Despite being without their three top men, the Varsity cross country crew managed a creditable third place finish at the University of Western Ontario invitational cross country meet held at Waterloo last Saturday.

The race was a rain-soaked affair and made the going incredibly heavy. Despite this the winner Grant McLaren from Western was able to set a new course record of 24 minutes 49 seconds over five miles.

The final team standings were exceptionally close for the top three and much credit should be given to the Toronto runners for staying within 11 points of the winning team from Waterloo. Western, even with McLaren's first place finish were unable to take the team title and finished second, five points out of first place.

Toronto followed up with 55 points just eleven more than the Waterloo total of 44. Far behind and way out of contention were York, and Queens with 97 and 95 points respectively.

The Toronto team is now in excellent position for the OQAA final Saturday when the three absentees will definitely rejoin the team. Both the Western and Waterloo squads were at full strength on Saturday and there should be no change for them next week.

All the Varsity runners ran strongly and almost all of them ran better than their personal best, although no official records are kept of cross country races.

Saturday's excellent race should give these runners the experience, and even more important the confidence, they need to play key roles in capturing the OQAA championship Saturday.

Ice Blues win 6-4 over Orillia

The Varsity Blues hockey team opened their pre-season schedule last night at Varsity Arena as they out-skated the Orillia Terriers on their way to a well-deserved 6-4 victory.

The Terriers are undefeated in OHA senior A action this year and their pin-point passing kept Blues off-balance until John Wright skated the length of the ice to break a 2-2 deadlock late in the second period.

Blues wrapped it up with three fast goals in the final period.

There were only 75 fans, including the Blues football team.

Trinity slithers over New 12-7

By PAUL RAPHAEL
Tuesday was the day of a mud-bath on the back campus, as Trinity slithered to a 12-7 gridiron victory over New.

Yesterday's game was necessarily dull, since the two teams had difficulty maintaining their footing long enough to concentrate on the game they were playing.

This resulted in play mostly at center field.

Trinity scored early on a major by Cernick after a fumble recovery deep in New territory. Their other touchdown by Groskope came after an interception. Both majors were unconverted.

New had a single in the first half and followed it with an unconverted touchdown by Olelland late in the fourth quarter.

Neither offence was overly competent. Trinity gave up a blocked punt and an interception, while New surrendered the ball once on a fumble and four times on interceptions. In fact of his 12 pass attempts, New QB Harbut completed only three.

The only successful features of the offences were: Foster's power running for Trinity and New's two successful faked punts, which, together, gained over 40 yards.

Prominent in both their colourful sweaters and their lack of cheering were Trinity's cheerleaders. If they had made an attempt at showing enthusiasm, perhaps the contest might have been less dull.

Cut, parry and thrust doesn't foil our fencers

The Varsity trials were the occasion, Hart House the scene and the Hennyey Trophy the prize this weekend in fencing action.

Jonannes Kacynski romped through the foil pool event distributing hits with gay abandon. Finn Matheson and Mark Taylor followed, thrusting to second and third places.

The cut and thrust of the sabre rang in the upper gym as Vladimir Hachinski (without horse) won the event. David Brown and Andrew Benyei place well in the pool as well as on their opponents.

Epee duels followed the style of Hennyey the coach as, stretched in tension, Rowland Griffin overcame the left arm of Vladimir Gettler to win while Taylor slipped past the others to third place.

NOTES: Forestry had little trouble tramping Pharmacy into the soft turf, as they ran up the most impressive score of the season: 41-0.

Water polo to splash tonight, not Saturday

The exhibition Water Polo game originally scheduled for this Saturday between Blues and Waterloo will be played instead this evening at 8:00 p.m. in Hart House. The Blues, coached by Alan Pyle, will be trying to get back on the winning track after being edged 9-6 by McMaster last weekend as pre-season play continues. Women welcome as usual.

"I couldn't hack the hassle in Los Angeles"

By Lyndon Little

BRUCE SIMPSON is 20. He has straight, medium-length brown hair, is of average size and speaks in a decidedly introspective manner.

One afternoon early last spring, at a conference meet as a member of the powerful UCLA track team, the Agincourt High School graduate pole vaulted 16 feet, 9 3/4 inches to take first place in that event. Although he later finished fifth in the conference finals, it was the year's best vault in the Pacific Eight.

This year, Bruce is a second-year student in the School of Physical Health and Education at Varsity and performs in virtual anonymity as a member of the U of T track and field team.

Why, you ask, would anyone give up a full scholarship (room, board, tuition) at one of the world's top track and field schools — where the track stars are frequently accorded as much attention as the football players — to enroll at U of T?

To hear Bruce tell his story, it was his concern over the general quality of life he was experiencing in the greater Los Angeles sprawl that prompted his decision not to return to UCLA this fall.

"It was certainly no easy choice to make," he began as he talked in The Varsity Sports office last week.

"THE ATHLETIC SETUP was so good there. Top coaching, excellent facilities. When I wanted to workout, I just told the vaulting coach, Tom Tellez, that I was going to practise and he came out and watched.

"I mean, it was a very stimulating environment for any athlete to be situated in. With world-class sprinters and field men working out all around you, well you just naturally tried harder."

According to Bruce, there was also very little to complain about the academic side of life at UCLA. The standards were high, the teaching staff very liberal and there was a good choice of subjects. Also, the Athletic Department made tutors available for any of the track men who felt they needed extra help with their studies.

The real problem was the general living environment in LA — both the social milieu and the physical atmosphere. "Like one day," he related, "a short time after I'd arrived, the heavy smog that is so much of the everyday life there, suddenly cleared up. Why geez, there a group of mountains just a few miles away that I'd never even seen before!

"BUT WHAT WAS more disturbing, was the prevailing attitude of the people there. I don't know if it is because of the density of population or what, but they seemed to be terribly self-orientated. They didn't appear to really care about anything or to respect anybody else's opinion. They were sort of plastic people in an unreal world.

"There was also a frightening polarization of views. You had the long-hairs, the Birchers, the drug freaks and the religious freaks — which left little room for the middle ground viewpoint. They really have some serious problems down there, and I can perhaps see it happening here in 15 years!"

While at UCLA, Bruce also had an opportunity to see the infamous Los Angeles police force in action. "After the Kent State affair," he recalls, "they had a sympathy demonstration on the campus. Boy, did the police ever bust in and break it up in a hurry! After it was all over, the authorities had a helicopter circling the campus for three days just to make sure other groups didn't have a chance to form."

Bruce considers himself fortunate to have had the chance to start pole vaulting while still in public school here in Toronto. By the time he had graduated into Grade 10 at Agincourt, he was also a member of the Scarborough Lions Track Club where he was able to work on his conditioning on a year-round basis.

HIS HARD WORK and abundant talent combined to produce a 16 feet, 1/4 inch vault in his senior year in high school. Not surprisingly, letters began to arrive marked with such interesting return addresses as, "ATHLETIC DEPARTMENT, UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA," and "OREGON STATE ATHLETIC DEPARTMENT."

He visited several of the west-coast universities that made him scholarship offers on those all-expense-paid weekend scouting trips before finally deciding on UCLA.

But, just because he has chosen to forego the remaining three years of his track scholarship, don't make the mistake of assuming that Bruce is against the athletic scholarship system — far from it!

"There's no need to go all out on the business," he claims. "But if the scholarships are carefully controlled to avoid the worst excesses of the American setup, then I feel it would be a good thing to have in Canada. That way, athletes can better themselves intellectually while at the same time improve their performances.

"We need better facilities at Canadian universities, but the most important thing is to have well-paid coaches. That way, it's their main business to make sure the athletes get the proper instruction and proper practice conditions."

NOW THAT HE is back in Toronto, vaulting continues to play a large part in his life. But, as he states, "the difference now is that I'm no longer willing to sacrifice "everything" for it."

Trouble securing the right pole — they were all provided for him at UCLA — caused him to flop in the recent interfac track meet. However, he came up with the right combination in time for the OQAA finals where he set a new standard of 16 feet, 3/4 inches at Hamilton.

"I still hope that I can reach my potential as a vaulter — that's the most important thing for any athlete — but it's just going to be a little harder. The problem at the moment is that I use up so much valuable energy just trying to get a good indoor vault setup."

At present, after the day's classes are over, Bruce meets his vaulting friend, Dennis Rice, and the two of them travel across the city to Woburn Collegiate in Scarborough. There, together with Walter Kostric, who is a PhysEd teacher there and who used to vault in Yugoslavia, they workout in the school gym in a make-shift arrangement.

Hopefully, if negotiations prove successful, by early December they may be able to obtain the use of the Exhibition Colliseum where there is a good, safe, vaulting pit that lies unused most of the time.

IN THE IMMEDIATE future, there are the Winter Games in Saskatoon in late December, the Maple Leaf Indoor Invitational Games in February and then possibly some of the big meets south of the border in the spring outdoor season.

"Dennie and I both used to play hockey," he adds with a smile. "Sometimes we like to kid ourselves and wonder out loud how rich we might be today if we had put all the time we've spent on vaulting into hockey instead."

It's a good thing for Canadian track and field fortunes that Bruce opted for the pit and the pole rather than the rink. We have plenty of spare hockey players in this country, but at the moment, we're just a little short of 16 foot plus vaulters!

Bruce Simpson, new OQAA pole vault champ, gave up his scholarship at UCLA

CBC censor Max Ferguson skit on Quebec

REGINA (CUP) — The Canadian Broadcasting Company withdrew from broadcast a Max Ferguson skit satirizing arrests made in Quebec under the War Measures Act.

The skit, which had already been fed out to the network stations and pre-recorded by them for later broadcast, was never used because a message from the CBC brass instructed stations not to broadcast it.

The skit features a supposed visit by Quebec Justice Minister Jerome Choquette to a Montreal jail where a number of prisoners are being held incommunicado after being rounded up under the War Measures Act.

In the background, one prisoner is heard pounding on the bars of his cell and vocally protesting his incarceration.

Gradually the noise coming from this activity becomes pre-dominant in the skit.

The listener then hears a guard ask the prisoner what right he feels he has to contact the outside when none of the other prisoners can do so.

The listener then hears the familiar voice of Pierre Elliot Trudeau say that he thought the Cabinet might be interested in his whereabouts and that he wants to contact them.

Ferguson then closes the skit with comments that at a time like this, he wouldn't want to be in disagreement with Mr. Choquette.

In a recent television column in the Toronto Globe and Mail, Blaik Kirby uses words such as "cowed" and "cowardice" to describe the recent actions of CBC officials.

For some time it has been obvious that George Davidson became President of the CBC because it was felt necessary to have someone in charge who knew his way around Parliament Hill. The idea was presumably that such a man would know how to deal with Parliament to fend off the attacks and give the CBC some strength and determination to stand by its principles.

The evidence indicates that instead of defending the CBC, he is bowing to the Parliamentary winds, Kirby wrote.

The biggest generator of those winds is Prime Minister Trudeau. Several weeks ago he severely criticized the CBC coverage of the developments in Quebec, causing an immediate self-censorship to be imposed upon the network by the CBC brass.

When contacted at his Toronto home, Mr. Ferguson said that he had made several inquiries in order to find out why the skit had not been used but had given up after getting nothing out of the CBC bureaucracy.

"This is the first time I have been censored in 23 years," he said.

The revelation of the censorship of the Max Ferguson show follows closely after the CBC's decision to censor a scheduled documentary on Lenin.

The CBC brass has faced mounting criticism recently for its "gutless" in handling the Quebec crisis.

Canada feared as Red threat

NEW YORK (CUP) — The Front De Liberation Du Quebec is a Red Chinese revolutionary group "Determined to overthrow the Canadian government and establish a People's Republic of Canada," says John R. Rarick, Louisiana Democrat.

A member of the U. S. House of Representatives, Rarick says that "Despite the recognition of the communist threat (FLQ), Mr. Trudeau and his government . . . extended diplomatic recognition to the government of Red China and has given indication of supporting the Red Chinese admission to the United Nations."

Apparently this act of recognizing China is part of an attempt by the "left wing extremist" Trudeau to play games "with the Canadian people, and their attention is being diverted by a skillful manoeuvre in sensitivity training."

Mr. Rarick also criticized the news commentators for "No longer" describing the FLQ as a "Communist Chinese movement."

The media, Rarick says, may be fearful of embarrassing "Canada's newly ally, Red China."

"Mr. Trudeau has exploited the realities of the situation magnificently," Rarick said in all seriousness. "The shock troops of the FLQ are safely in jail protected from the Canadian people and Trudeau's ideological friends of Red China have been extended diplomatic recognition without any backlash . . ."

Rarick is worried about what these latest diplomatic moves by Canada will mean to the safety of U. S. democracy.

"And we of the United States now have Castro and the Soviet fleet on the South — Trudeau on the North — our fighting men in South Vietnam — and our attention directed to Middle East.

"Where next? Bonn? London? Or here in the United States?"

Ryerson rejected employees' offer

By BEN FORSTER

Despite a proposal by management-level employees of Ryerson Press to buy the 140-year-old publishing house its owners, the company is now American controlled and will probably stay that way.

"A group of us here approached the owners during the late summer and made a proposal to buy the company — to keep it in Canadian hands" said Robin Farr, the Director of Publishing at Ryerson. The proposal was not a direct bid: "We couldn't lay our hands on a sum sufficient to pay outright. What we did was offer them a cheque for a certain sum and propose to pay the rest out of earnings," said Farr.

The move was intended as a forerunner to more concrete negotiations with the United Church, owners of Ryerson Press.

According to Rev. Frank Brisbin, Co-ordinator of church publications, the basic difficulty with the employee offer was that "the church would have been paid over a number of years. There would have been no immediate change in the present financial status of the church or in the debts incurred by Ryerson."

As the proposed down payment of the employee offer was too small for the Church to accept, the General Manager of Ryerson approached the Ontario government "in relation to their purchase plan."

"The General Manager, reported his approach to the Ontario government to me," said Brisbin. "We had the employees' offer for two or three months."

But it didn't get any further. The sale of Ryerson to McGraw-Hill of Canada, a subsidiary of the large American publishing company "happened with a great deal of suddenness; it was all over in a matter of hours." But, added Farr, the employee offer still stands if in some way the sale is rescinded.

There is little chance of that happening. "There is the possibility of action by the federal government," said Farr, "but I'm not sure of the legality of such a move."

He pointed out that the origins of Ryerson Press pre-dated Confederation. As well, Ryerson was not a separate corporate entity affiliated with the United Church. Rather it is simply, as Brisbin said, "the Church doing business." It was therefore constituted under ecclesiastical law, making any federal takeover move a ticklish proposition.

Noting that Stanley Randall, the minister of Trade and Development had stated that Ryerson was losing about $500,000 a year, and that Randall felt that the company would continue to lose, Farr said wryly "McGraw-Hill wouldn't buy a company that didn't have a chance of making a profit." The firm was losing money mostly in areas concerned with church publications, and if operations were cut back with this in mind, the company stood an excellent chance of returning a profit. "Besides, the company has been losing large sums only in the last couple of years."

McGraw-Hill offered the United Church about $2,000,000 for Ryerson, stating that the former Canadian Company would be run as a subsidiary. But employees have not been guaranteed jobs — they've just received promises that as many of them as possible will be kept.

Short-haired union men and long-locked campus Waffles parade outside the Ryerson Press to protest sale to U.S. interests.

Waffle pickets press

By ERIC MILLS

Wafflers and union members demonstrated outside the Ryerson Press Wednesday, protesting the recent takeover of the publishing firm by McGraw-Hill, an American publishing giant.

The demonstration of about 30 persons was sponsored by the U of T Waffle and the Toronto Typographical Union, one of the two main unions representing Ryerson workers. No Ryerson workers took part in the protest.

Calling the takeover "part of the whole offensive of the Americanization of Canada", the demonstrators were particularly upset that Ryerson is a major publisher of Canadian textbooks.

They carried signs saying "profits before principles", "What can McGraw-Hill teach our children

They carried signs saying "profits before principles", "What can McGraw-Hill teach our children about Canada?" and "Ryerson tops New York Times best sellout list", among others.

A Waffle statement given out called on the federal and provincial governments to block the sale (which is not to be finalized until December 1) by making the company a Crown Corporation.

The statement also asked that the textbook industry be declared a key sector of the economy with no foreign control and urged that an independent commission be established to investigate Canadian control in textbooks.

The Waffle has called upon the Ontario Government to set up a worker managed Crown Corporation to publish all school textbooks.

Typographical union president Terry Wilde supported the Waffle demands for nationalizing Ryerson and declaring textbook publishing a "key sector".

"The government took action on Denison Mines; why not on Ryerson?" he said.

"This shows a lack of confidence in Gavin Clarke," general manager of Ryerson appointed this year to shore up the finances, Wilde said. The sellout "virtually cuts the ground underneath him."

The union was also protesting 100 jobs lost over the past year and further job loss feared in the future.

U of T professor Melville Watkins, demonstrating alongside his ten-year-old son Kenneth, said that while only the Ontario government could nationalize Ryerson, the federal government could likely block the sale, because it was a transaction over international borders.

"This country is always late, but its still not too late for the Ontario government to take over Ryerson," Watkins said.

SAC votes to stay on President's Council

By BRIAN MORGAN

The coming of the Millennium was pitted against an aircraft half-way over the Atlantic with flailing incompetents at the controls, and the President's Advisory Council emerged the victor at last night's meeting of the Students' Administrative Council.

In a debate mixing touching, personal anecdotes with calls to the higher spiritual guidance of the spectre of CUG, SAC decided by a two-vote margin to accept the realities of the political consciousness of the student mass and keep its present five-student representation on PAC.

External Affairs Commissioner Vince Doan, in attempting to get the students removed, maintained that SAC was castrating its own power by legitimizing the voice of a group of students which could go against the wishes of SAC, and whose power, in being on such a body as the PAC, was actually greater than that of SAC itself.

He said that the failure of the PAC to decide on the kind of selection committee for a new president that SAC had wanted, indicated that SAC would no longer be the voice for students in important decisions in the university.

Some Honorable Members protested that assholes will always make incompetent decisions, while others felt it was the PAC itself that was assinine.

Moving right along, Peter Hall asked Mr. Dolan to wake up, and also to abandon his pre-CUG-UWC Wernickian analysis. He said that if SAC felt that it was to be the

Bloody awful

U of T students have so far donated 2,057 pints of blood in the blood drive that ends today. This is 1,350 pints short of the goal set for this year. Today's clinic will be held at the Red Cross Center at 67 College Street and at the Sir Daniel Wilson Residence.

only voice for students on the campus, it should not put students on any other body at all. He said he believed students could actually speak for themselves, and should be allowed to.

Some Honorable Members added the hitherto unsuspected information that SAC did not represent the view of many students on the campus, that SAC was confused and positionless, rotten and divided against itself, that The Varsity was a greater voice on the campus, and that SAC was inevitably doomed to a declining status and withering importance.

With the air thusly cleared, Brian Hayes said that the whole matter was really one of the tactics, and that it was poor tactical timing to accept the seats now.

Debate then lurked slightly, with the chessboard of campus politics becoming cluttered with uncontrollable pieces, and the possibility being raised of the faculty learning of divisions in the united student voice.

After two and a half hours of debate, some impatient members voiced their desire for a vote, but another half hour passed before their wish became reality, and the students from the Conservative-Radical Faction could breathe a sigh of relief in support of the PAC.

"Everybody knows Wolfville's where it's at, but who knows where Wolfville is at?"

— Oave Sheppard,
Wolfville, Nova Scotia

Wednesday, we took a look at the ideology of Canada's national police agency, the RCMP. Today, in further excerpts from an essay by former Saskatchewan university teacher W.F.P. Wringle, we examine some of the content of Canadian law.

The Ideology of the Canadian Law

DESPITE WHAT WE may have been trained to believe, there is very little protection for civil liberties in Canada.

It doesn't take the emergency War Measures Act or special Public Order Regulations to establish this.

A perusal of several sections of the Canadian Criminal Code makes it clear that there is an astonishing repressiveness written into our country's legal code. Many of the most powerful laws in Canada exist to "legalize" the repression of reform or revolutionary movements.

I have hesitated to document this matter for fear of intensifying fear and intimidation, but our commitments to having real knowledge must, I feel, always over-rule tendencies to maintain false securities based on myth.

FIRST, PROPERTY LAWS. Section 372(c) reads:

"(1) Every one commits mischief who wilfully . . . (c) obstructs, interrupts or interferes with the lawful use, enjoyment or operation of property."

This is the section under which 114 students, sitting in at Simon Fraser University in late 1968, were charged. Theirs was an act of civil disobedience aimed at securing reforms in discriminatory admission policies.

These laws and other property laws reflect the power that lies behind the authority of corporate institutions. They can be used if and when real challenges to corporate authority is put. When corporate authority begins to lose its legitimacy, as is happening in universities now, state force is sometimes used to maintain, or try to maintain, the exposed vested interests and the chain of elitist social relations that exist behind democratic mythology.

This usually happens because there is a major contradiction between, and/or an ambiguity about, the structure and the function of the institution.

Section 372, entitled mischief, is the main part of the Code to study regarding property. Sit-ins, teach-ins, occupations and other reform tactics all could to arrest under this section. It is important to remember that the legal power over corporations, including buildings, rests with a small elite under whose names it is incorporated. In planning reform activity these legal realities should be considered as part of strategy. When you read this section you will know what your parents and teachers meant when they warned you not to "get in any mischief." In this society, to raise a curious, questioning and independent ("mischievous") child may lead to the creation of another political "criminal."

The other relevant sections include treason, sedition, unlawful assembly and riots, disobedience and disorderly conduct. The Code is so technical and ambiguous, and arbitrary, that other existent or new sections could also be used for political oppression as well.

TREASON. UNDER SECTION 46 (1) (d):

"Every one commits treason who, in Canada . . . uses force or violence for the purpose of overthrowing the government of Canada or a province."

Treason is also defined as:

" . . . assisting an enemy at war . . . whether or not a state of war exists between Canada and the country whose forces they are; (giving information to another state) that he knows or ought to know may be used by that state for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or defense of Canada (conspires to do the above) . . . and manifests that intention by an overt act (or conspires to do this.)"

Under this section an "overt act" can be "expressed or declared by open and considered speech." Proceedings commence with an "oath (with information about this overt act) before a justice within six days after the time when the words are alleged to have been spoken", and a warrant "must be issued ten days after the time when information is laid."

Need I show how this law constitutes a continual threat to free speech? Though our Bill of Rights safeguards free speech in theory, until less ambiguous, arbitrary and potentially oppressive laws exist, it is without real substance.

SEDITION.

Under section 60, seditious "words", "libel", or "conspiracy" are shown by "seditious intention," in the latter case between two or more persons. It is a sort of tautology, but the pretense of an independent criterion for sedition is given under clause (4):

"Without limiting the generality of the meaning of expression 'seditious intention,' every one shall be presumed to have a seditious intention who (a) teaches or advocates, or (b) publishes or circulates any writing that advocates the use, without the authority of law, of force as a means of accomplishing change within Canada."

The phrases "without limiting the generality"; "shall be presumed to have"; and the fact that what constitutes the advocacy of using force is relative to one's ideology (vested interest and position) suggest that a lot of seditious conspiracy exists in all societies at all times. Since no real act, with irreversible consequences is even required for sedition to occur, this law can clearly be applied quite arbitrarily.

The quick amendment of the C.C. during the Winnipeg Strike to allow more stringent measures to be taken, legally, against strikers suggests that when a reform movement is perceived (whether or not it actually is) as a threat to the power of capitalist elites that people will be accused of "sedition."

Another point is that this law constitutes a hidden, but very real threat to academic freedom. Intellectual inquiry, especially in history and social science, often leads a scholar to conclude that a forceful change is required and/or inevitable in society and government. Technically, "teaching" or "publishing" sedition is possible, and were an intellectual to be part of a reform movement such could be used to make political oppression appear legal.

Intending, "in good faith", only "to point out errors or defects" in the government or constitution, Parliament or Legislature, of Canada or a province, or "the administration of justice in Canada," is not sedition. In fact all reform movements are attempting to do this, from their point of view, so this protection logically contradicts the idea of "sedition."

One "protection" against being convicted of sedition itself justifies, logically, the reform movement now developing in Canada. No seditious intention exists if one simply "point(s) out, for the purpose of removal, matters that produce or tend to produce feelings of hostility and ill-will between different classes of persons in Canada."

Though the liberal mythology disseminated and taught in Canada claims there are no "classes" here, that we are all equal, it is encouraging to see that the C.C. is more accurate. And since the very distribution of wealth and power in Canada, and Canada's satellite status in the U.S. empire act to create "feelings of hostility and ill-will between different classes," the C.C., logically (not politically, of course) itself advocates a social revolution and shown seditious intention. The social elites who exist because there is a class society in Canada had best lobby to have this part of the C.C. amended, or at least charge the M.P.'s passing the C.C. under the C.C.

Conviction for seditious conspiracy is punishable by as much as 14 years imprisonment.

UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY AND RIOTS

Unlawful assembly

"is an assembly of 3 or more persons who, with intent to carry out any common purpose, assembly in such a manner or so conduct themselves when they are assembled so as to cause persons in the neighbourhood of the assembly to fear, on reasonable grounds, that they (a) will disturb the peace tumultuously, or (b) will by that assembly needlessly and without reasonable cause provoke other persons to disturb the peace tumultuously."

A lawful assembly can become an unlawful one if people conduct themselves with "a common purpose in a manner that would have made the assembly unlawful if they had assembled in that manner for that purpose."

The law itself and this mouthful of "ifs" indicates the flexibility for laying this charge and its potential use to infringe civil rights. The police can arbitrarily define an assembly as unlawful since the phrases to do so make the charge, to say the least, a matter of opinion, i.e. ideology. Whether or not the political atmosphere warrants elites oppressing a movement will be fundamental to any legal technicalities, precedents, etc. when this charge is made and convictions occur.

But there is more. Unlawful assembly can become a "riot", that much used word today, much more easily than people think:

"A riot is an unlawful assembly that has begun to disturb the peace tumultuously."

The word "riot" usually conjures up images of a violent hoard. Those images are perpetuated by the very people and forces that so easily can oppress people demonstrating for needed reforms. We have seen how flexible and arbitrary "unlawful assembly" is within the C.C. What constitutes a "riot" is equally arbitrary.

Authorities who oppose the acts of a reform movement can escalate charges from unlawful assembly to riot, to the reading of the riot act, as threats to and/or possible punishments for continued action. The process can be initiated by the police defining people marching or even just milling as unlawful. If the stereotyping of reformers as subhumans is sufficiently successful among police, they may perceive almost any overt act in this way. It is clearly a law with immense political implications.

The Varsity a member of Canadian University Press was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto. Printed by Web Offset Publications Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Since "tumultuous" can mean "turbulence, agitation or even commotion" this escalation is quite feasible from the lesser to greater charge. It is the best example of a closed ideological-power system I have ever come across.

DISOBEDIENCE:

The policeman has great protections in carrying out his duty, which may mean assisting to oppress a social movement.

If you try to aid a friend that is being arbitrarily arrested, or if the police want to interpret your behaviour as obstructing such an arrest, you are "liable to imprisonment for two years" on an indictable offence.

Happening to be standing in a certain place during arrests; happening to say the wrong thing at the wrong time, which might antagonize a policeman, can escalate into this serious charge.

IN THESE KINDS OF LAWS

much is left deliberately ambiguous and up to the discretion of the policeman.

When this combines with the kind of socialization the policeman has received (as we saw yesterday, the ideology of the RCMP, for example, as expressed in a training handbook, trains police to see themselves as "supermen" and lawbreakers as sub-human.), law can be used as an instrument of direct political repression.

Prison notes by a Canadian political prisoner

One of the several hundred Quebecois arrested, detained and then released without charges in the last two weeks was Alain Patrie, a Montreal reporter for the Canadian Communist Party newspaper, The Canadian Tribune. Here we reprint Patrie's account of his experience.

THE FOUR OF THEM came through the door like a crowd. They had square faces and square shoulders and they mouthed explanations as they intoned the War Measures Act. They flashed badges in leather wallets and then snapped them shut.

There was no alternative. My wife huddled the two children close as the police fanned out through the house on an implacable search. They bent to their work with a vengeance, peering into the most secret places of our home. The bedroom, the vanity, the closets. Their main interest lay in the hundreds of books.

Their search concluded, they beckoned for me to get dressed and accompany them. I was "detained." Not arrested, not charged, not even suspected. From the police car I could see my family peering out the window through the rain-drenched night.

The Montreal city jail is a gleaming modern structure, 13 stories of modernity. The institution is riddled with electronic consoles and counters banked with switches that control gates and steel doors and bars. The doors are sentient, with no one visible they open at our approach and close as we pass.

The guards grin at my consternation and put me through the degradation of processing. I am obliged to undress while two guards arrogantly search my hair, my body, the soles of my feet. They confiscate my watch, tie and shoelaces. They are indifferent to my request for a lawyer. One of them tells me to take it up with Ottawa.

THE CELL THEY PLACE ME IN is classified as extreme detention. It measures six by six and contains a cantilevered board and blanket as a bed. There is a toilet bowl in the corner, nothing else. The authorities in their wisdom have decided to keep these cells cold. The temperature drops into the low fifties and the single blanket barely reaches from feet to chest. Sleep does not come.

After a few hours a clear bass voice is heard down the corridor. It rises in sure melody, deep and brave, singing the Internationale in French.

A voice shouted a query of who is singing. The singer halted his song and replied in sonorous tones, "Michel Chartrand." He recounted the story of his detention, how they took him in the middle of the night a week ago. Seven days in this hole.

I ask him if he is alone. There are four of us that are kept here constantly. The others are held in these cells for 24 hours and then transferred upstairs. You will be more comfortable upstairs, he reassures us. "Meanwhile," he urges, "wrap the blanket around you like a Mexican. It will help keep you warm."

He introduces us to the other three that we can hear but cannot see. I am in cell 20. In cell 22 they are keeping Charles Gagnon. In cell 16 Michel Chartrand, in cell 12 Pierre Vallieres and in cell eight their lawyer Robert Lemieux. All of them have been here for seven days. At the time of this writing it is 14 days and still no relief. They have no towel, no toothbrush, no access to telephones, no writing and no reading. The government acts with venomous spite. They are allowed to leave their cells twice weekly for a walk in a corridor.

THERE HAS BEEN NO CHARGE, no element of guilt evidenced, nothing but wrestling with ideas. Chartrand tells me that they have interrogated him. He states that he has been offered a deal: immediate release if he pledges to remain silent and removes himself from any association with the FLQ.

With scorn in his voice he shouts, "Thirty years I have struggled in the labor movement, do they think 30 days or even 30 months will frighten me?"

He explains the source of his courage.

Up in the Gaspé he spent much time with a new breed of Quebecois. Miners and fishermen who brook no submission to the ancient paternalism of old Quebec: "These are the breed who taught me courage."

He expounds on the recent developments in the province, explaining to all that under the capitalist mask of democracy there is the skull of fascism.

The cold is pervasive. The talk turns to the other political prisoners. I am told that Pierre Vallieres is sick, he suffers from gingivitis and gastro-enteritis. The authorities refuse him treatment. They refuse him a simple toothbrush. Robert Lemieux' voice is firm as he orates a humorous petition to the Quebec Minister of Justice. He calls for a restoration of democratic rights and the listening prisoners applaud. It is incredible. No one comes but the guards. No one questions or investigates or is even interested in innocence or guilt. With the War Measures Act justice does not have to be swift any longer.

THE NIGHT AND THE DAY PASS. I have heard much from the mouths of these four brave men. They seem calm in the face of adversity and persecution. They are ennobled by their ideas and are prepared to face any opponent at the bar of justice.

It is their opponents who elude the confrontation. It is the authorities who tremble at the thought of exposing ideas or truths.

In the evening the guards motion me out of my cell. There is no explanation. Michel Chartrand shouts encouragement. Imagine! He knows, I am going upstairs where it is warm and there are more conveniences — but he does not think about himself.

The 13th floor of the prison contains five or six radiating wards. Each ward holds 30 to 35 cells. Some of them are packed others half filled. I am placed in cell 16, Ward D. Three times a day we are allowed out of the "cages" for two hours recreation. There are tables and we can play cards. It is warm again.

The prisoners are uniformly young. I am the oldest among them and they flock to me with questions of the outside world. They are in total isolation, many of them for more than a week. They inquire about the people outside. Are they affronted by the War Measures Act? Are there rallies and demonstrations?

I discover that not one prisoner has been charged, some have not even been interrogated and they have been here seven days.

This is wholesale vengeance. The police have such arbitrary powers they are responsible to no one. Anyone can be detained and can be thrown into a hole to rot for days. It is more than intimidation, it is naked terror.

THE SECOND NIGHT IS EASIER. The warmth and the larger cell makes sleep possible. Out of my comfort my mind travels downstairs to the four men who are cold and cramped and alone. The world must know about them and the world must rally and grow indignant about what has come to pass.

The third day is one of resignation. I imagine that they will keep me indefinitely and I no longer anticipate interrogation. I have ceased asking the guards for a lawyer, it is quite useless. I recall that in Greece the conditions are similar except that the prisoners are placed on an island.

The other prisoners discuss incessantly. The topics range from Quebec to Ireland, from Chile to Guyana. I have lived in Quebec all my life and for the first time I discover how little I know about the French Canadian youth.

They discuss class struggle and the future of imperialism. They are bold and understand the nature of the forces that have put them in prison. They are prepared to wait out their jailers.

AT EIGHT IN THE EVENING of the third day I am interrogated. There is a 10-minute interview. I establish my identity and ask for a charge. They shrug and smile and apologize. I am free to go and oh yes, they offer this gratuitously, I am always free to sue the government if I wish.

Last Post insert 'changed my thinking'

The "special report" the Varsity carried Monday from The Last Post magazine was a much-needed sane appraisal of the real implications of the events in Quebec over the past month, and I congratulate you for running it. It has changed much of my thinking on the matter.

I would go even a little further than the authors of the piece, however, and raise the interpretation that the backdoor rumors out of Ottawa about Claude Ryan's "provisional government" are precisely the proof of the thesis of the piece — that Trudeau moved against separatism, and Quebec nationalism, not terrorism. Trudeau had successfully tarred the Parti Quebecois and FRAP with the FLQ brush after Laporte's murder, but also had to destroy the credibility of moderate separatists and nationalists from Claude Ryan to the labour leaders like Pepin and Laberge. If we see the "provisional government" garbage as a second-stage assault against moderates, following the first stage assault against the left and left nationalists, the confusion of events and possible intents becomes infinitely clearer.

Just another thought, a frightening one from my experience of the last month: When we get fed panicky rumours in dribs and drabbles, and when false cries of wolf are used to justify wider political moves, the propensity on everyone's part to accept, or at least to tacitly accept until much later, what the government is doing, is terrifying.

What struck me about the special report was that I had read all the quotes from ministers that the papers ran from day to day, but only when I saw them put together and put back to back in your Monday section, did the lies and contradictions dawn on me. To me, that was even more frightening than the War Measures Act.

John Holt,

Varsity commended for ineptitude

I should like to commend the editorial staff of the Varsity for their zeal in these troubled times. It is, indeed, impressive that, after turning out their editorial, they find time to fill the remaining pages. Most newspapers would hire reporters to cover campus news; The Varsity, it appears, lets the editorial staff ignore it altogether or manufacture its own.

Unfortunately, their ineptitude at covering their bias for writing news is all too obvious. Perhaps they should take lessons from the other Toronto dailies in hiding their opinions between the lines of copy. If you're going to do something, you might as well do it right.

Lecturer apologizes

I am writing to apologize to everyone who may have been disappointed last Wednesday when I did not appear for my lecture. I am violently embarrassed, and would like everyone to know how sorry I am. Seriously. The problem was that the party to whom I was speaking who was supposed to put the announcement in "Here and Now" was confused, and mistook the date of the lecture. It was actually scheduled for Thursday.

I will endeavour to repeat my lecture in the near future, and I wish to remind all interested students that the lecture is for free, absolutely no charge. Live long and prosper.

'Thanks for a non-hysterical account'

The Last Post special report in Monday's Varsity is the first time anyone's bothered to sit down and give a non-hysterical account of what's going on in Quebec.

To all the people who've been saying "We thought it couldn't happen here" about the FLQ's kidnappings and murder of Laporte, how about saying the same thing about the War Measures Act?

Maybe we can now have a true picture of what Trudeau is really trying to do.

Thanks for running it.

City undertakes study on campus roadways

In British Parliamentary procedure, usual practise on a topical issue is a debate followed by the establishment of a committee to examine the matter in further detail.

The University of Toronto liaison committee with City Hall followed that procedure last Friday.

Consequently, when the Sir Robert Falconer Association asked the liaison committee to put street lights on the west end of Queen's Park Crescent, either at Hoskin Ave. or at Hart House, in view of the recent accidents that have involved student injuries, the issue was debated for several minutes.

Then it was moved that a pedestrian and vehicular study of the University within the boundaries of Bloor, Spadina, College and Bay Streets be made and the results, when completed, be brought before the committee.

The committee then went on to other matters.

But what of the 15 or 20 minutes of debate?

Ald. Doherty suggested that lights of a crosswalk were useless because of the increased traffic flow expected from the Spadina Expressway. In its place he proposed an underpass or bridge.

Allan Archer suggested that the university "undertake a study of traffic patterns of pedestrians and vehicles to find a way of re-routing pedestrian traffic."

Principal Hallett from UC then revealed the City's responsibility in the matter since "Queen's Park Crescent belongs to the city."

"But in essence it belongs to U of T" said Archer.

After a few more comments, Archer then made the motion for the city to undertake a traffic study on the municipal roads running in and around the university.

And the beat goes on...

In Nova Scotia fishermen fight medieval conditions

Next to nothing has been written in the Canadian press about the long and vicious battle fishermen in three Nova Scotia communities have been waging since the spring for a series of basic human rights. This story, written by Howard Macdonald, a son of one of the striking fishermen, was first published in the Xaverian Weekly, the campus newspaper at St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

ON MARCH 31st., through to April 11th, 285 trawler crew members and inshore fishermen in Mulgrave, Petit deGrat and Canso walked off their boats as they landed and went on strike. Indirectly involved, because they have not crossed picket lines, are 800 members of the Canadian Seafood Workers Union who work in shore plants in the three communities. The ensuing battle has been one of the most vicious in the history of the labour struggle in Nova Scotia.

The fishermen are on strike to attain the basic rights of labour: the right to the union of their choice, collective bargaining with their employer and to strike for decent living standards and working conditions. At present the fishermen make trips out to sea of from 10 to 12 days, work 16 hours a day with only two days between trips.

The boats, owned by the company, are badly in need of safety inspection, unsanitary and have no medical supplies on board: e.g., one fisherman had three fingers cut off while working and had only a dirty rag to wrap his hand in until the boat reached port, 16 hours later. When the boats do land the fishermen are cheated on the weight and grade of the fish.

The company refuses to give settlement slips, to show proper earnings per trip, to pay one half of the Canadian Pension Plan as other employers do and to deduct income tax at the source. As a result, the fishermen are hit with large income tax bills and are forced to borrow from the company which gladly lends and thus keeps the fishermen in human bondage.

If they have a bad trip the fishermen come in owing the company money helping to perpetuate their bondage. Fishermen have no paid vacations or holidays and have inadequate time inshore to lead any sort of a social life.

THE COMPANIES INVOLVED are owned by large and powerful corporations of the U.S. and England. They are Acadia Fisheries Ltd., Mulgrave, N.S.; Acadia Fisheries Ltd., Canso, N.S.; and Booth Fisheries Ltd., Petit de Grat, N.S.

Booth Fisheries is 100 per cent owned by Consolidated Foods Corporation of the U.S.A. and Consolidated owns 62 per cent of Monarch Fine Foods which is connected with Lever Brothers Ltd. In 1968, Consolidated Foods had assets of $365,000,000 and made net profits of $87,000,000.

Acadia Fisheries is 98.4 percent owned by Universal Motor Fisheries which is, in turn, 100 percent owned by Boston Deep Sea-Fisheries Ltd., of England which is, in turn, owned by the Grimsby Group of England with unknown assets.

These two foreign-owned Goliaths have received massive loans, concessions and outright gifts of public funds. Acadia received a $9,000,000 loan to build its plant in Canso but hasn't bothered to pay it back, and to date, is $186,000 behind in interest payments. Acadia also received $3,639,000 as an outright gift to subsidize the building up of its trawler fleet. Booth received a subsidy of $1,837,000 for building new trawlers. The federal government also built a "public" wharf inside the Booth plant.

The government position has not changed much since 1949. In the mid-forties the government allowed what was called the Canadian Fishermen's Union, to be crushed into oblivion and their leaders black-listed by the fish companies and then allowed a Supreme Court decision to be passed — classifying fishermen as "co-adventurers" and not employees, thereby denying them the right to a union.

THE STRIKE PROCEEDED WITHOUT INCIDENT until May, with 24 hour picketing of the three plants and with all written requests by the union to begin talks aimed at settling the strike ignored by both companies. On May 11 and 12 Acadia Fisheries ordered trucks through the picket lines of Canso under the protection of a force of 25-30 man contingent of RCMP primarily to create an "incident" on which to base court injunctions and ensuing contempt of court proceedings against the fishermen.

Five striking fishermen were arrested on charges of illegal parking, mischief and obstruction. On May 29, Judge Green, the one man appointed inquiry commission, submitted an interim report recommending that the fishermen go back to work without a union and without a contract, which is exactly what the companies wanted.

On June 4th, Judge Green was wired telling him that the union fishermen had rejected his report by a majority of 99.4 percent. On the same day the companies obtained a sweeping "ex parte" injunction against all forms of picketing. The fishermen held fast to their position and maintained their picket lines.

On June 10-11 the companies, with the aid of the RCMP and Sheriff read the injunctions at the picket lines. On the weekend of June 13 Attorney-General Donahue worked overtime preparing contempt actions against 45 of the fishermen of the three communities. In court on July 19, thirteen fishermen from Mulgrave were sentenced from 20-30 days in jail. Three days later, during which fishermen stood unmoved on their picket lines, the court decided what was needed was an example to show the fishermen their place in society.

Everett Richardson of Canso, was sentenced to a prison term of nine months for daring to question the right of powerful foreign owned corporations to keep Canadian citizen's wages at a starvation level and to exploit them unmercifully under inhuman working conditions.

THE ONE FACTOR WHICH THE COMPANIES and government underestimated and had to reckon with: the average worker of the province. Enraged, 7,500 workers throughout the province walked off their jobs tying up over $300,000,000 of construction. Four days later the courts released all imprisoned fishermen and referred their cases until the Fall.

The major stumbling block is the fact that the fishermen have been classified as co-adventurers and not employees. This can only be undone by legislature but the government has been stalling on the issue. The Attorney-General declares that the Provincial Secretary will refer "jurisdiction" to the Appeal Court to decide who will handle this legislature. Only until this has been clarified can the issue come up before legislature.

During July, the union and the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour, demanded that Premier Smith, Federal Minister of Labour MacKasey, Provincial Minister of Labour MacKeough, and Attorney-General Donahue, take action to bring the companies to bargain in good faith with the union of the fishermen's choice. On July 14th MacKeough called Acadia, Booth and the union in. The companies refused to meet unless fishermen attend without elected union representatives.

This photo, provided to us by the Nova Scotia government, suggests that fishing in the Maritimes is an idyllic adventure. For striking fishermen, however, it's a cruel form of exploitation which belongs back in the Middle Ages.

Parades and protest demonstrations were carried on during August by the Nova Scotia Federation of Labour in support of the fishermen. Green's final report was submitted but it differed only slightly from his first report and was rejected again by the fishermen. All attempts to bring the companies to the table, without giving up the strike, failed.

THE UNION THE FISHERMEN HAVE CHOSEN as the one to represent them is the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union (U.F.A.W.U.) The big fish companies hate strong, militant unions. Why? Because unity of fishermen and plant workers is a threat to company dictatorship and control. Control means super profit, absolute authority, graft, rape of resources and smooth means of syphoning money from the public purse to fatten the dividends of foreign investors.

The U.F.A.W.U. is a strong and capable union with able officers who will not be moved through bribes, threats and other forms of intimidation. Homer Stevens, national president of the union, has recently served eleven months in prison for his struggles in obtaining rights for fishermen against other foreign owned corporations on the west coast and is prepared to do so again if necessary.

It is no wonder that Booth and Acadia hate this union which is attempting to take some of their profits and give it back to the workers who made the profit for the companies, or that these companies have waged such a slanderous and malicious campaign against the U.F.A.W.U.

During the course of the six months strike the fishermen have been receiving strike pay of $10 a week for a single man, $15 for a married man and an additional $1 for each child up to a maximum of $20 a week. The total cost per week is roughly $4,500 most of which has come from donations of other unions, individuals, etc. ($350,000) and from U.F.A.W.U. members on the west coast $25,000.

On Sept. 23, on the sixth floor of Nicholson Hall, negotiations finally began but at what price?

The fishermen have had to accede to unusual and far-reaching demands on the part of the company: (1) union officers and organizers to be kept out of direct meetings; (2) they demand that the inshore fishermen and clergymen elected as advisors be kept out of direct meetings; (3) picket lines must be removed with the opening of talks; (4) freedom to remove fish and fishmeal from their plants.

All these were agreed to by the fishermen to entice the companies to the negotiating table. The negotiating team for the fishermen is an "ad hoc" committee, consisting of four fishermen from each of the three communities. The committee has the right to take time out from talks to consult with their advisors in a separate room.

It is unclear as yet what the effect will be of the changeover from Conservative to Liberal rule in Nova Scotia as a result of the recent elections.

THE FISHERMEN'S STRIKE reflects the general attitude of both governments and companies that persist throughout the country. It is another example of where the basic rights of free Canadians to jointly withdraw their labour to achieve better wages and conditions is now at stake.

Metro's Chinatown threatened by rezoning

By ERIC MILLS

The proposed rezoning of the area between College and Queen Streets, University Avenue and McCaul St. is just a part of the encroachment now being generated on the downtown residential community.

The rezoning began with a Windlass Holdings, (Toronto developer) project to be built between McCaul and St. Patrick Streets, south of Dundas. Known as Grange Village, the development will house two 25-storey buildings with cinemas, boutiques, office space and apartments.

The present residential density permitted is 2.5, plus bonuses to a maximum of 3.125 4.375 is needed as the project now stands.

As an inducement to the city, Windlass has demolished most of the houses on the site.

The City Planning Staff in effect recommended: 1. that the core area designation in the Official Plan be extended to McCaul St. from University Ave;

The City Planning Staff in effect recommended:

1. that the core area designation in the Official Plan be extended to McCaul St. from University Ave.;
2. that Windlass be permitted to build Grange Village;
3. that the Planning Staff should carry out a lengthy study of the rest of the area, McCaul to Spadina and that no major development requiring rezoning be built until after the study is approved;
4. that these recommendations be given to the Special Committee on the Chinese Community for comment.

The Special Committee, which includes Aldermen David Rotenberg, June Marks, and Horace Brown, and not more than five who live in the area, met on October 21 and called for a study of the whole area.

The Chinese Community Conference on September 29 called for a freeze on all rezoning applications until a complete study had been made. They wanted no new development except that which is Chinese originated or community oriented.

The opinions of other groups had not been given a forum before a vote was taken by the Planning Board on October 13. The proposal was approved 6 to 5 but this was not binding since it involved a change to the Official Plan, it required an absolute majority of the 13 members.

The extension of the core area involves more than the area actually being rezoned: it inevitably will affect the rest of the city, particularly Chinatown.

The Spadina-University-Queen-College area contains about 7,800 residents, of whom approximately 60% are Chinese. The rest includes students and various ethnic minorities.

The area's low-density housing, being also low-cost, serves many social needs.

The Chinese community has a reception and transition role for recent immigrants and overseas students.

Chinatown gives Metro's Chinese population a sense of identity and serves as a focal point of social and cultural interests for them.

Yet this useful and culturally rich area is being eaten away, occupying only one-third of the space it had a quarter century ago.

Surrounded on the north by the University of Toronto and on the south and east by commercial, office and institutional buildings, Chinatown's last tie with the rest of residential Toronto will be weakened if the Spadina Expressway is built.

The Varsity — Jim Dowson

One of many houses in Chinatown being torn down by developers for high-rise construction.

Although the expressway will end above College St., the increased traffic flow and the proposed elimination of angle parking on Spadina Rd. can only further isolate Chinatown from the rest of Toronto.

The University of Toronto threatens to move in from the north. In 1967, the Planning Division recommended that the area bordered by College, Ross, Cecil, Beverly, Baldwin and Henry should be acquired for student residences.

Ontario Hydro has already beaten U of T to the punch for the block bounded by Beverly, Baldwin, Henry and Cecil Streets in order to build a transformer station.

This block was the scene of an occupation by the McCaul Street Co-op last summer in an attempt to persuade Hydro to rent out the 42 houses on the block until the whole transformer could be built.

Hydro was prevented from closing a lane in the middle of the block and may resort to the tactic of demolishing enough houses to build part of the transformer, and then re-applying for closure of the lane.

According to Larry Sanders, a Company of Young Canadian worker, Hydro has rented 6 houses to welfare families and about 12 to Chinese, leaving 24 that might be torn down.

A potential development exists in the Sullivan, Beverly, Phoebe and Huron St. block as Canada

Permanent Trust has bought almost all the land, excepting one house and the RCMP Headquarters on Sullivan, which will come on the market as soon as the new headquarters is completed.

Canada Trust has been known in the past to have acted for Cadillac Development.

Canada Trust is renting the houses out to freaks in an attempt to break up the Chinese community, asserts Larry Saunders. As these people have fewer roots in the community, it will be easier to move them out should this be desired.

Other proposed developments which affect the Chinese community include:

- expansion of the Art Gallery of Ontario which will reduce Grange Park;
- a 235-suite nurses' residence to be built behind the New Mount Sinai Hospital;
- a 214-foot high building for the Toronto Institute of Medical Technology to be built at McCaul and Elm Streets;
- proposed widening of Dundas St. on the south side where a number of Chinese shops are (Gray Coach and McLean Hunter are on the north side).

Alderman Horace Brown, chairman of the Special Committee on the Chinese Community, favors the Planning Staff recommendations and has said "there is no Chinese community, no Chinatown, and we are trying to create one."

Duncan Lang, program chairman of the Chinese Community Conference, said "it may be too late (to save Chinatown), but we've got to make a stand."

THE LITTLE PEOPLE GIVE THE — A-LERT!

Jon wishes to gratefully acknowledge the growing recognition of the problems referred to in his Oct. 9th Varsity article, "...complete non-linear environmental sensing-device, etc..." by the "little people" shown below. And is also happy to provide the following adenda, which was excluded from the original article due to a lack of adequately anticipatory design at the time it was meant to appear.

- Pollution is the result of life on Earth failing to use energy as well as it can. Do it or die.
- Pollution is junk mail and wrong numbers at three a.m.

He added in presenting the adenda that this was a momentous event since it demonstrated one, a combination or all of the following truths.

- the problem is real and
- is being recognised
- individual and small group-efforts have a direct and visible effect
- R. Crumh is a "neat guy"
- the "little people" count as ever
- without knowing it a lot of people are working toward the same goal
- the "little people" read the Varsity and
- had been waiting for us to raise the issue

Incredibly Delicious Banana Date & Nut Bread

Blend together 1/2 cup butter or margarine with one cup brown sugar. Mix in four mashed up ripe bananas and three well-beaten eggs. Add two cups soya or wholewheat flour, three teaspoons baking powder, a pinch of salt, 2/3 cup milk, and beat well. This is no easy job, but make sure there are no lumps.

Chop up some nuts (pecans are best, or almonds) and some organic dates — a little under one cup of each. Mix them thoroughly into the batter. You may, if you wish, season additionally with a little vanilla, cinnamon, and a tiny bit of nutmeg.

Fold the mixture into a well-greased loaf pan. Bake at 350° for at least one hour — more if necessary. Bread must be brown on the outside, well-done on the inside. Stick toothpick in to make sure.

Cool on a rack and serve with butter and or honey. This goes well with any meal, or is a meal in itself. Creatively stolen from a secret new york underground's cooking editor "fat annie"

WE ANSWERED THIS AD

WANTED: TOPLESS DANCERS, APPLY TO REGENCY TOWERS HOTEL.
MR. J. CUNNING

On Wednesday afternoon the Varsity staff had a meeting, and one of the topics discussed was the opposition to such advertisements as the one for Topless Dancers. It was decided that, rather than censor such ads, they should be printed, but at the same time examined, first-hand, and expaxed for what they are really selling.

We did it! Simply took off our blouses, gave a few bumps and grinds; all for a job at $110 a week, "better than a junior executive".

We jumped into the back of a van, heading for the Regency Towers Hotel to see a Mr. Cunning who was interviewing applicants for topless go-go dancers.

We giggled a lot, thinking of ways to write a revealing story about the exploitative attitudes of employers who put women on display for money.

The van pulled up in front of the hotel and we stumbled into the lobby.

"Is Mr. Cunning in?"

"What's it for, is it for business," the clerk behind the counter asked with a knowing grin, as he looked us up and down, surprised to see four girls in jeans and jackets applying for such a job.

"I won't talk prices until I see you dance."

He thinks we're sluts and tarts, nothing better than whores, to bobble topless in front of men, we mumbled in disgust to ourselves, trying to convince ourselves to the contrary.

But I guess that's how any woman applying for a job like this is looked down on, whether she's taking the job cause she's desperate for money or not. Though they'll all pay to see her gyrate and grind, and they all love it too.

Then Mr. Cunning himself is in front of us. Tall, stern, impersonally cold; eyes behind black rimmed glasses shot quickly up and down our bodies in a mechanical motion, quite unnoticeable.

We look at each other than all turn to look at him, a middle aged grey-haired man.

"We're looking for jobs to put us through school," we tell him.

And he continues to examine us nonchalantly from head to toe, sighs, and asks whether or not we're pros. None of us are, we tell him.

"Well where are your costumes?"

"Costumes?" we ask.

"My girls all have to supply their own costumes. Just get some bikini pants and sew on some tassles, they're so sexy," he says.

"But don't borrow from the other girls, they get jealous. And you should have two or three costumes each night. After all you sweat a lot and you want to look good on stage."

We finally convinced him to let us beyond the front door and he led us through a shadowy lounge where the bartenders look at us, look at each other, and whisper in hushed voices, most giving the same knowing grin.

Gulp. We're sitting in his office expected to audition. Where do we go from here? We really don't want to audition. But there's this wierd little stage in the middle of his cramped office. And there's a gold sign on the wall.

"Our employees are not: jealous, dishonest, envious, selfish, demanding, lazy . . ."

"You know I don't hire hookers or lesbians like they do in the joints on Yonge St., he said, eyeing us up and down with a cold look.

"Hookers? What are hookers," we ask innocently.

"Prostitutes."

"How much will you pay us?"

"Don't press me. I won't talk prices 'till I've seen you dance and I want to see you dance to three songs each.

"How do you determine a rate for girls?"

"Your body and your dancing," he said, "but I don't hire women over 25, they're simply too old and floppy," he added.

"You know dancing is an art, but I can't afford to keep a woman on for much more than two weeks. The boys get tired of the same girl.

"Just get out there and dance," he said. "But we don't have costumes." Oh, just go as you are.

We sighed with relief. At least we wouldn't have to take off our blouses. It wouldn't be too bad to dance with all our clothes on. We looked at each other, and thought what the hell, it's worth a good story.

"Kill, kick, spit not nervous now just angry"

We followed him into the shadowy beer hall, a poster of Paul Newman leered at us from the wall. An old couple, alone in the hall and sipping beer, watched curiously as we filed by.

"Okay girls, pick out your songs and I'll get the key to the changing room and you can just slip in there, you know, take off your bra and put your blouse back on and when you go on stage, then slip off your blouse again. Okay?"

"Oh my God, we can't do that, is it worth it for a story, but he told us . . . and the story became us.

Quit now, quit now, we don't want to go that far. Four of us held on tight to the juke box. (who ever told you that a woman doesn't need a Man's deodorant) and made the decision to sell.

In the dressing room I thought about people that would never even watch a nude dancer (remember Kathryn Ross in "The Graduate" when she ran out of the joint in tears?)

But suddenly I was on stage and a voice boomed out "I am the God of hell-fire, and I bring you fire" and I danced for him. Sometimes he didn't watch, while men from the next room crowded toward the door to look. I didn't focus on anything, I just moved until the music finished. I was a pig, I was two breasts, I wasn't me.

I asked about my price, but he refused to say. "I want to see the others first."

The room was silent. The men leered as they gulped down another beer and the second dancer was up.

"American Woman . . ."

Kill, kick, spit, God, no longer nervous, just angry.

Fuck I hate it . . .

But I hate them for watching me.

But they're not watching me, they're gawking at a jiving piece of concrete . . .

so lifeless to them, so utterly mechanical the whole thing is.

But I can't help wondering. . . am I good enough. . . what will be my price?

The old couple at the end of the hall kept drinking their beer as they watched the show. The third girl took her turn.

My only hope was to hide behind my long hair. It wasn't long enough. I could see Mr. Cunning pour himself another beer as I moved to "Backfield in Motion . . ."

If I ever hear that song again . . .

Then the music stopped and it was all over . . . But would we get the jobs?

Advice from the bartender; "Just don't make too many demands of him, and you've got a chance."

He called us in one by one. A natural anticipation and curiosity (did I make it?) oddly enough was in each of our minds.

Yep, we all did "make it" — we rated.

"How much?
I'm the buyer
name your price."

"How much do you want? You're the one who's selling you're body. I'm just the buyer. Name your price."

But we each separately found that $110 was the flat rate.

"Myself, I rather prefer small breasts." But some guys they like to see big breasts. To me they're just like cows."

He warned us about missing work. "Don't think you can fool me by phoning in three hours before you're supposed to go on and complain about period cramps."

"Others have tried, but I know all about women and their periods. They always know three to four days in advance."

"Last week one girl was in so much pain and her stomach was bloated from her period but I just dosed her up on aspirin and SHE went out and danced all night."

We asked him if he approved of topless dancing, if he'd like his own daughter to participate in it.

"I don't have a daughter, but I don't think there is anything wrong with topless dancing — it's an art, but as for bottomless dancing I don't like that."

However he liked it sufficiently well to use it if the public wanted it.

"Whatever the public wants, I'll give them," he said. I'm just trying to make money. I want to have a lot of money to leave my wife when I die. That's all I'm working for."

But he still had to be sure he had a good deal. "Pull down your slacks and let me see some leg."

Okay, start in two weeks, I'll give you a call."

We'd shown him our bodies, then we bargained for them, and now we'd sold them . . . There was nothing much left over for us, and even less for the girls that go on tonight.

Today's Royal Canadian Mounted Police are in the process of becoming the Royal Canadian Computerized Police — and that takes brainpower.

"As in the case of all large and modern organizations there are numerous specialist fields . . . requiring the knowledge and experience of specially selected members."

That was why Inspector Scott of the Mounties was on campus Wednesday afternoon interviewing potential U of T graduates for the "new" RCMP. At 3:00 p.m. he simultaneously interviewed an English — myself, and a pre-Medsman.

"You're both single, aren't you?" he smiled, for the RCMP has no truck with married men. After two years of singleness, however, a constable may "apply for permission to marry," according to the career brochure.

Inspector Scott is not the stereotyped flagbearer of Britishism that one might associate with the RCMP. He is articulate, friendly, and intelligent — all qualities the Force needs to keep up with the sophistication of organized crime while at the same time maintaining good public relations. Though both are essential, the RCMP hasn't been doing too well in either category in the past few years.

"We've had a few men doing stupid things," Scott muses, once more emphasizing the Force's need for capable university graduates.

The Medsman wondered if he could hold off on a full-time job until he was an M.D. "Maybe I could work part time until then as an undercover agent?" he asked.

"Well, we don't have too many civilian jobs any more," Scott replied. "We have experts working on the drug situation."

The Medsman seemed somewhat crestfallen, and Scott turned to me. "We do have openings for men with your qualifications, a degree in . . . er . . . English Literature."

Knowing that English degrees are usually a certificate of banishment to the College of Education of the Puvungnutuk Elementary School I eagerly awaited his suggestions.

"You'd want to work in our Security and Intelligence Bureau," he declared, and I flipped through the brochure to find out what that would involve. It turned out that I would "conduct analytical studies and assist in the preparation of various research papers."

"Would that be like — reading certain newspapers?" I asked cautiously.

Scott nodded enthusiastically. "Oh, yes, underground newspapers, keeping tabs on political organizations."

Referring to "the last Royal Commission," he pointed out that the RCMP will likely be taking formal responsibility for policing extremist political groups.

"Like the FLQ these last few weeks?"

"Oh, no. That's criminal activity. That's strictly up to the local agencies." He did point out that the Quebec Provincial Police have co-operated with the Mounties much more than they did in the past. And in the case of the FLQ, they actually requested RCMP help.

"Which we provided," Scott added. "Anyone interested in helping bring the Mounties into the twentieth century can get in touch with Inspector Scott at the RCMP offices on 3 Sullivan Street."

If you're a male, that is, unmarried, between 5'8" and 6'5", with a chest measurement at full inspiration and expiration totalling 70" with a minimum expansion of 2".

And if you can figure that out, you're probably a math graduate, which makes your qualifications complete.

BOOKS

At second glance, The Book of Imaginary Beings, the latest of the blind Argentinian writer Jorge Luis Borges' works to be Englished, may not be a failure. A little sadly, I enjoy and recommend it, but I want to point out how it differs from some of Borges' other books, and how it may be evaluated beside them.

The book is a bestiary, drawing its information from ancient sources Eastern and Western. English readers get an enlargement of the work from its first two editions in Spanish. Borges and his helpers present 120 notes, often with quiet but evident glee, on such famous animals as the Griffin, the Minotaur, the Phoenix. They also discuss really obscure beings; witness the shy, translucent A Bao A Qu, of Malaysian mythology, which lives in a tower and follows visitors almost to the top, glowing hopefully. . . it achieves its ultimate form only at the topmost step, when the climber is a person who has attained Nirvana and whose acts cast no shadows. This has happened once.

The book does not seem to have been an effort for Borges. Well, he's over 70, is not strong, and has earned much more than the right to fail. . . there is a kind of lazy pleasure in useless and out-of-the-way erudition, he says in a preface. Further, "Anyone looking into the pages of the present handbook will soon find out that the zoology of dreams is far poorer than the zoology of the Mak-er."

One could have told this without the author's admissions. The book is uncharged with Borges' characteristically vigorous and paradoxical metaphysical speculation. It doesn't stand beside Dreamtigers and Other Inquisitions, his finest fiction and non-fiction.

Perhaps the lack of tension in The Book Of Imaginary Beings is explainable in terms of Borges' explicit purpose; he's expressed discontent at being typecast as a fantasist. Citing Conrad, who thought that to write about the real world was to write a mystery, Borges has justified his delight with Westerns and good crime fiction, and has written some of the latter.

Not much seems to be at stake in The Book of Imaginary Beings, and the style coasts, retelling clearly and gently what others have said.

Among living authors, however, one does not find such colossal and unpedantic erudition save in the works of Hugh MacDiarmid or Edward Dahlberg. It may just be Borges collaborated with the wrong people, writing, if not a swansong, a diversion.

The Book of Imaginary Beings is published here by Clark, Irwin and costs $8.35. The same firm also publishes Dreamtigers ($2.35) and soon will bring out The Aleph and Other Sotires. Simon and Schuster holds Canadian rights to Other Inquisitions, the best bargain anywhere for $1.90. — T.W.

FILM

Beginning tomorrow night, and for the next five Saturdays, the Toronto Public Libraries is presenting "2002: Into the Future", a science-fiction film festival. All showings are at 8:00 p.m. in the Learning Resources Centre, 666 Eglinton W. The feature for Nov. 7 is The Day the Earth Stood Still. Single performance - and series-tickets are available at the door.

Also tomorrow evening at 8:00 is the screening of Alfred Hitchcock's latest opus, Topaz, by the U of T (Innis) Film Society. On the same programme in UC 104 is a discussion with Canadian cine author Robin Wood.

On Monday, Nov. 9 the U of T Film Society continues its weekly series with Resnais' Hiroshima Mon Amour. Show time is 8:00 in UC 104.

The U.C. Lit's "Comparative Literature on Film" presents Finnegans' Wake at 7:00 and 9:00 on Tuesday, Nov. 10. A discussion with Marshall McLuhan will take place after the first showing.

On tap at Cinema Lumiere: Nov. 7-11, Before the Revolution; Nov. 7-8, The Night of the Following Day (USA, 1969). Call 920-9817 for exact times.

FLICK OF THE WEEK: An era in Toronto filmdom has come to an end. 2001-A Space Odyssey finished its 2½-year engagement at the Glendale Theater this week.

Gone are the fascinating little articles about people who make a 50-mile bi-weekly "hegira" in the hope that they will figure out the movie the 35th time around.

Gone are the stories of the Glendale ushers and projectionists who know HAL the computer's entire dialogue by heart.

Gone are the hopes of serious film buffs that 2001 would be the one to wrest from goody-gumdrops — The Sound of Music the title of Longest Running Toronto Movie.

Masterminded by Stanley Kubrick and co-written by author-prophet Arthur C. Clarke, 2001 is now something of a legend. It has been responsible for giving good science-fiction films an air of respectability, and stands as the prime example of dynamic and believable special effects.

There is currently on the stands a fat little paperback purporting to give the reader the inside story on the making of 2001. Unfortunately it does nothing more than reprint a number of choice interviews and rave reviews, while padding its pages with poor-quality teeny-tiny publicity stills. If an in-depth book on 2001 were published, I think it would not only make incredible reading, but become a textbook of classic proportions.

The fact that the U.S. landed on the moon during 2001's run sent a new wave of curious and confused audiences packing into the Glendale for a momentary glimpse into Kubrick's crystal ball. But the days of Dave and HAL and The Monolith and zero-gravity washrooms are over.

A lot of people are eagerly awaiting the year 1984 to make grandiose socio-political comparisons of the I-told-you-so variety. Not me. When 2001 rolls around and I reach the ripe old age of 51, I'm hopping the first shuttle-bus to the moon where Space Odyssey will no doubt be enjoying a welcome revival.

THEATRE

The New York City Ballet is in town, but if you want to see it you'd better hurry: they are leaving tomorrow night. All the same, you've still got quite a range of choices.

Also in town is the highly acclaimed: "The Me Nobody Knows". The youngest member of the Toronto cast has reached the exalted age of nine, and the play is based on actual conversations of American ghetto children. This play is not a put-on, & neither is it purely for entertainment. It's a gutwrenching musical that you won't forget soon. The days of Shirley Temple seem to be gone forever. $3.50 and up. Crest Theatre.

Alicc is still in Wonderland.

MUSIC

"Iphigene en Tauride", the Gluck opera, opened at the Edward Johnston Bldg. Wednesday and continues Saturday (Nov. 7) and next Wednesday (Nov. 11). It is an excellent production musically, the staging is imaginative and colourful and the dance sequences are interesting but never distracting. The American Musicologists Convention (whose two-day takeover at the EJB had a lot to do with the selection of this particular work) will certainly be pleased. The problem is this: with this production of Iphigeneie stage director George Philipp and his colleagues have established a new precedent for operatic excellence which local audiences will rightfully expect in future production. You can't set out the china for the visitors only without some grumbling from the regular clientele! (928-3797)

And now, the news: Beethoven's Missa Solemnis is featured Tuesday (Nov. 10th) and Wednesday (Nov. 11) in the Toronto Symphony's Series "B", and again on Friday, Nov. 13. Performing at Massey Hall will be the TS with Ancell, the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir with Maureen Forrester and other soloists. Info at the box office, 363-7301.

A free lecture/demonstration of Songs of the Douk-bobors, Thursday (Nov. 12) at 2 p.m. in the Concert Hall, Edward Johnston Bldg. Also on Thursday at 8:30 p.m. in the Concert Hall of the EJB, the Faculty's Special Events Series presents soprano Bethany Beardslee, Miss Beardslee is an internationally acknowledged exponent of contemporary vocal literature.

which happens to be in the Ryerson Theatre. It's a 'Black Box' production by the Ryerson Opera Workshop (similar to Lanterna Magika).

After all, how else can the Cheshire Cat materialize in mid-air? And who ever heard of a pack of cards running around an ordinary stage? $1 with ATL.

Next week the St. Lawrence Centre will open its new season with A Yard of Sun. Meanwhile, Dionysius in 70 is running at the Studio Lab Theatre, Hair is still on, and Endgame is at Hart House. So don't ever let me hear you say: "But there's nothing to do!" — D.S.

Frye resurrects ancient form of learning — the lecture

By Laura Kelly

The ivory tower, and a few of its inhabitants, were both plucked and polished Wednesday night by Northrop Frye, an easy-going speaker who resurrected, at least for the evening, that ancient form of learning, the lecture.

Dispersing the fog that usually hangs over any lecture room, Frye speaking in the spacious OISE auditorium injected into a grateful audience, a stream of stories and ideas about education and the university that must have at least startled those uninitiated in Frye-following.

"Education is not the preparation for real life, but education is an encounter with real life," Frye said.

Frye termed political life, most apparent in the newspapers, as a "dissolving phantasmagoria," not to be taken as seriously as the maturity found in thought processes.

"The permanent form of society is only that which can be studied in the arts and sciences."

The desire to know is natural, and thus education is natural, said Frye, and he sniped at the repressive grade schools and high schools where "the atmosphere of the classroom resembled an armed truce," and the institutions have a "penal" quality.

These schools assume learning is not a natural desire for "Johnny" and consequently must assume benevolent authoritarianism to get him to learn.

Frye noted that learning through repetition, and learning through habits formed to counteract insecurity and anxiety were the primary educational means.

Schools foster these habits and create identities — an outstanding one being adolescence, which Frye termed a "social fixation," a ritual and binding pattern which is not true to life.

To free education from its undesired cloistered image, Frye requires teachers to be scholars, and scholars to be teachers, and students that will listen and talk, rather than compete with separate monologues.

The university is not autonomous from society, Frye admitted, yet he thought it should not be subordinated to society, since academic freedom is the only freedom possible.

"Yet it cannot be attained unless the university itself is free," said Frye.

In making less general comments, Frye visualized student-staff parity as merely more bureaucracy that will backfire on students.

Frye also prefers the General and Honours system of university education which demands "a little more sophistication from students."

Business Briefs

By the end of 1970, over 50% of all Canadian executives will be making at least $20,000 a year.

The average income for salaried employees in Canada as of July, 1970, was about $6,600, according to federal government statistics.

By the end of 1969, about 40% of all executives were already at or above the $22,000 a year mark — that's $383 a week.

Executives on the Prairies are likely to be more highly paid on average than elsewhere in Canada. Quebec ranks next, then British Columbia, Ontario and the Atlantic region.

Canadian business must lead in improving those features of society producing rising discontent and show solid results within 10 years or chaos could last half a century, according to C. Norman Simpson, who is: president of Acres Ltd. of Toronto; vice-chairman of Canadian Export Association; director of ATCO Industries Ltd., Lincoln Trust and Savings Co., Northumberland Consultants Ltd., CASECO Consultants Ltd., Crippen Acres Ltd., Canadian Executive Service Overseas, Canadian Nuclear Association.

"Our society, which is to say the values we live by, our attitudes toward family, property, life and liberty, is under attack as never before," he said. "These attacks are becoming increasingly violent and it would be simply foolhardy to dismiss this violence as the work of a lunatic fringe."

"What would happen if patchwork efforts failed to turn back the rising tide of discontent? What if incident triggered incident until hostility became general and swept over us in the form of anarchy, disorder and violent revolution? It would be followed here as elsewhere by about 50 years of chaos."

United States Steel Corp. of New York reported a profit of $108 million in the first nine months of 1970, which the company's chairman says is too low to adequately support a growing domestic steel industry.

Canadian life insurance companies operating in the United States are doing a higher volume of business than U. S. life insurance companies operating in Canada, according to the Globe and Mail.

The 12 Canadian companies in business in the U.S. received $420.4 million (U.S.) in premiums and annuity considerations, compared with $347.1 million (Canadian) received by 62 U.S. companies operating in Canada.

Prudential Insurance Co. of America, the world's largest insurance company, is moving into the mutual fund business in Canada.

The U.S.-based company, whose Canadian operations rank sixth in Canada in terms of insurance in force, is setting up its own mutual fund, Prudential Growth Fund Canada Ltd. of Toronto.

'Quebec as a nation' is rejected at debate

By MICHAEL MAZUREK
The proposition that "The Preservation of French Canada requires a Quebec National State" was rejected by a margin of 70 to 31 at Wednesday's Hart House Debate.

"French Canada is no longer satisfied with having its culture relegated to a second-class status", charged Sam Bucovetsky (UCII) in his keynote address. "And it is becoming increasingly evident that there cannot be maintained within one national state, two equally powerful cultures."

"I disagree," retorted Don Deveney (SGS). "The Canadian constitution, if properly implemented, can preserve the culture of French Canada."

Ted Rotenburg (Law III), remarked that "in a technological society such as ours, it is impossible for a culture of any kind, that of French Canada included, to survive, except in a unitary state."

Perhaps the most powerful statement of the evening was issued by Michel Charbonneau.

"You who are not Quebecois do not understand what French Canadian culture means," he thundered. "Survival, that is what it is all about. The culture of French Canada will survive regardless of whether or not a separate Quebec nation is established."

Licence pending Parents still fighting for day care centre

By TOM WALKOM
and JERRY McNABB

After a year of wrangling with government bureaucrats, the Campus Community Day Care Centre at 12 Sussex St., the focus for U of T's first sit-in is no closer to receiving an operating licence.

A letter received October 30, from the Day Nurseries Branch of the Ontario Department of Social and Family Services denied the application of the parent-run co-operative, mainly on the grounds of unsuitable physical conditions in the building and the lack of a "properly trained" staff.

THE MAIN POINT of contention as far as the parents are concerned is staff. Government regulations require that any nursery for infants have at least one qualified supervisor.

Effectively this means that the centre must hire someone trained in Europe since no North American school has a training program for infant care acceptable to the Ontario Government.

Renovations to bring the centre up to fire and safety standards are being carried out by U of T, the owner of the property. However, the government has required that the centre be entirely redecorated with washable floor and wall coverings. Who will be responsible for the cost of the redecoration is still in the air; the day care people have written to the University administration but have as yet received no reply.

THE CENTRE OPENED amid controversy in September 1969. Led by a women's liberation group, parents began negotiations with the university in July for Day Care space. After several months of waiting, the parents, backed by several hundred students, found the vacant Sussex St. building and moved in. The university then agreed to rent them the building.

Following months of haggling with university administrators over whether or not the day care centre would be allowed to remain at 12 Sussex, frustrated organizers called for a protest demonstration last March. The demonstration led Sheila Maxwell, one of the centre's two full time co-ordinators, said there was a general consensus among the parents to fight to stay open. Parents should have the right to choose the people who care for their children, she explained. She added that the centre was setting an example for other parents who might want to organize parent-run centres.

PARENTS PAY $40 per month in addition to working at the centre in their spare time, either caring for the children or cleaning at night. In addition, many volunteers from the community assist by working a half day each week.

Most parents are enthusiastic about the centre and are quick to explain the advantages. Jim Petersen, whose eight-month-old daughter Alexandra attends the centre, explained that children are imitative in their development and the centre offers them a wide range of behaviour to imitate.

Maxwell said children at the centre become more alert and less passive after a few weeks there.

"WE TREAT THEM as human beings, not property," she explained. "We want them to become strong and independent people. We don't protect them from the outside world. But they learn to love and trust each other rather than competing with each other."

She also believes the children could become discipline problems if present school systems are not changed. They will be more independent and not easily intimidated by authority, she said.

Petersen said he was unsure if he would send his daughter to public school. He considers them prisons which desensitize children and encourage daydreaming and other escapes. He theorizes that schools are largely responsible for the flourishing drug problem among young people. Drug use, he said, is an attempt by young people to re-open their senses.

As for the children's future, he agrees they will be more independent.

"I HOPE they will be able to govern themselves," he said.

Volunteers give many reasons for working at the centre but most simply enjoy the children.

"People don't need their own children to love children," explained one. "I think I can learn more from them than they from me."

to the first student occupation of Simcoe Hall, a 24-hour drama that ended only when U of T president Claude Bissell caved in to demands that the university take on the responsibility for repairing the centre.

Renovations, originally estimated at $3,000, have cost over $10,000 so far.

SPORT TALK

Lyndon Little
VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

Winning streaks are commin all sports. On the rare occasion, a team may even go the whole year undefeated.

But here at Varsity, the women's senior field hockey team, or the Blue Belles if you prefer, have never lost an intercollegiate contest in their entire nine-year existence!

When that first loss does come some year, it's going to be quite an upset!

THE WOMEN have just wrapped up another intercollegiate title last weekend at a WIT-CA tournament in McMaster where they defeated York 2-0, Mac 3-0, Western 2-0 and McGill 9-0. Over the season, their offence has produced a total of 60 goals while the defense got a little sloppy and allowed the opposition to score on two occasions.

Marina van der Merwe, the guiding spirit who has been the team coach for the nine years, finds no ready explanation for her group's phenomenal success.

"We actually practise less than many of the other schools," she began. "Some of them have a workout every day but we have only three one-hour sessions a week.

I GUESS the secret of our success is lots of drive from within and the girls' willingness to learn.

"Another factor that is probably significant is that I am personally involved with the game as a player so that perhaps it's easier for me to apply the game's techniques than it is for some of the other intercollegiate coaches who are not players themselves."

Wider recognition has finally come to this exceptional Varsity team. Three of the senior players, Sally Manning, Jackie Cheng and Lorna Tanner, as well as Miss van der Merwe herself and the intermediate coach, Susan Peck, have been named to the recently selected Canadian National Team which will represent Canada in the world championships next summer in New Zealand.

After a 10-day training camp in Vancouver beginning on July 7, the team will leave on an eight-week international tour which will include the world championships commencing in Auckland on Aug. 17.

In what will likely be the season's final match for the football Blues, they will meet Ray Johnson's McMaster Marauders at Varsity Stadium tomorrow.

Barring an upset of such a magnitude that divine intervention would be required, the Queen's Gaels will bring a merciful end to the 1970 grid season of the Waterloo Warriors and then it won't matter if or how badly Blues trample the Marauders.

If you're the type who likes to dwell on morbid thoughts, Blues could conceivably end up third if they were to blow the game to Mac and Western beats McGill at home.

But even though it looks as if Blues have little hope for a Yates Cup this year, the Mac game will have plenty of sidelight features which should make it a very interesting, if not crucial, match-up.

FOR STARTERS, there will be a sizeable group of veteran Blues who will be closing out distinguished college careers Saturday. Among them will be tight end Mark Slater, guard Gord Whitaker, end Mike Brierley and running backs Glen Markle, Walt Sehr and Bill Stankovic — who will all be graduating.

Then, with one devastating block, the CIAU five-year eligibility rule will wipe out center Rich Agro, guard Derek Turner and quarterback Victor Alboini.

Alboini, who has an injured shoulder, is the only one of the group who will not dress for the game.

Further interest should also be added over several individual statistical battles.

Sophomore quarterback stand-out Wayne and Dunkley has an excellent chance for the league passing crown with 716 yards — two more than the Gaels' pivot Arthur Rochette. Dunk, however, has compiled his total in two fewer games.

As for the prestigious rushing derby, fullback Markle trails McGill's David Fleiszer by 21 yards with Queen's Heino Lilles third, 53 back. The fine Western defensive line should limit Mr. Fleiszer to little gain, but Lilles could have a field day against Waterloo.

BLUES NOTES — Nobody can accuse the Waterloo fans of being spoiled by the their team this year. In their three home contests the Warriors have produced a glorious total of two points. That works out to an average of .66666666 points per home game! Word has it, that the stadium maintenance men at Waterloo actually removed the HOME part of the scoreboard after the first game.

Behind great protection from his offensive line, PhysEd quarterback Don Crocker unloads a pass during their 6-0 victory over Vic Wednesday afternoon. The win puts PhysEd in top spot in the first division with game left to play.

PhysEd halfback Gord Harvey grabs a Don Crocker pass and heads for the goal line while trying to elude a group of Vic defensive hacks. The margin of victory for PhysEd was provided on two field goals by Gene Vince.

Toe power is key as PhysEd downs Vic.

By STAN KOROLNEK

PhysEd (4-1) took over first place in interfaculty football first division play with a dull 6-0 win over a listless Victoria College team (3-2) on Wednesday.

The loss by Vic sets up the possibility of a three way tie for first place which will occur if Engineering (3-2) upsets PhysEd next week.

All the scoring in the game came in the first half on short field goals by kicking specialist Gene Vince who is without doubt the finest field goal kicker in the interfaculty league.

The first field goal came after a brilliant run by Gord Harvey brought PhysEd to the Vic four-yard line. However, their drive stalled there and Vince came on to kick complete a twelve-yard effort.

In the second quarter, Vince added a 20 yarder to end the scoring. Vic's field goal kicker, Joe Cornacchia, (those Riverdale guys appear everywhere) hit the crossbar with an attempt later in the quarter.

Vic had a further chance to pull the game out late in the fourth quarter but fumbled the ball away deep in PhysEd territory.

Peter White's running was the highlight of the Vic attack. For PhysEd, corner linebacker Kent Duncan played a strong game as did quarterback Don Crocker.

Notes: For their final game St. Mikes (0-5) might be wise in trying to round-up former Waterloo Lutheran fleetback Gerry Ryan, now on campus. The Engineer-PhysEd game is scheduled for next Wednesday. Yesterday, the Engineers downed St. Mikes 7-0 on a late touchdown.

Varsity oarsmen undisputed college champs

By BILL ALLISON

Last Saturday the Varsity oarsmen, already OQAA Champs, strengthened their grasp on intercollegiate rowing supremacy by capturing the Eastern Canadian Intercollegiate Rowing Association Championship.

Competing in the regatta besides Toronto were Western, Brock, MacMaster, and York.

These schools are listed in order of finish.

The Lightweight race was won handily by the Toronto crew who maintained a constant length-and-a-half lead over a labouring Western crew. Brock, Toronto's toughest competition at the beginning of the season, finished third.

Members of the victorious Toronto boat were: Pat Goodwin, cox: Terje Skrein, Paul Raney, Bill Allison, Brian MacFarlane, Jack Gibbons, Craig Appleyard, Garry Graham, and Doug Garfield.

In the Senior Heavyweight event, Toronto defeated a much heavier but poorly conditioned Western crew to make it four-to-zero for the season.

The Western crew, recognizing that Toronto had a definite edge in conditioning, decided to hang in behind for the first half of the race and spring the final 1000 meters. Toronto defended against this tactic by sprinting the entire 2000 meters, winning the race by a boat-length.

Competing for Toronto in this race were seven of the Lightweight crew members, plus two bona fide Senior Heavyweights, Don Kurphy, and Geof Wright.

The Junior Varsity was won by Western, Mac second and Blues third. Though the Toronto crew had the conditioning and the desire to win, experience was the vital factor missing.

Brock won the Freshman race with Western second and Mac third.

The outstanding feature of this year's rowing season was the high calibre of the senior events. This is due primarily to the fact that large numbers of university oarsmen are rowing for clubs during the summer. As this trend should continue, the standard of OQAA rowing should rise even more in the future.

Wrestle out your frustrations

By BILL ANDERSON

It is fast approaching the time when autumn sports fade away to be replaced by winter activities. The U of T wrestling team offers to frustrated ex-rugger players, oarsmen or any interested parties a vigorous diversion from the otherwise sedentary life of an academic.

Bill Allison, Jon Davis, Dave Simms and Ken White are OQAA class competitors and can provide guidance at any level of competence. The team is negotiating to meet with other local clubs (eg., Ryerson) in order to provide variety and experience before the competitive season begins. With several open competitions this year, anyone who practises regularly will represent U of T at these meets.

Coach Jack Edgar will be glad to meet you in the wrestling room, Hart House, from 5:15 - 6:30 p.m.

People holding balloons is art

By PHIL CHARKO

"Would you hold this string please?"

Surprised onlookers walking across the back campus of Hart House yesterday found themselves holding balloons as part of an art exhibit.

An American group presented Toronto with an art form consisting of colored, helium filled balloons arranged in a vertical spectrum tied together with strings.

In rather formidable terms, the Art Research Centre from Kansas Mo. billed it as "a lighter than air public celebrative and construct

In rather formidable terms, the Art Research Centre from Kansas Mo. billed it as "a lighter than air public celebrative and constructive event for the city of Toronto."

The Centre, a small group of artists, emphasized disassociation from the "Ivory tower artiste," and an attempt to return art to the people.

The group was in Toronto to return some of Zbigniew Blazej's works, from an exhibit in the States and decided to present itself to Toronto. Zbigniew is a Toronto multi-media artist and associate member of the group. At first, they had attempted to get Nathan Philips Square but permit difficulties ended them on the back fields of Hart House.

The building of the structure took four or five hours and comments from the small crowd which had gathered to watch were generally favourable. T. W. Harpur, professor from Wycliffe College said, "I'm in favour of it."

Students on AUCC harmful

By PHIL MASTERS

U of T student delegation to last week's conference of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, in Winnipeg are disillusioned with the AUCC as a useful body to deal with student problems.

Delegates from U of T unsuccessfully fought the election of three students to the Board of Directors of the AUCC on the grounds that it would do Canadian students more harm than good.

SAC University Commissioner, Peter Hall, said that the AUCC is a "sick, repressive organization", an administrative club where student representation is useless. The area that the AUCC is dealing in — education at a massive level — doesn't meet student needs, and the election of three students to the board is an instance of tokenism. Hall sums the AUCC up by saying, "The students are left, but confused, the faculty are intense, but hard to find, the administrators are celebrating."

Richard Reoch, a delegate from Trinity College, agrees that the students are confused, and adds that they are disillusioned with the whole system of education. This problem was a raison d'être of the AUCC, but questions of education were generally avoided, and emphasis was put on financial matters.

Reoch called the conference "a non-stop cocktail party, and a waste of money." There was disorganization and lack of concern among the students, he said. Students, by going along with AUCC decisions, are tying their own hands behind their backs added Reoch. The government will cut funds and dictate policy, and students on the AUCC will be part of it.

A student observer from Victoria College Darlene Lawson said that the AUCC is a large, bureaucratic administrative body which will do the students more harm than good. "It is a sad state of affairs for students" when they get involved in hassles with administration, she said, agreeing with Peter Hall, who feels that the U of T delegation will have done what it can if a motion for non-intervention of the AUCC board in the internal problems of universities is accepted.

Hall also disagrees with a AUCC resolution to schedule November 13th as a day of protest of the War Measures Act and subsequent legislation.

Preacher on campus: style without the soul

By JOHN ABBOTT

Friday night the Josh McDowell machine hit U of T billed as a Christian Revolutionary and sponsored by the Campus Crusade for Christ. Josh, as he is so fond of reminding his audience, has been both far and near spreading the word, Jesus Christ.

Despite his quasi-hip presentation Josh is still a preacher. Who wants folks to let Jesus Christ into their lives.

Josh comes on as a self assured young man with a hot item for sale. But his pitch is an insult to his audience. He seems to think that anyone with an approach that includes such "groovy" words as "rap" and "peace" will definitely make it. His repertoire includes a joke for the feeble minded. He says of one professor "One of his brains was lost and the other was out looking for it." He reaches his apex though when he refers to the apostles John and Peter as Johnny and Pete. Time was when Josh would have been a hot item at church camp.

Nonetheless Josh has certainly done his homework. He can reel off a long list of men who set out to disprove the resurrection of Jesus but through their investigation became converted. He delivers a scholarly lecture which validates Christ's resurrection on the third day. It's good, but frivolous.

Josh tells of his days on campus when he seemed to have every thing. He was elected Freshman President. He got drunk lots, and even balled with his chick, but still he wasn't happy. Then he let Jesus into his life and things started happening. Josh admits that things have not become crystal clear for him but you can tell he feels a whole lot better with God on his side.

Yet even letting Jesus Christ into his life hasn't given Josh any immediate answers that he'd care to share with his audience. As a matter of fact Josh includes a crack against Women's Lib and a comment about our Green Berets who serve in Viet Nam in his sermon. Somehow one can't help but wonder about how much Ole Brother Josh grosses in a year which takes him all over the place.

RCMP to employ women soon

By GABRIELLE DUMONT

The particular phrase "Males only" always seemed to get under my skin, so when my eyes alighted on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police ad in last week's Varsity I decided to do something about it. Disguised as a female member of The Varsity staff I went to beard the lion in his den.

The lion, Inspector Scott turned out to be a lamb. It seemed rather humorous to see him of the R.C.M.P. stop dead in his tracks as I strolled non-chalantly through his office door on campus. After we exchanged civil greetings he managed to express his surprise at seeing a member of the female sex, applying for a job in his rather all masculine force. Putting on my best expression of alarm, I coyly suggested that perhaps the R.C.M.P. discriminated against women?

Inspector Scott beamed at me, "my dear young lady" in a little more than a year you will be able to hold any job that a male officer holds now.

As you can guess, I was over- come with joy.

I later asked him why he was down here, at the University, especially at this time when feelings of the students are rather critical of the police force. His answer —

"As the intelligence of our population increases, so should that of our police force."

English depts. 'sponsor' Festival of the absurd

The Combined Departments of English, Wm. J. Hevey's radical theatre group that sponsored the fall Marshmallow Roast, is back in action again. An undergraduate source announced yesterday that there will be a free Festival of the Absurd today at 4 p.m. in the West Hall of University College.

As this paper went to press last night, the CDE office was still unavailable for comment. With a degree of engaging idealistic charm a student spokesman for the group announced that tomorrow's meeting will create a link between absurdist literature and the politics of the department. Discussion will include such problematic topics as: Samuel Beckett and Robert's Rules of Order — a study of contrast.

The meeting will be of special interest to English students but everyone is welcome to attend. Mr. Hevey regrets that he will be out of the city for the occasion, but before departing he was able to arrange for doorprizes and free refreshments.

Highlight of the afternoon will be a theatrical debut of the Royal Canadian Mounted Theatre. A question period will follow the main discussion. The festival was inspired by the writings of Herbert Marcuse and Antonin Artaud. The first three hundred people get to sit in chairs.

Starecase to fill gaps

The Blue and White Society is publishing a new paper, Starecase, to fill in gaps in Varsity coverage.

It will attempt to provide advertisement of upcoming social events, news, and entertainment.

The Society organizes dances, films, and other social events for the University of Toronto.

Mo Wortzman, chairman of the Blue and White, stated that if the Varsity would change toward that direction, "the Blue and White would cease publishing. It is not an attempt to challenge the Varsity."

The paper was put out by Wortzman, Bernie Teitelbaum — an unsuccessful candidate for last year's SAC presidency, and about twelve others from the Blue and White society. It's first issue Wednesday came out as one sheet folded twice to get eight pages. Four were an advertisement for the Blue and White dance Saturday and the remaining four included social news, jokes, and some of their philosophy.

Young Socialists' plans fail to inspire SAC to sponsor demonstration

SAC has refused to sponsor a Young Socialist day of protest against the War Measures Act.

The day of protest, which was originally called for this Friday by student presidents at the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada conference in Winnipeg last week, was defeated by a close vote, at Thursday's SAC meeting.

University Commissioner Peter Hall, who abstained from voting, pointed out that the vote was not taken on the validity of the War Measures Act as such.

"We didn't want to support a Trot (Young Socialist) meeting in Convocation Hall," he said. The motion was made by Joe Young of the Young Socialist Forum.

"There was no sentiment for a day of protest that would bring out more protesters against the protest than for it," Hall said.

Newfoundland Fishermen: mourning a quiet decline

By AL PITTMAN

*Al Pittman was born in St. Leonards, Newfoundland, and is planning to return to Newfoundland to teach next year. In the meantime he has become one of the best-known poets of eastern Canada: he has published two books of poetry: The Elusive Resurrection and Seaweed and Rosaries. He has lived in Montreal and Boston and was editor of Inter-course magazine. His poems have been published in a wide range of magazines. He is presently completing his B.A. in English at Saint Thomas University in Fredericton.*

In the summer of 1967 I sat in the kitchen of a fisherman's home on the island of Merasheen in Newfoundland's Placentia Bay. The fisherman, Anthony Wilson, had seen my wife and me walking down the road past his bungalow and, because we were strangers, had invited us in for a cup of tea.

In Newfoundland "tea" means a fully laid table including linen cloth, the best china in the house, home made bread, a variety of wild berry jams, a platter of luncheon meat, and always a jar of molasses. After we had gorged ourselves on Mrs. Wilson's "tea", Anthony broke out a bottle of rum. He had had the rum "come in" by mail boat two weeks before and had ever since kept it hidden in the bedroom only to be opened on the day of the annual garden party three days hence. Anthony, however, decided that having strangers in was excuse enough to break the rule and promptly produced a bottle of black demerara. For an hour we passed the bottle back and forth across the width of the kitchen-table and talked of Merasheen.

Merasheen lies about five miles off the west shore of Placentia Bay on Newfoundland's southeast coast. Most of the island's inhabitants live on the island's southern end in the villages of Merasheen, Little Merasheen, and Hickey's Bottom. The villages are located in three adjacent harbours, affording the fishermen of the place a choice of landings when weather conditions prevent them from "going in" to their usual moorings. Behind the villages lie the barren sheep-dotted hills of Merasheen which give the island its bleak naked appearance. Beyond the hills, however, there are miles of forest where the men snare rabbits in the fall, and beyond that, more miles of barrens where caribou roam out of reach of the guns of American big game hunters who come in droves to Newfoundland each autumn. Though the people of Merasheen feast on rabbit stew and caribou steaks in season, their livelihood is harvested out of the dark Atlantic waters that are everywhere around them. The violent rhythm of the sea is the rhythm in which the people of Merasheen have lived since man first set foot on the island's rugged perimeter.

My father was born in Merasheen in 1907 and I was born thirty-three years later in the tiny village of St. Leonard's just across the bay. I had gone there that summer with my wife to put all the stories my father and mother had ever told me into their proper setting. I had been taken out of the bay before I was six months old, and though I knew Chapel Pond and the Jawbones, and Soldier's Point, and the Jigging Cove, and St. Kyran's like the palm of my hand, I had never seen any of them. So I went that summer to see where my father had come from, where my mother had come from, and where, most of all, I had come from.

"Sounds like a hard way to make a living," I said when Anthony had finished telling of one particularly rough time he'd had in winter fishing.

"Well, I'll tell ye Phonse," he replied, "it's the devil's own handiwork betimes, but once ye leave off on a summer morning, heading out, with the sun just peeping up, the skiff cutting clean in the water, and all that shiny sea stretching out ahead of ye to westward, well Phonse, ye go out one morning like that and ye can put up with winter fishing the rest of your life."

It wasn't at all the sort of thing I would have expected from the weather-beaten, granite giant of a man sitting across the table from me. Yet, when he said it, it rang so true I felt a sudden surge of sadness rise up within me, for as we sat talking, we, all of us, knew that this would be the last summer Anthony Wilson or anybody else would "head out" from Merasheen.

Centralization, Premier Joseph Smallwood's plan to "drag Newfoundland kicking and screaming into the twentieth century", had already taken its toll in Placentia Bay. St. Leonard's, St. Kyran's, Clattice Harbour, St. Anne Centralization, Premier Joseph Smallwood's plan to "drag Newfoundland kicking and screaming into the twentieth century", had already taken its toll in Placentia Bay. St. Leonard's, St. Kyran's, Clattice Harbour, St. Anne's, Tossilow and numerous other villages were already being reclaimed by the wilderness into which they had been etched some hundreds of years ago.

The "livyers" had been paid a subsidy to move to a "better life" in places like Marystown and Placentia, where, they were promised, there would be jobs galore, and motor cars, and television sets, and better educational facilities for their children.

If such well-timed persuasions as these failed to move the people, the church lent a helping hand. It closed down schools and churches and took away the priests. Inevitably the latter did the trick. The people of the Placentia Bay outports could do without cars, and supermarkets, and television sets, but being as religious and as superstitious as they happen to be, they could think of living inland. So they moved.

From all the villages of the bay they moved to the government designated "growth centres" where they discovered, too late, that the only growth was the growth in population — the result of their own mass migration. Too often they found the worth of their subsidy not nearly enough to replace the homes they had left behind in the coves and on the islands. Too often they found that the promised jobs were nonexistent.

In Placentia, for instance, where so many of them were sent, they found that houses were hard to come by, and jobs ever harder.

The only sources of employment in the town were the Canadian National coastal boat terminal and the American naval station at Argentina. But cutbacks in the CN coastal service (now that there were fewer outports to serve) and the closing down of the U.S. military base, left fewer employment opportunities than ever before.

And now there was talk of Merasheen.

It seemed there was nothing Anthony Wilson or anyone else could do about it. The government fish plant was closing down, therefore there'd be no market for their fish. They could, as they did for years before the fish plant opened, take their catch to Wareham's in Harbour Buffett. But Wareham's too were curtailing operations because there weren't enough fisherman left in the outports to supply them with sufficient fish to maintain operations.

In addition to closing down the fish plant, the government would also halt operation of the dynamos that had, for the past few years, delivered electricity to the islanders' homes. The school had already closed. And the priest was leaving in the fall. So the people of Merasheen would have to move. What else could they do?

Anthony Wilson didn't want to go. He had his own home, and a comfortable and sturdy dwelling it was too. He had a garden out back where his wife grew turnips, potatoes, carrots, beets, cabbage, and a variety of currants and gooseberries. And when I suggested that his fishing take would probably do no more than pay for the gear, he said, "No. Phonse me son, we does a bit better than that."

And when his wife went to the bedroom and returned with the new clothes she had bought by mail order for the children and herself so that they might look "fine" on the day of the garden party, it wasn't hard to tell that the pleasure of the newly acquired finery was in no way diminished by the thought of payments, installments, or "time" as Newfoundlanders refer to credit.

But they would go. There was no other way.

Mike Casey would go too, and his wife Elizabeth, though she kept saying over and over that they would have to drag her away.

Stan Ennis and his son Andrew would go too, though they owned the best boat in the bay and Andrew was as good a "fish-killer" as his father.

And George Wilson would go too. Skipper George Wilson, white haired, as tall and dignified as a church spire, skin the texture of rawhide, "bread'n buttered" there some eighty odd years ago, a legend in his time, father to Anthony, village elder, as gentle as the waves lapping the shore below his house, as rough as the rock that threw the sea back upon itself when it erupted with all its fury upon the Jawbones. He would go too. Go leaving his wife's grave to the delinquent sheep. Leaving all he would have passed on to his sons to the wind and the rain and the sea. Would go leaving everything but his memory and his old man's heart. But he would go.

"I could see it", Anthony said, passing the bottle, "I could see it maybe if they moved us all into St. Kyran's or anyplace down there in the bay. There's good harbours, the fish is here, the men is here what can catch 'em too. I can see they wants bigger schools. I understands that. We been having hard enough time getting a teacher to come here and they only stays a year at the most. I can see the priest wanting one church to look after 'stead of a whole bunch of 'em. God knows, he has it hard going at it all the time. And a lot of priests don't like it in the bay no more. Well, they isn't fishermen so's I don't know ye could blame 'em any. All the same though, I can't for the life o' me see why they shifts us to Placentia. Ye knows yourself there's no living to be made there. The base is closing down bit by bit. Where's the men going to work. I asks. A man can't fish outa Placentia, that's for certain and for sure."

I took a long swig on the bottle and regretted that we couldn't stay for the garden party on Sunday. If I had my time back now, I would have stayed no matter what. But at the time the significance of it all passed me by. It didn't strike me as it should have that this garden party would be the last ever to be held in Merasheen. It would be the end of a tradition that went back before my father's father's time. The end of a way of life.

The morning after our visit with Anthony we walked past the parish hall and saw the tarpaulin booths all in a row in the church yard. Sunday they would be ringed by little girls in floral print dresses; by the men of the place, coat pockets bulging with bottles, Sunday tweed caps angled on their heads; by women with babies on their hips, white aprons looking altogether fine in the outdoors; by young girls with the dishes already done and for the first time in three days no rollers in their hair, flirting openly with the Peters and Andrews and Jims of Merasheen; by the boys who made root beer from extract and carried it in bottles as drunk as their fathers in their fantasies.

Sunday the booths would house ice-cream in heavy canvas khaki bags, wheels of fortune, cabbage-roll dinners, ticket peddlers, bean bags, balloons and darts, sacks for the sack race, ropes for the three-legged race, steaming boilers of good things to eat, coca cola in cases, peanut butter kisses, licorice, and home-knit scarves and caps and socks and mitts to be won as prizes.

But that morning the booths stood empty, their sides flapping noisily in the wind, as they had on that same morning for hundreds of years past.

The devil was there too, looking very much out of place in the middle of the empty yard. On Sunday every man and boy in Merasheen would take a crack at knocking his head off. How long ago was it that some expert young "chucker" first knocked the devil's head off, sent it rolling beneath the feet of the crowd, heralding good tidings for the people of Merasheen?

We left the parish ground and went over the hill into Hickey's Bottom. Mike Casey came then and invited us "ome to 'ave a shave and to meet the missus." As we walked along the beach road, Mike pointed out to me the precise spot where my grandfather's house used to be, and the path he used to take "luggin' 'is long ton", going into the barrens to get rabbits.

I could see my father, a little boy, running up the path at dusk to greet him, tall like timber, coming home from a day's huntin

I could see my father, a little boy, running up the path at dusk to greet him, tall like timber, coming home from a day's hunting on the barrens with his long tom over his shoulder and a brace of rabbits dangling at his side. A vigorous man, still vigorous after a day's trek on the barrens, tossing his young son high into the air and carrying him secure on his shoulder to the house.

"I'm too old to be going anywhere's at my age", Mike said as we sat in his kitchen nipping on his garden party rum. It seemed the invitation to shave was just an excuse of having strangers in to get at the rum without his wife objecting.

"What the Jeesus ye expect a man o' my age to be doing in Placentia, I asks. Lived right here all me born days. Ain't no time to be gallivantin' around at my age."

So he talked on through half the bottle of dark rum, but he would go too. Would go to Placentia or wherever and spend the rest of his days remembering the times back home. What else was there for him to do?

"They's 'll have to drag me", said his Elizabeth with the defiance of a young whippersnapper being sent off to school to repeat a grade.

"They's 'll have to drag me. Without they do, I'll not be going very far. They's 'll have to drag me is all."

She knew in the fall, when the time came, she'd be packing the old clock and her good linen and the quilt her mother gave her for a wedding gift, and she knew in the fall, when the time came, she'd be going too. But she wasn't about to admit it. Not yet. Not until she had to.

In the afternoon we met Stan Ennis. He had heard that Phonse Pittman's son was in and came out to find him. He did find us soon enough and invited us up to his place for a "drop o' rum".

"One time," he said, "Phonse was coming over from St. Leonard's to play football, and we was in the same boat together, and I

'ad a bottle o' rum on board, and I passed 'er around to all leaving Phonse out because 'e being the school teacher I didn't know as it't be right to ask 'im to 'ave a drop, and I been mindin' a long time that it weren't right not offering 'im a drop, so I wants ye to come up to the 'ouse and 'ave that drop o' rum that yer father should of 'ad that day."

So we went up to Stan's and had hot toddies — boiling water and sugar laced with black rum, good for what ails ye whether ye be man or beast.

"Don't know what I'll be doing to 'er," Stan said when I asked him what would become of his boat if he had to move off the island.

"Don't allow as I'll be able to sell 'er. Ain't no one'll be left to use 'er anyways as far as I can see."

The hot toddy was fit for a king. "Always was good fish in the bay, leastwise up 'ere. Man could always make a livin' at the fish. But if they takes the plant, my God, what's the use of catchin'

'em."

So Stan Ennis, the most renowned fish-killer in the bay, would be leaving Merasheen, and his son Andrew would be leaving with him.

"Ere's to your father, Phonse, as fine a man as ever broke a cake of the world's bread. Tell 'im I gave 'is son the drop o' rum I owed to 'im."

The next morning, the coastal boat Petitforte came in as she was scheduled to, doubling back on the bay run, and we went aboard.

It seemed the whole of Merasheen came to see us off. Men, women, and children crowding the small wharf, waving and wishing us well, and saying it was too bad we couldn't stay for the garden party.

Just as the CN boys were pulling in the ropes, preparing to set off, a short stocky man in blue serge, pipe firm in the corner of his mouth, face eroded like a cliff, came over the ramp, walked straight up to me, and, very businesslike introduced himself.

"I didn't get to have a chat with ye while ye were in which I'm sorry about but I used to know yer father right well when we was young, fished together, first trip for the both of us, didn't want it said that Phonse Pittman's boy was in and I never got to say hello to him."

The whistle blew then and he went back over the ramp as suddenly ashe

The whistle blew then and he went back over the ramp as suddenly as he had come. Back on the wharf he merged with all the other pipe smoking blue serge that stood hands in pockets waiting for us to shove off.

The people of Merasheen, as warm as we'd always remember them, stood there and waved us away. They waved us past Soldiers Point and out to the Jawbones where we could see crosses almost everywhere upon the cliffs marking the spots where men of the outports had run foul of the sunkeners and gone down in the sea that was at once their sustenance and deprivation, their life and their death.

Will Chile overcome extremist forces to achieve its goals?

By Arturo Chacon

Arturo Chacon is a native of Chile and a graduate student at the University of Toronto. In the following article, he presents his views on events surrounding the recent election of Marxist Salvador Allende to the presidency of Chile and raises some questions on future developments in Chile.

THE CONFIRMATION by the Chilean Congress of Salvador Allende as the new president of Chile is having repercussions throughout the world because it is the first time in history that a Marxist has been elected to power through elections in a democratic process.

What are the implications for Chile and the world? I will venture my opinion concerning this as a person who has been working very closely with the Socialist Party of Chile though not as a member of it.

I will dismiss rapidly the speculations concerning the future of the democratic procedure in my country not because this is not important but because it has to be looked at in the proper context and not as an isolated phenomenon.

Chile has had a long tradition of democratic elections which was put to a test in the recent elections when three distinctive alternatives were put forward to the electorate: status quo, reformism (Christian Democrats), and the possibility of a change towards socialism. The people gave a plurality to the latter one, which was confirmed by the Congress according to the best Chilean tradition (when no candidate gets over 50% of the total, the Congress decides between the first two pluralities. It has always chosen the front runner.)

The confirmation of Allende has confirmed the democratic vocation of the Chilean people once more in spite of some attempts from extremists (ultra right and some ultra left) to create chaotic conditions previous to the meeting of the Congress. The assassination of the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, General Rene Schneider, two days before the meeting was part of a plot by the Right to escalate events to the point of creating conditions for a coup d'etat by the military. It seems that the intention was to kidnap the General but he defended himself and was killed. The rest of the people involved in the plot did not expect this outcome and the escalation did not take place.

Further, the Left has had its own Intelligence Service which started to provide information to the outgoing Government in order to prevent unfortunate events like this as much as possible (e.g. its main preoccupation has been to protect the life of Allende and has already thwarted two attempts to kill him).

The political assassination of General Schneider is the first in the history of the Republic and only helped to galvanize public opinion around Allende, thus making the process more smooth for the Left to take over power and at the same time rendered credibility to his claims concerning his own possible assassination.

All of these events, plus others like bombings (21 since September) in universities, high schools, public buildings, etc. have made the people aware of the fact that the bourgeoisie and foreign investors are not going to give up their attempt to overthrow the new regime. It has already been hinted by the North American press that Allende might have to rule under a wave of violence. Already more than 5,300 North Americans have entered Chile since June, among some Cuban exiles.

This is the crucial point, the struggle is only beginning (or continuing) as the activities of the rightist elements have shown. The point is one of tactics not of substantia. The ultra left would like to see a rapid polarization of forces in order to create the conditions for a civil war. In this they have the company of the rightist elements who want the same, because the correlation of forces are on their side both at the national and international level.

By correlation of forces I mean the fact that privileged groups within the country, plus international interests involved, mainly from the US, can show more muscle in a showdown than those who support Allende.

Argentina has recently bought another 15 Mirage III jets and has entered agreements with French arms manufacturers to build tanks and airplanes in Argentina. The armed forces of that country would not need too much of an excuse to invade Chile.

ON THE OTHER CORNER, Peru's military government has made a declaration, right after Allende's election, against Marxism.

Argentina is mentioning that the budget for defense will have to be doubled now.

Chile however, cannot enter into an arms race with these countries because it would use up valuable resources needed for development. This has been the fate of Cuba, unfortunately, which has the largest armed forces in proportion to its population in Latin America.

What is needed at this crucial point in Chile, is to raise the political consciousness of the people to organize themselves to pressure the new government to fulfill the social and economic measures of the Popular Union program.

I am being very emphatic here in the sense that I do not want to have a civil war in my country just to prove that the proletariat can come to power only through violent methods. On the other hand, it is also true that the democratic procedures which took place in order to confirm Allende, were possible because there is already an organized force in the society manifested in the formation of 12,000 Committees of the Popular Union which did not disband after the election in September.

The situation is new and I would not, out of a rigid revolutionary dogmatism, dismiss the historical process that Chile has just entered.

THE QUESTION NOW IS: Is Chile going to be socialist?

First, I do not think that Chile will become a socialist society overnight. A socialist society cannot be made by decree of the government. It is a social process where the people become more aware of the reality, and the mastering of it, by themselves.

In this respect the valiant attempt of the Cubans to build a socialist society will not be repeated in Chile just because Allende is in power. The government of Allende will only establish the basis for this process to start, through the different measures which will be taken in the economical, social and educational areas.

This leads the discussion to the second level, that of the State. It is most likely that Chile will have a socialist State, though this has not yet been proclaimed by the Popular Union. The very nature of the measures which must be taken will lead the country to an almost full stabilization of the economy with the related bureaucratic apparatus. I cannot expand this here but it will suffice to say that this trend is already well established in the country, since it started some 30 years ago with the first Popular Front.

IT IS AT THIS POINT that I want to discuss the danger that the bureaucratic apparatus might take away control from the people, falling back into the Soviet type model.

There are elements in the new government who are bourgeois in both their style of life and their value orientation. Their preponderance might throw barriers in the way of achieving a genuine socialist society.

It will be up to the organizations of the workers, peasants and students to see that this does not take place. In the meantime an alert co-operation with the initiatives of the Government to take away the control from the bourgeoisie and foreign interests is the most viable alternative.

WHAT ARE THE MEASURES that the Popular Union has promised to take in the near future?

I will answer this question starting with the economic sphere. First, the nationalization of the copper nitrate, iodine, iron ore and coal industries, mostly in the hands of foreign capitalists, mainly from USA. This will be done with due compensation which will be discussed when the new government takes over. It is interesting to see the reaction of the international circles. The Export-Import Bank has rushed to classify Chile as a 'bad risk country' for investments and USA agencies do not guarantee any more investments in that country. These measures will only put more pressure on the new Government, thus radicalizing the whole process, a situation which at this point would only play in favor of the reactionary forces.

This is so because economic pressure might lead the government to take stern measures, which in due turn could mean to step out of the legal process. Something which cannot be overlooked in the Chilean situation is the legality and claim to legitimacy of the new government. This would provide an excuse to escalate the reaction against socialism in Chile on the part of rightist elements with outside help.

SECOND, THE NATIONALIZATION of all the banks, insurance companies, export and import business, and all the strategic industrial and commercial monopolies already existing in the country in the hands of private capitalists (there are some State monopolies already established too which will be put under the new economic policies of the Government).

Third, the total control by the State of production and distribution of electrical power, transportation systems, oil and its subproducts, steel industry, cement, petrochemical and heavy chemical industries.

These sweeping measures are all intended to make the production of the country meet the needs of the majority. Until now production has been geared to meet the needs of the minority of high income. The case of some industries in Chile working at half of their installed capacity is well known.

Chile is a member of the Latin American Free Trade Area and the Andean Market. The policy will be not to denounce these treaties but to participate only in the integration of production which will not have as its goal to satisfy the interests of the multinational corporations but those of the majority of the population. A possibility of agreement with Peru and Bolivia (maybe Ecuador) here might produce interesting results.

In international policy, some of the first measures will be to establish relations with Cuba, China, North Korea and North Vietnam. These initiatives might make headlines in the North American Press but nothing else more 'spectacular' is in sight.

CHILE WILL USE ITS membership in the OAS and similar agencies to present a different viewpoint to the problems which affect the world and especially Latin America (It has to be remembered that Cuba was expelled from these organizations, it did not withdraw. Is the same fate in sight for Chile? Time will answer this question.)

It is clear that active support for movements of liberation in other parts of the world will be part of the international policy of Chile but the participation in the South American continent will be carried out most carefully in order not to give reasons (not that they need them) for intervention in the affairs of the country. This will be in line with the traditional policies of non-intervention and self-determination.

It has to be remembered that Chile voted against the expulsion of Cuba from the OAS and against the intervention in the Dominican Republic. This policy will have the support of the majority of the population because of the long tradition in this respect. The new presence of Chile in international affairs will produce a new realignment of forces, especially in this hemisphere. By all standards Chile is a more important country than Cuba and it has the possibility of following a more independent line because of the nature of its resources and the industrial capacity of the country. Besides, this will be so because of the presence of the Socialist party in the coalition. For background I will have to say that this party was founded precisely because some people found there was a need for a Marxist party not to be completely subservient to the policy of the Soviet Union. I do not think that this is going to make Allende's Government a sort of maverick in the international scene, but I will mention one relatively recent incident which will show the built in tension within the new Government in international affairs. When the news broke that the Soviet Union, and other members of the Warsaw Pact, had invaded Czechoslovakia, the Socialist party came strongly against it while the Communist party of Chile was the only one in the Americas which supported it without conditions (Cuba qualified its support). This different outlook in international affairs of the two most important members of the coalition will have a lot to do with the next steps which Chile will take in the international scene.

Concerning the realignment of forces in the continent the possibility exists that the measures taken by the new Chilean Government might influence nationalist elements in other countries to look more sympathetically at the same measures being taken in their own countries. It could be that the policy of the new Government will be geared to take some steps in this direction. The fight against imperialism and international economic domination in Latin America goes well beyond the Marxist circles and the social and economical pressures in the continent are clamoring for some effective measures to be taken in the near future. Neo-capitalism has failed to improve the lot of the majorities, to say nothing of 'pure' capitalism. The presence of the Government of the Popular Union in Chile might help nationalist elements in Argentina and Peru to take further steps toward a more independent economic and international policy. This is a possibility which cannot be dismissed lightly. The revolutionary process in Latin America cannot come into being without the support of the nationalist forces which include elements related to the Christian churches and the masses in these bodies. An awareness of this trend and possibility has to be taken into account in the revolutionary strategy for the continent. It is very significant that two of the groups which are part of the Popular Union are formed by Christians with strong nationalist tendencies (to be sure I am talking of a nationalism which acquires continental characteristics not the petty nationalism of the 19th century). Each people has to bring about its own liberation and Latin Americans are quite aware of this, only in this way the cause of world wide liberation will be accomplished. Although the formation of an axis Chile-Cuba might make headlines in the North American Press, the important point is the nature of such an axis and its possible formation. Allende has made no bones of his support of the Cuban revolution, he is a personal friend of Fidel Castro, and has visited Cuba on various occasions. Besides, he participated in the formation of the OLAS (Latin American Organization of Solidarity). At least one member of Allende's Cabinet, Jacques Chonchol, worked in the Agrarian Reform in Cuba for many years. These links make for first hand knowledge on both sides. I will say that there are coincidences in many international features like the support of liberation movements and the fight against imperialism and economic domination by international circles of the Latin America continent. The Cuban situation is one of a revolution in process; Chile at most is in a pre-revolutionary state. Furthermore, conditions at the national and international levels are different. What I can see in the foreseeable future is a close cooperation in the areas already mentioned though not necessarily together. Propaganda in North America will make a lot of this since it already has a great investment in propaganda against the Cuban revolution and nothing would be easier than just to link it with Chile. This would make some stern measures that might have to be applied to Chile in the future.

It has to be very clear that USA has not renounced its role as the arbiter of the conduct of the nations in this hemisphere. So, in spite of the democratic credentials of Allende's Government, the links with Cuba, both real and imaginary, could serve the purpose of a reactionary move against Chile. Again, only the level of political consciousness of the people can help to stop such an attempt. Now, the level of political consciousness of the people in Chile is great enough not to be impressed by the overwhelming propaganda against Allende throughout the campaign.

USA WAS ABLE TO ISOLATE Cuba to a great extent, but it cannot do this very easily with Chile. Nobody is being naive enough not to realize that the confrontation will come, the question is when and how. In this process the Chilean people will become more conscious of the issues at stake and the process toward a revolution will be on its way. If anything the Chilean event has raised the revolutionary struggle in Latin America to a new level by bringing more elements into the struggle than were involved before. The determination to fight does not mean necessarily actual violence. But nobody is deceiving himself about the real possibility of violence. For the benefit of the great majorities of our countries I hope this will not become necessary. In the Spanish speaking world our experience with bloody confrontations has not brought many benefits in the long run. The Spanish Civil War was our great lesson. The same mistake cannot be made twice. The purpose is to include more and more people in the struggle so the fight will not mean shedding our own blood against our brethren but that in the last resource the imperialist will have to shed its own blood to preserve its current gains. In this last case the odds are in our favour, in the first case in favour of the imperialists.

Power to the people, yes, but if we can do it without shedding the blood of our people the better!

Group will observe parks in 50 countries

By CHRIS DYMOND

A dream to travel around the world has brought four recent University of Toronto graduates together to form the Canadian Global Expedition. The four outdoorsmen will observe at grass-roots level national parks in over fifty countries.

Ron Greeley, Dale DuQuesney, Kilian O'Donovan and Joe Grieco will examine the conflict between commercial interests and conservation, man's relationship to the natural environment and the most advantageous ways of harmonizing commercial development with natural preservation.

A recent trial run took the group to Western Canada and the United States to test equipment and check for items previously overlooked. Already they have observed the conflict between conservation and economic development.

In provincial parks this problem is more acute as the province is more tempted to sell off the natural resources than the federal government.

"Who's to say what value a person gets by going to a park or a wilderness area for a couple of weeks and then comes back completely refreshed? Perhaps the economic value of this is as great as the mineral resources to be found in these areas. But how can you measure it?" asked Greeley.

Their trip has received verbal support from Canadian government officials including Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, ex-P.M. Lester Pearson and Jean Chretien. Each provided a letter of endorsement. The federal government also provided a $1,000 grant.

DuQuesney estimated the total cost at $30,000 with ocean travel absorbing one-third of the budget. Hopefully they will receive support from shipping companies to defray this expense.

A lack of financial assistance from the business world means a delay for the group. Tight money has left most companies unable to invest in what Prime Minister Trudeau termed "a valuable and rewarding project of research".

Although they had originally planned to leave in October, the expedition now hopes to conclude financing by December.

"There is only one thing I'm convinced of and that is that I'm going. If I have to postpone it and work for another year I'll do it.

But I am going," said DuQuesney, the 29-year-old economics graduate.

Travel plans will take them to North America and South America, then Europe and Africa, followed by India and Australia.

Their findings will be presented to the Conference on National Parks in September 1972 at Banff.

A plan to increase public support calls for individual sponsorship. They hope to elicit a donation of 1¢ per ten miles of driving.

Sponsors can support them in any or all of the six continents they visit and will receive newsletters from those areas in which they express interest. Sponsorships range from $10 to $20 or $95 for the entire voyage.

Greeley, aged 21, and a Geography graduate said, "We feel we gain more from a learning experience such as this, than spending further time in university getting M.A.'s." He added that beyond the educational aspect of the parks he hoped this experience would lead to some work dealing with people on an international basis.

All four held regular jobs which they have now given up.

Would you like a piece of the action?

In the past bad publicity has kept us from attracting some of the best young hopefuls. We've been scandalized as an organization without scruples and without formal recognition from the authorities. Finally the wrong has been righted, the record cleared and our position is solid. Our contributions in maintaining stability from the streets to the stock exchange are evident to anyone in power. We rub shoulders with the best.

If you truly want to affect society,
 If you want a hand in forming tomorrow's swinging world,
 If you have ideas and ability that need just a little backing,
 Get in with the new people of the big organization
 That's not an organization.

We're a family.

We need engineers, and scientists to take jobs in our brother corporations,
 Business majors for the managerial posts,
 And the best of arts men for our public relations.

No limits can be set on the opportunities for you once you join us—Diversification is our trade mark.

'Safe' vending machine being considered for New men's residence

"Better safe than sorry."

New College Student Council has been approached by Gentry Vending Machines to install a condom vending machine in any specified place for the college.

The company has offered to install and maintain the machines paying for any damages. Price of the condoms would be $1.00 and the Student Council would get 25% of the money going into the machine.

The matter is currently before each house in Wetmore Hall, the men's residence where the machines would be located. Many houses have voted against the move and advance indications, are that the offer will be turned down.

One student council member, in favour of the machine stated that it's "a basic human right." Lorraine Symmes, representative for the women's residence and only female member on the student council commented, "As far as I'm concerned it doesn't make any difference. If they want it, it's their prerogative."

Student parity in Architecture

By MARCIA SINGER

Remember those beautiful recommendations on student parity. Well, they didn't die with the University Wide Committee or the withdrawal of the student members of the Faculty Council of Arts and Science. Student parity is alive, and well, and hiding in the department of architecture.

Since February, 1970, architecture has gone CUG. How? "We did it absolutely as CUG suggested it," explained Peter Prangnell, department chairman. In January 1970, the architecture committee, consisting of all full-time faculty, accepted the principle of the department council as set out in the CUG reports. They established a negotiation committee of seven faculty and seven students to examine the make-up of the departmental council. This committee's recommendations were passed by the architecture committee in February 1970.

The department council consists of 57 members; 28 faculty, 28 students and 1 support staff.

There are no qualifications, except perhaps interest and enthusiasm, to become a student representative on the departmental council. Three students are elected from each of the five years, and six members-at-large. In addition, president and vice-president of the Student Society, as well as the SAC rep are ex-officio members.

In keeping with this spirit, there are no qualifications for faculty to be on the council. Full-time or part-time teachers are automatically on the departmental council.

Since the creation of a departmental council with student parity, a number of faculty in the department have stopped coming to department councils. "I consider it (this problem) very serious but it would be perfect like the first day out," commented Prangnell.

The department council has not met any fundamental issues yet. It has been concerned with the day-to-day running of the department. There are some working committees examining issues, such as admissions policy and the curriculum.

"Somehow it's terribly easy for everyone to sit down and agree whether there should be one more hour of something or other, or if fifty dollars is a reasonable amount to put towards something. What I'm worried about is the idea you can draw the teeth of students if you get them involved in routine administrative things. It seems to me what is at stake is whether or not, very serious issues of policy, of philosophical ideas of running the department can be discussed," says Prangnell.

The admissions question is likely to test how successful the department council is. Only sixty of about four hundred applicants are accepted each year. Another problem is many applicants are turned away at Simcoe Hall because their marks aren't high enough.

"There is going to be a fight with new admissions policy", forecast Roger Harper, a student member of the department council.

Decisions of the departmental council can be reversed by the faculty council of the Faculty of Architecture. Chairman Prangnell outlined a hypothetical case. If a minority on the department council disagreed with a department council's decision, they could take the matter to the faculty council for legal approval. The decision there could be reversed "simply because the representation is so different."

The faculty council consists of some fifty members from its three departments. All faculty members are at or above the rank of assistant full-time professor. There are four student members. The possibility of parity on the faculty council depends on the faculty. And Prangnell stated "There would be every possibility if the faculty wanted it."

Parity has repercussions. When students and faculty share the administrative and policy making of a department, the teacher-student relationship changes. This was illustrated in a conflict with some civil engineering faculty and architecture students. The civil engineers taught a few hours a week in the department of architecture. These teachers were used to lecturing but not to being questioned and criticized intensively by their students. Architecture students on the other hand were used to criticizing any area in the department, the result was a collision of two life-styles. The engineers in a letter to Chairman Prangnell threatened to quit if their duties and hours were not specified. This year, there are no civil engineers teaching in architecture.

The department of architecture may be voted out of existence. A president's advisory committee is considering changing the structure of the faculty. Instead of a five year program in the department of architecture, a student would complete a three year general degree before specializing in the field of architecture for another three years. If the department of architecture dies, will parity remain alive?

Cross-Country team a disappointing second

By CLIVE HOBSON

"We blew it!" Those were the words of Varsity runner Rich Pyne after the finish of the OQAA cross country championships held at Guelph last Saturday. The highly touted Toronto team failed to live up to expectations as they finished second behind the victorious Western squad led by Grant McLaren.

McLaren was the overall winner as many of the favourites had off days and turned in poor performances. Bruce Snyder of Guelph was second, and the first Toronto runner home was Brian Armstrong in third place. He was followed by Chris Bolter, also from Western. Paul Pearson of Waterloo was fifth and Steve Mustard was sixth for Guelph.

The next Toronto finisher was Dave Bailey, who also had an off day, to finish in eighth spot. Bob Knuckey finished eleventh for Toronto. The remaining Varsity runners were Peter Pimm and Richie Pyne who finished fifteenth and twenty third respectively.

Pyne was especially disappointed in his finish; he had been expected to at least place in the top ten. This is his last year running for Toronto and he would have liked to have said farewell to the old alma mater at least on a winning note.

The course was a gruelling six mile affair and left many of the veterans reeling after the two mile mark. Waterloo's Brian Bisson was one of the favourites who failed to live up to his reputation as he trailed way back in the pack and was a contributing factor in his team's upset fourth-place finish.

It was the failure of runners like Pyne and Bisson that aided the winning Western cause. Had more of the established runners finished in the top ten as anticipated, the team race would have been much closer.

However, as it was, Western scrambled to the top of the pack with forty-three points. Toronto was second with fifty-five points while Guelph followed with sixty-three and Waterloo trailed with sixty-eight.

It was a downcast Toronto team that returned home. The responsibility for the loss couldn't be pinned on a single cause, the course was rugged, the competition tough, and for some of the guys it was "just one of those days".

UC downs Scarboro in thriller

By PAUL RAPHAEL

One of the most exciting games of the interfac grid season was played last Friday as UC downed Scarborough 20-16.

Both teams demonstrated solid offensive attacks with UC's ground game predominating. Defensively, UC's Fred Gurney set the tempo with his vicious tackling.

But the star of the game had to be Ed Nabeta of UC. He played in both the offensive and defensive backfields, punted, scored two majors, intercepted a pass and blocked a convert attempt.

UC's other points came on a major by Bill Dunford and two converts by Gurney.

For Scarborough, quarterback George Goldsmith scored six points on a keeper which was set up by a diving catch of one of his passes by Bob Carmichael. Their other touchdown came as a result of a faked punt which was converted into a 40-yard run into the end zone by track-man Matt Nakamura. Nakanura was also a continual threat on kick-off returns.

Eric Seery kicked a single and a convert, while the other two Scarborough points were surrendered by Nabeta when he conceded a safety after fumbling a snap on a punt.

4-1-2 grid record good for second place

Halfback Bob Morrow takes off on a 35-yard punt return which set up the game's only major.

Despite pressure from Blues' Mike Brierley, Mac punter Alec Lockington gets off a punt.

Volley Blues edge closer to the top Displaying much improved form according to their coach Taimo Pallandi, the Volleyball Blues won six games and lost only two in the round-robin tournament held at Waterloo on Saturday.

Combined with their 4-4 record at the season's first meeting at Guelph, the Blues emerged from the Waterloo tourney in second place in the OQAA Western Division standings with 10 points, four less than leading Western.

Saturday, Blues won 2-0 series from both McMaster and Waterloo while playing 1-1 draws with Guelph and Western.

Saturday, Blues won 2-0 series from both McMaster and Waterloo while playing 1-1 draws with Guelph and Western.

With only two more division meets left on the schedule, this Saturday at Mac and the following weekend at Western, Blues stand a good chance of finishing either first or second.

The top two finishers in each division meet in the OQAA finals November 28 on the home court of the Eastern Division champions.

By LYNDON LITTLE

Varsity's talented but injury-prone football Blues began Saturday afternoon's encounter with McMaster desperately hoping for a Waterloo Warrior upset over Queen's.

They finished the contest hoping just as fervently that the Gaels would come out victorious after all and thus save them from the acute embarrassment of having blown an opportunity for a Yates Cup with a 7-7 tie with the Marauders.

"How's that for a paradox," exclaimed assistant coach Tom Watt in a subdued but not overly grim Blues' dressing room after the game.

Blues thus ended what was otherwise an excellent season on a slightly low note as they came up with a disappointing performance before an equally disappointingly small crowd on a magnetic day for football.

"We were a bit flat," was head coach Ron Murphy's only comment.

THIS MARKS the third year in succession that Blues have come tantalizingly close to a Yates Cup only to fall short. In '67 they won both the OQAA and the College Bowl.

The 20-6 victory by the Gaels over Waterloo gives them first place and a final point total of 13. Blues and Western (winners 42-14 over McGill) each finish with 10 points but Blues take second as a consequence of their 10-4 victory in the only meeting between the two teams. McMaster is fourth with five points while McGill is fifth with three and Waterloo last with two.

The victorious Queen's crew now pack their long underwear for hospitable Winnipeg where they will meet the WCIAA conference champs, the U of Manitoba Bisons, on Saturday for a spot in the national final a week later at Varsity Stadium.

The other national semi-final will feature the Ottawa Gee-Gees, who won the Central Canada Conference title with a 32-15 triumph over Bishops, against the Bluenose winners University of New Brunswick Red Bombers in the Atlantic Bowl in Halifax.

Saturday's battle with the Marauders dragged at many points with Blues especially finding it difficult to move the ball with any consistency. The final minute, however, was something else entirely!

WITH JUST over sixty seconds remaining and the score tied 7-7, the Marauders were forced into a kicking situation on their own 46-yard line. The centering snap which had been getting higher and higher all afternoon finally sailed clear over punter Alex Lockington's head. Blues recovered on the Mac 24 with a golden opportunity to win the game.

Two incomplete passes and Blues' punter Peter Van Bodegom dropped back in an attempt to kick the winning single through the end zone. However, it fell a little short and Lockington returned the complement with the ball rolling out of bounds on about the Mac 30-yard line.

There was just enough time for one more play and Van Bodegom lined up for a final try.

This time, Mac's Davie West broke through and blocked the kick. Teammate Greg Higson picked up the loose ball and appeared headed for the winning touchdown when he was hauled down from behind by rookie Paul Kitchen on the Varsity 26-yard line as time ran out.

Blues started the game with authority. Their only sustained march of the game came on their first possession as quarterback Wayne Dunkley moved them from the Varsity 48 to the McMaster nine in nine plays. There they lost control of the ball when a third-down gamble fell short.

From then on, the offense moved only in fits and starts as Blues managed only a meager 166 yards in total offense to 260 for the Marauders.

BLUES JUMPED into an early 7-0 lead when a fine 35-yard punt return by halfback Bob Morrow gave them the ball on the Mac eight. On the next play, fullback Glen Markle found the left side of the line plugged, shifted to his right, and broke several tackles on his way into the end zone.

The Marauders came back with a single by Lockington and a safety touch when Dunkley was dropped in the end zone trying to pass. Blues led 7-3 at the half.

A 17-yard field-goal by Lockington on McMaster's first series of the second half narrowed the margin to 7-6. The score was set up when defensive back Jody Orved inadvertently tipped a long pass from quarterback Barry Finlay into the hands of flanker Bob Baytor for a 65 yard gain.

Lockington tied the score with a single mid-way through the fourth quarter to wet the stage for the last-minute thrills.

But Saturday was an off-day all-around at Varsity Stadium. Even the public address announcer got into the act when he persisted in referring to the latest score in the "NFL" playoff game between Argos and Montreal at CNE Stadium.

Blue Notes: According to McMaster head coach Ray Johnson, the Marauders will lose only three first stringers from this year's squad. If that's so, they'll be a strong contender next year . . .

Along with kicker Lockington, Mac wide receiver Bob Baytor was the offensive star of the game as he picked up 121 yards on five receptions. Blues' John Chapman had 53 yards on three catches . . .

Considering he was plagued with high snaps all afternoon, Lockington's 40 yard punt average was fantastic. When he had proper time, Van Bodegom loften several kicks that matched Lockington's.

Varsity censored over FLQ note

A front page story slated to run in Monday's edition of The Varsity was censored Sunday night by Web Offset Publications Ltd., the paper's printer.

The story consisted of a two-paragraph introduction, plus the complete text of the latest communication from the outlawed Front du Libération de Québec.

THE CENSORED STATEMENT WAS PRINTED in full in yesterday's edition of The Ubysey, the student newspaper at the University of British Columbia, and reported extensively in a page 8 story in Tuesday's edition of the Globe and Mail, Canada's national newspaper.

The Montreal weekly, Quebec Presse, has also printed large extracts from the communiqué.

None of these publications have faced reprisals from police as yet.

Web Offset withdrew the statement from The Varsity early Monday morning on the grounds that it "constituted a statement of the FLQ", Web manager J. R. Chittick, explained afterwards.

Varsity proofreaders inserted a photo of Robert Lemieux, the jailed lawyer who has represented the FLQ in negotiations, with tape plastered to his mouth, and the word "Censored" written across it.

Because no blank white space appeared where the story was to have gone, there was some confusion among readers as to whether The Varsity was actually censored. IT WAS.

THE PRINTERS REFER TO ONE CLAUSE of the Public Order Regulations, introduced almost a month ago by the federal government, as the basis of their refusal to print the material.

The clause says that anyone who "communicates statements on behalf of or as a representative of the unlawful association" (the FLQ in this case), is liable to imprisonment for up to five years.

The printers maintain that printing the complete text of the communiqué means acting "on behalf of or as a representative of" the FLQ.

Because it was signed by the FLQ, it had to be rejected, the printers' lawyer, Douglas Wilkins, explained yesterday.

"IT DOESN'T REALLY MATTER what it says," he said, "If it is written by the FLQ".

Wilkins suggested that the tack followed by the Globe and Mail was safer, but still contained "an element of risk."

The Globe devoted an entire story to paraphrasing sections of the communiqué. Words used were almost identical with the actual text, except for the addition of words attributing each idea to the FLQ.

"If you just quote the whole statement, you would probably be liable under section 4 (c)" (of the regulations), said Wilkins.

He indicated that it was a good idea to pay attention to the "government's intentions" in introducing the regulations.

"Their intention is to prevent certain information from being communicated," said Wilkins.

He did not feel it would be safe legally to print the text in order to supply readers of The Varsity with complete and accurate information about the situation in Québec.

"Accuracy is just what they (the government) don't want. There is no legal protection in accuracy. But if the information is diluted, as in the Globe and Mail, the risk is slight."

THE VARSITY YESTERDAY telexed the Department of Justice in Ottawa to enquire whether printing this text could be illegal.

The reply, signed yesterday afternoon by J. A. Scollin, director of the Criminal Law Section at the Justice Department, read as follows:

"Question whether offence is or is not committed is matter for Attorney General of province, not for Minister of Justice. However, note that under Section 4 of Public Order Regulations 1970 made under War Measures Act, offence committed only if statement communicated on behalf of repeat on behalf of or as representative or professed representative of the FLQ."

Wilkins did not feel this ruling constituted permission to print the FLQ text. "On behalf of," he said, covers "written by."

If the item did appear in print, Wilkins was sceptical about the likelihood of prosecution.

"They haven't prosecuted anybody in Ontario yet, of which I am aware, and I'd be amazed — not amazed, but surprised — if they started prosecuting The Varsity, and even more surprised if they started prosecuting Web Offset."

But, he added, "my job is to protect the printer from the possibility of court action."

Chittick added that he intended to "abide by the law" and was referring interpretation to his lawyer.

In the House of Commons Monday Justice Minister John Turner said the Act forbade journalists from acting "on behalf of" the FLQ, but did not provide for censorship of news and commentary.

"THERE IS NO CENSORSHIP AVAILABLE within the regulations," Turner told the House.

On previous occasions, since the imposition of the War Measures Act, Web has insisted on submitting "controversial copy" for legal rulings.

Several paragraphs were altered in two Oct. 19 stories, and three paragraphs were cut from a story on Oct. 28.

Election to decide VUSAC's role

By BEN FORSTER

Tomorrow's election at Vic, the second this fall, came as a result of massive resignations from VUSAC (Vic's student Council).

Reasons for resignations centred about the stated priorities of VUSAC. "The top priorities for the Council shall be University Government, the Strand, Education, Office and bureaucracy, Communications and the Contingency Fund; and the secondary priorities shall be social, cultural, and athletic activities," read a motion passed at the October 13 meeting of VUSAC.

The top priorities had been such throughout the entire summer, although they had not been publicly stated. The priorities were reflected in the creation of the position of Research Assistant to the Council, a full-time job paying $2700 for the school year.

Council felt strongly that this position was required if expansion in those fields designated as "top priorities" were to receive proper attention.

Opposition to the rechanneling of Council priorities, came, first of all, to the appointment of Ernie Hobbs, a Mini-CUG member and a former VUSAC President, to the post of Research Assistant.

The position was created over the summer when few students were able to witness it. Hobbs' elevation to the post took place over the summer as well.

Hobbs had an overwhelmingly large number of personal contacts on the Council, and he had been chosen over only two other applicants.

As well, the exact nature of Hobbs' job was never apparent to many students, though Council members kept on reiterating what Hobbs had done so far; finally council members confessed that they themselves did not really know what Hobbs' job consisted of — rather they said that the job was conforming to the needs of the hour.

Despite painfully sincere protests from the Council, a considerable number of students at Vic believed, that the job had been engineered as a sinecure for Hobbs.

They reacted accordingly, protesting to members of the Council and to Hobbs, who, by reason of his contract, was not able to defend his position. Hobbs has also resigned.

It was not until the VUSAC budget meeting that the inter-related quality of this issue became apparent.

In the past, a number of clubs, including the Vic men's Athletic Union, and the Women's Athletic Association, had been in the habit of having annual banquets ($600 each) totally subsidized by VUSAC.

The VUSAC budget cut all subsidies of banquets out. Representatives of the two athletic groups launched a bitter attack on VUSAC.

As a result of this controversy, seven members of the Council resigned, and only one, Brian Evans, has decided to run again — this time as president.

Thus the basic issue in this election is whether VUSAC should continue in its new direction, or whether it should take up its old function of being simply a distributor of money to clubs on campus.

Tim Young, the former VUSAC President, said in his letter of resignation: "VUSAC as presently structured and thought of is very out-moded. . . Most students are unaware of the educational, governmental and cultural gains that have been made, and their horizons are therefore limited in judging the lay of the VUSAC land." This was the feeling of The Council members that resigned.

Representation on Faculty Council

Conflict brews between faculty, students

The Faculty of Arts and Science seems to be heading for a major controversy over the issue of student representation on the top governing council, as student members on the council moved last night to take the matter to the student body.

Working on a referendum to be held in two weeks was finalized and the students' position clarified in an open letter. The full text of the letter follows below.

TO ALL STUDENTS IN THE FACULTY OF ARTS AND SCIENCE:

We are presently your representatives on the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. On October 28th, we decided to withdraw from the meetings of that body pending the outcome of a referendum to be held throughout the Faculty.

At this time there are 34 places allowed for student representatives on the 169 seat General Committee, which carries on the normal work of the Council. These same students and their alternates are also members of the Council itself, which has over 1300 members and which has veto power over any decision of the General Committee.

This General Committee is only an interim body and must be replaced before next year. On October 26th, the General Committee tabled for six months a student motion requesting that a restructuring committee be formed as soon as possible and that it consist of five faculty members, five students and the Dean or his representative as chairman. The faculty were to be elected by the entire teaching staff and the students were to be elected by the entire student body of the Faculty of Arts and Science. The tabling of this motion until April was an effective rejection of its principles.

The Council is responsible for the final decisions of all matters in the Faculty and is crucial in determining the nature of the academic education you participate in at the University of Toronto. It finally determines which courses are available to you, and how their classes will be held, whether there will be tutorials, seminars, independent study, final exams, grades or pass-fail. All your petitions come before a committee of this Council. Questions concerning your final standing in a course or in your year are also dealt with by a committee of this body.

We feel that these two facts - the present composition of the Council and the tabling of the motion to restructure - indicate that students are not being allowed an effective voice in the workings of the Faculty Council. The Council's work is vital. We have not resigned from it, for we do not wish to exclude any possibility of communication with the Council. Instead, we have withdrawn from active participation, maintaining the opportunity of resuming our seats at any time, pending the outcome of the referendum.

The referendum to be held on November 24th and 25th will be:

- We request that no student participate in any meeting of the interim General Committee of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science until it has constituted a committee to restructure the Faculty Council. This committee to have equal staff/student membership and to report by March 1st, 1971.
- We request that the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science be restructured to allow equal student representation at the departmental and college level.

Student Representatives, Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The Varsity — Jim Lane

Disregarding normal protocol, two students disrupt a meeting of the U of T combined English departments Monday with guerrilla theatrics.

English general meeting gets bounce

The General Meeting of the Combined Departments of English was disrupted Monday by three basketball players who dribbled down the main aisle whistling and cranking noise-makers.

Only momentarily phased by the disruption, the meeting went on to give first year students the right to be elected to the General Council, as well as setting up parity membership on the important Exam and Calendar Curriculum committees.

Organized by Wm. Hevey's radical group, the disruption was, according to the academically-attired ushers, an attempt to "liven up" the decision-making processes of the department and to "show people what politics at this university is all about."

Students filed into the open meeting at UC's west Hall chewing on marshmallows and tugging on balloons which were provided at the door.

The atmosphere however had nothing to do with marshmallows as speakers clashed over representation of first year students.

Any students on the general council are automatically eligible for seats on the important bodies such as the Calendar Curriculum Committee which decides what courses are to be taught in the department.

Several faculty members questioned the competence of freshmen, although in the end the majority supported Trinity Department head M. T. Wilson, who held that decision-making should involve the novice as well as the specialist.

This was the second English department meeting to be concerned with the status of first year students. A meeting of the smaller English Council on October 14 was thrown into an uproar when it was found that one student member was a freshman.

Canada called insignificant mini-imperialist power

By VALERIE CHAVOSSY
"Canada is a very insignificant, small, mini late-comer imperialist power in the Caribbean," says economist Kari Levitt, author of "Silent Surrender."

Speaking at a meeting sponsored by the U of T Waffle movement at the International Students' Centre on Monday, she went on to say that Canada has, nevertheless the role of an imperial power in Caribbean.

"Foreign investment in the Caribbean has not solved that area's economic problems. Instead it has created artificial wage differentials and reinforced the attitude of dependence.

"In the cases of Trinidad and Jamaica the post-war period has added a new type of imperialism to the old-type colonialism."

Referring specifically to English Canada, "the Toronto and Ontario complex," Levitt described Canadian imperialism in the Caribbean in three ways. "The legacy of the old mercantile system, Canadian banks such as the Royal Bank and the Bank of Nova Scotia now account for over half the commercial banking in the Caribbean." Canadian Alcan's investment in the bauxite industry and Canadian external aid "Some like to boast that Canadian aid runs to $8 per capita, an extremely high level."

"There is absolutely no rationale for the idea of aid being given for humanitarian reasons. It is given to assert political presence and to protect economic interests."

"I have the impression there is a close liaison between Ottawa and Washington not only in the Caribbean, but in Latin America."

She also refutes the "holier than thou attitude that because Canada is dominated by the United States, the feeling is that she cannot engage in economic imperialism. This is totally false."

Trudeau called 'fascist manipulator'

QUEBEC (CUPI) — A crowd of about 1,000 people stood and cheered Sunday night as Rene Levesque, leader of the Parti Quebecois called Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau a "fascist manipulator."

"In the most fundamental political meaning of the word, fascism means the type of absolutist taste for unchallenged power that tries its hardest to force to the edges of society all those who don't agree so as to leave place only for it", Levesque told the Quebec region PQ members.

He said Jean Marchand, Minister of Regional Development, Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau and "above all, Trudeau, profited from the situation in order to get a hold on Quebec so as to transform the Quebec government into a type of puppet with which they could almost do anything."

"It was a manipulation, a systematic manipulation, of the population with this in mind."

"From this point of view," Levesque said, "Pierre Elliott Trudeau conducted himself like a fascist manipulator."

He said that if the Ottawa and Quebec governments had negotiated with the FLQ, Laporte would be alive today, and both Laporte and James Cross would be free.

He cited the release of Arab prisoners in return for the freedom of hostages held in the Jordanian Desert as a sensible way of handling a similar situation.

Cockroach Poem

This poem was written by Toronto poet Joe Rosenblatt to commemorate the passing of the War Measures Act. Says Rosenblatt: "It expresses my opinion of the repressive measures being enacted in Parliament which are designed to destroy all dissent in this country. The modified version of the War Measures Act is just as vicious as its predecessor. These opinions are also, essentially, those of the poet Milton Acorn." Acorn, who is in Toronto now, bases himself on Prince Edward Island. When the War Measures Act was imposed, Acorn promptly turned up at the Charlottetown police station to turn himself in as an FLO sympathizer. He was turned away, and hit the road.

Make your peace with the cockroach he's home grown speaks English, is also bilingual was educated in Oxford, Sorbonne, Yale...
—then of course Goebels had a PhD—the bug found in the ulcerated stomach of middle America sings 'O Canada' with passion, passion!
this roach is even athletic fingers our liberty bells
—what is the word 'agnew' to this roach our xenophobic roach with his suction cups—he sees the fermentation: the skeletons of nine-to-five cry for the whole loaf of political stability dissent is the rat's hair in the bread and it won't be given the Good Housekeeping seal—liberals run before the roach —it's only a temporary measure—the roach chews away the finger of academia; the laughing grove or the beast takes sanctuary in the public beard he takes his ablutions in the dancing detergent under the long shadow of the hard hat he's in the thick of maple syrup and smells the sweeter for it —like the deodorant of the living dead—the erudite roach has covered every legal angle he has eyes for incongruity—every crack in the poverty closet has been covered—the insect carries his retroactive retribution to those fools who have attended meetings that the roach has found unclean—ah nostalgia, nostalgia this larva has brought the vanguard of the super roach small roaches at first then commissar roaches, SS roaches the legions moan in the darkness of the cupboard the dissonant has by its 'dialectic' or natural carbuncle of the class struggle put the show on the road.

'United action needed, not red-baiting'

I feel compelled to reply to the article in the Nov. 9 issue of The Varsity reporting on my attempt to get SAC to endorse the Nov. 13 Day of Protest against the War Measures Act and the new repressive legislation.

The Day of Protest is not a Young Socialist Day of Protest. It was initially called by an ad hoc committee in Saskatoon and was subsequently endorsed by the meeting of student presidents in Winnipeg and by the Comité Québécois pour la défense des libertés which is the broad defense committee in Quebec.

I would like to inform Peter Hall that I never asked SAC to support "a Trot meeting in Convocation Hall" but rather a meeting which had been initiated by the U. of T. Waffle group at its meeting on Tues Nov. 3.

Hall's red-baiting simply allows him to cop out completely from proposing any action. He said nothing at the SAC meeting to suggest some form of action in defense of our civil liberties. He abstained.

At this time when the democratic rights of Canadians and Quebecois are being seriously jeopardized by the new repressive legislation, when prominent leaders of the Quebec nationalist movement are being railroaded to jail for their views the article in The Varsity and SAC's refusal to act can be seen only as sabotage of the movement to defend our rights.

What we need at this time is not red-baiting and intentional distortion but united mass action. The Young Socialists are prepared to unite with anyone to fight the new legislation and free the political prisoners. Other groups should follow suit so that mass opposition can be organized now before it is too late.

Joe Young, Young Socialists

London group plans action on Quebec

Further to Pierre Lemieux's letter, which you kindly printed in another edition, the Ad Hoc Committee for Solidarity with Quebec and Canada held another meeting of disaffected Canadians at the London School of Economics on October 3.

A permanent co-ordinating committee, based in London, has been approved and a platform passed. The platform calls for the immediate repeal and abolition of all repressive measures introduced or planned; the withdrawal of troops from Quebec; the release of all political prisoners. It also affirms the right of the Quebec people to self-determination and confirms our solidarity with movements trying to achieve justice in Quebec and English Canada.

We are planning a small action at Canada House for November 6 and a larger demonstration with the support of British left groups when permanent legislation to replace the War Measures Act is introduced.

Again, we offer our support to interested groups in Canada. We are most interested in making contact with groups such as our own: please write to:

'Can campus centre broaden U of T's narrow horizons?'

The Campus Project Committee was organized in the last two weeks to carry on from Wayne Richardson's Campus Centre Report. It is fulfilling its charge to "concretize the need for a campus centre in terms of the needs of people affected by such a centre." While involved in this process, the committee feels it is invalid to envision this project being completed by building such as the Andrews Student Centre, or by any single structure.

The modern university fulfills a narrow set of purposes, for a narrow set of people. Its functions are those of teaching and research for a limited type of person and student and of service to the needs of the marketplace rather than those of the public and communities. We feel these functions must expand to accommodate the day-to-day needs of people who are part of an embryonic diverse community called university. The university must also begin to accommodate old and new communities of citizens.

In the past the university provided such services as created a community of its own scholars. Residences, dining halls, lounges, libraries tended to bring together the small numbers of the university on common ground. Today, because of excessive numbers of people, diversification and specialization of academic studies and their facilities, new responsibilities and status of the student, and longer time spent in university these facilities for community are insufficient.

The university has become a diverse assemblage of homogeneous interest groups, each separated and disinterested in the next. Self-criticism and social criticism are being replaced by jingoistic provincialism. Self-education is giving into education of and by the specialist.

A community is a group of diverse character, banded together by common interests, aims or grounds. The first aim of this Campus Project Committee is to help provide those common grounds, agora, marketplace which would enhance the quality of life of citizens of this community and of other citizens of the city.

This enhanced quality must be created of conscious and unconscious new opportunities and alternatives for education and passing time at the university. The Campus Projects Committee, in fulfilling its charge of assessing the needs of people here, must continually ask:

"How many of the traditional acts of expression (of joy, time passing, faith, play-teaching) are likely to continue to want to find expression?"

All readers are charged to assess their own life here, (and perhaps the life of their fellows) in light of the above question. Your thoughts put to paper are necessary if this project is going to meet with success. Briefs can be dropped by to Wayne Richardson at the SAC offices. This committee also needs help from many people of many interests.

Pub incident report corrected

I wish to draw your attention to an erroneous report concerning an incident in the Black Hart Pub on Thursday, October 29th, which appeared in The Varsity on October 30.

Contrary to your report the University Police did not 'bust' the pub. This is a grievous misrepresentation of the facts which casts a slur on both the campus police and the pub itself.

These are the facts which I trust you will publish for the edification of your readers.

1. A group of students were singing bawdy or vulgar songs and the student manager of the pub respectfully asked them to cease and desist out of courtesy for a number of female guests in the pub.
2. The student manager of the pub was met by insults and abuse and had no other recourse but to seek for help, at that time of evening, from the University Police.
3. Two members of the Police arrived and asked the students in question to stop what they were doing. They stopped.
4. Thereupon the student manager of the pub invited two of the students involved to leave the pub. One of the students left and the other apologized to the student manager and remained in the pub until about 9.30 p.m.

Hart House naturally regrets that certain students chose to behave in an unseemly fashion (this is the first time such a thing has happened) but chiefly do we bemoan the false and sensational Varsity report of the incident which could threaten the continuation of an experiment (the Pub) which has received wide approval throughout the University community.

Thank you for your assistance in correcting this report.
James S. Cunningham,
Assistant to the Warden,
Chaplain to Hart House.

"Certain political rights are inseparable from the very essence of democracy: liberty of thought, of speech, of expression (press, radio, etc.), of assembly and of association; in fact, citizens are powerless to participate fully in the social order if these liberties suffer the least restriction..."

HERE'S ONE DIAMOND THAT WASN'T A GIRL'S BEST FRIEND.

This particular diamond broke across the diameter because of a series of flaws, invisible to the naked eye. An unfortunate blow did the rest.

If you're in the market for a diamond ring why not deal with professionals. We can show you what a diamond looks like under 30 power magnification instead of in a showcase and what comprises value in a diamond.

The young cast of The Me Nobody Knows belt out "Flying Milk and Runaway Plates". The 12 Toronto kids play New York Ghetto kids in the musical.

"The Me Nobody Knows"

Joyful show from the New York Ghetto

By DIANNE SHULMAN

The Me Nobody Knows is an engaging, frolicking musical, but underneath it is really a tragedy in disguise. The words and lyrics are drawn from the work of school children in the slums of New York, and many of them contrast grimly with the actors' smiles and the lilt of G.W. Friedman's music. But how else could the cast tell such a story and still entertain their audience?

And entertain they do. The cast ranges in age from nine up, and the enthusiasm of the younger ones more than makes up for their lack of technical skill. They dance and sing their way up and around and over and under the stage, thoroughly enjoying themselves. Even the littles ones got a chance at the spotlight, showing surprisingly good voices. But for all of his new-found status, I noticed that Trevor Wilson got a carefully helping hand every time he was due to make an exit. And where else would you see one of the players stopping in the middle of his big number to tie his shoelace?

The format of "The Me" etc. is very similar to that of Hair; twenty-one musical numbers punctuated by short intervals of spoken soliloquies, loosely linked together by an underlying theme, and utterly devoid of plot. But that is how it must be, and anyway, what story could possibly be more effective than the children's own words?

Underneath the success story of the production, though, is the real tragedy of the children who poured out their dreams and feelings in the words that the play is based on. And the reality can be a grim one. For example: Steven Wragg sings a triumphant song "Rejoice, baby brother was eaten by rats last night, let's all give thanks, now there's more food to go around!" And "If I had a million dollars, I'd buy my brother a shirt so he wouldn't wear mine." But they also sing about their hopes, their dreams, and the minor victories that somehow make the whole thing worthwhile. Like the baby apple that miraculously appeared in the spring just when the man who had planted it had given up...

The production itself had many rough corners, which ought to be ironed out by now. The orchestra played far too loudly; Trevor especially could not make himself heard. But the use of children's paintings projected on the set was a beautiful touch, and the entire production was choreographed.

Personally, I think that everyone ought to see this play, especially the young, because the problems of the ghetto are the problems of every humanist, and if they are not solved, the turmoil that results will not be stopped by the border. But even if you are looking primarily for entertainment, by all means go see "The Me". The music, the dancing, the set, the cast themselves, all are highly enjoyable. So go, relax, and have a good time, but do the kids a favour: don't forget that they're different precisely because of what they have to say.

HOW TO W

Big Hassel and Little Falsy

By RALPH BENDAHAN

When the commercial Hollywood producer realizes that there is a vast potential revenue from the youthful film viewer of today (i.e. Easy Rider) he sets out to cash in on it. The attempt is all clear in films like Little Fauss and Big Halsy. First one must choose stars that youth in general can identify with, in this case Little Fauss (Michael J. Pollard of Bonnie and Clyde) and Big Halsy (Robert Redford of Sundance Kid fame). The story must be simple and mundane so as not to confuse the audience. There must be a bit of action, not much, a bit of ass thrown about sparingly, if possible a kind of quasi-homosexual relationship and a good musical soundtrack. Little Fauss and Big Halsy is just that; in effect, a study in futility.

The story revolves around the motorcycle racing circuit in the States and the attempt of a poor run-down racer Big Halsy to make it to the top. Big Halsy meets Little Fauss who is a dumb, winsome, cute. Big Halsy then convinces Little Fauss that as a team they can "make it".

If the story itself sounds boring it may be because it really is. If the characters themselves seem able to be anything more than two-dimensional cutout dropouts from other more successful films, they're not. The only redeeming point of the whole film may well be the soundtrack. Johnny Cash really belches it out and hits home, but one must remember that this a movie, and not a record.

If anything at all need be said to Director Sidney J. Furie (Ipcress File) it would be possibly to remind him of the last two lines of the film. Those famous lines read thus:

Big Halsy: It ain't how you do; it's where you been.

Little Fauss: It's how you do. Halsy.

Chamber music given monotonous interpretation

By CHRISTOPHER HUME

The intimate recital hall which the Wymlwood Concert Series calls home is architecturally suggestive of a cosy evening of home movies. The smallest audience of chamber music habitués at last Sunday's compounded this impression. However, the music, of Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann and Debussy, seemed to demand concert hall dimensions.

The performers, Dennis Brott cellist and Stephanie Sebastian pianist, both bring excellent musical credentials with them. Brott, the youngest of the famous Montreal musical family has concertized widely in recent years, including an appearance with the TS last season. Miss Sebastian's piano career includes an appearance on Leonard Bernstein's Young People's Concert programme, second prize in the CBC Talent Festival and an appearance last year with Ancerl and the TS as winner of the Mozart Piano Concerto (remember Elvira Madigan?) Competition.

Their first piece, Beethoven's Seven Variations on a Theme by Mozart, lived up to our expectations. Brott produced a large expansive tone, and his intonation was mostly secure. His lower strings were especially powerful. Miss Sebastian was never overpowering which seems amazing, in retrospect. Her solo performances, Schumann's Sonata in G minor and Debussy's Estampes, were less reticent. Miss Sebastian's aggressive approach was at first exciting, then grew monotonous. She played continually on the upper dynamic levels, this with the piano top completely open.

Debussy's Estampes again suffered from the imposition of her heavy, almost awkward approval. The first of this set of three pieces, "Pagodes", lost any resemblance to "oriental music, and all thematic differentiation was buried. Debussy, always subtle, demands extremely sensitive playing here. The second piece, "La soiree dans Grenade" was rather too frantic to be an elegant Spanish affair, and the third, "Jardins dans la Pluie" was an absolute flood.

Mr. Brott and Miss Sebastian again collaborated for the final item of the evening, Brahms' Sonata in E minor, Op. 38. Their performance was exhausting rather than exhaustive, and the piece suffered from a constant struggle for control. This showed in tempi as well as in expressions. The opening Allegro was well proportioned with confident, almost relaxed, playing. However in the final Allegro fugato things grew hectic, in spite of some rather deft sight-treading in the piano part. The fugue was marred again by their fierce competition for loudness. Stephanie Sebastian won.

Hemingway's legacy disappointing, dull, confused

ISLANDS IN THE STREAM, by Ernest Hemingway (Saunders of Toronto, $11.95)

By STEPHEN CHESLEY

It was nine years ago that he committed suicide nine years ago. Forced to leave his beloved, relaxing Cuba, hounded by publicity, haunted by memories of irretrievable younger days, and overcome by paranoia, he ended it all with a shotgun blast. Now, like a crippled phoenix rising, comes Islands in the Stream, a new "novel" by Ernest Hemingway.

Between the time of The Old Man and the Sea and his death, Hemingway had plans for a trilogy of novels, about the Land, the Sea, and the Air. Islands in the Stream was to have been the Sea volume, but it was never finished. Hemingway called the series his "big book" or the "blockbuster".

Many changes were indicated in the manuscript. The editors, his widow Mary and his publisher Charles Scribner, Jr., claim that nothing has been added to the book, that the few cuts they have made would have been approved by Ernest, and that the "book is all Ernest's".

Editors may be so overwhelmed by the nature of their function as to need grand generalized statements, but saying that Hemingway is to blame for Islands in the Stream is ludicrous. It is simply so incomplete that Hemingway would never have published it in this form.

The protagonist of the novel is Thomas Hudson, a successful painter living on the island of Bimini in the Caribbean. Hudson is middle-aged, and as the novel progresses he loses his grip on his art, and becomes obsessed with his youth in Paris with Picasso and Joyce, his two unsuccessful marriages, and his difficulty in communicating with his sons. Through it all, he searches for the meaning of his existence.

Part I, "Bimini", concerns a visit by his three sons to the island home, just prior to World War II. Also there is Roger Davis, a boyhood friend of Hudson's, and a writer; Davis is experiencing a creative crisis and has sold out to Hollywood. Enter young Tom, David, and Andrew, and the stage is set for Paris reminiscences, fishing broadbill, drinking fun, and much education. Then a former female acquaintance enters and Roger leaves with her when the boys leave. In almost the last paragraph, Hudson learns that David and Andrew have been killed in a car accident with their mother near Biarritz.

The second section, "Cuba", finds World War II beginning and Hudson operating a disguised fishing boat as a submarine hunter; but here is in between trips. He spends most of his time drinking with a whore named Honest Lil, who is rotund and comforting. Finally Hudson's second wife, whom he still loves, enters and they retire to his home. We learn that their son Tom has been killed on a flying mission.

"At Sea", the final section, occurs during the war. Hudson is on his boat and is searching for a group of Germans who have massacred the inhabitants of a hamlet. Several skirmishes take place, and eventually a final confrontation, in which Hudson is fatally wounded. End of section; end of book.

So we are presented with threadbare Hemingway plots. But there is no coherence. Characters participate in one section and are never seen again. Often the style is clumsy; Hemingway was a master of repetition, as is shown in the first paragraphs of A Farewell to Arms where the word "and" creates a type of musical counterpoint. Yet so often in this work a caricature Hemingway style emerges, as practised by William Goldman and Mickey Spillane, that Hemingway himself raged against.

Hudson is always referred to as "Thomas Hudson", never by first or last name only, a device for boredom that Hemingway never used so constantly in his other books. Sometimes the dialogue passages are much too long, and often the description is not as vivid as in the best of Hemingway.

Yet there is much to admire. The description of David's battle with the broadbill in "Bimini" is as exciting and as involving as anything Hemingway ever wrote, reminding us of The Old Man and the Sea. The Paris passages in "Bimini", with descriptions of Joyce, Pound and various good times, are wonderfully alive. The dialogue between Hudson and his first wife in the "Cuba" section is as lyrically emotional as any between Frederick Henry and Catherine or Robert Jordan and Maria.

At the time of writing Islands in the Stream, Hemingway had certainly not lost his creative ability; A Moveable Feast was written at the same time and is one of his greatest books. Where then is the reason for incoherence, incomplete characterization, and clumsy style?

The answer lies in the fact that Hemingway himself was a compulsive reviser. The ending of A Farewell to Arms was redone thirty-nine times in manuscript and then thirty times in proof. His writing credo was to hone everything down to the bare minimum until he had the essence of the emotion, and the true emotion conveyed to the reader.

Islands in the Stream was never published because it was not ready for publication; the authority on that statement is Hemingway himself: he never submitted it.

Yet those responsible for calling it a novel when it is only fragments of one, and saying that that is "all Ernest's" which distorts Hemingway's creative process, cannot be punished for their deeds.

Hemingway was a master, and any Hemingway freak would be happy for a few morsels. But if you have never read him, do not start here, for your reaction could only be: Why does everyone say he's so great?

Of course if the book had been published, Hemingway would have been held responsible for any sloppiness, but this volume should not be called a novel, and in plain view should be the fact that it is an edited version. This statement is not pedantic, but anti-hype, as anyone who has seen the Book-of-the-Month Club bullshit will agree.

Islands in the Stream is really a book about Hudson's past; most of the time he thinks about former actions and mistakes and joys. Unlike Hemingway's other books, where the past greatly influences the present but where more space is devoted to contemporary events, most of this book is past occurrences seen now.

Perhaps Thomas Hudson sums it up best; while lying on the deck of the boat he thinks: "Do you remember when you used to sleep all night with the girl and always happy and never woke unless she woke you to make love? Remember that, Thomas Hudson, and see how much good it will do you."

Hudson, like Hemingway, knows he cannot recapture the past, yet at the same time is furious that it is over.

In the end, then, what are we left with? Marlene Deitrich, a close friend of Hemingway, once said of him that he has had the time and energy to do what most men only dream about, and to create it too. The last point is what we should all be thankful for.

Exciting Indian mime complex

By TED WHITTAKER

In The Seven Ages of the Theatre, Richard Southern quotes from a book about the Indian mime theatre, Kathakali, on the function of speech in that medium: it is "a needless burden on the actor and imperfectly equipped to discharge the function it was called upon to bear."

For the largely Western audience who saw the Kerala Kalamandalam Kathakali company perform in the Edward Johnson building September 9, such a statement might have afforded some comfort. The dialogue was chanted, likely in Malayalam, the language of the southern Indian province of Kerala, while the actors depicted part of the familial quarrel that is the spine of the Mahabharata, a Sanskrit epic.

Two sets of cousins wrangle for power, one cheating the other at dice out of his wealth, his wife, his five brothers, and his own freedom. The losers are exiled until, with the help of the god Krishna, to whom they are related by marriage, they fight their way gory back to imperial majesty, revenging the humiliation done them. (The programs didn't arrive with the actors, and parts of the audience made up their own interpretation of the plot during intermissions — the mythic process.)

The conventions of Kathakali are few and complex. The intricate mime and side-of-the-feet dancing directly correspond to the dialogue, but just a broad idea of the plot is conveyed to an audience unfamiliar with the dozens of gestures or mudras associated with the form.

Characters are identified, not stereotyped, by their elaborate makeup, which takes hours to put on. The makeup man is the most important member of the troupe, applying, for example, red beards for villains, green faces for more virtuous characters.

Kathakali has no movable scenery and few props. In Monday's performance, part of the first American tour the genre has had in since its birth in the 16th century, the entire scenic effect was achieved with a curtain held by attendants before the actors at the start of scenes, a few square boxes as thrones, such hand props as swords, clubs, dice, and a tiny oil-lamp symbolizing the sun.

The music accompanying the mime and chant was percussive, drums, bells, gongs, and a sort of combination drone-and-bellows. Those playing these instruments did so for over three hours, steadily and with only tiny rests. Their skill was great, appropriating sound to indicate snoring, or attend a battle, murder dice-throw, or seduction.

There were opportunities for mimic cadenza, in which an actor took the whole attention of the audience, gesturing so fast his hands couldn't be followed.

The drama was realistic, but was achieved by stylization and convention. Fights were dances. Squeaking, twitching villains were slain in plain view, with no knife but with great spitting of blood or with the drawing from the deep folds of their brilliant costumes the long red strings emblematic of their steaming entrails.

Richard Southern notes that Kathakali has never become popular in the West, perhaps because of its leisure and lack of concern with the mundane. Some productions last all night, while the actors' training (there are no actresses) takes 12 years and demands yogic devotion.

The plays are about gods and heroes, who don't act in time except in that the dramatist summons them. In an article on Kathakali in Realites, S. Bhagwasor quotes the sage Bharata: "The purpose of a play is neither to favour the gods, nor to present the true reflection of the world, but to imagine its movements."

One of the many characters from the Kerala Kalamandalam Kathakali, the monkey general Hanuman. Make-up takes more than four hours to apply.

Powerful rendition

Brecht's play on revolutionary tactics

By DEBBIE MINDEN

First year student actors under the direction of University College english professor Stephen Martineau have come up with a powerful rendition of Bertolt Brecht's play on revolutionary communism.

Measures Taken, written in 1930, is Brecht's discussion of the application of revolutionary tactics and what that situation means to individual behaviour. In a nutshell it deals with the conflict between individual and the structure/environment he or she is working and struggling in.

The play opens with four Communist agitators justifying the liquidation of a fifth for the protection of the party and the advancement of the revolution. As the play progresses, Brecht rules out any show of human emotion or pride as counter-revolutionary.

The fifth revolutionary, certainly not an orthodox Communist, calls for a passionate revolution based on injustices he sees with his own two eyes. But the party has a thousand eyes and sees that there must be a sane and orderly - if mechanical - revolution. The fifth revolutionary is killed and his revolution is squelched.

The actors, some with previous experience, some without, are competent and sometimes moving. Their combined efforts result in a smooth, flowing and imaginative production.

Each actor portrays several characters, and each slips easily and convincingly from role to role. Because Measures Taken is a stylized play, there is little character development, but the eagerness and ability displayed by the actors in their roles are evident.

Besides being a terse and effective statement on communism, the production shows that there is hope for drama in the university.

Measures Taken will be played today, tomorrow and Friday at 1 p.m. in the University College Playhouse (89A St. George). Next Week it will be on with another one act play - Exception of the Rule by Brecht - at 8:30 p.m. in the UC Playhouse.

Residence questionnaire favours co-ed living arrangement at UC

Students in UC's Whitney Hall and Sir Daniel Wilson residences are requesting coed housing, although there is disagreement as to particular arrangements.

Results from a questionnaire which were tabulated this week showed that most residents wanted the change. The questionnaire suggested either living in alternate male female rooms at Sir Dan's, or separate wings segregating men and women, at Whitney Hall. In the latter case women's privacy would be insured by fire doors with an alarm system between men's and women's quarters.

Out of 232 women at Whitney Hall, 201 replied; 145 accepted the proposal, 47 rejected it; 93 were in favor of the separate wing conditions at Whitney Hall, 62 favored alternate rooms at Sir Dan's.

At Sir Dan's, of the 183 men there, 162 responses were received; 141 accepted the proposal, 21 rejected it; only 8 preferred living at Whitney Hall, the other 144 preferred the arrangement at Sir Dan's.

Would deal with cases like Ryerson Press sale

Liberal minister predicts ownership policy

Ottawa may have "comprehensive" policy on foreign ownership next spring to deal with problems such as last week's sale of Ryerson Press to an American firm, said federal cabinet minister Herb Gray at Hart House Monday.

Gray, the Federal Minister of Revenue, and Ontario Liberal Leader Robert Nixon, were speaking to about 40 people at a Hart House meeting sponsored by the U of T Liberal Club.

Gray said that he doubted that the federal government had power to intervene in the Ryerson sale. He discounted the Denison Mines precedent because "There is no analogous legislation on publishing", which would give the federal, as well as the provincial, governing jurisdiction.

In any case, he said that he "disliked ad hoc action".

The government's new policy will come in the form of a statement to Parliament "early in the new year", he hoped. Future legislation will be retroactive to the date of the statement.

Gray also gave a lesson in political theory, saying if you are displeased with the government, "use the power of the ballot box".

Robert Nixon charged that "The government of Ontario has done practically nothing" about the Ryerson sale. He claimed that either government should have the power to intervene.

Nixon did not appear very interested and left shortly after the formal questioning ended.

Awards to ease disappointment

While this year's edition of the grid Blues fell a trifle short of their Yates Cup target, it appears there will be plenty of individual awards to ease a little of the disappointment.

Canada Sports Digest, a rather obscure group that publishes a monthly newsletter, has had the wisdom to select no less than four Blues to their All-Canadian college team for 1970. U of Alberta Bears, who finished second out west, were the next highest team with three.

Chosen from Varsity were full back Glen Markle, center Rich Agro, defensive end Alex Squires and Eric Walter as a defensive back.

The final OQAA stats also show several Blues atop individual categories.

Markle won the scoring parade with 42 points on seven touchdowns. Queen's fine place-kicker Doug Cozac was second with 39 points on six field goals, 19 converts, and a pair of singles.

Despite missing the first league encounter with a muscle pull, flashy split end John Chapman led all pass receivers with 425 yards in 25 completions — a good post-pattern ahead of Western's Mike Tucker in second place.

Rookie defensive back Pete McNabb, who specialized in thwarting last-minute scoring threats, finished as the loop's top pass thief with eight interceptions. He also converted his steals into the most yardage with 147.

Playing only five league games, sophomore quarterback Wayne Dunkley ended up second in yards gained passing and first in completion percentage.

In team totals, Blues displayed a balanced attack as they finished second in both rushing and passing and were tops in first downs.

On the negative side, however, Toronto led in both the fumbles and penalties race.

The league all-stars will be announced shortly.

By LYNDON LITTLE

With only three games remaining to be played in the 77th interfac grid season, Victoria College is the only team with a playoff spot clinched.

The first and second place squads in the first division, and the winners in the second and third groups advance into the playoffs a week from today at the Stadium.

Here then, are the various possible permutations and combinations.

PhysEd and Engineering meet this afternoon in the final first division match.

If the plumbers can defeat the jocks by four points or better, then they can claim second place with Vic finishing first. An Engineering victory by three points or less puts Vic first and PhysEd second. However, a PHE triumph would give them top spot with Vic taking second.

In the second division, the title goes to

Dentistry unless the UCers can whip them by more than 29 points when the two meet in the regular season finale tomorrow.

Forestry and Trinity appear headed for a first-place deadlock in the third division with the lumberjacks taking first place on points spread unless Trinity can maul Pharmacy by some inhumane score in this afternoon's other game.

Vic wrapped up a playoff spot Monday afternoon as they took a hard-earned 20-1 decision from St. Mikes. In the process, however, they earned the ignominious distinction of having yielded the only point SMC scored all season.

But St. Mikes came up with a sound effort and at one stage in the third quarter it appeared as if they were going to turn the game around.

With Vic holding a slim 8-1 margin, a bomb to speedy flanker Paul Sheehan and a roughing penalty gave St. Mikes an excellent opportunity to score the tying points. However, a third-and-goal situation gamble fell just inches short and Vic took control of the ball — and the game — at that point.

Fullback Bruce Carroll on a ten-yard run and flanker Sonny Wade on a pin-point pass from quarterback John Baird scored majors to put the game out of reach.

Joe Cornacchia with a single off a wide field goal attempt plus a convert, and tight end Quick on a long pass from Baird scored the other Vic points.

Mike Damer registered St. Mikes' point when his long field goal effort in the second quarter went wide and through the end zone.

In other action this week, Forestry trampled and pampled New College 27-0 while Scarborough edged Meds 18-6. Both games were played in the slop yesterday.

Forestry got TD's from Rick Souter, Dave Wright and Bob Giza while Bruce Pamplin kicked a single, intercepted two passes and ran one of them in for a touchdown.

In other action this week, Forestry trampled and Pampled New College 27-0 while Scarborough edged Meds 18-6. Both games were played in the slop yesterday.

The mulock final is set for two weeks tomorrow — that is if there is anything left of the Stadium field after the College Bowl teams get through with it.

Oh yes, one final note. The Varsity Sports Department's interfac pigskin sleuth, Paul Raphael, would like it to be known that he considers the Scarborough cheerleaders to be without equal in the mud.

Hockey Blues drop Yeomen 5-4

By PAUL CARSON

By a score of 5-4 the hockey Blues last night finally broke the York jinx. But to do so, they had to survive 60 minutes of jungle warfare at the York Ice Box.

Bolstered by 500 screaming animals and aided by somewhat lax officiating, the Yeomen attempted to run Blues out of the rink.

A series of punishing body checks and diligent fore-checking constantly disrupted Varsity's attack.

Trailing 1-0, Blues tinnally sprang to life mid-way through the second period when York winger Steve Latinovich was assessed seven minutes in penalties for carving up veteran winger Terry Peterman.

With Latinovich off, rookie center Ivan McFarlane tied the game from a goal mouth scramble. Suitably patched up, Peterman returned and a converted Brian St. John's pass-out for another marker.

Then, with York two men short, Western Mustang transfer Brent Inlath put Blues up 3-1 on a deflection of defenseman Dave McDowall's shot from the point.

York cut the margin to one goal on three occasions but lanky Grant Cole in Blues' net made a clutch save in the dying seconds to preserve the win.

Captain John Wright and Peterman on a perfect pass from Gord Davies notched breakaway goals in the third period.

Blues outshot York 33-20 and, thanks to Latinovich, the Yeomen had a 17-16 minute edge in penalties.

Blues now meet their traditional rivals, the Loyola Warriors, Friday night at Varsity Arena in preparation for their first league match at Western next Thursday.

University and City hold hands to expand and exploit

By GORD FLOYD

EVERYONE AT THE University of Toronto has felt some of the effects of the city messing around with the St. George Campus. We've bitched for years about the fact U of T, Canada's largest university has no student centre, the fact that thousands of students risk their lives crossing St. George St. everyday, and the fact that housing around the university is becoming more and more scarce, upsurging residents and students.

But what filters to us and the press is but the tip of the iceberg. And needless to say the city has some kind of support, soppy as it may be, from the university for its plans to gouge through the centre immigrant areas, swelling around its edges.

The incident that has been receiving the most ink recently, is that of the proposed widening of St. Joseph Street. It is unique in that for the first time the City is wagging a finger at the university and telling officials no, they can't have things their own way all the time.

WHAT ARE SOME OF THE WAYS the city has taken to muck up the campus, both with and without the university's approval?

Many of them are contained in the City's Chief Planner's report dated October 13, 1970. And one can best see how thick the City and the University are, by reading the minutes of the City — U of T Liaison Committee, composed of distinguished Board of Governors and notable city politicians.

The City's accommodation to University expansion plans is criminal. The Planner's report states:

"Most of the St. George Campus has an R.4Z.4. (zoning) designation . . . There have been some suggestions in the past indicating that R.4Z.4, being basically a residential category, does not provide sufficient flexibility for the University buildings in terms of use, coverage, setback limitations and open space requirements.

St. George is still closed despite City offer

"Perhaps in order to facilitate the University of Toronto expansion program, it would be more appropriate to re-zone the area, or to develop a new zoning designation in order to replace the present practice of providing individual zoning exemptions for individual buildings."

The same report makes a recommendation that the university be asked to set up a permanent planning body with the authority to prepare and carry on continuous planning programs for University development and a further recommendation:

"That the City of Toronto Planning Board maintain a continuous liaison with the existing University Planning group for the purpose of preparing any necessary amendments to the Official Plan or Zoning by-law."

WHAT ARE THE OTHER LITTLE SURPRISES in store for us?

The plan designates the area south of Bloor Street and East of Spadina for Institutional Use. Of the more than 100 buildings the University presently plans to demolish, approximately 90 are residential structures. Two are north of Bloor and three south of College.

The University is not only being allowed to destroy area legally within its purview, but is not even being hampered when it steps outside of its legal boundaries . . . zoning is changed by the city to make room for the giant.

The City has also accepted the University's intention, as outlined in "Planning Consideration — St. George Campus, 1970", to expand into the entire area bounded by McCaul, College, Huron and Dundas, thus squeezing out what's left of Toronto's Chinatown, since the New City Hall routed the Chinese from that area.

AND THE CITY IS ALSO planning to extend the central core area from University to McCaul.

It's not enough that the University owns almost all of Queens Park (except for the site of the legislature buildings). The City tucks away a chuckle at this. . . it's a very powerful little piece of green bargaining tool.

The University also owns almost all of Queen's Park Crescent (except from the short stretch from Wellsley to the lights at Victoria College, near the new Academic building.

If the University decided to close their part of the Crescent no one could do a thing. And cars coming from St. Joseph Street would be able to travel only a few hundred yards in both directions before jolting to a stop at a dead end.

About four years ago the university was offered by the City, the road allowance for St. George Street, which could have then been cut off from traffic and grassed. THE UNIVERSITY REFUSED THE OFFER. The City wanted a portion of U of T's holdings in Aura Lee in exchange.

And those holdings in Aura Lee have a rather interesting history.

The City tried to get a grasp of the holdings from the University in 1967, for half a million dollars. But the University traded with one of Toronto's biggest developers, Greenwin Corporation.

GREENWIN HAS JUST SOLD the same piece of land for $1.5 million. In its trade with Greenwin, U of T picked up a playing field at the corner of Robert St. and Sussex. About one third of that land is now vacant, and is not maintained. There are no playgrounds for children in the area.

When the Sussex Area Resident's Association approached the University for permission to use the field when it was free, they were told to talk the City into paying $1,200 a year for the area's maintenance. Only after long battles with the City were the residents able to get the money so their kids could play in the lot.

But the Sussex area residents are in for more harsh treatment. When it became apparent that the proposed Spadina Expressway was going to cut into the campus between Washington Ave., and Harbord, the Board of Governors proposed that the offending ramp be swung to the west instead, to save the university, but at the same time, this will rear a gash in the surrounding community.

"WE DO HATE TO EXPROPRIATE people though," Bissell commented lethargically in an interview earlier this year.

In the same interview, Bissell contended the original assumption of expansion south of College St. was that of a slow growth over a period of years taking over occasional properties for residential and other needs.

However, it is his opinion now, that the university has waited too long.

Included in the proposals for the area is an area allotted residents housing 1,800 students.

Where will it all end? View south from the UC tower shows residential land scheduled for rape by university.

But Bissell was quick to add that the University never really endorsed the idea of closing Beverly St., between College and Dundas.

THERE ARE NO STUDENTS on the City-University Liaison Committee. Mind you, the student aspect is not entirely ignored, even if only acknowledged in a rather paranoid way. The rush overtones of certain recommendations are, at best, questionable:

"There are many factors which indicate that many aspects of our earlier plans for development must be reviewed and re-assessed. Among these factors . . . are the following:

. . . The probability that a new governing structure for the University will be developed which will permit greater participation by academic staff and students in the development of plans for the University . . ."

And here are some of the things the University has in mind for the northwest corner of its property:

- The Ontario College of Education will take up the entire Bloor-Spadina-Washington-Huron block.

- A new men's athletic building will be built at Harbord and Spadina. This building will have a tower to accommodate Health Services, and the Arts and Science overflow from Sid. Smith.

- Innis College has been scrapped, and will continue to be housed indefinitely in makeshift quarters — maybe not too bad an idea.

- Walker Hall, between Washington and Sussex on Huron, will house the Business School and the School of Social Work. The Extension Department and the Institute of Criminology will also move in.

- "Under this plan it was felt that the boundary of Spadina could best be utilized by the area Cooling Plant and Parking Garages, with superimposed high-rise office, housing or apartment facilities which may be required in the future."

THERE ARE TWO PROPOSALS for 'vehicular movement' on the St. George Campus. One has St. George St. closed. The other has St. George St. about 50% submerged. Both have, to date, been scuttled by the City.

There is another aspect to the plans for cars at U of T that the City can't touch though. This is the part that proposes nine, yes, I said nine, parking garages on campus.

In outlining the University's planning principles to City Council, the Chief Planner presented 8 points contained in the Master Plan Framework. Among these are:

1. That enrollment will be held at some 24,000 students. . .

2. That holding at the above enrollment in no way assumes that floor space and land needs will also be held constant. On the contrary space needs of all kinds will continue to rise. This implies a need to purchase more land, erect new buildings and rebuild existing facilities as, and when, they become obsolete.

3. That every attempt should be made to achieve the optimum use of land so as to save on acquisition costs, reduce City assessment losses, and to keep the Campus as compact as possible. This implies new development of a higher density than in the past and, wherever possible, the multi-use of land.

5. That essential parking needs be resolved by the provision of permanent parking facilities on the campus.

6. That gradual provision be made to meet certain housing needs on Campus."

"ALL INTENTIONS OF EXPANSION south of College Street have now been abandoned by the University." Just take a look at the accompanying map.

"During 1969, the residents north of Harbord Street and west of St. George Street started to view the University as a serious threat to their neighbourhood and expressed their dissatisfaction with the way the University was encroaching on their area at several meetings with University officials. The University has responded to the residents' concern . . ."

That sounds like it must have been taken from a University report. It's not. That is a line apparently swallowed whole by the City. Maybe that has something to do with the importance given to Ward aldermen at City Hall. Our senior alderman is June Marks. She voted for widening St. Joseph St., for building a police tower in Winston Churchill Park, and for almost every developer's scheme she's seen in the past year. Her junior partner, Horace Brown has a somewhat better record, but seems unable to take a sufficiently strong position to stop the worst abuses of University power.

One last point. Among the aims of the Lisison Committee is: "The integration of the University with the adjoining communities and the elimination of much of the traditional conflict between "Town" and "Gown".

Well, at least one of their aims is noble.

Wild Willy leads the Circus

THE CITY HALL CIRCUS may not be the greatest show on earth, but you've gotta admit, they have the classiest big-top around. And performers! Have they got performers, you ask? The likes of which you have never seen before, (lucky you), are not seeing now, and in all probability will never see in the future!

Nevertheless, these are people of inimitable talents, (a few even better than the bump-and-grinders at the Victory), and stamina so amazing that they can prolong one act (the Riverdale Community Organization Death-defying Double-whammy Inconclusive Nullifier for example) for hours after they have put everyone else to sleep.

And now, to meet the stars of our show (yes, yours and mine). Here's hoping you like them, because this show runs for two more years.

PERSONALITY AND ENTHUSIASM. That's what makes a good ringmaster. And we have one of the most personable and enthusiastic ringmasters around, Wild Willy Dennison. He brings zest and excitement to every show with his never-ending string of quips and stories, fit for the hearing of even your grandmother's clergyman. He is particularly impressive at the beginning of the show when he speaks most decisively: "Go-od Sa-ve the Queen" and "Oh Canada", Our fa-th-er, Who art Then the show is underway.

As master-of ceremonies, it is essential that Wild William keep up with the action at all times. So don't be fooled by those frequent questions like "where are we?", "when did you say that was?", and "what do we do?". These are all accompanied by a sheepish grin, an immediate cue to laugh along with the riotous escapade.

But not all is fun-and-games with this ringmaster. He demands (and from some people actually gets) strict adherence to certain fundamental policies concerning the circus. First and foremost he believes in maintaining the purity of the circus as an art form, and will not tolerate any performers who play to the crowd, particularly the "communists" therein who tend (occasionally) to boo. This is not to say that our ringmaster is not concerned about the audience — he is, in fact, an ardent supporter of wider aisles in the grandstand for improved flow, and safety.

At 65, Wild William has been around the circus long enough to know all the ropes, and of course he's had time to tone his personality and enthusiasm, too.

BUY THIS NEXT MAN a new whip for Christmas. Lion-tamer extraordinaire at the City Hall Circus it falls to 'Slash' Rotenberg to handle not only the jungle beasts, but that equally terrifying animal, the City Hall Circus budget. What, in less capable hands, would be an excruciatingly difficult task. Rotenberg handles with the cold, hard-headedness of any lion-tamer. Other people might flinch when asked why Pollution Probe can't have as much money as the Grey Cup Parade. Not Rotenberg. His chair has fended off many a Ratepayers' organization, his whip has cracked at many an expressway foe.

And in this vein, it must be said that we have a lion-tamer with a heart. He is indeed a very generous man. He has selflessly agreed to spending your money to widen any aisle that Works Commissioner Brenner suggests, and is even promoting a 12% raise for Mr. Brenner, presumably as a token of appreciation from the Circus, for the excellent crowd control measures he has instituted.

One very interesting aspect about 'Slash' Rotenberg is his impaired vision — he is far-sighted. He is always looking forward to the day when the Big Top will be lined with concession booths, and he very often promotes applications by corporate concerns for the available spaces, even when it means ripping out a few seats. But he realizes that this is what the Circus most needs, and that whether or not the audience knows it now, they'll be glad in a few years that once they had a lion-tamer who couldn't see straight.

One very seldom gets an opportunity to talk to the stars of the circus. But in this respect also, the City Hall Circus is a little out of the ordinary. All the performers communicate with the audience once every three years, and, when convenient, at other times. One of those 'other times' occurred last week when I was able to listen to the tight-rope walker of the City Hall Circus at an informal gathering. His name is William Archer (he's been around long enough that a statue at the entrance to the big-top bears his name.)

THE DISCUSSION was a wide-ranging one, hitting such topics as his relationship with Ying Hope, his partner on the high-wire, ("I have stated publicly that I don't trust him"), his attitude toward the corporate concerns-wishing to operate the Circus' concession booths, ("they are not bad people"), and the general philosophy behind his act, ("I try to do what's best for the people").

Mr. Archer feels that his antagonism with Mr. Hope might be causing the routine not to function at the optimum level. In elaborating his philosophy, he gave a brief demonstration of his ability to balance on a tight line, as he expressed a desire to work with members of the audience, even organized groups, so long as those groups were "responsible". He avoided performing his thrilling Spadina Turnabout, undoubtedly one of the most exciting manoeuvres to be seen at the City Hall Circus this past year.

And what's a circus without a clown? Freddie Beavis is one of the best in the business of making people laugh. His most popular routine is the recitation of a clever doggerel about himself:

Hi, I'm Folksy Freddie Beavis
 I'm as Canadian as the beaver,
 Those who say, "that man should leave us!"
 Will have to use every wedge and lever.
 I get all upset for a leaky roof,
 And from R.C.O. I want to see proof
 That they'll leave me alone,
 And that their speech, in tone,
 Will be friendly to all
 At City Hall.

THE CROWDS ROAR at this (and unless Commissioner Brenner's widened aisles join up, try to stampee too). Freddie's philosophy is very similar to that of Wild William Dennison (in fact, identical, if one goes by their voting records), and, like Dennison, he is a man motivated by certain profound principles. One may cite, for instance, his sense of outrage when asked by the Zero Population Growth group to incorporate some family planning material into his routine. "I think we should be offended", he said. But Freddie is seldom offended. He recently came under fire from John Sewell (the man they shoot out of the cannon) for his act in which he throws mounds of paper into the air, and completely covers the floor of the big top. Sewell suggested that rather than burning all this paper, some of it could at least be used to light the cannon, or patch the roof, or even be gathered up and thrown into the air in a second show.

Sewell termed the process one of recycling waste paper. Freddie termed the criticism a "facetious" one, and like the comedian he is, just laughed it off.

There are of course, many other stars in the City Hall Circus, but most occupy the realms of the sideshows. There is for instance, the strongman, Tony O'Donohue, who has recently been rehearsing his new act of picking up all 18 floors of Rochdale College from the corner of Huron and Bloor, then dropping them and smashing the entire building to bits. And there's the two-headed lady, June Marks. Actually the two heads are only an illusion produced by the simultaneous speeches against rabble-raising clergymen, and for 'our city's loyal employees'.

CLOSER ANALYSIS REVEALS that these two sentiments are obviously the product of the same mind. That master of the sleight-of-hand, Paul Pickett, is another notable. One moment he's there, standing right beside you, and the next, before you can blink an eye, he's voted to build a police tower in Winston Churchill Park, or to widen St. Joseph St., or to tear down a building at Bloor and Yonge.

Step right up, come in under the Big Top and see the City Hall Circus. It comes to town every second Wednesday at 2 p.m. and admission is always free. Thrill as 'Slash' Rotenberg tames the lions with his whip; wait in suspense as Bill Archer sways from side to side on the high wire — you know he's going to fall, but which way? Delight in the antics of Freddie Beavis and his trained seal, Tom Clifford. And the sideshows are guaranteed to amaze you. Really.

"Rabble-rousing red guard"

Riverdale Association threat to powers at City Hall

By MARY OMATSU

The degree of effectiveness of a community organization is dependent on a great many factors: the issues of the area, the class nature of the area, effective community organizers, a community solidarity and often as not, the attitude of the alderman of the ward. The discussion becomes more difficult when removed from the abstract to the concrete.

One of the city's most vocal, and in some senses, most successful community organizations is the Riverdale Community Organization in the Riverdale area of wards seven and eight.

Although still in its infancy, the RCO is composed of scores of tiny neighbourhood associations, whose prime concern is the maintenance of the area they have lived in for generations, better education for their children, better housing for the money they pay, the abolition of absentee landlords, etc. What they are demanding is control of their community.

The organization was boosted through the efforts of Don Keating an advocate of "people power" who is described as "a Communist agitator," a man of "suspicious" motivation, and a "trusted and well liked friend of the people of Riverdale," by city officials who see their power threatened.

The RCO believes that "good community organizing is people building their own influence but not by using links with places of influence like City Hall but by dealing with the institutions and people directly responsible or accountable for their problems.

Confrontation is a good word to those rank and file citizens who have come to realize that democracy operates on the basis of pressure and that pressure is created by money.

The RCO, relative to other groups in Toronto is militant but according to Alderman Clifford, alderman for the area nothing but a bunch of "rabble rousers and agitators," whose methods Dennison, in the face of threat, finds comparable to the Chinese Red Guards.

Apart from all this paranoid hysteria, the RCO has stood up to some hard scrutiny. All the aldermen complain, in varying degrees of annoyance, the RCO doesn't publicize its meetings, and when it does invite its aldermen (Jaffary, Sewell, Beavis and Clifford), they know that they will come in for "some" grilling, heckling, and name calling.

At a meeting held several weeks ago, about the Commissioners' Street Incinerator, the RCO gave the aldermen a rough going over. In the words of the Ward Seven paper, "It was the old story of 'don't confuse me with facts.'" The people had decided to stop the pollution NOW, and nothing was going to make them listen to anything else."

It is just one year since Keating came into the Riverdale area. In that short space of time, he has managed to convince the formerly "dead" citizenry that they have power if they want to use it. By finding small immediate problems that could easily be solved, Keating has produced a Pavlovian stimulus-response mechanism. He has been criticized for "inciting" the citizens about issues that could have been resolved simply by telephoning the local alderman. But the lesson wouldn't have been learned, unless the Riverdale people themselves experienced the small successes that have been theirs.

Sociologists say that the lower class has difficulty planning for the future, that life for them is lived day by day. One wonders why. Perhaps it is too much to ask of anyone, but hopefully Keating will be able to organize the Riverdale community behind issues that lie in the future. Issues that will in all eventuality affect them adversely unless they are prepared to fight for what they want.

Unless Keating and the community are able to bring this about, the RCO will probably die within two years. This has been the experience in many American cities: that after two years time, most of the little annoyances eg. absence of stop signs, sewers, trees, etc. have been eliminated and that unless the people have the ability to grasp the larger issues, the organization perks away.

Certainly, the fact that he has managed to overcome the widespread lethargy of the poor, and they have some measure of pride in their power to change their environment, deserves praise. As Jaffary said "Maybe we don't like Keating, but he wins, and very few organizers and community groups are winning."

Attending an RCO meeting is an experience in itself. It's the best of Marx's "lumpen proletariat". Generally they know what is in their best interest, but they tend to see issues and statements very simplistically. Over and over the chant, "Are you for us or against us?" It's like watching the Great Beast awakening, from its bed in the primeval mud, still sluggish and clumsy, but then it's been asleep for too long.

Big bad boy Lastman pulls big bad publicity stunt

Mel Lastmen, the "ten month rookie" controller from North York, and owner of the chain of Bad Boy stores appeared before Metro Social Services committee on Thursday the 5th. Described as "one of the snazziest dressers on Council", Lastmen unfortunately doesn't apply this type of fastidious attention to his political homework.

Lastmen wanted to start an investigation into what he called the "800-900 fraud cases" that cross the Welfare Department's desk. He felt something should be done "about the bad apples, who are giving welfare a bad name", namely the "hippies, the unemployed, the old age pensioners, and the deserted wives." Talk about hitting the down and out.

In a kind of hucksterish "you ain't heard nothing yet, folks" type of muckraking, Lastmen tried to illustrate his case with an unfortunate example. Going into the many and various ways some welfare recipient had managed to manipulate the system, Lastmen failed to reveal the most vital piece of information why the Welfare Department had decided against laying charges — namely that the man had been in and out of mental institutions and wasn't to be held responsible for his actions.

When Lastmen was accused by East York mayor True Davidson of trying to do the Morton Shulman trick, and of "possible political motives" behind his popular (at least in some circles) reactionary stand against welfare, millionaire Lastmen sheepishly said "well, I'm only a simple business man, I still haven't learned the ropes."

This type of defence didn't hold too much water among the committee members, however.

When asked by the City Solicitor to disclose the name of his informant, Lastmen refused. The Committee passed a motion to set up a commission to investigate who the leak in the welfare department was, and in Karl Jaffary's words "If Lastmen doesn't reveal his source of information to a judge, he will be sentenced to jail, for contempt of court."

Lastmen apparently didn't know the seriousness of his charges. He was accusing the City of "unlawful behaviour", and his proof was an illegally gotten document. The names and information about welfare recipients is private and the disclosure of such facts is illegal.

But trying to fight for motherhood, right, law, and justice certainly isn't as easy as selling colour ties, as Lastmen discovered.

Citizens find frustration at 'public meetings'

By MARY OMATSU

Every Tuesday evening before Wednesday's city council meetings citizens have the opportunity to voice their opinions, and perhaps influence the voting at council. Initially organized by Bill Archer, John Sewell, and Bill Kilbourne, Citizen's Forum is a loosely organized collection of "interested" people, who want to know what is going on in City Hall.

Formerly the meetings were wide open, and very well attended. Now issues are slated for discussion and attendance has fallen off. Aldermen tend to shy away from the Forum because often as not they are subject to grilling and embarrassing questions. And so, except for Sewell and Jaffary, who are two of a small handful of aldermen, sensitive to their constituents' wishes, aldermanic representation at the Forum is scanty.

Perhaps because the only aldermen who attend are open to criticism and discussion, and vote as their electors would have them, is the main reason why people no longer attend the meetings. There is a sense of futility, because the men who citizens would like to question, and who yield the most power on council never present themselves to this type of forum or scrutiny.

This is a short report of what took place at Citizen's Forum, the 27th of October.

Dorothy Thomas was speaking about her experience at the "public meeting" of the Harbour Commission on Monday, the 26th:

"I went down to the Harbour Commission Building and said I had come to attend the public meeting, the secretaries, three of them, had a little conference, to see whether or not they should admit me. Upon agreeing, they then ushered me into a large room, with wood panelling, thick carpeting, and crystal chandeliers.

They motioned to three leather chairs, and told me to sit in one of them. The five members of the Harbour Commission, looked at me over the tops of their glasses, as if to say what are you doing here, and I looked back at them over the tops of my glasses to show that I knew that something was going on. I heard them talk about how sad they were a German sailor had died in the harbour, about buying furniture, and topics of such merit. Then they looked at me and told me that I was to leave. The meeting was now closed to the public — In the public interest."

The second incident was more sad than amusing. The secretary of the Harbour Commission, in a reply to a request to appear before concerned citizens re: Cherry Beach, at Tuesday's Citizens' forum meeting, said that commissioners did not have to report to the public, that it had been done only on two previous instances at the request of the majority and consequently one would appear at the meeting to represent the Harbour Commission.

Whereupon a blonde haired youth, expressed very naively, de Tocqueville's theory of grassroots politics. He demanded, "Why can't we go to the mayor and say, would you please ask someone from the Harbour Commission to answer our questions? And then the man would come, and we could find out the things we need to know. But we have to act fast, or it'll be too late, and the whole Cherry Beach thing will be passed. But I'm sure, that if the mayor knows how we feel, he'll do something."

After he was finished, there was a short embarrassed silence, then a mixture of laughter, sighs, and groans, as people said, "if we had such a mayor", or "come now, what do you think this is, a democracy?"

Cramped space, bad conditions: all for luxury prices

By John Seaman

BRIAN AND RITA SHAUGHNESSY, tenants at the Married Students' Residence at Charles Street, have been pitted in a legally lopsided contest against the full coercive power of Ontario Housing Corporation (OHC) acting through its baby body, Ontario Student Housing Corporation (OSHC).

The Shaughnessy's, with a total income of about $4,000, have been taken to court by OSHC for non-payment of rent. It is virtually certain, given their legal position, that they will face eviction as a result of this court battle.

Legally, of course, the Shaughnessy's are in court as individuals for breach of contract. In reality, however, they are in court as full representatives of almost 300 families who throughout August and September withheld $50 from their rent in protest against inequitably high rents and against a situation in which they have no control over the managing of their buildings and the conditions of their tenancy.

IN A PROVINCE where tenants associations, collective bargaining between tenants and landlords, and rent strikes are not recognized by law, it is a natural consequence that the Shaughnessy's and other tenants have no legal recourse when they attempt to fight for their rights as tenants. It is also a natural consequence of such a situation that legally rightless, persecuted tenants will be harshly dealt with by morally rightless, prosecuting landlords.

It was not until labourers were able to shake off their apathy, to organize into associations, and to force governments to recognize legally the right of their associations to bargain with their employers over such issues as the rate of wages and the general conditions of labour that even the least critical observer of nineteenth century society could legitimately claim that labourers had acquired a position which was not totally powerless and totally degrading to their human dignity.

Similarly, it will not be until tenants are able to shake off their apathy, to organize into associations, and to force governments to recognize legally the right of these associations to bargain with their landlords over the issues of rent levels and conditions.

BUT THE DEVELOPMENT of Tenant's Associations has not been allowed to go on without the harassment of landlords. The record of OHC in this respect is no better than that of private landlords, and, in some respects, its activities are even more disreputable.

Tenants have been, however, considerably less successful in having their Tenant's Associations recognized by landlords as bargaining agents.

The tenants at the Charles Street apartments have had little difficulty in realizing that the history of their occupancy of these buildings has been the history of major and minor grievances and inconveniences.

The site, the general design, and the construction were originally a part of Rubin Corporation's plan for two downtown luxury swingers' apartments. Under pressure to find suitable housing for married students, OSHC entered the picture in time to prevent Rubin Corporation from going bankrupt.

THE RESULT OF THIS timely intervention was the construction of two OSHC married students' residences near the corner of Yonge and Bloor Streets. The change from Rubin Corporation to OSHC involved, of course, the removal of all the luxurious elements entailed in the initial plan; it did not, apparently, involve much change in the price of renting the apartment units. Comparison with the luxury apartment adjacent to the married students' apartments indicates that the students pay 2 cents more per square foot than the swingers across the street.

The two buildings were ill-designed to serve the needs of the student tenants. All the delights of luxury living: $\frac{3}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ inch gaps under their doors; of playing on gravel fatuously defined in advertising brochures as landscaping "desirable for young families;" of crowding their nearly 600 children into a playground area where each child could have 3 square feet of land to play on; of staging a long fight — successful for one year — to prevent OSHC-OHC from leasing the playground area to Rubin Corporation which had intentions of putting up a one story commercial development on it; and of rankling over the sparkling description of the two buildings in the brochure which the U of T Housing Service initially handed out to the unsuspecting tenants.

Thus, married students have had to live with the excessive inconveniences resulting from poor planning in which they did not participate but for which they would pay (and pay well).

They pay for kitchen cupboards and drawers falling off the walls, closet doors continually falling off their tracks, — poorly insulated and caulked windows and doors (useless for keeping the cold air out but handy for gaging the velocity and direction of the wind), — an erratic heating system continual breakdowns of elevators and laundry facilities.

The creation late in 1969 of a Policy Committee composed of representatives of OHC, the University of Toronto Housing Service and Housing Committee, Montreal Trust (who by contract with OHC currently manages the building in return for $80,000 a year), and the Tenant's Association appeared to the more optimistic to legitimize the grievances of the tenants in the eyes of OHC and to provide a channel through which grievances and needs could be directed and dealt with.

BECAUSE OF THE PRESSURE placed on OHC by the Tenant's representatives on the Committee, some of the more pressing problems of the tenants were successfully dealt with. But more prevailing was the indifference of OHC and managing officials to the needs of the tenants.

It was not uncommon, for example, for OHC representatives to contradict or deny their statements written into the minutes of the previous meeting. In another instance, the manager of the building denied the existence of a heating problem until hundreds of tenants signed a petition confirming that they had indeed problems with the heating. At first he replied that the heating problem was basically a nationality problem, Canadians finding it too hot, and "others," primarily from the equatorial areas of the world, finding it too cold.

But a more serious blow to the pretensions of the Policy Committee came a few months after its inception. In a rare show of concern for the welfare of the tenants and in a customary demonstration of the level of awareness permitted by a bureaucracy, OHC suggested the formation of a policy committee composed of representatives of all concerned to assist and improve communication between OHC and tenants.

It was through this Policy Committee that, late in the spring of 1970, OHC-OHSC announced its intention to raise rents in the married students' apartments, an increase which in some cases would amount to as high as $12.

Already, the present rent structure — without the prospective increase — was beyond the limits of many married students seeking accommodation there; and it was dangerously close to being prohibitively high for those students already renting in the buildings. A survey conducted by the Tenant's Association indicated that the median income of the tenants in the two buildings stood at $4,500. Reckoning by this figure showed that the majority of students were paying well over the maximum of 25% of income for rent guideline established by the Federal Minister of Housing. In many cases, it was found that rent consumed between 50 and 60% of the students' income.

IT BECAME CLEAR that the married students' residences would become the haven of only the few rich students or else the student apartments would have to be filled by non-students. On either alternative, the stated aims of both OSHC and the University of Toronto — namely, to provide residency for married students at low and reasonable subject only to a yearly cash grant covering municipal services and enabling the tenants' children to go to school. This demand — would result in a further rent reduction of $30 per month per apartment.

The Tenant's Association's Brief was submitted to the University and OSHC early in June.

In response to the Brief and the massive tenant support behind it, OSHC reviewed its budget for the buildings — a budget, which neither OSHC nor the University would reveal to the careful scrutiny of the Tenant's Association — and decided that it could afford to freeze the rents at their present level for another year.

At first sight, it appeared as if the tenants had won a victory. Yet, they had only succeeded in obtaining a stay of execution: OSHC made it clear rents would increase considerably in September, 1971.

By the end of June, apart from the promised rent freeze, OSHC showed no indication that it was considering the Brief or that it had even received it. An overwhelming majority of tenants then voted to go on rent strike. They also demanded future participation in the management of the buildings. The strike was due to start on August 1, a move intended to give OSHC another month to reply and to take some steps towards negotiations.

A few days before the rent strike was due to begin — Mr. Paul Goyette, Managing Director of OHC, issued two letters. The first addressed to the Tenant's Association, acknowledged in two sentences receipt of the Tenant's Association's Brief seven weeks after it had been submitted. The second letter, tactically and tactlessly circumventing the Tenant's Association, was sent out directly to each individual tenant and contained an intimidating reminder that withholding rent would constitute a breach of contract.

TENANT AND PUBLIC SUPPORT for the rent strike grew quickly. By the end of September about 300 apartments, nearly half of the total, were withholding rent, and canvasses by the floor representatives indicated that another 50 to 100 apartments would join the strike in October.

Public support was equally encouraging. Endorsements came in from several federal and municipal officials and organizations such as the Ontario Tenant's Association, the Metro Tenant's Association, and the Metro Labour Council. And the Star and the Telegram later reversed their positions and came out in full support of the striking tenants. But neither the University nor OSHC-OHC intended to be influenced by public opinion.

Before October arrived Mr. Goyette unveiled OHC's mailed fist informing the Tenant's Association that unless back rents were paid by October 1, OHC would begin eviction proceedings against those withholding rent.

The Tenant's Association could capitulate or act. It could have capitulated, but that was clearly a degrading and repugnant course of action. Capitulation was therefore overwhelmingly voted down. The opposite course of action, viz., that 300 people go to court to face certain eviction was certainly unacceptable because of the enormous costs.

It was, therefore, decided by the Tenant's Association to send one volunteer representative to court with both full moral and financial support. This, it was thought, would make it clear to the public and to the government that the tenants who were on rent strike were prepared to pay their inequitable rents only under extreme coercion.

Implicit in the student tenants' demand for lower rents is, of course, a much broader issue, namely the issue of tenant participation in decisions vitally affecting them as tenants. This includes not only the right of Tenant's Associations to negotiate over rent levels, but also the right of tenants, through the instrument of their associations, to participate in the management of their buildings and in the decisions generally affecting their tenancy and living environment.

The threatened increase of rents, then, only added certain — and possible fatal — financial injury to the insult of living in poorly planned and poorly constructed residences.

The Tenant's Association first step to analyze the financing and mortgaging of the two buildings and to present their analysis in the form of a Brief both to OSHC-OHC and to the University of Toronto.

The essential part of that Brief indicated not only that the rent increase was unnecessary but also that an alteration in the legal ownership of the mortgage could result in a rent reduction of approximately $50 per month per apartment. And because the Tenant's Association did develop a concrete and reasoned critique to the current financial arrangements of the married students' residence, it is important to understand in some detail the reasons for and the nature of that critique.

The first part of the tenants' counter-proposal was based on a critique of the nature of the mortgage held by OSHC in terms of OSHC's claim to be a non-profit corporation. The rents paid by students over the 50 year life of the mortgage are geared to pay in full the costs of capital construction, of the ongoing maintenance and management, and of the land on which the buildings stand.

These terms fulfil what OSHC defines as "full recovery." But, by the terms of the mortgage, the land and what remains of the buildings will redound to the owners, OSHC, and that land is presently valued at approximately 3 million dollars.

Despite the fact that the married students' residences are designated as University of Toronto residences, they are, in fact, owned by OSHC and stand on land not owned by the University. This means that the tenants are forced to pay full municipal taxes, putting them in the unique position of being the only buildings connected with the University which must do so.

THE TWO BUILDINGS ARE UNIQUE in another sense as well: OSHC developments at other universities in the province are all built on University land, — the brief legitimately argues that the married students' residences should be owned by the University.

They asked the University to acquire the mortgage for these buildings from OSHC and apply to the provincial government for a land acquisition grant to pay off that portion of the mortgage. This would place the residences in a relatively tax free position —

The walls are crumbling around Toronto's ancient educational system

By EILERT FRERICHS
U of T United Church Chaplain

PEOPLE POWER has come to the Toronto Board of Education, the establishment sometimes referred to as "the Kremlin on College Street"; as a result, the walls which have been carefully built around Toronto's education system and its inner workings are slowly crumbling. Its officials are becoming more accessible and responsive to people, the secrecy which used to surround many of its decisions is disappearing and observing Board meetings has become a very popular past time.

At the same time, teachers in the Toronto system are becoming more militant, as they see popularly elected trustees beginning to question some of the more silly and out-dated practices of the schools, such as rules about dress and hair and even methods of maintaining discipline in the classroom.

Very quietly and surprisingly peacefully, Toronto's first community-controlled school is being planned in Kensington by the Board and an elected Citizens Committee. This process has been going on for the last six months and is a sign of the kinds of changes which are hitting the educational establishment in the city.

The Board administers some 150 schools, thousands of teachers, a huge budget and, sooner or later, the lives of most children and their parents. It is the modern institution carried to perfect heights, a deeply entrenched interest-group with immense power which it does not hesitate to exercise. Twenty-two elected men and women are responsible for the exercise of this power. SOME OF THE NEW TRUSTEES, elected last December, are trying to do more, however. Trustees such as Nelson, Cressy, Scott, Rose Fraser, Frost, Shannoff, Matthews, Barr and to some extent Charleton are only too-well aware that some very drastic changes have to be made in the system in order to make it more flexible, to make it more open to participation by parents and students, to gear it less towards middle class goals and values. Frequently, of course, the Board of Education is used as a stepping stone towards greater political heights, or as a reward for faithful political service.

Trustee Yip from Ward 6 falls into the latter category, Barry Lowes (Ward 11) and Bill Charleton (Ward 5) belong to the former. One trustee sees sex education as a communist plot while others have tried (successfully) to eliminate the prayer before the Board meeting. Most of them, however, have a very genuine concern for the quality and direction of education in this city.

The proposed ($150,000) task-force on education in the inner city is one example. It is being set up in response to a brief submitted to the Board last year by some mothers from the Trefann Court area and is intended to take a close, highly critical look at education in the inner city. Many people, including the Trefann mothers have made the discovery that despite all the special services the Board provides, kids still don't really like school, that the system still serves fairly narrowly defined class interests, that kids sometimes don't learn to read and write, that the children of the poor are often streamed through "opportunity classes" into vocational schools and when they graduate from these schools, they can't get a job.

ANOTHER EXAMPLE WAS the appointment last summer of a new Director of Education, the top official in the system's administrative hierarchy. Many trustees saw the appointment, quite rightly, as the most important decision they would have to make during their three-year term of office. The new trustees further saw it as a test of their political and ideological strength, for they were faced with a choice between two men: Jones, a local man who had come up through the system and was now looking forward to achieving the pinnacle of any educator's career: the directorship of the Toronto Board of Education. The other serious candidate was John Bremer, an Englishman, the darling of liberal educational circles who was well-known for his daring and radical educational experiments in Philadelphia.

It boiled down to a battle over the future direction of education in Toronto: Jones, the choice of the establishment, the safe, status-quo man, or Bremer, the Saviour. Bremer was chosen. But Bill Davies at Queen's Park in effect disallowed the choice of the Toronto Board because of a technicality (Bremer did not have the correct certificates, and all his degrees and experience and ideas really did not matter in Davies' eyes). In the face of this massive assault by Queen's Park, the Toronto Trustees caved in and appointed Mr.

All of this leads one to wonder whether the argument between the liberals and the conservatives is not really a waste of time, since the real enemy appears to be more and more the Minister of Education himself. The issue, of course, is local autonomy, as the people in rural Ontario know only too well. For the amalgamation of local school boards all across the Province (apart from raising the taxes) has tended to destroy local autonomy quite effectively and to centralize decision-making in ever fewer hands, all in the name of administrative efficiency.

QUEEN'S PARK AS THE ENEMY also emerged recently in the planning for the West-Central Public School in Kensington. As readers of The Varsity will recall, a couple of years ago SAC acquired a site in Kensington in order to build a high-rise residence. SAC's plans had to be abandoned in the midst of charges of bad faith, double-crossing and inadequate consultation between the people in Kensington and the SAC. Whatever the truth of that matter may be, one thing is certain: SAC secretly sold the land it had bought with a provincial grant to the Toronto Board of Education, despite the famous Grossman promise.

Allan Grossman, it will be remembered, is the Minister of Reform Institutions in the Roberts Government; he happens to be the M.P.P. for St. Andrew-St. Patrick which includes Kensington. During the 1967 election campaign, he had promised the people in that area that no major changes would take place in their community without prior consultation with them. No one in Kensington, therefore, was very happy with the SAC's sale of its land to the Board of Education.

In May this year, despite a prior promise to consult with residents about the proposed school, the Board sent letters to home-owners on Oxford and Lipincott Streets inviting them to sell their homes to the Board. The word "expropriation" was mentioned twice in the letter, even though this course of action was not directly threatened.

To the people involved, however, the implications were clear. After some tough political manoeuvring, the Kensington community persuaded the Board to rescind its May letter and to engage in a serious consultation process with the people. As a result, two workers from the Board spent all summer in the community to find out if people really wanted a school and what kind of special facilities should be included in it. This is the first time this has happened in Toronto. A Citizens Committee was elected in late August and planning for the school began in earnest.

Two weeks ago, Queen's Park evidently decided that enough is enough and that this local control movement was getting put off control. It so happens that the acting president of the Kensington Area Residents Association, a member of the Citizens Committee, is also the NDP candidate against Grossman in the next provincial election. THE ATTACK WAS rather clumsy: one of Grossman's minions wrote a letter to the Board claiming that the Citizens Committee really was not "representative", a claim which would in effect have scuttled the Committee and the work that had been done all fall and summer. He even produced a couple of home-owners who claimed to be quite willing to sell their homes to the Board, since they feared that property values would plunge once the school was built. This was a particularly clever tactical move, since the Citizens Committee had decided that no homes should be destroyed for the sake of the new school, a decision which the Board had accepted. In fact, the Board had just stalled a recommendation by its own officials that more properties should be bought in order to enlarge the playground for the school.

Trustees Fraser, Frost, Yip and Rose who had been working with the Citizens Committee realized the threat posed by this challenge. They understood that Queen's Park was behind this move and held their ground. Round 2 clearly belonged to the People.

Naturalists plan anti-can mail campaign

By TOM WALKOM
Premier John Robarts may receive 34,000 empty soft-drink cans in the mail, if the campaign of a conservationist group succeeds. Spokesman for the Federation of Ontario Naturalists explained the plan at a press conference yesterday as a measure to pressure the Ontario government into banning the sale of non-returnable bottles and cans in the province. British Columbia has already banned the non-returnables in a bill this year.

The campaign involves sending labels out to member and affiliated naturalist groups in the province. According to FON executive director Gerald McKeating, the club has 7000 members, 5000 affiliated members and 22,000 junior members.

Wayne McLaren, another member of the executive, also suggested as an alternate means of protest that shoppers could return their empty cans to the retail stores where they were purchased.

According to Dr. Martin Edwards, a Kingston physicist who last year directed a provincial inquiry into the use of diazonal on Toronto Island, any pressure to oppose the FON campaign will come mainly from the large retail stores that find it too costly to handle returnable bottles.

Edwards would not comment on whether there existed big business pressure groups which were preventing the government from enacting such an anti-litter bill. McLaren however was amused by leftists who blamed pollution on the capitalist system.

If the FON anti-litter bill is passed it will spell an end to soft drinks in the present steel and tin cans since these are almost impossible to recycle.

City Council votes widening of St. Joseph's St. by four feet

By MICHAEL MAZUREK

City Council voted last night to go ahead with the widening of St. Joseph's Street between Bay St. and Queen's Park Crescent — but only by four feet.

It had originally been proposed that the road which passes through St. Michael's College be widened by six feet, but Alderman William Archer convinced his fellows that such would not be necessary if parking were abolished.

"Everybody here is in sympathy with the position of SMC," proclaimed Alderman Reid Scott, "but all facts and studies indicate that there is no way we can prevent St. Joseph's from becoming a major traffic artery."

Alderman William Kilbourn clamoured for Council to take steps to see that the use of cars in the downtown area be discouraged, but this merely brought an outcry from Alderman Hugh Bruce.

"The U of T has plans for a 4,000 car parking facility in the downtown area," he charged, waving a document which substantiated his claim. "Obviously, it is not against its own cars coming downtown . . . it just doesn't want the workers, whose taxes finance U of T's $80 million annual grant, using the downtown roads."

Illich, Cardinal at OISE talk

Ivan Illich and Harold Cardinal will be among the speakers for the concluding session of the international Teach-in "Crisis in Development" at the Ontario Institute For Studies in Education this weekend.

Illich, the founder of the Centre for Intercultural Documentation in Mexico, which trains volunteers to work in Latin America, will speak Friday evening at 8 p.m. on "Over and Under Development."

Cardinal, author of the Unjust Society, and President of the Indian Association of Alberta, will speak at 9:30 a.m. Saturday on "The Canadian Indian Nation and the Third World", and at 11:00 a.m. both will conduct a discussion of "Education as Cultural Diffusion".

Cardinal helped draw up the Red Paper, the Indians answer to the government white paper on Indian Affairs, and now organizes for the Indians in their movement for real equality.

The teach-in will also feature a discussion with Harry Magdoff, a teacher at the New School for Social Research in New York, and President Evans only political activist in new rah-rah VUSAC

VUSAC elections results indicate a victory for the socially minded politicians as the majority of the winners pledged support for school-spirit raising activities rather than political action. Brian Evans, victor in the presidential race with 242 votes, is the exception.

Other winners were: Finance Commissioner, Doug Blair 426; Education Commissioner, Debbie Lewis 350; Social Activities, Doug Hurst 272; Internal Affairs, Jack Basey 219; Members-at-Large, Marilyn Waugh 349, Randy Echlin 209; SAC rep, David Cuthbertson 240.

Referendum offers students participation

Reaction has been swift throughout the faculty of Arts and Science to Wednesday's announcement of the coming referendum on the restructuring of the Faculty Council.

Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allan said that he "applauded efforts to get more students interested and involved in the governing structures of the faculty." He said it would be unfortunate for students if they continued in their general withdrawal of interest from the different levels of authority, as they had been doing for the last year and a half.

History professor W. H. Nelson said it was pointless to try to settle the issue until the whole university had a new top governing structure, for only then could it be seen what inferior bodies should be like.

Indications are, however, that many students are still vague about what the facts are, and that they still see the Faculty Council as some mysterious power, very distant from their everyday lives.

Brian Morgan, a spokesman for the group of students who withdrew from the Council, said "most students just don't realize how personal to them the work of the Faculty Council actually is."

He went on to say that "the referendum has really become the whole issue of student participation in this faculty. The real question is how many students will see their involvement in the process of their education as being just as important as which books they have to read and when their next essay is due. Students must realize that they can help determine the conditions under which they live."

SAC University Commissioner

Peter Hall said he thought "the referendum represents the last chance for students to secure a strong voice on a body which deals with the gut issues of their education."

In an effort to inform students about the work of the Council, a pamphlet entitled ARE YOU A MEMBER OF THE FACULTY

OF ARTS AND SCIENCE? was put out on Wednesday. It explained how the Council controlled admissions into Arts and Science, the courses that are taught there, and whether there should be exams and graded marks in each subject. It revealed that, contrary to popular belief, petitions do not go to a higher celestial authority for judgement, but come to a committee of these same mortals.

Apparently few students had a chance to read the pamphlet, for it was discovered in a number of spot interviews yesterday that veil of ignorance still concealed the issue. One student, who refused to be identified, said he wasn't taking any interest.

When to get up and walk out.

Every company who can make it will be there, including us. Every company will do its level best to get bright, ambitious and qualified graduates to an interview, including us.

Then how come we're talking about you leaving the interview, when we're trying so hard to get you there in the first place?

Simple. We believe if you know when to walk out, you also know when to stay, and why. We base this odd little theory on what we've found out about interviewing strangers. The ability to come face to face with strangers happens to be our bread and butter. Our very life depends on it.

We've written a booklet on the subject. It's called "How to separate yourself from the herd." Its thrust is to help you handle an interview on your own terms. It talks about nervousness and money and the length of your hair. It talks about the guy across the desk from you. It even tells you about when to leave an interview. Things like that.

Our eight page booklet is tucked into The Employment Opportunities Handbook, which is also new. You'll find it at the placement office.

"How to separate yourself from the herd" won't make any magic between now and your first interview.

But it just might help.

FRAP claim Drapeau win not overwhelming

QUEBEC (CUP1) — Paul Cliche, leader of the Montreal municipal party Le Front d'Action Politique revealed facts and figures about the recent Montreal civil election to a press conference here Wednesday that show Mayor Jean Drapeau did not win the overwhelming victory he has been claiming.

Surveys show that there was a mass turn out of voters in the over 50 age group but there were practically no voters in the 18 to 25 age group (the group which is suffering from the greatest unemployment).

Simpson speaks today at protest meeting on War Measures Act

By IAN MACLAREN
Penny Simpson, who was arrested in Montreal under the War Measures Act will speak today at 1 p.m. in the Hart House Debates Room, as part of a nation-wide protest against the WMA.

Simpson has been touring Eastern Canadian Universities since her release three weeks ago after being held incommunicado under the act.

The meeting at Hart House is part of a nation-wide Day of Protest against Repressive Legislation called by a meeting of 28 university presidents in Winnipeg, October 30, and is a response to the appeals of Le Comité Québécois pour la défense des libertés.

The motion to take part in the day of protest was defeated at a SAC general meeting nine days ago, but was passed Wednesday night amidst the congenial atmosphere of the Trinity Buttery.

Also slated to speak is Michele Bourdon of the Confederation of National Trade Unions who was fired by the CBC last week because of his criticism of Radio Canada's coverage of the War Measures crisis.

Simpson is a proponent of the theory that the WMA was invoked not just for the FLQ but as a governmental instrument employed to crush the left in Canada.

Speaking at Dalhousie University last Wednesday, Simpson stated the purpose of her campaign: "We want to find out what our rights are and keep them. We must work to keep the few rights we have on paper ours, because Canada has lost the idea of democracy."

The overall turnout was 50 per cent of the 700,000 eligible voters. FRAP won 45,000 of these votes but not one seat on the 53 member council.

Cliche also told the press conference that he is demanding FRAP pass an anti-FLQ resolution or accept his resignation. The FRAP executive voted against such a resolution Nov. 8 and in the past they said they supported the aims of the Front de Liberation du Quebec although they clearly condemned its tactics.

Cliche said FRAP will disintegrate if it appears to condone FLQ violence. "Our party has always used normal, non-violent democratic methods, despite the repeated dishonest provocations of Mayor Drapeau and M. Marchand."

Cars out in future environment

By IAN SCOTT

York University brought the classroom into the community Wednesday night at Trinity Church.

Through many power failures, it presented its first of three meetings on urban environment.

"The car is a victim of a lot of controversy," stated a chief Detroit engineer from Chrysler, amongst guffaws from the audience.

Metro Traffic Commissioner Sam Cass, supporting the continuance of cars in the downtown core, said "People want the freedom of choice."

J. Vardon, director of the Transportation Division of the Metro Planning Board, expressed a pessimistic outlook.

He stated, "By 1995, we will spend a billion and a quarter dollars on transportation and the average speed on the expressways during rush hour will be about 12 m.p.h. In 1964 it was 17 m.p.h."

"Those of us in the downtown area will all be living in apartments. So we have to get away from surface transportation. The subway is the answer," said Baker of the Toronto Transit Commission.

In defence of the automobile, Cass stated that only 7½ per cent of the people use rail transportation and so the car is performing a valuable service.

"But 66% move by public transit during rush hour, the only crucial time," replied Baker.

Interfac teams head into Mulock finals

By STAN KOROLNEK

As the Interfaculty football regular season came to an end yesterday, only three of the four teams to play for the Mulock Cup have been decided.

As it stands now, Vic will play second division winner Dentistry in one semi-final while PhysEd will play either Trinity or Forestry in the other one.

On Wednesday, PhysEd clinched first place in the tough first division by holding an extremely strong Engineering squad to a 3-3 draw. The plumbers had to win this game by at least four points to make the playoffs.

For the third time this season, PhysEder Gene Vincez accounted for all his team's scoring. With three minutes left in the game, he came on to kick a long 35-yard field goal to tie the match.

The Engineers actually outplayed PhysEd but could do no better in the scoring department than Doug Ellsworth's 25-yard field goal in the second quarter.

On the second-to-last play of the game, Ellsworth tried another long effort but his kick fell short.

The entire PhysEd defence played its usual excellent game while the offence sputtered in the slop that is called a football field.

For the Engineers, center Paul Fletcher played his usually reliable game. Eng. coach Paul Rocks (another ex-Riverdalian) has been declared coach of the year by a select panel of judges.

Notes: Trinity destroyed a hapless Pharmacy team 53-0. In other action Dents edged UC 2-0. St. Mikes did not use speedster Gerry Ryan in their loss to Vic on Monday. They also passed up a chance to play former city all-stars John Horyn and Bill Altan.

Field hockey females fight to finish

By JUDI BOWNESS

The women's interfac field hockey season ended on a clear, cold day last Friday afternoon on the Trinity field as PHE (I) edged PHE (II) 1-0.

Ann Chalmers, PHE (II)'s aggressive center, finally broke the scoreless deadlock as she beat PHE

(III) goaltender Lynne Bustin.

Many thanks to all our interfac players who withstood chilling winds and dampening rain to make this a very successful season.

Congratulations to the worthy winners for their persistence, perseverance, and perspicacity!

Theatre in Toronto is nowhere, it seems, when it comes to an audience. Imported works with advanced publicity may break all box-office records like Hair.

The St. Lawrence Centre season opened last Tuesday with Christopher Fry's A Yard of Sun. A fine cast (and what's more a repertory cast, who will be appearing in several of the productions during the season) an efficient production, and a fascinating play, it is always with Fry, a little wordy. It would be pleasant to hail the fact that some type of city-sponsored theatre was a fact.

plays, two of them by Nobel Prize winner Samuel Beckett, and three by Francis Warner, poet and don of St. Peter's College, Oxford.

The plays include Beckett's latest work, Breath, a 36-second exercise in intense concentration without actors or words. This will be the North American premiere. Also, featured is Beckett's famous dramatic, Come and Go. Warner's set of three plays is entitled Maquettes, first performed last July.

"Pandora's Movie Box" at Theatre Passe-Muraille, 11 Trinity Square, will show a WC Fields double-bill on Wednesday, Nov. 18 at 7:00 and 9:15. The films are Million Dollar Legs (1932) and The Pharmacist (1933).

At Cinema Lumiere next week are: Nov. 14-18, Pasolini's Teorama; and Nov. 19-21, Night of the Living Dead. Show times are 7:00 and 9:30 with an additional 4:30 Sunday screening.

SALT

The established American movie industry has produced thousands of films, but none of them deals with the real interests and struggles of working class men and women. "Salt of the Earth" does just that. Depicting a 15-month-long strike at a New Mexico zinc mine in 1951 and 1952, it was made in the middle of the McCarthy era by a group of blacklisted movie people in conjunction with the actual miners and their families whose story is told.

Conceived in struggle, it had to fight for survival. Before it reached the screen the leading actress was jailed and deported, the distributor was called before HUAC, two union halls and one miner's home were burned, and attempts were made to sabotage showings. From criticism and rewriting of the script at mass meetings, to changes made during the shooting, it is a people's production, the first and only working class movie ever to come out of a capitalist country. As such, it is a testimony to the unity, courage and determination of all involved.

The movie "Salt of the Earth" is being shown by the Canadian Party of Labour at 2:00 p.m. Sunday, November 15, in the International Student Centre, 33 St. George Street

ROCK

There is little happening on the Toronto music scene this week. Seals and Crofts, who were to have been reviewed in this issue, will not arrive at the Riverboat till this weekend. They will hopefully be followed by Tim Hardin.

York will sponsor concerts by Malka and Bruce Cockburn (who made an impressive appearance on Peter Gzowski's unimpressive show last Thursday) over the weekend.

Upcoming concerts include Tom Rush and Livingstone Taylor; James Taylor, Leonard Cohen, Miles Davis, and the Van Morrison concert which was cancelled last month.

Rod McKuen comes to Toronto on the 23rd and 24th of this month. New College and SMC present Mainline and Jason, two reputable Toronto bands in concert on the 19th at Convocation Hall for a mere $1.50.

Ballet High featuring the Hoyal Winnipeg Ballet and Lighthouse will be seen on CBC on the 25th at 9 p.m.

Here we go again! Hockey opener tonight

By LYNDON LITTLE

With several newcomers cast in leading roles, the curtain goes up tonight on the 1970-71 hockey season as the local heroes, a talented troupe known as the Varsity Blues, meet the Loyola Warriors of Montreal.

In truth, it might be more accurate to say Blues are about to embark on year 0001 AL (After Laurent). For, it is generally regarded as of no small significance that the now completed five-year career of Paul Laurent coincided exactly with the team's four national championships in five seasons.

In all, Tom Watt's shiny group will introduce to the crowd eight fresh faces. How far the team goes this year will depend largely on the reviews these players earn.

"One thing for certain," says Watt. "I've never had as much depth as this year. But, whether our starting 17 players will be as strong as last year is another question."

IT WILL COME as no great revelation that the primary reason for Blues' success in the past decade has been the continuing quality of their center ice men.

Unfortunately, the tradition will be extended for at least another year.

Back to patrol the center lane for their third and fourth seasons respectively are John Wright and Brian St. John.

Wright, who has been selected as the new team captain, was the league's top marksman last year while St. John rejected tempting pro offers from the Boston organization to remain at Varsity.

Brent Imlach, a Western Mustang transfer who needs no introduction to Blues' fans, and Ivan McFarlane, a freshman from Copper Cliff, will provide additional strength up the middle.

Blues should also have the wingers to take full advantage of the talented centers.

Skating on the port side are two of last year's bumper rookie crop, Bill Buba and Nicki Holmes. Joining them will be Gord Davies, a regular with the Marlies last year, and Danny McCann a solid performer with Loyola in 1969-70.

John Wright

ON THE RIGHT FLANK, Watt is counting on productive seasons from two accomplished third-year men, Terry Peterman and Mike Boland.

Peterman has a proven touch around the net while Boland provides Blues with much-needed muscle and, after some exposure to pro hockey at the Springfield Kings camp this fall, could explode as a scorer at any time.

Scott Seagrist, who once had a brief stint with the Jr. A Oshawa Generals, and Kaz Lysionek, a mainstay with the Laurentian U. Vees last year, are the new right wingers on the roster.

At one point, it looked as if the defense might be a possible area of concern. Two of last season's regulars, Dave Field and Bob Hamilton, having departed.

However the sudden appearance, out of the woods so to speak, of Nelson Dehenedet and the return to form of smooth-skating Brent Swanick solidifies that position.

Terry Parsons, Dave McDowall and Bill L'Heureux are the other defencemen.

The goaltending department will be handled by sophomore rubber inspector Grant Cole with Tom Little in reserve.

WATT APPEARS SATISFIED with the team's showing to date which has included the 5-4 decision over York on Tuesday and non-games with Orillia Terriers and the Metro Jr. B Nationals.

Blues opposition tonight, Loyola, are a team which had for the most part a tremendous season in '69-70 but which saw them bow out of the national finals in the first round.

They have lost star winger Mike Lowe to pro hockey but the core of the team is a back intact.

Blues split their games with the Warriors last year. They won the first match 7-4 at the start of the year, then suffered a 10-4 thrashing in the final of the Centennial Tournament over Christmas and played to a 2-2 draw in the third match played at Varsity Arena.

Notes: McDowall and L'Heureux have been selected as the alternate captains for the coming season.

Soccer team miffed at game cancellation

By DON McMAHON

For the first time in my five-year university sports beat, a team I was involved with were unable to complete their inter-collegiate schedule.

It came as a shock and annoying revelation to me that the game against Guelph for the Soccer Blues had been cancelled because neither Guelph nor our own Athletic Department were too enthusiastic over the idea of putting out the money and effort required to play the game.

The reason was, in short, Blues were out of contention after their McMaster game — so why waste money and time for a "nothing game".

Some people do not seem to understand that soccer players are interested in one thing, PLAYING THE GAME. We find it a disgrace and an insult to our athletic spirit to have the prime consideration in inter-collegiate competition to be cash!

The players and coach had been canvassed after the Mac game concerning a Wednesday game at Guelph — which had to be postponed from two weeks before due to bad weather. All were unanimous in their desire to finish the schedule.

Perhaps it is a disease or hangover from the record of the Soccer Blues' first few league encounters which prompted the office to disregard our wishes and cancel the game.

But in the future, a more realistic approach might be to seek the players opinions and then make the decision — not the reverse!

For those soccer buffs who want winter entertainment, plans have been discussed with the Varsity team players to perhaps hold a two-day clinic some time in the new year featuring World Cup films and instruction for regulation, tactics, positional play etc.

The final OAAQ western division standings have McMaster on top with 13 points, Western second with 12 points and Blues next with 11 points in seven games. Guelph follows with six points and Waterloo trails in the cellar with two.

Blues record was two victories, one defeat and four ties with 17 goals for and 12 against. Their top scorer was Ersin Ozerding who notched seven goals, four of them off penalty shots.

The team MVP was captain John Cobby.

Next year's squad already looks good with the loss of only two or three veterans at the most. Most of the Blues play during the summer and with the usual excellent training and one-year's experience adding to their natural ability the 1971 edition will be a winner for sure.

FLQ defends Lortie, reveals escape plan

MONTREAL (CUP) — Francis Simard and Paul and Jacques Rose were in the apartment when police came to arrest Bernard Lortie last Friday, according to the FLQ communique received by the left wing weekly Quebec-

Presse Saturday night, and printed in their paper yesterday morning.

Although newspaper reports have claimed that Lortie turned himself in, the newest communique denies this. In fact, the communique demands that Lortie's name be added to the list of 23 political prisoners the front wants liberated.

"Führer St. Pierre" refers to Maurice St. Pierre, head of the Quebec Provincial Police, who, under a provincial law passed last year to deal with emergencies, currently controls all federal, provincial and municipal police forces in Quebec.

The communique was sent by the "Information-Viger" cell, in collaboration with the "Financement-Chenier" cell because "it is in the general interest that clarifications be made concerning the different information circulated in the 'establishment press.'"

"Contrary to what the authorities in power want people to believe, Bernard Lortie did not squeal, and he was not a traitor.

He acted as he should have (as we will show), and for this reason his name must be added to the list of the 23 political prisoners whom the FLQ demands be liberated," said the communique.

It continues: "When the police came on November 6, our four hunted comrades were inside the apartment, along with the two young women.

"The 'facist police' knocked, then they broke down the door (as is their habit).

"The two women and Bernard Lortie (who was inside an ordinary closet) were arrested. The other three had time to get into a hiding place they had built themselves beforehand.

"The three FLQistes stayed in their hiding place for 24 hours," said the communique.

"Saturday night at 6:30, the two police guards left for supper, leaving their guns in the apartment. At this point our three comrades escaped by the back door of the apartment which was barred from the inside. They didn't forget to take the arms which had been left inside through an excess of negligence. The Front thanks them," said the communique.

"Before leaving the place, Francis Simard, Jacques Rose and his brother Paul took care not to close the opening to their hiding place, and to leave their fingerprints everywhere: in spite of this, police have not divulged the facts, preferring instead to make Bernard Lortie look like a traitor and thereby smash public sympathy for the FLQ," the communique said.

The Communique was signed. "The Chemer cell will continue the fight. We shall be victorious."

Speaker sees WMA as sledge- hammer

By PHIL MASTERS

Penny Simpson, held under War Measures Act for 6 days, speaker at a meeting last Friday held as part of the nation-wide Day of Protest against Repressive Legislation, called on students to fight for their rights as Canadians to "end persecution of Quebec militants."

The Day of Protest was called by 28 university student council presidents in Winnipeg two weeks ago in response to appeals of Le Comité Québécois pour la défense des libertés.

Simpson sees the major problem in Quebec now as a symptom of frustration. "Everything comes to nothing — a dead-end." Attempts to deal with such social problems as poverty, housing, an archaic educational system, and the undermining of French language and culture have all been frustrated. The Quiet Revolution of 1960 came to nothing and the result was a turning towards terrorism.

The government "just let things sit — and boil," she said. And now it has arrested the very people who tried to tell it of its problems.

"Did the War Measures Act save Laporte, find Cross, or destroy the FLQ?" Simpson asked the audience. "Are such sledgehammer tactics the only solution?" She said that civil rights of this country can be suspended in a matter of hours, and as a result Quebecers have a narrow choice: Canada with its repression, brutality, futility, — or Independence.

"We across Canada are not at all willing to give up our rights to their (the government's) ephemeral, hysterical reaction. Our right to dissent, to live and not just exist, is at stake, and we are the people to fight," said Simpson, urging joint action with the federal caucus of the NDP.

Commemorated on this Chinese stamp, Bethune is almost unknown to Canadians. See page 5.

Bethune unknown at U of T

Norman Bethune, the Canadian surgeon who served with Spanish Republican forces during the Spanish Civil War and later died while serving with the revolutionary army in China, died 31 years ago this week.

His death will not be marked by any official services in Canada.

At the University of Toronto, Bethune's alma mater, his name remains almost unknown.

Dean of Medicine A. L. Chute, commented last night:

"I know absolutely nothing about him, probably less than you do. All I know is that he went to China."

Chute thought that Bethune was a graduate of McGill University, although Bethune did, in fact, graduate from U of T's medical school during World War I.

"I don't know a thing about him," Chute added. The U of T library has one copy of Bethune's biography, The Scalpel, The Sword, written by Ted Allan and Sydney Gordon. The copy is in the stacks of the Biological and Medicine library.

Monroe barred from Miami

Trevor Munroe, a Jamaican political scientist scheduled to take part in an International Teach-in this weekend was barred by American officials from making a 15-minute stop at Miami airport on his way to Toronto.

Munroe, who was unable to book a direct flight from the West Indies to Toronto would have had to switch planes at the American airport which would take only 15 minutes, said a spokesman for the Teach-in.

The Jamaican is a teacher in the faculty of government at the University of West Indies and one of the founding members of Abeng, a radical weekly newspaper, which has now disappeared.

This week-end's wind-up of the teach-in, labelled "Crisis in Development" also suffered from the loss of other key speakers.

Harold Cardinal, one of the creators of the last June's "Red Paper", an Indian answer to Ottawa's white paper on Indian Affairs, was involved in a traffic accident on his way to Edmonton airport to attend the Toronto Teach-in.

C. L. R. James, a 75-year-old Trinidadian and friend of Trinidad Prime Minister Eric Williams was unable to travel to the Teach-in for health reasons.

After addressing an audience until midnight Friday, Ivan Illich, another Teach-in speaker was too tired to speak again Saturday as scheduled.

Ryan speaks at noon in Convocation Hall

By ERIC MILLS

Claude Ryan, controversial editor of Le Devoir, and Parti Quebecois MNA Guy Joron will be speaking today at noon in Convocation Hall. The U of T Waffle, which is sponsoring the meeting, will also present the same speakers to an open Waffle meeting tonight at 8 p.m. at the Ontario Institute For Studies in Education.

Ryan is in the centre of a storm over his opposition to the War Measures Act and an alleged plot to set up a provisional government to replace Robert Bourassa's Liberal government. Other sources describe it as an offer to extend the government to include a number of people from outside the Liberal Party.

Ryan himself has said that the idea was merely discussed in the editorial offices of Le Devoir.

Ryan is also co-chairman with Toronto publisher Jack McClelland of the Committee for an Independent Canada (CIC). The CIC has not taken an official stand on the current crisis in Quebec, but according to McClelland, "Most of the Committee would support an independent Quebec inside an independent Canada. There is no contradiction between the two ideas."

He explained that by "independent Quebec" he meant one that is independent relative to its present status.

Ryan is under heavy attack

The question of Quebec status is not before the committee".

U of T professor Abraham Rotstein, a CIC member, also said in relation to the Quebec crisis and Ryan that "nothing has changed as far as the committee is concerned." He pointed out that the CIC is not a political party and does not need to take a stand on individual issues.

Innis film society holds panic meetings for help

By MARINA STRAUSS

The U of T Innis Film Society has called two "panic meetings" in the past two weeks in search of help in organization and support.

"We're now up from two to around eight people to help arrange things," explained George Edelman, co-director of the Society. "We're $100 in the red, and the support we've gotten so far has been discouraging. We got a $200 grant from SAC, and a $500 loan, to be paid back in April. We didn't sell enough membership tickets, although that's given us some capital. The Innis College Educational Committee has given us $75."

The main problem the Society has is that they have to break even. They couldn't make any gambles. "University College spent $400 on advertising for their Film series. Our major poster cost $20, and it's ridiculous." Vertigo 70, the Blue and White Society, and other colleges that show films are run on loans and can afford to lose money.

The competition is stiff. All over campus you can find free, or very cheap, big commercial films. "We haven't been picking our films for their commercial worth. We've been trying to be more than an entertaining bureau."

Although initially only series tickets were to be sold, these did not go very well, and single admissions are now being offered. There were 26 series tickets sold for Series 3 "New Wave" with films by Resnais and Chabrol, which broke all records for the Society.

As of next week the Society will be forced to drop their free daily showings. On Thursday, however, the three film-makers who put together the "King Heavy Festival" will be holding a discussion and film analysis (admission will be 50 cents).

Edelman commented: "I thought people were really interested in films, but I'm not sure anymore. There are so many film societies now, but they're bleeding each other dry".

Police arrest girl in Bourassa's office

MONTREAL (CUP1) — The secretary in Premier Robert Bourassa's Montreal office, who had considerable access to confidential information, was among five persons charged Friday under the War Measures Act.

Jocelyn Despatie, 19, Pierre Bourret, 19, a CEGEP student, and Gerard Pelletier, 21, a student at the University of Quebec, were charged with seditious conspiracy and being members of an unlawful association, i.e., the FLQ.

According to a story in Saturday's La Presse, the largest French language paper in Quebec, authorities have tried to keep the Despatie matter quiet.

As well as being familiar with the comings and goings of most Cabinet Ministers, especially Bourassa, she had access to all sorts of documents.

It appears, however, that she had been removed from her job by the time of the height of the crisis.

Despatie was arrested October 8, at her home just south of Montreal, along with Pelletier and Bourret. For some reason she was released. But only to be re-arrested a couple of weeks later.

'De-school' says educator Illich at OISE

By TED WHITTAKER

The "de-schooling of society" is what Ivan Illich, co-director of the Centre for International Documentation, an educational think-tank in Cernavaca, Mexico proposed to a Friday night audience at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

"My own tradition makes me tolerate little red schoolhouses but I wouldn't like to prescribe them," Illich said.

Illich, a Vienna-born Catholic priest with temporary lay status, is in his forties. He addressed about 400 people at a weekend teach-in sponsored by the Toronto-based International Education Project.

He discussed the need to "de-institutionalize" education and other social services, which he described a contradiction which he claimed the stratifying ritual of schooling conceals and perpetuates. He said the schools rationalize society's structure — "graduated unending consumption" — while claiming to promote its ideal of equality.

Many of Illich's illustrations were drawn from Latin America; he said that for the present cost of television networks there, one in ten adults could be given cassette tape recorders, and many tape libraries could be staffed and equipped.

Illich said he thought Ontario a good place in which to begin educational reform. He suggested: The abolition of curricula and compulsory attendance; providing every adolescent with an annual share of tax revenue for his private educational purposes; the establishment of a rigorously-controlled public review board to test job applicants for relevant skills, and laws to prevent applicants' being asked how much schooling they had undergone.

"Hunger is institutionally produced," Illich said, blaming the depletion of resources, the polarization of society and the psychological passivity of the consumer. He stressed the need for "a new trend in technological input."

Illich proposes three measures to combat neo-colonialism and the injustice in our own society: protection of the individual against being labelled by institutions as being "in need of treatment"; protection against "regressive taxation of resources" (if one hasn't consumed enough school, one isn't allowed to work); the necessary rationing of resources known to be limited.

"Institutionalization is the replacement of hope by rising expectation", Illich said. "Hunger rose with consumption" until we have "the ethos of non-satiety". Alienated, we can't use our institutions as the tools they should be.

We experience "progressive underdevelopment", assuming we're "weak and sick and have to engineer ourselves to health and strength", Illich said. "It has to be proved education increases with schooling" or that "health increases with medical services".

Ikkoku speaks

Nigeria needs leaders

By LAURA KELLY

Courageous leadership and planned education are the two pressing needs of underdeveloped African nations according to Dr. Ikkoku, a Nigerian chemist.

"Most of the elites charged with planning are themselves victims of attitudes which will require decolonization," said Ikkoku, during the Saturday morning session of the "Crisis in Development" teach-in at O.I.S.E.

Ikkoku, who worked for the Biafran nation as a scientific advisor during the recent civil war, accused the upper class of maintaining an aloof manner of an Oxford-bred class, disdainful of the masses, but failing to realize their position as elites.

"The elite is more worried with their position. Coming to decisions which are not in keeping with the establishment takes too much courage," he said.

Ikkoku asserted that the people could plan with the leaders since they had to plan and work during the war and despite under-education they got maximum use of the land and labor available.

"During the war, most of the population became in the true sense of the word, "scientists," said Ikkoku, explaining that this organization of the people still exists now, and should be utilized by the leaders.

Ikkoku, who teaches now at a Nigerian university, briefly described the historical background leading up to the formation of an elite class and the unemployed mass.

Imperialistic ventures onto the African continent by European countries halted its development, and initiated a slave trade to serve the trade in sugar and tobacco.

After European industrialization, African nations were a prime source of raw materials, and the trade was conducted solely for the benefit of Western capitalists.

"The labor of African masses was the crucial source of European profit, and the export of capital to Africa became the dynamo of imperialism," said Ikkoku.

Africa failed to industrialize, and only a few Africans who managed to deal with the white businessmen became prosperous.

Ikkoku jibed at the expensive hotels and handsome houses that are photographed as marks of African development, but which are used by whites or Africans on the government payroll.

Ikkoku suggested more technical and scientific education, a re-organization of the elements of production, and involvement of the people in planning for the new nations, as cures for the poverty existing among the natural riches of Africa.

Rent strike is renewed

About 100 striking students at the married students residence on Charles St. may face eviction notices later this week for non-payment of rent.

The students renewed their rent strike action Nov. 1, when about 100 rent-payers agreed to withhold the full rent from the Ontario Student Housing Commission.

"The refusal of O.S.H.C. to face the issues have forced the tenants at the married students' apartments to resume their rent strike. This time, however, not $50 but the entire amount of the rent will be withheld by the tenants in an attempt to encourage O.S.H.C. to meet the legitimate demands presented by the Tenant's Association," said John Seaman, a resident of the apartment building.

The rent strike of August and September involved about 300 of the 600 rent-payers who withheld $50, until the O.S.H.C. threatened the strikers with eviction. At that time Brian and Rita Shaughnessy volunteered to continue the fight but the O.S.H.C. refused to take them to court.

The O.S.H.C. cashes its rent checks on Nov. 18, and the strikers expect a reaction from the commission then.

Fiends send scare message to Varsity

OUR WOMAN IN THE STREET

"I'll about and drive away the vulgar from the streets."

Julius Caesar, as quoted in the Manifesto of Truth, November 11, 1970.

The Cultural Hero Inmates of the University of Toronto are planning the extinction of The Varsity and Radio Varsity in an effort to destroy "sound and eye pollution."

Their brief communique, entitled "Plans for the bombing of The Varsity and its appendage, Radio Varsity," was delivered last night by Hans Grimmelhausen, who claims he got it from a "long-haired fellow who probably smokes LSD."

It accused the two organizations of promoting headaches, aggressive tendencies, bad tempers, apathy, drug experimentation, cretinism, and suicide.

More specifically, its complaints against Radio Varsity included:

- using disc jockeys whose alternative to the monotone is hysteria, who are adept at the moronic anecdote, and who play silly little "in" jokes for the benefit of their own rather limited intellects.
- playing Led Zeppelin at nine o'clock in the morning.
- putting loudspeakers in all public places, and paying hirelings to continually turn up the speakers (and who are paid to stay by the speakers ten hours a day for this purpose.)
- employing conceited disc jockeys who get off on self-glorification, and at regular intervals (every three minutes) announce, "This is the _____ show," as if anybody cares.
- working under the following fallacious principles:
 - a) loud is good;
 - b) talk is good;
 - c) loud talk is good;
 - d) mumbling jokes are good;
 - e) advertisements are good, particularly when they are offensive and unsettling, since then some notice is taken of them.

They objected to The Varsity for:

- employing reporters who cannot write.
- being pretentious
- being run by egocentric children — proudly announcing that they are censored, whereas what they would have written would not be worth reading in the first place.
- not realizing that, much as they would enjoy being "Revolutionary Heroes", nobody is much interested in revolution at the moment

When told about the bomb threat, yesterday a U of T policeman only winked, and said "Good-bye, Son."

"The internationalist spirit of Comrade Norman Bethune is worthy to be learned by all Chinese Communists and respected by all Chinese people."

A class institution

When you talk about the university as a "class" institution, you can cite a lot of statistics to prove it.

You can talk about the composition of the student population, which is heavily weighted towards middle and upper income groups.

Or you can point to the direct control corporations and businesses exert over the operations of the university through their positions on the top governing authorities, the boards of governors.

The high price of tuition, the cost of textbooks, the structure of research financing — all point to the fact that universities do not offer equal opportunities to all people.

But one of the most significant ways in which the university reveals its class nature is in the kind of work that it does, both day to day in its classrooms, and also in its research studies.

Last week, for instance, U of T's Centre of Criminology released a lengthy report on public attitudes towards Metro Toronto police.

The report showed that 86 per cent of Torontonians feel the city police are doing a good job. Police, the report said, have widespread support and sympathy.

Only two or three per cent of those questioned in the gathering of data felt hostile towards Toronto police. In the 18 to 24 age bracket, however, this figure rose to 12 per cent.

As you can see, the researchers concerned themselves purely with accumulating statistical data. They were not gathering evidence about the role or function of Toronto police as demonstrated in practice, but, rather, they were taking a count of what people thought about Toronto police.

One of the researchers, Malcolm C. Courtis, indicated clearly the public relations utility of his report, in comments to the press:

"He suggested police should adopt a 'low profile' strategy to avoid polarization of public opinion. . .

"Measures such as recruiting more men from Metro's ethnic areas groups and using them in the areas they know would improve the 'quality' of individual contacts between police and public. . .

"He also suggested greater emphasis on human relations to police training, and endorsed some suggestions that sensitivity groups would be useful in police training."

(Toronto Star, Nov. 12, 1970)

In effect, then, the study is nothing but an aid to police in developing a good public image. The report has no conceivable use for anyone else.

Another set of data collated by the researchers was on what Torontonians (or rather 967 Torontonians) considered the major causes of crime. The most popular answers, the report revealed, were "drugs," "lack of home discipline," and "lack of respect for law."

In essence, what the report did was to conduct an opinion survey. Readers of the report will accept its figures as conclusive proof that (1) there is little if anything wrong with Toronto police, and (2) that illegal behaviour is definitely caused by those well-known stereotyped causes — "drugs," "lack of home discipline," and "lack of respect for law."

There is a hidden assumption behind this kind of study, one which our "precise" criminologists would rather forget. They would rather forget that their chosen methodology — one of purely quantitative analysis — is not a neutral and "objective" instrument.

The unspoken assumption in this kind of "social science" is that there is nothing fundamentally wrong with the world the way it now is.

This aversion to difficult questions among North American social scientists was described by New York political science professor Robert Engler:

"Measuring the measurable rather than asking fundamental questions of value question of content, value, and alternative, becomes the road to a vigorous ordering of evidence. . .

"The distorted scientism so prevalent in modern social science means that its inquiries are not guided by any sense of urgency or priority. . . First questions are not asked, but assumed."

It is not the place now to indicate what evidence researchers might have come up with if they had tackled the Toronto police in a less "hands-off" manner. Perhaps they would have examined the internal structure of the police, to see how and where important decisions are made. Perhaps they would have considered evidence from citizens who feel they have suffered at the hands of the police. Perhaps they would have considered some of the myths about drug-hippy-communist conspiracies which police are trained to believe.

Another example of how so-called "objective" research really conceals a lot of bias, is provided by a recent U.S. government health survey.

In measuring psychological stress among Americans, they recorded the relative incidence of such phenomena as nervousness, insomnia, nightmares, trembling hands, fainting, dizziness and nervous breakdowns, among different sectors of the population.

They discovered that women had significantly higher rates than men for every symptom.

The UPI story reporting the survey commented that this proved that "Women, at least when it comes to psychological stress, apparently, indeed, are the weaker sex."

Leaping to this kind of stereotyped conclusion is exactly what this kind of quantitative "social science" research promotes.

Remarkably, this survey went on to find that signs of psychological stress were especially pronounced among the following groups:

- "older persons",
- "the less educated",
- "lower income" groups,

Surely there is some connection between this widespread psychological stress and the fact that these groups — women, the elderly, the uneducated, and the poor — are the groups that suffer most oppression at the hands of an alienating and dehumanizing social system.

To ask this potentially dangerous question apparently did not occur to the researchers involved in the project.

Their hidden assumption was that psychological problems are symptoms of individual illness, not of social oppression.

The great failure of our universities is the way it conceals these kinds of assumptions and places emphasis on researching social issues in an easily quantifiable way.

This failure is one of the ways in which the university demonstrates its class function — dealing, that is, with issues in a way which will not challenge, but preserve and entrench the present arrangements of the world.

Unfortunately, it is exactly this kind of "dispassionate," "disinterested", and superficial inquiry that rules social scientists in our universities.

The woman who suffers insomnia will be comforted by the fact that one out of every five women suffer this complaint and so it's nothing unusual. The root of her distress — the general oppression of women in our society — will not be dealt with.

The Torontonian who feels a victim of our economic and social system — as enforced by the police — will read reports of the Criminology Centre study and find out that he is just another malcontent.

Is that the function we want our universities to perform?

If the object of social sciences is to make people more aware of their world and of the need to improve it, then it is essential they adopt a critical stance and begin to point to root causes of social problems and develop alternatives.

You will note in today's Write on: section a letter from a tutorial group in Sociology 303. They want to meet with all students in the course today in order to discuss how their course, entitled Canadian Society, can make the leap from studying statistics in an abstract way to confronting some of Canada's real social problems.

And on page five today, you can read a page from Canadian history that this university has successfully concealed from its students.

Although Norman Bethune was a graduate of U of T's medical school, he has never received any official recognition from the university.

His name is rarely, if ever, mentioned in either history or medical classes at this university.

Dean A. L. Chute, of the medical school, says he knows nothing at all about Bethune.

And the U of T Library has a single copy of his biography.

The treatment U of T has accorded Bethune is a clear indication of the class nature of the institution.

Many lesser men — indeed men who have spent their lives perpetuating an oppressive social system — have received high honours from the university.

But not Bethune.

He was on the wrong side.

The Writings of Doctor Norman Bethune

Norman Bethune is a man who is not well-known to Canadians, yet to this day he remains a national hero to the people of China.

Born in Gravenhurst, Ont. in 1890, Bethune was the son of a Presbyterian minister. He attended U of T before World War I, and then, after being invalided home, completed his MD here.

As a surgeon, Bethune developed a considerable reputation in Canadian medical circles, writing extensively about his work and inventing several important medical instruments.

In the Spanish Civil War, serving with the Republican forces, Bethune pioneered the use of mobile blood transfusion units.

In 1938 he travelled to China where he served as a doctor with the army of Mao Tse-Tung in the struggle against the Japanese invasion.

He died in the line of duty from blood poisoning caused by a cut on his finger after he had been performing front-line operations around the clock.

After his death, Mao Tse-Tung wrote: "No one who returned from the front failed to mention express admiration for Bethune whenever his name was mentioned, and none remained unmoved by his spirit . . ."

"We must all learn the spirit of absolute selflessness from him. With this spirit everyone can be very useful to the people. A man's ability can be great or small, but if he has this spirit, he is already noble-minded and pure, a man of moral integrity and above vulgar interest, a man who is of value to the people."

Bethune died 31 years ago this month. Below you can read some of his writings, collected from speeches, letters, articles and journals which he wrote.

Our profession must arouse itself from its scientific and intensely personal preoccupation and become socially-minded, realizing the inseparability of health from economic security.

Let us abandon our isolation and grasp the realities of the present economic crisis. The world is changing beneath our very eyes . . . We must go with the tide or be wrecked . . .

The situation which is confronting medicine today is a contest of two forces in medicine itself.

One holds that the important thing is the maintenance of our vested historical interest, our private property, our monopoly of health distribution.

The other contends that the function of medicine is greater than the maintenance of the doctor's position, that the security of the peoples' health is our primary duty, that we are above professional privileges.

The medical profession must — as the traditional, historical and altruistic guardians of the people's health — present to the Government a complete, comprehensive program of planned medical service for all the people.

Then, in whatever position the profession finds itself after such a plan has been evolved, that position it must accept.

The people of Madrid know that their cause lacks no followers — only arms; they know that the enemy lacks no arms — only followers. They know who is sending men to the enemy and who is depriving Republican Spain of arms . . .

Tonight, while it waits for the bombers, while it sends its men to the trenches, while it sleeps in cold room with pangs of hunger — tonight, Madrid under curfew has chosen the password, "What will be free?"

And the answer, El Mundo todo! The whole world will be free!

Institute launched. Magnificent response from people of Madrid. First test transfusions at front carried out last night with complete success. Greetings from all. (telegram to Spanish Aid Committee in Toronto, Dec. 24, 1936).

There were no sounds of bombing from the direction of the port. The bombers weren't interested in the port! They were after human prey. They were after the hundred thousand people who had eluded them at Malaga, who had refused to live under the fascists, who were now penned together here in a perfect target . . .

He cared little for the port. A port couldn't think, defy fascism or bleed. Only people had brains, hearts and courage. Kill them, maim them, show them the merciless claw of fascism . . .

The function of the artist is to disturb. His duty is to arouse the sleepers, to shake the complacent pillars of the world. He reminds the world of its dark ancestry, shows the world its present, and points the way to its new birth.

He is at once the product and preceptor of his time. After his passage we are troubled and made unsure of our too-easily accepted realities. He makes uneasy the static, the set and the still.

In a world terrified of change, he preaches revolution — the principle of life. He is an agitator, a disturber of the peace — quick, impatient, positive, restless and disquieting. He is the creative spirit working in the soul of man.

Yes, I am a Communist. That is a matter of my own beliefs and my own decisions. If I say now that milk is good for children, will anti-Communists therefore suggest that it is not good?

And if I say that the people need bread, does it mean that they don't, simply because the man who says it considers socialism the most equitable, the highest political and moral form of human society?

I am sure that if Christ walked the earth again, preaching the brotherhood of man, He too would have thrown at Him the label of "Moscow hireling."

I refuse to live in a world that spawns murder and corruption without raising my hand against them. I refuse to condone, by passivity, or by default, the wars which greedy men make against others . . .

Spain and China are part of the same battle. I am going to China because I feel that is where the need is greatest; that is where I can be most useful.

We are now working in Hu Chia Ch'uan, a little village of about 50 houses. We are 20 li (6 2/3 miles) west of the Yellow River and about 75 miles south of the Great Wall . . .

There are 175 wounded here, scattered among the houses. This is what is meant by a "hospital" here. It would break your heart to see them — lying on the brick k'angs with only a little straw beneath them. Some have no coverlets — none have blankets.

The wounds are crawling with lice. They all have only one uniform, and that they have on. It is filthy with the accumulated dirt of nine months' fighting. Their bandages have been washed so often they are now nothing but dirty rags. Three men, one with the loss of both feet through frostbite gangrene, have no clothes at all to wear. There is only a coverlet for them.

All are anaemic and underfed. Most of them are slowly dying of sepsis and starvation. Many have tuberculosis.

Haven't seen a newspaper or magazine (American or English) for three months. Have any arrived? What's happening in the world? What's happening in Spain? Have you received any news?

I did eight operations today . . . I am tired but enormously content . . . I see now that I must institute a medical course here from the ground up. I shall have to do something about blood transfusions. Am using a combination of shouts, tears and smiles to get things done.

More than anything else, it is understanding and knowledge that defeats fear . . .

I have no money or the need for it. I have the inestimable good fortune to be among and to work among people to whom communism is a way of life, not merely a way of talking and thinking.

Their communism is simple and profound, reflex as a knee jerk, unconscious as the movement of their lungs, automatic as the beating of the heart. They are implacable in their hate, world-embracing in their love.

The stoic Chinese indeed! Here I have found comrades who belong to the very hierarchy of humanity. They have seen cruelty, yet know gentleness; they have tasted bitterness, yet know how to smile; they have endured vast suffering, yet know patience, optimism, quiet wisdom. I have come to love them, I know they love me too.

Our watchword must be — Doctors! Go to the wounded. Don't wait for the wounded to go to you.

How beautiful the body is; how perfect its parts. With what precision it moves, how obedient, proud and strong; how terrible when torn. The little flame of life sinks lower and lower, and with a flicker goes out. It goes out like a candle, quietly and gently. It makes its protest at extinction, then submits. It has its say, then is silent.

Is it possible that a few rich reactionary men, a small class of men, have persuaded a million men to attack and attempt to destroy another million men poor as they? So that these rich may be richer still?

The agents of a criminal war of aggression such as this must be looked for like the agents of other crimes, such as murder, among those who are likely to benefit from these crimes . . .

What do these enemies of the human race look like? Do they wear on their foreheads a sign so that they may be told, shunned and condemned as criminals?

No. On the contrary, they are the respectable ones. They are honoured. They call themselves and are called, gentlemen.

They are the pillars of the state, of the church, of society. They support private and public charity out of the excess of their wealth. In their private lives they are kind and so considerate.

These men make the wounds.

'Villian of the piece' explains why it was time to stop talking

In response to your invitation I am writing to comment on the statement in Wednesday's Varsity by nineteen student members or alternates on the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science Council. Since I was the villain of the piece responsible for moving the six months hoist to the original student motion for a parity committee to restructure the faculty council I am glad of the opportunity to explain my action.

Eighteen months ago a staff-student committee of Council, of which I was a member, presented a Report based on lengthy deliberations, proposing a radical restructuring of the faculty Council. Last year this Report was sent back to a second committee and considerably modified. The modified Report, which was adopted by Council in spite of student objections, provided for the setting up of an interim General Committee of 169 members and alternates, including 34 students and alternates, to conduct the business of the Council. This Committee was to be reassessed in the spring of 1971.

In moving my delaying amendment it was my view, and I presume that of the majority who supported me, that one had to call a halt, if even a temporary one, to the interminable debate that has been going on for the past two or three years on university government and abide by a decision that has been made, which provides for a review in the near future.

Undoubtedly in the past the faculty underrated the potential contribution that students had to make in the sphere of university government and I readily admit that I have been impressed by the ability of many students whom I have met on university committees in the past few years. But only a relatively small group have shown an interest and the hard fact remains that the great majority of students have neither the time nor the inclination to debate such matters or to participate at all levels of university government. Indeed in my experience many of them would not claim to have the qualifications in many cases.

Faculty have to sit on the various committees and councils that govern university affairs for it is one of the duties for which they are paid. Students have no such moral or legal responsibility and student activists (I use the term in the best sense of the word) will know the difficulty in getting a sufficient number of students to attend all the meetings in which they are now entitled to participate. For instance not a single student attended the recent meeting of the Humanities division of the Graduate School Council, and I could mention other examples. This is no reflection on the students, but simply a reminder of the realities of the situation that all students should seriously consider before voting on the proposed referendum.

J. B. Conacher
History professor.

Case of beer will be at stake in referendum

I would like to reply to Professor Conacher's statements about the Faculty of Arts and Science Referendum and the role of the students in this university. The points he has touched on are crucial to far more than just this referendum.

I find it ironic and illuminating that Professor Conacher considers the proposed restructuring of the Faculty Council "radical". To my mind temporarily delegating authority to a general committee of 169 while retaining a veto for the larger Council of 1300 may be sensible. It is hardly radical.

Increasing student representation from 16 to 34 out of 169 on the committee and to 34 out of 1300 on the Council is good conservative politics. It is a move designed to keep students cooped and quiet but it too is hardly radical.

Putting a few token students on a large, faculty-dominated committee "for communication" is indeed a convenient way to keep students pacified. They have their representatives, who can talk all they want without really influencing any substantial vote of the committee. The fact that this Council could implement a restructuring proposal to which students objected in the first place and then in each of three successive meetings methodically table a motion to have it re-examined (a motion which every student rep supported) is a clear indication of the students' present impotence in that Council.

In that light it is not surprising that Professor Conacher wants to "call a halt" to the debate on university government on this campus. I can understand how, having just returned after being away for a year, he is annoyed that the faculty have still not completely quietened the students down and here and there a few of them are still heard mumbling about students' rights and educational reform.

I take strong issue with his charges that most students have no interest in such matters as the Faculty Council deals with nor any moral or legal responsibility for its decisions. The decisions which the Faculty Council makes concern the primary educational issues — class size, marking schemes, curriculum, student petitions, experimental courses — basic to every student's experience at this university.

As a member of the Faculty of Arts & Science every student has as much a responsibility as anyone else for these decisions. The students' representatives on that Council have a legal responsibility for its decisions both to the Council and to their constituency.

The time and effort which many students are putting into the Referendum should indicate students have both the "time and the interest to debate such matters". The turnout in the Referendum vote can demonstrate the more general interest most students have in what this Council does.

I would only point out that in most elections for the Association of the Teaching Staff the faculty turnout is below 10 per cent. Indeed when students did not sit on the Faculty Council it was often hard to get more than 100 out of 1100 staff members out to a meeting, no matter how vital. I will wager Professor Conacher a case of good beer that more than 10 per cent of the students in the Faculty of Arts and Science are interested enough to vote in the referendum. And I will wager him another case that we vote yes.

Sociology 303 meets today to discuss Canadian Society

There are many things in Canadian society that are troubling, interesting and exciting. All year we have been sitting in a course called Canadian Society, and have seen nothing but boring reams of statistics that any dunce could get from DBS.

What about the present crisis in Quebec? What causes poverty? Who rules Canada anyway? Why aren't we talking about these things in class?

A group of students in our class have decided that a course on Canadian society can be made interesting and relevant, but only if we act on the cause.

We invite all the long-lost students of Sociology 303 to come to the class on Monday at 11 (remember?) in Sid Smith 1087. Let's collectively discuss a new format for the course, guest lecturers, films, student presentations, anything we feel can help us understand what's really going on. There is still time.

Ubysses Press Club commends Varsity

I have been reading The Varsity for three years. On many occasions I have indeed felt that the quality of the paper was well below the standards that should be set for a university of the calibre of the University of Toronto.

Here at the University of B.C. our newspaper, The Ubysses, has consistently won university newspaper competitions. The Ubysses is indeed a fine newspaper. However, despite its seeming excellence, there are a number of occasions that The Varsity has outdone it. The Varsity has consistently, for this year at least, offered its readers fresh, original, and outstandingly consistent ideas.

Its layout has been of joy to the readers eye. What has been particularly noticeable this year has been The Varsity's original ideas such as answering advertisements from the paper. (Varsity, Vol. 91 No. 20). I found the article both intriguing and informative.

I will continue to read The Varsity and commend you for your fine journalism.

Incidentally, I am appalled and disgusted to learn that you have had problems printing a communique from the FLQ last week. We printed it on Tuesday without even the slightest hitch at all.

Campus Profile - a rap with Blue and White

We make dollars: Wortzman

By TOM WALKOM

Mo Wortzman, chairman of the Blue and White, is a man with the good of the university at heart.

"There is a tendency towards the university becoming socially conscious," Wortzman says, "In fact it's here already."

When Wortzman speaks of social consciousness, he doesn't mean it in the way political troublemakers do — he means conscious of the Blue and White's social program.

The Blue and White as well as organizing dances runs films. "Last week we showed 'The Graduate' and 'True Grit,'" Wortzman smiled.

In its past two football dances, the Blue and White has cleared a profit of $2100. According to the chairman, that represents about $1. of profit on every $2. ticket sold.

Wortzman brushed off any suggestion that the Blue and White could afford to cut its admission prices.

"If you don't charge, people don't think it's worth coming to. If you pay for something, you're going to come."

However the Chairman will give a break to girls at the next dance — they'll only be charged $1 as opposed to $2 for males.

When asked why a price differentiation would occur, Wortzman leaned back in his chair in the spacious but austere office of SAC president Rodney Hurd, and chuckled.

"We want to encourage people to come stag. This will encourage more girls and not as many guys. It's sort of a regressive tax on guys."

Wortzman gained his experience in the social field by organizing the unsuccessful SAC presidential campaign last year of Bernard Teitlebaum.

"I'm interested in publicity and entertainment — that's why I helped in Bernie's campaign," mused Wortzman. Teitlebaum is now a kingpin in the Blue and White.

The chairman has no political ambitions himself.

No small stuff for Bernie

By TOM WALKOM

Bernard Teitlebaum, modestly claims that he is the man behind the Blue and White's new newspaper, Starecase.

Starecase, which first appeared the week before last, devotes itself to matters not covered by the Varsity. Its first issue contained articles about Teitlebaum appearing on a local radio station, as well as coverage of U of T's homecoming weekend.

"We needed a paper on campus that had something to do with culture — like the Blue and White and movies," said Mr. Teitlebaum.

He dismissed the $150 printing costs of the first issue as "candy" to the Blue and White.

"Candy — it's candy," he said.

"A lot of people liked it," he said. "People have been tailing us all over campus to put stuff in the paper."

Teitlebaum who narrowly missed picking up the SAC presidency last year has "big plans"

Many questions, few answers

"Why is it necessary to have up to twenty years of continuous schooling? Why not break it up and, if necessary, space the years over a life time?"

The rhetoric of an angry student on the reform path? Wrong again — it's the innocent voice of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario which released a statement of issues at a press conference Monday.

The twelve member committee was appointed in April of 1969 to study areas such as equality of opportunity, certification, the structure of education, involvement of government, and who should pay for education.

The commission has completed a year of private study and discussion with specialists from many fields, and will begin open hearings and will receive briefs submitted by private groups.

The commission had few answers but a lot more questions: "Why is it necessary to assume that 'learning' must take place only when institutionalized? Why indeed, do we use degrees and diplomas (or certification purposes)? Do our post-secondary institutions really contribute to a better, fuller, life?"

Dr. Douglas Wright, former Dean of Engineering at the University of Waterloo and chairman of Ontario's committee on University Affairs is chairman of the commission which includes former SAC president, J. Kelly, and J. M. Careless, a U of T history professor.

Dennison speech cheered

By BARB SLATT
Toronto Mayor William Dennison was cheered on by his audience at a violence forum Saturday night at Glendon College as he answered a question on urban welfare with an old story about an Indian who stole a sack of flour.

"Violence opposes the democratic system because it means power without the majority's support," said Dennison.

Andy Wernick, a U of T graduate, pointed out that our political democratic system does not necessarily mean that the government has the support of the majority.

"To become a representative one must have money and so when you vote you choose between different people who have money," he said

Wernick reasoned that the laws couldn't possibly be democratically agreed upon by the members of society because we are not all alike and so few representatives couldn't represent all our interests. Dennison insisted that a democracy is the only way to eliminate violence.

SAC clarifies role

On Wednesday night SAC passed a motion designed to clarify the role of student members on the President's Advisory Council.

SAC accepted membership on PAC September 30

SAC accepted membership on PAC September 30, but opposition to the acceptance by some members of Council continued. Former Finance Commissioner Peter Boswell resigned over the issue. Vince Dolan moved at a SAC general meeting November 5 that SAC leave PAC but the motion was defeated.

The motion passed Wednesday night clearly stated that SAC directly appoint the undergraduate members (as opposed to campus-wide elections) and their alternates, that SAC by a motion could recall all appointed members for any reason deemed valid by SAC, and that all information pertinent to agenda items be available at least one week prior to any PAC meeting.

Wishy-washy: SRC

No to referendum

The Student Radical Caucus, a student group organized on campus this year, has denounced those students supporting the Faculty of Arts and Science Referendum.

Calling the organizers "a bunch of wishy-washy, education-type people," a spokesman for the Caucus accused them of trying to divert the students' attention from the real issues in the world today.

"It is time students stopped worrying about their education and took a good hard look at the poverty, the repression, and the imperialism in the world around them. Seats on committees are not going to solve any of these problems," declared Rick Polanti, one of the Caucus members.

"If students are really serious about taking control of this university, they are not going to do it with referendums", he said.

"We have been fooling around like this for four years. If students want power they are going to have to mobilize and that means sit-ins, that means a permanent arts festival in Sid Smith, that means striking out at this university until it stands still. We have had too many referendums and not enough action."

When asked to comment, a spokesman for the organizers of the referendum said that he felt students were basically concerned with the educational issues behind the referendum.

"A solid vote of support for this referendum could do more for the position of the students in the university than any of these other actions," commented Brian Morgan one of the students on the Faculty Council.

Night classes envisioned for integrated university

By JUDI SMITH

A FAR-REACHING REPORT on extension students released last week, if adopted may lead to night classes for full-time undergraduates as well as the construction of a new college on the St. George campus.

"The great majority of the University's part-time degree students, amounting to about 12,000 student course registrations, believe that they are regarded as second-class members of the University, and are not treated fairly," according to the Presidential Advisory Committee on Extension report.

Having studied the problems connected with part-time study, continuing education, and non-credit liberal education since February, 1969, the committee considered several means through which part-time students might be fully integrated into the Faculty of Arts and Science.

"If the present colleges are full to capacity, at least one new college would have to be established on the St. George campus." The report added that Falconer Hall, present headquarters of the Department of Extension, "could be used for this purpose." It also stated "...that any new college(s) not be exclusively for part-time students."

CONTINUING ALONG THE same line, the report recommended "That all part-time students proceeding to degrees, diplomas or certificates in this University be fully integrated into the Faculty or School concerned."

"That the distinction between full-time students and part-time students become purely formal. ... That all classes be open to part-time and full-time students equally."

The "second-class members of the University" becomes very real to the few Extension students who have been given special permission to attend one or two day classes instead of evening sessions. He first must receive written permission from the department head for the classes he would like to attend, but even then is not guaranteed a place. If full-time student enrollment is high in that subject, the first persons to be "dismissed" is the part-time student.

Another recommendation is: "That financial aid be made available to part-time students as well as to full-time students." The present government loan system has no provision for part-time students, whether employed or not.

A MEMBER OF THE committee, Mrs. Joyce Denyer, Past-President, Association of Part-Time Students, is concerned that full-time undergraduates may not realize the implications of the report for them. With the increased number of students, classes probably would be scheduled in the evenings and perhaps on Saturdays.

"Part-time students are assumed to have jobs, and would receive priority in time-table scheduling," she said. "This could mean that someone with a full-time schedule could find himself attending classes at 9:00 a.m. and 7:00 p.m. on the same day."

On the subject of extra colleges, Denyer "would like to see the Women's Union (Benson) building or the present Innis College location used." She feels the college system is good, giving students smaller groups to be part of, "developing higher morale and giving a greater sense of identity."

Mrs. Denyer said that Scarborough and Erindale campuses presently are integrating part-time and full-time students with no difficulty, but points out that these involve smaller numbers of people. In favour of the recommendations Denyer said: "Mutual benefit can be derived from integration of older and younger students." Class discussions can be more rewarding when there is the mixture of the ideas of the part-time student, often an older person, with his knowledge and working experience, with the enthusiasm and imagination of the younger full-time student."

THE THREE COLLEGE principals who were contacted unanimously agreed that added enrollment in the present colleges is impossible.

"There are financial implications, particularly for the church-related colleges," said Dr. J. E. Hodgetts of Victoria College. "The Extension Department was set up to pay its own way; if the students are dispersed to the various colleges, it raises the question of finances."

Dr. D. G. Ivey of New College concurred with Hodgetts. "I agree with some of the problems raised, but the solution to these problems would have strong financial implications. It would change what the university has for full-time students. There is the question, too, of whether the provincial government and the citizens are willing to accept this financial increase."

Dr. Robin Harris of Innis College feels that the financial aspects of integration are somewhat exaggerated. "It is not necessary to have a huge expenditure to develop new colleges." He cited the experience of Innis College itself. "The development of three small colleges (to accommodate 1200 students) could be as inexpensive as one college for the full 1200."

HODGETTS EXPRESSED CONCERN over the possibility of "moving to day and evening classes." Ivey commented that "The college in the evening is not as active as it should be; the majority are commuting students and do not involve themselves after four o'clock." Harris noted however, that "Many instructors have been teaching during the day and at night for years."

"We are not going to be able to come to a very quick conclusion," Hodgetts said. "Students ought to be alerted to the implication of these recommendations."

Agreeing that the report is "important, with tremendous implications for the university as a whole," Ivey added that he is "sympathetic towards many points raised in the report concerning the fact that extension students have not had the advantages of full-time students." However, he wondered if "the recommendations made to change this role are realistic."

Harris was very impressed with the report, saying it was "admirably brief in terms of dealing with the large set of problems the committee had to deal with." He agrees with what was recommended, and adds that "Carleton University (in Ottawa) has been operating on this proposed system for fifteen years."

THE FULL-TIME STUDENTS questioned were totally unaware of the report or its recommendations. Their reactions were varied.

"I like the idea of integration, even considering the implications for full-time students. I don't see how the scheduling could become more crowded than it is now. The Extension students in my class don't mix with the others, even if they are close in age," said Heddie Swanson (UC III).

An anonymous male student (UC III) said "I have already the choice of taking night classes in psychology and FSM courses."

"It points out the whole tragedy if the university can't meet the needs of students," said Alice Klein (Innis II). "There is a whole university crisis, and one of the games the university plays to ameliorate the problem is pitting students against each other."

Dave Dennis (New II) said that he was not in favour of the implications for full-time students. "So I am opposed to integration," he said. However, it is not fair that part-time students cannot get financial assistance the way things are set up now."

Rocky stingy in nets, Blues held to draw

LOOK OUT BELOW! Blues' Mac Hickox (15) and an unidentified Loyola Warrior collide behind the net. The two teams battled to a 1-1 draw before 3,000 fans Friday evening.

HE'S HUMAN AFTER ALL! Varsity winger Gord Davies (20) lifts his stick to salute his second period goal. Warrior goalie Rocky Martin was the biggest obstacle in the 1-1 tie.

The Varsity, Don Andrews

By LYNDON LITTLE

Loyola Warrior goalie Rocky Martin, a Finch Ontario native who stands a mere five-foot-six, is mainly responsible for the fact that 20 Varsity Blues hockey players spent the past weekend trying to work off the frustration created during Friday night's exhibition hockey game.

Martin, who has a glove hand that makes Johnny Bench look positively butterfingers, turned aside just about everything Blues threw at him as he and his teammates battled Blues to a 1-1 stand-off.

BLUES FIRED 38 shots at the 19-year-old former junior star with the Cornwall Royals who is in his second year with the Loyola team, and only Gord Davies' second-period drive from close in front managed to elude his grasp.

Tom Little, holding fort at the other end, also played an outstanding game but the Warriors directed only 21 shots into his area.

"There's no doubt about it," said Blues' newcomer Danny McCann, who was a teammate of Martin's with the Warriors last year, "Rocky was the outstanding man out there tonight.

"He's also very consistent," added McCann. He won many games for us last season with his great puck stopping ability."

With a singular exception, Blues appeared to regard the tie as the equivalent of a defeat. But, Mac Hickox, another newcomer who toiled bravely for the McMaster Marlin's past four years, found little reason for gloom.

"What the hell," he said, "this is the first time in quite a while I've been on a four-game undefeated streak!"

Davies, the former Marlie star who played left wing on a line with Brian St. John and Terry Peterman, had the best opportunity to notch the winner in a hectic third period when his sizzling slap-shot from just inside the blueline rattled off the goalpost.

"You have to give them credit," said Blues' defenseman Brent Swanick, "when a team is held in their own end like that for so much of the time they usually take a lot of penalties. But they didn't."

third year at Loyola and never noted as much of a scorer, gave his team a short-lived lead when he connected on an unassisted power-play goal at 8:56 of the middle period.

Hickox was serving an elbowing minor at the time.

However, just two minutes later, with Warrior's Ron Clarke off for interference, Davies evened the count flipping in St. John's rebound. Swanick, who made a fine play to keep the puck in the Loyola end, also drew an assist.

Coach Tom Watt, who was not overly dispirited at the outcome, had this to say:

"Sure you always like to win, but I feel the team played fairly well. We just didn't make the most of our opportunities."

Brent Imlach, who played most of the game as center on a line with Nick Holmes and Hickox before coming up with a slight groin pull, showed effectively, especially as a forechecker.

Hickox also played an aggressive skating game.

Rookie Ivan McFarlane between McCann and Scott Seagriff formed another combination while captain John Wright, Bill Buba and Mike Boland played together as they did most of last year.

BLUE NOTES: The Warriors' talented winger John Riley, one of the team's most consistent scorers, couldn't believe what happened to him in the first period when, somehow, he was unable to jam the puck in the open side of Blues' net with two or three virtually unhampered chances. . .

Blues' defenseman Dave McDowall and goaltender Grant Cole had to miss this one with injuries. . .

The Warriors took 19 minutes in penalties to 13 for Blues. . . Loyola's young defenseman, Steve Sly, is the younger brother of Vancouver Canucks rearguard Darryl Sly. . .

The three stars announced at the game were Martin, Little, and Swanick. . . Blues' next game is this Thursday evening when they travel to London to open the league schedule against the Western Mustangs. They then make a weekend trip to play an exhibition contest with the Laurentian Voyagers in Sudbury on Sunday afternoon.

Polo Blues take 6-1 dunking from MacMen

By CLIVE HOBSON

The Water Polo Blues were, so to speak, caught with their bathing suits down on Saturday as they went to McMaster and returned as losers on the short end of a 6-1 score.

This was only an exhibition game, so it counted for nothing more than experience. However, it was obvious Blues still lack the refined teamwork that is such an essential part of the game.

The team desperately needs a leader before they travel to McGill for the start of the regular season play. The defence played exceptionally well on Saturday. The offence, however, lacked the co-ordination that makes for goals.

Perhaps a week of team practises will be sufficient to sharpen up passing and shooting skills.

But to be absolutely fair, the teams were playing on Saturday with some unavoidable handicaps.

LEADING SCORER for the squad, Chris McNaught, missed the first half of play after writing a law exam the same morning. McNaught is the only Blues forward with real experience and his customary aggressive play was badly missed by the front line.

Also, this was the team's first experience in an Olympic size pool; the extra five yards in either direction not only take their toll in stamina, but make possible more varied plays — giving the home team a definite advantage.

Despite these handicaps, Blues found themselves trailing only 3-0 at the end of the half. McNaught rejoined the team midway through the third quarter and Mac's lead suddenly didn't appear as insurmountable.

McNaught scored a fast goal, and the team appeared to gain much needed impetus. However, Neil Jones scored his third of the game to push Mac into a 4-1 lead.

Blues spent the remainder of the quarter hitting the goalposts and the crossbar. In the fourth quarter, Mc-Naught missed a penalty shot when the Mac goalie almost stretched himself out of the pool to tip it over the crossbar. Mac connected shortly after that, and Neil Jones finished the scoring when he tipped in his fourth goal of the game.

COACH ALAN PYLE was not totally disappointed in his team's loss. The defence is blending into a strong, cohesive, unit and backed up by the capable goaltending of Tap Avvaleurine they seem capable of keeping the score low. The forwards have the ability to play equally as well, but unfortunately, team practices are often interrupted by defection of members to the swim team practices.

Blues have one more chance to put it all together when they play the Toronto Water Polo club this Wednesday.

That will be the final exhibition game of the season before they move into the big leagues. Unfortunately, amongst the kind of competition they will face then — you don't get many second chances!

PhD's can't find jobs in Canada

By PHILINDA MASTERS
Canadian PhD's are having a hard time finding jobs, according to a report released yesterday by the Graduate Students' Union, and its author, Marjaleena Repo, blames it primarily on Canada's foreign-dominated economy. Out of a total of 190 PhD's at U of T seeking employment last year, 85 found no work at all, and of those who did, 32 were not satisfied with their jobs. The Departments of Chemistry and Physics were the most seriously affected, out of 29 Chemistry students and 20 Physics students only 8 were employed in their field.

Repo, pointed to Canada's foreign-dominated economy as the key to the problem. Foreign industries in Canada either do their major research and development in their own country, or hire compatriots to fill the positions in Canada. At the same time, Canada unlike every other country has no legal restrictions on foreign professionals immigrating to fill the few positions available here, and Canadian PhD's cannot easily emigrate to other countries. "Canadians are stuck here whether they want to be or not."

The current crisis extends beyond economics, Repo continues. Universities, because of cutbacks in funds, have not been able to fill the unemployment void, and in some cases even hesitate to acknowledge the problem. PhD's have difficulty finding jobs in community colleges and high schools — they are either too highly qualified or do not have a teacher's certificate.

Out of a total of 53 PhD's seeking employment in community colleges last year, only 2 found employment in that field, and 32 found no other employment at all.

Another obstacle to employment is the 'grape-vine' method of making positions known to students. In many cases success in finding jobs is merely a result of good luck, since they are not widely advertised.

Other problems relate to the fact that there are more PhD's than jobs, owing to the vast increase in student enrolment in all universities in the late sixties, and to the fact that MA's often have trouble finding jobs and so go on to complete a PhD.

Among the recommendations to ease the complex problem of PhD unemployment, Repo suggests halting the extension of graduate schools; raising enrollment requirements; restricting foreign faculty members in universities to one-third; advertising of both university and industrial positions in national newspapers; and most important, changing Canadian immigration laws to restrict foreign professionals from entering the country.

Marjaleena Repo

Repo noted yesterday that only when the public realizes that the cost of educating one student to the PhD level is approximately $144,000, will it become agghast at wasting so much on unemployed intellectuals, and demand action.

Larry Hoffman, President of GSU, says that this study is the first and only one published on a problem which will inevitably be much worse in the next few years unless information and understanding become widespread among students across Canada.

Ottawa undermined Quebec power: Ryan

By ERIC MILLS

Chances for a moderate solution to the problem of deux nations have been greatly reduced by the present crisis in Quebec, according to Le Devoir editor Claude Ryan.

Speaking in Convocation Hall, Ryan also claimed that the Quebec government's power has seriously been undermined by Ottawa as a result of the crisis.

"Paramountcy has returned to the government which the rest of Canada always believed should have it (Ottawa). Bourassa may have developed into a second Godbout". (a former premier of Quebec who after cooperating with the central government could not even win in his own seat.)

Ryan said that there were three positive attitudes necessary before Canada-Quebec problems could be solved. The first is "the clear recognition of two nations that feel free".

"Unless we're willing to do that, I don't see how peace can be maintained," he claimed.

The second is that the political structures, at present "so artificial, so oriented to some segments of society", must become more democratic.

Thirdly, governments must define more clearly their economic and social goals.

He also described an analysis appearing in the magazine, The Last Post, that Prime Minister Trudeau implemented the War Measures Act because he realized that the people of Quebec sympathized with the FLQ, as "a very plausible interpretation."

Parti Quebecois MNA Guy Joron stressed the frustration felt by Quebecois due to cultural, economic and political factors.

"Independence is not considered by any members of the Parti Quebecois as an end in itself, but as a tool to face head on social and economic problems," he said in explaining the PQ stand.

The monetary union with Canada proposed by the PQ would limit Quebec's economic control he admitted, but the important thing is that PQ independence would lead to complete control over fiscal policy.

More radical solutions are required to solve Quebec's problems, said Joron. He predicted that the Parti Quebecois will "certainly move to the left".

Highlights from report show serious crisis among graduates

The problem of finding employment is becoming a crisis of major proportions for PhD's. The following excerpts are taken from Marjaleena Repo's report entitled "Who Needs the PhD?"

At U of T alone, which has a graduate student enrollment of over 6000 and which produces close to one-fifth of all the PhD's in the country, no information was available to students enrolled in graduate programs as to the supply-demand aspect of their discipline (p.1).

One cannot help but get the impression that there is a conspiracy of silence amongst the agencies involved; that they appear to think that by not talking about it the problem will go away (p.2).

"As to the question of surplus students we have been quite concerned to hear of the evidence that has been presented to you, because we... see no evidence of a surplus appearing in the foreseeable future." Dr. O. M. Solandt (p.10).

The labour market at various levels and particularly at the levels of a highly educated manpower, is largely dependent on the needs and necessities of the corporations of the U.S. as well as its national interests. (p.13).

Companies that are PhD intensive are currently showing the least increase in total research staffing. B.Sc.'s and M.Sc.'s predominate in their laboratories and this pattern is expected to persist (p.16).

Out of the U of T sample (190), 55 people looked for employment within government research, but only three people found such a position (p.22).

Married, non-Anglo-Saxon women had the most difficulty of any group in finding employment at the PhD level (p.34).

The time element spent job seeking does not appear to be a significant factor... This indicates to us that a number of people are not finding jobs regardless of the time element involved, for the simple reason that there are no jobs to be found (p.41).

What is clear is the tendency of people to stretch out their time in the university, either by holding onto some less-than-satisfactory and poorly paying teaching positions, or by stretching out their thesis (p.41).

Campus recruiting was generally considered to be a useless method altogether, and not without foundation since only one person obtained employment through an initial encounter with a campus recruiter (p.49).

FLQ threatens 'things will blow up' in Montreal

MONTREAL (CUP 1) — "Things are going to blow up in Montreal," if the 24 political prisoners aren't freed within four days, according to an FLQ communique from the Louis Riel cell, which arrived in the hands of CKAC, a Montreal radio station Monday night.

If the men are not liberated, the note says, "We will strike and we won't miss our mark."

Sunday morning the same radio station received a communique, also from the Riel cell, claiming responsibility for a Molotov cocktail thrown Friday night at the city hall of Laval, the sprawling city of suburbs which fills the islands right near the island of Montreal.

The Monday communique adds that the newest cell totally supports the Liberation, Chenier, and Dieppe cells, in the route that their policies have taken and the means they have used.

In addition, it states that despite the War Measures Act, the Louis Riel cell distributed a tract Oct. 30 inviting the population to support the liberators, and urging the people to use whatever means necessary to achieve liberation.

The police say they are studying the document "for authenticity."

Varsity not censored over FLQ statement

The Varsity was not censored this week.

Sunday night the newspaper's printers, Web Offset Publications Ltd., allowed The Varsity to print the text of an FLQ communique released last Saturday.

The only stipulation was that a number of credit lines reading "the communique said" be inserted following paragraphs from the communique.

This, the printers' lawyer felt, would minimize the danger of breaking the War Measures Act.

The Globe and Mail Monday morning printed the entire text of the same FLQ communique without alterations.

Last week Web refused twice to print the text of an earlier FLQ communique.

Meeting today

Vic campus centre stalled

By BOB JAMES

Vic's campus centre has been stalled indefinitely and a meeting has been called for 1:00 p.m. today in Room 3, NAB, to discuss why.

Unexpected opposition has arisen from the Vic faculty at a meeting last Thursday, when the Faculty Council was asked to give approval in principle to the campus centre.

They refused. Until an overall plan for the future of the college is formulated, with the full consultation of the faculty, it is financially irresponsible, say the Faculty to tie up money from the endowment fund for a period of seven years to pay for $1.8 million centre.

The Campus Centre Committee, a committee of the Board of Regents (Vic's equivalent to the Board of Governors), expected opposition from students (not faculty) to the centre. After preparing architects' plans, they held two public meetings to present information about the proposed centre — its finances, its site, and some of the information that the architects had prepared.

Representatives of Gordon Adamson, the architects involved, had prepared slides of the site of the new centre. They were challenged at the public meeting by architecture students to give more adequate detailed information before a decision was made on the suggested plan.

Last night, a group of 45 faculty members, including the chairmen of all Vic departments, presented a brief to Mini-CUG suggesting that they needed a 50 percent faculty and 15 percent students representation on any new governing structure at Vic to prevent such instances of financial irresponsibility.

Sources in the faculty said that the Faculty Council wanted more teaching facilities and professors on the Vic campus. They were worried about the implications of Dean A.D. Allen's letter (suggesting the possibility of faculty cut-backs for financial reasons). In their opinion, the resources from the campus centre should go towards more classroom facilities, more faculty offices, and to ensure the security of the positions and salaries of the present faculty at Vic.

The financial implications of the campus centre to the rest of the Vic campus have not been outlined. The Faculty Council complained that Vic president Dr. J.E. Hodgetts has yet to make his own position clear on the financial advisability of a centre at this time.

Politicians to decide if telephones tapped

OTTAWA (CUP) — Power to decide whose telephone will be tapped by police will be taken away from the judicial structures and handed over to politicians within the next few months.

Disclosure of the impending action came from Trudeau's Justice Minister John Turner during debate in the House of Commons on the anti-terrorist bill Monday.

The move, which will be included in a Trudeau bill scheduled for introduction during the current session, will give the Federal Justice Minister and Provincial Attorneys-General the power to approve wiretaps, rather than the courts which now make the decisions.

Last year, the Commons Justice Committee recommended that authority to grant warrants should rest with the judiciary.

However, what the Globe and Mail terms "a vocal minority on the committee" felt the power should be exercised by the Justice Minister and the Attorneys-General.

Civil Liberties Associations argued, as did the majority of the Commons committee, that the power to issue warrants should rest with the judiciary.

Justice Minister Turner argues that giving the courts the responsibility would place an unfair burden on them.

Exiled leader cites the CIA in Greek coup

Junta gets millions in U.S. aid

By JEFFREY WILSON

Poised in the center of shuffling T.V. cameras on one side and a magnetically symbolic drawing of struggling hands imprisoned in tightly-woven coils on the other, Dr. Andreas Papandreou, an exiled Greek minister, first related the terror of the existing Greek government Monday, and then harshly indicted the American CIA as the force behind the 1967 military coup.

Speaking at York University as part of its Greek Freedom Week, Papandreou, Director of economics in York's graduate economics program and present leader of the Panhellenic Liberation Movement, addressed a highly partisan assembly.

Papandreou spoke of the expulsion of presently governed Greece from the Council of Europe because of the government's inhumane attainment and maintenance of power. He referred to evidence brought out by a disaffected Greek officer and the Council's twelve-hundred page publication which indicated the junta's systematic torture, consisting in, for example, drugs, detergent in the eyes, pressurized water in the intestines or electro-shock in the genitals.

"The government of Greece," he pronounced, "might with dignity be termed a junta but in somewhat less formal situations, we call them by their proper name: MAFIA."

The major part of his discussion was not to illustrate the ugliness when freedom dies but rather to point out quite clearly who killed liberty in Greece. "The coup was in fact made in America and directly administered and financed by the C.I.A." Papandreou explained that this modern type takeover was a computerized CIA program, and in order to ensure the success of the manufactured program, Greeks were used to run the tapes. So the CIA chose the unknown George Papadopoulos, described by Papandreou as an ex-S.S. officer, to become prime minister.

Papandreou verified his accusations by referring to the intentions of some prominent American politicians. He talked of Secretary of State William Roger's European trip after the time of the coup, in which he acted as the junta's "salesman" pressuring, or more precisely, blackmailing western European American allies. He told the story of ex-president Lyndon Johnson's ambassador at large, Cyrus Vance, who on the morning of April 21, 1967, made rounds through the White House hushing critical concern of the junta's intentions by admonishing them: "This coup is ours."

More factually, Papandreou spoke of the supposed Greek Embargo by the Americans in 1969, which existed only on paper, while in fact the little-known Surplus Arms Act was used to permit the flow of arms to the junta. This Act had been on the books for years, but was used very conveniently in this situation — echoes of our very own War Measures Act. Now that the "Embargo" has been officially lifted, the U.S. has aided the colonels with nothing less than 172 million dollars of military equipment, in order to keep, as the liberation leader added, "the Greek people suppressed and oppressed. Military bread is well battered if Papadopoulos is in power." He also spoke of Defense Secretary Melvin Laird's announced intentions to work through the NATO meeting of this December to modernize Greece under the existing government. In a rather sardonic tone the exiled minister claimed, "There is a special kind of pride in Greece today; Greece is the only true ally of the U.S." Papandreou described the situation in Greece as just that of one more small nation caught in the web of international conflict. Soviet influence in the Mediterranean and the Middle East, or the numerous leftist liberation movements in Africa might explain the harsh American entrance into Greece, although only 12% of the popular vote went to the leftist party.

During the question period a young Greek girl condemned Papandreou's methods of liberation as equally fascist, but she was met with great verbal abuse by the audience. One Greek student cried out, "I've just left Greece for freedom here."

"You came here for democracy?" asked someone ironically from the audience.

The Canadian government also continues to maintain relations with the colonels of the coup, refusing to join with the Scandinavian countries in condemning the junta.

Greek Freedom Week continues through to Friday, November 20th at York, climaxing with a Friday night program of Greek Music, Folk Dance and Theatre. Stanley Burke will be the MC, and featuring "Loneliness", a short play by Spyros Yannatos, a political refugee. Members of Toronto's Greek community will be there to teach the Zorba dance, and thirteen kinds of Greek food will be served.

Cost is $1.00 to students, and the time and place are 8 p.m. in York's Burton Auditorium (for the theatrical and dance performances) and 9:30 in the Vanier Dining Hall (for those who go for audience participation, in eating, dancing, and drinking).

U of T students should allow at least an hour's travel time by TTC, and take the Keele bus north from Lansdowne subway station.

"As to the question of surplus students we have been quite concerned to hear of the evidence that has been presented to you, because we certainly . . . see no evidence of a surplus appearing in the foreseeable future."

the Science Council of Canada.

The Irony of History

Eighty-five years ago this week Louis Riel was executed by a Canadian government which found him guilty of treason.

It was the prime political mistake of John A. Macdonald's career. It aroused widespread public disfavour in French Canada, and established Riel as a national martyr.

When Wilfrid Laurier was first elected to Parliament, his maiden speech was one which helped to cement a tradition of respect for the memory of Riel.

"What is hateful," said Laurier, "is not rebellion, but the despotism that induces that rebellion."

Since then Riel has occupied a central place in the demonology of Canadian liberalism.

This spring it was crowned by the commemoration of Riel on a Canadian postage stamp.

In Regina, where Riel was hanged, a monument was unveiled to Riel's memory in 1968.

Making the dedication address was a Canadian Liberal prime minister by the name of Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

In a passionate defence of liberal democracy, he appealed for careful respect of minority aspirations:

"How many other Riels exist in Canada, beyond the fringe of accepted conduct driven to believe that this country offers no answer to their needs and no solution to their problems?"

"How many of us understand the loneliness, the sense of futility of such a man? How many of us are willing to concede that future historians, in chronicling the events of our lives, may choose to emphasize and applaud the activities, not of the privileged majority but of some little-known leader of an unpopular minority?"

In his peroration, Trudeau rang out a warning:

"It is all too easy, should disturbances erupt, to crush them in the name of law and order. We must be never forget that, in the long run, a democracy is judged by the way the majority treats the minority. Louis Riel's battle

"Louis Riel's battle is not yet won."

The irony of this kind of juxtaposition was not lost upon members of the outlawed Front du Liberation de Quebec.

Their latest communique, was released Monday, the anniversary of Riel's hanging, and it was signed by the "Louis Riel" cell of the FLQ.

As students, we too should scrutinize this kind of conventional political rhetoric very closely.

And we must juxtapose it with an accurate measurement of the actions and behaviour of Canadian statesmen like Trudeau.

Keeping the balance in our subsidiaries

It takes:

- keen political know-how
- appropriate publicity
- complete contingency plans

In the recent personnel dispute at our Canadian Subsidiary, our men in Ottawa proved that they HAVE what it takes. Rather than waffling around in confusion, they came up with the answer right away and acted quickly. They proceeded to cut right through all the red tape, and disable the 350 dangerous employees who were threatening to disrupt our operations. How's that for efficiency?

After that brilliant opener, there was no looking back for our boys. They then called in our subsidiary's full security force to cover all our major installations and investments over the entire country against any actions by this treacherous group. Let's face it: when you have an organization like ours, old-fashioned, inefficient ideas such as collective bargaining and time-wasting negotiations go right out the window!

Sure there was some nervousness and the odd complaint from our 22,000,000-odd personnel force, but our Ottawa directors put their minds completely at rest by carefully-timed and tailored announcements. We guarantee perfect security for all our employees.

Why don't you write us? We're a corporation you can really rely on. With men like our Canadian directors in Ottawa we're going to be around for a long time, expanding, innovating and controlling.

—William Carlos Williams

Monday we attempted to introduce you to some of the ideas of Norman Bethune, the Canadian surgeon who graduated from U of T and later fought with the revolutionary forces in Spain and in China.

Today political economy graduate Gary Webster, a student member of U of T's Commission on University Government, discusses the ways in which the content of our education reflects the fact that the university is a class institution committed, at this point, to reinforcing the status quo.

The teaching of social sciences at U of T, he argues, reinforces the existing class relationships and patterns of ignorance in our society.

This essay first appeared in this fall's first-rate Victoria University handbook, edited by Eric Hobbs and Paul Hurlly.

HERE IT IS 1970 and, as in past years, thousands of freshmen in the Arts Faculties of Ontario universities are expecting educations they aren't going to get. Many, perhaps most, believe a BA will make them prime contenders for choice jobs in industry, government and education.

A lot of them are in for disillusionment — not because the industrial and bureaucratic elites wouldn't like to absorb them, but because the branch-plant Canadian economy simply is not geared to use the abundant human resources which the high schools and universities disgorge every year.

Those who are in for an even greater disappointment, however, are the minority who come to university with the primary purpose of learning what the world is all about.

There are, unfortunately, many ways in which the University of Toronto resembles the most hierarchical of churches and these have not been fundamentally changed by the revisions of the top structure and the Faculty of Arts and Science Council that the Commission on University Government's report inspired. U of T is authoritarian and elitist in the style and form of its teaching-learning functions and of its government.

It is notably defensive about criticisms of its privileges and of its role in the Ontario community emanating from the unenlightened — those who are not members of the priesthood, regardless of whether or not they are among the less than 10 per cent of all Ontarians who have ever attended a university.

BUT THE WORST ASPECT of this whole inflated metaphor is that the eager freshman of 1970 will learn as much about the way the world really works in his classes at Toronto as he might have learned about heavenly truth in the corrupt Church of the Medici popes.

The arts and social science students will be the chief victims of this gap between reality and the gospel according to most U of T professors (there are a few heretics of course — we're very liberal — but don't mention institutional political commitment, it's worse than birth control).

The scientist will learn a lot about his physical environment and will probably become a fairly good employment prospect, even though he will get little idea of the social implications of his knowledge or of the means by which it will be expropriated for the benefit of the very few.

The arts student will study the intellectual playthings and the ideological emanations of all of Western man's past and present ruling classes. He will encounter hardly any of the literary, philosophical, visual or musical creations by which the vast majority of every Western population, with their "intellectual limitations", have obtained or expressed their awareness of their environment.

Unless his specialty is esoteric, he will hardly even awaken to the existence of the non-European phenomenon, culture, in the non-Western world. In short, most of his old class and cultural prejudices will be expanded upon, uplifted, and dignified by a flattering patina of intellectual jargon.

THE FAILURE OF THE ARTS SUBJECTS to transcend the boundaries of upper-class Western culture is compounded by the tendency of the academic disciplines to divorce all forms of artistic and intellectual expression from the social and political milieu in which they developed. English and classics professors should not be sociologists, say the rules of the game (see Bronwen Wallace's excellent article on this subject in Winter, 1970, This Magazine is About Schools).

The result is often a fraudulent transformation of the messages of spokesmen for particular classes and personality types within a society into the spirit of a whole age. It is as if we took the views of The Globe and Mail or the New York Times as the quintessence of the attitudes of all Canadians or all Americans. Add to this factor the fragmentation of culture into 'Literature', 'Philosophy', 'Fine Art', 'Music' — it's even a separate Faculty — and the dimensions of the problem become even clearer.

The student trying to understand the world might hope that the social sciences would offer some sort of antidote to this incapacity of the university to comprehend man's experience in any given age as both diverse — in terms of the activities of different classes, races and sexes (how many women does history record?) — and integrated — in the sense of interplay both among these groups and among their various modes of self-expression, i.e. art, politics, economic activity and intellectual creation.

The social science curricula afford scant fulfillment of that hope.

Anthropology courses focus chiefly on the exotica ignored by other departments although this is one discipline in which a capacity for dealing with the integrity and interrelatedness of human experience has not entirely disappeared.

PSYCHOLOGY, SOCIOLOGY and political science all suffer from a tendency to un-pose the norms of middle-class behaviour and existing social arrangements on the subjects of their study. Their essential goal is to orient students to the idea of society as a reconciliation system in which all interests and viewpoints can be accommodated without messy conflicts and without departing radically from existing institutional and economic models. Deviant behaviour and social disruptions are treated as anomalous problems rooted in the personal or group failures of the individuals or "minorities" concerned or as temporary aberrations in the essentially correct functioning of the system.

There are exceptions to this pattern of analysis among individual professors, but we are speaking of the general impression conveyed by the curricula of these departments. Economic courses by and large ignore the exploration of radical alternatives to the existing mode of production and distribution of wealth, treat capital as an entity with a life of its own rather than as the product of socially mobilized labour and human will, and bypass the political, social and cultural effects of American ownership of Canada. Non-development of the Third World is interpreted in nearly every discipline as a failure of the indigenous social systems (which are usually not even studied as they were before outside incursion) rather than as a by-product of centuries of imperialism and the capitalist organization of the world market. If only all peoples and all classes could be as rationally bureaucratic as the Western elites! (See, e.g., David Apter's Polines of Modernization, which tells us they inevitably will be.)

It is a commonplace among those who have had experience of this and other universities to note that their government and the educational process within them are undemocratic and conducive to the development of master-servant relationships between teachers and taught, graduates and their fellow Canadians. It is less frequently pointed out that the very content of our education fails to acquaint student with the real life, thoughts and social experience of the mass of humanity in this and every other age.

THE ARTICULATE, THE PRIVILEGED and the victors of history are paraded before us year after year as the only real representatives of life on this planet. And since most of us expect to join one or all of those categories, small wonder that we accept this fatuous and untruthful version of past and existing reality, as the classicists expound the virtues of slave-based, imperial Athens, the medievalists tout scholastic hierarchy and feudalism, and the political scientists tell us the benefits of the war in Vietnam.

Plato, Aristotle, Locke, Churchill, Franklin Roosevelt, Harold Wilson and Pierre Elliot Trudeau are slyly pawned off on us as contributors to the development of the democratic ideal, while Stalin and Brezhnev are passed off as the logical products of Marxist approaches to political problems. Major contributors to the growth of the democratic idea such as Marsilius of Padua, Herder, Thomas Paine, Rosa Luxemburg and Frantz Fanon are virtually ignored.

And in an era when minor variants of the fascist form of government are mainstays of the free world and the Hussian bloc, it is all but impossible to find a course in any department which deals with the history, politics, economic base (invariable support by the biggest industrialists, including British and American), psychology and sociology of the well-documented instances of full-blown fascism in the 1920's and 30's.

These and other deficiencies of the university curriculum are commonly blamed on the evil machinations of the corporate elites who supposedly dominate the universities through their boards of governors. They have played their part in the past, but in the present the buck need no longer be passed so far.

Universities are controlled from within, and the enemy of free thought is within. The fact is that it is the faculty members, aided by a largely quiescent, unquestioning, upper-class or aspiring upper-class student body, who are responsible for the shoddy state of the academic community. Those professors who have the tenure and concomitant security which should enable them to act independently are themselves, for the most part, the internal pole in the university of the anti-democratic, manipulative Canadian and American upper classes.

IF REAL CHANGES are to be made, they will be made by the students in concert with a small minority of the present faculty. The method of achievement of such changes remains an enigma. The type of reforms from above attempted in the last few years will clearly not work. We must rethink.

Perhaps a thoroughly progressive form of the Educational Opportunity Bank scheme of university financing now being considered by the Committee on University Affairs, which would give the students real control of hiring and promotion of staff and allocation of other university resources, should be fought for. An alliance with the technocrats around this plan is certainly fraught with dangers and stringent guarantees of the students' right to purchase the type of education they need would have to be built in. But up to now we have not even considered this scheme.

If we want a democratic education, a democratic, informed and independent Canada, and a world in which men can again live as men we must canvas this and every other alternative. And we must not be afraid to include the Ontario public, in whose name education is conducted so duplicitously today, in our attempts at transformation. In this, as in most other aspects of the transformation of education, we have failed up to now.

'Do engineers believe in their super-male image?' women ask

The Engineering Society seems dedicated to perpetuating an image of themselves which is outdated at best. The annual slave auction is obvious in its exploitation and objectification of women. This year one of the participants partially dis-robbed. The United Appeal (for which the benefit was held) has officially stated its displeasure at this fund-raising activity. Some women from CIN 203 expressed their disapproval through action, as reported in The Varsity.

The Lady Godiva Marching Band was an integral part of this activity; it also sponsors its own marches, etc. Last week they marched around with signs such as 'Penis Power' and 'Ejaculation Upon Demand'.

The Hustling Dances are repulsive not by definition but by atmosphere. The very name might be applauded for its honesty on both the men's and women's parts. But why, we may ask, is the price cheaper for women? This suggests an unequal relationship.

The Toike, we feel, is an outrage to the campus. We do not want imposed censorship; we ask only if the engineers as a group support the Toike's portrayal of the engineer as a supermale, fucking his way through university. At least half of each issue is devoted to pictures, jokes and stories exploiting women as sex objects. Even the jokes are all male chauvinistic, as opposed to being simply sexual. To add insult to injury, the Toike is distributed throughout campus, including the women's residences.

We feel that the Engineering Society will remain concocated with portraying the superpenis image until the Engineers as individuals have to deal with women as human beings in their everyday lives. That Engineering is practically an all-male faculty is important in considering why the Engineering Society feels it necessary to perpetuate this Playboy image of man. They do not seem to realize that Playboy objectifies man as well as woman.

We write this to express our reaction to the organized activities of the Engineering Society which exploit and objectify women and sexuality. Perhaps popular expression of unfavorable reaction can convince the Engineering Society that they are still in the 1950's; they are living with inhuman relationships and outdated views of life.

The University of Toronto Women's Caucus.

(Ed. Note: The New College and St. Mike's student councils tomorrow night are sponsoring a combination strip-tease show and rock concert in Convocation Hall. It might be unfair to single out the engineers.)

Sociology students call for end to 'humble reverence'

The issue in the coming referendum of students in the Faculty of Arts and Science is clearly the issue of staff/student parity. The implications resulting from this are: if you consider yourself to be a responsible adult, then you must support parity; if you do not support parity you must consider yourself to be a spoon-fed begging child.

Does anybody want the latter? If you believe yourself to be a responsible adult, you consider yourself capable of judging a situation as well as the next person, given the same information. You consider yourself capable of making decisions concerning your well-being, your future, your ideas, given the ability to make the decisions. If you do not have this ability, you are somewhat less than a self-respecting, responsible adult.

Students have 34 of 169 votes on the interim General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science, and 34 of 1335 on the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science, the final decision-making body of the Faculty. This can in no way be termed responsibility.

The Sociology Department has established parity in its highest decision-making body. In its first year it shows early signs of being successful in its aim of making student opinion heard and felt and acted upon. And though there are still issues, there is no more begging, no more arbitrary rejection by staff.

The Sociology Students' Union executive urges you to ask for favours with humble reverence no longer. It urges you to support the student representatives on the Council by voting in favour of both parts of the referendum.

— Sociology Students' Union

APUS executive not supporting referendum

This issue of Varsity listed my name among the Student Council members who are withdrawing from participation in the General Committee of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Please be advised that no authorized or appointed APUS representative was present at the meeting of October 28, which was referred to in the letter to all students in the Faculty of Arts and Science, nor was any authorized or appointed representative present at the meeting of November 10 when the decision to take the matter to the student body was made.

By an APUS executive decision of November 8, the Association for Part-Time Undergraduate Students is not participating in a referendum on the question of student representatives withdrawing from the Council. I might add that although the APUS executive is in agreement with other student bodies concerning the small representation of student members on the Council, I personally told Mr. Rod Hurd, President of Students' Administrative Council, on Friday, November 6, that it was extremely unlikely that the APUS executive would agree to sign the referendum

Politeness and savagery plus the devil and sainthood centre of new Davies book

Robertson Davies,
Fifth Business,
Macmillan of Canada, $6.95

Most of Robertson Davies' new novel is a polite tale spiced with ordinary savagery — a retired history master writes about what he's really seen in an apparently uneventful life — but the last fifty of its 314 pages are a fiendish coda to what has been in fact a subtle composition of the biggest themes left for a post-Christian to handle — the lack of love, the earth as the devil's walk, sainthood and legerdemain.

Dunstan Ramsay, the narrator, tells of his hideous upbringing in rural southern Ontario — his experience is all too common, even today. He stumbles into a Victoria Cross during the First World War, and loses a leg in exchange. He teaches school for aeons and is fobbed off to retirement with an impertinent tribute which prompts the book.

Ramsay's scholarly interest is hagiography, and he manages to write for a Jesuit periodical and to befriend its editors. During summers away from private school in Tonto, Ramsay researches in Europe. One of his boyhood passions was magic, and he befriends members of a ratty troupe of tricksters, for very special reasons.

Ugly Leisl Vitzliputzli, the Prime Mover of the troupe, whose name Davies draws from Aztec myth — it was the grain god who commanded the Aztecs to sacrifice each other — tries to seduce Ramsay, and perhaps he breaks her nose with a twist of his fingers, after she bangs him on his remaining stin with his fake leg.

Immediately, Ramsay becomes resonant, doing to Leisl (who's at least a naughty lady) what St. Dunstan had done to the marauding Devil a millenium before. Those aren't the only echoes careening through this novel; read more than the blurb to find that Ramsay has his own private saint, partially on whose behalf he becomes the fellow traveller and biographer of Magnus Eisengrim, magician, and of necessary Leisl, who may prove to him that other people aren't always Hell or that if they are, it's not as terrible as they seem.

Enough of the plot, which is linear but with the glances backward trumpeted or sometimes (and this is nicer) left to us to add for ourselves. Two local papers have panned the book's creaky structure and its inadequate characterization. I disagree with both criticisms.

One of the main characters runs away from a truly depraved home at the age of ten, and joins a circus; he turns up again. The home is credible, as is his flight. Therefore I accept his resurrection, as I might that of some character in a Dickens serial.

Davies gets at the other characters through Ramsay, and they're not grotesques, though they are somewhat less fleshed than the narrator. Ramsay talks a lot of clever nonsense about his rich acquaintances, who bore and fascinate him with their pecuniary talents. One of them keeps him rather like a part-time pet, setting him up for a modest coup at the market just before the 1929 crash. Ramsay's no hero, obviously; he does in his saint with thoughtless words that effectuate much of her mental and physical collapse.

The narration and dialogue usually avoid cliché. Ramsay talks with his favourite Jesus, a hoary and sensual centenarian, who's in a hospital bed awaiting death. "I have not yet found a God to teach me how to be old," I said. "Have you?"

"Shhh, not so loud. The nuns must not know in what a spiritual state I am. Yes, yes, I have found Him, and He is the very best of company. Very calm, very quiet, but gloriously alive: we do, but He is. Not in the least a proselytizer or a careerist, like His sons."

And that's about the sunniest scene in Fifth Business, the title of which I'm not going to explain. Really, much of this nasty book has about it the odour of decay. Money made slyly, small people trodden upon in the name of God or progress, misbegotten children of murderous marriages, guilt and grudges borne for four decades, Dunstan Ramsay's brackish humour at it all, Robertson Davies scribbling in the panelled fastnesses of Massey College, pulling back his lip at the world.

We deserve Davies, though; there's enough misery and foetidness in the nation to warrant his examination of our entrails. Despite the mincing way he describes his interests on the jacket notice — "recording the passionate temperament of the Canadian people", Davies has crafted a mean archaic novel that stylish critics may soon pass off, but which may astound or disgust those hither-to unconvinced of the existence of the Ruler, and familiars or slaves of the Prince of the Powers of the Air.

The keeper of the key

Topical themes, good production in new plays at Studio Theatre

Charlie is almost a comedy, almost a tragedy, but it doesn't quite make either. Grandfather visits the oculist to get glasses in order to shoot Charlie; but who is Charlie — the oculist, the patient, the telephone caller or us? The play is a study in fear and intimidation, a lesson in the arbitrary power of brute force, made more tense by the insane absurdity of the Kafka-esque situation. A topical theme in these days of the War Measures Act, but not too entertaining. The oblique symbolism of the play is never resolved, and we are left wondering what to do with blindness and sight, science versus illiteracy and whatever else the doctor and his patient might represent. The pen-and-ink sets were effective, suggesting another reality. The oculist, although undoubtedly more animated than the grandson, deteriorates into a grating whine by the end of the play.

The Death of Tarelkin, on the other hand, is thoroughly enjoyable and superbly produced. The title of the play (which would seem ominous for a comedy) describes the ingenious ruse of one villain to cheat another. none of our tender emotions are at stake here, and we can just indulge in pure unadulterated comedy for an hour or so. The characters are almost cartoon-like in their expression and make-up, the henchmen of Varravin being particularly stunning with their mask eyes. In action the characters, and especially the three most prominent ones, Varravin, Tarelkin, and Oks, the arresting officer, used movements and gestures (Varravin's wonderful fingers!) so visually rich and suggestive as to be almost a ballet. They travelled all over the stage with choreographic ease which spoke of the expert direction of Linda Hardy. The gongs which signalled scene changes were also a nice effect. The Death of Tarelkin surpasses the laugh-in sketches for humour and vitality, and was well worth seeing.

Whiter than white: King Heavy will reveal

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

What do you want: good grammar or good taste? Would you like to get your clothes whiter than white? Want relief from acid indigestion? These and other questions will be posed and answered tomorrow evening at the King Heavy Film Festival.

King Heavy is a film that criticizes our society in the most brutal, sarcastic and devastating manner possible. Its creators, David Shute, Paul Mandell and Jouko Salomaa, have spliced together over three hundred television commercials to form a three-hour

New Fry play not a great dramatic event

By SUZANNE ROULEAU

Christopher Fry's play, A Yard of Sun, is one of discovery; obviously so in the intrigue with the appearance of two lost sons and a lost lover; but also on the level of personality, or identity. We see the characters evolve in their relationships with each other and in their understanding of themselves.

It hardly seems like a new play though. Set in an Italian courtyard in 1946, the father image is somewhat reminiscent of Fiddler on the Roof, and there are remnants of Fry's earlier stylized comedies in the photographer and the jockey Alfio. It is hardly a great literary or dramatic event; but the theme, one of self discovery and openness to others, remains topical today and is entertaining. The first act is devoted to setting up the plot and this slow beginning taxes both actors and audience. Especially irritating at this time are Ed Resnais as Luigi and Mel Tuck as Alfio. As the action picks up, however, everyone falls into place. Marilyn Lightstone as Ana-Clara is the jewel of the play. She is the seer, almost the smiling wisdom, and she really seems to feel her enthusiasm about life and communicates it to the audience. Len Birman as Robert is very strong at the beginning and then his shouting becomes just another element in the pattern.

For only 50¢ you can see this movie tomorrow at 8:00 p.m. in the Innis College Common Room. Just watching these commercials on a big screen in lurid, living colour is guaranteed to make you stop shaving, gargling, brushing, swishing, spraying, rinsing, dabbing and soaking for at least a week.

Attempt at complex study in new novel set in Quebec fails without live characters

A GAME OF TOUCH, by Hugh Hood, Longmans Canada $5.95
 In Canada, a country where the political life was potentially shallow, the very existence of Quebec adds a remarkable and welcome breadth and depth. It is upon this more complex stage that the action of Hugh Hood's new novel, A Game of Touch, is set.

Hood himself, born and educated in Toronto, is an English professor now living permanently in Montreal. He is bilingual, and obviously sees a Canadian future as including Quebec. The theme of the novel, however, is not an appeal or a pulpit speech; rather he attempts to describe the factors involved in a very complex political, cultural, and sociological mix. Unfortunately here his troubles begin.

Since he is dealing with art, and not with a doctoral thesis, Hood needs to objectify his ideas and place them within a context of action. He chooses to use character and a touch football symbol, but the result is a false store front, empty and possessing only a surface.

At first glance the characters appear to be stereotypes. There is Jake, 20, who leaves a small Eastern Ontario town bursting with United Empire Loyalists, and travels to Montreal to confront life. By chance he is asked to join a touch football game when he arrives, and thus meets the others in the novel.

Jake asks the right question: What does Quebec want? and is offered various means of finding out through observing the actions of the others. He makes the right statements: English is the world language, so why doesn't everyone speak it? Not understanding the difference between fiscal and monetary policy, he wants only to pay as little as possible in taxes and to possess as many material goods as possible.

Roger Talbot is an academic, rich, forty, bicultural with English and French heritage. He is offered a job in Ottawa to help formulate a provincial-federal medicare scheme, and in the end is sacrificed by the politicians in order to further negotiations.

Marie-Ange is a wealthy English girl from Jake's home town, who's changed her name and seeks to become bicultural mainly through choosing the correct bed-mates. And Yvonne is a French-Canadian secretary, bilingual, who works in Personnel for a large English corporation.

The football game that Jake and Roger and their friends play is a "happy" game — no violence, just fun and running and relaxing. Anyone who joins must follow these rules.

Hood does breathe life into his characters from time to time. Roger is not the Bicultural Superman or Trudeau in disguise, he is fallible, sees the impracticality and futility of his scientific solution to the Canadian dilemma. And Marie-Ange is wonderfully sensual, despite her attempts at rational seeking of biculturalism.

This point is precisely where the problem lies, for Hood has not personalized it enough. The long philosophical or political conversations are boring, and too often the symbolism or the superficiality of the characters is too blatant, the reader cannot get inside the characters to a sufficient extent to care about them, even though he may care passionately about Canada.

Hood's answers to the problem are revealed indirectly. He believes more in the methods of Marie-Ange than in those of Roger. Even though she is too rational and lives too vicariously in the French world, she does understand. Finally, however, we see Jake, the English lumpenproletarian, and Yvonne, the loyal French-Canadian, go off into the sunset together; the only way is the personal, individual way.

There are then, many resemblances to Hugh MacLennan's Two Solitudes. In A Game Of Touch, though the problems are presented as being more complex, the effect is more obviously contrived. The result is a denotative list of passions, lacking the connotations necessary to living fiction.

Gigantic work of Beethoven's shows struggle for right form

To Beethoven musical form seems sometimes to have been a body-pinching foundation garment. As he grew older, the problem of squeezing what he had to say into appropriate aesthetic attire perplexed him more and more. His Muse, it appears, developed an antipathy for the bra and the garter belt.

A case in point is the composer's Missa Solemnis, opus 123. The gigantic work, which was originally intended for the coronation of Beethoven's friend and pupil, Archduke Rudolph of Austria in March of 1820, was not completed until early 1823, at which time Beethoven sent the Archduke his dedicatory copy. During the years he worked on the piece, the composer, plagued by ill health and financial difficulties, complained to his friend Schindler that every movement took much greater dimensions than had originally been planned. The fugal passages gave him particular difficulty — not so much because Beethoven found fugue writing difficult as a compositional exercise — as because the form created troubles in setting the text.

Beethoven's Missa Solemnis poses enormous vocal difficulties for both choir and soloists, especially with respect to the high tessitura which prevails throughout much of the work. To two female soloists who complained about the tessitura, Beethoven remarked that they had been spoiled by too much Italianate singing and added, "I tried to write in the most flowing manner possible and I am ready to answer for my work at the tribunal of sound judgment and good taste."

Whether one agrees with this statement or not, it must be admitted that Beethoven produced a marvelous — if somewhat disturbing — work. The difficulties his singers encounter can be borne more easily if one bears in mind that Beethoven made it a practice to write what was possible rather than what was merely convenient. To an instrumentalist who complained, "This passage does not lie well for my cello," Beethoven is said to have replied, "It must lie well!"

The Toronto Mendelssohn Choir coped extremely well last Wednesday evening with the difficulties posed by the work. Even in the most hectic passages, Ancerl and his musicians managed to maintain a marvelous control of the music. The four soloists distinguished themselves admirably in projecting the depth and majesty of Beethoven's music.

Film is prologue to the revolution; the camera is the gun

By RALPH BENDAHAN
 Sympathy for the Devil cannot be treated within the same, old conventional approach to films and reviewing films. Firstly its director, Godard, excels in baffling linear comprehension to absurdity, admitting always with the subtlest implications that you are in reality watching time and the essence of reality go by. Then, as if this were not enough, he just poses reality of film with reality of time to create his own image of here and now. In Sympathy he has wisely used the Rolling Stones as rests or pauses for the real core of the movie. Needless to say it works in giving us time to think, to realize what he is saying.

Godard is no fool when it comes to films. The very fact that he is using the film media to expound his and others' revolutionary doctrines and criticisms is a sign of wisdom. He realizes too well the potential of films as a revolutionary force in self-awareness and cultural awareness. He understands that the visual and aural impact is far superior to the written word. With this comprehension of media he has captured revolution on film.

Scrapped cars, blacks amidst the scraps reading Eldridge Cleaver aloud, enacting and re-enacting potential violence with the passing on of weapons of words, two black girls interviewing the black man, slogan painting on walls, on cars, on doors, shots of pornography to the sound of someone reading Mein Kampf, and above all, jagged singing "Let me introduce myself." It is all an incredible stoning experience to a slow zoom of two young freaks sitting and staring into the camera. Godard ends with a shot of the camera and two Red Flags blowing, a dead girl below camera. Film as prologue to a revolution the camera as the gun.

How appropriate, in fact, that this film be the first for the newly-opened Videotek which, as their fact sheet says, will deal with topics such as drugs, politics, music, sex and social commentary. Located on the premises of Cinema 2000 the theatre seats 100 comfortably and has 12 colour videotape modules to satisfy all. The regular price of two dollars until midnight, drops to one dollar until 2 a.m. Sundays to Thursdays, until 4 a.m. Fridays and Saturdays. For the money-conscious student there is no longer any excuse not to see a good movie.

Here's hoping that their future movies be as good as this first amazing choice.

Tribute to Canadian artist Zacks a painless, enjoyable dose of absurd

By STEPHEN WINGFIELD

Even if you have never heard of Samuel J. Zacks, see Breath and Come and Go by Samuel Beckett, and Maquettes by Francis Warner, which are being presented in his memory at Hart House Theatre this week.

Zacks, a Canadian artist, was a personal friend to Samuel Beckett and made a large contribution to the Samuel Beckett Theatre to be built at St. Peter's College in Oxford. There is an exhibition of some of Zack's paintings in the foyer at Hart House Theatre which were previously known only to his personal friends. Aside from the paintings there are the plays themselves, which are without a doubt the most thoroughly professional pieces of theatre presented at Hart House this fall.

Breath and Come and Go can be best described as capsulized Come and Go has three typically Beckett characters and the tedium of Beckett, but in its briefness is humorous and comfortable to watch. The other, Breath, which opens the evening and lasts only thirty seconds is perhaps an example of a Beckett character taken to a logical and absurd conclusion, for in fact there is no character in this play.

Before the presentation of Maquettes there is a reading by Chris Wiggins from Samuel Beckett's From An Abandoned Work. This is the Beckett character before he has been stripped down and put on stage; he is realistic as opposed to ultra-realistic. It is interesting to see and hear the reading on the same night one sees the two Beckett plays, for in the reading one can see a little of the playwright who is so far removed from his plays.

Maquettes, a trilogy of one act plays by Francis Warner, is an extremely well directed and well designed production. Warner's characters differ from Beckett's in that they experience some change through the play, there is a sense of his characters moving from one point to another. His characters can act and speak rationally, there is genuine communication between them. Maquettes presents its themes using a different style or technique in each. This adds to the general artistic merit of the trilogy. Maquettes is funny, sordid and absurd. The director handles well what might have been awkward moments, such as a skeleton on a swing or two gigantic slabs of meat hanging on stage.

Francis Warner presents himself as a playwright involved with words, presenting an absurd situation in a fairly rational way. He is amusing and extremely clever. He is a much more cohesive playwright than Beckett and his plays are much easier to grasp. But his plays lack the hugeness one can find in Beckett, they are not as universal.

This tribute to the memory of Samuel Zacks is well worth the admission price of $2 and $4. It is running every night this week at 8:30 at Hart House until the 21st of November. Tickets may be reserved by calling 928-8668.

Women to protest strip tease at Convo Hall Thursday night

By JEAN BUBBA

Thursday night, Metro Morality Squad and the U of T Police will have their hands and eyes full of women at Convocation Hall.

While two professional strip teasers and two equally professional go-go dancers support the Mainline rock concert, co-sponsored by New and St. Michael's Colleges, the U of T Women's Caucus will be picketing outside Convocation Hall, to protest the selling of women's bodies for profit.

Robin Ross, the Vice-President and Registrar of U of T was unavailable for comment but Mrs. Ross assured the Varsity that he had no knowledge of the support group for Mainline.

SAC (President) Rod Hurd declined to comment on the situation which he deemed "trivial".

Greg Duffy, SMC Senate President said "There will be a meeting Wednesday of the presidents of the student councils of New and St. Michael's colleges with the deans of men of both colleges and all those responsible to discuss the ramifications of the issue and its relationship to the actions of the U of T police and the Metro morality squad."

These two latter groups will definitely be attending the concert.

The Metro morality squad is obliged to attend the concert since they have received a complaint.

Duffy went on to say, "If the Mainline show is as obscene as some people think it is, then that part of the show will be dropped."

Posters advertising Mainline placed in the men's campus residences play up the strip tease although the ad for Mainline in Monday's Varsity did not mention the strip tease.

Students' brief protests Soc 303 lectures

By CARLEY McDONALD
"Day after day, week after week, we have been coming to these incredible, vacuous lectures, hoping... that they would somehow become at least mildly interesting and relevant. . . We can stop kidding ourselves."

This statement is part of a brief which was circulated to students of Professor Oswald Hall's Sociology 303 - Canadian Society - at their Monday lecture. Written by Ulli Diemer (UC III), the paper was formulated in a student-run tutorial.

It went on to say that "this is our education, and we have a right to something better than what Professor Hall is offering. And it is obvious that things are not going to improve until the class gets together and tells him nicely but bluntly, that what we have been getting simply will not do."

Students gathered at the Sidney Smith Hall lecture room considered the course too trivial and disjointed. Several students felt that Hall stressed statistics too heavily and that he refused to delve into the "why" of issues. "His view of the world doesn't ask any important questions," said Caspars Djile (UC III).

Although everyone present felt that lectures were boring and in need of a change in format, some called the brief unnecessarily insulting and also disapproved of a phrase in a letter to the editor in Monday's Varsity which stated that "any dunce" could present statistics. David Depoe (UC III) who wrote the letter on behalf of tutorial group E agreed that "dunce" was an "unfortunate word" but maintained that Professor Hall is unwilling to give his point of view on relevant questions.

The students recommended that guest speakers should be obtained for lectures and that more class discussion should be permitted. Statistical material could be dealt with more quickly if it were mimeographed and handed out, thus leaving time for more in-depth study in class, they said.

A group of five students volunteered to present these suggestions to Hall before the next lecture.

Loyola's Rocky Martin hard on Varsity snipers

On more occasions than Blues' hockey fans care to recall, Loyola Warrior diminutive dandy goaltender, Rocky Martin, robbed Blues' forwards of seemingly certain goals in the 1-1 draw between the two teams last Friday evening at Varsity Arena. In this instance, the victim was captain John Wright. Wright headed a quick, hard, wrist shot towards the top far corner — only to have Martin snatch it out of the air. Loyola defenseman Larry Carrier was supposed to have screened Martin on the play. Blues meet the Western Mustangs tomorrow.

Soccer-rugger playoffs on

The opening shots have been fired in both the interfac soccer and rugger playoffs.

Monday, both Erindale and New College advanced to quarter-final soccer action. Erindale were decisive 5-0 victors over Law, while New downed Grads B 3-1.

The Erindale crew, who led 3-0 at the half, got three goals off the boot of Gene Konarsky and single markers from Stan Daniel and Les Gill. Pastorek, Muskat and McLennan scored for New while Vic Marafioti notched the lone Grad B goal.

Yesterday, St. Mikes A advanced to the soccer semi-finals with a 9-0 thrashing of Emmanuel. Ernie Facchini, Louis D'Onofrio, and Des Barba scored two goals each for St. Mikes while Dom Frasca, Bertil Lobo and Bob Cazola connected for single markers.

Erindale now meets Grads A this afternoon at 3:00 with the winner going against St. Mikes next Monday.

The other quarter-finals matches feature New against Scarborough today at 12:15 and St. Mikes B against Sr. Engineering tomorrow at the same time.

In the first rugger playoff contest, Engineering I, the defending Nankivell Cup holders, completed the semi-final draw with a 19-0 whitewashing of a brave, but out-classed, Innis squad.

Ken Newland paced the Engineers with six points. Anton Davies contributed five, Wayne Maddaver and Pete Newall three each, while Bob Cherniack added two more.

The Engineering seven now face St. Mikes tomorrow at 1.15 with a spot in the finals at stake. The other semi-final goes at the same time and features PhysEd against the Engineering II team.

Finals are set for next Monday afternoon and clash with the rescheduled Mulock Cup semi-finals.

Gaels' Lilles Omega winner O-QAA rep for national MVP

Heino Lilles, the big fullback who the Gaels depended on in the clutch situations this year, has been named the 1970 winner of the Omega award as the most valuable player in the OQAA Senior Intercollegiate Football League.

Despite a nagging knee injury, Lilles finished a distinguished seven-year career at Queen's winning the rushing crown and leading the Gaels to the Yates Cup.

Lilles is also the OQAA nominee for the Hee Crighton Trophy as the outstanding Canadian college football player.

The choice of the Western Canada Intercollegiate Athletic Association is Manitoba quarterback Bob Kraemer who will lead his defending national champions, the Bisons, into Varsity Stadium for this Saturday's College Bowl. Kraemer was also the Western selection last year when McGill's Dave Fleiszer was named the winner.

The selection of the Central

Canada Intercollegiate Conference is Ottawa Gee-Gees pivot Paul Paddon. Paddon was the league's leading passer with 1,211 yards and a 60 per cent completion percentage.

Tony Proudfoot, a large and truculent linebacker from the University of New Brunswick, is the candidate from the Bluenose conference.

The winner is expected to be announced at the College Bowl dinner Friday evening.

Trinity completes surprise football year

The Varsity — David Lloyd

An unidentified Forestry ball carrier is grounded by an equally unidentified Trinity defender.

Downs Forestry 13-12

By STAN KOROLNEK

Inspired by an enthusiastic pro-Trinity crowd, Trinity defeated Forestry 13-12 in a sudden death playoff on Monday to claim the third division title of the inter-faculty football league.

As a result of their victory, Trinity will now face PhysEd in one of the semi-final games for the Mulock Cup. The other game pits Vic against Dents. These games will be played on Monday Nov. 23rd at Varsity Stadium, starting at 12:00.

At the beginning of this football season no one had given Trinity any chance of winning one ball game — let alone their division! However, improving as the season progressed, Trinity goes into the playoffs undefeated.

In their most important game of the season, Trinity opened the scoring in the first quarter when Lance MacIntosh wriggled his way through the Forestry team for a 92-yard punt return.

MacIntosh should have been tackled on the Trinity 10-yard line but poor tackling allowed him to break loose for his long run. With Gerry Groskopf's convert Trinity led 7-0.

end on a six-yard dash to chop the margin to 7-6.

Instead of going for the game-tying convert, Forestry gambled on a two-point conversion but the tough Trinity defence held.

Trinity increased their lead in the third quarter when quarterback Dave Baker passed to Brian Cernick on a well-executed screen pass that went 32 yards and put Trinity ahead 13-7.

Forestry scored in the fourth quarter on a one-yard run by Rick Souter. The play came on a third down gamble after the strong Trinity defence had held on the first two downs.

The wide convert attempt left the score 13-12.

Trinity ran out the clock for the last two minutes after recovering a Forestry fumble at mid-field and left the young starry-eyed girls from Trinity very very happy.

Notes: Trinity now has the formidable task of facing the tough PhysEd defence on Monday. They will also have to contend with Gene Vincze's magic toe, which represents the bulk of the PhysEd attack. There is a rumour that the PhysEd team plans to cut off Vincze's foot, case it in bronze, and enshrine it in the hall of fame!

Brent Imlach

League start for Blues

With two exhibition games under their belt, Tom Watt and his Bloor Street Blueshirts commence league play tomorrow evening when they head for London for a contest with the Mustangs.

The Western team, who finished in third place last year with a record of five wins and six defeats, sport a new coach in Ron Johnstone.

Their two top scorers of last year, Bob Jeffery and Dick Oudekerk, are back for another season; however, Oudekerk, a slick defenseman who was a first-team all-star in '69-70, is injured and is not expected to see any action until December.

Blues should be at full strength for the match. Dave McDowall, a regular defenseman who had to sit out the Loyola game with a leg bruise, will return to action.

Watt is hopeful that his charges will be able to improve their touch around the net and break out in a scoring way. He's had them paying special attention to their shooting drills this week.

Adding interest to the match, will be the return of center Brent Imlach to face his old mates for the first time. Imlach has starred for the Mustangs for the past three seasons.

Blues travel to Sudbury on Sunday for an afternoon exhibition contest with the Laurentian Vees.

Dents protest food, prices in cafeteria boycott today

Fed-up dentistry students are boycotting the cafeteria in the Edward St. dents building.

The boycott, called for today by the Dental Student Society, is to protest the high prices and poor quality food offered in the cafeteria by Canterbury Foods, the caterer.

"Almost everyone here relies on the cafeteria," said Wayne Pulver, Dentistry SAC member. "We're sort of isolated here in Chinatown."

According to Pulver, prices in the cafeteria have risen in inverse proportion to food quality. Soft drinks that previously were sold in ten ounce cans for 15 cents are now being hawked in seven ounce glasses for the same price. Coffee has jumped 50 percent over last year's price to 15 cents.

The DSS is serving Free coffee all day Friday in the downstairs lobby.

Lack of space in the cafeteria is also cramping the dentists' style.

U of T's administration has refused to renovate the cafeteria, pointing to the fact that eventually the dentists are to move into new quarters.

"That won't be for about ten years," said a disgruntled Pulver.

According to Pulver, faculty members in dentistry are unofficially going to respect the boycott even though they have not openly supported the student move.

"To support it would put them in a bad light," he observed.

Mainline is cancelled after Simcoe Hall applies the pressure

By BEN FORSTER

A stripper, topless go-go dancers and Mainline were cancelled last night as a result of pressure from Simcoe Hall.

William Kent, the Executive Assistant at Simcoe Hall, "felt that it was inappropriate to have go-go dancers" said John Curtin, SMC student council treasurer. Kent allowed the organizers three choices: not to have the concert, to have the concert without the dancers and the stripper, or to have the concert elsewhere than on the campus.

Mr. R. H. Hayward, Director of Student Affairs at SMC, said that, "after publicity about the stripper became widespread, an irate student contacted the Toronto Morality Squad, who in turn, contacted Robin Ross. The registrar at Simcoe Hall then forced the issue. "None of us" said Hayward, "knew exactly what was going on."

Mainline, in their contract, had agreed to hire two professional dancers, but organizers were not aware at that time that topless go-go dancers were intended. As publicity was handled by Mainline's agent, it was fairly late before the organizers did find out what was to happen.

Curtin, after Kent's ultimatum, went to Mainline's agency, to see if the dancers could be dropped. But Curtin, "failed to find satisfaction," and therefore went on to the musicians' union whose president, Mr. Bridgewater assured Curtin, "that we were within our rights to demand that Mainline agree that no female dancer of any kind be in their act."

But band members apparently refused to drop the dancers and the stripper from their act. As a result the concert was cancelled.

The group of people that gathered outside Convocation Hall at concert time were not excessively irritated; most of them were told that their money would be refunded by the organizers.

At New College, Dean Kurt stated, "It's nothing that I would really care to comment on."

Air Canada cancelled Cuba flights

OTTAWA (CUP) — Air Canada cancelled five charter flights to Cuba sometime in October because of the unhealthy political climate in Canada, particularly in Quebec.

Both Air Canada and Unitours, the company who organized the charters, mutually agreed to cancel the flights indefinitely. "The negotiations were not quite complete when the trouble broke out in Montreal," said H. Riopelle, a spokesman for Air Canada.

"Because of the political climate in the country it would be unhealthy to charter flights to Cuba," he said. "You couldn't take the chance that there might be revolutionaries aboard."

If things get back to normal, Riopelle said he expects the flights will be continued. Meanwhile, the only way one can get to Cuba from Canada is by taking a freighter off the east coast.

Dents claim that the quality of cafeteria food isn't worth the cost.

Food, prices, places on campus

By MARCIA SINGER

"Food, glorious food!" celebrates a song from the musical, "Oliver". University food, dispensed from cafeterias and snack bars alike, has a long way to come before it will be called "glorious" but it certainly is reasonable.

Many of the cafeterias and snack bars are run on a commission basis by catering companies, such as Beaver Foods and Commercial Catering. For their services, the catering companies pay a percentage of their gross to the University. In return, the university provides cleaning, heating, debugging, and general maintenance.

There are exceptions. Innis College runs its snack bar on a non-profit basis. The U.C. Lit. Society manages the J.C.R. snack bar.

Prices seldom vary among the many cafeterias and snack bars. Here are the most commonly found prices.

Workers want union recognition, wage hike

By JUDY WAPP

About 30 of the 45 employees of Vail's Laundry and Dry Cleaning at 444 Bathurst St. have been out on strike since Nov. 9. Their demands are minimal — recognition of the union and living wages. The workers belong to the Laundry, Dry Cleaning and Dye House Workers International of U.S. and Canada, Local 351 and most of them have worked for Vail's for several years. A year ago the company was purchased by a Mr. Scherer.

Scherer, whose prices for laundry and dry cleaning are among the highest in town, refuses to recognize that his workers belong to a legitimate bargaining collective which has been certified by the Labour Board. After unsuccessful attempts at bargaining, the union applied for conciliation and from management got no recognition, no check-off and no increase. Two weeks later they went on strike

Since last year, Mr. Scherer has raised his prices for laundry and dry cleaning four times but his employees haven't seen any of it.

Most of the men end up with a weekly check of $58.00, the women with $47.00. There is no extra pay for overtime. Brenda Newman, who has worked for Vail's for six years gets an hourly wage of $1.55. Gerald Uffett, who describes his age as "old enough" is making $1.50 per hour after ten years as Vail's night watchman and caretaker. The engineer who runs the boiler room is out on the line in solidarity. He is being replaced by a man who is past retirement age and is being sneaked into and out of Vail's every day.

Morale on the picket line is good. Workers are receiving full pay from the union during the strike. On Wednesday afternoon, Vincent Knap, business agent for the union, was out in the line in a Santa Claus suit as the strikers walked back and forth in front of a very conspicuous sign in Vail's window stating Business As Usual. This is not exactly the case at the moment.

Canadians will 'gladly' accept loss of freedoms

CALGARY (CUP) — "Canadians are going to find the doors closing on many of their freedoms in the future," Edward Palk, president of the Northern Life Assurance Company, said yesterday.

He said he believes most Canadians will gladly accept less personal and financial freedom in return for an end to lawlessness in the streets and poverty in the home.

Palk, of London, Ontario, was addressing a meeting of the Calgary Life Underwriters' Association.

Palk said he feels, and he said public opinion polls support him, that the average Canadian wants to see stronger laws to deter violence.

Palk said that to help the poor a guaranteed annual wage must

An Okanagan Valley bi-weekly last week reprinted a controversial editorial from The Varsity.

The Vernon News, one of more than two dozen Canadian newspapers owned by Thomson Newspapers, Ltd., Nov. 9 reprinted The Varsity editorial which was first printed Oct. 19, following the imposition of the War Measures Act and the killing of Quebec Labour minister Pierre Laporte.

Originally titled "The Kidnapping Crisis and the Quebecois," the look at the FLQ drama."

Not a word was changed. Besides the Varsity reprint, the News printed a Remembrance Day editorial which called for "all generations" to remember the real meaning behind the Nov. 11 ceremonies.

The Vernon news was founded in 1891. The Varsity was founded in 1880.

Arts eliminates annual study period

By PETER HALL

The traditional study week between the official end of classes and the beginning of the examination period has been eliminated this year in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

In a letter to all departments and colleges the Faculty of Arts and Science announced yesterday that classes will end officially on April 17 and final exams will begin on April 19.

Dean Foulds, the Secretary of the Faculty explained that this is the result of a motion passed by the Faculty Council on May 26th.

There were 16 student representatives out of 1300 members on that Council at the time. Students will vote on restructuring the Council in a referendum next week.

When asked about the possibility of extending the year to incorporate a study week Dean Foulds noted that this might be possible but would be "very difficult" as the item would have to be reconsidered by the Faculty Council.

He described such a move as "undesirable" in that it would mean exam results might be released later than usual. He indicated that the time normally taken up by the study week will be used for an extra exam period in January.

Student reaction to the move has been generally negative. One student who was interviewed suggested that this would be particularly hard on first year students.

Bob Spencer, the SAC Education Commissioner pointed out that the Engineering Faculty allows two weeks of study time before exams and asked why the Arts and Science Faculty was unable to do the same.

"They seem to be determined to make us write exams and then they make it harder for us to do well in them."

It may be too late to do anything about this in the Faculty Council but I hope students will remember this when they vote in the Referendum next week," he said.

Rod Hurd, SAC President commented, "If in fact examinations were abolished there would be no need for a study period, but if we are going to continue to have exams as we do in most courses, then it would seem only reasonable to have a study week." Students will continue to have a Reading Week in February

ARTS AND SCIENCE STUDENTS

No classes will be held in the first week of the second term but final examinations will be held in some first-term courses on January 6th, 7th, 8th, 1971.

Some term examinations in other courses may also be held in that week.

The last day of classes in the second term has been changed to April 17th, 1971.

Students ask for ruling on campus centre plan

By BEN FORSTER

At a public meeting at Vic on Wednesday, students passed a motion requesting that the Faculty Council accept or reject the campus centre proposal within a month.

This decision, which had been deferred for at least a month by the faculty, would make it possible for the architects to go ahead on their plans, or, in the case of a negative decision, would make way for alternate plans.

Deferral of the decision for more than a month could effectively halt construction for a year, as heavy construction must take place during the summer months.

The suggestion for a campus centre came from the faculty originally. As one professor at Wednesday's meeting said "Everyone agrees that we should have a campus centre." But he went on to express considerable concern about the final size of the centre: "Dean Allen's suggestions for expansion and extension make it necessary for the new building to be able to house more seminars and lectures." Of even greater importance was the problem of sinking a large sum of money into such a building, only to find that operating expenses could not be covered.

Faculty members had grave suspicions of the plan as a whole. Although a decision to approve the campus centre in principal, meant no more than approving of the site and the extension of the dining facilities, faculty members felt that blueprints were already in existence, and that their approval meant, as professor Harvey (Dept. of Ethics) put it, "that building, at that site, for that money."

"Faculty has not done its homework. What has been finalized, was finalized in July," answered Reg Foster (VUSAC University Government Commissioner).

ATTENTION ALL LAW SCHOOL APPLICANTS

TAKE NOTICE OF LAW SCHOOL ADMISSION REQUIREMENTS!!!

Ontario law schools are anxious to receive applications early this year because of the increase in numbers of applicants. It is hoped that early receipt of applications will facilitate prompt admissions decisions. Candidates for admission to next year's classes are advised to submit applications by January or February.

Law Schools at Queen's University, The University of Toronto, The University of Western Ontario, University of Windsor and Osgoode Hall Law School (York University) require all applicants for the year 1971-72 to take the Law School Admission Test.

The test will be given at most Ontario university campuses and in major Canadian cities on the following dates in 1970 and 1971:

December 19, 1970
February 13, 1971
April 17, 1971
July 31, 1971

Candidates must register at least three weeks in advance of each test date. The test originates from Educational Testing Service, Princeton, New Jersey, and is administered throughout the United States and Canada. Five Ontario law schools have adopted the test as a result of the growing number of applicants in recent years. The purpose of the test is to provide the schools with additional information upon which admission decisions can be made.

Further information concerning admissions procedures can be obtained from the Admissions Office of any of the above five law schools, and information regarding the Law School Admission Test can be obtained from Educational Testing Service, Box 944, Princeton, New Jersey 08540, USA.

Haunting speech

Old speeches always seem to come back to haunt politicians, but this problem has been most acute in the case of Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Here we publish a little known tribute Trudeau made this spring to the memory of the Canadians who fought, in 1837 and 1838, to achieve a new social order in Canada. They failed, victims of a repressive statue state authority, as Trudeau clearly points out.

The bilingual speech was delivered last May 18, in Sydney, Australia, where Trudeau unveiled a commemorative plaque for Canadians exiled after the abortive rebellions.

The plaque we are unveiling today commemorates fifty-eight French-speaking exiles from Lower Canada, now the Province of Quebec, and ninety-two English-speaking exiles from Upper Canada, now the Province of Ontario. The former group was locked up in Longbottom stockade, not far from here; the others were sent to Van Diemen's Land. Until they were paroled, the Canadian deportees experienced all the humiliations and embarrassments of a convict's life. When they were eventually pardoned about four years after their arrival in Australia, they began making their way home.

Thirteen of the English-speaking group died in exile, and only about forty are known to have returned to North America; there is no record of what happened to the rest. All the French-language group went home except two who died in prison and a certain Joseph Marceau who, after marrying in Australia, decided to settle here. I know that some of his descendants are still living in this part of the world. Some are here this morning and I was delighted to shake the hand of a Mr. Marceau, who is here this morning and who told me about his children.

LES RECITS DES AVENTURES parallèles qui firent le malheur de nos déportés nous émeuvent toujours. Exaltés par un William Lyon Mackenzie, inspirés par un Louis-Joseph Papineau, tous deux personnalités effervescentes, ardents démocrates, esprits imbus de libéralisme, ils étaient au nombre de ceux qu'un pouvoir abusif et injuste avait poussé à la révolte en 1837 et en 1838, dans le Haut et dans le Bas-Canada.

Notre histoire les connaît sous le nom de 'Patriotes'. Leurs moyens étaient dérisoires. Mal armés, mal organisés, mal commandés, trop peu nombreux, les rebelles n'avaient aucune chance de réussir. Bien que faisant preuve souvent d'une remarquable bravoure, les pauvres Patriotes ne purent livrer qu'une guérilla intermittente et sans envergure.

LES REPRÉSAILLES, tantôt impitoyables, tantôt molles, généralement erratiques, dont ils furent l'objet avaient quelque chose d'arbitraire. On brûla inutilement, devant des femmes et des enfants terrifiés, des centaines de granges et de maisons dont les maîtres, insurgés ou non, avaient dû fuir.

On exécuta dix-neuf rebelles dans le Haut-Canada; on en pendit douze dans le Bas-Canada. Quelques francophones furent aimablement exilés aux Bermudes, où ils s'adonnerent au plaisir de la chasse. D'autres furent bannis ou incarcérés. D'autres, à peine arrêtés, se voyaient libérés. Et cent cinquante prisonniers, que nous honorons aujourd'hui, étaient déportés.

A ce point de ma brève évocation, l'échec du double soulèvement semble total, définitif. Pourtant la tentative des rebelles n'avait pas été vaine; leur courage insensé, leurs hérosismes obscurs, ont porté fruit. Ce fruit, ce n'est rien moins que l'avènement au Canada du gouvernement démocratique et responsable. Telle était l'aspiration fondamentale des rebelles et là-dessus, il convient de le souligner, les Patriotes des deux langues étaient en parfaite communion, malgré les particularités que présentaient certains de leurs griefs.

150 Canadians were exiled to Australia and New Zealand following the rebellions of 1837. Many were branded while on board ship.

ONLY THREE YEARS after the troubles of 1837-38, and as a direct result of them, the Act of Union was proclaimed. The Assembly was no longer responsible to the executive, the elected representatives of the people held the purse-strings, and British parliamentary democracy was introduced.

Once it had achieved responsible government, Canada could progress from colonial status to nationhood and then full independence. This is the evolution followed by many of the British colonies and, in particular, by Australia. Our common history of development into sovereign states is one link which unites Australia and Canada as members of the Commonwealth, and on which is based our close and friendly relationship.

This plaque which I am honoured to unveil commemorates the 130th anniversary of the Canadian deportees' landing in Australia. It stands as a record of our gratitude to all those who, so rashly and so gallantly, risked their lives for freedom, for our freedom.

REVIEW OF THE PRESS:

Two weeks ago we printed a special supplement on Quebec, "The Santo Domingo of Pierre Elliott Trudeau", which was researched and written by staff of The Last Post.

Many people said afterwards that it was the best analysis they had been able to read anywhere on the crisis in Quebec.

Now The Last Post has again succeeded in making available a thorough analytical report on the events in Quebec. The latest issue, which goes on sale today, is devoted primarily to shedding light on the areas of the Quebec situation which the commercial press has left deliberately in the dark.

The Last Post can do this because it is a newsmagazine controlled entirely by its journalistic staff. Their sole commitment is towards providing Canadians with important information which they cannot obtain elsewhere.

During the Quebec crisis Canadian journalists have been closely muzzled by their newspapers. Many of them cooperated with The Last Post in funneling information.

The lead story in this issue is an expanded and updated version of the "Santo Domingo" article. It shows that the most recent developments indicate that the federal government is continuing to use its special powers and its normal resources to make a "virtual desert of all opposition in Quebec — radical, liberal, nationalist, even, in some cases, conservative."

A light-hearted piece by Last Post staffer Nick Auf der Maur retells the story of how he was arrested and detained under the War Measures Act. A picture of the incredible bungling and haphazard manoeuvres of the police emerges from the tale he tells with his ironic wit.

Remarkably, none of the daily newspapers has yet printed stories in which people arrested under the Act's arbitrary provisions can relate what was done to them.

Other stories in this issue include an analysis of the activities of the Front d'Action Politique, the alliance of community groups which challenged Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau's political hegemony in the recent city civic election, as well as a discussion of the mayor's remarkable political career itself.

Drapeau, it seems, has an astonishing record of exploding election eve bombshells in order to assure electoral landslides for himself.

Last month, of course, he denounced his only opposition, the FRAP, as an FLQ front. But his technique has a long history.

In 1960, for instance, Drapeau led a provincial police raid on a downtown Montreal apartment to discover a "plot" against the election. The next day, election day, Montrealers read about it and elected Drapeau. No details of the plot were ever released, and no charges made.

In 1962 Drapeau denounced his opposition, the Civic Action League, as a Mafia front. And won again.

This exposition of the Drapocracy which rules Montreal is, again, something that the daily press has not made it a priority to elucidate.

A major contribution to an understanding of Quebec is the publishing of excerpts from the autobiography of FLQ member Pierre Vallières, which has not been published before in English.

The lengthy excerpts cover Vallières' adolescence and growth to political maturity. He recounts, for instance, how he was selected to succeed Pierre Trudeau as co-editor of Cite libre:

The Last Post on Quebec

"I had it in mind," he writes, "to transform the review, which up to that time had served to promote the interests of the liberal bourgeoisie, into a weapon for the Quebecois workers."

He records his astonishment at the direction taken by such one-time "socialists" as Trudeau, Marchand, Pelletier, and how he came to see the FLQ as the only alternative. A reflection of the crisis which still reigns is the fact that The Last Post saw fit to exclude two sections of the planned excerpts in order to avoid the danger of police action against the magazine.

The entire book will be published in English in January by Monthly Review Press.

A large part of the blame for the unreasoning hysteria which has gripped English Canada in the wake of the imposition of the War Measures Act, lies with the press, which imposed large degrees of self-censorship on itself and printed wild and unsubstantiated stories.

A prime culprit was the Toronto Star which, on Oct. 26, ran a front page story starting the rumours that the real reason for the severity of federal actions had been that an "interim administration" was going to seize power in Quebec.

This issue also contains a comprehensive analysis of the Nova Scotia fishermen's strike, the struggle that has received practically no attention at all from the Canadian media.

It is to the shame of Canadian journalism that such a wide hole has been left for The Last Post to fill.

This new issue of The Last Post is on sale starting today at The Varsity office, 91 St. George, second floor. Price is 50 cents.

Engineering capers are just 'fun', and don't exploit women, says EngSoc head

I would like to address myself to the letter written by the University of Toronto Women's Caucus that was published in Wednesday's Varsity.

First of all let me comment on the facts from which you derive your conclusions. I really don't see how the slave auction is "obvious in its exploitation and objectification (if there is such a word) of women".

No girl was forced to participate and no girl was coerced or paid, etc. to disrobe in front of the audience. The whole idea of the auction is to let off steam and to collect money for the United Appeal — money which despite The Varsity's completely inaccurate reporting was readily accepted by them.

Both were accomplished despite the disruptions of some women from CIN 203. A disruption of the engineering slave auction is a contradiction in terms. But no matter what The Varsity reports there is absolutely no attempt to exploit women in the annual slave auction and I would doubt whether any of 'the participants' would consider themselves exploited. In fact this charge is so ridiculous that I am hard pressed to see any validity in it at all.

The cheaper prices for women at our Hustling dances indicates an attempt to attract more girls to our dances not to maintain an "unequal relationship." The attempts to see these things as anything more than the above is a distortion of reality and is the sign of a lack of sense of humour among the members of the Women's Liberation Movement. If this is true, it certainly will be dull when the revolution comes.

Only one other thing should be mentioned. If your letter was a popular expression of unfavourable reaction to our activities, can you please explain to me why our hustling dances, capers and slave auctions are such a success and why it is so difficult to find a single issue of the Toike out of the 15,000 that are distributed around the campus.

Rather than claiming that we are perpetuating an outdated image perhaps it would be more accurate to accuse the U of T Women's Caucus of being out of touch with reality.

If that letter was the best that the Women's Caucus could come up with, maybe men really are superior to women.

Michael Sefton,
President,
Engineering society.

(Ed. Note: Sefton errs in one detail of fact: Following the slave auction Oct. 22, the United Appeal's public relations director told The Varsity that he "Wasn't happy with receiving money from that sort of thing.")

Fire half of the bureaucracy, urges part-time student

I was most interested in your report in the November 16th issue about part-time students. From personal experience, I can say that the primary cause of our second-class status is bureaucracy. Although I had to register for classes by August 1st, I did not become a legitimate student with that all important ATL card until November 16th — after 3½ months of going from office to office, writing letter after letter — and endless waiting.

In short, I do not wish to suggest another calendar, but rather that half the administrative staff be fired. In this way, it would be impossible to administer all those regulations and maybe they would start to think about education instead.

Eliminating the bureaucracy would have many advantages:

1. It would eliminate all those rules found in calendars whose existence serves to differentiate between full-time and part-time students — in other words we would acquire equality in law.
2. It would eliminate all the means used to delay the part-time student's enrollment and rights to an ATL card and all its associated privileges, such as the library or the Black Hart Pub. Thus we would gain equality in fact.
3. It would drastically reduce the operating budget of the University. This might help to (a) Stop the endless upward spiral of education costs so feared by the Economic Council of Canada, and (b) Free a lot of money for education (academic) of students rather than education (practical, unnecessary) of administrators.

I sincerely hope that the report on extension students will attract action rather than dust — without several more committees to study its implementation. It seems to me that if a crass commercial and capitalistic employer is willing to grant, indeed is sufficiently far-sighted enough to grant, an employee a little time off to go back to school, a nice, egalitarian, non-profit-making, idealistic, university should be equally far-sighted in helping that student to enrol on a basis at least no worse than that available to his full-time colleague.

George A. Richards,
No. 693002139.

Mr. H. Helbig

This is to acknowledge with thanks your letter of October 30th with the cheque for $600 which is the sum raised by your annual United Appeal auction. An official receipt is enclosed. (No. L02580, dated Oct. 30, 1970.)

On behalf of the volunteer campaigners and Public Relations Committee may I say that not only are the dollars gratefully received but we also applaud the energy, ingenuity and enterprise of all students involved in planning and carrying this fun-making as well as fund-raising event.

CONVOCAATION HALL, U of T

Strip-tease canned to avoid official 'embarrassment'

The Bump and Grind Review, the strip show portion of the festivities at Convocation Hall last night, was cancelled. The explanation from the students in charge is that pressure from the Administration prompted the cancellation. It is somewhat open to question why the Administration exerted pressure two days before the performance, when it has been scheduled and advertised for some weeks.

It seems that the Administration's motivation grew out of a fear of being linked with any activity which involved the Metro Morality Squad. A male student at the University complained to the Morality Squad, which is obliged to answer all such complaints. The U of T police were also alerted. They, in turn, contacted various officials trying to find out about the performance.

At the same time, the U of T Women's Caucus began to plan a protest. A member of the Caucus who is a student in New College (one of the sponsors of the show) complained to the student council and was heard by the Dean of Men. The Varsity started to research the story.

All of these actions converged on the officials who might have to bear responsibility for the show. A meeting between the presidents of the student councils and the deans of men from both New and St. Michael's Colleges resulted in the decision to cancel the show.

It is clear the decision was reached because of the embarrassment which might result if the Morality Squad were to take action, and not because a group of students objected to the exploitation of women's bodies for profit. The U of T Women's Caucus did not plan a protest against obscenity, but a protest to educate people towards a new view of fellow humans. In a strip show, a performer is nothing but a pair of breasts; at that moment all women are reduced and objectified to that state. This objectifies men conversely.

That people were to be exploited is further substantiated by the fact that the show was advertised as a strip show only in the men's residences. Other posters and The Varsity ad made only minute mention of the Bump and Grind Review. The poster for men devoted more than half its space to explaining that the Review is two strippers and two topless dancers.

The publicity people seem to hold the sexist view that this would attract men only. It would have been interesting to speak with unsuspecting patrons of the show, both male and female.

BOOKS

(a guest Watsup this week, from a green thumb t.w.)

Gardening Explained is an excellent British book about growing your own, to the benefit of both the palate and the eye. I strongly recommend it, especially to the person who has always admired gardens, but who panics at the thought of turning over part of his lawn to activities other than watering and mowing. When applying the information here to your own little plot, two facts should be kept in mind: climatic conditions in England differ from our harsher weather in Canada, and some plants are either not available or fare poorly in our country

D. J. Edward has collaborated with the British periodical Amateur Gardening and with a host of other people for the various illustrations which considerably enhance the rather dry text

A warning about pesticides, the author recommends the use of DDT and superphosphate, the former is harmful to humans and the latter to earthworms, which are extremely beneficial to the soil

Gardening Explained is published by the Hamlyn Group, it costs $5.95 but is well worth more.

Roscoe Fillmore's Green Thumbs is an entertaining and delightful book on gardening in Canada. It is of special interest to those concerned with flowers, shrubs, lawns and trees, but is somewhat lacking in its coverage of vegetable growing. Mr. Fillmore, who was all but born in a greenhouse, writes his instruction and explanations so that the reader feels as though he is looking over the author's shoulder.

Although most planting dates are applicable to the Maritime provinces, and particularly to Nova Scotia, we need simply keep in mind that spring is two to three weeks earlier in Ontario, even five or six in large cities, especially if the garden is fortunate enough to be sheltered from north winds.

Generally speaking, Green Thumbs, with its Canadian viewpoint, is a rare and valuable addition or beginning to a gardening library. It is published by Ryerson Press and costs $3.50

..... piled by A. Hellyer (editor of Amateur Gardening), whose simply and clearly presented knowledge has been culled from a lifetime of gardening experience. I would suggest the book more for experienced gardeners than for the "just want to eat my own tomatoes and lettuce" types. The British weights, measures, dates and species of plants must be converted to the Canadian scene.

Hellyer does mention some interesting edible plants, not usually grown here, such as colewort (small, quick-growing cabbages). The handbook deals with fertilizers, various types of gardens, greenhousing, pest control and new techniques of gardening, and is all in all a good reference manual.

The Hamlyn Group publishes it, for $2.50.

FOOTNOTE TO HEADS: The October issue of Dreadnought had an interesting article on growing Psilocybin — those beautiful magic Mexican mushrooms. They are legal to grow, eat, or smoke, but don't sell them. —M.C.

As part of its continuing science-fiction film festival, the Toronto Public Libraries is showing 1984 tomorrow night at 8:00 in the Learning Resources Centre, 666 Eglinton Ave. W.

Cinema Lumiere will screen Bergman's Wild Strawberries November 22-26 at 7:00 and 9:30 plus Sunday at 4:30

On November 23-26 at 7:00 the Studio Theatre, 565 College (west of Bathurst), is showing North by Northwest and Psycho for 75c.

FLICK OF THE WEEK: You either like Elvis Presley or you don't. I don't.

For this reason I went to see Elvis — That's the Way

It is in the hope that I would finally appreciate Presley in the same way that I awakened for the first time to Ten Years After in Woodstock and to Janis Joplin in Montreux Pop. Sad to say, I am as apathetic to Elvis now as I ever was. — H.M.

THEATRE

The Me Nobody Knows is on at the Crest Theatre, and the prices have gone down 4 bits. That's right, now you can get in for only $3 with ATL, just before showtime (8:30)

Beckett is back with two short plays sharing the bill with Warner's Maquette's at Hart House. This is a painless way to get into Beckett: one of his plays is only 30 seconds long. There's also a reading from one of Beckett's musings on an unfinished play — it helps to clarify what he's trying to do. ($2 with ATL)

The St Lawrence Centre has opened its '70-'71 repertory season with 3 plays (get this): The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man in the Moon Merigolds; The Enemy of the People (Ibsen); and A Yard of Sun (Fry). These three plays will be playing until March in the main theatre. Enemy of the People

MUSIC

The oldest (1950) and in many ways the best string ensemble on the international concert circuit, the Virtuosi di Roma conducted by Renato Fasano will appear at Massey Hall at 8:30 PM, Thursday Nov. 26. The thirteen member Italian group was established in 1950 and has rescued composer Antonio Vivaldi, among others, from semi-oblivion.

A free band concert Sunday (Nov. 22) afternoon at 3:00 by the U. of T. Concert Band under Robert Rosevear. Concert will be held at the Edward Johnson Bldg.

Next Thursday, the Virtuosi di Roma appear at Massey Hall. Also on Thursday at 2:00 a recital by bassoonist Nicholas Kilburn and 'cellist Peter Schenkman at the Concert Hall of the EJB. No admission charge. C'est tout. —T.J.

No No Nanette is a musical comedy just arrived at the O'Keefe Centre for a two-week run. No social comment, just laughter and song.

The Theatre Passe Muraille also has a new play "I Had It But It's All Gone Now" starting tonight. This is the theatre for late-show addicts, watch for sideshow No.3 after the main play. It's worth the wait.

Penelope starts next Wed at U.C. Playhouse, 8.15 p.m. and last but not least:

Why not take advantage of your last (2) chances to see Brecht: The Measures Taken, and The Exception Rather than the Rule at the UC Playhouse tonight and tomorrow — D.S.

Romiossini: the story of the Greeks

*The sky weaves good morning with countless leaves.
The skies teem with whirling banners
While some are held in iron, others in earth.*

*Listen! Any moment bells will herald
This land is theirs and this land is ours.*

—Yannis Ritsos, imprisoned Greek poet

By Christos Theodorakakij

The author, a Greek, is an engineering student at U of T.

THE STRONG linguistic and cultural unity of the Greek people was never broken during the period of Turkish rule. The first Greek revolutionary movement at that time consisted of small bands of fighters who had taken to the mountains and never gave up their independence. These "klefts" (thieves), their ballads and exploits became the major element of Greek folklore.

By the late 18th century the internal weakening of the Turkish Empire and the inspiration of the French Revolution led many Greeks to seriously play for their own liberation.

In 1792, Rhigas Pheraios, one of the leaders of the revolutionary movement wrote:

*"Bulgorions, Albonions, Armenions, Greeks black and white, let us belt the sword all together in a surge for freedom.
So the world will know that we are the brave! How did our forefathers surge like lions, leaping for liberty into fire? So we, brothers, too, must seize our arms and cast off at once this bitter slavery to slay the wolves who impose the yoke, and cruelly torture Christian and Turk."*

The personal destiny of Pheraios was to be tragic. He was seized by the Austrians and handed over to the Turkish authorities who executed him by strangulation. Although the revolutionary tide could not be broken even after Pheraios was lost, the foreign powers intervened and imposed a Bavarian monarch.

Great Britain, in particular, opposed a large and independent Greece in such a way that Macedonia, Epirus, Thessaly, and most of the Aegean islands remained under Turkish rule.

THE PATTERN of foreign interventionists subverting indigenous democratic forces has plagued the Greek people ever since.

The Bavarian monarchy of 1829 was a betrayal of the revolution. From the first days of King Otto's rule, democratic forces took up the struggle for a republic that would embrace all Greek speaking people. King Otto was not the true voice of Greece and the remainder of the century saw attempt after attempt by democratic leaders to place the destiny of Greece in democratic Greek hands.

The twentieth century proved even more bitter than the nineteenth. Since 1900, the Greek people have witnessed thirty seven revolutions, counter-revolutions, foreign interventions, local wars, and civil wars.

The towering figure in the early part of the century was E. Venizelos. He was the leader in the struggle to liberate his native Crete, which became part of Greece in 1910. In that same year Venizelos was invited to become premier of Greece. He led his nation to successfully take part in the Balkan Wars, which liberated the rest of the Greek people and doubled the size of Greece.

THE MONARCHY of King Constantine was overthrown, but after World War I, Greek political life was again chaotic.

The disastrous war in Asia Minor led to an exchange of populations with Turkey, but in 1924 a plebiscite declared Greece a democratic republic. The world depression and the rise of fascism in the 1930's brought new vigour to the reactionaries. Under the military leadership of General Metaxas and with King George as its nominal head, the Greek rightists established a regime on the model of Germany, Italy and Spain.

Thousands of Greek patriots went to prison.

When World War II broke, the Greek officer corps was not prepared or willing to fight its fascist friends. Mussolini's demand for free passage through Greece brought a crisis. Hundreds and then thousands of national guardsmen took up their arms and moved to the borders without formal orders from their superiors. The regular army never gave full support to the partisans.

DURING THE NAZI occupation, men and women streamed to the mountains and Europe's first major guerilla army came into existence. The anti-fascists of the world thrilled when Manolis Glezos, with another patriot, ripped the swastika from the Parthenon. But behind such individual heroism was the EAM Underground and its military wing, ELAS, which organized two million people in a popular anti-fascist struggle.

As the war drew to an end, various political groupings formed. Great Britain and the USA were determined that a new government be friendly to their post-war Mediterranean ambitions. The monarchists were anxious to dissociate themselves from their overt and covert ties to the Nazis. The Soviet Union had agreed at Yalta that Greece was to be in the Anglo-Saxon sphere of influence, but she could not turn her back on the partisan armies which now lifted the banners of 1917.

Compromises were attempted, but the situation ended in Civil War. The massive aid in planes and heavy weapons given to the royalists by the USA helped them to successfully win the guerilla positions and crush the revolution. The captured rebels were placed on island concentration camps while thousands of others became permanent exiles.

BY 1960 A CULTURAL and political renaissance was in full swing. The leading parties of the sixties were the Center and the United Democratic Left (EDA) (Center Union was led by the aging George Papandreou, whom many former guerillas disliked because of his role in the post-war period, but whose son, Andreas, appealed to a wide spectrum of opinion).

In 1963 the EDA deputy Gregory Lambrakis was murdered in Thessaloniki by right wing terrorists under the orders of the chief of the police state. The movie Z is based on this event. Mass demonstrations of the Greek people brought down the government Karamanli's and led to the election of George Papandreou.

A crisis developed in 1965 when Papandreou wanted to assume control of the army he replacing the Defense Minister who was loyal to the king with a person loyal to the democratically elected government.

THE KING DISMISSED Papandreou over this issue and for two years the nation drifted without a democratic government. Class demonstrations and the need to end the political crisis resulted in the calling for elections to be held on May 28, 1967. The center union and the United Democratic left seemed certain of winning 70-80 per cent of the seats in Parliament.

On April 21, 1967, a group of colonels backed by the CIA led a coup to prevent the elections scheduled for the next month. They arrested all democratic political leaders and destroyed all political life.

Artists were particularly hard hit. Their works were banned and those who were not out of the country were sent to prison. The patriots have been sent back to the island death camps and once more the people sing the kleptic ballads.

GREEK FREEDOM WEEK ends tonight at York University with a program of music, dance and theatre. Cost is $1 to students, and it's at York's Burton auditorium at 8 p.m. Allow an hour for travel, and take the Keele bus north from the Lansdowne subway station.

U.S. revolutionary conference to re-convene

WASHINGTON (CPS — CUP) — The Revolutionary People's Constitutional Convention will reconvene in Washington, D.C. Nov. 27-29.

Washington members of the Black Panther Party have been receiving the run-around from local city and university officials since they announced plans Sept. 7 to hold the convention in Washington.

Oddly enough, no one wants to house the 7,500 — 8,000 people expected for the second plenary session of the re-writing of the U.S. constitution.

Members of the Panther D.C. chapter have been refused use of both the Washington National Guard Armory and the Cole field house at the nearby University of Maryland.

THE ARMORY, one of Washington's largest places for "public" assemblies has been refused for Panther use with a variety of excuses. The application was first turned down due to date conflict. Upon specific request of the facility for the Nov. 27-29 weekend, Armory head administrator Arthur Bergman said the facility was no longer to be used "for rock concerts or organizations such as yours."

Predominantly black Howard University in Washington is considering a request to allow the sessions to convene on the campus.

BY CONCENTRATING on the kind of society which radicals want after a revolution, the Panthers hoped to avoid the friction over strategy, which characterized previous meetings of diverse radical groups. In large measure the tactic succeeded, although Michael Tabor of the New York Panthers issued a broadside attacking the Progressive Labor Party as "enemies of the people" for attempting to organize a march on the city hall which the Panthers feared would bring the Philadelphia police down on the black community.

At the Philadelphia meeting, the main work was done by discussion groups, which brought a number of reports to a plenary session of 10,000. The November convention will attempt to mold these into a new constitution for the country, which will then be used as a model for a post-revolutionary society.

Discussion group proposals included:

- PLANS TO END AMERICAN IMPERIALISM. Discussion groups called for the immediate withdrawal of all U.S. forces from around the world and for the abolition of the standing army, to be replaced by a system of people's militias made up of only part time soldiers. The delegates recognized and accepted that the end of imperialism would necessitate a lower standard of living for Americans, who now consume over 60 per cent of the world's resources while only constituting six per cent of the population.

- Community control of police. The police would be under the control of community elected boards, which would be able to fire policemen, nonuniformed police would be prohibited, and the combined budget for police and the military would be less than 10 per cent of the national budget.
- Land reform. Control of the land will be vested in the community with the entire nation determining a general policy for land use, and the communities handling local problems.
- Basic rights for all people.

Rights to food, shelter, employment, medical care, education, birth control and abortion would be granted.

- An end to the oppression of women. The discussion groups called for free child care centres, free child delivery, free abortion and for 50 per cent of all leadership positions to be held by women.
- The end of the nuclear family. This proposal provoked considerable disagreement, with one discussion group saying the nuclear family might work out under socialism, and the groups on women's and gay liberation opposed.

That hair on your face.

If you're about to graduate, you're also about to move into a corporate world dominated by older people. Older people have been known to get quite tense about long hair and beards.

What do you do if your hair is longer than theirs? Cut it off and feel like a cop out? Leave it and risk losing a fine job?

Not shattering questions. But they may be part of a thicket of little problems, all twitching at you as you start those job interviews.

We wrote a booklet about going to job interviews. Eight pages only, but we packed it with what we've learned about coming face to face with strangers. The thrust is simple: how to approach, engage in and leave an interview on your own terms.

It's called "How to separate yourself from the herd." It talks about handling nervousness, money, and the guy across the desk from you. It talks about hair and how to turn an interview around. Things like that.

You'll find it tucked into a much larger book, also new, called The Employment Opportunities Handbook. The handbook is yours for the asking at the placement office.

Please understand, though. We don't kid you that eight pages, packed or otherwise, are going to pull off a miracle between now and the time you take your first interview.

But they just might help.

SAC picks Women's Lib delegate

By MARIS PAVELSON

Heather Swanson of the U of T Women's Caucus was named by SAC last night to represent the university at a women's liberation conference to be held this weekend in Saskatoon.

The appointment was the result of a non-meeting of the SAC Executive Committee last night. Only five of the necessary quorum of seven appeared and thus any decisions made were not official.

However, SAC President Rod Hurd explained that decisions made by the executive can be ratified later at an official meeting.

Initially, the representative was to have been Eden Anderson of St. Hilda's College. Anderson, who is not known to be very close to the women's lib movement, had been nominated by the SAC External Affairs Committee.

Brian Hayes, SAC Communications' Commissioner, viewed the nomination of Anderson as a weird SAC-type joke.

In order to accommodate the Women's Caucus, Hurd called an Executive meeting for Wednesday to decide between Anderson and the Caucus nominee. Confusion reared its ugly head, however, when the date of the meeting as posted in the SAC offices was set for yesterday.

This bureaucratic drama ended last night with the appointment of Women's Caucus member Swanson. Her $115 transportation costs will be paid for by SAC.

Swanson, upon her return, will report to SAC and otherwise disseminate the information which she collects this weekend in Saskatoon.

Quebec to screen civil servants

QUEBEC CITY (CUP 1) — The Quebec government will start screening all civil servants working near Liberal Prime Minister Robert Bourassa following the arrest last month of a receptionist in his Montreal office, Jocelyne Despatie, 21, was charged last week with seditious conspiracy and with being or professing to be a member of the Front De Liberation Du Quebec.

The screening was ordered by Quebec Justice Minister Jerome Choquette Tuesday to filter out any members of the FLQ who hold government positions. "We have been lax in the past, but now we'll have to be more severe and strict in screening our personnel," he said.

By the time Choquette made the announcement of the screening, Montreal police had questioned more than 15,000 people and searched nearly 4,000 empty buildings without turning up any clues concerning the whereabouts of abducted diplomat James Cross.

Ryerson sale is opposed

By SANDRA LANZALONE

Students of the Ontario College of Library Sciences have voiced opposition to the possibility of McGraw Hill, an American owned company, taking over the Canadian Ryerson Press.

Ashley Thompson, Student Council President for the College, voiced the librarians' objection to such a transaction. "Librarians are interested in the preservation of Canadian culture. Since publishing is an aspect of culture we object to American intervention!" He added that unless the government took action and tried to relieve the existing financial problems, it would be inevitable that Americans would gain control of Canadian publishing.

"Hopefully, an emotional rejection by Canadians might prompt the government to intervene. If not, there is danger that Canadians are opening themselves to American imperialism," said Thompson.

Markle Copp winner; Paddon national MVP

Fullback Glen Markle, whose sobriquet "The Bull" was cut perfectly to fit his running style, has been named the 1970 winner of the Johnny Copp Memorial Trophy as the football Blues most valuable player.

The award, which was won by flanker Eric Walter last year, is decided by a vote of the players themselves.

A graduate of Richview Collegiate, Markle closed out an outstanding seven year career with the Blues this season as he won the O-QAA scoring title and earned a spot on the Canadian Sports Digest's all-Canadian team.

Markle, who was the only member of the Varsity backfield to start all seven league games, scored 42 points on seven touchdowns and gained 455 yards rushing.

Meanwhile, preparations continue for the College Bowl championship to be played tomorrow between Manitoba Bisons and the Ottawa Gee-Gees. The absence of the Queen's Gaels and the fact that there will be no blackout of the Eastern Conference playoff game between Hamilton and Man-treil leads to speculation that the crowd will likely be something less than capacity.

Both teams arrived in town last night and will workout on the Trinity field today. Manitoba at 2:30 and Ottawa at 4:00 p.m. The Bisons, coached by former Winnipeg Blue Bomber great Henry Janzen, took their second-straight Western Canada Inter-collegiate crown suffering only two defeats. They then downed the Gaels in the Western Bowl last Saturday.

The Gee-Gees, coached by former Ottawa Rough Rider star Boh

O'Billovich, are undefeated after sweeping their regular season schedule in the Central Canada Conference and then defeating the University of New Brunswick Red Bombers in the Atlantic Bowl.

The Gee-Gees' offense is led by quarterback Paul Paddon who earlier this week was named the winner of the Ilec Crighton Trophy as the country's top college grid star.

The Bisons will depend heavily on their strong running game paced by backs Mike Slylo and Bob Toogood.

Blues clean Western 8-3 in league opener

London (Staff) — The Varsity Blues had simply too much of everything as they outclassed the Western Mustangs for a solid 8-3 victory last night here at the London Gardens.

It was the opening league game for both teams. Western finished in third place last year with a 5-6 record while the Blues, of course, are the defending champions.

Skating around the Mustangs almost at will, Blues fired 59 shots at the Western goal-tending duo of Pat Grace and Mac Smith.

Guarding the Blues' net, sophomore Grant Cole had an almost leisurely evening, facing only 29 opposition shots. However, Cole played his usually spectacular game — especially in the middle period when for 84 seconds Blues were short two bodies.

PERHAPS BECAUSE of the disgracefully small crowd of 200 on hand, Blues could not get untracked in the opening stanza and held only a 1-0 margin. Newcomer Mac Hickox notched that one when he poked in a loose puck with the home side one man down.

In the second period, Blues exploded with two markers in the first 90 seconds. Captain John Wright scored the first one with a quick, wrist shot from four feet out and then Brian St. John connected as he flipped the puck over goalie Grace.

Bob Jeffery for the Stangs then

Nick Holmes and Terry Peterman for Blues completed the scoring in the middle period as Varsity took command 5-1.

The third period saw Blues run into a rash of penalties taking six of seven minors plus a misconduct to left winger Gord Davies.

Despite playing short handed for the majority of the period,

Blues outscored the Ron Johnstone-coached Western team 3-2 in the final stanza.

Wright and Holmes with their second goals each and right winger Mike Boland found the range for Blues while Wayne Heasman and Rick Smith replied for the thoroughly corraled Mustangs.

Dave McDowall headed a steady blueline corps as he set up two break-a-way goals with pinpoint passes.

For those interested Blues hockey fans who tomorrow are neither watching the College Bowl, the EFC pro final or the Ohio State-Michigan classic; you can see the game replayed on Channel 11 starting at 2.00 p.m.

B-Ballers must shuck athletic constipation

By PETER WHITE

Dirty rumour has it that last year's Basketball Blues spent the off season ingesting a crash diet of yoga and the "Tranc" — the former to force them to meditate on their recent nullity, the latter to give them the inspiration to bear the whips of their immediate oppressors. They'll need both in this year's effort to shuck their athletic constipation and start playing some real basketball.

To those who have considered last season's debacle (and those who should have, but have not) the point must be sadly clear. Last season's 1-9 effort lends only discredit to the athletic department, the coaching staff, and the player's themselves.

THE PROBLEMS CONFRONTING the inter-collegiate basketball programme here are only now swelling to a head (it's a big head) and this office will support any positive efforts made to right what it considers to be a very wrong situation.

The surest solution to these type athletic woes is a winner — whether the 70-71 Blues can fill the prescription is at this early date impossible to predict but a whispering optimism could be heard these past evenings as Blues prepped for their first late awakening at York tonight.

Can there be any consolation in the return of most of last year's habitual losers? Probably yes. For, with the exception of long-gone John Hadden, the returnees are the quality players who finally sparked Blues toward credibility near season's end.

Bill Boston, Garth Evans, Mike Katz, Angus Braid and the kingpin, Larry Trafford, form an experienced and well-scarred nucleus. Back for another crack are Barry Markowsky and big Gerry Barker. Having stood the test of time (a primary asset in this particular establishment — who can stand it around here for long, eh Bruce) they should endure well the only test which means much in the world of games — winning some!

Innocents in the fold include Wayne Dunkley, Dan Foster, Rob Lewis, Steve O'Neill, Dave Watt, Bill Caskey and former Blue thrice remover, Ron Voake.

AS A GROUP, they are deeper in basketball interest, enthusiasm, and skill than the fodder which last season was consumed on Varsity's thorny bench and then turned to lick their sores in the action of the interfac league.

Voake, a native of San Diego, is described as smooth by those who have seen him in the past years as a member of Blues. Should he retain his former scoring bliss, he may prove to be, in this season's struggle to break into the providence of basketball reality, Blues much longed for second coming.

Caskey, a thinny six-foot-four, promises to compensate for the loss of Hadden, the tallest member of last-year's team, their leading rebounder and elected most valuable player.

Blues suffer again from an anemic schedule which provides only five exhibition games before the regular season (half the number most schools have arranged). However, a sure plus is the move back to Hart House where all the home games will be staged.

It is expected that this move not only will be of benefit to the team, since they practice there daily, but also to the fans who will no longer be obliged to make the Homeric trek out to York to view another further tragedy.

IN ANTICIPATION OF a resurgence in interest in our basketballers, Radio Varsity will broadcast three of these home encounters. A token effort certainly, but nevertheless a noble one — especially when one considers the possibilities some of last year's games provided:

e.g. Jack: Well Morty, from your court-side vantage point, what do you make of this?

Morty: Jack, I'm thinking we'd better make it back to the Boston Gaddens.

It is the outset of a new season and the press would like to feel more excited; instead, we're holding our breath. Tonight will be our first glimpse at this season's Blues as they take on coach Bob McKinney's York Yeomen.

Game time at York it is 8.00 p.m. and admission is free. It could be Blues most important test all season. Throw tragedy to the incompetents — make us some melodrama guys!

Interfac roundup: Grads A and Erindale must replay soccer

Grads A and Erindale couldn't settle their soccer dispute in regulation time on Wednesday so the game will be replayed today at 1.15 to decide who will join St. Mikes A, Sr. Engineering and Scarborough in the semi-finals of the Arts Faculty Cup playdowns.

The match, which began at 3.00 p.m., was finally called on account of darkness with the scored tied 2-2.

In the one completed game Wednesday, Scarborough downed New College 5-2. Yesterday, Sr. Engineering blanked St. Mikes B 5-0.

In rugby action, the finalists have been decided with the PlysEd seven set to meet defending title holders, Engineering 1, Monday afternoon at 1.15.

Referendum Tuesday on Fac council parity

Arts and Science students go to the polls tomorrow and Wednesday to voice their opinion in what has become the most important issue of the year in that faculty — the Faculty Council Referendum.

Around the campus college councils and course unions have been throwing their support behind the holding of the referendum and also have been urging an affirmative vote to the two questions being asked.

St. Mikes, Scarborough, and Trinity have come out strongest of all in favor of the referendum, with the councils of each giving unopposed support to the two questions, and giving money for the support of the campaign. University College, Erindale, and Victoria have also supported the referendum, with many of their members working actively to inform students of their colleges about the issues involved.

Innis' student council considered it unnecessary to pass a resolution supporting the referendum, since it felt the vast majority of its students supported it anyway and no resolution could make them support it more.

In the world of course unions, the sociology, political economy, math, physics, and chemistry unions have all been vying with each other to see who can be the most ardent supporter of the referendum.

The holding of the referendum results from the October 28 walk-out of the student members of the Faculty Council, declaring that their presence there was merely token and totally ineffective. It was at that meeting that the Council had finally rejected a student motion to create a restructuring committee of equal staff and students, after refusing for two meetings to give any decision at all on the issue.

Students had accepted seats on the interim general committee only on the understanding that the present arrangement was definitely temporary and that a committee would be formed as soon as possible to decide the permanent structure.

The Faculty Council is the most important body of the faculty, and has final authority over all academic matters. Just last week it was announced that this Council had eliminated the traditional study week just before exams in April. Last year the Council decided that it would be obligatory for all first year students to write three hour final exams in all their subjects. Another landmark was made when the Council refused to accept the pass-fail gradings of CIN 193, demanding that regular marks be given.

Third year Psychology courses to be specialized

By LAURA KELLY

Psychology students may face course pre-requisites and restricted registration in third and fourth year courses if the department administration has its way.

Third year courses will be more specialized, fourth year courses will be seminars, and there will be added choices among the more generalized second year courses, according to Prof. Anthony Doob, the psychology department undergraduate secretary.

Enrollment in the third year courses will drop from about 250 to 50 students.

"Before, a student had to wait until fourth year to get in a small course," said Doob.

The Psychology Students Union, opposed both to the changes and to the method of change, is meeting today in Room 4038 of Sid Smith.

"The department is reverting to the Honour's system in everything but name," said Sam Zybergold, a third year student and member of the Psychology Students Union, because of the fear of courses being "watered down" due to too much interdisciplinary diversification.

Zybergold said that the added prerequisites will keep students within the department and prevent "shopping around" for other courses.

"There shouldn't be rigidity between the different disciplines. Now you're going to have to be a psychology major to take psychology courses," said Zybergold.

"When you are in a fourth year seminar, and everyone else has taken all the same courses, how much can you learn from the other students," said Zybergold.

"I just don't agree with the prerequisites or with the decision-making policy," he said, and explained that he felt students could handle the more specialized courses without completing prerequisites.

Doob commented that students on the committee which made the recommendations came to a consensus and thus parity in decision making was not a relevant issue in this case.

Canterbury Foods faced an empty cafeteria Friday as dentistry students boycotted the Edward St. lunchroom's high prices. Dents eased the pain with free coffee downs-airs.

Vallieres' book refused

A student move to include a book by Pierre Vallieres, a political prisoner in Quebec, on the U of T English curriculum was blocked by the council of the combined departments of English Friday.

The council, which is controlled by the old guard English faculty, was ratifying course changes for its 1971-72 program, when a non-voting student observer suggested a "symbolic amendment" to one of the courses.

Brian Johnson (III UC) suggested two changes in a seminar course entitled "Literature and Social Criticism: The Problem of Individualism":

- o that the word "individualism" be changed to "capitalism";
- o that the name "C.B. Macpherson" be dropped from the reading list, which also includes names like Marx, Freud, Marcuse, Lawrence, Faulkner; and that it be replaced by Pierre Vallieres, author of Les Negres Blancs d'Amerique.

"Macpherson is not enough of a Marxist to understand his own class role," said Johnson. "He is a political prisoner in the intellectual bourgeoisie of English Canada, an academic Marxist. But Vallieres, a prisoner of the state in Quebec, is part of the most potent revolutionary situation in Canada."

Two voting student members of council moved and seconded Johnson's amendment.

But faculty members said the motion would be a political dictate to students, and B. S. Hayne, council chairman, ruled the motion out of order.

Student member Richard WRIGHT (III VIC) challenged the chair.

The faculty majority were impatient to return to more important issues like examination policy. So Hayne quickly performed the Roberts-Rules ritual of soliciting a vote of confidence from the meeting.

The Vallieres incident followed a faculty-student wrangle over the importance of first-year examinations. The faculty pushed for an examination worth 40 per cent of the final mark, while the student minority argued for 25 per cent. The two groups bargained to a thirty-three-and-a-third compromise.

Pierre Vallieres, who is charged with sedition and conspiracy, was unavailable for comment about the council's rejection of his book, Les Negres Blancs d'Amerique.

The English translation, The White Niggers of America, will be published by Moutbly Review in January.

Reform in the air

Trinity unites behind Owen

By BRAIN MORGAN

At a mass meeting Friday at Trinity College students and faculty voted together in a unanimous vote of confidence in the Provost, D.R.G. Owen.

There had been fear that the Provost was considering resigning as a result of an unfavorable reaction to his ideas by some members of the Corporation — the final legal authority of the college. At a meeting the day before, the Corporation had tabled proposed changes in the statutes of the college dealing with discipline, as well as proposed discussions of reform of the governing bodies of Trinity.

The proposed changes in the statutes were to completely eliminate the concept of in loco parentis from the regulations regarding discipline, in order that they would be consistent with the existing practices of the college. The discussions on the governing structures were to determine the role of students on bodies on which they have previously had no representation.

These changes all formed integral parts of the Provost's annual report.

The tabling of these proposals and the accompanying questioning of Owen's report were unprecedented in the history of the college.

The Corporation, has always previously confined its interest to the business matters of Trinity and has merely rubber-stamped measures dealing with academic or student life.

However, in the last few years there have been growing signs of a divergence of views between the Corporation's conception of the college and that of the students and faculty. The focus of this has been disagreement over the role of students and faculty in the governing structure.

Provost Owen has emerged as one of the most effective exponents of the idea that all members of the Trinity community must be given responsibility in making decisions that affect the college.

Speakers at the meeting said his loss would irreparably damage the evolution of both a better academic and residential life at Trinity. They emphasized the fact that he has consistently supported giving students greater responsibility for the conduct of their own lives and a greater role in determining the conditions under which they work and live.

The Friday meeting also urged that moves be made to meet personally with members of the Corporation to try to resolve their differing views and form a more truly cohesive community out of all parts of Trinity College.

Speaks at Holy Blossom

Abernathy claims Blacks not anti-semitic

By JEFFREY WILSON
Through the midis and tweeds of affluent Toronto a line of blacks edged to their seats while the stare of the congregation's eye rotated from the blacks sitting amongst them to Reverend Ralph Abernathy, the black standing above them, who had joined the Holy Blossom Temple congregation in an extraordinarily sensitive service.

Abernathy, successor to Martin Luther King as leader of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, spoke to the crowded congregation after the Friday evening service had been completed.

Proclaiming, "I need you, you need me. We need each other," the slow speaking man went on to indicate that the Jew and the Negro must work together to end as he states, "the desperate and violent Wallace and Agnew appeals."

"He warned the predominantly Jewish assembly that although Jewish racism and black anti-semitism do exist, both groups must realize that such feeling is minimal. Any conflict that does arise between the black and the Jew has been blown up and exploited by the true American racists who are tactfully trying to destroy both minorities through a 'divide and conquer' strategy."

Abernathy showed how Black resentment towards whites in the ghetto is often construed as anti-semitism. "The ghettoed black probably meets five representative whites in his lifetime; the teacher, social worker, merchant, policeman, and landlord. Of these, four are likely to be Jewish." The Southern Christian Conference Leader implied that these are victims of the black's struggle for freedom and not targets for anti-semitism. As for Jewish racism, Abernathy asserted that such feeling must exist but was careful enough not to forget to mention that the Jew had, in fact, been the black man's main ally in his freedom struggle in the southern U.S. states. He related the story of how a Rabbi Rotchild's support of the Negro in Atlanta, Georgia, had led to his temple being bombed by the Ku Klux Klan.

On the question of Black militarism and its goal of destroying Israel, Abernathy issued amazement at how his black brethren could hope to achieve justice by destroying what he termed as "the most socially progressive state of Israel, and a product of a liberation movement for justice."

In an almost defensive tone he told how this tiny nation had given more technical aid to the Black nations of Africa than any other powerful country. As almost a conclusion of his statement of the need for Blacks and Jews to understand the degree of either racism or anti-semitism Abernathy stated, "Anti-semitism is intolerable and immoral, as harmful to the black people as to the Jews because it forces the poison of racism everywhere."

Between the rising and lowering of the tone in his solemn and structured speech, one began to realize that Abernathy was not only interested in the pragmatics involved in Black and Jewish unity but rather in the historical and spiritual similarities between the two cultures which could advance his 'non-violent' precedent. With somewhat less oratory impact than his predecessor, who also spoke to the same congregation, Abernathy espoused the great religious explanation and necessity for non-violence.

He proudly proclaimed, "It appears that I hear a strange voice as I see the bushes of our society on fire. It appears that the voice proclaims, 'Ralph Abernathy, remove the shoes you wear for you walk on holy ground.'"

Then, the newly incarnated Moses added, "We are out of Egypt. We have crossed the Red Sea. I question whether Pharaoh's army got drowned or not."

But we have crossed the Red Sea. Now we must reach Canaan."

In pointing to America, Abernathy brought the two minorities together by lecturing, "The Jew has not settled for the crumbs of the pie of success and neither shall the Blacks."

Black militant group organizes against capitalism and racism

By ERIC MILLS
A militant black group, which has grown out of the experience of workers on the production lines of America, was described Thursday night to a crowd of about 50 people at the College of Education.

Black militant Mike Hamlin described the newly formed League of Black Workers as an organization geared to "destroying imperialism, capitalism and racism."

He said its origins lie in the anger felt by black workers in the sixties as production lines speeded up.

(He said that previously the black workers failed to get involved in the civil rights struggle because "working classes are not given to romanticism.")

The angry workers turned to their unions for redress — but with no result.

"Union and management work as one, especially in Detroit," said Mabel Turner, another league member.

Militant workers then attempted caucus organizing in order to take over the union locals. These attempts either failed outright or were co-opted.

"The only solution was much more sophisticated organizing", Hamlin said. Thus the League of Revolutionary Black Workers began.

By slowly educating workers the League has had some success in organizing Hamlin claimed.

The League supports the Black Panthers, although it does not agree with all their tactics. It also supports the National Liberation Front in Viet Nam.

Lance editor not quite fired

WINDSOR (CUP) — The Lance, student newspaper at the University of Windsor failed to publish Friday after the entire staff resigned in opposition to a student council attempt to have Editor Al Strachan fired.

Council last Wednesday passed a motion recommending the firing by 15 to 6, charging Strachan with "consistent misrepresentation of facts."

Strachan, now serving his second term as Lance Editor, says the paper this year has been consistently critical of the council's "lack of working order."

The antagonism between the editor and council came to a head a week ago when an editorial by Strachan accused the council of political patronage, after a member's girlfriend was given the summer position of administrator of the Free University with a salary of $500.

The recommendation for firing was submitted to the Media Corporation, the body directly responsible for the paper. However, at a meeting Friday, the Media Corporation turned down the recommendation by a vote of 6 to 2. The staff then returned to the newspaper office to prepare Monday's edition of the Lance. Strachan had been fired once before while filling in for an absent editor, when he ran a front page picture of a bull saying that's what the paper was full of.

The referendum

The Faculty Council Referendum in Arts and Science is the last chance for students to have a direct say in the structure that governs their faculty. It is the climax of two years of frustration in trying to achieve recognition of students as full members of the faculty.

If students do not turn out to vote at all in this referendum, they will have confirmed their status as passive consumers of whatever products the educational market happens to provide. Passive — neither supporting nor dissenting.

If they do not give an overwhelming "yes" vote to the questions of the referendum, they will have relegated themselves to the position of lesser participants in the process of education, acknowledging the necessary inferiority of students' contribution in comparison to that of professors in determining what their education should be like.

If the referendum fails, its failure will go far beyond the Faculty Council — it will permeate all departments and colleges, affecting both the participation and attitudes of students for years to come. If it succeeds, it could encourage an increased commitment of students at all these levels, and destroy the present feeling of impotence and despondency that have led to lack of interest.

Most students in first and second year simply do not understand how crucial this issue is, or how deeply routed it is, for they were not here two years ago when the most important commission in the history of the university was created — the Commission on University Government.

This Commission developed a philosophy of the academic life of the university, and recommended changes in all its governing structures.

The creation of this commission explicitly recognized a completely new concept in the relationship of staff to students in making decisions affecting their university. This commission, two years ago, making recommendations for the complete restructuring of the U of T and chaired by Claude Bissell, WAS COMPOSED OF EQUAL STAFF AND STUDENTS.

In its report, this group tried to show that the university should be a true community, in which both staff and students equally participate together in the activity of learning. It showed that this community had to be based on the mutual respect and co-operation of all members of that community.

This was fundamentally an attitude of people toward each other and attitudes are never created by the imposition of a rule of behavior.

However, this philosophy did have definite concrete implications in the structures that govern this university. It had procedural implications, such as candor, which was a concept unknown here before CUG, and which is now, as a result of CUG, being accepted throughout this university.

Some of the most important implications were in the composition of these governing structures. Here the report made some very explicit recommendations. It recommended parity of staff and students.

This recommendation was based "both on the student commitment to and interest in the learning process, as well as on very important political and psychological realities: unless students feel secure in their influence and are, indeed, given considerable influence, participation becomes merely token."

However, they did not stop at this generalized recommendation. They dealt specifically with the Faculty of Arts and Science. Here the report said, "We have accepted the principle of staff-student equality in representation on the Faculty Council, while providing for additional representation of academic administrators." The referendum is merely asking for an affirmation of the recommendations of the CUG report, because the present solution, proposed by the staff, is a direct contradiction of these recommendations — recommendations assented to by all the staff on the commission!

The acceptance of parity in no way implies that students and staff are in two mutually exclusive camps, battling out each issue to the finish, determined to dominate the policy of the university. Anyone who has attended any meeting of either staff or students knows that on almost all matters both bodies are scattered on either side. Monolithic unity is a myth.

Parity is intimately symbolic and psychological. It implies the equal respect of all members of the community for the potential contribution of all the other members. It recognizes that these contributions are different — that professors have generally more experience, that students are often more directly affected by decisions, and so on, but that these contributions are essentially equally valuable, and necessary, in forming decisions affecting the community of which they are both a part. Parity is also symbolic of the fact that neither group, by uniting its full membership, can make the final over-riding decision.

Voting yes on the referendum does not even imply a dissatisfaction with the courses, professors, etc. that you presently have. It is precisely because many students are able to find a majority of courses and professors that they are pleased with, that they take no interest in the structures that determine these — in the process of education.

To vote yes is to assent to a completely different view of education than many people presently have. This view says that participation of each individual student in the process of education is just as important as his participation in the classroom — even if the decisions made by the structures he participates in are generally the same as those made when he did not participate.

Of course it is an opportunity for him to change conditions in the university, but more, it is an opportunity for him to change something in himself — to feel himself equally responsible for creating the environment in which he lives.

Effective participation in the process of education shows you that you do not have to accept the world as given, determined by powers beyond you and unreachable by you.

Engineering women find engineers' sexually healthy

We, the girls in Engineering, would like to state the following facts. We have never been exploited, insulted or mistreated by any of our fellow engineers. Engineers always open the door for a LADY. A girl will never hear an engineer curse or swear and if by chance she does, an immediate apology follows. The girl who stripped was NOT an Engineer and was not in any way forced to do this. The Engineer has an average of 30 hours of class and labs a week and needs relaxation to release tension.

A normal male must have a healthy sexual attitude. The Slave Auction is a good example of a healthy sexual interest. If a guy is not interested he doesn't have to attend.

We constantly hear that Engineers treat girls as inferior beings. This is FALSE. Being with Engineers constantly we do not feel inferior, cheap, exploited or the butt of some joke. We do however feel that people should examine a situation before commenting on it. At present, we the girls of Engineering, are the only ones who can comment on the situation. One look does not consist of an examination.

Students can have vast power through the Faculty Council, to determine what their university world is like.

Claude Bissell supported equal staff-student representation of the Faculty Council two years ago. How many students in the Faculty of Arts and Science will support it on November 24 and 25?

Toike not out to demean women, say engineers

While the United Appeal may have protested the fund raising scheme of the Engineering Society, they did not object to the $600 raised. They even went as far as to express their warm appreciation for the contribution.

The Women's Caucus fails to realize that the actions of The Lady Godiva Memorial Band do not represent an extension of the ideas of The Engineering Society. By this same process of guilt by association, the Women's Caucus indicts engineers, through their Engineering Society, as beings obsessed with the concept of the supermale, intent on projecting the superpenis image. Each engineer is an individual, and the lump-together female chauvinistic attitudes of the Women's Caucus does little to portray that.

The Toike Oike, another victim of the Women's Caucus poison pen, is not out to objectify or demean the female.

It is the poor revolutionary who cannot laugh at himself. Robert Mitchell

CUG

THE SAD STORY OF THE DEATH OF THE REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT. BY JOEL HAGGLUND.

Years ago I remember sitting in the front row of a lecture hall in the Mechanical Building and listening attentively to history professor W. H. Nelson discussing the broad sweep of world history.

Nelson is a lanky and bald-headed fellow who speaks with great reserve, conviction and irony. Dean Rusk, the American Secretary of State, was clearly a latter-day Genghis Khan. I remember Nelson saying, "There was some dispute among students in the hall over this risky statement, delivered with such reserve and authority."

That's about all I remember of Nelson. It was one of those history courses where you got half a dozen different lecturers, and Nelson got the shortest stretch of them all.

But I remained impressed by his stance by his moral and academic authority, you might say. He delivered his judgments in such an articulate and authoritative manner, that one could not help but respond in some way, to what he spoke.

Maybe this is a back/ended way of getting at the subject, but it strikes me as important to put the man in context.

For Nelson has been touted time and time again as the man who put parity and CUG to rest.

Nelson was by no means a glib and accommodating liberal, the kind who, as one student politician laments, "will listen sympathetically to you for hours and then go out and screw you in the rear."

Nelson represented a style — of education, of university, of life — that is foreign to more and more of us. He had a firm grasp of fundamental principles and refused to back down from them.

It was this ability of his — to reach out and articulate such principles — that made him a pivotal figure in the events that followed upon the publication of the report of the Commission on University Government.

I would have liked to have known Nelson as a man and as an academic, but, from the perspective of the history lecture hall he remained a one of the untouchable gods.

This kind of "learning situation" was described concisely in the CUG Report itself:

"There is what appears to be a determined and often conscious effort to keep students and faculty from approaching each other as social equals, from getting to know each other as people. One of the strongest indictments that can be made of this 'community' is that vast numbers of students pass through it without ever talking to a professor, let alone getting to know him as an individual."

Nelson freely admitted that he stood for the "old definition" of the university, for the "guild" model in which student and teacher played the roles of apprentice and master.

It was his conviction in the correctness of this line of thought that enabled him to galvanize faculty opposition to the CUG Report and rout the threat of student parity.

The publication of the CUG report last year seemed to me to mark a critical starting point for a debate over the style and goals of education at U of T.

It's a debate that never took place.

For it became quickly very important to the faculty to make sure that if changes did take place, they would occur at the speed and on the terms set by the faculty of the university.

CUG and parity

IF A GROUP OF MEN was to be entrusted with the historic task of restructuring the University of Toronto, it was, perforce, an historic issue to determine who those men would be.

In June 1968 the president's council called for a committee to consist of the president himself, plus two representatives from each of the following constituencies: the board of governors, the teaching staff, the student body, the administration.

These members were to be appointed by appropriate institutions within the university. The Board of Governors supported the council's suggestion.

In September, however, the Students' Administrative Council proposed a different structure — four students and four faculty, plus the university president.

In setting forth this counter-proposal, SAC initiated a debate on the fundamental principle behind it — that of parity between students and faculty, as the primary estates of the university community.

A SPECIAL MEETING of the Association of the Teaching Staff decided, October 3, to accept the student proposal of CUG composition, with a number of modifications.

The modifications were that representatives of the board of governors, the senate and alumni, would sit on CUG without voting powers.

Furthermore, the eight student and faculty members would be chosen by university-wide elections.

Elections were held in November and December.

The four students elected all ran on platforms stressing joint student-faculty control of the decision-making process as a primary objective. The four elected faculty did not run on platforms with specific political objectives.

But it was really no surprise, when the Commission brought down its report eight months later, that one of its animating principles was that of parity.

This was based on a philosophy of learning that saw education as a process in which through participating on an equal basis, both the student and the teacher involved, could gain.

"If indeed, the university is to be controlled by its academic components," the commissioners wrote, "power should be shared.

"The strongest arguments for parity between faculty and students are based both on the student commitment to and interest in the learning process, as well as on very important political and psychological realities: unless students feel secure in their influence and, are, indeed, given considerable influence, participation becomes merely token."

It was for this reason that CUG called for parity in the representation of students and faculty at the senior levels of university government.

IN THE NEW UNICAMERAL top governing structure, CUG called for:

- 20 elected faculty,
- 20 elected students,
- 20 lay members, and
- 6 ex-officio members, including the president of the university.

In faculty councils, the top governing bodies in each faculty, CUG recommended representation be distributed in this way — academic staff 40 per cent, students 40 per cent, and administrators 20 per cent.

In departments, CUG suggested joint student-faculty negotiations to determine the best model to be adopted.

"A solution cannot be imposed by eight students or faculty upon one another," CUG concluded. "If people are to live together, they must be able to agree on the basis for that relationship."

CUG maintained that these proportions should be allowed as a right. If any constituency wished to agree to less, it was their privilege to do so.

The CUG compromise

WHEN THE COMMISSIONERS wrote their report, they were fully aware that to propose students be allowed an equal say with faculty in many important matters would arouse considerable ire among faculty.

Especially in the areas of hiring, promotion and tenure decisions.

The commission received a petition signed by 632 faculty members — about one-quarter of the total — expressing total opposition to allowing students any voice at all in such matters.

A more detailed brief, signed by 29 prominent professors, contended that faculty could adequately be judged "only by their peers" and that "students in general do not have the knowledge to make meaningful judgments on the scholarly and professional qualities of staff members."

The student position was that participation in shaping the nature of the educational experience required full participation in such crucial matters. It was necessary to allow students a strong voice because previously teaching abilities had not been an important factor in evaluating staff.

While students, the SAC brief said, "are not as knowledgeable as some faculty, they bring a perspective to academic decisions which must carry equal weight with that of faculty members. They are certainly more affected by the results in many cases. After all, they are the ones who must bear the consequence of their own education, or mis-education as the case may be."

CUG sought to mediate between what it perceived as two conceptions of the role of the teacher. The rigid and traditional faculty conception was that the academic was an independent professional and researcher; his teaching function was secondary. The extreme student position was that the teacher was the employee or servant of the students.

THE COMPROMISE POSITION put forward by CUG was based on "the primacy of learning in the university" and on "the principle that responsibility for academic decisions must be shared."

CUG rejected the "traditional view", but did not embrace the "radical view" either.

Instead, it attempted to steer a middle course between the two, a course based on the principle of academic freedom defined broadly enough to cover both faculty and students.

"Enjoyment of academic freedom must be an experience open to all members of the university academic community," the commissioners wrote.

"Freedom in teaching and research, long recognized in the traditional view to be the prerogative of the faculty member, must go hand in hand with the student's freedom in every aspect of his learning."

"Neither freedom is autonomous. The teacher's freedom must guarantee him the right to teach as his experience and knowledge suggest, and he must enjoy that freedom. But he must weigh alternatives that others — including students — propose."

"The student's freedom must assure him of the right to learn not only by choosing what he wants to learn, but also by having a say in how he learns it — how not only in the sense of a process of taking formal lectures, having seminars or tutorials, etc., but also in the sense of the method used to determine what he is to learn."

The old definition

(as summed up by CUG)

"...the university is a community of scholars... dedicated to the preservation, transmission and advancement of knowledge.

"By and large it is the teaching staff that takes the more active role in the classroom and laboratory; students come to receive basic instruction in the main disciplines and to develop fundamental technical skills that will later be put to use in or one or other of the professions. . .

"(Faculty) see themselves as more or less committed to the institution for a longer period of time than most students, and possessed of insights into the intricacies of the university that are not possessed by their students.

"As a result, many have come to think of themselves as the university. . .

"The university, in this view, does not adopt a political posture towards the 'outside' society. . .

"The university's relations with society at large are strictly at arms' length; it sets, or helps to set, the conditions under which members of the outside community can enter its halls for instruction, considers them under its jurisdiction as long as they stay, sends them forth to take whatever post in society they as graduates decide to take, and is content to influence society through the individuals it helps form.

"To repeat, the university is defined by its academic rather than its social role; its organization and structure are dictated by the needs of academic disciplines, not by social or political considerations. . .

"Its ethos is individualistic, not collective."

Master and apprentice

"WORDS SUCH AS master and apprentice are not offensive to me. The apprentice becomes a master."

That was how history professor W.H. Nelson summed up his position exactly one year ago, when the CUG report faced its crucial test — debate on the floor of the arts and science faculty council.

On the eve of the meeting CUG member Prof. Larry Lynch voiced prophetic fears: "It may decide whether the CUG Report goes down the drain."

Nelson had placed before the council a resolution rejecting student participation in all questions of hiring, promotion or tenure of teaching staff.

His resolution, as he freely admitted, embodied an "old definition of the university."

THE PHILOSOPHY behind Nelson's definition of the university was best expressed by the classics professor who seconded his motion, John Rist.

In a brief to CUG, Rist set forth his feelings about the incompetence of students and his belief that they have no place in the governing of a university.

"Students, even graduate students," he wrote, "have little notion of the boundaries of their subject and comparatively little skill, combined with no experience, in determining the quality of research done by a competent professor."

Note, of course, Rist's stress on research as the professor's primary concern.

"Very frequently," he added, "they are led astray by misleading talk about relevance. Student concepts of relevance are inevitably linked to their necessarily limited personal experience."

Mark up a notch for the value-free university, where all endeavour is of equal importance and the university, as an institution, bears no responsibility for leading the way to the solution of social problems.

Rist made his defence of the "value-free" university even more specific last November.

"MY BASIC OBJECTION to student involvement," he told an interviewer, "is that it is very likely to introduce the political test." He feared students would tend to elect students with "political consciences" to represent them.

As far as Rist was concerned, " . . . student power should be minimal in all committees concerned with the employment of academic staff."

The student can be called upon to "inform", but not "to control" the learning process.

Perhaps faculty at large did not support all the philosophy behind the political stand taken by Nelson and Rist.

In their classes and seminars many faculty are showing themselves extremely receptive to the cooperative approach to learning outlined in the CUG report. In some courses and departments, such as sociology, for instance, parity has been introduced without a serious disintegration of the academic fabric.

But, despite what faculty may have done on a small scale, the support given to Nelson and Rist last year was the decisive blow required to knock the wind out of CUG.

W. H. NELSON

In December Rist was elected to be chief of the Association of the Teaching Staff, and Nelson took his place as university government commissioner.

And in February, after endless meetings, and attempted amendments by more liberal faculty members, the original Nelson-Rist resolution was endorsed by the faculty council.

SINCE THEN THE FACULTY council has been deadlocked over the issue of exactly what kind of student participation to allow in the council itself, a huge assembly of all faculty members plus 35 students.

The issue has again come to a head this fall, with the small handful of students refusing to participate in a faculty council where they have a weak voice and even less influence.

The students have suspended participation in the council, called a referendum for this week, trying to get support for the view that student-faculty parity — as recommended in the CUG report — can be resurrected and used to breathe life into the council.

The offspring of CUG

TWO DIRECT OFFSPRING of CUG played determining roles in deciding the fate of the Report.

The first, a creature called the Programming Committee, was set up in order to promote wide discussion of the report's proposals in the university community.

In membership, the programming committee was again a parity body consisting of three faculty and three students.

The committee called for ad hoc staff-student committees to be established in various faculties, colleges and departments in order to reach a consensus on the CUG recommendations.

The committee considered it important to have debate take place through such special organizations for two reasons.

First, it was hoped there would be "a spirit of trust and cooperation between the two major estates of the university" if the debate took place in such a "realistic" way. And secondly, "student opinion (would be) fairly represented at all levels of the university during the debate."

Obviously, student opinion would not be "fairly represented" if the debate took place in established councils, where students had merely a token presence or none at all.

THE PROGRAMMING COMMITTEE, in offering this kind of outline, was seeking to recapture the spirit of trust, mutual confidence and compromise that characterized CUG.

It was an attempt, as advisory bureau head Don McCulloch suggested, to make all students and faculty go through the same process of collective decision making that the members of CUG were able to.

Among the grandiose plans which the programming committee tossed about, was the idea that sometime in January 1970, the university's regular business might be suspended for several days or even a week.

At that time, there could be either a university-wide convocation to discuss the CUG recommendations, or individual departments and faculties could gather to reach a consensus on the report.

The programming committee never pushed this too far.

Hopelessly, it seemed, these kinds of proposals were out of touch with the political realities.

The discussion of CUG did in fact take place, but not in a constructive manner at all.

It took place in the faculty council, where faculty fears of student parity poisoned much of the trend to reform.

And it took place again, once CUG was effectively dead, in the middle of the summer.

BEFORE DISAPPEARING, the programming committee performed two farewell acts.

In spite of the rejection of CUG's central principles by the faculty and the failure of the major student organization, the Students' Administrative Council, to mount any campaign for implementation of CUG, the administration still had a vested interest in keeping CUG alive.

After all, the commission had been set up at considerable expense and with much effort in order to provide some results. The least that could be expected was some kind of restructuring of the administration of the university, a rationalization of the decision-making process which had not been overhauled since 1906.

And so, the programming committee set up elections for something called the University-Wide Committee, a sort of estates general of the university.

In a final symbolic attempt to record what the opinion of the university community was, the committee distributed questionnaires.

NOWHERE ON THE questionnaires was there any mention of parity. Rather, respondents were asked to outline possible

CUG members (Prof. Larry Lynch and student) Gary Webster: "... anything can be worked out with faculty members if you can get together with them across a table or at a cocktail party for that matter." The job of student leaders, and of CUG, was to "use their power to open the university up so that everyone can have this contact."

models of what kind of proportional representation there might be on the top governing structure.

The results, difficult to interpret in most cases, still provided the following interesting statistics:

Translated into overall totals, the survey indicated that of 3,809 people answering this question 22 per cent felt faculty should have more than half the seats in any council, while six per cent felt students should enjoy this privilege.

59 PER CENT FELT faculty should get 26 to 45 per cent of the seats, while 48 per cent felt students should also fall in this range. 36 per cent felt students should have a quarter or even less of the total seats.

The survey was also used to legitimize a number of fait accompli — the composition of the UWC, and the idea of having it meet immediately — which meant in the summertime — rather than in the fall.

The final chapter

THE FINAL AND SADDEST chapter in the story of the death of CUG took place in June of this last summer.

The executioner was a creature called the University-Wide Committee. Few students knew it existed, and fewer still know what it did.

In the space of three days in early June, the UWC decided on a new top governing structure for the University of Toronto — and hammered the final nails into the coffin of CUG.

The affair was purely ceremonial, it was a question of deciding how dead CUG would be.

The battle had been lost months earlier, when faculty refused to accept the co-operative approach to learning which the Report had outlined.

The struggle to achieve real changes in the nature and goals of the university had been long lost and was beyond the scope of the UWC sessions.

The UWC was a purely political affair. It had to reach a working compromise by trading off the existing power relationships against each other.

INEVITABLY, STUDENTS, being the weakest, lost, and faculty, being the strongest, won.

Some students did not understand this, however, and were angry and disappointed at the outcome of the sessions. "We were screwed and snowed," they complained, "It was a disaster."

It was forgotten that CUG itself was a compromise between two positions. Now, the compromise, was to be further compromised.

"It was disgusting," one UWC member commented, "CUG wasn't mentioned more than five times during the three days."

THE UWC WAS MADE UP of the following:

- 40 students (27 undergraduates, 9 graduates, and four part time students),
- 40 faculty,
- 40 administrators, including academic, non-academic and support staff,
- 10 members of the board of governors,
- 20 alumni.

This composition formulated by the programming committee, reflected the idea that the university was composed of five estates. The principle behind the establishment of CUG and the content of its report was that there were two primary estates — only — the students and the faculty.

The outcome of the bargaining was a 72-man top governing body. Little else was discussed.

The UWC endorsed, after considering a number of alternatives, the following proportional representation, one which entirely invalidated the assumptions of CUG:

- 21 faculty,
- 14 students,
- 14 lay representatives,
- 10 alumni,
- six support staff,
- three academic administrators,
- three residential appointees,
- The President.

This solution was accepted by a majority vote.

Among important votes taken on June 2, were the following:

- by a vote of 63 to 56 the UWC decided against the idea that faculty and students should together form a clear majority on the top governing structure.

(CUG had recommended this as basic — as a basic principle — students and faculty were to have 40 out of 66 seats.)

- by a vote of 60 to 56 the principle of

"It's coming down to a real crunch," said Steve Langdon, former SAC President. "The administration is going to have to decide if it seriously wants to democratize the university." It didn't.

student-faculty parity was rejected.

It seems unfair that such important decisions were taken by such a close vote of simple majorities in a body composed of such a weird assortment of people.

STUDENTS DID HAVE an option. It was a condition of their participation that they be allowed to reject the outcome of the UWC until the matter could be resumed for discussion in the fall.

The faculty had a similar option, and no doubt would have exercised it if they had been as angry and disappointed at the manipulation and politics as students were afterwards.

Instead students chose to accept the outcome of UWC "reluctantly" write a minority report, and continue to press for parity elsewhere.

A penetrating analysis of the UWC goes on as was written during the summer by Art Moses, a former Varsity reporter and member of student member of the UWC.

"The resolutions from the University-Wide Committee were the product of unprincipled debate, lack of trust, and incredible behind the scene manipulation.

"Parity was rejected. We won 14 seats on a 72-man body. Three years ago it was 14 out of 130. That's some progress!" (In 1967 students were offered 14 seats on the Senate, but rejected them in order to press for wholesale structural reforms).

The rest of Moses' analysis follows.

"The UWC should never have existed"

The UWC should never have existed. It shouldn't have existed because students really did not have to go through that process at all. But the strategy we chose, as student power advocates, was such that we had no choice. And we left ourselves open for the kind of manipulation faculty and administrators were prepared to conduct.

For students, more than any other group in the university, have the power to close the campus down, or open it up, or transform it, or destroy it; our strength lies in our numbers and the fact that we are the university's raison d'être. That is not a threat; it is a fact. But the so-called "responsible" student leaders have never accepted that fact. We have chosen to operate through "constructive channels" and have concentrated on impressing the faculty and administrators who have determined those channels, with our "responsibility" and our "statesmanship."

We have neglected to bring many other students with us. We refused to concentrate on organizing a politically aware student body behind student power demands such as parity, in such a way that the students would be prepared to act when faced with the intransigence of the faculty. Without that base, we left ourselves open to every kind of manipulation, condescension and dishonesty that our adversaries chose to use.

And so we got the UWC. It was a retrograde step from the beginning. Student members of CUG denounced it as a sell out long before the SAC agreed to it. The five estates were back: students, faculty, administrators and support staff, and alumni and Board of Governors. Almost the same proposal for CUG that Langdon and Rae had persuaded the faculty to reject back in the fall of 1968. But it was the spring of 1970 now. CUG had reported and the "responsible" students feared CUG's year of hard work would be trampled under by A.T.S. opposition. And so we accepted the UWC, having won the right, or so we thought, of being able to defer any decision we didn't like. THE REFORM OF THE UNIVERSITY MUST GO ON, and so we accepted and agreed that elections should be held and meetings convened during May and June when students' political position would be weakest, for there would be no students around during that month to scrutinize what we were doing on their behalf.

The elections were farcical, but provided the university with the touch of legitimacy which it must have in THE AGE OF REFORM. And so we all got elected. Faculty and administrators ran on their curriculum vitae. Students ran mostly on vague statements embracing CUG and parity and everything else that's nice.

And then we all sat in John Roberts' huge room for three days and heard faculty and administrators talk about "THE GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY", "the efficiency of the decision-making apparatus", "internal and external credibility", "expertise", "excellence", "competence" and other things that GOOD academics talk about.

The only time they mentioned people was when they were worried that discussions about individuals might be in public, hence possibly harming the scholar's personal reputations. But we sat and listened, because THE REFORM OF THE UNIVERSITY MUST GO ON.

Occasionally students rose and tried to participate in the same process. Clearly our words had to be extra-"responsible", extra-elloquent, and extra-"statesmanlike". Gaffs by faculty and administrators did not seem like such horrible mistakes, because they were eminent scholars speaking. But gaffs by students, well, they just seemed like gaffs, and that proved what they assumed all along — that students couldn't assume power, or exercise the power they had.

For we were asking 100 people who were not part of us to give us things that we wanted; things they all had, but weren't willing to give to us. The fact they had insisted on the UWC with that composition proved that they weren't very anxious to give those things to us as well. But we didn't realize that until we sat down on the first day.

Our student caucuses beforehand had left us pitifully unprepared; that was our fault. Our time was spent discussing procedures and the wording of resolutions, without contemplating the dynamics which would unfold on the floor — the dynamics of cooption, and of conscious and unconscious manipulation. We failed to see the UWC for what it was — a magnificently performed text-book exercise in repressive tolerance.

All that talk of the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY sounded great. Sure we were part of the university, and we were concerned about its future. Maybe the faculty and administrators were right when they said that anyone elected to the new governing council of the university had to forget his constituency and work for the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY. But wait. What about the people that make up the university; wasn't that what CUG had been all about? How people with different views could get together and discuss them? CUG?

Then came the parity debate. Of all the proceedings, it was the best example of unprincipled discussion. We had to fight to get the body even to vote on the principle of parity, and to show us whether they were prepared to accept us as equal members of the university community.

Originally, they only wanted to ballot on different models so that they could arrive at an "efficient" and acceptable governing council without having to face any discussion on principles, or what the role of the new governing council was to be, or even what the role of the university was and how that role could best be served.

In that debate, students were for the only time in those three days really eloquent and articulate. We were discussing our status as people in the community. It meant a lot to us. But where were the anti-parity forces? W.H. Nelson of the famous Nelson-Rist anti-CUG onslaught in the A.T.S. and the Arts and Science faculty council rose and spoke of "honorable" and "dishonorable" compromises.

He assumed parity would be rejected, and did not take on the students arguments at all. Indeed it was the first time his views had been under attack in a body on which there was "meaningful" student representation, (meaningful?) There he was. Come on kids, for the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY compromise honorably, he pleaded and then sat down.

Then Chuck Hanley, the smooth, handsome faculty power advocate rose. He told us that the fine educational concept that we had just described, and that he endorsed; involving equality in the classroom, trust, and community, didn't require that student equality be recognized on a governing structure in order to be achieved. Maybe in 5 years you'll get parity, said Chuck, but look around you, kids, at all the skeptical faces. It just won't happen now. And for the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY...

That parity debate was perhaps symbolic of the unprincipled discussion which dominated the UWC proceedings. Faculty and administrators seemed to prefer to ignore the major question of the status of students in the university, until it came time to ballot on models, and they wanted to vote down parity in the secrecy of a ballot paper.

Once the straw vote on parity had been lost, a few students suggested that we walk out and refuse to participate in deciding to what extent students would be considered second class citizens in the university, but we stayed because THE REFORM OF THE UNIVERSITY MUST GO ON.

And then came the voting on models. Students had decided not to place any parallel structures or one-man, one-vote models on the floor to use as positions for compromise. We had accepted CUG (CUG?) and CUG had recommended parity, so we would. Everybody knew that.

But the faculty preferred to play a different game. They began by presenting models which they knew were distasteful (e.g. 20 faculty to 10 students). Then they withdrew that and went for 21 14 as their great concession, their honorable compromise. It was hard to get many faculty to accept even that, we were told, so kids, it's pretty good, won't you accept it?

It was a masterful exercise in collective bargaining, as administrator John Crispo knows so well. He came to the student caucus when the defeat of our parity model was imminent. He told us that if we held firm on parity we would be forcing the administrators to choose between a student deferral or a faculty deferral. They would have to choose whose model to support, ours or the faculty's (as if there was ever any question?).

Ol' John Crispo told us the administrators had to decide whose deferral would be worse for the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY. They would probably choose a student deferral, so compromise on parity, will you kids. The implication through all this process was that if we did defer, the repercussions would be tremendous.

Crispo told us he was just telling us that for our own help and that he hadn't discussed it with any other group. We later found out that he had addressed the faculty caucus just before he talked to us.

That's okay John, it's all for THE GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY.

Then came our last caucus. Like the last supper, only Christ was nailed and we were screwed.

At the last caucus the true extent of the manipulation became clear. Marty Friedland, the friendly chairman of the CUG (CUG?) Programming Committee had predicted a final composition close to 21:14 all along. He had been having frequent conversations with student members of the UWC who were weak in their support of parity. Then came our last caucus, and...

Lynch told us that he had qualms about having been asked to speak to us. Who asked you, he was asked. He stumbled, perhaps confused, himself, over the dynamics of the whole process. We later learned that it was Friedland who had been behind his appearance before us that day.

You students have acted marvellously here, Lynch began. Your cause has been greatly improved by your performance. And now you've been shafted, given a raw deal. But it would be a monumental act of statesmanship" if, for the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY you didn't defer and let this governing structure be set up.

THE GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY — precisely what we'd been there to work for, those three days, in front of all those "eminent scholars". Shit, how could we possibly run counter to the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY? We could always write a minority report, Lynch said, pointing out our disapproval and re-stating the case for parity, for THE REFORM OF THE UNIVERSITY MUST GO ON.

It must have been a bitter pill for Lynch to swallow, as much as it was for us. It meant he was forgetting about all the long hours he and Webster and Etkin and Rac and Thompson and Grant and Hodgetts and Martin and Bissell and the others had spent on examining real issues and problems facing the U of T, and trying to determine a governing system that would serve the people of the university.

It meant for the moment that he could swallow a composition for a governing council drawn up on the basis of principle as the recommendation of those nine men had been, but on the basis of who could do the best horse trading and manipulation during a four hour balloting session.

Maybe he wanted to help manipulate us as a loyal member of the academic guild, but more likely, Larry Lynch was swayed by the rhetoric about the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY as we were.

It's really hard to express how that whole manipulative process worked to destroy the students' belief in their power to defer. It was our only power there. We were consistently outvoted in the plenaries (and we've always had the right to write minority reports).

But from originally being an important right, the very condition of our accepting the UWC at all, our power to defer had become a terrible weapon which we would use only at the peril of the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY.

One of the things "responsible student activists" feel obligated to do, when they seek changes from those who hold the power to make them, is to impress those people with their concern for the best interests of university well-being, academic excellence, and other things those people are concerned about. Yes, with their concern for the GOOD OF THE UNIVERSITY. And so we didn't defer, and the REFORM OF THE UNIVERSITY GOES ON. It's really changing... .ep.

Law students provide legal aid

By MARIS PAVELSON

"We are not lawyers." Sid Valo, Director of the Campus Legal Assistance Centre stressed this fact repeatedly during an interview in the CLAC office at 44 St. George St. Valo and his co-workers are extremely wary of overstepping the ethical bounds of the legal profession. They must make it absolutely clear that they are law students, not lawyers. And they cannot advertise their service.

Consequently, many students are not aware of the existence of CLAC or what it does. It gives legal assistance to U of T students who 1) do not qualify for Legal Aid because of the minor nature of the case and 2) cannot afford a lawyer.

The CLAC staff handle minor legal matters for which Legal Aid has neither the time nor the facilities. These are "summary conviction" matters as opposed to indictable offenses. Summary conviction cases generally entail jail sentences of less than two years.

Such cases are usually dealt with in the divisional and provincial (formerly magistrate's) courts. One does not have to be a member of the bar to appear before these courts so that CLAC staff are free to plead cases in them if necessary.

As to the financial status of those who come to CLAC, there is, according to Valo, "provision for means tests," but the organization has not reverted to them. Means tests would only be used if the work load became too heavy and CLAC had to be discriminating with regard to the people it helped.

At the present time, the organization gives assistance to an average of 12 people per week and Valo says that it is capable of handling up to 20.

CLAC's staff is comprised of about 30 second- and third-year law students. Two law students man its offices from 1 to 6, Monday through Friday.

The people who work for the Campus Legal Assistance Centre have various motives. There is the altruistic aspect: they can use whatever legal knowledge they have to be of help to other students who need legal advice. In a more selfish vein, work at the Centre can give them exposure to some situations which actual lawyers confront. At present, CLAC workers receive no academic credit for their work but eventually, this may come to be.

Landlord-tenant conflicts are the problems which CLAC tackles most frequently. Traffic and liquor offenses, changes of name and the simple dispensation of legal information also are common. Rarely does a case ever get to court; most situations are settled by negotiation.

All cases which CLAC handles are surveyed by its Board of Review. This group consists of CLAC directors, professors from the law school and senior students. The Board examines a staff member's proposed course of action in a case and then rules on it. Says Valo, "We either solve a problem or ensure that it is solved properly by somebody else."

Financially speaking, CLAC exists by virtue of grants from three organizations at the U of T: $5,000 from SAC, $1,000 from the GSU and $1,500 from the Varsity Fund. Graduate or undergraduate, this is your money and the service exists for you — free.

Don't, however, get into any trouble between December 11 and January 4 when the CLAC office will be closed.

SAC lost file, STU dies

By ERIC MILLS and ERIC RUMP

The Student Tenant Union, a lofty ideal conceived in 1969 and nurtured in birth until 1970, has died of bureaucracy.

Emerging out of a year long SAC study group on Residences and Tenants' Organizations, the STU was embodied in a report by study group leader Tony Usher.

As the school year drew to a close, Usher, who was leaving Toronto for the summer, transferred the responsibility of organizing the union as promised to SAC, by way of giving the STU file to Bob James, last year's Finance Commissioner and SAC executive assistant over the summer.

James says the file was given to Services Commissioner (then, as now) Gerrit van Geign, who claims it was given to University Commissioner Ken McEvoy, who is also Information and Research officer for SAC.

However McEvoy denies having received the file and claims to have asked for it, without success. The net result is that the file was lost during the summer.

Even if the files had been found the STU was not, by last summer, an astounding success. After printing cards and pamphlets last spring, registration for the STU netted only 75 students instead of the expected 500.

But while the loss of files dealt a death blow to the organizational superstructure of the tenant union, there were not enough students interested this September to keep even the idea alive.

Lack of interest can be traced to the adequate supply of housing that students found this fall. Although the problems still exist, student tenants are not very conscious of them.

"Housing isn't as bad as it has been in past and will be in the future," says van Geign. He points out that some problems can be handled by complaining to City Hall at 367-8572.

McEvoy claimed the union was born "a brainchild of people, not a conscious need. It can't be done from the top down."

GSU vice president Neil Keller agrees. Describing the setting up of the "superstructure" of the union as "ill-conceived parachuting", he said the STU was too far ahead of the students. He predicted the union would fold.

However SAC has already given the Metro Tenants Association $150 to affiliate the STU with the city-wide tenants' union. Almost a year ago it had been proposed that both SAC and the GSU give $150 each to the MTA.

The agreement with the MTA could only be terminated if notification were given by September 1. No such notification was given by SAC who granted the sum to keep lines of communication open. The GSU has granted no money.

Originally conceived as a body that act on questions affecting tenants in their particular position as students, and provide legal advice for any landlord-tenant conflicts, the STU has had many of its functions taken over by other organizations. The Campus Legal Aid Centre for instance, can handle any tenant-landlord complaints, while the Charles St. Tenants' Association (in the Married Students Residence) has turned away from the concept of student tenant unions to organizing public housing tenants.

Waterpolo Blues split first league meet

By CLIVE HOBSON

The Waterpolo Blues plunged headfirst into a three-team tournament Saturday, and swam to the surface two games later with a creditable performance behind them.

The tourney took place at McGill with the host school being pooled against Varsity and Queen's in round-robin play.

After some disappointing exhibition losses, Blues played their best games of the year to finish second amongst the three squads.

By virtue of the draw, Blues met McGill first.

In the opening quarter, McGill raced into a 4-0 lead in the first five minutes. Then Toronto settled down and opened their scoring when Alex Fedco found the net. Lyle Macosky followed this with a fast goal and Chris McNaught closed out the first quarter with a third goal.

IN THE SECOND QUARTER, the Redmen scored twice more and the half ended with the score 6-3.

The second half showed just how much talent and experience the McGill team has. Three of the Redmen play for the National Team and each squad member has, on the average, five years experience behind him. They scored once more in the third stanza and twice in the final fifteen minutes to seal the victory, 9-4.

Essentially, Blues offence failed to jell. The Varsity swimmers turned in many creditable individual performances but missed too many scoring opportunities. They also exhibited some examples of poor passing which certainly didn't help their efforts.

However, in the second game against Queen's, Blues showed the results of their first-game experience and their performance improved. They took advantage of loose checking by the Gaels team and also used their superior swimming ability to a distinct advantage for a decisive 12-5 victory.

VETERAN McNAUGHT had a tremendous outing, leading the Blues with six goals. Macosky had a pair while Fedco, Dave Breech and Robin Wilson added single markers.

The young team from Kingston looked most impressive in both their games. Despite only two years in the league, they fought every inch of the way and despite falling behind by large margins, they refused to give up.

Coach Alan Pyle was most pleased with his teams' performance and gave special credit to the defensive play of Terry Bryan, Macosky and Fedco. Pyle hopes his offence can get it all together for the return games which will be played in the Hart House pool December 4. Blues must win both their games to advance into the O-QAA finals.

Ice girls down York 6-4

Paced by Dianne Gilmour's two goals, the Varsity Women's hockey team defeated the York "Yeowomen" 6-4 Friday night.

It was the second exhibition game for the team as they prepare for their league opener Thursday night at Guelph against the girl Gryphons.

Scoring single markers for the Silver Blue Skates were Terry Midhall, Barb Greaves and Bonnie Sproule.

Varsity coach Gordie Bullock was especially pleased with the defensive performance of his team.

'Rays of hope' as B-ball Blues lose to York

By PETER WHITE

Slippin an slidin, divin an tryin, the Varsity Blues basketballers bore defeat number-one Friday night at York, 91-63. Following what has been, and might become a familiar pattern, Blues fell flat fast but finally settled down to give York's second stringers some fun in the second half.

This game was quite frustrating to the prognosticator as Blues received less than adequate performances from several usually reliable sources. Neither Larry Trafford nor Bill Boston are likely to match this effort.

In defence of the whole bunch, it was the first game. They were tight (and played that way) and it was the initial Varsity level experience for one half the squad. Given time to play and practice together the team does beam several rays of hope.

MOST OF THESE are bound up in the person of Ron Voake. For the first time since the departure of Bruce Dempster, Blues have a bona fide basketball technician who is sound in the fundamentals of the game which our home-growers are still trying to grasp. His ability to pawn his skills off on his teammates is likely to help the coaching staff bring this team together much more quickly. In an unselfish trip he led Blues with 16 points — it was a pleasure to see.

Blues most trying battle may prove to be the one against themselves: a team of natural guards — and forwards built like natural guards — they were unable to rebound on either board. It will be a bloody aggravating season if all opposition is allowed to pound in upon so poorly defended Toronto board as York found.

Blues play was overwrought with disorganization and its obedient corollary, turnovers. Shooting was bad and so was luck for that matter but, its all not worth mentioning when you lose in such manner to a superior team.

On Wednesday, Blues meet Ryerson in the Ryerson gym at 5:

The intramural office would like to announce a Waterloo Referees Clinic tomorrow at 7:30 p.m.

00 p.m., a lesser and more reasonable early-season opponent than York.

Curling team in season's first action

Varsity curlers dominated the first Intercollegiate bonspiel of the season held last Saturday at Hamilton as George Carr skipped the Toronto A team to three wins and a first place finish. The final was at the expense of the Toronto B squad skipped by John Mather. Hosted by Mohawk College, the spiel attracted twelve entries, including last year's OQAA winners, McMaster.

Carr, who led Toronto's team to the 1970 OQAA playdowns, has Craig Burch replacing retired Bob Quinn, and veterans Dave Richardson and Jim Stewart supplying steady support on the front end. Carr reached the final with a free-scoring 12-10 win over St. Clair College, and a narrow 5-3 victory over Seneca College. In the final game he stole two on the last end to squeak by Mather by a 8-6 count.

Mather, curling with Alex Se-gall, Doug Paterson, and Bill Mather, hammered Sir Sandford Fleming College 11-3, and then upset the favoured McMaster entry 7-6 in his march to the final.

Other Varsity curling action over the week-end saw John Francis start his rink towards the Canadian Junior Winter Games as they advanced to the eastern Toronto divisional finals.

Volley Blues in finals

Led by the outstanding play of Peter Szlapak, the Volleyball Blues wrapped up an OQAA playoff spot Saturday afternoon at a tournament hosted by Western University.

The final team standings show the Mustangs on top with a record of 28 victories and only four defeats. Blues were second with an 18-14 mark, Guelph third at 15-17, then McMaster at 11-21 and Waterloo last with 8-24.

Both Blues and Western now advance to the OQAA finals this Saturday on the home court of the Eastern Division winner (probably the University of Ottawa).

Manitoba herd thunders to national crown

Manitoba "wonder boy" quarterback Boh Kraemer prepares to straight-arm Gee-Gees' Martin Sevigny in grid action Saturday.

The Varsity — David Lloyd

By LYNDON LITTLE

The U of Manitoba Bisons have endured some pretty lean years in Western Canada Intercollegiate football.

This writer can remember one particular Winnipeg daily newspaper that, with tongue in cheek, used to greet every new out-of-town Manitoba grid disaster with a headline:

Bisons drop another big one on the road!

But, all that derision is a thing of the past.

For the second year in a row, the Manitoba crew (Henry's Herd or the Brown Bombers if you prefer) have come thundering out of the west to grind an eastern opponent under their devastating ground game.

Last year, they defeated the McGill Redmen. This time, their victim was the U of Ottawa Gee-Gees, by a score of 38-11.

GRID COACHES are always paying homage to the old cliché that football is basically a running and ball-control game. However, for the Bisons and their head coach Henry Janzen, it's a way of life!

Saturday, the Bisons' grind-'em-out running attack kept the ball out of the hands of the Gee-Gees star passing quarterback Paul Paddon; running 69 offensive plays to only 35 for Ottawa.

Manitoba, paced by their three backs, Mike Shylo, Bob Toogood and Dennis Hryciako, gained 283 yards along the ground to only 34 for Ottawa. The Gee-Gees held a slight edge in passing yardage, 183-117.

"We only pass when we really have to," explained Janzen.

The Bisons led 13-3 at the ball but then exploded for 25 points in the final 30 minutes.

Hryciako headed the scoring parade with majors on runs of two and 29 yards. Flanker Henry Lodewyks, end Kim Ziola and quarterback Bob Kraemer added single touchdowns. Place-kicker Walt McKee contributed one field goal of 37-yards and three converts while the remaining two points came when Paddon conceded a safety touch in the fourth quarter.

The Ottawa points came on a 13-yard field goal off the boot of Claudio Valle in the second quarter and on an 85-yard bomb from Paddon to flanker Michell Leveille in the final period. Leveille made a fantastic catch between two defenders.

Notes: Attendance at the game was announced as 7,000. . . Stadium manager Ted Steadman and his crew deserve a lot of credit for having the field in fine condition despite heavy rains on Friday. . . Shylo, who once had a brief tryout with the Argos, was selected as the games' outstanding performer. . . The Bisons lose only center Jim Carlson, linebacker Jim Fildey, defensive back Clint Evans and Shylo for certain next year and should have a shot at a third-straight national crown. . . The RMC gymnastics team put on a skilled half-time show.

Buba, Wright notch two

Blues down Vees 8-1 in thumper

By THE FLOATER

Sudbury — Behind steady goaltending from Tummy Little, the Varsity Blues soundly trounced the Laurentian University Voyageurs 8-1 here yesterday afternoon in a bruising, penalty-studded exhibition hockey contest before 5,000 fans at the Sudbury Arena.

In all, Blues fired 43 shots at the Laurentian goaltender while Little faced 22 thrusts from the Vees.

The two teams "battled" through a scoreless opening period but in the second, Blues exploded with four unanswered markers.

Defenseman Nelson Debenedet, a Copper Cliff native, opened the scoring with Brent Imlach and Nicki Holmes drawing assists. Brian St. John, Gurd Davies and captain John Wright also connected before the middle period ended.

winger Terry Peterman, Bill Buba, Wright and then Buba again were the Varsity marksmen.

Blues took 31 minutes in penalties to 24 for the Vees in the rough contest that saw Debenedet, who may soon earn a reputation as Varsity's Ted Green, ejected from the game for manhandling an unfortunate Voyager in a test of fist-tuffs.

A casualty on the Varsity side was economy-sized winger Scotty Seagrist who, it is feared, suffered a broken hand.

It was a big evening for former Sudbury Wolves star Buba, who picked up two assists to go with his pair of goals. Linemate Mike Boland drew three assists.

Blues next game is a league fixture at Guelph tomorrow evening; then they depart Thursday afternoon for Montreal for weekend matches with the Loyola Warriors and the Sir George Georgians.

Blue Notes: Loyola's star defenseman Larry Carriere has been suspended by the Quebec Amateur Hockey Association for signing two CAHA playing cards in one year. . . Mike Murphy, a student at St. Mike's last year while he was playing with the Marlies, is currently fourth in scoring in the Central League as a member of the Omaha Knights, the top farm club of the New York Rangers.

We deserve extra money, says U of T

By LAURA KELLY and CETA RAMKHALWAN-SINGH

U of T made a pitch yesterday for preferential financial treatment by Ontario's Department of University Affairs on the grounds that "our role is crucial in the development of the provincial system."

The report was presented by Claude Bissell, U of T President, who argued that "we now find ourselves locked into the status quo faced with the necessity of eliminating some divisions unless all are to slip into mediocrity."

The extra funds are warranted, says the report, because U of T has prominence as a national university and sets the standards for excellence for the country as a whole.

"The quality of great universities determines the quality of the whole university system in a way that no number of lesser institutions can," the document stated.

The report boasted of U of T's pivotal position in the development of the provincial university system, its work in experimental teaching approaches, its preponderance of Woodrow Wilson Fellowships (Canada 794, Toronto 233, and all other Ontario Universities 153), and its general strength in the professional and arts faculties.

J.T. Wilson, Principal of Erindale, adding an appendix to the report, said: "The system of financial support should be such as to give extra aid to the top universities because it is only these which determine the quality of Canadian education and which can counter the pull of the United States, but it should also allow an aspiring university to rise."

E.E. Stuart, Ontario's Deputy Minister of University Affairs, termed the point of view "elitist" and one emphasizing the institution rather than the individual.

Students shocked by existence of 'marks' handbook

A little-known book listing arts and science students' marks, courses and standings is available to faculty, but not to students, at U of T.

The book, published each year by the Faculty of Arts and Science, lists every student, each course he took, the mark he received in each course, his overall average and, for honours students, his rank in the class.

Arts and science Dean A. D. Allen said last night that the book was "restricted to those who need to have it for a variety of purposes."

He said the book was used for "counselling and other purposes."

He added that the book used to be widely circulated — "a public document" — but that protests two or three years ago had forced the faculty to cut back on its circulation.

"The Students' Administrative Council felt the availability of this book was an infringement of student privacy," he said.

"We felt that the student's point was a real one."

Allen said he thought the situation was identical in all faculties of the university.

Students questioned by The Varsity were surprised and shocked to discover that such a book existed.

"I can't believe they'd publish a book like that," said one first year UC student.

One student suggested that information in the book could be used by faculty to determine attitudes of particular students in every sphere of academic activity. Such information might dispose faculty to favour some students in such things as grading, assignments, deadlines, admission to particular courses or seminars, and extensions on essays.

A student requesting the book at the faculty office in Sidney Smith Hall was told the book was restricted to faculty who were involved in "counselling" students.

Faculty members questioned said the book was sent to them automatically every year, without special request.

Sociology to probe content

By WAYNE ALDRIDGE

U of T's Sociology Department is going to determine whether there is enough Canadian content in its courses.

In response to the decision, Professor P. J. Giffen, department chairman said, "My personal opinion is that Canadian content hasn't been neglected," but the problem is that, "few good studies are Canadian." He attributes the problem to the short time that sociology has been studied in Canada.

The department of sociology is the only one at U of T to have student parity on the department assembly.

The decision follows almost two weeks after students in Canadian Sociology (Soc 303) circulated a memorandum complaining about the "trivial" nature of the course.

Cops ransack apartment

Police continue to terrorize Montreal

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Montreal is still in the grip of a reign of terror, as police raids continue to sweep the city.

Now, nearly seven weeks after the declaration of the War Measures Act, police have raided about 5,000 private homes and apartments there, according to the Montreal office of the Confederation of National Trade Unions.

TWO TORONTO RESIDENTS, Amber Grevatt, 24, and Chris Wilson, 21, experienced a typical example of an arbitrary police raid during their visit to Montreal Friday. They were "detained" for six hours for no apparent reason.

Organizers of the Quebec Teach-in to be held next week in Toronto, they were staying at the St. Paul St. apartment of Michael and Susan Smith in Old Montreal when it happened.

Amber was making a cup of coffee when the doorbell rang.

Michael went downstairs to the front door of the building, a converted warehouse, and was confronted by 15 burly plainclothes members of the Surete du Quebec, the investigating wing of the Quebec Provincial Police.

"THEY BARGED INTO the apartment," says Amber. "We didn't know what was happening. A few of them were still in the hall, and we heard the doors being kicked in and the locks breaking. They quickly searched the other two apartments, but the tenants were out."

"WE SAT AND WATCHED THE COPS spend two hours ransacking Michael's place," Amber adds. "They literally tore the place apart."

"They looked inside every book on every shelf, and pulled them onto the floor. They went through all the kitchen drawers, and a chest containing Michael and Susan's old wedding gifts and mementos."

Grevatt and Smith were bewildered. The police wouldn't say what they were looking for. Smith, who has never been a member of the FLQ, is a left-leaning political science student at McGill University and a former CUSO volunteer in Ghana. His father is a dean at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

His wife Susan, who was at work during the raid, is a probation officer for the Quebec government.

AT 1:15 P.M. — 45 minutes after the arrival of the police — Chris Wilson arrived at the apartment.

"I walked up the stairs and was met by a cop who told me to sit down and not move," he says. "The police were really tearing the place apart. They were ripping posters off the wall, going through the cupboards, knocking on walls, and measuring the door frames."

The police confiscated from the Smith's apartment personal letters dating back to their high-school days, calendars, date-books, boxes of old bills, two copies of Monthly Review, and two books — On Aggression by Conrad Lorenz and Do It by Jerry Rubin.

"THEY ALSO TOOK two ornamental mallets that especially fascinated them," says Wilson. "The kind you could buy for $2.50 at an army-navy store. The police were intrigued by some Italian vocabulary sheets pinned to the door of the bathroom. The Smiths were learning Italian for a planned trip to Europe."

Mr. Smith asked if he could have a list of the confiscated goods.

"The stuff will be back a lot sooner than you will be," said one of the police.

"How long?" Smith asked.

"Three months, if you're lucky," the cop laughed.

"They spent 15 minutes questioning Michael about a chain-saw he had," says Chris. "He uses it on a property in Ontario where he does a lot of woodcutting."

MICHAEL, CHRIS, AND AMBER were finally taken to an unmarked car parked in a back street, well out of sight of bystanders.

They were driven to QPP Station 4 and put in individual cells.

"After being questioned for 15 minutes," says Amber, "I was taken to a place in the basement they called 'the freezer'. I entered a big metal door into a windowless isolation cell — 9x9 with big cement walls, a thin bench bolted to a wall, and no bed. A fan blew cold air through the ceiling. In the cell next to me a guy was wheezing and coughing — he sounded very sick."

Michael, Chris and Amber spent four hours waiting in the cells. Only Amber was questioned.

"WE DIDN'T KNOW HOW LONG we were going to be there," says Chris. "They just kept threatening the three month thing."

After four hours, the three were released without charge.

It was just another random police action in Montreal, a mild one in contrast to those inflicted on Quebecois.

"They didn't know who we were," says Amber. "They knew nothing about the Teach-in Chris and I were organizing. They didn't seem to care. While they were booking us, I saw they had a long list of other houses they were going to raid."

PhysEd defensive back Mike Bell crosses the goalline after intercepting an errant Dave Baker pass

PhysEd hammers Trinity 40-7

By STAN KOROLNEK

Using a strong running attack, PhysEd overwhelmed an undermanned Trinity Trojan squad 40-7 on Monday afternoon to move into the 77th Mulock Cup final. Their opponents for the second consecutive year will be Victoria College.

Despite the score, Trinity played an inspired game and controlled most of the play in the first 20 minutes. They took an early one-point lead on an 18-yard single by quarterback Dave Baker.

Baker had to be the outstanding player of the game. He completed 13 of the 27 passes he attempted, returned punts and kick-offs, ran the ball on several occasions and even took a turn on the defensive platoon for a Trinity team that had only 18 players dressed for the game.

PhysEd took command of the struggle mid-way through the second quarter as they ran up 20 unanswered points. They added seven more in the third period and another 13 in the fourth.

GORD HARVEY HANDED the hulk of the PhysEd running attack and scored three touchdowns — including one 76 yard run.

Scoring additional majors for PhysEd were former Monarch Parkers (if the stars of the interfac games don't come from Riverdale they come from Monarch) Mike Bell, on a 40-yard pass interception, and Larry Theed on a 20-yard ramble. The other touchdown was scored by Dave Rae on a one-yard plunge. Rae was later injured in the third quarter and did not return. However, he expected to play in the final Friday.

Gene "The Bronzed Toe" Vineze completed the scoring for the winners with four converts.

Trinity's lone TD came in the fourth quarter from Brian Cernick on a 20-yard dash through a maze of PhysEd defenders.

PhysEd quarterback Don Crocker was good on two of the three passes he attempted. One was a bomb to Dave Turner which led to a Harvey touchdown run. Crocker was hurt and replaced by Kent Duncan who was the starting QB at the beginning of the year.

Bell played an outstanding game for the jocks, intercepting the one pass and sticking every black and red uniform.

Varsity winkers second at Cornell

By BARRY CORBIN

A four-year dream — to bring the trophy emblematic of the North American Tiddlywinks Championship to the University of Toronto is at last within the grasp of the "Toronto Six", the unheralded U of T tiddlywinks team.

During the past weekend, these players drove 250 miles to Cornell University in Ithaca, N.Y. to compete in the Western Regional Playoff that determined two of the four finalists who will compete in the "Continental."

Veterans Bryon Alexandroff, Barry Corbin, Lindsay Horenblas, Glen Kezzer and Mel Solomon, aided by the strong play of rookie Wendy Levinson, played superbly against tough opposition from Cornell, McGill, Carleton and Waterloo. "squidging" and "squopping" their way to a 157½ point total.

The Toronto Six, boosted by the support of two cheerleaders, had victory at its finger-tips, so to speak but luck was not winning down at the team. Cornell trounced Waterloo in the final round, knocking Toronto from its first place position and thus nailing the coveted spot for themselves.

But glory may yet come to the U of T should current plans to stage the February Continentals in Toronto go through. The team is hoping to bask in the full public adulation which they deserve.

Says Alexandroff, "We expect coverage from national T.V. in February of course."

PhysEd wins rugby title

PhysEd dethroned Engineering I as the reigning Nankivell Cup kings as they hammered the defending champs 19-5 in the interfac rugby final yesterday afternoon at the Stadium.

Football players dominated the scoring for both teams as Kenny Lee scored two trys while Doug Ball, Paul Kitchen and Mike Bell added singles for the PhysEders. Carl Triner converted Bell's try and Bell converted Kitchen's effort.

Wayne Maddever tallied the lone try for the losers which was successfully converted by Anton Davies.

Meanwhile, in soccer playoff action, the final between Sr. Engineering and St. Mikes A will be played at the Stadium today at 12.15.

Sr. Engineering gained the final with an 8-0 drubbing of Scarborough College Monday afternoon.

Grads A were last year's Arts Faculty Cup winners.

Vic QB John Baird gets away one of his few passes despite strong pressure from the Dentistry line

Too much power for Dents, Vic takes a 22-0 triumph

By PAUL RAPHAEL

With around 100 freezing fans watching the second game of the interfac football finals in Varsity Stadium (seating capacity over 28,000), Vic defeated Dents 22-0.

The game started queerly as Dents first pass was batted into the air and was intercepted by lineman Dave Duvener who then stepped into the end zone. A faked convert attempt resulted in a two-point conversion as QB John Baird passed to Peter Wade.

The first quarter ended with a single by John Russel.

The remainder of the first half was played almost entirely within the Vic end of the field. Dents, after recovering a fumble on the Vic 31, tried a pass to a man open on the 5-yard line. Before the ball reached the receiver, he was badly mauled by a defender. What seemed to be an obvious case of interference to everyone in the

Mulock Cup
 Final
 Friday — 1 p.m.
 Varsity Stadium

Stadium, was missed by the officials. The subsequent punt went to the back of the end zone and would have resulted in a single if not for a foolish no-yards penalty.

VIC WAS THEN to punt. The snap was poor. The punter scrambled for the ball in the end zone. He barely managed to boot it out to the 15 yard line before he was smeared. For some reason, better known only to himself, the referee called a roughing-the-kicker penalty. The punter had, indeed, been hit. However, if he, for any reason is forced out of his pocket or makes any movement but to kick the ball, he forfeits his privileged status and can be hit like any other player.

Things still worsened for Dents as their fullback Bob Sullivan was carried from the field on a stretcher with a knee injury.

Dents had blown their chances. With the hammering they were absorbing from the larger Vic lines, it was only a matter of time before the roof fell in.

Peter Wade swept around the left end and the major was converted by Joe Cornacchia to give Vic a 16-point lead in the third quarter.

The last scoring play was set up by a blocked King Draper punt which was recovered on the Dents five yard line. Peter White then scored an unconverted touchdown.

Although they gave it a good effort, Dents had neither the size, nor the offence to defeat a much stronger Vic team.

OQAA goes belly up

Lyndon Little
 VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

In a backward step as far as Canadian unity is concerned, the three Quebec members of the Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association — Laval University, University of Montreal and McGill — have been forced to drop out of the inter-collegiate sports group and, in effect, bring to an end a significant force in French-English relations in this country.

Participation by Laval and U de Montreal began in 1955 when the OQAA was formed. However, competition with McGill dates back to 1898 when Varsity, Queen's and McGill combined to play football.

THE DECISION WAS ANNOUNCED by OQAA Administrative Council Director, Harry Griffiths, Friday afternoon following three days of meetings at Hart House and will become effective at the start of the 71-72 school year.

The rump Ontario institutions of the OQAA — Varsity, Queen's, Carleton, U of Ottawa, Guelph, McMaster, U of Waterloo, Western and Windsor — have voted to combine with the major existing members of the present Ontario Inter-collegiate AA (York, Waterloo Lutheran, and Laurentian) to form an as yet unnamed, all-Ontario athletic association.

The main responsibility for the death of the OQAA must be carried by the Quebec provincial government — especially the previous Union Nationale administration of Jacques Bertrand!

Several years ago, the Bertrand government set up an advisory committee on sports called the Quebec Sports Confederation. This group set as its goal unity in all levels of sports within the province.

Naturally, one of their prime recommendations was to group all Quebec universities into an exclusive, Quebec athletic conference.

With complete control of the educational pursestrings, the Bertrand government made it clear that monies for inter-collegiate sports programmes would be easier to obtain as members of this new group (expected to be called the Quebec-St. Lawrence AA).

MCGILL HAS OFFICIALLY withdrawn from the OQAA but has been given a special extension, as far as football is concerned, to see if they can come up with enough money ($75,000 to $90,000) from private sources to operate their football programme. Prospects, however, are not bright and if they are not successful, 12 Ontario teams will form a football conference this fall.

They will be divided into Eastern and Western Divisions of six teams. Each division will be broken into two sections.

Blues will combine with Queen's and Carleton in one section of the Eastern Division while York, U of Ottawa and Laurentian will form the other. In the Western Division, McMaster, Guelph and Waterloo Lutheran will be in one group with Windsor, Western and U of Waterloo in the other.

Each team will play a home-and-home series with the other members of its section, one game with the remaining teams in their division and one match with a selected inter-divisional rival. Sectional winners would then meet in the semi-finals, the survivors in a final and the overall winner would then advance to playdowns leading to the College Bowl.

St. John, Cole star as Blues blank Guelph

By PAUL CARSON

(Guelph) — In mythology, Gryphons are sturdy beasts who make life miserable for gargoyles.

In hockey, Gryphons are 17 men of limited ability who lull better teams in playing their type of game.

Blues got lulled into their worst display of the year last night but they still had enough to come away with a 4-0 victory.

Hero of the evening was lanky sophomore netminder Grant Cole who stopped 20 Guelph shots in registering his first shutout of the season.

The Gryphons were most dangerous in the second period when penalties and general sloppiness gave Guelph several good chances from close in. Cole, however, rose to the occasion and was full measure for his shutout.

Unfortunately, the same could not be said for several other Varsity players who spent the night turning what could have been a rout into a close, if somewhat dull, game.

Veteran center Brian St. John accounted for all the Varsity goals as he fired one in each of the first two periods and a pair in the final 30 minutes of play.

Defensively, Blues played well — especially during a 73 second stretch in the opening period when the Gryphons were not allowed a shot on the Varsity goal with Blues two bodies short.

The blueline corp of Terry Parson, Bill L'Hereux, Brent Swanick, Dave McDowall and Nels Nebenedet played steadily and, unlike last year's embarrassing 3-2 loss to the Gryphons, the wingers were backchecking.

Also on Blues' behalf, it must be said that they once again faced those twin Varsity nemesis — hot goaltending and lax officiating.

Rookie Ken Lockett, guarding the Guelph net, stopped 32 of the 30 shots Blues aimed in his direction and virtually robbed Varsity snipers on several occasions.

Hometown referee Jim King, decided early that the Gryphons could do no wrong and according Blues took eight of the nine penalties — including misconducts to winger Mac Hickox and defenseman L'Heureux.

Blue Notes: Blues arrived to discover that they had left several of their game sweaters at home. Consequently, three Blues ended up wearing the wrong uniform numbers and two of them, backup goalie Tom Little and defenseman Debenedet, were forced to don the colors of the opposition. Little's borrowed jersey was at least three sizes too small for his six-foot-four frame!

"Oh, Eric's back"

—Paul Carson, on learning of the appointment of Eric Rump as The Varsity's publicity manager.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto. Printed by Web Offset Publications Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper, are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

What the faculty council does

The current referendum in the Faculty of Arts and Science is important for one simple reason.

The faculty council, whose membership is being challenged in this referendum, is the governing body of the faculty and has a lot of real power over students' lives.

What are some of the areas in which the faculty council makes important decisions?

It sets examination dates and policy.

For example:

- Last year, Jewish students had to petition the council to alter the examination schedule to make it possible for them to observe religious commitments. The solution reached was not satisfactory, as many students had to write two or more three-hour exams on a single day.

- This year the council has decided to eliminate the traditional "study week" between the end of lectures and the start of exams in April. The extra week will be used to hold mid-term exams during the first week of January.

- the faculty council has a standing resolution which says that all students in first year courses must write three-hour exams at the end of their year in each course. The exams are to count for 50 per cent of their year mark.

This faculty council regulation has made it necessary for students and faculty who have together decided not to rely on the examination as an instrument of evaluation, to sit about needlessly in the early summer to perform a meaningless ritual.

It approves or rejects marks in the faculty courses.

This can have a serious effect on students and faculty attempting to evolve new, co-operative, methods of learning.

This summer the council decided to veto the marks submitted by the instructor of an experimental course at Innis, CIN 193. It was felt that there was not a proper distribution of marks between A's, B's and lower grades, and it was rumoured that students had decided, together with their instructor, to prepare their own marks.

The council and its committees determine a very broad range of policy, including what courses are available, whether there will be exams, tutorials, seminars, lecture-halls, and whether there will be a grading system or a pass-fail system.

One example of the council's authority is the publication of the "Class List", the publication referred to in our front page story.

This list reinforces the emphasis on competition and grading in education, by its very existence — under a pass-fail system which did not depend on exam results, it would be superfluous.

It also reinforces the superior position of faculty in the educational process, since it is a book easily accessible to faculty for use for any purpose they consider necessary, but is not available to students.

Those are just some very specific examples of what powers the faculty council has to affect the academic processes at U of T. In formal terms, at least, the council has the power to create absurd difficulties for students and faculty who are attempting to alter the traditional authoritarian models of education. It was in the faculty council that attempts to introduce the "new program" met the fierce opposition that made the reforms bear little resemblance to the Macpherson Report that spawned them.

The faculty council is now composed of about 1300 faculty — all the faculty in arts and science — plus 34 students, each representing a different department in the faculty.

Two years ago it was 16 students, and before that none.

A more efficient "general committee" of the council includes 34 students and 135 faculty and administrators. This "executive" is only temporary and must be replaced before next year.

Student members this fall attempted to have a re-structuring committee set up immediately, to effect the necessary changes before the end of this academic year.

The faculty majority on the committee, however, tabled this until April.

Students felt this would be too late in the year for them to participate effectively. They also felt that such important changes should be made while the campus was in session, not in the summer and out of the students' eye.

Earlier this month most of the students on the council, withdrew in order to consult student opinion. They are asking support for two things.

- that students not participate in the council's decisions until a staff-student committee is set up to restructure the faculty council,

- that the council be restructured to allow equal faculty student representation at the departmental and college levels.

These are aims which deserve the support of all students in the faculty of arts and science. Today is the last day to cast your ballot in the referendum. The strongest possible show of support will have the maximum impact.

If we have learned anything in the last three or four years at U of T, it's that student participation in running the university — to be effective — must be on an equal basis with faculty.

That's the only way we can begin to build a co-operative community here at U of T.

"Ah, yes, so you got on F in Prof. Barker's psychology course last year. Your father got an A, you know."

"Meetings?" "Who needs them?"

"I'd rather go to a gathering of The Varsity staff anytime."

So says Eric Rump, the Varsity's newly-appointed publicity manager, and he ought to know.

Rump was the only person present at the staff meeting called for Monday.

Furthermore, not all of the announced prizes have been gobbled up yet, nor have all The Varsity staff yet attended a meeting this week.

Therefore, we again denounce a forthcoming meeting, this time for tomorrow, so you have a day to mull it over. Time is 1 p.m. and the place is the Varsity office.

Eric Rump feels there are a lot of things that should be dealt with at this meeting, including the Xmas CUP conference, the future of the paper between now and Xmas and beyond.

And our next supplement — we'll be discussing plans for this issue at the same meeting. In fact, it's the most important thing that could happen to you.

Oh yes — you'll get to meet Eric Rump as well.

Our mistake

The authors of the letter signed "Girls in Engineering" published in Monday's Varsity feel that a last-minute surgical operation performed on the letter by a Varsity proofreader early Sunday morning completely distorted the meaning of their letter.

The two sentences which had to be omitted from the printed version were:

- from the first paragraph: "... We consider them (the male engineers) the best example of chivalrous gentlemen to be found on Campus..."

- from the second paragraph: "... Some of us attended the Slave Auction as observers and participants and found it quite amusing..."

They also felt that the headline assigned the letter was inaccurate.

Do universities produce "surplus labour"?

On this page we print two views of the job crisis which university graduates are experiencing as they seek meaningful employment outside the university.

Attention has been focussed on the situation by the U of T Graduate Students Union report. "Who needs a PhD?", written by Marjalena Repo and released last week.

Today we print a copy of the form letter the Canadian prime minister mails out to graduating students.

Beginning immediately below is an article by Wynton Semple, who prefaced his study with these remarks:

"It's a bloody shame that Halli Repo has chosen to obfuscate her excellent statistics with her cretinous nationalism. The contradiction of the inability to dispose of surplus (including surplus human labour power) and at the same time experiencing a shortage of essential goods and services is pandemic to capitalism. "It is exacerbated, not caused by Canada's relationship to the United States."

IN 1969, THE NUMBER of people graduated by Canadian universities with Bachelor and first professional degrees increased by 10.9% — In the same year, 25.9% fewer Arts students with pass B.A.'s were required by Canadian industry, as compared with 1968.

While pass Arts students experienced the biggest cut, they weren't the only ones. Canadian industry's requirements for new graduates with Bachelor degrees in pass Science and honours Arts declined by 18.4% and 14.2% respectively. For honours Science graduates, there was a meager increase of 3.6%.

Those who did get jobs found their real starting salaries lower than those paid to their compatriots in comparable occupations the year before. The cost of living increased 5.9% in 1969. None of the starting salary rates increased as much as the cost of living. The averaged increase for all disciplines (including Commerce & Business Administration and Engineering) was 3%.

And just to put the finishing touches to a gloomy picture, not only did employers hire fewer graduates for less, many employers didn't bother recruiting at all.

In its post mortem on the job situation for 1969, the Department of Manpower and Immigration admits

"It was found that the much talked about shortage of jobs may - to some extent - actually exist."

BUT, BY JUGGLING some statistics they are able to convince themselves that last year's shortage of jobs was only a temporary shadow passing over a generally radiant outlook for university graduates. Listen to the glad tidings from Manpower:

"during this period (1961 to January 1969) the labour force as a whole increased by 18.7% while the "Professional" portion grew by 59.5% and accounted for almost one third of the total labour force growth. So, regardless of the present state of this portion of the labour market, the long-term prospects are extremely promising"

Manpower's optimism is based on a rather unique interpretation of recent history. While the "Professional" portion of the labour force grew by 59.5%, the number of new graduates with Bachelor and first professional degrees (i.e. those who are candidates for jobs in the "Professional" sector of the labour force) grew by 368.2% during the same time period.

Some idea of the total number of new people required in the "Professional" sector in Canada during the nine years from '61 to '70 can be obtained from a federal study done in 1968 by Meltz and Penz. This study gives a projection for the total number of required new entrants into the labour force in the "Professional" and certain semi-professional "Commercial and Financial" occupations during this time.

This study's projection of the number of people needed in these fields over this time is 272.5 thousand, 378,219 thousand people came out of Canadian universities with Bachelor and first professional degrees during the same time period.

If there was a surplus of university grad-

CANADA

PRIME MINISTER • PREMIER MINISTRE

Dear Students:

In a growing and prosperous country like Canada, the social and economic well-being of all citizens depends on their capacity to respond quickly to technological change and adjust successfully to new developments.

The key to our future progress and high standard of living is the education of our young people.

As new graduates, you have the knowledge, skills and ambition that will help make Canada a leader among nations that cherish freedom and fulfilment of the individual. It is through your initiative that Canada will prosper in the years ahead.

Pierre Elliott Trudeau

uates in the sixties, why is it only recently that it has become a prominent public issue?

ONE OF THE FACTORS that tended to obscure the problem was that emigration to the United States played a significant role in reducing the number of university graduates in the Canadian job market. It may be that the famous "brain drain" was occasioned less by the tummy charm of the American mammon than by the spectre of unemployment at home.

In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1968, 7,117 "Professional, technical and kindred workers" emigrated to the United States from Canada. This number amounted to 12.3% of the total number graduating from Canadian universities in 1968.

However, the door to this particular escape route was slammed shut on July 1, 1968 when the U.S. immigration laws were changed such that Canadians were forced to stand in line on a first come first served basis along with everybody else in the Western Hemisphere.

The privilege of being allowed into the U.S. is now extended to only 120,000 people a year from this region. Would-be immigrants with educational qualifications below the level of an M.A. must have pre-arranged employment before they're allowed in.

GRADUATE SCHOOLS HAVE served as another outlet for the surplus of graduates. From 1961 to 1970, the rate of increase in the number of graduate students was much higher than that of undergraduates. In this time period undergraduate enrolment grew by a factor of about 2.4, whereas graduate enrolment increased by about 4.2.

Also, the problem of employment for university graduates was and still is obscured by the position women are forced to occupy. Usually they are "allowed" to stay home and do unpaid labour in the home. Periodically they are used to help fight wars or to do the menial extra low-paying jobs which men refuse to do.

Of the 2,558,000 women in the labour force during the third quarter of 1969, 2,003,000 of them were employed in the service-producing industries. In October of 1969, the average weekly wage and salary in these industries (Service; Finance, insurance & real estate; and Trade) was

$97.69 as compared to an average weekly wage and salary of $137 for the goods producing industries. During the third quarter of 1969, 66% of the married women between the ages of 20 to 64 were officially considered to not be in the labour force since they did not work for pay and were not actively seeking work. (Whereas 34% of the married women in this age bracket were considered to be in the labour force, the corresponding figure for men was 94%)

There was no point in these women seeking work.

If one quarter of them (716,000) had decided to actively seek paid employment, the unemployment rate for women would have been 35% instead of the official 2.5%. The overall unemployment rate would have increased by 9%.

WHAT ABOUT THE FUTURE, what about Manpower's claim that "the long-term prospects are extremely promising"?

In both the immediate and long-range future, the supply of graduates will increase much more rapidly than will the supply of jobs. In the five years prior to 1971, the rate of increase in the annual number of new university graduates of all kinds from Canadian universities is approximately 4 times that of the projected rate of increase in jobs in the "Professional" sector in Ontario. For the '71-'76 period, this multiple declines to about 2.

It is clear that there is now a job shortage for university graduates and that the salaries new graduates are receiving have declined relative to those paid to their predecessors. It also appears that the discrepancy between supply and demand will increase with the likelihood of even larger relative declines in salaries in the future.

However, as is often the case, that which is clear on the basis of data gathered by social scientists who support capitalism, is not the most important.

It is all very well to know that 'X' number of people will or will not have jobs at 'Y' rates of pay but that tells us nothing of the actual experience of having a particular job.

In the final analysis, the operational definition of these terms is "from the point of view of the ruling class" since the research assumes the permanence of the status quo.

Watson and Butorac illustrate the way in which research is carried out from the perspective of the ruling class in their introduction to Qualified Manpower in Ontario 1961 - 1966 :

"These are estimates of the numbers and types of manpower we might reasonably need in the normal course of events in an unplanned economy, striving for sustained economic growth very loosely defined within certain general guidelines. They rest on the assumption that our social and economic structure will remain fundamentally unchanged over twenty-five years, unaffected by any catastrophe such as war, depression or revolution."

There doesn't need to be an organized, conscious conspiracy among social scientists to ensure the promotion of ruling class interests. They are required only to accept the legitimacy of the present order.

WHAT CAN BE SAID about the sorts of jobs university graduates can look forward to? Can we accept the prime minister's word? What are we to say to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who assures us that "Rapid and continuing technological change in today's society creates ever more exciting opportunities for rewarding careers in many fields - commerce, industry, science and academic endeavour."

In the minister's mind, there is not even an employment problem let alone a question of what kind of jobs.

Although the empirical research has not been done which would enable us to make confident assertions about what the work experience for university graduates actually is, it is possible to say what it is not. There seems to be little substance to the notion that capitalism is creating all sorts of exciting creative challenging jobs which demand that those who fill them be highly trained, capable of acting and thinking independently and critically.

Meltz and Peuz, in commenting on the changes in the education structure of the labour force which they project between 1961 and 1970 say "... it is important to note that only about one third of the projected change in the education structure is attributable to a shift in the structure of occupation groups toward white collar occupations, particularly professional and clerical occupations. The major part of change is due to upward shifts in the occupation groups' education structures"

In other words, it is not so much a matter of new job sectors opening up which require more education as it is a matter of the education level of existing jobs in the present sectors having risen.

IN THE 20 YEARS between 1966 and 1986, in Ontario, it is projected that the proportion of the total labour force constituted by those in the "Proprietary and managerial" and "Professional and technical" groups will increase by 2.86%

Even if the interesting jobs are in the "Professional and technical" sectors, few women will get a crack at them. Those who compile the projections have no reason to believe that the present level of gender racism will subside much in the next twenty years.

It is projected that in 1986, 2.15% of the labour force will be constituted by women holding jobs in the "Professional and technical" sectors (including elementary school teachers). If elementary school teachers are excluded from the calculations, the 1986 projections for the male and female participation rates in the "Professional and technical" sectors indicate that the proportion of females will be less than one fourth (1.46%) that of men (5.85%).

It appears that there will be few jobs opening up in the sectors which we have assumed embraced the stimulating, creative jobs.

Semple's article has been published by Hogtown Press as "They'll Have to Start a War or Something: the Employment Hoax". The Hogtown version includes many tables and footnotes which we have not reproduced.

Engineer offers solution to women's liberation

Speaking as an engineering student (and proud of it) I feel compelled to make some remarks on a letter which appeared in November 18's Varsity. This statement was written by "The University of Toronto Women's Caucus", which might lead us to believe that all of the women on campus got together in Maple Leaf Gardens to mull over each word. It was plain to any reader that the letter did not express the views of all our female students, but rather the lop-sided opinions of a few hiding behind that impressive title.

Since engineers are natural targets for these women's liberationists, for reasons I will explain later, I feel that a few words should be heard from our side to set the matter in perspective. To listen to these women one would think that we were a barbaric lot indeed, madly "fucking our way through university" as they phrased it.

Through the media we have been subjected to the ravings of such female neurotics, and although many of their demands are quite reasonable (even to an engineer) the time has come to realize the truer, underlying conflict.

First let me say that the engineer has a fundamental view of life in which he sees women as being different from men. We like women. We like their sexuality. We like sex. We think it's natural

We are not ashamed of our differences. There is nothing 'exploitive' about our slave auction. No chains. No whips. Just some healthy young people having fun for charity. We don't get uptight to hear a joke that has anything to do with s.e.x.; true, the Toike oike is rather juvenile, but so what? Sex can be treated with humour just as any other aspect of life can.

Let me be quite blunt when I say that the authors of this letter are using an intellectual facade to conceal their own inner sexual maladjustments and frustrations. The engineer is much more open and less self conscious about sex and, as such, appears as a dire threat to these women who would prefer their men castrated.

To them, "male chauvinism" is something to be feared. Well let me say something to set them shivering in their chastity belts: we engineers are "male chauvinists" in that we are proud of our sexuality. We are not ashamed, or afraid, to be men.

Their hysterical paranoia surfaced in the phrase quoted earlier "the engineer as super-male, fucking his way through university." Their disgust at sex was revealed when they point out in horror that at the auction one of the girls "partially disrobed". They had nightmares because someone, in good satiric fun, carried a sign proclaiming "Penis Power."

Let me conclude by giving some advice to these women, and others who may be in the same predicament.

Girls, if you want to know what a "human relationship" really is, if you want to cure yourself of all sexual neuroses, and, especially, if you want to know what it really feels like to be a woman, find yourself an engineer and submit to the overwhelming, ecstatic power of his gorgeous cock.

Mainline blasts U of T for canning Bump'n Grind

Regarding Ben Forster's piece "Mainline is cancelled after Simcoe Hall applies the pressure", Vol. 91-No. 26, Friday, Nov. 20, 1970; I figured I'd give you the facts.

The Mainline Bump 'n Grind Revue as advertised in the Varsity Monday, November 16th 1970 as well as Wednesday, November 18th 1970 was booked by Music Factory, October 23, 1970.

Everyone involved, namely the two representative signees, the one from New College, the other from St. Michael's College, and myself, the band leader, acknowledged and validated the conditions of the contract which stipulated that: Mainline provide its services for a concert-dance at Convocation Hall, Thursday, November 19th, 1970 and that Mainline agreed to hire two professional dancers for the performance. As bandleader, and U of T Alumnus, Arts 1966, I considered all production aspects of the "gig" and in good faith hired the services of:

1. A lighting crew, Catharsis Lighting.
2. An artist, David Andoff
3. A printer, Norman Green
4. The female dancers (Names withheld)
5. A four man security force (Vagabonds)
6. A limousine, Celebrity Limousine Service
7. A rehearsal hall (name withheld)

All these people, excluding Celebrity Limousine Service, have been paid in full by certified cheque. We were fortunate that the limousine service allowed Mainline to cancel on short notice.

Mainline has receipts for $437.00 pertaining to expenses incurred. Mainline received no advance. The contract guaranteed payment by cash or certified cheque upon the completion of the engagement.

The band arrived at Convocation Hall Thursday night, November 19th, 1970, at 8:20 p.m. fully prepared to blow as scheduled. Two campus cops told me that the gig was cancelled. My basic logic tells me we've been fucked for our money and efforts! The way I see it, all those people missed the show of their lives and I'm really sorry about that. So it looks like lots of people got fucked.

Staff Telegram writer, Peter Goddard has brought it to my attention that the Fugs blew at Convocation Hall three years ago. I consider our "Bump 'n Grind Revue" to be equally significant as entertainment, and music; Canadian music.

1. The publicity and promo was disseminated and handled by the Colleges, New and St. Michaels. Mainline spent nil on promotion. Do not confuse production costs with promotion costs.
2. Ignorance on the part of Hayward (Director of Student Affairs at St. Mike's) was purely ignorance; he should sign contracts rather than let an irresponsible student. If anything, Hayward should stand behind his subordinate's signature, or not allow same to sign contracts.
3. Organizers were 100% aware of what Mainline was doing with the topless dancers — the organizers just accepted God's rule and left Mainline holding the proverbial bag.
4. If I had handled the publicity or my agent had, we would have made this production nationally known.
5. Who the fuck is Kent? Has he the right to dictate like the Almighty. Wake up U of T students!
6. Bridgewater of the union wanted Mainline to compromise as in his eyes, there was quite a bit of bread at stake: the contract was for $1350 00; a handsome sum to lose eh! Bridgewater also advised me that Mainline would have no legal claims against the signees of the contract. My answer is, justice will triumph; justice is nemesis

MPSCU backs referendum

The executive of the Mathematics, and Physics Society and Course Union (MPSCU) urges students to vote in the forthcoming Faculty of Arts and Science referendum, and further urges support for the requests on that ballot.

We feel that the present structure of the General Committee

We feel that the present structure of the General Committee (the decision-making body) which allows only 20 per cent representation for students is totally unacceptable, and that a statement to this effect is needed.

We feel that for students taking any course in either mathematics or physics a Yes vote on the referendum is particularly essential, since neither department has a structure which adequately allows student representation, as recommended in the CUG Report, in the decision-making processes of the department.

Science students, get out and vote.

Outspan oranges from South Africa have been the aim of not-too-well publicized boycott.

Sweet apartheid

Eat Outspan oranges: help racism

By ERIC RUMP

Let your taste buds be glued to the succulent flavour of an Outspan orange which is on sale in the Arbor Room at Hart House. An Outspan costs only twelve cents and the money goes for a worthy cause.

Outspan oranges are one of the leading brands of oranges which South Africa uses as an export to boost its economy.

Outspan oranges have been the subject of a not-too-well publicized boycott for the past six or seven years to protest the apartheid regime in South Africa.

"Oranges are something we seldom use and we certainly wouldn't buy South African," is what Hart House supervisor of food services Rosemary Bolitho said in early 1969.

But a spokesman for Hart House said yesterday that the big male building buys its oranges without regard to brand, by asking the wholesale supplier for good quality goods.

Loblaws carries Sabalencia oranges, also from South Africa, which they claim are of top-quality and so they charge about 8c/orange.

Hart House Warden S. Hennesey said that one shouldn't rush into economic sanction as the only resort because one isn't totally aware of the conditions in the country under question, and economic sanction may sometimes hurt those you wish to help — the oppressed — by weakening the economy and thereby lowering their standard of living.

With regard to prices, Hennesey asserted that the Arbor Room is a restaurant with 60 per cent production costs.

To at least break even, prices must rise above the huge food suppliers.

Personally, I grow my own oranges.

Few grads jobless, says report by SGS that Repo criticized

By PHILINDA MASTERS

Only seven of 241 graduate students are still unemployed, according to a report of the School of Graduate Studies submitted to the Committee on University Affairs Monday.

This figure is at variance with the Graduate Students Union report by Marjaleena Repo issued last week, which stated that 85 of 190 graduate students could not find work.

The tone of this week's SGS report is similar to one issued last April, in which it assured that most PhDs had found "good jobs", although it did not explain what it meant by "good"; and that others had decided to do further research or had gone abroad.

REPO'S REPORT CRITICIZED that of the SGS for seriously overestimating the number of PhDs who found work, and as a result, she said, it seriously underestimated the crisis of unemployment.

"Any report that builds its conclusion on the kind of data provided by the SGS will be thoroughly suspect," she noted in her report entitled "Who Needs The PhD?"

In addition, Repo stressed that the reason many PhDs do further research, in the form of Post-Doctoral Fellowships, is their lack of success in finding work. The SGS did not consider this a part of the problem.

THIS YEAR'S SGS REPORT said that all but seven PhDs found work; that 53 per cent of the teaching staff are non-Canadian, 22 per cent of whom are American; and that there was an 8 per cent increase in graduate enrolment this year.

The latter two points are contrary to Repo's recommendations that two-thirds of the faculty be Canadian, and that there be no increase in graduate school enrolment until the unemployment problem is eased considerably.

W.D. Baines, Acting Dean of the School of Graduate Studies, said that there have been cut-backs in some overcrowded departments, but in some poorly organized departments "the professors are still living in ivory towers and have no idea what's going on outside." But he added that it would be easier for students to find jobs if they didn't pursue such narrow programs.

Baines admitted that the GSU survey was more accurate than that of the SGS because the students had more time to look into it, and that the problem will be worse next year, but that "it would probably clear itself up because it's a lot of sweat to go on to a PhD."

THE CURRENT UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM, the SGS report continues, is peculiar to our times and will correct itself in the next few years. "This was a year of austerity in most U.S. universities with the result that few jobs are available to Canadians who normally go South . . . and of a great increase in applications from good U.S. graduates," but this situation can, and most likely will, change abruptly.

English students to ask end to 100-series tests

By MARIS PAVELSON

A student motion that there be no final examinations in 100-series English courses will be put to the Council of the Combined Departments of English at its meeting on Friday.

The meeting will be held at 4 p.m. in UC's Croft Chapter House.

The motion, sponsored by students Susan Goldman and Robert Cook, further states "that we not appeal this decision to the Faculty of Arts and Science because the Faculty Council is an illegitimate and unrepresentative body."

There are 12 students and 20 faculty on the English Council. The motion is not expected to pass.

This is but the latest episode in the CDE's continuing saga of "Examinations: Yes or No?" Monday, at its last plenary meeting, the CDE came through with a resounding "maybe".

The question of final examinations for 300- and 400-series courses was left up to the discretion of individual instructors and their classes. No decision has been made yet for 200 series courses.

Monday's meeting was held in an ironic atmosphere: upon entering UC's West Hall, department members found the hall laid out in neat rows of little tables as if in anticipation of an exam.

The Wm. J. Hevey theatre group, which continues to haunt the Combined Departments, distributed examination papers for the course "English Marshmallows 102."

The examination contained five compulsory questions on marshmallows.

Rush concert good in ho-hum way, ritual of guest and encores kills it

By BOB BOSSIN

Leaving the Tom Rush-Livingston Taylor concert, people seemed to think it was fair, good, or beautiful in an everyday, ho-hum sort of way. Livingston Taylor sang his pleasant songs pleasantly, with even the odd line — like "I'll give you second chances again and again" — showing some of his older brother James' genius. At the moment he is a bit wordy, but growing. Rush sang with his usual understatement and re-confirmed himself as a fine discoverer of new songs, as one would expect.

That was the trouble. Since stereo lp's, FM and TV, concerts have been pre-empted as the means for hearing and seeing a musician. Now they are for catching the musician "live", which means, more often than not, live LITERALLY, i.e. unreplayable. Maybe the appearance of Tom Rush, etc. "in the flesh", IS enough, and I am just astrophied. But I am tired of stars introducing their special guest as "a fine performer and a good friend who has been nice enough to come along" — as if there were never any question of fee; tired of the fast last song and the following applause for more while the spotlight remains shining on the stage exit for the performer's return; tired of the one encore, and the applause that dies as soon as the house lights come up, as if some phantom schoolbell has rung, dismissing the audience. In Tom Rush's case, I am tired of "You Can't Tell a Book by the Cover," "(When she wants good loving) My Baby She Comes to Me", and "Bo Diddly".

Maybe I am in bad faith, and Livingston Taylor IS Tom Rush's good friend and did come out of niceness, and maybe last time Tom Rush was Richie Haven's good friend and came out of niceness too. Maybe the audience really wants only one encore, and maybe the performer isn't waiting behind the stage-left door counting to fifteen before his re-appearance. And Maybe Rush still gets off on "Bo Diddly", "Book by the Cover" and "Baby Come to Me", after all this time.

But me, I keep hoping like a kid in church that someone will drop the bible, that the audience will keep clapping right through the damn house lights — something to prove that I am live and not on tape.

Passe Muraille looks at Amerika laughs at society, laughs at itself

By PAT LIMA

There is something particularly fresh and unspoiled about the Theatre Passe Muraille — a real sense of community and honest fun that is conspicuously lacking in certain of Toronto's other "experimental" theatre groups. (Witness the Global Village production of Justine.) The Passe Muraille group uses the techniques of "experimental" theater with complete confidence and a total lack of self-consciousness. They are ready to mock the most sacred of social cows, but they are just as ready to turn the joke on themselves.

All this is abundantly evident in the Theatre Passe Muraille's current production — I Had It Once But It's All Gone Now, an outrageous burlesque of anything and everything American. The place is America; the time — anytime from frontier days to the present. Our hero is a boy, Lee Simpson, a wide-eyed, impressionable innocent, starting out to "seek his fortune". His constant companion and guide is a fat man, "Pops Sunday", a curious mixture of Joe (like in Joe — the movie), Spiro Agnew, Jerry Rubin, Mata Hari, Don Quixote and Peter Fonda. Together they set out to look for America. Instead they find, (in order of appearance), two con men, one paranoid prison guard, a thumb-sucking lawyer, a faggy judge with a real affection for his wig, a radical theater group called "The Anarchistic Mobile Museum of Gaudy Monstrosities", a cowardly gunslinger, a socially-concious Indian, a silver-lamme'd spy and a partridge If all this weren't enough, they experience the assorted delights of prison, poverty, starvation, scalping, castration (hence the title), and finally death and eternal bliss.

The play is such broad satire that it would be unfair to judge the acting abilities of the cast. Satire of this kind depends on exaggeration and over-acting, and the most obvious "ham" is suddenly a gifted comic. It is enough to say that each member of the cast projects a feeling of enjoyment, a "Hair"-y sense of fun that cannot help but infect the audience.

I Had It Once But It's All Gone Now, Theatre Passe Muraille, 11 Trinity Square. Nov. 9 — Dec. 6. Students, $1.50.

TSO NO CHARITY, BUT GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

By TONY JAHN

Two months ago the Toronto Symphony teetered on the brink of certain financial collapse. This seems paradoxical since both subscriptions and individual ticket sales are up, prices are certainly not down, and the number of concerts per season have also increased. It becomes less of a puzzle with the realization that the TS loses money on every concert they stage. The spectre of dissolution will remain with them.

That is, until the subsidizing powers at the three levels of government realize that a symphony orchestra is not a snack bar. Then, if ever, it will sink through their free-enterprise open-competition heads that the success of an institution is not always measured in terms of financial solvency, in dollars-and-cents profit per year. The North American business mind, imbued with the science of profit, has become too adept at translating the intangible in life into tangible terms. Here that thinking must be reversed. An orchestra is by its very nature got a good "investment" in the capitalistic sense. The returns are not tangible and will continue to baffle "increase in work output per hour of Muzak" thinking. Music has always been a necessary luxury. In the times of Beethoven and Haydn the bill was paid by the aristocracy. With the decline of the influence of aristocracy the onus of subsidizing the arts has passed, with political and economic power, to the government. As the enjoyment of music has become a middle class phenomenon, so the support of musical endeavors has become a middle class responsibility, i.e. the responsibility of the government in dispensing collected revenues in the form of grants. Yet our government, and especially the provincial and city governments, has stubbornly refused to face up to the full extent of this responsibility.

There is a standard excuse to the effect that there exists limited demand for symphonic music, and government subsidy must be commensurate with popular demand. This rationalization no longer holds. In the last three years TS attendance (i.e. box office take) has increased by 63%. Federal grants have increased similarly. Provincial and city grants have increased by zero percent. Thus provincial and city governments who are direct beneficiaries of the TS's continued presence in our city are passing the buck of increasing orchestra costs to the federal level instead. We then arrive at the situation where every concert is practically sold out (no demand?) yet the Toronto Symphony Association can barely afford to part with two complimentary tickets for music critics from the Toronto dailies. The point is this: the demand for symphonic music is clearly demonstrated. There is nothing more that an orchestra can do to attain financial solvency than to play to full houses every night (discounting selling clothes at a bazaar or peddling booze in the O'Keefe lobby). It is then up to the government to provide substantial subsidies on a regular basis to assure a continuation of symphonic music in Toronto. True, there has been an ad hoc emergency increase obtained from the government this year. Emergency, because the TS finished last season $300,000 in the hole and, but for the "deus ex machine" intervention of the Ontario government, would have certainly folded by the end of the year. This, in spite of the unexpected success of last spring's Beethoven Festival at the O'Keefe.

Drawing a comparison between the Symphony here and in Europe is an enlightening experience. Spending the summer in Budapest I learned that this Toronto-sized, city of 2 million supports five full symphony orchestras. These five orchestras each consist of over 80 members, all graduates (artist's diploma) of the Franz Liszt Music Academy and most in possession of higher qualifications as well. The orchestras play a full 12-month season and at any given time one or more orchestra is on tour anywhere in Western or Eastern Europe while visiting orchestras play in Budapest concurrently on an exchange basis. And this proliferation of symphonies does not hinge upon the status of Budapest as national capital, since every smaller city in Hungary (the whole country could fit into Lake Ontario several times) has its own symphony orchestra or philharmonic societies. Playing standards are generally comparable to better North American orchestras. In general, Hungarian string players, trained since early childhood through the Kodaly system of relative solmization, possess clearer intonation. Our own brass players, the product of an American "brass band — John Philip Souza" tradition, produce a more powerful sound. The main problem in Budapest is apportioning the ever-widening repertoire among the orchestras, and conductors meet regularly to avoid programme conflicts or repetitions. Tickets to all musical events are inexpensive. Summer outdoor concerts charge 16 forints (about 75¢) admission. Tickets to a spectacular open air production of Verdi's Aida, costing double the usual price because of foreign soloists, cost 2 dollars each.

The phenomenon is not restricted to Hungary and visitors to any country in Europe will witness a similar abundance of symphonic music. It is unfortunately becoming accepted practice for young Canadian singers and instrumentalists to emigrate to Europe and sign up with a West German Opera house or orchestra. Side by side with the oft documented brain drain of European professionals to the United States we are experiencing a reverse cultural drain of our best young artists to Europe. We certainly

King Heavy Festival reveals all— TV commercials are new art form

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

It's very rarely that one gets the exhilarating chance to be exposed to a totally new genre of a particular art. But this opportunity came last Thursday for about 40 students when Innis College screened three hours of television commercials under the title of the King Heavy Film Festival.

King Heavy is the work of Paul Mandell, David Shute and Jouko Salomaa. Through a fortunate quirk they managed to get their hands on 16 hours of commercials which had been intended for the garbage heap. With a flash of the scissors and a deft splice here and there, what emerged was a picture of the society Madison Avenue would like us to become.

IT IS EXTREMELY DIFFICULT to properly evaluate the T.V. spot announcement right off the tube, as it appears for a scant 60, 30, 15 or 10 seconds. But when viewed alongside other material of the same variety, the good commercial can be sensibly criticised for its filmic and literary quality. As a result, the proper montage of skilfully selected commercials deserves to rate as a bona fide genre together with the skin-flick, the Western or the horror movie.

Perhaps it was the novelty of the whole thing, but King Heavy came off surprisingly well, considering the unusual nature of the subject. The sole drawback stemmed from the fact that the three co-producers were exhibiting a rough work-print that lacked a general sense of cohesiveness. The unevenness of the splices can therefore be disregarded as a technical difficulty that will eventually be ironed out. But I feel that the general impact could have been a great deal stronger, had Mandell, Shute and Salomaa given more care to the arrangement and scripting of the commercials.

Overlooking the general air of nebulosity, I found the King Heavy Film Festival a truly fascinating piece of cinema. All the old favorites, whether excellent or disgusting in their own right, were a joy to behold in colour on a big screen. It was also extremely interesting watching these messages in the midst of the laughing, booing, talking audience so common to the movie-theatre but absent from the protected living-room.

THE SCENE-STEALERS were, of course, the Volkswagen ads, including The First Car on Zen, a 2001-type flick in which the Bug proves its prowess by withstanding the problems of interplanetary transportation. Worthwhile commercials were few and far between. But the audience perked right up to the Right Guard classic ("How ya doin', guy?"), and joined in a lusty chorus of "You've gotta lot to live, and Pepsi's gotta lot to give", when that cola ad came on.

And there was the usual crud. There was the cutesy childishness of Bio-Ad's Arthur Godfrey ("Billy has a grass stain"), Anita Bryant's sickeningly wholesome Florida Orange Juice spiel, the Dentyne freshest-mouth-in-town girl ("That's all it takes"), the Scope Jungle-mouth gorilla-man, Glem's interrupting kid ("Daddy! Daddy!"), and that perennial Playtex nurse ("Mine still stretches like new").

BUT THE BEST THING ABOUT KING HEAVY was not so much the ads themselves, as how they were joined one to the other. One memorable sequence included a nauseating array of dogs pampered by a Dr. Ballard's, Alpo, et al. Then suddenly onto the screen flashed a CARE of Canada commercial, complete with lean, hungry bodies, white gruel, and dead children. No explanation needed here.

Another section explored the sameness of wash-day detergents. Zeroing in on Oxydol and Tide X-K, both of which arc white with green cleaning crystals, King Heavy cut back and forth so rapidly, that it made no difference which harried housewife was extolling the virtues of which soap.

Sexual overtones and sly innuendoes abounded. There was Carol's Nice 'n' Easy, Planter's Dry Roasted Nuts, and rivers of the strangest looking chocolate, caramel, nougat and cherry cream.

There was this and much more: children as consumers, women as love machines, pills for internal security, and the Mexican as bandit. Noticeably absent were the Man From Glad, the Doublemint twins, the Certs kids and toilet-paper ads. But you can't have everything.

THE KING HEAVY FILM FESTIVAL deserves an honoured place in the rapidly expanding no-holds-barred nature of today's cinema. A bit of careful scripting together with some sort of interconnecting theme would make this film palatable not only to the college-age viewer, but to the members of the Silent Majority who hoth star in and watch these commercials.

Mamma mia! That's a spicy meat-a ball!

E MAKES DISSOLUTION A CONSTANT THREAT

can't boast of any surplus reservoir in this department, and the losses are often permanent.

Of course, there can be no close parallel drawn between the status of the symphony in Europe and North America. The political system in communist countries simplifies, indeed necessitates, massive government assistance to subsidize symphonic activities. The proximity of European countries to each other facilitates concert tours. A Toronto-to-Montreal size trip in Europe would take an orchestra from Budapest to Munich. Furthermore, classical music and a love and need for the symphonic medium is inculcated from early childhood through the broadcasting media. It is propagated within the family, assisted by a varied fare of inexpensive concerts and records. Classical music is an essential part of life. Nothing drove the point home to me as much as the fact that the Hungarian Telephone Service lists the standard "A" (440 cps.) as one of its services for those who want to tune their instruments. Instead of dial-a-prayer, it's dial-an-"A". A further consideration is the great conductor cult in Europe which is practically non-existent here. We idolize our soloists, they worship their Kleiber, Klemperer and — above all — Furtwangler. This also increases the demand for symphonic music.

In North America we're experiencing, through the two separate channels of classical guitar and string ensembles, a curious renaissance of smaller scale music making. This intimate form of musical expression, involving both actively and passively ever-increasing circles of amateurs resembles a phenomenon which was one of the main features of the Romantic era a hundred years ago. The sudden demise of the Canadian String Quartet in Toronto in the early sixties, compared with the flourishing Orford Quarter less than ten years later is one sign of this changed atmosphere. There seems to be increased receptivity to serious music in all its forms. Whether the symphony orchestra? We are faced with three possibilities.

The full symphonic orchestra in its present form may disappear. It may die out from lack of financial support or from the unrealistic sound criteria set by stereo records. Spawned by the orchestra, records have attained a life of their own, setting unrealistic standards for the ensemble which fathered them. Another contributing cause may be the ever-increasing salary scale demanded by the Musicians Union. In an attempt to carve out financial security for its members, the union taps the very resources which could strengthen the symphony and ensure a certain future for orchestral players. A vicious circle is thus propagated with the corollaries of increased dependence on cheaper "student labour" (both in teaching and performing fields) and considerable loss of mature musicians to European orchestras. The union is thus emasculating its very source of income. Also to be considered is the cumbersome system of annually renewable governmental subsidy which requires any organization to submit an annual proposed budget, cross its fingers and receive (perhaps) its request. The humiliating process is repeated every 12 months and absolutely precludes any long-term planning beyond that year. Even the august establishmentarian CBC is subjected to this ridiculous ritual.

Secondly, the symphony orchestra may survive only to revert to its former status as a plaything of the rich classes. The Detroit Symphony, heavily subsidized by Ford's and other indigenous industry, sells $180 series tickets to stay solvent. Needless to say, this policy further accentuates already existing social stratification, banishing most of the middle and lower classes to the limited plea-tures of recorded music.

A third direction hinges upon a dependable annual governmental subsidy of substantial size, given as a matter of fact rather than doled out in time of need. With this type of backing the orchestra could look after the task of sowing the seeds of music in children to reap increased audiences in ten years time. Concomitantly, other methods of swallowing the bitter financial pill could be utilized. If the focus of publicity is shifted from the fly-by-night soloist to the resident conductor there will result increased public recognition and support of the orchestra. The impact of Karel Ancerl on Toronto bears testimony to this fact. The "social event" aspect of symphonic concerts could be propagated by setting aside certain seats or certain evenings at much higher prices, without overpricing the symphony beyond the average music lover's budget. More concerts for people of every age and social class, an extended season, increased exchange concerts with other orchestras would assure musicians greater financial security even at a reduced fee-per-concert union scale. We need not look abroad for examples. The Hamilton Philharmonic boasts a programme of school concerts, "Kinderkonzerte", TV and pop concerts unmatched in variety by her larger neighbour. In Montreal the annual deficit (of half-million dollars) incurred by the Place des Arts is absorbed entirely by the government at city and provincial (not federal) levels. So why not here?

As long as the Ontario government neglects its financial responsibilities and burdens the orchestra with the prospects of annual bankruptcy, the Toronto Symphony remains deadlocked. With ridiculous prices, a limited season and absolute dependence on donations, the Toronto Symphony will remain a fashionable charity, a musical United Appeal. And we all lose.

Perth County Conspiracy are theatre as much as music

Last Monday night, Massey Hall was invaded by the Conspiracy (which does not exist) of Perth County. As always, it was more of a theatrical experience than just a concert, and it was free.

The entourage that appeared on stage is a group of about fifty men, women, and kids that live on a number of farms in Stratford, work in their coffee-shop — the Black Swan, and travel to every appearance of the Conspiracy, where they listen, perform, and usually distribute gifts to their friends — the audience.

Cedric Smith, Richard Keelan, and Michael Butler are the collective music talent of the group. Combining soft, acoustic background with vivid lyrics of strong, determined images, they scorn the big city society and hint at a better way of life. The staging and lighting of the songs served to enhance the feeling. Their friends on stage by their actions showed that they were the participating audience.

and everyone in the hall would have been allowed on stage either during the songs or for the easy going, whimsical carry-ons between each number. Their presence was never left unknown, but their manner was relaxed and humorous. If you have never heard of one of their concerts, listen to their new first album. Live or recorded, the sound, people, and experience is an altogether pleasant, happy trip.

McKuen entertains in French style

By ISSY DUBINSKY
Preceded by his black-clad musicians, Rod McKuen appeared on Massey Hall's stage last night clad in sneakers, jeans and sweatshirt. Greeted warmly by an enthusiastic, tho not capacity crowd, McKuen proceeded to entertain in a manner only a man of his diverse talents could hope to.

A brilliant lyric poet, he sang, read and talked of his music with a warmth and feeling only a man has led his type of life (the stereotype background of the struggling poet) could put forth. Those listening were quick to respond to this veracity and remained captive throughout the performance.

His singing especially revealed his central theme of love — love of life, and his life style.

His raspy voice, rugged looks, delivery, stage manner and ability to emoter reveal his friendship with the French chansonniers, especially Brel.

Warm, intense, at times brilliant, McKuen said he was glad to be in Canada (this was the first time he performed here). His performance and the audience's well-earned response to it were indications of the veritability of that statement.

Nostalgia hides bad show

Ruby Keeler leads the Busby Berkely chorus in one of the many song and dance routines in No, No Nanette.

By STEPHEN CHESLEY

Because of superficial similarities in culture and ideas, the middle Sixties saw a great revival of the 1920's and 1930's. Clothing, films, and finally theatre have been influenced, so that in November 1970 Toronto is being treated to a revival of No No Nanette, a Vincent Youmans musical comedy first staged in 1925. Unfortunately, as the climax of the revival mania, this show is a low point indeed.

No No Nanette was one of the most popular musicals of the Twenties. It ran for a year on Broadway, for two in Chicago, and at one point had seventeen companies playing it around the world. The producers claim to be striving for a restaging that will be true to the essence of the original. They point to the presence of Busby Berkeley, Ruby Keeler, and Thirties comedienne Patsy Kelly. And for 1970 there is designer Raoul Rene Dubois ("Gypsy") and director Bert Shevelove ("Hallelujah Baby"). Bobby Van (lawyer Billy Early) and Helen Gallagher (his wife Lucille) provide 1970 cast requirements.

A strange amalgam is thus produced. The sets are lavish and gigantic — one is a beach complete with cottage and another the ballroom-sized living room — as all sets were then, for everyone in musicals was rich.

Jimmy the Bible salesman has been giving money to three girls: 'Flora' from Frisco (boobs), 'Betty' from Boston (svelte), and 'Winnie' from Washington (few brains). Only money, though — he never touched them — and only because wife Sue (Ruby Keeler) won't let herself go and spend, and he has this compulsion to give money away to make people happy. The girls are about to visit him, so he hires Billy and Tom (Roger Rathburn), his lawyers, to buy them off.

And there's poor Nanette (Susan Watson). She's about to marry dumb prude Tom, but wants fun first. So she wants to go to the family cottage in Atlantic City. But Aunt Sue and Tom forbid it.

Jimmy gives Nanette money to go and goes himself. And Billy has the girls meet him at the cottage. Finally Sue and Lucille go to confirm rumours. All sorts of parties and a few misinterpreted actions take place. Everyone is finally revealed to be clean and in love with the right person and they all live happily ever after.

It is all entertainment, though, so who notices plot? Nevertheless, the final resolution is so instantaneous and reckless and incidental that we wonder where all the lines and songs arose from in the first place.

Nor are the songs outstanding. Vincent Youmans was very successful in the Twenties, but is known now only for "Tea for Two" and "I Want to be Happy" from this show, and for the "Carioca", the number that made stars of Astaire and Rogers in the film Flying Down to Rio. None of the other tunes in this show are memorable in any way. The treatment they receive is shoddy. The choreography is static and renders "Tea for Two" a bore.

Even Busby Berkeley helps little. His cosmic manipulation is in evidence on few occasions, such as when a line of standing chorus girls rolls out on, then dances on, large beach balls. This type of effect becomes too obvious, though mainly because the rest is so stagnant. The positive response that the show has received is explained by a combination of highly professional polish in all of the performances, and what must be called nostalgia.

Ruby Keeler has five main characteristics: lead feet, an off-key singing voice, and a monotone speaking voice (She is the only one who could blow the line "Oh what the hell" when casting off her financial inhibitions.) In her favor, though, she has magnificent, riveting eyes and a smile that electrifies her whole face. Perfect for film, where a whole personality can be visually implied with a close-up, but not for the stage where only her detriments can be seen. Yet her long tap dance production number was fascinating. She was back on 42nd Street, and Dick Powell was in the wings, and how can you describe your reaction to seeing a real live myth?

The audience cheered. During the finale 'Tea for Two', they clapped along in rhythm as if at a camp reunion. Some even attempted a standing ovation. But they were the past and how they saw the past as nothing but roses: they hardly noticed the mediocrity on stage.

Innis sets parity search committee; council splits in rejecting Bissells' plan

By PHIL CHARKO

Yesterday in a tension packed meeting Innis College Council turned down a recommendation of U of T president Claude Bissell and voted in favour of student non-student (administration and faculty) parity on the search committee to replace resigned principal Robin Harris.

Bissell's recommendation consisted of a committee structured to include three faculty members, two alumni, three students, the Dean of Arts and Science and the Provost who would act as chairman. In accepting any committee he is restrained by the recommendations of the Haste Report to include members outside the particular faculty or college involved.

The Innis College Council is a 38 member body consisting of 19 student and 19 non-student members. Because for many issues the non-student members are not present the students have an effective majority.

Council members fear privately that Bissell will not accept the new structure. In three letters sent to the president about the matter, no reply has been received.

The structure approved by Innis includes five students, three faculty representatives, the Dean of Arts and Science and the Provost who would act as chairman.

Despite all that had been achieved in building a community spirit in Innis College, when the vote took place an almost complete student non-student split occurred.

Peter Beyer a student member of the Council commenting on the vote said, "there was an unfortunate polarization which goes against the philosophy behind the Innis College community. It was a disappointment to me."

Sixteen students outnumbered the ten non-students at the meeting but results of the vote (14-12) indicated that some students had voted against the student originated motion.

During the meeting, a faculty member reminded the Council of Art Moses' analysis in the Varsity showing how too much compromising with the Administration had ended up defeating student interests.

Civil liberty will be at Convocation Hall right from Quebec

Marie Claire Pomez, spokeswoman for the Quebec Civil Liberties Defence Committee, will speak at Convocation Hall, tomorrow at 10 a.m. The speech, concerning the recent crisis in Quebec, will mark the last leg of provincial and national speaking tours organized by the New Democratic Youth.

Pomez is a sociologist at the University of Montreal and the University of Quebec. The defence committee is providing money for the families of persons seized under the War Measures Act, and for legal defence fees.

Dents' food demands are called unreasonable

By MARINA STRAUSS

In the wake of a boycott Friday by dentistry students of their cafeteria on Edward St., U of T's administration has told the dents that food prices cannot be lowered, calling the demands "unreasonable".

The charge was laid on Friday at a meeting of Dentistry's Food Services Committee, composed of three staff members, three students. R. Middleton, an administrator in charge of food services across campus attended the meeting.

The prices in all university cafeterias are set up in a contract by the administration in consultation with Hart House food service administrators and catering firms.

"The meeting failed to come to grasp with the major issue — food quality and food service," said Hans Viergerver, DSS President later. A further meeting yesterday accomplished nothing.

Peter Gold, former SAC representative for Dentistry, and committee member, was told that coffee cost ten cents to make, and thus was being sold for 15 cents.

"That's ridiculous," he said. "The problem is that prices have been set in a contract. It's the administration we have to deal with. The only solution is to run our own set-up, like the JCR snack-bar at UC College."

This concept of self-run food selling has already received widespread student support at the Dental Faculty.

During the boycott a petition was signed by over 400 persons for more realistic prices and better quality of food.

Poll on council recognition

25% vote on first day of Arts referendum

At the end of yesterday's voting in the Arts and Science Referendum the fate of the first case of beer warged between Peter Hall and history professor J. B. Conacher had been resoundingly decided by a turnout of an estimated 25 per cent of students at the polls.

Hall who is SAC University Affairs Commissioner, had proposed the spiritual wager in defence of his claim that over 10 per cent of the students would vote. He had added the offer of a second case if over 10 per cent did not support the two questions of the referendum, but since no results will be released until after the polls close tomorrow, the fate of this case is still unknown.

Conacher has released no official statement of acceptance of the wager, but it is assumed that in a matter of honour such as this a gentleman would not risk jeopardizing his name or reputation by refusing.

Brian Morgan, a spokesman for the Referendum Committee, said that he already considered the referendum a "fantastic success, since the primary goal of getting students informed and interested has already been fulfilled far beyond our expectations."

"Not only are students all over the campus arguing about which way they should be voting, but even in the Apolitical Corner of the Trinity Buttery I overheard two professors debating as to whether students would get a large enough turnout to force the issue. People finally realize how important the Faculty Council is and how ineffective the student representation has been up to now."

People who did not manage to vote today, or who could not because they forgot to bring their ATL card, will have their chance tomorrow. Polls will be open all day, and in some buildings, such as Sid Smith and New Physics, there will be more boxes than yesterday.

People began voting on the Arts and Science referendum yesterday. If you didn't, vote today.

Greek Festival Week

Week-long program puts Greek facism in public eye

By FRANC STURINO

A successful Greek Festival Week came to an end Friday night as 1,000 Toronto Greeks and their friends crowded into York University's Burton Auditorium for a program of theatre and music.

Yet the audience and the performers knew they were not there simply to enjoy each other's company. Through the actors and the musicians came a cry for freedom in Greece.

The music of Mikis Theodorakis (Zorba the Greek) may be banned in Greece but at least here it could still be enjoyed. When George Kotsopoulos, a young musician and refugee from the Greek junta played Theodorakis' theme from "Z", the audience gave him a standing ovation. Soon the music and the freedom would return to Greece.

The festival had been organized by the Students for a Free Greece for one main reason: to raise the Greek issue before the general Canadian public.

Day Two of Greek Festival Week was celebrated by a showing of the film "Zorba the Greek".

Its composer, Theodorakis, was recently released after three years of detention in Greece.

On Wednesday a seven-hour teach-in featuring John Harney, former provincial secretary of the NDP, Lionel Rubinoff, a York professor of philosophy and national chairman of Canadians for a Free Greece, and Nicholas Skoulas, a Canadian Representative for P.A.K. was presented.

Skoulas enlightened many of the audience as to the aims of P.A.K. Specifically, this Greek nationalist movement which has branches in Canada, the United States, Europe and Australia stands for four basic principles: (1) The resoration of democratic processes in the framework of a Republic;

(2) The introduction of national independence which means, "Greece for the Greeks" not, "Greece for the Power Blocs". It has been Greece's misfortune that for centuries she has been subjected by Big Power politics. First under the Turkish Empire, then the Fascists of World War Two and now under the Pentagon, Greece has suffered from its strategic position.

(3) The introduction of popular autonomy within Greece and government responsibility to Parliament.

(4) The introduction of social justice through the enactment of a Bill of Rights and social-economic development.

Since this last point would mean that foreign capital would lose its special privileges it is naturally opposed by American corporations such as Litton etc. Whether this policy will ever replace the present regime of dictatorship, torture, censorship and CIA dominance depends to a large extent on world public opinion.

Thursday of Greek Festival Week was proclaimed a "Day of Witness" for Greek students who have suffered under the junta. Hundreds of students are now in prison for taking a stance against the military dictatorship and many of the sentences are for life. In the concentration camps of Leros and Hallikarnassos they have joined the ranks of more than 3,000 who are being held for their political beliefs.

As one of the organizers of the Festival told me, most of the students arrested are not what would pass as radical on North American campuses. Many were engineering and professionally oriented students. He went on to tell me how a personal friend of his, a theology student, got 25 years for helping to organize a peaceful demonstration.

Perhaps the best way to concisely state the message that Greek Festival Week had for all of us, is to quote from the official PAK journal. Its concluding remark reads: "Democracy was born in Greece. Do not let it die there."

P.S. Since we all know that money promotes life, volunteers should send cheques to P.A.K., Box 142, Station J, Toronto 6.

The trickle down your armpits.

Some things make us nervous.

Some things turn us into a kind of stranger to ourselves. The old dryness of the mouth sets in. The sweat starts down.

How about those job interviews, where all of a sudden you've got to stand out very clearly from the herd? Inside half an hour you've got to establish yourself to a world you never made and may not even like.

Does the prospect make you just a little nervous? No? You're lucky.

Oh, it does? Join the club. It gets us all, even those over thirty.

You could write a book about being nervous about interviews. As a matter of fact, we have written a book. A little one: "How to separate yourself from the herd". It's packed with practical tips on how to go to an interview on your own terms.

We wrote it because we've been there. Without any modesty whatsoever we can tell you we're a company whose very life depends on our skill at coming face to face with strangers.

Our little book is tucked into a bigger one: The Employment Opportunities Handbook, a kind of dictionary of the companies who are looking. This brand new handbook is yours for the asking at the placement office.

"How to separate yourself from the herd" won't work any magic between now and your first interview.

But it just might help.

Abortion law critic to speak tomorrow

Dr. Henry Morgantaler, the most outspoken advocate of legalized abortion in the medical profession will be speaking on campus tomorrow. Morgantaler, who was a featured speaker on the abortion Caravan which carried a coffin from Vancouver to Ottawa last May, protested the number of deaths caused by botched-up abortions. At present, at least one out of every ten women is faced with the prospect of bearing an unwanted child. Morgantaler is speaking at 1 p.m. in Sydney Smith Hall 2108.

Psych students fear restrictions

By DEBBIE BALTMAN
A chaotic emergency meeting of the Psychology Student Union Monday resolved nothing as students panicked at the announcement of the Psychology departmental changes.
The new changes in the pre-requisites for third and fourth year Psychology, brought back memories of the old Honour Psychology Program. Not only are certain courses (statistics, labs, theses) now needed before most students can get into the higher years, but these courses must now be taken in a certain sequential order. In this way the Psychology Department hopes to limit the enrolment to 50 in the top two years.

As well as the specialist psychology degree being abolished, the limiting of future individual projects was announced. The department claims this limiting of projects will give the teachers more time to devote to the students already enrolled in psychology.

Preceding the P.S.U. meeting five students met with Dr. J. Foley in her office to discuss the new changes. One of these students, Pat Burchell (Innis II), described some of the issues that were discussed at the meeting.

Burchell asked what was to happen to the students in transition. The answer given by Foley was that allowances would be made for students caught in the phasing of the new program, but those who did have the pre-requisites would be accepted first. But, the fact is that there were no pre-requisites for courses this year and therefore students in transit should not be penalized for not being able to meet the pre-requisites next year.

Foley was then asked why the psychology department refuses to offer courses in other areas such as clinical, educational and industrial psychology. "She replied, 'the psychology department is a science department studying behaviour by scientific method,' and that applied psychology was offered in other parts of the university," said Burchell

The Committee For A Free Quebec to sponsor teach-in on Dec. 4-5

By WAYNE ALDRIDGE
Recent issues in Quebec will be the topic of an off-campus teach-in on Dec. 4 and 5.
The teach-in is being sponsored by the Committee For A Free Quebec, a group organized in response to the War Measures Act. The basic premise of the group is that English Canada needs education and informed communication in understandable language on recent events in Quebec. It is a widely based group, formed by a coalition of labour, university, women's and community oriented collectives.

The CFQ has two objectives: 1) to oppose the WMA and all other types of "repressive legislation," 2) to support the movement for self determination in Quebec in whatever form the people of Quebec desire.
Gary Webster, a member of the CFQ says that it, "does not support the FLQ" in their methods; however, he adds, "We understand the social context of political and economic realities" which has led to this crisis.

The Students Administrative Council voted last Wednesday to, "set up the requirements for a task force to get speakers from both sides of the issue to come to the university"

Dispute ends Radio Varsity at Scarborough

Radio Varsity is going to withdraw from Scarborough College. The U of T radio network will ask SAC for permission to withdraw their closed circuit service from Scarborough, which costs the organization $150 a month and services only one workable speaker.

The Radio Varsity move comes after months of frustration and conflict over the service. Initially five speaker outlets were located at Scarborough, however two located in the cafeteria were removed by the Scarborough House Committee (which deals with all building problems) allegedly because they interfered with academic studies.

"The real reason was that a professor who had his office nearby didn't like it," said Jim Cozzi of the radio last night.

Another outlet in the coffee shop was disconnected when manager Paul Cullen removed it from his amplifier system.

A fourth outlet in a common room is little used, said Cozzi, because "it had a bad habit of being turned off." Cozzi blamed this habit on the location immediately beneath the common room of the desk of 70 year old Martin Robb.

With only one speaker in operation in the Meeting Place, Radio Varsity went one and a half weeks ago to the House Committee to ask for permission to relocate four of the speakers and add two more.

"They weren't too receptive, to put it mildly," said mild mannered Cozzi. At the House Committee meeting which contains both faculty and students, one student member, Ed Bird, called the radio organization, "noise pollution."

In a compromise move the committee permitted Radio Varsity to install one speaker in a corner of the cafeteria for a trial period of two weeks, provided that they conduct a survey before and after its installation to test student reaction. The survey was to be supervised by a faculty member.

Varsity Managing director Pat Dymond has rejected the proposal as unreasonable, and at a communications commission meeting yesterday advised the termination of radio services at Scarborough.

Co-ops still alive after battle with City Council

By DAVID GOODMAN

The proposed by-law amendment, that would effectively destroy communes and co-ops in the city core area, was defeated in a special session of City Council Monday night.

The amendment, proposed by the Planning Board staff, would have prohibited more than two unrelated people from occupying the same fully-detached house.

Speakers for and against the amendment presented their briefs and were questioned by those aldermen who had turned up. Groups represented ranged from Campus Co-op to the Hillcrest Ratepayers Association.

Speakers against the amendment championed their "right" to live in a life style of their choice. Those in favour, complained of late-night party noise, and parking problems from the communes and co-ops.

The only constructive suggestion came from Dave Goodman, mild-mannered reporter for The Varsity.

He suggested that an amendment be made to the appropriate by-law, stipulating that those wishing to live communally should have in their midst someone over twenty-one, who would sign a special lease, thus becoming legally responsible for the behaviour of his 'family.'

U of T wants money

ferred and needed at a few large centres," said the report.

The report insists that any government drive toward uniformity among the educational institutions would be "wasteful of the investment which has been made in the University of Toronto in the past."

Harold I. Schiff, Dean of Science at York University, commented: "It's not a novel argument. On one hand, if you have limited resources, you put them in the established places. That's fine if you're in those places. But the other argument is how do you ever get to be good if you're small and don't get any money."

Schiff said that the report's assumption that because Toronto is the biggest university it's the best in every area is a fallacy. He noted York as an example because it is known to have a better history department than the U of T.

"I would take a dim view of preferential treatment," said A. Ross Dawson, Director of Campus Planning at York University, noting that U of T has a large alumni and endowment fund.

"How about other universities?" said Dawson.

U of T's Dean of Arts and Science, Albert Allen, said that while the morale of the faculty is high, professors "get extremely depressed when they go around the country and see what seems to be luxurious surroundings in other universities."

Remember the old Errol Flynn movies?

"What a little spitfire you are!" he says as the heroine scratches and bites to defend herself from his assaults, her straightjacket clothing preventing her from giving him the knock-out punch he deserves, her straightjacket mentality forcing her to submit.

ple sexual intercourse, even with a routine amount of clitoral stimulation prior to the act. In other words, indications of female pleasure — sighs, groans, grunts, etc. . . . while screwing are all fabricated to assure men of their prowess. Women who had previously been taught by the Freudians to think of themselves as frigid (sometimes the statistics went as high as 90 per cent of American women!) because they couldn't "achieve vaginal orgasm" now had the long-awaited last laugh: no such thing as a vaginal orgasm exists, and any woman who claims to have experienced one is a phony!

Shattering the myth

Thus Masters and Johnson's effectively squashed the myth of female frigidity. Every woman must be grateful to them for removing one psychological burden from our sex lives. If you can have a clitoral orgasm, you are not frigid; that term of contempt can no longer be applied to miserable femininity writhing under an unwelcome penis.

But, out of Masters and Johnson's "answer" new questions arise: can the term "orgasm", well-understood by men, adequately describe the female sexual response? Why must the female pleasure be defined by male terminology?

There is a superficial resemblance between the clitoral reaction in women and the male climax. Both send a kind of shock through the body and deliver a certain release. But women do not, to my knowledge — and against the evidence of male written pornographic novels — ejaculate semen. And we are capable of having many clitoral climaxes in a row, each an improvement over the one before, so that the first release, rather than satiating us, often is just an appetizer for things to come!

Another fact of life the scientists might look into is that female potency seems to grow as women mature, while male desires tend to diminish, after adolescence. It is likely that such effects are not "natural" but produced by the increasing and decreasing pressures imposed by society on women and men at different age levels. Still they should be checked out.

Many men in our society seem to be sensually shallow and emotionally inhibited to an extreme. Emotional expressions such as tears which are permitted to women are denied to men. Is it possible that by objectifying women, relegating us to a purely physical corner of their lives and denying our humanity, men are losing out on sexual ecstasies which go beyond the orgasm? Are men afraid to abandon themselves completely and reciprocally to women — afraid of the emotional waves that may be stirred in them?

By all means, women should have as many clitoral orgasms as we wish, but I maintain — from my own experience, which though long, may not be universal — that when the clitoral potential has been exhausted there is still a hole, physical and spiritual, to be filled. And when it has been filled well, with penis and ejaculated semen satisfaction comes with a certain finality which I have never achieved clitorally — a feeling of complete physical and emotional contentment.

Spiritual release needed

It is as if the body has been saturated with love. This release may have more to do with osmosis than nerve endings (which we are advised by Masters and Johnson and others do not reside in the vagina) and perhaps that is why such a reaction is not electronically perceptible. Or it may have to do with a sense of fecundity or of communication passing mental and nervous limits which simply does not happen under laboratory conditions.

The microscope does affect the organism (or orgasm) — being observed. I believe such a spiritual release is also possible to men, over and above what they are satisfied to call "orgasm," but seldom occurs because of the sensual and emotional limitations imposed on them by our civilization.

Of course it is impossible for most women to achieve this kind of nirvana in the midst of the rat race.

Men frighten women with their aggressive and egotistical overtures. If the positions were reversed and women came at men with force and promises and expectations of chastity and expectations of extraordinary prowess and demands for bottled beauty and instant relaxation and threats and the danger of giving birth to children they couldn't feed or didn't want with the extra reward of the world spitting in their eyes for being "unwed fathers," they might find it difficult to have an erection, much less come every time!

The male predator

The Freudian dictum, supported by Simone de Beauvoir in "The Second Sex" that women should outgrow the need for clitoral climaxes in maturity is patently Victorian.

The clitoris is a thing of joy; I wouldn't be without one. And I do think, from my own experience again, it takes time for some women to receive satiety from screwing, but I do not believe this inhibition in young girls is psychological. It just takes a hell of a long time to get over the feeling that you're a butterfly on the end of a pin — a feeling justified by the ugly predatoriness of the typical male approach.

Long love affairs of marriages in time can convince women that the aggressiveness of one man, at least, is a product of his own culturally induced hangups and his feelings toward "his" woman are well-intentioned if clumsily expressed. The long relationship also gives a woman a chance to express her own aggressiveness, to take an active part in the making of love.

She will find there are times when her needs are greater than his, and much of the life lovers enjoy together is spent in ordinary human companionship in which the beast of prey is domesticated. Women in our society are treated, if anything, like domesticated animals and for this reason cannot cope with the ruthless and wild.

To make it complete

If men complain about their domestication here, they have no one to blame but themselves. If they insist on taming us, they must behave like gentlemen. A desire for wildness and freedom beats as strongly in the heart of the woman cooking dinner as in the man at the IBM machine; the same sickness overwhelms both.

A woman's entire body must be involved in the sexual experience to make it complete for a woman, and men must also take into consideration the terrible beating her ego takes from society every day. This is why we frequently "neurotically" insist on assurance of love.

We are constantly the objects of degradation, contempt and exploitation and the man who would win our confidence must marvel at our endurance, encourage our originality, passionately endorse our efforts to break out of the feminine bind.

Marilyn Monroe committed suicide because she didn't have a date on Saturday night. A beautiful mind destroyed by exploitation.

Sensitive women are often on the verge of self-destruction, feeling their quest recognition, for making a dent in anyone's consciousness to be hopeless. We were taught from childhood to receive love from other people and no other success will compensate. Indeed, no other success is likely to be achieved!

Sex should recreate us

The dependence on men is so intricately woven into a woman's every breath that perhaps some of my sisters are right when they say my insistence that there be more to sex than a clitoral orgasm is counter-revolutionary.

The insatiable search for variety in partners is probably symptomatic of male frigidity — an inability to come spiritually, to fuse the physical with the psychological needs, to abandon themselves to the marvel of being close to another human being who can only begin to be appreciated in a lifetime of such moments.

Keeping women, who in early years exhibit superior intellectual abilities, chained to menial chores and the fine craft of aggravating man's egos, men can assure themselves that Beethoven is the final accomplishment in music, Shakespeare in poetry, Michelangelo in sculpture. Once women are released, men may discover undreamed of realms of beauty . . . if they are indeed, able to appreciate them.

As for sex — like eating, like walking in fresh air, like all human activity — it should recreate us, help us to find one another, make us real and tangible as the earth. It should put us together again, body and soul, male and female, in harmonious intercourse.

Butterfly on the end of a pin

A re-evaluation of female sexuality

ONE OF THE BY-PRODUCTS of the Women's Liberation movement — or perhaps it lies at the very centre of it — is a re-evaluation of female sexuality.

We know that we have been exploited in advertising, the media and "art" as sex objects; that is, we are displayed as consumable merchandise or often as attractive packaging for other consumable merchandise, rather than as human beings with needs and desires of our own.

Indeed from infancy we are raised to think of ourselves as consumer items in the "marriage market," and in many cultures daughters have actually been sold by their parents as marketable goods. Being attractive to men is a matter of life and death to most women. In addition to whatever other talents we may have, good looks and/or the ability to enhance men's egos are essential for getting the few career promotions available to women or hooking a man to take us out of the job competition for life and setting us and our children up in physical comfort.

If the competitive mercantile world we live in is distressing for men, it is an even heavier burden for women who must maintain a passive facade while fighting the same basic battle for survival, to which the weight of subtle and not-so-subtle prejudice against women "in the world" at all is added as a depressing obstacle.

The root of the problem

Since much of the oppression we suffer has been internalized over the millennia of female subjugation, it was natural for women to look for the root of the problem in our sexual and procreative functions—to which, at once, we owe both our "right" to survive and our oppression.

Once our eyes opened up in our long enforced somnambulism, we found all around us vivid signs that we are regarded as legitimate objects of men's pleasure — like food and wine — and that our pleasure, if permitted to us at all, is conceived of as an automatic out-growth of the male's; the lamb enjoying its slaughter!

In many cases (see male pornographic literature) men freely admitted their sexual pleasure was increased to the extent that the female partner showed she was not enjoying the act and had to be forced into it.

Remember the old Errol Flynn movies? "What a little spitfire you are!" he says as the heroine scratches and bites to defend herself from his assaults, her straitjacket clothing preventing her from giving him the knock-out punch he deserves, her straitjacket mentality forcing her finally to submit.

Proving you are "good"

Errol Flynn was a groovy looking man with a generally pleasant manner and it's altogether possible that most women would want to make it with him from the start. Women watching these films felt that the heroine put up a phony protest to begin with and that her arm finally creeping around his neck was not really a gesture of submission but a genuine desire. The point is that the poor woman did have to pretend to be conquered over her objections to prove she was a "good" woman. If she had just said, "Errol, I have a thing for you. Let's screw," she would have been given the "character" role of the town hussy... right?

While it's true that movies... even American movies — are changing with the change in acceptable sexual behaviour in society, we women are obviously being staked out for new commercially profitable roles in life as well as in "art."

The Varsity — Errol Flynn

The clitoral controversy, though, has just begun, and — oddly enough — I find myself personally in the middle of it! Or rather, on the counter-revolutionary side of it... which is even a stranger place for me to be.

Fabricated satisfaction

Recently Masters and Johnson, two indomitable sexologists — one male and one female — have proved to their own satisfaction and with much corroboration from women who have read their findings, that the only way women can achieve sexual satisfaction is through the active stimulation of the clitoris, that small projection just inside the vagina which corresponds in stimulative power to the "head" of the male penis.

The scientists demonstrated this by electronically recording the reactions of subjects engaged in the sex act.

The rediscovery in America of the importance of the clitoris in female sexual pleasure is a boon to women's liberationists who have always insisted on the women's right to seek her own satisfaction actively, not merely to serve as a device for satisfying men.

Women now have something to demand from men in bed other than screwing because screwing will seldom produce a clitoral orgasm. In a recent Danish book called "I Accuse," the author, Mette Ejlersen, produced female witnesses to say they had never gotten anything out of sim-

Students want equality

88.5% demand parity

in Arts and Science

By BEN FORSTER

In the most massive turnout — nearly 50 per cent — for any student referendum or election in the history of University of Toronto, Arts and Science students voted overwhelmingly in favour of having the Faculty of Arts and Science Council restructured to allow student parity.

Cliff Jenkins, the referendum returning officer said, "of the 12,300 Faculty of Arts and Science student body, about 6,000 voted, and about 82 per cent agreeing that students boycott the interim committee of the Faculty Council," which has a nominal number of students on it, until a parity commission is appointed to restructure the Council. Eighty-eight and a half per cent supported the principle of parity with faculty.

Trinity SAC rep. Peter Hall was quick to point out that all sorts of people were involved in planning the referendum: "The people who organized the referendum were not left-wing types."

AS TO THE TURNOUT, approximately 50 per cent Hall said, "I'm delighted. The vote went even better than I had hoped. This campus certainly isn't dead."

Faculty reaction was reserved and negative. Both Dean A. D. Allen and Assistant Dean W. D. Foulds said they had little reaction to the referendum results.

Added Allen "I'd rather not comment on it now. It seems to be a very important piece of information which will have to be taken into account."

"At the moment it isn't even on the agenda of the Faculty Council's Monday meeting," Foulds said very stiffly.

Professor J. B. Conacher of the Department of History belittled the referendum results, calling them, "a motherhood issue for the students." He added, "The effect in the long run won't be great, because the student interest is casual, and the majority is not ready to participate."

But Brian Morgan, one of the few student members on the interim General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science, felt that the referendum "has resoundingly smashed two myths on this campus, the myth of student apathy, and the myth of parity. Students overwhelmingly support being governed by parity bodies, and it's far from true that students take no interest in the structures that govern them."

ONE OF THE ORGANIZERS of the referendum, Bob Spencer, pointed out that the Nelson-Rist motions of last December, which attempted to bar student parity from governing bodies, was passed at a meeting at which less than 200 of the over 1100 eligible members of the Arts and Science Faculty Council attended, at the time of the motion's proposal. "And that was hailed as a significant academic policy statement," Spencer said.

The statement was an acceptance of 34 student representatives — one from each of the 25 departments in arts and science, one from each of the 8 colleges and one from the division of extension.

At a meeting on October 26 of the council's general committee (a 169-member steering body which in fact conducts most of the council's business), student representatives presented a motion that the faculty council should appoint a special committee to restructure itself. The committee would be composed equally of staff members and students.

HOWEVER, THE MOTION WAS TURNED ASIDE and the student representatives withdrew from the faculty council. At this point the referendum was called.

The proposal is in accordance with the recommendations of a commission on university government set up by U of T president Claude Bissell.

SAC President Rod Hurd greeted the massive student victory in this week's referendum with a prediction that the results would "strengthen the case for student parity all across the board."

"The rationale for faculty opposition to parity used to be that parity was not broadly supported among students," he

"All sad," Rist says

"Actually I haven't thought about it that much," said Association of Teaching Staff chairman John Rist yesterday, commenting on the results of the Arts and Science referendum.

"It's been all rather sad, I think," said Rist looking pensively at his hands.

Rist had no comment to make about the referendum results, explaining that he is not on the General Committee of the Faculty Council.

"I suppose the students will withdraw or something," he said, adding that he was surprised at the high voting turn-out over the referendum.

"Personally I predicted a 30 per cent turn out," he said.

Rist, a University College classics professor, along with W.H. Nelson, a professor of history, sponsored the anti-parity motion last year to the Arts and Science faculty Council which solidified faculty opposition to some of the more controversial aspects of the Commission on University Government report.

His appointment to the chairmanship of the ATS was seen by students as a reaffirmation of the new faculty hard line.

Rist is retiring from his post as chairman of the ATS Monday when the results of the election for this year's chairman are announced. The results are secret until the Monday meeting.

"I know, of course," added Rist.

Hurd surprised by huge turnout said, "Now they can't really say students don't support it."

He said faculty would be "very hard pressed to say no" to student demands for parity on the faculty council.

Hurd also hoped the broad student support for parity would affect the composition of a presidential selection committee to replace Bissell, now up in the air.

Hurd said he had anticipated victory in the referendum, but was surprised by the huge turnout.

"The results are a clear mandate for action to secure parity for students," he said.

"I've been thinking about that definition for a long time. I've been engaged in what I call comprehensive anticipatory design science." And Dr. Salk said, "That's interesting, because that's a description of my work too."

A strong mandate

The massive turnout in the referendum on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week proved conclusively that students will not be content to play a passive apprenticeship role in either the classrooms or the governing councils of this university.

Since the election of representatives to the Commission on University Government two years ago, there has never been any mass measurement of the extent of student support for equality with faculty in controlling their learning environment.

Students demonstrated their belief in parity when they elected four students to CUG who promised to fight for it. If anything students have learned since then that parity is an essential condition of genuine co-operation between students and faculty.

The opinion polls performed by the post-CUG programming committee did not pose the issue of parity in a measurable way. If they had done so, the influence of student opinion might have been great enough to make it impossible for the summertime University-Wide Committee to agree on anything but a parity model.

Now, the task is to translate this overwhelming sentiment on the part of students into a political reality.

This must happen on the departmental, level and on the college level. It must happen inside lecture halls and inside seminar rooms. It must happen between individual teaching staff and students. It must happen in the choice of a new president.

But above all, the results of this referendum must be taken to the faculty council, where the concept was pummeled to death following the CUG Report.

It is time for the faculty of this university to see that the greatest strength of the university lies in the ability of its primary members — its students and its faculty — to participate jointly in the process of discovering and analyzing our world.

That's the belief that students have demonstrated this week.

It's time for the faculty to respect the aspirations of the students.

Bissell's case for Uof T status

Below is an almost-complete text of President Claude Bissell's remarks to the Ontario Government's Committee on University Affairs earlier this week.

A clear understanding of our role and of the resources necessary to support it is important to us; it is also important to the Province since our role is crucial in the development of the provincial system. It is now eight years since the provincial system began to evolve; it rested in considerable part upon work done at the University of Toronto; new foundations — York, Trent, Scarborough, Erindale — drew in varying degrees, on our pioneer work and continuing interest and support; we doubled our undergraduate enrolment and more than doubled our graduate enrolment, the first as part of the common responsibility, the second as the contribution that we were best equipped to make. We have been constantly aware of the provincial context, and we have been prepared to give much of our time and effort to provincial issues.

We now face an institutional crisis more profound and disturbing than any other in our history. Having examined ourselves, I suspect more deeply and more critically than any other University in our time, having maintained a high quality of education at costs that are, in comparative terms, conspicuously low, having pioneered many new ventures in interdisciplinary studies, we now find ourselves locked into the status quo — faced with the necessity of eliminating some divisions unless all are to slip into mediocrity; forced to make expensive improvisations in order to house our staff, while abandoning any serious attempt to make old buildings efficient; compelled by multiple pressures to reduce the amount of money available for academic salaries, thus penalizing a staff with the highest qualifications and the heaviest burden in the provincial system.

We do not attack the theory of the operating formula (although we are unhappy about particular interpretations); we find the interim capital formula, as do most of our sister institutions, arbitrary and unjust; and we are beginning to think that the province must frankly recognize differences in function and responsibility among institutions.

We realize that the present atmosphere is one in which it is easy to take a stern view of Universities. Canada has a long tradition of virtuous poverty for her Universities; and this recent achievement of solvency, the rise in academic salaries, so that, on average, professors now get about half as much as lawyers, strikes many as impudent assertiveness. This puritanic philistinism of Canadian life is supported by the fantasies of analysts, divorced from the realities of University life, bedazzled by crude extrapolations of cost, ignoring a number of basic factors: that the burden of numbers is decreasing at the primary and secondary level but not at the post-secondary level; that the last ten years have been a period of expensive new starts in colleges and universities; and, that to a great extent, they are a charge upon the future; and, most important, that this country must not go back to its pre-second-war state of intellectual backwater, the ultimate suburb of the city of the mind.

I hope that we will not reinforce defeatist hysteria; that we will remember that the Committee on University Affairs and the Universities have a common cause — to develop and maintain a strong system of Higher Education; and that any plan for the future that circumvents the basic educational unit — a teacher working closely with a small group of students — is not a solution, but a betrayal.

Harris explains parity situation on Innis Council

Your reporter's account of the special meeting of the Innis College Council held on November 24 to discuss the composition of the search committee for a new Principal accurately reported both the issue and the result, but he also made this statement: "Despite all that had been achieved in building a community spirit in Innis College, when the vote took place an almost complete student non-student split occurred." Peter Beyer, the President of the Innis College Student Society is then quoted as saying that "there was an unfortunate polarization which goes against the philosophy behind the Innis College community."

Since the vote was by ballot, I see no possible justification for either statement. No one knows how Peter Beyer voted except himself, and Peter Beyer does not know how I voted or how any of the other student or non-student members of Council voted.

Since there were 16 students voting and only 14 votes in favour of Mr. Beyer's motion, it is apparent that at least two students voted against the motion, but there may well have been many more. Two non-student members spoke in support of the motion and it might be assumed that they would support the motion by their actual vote. But this would be an assumption and nothing more.

Students have been full members of the Innis College Council for over three years, and since that time there have been perhaps a half-dozen issues which were sufficiently controversial to require a vote. On none of these occasions has there been any evidence of polarization: each time some students have voted in favour and some against, and some non-students have voted in favour and some against. The same phenomenon occurred, one suspects, on November 24.

There is a simple explanation. The present Innis College Council is a parity body only with respect to its composition. There are nineteen students and nineteen non-students. But once constituted the Council consists of 38 members whose first loyalty as Council members is to the Council itself.

As a member of Council I vote on the issues presented not as Principal of the College or as a faculty member or as non-student, but according to my own conscience and judgment. It is my hope and it is also my belief that all other members of the Council do likewise.

Professor claims Repo's report is 'doubtful'

Marjaleena Repo's report, "I'm a Ph.D.; Who needs the Ph.D.?" has immediately received publicity and raised public concern for the future prospects of Canadian graduate students. Such publicity has included front page coverage and an editorial page cartoon in The Varsity issue of 18 November, and I do not question that the problem warrants such publicity, concern and appropriate action by the universities and government.

Yet I am reluctant to grant that Miss Repo's study has advanced our understanding of the problem one iota, or that the policy recommendations she puts forward are justified by the data she collected and analyzed. Equally I must take exception to The Varsity cartoon which represents a college diploma as a roll of toilet paper.

First, the cartoon. No university has, to my knowledge, advertised its education or degree as a guarantee of prosperity. Indeed much recent criticism of the university has centred on the contention that universities are the tools of the bureaucratic-military-industrial complex, adapting (or forcing) students to participation in crass middle-class life and complicity in the inhuman practices of government and capitalist enterprise.

Now it is being asserted that the universities are doing this inadequately! Which way is it to be: education aimed at self-realization and professional competence, or education aimed at the quick buck? Surely you can't have it both ways, ethically speaking, although in practice the university is concerned with promoting both ways.

Second, the report. Who were those 190 graduate students? If you read the methodological statement (p. 30 et passim) the report's implications become increasingly clouded. The respondents were not all graduate Ph.D.'s; they do not include all graduate students looking for jobs; and more important, we are given no indication of how representative these respondents are of all Ph.D.'s or all graduate students looking for jobs.

If this sample were drawn randomly from all job seekers, or all Ph.D.'s, or if this sample included 70% or more of all job seekers or Ph.D.'s, I would begin to concede the validity of the report's findings. As it stands, it is impossible to assess the validity of the findings.

Along similar lines, we are given no indication of the ability or performance record of these students. If they are all or almost all regarded as excellent by their teachers and fellow students, then of course we must be outraged by the waste of their talents and the unavailability of jobs for them; accordingly, it makes sense to start talking in terms of immigration quotas and the like. Conversely, if they are not excellent, Miss Repo is right in blaming the Departments concerned for allowing them to continue so far towards the Ph.D. without a realistic assessment of their abilities and prospects.

Yet here again, we are lacking the most important kinds of information about the group studied, and as a result, can meaningfully assess neither the report's findings nor the recommendations put forward to correct the situation.

There are many such questions raised by a careful reading of this report, and I believe they throw the report into such great doubt that action will not be forthcoming because the report is a persuasive research document. (This is not to rule out the possibility of action as a result of the publicity the report is getting.)

I contend then that the conclusions drawn by The Varsity and other news media from this report are unwarranted, and unfortunately the report may have done more to confuse our understanding of this serious problem than to advance it.

Canada moves to crack down on draft resisters

By SUSAN REISLER

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT is moving to crack down on the flow into Canada of draft dodgers, deserters and politically active people generally.

Otto Lang, minister of manpower and immigration, told a recent press conference that stringent immigration rules proposed in a special report for the government are aimed at ensuring that Canada gets "the cream of the crop."

"REVOLUTIONARIES WOULD BE kept out of the country if they are intending to subvert our democratic process," Lang said.

The report, compiled by Toronto lawyer Joseph Sedgwick at government request, calls for a security review board which would consider the cases of people engaged in extra-parliamentary opposition in their homelands.

The government would have the last word in defining security risks because the minister of immigration would decide on appeals against negative review board decisions.

The operation of such a board is complicated, Sedgwick says, "because those in charge of security cannot in most cases reveal, publicly, their information or its source."

"I assume that the security board will sit in camera," he writes, "and that it will have the power to consider evidence that would not be evidence under the strict rules they apply in Courts of Law, and particularly that it would have the right to receive evidence by way of solemn declaration."

THE PROPOSAL WOULD also allow the government more space to co-operate with United States officials in discouraging draft dodgers and deserters from emigrating to Canada. Once the word spreads in the U.S. that appeals will be limited and applicants may have to go through strict security clearance, the number of "exiles" applying for landed immigrant status will likely decrease. The applicants could not afford the risk of being turned down and deported back home where they would face jail terms of a minimum of five years.

Draft dodgers and deserters usually use their "illegal" stay in Canada to accumulate the points they require for admission to Canada under the point system.

If they are ordered deported because they do not at first meet the requirements, they can appeal the ruling. And because the backlog of appeals is so heavy, their case may be postponed for up to a year. In the meantime they can line up for a job and be "entrenched."

UNDER THE NEW PROPOSAL, the draft dodger or deserter would not be able to make that long appeal. He could only go to a special inquiry officer who the report says should deal with appeals quickly. The person would be swept out of the country.

The only recourse would be to apply for political asylum. Sedgwick recommends that the person responsible for the fate of this person be the minister of immigration.

"The granting of political asylum is essentially a political question which would be more sensibly received by the minister than by a quasi-judicial body such as the appeal board," Sedgwick says.

Sweden is the only country which recognizes desertion as grounds for political asylum, and there is reasonable doubt that Canada will follow Sweden's course.

Other recommendations in the report are measures that would "sensibly reduce" the legal recourse of those who pose as visitors to seek landed immigrant status while still in Canada.

SEDGWICK SUGGESTS that applicants for landed immigrant status in Canada be examined in the same way as if they applied abroad: should their application be rejected they would have the right to an inquiry by a departmental special inquiry officer. There would no longer be a right to appeal to the independent immigration appeal board, except by leave of the board, and such leave should be given only in special circumstances.

At the heart of the current "breakdown," says Sedgwick, is a liberal immigration policy which allows immigrants to get a foothold in Canada even when they don't meet the necessary criteria.

The right of appeal at the disposal of a person facing deportation is so far-reaching that it is years before the court of last resort — the appeal board — can order him out of the country via an "exclusion" order.

Meanwhile, the report says, a person who did not meet the criteria when he first applied has a tendency to become "entrenched." He may have married, started a family and got a job, thus changing the whole complexion of his case.

Sedgwick objects that this procedure gives an unfair advantage over someone who, for example, applies for landed immigrant status overseas.

IF TURNED DOWN, this landed applicant has the right to an investigation by a special inquiry officer. But unlike a person who enters Canada as a "tourist" and then applies for landed immigrant status, the overseas applicant has neither the right nor the opportunity to go before the immigration appeal board.

Sedgwick insists that "immigration to Canada by persons other than Canadian citizens or those having a Canadian domicile is a privilege determined by statute, regulation or otherwise, and is not a matter of right."

Visitors entering Canada, "who are less than truthful as to their reasons for coming here," should not have any special rights, he says.

Although Lang declined comment on when the report would become law, it is known that the government would like to see it implemented as soon as possible to rid themselves of the opposition criticism of Liberal immigration policies.

BOOKS

Had I space, I'd write a lengthy paean to the Shakers, the all-but-extinct cenobitic and quasi-Christian sect that flourished in rural New England in the nineteenth century. They forswore sex and contented themselves by rearing orphans, whom they taught trades in case they didn't want to stay in the sect upon reaching the age of discretion.

The Shakers were established in the 1770's by illiterate Ann Lee, who had four of her children die in childbirth and who came to figure intercourse itself had been her sin. Shakers were given their name because they quivered while they worshipped. Though they were not pewed, they shunned ostentation and produced some of the most simple and lovely furniture and buildings ever seen in America.

The Shakers didn't disapprove of joy. The Best of Shaker Cooking (Collier-Macmillan, $11.95), by Amy Bess Miller and Persis Fuller, is a compendious book of their recipes. It is expensive enough to warrant its purchase by real communists, whether they commit sex or not, and it's thoroughly researched and handsomely assembled.

Shaker food was simple and hearty; though pacifistic, they usually ate meat if they wished, brewed and drank cider and wines, and made all the food they could from what they foraged or grew. The recipes in this book are reduced in quantity from their originals, but often the language is refreshingly archaic and adaptations to modern culinary conditions are unobtrusive. Hardly any recipe here calls for ingredients unavailable in supermarkets or roadside stands, that is a delight.

The Shakers worked hard but made no cult of it. They ate to live, and provided wondering visitors with what they considered their simple fare. In 1886 a guest stopping for lunch at a Shaker village was served 16 courses, for 25c. He noted that "For breakfast and dinner eggs, tea, coffee, and all the fruits and vegetables of the season are added."

Closer to home, and presented in a less contemplative fashion is Jehane Benoit's Canadian Cookbook (Burns and MacEachern, $6.95), the most exhaustive collection of genuine Canadian cuisine I've come across. The recipes are arranged by provinces, which gives Mme. Benoit a chance to discuss the history of various regional foods.

The Canadian Cookbook tells a lot we might not know about our neighbours. Mme. Benoit doesn't write like Brillat-Savarin, but she does have a nose for sometimes embarrassing oddities. "We cannot say that Quebec's cooking is basically French. The French influence is felt more strongly in the method used to prepare and flavor foods than in the actual ingredients. . . . The English influence has been stronger, and still is Jacques Cartier and his men were mostly from Le Bretagne which was never quite as French as the rest of France, because of its proximity to England, and because its inhabitants were seamen and fishermen who were in constant contact with the English."

The charm of this work, then, lies particularly in the results of the author's explorations into foods with a pedigree. They are legion in Canada, coming to these pages from the fires of Indians, the giant stoves of bush whackers' camps, the galleys of fishboats, the kitchens of pioneer farms — and all are fitted to preparation in your own home, to make you a part of the real country.

Mme Benoit makes no apology for any part of Canada, and makes no apology for Canada — she loves it, all and together. A cookbook like this is in part a political statement, a Shaker recipe is also a meditation. Both are as important to the polity as are demands for social justice. Man does not live by bread alone, but without bread he does not live at all.

Engineer showed 'narrow concept of human interaction'

I had convinced myself upon reading David Alden's letter, which appeared in the Nov. 25 Varsity, that the letter should not be dignified either by a serious reading or a serious response. However, no matter how foolish, flippant and basically nonsensical this prideful engineer's offering was — I could not help but feel a sense of human outrage at the attitudes he expressed.

I am not a member of the Women's Caucus, nor of any other Women's Lib group — though I am in general sympathy with their aims and values. I am not writing this in rebuttal to Mr. Alden's nonsense nor specifically in support of the Women's Caucus he decries — but I do feel a need to point out the human tragedy of Mr. Alden's mind.

It is evident that he nor any other male that basically seconds the views expressed in the letter, will ever be able to understand the issues that are raised by the Women's Liberation Movement. It is no accident that he accuses Women's Caucus members of being "sexually maladjusted and frustrated," because clearly in his narrow conception of human interaction, any woman that does not overtly offer herself as a sexual plaything is grossly abnormal.

It is also no accident that he offers the "gorgeous cock" of the engineer as a means of allowing Women's Caucus members "to know what it really feels like to be a woman." His line of reasoning defines women solely as receptacles for the abstract "gorgeous cock."

As far as the engineer's view of women, it is no doubt that women are different from men sexually and that this difference is both natural and fun. Unfortunately from Mr. Alden's letter it is difficult to assume that he sees beyond the basic difference to similarities, gradations and subtleties that are at least as fascinating as sex itself.

This letter is not intended to somehow affect Mr. Alden's thinking or that of his fellow "male chauvinists." Clearly, they have a lot of changes to go through before they can begin to understand.

But I would like to express a hope, in which perhaps I will be joined by engineers and people alike, that Mr. Alden with his "gorgeous cock" in hand will find satisfaction as he goes through life, because apparently that's all he's got going for him.

Is woman's real place under a man?

About the letter "Engineer offers solution to women's liberation", in The Varsity, Nov. 25:

Although the writer claims to have a healthy sexual outlook, the poor guy can't see past the end of his penis. It's great to like sex, but he just doesn't seem to understand that the view he expresses has no real place for the woman — other than under him, submitting to the "ecstatic power of his gorgeous cock". The sad part is that his "natural" attitude may never go beyond puerile giggling at dirty jokes and exhibition of his prowess.

For years the engineers have suggested that artsmen — males suspected of insight into the "spiritual" aspect of sexuality — are fags. Now it's interesting to note that women who oppose their fun-type screwing are apparently inadequate and frustrated.

If you're secure in the magnificence of your performance, why depend so much on the engineering image to advertise it? Do you have to cling to the group for assurance and be afraid to speak, not as an engineer, but as an individual capable of love and caring?

You boast of your manliness — then why not get out of your adolescent clique and grow up?

Varsity printed discriminatory ad

In the past The Varsity has been liberal to radical in its support of freedom movements (the separatist movement in Quebec, women's liberation, "American Empire").

But an advertisement which it has carried in the last two issues of The Varsity can only be interpreted as evidence that it is not as liberal or enlightened as it would have us believe, or else they support some double standard of behaviour.

The advertisement to which I refer is that for the "Jewish Co-op".

Had it been labelled "WASP Co-op" and read "Would you like to live with other white anglo-saxon Protestants" or "Roman Catholics Co-op" and read "Would you like to live with other Roman Catholic students", it would have been met with cries of "Discrimination," "Prejudice", and "Segregation" that would have resounded across the campus.

Instead there has been no mention of Jewish discrimination and The Varsity has continued to publish the advertisement.

The discrimination of Jews or any other minority group would not be tolerated in the University of Toronto; nor should it be.

Why, then, is Jewish discrimination of the rest of the university society tolerated? There can be no double standards in freedom or civil rights: either you are opposed to discrimination or you support it, you cannot be opposed to it for some groups and support it in others.

To do so is to be a hypocrite and two-faced, and to have done so is to have lost sight of the original goal

Thank you all for making this show

Pink cream, his life pours out:
the ragged slit mouth smiles, splitting the gash wide into a plump grin.

His carcass hangs thick with the breath of slaughter.

Who were the bearded strangers
knapsack roaming into the white cottage?
Did they love their country?

My hands were numb with red cold huddling under the lights, waiting for black machine-gunned limousines to emerge from the curtains.

It was, to be sure,
THE Show of The Year, and the CBC was there,
mumbling about his date
who had to go home in a cab.

Its worse than the morning shows, he said, all those kidnappings and now this.

A body couldn't even get a night's rest.
with all this Quebec stuff going on.
Couldn't they have done it on a weekday
he said, I mean,
a little consideration.

Trudeau grey and staring.

They yell:
He is here,
reporters and photogs yelling,
he is here,
M. Trudeau est arrive.

We are the press and we say
he is here,
therefore he is real.

We shall follow him into parliament and write down what he says
so it can be real, too.

BACKSTAGE:
"O.K., we got Turner here.
Now, Mr. Turner, can you tell us."

"No, I'm sorry, I have nothing to say."

"Hey, George, bring the camera over here, Turner's gonna speak."

"I'm sorry, I have nothing to say."

"That's right George, get the lights.
Alright and ten, nine, eight . . ."

Turner in the wings:
"You mean, we're going to be on teevee, with all those millions of home viewers, town or hamlet or city and they live in boarded-up shacks in the Newfoundland outports in the hills outside St. John's and they have no toilets or electricity, or in the box-like housing developments of Halifax's North End.

They live, retired Baptists, in white rambling homes firm in Wolfville, warm kitchens on the potato farms out on Prince Edward Island or half-buried under the pulp soot of Irving's Saint John.

Don't hold up your sheet to me, lady, with its red words of affection for Canada.

Don't use the colour in vain.
Because we don't live the country.
Only the colour.

And we know it well,
our eyes are filled with blood and we aren't part of the entertainment.

We will never be stars, like you lady, with your fur collar tight warm around the neck, disc jockey for the patriot hit parade.

Our throats are bound by the directors, we're a nuisance to a smooth-running production.

We were just about ready. I almost had her convinced. She was so juicy and delectable. Like soft lotion or a pork chop, medium-rare. You see, she was a virgin. She'd never been murdered before.

"Well, here comes one of them now, let's go men, swing the lights, pan, excuse me, Mr. Diefenbaker, what do you think?"

"I love my country, that is all I know. Goodnight."

On a sheet they scrawled, in crayon or magic marker, and held it proudly right up front pushing to get a good spot in the cameras.
WE LOVE CANADA

I bent down for the right angle. They smiled.

Bigger smiles for the CBC who mumbled, "Oh, look guys, make 'em feel good, get it on the news."

And they sang so loud for the nation, so loud, because now they were on the screen now they were as real as any of those big shots with the machine-gun buddies.

The CBC is the National Network therefore the nation must exist. Right. Wrong.

.....

Woodstock Nation started one day in Bethel, New York, when the MC stood up and said, "I got a Times here . . . it says here."

That was THE NEW YORK TIMES and if it was in The Times that 300,000 hip people were digging the sun, fun and music then it had to be true. "Thank you all for making this show. Thank you for being so beautiful."

.....

Trudeau arrived rushed by a flash bodyguard whips in front like a bat.

"That's right, Johnny"

"O, boy, O boy, I can say whatever I want and they will love me because it will be on the CBC News and that's the real network I ever do watch."

(Family at home watching Bulletin Newscast: "Quick, the Justice Minister's gonna say something.")

"People of Canada, in this moment of tragedy, I can only hope that all dissenting hedgehogs will be immediately suppressed."

That Turner is brilliant, gets it down just right, if ya know what I mean.

Oh, I know what you mean but do you know what he means?

We hung around all night, the Peace Tower chiming, pulled the security guard's gloves on and watched the show. (The popcorn stand had closed early)

.....

CUES AND STAGE DIRECTIONS:

—Push right to the front, aim your lens in Stanfield's face. No one will ask questions.

—When the army man tells you to go back to the crowd, refuse and stay where you are. He won't mention it again.

—Act like you know everybody. Call them by their first names. If you don't know them, make them up.

—Bitch like hell about the weather and the hassles of a) newspapermen b) newspaperwoman c) photographer d) correspondent e) stage manager f) prop supervisor —Take it very seriously. The complaining, that is, not the reason why you are there

.....

I love Canada, whatever that means I love a lot of people who live in the bounds of a place they call Canada, but it doesn't exist.

Only the people exist and they live in their own we know its only a vaudeville variety. We know you aren't real. And we know where we live.

We know that The National (da-da-da-dum) doesn't tell us what's happening.

AND THAT'S THE NEWS!

Hmmm, I wonder why they didn't say anything about the strike at the shipyard the wages in the food processing plant the fishermen who don't want to leave their villages.

On the CBC National News, November tenth, 1970, Jerome Choquette, justice minister of Quebec said methods used to control organized crime will be used to control the FLQ.

Choquette said the only difference between the two groups is that the aim of the FLQ is revolution, while that of organized crime is profit. (Oh.)

Levesque appeals for unity against 'brutal' regime

MONTREAL (CUPI) — Over three thousand people rallied at the Paul Sauve Arena Wednesday night to demonstrate their solidarity with the Parti Quebecois and the Quebec Committee for the Defense of Civil Liberties.

It was the largest rally to be held in Quebec since the declaration of the War Measures Act on Oct. 16. The spirit of the crowd was one of solidarity, as everyone loudly applauded speakers who shouted "We are not alone, we have come here to be together."

Rene Levesque, Parti Quebecois leader, was the hero of the evening. His entrance into the arena in the middle of the program drew a long and loud standing ovation. It brought back memories of the days just prior to last April's election.

Levesque made a lengthy attack on the Federal Government, and Prime Minister Trudeau in particular. He called Trudeau a cynical unscrupulous conservative who used the FLQ crisis to "bring Quebec back in step and scare the people back into docility."

Levesque made an appeal for unity and concerted action on the part of Quebecois citizens to fight against a regime "which has chosen to harden itself and become brutal."

"Just a few short years from now, the economic, social and political system is going to inevitably sink into a permanent type of opposition between a certain form of anarchy and a certain form of repression," Levesque said.

Levesque said that the Parti Quebecois was the only answer to a regime which "demands, in order to continue, permanent humiliation" of the Quebecois.

The other speakers, members of the different unions and a professor criticized the way the Quebec Government is slipping into Fascism. Michel Bourdon, Vice President of the Montreal Council of Trade Unions who was fired by the CBC for criticizing the crown corporation, said that those in power would like to see the people of Quebec keep their mouths shut.

"The totalitarian enterprise that the Trudeau government is following, is to keep quiet all those who want to see change and our task is to face up to this government with all our strength."

Jean-Marc Piott, a political economy professor at the Université De Quebec said that "all contradictions of society can be found in Montreal: Ethnic oppression, minority domination of majority, unequal school systems, language discrimination..."

Piott said that the only alternative to this fascism was socialism, socialism which is supported by the power of the workers.

During the rally, special one dollar bills were sold at twenty-five cents a piece. The bills are issued from the Bank of the Republic of Quebec. They are "guaranteed by the natural riches of the future republic" and "are only negotiable between independentists."

The Chinese community - which way to go?

By ELLEN O'DONNELL
Developers and the Spadina Expressway are threatening Toronto's downtown Chinese community.

About 25 Chinese and non-Chinese students attending a panel discussion Wednesday at ISC listened as residents of the area explained the dangers facing their community.

Wess Lore, a graduate of York University, traced the movement of the Chinese community since it was pushed from the York and Queen St. section to Elizabeth St. and Chestnut St. during the 40's and 50's. By the late 50's only stores were left on Dundas St.

In the last decade, as people were squeezed further west, an unprecedented split separated the Chinese residential area from its businesses.

Lore said the Chinese community has consistently been elbowed out of areas so that it has exchanged its location for one further west every 15 years. The high density area now west of Chinatown will not accommodate more people.

"We're trying to prove if the Chinese lose this area, they will have no area," he said.

Lore noted developers and corporations have gobbled up the community, as they buy out blocks of land at a time.

Canada Trust, Windless Holdings and Ontario Hydro have recently purchased large lots of land, and parking lots are flattening out the rest of the area.

He noted, if the Spadina Expressway tangles its way south, more than 3,000 cars per hour will pour into what is now left of the strangled Chinese community.

The expressway traffic would make it necessary to widen Dundas St. in the heart of the community and the existing Chinese commercial community would be wiped out.

"Chinatown is vital as an immigration reception area, especially since several thousand Chinese arrive in Toronto each year," Lore added. "The immigrant must be able to live where his language can be understood and where he can buy the kind of food he eats."

Duncan Lang, another resident, outlined the long history of discrimination in Canada against the Chinese immigrant. It is a history of citizenship refusal, exorbitant head taxes, and immigration bans. Until recently there has been little opposition among the Chinese to official discriminatory action.

"We must champion our interests or they will be ignored," said Fred Kan, a lawyer and panel member. Typically, there was no representation of the Chinese as an other-language group made to the Bi & Bi Commission.

He said a Federation would give them a chance to settle their differences internally before going to the City Council's special committee on the Chinese people.

'A life and death problem'

Morgentaler criticizes liberal abortion laws

By PHILANDA MASTERS

Canada's abortion laws are inadequate, according to Dr. Henry Morgentaler who spoke to 50 people at Sidney Smith Hall yesterday, because they allow women to die as a result of unwanted pregnancies which are terminated non-medically.

A Montreal doctor who was arrested last June and charged with conspiring to perform illegal abortions, Morgentaler is an outspoken advocate of legalized abortions for all women. The present laws are restrictive, he said, and allow for many interpretations, so that the people who need help are not getting it.

In his opinion, any reference to abortion should be removed from the Criminal Code.

The abortion problem is not just an academic one, it is "a life and death problem" which could affect any woman from adolescence to menopause who cannot get a safe, legal abortion he said.

It is an ironical situation that many hospitals will not accept abortion cases, on moral grounds, "until they are stretcher-cases with complications from botched attempts," Morgentaler added, and it is a situation prevalent all over Canada because of the "so-called liberal" abortion laws.

Because of these laws, many women raise children they don't want, who are emotionally, and often physically, battered, and may become neurotic or psychotic invalids and criminals, he said.

Other unwanted babies are put up for adoption and live their formative years in institutions without the love and affection they need.

Perhaps the most tragic cases, Dr. Morgentaler said, are the women who will do anything to terminate their pregnancies and end up in the hands of back-street operators, who at worst exploit and humiliate them, and at best have not the necessary technical knowledge to perform a safe abortion. And when an attempt to abort the fetus fails, many women don't go to hospitals because they fear questioning or prosecution. Consequently they may die of infection or hemorrhage.

The problem, he admits, has been eased a little since last summer because of the very liberal, unrestrictive laws of New York state. But poor women are still at a disadvantage because clinical abortions cost from $250 to $1,000, and these women often haven't even the means to get to New York.

Dr. Morgentaler said he thought there may be five or ten Canadian doctors who will perform illegal abortions, but that most will not attempt it for fear of losing their licences or their reputations. There is still a possible sentence of life imprisonment for those performing illegal abortions.

"The present laws are inadequate because of the restrictions they impose," he continued. Only accredited hospitals (i.e., big hospitals in the big cities) can perform abortions by law, and each case must be approved by a board of three doctors, who are "usually older, conservative or reactionary in their narrow interpretation of the law."

Another restriction Morgentaler pointed out is the wide interpretation of the clause "endangering the life or health of the mother." The American Medical Association defines health as "physical, emotional, or spiritual well-being", and given a liberal interpretation, this could allow almost any woman a legal abortion, he said. But this, unfortunately, is not often the case.

Among the most liberal hospitals are the Toronto General and the Henderson Hospital in Hamilton, but these are swamped with applications, and they justifiably complain that other hospitals are not taking their share of the burden.

When enough doctors start performing illegal abortions, the laws must change he said. But this would be a long-term process, and pressure must be put on the federal government to carry through reforms now

Morgentaler echoed the women's liberation platform that it should be a fundamental right of all women to control their own reproductive processes, and that the emancipation of women "will be absolutely incomplete until they can decide when to have children and when not to."

Dennison's assertions lack insight, accuracy

By GORD FLOYD

"It is my desire to work with Council to produce the best administration possible for this city. Our aldermen now have private offices. This is instead of the common office they had to share before. We only get the kind of growth we've had in Toronto if it's a good city to live in.

"This growth has meant that we are short of housing, but we realized that we couldn't provide housing in competition with OHC. We are very rapidly making Toronto into one of the foremost cities as far as parkland is concerned. One by one, the major problems of this city are being tackled by your Council."

These introductory remarks by His Worship, Mayor Dennison, at yesterday's episode of the noon-hour meetings in Trinity Square, probably revealed more than all the other words spoken in the ensuing hour. That's the speech in its entirety — no organization, no insight, foresight, or even hindsight, and most assuredly, an astonishing lack of accuracy.

What's the mayor unhappy about in Toronto? Is he unhappy that, contrary to his indication, Toronto's acreage of parkland is only 3.3 per thousand persons rather than the recommended 4.6?

Does he give a damn about the fact that OHC is proving more and more inadequate every day in handling subsidized housing for Toronto?

Does he give a damn about the stinking pollution in Toronto? Apparently not. He mentioned only two points in reply to the question, "Are there things with which you are unhappy in Toronto?" The mayor said, "The federal government directs immigrants to come to Toronto . . . I am very sorry to see the delay in the CN-CP Metro Centre project . . ."

And what about political matters, like the change from strip to block wards, for example: ". . . I suppose it means that an alderman within his own ward can take a definitely biased stand on an issue. Previously he had to weigh the demands of, say, Rosedale against those of Regent Park and vice-versa."

"Now we have more trouble coordinating views." The implication that all aldermen managed somehow to resolve all issues in the same way is clear. I wonder who was favoured before, Rosedale or Regent Park?

The issue of community organizations, specifically Riverdale Community Organization occupied

" . . . you brand anyone who challenges existing forms of government, a Maoist."

most of the hour.

VARSIITY: There has been some confusion as to what constitutes a legitimate lobby at City Hall, and what constitutes an illegitimate one.

DENNISON: I don't think there is any government anywhere that hears more depositions than the City of Toronto . . .

VARSIITY: I'm referring specifically to Riverdale Community Organization.

DENNISON: We gave them $14,000 and they blew the whole thing in one person's salary. (This is not true) . . . If they're not satisfied with a person's reaction to their request they surround their house and intimidate them in their home (we'll give the Mayor the benefit of the doubt here, and say he was only exaggerating).

VARSIITY: Isn't this an exercise in censorship by the Executive Committee? Is this desirable once City Council has decided that a group is a beneficial one?

DENNISON: We would pay for the project if it was for the whole community.

VARSIITY: But by depriving these groups of money you are only, and obviously, stifling their voice, and keeping them ineffective and unable to challenge your power.

DENNISON: The most effective ratepayer's groups in the city such as South Rosedale Ratepayers operate without city assistance; they solicit door-to-door.

VARSIITY: And these groups are all in upper and middle income areas (was the Mayor really trying to cloud the facts?) . . . Mayor Dennison, are you still worried about community organizers being imported from the States?

DENNISON: I will quote from RCO literature: "So the method used in this organization is geared to the presupposition that the root of the problem is powerlessness and to the two-fold goal of getting results and building power. The presupposition includes the belief that any solution short of people getting the power to control their own communities by democratic processes like in community organizations merely postpones the horrible day of solution by whatever means are necessary like in underground movements." Now surely no Canadian educated man could have written that.

VARSIITY: Mr. Mayor, I've heard your charges on this matter before, and I have been doing some research. The RCO's organizer is a Canadian, born and educated in Canada, and spent only three years in the United States. Furthermore, I have discovered that you, sir, were educated in the States. (oh dear, we've caught the Mayor on another little bit of misrepresentation)

One questioner, a York University professor, pointed up a few more inconsistencies in the Mayor's claims: "I think, contrary to what you've said, that the ratepayers' groups are growing, but when these groups go to City Hall they are met by an impassive wall. When are some City Council members going to start listening to these groups? . . . you fail to understand the significance. I think, not only of community organizations, but also that of youth and all other new forces in the political arena . . . You still think, for instance, that Toronto is a collection of little villages . . ."

DENNISON: How would you do it then?

YORK PROF: "I would bend over backwards to educate the people so that they could use that bureaucracy that bewilders even many members of Council, to their best advantage . . . Most cities have inadequate organizations and systems of administration; we are lucky here in Toronto.

The world is experiencing a universal reaction against the 18th century model of representative democracy which you so firmly believe in, and you brand anyone who challenges existing forms of government, a Maoist. You charge them with confrontation, in fact 'confrontation politics' is a favourite phrase of yours. But it is you at City Hall who are responsible for confrontation politics."

Blues to renew battle with Loyola tonight

Blues' Grant Cole

Tom Watt's hockey Blues, currently sporting a 4-0-1 undefeated record, slipped out of town yesterday afternoon and headed for the wilds of Montreal where they will play exhibition struggles with the Loyola Warriors tonight and Sir George tomorrow evening.

Both games are in the Loyola rink, and if Blues can beat them both in the Warriors' home Wigwam, then they'll be well on their way to establishing themselves as solid contenders for a spot in this year's national finals.

It will be the second meeting of the year with Loyola who held Blues to a 1-1 draw behind spectacular goaltending from sophomore Rocky Martin at Varsity Arena Nov. 13.

The 4-0 victory over Guelph Tuesday night brought Blues league mark to 2-0 and left them a game ahead of Waterloo and Windsor who are both 1-0.

Counting exhibition contests, Blues' leading goal scorer to date is center Brian St. John with six. Captain John Wright has connected five times and winger Terry Peterman four.

Blues Notes: Scott Seagrist, Kaz Lysionek and Terry Parsons will not be making the trip to Montreal. Seagrist broke a hand in the Laurentian exhibition game, Lysionek is still recovering from a bout with pneumonia while Parsons has academic commitments.

Most of this weekend's inter-collegiate action is on the road... the VolleyBlues travel to Ottawa for the OQAA finals; coach Taimo Palladi's crew will probably have to upset Western to take the title.

There's women's action aplenty with swimming and diving at Western, volleyball at Queens, and basketball action Saturday in the Benson Building as our gals host Loyola.

An important pre-season fencing tourney goes Saturday morning at 11 in the Hart House fencing salle. Blues will entertain two inter-collegiate opponents, York and Waterloo in foil, sabre and epee competition

Well sports enthusiasts, as this article goes to the press we approach the eve of one of Canada's most prestigious sporting events. Yes T.O. is once again hosting — no, it's not the Grey Cup — but the "Mulock Cup" — symbolic of interfaculty football supremacy. In fact this afternoon at 1:00 p.m. for the measly sum of — no not $25 or even the 100 beans that scalpers are obliging patrons of Saturday's anticlimactic event to dole out — for absolutely "nil" you can witness what is shaping up to be one of the best football games this year.

If traditionalism is your bag the championship game this afternoon will more than accommodate you. Ever since 1894 when Sir William Mulock donated the Cup to the University, "as an incentive, and to stimulate interest in interfaculty competition", a great number of individuals playing on teams like the ones this afternoon have sought to perpetuate the Chancellor's ideal

THIS YEAR'S CONTEST PRESENTS THE MOST interesting and potentially exciting confrontation in years. PHE coming off its convincing victory over Trinity should be more than up for the big game. Its offence is centred around a hard running game led by punishing fullback Dave Rae and speedster Larry "the fly" Thede should prove an effective instrument on the stadium's difficult turf. Kicker "Gino" Vincze, throughout the season the Jocks most consistent offensive threat (scoring 26 points in 6 games) should more than complement the PHE attack. With such notables as halfback Mike Bell, linebackers Bruce Parrack and Varsity player Bob Sullivan (with the venerable "Neuf" in the pit) the bruising defense promises to be a key factor in today's contest.

To round out this favourable picture Coach Keith Johnson has informed this reporter his charges are healthy following the semi-final game and that his veterans including 12 graduating players are more than anxious to prove last year's win over Victoria (the first ever for PHE in Mulock competition) was no fluke.

IT'S NO COINCIDENCE THAT THE VIC TEAM has been looking forward to this game with the same measured anticipation displayed by coach Johnson and his crew. For it was last year almost to the day that PHE spoiled Vic's amazing Mulock Cup record of 11 straight wins by rolling out an exciting 16-12 win. Having had to live with that loss for a year, you can expect to see the Vic men hit the field with a little more than average zeal.

As has been the case over the past decade the team has the horses to get the job of winning done. A veteran defensive line featuring Dave Veale, Dave Duvener, Rick Nellis, and aggressive Dave Beal that has limited opponents to infrequent scoring opportunities throughout the year should harass the PHE offense. Other key individuals include Rick Kiyonaga whose determined efforts accounted for a number of key interceptions during the regular season, and defensive captain Ron Gray playing middle linebacker who has consistently downed anyone eluding the hardnosed pit crew.

COACH DAVE RICHARDSON following the semifinal against Dents, though certainly appreciative of the fine play of the defense was more pleased with the strong showing of his offense. "We've had several injuries to key personnel this year and this is the first game that we've had the full unit together," he was quoted as saying. "If they keep improving at the present rate they should be more than ready for Friday's game."

Certainly the team has the potential to score. With QB John Baird capable of generating a passing game to match the consistent running of Bruce Carroll, "Sonny" Wade and Pete White, Vic should put some points on the board. But whether they can overcome PHE's frustrating defense and outscore Gino (the Toe) is difficult to say. The only way to find out for sure is to join the multitude at the stadium at 1:00 p.m. and see for yourself.

MULOCKNOTES — Vic and PHE met twice during the regular season and split the series, Vic winning the first game 13-0, PHE taking the second 6-0. Nick "the Greek" out of Las Vegas has given PHE a 3 point advantage, (probably on the weight of Gino's toe and the heavy money flowing in from PHE).

Plumbers show some potency, edge SMC for soccer crown

By ALICE VD.

What, you may ask, does an engineer's ability to kick a soccer ball have to do with his male chauvinistic attitude towards women?

Probably a lot, and in this age of heightened social awareness it seems to be the appropriate way to announce that 11 frigid Skulemen overcame the elements and St. Mikes A to win the interfac soccer championship 3-1 Wednesday afternoon at Varsity Stadium.

Scoring for the scrappy, jock plumbers were Peter Wong and Nick Moros. Skule got lucky and picked up another marker when a SMC defender blasted a perfectly placed shot into the corner — of his own goal.

Ernie Facchini registered the only marker for the Christians.

Engineering reached the finals by scattering Scarborough 8-0 while St. Mikes edged Erindale 4-2.

Last season, the GSU sponsored a rather wild wine and cheese party when Grads A took the soccer crown. What, one wonders, will EngSue do this year to top that?

ATS to reveal new executive

The Association of the Teaching Staff tonight unveils its executive for the coming year at its annual fall general meeting.

The meeting is at 8:00 p.m. at Cody Hall.

There will be no vote taken to determine who will serve on the nine-man executive of the ATS.

The slate of candidates will simply be presented to the membership of the ATS, which consists of about four-fifths of the U of T teaching staff.

The slate of candidates will simply be presented to the membership of the ATS, which consists of about four-fifths of the U of T teaching staff.

The slate of candidates will simply be presented to the membership of the ATS, which consists of about four-fifths of the U of T teaching staff.

All members of the incoming executive must already be members of the Council.

The nine posts — ranging from committee chairmen up to the ATS chairmanship itself — have already been filled, but no names will be released until tonight, according to outgoing ATS chairman John Rist.

Rist, a champion of faculty opposition to student participation in the decision-making processes of the university, was chosen in the same manner last year.

Checking out one of the rumours floating around, a Varsity reporter phoned the outgoing chairman.

"No," he said in a delighted voice. "It's not him," referring to a rumoured name.

"I won't tell you who it is, but it's not him," he added.

"There seems to be a very low awareness of the ATS among faculty," commented one professor who is on the ATS council. "Faculty know it's there to look after matters that affect their conditions of employment."

In addition to leading the fight against student demands for parity with faculty in the faculty of arts and science last year, a major concern of Rist was to battle the administration for a 22 per cent salary hike. They got an average ten per cent increase in the end.

"The ATS is seen as a far more sinister organization than it actually is," commented a Council member. "But most faculty don't look on it as a militant group ready to lead crusades."

"The ATS is a powerless body and has no mandate to do anything."

Political science professor James Eayrs, a faculty member who does not belong to the voluntary association, commented that he left the ATS four years ago five years ago "because all they did was talk about parking."

ATS reject parity in pres search

The Association of Teaching Staff Council has called for a non-parity presidential search committee or else no search committee at all this year.

The Council opposed the model suggested by the President's Advisory Council — a search committee of 21 people — five students, five faculty, three members of the Board of Governors, five administrators, two alumni, and the chancellor of the university.

The ATS model is based on the controversial top governing structure proposed last spring by the University-Wide Committee, which called for 21 faculty, 14 students and 37 others.

ATS Council Chairman John Rist urged the President's Council to replace its proposal with the University-Wide Committee's model in a letter sent to O.D. Vaughan, Chairman of the Board of Governors, President Claude Bissell, and elected staff members on the President's Council.

Rist denied the President's Council's authority to establish its own search committee model and asserted that the top governing structure is the only legitimate model for a body dealing with any aspect of the central governance of the university.

"If the President's Council cannot agree to do this, the ATS will advise the Board of Governors forthwith to appoint an Acting President for 1971-1972, and to put off the selection of a search committee until the Ontario Legislature has had an opportunity to approve a new Governing Act for the University," concluded the letter.

WMA detainees headline Toronto teach-in

By BRIAN JOHNSON

In the wake of the Quebec crisis, English Canada is dazed and confused. The federal government has closeted itself away to tinker with a more refined War Measures Act, while the press, bored with Cross, turns its eye to a new spectacle — the drama of the conspiracy trials.

English Canadian response, nurtured by a limited diet of press reports and government statements, has been hysterical and uninformed.

These are some of the reasons why nearly 20 prominent representatives from a broad cross-section of community groups, labour unions, political parties, the universities, and civil liberties groups will be participating in a teach-in Friday and Saturday at St. Luke's United Church, Sherbourne and Carlton Sts.

Among the scheduled Quebecois visitors are Pierre Cloutier, associate defense lawyer for the most noted prisoners charged with sedition and conspiracy, Pierre Vallieres, Charles Gagnon, Michel Chartrand and Robert Lemieux.

Michel Bourdon will also be there. He is the vice-president of the Montreal Council of Trade Unions, who was fired from his job as a CBC announcer for protesting censorship.

"The purpose of the teach-in is to bring together English Canadians and Quebecois who are involved in parallel organizing efforts," says Gary Webster, chairman of the Committee for a Free Quebec, one of the teach-in's sponsors.

A list of other sponsors shows a broad range of community support: the Social Action Committee of the Unitarian Church, International Education Project, Pan-Hellenic Liberation Movement (PAK), Law Union, United Electrical Workers, Waffle (NDP), New Democratic Youth, Citizens for a Canadian Democracy, the Just Society, Canadian Peace Congress, Militant Co-op, Women's Liberation, PLUS.

"We hope the teach-in will break through the hysteria generated in English Canada," Webster adds, "provide some new information, and facilitate a productive dialogue between organizers here and in Quebec."

At least five of the visiting Quebecois are members of Montreal's Front d'Action Politique (FRAP), a party formed last year from citizens' committees fighting City Hall over housing, welfare, health-care, and community control development.

Two days before FRAP contested seats for the first time in Montreal's recent civic election, Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau and federal Minister of Regional Economic Expansion Jean Marchand accused FRAP members of being terrorists. That was the same week Toronto Mayor William Dennison compared the Riverdale Community Organization with China's Red Guard.

Toronto community organizers such as Ward 7 Alderman John Sewell will be at the teach-in to participate in workshops with FRAP members.

Two scheduled speakers — Michel Bourdon and Jean-Marc Pottier — shared a platform with Parti Quebecois leader Rene Levesque last Wednesday at a rally of 3,000 Montrealers in the Paul Sauve Arena, the first rally held since the declaration of the War Measures Act.

"The totalitarian enterprise that the Trudeau government is following, is to keep quiet all those who want to see change," Bourdon told the rally. "And our task is to face up to this government with all our strength."

Pottier, a political economy professor at the University de Quebec said, "All contradictions of society can be found in Montreal: ethnic oppression, minority domination of majority, unequal school systems, language discrimination."

Other teach-in guests include: Gaston Therrien from the Movement pour Liberation du Taxi; Richard Groulx, a Universite de Montreal student leader; Michel Pichette, a Universite de Quebec professor; and Michel Therrien and Louis Leborgne from FRAP.

Teach-in organizers expect representatives from this wide range of Quebec groups: FRAP, Quebec Federation of Labour, Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU), Parti Quebecois, Quebec-Presse, Quartier Latin (a radical student news-magazine), Movement pour la Liberation du Taxi, Movement pour la Defense des Prisonniers Politiques du Quebec, Comite pour la Defense des Libertes Civiles, the teachers union, citizens committees, and Montreal construction unions.

English Canadian speakers feature Sewell, Toronto lawyer Paul Copeland, and Progressive Conservative MP David MacDonald from Prince Edward Island.

MacDonald has been a harsh critic of both the War Measures Act and its intended replacement.

He was the only MP to oppose the new Public Order Temporary Measures Act in principle on its second reading in the House of Commons.

The teach-in starts Friday at 8 p.m. with a panel discussion on Quebec. It resumes at 10 a.m. on Saturday with a panel on the War Measures Act and repressive legislation. Saturday afternoon and evening will be occupied with workshops covering areas of labour and repression, community, the nationality question, education, alternate media, and civil liberties.

"The main emphasis will be on the workshops," says Webster. "We don't want to produce a spectacle. And the structure of the workshops will be left flexible to the needs of the people there."

The teach-in is open to everyone, and admission is one dollar or "what you can afford."

Lettuce boycott

Farm Workers will picket Dow

By PHIL CHARKO

Demonstrators will picket Dow Chemical in Toronto Tuesday as part of a lettuce boycott organized by the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. The North American boycott is to obtain recognition for the UFWOC from lettuce growers.

The success of the five-year California grape boycott has encouraged other rural farm workers to organize. Those harvesting lettuce in California, New Mexico, and Arizona have struck for union recognition choosing UFWOC as their bargaining agent. By the end of September, two of the largest growers had recognized UFWOC and signed contracts.

Dow Chemical fits into the picture because it is its massive capital which controls the operation of Bud Antle, a large California lettuce grower. Antle has not recognized the union.

In early October with Dow's backing, Antle obtained a court injunction to block UFWOC strike action.

On Dec. 4, Cesar Chavez, Director of the UFW, will face a contempt of court charge in the grower controlled courts in Salinas, California, for disobeying the injunction.

Growers are importing scab labour from cities and schools paying them $2.50 an hour to help break the strike. Before the strike, workers were being paid $1.65 an hour.

Demonstrators will mass at the Dow offices 250 Bloor, St. E., tomorrow at 4 p.m. Dow was the object of the first big demonstration at U of T, in 1967.

Freedom fighters ask Canadians for aid

By DREW HUTCHESON

Freedom fighters from the Mozambique Liberation Front FRELIMO are on campus appealing for an end to military aid to Portuguese forces in the colony.

Armando Gubbuza, Deputy Secretary of Education and Culture of FRELIMO, spoke yesterday to about 60 people in the Hart House music room.

FRELIMO is the governing organization of the Mozambique people's revolution against their Portuguese government. It has been struggling for freedom since 1964, and now has virtual control over a large area of the colony.

Gubbuza criticized direct and indirect aid from foreign governments to the Portuguese military. Through NATO, the Portuguese can get a great deal more arms than their relatively backward economy would otherwise allow. Since Mozambique is legally a province of Portugal rather than a colony, it is classed by the Portuguese as a NATO area, and thus NATO arms may be used there. As a result, Canadian Sabre jets have been sold to Portugal by Germany and used against the Mozambican people.

A large dam project at Caborabassa designed to exploit Mozambicans, according to Gubbuza, is being supported financially by several countries, some of whom are simply ignorant of the plan. It will irrigate a large area, from which the natives will be largely evacuated and replaced by 100,000 Europeans. It will also produce hydro-electric power to be sold mainly to South Africa.

FRELIMO diplomatic efforts have convinced Sweden and Italy to abandon their support of the project, but South Africa, Britain, Germany, and France are still involved.

"Perhaps we can get the latter three to withdraw, but the South Africans wouldn't understand, he said.

He said that foreign investors are becoming wary of Portuguese projects in Mozambique because of successful guerrilla attacks on the area around Caborabassa.

Canadian companies as well as involved at Caborabassa; Alcan and Reynolds Cable Co., both of Montreal, have sold 12,000 metric tons of aluminum rods to a Portuguese company for the project.

Gubbuza described the educational situation in the areas liberated by the guerrillas as highly inadequate but better than when the Portuguese were in power when there were few schools — most of them in the towns. Students were taught Portuguese language, history, culture, and geography, and virtually nothing about Mozambique. In the province of Niassa, which he said is as big as Portugal, there were no schools.

Now the schools are more common, but lack textbooks, blackboards, and basis writing materials. Gubbuza said that slates of wood and dried casava sticks are the common writing utensils. History and geography are taught from the Mozambique point of view.

Among the 14 far-flung universities of Ontario, the highest and brashiest is the University of Toronto.

This was made perfectly clear this week to the Ontario Government's Committee on University Affairs by spokesmen for the administration of this university.

Note, of course, that the university was represented by administrators. There had been no widespread public discussion within the university community about what they should be saying on our behalf. The precedent of two years ago — when students successfully demanded that the annual brief to the CUA be discussed and agreed upon by both student and faculty representatives — has been consigned to oblivion.

In that crisis the administration, knowing it was in the wrong, retreated tail between its legs. Administrators were forced to sit down and talk over several controversial recommendations, including the idea of moving Forestry out to Erindale and closing down the Institute for Child Studies. Both these were dropped under student and faculty pressure.

Student and faculty participation in drawing up the annual brief was never formalized.

All that remains from that forgotten crisis is the fact that the annual U of T statement is no longer secret and confidential. Rather, it is a widely distributed — almost public relations style — statement of U of T's eminence and status.

It would not be worthwhile to criticize the submission to the CUA in detail for the areas it fails to provide data on. It's enough to note that in all the tables and charts in this 232-page document (plus appendices) there are no figures available on such important areas as the status of women within the university structure, the citizenship of faculty in key areas such as political economy, sociology, and other social sciences, the economic and social class background of the student population, the "outside" (consulting and research) work done by teaching staff.

Perhaps, if students and faculty were involved in drawing up the submission, these more sensitive areas would be covered. After all, this is intended to be a sort of report to the people of Ontario — the taxpayers who fund this university — and it would be less than honest not to tell them that many of their interests are not served by the university's present structure and functions.

But the purpose of the annual CUA submission is to explain why the university should get more money.

Essentially it is a selling job and we shall take a short look at it in terms of that function.

The object of the game was to prove that U of T, as the leading centre of culture and education within the province, required preferential treatment from the Ontario government when money was being handed out.

There are arguments on both sides of this issue. On the one hand, it is maintained that all universities should be treated equally — in proportion to their enrollment of course, and paying attention to the higher costs of turning out highly skilled professionals such as engineers and doctors.

It is also claimed that some institutions — U of T in particular — have special responsibilities towards maintaining high standards and excellence in both teaching and research.

Historically, U of T has been the premier institution. In its earlier years it absorbed other universities, and in more recent times, has virtually given birth to many of the younger campuses in the province.

Having held this preeminent position for so long, U of T is reluctant to give it up.

In fact, we (or rather, the administrators, our spokesmen), have been attempting to cement and formalize this position.

For the last dozen years Claude Bissell has presided over the era of great expansion of the U of T, especially in the graduate school and in the research sector of the university's work.

In his statement to the CUA, last week, Bissell boasted of our eminence in the production of Woodrow Wilson fellows (Canada 794, and of that Toronto accounted for 233 and other Ontario campuses 153), and of PhDs (over 70 per cent in the Humanities out of Ontario's total).

The new $42 million graduate research library, sitting in its monolithic concrete splendour on the St. George-Hoskin-Huron-Sussex block, will be the cornerstone of a huge graduate complex on the St. George campus. Remember that undergraduate enrollment has been frozen downtown, while graduate figures continue to rise in astonishing leaps.

For it's important to understand that Claude Bissell is a man with a vision. His dream is that ultimately U of T will take its place as one of the ranking world universities.

Back in 1966, he put it bluntly:

"I know it's customary on the banquet circuit to refer to our university as great. But although we do provide a good university honours degree, we are not in that top world group of 10 or 15.

"No Canadian university is. We intend to be."

What is happening to Ontario universities is that they are being arranged hierarchically in descending order of merit — with U of T at the top of the heap. The announcement recently that Lakehead University will be downgraded and amalgamated with a local community college, indicates that the plan is already in motion.

Above the network of community colleges, supplying skilled technicians who do not require university degrees, will be a network of low-status campuses, providing mostly dumping grounds for students who aspire to BAs and/or cannot find employment and therefore go back to school.

A number of specialized campuses will train students for particular skills — Waterloo in Engineering, for instance, and Guelph in agriculture.

A handful of high status traditional campuses will retain their function of training Canada's social elite. Carleton and Queen's, for instance.

And, at the top of the heap, will be U of T, the focus for graduate work and research. It is not inconceivable that all undergraduates will be banished from the downtown campus.

The University of Ontario, much like the University of California, will have been created, at least de facto if not formally.

In a recent interview, Bissell admitted as much:

Varsity: How close is the University of Ontario?

Bissell: Gosh, it's very close. It depends on your interpretation of what the University of Ontario is.

"What we're doing now is dividing up those areas which can be dealt with provincially from those which must be left in the institution. . . .

"When we talk about new graduate programs, especially for the PhD, we say a PhD in such and such a subject should be at Laurentian or Toronto, as the case may be."

He went on to explain that on what now existed was a "provincial system" based on "voluntary cooperation."

"You have a University of Ontario when you have a body that has teeth behind it and effective officers on the institutional level. We don't have that now, but we have a provincial system."

In comments to the CUA last week Bissell explained what this kind of "provincial system" meant for U of T.

He said U of T was a "crucial" sector of the provincial system of universities and that it must not be allowed to slip into "mediocrity", being the guardian of such a rich tradition of excellence.

He pointed out to what a great extent the University of Ontario actually exists — in terms of the aid and benefits U of T, its kingly, confers on the lesser campuses — interlibrary loans, trained administrators, cooperative agreements on credit for courses, aid in policy and development planning.

We draw attention to all this because what is involved here is a preservation and even acceleration of the present elitist nature of university education.

It is disappointing to see the president of our university making a case rather than the effect that higness is betterness.

In his remarks to the CUA, however, there was a spark of challenge, the hopeful beginnings of a seriousness contradiction.

Universities, Bissell writes, must be used to cement and develop Canada's cultural achievements. This country, he adds, "must not go back to its pre-second war state of intellectual backwater, the ultimate suburb of the city of the mind."

It is comforting to see him making a plea for the social relevance of universities in these days of "value-free" education.

Furthermore, it is interesting to see Bissell reiterate a basic principle of the Commission on University Government in his final comments:

The "basic educational unit," he writes, consists of "a teacher working closely with a small group of students."

The real question is whether these two objectives can best be achieved through building up a hierarchical system of universities — through exacerbating the status quo.

Perhaps the real answer lies in a radical decentralization of university facilities.

Perhaps that is one of the ways universities can cease to recreate themselves in the corporate image and forge close links with the people of Ontario, the community which supports them and which they should serve. Certainly, one of the means would be through ensuring that public representatives on university governing bodies cease to represent corporations and social elites.

The other way would be through shaping the curriculum and research of universities towards the solving of the severe social crises facing Canadians, both nationally and on the local level.

It's too bad that in his zealous defence of U of T's status and merits, Bissell failed to consider more adventurous ways of making education serve the people of Ontario.

51 people have been charged under the War Measures Act

One of them is Michel Chartrand

MICHEL CHARTRAND is one of the 51 people charged under the special powers of the War Measures Act. He is now in jail awaiting trial.

Chartrand is the 53-year-old former technical advisor to the Montreal construction workers union and is currently president of the 57,000 member Montreal Council of the Confederation of National Trade Unions.

Why would the government want to arrest a popular and active labour union leader during the present crisis? Let's look at his record and see.

AS IN ONTARIO, Quebec has seen a summer of struggle between the provincial government and the construction workers. In Quebec, there was a province-wide construction workers strike (eventually broken by the government passing a law ordering them back to work), which fought for equal rates of pay between Montreal and outlying regions of Quebec.

Chartrand, knowing the only way to advance the workers' goals is to present a united front of all construction workers, wholeheartedly supported the workers. He also worked to break down the inter-union rivalry, which didn't win him many friends among the unions' bureaucrats who still believe in raiding etc. to increase membership and therefore, supposedly, powers.

In fact, Chartrand was suspended from the union for a year in 1968 when he called the CNTU President's decision to boycott a general construction strike organized by the rival Quebec Federation of Labour a "mental aberration" — but was allowed back on a technicality.

Similarly, when the federal government decided to "increase efficiency" in postal service during its "spring-cleaning" last March, by taking away the Montreal Lapalme drivers' contract to pick up the mail, and incidentally, breaking a strong union it has taken the workers years to build up and throwing 450 men out of work in the process, Chartrand took a very strong stand against the government.

IN A MEETING with the cabinet in Ottawa, he said "This is a cabinet made up of millionaires" (referring to Trudeau who's worth a couple of million, and Kierans, Post-Master General and former President of the Montreal Stock Exchange), and accused the PM of lying when he said the 6% wage guideline set by the Prices and Incomes Commission was necessary to combat inflation.

Last Christmas union leader Michel Chartrand visited the annual Canadian University Press Conference, where this photo was taken. He'll be spending this Christmas in jail.

The Varsity — Errol Young

Chartrand is part of the progressive wing of the CNTU which advocates a new orientation for unions, involving greater participation in political action and education.

By bringing together organized and unorganized workers, poor people and unemployed — the majority of the population — this group hoped to win election, at the municipal level, replacing the 95 to 100% representation for businessmen with workers and people.

8 Called FRAP, Front d'Action Politique, or Front for Political Action, many of its members have been arrested in the present crisis. As well as the larger goals of municipal, and later, provincial power, FRAP has been working toward the betterment of people's daily lives by organizing food and merchandise co-operatives, to end exploitation by the supermarkets and chainstores (so effectively aided by the present Montreal City Council).

CHARTRAND IS NOT new to the labour scene. Twenty years ago during one of Quebec's bloodiest strikes at Asbestos, when the Quebec provincial police were sent in to break up the picket lines with guns and clubs, Chartrand was arrested for sedition (which means to advocate the use of force to change a government) and later convicted of contempt when he accused a policeman of lying during court proceedings.

And in 1957 at Murdochville, Chartrand took a leading role against Noranda Mines, which refused to recognize the United Steel workers Union. As in many of the strikes here in Regina Police protection was given to scabs and used against the workers.

But, unlike so many Quebec strikes, this one was won, although initial gains were doubtful as the United Steelworkers were forced to pay over $2,000,000 in damages (lost profits) to Noranda, one of the largest and richest corporations in Canada.

And two years ago, a Montreal shipbuilding firm was to close out with minimum notice (like Dunlop in Toronto) throwing 200 men out of jobs, so the workers occupied the drydock area Chartrand was the only union representative with the courage to go down and give them his direct support.

AGAIN IN 1968, when Chartrand publicly denounced Bill 63, which would deprive workers of the right to work in their own language, he was arrested on sedition charges. He was allowed out on bail after telegrams were sent by the Montreal Construction Union, the Northwest Quebec CNTU, and the University of Montreal Teacher's Union, protesting the imprisonment of a man who "represented the popular forces of opposition."

The condition of his release was that he make no public statements until his trial. But not seeing how he could represent the workers while being muzzled, he went to talk to the striking Montreal construction workers, and was arrested for contempt of court, but later acquitted on both charges.

MICHEL CHARTRAND has consistently fought for the rights of workers and against anyone opposed to them. He is against violence and does not agree with the means used by the FLQ. But he does support the goals of the FLQ, which is to give real power to the majority of the people in all decisions affecting their lives — from the food they eat, to the work they do, to the foreign policy of their country.

He is a friend of the people, not an enemy. We must ask ourselves why he is being kept in jail and if the government is also a friend of the people.

NATO: The US controlled w

By SUSAN REISLER

THE FACT THAT the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is merely a political tool of the ruling elite in Washington is no accident. And the fact that Canada participates in such an organization is not altogether a decision she could make on her own.

NATO was created in 1949 because the political leaders in the United States and some in Europe wanted to build up a military force in Europe to protect their interests (capitalist interests) from being taken over by any possible force. NATO remains on the continent to ensure that there will be governments that are in accord with the American needs.

The incidents in American history which led to the establishment of NATO are similar to the one John Warnock, a Canadian professor of political science describes in his thesis on Canadian military policy (now published by New Press as Partner to Behemoth):

"As a result of the Moscow meeting in October 1944 between Churchill and Stalin which divided post-war interests in the Balkans, Great Britain had been in the process of attempting to restore a royalist regime in Greece. The effort was strongly resisted by a large group of Greek republicans, socialists and communists. On Feb. 24, 1947, the British government informed the United States that they could no longer support the effort financially and would have to withdraw. The United States government decided to assume the British role; the civil war had become "a struggle against communism."

THE ONLY WAY AMERICA could get its own people and Canadians to consider leaving men on the continent and establishing more bases was to present them with a huge red scare of the communist conspiracy to take over the world. With the threat of communism, ever looming of the horizons, the U.S. was able to mobilize considerable support for its weapon: NATO.

Canadian politicians were having a difficult time convincing the electorate that NATO was something in which they needed to get involved. Most speeches tried to inject some red scare tactics:

"... to all Canadians of my own race and creed, the bitterness with which this pact is being opposed by the few communists who unfortunately live in our midst, is sufficient proof that it is in the interests of true Canadians to approve the pact."

—Louis St. Laurent in an address to the Commons, March 28, 1948.

Timothy Stanley in his book NATO in Transition: The Future of the North Atlantic Alliance sums up the propaganda that people were being forced to listen to:

"Communism stands in the way of a world order (where people are free to pursue their own way of life). It is the free world which has the positive approach to the future."

WHILE EUROPEANS, CANADIANS, AMERICANS, all people, were being warned that the communists wanted to take over the world and they had reason to fear communist aggression in their own countries, the fact is that the USSR was totally wiped out by the war. It had been fought on their fronts, not on American fronts.

Industrially, the Soviet Union was way behind the U.S. Their steel production was back where the U.S. had been around 1913. Their military manpower after the war was reduced to 2.9 million, with long and potentially hostile borders in Europe, the Middle and Far East. The U.S. maintained 1.5 million men with no potentially hostile borders and with access to the atomic bomb which Russia did not have.

George Kennan, State Department official and one of the prime authors of U.S. Cold War policy, said:

"The image of a Stalinist Russia poised and yearning to attack the West, and deterred only by our possession of atomic weapons, was largely a creation of the Western imagination."

BUT THE ALLIANCE WAS SET UP ANYWAY.

The preamble of the treaty the twelve founding nations signed proclaimed the determination of member governments "to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law."

Portugal, at the insistence of the U.S. was one of the original members. Portugal maintains a classical fascist regime. But Portugal is strategically important in terms of the United States desires to have military bases around the world. And Gulf Oil has huge investments in Angola, a Portuguese colony.

With full support of NATO, Portugal manages to carry on wars with its colonies in Africa in an attempt to make them submit to its dictatorship. Portugal would be financially and technically incapable of carrying on its racist domination of the African colonies without NATO's military and economic support.

"By defending her African provinces, Portugal not only defends her own territory and her own children, but also the West... The bases in Africa, which the European nations would put at the disposal of NATO, are either no longer under their control or have become uncertain. Except for a few others, only the Portuguese territories have remained within the 'military vacuum' in Africa... Owing to the presence of the Portuguese and as long as the Portuguese remain there the Portuguese positions in Africa are safe and as such they are of great significance to the West. It is therefore obvious that the West serves its own cause if it supports Portugal's efforts in Africa."

—Revue Militaire Generale, France

November 8, 1963

IN ANGOLA, MOZAMBIQUE AND PORTUGUESE GUINEAU, Portugal carries on a gruelling campaign to force the Africans into submission. The people are slaves of their colonizers and are treated as less than human. NATO gives full support to Portugal and NATO military equipment is what the Portuguese use to keep the natives down. Only France has admitted this support, yet lists are published regularly of American, German, British and Canadian planes, guns and other equipment being used in the Portuguese colonies.

Nato was created more for purposes like the one above — for making sure that the Americans had a strong foothold in strategic points around the world, than for reasons of safeguarding democracy and the 'free world'.

Portugal is not the only example of NATO supporting fascist regimes. After the Korean war, NATO admitted two more members, Turkey and Greece. Turkey persecutes people for religious reasons; Greece maintains a fascist military dictatorship. But both countries are militarily important to the United States.

Spain has also been involved in NATO although not a member of the alliance. The U.S. was unable to get Spain admitted, but they got around the problem. Spain is now linked to most of the NATO member countries by various bilateral treaties. The United States also makes a point of informing Generalissimo Franco about all that is happening with NATO.

IT WAS NO TOURIST SIDE-TRIP when Nixon stopped off in Spain on his recent European jaunt. He had just announced resumption of shipments of weapons to Greece again, and Franco had to be kept in touch regarding American plans for the Middle East. There was also a discussion about the U.S. Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean.

Nixon did try to emphasize that although the U.S. may have more destroyers and aircraft lurking about the Mediterranean Sea, still, he hoped the sea "will belong to all peoples."

It is difficult to fit Canada into the picture, precisely because Canada plays such a minimal role in the alliance. She is only important in that she can provide more military support for NATO because the country is economically better off (or at least was at the end of the war), than the other European members. (Germany has now made a healthy recovery.)

Canada was dragged along into the alliance. Her presence was unnecessary in terms of her own security. If it came right down to it, Canada could never defend herself against either of her neighbours — the USSR and the USA. But Canada was manipulated by the Americans into joining the alliance.

THE CONTROL THE U.S. has over all NATO countries is powerful. The U.S. is able to dictate to the countries the amount of money each one should spend on military needs. If the country does not go along, the U.S. refuses them foreign aid.

Like the USSR and the Warsaw Pact countries, the U.S. is able to make or break the economy of each of its satellites within the structures of a market economy.

NATO, as Warnock says in Partner to Behemoth, was an alliance between the U.S. and several European countries to resist the spread of communism; Canada followed along. The only common denominator among the countries was the capitalist mode of production (or, if you like, 'adherence to the principles of the market economy').

Charles Marshall, the liaison man in Canada between the government and NATO HQ in Brussels, said that NATO had provided a very real function in Europe — acting as a physical barrier behind which the western European countries could rebuild after the Second World War.

HE SAW NATO AS A FORCE that acted as a deterrent to the expected communist aggression from outside the borders of those countries. But, he said, over the years, the U.S. and the Soviets seem to be sharing much in common.

"There is a very important and positive development to be seen in the gradual identification of the common interests of the USSR and the USA. It's both very important and at the same time a little frightening. People are concerned that if these two got together they could organize the world between them. This is another reason why countries like Canada and those in Europe put a lot of store by NATO, because it is a mechanism for encouraging the U.S. to sort of not to go it alone, entirely in terms of their relationship with the Soviet Union.

"There is a kind of nagging fear that the U.S. might make a deal with the Soviet Union that might not serve the interests of the rest of the members. NATO helps to diffuse this problem and helps the smaller countries to bring a lot of the problem to the attention of the U.S."

Although Marshall outlines some of the very real problems that all countries in the world face when they are at the mercy of the big powers, he is wrong when he says that small countries can bring their fears to the attention of the U.S.

POLICY FOR NATO IS FIRST FORMED in the U.S. and then brought to the other countries for approval, which is rarely refused. This is a form of political blackmail that the U.S. maintains over the other countries. The basic purpose of the alliance system is to guarantee the U.S. a significant role in determining European policy, and significant influence over the policy of member states.

If NATO were dissolved, the U.S. would lose a major area of influence in the most important front line defence against the "spread of communism."

The U.S. has strengthened its position considerably since the organization was formed 21 years ago. They are now responsible for the supreme allied command over all the forces of NATO. The position at the top has always been held by an American general.

The belief that Canada has any influence over the policy-making of the U.S. is probably one of the best myths perpetuated today. The U.S. takes Canada for granted. She treats us as one of the best allies she has today. Few are the occasions when we act against her wishes as with the sale of wheat to China and the conduct of trade with Cuba. Otherwise, most of Canadian foreign policy is made with the blessing of Washington, including Canadian participation in the war in Vietnam.

ALTHOUGH MARSHALL STRONGLY DENIED that NATO would directly intervene in the internal problems of countries, saying it would mean the end of the alliance, the U.S. has established a policy of direct military intervention into the internal affairs of countries in the western hemisphere if they show a tendency to move towards socialism and communism. The U.S. says it will permit no more Cubas.

With the world in turmoil, governments being toppled and national liberation movements being formed, it is difficult to see what NATO will be doing in the future.

tion and culture in North America are more menaced, more strongly threatened by internal disorders, than by external pressures. In a very real sense we are not threatened by the ideologies of communism or fascism or even by atomic bombs and international ballistic missiles but by the threat from two-thirds of the world's population that go to bed hungry each night, and by the large fractions of North American society who do not find fulfillment in it."

Notes from a Natotripper's journal

The author, Liz Willick, is a member of the national staff of Canadian University Press in Ottawa. She was one of ten Canadian college editors (eight men and two women) to participate in a series of briefings on NATO and the Canadian Military in Brussels and at the Canadian Forces Base in Lahr, West Germany.

The trip was jointly sponsored by the Canadian Department of External Affairs and the Nata Information Services (NATIS).

The group left from Uplands Air Base, Ottawa on October 16, just sixteen hours after the War Measures Act had come into effect. They returned from Lahr on October 26.

During their stay in Europe they were cut off from any legitimate information source of what was happening back home. Under the circumstances, the diplomatic cocktail circuit, and hobnobbing with generals had more than its usual heavy aura of unreality.

IT HAD BEEN A HECTIC week of trying to analyse the tremors shuddering across the border from Quebec (funny how most of us Anglos never really noticed that border before).

Then we were standing hairily before a worried looking commissioner in Parliament Hill's East Block (home of THE CRISIS CENTRE). We hadn't of course, noticed the troops, camouflaged to face into the woodwork of civil service Ottawa in their green fatigues, leafy helmets and submachine guns.

A few calls into the bowels of the now thoroughly constipated beast convinced the little man that we were not about to make off the P.M. Pete, and we proceeded to our pre-briefing briefing.

"Harumph," said the Nato Handbook, "The parties to this Treaty . . . are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law."

"WAIT," WE CRIED, our intelligence wounded, "What about Greece?" (and, might we have added, Portugal and Turkey . . . and Canada?)

"Well," said Mr. Marshall, Canadian head of Nato in Ottawa, "Perhaps we can't throw stones any more after the government action this morning. After all, they've rounded up 300 Canadian citizens and put them under detention without recourse to established modes of justice."

"Although Greece is a situation we abhor, the interests of the Greek people as opposed to the Greek government would not be served by expelling them. After all, we're not protecting the Greek government but the Greek people."

But, replied the Handbook,

"SINCE THE ORGANIZATION of the North Atlantic Treaty is not supranational, all decisions taken are the expressions of the collective will of the member governments." (their emphasis)

Are the governments, then, the country, the people? Even Mr. Marshall knows better than that.

Internal security is not a part of the subject matter of the Treaty," explained Mr. Marshall.

And then, still pondering the rhetoric/reality split, we were hustled off for cholera shots, which as it turned out were quite unnecessary.

FINALLY AT UPLANDS military terminal (where, earlier in the day, the maritime members of the excursion were ordered to remove themselves from where they happened to be by invisible gun-welding camouflage troops — or risk getting shot by the RCMP), we were given a gay sendoff by an air force major.

"What's brown and comes from the back of a Buffalo?" answer: "Paratroops."

Eventually, having been weighed, stamped, tagged, sorted, identified and classified, we found our way on to the plane.

Eight hours on a four-engine propellor-driven Yukon

NEIL SAT BEATIFICALLY grinning through it all, watching the revving circles of the props through the window and the acid-flashing red of the running lights against the night sky.

Randy and Sue communed atop the life raft in centre fuselage. A few of our number, heads and feet planted firmly on the ground, slept.

Bill and I rapped all night trying to co-ordinate the reality of the War Measures Act, our paranoia, the unreality of the plane full of military personnel, and our fight to Europe complete with seditious literature and treasonous thoughts — and Quebec under martial law below.

We finally decided that the next step was entirely up to the ruling class, the extent of whose paranoia was the only justification for the extent of ours. And since we couldn't read Pat's mind, we prepared for landing.

GLIMPSES OF LONDON through various windows. Five hours of plane stations, subway stations, train stations, and taxis surfaced for a minute in Trafalgar Square amongst the pigeons to pick up tickets for Brussels. All I wanted was a can, but they wouldn't even take the chains off the door at Canada House, let alone allow us inside. "Security meeting happening here," we were told. Before the Brussels flight, we were halfheartedly searched for weapons or bombs.

The whole fuckin' world's freaking out, friends. Hotel Splendid, Brussels. Every molecule rattled whenever a train went by (often). Back to sandals and blue jeans.

PHIL SAID BRUSSELS doesn't like foreigners much — been invaded and controlled too often by too many varieties of them.

Then came the Nato briefings and the diplomatic cocktail circuit.

To a Canadian naval commander, I am a pert little female communist ("You must argue with this one."), as red as the Kremlin, but nicer to look at. To the Canadian ambassador I am an amusing toy with a degree of debating skill and an approach that gives him a chance to play Diplomacy in an unusual and rather pleasantly different way. I remind a Canadian air force general of his daughter, so he buys me dinner. . . .

But the veneer of Western upper class diplomacy is almost impossible for an outsider to penetrate. One never knows what is real or honest or sincere, yet I presume that many of them have so assimilated the rules of the game that they have no other reality.

INDIVIDUAL INITIATIVE really seems to be quite impossible. Security of place in the hierarchy is totally dependent on one's superior. Ultimately, as Campbell said, the superior for the Canadian group is Pierre Elliot Trudeau. The Canadian Government.

One member of the staff confided that hours were sometimes bad because it was inadvisable to leave a social function before one's superior.

Another said that, "Canada is as completely irrelevant to Nato as Nato is to Canada," then cautioned me not to tell anyone. He also pointed out that Nato headquarters would continue to function precisely as it does now, even if totally cut off from communication with the outside world.

Not politics as life here; but as life style. Politics as game. What is real is not. What is unreal is real.

AS FAR AS I COULD SEE, there is an incredible amount of skill and energy expended in assessing who and what the people are who have a measure of control over one's life. And then one works one's ass off making sure that power is used in one's favour.

Due to conflicting world views (any other explanation would take pages) communication between us and them was quite impossible.

At one point, having wended our way through and around eight security guards, we found ourselves in the hallowed inner sanctum of the Committee on the Challenges of Modern Society. The men in the dark suits around the big table with the translating machinery stopped talking to stare at the gross intrusion of these unsightly creatures. The secretary jumped up to throw us out.

The committee is unclassified and open to the public. We were told that had we applied six months ago, we might have been allowed to stay.

AT ONE BRIEFING, the present state of Europe was explained as being one of "no internal troubles really; NATO has contributed to peace, stability and absence of fear in Europe."

We sighed, wondering what had become of Ireland and England and France and Italy and Greece.

The politicians told us NATO's function today as opposed to what it was twenty years ago, is primarily one of political co-operation and exchange.

Publicly, NATO tells us, they are attempting to establish some form of peaceful co-existence between East and West, now that Europe has recovered economically.

However, if we look closely at what is taking place, it seems that NATO is supporting several oppressive military regimes.

AS WARNOCK EXPLAINS, NATO CREATED the conditions which made possible the military coup in Greece in 1968. And, during the May 1968 strikes in France, de Gaulle negotiated with the armed forces presumably to the maintenance of his assistance if the left united and took over the government. Also, amidst the continued chaos of the governing coalition in Italy, and the persistent demonstrations and general strikes, the armed forces in that country were narrowly averted from taking over by a coup in 1968.

According to Marshall, NATO troops would never be used in a domestic situation. Yet in both France and Italy, NATO justifies large standing armies.

And in the final analysis, it is the United States that controls and directs those armies. As John Kennedy said, the United States looks upon itself as responsible for the maintenance of freedom around the world. British historian Arnold Toynbee says:

" . . . America is today the leader of a world-wide anti-revolutionary movement in defense of vested interests. She now stands for what Rome stood for; Rome consistently supported the rich against the poor in all foreign communities that fell under her sway; and since the poor, so far have always and everywhere been far more numerous than the rich, Rome's policy made for inequality, for injustice and for the least happiness of the greatest number. America's decision to adopt Rome's role has been deliberate, if I have gauged right."

AND CANADA'S FUTURE IS NOW inextricably tied by the knots of capitalism to that of the U.S.

"I happen to believe that in a very real sense, civiliza-

Egyptian markings shadows U.S. ship on NATO patrol

We were told that "in the prevailing international atmosphere of detente, the Soviet Union has been increasing its military in parallel with economic growth, which is decreasing since the fifties. The possibility of the use of violence against any of the Nato countries has receded."

AMBASSADOR CAMPBELL said that there was a "process of the two ideologies of Nato and the Warsaw Pact converging," theirs being "the state above the individual," versus ours of "the individual above the state" — with one or two aberrations which are not all that exaggerated.

He and Marshall agreed that the organization "will and should pass in time when the reasons for which it was created (primary security) have disappeared."

The military, as we soon found out, tend to disagree with all that.

Still, by the time we got to the Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe (SHAPE), we found it a welcome relief. They had at least a limited ability to say what they meant — usually to the effect that the great iron fist of Russia was hanging precariously over Western Europe's head, and if they try anything they'll be sorry — but for Christ's sake, don't give them an extra inch by cutting back anywhere.

WE WERE TOLD HOW many kilometres of gas and water piping there are in SHAPE Village, and shown, from a bus, the schools (one American, one international) the bowling centre, shopping plaza, youth centre, and theatre (which shows films only in English). 9,000 people and 400 buildings live there.

Nine of us (Nato had claimed one casualty) sat in the middle of an empty auditorium for a slide show briefing on the might of the Russian military machine.

"I apologize for showing a Russian submarine off the coast of your country. Of course, this is only for illustrative purposes... they could be anywhere."

There are three military responses to any aggression, we learned: "direct offence, deliberate escalation, or general nuclear response".

BACK AT NATO, we had been told that the function of the Alliance under attack was not to bargain "space for time" at the risk of decreasing NATO's territorial sphere of influence. At SHAPE they pointed out that this procedure would be necessary, since if negotiation failed, NATO would "not have much hope of lasting out for long under conventional warfare conditions," and would have to choose the second course, "deliberate escalation".

Campbell had denied that Portugal receives any material benefit from Nato for her subjection of African colonies in Angola and Mozambique. Nato, after all doesn't interfere in internal matters of that sort. The SHAPEmen at least admitted that Portugal gets "technical knowledge and training assistance".

No mention was made of the complicated process whereby Canadian and American arms and planes have been turning up in Angola on the side of the Portuguese, except to say that the international travel of arms was hardly something Nato could control.

After asking for an equivalent briefing on the might of the American military machine and being referred to the Warsaw Pact, we had cocktails with a colonel, seven generals and a couple of majors. Which wasn't a bad score for nine scruffy college editors. Apparently our fame for the "occupation" of the CCMS chambers had pre-ceeded us.

IT WAS INTERESTING to note that at Nato the politicians generally looked down on the military (Marshall in Ottawa talked about "sabre-rattlers"). At SHAPE, the military looked down on the politicians. Technically the politicians control and direct the military. But then, the military control and direct the guns.

We left Nato and Brussels tired, frustrated and with little regret. It's difficult relating to people for whom the world is black and white (or red and blue?) to the extent that any thing you attempt to say that's at all relevant makes you an apologist for the Soviet Union.

We arrived at the Canadian Forces Base in Lahr, West Germany just in time for dinner at the mess. Sue and I made the mistake of wearing short skirts, and had to run the gauntlet of some very friction. We were talking to men with a job to do as best they could.

As one helicopter pilot explained, "The people in Brussels provide the justifications. Ours not to reason why. We just do our job. I don't think the Russians are about to attack us. I'm here because I enjoy it. Flying helicopters isn't work. Great way to see Germany."

We crawled around on a CF-104 Starfighter, and peered through artillery-sighting equipment, had a ride in a Centurion tank and an armored troop carrier, took pictures with assorted fists and peace signs, and bought alcohol and cigarettes and cameras at disgustingly low prices at the base exchange.

At night we went pub crawling, drank good German beer and ate fine German food. We danced in Americanized discotheques with German disc jockeys who spoke German and sounded American and played all our old hits from straight rock and roll to heavy rock about a year old.

WE TALKED TO a number of sixteen to get away from home and high school and were now just awaiting discharge.

One explained that the American forces are "in shitty shape" because of the racial tensions and the draft. The Canadian forces, he said, have a higher feeling of esprit de corps and a good deal of pride in their organization. Senior officers kept telling us how the Canadian units come off first or second in the international Nato competition manoeuvres.

WE BUMPED INTO MORE Canadian national consciousness over there in four days than in four years back home. Whether or not they believe the Nato justifications for their presence there makes little difference. What they do and where and when is still dictated by the inhumans at Nato and SHAPE and by Pierre Elliot Trudeau, our very own Spiro Agnew.

However, one drunken young fellow of twenty-one kept insisting as he draped himself around my shoulders, "Tell them it's all a farce. Just tell them it's a big fuckin' farce."

Which is what I've tried to do.

Mitchell Sharp and other NATO delegates at a cocktail party.

heavy male chauvinism in the foodline.

Generally we managed to relax and enjoy ourselves. For the first time we were meeting a few of the men who make the military machine run, and finding them quite human.

WE RECEIVED BRIEFINGS on how three thousand foreign military people can relate to a small German town with a minimum of young Canadian soldiers and dependents in our travels (there's one Canadian for every three Germans in Lahr).

One was awaiting court martial for possession of hash and told us about dope in the ranks (lots). Another talked about black marketing cigarettes and booze from the PX, and equipment from elsewhere.

Maoist U of T graduate may be deported

A U of T graduate engineering student who punched an immigration appeal court chairman Friday, may be deported.

Hirsch Chadha, a landed immigrant from India who has been in Canada for three years, was appealing a deportation order arising out of his conviction for assaulting a policeman last August. Chadha, a member of the Toronto Student Movement (Maoists) and the Indian Progressive Study Group, had struck a policeman attempting to prevent him from distributing copies of a left-wing newspaper at Bickford Park High School.

After being sentenced to the Guelph Reformatory for three months, Chadha was released on Nov. 3, only to be re-arrested — this time by immigration authorities. He was to be deported within two days.

Chadha appealed his case to the Immigration Appeal Board, a quasi-judicial body. At his hearing, he attempted to make a political speech "exposing the bloody imperialist court." When one of the board's co-chairmen J. V. Bendetti attempted to silence him, Chadha punched him. Bendetti cleared the courtroom, and the session was continued in camera.

Not even Chadha, who was immediately hustled off to the Don Jail, was present for the remainder of the hearings. No counsel represented the engineer, who had refused to hire a lawyer, using two fellow TSM members as counsel instead.

The outcome of Chadha's closed trial is unknown. A spokesman for the Immigration Appeals Board refused to reveal the verdict, which is transmitted only to the defendant.

Chadha however cannot be reached. Don jail authorities confirmed that any prisoner is held incommunicado to all except close family members or certified lawyers.

Among the evidence used at Chadha's hearing were his remarks attacking the courts as "imperialist tools" and the transcript of a political speech made outside the American Consulate on May 9. The transcript, made by an RCMP agent misspelled the word Palestinian as Philistinian.

Last night, Chadha was still registered in the Don Jail.

Marriage partner required

A woman is required to marry a young American immigrant to Canada.

It's for a temporary length of time, and money will be provided for future divorce proceedings.

It's all perfectly legal.

The young immigrant would prefer to marry a Canadian citizen with no criminal record. As soon as possible.

Written applications — include name and phone number — are now being received at The Varsity office, 91 St. George, second floor.

Dents win 3 Council seats

By MICHAEL MAZUREK

Dentistry Students, demonstrating the effectiveness of co-operation with the faculty, have won three seats on the 191-seat Dents Faculty Council.

"I should like to stress that these concessions were won, not by confrontation tactics, but by responsible discussion between students and faculty," declared student president Hans Vieregger, in announcing the triumph.

Vieregger went on to cite other fruits of the Dents students' co-operation with the faculty.

"Six of the 13 men on the committee to investigate curriculum changes are students," he boasted. "And the Faculty Council has ruled that departmental officialists must 'act in an appropriate manner' in response to the results of student course evaluations."

Asked what action the Dents students would take if the six students on the curriculum committee were outvoted, or if the faculty's idea of "appropriate action" were different from that of the students, Vieregger said, "We don't anticipate any problems of this nature. But should we be unable to work things out through responsible discussion, proper action will be taken, though I'm not prepared at this time to say just what."

Vieregger attributes the confidence the Dents faculty has in its students to the "responsible" decisions students have made in the past.

Volley Blues bow out in finals

John McManus' Basketball Blues hustled their way to their first exhibition victory of the season last Wednesday as they downed Ed D'Armon's Ryerson Rams 81-67.

Veteran guard Larry Trafford paced Blues with his fine all-around play as he netted 17 points. Ron Voake had 13, Bill Boston 11, Mike Katz 10, and Bill Caskey 9.

Blues, who led by 24 points at one stage, sprinted into a quick lead and then coach McManus used the remaining time to give his bench a good workout.

Blues travel south of the border tomorrow to tangle with traditional rival, Buffalo State. The State crew should give Blues a real test as last season they made it to the last four in the NAIA championships and boost a genuine all-American candidate in Randy Smith.

Basket Blues down Rye 81-67

The Varsity Volleyball Blues finished what their coach Taimo Pallandi described as a "hot and cold" season this Saturday at Ottawa University where they finished fourth in the OQAA round-robin championship tournament held among the first and second place teams in both the Western and Eastern sections of the conference.

Blues earned the trip to the finals finishing regular season play in second place behind Western University in the Western section.

The Volleyball Mustangs were the eventual winners as they took a best-of-three-game final series from the host U of Ottawa team in two straight matches, 15-5 and 15-6.

The defending champions of the James Forsyth Trophy, the University of Montreal, failed to make the finals this time around.

Varsity gymnasts short-staffed

In past seasons, Varsity gymnasts have been hampered in their preparations for competition by lack of practice time and injuries to key team members.

This season, the Gym Blues are continuing in the same tradition. In addition, the team has suffered the graduation of four vital members: John Kortright, Brian McVey, Art Stein and Carl Sloan.

On Saturday, Blues met with five other teams at an invitational meet hosted by Queens. Without newcomer Hans Frick, who had injured his thumb only a few days before the meet, there were three competitors in only two of the six events. Since the top three scores for each event count towards the team's total score, the meet was essentially lost before it began.

Individually, Al Forest put in a commendable effort with a third on rings and a sixth in the final standings. Close behind was Toronto's Gary Wicks in eighth position. Gary surprised the team with his third in free exercise — only 0.4 behind the leader. Specialist Philip Michaelis placed fourth in vaulting, and added points to the team total in free exercise.

Coach Julio Roncon expects that the team will stand higher in next week's competition at York.

Ice gals edged 3-2 in thriller

The Varsity ice hockey gals dropped their first league game to the Guelph Gryphonettes 3-2 last Thursday evening at the Guelph Arena.

The Baby Blues opened the scoring in the first period on a goal by Barb Greaves only to have the game tied less than a minute later by Guelph.

The Varsity girls again took the lead in the second period on a picture goal by co-captain Dianne Gilmour.

Guelph came on strong in the third period to score a pair of goals with the winner coming with less than three minutes remaining.

Our gals gave the opposition a few tense moments near the end of the third period but were unable to capitalize on a great opportunity when the Guelph goalie decided to play defence at the blue line.

The next game for the much improved team coached by Gord Bullock will take place at Varsity Arena Wednesday at 7.30 when they meet the Varsity Grads.

Last minute TD earns Vic 12-10 victory

By STAN KOROLNEK

You couldn't have asked for a better game!

The biggest game of the interfac football season also turned out to be the best game as Victoria College downed a determined PhysEd squad 12-10 to win the 77th Mulock Cup championship game.

The victory was sweet revenge for Vic whose long series of Mulock victories was broken by the PhysEders last year.

The score indicated the closeness of the game. In total offence, Vic had a slight 251-221 yard edge.

The Cup-winning touchdown was scored with only three minutes left in the game following a 56-yard march. Vic's big fullback Bruce Carroll capped the drive going over from two-yards out. The march was highlighted by a clutch third down pass from quarterback John Baird to tight end Dave Quick. A roughing penalty against PhysEd also helped to keep the drive alive.

Baird played his best game of the year as he completed eight of his 10 pass attempts for 134 yards — most of them in critical situations. The longest was a 76-yard bomb to speedy flanker Peter "Sonny" Wade.

The two teams exchanged majors in the first half with Vic scoring first on a two-yard flanker reverse around left end by Wade and then PhysEd replying with a five-yard gallop by QB Don Crocker. Both squads missed the convert attempts.

PhysEd pulled ahead in the third quarter when a 33-yard field goal try by Gene Vincze went wide but good for a single point. Later in the period, the "Bronze Toe" was accurate on a 24-yard effort and put the jocks ahead 10-6. That set the stage for Carroll's last minute plunge.

Notes: Larry Theed of PhysEd was the game's top rusher with 55 yards on 12 carries including one 27-yard scamper. Peter "Snow" White was tops for Vic with 46 yards on 12 attempts. Crocker hit on seven of his 14 pass attempts for 117 yards. Defensive backs Rick Kiyonaga and Arne Kartna played outstanding games for the winners.

Victoria College defensive half Aarne Kartna is cheered on by teammates as he speeds down the sideline during Mulock Cup final action Friday afternoon. Vic edged PhysEd 12-10.

Vic players, coaches praise PhysEd effort

By PAUL RAPHAEL

"It was a hell of a ball game," said Paul Lasko as he and his Vic teammates whooped it up on the steps of their dressing room after defeating PhysEd 12-10 to win the 77th Mulock Cup battle.

After regaining possession of the Cup after a year's absence, the team was full of congratulations for both themselves and their opponents.

Joe Cornacchia felt that "all the credit should go to quarterback John Baird who he felt called a great game. He did this, he explained, in spite of being "dinged" at one point in the match.

Lineman Ken Howarth thought that injured QB Terry Bridal had given the club a lot of spirit with his play early in the season. Fullback Bruce Carroll had words of praise for the PhysEd defense — especially for defensive end Fred Fairs.

The consensus of opinion was that the key play was the third down "pro pass" at the PhysEd 20-yard line from Baird to tight end Dave Quick that led to Carroll's winning touchdown. Carroll described the winning major as a "power 32" where the halfback Peter White leads the play, the line blocks straight ahead, and the fullback picks his hole.

Assistant coach Chris Hicks of the VICTORIOUS team thought the game could have gone either way. "It was tense," he said. "PhysEd had a good team. When Baird was hurt our offence became upset but as he came out of his daze so did the others. Everyone gave out. It was an outstanding team effort."

Losing coach Keith Johnson felt his team had played their hearts out. "It's just one of those games, that's all," he said. "I thought we had them beaten. However, our team has nothing to be ashamed of."

Montreal weekend

Win, loss for hockey Blues

By LYNDON LITTLE

At an average of five-foot-eleven and 180 pounds, this year's edition of the hockey Blues must rate as one of the nation's largest intercollegiate shinny teams.

However, coach Tom Watt feels that if the squad is to meet with success in the present season, they'll have to start using that size to more advantage.

"We just let the Loyola team bring it to us," said an obviously displeased Watt after he watched his team drop a 5-3 decision to the Warriors Friday night in the first of a pair of exhibition matches played in Montreal over the weekend.

Blues managed to salvage a split of the two games as Saturday evening they came back and gained a decisive, but by no means overwhelming, 6-3 victory over a young and inexperienced team from Sir George Williams University.

"We're just going to have to start playing a more physical type of game," he added. "Look at our record so far this year. The only really outstanding game we've played to date was the 8-1 triumph over Laurentian where they tried to run us out of the rink and we responded in kind.

"And another thing," he continued, "I doubt if we have been really up for any of our games this year."

The general feeling among the players was that the Loyola defeat (the first Blues have suffered since they dropped a 2-1 decision to Cornell last January) may, after all, prove to be a blessing in disguise.

"Maybe it was good for us," commented veteran center Brian St. John, "now perhaps we'll work harder."

Against the Warriors, Blues notched the first goal when Mike Boland converted linemate Bill Buba's pass from behind the net but then they allowed the Loyola team take a 2-1 margin by the end of the second period.

Early in the third, quick goals by Gord Davies and defenseman Nelson Debenedct recaptured the lead for a brief spell, but, the Warriors came back and pumped in three markers to earn the victory.

The last one was into a empty net with only two seconds remaining.

In the struggle with Sir George, Blues spotted the Georgians the first score then rattled in the next four goals before splitting the third period with a pair of scores each.

Sophomore winger Bill Buba ached Blues attack with two goals while Mac Hickox, captain John Wright and Ivan McFarlane added singles.

Wright's goal, which came at the 8:00 minute mark of the middle period, was the prettiest of the night as he took a pass from defenseman Bill L'Heureux at the Georgians' blueline then stickhandled by several defenders to beat goalie TOM Bickerdike on the short side.

Blue Notes: Both games were played at the Warriors home rink. The first game was a sellout. . . . Buba was the top scorer for the two games with two goals and an assist. Hickox had a goal and two assists. . . . Right winger Terry Peterman picked up a bruised knee in the Loyola game and sat out the Saturday night match with Sir George. . . . Hickox took his place on a line with St. John and Davies while Danny McCann moved into his spot with Brent Imlach and Nicki Holmes. . . . McCann, who played with the Warriors last season, was one of the few Blues who was playing an aggressive checking game. . . . Blues next game is a league fixture against the Windsor Lancers Friday night at Varsity Arena. The Waterloo Warriors come to Varsity next Wednesday in what should be a showdown for first place in the OQAA Western Division.

Students win on parity vote in Faculty Council

Students scored a major victory Monday afternoon when they took the results of last week's arts and science referendum to the faculty council.

Members of the council — or, rather, the interim general committee of the council — voted to set up a commission to bring down recommendations on how the council should be restructured for next year.

The count was 66 for and 48 against.

This ten-man commission will be composed equally of student and faculty members, with Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen acting as chairman. The commission must report back by March 1.

In last week's referendum, 4,725 students, or 81.7 per cent of those voting, asked that students cease to participate in the faculty council unless this commission was set up.

Currently, the 169-member general committee includes 34 students, and the 1300-member council itself includes 68 students. Any restructuring proposals brought down in the spring would have to be dealt with by the huge 1300-member council.

The debate got off to a slow start, as council chairman Provost John Sword decided to move the meeting from the overcrowded Senate Chambers to the floor of Convocation Hall.

When the time came for the students to introduce their motion, the chairman pronounced himself in a dilemma about how to achieve "efficient discussion and disposal of what is a persistent problem with us."

He pointed out that a similar motion — to set up such a commission for restructuring — had been brought up at a previous meeting this fall and tabled for discussion in the spring. (It was this tabling that moved the student members of the council to withdraw and hold the referendum.)

Sword suggested it might appear the proper procedure to move that this old motion be lifted from the table, which would require a two-thirds majority.

On the other hand, he said he was weighing the possibility that this new motion was "sufficiently different." He said one required "the wisdom of Solomon" to be able to decide these issues.

Cynical whisper: "Don't have an identity crisis already."

Sword finally decided to allow the motion to be put on the floor, but warned that the council could over-rule him.

History professor J. B. Conacher took up the challenge, and claimed that the whole issue had "clearly been dealt with."

A standing vote was taken on the chairman's ruling.

Cynical whisper: "Why are all these people standing here; why don't they go out and do something?"

The chair's ruling was upheld by a vote of 81 to 39, and the motion was allowed.

Student member Brian Morgan pointed out that the council was already committed to restructuring itself before next September, and that this process had to begin while students were able to participate fully — during the academic year.

"We were told that students didn't care about the faculty council, and that even those who cared didn't believe in parity," said Morgan. "We were told that only a small number of students were

Police bust 9 in radical co-op

By ANNE BOODY

Toronto police swept into action yesterday afternoon carrying out simultaneous raids at three places frequented by Toronto leftists.

Armed with warrants for arson they were searching for incendiary devices. They arrested nine members of Rising Up Angry at a co-op on Dupont St., searched the premises and carried out similar raids at the St. Joseph St. offices of the newspaper, Guerilla, and a Maoist Bookstore.

Two Maoists were arrested for obstructing and assaulting police during the raid.

Police walked into the house at Dupont St., without knocking, and arrested three persons for possession of marijuana and possession of weapons for the purpose of being dangerous to the public peace. Lawyer Clayton Ruby said the rifle was legally possessed.

During the search, friends coincidentally phoned the house and a strange voice answered. When they asked for one of the residents of the house, they were told she was upstairs, busy fucking, and unavailable.

Fearing for her, the six went directly to the house, entered and when they refused to leave until given information on her whereabouts, were charged with obstructing police.

Those arrested at the house were: Nick de Carlo, Linda Vezina, Debbie Tarshis, Dorothy MacIntosh, Dennis Corcoran, Ted Richmond, Jim McKibbin, Diane Wienrib, and Sue Calley.

During the raid, police rummaged through personal belongings, books, files, etc. At the same time, a serviceman was installing a minute-to-minute tapping device on the telephone wires in the backyard.

Police were carrying out the raids looking for tips following the Saturday morning bombings at the CBC and the U.S. Consulate.

About fifteen police sealed off the Guerilla newspaper offices and searched the office for two hours, refusing to let anyone in the building that houses a print shop, a cafe and numerous offices.

They searched files and address lists. Samples of type faces were taken from all the typewriters in a hope to match them with that found on the notes by the group that hoisted the small molotov cocktails at the two buildings on Saturday, but all to no avail. Police claimed the arrests had no connection with the Saturday bombings.

The eleven prisoners were being held until this morning since the justice of the peace refused to set bail for them last night. They were in eels at the 52 division police station on College St. All were held incommunicado and police refused to release any information on the arrests.

Missen is chosen ATS short-term chairman

R. W. Missen, U of T Chemical Engineering professor, is the new chairman of the Association of Teaching Staff. He was announced Monday evening as the successor to John Rist, at a general meeting attended by fifty members of the association.

"He (Missen) is not wishy-washy left, he's not wishy-washy right, he's just wishy-washy," said Wayne Richardson, the Campus Centre Co-ordinator, and U of T APSC graduate.

S. A. Schiff of the Law faculty is the new salary committee chairman, and W. H. Nelson of the History department was re-elected to the University Government Committee Chairmanship.

As chairman, Missen says he accepts ATS policy of student representation, but not parity, on the top governing structure.

"No one on the staff seems particularly disturbed about the University-Wide Committee's proposed structure." (21 faculty, 14 students, 14 lay representative, 10 alumni, 6 support staff, 3 academic administrators, 3 residential appointees, and the President) said Missen.

"What we're really waiting to hear is the opinion of the Board of Governors and the Ontario government," said Missen.

Missen said the question of parity was never brought up in the Engineering Faculty Council, a body of 200 staff and about 20 students.

Missen was chosen by the executive committee in conjunction with a nominating committee. Missen said this procedure may be changed to one of election by the general membership.

Missen projected term is only seven months since the ATS may revise the executive's term to coincide with the academic year, July to June, and a new chairman would be chosen next June.

In drawing attention to the accomplishments of the ATS, out-going chairman, Rist singled out the university government committee as being "very influential" during the last year and often playing a "very unpopular role."

"It worked out the basis of the proposal accepted in the University-Wide Committee this summer, and deserves credit for hammering these things through," said Rist.

ATS meetings are not open to observers or members of the press, this reporter discovered.

After the initial 15 minutes of the meeting, the reporter was expelled when the chairman requested him to leave.

The chairman apologized for the confusion caused by ATS members who had mistakenly thought their meeting was not closed to outsiders.

U de Montreal cuts 28 staff

MONTREAL (CUP) — L'Universite de Montreal, faced with a $2 million deficit, Monday announced that 28 of its teaching staff will not be re-hired for the 1971-72 academic year.

Vice Rector Paul Lacoste said the university was reassessing all budget items "in an effort to adjust expenses to resources" it is estimated that the cancellation of the contracts will save the university about $300,000.

The move will affect professors who have reached retirement age, guest professors, lecturers and "a few" assistant-professors. Teaching posts until the financial situation improves interested in these things."

The referendum results, he said, showed this was not true. "Students know the faculty council exists and that it is a very important body."

The second question on the referendum, said Morgan, gave the student members some guidelines about the direction in which restructuring should take place. The referendum statement, supported by 88.5 per cent of the voting students, called for restructuring the council at the college and departmental level on a parity basis.

Morgan suggested faculty members take a similar sampling of opinion from among themselves.

The student motion was seconded by A. C. Hallett, principal of UC and a former associate dean of arts and science.

"It may come as a surprise to some that I am supporting this motion," he said, explaining that his primary motive was "practical", that he wanted to ensure that the council could begin to operate "normally" next September.

Hallett said the referendum results were a "very important piece of information."

"This information should be weighed when considering a new structure."

Conacher rose again from his seat.

Whisper: "Is he the only guy they've got? Where are their other players?"

"I don't want to appear to be one of those who have no use for students," said Conacher, "I believe in student presence, I do not believe in student parity."

He said the council was under no obligation to accept "automatically" the results of the referendum.

"The organizers of the referendum should be complemented for the way they turned people out to vote — but that carries noonus."

"It's a hard fact of life that students have not shown their readiness to participate at a parity level."

Whisper: "Why does he object to student participation if he's so sure they won't come?"

Innis college principal Robin Harris rose to report that at Innis, where the governing council has been structured on a parity basis for three years, it has been clearly shown that "students can be serious in their involvement in situations where important decisions are being taken."

Erindale College Dean E. A. Robinson supported this view, saying that "any decision affecting even a small minority in which those people are not involved is a bad decision."

History professor W. H. Nelson, long a leader of anti-parity opinion among faculty, said the results of the referendum didn't surprise him at all.

"I am willing to accept a genuine student concern," he said, "but to encourage this interest would be fundamentally dishonest."

He accused administrators within the faculty of being "cynical" and not following a path of "strict honesty" in supporting the establishment of a parity committee to propose a new structure for the council.

"Let's not fool each other," he said, "A parity committee is bound to come in with a parity recommendation."

New College Dean D. G. Ivey proposed an amendment which would change the proposed commission to a joint student-faculty body, but not a parity composition.

This provoked an angry response from Morgan:

"If you're going to defeat parity, do it honestly, not by amendment."

The amendment was disallowed.

Geography department head N. C. Field supported Nelson's call for an "honest" confrontation:

"We all know what the issue is. Let's have a debate sometime in January and get it over and done with."

"If we're going to have a revolution, let's have it in March. It's always nicer to be put out of your office in the warmer weather."

Hallett pointed out that the motion now at stake was one of "particular practical importance," and was not an across the board endorsement of parity.

The motion was carried by a vote of 66 to 48.

It was agreed afterwards that the commission, to consist of five student and five faculty would be chosen by each of the two estates separately.

Picket lines appeared in front of Dow Chemical Farm Workers lettuce Boycott. Dow controls a Toronto office yesterday as part of the United large Californian lettuce grower.

Kunstler dismissed; Burkens not credible

TORONTO (CUP) — After three false starts, the trial of Regina vs Kunstler finally ended yesterday with a dismissal by Judge Tupper Bigelow.

William Kunstler, one of the defense lawyers in the trials of the Chicago 7, was charged by Paul Fromm and Allan Overfield with assault causing bodily harm and common assault. The charges arose out of an incident at Convocation Hall on June 22 when Kunstler had been scheduled to speak.

Members of the Edmund Burke Society to which Fromm and Overfield belong, disrupted the meeting. Fromm, who was given a moment to speak at the podium, spilled water over Kunstler's hand and Kunstler spilled the pitcher of water over Fromm's head.

When other members of the Edmund Burke Society rushed to the front, scuffling broke out, and in the ensuing melee, Fromm was knocked out. He claimed Kunstler hit him, but all the defense witnesses said that Kunstler was nowhere near Fromm when he was knocked out.

Kunstler's lawyers, Clayton Ruby and Aubrey Golden, presented a small but impressive list of defense witnesses, including two Toronto lawyers, a researcher for the NDP, a retired lawyer, a sociology professor, a member of the Canadian University Press cooperative.

All the witnesses denied seeing Kunstler hit Fromm. They also testified the EBS carried placards saying "Kunstler" which the members of the EBS denied.

Much of the testimony the crown witnesses gave was contradictory. Overfield testified he was a truck driver and he denied being Fromm's body guard, although the night of the incident when he filed his complaint against Kunstler, Overfield wrote down his occupation as bodyguard.

The crown attorney Pat Lesage did little questioning of the defense witnesses and when the hearing concluded, he agreed that he did not believe much of what his clients said.

Judge Bigelow dismissed the case for lack of evidence.

During the trial he said he was already working on a brief for a new case which involves Spiro Agnew. Agnew is suing a toy company who manufactured dart boards with his face in the middle. Kunstler will be handling the defense for the toy company.

Leave the bombing

Well it can happen here too folks as the old saying goes and yesterday's simultaneous raids at the home, offices and businesses of Toronto leftists, proves that repression is beginning to come down in Toronto.

The intelligence force, composed of Metro police, OPP, and RCMP claim they made their raids in an attempt to advance their investigation into the Saturday morning bombing incidents at the US consulate and the CBC on Shuter St.

Yet they also claim that none of the nine arrests they made were at all connected with these previous incidents. And at the same time they are setting bail as high as $250 for a "simple" charge of obstruction.

And police were quick to initiate such repressive tactics as placing minute-to-minute wire-tapping devices on the telephone lines leading to the co-op where nine people were busted on varying charges.

So fearful were the police of the left in general that they also searched businesses, — a print shop and a cafe in the building that houses Guerilla, a youth culture newspaper with a circulation of 13,500 copies sold on the streets of Toronto.

Police also made clear they would release no information on the Dupont St. arrests and Clay Ruby, lawyer for the arrested, was refused admittance to the house where the arrests were made.

Only after arguing with officials at 52 Division was he allowed to see the prisoners.

But there's a lesson for all on the left to be gained from this incident. First one of course, is keep your place clean of any drugs, even if you're only involved in such organizations as Stop Spadina, setting up day-care centres, providing for breakfasts for poor children and other such "criminal" activities.

And second, now is not the time for pseudo-guerilla tactics, which implicate all persons involved in constructive left-wing politics.

At this time what we should best be doing is learning from the people, meeting the people, and understanding how to work with those persons most fucked-over by the system.

What the media, the police and the governments of Canada most want at this point is to identify all opposition radical organizations in Canada — both within and outside Quebec — with the terrorist tactics of such groups as the Front de Liberation de Quebec.

Yet, in Quebec at this time, there is a growing wave of demand for radical reform of Quebec society, starting with separation from the rest of Canada and including the democratization of all spheres of life.

This is what we have tried to indicate in our coverage of the events of the last month and a half.

This weekend representatives of a number of Quebec community organizations, unions, newspapers and other groups, are participating in a Toronto teach-in on the crisis in Quebec. It is extremely important that English Canadians attend and participate in this event. Details are elsewhere in this paper.

Let's leave the bombings to the Burkers.

Montreal — Quartier Latin

Crackdown on education in Quebec

If you thought the War Measures Act itself carried a lot of implications about the restriction of the free exchange of ideas and opinions, take a gander at these regulations, introduced by the Quebec education minister.

Guy St. Pierre last week announced that the following steps are being taken to tighten the screws on radical teachers in public schools and in the universities:

- a commissioner of inquiry will receive complaints from parents and school administrators about teachers "abusing" their positions for the purposes of spreading "political propaganda" or "indoctrinating their students;"
- rectors of universities and directors of CEGEPS (junior colleges) and school commissioners will be warned to stop these "abuses" as they see fit, and if they don't, the minister himself will personally take action;
- a joint committee of representatives of teachers, the school commissions and the minister will draw up a "code of ethics" defining the relationship between teacher and student.

These projected measures have been denounced as "a permanent extension of the War Measures Act" by the Alliance des Professeurs de Montreal, the union representing Catholic teachers in the city.

One school teacher was arrested because his principal, while eavesdropping on the school intercom, heard part of the answer he was giving a student concerning the crisis. In another case, a 14-year-old high school student was arrested for posting the FLQ manifesto on a school bulletin board.

Although St. Pierre denies that this is a political witch hunt, all the signs are there. And even if he doesn't take his broomstick and fly through class rooms, he has already left his mark.

Most professors and teachers have been very intimidated by the minister's proposals. Value-free education does not exist. They recognize that. The problem is, many Quebec teachers do not always see the answer the way the State does.

Their ideas clash.

The teachers do not know what they can say. When they question the powers that rule, the answer is: "Go ahead and teach, then we will decide afterwards is what you have to say breaks any rules. (How can we tell if a film is pornographic if we don't see it first?)"

The result is that very little education is going on in Quebec schools at the moment. The students ought to be able to study and discuss events that relate to their very lives. That includes discussions on the FLQ. Making an organization illegal in no way deals with the origins of that organization nor prevents the same thing from recurring. Only through understanding the problem can one begin to solve it.

One cannot simply say to students the FLQ is illegal because it already exists. St. Pierre, one assumes, has some understanding of education and what it means. It is impossible and totally unrealistic to suggest that by some means the past events of October can simply be shut out of people's minds — that people will become deaf and dumb and lose their memory.

We must fight against that kind of repression because it in no way begins to help us answer our questions of why what happened, did.

The authoritarian workings of Radio Varsity

The following critique of Radio Varsity was written by Geoff Meggs, a Radio Varsity staff member who was among a small handful of staff "fired" last week. The story tries to point out that Radio Varsity is not controlled by the staff of the station, and to indicate some of the implications of this.

IF YOU'VE EVER had the impression Radio Varsity is an oppressive organization with an authoritarian power structure, now is your big chance. Pat Dymond, Station Director, is willing to consider written suggestions for an announcer's code, a statement of what an announcer should expect when he works for Radio Varsity. Dymond will "synthesize" the submissions, then call a staff meeting for their discussion.

Radio Varsity's last staff meeting, the one and only so far this year, was held Monday. Those who failed to appear without warning Station Manager David R. Cuddy, were threatened with being "taken off active on-air duty." However, Dave didn't fire anyone, because only ten of a possible 25 or so showed up, and "a lot of people couldn't make it." But anyone seeing that notice in the hall, could have surmised that Radio Varsity was a somewhat authoritarian place.

Most RV announcers are inured to this sort of thing, and are happy in their work. Maybe they should be a little careful. Announcer Gard Shelley was warned by an RV executive last week that "heads are going to roll" at Monday's meeting and Dymond himself says a number of Radio Varsity personnel will have to go in the new terms as part of a "new programming emphasis."

If you volunteered for a student organization, supported by your SAC fees and then got laid off, you might find the situation somewhat authoritarian.

YET PAT DYMOND WOULD disagree with you. Dymond is appointed by the SAC Communications Commission, and in turn appoints his staff. It may not seem democratic to the staff, but Dymond insists that "this station is run democratically."

"It's a matter of the elected representatives of the students, which is SAC, picking me to decide the policies of the station," he says. "You can hold meetings — Don Brady did that two years ago — he tried to get the staff involved in every stage of the station's operation and wound up with big fights all the time."

"Instead of trying motivate people to work for the station, he was trying to motivate them to decide things for the station — the destiny of the station, the future of the station. Well you can't do that . . . The students who work here don't decide what's going to be done, the students who pay for it decide what's going to be done."

At this juncture, my friend Doug Bennett asked, "Suppose there's someone who has a different conception of what Radio Varsity should be than you. Do you think its your privilege to fire them?"

Quoth Dymond: "I don't think it's my privilege, I think it's my job."

This was an important question for us, because we had just been fired. On our arrival at the station to do our show Tuesday night, a posted note informed us of our dismissal.

We were charged with "mysterious signs and notes, listener response (bad), strange telephone calls" and "writing on the wall." We were guilty of the notes and the writing, but couldn't see they were grounds for dismissal. But we apologized. The other two charges were withdrawn. Nonetheless we would not be taken back on "active staff."

NO, SAID DYMOND, it's more than the writing on the wall

"We run a radio station the way we think

1. Radio Varsity exists to serve the university community with news, information and entertainment.
2. News and information used on the station shall be accurate.
3. Music and entertainment shall be designed to appeal to the maximum possible number of our listening audience.
4. Commercials shall be accurate, in good taste, and informative.
5. News and editorial material shall be strictly separated.
6. Public service announcements will be made free, as a service to our listeners.
7. The use of profanity or other material not in good taste is forbidden.
8. News and informational programming shall take precedence over regular music programming.
9. New and experimental forms of radio broadcasting are encouraged, but only under the supervision and control of the Programming Director.
10. Contracts with advertisers will be honored, and all commercials will be played exactly when logged.
11. Programs found not to be in the best interests of the university community will be cancelled.

there should be an easier course than trying to depose him, but at the same time asks for a little understanding. "How am I supposed to do my job if I'm constantly worrying about people going around trying to undercut me?" he asked us.

"Look — real politik, man, — you have to have power to be able to do something. I had to have power to get $8,000 for the carrier current. Now if you guys were running around telling people Pay Dymond has altogether the wrong idea of how to run a radio station, I wouldn't have got the $8,000. I really don't know what the answer is. You make sacrifices when you put somebody in to run something."

We're the ones who make the sacrifices.

Speaking of our own dismissal, Dymond apologized for the way it was done, but again asked us to look at his side. "If there's enough grief that comes from a particular set-up, I really don't have enough time and patience to sit around and coddle people. So, what I'd like to do is fire anybody who gives me any trouble, but I don't go that far. But I hope you appreciate there's a tendency in that direction."

Yes we did.

Although Dymond has promised to "synthesize" any suggestions he gets for a Radio Varsity rule book, he has already completed the work of stating his own views on the station's operations and entrenching them as the modus operandi. This is in the form of a report to U of T's Board of Governors to encourage their support. Oddly enough, the last page has the program code you can read on this page.

A section on entertainment programming reads "musically, we try to provide something for everyone, from classics to acid rock, without offending anyone. Of course, this goal is impossible to achieve completely, and compromises are necessary in this area."

"THERE IS AN AXIOM that the function of student media is to make the audience think, or change their philosophies. While I suppose this axiom is true in some instances, at Radio Varsity we try to provide listeners with what they want — music or news."

What is the "basic rationale" for this? Dymond writes "U of T Radio can become an effective, efficient and useful channel of communication serving students and other members of the community at this university . . . if the station really serves this community, student radio will become a valuable asset to this University." What kind of service is Radio Varsity to provide? "Information and entertainment" is the report's answer. What workers at Radio Varsity are being asked to do is serve the interests of a group they themselves belong to. But these interests are only served at Radio Varsity insofar as they coincide with the interests of the appointed hierarchy.

AS CAN BE SEEN from the code, the Program Director at the top of the hierarchy need not worry about being undercut. New conceptions of "serving the community" are strictly under his control and if any aspect of the radio operation seems to him to deviate from "the best interests of the university community it will be cancelled."

Instead of creating policies that outline what can't be done, the Radio Varsity operation should be seeing what must be done. The people most interested in radio in this campus are the ones working at the station. It is their interests that are consistently ignored it should be run and you guys don't really think it should be run that way. Your philosophy of radio is different from mine." Dymond said he knew that by our writing on the wall. "and by the fact you have a general dissatisfaction with the way things are being run. Assuming all these things why should I argue with you?"

Dymond had no desire to argue with us — he would rather compromise. But, he couldn't understand our complaint. We told him it boiled down to the fact that we didn't like working in an authoritarian structure.

"Well, I'm interested in that," replied Dymond "because that's one of the things I'd like to get out of. I don't want to impose structures on people, which is why I DO a lot of this crap myself and I don't have discussions on it and vote on it and pass rules about it. Show me where it's different from what it should be. Where are rules going up?"

"WHAT ABOUT THE RULE we couldn't broadcast after 10 p.m.," I suggested.

"That's a hard one to justify," was the answer. A brief silence. "Now you get into the difference between idealism and practicality, which is that there's got to be some control in the use of this station."

Right now, Dymond runs the station and staff can do what they please as long as it is also what Dymond pleases. Dymond thinks

Physics chairmen challenge Rogers' assertions

In the November 25 edition of The Varsity there is a letter from Mr. Norman Rogers, Physics Coordinator of the MPSCU, in which he states:

"We feel that for students taking any course in either mathematics or physics a Yes vote on the referendum is particularly essential, since neither department has a structure which adequately allows student representation, as recommended in the CUG report, in the decision-making processes of the department."

It seems to us that this statement creates a false impression about the actual situation in the Physics Department.

The Department of Physics has recently set up a departmental council with student and other representation, the composition of which was achieved through discussion in the departmental CUG discussion group and subsequently ratified by the various estates in the department. An almost verbatim record was kept of the meetings of this discussion group and it is interesting to see, through quotations of this record, how the composition of this council was determined.

On February 13 the discussion group recommended a departmental council rather larger than, but with proportionally the same representation as, the presently existing departmental council. Before the vote was taken, Mr. N. Rogers stated, "In my opinion (this proposal) gives a council type of structure which is what I would like to see . . . I think the proposal is approximately acceptable to what the CUG report recommended."

At the same meeting, a motion to set up such a council on a trial basis was seconded by Mr. N. Rogers, and passed.

On March 6 Mr. Rogers reported, "The executive of the Mathematics and Physics Society approved the proposed structure of the departmental council . . ." At about the same time, the executive committee of the Physics Department recommended a council smaller in size, but with the same relative composition, as the council previously recommended by the CUG discussion group.

On March 13 Mr. N. Rogers reported:

"In the Mathematics and Physics Society meeting yesterday, a motion was passed to the effect that there shall exist in both the Mathematics and Physics Departments, a departmental council, and that neither students, faculty, nor support staff should have a majority of votes in this council.

This was passed overwhelmingly. There were 28 students present at this meeting."

After some discussion, Mr. Rogers said that the council of 12 members suggested by the executive committee of the Department was acceptable, and moved:

"That the chairman, under departmental conditions, should consider himself bound by a two-thirds majority but advised by a counsel of lesser votes and such a council shall be one in which no single estate has a 50% majority."

This was seconded by Mr. N. Keller and passed.

This motion, which sets out the rules of the present departmental council in the Department of Physics, was subsequently ratified by all the estates in the department.

We think that the statement of Mr. N. Rogers in The Varsity is a very surprising statement to make when one considers the part which he played in setting up the present Physics Departmental Council.

MPSCU President challenges Rogers

Mr. Norman Rogers had not the authority to sign his article as a representative of the Mathematics & Physics Society Course Union. He is not a representative of MPSCU to the University Community; as such his signature is meaningless. The first three paragraphs of the article were correct.

1) The letter was written as a result of an M.P.S.C.U. executive decision;

2) The executive feels that the letter accurately expresses the sentiments of that decision;

3) The present Physics Departmental Council does not include committees allowing a student voice on hiring and promotion, which the student members on the organizational committee (both graduate and undergraduate) understood to have been agreed upon last spring.

'Red' cards get discount

Two U of T students have launched a campaign to provide students with discount cards which selected merchants are obliged to honour.

Many businesses, they say, will give students a discount on purchases if students ask about it. But the problem is students forget to ask.

Since last week Howard Balshin and Stuart Peikes have signed up about two dozen local retailers who have undertaken, formally, to allow students a ten per cent discount on merchandise. Some businesses specified stipulations, which are outlined in information you get when you buy a card.

The little red cards cost one dollar each and can be obtained only at the Students Administrative Council office.

Thirty per cent of the money goes to the U of T Campus Community Cooperative Daycare Centre. Another 30 per cent goes to pay for mailings to card-holders — mailings including names of additional businesses the students hope to sign up.

After the cost of printing the cards is counted in, the two students figure they may make from three to seven cents on a card — enough to pay for their time and expenses.

When using one of the cards, you have to present your U of T Admittance Lectures card as well.

SAC to study extent of American influence

The Students Administrative Council has undergone a project to study the extent of American influence at the University of Toronto.

At the last SAC meeting, a task force was established to answer questions on the controversial matter.

The group will set its own terms of reference, but has been directed to look at the citizenship and academic background of U of T faculty and administrators, the hiring policies of departments in all faculties, and the employment situation of Canadian academics.

The state of "Canadian studies, the role of research and consulting, and the role of the university in both Canada and the United States are other key areas to be examined.

The Task Force will hopefully encourage discussion of Americanization on the campus through public forums, and the SAC gave $100 to the force to cover initial expenses.

Membership is open to anyone in the U of T community interested in the problem.

An important organizational meeting will be held tomorrow at 1 p.m. in the South Sitting Room of Hart House.

Put-down done on Playboy lie

By LARRY MARTIN
Love and Will by Rollo May,
W. W. Norton, $8.75

Psychotherapist Rollo May's book Love and Will is certainly a put-down of our alleged sexual freedom, of the Playboy philosophy, and of our technological culture. To those who exult in pre-marital sexual relationships and sell them as love, Dr. May would ask whether there isn't a good bit of manipulation involved, as hemanship and shemanship often is the prime motivation. Perhaps there is the desire to punish one's parents, or other authorities in society. In no uncertain terms May scores the so-called current sexual freedom for its mechanistic, passionless attitude, with the opposite sex becoming an it to be used like a mechanical object.

By anesthetizing feeling in order to perform better, by seeking merely release of tension, the sexual relationship has become a tool to emasculate those involved. The answer to these and many other problems of our time involving sex is not to grind out more technical information about the body's plumbing and reproductive systems. Interestingly enough, the author cites figures on pregnancies and abortions among unmarried mothers to illuminate the fallacy of this approach to sex education.

The present rate of such pregnancy is 2½ times that of a decade ago. At this rate, 1 out of 6 girls will become pregnant between the ages of 13 and 20. When we look at the sex education programs in our school systems, designed to inform young people of the problems in pre-marital relationships, we might be led, as was Dr. May, to see almost a direct relationship between such information and the higher incidence of pregnancy and abortion.

The outpouring of technical information, the availability of dozens of "how-to" books flooding the market, has little effect on influencing our morals. The real culprit is our technological culture. While science has provided splendid and fascinating exploits and discoveries, and while affluence has enriched our lives in some ways, Dr. May sees this technological culture creating an immense repression of feeling that leads many people of any age to prove that in this vast wasteland of emptiness, boredom, and loneliness, they do have feelings. He cites the number of his clients in therapy who welcome pregnancy in their search for an identity only motherhood seems to afford.

The Playboy philosophy is demythologized, with the author seeing its impact not so much as a rebellion against victorian prudery or Puritan moralism. The same repression of feeling throughout our technological culture, is no less a prisoner even though it prompts a young woman to expose her nude body in a public magazine. Dr. May sees a new fascism in this Playboy myth, as Hugh Hefner shifts the fig leaf from the genitals to the face. The author sees only vacuous expressions on the faces of the nude figures. And then Rollo May has a word for all of those men (and clergymen) who page through Playboy. What are you trying to do, give yourself the illusion of potency?

Another fascinating thing about this book is the section in which Rollo May recovers the daimonic as a working tool in diagnosis and theology. We have long been accustomed to writers such as Niebuhr and Tillich seeing the demonic in certain forms and personalities of our time. The author posits the daimonic as not only the possible root of the demonic, but also as the agent or avenue to communication with divine reality. The daimonic is forever the enemy of technology because technology will not accept a rational No for an answer.

The great power of the daimonic can be seen in the unusual creativity of philosophers, poets, and artists. One of the book's finest insights is May's proposal for channelling the daimonic into positive impulses for the support of the person and the community. He notes that the violence among nations, in the cities, in individuals, is the daimonic gone awry. Then it is demonic possession! The reader is warned that refusal to recognize the daimonic is itself a form of demonic denial, leading to perverted forms of aggression.

Dr. May says that violence and aggression is the product of psychological and spiritual agony, and is spawned by depersonalisation. We are reminded that there are those who clutch at physical pain, social ostracism, violence and delinquency as means of producing pain. Pain at least gives some meaning to life.

There could hardly be a clearer message to the campus administration than May's concerning the style and ethic of dealing with demonstrations. The sincere critic of existing inequalities will respond affirmatively to genuine attempts by the administration to solve the inequality. This is to channel the daimonic positively. But violence on the part of the administration or other campus members of a population could be seen as demonic possession, which we must imagine is a neurotic seeking of pain and ostracism for guilt atonement, projection of hostility on the community, or search for identity. Undoubtedly all 3 aspects are involved at various stages of growth and expression.

The closing chapter, entitled Communion and Consciousness comes very close to articulating the Hebrew-Christian understanding of divine love, agape. Careful reading of this section will reveal at least some of the concerns this religious heritage has been wrestling with, lo these many centuries.

La Guerre, Yes Sir, H

Novels on Qu show urban a

By DAVID FRANK

La Guerre, Yes Sir! by Roch Carrier
House of Anansi, $2.50 (hardcover $5)
Hail Galarneau, by Jacques Godbout
Longman, $6.95

Two of the best written and most enjoyable French Canadian novels of the last five years are now available in fine English translations.

Although set in entirely different milieu — the first is located in the archetypal snowed-in French Canadian village, and the second in the maze of highways and suburbs surrounding Montreal — both novels ring out very clearly some of the major themes of French Canadian literature.

Roch Carrier's novel, La Guerre, Yes Sir! is a beautifully understated recreation of the reactions of a small French Canadian community to the holocaust of World War II into which they have been plunged by Canada and Britain.

The focal incident of the book is the return of the Union Jack-draped coffin of one of the villagers, Corriveau, by a troop of British soldiers. The tensions between the Quebecois and the 'maudits anglais' are skillfully brought out.

A recent survey done by Maclean's Magazine underscores the significance of the novel's title. The most interesting figure that came up with was that most French Canadians (61 per cent) thought violence was a ways bad, while only 38 per cent of English Canadians thought so.

Maclean's illustrated this point graphically with a photo of a blackboard with one hand writing WAR YES and a second hand writing La Guerre, Non. It would seem that Carrier's choice of title reflects a similar kind of contrast.

Carrier displays superb craftsmanship in his ability to handle smoothly a wide number of characters, all with important symbolic values in the demonology of Quebecois literature.

The central image or clue which the novel provides is contained in the first few pages where Joseph, a villager who does not want to go to war, takes his axe and chops off his own hand to disqualify himself. The reaction to oppression and frustration summed up in this act, takes the form of violence upon oneself. The root causes are not even broached.

The entire thrust of Carrier's novel is into the past — into the snow and cold of the countryside, where a close community of spirit holds men together of necessity.

His attempt to create a sense of deep human values out of this material is a characteristic mark of much French Canadian literature. Since the earliest Quebecois writing authors have projected themselves back into a more or less idyllic past in order to discover some sense of roots and meaning.

Carrier's novel avoids the crude conclusions and generalities which it might easily fall into. Mostly it is his consummate skill and wry sense of irony that carry it off.

Jacques Godbout, in his novel, Salut Galarneau, strikes many of the same chords in his well-told tale, but handles the problem of relevance by making his central character definitely an urban Quebecois of the late 1960's.

While the persona in Carrier's novel is probably most correctly the collectivity of the community, Godbout's Galarneau is the modern Quebecois-on-the-make, hoping to build from his single hot dog stand by the highway into a network of hot-dog stands all over the province.

Galarneau

bec reality
d rural life

The difference, I think, reflects differing assessments of the relative distinctiveness of French Canadian civilization. Godbout's is a French Canada confused and reeling from the shock of almost total North Americanization, while Carrier's is an embattled self-reliant Quebecois people.

The former, one would think, is closer to the reality of a French Canada subject to both Canadian and American imperial prerogatives.

Godbout, like Carrier, is a superb raconteur. His message is also more buoyant and enthused about the world than Carrier's rather ironic outlook.

Galarneau, in the course of the novel, experiences a process of politicization which brings him through the maze of an Americanized society, to reach his own tentative answers about the world.

His fantasies are those of the modern North American, but in their Quebecois context, they have become sharpened and refined.

"I'm o wor victim," Galarneau writes in his notebooks, "o victim of a strange war that must have started without anybody wanting it, like the one in Vietnam."

He pictures himself the victim of a corporate conspiracy to lobotomize modern man and finds it necessary to turn the tables:

"One thing the sociologists hadn't forescent . . . what they didn't expect was the chosen guineo-pig might rebel."

Galarneau's fight to leave Reader's Digest, Superman, the hot-dog stand, and all the other accoutrements of modern civilization behind leads to an outcome similar to that of Carrier's community, which closed in upon itself.

Galarneau ends up walling himself in his house in order to escape the outside world. Again, repression and frustration result in violence upon oneself.

Ultimately, Godbout's message is a buoyant and life-affirming one, not as bleak as Carrier's outlook.

But neither author can be considered adequate to understand the realities of the Quebec where revolutionary sentiments have emerged forcefully in the open in the last two years. The cycles of institutional violence are now being broken.

Both novels remain essentially literary projections of rootlessness.

Two final comments. Carrier and Godbout both tell their stories with an ease and craftsmanship which should shame every English Canadian writer. Secondly, Godbout's English publishers should be strongly criticized for converting a popular best-selling original novel, which originally sold for about $2, into an expensive $6.95 publication.

It's too bad House of Anansi, who printed both hard and paperback editions of Carrier, could not have published both novels.

New pioneers caught with love by Klein

BY JUDY WAPP

Irwin Klein's exhibit at the Baldwin Street Photo Gallery, 23 Baldwin Street, is titled The New Settlers. The settlers are the young, mostly white, urban young people who have settled in rural New Mexico. Many live in communes and all are working out what are, for them, new ways of life. Much of this new way is reminiscent of the many communal experiments of 19th century rural North America.

People are always central to the photographs — people in relation to the land, people living, loving, eating, farming, sitting, standing, being. The prints in which no people appear are still about people — the marks they leave, the places they build, the tables they eat on. Some of the prints are quiet, simple statements of a moment in the life of some human beings. Because of the high quality of the prints, the textures of the land, the structures, the animals, the clothing, the plants and the people themselves are striking: soft, silky hair against the hard cracked New Mexico soil; a smooth, young nude body washing in a waterfall against a background of old, old-hard Southwestern rock. Others are very complex, studies of ceremonies in the lives of people creating new forms within old traditions: a fourth of July celebration at the Hog Farm; a wedding party at another farming commune.

Irwin Klein is not a photographic voyeur. He obviously loves the land and the people who live on it and within its conditions. He spends several months of the year in New Mexico and his photographs convey his joy of discovering a renewed way of life in a very old part of the world. The communal way of life was highly developed within the Hopi culture of the Southwest and the early white settlers found that some variation of it was necessary to survive there.

So, these photographs are a beautiful visual chapter of a very ancient story

Black revolution shown as clear picture

By PAUL NORTON
SOLEDAD BROTHER

by George Jackson
Longman Canada Ltd., $7.50

SOLEDAD BROTHER is a collection of letters written by George Jackson, an Afro-American who has spent the last ten years, seven in close confinement in various California prisons, on a sentence of one year to life for a $70 theft. He now faces a mandatory death sentence upon conviction, with two other black inmates, of murdering a white prison guard.

Jackson's letters will immediately take their place alongside other Black Panther texts: the final entry notes the of Jackson's 17-year-old "baddest brother" Jonathan, slain in the San Raphael Courthouse gun battle, and it concludes with the right word, the terrible word, the word which has become Jackson's raison d'être — "Revolution". At a time when this word seems to come easily and quickly to so many people, it is instructive to be shown its roots in the mind and life of a man like Jackson who claims so much in the name of Black America and its revolutionary faction.

The man who wrote these letters reveals an intense hatred and a strong intellect; in the ten years uncovered by these letters this hatred has been refined, but not compromised, by his having learned how to derive the Marxist formulas of condemnation, by his introduction to the problem of distinguishing between capitalist whites and radical whites. In those ten years Jackson has preserved, by taking "everything in the extreme", his life and sanity and character in a racist and sadistic Hell which must inevitably make a good man bad and a bad man worse. There is no way to summarize or review here the physical, psychological, psychopathological, legal, and soulful tracks that this "man with few alternatives" has left for our recognition and credulity. And to attempt to disenfranchise oneself from the spectre of Jackson's wretched sojourn in "soledad" would be slightly inhuman.

The only response that can be made here must attend to that part of Jackson's letters that are least dependent on judging the man, and therefore, this response may be simplistic, even obscurantist, for it displaces this black man's awesome moral indignation and substitutes a fear as profound and sweeping as Jackson's faith in "Revolution".

Consider, then, this faith: "My faith in life holds still to the principle that we men of color will soon make a harmonious world out of this chaotic travesty of fact. But first we must destroy the malefactor and root out all of his ideals, moralities, and institutions. It is to this end that I have long since dedicated myself, to extinguish forever the lights of a perverted science, in any way that I can, by any and all means." "I know that I am the original man and will soon inherit this earth."

That is the faith and this is its vision: "I want to leave a world that is liberated from trash, pollution, racism, poverty, nation-states, nation-state wars and armies, from pomp, bigotry, parochialism, a thousand different brands of untruth and licentious usurious economics."

"The central point is that the government must be truly representative. All important positions must be elective, and a man's position within the governing body must be solely dependent upon meritorious conduct of the state's business." "Consider the people's store, after full automation, the implementation of the theory of economic advantage. You dig, no waste makers, no harnesses on production." "The people's store will work as long as people know that it will be there, and have in abundance the things they need and want (really want) . . ."

That is the faith and its vision, and this is the fear: in 1970 Jackson wrote to Angela Davis that "We've wasted many generations and oceans of blood trying to civilize these elements over here. It cannot be done in the manner we have attempted it in the past. Dialectics, understanding, passive resistance, they don't work on an activist, maniacal, gory pig." The fear is that Jackson is perfectly right that "If there is any basis for a belief in the universality of man then we will find it in this struggle against the enemy of all mankind." And this fear issues in a question: who are the pigs?

Mod version of Wilde story

HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

The Secret of Dorian Gray is without a doubt the worst movie I have seen all year. Ordinarily I would not bother writing a review of so poor a film as this. But because Dorian Gray fails on so many different levels at once, a few words of comment are in order.

This is the second filmed version of Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray. In the first rendition (U.S.A., 1944), the script adheres fairly closely to the novel in depicting in physical terms the grotesque changes that occur in a debauched soul. Dorian Gray, wishing eternal youth, makes a satanic deal, whereby a portrait of himself ages while his body remains intact. However, the painting not only grows older; but also reflects the true appearance of Gray's ugly mind. Unable to bear the disgusting truth which the portrait mirrors, Gray kills himself, and in death assumes the gnarled image of the picture.

The modern sequel completely destroys any air of the mysterious or supernatural by taking place, not in the gloomy mistiness of Victorian England, but in the razzle-dazzle, sparkling, neoned flashiness of "swinging London". This is not to say that allegories or fables cannot take place in a modern setting. But Dorian Gray tumbles into the ranks of the hundreds of other dull, drugged, pseudo-hip "youth" movies currently glutting the market.

Unlike so many "now" flicks, Dorian Gray spares us the rock-music soundtrack. But in its place there is substituted listless trash comparable in its innocuousness only to the Muzak between the cabbage and string beans at the supermarket.

The portrayal of Dorian Gray poses as many problems as does that of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. All too often the writer and director have too much fun presenting the Jekyll-Hyde immortal escapades, and entirely disregard the theme of good and evil. Similarly in Dorian Gray, the constant emphasis on the hero's disgusting behaviour totally obscures the reasons for the portrait's existence in the first place.

All the implications of Wilde's book are lost in a ho-hum, non erotic circus of homosexuality, sodomy, murder, lesbianism, rape and voyeurism. But even when the movie lapses into philosophic questioning, Dorian Gray's line, "Why can't a man live forever in sin?" takes on all the cliched overtones of such classic statements as, "It is not Man's privilege to tamper with the secrets of nature". On the technical level, Dorian Gray is a horror movie in more ways than one. The settings are either terribly claustrophobic or tiresome and gaudy. Montage is virtually non-existent as a means of heightening tension in moments of crisis. The actors, incompetent in their own right, are further devalued by being made-up and costumed as stereotypes and caricatures.

Worst of all the technical failings is the atrocious quality of the sound. As if matters are not bad enough, the picture and the voices are unsynchronized throughout major portions of the film. In one sequence it is impossible to tell whether the sound trails after the image, or if the actors are foreigners whose dialogue has been badly dubbed.

The failure of The Secret of Dorian Gray is very much unlike the garbage churned out by Andy Warhol or Russ Meyer. I forgive the latter directors for their monumental shortcomings, since they cannot be expected to produce anything of value when they have nothing at all to work with. However, when a film company starts out with such potentially intriguing material as Wilde's novel and then makes horseshit out of it, the result is both inachievement and a great sense of loss.

TWP show exciting in production

By SUZANNE ROULEAU

Visual excitement is the essential quality of George Luscombe's Theatre Workshop Production of The Piper by Nancy Jowsey. This is most amazing since the play itself is basically static.

The intrigue, based on the Pied Piper of Hamelin, begins with the calling of a general meeting of all rats to discuss possible measures to cope with overpopulation, pollution, the food crisis, etc. . . . They decide to exterminate man. We then see the townspeople, with speeches from the mayor, talk of finances and erection of monuments, all very windy. The play goes on, loosely following the story, presenting us with both points of view, satirizing both man and the world of politics. There seems to be only one permissible tone of voice: shouting.

The set, by Miss Jowsey, (this is her first) is excellent, a sort of elevated castle of Swiss cheese. The rats' tails, dragging noisily as the actors scurry about, the use of lighting and the projection of a film strip of rat-like designs are very effective in recreating the horror of a swarming invasion.

The play itself is essentially boring, consisting primarily of long political speeches and satires, only briefly interesting or funny. The production is most successful and exciting when it is most removed from what the author is trying to do. George Luscombe has really done miracles with it.

Claims "kids" are conservative

By BILL MACVICAR

New Reformation: Notes of a Neolithic Conservative by Paul Goodman, Random House.

Paul Goodman, the quiet, almost ingenuous anarchist, has finally articulated what he and other noteworthy critics (the left-conservative Norman Mailer, the right-superliberal Garry Willis) have been on to for a long time: that the "kids", purged of their swashbuckling rhetoric and loud-mouth spokesmen, are motivated by principles essentially conservative.

Their desire to break down a monster social machine which has developed appetites and goals of its own, counter to the weal of its owners; their stubborn demand to take control of their own lives; their recognition that red tape usually strangles the people whose problems it should expedite; these are, in sum, a gut rebellion against arthritic, obese liberalism.

The book's subtitle is not (as I first thought) the grump of an aging Leftist burning down into a reactionary cinder, but an exhortation to a vigorous reclaiming of rights from a state that has, through osmosis and expediency, gobbled up too many of them.

Back in the Golden Age of Eisenhower, Goodman was telling us what a mess education was in, and he returns to this perdurable theme, proposing some changes: since most useful knowledge is picked up on the periphery of formal education, create community groups which can better serve that socio-didactic function; let all sorts of people, not just certified (ossified?) degree-holders take a hand in education; break up the chain-gang march from kindergarten to the Ph.D. — those who can get what they want only out of college will find their way there.

When a political system ostensibly motivated by a whole society starts turning out products irrelevant or even noxious to some (or all) of that society, it has lost its legitimacy. That this has happened Goodman infers from the attitudes of protestors: "I see a good deal of calculation of consequences, and . . . an admirable courage and patriotism: but I have not seen any signs of inner tragic conflict" which would result if the law was deemed to have moral force.

He gives scientists and technologists moral responsibility and control over their work, but disposes neatly of some facile judgements about priorities: it is pointless to bray about the billions spent on space while people starve, for science is our religion and moonshots are our cathedrals.

"When Eldridge Cleaver calls it a circus, it is understandable polemical spite. When Noam Chomsky calls it a circus, it seems to me a rather inexcusable snobbery, as if only professors at MIT have a right to play nable and exciting games . . . A part of living well is to waste money you can't afford on big excitement, curiosity, and a better level of chatter."

Goodman's quiet sincerity sets him apart from those who lose no opportunity to beat their solidarity with whatever the kids are up to now, and those who insanely berate them. A palpable love for youth animates his work, but he writes: "Except for a few, I am not impressed by their moral courage or even honesty . . . They are quite lacking in personality. They do not have world enough to have strong character. But they keep pouring out a kind of metaphysical vitality."

He deplores their unwillingness to take any responsibility for the society they have inherited: "It is as if they are about to abandon an old house and therefore it makes no difference if they litter it with beer cans."

The spiky topical illustration and deft command of history and politics are at least as valuable as the book's theses. The metaphor of the title, an extended parallel between today's revolt and the Protestant Reformation, is, Goodman admits, not really essential, "But the reason I spell it out is that perhaps some young person will suddenly remember that history is about something."

Abortion service profits on New York run

By DONNY TAYMEN

This cryptic ad (at right), which has been appearing in various forms in this fall's Varsity has caught the interest of many of us in the women's lib abortion collective.

Finally, last week we were able to check out to a limited extent some of the background of the group placing the ad and the details of their so-called service.

I say "to a limited extent" for a good reason. The organization through its roving promotional representative, Ron Wise, is seemingly uninformed on some details of its abortion services and very reluctant to discuss many aspects of his organization.

However two things are very clear: (1) the group's assertion that OHSIP pays the fees is in fact a fraudulent lie; (2) contrary to the calculated impression given by the promotional literature and representatives, the organization is not an idealistic venture designed to meet the real needs of pregnant women but is a small moneymaking operation hoping to capitalize on a degree of difficulty getting a New York state abortion and the resulting necessity of having to have connections to get one.

But more particularly, Wise is hoping to capitalize on the very restrictive abortion laws in Canada, and the desperation of women burdened with an unwanted pregnancy.

OHSIP confirms that it will pay 90% of the OMA schedule of fees for approved abortions done in New York state. However this works out to $67.50 for a procedure done under 10 weeks which doesn't amount to much beside the current New York rates of $250 and up.

OHSIP (Ontario Hospital Services Commission) will pay 75% of in-patient hospital services for

New York state abortions. However, both OHSIP and OHSC are quick to point out payment of claims will only be approved if the claims departments are satisfied that the conditions under which the abortion was performed fulfilled the requirements of Canadian law — a policy likely to involve a lot of time and energy on the part of women and little in the way of results.

More disturbing than the lie about the money, is the economic exploitation by this New York abortion agency of the idealism of the various groups involved in abortion referral in Toronto and the economic exploitation of the misery of the women who have the misfortune to get involved with this organization.

Wise, representing the agency was in Toronto last week promoting his service. He attended a meeting of the women's lib abortion collective and presented promotional literature from the Pregnancy Control Centre, Inc. at a New York City address. Also available was a list of the abortion procedures available ranging in price from $285 to $375.

He also created the distinct impression his organization was a private hospital willing to satisfy the demand for abortions possibly up to its full bed capacity.

On close questioning, though, all of these impressions proved to have no basis. The wide range of services includes getting a woman an abortion as fast as she can give them her money. That is just about it, unless you consider instructions on how to get from the airport to the hospital, and briefing on what you can expect at your destination as additional services.

The organization consists of the executive chairman, Warren Wise, his brother, Ron, two other "founding members", the 9 a.m. to 11 p.m. answering service and now a social worker. It is not a hospital but merely an agency very much like an employment agency channelling women at the present rate of 30 to 40 per week to one of six doctors mostly at one hospital. They hope to be able to handle up to 100 women a week — all for a suitable commission, of course.

Wise stated that if the Toronto abortion collective could direct sufficient numbers of women to his agency, a reduction in rates could be negotiated with the possibility of doing an occasional free abortion. "Yes," he was sympathetic to the aims of women's lib, but "you couldn't expect us to undertake the expenses involved if we weren't going to make money."

For an organization advertising its prompt and comprehensive service, its roving representative had disturbing gaps in his knowledge about the abortion procedures available — a situation not likely to inspire confidence in the mind of anyone using its service.

Gradually I realized why he was so elusive in describing his organization. In Toronto, any groups involved in abortion referral work are voluntary and non-profit reform groups — people not likely to be sympathetic to organizations profit-making in this area.

So, I feel exploited, and I'm only involved in the referral end of the abortion situation. What about the woman who finds herself in need of an abortion and is directed to this group? Well, we don't know what happens then. We suppose, at best, she comes out of it minus anywhere from $400 to $1,000, possibly a good abortion and a feeling of being exploited only slightly greater than when dealing with the average funeral director. (The difference being the funeral director doesn't usually insist on payment before he delivers the goods.)

Possibly she would end up with just plain poor service creating problems which we could only speculate about at this point.

To me the existence of this group illustrates an additional dimension to the abortion problem — a problem which could be met by the passage of an abortion law guaranteeing free access to abortion limited neither by personal finances nor shortage of facilities thus making profiteering by abortion agencies impossible.

GSU wants 100% Canadian U of T junior staff quota

A quota requiring 100% of junior staff at the University of Toronto to be Canadian citizens was recommended Monday night by the General Council of the Graduate Students Union.

The council also called for an overall quota of 85% for all faculties or departments at U of T. Of the remaining 15%, 1/2 could be from any one country.

With this motion, the U of T joins Lakehead University and the Association of Alberta Students in student support for a quota. The Lakehead Alma Mater Society recently endorsed the demands of the Canadian Liberation Movement petition for an 85% quota and a brief from the Association of Alberta Students called for a 90% quota a number of months ago.

The GSU motion comes in the wake of debate on the recently released GSU report on job opportunities for graduate students, "Who Needs the PhD?" by Marjaleena Repo.

The motion for the quota was an amendment to an original recommendation in the report for a quota of two-thirds Canadian. Larry Hoffman, GSU president, told the meeting that a survey taken by the GSU last February revealed that a majority of the graduate students who responded to a question on citizenship of faculty wanted a quota of anywhere from 70% to 100%. Of the Canadians queried, 85% called for such a quota, and to a question as to whether the GSU should express an opinion on citizenship, students agreed by over 5 to 1.

Another startling revelation from a study of job opportunities shows that even a 100% quota on all faculty would not employ all the Canadian PhD's who apply for teaching jobs in Canadian universities. This does not include the MA's and Phil M's who outnumber the available jobs by almost 4 to 1. This is based on the fact that in recent years, Canadian universities have filled only 27% of available positions with PhD's.

In 1969-70, 77% of all new positions were filled by foreign citizens and half of those were American. This is actually a slight decrease from the year before when foreign professors accounted for 85% of all new hirings.

It was also pointed out at the meeting that there is now an overall freeze on hiring in Canadian universities as well as most in the United States. For this reason, it is not likely that Canadian universities will be expanding to meet the surfeit of qualified Canadians.

Hoffman, a landed immigrant from the U.S. who intends to become a Canadian citizen as soon as he can, said the motion was very encouraging, and the sign of a national movement.

"And even though graduate students are most affected now, it really affects our whole culture. Canadian kids are not learning about Canada because they're being taught by people who don't know anything about the country."

Some graduate students in small growing departments expressed concern that such a quota would limit the growth of their disciplines in Canada.

Quotas however apply only to permanent teaching positions and do not refer to visiting professors or temporary appointments. It was also agreed that Canadian universities had to build up their own departments and that they had to challenge the definitions of excellence set by American universities.

Another important motion that the council passed was a call for the abolition of the two-year tax-free privileges enjoyed by foreign professors in Canada. They also recommended that "the Federal government collect information on citizenship and rank of all university and community college teachers hired during 1969-70 and annually thereafter and that this information be made public."

It was agreed that not permitting further expansion of graduate schools in Ontario would be extremely dangerous, and would, in fact, help the Government in its present policy of cutting back on education expenditures. Such a solution was said to ignore the real problems behind the job crisis — the overproduction of PhD's for a branch plant economy and the hiring of foreign academics to the detriment of Canadian citizens.

We went to Birks because we knew that's where we'd get the most diamond his hard-earned money could buy. Not something tiny for a fortune. And not something big and bright worth very little.

Fencers wound York, Waterloo

Imre Hennyey (Varsity fencing coach) reflected on "a good result against experienced opposition" last Saturday in an exhibition meet against squads from York and Waterloo at Hart House.

In fact, over-confidence afflicted several Blues' fencers which, from the York and Waterloo point of view, prevented a complete whitewash.

The Varsity results were: Toronto 20-Waterloo 7. Toronto 14-York 4.

Excellent fencing developed in the foil — notably by Oscar Wong (undefeated) and Johannes Karcynski (one defeat). Carmen Con-fort (two defeats) was outstanding for Varsity's second foil team in their victories over York (8-1), Waterloo's second team (6-3) and their loss to Waterloo's first team.

Varsity's strong suit, epee, dominated Waterloo with Rowland Griffin and David Duthie undefeated. Kirk Johnston provided Waterloo's limited opposition.

B-Ball girls down Loyola

The hitherto unsung Women's Inter-collegiate Basketball team managed to come through with lily colors in their first league game last Saturday.

Playing in the Benson Building, they defeated Loyola College convincingly 51-19.

Highest scorer in the game was Melanie Tennant (PHE II) with 14 points followed by Jenny Glass (Pharm. II) with 7 points.

Loyola forced an evenly matched first half, keeping the play fairly tight and also scoring many points from Toronto mistakes. In the second half, however, it was a different story.

Playing superbly, both offensively and defensively, Toronto kept Loyola away from the basket and managed, at the same time, to increase their own shooting percentages.

Coach Sandy Nimmo says that they could have played better, but she was very pleased with the first victory of the season.

Semis go tomorrow

Lacrosse

The interfac lacrosse playoffs for the Dr. W. A. Dafeo Trophy are always one of the most popular sporting events on campus.

This season's playdowns got underway Monday afternoon in Hart House as the eight quarter-finalists began action. St. Mikes "A", one of the finalists last year, defeated PHE "B" 10-7 in one quarter-final match.

Another game yesterday afternoon saw Erindale join St. Mikes in the semi-final bracket with a 8-3 decision over Engineering.

The other two first-round games will feature defending champs PHE "A" against Innis College and Knox versus Scarboro.

The winners of those two games will meet in the first semi-final match-up tomorrow at 1.00 p.m.

The second semi-final game will follow at 6.30 and will feature St. Mikes "A" and Erindale.

Championship swim team sees first action

In their first official outing of the season, the Varsity swim team travels to McMaster on Saturday evening to defend their title in the annual OQAA Relay Meet.

In his third year as head coach, Robin Campbell masterminds a powerful group of swimmers who have won ten consecutive OQAA league championships, are five times defending national CIAU champs, and have also won the OQAA relays each time in their four-year existence.

Blues have lost no-one from the 1969-70 CIAU championship team and have attracted several promising freshmen plus skilled butterfly and freestyle sprinter Alex Fedko from Simon Fraser University in British Columbia.

National champion Jim Adams anchors the free style events ably assisted by five-year CIAU veteran Doug MacIntosh and John Peters. Theo Van Ryn, six-year veteran and Canadian record-holder, will unfortunately be absent from the freestyle lineup as he is getting married on Saturday. Doug MacIntosh will further deplete the reserves by acting as an usher.

In the backstroke, Varsity has another National recordholder and Olympic finalist in Jim Shaw. Included on his relay team are three members of the Canadian team at the recent World Student Games in Italy — co-captains Barry Bowerman and Mike Guinness plus sprinter John Twohig.

The 10-event programme was conceived as a low pressure meet for maximum participation.

The Blues, however, will use the meet to gain sprint times for the Top-Fifteen listings that will come out starting next week and each successive week until the end of the season. Top on the list after the week-end should be CIAU record-holder Bob Heatley in the butterfly and Ross Ballantyne in the breaststroke.

With these talented veterans in the lineup, it's hard for a freshman to win a starting spot but three exceptional rookies have made the grade — Nick Rottman (breaststroke), versatile Russ Farquhar and Zvi Eldar (fly).

For those interested the meet will be taped by CHCH Channel 11 in Hamilton for broadcast later in December.

Blue Notes: The following members of the Blues swim team hold current OQAA records: Theo Van Ryn and Jim Adams (50-yard free — 22.2), Ross Ballantyne (100 yard Breast — 1:03.4), Jim Shaw (100 yard Back — 55.2), Ross Heatley (100 yard fly — 53.0), Mike Guinness (200 yard free — 1:50.0), Jim Hawes (200 yard back — 2:01.2).

Board tosses out CUG-like body; 72 won't govern

The Board of Governors has rejected as "inappropriate" a proposed single 72 member governing body for the university which would replace the board.

Currently the university is ruled on a two-tiered system with the senate responsible for academic affairs and the board of governors for financial concerns.

O. D. Vaughan, chairman of the board, said a majority of the members of the board shared the feeling that the proposed 72 member body was not feasible.

He said the new body suggested by the University-Wide Committee is too large and would be unwieldy. "If a unicameral structure is decided upon, we would recommend a much smaller council," he added.

Recommendations to replace the board of governors were made last fall by the Commission on University Government.

Members of the Commission included two governors, faculty, students and senators and Claude Bissell.

After ten months of study, the Commission recommended that a 72 member body govern the university consisting of 21 faculty members, 14 students, 14 laymen, ten alumni, six support staff and seven administrators including the president.

The board now consists of 32 members, including all government appointees from outside the university and the president.

Vaughan said it is important that the top governing body at the university include an effective majority of Government appointees. These government appointees should have the responsibility and authority of making the final decisions on financial matters, including salaries and overall broad budget considerations.

"It is essential that there be a strong Executive Committee to provide leadership for the top governing body and that the University maintain a strong and properly structured administration to deal with the problems of such a complex problem as the University of Toronto," Vaughan said.

In rejecting the proposed body, the Board of Governors is again striking a blow contrary to the spirit of CUG which calls for stronger student and faculty representation at all levels of university government.

Does the procedure for the selection of a successor to Robin Harris matter to Innis students?

Plans set to select Innis chief

By SUSAN REISLER

The solution to the selection procedures for the new principal of Innis College who will replace retiring principal Robin Harris will probably be announced at an emergency meeting of the Innis College Council Monday.

Harris resigned last spring but it wasn't until late October that people began discussing the composition of the search committee to appoint his successor.

Innis College has been run by a council composed on a parity basis for the last three years. It consists of nineteen students and nineteen non-students.

At a special council meeting Nov. 24 a motion was passed (14 to 2) recommending a search committee of five students and five non-students, with three faculty members being elected by the faculty members of council.

This recommendation was passed on to Claude Bissell, president of the University of Toronto who rejected it Tuesday saying it, "goes far beyond even the recommendations of CUG."

Bissell, in a letter to Harris, said the selection procedure should follow the recommendations of the Haist Committee, appointed by Bissell in 1967 to study selection procedures. This committee recommends the President appoint a special committee for the selection of the principal.

The committee would consist of the Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science, the Dean of the School of Graduate Studies, a senior academic administrator, five to seven members of the council of the college and three other persons from within or outside the University.

Although Bissell recognized that Innis College is run as a parity institution, he felt that parity on the search would create opposition between faculty and students in their search for a successor.

Peter Beyer, president of the Innis College Student Society and an ex officio member of the Innis College Council said he thought the Council would accept Bissell's proposal. The motion on Nov. 24 was "symbolic" he said.

"We are reluctant to accept it (the Haist recommendation) but we will because of expediency," he said.

Quebecois lead 2-day teach-in

By SUSAN REISLER

James Cross is free, the headlines tell us. The ordeal is over. This may be true for some people, but for the majority of Quebecois, things have only become worse.

The teach-in on Quebec planned for tonight and tomorrow in St. Luke's United Church (corner of Sherbourne and Carleton) will be important because it will inform English Canadians how the nightmare, as Trudeau calls it, is still very much of a reality for the majority of Quebecois.

Jacques Desmarais, a representative of the Council of National Trade Unions told the Varsity in a telephone interview Wednesday. "There is much information that has to be talked about concerning the actual crisis in Quebec."

"We have to inform people about what's going on so they can make accurate judgements," he said.

That is the purpose of the teach-in — to inform people about what is taking place in Quebec. Speakers will explain how the release of James Cross will not alleviate the repression that exists.

Most of the progressive segments of Quebec society will be represented. All of the participants have been affected by the government attempts to smash separatism and keep a tight control over Quebec.

During the course of the weekend they will attempt to put what has happened into perspective to show that for them, the ordeal has just begun.

There are still 49 prisoners being held because of the War Measures act and the new Public Order Act. They face sentences from five years to the death penalty. People may still be arrested if the State thinks it can prove they once had some affiliation with the Front de Liberation du Quebec.

The teach-in will feature the following:

- Jean-Marc Ptiotte — Professor of Political Science, University of Quebec
- Gaston Therrien — FRAP, Mouvement de Liberation du Taxi
- Michel Bourdon — V.P. Montreal Council of CNTU, lured by CBC
- Jackie Brown — Committee for a Free Quebec
- Pierre Cloutier — Defense lawyer for Valheres, Gagnon, Chartrand and Lemieux.
- Michel Pichette — Comite pour la Defense des Libertes Civiles
- Paul Copeland — Toronto Civil Liberties Lawyer, Law Union
- David Macdonald — MP-Progressive Conservative — Egmont, sole voter against Public Order Temporary Measures Act.
- Ronald Lanier — Quarter Latin staff
- John Sewell — Alderman for Ward 7.

Engineering summer work rule to stay

Degrees could be withheld

Engineers who fail to get summer jobs may once again find their degrees being withheld, as the Faculty Council of Applied Science and Engineering settled at their meeting on Tuesday the question of "practical experience" for another academic year. For over half a century all Engineering students have been required to work for 600 hours (roughly one summer) at a job related to their field of study. Within the past few years, several students who have failed to get this employment requirement have had their degrees withheld until they had fulfilled the requirement.

At a meeting last spring, the Committee on Curriculum presented a report urging the discontinuation of the necessity of "practical experience" as a requirement for a B.A.Sc. (The committee decision was based on several factors of which the difficulty of finding summer employment was only one. The question of the purpose of "practical experience" was raised, as so few engineers get jobs that are related directly to their education. There was also a feeling that if employment were to be a prerequisite for a degree, then the university had a responsibility to guarantee the necessary employment.) At that time, Prof. T. C. Kenney, chairman of the Dept. of Civil Engineering, warned that if the "practical experience" requirement were dropped, that his department would continue to require it as part of their individual program. The motion to discontinue the requirement failed.

On Tuesday Dec. 1st, the Curriculum Committee again reported to the Faculty Council, which now has about 200 faculty members, and 24 student members (and meets in closed session). This time the committee again recommended the abolition of "practical experience" as a requirement for a degree, but with the stipulation that individual departments could, if they wished, re-institute the 'summer of work' requirements in their own programs. This recommendation was acceptable to the student representatives.

For W. R. Rapson (Chemical Engineering), a member of the President's Advisory Council moved an amendment to the original motion such that the Faculty retain the present policy, but permit individual departments to request permission to drop it.

Several student members spoke against the amendment, saying it would not facilitate the necessary reassessment of this policy, there was fear some departments might simply choose to do nothing, thus effectively retaining the policy, rather than taking time to discuss it, especially in the present context of scarce summer employment. One student pointed out the lack of any printed, workable definition of what constituted "practical experience."

In a hastily-called vote, it appeared that Rapson's amendment had been defeated; Professor Rapson immediately called for a standing vote. In the new vote, it appeared that some faculty members had second thoughts, and the amendment was carried.

All students present voted against the amendment.

As the vote on the amended motion was called, Prof. Rapson commented, "I'm sure the students will support the report. This is what they want."

Under the circumstances, the students had no choice but to support the motion as amended in the hope that some departments would reassess this historic policy.

Windlass opposed at meeting of area residents

By ERIC MILLS
The City Planning Board was forced to ask for citizen participation in urban planning and last night they really got it.

At a public meeting held at the University Settlement House on the proposed change to the Official Plan in order to accommodate a Windlass Holdings development, only two of over 25 speakers supported the change.

One of these two was Alderman June Marks, well known for opposing community control.

Speaker after speaker, representing local ratepayers' groups, the Chinese community, SAC (Vince Dolan) churches and ordinary citizens opposed the three tower highrise and commercial development.

Most wanted a complete study of the area between University and Spadina before any further development. Many of these clearly desires that no high-rise be allowed, in order to preserve the area's unique character and varied uses.

More than 200 people, including about 50 Chinese residents attended the meeting.

Quebecois speaks here

Jean-Marc Pottie, keynote speaker for the Quebec teach-in to be held this weekend (see story in paper) will be speaking in Sid Smith, Room 2118 today at 1:00 p.m., at a meeting sponsored by SAC.

Pottie is a member of the Quebec Committee for the Defense of Civil Liberties and a political economy professor at the University of Quebec.

He has recently completed an analysis of the economic situation in Quebec and will have relevant information about the events that have taken place in Quebec over the past two months.

Public Order Act

Substitute legislation for WMA changes nothing in Quebec

By SUSAN REISLER
Canadian University Press

The bill Public Order Temporary Measures Act, 1970 (POTMA) became federal law in Canada this week, putting the emergency War Measures Act back in mothballs till next time.

English Canada can breathe a sigh of relief — and forget all about Quebec again until the next "state of apprehended insurrection".

The new Public Order Act does not change anything in Quebec.

What does it really say?

The third and eighth sections probably contain the most important portions. Section 3 says:

"The group of persons or association known as Le Front de Liberation du Quebec and any successor groups or successor organization of the said Front de Liberation du Quebec, or any group of persons or association that advocates the use of force or the commission of crime as a means of or as an aid in accomplishing the same or substantially the same governmental change within Canada as that advocated by the said Le Front de Liberation du Quebec, is declared to be an unlawful organization."

This clearly is an attempt by the government to smash all real forms of extra-parliamentary opposition. The only legal opposition, in effect, is that in the House of Commons.

The people of Quebec are left to the mercy of career politicians who have yet to provide any real solutions to their problems. Neither the Bourassa nor the Trudeau governments has been able to solve the unemployment problem in Quebec, let alone the problem of language discrimination and its racist ramifications.

THE NEW LEGISLATION DOES NOTHING to protect the people. It ensures that the Trudeau-style government will stay in power despite the multitude of problems which Trudeau and others like him will never solve. Only very fundamental changes in our society can do that. And this is what the politicians are trying to avoid — by outlawing any attempt to oppose their power with popular action.

The only "violence" under consideration now, is the violence which, in anger and frustration, is directed against a wealthy and powerful few.

Institutionalized violence — emotional, psychological, physical, economic — is ignored and allowed to run rampant.

According to Quebec-Presse, the FLQ Manifesto received the support of over 50 per cent of the Quebecois (only 25 per cent of the population is English-speaking) indicating that the Quebecois know they have been treated unjustly. But no new legislation has been proposed to alleviate their very real grievances.

In fact the reasons behind the actions of the FLQ have been completely obscured by the publicity given to the government in its hunt for the kidnapers. The Act deals with law and order in total isolation from the human needs of the majority of people in Quebec.

Section 3 of POTMA affects all left movements in Canada which support the liberation of Quebec. It is possible for any of the provincial governments to charge a left group under the POTMA, citing their support of the "Le Quebec Libre" as evidence.

IF A PERSON IS CHARGED UNDER THE LAW, it is up to the person to prove he is innocent. The law automatically assumes the person charged is guilty in this case.

Which leads to the second entry in the POTMA, section 8:

"In any prosecution for an offence under this act, evidence that any person, either before or after the coming into force of this act is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that he is a member of the unlawful association."

The act is retroactive. Anyone who over the years has supported the FLQ through its various stages of development, or who has supported similar movements, is liable to five years imprisonment, unless the person can sufficiently convince the courts that he no longer shares the same beliefs (hopes? ideals?).

Both section 3 and section 8 will be extremely important in the upcoming trials in Quebec. Visibly or invisibly, they will be the cause of heavy repression throughout Canada, forcing many people to keep silent about their opposition for fear of being charged with conspiracy or treason. The law is vague enough to apply to all the factions of the left in Canada and in Quebec.

THE POLICE MAINTAIN their extraordinary powers under the new legislation. They have the right to search, arrest and seize documents without a warrant.

The only actual change with POTMA is the reduction of time a person may be detained without being charged and brought to trial. The person arrested has to be charged within three days or released, instead of the seven days specified under the WMA. The maximum period of detention without charges is reduced to seven from 21.

THE REAL CRUX OF THE PROBLEM has been avoided. It is buried. The Trudeau government has been victorious in deceiving the people of Canada. We no longer think about the oppression of the Quebecois, but concentrate on how law and order may be maintained.

Unemployment is still between 12 and 15 per cent in Quebec. Almost all of those unemployed are French and a good majority are under 25 years of age.

POTMA will not solve these kinds of problems in Quebec. Law and order cannot deal with the larger social problems.

And what will they give us next?

Business Briefs: INCO relations 'lousy'

By ADAM SMITH

International Nickel Co. of Canada Ltd has started on a propaganda program to improve what executives describe as a history of "lousy" labour and industrial relations.

One of the first steps taken to spruce up the multi-million dollar corporation that runs company towns in Sudbury, Ont., and Thompson, Man., was a beef session held by management with Sudbury and Port Colborne locals of the United States-affiliated United Steelworkers of America.

The corporation's move to co-opt its workers came shortly after the two locals elected more militant leadership following a 128-day strike.

To help the plan along, the company brought in what the Toronto Globe and Mail describes as "an aggressive, plain-speaking and progressively minded vice-president of industrial relations and personnel" from the U.S.

The Globe and Mail says: "It is generally conceded within Inco that the company has neglected the human element in its concentration on production and that there is not enough sensitivity shown to workers as individuals."

Admissions of psychiatric patients increased by five per cent to 92,885 persons during 1969, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports.

Half of those patients were admitted for the first time. Among men, the median age was 37, and the most common diagnosis was alcoholism. Among women, the median age was 36, and the most common diagnosis was neurosis.

Of 92,075 in-patients discharged in 1969, 56% had stayed less than one month, 31% on to four months and 6% four to 12 months.

Funeral directors in Upper Canada are getting worried about inroads being made by U.S. owned death parlours in Canada.

So far, the Americans haven't taken over many funeral homes — 34 out of 1,400 in the country in the past two years — but the amount of capital they have behind them is what worries funeral directors especially in Ontario.

A spokesman for the Metro Toronto Funeral Director's Association said members are concerned about the invasion "and we feel prices will go up with U.S. promoters."

The market is a lucrative one for either Canadian or American firms. The Death business has been looking up in recent years.

In 1964, there were 147,367 deaths in Canada. In 1968 there were 153,196, an increase of nearly 6,000. The average price of a funeral is about $600, which means the increased take in five years amounts to $3.6 million.

"Canada's First Bank" the Bank of Montreal has apparently decided that the U.S. based public relations firms are better equipped to think up advertising and propaganda campaigns for Canadian than are P.R. firms in Canada.

The bank has switched its $12 million advertising account from a Toronto company to the Canadian branch of a company controlled 95% from the fatherland. The U.S.A.

Judgment judges understanding

"WHAT DO WE HAVE HERE?" is supposed to be the most powerful question that can be asked. Well, what do we have here?

There are certain things you only begin to notice after you've been up all night working on the Varsity and wondering if it will get delivered because the guy who delivers to where you picked it up got arrested with eight other people and is in jail. Detention. Police custody. Incarceration. Prison.

Well you read all that on Wednesday and the paper did get delivered, right? Everyone mentioned in the story was released on bail by about noon Wednesday. The bail was $100-$250 and people were generous.

After three days of grey damp weather Wednesday dawned a spectacularly beautiful clear sunny-blue, 10 o'clock was court time. Numbed I went along anyway. The weather and spirit of the group sustained and carried me. Good people. Good day.

OLD CITY HALL, DESPITE ITS GROTESQUE EXTERIOR is really beautiful once you get inside. The floors have a simple and attractive coloured-mosaic pattern while the high ceilings have elaborately beautiful relief along the edges and trim.

The halls are filled with a conspicuously divided group. Young people and various police. The burly plainclothes police oink guiltily to each other while faking suspicious glances and penetrating "familiarization-with-the-enemy" stares at us.

Other than the police, everyone is open and exudes friendly interest. There is an unstated understanding among everyone here. None of the accused is guilty. We are only here today to see if the police and the courts have found out yet.

The lawyers are friendly-busy and the bureaucrats look busy with papercarrying. Market. Bazaar. Festival. The Incredible String Band sing a verse: "Ain't got no home in this world any more. Ain't got no home in this world any more. Farewell sorrow, Praise God the open door. Ain't got no home in this world any more." People clap, dance, sing and smile. THE COURTROOM IS ANOTHER WORLD. A weird blend of grade school-army-joke-inferno.

"... WHO HAVE BUSINESS ENTER?" a large angry faced cop announces the play is about to begin, after a ritual locking followed by the opening of the courtroom doors.

The center of the room has a cage and two nukes for defending prisoners who come up from the cells beneath the room. Honest.

Our severe faced friend does a remarkable display of grade-two teacher psychic fascism: "TAKE THAT GUM OUT OF YOUR MOUTH YOU TOO!"

The judge appears but he, like the police, is entirely absent, unconscious sadists. A show they've done literally a thousand times. No wonder they hate the accused. Each moment the accused change and vary in form and information. The king ogre must remain the same, as must the attendants. Evidently unaware of the employment situation in the country, he asks each one if they have a job. Answers vary and those that don't, have to get one within a month or else.

THE ACCUSED ARE VARIOUSLY SUBMISSIVE, uncertain, confused, numbed and uniformly unable to bring the fantastic performance to a halt. They want justice. I want mercy. They are charged. I charge the court. They were arrested. I arrest the police. They were sentenced. I sentence the judge. They were imprisoned. I imprison the police.

There is a book by Menninger, who studied the process carefully called The Crime of Punishment. Dig it.

The police should be sentenced to solve the problems of each person they arrest. Right Now!!

WHAT DO WE HAVE HERE?

We got poverty. Unemployment. Fear. War. Hunger. Inadequate housing. Inflation. Starvation. Catastrophe. Disease. Pollution. Waste. Violence. Despair. Death. And amid all these are people trying to survive, to grow, to evolve, to LIVE. There are children being born and with the challenge of all reality surely to God the police and courts and lawyers and judges and legislators are going to think of something more interesting to do than find people to punish!

OH NOBLY BORN!

Change, create, live, love God

WE ALL ARE ONE.

"That from this day forward, the people of Lower Canada are absolved from all allegiance to Great Britain, and that the political connexion between that power and Lower Canada is now dissolved."

"That a republican form of government is best suited to Lower Canada, which is this day declared to be a republic."

The crisis is not over

James Cross is free.

At this point it's not entirely clear how this event came about. Robert Bourassa is claiming that all credit belongs to the police forces who ferreted out the Cross hideaway. On the other hand, Pierre Elliott Trudeau contradicts this when he states that members of the Front de libération du Québec telephoned police early Thursday morning, asking to make a deal for Cross' life, the same deal they had turned down weeks earlier.

But regardless of how the end to the so-called "kidnap drama" came about, Trudeau, Bourassa and others are trying already to consign it to the custody of old memories.

At a press conference yesterday, for instance, Trudeau, smiling, was announcing that the events of the last 60 days are "a nightmare which has passed into history."

It's wishful thinking on his part.

Because this particular set of kidnappings is over, he and other spokesmen for the ruling authorities are trying to say, the entire crisis in Quebec is also at an end.

This is not so, and they know it very well.

They know that the FLQ, when it kidnapped Cross and later Laporte, was not acting against the people of Quebecois, but on their behalf.

This became perfectly clear when Trudeau committed his basic tactical mistake — authorizing the broadcast of the Manifesto of the FLQ.

The political analysis of the Manifesto, and the aims and political objectives they expressed, articulated very concisely the mood of the Quebecois. It was this response that forced the federal government to come down with a heavy hand.

In the Montreal weekly, Quebec-Press, Pierre Desrosiers, wrote: "The fact is that during the second week that the Act appeared . . . the radio station hot line shows during that the announcers conversed with the listeners, these stations revealed that more than 50 per cent of the listeners of the popular French stations heavily supported the Manifesto of the FLQ."

"Of course, the majority of the callers rejected the tactics of the front. But at the same time, the majority supported the idea of forceful change in society."

"One listener said herself: 'I would rather be the mother of a member of the FLQ than the mother of a mercenary politician."

"This unsuspected force entirely changed the strategy of Trudeau. Jean Marchand himself declared in a Radio Canada interview, that the federal government was amazed to observe the people's support for the Manifesto."

What all this indicates is that the roots of the present crisis are deeply ingrained in the hard social and economic facts of Quebec.

The end of the "kidnap crisis" has not resolved any of the fundamental issues — it has, in fact, made some of them clearer.

"The revolution will not be made by a hundred people, as the authorities want everyone to believe, but by the whole population," the FLQ said, in one communique, "The only true power of the people is power exercised by the people and for the people. The FLQ leaves coups d'états to the three governments in office . . ."

During the present crisis, the Quebecois learned that they have nothing to fear except from those who face the loss of their power.

Who needs a PhD? — three views of the GSU report

Repo defends report, attacks 'clumsy acrobatics'

Assistant professor of sociology, Lorne Tepperman, was in too much of a hurry to criticize my report, Who needs the PhD?, that he missed some essential points in the methodological note, which I specifically wrote for the benefit of assistant professors in sociology, to prevent them from playing their inevitable numbers games.

I failed, however, simply because Lorne Tepperman cannot read and does not know how to add. I will try again, patiently.

Our group of 190 PhD level jobseekers (All But Dissertation, PhD completed and Post-Doctoral Fellows) came as close to the total jobseeking PhD level population as I could have hoped for, that is, above the 70 per cent, which Professor Tepperman needed to concede the validity of the report's findings.

The total of new PhDs and ABDs seeking employment, which the SGS survey came up with, was 207 (excluding 35 from OISE, since we did not cover OISE in our study). In the SGS population there were, however, people who looked for post-doctoral fellowships only and these we did not include in our study, since they could not talk about the actual job situation. Instead we included a total of 46 PDFs who were presently on the job market. (These PDFs, as the study pointed out, are never included in anybody's statistics, since they have officially "graduated" and have presumably left the university or have transferred to another university.)

If we would have accepted the SGS total of 207 as an accurate number, ours would have constituted 91.8 per cent of the total population, but since we criticized the SGS for having seriously underestimated the job seeking group in various departments (which were spelled out in the study), I would raise the actual total to c 240 (still excluding OISE), which would leave us with a sample of 80 per cent of all PhD level jobseekers (All the above information, except the percentages, was included in the methodological note that Tepperman so carefully studied.)

As for the absurd suggestion that we should have collected an ability or performance record on all these 190 PhD's, that is just another vain attempt to avoid coming

Cockell's view:

HERE YOU GO MY BOY, WE LIKE OUR P.H.D.'S TO BE FAMILIAR WITH THE RUNNING OF THE FACTORY to terms with reality and an equally futile attempt to guilt the individuals who are presently either unemployed or underemployed.

The study proves, I think, conclusively, through quantitative and qualitative data, that qualifications are no longer the issue.

The jobs simply are extremely scarce and too many of them are going to foreign citizens (see the immigration statistics included in the study.) That is why all the recommendations, big and small, follow logically from the data, whether Tepperman likes the implications of these recommendations or not.

If it is the recommendations he is opposed to, I wish he would have stated so, instead of performing his clumsy acrobatics.

Marjaaleena Repo

A call for creative job alternatives

Yes, it is harder for PhD's to find jobs now. Thanks to the Graduate Students' Union for pointing it out so insistently.

From the Canadian student's point of view, the report seems to find that the main issue is to reserve the scarce supply of Canadian academic jobs for the Canadian PhD jobseekers. Restrict immigration, establish quotas, and so on. Now to me, this sounds off the mark, as much so as some colleagues' proposal to restrict admission to graduate schools. Believing that education (at least some education) is beneficial to the student, I naturally look, not for ways to reduce the number of job-seekers, but for ways to increase the number of jobs.

What's more, the objective should be to increase the number of jobs for everyone, not just for graduate students. We professors have a special responsibility toward our graduate students, because we are inviting them to be like us, in the sense that they learn our skills. Our responsibility toward them is a painful one just now, because they are unable to be like us, in the sense of joining us in secure research or teaching jobs. But in a larger view their "job crisis" is just a part, and not an isolated part, of the unemployment problem of Canada.

Let's turn from small-minded talk of job-hoarding to constructive talk of job-creation.

I am not proposing that the government invent useless jobs as a disguised dole, for PhD's or anyone else. I am saying, look around you! Look at our surroundings, at the conditions of our life, you will see that there are plenty of tasks that need to be done. Let useful work be done, and respected, and paid for — without waiting for some entrepreneur to figure out how to extract a profit from it.

Crash programmes for the relief of unemployment and poverty have often taken the form of elaborate studies of the matter by well-paid economists and psychologists. It seems appropriate to let teams of unemployed (skilled and unskilled working together) find useful projects, define them, and do them.

What? Give self-appointed gangs of meddlers carte blanche? No, to be sure, I do not envision putting the public treasury at the disposal of every job-creation team, however capricious. To be sure, we would try to ensure that their schemes were indeed in harmony with society's needs.

This problem does not worry me, frankly, nearly as much as the parallel problem which is already with us. Rich meddlers, known as investors or developers or entrepreneurs, already have pretty much carte blanche. Governments let them use their private treasuries (sometimes a good bit of public funds as well) on schemes which often counter society's needs.

Curious that Dow and Erco's poisoning of our waterways and lands should be welcomed as a stimulus to our economy just because they, the owners of Dow and Erco, are profiting! If a team of volunteers cleaned up their pollution and the bill was charged to their owners, no doubt that would be attacked as deterring investment. Yet it seems more natural to have confidence in economic initiatives which at least attempt to serve public needs. To stimulate the economy, find the jobs that need doing, and do them!

"In our society, justice is one of the most badly administered social functions."

— Pierre Elliott Trudeau, May 1964

"You cannot tell lies to the people; they will not believe you. PEOPLE ARE MORE SOPHISTICATED NOW."

— Pierre Elliott Trudeau, June 17, 1969

In memory of the thoughts of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, here are

Some facts and figures on Quebec

Most of this material was compiled by The Yellow Journal in Vancouver and distributed by Canadian University Press. Where not indicated otherwise, the source for this article is the federal government's very own Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism Report.

THE MOST IMPORTANT fact about Quebec is that 83% of the people speak French while only 17% speak English. In the 'engine of the province' (Montreal) the ratio is 70% French-speaking and only 30% English-speaking.

'Colonialism' is the system in which a country maintains foreign colonies for economic exploitation. Quebec is a colony within Canada and a colony within the American Empire.

'Canadians of British origin occupied a more favourable position in Montreal than in the province of Quebec and a more favourable position in both these areas than in Canada as a whole. Because of this, Canadians of French origin are more disadvantaged in Montreal than in the rest of Canada.' (federal Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism).

Over 53% of the Quebec labour force works for Anglo-Canadian or foreign-owned firms.

The average number of employees was 94 in Quebecois-owned firms, 145 in Anglo-Canadian enterprises, and 332 in foreign owned establishments.

Quebecois firms employed only 22% of the labour force in the manufacturing industries and produced only 15% of manufacturing output in Quebec.

Ownership patterns in major Quebec industries break down this way:

	Anglo-Quebecois	Canadians	Foreign
textiles	2.1	68.3	29.6
iron & steel	11.7	28.9	59.4
non-ferrous metals	3.7	11.6	84.7
petroleum & coal	0.0	0.0	100.0
chemical & medical	6.5	16.4	77.1
precision instruments	4.6	23.5	71.9
paper	4.8	53.3	41.9
rubber	8.0	37.5	54.5
clothing	8.2	88.6	3.2
machinery	18.3	17.0	64.7
transportation equipment	6.4	14.4	79.4
miscellaneous	24.5	41.3	34.2

In the largest sector of Quebec industry, manufacturing, the value added by Quebecois establishments was 1/4 that of Anglo-Canadian and 1/7 that of foreign-owned firms.

Yearly output of a Quebec worker was $6,500 for a Quebecois firm, $8,400 for an Anglo-Canadian firm, and $12,200 for a foreign controlled company.

THE PROBLEM OF FOREIGN capital is more acute for Quebec than it is for Canadian industry as a whole.

Of the total exports from Quebec, Quebecois firms were responsible for less than 5% of the total while Anglo-Canadian and foreign-owned firms provided 44% and 52% respectively.

The existing situation of Quebecois enterprise is unnatural, limited and traditional. The national and international firms are Anglo-Canadian and (even more so) foreign-owned.

- Over 60% of Quebec industry is U.S. owned; the rest is owned largely by British and Anglo-Canadian interests. (Source: Last Past)
- Quebec accounted for only 20.6% of new jobs in Canada last year, while Ontario accounted for 43.6% of them. (source: Financial Post)
- While unemployment in Canada as a whole dropped to 4.7% in 1969, in Quebec it rose to 6.9% with only the Maritimes lower. (source: Financial Post)
- taxes in Quebec are the highest in Canada but incomes are 10% below the Canadian average and 20%

below Ontario. (Financial Post)

o Canadian banks have assets of more than $40 billion, yet the two banks controlled by Quebec have less than $2.5 billion. (Toronto Globe and Mail)

o about 80% of the $11 billion plus spent by Quebecois on goods and services is supplied by Anglo-Canadians and Americans. (Globe and Mail)

In the case of one city, Cap de Madalaine:

FIRM:	NO. OF EMPLOYEES
Reynolds Aluminum (USA)	675
Consolidated Paper (USA)	400
St. Regis Paper	415
Tooke Bros. Ltd.	465
Continental Paper	150
Norton Co.	115
Lingerie d'Enfants Reg'd (largest Quebecois firm)	50

The Toronto based company, Noranda Mines Ltd., has company towns all over northern Quebec. In Rouyn/Noranda, the company employs 2,200 of 33,000 residents, owns the only newspaper outright and controls the city government. (Last Post)

Minimum wage at Noranda mines in Quebec is $2.40/hr. while it is $3.00/hr. at Inco mines in Sudbury, Ontario. (Last Post)

In 1968 less than 6,000 of 35,000 immigrants to Quebec were French-speaking. Only one out of 20 of the remainder adopted French as their main language. (Canadian Facts). Immigration is a federal government power.

If the majority of a firm's customers are English-speaking, it is unlikely that French will be the working language of the firm.

The Canadian military organization has made little effort to establish a situation which would permit Francophones to enter the Forces and pursue a military career in their own language and within the framework of their own culture.

In the Canadian Forces, French Canadians made up 24.6% of the soldiers, 14.2% of the sergeants, 13.1% of the lieutenants, 9.9% of the captains, 7.9% of the majors and 6.3% of the colonels and higher. (This is the army which now occupies Quebec)

NOT ONLY IS THERE a national crisis in Quebec, there is also a parallel class crisis.

• "As proof of his own commitment to the province, Charles Bronfman of distiller's Corp. (Seagram's) offers his personal investment in Montreal; he is building a house costing more than $1 million in Westmount." (Globe and Mail)

• during Drapeau's tenure as mayor of Montreal 935 low-cost housing units were built in that city. In the same period 12,645 were built in Toronto and 1,350 in Vancouver (a city 1/3 the size of Montreal). (Last Post)

• housing starts were down 11.9% in Quebec in 1969. (Financial Post)

• in Montreal, Quebecois income was $330 below the city's averages, while Scottish-Canadian income was $1,1319 above.

• Quebecois hold only 27% of the key management posts in the 30 largest corporations in the province. (Globe and Mail)

• only 6.7% of the directorates of major Canadian firms are composed of French-Canadians.

(Vancouver Sun)

Canadian of British origin have an average of 2 1/2 years more schooling than those of French origin in Quebec.

Educational attainment and occupational status closely followed income in Quebec with English-speaking people higher than French-speaking

Of 14 ethnic groups those of British origin had the highest average income, while people of French origin ranked third from the bottom above only native Indians and Italians. (Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism)

• in Quebec an unilingual 'anglo' earns $5,502 more than a bilingual 'anglo' ($4,772), who in turn earns more than a bilingual Quebecois ($4,350) and at the bottom is the unilingual Quebecois ($3,099). In Quebec and more so in Montreal, according to the Royal Commission "it pays not to speak French."

• British-Canadians have incomes 10% higher than those of French origin in every province except Quebec where their incomes are 40% higher.

• the average salaried engineer in Montreal of French origin earned $6,961 compared to $8,465 for his English counterpart.

• over 30% of the grants to universities in Quebec went to English language institutions.

• the English language institutions still have a far greater proportion of all Quebec students than their English language base in Quebec would warrant.

French Canadians are under-represented proportionally in all 10 provinces and in Canada as a whole in professional and technical occupations, in managerial positions and in clerical and sales jobs. British Canadians were over-represented in ALL

AMONG ADVISORS to the Quebec government are representatives of Iron Ore of Canada (U.S. owned); Distillers Corp./Seagrams (U.S.); CP Railways (Anglo-Canadian); Texaco of Canada (U.S.); Bank of Montreal (Anglo-Canadian); Royal Trust; Molson Industries; Royal Bank of Canada; Steinberg's Ltd. (all Anglo-Canadian) and Bell Canada (U.S.) (Financial Post)

Robert Bourassa, who requested that Canadian troops be called into Quebec to preserve law and order, is a graduate of Harvard and Oxford. He is married to Andreé Simard, who is independently wealthy. Her cousins, Arthur, Jean and Leon Simard hold directorships or are connected with over 70 companies. Some of them are:

THEATRE

DAFFYDIL, the Medical students annual production, starts Tuesday night at Hart House Theatre. It promises to be hilarious from past experience, some of the best witticisms and worst puns of the whole university (always excepting the engineers) have come from the boys and girls with the stethoscopes.

Prime Pastorum is opening Monday at the UC Playhouse. This is a medieval play, in fact, one of the prime examples of the mystery plays annually presented five hundred years ago. If its reception is anything like that given to Mankynde last month, you'd better go early to be sure you get a seat.

I Hed It Dnce But It's All Gone Now is playing at the Theatre Passe Muraille. This is the highly praised satire of America that opened last week and is going strong. The intimacy of the theatre itself is a welcome change from the more usual big business atmosphere of the major theatres.

THE PIPER produced by the Theatre Workshop Productions has made especially good use of this kind of small theatre. Though the play itself is rather mediocre, the production is so interesting that it almost doesn't matter.

Red Buttons is here again in PLAY IT AGAIN, SAM, a Woody Allen comedy playing at the Keefe Centre until Dec 12. Student tickets are available after 7 p.m. for $2.

Incidentally, it seems that the press releases announcing the imminent demise of HAIR were slightly premature. Nevertheless at least three new plays are being prepared, so Hair's departure, if not immediate, will probably come in the New Year.

ROCK

Sometimes the most pleasant musical discoveries are made under the least expected sets of circumstances. Thus my surprise at two most pleasing revelations last Thursday evening. Having set out to partake in some of the Grey Cup hoopla I found myself listening to Tranquility Base, a pop group from Hamilton. Their vocal arrangements and instrumental proficiencies made for most pleasant listening. Performing mainly other artists' works, they came across as a highly polished group, capable of carrying on with songs ranging from 'Let's Go To the Hop' by Danny and the Juniors (circa 1955) to Laura Nyro and John Phillips (Dedicated to the One I Love). Any future performances in the Toronto area should warrant a listen.

I later wandered on down to the Brown Derby to try out their veal and pepper sandwiches in their new San Francisco room. There I discovered one Art Larmand, a talented folk performer who takes his music somewhat lightly, and thus is able to make it most pleasing to the small crowds which have frequented the room to date. However, those looking for a cosy place to have a draught (the beer is excellent), a fine sandwich, and some enjoyable music are referred to the 'Derby'. It's located at the corner of Yonge and Dundas a short walk from the campus.

Tim Hardin closes out his stay at the Riverboat this weekend and will be followed by an as yet unannounced artist. The Riverboat also presents James Taylor in concert next Thursday.

Ronnie Hawkins opens at the Coq d'Or Dec. 14th and should provide some great 'Rockabilly' music. The Bobby Hutchinson Jazz Quintet closes at the Colonial this weekend, and will be followed by Maxine Brown for two weeks. A new jazz club has opened at 167 Church, featuring the Metro Stompers. The club is open Monday nights only, and will be reviewed shortly in this column.

BOOKS

There's lots to trumpet about in W.S. Baring-Gould's anthology, The Lure of the Limerick (General Publishing, $95) — it's cheap, has an unimposing history of the genre, and most of the examples are bawdy.

The one I liked best is on page 177, but it's too naughty to quote here (read it in the Bookroom). Here's another I'm partial to: "There was a young plumber of Leigh / was plumbing a maid by the sea / Said the maid, 'Cease your plumbing / I think someone's coming' / Said the plumber, still plumbing, 'It's me'."

The book has a lengthy bibliography, compiled and presented with obvious zest and authentic scholarship. Baring-Gould pays tribute to Gershon Legman, likely the most thorough researcher now writing in English about erotic literature and folklore — anyway the wittiest. Legman, despite his name, is not a misogynist.

Baring-Gould points out that the limerick may be the only verse form indigenous to English.

University presidents censured by CAUT

MONTREAL (CUP) — Delegates to the Canadian Association of University Teachers' general council meeting here over the weekend agreed to censure action against Mount Allison University in New Brunswick and the Université du Québec at Montreal, but waffled in the case of action against Simon Fraser University.

In what one delegate described as "an unusually tough mood" the general council voted unanimously for a resolution censuring President Alphonse Rivest and Rector Leo Dorais of UQAM for "clear cut and blatant violations of academic freedom."

The council also ruled that Mount A's President Laurence Cragg made himself plaintiff, judge and jury in the dismissal of Mrs. Catherine Daniel, a music instructor, last year.

However, in the case of Simon Fraser, where far-reaching political purges were carried out against left wing faculty by President Kenneth Strand, the CAUT council decided to ask the executive to "seek new initiatives" and failing a solution, as a last resort, to censure the university.

Apparently the reason behind the weak position against Kenneth Strand at SFU is that his actions have been endorsed by the Faculty Association on that campus.

Macpherson moved to the left this week

Crawford Macpherson, U of T's most famous political theorist, moved to the left Tuesday

Macpherson, a professor in political economy, who is recognized as the departmental Marxist, usually teaches his Modern Political Thought (Pol 320) from a lectern in the middle of a huge Sydney Smith lecture hall.

Tuesday this week, from his perspective, Macpherson's lectern was on the left side of the room.

To the student perspective, the lectern was on the right.

Macpherson maintains that the university is not a political society, but an institution devoted to the advancement of knowledge.

U of T grad spends 4 months in jail; will likely be deported

On August 8th Harsh Chadha, graduate student in Mechanical Engineering at U of T was arrested for distributing "Chingari", a revolutionary Indian journal at Bickford Park High School. He was charged with "assaulting police" and sentenced to 3 months.

On November 4th he was released and re-arrested by the Immigration Department who claim he is to be deported because of his "criminal record". At the Immigration hearing to appeal the deportation order, the "evidence" produced consisted of:

Toronto Star and Globe and Mail articles on Chadha's arrest for "assaulting police" while distributing Chingari.

A leaflet of the Indian Progressive Study Group entitled "Free All Political Prisoners" containing a quote from Chadha's denunciation of the court: "No amount of racist and fascist attacks by the fascist police, whether in the streets or inside the police stations will stop us from distributing revolutionary literature to our people and exercising our inalienable fundamental democratic rights."

No criminal charges were brought up. Because of the clear political harassment, Chadha refused to participate in the hearing and punched the judge. He has since been held in the Don Jail. A visitor reported that Chadha has been racially slandered and beaten by guards who later opened windows and shut off heat to retaliate against prisoners who had refused to co-operate with guards who had beat Chadha.

Don Jail officials claim that there have been no beatings. When asked they said, "That would mean immediate dismissal of anyone here."

Chadha is a member of the Anti-imperialist Canadian Student Movement and a leader of the Indian Progressive Study Group. Both groups are sponsoring a meeting in front of the library at 12:30 today to support Chadha's stand against political deportation of foreign students.

TOYOTA

Erindale - PhysEd to meet in lacrosse final

By THE MAN ON THE TRACK

The 1970 final for the Dafeo Cup, emblematic of the interfac lacrosse supremacy, will be a PHE "A" Erindale College affair.

This was decided in semi-final action yesterday in that quaint old lady known as Hart House gym. PHE "A", the defending champions, dismissed a Scarborough College squad in rather easy fashion with a 12-5 decision in an afternoon match.

The Erindale Warriors, who inished regular season play in third place in the premiere division, came up with the surprise of the year in the evening tilt as they sidelined first division winner St. Mikes "A" by a 16-10 count.

The PHE crew, decisive throughout the match, were paced by the seven-goal sniping of Boh Connelly and the all-around court mastery of Don Crocker. Crocker contributed two goals. Al Christie, George Nuppola and Bill Fawcett added singles for the PhysEders who held a 5-2 margin at half-time.

Bryan Harvey and Doug Thompson each notched a pair of goals for the losing Scarborough side who finished the regular season as the second division champions. Don Suppelsa with a single goal completed Scarborough's meager offensive show.

A dejected Scarborough coach Cam Hall offered this comment: "My team just stunk this afternoon, we just had nothing!"

In the evening match, the green-clad Erindale crew rode the offensive shooting power of Doug McKeown and John Robinson plus the rugged defensive checking skill of Grant Cole to their upset over St. Mikes.

The Warriors held a slim 6-5 lead at the half. However, they then exploded in the third period for six goals and a commanding 12-7 lead.

Cole, who is better known to Varsity sportsies as the lanky, laconic netminder for Tom Watt's championship shinny team, clinched the game in the final period when he took a breakaway pass and steamed in alone to score the goal that gave his team a 15-9 margin with less than two minutes remaining.

Robinson set the pace for the winners as he pumped in six goals while McKeown added five more. Dave Mickie contributed a two markers while Doug Ward and Wayne Sorchetti connected for one each.

Stick Mike O Toole paced the St. Mikes attack with a fine, five-goal performance.

The Dafeo final, a best-of-three-game series, begins next Tuesday at 1.00 p.m. The second match is scheduled for next Thursday at 8.00 p.m. while the third game, if necessary, is slotted for the following Monday afternoon at 1.00 p.m.

Ice hockey gals

in 2-2 standoff with "Old Girls"

Facing a team that thrashed them by a six goal margin in an exhibition tilt last year, coach Gord Bullock guided his Varsity women's hockey team to a 2-2 standoff with the Toronto Girl Grads at Varsity Arena Wednesday night.

Barb Spence scored with less than two minutes remaining in the final period to gain the tie for the Blueettes who have picked up a victory over York and narrow loss to Guelph in earlier action this season.

Ann Radecki notched the other Blueette marker while Pat Archibute and Marilyn Lansden connected for the Grads.

Innis goalie Larry Matsuba is beaten for a PhysEd goal in quarterfinal action Monday afternoon.

Weekend Sports Schedule

TODAY:

- Queens and McGill Water Polo teams meet with Blues in round-robin meet at Hart House.
- Hockey Blues host Windsor Lancers, 8.00 p.m. at Varsity Arena.

Team effort necessary for Water Polo win

By POLO PETE

Today is the day of decision for the Water Polo Blues.

If the team, coached by Alan Pyle, is to advance to the conference finals tomorrow at McMaster, they must defeat both Queens and McGill today as the three teams that compose the Eastern Division of the OQAA meet in Hart House pool in a round-robin tournament that marks the end of regular season play.

Blues clash with the Queen's squad at 6.30 and then tangle with the Water Polo Redmen at 8.30.

The individual type of play which has characterized Blues' performance in the past will not suffice in achieving victory over these talented teams. Individualism and a combination of bad passing and shooting have cost Blues important games in the past.

Man for man, however, the Varsity crew is the best team in the OQAA. But Blues must function as a cohesive unit in order to realize their championship potential.

Precise passing and effective shooting will be the keys to their hopes of gaining a playoff berth.

Lyle Makosky, probably the most consistent player on the team, must continue his excellent play and sound defensive game.

Andy Hackett, the other defenseman, must rise to the occasion and demonstrate his ability as an equally talented defenseman.

It is also essential that rovers Alex Fedko and Terry Bryon turn in a strong and aggressive swimming performance, filling in the gap in center pool that has been ever present in Blues' attack.

It will be the responsibility of team captain Dave Breech to direct the attack, to set up plays and make the others aware of the action.

Hopefully, top scorer Chris McNaught will find the net with consistency, increasing the scoring punch of the team. Goalie Tap Alvasalmi has played well all season and there is every reason to expect another sound performance from him.

Spelling these regulars will be Adam Gesting, Robin Wilson, and Hunter Milborne who have played well for the team and add that much-needed depth.

Blues have lacked aggressive, all-out play in the past. They have played as individuals rather than as a close-knit unit. They have the potential and hopefully they will realize that potential as a team this evening.

Unless they can get it all together, they are doomed to defeat. Coach Pyle has done all that he can in instructing and encouraging them along. It's now up to the team to perform!

Frantic action like this will be common today in the Water Polo tournament at Hart House.

Fifteen faculty move to veto new parity committee

By SID 'PARITY' SMITH

Fifteen disgruntled faculty members have moved to quash the new faculty-student parity commission set up to make recommendations on the structure of the faculty of arts and science.

The 15 faculty want the full 1300-member faculty council, whose operation was suspended this year, to veto the decision made last week by the council's 169-member general committee.

Instead, the faculty want a new committee set up, composed of six faculty and only two students

They also want the committee to report back April 1, rather than before March 1, as the students originally called for. Students maintained that they could not participate fully in any debate, if the decision was delayed into April or early summer.

The student proposal was passed by a 66 to 48 vote at the general committee meeting last Monday. This vote followed a student referendum the previous week in which more than 4,700 arts and science students demanded that a parity commission be established immediately or that the 34 student representatives withdraw from the committee.

A meeting of the full council will be held next Monday, December 14. Students have 63 seats on this council, which includes all arts and science faculty members.

Assistant Dean W D Foulds says that he called the special meeting "at the request of 15 members of the Council."

History professor J. B. Conacher, yesterday said it was "a good thing" that the decision was being appealed to the full council.

He said he was one of the 15 who signed the request, but said he did not originate the appeal.

"It was wrong to bring up such an important matter without announcing it in the agenda," said Conacher

Conacher was one of the leaders of the opposition to the student motion passed at last week's meeting

Brian Murgan, the student member who introduced the parity motion, said yesterday that "some of the faculty are acting like spoiled children" in the affair.

"The faculty council is their game — if you don't let them win, they'll take the ball and go to play with those who will let them win."

Morgan also pointed out that any recommendations brought back by the parity commission would have gone to the full council anyway — where faculty had a huge majority over students.

"I really thought they would have been more subtle about it all," said Morgan. During negotia-

Burkers disrupt teach-in; woman taken to hospital

By PHILINDA MASTERS and BOB GAUTHIER

Members of the right-extremist Edmund Burke Society disrupted the Saturday morning session of the Quebec Teach-in at St. Luke's United Church and were finally dragged kicking and screaming to the street into the hands of the police.

Windows of the church were broken and one woman was sprayed in the eyes with a mace-like aerosol spray. Later, one of the "Burkers" said that there was no dealing with these people (speakers at the Teach-in) because "they don't care about individuals and are too violent." The woman, whose eyes were sprayed by one of the Burkers, was taken to hospital.

Despite these interruptions the Teach-in, sponsored by SAC, the Women's Liberation Movement, NDP Waffle, and Law Union, among others, continued to consider the question of repression in Quebec.

The speakers included Michel LaMarre, from the Mouvement pour la defense des prisonniers politiques du Quebec; Paul Copeland, a Toronto Civil Liberties lawyer; Michel Pichette, from the Comite pour la defense des libertes civiles; and Gaston Therrien, a FRAP candidate and member of the Mouvement de liberation du taxi.

LaMarre said that there were two aspects of repression in Quebec — in the law and in the spreading of facts. "Criminal Declaration" makes a man guilty for what he says, and "Punitive Detention" allows a man to be arbitrarily detained for the sake of detention. "The reason for detention will remain after Rose and Simard have been found," he said, because the police are not trying to find Laporte's murderers, but to force silence.

Regarding the repression of facts, LaMarre noted that "for a time after the invocation of the War Measures Act, newspapers were all blacked out because they were afraid; until some leftist papers started printing facts and found that nothing happened." Because of the black-out, the government, while trying to minimize the crisis, really caused the situation to be blown out of proportion.

Gaston Therrien, a small wiry man, said that as a French worker she has "lived with repression day to day and generation to generation. It was always there; it was more subtle but it was there all the time."

The Canadian government, the champion of liberty and democracy, he said, does not act up to its ideals. There is spying and surveillance all the time and the present regime will never let Quebecois liberate themselves by legislation or democratic means, he observed.

Therrien concluded that under the Constitution of the United Nations, any colonized peoples are entitled to freedom and they can use any possible way at their disposal to liberate themselves. "If the Government won't deal with the Quebecois, it will have to deal with the U.N."

David MacDonald (PC — Egmont) who was the only MP opposed to the second reading of the Public Order Temporary Measures Act, and Pierre Cloutier, defence lawyer for Pierre Vallieres, Charles Gagnon, Michel Chartrand, and Robert Lemieux, were also slated to speak at the teach-in, but were unable to attend at the last minute.

On Friday night more than 300 people had crowded in the Church to hear five speakers — four of them from Quebec — speak on "the Quebec struggle".

They all agreed that the reason the federal government introduced emergency war measures and sent troops into Quebec was not to break the FLQ, but to break a general popular movement for Quebec liberation.

Jean Marc Pottle, a Universite de Quebec political science professor, offered three basic reasons for the government actions.

First, "to get the media back to the status quo ante", since broadcasting of the FLQ manifesto had revealed wide support for the political analysis articulated by the FLQ.

Second, said Pottle, "the anglo-capitalists of Ontario wouldn't stand for the independence of Quebec, since they're tied to the United States."

Third, he saw the repression in Quebec as part of a government decision to check "the left."

Pottle labelled Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau a "proto-fascist" and received applause from the audience when he remarked that "a liberal is always a fascist when you come down to it." He outlined Drapeau's repressive record of the last few years, including the controversial anti-demonstration-by-law.

He ended by appealing to the audience to "organize yourselves against the anglo-canadian imperialists and in this way we'll help each other."

Claire Sauve, speaking for the Montreal Front pour l'Action Politique, said FRAP had offered the people of Montreal a "real choice in municipal government", but had been the victim of smear and propaganda campaigns the week before the city elections last month.

She added that Drapeau's city council contained "98 per cent bureaucrats, merchants and others not representative of the Montreal people."

FRAP's aim, she said, was to give political power to the wage-earners of the city.

Ronald Lantier, one of the editors of the student magazine Quartier Latin, said that there was in Quebec a "certain amount of a frustrated national elite" who wanted to substitute itself for the present English elite in Quebec.

"All socialists, are separatists," he said, "but not all separatists are socialists."

He added that the goal was not between being "English Socialists or French capitalists" but to create an independent French Canadian socialist state

SAC plans Christmas party at Convo Hall

Usually reliably informed highly placed sources last night revealed that a giant Christmas party is being planned for Convocation Hall next Monday, to coincide with the faculty council meeting set for the same place.

Both events would occur at the same time — 4 p.m. in the afternoon.

The Christmas party, to be sponsored by the Students Administrative Council, is an annual event usually held at the offices of the SAC, 12 Hart House Circle.

In past years the party has been called the "SAC-CUS Bacchus Fracas", but no name has been attached to this year's affair and none of the projected events have been revealed.

Convocation Hall has a seating capacity of about 1,700 people.

Members of the faculty council — which includes 1300 faculty and 68 students — plan to discuss the future of a staff-student committee set up last week to restructure the council. Some faculty want the committee to have six faculty and two students, instead of the originally approved commission of five faculty and five students.

Teach-in told FLQ not 'bandits'

He attacked the NDP in particular, singling out a member of the "socialist" Manitoba NDP for saying, about the kidnappers of Cross and Laporte, "if you catch the bastards, shoot them."

Lantier explained that the "police state" in Quebec had created a lot of internal distrust among leftist groups in Quebec.

"Quartier Latin, he added, is threatened with disappearance because of police harassment."

The overall outcome of the events of this fall, he said, is that "people will continue every day to face their problems and become more and more aware."

"The situation is becoming for an increasing number of people a matter of life and death."

He appealed for English Canadians to start to explain to their fellow citizens that the Quebecois working for independence are not "bandits" but ordinary people "just fighting to be ourselves."

Faculty anti-parity?

ions in the commission, for instance, he said, faculty could have used the threat of rejection by the council as a lever to avoid recommendations they didn't want.

UC Principal A. C. H. Hallett commented last night that he didn't expect that delaying the commission report until April would produce a working restructured faculty council by the beginning of next fall.

He pointed out that while he did not support parity as a general rule, he still thought it appropriate on this particular commission.

Hallett seconded Morgan's proposal at the general committee meeting last week.

The notice sent out by Dean Foulds' office, announcing the new showdown in the faculty council, requests that members of the council take seats on the floor of Convocation Hall and that observers restrict themselves to the galleries.

Teach-in cheers

'Vive le Quebec Libre'

By BRIAN JOHNSON

"If I had the last word to say to Marc Carboneau and Jacques Lanctot, it would be 'Vive le Quebec Libre!'" And a church packed with 500 English Canadians cheered the concluding statement of Gaston Therrien Friday night at a Teach-in on "Quebec and Repressive Legislation".

Therrien is member of Montreal's militant Movement de Liberation du Taxi and was an unsuccessful candidate for the Front d'Action Politique in the recent municipal election. His emotion-charged speech marked a highlight of the two-day teach-in at St. Luke's United Church, organized by the Committee for a Free Quebec.

"I'm glad to see that it's not only in China that the churches are being used for the revolution," said Therrien before launching into a moving personal tribute to Carboneau and Lanctot, the two kidnapers of British Trade Commissioner James Cross.

"They belonged to the taxi movement," he said. "I knew the two personally very well. Marc Carboneau was always one of the boys who said we had to move a step further. Marc is a five-foot-five, Cuban-looking individual, who is very human, who is very hard-working, who never thought of himself, but always of others, who never left a question unanswered. He never left anything undone.

"I was convinced from reading the press," he continued, "when I saw he was one of the kidnapers, that no harm would come to Mr. Cross. I refute the information given to the Canadian public that these two individuals (Carboneau and Lanctot) were maniacs, that they would rope themselves with dynamite, that they were human bombs. They released Mr. Cross because they knew it was the time to do it. They couldn't go any further because the federal government refused to deal. Anyone who tells you they were armed to the teeth with dynamite in their pockets is full of baloney. . . .

"They did what they did because they were denied the most elementary needs," said Therrien. "Marc Carboneau was shot in the back one night for wanting to be free."

(Therrien later showed photographs of Carboneau's legs, riddled with over 20 pieces of buckshot fired by Montreal police during last fall's demonstration by taxi drivers against Murray Hill, the English company owning the exclusive airport limousine franchise.

"In all the time that I lived with Marc Carboneau," he added, "I never heard that he complained of pain. He was miserably beaten in police station No. 4 on June 24, 1968. He never got over it. He was so scared of cops that he would cross the street not to meet one. He would talk about it for days — of 34 people crammed in a cell . . . he never forgot that. . . .

"Marc and Jacques used to work for a newspaper we published once a month (Journal du Taxi). These boys told me I had to go further, and I did that. I probably would not have the nerve to do what they did. . . . So I joined a political organization called FRAP, which was fighting the Drapeau administration. We were of a socialistic nature. . . .

"This didn't receive the approval of the bourgeoisie," Therrien laughed. "We had a good political platform; then someone realized that this workers' party, this prize de conscience, had to be destroyed. To destroy it, they took an ex-union president, a guy with a lot of prestige across Canada. They didn't send him to Quebec, but to Vancouver. When Mr. (Jean) Marchand made the declaration that FRAP was a terrorist organization, he made sure it went right across Canada, and into Quebec — to make sure that FRAP would lose the election. . . .

"They create such a fear in the minds and hearts the Quebec people. When we read the newspapers, we could die laughing at the Bourassas, the Choquettes who own and control us," Therrien said, spitting out the names of the Quebec premier and justice minister.

"They have centralized the power of the taxi industry in Quebec City," he added. "We can't go to City Hall anymore. We have to go to the 'public servant de functionalisme' in Quebec City. They have removed the bargaining power of the taxi drivers. . . .

"If the Bourassa people — who centralize everything — put through this legislation it would be a very dangerous precedent. . . .

"The federal government has been using Quebec to cream off the human potential — from the trucking industry, the taxi industry, the labour and manpower offices — from everything. . . .

"If I had the last word to say to Marc Carboneau and Jacques Lanctot, it would be 'Vive le Quebec Libre!'"

Varsity gaffe gets laughs

Special to The Varsity — A front page inaccuracy in Friday's Varsity sent administrators at Simcoe Hall reeling into fits of laughter this weekend as they chuckled over The Varsity's habit of mystifying the decision-making processes of the university.

"They made it seem perfectly normal and rational," one administrator said with mirth. "They made it seem like we actually followed the recommendations of the CUG Report."

The Report of the Commission on University Government called for a top governing structure of 20 elected students, 20 elected faculty, 20 lay members and six ex-officio administrators.

A summertime body called the University-Wide Committee came up with a different formula this summer — 21 faculty, 14 students, 14 laymen, 10 alumni, six support staff and seven administrators.

The Varsity story Friday reported that the present top governing structure — the businessman-dominated Board of Governors — did not like the recommendations of either CUG or the UWC, but thought that government appointees (like themselves) should have the main say in deciding important matters involving money.

This was correct. The inaccuracy perpetrated by The Varsity staff was to say that it was CUG that recommended the formula arrived at by the UWC.

Grange Village opposed at public meeting

By ERIC MILLS

Ward 7 Alderman June Marks claims that the Chinese community in Toronto wants development and that a new project, Grange Village, is a "solid, good development that will have a total good effect on the community".

Judging by the response at a public meeting Thursday of many residents of the area, including Chinese representatives, that claim is hard to substantiate.

Grange Village, as shown by Windlass Holdings architect Joseph Zerafa, is a huge project involving commercial, art gallery and cinema use on the lower three floors and three 26-storey luxury apartment towers.

In order to build Grange Village, as planned, Windlass requires an amendment to the City Official Plan extending the city core area for residential building to McCaul St. from University Ave.

City Planning Staff recommended the change and called for a more comprehensive study of the area bounded by McCaul, College, Spadina and Queen. Chief Planner Dennis Barker defended that decision at the meeting because "the site having been cleared, (Grange Village) should be built."

(A well known developers' tactic is to buy up land, clear the site and present the convincing argument to City Hall that any develop-opment is better than vacant land)

Wes Lore and Fred Khan, representing the Special Committee on the Chinese Community, agreed that before Grange Village be allowed to proceed, it must be demonstrated that it would be "beyond a doubt" beneficial to the community.

Khan said that the project was "exciting" technically and architecturally, but that it must be evaluated with respect to the Chinese community. He did not necessarily oppose the plan, but objected to haphazard development and called for "co-ordinated community planning".

Kay Parsons of the Grange Park Residents' Association went beyond the immediate Windlass crisis to include other threats to the area.

"Does Hydro expect children to move into a transformer station?"

she asked, referring to the large number of houses owned by Hydro which are slated for demolition.

"Does Windlass expect large families from Chinatown to move into expensive apartments?"

SAC External Affairs Commissioner Vince Dolan claimed that windlass' and other development threatened to decrease the amount of low cost housing in the area and alter the character of the neighbourhood. He maintained that the downtown area should be able to accommodate many styles of living.

The Rochdale Papers

By Brian Johnson

Attacked by city officials and police, and nervously protected by the federal government, Rochdale College is still alive and kicking. But it's dangling on a thin thread, which could be cut at any moment. The building's future is at the mercy of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corp., the federal agency which holds a $4,884,165 mortgage on the co-operative high-rise residence at Bloor and Huron St.

Last August an escalation of police drug raids on Rochdale and criticism from city officials heralded the start of an intense pressure campaign to shut down the college. The city, the police, and the press painted it as a bastion of drugs and filth, and leapt to the defense of the taxpayer.

"By foreclosing and selling, CMHC would rid the City of a grave social nuisance," wrote McKenzie Porter in The Telegram. "It would also recover for the taxpayer some of the public money that has been squandered through political pandering to the caprices of a bunch of conceited neurotics."

Last month Alderman Anthony O'Donohue, in a letter to Robert Andras, federal housing minister, called Rochdale "a vertical flop-house" and demanded it be closed.

A Globe and Mail editorial described it as "an insufferable symbol of privilege... a seedy haven for some of society's passengers. About half of Rochdale's residents are either students or working at straight jobs," said The Globe. "The other half, one is left to assume, are pursuing a life style of great originality, known to other generations as indolence."

"Indolence" is The Globe And Mail's colourful translation of what some generations have called "unemployment". The real symbols of privilege — those who squeezed the fattest sums from the taxpayer — won't be found smoking dope in Rochdale College. They are Howard Adelman and Revenue Properties, the developers who originally planned and built the residence for profit, and who left behind them a project with a staggering debt, an inflated mortgage, and thus high rents for the tenants.

"Rochdale is really living out of the fantasies of a liberal society," Adelman once commented.

He ought to know. He was Rochdale's original developer, who won a fortuna in consulting fees on the project, and who used Rochdale as a guinea pig for a number of other lucrative co-op housing schemes.

In fact, Howard Adelman is really living out of the liberal profits reaped from the Rochdale "fantasy". Now an assistant dean at Atkinson College, he is comfortable and secure in his luxurious Rosedale home, and he has returned to the study of philosophy.

Other contemporary philosophers have eulogized Rochdale's problems as 'a dream that never came true, a utopian ideal that failed, a hope that turned to despair.' But Rochdale never was a goal. It's an apartment building with a community of tenants, who have been blamed for a financial mess over which they never had any control.

A House Of Debts

DRAMATIS PERSONAE

Here is the family that built the house called Rochdale College (in order of appearance):

Howard Adelman: worked for Campus Co-op, Co-op College, Revenue Properties, Student Management Services, to name a few. Now a successful wonder dean at York University.

Campus Co-op: the original student housing service that planned Rochdale; not to be confused with Co-op College.

Co-op Collaga: affectionately known as Co-op College Residences Inc.; it legally owns the first mortgage on Rochdale; it's a co-op housing business that has planned several other projects including Tartu College; not to be confused with Campus Co-op.

CMHC: Central Mortgage and Housing Corp.; holder of the first mortgage, where most of the money came from; a federal government agency.

Revenue Properties: the developer that bought the land for Rochdale.

Rubin Corp.: a Revenue Properties subsidiary; it holds the second mortgage on Rochdale.

Aiscott Construction: a partly-owned subsidiary of Revenue Properties; it won the contract to build Rochdale.

Tampold and Walls: Rochdale's architects, collaborated with Co-op College and Revenue Properties on other housing projects; don't like elevators.

A. C. Murphy: Construction firm that built Tartu and Pestalozzi, two post-Rochdale housing projects designed by Tampold and Wells, who sat on its board of directors.

City Politicians, Bureaucrats, Press and Police: trying to smash Rochdale.

Federal Officials: trying to save Rochdale.

Rochdale College: a free-school

THE REAL CRISIS at Rochdale College is a debt structure of nearly half a million dollars, a legacy that can be traced back to the conception of the building as a money-making pilot project for co-operative housing.

Rochdale now owes $125,000 in overdue payments to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corp., which holds a $4,884,165 mortgage on the 1B-storey residence at Bloor and Huron St. And Co-op College Residences Inc., which owns the mortgage, has accumulated about $400,000 in outstanding debts on the Rochdale project. Most of them are unpaid construction bills which were not covered by the CMHC mortgage.

The college's position is delicate. For while CMHC is not pushing to collect its share of the debt, a top-level shift in federal government policy could force CMHC to end the Rochdale experiment by foreclosing the mortgage and selling the building.

Rochdale's complex financial history started in the early 1960s when Howard Adelman, a veteran of the student housing movement, masterminded a scheme to build low-rental high-rise on a shoe string budget.

Adelman had already built up a large service which rented houses to students on a non-profit basis. Called Campus Co-op, it provided the nucleus for Co-op College and the Rochdale project.

Adelman's group had practically no capital. So their strategy was aimed at getting 100-per-cent government financing.

From the start, they tried to found Rochdale as an educational institution and reap the tax deductions that came with such a status. In 1963 they lobbied the province for a private member's bill to incorporate Rochdale College. The bill failed on a tie vote.

But while selling the project as an educational institution to one group of politicians, Campus Co-op packaged it as a student housing to another group.

(Student housing is eligible for a 90-per-cent CMHC mortgage at an interest rate of 6-7/8 per cent — low compared to the then normal rate of 9 1/4 per cent.)

In 1964 a successful lobby in Ottawa by Adelman's group produced an amendment to the National Housing Act allowing for the development of student housing outside of accredited universities.

CAMPUS CO-OP NEXT ENLISTED the support of Robert Macaulay, then Ontario Housing Minister, and persuaded the provincial government that Rochdale — as a student housing project — was eligible for the special CMHC loan.

"Macaulay was interested in helping us get it through," Adelman says. "He liked our idea of a residence run by students."

Now a lawyer for several developers, Macaulay later did legal work for the company that developed Rochdale — Revenue Properties — and became a director of one of its subsidiaries.

Revenue Properties, Adelman says, expected to make a $430,000 profit on the Rochdale project — most of it from the mortgage.

In the fall of 1965, Adelman set up and incorporated Co-op College Residences Inc. (Co-op College) to handle his booming student housing business, which had found another market in building a co-op residence at the University of Waterloo.

Co-op College emerged as the development arm of the rising movement in Canada to plan large-scale, student-run housing projects. The concept was in vogue in the strangest places — among university administrators like U of T President Claude Bissell, who saw an easy solution to a tense student housing crisis; among politicians and developers.

In 1966 Co-op College finally received the CMHC mortgage, subject to a later audit, to cover 90 per cent of the capital costs of building Rochdale.

Somehow Co-op College had to raise the money to cover the other 10 per cent of the capital costs, then estimated at $5.6 million.

They never quite made it. BUT A GOOD CHUNK of the needed capital came from inflation of the price of the land on which Rochdale was built.

Speculators first assembled the property at Bloor and Huron and sold it back and forth to each other in paper transactions, raising the price each time.

Revenue Properties bought the assembled land en bloc for about $600,000, and re-sold it to Co-op College for $1 million, making about $400,000 profit

In a second mortgage, Rubin Corp., a Revenue subsidiary, loaned Co-op College the $400,000

In effect, Revenue loaned Co-op the $400,000, which represented the profit Revenue made in the sale of the land to Co-op

It was a paper transaction that inflated the land price by $400,000, which in turn inflated the capital costs of Rochdale, which in turn inflated the CMHC mortgage

Despite this skillful juggling, another problem broke the shoe-string holding together the project's finances

When Rochdale was finally built, and the bills were added up, the capital costs came to $5.85 million, rather than the expected $5.6 The increase was mostly due to a five-month delay in its construction, which was handled by Alscott Construction Co., then a partly-owned subsidiary of Revenue Properties.

THE ROCHDALE PROJECT TRIED to squirm out of its debt by again looking to the government for tax cuts.

Rochdale College was an educational institution, they said, and — like any university — it should not have to pay taxes on construction materials.

(Back in 1967, Campus Co-op members decided to privately incorporate Rochdale as a separate entity. Some members wanted this official founding of Rochdale College for "genuine educational reasons," says John Jordan, Co-op College employee, while others argued it was a necessary step to get tax exemptions)

Rochdale applied to the Department of National Revenue for a rebate of the $200,000 tax on the building's construction materials

At the same time, Co-op College included the same tax as part of the $5.85 million capital costs it listed in the mortgage it submitted to CMHC.

In effect, Rochdale tried to get the tax refunded in full while Co-op claimed it as an expense in applying for a CMHC loan including 90 percent of the tax

Co-op College tried to get the money two ways," says Rochdale's present general manager, Brian Gilhulu "It was one of their stupidest rip-off attempts"

Rochdale lost both ways

The Dept of National Revenue turned down the application for the rebate. And the federal Audit Services Bureau dropped the taxes from the mortgage submission when the bureau reviewed it in the summer of 1969

The audit also deleted $200,000 in furniture bills that Co-op had sneaked in as part of the capital costs

Rochdale appealed the revenue department's decision on the tax rebate, but they were refused again this September

The college also tried to hold back $114,805 in municipal taxes in 1969 on the basis of being an educational institution. The attempt failed

Many of Rochdale's original supporters were attracted to the project because they were told the tax refunds would be used to set up educational and cultural programs. But even if the college had won the refunds, the money would be diverted to pay off the overdue CMHC mortgage payments.

WELL-KNOWN FIGURES such as poet-publisher Dennis Lee and novelist Matt Cohen were part of the initial enthusiasm over Rochdale's birth as a free-school in 1967

The School for Social Theory, now defunct, was a major sponsor. From that group came economist Mel Watkins, who was president of the Rochdale governing council before Ottawa invited him to join a task force on foreign ownership Headlines predicting Rochdale's imminent bankruptcy flashed briefly through the front pages of the daily press last summer when it was first unable to meet its $26,000 monthly mortgage payments to CMHC. By then most of the educators had left disillusioned.

A constant source of confusion in the financial dealings is the blurred distinction between Rochdale and Co-op College.

Co-op College, as Rochdale's legal owners, have the paper responsibility for the CMHC mortgage. But, in effect, they entrusted it to Rochdale when they allowed the college to become self-governing in 1969.

The Politicians Will Decide

If the federal government grants the tax rebate on construction materials, there would be a fight between Co-op and Rochdale over who should get the money. Both groups claim its theirs.

Now the Rochdale project is saddled with four mortgages totalling $5,584,165.

- First mortgage to CMHC of $4,884,165
- Second mortgage to Rubin Corp of $430,000.
- Third mortgage to Campus Co-op (the original student housing service) of $150,000.
- Fourth mortgage to Nu Sigma Nu Fraternity of $120,000. The fraternity had occupied a floor of the building. But they've moved out and now want to settle the mortgage.

On top of the four mortgages, Rochdale owes $52,000 to a group called Student Management Services (SMS) for the unpaid architectural and development fees.

SMS was a consulting firm that Adelman set up with Tampold and Wells, Rochdale's architects. Co-op College, which also employed Adelman, hired SMS to help develop the project.

What ever happened to Howard Adelman?

He developed a canny knack for raking in consulting fees.

"Once the building's construction was started, I faded out of the picture," says Adelman, now assistant dean at Atkinson College.

HIS EXPERIENCE IN PIONEERING student co-op housing with Rochdale opened up a lucrative consulting career to him. Rochdale provided the abortive model for other projects he planned in Canada and the United States.

"I left Co-op College for two reasons," he says frankly. "Monetary greed was one. I found an opportunity to make a lot of money by consulting. The other was the insecurity that comes of working with organizations like Co-op College."

Adelman acted as a consultant for Revenue Properties on several projects after he left Co-op. He worked for both companies on Rochdale. And he's had a long business association with Tampold and Wells, the architects.

(In the 1960's Mr. Tampold and Mr. Wells were directors of A. C. Murphy, the construction firm that built other co-op housing projects developed by Revenue Properties. An example is Tartu College, just across the road from Rochdale. Its architects, of course, were Tampold and Wells.)

Adelman modestly admits he looks back on Rochdale with "some sense of responsibility."

He says he regrets Co-op College's decision to open the building to tenants before construction was finished. The move resulted from Co-op's urgent need for revenue, but created long-term problems.

Construction and architectural short-cuts have left Rochdale's tenants with costly repair bills. The four elevators broke down in the first year of operation and, since then, have cost $500 to $1,000 a month to repair. The elevators were built for ordinary apartment specifications — two rush-hour periods a day. But 70 per cent of the building's elevator traffic is between floors, says general manager Brian Gilhuly.

A BUILDING LIKE ROCH-

DALE needs six elevators, he adds. But Tampold and Wells, the architects, have made the same cost-cutting "error" in designing a similar co-op housing project in Ottawa — Pestalozzi, a 22-storey student residence financed by CMHC and built by A. C. Murphy Construction. It has only four elevators.

When CMHC realized last year that Rochdale was in deep financial trouble, it conducted a feasibility study on the college. The study, completed last February, concluded Rochdale could not eliminate its heavy debts through normal revenue sources, regardless of any improvements in management.

While CMHC was making the study, it allowed Rochdale to make just token mortgage payments of $1,500 a month.

At a meeting last April, CMHC criticized Rochdale officials for spending $135,000 on an educational program while mortgage payments were still outstanding. And they turned down a Rochdale request that CMHC loan the project an additional $700,000 and grant a moratorium on mortgage payments. The loan could not exceed 90 per cent of the audited costs of the building, CMHC insisted.

Since then, Rochdale has cut back administrative expenses and held numerous meetings with officials from Prime Minister Trudeau's office, who see the college as a useful experiment in counter-insurgency, as a way to keep potentially violent youth off the streets and politically dormant. Former Rochdale President Peter Turner has said Rochdale keeps youth conservative and dissipates radical political energy.

SO THE COLLEGE IS SURVIVING under the protection of the federal government. CMHC started another study on the building when criticism from police and city officials became embarrassing this fall. And Rochdale is looking for money elsewhere in the federal government, particularly the Department of Health and Welfare and the Secretary of State. Both offices are interested in "the experiment".

Rochdale's future is tenuous. The fate of a community is based on a delicate set of top-level negotiations.

If CMHC decides to foreclose and sell, it will complete the operation in gradual stages. Its first step would be to put the building under trusteeship, then slowly take it over. CMHC officials realize that a dramatic shutdown would provoke a violent defense by the tenants.

Where does this complex history of financial dealings leave the tenants?

They are victims of a development practice that's mostly legal, and certainly not unusual.

The inflation of the mortgage has burdened them with high rents in an inadequate building that was originally packaged as low-rental student housing. One person is charged $50 to $60 for a double room, and $60 to $70 for a single. A one-bedroom costs $150, a two-bedroom $240.

And the tenants face the possibility of being evicted from their home without any provision for alternate housing. But Howard Adelman and his friends don't live there.

Today, The Varsity has presented Rochdale's financial history. In the new year, there'll be a sequel describing the more recent political developments that have threatened the survival of the building.

Swim Blues capture OQAA Relay Meet

Varsity swimmers were able to hold off strong relay teams from both McGill and Western to capture their fourth consecutive title at the OQAA Relay Meet Saturday evening at McMaster.

Blues won five of the nine relays. McGill three and Western one.

McGill have six returning CIAU swimmers and have in addition picked up Bill Coke from the University of Manitoba. Western have two members of the 1970 Canadian World Student Games team, Craig Gauld and Ken Fowler, in addition to several promising freshmen.

Western, who have never been defeated in the 300 Breaststroke relay, again defended their title by beating a Varsity team of Ross Ballantyne, Barry Bowerman, and Nick Rottman by nearly 2 seconds.

McGill, traditionally strong in freestyle, captured the 400-yd. sprint relay and the 400 Individual Medley Relay. Toronto finished second in each with John Twohig, Jim Adams, Terry Bryon, Alex Fedko then Jim Shaw. Bob Heatley, Terry Bryon and Russ Farquhar respectively.

The Toronto-McGill dual in the 400 Freestyle Relay went to McGill this year in a close finish.

Toronto easily won the 400 Medley Relay (Jim Shaw, Ross Ballantyne, Bob Heatley, and John Peters) and the 300 Backstroke Relay (Don Carr, Russ Farquhar, and Jim Shaw).

Varsity's third and fourth victories came in the 300 Butterfly Relay (Jim Shaw, Bob Heatley, and Alex Fedko) and the 200 Freestyle Relay (Jock McRae, John Peters, Jim Adams, and John Twohig.)

The highlight of the evening was the 800-yd. crescendo relay. This race placed Varsity's Mike Guinness against the CIAU record holder Dave Johnson of McGill. Starting into the last 500-yards, McGill held a slight lead with initial legs by Nesbitt and Zajchowski over Twohig and Fedko.

Guinness however, caught Johnson with less than 50 yards to go and went on to win by 1.5 seconds. The victory was certainly a blow to McGill's Freestyle supremacy.

The results show that Toronto is still far ahead of the other teams in depth and strength. Individual titles will be difficult to win this year and relays impossible to predict. But in the end, Toronto should once again be on top.

Water Polo Blues show well against McGill

By CLIVE HOBSON

Varsity's Water Polo squad came of age Friday evening.

Although they failed to advance to the OQAA finals, they did come up with their best performance of the year against a superior team from McGill in the tri-meet at Hart House.

The meet, between Blues, Queens and McGill, was the second half of a round-robin tournament which began two weeks earlier. McGill held a lead after the first round and Blues had to win both their games to become the Eastern Division champions.

The Varsity crew took to the pool in their first game against the Gaels under somewhat ominous conditions.

The referee for the game forewarned coach Alan Pyle that he would favour Queens, simply because of their inexperience, in an effort to give them encouragement.

As a result, Terry Bryon and Chris McNaught were both yanked from the game after receiving three major fouls between them.

COACH PYLE EXPERIMENTED with second stringers throughout the game and the result was a lackluster affair with Blues coming out on top by a 9-4 score.

Blues then prepared to meet the Redmen in the game that would decide the Eastern Division title (McGill had defeated Queens 19-12 earlier in the afternoon). As was befitting the biggest game of the year, the tension surrounding the pool was electric.

Blues played an inspired first half and goals by Bryon, Alex Fedko and Adam Gesing (his first of the year) game them a 3-2 halftime margin.

In the second half, McGill's wealth of experience began to show and Blues began to tire as the result of their back-to-back games.

But the Varsity squad failed to flag and the game remained close with the Redmen holding a single goal lead at the three-quarter mark.

IN THE FOURTH QUARTER, however, the pressure took its toll as the usually reliable Dave Breech missed two sure scores when he drilled a pair of easy shots into the water just in front of the McGill goalie.

As usual, the defense played excellently. Andy Hackett had perhaps his best game of the season, Lyle Makosky and Bryon played solidly. Hunter Milbourne was very effective and coach Pyle was especially pleased with the play of rookies Robin Wilson and Gesing.

Tap Avasalmi was nothing less than spectacular in goal. Three times he stopped McGill players on breakaways.

The Water Polo Redmen are without doubt worthy winners Saturday. They went on to McMaster and defeated the fine Mac team 7-4 to win the OQAA title and the Herschorn Cup.

Overall, coach Pyle has reason to be pleased with his team's effort. Prospects look good for next year as the basic team remains intact and will certainly benefit from the fairly extensive exhibition schedule lined up for the next three months.

Varsity Gym team performs well in individual events

Varsity's Gymnastic Blues put in a superior effort in Saturday's seven-team invitational competition at York.

For some reason, however, it was decided that the top five, instead of the usual three, performers for each event would count towards the team totals.

This greatly reduced the standing of the short-staffed, four-member Varsity squad.

But individually, the team had a good day. Hans Frick, still with an injured thumb, competed in all six events but was able to perform only parts of his routines. His rings performance, with a beautiful full-twisting back layout dismount, was good enough for a third position and he easily took third on the side horse with less than half of his normal routine.

Gary Wicks again led the team in free exercise and Al Forest vaulted to fourth position on the horse.

In spite of multiple injuries,

Phil Michaelis placed second in vaulting — only 0.35 points behind McMaster's Olympic gymnast, Steve Mitruk.

In future competitions, coach Julio Roncon hopes to enter more gymnasts. This, however, will require more practice time — something which has definitely been lacking!

Goals, goals, as Blues trounce Lancers 10-2

The Varsity — Clive Hobson

Blues' Terry Peterman (at edge of net) deflects Nels Dehenedet's shot for his second goal of the game. Later he scored two more as Blues trounced Windsor 10-2.

By LYNDON LITTLE

"News! you want news." Tom Watt was saying Friday night after he had watched his Blues thrash the Windsor Lancers 10-2 at Varsity Arena before 3,000 enthusiastic fans.

"Listen," he said, "when we score 10 goals and John Wright doesn't get a single point — that's news!"

Wright, Blues' slick centerman deluxe who was the OQAA Western Division scoring champ last season, had one of his rare off nights. The majority of the team, however, fattened their point totals at the expense of the Lancers who gave every indication that, unless they jettison soon, they'll be threats only to their coach Cec Eaves.

THE VICTORY, Blues' third straight league triumph, set the stage for Wednesday night's showdown at Varsity Arena against those perennial pretenders from Waterloo.

After a 4-1 decision over the McMaster Marlies Friday night, the Warriors also sport an unblemished 2-0 record.

The onslaught against the Lancers was led by the Gord Davies-Brian St. John-Terry Peterman line which has been the team's top production combination to date. Together, they accounted for a total of seven goals Friday as Blues scored three times in the opening 20 minutes, four times in the middle period, and added another three markers in the final stanza.

Peterman, the former Princeton star who was Blues' third highest goal scorer last year, had the biggest game of his three-year tenure at Varsity as he pumped four goals behind Windsor's shell-shocked netminder Scott McFadden.

Workhorse center Brian St. John added two more while left winger Davies contributed a single marker.

St. John's two goals brought his league total to seven — already one more than his last year's total when he missed the first half of the season with a knee injury!

OTHER VARSITY MARKSMEN were wingers Bill Buba and Mac Hickox plus defenseman Terry Parsons.

Jim Gratto and Tom McFadden replied for Windsor.

The other McFadden, bravely occupying the space between Windsor pipes, faced more rubber than a Goodyear tire inspector as Blues fired 59 pucks in his direction.

However, at the other end of the ice, Blues' sturdy Grant Cole spent long stretches with little else to do but to possibly dwell on more exciting moments on the lacrosse floor. A total of only 19 Windsor shots found their way to his doorstep.

After the previous weekend's excursion to Montreal where Blues' snipers experienced frustration around the net, Watt felt the Windsor game served as a scoring catharsis.

"That's what we needed — a few goals!" he said as he smiled, obviously pleased with their performance.

Watt also had special words of praise for Davies and rookie center Ivan (The Terrible) McFarlane.

"Davies has been great," he said, "he earned a reputation as a great defensive winger when he starred with the Marlies; I had a talk with him about being more offensively minded and he's picked up some big goals."

McFarlane, who led his Copper

Cliff high school team to the provincial finals last year, stepped in and centered the line with wingers Nick Holmes and Hickox when Watt decided to rest Brent Imlach. Imlach has been slowed by a chronic groin injury.

McFARLANE RESPONDED by drawing assists the goals by Buba, Hickox and Parsons. His play on Buba's goal in the second period set up the prettiest scoring play of the night.

McFarlane carried the puck deep into the Windsor end, dropped it back to Hickox who was stationed 20-feet in front of the net. Hickox then fed a perfect pass to Buba who was streaking in on the left wing.

Kaz Lysioneck, a rugged right winger who transferred to Varsity from Laurentian, saw his first action as a member of the Blues. He picked up a bout of pneumonia before training camp started and wasn't able to get back on skates until a few weeks ago.

Watt used Lysioneck as a replacement for the absent Mike Boland on the Buba-Wright line.

In Brief: Scott McFadden has taken over where the Lancers' regular goaltender of last year, Don Brunner, left off; that is performing heroics to keep the score against his team in the two-digit range. . . . Referee Pat Murphy called four minor penalties on each team in a relatively cleanly played contest.

Lancer goalie Scott McFadden had few unhindered moments as he faced 59 Varsity shots. Here, Blues' Brian St. John tests him.

Students walk out, may quit council

By JUDI SMITH

Four student members walked out of the Presidential Advisory Council meeting yesterday, following defeat of the SAC resolution to have delegates to the PAC appointed as opposed to their being elected.

Following the defeat of the resolution, there was some feeling among the students present that SAC might withdraw student membership from the Council.

Leading up to the vote on the motion, A. G. Rankin, Vice-President (Non-Academic), said that the SAC resolution "... implies a fallacious view of the function of this body ... (this is) not a place where specific political points of view are brought and tabled. If the president wants the opinion of SAC, he can pick up the phone and call Mr. Hurd (SAC president); he doesn't need to instruct these delegates to consider these views. I support the motion to turn down the SAC resolution."

There was a great deal of lively discussion about the resolution, with most Council members taking part.

"There is some virtue in what SAC proposes" said Jim St. John (GSU). "It has been a frequently-expressed worry that in an election such as for these members of PAC, passions of the moment might occur. Instead of responsible students there might be another type altogether. Often delegates are responsible for a group and end up being obstructed by the group."

"Elections are intrinsically unreliable and vicious activities," commented Dead A. D. Allen among general titters. "I wouldn't have thought, however, there was any particular danger in students being elected to Council any more than there is danger in students being elected to SAC. The requirement in connection with the teaching staff is equally applicable to students."

SAC president, J. Rodney Hurd answered: "There are some appointed members to this Council, so it isn't without precedent." He added that "the student council is a duly elected body who could appoint members to Council," and that these members "would be accountable to SAC."

Immediately after the vote on the resolution, SAC member Norman Rogers (UC IV) left the meeting, soon to be followed by Hurd and the other members. The delay in total undergraduate exit annoyed one SAC member: "As soon as the Council rejected the resolution, the students should have got up and walked out as a body. There was exhibited a definite lack of leadership and fidelity to the wishes of SAC."

Bissell, faculty belles chuckle about babies

By LAURA KELLY

"One of my chief gratifications is the possibility of having the Honours system without really calling it that," said Claude Bissell, U of T President, speaking of his sadness at the demise of the Honours Program.

Bissell spoke at the closed dinner meeting for the women members of the Faculty Club last night.

Wanting the university's primary role to be critical is "part of the messianic, idealistic fervor of students and staff," he said, to the 80 women members of the Faculty Club who dined with Bissell, the guest of honour, in the club's wedgewood-lined dining hall, at a closed meeting.

Bissell, who is to resign in June, had joked first about day care centres, and when he concluded the speech, the women assured him they were a social and intellectual group interested in the university, not "feminists" at all.

"I hope not," chuckled Bissell. Bissell noted that the split between collegial, communitarian academics, used to working by consensus, and those accustomed to hierarchical structures, and the division between those who view the university as the political community.

Capulizing his views of university structure, he said that the conflict between those who see the university as a neutralist, free institution, and those who want the university to be a critic of society is a basic reason for the recent vociferous debate over university government.

Bissell said that those who endorse the neutralist university

Hassles effectively deny exile citizenship

By TOM WALKOM

Immigration Department officials are deliberately using red tape bureaucracy to prevent an eligible American exile from gaining Canadian citizenship.

The exile, who prefers to be known only as Richard while his case is in review, arrived in Canada two years ago. A university graduate, former radio announcer and trained pilot, he amassed well over the 50 points needed to qualify for landed immigrant status.

BUT RICHARD WAS A DESERTER from the U.S. Army "special training unit."

The first immigration official he talked to told Richard, who even now, with his fashionably shaggy hair and neatly trimmed van dyke, looks more like a junior executive than a subversive, that he would have no problem. As "a formality", he was told to see a second official, a Mr. Burns.

Burns was more than a formality. He wanted complete documentation to prove Richard's existence, including an original birth certificate, and his college, high and public school transcripts. In the United States, school transcripts are classed as limited access documents and it is difficult for an individual to obtain his own.

After six months, Richard got the documents together, only to be told that he now had to undergo not only a complete physical check-up, but a medical check-up to prove he was capable of piloting. The latter costs $30. He had both check-ups (which are good only for a three-month period) and presented the evidence to Burns, but a slight problem had come up.

IMMIGRATION HAD LOST his birth certificate; he was to furnish them with a new one. This took six weeks, and returning to Burns with the new certificate, Richard encountered another slight problem.

Immigration had lost his high school transcript. Another six weeks, another high school transcript, another small problem — his physical had expired; three months were up.

Another $30. Richard's documents now had to be sent to the RCMP in Ottawa for a "routine check," a process which took another six weeks.

In the meantime, the $6000 that Richard had entered the country with, was dwindling, and without landed status, he was legally prevented from getting a job.

Back at Immigration, Burns had received the word from the RCMP, and Richard was accused of stealing a car in Missouri.

He has never been in Missouri, but only after two or three months of correspondence with that state, did a letter arrive in Toronto establishing this fact.

The letter did not have an official seal, Burns pointed out, and so another request to Missouri was sent out.

Richard was cleared, but by this time his medical examination had run out again. This time, when he got a check-up, Richard hadn't enough to pay the $30.

IT DIDN'T REALLY MATTER TROUGH, Burns said, because Immigration had lost his birth certificate again. Richard, having smartened up by this time, did nothing and after a regulation six week period, received another letter from Immigration, to the effect that they had misplaced his high school transcript again, and that he should replace it.

Richard has not been in contact with the department for the past four months.

He has however talked to a lawyer and found that if he married a Canadian girl, he will be automatically granted citizenship status. After a marriage, his lawyer will arrange a divorce within three weeks.

Richard is looking for a girl willing to participate in a quick marriage, and a quick divorce (he will pay the costs). Applicants should leave their name and telephone numbers at The Varsity, 91 St. George St., second floor.

Arts showdown, SAC Xmas fete postponed

The special meeting of the Arts and Science Faculty Council, called to revoke the general committee's decision for a student-faculty parity restructuring committee, has been tentatively postponed from Monday to Friday, the last day of the fall term.

Dean W D Foulds, Assistant Dean of Arts and Science, who called the Monday meeting at the request of 15 faculty members made the schedule change because all the Arts colleges have scheduled their own faculty meetings for Monday.

Foulds said, however, that several faculty have protested the later date, and the final schedule decision won't be made until today.

"Friday was the first day we could arrange, and apparently the Provost, who is the Chairman of the Council, wouldn't be able to attend. Sword (the Provost) was unavailable today, so hope to talk to him tomorrow, and make the final decision," said Foulds.

Foulds admitted that he might be forced to wait until the new term to call the meeting.

He denied that the planned SAC Bacchus Fracas, to be held at the same time and place, influenced the decision to postpone the meeting.

If the meeting is held Friday many of the 4700 arts students who voted for parity on a faculty-wide referendum will be winging their way home for Christmas.

Ceta Ramkhalawansingh, organizer for the huge SAC Christmas party, was horrified at the suggestion that the faculty might be left out of the fun fest, and confirmed the re-scheduling of the SAC party to Friday at 4 p.m. at Convocation Hall.

have a good point in that it is necessary for an atmosphere of freedom.

"It usually works out that the social critic, collegial, and political view line up against the neutral, hierarchical, corporate views," said Bissell.

The conflict of the corporation and the collegials makes the role of President difficult, since he is appointed by the Board of Governors, but must deal with the academics, said Bissell.

"If he is to survive at all, he must become adept at political manoeuvring," said Bissell.

Bissell called finally for the willingness of lay people and academics to work together, to prevent the ideological questions from creating an unstable university.

He ended his formal remarks with an anecdote about a young hitch-hiker he once picked up in Nova Scotia who intended to come to the U of T because "that's where the action is."

"The context has grown over the years," remarked Bissell.

As the women drifted out of the hall, the chairlady buttonholed me, asked whom I represented and after checking with Bissell approved my note-taking.

"It's all right. He said he didn't say anything controversial," she smiled.

Jobless summers difficult for Engineers

Do degrees relate to 'practical experience'?

The following story recorded by Mike Lee, an engineer, tells the plight of four saddened plumbers, Geo. Joe Blow, George Civil, and Dick Chemicals on hearing the latest ultimatum of the Engineering Faculty Council - that degrees still depend on 600 hours of practical experience in a summer job situation, a situation which is becoming increasingly more stringent.

Joe Blow has been opening and closing doors for two decades, though it was only a few years ago that he learned he'd been applying the principle of moments. "Practical Experience" has been my bag," claims Joe.

Four years in the Engineering Course left him an experience; "Boy, wasn't it a practical impracticality."

He was also a sound engineer, working part-time for Lady Godiva's Band to learn single harmonic motion - all an application of Lecture 22 from Physics Course 2501.

Admits Blow, "I spent more than 600 hours. I am married now but an still awaiting a Bachelor's degree."

George Civil described how dug up his backyard, maintained slope stability, empowered it with flow nets, conducted site exploration and soil sampling with much shearing strength, overcame effective stresses and built a glass greenhouse. But he got no credit.

However after 600 hours of washing subway walls for the TTC, a degree was his.

Geo has taken two years of geological engineering. Like George he claims specialization in digging, but many of the two Engineers, the explorers hired from every third school across country, beat him to the bushes.

Laments Geo, "If only the Imperial Shellaxaco Oil Ltd., could plant more bushes and hired George Civil to build more wells or Clifed Copper Moles were off on a gold rush! If only they could..."

Dick Chemicals is among the number pitied after a reported 40% drop in the job market. His experience carries him over the threshold of smelly labs (he didn't complain of colds), an explosion in his basement, graduation from four chemistry sets dad plied him with and four years of heat transfer in school. But it didn't get him a summer job.

Dick feels that he can't make it into grad school but needs 600 hours and wants a full-time job.

Dick cited the Varsity report (Dec. 2, 1970) on AT'S Chairman, Chemical Eng. Prof. W. W. Missen's comment on the question of parity being "never brought up in the Engineering Faculty Council".

"How could the 20 odd student votes on the 224-man Faculty Council be optimized?", Blow asks.

Dick suggests, "It's pointless worrying about it. Chances are that we engineers specialize in Process Modelling and Simulation. Try and figure out the Fluid Mechanics of the Strategy of Process Engineering in things like that - without practical experience in Reaction Kinetics we'd probably give up and turn to Organization Psychology for help!"

"Let's imagine the 24 seats are more than enough. Besides even if we had more, would we be able to fill them? Joe, you seem to forget, the departments and council are omniscient; I wouldn't tread on their toes.

"Ya, Dick, ya. I don't know why, but... (pause)... somehow... I agree with you."

"What constitutes the alienation of labour?"

"First, that the work is external to the worker, that it is not part of his nature; and that, consequently, he does not fulfill himself in his work but denies himself, has a feeling of misery rather than well being, does not develop freely his mental and physical energies but is physically exhausted and mentally debased.

"The worker, therefore, feels himself at home only during his leisure time, whereas at work he feels homeless. His work is not voluntary but imposed, forced labour. It is not the satisfaction of a need, but only a means for satisfying other needs. It's alien character is clearly shown by the fact that as soon as there is no physical or other compulsion, it is avoided like the plague.

"External labour, labour in which man alienates himself, is a labour of self-sacrifice, or mortification. Finally, the external character of work for the worker is shown by the fact that it is not his own work but work for someone else, that in work he does not belong to himself but to another person.

rather subtle form of masturbation. What I am trying to say, in my fuddle-headed female fashion, is that we are not frigid, it is your much vaunted technique that leaves us cold.

By the way, I am not a sour 22-year-old virgin. I am not inexperienced, just disillusioned. I am tired of lying on my back pretending pleasure which I don't feel in order not to damage some "super-male's" ego. Nor am I alone. Any woman who has found the courage to be honest will tell you how many times she has feigned pleasure.

I am all for sex. I have, in fact found happiness and satisfaction with a man who has had the sensitivity and humility to consider my needs as well as his own. This man is no super-male Engineer, but a historian.

In conclusion, I would like to point out to you, dear David, that satisfaction of your lust, "submission to the overwhelming, ecstatic power of his gorgeous cock" does not constitute a "real" human relationship. Human relationships are built on love, on sharing and understanding, not on masturbation.

'Penis Power' is a subtle form of masturbation

This is really not addressed to you, dear editor, but to David Alden, Engineering III, and all his fellows.

Dear David,
I read with great interest your letter to the Varsity (Nov. 25). I feel that you and all your merry, fun-loving comrades should have read the article on pp 19 and 20 of the same edition of the Varsity. In case you missed it, here is the gist: it ain't us, dear, it's you! In plainer terms, "Penis Power" is a

Does female sexuality 'castrate' men?

In answer to David Alden, the "proud" engineer whose comments appeared in the Nov 25 issue of the Varsity:

He asserted in his letter: "We engineers are male chauvinists in that we are proud of our sexuality."

This seems to imply that male sexuality is in some way connected with male chauvinism, or the feeling of male supremacy. Does this "proud" young man feel that his sexuality hinges on his superiority, his dominance, his ability to control a woman? Would he feel his sexuality threatened by a relationship based on mutual interaction between two people on all levels — spiritual, emotional, and physical? Would he, in fact, feel "castrated" if a woman exerted her own sexuality?

He wondered why the recent engineering slave auction, despite its lack of whips and "just having fun" attitude, was found objectionable by so many people. I think this was because, regardless of its being conducted seriously or in fun, it had distinct overtones of a one-way relationship, in which attraction between the sexes is a male-initiated and male-executed activity, rather than a mutual process between two people. A relationship based on this type of mutual interaction (the aim of Women's Liberationist groups) implies castrated males and "maladjusted" females only if you assume that male sexuality relies on dominance and female sexuality on submissiveness.

I find it ironic that this young man considers members of Women's Liberationist groups to be suffering from "inner sexual maladjustments and frustrations" simply because they prefer to actively assert their own sexuality, rather than passively submit to his.

David Alden also implied that engineers feel that the "super-male" image, so often attached to them, is unfair. This is very likely true. I find it difficult to believe that the individual engineer lives the life that the Toike seems to indicate he does. But I do wonder why engineers perpetuate this false image, (if indeed, it is false) by supporting slave auctions, the Toike Oike, and other "good satirical fun."

A group of whites may carry signs protesting against the equality of Negroes "all in fun", but to what extent does one person's fun not become another's aggravation?

Shot, not beaten

Re: Brian Johnson's article "Vive le Quebec Libre" in Dec 7th's Varsity.

Johnson quotes Mr Therrien as saying that Marc Carboneau was "beaten in police station No 4 on June 24, 1968"

I understood that Mr. Therrien was referring to Jacques Lanctot, rather than Marc Carboneau in this incident. If it was a misprint or mistake, I hope it will be corrected in the next issue of The Varsity.

David Howden
UCII

(Ed. Note: You are right, Therrien) was referring to Lanctot in this case. Carboneau, Therrien said, was shot in the back during a taxi drivers' demonstration.

Skidoos—the easy way

On the occasion of Open House, November 6, 1970 at the University of Western Ontario in London, M. Jean Chretien, minister of Indian Affairs, delivered a speech on the subject of Indians in Canada. Following this, he participated with students in a forum. In reply to a question which compared the situation of Indians and Quebecois, M. Chretien said,

"All that Quebecers want is a ski-do and to speak French."

That a federal minister should say this at any time would be lamentable; when he says it in the midst of a crisis which is exposing the conditions of life for many in Quebec is incredible and indicative of gross insensitivity. The unemployment in Quebec is perpetually higher than the Canadian average. With 28.6% of the population of Canada, Quebec is home to 40% of the unemployed, 38% of Montrealers live on $4,000 or less annually; 25% on less than $3,000. Without apportioning blame for the conditions of life in Quebec, it still must be said that such a gratuitous comment is shoddy and unworthy.

MY

No sisters in Woodstock Nation

I grew up on Peter Tripp, the Curley headed kid in the Third Row (an AM DJ in the late fifties in New York City). I spent a lot of time after school following the social life of the kids on American Bandstand. Then in high school I spent most of my time in my room with the radio avoiding family fights. Rock became the thing that helped fill the loneliness and empty spaces in my life. The sound became sort of an alter world where I daydreamed — a whole vicarious living out of other people's romances and lives. Sally Go Round the Roses. Donna.

In college rock was one of the things that got me together with other people. Hours spent in front of a mirror learning how to dance, going to twist parties — getting freakier — tripping off the whole outlaw thing of My Generation and Satisfaction. I was able to dance rock and talk rock comfortably in a college atmosphere where everything else was mystified and intellectualized out of my comprehension and control. You didn't have to have heavy or profound thoughts about rock — you just knew that you dug it.

A whole sense of a people together behind their own music. It was the only thing we had of our own where the values weren't set up by the famous wise professors. It was the way not to get old and deadened in white Amerika. We wore hip clothes and smoked dope and dropped acid. Going to San Francisco with flowers in our hair.

For a couple years when I was with a man I remember feelin pretty good — lots of people around, a scene I felt I had some control over — getting a lot of mileage off being a groovy couple. For as long as I was his woman I was protected and being a freak was an up because it made me feel like I had an identity.

When I split from him a whole other trip started. It got harder and harder to be a groovy chick when I had to deal with an endless series of one night stands and people crashing and always doing the shit work — thinking and being told that the only reason I wasn't digging being a freak was because I was too uptight. Going to Woodstock all but bare-breasted somewhere in the middle of all that and thinking I was fucked up for not being able to have more fun than I was having. In a world where the ups were getting fewer and fewer, rock still continued to turn me on.

Then I connected to the women's movement and took a second look at rock.

THE SOUNDS OF SILENCE: It took me a whole lot of times of going to the Fillmore and listening to records and reading Rolling tone before it even registered that what I was seeing and hearing was not all these different groups, but all these different groups of men. And once I noticed that, it was hard not to be constantly noticing all the names on the albums, all the people doing sound and lights, all the voices on the radio, even the DJ's between the songs — they were ALL men. IN FACT, THE ONLY PLACE I could look to see anyone who looked anything like me, was in the audience, and even there, there were usually more men than women.

It occurred to me that maybe there were some good reasons besides inadequacy that I had never taken all my fantasies about being a rock musician very seriously. I don't think I ever even told anyone about them. Because for the female 51% of Woodstock Nation that I belong to, there isn't any place to be in any creative kind of way. It's a pretty exclusive world.

There are, of course, exceptions. I remember hearing about some "all-chick" bands on the West Coast, like the Ace of Cups, and also remember reading about how they were laughed and hooted at with a general "take them off the stage and fuck them" attitude. And how they were given the spot in between the up-and-coming group and the big name group — sort of for comic relief. Or the two women I saw once who played with the Incredible String Band. They both played instruments and looked terrified through the entire concert. (I kept thinking how brave they were to be there at all.) The two men treated them as backdrops — they played back-up and zany harmony, and in fact they were introduced as Rose and Licorice — no last names. The men thought it was cute that they were there, and they had such cute names. No one either on stage or in the audience related to them as musicians. But they sure were sweet and pretty.

It blew my mind the first time I heard about a woman playing an electric guitar. Partly because of the whole idea we have that women can't understand anything about electronics (and we're not even supposed to want to), and also because women are supposed to be composed, gentle, play soft songs. A guy once told my sister when she picked up his electric guitar that women were meant to play only folk guitar, like Joan Baez or Judy Collins, that electric guitars were un-feminine. There are other parallel myths that have kept us out of rock — women aren't strong enough to play the drums, women aren't aggressive enough to play good, driving rock.

And then there is the whole other category of exception — the "chick" singer. The one place, besides groupie, where the stag club allows any space for women to exist. And the women who make it there pretty much have to be incredible to break in, and they are — take for instance Janis Joplin and Aretha Franklin. It's a lot like the rest of the world where women have to be twice as good just to be acceptable.

WORDS OF LOVE: Getting all this together in my head about the massive exclusion of women from rock left me with some heavy bad feelings. But still there was all that charged rock energy to dig. But what was that all about anyway? Stokely Carmichael once said that all through his childhood he went to the movies to see Westerns and cheered wildly for the cowboys, until one day he realized, that being black he was really an Indian and all those years he had been rooting for his own destruction. Listening to rock songs became an experience a lot like that for me. Getting turned on to Under My Thumb a revenge song filled with hatred for women, made me feel crazy. And it wasn't an isolated musical moment that I could frown about and forget. We are cunts, sometimes ridiculous (Twentieth Century Fox), sometimes mysterious (Ruby Tues- day), sometimes bitchy (Get a Job) and sometimes just plain cunts (Wild Thing).

... but they didn't tell us that in the movie

And all that sexual energy that seems to be the essence of rock is really energy that climaxes in fucking over women — endless lyrics and a sound filled with feelings I thought I was relating to but couldn't relate to — attitudes about women like put downs, domination, threats, pride, mockery, fucking around and a million different levels of woman hating. For some reason the Beatles' "rather see you dead little girl than to see you with another man" pops into my head. But it's a random choice. Admittedly there are some other kinds of songs — a few with nice feelings, a lot with a cool macho stance toward life, and a lot with no feelings at all, a realm where, say, the Procol Harum shines pretty well at being insipid or obscure (A Whiter Shade of Pale). But to catalogue the anti-woman songs alone would make up almost a complete history of rock.

This all hit home to me with knock-out force at a recent Stones concert when Mick, prancing about enticingly with whip in hand, suddenly switched gears and went into Under My Thumb with an incredible vengeance that upped the energy level and brought the entire audience to its feet dancing on the chairs. Mass wipe-out for women — myself included.

Contrast this with the songs that really do speak to women where our feelings are at, songs that Janis and Aretha sing of their own experience of being women, of the pain and humiliation of love. And it's not all in the lyrics. When Aretha sings the Beatles' Let It Be she changes it from a sort of decadent sounding song of resignation to a hymnal of hope. A different tone coming from a different place.

The Great Pretenders: The whole star trip in rock is another realm where macho reigns supreme. At the center of the rock universe is the star — flooded in light, offset by the light show, and the source of incredible volumes of sound. The audience remains totally in darkness: the Stones kept thousands waiting several hours till nightfall before they would come on stage at Altamont. The stage is set for the men to parade around acting out violence/sex fantasies, sometimes fucking their guitars then smashing them, writhing bare chested with leather fringe flying, while the whole spectacle is enlarged 100 times on a movie screen behind them. And watching a group like the Mothers of Invention perform is a lesson in totalitarianism — seeing Frank Zappa define sound and silence with a mere gesture of his hand. There is no psychic or visual or auditory space for anyone but the performer — even if 400,000 are gathered. This intensity could be fantastic but it is abused — I remember Jesse Colin Young of the Youngbloods turning to his audience with disdain "the least you could do is clap along." First you force the audience into passivity and then you imply that they are fucked up for not moving.

SMILE ON YOUR BROTHER: Something else about the audience — even after I realized women were barred from any active participation in rock music, it took me a while to see that we weren't even considered a real part of the listening audience. At first I thought I was being paranoid, but then I heard so many musicians address the audience as if it were all male — "I know you all want to find a good woman," "When you take your ol' lady home tonight . . ." "This is what you do with a no good woman", etc. etc. It was clear that the concerts were directed only to men, and the women were not considered people but more on the level of exotic domestic animals that come with their masters or come to find masters. Only men are assumed smart enough to understand the intricacies of the music. Frank Zappa laid it out when he said that men come to hear the music and chicks come for sex thrills. Dig it!

It was a real shock to put this all together and realize rock music itself — all the way from performing artist to listener — refuses to allow any valid place for women. And yet I know there would never be rock festivals and concerts if women weren't there — even though we have nothing to do with the music. Somehow we're very necessary to rock culture.

Women are required at rock events to pay homage to the rock world — a world made up of thousands of men, usually found in groups of fours and fives. Homage paid by offering sexual accessibility, orgasmic applause, group worship, gang bangs at Altamont. The whole rock scene (as opposed to rock music) depends on us being there. Women are necessary at these places of worship so that, in between the sets, the real audience (men) can be assured of getting that woman they're told about in the lyrics. And what is that woman supposed to be like? Well it's not enough to be just a plain old cunt — we have to be beautiful and even that's not enough — we've got to be groovy — you know, not uptight, not demanding, not jealous or clinging or strong or smart or anything but loving in a way that never cuts back on a man's freedom. And so women remain the last legitimate form of property that the brothers can share in a communal world. Can't have a tribal gathering without music and dope and beautiful groovy chicks.

For the musicians themselves there is their own special property — groupies. As one groupie put it: "Being a groupie is full-time gig. Sort of like being a musician . . . you have two or three girlfriends you hang out with and you stay as high and as intellectually enlightened as a group of musicians. You've got to if you're going to have anything to offer . . . you are a non-profit call girl, geisha, friend, housekeeper; whatever the musician needs."

This total disregard and disrespect for women is constant in the rock world and has no exceptions. Not even Janis Joplin, the all time queen of rock. She made her pain evident in all her blues — that's what made them real. And the male rock world made her pay for that vulnerability in countless ways. Since women don't get to play the instruments, it means they're always on stage with nothing to relate to but the microphone, and nothing between them and the audience but their own bodies. So it is not surprising that Janis became an incredible sex object and was related to as a cunt with an outsize voice. Almost everyone even vaguely connected to rock heard malicious stories about how easy she was to fuck. This became part of her legend and no level of stardom could protect her because when you get down to it she was just a woman.

Because she was at the top and a woman, her success was so threatening to some pig interviewer that he had to hammer her with accusations about who she was sleeping with until he broke her and she cried saying, "I thought you were my friend."

AND WHO COULD BE FOOLIN' ME? And whoever thought this was all the brothers were offering us when they rapped about the revolution? Why do we stick with it? Women identified with youth culture as the only alternative to our parents' uptight and unhappy way of life. We linked up with rock and never saw how it fucked us over. Partly this was because we had no sense of being women together with other women. Partly this was because it was impossible to think of ourselves as performing as exhibitionists in macho sex roles, so we didn't wonder why there weren't more of us on stage. Partly because we identified with the men and not other women when we heard lyrics that put women down. And a lot because we have been completely cut off from perceiving what and who really are on our side and what and who don't want to see us as whole people.

We have been told until we too believed that we are crazy and weak and dependent and irrational and frivolous and unattractive and stupid. In culture after culture men have destroyed our minds and fucked over our bodies.

In a world of men, Janis sang our songs. It is time for us to reclaim the Janis Joplins and the Billie Holidays and the Marilyn Monroes that belong to us and have always belonged to us even if we didn't always see it. As Billie Holiday said, "It's the easiest thing in the world to say every broad for herself — saying it and acting that way is one thing that has kept us behind the eight ball where we have been living for years."

There is no reason for us to go back into the alienation and isolation of Woodstock Nation. Not in Woodstock Nation or in any of the other cultures men have forced and will try to force on women. It can't be now. We don't want to force a culture on anyone — we want to make space for every human being to be real in.

I FEEL AWE AT OUR possibilities, wondering where our unhampered feelings can lead us to — what culture, what society, what education, what music and dance, what ways of living will be ours? Inside each woman is an energy that is glorious and wild. Our combined energies can change the world.

Pollution movie projects future with realistic horror

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

When a science-fiction movie asks, "Wouldn't it be terrible if such-and-such happened?", the usual audience reaction is, "I'll say! But it's only a story." Such may be the response to 50-foot tall gorillas, mad scientists and squishy amoeba-blob things. But not to No Blade of Grass.

Most sci-fi flicks depend for thrills on the possible-but-improbable, and, like Planet of the Apes, become just an amusing diversion. No Blade of Grass avoids this pitfall, choosing instead to exist in the world of the very-possible-and-frighteningly-probable. The result is a fearful proximity to reality equal to such non-fiction fiction predecessors as Fail-Safe and 2001.

The time is the very near future; no more than five years from now. Mining has pockmarked and exhausted the surface of the earth. Waste and sewage is dumped indiscriminately into major lakes and all the oceans. Heavy industry keeps belching poison smoke into the air. Suddenly in China there is a serious epidemic of plague caused by a hardy virus that evolved from a combination of pollutants. Killing most forms of plant life, the germ spreads uncontrollably through Europe, Asia, Africa and most of South America. As the famine grows worse, governments topple, anarchy breaks out in the most civilized countries, and upwards of 600 million people perish.

John Custance (Nigel Davenport), a London resident, has foreseen this disaster and built an armed fortification deep in the back-country of Northern England. No Blade of Grass follows Custance as he leads his family and a small community of refugees as they hike as far away as possible from the population centers of Britain.

Producer-director Wilde keeps his film moving at a brisk, exciting clip that maintains a high state of tension at all times. With his guidance, Davenport and the other actors blend very easily and very well into their roles, and succeed in conveying the impression that these are indeed real people in flight. Wilde also has an unerring gift for staging violence of all kinds. Shootouts, ambushes and guerrilla fighting are handled in a sharp, clean manner, with much blood when necessary, but without gore for its own sake.

Unfortunately, Wilde has included little episodes or shots that tend to lessen the impact of the movie in general. The desire to create a documentary atmosphere is clearly evident, but this reality momentarily breaks down when the director inserts flash-forwards of eventual obstacles and bloodshed.

But as Custance's problems multiply, Wilde abandons these fancy distractions in favour of good old-fashioned edge-of-the-seat suspense. Especially memorable is the group's bloody confrontation with a pack of murdering motorcycle hoods.

No Blade of Grass mercifully avoids any overt editorializing. It lets the facts speak for themselves and does not pretend to be the spearhead for a renewed social awareness of the problems of pollution. But it prods you into thinking about the distinct possibility of an ecological catastrophe, and that's the first step in the right direction.

Aural experience of poetry theatre's aim

By PAT LIMA

Wright-Off the Page — getting the words of poetry right off the printed page and into the air; seeing the poet as playwright, and hence, attempting to capture the dramatic elements in poetry; getting right off traditional, beaten "poetical" tracks; a rite, or ritual offering; a write-off, a total failure? These are just some of the things suggested to me by Michael Mecina, director, chief organizer, and sometimes actor for St. Michael's Little Pocom Theatre group.

Wright-Off the Page is described by Mecina as "an evening of modern sound"; and the entire evening is the result of the director's particular views on modern poetry. It is Mecina's aim to expand the aural experience of poetry, by transferring poetry from the silent medium of print into the medium of sound. If modern poetry is read, silently, "on the page", it is only partially appreciated. To be fully experienced, poetry, and especially modern poetry, must be heard, rather than read. Mecina emphasized the essential musical element in much of modern poetry: words, like notes in a musical composition, are juxtaposed, not for any thematic relevance, but rather for an aurally aesthetic effect. The particular arrangement of sounds, the composition of word-notes, Mecina calls a "soundscape".

A concern with sound leads him to an interesting re-evaluation of silence as a tool of poetry. Poets like John Cage use silence as an integral part of their "soundscapes". An evening of modern sound is also it seems an evening of modern silence.

Mecina is sometimes over-zealous in his attempts to get poetry "off the page". Included in his program are a number of concrete poems — poems that depend to a great extent on the arrangement of words on the page. (A poem about the crucifixion, for example, might be printed on the page in the shape of a cross.) Mecina is attempting to shift a spatial arrangement into a sound pattern; to compensate for the resulting loss of visual stimulation, Mecina uses stylized body movements and gestures borrowed from modern dance. A transition of this kind is difficult to accomplish successfully, and Mecina is the first to admit that his treatment of concrete poetry is little more than an entertaining experiment.

In keeping with the director's view of poetry as a kind of musical composition, the Improvisation Ensemble, under the direction of Alex Pauk will intersperse the evening's soundscape with a series of musical improvisations. In addition several of the poems on the program have been set to music.

If you have an interest in modern poetry or modern music, if your particular thing is drama, if you are intrigued by the idea of shifting media, if you have ears, then "an evening of modern sound might be an evening well spent

FULLER'S EARTH

Operating Manual for Spaceship Earth

by R. Buckminster Fuller, Simon and Schuster of Canada,
$1.25

By GARY BOYD

A) Screwmaster Fuller, our spiritual leader plucky bucky's dunned it again! Multiplying flying fishes from his New-England saltmarsh retreat, the prophet child of the Old Comprehensive Anticipatorially designing (e.g. Teddy Roosevelt) Worldmasters, has multiplied his pronouncements an hundredthousandfold thanks to Pocketbooks Canada Ltd., who've just brought out a cheap edition of his pocket preface to an Operating Manual for Spaceshit Urth. — pocketbooks No. 78046 at your local Loblaw.

Of course this operating manual doesn't tell you how to turn-the-earth-ON, let alone how to turn it OFF IN CASE OF EMERGENTcy; nor does it give you the phone number of the nearest service depot. But aside from that, Mrs. Kennedy, it'll help you to keep your husband's biggest yacht smelling sweet. (P.S. Fuller doesn't come with it, in case you older women are taking seriously your anticipatorial designs.)

At the price, you can afford to keep your place in this edition by tearing the crummy newspaper pages off as you read them (the sheets don't smoke so good but they are fairly absorbent); the cover you can stick in the crib of some commerce student suffering from sensory deprivation. All in all, a useful book.

B) Where were we? The thread of the threnody of the Great Pirates runs through so much of Fuller's expatiation on his life, works and beliefs; that there is some danger of the poverty of this historicism obscuring the very real worth of much that he says and does. But that worth is there; is here in the so-called "operating manual", which is nothing of the kind but rather a plea for an awakening of human consciousness regarding the nature of life and the physical limitations and opportunities for manking in space-time.

Fuller is a prophet, and moreover one endowed with the power to work synergetic dymaxion miracles. Fertilize him with a few dollars and he'll lay you a dream dome to sbelter you from a lifetime of fears.

That's not it at all, really — less is more. The friendly Massachusetts yankee is no travelling pleasedome peddler, but rather a stern puritan who has consecrated his life to a belief in the resurrection of mankind through technology, and as even Paul Goodman will admit, there is no real possibility of turning our backs on technology now. We survive through our Golem or not at all. Read Kenneth Boulding's The Meaning of the Twentieth Century as a sequel.

C) XC9300725905 KEYWRD: SYNERGETIC-REGENERATIONEARTH/AUTHOR: FULLER/RB/USA/1895-1977/OTHRWRKS: Education Automation (or how the Carbondale campus of the U. of Southern Illinois was begot, with useful bywords on educating GENERALISTS); Nine Chains to the Moon (a trip with No More Secondhand God (and Fuller is his prophet); etc. Wrk ABOUT Fuller: The Dymaxion World of Buckminster Fuller, by Robert W. Marks (a lavishly illustrated biography and commentary particularly of interest to architects and other designers).

THISWRK: Operating Manual for Spaceship Earth. Fuller is a designer, and if you wonder a little at what that may imply, I recommend a paperback by Boguslaw, entitled The New Utopians. Fuller is a poetical prosodist, and if McLuhan isn't a sufficient example of what this implies, go back to Sir Thomas Browne and compare his essay "The Garden of Cyrus; or the Quincuncial Lozenge or Network Plantations of the Ancients, Artificially, Naturally, and Mystically Considered" with Fuller's chapter five, and with his other writings on "synergetic-energetic" geometry (it is by alternating quincunxes with triangles that one can construct a geodesic dome, not otherwise.)

Fuller is a radical conservative saved by his vaulting architectonic imagination from the Fate who caught Ayn Rand. Like Disraeli, he would do much for the poor to help themselves, and does.

D) There are several mistakes of fact in Fuller's book. The most serious one is his denial of the fact of the population explosion. According to Fuller, "the population explosion is a myth. As we industrialize, down goes the birth rate. If we survive, by 1985 the whole world will be industrialized . . . and the birthrate will be dwindling."

Compare this with J. J. Spengler, (Science 166, 14 Nov. 1969, p. 1234): "It is not surprising that population threatens to overtake the food supply . . . Suppose the current world food supply is increased eightfold, even then should world population continue to grow at a rate falling within the range of rates projected by the U. N. secretariat to the year 2000 — 1.5 to 2.2% — it also would outpace by the latter part of the next century or soon thereafter. Population would continue to grow for some time even after the 'true rate' of increase had descended to zero."

Another serious factual mistake is Fuller's confusion of conservation of energy (a fact) with conservation of AVAILABLE energy — which, alas, is not a fact. In order to ensure an indefinite supply of useable energy we must reach out into space somehow.

If Fuller has twisted Truth's tail a little when it comes to entropy, scarcity and overpopulation, he has not done so without reason. For scarcity seems to imply competition, and competition aggression, and aggression war. But today war on any appreciable scale implies our extermination. Fuller knows that with co-operative anticipatory design, a very large population can live, in many ways, very well, on this earth. (Although from a material consumption point of view, only a fraction of the present world population can live the way middle class Americans do now.) If co-operation is imperative, and if certain ideas tend to work against co-operation, then those ideas must be put away.

However, before we choose to ignore fundamental truths, it behooves us to check the links between those truths and the destructive acts we wish to avoid. The entropic constraint itself, limited resources and population explosions are not, of themselves, the causes of aggressive competition; rather, the main things that stand in the way of Fuller's vision of co-operation are the gluttonous dreams of material consumption on the one hand ("Free world") and the gluttonous dreams of Marxist-Leninist-Maoist ideology elsewhere.

It is not necessary to bend Truth to usher in Utopia. It is necessary to bend advertising, entertainment and Art to create human aspirations which lead toward indefinitely protracted survival and development rather than toward oblivion.

With visions of "Mustangs" and superhighways, Sputniks and computocracy in their heads, the people shall certainly perish

U of T Symphony shows musical and technical excellence

By TONY JAHN

Listening to the University of Toronto Symphony last Friday night, at times one tended to lose sight of the fact that this is primarily a teaching facility for music students. Several aspects of that concert, notably the Symphony No. 1 by Harry Somers needed no pedagogical raison d'être as the 83-member orchestra under conductor Victor Feldbrill conjured up enough musicality and technical prowess to justify this and any other concert they care to give.

The evening opened with Brahms' Tragic Overture, Op. 81. The more intricate details of this work were often glossed over in Mr. Feldbrill's excessively fast reading. The tempo seemed hurried not only in relation to most other interpretations but in relation to the inherent nature of the work itself. Dotted rhythms lost their exquisite angularity as the somber dignity of the overture was jostled along. While this is not a sad work it is definitely one of darker colouration, and shades of expression often tended towards a mezzoforte melange.

The second item on the programme, Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat is a difficult work. This statement does not distinguish the work from Mozart's other late symphonies, indeed, from all of his mature output. Schnabel's famous statement about Mozart's piano sonatas ("too easy for children, too difficult for adults") may be adopted here, since the 39th Symphony is replete with exposed string passages in unison and orchestral nuances which would test any ensemble, always striving for the ultimate effect of deceptive simplicity. Friday's attempt at presenting this robust yet fragile work intact was generally successful. Mr. Feldbrill's interpretation was idiomatic and expressive and the orchestra responded delicately but with power, encompassing a considerable range of expressions. As in most string sections, here also there was a certain amount of intonation difficulty, blurring the graceful contours of some especially exposed passages. The over-all effect, meant to be a translucent Botticelli, emerged as a slightly hazy but lush Renoir. But this in itself is no grounds for complaint.

There can be no quibbling about the orchestra's tour de force, the Symphony No. 1 by Harry Somers. This early work, written almost 20 years ago by one of Canada's best contemporary composers, takes up the better part of an hour. In that time it systematically explores the orchestral palette beginning an eloquent recitativo prologue for unison violins and culminating in massive orchestral tuttis. Mr. Feldbrill showed his affinity for modern music in the sustained excitement of his presentation. He drew a cultured sensitive response from the orchestra, including a beautiful solo passage from concertmaster Joseph Peleg.

It is this type of work which establishes the U of T Symphony as a first rate student orchestra, a rank which is but one removed from the fully professional symphonies plying their trade across North America today. And getting that close with an orchestra which by its nature is impermanent, subjected to an annual 25% turnover in membership, is a frustrating but beautiful experience.

ROM exhibit shows new and old

By LEIGH COLBORNE

Total environment and the connection between primitive and modern worlds are stressed at the New Guinea art exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum. Simon and Garfunkle alternate with jungle cries and tribal chants. The mural, burning orange with strong black lines, seems modern yet echoes the designs on the shields, woven masks and ancestral monuments. Net cages the ceiling and reinforces the display glass, but also serves as pig and human snares for the native warrior. Even the display cases, reproductions of grass huts, reflect the New Guinea life style.

Although most artifacts bear familiar resemblance, no two are ever alike, for a primitive form of copyright exists to protect the designs of various artisans. The human form, the central motif of most designs, is subordinated to the structure of the particular work. Bone formation often eases into a sweeping curve and eyes are abstracted to intense, staring orbs. All but two of the artifacts shown are battle implements or religious symbols, possibly accounting for the fervor of design, the twisting, excited line and simplified form. Perhaps the most impressive work in the display is a Massina dance shield, which is intricately carved in a sort of primitive paisley design. A unique exhibit, instructive yet entertaining. Until January 10.

Medieval revivals unsuccessful at UC

By GARY BARKER

If medieval plays are to be accurately reproduced, why should medieval audiences not also take part?

There's a free double bill at the UC Playhouse this week: THE FOUR PP and PRIMA PASTORUM, directed, produced and starred in by Fr. Genesius Jones, (who is naturally enough, a scholar of medieval drama.) And unfortunately, it is upon this that the plays founder.

Fr. Jones has attempted to revive medieval drama in its original form, for the sake of authenticity. But Prima Pastorum, especially, seems to be more an attempt to substantiate his theory of the play, than an attempt to produce enjoyable theatre. Both plays contained innumerable bawdy and witty jokes, and some scenes were hilariously funny. (Did you ever hear dirty Latin?) But some of the best humour was missed simply because much of the dialogue was unintelligible.

To make matters worse, the production was extremely inconsistent, even schizophrenic. Half of the acting, language costumes, etc. was indeed medieval, but the other half was purely contemporary (e.g. an apothecary in a lab coat, complete with plastic stethoscope!)

Mercifully, the plays were very short. All the same, wouldn't it be easier on the audience if they were free to talk, eat, and wander around as did their predecessors?

THE FOUR PP. & PRIMA PASTORUM, until Dec. 12, at UC Playhouse, 8:30.

SMC Council will lose student membership

By VINCENT DOLAN
The Student Senate at St. Mike's has voted 10-9 to withdraw from the College Council, almost the top-governing body at SMC (under the Basilian Fathers).

The Council consists of well over 100 faculty and seven students; the Student Senate demand is that the council be restructured along parity lines.

Following the vote on withdrawal last Tuesday, the Senate voted unanimously to support the concept of student equality on all governing bodies at SMC.

The Senate also voted to set up a five-man sub-committee to study the recommendations of the "Committee to Study the Government of the University of St. Michael's College" (SMUG), a staff/student parity body.

The Senate's sub-committee, co-chaired by its two women members, will formulate the student response to SMUG's call for a formal break from the Roman Church, for "constituency control" of residences, dining rooms, etc., and for four students on a top-governing body of 24. They will be holding open meetings throughout December and January.

The sub-committee will also be examining the mysterious disappearance of at least one minority report to SMUG, on the Americanization of the SMC faculty. He pointed out that 66 per cent of the German, 62.5 per cent of the Classics, 52.9 per cent of the English, and 50 per cent of the French Department are Canadian.

Students fight JMC 300 exam

By A. B. DICK

Students in "Modern China in Revolution", an interdisciplinary course, voted almost unanimously this week to have the final exam made optional.

The course is run jointly by the Departments of History and Political Economy and includes three lecturers: Professors F. Gerson, D. M. Johnston and John Saywell.

Students were led to believe at the start of the course in September that there would be an "option" as to methods of final evaluation. Most students say they thought this meant that it was not mandatory to write an exam.

Then on Wednesday of last week, a small mimeographed sheet was handed out in class. It began: "There will be a final examination composed of two parts . . ." and further, "On Wednesday December 9th in the lecture period all members of the staff will be present to discuss with the students the reasons for this decision and the form of the exam. At the end of that meeting you will be asked to vote for one of the following options regarding how the exam is written . . ."

The notice goes on to list a three-hour exam; half take home and half supervised exam; and half take-home, half one day "mini take-home".

Several tutorials in the course have already been organized to challenge this decision. If the professors refuse to consider a change, many of the students in the course have indicated that they will abstain from voting and therefore deny a majority to any of the pseudo-"options".

"Refrigerators are important. But I don't intend wearing one on my finger for the rest of my life. It's different about The Diamond. It's for a long time. Like forever and ever.

We went to Birks because we knew that's where we'd get the most diamond his hard-earned money could buy. Not something tiny for a fortune. And not something big and bright worth very little.

The one we found turned out to be less expensive than we expected. But because it was Birks, we knew we were getting exactly the quality we were paying for. (Birks now has diamonds of different qualities at prices to match each quality.)

Job agency nixes midi-wearer

By BOB GAUTHIER

A girl has withdrawn her card from the files of an employment agency because she felt she was being treated as a sex symbol.

A. L. Bowland, who was being interviewed for a job by Kelly Girl Service of Canada Ltd. was told that her dress would not be acceptable to some firms. (The midi dress she was wearing at the time was of moderate colour and texture.) In the four years she has worked (including work for two employment agencies) Bowland says she has never received complaints about her dress.

"Kelly Girl Service does not like temporary employees to wear midi skirts," she said. "I thought about it and got really mad. Everything was allowed except my one dress, probably because it was too unorthodox by their definition."

She received a letter from the manager of the agency stating that Kelly Girl Service was "very liberal" regarding dress. However, Bowland did not like the paternalistic attitude of the manager's letter. "He thought I was being stupid," she said.

Bowland wrote the agency two weeks ago saying, "you can remove my card from your files". She complained that although Kelly office girl staff were dressed unnaturally, her dress, conservative by comparison, was rejected.

Barbara Glover, the supervisor at the agency who interviewed Bowland said yesterday that the agency "does not know what the standards (of dress) of a certain office are." It therefore suggests that girls going into an office for the first time "wear something in-between".

"Two offices we know of do not want girls in midi skirts", she said. Glover said that certain offices, "such as Royal Trust" are "very liberal". "Their girls can come in anything — mini skirts, pant suits, ... but we might receive complaints from a conservative bank."

"I liked the way Miss Bowland was dressed," Glover said. "The whole story was just a vast misunderstanding. I was very sorry about it."

Bowland said it was obvious the agency wanted her to wear a mini skirt because her dress was not "eye-catching" enough. "What it comes down to is that they (Kelly Girl) wanted me to be a sex symbol."

THE DRUZE

ARAB FIGHTERS FOR ISRAEL

For the past twenty-two years, the 50,000 Arab Israelis of Druze faith have fought alongside their Jewish countrymen in defense of Israel. Like their Jewish countrymen, all young Druze serve three years in the Israeli army. They are considered among the elite fighters of Israel's armed forces, serving with special distinction in such critical units as the border patrols.

THEY ARE ARABS! THEY SPEAK ARABIC! THEIR RELIGION IS AN OFF-SHOOT OF ISLAM!
WHY THEN DO THEY STAND UP FOR ISRAEL?

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

Most Druze live in Syria, about 250,000. There, as in all Arab states, they are considered a sect of Islam, and not a distinct religion. Important ceremonies, like marriage, etc., must be performed by Moslem clergy in order to be recognized by the state. Druze clergy have no official status in Syria. The resulting animosity between Moslem and Druze has been simmering for centuries.

In Israel, the Druze faith is recognized by the state, and Druze clergy and religious courts are on equal status with their Jewish, Moslem and Christian counterparts. The Druze appreciate this freedom, and are willing to fight for the country that gives it to them.

THE GOLAN HEIGHTS A BONUS FOR ISRAEL

When Israel captured the Golan Heights from Syria in the June 1967 war, all the Arab inhabitants fled, EXCEPT THE DRUZE! In spite of twenty years of anti-Israel propaganda, these Syrian Druze chose to remain under Israeli authority. They had heard of the religious freedom granted their people by the Jewish state.

THE 8,000 DRUZE IN GOLAN WILL NOT READILY SUBMIT TO SYRIAN RULE!

COMMENT AND OPINION

The Middle East Forum approves of the religious freedom enjoyed by the Druze and other minorities in Israel. We suspect that Jewish concern for the rights of minorities is unique, and is based on their own long and tragic history as a minority in other lands.

Once again, the Middle East Forum accuses the News Media of ignoring an important and fascinating component of the complex Middle East scene. We intend to make known the facts - the story of these Arab Fighters for Israel.

Fund-raising car rally

Our National Bobsled team battles finances, apathy

By CLIVE HOBSON

Heads bent, muscles screaming in defiance of the assault placed upon them. Poised on four runners of hardened steel only inches from the ice, a bobsled is capable of travelling one mile in a minute and nine seconds.

The Canadian National Bobsled team competes in obscurity as they struggle to regain a lost honour; every man muscle and limb defies injury or death competing against the world's best, over a mile-long snaking tunnel of ice.

REASON, IF YOU WILL, how a sport that defies death at every turn can be rated as "Class B" by the Canadian government. Does it seem incredible? It has been suggested by some members of the national team, that should the Minister of National Health and Welfare, John Munro, take just on ride on the back of a four-man bobsled, his opinion would change before the end of the quarter mile!

In 1968, Munro established two categories of competitive sports. In Class A and eligible for full financial support were: hockey, skydiving, swimming, track and field and skiing. In Class B, and all scrambling for the bottom of the financial barrel, were the likes of softball, flycasting, soccer, badminton and bobsledding.

To compete in the world championships and the other competitions which lead up to them is an expensive proposition. A four-man sled costs about $2,000. Then we must take into account the expense of shipping the sleds half-way around the world; the transportation of eight team members and the cost of accommodation during the competition and trials the week before.

LET'S NOT FORGET also that nowhere in Canada is there a regulation bobsled run that the team can use for practice prior to the start of the season. As a result, they are forced to travel to the States or even to Europe in order to have the opportunity of training together.

It seems incredible that despite all these handicaps and the general lack of support, the Canadian National team still manages to go into other team's backyards and come back winners. The Canadians are respected around the world.

This year, in order to raise funds to subsidize their international competition, the Canadian Bobsled Association is holding a car rally for students in Metro Toronto. The rally is to be held tomorrow and the winning team will receive an all expense paid trip to Lake Placid for the Kennedy Games. There they will be able to see the team compete against opposition from the United States and Europe.

QUITE APART from being a worthy cause, the idea of rally itself is superb. For a combination of madness, elation, frustration and sheer pointless fun, rallying is hard to beat!

The entry fee for this rally should be in the region of $4.00 a person and the first, second, and third place teams with all receive trophies. Anyone interested in entering can get further information by calling 928-3240.

So let's get behind our national team. Let's show them that they are not alone. And most of all, let's give them a chance to train and compete alongside the world's best — without having to worry whether or not they'll be able to pay their hotel bill. Let's send them to Europe with a fighting chance!

THIS YEAR'S eight-man team is comprised of students and some recent graduates. Bob Storey, the number-one team driver and also the captain of the squad, is a journalism major at Carleton; Vance White, the second man on the number-one sled is a graduate of U of T. Vance went through PHE and then took his MBA. Dave Richardson attends Varsity, played football for Blues in his first year and now coaches the Vic football team.

The second team is comprised of Hans Gherligh who was born in Switzerland and is now a naturalized Canadian citizen. Hans is the driver. Pete Blakey is in commerce and finance at Lyola; Colin Nesbitt is working for a Montreal stock brokerage firm and the final member of the team, Mike Hartley, is a Varsity grad last year.

Do you understand the Class B classification? Neither do the team members. But none the less, they'll head for Europe, take their chances, and receive a scant three lines in the press reports.

ALL OF THAT is a way of life for a bobsledder. He resents it, but he accepts it. So surely the least we can do is help them raise the funds to give them a real chance among the best of the world, and if they should bring home a world championship, we can all bask in their reflected glory.

Unsung Peterman finally hits puck spotlight

By LYNDON LITTLE

Quick now, every Varsity hockey fan knows that Paul Laurent scored the goal with only 14 seconds remaining that gave Blues the 3-2 victory over the St. Mary's Huskies in last year's national final at Charlottetown. But, who remembers which player scored the first two Varsity goals in that game!

Well, in case you've forgotten, that player was Terry Peterman who shouldn't really be surprised that his outstanding two-goal performance got lost in the publicity surrounding Laurent's last-minute heroics; that's been the pattern since he joined Blues three years ago after starring at Princeton in U.S. college hockey.

With Blues, Peterman would play the unspectacular skating game, pick up some very important goals — but someone else would always grab the headlines.

That is until last Friday night!

Against the Windsor Lancers, the veteran right-winger enjoyed a big, four-goal outing as he led Blues to a decisive 10-2 victory. The scoring outburst brought his goals total to five for three league games and to eight counting exhibition matches giving him a big boost to what should be his most productive season.

Earns Watt's praise

Peterman, who at five-eight and 171 pounds is not one of the bigger players in the league, has been quick to earn kudos from his coach Tom Watt for his fine play this year.

"Terry's a clever, heads-up type who rarely gives the puck away," Watt praised. "He's also got that intangible quality of puck sense that makes him dangerous around the net."

Watt will be counting heavily on Peterman and his linemates, Brian St. John and Gord Davies when Blues take to the ice at Varsity Arena tonight against the undefeated Warriors from Waterloo in a game that will go a long way to deciding which team will be favoured to finish first in the SIHL Western Division.

"We can make things a lot easier for ourselves with a win tonight," commented Watt.

The Peterman-St. John-Davies combination has accounted for 21 of the 45 goals Blues have scored in games to date.

The 1970 edition of the Warriors is basically the same group that Blues tied twice and defeated once last year. Two of those three games, however, were in the insane Waterloo Arena. But this time around, Blues have the extra home game between the two squads.

Ian Young returns

The Warriors have all three of their 1969-70 All-Stars — Ken Laidlaw, Dave Rudge and Ian McKeeney — back for another year. Their only significant loss was forward Rick Bacon who was the team's second leading scorer last year. They've added a very experienced winger in Bobby Bauer Jr. who starred at Harvard for many years.

But one very big change for Waterloo has Ian Young established as their regular goaltender. Young, of course, was a sure-fire pro prospect four years ago when he played for the Oshawa Generals of the OHA Junior A Series.

In a game against the Peterborough Petes on January 21, 1967, he was struck following a faceoff and lost the sight in his left eye. He enrolled at Waterloo and has been the hockey team's student manager for the last two years.

This season, he persuaded the coaching staff to let him try out for the team and has won the starting job.

WHERE'D HE GO! Lancer goalie turns the wrong way as Blues' Terry Peterman flashes by.

PhysEd's Gord Nelson gets set to fire a first quarter goal during action yesterday afternoon.

Varsity fencing team splits weekend tour

Last Friday, the Fencing Blues challenged the State University of New York, American college fencing powerhouse, and just missed an upset victory.

In the 27-25 defeat, narrow victories — 9-7 at epee and 10-8 in sabre — gave Varsity an early lead.

The turning point, however, came in the foil where our top fencers faced the delicate probing and incisive stop hits of Mark Singer and his Buffalo teammates.

The Blues then moved on to Rochester I.T. Saturday for the second half of the weekend excursion south of the border where, spurred on by the memory of last year's defeat, they charged to an excellent 27-14 bout victory.

Oscar Wong outclassed the foilists leading to a 7-2 margin. R.I.T. regained respectability in the sabre due to the efforts of their coach Plouff but Hachinski remained undefeated leading Blues to a 9-7 win.

The best effort, however, came in the epee where Varsity "put it all together" with point control plus daring and patience to seduce their opponents to commit harikari. A great win by Helmut Miereys, Rowland Griffin and Ron Keith.

HOCKEY-VARSITY ARENA BLUES vs WATERLOO TONIGHT AT 8:00 P.M.

Hockey books at $3.00 are still a good buy - 8 games remaining. On sale at gate from 7:00 p.m. on.

PhysEd leads in lacrosse final

By THE EYE IN THE SKY
Serious lapses at the beginning of both the third and fourth quarters proved disastrous for the Erindale

Warriors as they dropped the first game of the interfac lacrosse finals to PhysEd by a score of 12-8 yesterday afternoon at Hart House.

The PhysEd crew, defending Dafoe Cup champs, scored two goals in the first minutes of action in the last two quarters to break open a tight game that featured rugged checking on both sides.

The third quarter opened with the teams deadlocked at four goals apiece. However, in the space of just twenty-five seconds, Bill Fawcett and Gord Nelson pumped shots past Erindale's Ron Grogan.

Then, in the first 60 seconds of the last quarter, Don Crocker scored twice to stretch his team's margin to a commanding 9-4 score.

The Warriors later came back with a belated rally as they notched three straight scores. The PhysEders, however, finished off the match with three consecutive markers of their own.

Once again, the sharp-shooting Connelly paced the PhysEd attack picking up five goals. Crocker and Neuf Fever added a pair each while Gord Nelson, Al Christie and Fawcett contributed one goal each for the winners.

For Erindale, who were surprise winners over the first division champs from St. Mikes in the semi-finals, Doug McKeown and Dave Michie each struck for three goals while John Robinson added two more.

PhysEd can now wrap up the series in straight games with a victory in the second match tomorrow evening beginning at 8:00 p.m.

Jockstrap jottings: An enthusiastic crowd of 300 packed the upper track for yesterday's opening game.

VOL. 91 — NO. 35
FRI., DEC. 11, 1970

Our worst foes are ignorance, poverty and the unconscious cruelty of our commercial society. These are the causes of much blindness, these are the enemies which destroy the sight of little children and workmen, and undermine the health of mankind. So long as these enemies remain unvanquished, so long will they be blind and crippled men and women.

— Helen Keller

"We're taught to be ashamed of how we came into the world. We're taught that if we dig sex, we should feel guilty.

"We are

"We're taught body pleasure is immoral.

"We're taught to hate ourselves!

"Americans are puritans. Americans are afraid of sex. America creates a sexual prison in which men think they have to be supermen and have to see sensitivity as weakness. Women are taught that self-assertion is unfeminine. So Marines go to Vietnam and get their asses kicked in by Viet Cong women."

Psychiatry advances ideas of status quo

By Richard Kunnes, M.D.

THE major theme I wish to present is that psychiatry, the profession, its programs and professionals are a part of, give support to, and provide enhancement for the U.S. ruling class, its imperialistic system and the racist institutions which uphold it. And when psychiatry isn't specifically supporting that system, it's supporting itself.

Correspondingly, for psychiatry to serve the ruling class and its system, psychiatry must obey the laws of capitalism and evolve in a materialistically determined fashion.

A major role of psychiatric services is to help, allow, or force the individual to adjust to a repressive, oppressive, racist, sexist and imperialistic political structure. And adjusting is only one aspect of it. Another goal of psychiatry in the context of American capitalism, is to maximize worker productivity and minimize political dissent.

Psychiatry services, when they are available, either control and socialize their recipients, or enhance the establishment.

Long and expensive training insures that psychiatrists will be available only in limited numbers, thereby limiting competition for the patient market, and the few psychiatrists available will be of white, upper middle-class establishment background.

Like other medical specialties, psychiatric training institutions train psychiatrists to treat the upper classes by training and experimenting on the classes below them.

The "new psychiatry" is different from the old, in that in the case of the old psychiatry, the adjustor was the psychiatrist alone. In the "new psychiatry" the adjustor is a team of corporately functioning elites, e.g. urbanologists, economists, architects, etc., and not the entrepreneurial psychiatrist.

The psychiatrist in his role as controller, administrator and purveyor of mental health services has functioned as an agent of the ruling class and has himself become a part of that class. Some examples of the above might be seen in the use of mental health services as a tool of social control.

In this case the individual person, i.e. the "patient", is always defined as the problem and never the society or economic system which ultimately defines both the society and the individual. For example, in the school system, mental health services are used to define the "so called misbehaving" student as a "behaviour" problem, with the mental health professional using his professional privilege to label and place the student outside of the school structure.

The structure and function of the school is itself an agent of social control, a tracking system, as well as a training ground for future workers in the military-industrial complex. That it is an agent of oppression and repression is rarely questioned by professionals.

Being a psychiatrist practicing in this current society, for example, in the ghetto, is about as corrupt as being a psychiatrist in a concentration camp.

Even if the shrink provides services in the concentration camp, even if he really meets some people's needs in the camp and is supportive to them, the M.D. in such a political environment can function only as a part of a pacification program within the camp and thus support the concentration camp, working counter to the prisoners' most crucial and urgent needs, i.e., getting out and causing the destruction of the camp.

The psychiatrist in the camp, giving traditional services, can only function to adjust the prisoner or patient to the ghetto or concentration camp. Services provided, no matter how technologically innovative and advanced, are of no use unless they help destroy the conditions that are destroying the community.

Community mental health programs do serve to pacify a neighborhood—particularly a ghetto, and thus are functionally racist. The programs "mystify and mollify justifiable outrage and thereby prevent action for meaningful change. By directing community concern toward problems of "mental health" and away from "efforts to confront the basic oppressive institutions in our society, such programs function to maintain the establishment's status quo, rather than to advance the interests of the oppressed community.

Just as our economy and establishment has become dominated by the mechanisms of the military-industrial complex, the mental health market is dominated by similar mechanisms.

Emphasis on pacification and security

First is the emphasis on pacification and counter-insurgency. Second, is the fact that as the defense industry is really a war industry, the mental health market is really a mental illness market. Third, both this industry and that market are basically profitless, if run on a major scale without these three major components: war, illness and money. The defense industry needs war, while the mental health industry needs illness — and both need a federal influx of money to stabilize the financial bases of their respective markets.

The community mental health movement got a big boost from the Defense Department when it was noted that an incredible number of draft rejections (about 25 per cent) occurred on the basis of mental illness.

Also noted was that victims of shell shock and other psychiatric problems resulting from battlefield conditions responded "best" (i.e. the soldier returned to the front to continue shooting and killing) when the soldier was treated while still near the front lines, i.e. the soldier's community so to speak, rather than at a quiet home camp.

Thus developed the theoretical basis for treating the patient where he is, that is, don't make him an invalid by either hospitalizing him behind the lines or out in the country state hospital. The logical extension of the military's continued interest in mental health has reached the point where some psychiatrists are now saying that the National Institute of Mental Health should be turned over to the Defense Department to help maintain national security, by insuring an adequate, "well adjusted" manpower service for the Armed Forces and to insure adequate funding to the Mental Health Associations.

One example of the role of the professional establishment and institutional imperatives holding sway over the public need is the addiction crisis. Psychiatrists view addiction as a personal problem and talk of the so-called "addictive personality." However, there is a far greater correlation between addiction and economic and geographic distribution than with personality types.

Yet, treatment programs are geared for changing individual personalities and not the political realities that are responsible for the addiction problems. The immediate political realities are the Mafia, police complicity, and political payoffs throughout the cities.

Professor R. Cloward of Columbia University notes that political inaction on the part of the government existed and the narcotic traffic was tolerated as long as the inaction and tolerance aided the establishment's status quo.

"As long as the slum dwellers remain on drugs they cannot mobilize politically." The Black Panthers prohibit the use of narcotics, for just that reason. In face of the above, no existing treatment program so far has been shown to be a serious and efficacious one, and none relates to political realities. The only ones which do are the Peoples' Defense Leagues. These people know that the political system kills 100 drug addicts per month in New York City alone. Thus the violence is already there and the question whether their response should be violent or not is academic.

The People's Defense Leagues function as vigilante groups, shooting and killing major pushers on sight. The Leagues are having more therapeutic effect on the community in general and the addicts in particular, than any other treatment program.

And to be sure, no professional ever thought of such a program or researched it, but people from the community did.

In a situation analogous to front line psychiatric treatment in the military, is the use of psychiatrists at the corporation site. It's no coincidence, IBM, is one of the first to provide on-the-job psychiatric service in order to maximize worker productivity.

Psychology and psychiatry are increasingly being used for purposes ranging from selling deodorant to isolating and repressing those who "step to a different drummer." Prosecutors seek to have defendants against whom they have flimsy evidence declared "incompetent" and "committed."

Even the police use psychology as one of their weapons. Increasingly, police departments are allying themselves with academic departments of

One of the most pervasive uses of this kind of psychiatric ideology is in supporting the continued oppression of women. A woman's failure to accept her prescribed roles as a housekeeper, nursemaid, and husband-pamperer is explained to her as resulting from her own psychological inadequacies as a mother and a wife rather than from flaws in the institutions of marriage and the family and the role defined within them.

If she fails to wipe Con Ed's soot off the window sills every day she is a "bad" housekeeper; if her child uses dope, she is a "bad" mother. Whether delivered in person by her psychiatrist or through the mass psychotherapy of Abby, Ann Landers and the Reader's Digest, the message is clear: your oppression as a woman is your own god damn fault, not a social problem, or that it's an issue of mental illness not a derivative of economic exploitation; hence it must be met individually (and by changes in yourself), not collectively.

Psychiatry is not value-free

Another use of the ideology has been in "explaining" the rise of dissident political movements. Thus, psychiatrists and psychologists have sought to explain the rise of the New Left to the American people in terms of the psychology of the dissenters, and thus avoiding the politics of the dissenters.

Vietnam, racism, poverty, imperialism all disappear, save as triggers of latent psychopathology.

The bourgeois press turns it into laymen's language- "spoiled, self-centred brats" who "hate everything decent and good" and have "an urge to destroy." The psychiatrists give the same theme the respectability of science. Widely publicized in the mass media, their views help shape the public's consciousness of the movement. They help insulate the good TV-watching, Life magazine-reading citizens from understanding what the movement is all about, how it relates to the forms of oppression he feels in his own life, and why he should take it seriously on its own terms.

Many other examples of the repressive ideology of psychiatrists and psychologists can be given. Black riots come from the "instability of the Negro family", not from poverty, racism, hopelessness and anger.

Absenteeism among the blacks and Puerto Ricans in low-paying, dead-end jobs is due to inadequate socialization in the virtues of promptness and perseverance, not the inhumanity and pointlessness of the job itself. Acceptance of the status quo is normal and healthy; defiance in thought or behaviour whether individual or collective, is pathological. People are taught to think of themselves and to think of the deviations and dissents of others in these terms. A sick society is transformed into nothing more than a collective of sick individuals.

Integrating a patient psychologically or socially is integrating him into a racist, sexist society. The more we do this the more we serve the society that destroys us.

More direct links with the military are demonstrated by psychiatrists such as John Talbot who explains how he has "The function of school is to keep youth off the streets. High school and colleges are fancy baby-sitting agencies.

"Vietnam and the school system are the two main fronts in America's hateful campaign against its youth. Jails and mental hospitals follow closely. School offers us cheap victories - grades, degrees - in exchange for our souls. We're actually supposed to be happy when we get a better grade than somebody else! We're taught to compete and to get our happiness from the unhappiness of others."

helped soldiers and officers deal with their anxiety about killing or being killed in Vietnam. That is, the psychiatrist is used to make the Army a more brutal and effective killing machinery.

No psychiatrist is value-free in the way in which he relates to his or other economic classes. The private psychiatrist and his private patient are essentially from the same class and have the same ideologies. They are not in conflict from a class or ideological point of view. Thus their therapeutic relationship tends to be an enhancing and supporting one rather than a conflictual one.

On the other hand, the relationship of the upper class psychiatrist to his lower class, working class patients is economically and thus therapeutically conflictual. The relationship tends to be one of control and hostility rather than enhancement.

Psychiatrists repress and oppress by labeling political acts as psychiatric symptoms, thus to be dealt with by psychiatrists rather than by political struggle. Violence in a political context is seen only as a product of a psychotic criminal mind. Kids throw rocks through windows and 100 articles are published in newspapers, journals and books by psychiatrists and psychologists and the like. President Nixon maintains a world-wide enforced policy of imperialism, racism, chauvinism and even genocide- and not one psychiatrist has written about President Nixon's symptoms, or his Oedipus complex.

Canadian psychiatry is an agent of the establishment. Canada is an American colony. Sixty per cent of all Canadian industrial assets are controlled by the U.S. The Canadian establishment is nothing more than the colonial agent of the Nixon administration.

The problem isn't whether psychiatry is or is not an agent of the establishment. Virtually all parts of the establishment's political system and services serve that system and psychiatry is one of them. The question is, is the establishment serving the people? In the case of the Canadian establishment the answer is clearly no - no as long as it continues to be subservient to the U.S. corporate ruling class.

Psychiatric services are never delivered in a social or political vacuum. They are either part of the problem or part of the solution. To the extent that they de-politicize and psychologize, psychiatry is an agent of repression. No psychiatrist ever tells his patients that many of their problems are derived from capitalism and exploitation exported by and controlled by the U.S., and that the only way to deal with capitalism is to destroy it. And that the only way to end it is to join a revolutionary organization such as the Black Panthers or the Quebec Liberation Front. And no psychiatrist (except Franz Fanon) ever told his patient that the act of revolutionary struggle and violence will not only help destroy colonialism and capitalism, but will also alleviate his symptoms.

Those patients who aren't poor, who have a stake in the establishment, naturally don't have as much to gain from revolutionary change and thus are part of the problem and the establishment.

The private practitioner, and the university professor are establishment agents not because they opt out of social and political involvement - just the opposite. They reproduce, maintain and support a dual standard of services and thus support a class divided society. They also perpetuate and disseminate the upper class's values, ideology and politics.

Some of the more liberal doctors and professors may call for an end to the war in Vietnam, but not for an end to imperialism or support for the Quebec Liberation Front. A patient of theirs who wishes to fight racism and imperialism is seen as "acting out". A patient volunteering to join the RCMP is seen as a dutiful citizen behaving responsibly and is not questioned about his motives.

Psychiatry is derived from and gives support to the dominant and prevailing culture and its ideology. Psychiatry, psychotherapy and psychiatrists are not value-free, but reflect the values of those dominant in that society - in other words they reflect and support the establishment.

Psychiatry oppresses women psychiatry and psychology for assistance in dealing with individual offenders, crowd control and "conflict resolution."

Psychiatry and psychology are thus used as direct instruments of concern against individuals. Under the guise of "medical methods," people are pacified, punished, or incarcerated. But psychiatry and psychology are also used more generally as an instrument of pacification and control of our entire society. They have become a central ideological instrument for obscuring people's understanding of their experience and for preventing their recognizing the social bases and collective nature of their oppression.

The central mechanism by which psychiatry and psychology achieve this is to reduce all collective experience to a sum of individual experiences, to reduce all social grievances, to individual pathology.

The drug industry prostitutes itself for profit

By Joel Lexchin
and Danny Roden

ALEXANDER ENGLISH earns $105 a week and spends over $40 every two to three weeks on drugs to counter a chronic sickness. Mrs. Jeanne Arnett and her husband pay $40 a month for drugs for their two epileptic sons. Frank Taylor and his wife have a monthly income of $258 and drugs cost them more than $100 a month.

These are not isolated instances, but in fact, occur with alarming regularity across Canada.

A comprehensive research project undertaken by the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act, showed that "prices of drugs in Canada are among the highest in the world." And more up-to-date figures on the comparison of prices of drugs in Canada with those in other countries having relatively advanced economies, substantiated these figures.

Furthermore the drug industry's arguments cannot account for the wide range of prices of the same drug industry in Canada alone. In a survey taken in May 1970, the price of 19 commonly prescribed drugs were checked in 10 drug stores in Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. For some drugs, the highest retail price was double the lowest price. In a couple of cases, there was a three-fold difference between the highest and the lowest. And in each city it also appeared that the highest cost of drugs was in the poorest areas of the city.

Another survey showed that generic-named drugs cost less than trade-name drugs for specific economic reasons. And Canadians pay exorbitantly high prices for drugs in general for very specific economic reasons.

Here is an attempt to analyze these reasons.

In 1963 in Canada there were 173 establishments engaged in the manufacture of pharmaceuticals. The industry is divided into two groups; those belonging to the Pharmaceutical Manufacturer's Association of Canada (PMAC) and those not.

Fifty-seven companies belonging to PMAC produce over 85 per cent of the dollar volume of prescription drugs sold in Canada under both brand and/or generic name.

The remaining manufacturers are mostly Canadian-owned and usually are generic manufacturers, though a few of them market their products under brand name as well.

Most companies in PMAC are foreign controlled. In 1961, out of these 57, some 34 companies were subsidiaries or branches of U.S. firms, 9 were branches of European and British firms and only 7 were Canadian controlled.

The PMAC is not surprisingly described as "not legally but for all intents and purposes, a branch of the U.S. Pharmaceutical Manufacturer's Association."

Conditions in the Canadian drug industry are so related to the conditions in the U.S. industry that in many respects the Canadian market may be considered as simply an expansion of the U.S. market.

Not only are the dominant drug firms in Canada branches or subsidiaries of U.S. firms, but the influence of these firms appears to effect the policies of other foreign firms operating subsidiaries in Canada.

Specifically the U.S. and Canadian markets are characterized by probably the highest prices in the world and when European and other firms enter this market they adopt the same price levels prevailing in the market, regardless of the prices at which they sell their products in other parts of the world.

Thus the Canadian prices of a certain drug reflects the usual relationship between the Canadian Industry competes with people, not itself and U.S. prices but is proportionately higher than the price charged in France where the drug was developed and from where supplies of the basic drug are obtained.

In the case of prescription drugs, the doctor, who determines which drug will be used, does not pay for it, while the patient who pays for it has no choice among the drugs. Moreover very rarely does the doctor consider the background of his patient and prescribe accordingly, accounting for price. And since doctors rarely consider the price of drugs it therefore does a company little good to reduce their prices, since this will lead not to increased demand but only a reduction in revenue.

Because of this, competition among drug manufacturers consists largely of feeding doctors with more and more new samples.

As one president of a leading drug industry put it: "It's like a fad or a fashion, if the trade name catches then the product sells."

There are many other reasons for the soaring costs of drugs, the drug industry claim: research, quality control, and advertising are always given predominance when reasons are mentioned to justify these prices.

On the question of research. A recent survey showed that 27 major drug manufacturers in Canada spent an average 2.12 per cent of their sales dollar on research. Only four spent over 3 per cent.

From the same survey we find that half the firms spent 0.68 per cent or less of their net sales revenue on research and development. Six firms reported they did no research whatsoever.

Much of the research that goes on in the drug industry is not in the public's best interest — sometimes by omission and sometimes by commission. A good example is the supply of penicillin during World War II; the drug was needed, but production processes to make it available were not discovered. The American government asked the companies doing research on the processes to pool their resources but they all refused. Large scale production began only after the government had discovered the process itself, thus making it available to all corners.

After the war, research into new and better antibiotics soared ahead at a fast clip and new drugs often were put on the market before clinical studies were published.

Much of the research carried out by Canadian drug firms has been generated for two reasons, the first being to satisfy the Food and Drug Directorate and the second to take advantage of tax concessions granted to Canadian corporations given for the promotion of research.

And on to quality control: A survey in 1960 showed that no drug firm spent more than 3 per cent of its profits on quality control. The study revealed that 27 major companies spent $1,120,000 on quality control in this country. This was equivalent to 1.21 per cent of the net sales for the 21 firms actually spending money on this.

And further, an investigation by the Department of Health and Welfare in 1967 found that 16 per cent of both domestic and imported drugs were unsatisfactory.

"IF YOU CAN'T CONVINCE THEM CONFUSE THEM, WOULD BE AN APPROPRIATE MOTTO FOR THE INDUSTRY." (Dr. Dale Console, to the Senate Sub-committee on Monopoly.)

In 1960, 40 large drug companies spent an average of 29.2 per cent of their sales dollars on advertising. All is in an effort to impress the doctor who later sells the drugs to patients. But the drug industry is famous for ignoring or refusing to mention health hazards caused by their products.

As Senator Estes Kefauver, author of the book 'In a Few Hands' and the senator that led the Senate Sub-committee on Monopoly put it, "particularly among the major companies, the practice of molecule manipulation is a tried and true way of breaking into an assured market."

Dr. Dale Console, the former medical director at Squibb, one of the top U.S. drug giants testified that more than 50 per cent of drugs promise nothing, even when they are on the drawing board, except profit. The danger there is that the patient often suffers because the doctor has been taken in by false advertising, by the detail men, and by the sheer volume of claims with which he is bombarded every week.

Another favourite trick of drug research — one with which we are more than familiar — is the gimmick. The buffered or mint-coated aspirin and the cold remedy with the "tiny time pills" are examples. Is this research and gimmickery in the public interest or does it help justify huge profits?

Co-operation among major members of an oligarchy (domination of a field by a limited number of companies — more than one) is common in the drug industry. There are many drug industries in the U.S. but 22 of them control 90 per cent of the market. This is an oligarchy and tends to generate what Kefauver called a "fraternity of spirit" among major members. In direct consequence, major companies license other major companies to market their drugs (at the same cost or higher to the consumer); thus we run up against the extreme case of Parke Davis.

*"Tell 'em again, and again and again.

Parke Davis marketed 20 of 51 drugs the Kefauver committee examined, but it manufactured exactly one — the rest were sold under license. A situation like this tends to reduce competition, in research as in other areas. Instead of making serious efforts to get a better antibiotic, major companies market each others, or "discover" their own "new" ones by replacing a hydroxyl group with a methyl group.

And most drug firms fail to bring to light their Practices shady, industry hides test results testing results. Once a new product is ready for testing, how do they go about it?

The first set of tests is on animals, usually animals chosen for their cheapness and their availability rather than their resemblance to man. Animals often metabolize drugs differently than man and therefore do not show many of the side effects humans do.

Thalidomide did not show fetal abnormalities when tested in animals. The next step is limited testing on humans. (Since American doctors gave some 1200 patients trial samples of thalidomide without telling them of the potential dangers, it has become mandatory in the United States as in Canada to tell a patient when he is being tested and give him a chance to opt out, as it were.) Human targets for tests now include willing patients and, when they are not available, the lower class of American colonies.

G. D. Searle tested the first oral contraceptive, Enovid, on 265 Puerto Rican women "from the low income population living in a housing development project in a slum clearance area."

And inmates of prisons are sometimes used, often under poor or non-existent medical supervision according to a recent report of the Alabama Medical Association.

One of the major abuses of drug research is that side effects, sometimes annoying and sometimes dangerous, are often downplayed if they are discovered at all. A few examples:

Chloromycetin, one of a new breed of drugs produced after the war was at one time the second most widely used antibiotic in the United States. Later it was shown to be associated with various blood disorders, including a plastic anemia which has a mortality rate of over 50 per cent.

Parke Davis, the sole producer, didn't take that lying down. After the Food and Drug Administration approved the continued use of the drug as long as its labels warned of the possibility of dangerous side effects, the company sent out letters to all its detail men outlining the FDA's decision.

One of those letters told the men that the subject of chloromycetin's potential toxicity "SHOULD NOT BE INTRODUCED UNLESS THE PHYSICIAN BRINGS IT UP OR UNLESS YOU KNOW HE HAS CEASED PRESCRIBING THE DRUG."

The conclusion one draws is that Parke Davis wanted Dr. X, with too many patients to see and too little time to read, too much material, to continue prescribing the drug, unaware of its potential.

Research is profit-motivated. It is often not done in the public's best interests, often directly against their interests. The drug industry makes huge profits in an area where the consumer is ill-equipped to fight. It is up to the medical profession and the government to deal with the industry. Doctors should be taught the practices of the industry, such as marketing a drug under ten different brand names — at the same price — when the drug is available under its generic name at one-tenth the cost.

But educating doctors and demanding governmental regulations, will ultimately prove to be only half-way measures. Profit motivates industry, and as long as the profit motive remains in this industry — upon which many depend literally to survive — there will be gross abuses. Take it from there!

"For one to be a revolutionary doctor or to be a revolutionary at all, there must first be a revolution. Isolated individual endeavour, for all its purity and ideals, is of no use, and the desire to sacrifice an entire lifetime to the noblest of ideals serves no purpose if one works alone in some corner of America, fighting against adverse governments and social conditions which prevent progress. To create a revolution, one must have what there is in Cuba—the mobilization of a whole people who learn by the use of arms and exercise of militant unity to understand the value of arms and the value of this unity."

—Che Guevara

Che was a doctor. Live like him!

—by Bob Barkwell

It is clear that a system based on an ideology of a free-market price mechanism and on a practice of blatant profiteering (by drug companies, medical equipment suppliers and doctors themselves) cannot be expected and does not provide a standard of health care compatible with the technological and organizational level of society. It is also obvious that such a system could only exist in a social structure in which profit maximization was the greatest good.

The logical extension of these perceptions is that little improvement in the health care sector can be expected until such a time as the entire capitalistic framework is swept away.

Medical "education" is no education at all; at best it is technical training. Even the Faculty of Medicine acknowledges this; the pre-medical course is supposed to educate the student in the broader fields of the humanities before he starts his "Professional" (i.e., technical) training. The fact that such education in a broad sense does not occur can only partly be blamed on the Faculty. To a large extent, it is a product of the general malaise affecting the university. Nevertheless, the Faculty tacitly encourages a narrow scientific bias in students entering the course; this usually precludes any critical analysis of the social function of medicine.

In the rhetoric of the Faculty, medical students are being trained to be professionals, providing an essential service to the community. The student is taught, both directly and by example, to gather all the evidence available before making decisions, to treat the patient as a person who interacts with a complex environment (social, economic) and not as a disease or syndrome, to exercise the greatest care, caution, and restraint in the management of patients because of the immense responsibility which is attendant on handling matters of life and death. He is taught that medicine is an art requiring tact and sensitivity as well as a science requiring precision and knowledge.

This is the rhetoric and even to some extent, the reality of medical education. Yet this education also has some unfortunate side effects. Students come to feel that because they have a considerable amount of specialized knowledge, carry a grave responsibility, and supply an essential service, that they are somehow superior to other people, even other professionals. This feeling of superiority leads to the conclusion that no other person or group has either the ability or the right to interfere with medical practice. All these attitudes are encouraged and reinforced by the teaching staff; the result is a remarkable homogeneity of attitude which transcends even class boundaries.

These attitudes help explain the dichotomy between the image of the selfless doctor, tirelessly performing a needed service, regulating his own profession so that quacks and incompetents will not be inflicted on society, and otherwise nobly serving the community; and the reality of a situation where doctors cluster in the relatively wealthy middle-class suburbs, bill patients for the ten percent they do not get from OHSIP, and use the professional ethic to protect and hide many incompetents.

The medical school is admirably suited to inculcating these sorts of values, since the student tends to learn attitudes and outlooks from his clinician unconsciously at the same time as he picks up technical knowledge consciously. Moreover, the situation at medical school is very much a "master-apprentice" one. Students are presumed to be inferior member of the guild and hence to have no particular contribution to make to medical education until they have proved themselves in practice. The whole system is beautifully designed to produce people who believe that age confers authority and worth is based on seniority. (Note: these criteria apply only within the profession; as early as second year medicine, students are taught by example that they are superior to other members of the medical team — nurses, pharmacists, physiotherapists, etc.)

Students who enter medicine are qualitatively different from their peers who enter other courses. Not only have they gone through the same socialization at public and high school, but since they come from a higher socio-economic class, this socialization "takes" better. Their fathers are corporation executives, lawyers, doctors are successful businessmen. We see that 73.1 per cent of doctors come from the upper three socio-economic classes who represent only 17.2 per cent of the population.)

Many medsmen are aware of the inequitable organization of society and the economic disparities involved, and they consciously accept this organization and their place in it. In general, this leads to political conservatism, or at best, moderate liberalism, since from this point of view, the world has very little wrong with it.

Attitudes towards medicare and specialization are at least partially determined by concern for the welfare of the patient and the quality of medical care which will be attainable. Medsmen do not oppose medicare on the grounds that it will destroy their freedom as individuals and compromise the quality of medical care available to the community. Generally speaking, if the scheme can be designed to provide adequate care and coverage without threatening the physicians position either vis-a-vis his patients or vis-a-vis the general community, it will be accepted.

As anyone who has been connected with the medical profession for any length of time soon realizes, the health professions are organized into a rigidly structured hierarchy in which the physician stands at the head, unquestioned and omnipotent. Even doctors themselves are organized in a hierarchical manner, with specialists taking precedence over general practitioners, senior residents over junior residents, and everybody over the interns.

The more serious of the two problems is the first; one of the most distressing results is that nurses, pharmacists, physiotherapists, etc., are not only not encouraged to think for themselves, they are oft-times actively discouraged. Nursing training stresses the need to consult the doctor on everything, pharmacists learn not to question the physician's judgement in choice of drugs. The results of such training (and the concomitant training of medical students — that all other medical personnel are present to help them) are manifold; many of the best nurses become embittered and unwilling to proffer any advice to the physician, or leave the profession altogether; students enter pharmacy because they realize that they can get some of the status and pay of a professional without having — or being able — to take the responsibility or do the thinking that such a position should involve.

This problem is very closely tied to another; the chronic shortage of doctors. It is fairly obvious that this problem has a double genesis: first an absolute shortage of doctors; and second, a misallocation of what resources are available.

The absolute shortage of doctors, and the misallocation of material resources can only be remedied by exchanging the anarchy of a capitalist economy for the rational and humane planning of a socialist one. While, therefore, these should be a target of our organizing, changing them cannot be one of the ways in which we seek to serve the people before the revolution.

In dealing with the misallocation of human resources, it seems that the obvious approach for movement medical people is a team approach to medical care. That is to say, the health team would be organized in such a way that responsibility for the patient's care would be shared by all the members of the team (thereby removing one of the potent pressures on the physician to do everything himself.), and decisions about the course of treatment of the patient would be collective decisions.

This, of course, adds several complicating factors to the practice of medicine, including the need to explain everything in very clear terms to the patient so that he can be truly involved in the decision, rather than being consulted pro forma. Obviously, the involvement of the patient would vary with his intelligence and ability to cope.

It seems to me that this sort of approach to patient care offers the beginnings of breaking down the mystique which surrounds medicine (even within the movement) and the hierarchical, authoritarian structures of the health professions themselves. One must point out, however, that serious difficulties attend any attempt to extend this approach beyond the movement. Some of these are:

i) the unwillingness of physicians to relinquish any of the responsibility and, hence, any of the power which they now hold;

ii) the unwillingness of nurses and other para-medical personnel to take over any of that responsibility, or to begin to think for themselves. This is largely a function both of the nature of their training and of the type of person she tends to be attracted to that type of training;

iii) the unwillingness of any medical people to include the patient as a real part of the decision-making process. Most of these problems arise from the socialization which people undergo and from the class nature of the health professions, so that they are soluble in the long run by changing the nature of society and of the socialization process. However, in the period of transition, they present serious obstacles to any change in the relationships which exist today in the health professions.

It is quite clear that various roles within health care (nurse, physio) are reserved for women, that others (doctor) are reserved for men, and that some (pharmacist) are ambiguously defined, depending on the situation (i.e., hospital pharmacists tend to be women, independent retailers tend to be men.) These roles reinforce the oppression of women in society both by job definitions which conform to traditional stereotypes (father-figure doctors; gentle, healing nurses; etc) and by systematic economic exploitation.

At the present time, physicians tend to stand both above and outside the rest of the community in which they operate. There are a number of reasons for this: first, the physician provides a service on which the community depends without himself being in any major way dependent on that community; secondly, because of the mystique built up around the medical profession, and because of his own feelings of superiority, the doctor-patient relationship is very seldom an association between equals, but rather is very much the sort of relationship which exists between a superior and one of his inferiors; and third, the doctor exists as a small businessman, selling his services as if they were commodities, to be sold at the highest price the market will bear. (We have already dealt with the fact that his monopoly situation gives him rather more security than the average smallbusinessman.)

Economic oppression attacked

The traditional socialist approach to medical care has been the espousal of medicare in one form or another. While medicare, if carefully set up and administered, will provide adequate medical care to the entire population, it does not do anything to change traditional roles and relationships. It allows the doctor to continue as being-outside-the-community, and as private entrepreneur. It should, therefore be seen at best as an interim step towards truly socialist medicine, and at worst, as an impediment in the path.

An alternative which seems to offer the most hope of changing these relationships is the concept of the community clinic. Under this scheme, the community owns the building and all the equipment in it, and the medical personnel (including doctors, nurses, and all support staff) are on salary. All decisions made about the policies of the clinic are made by the entire group involved — the community, the medical staff, the cleaning staff, etc.

The effects of such an organization are potentially revolutionary — though not necessarily. Such a structure does make the doctor as dependent on the community as it is on him. It changes the basic power relationships in such a way as to make it easier for the patients to relate to the doctor as a person and as an equal. As is essential in any sort of socialist society, it destroys the concept to the doctor as small businessman.

Secondly, it provides a structure in which it is possible to reverse the trend towards depersonalization in medicine. Specialization, as was pointed out earlier, is, economic considerations aside, a very attractive course to take when one is faced with the immensity of medical knowledge. As this knowledge continues to grow, the tendency to specialize will also grow. The community clinic allows people to specialize, while at the same time acting as a "family doctor" in the traditional sense to a given number of patients. Each visit to the clinic would bring the patient in contact first with his own doctor, who could then either treat the problem himself, or send the patient to another specialist in the same building if that seemed indicated. This gives the patient all the advantages of the best in technical care without sacrificing the personal attention which is necessary if medicine is to be humane.

Personnel serve the people

There are two ways in which such a clinic can be established: one is that a community already organized around its own needs will set up a clinic and attempt to staff it; the other is that a group of radical people will start a clinic to use it as a basis for organizing, as a catalyst for creating a community aware of its needs. It is this second alternative with which we are concerned.

It is clear that serious difficulties in financing and community cooperation will be encountered in the opening stages of such a clinic. Many of these problems will be specific to given areas and material and historical conditions and therefore can only be dealt with as they arise.

i) all staff must live in the community.

ii) all staff must receive roughly comparable salaries

iii) There must be complete openness from the beginning about the political orientation of the staff.

iv) ways of getting immediate feedback from the community so that the delivery of health care can be both efficient and humane must be worked on — the concept of "people's advocate" which is in use in the clinics run by the Young Patriots and the Black Panthers in Chicago is one way in which this might begin

v) as soon as possible people from the community must be involved in decision-making.

The Story of Norman Bethune or: U of T graduate makes good

By DANNY RODEN

In an isolated valley in the Wut'ai mountain range of the northern Chinese province of Shansi, there stands a white marble monument to a foreign doctor who in 1939 gave his life in the Chinese fight against imperialistic Japan. Every year, on November 13 — the anniversary of his death — all China pauses to remember him. Chinese youths are taught to honor him second only to Mao Tse-tung. His name was Norman Bethune — a brilliant thoracic surgeon, an inventor, a painter, teacher, a writer, a poet. He is remembered by 800 million Chinese yet he is all but forgotten here in his native Canada.

The main characteristic of the young Norman Bethune was his impatience, his irascibility; this trait was to stay with him his whole life. It would cause the break-up of his marriage, it would frustrate him in his practice of North American medicine, it would make him an implacable enemy of private enterprise, and it would finally drive him to fight for his principles — first in Spain, and then in China.

Bethune, the son of an Ontario Presbyterian minister (one of his ancestors was the second Principal of McGill University), first set up practice in late 1924 in an ethnic district of Detroit. It was here that he began to show signs of contempt for a medical system which he called a "luxury trade". He delivered pregnant women even if they lived in boxcars, and went out at any time of night to see patients who couldn't pay him. He criticized his colleagues whom he accused of "selling bread at the price of jewels". His anger grew along with his success; the rich began to come to get treatment from this out-spoken young doctor. Then, at the peak of his career, at the age of 36, he received what in those days was a death sentence — a diagnosis of tuberculosis.

He divorced his wife — a Scotswoman named Francis Penney whom he had married before starting practice in Detroit — "to give her her freedom" and entered Trudeau sanitarium in upstate New York for treatment. The treatment in those days consisted essentially of rest; but this was not in Bethune's nature. He and the three patients with whom he shared a cottage at the sanitarium caroused the nights away. Bethune became a specialist in judging the quality of bootleg whiskey. During a fit of depression he covered the walls of the cottage with a series of murals entitled "A TB's progress: A Drama in One Act and Nine Painful Scenes". In the last "scene", he predicted the date of his own death — 1932.

But one night in 1927, he read of a new technique for the treatment of tuberculosis confined to one lung — literally collapsing the lung by the introduction of air into the chest cavity so the diseased organ would completely stop functioning. Bethune, with TB in his left lung only, demanded the operation from the staff at the sanitarium even though the technique was still in its experimental stages. Two months later he left the sanitarium. He wired Francis, "Cured, left Trudeau today. Am feeling the same about you as always. Will you marry me?"

They remarried but the marriage didn't last. Their relationship reflected in microcosm many of the antitheses in Bethune's character. He was miserable when they were apart and they constantly argued when they were together. Bethune believed "The female mind is a human mind. Under inhuman conditions it will suffer. The myths created about the so-called female mind are kept alive by men who would like to keep women in bondage." A few years later, they divorced. When the divorce finally came through, he wired Francis another proposal: but they never remarried again.

Bethune would fly into towering rages in the operating theater, often throwing instruments across the room for trivial reasons; yet he was a compassionate and extremely competent doctor. He hated arrogance, but could be extremely arrogant himself. He took his work very seriously, and took his leisure just as seriously.

Bethune's impatience, his flair for the unusual, his compassion, and his imagination soon combined to make him one of the most outstanding surgeons on the staff of Montreal's Royal Victoria Hospital. He invented dozens of new instruments for use in the operating theater, modifications of which are still in use today. He continuously attacked the TB problem, advocating earlier and earlier operations. But he understood that his treatment of TB was a last-ditch measure — that social conditions are responsible for the spread of the disease. He understood that TB feeds on poverty. He despised politicians; he once said "The palliative measures suggested by most of our political quacks are like aspirin tablets given for a syphilitic headache. They may relieve; they will never cure." He saw that medicine was not being delivered to the people who needed it and advocated the socialization of all medical services. "Let us take the profit, the private economic profit, out of medicine and purify the profession of rapacious individualism. Let us make it disgraceful to enrich ourselves at the expense of our fellow men," he wrote.

He became chief of Thoracic Surgery at Sacre Coeur Hospital in suburban Montreal, and continued agitating for socialized medicine. He became a familiar figure on the breadlines of Depression Montreal, treating the poor for free. He worked with unions and groups of unemployed citizens. He founded an art school for children to try to replace some of the emptiness he felt after his final break-up with Francis. He painted; one painting "The Surgeon at the Day of Judgment" depicted a doctor in front of a godhead figure surrounded by the spirits of men and women in agony. He saw art as an instrument for social agitation. "The artist enters eagerly into the life of man, of all men. He becomes all men in himself. He reminds the world of its dark ancestry, shows the world its present and points the way to its future. . . . The function of the artist is to disturb. His duty is to arouse the sleeper, to shake the complacent pillars of the world." And all through this turbulent period his eye was on Spain.

Even if Bethune had never gone to China, if he had not been the outstanding surgeon that he was, he would still be remembered for his work in Spain. It was on the night of December 23, 1936 on the outskirts of Madrid, that wounded soldiers received blood at the battlefield for the first time in history. Twelve Loyalist soldiers, who might otherwise have died of shock, were kept alive by Colonel Norman Bethune of the Loyalist Army who administered the transfusions himself under fascist fire.

Bethune wanted to go to Spain because "that is where the great issues of our time are being fought out." The idea behind the transfusion service was consistent with a basic tenet of his philosophy of medicine — get to the sick and injured as early as possible. On the first day Bethune called for donations, 1200 Madrilenos came to give. Soon he had coordinated all transfusion services along a 1000-kilometer front. He compared it to setting up a milk route. During this time, his temperament did not change. He enjoyed the occasional trip to the mountains north of Madrid for a skiing holiday — and his famous rages went on. He witnessed the deaths of thousands of refugees when the town of Almeria was wantonly bombed by the Germans. He became more and more frustrated by growing bureaucracy in the Loyalist army. Finally, in June 1937, he left Spain for a fund-raising trip to North America.

Yet even as he left Spain, his thoughts were already turned to another battlefield against fascism — North China. He returned to a hero's welcome in Montreal: friend and foe came out to greet a great man. He travelled across the continent for six months asking for funds in the fight against the growing German-Italian threat in Europe. He read the newspaper reports on China with the same dismay he had once shown reading reports from Spain. On January 2, 1938, he left Canada for Hong Kong and the totally foreign environment of the world's oldest country. Playing a game of cat and mouse with the armies of both the Japanese warlords and Chiang Kai-shek, he arrived in Yen-an — the centre of operations of the communist guerillas waging the war — on March 26. His death had already been reported by the press.

He met Mao Tse-tung the next evening and convinced Mao to let him set up a mobile operating unit to reach wounded soldiers before they died of their injuries. Bethune said he could cut casualties by 75 per cent. By the end of June 1938, he was already working the Chin-Cha-Chi border region, the centre of the guerillas' fight.

The stories about Bethune in China are almost innumerable — he worked tirelessly — treating the wounded and the sick, training medical personnel, administering medical services (including the construction of the first modern hospitals in the area), and writing, always writing. His irascibility stayed with him.

Once, operating on a wounded soldier, he looked up from the table and asked for a blood donor. When no one volunteered, he flew into a typical rage and then rolled up his sleeve and gave the blood himself. Later, he realized the nurses had been afraid because they didn't know what could happen to them if they gave the blood. After he explained the principle to the whole village three weeks later — and gave blood in public to show its almost instantaneous effects on a wounded soldier — the first Blood Donor Volunteer Corps was organized. Many others later followed.

He rarely got — or wanted — more than six hours of sleep a night. When he was not operating, he was training medical personnel and writing his "Manual of Organization and Technic for Divisional Field Hospitals in Guerilla War." One day, passing through a village with a hospital he had helped set up, he found most of the patients there suffering from skin eruptions due to inadequate disinfection. He stayed for three days, showing the doctors, nurses and orderlies how to soak the patients' bodies in sulfur ointment to treat the skin. "There is no job too menial for a doctor," he said. He wrote reams back to his friends in North America, but none of his letters ever got past the Nationalist censors. Only after the Communist victory in 1949 were the carbon copies of his letters first examined by Canadians.

Bethune's exploits made him a semi-legendary figure among the people of the Chin-Cha-Chi region; plays were written about Pa; Chu En — "White Seek Grace," his Chinese name — and wherever he went, stories about him went first. Once, in the early hours of November 29, 1938, after a 75-mile march and six hours of sleep the day before, Bethune and his staff set up their mobile operating theater in a temple near a road the guerillas were going to try to cut later in the day. At 5:15 p.m., the first wounded soldier was brought in. Fifteen minutes later, the soldier was anesthetized and Bethune was operating. Twenty-four hours after setting up the theater, he was still operating. Soldiers of the guerillas' 359th brigade charged Japanese reinforcements crying "Attack! Bethune is with us!" Bethune stopped operating at 10 a.m. on December 1, after being on his feet for more than 50 hours. He had performed 71 operations. The guerillas had won.

Deafness doesn't stop Bethune

Bethune was weakening himself tremendously and refused to listen to any expression of concern — be it from his translator or from Mao's chief of staff. It wasn't in his nature to sleep when there was work to be done, and he never stopped working — once 69 operations in 115 hours straight, always writing, training, organizing. Finally he decided to return to North America to raise money for supplies. His departure was set for mid-October, 1939.

Two weeks before he was to leave, he went deaf. He realized he had been overworking, that he looked like he had put on 20 years in the last 12 months. But he recovered his hearing and at the beginning of November, he was operating under the benign eye of the Buddha in a village temple at the foot of a mountain called Sky-Kissing Peak. Suddenly the Japanese appeared on the rear. Headquarters ordered Bethune to retreat, but he refused to stop operating until the last serious case was dealt with. His assistants said they would stay but that he should go, that he was too valuable to the guerilla movement as a whole to risk being captured. He ordered them to retreat, threatening to cite anyone who refused. During the hectic rush, he cut his finger. Half an hour later, Bethune was the last of his unit to leave the village, galloping out one end while the Japanese entered the other. In his weakened condition, Bethune contracted blood poisoning from his cut finger, and was brought back to the village under Sky-Kissing Peak. He died there ten days later.

Norman Bethune sacrificed the comfort and prestige of being a big-city surgeon to fight with people who opposed a system which bred illness and wounds. Just before his death, he wrote: "What do the enemies of the human race look like? Do they wear on their foreheads a sign so that they may be told, shunned and condemned as criminals? No. On the contrary, they are the respectable ones. They are honored. They call themselves, and are called gentlemen. They are the pillars of the state, of the church, of society. They support private and public charity out of the excess of their wealth. In their private lives they are kind and considerate. These men make the wounds."

Before he left for China, Bethune joined the Communist Party, but he could not ever be tied down by any discipline but his own. He opposed what he considered bad decisions by the Chinese command. His Chinese co-workers criticized his temper; he listened, but he did not, he could not, change. He did what he thought best to help humanity, and at the same time he lived his short life to the fullest. Even in China, his letters reflected his life-style. He complained "Are books still written? Do women still love

"Our profession must arouse itself from its scientific and intensely personal pre-occupation and become socially minded, realizing the inseparability of health from economic security.

"Let us abandon our isolation and grasp the realities of the present economic crisis. The world is changing beneath our very eyes . . . We must go with the tide or be wrecked."

—Norman Bethune

to be loved? God, I'd like a hamburger sandwich." He loved people and loved life. He fought against oppression wherever he saw it — in China, in Spain, in Canada. It should come as no surprise that Norman Bethune, a Canadian, one of the saints of the twentieth century, does not even rate a footnote in our history books.

* * *

Norman Bethune was a graduate of the University of Toronto Medical School in 1916, but at U of T his name is almost unknown.

The Dean of Medicine at U of T, A. L. Chute thought he graduated from McGill and knew nothing of him except that he was a doctor in China.

The U of T library has one copy of Bethune's biography, The Scalpel, The Sword, written by Ted Allan and Sydney Gordon. The copy is in the stacks of the Biological and Medicine library.

Bethune's name is rarely, if ever, mentioned in history or medical classes at this university. The treatment U of T has accorded this man is a clear indication of the class nature of this institution.

Many lesser men — indeed men who have spent their lives perpetuating an oppressive social system — have received high honours from the university.

But not Bethune.

He was on the wrong side!

China's medicine. People's medicine

The Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution which unfolded in early 1966 and did not abate until three years later was perhaps the greatest social upheaval of modern times. It has been hailed by many as an experiment in mass democracy, but at the same time condemned by other as one man's folly which brought China to the brink of total collapse and destruction.

In the course of it, all institutions were radically changed and Medicine, by its very nature, an integral part of the socio-cultural milieu, did not emerge from the Revolution unscathed.

Historically, modern medical education in China has its root in her semi-colonial past. The first modern hospital was set up only as late as 1835 by the English medical missionary Peter Parker in Canton. He soon began training Chinese assistants forming the prototype of China's first medical school.

The first half of the present century witnessed one of China's most turbulent periods. Plagued by perpetual political chaos, little improvement in medical health or medical education was made.

In 1935 there were only 33 medical schools in the entire country. Most were concentrated along the Eastern seaboard, and half were run by foreign missions. Only 500 hospitals with just over 20,000 beds were available and the doctor/population ratio came out to be a horrifying 1 in 25,000.

Soon the country was at war with imperialist Japan and the Civil war between the Nationalists and the progressive communists ensued. When the People's Republic was inaugurated in 1949, the new government was faced with the task of national reconstruction.

Re-organization of the educational system was called for in 1950 and the model of the USSR was faithfully adopted. This resulted in the separation of the medical schools along with other specialized fields like engineering and agriculture, from the universities. Between 1949 and 1959 some 40,000 medical graduates were made available, and the country came to enjoy a standard of health it had never before experienced.

A first hand report and evaluation of Chinese medicine before the Cultural Revolution was made by Dr. Penfield who visited the country in 1962.

"The application of modern methods in hospital treatment is satisfactory, sometimes brilliant. Basic science is less well developed. Progress here awaits better equipment in some cases, but most of all, the availability of trained post-graduate students who are not completely occupied with clinical work."

To many medical people in the West,

China was well on her way to becoming one of the world's most advanced nations. The Cultural Revolution came as a shock, and superficially it appeared that what she had achieved painfully in the past had now gone down the drain. A state of "scientific regression" was feared to have set in. But it is the author's belief that better knowledge and more mature thinking would remove much of this misconception.

The Cultural Revolution began in the early months of 1966 as an intra-Party debate on the nature of the arts in the socialist society, but soon became broader and deeper in scope. In a circular of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, May 16, 1966, it was proclaimed that:

"... Our country is now in an upsurge of the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution which is pounding at all the decadent ideological and cultural positions still held by the bourgeoisie and the remnants of feudalism..."

Shortly after, on May 25, the first "Big Character Poster" was created in Peking University criticizing the Principal, an incident regarded by many as the first cannon heralding the Revolution, which soon spread to other institutions. Throughout the country unrest spread quickly to a gigantic magnitude, with increasing confusion and bloodiness. The educational process came to a standstill as students took to the streets.

The medical establishment headed by the Chinese Medical Association and the medical colleges, were swept into the movement and received their full share of criticisms. The Red Guard overthrew the "bourgeois authorities" in the medical schools and affiliated hospitals, and set up radical communes composed of radical students, faculty and Party members.

The Chinese Medical Journal, the official organ of the C.M.A. (published in English), can serve as a handy guide to the course of development of the Revolution. Beginning in mid-1966, the CMJ began carrying articles of a purely political and ideological nature. This trend became intensified as the year went on. In September the readers were notified that, in response to the call of the Revolution, the C.M.A. had decided to publish a new renovated journal to be known as

● The situation which is confronting medicine itself.

One holds that the important thing is the interest, our private property, our monopoly. The other contends that the function of the doctor's position, that the security duty, that we are above professional privilege.

China's Medicine, beginning the following month. The CMJ was thus officially pronounced dead after eighty years of reputable existence. However its replacement did not appear until January 1968, some fifteen months later and it was to be known as China's Medicine.

The Chinese Academy of Medical Sciences, the pinnacle of medical research in China which was established in 1957 with headquarters in Peking was also embroiled in the struggle. The Director, C. H. Huang, a noted thoracic surgeon formerly trained in Michigan, accepted the policy but later was under attack by orthodox Party students.

At one time an attempt was made to castigate the students by cutting off heat and electricity. But finally the rebel students emerged victorious and a revolutionary commune was formed in June 1967. "The Director is now on excellent terms with the Party. He was a man with a sense of dedication which made

...medicine today is a contest of two forces in
 ...the maintenance of our vested historical
 ...topoly of health distribution.
 ...of medicine is greater than the maintenance ...of the peoples' health is our primary ...privileges."

-Norman Bethune

him feel that their revolutionary enthusiasm could be harnessed to build up the kind of medical profession that China needs," according to sources.

The guidelines for educational reform were laid down by the now famous "Sixteen Points" of the Central Committee of August, 1966. Point ten of the document enunciated that:

The phenomenon of our schools being dominated by bourgeois intellectuals must be completely changed. . . . We must adopt thoroughly the policy advanced by Mao Tse Tung of education serving proletarian politics and education being combined with productive labour. . . .

The period of schooling must be shortened. Courses should be fewer and better. . . . While their main task is to study, they should also learn other things: they should learn, industrial work, farming and military affairs and take part in the struggles of the Cultural Revolution. . . .

It is immediately apparent that medical education which in China used to require six to eight years of study, would be the first to be affected by such a policy. The prestigious China Medical College (formerly the Peking Union Medical College supported by the Rockefeller Foundation), came under the heaviest fire for its lengthy eight-year course

The revolutionary commune of the College submitted an article to Chinese Medicine in which it enumerated the following complaints:

- 1) Too little time for political studies (which already occupied 3.5 per cent of the curriculum time) and discouragement from staff.
- 2) The Pre-Med course was irrelevant as "it was not necessary for a doctor to study so much mathematics and natural science.
- 3) The academic load was overburdening, averaging 15 hours of work per day, generally imperiling the students health and resulting in a 15 per cent drop-out rate.

4) Examinations created too much tension, especially the "surprise attack" method which the professors delighted in.

5) An imbalanced interest in rare diseases and reliance on expensive instruments which were not available in most city general hospitals, let alone the countryside.

In another article, students from Shanghai aired similar views on the de-cayed system of medicine. The so-called first rate doctors these institutions purported to produce, charged this group of students, ignored the 500 million peasants and served only the cities.

What then were the new approaches to medical education? It was almost universally agreed that all entrance examinations be abolished, consideration given only to those with proven revolutionary zeal. Despite the elimination of class stratification since the Revolution, there still remained in the educational system much of the old favoritism toward the children of the former middle class, well-educated parents and discrimination against children of workingclass or peasant families.

It can be seen that most of the demands of the Chinese medical students were reasonable. It is obvious too that many of their grievances are shared by medical students on this side of the Pacific.

Colin McCullough, the Toronto Globe and Mail Peking correspondent visited the Chung Shan Medical College during the summer of 1969. He found a deserted campus since most of the students and faculty had gone to the country for six months to be "re-educated" by the peasants. A spokesman of the school explained that the students at the College had long been obsessed with the Three Bigs and the Three Smalls — referring to Big Doctor, Big House, Big City and Small house, Small family and Small car. Recognizing that traditionally Chinese intellectuals were disgusted with manual labour the ruralization drive was conceived to deflate the students' arrogance and on the practical side, provide the peasants with medical care which was most needed.

It is a sad consequence of the achievement of universal education and equality of opportunity which the Chinese aim to avoid. The Chinese Revolution attempted to re-orientate people's attitudes in the face of a slowly emerging professional elite. It was no coincidence that Mao's essay, In Memory of Norman Bethune, was made required reading throughout the country. The future doctors in China are conscious of the country's overwhelming problems and their radicalism is aimed at attacking at the very roots, the medical backwardness common in all underdeveloped nations.

Only by such drastic measures as were pronounced during the Cultural Revolution could there be any chance at all of winning the battle. Basic research and specialty-training will undoubtedly be retarded, although they are not currently totally abandoned. But it is foreseen that when the situation has improved, some of those who have gained practical experience will return from the countryside for further training.

There is a valuable lesson for the so-called Third World from China's example of self-reliance. Self-reliance however should not lead to scientific isolationism, and the latter was never a goal of the Cultural Revolution. The inflow of scientific information was never cut off.
 In fact, the new breed of Chinese doctors are officially expected "to absorb all the positive achievements of modern medicine," but at the same time must "wage repeated fierce struggles against the slavish ideas of worshipping everything foreign."

With the setting up of Revolutionary
 Committees in all provinces by October 1968, the Cultural Revolution was completed in a formal sense. For better or worse, the changes in medical education had been substantial. Back in 1960 the then editor of Lancet, Theodore Fox wrote: "The Chinese are engaged in perhaps the largest experiment of all times; and medicine, "as we understand it," could be a local casualty. In the decade to come, we shall be able to see whether Chinese medicine has indeed become a casualty, or whether our conception of medicine should be changed."

BOOKS

Two of the poembooks received recently are excellent. Hugh MacDiarmid's Selected Poems (Penguin, $1.15) and The Penguin Book of Socialist Verse ($2.50) edited by Alan Bold.

They go together also. MacDiarmid's poems are in socialist ideology and the octogenarian Scottish genius has been a steaming nationalist and communist all his adult life thrown out of the Scottish nationalist party for his unapologetic socialism and out of the CP for nationalism all in the same week. I believe.

One of MacDiarmid's greatest achievements has been to inject Scots as a literary language into the great as Burns or Dunbar by his own admission and the few poems presented here from his prodigious output justify the claim that he should be considered with Yeats, Eliot and Pound among the leading poets of our century.

MacDiarmid has written long (many thousands of lines and only partly published) philosophical poems in English, in rhythms strongly influenced by Whitman; he is also at home in polemic. The critical essay autobiography and this book contains some of his famous Scots poems—the three lyrics to Lenin, some gnarled and starchy lyrics and excerpts from such longer works as A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle and In Memoriam James Joyce. Scots words are glossed clearly throughout.

Alan Bold, a young Edinburgh poet has assembled a truly monumental anthology of socialist poetry for Penguin Books—550 pages long, with selections from the works of 135 famous, infamous and unheard of poets from all over the wretched yearning world, all written since Homer's day (Homer being a friend and contemporary of Karl Marx). Chairman Mao leads this field with 13 poems and Pablo Neruda places with 12.

Bold figures, a poet need not be a socialist to write well, but at the other apologetic extreme, Cynicism is generally the aggressive face of ignorance. Bold attributes the bog that is Britain and her polite culture today, in part to the fact that her poets haven't been heard, he also notes that British poets themselves, unlike their contemporaries elsewhere, have been too ready to stop short of socialism as the economic argument for democracy.

We're farred here with a fortune in poems, not all written by socialists, but all at least having that imminent vision of human brotherhood which fortifies socialism—my emphasis has been on creativity rather than ideology, says Bold, but the letter flows from the former and many of the poems in this anthology have both in abundance.

New arrivals: Earle Birney's rege bone shop, from McClelland and Stewart at $2.95. It's all odd lots, but none of it dingy—word and type games, found poems, concrete poems, carols, travel poems, love poems, a Chaucer imitation (the best phonies performed by the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra, Franz Konwitschny conducting. They are available on six stereo discs at a ridiculous $5.00 & 50¢ postage for the set. Write to Marboro Books, Dept. S-19B, 131 Varick St., New York, N.Y. 10013, quoting catalogue number R756. This has been a free public service announcement. —T.J.

MUSIC

(thing in the book). The overall tone is light, scornful, high sensuousness, the Earle thanks his nichol for turning me on—many of the poems are set in red and black type.

Wheel for a new Anansi anthology costs $2.50 called Soundings—which has poems by 14 people of no reputation, some of whom certainly could have good ones ahead of them if they cared for that. Their voices are sweet when they speak of love or other warmth, or are just being hilarious or sly. Tom Wayman's Life on the Land Grant Review is crow pie for editors.

Pick up Acta Victoriana, the Vic College lit mag free at Vic. —T.W.

Tonight at Massey Hall, 8:30 p.m., an all Brahms programme with the TS, Karel Ancel and violinist Ida Heendel. On the programme are two Hungarian Dances, the Violin Concerto and the Third Symphony. Tickets at the box office.

Sunday (Dec. 13 at 3:15 p.m.) the Beaverlens Stings debut with a concert of Atensky, J.S. Bach and Gneg at Scarborough College. If you're interested further info awaits you at 261 8777.

Next week is Messiah week at Massey Hall with Nandef's masterly oratorio interpreted by Ancel and the TS, with soloists Theodore Gentry, Charles Bressler and Donald Bell. The work is presented Tuesday (Dec. 15), Wednesday (Dec. 16) and Friday (Dec. 18), at 8:30. Ticket prices are from $2.75 up to $6.50, at the box office.

Next Thursday (Dec. 17), the U of T concert choir is presenting a free recital of seasonal music at 2:00 p.m. in Trinity College Chapel.

December 16 is Beethoven's Birthday (or so Schroeder tells me). You can celebrate with the 9 Sym.

SAC debates, postpones decision on UWC

By BOB GAUTHIER

SAC's discussion of the University Wide Committee (UWC) centred about exactly how democratic the governing structure of the University should be. No decision was reached.

At the Wednesday evening meeting Brian Hayes (UC), and Peter Hall (Trin), put forward motions questioning the proposed UWC set-up.

Hayes' lengthy motion (ten paragraphs) included the statement that SAC affirm its position as the collective voice of students and advance their interests. He said that SAC must remain the legitimate voice of students until a complete and final "democratization" of the university comes about.

The motion also called for parity as a compromise "not as a utopia." Parity, in Hayes' view, is only an interim measure designed to lead to a "common franchise" — one man, one vote — including everyone within the university. He believes an interim structure (of parity) would "give us time to learn how to govern ourselves."

"I don't care if it's my motion," he said. "I want a democratic university and I say parity is the way to get to that. We want parity because we want an effective voice. Without it, it won't help us one iota. Parity is how we'll be educated on how to govern a university of this size."

Craig Heron, education consultant, said that Hayes' "rhetoric is obnoxious to me. Participatory democracy is a hell of a lot more than the liberal democratic stuff he's trying to import from city hall. I sat on the UWC and was very pissed off. The UWC was a fait accompli. The President and the Board of Governors passed it on to the government. . . . I think generally students on this campus are not willing to accept it."

Ken McEvoy thought Hayes' motion to be contradictory to SAC policy. "I don't think we should take it since it opposes council. The role of the students and the role of the faculty members is not the same, therefore it's ridiculous to say faculty and students are the same. This is why the council has not pushed for parity. Therefore we want parallel structures. I don't think council policy should be changed."

Hayes replied: "From what I understand SAC supported parity and CUG as a compromise. I think there are certain fundamental issues on which we should not be flexible. We are setting no precedent except the precedent that we are willing to go to ends to achieve what we wish. I don't think anyone when he really looks at it can find any reason against democracy."

Tony Usher, undergraduate student representative on UWC agreed with McEvoy that SAC policy was not parity but parallel structures. "We have to be very careful as to how to phrase actions. We have the legitimacy of the committee to look after."

"We made a grave mistake in accepting the composition of the UWC. We also made a mistake in accepting a committee that would deliberate in the summer."

"We have the responsibility to say the intent of the UWC recommendations are repugnant to us. We should affirm student-faculty majority and student-faculty parity. It's not good enough to say we were screwed by the UWC because we accepted it."

Peter Hall motioned to repudiate the majority report of the UWC. He felt SAC was "dealing with the answer, before we deal with the question. The question is: what kind of a university do we want, and what kind of an education for students do we want?"

"There are two basic facts: the government of Ontario has power and the students of this university have power. If the students don't exercise this power, the government will."

After four hours of discussion the meeting was adjourned, and agreed to meet again after Christmas break. Hayes was the last to speak "No matter what position is decided upon, if it is not a democratic university I will be opposed. As an ultimate goal parallel structure is bullshit."

Fac brief requests last year mark switch

By MARINA STRAUSS

The Faculty of Arts and Science "Evaluation Committee" yesterday passed a motion which requests that exemptions from exams in 100-series courses be presented to the particular department involved, instead of the Faculty Council.

The motion was passed five to one by the Committee, which consists of six Faculty members from Arts and Science. As yet no students have formally requested to be members on the committee.

The policy that "The final mark in the 100-series courses will normally be made up of a term mark and an exam mark with the restriction that not less than one-third nor more than two-thirds of the final mark will be based on term work" will be recommended to be removed, according to the motion.

Questions concerning the necessity of evaluation will also be submitted in the Committee's report to the Faculty Council.

Whether evaluation is necessary, or whether it is only appropriate for certain disciplines, and how the evaluation should be arrived at are the major topics in the brief.

Problems peculiar to the Inter-Disciplinary Studies, especially the proposal of self-evaluation, will not be discussed until January, when a report will be in from Innis College.

The Committee agreed that final exams of two- or three-hour duration should not be held outside the special final exam period. Exams held during regular class periods were said to interfere with the student's concentration in his other courses.

Professor J. E. Smith, the only member of the Committee opposing the motion, insisted that "University standards should take priority over what each department wants." He felt that every student should have the experience of writing one exam of the particular department during his undergrad years.

"The most logical way to evaluate and pull together a first year introductory course is through a final exam," he insisted.

However W. J. Huggett, professor at Erindale, felt that it was not a common necessity to draw together a year's work in all departments. "And there are other means rather than the formal exam."

An observer commented that a final exam maintains standards. He claimed that, for one, it solves the problem of trust. Students can cheat in the writing of an assignment. Secondly, the final exam establishes a level of justice for the student, preventing different loads of assignments for different sections of the same course.

To this Professor C. Plowright of Innis College argued "You are encouraging conformity. I encourage diversity."

One student observer said that "it is part of the educational process to develop a sense of trust in the individual. It is therefore both negative and contradictory to tell the student that he will write an exam to ensure that he does not cheat, and that he will not be trusted to do an essay or an assignment."

The Committee's motion will be presented for further discussion to the General Faculty Committee on Jan. 4th.

SMC going down financial hatch

By JEAN BUBBA

Thursday afternoon, approximately two hundred SMC students were confronted with the question of the future of the college by a faculty panel consisting of Rev. John Kelly, President of SMC, Professors B. F. Brown and L. E. Lynch of the Philosophy Department and Professor Marshall McLuhan of the English Department.

Mr. Kelly felt that the college had a general desire to remain Catholic and that it "is equally as Catholic as forty years ago but in a more developed sense, a more open and less prejudiced sense of the word."

But "because of its Church relations, the college is ostensibly not available for formula financing," said Prof. B. Brown.

"Since 1966 we have not received the full equivalent of formula financing, or the full basic unit of $1530 per student from the Province of Ontario. St. Michael's College loses approximately $133,000 per year on basic income units from the government," said Brown.

"Over and above student fees, we receive $150 per student at SMC and other federated colleges receive $200 per student," said Kelly.

Lynch saw two alternatives to the problem at SMC: secularization of the college, that is, keeping it Catholic and Christian in outlook but in the hands of laymen; or SMC could redefine the Catholic College's responsibility for its Catholicism as a lay responsibility.

Redefinition on its most practical level is aimed at obtaining increased government support.

"Internally SMC has gone from a seminary, to a men's arts college, to a co-ed arts college, to a university. We have experienced a shift in the disciplines offered and the orientation of the college towards the university. This change creates a new set of administrative problems that require a different focus," said Lynch.

McLuhan said that the "future of SMC is to be decided by yourselves (the Students)."

"But the components have gone way ahead of the ideals in that the possibility for good is ahead of the good itself. We are dealing with nineteenth century ideals of power, priority and parity. When people struggle for power they get something different from what they want to get," said McLuhan.

He then spoke of the possibility of setting up a commune on campus.

Zen monk speaks on meditation

By MAURICE HARLES

If you're into Zen, oriental studies, the occult, comparative religion, Gurdjieff, Buddhism or simply curious about the life-style of a Tibetan Buddhist, you can hear a lecture by a man trained and authorized to teach by high level Tibetan masters.

From the Tail of the Tiger Buddhist Community in Vermont, Kuenga Dawa will give a public lecture on the Path of Compassion and the Guru Scene today and on Saturday, December 12 at 1657 Bloor Street West (near East entrance to Keele subway) at 8:00 p.m.

Tibet has come into the public eye since the invasion by China in 1959 with thousands of refugees pouring into India. Remote and isolated, Tibet has been shrouded in mystery for centuries with only a handful of westerners ever managing to live there for long or to experience the unique teachings, culture and meditation practices of that country.

Psychiatrists, psychologists and scientists have learned recently that Tibetans have been experiencing depth penetration of the unconscious in a unique way and scientists experimenting with the electroencephalogram have measured the electrical currents in the brain of meditation masters and found it to be a unique state of consciousness.

Kuenga Dawa is a student of the Venerable Choegyam Trungpa Rinpoche, a former supreme Abbot of the Surman group of monasteries in Eastern Tibet, and a renowned Yogi and meditation teacher in the spiritual lineage of Milarepa.

Keenly interested in psychology, Dawa explored the subject with the controversial psychiatrist R. D. Laing. He also selected and edited the material for Rinpoche's book, Meditation in Action.

The Tail of the Tiger Buddhist

Community, where Dawa teaches, was established in March 1970 by a group of disciples of Rinpoche and is dedicated to strict observance of Buddhist teachings through work, study and meditation. It is situated on a 430 acre farm in the Green Mountains of Vermont.

Here, in Toronto, Karma Kunzang, recently installed as a Nagma Lama, or spiritual teacher, of Tibetan Buddhism has established a centre for Tibetan Studies at 197 Harbord Street (above the Studio of the Joyous Brush).

1970 'dream team' announced

Blues clinch seven OQAA all-star spots

Strong-armed quarterback Wayne Dunkley led a parade of five Varsity Blues football stars onto the 1970 OQAA all-star offensive platoon it was announced late last night.

In addition to Dunkley, tackle Jim Kellam, guard Don Fraser, running back Glenn Markle and split end John Chapman were the other Blues to be selected to the prestigious SIFL "dream team" offensive squad.

In addition to these five, veteran defensive tackle Alex Squires and rookie standout defensive back Pete McNabb were chosen to the defensive team to give Blues a total of seven selections — the same number as the Yates Cup champions from Queens.

Alex Squires

John Chapman

Blues and the Gaels evenly split 10 of the 12 offensive positions.

The team, chosen by a Canadian Press poll of sports writers, broadcasters and coaches, will be the final one to bear the OQAA stamp as the old association will give way to a new, as yet unnamed, all-Ontario conference next year.

Dunkley, who is only in his second year with Blues, stepped in to take charge of Blues attack when veteran star pivot Vic Albino was injured in a match against Queens in Blues' second league game. Despite having sat out the first two games, Dunkley led the league in passing with 777 yards.

Markle, capped an outstanding career with Blues as he captured the league scoring title with 42 points on seven touchdowns. He was Blues most consistent rusher all season and was recently selected as the team's MVP for 1970.

For flashy wide receiver Chapman, the selection marks the second consecutive year as an all-star. Last year, he shared the split end spot with Waterloo's Don Manahan. This time, however, he grabbed all but one of the votes as a runaway winner. He led the league win 425 yards on 25 receptions.

McNabb, the ball-hawking former star with Trinity College School, led the loop in interceptions in his first year. He hijacked eight enemy passes — two more than Queen's celebrated Mike Lambros.

It was the fourth selection for both Kellam and Squires.

Blues down Warriors 5-3 for important win

Debenedet scores winner early in third period

By LYNDON LITTLE

Varsity's championship hockey Blues survived an unscheduled eight-minute siesta in the second period Wednesday night and then went on to take a 5-3 decision from the Waterloo Warriors at Varsity Arena.

Leading by a 3-1 margin midway through the middle frame thanks to goals by Nick Holmes, Mac Hickox and Bill Buba, Blues appeared to ease up on the throttle and, as they've done so often before, the Warriors stormed back with goals by Ken Laidlaw and Dave Rudge to deadlock the match.

But unfortunately, Blues regained their spark in the final 20 minutes and after just 38 seconds of play, defenseman Nels Debenedet scored the winning goal on a hard backhand drive to the top right-hand corner of the Waterlounet.

BLUES MADE THAT MARKER stand up the rest of the way and with only 20 seconds remaining winger Gord Davies fired an insurance marker into an abandoned Warrior goal.

The narrow, hard-earned victory permitted Blues to take over sole possession of first place in the OQAA Western Division with a record of four straight wins. The loss dropped Waterloo back into second place with a 3-1 mark.

Blues travel to Hamilton this evening to meet the McMaster Marlin's in their final league contest in the pre-Christmas schedule.

"That was a great team effort," commented a happy coach Tom Watt after the thrilling, end-to-end battle with the arch rival Warriors. "Except for that stretch in the second period I felt we played well."

"IT WAS A TYPICAL Waterloo-Varsity game," echoed Blues captain John Wright who picked up assists on the goals by Buba and Debenedet. "Lots of hitting with few clear-cut scoring opportunities."

"I thought Grant (Cole) kept us in there — especially in the first period," he added.

In the other dressing room, Warrior coach Bob McKillop, who found little reason to be displeased with his team's showing, said:

"I thought we skated well tonight. What I like about this team is that they never quit on me, they always come back. At least this year, we haven't had to rally from as large deficits as last year."

BOTH GOALTENDERS, Cole for Blues and Ian Young for Waterloo, played outstanding games. Facing his stiffest opposition since he began his competitive comeback after losing the sight in his left eye four years ago, Young said:

"Playing a team like Blues really helps you regain your edge. I'm still having a little trouble with the long shots. However, the close in ones don't bother me because I'm primarily an angle goaltender."

Young wears a special mask with the opening for his good right eye smaller than normal for added protection against sticks and pucks.

Rookie Ivan McFarlane continued his fine play as he centered a line with Holmes and Hickox who both picked up their third league goals.

Davies and Terry Peterman did a fine job of killing penalties — especially at one crucial juncture late in the second period when the Warriors had just tied it up at 3-3 and then Holmes took a charging minor.

BLUE NOTES: Referee Zip Thompson fingered Blues for eight minor penalties and the Warriors for six... Shots on goal were 39-28 — in favour of Blues... Gord Bullock selected Davies, Waterloo's Ian McKeegney and Holmes as his three stars... Warriors will compete in a tournament at Queen's over the holidays; they're understandably miffed at not being selected for the Hockey Canada Tournament... Hickox will be facing his old buddies for the first time tonight. He toiled for Mac for four years.

Lacrosse Warriors hold PhysEd back 8-6

By THE MAN AT THE BACK

Doug McKeown stole the ball and pumped a low bounce shot goal past PhysEd netminder Paul Rocks with only six seconds remaining to clinch a 8-6 victory for his Erindale Warriors in a thrill-packed interfac lacrosse playoff game at Hart House last night.

The Erindale victory ties the best-of-three game series at one game each and sets the stage for the third and deciding match Monday afternoon at 1.00 p.m.

PhysEd took the first game by a score of 2-8.

McKeown paced the attack for the winners who held off a strong PhysEd rally in the dying minutes as they killed the clock effectively. Dave Michie also scored three times for Erindale while John Robinson added two more. Al Christie, and Don Crocker each scored twice for the PhysEd team which trailed 5-3 at the half.

Erindale successfully muffed the big stick of Bob Connelly who scored only once for PhysEd while Neuf Fever also contributed a single score.

The game was witnessed by a highly vocal crowd of 372 who ringed the upper tar track; many standing two deep hoping for a glimpse of action taking place below.

Residents become guerrillas

Tenants at the U of T married students' residence on Charles St. W. enact French Revolution guillotine scene in guerrilla theatre form. The skit, put on last Saturday, was to protest the failure of the Ontario Housing Corporation to meet demands for better services and less rent. Students who face possible eviction for their rent strike, performed a wee ditty wherein "Supertenant" arrived on the scene freeing the guiltless and moreover innocent dwellers from the oppressive hassles of the guillotine. As a result no one spent the night on the street. But the OHC symbolized by the hooded baddies is still lurking in the background waiting for the good guys to let down a bit. Then beware as both the book-bound grads, their potage of kids as well as all chattels will be hurled into the wintry drifts.

Scientist Chi Ikoku to speak on rebuilding wartorn Nigeria

At 12:30 today in Room 1071 Sid Smith, Dr. "Chi" Ikoku, prominent Nigerian scientist and social theorist, will speak on the topic "Towards a New Nigeria."

During the recent Nigerian-Biafran war "Chi" worked in Biafra as a member of the Science Group, which worked on the development of techniques for the production of numerous staples of life denied to the Biafrans by the Nigerian blockade.

The successes of the Science Group under extremely adverse circumstances smashed the myth that Africans are incapable of producing on their home territory: with indigenous skills the goods that have typically been provided by their former imperial masters.

Since the end of the war, Ikoku and his colleagues have been working to apply the knowledge gained under wartime conditions to the solution of continuing food and material deficiencies in Nigeria and to free their country from dominance by the vagaries of the international market.

Ikoku, who spoke at the recent International Teach-In on the "Crisis in Development", is a leading member of the Frantz Fanon Research Center in eastern Nigeria.

The Frantz Fanon Center is a think-tank for Nigerian intellectuals committed to breaking out of the neo-colonial cycle.

By looking at African social and political problems from an African perspective, and by involving the mass of the people in the solution of those problems, the intellectuals hope to create an African society which is both independent of the white world and capable of meeting the material and social needs of the population by concentrated use of African skills and manpower.

Ikoku's experiences in the Biafran War were recently chronicled for Canadians in a collection of his letters edited by Betty Nickerson of Montreal under the title "Chi", published by New Press.

Yum, yum. Slurp only if you're IN

By MERRY WALLPOLL

Students wishing to mingle with their student, faculty, or administration superiors in a free-flowing atmosphere have an excellent opportunity in the pre-Christmas season if they have the right connections.

The U.C. alumni invited third and fourth year students to a "holiday reception" on Dec. 5 in honour of retiring registrar R M H Shepherd and new principal A C H. Hallett. The college student elite, experienced in these matters, turned up in force. They knew that the alumni were spending $1200, most of it on liquor. Those present commented that the canapes were weak but the bar service excellent.

The same crowd dominated a $500 wine and cheese party on Dec. 10 also honouring Hallett and Shepherd, put on by the alumni and the U.C. Lit. Lit president Marty Goldberg proudly pointed out that this was the first reception with a bar presented by the student council.

Among those present were a number of present and former student politicians from outside the college who keep tabs on these in port social occasions. The SAC-CUS Bacchus Fracas, an annual event hosted by the SAC, also lubricates campus political wheels. This year the $300 of liquor will be consumed at the SAC office on Friday. SAC president Rod Hurd said the money would be raised from private sources, and that it would be a "tight" party.

The other Christmas charity of SAC is the annual union-management dinner. The executive and the employees went out to a $200 lunch yesterday, paid for by council funds.

Council to sit Jan. 19

Bowing to a rising ground swell of student dissent, Arts and Science secretary W D Foulds has rescheduled the meeting of the 1300-man faculty council to Jan. 19.

The meeting, called by 15 faculty members to veto the decision of the smaller 169 General Council was originally slated for Monday this week.

The General Council had substantially followed the recommendations of 4700 students who in a referendum called for a party committee to restructure the council.

As students had organized to come to the Monday meeting en masse, Foulds switched the date to Friday when few students would be on campus, ostensibly because the Monday date conflicted with other meetings.

Foulds denied that the meeting had been postponed because the scheduling of the SAC party had been scheduled for the same place at the same time Friday.

Education is holding referendum on SAC

The College of Education Student Union is holding a referendum today and tomorrow on whether to withdraw from SAC.

Union vice-president Hugh Macmillan says the referendum is intended not as a serious move to pull out, but rather as an attempt to register discontent with SAC and the way approximately $27,000 coming from C of E students is being spent.

"The executive feels the college cannot participate fully in SAC", says Macmillan. "We're not really a part of the campus".

He said student teachers are only at the college for one year, and during this year, they are away on teaching assignments for 10 weeks. Four of these 10 weeks come in early fall, when it is most important to participate in SAC.

According to MacMillan, the student union gets very little money back from SAC, and exists on college administration funds. He said that the CESU wants some sort of rebate of the $14 paid to SAC by each student similar to that the Scarborough College Student Council receives.

To be binding on the union, the referendum needs at least a 50 per cent turnout, and at least 75 per cent of these voting must favour leaving SAC. Polls will be open between 9 and 5 p.m.

The future is dim for Scarborough College

By DOUG HAMILTON

Five years ago, Scarborough College was considered to be a dynamic and unique appendage of the University of Toronto.

Today, the brief period of success which the College enjoyed has disappeared. Scarborough College has died and needs only an official reading of the last rites to commemorate its passing.

The College has experienced countless problems since its erection in 1965. The curriculum was mutilated by the Faculty of Arts and Science, the television experiment has been virtually a failure and the facilities are no longer under Scarborough's control. Serious discrepancies in the system of cross-appointments have also arisen. Many professors dislike being appointed to teach downtown and at the Scarborough campus.

Dean John Colman has complained of faculty absenteeism and the lax attitude to submitting grades. A paper prepared by six professors and presented to the Presidential Advisory Committee on the Status and Future of Scarborough College stated that some faculty members "come to the College only for their lectures, and some complain bitterly if this means being present more than two half days per week." Some staff members are reluctant to engage in committee work and other activities outside their formal teaching duties.

BY THE SUMMER OF 1970, the situation at Scarborough College was so desperate that the Principal, A. F. W. Plumtree made it clear to President Bissell that "life within the University of Toronto was going to become intolerable." The President initiated a committee of prominent bureaucrats and faculty under the capable leadership of Kenneth Hare, a geography professor. The report will either suggest that the U of T become a federation of autonomous colleges, or that Scarborough become Toronto's third university.

The Hare Committee has largely been ignored by Scarborough's student body, and one faculty member even described the proceedings as "bullshit."

Although the report may solve some of the problems which are attributable to Scarborough College's unusual position within the University, it can offer no solutions to the real problems.

There is no effective leadership to mobilize the mass of apathetic students. The President of the Scarborough College Student Society, Carmen Palumbo, announced that he would resign at the end of this calendar year. At a meeting of the SCSS on December 8, Vice-President Bob Levine moved that all the members of the Student Society should resign with Palumbo. If Levine's motion is carried, student government will cease to exist because it is doubtful that enough candidates can be found to fill any vacant positions. No elections were held earlier this year due to the lack of nominations, and nine positions were filled by acclamation. Carmen Palumbo has accused the College Registrar, A. J. G. Patenall, and Assistant Dean J. Riddick, of attempting "to kill the Student Society once and for all."

There is no doubt that strong anti-student forces are active within the College hierarchy. Mr. Les Fee, the Assistant to the Principal, was "fired" by the Administration. Mr. Fee was considered to be a student-sympathizer and an expert at cutting red tape.

EVEN IF THE STUDENT BODY wished to protest the dismissal of Mr. Fee, there is nothing they can effectively do to alter the situation. The power structure of the College is inviolable against any attack. For the past few years the College has witnessed a proliferation of legislative committees which has rendered the student body powerless.

"The students' presence (on committees) is used to legitimize any decision taken as being representative of the wishes of the community as a whole, even though all the students might oppose that decision. This is done by making sure that the number of students involved is too small to carry any real weight, but large enough to avoid any charge of tokenism," said Palumbo in a recent issue of the college paper, Balcony Square.

The committee system has ennobled student organizations at Scarborough College. The House-keeping Committee which regulates the College transportation system, security, and student activities, prevented Radio Varsity from expanding its speaker layout.

SAC member and Radio Varsity news reporter Jim Cozzi was hitler about the rejection of his proposals for improved inter-campus communications. He claimed that Principal Plumtree dominated the debates within the House Committee, and said the formidability of the committee structure "disillusioned active students."

CINESCAR, a student-operated film group was asked by the House Committee to limit the showing of feature films in the College because high-school students were entering the building at night. By allowing non-University students to watch a weekly movie, CINESCAR was accused of fostering "beer-drinking, pot smoking, and brawling", in and around the College. The pot smoking charge was never substantiated with concrete evidence, but U of T students were caught drinking beer and expelled from the lecture theatre where the film was being shown.

ANDY DENVER, Director of CINESCAR, insists the trouble was created largely by College students and says there is no reason why high-school students should be barred from the theatre. East Scarborough is notorious for shopping-plaza gangs, and CINESCAR was providing a much-needed community service by offering the local teenagers reasonably-priced entertainment.

Besides the film programme undertaken by CINESCAR, entertainment at Scarborough College consists of either watching cartoons on television, or listening to a rock or folk concert arranged monthly by efficient SAC member Bob Stewart. The Administration has ruled that a "noisy event" can only take place monthly. The Administration also closed a student-run coffee shop due to fire regulations. It appears unlikely that the Drama Club will stage a production this year, and there is no sign of a literary magazine

After a long illness, the College newspaper, Balcony Square, died.

An autopsy revealed the Balcony Square suffered from an acute paucity of staff. About 25 students joined the paper at the beginning of the year, but only a handful were left when it stopped publishing last week.

The editorial staff maintains that the Student Society throttled the paper by not granting it sufficient operating capital. The SCSS gave the Balcony Square $3000 and assumed that advertising revenue would further defray the costs. However both the Business and Advertising Managers were incompetent. Ad Manager Bill Gale disappeared from the newspaper office at mid-term and was never seen again. Ed Bird, the Business Manager, kept his book-keeping figures on the back of old cheque stubs. On the day the paper folded, he ran up to the office to inform provisional editor Larry Osborn that the printing company had been overcharging the Balcony Square for several months. Bird has since been fired by a committee of 10 students who hope to resurrect the newspaper. At this time, the eventual fate of the Balcony Square is unknown.

WITHOUT A NEWSPAPER, a coffee shop, recreational, and athletic facilities, the students of Scarborough College face a bleak and depressing year. The building itself may be an architectural marvel, but it was not constructed realistically to serve the needs of students and faculty. The Principal acknowledged this fact, and has condemned the College as an "unfurnished and ill-balanced building."

Scarborough College has become a mausoleum for an indifferent and apolitical student rabble, oblivious to the world and ignorant of the harsh realities of the academic community.

Three Wooden Spoons For Your Aluminium Pans

"To talk of peace and brotherhood what might be the cost? a man ha did it long ago they hung him on a cross long ago/far away y'know things like that don't happen now-a-days."

— from Long Ago and Far Away by Bob Dylan

It is in the response to extremists that existing society shows its refusal to acknowledge let alone be the keeper of its "brother" For Canadians the story of the FLO is now almost as universally known as the story of another extremist who's person and movement was condemned and outlawed by the established authorities. Jesus Womens Lib groups are being condemned and ridiculed at every turn "Joe"-like hard-hats and Porter-like executives and intellectuals including Trudeau actually believe — at least say they believe that North America and the human race have more to fear from anarchists and hippies than from the possibility of nuclear holocaust!

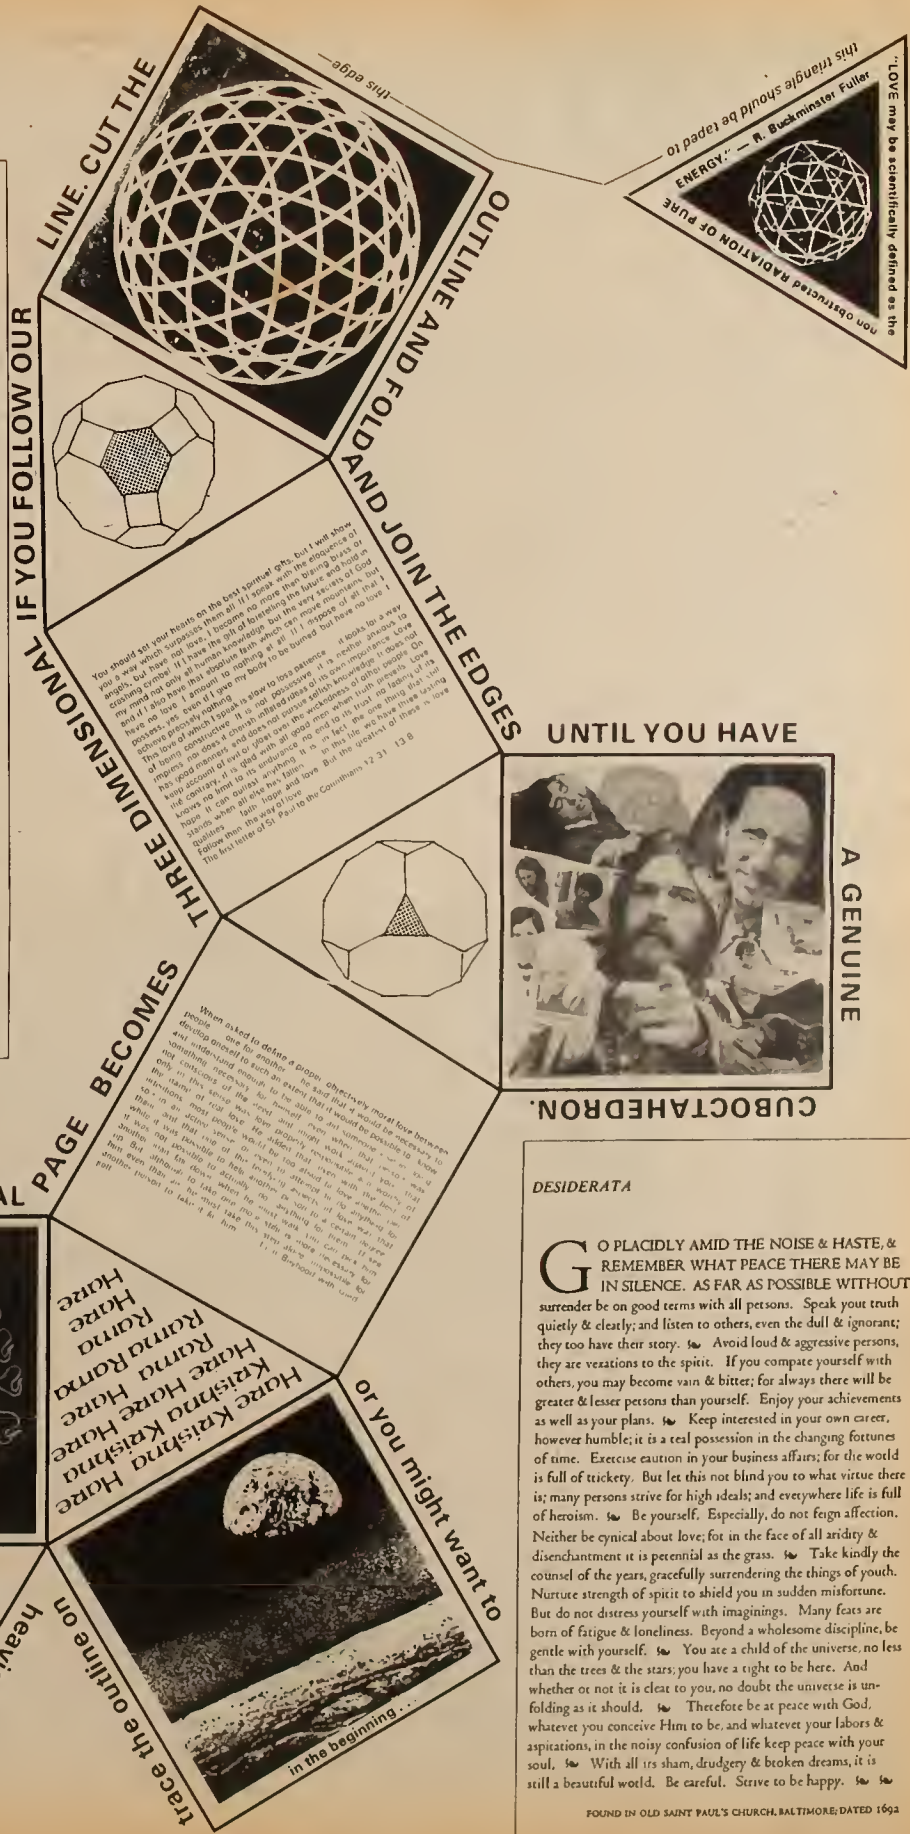

The oppression and struggles that generate extremism remain invisible to the oppressors and established authorities. They still accept profiteering as a fundamental right of the rich. They still see inflation not as absurdly excessive profiteering but as the responsibility of Labor! (Oh! now I get it!) ROWER! A peoples' history of French Canada

The leading best-selling book in Quebec right now is a unique little history book that breaks all the rules of history-writing as we know it.

It's called Petit manuel d'histoire du Québec, and sells for a dollar.

On first glance the book might seem to be just another thumbnail sketch of Quebec history. Certainly, it's the best introduction available for anyone unfamiliar with French Canada, but there is a lot more to the Petit manuel than that.

This book is an integral part of the upheavals which have been shaking Quebec and will continue to. It represents part of the struggle to reclaim their history that French Canadians are now waging.

Until now, writes author Leandre Bergeron in his foreward, "the tales we have been told about our past were conceived to keep us, the people of Quebec, outside of History." His position is that the historian must situate himself in the life process of his people — and see his work as part of their struggle for liberation.

Instead of concealing his sympathies and his analysis — the way bourgeois historians do under their guise of "value-free" objectivity — he states his position clearly.

Bergeron sees his book as a tool — a concise analysis that fellow Quebecois can make use of in shaping their future.

"We are a captive people," he writes. "In order to change our situation, we must first comprehend it."

The main theme of the book is simple: there has never been an independent and sovereign Quebec, ruled by the Quebecois. The history of Quebec is divided neatly into three eras, each corresponding to the rule of French, English and, now, American, imperialism.

Bergeron performs a valuable job in retelling the struggle of Quebecois for national survival over the last three centuries in a straightforward and un-sentimental way. His story is not coloured by the long-nourished illusion that Quebec was robbed of its happiness by the British Conquest, or by the clerical notion that Quebec had a mission to be the custodian of true Catholicism in a secular world.

Those are the hang-ups that, in the past, have successfully prevented the people of Quebec from understanding the nature of their oppression.

For Bergeron sees the history of Quebec not as a simple matter of national oppression. The French, English and American regimes have all been instruments of class rule, as well.

By stressing the conflict of classes within the context of a national struggle, Bergeron establishes a solid framework for his analysis of Quebec history.

No history or economics book that I have ever seen makes the same kind of diagrammatic analyses of such historical phenomena as the fur trade, lumber trade, etc.

Several charts reconstruct the economic links of the staple trades, from hunter through to consumer, noting clearly along the way who does the productive labour and who reaps the profits.

Or the following three pyramids, for example, express the relationships of class and nationality which characterized Quebec social structures in the 1830's, shortly before the eruption of armed conflict.

The English pyramid remains intact, ranging from aristocracy and administrators down through bourgeoisie and ordinary English settlers (especially in the Eastern townships), while the French has been lopped off at the top through the Conquest (leaving an unresolved conflict between the ordinary Quebecois and an aspiring bourgeoisie — a conflict which showed up in the failure of the rebellions), and the Indian pyramid has been reduced to the single class of an oppressed minority.

Note that Bergeron does not refer to the latter as "Indians", but as "hommes rouges". After noting that the precise term for North American natives would be "Amerindians" and that the referred to themselves as the "El-nou" people, Bergeron argues that if we are to call the Europeans "whites," we ought to call the natives, "Reds."

Bergeron makes the same kinds of important distinction when he footnotes a reference to Columbus' "Discovery" of America as a term that reveals a real racial chauvinism among whites — including our most distinguished historians.

"To say that Columbus and Cartier are discoverers, is to say that only Whites are men who are capable of making discoveries for the human race, while the Indians on the continent were only animals, hardly more developed than apes."

"The white explorers discovered nothing. They explored territory and conquered territory by force, employing genocidal means as barbaric as those Hitler used against the Jews and the Americans against the Vietnamese."

What makes Bergeron's history book different is that he considers it really important to challenge the use of such simple terms and examine what hidden biases and assumptions lie behind their almost automatic use.

Bergeron's history performs two functions. First, it recounts in an easily readable way the main chapters in French Canadian history.

His accounts of, for instance, the 1837-38 rebellions and of Louis Riel's struggles, are the most accurate and worthwhile short accounts available. In English, I can recommend only Stanley Ryerson's Unequal Union as a useful book dealing with the same themes.

Second, Bergeron provides Quebecois with an analysis which will help them understand their history in order to, literally, create their future history.

His account of liberal democracy, for instance, is extremely cogent, for it is done not only in anecdotes, and historical data, but also in diagrams such as those in the box on this page.

Bergeron's history is a remarkable book because it combines a popular and easily readable account of history with a class analysis which bears very directly on present struggles and conflicts.

As English Canadians there are several important uses we can put this book to. We can use it to understand not only the history of French Canadians, but also of the economic structures which govern the lives of us all.

Bergeron's book, which deals with events up to the emergence of the Parti Québécois and the elections of last April, concludes on a prophetic note:

"Malgré le bruit intermittent des bombes, il règne un lourd silence dans la société québécoise. C'est un creux de vague qui prépare un nouvel élan."

For the theme of Bergeron's history is that the present so-called "crisis" in Quebec is much more than an isolated happening, but the outcome of long years of unresolved class and national contradictions.

Perhaps the day is not too far off when a similar history of the people of English Canada can be written. For we too have been robbed of our history.

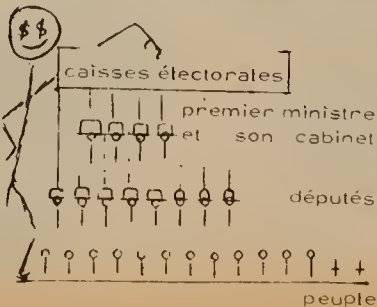

Supplementary note:
 The book carries a note at the back saying that it should not be sold for more than a dollar — the cost of production. One Yonge St. store has priced it at $1.25. They wouldn't dare do that in Quebec.

The apparent political structure :

The people elect representatives. The representatives belonging to the majority party (square hats) form the government. That is, the leader of the party becomes prime minister and chooses the various ministers he needs to govern the country from among his colleagues. The representatives of the minority party (round hats) from the opposition. Their work is to criticise the government so that it will pass good laws for the people.

The real political structure:

The people elect representatives who belong to parties. The parties "win" the elections through electoral campaigns paid for by companies. The party in power first passes laws that favour the companies, and later other laws in order to appease the people (family allowances, employment laws, social security, etc.) The government is at the service of the companies. It is a puppet government. This kind of democracy is called bourgeois democracy. Bourgeois democracy is in fact the dictatorship of the propertied class.

The Art of Trucking

Trucking and the body not mutually disjointed

Like most traditional philosophy, Truckism has its roots in the thoughts of Plato. The "Trucking Credo" is the most inspiring and the most important of Plato's shorter works. It is concerned as a whole with a theme of universal and perpetual interest, the immortality of the Truck. Plato, still fired by Socrates' death, brings to his description of the last hours of his friend's life all his many and varied gifts. No other dialogue reveals such sustained seriousness, with only brief pauses for relaxation, or so subtle a blend of intellectual argument with emotional appeal. There is first an introductory statement of the main Trucking thesis, which is essentially religious. Trucking, Plato maintains, is really the achievement of the soul's independence and that is what the philosopher is always seeking. The Trucking "argument from opposites" holds that the world is made up of opposites, hot and cold, great and small, and so on. Now as a trucker becomes bigger it must first have been smaller; and so, universally, whatever comes to be comes out of its opposite. The argument from the doctrine of recollection as it relates to Trucking, holds that no two visible things, such as Trucks or sticks or stones, are ever equal; yet the sight of two Truckers that only approximate to equality reminds us of perfect equality. We must therefore have known perfect equality in a previous existence; and in that case we must not only have existed before birth, we must also have engaged in pre-natal Trucking or its fetal equivalent.

Therefore, Plato asks, how are we to know that the soul at death Trucks its way to heaven rather than, say, simply is dispersed like smoke? Truckism's reply is to the effect that composite things are dispersed while the incomposite, if any such exist, are not; moreover Truckers are mutable. Trucking mutable. There are two classes of things, the mutable and the sensible. Obviously the Trucker belongs to the former class. Trucking to be latter. Furthermore, the Trucker commands and Trucking results: But to command is the function of the divine, to obey the function of the mortal. On both grounds together, therefore, the Trucker would appear to be constant and divine, both mutable and mortal. But since even Truckers, or parts of them such as bones, last a very long time, Truckers must be almost imperishable.

Philosophers since Plato, particularly the neo-Truckists of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries raise important objections to the arguments as it has so far been developed. Many espouse what may be one of the variant Pythagorean views of the Truck, the theory that it is a mere "harmony" or attunement of the bodily constituents, that when the physical elements are correctly proportioned, Truck supervenes, but that when that proportion is appreciably deranged Truck vanishes again.

The latter seems a more appealing view of the Truck for Trucking and the body cannot, by their natures, be in and of themselves, mutually disjointed. Thus this is the stand the contemporary Trucker most readily embraces, both for its scope and simplicity. Keep on Trucking.

But you thought trucking died out after the unsuccessful rebellions of 1837-38! This photo, taken at a secret Nova Scotia guerilla trucking training camp, shows that the old truckulent insurrectionary art still lives.

Trucking: learned or instinctive?

The fundamental question asked by most psychologists of trucking is, Is trucking a learned or an instinctive response? Experimental results in this area have been largely contradictory. Harlot observed that baby monkeys, raised in isolation, exhibited a behavior which closely resembled trucking (Harlot, 1958).

The young animals frequently emitted a locomotion response involving backward extension of the trunk and a forward protrusion of the neck and head. Harlot concluded that the results of his study strongly supported the instinctive theory of trucking.

B. F. Skinner replicated the experiment using as subjects, the Norwegian rat. The results of this study showed that the animals emitted no trucking behavior. However, critics of Skinner's learning theory of trucking state that the experimental apparatus used by Skinner hampered trucking in tall rats since the boxes had a very low ceiling.

Comparative psychology has not ignored the trucking response. T. A. Smith claims that he has isolated a trucking response in planaria (Smith, 1963). Smith said that the response can be elicited by a particular stimulus condition - the smell of garbage.

Social psychology has also been concerned with trucking. Allport has investigated the effect of trucking style on naive observers. The results of this study provided evidence that individuals are very conscious of the mode of trucking of others and that this greatly influences their attitudes.

When talking of trucking it is impossible to forget the huge contribution made by Freud's theory of psycho-sexual trucking development. Freud maintained that children go through psycho-trucking stage at age 13 to 14.65 years.

At this time it is particularly important that children be able to identify with a trucker - preferably a third cousin of the opposite sex and at least 15 years older than the child. If this identification does not take place, it is likely that the child will fixate at this stage and be truckingly retarded and unable to obtain trucking satisfaction with a member of the opposite sex in adulthood.

Psychopathology is turning its attention to manic-depressive trucking. Increasing numbers of truckers are finding their way into our mental institutions suffering from this particular syndrome. They alternate between manic trucking and a depressive condition where they have insufficient energy to truck, a fatal disturbance (as we truckers know). Therapists advise that patients be required to undergo trucking therapy where they are positively reinforced for proper trucking.

Trucking hallucinations and compulsive trucking are two more areas of concern of the psychopathologist. No one who has ever witnessed a compulsive trucker will ever forget the phenomenon - the exhausted man lying, pale and wan, on his bed trucking away. So far there is no effective therapy for these conditions.

And there our knowledge of trucking psychology ends. Research is continually analysing the behavior and our only hope is that we discover the stimulus conditions which control trucking.

The Varsity - Davi Frank

"Woodstock", Nicholson, Snodgrass: the best of '70

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

Because this is the last paper of 1970, I'd like to take a backward look at the films I've enjoyed and hated most in the past year. Which was the best movie? And the worst? Questions like these can't really be answered, since the same picture can be an awe-inspiring milestone to one person, and a cure for insomnia to another. As such, I do not claim to have the last word. But after seeing about one hundred movies through the Varsity in the past year, I just thought I'd let you in on my preferences.

In my opinion the best movie of the year was Woodstock. I've tried to remain as objective as possible in this choice, since my addiction to rock music is almost as devouring as my film buffery. But no matter how I look at it, Woodstock is outstanding in terms of editing, photography, sound quality and overall arrangement. Admittedly it relies heavily upon the strength of its performers, but what film doesn't? Besides, even the non-musical thunderstorm sequence conveys the ever-present immediacy and excitement of the entire movie. Whether or not you believe in the Woodstock Legend, this film is top-notch cinema.

Next in line for honours are Five Easy Pieces, Lovers and Other Strangers, The Boys in the Band and *M*A*S*H*. Honourable mention also goes to Diary of a Mad Housewife, Women In Love and Let It Be. (Just in case you think I've forgotten, I class Z and They Shoot Horses, Don't They? as 1969 films, and have thus omitted them.)

The worst film I've seen this year is The Secret of Dorian Gray. You may recall my vehement denunciation of this flick a few weeks ago in the Varsity. I don't think I need to recapitulate my opinions regarding this prostitution of literature. Other losers, as can be expected, all tried to cash in on the youth-and-sex market. Curses upon: Myra Breckenridge, Beyond the Valley of the Dolls, I Am Curious (Yellow), More and The Strawberry Statement.

The biggest surprise for me occurred when I discovered that the saddest disappointments of the year had come from directors of the Old Masters category. Fellini's Fellini Satyricon was a mindless, pointless array of circus freaks. Otto Preminger, as part of a continuing downhill slide, treated us to Tell Me That You Love Me, Junie Moon. Bunuel offered a limp Tristana and Godard a mildly amusing Sympathy for the Devil. Even Alfred Hitchcock could do no better than Topaz.

It was the new directors of the sixties who offered the best products. Michael Wadleigh created Woodstock which cannot be praised enough. The quiet, sensitive emotions of Five Easy Pieces came from Bob Rafelson. And I thoroughly enjoyed Mike Nichols' work in Catch-22. Canada in the 70's will not be taking a cinematic hack seat with such directors as Don Shehik (Goin' Down the Road) and Paul Almond (Act of the Heart) in her midst.

Good acting came in pretty small and infrequent amounts this year. But when it came, it was of top quality. Jack Nicholson, my vote for the best actor of 1970, proved as Robert Dupea in Five Easy Pieces that the abilities he displayed in Easy Rider can surface on more than one occasion. A very close second was Richard ("So, uh... what's the story?") Castellano, the father of the groom in Lovers and Other Strangers. Both he and Nicholson display an insight and sensitivity that is much needed in these days of faceless, one-sided porno-people.

More actors worth mentioning: Elliott Gould as Trapper in *M*A*S*H*; Alan Arkin as Yossarian in Catch-22; and Peter Boyle as Joe in an otherwise slushy Joe.

My choice for best actress is Carrie Snodgrass as Tina in Diary of a Mad Housewife. Her strength in this film was paradoxically the lack of strength and general spinelessness she showed in the face of a dominating, mixed-up husband. The fact that she was an unknown until this film greatly helped her give an honest portrayal that was unhampered by an Image to live up to.

And an additional tip of the hat to Mariann Hailey as the naive bridesmaid in Lovers and Other Strangers; and Glenda Jackson as Gudrun in Women In Love.

So now you know what I think. It's been a fairly good year for films, but there's also been some hideous garbage foisted on the public. I suppose I could end with the bland hope that next year will be a time of progress when movies will be better than ever. But I won't go that far. You and I both know that the next 52 weeks will contain a distressing amount of junk through which we must sift and sort to find anything of value. The coming year will no doubt run the gamut of sex-for-its-own-sake films, irrelevant relevance films, unfunny comedies, and undramatic dramas. But so it is with any art. When you've finally found something you enjoy, the whole thing really seems worthwhile.

ACTORS

For any erstwhile actors who want to make it, or in fact just want the chance to act in movies, you have a chance to audition Thursday.

Don Shebib, of Going Down the Road fame, is looking for people for his new film, and is having problems finding the following characters:

Two men, aged 18-19. One needs to be heavy, and the other has to be ratty-looking.

Two women. One has to be 21-22, very attractive, and 5'8" or 9". The other has to be cute, 5'6" ish, age 19.

The auditions are being held at the NEW YORKER, 11.00 a.m. to 2.00 p.m. Thursday 17 December. The gentleman to ask for is William Matheson.

TSO shows development of strings

By TONY JAHN

After attending concerts by two different symphony orchestras in the past two weeks, it was a joy to renew acquaintances with the Toronto Symphony last Friday night. As the occasion was an evening of Brahms, the meeting was especially pleasurable. The ever more authoritative interpretation accorded to Brahms by the TSO is a welcome sign marking the development of a cohesive big string sound unthinkable in the old Susskind days, a sound we usually associate with the best American symphonies. If the TSO played to less than full houses on their recent Montreal tour (the publicity was apparently lousy and the night of performance clashed with a Gordon Lightfoot concert at the Place des Arts) the loss was definitely Montreal's.

Where Montreal does gain is in having Polish-born violinist Ida Haendel among her residents. Miss Haendel, who is little known in this part of the country, completed the programme (Hungarian Dances No. 3 and 10 and Symphony No. 3) with a formidable performance of the D major Violin Concerto. While this work is the most concerto-like (in the traditional sense) of Brahms' output, it still tends to be (like all his concertos) a symphonic essay with instrumental virtuosity subjected and assimilated into musical virtuosity. The work takes the better part of an hour and just reading it through piecemeal requires an extra helping of Wheaties. Miss Haendel's playing transcended mere fidelity to the score, encompassing the work in a vast, unified perspective. She has a warm sound which rode above the orchestra in spite of a thorny solo line spiked with double and triple stops. The average listener weaned on closely taped recordings of the work may have found her projection lacking in testosterone, but even Isaac Stern's performance here last year could not compare in this respect. The tempi were measured, perhaps a hit conservative, but the generous polyphony of the work compensated and triumphed above this. Above all, the magnanimity of Miss Haendel's playing carried the work to heights shared perhaps only by Fritz Kreisler and a handful of other true Brahmsians. Hopefully Friday's appearance here (the second in some years) heralds the beginning of many Toronto performances by this excellent violinist.

The orchestral portion of the programme proffered virtuosity of a different sort. Anceri's mastery was always in evidence, in the selection of the programme, its interpretation and the absolute control he has gained over the orchestra. The Hungarian Dances No. 3 and 10 opened the evening, contrasting with each other and the rest of the programme. The lace filigree of No. 3 set off the rich embroidery of No. 10, and coincidentally also exposed some weaknesses in the woodwind section. There seems to be a bad case of flute flatness going around and what passed as one of many weak points in the Montreal Orchestra stuck out as a solitary sore thumb here. The 10th dance showed the strings in dubious light, and fast passages lacked rhythmic clarity in all sections. In places the violas and celli succumbed to lugubrious mumbling where accented underlining was called for. While on the subject of strings, the viola section deserves some comment. The reshuffled seating order shows off this soft-spoken instrument more fully. The exposure is not always to their advantage, and they must learn to turn this new unveiling to their benefit. There were parts especially in an exposed difficult section at the end of the 3rd Symphony, where the section was frankly out of tune.

In view of the general excellence of the major orchestral work of the evening the Third Symphony, these points of criticism dwindle. The piece was obviously not technically immaculate. However its integrity and persuasiveness, the coherence within and between movements and the sheer gut-reaction joy that it evoked proclaimed its merits with conviction.

Taylor fine

By ISSY DUBINSKY

James Taylor is a young, Carolina-horn folk artist whose name first came to the fore when Tom Rush regularly performed his songs. After a disastrous debut album for Apple Records, Taylor began recording for Warner Bros., who made his Sweet Baby James album a hit, with a number one single Fire and Rain.

Thursday night, Taylor entertained a capacity Massey Hall audience with a warm, sincere show that reflected none of his new-found success and fame.

Backed at times by an excellent group composed of Carole King on piano, Jim Sklar on bass and Russ Kunkel on drums, Taylor reflected all the mannerisms of his close friend Rush. The same quiet, sedate wit, voice range, and themes. He even displayed the tendency to do the tongue-in-cheek blues numbers, and performed a wildly received version of 'Okie from Muskogee'.

There were two unexpected highlights to the show. One was the brilliant drumming of Kunkel, who, at times overpowering, showed nothing less than technical brilliance in his work. The other was the work of Miss King, who occupied the entire first half of the show with her Laura Nyro-like style.

She showed the potential to become a great star in her own right, provided she can learn not to let her piano emoter for her, and that she is not Miss Nyro.

BOOKS

A more vital and enjoyable Christmas custom than is found in our deathly cities is described in Christmas Mummings in Newfoundland (eds. Herbert Halpert and G. M. Story, U. of T. Press, $7.50).

Mumming, an ancient and corrupt fertility ritual, consists of a play often roughly appropriate to the winter solstice, performed then in various parts of a community by disguised members of that community. The play's text and plot vary widely, but may consist of a fight between a hero and villain, in which the hero is slain and revived by a comic doctor, he may then fight again, defeating the villain, or other characters may be introduced and revenge forgotten.

I believe the superb NFB feature Moon-Raker shows mumming on Ile aux Coudres in the St. Lawrence, but except for there I don't know of any mumming in Canada outside Newfoundland. Story and Halpert have collected 13 thorough and fascinating scholarly essays and appendices on the history of the custom and its present condition. Because of an 1861 law against it and because of the modernization of Newfoundland, the playing has died out, but spooky Christmas mummings still might visit houses, especially in the east coast outports.

T. W.

The Magic Mailbox, The Boronian Wer, Trouble Underground by William Robson New Press $7.50

Wiggle to the Laundromat by Dennis Lee New Press $5.00

William Robson was nine years old when he wrote his trilogy. His characters, escaping from a most unpleasant orphanage, experience hair-raising adventures. They encounter people from Earth II, the Softies, a "Queen", a war between two cities which are "separated by a huge mountainous land which was inhabited from head to toe by monsters", and a cave of witches.

William displays good narrative ability, he gives some of his characters accents, includes a diary written by one of the orphans, and has a dragon deliver a poem.

The books also include his own colour illustrations. They come in a boxed set and are near-facsimile reproductions (reduced in size, however) of his own typescripts.

The trilogy is a remarkable and thoroughly enjoyable piece of work. I can only hope William continues to allow his imagination to grow and express itself.

Dennis Lee's expensive new book, Wiggle to the Laundromat, is whimsical but dark children's verse. Ookpik, alligator, fishes, laundromat, skyscraper and a martian appear throughout the work. Lee's approach to childhood's experience is funny yet gloomy. "A dump truck with a driver came/To excavate my head/But I was catching windypuffs/ And so they went to bed. A preacher with a pretzel came/ To lustrigate my soul/ But I was catching windypuffs/ And so he ate a roll."

The black and white illustrations by Charles Pachter are appealing and effective as frames and back-drops for the poems. Lee plays with a child's love of sounds and uses many Canadian place names to that end. A five-year-old friend was delighted when I read the book to her, much older friends were delighted and depressed.

Meanwhile the cast of Justine are presenting a "candy rock" musical, Copper Mountain at the Global Village. It was written especially for children, but anyone who still remembers the joys of fairy tales is welcome. $1.92-8170.

Most of the theatre available over the holidays, though, is the usual group of long-running plays I write up every week. The Me Nobody Knows, at the Crest Theatre 485-0777, the musical based on the writings of New York ghetto children, Dionysus In '70, at the Studio Lab Theatre 366-6451, I Had It But Its All Gone Now, Theatre Passe Muraille, 366-3376, the Candidelike satire of America, A Yard Of Sun, An Enemy Of The People, & The Effect Of Gamma Rays On Man-In-The-Moon Merri-golds, alternating in repertory at the St. Lawrence Centre, 366-7723, Hair, dragging out its last performances at the Royal Alex 363-4211, On Coward, Theatre in the Oeil, has just celebrated its 250th performance since its reorganization from the Noel Coward Revue. It's witty, musical and with just a touch of nostalgia.

368-5309 The Piper at the Toronto Workshop Theatre, is a new presentation of the Pied Piper, from the rats point of view for once. Interesting, but not great. 925-8640, and bringing up the rear, The Jest Society, at the Poor Alex, a series of revue sketches by a highly flexible cast. The audience can even choose the themes! 920-8370. Have a good holiday anyway.

FILM

Today's WatsUP is supposed to be a guide to fun things to do during the winter holidays. But I gave you all that information in last Friday's Varsity so that in this column I could digress somewhat from the ordinary.

What I'd like to do is recommend a book. Yes friends, it's true. Dedicated as I am to the moving image, I every so often turn to see what lurks in the world-between-the-bookcovers. And I've come across what I consider the most valuable, most informative, most interesting and most up-to-date film encyclopedia in existence.

I refer to none other than the third edition of Leslie Halliwell's The Filmgoer's Companion (MacGibbon & Kee, London, 1970). The price tag of $19.95 will no doubt strike fear into the hearts of all but the most rabid film buffs. However, this volume is so well arranged with thousands of fact-packed entries in its 1100 pages, that even at such a price I would not hesitate to call it an out-and-out bargain.

I can readily appreciate the fact that not many of you have any use for a cinematic encyclopedia. And few people would consider picking up a book that has no pretty pictures in it. But for those who really care about movies and need a handy reference to anything and everything, The Filmgoer's Companion is well-nigh indispensable.

Halliwell has recorded the major films of just about every significant actor, actress, director, producer, writer and cinematographer in the history of motion pictures. It is possible to look up virtually anyone of importance in either the silent or talkie eras and establish who he is when he lived and what he has done. The information is often so detailed, that experience in both films and TV series is listed.

Would you like a quick run-down on Birth of a Nation, Citizen Kane or The Seventh Seal? This book contains capsule reviews and remarks on hundreds of major films from all countries. Not only that, but The Filmgoer's Companion devotes entire entries to important or interesting characters within the film. That includes such notables as Peewee, Betty Boop, the Cisco Kid, Jungle Jim and Godzilla. By far the most fascinating paragraphs are those devoted to specific topics. The work "air plane", for example, is followed by a list of films wherein a plane makes an important contribution (e.g. North by Northwest). "Mirrors" names everything from the magic mirror in Snow White to the two-way mirror in From Russia With Love. "Oantists" says that that role was played by W. C. Fields and Laurel & Hardy. And get this: "title changes" reveals that Help! was originally to be called Eight Arms to Hold You.

If by now you find it hard to read the print on this page because you've drooled all over it, then The Filmgoer's Companion will occupy an honoured place in your library. There can be no better way to treat yourself to something great in time for Christmas or Chanukah.

Happy Holidays!

MUSIC

There is precious little live music to be had during the holidays. Tonight (Wed) at the Faculty of Music Concert Hall, a special (FREE!) Beethoven Birthday Celebration Concert, with the String Quartet Op. 59, No. 2 performed by a Faculty ensemble, and the "Diabelli" Variations, Op. 120, performed by pianist Anton Kuerti. Starting time 8:30.

Also tonight (dammit) a CBC special on Beethoven, on CBL TV, Channel 6 from 9:11 p.m. The presentation consists of a background film on Beethoven's later years, narrated by Beethoven scholar H. Robbins Landon, followed by Beethoven's 9th Symphony performed by the Berlin Philharmonic under von Karajan. Soloists are Gundula Janowitz, Christa Ludwig, Jess Thomas and Walter Berry.

The Messiah continues at Massey Hall, tonight and Friday night at 8:30 p.m. Tickets at the box office.

Check your TV listings for two holiday specials. CFTD's "Gift of Music" with the Toronto Symphony under Boris Brott, and masses of cherubic choirs, rosy cheeks and white surpluses. Seriously, it includes the last movement of Beethoven's Ninth, some Handel and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Richard Strauss.

CBC presents a TV adaptation of Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" on CBL TV. While touted as a children's opera, Humperdinck's work is interesting for all, since he was a disciple of Wagner, and incorporated many of Wagner's operatic principles. The leading role (The Witch) is sung by Maureen Forrester, reason enough for tuning in. Merry Xmas.

T.J.

For those interested, there will be a Winter Solstice celebration at Bathurst United Church, Lennox and Bathurst, December 21 at 8:00 p.m. THOG and the Perth County Conspiracy will be there.

Thanks to one and all, Merry etc's.

Small scale production wise and amusing

By PAUL STEINBERG

The presentation of Ludrig Holberg's Erasmus Montanus is another manifestation of the ascent of the small scale production over the blockbuster that so characterized the Sixties. Many of us, I think, are weary of being bludgeoned insensibly by colossal (if sometimes worthy) theatrics; even Hair which could be a highly intimate experience, at the same time ravaged one's mind with love, peace, etc. Erasmus Montanus is just wise, coy and amusing. Let the prospective play-goer be warned: all he may expect is to enjoy the play.

The actors seemed to be chosen because they looked and spoke like the medieval Danes they were supposed to represent (disregarding the unlikelihood of any of us knowing what to expect from a medieval Dane,) which attests to their intelligence/ taste/ talent/ what-have-you

As the country bumpkins served as a collective foil for the lead, a haughty student, they properly did not abuse whatever opportunity the script gave them to attract the audience's attention; thus they accomplished the difficult achievement of remaining a synthesized unit without sacrificing the sometimes priceless foibles of each character in the play, which they happily managed to convey. This enabled John Pepper, in the title role, to do a superlative job. The part required more taste than inspiration, and he more than filled the bill.

Unhappily, the play was performed before a sparsely filled theatre. The players deserved the applause of a full house.

Erasmus Montanus will be played nightly up to and including Saturday, and is well worth seeing. While one won't leave it with his rib cage cracked, or his tear ducts drained dry, he may well leave with the hint of a smile on his face.

Schubert records give good start

By TONY JAHN

Franz Schubert; Portrait of the Composer (Angel, SCB - 3770). This three-record set is part of Angel's "Portrait of the Composer" series, and contains six selections, all previously released as singles or other sets. In a representative selection of Schubert's oeuvre, we have the "Unfinished" Symphony with the Yehudi Menuhin Festival Orchestra, the "Wanderer" Fantasy in C major with Sviatoslav Richter, the "Trout" Quintet, the "Shepherd on the Rock, Leider with Fischer-Dieskau and incidental music for "Rosamunde". The preponderance of nicknames will suggest that these are all well-known favourites by Schubert and the performances are excellent.

Richter's interpretation of the Fantasy is also...slightly awe-inspiring in its absolute stark perfection. The quintet has received warmer treatment, notably on Vanguard with Dennis Matthews, but the Melos ensemble here is certainly amiable. It is generally a beautifully set and a good starting point for the Schubert novice. Something slightly off the beaten track, like the B flat Trio (Op. 99) would have been perhaps more of an introduction to Schubert, since all music here represents end-points rather than beginnings. Record quality and sound are, of course, first rate.

Ruggiero Ricci: Violin Plus One (Decca DL 710177). This record is handicapped in three ways. It has an idiotic title, the typical unimaginative cover that one expects from Decca's classical series, and the much maligned name of Ruggiero Ricci. Transferring the disc from jacket to turntable, I find that Ricci is an excellent violinist who, chameleon-like, adapts his playing to each of the five composers (Vivaldi to Prokofieff) who are represented by some off-beat works. Chances are the average music lover has not heard these works because they are difficult to fit into standard concert format. The Villa-Lobos Suite for Voice and Violin is one of the best things on the record, a piece which employs the voice in song, in "Sprechstimme" and as an absolute instrument. Prokofieff's Sonata for Two Violins is an intriguing essay for the instrument, a refined but deep treatise which ranks in importance with his better known works for the instrument. Every collector, no matter how extensive his collection, will find something on this disc that he has not heard (or heard of) and should hear. Don't let the cover throw you.

The National Arts Centre Orchestra (RCA: LSC-3172). Their recording debut. The newest orchestra in Canada is youngest also in the age of its members, and youth shows in the enthusiasm of this recording. They perform

Mozart's Symphony No. 41 ("Jupiter") and Mozart's Ombre Felice, an aria for contralto and orchestra. The Mozart aria as well as Harry Somers' "Five Songs for Dark Voice" enlist the rich chocolate contralto of Maureen Forrester. The symphony is played as if for the first time, probing the voices, the texture and colours, the Mozart aria is elegant and the Somers work is exhaustive and intricate. That a new symphonic orchestra should spring up, contrary to all laws of economy, is a joy in itself. That it should have such great potential is cause for celebration

There's No Forgetting (Sonata)

Ask me where have I been and I'll tell you: "Things keep on happening."
I must talk of the rubble that darkens the stones;
of the river's duration, destroying itself;
I know only the things that the birds have abandoned, or the ocean behind me, or my sorrowing sister.
Why the distinctions of place? Why should day follow day? Why must the blackness of nighttime collect in our mouths? Why the dead?

If you question me: where have you come from,
I must talk with things falling away, artifacts tart to the taste, great, cankering beasts, as often as not,
and my own inconsolable heart.

Those who cross over with us, are no keepsakes, nor the yellowing pigeon that sleeps in forgetfulness:
only the face with its tears,
the hands at our throats, whatever the leafage dissevers:
the dark of an obsolete day,
a day that has tasted the grief in our blood.

Here are violets, swallows, all things that delight us, the delicate tallies that show in the lengthening train through which pleasure and transiency pass.

Here let us halt, in the teeth of a barrier, useless to know on the husks that the silence assembles.
For I come without answers:
see: the dying are legion, legion, the breakwaters breached by the red of the sun,
the headpieces knocking the ship's side,
the hands closing over their kisses, and legion the things I would give to oblivion.

Campuses open to police: Trudeau

By MARIS PAVELSON

In a recent interview, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau made it clear that the government no longer regards university campuses as off-limits for police agents.

"It's apparent that if the revolutions and the revolts are going to begin on campuses, if the instigators for violent dissent are going to find their natural milieu there, there can be no more exception for the intellectual community in the name of academic freedom than there can for you and me in the name of other freedoms," he said.

Trudeau spoke on the CBX television programme "Sixty Minutes."

When asked to comment on Trudeau's statement last night, U of T President Claude Bissell said that he would not be opposed to the presence of under-cover police agents on campus. "The university can't be any different from any other part of society," Bissell said.

Bissell stated that he would be against any screening of faculty and students on political grounds but maintained that university members who engage in violent or criminal activity should not be immune from prosecution.

SAC seizes The Varsity

By AL PLATT

Twenty thousand copies of Monday's Varsity were seized by SAC administrators in the early grey hours of Monday morning.

The papers, which were being readied for delivery by The Varsity's printer in Don Mills were being loaded into an unmarked truck when a black Cadillac roared into the quiet parking lot.

According to Varsity publicity manager Eric Rump, who just happened to be passing at the time, four masked men jumped out of the car, and before a word could be uttered, flipped the Varsity's into their trunk and sped off.

Rump however recognized the footprints left at the scene as those of a size 9½ EE Greh Mohican.

Greh Mohicans are normally sold only in full sizes, and in widths up to D. A quick check of Toronto's department stores found that only one pair of 9½ EE's had ever been made.

The shoes were custom made last September for a major official in the Student Administrators' Council.

SAC officials have maintained a low profile on the subject, although as yet no one has been able to explain the smell of decaying newsprint emanating from president Ron Lurd's office.

Unemployed want benefits

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

The Committee on Unemployment is presenting a brief to City Hall today in an attempt to achieve free public transit for the jobless, unemployment benefits of $100 a week, and a 35 hour-$3 per hour minimum wage.

In an 8:00 a.m. demonstration in Nathan Phillips Square, a delegation from the Committee is submitting to City Council a 13 point program through which it feels "unemployment can be wiped out".

According to the Committee, present government aid fails to provide adequate assistance to the unemployed, and does little to kill the problem at its roots. Welfare roles in September 1970 have grown 50% from the previous year.

The Unemployment Committee maintains that "$53 per week (the full Unemployment Insurance benefit) is totally inadequate to cover the cost of living" which has spiralled in the last year. Furthermore, with benefits constantly running out and jobs becoming unavailable, welfare rolls will continue to increase.

The Committee suggests that:
— all payment of debts, including taxes, be frozen during the entire period of unemployment — surplus foods, such as butter and eggs be distributed free of charge to the unemployed
— all private employment agencies be outlawed and the Government Manpower Service be the only agency of that type, in order to protect people from double exploitation.

The Committee on Unemployment has been set up by the Militant Co-op, an organization of concerned working men and women. At today's assembly it is signing up members for a Union of Unemployed as a means of giving the jobless bargaining power.

Our mistake

Arts and science dean A. D. Allen was misquoted on the front page of last Wednesday's Varsity, when he was reported as saying "Elections are intrinsically unreliable and vicious activities."

Dean Allen writes:

"In fact I was arguing in exactly the opposite sense, that although it is well recognised that elections are imperfect activities, they are the best method we have of choosing representatives and that in practice they work remarkably well."

Trudeau to do away with student political activity

I think The Varsity missed a piece of news last week that is of special importance to students.

As reported in the Globe and Mail Dec. 9, Prime Minister Trudeau said in a TV interview in the U.S. that though the decision in the early 60's to have police surveillance of university campuses was a good decision at the time. "It's apparent that if the revolution and the revolts are going to begin on campuses... if the instigators of violent dissent are going to find their natural milieu there... there can be no more exceptions for the intellectual part of the community in the name of academic freedom than there can be for you and me in the name of any other freedoms."

What Trudeau is threatening to end is not the mythical "academic freedom" — the ivory tower never has existed and should not exist; the university should not be a privileged sphere pursuing its own aims independently of the rest of society, in particular the taxpaying working people.

What Trudeau is planning to do away with is the right of students to political activity.

"I would think that as the anti-democratic forces develop in any given society that this society will pass from the stage where it uses exceptional measures to a stage where there is a more permanent checking on people."

We have seen recently an example of who Trudeau means by the anti "anti-democratic" forces — not the FLQ, but all those working for the national and economic rights of the Quebec people, who have been and still are victims of police terror

Business Briefs

Saskatchewan is running out of crude oil reserves at a very rapid pace.

Canada is now being pressured to sell more and more of its natural gas and crude oil supply to the energy-bankrupt United States, and only 10 more years of production remain, according to J. G. Wotherspoon, Saskatchewan's natural resource deputy minister.

The following from the Ottawa Citizen, Nov. 30: "When the Arab guerillas blew up the trans-Arabian pipeline last May 3, it helped Canada win free access of its oil to U.S. markets this week.

That case had been presented by Prime Minister Trudeau to President Nixon in March, 1969, when he said, as he told the Press Club in Washington, that "our oil is not only cheaper, but it is more secure in terms of defence in any future conflict. It is continental oil.

Now the American-owned subsidiaries in the CANADIAN oil business have a free hand in selling oil supplies to the mother company in the U.S. The reserves are being depleted quickly in Canada, but that no longer appears to be the case in the Arab countries.

Profit of the Bank of Nova Scotia rose by 12.2 per cent to $19.9 million in the year ended Oct. 31.

Claims for unemployment insurance rose 34 per cent in September, 1970, compared with figures from September, 1969.

The 391,000 persons (60 per cent male) claiming benefit at the end of September were 18,000 (4 per cent) fewer than in August this year, but 131,000 (51 per cent) more than in September, 1969. But the banks are making lots of profits so don't worry, everything will be all right.

The Toronto-Dominion Bank profit for the year ended Oct. 31, was up 9.5 per cent to $18.9 million over the previous year.

Bank of Montreal reports profit of $35.9 million for the year ended

Oct. 31, a 4.8 per cent increase over the previous year.

Imperial Oil Ltd of Toronto, owned by Standard Oil of Ohio, has increased prices of gasoline, diesel and heating fuel in western Canada by one cent a gallon in the four western provinces and the Yukon and 1.7 cents a gallon in the Mackenzie district of the Northwest Territories.

Imperial said the increases are still insufficient to offset continuing cost pressures in the manufacturing, sale and distribution end of the business.

"The company not only faces high labour and materials expenditures, but also the need to maintain and expand capital investments for plants and other facilities."

"Refrigerators are important. But I don't intend wearing one on my finger for the rest of my life. It's different about The Diamond. It's for a long time. Like forever and ever.

We went to Birks because we knew that's where we'd get the most diamond his hard-earned money could buy. Not something tiny for a fortune. And not something big and bright worth very little.

The one we found turned out to be less expensive than we expected. But because it was Birks, we knew we were getting exactly the quality we were paying for. (Birks now has diamonds of different qualities at prices to match each quality.)

GM strikers' fund will run out this week

For the past ten weeks G M workers in Canada have been involved in strike action against the company. Even the settlement a few weeks ago in the U.S. (though it should be noted that approximately 100,000 workers in the U.S. have not gone back to work) has not ended the strike here.

However, most Canadians have been puzzled by the Canadian GM workers actions. They regard the major union demand of parity with U.S. workers as economically nonsensical. Furthermore, they believe that the workers are highly paid. As one student said to me "they make $10,000 a year and you want me to contribute money to them?"

GM workers in Canada earned an average of $6,500.00 last year. And this is gross earnings; their net take home pay was much less. So much for the overpowering prosperity of the workers. But you might say when they retire their pension plan will leave them relatively comfortable. But in the US contract (and this will occur in the Canadian as well) the pension has become "58 and out" not 30 years of service and out (if one can last 30 years in any auto plant by the time 58 rolls around).

Secondly, the major issues that the workers are concerned with do not deal with "parity". Newspapers and union leaders have done an excellent job in mystifying and frankly eliminating from public eye the issues with which workers are truly concerned.

The workers want improved working conditions. For example they want an end to compulsory overtime and speed-up on the assembly line. Furthermore they need to have a dental plan implemented which is company paid. However this last plan has been dropped in the negotiations between the union and management. Other important working conditions are not even being considered.

In the U.S. union leaders claim that there is a 49c-51c hourly increase in the first year of the new contract. But 26c of that is to make up for some of the robbery in the last contract's cost-of-living clause, money that GM workers should have been getting over the past three years. And another 5c is to cover the period from Sept. 14 to now. That leaves 18c to 20c in the first year. BUT there will be no cost-of-living adjustment until Dec. 5, 1971, a full year away. So the remaining 18c to 20c will not even cover the expected rise in the cost of living over the next 12 months!

If this 49c to 51c doesn't even cover the jump in the cost of living from 1967 to 1971, there's obviously no money allotted for any real wage increase. In fact, before workers even get their paycheck, they will be far behind.

And Canadian workers will get still less because the 26c cost-of-living "adjustment" becomes 11c in Canada when "translated" into Canadian figures. The issue of "parity" is therefore not as important as union leaders make it out to be. In reality, the workers in Canada will not get any wage increase.

The GM workers then are involved in an important strike against GM management. But their strike fund has been running low and will in fact run out this week.

The "Food for GM strikers Committee" formed on campus has been collecting food and money on campus everyday from 12-2 p.m. starting from Sid Smith foyer. So far, $140.00 and 4 boxes have been collected. Within the next week these collections will be continuing. More important students from the committee will be distributing the food and money to the GM workers in Oshawa. If you would like to help collect money or distribute the food in Oshawa please come to the table in Sid Smith 12-2 p.m.

Erindale takes Dafoe Cup with 11-7 victory

Thanks to its cinderella lacrosse team, Erindale College now has the first interfaculty sports title in the school's history

Monday night at Hart House gym, the hustling Erindale Warriors capped an amazing comeback as they downed PhysEd 11-7 to take the Dr. W. A. Dafoe Trophy, emblematic of Varsity lacrosse supremacy.

The talented PhysEd team, defending champions, took the first game of the best-of-three-game series last Tuesday afternoon by a 12-8 score in decisive fashion; they appeared set to wrap up the final in straight games.

HOWEVER, the underdog Erindale team, who finished the regular season in third place, came back and forced Monday's third and deciding game with a thrilling 8-6 victory Thursday night.

"Just tell everyone that this is just the start of successful teams from Erindale," said an excited Ron Grogan whose fine goaltending was a vital factor in the final game. "I hear our women's hockey team is not doing too badly," he added.

"Listen," said an elated Dave Mickie, "somebody should thank all those beautiful Erindale fans who came out and gave us all that support in the three games. They were just great."

About 150 students and friends braved blizzard conditions to take in the Monday evening game.

Erindale coach Jim McElroy, who did a fine job in preparing his team for the playoffs, said:

"Checking made the difference, after we got the lead we just stayed with them and played a ball-control game. I thought Grogan played a great game for us tonight."

"Cole (Blues' hockey star Grant Cole) also played a very fine game," he added. "He's not our best lacrosse player but he is the team's inspirational leader."

Cole, Brian "Gunner" Robinson and Doug McKeown each scored three times to lead the way for the winners. Mickie and Wayne Sorichetti added singles.

PLAYING COACH Don Crocker was the top man for PhysEd with three goals. Robert John Feaver added two more while Bob Connely and Al Christie contributed one each.

"They just simply played a better game than we did," credited Crocker. PhysEd opened play as if they were going to win handily. The game was only 23 seconds old when Christie took the ball and steamed, almost unhindered, down the right side of the floor to score the game's first goal.

But McKcown evened the score at the 4:10 mark of the first quarter when he jumped off the penalty bench to take a breakaway pass.

Then, just 55 seconds later, Cole gave his team the lead when he replaced netminder Grogan on a delayed penalty call and pumped a low bounce shot past PhysEd goaltender Paul Rocks.

The Warriors went on to stretch their lead to 5-1 at one point then settled down to a 6-3 halftime margin. From that point on, they checked well, made the most of their opportunities, and never allowed PhysEd to come closer than two goals.

Hot in post-season play

Varsity soccer season in review

By UNCLE CHARLIE

Like good wine, the 1970 Soccer Blues improved with age.

Beginning the season with only four veteran players, the pre-season schedule (longest in the team's 45-year history) assumed added importance in moulding a championship contender for 1970. That this difficult task was eventually achieved may be gauged from Blues nine-game unbeaten streak in recent post-season exhibition play.

However, the early season form was sufficiently unco-ordinated to eliminate the young squad from the number-one spot in the OQAA Western Division.

Bob Nicol, returning Blues' mentor, looking back on the past season's progress commented:

"It was encouraging to be involved with the best conditioned and individually skilled team in the league."

Maybe this will seem an overstatement, but Blues did jump from rags to riches in short order and eventually proved to be the only team not to suffer a loss at the "feet" of the champions from McMaster.

The first league match against Guelph saw eleven individuals scramble and scratch their way to a 4-4 draw against a team nowhere near their equal in talent. Defensively, the squad had an alarming tendency to concede goals at the slightest provocation. The offence — despite the late comeback — found itself unable to press home its overwhelming advantage. Succeeding matches served to illustrate Blues' major weaknesses — inconsistent defensive work and an unproductive offense.

The season's turning point, however, came at Hamilton where the Mac Marauders were grateful to obtain a late equalizing tally after Blues had put it all together for the first time.

A new Varsity team emerged as definite and determined contenders for the OQAA crown, and confirmed coach Nicol's confidence in his players.

This, is not to say, that the team became giants in the league, but rather that Blues eventually realized their worth and their limitations and played with more conviction.

Despite the disappointment at not finishing first, Blues spirit was such that the cancellation of the "nothing game" against Guelph was not viewed with equanimity and a series of post-season games was arranged in which Blues remained unbowed.

Notes: Here is a list of the players Blues relied upon most for the past season. GOAL, Tony Bowker; DEFENSE, Bruno Bruni, Ed Carter, John Cobby and Ken Franco; MID-FIELD, Ken Cancellara, Mike Moores and Vito Polera. OFFENCE, Mario DaRosa, Dave Evans, Tony Lavelle, Ersin Ozerding and Miles Sosa. The 10 rookies introduced to the 14-member squad all performed well. The team's top scorer was Ozerding who collected seven goals.

Next year should offer much promise if the experience gained this season has been effectively assimilated. With the added incentive of the new, CIAU national inter collegiate championship available to the league winners, Blues should be a force throughout the next season and not just at the end as in this year's campaign.

Blues whip McMaster; face stiff action over holidays

By LYNDON LITTLE

Tom Watt's hockey Blues completed an undefeated pre-Christmas league schedule last Friday evening in Hamilton as they harpooned the slippery McMaster Marlin's by a 6-0 count.

The real competition, however, awaits them as the team faces one of its busiest — and toughest — Christmas schedules in recent memory.

Blues depart tomorrow afternoon by airmail for St. Louis where they will play exhibition contests Friday and Sunday with the St. Louis University Billikens in the hockey mad Missouri capital.

St. Louis U. has decided to get into college hockey in a big way and have gone to a full scholarship program. They have attracted 13 Canadians, mostly from the Western Canada Junior "A" leagues, and should provide Blues with stiff opposition.

THE TEAM THEN RETURNS home and will participate in the national college tournament organized by Hockey Canada which begins on Boxing Day and concludes until the following Tuesday.

If Blues make it to the final, it would mean four games in four days!

The tourney has been organized into East and West sections of four top teams each. Loyola, St. Mary's University of Halifax, Sherbrooke U. and Laval will compete in the Eastern section in Montreal.

Blues, Laurentian, York and U. of Calgary Dinosaurs will be the teams in the Western group to take place here in Toronto. Each section plays a round-robin series with the top team in each section meeting at Maple Leaf Gardens in the final.

The first two dates are at Varsity Arena and the last two at the Gardens. Student tickets will be available at the gate for all games at a $1.00 a night.

BLUES HAVE MET AND defeated both York and Laurentian in earlier games this year but it will be the first time that Varsity and Calgary have met on the ice lanes. The Dinosaurs finished first in the WCAA last year but then lost out to U. of Alberta Bears in the playoffs.

There is a strong possibility that Blues fans could be treated to a replay of the thrilling national final last year when Varsity edged St. Mary's 3-2.

Against the Marlin's Friday night, Blues survived what one observer charitably described as "60 minutes of scramble".

It was a chippy, penalty-filled affair played in the accordion-sized Hamilton Forum.

Blues' goaltender Tom Little provided the only significant story as he registered his first intercollegiate shutout in three years of play as he handled 24 McMaster shots without error.

Little, Blues' mod puckstopper, played 22 games in 1967-68 when he shared the job with John Wrigley and eight games in 68-69 when he alternated with Adrian Watson.

BLUES SCORED TWICE in the opening 20 minutes, once in the middle frame and added three more in the final period.

Sophomore winger Bill Buba connected twice while Dave McDowall, Kaz Lysonek, Brian St. John and Mac Hickox added singles.

Hickox, playing his first game against his old teammates, waited until the last minute of play to register his goal on a hard, 30-footer to the top left-hand corner of the Marlin net.

"I was really apprehensive about this one," confided Watt after the game. "I was afraid of a big letdown after Wednesday's game with Waterloo."

"I thought Brent Swanick played well, as he has all year," he added.

Blue Notes: Lysonek's goal was his first as a member of Blues. There were a total of 23 minor penalties called in the game — 13 to Blues and 10 to Mac — plus a misconduct to Blues. Bill L'Heureux...

Mike Boland, Varsity's bold, brash and colorful winger has left the team and expects to sign a pro contract with the Springfield, Mass. Kings of the American Hockey League. A three-year veteran, "Bookie" attended the camp of the parent Los Angeles Kings this fall and impressed with his play. One of the strongest players in college hockey, Boland was the right-winger on the John-Wright-Bill Buba line. His place has been taken by Lysonek. Captain John Wright continued to be Blues' hard-luck sniper as he rattled one off the goal post after making a nifty move around a McMaster defenseman.

OHC to evict St. Charles leaders

By BRIAN BANNON

Sixty married University of Toronto students living in the Married Students Residences at Yonge and St. Charles received eviction notices on New Years Day. All 60 were active in the rent strike at the two Charles Street residences.

For two months, 125 tenants have withheld their rents demanding rent reductions and building repairs. A further 200 are planning a sympathy strike for the month of February.

Paul Goyette, manager-director of Ontario Housing Corporation, which holds the leases, told the press last week that the notices were, merely 10-day notices of overdue rent. But a copy from one of the evictees read: "I hereby give you notice to deliver up possession of the premises." The eviction date was set for Jan. 31.

Goyette had also stated to the press that those to be evicted were chosen arbitrarily, two or three from each floor. But an investigation revealed that all the active leadership of the strike were singled out for eviction notices.

The project has been criticized by tenants since its inception in September, 1969. Complaints centred around excessive rents (averaging $160 per month), shoddy building practices, and inefficient planning (for example, no provisions were made for the 300 children). The Tenants Association who surveyed 200 apartments in the two buildings found 1,874 violations of the Housing Standards Bylaw; one of the tenants questioned how Ontario Housing can "get away with it".

The OHC has consistently refused to discuss the issues raised by tenants. A brief submitted to Goyette last May was ignored.

Events speeded up after the evictions were received on New Years. Strikers marched to OHC headquarters on Tuesday, Jan. 5, and a general meeting including press was held Wednesday. Regular picketing parties are marching three times a week.

Ted Burnett, one of the evictees, is confident that the evictions are just a bluff to test the strength of the rent strike. He warned that if legal and public pressures failed to deter OHC evictors, that physical obstruction would make evictions impossible.

The strike has received support from Metro Labour Council, three MPPs, two city aldermen, The

Toronto Daily Star, and The Toronto Telegram

A meeting will be held today between the Charles St. Tenants Association and university administrators to attempt to get U of T support for the strike and to disassociate itself from student evictions. In the past, Simcoe Hall has refused to take a stand on the issue.

If the Tenants Association fails to get support from the administrators, a mass demonstration will be held on campus this week.

Fern King, one of the evictees, expects strong support from the campus since "one of the goals of the strike is equal access to education and housing for the poor".

U.S. college papers, radio being censored

NEW YORK (CUP-CPS) — The United States Student Press Association reports that 25 campus papers have been censored and two campus radio stations have been shut down since September.

The repression being faced by college papers has taken the form of editors fired, evictions and lock outs from offices, freezing of funds, suppression of articles about women's oppression, and prohibition of publication.

The USSPA survey of its membership found that 40 per cent of the papers replying report that they have been censored or harassed because they express radical politics.

Ads for abortion referrals and articles about the myth of the vaginal orgasm have been banned by school administrations and state governments at Concordia College in Minnesota, Metropolitan State College in Pueblo, Colorado, the State University of Southern Colorado in Pueblo the managing editor of the Arrow was fired when she refused to change an editorial about student parking.

The administrations of Dillard University and Norfolk State College, both black schools, have had their presses shut down. Dillard's newspaper staff refused to submit copy to an advisor for censorship; Norfolk's paper supported student actions against the invasion of Cambodia this past spring.

When a "God is dead" editorial appeared in the Reflector of Mississippi State University the state government set up censors for all campus papers and yearbooks.

TURN ON

Perhaps I want to have my cake and eat it too. But why not? I have found that with some men, I can have a relationship of love and understanding and honesty and (yes) equality. This does not mean that our relationship is ahistorical; that we can ignore our socialization, my oppression, his chauvinism. It does mean however that we can recognize the necessity for dealing with that, honestly and continuously as human beings — with love, because we've all been fucked over for the same kinds of perverted ends. It means we have the basis for struggle.

85% Canadian quota campaign starts today

A drive to demand a quota of American professors in Canadian universities is being launched today from a table in Sidney Smith Hall.

The 85% Canadian Quota Campaign is calling for a minimum of 85% Canadian citizens in university teaching positions in this country.

The Campaign, supported by the Council of Canadian Unions, the Graduate Students' Union, the Lakehead University Alma Mater Society and the Canadian Liberation Movement will be circulating a petition throughout college residences and cafeterias, from their headquarters in the lobbies of Sydney Smith Hall and the main library.

The campaign is calling on students to use the quota test to find out who are the reactionary Canadian professors.

"One of the best ways to find out who are the Canadian reactionaries is to ask them what position they take on this important anti-imperialist issue," says CQC chairman Larry Haiven. "They usually squeal the loudest when their buddies are threatened."

The number of U.S. professors entering the country has risen in both relative and absolute terms. Between 1963 and 1965, one half the new jobs went to foreign citizens (mainly American). Between 1965 and 1967, this figure rose to 72%. In 1968, it rocketed to 86%.

Haiven gives the reasons for a quota

"It is in the universities that our teachers, artists, lawyers, engineers, doctors, scientists, reporters are trained. But it is also here that they are brainwashed. They are taught to depreciate the country, to worship the empire, that patriotism is passe, that Canadian history is worthless, that even to be Canadian is something worthy of shame. This must stop. The quota is the only method that will break this stranglehold and build Canadian universities."

The Campaign is not calling for the removal of all foreign professors, but to end all the frills used to attract American scholars, such as a two year tax holiday

"Those who are serious and apply for citizenship show a certain commitment and can stay," noted a CQC spokesman

The CQM questions the academic excellence of some of the American professors shipped off to Canadian campuses. In some instances, these people are referred to as "the colonial service"

Although universities have been able to pick up most U.S. scholars those few radicals attempting to come to teach their northern neighbours have run into trouble.

Some, like Gabriel Kolko, who was offered a position at York last summer, have been refused immigrant status. Others have been harassed, fired, blacklisted and deported.

Janitorial service Work corps for unemployed

A Toronto salesman is trying to battle unemployment by forming a work corps of the unemployed.

Shell Pan, a regional sales representative for a large advertising organization is pushing an idea called the Canadian Job Council Program, a workshop designed to allow people "to do their own thing."

Pan talks of helping shoemakers and other handicraft ideas, but his main interest is in forming a contract janitorial service.

Pan hopes to have his workers hired by Toronto City Hall and businesses to do jobs that other firms won't touch.

Although he has not been in touch with city officials to find out whether his services are desired, Pan says his idea will provide a definite advantage to the city. To hire their own janitorial employees, the city would have to pay extra benefits such as severance pay, unemployment insurance and pension contributions.

A contract service of unemployed workers would not have to receive any such benefits, could be taken on for a specific period and let go without notice.

The jobless win says Pan, because they could work for a few days a month, and make up to the $50 limit that the Unemployment Insurance Commission allows before it starts to decrease benefits.

Pan says his motives for organizing the Council are altruistic.

"I'm a business man. I look at supply and demand — there's a supply of unemployed, and a demand for jobs: they need organizing.

The Council has received some moral support, but little material aid as of yet. Pan says he has been given 50 shovels and promised some brooms. He also has an idea for making sandals out of old rubber tires, a method used successfully by Viet Cong guerrillas.

Pan is looking for university professors and students willing to spend time helping with his organization. He can be contacted at 920-9871.

Chancellor Solandt quits polluting ERCO

By ART MOSES

University of Toronto chancellor Dr. Omond Solandt has resigned as vice-chairman of the Electric Reduction Company. In severing his corporate connections with ERCO Dr. Solandt denied conflict of interest charges had anything to do with his decision.

"It was a simple reorganization of the company," Dr. Solandt said yesterday. He explained that ERCO is wholly owned by Albright and Wilson, a middle-sized British Chemical firm which decided "to tidy up their whole operation by having all directors from outside the parent firm resign."

Solandt has faced numerous charges over the past few years that his position as Chairman of the Science Council of Canada was incompatible with his continued association with ERCO. ERCO has been accused of polluting air and water in the Dunnville area in southern Ontario and off the coast of Newfoundland.

Solandt said his resignation from ERCO "comes as no disappointment" because his position there "has caused some embarrassment."

"The Varsity has done its best to discredit the Chancellor," Dr. Solandt said, but he denied that criticism of ERCO had any part in his decision to leave the company.

He said no conflict of interest existed since the Science Council of Canada has no influence on allocating funds. He called the charges "inevitable" if governments hire people with outside business interests.

"You can find lots of such cases if you want to look for them," he said.

ERCO's Port Maitland Ontario plant near Dunnville was the subject of a 1969 judicial inquiry into the effects of fluorine gas from its stacks on local residents. ERCO paid over $200,000 to farmers for poisoning their crops and animals. ERCO testified that the gas while fatal to cows, was not harmful to people.

The same year, fishermen in Placentia Bay off Newfoundland accused ERCO's phosphate plant in Lone Harbor 70 miles away of killing fish. Federal scientists confirmed the charges. Toxic effluent from the plant was killing the fish, they said. The plant was closed for a month but ERCO refused to accept legal responsibility for the dead fish. Eventually the company settled with the fishermen out of court.

U of T Chancellor since 1965, Dr. Solandt graduated from U of T medical school in 1938 with the highest marks ever achieved by a graduate. From 1947 to 1956 he chaired the Defence Research Board. In 1956 he became vice-president in charge of research and development for the CNR and in 1963 he filled a similar position with De Havilland Aircraft. In 1966 Solandt became chairman of the Science Council of Canada.

Their boredom becomes more and more terrible. They realize that they've been tricked and burn with resentment. Every day of their lives they read the newspapers and went to the movies. Both fed them on lynchings, murder, sex crimes, explosions wrecks, love nests, fires, miracles, revolutions, wars . . . They have been cheated and betrayed. They have slaved and saved for nothing.

The locusts sang

*And the locusts sang,

 Oh the locusts sang,

 Oh the locusts sang,
 And they were singing for me*

If you want to sit down at the Calgary airport you have to buy your way into the CARA Chuckwagon restaurant sandwiches are 60 cents each and tomato juice as precious as human blood.

The airport is built that way. Outside of the restaurant there are a scattered dozen casual plastic chairs — no sofas — and you have to be sharp on your sitting down to nab one.

It's a businessmen's airport. Fat men with heavy cufflinks, sleek but graying hair and chubby worn hands clasped behind their backs, confer in low tones while looking out at the DC-8 they are about to board.

Snaatches of their conversation: "We'll get all their proxies . . ." "Shares . . . options . . . dirceors . . . royalty interest . . ." "90 grand"

Then they talk about the best place to sit in a plane.

"In the middle, just above the wings, so that you're well balanced and don't catch any of the sway." A young pin-striped man earnestly explains his thesis to men on both sides of him:

"It's like a teeter-totter, you know," he gestures with his hands, "You go up and down at both ends, but the middle doesn't move."

Next to me, across the aisle, the man from CIL. I knew he was from CIL because a second businessman, making his way to the back of the plane, had stopped to shake hands.

"London, May '69. Remember?"

And then they both identified themselves by company affiliation.

The man from CIL was asleep now. The successful executive, his shoelaces loosened, his feet perched up on his attache case, his hands folded in his lap calmly, and his chunky face, which betrayed signs of often being shaven in the early morning and lotioned into a brisk businesslike health, was sleeping, quietly, almost childlike.

The man from CIL was flying back to the head office in Montreal, after looking into various natural gas concerns in the west.

In the seat ahead, another businessman, this one not asleep, but reading, intently, a finger poised to his jaw, Rollo May, Love and Will.

What I want to know Mr. Businessman is what do you think about Paul Rose, the FLQ, Trudeau, Canada, the men of Lapalme and the 600 Dunlop workers fired last spring and the Whitty Dunlop workers who face a ten per cent wage cut now, and the men at Eaton's who have been taken off salary and put on commission after these ten, 15, 20 years?

South of the border the world is exploding.

The most graphic explosion was at a huge refinery in Linden, New Jersey. Urban guerillas virtually destroyed the local Standard Oil refinery there last month.

Standard Oil, the second largest corporation in the world, owns 51 per cent of Irving Oil, the kingpin of Maritimer K. C. Irving's New Brunswick empire. Irving owns all the English language daily newspapers in the province, as well as assorted bus lines, factories, mills and forests.

North American banks lost more money last year from employees embezzling funds, than they did from bank robberies.

This October almost 400,000 Canadians were unemployed, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports, up two per cent from the previous month. Since October 1969 the ranks of the unemployed have swelled by 119,000 workers.

Federal economists report that although there are now about 400,000 farmers in Canada farm incomes will only support about 150,000 people, at a level of $4,000 each annually. The farm population is dwindling drastically. There are now fewer farmers than Indians in Canada.

"One Canadian in every five is living at or below poverty levels . . . In 1967 the poor numbered 831,500 families and 585,100 unattached individuals. This count did not include people in institutions, people in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, or people on Indian reservations." — Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada

Last summer the federal government spent $28 million on a youth program which set up militia training schemes for unemployed youth and made federal armories available for shelter for transient young people.

While predicting that as many as a quarter of a million students will not find work this summer, a leading Canadian newspaper pointed out that heavy unemployment can be "demoralizing" and that "Canada faces a monumental problem in how to channel the flood of young people now coming of age into the national work force."

The newspaper predicted, however, that this was probably just a "temporary situation of maladjustment."

University students are finding that there are no push jobs waiting for them once they pick up their diploma. A general arts graduate from U of T is lucky to find a niche at an insurance company as a $60-a-week clerk.

The most significant historical event of the last century in Canada has been the disappearance of the independent, self-employed craftsman and entrepreneur.

The modern industrial economy has created a huge class of men who sell their labour for a set price for a set period of time each day. This class of men who work for salaries and wages numbers 6.2 million people in Canada.

There is also a class who own and control the means of production, but do little or no productive work themselves. In Canada, most of them are not Canadians, but Americans.

In the Vertical Mosaic, John Porter identifies an "economic elite" in Canada of about 985 people. They are the men who wield economic and financial power. In doing that they determine the shape of our daily lives.

Fortune, the magazine of the North American business elite, is worried. The editors report an increasing alienation among both blue and white collar workers. Traditionally, the white collar worker has looked on his job as a symbol of status (a job requiring education beyond high school), but that has changed.

Businesses know their world is imploding, and Fortune is warning them to sharpen up, and start providing "fulfilling, satisfying work for the people who spend so much of their lives inside the company walls." The entire fabric of a society based on exploitation must be saved "More than economic needs must be met."

"There is a terrible, striking contrast between the fun-filled, mobile existence of the young opulents of America as shown on television, and the narrow constricting un-fun existence that is the lot of most white-collar workers at the lower job levels.

"You can't buy much of what television is selling on the salaries these young workers earn; about all you do is stay at home watching those good things go by on the screen. The result is frustration, sometimes bitterness, even anger . . ."

Yes, we are at the threshold of a decade of anger on this continent as the ranks of the economically and spiritually dispossessed swell to include all of the working people of the Americas — from those who make up the welfare and unemployment rolls through to those who are training in schools and universities for jobs our economy cannot provide.

Oh the benches were stained with tears and perspiration.

The birdies were flying from tree to tree.

There was little to say, there was no conversation.

If I could turn you on...

BY LIZ WILLICK

Society highly values its normal man. It educates children to lose themselves and to become absurd, and thus to be normal.

Normal men have killed perhaps 100,000,000 of their fellow normal men in the last fifty years.

— r. d. laing

This is not a normal sort of feature. I'm not attempting to write the definitive Canadian paper on Women's Lib. What I want to do is communicate some ideas and perceptions of the world, as a person who's thought some about what it all means — being human. And I find that when I try to intellectually abstract from my experience, I become academic and lifeless. So I'll just rap at you for a while.

I AM a woman and I am 23 and I took two years off from life to become a nurse. So I was rather a late bloomer for the radical student movement. When I say I am oppressed, I don't mean there's a whip over my head and I am fed on bread and water. I don't mean I am unique in my oppression, and I'm not asking for sympathy.

Each and every person in this country is oppressed — from the stars like Schmuck Pierre to the smallest cogs in the big machine.

We are all oppressed because we have little or no power over the course of our lives.

We are oppressed when the place and conditions of our birth most likely determine our place and role in society.

We are oppressed when we don't want to keep up with the Jones, but try anyway; when we can't find a job, when we have to go hungry, when we hate our work; when we live with someone we don't like very much because he or she is called husband or wife.

We are oppressed when our car falls apart after five years. We are oppressed when we can't afford a home while others have three. We are oppressed when we are hungry and millions of bushels of wheat rot in the Prairies. We are oppressed when we breathe air that will kill us before our time. We are oppressed when, to be socially acceptable, we must buy and wear the right clothes, buy and use the right cosmetics, buy and eat the right food, buy and think the right education, know and like the right people. We are oppressed when we dislike ourselves and distrust others, when we cannot love.

We are all oppressed

But some people in Canada are more oppressed than others because they are poor or uneducated, or because, like the Québécois or the blacks or the Indians, their racial origins or skins are different, or because, like the Jews or the Mennonites or the Catholics or the Protestants, their religion is different — or because they are women. —>

Together we could be so strong

WOMAN'S oppression does not only affect women, and it cannot be eradicated by them alone. Women's oppression also oppresses men, even though they are its immediate agent. Women are oppressed when their self-definition of themselves, as well as their world's definition of them, is dictated by men — when their status is judged by that of their fathers, their boyfriends, their husbands, their sons.

Women are oppressed when they must conform to a definition not of their own choosing — a self-definition built into them by closer physical contact in infancy, by their first doll, by their first frilly dress and ringletted hairdo, and by their instructions in being ladylike — how to sit and walk and talk and be quiet and polite and restrained and good.

Later on, that self-definition gets tangled up with Maidenform bras, and vaginal deodorants, and Revlon cosmetics and breasts and legs and eyes and hair and clothes and men, men, men. And with women who cry when the cake falls, and women who are international spies, and women who are jealous of someone else's laundry, and women who glide around gracefully in thousand-dollar gowns and marry three millionaires.

Their bodies become ornaments for the pleasure of masculine eyes and bodies. Their minds, having become moderately irrelevant, split off — stamped 'Danger, Do Not Enter.'

And what does that mean for a man? He may be able to boast to his friends that "his woman" is "all woman" — but at what price?

When it means the sacrifice of the honest reality of that human being — her mind, her individuality, her human potential — is it really such a bargain?

UNTIL a year and a half ago, I had never really had a close warm relationship with a woman. I don't think that I was particularly unique. Sure, I had friends, but when I needed a mind to stimulate me, when I wanted to really talk, when I needed a shoulder to cry on; I always turned to men.

I wrote off the personal human worth of more than half of the population — other women were competition, but they were also mainly unthinking and uninteresting.

In high school, a girl is miserable unless she is popular. And popularity for a woman is judged by the men she attracts — quantitatively and qualitatively.

So having the required physical assets, I very quickly became a success. I was confident I could get almost any man I wanted. I learned to be what they wanted me to be. I could conform to the appropriate role quickly and well. But the power that ability gave was hollow.

Like most women, I felt (consciously or not) that my function in life was to make some man (or men) happy. To do that I had to be all the stereotypes of femininity — which require in response, all the stereotypes of masculinity. And if that response was not forthcoming, my identity as a woman was threatened.

The only trouble with the whole setup, of course, is that it's all a game. Chameleon-like you adapt your role to get what you want — which means in the case of men, playing up to their chauvinism, which is part of your definition of what men are all about — and accepting their increased chauvinism toward you in particular as a tribute. Which, of course, it is — but only to the you that is not real, that is the role you have assumed, that is a part of the game.

So, naturally, it is a hollow victory, only usually you never know that. You have no alternatives. You may not be happy, your marriage may be the shits, you may be afraid you're beginning to hate your children, but you never know why. You keep trying to be more adept with the roles, better at playing the game — the loyal, devoted loving wife and mother; or the swinging amoral playgirl — it doesn't matter which. You still lose as long as you play by rules you didn't make, don't understand, and maybe don't even know exist.

MANY of us have abandoned our careers, dropped out of university, thrown away our bras and makeup and expensive clothes, lived common law, smoked dope and been unemployed. Some of us have learned to write and to speak, to take positions and make decisions — to claim our right to independent, meaningful human existence.

It is never easy, this breaking out of the old structures and roles, but is necessary if women's liberation, men's liberation, human liberation, is to become a reality.

In some ways, it is easier for university women. They seldom have to worry about physical survival. They may be more liberal in their attitudes towards sex, speech, dress. They are more likely to use dope.

But, still the final goal for many of them is a "good" husband. And oddly enough, when marriage comes along, most of them expect that their promiscuous past will be just that — past. Endit. Most of them, and a goodly number of men too, assume that signing on the dotted line and saying the eternal word in front of a little man in black will wipe out that part of their biological makeup which forms a sexual attraction for any but the legal chosen partner.

Because a wife is loyal and faithful (not necessarily to a fellow human being she honestly values greatly, but to her husband). And if she isn't, then no one is supposed to know, or let on that they know. How absurd.

So the man you marry is often the one you can be least honest with. To him you are a doll and a monument, a plaything and an idol. And you must live in that precarious balance — maintaining his illusions — being the counter foil for his masculinity, tension-managing his frustrations, bringing him physical comfort and release, subordinating yourself to his needs and wishes and plans. Your way of life, the food you eat, your very identity depends on it.

Fuck it!

As long as we deny any part of what is real in us, as long as we try to be what we are told we should be without knowing why, we lose; and so do our men.

THE very essence of a loving human relationship is honesty, trust and understanding. All these words have been grossly violated and misused. The word love in this class society of consumerism, competition, social games and artificiality has been desecrated almost to the point of no return.

To be honest, one must trust. To trust, one must know. To know, one must be unafraid.

We must learn not to be afraid to stop playing the games. We must learn not to be afraid to identify and understand them. We who are women must learn that our position of relative powerlessness is not an individual failure.

We must learn how and why our socialization is determined by the same society that fosters racism and poverty, the War Measures Act and political prisoners, the wheat surplus and the Amerikan economic control. Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the FLQ.

And then, recognizing and accepting our history we must begin to rebuild our self-definition, our lives and our world.

We must learn to accept our sexuality as an integral and beautiful part of our particular humanity. We must stop distrusting and despising our bodies, stop binding them, and painting them and squeezing them into shapes they aren't. We must take back our lost sensuality.

And all of us, men and women alike, need to confront the thorny question of what is called homosexuality.

If I have a warm, loving, human relationship with another person, is not the sensual and sexual expression of that love a theoretically logical step — even if that person is another woman?

Unlike some of the feminists, I do not believe that what needs to be accepted by women seeking liberation, is the end of sexual relations with men. Rather, it is the possibility of sexual relations with our sisters.

For me as a woman who has been able to relate well to some men on at least some levels, the rejection of men as sexual partners has never been a real consideration. Rather, the understanding of the possibilities for the sisterhood of women; for relating closely, warmly, lovingly to a whole half of the population with whom before I could only be competitive or superficial, is simply mindblowing.

Perversion is not when two people of the same sex sleep together or when two people deviate from the traditional kinds of male-dominant, 'lovmaking' positions.

Perversion is the process whereby our minds and hearts are cut off from our bodies; whereby we are made incapable of love; or whereby the sensual expression of love, the sexual extension of warmth and love and sensuality is denied by our very selves because our understanding of ourselves is external and fragmented by our history and our society; whereby false dichotomies exist between sensuality and sexuality, homosexuality and heterosexuality, whereby our humanity is overthrown by rigid role definitions, and the concept of sex as an end in itself instead of the normal expression of love

WE as women must learn to relate to men as human beings. We must stop seeing them as property or status objects or as the means for extending our limited conception of self. More important, we must learn to relate to our sisters as human beings, not 'the competition', not part of the gossip grapevine. We must reach out to them in warmth and love, for they share our oppression. The image they often project is only the societal stereotype they have been molded into. They did not choose it, although they may believe in it so much that they feel happy in it.

We must demand alternatives. If necessary, we must create them.

I AM not a liberated woman. I shall never be free of my past. And none of us can ever be liberated while we live in a society of inequality and inhumanity. Like socialism, no island of peace and love will ever exist in North America. It will be foreclosed by the bank, torn down by urban renewal, or routed out by mineral excavation, exploration rights or irate and threatened neighbours.

If we, the young men and women of the Seventies, want our liberation — the freedom to control our destinies, to be equal, to love — we must fight for it. No one will give it to us.

Those few who have money in this hierarchical world of ours, are also those who have power. And it is in their best interests of retaining and increasing that money (and power) to maintain the status quo.

Our strength — our power — is in our numbers. We must be prepared to struggle in our daily lives to fashion the beginnings of a viable alternative by rejecting the stereotypes, the roles, the values that are imposed upon us.

And as our knowledge and understanding grows, we must be prepared to help others to know and understand their oppression and also their capacity to end it.

Our common practice must be our struggle to survive, to share warmth and love and laughter, to create as best we can the conditions for the revolution that will be the beginning of the end of the conditions and processes that fucked us all so badly.

Together we can be strong

If I could turn you on, if I could drive you out of your wretched mind, I would let you know . . .
I have seen the Bird of Paradise, she has spread herself before me, and I shall never be the same again.

There is nothing to be afraid of. Nothing.

Exactly.
The Life I am trying to grasp is the me that is trying to grasp it.

URGENT - Special Male Blood Donors Required for Plasmapheresis at Red Cross Depot 460 Jarvis St. (at Wellesley)

"PLASMAPHERESIS" is a term which we now hear quite frequently, and a procedure which is becoming quite common in the Canadian Red Cross Blood Transfusion Service.

The word is of Greek origin; plasma — apahairesis (a withdrawal) and as presently defined refers to a donation of blood; centrifugation to separate the plasma from the cells; extraction of the plasma; and return of the cells to the donor. This procedure was first used on dogs as early as 1914. In 1944 it was used to obtain additional plasma required by the Armed Forces. It was not until the advent of plastic equipment, with its closed sterile system and the refrigerated centrifuge, that it attained general use.

As a form of plasma donation, single or double plasmapheresis is possible. Double donations are obtained by the use of a four plastic pack unit. The blood is drawn into one of the two main packs, separated in a refrigerated centrifuge, the plasma expressed into one of the two satellite packs, and the cells returned to the donor.

The same procedure is then repeated using the two remaining packs, the needle not being removed from the donor's arm at any time. This is a completely harmless procedure, but there is the inconvenience of the time factor. Double plasmapheresis requires 1½ - 2 hrs. However, with the use of our new donor chairs, many of the participants find it a very good time to catch up on their reading.

The relative rapidity with which blood plasma is reconstituted (30-40 hrs), in contrast to that of the red cells (3-4 wks), makes possible the withdrawal of 1,000 cc (one litre or approximately 2 pints) of plasma a week without any adverse effects. One participant in a trial project at the National Office of the Blood Transfusion Service contributed over a period of seven months, and another project reported regular double donations twice weekly for as long as 32 months.

Plasmapheresis which makes possible the procurement of 50 litres of plasma over a one year period, as opposed to one litre a year from the conventional donors, has opened up a complete new field. It permits the provision of large quantities of hyperimmune plasma to replace antisera presently obtained from horses, cattle and other non-human sources, which frequently cause severe allergic reactions, even death.

Products made from human plasma not only are exempt from allergic reactions, but as well are more effective than those produced from non-human sources. These will eventually be used for the prevention and treatment of Tetanus, Rabies, severe reactions to Small Pox vaccination, Mumps, etc.

Projects being undertaken by Blood Transfusion Service Depots apply only to donations from persons who have naturally acquired antibodies, or those who are especially stimulated for this purpose. The small number of such participants will in no way affect our normal Blood Donor Programme.

The University of Toronto Staff and Students are obvious choices for donors in this program because of their proximity to the Blood Depot. Any person interested in participating in this project is urged to contact Mrs. MacDonald at the Red Cross Depot, 460 Jarvis St. 923-6692 923-9840

Scarborough College will remain in U of T

By MARIS PAVELSON
The Presidential Advisory Committee on the Status and Future of Scarborough College has decided to recommend that Scarborough remain within the University of Toronto "for the foreseeable future." The decision was the result of a motion which passed 15-2, with nine abstentions.

Of the 16 Scarborough members voting on the motion, six voted for, two against and eight abstained. The decision to remain with U of T has thus been brought about mainly by St. George Campus members of the committee.
N. H. Dobbs, secretary of the committee, attributes the surprisingly large number of abstentions on so basic a question to the "ambiguous wording" of the motion. "For the foreseeable future" could mean anything, says Dobbs. Those who abstained did not do so as a bloc. The spectrum of opinion within this group ranges from integrationist to loosely federalist. The motion was supposed to be a clarification of a previous motion which passed at the committee's last meeting in December. It read: "By 1975, the status of the campus should be changed to that of either an independent institution or a fully autonomous university within a confederal University of Toronto."

That motion was called "a lot of gulf" by Scarborough's R. S. Blair, one of the people who abstained on the January motion because he thought that it was clearer than the first one. Blair wants very close, clear ties with the university. "We've got to make up our minds on what the future is going to be... in or out."
In contrast, another Scarborough man, J. R. Warden, abstained because he thought the December resolution was clear enough. "For the foreseeable future" didn't seem to me to clarify the situation. It didn't add anything to '1975' which was in the content of the previous motion," says Warden.

Now that the question of Scarborough's remaining within the university has been settled, the committee must decide what status the Scarborough community should have within the university. Says David Onley, Vice-president of the Scarborough College Student Society. "It's now a question of the degree of autonomy."
Among the issues yet to be considered is the status of the Scarborough College faculty within the Faculty of Arts and Science. Should Scarborough remain under the thumb of the St. George-oriented Faculty Council or should it have a more autonomous status?

Committee members say that there seems to be a consensus among Scarborough people that it should have a more independent position. Plumtree would personally like to see freedom from the Faculty Council but not from the Senate.
According to Onley, Scarborough students are more concerned about adequate services than about intricate departmental structures. The college still does not have residences or any athletic facilities other than a playing field. The uncertainty over the future of Scarborough College has put a virtual moratorium on new building on the campus which Onley says is "not even half-completed." Despite this, Scarborough students wish to retain the prestige that U of T affiliation brings.

Rythmn of swishing twine at Hart House

By PETER WHITE

NEW NOTES FROM HART HOUSE: The last was a nostalgic week for Varsity's hung-up basketball sympathizers. At long last, after their fruitless two-year sojourn at the plush basketball emporium on the corner of Keele and Steeles, Blues and fans returned to the old watering hole — Hart House.

Larry Trafford

Once again that most gorgeous of sounds (not counting Pharoah), the rythm of swishing twine, led the hopeful into heated degrees of enchanted excitement. But alas the old hole revealed its age, at least for the time being, having run dry; suggesting another winter freeze for the denizens of her court.

CONSECUTIVE LOSSES to York (77-73) and Western (90-70) left the Blues wondering whether their rainbow would ever appear. Playing tough, tight and pretty smart, compared to what has been seen earlier, they made good games of both but were finally frustrated by their glaring weakness at the forward position.

Blues broke smooth and clean in the York affair.

Clearing well off their own board and passing adeptly out of their end they treated their first full house and vocally biased partisans in recent years to a 3-point halftime advantage. However, lapsing back into shades of former ineptness they found themselves behind by 11 points mid-way through the second half.

But, Blues regrouped as it were and dogged their way into a 71 tie with less than four minutes remaining. Two minutes and two York buckets appeared to doom the hapless and, on this night, heroic Blues. Struggling for a way up and out Blues forced a York turnover and, as the game entered its final minute, an Angus Braid breakaway layup brought the Hart House gang to a fleeting moment of standing silence and the score to 75-73.

Again Blues seized control of the ball and set up for a game tying basket.

You remember this is a story of the Blues and so here ends the history. A 12-footer from the left side by Ron Voake fell dastardly short and with 18 seconds left that was sadly that for Wednesday night.

Saturday night, Western appeared for the Varsity league opener. Amused but not intimidated by their cramped quarters Western staggered a game but ineffectual Toronto team.

BLUES OPENED with an aggressive man defence which harried Western into several turnovers and kept Blues even against a much taller opponent for the first six minutes.

Varsity floor leader Larry Trafford turned an ankle and was forced to the dressing room for medication. Blues, without Trafford to guard his former running mate Bruce Dempster switched into a zone and were able to hold their own until Trafford's return several minutes later.

But by this time, Western had solved the Toronto defence. Finally looking to their strength on the front line they peppered Blues with a kaleidoscopic variety of tips and short jumpers. By the half Blues trailed by 13 and for this night it was early to bed.

What chance Blues may have had seems to have been lost at that crucial time of Trafford's return. A move back into their earlier successful man defence may have staggered the gathering momentum of the Western juggernaut. As it was, Western continued to rain down upon the ineffectual Toronto forwards.

Six-foot-seven Western centre Al Brown led with 30 points and appeared at times free to move at will. Only Toronto forward to have any success was Bill Boston, a 6-foot-5 centre who dominated rebounds and added 16 points of his own.

IT'S TOO BAD that not to be heard again dictum, "it's what's up front that counts" does! Even against Bruce Dempster Blues backcourt of Trafford, Voake, Barker was superior in this game, and probably will be in most games they play. Trafford led Blues with 18 points.

Blues next action is in Waterloo next Saturday night, followed by three consecutive home games. Maybe the old place will have warmed up by then — it's the big time.

Bill Boston

Blues win only two of six holiday games, 6-4 loss to Windsor

By LYNDON LITTLE

All is not well with Varsity's defending national championship hockey team.

For the first time since anyone cares to remember, Blues are fighting a serious slump.

Since Dec. 11, when they terminated their pre-Christmas league schedul with a 6-0 whitewashing of the McMaster Marlins, Blues have managed only two victories in their last six games.

For any team that's a bad record; but for Blues — winners of five consecutive OAAA crowns — it's a disaster!

Here's the sad story:

● December 18-20 — Blues complete a two-game, four-day, trip to St. Louis where they are tied once (4-4) and defeated once (8-7, by the St. Louis University Billikens — a team in its first year of existence!

● December 26-29 — Blues compete in the big, prestigious, Hockey Canada Invitational College Tournament, win their preliminary round games (4-2 over Laurentian and 7-1 over Calgary) but then are shutout by York in the semi-finals, 2-0

● January 9 — Blues resume league play as they travel to Windsor to meet the Lancers, a team they thrashed by a score of 10-2 at Varsity Arena Dec. 4. They drop a surprise 6-4 decision marking the first time a Varsity hockey team has lost two games in a row in over five years.

COACH TOM WATT appeared ready to forget the disappointing results in the holiday exhibition play; but after Saturday afternoon's loss to the lowly Lancers, he exploded.

"That was just terrible," he snapped. "Our defence, especially, was just horseshit!"

"I wish I knew what the problem is. I worked them extra hard in practice this week. But I guess if they don't want to do the job they won't do it. I can't think of any other solution but more hard work!"

The defensive corps of Dave McDowall, Bill L. Heureux, Terry Parsons, Brent Swanick and Nels Debenedet were guilty of numerous sloppy play in their own end, exacerbated by industrious forechecking by the Lancers.

Swanick, normally one of the team's steadier rearguards, said "I couldn't believe the way I played out there. I know I was personally responsible for two of their goals."

Windsor coach Cec Eaves was understandably ecstatic with his team's first-ever victory over Varsity.

"I've been trying to teach these boys pride in themselves, as hockey players and also as a team," he said. "It looks as if it's working."

"I decided to use a four-man forechecking system," he explained. "It seemed to work because we had them pretty mixed up in their own end. I thought Tom (Watt) would pick it up earlier but it wasn't until Number -16's goal (Kaz Lysionek's third period marker) that they appeared to figure out what we were doing."

The Varsity — David Lloyd

OOPS! Blues had trouble scoring goals in the big games over the holidays. However, on this occasion, a blistering Varsity shot appears to handcuff Laurentian goalie Matt Thorpe.

BLUES STILL HAVE a very respectable 5-1 record in OQAA Western Division play. But, against competition in exhibition play, they stand only 5-3-2.

In all fairness, however, it should be noted that they did run into some blatantly biased officiating in St. Louis in the form of the comical Mark and Ed Olson brother act. Also, the loss to York in the Hockey Canada tourney was a heartbreaker as both teams played 55 exciting minutes of sustained, scoreless, action before the Yeomen finally broke through.

Still, Blues inability to score consistently despite many chances may be a manifestation of other serious deficiencies.

Whatever the root of Blues malaise, Watt and the team have little time to work them out. Blues play six games in the remaining three weeks of January starting with a trip to Western Thursday and then a date the following night at Varsity Arena against the Guelph Gryphons. Blue notes: Mike Boland, who left Blues in early December, has joined the Springfield Kings of the American Hockey League. . . Brian St. John and John Wright share the club lead in goals with 11 each. Gord Davies and Terry Peterman have 10 each. . . Loyola's star defenceman, Larry Carriere is back with the team after being released by the Verdun Maple Leafs of the Quebec Junior "A" league. Carriere was the centre of a dispute after signing a CAHA card with Verdun and then returning to Loyola.

Western wins squash tourney, green Varsity team fourth

University of Western Ontario handily won the third annual Canadian Invitational Intercollegiate squash team championships played the weekend of December 18, 19, 20.

In capturing the Molson Trophy, the Western team won 25 straight matches, a record equalled only by Varsity in last year's OQAA finals.

Blues fielded a completely new team and struggled to a fourth-place finish with seven wins, just one victory ahead of McGill and five ahead of hapless McMaster.

Best performers for Varsity were John Holmes and Gord Gibbins, each with two wins; Mark Khanna, Rupert Bramall and Don Hanser each managed one win in five matches.

However, U of T coach Ralph Rimmer wasn't overly disappointed at the relatively weak showing.

"We played the tournament for the experience and lost a few five-game matches that we might have won with better conditioning and practice."

York edged Princeton, ranked fourth in US college squash, by one victory (18-17) for second place. Navy, rated third among American colleges, was forced to withdraw due to travelling difficulties.

The impressive nature of the Western victory makes the Mustangs almost prohibitive favorites for the OQAA title, especially since the February finals will be played in London.

Varsity fencing duo win medals

Two Varsity fencers will compete for Ontario in the Canada Winter Games to be held in Saskatoon in February.

The six-man fencing contingent was chosen after the events in the Ontario Winter Games held in Etobicoke over Christmas.

Rowland Griffin took the gold and Halmut Microys the bronze in the individual event. Microys took 6th in the foil as well as reaching the semi-finals of the sabre. Griffin's 5th in the sabre gave Varsity competitors finalists in all weapons.

Griffin credits his coach at U of T, Imre Hennyey, with the expert training that resulted in his gold medal.

Vladimir Gettler, Dave Brown, Mike Kerwin and Finn Mattheisen gained valuable experience in the qualifying rounds.

Fire at Praxis on Huron has left homeless Stop Spadina and Women's Lib. Arson is suspected.

Arson is suspected in fire

By PHILINDA MASTERS

Arson is suspected in a fire which swept through 373 Huron St. Dec. 18, extensively damaging the building which housed Praxis Corporation, Metro Tenants Association, Women's Liberation Movement, and Stop Spadina Save Our City Coordinating Committee.

At the same time, money, files, registration lists, cheque stubs and money were stolen from all four offices. The fact that the fire broke out at the back of the house, whereas the furnace and fuse boxes are at the front reinforces the suspicion of arson. As yet no accusations have been made.

Ruth McKeown, a staff member of Praxis who was the last to leave the house before the fire, said that among the items stolen were all the registration lists and files on last weekend's Poor Peoples Conference which Praxis had been hired to organize. "It really messed up the Poor Peoples Conference — people in Ottawa had to phone all the groups themselves; it was amazing that the conference came off at all," McKeown said.

Although she wouldn't name anyone possibly responsible for the theft and fire, McKeown said that "it was a pretty professional job" which has "managed to stop operations (of Praxis) for at least a month or two." She added that recent criticism of Praxis by Peter Worthington in the Toronto Telegram "could have had some influence."

Howard Buchbinder, a Praxis Fellow, said yesterday that as well as $40 petty cash, cheque stubs and file cards, applications for grants and research contracts were taken from the Praxis office, along with the sole copy of the membership list for the Metro Tenants Association.

The house belongs to the U of T, and in view of the extensive damage, costs of repairing it would be disproportionate, according to Keale Gregory, administrative assistant to U of T Vice President (non-academic) A. G. Rankin. Gregory added that the house will be demolished for future expansion by the university.

Stephen Clarkson, Praxis' Executive President, said that the building was formerly owned by the Anglican Church, who let it rent-free to Praxis. When it was bought by U of T a $100-a-month rent was charged. But since the fire, the university will no longer house Praxis, Gregory said.

A similar situation occurred last year when the Day Care Centre, which rented a house at 12 Sussex Ave. from the University, was in need of $2,000 worth of repairs in order to continue operating. Since the Day Care Centre was unable to afford this sum, the university as the owner of the house was expected to pay for the repairs. Only after a sit-in at Simcoe Hall did the university agree to undertake these expenses.

A Praxis press release December 22, indicated that between the appearance of Worthington's critical articles in late November and the day of the fire, Praxis employees received "phone calls of a harassing nature, by unidentified individuals," and that after the fire a careful examination of the premises failed to uncover the missing articles.

"We do not know who took the files," it continued. "We do not know how the fire was started. We do not know if they were connected. We do know that these events occur in a sequence which is closely related in time to a series of irresponsible newspaper articles."

About Worthington and Praxis. . .

By ERIC MILLS

The roots of the Fire at the Praxis Corporation building at 373 Huron St. may go back to something far more serious than mere accident.

Praxis has charged that a series of articles by Peter Worthington in the Toronto Telegram about the organization created an atmosphere that may have inspired someone to commit arson. The physical facts of the fire and the amount and type of stolen property seem to support this contention.

On November 25, Worthington said that the "handful of academics" who founded Praxis "are now only peripherally involved. The organization has assumed a more strident and political tone than perhaps some of its founding members anticipated".

He notes that at a Workers' Control conference held on the weekend of October 30, "observers" found the following "themes" (among others):

• — "A 'demand' to overthrow all forms of 'capitalistic control'. The formula: to identify with radical revolution.

• — "Wage campaigns of discreditation: character assassination against select individuals of the establishment."

ard Buchbinder as the most prominent Praxis spokesman, Worthington juxtaposed this with the comment of the director of the Canadian Welfare Council, Reuben Baetz, that Buchbinder's views "seem to be based on a central Marxist Socialist doctrine." He also claimed that Praxis has "chameleon-like qualities".

Praxis describes itself as an "institute to generate the creative 'social invention' that is needed for social change. Social theory and practical action must be linked together. . . . This is what the term 'praxis' means" (from a booklet issued by Praxis)

Worthington suggests that linking 'social action' with 'practical action' is really "a polite way of saying 'revolution'".

The next day (Nov. 26), Worthington followed up this sally with a carefully selected 'factual' expose of Gerry Hunnius, "an activist for all seasons". This dwelt on Hunnius' travels behind the Iron Curtain and his involvement in many peace organizations. The picture was made complete by an unsavory police-like drawing of Hunnius.

A television show on Thursday December 17 had Worthington being interviewed by Praxis President Stephen Clarkson, Howard Buchbinder and the CBC's Barbara Frum. According to Frum, Worthington did not respond to many of the questions asked about his articles, but there was an angry viewer response in favour of him.

On the day of the fire, Worthington wrote an article purporting to describe "how an establishment organization (the Metro Social Planning Council) was radicalized by a persistent minority (Praxis) . . ."

Stating that Praxis "seems to be dabbling into every area of social concern", he claims the "assault" on the SPC started with the Just Society (to which he claims Praxis is a "Big Brother") confrontations last spring.

Worthington claimed this meant there is a blanket of respectability for virtually any action among poor people. "Now 'urban guerrilla' techniques have a cover of SPC respectability".

Somehow, the Tely neglected to cover the fire on December 18, but the following week (Dec. 24) ran a Worthington article denying the Praxis assertion that his previous articles had been composed of "lies, distortions and innuendo" (from the Praxis release). He quoted Clarkson at the press con-

Clerk fired on 10 minutes' notice

By LAURA KELLY

Patricia Garcia, a Sigmund Samuel Library clerical worker, fired for "insubordination" on Dec. 29 after refusing to assume extra duties without a pay raise will have a hearing today at 2 p.m. at 215 Huron St.

The Canadian Party of Labour has called a pre-hearing rally at 1 p.m. today in the library foyer to support the demands for Garcia's re-hiring, and no cutbacks in staff.

Garcia had been working four months in the library, completing her three month probationary period, and therefore was a member of the permanent staff.

Passing probation usually indicates a sort of job security "but I found out that's not the case here, said Garcia.

Garcia had as part of her duties the occasional relief of a library secretary; when that secretary resigned with a month's notice, Garcia applied for her job, which carried a $46 per month wage increase.

Neither Garcia nor anyone else was moved into the vacant position. Instead the duties were split among Garcia and another worker, without a pay hike.

Garcia said the new duties plus other "harrassment" from her supervisors led her to complain about the working conditions.

Ten minutes later she was fired by Herbert Sholler, Head of Readers Services, for insubordination.

Sholler requested, according to Garcia, that she not return to the library or talk to anyone about the dismissal.

Garcia was one of three workers from the same department who a month earlier fought for the re-hiring of Sandra Glick, fired for talking sharply to superiors when another department worker was let go.

The incidents of firing, ensuing complaints, and more firing, are sparked, says Garcia, by the constant pressure of the supervisors on the workers.

"We're pushed around like animals. We aren't given a chance to settle in or learn the work we're responsible for," said Garcia.

Garcia said her department superiors used the growing unemployment problem to threaten workers who didn't "keep in line."

Sholler said he had no comment on the matter, and Frank Kitchen, a member of the Canadian Union of Public Employees with whom Garcia filed her grievance, also declined to make any comment before the hearing.

A library worker outside Garcia's department said that overwork and underpayment are not rare in the library, and prolonged delay of salary payment is also frequent.

"You have to handle your complaints diplomatically. If you're going to play the work game you have to bend a little," said the employee.

Skiweek on line again

Skiweek is on the line again. At the General Committee meeting of the Faculty of Arts and Science held last week the Undergraduate Studies Committee recommended that the traditional reading week held in February be cancelled next year.

This year, reading week will be retained but there will be no time to study between the end of classes on April 17th and the beginning of exams on April 19th.

Next year, it is proposed that: classes start a week earlier on September 13, reading week be eliminated, Christmas holidays last for two weeks and exams begin on April 17th. This would allow for an exam week in December and a study week in April before exams.

This procedure is to allow a better co-ordination with the Engineering Faculty which is now operating on a semester basis and to provide an exam week for fall term courses.

The proposal was referred back to the Undergraduate Studies Committee for more study as faculty joined students to oppose it. Students objected to the elimination of reading week and so did a few faculty members.

Office supplies workers may picket UBC

VANCOUVER (CUP) — UBC is using "hot" duplicating material and may be picketed as a result.

Many faculty and administrative offices at UBC use office supplies manufactured and sold by A B Dick, an American-owned firm which is a major supplier of office equipment in Vancouver.

The A B Dick Local of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Clerks Union is on strike against the company. The union is asking customers to stop using A B Dick for their machines.

Simon Fraser University has agreed, but the University of British Columbia has not.

John Mclean, director of personnel for the UBC Administration, told the Ubyssy he has no power over the use of office equipment.

"There is no A B Dick equipment used in the administration building," he said.

Mclean said each faculty decides what machines they use and buy their own supplies.

The question now is whether or not the A B Dick Local will picket UBC. This cannot be done without the striking union giving 48 hours notice to the University Local of the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

Bill Morrison, President of the University Local of CUPE, said the A B Dick Local has not contacted his union on the matter yet.

The strike is an important one to both union and management. The Vancouver office of A B Dick is the only unionized branch of the company in North America.

Red Visser, spokesman for the striking union, said the issue was not working conditions. "But we want an increase in wages. There is nothing down in black and white about wages or working conditions."

"The Vancouver manager is anti union, but he doesn't have any negotiating rights anyway," Visser said. "They've sent in a man from head office in Chicago. . . ."

The man from Chicago has made arrangements for several meetings, but cancels out at the last moment.

"We've been on strike since Oct. 27, and the equipment was declared hot by the B C Federation of Labour in the first week of November," Visser said.

"We're not asking much. We only want people to buy their supplies from union shops and, where possible, to cancel their contracts with A B Dick."

There are 16 men involved in the strike. A B Dick has hired more than 16 scabs.

John Howe, Canadian Vice president of A B Dick said he is not willing to negotiate with the striking union until the men return to work.

Howe described working conditions at his plant as "ideal, with a homey atmosphere. Everyone knows each other on a first name basis." He did say that there is no written guarantee of working conditions.

The UBC CUPE local is somewhat in the middle of the dispute but Morrison said he didn't think the administration would fire employees for honoring the RWDSU picket lines if they are implemented.

"But I can't instruct CUPE members to cross or not to cross picket lines. I could be put in jail for that."

Board announces search committee choice

By ART MOSES

The search for a successor to U of T president Claude Bissell will be conducted by 14-man committee the Board of Governors announced Monday.

The Board proposal differs considerably from several suggested by other university bodies but appears to have enough support on campus to guarantee its acceptance.

A spokesman for the office of Vice President and Registrar Robin Ross said yesterday the Board proposal was endorsed at Monday's meeting of the President's Council.

The proposal calls for a committee consisting of 3 members of the Board of Governors, 3 faculty, 3 students, 2 administrators, 2 alumni. Soon-to-retire Chancellor Omond Solandt would serve as chairman.

The President's Council on October 26 called for a larger 21-man committee composed of 5 students, 5 faculty, 5 administrators, 3 members of the Board of Governors and 2 alumni, plus the chancellor. According to Board chairman O. D. Vaughan, the Board tried to stick closely to the President's Council proposal while establishing a smaller body.

Vaughan said the Board proposal was drawn up by a small committee set up months ago by the Board consisting of himself, Dr. Bissell and Dean of Law, R. St. J. Macdonald. The committee heard various proposals before agreeing on the plan announced Monday.

The Board's plan runs counter to recommendations of the Association Staff which rejected staff-student parity for any presidential search committee. The ATS asked that students and faculty be represented on the committee in the same 21:14 ratio called for by the University-Wide Committee for the university's new top governing structure.

ATS chairman R. W. Missen was guarded in his reaction yesterday but indicated the faculty may cooperate in the interests of obtaining a new president.

"This seems to be as good a start as any, though I regret certain aspects; I say let's get going with the job of finding a new president."

Concerning the parity granted students with faculty in the Board's plan Dr. Missen said, "There are a few things built into it that obviously we don't like."

Missen said further ATS reaction would only come after its executive had discussed the question.

Vaughan wished to clarify that, although Bissell sat on the small committee which forwarded the plan to the entire Board, he was "completely neutral" on the question.

"This was really a decision of the Board, not of this small committee," he said.

Students' reaction was also gauged.

SAC Research and Information Officer Ken McEvoy said he "imagines SAC will accept" the plan and would not push for the President's Council recommendation as it was "not much better" than the Board's. SAC representatives were sitting on the President's Council when it made its proposal for the presidential search committee, but later walked out when the Council refused to allow student representatives to be appointed by SAC.

The Board of Governor's proposal calls for student, faculty and administration representatives to be elected. The spokesman for the Vice President and Registrar's office said the President's Council appointed Chancellor Solandt to supervise the elections.

First year exams are still here

By PETER HALL

Students were screwed again last week but this time they came out fighting.

Over student objections the General Committee of the Faculty Council of Arts and Science reaffirmed that all first year courses must have final examinations this year.

Originally Dean A. D. Allen and the Committee on Evaluation recommended, after student pressure, that the decision to require finals be left up to the individual departments. Last week the General Committee rejected this proposal and referred back to the committee all the requests for exemption this year.

A. P. Thornton, the chairman of the history department who moved the motion explained that he felt the Council would be a "useful safeguard on departments" and worried that a few "weak-kneed instructors and militant students" might decide not to hold exams and possibly lower the standards of the university. He wanted to make sure that for each exemption "a case would have to be made and defended before the Faculty committee".

Principal D. G. Ivey of New College then moved that this exam count for at least one third of a student's final mark. He and other faculty speakers expressed a fear that some instructors might try to avoid the regulation by barely counting the exam in a student's mark. His motion also passed.

At this time Norman Rodgers, a student representative from Physics objected that these amendments were contrary to the spirit of the committee's recommendation and proposed a counter motion leaving the decision to hold an exam up to the class and professor involved.

Jack Sword, Vice President of the university and chairman of the meeting, however ruled Rodgers out of order at that point, and his decision was upheld by the Committee.

In explaining his proposal Rodgers said, he "felt morally obligated to say the way things should be."

"To allow for progressive education each class in consultation with the professor should have the right to decide on its own evaluation methods," he said.

"The department, much less the Faculty Council doesn't know what is going on in any one class. If we expect to permit any diversity in education here we have to provide for some classroom autonomy," stated Rodgers.

He revealed that students had held a caucus Monday night and were going to appeal the decision to the whole Faculty Council.

Bob Spencer, the Education Commissioner of SAC, presented a petition to that effect to Dean Allen yesterday and indicated that the matter might well come before the next meeting of the Faculty Council on Tuesday at 4:10.

"It was an absurd meeting," he said in reference to the General Committee, "It seems so ridiculous that classes which are now expecting to write no exam this spring may have that decision taken away from them."

Spencer said that students in some already completed courses might still be required to write final exams under this rule, notably Geology 121F and Computer Science 148F.

Thornton when asked if he knew of any exemptions granted this year in history remarked he knew of none.

So far the Evaluation Committee has been unable to reach agreement on any proposed exceptions. At the moment the ball is in the hands of the whole Faculty Council meeting on January 19th.

U of T silent, while activist groups burn

Something is happening just outside the university campus, which the university cannot afford to ignore.

The night of December 18 there was a fire at 373 Huron St., in a U of T-owned building rented to a group of organizations working for social changes in Canada. The groups included The Toronto Women's Liberation Movement, the Metro Tenants' Association, the Stop Spadina Save Our City Coordinating Committee, and the Praxis Research Institute. Until recently the Just Society movement, an association of poor people, also used the building.

With differing emphases, all these groups have been working to lay the basis for fundamental social changes — changes which would put the real power in our society back in the hands of the Canadian people.

That means fighting to end the oppression of women, fighting to achieve cheap housing for Torontonians, and fighting to stop the destruction of the city by developers and politicians with an eye only to profit and efficiency.

There is no evidence that the fire was an accidental one. There is considerable evidence that it was the direct result of the atmosphere of repression and hysteria which groups and organizations — from the federal government in Ottawa down to the Toronto press and fanatic groups like our own home-grown Edmund Burke Society — have been promoting.

The hostility with which the press treated last weekend's Poor People's Conference too, is a barometer of the attitudes irrational hysteria promotes.

There is evidence (see our front page report) that the events at 373 Huron on December 18 were deliberately calculated to undermine the Poor People's Conference held here last weekend.

There appears to be abundant circumstantial evidence to show that Telegram reporter Peter Worthington could be charged with incitement to arson (if there is such a charge) in the series of provocative and unsubstantiated attacks he has mounted on Praxis.

It was no surprise, for instance, to find Worthington, the weekend of Laporte's murder, writing virulently that Canada's campuses were hotbeds of violence and extremism which ought to be purged if social upheavals were to be avoided.

Worthington warmly endorsed the remarks of retired RCMP security and intelligence chief W. H. Kelly, that, without political purges in universities, the campuses could become "incubators of terrorism."

The technique ought to be quite familiar to us, if we have learned anything in the last couple of months. The way in which federal politicians were able to raise the spectre of "insurrection" and of thousands of armed FLQ members, in order to crush a wide range of democratic community organizations in Quebec, provides a textbook example.

Peter Worthington took a page right out of Jean Drapeau's book, when he mounted his campaign against Praxis just as the organization was beginning to organize workshop-style conferences at which people could discuss how to begin to achieve their social aims.

The fire and looting, of course, occurred the same day one of Worthington's slanderous attacks appeared in print.

And let's not forget Prime Minister Trudeau, who picked up on Kelly's rhetoric when he suggested early last month that university campuses will have to be increasingly under police surveillance, since the university is the place where "the instigators of violent dissent are going to find their natural milieu."

What is the importance of all this to the University of Toronto?

In the first place, U of T plans to stand idly by while Praxis and the other groups attempt to survive this blow at both their physical survival and their viability as community organizing groups.

U of T, which owns 373 Huron, does not plan to restore it for use by its original occupants, or to help find alternate accommodation for its occupants.

The university's callous stand on this issue is just another example of its traditional attitude to groups outside the parameters of the ivory tower.

Two summers ago, U of T tore down an outstanding second hand bookstore, Volume One, at the corner of Harbord and Spadina — for parking space.

Last spring U of T, in a situation almost parallel with the 373 Huron affair, refused to spend $2,000 on repairs to a cooperative daycare centre housed in a university building on Sussex Ave. That error in judgement was corrected by a prolonged overnight visit of hundreds of students and faculty to Simcoe Hall, where they threatened to remain unless the university agreed to help out the daycare centre.

But what is even more appalling is the apparent disinterest U of T President Claude Bissell has displayed in the whole atmosphere of repression infecting Canada.

He made no public statement on the suspension of civil liberties in October, and the subsequent crack-down on the people of Quebec.

A man of reason, and a leader of opinion in English Canada, Claude Bissell did not feel compelled to articulate any objections to the actions of the federal government in Quebec and of governments — like the B.C. and Quebec Governments for instance — which took the opportunity to impose strict political control on teachers and faculty.

Bissell's incredible disinterest in these challenges to the independence of the university and to the Canadian traditions of freedom of thought and learning, is difficult to comprehend.

The university should be a place where free exchange of opinion can always take place.

But it should take place there especially if it attempts in an analytical way to examine the problems facing Canadians and begin to resolve them.

U of T took a half-hearted step in that direction when it (or at least its faculty, students, and president) opposed the Spadina Expressway.

It is time now for U of T to come to the aid of the groups who have been terrorized out of their accommodation.

U of T should be standing solidly behind all of these groups — supporting them both in the public eye and in working for fundamental social change.

Concretely, this would mean providing physical facilities and helping them with their work — as an integral part of the university's responsibilities.

It would also mean speaking out publicly to demand that the police move to protect such groups from right-wing harassment, and to support any legal charges Praxis, or others, might wish to lodge against Peter Worthington.

Red Roses for a Blue Lady

The Rochdale Papers

Adelman: omissions and distortions

Last month we printed an article which attempted to probe the lesser-known aspects of the history of Rochdale College. The general thesis was that from the beginning, Rochdale has been controlled by politicians, developers and opportunists, not by the residents of the "co-operative". Here we print two lengthy replies to Brian Johnson's original story, plus a response from Johnson.

Your feature article "The Rochdale Papers" has been brought to my attention. Unfortunately in all its efforts to unravel the history, a number of serious omissions, distortions and implications have been made which do not help in providing an accurate picture.

The article begins on a false note. "The real crisis at Rochdale College is a debt structure of nearly half a million dollars, a legacy that can be traced back to the conception of the building as a money making pilot project for co-operative housing."

Rochdale College has no essential difference in debt structure from any of the other new co-operatives developed across Canada in terms of its capital building costs. The additional debts on Rochdale College are directly attributable to problems of management.

Let's take the problems one by one. The land cost was $1,000,000.00. The Varsity article asserts Revenue bought the assembled land en bloc for about $600,000.00, making about $400,000.00 profit. According to the information we were able to find out at the time of purchase, the cost to Revenue Properties of the complete parcel of land was approximately $760,000.00 not including interest, carrying charges, and legal fees. We considered the purchase of the land from several angles:

- The expropriation by the University of two different parcels of land we already owned and the drying up of sites available when the block of land between Harbord and Bloor was included within the master-plan of the University.
- The inappropriateness of a site on the west side of Spadina Avenue because of the development of the Spadina Expressway.
- Our inability to complete the assembly of a block of land at Bloor and Madison Avenue on which Tartu College was eventually built.
- The fair price of the land — the market price of land at $30 per square foot for seven times's coverage or $4.30 for land for each square foot of building (7 square feet of building would be built for each square foot of land). We were independently advised that this was a fair price as the Consolidated Building Corporation land at the corner of Walmer Road and Bloor was available for $25.00 a square foot, but was a poor site in terms of location and the coverage was only five times (i.e. $5.00 for land for each square foot of building). Similarly, our own land south of Bloor was worth $10.00 per square foot or $5.00 for land for each squarefoot of building.
- The willingness of the developer to reinvest his land profit ($200,000.00 approximately) and building profit ($200,000.00 approximately) in the project in the form of a second mortgage which would provide some of the needed equity for the project.
- The ideal location of the property relative to other houses.

In terms of the building cost, the great delay came from a general construction strike which lasted three months during a crucial period in the time of construction, and resulted in an effective delay of four or five months. This is a serious omission in the article, for though we had serious complaints about the work of Alscot Construction, it is totally unfair to blame them with a problem beyond anyone's control.

The escalation in project costs came from two directions:

- The costs of project development.
- The interest charges for the longer period of development.

The second was an admissible expense eligible for an increase in the mortgage. The former was overwhelmingly made up of expenses of Rochdale College and these were ruled inadmissible by CMHC. We can only note that extra expenses when they were encountered in Waterloo were financed by CMHC. Rochdale became a special case in which all expenses became subject to special scrutiny because CMHC was not by law entitled to finance educational expenses and seemed to take the position that many of the development expenses were educational and not for building development.

What made Rochdale different was an attempt to develop an educational and not just a residential institution. The project was not developed as your article mistakenly asserts in the first paragraph, as a money-making pilot project for co-operative housing. It was not the pilot project; Hammarck House in Waterloo was. It was not intended to be money-making. Rather it was the first attempt to develop a charitable educational institution rather than just a residence. We proved very adept and successful at developing co-operative residences. When we attempted to enter into an area for which we had little experience and no financial resources, I think we proved to be inadequate to the task.

A number of personal assertions are also made which are misleading or wrong. Robert Macauley is linked with the original incorporation of Rochdale College. He was. At that time a site was owned by Campus Co-op (later to be expropriated by the University). We had not heard of Revenue Properties. In the next paragraph you link Macauley with Revenue Properties. Robert Macauley evidently did legal work for Revenue according to newspaper reports but it had nothing to do with Rochdale. We did not know of any connection and three other legal firms used by Revenue were involved in the Rochdale transaction. Bob Macauley as a Minister in the provincial Government went out of his way to support a co-operative residence which would have some tax exemption which it could use to run an educational institution. It was not a political position with which his conservative colleagues had much sympathy. Bob Macauley was an innovative man willing to take risks which were of no possible reward to him (even politically) since most of us were not even likely to vote conservative. The implication that he was involved because of his financial connection is grossly unfair to a man who bent over backwards to help the co-op.

On page 8 you assert "In the 1960's Mr. Tampold and Mr. Wells were directors of A. C. Murphy, the construction firm that built other co-op housing projects developed by Revenue Properties." To my knowledge, Tampold and Wells were and are not directors of A. C. Murphy Construction. Further, the first and only project Revenue Properties built directly or indirectly for co-ops was Rochdale College. Finally, A. C. Murphy is totally independent of Revenue Properties and to our knowledge was in fact a bitter rival.

As far as the decision on elevators as short cuts by the architects, the decisions were made on the basis of studies done by the elevator companies. Whether or not a project like Rochdale needs 6 elevators or not I cannot say since the use of the building by residents is different than that originally planned. But Neill-Wyck College, the 22-storey co-op at Ryerson, has four elevators and one might find out whether the operation there is satisfactory.

As far as cost short-cuts, Rochdale was designed as an economical building at a cost of roughly $4,300 per bed unit exclusive of land, in comparison to a cost in New College of $12,000 to $14,000 per bed unit, or in Massey College of $30,000 per bed unit. With bed costs like these, overruns in capital costs of even 5% could easily be absorbed provided the building was kept reasonably filled and efficiently managed. One cannot run a residence which is expected to be full in the winter but which instead suffers a high vacancy rate while at the same time pioneering with an educational institution, a social service agency, and a counter cultural community. The base to support those other enterprises is not only absent but it makes the job of running the basic residence more costly in terms of income loss through vacancies and higher expenses.

With regard to myself, you assert (page 8) that I worked for both Revenue Properties and the Co-op on the Rochdale project. This is false and possibly libellous. I did not work for Revenue Properties on Rochdale and received no money from Revenue Properties for work on Rochdale. The work I did was paid for by the Co-op and the amounts paid are in the co-operative's books. The assertion that the beginning of the story that I "won a fortune in consulting fees on the project" is patently false. Further, I may add, the large amounts in consulting fees I earned subsequently were made in spite of the reputation of Rochdale and my association with it.

With respect to the suggestions of excessive profits by others, namely Revenue Properties and Tampold, Wells Architects, this too is misleading. A profit of less than 10% by a developer on a project is normal in this society. When that profit is not realised in cash, when the profit is re-invested for thirty years at 7% interest, secured by a second mortgage, and when even that low interest long-term second position security is undermined by non-payment of the first mortgage, one can only suggest there was in fact very little, if any, real profit in the deal for Revenue Properties. In the case of the Architects, they worked for the regulation fee required to be paid by the Architectural Association of Ontario. A regulation fee of 6% on a low cost student housing project earns half the amount of money of 6% on a high cost student housing project (e.g. New College). Further, when 20% of that fee is evidently not yet paid, and when the project is one which involves the Architects in all kinds of extra work with student committees and the numerous changes in decisions made throughout the design period, and indeed even through the building period, one can only suggest the fee was not only the required legal fee and one which has not been fully paid, but is also one for which services were received beyond that normally called for from an architect.

But there are more important issues than personal offences committed by your article. You refer to my feeling of responsibility over the developments of Rochdale. I feel more than responsible; I feel a sense of guilt. And this feeling is directed towards those who invested monies in Rochdale and whose investments are now in danger. My prime concern is with the Campus Co-op, a hard working group of students who, over the years, have provided economic housing to students at low cost through their own resources, this in spite of the fact that they are handicapped by paying land costs, sales taxes on construction materials, and municipal taxes.

I feel guilty because I believe the present operations of Rochdale have jeopardized the security of the Campus Co-op mortgage. I think the primary goal of The Varsity should be to protect the position of the Campus Co-op and the advocacy of more equitable treatment generally for co-operative residences, as recommended in the Committee of Presidents' subcommittee on student housing.

Secondly, I think the Federal Government should provide a program for non-student youth with appropriate financing. I do not think Rochdale College is the appropriate place for it was not designed for that purpose. To this end the work of Peter Turner should be encouraged. However, the mere alleviation of mortgage payments on Rochdale is a temporary cop-out on a program which requires a lot more money and the support of a great deal of experience. In fact, Peter Turner is quite correct in his assertions, for Rochdale is a cheap way out in dealing with the underlying factors of dissidence which will mean, for one thing, a half million unemployed youth in Canada this coming February.

In spite of the errors, serious omissions, and misleading implications, I recognize the difficulty in sorting out the factors leading to the problems of Rochdale.

Howard Adelman

Dimond: unfair indictment

Brian Johnson's article is an unfair and unconvincing indictment of Rochdale's founders. I use the word "founders" deliberately, because no matter how important Howard Adelman was in Rochdale's development from 1965 to 1968, he was only one of a 10-man Governing Council which was responsible for decisions on all phases of the project. This group, which was controlled by faculty and students from U of T, among them myself, was quite conscious of the physical and financial parameters of the project. What they were not conscious of, and what they perhaps should have anticipated, was that the free-wheeling educational aspect of the college would attract people who either couldn't or wouldn't pay their rent money.

The healthy existence for the last five years of Waterloo Campus Co-op in modern buildings designed and financed in the same way as Rochdale; the similar success of Neill-Wyck College at Ryerson in this its first year; the willingness of CMHC to finance Pestolazzi College at Ottawa and Elrond College at Queen's — all these projects should give Mr. Johnson some pause in concluding that the financing or the debt structure of Rochdale is responsible for its unique problems. Certainly having such a load did not make matters easier, but the original Rochdale Council knew that even with such an overhead they could offer rates lower than university rates. This was enough to make the project reasonable and it still is.

Nor is Mr. Johnson's charge of an "inflated" mortgage convincing. The basic situation was as follows: the price for the land and building as a package was negotiated between Rochdale members employed by Co-op College, on one side, and Revenue Properties on the other. At an advanced stage in these negotiations Revenue raised its price by several hundred thousand dollars. Rochdale Council had the price estimate checked by a quantity surveyor and discovered a true rise in costs was responsible. We ordered a re-design of the project to meet the original budget and told Revenue that the project would go ahead only if they left $30,000 in the project on a second mortgage for 30 years at 7%. We later discovered that this sum represented the entire profit which Revenue anticipated on the project.

I would be interesting to know how Mr. Johnson concludes that the $400,000 was made solely on the land assembly, but I can assure you that if it was then the building itself was built at cost, a hardly profitable situation for the developer. I wonder if Revenue Properties feels today that they have squeezed the taxpayer after having been talked into investing their entire profit in a second mortgage on a property which isn't even meeting its first mortgage commitments.

Mr. Johnson's personal allegations about Howard Adelman are malicious at best. He was paid about $12,000/yr. by Co-op College for work on Rochdale and never worked for Revenue Properties on the project. Rochdale was not the cornerstone of Mr. Adelman's career as a consultant on student housing. In the mid-sixties he invented and pioneered a new approach to university housing in Ontario that has been imitated here and abroad, and which was the direct cause of the Ontario government's establishment of the Ontario Student Housing Corporation to get a piece of the action. He can be no more blamed for Rochdale's current problems that he can be for the government's clumsy imitation of his techniques.

The blame that may be laid to the Rochdale founders was in part an ignorance of the blossoming pseudo-revolution among North American youth that would make their "free school" quite a different place from what their experiences led them to believe. This factor made the deliberate organizational underplanning seem, with hindsight to fall somewhere between naive and culpable negligence. It would be interesting to collect and tell the story behind Rochdale and to try to analyse who should be blamed for what. There is much of interest in that story I assure you and the cast of characters would be large. But such work will never be done by someone who twists the facts the way Mr. Johnson has done. My advice to him is to find a case which fits the analysis which he seems determined to present.

Jack Dimond

Johnson: Rochdale a victim of the marketplace

Moved by the air of authority behind the letters written by Howard Adelman and Jack Dimond, two Rochdale "founders", I am replying to their charges that "The Rochdale Papers" is an unfair distortion of fact.

First, the article was never intended to be a complete history of Rochdale. It was only an initial exposure of a vital aspect of its history that has been ignored by the commercial press in their caricature of the building as a flophouse furnished with dope and dirt.

The building's financial history is complex and obscure, a researcher's nightmare. Because the real dealings occurred behind closed doors, and only a few people like Adelman know what really went on.

However, I will deal with some of the points raised in the two letters:

● "an indictment of Rochdale's founders": The purpose of the article was not to lay blame on the "founders", because no one is responsible individually for the operations of a market which has screwed Rochdale. And Howard Adelman was more than "only one of a 10-man Governing Council" which made all the decisions. I am startled by Mr. Dimond's apparent belief that such a council can control the housing market by virtue of its constitution. And Adelman was more than a member of that council. He was intimately involved with the commercial development of Rochdale.

● "malicious" allegations about Adelman: Rochdale's debt structure is greater than Mr. Adelman's stature as a villain, and the article was not a character study. I have verbal evidence that he had worked for Revenue Properties since 1963. It is difficult to prove whether or not he actually did, because, as a consultant, he would not be included on Revenue's payroll. For the sake of libel laws, I will temporarily retract that charge until I have assembled legal documentation. Without doubt, Adelman did have a long informal and formal association with Revenue Properties.

● "a sense of guilt": Adelman seems to feel more guilty about inconvenience caused to a bureaucracy like Campus Co-op than to Rochdale's real heirs — the tenants whom the bureaucracies failed to serve.

● a pilot project: Adelman may be correct that his history on the Rochdale project was more of a slur on his reputation as a consultant than credit to him. But the expertise he gained on the Rochdale project qualified him for a lucrative consulting career.

The Versily | Errol Young

● Inflation of the mortgage: 1. Dimond says Rochdale was built "at cost". Yes, of course the final audit states that. But the paper price of the project had to be convincing to secure a CMHC mortgage covering 90 per cent of the bill. Before CMHC granted the mortgage, government auditors had to delete bills for furnishings, which were obvious non-capital costs included in Rochdale's assessment of capital costs.

2. Dimond says the mortgage was not inflated. But even Adelman, in his letter, admits Revenue made $240,000 on the land deal. Revenue Properties sold the land for $1 million. I said Revenue had bought it for $600,000, while Adelman says the figure was $760,000 — "according to the information we were able to find out at the time of purchase". But what was the real land cost? Adelman should have that information, so why does he withhold it?

3. Neither Adelman nor Dimond mention how the land price was inflated before Revenue officially acquired the property — while its middlemen were selling it back and forth to each other, constantly raising the price, while it was being assembled.

4. Revenue Properties is hardly a charity. It doesn't undertake projects "at cost". Aside from the profit made in land assembly, there are the construction fees — paid to Alscott Construction Co., then a Revenue subsidiary. And Revenue is in the position of an important creditor: it holds the second mortgage on Rochdale.

● "a charitable educational institution": While describing the purity of developing an educational institution, Adelman completely ignores the municipal and federal tax rebates sought through such a status for Rochdale.

● Tampold and Wells: I retract the statement that these architects were directors of A. C. Murphy Construction until further documentation. But Rochdale was not the only co-op housing project developed by Revenue. Revenue Properties assembled the land for the Married Students Residence on Charles St.

● elevator problem: Rochdale doesn't just have too few elevators (4); they are low-quality elevators which have continually been breaking down, causing costly repair bills.

● construction strike: Adelman says the construction strike, which delayed the project and raised the cost, was a problem "beyond anyone's control. A strike is like a natural disaster or act of God?"

● other co-op housing: Dimond says a heavy debt structure is normal for co-op housing. He's right. And Rochdale is no exception to the standard development practices elsewhere in Toronto, where the price and style of housing is determined by corporations whose primary motive is the maximization of profit. But just because the debt structure is normal, that doesn't diminish the importance of Rochdale's specific debt structure as a major determinant in its history. And the normal debt structure normally makes low-rental co-op housing impossible.

● The "blossoming pseudo revolution" among North American youth that undercut the intentions of the Rochdale founders is really the blossoming unemployment. Agreed, in "naive and culpable negligence", the founders never guessed poor people would want to live in the new utopia. They didn't understand the economic fact of a housing crisis, which hits hardest the poor and unemployed.

I apologize to the "founders" if they have construed from my article that I implied they were totally conscious of what they were doing. As Dimond says, if the whole story was told, it would reveal more than just a financial history, and the cast of characters would be large. But some would have more power than others.

About Worthington and the Praxis fire . .

only $1500 comes from McMaster. He says this is less than he earned before joining Praxis, and that some of it has been put back into Praxis)

Clarkson claims Worthington succeeded in creating an atmosphere in which some right wing group felt inspired to burn Praxis. "One can be responsible for a crime without actually committing it", he said. "Worthington is a professional of the worst kind of journalism the press can boast of".

He noted that although there have been some difficulties in communication between the full-time staff of Praxis and its more academic Council, there has been continuous interaction and co-operation. A grant to Praxis by the Toronto Star of $35,000, which according to Worthington "(Star editor Peter) Newman said they dropped because they didn't think much of that organization," was never thought of as a continuing donation, said Clarkson.

He added that Praxis is considering legal action against Worthington.

Howard Buchbinder, Praxis Co-ordinator of Urban Poverty and Social Services Project, terms "ridiculous" Worthington's insinuation of a split between the staff and council of Praxis.

"There are council members usually at all decision-making meetings", he said. "Praxis has turned perhaps more activist, the staff more than the council, but there is no split."

U of T Professor Meyer Brownstone, this year's 'acting president' of Praxis, agreed there has been a learning process which has turned Praxis more activist, but said "Worthington's completely misreading the whole thing." He suggested that possibly some East European rightist group was responsible for the fire.

Contacted last night, F. Paul Fromm of the Edmund Burke Society denied that the Burkers had anything to do with the fire. The EBS has been interested in Praxis however, and by Fromm's own admission have been doing "an intensive investigation into Praxis."

Fromm suggested that "some-one may have done this to frame Worthington". Describing Praxis as "one of the major thrusts of radicalism in this city", Fromm said Worthington "didn't write anything we didn't already know. We had published most of it two months ago."

Fromm claimed the EBS had "some people associated with police agencies in the U.S. investigating Howard Buchbinder" and "we're willing to go a lot further than Worthington did."

The dispute over the fire will not likely end here, with Worthington and the Edmund Burke Society investigating and 'exposing' Praxis, and Praxis investigating Worthington's articles. Meanwhile, four socially concerned organizations have been discredited, dislocated and made homeless.

BEFORE YOU MAKE YR NEXT MOVE CHECK THE FANTASTIC SELECTION OF BOOKS ON CINEMA AT THE UNIVERSITY BOOKROOM

(HURRY BEFORE IT'S TOO LATE!)

BY BETTY DODSON

IT was really very beautiful — a group of women gathered in the offices of Screw to put together an entire women's issue. I seemed to be the "artist in residence." What would I like to draw and write about? My last six years as an erotic artist had given me a wealth of information and some very fascinating life experiences.

At first, I must confess that I had vindictive images of a series of male "crotch shots," complete with black socks and garters. But that is the other side of the sexual double standard and really is a turn-off. "Getting even" is not the point.

I mentioned to the group that I found it interesting that every time I drew an erect cock, it was always censored — even Screw had to censor my drawings of erections in order to get printed. The law prohibiting hard-on display was obviously written by men — but to "protect" whom from exactly what?

I proceeded to ask a good number of my friends the following question: In most erotic material available today, showing both male and female genitalia is permitted. However, the law strictly prohibits the showing of an erect penis. What do you feel is the reasoning behind this?

One woman said: "The erect penis is too erotically stimulating for women." Her acceptance of this idea fascinated me. I wondered why she never considered pictures of the open, available cunt as too erotically stimulating for men? It seemed clear to me that women will have to add equal "erotic rights" to their list of demands.

There are, of course, publications aimed at the male homosexual market in which the penis is presented erotically, but by law not erect. The "turgid" penis is acceptable — that is, below a 45 degree angle. (It's really a wild vision I get of these very dignified lawmakers poring over pictures of cocks to determine the legality of it all based on a 45 degree angle. What the hell is going on in their heads?) At any rate, these publications showing male "crotches" do not work as a turn-on for women because of their obvious homosexual orientation.

One woman said the law "was protecting lily-white feminine sensibilities — women should not be turned on by direct, straight sex." Another said: "Maybe it would be too exciting for us. We still have to be protected; otherwise there is no way of faking, exaggerating, or confusing real sexual content." But focusing on "protecting the female" is actually a way of protecting the male. If the woman is kept virginal, chaste, uninformed, erotically disinterested, and protected from overt sexual material, the man feels "safe" because his tenuous masculinity will not be "put to the test."

One woman said the male simply can't handle "size-king competition." The repression of real sexuality always leads to strange and exaggerated notions. This partly explains the extreme concern most men have about the size of their cocks.

I feel that men would benefit from seeing pictures of erections because they would then realize that most erect cocks are within a limited size range. Because of the "masculine mystique," this is something a man can rarely, if ever, discuss with other men. The hang-up on "bigger means better" is simply one-dimensional thinking. The women I asked showed no marked preference for a big cock. They had many other considerations — but that is another story.

Another female comment was: "The cock has come to be such a supreme symbol of masculinity that to show this 'ultimate' leaves the man with his glory reduced to black and white." If masculinity is to be equated with the erect cock, to show a picture of it would be sacrilegious. God might have a wart on his nose!

The men's answers were equally interesting. On one, I got the actual law: "Obscenity prosecutions today require the demonstration of three conditions: (1) that the questioned material must appeal to prurient interests; (2) that it goes beyond the scope and candor of contemporary community standards; (3) that it is utterly without socially redeeming value." But we can show the female genitals open and ready for sexual action while we cannot show the male genitals ready for sexual action. Since the actual law does not specify male or female, it is obvious that the interpretation of the law by men is based on a sexual double standard.

One man said that the erect cock was "too sincere for this society," and that the male did not want to be looked upon as a sex object. I agree. Who does? But the fact is that women are! The sexual double standard is still very much alive. Another man answered: "In a woman-dominated society, the female calls the shots on what is socially acceptable. An erect penis would be considered overly stimulating and embarrassing to the female onlooker." He offered as an example the leaves covering the cocks on statues in the Vatican. Actually, the leaves were placed there by the church fathers after a full-scale attack on the male genitals led by a male (the Italian religious fanatic Savonarola), in the 1400s.

A friend involved in sex research wrote: "The surface reason is that the erect penis is highly visible and the most clearest, unmistakable symbol of sexual arousal, which is a highly threatening thing in a sex-negative society. However, I think there are two suppressed reasons: (1) Our double-standard society regards the erect cock as a 'call to action.' When the male cock is up, the female must take action (phallic worship). (2) More importantly, men are extremely uptight about becoming sex objects themselves and are very fearful of having to compete genitally. They fear, more specifically, being measured by their hard-ons (their ability to get them, keep them, and perform heroically), and not being large enough or larger than the next guy."

It would be nice if a guy could just have a hard-on because it felt good. It would be the same for a woman to feel turned on without the "call to action." Our sex-negative society creates a sex-starved environment where sexual arousal is viewed as urgent (backed-up frustration) and one must "make out," even under stress or in difficult circumstances. The point is that if you are sexually expressed, sexual arousal does not necessarily mean "horny."

Another interesting male answer was: "Females do not have erections, and men feel awkward about their state of sexual tension showing." That one intrigued me, because women do have erections, the female genitals increase in size with sexual stimulation. The dictionary gives as one of two definitions of the phallus: "The penis or clitoris or the sexually undifferentiated organ out of which each develops." If we all thought of the phallic symbol as both clitoris and penis, we could establish a common base for human sexuality.

It has been clearly established and scientifically demonstrated that the woman's point of pleasure is in her phallus (clitoris) and that is how she comes. But the myth of the vaginal orgasm dies slowly. Despite all of the so-called new sexual freedom, the abundance of marriage manuals, scientific investigation, erotic art and films, we still have a fixation on "the cock in the hole!" And once that male phallus is in that hole, that's all there is to sex!

Not true! Clitoral stimulation for the female is as essential as getting a hard-on is for the male. Many women require from 15-30 minutes of direct or indirect clitoral stimulation to achieve orgasm. But there is still a vast majority of men (and some women) who do not understand female sexuality because they are hooked on the male phallus only. "The cock in the hole only" approach will not satisfy most women.

In Human Sexual Response by Masters and Johnson (p 49), there are three drawings of the female phallus in three sexual stages. (So that women do not become "size queens" about the female phallus, Masters and Johnson clearly state that there is no relationship between the size of the clitoris and the effectiveness of its role in female stimulation.)

1. The first female response to sexual stimulations is lubrication. This is a parallel response to the man's erection. In both cases a minimum of sexual tension is present. Clitoral response does not develop as rapidly as does penile erection. The rapidity of the "turned-on" response of the clitoris depends upon the type of stimulation used — direct or indirect. The faster direct approach is mouth or hand manipulation of the clitoral body (shaft and glans) or the mons area.

2. When swelling of the female genitals (clitoris and vaginal lips) does occur the woman is well advanced into the excitement phase.

3. In the plateau phase (just prior to orgasm) the entire clitoral body retracts beneath the protective foreskin. Don't stop and search for it — it's still there — just continue manipulations in the same area. What happens to the female phallus during orgasm has not yet been established. The woman desires stimulation (direct or indirect) during her entire orgasmic experience.

The female phallus is not exactly like the male phallus, but there are many similarities. When the woman runs her wet tongue over the tip of the man's penis (glans), it feels very much like a wet tongue on the clitoris (glans). Usually when a woman becomes excited, the clitoris enlarges, but she can have an orgasm without this response, just as a man can ejaculate without an erection. A woman can be like the male premature ejaculator if she comes very quickly and is no longer desirous or interested in further sexual contact. Also, a woman can be very erectively potent, highly erotic and not be able to come the same as a man who keeps his hard-on forever but cannot come. A highly sexed woman will want to have several orgasms during a sexual encounter the same as a highly sexed man. Orgasm, from mild to intense, feels similar for both men and women. And so does getting turned on and not coming.

So why don't we let go of our fixed notions and ideas? Why don't we get our phallic symbols together and play that childhood game all over again, "I'll show you mine if you'll show me yours," and tell each other what feels good where and how and ask questions? Why don't we start an honest dialogue between the cunt and the cock?

Anatomy-wise, little girls and boys start off on the right track when they play. "I'll show you mine if you'll show me yours." It is not at all as Freud said: little girls don't feel that they are missing a penis. That was only what he felt. I definitely had "something" to show when I played that game. It was only much later that my "thing" became just a hole. I was being conditioned by the sex-negative system into its limited concept of womanhood, emphasizing procreation and repressing sexual gratification. I was told that I should dig the feelings "in there." The fact that there were no sensitive nerve endings "in there" was not taken into consideration. The fact that I seldom made orgasm in "Position A" (man on top) was rationalized and repressed. I could and did make it sometimes! Because my womanhood was at stake, "sometimes" was enough.

There is a dreadful inability of women and men to communicate their feelings and desires about their own sex preferences! I have had too many experiences with men who do not respond to verbal or acted-out preferences on my part. They simply are not accustomed to considering female sexual response as valid and important. In other words, they do not give a shit as long as they get their rocks off, even though they might ask (weakly): "Did you come?"

Presently, I am working on my freedom to "call off a bad fuck in progress." If my partner cannot handle my verbalizing or indicating my sexual preferences, then we are not sharing. He is "running the fuck" and because of his fragile male ego cannot "take turns." This is a difficult situation because I have had years of conditioning to please and to protect the male ego — even if it meant sacrificing my own sexual gratification. Equality of the sexes may have to start in the bedroom, and only then can we proceed to include the world at large.

Many years ago, I drew a picture of what I thought to be a phallic woman. She had a cock! I didn't understand that she already had a phallus of her own — her clitoris. The phallic woman need not be a negative concept; that is Freudian thinking. The passive, submissive, wife-mommy of the turned-off Victorian era is the arbitrary model of the so-called "proper" female role. The new phallic woman of the electronic age might simply be equal and free to determine her own role in society. She would be able to state her position and her pleasure. She would be able to do her own thing and make it in the world as an equal human phallic being. And men really need not be afraid! She would be a lot more fun to play with!

So here's to the phallus — mine and yours.

Betty Dodson is one of the foremost erotic artists in the United States, and several of her drawings were published in Erotic Art — Volumes I and II (ed. Kronhausen, Grove Press). She is also a staff artist on Screw Magazine (New York City), where this article originally appeared.

Oh Coward! is still a success

What accounts for the success of Oh Coward!, the elegant revue at the Theatre in the Dell? Spelled by a new cast, it moves toward its three hundredth sellout performance.

Not least is its lack of pretension. Ticket costs are low because there is no balconied mausoleum to keep up, no gaudy publicity, no elaborate sets or chic costumes. The players compress the atmosphere into the sparest of props (shopping bags, a cocktail glass, walking sticks), and use their intimacy with the audience to delightful advantage.

The audience, in kind, responds quickly and attentively. Jack Creely is its obvious favorite, charming with expressive mugging and a wide, wide smile. The evening's tempo is set by his vigorous showmanship. A less animated man would leave the show a bit flat, sluggish; three players like him would dash through a frenzied, overdone performance.

Gordon Thomson is as debonair as a Mayfair boy in the 'twenties might hope to be; indeed, his nonchalance goes beyond the role and bleaches it of much colour. Even world-weariness can be underplayed.

Patricia Collins, like the third bowl of porridge, is just right, mixing a glacial sophistication with a slow charm. She is a good foil for the men — smoothing down Jack, complementing and strengthening Gordon. Her solos, like a beautifully done "Mad about the Boy", show her talent best.

Yet Noel Coward's effervescent dialogue and beguiling music, skilfully played, do not tell the whole success story. Toronto's enthusiasm has been in large share reserved for the cabaret format itself. Rather than sitting in silent, magnetized rows, one can sit around low tables, sip a drink, smoke. The frequent breaks between skits give one a moment to chat with friends; the two nightly shows can easily be made into an ice-breaking cocktail hour before a late dinner, or an elegant finale, replete with brandies, to an earlier one.

The evening is light, polished, and great fun, particularly in Jack's bravura piece "Marvellous Party". This sort of thing Toronto can do well, and its streets better than the contrived, imported comedies which regularly creak into the city. If we have more of them, and they are as good as Oh Coward!, Toronto will be lucky indeed.

Raw female reality seen in Honeymoon

The Honeyman Festival, by Marian Engel, Anansi, $2.50

Advertising tells us that the world of woman is all downy softness and sunlight slipping through the rich woods of Salem Country. For Marian Engel reality is sinking in a quagmire of dirty, overstuffed houses, food pasted on walls, and the acrid taste of a diaper pin. In her second novel, The Honeyman Festival, she superbly explores the raw reality of female existence.

Minn Burge is a thirty-seven year-old housewife bloated with a fourth accidental child, oppressed by a too-large house in downtown Toronto, and is always groping for the thread which maintains her sanity.

It is the day of the close of the film festival for the director Honeyman, a cult figure in the vein of Fuller or Corman. Minn is to host a party later in the evening, and with her husband away, her children entering and leaving the scene, and her hippy boarders simply existing, she thinks about her past and present life.

Born in a small Ontario town of WASP gentility with its accompanying politics, insanity, and scandal, she fled to University of Toronto and then to Europe. Adolescence provokes the fond memories and nostalgia of growth, but in Europe she flowers, for she meets Honeyman. Thirty-five years her senior, he teaches her about Life, and especially the pleasures of food and the mind. She loses her self-consciousness about her body, acts in his films, and lives with him for periods during five years.

Then she leaves him, meets her journalist husband, marries, and settles in Toronto. Housewife bliss is unimaginable after three children and eating leftovers and cleaning everpresent dust. Our first glimpse of her is in the bath, examining her pregnant body, and making the "small, sadistic gestures of women in imprisoned situations".

Through the day we move with her, as she analyzes her state. The hippies prompt her to think about freedom and self-discovery; a guest about orderliness and repression. The party brings old friends and new enemies, her housework triggers thoughts of physical existence, her body, her pregnancies, making love, and routine bodily functions.

All is not one-sided. She feels real accomplishment in her children and husband; her past has not overwhelmed her to such an extent that its glories warp her present. Rather Engel presents a complex portrait of Minn Women's Lib is machine-like rhetoric; Minn's salvation if it is possible, will be gaining more control over situation, not leaving it.

Engel's style is perfectly suited to her subject. Objects are presented not only as symbols, but also as triggers for thoughts, dreams, and memories. The prose is hard, concrete, and direct; a brevity and vividness creates an effect of poetry. The overall presentation is very similar to a film, with concrete images and scenes, fast cuts, and an impression which grows as ideas are added.

The supporting cast is only sketched; none is complete or real. Engel creates this impression possibly because everything is seen from Minn's viewpoint, but at times it is hard for the reader to sympathize with certain thoughts, for example about her husband, simply because we do not know if he is worth the devotion she gives him; he is too one-dimensional.

Minn, however, is as full and complete as a character can be. Engel bares her guts for all to see, and whether you get fed up with her rationalizing and bitching, or cheer her on when she expels all her fury irrationally, she will not be forgotten

Altamont: their satanic majesties' request

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

On December 6, 1969, the eleven o'clock news carried a brief story about a rock music concert at Altamont Raceway in California. Included was some footage of the usual crowds, noise, and scuffles to keep the fans off the stage. Ordinarily, such an event would not rate TV coverage. But this was a free show starring the Rolling Stones, who were about to conclude a highly successful tour of the United States. And oh yes, added the announcer, someone died during the Stones' set.

It was not until days later that the real truth began to sift through to the public. While Mick Jagger was singing "Under My Thumb", eighteen-year-old Meredith Hunter was repeatedly stabbed and then beaten to death by a group of Hell's Angels a scant 20 feet from the stage. Dozens of others were maimed by Angels using weighted pool cues as weapons and playing "catch" with full beer cans.

Now, a year later, the Maysles brothers have released their documentary film, Gimme Shelter, which offers highlights from the tour's inception all the way to its tragic finale. What emerges is a truly fascinating peek at what turned out to be the Rosemary's baby of rock festivals.

Well, we all need someone to bleed on, And if you want it,

Well, you can bleed on me.

Mick Jagger is the undisputed center of attention during the entire movie. He is shown dressing, practising, speaking to reporters and nonchalantly mugging for the cameras. At times he is photographed watching his own concerts on an editing machine. Throughout the performances, dressed in a tight-fitting black costume and swirling red cape, Jagger in appearance and gesture manages to hypnotize both his concert and movie-theater audiences.

The Maysles handle the Stones' anchor-man in a precise and efficient way, and are to be highly commended for not adopting a "gee whizz" idol-worship attitude. What could have become The Mick Jagger Story is in reality a close examination that allows the viewer to draw his own conclusions.

Another plus for Gimme Shelter is the incredibly good quality of the recorded music. Especially noteworthy are the renditions of "Satisfaction", "Wild Horses" and "Love in Vain" in which the Maysles brothers also use quick cutting, low angles, close-ups and slow motion in a clean, uncluttered manner.

I wanna see you painted, pointed black!

Black as night, black as cool -

I wanna see the sun blotted out from the sky.

But, like a Greek tragedian slowly making his way toward an inevitable, catastrophic conclusion, the Maysles finally point their cameras at Altamont. Gimme Shelter captures the mix-ups in location, the money hassles, the cold weather and the generally bad vibrations. Hell's Angels are recruited as security guards in order to keep fans off the stage. Their payment: all the beer they can drink. Fights break out early. Ambulance-helicopters begin to shuttle back and forth with unsettling regularity. The crowd is ready for violence.

During the Jefferson Airplane's set, Marty Balin jumps off the stage to break up a scuffle, only to be knocked unconscious. "What's going on?" screams Paul Kantner. "They're beating up on my lead singer!" The music comes in spurts, Grace Slick stopping every so often to plead, "Easy, easy. Take it easy."

And then it's time for the Rolling Stones. At first it seems as though the audience might settle down, but it's not long before the pool cues are flying again. A few Angels ride their motorcycles right through the crowd. Beer cans soar over people's heads. Then a particularly violent scuffle breaks out during "Sympathy For the Devil". Jagger is forced to stop on several occasions to beg for order, but it does not come. And when the Stones play the first chords of "Under My Thumb", the movie audience knows it will soon be all over.

No one is really sure why Woodstock worked out as well as it did. And it is hard, to say just why Altamont was such a colossal mess. The Maysles brothers justifiably, side-step this question, allowing the facts to speak for themselves, and the moviegoer to think for himself. By combining technical excellence with the proper balance of sensationalism and objectivity, the directors have created in Gimme Shelter the unerring documentation of a disaster.

It's so very lonely.

We're 2000 light-years from home.

Hanna's 'guide for perplexed' popularizes Marx, Reich

Bodies in Revolt
 Thomas Hanna
 Holt, Rinehart and Winston
 $8.50

It's hard to be entirely unsympathetic to a book which attends to vital ideas neglected in North American university curricula. When it's still possible to take a degree, even in the social studies, with little reading in Marx, Nietzsche, Reich and Merleau-Ponty, any book, even a popularizing one, which attempts to do these thinkers justice must be rather welcome.

But Hanna, concerned primarily with "somatic culture", doesn't convince us that his book is a sophisticated response to important arguments and questions; in fact, he gives us fair warning in the introduction: "Whether Bodies in Revolt is either a finished book or a scholarly book is indifferent to me. What is not a matter of indifference is that someone had to write a book of this kind that it had to be written soon. There have been few times in history when a nation was so in need of a Guide for the Perplexed." This prefacing statement also hints that a peculiarly American utopianism is to dominate the proceedings.

THE DIFFICULTY WITH THE BOOK lies not so much in its simplicity (excusable enough in a "primer") as in its promising by chapters and chapter headings a confrontation with other men's ideas which never satisfactory takes place.

The chapter titled "Merleau-Ponty, or Perception Leashed and Perception Unleashed" is a good example of what I mean. It begins with an unnecessary discussion of German turpitude in the styles of Merleau-Ponty and Claude Levi-Strauss; then after more digression Hanna asserts "Edmund Husserl gave phenomenology its characteristic form, Jean-Paul Sartre took a bath in it, leaving two rings around the tub, and Maurice Merleau-Ponty drew phenomenology out to its final limits and was about to complete and, thus, kill the movement when he, himself, died."

Considering that Husserl's last major work was published in English translation only last year and that most of Merleau-Ponty was not translated into English until the Sixties (while some has not yet been published in translation), it seems premature to autopsy the phenomenological movement. The rest of the chapter gives only a skeletal impression that Merleau-Ponty's work is primarily concerned with perception in terms of situations, and nothing is said about Merleau-Ponty's concern with the development of consciousness.

Hanna's emphasis is on the idea that "phenomenological consciousness is letting-it-be and letting-yourself-go." Characteristically, then, for Hanna's book another philosopher's work serves as both the authority for its arguments and as a casually used source of points which can be construed to his own ends.

THE MOST INTERESTING and disturbing parts of the work are the final chapters, in which Hanna puts forward in some detail his own arguments concerning the trend toward a somatic culture. A principal argument is that "we see how a technology developed for the benefit of man is murderously turned against man without reason" and that with adaptation to the new world we have created — through the cultural mutation of the soma, there emerges "an intact human being who is no longer distracted from the business of living with his fellows and with himself by the frightening presence of a non-human environment which threatens the non-survival of him and his fellows." This seems a typically American futurism without historical perspective; the value of the technologies and logics by which various cultures have attempted to master their profound sense of crisis has never been unambiguous.

What then, exactly, can Hanna mean when he writes of the development of "cultural traditions which would elevate men and enhance them?" Is he referring to a rather chaotic process or to the emergence of a rather complete and satisfying rationale, a uniculture to embrace the "global village"? The latter apparently, for further on, he argues "A major part of what psychologists, philosophers and other scientists and religionists have called the 'human spirit' is now being manufactured by I.B.M. . . . As soon as men get over their amazement at this surprising turn of events which computers represent, they will quickly settle into a profound indifference to computers and their functions: they will take these functions for granted, inasmuch as they will, as human beings, be engaged in other activities in which they are not called upon to be consciously rational."

IT SEEMS UNLIKELY that there is any such clear-cut division between acquired skills such as verbal techniques and the "consciously rational." At any rate, according to Hanna, the human mutants of the future will be able to spend more time at the task of self-knowledge, but it's difficult to understand what he thinks would make this task desirable or even necessary. Huxley posed the important questions about this kind of futurist thinking some time ago, and Bodies in Revolt is the poorer because it does not effectively take into account these questions.

Underlying this thought about the future is the cliché that the U.S. is the avant-garde and that other states must eventually experience American Sturm und Drang; the linearity of this historical outlook (if there is a definition of history which permits such a label) makes somewhat clearer how such diverse thinkers as Nietzsche, Marx, Camus, and Merleau-Ponty can be understood as helping forward yet another version of the history — and culture — transcending American Dream.

Aggregation art exhibit showing new, imaginative works by galley artists

Aggregation, at 73 Jarvis, is now showing works by gallery artists. Dik Zander draws inspiration from urban buildings for his plexiglass constructions, but by filling them with layers of coloured glycol, discovers beauty not readily apparent in the concrete originals.

An effective work is a paper-weight suggestive in shape of the Toronto City Hall, but lit in flowing curves by the glycol. His designs are also sold as pendants and rings.

Of the wall paintings, most powerful are the oils by Ed Bartram. By experimenting with the effect of oil paint over cord and carbon particles, he achieves a unique patterning which suggests primitive cell and atom formations.

The watercolours by Doreen Foster betray an intensive study of Rousseau, Beardsley and Chagall, but the sensitive, often hesitant use of line and the poetic mingling of colour raises the works beyond the level of mere imitations.

The art exhibit on the sixth floor of Sid Smith is mainly a fourth-year student effort, under the direction of Mr. Rifat. Janice Wilson's lavatory art and the twisting plastic transparencies of Kathy Stasko are solutions to the problem of plastic art using soft canvas.

Susan Mason's canvas, based on the golden section, is both ably and imaginatively accomplished. The highlight of the exhibit, however, is a kinetic design by a second year student which combines foam rubber and fluorescent paint for explosive effect.

The dos and don'ts of PhD gamesmanship - from experts

Academic Gamesmanship (Pierre van den Berghe, Abelard/Schuman, $5.95) and Confessions of an American Scholar (Simon O'Toole, Copp Clark, $1.95) are two disgusting books, the former about how to make your Ph.D. work for you, and the latter by and about a man whose Ph.D., unfortunately, did.

Van den Berghe, a sociologist, has codified with Machiavellian honesty the unwritten laws by which academicians rate, advance and retard each other. For those of us genuinely interested in taking higher orders in the academic church, this is the book to read each night before sleep, as Mussolini read The Prince.

"Cultivate departmental secretaries," Van den Berghe tells graduate students. "Unless some professor hit on the idea before you, you may find it rewarding to take them to dinner and bed, but be discreet about it." Advice to young professors follows — why, where and how to publish, how often to quit jobs and how to move up the departmental ladder, ever dickering skillfully for the ecstasy of prestige, a higher salary and a lighter teaching load.

The jacket of this book has a really fatuous comment about the author's purpose: "His broad experience as a professor has aroused his concern over the rules for advancement on the university campus. Dr. van den Berghe has written Academic Gamesmanship expressly to help to help young professors either to change these rules or, if this is impossible, to use them to win deserved advancement."

That is irrelevant nonsense. Almost entire book, whatever its purpose, is a bitter and brilliantly ironic anatomy of academic politics, with a few decorous afterthoughts in favour of change. The only positive thing Van den Berghe can say about the campus is that it's not so crazy (yet) as the rest of the world, and when he looks about him at the yahos and ostriches, he isn't even sure about that.

Simon O'Toole is the pen-name of one of the few American scholars who knows how to write. He starts from his undergraduate career, which he began thirty years ago because he could not think of anything better to do. He has been reading, publishing and "teaching" since, and admits to having been engulfed by boredom and an acute sense of the folly of his ways.

IT HAPPENS! IT HAPPENS! HE GOT HIS PH.D. AT THE AGE OF THIRTY-FOUR! He moved, he strove, he farted around for years at a dull thesis which some other idiot read approvingly, and which he himself later improved upon by editing the letters of the same obscure author he'd originally scribbled about.

O'Toole's excruciating book is a brave one; just because he admits everything, he can also excoriate. He's "learned" and so can say, "you contemplate so-and-so who has read all the Elizabethan plays and knows Latin. A piece of decayed flesh he is, a trained ass. Do you not believe that a lot of learning is the devil's own instrument?" (Fear not; he has similar words for pompous ignorance, of which there is obviously enough about.)

Of course O'Toole is a liberal, has had the proper attitude toward Joe McCarthy, has advised students to burn draft cards, hopes blacks don't get attached to geggaws or mindless white hopes, out of schools or in them.

He offers a few sane and hopeless alternatives to the present academic confusion: let the student direct most of his own research; let tenure be automatic, after the doctorate; let there be stringent restrictions on academic publishing, for which there shall be verily no reward save the joy of the work itself.

With Carl Rogers' Freedom to Learn and the scattered polemics of Ivan Illich, these two books display the most piercing insight I have found into contemporary "higher education."

Help!

There will be a meeting of review staffers next Tuesday (January 19) at 1 p.m. in the review office, for the purpose of choosing a new co-ordinating editor for the Varsity review section, and for discussing this term's review section.

For a small weekly honorarium, the review editor will have to make sure copy comes in weekly for the Wednesday review section of the Varsity and for Friday's Watsup page. He or she will also be responsible for laying out both the reviews and Watsup, each week.

Prior experience in layout is helpful, but not necessary. Knowledge and enthusiasm about the lively arts is most welcome.

Lesson of Winter Pop

Winter Pop, the Maple Leaf Gardens New Years' Eve rock festival, succeeded in terms of music, spirit, and attendance. But it heavily underlined the need for an open-air setting for the extended rock concert.

A nine-hour hard rock festival is enough to tax the stamina of even the most avowed fan. But lying on the grass, picnicking or strolling about more than makes up for the dull moments in the programme. Unfortunately none of these were possible in Maple Leaf Gardens. No one can be blamed for this situation, as Winter Pop was well staged, lit and organized. However, what was merely a fairly good show could have been an excellent concert in the right surroundings.

Physical conditions aside, Winter Pop offered excellent entertainment for a reasonable price. Particularly good were the James Gang, Chilliwack (sounding at times like Jethro Tull and Santana) and the imitable Sha-Na-Na.

But no one could touch Johnny Winter and And. Appearing at 11:45, Winter played to a highly receptive audience until 1:30. After 15 minutes of fairly slow blues, he brought in the New Year with an electrifying rendition of "Jumpin' Jack Flash" that would put the Stones to shame. From then on it was a mixed bag of old rock 'n' roll and material from Winter's latest album

Varsity staffer wins post

Anne Boody, former renowned Supplement Editor of The Varsity, was elected to the position of Regional Western Field Secretary for Canadian University Press.

Elections took place at CUP's annual conference during the holiday. Boody was one of three candidates running for this position.

CUP employs a national field secretary, plus three regional ones, one for the West, the Maritime provinces, and Ontario. They roam the countryside seeking out member papers in need of assistance in any aspect of production.

Boody is highly qualified for this position, with three years experience on The Varsity, and one summer with the Toronto Star.

Remarkd one Varsity staffer: "I think it's great. Heh, heh."

RCMT a "surefire" show

By IAN "REVIEW" MACLAREN

Following in the caterwauling footfalls of Dan McGurk and Dudley Do-right, and with such heartwarming and eye-catching lines as "Chayunga acin uwanga naluvit", Captain Frank Masi and his highly polished troupe of mounted and not so mounted performers open their fourth production at the UC Playhouse (79a St. George St.) tonight.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Theatre, sporting the audience alluring "Always Free" spirit that made the RCMP such a favourite, presents a programme that is sure to tingle your spine in a rare moment of effusive nationalistic fervour, paralleled only by that favourite snapshot mom took of you in a Mountie's arms when you were in Ottawa as an anklebiter.

The RCMT had its incipience last fall when it was realized that only a very serious appraisal of marshmallow courses could rescue the Combined Departments of English from its sticky situation.

Initially billed as incidental entertainment, the RCMT performances grew to be one of the more worthwhile points on the agenda of the Combined Departments of English meetings.

Its reputation spreading rapidly; it was not long before the RCMT graduated from an incidental agenda point into a formidable theatre group. In late November SRO audiences acclaimed the troupe's production of Brecht's "The Exception and the Rule".

And as sure as December precedes January the RCMT accepted invitations to perform "The Life of Antoin Artaud" at Trinity College and the UC Playhouse late last year.

This week's production, the RCMT's first of the new year, is in the words of 'Dud' a surefire. The guest artist Milton Eagle highlights the show with his poignant and thought provoking rendition of the "Falling Eagle Dance".

Originality does not escape the RCMT; before your very real eyes will be presented "Eskimo Dan's story of how the men of a certain village put their women in their proper place", an original Hollywood theme and to say the least a nifty little ditty which in no particular manner relates to the show stopper, "The Green Corn Dance" wherein the head dancer's attention is focused on the pot.

For your listening pleasure, a once-in-a-lifetime live performance of a genuine Eskimo Weather Chant sung by the RCMT choir (apparently cast-offs from the RCMP women's auxiliary songsters) has been strategically added to the programme.

And for all you perverts, the unsung legendary tale of the "Dwarf Who Gave Caribou", an unheralded lesson in unreciprocated generosity in the northland, will be played.

With such never before and holy frote skits to grace the UC Playhouse stage for the next four nights at 8:30 p.m., it would seem unfathomable to the ordinary Toronto theatre-goer that this RCMT production will be admissionless.

On the strength of outstanding technological resources of the RCMT which include blankets, dead branches and old hockey pucks, you're bound to see a very worthwhile evening of theatre.

You'll weep at tear jerkers like, "Sure hope those cheeseburgers are cooked this time", and find yourself sitting on the edge of your stall when you hear, "The giant carries the man in and props him up by the entrance (to thaw)."

Detainees featured at OCE

Jacques Larue-Langlois, one of the "Montreal Five" who are facing trial for seditious conspiracy, will be at the College of Education Sunday.

Langlois and singer Pauline Julien, whose children were arrested under the War Measures Act and later released, are keynote speakers at the rally sponsored by the Emergency Committee for the Defence of Political Rights in Quebec.

Also on the speaking list are Gerald Godin, editor of the radical weekly Quebec Presse who was arrested and later released during the Quebec repression, Ursula Franklin a professor of metallurgy at U of T and Clayton Ruby, member of the Law Union.

Langlois is the first person seriously charged as a result of the Quebec crisis to get out of jail. The other members of the Montreal Five have been in jail since the invocation of the WMA early on the morning of Oct. 17.

The Emergency Committee is calling for an end to the trials, repeal of the Public Order Act and freeing of all political prisoners in Quebec.

The Hockey Canada Tournament

Lyndon Little
VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

Hockey Canada, a much-publicized government corporation with a federal mandate to clean up our national game, blew a bundle of the taxpayers' loot over the holidays sponsoring college hockey tournament.

FORTUNATELY, FOR THOSE OF US who like college hockey, government bodies are not easily discouraged by such minor matters, so plans are under way for more of the same next season — only on an even bigger scale!

"The final figures haven't been completely tallied as yet," said Hockey Canada's Secretary-Treasurer, Chris Lang, yesterday morning from their plush headquarters on the 48th floor of the TD center. "However, my estimation is that we'll come out about $10,000-$15,000 in the red."

"But we don't like to call it a loss," he quickly added. "We prefer to consider it 'an investment.'"

THE TOURNAMENT was held in two sections. Blues, Laurentian, York and Calgary here in Toronto; Loyola, Sherbrooke, Laval and St. Mary's University in Montreal. Loyola defeated York in the final played at Maple Leaf Gardens.

Undaunted, tentative Hockey Canada plans call for four regional tournaments next Christmas. One will be out west (probably Winnipeg), one here in Toronto again, one in Montreal and another in Halifax. Regional winners would play off for the national title.

But, hockey Canada has come in line for some criticism over their handling of this year's tournament.

Paul Arseneault, coach of the Sir George Williams Georgians, was especially vocal about the way the Eastern Section of the tourney was organized. For one thing, he felt his team should have been included.

Ed Enos, athletic director at Loyola, suggested that he would like to see an European team invited to participate.

THE OFFICIAL HOCKEY CANADA REACTION, however, was one of quiet optimism. President Charles Hay commented: "We'd always like to see bigger crowds out to tournaments like this. But the main purpose is to see Canadian college hockey players get more ice time. Some of these kids are good, but they don't get the required ice time to make it in pro hockey."

The Varsity Sports Department takes this position on the Hockey Canada Invitational Hockey Tournament:

(1) — We heartily endorse Hockey Canada's efforts to support and improve Canadian college hockey, through both their scholarship program for needy shiny athletes and through tournament sponsorship.

(2) — Advance promotion for the tournament was virtually absent. This was clearly reflected in the attendance figures. However, with proper prior publicity the tourney should built momentum from year to year to the point where, hopefully, it should carry itself financially.

(3) — Dates, either just before Christmas or early in January, would be more suitable. Also, the tournament dates should be expanded to permit an open day for travel and recuperation for the sectional winners.

THE "NOW WE DON'T FEEL SO BAD" DEPARTMENT: Blues aren't the only top-ranked hockey team suffering an upset. Loyola Warriors, fresh from their Christmas season success were surprised in their own rink by the lightly-regarded RMC Redmen. The score? Same as Blues loss to Windsor, 6-4.

JOCK TALK. Waterloo's hockey Warriors, Blues main league rival, had mixed luck over the holidays. They emerged as the winners of the First Annual Queen's Invitational Tournament. But in the process, they lost the services of their fine winger, Cam Crosby, with a badly broken leg. Crosby, a veteran of OHA Junior "A" play with the Marlies and Kitchener Rangers, was also Waterloo's starting quarterback for the majority of the grid season. Coach Bob McKillop's reaction: "We'll still beat Toronto without Cam!" ... Bert Olmstead, former NHL player with Canadiens and Leafs and then coach of the Oakland Seals, has resigned as the hockey coach of Mount Royal College in Calgary.

The Reflector, MRC's student journal, reports: "Bert Olmstead views on hockey, and those of the MRC players did not coincide. It appears that Olmstead's driving desire to win, developed through long association with pro hockey, began to colour his approach to his players'."

... Jane O'Hara, first-year Varsity arts student and rising tennis star, is currently on a six-week world tour sponsored by the Canadian Lawn Tennis Federation. O'Hara, 19, is the current Ontario Open Ladies singles champion and was the only Canadian to compete at Wimbledon last year. She anchored Varsity's WITCA championship net team of last fall.

Swim girls triumphant

The University of Toronto hosted the First Annual Women's Invitational Swim Relay Meet last Saturday and overwhelmed the opposition with victories in six of the eight events, compiling a point total of 66.

Western placed second with 32 points; Guelph third with 30; then McMaster with 28 and York with 18.

Kathy Smith, Randy Croome, Liz Daniel, and Merrily Stratten linked to win both the 200-yard Freestyle Relay and the 400-yard Free Relay events with times of 1:59.0 and 4:25.5, well ahead of their opposition. Liz and Merrily then combined with Tandy Adkins to win the Individual Medley Relay over Western by a five-second margin.

In the 300-yard Backstroke Relay, Randy anchored the team of Janice Hines and Joan Dolson to victory and a narrow eight-second margin over Guelph. Merrily and Joan teamed up with Vicky Porter and Frances Flint in the 200-yard Fly for a time of 2:20.4 and first-place.

The last event of the day was the 300-yard Breaststroke Relay and a tired Toronto squad finished fourth.

Congratulations are in order to coach Sue Kinnear and the remainder of the team and also to those who assisted with the running of the meet.

BILL L'HEUREUX Blues head for London tomorrow night in an unfamiliar role; they're trying to break a two-game losing streak. Coach Tom Watt will be counting heavily on veteran defenseman Bill L'Heureux to help lead the team out of its current slump.

Curlers to Saskatoon

Varsity curlers maintained their phenomenal record intact in games played through the holidays, as entries in the Ontario Junior Winter Games, the Brock Bonspiel, and a Men's Bonspiel at Milton were undefeated.

The Club now has a season total of 21 wins and a single loss, the latter coming when two Toronto rinks met at the Mohawk College Bonspiel.

In the Ontario Winter Games, John Francis skipped his team to five wins over Renfrew, North Bay, Thunder Bay, Kapuskasing, and McMaster University to win the gold medals and a trip to Saskatoon in February for the Canada Winter Games. Playing with him were Bob Hollingshead, Greg Reid, and Paul Slocombe. The same team, with Gary Howsam replacing Reid, won three straight at Brock last Saturday. But they came second behind Waterloo because of a lower points spread in their wins over Laurentian, McMaster, and Brock.

At Milton, a rink skipped by Gary Thaler took top prize by beating entries from Burlington, Bolton, and Leamington Curling Clubs. The team, which included Craig Burch, Doug Paterson, and Dave Richardson, was warming up for play in the Governor-General's Competition, which will involve a double-rink entry of Thaler and Francis.

Doors smashed outside Clerk gets closed hearing

By BOB GAUTHIER

The front door at 215 Huron St. was smashed Wednesday afternoon as demonstrators tried to push past police into a hearing over the firing of library worker Patricia Garcia.

The hearing at 215 Huron ended with the university and the Canadian Union of Public Employees, which represents library clerical workers, declining to make a decision. The hearing was over the firing of Garcia on Dec. 29 for "insubordination." She had refused to take on extra duties without a pay raise.

Earlier that afternoon The Canadian Party of Labour had held a rally for Garcia in the lobby of Sigmund Samuel Library before proceeding to 215 Huron St. The rally was cordoned off by a chain of U of T police at the top of the lobby stairs.

At 215 Huron the people who had joined the rally were not allowed into the building. The front doors were locked and both plain clothes and uniformed police were positioned within the building.

When the doors were unlocked to let Garcia in for her hearing, attempts were made by the members of the rally to enter the building. Pushing and shoving occurred and one of the glass doors was broken.

The rally then moved on to the library where students entered an administrative office and demanded that Garcia be rehired. Extra police were requested by the cops at the library. According to Garcia the hearing which was closed to the press produced no results at all. John Parker, manager of labour relations for the university, and Frank Kitchen of CUPE are the mediators in the dispute.

Kitchen said that he is expecting to hear from the university today.

In a prepared statement issued last night, Chief Librarian Robert Blackburn maintained that the disciplinary action was correct.

CUA proposes hike in graduate fees of $315 by next year

If recommendations of the Commission on University Affairs are accepted, fees for graduate students may rise to $750 for a full year from the present $435.

In a letter sent on Monday to all university presidents in Ontario, the Commission outlined recommendations for what it called "adjustments" to the graduate financing program.

The fund for Ontario Graduate Fellowships will be cut from five million dollars to 3.5 million dollars next year.

Dean W. D. Baines of the School of Graduate Studies predicts that as a result of this cut, U of T will have to reduce the number of their $1500 graduate fellowships offered next year by 250.

The CUA also recommends that undergraduate enrollment be increased by 10 per cent in all Ontario universities.

The fee hike may arise from the recommendation of the CUA. A cut in the government per capita grant will leave the university with the option of either raising fees, or absorbing the extra cost, in a time of shrinking budgets.

Under the new CUA formula, a graduate who makes over $1800 per year for "teaching or light duties" will receive only one-third the present formula grant from the province. Baines said the university may have to count these students as only part time students, because of the loss in revenue.

Since a PhD candidate requires a total of three full years in residence, the new formula will keep some students in graduate school for nine years instead of the normal three.

"It's sort of like a poker game," said Baines, referring to the report, "and that (the CUA letter) is the first card."

Baines said that U of T will do nothing until the Committee of Presidents of the Universities of Ontario, meeting today in London studies the recommendations.

The universities have only until next Wednesday to reply to the CUA.

Education Minister William Davis will be meeting with officials of the CUA, CPUO and the Canadian Union of Graduate Students, within 10 days.

At a meeting with Davis in Windsor Tuesday, CUGS president Wayne Yared discounted reports of a strike among graduate students to protest the report

60 more strikers get eviction notices

By BRIAN BANNON

Approximately 60 more students received eviction notices Tuesday to bring the total to well over 100 in the Married Students Residence fight against Ontario Housing. Only a handful of the 131 students striking for rent reductions have not received evictions.

John Carland of the Tenants Association says, "The only reason they haven't got around to everyone is Montreal Trust's incompetent bookkeeping."

In an attempt to bring about negotiations between OHC and the strikers, the Tenants Association has requested the University to recognize its responsibility to its students and take a stand on the issue. At a Monday meeting with Wymm Kent, the president's special advisor on housing, the tenants asked for an official statement on the University's policy towards:

• tenant control (i.e. negotiations between landlords and tenant associations);

• the eviction tactics of OHC;

• the University's willingness to fill vacancies if the evictions actually take place;

• how OHC interprets "full recovery" (i.e. to what extent is OHC a profit-making organization).

On Wednesday, when Simcoe Hall has promised to make public their statement, the tenants plan to organize a mass meeting of students to bear witness. According to John Carland, "The students will then judge where the University's true loyalties lie: OHC landlords or the people."

Any students interested in helping the tenants efforts to mobilize campus support, can meet in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall at 10:30 Monday morning.

Patriots to be at OCE

Jacques Larue-Langlois, one of the "Montreal Five" scheduled to stand trial for seditious conspiracy, will speak this Sunday at 2 pm at the Ontario College of Education, 371 Bloor St. W.

His subject will be: "What's Behind The Quebec Political Trials" Other speakers will include Pauline Julien, Guy Marcoliaif, Gerald Godin, Dr. Ursula Franklin, Clayton Ruby. Day care will be provided.

Crowded? It's school

The January 8, 1971 summary of Senate minutes reports that the University of Toronto is full of 26,591 full-time and 9,573 part-time students for the Winter session. This is a total increase of 247

(0.9%) full-time students and 1,344 (16.3%) part-time students over the same date last year. Now, how small do you feel, you "ole number you?"

Prof found teaching at two universities

VANCOUVER (CUP) — A Simon Fraser University prof has resigned from two positions after his moonlighting was exposed in the campus newspaper. But the credibility of that university's administration has again been shaken.

The Peak disclosed that Gordon Eastwood, a tenured prof in Simon Fraser's education faculty had accepted a full time teaching position at the University of Washington this term while scheduled to teach full time at SFU.

Eastwood had threatened to sue the paper, but has now resigned his position at the University of Washington, as well as the position as head of SFU's social and philosophical foundations.

Eastwood has been receiving $22,500 per year from the Canadian university and a prospective salary of about $12,000 from the U of W.

According to the Peak, the moonlighting has been going on for some time. During the 1969 summer and fall semesters Eastwood went on a research leave from Simon Fraser. During that time, he worked for the U of W as well as the University of Minnesota and Sir George Williams. Eastwood has not published since he came to SFU in 1965.

Meanwhile, Dr. John Leggett of the Political Science, Sociology and Anthropology (PSA) Department was told that his contract would be terminated following charges by SFU administration president Kenny Strand that Leggett had been moonlighting.

Leggett taught at the University of Connecticut in 1968-1969 — not while on paid research leave, but while on an unpaid leave of absence.

Eastwood however was granted tenure by the SFU administration in August, 1969. Leggett lost his job. But then, Leggett has long been known as one of Simon Fraser's PSA radicals.

McMaster may end exams

McMaster University may adopt a degree program based on individual study and a final presentation of some creative work, e.g., a thesis, novel or film.

Traditional exams and lectures as staples of undergraduate university education would be abolished.

These radical changes were presented in a special committee's report, the product of a two-year investigation of undergraduate education, and somewhat similar to the MacPherson Report released at the U of T two years ago.

The MacPherson Report advocates a first year program of two-fifths to three-fifths of supervised but independent study by all students. The rest of the studies would be designed by each faculty with flexible requirements.

After second year, students could choose between continued independent study, or two or three years more of structured studies.

The structured studies would still be done in small groups, with at least three pass-fail courses, and a minimum of 40 per cent choice in subject matter.

The MacPherson Report at the U of T was responsible for abolishing the honour course, pass courses, course requirements beyond pre-requisites, and allowing each department to decide on final exams after first year.

The report had recommended the complete elimination of second year exams in favor of a third year comprehensive, and a limitation on the number of lectures per week. Neither reform was accepted.

C. B. MacPherson, Political Economy professor and author of the report, commented that the idea of free study for undergraduates as suggested by the MacPherson report is excellent, but financially unworkable.

MacPherson also said that the various interdisciplinary courses at the U of T show a more practical movement toward freer study.

Search Committee snubs SAC

By ART MOSES

The Students Administrative Council is protesting the fact that it was not consulted over election procedures for the search committee to choose a successor to U of T president Claude Bissell.

Composition of and elections to the 13-man committee were announced unilaterally by the Board of Governors on Monday.

SAC President Rod Hurd termed the Board's action "a bad precedent."

"We want a written assurance from Simcoe Hall that this won't happen again."

"In this way the President's Council could have simply run its own student elections after SAC withdrew its representatives from the body," Hurd said. In November SAC walked off the Council when it refused to allow student representatives to be directly appointed by SAC.

Hurd said SAC had agreed to sit on a Simcoe Hall elections committee only if students were consulted before student elections were called.

"But students were not involved in any of the procedures which led up to the announcement of elections for the search committee," Hurd said.

Meanwhile prospective candidates for the committee have been obtaining nomination forms from the office of Vice President and Registrar Robin Ross.

One undergraduate has already applied for the committee.

An office spokesman said workers have been busy establishing constituencies for the elections scheduled for February 1, 2, and 3.

Nominations close January 25 according to the election plans announced by the Board of Governors.

The committee slated to consist of 3 faculty, 2 undergraduates, 1 graduate, 2 administrators, 3 Board of Governors members, 2 alumni, and Chancellor Omund Solandt will help select a new U of T president from among the cream of Canada's academic crop.

Names frequently mentioned as being in the running for the presidency include Carleton University president Davidson Dunton, Queen's president John Deutch, and University of Calgary president Fred Carrothers.

U of T names considered as possibilities are Faculty of Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen and Engineering faculty Dean J. M. Ham.

Gordon says nothing new

By Bro Jon Gordon (beh heh)

Celebrated former Liberal party economist Walter Mitty spoke here Thursday afternoon at Sid Smith in support of and to enlist membership in the Committee for an Independent Canada.

Varsity contributor Art Moses expressed disappointment in Walters presentation saying that, "He seemed tired."

Photographer David Lloyd reflected this impression describing the talks as "Hohum."

When questioned, Mr. Walter suggested he was unfamiliar with the recent Helter and Kelso book entitled, "Two Factor Theory: The Economics of Reality". He was generally liberal as well as liberal-ly general.

Although his own modest proposals on taxation were rejected by the government Walter did not seem to feel any need for a revolution. Oh well . . .

Alberta campus cops' lack of power sparks complaints, suspension

EDMONTON (CUP) — Eleven constables in the patrol section of the University of Alberta's campus security force have been relieved of their normal duties as of Tuesday because of a disagreement over the functions and management of campus securities.

One of the men has been fired, and the remaining ten have been asked to resign or "termination proceedings" will be initiated against them.

The suspension came after the police contacted the Edmonton Journal to air their grievances, in contravention of the regulation prohibiting them from talking to the press.

The men expressed dissatisfaction at the lack of specific guidelines and regulations for the force. While these constables are authorized by the provincial Attorney General as special constables carrying all the powers of a peace officer, they claim they have been instructed not to take any action on what they feel are serious legalities.

By ignoring these offences they claim they are violating their mandate under the Alberta Police Act. The constables felt that the university would be wiser to hire commissionaires to perform the duties of the present force, writing parking tickets and acting as night watchmen.

Seven of the eight constables interviewed had previous training and experience in civilian policing. All said that they would return to the force if it were reorganized as a regular police force.

So far the powers and procedures of the force have been exercised totally at the discretion of the administrative official responsible, presently D. G. Tyndall.

The U of A non-academic staff association is backing the suspended constables. They have demanded that the men be reinstated. They also asked that Tyndall personally revise the campus security regulations and issue them as university policy until the law and order committee of students, faculty, and administrators, submit a report.

Faculty gets compromise

Pol Ec course evaluations stumble on

By JEANBUBBA

Course union evaluations in political economy are continuing despite a four week delay prompted by departmental objections to questionnaire format.

Facing a possible loss of their $600 honoraria and co-operation with staff in giving up class time, course union members met with department representatives to discuss the evaluation issue.

Past evaluations consisted of tedious questionnaires in which students were asked to punch out computer cards for up to 64 questions. In other years, almost intranslatable tables of statistics were published.

Last year, students were asked to submit a short critique along with their analyzed data. According to the PECU, the results of this were quite successful and went on to, in their words, "humanize the process."

This year the PECU proposed that individual classes select their own method of evaluation, ranging from questionnaires to group discussions.

But the Political Economy Department objected.

J. S. Dupre, departmental chairman described last year's evaluation as "a half-assed job", according to Bennett, the PECU Chairman. Instead, he proposed an across the board questionnaire.

At one point in the ensuing four weeks of meetings, Prof. A. Kruger recommended the services of a professional consultant in composing a basic questionnaire. The suggestion was dropped immediately.

On the recommendation of the CUG Report it was finally decided that evaluations be standardized to ensure an equal basis of comparison of professors. In addition to this, an appendix containing statistical results of the questionnaires financed by the department, would be added to the evaluation booklet to counter-balance the student critique.

Although PECU plans to retain individual course evaluations selections, they agreed to administer the short questionnaire recommended as a supplement.

Despite the agreement, the month of discussions has hampered work of the PECU.

"We had only one week left to do evaluations on half courses and courses with more than one professor teaching," said Bennett

"Because Dupre did not grant class time for these evaluations, it will mean that twice as much time will be demanded from second term professors to conduct evaluations in April," he said.

SAC Education Commissioner, Bob Spencer, said that he was "unaware of any other departmental course unions running into a similar problem."

Bennett also said that Dupre is "very much in favour of course union evaluations in general. He says that the department could find them useful in the hiring, firing, and promotion of professors."

But Dupre did not find last year's evaluations useful.

PECU feels the battle nearly destroyed the small amount of co-operation existing between students and faculty in Political Economy.

For the course union people, the implementation of CUG recommendations on the questionnaire is ironic in the light of departmental reduction of parity, the heart of CUG.

The PECU is willing to follow departmental advice, but "we are not willing to compromise the compromise," said Bennett.

Bold patriots spring to arms

The Canadian government can move very swiftly and effectively to bar American penetration into Canada.

They demonstrated this very clearly this week.

Even with the Prime Minister off in Asia mediating international crises, (daintily, mind you, for he wouldn't want anyone to mention Canada's more than $300 million a year arms sales to the U.S. military), they could still carry it off.

It didn't take much.

Why Immigration Minister Otto Lang did it all by his lonesome self, although presumably with the acquiescence and support of the cabinet.

It was Lang, the Canadian patriot, who singlehandedly issued the ruling which barred Yippie leader Abbie Hoffman, from entering the country.

Hoffman was planning to be interviewed for a TV program at the University of Western Ontario, and (horrors!) accept a speaking invitation from Dalhousie University students in Halifax.

Lang took a strong stand against this kind of Yankee imperialism, suggesting the moral fibre of our nation's youth might be threatened by Hoffman's visit.

"Mr. Hoffman," Lang observed shrewdly earlier this week, "didn't behave himself particularly well the last time he was here."

Lang also explained that the immigration laws bar the entry of anyone convicted of a criminal offence involving "moral turpitude."

Lang failed to explain why the federal government did not act last September to forbid Hoffman's visits to Alberta, since at that time Hoffman's legal status — a convicted conspirator, out on bail, and appealing his conviction — was the same as it is now.

That's why it strikes us that perhaps this turn-about in federal government policy reflects a very basic new direction in Canada's official attitude towards Americans who are attempting to penetrate (and even overtake) our country.

We greet this new direction enthusiastically and can only offer a number of hints on how to pursue it with vigour:

- they could, perhaps just for starters end the two-year income tax holiday American professors entering Canada now receive,

- later, they might take steps to end the special tax privileges, such "Canadian" publications as Time and Readers' Digest happily enjoy,

- if it wasn't pushing things a bit too much, we might request that they buy back Ryerson Press, the late lamented Canadian firm, and put it squarely back in the hands of good Canadian capitalists.

The suggestions are endless.

We could go on for a long time enumerating various steps that would make Canadians proud to live in such a strong and independent nation.

But the best idea would be for everybody to write down their own suggestions and mail them in. That way, the government, led on by patriotic personality of the week Otto Lang, can know what's really needed, where and when.

85% quota system 'not revolutionary'

The 85% Canadian Quota Campaign ostensibly strives for Canadian self-determination. If we examine the particular nature of the campaign's demands however, aside from the anti-imperialist rhetoric, the issue is found to be tainted with what Lenin termed "national culture": i.e. bourgeois liberal nationalism.

A demand for a minimum of 85% Canadian citizens in university teaching positions will do nothing towards strengthening Canada if the majority of those 85% are as reactionary as their petty-bourgeois American counterparts. A capitalist Canada remains the handmaiden of U.S. Imperialism, assimilated or "independent". By whom are Canadian students taught to "worship the empire" (re: Larry Haiven, CQC Chairman. The context indicates the British Empire.)? Does applying for Canadian citizenship necessarily "show a certain commitment" to Canada? (The Canada of Pierre Elliott Trudeau?)

If in 1968, 86% of teaching positions went to foreign citizens, a crying lack of qualified Canadians is indicated. To expand, Canadian education absolutely requires large numbers of foreign professors. The essential problem is this: weeding out the reactionaries and fighting for the admittance of valid radicals.

The Paris Commune of 1871 set the standard for all oppressed peoples. The French workers accepted into their ranks revolutionaries from many countries. The Minister of Labor was a German although the Prussian Army camped on the gates of Paris; the military commander was a Pole. The criteria is revolutionary commitment, not "national culture" citizenship.

Alden comes back for final remarks

I feel compelled to make some response to the barrage of letters the Varsity has printed in response to my letter published Nov. 25 in which I attempted to put some inane remarks made by some women's liberationists in perspective.

I do not wish to further the discussion with these frantic women. I said what had to be said and my statement stands.

However, since the outrageous innuendoes about me have been of an extremely personal nature — the women writers attempting vainly to humiliate me — I feel that I must be given some opportunity to clear up any misunderstandings which may have resulted from the publication of these vile attacks against me.

In their attempts to enlighten the world these women have distorted my views to an amazing degree. Let me say this by way of clarification. I think women should fulfill themselves in any manner they choose, sexually or otherwise. If a woman doesn't like the sex act, she shouldn't be forced to "feign pleasure" as one of the writers said almost all women do. I do not degrade women. In fact I think I spoil them too much (equality of sexes should have a beneficial effect on my wallet).

Maybe these women are correct, maybe the old sexual values are no longer relevant; if so, maybe the "crime" of masturbation of which I was accused by several of them will solve the problem... sexual polarization, peaceful coexistence. To be perfectly frank, if all women turn out to be like the authors of these letters, I would be in favour of society's adoption of homosexuality as the norm. Let me underline the fact that I do not think this will happen and I'm not queer yet.

My original remarks were flavoured with the acrid wit for which I am well known; perhaps I should have realized that the type of people I opposed are devoid of a sense of humour and would leap at the opportunity to twist my statements as fuel for their hysteria.

I don't think these particular girls are what you'd call "sick" — just a little too eager to promote their sexuality (I confess, I could conceivably be accused of the same thing). I am too much of a gentleman to attack them personally (seduction, maybe) as they were low enough to do to me. Let me thank them for their warm, maternal concern for me. Marta, may you whip sprout roses; Adasia, may your stud inherit a million; Linda, may a lecherous Buddha suck your toes; and to all the rest of you, may you have an orgasm before you're thirty. Good bye.

The false myth of the vaginal orgasm

I picked up a stray copy of The Varsity on the subway the other day and was indeed surprised at the change in content from my day, 20 years ago, to this.

On the back page in the current copy was a dissertation on the pros and cons of female orgasms. The writer of the article contended that women indeed can have a clitoral orgasm with or without the aid of a male — and for this she can personally vouch.

But she questions the existence of a vaginal orgasm and quoted from various recent publications to prove her point.

I have not read the books in question, but like the writer of the article I feel I can bring personal experience to bear. I am a 43-year-old housewife (a dirty word in today's English), happily married to one of those self-satisfied SPS (School of Practical Science — now known as Engineering — ed.) graduates.

To today's young women I can emphatically state "Yes, Virginia, there really is a vaginal orgasm."

I feel sorry for you, who have access to all the technical books, and the freedom to try out your newfound knowledge and yet still remain physically and emotionally unsatisfied.

In a normal relationship one doesn't have to scream or squirm or in any other way feign to your mate that you are experiencing a vaginal orgasm. He knows it, he can feel it too! Let me warn you that all the techniques derived from books cannot produce it. It comes quite naturally and regularly to a man and a woman who love each other deeply and have the time and desire to develop their relationship beyond the moment.

That is why that antiquated way of life "marriage" is not such a bad idea after all.

Name withheld by request.

Explosives come in small packets

The editorial for Monday January 11 is a most effective way of politicizing readers. Instead of insulting the intelligence of the readers by interpreting things for him in terms of the revolutionary doctrine, writ large, and in black and white, you left something for him.

You presented some highly explosive facts in little easy-to-read packets. This draws the reader in, instead of turning him off by a high-definition ideological harangue. Certainly in the long run this is the best approach. I hope you keep it up.

What does Renaissance '71 mean to you?

Renaissance — what does it mean to you?

Another museum of art to intellectually browse through?

A competition of some sort? An advertising campaign for new art and culture?

The purpose of the Festival is "to bring together the very best examples of Canadian university students' talents to the public and university audiences' attention", so says Clive Hobson, Public Relations Director for Renaissance.

Students from universities throughout Canada have been invited to participate in a ten-day showcase of art, photography, film, drama, music, and creative writing. And the big attraction, what will attract all the potential artists on our campuses, is the adjudication by professional, established artists.

So far Renaissance has spent $9,000. It is being organized by a group of students who have had a lot of difficulties in promoting and financing a type of Festival whose contribution to art is perhaps questionable. The active process of creating art, getting together to work with new and better materials, seems to have been pushed aside to emphasize the rating and, as always, display of art as objects (as in, if you want to see Art, straight down the corridor and to your left). Money always seems to be available to collect art. Government programs are continuously trying to arrange for this. And that's not a bad thing. But when university students want to get into the picture, shouldn't they perhaps start, for once, on the production aspect, on the creative working and thinking happening in heads of artists all through Canada. These people would really appreciate a festival financed for the purpose of getting these things together.

An annual arts Festival is a good idea. But what exactly does Renaissance '71 mean to you?

Bethune and Trudeau in historical analogy

Newlove told me that Bethune reminded him of Sir Philip Sydney — "Thy necessity is greater than mine" (Zaney but true, though the necessity Bethune saw was of an army, a nation, a revolution, a world...)

By the same token Trudeau reminds us of Sir Henry Morgan. Who after a profitable career at piracy retired to become a governor. And in that capacity hanged several of his old partners in (well you could call it crime: it's always called that but if you look into the history of bucaneeering it appears more like insurrection...)

Milton Acorn

When Canadian poet Milton Acorn sent us this poem, here published for the first time, he enclosed a note: "I was happy when you printed the Joe Rosenblatt poem, countersigned by me, upon the War Measures Act. I would also be even happier if you printed the accompanying poem by me. I like to get out front, carrying the flag. I figure that's the safest spot for me."

ART

Aggregation, at 73 Jarvis, is now showing works by gallery artists. Dik Zander draws inspiration from urban buildings for his plexiglass constructions, but by filling them with layers of coloured glycol, discovers beauty not readily apparent in the concrete originals.

An effective work is a paper-weight suggestive in shape of the Toronto City Hall, but lit in flowing curves by the glycol. His designs are also sold as pendants and rings.

Of the wall paintings, most powerful are the oils by Ed Bartram. By experimenting with the effect of oil paint over cord and carbon particles, he achieves a unique patterning which suggests primitive cell and atom formations.

The watercolours by Doreen Foster betray an intensive study of Rousseau, Beardsley and Chagall, but the sensitive, often hesitant use of line and the poetic mingling of colour raises the works beyond the level of mere imitations.

The art exhibit on the sixth floor of Sid Smith is mainly a fourth-year student effort, under the direction of Mr. Rifat Janice Wilson's lavatory art and the twisting plastic transparencies of Kathy Stasko are solutions to the problem of plastic art using soft canvas.

Susan Mason's canvas, based on the golden section, is both ably and imaginatively accomplished. The highlight of the exhibit, however, is a kinetic design by a second-year student which combines foam rubber and fluorescent paint for explosive effect. — L.C.

MUSIC

Opening at the Riverboat last month for a ten-day stay, Tim Hardin showed why his popularity will be longlasting even though he has never reached the star status of a James Taylor or Neil Young.

Looking small behind his guitar, the now-bearded Hardin started predictably with "Reason to Believe," the song that says it all. Friendly and talkative between songs, from the first note he closes his eyes and, seemingly oblivious to all around him, allows his simple human songs to speak for him. His deep and mellow voice vibrating from a soft whisper to a bluesy plaintiveness, he infuses as much sincere emotion into old songs like "Black Sheep Boy" and "Misty Roses" as when he wrote them. He seems to relive the experiences behind each song, which is why his blues are natural and in-born instead of strained and meaningless like those of so many white blues singers.

His format is simple, but his fluent guitar and piano create just the mood he wishes to convey. Combined with his distinctive voice and his occasional slurring of the words for effect, they are the perfect vehicle for his thoughts. "How can we hang on to a dream that don't ever seem like it will become real?"

It's unfortunate that Hardin has temporarily been pushed into the background by flooding the record market with too much of his poorer work — maybe more live appearances will make people see again that he still has a lot to offer. — M.L.

CENSORED

The article which was scheduled to appear in this space has been censored by The Varsity's printers, Web Offset Publications Ltd.

Entitled Very Pleasurable Politics, the story was the third in a series of stories running this week dealing with various aspects of love and human sexuality. Monday we printed Liz Willick's If I Could Turn You On . . . and Wednesday we printed Betty Dodson's The Masculine Mystique.

Originally printed in RAT, a New York women's newspaper, today's feature discussed the need to be able to experience pleasure without feelings of shame or guilt.

Basically, the theme of the article was that the more you know about your body the easier it is to give yourself pleasure and to show someone else what gives you pleasure.

In addition to a biology text diagram of a woman's genital, the feature described how women could become more familiar with their own anatomy. The authors — women working on RAT — suggested ways in which women could explore their own sexuality, especially by stimulating the clitoris.

Web Offset's general manager, Bob Chittick, said they were refusing to print the feature on the advice of their lawyer, Douglas Wilkins. Chittick also said that he doesn't like "that kind of obscene material."

Toronto lawyer Clayton Ruby, consulted Wednesday by The Varsity, said he found the story "entirely innocuous" and found it "not in any way obscene."

Ruby added he thought the article contained information "women ought to have — and men ought to have too."

Web Offset also consulted their lawyer about the Wednesday article, The Masculine Mystique. Wilkins gave that article his legal OK.

The Varsity has been censored twice in the last few months by its printers. On both occasions, the printers were acting on their interpretation of the Public Order Regulations of the War Measures Act.

The usual definitions of obscenity simply do not apply to today's story.

The material definitely does not arouse sexually or appeal to "prurient interest". On the contrary, it is a straightforward and rational account.

The sole reason for printing it is that we consider the article to be an important statement of both fact and feelings which, readers of The Varsity, as adult men and women are capable of using in their attempts to achieve liberation from the feelings of guilt and shame about our own bodies which our society has fostered in us.

Readers of The Varsity, we believed, would see this story not as an isolated off-colour story, but as a continuation of the debate on sexuality and human liberation which has been going on in the pages of the paper this year. A glance at some of today's opinions in the Write on: section can only confirm the need for that debate.

A further couple of notes should be added.

- for years The Varsity — as well as other media and many public figures — have taken the stand that the right to freedom of information is a basic human right. We continue to assert that.

- the decision to censor this article was taken by men — not by women — and that is an important indication of the sexist bias of our society. Perhaps there would not have been the same objections if this was an article written by a man, dealing honestly and forthrightly with problems of male sexuality. There might have been chuckles, but perhaps no serious challenges.

In a male society, it seems, it is usually the female body which is regarded as obscene.

- This is the first time The Varsity has had problems printing this kind of material. We wonder why. Web Offset also prints the Toike Oike, U of T's engineering society newspaper, which practically all of its readers would agree, treats sexuality in a sexist, degrading, often anti-human and offensive way.

In this and other articles we are trying to break the rule which says that sexuality — and the reality of masturbation, for instance — are nasty private acts that should not be talked about.

Those of us who still believed that freedom of speech and information existed have been faced with a glaring contradiction.

Freedom of speech belongs to those who own the means of production — in this case our printers.

Parkins quits Chancellor race

By C. P. STILES

Charging that the election procedures are undemocratic, the first contender for the post of Chancellor of U of T has withdrawn his nomination.

R. J. Parkins, a 1967 U of T graduate declared his candidacy Monday, promising to "solve some of the problems of the university and the world" if given the chance.

The Chancellor was selected by the Committee made up of graduate members of the Senate plus the president of the Alumni Association. Whoever holds the position has the right to confer degrees. More important the Chancellor alone has the power to call together an emergency convocation.

At a surprise press conference called in his fashionable North York Apartment Wednesday, Parkins, tight-lipped and grim, issued a brief statement, attacking the undemocratic operation of the university.

Parkins suggested that the Chancellor be chosen by "the university community as a whole," by write-in ballots from all alumni students, faculty, administrators and support staff.

Dressed casually in grey slacks and a dark blue shirt without a carnation, Parkins remained calm and composed, a twitch in his left cheek being the only betrayal of a strenuous week of decision and disappointment.

Parkins had almost withdrawn Tuesday because of financial considerations, but a powerful grass-roots movement persuaded him to reconsider. The final obduracy of U of T's election procedures was the last straw, according to sources near the candidate.

Nomination and election procedures for university officials like the Chancellor are set out in the U of T Act. Only a British subject who lives in Ontario and is not a student, faculty member or bureaucrat at U of T is eligible.

Alumni Association president C. Ian P. Tate said Parkins charges "have no validity as long as the Act is that which governs."

"On the other hand I can see his point," said Tate, "and if he wants to he can agitate to see that the Act is changed."

According to Patty Fleury, secretary of the Elections Committee, no other applications have been received. Parkins application was never officially presented to the committee.

Anybody with the required qualifications may be nominated by ten graduates; the deadline is April 7.

FAC decides on parity Tuesday

The next episode in the continuing drama of the Arts and Science Faculty Council Restructuring Hassle is scheduled for this Tuesday afternoon in Convocation Hall. Curtain time is 4.15, and the public is invited.

In this meeting, which was postponed twice before Christmas, the entire 1300 staff members will gather to discuss whether or not to throw out the student restructuring motion that was passed on November 30 by the 169 member General Committee. The 34 student members and their alternates will also be permitted to participate.

The 15 disgruntled faculty who called the full meeting have proposed that the restructuring committee consist of six faculty and two students, instead of five of each, as was originally passed.

They also want the date when the committee is to report changed from March 1 to April 1. This change would make the holding of elections for the new body practically impossible until next year. Principle A. C. H. Hallett, who seconded the parity motion, emphasized at the time that a delay in setting up the committee would hamper the work of the Faculty Council for yet another year.

The passing of the original motion followed a referendum in the faculty in which a record 49.8% of the students voted, with close to 90% supporting parity.

Although the original motion as moved by Brian Morgan called for the committee to be set up "immediately", the faculty move has effectively postponed its creation for over a month. Dean Allen cast aside suggestions before Christmas that the committee start work anyway and its efforts be annulled if necessary as a result of the decision of the full Council.

The General Committee was originally formed to carry out the work of the Faculty Council because of the ineffectiveness of the full body. This committee had been operating for three months before it in turn was declared ineffective, and the full body called to deal with this issue.

Immigrants are equal

TORONTO (CUP) — York University's Political Science Department last Monday decided to hire non-Canadians on the same basis as Canadian citizens.

At a departmental council meeting the department reaffirmed the "two file" system of hiring qualified Canadians before non-Canadians but gave "Canadian" status to foreign nationals who are studying for a PhD in Canada and have applied for immigrant status.

At the meeting department members argued that a foreign citizen who has moved to Canada is showing a commitment to this country which is greater than that of a Canadian studying in the United States.

The vote on the two file system comes as a result of a dispute within the department which arose over the proposed hiring of an American expert in international relations. The department has been looking for someone to fill this position for several years. The recruiting committee could not find a suitable Canadian and turned to the foreign file.

However at a meeting of the departmental council, the American failed to receive a strong vote of acceptance from the department. It was decided not to hire anyone to fill the senior position.

Monday the council decided that the funds which would have been used to hire the senior international relations specialist should now go to hiring three or four junior faculty with priority going to an expert in Canadian government and political theory.

It was originally felt by some members of the department, however, that the procedure used in not hiring the American implied that no non-Canadians were to be hired in future. For this reason, the two file system was reaffirmed.

Department Chairman Harold Kaolan explained that the system had been instituted as a sort of "protective tariff" which was legitimate given the small size of the Canadian market.

He added that it has been much easier for Americans to obtain position in Canada than the reverse.

THE ONLY victory in league competition for the Varsity basketball Blues last year came at the expense of the Waterloo Warriors, pictured above battling Blues at the York gym. If Blues are to repeat that upset when they meet the Warriors in Waterloo tomorrow evening, they will require top performances from players like forward Bill Caskey (left) and guard Garth Evans (right). Evans was the star of last year's upset when he came off the bench to score 26 points, sparking the team. Caskey, 20, is 6-foot-4 and coach John McManus will likely start him at one of the forward spots.

Cage Blues to Waterloo, seeking initial victory

By PETER WHITE

Varsity Blue basketballers return tomorrow night to the seat of their only 1970 coup — that's Waterloo.

Last year's surprise 86-81 victory featured the inspiring play of veteran guard Garth Evans who, on that weird and wonderful night, came off the bench to replace an injured Mike Katz to outslug the Warrior's king slinger, Jaan Laaniste, 26-18 in leading our guys to victory.

Can we do it again? Depends a lot on whether we want to, and it would sure help if a recent visitor to these parts — a little fela called Wilty — could go along for the ride.

In any case, victory will require not only a good team effort but also another inspired performance.

Waterloo matches up, man for man, with any team in the league. Add to this, invective felt for a heartbreaking three-point loss to Guelph in their last league outing, and Blues are not in for a normal night. Blues will simply have to produce; someone will probably have to have another big shooting night.

Bill Boston leads a low scoring Toronto forecourt against a muscular collection of Warriors, a Bilewicz, a Linzinsky, a Lance and a Dragon to pin their hopes on. Varsity's backcourt, however, should be a match for Waterloo's Kiewswetter and Laaniste. Laaniste, usually a high scorer, has had only failure against recent Toronto defences.

Blues' Larry Trafford is always superb. Ron Voake and Evans, steady but unspectacular so far, can be expected to bridge the gap of their mediocrity soon.

Blues are looking for another upset, to stir things up a little more in an already shaky league.

Probable starters: Guards: Voake, Trafford. Forwards: Angus Braid, Bill Caskey, Boston

Guelph here tonight

Blues rebound, trounce Mustangs 11-6

By PAUL CARSON

London — Varsity Blues' hockey fans relax, there's life in them Blues still.

Throwing defence to the winds, Blues outscored the Western Mustangs 11-6 here last night for their highest goal production of the season.

The victory, sixth in seven league games, gives Varsity a two-point lead over the Waterloo Warriors in the hot OQAA Western Division race.

Blues will have a chance to pad that lead tonight when they meet the Guelph Gryphons in Varsity Arena at 8:00 p.m.

With centers Brent Imlach injured and Ivan McFarlane not playing, coach Tom Watt dipped into his repertoire of permutations and came up with the following three new lines:

Nick Holmes, normally a left-winger, centered wingers Dan McCann and Kaz Lysionek to form one combination, Brian St. John — Bill Buba — Terry Peterman and John Wright — Gord Davies — Scott Seagrist were the other two groups. Mac Hickox split time with Davies who was still feeling the effects of a bout with the flu.

Leading 3-1 after the first period, Blues went to work quickly as team captain Wright blasted home his thirteenth goal of the season with a slapshot from the blueline after only 11 seconds of play.

Buba potted a rebound behind Mustang goalie Pat Grace and Western coach Ron Johnstone replaced Grace with Mac Smith. However, just six minutes later, Buba connected again on a breakaway to give Blues a 6-1 margin.

But then Blues started to play giveaway hockey and Western cut the lead to 8-5.

Cole Sharp

Sharp goaltending by Blues' Grant Cole and Smith featured the third stanza as Varsity outshot the Mustangs 17-5 for an overall total of 48-30.

Blues defensive play improved considerably in the third period, especially after defenceman Brent Swanick took a major for butt-ending at 5:55.

Varsity's tenacious checking limited the Stangs' "power play" to only one shot during the five minutes of Swanick's penalty!

Toronto penalty killers had a good day, picking up no less than three short-handed goals, Hickox in the first period, defenceman Nels Debenedet and Lysionek in the third.

Other Varsity goals went to Peterman, Davies, Dave McDowall, McCann and Seagrist. It was the first goals for both McCann and Seagrist as members of Blues.

Despite six Western goals, Cole played an outstanding game while guarding the Varsity net. Frequently abandoned by his defence, he often had to stop two or three shots in succession.

Perhaps an indication of the scoring balance on this year's team, the game only produced one two-goal scorer — left-winger Buba.

Blue Notes: Blues' first game with the Mustangs, on November 19, ended in an 8-3 Varsity triumph.

Mash McCann: first Varsity goal

Scott Seagrist: first Varsity goal

Swim Blues in top form at McMaster

The University of Toronto Men's and Women's Swim Teams travelled to McMaster Wednesday evening and both groups came home victorious.

The Blues won handily, 78-35, while the Bluettes were forced to win the last relay for a narrow 70-64 triumph.

For the girls, the victory was without the aid of several of their best swimmers, including Merrily Stratten.

They remain undefeated in dual meet competition.

Outstanding for the girls was Randy Croome, event winner in the 50-yard backstroke, 100-yard backstroke and 200-yard freestyle relay and Frances Flint, winner of the 50-yard butterfly.

ON THE MEN'S SIDE the Swim Blues, coached by Robin Campbell, were easily able to contain the McMaster team, allowing only one win in swimming (50-yard free style) and two diving victories.

Event winners for Blues were Adam Gesing (1000-yard freestyle, 500-yard freestyle), Jim Adams (200-yard freestyle, 100-yard freestyle), Nick Rottman (100-yard breast) and Alex Fedko (200-yard butterfly, 200-yard individual medley).

Best noted for his sprint events, Fedko will probably swim the 200 fly and 200 I.M. in the OQAA championships to be held at Queens early in February.

A surprising performance was achieved by freshman Jock McLaue in winning the 200-yard backstroke. For his performance in the backstroke and freestyle relays, McRae was selected as the meet's top swimmer.

After this relatively easy meet against Mac, Blues will host Western Mustangs tomorrow in the Benson Building beginning at 2:00 p.m.

Western, who have two members from the Canadian Student Games Team, obviously will provide better competition for our defending national championship squad. The meet will feature a dual between the Mustang's Craig Gould and Varsity's sprint team. In addition, the 200-yard breaststroke should be an especially interesting contest.

Varsity curlers host bonspiel on Saturday

Intercollegiate curling action comes to Toronto this Saturday when Erindale College and the University of Toronto Curling Club jointly host a bonspiel at the Royal Canadian Curling Club.

Entries from Queen's, Trent, Brock, Laurentian, McMaster, York, Western, Waterloo, and Toronto are entered in this first event of its kind held here. Rinks skipped by George Carr, Dave Patroch, and Tom Takenaka will carry Varsity colours.

Action starts at 11:00 a.m., with later draws at 2:30 and 6:00 p.m. Spectators are welcome at the Club, which is at the corner of Queen and Broadview.

Crucial trial awaits parity Tuesday

A special meeting of the 1330-man Arts and Science Faculty Council tomorrow will attempt to veto a decision made in November which in effect, endorses the principle of parity.

The meeting slated for 4 p.m. at Convocation Hall was called at the insistence of fifteen faculty members. Incensed at a motion passed by the Council's 169-man General Committee to set up a commission comprised of five faculty and five students to recommend a restructuring of the Faculty Council.

The commission, which would only have an advisory status, was originally slated to report before March 1. The counter-motion, presented tomorrow asks for a commission with six faculty and two students, to report before April 1, when students would be involved in end of term work.

The latest move by conservative staff within the Arts faculty is the continuation of a battle begun last year when the Commission on University Government Report came out in favour of parity.

Frightened faculty members, fearing a form of student dictatorship of the proletariat, backed the vague and general anti-parity motion of J. M. Rist and W. H. Nelson last spring. Rist, on the strength of this backlash, was put in the chairmanship of the Association of Teaching Staff — a type of professorial union.

Rist and Nelson are among the 15 hardliners who called for tomorrow's meeting.

Last summer, the smaller 169-man body was set up as an interim measure to effectively replace the unwieldy full Council. After a futile attempt by the 34 student members on the body to create a parity commission which would recommend permanent changes, students withdrew to hold a faculty-wide referendum on the question

The referendum which produced one of the heaviest voting turn-outs in U of T's recent history, polled 88.5% in favour of parity. In addition, over 4700 voted that student members pull out if a parity committee were not set up.

On the strength of the referendum, the General Council reversed its earlier motion and called for the parity commission.

Observers note that moderate elements in the Referendum Action Committee, set up to oppose the 15, are having trouble in controlling more radical elements. Although no disruptions have been officially planned for tomorrow's meeting, seasoned veterans of faculty council disputes remember the incident last year, when amidst flying peanut shells, a shoving match ensued at the Rist-Nelson anti-parity meeting.

Jacques Larue-Langlois

Langlois speaks here today

Quebecois want independence, revolution

The majority of the Quebecois support the struggle for the independence of their nation, Jacques Larue-Langlois told a Toronto audience yesterday afternoon.

And national liberation, he added, ultimately means the destruction of capitalism.

"The revolution will not be made by a small group of intellectuals," he said. "They have locked up 50 people, but the struggle is resting on the vast majority of the workers of Quebec."

Langlois, charged with seditious conspiracy, was imprisoned in Montreal for three months before being granted $5,000 bail. He is the only one of the so-called "Montreal Five" now at liberty.

The only reason the Quebec authorities will not allow bail to the others, he said, was because "they will keep on talking, keep on continuing the struggle for liberation."

He added that after his release his judge cautioned him "to be careful with your public declarations."

Langlois said he disliked the use of the term "Montreal Five" and reminded the overflow audience of more than 500 people at the College of Education auditorium, that 51 people remain imprisoned in Quebec.

If you count out the 16 people arrested specifically for the kidnappings and the "execution" of Pierre Laporte, said Langlois, that leaves 35 people in jail "strictly for their political ideas."

The War Measures Act, said Langlois, should not have surprised us.

"It was within the logic of the system to react by relying on the only basis for its survival — the police and armed forces."

Although it was important to protest abuses of power by Quebec authorities, it was also significant not to forget the real object of the emergency measures taken by the government

"In the eyes of capitalism," said Langlois, "Everything is illegal that tends to question their scandalous profits. That is their real objective."

In answer to questions Langlois said the leaders of the Parti Quebecois were "not attempting to attain the total liberation of Quebec, but only a certain degree of political liberation." He questioned the value of elections as an instrument for attaining radical social and economic change.

"Are we to expect that the system — capitalism — will give us the weapons — elections — to destroy that system," he asked.

In answer to another question, who wondered whether support for separatism in Quebec "included the working class," Langlois replied:

"It can't be done without the working class — they are the exploited."

Langlois will be speaking today at 1 p.m. in the Hart House Debates Room at a meeting sponsored jointly by SAC and the Committee for a Free Quebec.

Gerald Godin, a member of the editorial board of the left-wing Quebec weekly Quebec-Press, singled out Pierre Elliott Trudeau ("the cool one"), Jean Drapeau ("a restaurant owner who doesn't pay his rent"), and Robert Bourassa ("the rookie"), as the main people behind the War Measures Act.

He accused them of creating the "theory of a very big mass revolutionary movement" in Quebec.

"There are revolutionaries in Quebec," Godin added, "but in their wildest dreams they never thought there could be an insurrection in Quebec in 1970."

"Except for Trudeau," Godin singled out Drapeau as having special interest in creating an atmosphere of hysteria and fear on the eve of the Montreal municipal elections.

Godin fingers Drapeau

"For the first time, there was universal suffrage in Montreal," Godin pointed out. "and there was a consistent opposition slate of candidates."

Bourassa, said Godin, was "stampeded" into action by Drapeau, even though the majority of his cabinet wanted to negotiate for the release of Pierre Laporte.

"Back in the '60's," Godin recalled, "Jean Lesage used to say there were not more than 500 separatists in Quebec."

"Marchand used to say that separatists were infiltrating the CBC, the schools, the government — and that there were only 200 of them altogether.

"Now, after two people were kidnapped, suddenly Marchand is saying there are 3,000 terrorists — which is like rabbits, you know."

Godin added that from what he could see in the press, it seemed that most English Canadians "think they have nothing to fear".

"But if ever they begin to organize against the actual system which exists in Canada, they too will be arrested."

Chanteuse Pauline Julien, who, like Godin, spend 8 days in prison in October, recalled that "you are absolutely nothing but a numero uno when you are in jail."

"If all the Quebecois are not in jail," she continued in French, "the daily threat which still exists is enough to turn all our rights into a petit rien."

Union organizer Guy Marcolaif, who is also working with the Mouvement pour la Defense des prisonniers politiques Quebecois, urged English Canadians to time demonstrations to coincide with those scheduled in Quebec, "so that all Canada knows that we are not alone in this fight". Protests are planned in Montreal and Quebec for Jan. 20 and for when more "political trials" begin in February.

He warned that the "political mafia, in the service of Trudeau, himself a waterboy of Nixon, is planning to install fascism completely in Quebec."

"When they have done that," he added, "it will be your turn."

U of T metallurgy professor Ursula Franklin called for repeal of the Public Order Temporary Measures Act, saying that "we can't live in a country where an association of people is labelled beforehand unlawful" and where the government "presumes the right to tell me whom to talk to, what to read, who to associate with."

"My deepest concern is one of reconciliation," she said. "it is essential in a time of crisis to be close to those with whom I might disagree most."

Toronto lawyer Clayton Ruby, a member of the Law Union, pointed out that the laws introduced by the federal government turned "political beliefs and advocacy" into crimes.

Ruby said the laws dispensed with the traditional right of the accused to have an immediate preliminary hearing to determine whether there was any case against him, and also did away with the right to bail.

"The only reason Lemieux is still in jail is because of what he'll say when he gets out," said Ruby.

Ruby added that a prime legal objection to government legislation was that it was retroactive.

"If the purpose of the FLQ was to show the harsh and repressive nature of the government, then it has succeeded," added Ruby. "If their purpose was to show that the law is a political tool, it has succeeded."

At the end of yesterday's meeting Doris Power, a welfare mother helping to organize the poor people's National Day of Protest set for January 25, read a statement from the Toronto Organizing Committee.

The statement is printed in full on page 3.

Dear Faculty Member:

(The following is the copy of a letter sent to all faculty members of the arts and science council). On January 19th you will be asked to vote on a resolution vetoing the decision of the General Committee of the Faculty Council to set up a restructuring committee with equal staff-student representation. Your presence and vote at that time will mean a great deal to the students you teach.

For over three years students and faculty have been moving to restructure the Faculty Council. During these years we have discussed at great length the issues of openness, parity, constituencies and departmental membership. We have agreed on some of these issues; others remain to be resolved. But in this case the question facing you on January 19th is a much simpler one — what regard do you have for the opinions of the students of this Faculty? For over a year the students' representatives have worked patiently and peacefully for reform in this area.

We sat on the committees last year: met frequently among ourselves to discuss the issues; approached the Faculty Council and the General Committee several times last fall seeking only a restructuring committee with equal staff-student representation, able to report while students were still in classes. Finally, in desperation, we held a Referendum on the question. Forty-nine percent of the students voted. Eighty-three percent instructed their representatives to withdraw if the committee was not set up. It was — and we thought we could go on with the regular business of Council.

Unfortunately a small group of disgruntled faculty members have forced us to debate the question again. What more can we do? We feel the students have expressed their position as rationally, as reasonably, and as clearly as possible. If you have any regard for their opinion, please make that known now, on January 19th.

It is time for the Faculty Council to get back to the work at hand.

Peter Hall (SAC University Commissioner), J. Rodney Hurd (President, SAC), Robert Spencer (SAC Education Commissioner), Larry Hoffman (President, GSU).

Sweet parity sours faculty

Five of the 15 disgruntled faculty members who petitioned for the special meeting of the 1330-man Arts and Science Faculty Council tomorrow, explain below their views on parity, the meeting, and students in general.

The Varsity — John Johnson

W. H. Nelson

The original co-sponsors of anti-parity motions in the faculty council, John Rist and W. H. Nelson, cannot agree on their timing. "It's too late," said Rist last night, when asked to comment on the Tuesday meeting.

The Varsity — Jon Harsemeyer

J.M. Rist

Nelson, on the other hand said it was too early to make any statement. "You'll hear my arguments in the debate Tuesday," he said.

J. B. Conacher

J. B. Conacher — Professor, Department of History. "You represent a fairly small elite among the students."

Even after a referendum in which more people participated than ever before on any issue on this campus, Conacher and others still believe that the cry for reform is a cry in the wilderness. After explaining last night that students didn't care whether they had parity on the Council or not, Conacher urged students not to "Cut off their noses to spite their face" and consider the faculty arguments. After all, the "idealists have set their sights too high" and the university should not be run by students and faculty equally because the faculty are better equipped to do it.

The Varsity — David Lloyd

D. G. HUNTLEY — Professor, Department of Slavic Languages.

Between bites on an apple, D. G. Huntley, last night offered the juicy information that he had "heard rumours of a disruption" at tomorrow's meeting.

When asked what his grounds were for taking the rumour seriously, he replied "I have no grounds whatsoever". It seems that he had gotten his information from "somebody else."

Who knows what evil lurks in the hearts of men?

What's happened in parity fight so far

- Summer 1970: The Faculty Council was restructured on an interim basis for 1970-71. The 1330-member Council, including 68 students, retained veto power over the new General Committee which was set up to carry on the normal work of the Council. This General Committee consists of 169 members of which 34 are students.
- Sept. 28: The student motion calling for a total restructuring of the Council along parity lines was tabled until the October meeting.
- Oct. 28: That motion to restructure was tabled until April.
- Oct. 30: Student members withdrew from the Council.
- Nov. 24-25: In a referendum 88.5% voted in favour of parity. Student turn-out in the Faculty was a record 50%.
- Nov. 30: On the strength of the referendum, a student motion for a parity restructuring commission was reintroduced and passed by the General Committee.
- Dec. 4: Fifteen faculty members called a meeting of the full 1330-member Council to veto the formation of the parity commission. That meeting, to be held Dec. 14th, was postponed to Dec. 19th and then postponed again until Jan. 19th.
- Jan. 19: The Faculty Council will meet in Convocation Hall at 4:10 in an attempt to reverse the November parity motion by proposing a restructuring commission of six faculty and two students rather than the original five faculty and five students.

Surprise: the poor support the rich at university

CUP (OTTAWA) — "Poor may be subsidizing rich students, educators told," read some of the headlines in the daily press last week, indicating the surprise discovery of the Economic Council of Canada

Student leaders were among the least surprised, however, because in 1964 an analysis of the Canadian Union of Students pointed out that 28 per cent of Canadian university students came from families earning less than $5,000 but 52 per cent of the families in Canada earned less than $5,000.

These students were aware that the government pays for 80-90% of higher education, and 80% of the taxes come from individuals, the majority of which were not directly benefiting from higher education.

Only now, years later, Arthur Smith, Chairman of the ECC is telling us, "The great bulk of tax revenues are derived from families with low incomes... as much as two thirds of all the tax revenues available for financing post-secondary education may well be coming from households with gross incomes of less than $10,000 a year"

"Higher education may be tending to become a mechanism for transferring income from poor families to rich families," he said.

May?

EOB is a blanket name for a tuition loan plan that will replace OSAP, and will probably mean a tuition hike to full cost. Each tuition loan, not grant, will be repaid by an income tax type plan after university.

The government is finding it very convenient to dredge up appalling statistics of tax inequalities and stratification at the university to justify their new schemes of university non-subsidization. A scheme which has yet to be shown as an answer to the class basis for the university.

SAC brief needs contributors

The SAC Education Commission would like to form a small working group to prepare a student brief to the Commission on Post-Secondary Education, on roles and aims of post-secondary education.

We urge you to aid in the preparation of this brief since all university sectors should be represented.

There are deadlines, however, as the Commission meets in Toronto twice more this year — Wed. February 10 and Wed. March 31.

Take a liberal issue . . .

Take a liberal issue,
Put it in a pie;

The furor in the Faculty of Arts is of interest partly because of its stubbornness. At the first meeting of the Faculty in the fall the question of the re-structuring committee was tabled. Since that time the committee has been seen, by both students and faculty members, as a way to bring about peaceful co-operation and smooth operating procedures. If we do things right we won't have to worry about radicals disrupting our University.

This logic leaves a bit to be desired since radical objectives are only partly met by a democratized decision-making machinery. It is likely that we would have much to demand until the entire nature of our class society and its educational concepts are changed.

Nonetheless, this desire to work things through within the limits of the system as it now exists has been very much evident throughout the entirety of the debate. Even now, student members of the faculty feel that an outright disruption of the Tuesday meeting would create a loss of respect and an unnecessarily hostile atmosphere.

The stubbornness comes from the fact that some faculty members are driving essentially reformist and peacefully-minded students to the brink of desperation. If the University cannot recognize the need to accept change within its ranks, then something must be done to open up its awareness to that need. The desire for a committee to make recommendations is not in itself a radical or revolutionary step. The failure to bring such a committee about is almost sure to bring about an intensification of the contradictions — as students begin to take more and more dramatic steps to gain recognition.

The first attempt was the referendum — a perfectly constitutional and reasonable step.

If the Tuesday meeting fails to recognize the significance and weight of that referendum — both in terms of its result and the peaceful constitutional means that it represents, then perhaps we cannot expect students to continue to rely upon those means.

Should the faculty council fail to uphold the decision of the general committee, there are still constitutional avenues available — appeal to the president; the convening of a convocation. But, it would be expecting a lot to ask perpetually frustrated students to rely solely upon such procedures. The success of an appeal to President Bissell can be seen, even now, to be extremely dubious. He is a lameduck leader renowned throughout the academic world for his ability to say "maybe", while convincing everyone that he is saying "yes" or "no." The failure of the university to assess its continuing responsibility for day-care is a perfect example.

Thus we may expect that if the student proposals are not upheld in Tuesday's meeting, extra-constitutional but still peaceful initiatives will be seen as increasingly justified and increasingly necessary.

A rotating sit-in, student strike, or other action will seem and in fact will be justified by the conditions that present themselves. And as such things also tend to escalate in themselves, it seems that the time to settle this issue of the re-structuring committee is now, before things are intensified.

Then we can get back to other, more important attempts to change the nature of the society and the university.

Parity is symbolic and psychological

Faculty objections to a parity restructuring committee in Arts and Science are based on a complete opposition to any application of the principle of parity in any committee or any governing body in the university. They recognize that we are not yet dealing in the Faculty Council debate with the structure of the permanent body itself, and that the present 1300-member Council can reject the recommendation of any restructuring committee, even if it were composed entirely of faculty.

They know that it was unnecessary to call the full Council now if all they were concerned about was the structure of the final body.

However, what these professors want to stop is the gradual process of the acceptance of parity in the thinking and attitudes of both staff and students, and the application of parity in increasingly important bodies in the university. Thus they feel they must absolutely oppose any application of parity whatsoever, even in committees such as this, which are temporary and over whose final decisions the faculty still hold overwhelming control.

What is behind students' demands for parity? What is the process of which the structure of this committee is only a small part, and to which these faculty are so unalterably opposed?

The acceptance of parity means the acceptance of students as full members in the university community.

It means that the activity of learning must be one in which staff and students participate equally together, and that the creation of an educational environment in one of the essential parts of this activity. This view assumes that the university community must be based on the mutual respect and co-operation of all the members of that community.

This is fundamentally an attitude of people toward each other and attitudes are never created by the imposition of a rule of behaviour or of a structure of government. This is why the concern of these few faculty is with the entire attitude, instead of just with maintaining control over final important structures.

Parity is ultimately symbolic and psychological. It implies the equal respect of all members of the community for the potential contribution of all the other members. It recognizes that these contributions are different — that professors have generally more experience, that students are often more directly affected by decisions, and so on, but that these contributions are essentially equally valuable, and necessary, in forming decisions affecting the community of which they are both a part. Parity is also symbolic of the fact that neither group, by uniting its full membership, can make the final over-riding decision.

The acceptance of parity in no way implies that students and staff are in two mutually exclusive camps, battling out each issue to the finish, determined to dominate the policy of the university. Anyone who has attended any meeting of either staff or students knows that on almost all issues except those dealing with the actual structure itself, both groups are scattered on either side. On substantive matters, monolithic unity is a myth.

Student support of parity does not even imply a dissatisfaction with the courses, professors, etc. that they presently have, although this is an obvious initiating cause. It is precisely because many students are able to find a majority of courses and professors that they are pleased with that they take no interest in the structures that determine these — the process of education.

To support parity is to support a completely different view of education than many people presently have, especially those who vehemently oppose parity. This view says that participation of each individual in the process of education is just as important as his participation in the classroom — even if the decisions made by the structures he participates in are generally the same as those made when he did not participate.

Of course it is an opportunity for a student to change conditions in the university, but more, it is an opportunity for him to change something in himself — to feel himself equally responsible for creating the environment in which he lives.

Effective participation in the process of education shows you that you do not have to accept the world as given, determined by powers beyond you and unreachably by you.

Students can have vast power through the Faculty Council to determine what their university world is like.

It is this view that the faculty members who called the full meeting are opposed to.

What CUG was about—what it means now

For most students and faculty in the university, the governing structure of their faculty is the most relevant; it makes practically all of the decisions that influence the academic procedures, and there is very seldom any need to go to a higher level for advice, instruction, except, perhaps, in the case of an appeal or grievance.

President Bissell's Commission on University Government made eight specific recommendations for faculty governing structures:

The question of student representation on these councils is no longer controversial: most faculty councils now have at least some students among their members. However, the proportion of student participation is still a matter of some concern. In our recommendations, we have accepted the principle of staff-student equality in representation on the faculty council, while providing for additional representation of academic administrators, i.e. department chairmen and deans. It was suggested to the Commission that administrators should serve as non-voting members of the faculty councils. This does not strike us as particularly realistic, or, more important, as particularly fair. Department chairmen should be on the councils as representatives of their departments; they cannot be expected to accept the responsibility of implementing policy decisions on which they — or their department — have no vote. This same argument obviously applies to deans and to assistant and associate deans. A faculty council on which department chairmen were not present would be simply unworkable.

... In summary, the Commission recommends:

Recommendation 74

*That, where feasible, all faculty councils consist of academic staff, students and administrators. That the proportion of representation of these three groups be as follows: * Academic Staff 2/5; Students 2/5; Administrators 1/5.*

Recommendation 75

That the size of faculty councils generally not exceed one hundred.

Recommendation 76

That all elections to faculty councils be on a constituency basis, so that staff and students may be fairly represented on council. That part-time staff, because their affiliation with the university may be minimal, have only a small representation, to be decided upon by the faculty council.

* We are recommending 40% staff and student representation as a right. If either group wants less for itself, it can have less. We would not insist on staff and students taking up seats involuntarily. If a faculty has no department chairman, or if, for any reason the number of "administrators" is too large or too small, another arrangement may be possible, but it should follow the above proportions as closely as possible and the final arrangement must be approved by the Governing Council.

Recommendation 77

That meetings of the faculty council and its committees generally be open.

Recommendation 78

That others (e.g. graduates, support staff, and secondary schools) be invited to send representatives to faculty councils.

Recommendation 79

That any student registered in the faculty be eligible for membership on the faculty council and to vote in elections to faculty council.

Recommendation 80

That any member of the full-time staff be eligible for membership on council and to vote in elections to faculty council.

Recommendation 81

That occasional meetings of all the academic citizens of each faculty (teachers and students) be held whenever the faculty council deems them useful, but only for purposes of information and to make recommendations to the faculty council.

The recommendations of the CUG Commission were a compromise, and they satisfied almost no-one: the faculty members feared an implied loss of power, and many resented the underlying concept of the equality of staff and students in the learning process.

Students, on the other hand, felt that even with parity, the percentage of students involved in the governing process would still be so small (especially compared to the percentage of faculty), that those students would become another student elite, and that those students would see themselves as servants of the governing processes of the faculty, and not as representatives of the students.

Students and members of the teaching staff are not the same; their major area of common interest is the learning process, usually in the classroom. But faculty members are also concerned with making a living, professional status, research (to a greater extent than students), etc. Students are concerned with future job possibilities, inter-personal relationships, self-development, etc. The "generation-gap" between students and staff produces a different set of needs and desires for both groups, both within and outside the university. Even in the classroom, the area of common interest, the perspective will be different for students and staff.

A governing structure that simply allows for equal representation of staff and students ignores these differences. Parity is a first step: as the CUG Report says, "Just as (the university) must ward off outside domination, whether of government, business, or any social group, so too, must it defend itself against domination by any internal group, whether it be faculty, students or administration."

What a faculty governing structure needs is a forum in which faculty can assemble and discuss their needs as faculty; a forum in which students can discuss their needs as students (in the faculty of Arts and Science, this could be a Union of Course Unions); then, a parity body on which representatives of the faculty and students could meet and make the necessary decisions that best meet the needs of all members of the academic community. This form of governance, known as parallel structures, is what the SAC recommended to the Commission on University Government in its brief.

It might be pointed out that many of the faculty governing structures that now exist (e.g. some students, but generally faculty dominated) function is "one-half of a parallel structure set-up". Faculty members, through their Association of Teaching Staff, are well organized, aware of their own needs, and articulate. In some faculties, all members of the teaching staff (usually associate professors and up) are also on the governing council (as is now the case in the Faculty of Arts and Science). Though some teachers will talk of "expertise" as being the rationale for their domination of a council, at the faculty council level, where very little of the discussion is in the specific field of an individual professor, most members of the teaching staff will debate from the point of view of legitimate self-interest, rather than that of objective analysis. Students, however, are denied this opportunity. They are usually well out-numbered, co-opted, and alienated from the student body they are supposed to serve.

One other question that is raised by both students and faculty members, is the status of academic administrators on the governing council. Fearing a "Kafkaesque" bureaucracy, many feel that administrators should not have a vote in council meetings, but should be simply administrators who carry out the wishes of the students. The Haist report, the document that currently outlines the university's policy on administrative positions (among other things) would seem to support this belief. "The positions of chairmen, deans and directors should continue to be held by persons who are themselves teachers and scholars, but who are willing to assume, for a time, special responsibility for the harmonious and effective functioning of the part of the University in which their appointment lies."

OTHER FACULTIES AT U of T

How are some of the faculties other than Arts & Science now governed?

ENGINEERING:

The Faculty Council of Applied Science and Engineering has approximately 200 faculty members, and positions for 24 students, though only 22 of these are filled. It meets in closed session. There are at the moment plans for revision. Last year the Special Committee on the Structure of the Faculty and Council (consisting of seven faculty members — no students) made recommendations. At present a Special Committee on Implementation of the New Faculty Structure (6 staff, 2 students) is in the process of implementing the recommendations of the earlier committee. According to a student member of the latter committee, "There may be a new governing structure in Engineering in '71-'72"

PHARMACY:

Above and outside of the Faculty of Pharmacy, there is a standing committee of the Senate known as the Board of Pharmaceutical Studies. There are no students on this body. Within the Faculty, however, the top governing body is the Council of the Faculty of Pharmacy: its members include some ex-officio administrators, all the teaching staff of the Faculty (both full and part-time), all faculty members from outside Pharmacy who give courses to Pharmacy students, and seven students (six undergrads, and one graduate student). This Council's meetings are open, though the meetings of its committees are closed, except to members of Council (which allows any faculty member to attend a committee meeting, but only those students who are on the Council). The membership of the committees is determined by the Striking Committee, which includes the Dean, one student, and five other members of the Council.

FOOD SCIENCES:

The Council of the Faculty of Food Sciences has no student members; furthermore, it meets in closed session. As long as the Faculty exists, so does the possibility of change.

MUSIC:

Until recently, the Council of the Faculty of Music also met in closed session, and with no student members. After the CUG report was issued, the Faculty Council, in a Brief to the CUG Programming Committee (Feb. 5, '70) commented: "It is the conviction of many members of the teaching staff of the Faculty of Music that, in a professional Faculty such as Music, students cannot be expected to decide on matters of appointments, tenure, and curriculum." This brief also questioned the universal application of the principle of openness, and the necessity of student-run course and teacher evaluations. Since then, the Council meetings have been opened, and there are now nine students on an approximately 50 member council.

ARCHITECTURE:

The Council of the Faculty of Architecture includes all the members of the Teaching Staff, and four students. However, nearly 75% of the students in the Faculty of Architecture, Urban and Regional Planning, and Landscape Architecture (to give its full name) are in the Department of Architecture. The Council of the Department consists of all the members of the staff in the department, and equal number of students, and one representative of the support staff. The students in this department are much more influenced by the decisions made at the departmental level than by those of the Faculty Council.

VUSAC supports student efforts

Sociology rejects faculty motion

The Sociology Students' Union wishes to express its regret that Council finds it necessary to review the motion passed by the General Committee of the Council on November 30

In examining the motion presented we find an argument which seems to ignore the spirit of the original motion. The motion passed was meant to allow investigation for possible change, precisely, a change in regard to the policy which the new motion uses as its base, parity

"Whereas the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science has repeatedly expressed its opposition to the existence of parity committees..."

The Sociology Students' Union finds this approach somewhat anti-democratic. It disregards even the possibility of changing conditions. It disregards the results of the Referendum of November 24, 25

We find the position of the new motion totally unacceptable. We ask that the members of the Council carefully consider the motion, and to reject it as an attempt at predetermination of the question.

Les Prokop
Chairman, Sociology Students' Union

... Support from Scarborough

We feel that the motion of November 30, 1970 setting up a parity review commission is the minimum that our students can support at this time and thus we urge you to defeat this new motion which changes the composition of the review commission to six faculty and two students.

THE COMPLEAT FACULTY COUNCIL

Will we be screwed again?

By PETER HALL

Tomorrow the Faculty Council meets. Tomorrow, the representatives of 1330 professors will be asked to tell the representatives of 12,000 students that four students on a nine man restructuring committee is too many. Two out of nine would be a nicer number.

"It's been nice, hut . . ."
"We appreciate your interest, hut . . ."
"Don't call us, we'll call you."
And I'm not going to be able to do anything but watch. Because I am a student. Every professor, associate professor, assistant professor, and lecturer in the Faculty of Arts and Science can vote. You and I can listen.

"Don't worry, only a hundred or so ever come out."
We doubted the student representatives last year . . . from 32 to 68."
"You should be glad. It took a year to get open meetings."

Actually I don't mind listening. We'll get to hear James Conacher, the man who came back from sabbatical only to find students sitting on his committees. ("How did that happen?") We'll get to watch the Nelson-Rist team in action — the dynamic history-classics department duo who spent three months last year arguing against parity — and won, only to have their motion ruled inapplicable in practice, by the chairman of the meeting. There is a star-studded cast. And a host of extras.

"Claude T. Bissell presents 'THE FACULTY COUNCIL', in cinemascope and technical colour. The hood and gore epic that won the hearts of millions."

"It's almost like real life!"
"15 disgruntled faculty challenge the world. 12,000 students eringe."

I suppose my point is very simple. But it has taken me a long time to learn. Students are expected to play a purely passive role in this university. They are to be consulted but they are not themselves expected to decide. They are to listen and to learn but they have nothing to say or to teach

At times I almost forget why we bother worrying about the structure of a Faculty Council, let alone the structure of restructuring committees. But then I go back to my classes. And I remember.

I remember that the Faculty Council in its meandering way defines the nature of my education and it defines my passive role in it. It ultimately decides the size of my classes, the lecture format, the type of subject material, and the methods of evaluation.

I just sat painfully through a two-hour seminar — painfully because I was embarrassed for the professor, who was so bad. It's not that he didn't know his material, nor that he wasn't interested in his students. He is a nice man with a good mind but he feels forced to stammer through this semi-seminar for two hours every week on some text, while the class sleeps (or sits painfully embarrassed) content to play their passive role . . . waiting for the exam, their one burst of desperate, alienating creative activity. It's like waiting for Godot.

Students know that the exam is all that counts. Getting interested in something can be a fatal distraction from school work.

You've got to learn self-discipline. So eat the shit. Students are expected to be passive. In the classroom, passive receptacles of knowledge. On decision-making structures, passive communicants for somebody else's decision. A good student should be seen but not heard.

Until we wake up and realize that as long as we remain in our passive role everything we do will simply reinforce the status quo, we will get nowhere. Listening to a lecture in Convocation Hall is just like listening to a lecture in Sid Smith Hall. Somebody else is talking and ultimately somebody else is acting. It is no wonder we are still debating the restructuring committee's structure instead of the structure of the Council itself.

One day last term, 6000 students woke up and voted in a referendum. Somebody told them that in a democracy that was how they influenced the shape of their life and education here.

Tomorrow, a few students will watch a few faculty veto the General Committee's decision they worked and voted for. The referendum marked the birth of democracy on this campus. Tomorrow could be its wake.

Any graduating student is eligible — all you need is the signatures of any 10 alumni — start with your parents. Fringe benefits of the job include the ability to grant degrees, call special university-wide Convocations, and chairmanship of the national Science Council.

If you are desperate, you might try appealing to Claude Bissell, the President of the University, or you might sit in his office — but don't expect many results. He can waffle even on a motherhood issue.

Finally for those desperate few of you who really know where your heads are there is the ultimate disruptive action. Petition the Faculty Council to hold a special meeting to consider your grievance. But beware. The Varsity might label you "one of a small group of disgruntled students".

When it happens, you can...

This month it's your turn. Tomorrow, the Faculty Council is going to veto the student proposal to set up a parity restructuring committee. Here is your handy guide on how to react when you are screwed.

If this doesn't work don't despair! You can still take out your frustrations.

One suggestion would be to appeal this issue to a special Convocation called for the entire university community. Twenty-five graduates (any 25 graduates) can petition the university to call a convocation of all faculty, Board of Governor members, and all alumni. That entails sending out over 200,000 letters at a cost of $5000, and then putting them up in Toronto. This can be done every two weeks and is guaranteed to disrupt the bureaucracy. (It is in the U of T Act. It's the LAW!)

WHEN YOU ARRIVE: sit in the first gallery. The floor is reserved for the Council. Access to the floor and exits can be gained either by the peripheral stairwells or directly over the ledge which separates the first gallery from the raised seats of the floor.

IF YOU WISH TO SPEAK: your student representatives or their alternates will introduce you. A roll call vote will be requested. Do not disrupt this process by cheering or booing.
