mine too. They went wild in my house (in Willowdale). It was quite a day!

We would usually decide together they day before what we would do the next day. My suggestions and their suggestions were all considered and the verdict was come to by a mutual motion.

There were hassles too. One girl always wanted to do something else. But I found my position not one of having to console, reproach, or direct — my girls all took their own discipline into their own hands and handled such situations with me — because we were a group.

The Settlement House, I discovered is a "hang-out" for kids from five to 50 years old. There are the "regulars". They wander around, play games, bug people, help people. You get to know them. You find they are part of the Settlement House and you find the Settlement House is no institution; it is a house — a home. Dig anything you like.

We also had special activities we could attend, like arts and crafts, folk dancing and singing. Here we joined in with other groups. But some of our most precious memories are from the days when nothing was planned; it was always easy to get something together, and these were times to get to know each other. There are facilities at the House such as a gymnasium, and a kitchen which we were free to use.

It all comes down to the fact that the organization and the ideas come from within; everybody involved gets a say in their activities. The University Settlement House isn't a bureaucratic YMCA-type of summer-camp structure. There are no counsellors being paid to boss around their petty campers under the auspices of being teacher and almighty commander. Programs have been designed for the children — not dictated, merely designed.

To pay for events like an overnight camp-out up north this summer, children and volunteers together had a big "Sport-a-thon", a walk-a-thon, swim-a-thon. However it wasn't necessary to spend much in order to keep ourselves occupied and happy. And since there was always one or two kids who either forgot or simply couldn't get the bread for a bus-ticket or a ferry-ride to the island, we often turned to the more primal diversions of life (when was the last time you got into a really good game of hide-and-seek).

A Sunday Program is now beginning which will be much like the Summer Fun Program. The Holy Blossom Temple started a weekly program last winter; this year it will provide $750 and the Settlement House $750. But it will be run by the Settlement House itself.

Settlement House — Kathleen Vowinkel

For Grange Park area kids, Settlement House is a community centre.

It is the security and intimacy of the group that makes this youth program at the Settlement House so meaningful. And it's the kids — a confrontation of so many different interests, talents, backgrounds. It is a program intended for the Individual, for Every One involved — for the People.

This summer when my kids began to ask "Why do we meet only on week-days, why not every day of the week?" I knew there had to be a good thing going

"The superstition that used to ascribe revolutions to the ugly intentions of agitators is a thing of the past. Today everybody knows that whenever a revolutionary upheaval takes place, its source lies in some social need that outdated institutions are not meeting.
"The need may not be felt strongly or widely enough to obtain immediate success, but any attempt at brutal repression will only make it more powerful."
— Karl Marx (1853)

Today is RCMP recruitment day on the U of T campus. In honour of the annual event we print an elementary lesson in police ideology excerpted and abridged from "Political Repression in Canadian History," an essay by W. F. P. Wringle, a former Saskatchewan university teacher.

The Ideology of the Canadian Police

MANY OF THE MOST POWERFUL LAWS in Canada exist to "legalize" the repression of reform or revolutionary movements.

These political laws which exist as a threat or which can be applied harshly reveal the "tautology of authority" in the capitalist nation state in which we live.

As long as people act within the authority system, and accept its rhetoric uncritically, they are said to be "free." As long as they use the so-called "proper channels" (which change over time to the advantage of elites), they have "rights".

When people begin to question, and, more important, to evaluate the conditions that underlie authority and the consequences of the use of that authority, laws exist to oppress them.

The police are often the instruments of political oppression, though it is a mistake to believe (as many seem to) that it is the "mentality of the cops" per se that leads to such oppression. It is crucial to understand the ideology and controls that ensure that the police are reliable for this task.

As bureaucrats in a corporation must actually believe, absolutely, in what they do, to do it efficiently, so too police must also possess totally uncritical beliefs. "Law and order" must be reified, much as the idea of "God" has been in past periods. WE CAN GET AN INDICATION OF POLICE IDEOLOGY by studying a 273-page handbook, called Law and Order in Canadian Democracy, which RCMP personnel possess.

Called a "series of lectures" by former RCMP Commissioner Wood, (the authors are unidentified), this book can give us insight into the police beliefs that ensure that the tautology of authority operates when reform movements begin to show success.

The "lectures" are a conglomeration of legal knowledge, social scientism, political ideology and authoritarian moralism. A detailed analysis of them, as an example of quasi-academic ideas being used for ideological training (typical in our society) would be of great value.

For now, I will concentrate on a sampling of statements to show the police beliefs that complement the use of police for political oppression.

"Freedom" is of course the call word. Our society does everything — fought "two terrible wars," entered Korea and joined NATO — "to guard against the ever growing danger of a tyranny such as the world has never known." (p.vii) What the tyranny is, is not clear, but it is better propaganda if left unintelligible at this stage in the book.

The Foreword clearly establishes that "we" are the good guys. It also establishes the use of an irrational language about crime.

"Crime is contagious and infectious. Contact with criminals, the taint of criminal atmosphere, makes more criminals; too often the new recruit to the ranks of the evildoers is involved before he is aware and offends before he knows that he is erring; then the downward path is easy." (p. vii)

Worded in a more rational way with some argument involved, this statement could suggest that criminal socialization and recidivism result from penal subcultures, which is the case; but, since the book includes a large discussion of political laws, this irrational statement serves as a basis for the "conspiracy theory" that is central to police ideology. This conspiracy theory, which pervades the media and government as well as the police, goes like this:

Contact with subversives is what leads to reform movements. Since this society is progressing there is no need for such movements. People have no intelligence by which to make sense of their own experience, and act to change conditions. Those in authority know what is best for the people.

Could the authoritarian setup of police forces themselves lead many policemen to project their own dependency on rigid authority and leadership into a conspiracy theory of social movements? Their own forced dependency certainly complements their unquestioning belief in conspiracies. Arresting "the leaders" is thus justified as being both in the interests of "public order" and "the common good."

THE BOOK IS BUILT ON RHETORIC, not on historical evidence. It opens with:

"Canadian democracy is real and vibrant, pulsating with the life-blood of a young nation, and has its roots in the rich heritage of the past. But our democratic way of life is threatened, both by active forces within and from outside, and by an all-too-often passive state within. Have we the will to survive, both as a nation and as a democracy?" (p. 1)

And, of course, "law and order" is emphasized as the backbone of Canadian democracy; "where the law-enforcement agencies are the friends of all law-abiding citizens." And, of course, the RCMP knows the true meaning of "law" and of "order": "Our ideas, which time and experience have proved to be generally sound..." (p. 1)

Here is the first example of how the police, contrary to all rhetoric about all citizens being equal before the law, are trained to see themselves as judges. The court judge is quite secondary to the judgements made by the police when they interpret behavior as criminal or not.

THE IDEOLOGY OF "POSSESSIVE INDIVIDUALISM" is basic to the view of freedom and order, and crime and punishment which is presented in the book. Take these quotes:

- The law guards the liberties of each by limiting the liberty of all. (p. 43)
- Liberty, with its avoidance of restraint, has within itself the seeds of license. (p. 49)
- Man's taste of liberty and dislike of restraint may cause some to go from liberty to license, but the average person desires an orderly existence and is willing to share in the maintenance of order. (p. 53)
- Private enterprise, initiative, and service to the public are always commended in a democracy when existence is thus well ordered. (p. 53)

And, again, of course, it is the police who impose this order and discipline — sometimes called "self-imposed discipline" in the book as if each person signs a social contract with the police at birth — to "restrict liberty for the common good." (p. 54)

Law, law in the abstract that is, is "the sworn enemy of license and friend and protector of all law-abiding citizens," and the police enforce it. It is as simple as that. If truth is thought to be that simple, then the policeman can certainly feel justified in being arbitrary, uncritical of himself, and even "militant" (p. 1) against "law breakers."

Hobbes, Locke and Rousseau, who developed their ideas while the bourgeoisie developed out of feudalism, have had their ideas reified into the quasi-philosophies of free-enterprise capitalism. Though the free-enterprise society does not, nor never did exist, these quasi-philosophies still serve their original function of justifying the competitive social relations in capitalist societies.

According to them, there is the "Individual" — basically aggressive and asocial — who is Free. Freedom is individualistic and liberty is thus licence if not controlled. So Law enters the picture. Law ensures that this individualistic freedom doesn't infringe on other's individual freedom. Those who determine and enforce the Law do so for the Common Good.

So we end up with a double-talk; quite unrelated to human beings (who are interdependent from birth to death) and in contradiction to any historical or sociological study of authority, power and ideology, which cloaks the distortion of human beings within capitalist and other authoritarian societies.

LOOK AT THE FOLLOWING QUOTES taken from the selection on the policeman in the RCMP book:

To be a policeman "requires skill, intelligence, forebearance and compassion to live one's own life within the law, yet it requires more than these to apply that law... to the acts of others."

Once again we see the simple equation of conformity and good. The policeman must just be that much better than others. (If conformity = good, then since police have more rigid social behavior, they are, logically "better".) Giving the police such a view of "intelligence" makes the "law-breaker" almost sub-human. It is clear that "intelligence" does not mean anything like curiosity, creativity or criticism the way it is being used.

The Policeman needs "...comprehension of democratic philosophy... intelligence... (to) study, understand and interpret laws..."

A Career in Scarlet

For graduating students, we are conducting interviews at U of T today for full time positions with Canada's national police agency. Our men bear major responsibility for preserving the unique Canadian way of life. It's a tough job, but in emergency situations, such as we have seen in the last couple of weeks, the government gives us strong support and places extra weapons at our disposal.

If you're still in school, we also have a place for you. Serve as an undercover agent and pay your way through school — and clean up your community at the same time.

So, if you're looking for a socially conscious career with plenty of room for advancement, check into the RCMP. We are interviewing today and Nov. 26 on the main campus, Dec. 9 at Erindale College, and Jan. 15 at Scarborough. Contact us through your university placement service.

RCMP IN ACTION, WINNIPEG, JUNE 21, 1919

"Then, with revolvers drawn, they galloped down Main Street, turned and charged right into the crowd on William Avenue, firing as they charged." (Strike Bulletin, June 23, 1919)

What occurs to me is the image of a "Philosopher-Cop" (not unlike Plato's Philosopher King), viewing society and other humans in a detached and Objective way; enforcing Laws according to their True interpretation.

As well, it is stated quite openly that the policeman can define deviant behaviour (by interpreting the law), hence does not apply the law equally to all people as our democratic rhetoric implies. The authorities in charge of police training know fully well that the policeman judges human acts as criminal or not depending on his socialization. The policeman himself and the public, must be made to believe that policemen are "public servants" when they engage in political oppression.

The policeman needs "... strength of character ... (he must) resist the many human impulses excusable in the private citizen but disastrous to the policeman, requires not only self-control but an understanding of the shortcomings of others."

Here is the self-sacrificing, all-understanding policeman. A combination of paternalism, moralism, and authoritarianism is nurtured both to ensure that the recruit will not rebel against his restrictive job and will impose the laws on others unquestioningly.

The policeman needs "... understanding ... tolerance ... physical excellence ... bravery and heroism ... courage ..."

The policeman is getting closer and closer to the male stereotype that has dominated the society, and which fits so nicely the needs of a militaristic and regimented system.

His is "... The true desire to serve the public — a belief in the worthiness of mankind — a desire for variety and adventure and the spiritual need for self-sacrifice for the benefit of other people."

The highest good, doing for others. It is amazing how a self-sacrificing self image, for one identifying so totally with authority, making only pseudo-choices (within the Law), not moral choices about the effects of what he does for other people, can maintain such a self view. The double-talk that operates for police about "freedom and order" also works at another level, the very center of personality.

"In this democracy the selection and training of the policeman is not the constricting of those who will obey the atheistic tyranny of the state in the oppression of its subjects, it is the offering of opportunity to those who are worthy to live in self-expression and service as an example of Canadianism to those who hold it dear."

The self-sacrificing characteristics are finally related to the ideology which is used to justify the political use of police, and the circle is drawn. It is disgusting that such meaningless rhetoric has come to actually affect human beings. "Canadianism" is a term that could justify the German ovens, if the logic of this statement were to ever be associated with a fascist political milieu.

NEXT WE GET A 40-PAGE SUMMARY OF TREASON, sedition, communism, fascism, and national socialism. It has the same assumptions of many university courses taught by those intimidated by McCarthyism, though the blatant statement of them would never succeed in passing as value-free social science, even to the most indoctrinated students.

Order is again the main emphasis. Order and civilized (versus primitive) societies are even equated. And the inevitable contradiction within monopoly capitalism is exposed. The "State", not the "Individual" now becomes important per se. Sedition helps to preserve "the tranquility of the state." (p. 136) The political oppression of the police is thus "justified" not by some quasi-humanism but by a pseudo-totalitarianism. Humanist rhetoric might even subvert the RCMP if it was articulated clearly.

Mention is made of the conviction of R. B. Russell, a leader of the Winnipeg Strike, for sedition:

While there was no evidence produced at his trial to show that Russell was a Communist ... still his speeches showed that he believed and advocated the principles of revolution adopted by the Communists. (p. 138)

Here is an example of how police ideology reduces specifics to its own metaphysics. And this is aided by the same old double-talk: "no evidence ... that he was a Communist ... still his speeches showed that he believed and advocated the principles adopted by the Communists".

According to the book sedition laws protect societies from "outside influences, ... suppression all activities" which would lead to "civil war and anarchy", (p. 142) "Every serious minded citizen" should assist in "eradicating this menace to his way of life, his home, his freedom of thought and his country" (p. 142). The wording (e.g. "menace to ... his home") almost incites the true believer in the conspiracy theory to go out and kill himself a commie for the good of mankind.

After this, communism and fascism are both defined as totalitarian, and arguing from general, tautological principles to specifics about history, the simplistic conspiracy theory is again perpetuated. Any possible understanding of the history of Europe since the turn of the century is destroyed.

THEN THERE IS THE TASK OF CONTROLLING RIOTS. Doing his duty of breaking strikes, protest demonstrations or whatever criticisms, and there will always be some, will be levelled at him. He must be big enough to accept these without faltering. (p. 189)

He can do no wrong, for he is carrying out the Law. And, anyway, he is a better human than the "rioters". He has great "degrees of freedom" in his approach, and is confident and protected by his modern equipment. The law gives him immense protections against "rioters" (see Section 110 of C.C.), and he is again told that it is "the actions of a few" that endanger the rights of the many. (p. 190)

The book concludes on the same note as it began, and with the same irrational language about "crime".

The field of crime is not static, and no agency engaged in combating this insidious and contagious disease can afford to be static. In these days the impact of crime upon society and subversive efforts to deprive us of our hard-won freedoms and democratic principles is of importance to us all. (p. 273)

I know of no instance where those who identify so totally with conservative authority have aided in the ongoing struggle to put social institutions in the control of people. Though the RCMP book emphasizes the vote as basic to democracy, police ideologists handily forget that it took forms of civil disobedience to win the franchise for the working people.

- An "apprehended insurrection" is:
 - An Imaginary insurrection;
 - A convenience to a government bent on eliminating certain opposition forces;
 - Probably both of the above;
 - None of the above.
- For printing the FLQ manifesto The Varsity staff could have:
 - Been subject to arrest without charge and held for 90 days without a trial;
 - Been subject to arrest without charge and held for 90 days without a trial;
 - Been sentenced to five years in jail;
 - Both of the above;
 - Deserved whatever they got anyway.
- For reading the FLQ manifesto in The Varsity you could have been:
 - Subject to arrest without charge and held for 90 days without trial;
 - Sentenced to five years in prison;
 - Both of the above;
 - I have mellowed somewhat on my hard-line attitude towards The Varsity.
- Both you and The Varsity staff are free only at the discretion of the authorities. This makes you feel:
 - Freaked out;
 - Glad you don't live in Quebec;
 - Like running home and burning that issue of The Varsity;
 - Confidence in the ability of the authorities to enforce the law with wisdom and moderation.
- "Protecting and preserving our democracy" means:
 - Not very much these days;
 - Something different than it used to mean;
 - Suspending civil rights;
 - Making people subject to arbitrary, secret arrest so that they may be free from fear and, thus, protecting democracy.
- Mayor Jean Drapeau is correct when he says there are "no classes in Montreal" because:
 - Cateb-22 says so;
 - Who's going to argue with him in the face of the War Measures Act;
 - There are no slums in Montreal, just gaily-painted fences;
 - The concept of "social class" is a Marxist fabrication and under the War Measures Act the mayor can declare such nonsense subversive thereby making social classes non-existent. Anyway, if there were any they would be subject to arrest.
- Separatism in Quebec is:
 - A product of Canadian history and Quebec social conditions;
 - A plot fabricated by a bunch of recently-released mental patients;
 - A plot fabricated by the Weathermen to dupe the Quebecois into becoming subject to their planned Amerikan Kommunist Empire;
 - Now a thing of the past because of the firm action the government has taken to protect our democracy, our freedom, our nation.
- The invocation of the War Measures Act was:
 - Proof that civil rights never existed in Canada;
 - A bit heavy;
 - Not interfering a bit with my classes;
 - The finest defence of our way of life ever.

SCORE FOR THE GIANT VARSITY KNOW CANADA BETTER QUIZ CONTEST

Score 10 points for each question in which you picked number 1); five for each choice of number ii); two points for each number iii) picked and none for each choice of number iv).

RATING

A score of 40 to 80

You're in trouble. You're guilty of sedition. Destroy your copy of the quiz and then lay low for a few days until the heat cools. Don't talk in your sleep, don't tell people you're a student and don't talk politics with anybody, even your parents.

A score of 16 to 40

You're probably still guilty of sedition (see advice above) but even if you aren't they've got you cold under the War Measures Act.

A score of 2 to 16

Even one wrong answer puts you under the War Measures Act, chickenshit. They've got you anyway.

A score of Zero

Nobody's that perfect! Just who the hell do you think you're kidding! The police know damn well that anybody with a perfect score is putting up a cover and will probably get you as a spy or something.

'The Government hasn't confronted Quebec's institutional violence'

This is a statement prepared by the Centre for the Study of Institutions and Theology

When an adolescent breaks out destructively, it is the custom in our culture to surround him as a problem child with dramatic parental attention, together with insistent legal and institutional restraints. Rarely does our response to the overt drama push us with honesty to confront the hidden, deeply entrenched destructiveness present in the marriage and institutions so radically formative to this child.

In the last two weeks we have watched those in power as representatives react with massive military measures and ill-concealed personal venom against a group whose destructive and murderous acts are their chosen method to express and counter the historical and actual oppression of the French-Canadian people and culture.

Everything from the august and expensive B. and B. Commission reports, to the mute emptiness of a bloodied automobile trunk, has been documenting for us the thesis that in Quebec, the injustices of our shared society afflict people in a concentrated way. With one quarter of Canada's population, Quebec has 31% of Canada's unemployment; a more blatant maldistribution of income grinds the rich against the poor — and some of that maldistribution is a direct result of the unfair economic advantage of those who speak English over those who would work in French. The structures which make life bitter all over our country for those who do not fit the powerful middle-class pattern act in an especially painful way in Quebec.

When the Federal Government reacts to the violence of the few with a posture and psychology of war, with no admission, much less confrontation, of the institutional violence oppressing French Canadians, are the forces which that Government intends to crush only the forces of terrorism?

Growing numbers of Quebecers accept a radical analysis of institutional oppression, without intending to bomb or kill in response to it. Is it exclusively agreement with terrorism that constitutes a "sympathizer" with the FLQ? The record of arrests so far is not reassuring.

We cannot remain silent when our leaders say in our name that the confrontation is between "just" social institutions and some twisted and vicious men. Such righteous complacency, such ignoring of long-standing historic institutional violence will breed only more desperate counter-violence in Quebec. In those of us outside, it will reinforce apathetic participation in profitable injustice.

Massive military response constitutes a massive distraction of our attention away from the substantial challenges posed by Quebec's situation. Those challenges are social and economic, and they are profound. They face all of us; but, being exacerbated in Quebec, they are more obvious there.

Let us summon our representatives out from behind their screen of armed men. What has protection like that to do with real life in common? Let us invite our Government away from its stance of war and towards one of more limited power, more calibrated firmness, and above all, more substantial listening.

Let us learn to listen to the whole social and economic substance, the human substance, of the struggle now so painfully evident in Quebec. It is a struggle that belongs to all our futures.

Jesus warned us of our proneness to domination and self-blinding and that the love of brothers requires a death of the lies in our hearts. "In the world men lord it over one another. It shall not be so among you. For all of you are brothers."

Letter from Pierre

We live in an age of stunning technological advances — we have propelled man to the moon, we have enabled him to travel for weeks under the ocean surface. We have enabled him to do this safely.

It is essential that we more vigorously apply our new technology to improving the safety of our automobiles and highways. The Canada Safety Council makes an important contribution to this cause.

I am pleased to congratulate the members of this organization for once again sponsoring Safe Driving Week in Canada. Their efforts deserve the support of all Canadians.

"What we need are more humane killers," one of the characters in How I Won The War muttered in exasperation during the opening night of last week's film festival and teach-in, And The Second Horseman Was War. The sentiment was to be echoed many times during the week. Sponsored by Hart House, the festival consisted of an international selection of distinguished films on war followed each evening by informal discussions with guest speakers on topics such as conscientious the agenda was presented on Monday, it was How I Won The War by that beautiful, mad genius, Richard Lester. War as tragicomic nightmare provides the landscape for this surrealistic saga of a band of soldiers wandering through World War II. Lester doesn't compromise with his audience. World War II was not a conflict between 'good' and 'evil', he contends, but a conspiracy by both sides to destroy the last real men. In a sense, fascism won. Michael Crawford plays the troupe leader who, hav-via and is to this day banned in West Germany.

Jack Pooeok of the Friends' Service Committee discussed further the plight of the conscientious objector, who must decide whether he would rather betray his country or betray humanity.

The Russian film, Ballad Of A Soldier, shown on Wednesday, was a rather charming story of a young soldier journeying over war-torn Russia to see his mother. It would be easy to criticize it for the moral simplicwas on hand Thursday to report on his study of the military-industrial personality. By contrast, he found the anti-war personality to be "sexually adequate, socially responsible, altruistic, self confident, creative and intelligent." Unfortunately it would seem that the former category is the one with its finger on the trigger. Perhaps World War III will be a psychological war between the two groups... perhaps its going on right now.

We are still living in the nightmare. On Friday two documentaries were shown on modern warfare, both banned by the B.B.C. Peter Watkins saw his film, The War Game, as an effort to shock people out of their moral complacency, to educate them of their moral responsibility to say 'no'. It was a documentary — styled dramatization of a nuclear holocaust in England, assaulting the audience with the very real horrors of burning cities and melting flesh. A Plague Upon Your Children described the grim facts of biological warfare, but, unlike The War Game, it was not fiction — the morally bankrupt scientists and political strategists interviewed were all too real. After the film, Dr. Ursula Franklin spoke out against the major role played by Canada in germ warfare research.

The festival concluded, perhaps one overall generalization could be made: we can no longer surrender our individual moral responsibilities to scientists and politicians; war is no longer a game. We are all personally responsible to face the issue, to realize that there is madness in the world, and to have the courage to confront it.

... THE SECOND HORSEMAN ...

objection and biological warfare. The overall concept of a festival concentrating in depth on a single subject was a valuable one, enabling the participants to achieve a comprehensive perspective on a many-faceted problem. World peace may not have been attained, but certainly a few seeds of thought were cast to the winds.

The important role of the artist, specifically the film-maker, in revealing human realities beneath political lies was particularly accented, for it is in the nature of his art to isolate a truth with awesome power. On celluloid he can expose the madness we live each day without noticing. Whereas Hitler used film to glorify war, it can also propagandize peace. Failsafe, by Sydney Lumet, presented on Thursday's programme was a good example of this. A second rate film concerning itself with accidental nuclear confrontation, it at least could dramatize a point of view to the audience for which it was intended, which they might otherwise have been able to ignore. When you see a film such as The War Game you can react any way you desire, but one thing is for certain: you can't ignore it.

THE MOST DEVASTATING FILM ON

ing seen his men destroyed and replaced by weird plastic figures (grown up toy soldiers?), realizes during a confrontation with a Nazi commander that the two men are the same, that he too is a fascist. And the war was not over yet; as the WWII segment comes to an end, one of the plastic men turns to the other and says, "I hear this Vietnam thing is coming up. I don't like the director, but the money's good."

The discussion which followed was with George Addison of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee. Somewhere in the midst of all those words, you begin to realize just how much the spectre of Vietnam haunts the world, just how deeply it is rooted into our consciousness. Indeed, this is probably the most analysed, agonized war in history, tormenting us all to the edge of apocalypse.

TUESDAY OFFERED the celebrated Polish short, The Magician, in which a general lures young boys to their deaths. We also had a rare opportunity to see Thou Shalt Not Kill, a French-German film of a man imprisoned for conscientious objection; it's quite a brilliant study of this moral conflict, and significantly, was subject to active government repression not to have it completed. It had to be finished in Yugosla-ity and sentimentality in its presentation of the well-scrubbed Soviets. But in criticizing war, you must do so from a virtuous ideal, for if you belittle human existence too cynically, then you will have no reason to expect peace. As Nietzsche put it, "Beware when gazing into the abyss, lest the abyss gaze back."

In the discussion of 'justified and unjustified wars' which followed, there was a problem as to establishing just when political killing is required. One young lady, for example, formerly quite docile, during the course of heated discussion admitted that she would not hesitate to kill a man in the name of women's liberation. It became clear that peace isn't going to be easy. Another conclusion was evident: something of a paradox: all wars are attempts to impose peace on others.

THE MILITARY-INDUSTRIAL personality tends to be "sexually inadequate, aggressive, impulsive, socially irresponsible, conformist, alcoholic, undesirous of helping others, low in self esteem and poorly developed in conscience, but not necessarily low in intelligence." These are some of the results found by Dr. William Eckhardt of the Canadian Peace Research Institute who

Basic approach to opera reexamined in Gluck work

By TONY JAHN

The Canadian premiere of Gluck's Iphigénie en Tauride at the Faculty of Music demands that we re-examine our basic approach to opera. It is tempting to consider opera as a musical medium and a survey of the librettos of our most popular operas, those of Verdi and Puccini, reinforce the suspicion that they survive by virtue of their musical content only. Yet even a cursory glance at trends in the historical development of opera demonstrates a cyclic pattern which embraces either music or drama at the expense of the other art. A mere handful of opera's greatest exponents succeeded in fusing opera's diverse facets and the greatest of these was Christoph Willibald Gluck. The greater fame which Richard Wagner enjoys today casts no reflection on Gluck's genius but rather on the political, artistic and philosophical tastes of their times.

Gluck (1714-1784) was a revolutionary who in the first fifty years of his life, working within the system, wrote about 100 justly forgotten operas. In his last 20 years with seven operas he destroyed that system completely. He was a true reformer who reached back to bring to life the original principles and tenets of the operatic medium. He was also a touch-stone and inspiration to almost every major composer in the classical and romantic century after his death. Hector Berlioz acknowledged his immense debt to Gluck both in his writings and his music. Schumann remarked that Mozart plainly stands on Gluck's shoulders. Wagner, through his own consummate egotism saw in Gluck the foreshadowing of his own operatic philosophy. Yet the discrepancies between the two are greater than the apparent similarities.

During Gluck's early years opera was tyrannized by Pietro Metastasio, librettist to the imperial family of Austria. Metastasio himself began as a reactionary, and he abolished the then-prevalent obsession with visual effects and mechanics of staging. In later life however he developed a stranglehold on operatic style. For fifty years he systematically debased classical and mythological themes into insipid librettos to flatter royalty and laud the political system of his day. Each libretto was then set by twenty to fifty composers whose works followed each other like grade B movies on the late show. Of the 25,000 operas written before 1800, less than 250 are remembered today.

Gluck remarked once that nothing ought to be written that is not effective. Music must then complement and magnify drama until together they transcend all national boundaries. Accordingly he left Vienna and in his own work rooted out all Metastasian influence, the flowery poetry and recitativo secco. Concentrating instead on the drama itself, he distilled his own unique operatic approach which had universal appeal. His first epochal work, "Orfeo ed Euridice" is best known today and some popular operatic guides limit their discussion of Gluck to this one work. This seems unfair, as each of his last seven operas is unique both in problems and solutions.

Gluck's greatest work in terms of both music and story is "Iphigénie en Tauride". Librettist Nicolas-Francois Guillard drew his inspiration from Gluck's earlier "Iphigénie en Aulide" and Euripides' drama. He presented the composer with a book that is essentially Greek drama in French. Gluck then set wings to this story of Iphigenia, accursed of the gods, who must serve in the temple of the barbaric Scythian king Thoas until one day she must put the sacrificial knife to her own captured brother Orestes. Gluck uses radical innovations such as side-drum and cymbals in primitive cross-rhythms, setting scales of trombones in unison against the choir. His work was much imitated (Spontini often copied him note for note) but never equalled. This opera, his most unequivocal success, was his last stage work.

The total impact of Gluck as a composer was more open to debate. Over a hundred years later Debussy would refer to him as the naturalistic barbarian who destroyed Rameau. His style has been called stationary in setting and musically sparse. The noted 19th century Viennese critic Eduard Hanslick, who is most remembered as a venomous anti-Wagnerian, remarked once that he would gladly burn all of Gluck's output to save one of Mozart's operas. Ironically many of the guiding principles claimed by composers of the last century were first enunciated by Gluck, often maligned and now almost forgotten.

Why is Gluck so neglected today? Because he doesn't draw at the box-office. We demand prima donnas and extensive staging rather than essential musical drama. Nevertheless Gluck's operatic approach remains as controversial today as it was 200 years ago. Let's hope that the Opera Dept.'s presentation augurs well for a renaissance of Gluck's music. While the novelty of Iphigénie is a matter of personal judgment the import of Gluck's work in historic perspective should make the Toronto presentation an enlightening experience.

Toronto Symphony superb Du Pre conquers unhappy ill-tempered Schuman piece

By Colin Kaiser

There are always some jaded souls who prefer not to suffer through a performance by our "second-rate" orchestra. However, one year under Karel Ancerl's baton has changed the quality of the Toronto Symphony — even the horns sound better — and the addition of several new players is in keeping with their new high standards.

At last Wednesday's Series B opening British cellist Jacqueline du Pre sounded convincing and endearing in spite of the ill-constructed, ill-tempered and ill-coloured Schumann Cello Concerto. This work is never very kind to the performer, but Miss du Pre held her own against the orchestra, even against Schumann; she was able to make his themes whisper, still they did not disappear. What is especially striking about Jacqueline du Pre's playing is the simultaneous lightness and strength of her attack; in addition there is an extraordinary clarity which triumphed last night in spite of the seeming incoherence of Schumann's writing.

The "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn (No. 94) and Brahms' Third Symphony made up the second half of the concert and represented its happier aspects. Brahms was best not because of Brahms but because of Ancerl. Some conductors like to give this symphony a more expansive treatment, sometimes overly drawing out the first three movements. Ancerl's treatment was sinewy and concise. The andante was also gratifying, the opening woodwind themes leisurely but exact and the obviously sweet string passages not too wet. Most interesting was the speeded-up tempo of the third movement: it is just this type of movement which prods Nietzscheans to say "the melancholy of impotence". Alas, for us would be Nietzscheans the phrase could not fall out, given this vigorous approach. For the last movement Ancerl truned again to muscle, not unnaturally but with the effect of underlining the sad and almost yearning coda. We must remember what Brahms had to say about the ostensibly religious aspects of Bruckner's art: "his piety is his own business". Brahms hides as much as he shows and we must thank Ancerl for his good taste here.

The orchestra? I'll stick my neck out; for all purposes it was flawless.

Exciting choreography from TDT

By SUSAN COHEN

An inventive choreographer is a very precious commodity, to be harbored and nurtured, because without him, dance companies rarely develop their own style or become mature.

Look at the National Ballet of Canada, borrowing ballets on the international level and only palely imitating what other ensembles do much better.

So we must be doubly grateful for the Toronto Dance Theatre. Not only is it a company whose prowess and skills are being refined, but it is also the home of three enthusiastic, and sometimes skilled, choreographers, Patricia Beatty, David Earle and, best of all, Peter Randazzo, the artistic triumvirate at its head.

Now, in the company's fourth season, playing at 12 Alexander St. it is increasingly clear that Randazzo's contributions are the most important.

His ballets are intense, abstract and fascinating.

Even though a year old, continuum is still his finest achievement. Sinuous movements, in complete sympathy with Ann Southam's excellent electronic score, mark him as a choreographer who has mastered the essentials of line and form.

His latest work, premiered just this season, is still untitled. Disregard the pretentious theme — an exploration of man's inner soul. It is really a study in shape, and as such, it is intriguing.

Randazzo is wrapped inside a long bag, toying with its outline, pushing at the sides, until he slithers out, naked, at its end.

Of the trio, David Earle is the one who considers sexuality, sensation and their implications. His study of the days of Christ, A Thread of Sand, combines dance, drama, words, music and movement into a well-conceived whole with impact.

Unfortunately, the distaff side of the triangle is the weakest, Patricia Beatty is a calm, sometimes too calm a dancer, but her choreography is, at best, cute and at worst, pretentious.

Still, she can be light hearted and fun and Hot and Cold Heroes, a portrait of a New York street, its title taken from a sign in a now destroyed delicatessen, is welcome comic relief.

While the company is fine technically, especially when the confident Amelia Itush and the splendidly strong Keith Urban are centre stage, it still founders in conveying more intense emotions.

That may be a problem later. Now, with the works of Randazzo as its core, the Toronto Dance Theatre is carving out a viable and vivid place in Canadian dance.

Endgame Beckett's theories boring

By DIANNE SHULMAN

Samuel Beckett's 'Endgame' is for people who are a) addicts and/or b) students of Beckett. A member of the first group explained it to me thus: "After you plow your way all the way through 'En Attendant Godot', you have to love the guy. Otherwise, how do you rationalize all that work?" To the second group, I can only extend my condolences.

As philosophy, 'Endgame' lends itself to as many interpretations as there are disputants, but as theatre, it is simply boring. Admittedly, it is far easier to watch than to read: the bodily presence of four different actors helps one to remember which lines belong to whom. Nevertheless, at the end of the performance several members of the audience confessed to me that they had almost fallen asleep.

The actual production of the play wasn't bad at all. The cast had obviously worked very hard at their roles, and used mime to great effect. When, at the curtain call they allowed their faces to return to normal, they were almost unrecognizable! Make-up and costumes were also good: gray for Clov, florid for Hamm, and white for Nagg and Nell. Nell, incidentally, was played by Kenneth Wickes, surprisingly well.

"Nothing is funnier than unhappiness", says Beckett, yet, though all four characters are undoubtedly unhappy they are far from funny. This is a play that starts and goes nowhere. The more's the pity.

Concert beats bad acoustics

By MARY BERNSTEIN

The Convocation Hall concert Sunday, offered people a chance to hear many varying moods.

Simon Caine, who played at Day One, returned to play at this concert. Marred by the bad acoustics of the hall, the set was a mixture of loud country music, featuring an exceptional piano-player and flautist. It was a tight, together sound.

Lenny Breau, as always, drew his listeners into each of his songs, his quick guitar work and sense of timing producing an engrossing sound that flows.

Murray McGlaughlin's career grows from each of his performances. He talks just as beautiful as he sings, and so you are aware of him for every moment of the set. He sings of people growing up and looking at life, and you feel part of what he's saying, because he sings about everyone.

The show served to demonstrate that enjoyable pop shows can be cheap. Sunday only cost $1.50 each.

Show tells same tale Dionysius 70 not new

By ELEANOR JOHNSTON

"Blessed be those who dance! Blessed be those who understand the mysteries of God!" So began the celebration of DIONYSUS IN 1970.

This show is an imitation of the dionysian rites. The eight-member cast passed around wooden bowls of wine, chanting and humming in a supposedly primitive way. The effect on the audience was at first more amusing than entrancing.

Then the cast drew about a third of the audience into the centre of the floor and the hand-clapping, feet-stomping, screaming dance began, seemingly uninhibited, but actually very carefully and skillfully programmed by the cast. We were made into swaying humming concentric circles around the writhing god (Rita Deverall) and then broken into little groups to lunge and repeat unintelligible monosyllables somewhat in the manner of a spastic square-dance.

Then somehow we landed on the floor, neatly forming a circle around the stage, a red carpet in the middle of the room. The Dionysian rite was over; the rest of the show was a commentary, based on Euripides' The Bacchae, of the destructiveness of the god.

The story takes place in ancient Thebes where King Pentheus (a self-consciously tragic Nick Mancuso) struggles unsuccessfully to suppress Dionysus. She escapes from his prison and charms him into initiation to her cult. He dresses himself in women's clothes which are stripped from him by his frenzied townspeople. He is unable to perform the rite before being murdered by his mother Agave who mistook him for a lion.

The actors were unable to make this scene appropriately horrible. The audience was confused as to just what had happened until Pentheus' grandfather Cadmus very narratively explained the situation to Agave. The concentration of the murder-scene was broken also by a girl from the audience screaming "Stop it! Stop it!" Whether her interruption was part of the script or not, it managed to disconcert both cast and audience.

The play ends with the actors groaning in apparent self-disgust, fleeing the complacent god. But moral condemnation of Dionysus is not explicit; it, as does much of the show, depends on the audience.

This show is a very interesting, if not wholly successful experiment in audience involvement. Many responded with evident enthusiasm. There was little scorn for the participation, but some self-conscious laughter.

This production is considerably less violent and sexually explicit than Dionysus 69. This year's audience is not as involved, eg. in the murder.

Low prices and subtle spices feed your head at the Bengal

As more and more people get more and more stoned, they are finding the food served at the raft of plastic-cum-formica restaurants in Toronto is not just inadequate, but revolting.

Concoctions of grease and starch get depressing after a while. And the alternatives are often expensive.

But the Royal Bengal Restaurant at 117 Carlton St. near Jarvis is an exception.

The Bengal has the best Indian food in Toronto, yet an average meal costs only about $2.

Indian food freaks who haven't visited the Bengal should know that most of their dishes are at least 25 cents cheaper than their equivalents at the Rajput, the better-known Indian restaurant on Bloor St. near Spadina.

Shish kebab is $1.25 at the Bengal, as compared to $1.95 at the Rajput.

And the Bengal gives all students a 10 per cent discount.

Two other Indian restaurants in Toronto are India House and the Taj Mahal, but they are expensive and the food isn't worth it.

Indian food does not resemble the stereotype of hot, heavy curries served with chutney.

Indian cuisine at the Bengal is never boring. To the stoned palate, the subtle kaleidoscope of textures, and even colours, of the food are as important as the fine taste.

The Bengal, with its soft eastern decor and high-backed table booths, is a good place to spend an evening. Just talking and eating. The Indian music urges you to eat slowly. The incredible variety on the menu allows you to orchestrate your food-trip to the finest detail.

You could start with pacora, small pieces of vegetable fried in a deep batter and spices. And order a dish of sour cream (at no extra cost) to cool the spices.

You could move on to a beef bhooona (beef, tomato, and onion, in a delicious sauce). And a spinach curry, a pilaf rice. Gulub Jamans are a succulent desert.

If you go with a large group of people, you can order a spectrum on different dishes and reduce the individual bills. Deciding the menu proves to be an interesting political process.

The Bengal was opened only six months ago by S.M. Yakub, its present owner and manager. It doesn't close until midnight Monday to Thursday, and 1 a.m. Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Where kids learn 4 Rs

But it's the RESPECT that's most important

By MARIS PAVELSON

THE INSIDE LOOKS like a Sunday school classroom — one of those spanking new church basement halls with orange doors and cream-coloured walls. In large, multi-coloured letters, CHRIST CALLS — ADVANCE has been taped high on the wall.

A small corner of this huge room is occupied by a group of young people, a teacher and two Sunday school-type blackboards. This is Gateway — a school for children with special learning problems.

GATEWAY IS NOT what one would call a "free school," though it is "free" to the extent that it exists as an alternative to the present Toronto school system. But Gateway has seceded from the system for different reasons than, say, Everdale, a loosely structured school north of Toronto.

Dorothy Shrigley, the self-confessed "brassy" founder of the five-week-old school says: "At Gateway, we teach the four Rs: reading, 'riting, 'rithmetic and respect!"

Who goes to Gateway? There are now seven pupils and they all have special learning problems such as — to use the euphemisms of the teaching trade — "perceptual handicap and educational retardation."

THE CHILDREN, ranging in age from 13-17, have been through the process of "opportunity classes." Opportunity classes were introduced so that special attention might be given to those with learning problems. Jim Acheson, consultant for the Special Education Department, Toronto Board of Education, explains: "There's a very fine line between the child who is trainable and one who is educable." The children in opportunity classes are "just a hair's breadth" above the educable cut-off point according to Acheson.

Opportunity classes have come under increasing attack because they "mark" the child as inferior. Consequently, teachers of opportunity classes may tend to think of their pupils as hopeless cases and not expect too much of them.

Says Gateway teacher Natalie Little: "I think the problem is the ordinary classroom teacher just doesn't give a damn."

AN ATMOSPHERE of defeat pervades the lives of many of these children. Failures in regular classes lead to opportunity classes and eventually specialized schools such as Parkway and Eastdale Vocational Schools — and then, jobs as hairdressers and gas jockeys.

Anne Fraser, Principal of Eastdale reflects sadly: "They have met defeat so often that they just can't bring themselves to try any longer."

Mrs. Shrigley wants to break this cycle of failure and surrender. "They have never been encouraged to compete for better things. Competition is a very good thing.

"These kids need to be given a chance," she adds.

She thinks the children should be pushed to the very limit of their potential. Emphatically denying criticisms that she is trying to make neurosurgeons out of the children at Gateway, she says, "This is all we want for our children — to reach out to the best of their ability."

OPPORTUNITY CLASSES, she maintains, do not do the job. "We're not condemning the opportunity class idea but the children are treated as nothing more than glorified babies. . . and they never get out unless they find they've made a real bad mistake in the first place."

One wonders what opportunity classes are actually accomplishing. Many children enter Eastdale Vocational at the age of 13 or 14 with Grade I and II levels of reading ability. The pupils at Gateway, Mrs. Shrigley allows, are "almost illiterate."

By expecting a lot from its pupils, Gateway hopes to have them up to a high school educational level within two years. Mrs. Shrigley cites the educational history of her own son, at present a pupil at Gateway.

"He was six and I was told he was hopeless. Consequently, I treated him as if he were completely helpless.

"HE WASN'T ALLOWED to do his share of household chores. I didn't let him go to the show alone or even cross the street. I thought he was so stupid he'd get himself killed.

"I was smothering him."

Her son was in special classes until the age of 13. Then, business forced the Shrigleys to move to Orillia. "I was petrified about going to Orillia," Mrs. Shrigley recalls, "because I thought there were no opportunity classes."

Her son was nevertheless put into a regular class "and he upgraded himself five grades in one year. He was getting As and Bs on his report card. For the first time in his life, he was acting like a person."

Last year, upon returning to Toronto, he was again put into an opportunity class. According to Mrs. Shrigley, he has regressed.

"If our children had not gone to school last year at all, they'd have missed nothing," states Mrs. Shrigley, with conviction.

A VERY STRONG POINT of contention with Gateway parents is the amount of involvement which the parents are allowed in their children's education. Apparently, in the public system teachers have frowned on parents helping their children with homework.

With children who have learning problems, parent-teacher communication is even more important. Various education administrators admit a certain failure in this area.

Acheson says, "We've got to make the parents aware. Perhaps our methods of reporting to the parents isn't the best."

For example, Eastdale vocational has no Home and School Association. Principal Fraser says that the organization disintegrated because of lack of interest on the part of the parents.

MISUNDERSTANDING arises and the child suffers. Sometimes parents are not at all sure that their children are in the right place.

Are these vocational classes and schools dumping grounds for children who don't fit in anywhere else? Principal Charles Brundage, who reacted very defensively when questioned about his school, Parkway Vocational, thinks not. "We have in Toronto a marvellously flexible system of education which enables us to meet the needs of each student."

Yet, one boy at Gateway, a former Parkway student, has emotional problems which compound the difficulty of educating him.

The people at Gateway and the Toronto Board of Education are well-intentioned: everyone wants the best for the children. There is no one right approach; Gateway School is one alternative.

BUT THE SCHOOL now has troubles with regard to staff and to finances. One of their two teachers has left because she cannot support herself on her meagre Gateway salary.

The school, therefore, is appealing to the university community for help. Any payment would have to consist of free room and board. If you are interested, please call Dorothy Shrigley at 465-1434.

Metro resident fights to stop Quetico destruction

By JEAN BUBBA

Quetico Provincial Park is one of the last wilderness parks in the Country.

Now, its future as such a park is dubious.

The Province of Ontario apparently has no need for a wilderness park like Quetico.

Situated on the shores of the French Lake in Northern Ontario on the Dawson Trail, it has an area of over a million acres. Quetico is in the middle of canoe country on an historic waterway to the west. During the summer it offers a museum and an interpretive programme to those who visit the area.

A thing of beauty does not remain forever; at least, not in the eyes of the province.

But why Quetico when if it goes, in any part, there is nothing comparable to take its place?

Maybe because it's a bit out of the way, because it has a funny name which isn't as recognizable as Algonquin or the Muskokas, because no one of importance has his camp there, because no one will know what we do there if we do anything at all.

But someone did find out. And that someone was Bill Auchterlonie, a nobody as far as the province is concerned.

But the nobody decided to do something. Tuesday night he used the St. Lawrence Centre's Town Hall to publicise the case of Quetico. He tried to show people what is happening to the few remaining areas of unadulterated forest and game preserve land.

Bill Auchterlonie, resident of Toronto, is fighting to save some tract of land called Quetico which lies thousands of miles away.

Bill Auchterlonie is fighting the Province of Ontario.
